

OXFORD WORLD'S CLASSICS

OSCAR WILDE
THE PICTURE OF
DORIAN GRAY

OXFORD WORLD'S CLASSICS

THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY

OSCAR WILDE was born in Dublin in 1854, the son of an eminent surgeon and a poetess who wrote under the pseudonym 'Speranza'. He was educated at Trinity College Dublin and Magdalen College, Oxford where he founded an aesthetic cult, achieved a double first, and won the Newdigate Prize for Poetry. His first volume of poems appeared in 1881, and he began a career as a journalist in 1884. In the same year he married Constance Lloyd, and his two sons were born in 1885 and 1886.

In the late 1880s Wilde began publishing his critical essays and short stories. The notoriety of The Picture of Dorian Gray (1890, revised 1891) was swiftly followed by the success of Wilde's Society Comedies, Lady Windermere's Fan (1892), A Woman of No Importance (1893), An Ideal Husband (1895), and The Importance of Being Earnest (1895). In 1895, following his libel action against the Marquess of Queensberry, he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for homosexual conduct, as a result of which he wrote The Ballad of Reading Gaol (1898) and his confessional letter De Profundis (published in abridged form in 1905). On his release from prison in 1897 he lived in obscurity in Europe, and died in Paris in 1900.

JOSEPH BRISTOW is Professor of English at the University of California, Los Angeles. He is the editor of the Oxford English Texts edition of The Picture of Dorian Gray (volume iii of The Complete Works of Oscar Wilde, 2005). Other recent books include The Fin-de-Siècle Poem: English Literary Culture and the 1890s (2005).

OXFORD WORLD'S CLASSICS

For almost 100 years Oxford World's Classics have brought readers closer to the world's great literature. Now with over 700 titles—from the 4,000-year-old myths of Mesopotamia to the twentieth century's greatest novels—the series makes available lesser-known as well as celebrated writing.

The pocket-sized hardbacks of the early years contained introductions by Virginia Woolf, T. S. Eliot, Graham Greene, and other literary figures which enriched the experience of reading.

Today the series is recognized for its fine scholarship and reliability in texts that span world literature, drama and poetry, religion, philosophy and politics. Each edition includes perceptive commentary and essential background information to meet the changing needs of readers.

OXFORD WORLD'S CLASSICS

OSCAR WILDE

*The Picture of
Dorian Gray*

Edited with an Introduction and Notes by JOSEPH BRISTOW

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD

UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto

With offices in

Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

Editorial material © Joseph Bristow 2006

The moral rights of the author have been asserted Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

First published as a World's Classics paperback 1981
Reissued as an Oxford World's Classics paperback 1998
New edition 2006

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Wilde, Oscar, 1854–1900.

The picture of Dorian Gray/Oscar Wilde.—New ed./edited with an introduction and notes by Joseph Bristow.

p. cm.—(Oxford world's classics)

Includes bibliographical references.

1. Appearance (Philosophy)—Fiction. 2. Conduct of life—Fiction.
3. Portraits—Fiction. I. Bristow, Joseph. II. Title. III. Series.
PR5819.A2B75 2006 823'.8—dc22 2006013477

Typeset in Ehrhardt

by RefineCatch Limited, Bungay, Suffolk Printed in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, St Ives plc

ISBN 0–19–280729–3 978–0–19–280729–8

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This Oxford World's Classics edition of The Picture of Dorian Gray derives from the Oxford English Texts Edition of Oscar Wilde's novel that Oxford University Press issued in 2005. It would have been impossible for me to conduct advanced editorial work on Wilde's writings without the firm guidance of Professor Ian Small. I remain extremely grateful to him.

My editorial endeavours remain indebted to excellent resources provided by the University of California, Los Angeles. Peter Reill, Director of the Center for Seventeenth- and Eighteenth-Century Studies, kindly supported my research. While focusing mainly on humanities research based on the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century collections housed at the William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles, the Center also provides support for the use of other major collections held at the Clark, including the large archive relating to the life and works of Oscar Wilde. The staff at the Clark—especially Scott Jacobs, Jennifer Schaffner, and Suzanne Tatian—made a large number of sources available to me. My research assistants, Manushag N. Powell, Anne Sheehan, Johanna M. Schwartz, and Tamara Zwick, helped identify and check a large quantity of information.

Several colleagues in the UCLA English Department—Maximillian Novak, Felicity S. Nussbaum, and Thomas Wortham—advised me on a number of points of detail. Patrick Coleman, of the UCLA French Department, guided me on a French idiom. Julie Townsend helped with providing literal translations from French sources.

After the 2005 OET edition of The Picture of Dorian Gray appeared, Donald Mead, Chairman of the Oscar Wilde Society, London, kindly informed me that the manuscript of Wilde's 'Preface' to the novel had been recently bequeathed to the British Library. Sally Brown, Curator of Manuscripts at the British Library, generously allowed me access to this particular manuscript, as well as a host of others, that belong to the Hyde Eccles collection. At Oxford University Press, Judith Luna, editor of Oxford World's Classics, provided me with constructive responses as I prepared the present edition.

Any editor of The Picture of Dorian Gray remains indebted to the researches of four scholars in particular: Wilfried Edener, Bernard Fehr, Donald L. Lawler, and Isobel Murray. I have attempted to acknowledge their scholarship as fully as possible.

J.E.B.

January 2006

CONTENTS

Introduction	ix
Note on the Text	xxxiii
Select Bibliography	xxxiv
A Chronology of Oscar Wilde	xxxviii
THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY	i
Explanatory Notes	189

This page intentionally left blank

INTRODUCTION

Readers who do not wish to learn details of the plot will prefer to treat the Introduction as an Afterword.

OSCAR WILDE's only novel, The Picture of Dorian Gray, made its controversial first appearance in the July 1890 issue of the popular Lippincott's Monthly Magazine. Lippincott's was a well-established American literary periodical that, like its main rivals, Harper's and the Century, wished to increase its share of an expanding transatlantic market. Any aspiring author would seize on the opportunity to place his or her work in literary monthlies of this kind, since their immense sales (running into thousands) provided writers with much greater visibility and more handsome fees than most writers could obtain elsewhere. In the past, the J. B. Lippincott Company, based in Philadelphia, had given pride of place in their journal to American fiction, sometimes of a racy kind. But in the late 1880s, one of their editors, J. M. Stoddart, visited London to meet with a small number of talented literary men who had only recently come into the British public's eye. Stoddart arranged appointments with Arthur Conan Doyle, Rudyard Kipling, and Oscar Wilde; his plan was to invite them to contribute a 'novelette' to his monthly. These up-and-coming authors duly obliged. Doyle furnished The Sign of Four (February 1890), Kipling The Light that Failed (January 1891), and Wilde The Picture of Dorian Gray (July 1890). Each of these substantial works, which stood at the head of a list of contents that included sundry shorter contributions, including poems and reviews, aimed to broaden the magazine's appeal to audiences in both America and Britain.

Stoddart's offer was attractive to a comparatively unknown author such as Wilde. At the time, Wilde's literary career, which he had long hoped would flourish, was not overwhelmingly successful, even though he was for rather different reasons a household name. In 1881, when the young Oxford-educated Irishman achieved celebrity in London as a fashionable 'Professor of Aesthetics', he published a somewhat derivative volume of poems that the press was quick to satirize. Although Wilde subsequently earned large sums from giving public lectures on 'aesthetic' topics, such as home decoration, especially during his arduous ten-month tour of North America in 1882, he could hardly be labelled a writer of any distinction. But that is not to say he entirely failed to make his mark in the literary metropolis. Wilde spent much of the remainder of the decade producing a considerable quantity of intelligent journalism for newspapers such as the Pall Mall Gazette, and in 1887 he took up the editorship of the Woman's World, a largely feminist periodical which featured some of his most impressive reviews. It was only in 1888, when he completed The Happy Prince and Other Tales—a book of fairy stories based on ones he had told to his small sons—that the press began to take him seriously as a talented literary figure.

The next two years proved remarkably fertile, with a number of his arresting essays, including 'The Decay of Lying', appearing in journals such as the prestigious Nineteenth Century. In 1889 Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, whose high reputation stretched back to very early in the century, published Wilde's fine novella 'The Portrait of Mr W.H.', which explores in an ingeniously playful manner the love triangle featured in Shakespeare's sonnets. It was on the basis of Wilde's growing prominence that Stoddart offered Wilde a hefty £200 advance for a story of 30,000 or so words. Toward the end of 1889 Wilde presented Lippincott's with a fairy tale, 'The Fisherman and His Soul'. Stoddart, however, wanted a piece twice the length, and so Wilde immediately got down to writing a far more demanding narrative, one whose supernatural elements explored how horrifying forms of vice haunted the refined world of upper-class London. By the spring of the following year The Picture of Dorian Gray was ready for publication. Nine months later, Wilde would add six new chapters to his story so that it could be reissued in a single volume by Ward, Lock, and Co. (the London publisher which circulated the British edition of Lippincott's). The text of the novel contained in the present edition follows the twenty-chapter narrative that appeared, in an exquisite binding designed by Charles Ricketts, in the spring of 1891.

There is no question that The Picture of Dorian Gray, in both its 1890 and 1891 versions, aimed to attract attention because it tells a singularly thought-provoking tale—one that is far more complicated in its implications than it might at first appear. Wilde's compelling story of a striking young man who scarcely looks as if he could commit murder, indulge in blackmail, and ruin numerous lives followed a much-publicized literary precedent that had caused a stir in the mid-1880s. By presenting Dorian Gray as a youth who appears perfect on the outside and who proves to be corrupt on the inside, Wilde was drawing partly on the sensational fame that Robert Louis Stevenson had enjoyed with the Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde (1886). In his unforgettable tale, Stevenson's depiction of a mad scientist whose homicidal alter ego lurks within his soul inventively absorbs the structure of the modern medical case history into the much older literary tradition known as the Gothic, which from its beginnings in the mid-eighteenth century had excited readers with horrifying scenes set in ancestral homes filled with spooks and shadows. Wilde, however, split the personality of his lead character in a different way. In The Picture of Dorian Gray he turned Stevenson's murderous double inside out so that the eponymous protagonist's secret sins are represented on his exquisitely painted portrait. As Dorian Gray commits more crimes, the more unsightly the canvas becomes. Meanwhile, no matter how much destruction he wreaks or how much he is supposed to age, his ever-youthful beauty defies the ravages of time. In other words, Dorian Gray and his portrait switch identities, ensuring that his outward appearance and his inner reality are increasingly at odds. But while it is easy to grasp this clever narrative device, the question of how we might take its meaning proves more difficult to understand. In order to appreciate this point more fully it is first necessary to examine in some detail the most significant shifts and developments in a story that provides no clues that the beautiful main protagonist will turn out to be a heartless addict who has little hesitation in taking another man's life.

The Story

Before we meet Dorian Gray, very near the start of the novel, we are encouraged to view him as the embodiment of artistic perfection. In the opening chapter, the painter Basil Hallward (a lonely, romantic single man) and Lord Henry Wotton (a married, very dandyish aesthete) exchange views in the painter's London studio about a portrait—one that still needs some finishing touches—of 'a young man of extraordinary personal beauty' (p. 5). Both characters, it seems, are only slightly older than the subject of the picture, and both of them belong to what the late Victorians called 'Society' (the upper crust who either held titles or commanded professional wealth). As he gazes at Hallward's canvas, Lord Henry observes that it is the 'best thing' that Hallward has 'ever done' (p. 5); he therefore urges the artist to show it at the Grosvenor, a trendsetting London art gallery whose renown rested on its introduction of new movements such as Impressionism to the cultural elite. But Hallward says he is reluctant to exhibit the painting because he has 'put too much' of himself into the work (p. 6). In response, Lord Henry treats Hallward's statement as a joke: 'Too much of yourself in it!' he exclaims. 'I really can't see any resemblance between you, with your rugged strong face and your coal-black hair, and this young Adonis' (p. 6). It is at this juncture that Lord Henry learns, as we also learn, the name of Dorian Gray. 'He likes me,' the painter anxiously confides to Lord Henry, disclosing a desire that flew in the face of Victorian morality. 'I know he likes me,' he insists (p. 14), implying perhaps that they will become intimate friends, if not lovers. Yet as the two men converse about the youth, his family, and his background, we discover that Hallward fears Lord Henry will harm the object of his affection. 'Don't spoil him', Hallward pleads, 'Don't try to influence him' (p. 16). Such words provide sufficient foreshadowing for us to infer that this is exactly what Lord Henry will do.

Or does he? Although Wilde's novel, from this point onward, charts the course of Dorian Gray's gradual decline into all sorts of corruption, it becomes hard to estimate the degree to which Lord Henry is responsible for luring the gorgeous youth into a life of increasing danger. To be sure, the downward path starts with Lord Henry's earliest meeting with the young man. Once Lord Henry sets eyes on Dorian Gray, he is struck by the model's striking looks: 'There was something in his face that made one trust him at once' (p. 17). Adept with words, Lord Henry aims to charm Dorian Gray with excellently crafted aphorisms. 'The only way to get rid of a temptation is to yield to it,' he suggests to the young man. 'Resist it,' he declares, 'and your soul grows sick with longing for the things it has forbidden to itself' (p. 19). But is this really the voice of an evil manipulator who deserves to be condemned? Or should we relish these elegant words because of their irresistible stylishness?

The answer, in some ways, lies in the limited manner that Dorian Gray comprehends Lord Henry's suave rhetoric. Even though Dorian Gray protests that Lord Henry's fine-sounding phrases baffle him, they nonetheless play upon his soul as if it were their instrument. Very soon, Lord Henry's sparkling epigrams, intentionally or not, work a 'subtle magic' that awakens forbidden thoughts in the susceptible young man (p. 19). Once Lord Henry observes, ominously, that his new companion has 'only a few years in which to live really, perfectly, and fully', Dorian Gray fears becoming 'sallow, and hollow-cheeked, and dull-eyed' (p. 22). 'How sad it is!' the youth despairs, looking at the finished portrait. 'I shall grow old . . . But this picture will remain always young' (p. 25). The very idea that the picture will retain its youth while his body will suffer the torment of old age arouses violent emotions in him. 'It will mock me some day', he protests, 'mock me horribly!' (p. 26). At this point, it appears that Dorian Gray has absorbed Lord Henry's pronouncements quite literally—so much so that he will, by a supernatural twist, exchange places with the painting that threatens to rob him of youth and beauty.

Meanwhile, we soon see that Dorian Gray stands between the competing interests of the painter and the aristocrat, both of whom wish to sway the young man's affections. Basil Hallward, who suffers from excessive romantic passion for the youth, proves his love by giving Dorian Gray his most treasured artwork. Yet the painter's generosity cannot defeat the platonic intimacy that Lord Henry has rapidly secured with the 'young Adonis'. While it may seem that Lord Henry's interest in Dorian Gray rivals Basil Hallward's, it soon emerges that the aristocrat regards his new friend not so much as an object of desire as an 'interesting study' (p. 50)—a 'subject made to his hand' (p. 52). The narrator mentions that Lord Henry's fascination with Dorian Gray is based on an 'experimental method' that aims at a 'scientific analysis of the passions' (p. 52). In other words, Lord Henry reflects indifferently upon the young man's responses to the fresh sensations and novel ideas he has tempted him to imagine. Later, we learn that the young lord treats Dorian Gray's 'complex personality' as an aesthetic object whose joys and sorrows would arouse wonder and pity in the spectator of a play. Echoing Lord Henry's voice, the narrator observes: 'It was no matter how it all ended, or was destined to end' (p. 51). Instead, Lord Henry anticipates the 'rich and fruitful results' (p. 52) that will arise from mentoring a naive individual whose impressionability is for him nothing more than a source of idle amusement.

The experiment, however, has disastrous consequences, and it remains for us to judge whether Lord Henry should bear any blame for what happens to his new-found acolyte who seems to take his each and every aphorism at its word. (At the same time, readers may well wonder if Dorian Gray would have benefited from the self-sacrificing love that Basil Hallward wished to bestow upon him.) Early in the novel, Dorian Gray tells Lord Henry: 'You filled me with a wild desire to know everything about life' (p. 43). But his search for knowledge, once again, follows a path where he adopts an uncritical attitude to whomever he encounters and whatever he sees. As he tells Lord Henry about his adventures, he recalls how he went eastward, away from Hyde Park and Piccadilly (his favourite haunts in the wealthy West End) to places associated in the Victorian imagination with poverty and crime. He enters a shabby theatre, and is captivated by teenage actress Sibyl Vane. 'Why should I not love her?' he asks Lord Henry (p. 45). Soon he plans to marry the actress whose skills in artifice he mistakes for her authenticity. For a while, it seems that Dorian Gray's instantaneous romance with Sibyl Vane will make him forget Lord Henry's 'wrong, fascinating, poisonous, delightful theories' (p. 67). At this juncture, however, it becomes hard to tell which is more misguided—his absorption of Lord Henry's classy wit or his belief that an actress's presence on stage makes her eminently suitable for love.

When Sibyl declares that her passion for Dorian Gray has disabused her of the theatre's artificiality ('You taught me', she proclaims, 'what reality really is' (p. 74)), he rejects her: 'Without your art you are nothing', he remarks coldly (p. 75). Such heartless words in many respects repeat, again quite literally, the misogyny that Lord Henry has already confided to him. 'Women are a decorative sex,' the aristocrat pronounces. 'They never have anything to say', he adds with disdain, 'but they say it charmingly' (p. 42). Since she has failed to embody great art, the man whom she knows as Prince Charming promptly deserts her, embarking on yet another of his nocturnal excursions through 'dimly-lit streets, past gaunt black-shadowed archways' (p. 76). It is only in the morning, when he returns to his well-appointed home, that he recognizes that from now on his picture 'would be to him the visible emblem of conscience' (p. 79). Once he has abandoned the disillusioned Sibyl, his portrait's eye-catching features begin to turn grotesque. The implication is that with conscience Dorian Gray would have a more reflective and controlled approach to a world in which there are clear distinctions not just between right and wrong but also—as the portrait instructively reveals—between art and reality.

In some respects, it would appear that Lord Henry and Dorian Gray share the same aesthetic attitude toward life. This is a life in which the only emotions that matter take place not in the everyday world but in noble works of art, such as Robert Schumann's Forest Scenes, Richard Wagner's Lohengrin, and the music played by the eminent pianist Anton Rubinstein—all of which feature in the novel. Moreover, this is a life in which beauty exists solely in aesthetic objects, such as the Louis-Quinze toilet-set and gilt Spanish leather screen that count among the opulent furnishings that adorn Dorian Gray's home. Yet the more Lord Henry encourages Dorian Gray to explore how various art forms can arouse exquisite emotions, the more the young man's passions are attracted to sensations and ideas whose pleasures are taboo—though in ways inconceivable to the aristocrat who is seldom seen venturing outside his confined world of domestic luxury. The decisive shift occurs when Dorian Gray reads the morally questionable 'yellow book that Lord Henry had sent him' (p. 106). (The 'yellow' implicitly refers to the covers of disreputable French novels, which were notorious for telling tales of sexual intrigue.) Once again, this gift might seem to suggest that Lord Henry is deliberately striving to corrupt rather than amuse his young friend. But, as we soon gather, Dorian Gray subjects this work of literature to a very narrow interpretation. As the ever more cold-blooded youth becomes absorbed in this 'novel without a plot' (p. 106), he discovers a stimulating world in which the Parisian hero indulges in every conceivable type of sensuous experience. 'It was', the narrator observes, 'the strangest book that he had ever read . . . Things of which he had never dreamed were gradually revealed' (p. 106). Although it is never named, this is J.-K. Huysmans's notorious A rebours (1884), usually known in English as Against Nature. Huysmans's experimental novel focuses on Duc Jean des Esseintes, a weakly aristocrat who spends hours in his luxurious home reading books from the Roman Empire's 'Decadent Period' including Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars. Elsewhere, the eccentric Des Esseintes secludes himself so that he can indulge his bizarre aesthetic pursuits, all of which seek to intensify his senses. (At one point, Des Esseintes delights in plating the shell of a live tortoise with gold and encrusting it with jewels.) In many respects, Wilde modelled the long eleventh chapter of his novel on aspects of A rebours. Just as Des Esseintes whiles away his time contemplating the beauty of gemstones and suffusing exotic perfumes in his room, so too does Dorian Gray take sensory pleasures to exorbitant lengths. With its 'curious jewelled style' and its 'metaphors as monstrous as orchids', the story exerts on him a charm similar to Lord Henry's aphorisms. Very rapidly he convinces himself that the 'yellow book' contains 'the story of his own life', even though the volume was composed 'before he had lived it' (p. 108). Such phrasing suggests that Dorian Gray has once more traded ethical existence for aesthetic experience. Instead of taking independent-minded inspiration from this unique French novel, he pursues the bluntest imitation of it.

Chapter XI describes the tedious extent to which Dorian Gray ceaselessly searches 'for sensations that would be at once new and delightful' but which involve adopting 'modes of thought that he knew to be really alien to his nature' (p. 112). He spends hours inhaling aromatic perfumes, collecting exotic musical instruments, procuring rare gemstones, and accumulating exquisite embroideries. This deliberately exhaustive chapter proceeds to list each of the extravagant ecclesiastical vestments he acquires. But while these lavish robes designed for Christian ceremonies enliven his imagination, they cannot awaken an ounce of religious virtue in him. Tellingly, once we have read this inventory of chalice-veils, sudaria, and the like, we learn that Dorian Gray slips out at night to visit Blue Gate Fields: an area, once known as Ratcliffe Highway, in London's poorly lit East End which had long been linked with murderous violence. In subsequent chapters, we see that his night-time visits to this squalid part of town help feed his addiction to opium. The fact that his life has led to taking narcotics amplifies his compulsive but ever-dissatisfied need to sustain pleasure, whatever the cost.

Meanwhile, Wilde's narrative carefully intensifies the contrast between the splendour and the squalor of Dorian Gray's existence. Dorian Gray dismisses his individual responsibility so much that he assumes that his sins can be attributed not only to his family but also to literary writings from the past. He then enlarges this reckless view to encompass ancient and modern history. Dorian Gray thus becomes absorbed in stories about the Roman Empire's worst rulers whose tyranny is chronicled in Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars. He is particularly drawn to Heliogabalus, the cross-dressing worshipper of the sun, whose infamy lay in his licentiousness and perversity, and will later savour the sadism of Renaissance autocrats. Not surprisingly, the pivotal Chapter XI concludes that Dorian Gray had now reached a point where 'he looked on evil simply as a mode through which he could realize his conception of the beautiful' (p. 124). Lacking conscience of any kind, this living work of art will have no qualms whatsoever about committing the kind of homicide familiar to legendary despots.

Dorian Gray's victim is Basil Hallward, the only person who tries to save him from himself. When Basil sees his altered portrait, he exclaims in horror, 'This is the face of a satyr. . . . It has the eyes of a devil.' 'It is', Dorian Gray corrects him, 'the face of my soul' (p. 132). All that the despairing Basil Hallward can do in the circumstances is pray, suggesting that Christianity contains precisely those words of wisdom that the young man should know in order to save his soul.

Having savagely murdered Hallward, Dorian Gray blackmails an acquaintance into helping to dispose of the body. His precarious double life continues. On the one hand, he attends upper-class gatherings where Lord Henry views humanity as if it were a collection of aesthetic objects. On the other hand, Dorian Gray visits an opium den in London's docklands. Such juxtapositions suggest that corruption arises because self-satisfied aesthetes like Lord Henry have little worldly understanding of the unaesthetic cityscape where yielding to temptation comes at a perilous price. Dorian Gray devotes his time to the aesthetic preoccupations that Lord Henry has cultivated in him. He muses on the splendour of French poet Théophile Gautier's celebrated 1852 collection Émaux et camées ('Enamels and Cameos')—a title which concentrates attention on the glories of objets d'art. Particularly enchanting for him is the lyric that focuses on the faun-like fingers of Pierre François Lacenaire, who was executed for double murder in 1836. Equally absorbing are Gautier's fine lines on Venice, a city of legendary dissipation, along with his tribute to the 'monstre charmant' or 'charming monster' embodied in Hermaphroditus, the second-century Roman replica of an ancient Greek statue, featuring a doubly sexed youth, displayed at the Louvre, Paris. Gautier's elegant poetry makes a stark contrast with the seamier reality of Dorian Gray's life.

When Dorian Gray finally begins to fear for his own life, all Lord Henry can say is that the 'only horrible thing in the world is ennui' (p. 171). But such idle banter fails to divert his ever-youthful friend. He anticipates the 'coming of Death' with its 'monstrous wings', and takes belated steps to redeem himself. He vows to Lord Henry that from now on he will be virtuous. Try as he might, Dorian Gray cannot convince his mentor that art can and does exercise moral influence. '[Y]ou poisoned me with a book', he protests to Lord Henry. But the only response the aristocrat can make to this tiresome remonstrance is that '[a]rt has no influence upon action' (p. 183). The very idea that artworks might change the path of a human life such as Dorian Gray's strikes Lord Henry as absurd. It is left for us to speculate if for once the complacent aristocrat has spoken a word of truth.

Yet Lord Henry, for all his stylish cleverness, cannot exert any meaningful influence on Dorian Gray at this late stage of the story. Rightly or wrongly, he remains as incapable of improving his world as any of the other characters. Dorian hopes that his uncritical yearning to pursue a better life will be reflected in his portrait. He has struggled to blot out from memory the long list of catastrophes which have beset him. But when he enters the schoolroom he sees that the picture is 'still loathsome—more loathsome, if possible, than before' (p. 186). He therefore musters the courage to destroy it, in his first (and, ironically, last) act of will. By using the knife that killed the painter, he plunges at the painter's canvas, in full knowledge that by doing so he will at last 'be at peace' (p. 187). Sure enough, peace does return. Once his servants rush upstairs in search of him, they find Dorian Gray lying on the floor next to the portrait. The imposing picture represents their youthful employer as they had known him for years. Meanwhile, the corpse looks as 'withered, wrinkled, and loathsome of visage' as the portrait had been (p. 188). Art and life are thus restored to their proper place. And, with that, the horrifying actions of this forceful novel come to a decisive end.

Reception, Revision, Scandal

Is there, we might reasonably wonder, a moral to this story? Is there some lesson to be learned? In some respects, The Picture of Dorian Gray, in both its thirteen- and twenty-chapter versions, hurtles toward a conclusion that makes it resemble a morality tale. The ending, at first glance, suggests that any man who fails to develop conscience in the name of pursuing pleasure for its own sake must ultimately forfeit his life. Like Faust, Dorian Gray sells his soul to the devil to obtain his desires. That, at least, was the conclusion drawn by many of his earliest readers. The Christian Leader, for example, believed that Wilde had ‘performed a service to his age’ by detailing ‘the tragic picture of Dorian Gray’s life, given up to sensuous pleasure, with its mingled culture and corruption’.<sup>1</sup> But this opinion, which was shared by numerous journalists, hardly won the public’s respect. It may come as some surprise to learn that when the issue of Lippincott’s containing The Picture of Dorian Gray reached the news-stands it met with a storm of protest from a handful of reviewers who deemed Wilde’s story to be anything but moral. The ensuing controversy waged in the press shows how this intriguing novel touched a nerve on matters that are not immediately apparent to us more than a hundred years after it first appeared.

Three of Britain’s prominent newspapers agreed that Wilde’s eerie narrative aimed not to question immorality but extol it. The conservative St James’s Gazette led the fray by stating that the British distributor of Lippincott’s, Ward, Lock & Co., should have been ‘ashamed to circulate’ The Picture of Dorian Gray. So offended was their reviewer, Samuel Henry Jeyes, that he informed his readers he would not discuss the content of Wilde’s novel because he had no wish to ‘advertise the developments of an esoteric prurience’.<sup>2</sup> As far as Jeyes could tell, there was some possibility that ‘the Treasury or the Vigilance Society will think it worth while to prosecute Mr Oscar

<sup>1</sup> This review is quoted in Stuart Mason [Christopher Millard] (ed.), Oscar Wilde—Art and Morality: A Record of the Discussion which Followed the Publication of ‘Dorian Gray’, 2nd edn. (London: Frank Palmer, 1912), 21. Mason’s volume charts in great detail the controversy that raged in the press after The Picture of Dorian Gray appeared in Lippincott’s.

<sup>2</sup> [Samuel Henry Jeyes,] Review of Oscar Wilde, The Picture of Dorian Gray, St James’s Gazette, 20 June 1890, repr. in Karl Beckson (ed.), Oscar Wilde: The Critical Heritage (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1970), 68.

Wilde or Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.’<sup>3</sup> Such comments make one wonder what it was about the tale that could arouse such indignation. Jeyes’s subsequent comments give some clues. To begin with, he indicates that Wilde has betrayed his classical training at Oxford by including references to the more infamous passages from Suetonius’ Lives of the Caesars. Moreover, Jeyes detests the way Wilde ‘airs his cheap research among the garbage of the French Décadents’.<sup>4</sup> Here Jeyes no doubt has in mind J.-K. Huysmans, as well as other avant-garde French writers, whose novels heralded the recent literary movement loosely known as ‘Décadence’ (Decadence): a term that was soon attached to types of fiction and poetry that appeared to celebrate moral decay. Taking some of their inspiration from Théophile Gautier’s ideas, works linked with Decadence frequently suggested that art existed solely for its own, rather than some moral, purpose.

Any reviewer with a knowledge of modern French writing could quickly tell that the poisonous ‘yellow book’ which Lord Henry presents to Dorian Gray derives from Huysmans’s A rebours. Given that Decadent works such as Huysmans’s novel had little interest in moralizing about art, Jeyes gathered the impression that The Picture of Dorian Gray set out to exploit what he called the ‘New Voluptuousness’—which he linked not only with French Decadence but also the scandal-mongering ‘New Journalism’ of the day.<sup>5</sup>

The Daily Chronicle was no kinder. It, too, concluded that The Picture of Dorian Gray was a ‘tale spawned from the leprous literature of the French Décadents’, and it similarly carped at Wilde’s ‘obtrusively cheap scholarship’. Besides detesting the ‘effeminate frivolity’ of the work, the Daily Chronicle objected to the novel’s ‘studied insincerity’.<sup>6</sup> The reviewer contended that the story had no moral because it held every ‘good and holy impulse . . . up to ridicule’.<sup>7</sup> On this view, Dorian Gray’s death is instead a ‘sham moral’ since the overall thrust of the story implicitly defends the belief that the senses will cure the soul ‘whenever the spiritual nature of man suffers from too much purity and self-denial’.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>3</sup> Beckson (ed.), Oscar Wilde: The Critical Heritage, 68–9.

<sup>4</sup> Ibid. 69.

<sup>5</sup> Ibid. 70.

<sup>6</sup> [Anonymous], Review of The Picture of Dorian Gray, Daily Chronicle, 30 June 1890, p. 7, repr. in Beckson (ed.), Critical Heritage, 72.

<sup>7</sup> Ibid. 73–3.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid. 73.

It was, however, left to the Scots Observer to make the fiercest assault on Wilde's work. Edited by the imperialist poet W. E. Henley, this paper went further than simply accusing Wilde of 'grubbing in muck-heaps'. It stated that The Picture of Dorian Gray—even though 'ingenious, interesting, full of cleverness, and plainly the work of a man of letters'—was at base a 'medico-legal' fiction. Just to show what this epithet meant, the reviewer (most probably Henley's assistant, Charles Whibley) claimed that the story dealt 'with matters only fitted for the Criminal Investigation Department or a hearing in camera'. Why, we might wonder, should Henley's paper regard the novel as one that dealt in matters so troubling that only doctors and lawyers should discuss them in private? What exactly is the criminal pathology that supposedly lurks in Wilde's narrative? It was here that the Scots Observer made its boldest accusation. While the paper was willing to admit that the author had 'brains, and art, and style', it deplored the idea that the work had been written 'for none but outlawed noblemen and perverted telegraph-boys'.<sup>9</sup>

This was an insulting attack whose full import would have been obvious to many of Wilde's contemporaries. By mentioning outlaws and perverts, Henley's paper was referring to a recent scandal that had broken in the press in September 1889. Since the summer of that year, a police constable had been ordered to put 19 Cleveland Street, in the West End of London, under surveillance. The reason for this action lay in a disclosure made by a telegraph messenger-boy, suspected of theft, whose employer found him to be in possession of eighteen shillings, far more money on him than would be expected. When asked by the police where he obtained such a sum, he revealed the source of his earnings. In what soon became known as the Cleveland Street Affair, the police discovered that upper-class clients had been paying young men at the local post office for sexual favours.<sup>10</sup> By November the North London Press insinuated that Lord Arthur Somerset had frequented what was a male brothel. (Although a warrant was eventually issued a year later for the nobleman's arrest, he had fled the country, never to return to his homeland again.)

<sup>9</sup> [Anonymous], 'Reviews and Magazines', Scots Observer, 5 July 1890, p. 181, repr. in Beckson (ed.), Critical Heritage, 75.

<sup>10</sup> See H. Montgomery Hyde, The Cleveland Street Scandal (London: W. H. Allen, 1976), and Lewis Chester, David Leitch, and Colin Simpson, The Cleveland Street Affair (London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976).

Meanwhile, two of the telegraph messengers were dismissed from duty, and, much more seriously, one was sentenced in January 1890 to four months with hard labour for committing homosexual offences. In all probability, the Scots Observer took offence at the dialogue where Basil Hallward asks Dorian Gray: 'Why is your friendship so fatal to young men?' The painter proceeds to mention 'Sir Henry Ashton, who had to leave England, with a tarnished name' (p. 127). Very possibly, the staff at Henley's paper had heard rumours that Wilde was intimate with London's homosexual underworld, and they no doubt realized that in the early chapters Wilde audaciously accentuated Basil Hallward's homoerotic interests. Whether Wilde ever visited 19 Cleveland Street remains unknown. But one thing is for sure: the Scots Observer jumped to the conclusion that Dorian Gray moved in circles not dissimilar to those of the recently disgraced lord.

Wilde was not, in any respect, intimidated by the press. A practised journalist, he defended his work in an eloquent letter to the St James's Gazette in which he said he was 'quite incapable of understanding how any work of art can be criticised from a moral standpoint'.<sup>11</sup> This particular newspaper poked fun at Wilde's impenitent epistle by publishing it under the header 'MR OSCAR WILDE'S BAD CASE'. There followed three further bitter exchanges in its columns, with Wilde defending his erudition, noting that the Lives of the Caesars formed part of the curriculum for those candidates studying Literae Humaniores at Oxford (the demanding degree in ancient and modern philosophy in which Wilde had excelled). Furthermore, he claimed that in art 'bad people stir one's imagination'. But perhaps the most notable aspect of this correspondence focuses on whether The Picture of Dorian Gray imparts a moral of some kind. Impatient with Jeyes's demand that an artwork should preach wisdom, Wilde claimed that if his novel contained a moral it was this: 'All excess, as well as all renunciation, brings its own punishment.'<sup>12</sup> To prove this point, he made the following observations about the three main characters:

<sup>11</sup> Wilde, 'To the Editor of the St James's Gazette', 25 June 1890, in The Complete Letters of Oscar Wilde, ed. Merlin Holland and Rupert Hart-Davis (London: Fourth Estate, 2000), 428.

<sup>12</sup> Wilde, 'To the Editor of the St James's Gazette', 26 June 1890, in Complete Letters, 430.

The painter, Basil Hallward, worshipping physical beauty far too much, as most painters do, dies by the hand of one in whose soul he has created a monstrous and absurd vanity. Dorian Gray, having led a life of mere sensation and pleasure, tries to kill conscience. Lord Henry Wotton seeks to be merely the spectator of life. He finds that those who reject the battle are more deeply wounded than those who take part in it. Yes; there is a terrible moral in Dorian Gray—a moral which the prurient will not be able to find in it, but which will be revealed to all whose minds are healthy. Is this an artistic error? I fear it is. It is the only error in the book.<sup>13</sup>

Wilde's account certainly complicates the conflicting perspectives that the Christian Leader and the three adversarial reviews adopted on his novel. His wording suggests that only those readers who banish from their minds that works should be judged either moral or immoral will grasp the terrible truth that The Picture of Dorian Gray represents. His letter also encourages us to think that, in each case, Basil Hallward, Dorian Gray, and Lord Henry remain incomplete because none of them strikes a balance between indulgence and restraint.

There is no question that Wilde believed that the hostile reviewers' obsession with the questionable morality of his story seriously distracted from the artistic quality he wished to achieve in The Picture of Dorian Gray. In his response to the Daily Chronicle, he held himself to account for its reviewer's misreading of his novel:

When I first conceived the idea of a young man selling his soul in exchange for eternal youth—an idea that is old in the history of literature, but to which I have given new form—I felt that, from an aesthetic point of view, it would be difficult to keep the moral in its proper secondary place; and even now I do not feel quite sure that I have been able to do so.<sup>14</sup>

He goes on to observe that in the single-volume version he planned to publish, this deficiency would be resolved. Yet it was the unpleasant cross-fire that took place in the Scots Observer that prompted Wilde to define his artistic aims with greater clarity. Tactfully, Wilde declined to engage with the smear that both he and his novel traded in unspeakable 'medico-legal' matters. Instead, he wisely remarked that Henley's paper had committed 'the unpardonable crime of trying to confuse the artist with his subject-matter'. In Wilde's view, the best artists were not moralists who established distinctions between virtue and vice. 'An artist, sir,' he informed the editor, 'has no ethical sympathies at all.' To be sure, he had chosen 'to surround Dorian Gray with an atmosphere of moral corruption'. But he sought to keep the 'atmosphere vague and indeterminate'. Why? Wilde ingeniously argued that such indeterminacy ensured that his readers had to play an active role in construing what Dorian Gray's sins might be: 'Each man sees his own sin in Dorian Gray. What Dorian Gray's sins are no one knows. He who finds them has brought them.'<sup>15</sup> While such comments are slightly misleading (we know, after all, that Dorian Gray is a homicide, an addict, and a manipulator), it is also the case that elements of his sinful life remain obscure, if not invisible, in the story. On this basis, Wilde hinted that it was not The Picture of Dorian Gray that revelled in depravation but the hypocritical reviewer who imagined it.

<sup>13</sup> Ibid. 430–1.

<sup>14</sup> Wilde, 'To the Editor of the Daily Chronicle', 30 June 1890, in Complete Letters, 435.

Undoubtedly, Wilde would have liked to have had the last word in this dispute. But in the summer of 1890 circumstances dictated he could not. The Scots Observer absorbed his letters into a protracted debate about the moral shortcomings of modern literature, especially the naturalist novels of Émile Zola. In any case, soon after the furore exploded in the press, it proved difficult for readers to obtain Wilde's novel. Once the Scots Observer published its calumniating review, the largest bookseller in the land, W. H. Smith, wrote to Ward, Lock & Co. stating that they had withdrawn the July 1890 issue of Lippincott's from sale because the press had claimed that The Picture of Dorian Gray was indecent.

Wilde, however, knew that he remained undefeated. Just at the point when his enemies tried to pillory him, he visited Ward, Lock & Co. to discuss the publication of his novel in expanded form. Very probably, Wilde had secured a contract for a single-volume edition of his novel with his editor, George Lock, some time before his enemies vented their spleen. In a letter dated 7 July 1890, Lock encouraged Wilde to bring the revised version of his story to a morally more satisfying conclusion. He even went so far as to suggest that Wilde might have Dorian Gray either 'live longer with the face of the picture transformed to himself and depict the nursery in which he ends his days by suicide' or 'repent . . . and become . . . a better character'.<sup>16</sup>

<sup>15</sup> Wilde, 'To the Editor of the Scots Observer', 9 July 1890, in Complete Letters, 439.

In the end, Wilde did not heed Lock's advice. But he made many other changes. The most substantial revisions relate to the six additional chapters (or parts of chapters) that Wilde inserted into the Lippincott's version. These new materials include Chapter III (in which Lord Henry learns from his uncle information about Dorian Gray's parentage), Chapter V (which sketches in details about Sibyl Vane's mother, together with her brother James), Chapters XVI, XVII, and XVIII (which elaborate the contrast between the upper- and lower-class world that Dorian Gray inhabits), and portions of Chapters XIX and XX. Together, these materials enlarged the novel by some 28,000 words. As far as the existing thirteen chapters were concerned, Wilde took pains to add further polish to his stylish sentences, frequently by altering single words and phrases. In Chapter II, for example, the narrator describes 'the oval stelled globe' of a lilac blossom (p. 23), whereas in Lippincott's he had written 'the purple fretted globe'. On the same page, Basil Hallward makes 'staccato signs' to his friends to enter his studio (p. 23). In 1890 these 'signs' are 'frantic'. His copy editor, Coulson Kernahan, took responsibility for numerous modifications as well. He not only adjusted the prose to British English conventions but also removed many paragraph breaks. In addition, he corrected, in line with Wilde's wishes, the use of 'wills' and 'shalls'. The only substantial revision that Kernahan asked Wilde to entertain was the removal of Lord Henry's famous dictum about yielding to temptation. He wanted Wilde to eliminate the aristocrat's 'ready-made excuses for indulgence'. Even though Wilde admitted that Lord Henry's remark was 'devil's doctrine', he wanted to preserve it because it was 'merely Luther's Pecca Fortiter [i.e. sin without fear] put dramatically into the lips of a character'.<sup>17</sup>

Wilde, however, undertook a number of revisions that tone down Basil Hallward's enthusiasm for Dorian Gray. Conspicuously, in the 1890 version of Chapter I the painter informs Lord Henry that he has put 'all the extraordinary romance' into his portrait. By comparison, in 1891 Basil Hallward claims, with greater discretion, that he has 'put into it some expression of this curious artistic idolatry'. (Elsewhere, Wilde tactfully changed the painter's 'romance' to his 'ideal'.) Soon after, a similar tempering occurs. In 1890 Wilde shows Basil Hallward voicing his passion for Dorian Gray in the following manner: 'As a rule, he is charming to me, and we walk home together from the club arm in arm, or sit in the studio and talk of a thousand things.' Meanwhile, in 1891 any mention of walking home arm in arm from the club is omitted. Other striking revisions of this kind are listed in the notes to the present edition.

<sup>16</sup> George Lock, 'To Oscar Wilde', 7 July 1890, William Andrews Clark Memorial Library, University of California, Los Angeles, Wilde MS. L813L W6721.

<sup>17</sup> Wilde, 'To Coulson Kernahan', 7 Mar. 1891, in Complete Letters, 473.

In order to herald the appearance of his transformed novel, Wilde published 'A Preface to "Dorian Gray"' in the Fortnightly Review (a liberal-minded journal edited by his friend Frank Harris). This document, which appeared in February 1891, comprised twenty-three aphorisms (many of them sounding as if they might be spoken by Lord Henry), and it formed the basis of 'The Preface' that introduces the twenty-chapter edition. In many respects, these epigrams revived on his own terms the controversy about art and morality that had preoccupied the Scots Observer the previous summer. Some of them actually echo remarks he made in his letters to Henley's paper: 'No artist has ethical sympathies. An ethical sympathy in an artist is an unpardonable mannerism of style'; 'Vice and virtue are to the artist materials for an art'. In many ways, 'The Preface' reads like a manifesto that steers readers away from making moral judgements on the novel toward appreciating its aesthetic quality: 'There is no such thing as a moral or an immoral book. Books are well written, or badly written. That is all' (p. 3). As his exchanges with the press had shown, Wilde had no doubts about his literary calibre. Meanwhile, he confided to a correspondent that he remained 'curious to see whether these wretched journalists will assail it [i.e. his novel] so ignorantly and pruriently as they did before'. 'My preface', he added, 'should teach them to mend their wicked ways.'<sup>18</sup>

All of these revisions and expansions show that the 1891 text of Wilde's novel reads very differently from its 1890 predecessor. Its style of publication, too, was also dissimilar. Ward, Lock & Co., which was not known for innovative book design, took the unusual step of commissioning the emergent artist Charles Ricketts to create a distinctive 'aesthetic' look for the boards, spine, and title page of the single-volume edition. For the binding, Ricketts devised unique gilt-stamped lettering, which appears more handwritten than typed, together with motifs resembling butterflies. In particular, the title page features two leaf-shaped ornamentations, which, together with the idiosyncratic hand-crafted type, suggest that this beautiful artefact is not a mass-reproduced work.<sup>19</sup> There is no question that Ricketts, an avant-garde book designer, was given this commission because Wilde and his publisher wished to impress the public that his novel was the work of an accomplished artist. Moreover, Ward, Lock & Co. endorsed this idea by presenting the single volume in two different sizes aimed at different markets. They issued one thousand copies in crown octavo priced at six shillings, and, two months later, they published 250 numbered and signed copies in a foolscap quarto edition, printed on handmade paper, at the costly amount of a guinea. This large-paper edition appealed to collectors.

<sup>18</sup> Wilde, 'To J. S. Little', 21 Mar. 1891, in Complete Letters, 475.

Unfortunately, the scant reviews of the 1891 version were unfavourable. The Athenaeum, a weekly review which exercised considerable authority, deemed the fresh version of The Picture of Dorian Gray ‘unmanly, sickening, vicious (though not exactly what is called “improper”), and tedious’.<sup>20</sup> Even the Theatre, which thought the story ‘wonderfully ingenious’, concluded that it lacked ‘human interest’.<sup>21</sup> Sales, too, were poor. Even though the foolscap quarto edition was snapped up by collectors, many of the crown octavo copies had no buyers. It therefore looked as if the revised version was a flop. But toward the end of the year a significant critical voice drew renewed attention to the true distinction of Wilde’s novel. The critic in question was Walter Pater, an Oxford don, who gained prominence (as well as some notoriety) with his first book, Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873). Before we look at Pater’s review it is necessary to grasp the immense influence his 1873 volume exerted on Wilde. The Renaissance, as it was known from 1877, brought together Pater’s earliest forays into art criticism, including his exquisitely written essays on Leonardo da Vinci, Sandro Botticelli, and Michelangelo. It was the brief ‘Conclusion’ to his book that troubled some readers because it advanced a contentious belief in the need to intensify sensuous experience: 'Not the fruit of experience, but experience itself, is the end. A counted number of pulses only is given to us of a variegated, dramatic life. How may we see in them all that is to be seen in them by the finest senses?'<sup>22</sup> In advancing the view that we should live for the moment, enjoying 'any stirring of the senses', Pater laid himself open to the charge that he celebrated hedonism. Faced with such accusations, in 1877 Pater withdrew the displeasing 'Conclusion' from the second edition of his book. Meanwhile, he took pains in his historical novel Marius the Epicurean (1885), which traces the growth and development of a young man living in second-century Rome, to explain that sensory experience must be subjected to measures of control and discipline.

<sup>19</sup> On Ricketts’s design for Wilde’s novel, see Nicholas Frankel, Oscar Wilde’s Decorated Books (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2000), 131–53.

<sup>20</sup> Unsigned Notice, Athenaeum, 27 June 1891, in Beckson (ed.), Critical Heritage, 82.

<sup>21</sup> Unsigned Review, Theatre, 1 June 1891, p. 295, repr. in Beckson (ed.), Critical Heritage, 82.

Pater could not have escaped noticing that phrases from his works, especially the 'Conclusion', resound throughout The Picture of Dorian Gray. Time and again, Lord Henry echoes Pater's insights. In Chapter II, for example, the dandyish lord impresses Dorian Gray by declaring that 'if one man were to live out his life fully and completely, were to give form to every feeling, expression to every thought, reality to every dream . . . the world would gain such a fresh impulse of joy that we would forget all the maladies of mediævalism, and return to the Hellenic ideal' (pp. 18–19). This statement sounds similar to two different sections of Pater's Renaissance. On the one hand, Lord Henry seems to be invoking Pater's essay 'Two Early French Stories', which examines how the lingering paganism of the 'mediæval Renaissance' impelled people 'beyond the bounds of the Christian ideal; and their love became sometimes a strange idolatry, a strange rival religion'.<sup>23</sup> On the other hand, the aristocrat appears to endorse Pater's study of Johann Joachim Winckelmann, the eighteenth-century German art historian whose 'affinity with Hellenism was not merely intellectual' because 'subtler threads of temperament were inwoven in it', as 'is proved by his romantic, fervent friendships with young men'.<sup>24</sup> While Lord Henry does not cite from The Renaissance verbatim, his implicit allusions to this increasingly acclaimed work would have been clear enough to Wilde's peers. These reverberations of Pater's writings were potentially polemical because, as the quotations above disclose, they elevated pagan sensuality over Christian asceticism, just as they suggested that the genuine love of ancient Greek art emerged from a homoerotic sensibility.

<sup>22</sup> Walter Pater, Studies in the History of the Renaissance (London: Macmillan, 1873), 210, repr. in The Renaissance: Studies in Art and Poetry—The 1893 Text, ed. Donald L. Hill (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1980), 188.

<sup>23</sup> Ibid. 18–19.

<sup>24</sup> Ibid. 152.

Wilde became acquainted with Pater during his final year at Oxford, although he had read The Renaissance avidly when he entered the university, after studying at Trinity College Dublin, in 1874. Thereafter, the two men maintained a friendship, with Wilde producing celebratory reviews of Pater's Imaginary Portraits (1887) and Appreciations (1890). Wilde's novel shows that he followed Pater's career very closely indeed. Noticeably, Lord Henry's musings include a brief contemplation of philosopher Giordano Bruno (the sixteenth-century Italian monk who denied the divinity of Christ), whose insubordinate philosophical views Pater had discussed in an essay that appeared in the Fortnightly Review in 1889. It would, however, be mistaken to view Lord Henry solely as a mouthpiece for Pater's belief to 'burn always with this, hard gem-like flame'—perhaps the most famous statement in the 'Conclusion' that stresses the need to remain open to ever-varying types of pleasure.<sup>25</sup> On a number of occasions, Lord Henry's formulations reiterate ones that Wilde had already devised. Shortly after contemplating Giordano Bruno's philosophy, the lordly aesthete makes the following assertion: 'Experience was of no ethical value. It was merely the name men gave to their mistakes' (p. 52). This statement repeats a line that Wilde had given to the witty Prince Paul in Vera; or, the Nihilists, a play which dates from 1880. It became Wilde's habit to reuse his favourite epigrams, which he frequently compiled in notebooks, sometimes on more than one occasion. In this instance, the epigram migrated not only from Vera to The Picture of Dorian Gray. Later, it shifted from his novel to his first Society Comedy, Lady Windermere's Fan, which was staged, with great success, in February 1892. These witty aphorisms, which frequently revel in paradox, became Wilde's trademark, and they were, in his dramas especially, preserved largely for dandies like Lord Henry.

In his intensely thoughtful review of The Picture of Dorian Gray, Pater gives special credit to the 'felicitous expression' of Wilde's

<sup>25</sup> Ibid. 189.

often epigrammatic prose. He observes, too, that the novel's rhetorical stylishness comes from an admirable impulse to challenge 'the commonplace, rightly or wrongly identified by him with the bourgeois, or middle-class'. For this reason, Wilde harbours a dislike of dreary 'realism in art'.<sup>26</sup> But, as Pater acknowledges, Wilde's novel is not a work that simply confronts middle-class Philistinism with a 'dainty Epicurean theory'. (Epicurus was the ancient philosopher of pleasure.) In Pater's view, even though Wilde has written a supernatural tale, powerful elements of 'real life and its sordid aspects'—such as James Vane's wish to protect his sister's honour—evoke remarkable pathos. Since Wilde has adroitly integrated both the real and the supernatural, the novel is 'first-rate in artistic management'.<sup>27</sup> The lesson of the story also appears admirably vivid. Dorian Gray proves 'a quite unsuccessful experiment in Epicureanism' because his career reveals 'a very plain moral . . . to the effect that vice and crime make people coarse and ugly'.<sup>28</sup> Yet when he turns to the character that blends his own voice with Wilde's, Pater remains somewhat puzzled. It is not entirely obvious to him if Wilde intended Lord Henry 'as a satiric sketch'. Surely, Pater writes, the young lord is not supposed to 'figure the motive and tendency of a true . . . Epicurean doctrine of life'.<sup>29</sup>

Pater's suspicion that Lord Henry might be the object of satire raises a number of questions about Wilde's approach to this dandy. Is Wilde really mocking this character? If this is the case, what is the purpose of such ridicule? Are we supposed to view Lord Henry's musings as empty cynicism when their sources come mostly from Pater and Wilde? Likewise, Pater's belief that Dorian Gray's story upholds 'a very plain moral' would in some ways seem to run contrary to Wilde's assertion in 'The Preface' that '[t]here is no such thing as a moral or an immoral book'. These contradictions usefully reveal that no matter how hard readers try to pin down the story's celebration or resistance to a moral message, its attraction or repulsion to realism, or its delight or despair in aphoristic wit, The Picture of Dorian Gray suggests we should be wary of assuming that it is a clear-cut allegory of some kind.

<sup>26</sup> Walter Pater, Review of The Picture of Dorian Gray, Bookman, November 1891, pp. 59–60, reprinted in Beckson (ed.), Critical Heritage, 83.

<sup>27</sup> Ibid. 84.

<sup>28</sup> Ibid. 85.

<sup>29</sup> Ibid. 84.

It did, however, take many decades before other readers gave The Picture of Dorian Gray its critical due. After Ward, Lock & Co. witnessed the commercial failure of the single volume, Wilde turned his sights on the London theatre, and within a short span of years he became a leading dramatist. For the rest of his career, the only other time when his novel caught public attention occurred at the Old Bailey in early April 1895. Wilde took the stand in this famous courtroom because he was pursuing a hazardous libel suit against the Marquess of Queensberry: the father of Alfred Douglas, who had been the married Wilde's lover since 1892. The suit rested on Wilde's denial that he was, as Queensberry had charged, a sodomite. Edward Carson, on behalf of the defence, did everything within his power to show that Wilde was 'sodomitical'. Before Carson disclosed unexpected evidence about various young men (some of them prostitutes) with whom Wilde had been intimate, he cross-examined the plaintiff about a passage in the Lippincott's version of the novel. Carson concentrated on the episode where Basil Hallward declares to Dorian Gray: 'Your friendship is dearer to me than any fame or reputation' (p. 97). In the 1890 text, the painter confesses:

It is quite true that I have worshipped you with far more romance of feeling than a man usually gives to a friend. Perhaps, as Harry says, a really 'grande passion' is the privilege of those who have nothing to do, and that is the use of the idle classes in a country . . . I quite admit that I adored you madly, extravagantly, absurdly.

Basil Hallward's effusion gave Carson the cue to ask Wilde: 'Do you mean to say that that passage describes a natural feeling of one man towards another?' In response, Wilde sought to circumvent Carson's enquiry by stating the excerpt described 'the influence produced on an artist by a beautiful personality'. He certainly knew that he was treading on dangerous ground, since he had taken pains to remove all of these sentences from the single-volume edition. 'Have you yourself ever had that feeling towards a young man?' Carson persisted, 'May I take it that you yourself have never known the feeling towards a younger man that is described there?'<sup>30</sup> Carson's crude line of questioning certainly bears out Wilde's remark that the Scots

<sup>30</sup> Merlin Holland, Irish Peacock and Scarlet Marquess: The Real Trial of Oscar Wilde (London: Fourth Estate, 2003), 90.

Observer had perpetrated ‘the absolutely unpardonable crime of trying to confuse the artist with his subject-matter’.<sup>31</sup> Yet in spite of his attempts to deflect such insinuations with his nimble wit, Wilde failed to win his case. Since Queensberry’s cronies had unearthed incriminating evidence about Wilde’s personal life, the Crown stepped in to prosecute him under the provisions of the 1885 Criminal Law Amendment Act. By the end of May (after two further trials), the humiliated author began a two-year sentence, in solitary confinement with hard labour, for committing and procuring acts of ‘gross indecency’ with other men.

Given the vilification Wilde and his novel suffered in court, it is not that surprising that The Picture of Dorian Gray disappeared from view for some time. Although his Society Comedies were slowly revived in the years after his death in 1900, the authorized edition of his novel was issued until 1910 by Charles Carrington (a Paris-based bookseller who traded in literary pornography). By 1913 G. Constant Lounsbery’s stage adaptation at the Vaudeville Theatre, London, marked its slow but sure return to respectability. In 1925 the London publisher John Lane—who had issued some of Wilde’s volumes in the early 1890s—brought out a beautifully illustrated edition. Twenty years later, Albert Lewin’s screen version won an Oscar for its black-and-white photography, while Angela Lansbury received an Oscar nomination for her role as Sibyl Vane. In the 1950s, the decade which witnessed the Wolfenden Report advocating homosexual law reform, critical interest in Wilde’s career gathered apace. Meanwhile, the publication of his letters in 1962 amplified our understanding of his extraordinary career. As the twentieth century unfolded, it proved hard to escape Wilde’s presence on screen and stage, in biographies and memoirs, as well as in countless critical studies and editions of his works. These days, it is indisputable that The Picture of Dorian Gray stood well in advance of those contemporaries who could not bear its confrontation with their restricted conceptions of morality. Meanwhile, as modern scholarship continues to reveal, the unceasing fascination of this clever story exerts pressure on us to produce ever more resourceful interpretations—ones that engage with the many possible reasons why Dorian Gray perilously decides to live his life as a work of art.

<sup>31</sup> Complete Letters, 439.

NOTE ON THE TEXT

THE earliest version of The Picture of Dorian Gray was first published, in thirteen chapters, in the July 1890 issue of Lippincott's Monthly Magazine. It was subsequently issued in a single volume, with twenty chapters, in the following year by Ward, Lock & Co. (see Introduction and Explanatory Notes for details of the changes). The copy text for this edition is the foolscap quarto volume (also known as the large-paper edition), which appeared in a limited print run of 250 copies—rather than the crown octavo single volume, also from Ward, Lock & Co. that went on sale in late April or May that year—because it contains a small correction to the crown octavo predecessor. The foolscap quarto edition still contains a number of errors. In particular, Wilde had a habit of misplacing a circumflex where a grave accent should appear in French words. Besides containing a handful of typographical mistakes, the 1891 large-paper omits a question mark from a piece of dialogue. In the text that follows, all of these errors have been silently corrected. For further information on these matters, see the present editor's 'Editorial Introduction' in the Oxford English Texts variorum edition of Wilde's novel: The Complete Works of Oscar Wilde, volume iii (Oxford University Press, 2005), pp. lxi–lxviii.

Both the 1890 and 1891 editions of Wilde's novel present double, instead of single, quotation marks. The text presented here uses single quotation marks throughout.

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

Editions

- The Picture of Dorian Gray*, Lippincott's Monthly Magazine (1890), 1–100. This is the thirteen-chapter edition of Wilde's novel. Lippincott's had both American and British editions; Wilde's novel was the main feature in both editions of the magazine.
- The Picture of Dorian Gray*, crown octavo (London: Ward, Lock & Co.: April/May 1891). This is the twenty-chapter edition of Wilde's novel.
- The Picture of Dorian Gray*, foolscap quarto (London: Ward, Lock & Co., July 1891). This is the large-paper, twenty-chapter edition of the novel, issued specially for the collectors' market, that provides the basis for the text presented here.
- The Picture of Dorian Gray (Urfassung 1890)*, critical edition with introduction by Wilfried Edener (Nuremberg: Hans Carl, 1964). Edener's edition was the first to list the differences between the 1890 and 1891 texts of Wilde's novel.
- The Picture of Dorian Gray: Authoritative Texts; Backgrounds; Reviews and Reactions; Criticism*, ed. Donald L. Lawler (New York: W. W. Norton, 1988). This edition includes both the 1890 and 1891 editions.
- The Picture of Dorian Gray: The 1890 and 1891 Texts*, ed. Joseph Bristow, in The Complete Works of Oscar Wilde, 3 vols. to date (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005), iii. The first complete variorum edition of Wilde's novel.

Bibliography and Reference Works

- Karl Beckson (ed.), The Oscar Wilde Encyclopedia (New York: AMS Press, 1997). The standard reference work.
- Stuart Mason [Christopher Millard], Bibliography of Oscar Wilde (London: T. Werner Laurie, 1914). Detailed account of all of Wilde's known publications.
- Thomas A. Mikolyzk (ed.), Oscar Wilde; An Annotated Bibliography (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993). Lists extensive amount of criticism on Wilde's works.
- Ian Small, Oscar Wilde: Recent Research—A Supplement to 'Oscar Wilde Revalued' (Greensboro, NC: ELT Press, 2000). Comprehensive, and at times contentious, survey of recent criticism.
- Oscar Wilde Revalued: An Essay on New Materials and Methods of Research (Greensboro, NC: ELT Press, 1993).

Robert Tanitch, Oscar Wilde on Stage and Screen (London: Methuen, 1999). Provides detailed accounts of cinematic adaptations and stage productions of Wilde's works.

Critical Biography and Related Documents

Richard Ellmann, Oscar Wilde (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1987). This remains the standard biography; it does, however, contain numerous errors of fact and some questionable interpretations of information.

H. Montgomery Hyde, The Trials of Oscar Wilde, 2nd edn. (New York: Dover, 1973). Mostly compiled from newspaper reports. The transcript of Wilde's libel trial is far less detailed than the one recorded in Holland's volume (below).

Merlin Holland, Irish Peacock and Scarlet Marquess: The Real Trial of Oscar Wilde (London: Fourth Estate, 2003). This volume includes a transcript of the trial in which Wilde sued for libel against the Marquess of Queensberry. The trial includes discussion of Wilde's novel.

Neil McKenna, The Secret Life of Oscar Wilde (London: Century, 2003). Speculative biography focusing on Wilde's sexuality.

Horst Schroeder, Additions and Corrections to Richard Ellmann's Oscar Wilde, 2nd edn. (Braunschweig: privately printed, 2002). Significant corrective to Ellmann's biography.

Critical Books and Essays

Since the 1980s over two hundred works of criticism have been completed on The Picture of Dorian Gray. The necessarily selective list of critical works listed below will introduce readers to a wide variety of approaches that illuminate different aspects of Wilde's novel. For readers learning about Wilde's writings for the first time, the collections edited by Regenia Gagnier, Peter Raby, and Frederick S. Roden provide useful points of access to this busy scholarly field. The studies by Neil Bartlett, Ed Cohen, Matt Cook, Richard Dellamora, Jeff Nunokawa, and Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick provide ways of interpreting the sexual dissidence of Wilde's works. More recently, the focus on Wilde's Irish heritage has come to the fore in discussions by a number of scholars, including Jerusha McCormack and Jarlath Killeen. Meanwhile, Wilde's professional career as a writer (contracts, earnings, and sales) has been examined by Josephine M. Guy and Ian Small.

Neil Bartlett, Who Was That Man? A Present for Mr. Oscar Wilde (London: Serpent's Tail, 1988). On Wilde's urban homosexual experiences.

Rachel Bowlby, 'Promoting Dorian Gray', Oxford Literary Review, 9 (1987), 147–62. On Wilde and consumerism.

- Ed Cohen, Talk on the Wilde Side: Towards a Genealogy of a Discourse on Male Sexualities (New York: Routledge, 1990). Contains helpful analysis of how Wilde's novel was discussed in the 1895 trial.
- 'Writing Gone Wilde: Homoerotic Desire in the Closet of Interpretation', PMLA 102 (1987), 801–13.
- Matt Cook, London and the Culture of Homosexuality, 1885–1914 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2003). The short section on Dorian Gray's explorations of the East End is illuminating.
- Richard Dellamora, 'Representation and Homophobia in The Picture of Dorian Gray', Victorian Newsletter, 73 (1998), 28–31.
- Regenia Gagnier (ed.), Critical Essays on Oscar Wilde (New York: G. K. Hall, 1991).
- Idylls of the Marketplace: Oscar Wilde and the Victorian Public (Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1986).
- Josephine M. Guy and Ian Small, Oscar Wilde's Profession: Writing and the Culture Industry in the Late Nineteenth Century (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000).
- Simon Joyce, 'Sexual Politics and the Aesthetics of Crime: Oscar Wilde in the Nineties', ELH 69 (2002), 501–23.
- Jarlath Killeen, The Faiths of Oscar Wilde: Catholicism, Folklore and Ireland (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005).
- Jerusha McCormack (ed.), Wilde the Irishman (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1998).
- Jeff Nunokawa, Tame Passions of Wilde: The Styles of Manageable Desire (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2003).
- Peter Raby (ed.), The Cambridge Companion to Oscar Wilde (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997).
- Frederick S. Roden (ed.), Palgrave Advances in Oscar Wilde Studies (Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004).
- Talia Schaffer, 'The Origins of the Aesthetic Novel: Ouida, Wilde, and the Popular Romance', in Joseph Bristow (ed.), Oscar Wilde: Contextual Conditions (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003), 212–29.
- Heather Seagrott, 'Hard Science, Soft Psychology, and Amorphous Art in The Picture of Dorian Gray', SEL: Studies in English Literature, 1500–1900, 38 (2002), 741–59.
- Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Epistemology of the Closet (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1990).
- John Sloan, Oscar Wilde (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003).

Letters

- The Complete Letters of Oscar Wilde*, ed. Merlin Holland and Rupert Hart-Davis (London: Fourth Estate, 2000).

Reviews

- Karl Beckson (ed.), Oscar Wilde: The Critical Heritage (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1970). Contains a selection of noteworthy early reviews of Wilde's novel.
- Stuart Mason [Christopher Millard] (ed.), Oscar Wilde: Art and Morality, 2nd edn. (London: Frank Palmer, 1912). Traces the critical controversy that persisted in the press after the thirteen-chapter edition of Wilde's novel appeared in July 1890.

Sources

- Théophile Gautier, Émaux et camées ('Enamels and Cameos') (Paris: E. Didier, 1852), repr. in Poésies complètes, new edn., 3 vols. (Paris: A. G. Nizet, 1970).
- J.-K. Huysmans, A rebours ('Against Nature') (1884), ed. Nicholas White and trans. Margaret Mauldon (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998).
- Walter Pater, 'Gaston de Latour', chapters I–V, Macmillan's Magazine, 53 (June–Oct. 1888), repr. in Gaston de Latour: The Revised Text, ed. Gerald Monsman (Greensboro, NC: ELT Press, 1995).
- Marius the Epicurean: His Sensations and Ideas, 2nd edn., 2 vols. (London: Macmillan, 1885), repr. ed. Ian Small (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986).
- Studies in the History of Renaissance (1873), revised and expanded as The Renaissance (1877), repr. in The Renaissance: Studies in Art and Poetry—The 1893 Text, ed. Donald L. Hill (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1980). Hill's edition notes the textual variants in the four editions of The Renaissance that Pater published during his lifetime.
- Suetonius, Lives of the Caesars, ed. and trans. Catharine Edwards (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000).
- Symonds, John Addington, Renaissance in Italy: The Age of the Despots (London: Smith, Elder, 1875).

Further Reading in Oxford World's Classics

- Late Victorian Gothic Tales*, ed. Roger Luckhurst.
- John Sloan, Oscar Wilde (Authors in Context).
- Oscar Wilde, Complete Poetry, ed. Isobel Murray.
- Complete Shorter Fiction, ed. Isobel Murray.
- The Importance of Being Earnest and Other Plays, ed. Peter Raby.
- The Major Works, ed. Isobel Murray.
- Selected Journalism, ed. Anya Clayworth.

A CHRONOLOGY OF OSCAR WILDE

- 1854 (16 October) Oscar Fingal O'Flahertie Willis Wilde born to a Protestant family in Dublin. His father, Sir William Wilde (1815–76), was a leading eye surgeon; his mother, Jane Francesca Wilde, née Elgee (c.1821–96), firmly established her reputation as a nationalist poet writing under the name of 'Speranza' ('Hope') in the 1840s.
- 1864 Attends Portora Royal School, Enniskillen.
- 1871 Attends Trinity College Dublin, where he becomes closely acquainted with Revd J. P. Mahaffy (1839–1919), Professor of Ancient History.
- 1874 (June) Sits examination at the University of Oxford, where he wins Demyship in Classics at Magdalen College. Some of his earliest poems date from this period. (October) Enters Oxford.
- 1875 (June–July) Travels in Italy with Mahaffy, visiting Florence, Bologna, Venice, and Milan.
- 1877 (March–April) Travels to Italy and Greece; his visit includes an audience with Pope Pius IX. (Late April) Attends private view at the fashionable Grosvenor Gallery, London. (May) Attends fancy-dress ball dressed as Prince Rupert.
- 1878 (April) Visits Revd Sebastian Bowden at the Brompton Oratory, London, to discuss his interest in converting to Roman Catholicism, which both Sir William and Mahaffy had discouraged. (June) Sits his final examinations in Literae Humaniores ('Greats'); he is awarded a double first the following month. Wins the prestigious Newdigate Prize for his poem Ravenna. (Late November) Moves to London, where he will soon share rooms with painter Frank Miles (1852–91).
- 1879 Establishes himself as a fashionable literary man-about-town, publishing a poem on revered French actress Sarah Bernhardt (1844–1923) in the World. His dress, manner, and style of conversation soon capture the interest of the press. He is quickly thought to embody many of the affectations associated with the loosely defined Aesthetic Movement.
- 1880 (October) Aspects of his fashionable style treated satirically

- in a cartoon lampooning the Aesthetic Movement by George Du Maurier (1834–96) in the popular magazine Punch.
- 1881 (May) Poems published at his own expense; reviews mostly unfavourable, leading to more satirical jibes against him in Punch.
- 1881 (September) Theatre impresario Richard D'Oyly Carte (1844–1901) invites Wilde to undertake a tour lecturing on aesthetic topics throughout North America. (December) London production of his play Vera, on Russian nihilism, cancelled. Sets sail for New York City on the s.s. Arizona.
- 1882 (January) Arrives in New York City. The following month he begins a ten-month, highly profitable lecture tour. (December) Signs a contract for the production of his play The Duchess of Padua. Sails from New York City to London.
- 1883 (January) Agrees terms for an American production of Vera. (Late January–May) Visits Paris where he makes acquaintance with his earliest biographer, Robert Harborough Sherard (1861–1943), and leading French literary figures such as Édmond de Goncourt (1822–96). (June–July) Lectures on 'Personal Impressions of America' in England. (August) Travels to New York City to see opening of Vera; production closes after a week. (September) Returns to England where he will deliver lectures on a regular basis through to the later part of 1885.
- 1884 (May) Marries Constance Lloyd (1858–98). (November) Begins reviewing for the Pall Mall Gazette, an influential London afternoon newspaper.
- 1885 (April) His poem 'The Harlot's House' appears in the Dramatic Review. (May) His first major essay, 'Shakespeare and Stage Costume', published in Nineteenth Century. (June) Birth of his first son, Cyril.
- 1886 (November) Birth of second son, Vyvyan. American painter James Abbott McNeill Whistler (1834–1903) attacks Wilde's opinions on art in the World.
- 1887 (April) Takes up editorship of the Lady's World, a journal published by Cassell and Co., London. He renames it the Woman's World, making it a progressive, largely feminist journal covering a wide variety of cultural, literary, and political topics. Contributes several important reviews to this periodical. Editorship lasts until sometime in 1889.

- 1888 (May) Publishes The Happy Prince and Other Tales, a collection of fairy tales, with David Nutt.
- 1889 (January) Publishes two long, intellectually ambitious essays: 'Pen, Pencil, and Poison', in the Fortnightly Review, and 'The Decay of Lying', in the Nineteenth Century. (July) Publishes novella 'The Picture of Mr. W.H.' (on the story behind Shakespeare's sonnets) in Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine. (August) J. M. Stoddart, editor for the J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia, invites Wilde to contribute a work of fiction to Lippincott's Monthly Magazine.
- 1890 (June) British edition of the July issue of Lippincott's Monthly Magazine is published, featuring the thirteen-chapter text of The Picture of Dorian Gray. Immediate hostility from influential quarters of the London press. (July–September) The first and second parts of his major essay 'The True Function and Value of Criticism: With Some Remarks on the Value of Doing Absolutely Nothing' (later retitled 'The Critic as Artist') appear in the Nineteenth Century.
- 1891 (January) The Duchess of Padua produced on Broadway, New York City. (February) 'The Soul of Man under Socialism' appears in the Fortnightly Review. (March) The contentious 'Preface' to The Picture of Dorian Gray published in the Fortnightly Review. (April–May). The twenty-chapter, single volume edition of The Picture of Dorian Gray issued by Ward, Lock, & Co. in London; this edition of 1,000 copies features an exquisite design on the boards and spine by Charles Ricketts (1866–1931). (July) The foolscap quarto edition of the novel, 250 copies on hand-laid paper, issued by Ward, Lock, & Co. Intentions, which collects revised versions of his major essays, published. Around this time, Wilde meets Alfred Douglas (1870–1945), who will later become his lover and companion. (November) A House of Pomegranates, his second book of fairy stories, appears.
- 1892 (February) His first Society Comedy Lady Windermere's Fan, opens at the fashionable St James's Theatre; production runs until the end of July. (May) Rebound edition of Poems (1881), with a new title page, boards, and spine designed by Ricketts, issued by Elkin Mathews and John Lane. (June) Proposed production of his French-language play Salomé, starring Sarah

- Bernhardt at the Palace Theatre, London, cancelled because the Lord Chamberlain censors it.
- 1893 (February) French-language edition of Salomé published in Paris and London. (April) His second Society Comedy, A Woman of No Importance, opens at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket; production runs until August.
- 1894 (February) Mathews and Lane issue English-language version of Salomé, translated from the French by Douglas, with controversial illustrations by Aubrey Beardsley (1872–98). (June) The Sphinx, designed and illustrated by Ricketts, issued by Ekin Mathews and John Lane in an edition of 250 copies. (July) Six prose-poems appear in the Fortnightly Review. (September) Mathews and Lane decline to publish revised version of 'The Portrait of Mr W.H.'. (November) Nineteen of his aphorisms, titled 'A Few Maxims for the Instruction of the Over-Educated', appear in the Saturday Review. (December) Thirty-five aphorisms, titled 'Phrases and Philosophies for the Use of the Young', published in the Chameleon, an Oxford undergraduate magazine.
- 1895 (January) His third society comedy, An Ideal Husband, opens at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket. (February) His fourth Society Comedy, The Importance of Being Earnest, premieres at the St James's Theatre. (March) Begins libel suit against Douglas's father, John Sholto Douglas (1844–1900), 8th Marquess of Queensberry, who has accused Wilde of sodomy. (Early April) Wilde's libel suit fails. (Late April) Evidence produced by the defence in court results in trial of Regina versus Wilde. Production of An Ideal Husband closes. (Early May) Jury cannot agree on questions put to them by the judge. Fresh trial ordered. Production of The Importance of Being Earnest closes. (Late May) Wilde sentenced under the provisions of the Criminal Law Amendment Act (1885) to two years of solitary confinement with hard labour for committing acts of 'gross indecency' with other men in private. Enters Pentonville Prison, London. (July) Transfers to Wandsworth Prison, London. (October) Ward, Lock & Co. issues another crown octavo edition of The Picture of Dorian Gray. (November) Moves to Reading Gaol, west of London.
- 1896 (February) First production of Salomé at Théâtre de l'Œuvre, Paris.

- 1897 (January–March) Probably during these months he completes the 30,000-word prison letter addressed to Douglas; in 1905 his literary executor, Robert Ross (1869–1918), will title this document De Profundis, publishing part of it in that year. (May) Leaves Reading Gaol and proceeds to Dieppe, France, where he settles at the nearby village of Berneval.
- 1898 (January) Based in Naples, Italy. (February) Publishes, as ‘C.3.3.’ (the number of his prison cell), The Ballad of Reading Gaol with Leonard Smithers; by 1899 the seventh edition of this highly popular work will bear Wilde’s name. (April) Constance Wilde dies after surgery to correct spinal injury.
- 1899 (January) Smithers issues first edition of The Importance of Being Earnest; Wilde’s name is not mentioned. (May) Based in Paris. (July) Smithers issues first edition of An Ideal Husband; Wilde’s name is not mentioned.
- 1900 (October) Mr and Mrs Daventry, which Frank Harris (1856–1931) has developed from an outline by Wilde, opens at the Royalty Theatre, London; production runs until February 1901.
- 1900 (30 November) On his deathbed, under Ross’s supervision, Wilde converts to Roman Catholicism. Dies of meningitis at the Hôtel d’Alsace in the Latin Quarter of Paris. (2 December) Buried at Bagneux Cemetery; Douglas is chief mourner. In 1909 Wilde’s remains will be moved to Père Lachaise Cemetery, Paris.

THE PICTURE OF DORIAN GRAY

This page intentionally left blank

THE PREFACE*

THE artist is the creator of beautiful things.

To reveal art and conceal the artist is art's aim.

The critic is he who can translate into another manner or a new material his impression of beautiful things.

The highest as the lowest form of criticism is a mode of autobiography.

Those who find ugly meanings in beautiful things are corrupt without being charming. This is a fault.

Those who find beautiful meanings in beautiful things are the cultivated. For these there is hope.

They are the elect to whom beautiful things mean only Beauty.

There is no such thing as a moral or an immoral book.

Books are well written, or badly written. That is all.

The nineteenth century dislike of Realism is the rage of Caliban seeing his own face in a glass.

The nineteenth century dislike of Romanticism is the rage of Caliban not seeing his own face in a glass.

The moral life of man forms part of the subject-matter of the artist, but the morality of art consists in the perfect use of an imperfect medium.

No artist desires to prove anything. Even things that are true can be proved.

No artist has ethical sympathies. An ethical sympathy in an artist is an unpardonable mannerism of style.

No artist is ever morbid. The artist can express everything.

Thought and language are to the artist instruments of an art.

Vice and virtue are to the artist materials for an art.

From the point of view of form, the type of all the arts is the art of the musician. From the point of view of feeling, the actor's craft is the type.

All art is at once surface and symbol.

Those who go beneath the surface do so at their peril.

Those who read the symbol do so at their peril.

It is the spectator, and not life, that art really mirrors.

Diversity of opinion about a work of art shows that the work is new, complex, and vital.

When critics disagree the artist is in accord with himself.

We can forgive a man for making a useful thing as long as he does not admire it. The only excuse for making a useless thing is that one admires it intensely.

All art is quite useless.

OSCAR WILDE

CHAPTER I

THE studio was filled with the rich odour of roses, and when the light summer wind stirred amidst the trees of the garden there came through the open door the heavy scent of the lilac, or the more delicate perfume of the pink-flowering thorn.*

From the corner of the divan of Persian saddlebags* on which he was lying, smoking, as was his custom, innumerable cigarettes, Lord Henry Wotton* could just catch the gleam of the honey-sweet and honey-coloured blossoms of a laburnum,* whose tremulous branches seemed hardly able to bear the burden of a beauty so flame-like* as theirs; and now and then the fantastic shadows of birds in flight flitted across the long tussore-silk* curtains that were stretched in front of the huge window, producing a kind of momentary Japanese effect,* and making him think of those pallid jade-faced painters of Tokio who, through the medium of an art that is necessarily immobile, seek to convey the sense of swiftness and motion. The sullen murmur of the bees shouldering their way through the long unmown grass, or circling with monotonous insistence round the dusty gilt horns of the straggling woodbine, seemed to make the stillness more oppressive. The dim roar of London was like the bourdon* note of a distant organ.

In the centre of the room, clamped to an upright easel, stood the full-length portrait of a young man of extraordinary personal beauty, and in front of it, some little distance away, was sitting the artist himself, Basil Hallward,* whose sudden disappearance some years ago caused, at the time, such public excitement, and gave rise to so many strange conjectures.

As the painter looked at the gracious and comely form he had so skilfully mirrored in his art, a smile of pleasure passed across his face, and seemed about to linger there. But he suddenly started up, and, closing his eyes, placed his fingers upon the lids, as though he sought to imprison within his brain some curious dream from which he feared he might awake.

'It is your best work, Basil, the best thing you have ever done,' said Lord Henry, languidly. 'You must certainly send it next year to the Grosvenor. The Academy* is too large and too vulgar. Whenever I have gone there, there have been either so many people that I have not been able to see the pictures, which was dreadful, or so many pictures that I have not been able to see the people, which was worse. The Grosvenor is really the only place.'

'I don't think I shall send it anywhere,' he answered, tossing his head back in that odd way that used to make his friends laugh at him at Oxford. 'No: I won't send it anywhere.'

Lord Henry elevated his eyebrows, and looked at him in amazement through the thin blue wreaths of smoke that curled up in such fanciful whorls from his heavy opium-tainted cigarette.* 'Not send it anywhere? My dear fellow, why? Have you any reason? What odd chaps you painters are! You do anything in the world to gain a reputation. As soon as you have one, you seem to want to throw it away. It is silly of you, for there is only one thing in the world worse than being talked about, and that is not being talked about. A portrait like this would set you far above all the young men in England, and make the old men quite jealous, if old men are ever capable of any emotion.'

'I know you will laugh at me,' he replied, 'but I really can't exhibit it. I have put too much of myself into it.'

Lord Henry stretched himself out on the divan and laughed.

'Yes, I knew you would; but it is quite true, all the same.'

'Too much of yourself in it! Upon my word, Basil, I didn't know you were so vain; and I really can't see any resemblance between you, with your rugged strong face and your coal-black hair, and this young Adonis, who looks as if he was made out of ivory and rose-leaves. Why, my dear Basil, he is a Narcissus,* and you—well, of course you have an intellectual expression, and all that. But beauty, real beauty, ends where an intellectual expression begins. Intellect is in itself a mode of exaggeration,* and destroys the harmony of any face. The moment one sits down to think, one becomes all nose, or all forehead, or something horrid. Look at the successful men in any of the learned professions. How perfectly hideous they are! Except, of course, in the Church. But then in the Church they don't think. A bishop keeps on saying at the age of eighty what he was told to say when he was a boy of eighteen, and as a natural consequence he always looks absolutely delightful. Your mysterious young friend, whose name you have never told me, but whose picture really fascinates me, never thinks. I feel quite sure of that. He is some brainless, beautiful creature, who should be always here in winter when we have no flowers to look at, and always here in summer when we want something to chill our intelligence. Don't flatter yourself, Basil: you are not in the least like him.'

'You don't understand me, Harry,' answered the artist. 'Of course I am not like him. I know that perfectly well. Indeed, I should be sorry to look like him. You shrug your shoulders? I am telling you the truth. There is a fatality about all physical and intellectual distinction, the sort of fatality that seems to dog through history the faltering steps of kings. It is better not to be different from one's fellows. The ugly and the stupid have the best of it in this world. They can sit at their ease and gape at the play. If they know nothing of victory, they are at least spared the knowledge of defeat. They live as we all should live, undisturbed, indifferent, and without disquiet. They neither bring ruin upon others, nor ever receive it from alien hands. Your rank and wealth, Harry; my brains, such as they are—my art, whatever it may be worth; Dorian Gray's* good looks—we shall all suffer for what the gods have given us, suffer terribly.'

'Dorian Gray? Is that his name?' asked Lord Henry, walking across the studio towards Basil Hallward.

'Yes, that is his name. I didn't intend to tell it to you.'

'But why not?'

'Oh, I can't explain. When I like people immensely I never tell their names to any one. It is like surrendering a part of them. I have grown to love secrecy. It seems to be the one thing that can make modern life mysterious or marvellous to us. The commonest thing is delightful if one only hides it. When I leave town now I never tell my people where I am going. If I did, I would lose all my pleasure. It is a silly habit, I dare say, but somehow it seems to bring a great deal of romance into one's life. I suppose you think me awfully foolish about it?'

'Not at all,' answered Lord Henry,* 'not at all, my dear Basil. You seem to forget that I am married, and the one charm of marriage is that it makes a life of deception absolutely necessary for both parties. I never know where my wife is, and my wife never knows what I am doing. When we meet—we do meet occasionally, when we dine out together, or go down to the Duke's—we tell each other the most absurd stories with the most serious faces. My wife is very good at it—much better, in fact, than I am. She never gets confused over her dates, and I always do. But when she does find me out, she makes no row at all. I sometimes wish she would; but she merely laughs at me.'

'I hate the way you talk about your married life, Harry,' said Basil Hallward, strolling towards the door that led into the garden. 'I believe that you are really a very good husband, but that you are thoroughly ashamed of your own virtues. You are an extraordinary fellow. You never say a moral thing, and you never do a wrong thing. Your cynicism is simply a pose.'

'Being natural* is simply a pose, and the most irritating pose I know,' cried Lord Henry, laughing; and the two young men went out into the garden together, and ensconced themselves on a long bamboo seat that stood in the shade of a tall laurel bush. The sunlight slipped over the polished leaves. In the grass, white daisies were tremulous.

After a pause, Lord Henry pulled out his watch. 'I am afraid I must be going, Basil,' he murmured, 'and before I go, I insist on your answering a question I put to you some time ago.'

'What is that?' said the painter, keeping his eyes fixed on the ground.

'You know quite well.'

'I do not, Harry.'

'Well, I will tell you what it is. I want you to explain to me why you won't exhibit Dorian Gray's picture. I want the real reason.'

'I told you the real reason.'

'No, you did not. You said it was because there was too much of yourself in it. Now, that is childish.'

'Harry,' said Basil Hallward, looking him straight in the face, 'every portrait that is painted with feeling is a portrait of the artist, not of the sitter. The sitter is merely the accident, the occasion. It is not he who is revealed by the painter; it is rather the painter who, on the coloured canvas, reveals himself. The reason I will not exhibit this picture is that I am afraid that I have shown in it the secret of my own soul.'

Lord Henry laughed. 'And what is that?' he asked.

'I will tell you,' said Hallward; but an expression of perplexity came over his face.

'I am all expectation, Basil,' continued his companion, glancing at him.

'Oh, there is really very little to tell, Harry,' answered the painter;

‘and I am afraid you will hardly understand it. Perhaps you will hardly believe it.’

Lord Henry smiled, and, leaning down, plucked a pink-petalled daisy from the grass, and examined it. ‘I am quite sure I shall understand it,’ he replied, gazing intently at the little golden white-feathered disk, ‘and as for believing things, I can believe anything, provided that it is quite incredible.’

The wind shook some blossoms from the trees, and the heavy lilac-blooms, with their clustering stars, moved to and fro in the languid air. A grasshopper began to chirrup by the wall, and like a blue thread a long thin dragon-fly floated past on its brown gauze wings. Lord Henry felt as if he could hear Basil Hallward’s heart beating, and wondered what was coming.

‘The story is simply this,’ said the painter after some time. ‘Two months ago I went to a crush* at Lady Brandon’s. You know we poor artists have to show ourselves in society from time to time, just to remind the public that we are not savages. With an evening coat and a white-tie, as you told me once, anybody, even a stock-broker, can gain a reputation for being civilized. Well, after I had been in the room about ten minutes, talking to huge overdressed dowagers and tedious Academicians,* I suddenly became conscious that some one was looking at me. I turned half-way round, and saw Dorian Gray for the first time. When our eyes met, I felt that I was growing pale. A curious sensation of terror came over me. I knew that I had come face to face with some one whose mere personality was so fascinating that, if I allowed it to do so, it would absorb my whole nature, my whole soul, my very art itself. I did not want any external influence in my life. You know yourself, Harry, how independent I am by nature.* I have always been my own master; had at least always been so, till I met Dorian Gray. Then——but I don’t know how to explain it to you. Something seemed to tell me that I was on the verge of a terrible crisis in my life. I had a strange feeling that Fate had in store for me exquisite joys and exquisite sorrows.* I grew afraid, and turned to quit the room. It was not conscience that made me do so: it was a sort of cowardice. I take no credit to myself for trying to escape.’

‘Conscience and cowardice are really the same things, Basil. Conscience is the trade-name of the firm. That is all.’

‘I don’t believe that, Harry, and I don’t believe you do either.’

However, whatever was my motive—and it may have been pride, for I used to be very proud—I certainly struggled to the door. There, of course, I stumbled against Lady Brandon. “You are not going to run away so soon, Mr Hallward?” she screamed out. You know her curiously shrill voice?”

‘Yes; she is a peacock in everything but beauty,’ said Lord Henry, pulling the daisy to bits with his long, nervous fingers.

‘I could not get rid of her. She brought me up to Royalties, and people with Stars and Garters,* and elderly ladies with gigantic tiaras and parrot noses. She spoke of me as her dearest friend. I had only met her once before, but she took it into her head to lionize me. I believe some picture of mine had made a great success at the time, at least had been chattered about in the penny newspapers,* which is the nineteenth-century standard of immortality. Suddenly I found myself face to face with the young man whose personality had so strangely stirred me. We were quite close, almost touching. Our eyes met again. It was reckless of me, but I asked Lady Brandon to introduce me to him. Perhaps it was not so reckless, after all. It was simply inevitable. We would have spoken to each other without any introduction. I am sure of that. Dorian told me so afterwards. He, too, felt that we were destined to know each other.’

‘And how did Lady Brandon describe this wonderful young man?’ asked his companion. ‘I know she goes in for giving a rapid précis of all her guests. I remember her bringing me up to a truculent and red-faced old gentleman covered all over with orders and ribbons, and hissing into my ear, in a tragic whisper which must have been perfectly audible to everybody in the room, the most astounding details. I simply fled. I like to find out people for myself. But Lady Brandon treats her guests exactly as an auctioneer treats his goods. She either explains them entirely away, or tells one everything about them except what one wants to know.’

‘Poor Lady Brandon! You are hard on her, Harry!’ said Hallward, listlessly.

‘My dear fellow, she tried to found a salon, and only succeeded in opening a restaurant.* How could I admire her? But tell me, what did she say about Mr. Dorian Gray?’

‘Oh, something like, “Charming boy—poor dear mother and I absolutely inseparable. Quite forget what he does—afraid he—doesn’t do anything—oh, yes, plays the piano—or is it the violin, dear Mr. Gray?" Neither of us could help laughing, and we became friends at once.'

'Laughter is not at all a bad beginning for a friendship, and it is far the best ending for one,' said the young lord, plucking another daisy.

Hallward shook his head. 'You don't understand what friendship is, Harry,' he murmured—'or what enmity is, for that matter. You like every one; that is to say, you are indifferent to every one.'

'How horribly unjust of you!' cried Lord Henry, tilting his hat back, and looking up at the little clouds that, like ravelled skeins of glossy white silk, were drifting across the hollowed turquoise of the summer sky. 'Yes; horribly unjust of you. I make a great difference between people. I choose my friends for their good looks, my acquaintances for their good characters, and my enemies for their good intellects. A man cannot be too careful in the choice of his enemies. I have not got one who is a fool. They are all men of some intellectual power, and consequently they all appreciate me. Is that very vain of me? I think it is rather vain.'

'I should think it was, Harry. But according to your category I must be merely an acquaintance.'

'My dear old Basil, you are much more than an acquaintance.'

'And much less than a friend. A sort of brother, I suppose?'

'Oh, brothers! I don't care for brothers. My elder brother won't die, and my younger brothers seem never to do anything else.'

'Harry!' exclaimed Hallward, frowning.

'My dear fellow, I am not quite serious. But I can't help detesting my relations. I suppose it comes from the fact that none of us can stand other people having the same faults as ourselves. I quite sympathize with the rage of the English democracy against what they call the vices of the upper orders. The masses feel that drunkenness, stupidity, and immorality should be their own special property, and that if any one of us makes an ass of himself he is poaching on their preserves. When poor Southwark got into the Divorce Court,* their indignation was quite magnificent. And yet I don't suppose that ten per cent. of the proletariat live correctly.'

'I don't agree with a single word that you have said, and, what is more, Harry, I feel sure you don't either.'

Lord Henry stroked his pointed brown beard, and tapped the toe of his patent-leather boot with a tasselled ebony cane. 'How English you are, Basil! That is the second time you have made that observation.

If one puts forward an idea to a true Englishman—always a rash thing to do—he never dreams of considering whether the idea is right or wrong. The only thing he considers of any importance is whether one believes it oneself. Now, the value of an idea has nothing whatsoever to do with the sincerity of the man who expresses it. Indeed, the probabilities are that the more insincere the man is, the more purely intellectual will the idea be, as in that case it will not be coloured by either his wants, his desires, or his prejudices. However, I don't propose to discuss politics, sociology, or metaphysics with you. I like persons better than principles, and I like persons with no principles better than anything else in the world. Tell me more about Mr. Dorian Gray. How often do you see him?'

'Every day. I couldn't be happy if I didn't see him every day.* He is absolutely necessary to me.'

'How extraordinary! I thought you would never care for anything but your art.'

'He is all my art to me now,' said the painter, gravely. 'I sometimes think, Harry, that there are only two eras of any importance in the world's history. The first is the appearance of a new medium for art, and the second is the appearance of a new personality for art also. What the invention of oil-painting was to the Venetians, the face of Antinoüs* was to late Greek sculpture, and the face of Dorian Gray will some day be to me. It is not merely that I paint from him, draw from him, sketch from him. Of course I have done all that.* But he is much more to me than a model or a sitter. I won't tell you that I am dissatisfied with what I have done of him, or that his beauty is such that Art cannot express it. There is nothing that Art cannot express, and I know that the work I have done, since I met Dorian Gray, is good work, is the best work of my life. But in some curious way—I wonder will you understand me?—his personality has suggested to me an entirely new manner in art, an entirely new mode of style. I see things differently, I think of them differently. I can now recreate life in a way that was hidden from me before. "A dream of form in days of thought:"*—who is it who says that? I forget; but it is what Dorian Gray has been to me. The merely visible presence of this lad—for he seems to me little more than a lad, though he is really over twenty—his merely visible presence—ah! I wonder can you realize all that that means? Unconsciously he defines for me the lines of a fresh school, a school that is to have in it all the passion of the romantic spirit, all the perfection of the spirit that is Greek. The harmony of soul and body—how much that is! We in our madness have separated the two, and have invented a realism* that is vulgar, an ideality that is void. Harry! if you only knew what Dorian Gray is to me! You remember that landscape of mine, for which Agnew* offered me such a huge price, but which I would not part with? It is one of the best things I have ever done. And why is it so? Because, while I was painting it, Dorian Gray sat beside me. Some subtle influence passed from him to me, and for the first time in my life I saw in the plain woodland the wonder I had always looked for, and always missed.'

'Basil, this is extraordinary! I must see Dorian Gray.'

Hallward got up from the seat, and walked up and down the garden. After some time he came back. 'Harry,' he said, 'Dorian Gray is to me simply a motive in art. You might see nothing in him. I see everything in him. He is never more present in my work than when no image of him is there. He is a suggestion, as I have said, of a new manner. I find him in the curves of certain lines, in the loveliness and subtleties of certain colours. That is all.'

'Then why won't you exhibit his portrait?' asked Lord Henry.

'Because, without intending it, I have put into it some expression of all this curious artistic idolatry,* of which, of course, I have never cared to speak to him. He knows nothing about it. He shall never know anything about it. But the world might guess it; and I will not bare my soul to their shallow, prying eyes. My heart shall never be put under their microscope. There is too much of myself in the thing, Harry—too much of myself!'

'Poets are not so scrupulous as you are. They know how useful passion is for publication. Nowadays a broken heart will run to many editions.'

'I hate them for it,' cried Hallward. 'An artist should create beautiful things, but should put nothing of his own life into them. We live in an age when men treat art as if it were meant to be a form of autobiography. We have lost the abstract sense of beauty. Some day I will show the world what it is; and for that reason the world shall never see my portrait of Dorian Gray.'

'I think you are wrong, Basil, but I won't argue with you. It is only the intellectually lost who ever argue. Tell me, is Dorian Gray very fond of you?'

The painter considered for a few moments. 'He likes me,' he answered, after a pause; 'I know he likes me. Of course I flatter him dreadfully. I find a strange pleasure in saying things to him that I know I shall be sorry for having said. As a rule, he is charming to me,* and we sit in the studio and talk of a thousand things. Now and then, however, he is horribly thoughtless, and seems to take a real delight in giving me pain. Then I feel, Harry, that I have given away my whole soul to some one who treats it as if it were a flower to put in his coat, a bit of decoration to charm his vanity, an ornament for a summer's day.'

'Days in summer, Basil, are apt to linger,' murmured Lord Henry. 'Perhaps you will tire sooner than he will. It is a sad thing to think of, but there is no doubt that Genius lasts longer than Beauty. That accounts for the fact that we all take such pains to over-educate ourselves. In the wild struggle for existence,* we want to have something that endures, and so we fill our minds with rubbish and facts, in the silly hope of keeping our place. The thoroughly well-informed man—that is the modern ideal. And the mind of the thoroughly well-informed man is a dreadful thing. It is like a bric-à-brac shop, all monsters and dust, with everything priced above its proper value. I think you will tire first, all the same. Some day you will look at your friend, and he will seem to you to be a little out of drawing, or you won't like his tone of colour, or something. You will bitterly reproach him in your own heart, and seriously think that he has behaved very badly to you. The next time he calls, you will be perfectly cold and indifferent. It will be a great pity, for it will alter you. What you have told me is quite a romance, a romance of art one might call it, and the worst of having a romance of any kind is that it leaves one so unromantic.'

'Harry, don't talk like that. As long as I live, the personality of Dorian Gray will dominate me. You can't feel what I feel. You change too often.'

'Ah, my dear Basil, that is exactly why I can feel it. Those who are faithful know only the trivial side of love: it is the faithless who know love's tragedies.' And Lord Henry struck a light on a dainty silver case, and began to smoke a cigarette with a self-conscious and satisfied air, as if he had summed up the world in a phrase. There was a rustle of chirruping sparrows in the green lacquer leaves of the ivy, and the blue cloud-shadows chased themselves across the grass like swallows. How pleasant it was in the garden! And how delightful other people's emotions were!—much more delightful than their ideas, it seemed to him. One's own soul, and the passions of one's friends—those were the fascinating things in life. He pictured to himself with silent amusement the tedious luncheon that he had missed by staying so long with Basil Hallward. Had he gone to his aunt's, he would have been sure to have met Lord Goodbody there, and the whole conversation would have been about the feeding of the poor, and the necessity for model lodging-houses.* Each class would have preached the importance of those virtues, for whose exercise there was no necessity in their own lives. The rich would have spoken on the value of thrift, and the idle grown eloquent over the dignity of labour. It was charming to have escaped all that! As he thought of his aunt, an idea seemed to strike him. He turned to Hallward, and said, 'My dear fellow, I have just remembered.'

'Remembered what, Harry?'

'Where I heard the name of Dorian Gray.'

'Where was it?' asked Hallward, with a slight frown.

'Don't look so angry, Basil. It was at my aunt, Lady Agatha's. She told me she had discovered a wonderful young man, who was going to help her in the East End, and that his name was Dorian Gray. I am bound to state that she never told me he was good-looking. Women have no appreciation of good looks; at least, good women have not. She said that he was very earnest, and had a beautiful nature. I at once pictured to myself a creature with spectacles and lank hair, horribly freckled, and tramping about on huge feet. I wish I had known it was your friend.'

'I am very glad you didn't, Harry.'

'Why?'

'I don't want you to meet him.'

'You don't want me to meet him?'

'No.'

'Mr. Dorian Gray is in the studio, sir,' said the butler, coming into the garden.

'You must introduce me now,' cried Lord Henry, laughing.

The painter turned to his servant, who stood blinking in the sunlight. 'Ask Mr. Gray to wait, Parker: I shall be in in a few moments.' The man bowed, and went up the walk.

Then he looked at Lord Henry. 'Dorian Gray is my dearest friend,' he said. 'He has a simple and a beautiful nature. Your aunt was quite right in what she said of him. Don't spoil him. Don't try to influence him. Your influence would be bad. The world is wide, and has many marvellous people in it. Don't take away from me the one person who gives to my art whatever charm it possesses: my life as an artist depends on him. Mind, Harry, I trust you.' He spoke very slowly, and the words seemed wrung out of him almost against his will.

'What nonsense you talk!' said Lord Henry, smiling, and, taking Hallward by the arm, he almost led him into the house.

CHAPTER II

As they entered they saw Dorian Gray. He was seated at the piano, with his back to them, turning over the pages of a volume of Schumann's 'Forest Scenes.*' 'You must lend me these, Basil,' he cried. 'I want to learn them. They are perfectly charming.'

'That entirely depends on how you sit to-day, Dorian.'

'Oh, I am tired of sitting, and I don't want a life-sized portrait of myself,' answered the lad, swinging round on the music-stool, in a wilful, petulant manner. When he caught sight of Lord Henry, a faint blush coloured his cheeks for a moment, and he started up. 'I beg your pardon, Basil, but I didn't know you had any one with you.'

'This is Lord Henry Wotton, Dorian, an old Oxford friend of mine. I have just been telling him what a capital sitter you were, and now you have spoiled everything.'

'You have not spoiled my pleasure in meeting you, Mr. Gray,' said Lord Henry, stepping forward and extending his hand. 'My aunt has often spoken to me about you. You are one of her favourites, and, I am afraid, one of her victims also.'

'I am in Lady Agatha's black books at present,' answered Dorian, with a funny look of penitence. 'I promised to go to a club in Whitechapel* with her last Tuesday, and I really forgot all about it. We were to have played a duet together—three duets, I believe. I don't know what she will say to me. I am far too frightened to call.'

'Oh, I will make your peace with my aunt. She is quite devoted to you. And I don't think it really matters about your not being there.'

The audience probably thought it was a duet. When Aunt Agatha sits down to the piano she makes quite enough noise for two people.'

'That is very horrid to her, and not very nice to me,' answered Dorian, laughing.

Lord Henry looked at him. Yes, he was certainly wonderfully handsome, with his finely-curved scarlet lips, his frank blue eyes, his crisp gold hair. There was something in his face that made one trust him at once. All the candour of youth was there, as well as all youth's passionate purity. One felt that he had kept himself unspotted from the world.* No wonder Basil Hallward worshipped him.*

'You are too charming to go in for philanthropy, Mr. Gray—far too charming.' And Lord Henry flung himself down on the divan, and opened his cigarette-case.

The painter had been busy mixing his colours and getting his brushes ready. He was looking worried, and when he heard Lord Henry's last remark he glanced at him, hesitated for a moment, and then said, 'Harry, I want to finish this picture to-day. Would you think it awfully rude of me if I asked you to go away?'

Lord Henry smiled, and looked at Dorian Gray. 'Am I to go, Mr. Gray?' he asked.

'Oh, please don't, Lord Henry. I see that Basil is in one of his sulky moods; and I can't bear him when he sulks. Besides, I want you to tell me why I should not go in for philanthropy.'

'I don't know that I shall tell you that, Mr. Gray. It is so tedious a subject that one would have to talk seriously about it. But I certainly shall not run away, now that you have asked me to stop. You don't really mind, Basil, do you? You have often told me that you liked your sitters to have some one to chat to.'

Hallward bit his lip. 'If Dorian wishes it, of course you must stay. Dorian's whims are laws to everybody, except himself.'

Lord Henry took up his hat and gloves. 'You are very pressing, Basil, but I am afraid I must go. I have promised to meet a man at the Orleans.* Good-bye, Mr. Gray. Come and see me some afternoon in Curzon Street.* I am nearly always at home at five o'clock. Write to me when you are coming. I should be sorry to miss you.'

'Basil,' cried Dorian Gray, 'if Lord Henry Wotton goes I shall go too. You never open your lips while you are painting, and it is horribly dull standing on a platform and trying to look pleasant. Ask him to stay. I insist upon it.'

'Stay, Harry, to oblige Dorian, and to oblige me,' said Hallward, gazing intently at his picture. 'It is quite true, I never talk when I am working, and never listen either, and it must be dreadfully tedious for my unfortunate sitters. I beg you to stay.'

'But what about my man at the Orleans?'

The painter laughed. 'I don't think there will be any difficulty about that. Sit down again, Harry. And now, Dorian, get up on the platform, and don't move about too much, or pay any attention to what Lord Henry says. He has a very bad influence over all his friends, with the single exception of myself.'

Dorian Gray stepped up on the dais, with the air of a young Greek martyr, and made a little moue* of discontent to Lord Henry, to whom he had rather taken a fancy. He was so unlike Basil. They made a delightful contrast. And he had such a beautiful voice. After a few moments he said to him, 'Have you really a very bad influence, Lord Henry? As bad as Basil says?'

'There is no such thing as a good influence, Mr. Gray. All influence is immoral—immoral from the scientific point of view.'

'Why?'

'Because to influence a person is to give him one's own soul. He does not think his natural thoughts, or burn with his natural passions. His virtues are not real to him. His sins, if there are such things as sins, are borrowed. He becomes an echo of some one else's music, an actor of a part that has not been written for him. The aim of life is self-development. To realize one's nature perfectly—that is what each of us is here for.* People are afraid of themselves, nowadays. They have forgotten the highest of all duties, the duty that one owes to one's self. Of course they are charitable. They feed the hungry, and clothe the beggar. But their own souls starve, and are naked. Courage has gone out of our race. Perhaps we never really had it. The terror of society, which is the basis of morals, the terror of God, which is the secret of religion—these are the two things that govern us. And yet—'

'Just turn your head a little more to the right, Dorian, like a good boy,' said the painter, deep in his work, and conscious only that a look had come into the lad's face that he had never seen there before.

'And yet,' continued Lord Henry, in his low, musical voice, and with that graceful wave of the hand that was always so characteristic of him, and that he had even in his Eton* days, 'I believe that if one man were to live out his life fully and completely, were to give form to every feeling, expression to every thought, reality to every dream—I believe that the world would gain such a fresh impulse of joy that we would forget all the maladies of mediævalism, and return to the Hellenic ideal*—to something finer, richer, than the Hellenic ideal, it may be. But the bravest man amongst us is afraid of himself. The mutilation of the savage has its tragic survival in the self-denial that mars our lives. We are punished for our refusals. Every impulse that we strive to strangle broods in the mind, and poisons us. The body sins once, and has done with its sin, for action is a mode of purification. Nothing remains then but the recollection of a pleasure, or the luxury of a regret. The only way to get rid of a temptation is to yield to it.* Resist it, and your soul grows sick with longing for the things it has forbidden to itself, with desire for what its monstrous laws have made monstrous and unlawful. It has been said that the great events of the world take place in the brain. It is in the brain, and the brain only, that the great sins of the world take place also. You, Mr. Gray, you yourself, with your rose-red youth and your rose-white boyhood, you have had passions that have made you afraid, thoughts that have filled you with terror, day-dreams and sleeping dreams whose mere memory might stain your cheek with shame—'

'Stop!' faltered Dorian Gray, 'stop! you bewilder me. I don't know what to say. There is some answer to you, but I cannot find it. Don't speak. Let me think. Or, rather, let me try not to think.'

For nearly ten minutes he stood there, motionless, with parted lips, and eyes strangely bright. He was dimly conscious that entirely fresh influences were at work within him. Yet they seemed to him to have come really from himself. The few words that Basil's friend had said to him—words spoken by chance, no doubt, and with wilful paradox in them—had touched some secret chord that had never been touched before, but that he felt was now vibrating and throbbing to curious pulses.

Music had stirred him like that. Music had troubled him many times. But music was not articulate. It was not a new world, but rather another chaos, that it created in us. Words! Mere words! How terrible they were! How clear, and vivid, and cruel! One could not escape from them. And yet what a subtle magic there was in them! They seemed to be able to give a plastic form to formless things, and to have a music of their own as sweet as that of viol or of lute. Mere words! Was there anything so real as words?*

Yes; there had been things in his boyhood that he had not understood. He understood them now. Life suddenly became fiery-coloured to him. It seemed to him that he had been walking in fire. Why had he not known it?

With his subtle smile, Lord Henry watched him. He knew the precise psychological moment when to say nothing. He felt intensely interested. He was amazed at the sudden impression that his words had produced, and, remembering a book that he had read when he was sixteen, a book which had revealed to him much that he had not known before, he wondered whether Dorian Gray was passing through a similar experience. He had merely shot an arrow into the air. Had it hit the mark? How fascinating the lad was!

Hallward painted away with that marvellous bold touch of his, that had the true refinement and perfect delicacy that in art, at any rate, comes only from strength. He was unconscious of the silence.

'Basil, I am tired of standing,' cried Dorian Gray, suddenly. 'I must go out and sit in the garden. The air is stifling here.'

'My dear fellow, I am so sorry. When I am painting, I can't think of anything else. But you never sat better. You were perfectly still. And I have caught the effect I wanted—the half-parted lips, and the bright look in the eyes. I don't know what Harry has been saying to you, but he has certainly made you have the most wonderful expression. I suppose he has been paying you compliments. You mustn't believe a word that he says.'

'He has certainly not been paying me compliments. Perhaps that is the reason that I don't believe anything he has told me.'

'You know you believe it all,' said Lord Henry, looking at him with his dreamy, languorous eyes. 'I will go out to the garden with you. It is horribly hot in the studio. Basil, let us have something iced to drink, something with strawberries in it.'

'Certainly, Harry. Just touch the bell, and when Parker comes I will tell him what you want. I have got to work up this background, so I will join you later on. Don't keep Dorian too long. I have never been in better form for painting than I am to-day. This is going to be my masterpiece. It is my masterpiece as it stands.'

Lord Henry went out to the garden, and found Dorian Gray burying his face in the great cool lilac-blossoms, feverishly drinking in their perfume as if it had been wine. He came close to him, and put his hand upon his shoulder. 'You are quite right to do that,' he murmured. 'Nothing can cure the soul but the senses,* just as nothing can cure the senses but the soul.'

The lad started and drew back. He was bare-headed, and the leaves had tossed his rebellious curls and tangled all their gilded threads. There was a look of fear in his eyes, such as people have when they are suddenly awakened. His finely-chiselled nostrils quivered, and some hidden nerve shook the scarlet of his lips and left them trembling.

'Yes,' continued Lord Henry, 'that is one of the great secrets of life—to cure the soul by means of the senses, and the senses by means of the soul. You are a wonderful creation. You know more than you think you know, just as you know less than you want to know.'

Dorian Gray frowned and turned his head away. He could not help liking the tall, graceful young man who was standing by him. His romantic olive-coloured face and worn expression interested him. There was something in his low, languid voice that was absolutely fascinating. His cool, white, flower-like hands, even, had a curious charm. They moved, as he spoke, like music, and seemed to have a language of their own. But he felt afraid of him, and ashamed of being afraid. Why had it been left for a stranger to reveal him to himself? He had known Basil Hallward for months, but the friendship between them had never altered him. Suddenly there had come some one across his life who seemed to have disclosed to him life's mystery. And, yet, what was there to be afraid of? He was not a schoolboy or a girl. It was absurd to be frightened.

'Let us go and sit in the shade,' said Lord Henry. 'Parker has brought out the drinks, and if you stay any longer in this glare you will be quite spoiled, and Basil will never paint you again. You really must not allow yourself to become sunburnt. It would be unbecoming.'

'What can it matter?' cried Dorian Gray, laughing, as he sat down on the seat at the end of the garden.

'It should matter everything to you, Mr. Gray.'

'Why?'

'Because you have the most marvellous youth, and youth is the one thing worth having.'

'I don't feel that, Lord Henry.'

'No, you don't feel it now. Some day, when you are old and wrinkled and ugly, when thought has seared your forehead with its lines, and passion branded your lips with its hideous fires, you will feel it, you will feel it terribly. Now, wherever you go, you charm the world. Will it always be so? . . . You have a wonderfully beautiful face, Mr. Gray. Don't frown. You have. And Beauty is a form of Genius—is higher, indeed, than Genius, as it needs no explanation. It is one of the great facts of the world, like sunlight, or spring-time, or the reflection in dark waters of that silver shell we call the moon. It cannot be questioned. It has its divine right of sovereignty. It makes princes of those who have it. You smile? Ah! when you have lost it you won't smile. . . . People say sometimes that Beauty is only superficial. That may be so. But at least it is not so superficial as Thought is. To me, Beauty is the wonder of wonders. It is only shallow people who do not judge by appearances. The true mystery of the world is the visible, not the invisible. . . . Yes, Mr. Gray, the gods have been good to you. But what the gods give they quickly take away. You have only a few years in which to live really, perfectly, and fully. When your youth goes, your beauty will go with it, and then you will suddenly discover that there are no triumphs left for you, or have to content yourself with those mean triumphs that the memory of your past will make more bitter than defeats. Every month as it wanes brings you nearer to something dreadful. Time is jealous of you, and wars against your lilies and your roses. You will become sallow, and hollow-cheeked, and dull-eyed. You will suffer horribly. . . . Ah! realize your youth while you have it. Don't squander the gold of your days, listening to the tedious, trying to improve the hopeless failure, or giving away your life to the ignorant, the common, and the vulgar. These are the sickly aims, the false ideals, of our age. Live! Live the wonderful life that is in you! Let nothing be lost upon you. Be always searching for new sensations.* Be afraid of nothing. . . . A new Hedonism*—that is what our century wants. You might be its visible symbol. With your personality there is nothing you could not do. The world belongs to you for a season. . . . The moment I met you I saw that you were quite unconscious of what you really are, of what you really might be. There was so much in you that charmed me that I felt I must tell you something about yourself. I thought how tragic it would be if you were wasted. For there is such a little time that your youth will last—such a little time. The common hill-flowers wither, but they blossom again. The laburnum will be as yellow next June as it is now. In a month there will be purple stars on the clematis, and year after year the green night of its leaves will hold its purple stars. But we never get back our youth. The pulse of joy that beats in us at twenty, becomes sluggish. Our limbs fail, our senses rot. We degenerate into hideous puppets, haunted by the memory of the passions of which we were too much afraid, and the exquisite temptations that we had not the courage to yield to. Youth! Youth! There is absolutely nothing in the world but youth!’

Dorian Gray listened, open-eyed and wondering. The spray of lilac fell from his hand upon the gravel. A furry bee came and buzzed round it for a moment. Then it began to scramble all over the oval stellated globe of the tiny blossoms. He watched it with that strange interest in trivial things that we try to develop when things of high import make us afraid, or when we are stirred by some new emotion for which we cannot find expression, or when some thought that terrifies us lays sudden siege to the brain and calls on us to yield. After a time the bee flew away. He saw it creeping into the stained trumpet of a Tyrian* convolvulus. The flower seemed to quiver, and then swayed gently to and fro.

Suddenly the painter appeared at the door of the studio, and made staccato signs for them to come in. They turned to each other, and smiled.

‘I am waiting,’ he cried. ‘Do come in. The light is quite perfect, and you can bring your drinks.’

They rose up, and sauntered down the walk together. Two green-and-white butterflies fluttered past them, and in the pear-tree at the corner of the garden a thrush began to sing.

‘You are glad you have met me, Mr. Gray,’ said Lord Henry, looking at him.

‘Yes, I am glad now. I wonder shall I always be glad?’

‘Always! That is a dreadful word. It makes me shudder when I hear it. Women are so fond of using it. They spoil every romance by trying to make it last for ever. It is a meaningless word, too. The only difference between a caprice and a life-long passion is that the caprice lasts a little longer.’

As they entered the studio, Dorian Gray put his hand upon Lord

Henry's arm. 'In that case, let our friendship be a caprice,' he murmured, flushing at his own boldness, then stepped up on the platform and resumed his pose.

Lord Henry flung himself into a large wicker arm-chair, and watched him. The sweep and dash of the brush on the canvas made the only sound that broke the stillness, except when, now and then, Hallward stepped back to look at his work from a distance. In the slanting beams that streamed through the open doorway the dust danced and was golden. The heavy scent of the roses seemed to brood over everything.

After about a quarter of an hour Hallward stopped painting, looked for a long time at Dorian Gray, and then for a long time at the picture, biting the end of one of his huge brushes, and frowning. 'It is quite finished,' he cried at last, and stooping down he wrote his name in long vermilion letters on the left-hand corner of the canvas.

Lord Henry came over and examined the picture. It was certainly a wonderful work of art, and a wonderful likeness as well.

'My dear fellow, I congratulate you most warmly,' he said. 'It is the finest portrait of modern times. Mr. Gray, come over and look at yourself.'

The lad started, as if awakened from some dream. 'Is it really finished?' he murmured, stepping down from the platform.

'Quite finished,' said the painter. 'And you have sat splendidly to-day. I am awfully obliged to you.'

'That is entirely due to me,' broke in Lord Henry. 'Isn't it, Mr. Gray?'

Dorian made no answer, but passed listlessly in front of his picture and turned towards it. When he saw it he drew back, and his cheeks flushed for a moment with pleasure. A look of joy came into his eyes, as if he had recognized himself for the first time. He stood there motionless and in wonder, dimly conscious that Hallward was speaking to him, but not catching the meaning of his words. The sense of his own beauty came on him like a revelation. He had never felt it before. Basil Hallward's compliments had seemed to him to be merely the charming exaggerations of friendship. He had listened to them, laughed at them, forgotten them. They had not influenced his nature. Then had come Lord Henry Wotton with his strange panegyric on youth, his terrible warning of its brevity. That had stirred him at the time, and now, as he stood gazing at the shadow of his own loveliness, the full reality of the description flashed across him. Yes, there would be a day when his face would be wrinkled and wizen, his eyes dim and colourless, the grace of his figure broken and deformed. The scarlet would pass away from his lips, and the gold steal from his hair. The life that was to make his soul would mar his body. He would become dreadful, hideous, and uncouth.

As he thought of it, a sharp pang of pain struck through him like a knife, and made each delicate fibre of his nature quiver. His eyes deepened into amethyst, and across them came a mist of tears. He felt as if a hand of ice had been laid upon his heart.

‘Don’t you like it?’ cried Hallward at last, stung a little by the lad’s silence, not understanding what it meant.

‘Of course he likes it,’ said Lord Henry. ‘Who wouldn’t like it? It is one of the greatest things in modern art. I will give you anything you like to ask for it. I must have it.’

‘It is not my property, Harry.’

‘Whose property is it?’

‘Dorian’s, of course,’ answered the painter.

‘He is a very lucky fellow.’

‘How sad it is!’ murmured Dorian Gray, with his eyes still fixed upon his own portrait. ‘How sad it is! I shall grow old, and horrible, and dreadful. But this picture will remain always young. It will never be older than this particular day of June. . . . If it were only the other way! If it were I who was to be always young, and the picture that was to grow old! For that—for that—I would give everything! Yes, there is nothing in the whole world I would not give! I would give my soul for that!’

‘You would hardly care for such an arrangement, Basil,’ cried Lord Henry, laughing. ‘It would be rather hard lines on your work.’

‘I should object very strongly, Harry,’ said Hallward.

Dorian Gray turned and looked at him. ‘I believe you would, Basil. You like your art better than your friends. I am no more to you than a green bronze figure. Hardly as much, I dare say.’

The painter stared in amazement. It was so unlike Dorian to speak like that. What had happened? He seemed quite angry. His face was flushed and his cheeks burning.

‘Yes,’ he continued, ‘I am less to you than your ivory Hermes or your silver Faun.* You will like them always. How long will you like me? Till I have my first wrinkle, I suppose. I know, now, that when one loses one's good looks, whatever they may be, one loses everything. Your picture has taught me that. Lord Henry Wotton is perfectly right. Youth is the only thing worth having. When I find that I am growing old, I shall kill myself.'

Hallward turned pale, and caught his hand. 'Dorian! Dorian!' he cried, 'don't talk like that. I have never had such a friend as you, and I shall never have such another. You are not jealous of material things, are you?—you who are finer than any of them!'

'I am jealous of everything whose beauty does not die. I am jealous of the portrait you have painted of me. Why should it keep what I must lose? Every moment that passes takes something from me, and gives something to it. Oh, if it were only the other way! If the picture could change, and I could be always what I am now! Why did you paint it? It will mock me some day—mock me horribly!' The hot tears welled into his eyes; he tore his hand away, and, flinging himself on the divan, he buried his face in the cushions, as though he was praying.

'This is your doing, Harry,' said the painter, bitterly.

Lord Henry shrugged his shoulders. 'It is the real Dorian Gray—that is all.'

'It is not.'

'If it is not, what have I to do with it?'

'You should have gone away when I asked you,' he muttered.

'I stayed when you asked me,' was Lord Henry's answer.

'Harry, I can't quarrel with my two best friends at once, but between you both you have made me hate the finest piece of work I have ever done, and I will destroy it. What is it but canvas and colour? I will not let it come across our three lives and mar them.'

Dorian Gray lifted his golden head from the pillow, and with pallid face and tear-stained eyes looked at him, as he walked over to the deal painting-table that was set beneath the high curtained window. What was he doing there? His fingers were straying about among the litter of tin tubes and dry brushes, seeking for something. Yes, it was for the long palette-knife, with its thin blade of lithe steel. He had found it at last. He was going to rip up the canvas.

With a stifled sob the lad leaped from the couch, and, rushing over to Hallward, tore the knife out of his hand, and flung it to the end of the studio. 'Don't, Basil, don't!' he cried. 'It would be murder!'

'I am glad you appreciate my work at last, Dorian,' said the painter, coldly, when he had recovered from his surprise. 'I never thought you would.'

'Appreciate it? I am in love with it, Basil. It is part of myself. I feel that.'

'Well, as soon as you are dry, you shall be varnished, and framed, and sent home. Then you can do what you like with yourself.' And he walked across the room and rang the bell for tea. 'You will have tea, of course, Dorian? And so will you, Harry? Or do you object to such simple pleasures?'

'I adore simple pleasures,' said Lord Henry. 'They are the last refuge of the complex. But I don't like scenes, except on the stage. What absurd fellows you are, both of you! I wonder who it was defined man as a rational animal. It was the most premature definition ever given. Man is many things, but he is not rational. I am glad he is not, after all: though I wish you chaps would not squabble over the picture. You had much better let me have it, Basil. This silly boy doesn't really want it, and I really do.'

'If you let any one have it but me, Basil, I shall never forgive you!' cried Dorian Gray; 'and I don't allow people to call me a silly boy.'

'You know the picture is yours, Dorian. I gave it to you before it existed.'

'And you know you have been a little silly, Mr. Gray, and that you don't really object to being reminded that you are extremely young.'

'I should have objected very strongly this morning, Lord Henry.'

'Ah! this morning! You have lived since then.'

There came a knock at the door, and the butler entered with a laden tea-tray and set it down upon a small Japanese table. There was a rattle of cups and saucers and the hissing of a fluted Georgian urn. Two globe-shaped china dishes were brought in by a page.* Dorian Gray went over and poured out the tea. The two men sauntered languidly to the table, and examined what was under the covers.

'Let us go to the theatre to-night,' said Lord Henry. 'There is sure to be something on, somewhere. I have promised to dine at White's,* but it is only with an old friend, so I can send him a wire to say that I am ill, or that I am prevented from coming in consequence of a subsequent engagement. I think that would be a rather nice excuse: it would have all the surprise of candour.'

'It is such a bore putting on one's dress-clothes,*' muttered Hallward. 'And, when one has them on, they are so horrid.'

'Yes,' answered Lord Henry, dreamily, 'the costume of the nineteenth century is detestable. It is so sombre, so depressing. Sin is the only real colour-element left in modern life.'

'You really must not say things like that before Dorian, Harry.'

'Before which Dorian? The one who is pouring out tea for us, or the one in the picture?'

'Before either.'

'I should like to come to the theatre with you, Lord Henry,' said the lad.

'Then you shall come; and you will come too, Basil, won't you?'

'I can't, really. I would sooner not. I have a lot of work to do.'

'Well, then, you and I will go alone, Mr. Gray.'

'I should like that awfully.'

The painter bit his lip and walked over, cup in hand, to the picture. 'I shall stay with the real Dorian,' he said, sadly.

'Is it the real Dorian?' cried the original of the portrait, strolling across to him. 'Am I really like that?'

'Yes; you are just like that.'

'How wonderful, Basil!'

'At least you are like it in appearance. But it will never alter,' sighed Hallward. 'That is something.'

'What a fuss people make about fidelity!' exclaimed Lord Henry. 'Why, even in love it is purely a question for physiology. It has nothing to do with our own will.* Young men want to be faithful, and are not; old men want to be faithless, and cannot: that is all one can say.'

'Don't go to the theatre to-night, Dorian,' said Hallward. 'Stop and dine with me.'

'I can't, Basil.'

'Why?'

'Because I have promised Lord Henry Wotton to go with him.'

'He won't like you the better for keeping your promises. He always breaks his own. I beg you not to go.'

Dorian Gray laughed and shook his head.

'I entreat you.'

The lad hesitated, and looked over at Lord Henry, who was watching them from the tea-table with an amused smile.

'I must go, Basil,' he answered.

'Very well,' said Hallward; and he went over and laid down his cup on the tray. 'It is rather late, and, as you have to dress, you had better lose no time. Good-bye, Harry. Good-bye, Dorian. Come and see me soon. Come to-morrow.'

'Certainly.'

'You won't forget?'

'No, of course not,' cried Dorian.

'And . . . Harry!'

'Yes, Basil?'

'Remember what I asked you, when we were in the garden this morning.'

'I have forgotten it.'

'I trust you.'

'I wish I could trust myself,' said Lord Henry, laughing. 'Come, Mr. Gray, my hansom* is outside, and I can drop you at your own place. Good-bye, Basil. It has been a most interesting afternoon.'

As the door closed behind them, the painter flung himself down on a sofa, and a look of pain came into his face.

CHAPTER III

AT half-past twelve next day Lord Henry Wotton strolled from Curzon Street over to the Albany* to call on his uncle, Lord Fermor, a genial if somewhat rough-mannered old bachelor, whom the outside world called selfish because it derived no particular benefit from him, but who was considered generous by Society* as he fed the people who amused him. His father had been our ambassador at Madrid when Isabella was young, and Prim* unthought of, but had retired from the Diplomatic Service* in a capricious moment of annoyance on not being offered the Embassy at Paris, a post to which he considered that he was fully entitled by reason of his birth, his indolence, the good English of his despatches, and his inordinate passion for pleasure. The son, who had been his father's secretary, had resigned along with his chief, somewhat foolishly as was thought at the time, and on succeeding some months later to the title, had set himself to the serious study of the great aristocratic art of doing absolutely nothing. He had two large town houses, but preferred to live in chambers as it was less trouble, and took most of his meals at his club. He paid some attention to the management of his collieries in the Midland counties,* excusing himself for this taint of industry on the ground that the one advantage of having coal was that it enabled a gentleman to afford the decency of burning wood on his own hearth. In politics he was a Tory,* except when the Tories were in office, during which period he roundly abused them for being a pack of Radicals. He was a hero to his valet, who bullied him, and a terror to most of his relations, whom he bullied in turn. Only England could have produced him, and he always said that the country was going to the dogs. His principles were out of date, but there was a good deal to be said for his prejudices.

When Lord Henry entered the room, he found his uncle sitting in a rough shooting coat, smoking a cheroot and grumbling over The Times.* ‘Well, Harry,’ said the old gentleman, ‘what brings you out so early? I thought you dandies* never got up till two, and were not visible till five.’

‘Pure family affection, I assure you, Uncle George. I want to get something out of you.’

‘Money, I suppose,’ said Lord Fermor, making a wry face. ‘Well, sit down and tell me all about it. Young people, nowadays, imagine that money is everything.’

‘Yes,’ murmured Lord Henry, settling his button-hole in his coat; ‘and when they grow older they know it. But I don’t want money. It is only people who pay their bills who want that, Uncle George, and I never pay mine. Credit is the capital of a younger son, and one lives charmingly upon it. Besides, I always deal with Dartmoor’s tradesmen, and consequently they never bother me. What I want is information: not useful information, of course; useless information.’

‘Well, I can tell you anything that is in an English Blue-book,* Harry, although those fellows nowadays write a lot of nonsense. When I was in the Diplomatic,* things were much better. But I hear they let them in now by examination. What can you expect? Examinations, sir, are pure humbug from beginning to end. If a man is a gentleman, he knows quite enough, and if he is not a gentleman, whatever he knows is bad for him.’*

‘Mr. Dorian Gray does not belong to Blue-books, Uncle George,’ said Lord Henry, languidly.

‘Mr. Dorian Gray? Who is he?’ asked Lord Fermor, knitting his bushy white eyebrows.

‘That is what I have come to learn, Uncle George. Or rather, I know who he is. He is the last Lord Kelso’s* grandson. His mother was a Devereux,* Lady Margaret Devereux. I want you to tell me about his mother. What was she like? Whom did she marry? You have known nearly everybody in your time, so you might have known her. I am very much interested in Mr. Gray at present. I have only just met him.’

‘Kelso’s grandson!’ echoed the old gentleman—‘Kelso’s grandson! . . . Of course. . . . I knew his mother intimately. I believe I was at her christening. She was an extraordinarily beautiful girl, Margaret Devereux, and made all the men frantic by running away with a penniless young fellow, a mere nobody, sir, a subaltern in a foot regiment,* or something of that kind. Certainly. I remember the whole thing as if it happened yesterday. The poor chap was killed in a duel at Spa* a few months after the marriage. There was an ugly story about it. They said Kelso got some rascally adventurer, some Belgian brute, to insult his son-in-law in public, paid him, sir, to do it, paid him, and that the fellow spitted his man as if he had been a pigeon. The thing was hushed up, but, egad, Kelso ate his chop alone at the club for some time afterwards. He brought his daughter back with him, I was told, and she never spoke to him again. Oh, yes; it was a bad business. The girl died too, died within a year. So she left a son, did she? I had forgotten that. What sort of boy is he? If he is like his mother he must be a good-looking chap.’

‘He is very good-looking,’ assented Lord Henry.

‘I hope he will fall into proper hands,’ continued the old man. ‘He should have a pot of money waiting for him if Kelso did the right thing by him. His mother had money too. All the Selby property* came to her, through her grandfather. Her grandfather hated Kelso, thought him a mean dog. He was, too. Came to Madrid once when I was there. Egad, I was ashamed of him. The Queen used to ask me about the English noble who was always quarrelling with the cabmen about their fares. They made quite a story of it. I didn’t dare show my face at Court for a month. I hope he treated his grandson better than he did the jarvies.’*

‘I don’t know,’ answered Lord Henry. ‘I fancy that the boy will be well off. He is not of age yet. He has Selby, I know. He told me so. And . . . his mother was very beautiful?’

‘Margaret Devereux was one of the loveliest creatures I ever saw,

Harry. What on earth induced her to behave as she did,* I never could understand. She could have married anybody she chose. Carlington was mad after her. She was romantic, though. All the women of that family were. The men were a poor lot, but, egad! the women were wonderful. Carlington went on his knees to her. Told me so himself. She laughed at him, and there wasn't a girl in London at the time who wasn't after him. And by the way, Harry, talking about silly marriages, what is this humbug your father tells me about Dartmoor wanting to marry an American?* Ain't English girls good enough for him?'

'It is rather fashionable to marry Americans just now, Uncle George.'

'I'll back English women against the world, Harry,' said Lord Fermor, striking the table with his fist.

'The betting is on the Americans.'

'They don't last, I am told,' muttered his uncle.

'A long engagement exhausts them, but they are capital at a steeplechase. They take things flying. I don't think Dartmoor has a chance.'

'Who are her people?' grumbled the old gentleman. 'Has she got any?'

Lord Henry shook his head. 'American girls are as clever at concealing their parents, as English women are at concealing their past,' he said, rising to go.

'They are pork-packers, I suppose?'

'I hope so, Uncle George, for Dartmoor's sake. I am told that pork-packing is the most lucrative profession in America, after politics.'

'Is she pretty?'

'She behaves as if she was beautiful. Most American women do. It is the secret of their charm.'

'Why can't these American women stay in their own country? They are always telling us that it is the Paradise for women.'

'It is. That is the reason why, like Eve, they are so excessively anxious to get out of it,' said Lord Henry. 'Good-bye, Uncle George. I shall be late for lunch, if I stop any longer. Thanks for giving me the information I wanted. I always like to know everything about my new friends, and nothing about my old ones.'

'Where are you lunching, Harry?'

‘At Aunt Agatha’s. I have asked myself and Mr. Gray. He is her latest protégé.’

‘Humph! tell your Aunt Agatha, Harry, not to bother me any more with her charity appeals. I am sick of them. Why, the good woman thinks that I have nothing to do but to write cheques for her silly fads.’

‘All right, Uncle George, I’ll tell her, but it won’t have any effect. Philanthropic people lose all sense of humanity. It is their distinguishing characteristic.’

The old gentleman growled approvingly, and rang the bell for his servant. Lord Henry passed up the low arcade into Burlington Street, and turned his steps in the direction of Berkeley Square.*

So that was the story of Dorian Gray’s parentage. Crudely as it had been told to him, it had yet stirred him by its suggestion of a strange, almost modern romance. A beautiful woman risking everything for a mad passion. A few wild weeks of happiness cut short by a hideous, treacherous crime. Months of voiceless agony, and then a child born in pain. The mother snatched away by death, the boy left to solitude and the tyranny of an old and loveless man. Yes; it was an interesting background. It posed the lad, made him more perfect as it were. Behind every exquisite thing that existed, there was something tragic. Worlds had to be in travail, that the meanest flower might blow.* . . . And how charming he had been at dinner the night before, as with startled eyes and lips parted in frightened pleasure he had sat opposite to him at the club, the red candleshades staining to a richer rose the wakening wonder of his face. Talking to him was like playing upon an exquisite violin. He answered to every touch and thrill of the bow. . . . There was something terribly enthralling in the exercise of influence. No other activity was like it. To project one’s soul into some gracious form, and let it tarry there for a moment; to hear one’s own intellectual views echoed back to one with all the added music of passion and youth; to convey one’s temperament into another as though it were a subtle fluid or a strange perfume: there was a real joy in that—perhaps the most satisfying joy left to us in an age so limited and vulgar as our own, an age grossly carnal in its pleasures, and grossly common in its aims. . . . He was a marvellous type, too, this lad, whom by so curious a chance he had met in Basil’s studio, or could be fashioned into a marvellous type, at any rate. Grace was his, and the white purity of boyhood, and beauty such as old Greek marbles kept for us. There was nothing that one could not do with him. He could be made a Titan* or a toy. What a pity it was that such beauty was destined to fade! . . . And Basil? From a psychological point of view, how interesting he was! The new manner in art, the fresh mode of looking at life, suggested so strangely by the merely visible presence of one who was unconscious of it all; the silent spirit that dwelt in dim woodland, and walked unseen in open field, suddenly showing herself, Dryad-like* and not afraid, because in his soul who sought for her there had been awakened that wonderful vision to which alone are wonderful things revealed; the mere shapes and patterns of things becoming, as it were, refined, and gaining a kind of symbolical value, as though they were themselves patterns of some other and more perfect form whose shadow they made real: how strange it all was! He remembered something like it in history. Was it not Plato, that artist in thought, who had first analyzed it? Was it not Buonarrotti who had carved it in the coloured marbles of a sonnet-sequence? But in our own century it was strange. . . . Yes; he would try to be to Dorian Gray what, without knowing it, the lad was to the painter who had fashioned the wonderful portrait. He would seek to dominate him—had already, indeed, half done so. He would make that wonderful spirit his own. There was something fascinating in this son of Love and Death.

Suddenly he stopped, and glanced up at the houses. He found that he had passed his aunt's some distance, and, smiling to himself, turned back. When he entered the somewhat sombre hall, the butler told him that they had gone in to lunch. He gave one of the footmen his hat and stick, and passed into the dining-room.

'Late as usual, Harry,' cried his aunt, shaking her head at him.

He invented a facile excuse, and having taken the vacant seat next to her, looked round to see who was there. Dorian bowed to him shyly from the end of the table, a flush of pleasure stealing into his cheek. Opposite was the Duchess of Harley, a lady of admirable good-nature and good temper, much liked by every one who knew her, and of those ample architectural proportions that in women who are not Duchesses are described by contemporary historians as stoutness. Next to her sat, on her right, Sir Thomas Burdon, a Radical member of Parliament,* who followed his leader in public life, and in private followed the best cooks, dining with the Tories, and thinking with the Liberals,* in accordance with a wise and well-known rule. The post on her left was occupied by Mr. Erskine of Treadley,* an old gentleman of considerable charm and culture, who had fallen, however, into bad habits of silence, having, as he explained once to Lady Agatha, said everything that he had to say before he was thirty. His own neighbour was Mrs. Vandeleur, one of his aunt's oldest friends, a perfect saint amongst women, but so dreadfully dowdy that she reminded one of a badly bound hymn-book. Fortunately for him she had on the other side Lord Faudel, a most intelligent middle-aged mediocrity, as bald as a Ministerial statement in the House of Commons, with whom she was conversing in that intensely earnest manner which is the one unpardonable error, as he remarked once himself, that all really good people fall into, and from which none of them ever quite escape.

'We are talking about poor Dartmoor, Lord Henry,' cried the Duchess, nodding pleasantly to him across the table. 'Do you think he will really marry this fascinating young person?'

'I believe she has made up her mind to propose to him, Duchess.'

'How dreadful!' exclaimed Lady Agatha. 'Really, some one should interfere.'

'I am told, on excellent authority, that her father keeps an American dry-goods store,' said Sir Thomas Burdon, looking supercilious.

'My uncle has already suggested pork-packing, Sir Thomas.'

'Dry-goods! What are American dry-goods?' asked the Duchess, raising her large hands in wonder, and accentuating the verb.

'American novels,*' answered Lord Henry, helping himself to some quail.

The Duchess looked puzzled.

'Don't mind him, my dear,' whispered Lady Agatha. 'He never means anything that he says.'

'When America was discovered,' said the Radical member, and he began to give some wearisome facts. Like all people who try to exhaust a subject, he exhausted his listeners. The Duchess sighed, and exercised her privilege of interruption. 'I wish to goodness it never had been discovered at all!' she exclaimed. 'Really, our girls have no chance nowadays. It is most unfair.'

'Perhaps, after all, America never has been discovered,' said Mr. Erskine; 'I myself would say that it had merely been detected.'

'Oh! but I have seen specimens of the inhabitants,' answered the Duchess, vaguely. 'I must confess that most of them are extremely pretty. And they dress well, too. They get all their dresses in Paris. I wish I could afford to do the same.'

'They say that when good Americans die they go to Paris,' chuckled Sir Thomas, who had a large wardrobe of Humour's cast-off clothes.

'Really! And where do bad Americans go to when they die?' inquired the Duchess.

'They go to America,'* murmured Lord Henry.

Sir Thomas frowned. 'I am afraid that your nephew is prejudiced against that great country,' he said to Lady Agatha. 'I have travelled all over it, in cars provided by the directors, who, in such matters, are extremely civil. I assure you that it is an education to visit it.'

'But must we really see Chicago in order to be educated?' asked Mr. Erskine, plaintively. 'I don't feel up to the journey.'

Sir Thomas waved his hand. 'Mr. Erskine of Treadley has the world on his shelves. We practical men like to see things, not to read about them. The Americans are an extremely interesting people. They are absolutely reasonable. I think that is their distinguishing characteristic. Yes, Mr. Erskine, an absolutely reasonable people. I assure you there is no nonsense about the Americans.'

'How dreadful!' cried Lord Henry. 'I can stand brute force, but brute reason is quite unbearable. There is something unfair about its use. It is hitting below the intellect.'

'I do not understand you,' said Sir Thomas, growing rather red.

'I do, Lord Henry,' murmured Mr. Erskine, with a smile.

'Paradoxes are all very well in their way . . .' rejoined the Baronet.

'Was that a paradox?' asked Mr. Erskine. 'I did not think so. Perhaps it was. Well, the way of paradoxes is the way of truth. To test Reality we must see it on the tight-rope. When the Verities* become acrobats we can judge them.'

'Dear me!' said Lady Agatha, 'how you men argue! I am sure I never can make out what you are talking about. Oh! Harry, I am quite vexed with you. Why do you try to persuade our nice Mr. Dorian Gray to give up the East End?*' I assure you he would be quite invaluable. They would love his playing.'

'I want him to play to me,' cried Lord Henry, smiling, and he looked down the table and caught a bright answering glance.

'But they are so unhappy in Whitechapel,' continued Lady Agatha.

'I can sympathize with everything, except suffering,' said Lord Henry, shrugging his shoulders. 'I cannot sympathize with that. It is too ugly, too horrible, too distressing. There is something terribly morbid in the modern sympathy with pain. One should sympathize with the colour, the beauty, the joy of life. The less said about life's sores the better.'

'Still, the East End is a very important problem,' remarked Sir Thomas, with a grave shake of the head.

'Quite so,' answered the young lord. 'It is the problem of slavery, and we try to solve it by amusing the slaves.'*

The politician looked at him keenly. 'What change do you propose, then?' he asked.

Lord Henry laughed. 'I don't desire to change anything in England except the weather,' he answered. 'I am quite content with philosophic contemplation. But, as the nineteenth century has gone bankrupt through an over-expenditure of sympathy, I would suggest that we should appeal to Science to put us straight. The advantage of the emotions is that they lead us astray, and the advantage of Science is that it is not emotional.'

'But we have such grave responsibilities,' ventured Mrs. Vandeleur, timidly.

'Terribly grave,' echoed Lady Agatha.

Lord Henry looked over at Mr. Erskine. 'Humanity takes itself too seriously. It is the world's original sin. If the caveman had known how to laugh, History would have been different.'

'You are really very comforting,' warbled the Duchess. 'I have always felt rather guilty when I came to see your dear aunt, for I take no interest at all in the East End. For the future I shall be able to look her in the face without a blush.'

'A blush is very becoming, Duchess,' remarked Lord Henry.

'Only when one is young,' she answered. 'When an old woman like myself blushes, it is a very bad sign. Ah! Lord Henry, I wish you would tell me how to become young again.'

He thought for a moment. 'Can you remember any great error that you committed in your early days, Duchess?' he asked, looking at her across the table.

'A great many, I fear,' she cried.

'Then commit them over again,' he said, gravely. 'To get back one's youth, one has merely to repeat one's follies.'

‘A delightful theory!’ she exclaimed. ‘I must put it into practice.’

‘A dangerous theory!’ came from Sir Thomas’s tight lips. Lady Agatha shook her head, but could not help being amused. Mr. Erskine listened.

‘Yes,’ he continued, ‘that is one of the great secrets of life. Nowadays most people die of a sort of creeping common sense, and discover when it is too late that the only things one never regrets are one’s mistakes.’

A laugh ran round the table.

He played with the idea, and grew wilful; tossed it into the air and transformed it; let it escape and recaptured it; made it iridescent with fancy, and winged it with paradox. The praise of folly,* as he went on, soared into a philosophy, and Philosophy herself became young, and catching the mad music of Pleasure, wearing, one might fancy, her wine-stained robe and wreath of ivy, danced like a Bacchante over the hills of life, and mocked the slow Silenus* for being sober. Facts fled before her like frightened forest things. Her white feet trod the huge press at which wise Omar* sits, till the seething grape-juice rose round her bare limbs in waves of purple bubbles, or crawled in red foam over the vat’s black, dripping, sloping sides. It was an extraordinary improvisation. He felt that the eyes of Dorian Gray were fixed on him, and the consciousness that amongst his audience there was one whose temperament he wished to fascinate, seemed to give his wit keenness, and to lend colour to his imagination. He was brilliant, fantastic, irresponsible. He charmed his listeners out of themselves, and they followed his pipe laughing. Dorian Gray never took his gaze off him, but sat like one under a spell, smiles chasing each other over his lips, and wonder growing grave in his darkening eyes.

At last, liveried in the costume of the age, Reality entered the room in the shape of a servant to tell the Duchess that her carriage was waiting. She wrung her hands in mock despair. ‘How annoying!’ she cried. ‘I must go. I have to call for my husband at the club, to take him to some absurd meeting at Willis’s Rooms,* where he is going to be in the chair. If I am late he is sure to be furious, and I couldn’t have a scene in this bonnet. It is far too fragile. A harsh word would ruin it. No, I must go, dear Agatha. Good-bye, Lord Henry, you are quite delightful, and dreadfully demoralizing. I am sure I don’t know what to say about your views. You must come and dine with us some night. Tuesday? Are you disengaged Tuesday?’

‘For you I would throw over anybody, Duchess,’ said Lord Henry, with a bow.

‘Ah! that is very nice, and very wrong of you,’ she cried; ‘so mind you come;’ and she swept out of the room, followed by Lady Agatha and the other ladies.

When Lord Henry had sat down again, Mr. Erskine moved round, and taking a chair close to him, placed his hand upon his arm.

‘You talk books away,’ he said; ‘why don’t you write one?’

‘I am too fond of reading books to care to write them, Mr. Erskine. I should like to write a novel certainly, a novel that would be as lovely as a Persian carpet and as unreal. But there is no literary public in England for anything except newspapers, primers, and encyclopædias. Of all people in the world the English have the least sense of the beauty of literature.’

‘I fear you are right,’ answered Mr. Erskine. ‘I myself used to have literary ambitions, but I gave them up long ago. And now, my dear young friend, if you will allow me to call you so, may I ask if you really meant all that you said to us at lunch?’

‘I quite forget what I said,’ smiled Lord Henry. ‘Was it all very bad?’

‘Very bad indeed. In fact I consider you extremely dangerous, and if anything happens to our good Duchess we shall all look on you as being primarily responsible. But I should like to talk to you about life. The generation into which I was born was tedious. Some day, when you are tired of London, come down to Treadley, and expound to me your philosophy of pleasure over some admirable Burgundy I am fortunate enough to possess.’

‘I shall be charmed. A visit to Treadley would be a great privilege. It has a perfect host, and a perfect library.’

‘You will complete it,’ answered the old gentleman, with a courteous bow. ‘And now I must bid good-bye to your excellent aunt. I am due at the Athenæum.* It is the hour when we sleep there.’

‘All of you, Mr. Erskine?’

‘Forty of us, in forty arm-chairs. We are practising for an English Academy of Letters.’*

Lord Henry laughed, and rose. ‘I am going to the Park,’* he cried.

As he was passing out of the door Dorian Gray touched him on the arm. ‘Let me come with you,’ he murmured.

‘But I thought you had promised Basil Hallward to go and see him,’ answered Lord Henry.

‘I would sooner come with you; yes, I feel I must come with you. Do let me. And you will promise to talk to me all the time? No one talks so wonderfully as you do.’

‘Ah! I have talked quite enough for to-day,’ said Lord Henry, smiling. ‘All I want now is to look at life. You may come and look at it with me, if you care to.’

CHAPTER IV

ONE afternoon, a month later, Dorian Gray was reclining in a luxurious arm-chair, in the little library of Lord Henry’s house in Mayfair. It was, in its way, a very charming room, with its high panelled wainscoting of olive-stained oak, its cream-coloured frieze and ceiling of raised plaster-work, and its brickdust felt carpet strewn with silk long-fringed Persian rugs. On a tiny satin-wood table stood a statuette by Clodion,* and beside it lay a copy of ‘Les Cent Nouvelles,’* bound for Margaret of Valois by Clovis Eve,* and powdered with the gilt daisies that Queen had selected for her device. Some large blue china jars and parrot-tulips* were ranged on the mantelshelf, and through the small leaded panes of the window streamed the apricot-coloured light of a summer day in London.

Lord Henry had not yet come in. He was always late on principle, his principle being that punctuality is the thief of time.* So the lad was looking rather sulky, as with listless fingers he turned over the pages of an elaborately-illustrated edition of ‘Manon Lescaut’* that he had found in one of the bookcases. The formal monotonous ticking of the Louis Quatorze clock annoyed him. Once or twice he thought of going away.

At last he heard a step outside, and the door opened. ‘How late you are, Harry!’ he murmured.

‘I am afraid it is not Harry, Mr. Gray,’ answered a shrill voice.

He glanced quickly round, and rose to his feet. ‘I beg your pardon. I thought—’

‘You thought it was my husband. It is only his wife. You must let me introduce myself. I know you quite well by your photographs. I think my husband has got seventeen of them.’

‘Not seventeen, Lady Henry?’

‘Well, eighteen, then. And I saw you with him the other night at the Opera.’* She laughed nervously as she spoke, and watched him with her vague forget-me-not eyes. She was a curious woman, whose dresses always looked as if they had been designed in a rage and put on in a tempest. She was usually in love with somebody, and, as her passion was never returned, she had kept all her illusions. She tried to look picturesque, but only succeeded in being untidy. Her name was Victoria, and she had a perfect mania for going to church.

‘That was at “Lohengrin,”* Lady Henry, I think?’

‘Yes; it was at dear “Lohengrin.” I like Wagner’s music better than anybody’s. It is so loud that one can talk the whole time without other people hearing what one says. That is a great advantage: don’t you think so, Mr. Gray?’

The same nervous staccato laugh broke from her thin lips, and her fingers began to play with a long tortoise-shell paper-knife.

Dorian smiled, and shook his head: ‘I am afraid I don’t think so, Lady Henry. I never talk during music—at least, during good music. If one hears bad music, it is one’s duty to drown it in conversation.’

‘Ah! that is one of Harry’s views, isn’t it, Mr. Gray? I always hear Harry’s views from his friends. It is the only way I get to know of them. But you must not think I don’t like good music. I adore it, but I am afraid of it. It makes me too romantic. I have simply worshipped pianists—two at a time, sometimes, Harry tells me. I don’t know what it is about them. Perhaps it is that they are foreigners. They all are, ain’t they? Even those that are born in England become foreigners after a time, don’t they? It is so clever of them, and such a compliment to art. Makes it quite cosmopolitan, doesn’t it? You have never been to any of my parties, have you, Mr. Gray? You must come. I can’t afford orchids, but I spare no expense in foreigners. They make one’s rooms look so picturesque. But here is Harry!—Harry, I came in to look for you, to ask you something—I forget what it was—and I found Mr. Gray here. We have had such a pleasant chat about music. We have quite the same ideas. No; I think our ideas are quite different. But he has been most pleasant. I am so glad I’ve seen him.’

‘I am charmed, my love, quite charmed,’ said Lord Henry, elevating his dark crescent-shaped eyebrows and looking at them both with an amused smile. ‘So sorry I am late, Dorian. I went to look after a piece of old brocade in Wardour Street,* and had to bargain for hours for it. Nowadays people know the price of everything, and the value of nothing.’*

‘I am afraid I must be going,’ exclaimed Lady Henry, breaking an awkward silence with her silly sudden laugh. ‘I have promised to drive with the Duchess. Good-bye, Mr. Gray. Good-bye, Harry. You are dining out, I suppose? So am I. Perhaps I shall see you at Lady Thornbury’s.’

‘I dare say, my dear,’ said Lord Henry, shutting the door behind her, as, looking like a bird of paradise that had been out all night in the rain, she flitted out of the room, leaving a faint odour of frangi-panni.* Then he lit a cigarette, and flung himself down on the sofa.

‘Never marry a woman with straw-coloured hair, Dorian,’ he said, after a few puffs.

‘Why, Harry?’

‘Because they are so sentimental.’

‘But I like sentimental people.’

‘Never marry at all, Dorian. Men marry because they are tired; women, because they are curious: both are disappointed.’*

‘I don’t think I am likely to marry, Harry. I am too much in love. That is one of your aphorisms. I am putting it into practice, as I do everything that you say.’

‘Who are you in love with?’ asked Lord Henry, after a pause.

‘With an actress,’ said Dorian Gray, blushing.

Lord Henry shrugged his shoulders. ‘That is a rather commonplace début.’

‘You would not say so if you saw her, Harry.’

‘Who is she?’

‘Her name is Sibyl Vane.’*

‘Never heard of her.’

‘No one has. People will some day, however. She is a genius.’

‘My dear boy, no woman is a genius. Women are a decorative sex. They never have anything to say, but they say it charmingly. Women represent the triumph of matter over mind, just as men represent the triumph of mind over morals.’

‘Harry, how can you?’

‘My dear Dorian, it is quite true. I am analyzing women at present, so I ought to know. The subject is not so abstruse as I thought it was. I find that, ultimately, there are only two kinds of women, the plain and the coloured.* The plain women are very useful. If you want to gain a reputation for respectability, you have merely to take them down to supper. The other women are very charming. They commit one mistake, however. They paint in order to try and look young. Our grandmothers painted in order to try and talk brilliantly. Rouge and esprit* used to go together. That is all over now. As long as a woman can look ten years younger than her own daughter, she is perfectly satisfied. As for conversation, there are only five women in London worth talking to, and two of these can't be admitted into decent society. However, tell me about your genius. How long have you known her?'

'Ah! Harry, your views terrify me.'

'Never mind that. How long have you known her?'

'About three weeks.'

'And where did you come across her?'

'I will tell you, Henry; but you mustn't be unsympathetic about it. After all, it never would have happened if I had not met you. You filled me with a wild desire to know everything about life. For days after I met you, something seemed to throb in my veins. As I lounged in the Park, or strolled down Piccadilly, I used to look at every one who passed me, and wonder, with a mad curiosity, what sort of lives they led. Some of them fascinated me. Others filled me with terror. There was an exquisite poison in the air. I had a passion for sensations. . . . Well, one evening about seven o'clock, I determined to go out in search of some adventure. I felt that this grey, monstrous London of ours, with its myriads of people, its sordid sinners, and its splendid sins, as you once phrased it, must have something in store for me. I fancied a thousand things. The mere danger gave me a sense of delight. I remembered what you had said to me on that wonderful evening when we first dined together, about the search for beauty being the real secret of life. I don't know what I expected, but I went out and wandered eastward, soon losing my way in a labyrinth of grimy streets and black, grassless squares. About half-past eight I passed by an absurd little theatre, with great flaring gas-jets* and gaudy play-bills.* A hideous Jew,* in the most amazing waistcoat I ever beheld in my life, was standing at the entrance, smoking a vile cigar. He had greasy ringlets, and an enormous diamond blazed in the centre of a soiled shirt. "Have a box, my Lord?" he said, when he saw me, and he took off his hat with an air of gorgeous servility. There was something about him, Harry, that amused me. He was such a monster. You will laugh at me, I know, but I really went in and paid a whole guinea* for the stage-box. To the present day I can't make out why I did so; and yet if I hadn't—my dear Harry, if I hadn't, I should have missed the greatest romance of my life. I see you are laughing. It is horrid of you!

'I am not laughing, Dorian; at least I am not laughing at you. But you should not say the greatest romance of your life. You should say the first romance of your life. You will always be loved, and you will always be in love with love. A grande passion* is the privilege of people who have nothing to do. That is the one use of the idle classes of a country. Don't be afraid. There are exquisite things in store for you. This is merely the beginning.'

'Do you think my nature so shallow?' cried Dorian Gray, angrily.

'No; I think your nature so deep.'

'How do you mean?'

'My dear boy, the people who love only once in their lives are really the shallow people. What they call their loyalty, and their fidelity, I call either the lethargy of custom or their lack of imagination. Faithfulness is to the emotional life what consistency is to the life of the intellect—simply a confession of failure. Faithfulness! I must analyze it some day. The passion for property is in it. There are many things that we would throw away if we were not afraid that others might pick them up. But I don't want to interrupt you. Go on with your story.'

'Well, I found myself seated in a horrid little private box, with a vulgar drop-scene* staring me in the face. I looked out from behind the curtain, and surveyed the house. It was a tawdry affair, all Cupids and cornucopias,* like a third-rate wedding-cake. The gallery and pit were fairly full, but the two rows of dingy stalls were quite empty, and there was hardly a person in what I suppose they called the dress-circle. Women went about with oranges and ginger-beer, and there was a terrible consumption of nuts going on.'

'It must have been just like the palmy days of the British Drama.'*

'Just like, I should fancy, and very depressing. I began to wonder what on earth I should do, when I caught sight of the play-bill. What do you think the play was, Harry?'

'I should think "The Idiot Boy, or Dumb but Innocent."* Our fathers used to like that sort of piece, I believe. The longer I live, Dorian, the more keenly I feel that whatever was good enough for our fathers is not good enough for us. In art, as in politics, les grands-pères ont toujours tort.’*

‘This play was good enough for us, Harry. It was “Romeo and Juliet.” I must admit that I was rather annoyed at the idea of seeing Shakespeare done in such a wretched hole of a place. Still, I felt interested, in a sort of way. At any rate, I determined to wait for the first act. There was a dreadful orchestra, presided over by a young Hebrew who sat at a cracked piano, that nearly drove me away, but at last the drop-scene was drawn up, and the play began. Romeo* was a stout elderly gentleman, with corked eyebrows, a husky tragedy voice, and a figure like a beer-barrel. Mercutio was almost as bad. He was played by the low-comedian, who had introduced gags of his own and was on most friendly terms with the pit. They were both as grotesque as the scenery, and that looked as if it had come out of a country-booth. But Juliet! Harry, imagine a girl, hardly seventeen years of age, with a little flower-like face, a small Greek head with plaited coils of dark-brown hair, eyes that were violet wells of passion, lips that were like the petals of a rose. She was the loveliest thing I had ever seen in my life. You said to me once that pathos left you unmoved, but that beauty, mere beauty, could fill your eyes with tears. I tell you, Harry, I could hardly see this girl for the mist of tears that came across me. And her voice—I never heard such a voice. It was very low at first, with deep mellow notes, that seemed to fall singly upon one’s ear. Then it became a little louder, and sounded like a flute or a distant hautbois.* In the garden-scene it had all the tremulous ecstasy that one hears just before dawn when nightingales are singing. There were moments, later on, when it had the wild passion of violins. You know how a voice can stir one. Your voice and the voice of Sibyl Vane are two things that I shall never forget. When I close my eyes, I hear them, and each of them says something different. I don’t know which to follow. Why should I not love her? Harry, I do love her. She is everything to me in life. Night after night I go to see her play. One evening she is Rosalind, and the next evening she is Imogen. I have seen her die in the gloom of an Italian tomb, sucking the poison from her lover’s lips. I have watched her wandering through the forest of Arden, disguised as a pretty boy in hose and doublet and dainty cap. She has been mad, and has come into the presence of a guilty king, and given him rue to wear, and bitter herbs to taste of. She has been innocent, and the black hands of jealousy have crushed her reed-like throat. I have seen her in every age and in every costume. Ordinary women never appeal to one's imagination. They are limited to their century. No glamour ever transfigures them. One knows their minds as easily as one knows their bonnets. One can always find them. There is no mystery in any of them. They ride in the Park in the morning, and chatter at tea-parties in the afternoon. They have their stereotyped smile, and their fashionable manner. They are quite obvious. But an actress! How different an actress is! Harry! why didn't you tell me that the only thing worth loving is an actress?'

'Because I have loved so many of them, Dorian.'

'Oh, yes, horrid people with dyed hair and painted faces.'

'Don't run down dyed hair and painted faces. There is an extraordinary charm in them, sometimes,' said Lord Henry.

'I wish now I had not told you about Sibyl Vane.'

'You could not have helped telling me, Dorian. All through your life you will tell me everything you do.'

'Yes, Harry, I believe that is true. I cannot help telling you things. You have a curious influence over me. If I ever did a crime, I would come and confess it to you.* You would understand me.'

'People like you—the wilful sunbeams of life—don't commit crimes, Dorian. But I am much obliged for the compliment, all the same. And now tell me—reach me the matches, like a good boy: thanks—what are your actual relations with Sibyl Vane?'

Dorian Gray leaped to his feet, with flushed cheeks and burning eyes. 'Harry! Sibyl Vane is sacred!'

'It is only the sacred things that are worth touching, Dorian,' said Lord Henry, with a strange touch of pathos in his voice. 'But why should you be annoyed? I suppose she will belong to you some day. When one is in love, one always begins by deceiving one's self, and one always ends by deceiving others. That is what the world calls a romance. You know her, at any rate, I suppose?'

'Of course I know her. On the first night I was at the theatre, the horrid old Jew came round to the box after the performance was over, and offered to take me behind the scenes and introduce me to her. I was furious with him, and told him that Juliet had been dead for hundreds of years, and that her body was lying in a marble tomb in Verona. I think, from his blank look of amazement, that he was under the impression that I had taken too much champagne, or something.'

'I am not surprised.'

'Then he asked me if I wrote for any of the newspapers. I told him I never even read them. He seemed terribly disappointed at that, and confided to me that all the dramatic critics were in a conspiracy against him, and that they were every one of them to be bought.'

'I should not wonder if he was quite right there. But, on the other hand, judging from their appearance, most of them cannot be at all expensive.'

'Well, he seemed to think they were beyond his means,' laughed Dorian. 'By this time, however, the lights were being put out in the theatre, and I had to go. He wanted me to try some cigars that he strongly recommended. I declined. The next night, of course, I arrived at the place again. When he saw me he made me a low bow, and assured me that I was a munificent patron of art. He was a most offensive brute, though he had an extraordinary passion for Shakespeare. He told me once, with an air of pride, that his five bankruptcies were entirely due to "The Bard," as he insisted on calling him. He seemed to think it a distinction.'

'It was a distinction, my dear Dorian—a great distinction. Most people become bankrupt through having invested too heavily in the prose of life. To have ruined one's self over poetry is an honour. But when did you first speak to Miss Sibyl Vane?'

'The third night. She had been playing Rosalind. I could not help going round. I had thrown her some flowers, and she had looked at me; at least I fancied that she had. The old Jew was persistent. He seemed determined to take me behind, so I consented. It was curious my not wanting to know her, wasn't it?'

'No; I don't think so.'

'My dear Harry, why?'

'I will tell you some other time. Now I want to know about the girl.'

'Sibyl? Oh, she was so shy, and so gentle. There is something of a child about her. Her eyes opened wide in exquisite wonder when I told her what I thought of her performance, and she seemed quite unconscious of her power. I think we were both rather nervous. The old Jew stood grinning at the doorway of the dusty greenroom, making elaborate speeches about us both, while we stood looking at one. She is more than an individual. You laugh, but I tell you she has genius. I love her, and I must make her love me. You, who know all the secrets of life, tell me how to charm Sibyl Vane to love me! I want to make Romeo jealous. I want the dead lovers of the world to hear our laughter, and grow sad. I want a breath of our passion to stir their dust into consciousness, to wake their ashes into pain. My God, Harry, how I worship her!' He was walking up and down the room as he spoke. Hectic spots of red burned on his cheeks. He was terribly excited.

Lord Henry watched him with a subtle sense of pleasure. How different he was now from the shy, frightened boy he had met in Basil Hallward's studio! His nature had developed like a flower, had borne blossoms of scarlet flame. Out of its secret hiding-place had crept his Soul, and Desire had come to meet it on the way.

'And what do you propose to do?' said Lord Henry, at last.

'I want you and Basil to come with me some night and see her act. I have not the slightest fear of the result. You are certain to acknowledge her genius. Then we must get her out of the Jew's hands. She is bound to him for three years—at least for two years and eight months—from the present time. I shall have to pay him something, of course. When all that is settled, I shall take a West End theatre* and bring her out properly. She will make the world as mad as she has made me.'

'That would be impossible, my dear boy!'

'Yes, she will. She has not merely art, consummate art-instinct, in her, but she has personality also; and you have often told me that it is personalities, not principles, that move the age.'

'Well, what night shall we go?'

'Let me see. To-day is Tuesday. Let us fix to-morrow. She plays Juliet to-morrow.'

'All right. The Bristol* at eight o'clock; and I will get Basil.'

'Not eight, Harry, please. Half-past six. We must be there before the curtain rises. You must see her in the first act, where she meets Romeo.'

'Half-past six! What an hour! It will be like having a meat-tea,* or reading an English novel. It must be seven. No gentleman dines before seven. Shall you see Basil between this and then? Or shall I write to him?'

'Dear Basil! I have not laid eyes on him for a week. It is rather horrid of me, as he has sent me my portrait in the most wonderful frame, specially designed by himself, and, though I am a little jealous of the picture for being a whole month younger than I am, I must admit that I delight in it. Perhaps you had better write to him. I don't want to see him alone. He says things that annoy me. He gives me good advice.'

Lord Henry smiled. 'People are very fond of giving away what they need most themselves.* It is what I call the depth of generosity.'

'Oh, Basil is the best of fellows, but he seems to me to be just a bit of a Philistine. Since I have known you, Harry, I have discovered that.'

'Basil, my dear boy, puts everything that is charming in him into his work. The consequence is that he has nothing left for life but his prejudices, his principles, and his common sense. The only artists I have ever known, who are personally delightful, are bad artists. Good artists exist simply in what they make, and consequently are perfectly uninteresting in what they are. A great poet, a really great poet, is the most unpoetical of all creatures. But inferior poets are absolutely fascinating. The worse their rhymes are, the more picturesque they look. The mere fact of having published a book of second-rate sonnets makes a man quite irresistible. He lives the poetry that he cannot write. The others write the poetry that they dare not realize.'

'I wonder is that really so, Harry?' said Dorian Gray, putting some perfume on his handkerchief out of a large gold-topped bottle that stood on the table. 'It must be, if you say it. And now I am off. Imogen is waiting for me. Don't forget about to-morrow. Good-bye.'

As he left the room, Lord Henry's heavy eyelids drooped, and he began to think. Certainly few people had ever interested him so much as Dorian Gray, and yet the lad's mad adoration of some one else caused him not the slightest pang of annoyance or jealousy. He was pleased by it. It made him a more interesting study. He had been always enthralled by the methods of natural science, but the ordinary subject-matter of that science had seemed to him trivial and of no import. And so he had begun by vivisection* himself, as he had ended by vivisection others. Human life—that appeared to him the one thing worth investigating. Compared to it there was nothing else of any value. It was true that as one watched life in its curious crucible of pain and pleasure, one could not wear over one's face a mask of glass, nor keep the sulphurous fumes from troubling the brain and making the imagination turbid with monstrous fancies and misshapen dreams. There were poisons so subtle that to know their properties one had to sicken of them. There were maladies so strange that one had to pass through them if one sought to understand their nature. And, yet, what a great reward one received! How wonderful the whole world became to one! To note the curious hard logic of passion, and the emotional coloured life of the intellect—to observe where they met, and where they separated, at what point they were in unison, and at what point they were at discord—there was a delight in that! What matter what the cost was? One could never pay too high a price for any sensation.

He was conscious—and the thought brought a gleam of pleasure into his brown agate eyes—that it was through certain words of his, musical words said with musical utterance, that Dorian Gray's soul had turned to this white girl and bowed in worship before her. To a large extent the lad was his own creation. He had made him premature. That was something. Ordinary people waited till life disclosed to them its secrets, but to the few, to the elect, the mysteries of life were revealed before the veil was drawn away. Sometimes this was the effect of art, and chiefly of the art of literature, which dealt immediately with the passions and the intellect. But now and then a complex personality took the place and assumed the office of art, was indeed, in its way, a real work of art, Life having its elaborate masterpieces, just as poetry has, or sculpture, or painting.

Yes, the lad was premature. He was gathering his harvest while it was yet spring. The pulse and passion of youth were in him, but he was becoming self-conscious. It was delightful to watch him. With his beautiful face, and his beautiful soul, he was a thing to wonder at. It was no matter how it all ended, or was destined to end. He was like one of those gracious figures in a pageant or a play, whose joys seem to be remote from one, but whose sorrows stir one's sense of beauty, and whose wounds are like red roses.

Soul and body, body and soul—how mysterious they were! There was animalism in the soul, and the body had its moments of spirituality. The senses could refine, and the intellect could degrade. Who could say where the fleshly impulse ceased, or the psychical impulse began? How shallow were the arbitrary definitions of ordinary psychologists!* And yet how difficult to decide between the claims of the various schools! Was the soul a shadow seated in the house of sin? Or was the body really in the soul, as Giordano Bruno* thought? The separation of spirit from matter was a mystery, and the union of spirit with matter was a mystery also.

He began to wonder whether we could ever make psychology so absolute a science that each little spring of life would be revealed to us. As it was, we always misunderstood ourselves, and rarely understood others. Experience was of no ethical value. It was merely the name men gave to their mistakes.* Moralists had, as a rule, regarded it as a mode of warning, had claimed for it a certain ethical efficacy in the formation of character, had praised it as something that taught us what to follow and showed us what to avoid. But there was no motive power in experience. It was as little of an active cause as conscience itself. All that it really demonstrated was that our future would be the same as our past, and that the sin we had done once, and with loathing, we would do many times, and with joy.

It was clear to him that the experimental method was the only method by which one could arrive at any scientific analysis of the passions; and certainly Dorian Gray was a subject made to his hand, and seemed to promise rich and fruitful results. His sudden mad love for Sibyl Vane was a psychological phenomenon of no small interest. There was no doubt that curiosity had much to do with it, curiosity and the desire for new experiences; yet it was not a simple but rather a very complex passion. What there was in it of the purely sensuous instinct of boyhood had been transformed by the workings of the imagination, changed into something that seemed to the lad himself to be remote from sense, and was for that very reason all the more dangerous. It was the passions about whose origin we deceived ourselves that tyrannized most strongly over us. Our weakest motives were those of whose nature we were conscious. It often happened that when we thought we were experimenting on others we were really experimenting on ourselves.

While Lord Henry sat dreaming on these things, a knock came to the door, and his valet entered, and reminded him it was time to dress for dinner. He got up and looked out into the street. The sunset had smitten into scarlet gold the upper windows of the houses opposite. The panes glowed like plates of heated metal. The sky above was like a faded rose. He thought of his friend's young fiery-coloured life, and wondered how it was all going to end.

When he arrived home, about half-past twelve o'clock, he saw a telegram lying on the hall table. He opened it, and found it was from Dorian Gray. It was to tell him that he was engaged to be married to Sibyl Vane.

CHAPTER V

'MOTHER, mother, I am so happy!' whispered the girl, burying her face in the lap of the faded, tired-looking woman who, with back turned to the shrill intrusive light, was sitting in the one arm-chair that their dingy sitting-room contained. 'I am so happy!' she repeated, 'and you must be happy too!'

Mrs. Vane winced, and put her thin bismuth-whitened* hands on her daughter's head. 'Happy!' she echoed, 'I am only happy, Sibyl, when I see you act. You must not think of anything but your acting. Mr. Isaacs has been very good to us, and we owe him money.'

The girl looked up and pouted. 'Money, mother?' she cried, 'what does money matter? Love is more than money.'

'Mr. Isaacs has advanced us fifty pounds to pay off our debts, and to get a proper outfit for James. You must not forget that, Sibyl. Fifty pounds is a very large sum. Mr. Isaacs has been most considerate.'

'He is not a gentleman, mother, and I hate the way he talks to me,' said the girl, rising to her feet, and going over to the window.

'I don't know how we could manage without him,' answered the elder woman, querulously.

Sibyl Vane tossed her head and laughed. 'We don't want him any more, mother. Prince Charming rules life for us now.' Then she paused. A rose shook in her blood, and shadowed her cheeks. Quick breath parted the petals of her lips. They trembled. Some southern wind of passion swept over her, and stirred the dainty folds of her dress. 'I love him,' she said, simply.

'Foolish child! foolish child!' was the parrot-phrase flung in answer. The waving of crooked, false-jewelled fingers gave grotesqueness to the words.

The girl laughed again. The joy of a caged bird was in her voice. Her eyes caught the melody, and echoed it in radiance: then closed for a moment, as though to hide their secret. When they opened, the mist of a dream had passed across them.

Thin-lipped wisdom spoke at her from the worn chair, hinted at prudence, quoted from that book of cowardice whose author apes the name of common sense. She did not listen. She was free in her prison of passion. Her prince, Prince Charming, was with her. She had called on Memory to remake him. She had sent her soul to search for him, and it had brought him back. His kiss burned again upon her mouth. Her eyelids were warm with his breath.

Then Wisdom altered its method and spoke of espial and discovery. This young man might be rich. If so, marriage should be thought of. Against the shell of her ear broke the waves of worldly cunning. The arrows of craft shot by her. She saw the thin lips moving, and smiled.

Suddenly she felt the need to speak. The wordy silence troubled her. 'Mother, mother,' she cried, 'why does he love me so much? I know why I love him. I love him because he is like what Love himself should be. But what does he see in me? I am not worthy of him. And yet—why, I cannot tell—though I feel so much beneath him, I don't feel humble. I feel proud, terribly proud. Mother, did you love my father as I love Prince Charming?'

The elder woman grew pale beneath the coarse powder that daubed her cheeks, and her dry lips twitched with a spasm of pain. Sybil rushed to her, flung her arms round her neck, and kissed her. 'Forgive me, mother. I know it pains you to talk about our father. But it only pains you because you loved him so much. Don't look so sad. I am as happy to-day as you were twenty years ago. Ah! let me be happy for ever!'

'My child, you are far too young to think of falling in love. Besides, what do you know of this young man? You don't even know his name. The whole thing is most inconvenient, and really, when James is going away to Australia, and I have so much to think of, I must say that you should have shown more consideration. However, as I said before, if he is rich . . .'

'Ah! mother, mother, let me be happy!'

Mrs. Vane glanced at her, and with one of those false theatrical gestures that so often become a mode of second nature to a stage-player, clasped her in her arms. At this moment the door opened, and a young lad with rough brown hair came into the room. He was thick-set of figure, and his hands and feet were large, and somewhat clumsy in movement. He was not so finely bred as his sister. One would hardly have guessed the close relationship that existed between them. Mrs. Vane fixed her eyes on him, and intensified her smile. She mentally elevated her son to the dignity of an audience. She felt sure that the tableau was interesting.

‘You might keep some of your kisses for me, Sibyl, I think,’ said the lad, with a good-natured grumble.

‘Ah! but you don’t like being kissed, Jim,’ she cried. ‘You are a dreadful old bear.’ And she ran across the room and hugged him.

James Vane looked into his sister’s face with tenderness. ‘I want you to come out with me for a walk, Sibyl. I don’t suppose I shall ever see this horrid London again. I am sure I don’t want to.’

‘My son, don’t say such dreadful things,’ murmured Mrs. Vane, taking up a tawdry theatrical dress, with a sigh, and beginning to patch it. She felt a little disappointed that he had not joined the group. It would have increased the theatrical picturesqueness of the situation.

‘Why not, mother? I mean it.’

‘You pain me, my son. I trust you will return from Australia in a position of affluence. I believe there is no society of any kind in the Colonies,* nothing that I would call society; so when you have made your fortune you must come back and assert yourself in London.’

‘Society!’ muttered the lad. ‘I don’t want to know anything about that. I should like to make some money to take you and Sibyl off the stage. I hate it.’

‘Oh, Jim!’ said Sibyl, laughing, ‘how unkind of you! But are you really going for a walk with me? That will be nice! I was afraid you were going to say good-bye to some of your friends—to Tom Hardy, who gave you that hideous pipe, or Ned Langton, who makes fun of you for smoking it. It is very sweet of you to let me have your last afternoon. Where shall we go? Let us go to the Park.’

‘I am too shabby,’ he answered, frowning. ‘Only swell people go to the Park.’

‘Nonsense, Jim,’ she whispered, stroking the sleeve of his coat.

He hesitated for a moment. ‘Very well,’ he said at last, ‘but don’t be too long dressing.’ She danced out of the door. One could hear her singing as she ran upstairs. Her little feet pattered overhead.

He walked up and down the room two or three times. Then he turned to the still figure in the chair. ‘Mother, are my things ready?’ he asked.

'Quite ready, James,' she answered, keeping her eyes on her work. For some months past she had felt ill at ease when she was alone with this rough, stern son of hers. Her shallow secret nature was troubled when their eyes met. She used to wonder if he suspected anything. The silence, for he made no other observation, became intolerable to her. She began to complain. Women defend themselves by attacking, just as they attack by sudden and strange surrenders. 'I hope you will be contented, James, with your sea-faring life,' she said. 'You must remember that it is your own choice. You might have entered a solicitor's office. Solicitors are a very respectable class, and in the country often dine with the best families.'

'I hate offices, and I hate clerks,' he replied. 'But you are quite right. I have chosen my own life. All I say is, watch over Sibyl. Don't let her come to any harm. Mother, you must watch over her.'

'James, you really talk very strangely. Of course I watch over Sibyl.'

'I hear a gentleman comes every night to the theatre, and goes behind to talk to her. Is that right? What about that?'

'You are speaking about things you don't understand, James. In the profession we are accustomed to receive a great deal of most gratifying attention. I myself used to receive many bouquets at one time. That was when acting was really understood. As for Sibyl, I do not know at present whether her attachment is serious or not. But there is no doubt that the young man in question is a perfect gentleman. He is always most polite to me. Besides, he has the appearance of being rich, and the flowers he sends are lovely.'

'You don't know his name, though,' said the lad, harshly.

'No,' answered his mother, with a placid expression in her face. 'He has not yet revealed his real name. I think it is quite romantic of him. He is probably a member of the aristocracy.'

James Vane bit his lip. 'Watch over Sibyl, mother,' he cried, 'watch over her.'

'My son, you distress me very much. Sibyl is always under my special care. Of course, if this gentleman is wealthy, there is no reason why she should not contract an alliance with him. I trust he is one of the aristocracy. He has all the appearance of it, I must say. It might be a most brilliant marriage for Sibyl. They would make a charming couple. His good looks are really quite remarkable; everybody notices them.'

The lad muttered something to himself, and drummed on the window-pane with his coarse fingers. He had just turned round to say something, when the door opened, and Sibyl ran in.

‘How serious you both are!’ she cried. ‘What is the matter?’

‘Nothing,’ he answered. ‘I suppose one must be serious sometimes. Good-bye, mother; I will have my dinner at five o’clock.* Everything is packed, except my shirts, so you need not trouble.’

‘Good-bye, my son,’ she answered, with a bow of strained stateliness.

She was extremely annoyed at the tone he had adopted with her, and there was something in his look that had made her feel afraid.

‘Kiss me, mother,’ said the girl. Her flower-like lips touched the withered cheek, and warmed its frost.

‘My child! my child!’ cried Mrs. Vane, looking up to the ceiling in search of an imaginary gallery.

‘Come, Sibyl,’ said her brother, impatiently. He hated his mother’s affectations.

They went out into the flickering wind-blown sunlight, and strolled down the dreary Euston Road.* The passers-by glanced in wonder at the sullen, heavy youth, who, in coarse, ill-fitting clothes, was in the company of such a graceful, refined-looking girl. He was like a common gardener walking with a rose.

Jim frowned from time to time when he caught the inquisitive glance of some stranger. He had that dislike of being stared at which comes on geniuses late in life, and never leaves the commonplace. Sibyl, however, was quite unconscious of the effect she was producing. Her love was trembling in laughter on her lips. She was thinking of Prince Charming, and, that she might think of him all the more, she did not talk of him, but prattled on about the ship in which Jim was going to sail, about the gold he was certain to find, about the wonderful heiress whose life he was to save from the wicked, red-shirted bushrangers. For he was not to remain a sailor, or a super-cargo,* or whatever he was going to be. Oh, no! A sailor’s existence was dreadful. Fancy being cooped up in a horrid ship, with the hoarse, hump-backed waves trying to get in, and a black wind blowing the masts down, and tearing the sails into long screaming ribands! He was to leave the vessel at Melbourne, bid a polite good-bye to the captain, and go off at once to the gold-fields. Before a week was over he was to come across a large nugget of pure gold, the largest nugget that had ever been discovered, and bring it down to the coast in a waggon guarded by six mounted policemen. The bush-rangers were to attack them three times, and be defeated with immense slaughter. Or no. He was not to go to the gold-fields at all. They were horrid places, where men got intoxicated, and shot each other in bar-rooms, and used bad language. He was to be a nice sheep-farmer, and one evening, as he was riding home, he was to see the beautiful heiress being carried off by a robber on a black horse, and give chase, and rescue her. Of course she would fall in love with him, and he with her, and they would get married, and come home, and live in an immense house in London. Yes, there were delightful things in store for him. But he must be very good, and not lose his temper, or spend his money foolishly. She was only a year older than he was, but she knew so much more of life. He must be sure, also, to write to her by every mail, and to say his prayers each night before he went to sleep. God was very good, and would watch over him. She would pray for him too, and in a few years he would come back quite rich and happy.

The lad listened sulkily to her, and made no answer. He was heart-sick at leaving home.

Yet it was not this alone that made him gloomy and morose. Inexperienced though he was, he had still a strong sense of the danger of Sibyl's position. This young dandy who was making love to her could mean her no good. He was a gentleman, and he hated him for that, hated him through some curious race-instinct for which he could not account, and which for that reason was all the more dominant within him. He was conscious also of the shallowness and vanity of his mother's nature, and in that saw infinite peril for Sibyl and Sibyl's happiness. Children begin by loving their parents; as they grow older they judge them; sometimes they forgive them.*

His mother! He had something on his mind to ask of her, something that he had brooded on for many months of silence. A chance phrase that he had heard at the theatre, a whispered sneer that had reached his ears one night as he waited at the stage-door, had set loose a train of horrible thoughts. He remembered it as if it had been the lash of a hunting-crop across his face. His brows knit together into a wedge-like furrow, and with a twitch of pain he bit his underlip.

'You are not listening to a word I am saying, Jim,' cried Sibyl, 'and I am making the most delightful plans for your future. Do say something.'

'What do you want me to say?'

'Oh! that you will be a good boy, and not forget us,' she answered, smiling at him.

He shrugged his shoulders. 'You are more likely to forget me, than I am to forget you, Sibyl.'

She flushed. 'What do you mean, Jim?' she asked.

'You have a new friend, I hear. Who is he? Why have you not told me about him? He means you no good.'

'Stop, Jim!' she exclaimed. 'You must not say anything against him. I love him.'

'Why, you don't even know his name,' answered the lad. 'Who is he? I have a right to know.'

'He is called Prince Charming. Don't you like the name. Oh! you silly boy! you should never forget it. If you only saw him, you would think him the most wonderful person in the world. Some day you will meet him: when you come back from Australia. You will like him so much. Everybody likes him, and I . . . love him. I wish you could come to the theatre to-night. He is going to be there, and I am to play Juliet. Oh! how I shall play it! Fancy, Jim, to be in love and play Juliet! To have him sitting there! To play for his delight! I am afraid I may frighten the company, frighten or enthrall them. To be in love is to surpass one's self. Poor dreadful Mr. Isaacs will be shouting "genius" to his loafers at the bar. He has preached me as a dogma; to-night he will announce me as a revelation. I feel it. And it is all his, his only, Prince Charming, my wonderful lover, my god of graces. But I am poor beside him. Poor? What does that matter? When poverty creeps in at the door, love flies in through the window.* Our proverbs want re-writing. They were made in winter, and it is summer now; spring-time for me, I think, a very dance of blossoms in blue skies.'

'He is a gentleman,' said the lad, sullenly.

'A Prince!' she cried, musically. 'What more do you want?'

'He wants to enslave you.'

'I shudder at the thought of being free.'

'I want you to beware of him.'

'To see him is to worship him, to know him is to trust him.'

'Sibyl, you are mad about him.'

She laughed, and took his arm. 'You dear old Jim, you talk as if you were a hundred. Some day you will be in love yourself. Then you will know what it is. Don't look so sulky. Surely you should be glad to think that, though you are going away, you leave me happier than I have ever been before. Life has been hard for us both, terribly hard and difficult. But it will be different now. You are going to a new world, and I have found one. Here are two chairs; let us sit down and see the smart people go by.'

They took their seats amidst a crowd of watchers. The tulip-beds across the road flamed like throbbing rings of fire. A white dust, tremulous cloud of orris-root* it seemed, hung in the panting air. The brightly-coloured parasols danced and dipped like monstrous butterflies.

She made her brother talk of himself, his hopes, his prospects. He spoke slowly and with effort. They passed words to each other as players at a game pass counters. Sibyl felt oppressed. She could not communicate her joy. A faint smile curving that sullen mouth was all the echo she could win. After some time she became silent. Suddenly she caught a glimpse of golden hair and laughing lips, and in an open carriage with two ladies Dorian Gray drove past.

She started to her feet. 'There he is!' she cried.

'Who?' said Jim Vane.

'Prince Charming,' she answered, looking after the victoria.*

He jumped up, and seized her roughly by the arm, 'Show him to me. Which is he? Point him out. I must see him!' he exclaimed; but at that moment the Duke of Berwick's four-in-hand* came between, and when it had left the space clear, the carriage had swept out of the Park.

'He is gone,' murmured Sibyl, sadly. 'I wish you had seen him.'

'I wish I had, for as sure as there is a God in heaven, if he ever does you any wrong, I shall kill him.'

She looked at him in horror. He repeated his words. They cut the air like a dagger. The people round began to gape. A lady standing close to her tittered.

'Come away, Jim; come away,' she whispered. He followed her doggedly, as she passed through the crowd. He felt glad at what he had said.

When they reached the Achilles Statue* she turned round. There was pity in her eyes that became laughter on her lips. She shook her head at him. 'You are foolish, Jim, utterly foolish; a bad-tempered boy, that is all. How can you say such horrible things? You don't know what you are talking about. You are simply jealous and unkind. Ah! I wish you would fall in love. Love makes people good, and what you said was wicked.'

'I am sixteen,' he answered, 'and I know what I am about. Mother is no help to you. She doesn't understand how to look after you. I wish now that I was not going to Australia at all. I have a great mind to chuck the whole thing up. I would, if my articles hadn't been signed.'

'Oh, don't be so serious, Jim. You are like one of the heroes of those silly melodramas mother used to be so fond of acting in. I am not going to quarrel with you. I have seen him, and oh! to see him is perfect happiness. We won't quarrel. I know you would never harm any one I love, would you?'

'Not as long as you love him, I suppose,' was the sullen answer.

'I shall love him for ever!' she cried.

'And he?'

'For ever, too!'

'He had better.'

She shrank from him. Then she laughed and put her hand on his arm. He was merely a boy.

At the Marble Arch* they hailed an omnibus,* which left them close to their shabby home in the Euston Road. It was after five o'clock, and Sibyl had to lie down for a couple of hours before acting. Jim insisted that she should do so. He said that he would sooner part with her when their mother was not present. She would be sure to make a scene, and he detested scenes of every kind.

In Sybil's own room they parted. There was jealousy in the lad's heart, and a fierce, murderous hatred of the stranger who, as it seemed to him, had come between them. Yet, when her arms were flung round his neck, and her fingers strayed through his hair, he softened, and kissed her with real affection. There were tears in his eyes as he went downstairs.

His mother was waiting for him below. She grumbled at his unpunctuality, as he entered. He made no answer, but sat down to his meagre meal. The flies buzzed round the table, and crawled over the stained cloth. Through the rumble of omnibuses, and the clatter of street-cabs, he could hear the droning voice devouring each minute that was left to him.

After some time, he thrust away his plate, and put his head in his hands. He felt that he had a right to know. It should have been told to him before, if it was as he suspected. Leaden with fear, his mother watched him. Words dropped mechanically from her lips. A tattered lace handkerchief twitched in her fingers. When the clock struck six, he got up, and went to the door. Then he turned back, and looked at her. Their eyes met. In hers he saw a wild appeal for mercy. It enraged him.

‘Mother, I have something to ask you,’ he said. Her eyes wandered vaguely about the room. She made no answer. ‘Tell me the truth. I have a right to know. Were you married to my father?’

She heaved a deep sigh. It was a sigh of relief. The terrible moment, the moment that night and day, for weeks and months, she had dreaded, had come at last, and yet she felt no terror. Indeed in some measure it was a disappointment to her. The vulgar directness of the question called for a direct answer. The situation had not been gradually led up to. It was crude. It reminded her of a bad rehearsal.

‘No,’ she answered, wondering at the harsh simplicity of life.

‘My father was a scoundrel then!’ cried the lad, clenching his fists.

She shook her head. ‘I knew he was not free. We loved each other very much. If he had lived, he would have made provision for us. Don’t speak against him, my son. He was your father, and a gentleman. Indeed he was highly connected.’

An oath broke from his lips. ‘I don’t care for myself,’ he exclaimed, ‘but don’t let Sibyl . . . It is a gentleman, isn’t it, who is in love with her, or says he is? Highly connected, too, I suppose.’

For a moment a hideous sense of humiliation came over the woman. Her head drooped. She wiped her eyes with shaking hands. ‘Sibyl has a mother,’ she murmured; ‘I had none.’

The lad was touched. He went towards her, and stooping down he kissed her. ‘I am sorry if I have pained you by asking about my father,’ he said, ‘but I could not help it. I must go now. Good-bye. Don’t forget that you will have only one child now to look after, and believe me that if this man wrongs my sister, I will find out who he is, track him down, and kill him like a dog. I swear it.’

The exaggerated folly of the threat, the passionate gesture that accompanied it, the mad melodramatic words, made life seem more vivid to her. She was familiar with the atmosphere. She breathed more freely, and for the first time for many months she really admired her son. She would have liked to have continued the scene on the same emotional scale, but he cut her short. Trunks had to be carried down, and mufflers* looked for. The lodging-house drudge bustled in and out. There was the bargaining with the cabman. The moment was lost in vulgar details. It was with a renewed feeling of disappointment that she waved the tattered lace handkerchief from the window, as her son drove away. She was conscious that a great opportunity had been wasted. She consoled herself by telling Sibyl how desolate she felt her life would be, now that she had only one child to look after. She remembered the phrase. It had pleased her. Of the threat she said nothing. It was vividly and dramatically expressed. She felt that they would all laugh at it some day.

CHAPTER VI

‘I SUPPOSE you have heard the news, Basil?’ said Lord Henry that evening, as Hallward was shown into a little private room at the Bristol where dinner had been laid for three.

‘No, Harry,’ answered the artist, giving his hat and coat to the bowing waiter. ‘What is it? Nothing about politics, I hope? They don’t interest me. There is hardly a single person in the House of Commons worth painting; though many of them would be the better for a little whitewashing.’

‘Dorian Gray is engaged to be married,’ said Lord Henry, watching him as he spoke.

Hallward started, and then frowned. ‘Dorian engaged to be married!’ he cried. ‘Impossible!’

‘It is perfectly true.’

‘To whom?’

‘To some little actress or other.’

‘I can’t believe it. Dorian is far too sensible.’

‘Dorian is far too wise not to do foolish things now and then, my dear Basil.’

‘Marriage is hardly a thing that one can do now and then, Harry.’

‘Except in America,’ rejoined Lord Henry, languidly. ‘But I didn’t say he was married. I said he was engaged to be married. There is a great difference. I have a distinct remembrance of being married, but I have no recollection at all of being engaged. I am inclined to think that I never was engaged.’

‘But think of Dorian’s birth, and position, and wealth. It would be absurd for him to marry so much beneath him.’

‘If you want to make him marry this girl tell him that, Basil. He is sure to do it, then. Whenever a man does a thoroughly stupid thing, it is always from the noblest motives.’

‘I hope the girl is good, Harry. I don’t want to see Dorian tied to some vile creature, who might degrade his nature and ruin his intellect.’

‘Oh, she is better than good—she is beautiful,’ murmured Lord Henry, sipping a glass of vermouth and orange-bitters. ‘Dorian says she is beautiful; and he is not often wrong about things of that kind. Your portrait of him has quickened his appreciation of the personal appearance of other people. It has had that excellent effect, amongst others. We are to see her to-night, if that boy doesn’t forget his appointment.’

‘Are you serious?’

‘Quite serious, Basil. I should be miserable if I thought I should ever be more serious than I am at the present moment.’

‘But do you approve of it, Harry?’ asked the painter, walking up and down the room, and biting his lip. ‘You can’t approve of it, possibly. It is some silly infatuation.’

‘I never approve, or disapprove, of anything now. It is an absurd attitude to take towards life. We are not sent into the world to air our moral prejudices. I never take any notice of what common people say, and I never interfere with what charming people do. If a personality fascinates me, whatever mode of expression that personality selects is absolutely delightful to me. Dorian Gray falls in love with a beautiful girl who acts Juliet, and proposes to marry her. Why not? If he wedded Messalina* he would be none the less interesting. You know I am not a champion of marriage. The real drawback to marriage is that it makes one unselfish. And unselfish people are colourless. They lack individuality. Still, there are certain temperaments that marriage makes more complex. They retain their egotism, and add to it many other egos. They are forced to have more than one life. They become more highly organized, and to be highly organized is, I should fancy, the object of man’s existence. Besides, every experience is of value, and, whatever one may say against marriage, it is certainly an experience. I hope that Dorian Gray will make this girl his wife, passionately adore her for six months, and then suddenly become fascinated by some one else. He would be a wonderful study.'

'You don't mean a single word of all that, Harry; you know you don't. If Dorian Gray's life were spoiled, no one would be sorer than yourself. You are much better than you pretend to be.'

Lord Henry laughed. 'The reason we all like to think so well of others is that we are all afraid for ourselves. The basis of optimism is sheer terror. We think that we are generous because we credit our neighbour with the possession of those virtues that are likely to be a benefit to us. We praise the banker that we may overdraw our account, and find good qualities in the highwayman in the hope that he may spare our pockets. I mean everything that I have said. I have the greatest contempt for optimism. As for a spoiled life, no life is spoiled but one whose growth is arrested. If you want to mar a nature, you have merely to reform it. As for marriage, of course that would be silly, but there are other and more interesting bonds between men and women. I will certainly encourage them. They have the charm of being fashionable. But here is Dorian himself. He will tell you more than I can.'

'My dear Harry, my dear Basil, you must both congratulate me!' said the lad, throwing off his evening cape with its satin-lined wings, and shaking each of his friends by the hand in turn. 'I have never been so happy. Of course it is sudden: all really delightful things are. And yet it seems to me to be the one thing I have been looking for all my life.' He was flushed with excitement and pleasure, and looked extraordinarily handsome.

'I hope you will always be very happy, Dorian,' said Hallward, 'but I don't quite forgive you for not having let me know of your engagement. You let Harry know.'

'And I don't forgive you for being late for dinner,' broke in Lord Henry, putting his hand on the lad's shoulder, and smiling as he spoke. 'Come, let us sit down and try what the new chef here is like, and then you will tell us how it all came about.'

'There is really not much to tell,' cried Dorian, as they took their seats at the small round table. 'What happened was simply this. After I left you yesterday evening, Harry, I dressed, had some dinner at that little Italian restaurant in Rupert Street, you introduced me to, and went down at eight o'clock to the theatre. Sibyl was playing Rosalind. Of course the scenery was dreadful, and the Orlando* absurd. But Sibyl! You should have seen her! When she came on in her boy's clothes she was perfectly wonderful. She wore a moss-coloured velvet jerkin with cinnamon sleeves, slim brown cross-gartered hose, a dainty little green cap with a hawk's feather caught in a jewel, and a hooded cloak lined with dull red. She had never seemed to me more exquisite. She had all the delicate grace of that Tanagra figurine* that you have in your studio, Basil. Her hair clustered round her face like dark leaves round a pale rose. As for her acting—well, you shall see her to-night. She is simply a born artist. I sat in the dingy box absolutely enthralled. I forgot that I was in London and in the nineteenth century. I was away with my love in a forest that no man had ever seen. After the performance was over I went behind, and spoke to her. As we were sitting together, suddenly there came into her eyes a look that I had never seen there before. My lips moved towards hers. We kissed each other. I can't describe to you what I felt at that moment. It seemed to me that all my life had been narrowed to one perfect point of rose-coloured joy. She trembled all over, and shook like a white narcissus. Then she flung herself on her knees and kissed my hands. I feel that I should not tell you all this, but I can't help it. Of course our engagement is a dead secret. She has not even told her own mother. I don't know what my guardians will say. Lord Radley* is sure to be furious. I don't care. I shall be of age in less than a year, and then I can do what I like. I have been right, Basil, haven't I, to take my love out of poetry, and to find my wife in Shakespeare's plays? Lips that Shakespeare taught to speak have whispered their secret in my ear. I have had the arms of Rosalind around me, and kissed Juliet on the mouth.'

'Yes, Dorian, I suppose you were right,' said Hallward, slowly.

'Have you seen her to-day?' asked Lord Henry.

Dorian Gray shook his head. 'I left her in the forest of Arden, I shall find her in an orchard in Verona.'

Lord Henry sipped his champagne in a meditative manner. 'At what particular point did you mention the word marriage, Dorian? And what did she say in answer? Perhaps you forgot all about it.'

'My dear Harry, I did not treat it as a business transaction, and I did not make any formal proposal. I told her that I loved her, and she said she was not worthy to be my wife. Not worthy! Why, the whole world is nothing to me compared with her.'

'Women are wonderfully practical,' murmured Lord Henry,—

‘much more practical than we are. In situations of that kind, we often forget to say anything about marriage, and they always remind us.’

Hallward laid his hand upon his arm. ‘Don’t Harry. You have annoyed Dorian. He is not like other men. He would never bring misery upon any one. His nature is too fine for that.’

Lord Henry looked across the table. ‘Dorian is never annoyed with me,’ he answered. ‘I asked the question for the best reason possible, for the only reason, indeed, that excuses one for asking any question—simple curiosity. I have a theory that it is always the women who propose to us, and not we who propose to the women. Except, of course, in middle-class life. But then the middle classes are not modern.’

Dorian Gray laughed, and tossed his head. ‘You are quite incorrigible, Harry; but I don’t mind. It is impossible to be angry with you. When you see Sibyl Vane you will feel that the man who could wrong her would be a beast, a beast without a heart. I cannot understand how any one can wish to shame the thing he loves. I love Sibyl Vane. I want to place her on a pedestal of gold, and to see the world worship the woman who is mine. What is marriage? An irrevocable vow. You mock at it for that. Ah! don’t mock. It is an irrevocable vow that I want to take. Her trust makes me faithful, her belief makes me good. When I am with her, I regret all that you have taught me. I become different from what you have known me to be. I am changed, and the mere touch of Sibyl Vane’s hand makes me forget you and all your wrong, fascinating, poisonous, delightful theories.’*

‘And those are . . .?’ asked Lord Henry, helping himself to some salad.

‘Oh, your theories about life, your theories about love, your theories about pleasure. All your theories, in fact, Harry.’

‘Pleasure is the only thing worth having a theory about;’ he answered, in his slow, melodious voice. ‘But I am afraid I cannot claim my theory as my own. It belongs to Nature, not to me. Pleasure is Nature’s test, her sign of approval. When we are happy we are always good, but when we are good we are not always happy.’

‘Ah, but what do you mean by good?’ cried Basil Hallward.

‘Yes,’ echoed Dorian, leaning back in his chair, and looking at Lord Henry over the heavy clusters of purple-lipped irises that stood in the centre of the table, ‘what do you mean by good, Harry?’

‘To be good is to be in harmony with one’s self,’ he replied, touching the thin stem of his glass with his pale, fine-pointed fingers. 'Discord is to be forced to be in harmony with others. One's own life—that is the important thing. As for the lives of one's neighbours, if one wishes to be a prig or a Puritan, one can flaunt one's moral views about them, but they are not one's concern. Besides, Individualism* has really the higher aim. Modern morality consists in accepting the standard of one's age. I consider that for any man of culture to accept the standard of his age is a form of the grossest immorality.'

'But, surely, if one lives merely for one's self, Harry, one pays a terrible price for doing so?' suggested the painter.

'Yes, we are overcharged for everything nowadays. I should fancy that the real tragedy of the poor is that they can afford nothing but self-denial. Beautiful sins, like beautiful things, are the privilege of the rich.'

'One has to pay in other ways but money.'

'What sort of ways, Basil?'

'Oh! I should fancy in remorse, in suffering, in . . . well, in the consciousness of degradation.'

Lord Henry shrugged his shoulders. 'My dear fellow, mediæval art is charming, but mediæval emotions are out of date. One can use them in fiction, of course. But then the only things that one can use in fiction are the things that one has ceased to use in fact. Believe me, no civilized man ever regrets a pleasure, and no uncivilized man ever knows what a pleasure is.'

'I know what pleasure is,' cried Dorian Gray. 'It is to adore some one.'

'That is certainly better than being adored,' he answered, toying with some fruits. 'Being adored is a nuisance. Women treat us just as Humanity treats its gods. They worship us, and are always bothering us to do something for them.'

'I should have said that whatever they ask for they had first given to us,' murmured the lad, gravely. 'They create Love in our natures. They have a right to demand it back.'

'That is quite true, Dorian,' cried Hallward.

'Nothing is ever quite true,' said Lord Henry.

'This is,' interrupted Dorian. 'You must admit, Harry, that women give to men the very gold of their lives.'

'Possibly,' he sighed, 'but they invariably want it back in such very small change. That is the worry. Women, as some witty Frenchman once put it, inspire us with the desire to do masterpieces, and always prevent us from carrying them out.'

'Harry, you are dreadful! I don't know why I like you so much.'

'You will always like me, Dorian,' he replied. 'Will you have some coffee, you fellows?—Waiter, bring coffee, and fine-champagne,* and some cigarettes. No: don't mind the cigarettes; I have some. Basil, I can't allow you to smoke cigars. You must have a cigarette. A cigarette is the perfect type of a perfect pleasure. It is exquisite, and it leaves one unsatisfied. What more can one want? Yes, Dorian, you will always be fond of me. I represent to you all the sins you have never had the courage to commit.'

'What nonsense you talk, Harry!' cried the lad, taking a light from a fire-breathing silver dragon* that the waiter had placed on the table. 'Let us go down to the theatre. When Sibyl comes on the stage you will have a new ideal of life. She will represent something to you that you have never known.'

'I have known everything,' said Lord Henry, with a tired look in his eyes, 'but I am always ready for a new emotion. I am afraid, however, that, for me at any rate, there is no such thing. Still, your wonderful girl may thrill me. I love acting. It is so much more real than life. Let us go. Dorian, you will come with me. I am so sorry, Basil, but there is only room for two in the brougham.* You must follow us in a hansom.'

They got up and put on their coats, sipping their coffee standing. The painter was silent and pre-occupied. There was a gloom over him. He could not bear this marriage, and yet it seemed to him to be better than many other things that might have happened. After a few minutes, they all passed downstairs. He drove off by himself, as had been arranged, and watched the flashing lights of the little brougham in front of him. A strange sense of loss came over him. He felt that Dorian Gray would never again be to him all that he had been in the past. Life had come between them. . . . His eyes darkened, and the crowded, flaring streets became blurred to his eyes. When the cab drew up at the theatre, it seemed to him that he had grown years older.

CHAPTER VII

FOR some reason or other, the house was crowded that night, and the fat Jew manager who met them at the door was beaming from ear to ear with an oily, tremulous smile. He escorted them to their box with a sort of pompous humility, waving his fat jewelled hands, and talking at the top of his voice. Dorian Gray loathed him more than ever. He felt as if he had come to look for Miranda and had been met by Caliban.* Lord Henry, upon the other hand, rather liked him. At least he declared he did, and insisted on shaking him by the hand, and assuring him that he was proud to meet a man who had discovered a real genius and gone bankrupt over a poet. Hallward amused himself with watching the faces in the pit. The heat was terribly oppressive, and the huge sunlight flamed like a monstrous dahlia with petals of yellow fire. The youths in the gallery had taken off their coats and waistcoats and hung them over the side. They talked to each other across the theatre, and shared their oranges with the tawdry girls who sat beside them. Some women were laughing in the pit. Their voices were horribly shrill and discordant. The sound of the popping of corks came from the bar.

‘What a place to find one’s divinity in!’ said Lord Henry.

‘Yes!’ answered Dorian Gray. ‘It was here I found her, and she is divine beyond all living things. When she acts you will forget everything. These common, rough people, with their coarse faces and brutal gestures, become quite different when she is on the stage. They sit silently and watch her. They weep and laugh as she wills them to do. She makes them as responsive as a violin. She spiritualizes them, and one feels that they are of the same flesh and blood as one’s self.’

‘The same flesh and blood as one’s self! Oh, I hope not!’ exclaimed Lord Henry, who was scanning the occupants of the gallery through his opera-glass.

‘Don’t pay any attention to him, Dorian,’ said the painter. ‘I understand what you mean, and I believe in this girl. Any one you love must be marvellous, and any girl that has the effect you describe must be fine and noble. To spiritualize one’s age—that is something worth doing. If this girl can give a soul to those who have lived without one, if she can create the sense of beauty in people whose lives have been sordid and ugly, if she can strip them of their selfishness and lend them tears for sorrows that are not their own, she is worthy of all your adoration, worthy of the adoration of the world. This marriage is quite right. I did not think so at first, but I admit it now. The gods made Sibyl Vane for you. Without her you would have been incomplete.'

'Thanks, Basil,' answered Dorian Gray, pressing his hand. 'I knew that you would understand me. Harry is so cynical, he terrifies me. But here is the orchestra. It is quite dreadful, but it only lasts for about five minutes. Then the curtain rises, and you will see the girl to whom I am going to give all my life, to whom I have given everything that is good in me.'

A quarter of an hour afterwards, amidst an extraordinary turmoil of applause, Sibyl Vane stepped on to the stage. Yes, she was certainly lovely to look at—one of the loveliest creatures, Lord Henry thought, that he had ever seen. There was something of the fawn in her shy grace and startled eyes. A faint blush, like the shadow of a rose in a mirror of silver, came to her cheeks as she glanced at the crowded, enthusiastic house. She stepped back a few paces, and her lips seemed to tremble. Basil Hallward leaped to his feet and began to applaud. Motionless, and as one in a dream, sat Dorian Gray, gazing at her. Lord Henry peered through his glasses,* murmuring, 'Charming! charming!'

The scene was the hall of Capulet's house, and Romeo in his pilgrim's dress had entered with Mercutio and his other friends. The band, such as it was, struck up a few bars of music, and the dance began. Through the crowd of ungainly, shabbily-dressed actors, Sibyl Vane moved like a creature from a finer world. Her body swayed, while she danced, as a plant sways in the water. The curves of her throat were the curves of a white lily. Her hands seemed to be made of cool ivory.

Yet she was curiously listless. She showed no sign of joy when her eyes rested on Romeo. The few words she had to speak—

*Good pilgrim, you do wrong your hand too much,
Which mannerly devotion shows in this;
For Saints have hands that pilgrims' hands do touch,
And palm to palm is holy palmers' kiss*—*

with the brief dialogue that follows, were spoken in a thoroughly artificial manner. The voice was exquisite, but from the point of view of tone it was absolutely false. It was wrong in colour. It took away all the life from the verse. It made the passion unreal.

Dorian Gray grew pale as he watched her. He was puzzled and anxious. Neither of his friends dared to say anything to him. She seemed to them to be absolutely incompetent. They were horribly disappointed.

Yet they felt that the true test of any Juliet is the balcony scene of the second act. They waited for that. If she failed there, there was nothing in her.

She looked charming as she came out in the moonlight. That could not be denied. But the staginess of her acting was unbearable, and grew worse as she went on. Her gestures became absurdly artificial. She over-emphasized everything that she had to say. The beautiful passage—

*Thou knowest the mask of night is on my face,
Else would a maiden blush bepaint my cheek
For that which thou hast heard me speak to-night*—* was declaimed with the painful precision of a school-girl who has been taught to recite by some second-rate professor of elocution. When she leaned over the balcony and came to those wonderful lines—

*Although I joy in thee,
I have no joy of this contract to-night:
It is too rash, too unadvised, too sudden;
Too like the lightning, which doth cease to be Ere one can say, 'It lightens.' Sweet, good-night!
This bud of love by summer's ripening breath
May prove a beauteous flower when next we meet*—*

she spoke the words as though they conveyed no meaning to her. It was not nervousness. Indeed, so far from being nervous, she was absolutely self-contained. It was simply bad art. She was a complete failure.

Even the common, uneducated audience of the pit and gallery lost their interest in the play. They got restless, and began to talk loudly and to whistle. The Jew manager, who was standing at the back of the dress-circle, stamped and swore with rage. The only person unmoved was the girl herself.

When the second act was over there came a storm of hisses, and Lord Henry got up from his chair and put on his coat. 'She is quite beautiful, Dorian,' he said, 'but she can't act. Let us go.'

'I am going to see the play through,' answered the lad, in a hard, bitter voice. 'I am awfully sorry that I have made you waste an evening, Harry. I apologize to you both.'

'My dear Dorian, I should think Miss Vane was ill,' interrupted Hallward. 'We will come some other night.'

'I wish she were ill,' he rejoined. 'But she seems to me to be simply callous and cold. She has entirely altered. Last night she was a great artist. This evening she is merely a common-place, mediocre actress.'

'Don't talk like that about any one you love, Dorian. Love is a more wonderful thing than Art.'

'They are both simply forms of imitation,' remarked Lord Henry. 'But do let us go. Dorian, you must not stay here any longer. It is not good for one's morals to see bad acting. Besides, I don't suppose you will want your wife to act. So what does it matter if she plays Juliet like a wooden doll? She is very lovely, and if she knows as little about life as she does about acting, she will be a delightful experience. There are only two kinds of people who are really fascinating—people who know absolutely everything, and people who know absolutely nothing. Good heavens, my dear boy, don't look so tragic! The secret of remaining young is never to have an emotion that is unbecoming.* Come to the club with Basil and myself. We will smoke cigarettes and drink to the beauty of Sibyl Vane. She is beautiful. What more can you want?'

'Go away, Harry,' cried the lad. 'I want to be alone. Basil, you must go. Ah! can't you see that my heart is breaking?' The hot tears came to his eyes. His lips trembled, and, rushing to the back of the box, he leaned up against the wall, hiding his face in his hands.

'Let us go, Basil,' said Lord Henry, with a strange tenderness in his voice; and the two young men passed out together.

A few moments afterwards the footlights flared up, and the curtain rose on the third act. Dorian Gray went back to his seat. He looked pale, and proud, and indifferent. The play dragged on, and seemed interminable. Half of the audience went out, tramping in heavy boots, and laughing. The whole thing was a fiasco. The last act was played to almost empty benches. The curtain went down on a titter, and some groans.

As soon as it was over, Dorian Gray rushed behind the scenes into the greenroom. The girl was standing there alone, with a look of triumph on her face. Her eyes were lit with an exquisite fire. There was a radiance about her. Her parted lips were smiling over some secret of their own.

When he entered, she looked at him, and an expression of infinite joy came over her. 'How badly I acted to-night, Dorian!' she cried.

'Horribly!' he answered, gazing at her in amazement—'horribly! It was dreadful. Are you ill? You have no idea what it was. You have no idea what I suffered.'

The girl smiled. 'Dorian,' she answered, lingering over his name with long-drawn music in her voice, as though it were sweeter than honey to the red petals of her mouth—'Dorian, you should have understood. But you understand now, don't you?'

'Understand what?' he asked, angrily.

'Why I was so bad to-night. Why I shall always be bad. Why I shall never act well again.'

He shrugged his shoulders. 'You are ill, I suppose. When you are ill you shouldn't act. You make yourself ridiculous. My friends were bored. I was bored.'

She seemed not to listen to him. She was transfigured with joy. An ecstasy of happiness dominated her.

'Dorian, Dorian,' she cried, 'before I knew you, acting was the one reality of my life. It was only in the theatre that I lived. I thought that it was all true. I was Rosalind one night, and Portia the other. The joy of Beatrice was my joy, and the sorrows of Cordelia* were mine also. I believed in everything. The common people who acted with me seemed to me to be godlike. The painted scenes were my world. I knew nothing but shadows,* and I thought them real. You came—oh, my beautiful love!—and you freed my soul from prison. You taught me what reality really is. To-night, for the first time in my life, I saw through the hollowness, the sham, the silliness of the empty pageant in which I had always played. To-night, for the first time, I became conscious that the Romeo was hideous, and old, and painted, that the moonlight in the orchard was false, that the scenery was vulgar, and that the words I had to speak were unreal, were not my words, were not what I wanted to say. You had brought me something higher, something of which all art is but a reflection. You had made me understand what love really is. My love! my love! Prince Charming! Prince of life! I have grown sick of shadows. You are more to me than all art can ever be. What have I to do with the puppets of a play? When I came on to-night, I could not understand how it was that everything had gone from me. I thought that I was going to be wonderful. I found that I could do nothing. Suddenly it dawned on my soul what it all meant. The knowledge was exquisite to me. I heard them hissing, and I smiled. What could they know of love such as ours? Take me away, Dorian—take me away with you, where we can be quite alone. I hate the stage. I might mimic a passion that I do not feel, but I cannot mimic one that burns me like fire. Oh, Dorian, Dorian, you understand now what it signifies? Even if I could do it, it would be profanation for me to play at being in love. You have made me see that.'

He flung himself down on the sofa, and turned away his face. 'You have killed my love,' he muttered.

She looked at him in wonder, and laughed. He made no answer. She came across to him, and with her little fingers stroked his hair. She knelt down and pressed his hands to her lips. He drew them away, and a shudder ran through him.

Then he leaped up, and went to the door. 'Yes,' he cried, 'you have killed my love. You used to stir my imagination. Now you don't even stir my curiosity. You simply produce no effect. I loved you because you were marvellous, because you had genius and intellect, because you realized the dreams of great poets and gave shape and substance to the shadows of art. You have thrown it all away. You are shallow and stupid. My God! how mad I was to love you! What a fool I have been! You are nothing to me now. I will never see you again. I will never think of you. I will never mention your name. You don't know what you were to me, once. Why, once . . . Oh, I can't bear to think of it! I wish I had never laid eyes upon you! You have spoiled the romance of my life. How little you can know of love, if you say it mars your art! Without your art you are nothing. I would have made you famous, splendid, magnificent. The world would have worshipped you, and you would have borne my name. What are you now? A third-rate actress with a pretty face.'

The girl grew white, and trembled. She clenched her hands together, and her voice seemed to catch in her throat. 'You are not serious, Dorian?' she murmured. 'You are acting.'

'Acting! I leave that to you. You do it so well,' he answered, bitterly.

She rose from her knees, and, with a piteous expression of pain in her face, came across the room to him. She put her hand upon his arm, and looked into his eyes. He thrust her back. 'Don't touch me!' he cried.

A low moan broke from her, and she flung herself at his feet, and lay there like a trampled flower. 'Dorian, Dorian, don't leave me!' she whispered. 'I am so sorry I didn't act well. I was thinking of you all the time. But I will try—indeed, I will try. It came so suddenly across me, my love for you. I think I should never have known it if you had not kissed me—if we had not kissed each other. Kiss me again, my love. Don't go away from me. I couldn't bear it. Oh! don't go away from me. My brother. . . . No; never mind. He didn't mean it. He was in jest. . . . But you, oh! can't you forgive me for to-night? I will work so hard, and try to improve. Don't be cruel to me because I love you better than anything in the world. After all, it is only once that I have not pleased you. But you are quite right, Dorian. I should have shown myself more of an artist. It was foolish of me; and yet I couldn't help it. Oh, don't leave me, don't leave me.' A fit of passionate sobbing choked her. She crouched on the floor like a wounded thing, and Dorian Gray, with his beautiful eyes, looked down at her, and his chiselled lips curled in exquisite disdain. There is always something ridiculous about the emotions of people whom one has ceased to love. Sibyl Vane seemed to him to be absurdly melodramatic. Her tears and sobs annoyed him.

'I am going,' he said at last, in his calm, clear voice. 'I don't wish to be unkind, but I can't see you again. You have disappointed me.'

She wept silently, and made no answer, but crept nearer. Her little hands stretched blindly out, and appeared to be seeking for him. He turned on his heel, and left the room. In a few moments he was out of the theatre.

Where he went to he hardly knew. He remembered wandering through dimly-lit streets, past gaunt black-shadowed archways and evil-looking houses. Women with hoarse voices and harsh laughter had called after him. Drunkards had reeled by cursing, and chattering to themselves like monstrous apes. He had seen grotesque children huddled upon doorsteps, and heard shrieks and oaths from gloomy courts.

As the dawn was just breaking he found himself close to Covent Garden.* The darkness lifted, and, flushed with faint fires, the sky hollowed itself into a perfect pearl. Huge carts filled with nodding lilies rumbled slowly down the polished empty street. The air was heavy with the perfume of the flowers, and their beauty seemed to bring him an anodyne for his pain. He followed into the market, and watched the men unloading their waggons. A white-smocked carter offered him some cherries. He thanked him, wondered why he refused to accept any money for them, and began to eat them listlessly. They had been plucked at midnight, and the coldness of the moon had entered into them. A long line of boys carrying crates of striped tulips, and of yellow and red roses, defiled* in front of him, threading their way through the huge jade-green piles of vegetables. Under the portico, with its grey sun-bleached pillars, loitered a troop of draggled bareheaded girls, waiting for the auction to be over. Others crowded round the swinging doors of the coffee-house in the Piazza. The heavy cart-horses slipped and stamped upon the rough stones, shaking their bells and trappings. Some of the drivers were lying asleep on a pile of sacks. Iris-necked, and pink-footed, the pigeons ran about picking up seeds.

After a little while, he hailed a hansom, and drove home. For a few moments he loitered upon the doorstep, looking round at the silent Square with its blank close-shuttered windows, and its staring blinds. The sky was pure opal now, and the roofs of the houses glistened like silver against it. From some chimney opposite a thin wreath of smoke was rising. It curled, a violet riband, through the nacre-coloured* air.

In the huge gilt Venetian lantern, spoil of some Doge's barge,* that hung from the ceiling of the great oak-panelled hall of entrance, lights were still burning from three flickering jets: thin blue petals of flame they seemed, rimmed with white fire. He turned them out, and, having thrown his hat and cape on the table, passed through the library towards the door of his bedroom, a large octagonal chamber on the ground floor that, in his new-born feeling for luxury, he had just had decorated for himself, and hung with some curious Renaissance tapestries that had been discovered stored in a disused attic at Selby Royal. As he was turning the handle of the door, his eye fell upon the portrait Basil Hallward had painted of him. He started back as if in surprise. Then he went on into his own room, looking somewhat puzzled. After he had taken the buttonhole out of his coat, he seemed to hesitate. Finally he came back, went over to the picture, and examined it. In the dim arrested light that struggled through the cream-coloured silk blinds, the face appeared to him to be a little changed. The expression looked different. One would have said that there was a touch of cruelty in the mouth. It was certainly strange.

He turned round, and, walking to the window, drew up the blind. The bright dawn flooded the room, and swept the fantastic shadows into dusky corners, where they lay shuddering. But the strange expression that he had noticed in the face of the portrait seemed to linger there, to be more intensified even. The quivering, ardent sunlight showed him the lines of cruelty round the mouth as clearly as if he had been looking into a mirror after he had done some dreadful thing.

He winced, and, taking up from the table an oval glass framed in ivory Cupids, one of Lord Henry's many presents to him, glanced hurriedly into its polished depths. No line like that warped his red lips. What did it mean?

He rubbed his eyes, and came close to the picture, and examined it again. There were no signs of any change when he looked into the actual painting, and yet there was no doubt that the whole expression had altered. It was not a mere fancy of his own. The thing was horribly apparent.

He threw himself into a chair, and began to think. Suddenly there flashed across his mind what he had said in Basil Hallward's studio the day the picture had been finished. Yes, he remembered it perfectly. He had uttered a mad wish that he himself might remain young, and the portrait grow old; that his own beauty might be untarnished, and the face on the canvas bear the burden of his passions and his sins; that the painted image might be seared with the lines of suffering and thought, and that he might keep all the delicate bloom and loveliness of his then just conscious boyhood. Surely his wish had not been fulfilled? Such things were impossible. It seemed monstrous even to think of them. And, yet, there was the picture before him, with the touch of cruelty in the mouth.

Cruelty! Had he been cruel? It was the girl's fault, not his. He had dreamed of her as a great artist, had given his love to her because he had thought her great. Then she had disappointed him. She had been shallow and unworthy. And, yet, a feeling of infinite regret came over him, as he thought of her lying at his feet sobbing like a little child. He remembered with what callousness he had watched her. Why had he been made like that? Why had such a soul been given to him? But he had suffered also. During the three terrible hours that the play had lasted, he had lived centuries of pain, æon upon æon of torture. His life was well worth hers. She had marred him for a moment, if he had wounded her for an age. Besides, women were better suited to bear sorrow than men. They lived on their emotions. They only thought of their emotions. When they took lovers, it was merely to have some one with whom they could have scenes. Lord Henry had told him that, and Lord Henry knew what women were. Why should he trouble about Sibyl Vane? She was nothing to him now.

But the picture? What was he to say of that? It held the secret of his life, and told his story. It had taught him to love his own beauty. Would it teach him to loathe his own soul? Would he ever look at it again?

No; it was merely an illusion wrought on the troubled senses. The horrible night that he had passed had left phantoms behind it. Suddenly there had fallen upon his brain that tiny scarlet speck that makes men mad. The picture had not changed. It was folly to think so.

Yet it was watching him, with its beautiful marred face and its cruel smile. Its bright hair gleamed in the early sunlight. Its blue eyes met his own. A sense of infinite pity, not for himself, but for the painted image of himself, came over him. It had altered already, and would alter more. Its gold would wither into grey. Its red and white roses would die. For every sin that he committed, a stain would fleck and wreck its fairness. But he would not sin. The picture, changed or unchanged, would be to him the visible emblem of conscience. He would resist temptation. He would not see Lord Henry any more—would not, at any rate, listen to those subtle poisonous theories that in Basil Hallward's garden had first stirred within him the passion for impossible things. He would go back to Sibyl Vane, make her amends, marry her, try to love her again. Yes, it was his duty to do so. She must have suffered more than he had. Poor child! He had been selfish and cruel to her. The fascination that she had exercised over him would return. They would be happy together. His life with her would be beautiful and pure.

He got up from his chair, and drew a large screen right in front of the portrait, shuddering as he glanced at it. 'How horrible!' he murmured to himself, and he walked across to the window and opened it. When he stepped out on to the grass, he drew a deep breath. The fresh morning air seemed to drive away all his sombre passions. He thought only of Sibyl. A faint echo of his love came back to him. He repeated her name over and over again. The birds that were singing in the dew-drenched garden seemed to be telling the flowers about her.

CHAPTER VIII

IT was long past noon when he awoke. His valet had crept several times on tiptoe into the room to see if he was stirring, and had wondered what made his young master sleep so late. Finally his bell sounded, and Victor came in softly with a cup of tea, and a pile of letters, on a small tray of old Sèvres china,* and drew back the olive-satin curtains, with their shimmering blue lining, that hung in front of the three tall windows.

'Monsieur has well slept this morning,' he said, smiling.

'What o'clock is it, Victor?' asked Dorian Gray, drowsily.

'One hour and a quarter, Monsieur.'

How late it was! He sat up, and, having sipped some tea, turned over his letters. One of them was from Lord Henry, and had been brought by hand that morning. He hesitated for a moment, and then put it aside. The others he opened listlessly. They contained the usual collection of cards, invitations to dinner, tickets for private views, programmes of charity concerts, and the like, that are showered on fashionable young men every morning during the season. There was a rather heavy bill, for a chased silver Louis-Quinze toilet-set,* that he had not yet had the courage to send on to his guardians, who were extremely old-fashioned people and did not realize that we live in an age when unnecessary things are our only necessities; and there were several very courteously worded communications from Jermyn Street moneylenders* offering to advance any sum of money at a moment's notice and at the most reasonable rates of interest.

After about ten minutes he got up, and, throwing on an elaborate dressing-gown of silk-embroidered cashmere wool, passed into the onyx-paved bath-room. The cool water refreshed him after his long sleep. He seemed to have forgotten all that he had gone through. A dim sense of having taken part in some strange tragedy came to him once or twice, but there was the unreality of a dream about it.

As soon as he was dressed, he went into the library and sat down to a light French breakfast, that had been laid out for him on a small round table close to the open window. It was an exquisite day. The warm air seemed laden with spices. A bee flew in, and buzzed round the blue-dragon bowl* that, filled with sulphur-yellow roses, stood before him. He felt perfectly happy.

Suddenly his eye fell on the screen that he had placed in front of the portrait, and he started.

'Too cold for Monsieur?' asked his valet, putting an omelette on the table. 'I shut the window?'

Dorian shook his head. 'I am not cold,' he murmured.

Was it all true? Had the portrait really changed? Or had it been simply his own imagination that had made him see a look of evil where there had been a look of joy? Surely a painted canvas could not alter? The thing was absurd. It would serve as a tale to tell Basil some day. It would make him smile.

And, yet, how vivid was his recollection of the whole thing! First in the dim twilight, and then in the bright dawn, he had seen the touch of cruelty round the warped lips. He almost dreaded his valet leaving the room. He knew that when he was alone he would have to examine the portrait. He was afraid of certainty. When the coffee and cigarettes had been brought and the man turned to go, he felt a wild desire to tell him to remain. As the door was closing behind him he called him back. The man stood waiting for his orders. Dorian looked at him for a moment. 'I am not at home to any one, Victor,' he said, with a sigh. The man bowed and retired.

Then he rose from the table, lit a cigarette, and flung himself down on a luxuriously-cushioned couch that stood facing the screen. The screen was an old one, of gilt Spanish leather,* stamped and wrought with a rather florid Louis-Quatorze pattern. He scanned it curiously, wondering if ever before it had concealed the secret of a man's life.

Should he move it aside, after all? Why not let it stay there? What was the use of knowing? If the thing was true, it was terrible. If it was not true, why trouble about it? But what if, by some fate or deadlier chance, eyes other than his spied behind, and saw the horrible change? What should he do if Basil Hallward came and asked to look at his own picture? Basil would be sure to do that. No; the thing had to be examined, and at once. Anything would be better than this dreadful state of doubt.

He got up, and locked both doors. At least he would be alone when he looked upon the mask of his shame. Then he drew the screen aside, and saw himself face to face. It was perfectly true. The portrait had altered.

As he often remembered afterwards, and always with no small wonder, he found himself at first gazing at the portrait with a feeling of almost scientific interest. That such a change should have taken place was incredible to him. And yet it was a fact. Was there some subtle affinity between the chemical atoms, that shaped themselves into form and colour on the canvas, and the soul that was within him? Could it be that what that soul thought, they realized?—that what it dreamed, they made true? Or was there some other, more terrible reason? He shuddered, and felt afraid, and, going back to the couch, lay there, gazing at the picture in sickened horror.

One thing, however, he felt that it had done for him. It had made him conscious how unjust, how cruel, he had been to Sibyl Vane. It was not too late to make reparation for that. She could still be his wife. His unreal and selfish love would yield to some higher influence, would be transformed into some nobler passion, and the portrait that Basil Hallward had painted of him would be a guide to him through life, would be to him what holiness is to some, and conscience to others, and the fear of God to us all. There were opiates for remorse, drugs that could lull the moral sense to sleep. But here was a visible symbol of the degradation of sin. Here was an ever-present sign of the ruin men brought upon their souls.

Three o'clock struck, and four, and the half-hour rang its double chime, but Dorian Gray did not stir. He was trying to gather up the scarlet threads of life, and to weave them into a pattern; to find his way through the sanguine labyrinth of passion through which he was wandering. He did not know what to do, or what to think. Finally, he went over to the table and wrote a passionate letter to the girl he had loved, imploring her forgiveness, and accusing himself of madness.

He covered page after page with wild words of sorrow, and wilder words of pain. There is a luxury in self-reproach. When we blame ourselves we feel that no one else has a right to blame us. It is the confession, not the priest, that gives us absolution. When Dorian had finished the letter, he felt that he had been forgiven.

Suddenly there came a knock to the door, and he heard Lord Henry's voice outside. 'My dear boy, I must see you. Let me in at once. I can't bear your shutting yourself up like this.'

He made no answer at first, but remained quite still. The knocking still continued, and grew louder. Yes, it was better to let Lord Henry in, and to explain to him the new life he was going to lead, to quarrel with him if it became necessary to quarrel, to part if parting was inevitable. He jumped up, drew the screen hastily across the picture, and unlocked the door.

'I am so sorry for it all, Dorian,' said Lord Henry, as he entered. 'But you must not think too much about it.'

'Do you mean about Sibyl Vane?' asked the lad.

'Yes, of course,' answered Lord Henry, sinking into a chair, and slowly pulling off his yellow gloves. 'It is dreadful, from one point of view, but it was not your fault. Tell me, did you go behind and see her, after the play was over?'

'Yes.'

'I felt sure you had. Did you make a scene with her?'

'I was brutal, Harry—perfectly brutal. But it is all right now. I am not sorry for anything that has happened. It has taught me to know myself better.'

'Ah, Dorian, I am so glad you take it in that way! I was afraid I would find you plunged in remorse, and tearing that nice curly hair of yours.'

'I have got through all that,' said Dorian, shaking his head, and smiling. 'I am perfectly happy now. I know what conscience is, to begin with. It is not what you told me it was. It is the divinest thing in us. Don't sneer at it, Harry, any more—at least not before me. I want to be good. I can't bear the idea of my soul being hideous.'

'A very charming artistic basis for ethics, Dorian! I congratulate you on it. But how are you going to begin?'

'By marrying Sibyl Vane.'

'Marrying Sibyl Vane!' cried Lord Henry, standing up, and looking at him in perplexed amazement. 'But, my dear Dorian—'

‘Yes, Harry, I know what you are going to say. Something dreadful about marriage. Don’t say it. Don’t ever say things of that kind to me again. Two days ago I asked Sibyl to marry me. I am not going to break my word to her. She is to be my wife.’

‘Your wife! Dorian! . . . Didn’t you get my letter? I wrote to you this morning, and sent the note down, by my own man.’

‘Your letter? Oh, yes, I remember. I have not read it yet, Harry. I was afraid there might be something in it that I wouldn’t like. You cut life to pieces with your epigrams.’

‘You know nothing then?’

‘What do you mean?’

Lord Henry walked across the room, and, sitting down by Dorian Gray, took both his hands in his own, and held them tightly. ‘Dorian,’ he said, ‘my letter—don’t be frightened—was to tell you that Sibyl Vane is dead.’

A cry of pain broke from the lad’s lips, and he leaped to his feet, tearing his hands away from Lord Henry’s grasp. ‘Dead! Sibyl dead! It is not true! It is a horrible lie! How dare you say it?’

‘It is quite true, Dorian,’ said Lord Henry, gravely. ‘It is in all the morning papers. I wrote down to you to ask you not to see any one till I came. There will have to be an inquest, of course, and you must not be mixed up in it. Things like that make a man fashionable in Paris. But in London people are so prejudiced. Here, one should never make one’s début with a scandal. One should reserve that to give an interest to one’s old age. I suppose they don’t know your name at the theatre? If they don’t, it is all right. Did any one see you going round to her room? That is an important point.’

Dorian did not answer for a few moments. He was dazed with horror. Finally he stammered, in a stifled voice, ‘Harry, did you say an inquest? What did you mean by that? Did Sibyl——? Oh, Harry, I can’t bear it! But be quick. Tell me everything at once.’

‘I have no doubt it was not an accident, Dorian, though it must be put in that way to the public. It seems that as she was leaving the theatre with her mother, about half-past twelve or so, she said she had forgotten something upstairs. They waited some time for her, but she did not come down again. They ultimately found her lying dead on the floor of her dressing-room. She had swallowed something by mistake, some dreadful thing they use at theatres. I don’t know what it was, but it had either prussic acid* or white lead in it.

I should fancy it was prussic acid, as she seems to have died instantaneously.'

'Harry, Harry, it is terrible!' cried the lad.

'Yes; it is very tragic, of course, but you must not get yourself mixed up in it. I see by The Standard* that she was seventeen. I should have thought she was almost younger than that. She looked such a child, and seemed to know so little about acting. Dorian, you mustn't let this thing get on your nerves. You must come and dine with me, and afterwards we will look in at the Opera. It is a Patti* night, and everybody will be there. You can come to my sister's box. She has got some smart women with her.'

'So I have murdered Sibyl Vane,' said Dorian Gray, half to himself—'murdered her as surely as if I had cut her little throat with a knife. Yet the roses are not less lovely for all that. The birds sing just as happily in my garden. And to-night I am to dine with you, and then go on to the Opera, and sup somewhere, I suppose, afterwards. How extraordinarily dramatic life is!* If I had read all this in a book, Harry, I think I would have wept over it. Somehow, now that it has happened actually, and to me, it seems far too wonderful for tears. Here is the first passionate love-letter I have ever written in my life. Strange, that my first passionate love-letter should have been addressed to a dead girl. Can they feel, I wonder, those white silent people we call the dead? Sibyl! Can she feel, or know, or listen? Oh, Harry, how I loved her once! It seems years ago to me now. She was everything to me. Then came that dreadful night—was it really only last night?—when she played so badly, and my heart almost broke. She explained it all to me. It was terribly pathetic. But I was not moved a bit. I thought her shallow. Suddenly something happened that made me afraid. I can't tell you what it was, but it was terrible. I said I would go back to her. I felt I had done wrong. And now she is dead. My God! my God! Harry, what shall I do? You don't know the danger I am in, and there is nothing to keep me straight. She would have done that for me. She had no right to kill herself. It was selfish of her.'

'My dear Dorian,' answered Lord Henry, taking a cigarette from his case, and producing a gold-latten* matchbox, 'the only way a woman can ever reform a man is by boring him so completely that he loses all possible interest in life. If you had married this girl you would have been wretched. Of course you would have treated her kindly. One can always be kind to people about whom one cares nothing. But she would have soon found out that you were absolutely indifferent to her. And when a woman finds that out about her husband, she either becomes dreadfully dowdy, or wears very smart bonnets that some other woman's husband has to pay for. I say nothing about the social mistake, which would have been abject, which, of course, I would not have allowed, but I assure you that in any case the whole thing would have been an absolute failure.'

'I suppose it would,' muttered the lad, walking up and down the room, and looking horribly pale. 'But I thought it was my duty. It is not my fault that this terrible tragedy has prevented my doing what was right. I remember your saying once that there is a fatality about good resolutions—that they are always made too late. Mine certainly were.'

'Good resolutions are useless attempts to interfere with scientific laws. Their origin is pure vanity. Their result is absolutely nil. They give us, now and then, some of those luxurious sterile emotions that have a certain charm for the weak. That is all that can be said for them. They are simply cheques that men draw on a bank where they have no account.'

'Harry,' cried Dorian Gray, coming over and sitting down beside him, 'why is it that I cannot feel this tragedy as much as I want to? I don't think I am heartless. Do you?'

'You have done too many foolish things during the last fortnight to be entitled to give yourself that name, Dorian,' answered Lord Henry, with his sweet, melancholy smile.

The lad frowned. 'I don't like that explanation, Harry,' he rejoined, 'but I am glad you don't think I am heartless. I am nothing of the kind. I know I am not. And yet I must admit that this thing that has happened does not affect me as it should. It seems to me to be simply like a wonderful ending to a wonderful play. It has all the terrible beauty of a Greek tragedy, a tragedy in which I took a great part, but by which I have not been wounded.'

'It is an interesting question,' said Lord Henry, who found an exquisite pleasure in playing on the lad's unconscious egotism—'an extremely interesting question. I fancy that the true explanation is this. It often happens that the real tragedies of life occur in such an inartistic manner that they hurt us by their crude violence, their absolute incoherence, their absurd want of meaning, their entire lack of style. They affect us just as vulgarity affects us. They give us an impression of sheer brute force, and we revolt against that. Sometimes, however, a tragedy that possesses artistic elements of beauty crosses our lives. If these elements of beauty are real, the whole thing simply appeals to our sense of dramatic effect. Suddenly we find that we are no longer the actors, but the spectators of the play. Or rather we are both. We watch ourselves, and the mere wonder of the spectacle entralls us. In the present case, what is it that has really happened? Some one has killed herself for love of you. I wish that I had ever had such an experience. It would have made me in love with love for the rest of my life. The people who have adored me—there have not been very many, but there have been some—have always insisted on living on, long after I had ceased to care for them, or they to care for me. They have become stout and tedious, and when I meet them they go in at once for reminiscences. That awful memory of woman! What a fearful thing it is! And what an utter intellectual stagnation it reveals! One should absorb the colour of life, but one should never remember its details. Details are always vulgar.'

'I must sow poppies in my garden,' sighed Dorian.

'There is no necessity,' rejoined his companion. 'Life has always poppies in her hands. Of course, now and then things linger. I once wore nothing but violets all through one season, as a form of artistic mourning for a romance that would not die. Ultimately, however, it did die. I forget what killed it. I think it was her proposing to sacrifice the whole world for me. That is always a dreadful moment. It fills one with the terror of eternity. Well—would you believe it?—a week ago, at Lady Hampshire's, I found myself seated at dinner next the lady in question, and she insisted on going over the whole thing again, and digging up the past, and raking up the future. I had buried my romance in a bed of asphodel. She dragged it out again, and assured me that I had spoiled her life. I am bound to state that she ate an enormous dinner, so I did not feel any anxiety. But what a lack of taste she showed! The one charm of the past is that it is the past. But women never know when the curtain has fallen. They always want a sixth act, and as soon as the interest of the play is entirely over they propose to continue it. If they were allowed their own way, every comedy would have a tragic ending, and every tragedy would culminate in a farce. They are charmingly artificial, but they have no sense of art. You are more fortunate than I am. I assure you, Dorian, that not one of the women I have known would have done for me what Sibyl Vane did for you. Ordinary women always console themselves. Some of them do it by going in for sentimental colours. Never trust a woman who wears mauve, whatever her age may be, or a woman over thirty-five who is fond of pink ribbons. It always means that they have a history.* Others find a great consolation in suddenly discovering the good qualities of their husbands. They flaunt their conjugal felicity in one's face, as if it were the most fascinating of sins. Religion consoles some. Its mysteries have all the charm of a flirtation, a woman once told me; and I can quite understand it. Besides, nothing makes one so vain as being told that one is a sinner. Conscience makes egotists of us all. Yes; there is really no end to the consolations that women find in modern life. Indeed, I have not mentioned the most important one.'

'What is that, Harry?' said the lad, listlessly.

'Oh, the obvious consolation. Taking some one else's admirer when one loses one's own. In good society that always whitewashes a woman. But really, Dorian, how different Sibyl Vane must have been from all the women one meets! There is something to me quite beautiful about her death. I am glad I am living in a century when such wonders happen. They make one believe in the reality of the things we all play with, such as romance, passion, and love.'

'I was terribly cruel to her. You forget that.'

'I am afraid that women appreciate cruelty, downright cruelty, more than anything else. They have wonderfully primitive instincts. We have emancipated them, but they remain slaves looking for their masters, all the same. They love being dominated. I am sure you were splendid. I have never seen you really and absolutely angry, but I can fancy how delightful you looked. And, after all, you said something to me the day before yesterday that seemed to me at the time to be merely fanciful, but that I see now was absolutely true, and it holds the key to everything.'

'What was that, Harry?'

'You said to me that Sibyl Vane represented to you all the heroines of romance—that she was Desdemona one night, and Ophelia* the other; that if she died as Juliet, she came to life as Imogen.'

'She will never come to life again now,' muttered the lad, burying his face in his hands.

'No, she will never come to life. She has played her last part. But you must think of that lonely death in the tawdry dressing-room simply as a strange lurid fragment from some Jacobean tragedy, as a wonderful scene from Webster, or Ford, or Cyril Tourneur.* The girl never really lived, and so she has never really died. To you at least she was always a dream, a phantom that flitted through Shakespeare's plays and left them lovelier for its presence, a reed through which Shakespeare's music sounded richer and more full of joy. The moment she touched actual life, she marred it, and it marred her, and so she passed away. Mourn for Ophelia, if you like. Put ashes on your head because Cordelia was strangled. Cry out against Heaven because the daughter of Brabantio* died. But don't waste your tears over Sibyl Vane. She was less real than they are.'

There was a silence. The evening darkened in the room. Noiselessly, and with silver feet, the shadows crept in from the garden. The colours faded wearily out of things.

After some time Dorian Gray looked up. 'You have explained me to myself, Harry,' he murmured, with something of a sigh of relief. 'I felt all that you have said, but somehow I was afraid of it, and I could not express it to myself. How well you know me! But we will not talk again of what has happened. It has been a marvellous experience. That is all. I wonder if life has still in store for me anything as marvellous.'

'Life has everything in store for you, Dorian. There is nothing that you, with your extraordinary good looks, will not be able to do.'

'But suppose, Harry, I became haggard, and old, and wrinkled? What then?'

'Ah, then,' said Lord Henry, rising to go—'then, my dear Dorian, you would have to fight for your victories. As it is, they are brought to you. No, you must keep your good looks. We live in an age that reads too much to be wise, and that thinks too much to be beautiful. We cannot spare you. And now you had better dress, and drive down to the club. We are rather late, as it is.'

'I think I shall join you at the Opera, Harry. I feel too tired to eat anything. What is the number of your sister's box?'

'Twenty-seven, I believe. It is on the grand tier.* You will see her name on the door. But I am sorry you won't come and dine.'

'I don't feel up to it,' said Dorian, listlessly. 'But I am awfully obliged to you for all that you have said to me. You are certainly my best friend. No one has ever understood me as you have.'

'We are only at the beginning of our friendship, Dorian,' answered Lord Henry, shaking him by the hand. 'Good-bye. I shall see you before nine-thirty, I hope. Remember, Patti is singing.'

As he closed the door behind him, Dorian Gray touched the bell, and in a few minutes Victor appeared with the lamps and drew the blinds down. He waited impatiently for him to go. The man seemed to take an interminable time over everything.

As soon as he had left, he rushed to the screen, and drew it back. No; there was no further change in the picture. It had received the news of Sibyl Vane's death before he had known of it himself. It was conscious of the events of life as they occurred. The vicious cruelty that marred the fine lines of the mouth had, no doubt, appeared at the very moment that the girl had drunk the poison, whatever it was. Or was it indifferent to results? Did it merely take cognizance of what passed within the soul? He wondered, and hoped that some day he would see the change taking place before his very eyes, shuddering as he hoped it.

Poor Sibyl! what a romance it had all been! She had often mimicked death on the stage. Then Death himself had touched her, and taken her with him. How had she played that dreadful last scene? Had she cursed him, as she died? No; she had died for love of him, and love would always be a sacrament to him now. She had atoned for everything, by the sacrifice she had made of her life. He would not think any more of what she had made him go through, on that horrible night at the theatre. When he thought of her, it would be as a wonderful tragic figure sent on to the world's stage to show the supreme reality of Love. A wonderful tragic figure? Tears came to his eyes as he remembered her childlike look and winsome fanciful ways and shy tremulous grace. He brushed them away hastily, and looked again at the picture.

He felt that the time had really come for making his choice. Or had his choice already been made? Yes, life had decided that for him—life, and his own infinite curiosity about life. Eternal youth, infinite passion, pleasures subtle and secret, wild joys and wilder sins—he was to have all these things. The portrait was to bear the burden of his shame: that was all.

A feeling of pain crept over him as he thought of the desecration that was in store for the fair face on the canvas. Once, in boyish mockery of Narcissus, he had kissed, or feigned to kiss, those painted lips that now smiled so cruelly at him. Morning after morning he had sat before the portrait wondering at its beauty, almost enamoured of it, as it seemed to him at times. Was it to alter now with every mood to which he yielded? Was it to become a monstrous and loathsome thing, to be hidden away in a locked room, to be shut out from the sunlight that had so often touched to brighter gold the waving wonder of its hair? The pity of it! the pity of it!*

For a moment he thought of praying that the horrible sympathy that existed between him and the picture might cease. It had changed in answer to a prayer; perhaps in answer to a prayer it might remain unchanged. And, yet, who, that knew anything about Life, would surrender the chance of remaining always young, however fantastic that chance might be, or with what fateful consequences it might be fraught? Besides, was it really under his control? Had it indeed been prayer that had produced the substitution? Might there not be some curious scientific reason for it all? If thought could exercise its influence upon a living organism, might not thought exercise an influence upon dead and inorganic things? Nay, without thought or conscious desire, might not things external to ourselves vibrate in unison with our moods and passions, atom calling to atom in secret love or strange affinity? But the reason was of no importance. He would never again tempt by a prayer any terrible power. If the picture was to alter, it was to alter. That was all. Why inquire too closely into it?

For there would be a real pleasure in watching it. He would be able to follow his mind into its secret places. This portrait would be to him the most magical of mirrors. As it had revealed to him his own body, so it would reveal to him his own soul. And when winter came upon it, he would still be standing where spring trembles on the verge of summer. When the blood crept from its face, and left behind a pallid mask of chalk with leaden eyes, he would keep the glamour of boyhood. Not one blossom of his loveliness would ever fade. Not one pulse of his life would ever weaken. Like the gods of the Greeks, he would be strong, and fleet, and joyous. What did it matter what happened to the coloured image on the canvas? He would be safe. That was everything.

He drew the screen back into its former place in front of the picture, smiling as he did so, and passed into his bedroom, where his valet was already waiting for him. An hour later he was at the Opera, and Lord Henry was leaning over his chair.

CHAPTER IX

As he was sitting at breakfast next morning, Basil Hallward was shown into the room.

‘I am so glad I have found you, Dorian,’ he said, gravely. ‘I called last night, and they told me you were at the Opera. Of course I knew that was impossible. But I wish you had left word where you had really gone to. I passed a dreadful evening, half afraid that one tragedy might be followed by another. I think you might have telegraphed for me when you heard of it first. I read of it quite by chance in a late edition of The Globe, that I picked up at the club. I came here at once, and was miserable at not finding you. I can’t tell you how heart-broken I am about the whole thing. I know what you must suffer. But where were you? Did you go down and see the girl’s mother? For a moment I thought of following you there. They gave the address in the paper. Somewhere in the Euston Road, isn’t it? But I was afraid of intruding upon a sorrow that I could not lighten. Poor woman! What a state she must be in! And her only child, too! What did she say about it all?’

‘My dear Basil, how do I know?’ murmured Dorian Gray, sipping some pale-yellow wine from a delicate gold-beaded bubble of Venetian glass, and looking dreadfully bored. ‘I was at the Opera. You should have come on there. I met Lady Gwendolen, Harry’s sister, for the first time. We were in her box. She is perfectly charming; and Patti sang divinely. Don’t talk about horrid subjects. If one doesn’t talk about a thing, it has never happened. It is simply expression, as Harry says, that gives reality to things. I may mention that she was not the woman’s only child. There is a son, a charming fellow, I believe. But he is not on the stage. He is a sailor, or something. And now, tell me about yourself and what you are painting.’

‘You went to the Opera?’ said Hallward, speaking very slowly, and with a strained touch of pain in his voice. ‘You went to the Opera while Sibyl Vane was lying dead in some sordid lodging? You can talk to me of other women being charming, and of Patti singing divinely, before the girl you loved has even the quiet of a grave to sleep in? Why, man, there are horrors in store for that little white body of hers!’

‘Stop, Basil! I won’t hear it!’ cried Dorian, leaping to his feet. ‘You must not tell me about things. What is done is done. What is past is past.'

'You call yesterday the past?'

'What has the actual lapse of time got to do with it? It is only shallow people who require years to get rid of an emotion. A man who is master of himself can end a sorrow as easily as he can invent a pleasure. I don't want to be at the mercy of my emotions. I want to use them, to enjoy them, and to dominate them.'

'Dorian, this is horrible! Something has changed you completely. You look exactly the same wonderful boy who, day after day, used to come down to my studio to sit for his picture. But you were simple, natural, and affectionate then. You were the most unspoiled creature in the whole world. Now, I don't know what has come over you. You talk as if you had no heart, no pity in you. It is all Harry's influence. I see that.'

The lad flushed up, and, going to the window, looked out for a few moments on the green, flickering, sun-lashed garden. 'I owe a great deal to Harry, Basil,' he said, at last—'more than I owe to you. You only taught me to be vain.'

'Well, I am punished for that, Dorian—or shall be some day.'

'I don't know what you mean, Basil,' he exclaimed, turning round. 'I don't know what you want. What do you want?'

'I want the Dorian Gray I used to paint,' said the artist, sadly.

'Basil,' said the lad, going over to him, and putting his hand on his shoulder, 'you have come too late. Yesterday when I heard that Sibyl Vane had killed herself——'

'Killed herself! Good heavens! is there no doubt about that?' cried Hallward, looking up at him with an expression of horror.

'My dear Basil! Surely you don't think it was a vulgar accident? Of course she killed herself.'

The elder man buried his face in his hands. 'How fearful,' he muttered, and a shudder ran through him.

'No,' said Dorian Gray, 'there is nothing fearful about it. It is one of the great romantic tragedies of the age. As a rule, people who act lead the most commonplace lives. They are good husbands, or faithful wives, or something tedious. You know what I mean—middle-class virtue,* and all that kind of thing. How different Sibyl was! She lived her finest tragedy. She was always a heroine. The last night she played—the night you saw her—she acted badly because she had known the reality of love. When she knew its unreality, she died, as Juliet might have died. She passed again into the sphere of art. There is something of the martyr about her. Her death has all the pathetic uselessness of martyrdom, all its wasted beauty. But, as I was saying, you must not think I have not suffered. If you had come in yesterday at a particular moment—about half-past five, perhaps, or a quarter to six—you would have found me in tears. Even Harry, who was here, who brought me the news, in fact, had no idea what I was going through. I suffered immensely. Then it passed away. I cannot repeat an emotion.* No one can, except sentimentalists. And you are awfully unjust, Basil. You come down here to console me. That is charming of you. You find me consoled, and you are furious. How like a sympathetic person! You remind me of a story Harry told me about a certain philanthropist* who spent twenty years of his life in trying to get some grievance redressed, or some unjust law altered—I forget exactly what it was. Finally he succeeded, and nothing could exceed his disappointment. He had absolutely nothing to do, almost died of ennui, and became a confirmed misanthrope. And besides, my dear old Basil, if you really want to console me, teach me rather to forget what has happened, or to see it from a proper artistic point of view. Was it not Gautier who used to write about la consolation des arts?* I remember picking up a little vellum-covered book in your studio one day and chancing on that delightful phrase. Well, I am not like that young man you told me of when we were down at Marlow* together, the young man who used to say that yellow satin could console one for all the miseries of life. I love beautiful things that one can touch and handle. Old brocades, green bronzes, lacquer-work, carved ivories, exquisite surroundings, luxury, pomp, there is much to be got from all these. But the artistic temperament that they create, or at any rate reveal, is still more to me. To become the spectator of one's own life, as Harry says, is to escape the suffering of life. I know you are surprised at my talking to you like this. You have not realized how I have developed. I was a schoolboy when you knew me. I am a man now. I have new passions, new thoughts, new ideas. I am different, but you must not like me less. I am changed, but you must always be my friend. Of course I am very fond of Harry. But I know that you are better than he is. You are not stronger—you are too much afraid of life—but you are better. And how happy we used to be together! Don't leave me, Basil, and don't quarrel with me. I am what I am. There is nothing more to be said.'

The painter felt strangely moved.* The lad was infinitely dear to him, and his personality had been the great turning-point in his art. He could not bear the idea of reproaching him any more. After all, his indifference was probably merely a mood that would pass away. There was so much in him that was good, so much in him that was noble.

'Well, Dorian,' he said, at length, with a sad smile. 'I won't speak to you again about this horrible thing, after to-day. I only trust your name won't be mentioned in connection with it. The inquest is to take place this afternoon. Have they summoned you?'

Dorian shook his head, and a look of annoyance passed over his face at the mention of the word 'inquest.' There was something so crude and vulgar about everything of the kind. 'They don't know my name,' he answered.

'But surely she did?'

'Only my Christian name, and that I am quite sure she never mentioned to any one. She told me once that they were all rather curious to learn who I was, and that she invariably told them my name was Prince Charming. It was pretty of her. You must do me a drawing of Sibyl, Basil. I should like to have something more of her than the memory of a few kisses and some broken pathetic words.'

'I will try and do something, Dorian, if it would please you. But you must come and sit to me yourself again. I can't get on without you.'

'I can never sit to you again, Basil. It is impossible!' he exclaimed, starting back.

The painter stared at him. 'My dear boy, what nonsense!' he cried. 'Do you mean to say you don't like what I did of you? Where is it? Why have you pulled the screen in front of it? Let me look at it. It is the best thing I have ever done. Do take the screen away, Dorian. It is simply disgraceful of your servant hiding my work like that. I felt the room looked different as I came in.'

'My servant has nothing to do with it, Basil. You don't imagine I let him arrange my room for me? He settles my flowers for me sometimes—that is all. No; I did it myself. The light was too strong on the portrait.'

'Too strong! Surely not, my dear fellow? It is an admirable place for it. Let me see it.' And Hallward walked towards the corner of the room.

A cry of terror broke from Dorian Gray's lips, and he rushed between the painter and the screen. 'Basil,' he said, looking very pale, 'you must not look at it. I don't wish you to.'

'Not look at my own work! you are not serious. Why shouldn't I look at it?' exclaimed Hallward, laughing.

'If you try to look at it, Basil, on my word of honour I will never speak to you again as long as I live. I am quite serious. I don't offer any explanation, and you are not to ask for any. But, remember, if you touch this screen, everything is over between us.'

Hallward was thunderstruck. He looked at Dorian Gray in absolute amazement. He had never seen him like this before. The lad was actually pallid with rage. His hands were clenched, and the pupils of his eyes were like discs of blue fire. He was trembling all over.

'Dorian!'

'Don't speak!'

'But what is the matter? Of course I won't look at it if you don't want me to,' he said, rather coldly, turning on his heel, and going over towards the window. 'But, really, it seems rather absurd that I shouldn't see my own work, especially as I am going to exhibit it in Paris in the autumn. I shall probably have to give it another coat of varnish before that, so I must see it some day, and why not to-day?'

'To exhibit it! You want to exhibit it?' exclaimed Dorian Gray, a strange sense of terror creeping over him. Was the world going to be shown his secret? Were people to gape at the mystery of his life? That was impossible. Something—he did not know what—had to be done at once.

'Yes; I don't suppose you will object to that. Georges Petit is going to collect all my best pictures for a special exhibition in the Rue de Sèze,* which will open the first week in October. The portrait will only be away a month. I should think you could easily spare it for that time. In fact, you are sure to be out of town. And if you keep it always behind a screen, you can't care much about it.'

Dorian Gray passed his hand over his forehead. There were beads of perspiration there. He felt that he was on the brink of a horrible danger. 'You told me a month ago that you would never exhibit it,' he cried. 'Why have you changed your mind? You people who go in for being consistent have just as many moods as others have. The only difference is that your moods are rather meaningless. You can't have forgotten that you assured me most solemnly that nothing in the world would induce you to send it to any exhibition. You told Harry exactly the same thing.' He stopped suddenly, and a gleam of light came into his eyes. He remembered that Lord Henry had said to him once, half seriously and half in jest, 'If you want to have a strange quarter of an hour, get Basil to tell you why he won't exhibit your picture. He told me why he wouldn't, and it was a revelation to me.' Yes, perhaps Basil, too, had his secret. He would ask him and try.

'Basil,' he said, coming over quite close, and looking him straight in the face, 'we have each of us a secret. Let me know yours, and I shall tell you mine. What was your reason for refusing to exhibit my picture?'

The painter shuddered in spite of himself. 'Dorian, if I told you, you might like me less than you do, and you would certainly laugh at me. I could not bear your doing either of those two things. If you wish me never to look at your picture again, I am content. I have always you to look at. If you wish the best work I have ever done to be hidden from the world, I am satisfied. Your friendship is dearer to me than any fame or reputation.'

'No, Basil, you must tell me,' insisted Dorian Gray. 'I think I have a right to know.' His feeling of terror had passed away, and curiosity had taken its place. He was determined to find out Basil Hallward's mystery.

'Let us sit down, Dorian,' said the painter, looking troubled. 'Let us sit down. And just answer me one question. Have you noticed in the picture something curious?—something that probably at first did not strike you, but that revealed itself to you suddenly?'

'Basil!' cried the lad, clutching the arms of his chair with trembling hands, and gazing at him with wild, startled eyes.

'I see you did. Don't speak. Wait till you hear what I have to say.* Dorian, from the moment I met you, your personality had the most extraordinary influence over me. I was dominated, soul, brain, and power by you.* You became to me the visible incarnation of that unseen ideal whose memory haunts us artists like an exquisite dream. I worshipped you. I grew jealous of every one to whom you spoke. I wanted to have you all to myself. I was only happy when I was with you. When you were away from me you were still present in my art. . . . Of course I never let you know anything about this. It would have been impossible. You would not have understood it. I hardly understood it myself. I only knew that I had seen perfection face to face, and that the world had become wonderful to my eyes—too wonderful, perhaps, for in such mad worships there is peril, the peril of losing them, no less than the peril of keeping them. . . . Weeks and weeks went on, and I grew more and more absorbed in you. Then came a new development. I had drawn you as Paris* in dainty armour, and as Adonis with huntsman's cloak and polished boar-spear. Crowned with heavy lotus-blossoms you had sat on the prow of Adrian's barge,* gazing across the green turbid Nile. You had leant over the still pool of some Greek woodland, and seen in the water's silent silver the marvel of your own face. And it had all been what art should be, unconscious, ideal, and remote. One day, a fatal day I sometimes think, I determined to paint a wonderful portrait of you as you actually are, not in the costume of dead ages, but in your own dress and in your own time. Whether it was the Realism of the method, or the mere wonder of your own personality, thus directly presented to me without mist or veil, I cannot tell. But I know that as I worked at it, every flake and film of colour seemed to me to reveal my secret. I grew afraid that others would know of my idolatry. I felt, Dorian, that I had told too much, that I had put too much of myself into it. Then it was that I resolved never to allow the picture to be exhibited. You were a little annoyed; but then you did not realize all that it meant to me. Harry, to whom I talked about it, laughed at me. But I did not mind that. When the picture was finished, and I sat alone with it, I felt that I was right. . . . Well, after a few days the thing left my studio, and as soon as I had got rid of the intolerable fascination of its presence it seemed to me that I had been foolish in imagining that I had seen anything in it, more than that you were extremely good-looking and that I could paint. Even now I cannot help feeling that it is a mistake to think that the passion one feels in creation is ever really shown in the work one creates. Art is always more abstract than we fancy. Form and colour tell us of form and colour—that is all. It often seems to me that art conceals the artist far more completely than it ever reveals him.* And so when I got this offer from Paris I determined to make your portrait the principal thing in my exhibition. It never occurred to me that you would refuse. I see now that you were right. The picture cannot be shown.

You must not be angry with me, Dorian, for what I have told you. As I said to Harry, once, you are made to be worshipped.'

Dorian Gray drew a long breath. The colour came back to his cheeks, and a smile played about his lips. The peril was over. He was safe for the time. Yet he could not help feeling infinite pity for the painter who had just made this strange confession to him, and wondered if he himself would ever be so dominated by the personality of a friend. Lord Henry had the charm of being very dangerous. But that was all. He was too clever and too cynical to be really fond of. Would there ever be some one who would fill him with a strange idolatry? Was that one of the things that life had in store?

'It is extraordinary to me, Dorian,' said Hallward, 'that you should have seen this in the portrait. Did you really see it?'

'I saw something in it,' he answered, 'something that seemed to me very curious.'

'Well, you don't mind my looking at the thing now?'

Dorian shook his head. 'You must not ask me that, Basil. I could not possibly let you stand in front of that picture.'

'You will some day, surely?'

'Never.'

'Well, perhaps you are right. And now good-bye, Dorian. You have been the one person in my life who has really influenced my art.* Whatever I have done that is good, I owe to you. Ah! you don't know what it cost me to tell you all that I have told you.'

'My dear Basil,' said Dorian, 'what have you told me? Simply that you felt that you admired me too much. That is not even a compliment.'

'It was not intended as a compliment. It was a confession. Now that I have made it, something seems to have gone out of me. Perhaps one should never put one's worship into words.'

'It was a very disappointing confession.'

'Why, what did you expect, Dorian? You didn't see anything else in the picture, did you? There was nothing else to see?'

'No; there was nothing else to see. Why do you ask? But you mustn't talk about worship. It is foolish. You and I are friends, Basil, and we must always remain so.'

'You have got Harry,' said the painter, sadly.

'Oh, Harry!' cried the lad, with a ripple of laughter. 'Harry spends his days in saying what is incredible, and his evenings in doing what is improbable.* Just the sort of life I would like to lead. But still I don't think I would go to Harry if I were in trouble. I would sooner go to you, Basil.'

'You will sit to me again?'

'Impossible!'

'You spoil my life as an artist by refusing, Dorian. No man came across two ideal things. Few come across one.'

'I can't explain it to you, Basil, but I must never sit to you again. There is something fatal about a portrait. It has a life of its own. I will come and have tea with you. That will be just as pleasant.'

'Pleasanter for you, I am afraid,' murmured Hallward, regretfully. 'And now good-bye. I am sorry you won't let me look at the picture once again. But that can't be helped. I quite understand what you feel about it.'

As he left the room, Dorian Gray smiled to himself. Poor Basil! how little he knew of the true reason! And how strange it was that, instead of having been forced to reveal his own secret, he had succeeded, almost by chance, in wresting a secret from his friend! How much that strange confession explained to him! The painter's absurd fits of jealousy, his wild devotion, his extravagant panegyrics, his curious reticences—he understood them all now, and he felt sorry. There seemed to him to be something tragic in a friendship so coloured by romance.

He sighed, and touched the bell. The portrait must be hidden away at all costs. He could not run such a risk of discovery again. It had been mad of him to have allowed the thing to remain, even for an hour, in a room to which many of his friends had access.

CHAPTER X

WHEN his servant entered, he looked at him steadfastly, and wondered if he had thought of peering behind the screen. The man was quite impassive, and waited for his orders. Dorian lit a cigarette, and walked over to the glass and glanced into it. He could see the reflection of Victor's face perfectly. It was like a placid mask of servility. There was nothing to be afraid of, there. Yet he thought it best to be on his guard.

Speaking very slowly, he told him to tell the housekeeper that he wanted to see her, and then to go to the frame-maker and ask him to send two of his men round at once. It seemed to him that as the man left the room his eyes wandered in the direction of the screen. Or was that merely his own fancy?

After a few moments, in her black silk dress, with old-fashioned thread mittens on her wrinkled hands, Mrs. Leaf bustled into the library. He asked her for the key of the schoolroom.

‘The old schoolroom, Mr. Dorian?’ she exclaimed. ‘Why, it is full of dust. I must get it arranged, and put straight before you go into it. It is not fit for you to see, sir. It is not, indeed.’

‘I don’t want it put straight, Leaf. I only want the key.’

‘Well, sir, you’ll be covered with cobwebs if you go into it. Why, it hasn’t been opened for nearly five years, not since his lordship died.’

He winced at the mention of his grandfather. He had hateful memories of him. ‘That does not matter,’ he answered. ‘I simply want to see the place—that is all. Give me the key.’

‘And here is the key, sir,’ said the old lady, going over the contents of her bunch with tremulously uncertain hands. ‘Here is the key. I’ll have it off the bunch in a moment. But you don’t think of living up there, sir, and you so comfortable here?’

‘No, no,’ he cried, petulantly. ‘Thank you, Leaf. That will do.’

She lingered for a few moments, and was garrulous over some detail of the household. He sighed, and told her to manage things as she thought best. She left the room, wreathed in smiles.

As the door closed, Dorian put the key in his pocket, and looked round the room. His eye fell on a large purple satin coverlet heavily embroidered with gold, a splendid piece of late seventeenth-century Venetian work that his grandfather had found in a convent near Bologna.* Yes, that would serve to wrap the dreadful thing in. It had perhaps served often as a pall for the dead. Now it was to hide something that had a corruption of its own, worse than the corruption of death itself—something that would breed horrors and yet would never die. What the worm was to the corpse, his sins would be to the painted image on the canvas. They would mar its beauty, and eat away its grace. They would defile it, and make it shameful. And yet the thing would still live on. It would be always alive.

He shuddered, and for a moment he regretted that he had not told Basil the true reason why he had wished to hide the picture away. Basil would have helped him to resist Lord Henry’s influence, and the still more poisonous influences that came from his own temperament. The love that he bore him—for it was really love—had nothing in it that was not noble and intellectual. It was not that mere physical admiration of beauty that is born of the senses, and that dies when the senses tire. It was such love as Michael Angelo had known, and Montaigne, and Winckelmann, and Shakespeare himself.* Yes, Basil could have saved him. But it was too late now. The past could always be annihilated. Regret, denial, or forgetfulness could do that. But the future was inevitable. There were passions in him that would find their terrible outlet, dreams that would make the shadow of their evil real.

He took up from the couch the great purple-and-gold texture that covered it, and, holding it in his hands, passed behind the screen. Was the face on the canvas viler than before? It seemed to him that it was unchanged; and yet his loathing of it was intensified. Gold hair, blue eyes, and rose-red lips—they all were there. It was simply the expression that had altered. That was horrible in its cruelty. Compared to what he saw in it of censure or rebuke, how shallow Basil's reproaches about Sibyl Vane had been!—how shallow, and of what little account! His own soul was looking out at him from the canvas and calling him to judgment. A look of pain came across him, and he flung the rich pall over the picture. As he did so, a knock came to the door. He passed out as his servant entered.

'The persons are here, Monsieur.'

He felt that the man must be got rid of at once. He must not be allowed to know where the picture was being taken to. There was something sly about him, and he had thoughtful, treacherous eyes. Sitting down at the writing-table, he scribbled a note to Lord Henry, asking him to send him round something to read, and reminding him that they were to meet at eight-fifteen that evening.

'Wait for an answer,' he said, handing it to him, 'and show the men in here.'

In two or three minutes there was another knock, and Mr. Hubbard himself, the celebrated frame-maker of South Audley Street,* came in with a somewhat rough-looking young assistant. Mr. Hubbard was a florid, red-whiskered little man, whose admiration for art was considerably tempered by the inveterate impecuniosity of most of the artists who dealt with him. As a rule, he never left his shop. He waited for people to come to him. But he always made an exception in favour of Dorian Gray. There was something about Dorian that charmed everybody. It was a pleasure even to see him.

‘What can I do for you, Mr. Gray?’ he said, rubbing his fat freckled hands. ‘I thought I would do myself the honour of coming round in person. I have just got a beauty of a frame, sir. Picked it up at a sale. Old Florentine.* Came from Fonthill,* I believe. Admirably suited for a religious subject, Mr. Gray.’

‘I am so sorry you have given yourself the trouble of coming round, Mr. Hubbard. I shall certainly drop in and look at the frame—though I don’t go in much at present for religious art—but to-day I only want a picture carried to the top of the house for me. It is rather heavy, so I thought I would ask you to lend me a couple of your men.’

‘No trouble at all, Mr. Gray. I am delighted to be of any service to you. Which is the work of art, sir?’

‘This,’ replied Dorian, moving the screen back. ‘Can you move it, covering and all, just as it is? I don’t want it to get scratched going upstairs.’

‘There will be no difficulty, sir,’ said the genial frame-maker, beginning, with the aid of his assistant, to unhook the picture from the long brass chains by which it was suspended. ‘And, now, where shall we carry it to, Mr. Gray?’

‘I will show you the way, Mr. Hubbard, if you will kindly follow me. Or perhaps you had better go in front. I am afraid it is right at the top of the house. We will go up by the front staircase, as it is wider.’

He held the door open for them, and they passed out into the hall and began the ascent. The elaborate character of the frame had made the picture extremely bulky, and now and then, in spite of the obsequious protests of Mr. Hubbard, who had the true tradesman’s spirited dislike of seeing a gentleman doing anything useful, Dorian put his hand to it so as to help them.

‘Something of a load to carry, sir,’ gasped the little man, when they reached the top landing. And he wiped his shiny forehead.

‘I am afraid it is rather heavy,’ murmured Dorian, as he unlocked the door that opened into the room that was to keep for him the curious secret of his life and hide his soul from the eyes of men.

He had not entered the place for more than four years—not, indeed, since he had used it first as a play-room when he was a child, and then as a study when he grew somewhat older. It was a large, well-proportioned room, which had been specially built by the last Lord Kelso for the use of the little grandson whom, for his strange likeness to his mother, and also for other reasons, he had always hated and desired to keep at a distance. It appeared to Dorian to have but little changed. There was the huge Italian cassone,* with its fantastically-painted panels and its tarnished gilt mouldings, in which he had so often hidden himself as a boy. There the satinwood bookcase filled with his dog-eared schoolbooks. On the wall behind it was hanging the same ragged Flemish tapestry where a faded king and queen were playing chess in a garden, while a company of hawkers rode by, carrying hooded birds on their gauntleted wrists. How well he remembered it all! Every moment of his lonely childhood came back to him as he looked round. He recalled the stainless purity of his boyish life, and it seemed horrible to him that it was here the fatal portrait was to be hidden away. How little he had thought, in those dead days, of all that was in store for him!

But there was no other place in the house so secure from prying eyes as this. He had the key, and no one else could enter it. Beneath its purple pall, the face painted on the canvas could grow bestial, sodden, and unclean. What did it matter? No one could see it. He himself would not see it. Why should he watch the hideous corruption of his soul? He kept his youth—that was enough. And, besides, might not his nature grow finer, after all? There was no reason that the future should be so full of shame. Some love might come across his life, and purify him, and shield him from those sins that seemed to be already stirring in spirit and in flesh—those curious unpictured sins whose very mystery lent them their subtlety and their charm. Perhaps, some day, the cruel look would have passed away from the scarlet sensitive mouth, and he might show to the world Basil Hallward's masterpiece.

No; that was impossible. Hour by hour, and week by week, the thing upon the canvas was growing old. It might escape the hideousness of sin, but the hideousness of age was in store for it. The cheeks would become hollow or flaccid. Yellow crow's-feet would creep round the fading eyes and make them horrible. The hair would lose its brightness, the mouth would gape or droop, would be foolish or gross, as the mouths of old men are. There would be the wrinkled throat, the cold, blue-veined hands, the twisted body, that he remembered in the grandfather who had been so stern to him in his boyhood. The picture had to be concealed. There was no help for it.

'Bring it in, Mr. Hubbard, please,' he said, wearily, turning round. 'I am sorry I kept you so long. I was thinking of something else.'

'Always glad to have a rest, Mr. Gray,' answered the frame-maker, who was still gasping for breath. 'Where shall we put it, sir?'

'Oh, anywhere. Here: this will do. I don't want to have it hung up. Just lean it against the wall. Thanks.'

'Might one look at the work of art, sir?'

Dorian started. 'It would not interest you, Mr. Hubbard,' he said, keeping his eye on the man. He felt ready to leap upon him and fling him to the ground if he dared to lift the gorgeous hanging that concealed the secret of his life. 'I shan't trouble you any more now. I am much obliged for your kindness in coming round.'

'Not at all, not at all, Mr. Gray. Ever ready to do anything for you, sir.' And Mr. Hubbard tramped downstairs, followed by the assistant, who glanced back at Dorian with a look of shy wonder in his rough, uncomely face. He had never seen any one so marvellous.

When the sound of their footsteps had died away, Dorian locked the door, and put the key in his pocket. He felt safe now. No one would ever look upon the horrible thing. No eye but his would ever see his shame.

On reaching the library he found that it was just after five o'clock, and that the tea had been already brought up. On a little table of dark perfumed wood thickly incrusting with nacre, a present from Lady Radley, his guardian's wife, a pretty professional invalid, who had spent the preceding winter in Cairo,* was lying a note from Lord Henry, and beside it was a book bound in yellow paper,* the cover slightly torn and the edges soiled. A copy of the third edition of The St. James's Gazette* had been placed on the tea-tray. It was evident that Victor had returned. He wondered if he had met the men in the hall as they were leaving the house, and had wormed out of them what they had been doing. He would be sure to miss the picture—had no doubt missed it already, while he had been laying the tea-things. The screen had not been set back, and a blank space was visible on the wall. Perhaps some night he might find him creeping upstairs and trying to force the door of the room. It was a horrible thing to have a spy in one's house. He had heard of rich men who had been blackmailed all their lives by some servant who had read a letter, or overheard a conversation, or picked up a card with an address, or found beneath a pillow a withered flower or a shred of crumpled lace.

He sighed, and, having poured himself out some tea, opened Lord Henry's note. It was simply to say that he sent him round the evening paper, and a book that might interest him, and that he would be at the club at eight-fifteen. He opened The St. James's languidly, and looked through it. A red pencil-mark on the fifth page caught his eye. It drew attention to the following paragraph:—

‘INQUEST ON AN ACTRESS.—An inquest was held this morning at the Bell Tavern, Hoxton Road,* by Mr. Danby, the District Coroner, on the body of Sibyl Vane, a young actress recently engaged at the Royal Theatre, Holborn.* A verdict of death by misadventure was returned. Considerable sympathy was expressed for the mother of the deceased, who was greatly affected during the giving of her own evidence, and that of Dr. Birrell, who had made the post-mortem examination of the deceased.’

He frowned, and, tearing the paper in two went across the room and flung the pieces away. How ugly it all was! And how horribly real ugliness made things! He felt a little annoyed with Lord Henry for having sent him the report. And it was certainly stupid of him to have marked it with red pencil. Victor might have read it. The man knew more than enough English for that.

Perhaps he had read it, and had begun to suspect something. And, yet, what did it matter? What had Dorian Gray to do with Sibyl Vane's death? There was nothing to fear. Dorian Gray had not killed her.

His eye fell on the yellow book that Lord Henry had sent him. What was it, he wondered. He went towards the little pearl-coloured octagonal stand, that had always looked to him like the work of some strange Egyptian bees that wrought in silver, and taking up the volume, flung himself into an armchair, and began to turn over the leaves. After a few minutes he became absorbed. It was the strangest book that he had ever read. It seemed to him that in exquisite raiment, and to the delicate sound of flutes,* the sins of the world were passing in dumb show before him. Things that he had dimly dreamed of were suddenly made real to him. Things of which he had never dreamed were gradually revealed.

It was a novel without a plot,* and with only one character, being, indeed, simply a psychological study of a certain young Parisian, who spent his life trying to realize in the nineteenth century all the passions and modes of thought that belonged to every century except his own, and to sum up, as it were, in himself the various moods through which the world-spirit had ever passed, loving for their mere artificiality those renunciations that men have unwisely called virtue, as much as those natural rebellions that wise men still call sin. The style in which it was written was that curious jewelled style, vivid and obscure at once, full of argot* and of archaisms, of technical expressions and of elaborate paraphrases, that characterizes the work of some of the finest artists of the French school of Symbolistes.* There were in it metaphors as monstrous as orchids,* and as subtle in colour. The life of the senses was described in the terms of mystical philosophy. One hardly knew at times whether one was reading the spiritual ecstasies of some mediæval saint or the morbid confessions of a modern sinner. It was a poisonous book. The heavy odour of incense seemed to cling about its pages and to trouble the brain. The mere cadence of the sentences, the subtle monotony of their music, so full as it was of complex refrains and movements elaborately repeated, produced in the mind of the lad, as he passed from chapter to chapter, a form of reverie, a malady of dreaming, that made him unconscious of the falling day and creeping shadows.

Cloudless, and pierced by one solitary star, a copper-green sky gleamed through the windows. He read on by its wan light till he could read no more. Then, after his valet had reminded him several times of the lateness of the hour, he got up, and, going into the next room, placed the book on the little Florentine table that always stood at his bedside, and began to dress for dinner.

It was almost nine o'clock before he reached the club, where he found Lord Henry sitting alone, in the morning-room, looking very much bored.

'I am so sorry, Harry,' he cried, 'but really it is entirely your fault. That book you sent me so fascinated me that I forgot how the time was going.'

'Yes: I thought you would like it,' replied his host, rising from his chair.

'I didn't say I liked it, Harry. I said it fascinated me. There is a great difference.'

'Ah, you have discovered that?' murmured Lord Henry. And they passed into the dining-room.

CHAPTER XI

FOR years, Dorian Gray could not free himself from the influence of this book. Or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that he never sought to free himself from it. He procured from Paris no less than nine large-paper copies of the first edition,* and had them bound in different colours, so that they might suit his various moods and the changing fancies of a nature over which he seemed, at times, to have almost entirely lost control. The hero, the wonderful young Parisian, in whom the romantic and the scientific temperaments were so strangely blended,* became to him a kind of prefiguring type of himself. And, indeed, the whole book seemed to him to contain the story of his own life, written before he had lived it.

In one point he was more fortunate than the novel's fantastic hero. He never knew—never indeed, had any cause to know—that somewhat grotesque dread of mirrors, and polished metal surfaces, and still water,* which came upon the young Parisian so early in his life, and was occasioned by the sudden decay of a beauty that had once, apparently, been so remarkable. It was with an almost cruel joy—and perhaps in nearly every joy, as certainly in every pleasure, cruelty has its place—that he used to read the latter part of the book, with its really tragic, if somewhat over-emphasized, account of the sorrow and despair of one who had himself lost what in others, and in the world, he had most dearly valued.

For the wonderful beauty that had so fascinated Basil Hallward, and many others besides him, seemed never to leave him. Even those who had heard the most evil things against him, and from time to time strange rumours about his mode of life crept through London and became the chatter of the clubs, could not believe anything to his dishonour when they saw him. He had always the look of one who had kept himself unspotted from the world. Men who talked grossly became silent when Dorian Gray entered the room. There was something in the purity of his face that rebuked them. His mere presence seemed to recall to them the memory of the innocence that they had tarnished. They wondered how one so charming and graceful as he was could have escaped the stain of an age that was at once sordid and sensual.

Often, on returning home from one of those mysterious and prolonged absences that gave rise to such strange conjecture among those who were his friends, or thought that they were so, he himself would creep upstairs to the locked room, open the door with the key that never left him now, and stand, with a mirror, in front of the portrait that Basil Hallward had painted of him, looking now at the evil and aging face on the canvas, and now at the fair young face that laughed back at him from the polished glass. The very sharpness of the contrast used to quicken his sense of pleasure. He grew more and more enamoured of his own beauty, more and more interested in the corruption of his own soul. He would examine with minute care, and sometimes with a monstrous and terrible delight, the hideous lines that seared the wrinkling forehead or crawled around the heavy sensual mouth, wondering sometimes which were the more horrible, the signs of sin or the signs of age. He would place his white hands beside the coarse bloated hands of the picture, and smile. He mocked the misshapen body and the failing limbs.

There were moments, indeed, at night, when, lying sleepless in his own delicately-scented chamber, or in the sordid room of the little ill-famed tavern near the Docks,* which, under an assumed name, and in disguise, it was his habit to frequent, he would think of the ruin he had brought upon his soul, with a pity that was all the more poignant because it was purely selfish. But moments such as these were rare. That curiosity about life which Lord Henry had first stirred in him, as they sat together in the garden of their friend, seemed to increase with gratification. The more he knew, the more he desired to know. He had mad hungers that grew more ravenous as he fed them.

Yet he was not really reckless, at any rate in his relations to society. Once or twice every month during the winter, and on each Wednesday evening while the season* lasted, he would throw open to the world his beautiful house and have the most celebrated musicians of the day to charm his guests with the wonders of their art. His little dinners, in the settling of which Lord Henry always assisted him, were noted as much for the careful selection and placing of those invited, as for the exquisite taste shown in the decoration of the table, with its subtle symphonic arrangements of exotic flowers, and embroidered cloths, and antique plate of gold and silver. Indeed, there were many, especially among the very young men, who saw, or fancied that they saw, in Dorian Gray the true realization of a type of which they had often dreamed in Eton or Oxford days, a type that was to combine something of the real culture of the scholar with all the grace and distinction and perfect manner of a citizen of the world. To them he seemed to be of the company of those whom Dante describes as having sought to 'make themselves perfect by the worship of beauty.*' Like Gautier, he was one for whom 'the visible world existed.*'

And, certainly, to him Life itself was the first, the greatest, of the arts, and for it all the other arts seemed to be but a preparation. Fashion, by which what is really fantastic becomes for a moment universal, and Dandyism, which, in its own way, is an attempt to assert the absolute modernity of beauty,* had, of course, their fascination for him. His mode of dressing, and the particular styles that from time to time he affected, had their marked influence on the young exquisites of the Mayfair balls* and Pall Mall club windows,* who copied him in everything that he did, and tried to reproduce the accidental charm of his graceful, though to him only half-serious, fopperies.

For, while he was but too ready to accept the position that was almost immediately offered to him on his coming of age, and found, indeed, a subtle pleasure in the thought that he might really become to the London of his own day what to imperial Neronian Rome the author of the 'Satyricon'* once had been, yet in his inmost heart he desired to be something more than a mere arbiter elegantiarum,* to be consulted on the wearing of a jewel, or the knotting of a necktie,* or the conduct of a cane. He sought to elaborate some new scheme of life that would have its reasoned philosophy and its ordered principles, and find in the spiritualizing of the senses its highest realization.

The worship of the senses has often, and with much justice, been decried, men feeling a natural instinct of terror about passions and sensations that seem stronger than themselves, and that they are conscious of sharing with the less highly organized forms of existence. But it appeared to Dorian Gray that the true nature of the senses had never been understood, and that they had remained savage and animal merely because the world had sought to starve them into submission or to kill them by pain, instead of aiming at making them elements of a new spirituality, of which a fine instinct for beauty was to be the dominant characteristic. As he looked back upon man moving through History, he was haunted by a feeling of loss. So much had been surrendered! and to such little purpose! There had been mad wilful rejections, monstrous forms of self-torture and self-denial, whose origin was fear, and whose result was a degradation infinitely more terrible than that fancied degradation from which, in their ignorance, they had sought to escape, Nature, in her wonderful irony, driving out the anchorite to feed with the wild animals of the desert and giving to the hermit the beasts of the field as his companions.

Yes: there was to be, as Lord Henry had prophesied, a new Hedonism that was to recreate life, and to save it from that harsh, uncomely puritanism that is having, in our own day, its curious revival. It was to have its service of the intellect, certainly; yet, it was never to accept any theory or system that would involve the sacrifice of any mode of passionate experience. Its aim, indeed, was to be experience itself, and not the fruits of experience,* sweet or bitter as they might be. Of the asceticism that deadens the senses, as of the vulgar profligacy that dulls them, it was to know nothing. But it was to teach man to concentrate himself upon the moments of a life that is itself but a moment.*

There are few of us who have not sometimes wakened before dawn, either after one of those dreamless nights that make us almost enamoured of death, or one of those nights of horror and misshapen joy, when through the chambers of the brain sweep phantoms more terrible than reality itself, and instinct with that vivid life that lurks in all grotesques, and that lends to Gothic art* its enduring vitality, this art being, one might fancy, especially the art of those whose minds have been troubled with the malady of reverie. Gradually white fingers creep through the curtains, and they appear to tremble. In black fantastic shapes, dumb shadows crawl into the corners of the room, and crouch there. Outside, there is the stirring of birds among the leaves, or the sound of men going forth to their work, or the sigh and sob of the wind coming down from the hills, and wandering round the silent house, as though it feared to wake the sleepers, and yet must needs call forth sleep from her purple cave.* Veil after veil of thin dusky gauze is lifted, and by degrees the forms and colours of things are restored to them, and we watch the dawn remaking the world in its antique pattern. The wan mirrors get back their mimic life. The flameless tapers stand where we had left them, and beside them lies the half-cut book that we had been studying, or the wired flower that we had worn at the ball, or the letter that we had been afraid to read, or that we had read too often. Nothing seems to us changed. Out of the unreal shadows of the night comes back the real life that we had known. We have to resume it where we had left off, and there steals over us a terrible sense of the necessity for the continuance of energy in the same wearisome round of stereotyped habits, or a wild longing, it may be, that our eyelids might open some morning upon a world that had been refashioned anew in the darkness for our pleasure, a world in which things would have fresh shapes and colours, and be changed, or have other secrets, a world in which the past would have little or no place, or survive, at any rate, in no conscious form of obligation or regret, the remembrance even of joy having its bitterness, and the memories of pleasure their pain.

It was the creation of such worlds as these that seemed to Dorian Gray to be the true object, or amongst the true objects, of life; and in his search for sensations that would be at once new and delightful, and possess that element of strangeness that is so essential to romance, he would often adopt certain modes of thought that he knew to be really alien to his nature, abandon himself to their subtle influences, and then, having, as it were, caught their colour and satisfied his intellectual curiosity, leave them with that curious indifference that is not incompatible with a real ardour of temperament, and that indeed, according to certain modern psychologists, is often a condition of it.*

It was rumoured of him once that he was about to join the Roman Catholic communion;* and certainly the Roman ritual had always a great attraction for him. The daily sacrifice, more awful really than all the sacrifices of the antique world, stirred him as much by its superb rejection of the evidence of the senses as by the primitive simplicity of its elements and the eternal pathos of the human tragedy that it sought to symbolize. He loved to kneel down on the cold marble pavement, and watch the priest, in his stiff flowered dalmatic,* slowly and with white hands moving aside the veil of the tabernacle, or raising aloft the jewelled lantern-shaped monstrance* with that pallid wafer that at times, one would fain think, is indeed the 'panis coelestis,'* the bread of angels, or, robed in the garments of the Passion of Christ, breaking the Host into the chalice, and smiting his breast for his sins. The fuming censers, that the grave boys, in their lace and scarlet,* tossed into the air like great gilt flowers, had their subtle fascination for him. As he passed out, he used to look with wonder at the black confessionals,* and long to sit in the dim shadow of one of them and listen to men and women whispering through the worn grating the true story of their lives.

But he never fell into the error of arresting his intellectual development by any formal acceptance of creed or system, or of mistaking, for a house in which to live, an inn that is but suitable for the sojourn of a night, or for a few hours of a night in which there are no stars and the moon is in travail. Mysticism, with its marvellous power of making common things strange to us, and the subtle anti-nomianism* that always seems to accompany it, moved him for a season; and for a season he inclined to the materialistic doctrines of the Darwinismus movement in Germany,* and found a curious pleasure in tracing the thoughts and passions of men to some pearly cell in the brain, or some white nerve in the body, delighting in the conception of the absolute dependence of the spirit on certain physical conditions, morbid or healthy, normal or diseased. Yet, as has been said of him before, no theory of life seemed to him to be of any importance compared with life itself. He felt keenly conscious of how barren all intellectual speculation is when separated from action and experiment. He knew that the senses, no less than the soul, have their spiritual mysteries to reveal.

And so he would now study perfumes, and the secrets of their manufacture, distilling heavily-scented oils, and burning odorous gums from the East. He saw that there was no mood of the mind that had not its counterpart in the sensuous life, and set himself to discover their true relations, wondering what there was in frankincense that made one mystical, and in ambergris that stirred one's passions, and in violets that woke the memory of dead romances, and in musk that troubled the brain, and in champak* that stained the imagination; and seeking often to elaborate a real psychology of perfumes, and to estimate the several influences of sweet-smelling roots, and scented pollen-laden flowers, of aromatic balms, and of dark and fragrant woods, of spikenard* that sickens, of hovenia* that makes men mad, and of aloe that are said to be able to expel melancholy from the soul.

At another time he devoted himself entirely to music, and in a long latticed room, with a vermilion-and-gold ceiling and walls of olive-green lacquer, he used to give curious concerts in which mad gypsies tore wild music from little zithers, or grave yellow-shawled Tunisians plucked at the strained strings of monstrous lutes, while grinning negroes beat monotonously upon copper drums, and, crouching upon scarlet mats, slim turbaned Indians blew through long pipes of reed or brass, and charmed, or feigned to charm, great hooded snakes and horrible horned adders. The harsh intervals and shrill discords of barbaric music stirred him at times when Schubert's grace, and Chopin's beautiful sorrows, and the mighty harmonies of Beethoven himself, fell unheeded on his ear. He collected together from all parts of the world the strangest instruments that could be found, either in the tombs of dead nations or among the few savage tribes that have survived contact with Western civilizations, and loved to touch and try them. He had the mysterious juruparis of the Rio Negro Indians,* that women are not allowed to look at, and that even youths may not see till they have been subjected to fasting and scourging, and the earthen jars of the Peruvians that have the shrill cries of birds, and flutes of human bones such as Alfonso de Ovalle heard in Chili, and the sonorous green jaspers that are found near Cuzco and give forth a note of singular sweetness. He had painted gourds filled with pebbles that rattled when they were shaken; the long clarin of the Mexicans, into which the performer does not blow, but through which he inhales the air; the harsh turé of the Amazon tribes, that is sounded by the sentinels who sit all day long in high trees, and can be heard, it is said, at a distance of three leagues; the teponaztli, that has two vibrating tongues of wood, and is beaten with sticks that are smeared with an elastic gum obtained from the milky juice of plants; the yotl-bells of the Aztecs, that are hung in clusters like grapes; and a huge cylindrical drum, covered with the skins of great serpents, like the one that Bernal Diaz saw when he went with Cortes into the Mexican temple, and of whose doleful sound he has left us so vivid a description. The fantastic character of these instruments fascinated him, and he felt a curious delight in the thought that Art, like Nature, has her monsters, things of bestial shape and with hideous voices. Yet, after some time, he wearied of them, and would sit in his box at the Opera, either alone or with Lord Henry, listening in rapt pleasure to 'Tannhäuser,' and seeing in the prelude to that great work of art* a presentation of the tragedy of his own soul.

On one occasion he took up the study of jewels, and appeared at a costume ball as Anne de Joyeuse,* Admiral of France, in a dress covered with five hundred and sixty pearls. This taste enthralled him for years, and, indeed, may be said never to have left him. He would often spend a whole day settling and resettling in their cases the various stones that he had collected, such as the olive-green chrysoberyl* that turns red by lamplight, the cymophane with its wire-like line of silver, the pistachio-coloured peridot, rose-pink and wine-yellow topazes, carbuncles of fiery scarlet with tremulous four-rayed stars, flame-red cinnamon-stones, orange and violet spinels, and amethysts with their alternate layers of ruby and sapphire. He loved the red gold of the sunstone, and the moonstone's pearly whiteness, and the broken rainbow of the milky opal. He procured from Amsterdam three emeralds of extraordinary size and richness of colour, and had a turquoise de la vieille roche that was the envy of all the connoisseurs.

He discovered wonderful stories, also, about jewels. In Alphonso's 'Clericalis Disciplina' a serpent was mentioned with eyes of real jacinth, and in the romantic history of Alexander, the Conqueror of Emathia was said to have found in the vale of Jordan snakes 'with collars of real emeralds growing on their backs.' There was a gem in the brain of the dragon, Philostratus told us, and 'by the exhibition of golden letters and a scarlet robe' the monster could be thrown into a magical sleep, and slain.* According to the great alchemist, Pierre de Boniface, the diamond rendered a man invisible, and the agate of India made him eloquent. The cornelian appeased anger, and the hyacinth provoked sleep, and the amethyst drove away the fumes of wine. The garnet cast out demons, and the hydropicus deprived the moon of her colour. The selenite waxed and waned with the moon, and the meloceus, that discovers thieves, could be affected only by the blood of kids. Leonardus Camillus had seen a white stone taken from the brain of a newly-killed toad, that was a certain antidote against poison. The bezoar, that was found in the heart of the Arabian deer, was a charm that could cure the plague. In the nests of Arabian birds was the aspilates, that, according to Democritus, kept the wearer from any danger by fire.

The King of Ceilan rode through his city with a large ruby in his hand, at the ceremony of his coronation. The gates of the palace of John the Priest were 'made of sardius, with the horn of the horned snake inwrought, so that no man might bring poison within.' Over the gable were 'two golden apples, in which were two carbuncles,' so that the gold might shine by day, and the carbuncles by night. In Lodge's strange romance 'A Margarite of America' it was stated that in the chamber of the queen one could behold 'all the chaste ladies of the world, inched out of silver, looking through fair mirrours of chrysolites, carbuncles, sapphires, and greene emeraults.' Marco Polo had seen the inhabitants of Zipangu place rose-coloured pearls in the mouths of the dead. A sea-monster had been enamoured of the pearl that the diver brought to King Perozes, and had slain the thief, and mourned for seven moons over its loss. When the Huns lured the king into the great pit, he flung it away—Procopius tells the story—nor was it ever found again, though the Emperor Anastasius offered five hundred-weight of gold pieces for it. The King of Malabar had shown to a certain Venetian a rosary of three hundred and four pearls, one for every god that he worshipped.

When the Duke de Valentinois, son of Alexander VI., visited Louis XII. of France, his horse was loaded with gold leaves, according to Brantôme, and his cap had double rows of rubies that threw out a great light. Charles of England had ridden in stirrups hung with four hundred and twenty-one diamonds. Richard II. had a coat, valued at thirty thousand marks, which was covered with balas rubies. Hall described Henry VIII., on his way to the Tower previous to his coronation, as wearing 'a jacket of raised gold, the placard embroidered with diamonds and other rich stones, and a great bawderike about his neck of large balasses.' The favourites of James I. wore ear-rings of emeralds set in gold filigrane. Edward II. gave to Piers Gaveston a suit of red-gold armour studded with jacinths, a collar of gold roses set with turquoise-stones, and a skull-cap parsemé with pearls.* Henry II. wore jewelled gloves reaching to the elbow, and had a hawk-glove sewn with twelve rubies and fifty-two great orients. The ducal hat of Charles the Rash, the last Duke of Burgundy of his race, was hung with pear-shaped pearls, and studded with sapphires.

How exquisite life had once been! How gorgeous in its pomp and decoration! Even to read of the luxury of the dead was wonderful.

Then he turned his attention to embroideries,* and to the tapestries that performed the office of frescoes in the chill rooms of the Northern nations of Europe. As he investigated the subject—and he always had an extraordinary faculty of becoming absolutely absorbed for the moment in whatever he took up—he was almost saddened by the reflection of the ruin that Time brought on beautiful and wonderful things. He, at any rate, had escaped that. Summer followed summer, and the yellow jonquils* bloomed and died many times, and nights of horror repeated the story of their shame, but he was unchanged. No winter marred his face or stained his flower-like bloom. How different it was with material things! Where had they passed to? Where was the great crocus-coloured robe, on which the gods fought against the giants, that had been worked by brown girls for the pleasure of Athena? Where, the huge velarium that Nero had stretched across the Colosseum at Rome, that Titan sail of purple on which was represented the starry sky, and Apollo driving a chariot drawn by white gilt-reined steeds? He longed to see the curious table-napkins wrought for the Priest of the Sun, on which were displayed all the dainties and viands that could be wanted for a feast; the mortuary cloth of King Chilperic, with its three hundred golden bees; the fantastic robes that excited the indignation of the Bishop of Pontus, and were figured with ‘lions, panthers, bears, dogs, forests, rocks, hunters—all, in fact, that a painter can copy from nature’; and the coat that Charles of Orleans once wore, on the sleeves of which were embroidered the verses of a song beginning ‘Madame, je suis tout joyeux,’ the musical accompaniment of the words being wrought in gold thread, and each note, of square shape in those days, formed with four pearls. He read of the room that was prepared at the palace at Rheims for the use of Queen Joan of Burgundy, and was decorated with ‘thirteen hundred and twenty-one parrots, made in broidery, and blazoned with the king’s arms, and five hundred and sixty-one butterflies, whose wings were similarly ornamented with the arms of the queen, the whole worked in gold.’ Catherine de Médicis had a mourning-bed made for her of black velvet powdered with crescents and suns. Its curtains were of damask, with leafy wreaths and garlands, figured upon a gold and silver ground, and fringed along the edges with broideries of pearls, and it stood in a room hung with rows of the queen’s devices in cut black velvet upon cloth of silver. Louis XIV. had gold-embroidered caryatides fifteen feet high in his apartment. The state bed of Sobieski, King of Poland, was made of Smyrna gold brocade embroidered in turquoises with verses from the Koran. Its supports were of silver gilt, beautifully chased, and profusely set with enamelled and jewelled medallions. It had been taken from the Turkish camp before Vienna, and the standard of Mohammed had stood beneath the tremulous gilt of its canopy.*

And so, for a whole year, he sought to accumulate the most exquisite specimens that he could find of textile and embroidered work, getting the dainty Delhi muslins, finely wrought with gold-thread palmates, and stitched over with iridescent beetles' wings; the Dacca gauzes, that from their transparency are known in the East as 'woven air,' and 'running water,' and 'evening dew'; strange figured cloths from Java; elaborate yellow Chinese hangings; books bound in tawny satins or fair blue silks, and wrought with fleurs de lys, birds, and images; veils of lacis worked in Hungary point;* Sicilian brocades, and stiff Spanish velvets; Georgian work* with its gilt coins, and Japanese Foukousas* with their green-toned golds and their marvellously-plumaged birds.

He had a special passion, also, for ecclesiastical vestments, as indeed he had for everything connected with the service of the Church. In the long cedar chests that lined the west gallery of his house he had stored away many rare and beautiful specimens of what is really the raiment of the Bride of Christ,* who must wear purple and jewels and fine linen that she may hide the pallid macerated body that is worn by the suffering that she seeks for, and wounded by self-inflicted pain. He possessed a gorgeous cope of crimson silk and gold-thread damask, figured with a repeating pattern of golden pomegranates set in six-petalled formal blossoms, beyond which on either side was the pine-apple device wrought in seed-pearls. The orphreys were divided into panels representing scenes from the life of the Virgin, and the coronation of the Virgin was figured in coloured silks upon the hood. This was Italian work of the fifteenth century. Another cope was of green velvet, embroidered with heart-shaped groups of acanthus-leaves, from which spread long-stemmed white blossoms, the details of which were picked out with silver thread and coloured crystals. The morse bore a seraph's head in gold-thread raised work. The orphreys were woven in a diaper of red and gold silk, and were starred with medallions of many saints and martyrs, among whom was St. Sebastian.* He had chasubles, also, of amber-coloured silk, and blue silk and gold brocade, and yellow silk damask and cloth of gold, figured with representations of the Passion and Crucifixion of Christ, and embroidered with lions and peacocks and other emblems; dalmatics of white satin and pink silk damask, decorated with tulips and dolphins and fleurs de lys; altar frontals of crimson velvet and blue linen; and many corporals, chalice-veils, and sudaria.* In the mystic offices to which such things were put, there was something that quickened his imagination.

For these treasures, and everything that he collected in his lovely house, were to be to him means of forgetfulness, modes by which he could escape, for a season, from the fear that seemed to him at times to be almost too great to be borne. Upon the walls of the lonely locked room where he had spent so much of his boyhood, he had hung with his own hands the terrible portrait whose changing features showed him the real degradation of his life, and in front of it had draped the purple-and-gold pall as a curtain. For weeks he would not go there, would forget the hideous painted thing, and get back his light heart, his wonderful joyousness, his passionate absorption in mere existence. Then, suddenly, some night he would creep out of the house, go down to dreadful places near Blue Gate Fields,* and stay there, day after day, until he was driven away. On his return he would sit in front of the picture, sometimes loathing it and himself, but filled, at other times, with that pride of individualism that is half the fascination of sin, and smiling, with secret pleasure, at the misshapen shadow that had to bear the burden that should have been his own.

After a few years he could not endure to be long out of England, and gave up the villa that he had shared at Trouville* with Lord Henry, as well as the little white walled-in house at Algiers where they had more than once spent the winter. He hated to be separated from the picture that was such a part of his life, and was also afraid that during his absence some one might gain access to the room, in spite of the elaborate bars that he had caused to be placed upon the door.

He was quite conscious that this would tell them nothing. It was true that the portrait still preserved, under all the foulness and ugliness of the face, its marked likeness to himself; but what could they learn from that? He would laugh at any one who tried to taunt him. He had not painted it. What was it to him how vile and full of shame it looked? Even if he told them, would they believe it?

Yet he was afraid. Sometimes when he was down at his great house in Nottinghamshire, entertaining the fashionable young men of his own rank who were his chief companions, and astounding the country by the wanton luxury and gorgeous splendour of his mode of life, he would suddenly leave his guests and rush back to town to see that the door had not been tampered with, and that the picture was still there. What if it should be stolen? The mere thought made him cold with horror. Surely the world would know his secret then. Perhaps the world already suspected it.

For, while he fascinated many, there were not a few who distrusted him. He was very nearly blackballed at a West End club of which his birth and social position fully entitled him to become a member, and it was said that on one occasion, when he was brought by a friend into the smoking-room of the Churchill,* the Duke of Berwick and another gentleman got up in a marked manner and went out. Curious stories became current about him after he had passed his twenty-fifth year. It was rumoured that he had been seen brawling with foreign sailors in a low den in the distant parts of Whitechapel, and that he consorted with thieves and coiners* and knew the mysteries of their trade. His extraordinary absences became notorious, and, when he used to reappear again in society, men would whisper to each other in corners, or pass him with a sneer, or look at him with cold searching eyes, as though they were determined to discover his secret.

Of such insolences and attempted slights he, of course, took no notice, and in the opinion of most people his frank debonnair manner, his charming boyish smile, and the infinite grace of that wonderful youth that seemed never to leave him, were in themselves a sufficient answer to the calumnies, for so they termed them, that were circulated about him. It was remarked, however, that some of those who had been most intimate with him appeared, after a time, to shun him. Women who had wildly adored him, and for his sake had braved all social censure and set convention at defiance, were seen to grow pallid with shame or horror if Dorian Gray entered the room.

Yet these whispered scandals only increased, in the eyes of many, his strange and dangerous charm. His great wealth was a certain element of security. Society, civilized society at least, is never very ready to believe anything to the detriment of those who are both rich and fascinating. It feels instinctively that manners are of more importance than morals,* and, in its opinion, the highest respectability is of much less value than the possession of a good chef. And, after all, it is a very poor consolation to be told that the man who has given one a bad dinner, or poor wine, is irreproachable in his private life. Even the cardinal virtues cannot atone for half-cold entrées, as Lord Henry remarked once, in a discussion on the subject; and there is possibly a good deal to be said for his view. For the canons of good society are, or should be, the same as the canons of art. Form is absolutely essential to it. It should have the dignity of a ceremony, as well as its unreality, and should combine the insincere character of a romantic play with the wit and beauty that make such plays delightful to us. Is insincerity such a terrible thing? I think not. It is merely a method by which we can multiply our personalities.*

Such, at any rate, was Dorian Gray's opinion. He used to wonder at the shallow psychology of those who conceive the Ego in man as a thing simple, permanent, reliable, and of one essence. To him, man was a being with myriad lives and myriad sensations, a complex multiform* creature that bore within itself strange legacies of thought and passion, and whose very flesh was tainted with the monstrous maladies of the dead. He loved to stroll through the gaunt cold picture-gallery of his country house and look at the various portraits of those whose blood flowed in his veins. Here was Philip Herbert, described by Francis Osborne, in his 'Memoires on the Reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James,'* as one who was 'caressed by the Court for his handsome face, which kept him not long company.' Was it young Herbert's life that he sometimes led? Had some strange poisonous germ crept from body to body till it had reached his own? Was it some dim sense of that ruined grace that had made him so suddenly, and almost without cause, give utterance, in Basil Hallward's studio, to the mad prayer that had so changed his life? Here, in gold-embroidered red doublet, jewelled surcoat,* and gilt-edged ruff and wrist-bands, stood Sir Anthony Sherard,* with his silver-and-black armour piled at his feet. What had this man's legacy been? Had the lover of Giovanna of Naples* bequeathed him some inheritance of sin and shame? Were his own actions merely the dreams that the dead man had not dared to realize? Here, from the fading canvas, smiled Lady Elizabeth Devereux,* in her gauze hood, pearl stomacher,* and pink slashed sleeves. A flower was in her right hand, and her left clasped an enamelled collar of white and damask roses. On a table by her side lay a mandolin and an apple. There were large green rosettes upon her little pointed shoes. He knew her life, and the strange stories that were told about her lovers. Had he something of her temperament in him? These oval heavy-lidded eyes seemed to look curiously at him. What of George Willoughby, with his powdered hair and fantastic patches? How evil he looked! The face was saturnine and swarthy, and the sensual lips seemed to be twisted with disdain. Delicate lace ruffles fell over the lean yellow hands that were so overladen with rings. He had been a macaroni* of the eighteenth century, and the friend, in his youth, of Lord Ferrars. What of the second Lord Beckenham, the companion of the Prince Regent* in his wildest days, and one of the witnesses at the secret marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert? How proud and handsome he was, with his chestnut curls and insolent pose! What passions had he bequeathed? The world had looked upon him as infamous. He had led the orgies at Carlton House.* The star of the Garter glittered upon his breast. Beside him hung the portrait of his wife, a pallid, thin-lipped woman in black. Her blood, also, stirred within him. How curious it all seemed! And his mother with her Lady Hamilton* face, and her moist wine-dashed lips—he knew what he had got from her. He had got from her his beauty, and his passion for the beauty of others. She laughed at him in her loose Bacchante dress. There were vine leaves in her hair. The purple spilled from the cup she was holding. The carnations of the painting had withered, but the eyes were still wonderful in their depth and brilliancy of colour. They seemed to follow him wherever he went.

Yet one had ancestors in literature, as well as in one's own race, nearer perhaps in type and temperament, many of them, and certainly with an influence of which one was more absolutely conscious. There were times when it appeared to Dorian Gray that the whole of history was merely the record of his own life, not as he had lived it in act and circumstance, but as his imagination had created it for him, as it had been in his brain and in his passions. He felt that he had known them all, those strange terrible figures that had passed across the stage of the world and made sin so marvellous and evil so full of subtlety. It seemed to him that in some mysterious way their lives had been his own.

The hero of the wonderful novel that had so influenced his life had himself known this curious fancy. In the seventh chapter* he tells how, crowned with laurel, lest lightning might strike him, he had sat, as Tiberius, in a garden at Capri, reading the shameful books of Elephantis,* while dwarfs and peacocks strutted round him and the flute-player mocked the swinger of the censer; and, as Caligula,* had caroused with the green-shirted jockeys in their stables, and supped in an ivory manger with a jewel-frontleted horse; and, as Domitian,* had wandered through a corridor lined with marble mirrors, looking round with haggard eyes for the reflection of the dagger that was to end his days, and sick with that ennui, that terrible tædium vitæ,* that comes on those to whom life denies nothing; and had peered through a clear emerald at the red shambles of the Circus, and then, in a litter of pearl and purple drawn by silver-shod mules, been carried through the Street of Pomegranates to a House of Gold, and heard men cry on Nero Cæsar* as he passed by; and, as Elagabalus,* had painted his face with colours, and plied the distaff among the women, and brought the Moon from Carthage, and given her in mystic marriage to the Sun.

Over and over again Dorian used to read this fantastic chapter, and the two chapters immediately following, in which, as in some curious tapestries or cunningly-wrought enamels, were pictured the awful and beautiful forms of those whom Vice and Blood and Weariness had made monstrous or mad: Filippo, Duke of Milan,* who slew his wife, and painted her lips with a scarlet poison that her lover might suck death from the dead thing he fondled; Pietro Barbi,* the Venetian, known as Paul the Second, who sought in his vanity to assume the title of Formosus, and whose tiara, valued at two hundred thousand florins, was bought at the price of a terrible sin; Gian Maria Visconti,* who used hounds to chase living men, and whose murdered body was covered with roses by a harlot who had loved him; the Borgia on his white horse, with Fratricide riding beside him, and his mantle stained with the blood of Perotto,* Pietro Riario,* the young Cardinal Archbishop of Florence, child and minion of Sixtus IV.,* whose beauty was equalled only by his debauchery, and who received Leonora of Aragon in a pavilion of white and crimson silk, filled with nymphs and centaurs, and gilded a boy that he might serve at the feast as Ganymede or Hylas;* Ezzelin,* whose melancholy could be cured only by the spectacle of death, and who had a passion for red blood, as other men have for red wine—the son of the Fiend, as was reported, and one who had cheated his father at dice when gambling with him for his own soul; Giambattista Cibo,* who in mockery took the name of Innocent, and into whose torpid veins the blood of three lads was infused by a Jewish doctor; Sigismondo Malatesta,* the lover of Isotta, and the lord of Rimini, whose effigy was burned at Rome as the enemy of God and man, who strangled Polyssena with a napkin, and gave poison to Ginevra d'Este in a cup of emerald, and in honour of a shameful passion built a pagan church for Christian worship; Charles VI.,* who had so wildly adored his brother's wife that a leper had warned him of the insanity that was coming on him, and who, when his brain had sickened and grown strange, could only be soothed by Saracen cards* painted with the images of Love and Death and Madness; and, in his trimmed jerkin and jewelled cap and acanthus-like curls, Grifonetto Baglioni, who slew Astorre with his bride, and Simonetto* with his page, and whose comeliness was such that, as he lay dying in the yellow piazza of Perugia, those who had hated him could not choose but weep, and Atalanta, who had cursed him, blessed him.

There was a horrible fascination in them all. He saw them at night, and they troubled his imagination in the day. The Renaissance knew of strange manners of poisoning—poisoning by a helmet and a lighted torch, by an embroidered glove and a jewelled fan, by a gilded pomander and by an amber chain. Dorian Gray had been poisoned by a book. There were moments when he looked on evil simply as a mode through which he could realize his conception of the beautiful.

CHAPTER XII

It was on the ninth of November, the eve of his own thirty-eighth birthday, as he often remembered afterwards.

He was walking home about eleven o'clock from Lord Henry's, where he had been dining, and was wrapped in heavy furs, as the night was cold and foggy. At the corner of Grosvenor Square* and South Audley Street a man passed him in the mist, walking very fast, and with the collar of his grey ulster* turned up. He had a bag in his hand. Dorian recognized him. It was Basil Hallward. A strange sense of fear, for which he could not account, came over him. He made no sign of recognition, and went on quickly, in the direction of his own house.

But Hallward had seen him. Dorian heard him first stopping on the pavement and then hurrying after him. In a few moments his hand was on his arm.

‘Dorian! What an extraordinary piece of luck! I have been waiting for you in your library ever since nine o’clock. Finally I took pity on your tired servant, and told him to go to bed, as he let me out. I am off to Paris by the midnight train, and I particularly wanted to see you before I left. I thought it was you, or rather your fur coat, as you passed me. But I wasn’t quite sure. Didn’t you recognize me?’

‘In this fog, my dear Basil? Why, I can’t even recognize Grosvenor Square. I believe my house is somewhere about here, but I don’t feel at all certain about it. I am sorry you are going away, as I have not seen you for ages. But I suppose you will be back soon?’

‘No: I am going to be out of England for six months. I intend to take a studio in Paris, and shut myself up till I have finished a great picture I have in my head. However, it wasn’t about myself I wanted to talk. Here we are at your door. Let me come in for a moment. I have something to say to you.’

‘I shall be charmed. But won’t you miss your train?’ said Dorian Gray, languidly, as he passed up the steps and opened the door with his latch-key.

The lamp-light struggled out through the fog, and Hallward looked at his watch. ‘I have heaps of time,’ he answered. ‘The train doesn’t go till twelve-fifteen, and it is only just eleven. In fact, I was on my way to the club to look for you, when I met you. You see, I shan’t have any delay about luggage, as I have sent on my heavy things. All I have with me is in this bag, and I can easily get to Victoria* in twenty minutes.’

Dorian looked at him and smiled. ‘What a way for a fashionable painter to travel! A Gladstone bag,* and an ulster! Come in, or the fog will get into the house. And mind you don’t talk about anything serious. Nothing is serious nowadays. At least nothing should be.’

Hallward shook his head, as he entered, and followed Dorian into the library. There was a bright wood fire blazing in the large open hearth. The lamps were lit, and an open Dutch silver spirit-case* stood, with some siphons of soda-water and large cut-glass tumblers, on a little marqueterie table.

‘You see your servant made me quite at home, Dorian. He gave me everything I wanted, including your best gold-tipped cigarettes. He is a most hospitable creature. I like him much better than the Frenchman you used to have. What has become of the Frenchman, by the bye?’

Dorian shrugged his shoulders. ‘I believe he married Lady Radley’s maid, and has established her in Paris as an English dressmaker. Anglomanie* is very fashionable over there now, I hear. It seems silly of the French, doesn’t it? But—do you know?—he was not at all a bad servant. I never liked him, but I had nothing to complain about. One often imagines things that are quite absurd. He was really very devoted to me, and seemed quite sorry when he went away. Have another brandy-and-soda? Or would you like hock-and-seltzer?† I always take hock-and-seltzer myself. There is sure to be some in the next room’.

‘Thanks, I won’t have anything more,’ said the painter, taking his cap and coat off, and throwing them on the bag that he had placed in the corner. ‘And now, my dear fellow, I want to speak to you seriously. Don’t frown like that. You make it so much more difficult for me.’

‘What is it all about?’ cried Dorian, in his petulant way, flinging himself down on the sofa. ‘I hope it is not about myself. I am tired of myself to-night. I should like to be somebody else.’

‘It is about yourself,’ answered Hallward, in his grave, deep voice, ‘and I must say it to you. I shall only keep you half an hour.’

Dorian sighed, and lit a cigarette. ‘Half an hour!’ he murmured.

‘It is not much to ask of you, Dorian, and it is entirely for your own sake that I am speaking. I think it right that you should know that the most dreadful things are being said against you in London.’

‘I don’t wish to know anything about them. I love scandals about other people, but scandals about myself don’t interest me. They have not got the charm of novelty.’

‘They must interest you, Dorian. Every gentleman is interested in his good name. You don’t want people to talk of you as something vile and degraded. Of course you have your position, and your wealth, and all that kind of thing. But position and wealth are not everything. Mind you, I don’t believe these rumours at all. At least, I can’t believe them when I see you. Sin is a thing that writes itself across a man’s face. It cannot be concealed. People talk sometimes of secret vices. There are no such things. If a wretched man has a vice, it shows itself in the lines of his mouth, the droop of his eyelids, the moulding of his hands even. Somebody—I won't mention his name, but you know him—came to me last year to have his portrait done. I had never seen him before, and had never heard anything about him at the time, though I have heard a good deal since. He offered an extravagant price. I refused him. There was something in the shape of his fingers that I hated. I know now that I was quite right in what I fancied about him. His life is dreadful. But you, Dorian, with your pure, bright, innocent face, and your marvellous untroubled youth—I can't believe anything against you. And yet I see you very seldom, and you never come down to the studio now, and when I am away from you, and I hear all these hideous things that people are whispering about you, I don't know what to say. Why is it, Dorian, that a man like the Duke of Berwick leaves the room of a club when you enter it? Why is it that so many gentlemen in London will neither go to your house nor invite you to theirs? You used to be a friend of Lord Staveley. I met him at dinner last week. Your name happened to come up in conversation, in connection with the miniatures you have lent to the exhibition at the Dudley.* Staveley curled his lip, and said that you might have the most artistic tastes, but that you were a man whom no pure-minded girl should be allowed to know, and whom no chaste woman should sit in the same room with. I reminded him that I was a friend of yours, and asked him what he meant. He told me. He told me right out before everybody. It was horrible! Why is your friendship so fatal to young men? There was that wretched boy in the Guards* who committed suicide. You were his great friend. There was Sir Henry Ashton, who had to leave England, with a tarnished name.* You and he were inseparable. What about Adrian Singleton, and his dreadful end? What about Lord Kent's only son, and his career? I met his father yesterday in St. James's Street.* He seemed broken with shame and sorrow. What about the young Duke of Perth? What sort of life has he got now? What gentleman would associate with him?'

'Stop, Basil. You are talking about things of which you know nothing,' said Dorian Gray, biting his lip, and with a note of infinite contempt in his voice. 'You ask me why Berwick leaves a room when I enter it. It is because I know everything about his life, not because he knows anything about mine. With such blood as he has in his veins, how could his record be clean? You ask me about Henry Ashton and young Perth. Did I teach the one his vices, and the other his debauchery? If Kent's silly son takes his wife from the streets, what is that to me? If Adrian Singleton writes his friend's name across a bill, am I his keeper? I know how people chatter in England. The middle classes air their moral prejudices over their gross dinner-tables, and whisper about what they call the profligacies of their betters in order to try and pretend that they are in smart society, and on intimate terms with the people they slander. In this country it is enough for a man to have distinction and brains for every common tongue to wag against him. And what sort of lives do these people, who pose as being moral, lead themselves? My dear fellow, you forget that we are in the native land of the hypocrite.'

'Dorian,' cried Hallward, 'that is not the question. England is bad enough I know, and English society is all wrong. That is the reason why I want you to be fine. You have not been fine. One has a right to judge of a man by the effect he has over his friends. Yours seem to lose all sense of honour, of goodness, of purity. You have filled them with a madness for pleasure. They have gone down into the depths.* You led them there. Yes: you led them there, and yet you can smile, as you are smiling now. And there is worse behind. I know you and Harry are inseparable. Surely for that reason, if for none other, you should not have made his sister's name a by-word.'

'Take care, Basil. You go too far.'

'I must speak, and you must listen. You shall listen. When you met Lady Gwendolen, not a breath of scandal had ever touched her. Is there a single decent woman in London now who would drive with her in the Park? Why, even her children are not allowed to live with her. Then there are other stories—stories that you have been seen creeping at dawn out of dreadful houses and slinking in disguise into the foulest dens in London. Are they true? Can they be true? When I first heard them, I laughed. I hear them now, and they make me shudder. What about your country house, and the life that is led there? Dorian, you don't know what is said about you. I won't tell you that I don't want to preach to you. I remember Harry saying once that every man who turned himself into an amateur curate for the moment always began by saying that, and then proceeded to break his word. I do want to preach to you. I want you to lead such a life as will make the world respect you. I want you to have a clean name and a fair record. I want you to get rid of the dreadful people you associate with. Don't shrug your shoulders like that. Don't be so indifferent. You have a wonderful influence. Let it be for good, not for evil. They say that you corrupt every one with whom you become intimate, and that it is quite sufficient for you to enter a house, for shame of some kind to follow after. I don't know whether it is so or not. How should I know? But it is said of you. I am told things that it seems impossible to doubt. Lord Gloucester was one of my greatest friends at Oxford. He showed me a letter that his wife had written to him when she was dying alone in her villa at Mentone.* Your name was implicated in the most terrible confession I ever read. I told him that it was absurd—that I knew you thoroughly, and that you were incapable of anything of the kind. Know you? I wonder do I know you? Before I could answer that, I should have to see your soul.'

'To see my soul!' muttered Dorian Gray, starting up from the sofa and turning almost white from fear.

'Yes,' answered Hallward, gravely, and with deep-toned sorrow in his voice—'to see your soul. But only God can do that.'

A bitter laugh of mockery broke from the lips of the younger man. 'You shall see it yourself, to-night!' he cried, seizing a lamp from the table. 'Come: it is your own handiwork. Why shouldn't you look at it? You can tell the world all about it afterwards, if you choose. Nobody would believe you. If they did believe you, they would like me all the better for it. I know the age better than you do, though you will prate about it so tediously. Come, I tell you. You have chattered enough about corruption. Now you shall look on it face to face.'

There was the madness of pride in every word he uttered. He stamped his foot upon the ground in his boyish insolent manner. He felt a terrible joy at the thought that some one else was to share his secret, and that the man who had painted the portrait that was the origin of all his shame was to be burdened for the rest of his life with the hideous memory of what he had done.

'Yes,' he continued, coming closer to him, and looking steadfastly into his stern eyes, 'I shall show you my soul. You shall see the thing that you fancy only God can see.'

Hallward started back. 'This is blasphemy, Dorian!' he cried. 'You must not say things like that. They are horrible, and they don't mean anything.'

'You think so?' He laughed again.

'I know so. As for what I said to you to-night, I said it for your good. You know I have been always a staunch friend to you.'

‘Don’t touch me. Finish what you have to say.’

A twisted flash of pain shot across the painter’s face. He paused for a moment, and a wild feeling of pity came over him. After all, what right had he to pry into the life of Dorian Gray? If he had done a tithe* of what was rumoured about him, how much he must have suffered! Then he straightened himself up, and walked over to the fireplace, and stood there, looking at the burning logs with their frost-like ashes and their throbbing cores of flame.

‘I am waiting, Basil,’ said the young man, in a hard, clear voice.

He turned round. ‘What I have to say is this,’ he cried. ‘You must give me some answer to these horrible charges that are made against you. If you tell me that they are absolutely untrue from beginning to end, I shall believe you. Deny them, Dorian, deny them! Can’t you see what I am going through? My God! don’t tell me that you are bad, and corrupt, and shameful.’

Dorian Gray smiled. There was a curl of contempt in his lips. ‘Come upstairs, Basil,’ he said, quietly. ‘I keep a diary of my life from day to day, and it never leaves the room in which it is written. I will show it to you if you come with me.’

‘I will come with you, Dorian, if you wish it. I see I have missed my train. That makes no matter. I can go to-morrow. But don’t ask me to read anything to-night. All I want is a plain answer to my question.’

‘That shall be given to you upstairs. I could not give it here. You will not have to read long.’

CHAPTER XIII

HE passed out of the room, and began the ascent, Basil Hallward following close behind. They walked softly, as men do instinctively at night. The lamp cast fantastic shadows on the wall and staircase. A rising wind made some of the windows rattle.

When they reached the top landing, Dorian set the lamp down on the floor, and taking out the key turned it in the lock. ‘You insist on knowing, Basil?’ he asked, in a low voice.

‘Yes.’

‘I am delighted,’ he answered, smiling. Then he added, somewhat harshly, ‘You are the one man in the world who is entitled to know everything about me. You have had more to do with my life than you think': and, taking up the lamp, he opened the door and went in. A cold current of air passed them, and the light shot up for a moment in a flame of murky orange. He shuddered. 'Shut the door behind you,' he whispered, as he placed the lamp on the table.

Hallward glanced round him, with a puzzled expression. The room looked as if it had not been lived in for years. A faded Flemish tapestry, a curtained picture, an old Italian cassonne, and an almost empty bookcase—that was all that it seemed to contain, besides a chair and a table. As Dorian Gray was lighting a half-burned candle that was standing on the mantelshelf, he saw that the whole place was covered with dust, and that the carpet was in holes. A mouse ran scuffling behind the wainscoting. There was a damp odour of mildew.

'So you think that it is only God who sees the soul, Basil? Draw that curtain back, and you will see mine.'

The voice that spoke was cold and cruel. 'You are mad, Dorian, or playing a part,' muttered Hallward, frowning.

'You won't? Then I must do it myself,' said the young man; and he tore the curtain from its rod, and flung it on the ground.

An exclamation of horror broke from the painter's lips as he saw in the dim light the hideous face on the canvas grinning at him. There was something in its expression that filled him with disgust and loathing. Good heavens! it was Dorian Gray's own face that he was looking at! The horror, whatever it was, had not yet entirely spoiled that marvellous beauty. There was still some gold in the thinning hair and some scarlet on the sensual mouth. The sodden eyes had kept something of the loveliness of their blue, the noble curves had not yet completely passed away from chiselled nostrils and from plastic throat. Yes, it was Dorian himself. But who had done it? He seemed to recognize his own brushwork, and the frame was his own design. The idea was monstrous, yet he felt afraid. He seized the lighted candle, and held it to the picture. In the left-hand corner was his own name, traced in long letters of bright vermilion.

It was some foul parody, some infamous, ignoble satire. He had never done that. Still, it was his own picture. He knew it, and he felt as if his blood had changed in a moment from fire to sluggish ice. His own picture! What did it mean? Why had it altered? He turned, and looked at Dorian Gray with the eyes of a sick man. His mouth twitched, and his parched tongue seemed unable to articulate. He passed his hand across his forehead. It was dank with clammy sweat.

The young man was leaning against the mantelshef, watching him with that strange expression that one sees on the faces of those who are absorbed in a play when some great artist is acting. There was neither real sorrow in it nor real joy. There was simply the passion of the spectator, with perhaps a flicker of triumph in his eyes. He had taken the flower out of his coat, and was smelling it, or pretending to do so.

‘What does this mean?’ cried Hallward, at last. His own voice sounded shrill and curious in his ears.

‘Years ago, when I was a boy,’ said Dorian Gray, crushing the flower in his hand, ‘you met me, flattered me, and taught me to be vain of my good looks. One day you introduced me to a friend of yours, who explained to me the wonder of youth, and you finished a portrait of me that revealed to me the wonder of beauty. In a mad moment, that, even now, I don’t know whether I regret or not, I made a wish, perhaps you would call it a prayer . . .’

‘I remember it! Oh, how well I remember it! No! the thing is impossible. The room is damp. Mildew has got into the canvas. The paints I used had some wretched mineral poison in them. I tell you the thing is impossible.’

‘Ah, what is impossible?’ murmured the young man, going over to the window, and leaning his forehead against the cold, mist-stained glass.

‘You told me you had destroyed it.’

‘I was wrong. It has destroyed me.’

‘I don’t believe it is my picture.’

‘Can’t you see your ideal in it?’ said Dorian, bitterly.

‘My ideal, as you call it . . .’*

‘As you called it.’

‘There was nothing evil in it, nothing shameful. You were to me such an ideal as I shall never meet again. This is the face of a satyr.’

‘It is the face of my soul.’

‘Christ! what a thing I must have worshipped! It has the eyes of a devil.’

‘Each of us has Heaven and Hell in him,* Basil,’ cried Dorian, with a wild gesture of despair.

Hallward turned again to the portrait, and gazed at it. ‘My God! if it is true,' he exclaimed, 'and this is what you have done with your life, why, you must be worse even than those who talk against you fancy you to be!' He held the light up again to the canvas, and examined it. The surface seemed to be quite undisturbed, and as he had left it. It was from within, apparently, that the foulness and horror had come. Through some strange quickening of inner life the leprosy of sin were slowly eating the thing away. The rotting of a corpse in a watery grave was not so fearful.

His hand shook, and the candle fell from its socket on the floor, and lay there sputtering. He placed his foot on it and put it out. Then he flung himself into the rickety chair that was standing by the table and buried his face in his hands.

'Good God, Dorian, what a lesson! what an awful lesson!' There was no answer, but he could hear the young man sobbing at the window. 'Pray, Dorian, pray,' he murmured. 'What is it that one was taught to say in one's boyhood? "Lead us not into temptation. Forgive us our sins.* Wash away our iniquities."* Let us say that together. The prayer of your pride has been answered. The prayer of your repentance will be answered also. I worshipped you too much. I am punished for it. You worshipped yourself too much. We are both punished.'

Dorian Gray turned slowly around, and looked at him with tear-dimmed eyes. 'It is too late, Basil,' he faltered.

'It is never too late, Dorian. Let us kneel down and try if we cannot remember a prayer. Isn't there a verse somewhere, "Though your sins be as scarlet, yet I will make them as white as snow"?'*

'Those words mean nothing to me now.'

'Hush! don't say that. You have done enough evil in your life. My God! don't you see that accursed thing leering at us?'

Dorian Gray glanced at the picture, and suddenly an uncontrollable feeling of hatred for Basil Hallward came over him, as though it had been suggested to him by the image on the canvas, whispered into his ear by those grinning lips. The mad passions of a hunted animal stirred within him, and he loathed the man who was seated at the table, more than in his whole life he had ever loathed anything. He glanced wildly around. Something glimmered on the top of the painted chest that faced him. His eye fell on it. He knew what it was. It was a knife that he had brought up, some days before, to cut a piece of cord, and had forgotten to take away with him. He moved slowly towards it, passing Hallward as he did so. As soon as he got behind him, he seized it, and turned round. Hallward stirred in his chair as if he was going to rise. He rushed at him, and dug the knife into the great vein that is behind the ear, crushing the man's head down on the table, and stabbing again and again.

There was a stifled groan, and the horrible sound of some one choking with blood. Three times the outstretched arms shot up convulsively, waving grotesque stiff-fingered hands in the air. He stabbed him twice more, but the man did not move. Something began to trickle on the floor. He waited for a moment, still pressing the head down. Then he threw the knife on the table, and listened.

He could hear nothing, but the drip, drip on the threadbare carpet. He opened the door and went out on the landing. The house was absolutely quiet. No one was about. For a few seconds he stood bending over the balustrade, and peering down into the black seething well of darkness. Then he took out the key and returned to the room, locking himself in as he did so.

The thing was still seated in the chair, straining over the table with bowed head, and humped back, and long fantastic arms. Had it not been for the red jagged tear in the neck, and the clotted black pool that was slowly widening on the table, one would have said that the man was simply asleep.

How quickly it had all been done! He felt strangely calm, and, walking over to the window, opened it, and stepped out on the balcony. The wind had blown the fog away, and the sky was like a monstrous peacock's tail, starred with myriads of golden eyes. He looked down, and saw the policeman going his rounds and flashing the long beam of his lantern on the doors of the silent houses. The crimson spot of a prowling hansom gleamed at the corner, and then vanished. A woman in a fluttering shawl was creeping slowly by the railings, staggering as she went. Now and then she stopped, and peered back. Once, she began to sing in a hoarse voice. The policeman strolled over and said something to her. She stumbled away, laughing. A bitter blast swept across the Square. The gas-lamps flickered, and became blue, and the leafless trees shook their black iron branches to and fro. He shivered, and went back, closing the window behind him.

Having reached the door, he turned the key, and opened it. He did not even glance at the murdered man. He felt that the secret of the whole thing was not to realize the situation. The friend who had painted the fatal portrait to which all his misery had been due, had gone out of his life. That was enough.

Then he remembered the lamp. It was a rather curious one of Moorish* workmanship, made of dull silver inlaid with arabesques of burnished steel, and studded with coarse turquoises. Perhaps it might be missed by his servant, and questions would be asked. He hesitated for a moment, then he turned back and took it from the table. He could not help seeing the dead thing. How still it was! How horribly white the long hands looked! It was like a dreadful wax image.

Having locked the door behind him, he crept quietly downstairs. The woodwork creaked, and seemed to cry out as if in pain. He stopped several times, and waited. No: everything was still. It was merely the sound of his own footsteps.

When he reached the library, he saw the bag and coat in the corner. They must be hidden away somewhere. He unlocked a secret press that was in the wainscoting, a press in which he kept his own curious disguises, and put them into it. He could easily burn them afterwards. Then he pulled out his watch. It was twenty minutes to two.

He sat down, and began to think. Every year—every month, almost—men were strangled in England for what he had done. There had been a madness of murder in the air. Some red star had come too close to the earth. . . . And yet what evidence was there against him? Basil Hallward had left the house at eleven. No one had seen him come in again. Most of the servants were at Selby Royal. His valet had gone to bed. . . . Paris! Yes. It was to Paris that Basil had gone, and by the midnight train, as he had intended. With his curious reserved habits, it would be months before any suspicions would be aroused. Months! Everything could be destroyed long before then.

A sudden thought struck him. He put on his fur coat and hat, and went out into the hall. There he paused, hearing the slow heavy tread of the policeman on the pavement outside, and seeing the flash of the bull's-eye* reflected in the window. He waited, and held his breath.

After a few moments he drew back the latch, and slipped out, shutting the door very gently behind him. Then he began ringing the bell. In about five minutes his valet appeared, half dressed, and looking very drowsy.

'I am sorry to have had to wake you up, Francis,' he said, stepping in; 'but I had forgotten my latch-key. What time is it?'

'Ten minutes past two, sir,' answered the man, looking at the clock and blinking.

'Ten minutes past two? How horribly late! You must wake me at nine to-morrow. I have some work to do.'

'All right, sir.'

'Did any one call this evening?'

'Mr. Hallward, sir. He stayed here till eleven, and then he went away to catch his train.'

'Oh! I am sorry I didn't see him. Did he leave any message?'

'No, sir, except that he would write to you from Paris, if he did not find you at the club.'

'That will do, Francis. Don't forget to call me at nine to-morrow.'

'No, sir.'

The man shambled down the passage in his slippers.

Dorian Gray threw his hat and coat upon the table, and passed into the library. For a quarter of an hour he walked up and down the room biting his lip, and thinking. Then he took down the Blue Book from one of the shelves, and began to turn over the leaves. 'Alan Campbell, 152, Hertford Street, Mayfair.'* Yes; that was the man he wanted.

CHAPTER XIV

AT nine o'clock the next morning his servant came in with a cup of chocolate on a tray, and opened the shutters. Dorian was sleeping quite peacefully, lying on his right side, with one hand underneath his cheek. He looked like a boy who had been tired out with play, or study.

The man had to touch him twice on the shoulder before he woke, and as he opened his eyes a faint smile passed across his lips, as though he had been lost in some delightful dream. Yet he had not dreamed at all. His night had been untroubled by any images of pleasure or of pain. But youth smiles without any reason. It is one of its chiefest charms.

He turned round, and, leaning upon his elbow, began to sip his chocolate. The mellow November sun came streaming into the room. The sky was bright, and there was a genial warmth in the air. It was almost like a morning in May.

Gradually the events of the preceding night crept with silent blood-stained feet into his brain, and reconstructed themselves there with terrible distinctness. He winced at the memory of all that he had suffered, and for a moment the same curious feeling of loathing for Basil Hallward, that had made him kill him as he sat in the chair, came back to him, and he grew cold with passion. The dead man was still sitting there, too, and in the sunlight now. How horrible that was! Such hideous things were for the darkness, not for the day.

He felt that if he brooded on what he had gone through he would sicken or grow mad. There were sins whose fascination was more in the memory than in the doing of them, strange triumphs that gratified the pride more than the passions, and gave to the intellect a quickened sense of joy, greater than any joy they brought, or could ever bring, to the senses. But this was not one of them. It was a thing to be driven out of the mind, to be drugged with poppies, to be strangled lest it might strangle one itself.

When the half-hour struck, he passed his hand across his forehead, and then got up hastily, and dressed himself with even more than his usual care, giving a good deal of attention to the choice of his necktie and scarf-pin, and changing his rings more than once. He spent a long time also over breakfast, tasting the various dishes, talking to his valet about some new liveries that he was thinking of getting made for the servants at Selby, and going through his correspondence. At some of the letters he smiled. Three of them bored him. One he read several times over, and then tore up with a slight look of annoyance in his face. 'That awful thing, a woman's memory!' as Lord Henry had once said.

After he had drunk his cup of black coffee, he wiped his lips slowly with a napkin, motioned to his servant to wait, and going over to the table sat down and wrote two letters. One he put in his pocket, the other he handed to the valet.

'Take this round to 152, Hertford Street, Francis, and if Mr. Campbell is out of town, get his address.'

As soon as he was alone, he lit a cigarette, and began sketching upon a piece of paper, drawing first flowers, and bits of architecture, and then human faces. Suddenly he remarked that every face that he drew seemed to have a fantastic likeness to Basil Hallward. He frowned, and, getting up, went over to the bookcase and took out a volume at hazard. He was determined that he would not think about what had happened until it became absolutely necessary that he should do so.

When he had stretched himself on the sofa, he looked at the title-page of the book. It was Gautier's 'Émaux et Camées,' a Charpentier's Japanese-paper edition,* with the Jacquemart etching. The binding was of citron-green leather, with a design of gilt trellis-work and dotted pomegranates. It had been given to him by Adrian Singleton. As he turned over the pages his eye fell on the poem about the hand of Lacenaire,* the cold yellow hand 'du supplice encore mal lavée,' with its downy red hairs and its 'doigts de faune.'* He glanced at his own white taper fingers, shuddering slightly in spite of himself, and passed on, till he came to those lovely stanzas upon Venice:—

*'Sur une gamme chromatique,
Le sein de perles ruisselant,
La Vénus de l'Adriatique
Sort de l'eau son corps rose et blanc.*

*Les dômes, sur l'azur des ondes
Suivant la phrase au pur contour,
S'enflent comme des gorges rondes Que soulève un soupir d'amour.*

*L'esquif aborde et me dépose,
Jetant son amarre au pilier,
Devant une façade rose,
Sur le marbre d'un escalier.'\

How exquisite they were! As one read them, one seemed to be floating down the green waterways of the pink and pearl city, seated in a black gondola with silver prow and trailing curtains. The mere lines looked to him like those straight lines of turquoise-blue that follow one as one pushes out to the Lido.* The sudden flashes of colour reminded him of the gleam of the opal-and-iris-throated birds that flutter round the tall honey-combed Campanile,* or stalk, with such stately grace, through the dim, dust-stained arcades. Leaning back with half-closed eyes, he kept saying over and over to himself:—

*'Devant une façade rose,
Sur le marbre d'un escalier.'*

The whole of Venice was in those two lines. He remembered the autumn that he had passed there, and a wonderful love that had stirred him to mad, delightful follies. There was romance in every place. But Venice, like Oxford, had kept the background for romance, and, to the true romantic, background was everything, or almost everything. Basil had been with him part of the time, and had gone wild over Tintoret.* Poor Basil! what a horrible way for a man to die!

He sighed, and took up the volume again, and tried to forget. He read of the swallows that fly in and out of the little café at Smyrna where the Hadjis* sit counting their amber beads and the turbaned merchants smoke their long tasselled pipes and talk gravely to each other; he read of the Obelisk in the Place de la Concorde* that weeps tears of granite in its lonely sunless exile, and longs to be back by the hot lotus-covered Nile, where there are Sphinxes,* and rose-red ibises, and white vultures with gilded claws, and crocodiles, with small beryl eyes, that crawl over the green steaming mud; he began to brood over those verses which, drawing music from kiss-stained marble, tell of that curious statue that Gautier compares to a contralto voice, the 'monstre charmant'* that couches in the porphyry-room of the Louvre. But after a time the book fell from his hand. He grew nervous, and a horrible fit of terror came over him. What if Alan Campbell should be out of England? Days would elapse before he could come back. Perhaps he might refuse to come. What could he do then? Every moment was of vital importance.

They had been great friends once, five years before—almost inseparable, indeed. Then the intimacy had come suddenly to an end. When they met in society now, it was only Dorian Gray who smiled: Alan Campbell never did.

He was an extremely clever young man, though he had no real appreciation of the visible arts, and whatever little sense of the beauty of poetry he possessed he had gained entirely from Dorian. His dominant intellectual passion was for science. At Cambridge he had spent a great deal of his time working in the Laboratory, and had taken a good class in the Natural Science Tripos* of his year. Indeed, he was still devoted to the study of chemistry, and had a laboratory of his own, in which he used to shut himself up all day long, greatly to the annoyance of his mother, who had set her heart on his standing for Parliament and had a vague idea that a chemist was a person who made up prescriptions. He was an excellent musician, however, as well, and played both the violin and the piano better than most amateurs. In fact, it was music that had first brought him and Dorian Gray together—music and that indefinable attraction that Dorian seemed to be able to exercise whenever he wished, and indeed exercised often without being conscious of it. They had met at Lady Berkshire's the night that Rubinstein* played there, and after that used to be always seen together at the Opera, and wherever good music was going on. For eighteen months their intimacy lasted. Campbell was always either at Selby Royal or in Grosvenor Square. To him, as to many others, Dorian Gray was the type of everything that is wonderful and fascinating in life. Whether or not a quarrel had taken place between them no one ever knew. But suddenly people remarked that they scarcely spoke when they met, and that Campbell seemed always to go away early from any party at which Dorian Gray was present. He had changed, too—was strangely melancholy at times, appeared almost to dislike hearing music, and would never himself play, giving as his excuse, when he was called upon, that he was so absorbed in science that he had no time left in which to practise. And this was certainly true. Every day he seemed to become more interested in biology, and his name appeared once or twice in some of the scientific reviews, in connection with certain curious experiments.

This was the man Dorian Gray was waiting for. Every second he kept glancing at the clock. As the minutes went by he became horribly agitated. At last he got up, and began to pace up and down the room, looking like a beautiful caged thing. He took long stealthy strides. His hands were curiously cold.

The suspense became unbearable. Time seemed to him to be crawling with feet of lead, while he by monstrous winds was being swept towards the jagged edge of some black cleft or precipice. He knew what was waiting for him there; saw it indeed, and, shuddering, crushed with dank hands his burning lids as though he would have robbed the very brain of sight, and driven the eyeballs back into their cave. It was useless. The brain had its own food on which it battered, and the imagination, made grotesque by terror, twisted and distorted as a living thing by pain, danced like some foul puppet on a stand, and grinned through moving masks. Then, suddenly, Time stopped for him. Yes: that blind, slow-breathing thing crawled no more, and horrible thoughts, Time being dead, raced nimbly on in front, and dragged a hideous future from its grave, and showed it to him. He stared at it. Its very horror made him stone.

At last the door opened, and his servant entered. He turned glazed eyes upon him.

‘Mr. Campbell, sir,’ said the man.

A sigh of relief broke from his parched lips, and the colour came back to his cheeks.

‘Ask him to come in at once, Francis.’ He felt that he was himself again. His mood of cowardice had passed away.

The man bowed, and retired. In a few moments Alan Campbell walked in, looking very stern and rather pale, his pallor being intensified by his coal-black hair and dark eyebrows.

‘Alan! this is kind of you. I thank you for coming.’

‘I had intended never to enter your house again, Gray.* But you said it was a matter of life and death.’ His voice was hard and cold. He spoke with slow deliberation. There was a look of contempt in the steady searching gaze that he turned on Dorian. He kept his hands in the pockets of his Astrakhan coat,* and seemed not to have noticed the gesture with which he had been greeted.

‘Yes: it is a matter of life and death, Alan, and to more than one person. Sit down.’

Campbell took a chair by the table, and Dorian sat opposite to him. The two men’s eyes met. In Dorian’s there was infinite pity. He knew that what he was going to do was dreadful.

After a strained moment of silence, he leaned across and said, very quietly, but watching the effect of each word upon the face of him he had sent for, ‘Alan, in a locked room at the top of this house, a room to which nobody but myself has access, a dead man is seated at a table. He has been dead ten hours now. Don’t stir, and don’t look at me like that. Who the man is, why he died, how he died, are matters that do not concern you. What you have to do is this——’

‘Stop, Gray. I don’t want to know anything further. Whether what you have told me is true or not true, doesn’t concern me. I entirely decline to be mixed up in your life. Keep your horrible secrets to yourself. They don't interest me any more.'

'Alan, they will have to interest you. This one will have to interest you. I am awfully sorry for you, Alan. But I can't help myself. You are the one man who is able to save me. I am forced to bring you into the matter. I have no option. Alan, you are scientific. You know about chemistry, and things of that kind. You have made experiments. What you have got to do is to destroy the thing that is upstairs—to destroy it so that not a vestige of it will be left. Nobody saw this person come into the house. Indeed, at the present moment he is supposed to be in Paris. He will not be missed for months. When he is missed, there must be no trace of him found here. You, Alan, you must change him, and everything that belongs to him, into a handful of ashes that I may scatter in the air.'

'You are mad, Dorian.'

'Ah! I was waiting for you call me Dorian.'

'You are mad, I tell you—mad to imagine that I would raise a finger to help you, mad to make this monstrous confession. I will have nothing to do with this matter, whatever it is. Do you think I am going to peril my reputation for you? What is it to me what devil's work you are up to?'

'It was suicide, Alan.'

'I am glad of that. But who drove him to it? You, I should fancy.'

'Do you still refuse to do this for me?'

'Of course I refuse. I will have absolutely nothing to do with it. I don't care what shame comes on you. You deserve it all. I should not be sorry to see you disgraced, publicly disgraced. How dare you ask me, of all men in the world, to mix myself up in this horror? I should have thought you knew more about people's characters. Your friend Lord Henry Wotton can't have taught you much about psychology, whatever else he has taught you. Nothing will induce me to stir a step to help you. You have come to the wrong man. Go to some of your friends. Don't come to me.'

'Alan, it was murder. I killed him. You don't know what he had made me suffer. Whatever my life is, he had more to do with the making or the marring of it than poor Harry has had. He may not have intended it, the result was the same.'

'Murder! Good God, Dorian, is that what you have come to? I shall not inform upon you. It is not my business. Besides, without my stirring in the matter, you are certain to be arrested. Nobody ever commits a crime without doing something stupid. But I will have nothing to do with it.'

'You must have something to do with it. Wait, wait a moment; listen to me. Only listen, Alan. All I ask of you is to perform a certain scientific experiment. You go to hospitals and dead-houses,* and the horrors that you do there don't affect you. If in some hideous dissecting-room or fetid laboratory you found this man lying on a leaden table with red gutters scooped out in it for the blood to flow through, you would simply look upon him as an admirable subject. You would not turn a hair. You would not believe that you were doing anything wrong. On the contrary, you would probably feel that you were benefiting the human race, or increasing the sum of knowledge in the world, or gratifying intellectual curiosity, or something of that kind. What I want you to do is merely what you have often done before. Indeed, to destroy a body must be far less horrible than what you are accustomed to work at. And, remember, it is the only piece of evidence against me. If it is discovered, I am lost; and it is sure to be discovered unless you help me.'

'I have no desire to help you. You forget that. I am simply indifferent to the whole thing. It has nothing to do with me.'

'Alan, I entreat you. Think of the position I am in. Just before you came I almost fainted with terror. You may know terror yourself some day. No! don't think of that. Look at the matter purely from the scientific point of view. You don't inquire where the dead things on which you experiment come from. Don't inquire now. I have told you too much as it is. But I beg of you to do this. We were friends once, Alan.'

'Don't speak about those days, Dorian: they are dead.'

'The dead linger sometimes. The man upstairs will not go away. He is sitting at the table with bowed head and outstretched arms. Alan! Alan! if you don't come to my assistance I am ruined. Why, they will hang me, Alan! Don't you understand? They will hang me for what I have done.'

'There is no good in prolonging this scene. I absolutely refuse to do anything in the matter. It is insane of you to ask me.'

'You refuse?'

'Yes.'

'I entreat you, Alan.'

‘It is useless.’

The same look of pity came into Dorian Gray’s eyes. Then he stretched out his hand, took a piece of paper, and wrote something on it. He read it over twice, folded it carefully, and pushed it across the table. Having done this, he got up, and went over to the window.

Campbell looked at him in surprise, and then took up the paper, and opened it. As he read it, his face became ghastly pale, and he fell back in his chair. A horrible sense of sickness came over him. He felt as if his heart was beating itself to death in some empty hollow.

After two or three minutes of terrible silence, Dorian turned round, and came and stood behind him, putting his hand upon his shoulder.

‘I am so sorry for you, Alan,’ he murmured, ‘but you leave me no alternative. I have a letter written already. Here it is. You see the address. If you don’t help me, I must send it. If you don’t help me, I will send it. You know what the result will be. But you are going to help me. It is impossible for you to refuse now. I tried to spare you. You will do me the justice to admit that. You were stern, harsh, offensive. You treated me as no man has ever dared to treat me—no living man, at any rate. I bore it all. Now it is for me to dictate terms.’

Campbell buried his face in his hands, and a shudder passed through him.

‘Yes, it is my turn to dictate terms, Alan. You know what they are. The thing is quite simple. Come, don’t work yourself into this fever. The thing has to be done. Face it, and do it.’

A groan broke from Campbell’s lips, and he shivered all over. The ticking of the clock on the mantelpiece seemed to him to be dividing Time into separate atoms of agony, each of which was too terrible to be borne. He felt as if an iron ring was being slowly tightened round his forehead, as if the disgrace with which he was threatened had already come upon him. The hand upon his shoulder weighed like a hand of lead. It was intolerable. It seemed to crush him.

‘Come, Alan, you must decide at once.’

‘I cannot do it,’ he said, mechanically, as though words could alter things.

‘You must. You have no choice. Don’t delay.’

He hesitated a moment. ‘Is there a fire in the room upstairs?’

‘Yes, there is a gas-fire with asbestos.’

‘I shall have to go home and get some things from the laboratory.’

‘No, Alan, you must not leave the house. Write out on a sheet of note-paper what you want, and my servant will take a cab and bring the things back to you.’

Campbell scrawled a few lines, blotted them, and addressed an envelope to his assistant. Dorian took the note up and read it carefully. Then he rang the bell, and gave it to his valet, with orders to return as soon as possible, and to bring the things with him.

As the hall door shut, Campbell started nervously, and, having got up from the chair, went over to the chimney-piece. He was shivering with a kind of ague. For nearly twenty minutes, neither of the men spoke. A fly buzzed noisily about the room, and the ticking of the clock was like the beat of a hammer.

As the chime struck one, Campbell turned round, and, looking at Dorian Gray, saw that his eyes were filled with tears. There was something in the purity and refinement of that sad face that seemed to enrage him. ‘You are infamous, absolutely infamous!’ he muttered.

‘Hush, Alan: you have saved my life,’ said Dorian.

‘Your life? Good heavens! what a life that is! You have gone from corruption to corruption, and now you have culminated in crime. In doing what I am going to do, what you force me to do, it is not of your life that I am thinking.’

‘Ah, Alan,’ murmured Dorian, with a sigh, ‘I wish you had a thousandth part of the pity for me that I have for you.’ He turned away as he spoke, and stood looking at the garden. Campbell made no answer.

After about ten minutes a knock came to the door, and the servant entered, carrying a large mahogany chest of chemicals, with a long coil of steel and platinum wire and two rather curiously-shaped iron clamps.

‘Shall I leave the things here, sir?’ he asked Campbell.

‘Yes,’ said Dorian. ‘And I am afraid, Francis, that I have another errand for you. What is the name of the man at Richmond* who supplies Selby with orchids?’

‘Harden, sir.’

‘Yes—Harden. You must go down to Richmond at once, see Harden personally, and tell him to send twice as many orchids as I ordered, and to have as few white ones as possible. In fact, I don’t want any white ones. It is a lovely day, Francis, and Richmond is a very pretty place, otherwise I wouldn’t bother you about it.’

‘No trouble, sir. At what time shall I be back?’

Dorian looked at Campbell. ‘How long will your experiment take, Alan?’ he said, in a calm, indifferent voice. The presence of a third person in the room seemed to give him extraordinary courage.

Campbell frowned, and bit his lip. ‘It will take about five hours,’ he answered.

‘It will be time enough, then, if you are back at half-past seven, Francis. Or stay: just leave my things out for dressing. You can have the evening to yourself. I am not dining at home, so I shall not want you.’

‘Thank you, sir,’ said the man, leaving the room.

‘Now, Alan, there is not a moment to be lost. How heavy this chest is! I’ll take it for you. You bring the other things.’ He spoke rapidly, and in an authoritative manner. Campbell felt dominated by him. They left the room together.

When they reached the top landing, Dorian took out the key and turned it in the lock. Then he stopped, and a troubled look came into his eyes. He shuddered. ‘I don’t think I can go in, Alan,’ he murmured.

‘It is nothing to me. I don’t require you,’ said Campbell, coldly.

Dorian half opened the door. As he did so, he saw the face of his portrait leering in the sunlight. On the floor in front of it the torn curtain was lying. He remembered that the night before he had forgotten, for the first time in his life, to hide the fatal canvas, and was about to rush forward, when he drew back with a shudder.

What was that loathsome red dew that gleamed, wet and glistening, on one of the hands, as though the canvas had sweated blood? How horrible it was!—more horrible, it seemed to him for the moment, than the silent thing that he knew was stretched across the table, the thing whose grotesque misshapen shadow on the spotted carpet showed him that it had not stirred, but was still there, as he had left it.

He heaved a deep breath, opened the door a little wider, and with half-closed eyes and averted head walked quickly in, determined that he would not look even once upon the dead man. Then, stooping down, and taking up the gold-and-purple hanging, he flung it right over the picture.

There he stopped, feeling afraid to turn round, and his eyes fixed themselves on the intricacies of the pattern before him. He heard

Campbell bringing in the heavy chest, and the irons, and the other things that he had required for his dreadful work. He began to wonder if he and Basil Hallward had ever met, and, if so, what they had thought of each other.

‘Leave me now,’ said a stern voice behind him.

He turned and hurried out, just conscious that the dead man had been thrust back into the chair, and that Campbell was gazing into a glistening yellow face. As he was going downstairs he heard the key being turned in the lock.

It was long after seven when Campbell came back into the library. He was pale, but absolutely calm. ‘I have done what you asked me to do,’ he muttered. ‘And now, good-bye. Let us never see each other again.’

‘You have saved me from ruin, Alan. I cannot forget that,’ said Dorian, simply.

As soon as Campbell had left, he went upstairs. There was a horrible smell of nitric acid in the room. But the thing that had been sitting at the table was gone.

CHAPTER XV

THAT evening, at eight-thirty, exquisitely dressed, and wearing a large buttonhole of Parma violets,* Dorian Gray was ushered into Lady Narborough’s drawing-room by bowing servants. His forehead was throbbing with maddened nerves, and he felt wildly excited, but his manner as he bent over his hostess’s hand was as easy and graceful as ever. Perhaps one never seems so much at one’s ease as when one has to play a part. Certainly no one looking at Dorian Gray that night could have believed that he had passed through a tragedy as horrible as any tragedy of our age. Those finely-shaped fingers could never have clutched a knife for sin, nor those smiling lips have cried out on God and goodness. He himself could not help wondering at the calm of his demeanour, and for a moment felt keenly the terrible pleasure of a double life.

It was a small party, got up rather in a hurry by Lady Narborough, who was a very clever woman, with what Lord Henry used to describe as the remains of really remarkable ugliness. She had proved an excellent wife to one of our most tedious ambassadors, and having buried her husband properly in a marble mausoleum, which she had herself designed, and married off her daughters to some rich, rather elderly men, she devoted herself now to the pleasures of French fiction, French cookery, and French esprit when she could get it.

Dorian was one of her especial favourites, and she always told him that she was extremely glad she had not met him in early life. 'I know, my dear, I should have fallen madly in love with you,' she used to say, 'and thrown my bonnet right over the mills* for your sake. It is most fortunate that you were not thought of at the time. As it was, our bonnets were so unbecoming, and the mills were so occupied in trying to raise the wind, that I never had even a flirtation with anybody. However, that was all Narborough's fault. He was dreadfully short-sighted, and there is no pleasure in taking in a husband who never sees anything.'

Her guests this evening were rather tedious. The fact was, as she explained to Dorian, behind a very shabby fan, one of her married daughters had come up quite suddenly to stay with her, and, to make matters worse, had actually brought her husband with her. 'I think it is most unkind of her, my dear,' she whispered. 'Of course I go and stay with them every summer after I come from Homburg,* but then an old woman like me must have fresh air sometimes, and besides, I really wake them up. You don't know what an existence they lead down there. It is pure unadulterated country life.* They get up early, because they have so much to do, and go to bed early because they have so little to think about. There has not been a scandal in the neighbourhood since the time of Queen Elizabeth, and consequently they all fall asleep after dinner. You shan't sit next either of them. You shall sit by me, and amuse me.'

Dorian murmured a graceful compliment, and looked round the room. Yes: it was certainly a tedious party. Two of the people he had never seen before, and the others consisted of Ernest Harrowden, one of those middle-aged mediocrities so common in London clubs who have no enemies, but are thoroughly disliked by their friends; Lady Ruxton, an overdressed woman of forty-seven, with a hooked nose, who was always trying to get herself compromised, but was so peculiarly plain that to her great disappointment no one would ever believe anything against her; Mrs. Erlynne,* a pushing nobody, with a delightful lisp, and Venetian-red hair; Lady Alice Chapman, his hostess's daughter, a dowdy dull girl, with one of those characteristic British faces, that, once seen, are never remembered; and her husband, a red-cheeked, white-whiskered creature who, like so many of his class, was under the impression that inordinate joviality can atone for an entire lack of ideas.

He was rather sorry he had come, till Lady Narborough, looking at the great ormolu* gilt clock that sprawled in gaudy curves on the mauve-draped mantelshelf, exclaimed: 'How horrid of Henry Wotton to be so late! I sent round to him this morning on chance, and he promised faithfully not to disappoint me.'

It was some consolation that Harry was to be there, and when the door opened and he heard his slow musical voice lending charm to some insincere apology, he ceased to feel bored.

But at dinner he could not eat anything. Plate after plate went away untasted. Lady Narborough kept scolding him for what she called 'an insult to poor Adolphe, who invented the menu specially for you,' and now and then Lord Henry looked across at him, wondering at his silence and abstracted manner. From time to time the butler filled his glass with champagne. He drank eagerly, and his thirst seemed to increase.

'Dorian,' said Lord Henry, at last, as the chaudfroid* was being handed round, 'what is the matter with you to-night? You are quite out of sorts.'

'I believe he is in love,' cried Lady Narborough, 'and that he is afraid to tell me for fear I should be jealous. He is quite right. I certainly should.'

'Dear Lady Narborough,' murmured Dorian, smiling, 'I have not been in love for a whole week—not, in fact, since Madame de Ferrol left town.'

'How you men can fall in love with that woman!' exclaimed the old lady. 'I really cannot understand it.'

'It is simply because she remembers you when you were a little girl, Lady Narborough,' said Lord Henry. 'She is the one link between us and your short frocks.'

'She does not remember my short frocks at all, Lord Henry. But I remember her very well at Vienna thirty years ago, and how décolletée* she was then.'

'She is still décolletée,' he answered, taking an olive in his long fingers; 'and when she is in a very smart gown she looks like an édition de luxe* of a bad French novel. She is really wonderful, and full of surprises. Her capacity for family affection is extraordinary. When her third husband died, her hair turned quite gold from grief.*

‘How can you, Harry!’ cried Dorian.

‘It is a most romantic explanation,’ laughed the hostess. ‘But her third husband, Lord Henry! You don’t mean to say Ferrol is the fourth?’

‘Certainly, Lady Narborough.’

‘I don’t believe a word of it.’

‘Well, ask Mr. Gray. He is one of her most intimate friends.’

‘Is it true, Mr. Gray?’

‘She assures me so, Lady Narborough,’ said Dorian. ‘I asked her whether, like Marguerite de Navarre,* she had their hearts embalmed and hung at her girdle. She told me she didn’t, because none of them had had any hearts at all.’

‘Four husbands! Upon my word that is trop de zèle.’*

‘Trop d’audace,* I tell her,’ said Dorian.

‘Oh! she is audacious enough for anything, my dear. And what is Ferrol like? I don’t know him.’

‘The husbands of very beautiful women belong to the criminal classes,’ said Lord Henry, sipping his wine.

Lady Narborough hit him with her fan. ‘Lord Henry, I am not at all surprised that the world says that you are extremely wicked.’

‘But what world says that?’ asked Lord Henry, elevating his eyebrows. ‘It can only be the next world. This world and I are on excellent terms.’*

‘Everybody I know says you are very wicked,’ cried the old lady, shaking her head.

Lord Henry looked serious for some moments. ‘It is perfectly monstrous,’ he said, at last, ‘the way people go about nowadays saying things against one behind one’s back that are absolutely and entirely true.’*

‘Isn’t he incorrigible?’ cried Dorian, leaning forward in his chair.

‘I hope so,’ said his hostess laughing. ‘But really if you all worship Madame de Ferrol in this ridiculous way, I shall have to marry again so as to be in the fashion.’

‘You will never marry again, Lady Narborough,’ broke in Lord Henry. ‘You were far too happy. When a woman marries again it is because she detested her first husband. When a man marries again, it is because he adored his first wife. Women try their luck; men risk theirs.'

'Narborough wasn't perfect,' cried the old lady.

'If he had been, you would not have loved him, my dear lady,' was the rejoinder. 'Women love us for our defects. If we have enough of them they will forgive us everything, even our intellects. You will never ask me to dinner again, after saying this, I am afraid, Lady Narborough; but it is quite true.'

'Of course it is true, Lord Henry. If we women did not love you for your defects, where would you all be? Not one of you would ever be married. You would be a set of unfortunate bachelors. Not, however, that that would alter you much. Nowadays all the married men live like bachelors, and all the bachelors like married men.'*

'Fin de siècle,' murmured Lord Henry.

'Fin du globe,'* answered his hostess.

'I wish it were fin du globe,' said Dorian, with a sigh. 'Life is a great disappointment.'

'Ah, my dear,' cried Lady Narborough, putting on her gloves, 'don't tell me that you have exhausted Life. When a man says that one knows that Life has exhausted him. Lord Henry is very wicked, and I sometimes wish that I had been; but you are made to be good—you look so good. I must find you a nice wife. Lord Henry, don't you think that Mr. Gray should get married?'

'I am always telling him so, Lady Narborough,' said Lord Henry, with a bow.

'Well, we must look out for a suitable match for him. I shall go through Debrett* carefully to-night, and draw out a list of all the eligible young ladies.'

'With their ages, Lady Narborough?' asked Dorian.

'Of course, with their ages, slightly edited. But nothing must be done in a hurry. I want it to be what The Morning Post* calls a suitable alliance, and I want you both to be happy.'

'What nonsense people talk about happy marriages!' exclaimed Lord Henry. 'A man can be happy with any woman, as long as he does not love her.'

'Ah! what a cynic you are!' cried the old lady, pushing back her chair, and nodding to Lady Ruxton. 'You must come and dine with me soon again. You are really an admirable tonic, much better than what Sir Andrew prescribes for me. You must tell me what people you would like to meet, though. I want it to be a delightful gathering.'

'I like men who have a future, and women who have a past,' he answered. 'Or do you think that would make it a petticoat party?'

'I fear so,' she said, laughing, as she stood up. 'A thousand pardons, my dear Lady Ruxton,' she added, 'I didn't see you hadn't finished your cigarette.'*

'Never mind, Lady Narborough. I smoke a great deal too much. I am going to limit myself, for the future.'

'Pray don't, Lady Ruxton,' said Lord Henry. 'Moderation is a fatal thing.* Enough is as bad as a meal. More than enough is as good as a feast.'

Lady Ruxton glanced at him curiously. 'You must come and explain that to me some afternoon, Lord Henry. It sounds a fascinating theory,' she murmured, as she swept out of the room.

'Now, mind you don't stay too long over your politics and scandal,' cried Lady Narborough from the door. 'If you do, we are sure to squabble upstairs.'

The men laughed, and Mr. Chapman got up solemnly from the foot of the table and came up to the top. Dorian Gray changed his seat, and went and sat by Lord Henry. Mr. Chapman began to talk in a loud voice about the situation in the House of Commons. He guffawed at his adversaries. The word doctrinaire—word full of terror to the British mind—reappeared from time to time between his explosions. An alliterative prefix served as an ornament of oratory. He hoisted the Union Jack on the pinnacles of Thought. The inherited stupidity of the race—sound English common sense he jovially termed it—was shown to be the proper bulwark for Society.

A smile curved Lord Henry's lips, and he turned round and looked at Dorian.

'Are you better, my dear fellow?' he asked. 'You seemed rather out of sorts at dinner.'

'I am quite well, Harry. I am tired. That is all.'

'You were charming last night. The little Duchess is quite devoted to you. She tells me she is going down to Selby.'

'She has promised to come on the twentieth.'

'Is Monmouth to be there too?'

'Oh, yes, Harry.'

'He bores me dreadfully, almost as much as he bores her. She is very clever, too clever for a woman. She lacks the indefinable charm of weakness. It is the feet of clay that make the gold of the image precious. Her feet are very pretty, but they are not feet of clay. White porcelain feet, if you like. They have been through the fire, and what fire does not destroy, it hardens. She has had experiences.'

'How long has she been married?' asked Dorian.

'An eternity, she tells me. I believe, according to the Peerage, it is ten years, but ten years with Monmouth must have been like eternity, with time thrown in. Who else is coming?'

'Oh, the Willoughbys, Lord Rugby and his wife, our hostess, Geoffrey Clouston, the usual set. I have asked Lord Grotrian.'

'I like him,' said Lord Henry. 'A great many people don't, but I find him charming. He atones for being occasionally somewhat over-dressed, by being always absolutely over-educated.* He is a very modern type.'

'I don't know if he will be able to come, Harry. He may have to go to Monte Carlo* with his father.'

'Ah! what a nuisance people's people are! Try and make him come. By the way, Dorian, you ran off very early last night. You left before eleven. What did you do afterwards? Did you go straight home?'

Dorian glanced at him hurriedly, and frowned. 'No, Harry,' he said at last, 'I did not get home till nearly three.'

'Did you go to the club?'

'Yes,' he answered. Then he bit his lip. 'No, I don't mean that. I didn't go to the club. I walked about. I forget what I did. . . . How inquisitive you are, Harry! You always want to know what one has been doing. I always want to forget what I have been doing. I came in at half-past two, if you wish to know the exact time. I had left my latch-key at home, and my servant had to let me in. If you want any corroborative evidence on the subject you can ask him.'

Lord Henry shrugged his shoulders. 'My dear fellow, as if I cared! Let us go up to the drawing-room. No sherry, thank you, Mr. Chapman. Something has happened to you, Dorian. Tell me what it is. You are not yourself to-night.'

'Don't mind me, Harry. I am irritable, and out of temper. I shall come round and see you to-morrow, or next day. Make my excuses to Lady Narborough. I shan't go upstairs. I shall go home. I must go home.'

'All right, Dorian. I dare say I shall see you to-morrow at tea-time. The Duchess is coming.'

'I will try to be there, Harry,' he said, leaving the room. As he drove back to his own house he was conscious that the sense of terror he thought he had strangled had come back to him. Lord Henry's casual questioning had made him lose his nerves for the moment, and he wanted his nerve still. Things that were dangerous had to be destroyed. He winced. He hated the idea of even touching them.

Yet it had to be done. He realized that, and when he had locked the door of his library, he opened the secret press into which he had thrust Basil Hallward's coat and bag. A huge fire was blazing. He piled another log on it. The smell of the singeing clothes and burning leather was horrible. It took him three-quarters of an hour to consume everything. At the end he felt faint and sick, and having lit some Algerian pastilles* in a pierced copper brazier, he bathed his hands and forehead with a cool musk-scented vinegar.

Suddenly he started. His eyes grew strangely bright, and he gnawed nervously at his under-lip. Between two of the windows stood a large Florentine cabinet, made out of ebony, and inlaid with ivory and blue lapis.* He watched it as though it were a thing that could fascinate and make afraid, as though it held something that he longed for and yet almost loathed. His breath quickened. A mad craving came over him. He lit a cigarette and then threw it away. His eyelids drooped till the long fringed lashes almost touched his cheek. But he still watched the cabinet. At last he got up from the sofa on which he had been lying, went over to it, and, having unlocked it, touched some hidden spring. A triangular drawer passed slowly out. His fingers moved instinctively towards it, dipped in, and closed on something. It was a small Chinese box of black and gold-dust lacquer, elaborately wrought, the sides patterned with curved waves, and the silken cords hung with round crystals and tasselled in plaited metal threads. He opened it. Inside was a green paste* waxy in lustre, the odour curiously heavy and persistent.

He hesitated for some moments, with a strangely immobile smile upon his face. Then shivering, though the atmosphere of the room was terribly hot, he drew himself up, and glanced at the clock. It was twenty minutes to twelve. He put the box back, shutting the cabinet doors as he did so, and went into his bedroom.

As midnight was striking bronze blows upon the dusky air, Dorian Gray, dressed commonly, and with a muffler wrapped round his throat, crept quietly out of his house. In Bond Street* he found a hansom with a good horse. He hailed it, and in a low voice gave the driver an address.*

The man shook his head. 'It is too far for me,' he muttered.

'Here is a sovereign for you,' said Dorian. 'You shall have another if you drive fast.'

'All right, sir,' answered the man, 'you will be there in an hour,' and after his fare had got in he turned his horse round, and drove rapidly towards the river.

CHAPTER XVI

A COLD rain began to fall, and the blurred street-lamps looked ghastly in the dripping mist. The public-houses were just closing, and dim men and women were clustering in broken groups round their doors. From some of the bars came the sound of horrible laughter. In others, drunkards brawled and screamed.

Lying back in the hansom, with his hat pulled over his forehead, Dorian Gray watched with listless eyes the sordid shame of the great city, and now and then he repeated to himself the words that Lord Henry had said to him on the first day they had met, 'To cure the soul by means of the senses, and the senses by means of the soul.*' Yes, that was the secret. He had often tried it, and would try it again now. There were opium-dens,* where one could buy oblivion, dens of horror where the memory of old sins could be destroyed by the madness of sins that were new.

The moon hung low in the sky like a yellow skull. From time to time a huge misshapen cloud stretched a long arm across and hid it. The gas-lamps grew fewer,* and the streets more narrow and gloomy. Once the man lost his way, and had to drive back half a mile. A steam rose from the horse as it splashed up the puddles. The side-windows of the hansom were clogged with a grey-flannel mist.

'To cure the soul by means of the senses, and the senses by means of the soul!' How the words rang in his ears! His soul, certainly, was sick to death. Was it true that the senses could cure it? Innocent blood had been spilt. What could atone for that? Ah! for that there was no atonement; but though forgiveness was impossible, forgetfulness was possible still, and he was determined to forget, to stamp the thing out, to crush it as one would crush the adder that had stung one. Indeed, what right had Basil to have spoken to him as he had done? Who had made him a judge over others? He had said things that were dreadful, horrible, not to be endured.

On and on plodded the hansom, going slower, it seemed to him, at each step. He thrust up the trap, and called to the man to drive faster. The hideous hunger for opium began to gnaw at him. His throat burned, and his delicate hands twitched nervously together. He struck at the horse madly with his stick. The driver laughed, and whipped up. He laughed in answer, and the man was silent.

The way seemed interminable, and the streets like the black web of some sprawling spider. The monotony became unbearable, and, as the mist thickened, he felt afraid.

Then they passed by lonely brickfields.* The fog was lighter here, and he could see the strange bottle-shaped kilns with their orange fan-like tongues of fire. A dog barked as they went by, and far away in the darkness some wandering seagull screamed. The horse stumbled in a rut, then swerved aside, and broke into a gallop.

After some time they left the clay road, and rattled again over rough-paven streets. Most of the windows were dark, but now and then fantastic shadows were silhouetted against some lamp-lit blind. He watched them curiously. They moved like monstrous marionettes, and made gestures like live things.* He hated them. A dull rage was in his heart. As they turned a corner a woman yelled something at them from an open door, and two men ran after the hansom for about a hundred yards. The driver beat at them with his whip.

It is said that passion makes one think in a circle. Certainly with hideous iteration the bitten lips of Dorian Gray shaped and reshaped those subtle words that dealt with soul and sense, till he had found in them the full expression, as it were, of his mood, and justified, by intellectual approval, passions that without such justification would still have dominated his temper. From cell to cell of his brain crept the one thought; and the wild desire to live, most terrible of all man's appetites, quickened into force each trembling nerve and fibre. Ugliness that had once been hateful to him because it made things real, became dear to him now for that very reason. Ugliness was the one reality. The coarse brawl, the loathsome den, the crude violence of disordered life, the very vileness of thief and outcast, were more vivid, in their intense actuality of impression, than all the gracious shapes of Art, the dreamy shadows of Song. They were what he needed for forgetfulness. In three days he would be free.

Suddenly the man drew up with a jerk at the top of a dark lane. Over the low roofs and jagged chimney-stacks of the houses rose the black masts of ships. Wreaths of white mist clung like ghostly sails to the yards.

‘Somewhere about here, sir, ain’t it?’ he asked huskily through the trap.

Dorian started, and peered round. ‘This will do,’ he answered, and, having got out hastily, and given the driver the extra fare he had promised him, he walked quickly in the direction of the quay. Here and there a lantern gleamed at the stern of some huge merchantman. The light shook and splintered in the puddles. A red glare came from an outward-bound steamer that was coaling. The slimy pavement looked like a wet mackintosh.

He hurried on towards the left, glancing back now and then to see if he was being followed. In about seven or eight minutes he reached a small shabby house, that was wedged in between two gaunt factories. In one of the top windows stood a lamp. He stopped, and gave a peculiar knock.

After a little time he heard steps in the passage, and the chain being unhooked. The door opened quietly, and he went in without saying a word to the squat misshapen figure that flattened itself into the shadow as he passed. At the end of the hall hung a tattered green curtain that swayed and shook in the gusty wind which had followed him in from the street. He dragged it aside, and entered a long, low room which looked as if it had once been a third-rate dancing-saloon. Shrill flaring gas-jets, dulled and distorted in the fly-blown mirrors that faced them, were ranged round the walls. Greasy reflectors of ribbed tin backed them, making quivering discs of light. The floor was covered with ochre-coloured sawdust, trampled here and there into mud, and stained with dark rings of spilt liquor. Some Malays were crouching by a little charcoal stove playing with bone counters, and showing their white teeth as they chattered. In one corner with his head buried in his arms, a sailor sprawled over a table, and by the tawdrily-painted bar that ran across one complete side stood two haggard women mocking an old man who was brushing the sleeves of his coat with an expression of disgust. ‘He thinks he’s got red ants on him,’ laughed one of them, as Dorian passed by. The man looked at her in terror, and began to whimper.

At the end of the room there was a little staircase, leading to a darkened chamber. As Dorian hurried up its three rickety steps, the heavy odour of opium met him. He heaved a deep breath, and his nostrils quivered with pleasure. When he entered, a young man with smooth yellow hair, who was bending over a lamp lighting a long thin pipe, looked up at him, and nodded in a hesitating manner.

'You here, Adrian?' muttered Dorian.

'Where else should I be?' he answered, listlessly. 'None of the chaps will speak to me now.'

'I thought you had left England.'

'Darlington is not going to do anything. My brother paid the bill at last. George doesn't speak to me either. . . . I don't care,' he added, with a sigh. 'As long as one has this stuff, one doesn't want friends. I think I have had too many friends.'

Dorian winced, and looked round at the grotesque things that lay in such fantastic postures on the ragged mattresses. The twisted limbs, the gaping mouths, the staring lustreless eyes, fascinated him. He knew in what strange heavens they were suffering, and what dull hells were teaching them the secret of some new joy. They were better off than he was. He was prisoned in thought. Memory, like a horrible malady, was eating his soul away. From time to time he seemed to see the eyes of Basil Hallward looking at him. Yet he felt he could not stay. The presence of Adrian Singleton troubled him. He wanted to be where no one would know who he was. He wanted to escape from himself.

'I am going on to the other place,' he said, after a pause.

'On the wharf?'

'Yes.'

'That mad-cat is sure to be there. They won't have her in this place now.'

Dorian shrugged his shoulders. 'I am sick of women who love one. Women who hate one are much more interesting. Besides, the stuff is better.'

'Much the same.'

'I like it better. Come and have something to drink. I must have something.'

'I don't want anything,' murmured the young man.

‘Never mind.’

Adrian Singleton rose up wearily, and followed Dorian to the bar. A half-caste, in a ragged turban and a shabby ulster, grinned a hideous greeting as he thrust a bottle of brandy and two tumblers in front of them. The women sidled up, and began to chatter. Dorian turned his back on them, and said something in a low voice to Adrian Singleton.

A crooked smile, like a Malay crease,* writhed across the face of one of the women. ‘We are very proud to-night,’ she sneered.

‘For God’s sake don’t talk to me,’ cried Dorian, stamping his foot on the ground. ‘What do you want? Money? Here it is. Don’t ever talk to me again.’

Two red sparks flashed for a moment in the woman’s sodden eyes, then flickered out, and left them dull and glazed. She tossed her head, and raked the coins off the counter with greedy fingers. Her companion watched her enviously.

‘It’s no use,’ sighed Adrian Singleton. ‘I don’t care to go back. What does it matter? I am quite happy here.’

‘You will write to me if you want anything, won’t you?’ said Dorian, after a pause.

‘Perhaps.’

‘Good-night, then.’

‘Good-night,’ answered the young man, passing up the steps, and wiping his parched mouth with a handkerchief.

Dorian walked to the door with a look of pain in his face. As he drew the curtain aside a hideous laugh broke from the painted lips of the woman who had taken his money. ‘There goes the devil’s bargain!’ she hiccoughed, in a hoarse voice.

‘Curse you!’ he answered, ‘don’t call me that.’

She snapped her fingers. ‘Prince Charming is what you like to be called, ain’t it?’ she yelled after him.

The drowsy sailor leapt to his feet as she spoke, and looked wildly round. The sound of the shutting of the hall door fell on his ear. He rushed out as if in pursuit.

Dorian Gray hurried along the quay through the drizzling rain. His meeting with Adrian Singleton had strangely moved him, and he wondered if the ruin of that young life was really to be laid at his door, as Basil Hallward had said to him with such infamy of insult. He bit his lip, and for a few seconds his eyes grew sad. Yet, after all, what did it matter to him? One's days were too brief to take the burden of another's errors on one's shoulders. Each man lived his own life, and paid his own price for living it. The only pity was one had to pay so often for a single fault. One had to pay over and over again, indeed. In her dealings with man Destiny never closed her accounts.

There are moments, psychologists tell us, when the passion for sin, or for what the world calls sin, so dominates a nature, that every fibre of the body, as every cell of the brain, seems to be instinct with fearful impulses. Men and women at such moments lose the freedom of their will. They move to their terrible end as automatons move. Choice is taken from them, and conscience is either killed, or, if it lives at all, lives but to give rebellion its fascination, and disobedience its charm. For all sins, as theologians weary not of reminding us, are sins of disobedience. When that high spirit, that morning-star of evil,* fell from heaven, it was as a rebel that he fell.

Callous, concentrated on evil, with stained mind and soul hungry for rebellion, Dorian Gray hastened on, quickening his step as he went, but as he darted aside into a dim archway, that had served him often as a short cut to the ill-famed place where he was going, he felt himself suddenly seized from behind, and before he had time to defend himself he was thrust back against the wall, with a brutal hand round his throat.

He struggled madly for life, and by a terrible effort wrenched the tightening fingers away. In a second he heard the click of a revolver, and saw the gleam of a polished barrel pointing straight at his head, and the dusky form of a short thick-set man facing him.

'What do you want?' he gasped.

'Keep quiet,' said the man. 'If you stir, I shoot you.'

'You are mad. What have I done to you?'

'You wrecked the life of Sibyl Vane,' was the answer, 'and Sibyl Vane was my sister. She killed herself. I know it. Her death is at your door. I swore I would kill you in return. For years I have sought you. I had no clue, no trace. The two people who could have described you were dead. I knew nothing of you but the pet name she used to call you. I heard it to-night by chance. Make your peace with God, for to-night you are going to die.'

Dorian Gray grew sick with fear. 'I never knew her,' he stammered. 'I never heard of her. You are mad.'

'You had better confess your sin, for as sure as I am James Vane, you are going to die.' There was a horrible moment. Dorian did not know what to say or do. 'Down on your knees!' growled the man. 'I give you one minute to make your peace—no more. I go on board to-night for India, and I must do my job first. One minute. That's all.'

Dorian's arms fell to his side. Paralyzed with terror, he did not know what to do. Suddenly a wild hope flashed across his brain. 'Stop,' he cried. 'How long ago is it since your sister died? Quick, tell me!'

'Eighteen years,' said the man. 'Why do you ask me? What do years matter?'

'Eighteen years,' laughed Dorian Gray, with a touch of triumph in his voice. 'Eighteen years! Set me under the lamp and look at my face!'

James Vane hesitated for a moment, not understanding what was meant. Then he seized Dorian Gray and dragged him from the archway.

Dim and wavering as was the windblown light, yet it served to show him the hideous error, as it seemed, into which he had fallen, for the face of the man he had sought to kill had all the bloom of boyhood, all the unstained purity of youth. He seemed little more than a lad of twenty summers, hardly older, if older indeed at all, than his sister had been when they had parted so many years ago. It was obvious that this was not the man who had destroyed her life.

He loosened his hold and reeled back. 'My God! my God!' he cried, 'and I would have murdered you!'

Dorian Gray drew a long breath. 'You have been on the brink of committing a terrible crime, my man,' he said, looking at him sternly. 'Let this be a warning to you not to take vengeance into your own hands.'

'Forgive me, sir,' muttered James Vane. 'I was deceived. A chance word I heard in that damned den set me on the wrong track.'

'You had better go home, and put that pistol away, or you may get into trouble,' said Dorian, turning on his heel, and going slowly down the street.

James Vane stood on the pavement in horror. He was trembling from head to foot. After a little while a black shadow that had been creeping along the dripping wall, moved out into the light and came close to him with stealthy footsteps. He felt a hand laid on his arm and looked round with a start. It was one of the women who had been drinking at the bar.

‘Why didn’t you kill him?’ she hissed out, putting her haggard face quite close to his. ‘I knew you were following him when you rushed out from Daly’s.* You fool! You should have killed him. He has lots of money, and he’s as bad as bad.’

‘He is not the man I am looking for,’ he answered, ‘and I want no man’s money. I want a man’s life. The man whose life I want must be nearly forty now. This one is little more than a boy. Thank God, I have not got his blood upon my hands.’

The woman gave a bitter laugh. ‘Little more than a boy!’ she sneered. ‘Why, man, it’s nigh on eighteen years since Prince Charming made me what I am.’

‘You lie!’ cried James Vane.

She raised her hand up to heaven. ‘Before God I am telling the truth,’ she cried.

‘Before God?’

‘Strike me dumb if it ain’t so. He is the worst one that comes here. They say he has sold himself to the devil for a pretty face. It’s nigh on eighteen years since I met him. He hasn’t changed much since then. I have though,’ she added, with a sickly leer.

‘You swear this?’

‘I swear it,’ came in hoarse echo from her flat mouth. ‘But don’t give me away to him,’ she whined; ‘I am afraid of him. Let me have some money for my night’s lodging.’

He broke from her with an oath, and rushed to the corner of the street, but Dorian Gray had disappeared. When he looked back, the woman had vanished also.

CHAPTER XVII

A WEEK later Dorian Gray was sitting in the conservatory at Selby Royal talking to the pretty Duchess of Monmouth, who with her husband, a jaded-looking man of sixty, was amongst his guests. It was tea-time, and the mellow light of the huge lace-covered lamp that stood on the table lit up the delicate china and hammered silver of the service at which the Duchess was presiding. Her white hands were moving daintily among the cups, and her full red lips were smiling at something that Dorian had whispered to her. Lord Henry was lying back in a silk-draped wicker chair looking at them. On a peach-coloured divan sat Lady Narborough pretending to listen to the Duke's description of the last Brazilian beetle* that he had added to his collection. Three young men in elaborate smoking-suits were handing tea-cakes to some of the women. The house-party consisted of twelve people, and there were more expected to arrive on the next day.

'What are you two talking about?' said Lord Henry, strolling over to the table, and putting his cup down. 'I hope Dorian has told you about my plan for rechristening everything, Gladys. It is a delightful idea.'

'But I don't want to be rechristened, Harry,' rejoined the Duchess, looking up at him with her wonderful eyes. 'I am quite satisfied with my own name, and I am sure Mr. Gray should be satisfied with his.'

'My dear Gladys, I would not alter either name for the world. They are both perfect. I was thinking chiefly of flowers. Yesterday I cut an orchid, for my buttonhole. It was a marvellous spotted thing, as effective as the seven deadly sins. In a thoughtless moment I asked one of the gardeners what it was called. He told me it was a fine specimen of Robinsoniana,* or something dreadful of that kind. It is a sad truth, but we have lost the faculty of giving lovely names to things. Names are everything. I never quarrel with actions. My one quarrel is with words. That is the reason I hate vulgar realism in literature. The man who could call a spade a spade should be compelled to use one. It is the only thing he is fit for.'

'Then what should we call you, Harry?' she asked.

'His name is Prince Paradox,' said Dorian.

'I recognize him in a flash,' exclaimed the Duchess.

'I won't hear of it,' laughed Lord Henry, sinking into a chair. 'From a label there is no escape! I refuse the title.'

'Royalties may not abdicate,' fell as a warning from pretty lips.

'You wish me to defend my throne, then?'

'Yes.'

'I give the truths of to-morrow.'

'I prefer the mistakes of to-day,' she answered.

'You disarm me, Gladys,' he cried, catching the wilfulness of her mood.

‘Of your shield, Harry: not of your spear.’

‘I never tilt against Beauty,’ he said, with a wave of his hand.

‘That is your error, Harry, believe me. You value beauty far too much.’

‘How can you say that? I admit that I think that it is better to be beautiful than to be good. But on the other hand no one is more ready than I am to acknowledge that it is better to be good than to be ugly.’

‘Ugliness is one of the seven deadly sins, then?’ cried the Duchess. ‘What becomes of your simile about the orchid?’

‘Ugliness is one of the seven deadly virtues, Gladys. You, as a good Tory, must not underrate them. Beer, the Bible, and the seven deadly virtues have made our England what she is.’

‘You don’t like your country, then?’ she asked.

‘I live in it.’

‘That you may censure it the better.’

‘Would you have me take the verdict of Europe on it?’ he enquired.

‘What do they say of us?’

‘That Tartuffe* has emigrated to England and opened a shop.’

‘Is that yours, Harry?’

‘I give it to you.’

‘I could not use it. It is too true.’

‘You need not be afraid. Our countrymen never recognize a description.’

‘They are practical.’

‘They are more cunning than practical. When they make up their ledger, they balance stupidity by wealth, and vice by hypocrisy.’

‘Still, we have done great things.’

‘Great things have been thrust on us,* Gladys.’

‘We have carried their burden.’

‘Only as far as the Stock Exchange.’

She shook her head. ‘I believe in the race,’ she cried.

‘It represents the survival of the pushing.’*

‘It has development.’

‘Decay fascinates me more.’

‘What of Art?’ she asked.

‘It is a malady.’

‘Love?’

‘An illusion.’

‘Religion?’

‘The fashionable substitute for Belief.’

‘You are a sceptic.’

‘Never! Scepticism is the beginning of Faith.’

‘What are you?’

‘To define is to limit.’

‘Give me a clue.’

‘Threads snap. You would lose your way in the labyrinth.’

‘You bewilder me. Let us talk of some one else.’

‘Our host is a delightful topic. Years ago he was christened Prince Charming.’

‘Ah! don’t remind me of that,’ cried Dorian Gray.

‘Our host is rather horrid this evening,’ answered the Duchess, colouring. ‘I believe he thinks that Monmouth married me on purely scientific principles as the best specimen he could find of a modern butterfly.’

‘Well, I hope he won’t stick pins into you, Duchess,’ laughed Dorian.

‘Oh! my maid does that already, Mr. Gray, when she is annoyed with me.’

‘And what does she get annoyed with you about, Duchess?’

‘For the most trivial things, Mr. Gray, I assure you. Usually because I come in at ten minutes to nine and tell her that I must be dressed by half-past eight.’

‘How unreasonable of her! You should give her warning.’

‘I daren’t, Mr. Gray. Why, she invents hats for me. You remember the one I wore at Lady Hilstone’s garden-party? You don’t, but it is nice of you to pretend that you do. Well, she made it out of nothing. All good hats are made out of nothing.’

‘Like all good reputations, Gladys,’ interrupted Lord Henry. ‘Every effect that one produces gives one an enemy. To be popular one must be a mediocrity.’

‘Not with women,’ said the Duchess, shaking her head; ‘and women rule the world.* I assure you we can’t bear mediocrities. We women, as some one says, love with our ears, just as you men love with your eyes, if you ever love at all.’

‘It seems to me that we never do anything else,’ murmured Dorian.

'Ah! then, you never really love, Mr. Gray,' answered the Duchess, with mock sadness.

'My dear Gladys!' cried Lord Henry. 'How can you say that? Romance lives by repetition, and repetition converts an appetite into an art. Besides, each time that one loves is the only time one has ever loved. Difference of object does not alter singleness of passion. It merely intensifies it. We can have in life but one great experience* at best, and the secret of life is to reproduce that experience as often as possible.'

'Even when one has been wounded by it, Harry?' asked the Duchess, after a pause.

'Especially when one has been wounded by it,' answered Lord Henry.

The Duchess turned and looked at Dorian Gray with a curious expression in her eyes. 'What do you say to that, Mr. Gray?' she enquired.

Dorian hesitated for a moment. Then he threw his head back and laughed. 'I always agree with Harry, Duchess.'

'Even when he is wrong?'

'Harry is never wrong, Duchess.'

'And does his philosophy make you happy?'

'I have never searched for happiness. Who wants happiness? I have searched for pleasure.'

'And found it, Mr. Gray?'

'Often. Too often.'

The Duchess sighed. 'I am searching for peace,' she said, 'and if I don't go and dress, I shall have none this evening.'

'Let me get you some orchids, Duchess,' cried Dorian, starting to his feet, and walking down the conservatory.

'You are flirting disgracefully with him,' said Lord Henry to his cousin. 'You had better take care. He is very fascinating.'

'If he were not, there would be no battle.'

'Greek meets Greek, then?'

'I am on the side of the Trojans. They fought for a woman.*'

'They were defeated.'

'There are worse things than capture,' she answered.

'You gallop with a loose rein.'

'Pace gives life,' was the riposte.

'I shall write it in my diary to-night.'

‘What?’

‘That a burnt child loves the fire.’*

‘I am not even singed. My wings are untouched.’

‘You use them for everything, except flight.’

‘Courage has passed from men to women. It is a new experience for us.’

‘You have a rival.’

‘Who?’

He laughed. ‘Lady Narborough,’ he whispered. ‘She perfectly adores him.’

‘You fill me with apprehension. The appeal to Antiquity is fatal to us who are romanticists.’*

‘Romanticists! You have all the methods of science.’

‘Men have educated us.’

‘But not explained you.’

‘Describe us as a sex,’ was her challenge.

‘Sphinxes without secrets.’*

She looked at him, smiling. ‘How long Mr. Gray is!’ she said. ‘Let us go and help him. I have not yet told him the colour of my frock.’

‘Ah! you must suit your frock to his flowers, Gladys.’

‘That would be a premature surrender.’

‘Romantic Art begins with its climax.’

‘I must keep an opportunity for retreat.’

‘In the Parthian* manner?’

‘They found safety in the desert. I could not do that.’

‘Women are not always allowed a choice,’ he answered, but hardly had he finished the sentence before from the far end of the conservatory came a stifled groan, followed by the dull sound of a heavy fall. Everybody started up. The Duchess stood motionless in horror. And with fear in his eyes Lord Henry rushed through the flapping palms, to find Dorian Gray lying face downwards on the tiled floor in a death-like swoon.

He was carried at once into the blue drawing-room, and laid upon one of the sofas. After a short time he came to himself, and looked round with a dazed expression.

‘What has happened?’ he asked. ‘Oh! I remember. Am I safe here, Harry?’ He began to tremble.

‘My dear Dorian,’ answered Lord Henry, ‘you merely fainted.

That was all. You must have overtired yourself. You had better not come down to dinner. I will take your place.'

'No, I will come down,' he said, struggling to his feet. 'I would rather come down. I must not be alone.'

He went to his room and dressed. There was a wild recklessness of gaiety in his manner as he sat at table, but now and then a thrill of terror ran through him when he remembered that, pressed against the window of the conservatory like a white handkerchief, he had seen the face of James Vane watching him.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE next day he did not leave the house, and, indeed, spent most of the time in his own room, sick with a wild terror of dying, and yet indifferent to life itself. The consciousness of being hunted, snared, tracked down, had begun to dominate him. If the tapestry did but tremble in the wind, he shook. The dead leaves that were blown against the leaded panes seemed to him like his own wasted resolutions and wild regrets. When he closed his eyes, he saw again the sailor's face peering through the mist-stained glass, and horror seemed once more to lay its hand upon his heart.

But perhaps it had been only his fancy that had called vengeance out of the night, and set the hideous shapes of punishment before him. Actual life was chaos, but there was something terribly logical in the imagination. It was the imagination that set remorse to dog the feet of sin. It was the imagination that made each crime bear its misshapen brood. In the common world of fact the wicked were not punished, nor the good rewarded. Success was given to the strong, failure thrust upon the weak. That was all. Besides, had any stranger been prowling round the house he would have been seen by the servants or the keepers. Had any footmarks been found on the flower-beds, the gardeners would have reported it. Yes: it had been merely fancy. Sibyl Vane's brother had not come back to kill him. He had sailed away in his ship to founder in some winter sea. From him, at any rate, he was safe. Why, the man did not know who he was, could not know who he was. The mask of youth had saved him.

And yet if it had been merely an illusion, how terrible it was to think that conscience could raise such fearful phantoms, and give them visible form, and make them move before one! What sort of life would his be if, day and night, shadows of his crime were to peer at him from silent corners, to mock him from secret places, to whisper in his ear as he sat at the feast, to wake him with icy fingers as he lay asleep! As the thought crept through his brain, he grew pale with terror, and the air seemed to him to have become suddenly colder. Oh! in what a wild hour of madness he had killed his friend! How ghastly the mere memory of the scene! He saw it all again. Each hideous detail came back to him with added horror. Out of the black cave of Time, terrible and swathed in scarlet, rose the image of his sin. When Lord Henry came in at six o'clock, he found him crying as one whose heart will break.

It was not till the third day that he ventured to go out. There was something in the clear, pine-scented air of that winter morning that seemed to bring him back his joyousness and his ardour for life. But it was not merely the physical conditions of environment that had caused the change. His own nature had revolted against the excess of anguish that had sought to maim and mar the perfection of its calm. With subtle and finely-wrought temperaments it is always so. Their strong passions must either bruise or bend. They either slay the man, or themselves die. Shallow sorrows and shallow loves live on. The loves and sorrows that are great are destroyed by their own plenitude. Besides, he had convinced himself that he had been the victim of a terror-stricken imagination, and looked back now on his fears with something of pity and not a little of contempt.

After breakfast he walked with the Duchess for an hour in the garden, and then drove across the park to join the shooting-party. The crisp frost lay like salt upon the grass. The sky was an inverted cup of blue metal. A thin film of ice bordered the flat reed-grown lake.

At the corner of the pine-wood he caught sight of Sir Geoffrey Clouston, the Duchess's brother, jerking two spent cartridges out of his gun. He jumped from the cart, and having told the groom to take the mare home, made his way towards his guest through the withered bracken and rough undergrowth.

'Have you had good sport, Geoffrey?' he asked.

'Not very good, Dorian. I think most of the birds have gone to the open.* I dare say it will be better after lunch, when we get to new ground.'

Dorian strolled along by his side. The keen aromatic air, the brown and red lights that glimmered in the wood, the hoarse cries of the beaters ringing out from time to time, and the sharp snaps of the guns that followed, fascinated him, and filled him with a sense of delightful freedom. He was dominated by the carelessness of happiness, by the high indifference of joy.

Suddenly from a lumpy tussock of old grass, some twenty yards in front of them, with black-tipped ears erect, and long hinder limbs throwing it forward, started a hare. It bolted for a thicket of alders. Sir Geoffrey put his gun to his shoulder, but there was something in the animal's grace of movement that strangely charmed Dorian Gray, and he cried out at once, 'Don't shoot it, Geoffrey. Let it live.'

'What nonsense, Dorian!' laughed his companion, and as the hare bounded into the thicket he fired. There were two cries heard, the cry of a hare in pain, which is dreadful, the cry of a man in agony, which is worse.

'Good heavens! I have hit a beater!' exclaimed Sir Geoffrey. 'What an ass the man was to get in front of the guns! Stop shooting there!' he called out at the top of his voice. 'A man is hurt.'

The head-keeper came running up with a stick in his hand.

'Where, sir? Where is he?' he shouted. At the same time the firing ceased along the line.

'Here,' answered Sir Geoffrey, angrily, hurrying towards the thicket. 'Why on earth don't you keep your men back? Spoiled my shooting for the day.'

Dorian watched them as they plunged into the alder-clump, brushing the lithe, swinging branches aside. In a few moments they emerged, dragging a body after them into the sunlight. He turned away in horror. It seemed to him that misfortune followed wherever he went. He heard Sir Geoffrey ask if the man was really dead, and the affirmative answer of the keeper. The wood seemed to him to have become suddenly alive with faces. There was the trampling of myriad feet, and the low buzz of voices. A great copper-breasted pheasant came beating through the boughs overhead.

After a few moments, that were to him, in his perturbed state, like endless hours of pain, he felt a hand laid on his shoulder. He started, and looked round.

'Dorian,' said Lord Henry, 'I had better tell them that the shooting is stopped for to-day. It would not look well to go on.'

‘I wish it were stopped for ever, Harry,’ he answered, bitterly. ‘The whole thing is hideous and cruel. Is the man . . .?’

He could not finish the sentence.

‘I am afraid so,’ rejoined Lord Henry. ‘He got the whole charge of shot in his chest. He must have died almost instantaneously. Come; let us go home.’

They walked side by side in the direction of the avenue for nearly fifty yards without speaking. Then Dorian looked at Lord Henry, and said, with a heavy sigh, ‘It is a bad omen, Harry, a very bad omen.’

‘What is?’ asked Lord Henry. ‘Oh! this accident, I suppose. My dear fellow, it can’t be helped. It was the man’s own fault. Why did he get in front of the guns? Besides, it is nothing to us. It is rather awkward for Geoffrey, of course. It does not do to pepper beaters.* It makes people think that one is a wild shot. And Geoffrey is not; he shoots very straight. But there is no use talking about the matter.’

Dorian shook his head. ‘It is a bad omen, Harry. I feel as if something horrible were going to happen to some of us. To myself, perhaps,’ he added, passing his hand over his eyes, with a gesture of pain.

The elder man laughed. ‘The only horrible thing in the world is ennui, Dorian. That is the one sin for which there is no forgiveness. But we are not likely to suffer from it, unless these fellows keep chattering about this thing at dinner. I must tell them that the subject is to be tabooed. As for omens, there is no such thing as an omen. Destiny* does not send us heralds. She is too wise or too cruel for that. Besides, what on earth could happen to you, Dorian? You have everything in the world that a man can want. There is no one who would not be delighted to change places with you.’

‘There is no one with whom I would not change places, Harry. Don’t laugh like that. I am telling you the truth. The wretched peasant who has just died is better off than I am. I have no terror of Death. It is the coming of Death that terrifies me. Its monstrous wings seem to wheel in the leaden air around me. Good heavens! don’t you see a man moving behind the trees there, watching me, waiting for me?’

Lord Henry looked in the direction in which the trembling gloved hand was pointing. ‘Yes,’ he said, smiling, ‘I see the gardener waiting for you. I suppose he wants to ask you what flowers you wish to have on the table to-night. How absurdly nervous you are, my dear fellow! You must come and see my doctor, when we get back to town.'

Dorian heaved a sigh of relief as he saw the gardener approaching. The man touched his hat, glanced for a moment at Lord Henry in a hesitating manner, and then produced a letter, which he handed to his master. 'Her Grace told me to wait for an answer,' he murmured.

Dorian put the letter into his pocket. 'Tell her Grace that I am coming in,' he said, coldly. The man turned round, and went rapidly in the direction of the house.

'How fond women are of doing dangerous things!' laughed Lord Henry. 'It is one of the qualities in them that I admire most. A woman will flirt with anybody in the world as long as other people are looking on.'

'How fond you are of saying dangerous things, Harry! In the present instance you are quite astray. I like the Duchess very much, but I don't love her.'

'And the Duchess loves you very much, but she likes you less, so you are excellently matched.'

'You are talking scandal, Harry, and there is never any basis for scandal.'

'The basis of every scandal is an immoral certainty,'* said Lord Henry, lighting a cigarette.

'You would sacrifice anybody, Harry, for the sake of an epigram.'*

'The world goes to the altar of its own accord,' was the answer.

'I wish I could love,' cried Dorian Gray, with a deep note of pathos in his voice. 'But I seem to have lost the passion, and forgotten the desire. I am too much concentrated on myself. My own personality has become a burden to me. I want to escape, to go away, to forget. It was silly of me to come down here at all. I think I shall send a wire to Harvey to have the yacht got ready. On a yacht one is safe.'

'Safe from what, Dorian? You are in some trouble. Why not tell me what it is? You know I would help you.'

'I can't tell you, Harry,' he answered, sadly. 'And I dare say it is only a fancy of mine. This unfortunate accident has upset me. I have a horrible presentiment that something of the kind may happen to me.'

'What nonsense!'

'I hope it is, but I can't help feeling it. Ah! here is the Duchess, looking like Artemis* in a tailor-made gown. You see we have come back, Duchess.'

'I have heard all about it, Mr. Gray,' she answered. 'Poor Geoffrey is terribly upset. And it seems that you asked him not to shoot the hare. How curious!'

'Yes, it was very curious. I don't know what made me say it. Some whim, I suppose. It looked the loveliest of little live things. But I am sorry they told you about the man. It is a hideous subject.'

'It is an annoying subject,' broke in Lord Henry. 'It has no psychological value at all. Now if Geoffrey had done the thing on purpose, how interesting he would be! I should like to know some one who had committed a real murder.'

'How horrid of you, Harry!' cried the Duchess. 'Isn't it, Mr. Gray? Harry, Mr. Gray is ill again. He is going to faint.'

Dorian drew himself up with an effort, and smiled. 'It is nothing, Duchess,' he murmured; 'my nerves are dreadfully out of order. That is all. I am afraid I walked too far this morning. I didn't hear what Harry said. Was it very bad? You must tell me some other time. I think I must go and lie down. You will excuse me, won't you?'

They had reached the great flight of steps that led from the conservatory on to the terrace. As the glass door closed behind Dorian, Lord Henry turned and looked at the Duchess with his slumberous eyes. 'Are you very much in love with him?' he asked.

She did not answer for some time, but stood gazing at the landscape. 'I wish I knew,' she said at last.

He shook his head. 'Knowledge would be fatal. It is the uncertainty that charms one. A mist makes things wonderful.'

'One may lose one's way.'

'All ways end at the same point, my dear Gladys.'

'What is that?'

'Disillusion.'

'It was my début in life,' she sighed.

'It came to you crowned.'

'I am tired of strawberry leaves.'*

'They become you.'

'Only in public.'

'You would miss them,' said Lord Henry.

'I will not part with a petal.'

'Monmouth has ears.'

'Old age is dull of hearing.'

'Has he never been jealous?'

‘I wish he had been.’

He glanced about as if in search of something. ‘What are you looking for?’ she enquired.

‘The button from your foil,’ he answered. ‘You have dropped it.’

She laughed. ‘I have still the mask.’

‘It makes your eyes lovelier,’* was his reply.

She laughed again. Her teeth showed like white seeds in a scarlet fruit.

Upstairs, in his own room, Dorian Gray was lying on a sofa, with terror in every tingling fibre of his body. Life had suddenly become too hideous a burden for him to bear. The dreadful death of the unlucky beater, shot in the thicket like a wild animal, had seemed to him to prefigure death for himself also. He had nearly swooned at what Lord Henry had said in a chance mood of cynical jesting.

At five o’clock he rang his bell for his servant and gave him orders to pack his things for the night-express to town, and to have the brougham at the door by eight-thirty. He was determined not to sleep another night at Selby Royal. It was an ill-omened place. Death walked there in the sunlight. The grass of the forest had been spotted with blood.

Then he wrote a note to Lord Henry, telling him that he was going up to town to consult his doctor, and asking him to entertain his guests in his absence. As he was putting it into the envelope, a knock came to the door, and his valet informed him that the head-keeper wished to see him. He frowned, and bit his lip. ‘Send him in,’ he muttered, after some moments’ hesitation.

As soon as the man entered Dorian pulled his cheque-book out of a drawer, and spread it out before him.

‘I suppose you have come about the unfortunate accident of this morning, Thornton?’ he said, taking up a pen.

‘Yes, sir,’ answered the gamekeeper.

‘Was the poor fellow married? Had he any people dependent on him?’ asked Dorian, looking bored. ‘If so, I should not like them to be left in want, and will send them any sum of money you may think necessary.’

‘We don’t know who he is, sir. That is what I took the liberty of coming to you about.’

‘Don’t know who he is?’ said Dorian, listlessly. ‘What do you mean? Wasn’t he one of your men?’

‘No, sir. Never saw him before. Seems like a sailor, sir.’

The pen dropped from Dorian Gray’s hand, and he felt as if his heart had suddenly stopped beating. ‘A sailor?’ he cried out. ‘Did you say a sailor?’

‘Yes, sir. He looks as if he had been a sort of sailor; tattooed on both arms, and that kind of thing.’

‘Was there anything found on him?’ said Dorian, leaning forward and looking at the man with startled eyes. ‘Anything that would tell his name?’

‘Some money, sir—not much, and a six-shooter. There was no name of any kind. A decent-looking man, sir, but rough-like. A sort of sailor we think.’

Dorian started to his feet. A terrible hope fluttered past him. He clutched at it madly. ‘Where is the body?’ he exclaimed. ‘Quick! I must see it at once.’

‘It is in an empty stable in the Home Farm, sir. The folk don’t like to have that sort of thing in their houses. They say a corpse brings bad luck.’

‘The Home Farm! Go there at once and meet me. Tell one of the grooms to bring my horse round. No. Never mind. I’ll go to the stables myself. It will save time.’

In less than a quarter of an hour Dorian Gray was galloping down the long avenue as hard as he could go. The trees seemed to sweep past him in spectral procession, and wild shadows to fling themselves across his path. Once the mare swerved at a white gate-post and nearly threw him. He lashed her across the neck with his crop. She cleft the dusky air like an arrow. The stones flew from her hoofs.

At last he reached the Home Farm. Two men were loitering in the yard. He leapt from the saddle and threw the reins to one of them. In the farthest stable a light was glimmering. Something seemed to tell him that the body was there, and he hurried to the door, and put his hand upon the latch.

There he paused for a moment, feeling that he was on the brink of a discovery that would either make or mar his life. Then he thrust the door open, and entered.

On a heap of sacking in the far corner was lying the dead body of a man dressed in a coarse shirt and a pair of blue trousers. A spotted handkerchief had been placed over the face. A coarse candle, stuck in a bottle, sputtered beside it.

Dorian Gray shuddered. He felt that his could not be the hand to take the handkerchief away, and called out to one of the farm-servants to come to him.

‘Take that thing off the face. I wish to see it,’ he said, clutching at the doorpost for support.

When the farm-servant had done so, he stepped forward. A cry of joy broke from his lips. The man who had been shot in the thicket was James Vane.

He stood there for some minutes looking at the dead body. As he rode home, his eyes were full of tears, for he knew he was safe.

CHAPTER XIX

‘THERE is no use your telling me that you are going to be good,’ cried Lord Henry, dipping his white fingers into a red copper bowl filled with rose-water. ‘You are quite perfect. Pray, don’t change.’

Dorian Gray shook his head. ‘No, Harry, I have done too many dreadful things in my life. I am not going to do any more. I began my good actions yesterday.’

‘Where were you yesterday?’

‘In the country, Harry. I was staying at a little inn by myself.’

‘My dear boy,’ said Lord Henry, smiling, ‘anybody can be good in the country. There are no temptations there. That is the reason why people who live out of town are so absolutely uncivilized. Civilization is not by any means an easy thing to attain to. There are only two ways by which man can reach it. One is by being cultured, the other by being corrupt. Country people have no opportunity of being either, so they stagnate.’

‘Culture and corruption,’ echoed Dorian. ‘I have known something of both. It seems terrible to me now that they should ever be found together. For I have a new ideal, Harry. I am going to alter. I think I have altered.’

‘You have not yet told me what your good action was. Or did you say you had done more than one?’ asked his companion, as he spilt into his plate a little crimson pyramid of seeded strawberries, and through a perforated shell-shaped spoon snowed white sugar upon them.

‘I can tell you, Harry. It is not a story I could tell to any one else.’

I spared somebody. It sounds vain, but you understand what I mean. She was quite beautiful, and wonderfully like Sibyl Vane. I think it was that which first attracted me to her. You remember Sibyl, don't you? How long ago that seems! Well, Hetty was not one of our own class, of course. She was simply a girl in a village. But I really loved her. I am quite sure that I loved her. All during this wonderful May that we have been having, I used to run down and see her two or three times a week. Yesterday she met me in a little orchard. The apple-blossoms kept tumbling down on her hair, and she was laughing. We were to have gone away together this morning at dawn. Suddenly I determined to leave her as flower-like as I had found her.'

'I should think the novelty of the emotion must have given you a thrill of real pleasure, Dorian,' interrupted Lord Henry. 'But I can finish your idyll for you. You gave her good advice, and broke her heart. That was the beginning of your reformation.'

'Harry, you are horrible! You mustn't say these dreadful things. Hetty's heart is not broken. Of course she cried, and all that. But there is no disgrace upon her. She can live, like Perdita, in her garden of mint and marigold.'

'And weep over a faithless Florizel,'* said Lord Henry, laughing, as he leant back in his chair. 'My dear Dorian, you have the most curiously boyish moods. Do you think this girl will ever be really contented now with any one of her own rank? I suppose she will be married some day to a rough carter or a grinning ploughman. Well, the fact of having met you, and loved you, will teach her to despise her husband, and she will be wretched. From a moral point of view, I cannot say that I think much of your great renunciation. Even as a beginning, it is poor. Besides, how do you know that Hetty isn't floating at the present moment in some star-lit mill-pond, with lovely water-lilies round her, like Ophelia?''*

'I can't bear this, Harry! You mock at everything, and then suggest the most serious tragedies. I am sorry I told you now. I don't care what you say to me. I know I was right in acting as I did. Poor Hetty! As I rode past the farm this morning, I saw her white face at the window, like a spray of jasmine. Don't let us talk about it any more, and don't try to persuade me that the first good action I have done for years, the first little bit of self-sacrifice I have ever known, is really a sort of sin. I want to be better. I am going to be better. Tell me something about yourself. What is going on in town? I have not been to the club for days.'

'The people are still discussing poor Basil's disappearance.'

'I should have thought they had got tired of that by this time,' said Dorian, pouring himself out some wine, and frowning slightly.

'My dear boy, they have only been talking about it for six weeks, and the British public are really not equal to the mental strain of having more than one topic every three months. They have been very fortunate lately, however. They have had my own divorce-case, and Alan Campbell's suicide. Now they have got the mysterious disappearance of an artist. Scotland Yard* still insists that the man in the grey ulster who left for Paris by the midnight train on the ninth of November was poor Basil, and the French police declare that Basil never arrived in Paris at all. I suppose in about a fortnight we shall be told that he has been seen in San Francisco. It is an odd thing, but every one who disappears is said to be seen at San Francisco.* It must be a delightful city, and possess all the attractions of the next world.'

'What do you think has happened to Basil?' asked Dorian, holding up his Burgundy against the light, and wondering how it was that he could discuss the matter so calmly.

'I have not the slightest idea. If Basil chooses to hide himself, it is no business of mine. If he is dead, I don't want to think about him. Death is the only thing that ever terrifies me. I hate it.'

'Why?' said the younger man, wearily.

'Because,' said Lord Henry, passing beneath his nostrils the gilt trellis of an open vinaigrette box,* 'one can survive everything nowadays except that. Death and vulgarity are the only two facts in the nineteenth century that one cannot explain away. Let us have our coffee in the music-room, Dorian. You must play Chopin to me. The man with whom my wife ran away played Chopin exquisitely. Poor Victoria! I was very fond of her. The house is rather lonely without her. Of course married life is merely a habit, a bad habit. But then one regrets the loss even of one's worst habits. Perhaps one regrets them the most. They are such an essential part of one's personality.'

Dorian said nothing, but rose from the table, and, passing into the next room, sat down to the piano and let his fingers stray across the white and black ivory of the keys. After the coffee had been brought in, he stopped, and, looking over at Lord Henry, said, 'Harry, did it ever occur to you that Basil was murdered?'

Lord Henry yawned. 'Basil was very popular, and always wore a Waterbury watch.* Why should he have been murdered? He was not clever enough to have enemies. Of course he had a wonderful genius for painting. But a man can paint like Velasquez* and yet be as dull as possible. Basil was really rather dull. He only interested me once, and that was when he told me, years ago, that he had a wild adoration for you, and that you were the dominant motive of his art.'

'I was very fond of Basil,' said Dorian, with a note of sadness in his voice. 'But don't people say that he was murdered?'

'Oh, some of the papers do. It does not seem to me to be at all probable. I know there are dreadful places in Paris, but Basil was not the sort of man to have gone to them. He had no curiosity. It was his chief defect.'

'What would you say, Harry, if I told you that I had murdered Basil?' said the younger man. He watched him intently after he had spoken.

'I would say, my dear fellow, that you were posing for a character that doesn't suit you. All crime is vulgar, just as all vulgarity is crime. It is not in you, Dorian, to commit a murder. I am sorry if I hurt your vanity by saying so, but I assure you it is true. Crime belongs exclusively to the lower orders. I don't blame them in the smallest degree. I should fancy that crime was to them what art is to us, simply a method of procuring extraordinary sensations.'

'A method of procuring sensations? Do you think, then, that a man who has once committed a murder could possibly do the same crime again? Don't tell me that.'

'Oh! anything becomes a pleasure if one does it too often,' cried Lord Henry, laughing. 'That is one of the most important secrets of life. I should fancy, however, that murder is always a mistake. One should never do anything that one cannot talk about after dinner. But let us pass from poor Basil. I wish I could believe that he had come to such a really romantic end as you suggest; but I can't. I dare say he fell into the Seine off an omnibus, and that the conductor hushed up the scandal. Yes: I should fancy that was his end. I see him lying now on his back under those dull-green waters with the heavy barges floating over him, and long weeds catching in his hair. Do you know, I don't think he would have done much more good work. During the last ten years his painting had gone off very much.'

Dorian heaved a sigh, and Lord Henry strolled across the room and began to stroke the head of a curious Java parrot, a large grey-plumaged bird, with pink crest and tail, that was balancing itself upon a bamboo perch. As his pointed fingers touched it, it dropped the white scurf of crinkled lids over black glass-like eyes, and began to sway backwards and forwards.

‘Yes,’ he continued, turning round, and taking his handkerchief out of his pocket; ‘his painting had quite gone off. It seemed to me to have lost something. It had lost an ideal. When you and he ceased to be great friends, he ceased to be a great artist. What was it separated you? I suppose he bored you. If so, he never forgave you. It’s a habit bores have. By the way, what has become of that wonderful portrait he did of you? I don’t think I have ever seen it since he finished it. Oh! I remember your telling me years ago that you had sent it down to Selby, and that it had got mislaid or stolen on the way. You never got it back? What a pity! It was really a masterpiece. I remember I wanted to buy it. I wish I had now. It belonged to Basil’s best period. Since then, his work was that curious mixture of bad painting and good intentions that always entitles a man to be called a representative British artist. Did you advertise for it? You should.’

‘I forget,’ said Dorian. ‘I suppose I did. But I never really liked it. I am sorry I sat for it. The memory of the thing is hateful to me. Why do you talk of it? It used to remind me of those curious lines in some play—“Hamlet,” I think—how do they run?—

*“Like the painting of a sorrow, A face without a heart.”**

Yes: that is what it was like.’

Lord Henry laughed. ‘If a man treats life artistically, his brain is his heart,’ he answered, sinking into an arm-chair.

Dorian Gray shook his head, and struck some soft chords on the piano. “‘Like the painting of a sorrow,’” he repeated, “‘a face without a heart.’”

The elder man lay back and looked at him with half-closed eyes. ‘By the way, Dorian,’ he said, after a pause, “‘what does it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose—how does the quotation run?—his own soul’*?”

The music jarred and Dorian Gray started, and stared at his friend. ‘Why do you ask me that, Harry?’

‘My dear fellow,’ said Lord Henry, elevating his eyebrows in surprise, 'I asked you because I thought you might be able to give me an answer. That is all. I was going through the Park last Sunday, and close by the Marble Arch there stood a little crowd of shabby-looking people listening to some vulgar street-preacher. As I passed by, I heard the man yelling out that question to his audience. It struck me as being rather dramatic. London is very rich in curious effects of that kind. A wet Sunday, an uncouth Christian in a mackintosh, a ring of sickly white faces under a broken roof of dripping umbrellas, and a wonderful phrase flung into the air by shrill, hysterical lips—it was really very good in its way, quite a suggestion. I thought of telling the prophet that Art had a soul, but that man had not. I am afraid, however, he would not have understood me.'

'Don't, Harry. The soul is a terrible reality. It can be bought, and sold, and bartered away. It can be poisoned, or made perfect. There is a soul in each one of us. I know it.'

'Do you feel quite sure of that, Dorian?'

'Quite sure.'

'Ah! then it must be an illusion. The things one feels absolutely certain about are never true. That is the fatality of Faith, and the lesson of Romance. How grave you are! Don't be so serious. What have you or I to do with the superstitions of our age? No: we have given up our belief in the soul. Play me something. Play me a nocturne, Dorian, and, as you play, tell me, in a low voice, how you have kept your youth. You must have some secret. I am only ten years older than you are, and I am wrinkled, and worn, and yellow. You are really wonderful, Dorian. You have never looked more charming than you do to-night. You remind me of the day I saw you first. You were rather cheeky, very shy, and absolutely extraordinary. You have changed, of course, but not in appearance. I wish you would tell me your secret. To get back my youth I would do anything in the world, except take exercise, get up early, or be respectable.* Youth! There is nothing like it. It's absurd to talk of the ignorance of youth. The only people to whose opinions I listen now with any respect are people much younger than myself. They seem in front of me. Life has revealed to them her latest wonder. As for the aged, I always contradict the aged. I do it on principle. If you ask them their opinion on something that happened yesterday, they solemnly give you the opinions current in 1820, when people wore high stocks,* believed in everything, and knew absolutely nothing. How lovely that thing you are playing is! I wonder did Chopin write it at Majorca,* with the sea weeping round the villa, and the salt spray dashing against the panes? It is marvellously romantic. What a blessing it is that there is one art left to us that is not imitative!* Don't stop. I want music to-night. It seems to me that you are the young Apollo, and that I am Marsyas* listening to you. I have sorrows, Dorian, of my own, that even you know nothing of. The tragedy of old age is not that one is old, but that one is young. I am amazed sometimes at my own sincerity. Ah, Dorian, how happy you are! What an exquisite life you have had! You have drunk deeply of everything. You have crushed the grapes against your palate. Nothing has been hidden from you. And it has all been to you no more than the sound of music. It has not marred you. You are still the same.'

'I am not the same, Harry.'

'Yes: you are the same. I wonder what the rest of your life will be. Don't spoil it by renunciations. At present you are a perfect type. Don't make yourself incomplete. You are quite flawless now. You need not shake your head: you know you are. Besides, Dorian, don't deceive yourself. Life is not governed by will or intention. Life is a question of nerves, and fibres, and slowly built-up cells* in which thought hides itself and passion has its dreams. You may fancy yourself safe, and think yourself strong. But a chance tone of colour in a room or a morning sky, a particular perfume that you had once loved and that brings subtle memories with it, a line from a forgotten poem that you had come across again, a cadence from a piece of music that you had ceased to play—I tell you, Dorian, that it is on things like these that our lives depend. Browning writes about that somewhere,* but our own senses will imagine them for us. There are moments when the odour of lilas blanc* passes suddenly across me, and I have to live the strangest month of my life over again. I wish I could change places with you, Dorian. The world has cried out against us both, but it has always worshipped you. It always will worship you. You are the type of what the age is searching for, and what it is afraid it has found. I am so glad that you have never done anything, never carved a statue, or painted a picture, or produced anything outside of yourself! Life has been your art. You have set yourself to music. Your days are your sonnets.'

Dorian rose up from the piano, and passed his hand through his hair. 'Yes, life has been exquisite,' he murmured, 'but I am not going to have the same life, Harry. And you must not say these extravagant things to me. You don't know everything about me. I think that if you did, even you would turn from me. You laugh. Don't laugh.'

'Why have you stopped playing, Dorian? Go back and give me the nocturne over again. Look at that great honey-coloured moon that hangs in the dusky air. She is waiting for you to charm her, and if you play she will come closer to the earth. You won't? Let us go to the club, then. It has been a charming evening, and we must end it charmingly. There is some one at White's who wants immensely to know you—young Lord Poole, Bournemouth's eldest son. He has already copied your neckties, and has begged me to introduce him to you. He is quite delightful, and rather reminds me of you.'

'I hope not,' said Dorian, with a sad look in his eyes. 'But I am tired to-night, Harry. I shan't go to the club. It is nearly eleven, and I want to go to bed early.'

'Do stay. You have never played so well as to-night. There was something in your touch that was wonderful. It had more expression than I had ever heard from it before.'

'It is because I am going to be good,' he answered, smiling. 'I am a little changed already.'

'You cannot change to me, Dorian,' said Lord Henry. 'You and I will always be friends.'

'Yet you poisoned me with a book once. I should not forgive that. Harry, promise me that you will never lend that book to any one. It does harm.'

'My dear boy, you are really beginning to moralize. You will soon be going about like the converted, and the revivalist, warning people against all the sins of which you have grown tired. You are much too delightful to do that. Besides, it is no use. You and I are what we are, and will be what we will be. As for being poisoned by a book, there is no such thing as that. Art has no influence upon action. It annihilates the desire to act. It is superbly sterile. The books that the world calls immoral are books that show the world its own shame. That is all. But we won't discuss literature. Come round to-morrow. I am going to ride at eleven. We might go together, and I will take you to lunch afterwards with Lady Branksome. She is a charming woman, and wants to consult you about some tapestries she is thinking of buying. Mind you come. Or shall we lunch with our little Duchess? She says she never sees you now. Perhaps you are tired of Gladys? I thought you would be. Her clever tongue gets on one's nerves. Well, in any case, be here at eleven.'

'Must I really come, Harry?'

'Certainly. The Park is quite lovely now. I don't think there have been such lilacs since the year I met you.'

'Very well. I shall be here at eleven,' said Dorian. 'Good-night, Harry.' As he reached the door he hesitated for a moment, as if he had something more to say. Then he sighed and went out.

CHAPTER XX

It was a lovely night, so warm that he threw his coat over his arm, and did not even put his silk scarf round his throat. As he strolled home, smoking his cigarette, two young men in evening dress passed him. He heard one of them whisper to the other, 'That is Dorian Gray.' He remembered how pleased he used to be when he was pointed out, or stared at, or talked about. He was tired of hearing his own name now. Half the charm of the little village where he had been so often lately was that no one knew who he was. He had often told the girl whom he had lured to love him that he was poor, and she had believed him. He had told her once that he was wicked, and she had laughed at him, and answered that wicked people were always very old and very ugly. What a laugh she had!—just like a thrush singing. And how pretty she had been in her cotton dresses and her large hats! She knew nothing, but she had everything that he had lost.

When he reached home, he found his servant waiting up for him. He sent him to bed, and threw himself down on the sofa in the library, and began to think over some of the things that Lord Henry had said to him.

Was it really true that one could never change? He felt a wild longing for the unstained purity of his boyhood—his rose-white boyhood, as Lord Henry had once called it. He knew that he had tarnished himself, filled his mind with corruption and given horror to his fancy; that he had been an evil influence to others, and had experienced a terrible joy in being so; and that of the lives that had crossed his own it had been the fairest and the most full of promise that he had brought to shame. But was it all irretrievable? Was there no hope for him?

Ah! in what a monstrous moment of pride and passion he had prayed that the portrait should bear the burden of his days, and he keep the unsullied splendour of eternal youth! All his failure had been due to that. Better for him that each sin of his life had brought its sure, swift penalty along with it. There was purification in punishment. Not 'Forgive us our sins,' but 'Smite us for our iniquities,' should be the prayer of man to a most just God.

The curiously-carved mirror that Lord Henry had given to him, so many years ago now, was standing on the table, and the white-limbed Cupids laughed round as of old. He took it up, as he had done on that night of horror, when he had first noted the change in the fatal picture, and with wild tear-dimmed eyes looked into its polished shield. Once, some one who had terribly loved him, had written to him a mad letter, ending with these idolatrous words: 'The world is changed because you are made of ivory and gold. The curves of your lips rewrite history.' The phrases came back to his memory, and he repeated them over and over to himself. Then he loathed his own beauty, and flinging the mirror on the floor crushed it into silver splinters beneath his heel. It was his beauty that had ruined him, his beauty and the youth that he had prayed for. But for those two things, his life might have been free from stain. His beauty had been to him but a mask, his youth but a mockery. What was youth at best? A green, and unripe time, a time of shallow moods, and sickly thoughts. Why had he worn its livery? Youth had spoiled him.

It was better not to think of the past. Nothing could alter that. It was of himself, and of his own future, that he had to think. James Vane was hidden in a nameless grave in Selby churchyard. Alan Campbell had shot himself one night in his laboratory, but had not revealed the secret that he had been forced to know. The excitement, such as it was, over Basil Hallward's disappearance, would soon pass away. It was already waning. He was perfectly safe there. Nor, indeed, was it the death of Basil Hallward that weighed most upon his mind. It was the living death of his own soul that troubled him. Basil had painted the portrait that had marred his life. He could not forgive him that. It was the portrait that had done everything. Basil had said things to him that were unbearable, and that he had yet borne with patience. The murder had been simply the madness of a moment. As for Alan Campbell, his suicide had been his own act. He had chosen to do it. It was nothing to him.

A new life! That was what he wanted. That was what he was waiting for. Surely he had begun it already. He had spared one innocent thing, at any rate. He would never again tempt innocence. He would be good.

As he thought of Hetty Merton, he began to wonder if the portrait in the locked room had changed. Surely it was not still so horrible as it had been? Perhaps if his life became pure, he would be able to expel every sign of evil passion from the face. Perhaps the signs of evil had already gone away. He would go and look.

He took the lamp from the table and crept upstairs. As he unbarred the door, a smile of joy flitted across his strangely young-looking face and lingered for a moment about his lips. Yes, he would be good, and the hideous thing that he had hidden away would no longer be a terror to him. He felt as if the load had been lifted from him already.

He went in quietly, locking the door behind him, as was his custom, and dragged the purple hanging from the portrait. A cry of pain and indignation broke from him. He could see no change, save that in the eyes there was a look of cunning, and in the mouth the curved wrinkle of the hypocrite. The thing was still loathsome—more loathsome, if possible, than before—and the scarlet dew that spotted the hand seemed brighter, and more like blood newly spilt. Then he trembled. Had it been merely vanity that had made him do his one good deed? Or the desire for a new sensation, as Lord Henry had hinted, with his mocking laugh? Or that passion to act a part that sometimes makes us do things finer than we are ourselves? Or, perhaps, all these? And why was the red stain larger than it had been? It seemed to have crept like a horrible disease over the wrinkled fingers. There was blood on the painted feet, as though the thing had dripped—blood even on the hand that had not held the knife. Confess? Did it mean that he was to confess? To give himself up, and be put to death? He laughed. He felt that the idea was monstrous. Besides, even if he did confess, who would believe him? There was no trace of the murdered man anywhere. Everything belonging to him had been destroyed. He himself had burned what had been below-stairs. The world would simply say that he was mad. They would shut him up if he persisted in his story. . . . Yet it was his duty to confess, to suffer public shame, and to make public atonement. There was a God who called upon men to tell their sins to earth as well as to heaven. Nothing that he could do would cleanse him till he had told his own sin. His sin? He shrugged his shoulders. The death of Basil Hallward seemed very little to him. He was thinking of Hetty Merton. For it was an unjust mirror, this mirror of his soul that he was looking at. Vanity? Curiosity? Hypocrisy? Had there been nothing more in his renunciation than that? There had been something more. At least he thought so. But who could tell? . . . No. There had been nothing more. Through vanity he had spared her. In hypocrisy he had worn the mask of goodness. For curiosity's sake he had tried the denial of self. He recognized that now.

But this murder—was it to dog him all his life? Was he always to be burdened by his past? Was he really to confess? Never. There was only one bit of evidence left against him. The picture itself—that was evidence. He would destroy it. Why had he kept it so long? Once it had given him pleasure to watch it changing and growing old. Of late he had felt no such pleasure. It had kept him awake at night. When he had been away, he had been filled with terror lest other eyes should look upon it. It had brought melancholy across his passions. Its mere memory had marred many moments of joy. It had been like conscience to him. Yes, it had been conscience. He would destroy it.

He looked round, and saw the knife that had stabbed Basil Hallward. He had cleaned it many times, till there was no stain left upon it. It was bright, and glistened. As it had killed the painter, so it would kill the painter's work, and all that that meant. It would kill the past, and when that was dead he would be free. It would kill this monstrous soul-life, and, without its hideous warnings, he would be at peace. He seized the thing, and stabbed the picture with it.

There was a cry heard, and a crash. The cry was so horrible in its agony that the frightened servants woke, and crept out of their rooms. Two gentlemen, who were passing in the Square below, stopped, and looked up at the great house. They walked on till they met a policeman, and brought him back. The man rang the bell several times, but there was no answer. Except for a light in one of the top windows, the house was all dark. After a time, he went away, and stood in an adjoining portico and watched.

'Whose house is that, constable?' asked the elder of the two gentlemen.

'Mr. Dorian Gray's, sir,' answered the policeman.

They looked at each other, as they walked away, and sneered. One of them was Sir Henry Ashton's uncle.

Inside, in the servants' part of the house, the half-clad domestics were talking in low whispers to each other. Old Mrs. Leaf was crying, and wringing her hands. Francis was as pale as death.

After about a quarter of an hour, he got the coachman and one of the footmen and crept upstairs. They knocked, but there was no reply. They called out. Everything was still. Finally, after vainly trying to force the door, they got on the roof, and dropped down on to the balcony. The windows yielded easily: their bolts were old.

When they entered, they found hanging upon the wall a splendid portrait of their master as they had last seen him, in all the wonder of his exquisite youth and beauty. Lying on the floor was a dead man, in evening dress, with a knife in his heart. He was withered, wrinkled, and loathsome of visage. It was not till they had examined the rings that they recognized who it was.

THE END.

EXPLANATORY NOTES

Abbreviations

- CL*      The Complete Letters of Oscar Wilde, ed. Merlin Holland and Rupert Hart-Davis (London: Fourth Estate, 2000)
- CW*      The Complete Works of Oscar Wilde, gen. ed.: Ian Small, 3 vols. to date (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2000–)
- CWks*    The Collected Works of Oscar Wilde, 14 vols., ed. Robert Ross (London: Methuen, 1908)
- Gaston*    Walter Pater, Gaston de Latour: The Revised Text, Based on the Definitive Manuscripts and Enlarged to Incorporate All Known Fragments, ed. Gerald Monsman (Greensboro, NC: ELT Press, 1995)
- Huysmans*    Joris-Karl Huysmans, Against Nature, trans. Magaret Mauldon, ed. Nicholas White (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998)
- IPSM*      Merlin Holland, Irish Peacock and Scarlet Marquess: The Real Trial of Oscar Wilde (London: Fourth Estate, 2003)
- Lemprière*    J. Lemprière, A Classical Dictionary, revised edn., ed. T. Smith (T. Allman, 1833).
- Marius*      Walter Pater, Marius the Epicurean: His Sensations and Ideas, 2nd edn., 2 vols. (London: Macmillan, 1885)
- OW*        Oscar Wilde, ed. Isobel Murray, The Oxford Authors, 2nd edn. (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000)
- PDGO*      Wilde, The Picture of Dorian Gray, ed. Isobel Murray (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1998).
- Renaissance*    Walter Pater, Studies in the History of the Renaissance (London: Macmillan, 1873)
- TOW*        H. Montgomery Hyde, The Trials of Oscar Wilde, 2nd edn. (New York: Dover, 1973)

The notes that follow are largely based on the more expansive annotation that I provide in the Oxford English Texts (OET) volume which includes both the 1890 and 1891 editions of The Picture of Dorian Gray. Since Wilde's main sources—especially Théophile Gautier's Émaux et camées (1852), J. K. Huysmans's A rebours (1884), Pater's writings, and Suetonius' Lives of the Caesars—remain crucial to our understanding of his novel, the notes provide detailed information that clarifies his numerous references to these works. Wherever possible, I have, for the sake of historical accuracy, quoted from sources that would have been available to Wilde. On this basis, I allude to Walter Pater's Studies of the Renaissance (1873), since Wilde drew on the wording of this first edition, which at times differs from the three subsequent editions of Pater's study that appeared in 1877, 1888, and 1893 respectively.

It was Wilde's habit to reuse striking aphorisms, memorable turns of phrase, and cherished bons mots throughout his oeuvre. I have identified some of the more prominent places where The Picture of Dorian Gray both echoes his earlier works and exerts influence on the wording on some of his later writings. The notes disclose that Wilde drew on his novel for some of the more witty exchanges that take place in his Society Comedies, especially A Woman of No Importance, which was staged in 1893. Likewise, Wilde tended to reuse proper names in his writings, and on several occasions I have explained where they reappear.

I have listed the more noticeable changes that Wilde made when he revised and expanded the thirteen-chapter 1890 Lippincott's Magazine edition for the twenty-chapter single volume that Ward, Lock & Co issued in 1891. In the notes below I occasionally mention details from some of the manuscripts of the chapters that Wilde added to the 1890 edition of his novel. Full details of all of Wilde's manuscripts, along with the many textual differences between the 1890 and 1891 editions of his novel, appear in the OET edition.

- 3 THE PREFACE: a draft of the 'The Preface', titled 'Dogmas for the Use of the Aged', is held in the Hyde Eccles Collection, British Library. 'The Preface' was first published as 'A Preface to "Dorian Gray"', Fortnightly Review, NS 44 (Mar. 1891), 480–1. At the time, the Fortnightly, a well-regarded liberal-minded magazine established in 1865, was edited by Wilde's friend, Frank Harris (1856–1931). Many of the aphorisms in 'The Preface' anticipate some of the most memorable phrases in the chapters that follow: e.g. 'The highest as the lowest form of criticism is a mode of autobiography'; cf. p. 13: 'We live in an age when men treat art as if it were meant to be a form of autobiography.'

'The Preface' posed a challenge to those hostile reviewers who had passed censure on the 1890 edition of Wilde's novel nine months previously. (He wrote to a correspondent in March 1891: 'My novel appears in volume form next month, and I am curious to see whether these wretched journalists will assail it so ignorantly and pruriently as they did before. My preface should teach them to mend their wicked ways' (CL, 475).) For example, in his statement that No artist has ethical sympathies Wilde repeated a remark he made in a letter to one of his staunchest critics, the Scots Observer, on 9 July 1890: 'An artist, sir, has no ethical sympathies at all' (CL, 439). Five years later, during his unsuccessful libel suit against the Marquess of Queensberry, the defence quizzed Wilde on the meaning of one of the most provocative aphorisms: 'There is no such thing as a moral or an immoral book.' Edward Carson, whose cross-examination aimed to uphold Queensberry's charge that Wilde had immoral and 'sodomitical views', quoted this aphorism and asked Wilde the following question: 'That expresses your view?' 'My view of art, yes', Wilde replied (IPSM, 80; cf. TOW, 109).

'No artist is ever morbid. The artist can express everything': This aphorism did not appear in the version of 'The Preface' published in the Fortnightly. However, it echoes Wilde's essay 'The Soul of Man under Socialism', which had appeared in the Fortnightly the previous month: 'The artist is never morbid. He expresses everything' (CWs, viii. 308; cf. CL, 473-4).

In many respects, 'The Preface' provides a summary of the widely touted doctrine of 'l'art pour l'art' or 'art for art's sake', which is central to Wilde's belief that what remains of utmost significance in art is the beauty of its form not its moral utility. In this regard, 'The Preface' echoes some of the most famous statements made by Walter Pater, the cultural historian and classical scholar whose works had exercised considerable influence over Wilde's ideas about art since his undergraduate years at Oxford: 'From the point of view of form, the type of all the arts is the art of the musician. From the point of view of feeling, the actor's craft is the type'; cf. Pater, 'The School of Giorgione', included in the third edition of The Renaissance (1888): 'All art constantly aspires towards the condition of music' (Fortnightly Review, NS 22 (1877), 528).

- 5 roses . . . lilac . . . thorn: it is improbable that the 'rich odour', 'heavy scent', and 'delicate perfume' of these plants would have 'mingled together on the summer wind'.

Persian saddlebags: couch covered in fine quality carpeting made in sizes and designs that imitated saddlebags carried by camels in the East.

Lord Henry Wotton: in 'An Editorial Note' to a 1908 authorized edition of Dorian Gray, Wilde's literary executor, Robert Ross (1869-1918), remarked that 'the characters of this novel were entirely imaginary in spite of assertions to the contrary by claimants to the doubtful honour of being the original "Dorian Gray": though it is obvious that, consciously or unconsciously, Wilde has put a great deal of himself into the character of "Lord Henry Wotton"' (Paris: Charles Carrington, 1908, p. vii).

Later commentators have been persuaded that Wilde based Lord Henry Wotton on a friend. In her biography of John Addington Symonds (1840-93) Phyllis Grosskurth claims, without supporting evidence, that the artist and connoisseur Lord Ronald Sutherland-Gower (1845-1916), the younger son of the Duke of Sutherland, was 'the sculptor who served as the original Lord Henry' (The Woeful Victorian: A Biography of John Addington Symonds (New York: Holt, Rinehart, Winston, 1964), 266). Gower was a friend of artist Frank Miles (1852-91), with whom Wilde became acquainted at Oxford and later shared rooms with in Salisbury Street, London, in 1879. The character's last name may have been an acknowledgement of Wilde's friendship with More Adey (1858-1942), whose family home was based at Under-the-Hill, Wootton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire.

laburnum: in England, this plant blooms in early summer, but its fragrance is unlikely to have mingled with that of lilac and thorn.

5 flame-like: the adjective echoes a passage in the ‘Conclusion’ to Pater, Studies in the History of the Renaissance: ‘That clear perpetual outline of face and limb is but an image of ours under which we group them [i.e. multiple elements, driven by many forces]—a design in a web, the actual threads of which pass out beyond it. This at least of flame-like our life has, that it is but the concurrence, renewed from moment to moment, of forces parting sooner or later on their ways’ (Renaissance, 208). In the same document, Pater asserts: ‘To burn always with this hard gem-like flame, to maintain this ecstasy, is success in life’ (p. 210).

tussore-silk: coarse brown silk originating in India and China, used for furnishings, women’s clothing, and parasols.

Japanese effect: in the West, Japanese art grew in popularity after the signing of the Kanagawa Treaty (1854), which opened Japan to international trade. The establishment of such stores as Farmer and Roger’s Oriental Warehouse (later known as Liberty and Co.) in 1862 began an artistic trend that would become known ten years later as japonisme. At Oxford, Wilde gained a reputation for collecting Japanese ‘blue and white china’, which had previously found favour with the poet and painter Dante Gabriel Rossetti.

bourdon: under-song, as in poetic burden or refrain (OED).

Basil Hallward: there have been various accounts of the painter on whom Wilde supposedly based the character Basil Hallward. On 9 October 1890 the poet Ernest Dowson (1867–1900) recorded that the artist Charles Shannon (1863–1937), whom Wilde met at Shannon’s home, The Vale, Chelsea, in May 1889, was ‘the prototype of the artist in “Dorian”’ (The Letters of Ernest Dowson, ed. Desmond Flower and Henry Maas (London: Cassell, 1967), 169). Kerry Powell observes that in a harsh review of Sententiae Artis: First Principles of Art for Painters and Picture Lovers (London: Isbister, 1886) by Harry Quilter (1851–1907) Wilde draws attention to Quilter’s misspelling of the last name of portrait painter Frank Holl (1845–88) as ‘Hall’ (Sententiae Artis, 162; CWks, xiii. 115). Powell notes that Quilter’s description of Holl’s portraiture corresponds with a number of descriptions of Basil Hallward’s art: e.g. ‘in the course of his painting [he would seem to] have discovered some dreadful secret in those apparently blameless breasts, such “damnable faces” have his sitters shown’ (Sententiae Artis, 232); see Powell, ‘Who Was Basil Hallward?’, English Language Notes, 24 (1986), 84–91.

the Grosvenor. The Academy: the Grosvenor Gallery, New Bond Street, London, opened in 1877; it was owned by Sir Coutts Lindsay (1824–1913) and Blanche, Lady Lindsay (1844–1912). The Grosvenor exhibited works that were at times experimental in form and subject matter. By contrast, the (Royal) Academy was more conventional.

6 heavy opium-tainted cigarette: it is clear from Dorian Gray’s later excursions into the economically poor East End of London, notably Blue Gate Fields (see Chapter XI), that Wilde linked opium smoking with the Chinese community. By the 1890s and early 1900s, commentators were reporting that in the East End there were establishments for wealthy clientele from the West End who were 'seeking a new sensation' (see Virginia Berridge and Griffith Edwards, Opium and the People: Opiate Use in Nineteenth-Century England (London: Allen Lane, 1981), 196, 200). In the 1890s cigarettes were sometimes associated with bohemian behaviour.

Adonis . . . Narcissus: in classical myth, Adonis was a beautiful youth to whom Proserpine restored life, on condition that he should spend six months with her, and the rest of the year with Venus; Narcissus was a beautiful youth who saw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place: his hopeless attempts to approach her beauty provoked him so much that he grew desperate and killed himself.

Intellect . . . exaggeration: this remark relates loosely to nineteenth-century popularizations of the sciences of physiognomy and phrenology, such as L. N. Fowler, New Illustrated Self-Instructor in Phrenology and Physiology, 16th edn. (c.1886).

- 7 Dorian Gray: the first name of Wilde's protagonist may derive from the ancient Greek people who were thought to have originated in the district of Doris; their language, Doric, was one of the several major dialects of ancient Greek. Nineteenth-century critics, such as John Addington Symonds, associated the Dorians with the Spartan form of military prowess based on structures of pederasty that involved friendship and sexual love between an adult male citizen (or a soldier) with a younger male who was preparing to attain the same status.

In nineteenth-century Oxford, the Spartan military regime and Plato's Republic (c.375 BC) became central to intellectual debates about the modern nation-state. For discussion of these materials, see Dellamora, Apocalyptic Overtures: Sexual Politics and the Sense of an Ending (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1994), 43–64; and Linda Dowling, Hellenism and Homosexuality in Victorian Oxford (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press), 124–5.

The last name of Wilde's protagonist possibly derives from John Gray (1866–1934), whose early poetry responded to French Symbolist writing. The only extant letter from Gray to Wilde, a draft of his poem 'Mishka', is signed 'Dorian'; Gray was widely known as 'Dorian' among members of Wilde's circle. When the gossip column of The Star (15 February 1892) reported that Gray was 'said to be the original Dorian of the same name', Gray's threat of a legal suit led to an immediate retraction: in a letter to the Daily Telegraph (19 February 1892), Wilde stated that the newspaper was mistaken to believe that Gray was his 'protégé', adding that his 'acquaintance with Mr John Gray' was 'extremely recent' (CL, 520). This move by Gray signals the ending of his friendship with Wilde.

Wilde offered to finance the publication of Gray's earliest collection of poems, Silverpoints (1893), but withdrew from the contract.

7 answered Lord Henry: in the 1890 edition, the words 'laying his hand upon his shoulder' appeared after a comma here.

8 Being natural: cf. Wilde, 'The Decay of Lying': 'As for the infinite variety of Nature, that is pure myth. It is not to be found in Nature herself. It resides in the imagination, or fancy, or cultivated blindness of the man who looks at her' (CWks, viii. 4).

9 crush: crowded social gathering (OED).

Academicians: elected members of the Royal Academy.

how independent I am by nature: in the 1890 edition, the following text appears after the full stop: 'My father destined me for the army. I insisted on going to Oxford. Then he made me enter my name in Middle Temple [i.e. to train as a barrister]. Before I had eaten a dozen dinners I gave up the Bar, and announced my intention to become a painter.'

exquisite sorrows: in the 1890 edition, the following text appears after the full stop: 'I knew that if I spoke to Dorian I would become absolutely devoted to him, and that I ought not to speak to him.'

10 Royalties . . . Stars and Garters: stars and garters are ornaments that represent the insignia of knighthood; the Order of the Garter, founded in 1348 by Edward III (1284–1327), stands as the highest British civil and military honour.

penny newspapers: daily newspapers that originally sold for 1d. The penny newspapers originated with the Daily Telegraph, which was founded in 1855 when the state repealed stamp duty on the press.

she tried to found a salon, and only succeeded in opening a restaurant: this remark echoes a sniping comment that Wilde was said to have made at the expense of poet Marc-André Raffalovich (1864–1934), who became John Gray's close companion after Gray terminated his friendship with Wilde: 'He tried to found a salon, and only succeeded in opening a salon.'

11 Divorce Court: the Divorce Act of 1857 had made divorce obtainable through the courts. By the late nineteenth century, even though the annual number of divorce decrees increased to six hundred a year, divorce had considerable social stigma attached to it and remained difficult to obtain. But cf. the many jokes about divorce in Wilde's Society Comedies.

12 I couldn't be happy if I didn't see him every day: in the 1890 edition, the following text appears as part of Hallward's speech after the full stop:

Of course sometimes it is only for a few minutes. But a few minutes with somebody one worships means a great deal.'

'But you don't really worship him.'

'I do.'

Antinoös: in classical times, the youth whom the Roman emperor Hadrian (AD 76–138) adored.

Of course I have done all that: in the 1890 edition, the following text appears after the full stop: ‘He has stood as Paris in dainty armor, and as Adonis with huntsman’s cloak and polished boar-spear. Crowned with heavy lotus-blossoms, he has sat on the prow of Adrian’s barge, looking into the green turbid Nile. He has leaned over the still pool of some Greek woodland, and seen in the water’s silent silver the wonder of his own beauty.’ This text appears in slightly modified form in the 1891 edition in Chapter IX (p. 98).

‘A dream . . . of thought’: from Austin Dobson (1840–1921), ‘To a Greek Girl’, a short philhellenic poem, first published in Proverbs in Porcelain (1877). In Dobson’s original, the line reads: ‘A dream of Form in days of Thought.’ The poem conjures an ideal image of ‘nymph-like’ maiden, Autoñoë, who exists as a ‘dream’ in the poet’s imagination.

- 13 realism: in the mid- and late nineteenth century, realism came into wide circulation in relation to the arts, particularly literature, to describe works that placed more emphasis on representing actions, characters, and events that appeared true to life; there was, however, little consensus about its precise meaning in the 1890s. In the context of novels and short stories, realism was often opposed to romance, a term associated with a broad range of literary genres that stressed imagination more than reality. Cf. ‘The Preface’ (p. 3).

Agnew: Agnew’s, dealer in fine art, began business at the Repository of Arts, Market Street, Manchester, in 1817. By the 1860s Agnew’s became a leading buyer of contemporary art. Further expansion meant that Agnew’s built its current premises in Old Bond Street in 1876.

some expression of all this curious artistic idolatry: in 1890 this phrase reads: ‘all the extraordinary romance’.

- 14 charming to me: in the 1890 edition this sentence continued as follows after the comma: ‘and we walk home from the club arm in arm’.

the mild struggle for existence: in chapter 3 of On the Origin of Species (1859), Charles Darwin (1809–82) discusses ‘the Struggle for Existence’; he based his theory of natural selection on this principle.

- 15 model lodging-houses: Wilde probably means ‘model dwelling-houses’. In the mid- and late nineteenth century lodging-houses were associated with dirt, disorder, and vice; they offered low-quality accommodation on a nightly basis. Wilde probably had in mind the model dwelling companies of the 1870s and 1880s which built large blocks of flats that were criticized for their poor lighting and ugliness. The Housing Act (1890) and Public Health Amendment Act (1890) improved on earlier legislation that empowered local authorities to enforce standards of space and cleanliness from landlords.

- 16 Schumann’s ‘Forest Scenes’: Robert Schumann (1810–56), German composer and music critic, produced the nine keyboard miniatures titled Waldscenen ('Forest Scenes'; Op. 82), between 24 December 1848 and 6 January 1849.

- 16 club in Whitechapel: one of many philanthropic associations that aimed at ennobling the lives of the poor in the East End of London.

- 17 unspotted from the world: see James 1: 27.

worshipped him: in the 1890 edition Wilde included a further sentence: 'He was made to be worshipped.'

the Orleans: gentleman's club, 29 King Street, St James's, in the West End of London.

Curzon Street: in the residential district of Mayfair in the West End of London, a recently fashionable part of town.

- 18 moue: pout (French).

To realize one's nature . . . each of us is here for: cf. Wilde's comment in his libel suit against the Marquess of Queensberry on 3 April 1895: 'I think self-realisation—realisation of one's self—is the primal aim of life. I think that to realise oneself through pleasure is finer than to realise one's self through pain' (IPSM, 75; cf. TOW, 108–9).

Eton: Eton College, Eton, Berkshire, the largest and one of the most prestigious public schools in England, founded by Henry VI (1421–71) in 1440–1.

- 19 the maladies of mediævalism . . . the Hellenic ideal: on mediævalism, cf. Pater, 'Aucassin and Nicolette' (Renaissance, 15): 'One of the strongest characteristics of that outbreak of the reason and the imagination, of that assertion of the liberty of the heart in the middle age, which I have termed the mediæval Renaissance, was its antinomianism, its spirit of rebellion and revolt against the moral and religious ideas of the time. In their search after the pleasures of the senses and the imagination, in their care for beauty, in their worship of the body, people were impelled beyond the bounds of the Christian ideal; and their love became sometimes a strange idolatry, a strange rival religion. It was the return of that ancient Venus, not dead, but only hidden for a time in the caves of the Venusberg, of those old pagan gods still going to and fro on the earth, under all sorts of disguises.'

On the Hellenic ideal, cf. Pater's remarks on German art historian Johann Joachim Winckelmann (1717–68), that 'his affinity with Hellenism was not merely intellectual, that the subtler threads of temperament were inwoven in it, is proved by his romantic, fervent friendships with young men' (Renaissance, 161).

The only way to get rid of a temptation is to yield to it: Murray (OW, 578) has suggested that the aphorism derives from chapter 2 of Le Père Goriot (1834–5) by Honoré de Balzac (1799–1850), where Vautrin influences Eugène de Rastignac in a manner that compares with Lord Henry's influence over Dorian. Wilde reused the aphorism, with some variation, on several occasions: e.g. 'I can resist everything except temptation' (Lord Darlington in Lady Windermere's Fan, Act I).

- 20 Mere words! . . . as words?: cf. Pater, 'Gaston de Latour', Macmillan's Magazine, 53 (1888), 260 (Gaston, 28), where the narrator comments on the effect of Ronsard's poetry on Gaston: 'Here was a poetry that boldly assumed the dress, the words, the habits, the very trick, of contemporary life, and turned them into gold. It took possession of a lily in one's hand, and projecting it into a visionary distance, shed upon the body of the flower the soul of its beauty. Things were become at once more deeply sensuous and more deeply ideal. As at the touch of a wizard, something more came into the rose than its own natural blush.' Pater observes that, for Gaston, Ronsard's poetry eventually 'lost its thaumaturgic power in turn, and became mere literature in exchange for life' ('Gaston de Latour', 260; Gaston, 27).
- 21 Nothing can cure the soul but the senses: cf. chapter 3 of Pater's Marius the Epicurean, where the narrator observes of the 'religion of Aesculapius' that it possessed the 'valuable, because partly practicable, belief that all the maladies of the soul might be reached through the subtle gateways of the body' (Marius, i. 33) (OW, 578; PDGO, 186).
- 22 Be always searching for new sensations: cf. Pater, 'Preface' to Studies in the History of the Renaissance: 'The æsthetic critic, then, regards all the objects with which he has to do, all works of art, and the fairer forms of nature and human life, as powers or forces, producing pleasurable sensations, each of a more or less peculiar and unique kind' (Renaissance, pp. viii–ix). Cf. also Pater's 'Conclusion' (ibid. 211): 'A counted number of pulses only is given to us of a variegated, dramatic life. How may we see in them all that is to be seen by the finest senses? What we have to do is to be for ever curiously testing new opinions and courting new impressions, never acquiescing in a facile orthodoxy.'

A new Hedonism: Lord Henry's remark appears to echo and revise the critical remarks on hedonism that appear in chapter 9 of Pater's Marius the Epicurean: 'Words like "hedonism"—terms of large and vague comprehension—especially when used for an avowedly controversial purpose, have ever been called "question-begging terms".' The narrator adds that the 'phase of reflection' through which his protagonist 'was then passing' could not be characterized as 'hedonism'; instead, Marius was engaged in pursuing 'Not pleasure, but fulness of life, and "insight" as conducting to that fulness—energy, choice, and variety of experience, including noble pain and sorrow even . . . whatever form of human life . . . was impassioned and ideal.' The narrator describes this mode of life as the 'new Cyrenaicism', after the Cyrenaici, a sect of philosophers who followed an ancient philosopher of Cyrene, Aristippus (c.435–350 BC), in their belief in the virtues of pleasure (Marius, i. 151–2).

- 23 Tyrian: purple; in reference or allusion to the purple or crimson dye anciently made at Tyre from certain molluscs (OED).

25 ivory Hermes . . . silver Faun: in Greek myth, Hermes, son of Zeus and Maia, appears in Homer's Odyssey as messenger of the gods and conductor of the deceased to the underworld; fauns were a class of rural deities possessing the horns and legs of a goat (features shared by satyrs, who represent lust).

27 page: a male servant of the lowest grade of service (OED). The word, in this context, is unusual for its time, and it may have a homoerotic connotation.

White's: the oldest gentleman's club in London, 37 St James's Street, which runs south of Piccadilly in the West End.

dress-clothes: formal evening-wear for a man.

28 It has nothing to do with our own will: in the 1890 edition, Lord Henry's observation is followed by this remark: 'It is either an unfortunate accident, or an unpleasant result of temperament.'

29 hansom: a two-wheeled horse-drawn cab that derives its name from the architect who patented its design in 1834.

the Albany: a suite of bachelors' apartments on the north side of Piccadilly.

Society: also known at the time as the 'upper 10,000', 'Society' included the wealthiest and most influential members of British culture, such as the aristocracy, financiers, and parliamentarians. The use of the term in this sense was recent.

Isabella . . . Prim: Isabella II (1830–1904), Bourbon queen of Spain (1833–68), deposed after the revolution of 1868 drove her into exile. Juan Prim Y Prats (1814–70), Catalan officer, Spanish military leader, who fought for Isabella II against the Carlists. Later, he became governor of Puerto Rico (1847), commanded armed forces in Morocco (1859–60), and led troops in Mexico (1860–2). In 1868 he played a central role in the successful overthrow of Isabella II's reign.

Diplomatic Service: known in other countries as Foreign Service; traditionally, diplomatic and consular personnel in Britain were drawn from the wealthier classes; competitive entrance in 1871 initiated a change from entrance on the basis of individual merit rather than social background.

30 collieries in the Midland counties: those counties in the Midlands of Central England—Staffordshire, Nottinghamshire, and Warwickshire—where coal-mining was carried on.

Tory: in the late nineteenth century, a political conservative; in the 1820s and 1830s, the Tory party became known as the Conservative party, though Tory was a term still applied to characterize its interests.

The Times: Britain's oldest daily newspaper, which began as The Daily Universal Register in 1785, becoming The Times in 1788; by the mid-nineteenth century, it ranked as the most prestigious national newspaper.

dandies: a dandy is a beau, a fop, an 'exquisite' (i.e. a man who dresses elegantly and fashionably) (OED). The term dates from the late eighteenth century, and it is generally associated with the Regency arbiter of fashion Beau Brummell (1778–1840). Wilde's fashionable aesthetic style of dress was frequently considered dandyish.

English Blue-book: commonly used name for one of the official reports of Parliament and the Privy Council, which are issued in a dark blue paper cover (OED). The usage here, however, is different. In the manuscript of the 1890 edition of his novel, Wilde deleted the words 'address book' before continuing with 'Blue Book', implying that this Blue Book is a directory listing the names and addresses of people in Society (see p. 29).

the Diplomatic: the Diplomatic Service.

Examinations . . . bad for him: cf. Lord Illingworth in A Woman of No Importance, Act III: 'My dear Gerald, examinations are of no value whatsoever. If a man is a gentleman, he knows quite enough, and if he is not a gentleman, whatever he knows is bad for him.'

- 31 Kelso: Wilde used the name in A Woman of No Importance, Act I.

Devereux: see note to p. 121.

subaltern in a foot regiment: soldier holding an inferior position in a non-prestigious (infantry) regiment.

Spa: in Liège province, eastern Belgium, whose famous minerals springs made it a popular resort; its casino was built in 1763.

Selby property: the imaginary name of Dorian Gray's country estate. Selby is an ancient town on the River Ouse, North Yorkshire.

jarvies: an Irish, not English, term; jaunting-car drivers, perhaps derived from the proper name Jarvis (in memory of a noted nineteenth-century hackney-coach driver called Jarvis) (Terence Patrick Dolan, A Dictionary of Hiberno-English (Dublin: Gill and Macmillan, 1998)). It would not appear that Lord Fermor is an Irishman, since the narrator states: 'Only England could have produced him' (p. 30). In the manuscript of Chapter III, Wilde deleted 'cabmen' and inserted 'jarvies'.

- 32 to behave as she did: in the manuscript of Chapter III, Wilde wrote and then deleted 'go to Gretna Green <illeg.> with a nobody'. Gretna Green, the first staging-post that travellers from England reached in Scotland, was famous for consecrating the marriages of eloping couples.

what is this humbug . . . about Dartmoor wanting to marry an American?: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act I, where Lady Caroline Pontefract remarks: 'These American girls always carry off the good matches. Why can't they stay in their own country?' Wilde reused this and the next few lines in the exchange that takes place between Lady Caroline Pontefract and Lord Illingworth in this part of his comedy.

- 33 Burlington Street . . . Berkeley Square: both prestigious addresses. Burlington Street 'runs from Savile Row to Regent Street, originally called Little Burlington Street. It was in this street that brass name-plates were first fixed on house doors' (Henry B. Wheatley, London Past and Present: A Dictionary of Its History, Association, and Traditions, 3 vols. (London: John Murray, 1891), i. 308).

- 33 meanest flower might blow: cf. the ending of 'Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood. Ode' (published 1807) by William Wordsworth (1770–1850): 'Thanks to the human heart by which we live, | Thanks to its tenderness, its joys, and fears, | To me the meanest flower that blows can give (The Poetical Works, ed. William Knight, 11 vols. (Edinburgh: W. Paterson, 1882–9), iv. 55).
- 34 Titan: in classical myth, a giant of prodigious strength.

Dryad-like: like the nymphs of trees.

Was it not Plato . . . who had first analyzed it?: an allusion to the theory of ideas or forms set forth by Plato in a number of his dialogues, especially Phaedo and Parmenides. In Plato's philosophy forms are unchangeable essences of perfection, which are not directly accessible to the human senses, but which enter into the temporal world in conceptual examples and objects that human beings produce. Thus the forms are only perceived in 'shapes and patterns' that are in a state of 'becoming'; such 'shapes and patterns' may undergo further refinement as humanity reaches towards the eternal, perfect forms.

Buonarotti . . . sonnet-sequence: Michelangelo Buonarotti (1475–1564) left a large number of poems, including seventy-five sonnets that derive their themes from the work of the Italian poet Francesco Petrarca (Petrarch) (1304–74); some of these sonnets are addressed to two people who were the object of Michelangelo's adoration, the young nobleman Tommaso Calvieri (c.1509–87) and the poet Vittoria Colonna (1490–1547). The complete corpus of Michelangelo's sonnets became available through the Italian edition that Cesare Guasti published in 1863.

Radical member of Parliament: Radicals believed in fundamental change in the social order; they represented the trade unions in the House of Commons. Cf. An Ideal Husband, Act IV, where the Conservative Lord Caversham declares to Sir Robert Chiltern: 'If the country doesn't go to the dogs or the Radicals, we shall have you Prime Minister some day.'

Liberals: the Liberal parliamentary party developed after the Reform Bill of 1832; Lord John Russell (1792–1878) is credited with naming the Liberal party, and as prime minister 1846–52 he led the first Liberal government. Liberals were associated with advancing free trade. In the closing decades of the century, while they split on contentious issues such as Home Rule for Ireland and imperial rule, they remained opposed to most Tory tenets.

- 35 Mr. Erskine of Treadley: Wilde had used the name Erskine for the older male character in the story 'The Portrait of Mr W.H.' (CWks, vi. 147–99). The name Treadley is fictitious.
- 'American dry-goods . . . American novels'*: cf. the following exchange in A Woman of No Importance, Act I:

LADY HUNSTANTON. What are American dry goods?

LORD ILLINGWORTH. American novels.

- 36 'when good Americans die . . . They go to America': cf. the following exchange in A Woman of No Importance, Act I:

MRS. ALLONBY. They say, Lady Hunstanton, that when good Americans die they go to Paris.

LADY HUNSTANTON. Indeed? And when bad Americans die, where do they go to?

LORD ILLINGWORTH. Oh, they go to America.

the Verities: cf. 'Propositions, concerning any abstract Ideas, that are once true, must needs be eternal Verities' (John Locke, An Essay concerning Human Understanding (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1979), 639); Locke's Essay was first published in 1689.

East End: Wilde frequently associates the East End—located to the east of the City of London—with crime, poverty, and vice.

- 37 problem of slavery . . . amusing the slaves: Wilde repeats this observation in a number of places; cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act I, where Lord Illingworth comments: 'we are trying to solve [the problem of slavery] by amusing the slaves.'

- 38 praise of folly: the phrase suggests the satire The Praise of Folly (1511), by the Dutch humanist Erasmus (c.1467–1536).

Bacchante . . . Silenus: a priestess of Bacchus, the god of wine and revelry, and the fat and jolly old man, always intoxicated, who attended Bacchus.

wise Omar: Omar Khayyám (1048–1131), Persian astronomer, mathematician, and poet, known to the nineteenth-century English-speaking world for The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, a sequence of quatrains, translated and published anonymously in 1859 by English writer Edward FitzGerald (1809–83). FitzGerald's translation was popularized by Pre-Raphaelite poets such as Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828–82) and Algernon Charles Swinburne (1837–1909) in the 1860s.

Willis's Rooms: a suite of assembly rooms used for high-class dinners, meetings, concerts, and balls.

- 39 the Athenaeum: Athenaeum Club, Pall Mall, instituted in 1824, whose members were associated with the arts and patronage of literature and science.

English Academy of Letters: Britain did not have an academy of letters until the British Academy was established by Royal Charter in 1902, although there was a strong campaign to establish such a body in the second half of the nineteenth century; the French Académie Française was established in 1634 in a nationalist spirit in order to maintain standards in literary taste and the French language.

the Park: Hyde Park, West End of London. In his Society Comedies, Wilde refers to the social importance attached to riding in Hyde Park.

- 40 Clodion: Claude Michel (1738–1814), French rococo sculptor who completed commissions for Louis XVI (1754–93), famous for bas-reliefs and small figure groups in bronze and terracotta representing fauns, nymphs, and children.

'Les Cent Nouvelles': more properly, 'Les Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles' ('The Hundred New Tales'), a collection of licentious prose tales presented to Philippe duc de Bourgogne in 1462.

Margaret of Valois by Clovis Eve: Marguerite de Valois (1553–1615), daughter of Henri II of France and Catherine de Medici, married Henri de Navarre in 1572, and was notorious for her promiscuity. Clovis Eve (1584–1635), a binder at the royal court, is credited with the invention of delicate fanfare bindings, which feature 'interlaced double ribboning, with a double line on one side and a single line on the other, which divides the whole surface into symmetrical compartments of varying shapes and sizes' (OED).

parrot-tulips: brightly coloured tulips with ruffled edges.

punctuality is the thief of time: a reversal of the proverbial line 'Procrastination is the thief of time', from Night Thoughts (1742–5) by Edward Young (1683–1765).

'Manon Lescaut': Histoire du Chevalier des Grieux et de Manon Lescaut (1731) by Abbé Prévost (Antoine-François Prévost d'Exiles) (1697–1763): the final instalment in a seven-volume narrative of a respectable young man who loses his reputation after falling in love with a courtesan; the subject matter reflects Lord Henry's literary tastes.

- 41 Opera: Covent Garden Theatre, or the Royal Italian Opera House, opened in 1858.

'Lohengrin': three-act opera by German composer Richard Wagner (1813–83), composed in 1846–8, and first produced at Weimar, Germany, in 1850. The opera is based on a German version of the Grail legend.

- 42 Wardour Street: runs south of Oxford Street, in the West End of London.

Nowadays people know the price of everything, and the value of nothing: Wilde reused this aphorism in Lady Windermere's Fan, Act III, where Lord Darlington remarks: 'A man who knows the price of everything and the value of nothing.'

frangipanni: more commonly, frangipane; a perfume prepared from, or imitating the odour of, the flower of the red jasmine (OED). One of the most costly scents to extract.

Men marry because they are tired; women, because they are curious: both are disappointed: Wilde would reuse this line in A Woman of No Importance, Act III, where Lord Illingworth states: 'Men marry because they are tired, women because they are curious. Both are disappointed.'

Sibyl Vane: in classical antiquity, sibyls were women prophets some of whom had individual names; the most eminent was the Cumaean Sibyl.

In the manuscript of the 1890 edition of his novel, Wilde frequently corrects the spelling of the character's last name from 'Fane' to 'Vane'.

- 43 two kinds of women, the plain and the coloured: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act III:

GERALD: Still, there are many different kinds of women, aren't there?

LORD ILLINGWORTH: Only two kinds in society: the plain and the coloured.

Ian Small notes that this metaphor is 'taken from nineteenth-century toy theatre sheets—the plain cost one penny, the coloured twopence' (A Woman of No Importance, 2nd edn., ed. Small (London: Benn, 1993), 69).

Rouge and esprit: dating from the mid-eighteenth century rouge became a standard part of women's make-up; esprit (French) suggests a witty, spirited mind.

gas-jets: before 1891, English theatres were illuminated, both in the auditorium and on stage, by gas-jets that had to be lighted with caution; a number of late nineteenth-century theatres burned down because of gas explosions.

gaudy play-bills: by the 1880s, playbills, which provided information about the cast, director, and designer of a theatrical performance, varied in size and quality, depending on the price of the theatre seat. In cheaper theatres, such as the one in which Sibyl Vane performs, inferior playbills comprised a thick sheet of folio paper, crowded with type.

hideous Jew: Wilde's representation of Mr Isaacs counts among the many negative stereotypes of Jewish characters in nineteenth-century literature about London. Demeaning depictions of Jews appeared in the London theatre world, in which Jewish people played important roles as actors, managers, and patrons.

- 44 guinea: twenty-one shillings; in pre-decimalized currency (i.e. prior to 1970), there were twenty shillings to one pound sterling; professional services, luxury goods, and entertainments were sold in guineas rather than pounds.

grande passion: great passion (French).

drop-scene: a term used loosely or incorrectly for drop or act-drop, meaning the painted curtain let down between the acts of a play to shut off the stage from the view of the audience (OED).

Cupids and cornucopias: decorations (1) featuring the figure of Cupid, the Roman boy-god of love, often depicted in cherubic form, with a quiverful of arrows; (2) in the shape of a cornucopia or horn of plenty filled with fruits and flowers.

the palmy days of the British Drama: Wilde possibly means the heyday of Elizabethan and Jacobean theatre, when a broad cross-section of society went to plays, such as Shakespeare's, performed in open-air venues such as the Globe in London.

- 44 'The Idiot Boy, or Dumb but Innocent': The Idiot Boy (1829) by Mary Martha Sherwood (1775–1851), a prolific writer of didactic children's tales, is not a play but a story that was still in wide circulation in the 1870s; Sherwood's tale shows how a nursemaid teaches a young girl to repent for teasing an 'idiot boy'.
- 45 les grandpères ont toujours tort: the grandfathers are always in the wrong (French).

Romeo: male protagonist of Romeo and Juliet. In this and the later paragraphs, the narrator lists various characters and episodes from Shakespeare's plays. Mercutio: close friend of Romeo. Juliet: female protagonist in Romeo and Juliet. Rosalind: female protagonist in Shakespeare's comedy As You Like It (1599). Imogen: female protagonist of Shakespeare's Cymbeline (1609–11). She has been mad: Ophelia in Shakespeare's Hamlet (1599–1601). black hands of jealousy: Othello in Shakespeare's Othello (1604) who murders his spouse Desdemona. Lady Capulet: mother of Juliet in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

hautbois: oboe.

- 46 curious influence . . . confess it to you: this remark anticipates Wilde's recollection, in De Profundis: 'I remember during my first term at Oxford reading . . . Pater's Renaissance—that book which has had such a strange influence over me' (CW, ii. 168).
- 48 dressing-wrapper: presumably a dressing-gown; usage not recorded in OED.
- 49 a West End theatre: theatre district located within the fashionable West End of London, whose boundaries were marked by Compton Street to the north, the Strand to the south, Drury Lane to the east, and Mayfair to the west.

The Bristol: the name of this gentleman's club would appear to be Wilde's invention.

a meat-tea: high tea; a light afternoon or evening meal at which meat is served.

- 50 People are very fond of giving away what they need most themselves: in the 1890 edition, Lord Henry's remark is followed by this exchange, which begins with Dorian Gray's question:

'You don't mean that Basil has got any passion or any romance in him?'

'I don't know whether he has any passion, but he certainly has romance', said Lord Henry, with an amused look in his eyes. 'Has he never let you know that?'

'Never, I must ask him about it.'

vivisection: the dissection of live animals in the name of scientific research was a focus of considerable outrage and protest in the second half of the nineteenth century.

51 ordinary psychologists: the science of psychology developed rapidly in the mid-nineteenth century. There were several prominent thinkers who became so well known that their writing was 'ordinary' or familiar among educated people: George Henry Lewes (1817–78), author of The Physiology of Common Life (1859); Henry Maudsley (1835–1918), author of The Physiology and Pathology of Mind (1870); and Herbert Spencer (1820–1903), author of The Principles of Psychology (1855).

52 Or was the body really in the soul, as Giordano Bruno: Filippo Bruno (1548–1600), Italian Dominican monk turned philosopher whose theories of an infinite universe and multiple worlds anticipated aspects of Enlightenment and modern scientific thought. His career involved many conflicts with teachings of the Roman Catholic and Reformed churches, including upholding the Arian heresy (which denied the divinity of Jesus Christ).

In the Fortnightly Review, NS 46 (1889), 234–44, Pater published 'Giordano Bruno: Paris: 1586', which was later revised as the seventh chapter, titled 'The Lower Pantheism', of his posthumously published novel Gaston de Latour (Gaston, 68–83). Pater commented on how Bruno advanced a belief in the 'unity, the spiritual unity, of the world' ('Bruno', 242; Gaston, 79).

Experience was of no ethical value . . . name men gave to their mistakes: Murray (PDGO, 188) notes that Wilde used this aphorism before: 'Experience, the name men give to their mistakes' (Prince Paul in Vera, Act II). Wilde reused it, with variations, twice in Lady Windermere's Fan, Act III; see, for example, Dumby: 'Experience is the name every one gives to their mistakes.'

53 bismuth-whitened: a reddish white metal, used in make-up during the nineteenth century.

55 no society of any kind in the Colonies: cf. Lady Windermere's Fan, Act II, where the Duchess of Berwick makes demeaning remarks about Australia: 'Oh don't mention that dreadful vulgar place.'

57 I will have my dinner at five o'clock: in the 1890s this would have been thought of as a rather early time for dinner; the comment suggests that James Vane's eating habits were unlike those of the gentleman dining either away from or at home.

Euston Road: street running west of King's Cross, London.

super-cargo: more commonly, supercargo; an officer on board a merchant ship whose business is to superintend the cargo and the commercial transactions of the voyage (OED).

58 Children begin . . . they forgive them: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act II, where Lord Illingworth states: 'Children begin by loving their parents. After a time they judge them. Rarely, if ever, do they forgive them.'

59 When poverty . . . the window: this anonymous proverb, which dates from the seventeenth century, is more commonly phrased: 'When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window.'

- 60 orris-root: rhizome of three species of iris, which has a fragrant odour like that of violets; it is used powdered as a perfume and in medicine (OED).

victoria: a light, low, four-wheeled carriage having a collapsible hood (OED). Although two ladies are riding with Dorian Gray in this carriage, a victoria was usually built with two riding seats and an elevated seat in front for the driver.

four-in-hand: a vehicle with four horses driven by one person (OED).

Achilles Statue: in Hyde Park. In Greek mythology, Achilles was the chief hero in the Trojan War on the Greek side.

- 61 Marble Arch: entrance to Hyde Park.

omnibus: a four-wheeled public vehicle for carrying passengers, with the inside seats extending along the sides, and the entrance at the rear, and with or without seats on the roof; usually plying along a fixed route (OED).

- 63 mufflers: wraps or scarves (usually of wool or silk) worn round the neck or throat, by both men and women, for warmth (OED).

- 64 Messalina: the spouse of the Emperor Claudius (10 BC–AD 54), who disgraced herself by her cruelties and extravagance.

- 65 Orlando: male protagonist in Shakespeare's As You Like It.

- 66 Tanagra figurine: terracotta statuettes, dating from the third century BC and originating in Boeotia, east-central Greece.

Lord Radley: Wilde reused this fictitious name in An Ideal Husband.

- 67 wrong, fascinating, poisonous, delightful theories: cf. Sir Robert Chiltern in An Ideal Husband, Act II, where he recalls the influence that Baron Arnheim exercised over him: 'With that wonderfully fascinating quiet voice of his expounded to us the most terrible of all philosophies, the philosophy of power.'

- 68 Individualism: the doctrine that the individual is a self-determined whole, and that any larger whole is merely an aggregate of individuals, which, if they act upon each other at all do so only externally; usage dates from the nineteenth century (OED). In the 1880s and 1890s the term was frequently opposed to socialism, the growing political movement that was associated with collective, not individual, interests.

- 69 fine-champagne: old liqueur brandy (OED).

silver dragon: cigarette lighter.

brougham: one-horse closed carriage, with two or four wheels, for two or four persons (OED).

- 70 Miranda . . . Caliban: characters in Shakespeare's romantic comedy The Tempest (1611). With her father, Prospero, Duke of Milan, Miranda has been exiled by her uncle (Antonio) to a lonely island. Prospero takes

- control of Sycorax's son, Caliban, a misshapen being, who attempts to rape Miranda. The events that follow a shipwreck near the island result in Prospero and Miranda returning to Milan, leaving Caliban behind. Cf. the allusion to Caliban in 'The Preface' (p. 3).
- 71 glasses: a small binocular for use at theatres, concerts (OED).
The scene was the hall of Capulet's house . . . Good pilgrim . . . holy palmers' kiss: Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (I. v).
- 72 Thou knowest the mask of night . . . speak to-night: Romeo and Juliet (II. i).
Although I joy in thee . . . next we meet: Romeo and Juliet (II. i).
- 73 The secret of life . . . unbecoming: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act III, where Mrs Allonby remarks: 'The secret of life is never to have an emotion that is unbecoming.'
- 74 Portia . . . Beatrice . . . Cordelia: female protagonists of Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice (1596–8), Much Ado about Nothing (1598–9), and King Lear (1604–5) respectively.
I knew nothing but shadows: slightly echoes the line 'I am half-sick of shadows' uttered by the eponymous character of 'The Lady of Shalott' (1832, rev. 1842), a poem by Alfred Tennyson (1809–92).
- 77 Covent Garden: vegetable market, West End of London.
defiled: marched in a line or by files (OED).
nacre-coloured: coloured like mother-of-pearl.
Doge's barge: barge of the chief magistrate of Venice.
- 80 old Sèvres china: high-quality porcelain produced at the royal factory of Sèvres, near Versailles, from 1756 onward.
Louis-Quinze toilet-set: arts style that flourished during 1715–74, the reign of French monarch Louis XV. This type of toilet-set—comprising jug, bowl, and other utensils for cleansing the skin—would have been inlaid with foreign woods, ivory, metal, or mother-of-pearl.
Jermyn Street moneylenders: Jermyn Street is located south of Piccadilly and north of St James's Square in the West End of London. The street was well known for family hotels and gentlemen's tailors, as well as bachelors' apartments. It was the practice of the 'discounting tailors' to arrange credit for customers, rather than sue them for unpaid debts.
- 81 blue-dragon bowl: fine porcelain bowl with design originating in China or Japan.
Spanish leather: expensive durable leather used in luxury goods and furnishings.
- 84 prussic acid: also known as hydrocyanic acid, not uncommonly used in suicide attempts during the nineteenth century.
- 85 The Standard: the Evening Standard (1860–present), a popular daily newspaper that sold for 1d.

- 85 Opera . . . Patti: Italian soprano Adelina Patti (1843–1919) performed regularly at the Covent Garden Theatre or Royal Italian Opera House, London for twenty-three years after 1861.

How extraordinarily dramatic life is!: Wilde frequently presented similar formulations in his critical essays; cf. 'The Decay of Lying', where Vivian comments: 'Life imitates Art far more than Art imitates Life. This results not merely from Life's imitative instinct, but from the fact that the self-conscious aim of Life is to find expression, and that Art offers it certain beautiful forms through which it may realise that energy' (CWks, viii. 56).

gold-latten: made of a mixed metal or gold or yellow colour that resembles brass.

- 88 Never trust a woman who wears mauve . . . have a history: an allusion to the figure of the 'woman with a past' (i.e. a dubious sexual history), a well-known character type on the nineteenth-century stage. In his society comedies, Wilde features several women with pasts; one of them, Mrs Cheveley in An Ideal Husband, wears a dress 'in heliotrope' (i.e. mauve) (stage direction, Act I).

Desdemona . . . Ophelia: Desdemona was the spouse of Othello in Shakespeare's Othello; Ophelia loved the eponymous hero in Shakespeare's Hamlet.

- 89 Webster . . . Ford . . . Cyril Tourneur: John Webster (c.1578–c.1632), John Ford (1586–post-1639), and Cyril Tourneur (c.1575–1626), all Jacobean dramatists.

daughter of Brabantio: Desdemona in Othello.

grand tier: at Covent Garden Theatre, the seating arranged above the stalls and stall circle; grand tier boxes were expensive.

- 91 The pity of it! the pity of it!: cf. Iago and Othello's discussion of Desdemona's supposed infidelity in Othello (IV. i); Othello: 'the pity of it, Iago. O, Iago, the pity of it, Iago.'
- 93 middle-class virtue: Wilde frequently makes smug middle-class morality the butt of his humour; cf. 'To be good, according to the vulgar standard of goodness, is obviously quite easy. It merely requires . . . a certain low passion for middle-class respectability' (Gilbert in 'The Critic as Artist', CWks, viii. 221).
- 94 I cannot repeat an emotion: cf. 'the chief thing that makes life a failure from the artist point of view is the thing that lends life its sordid security, the fact that one can never repeat exactly the same emotion' (Gilbert in 'The Critic as Artist', CWks, viii. 166).

philanthropist: Wilde often poked fun at high-minded philanthropy; cf. 'philanthropy seems to me to have become simply the refuge of people who wish to annoy their fellow-creatures' (Mrs Cheveley in An Ideal Husband, Act I).

Gautier . . . la consolation des arts: the phrase slightly misquotes an observation that appears in 'Théophile Gautier' (1859), an essay by Charles Baudelaire (1821–67). Baudelaire describes the contribution of Gautier (1811–72) to French poetry as follows: 'He [Gautier] introduced in poetry a new element by way of what I will call the consolation of the arts, by way of all the picturesque objects, which delight the eyes and amuse the spirit.'

Marlow: town in Buckinghamshire, England, in 1720; Marlow Place was built for George II (1683–1760) when he was prince of Wales.

95 The painter felt strangely moved: in the 1890 edition, an additional sentence appears at this point: 'Rugged and straightforward as he was, there was something in his nature that was purely feminine in its tenderness.'

96 Georges Petit . . . Rue de Sèze: the Galeries Georges Petit, 8 rue de Sèze, Paris 8<sup>ème</sup>; a major art gallery that held many well-publicized exhibitions, including the display of works by Claude Monet (1840–1926) and Auguste Rodin (1840–1917) in 1889. Hallward's connection with this gallery suggests the avant-garde, fashionable nature of his work.

97 Wait till you hear what I have to say: in the 1890 edition, the following text follows this sentence: 'It is quite true that I have worshipped you with far more romance of feeling than a man usually gives to a friend. Perhaps, as Harry says, a really "grande passion" is the privilege of those who have nothing to do, and that is the use of the idle classes in a country.' During his libel suit against the Marquess of Queensberry in April 1895, Wilde was cross-examined by Edward Carson (1854–1935) who sought to expose Wilde's 'sodomitical' behaviour by quoting from this conversation between Dorian Gray and Basil Hallward. 'Do you mean to say that that passage describes the natural feeling of one man towards another?', Carson asked Wilde (IPSM, 89; TOW, 112).

I was dominated, soul, brain, and power by you: in the 1890 edition, this sentence reads: 'I quite admit that I adored you madly, extravagantly, absurdly.'

98 Paris: the son of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba. He was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country.

Adrian's barge: the barge from which Antinoüs fell into the Nile and drowned (see note to p. 12).

art conceals the artist . . . ever reveals him: cf. 'The Preface': 'To reveal art and conceal the artist is art's aim' (p. 3).

99 You have been the one person in my life who has really influenced my art: in the 1890 edition, Hallward's observation is worded as follows: 'You have been the one person of whom I have been really fond. I don't suppose I shall often see you again.' Wilde added the next sentences in Hallward's speech to the 1891 edition.

saying what is incredible . . . doing what is improbable: Wilde used versions of this aphorism on a number of occasions. Cf., for example, Vivian in

'The Decay of Lying': 'Man can believe the impossible, but man can never believe the improbable' (CWks, viii. 51).

101 Bologna: city in north-east Italy.

102 such love as Michael Angelo had known, and Montaigne, and Winckelmann, and Shakespeare himself: Italian artist and poet Michelangelo Buonarroti, French essayist Michel Eyquem seigneur de Montaigne (1533–92), and Winckelmann (see note to p. 19) are discussed in Pater's Studies in the History of the Renaissance. In each case, Pater comments on these writers' focused interest in desire and sentiment: '[F]or Michelangelo, to write down his passionate thoughts at all, to make sonnets about them, was already in some measure to command and have his way with them' (Renaissance, 74); Montaigne's Essays (1580–8) express 'intimacy of sentiment' (Renaissance, 141); and Winckelmann expresses an 'affinity with Hellenism' that was 'not merely intellectual'—'the subtler threads of temperament were inwoven in it', a point 'proved by his romantic, fervid friendships with young men' (Renaissance, 161).

The last comment suggests that Winckelmann's primary passions were homoerotic, while the allusion to Michelangelo's poetry and Montaigne's Essays points to writings that Wilde's well-educated contemporaries would have known represent intimacy between males. Shakespeare's Sonnets (1609), which can be read as an exploration of male homoeroticism within a love triangle, considers similar subject matter.

South Audley Street: close to Grosvenor Square and Curzon Street; a fashionable part of the West End of London.

103 Old Florentine: Wilde may be referring to the kind of Florentine frame with carved gilt scrolled ornaments on red ground, beaded and fluted mouldings that date from the late seventeenth or early eighteenth century.

Fonthill: Fonthill Abbey, Wiltshire, built 1796–1807, was the most extravagant of the Romantic country houses designed by English architect James Wyatt (1746–1813). It was home to William Beckford (1760–1844), author of the Gothic romance Vathek (1786), who oversaw its design and construction.

104 cassone: large chest (Italian).

105 Cairo: the capital of Egypt (put under British colonial rule from 1882) became a favoured destination with wealthier British tourists after the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869; for such visitors, the Egyptian season ran from mid-November to early spring.

a book bound in yellow paper: it later becomes clearer that the volume is Arrebours (1884) by J.-K. Huysmans, although Richard Ellmann is correct to state that the 'references in Dorian Gray to specific chapters of the unnamed book are deliberately inaccurate' (Oscar Wilde (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1987), 298), as has been noted below. Editions of French novels of the 1880s were commonly bound in yellow wrappers. The sensuous quality of the book in 'yellow paper' also bears a passing resemblance to the "'golden" book' that Pater depicts in Marius (ch. 5).

St. James's Gazette: penny newspaper (1880–1905), politically supportive of the Conservative party.

- 106 Bell Tavern, Hoxton Road: implicitly cheap lodgings in one of the poorer districts of north London. Some taverns also served as penny gaffs (i.e. illegitimate theatres) that thrived in the East End of London. Hoxton Street (not Road) is a thoroughfare that leads from north London to the East End.

Royal Theatre, Holborn: the Holborn Theatre Royal, High Holborn, opened in 1870. Its name changed to the Royal Holborn Theatre in 1870, and changed once more to the Duke's Theatre in 1880, the year in which it was destroyed by fire.

delicate sound of flutes: Murray (PDGO, 236; OW, 586) suggests that Wilde links flutes and music with two sources: the myth of Marsyas (see p. 182), and a passage from Pater's description of Leonardo da Vinci's La Gioconda (i.e. the Mona Lisa) in Studies in the History of the Renaissance: '[L]ike the vampire, she has been dead many times, and learned the secrets of the grave; and has been a diver in deep seas, and keeps their fallen day about her; and trafficked for strange webs with Eastern merchants: and, as Leda, was the mother of Helen of Troy, and, as Saint Anne, the mother of Mary; and all this has been to her but the sound of lyres and flutes, and lives only in the delicacy with which it has moulded the changing lineaments, and tinged the eyelids and the hands' (Renaissance, 118–19).

The phrase also echoes Enobarbus's description of Cleopatra's barge in Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra (1606–7): 'the oars were silver, | Which to the tune of flutes kept stroke and made | The water which they beat to follow faster' (II. ii). Wilde used the phrase on several occasions in his writings.

It was a novel without a plot: Huysmans's A rebours which was regarded as one of the most significant writings of literary Decadence in France. Huysmans's novel features a wealthy aesthete, Duc Jean des Esseintes, who sequesters himself in his luxurious home in order to savour erotic fantasies and sensuous experiences that generate sensations that he fears he will not find in reality.

- 107 argot: jargon or slang, often associated with thieves and rogues (OED).

French school of Symbolistes: known in English as Symbolists; a literary movement, inspired by the work of Baudelaire, headed by a group of French poets, such as Jules Laforgue (1860–87), Arthur Rimbaud (1854–91), and Paul Valéry (1871–1945). The Symbolists aimed at producing poems that represented correspondences between the senses by emphasizing colour, harmony, and tone.

107 metaphors as monstrous as orchids: for Wilde, orchids connoted artificiality and excess; cf. 'Lord Illingworth told me this morning that there was an orchid there [i.e. in the conservatory] as beautiful as the seven deadly sins' (Mrs Allonby in A Woman of No Importance, Act I).

108 nine large-paper copies of the first edition: Huysmans's A rebours was published by the Parisian publisher Charpentier in a standard edition, as well as an exclusive edition of ten copies on Dutch handmade paper and ten copies on Japanese handmade paper.

the hero . . . were strangely blended: implicitly, Des Esseintes in Huysmans's A rebours.

that somewhat grotesque dread of mirrors . . . still water: Des Esseintes in Huysmans's A rebours has no such dread; in chapter 1, the narrator states that Des Esseintes designed a 'boudoir' or bedroom that featured the following furnishing, textures, and scents: 'This bedroom, where mirrors mirrored one another and reflected an infinite series of pink boudoirs on the walls, had been celebrated among the prostitutes, who loved to soak their nakedness in this bath of rosy warmth, perfumed by the minty aroma coming from the wood of the furniture' (Huysmans, 10).

109 the Docks: London's dockland area is in the East End of the city.

the season: from May to July each year the upper classes arranged a round of parties and social gatherings, including balls and at-homes, in London and at landed estates across the country.

110 those whom Dante describes . . . worship of beauty: Dante is not the source for this quotation.

Gautier . . . world existed: Gautier's remark was recorded in the Journal of the brothers Goncourt for 1 May 1857: 'Criticism and praise congratulate and ruin me without understanding a word of my talent. All my value, they've never spoken of that; it's that I am a man for whom the visible world exists.'

Dandyism . . . modernity of beauty: this statement echoes and revises Baudelaire's famous declaration in 'The Painter of Modern Life' (1863): 'Dandyism appears especially at periods of transition when democracy is not yet all powerful, and when aristocracy is only partially collapsed and vilified. In the disorder of those times, certain men who have lost their standing, who are disgruntled and idle, but rich in native strength, may conceive the project of founding a new species of aristocracy, all the more difficult to upset because it will be based on the most precious, the most indestructible faculties, and on the heavenly gifts which work and money cannot bestow.'

Mayfair balls: private balls held in Mayfair, part of 'the season'.

Pall Mall club windows: several gentlemen's clubs were located in Pall Mall in the West End of London: the Oxford and Cambridge Club, the Unionist Club, and the Marlborough Club.

to imperial . . . the 'Satyricon': Nero (AD 37–68), fifth emperor of Rome, notorious for using his office to indulge his murderous passions and artistic pleasures. The Satyricon, attributed to Gaius Petronius Arbiter (d. AD 66), is a comic narrative of first-century Roman life that features three dishonourable adventurers. The surviving fragments of the work, which vary in literary quality, present scenes of vulgarity and hedonism.

arbiter elegantiarum: a judge in the matters of taste (Latin); a reference to Gaius Petronius Arbiter (see preceding note).

knotting of a necktie: cf. Lord Illingworth in A Woman of No Importance, Act III: ‘the essential thing for a necktie is style. A well-tied tie is the first serious step in life.’

- 111 experience itself . . . fruits of experience: in the ‘Conclusion’ of Studies in the History of the Renaissance, Pater suggests a modern version of the much older principle of carpe diem (i.e. ‘seize the moment’): ‘Not the fruit of experience, but experience itself is the end. A counted number of pulses only is given to us of a variegated, dramatic life’ (Renaissance, 210).

to teach man . . . but a moment: cf. Pater, ‘Conclusion’ to Studies in the History of the Renaissance: ‘For art comes to you proposing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to your moments as they pass, and simply for those moments’ sake’ (Renaissance, 190).

Gothic art: architecture, painting, and sculpture that thrived in central and western Europe from the mid-twelfth century to the end of the sixteenth century; frequently typified in the architecture of churches and cathedrals featuring pointed arches, flying buttresses, and piers supporting ribs to produce ceiling vaults.

sleep from her purple cave: in classical myth, Somnus, the god of sleep, inhabits a dark cave with poppies planted at the entrance.

- 112 that curious indifference . . . condition of it: cf. Pater, ‘Giordano Bruno’: ‘God the Spirit, the soul of the world, being therefore really identical with the soul of Bruno also, as the universe shapes itself to Bruno’s reason, to his imagination, ever more and more articulately, he too becomes a sharer of the divine joy in that process in the formation of true ideas, which is really parallel to the process of creation, to the evolution of things . . . with characteristic largeness of mind, Bruno accepted this theory in the whole range of its consequences. Its more immediate corollary was the famous axiom of “indifference”, of “the coincidence of contraries”’ (p. 286; Gaston, 73). Pater adds that ‘there is no proof’ that Bruno drew the joy, sincerity, enthusiasm, and religious fervour of his guiding idea—‘Conform thyself to Nature’—‘from his axiom of the “indifference of contraries”’ (p. 287; Gaston, 74).

Roman Catholic communion: the Roman Church was frequently associated with elaborate ritual, which appealed to many aesthetic and Decadent writers. Several figures in Wilde’s milieu would convert to Catholicism, including Aubrey Beardsley (1872–98) and John Gray. Wilde had long maintained a strong interest in Roman Catholicism, which is evident from his undergraduate correspondence at Oxford. Wilde's conversion to Rome took place on his deathbed in late November 1900.

- 112 dalmatic: an ecclesiastical vestment, with a slit on each side of the skirt, and wide sleeves, and marked with two stripes, worn in the Western Church by deacons and bishops on certain occasions (OED). Murray notes that Wilde misuses the term, since dalmatics were not worn at Benediction in the Roman Catholic Church. Murray notes that the references to ecclesiastical vestments and textiles that appear in this chapter are taken loosely from the 'Introduction' and catalogue entries in Daniel Rock, Textile Fabrics: A Descriptive Catalogue of the Collection of Church-Vestments, Dresses, Silk Stuffs, Needlework and Tapestries, Forming that Section of the Museum (1871); the collection that Rock describes belonged to the South Kensington Museum (later the Victoria and Albert Museum), whose collections partly derived from the Great Exhibition of 1851 (PDGO, 191–2).

monstrance: an open or transparent receptacle, now usually consisting of a holder or lunette set behind a circular pane of glass in a cross of gold or silver, in which the consecrated host is exposed for veneration (OED).

'panis caelestis': 'bread of heaven' (i.e. the Eucharist celebrated in the Roman Catholic mass).

- 113 chalice . . . censers . . . boys, in their lace and scarlet: components of the Roman Catholic mass: the chalice contains the wine that becomes the blood of Jesus Christ, the censers are for incense that symbolizes purification, and the altar boys attend the priest during the ceremony.

black confessionals: confessional boxes where Roman Catholics individually confess their sins to a priest whose face is obscured behind a screen.

antinomianism: doctrine that maintains that Christians are not bound by obligations to natural or moral law; the term dates back to 1535 when it was applied to a sect thought to hold such belief.

the Darwinismus movement in Germany: a reference to the integration of Origin of Species (1859) by Charles Darwin (1809–82) into German intellectual history. The 'Darwinismus' movement is usually dated to the speech made by Ernst Haeckel (1834–1919) to the Association of German Scientists at Stettin in 1863.

champak: Asian magnolia often founded in the grounds of Hindu temples because it is considered sacred to the god Vishnu. It is one of the many scents that appears in chapter 10 of Huysmans's A rebours where Des Esseintes sprays his room with various sensual perfumes—'human, half-feline essences, redolent of skirts, heralding the appearance of powdered and rouged womankind' (Huysmans, 97).

spikenard: fragrant ointment derived from a Himalayan aromatic plant in the valerian family.

hovenia: East Asian shrub better known as the raisin tree because of the shape of its fruit.

- 114 juruparis of the Rio Negro Indians: in this and the following paragraphs, many of the references to musical instruments and precious stones are taken from handbooks published to accompany exhibits in the South Kensington Museum. For the exotic musical instruments, Wilde adapted passages from Carl Engel, Musical Instruments (South Kensington Museum Art Handbooks, No. 5 (Chapman and Hall, 1875): e.g. ‘the juruparis, a mysterious instrument of the Indians of the Rio Haupés, a tributary of the Rio Negro, south America. The juruparis is regarded as an object of great veneration. Women are never permitted to see it. So stringent is this law that any woman obtaining sight of it is put to death—usually by poison . . . Jurupari means “demon”’ (Engel, Instruments, 68).

‘Tannhäuser’ . . . prelude to that great work of art: opera by Wagner, based on German legend, first performed at Dresden in 1845. The historical Tannhäuser was a Minnesinger or minstrel, to whom a number of Leiche (lyric lays) are attributed. The popular sixteenth-century German ballad ‘Danhauser’ preserves the legend that later German writers—including Heinrich Heine (1797–1856), E. T. A. Hoffman (1776–1822), and Ludwig Tieck (1773–1853)—would reinterpret. By ‘prelude’, Wilde presumably means the Ouverture (overture) to the opera, which his speaker Gilbert praises in ‘The Critic as Artist’ (CWks, viii. 149).

- 115 Anne de Joyeuse: (1561–87) Duke of Joyeuse, Admiral of France, and favourite of Henri III of France (1551–89). Henri III arranged for de Joyeuse’s marriage to the queen’s sister; according to Jules Quicherat’s Histoire de Costume en France (Paris: Hachette, 1875), at the wedding the bride and bridegroom were adorned with ‘broderies, perles et pierreries’ (‘embroideries, pearls and precious stones’) (PDGO, 192).

chrysoberyl: in ‘Das Gelbe Buch in Oscar Wildes Dorian Gray’, Englische Studien, 55 (1921), 237–56, Bernard Fehr notes that this is the first of a series of references that were largely taken from A. H. Church, Precious Stones Considered in their Scientific and Artistic Relations, with a Catalogue of the Townshend Collection of Gems in the South Kensington Museum (London: South Kensington Museum, 1882).

Alphonso’s ‘Clericalis Disciplina’ . . . slain: Murray (OW, 583; PDGO, 192) observes that Wilde imported the information contained in this and the next two paragraphs almost verbatim from William Jones, History and Mystery of Precious Stones (London: R. Bentley, 1880). In a letter to the Daily Chronicle, which had complained of the ‘obtrusively cheap scholarship’ of the 1890 edition, Wilde remarked: ‘my story contains no learned or pseudo-learned discussion . . . Such books as Alphonso’s Clericalis Disciplina belong not to culture, but to curiosity’ (CL, 436).

- 116 Edward II . . . parsemé with pearls: the reference to Edward II (1284–1327) and his male lover Piers Gaveston (d. 1312) is the only part of this and the preceding paragraphs not to appear in Jones's study Precious Stones. Jones, however, mentions the jewels that Edward II gave to Queen Isabella. parsemé: sprinkled (French).

- 116 Then he turned his attention to embroideries: in Oscar Wilde (London: Methuen, 1910), Arthur Ransome (1884–1967) notes that the 'original of the passage in Dorian Gray on embroideries and tapestries is to be found in a review of a book by Ernest Lefébure' (pp. 82–3). Wilde's source was the English translation of Ernest Lefébure, Embroidery and Lace: Their Manufacture and History from the Remotest Antiquity to the Present Day—A Handbook for Amateurs, Collectors, and General Readers, trans. Alan S. Cole (London: H. Grevel, 1888). Wilde's review of Lefébure's study, 'A Fascinating Book', was published in Wilde's Woman's World, 2 (1888–9), 53–6; repr. in CWks, xiii. 327–41. Much of the following paragraph is taken verbatim from Wilde's review.

- 117 jonquils: Wilde associated jonquils with male beauty. In late May 1898, for example, Wilde wrote of his friend Maurice Gilbert (a young soldier in a marine infantry; dates unknown): 'He appeared, jonquil-like in aspect, a sweet narcissus from an English meadow' (CL, 1074).

- 118 the crocus-coloured robe . . . the tremulous gilt of its canopy: cf. Wilde, 'A Fascinating Book' (CWks, xiii. 334–5), from which most of this passage is taken.

veils . . . Hungary point: cf. Lefébure, Embroidery and Lace, 166: 'Every assiduous woman now embroiders in satin stitch, feather stitch, check or chessboard stitch, and point de Hongrie (Hungary stitch).'

Georgian work: cf. Lefébure, Embroidery and Lace, 161: 'Georgians and Greeks work charming meanders upon cloth in gold threads or cords, picked out sometimes with small discs or little coins.' By 'Georgian', Lefébure means 'of Georgia', not, in the more usual English sense, of the architectural styles and furnishing associated with George III (1738–1820).

Foukousas: cf. Lefébure, Embroidery and Lace, 161: 'Japanese Foukouses, "those squares of stuff, more or less worked over, which are used by the Japanese as covers to their ceremonial gift".'

raiment of the Bride of Christ: vestments worn by a novitiate nun on her wedding day when she takes holy vows that commit her to a life of religious devotion as a Bride of Christ.

St. Sebastian: Christian saint, d. c.288, who was believed to have been persecuted by Roman emperor Diocletian (243–303). Several Italian Renaissance and Baroque painters depicted Sebastian's martyrdom, and the image of the slain saint became a point of reference for a number of homophile writers in the nineteenth century.

- 119 cope . . . orphreys . . . sudaria: ecclesiastical vestments.

Blue Gate Fields: formerly known as Ratcliffe Highway, the area known as Blue Gate Fields, in the East End of London, was associated with opium dens (cf. note to p. 5 on opium-tainted cigarettes). Earlier in the century, the motiveless murders committed in December 1811 by seaman John Williams on Ratcliffe Highway were discussed by Thomas De Quincey (1785–1859) in ‘Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts’ (1827).

Trouville: Trouville-sur-Mer, French seaside resort on Normandy coast.

- 120 the Churchill: this name of this club or restaurant is probably Wilde’s invention.

coiners: makers of counterfeit coins (OED).

manners are of more importance than morals: cf. Mrs Erlynne in Lady Windermere’s Fan, Act IV: ‘My dear Windermere, manners before morals!’

- 121 a method . . . multiply our personalities: cf. Gilbert in ‘The Critic as Artist’: ‘What people call insincerity is simply a method by which we can multiply our personalities’ (CWks, viii. 197).

complex multiform: cf. Gilbert in ‘The Critic as Artist’: ‘And yet, while in the sphere of practical and external life it [i.e. the scientific principle of heredity] has robbed energy of its freedom and activity of its choice, in the subjective sphere, where the soul is at work, it comes to us, this terrible shadow, with many gifts in its hands . . . complex multiform gifts of thoughts that are at variance with each other, and passions that war against themselves’ (CWks, viii. 179).

Philip Herbert . . . Francis Osborne . . . ‘Memoires on the Reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James’: in Historical Memoirs on the Reigns of Elizabeth and King James (1658) by Francis Osborne (1593–1659), the quotation reads ‘caressed by KING JAMES’ (OW, 583; PDGO, 192).

surcoat: an outer coat or garment, commonly of rich material, worn by people of rank of both sexes; often worn by armed men over their armour, and having the heraldic arms depicted on it (OED).

Sir Anthony Sherard: the name Sherard comes from Robert Harborough Sherard (1861–1943), whom Wilde first met at Paris in 1883.

Giovanna of Naples: Giovanna II of Naples (1371–1435) had a succession of husbands and turbulent love affairs.

Lady Elizabeth Devereux: the name is Wilde’s invention; he is alluding to the intimacy between Elizabeth I (1533–1603) and Robert Devereux, 2nd Earl of Essex (1567–1601). While the earl, a military commander, for some time maintained the queen’s favour, his campaigns eventually fell short of her wishes. In 1599 the queen ordered the earl to suppress rebellion in Ireland, where he reached an inauspicious truce, which led to his dismissal from his duties. After the earl and his followers failed in a revolt against the monarch, he was executed. Devereux is the last name of Dorian Gray’s mother.

pearl stomacher: cf. Jones, Precious Stones, 334: ‘The STOMACHER [i.e. a kind of waistcoat] jewelled, was worn by men and women from the reign of Edward IV. [1442–83] to Henry VIII. [1491–1547], inclusive.’

- 122 macaroni: in the mid-eighteenth century, a young man who had travelled and affected the tastes and fashions prevalent in Continental society (OED); a forerunner of the dandy.

Prince Regent: in 1811, the prince of Wales (1762–1830) became prince regent because the insanity of his father George III (1738–1820) meant that the monarch was unfit to rule. The Regency period (1811–19), which witnessed the end of the Napoleonic Wars, was associated with dissolute and luxurious styles of living.

Mrs. Fitzherbert: Maria Anne Fitzherbert (1756–1837) married the prince of Wales in 1785; he was her third husband. Since Mrs Fitzherbert was a Roman Catholic, the marriage was declared illegal under the Act of Settlement (1701) and the Royal Marriage Act (1772). Although the Prince of Wales fulfilled state requirements in his marriage to Caroline of Brunswick in 1795, he continued his relationship with Mrs Fitzherbert intermittently for many years afterwards.

Carlton House: located in the north-east of St James’s Park, London, the home of the prince of Wales when he reached his majority in 1783; architects Henry Holland (1745–1806) and John Nash (1752–1835), among others, helped to refurbish and extended the lavish dwelling until 1815. In 1826 Nash declared the building structurally unsafe; it was demolished the following year.

Lady Hamilton: Lady Emma Hamilton, originally Amy Lyon (1761–1815), renowned beauty, mistress of Viscount Horatio Nelson (1758–1805), whom she met in 1793 and with whom she had an illegitimate daughter in 1801; several painters, notably the English artist George Romney (1734–1802), painted portraits of her.

wonderful novel . . . seventh chapter: Wilde is presumably thinking of chapter 3 of Huysmans’s A rebours where Des Esseintes explores the Latin works held in his library; in the following paragraph, only the reference to Elagabalus comes from this chapter. Chapter 7 of Huysmans’s A rebours has no bearing on the list of Roman tyrants that appear in this paragraph.

- 123 crowned with laurel . . . Tiberius . . . Elephantis: Tiberius (b.42 BC), declared Roman emperor in AD 14. He was an unpopular ruler who retired to Capri in AD 27. Wilde’s source is Lives of the Caesars by Suetonius (b. c. AD 70) who comments at length on the Caesars’ legendary tyranny, cruelty, and sexual perversity. In ancient Greece, Elephantis was a woman poet who wrote about different modes of sexual coition. The Roman poet Martial (c. AD 40–c.104) refers to ‘molles Elephantidos libelli’ (‘voluptuous little books of Elephantis’) in his Epigrams, vii. 43; her writings have long perished.

Caligula: Gaius (AD 12–41), popularly known as Caligula, Roman emperor AD 37–41.

Domitian: (AD 51–96), Roman emperor AD 81–96.

tædium vitæ: weariness of life (Latin).

Nero Cæsar: see note to p. 110.

Elagabalus: Roman emperor, c.205–22. ‘HELOGABALUS . . . —M. Aurelius Antoninus, a Roman emperor, son of Varius Marcellus, called Heliogalabus, because he had been priest of that divinity in Phœnecia’ (Lemprière, 293). Elagabalus was a cross-dressed tyrant infamous for his licentiousness and perversity. Fehr (‘Das Gelbe Buch’, 252) identifies Wilde’s source as The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, 6 vols. (1766–88) by Edward Gibbon (1737–94), vol. i. ch. 6. In his correspondence, Wilde associates Elagabalus with homosexual desire. In chapter 5 of A rebours, des Esseintes becomes absorbed in the life of Tertullian (c. AD 160–c.225), father of Latin theology, where he reads about Elagabalus.

Filippo, Duke of Milan: Filippo Maria Visconti (1392–1447). Fehr (‘Das Gelbe Buch’, 251–5) notes that the allusions to figures from the Italian Renaissance appear in Renaissance in Italy: The Age of the Despots (1875) by John Addington Symonds. Symonds mentions this duke on pp. 54 and 81–2.

Pietro Barbi: Paul II (1417–71), pope 1464–71; cf. Symonds, Age of the Despots, 317–18.

Gian Maria Visconti: Giovanni Maria Visconti, despotic duke of Milan (1388–1412); cf. Symonds, Age of the Despots, 82.

the Borgia . . . Perotto: Cesare Borgia (1476–1507), Italian soldier, younger son of Pope Alexander VI (1431?–1503), was supported by his father to create a papal empire; from 1499 to 1503 he used criminal methods to seize territory, until Louis XII (1462–1515) and Pope Julius II (1443–1513) turned against him. Cf. Symonds, Age of the Despots, 361–2: ‘At one time Cesare stabbed Perotto, the Pope’s minion, with his own hand, when the youth had taken refuge in Alexander’s arms; the blood spurted out upon the priestly mantle and the youth died there.’

Pietro Riario: cf. Symonds, Age of the Despots, 324–5: ‘Pietro, another nephew of the Riario blood, or, as scandal then reported and [Italian historian Ludovico Antonio] Muratori [1672–1750] has since believed, a son of the Pope himself, was elevated at the age of twenty-six to the dignities of Cardinal, Patriarch of Constantinople, and Archbishop of Florence. He had no virtues, no abilities, nothing but his beauty, the scandalous affection of the Pope, and the extravagant profligacy of his own life, to recommend him to the notice of posterity. All Italy during two years rang with the noise of his debaucheries.’

Sixtus IV: Francesco della Rovere (1414–84), pope 1471–81.

Ganymede or Hylas: both beautiful youths in classical myth: Ganymede was cup-bearer to the gods; Hylas was the favourite companion of Hercules; while travelling with the Argonauts, Hylas was enchanted by nymphs, fell into a spring, and drowned.

- 123 Ezzelin: Ezzelino of Romano (1194–1259), Duke of Padua, tyrannical Ghibelline leader; cf. Symonds, Age of the Despots, 42–5: ‘His one passion was the greed of power, heightened by the lust for blood . . . Ezzelino made himself terrible not merely by executions and imprisonments but also by mutilations and torments . . . [Such a man] becomes the puppet of passions which the sane man cannot so much as picture to his fancy, the victim of desire, ever recurring and ever destined to remain unsatisfied; nor is any hallucination ever akin to lunacy than the mirage of a joy that leaves the soul more thirsty than it was before, the paroxysm of unnatural pleasure that wearies the nerves that crave for it.’
- Giambattista Cibo*: (1432–92), Pope Innocent VIII (1484–92); cf. Symonds, Age of the Despots, 338–9: ‘Avarice, venality, sloth, and the ascendancy of base favourites made his reign loathsome . . . While [he] still hovered between life and death, a Jewish doctor proposed to reinvigorate him by the transfusion of young blood into his torpid veins. Three boys throbbing with the elixir of early youth were sacrificed in vain.’
- 124 Sigismondo Malatesta: Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta (1417–68), Italian despot; cf. Age of the Despots, 103–4: ‘Sigismondo Pandolfo Malatesta, the Lord of Rimini, might be selected as a true type of the princes who united a romantic zeal for culture with the vices of barbarians . . . [He] killed three wives in succession, violated his daughter, and attempted the chastity of his own son . . . He caused the magnificent church of San Francesco at Milan to be raised by Leo Alberti in a manner more worthy of a Pagan Pantheon than of a Christian temple. He encrusted it with exquisite bas-reliefs in marble, the triumphs of the earliest Renaissance style, carved his own name and ensigns upon every scroll and frieze and point of vantage in the building, and dedicated a shrine to his concubine—Divæ Isottæ Sacrum [i.e. Temple of the Goddess Isotta].’
- Charles VI*: (1362–1422), king of France from 1380; this reference does not appear in Symonds, Age of the Despots.
- Saracen cards*: early name for Tarot cards, which were assumed to have their origins in Arabic culture.
- Grifonetto Baglioni* . . . Astorre . . . Simonetto: members of the family of Umbrian nobles who controlled the city of Perugia between 1488 and 1534; cf. Symonds, Sketches and Studies in Italy and Greece (London: Smith, Elder, 1874), 84–6.
- Grosvenor Square*: a fashionable area of the West End of London.
- grey ulster*: long, loose belted overcoat introduced by J. G. M. McGee of Belfast in 1867.
- 125 Victoria: Victoria railway station, London, was partly opened in 1860 and fully opened in 1862; it served the south and west of England.
- Gladstone bag*: leather travelling-bag, dating from the 1880s, named after W. E. Gladstone (1809–98), who served as prime minister in 1868–74, 1880–5, 1886, 1892–4.

Dutch silver spirit-case: a spirit-case that holds bottles containing alcoholic beverages.

- 126 Anglomanie: Anglomania (fanaticism for all things English) (French).

hock-and-seltzer: mixed beverage of German wine, known as Hochheimer (from Hochheim on Main), and carbonated mineral water (originally from the German spas of Selters).

- 127 exhibition at the Dudley: major art gallery located at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, in the West End of London.

the Guards: the cavalry brigade of the English Household troops; specifically the 3rd regiment of this body, the Royal Horse Guards (formerly the Oxford Blues) (OED).

Sir Henry Ashton . . . tarnished name: while the name of this lord is Wilde's invention, this figure may refer indirectly to Lord Arthur Somerset (1851–1926), who left England permanently on 18 October 1889 after his name had been linked with the activities of a homosexual brothel at 19 Cleveland Street in the West End of London. Since 9 July 1889 police had been observing the movements of upper-class men and 'telegraph-boys' from the nearby Post Office in and out of this building. Somerset resigned his commission from the Prince of Wales's household and fled to France before the warrant for his arrest was issued.

St. James's Street: in the West End of London.

- 128 They have gone down into the depths: cf. Psalm 107: 26.

- 129 Mentone: also called Merton, summer resort town on the south-eastern coast of France, close to the border with Italy, famous for its warm climate, luxurious hotels, promenades, tropical gardens, casino, and seventeenth-century district; the town was a favourite winter resort among the British upper classes.

- 130 tithe: a tenth part.

- 132 'Can't you see your ideal in it?' . . . 'My ideal . . .': in the 1890 edition, 'romance' appears in place of 'ideal'.

'Each of us has Heaven and Hell in him': cf. Milton, Paradise Lost (1674), where Satan declares: 'The mind is its own place, and in itself | Can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven' (i. 422).

- 133 Lead us not into temptation. Forgive us our sins: these sentences reverse the sequence in which they appear in the Lord's Prayer recited in both Anglican and Roman Catholic services, which runs as follows: 'Give us this day our daily bread; | And forgive us our debts, As we also have forgiven our debtors; | And lead us not into temptation, But deliver us from evil' (Matthew 6: 11–13).

Wash away our iniquities: 'Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin!' (Psalm 51: 2); cf. 'Wash yourselves; make yourselves clean; remove the evil of your doings from before my eyes' (Isaiah 1: 16).

133 'Though your sins . . . as snow': 'Though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow' (Isaiah 1: 18).

135 Moorish: of or pertaining to the nomadic Moors of Northern Africa, whose culture spread to south-west Europe. Now often used with reference to the style of furniture and architecture, popular in England in the nineteenth century, characteristic of that made by the Moors in Spain (eighth–fifteenth century) and in North Africa (OED).

bull's-eye: a lantern featuring a hemispherical lens of thick glass.

136 Hertford Street, Mayfair: located in the West End of London.

138 Gautier's 'Émaux et Camées,' a Charpentier's Japanese-paper edition: the Japanese paper edition ('papier vergé') of Théophile Gautier's Émaux et Camées with the etching ('eau-forte') by J. Jacquemart, was published in Paris by Charpentier in 1872.

the poem about the hand of Lacenaire: 'Lacenaire', in Gautier's Émaux et Camées. Pierre François Lacenaire (1803–36) was a convicted double murderer.

'du supplice encore mal lavée' . . . 'doigts de faune': 'of torment yet uncleansed' . . . 'fingers like those of a faun' ('Lacenaire', Émaux et Camées, 191).

Sur une gamme chromatique . . . escalier: from Gautier's 'Sur les lagunes' ('On the Lagoons', Émaux et camées, 25). 'Upon a chromatic scale, | Her bosom streaming with pearls, | The Venus of the Adriatic | Comes out of the water in her pink and white flesh. | The domes upon the blue water's waves | Pursue the pure contour of the musical phrase, | Filling like plump breasts | That heave with a sigh of love. | The skiff lands and sets me down, | Throwing its lines on the pillar, | In front of a pink façade, | On the marble of a stairway.'

the Lido: the nineteenth-century seaside resort built on the largest sand-bank surrounding the lagoon in which the city of Venice is located.

Campanile: the 324-foot high bell-tower of St Mark's basilica in the Piazza San Marco, Venice.

139 Tintoret: better known as Tintoretto (Jacopo Robusti, c.1518–94), Mannerist painter, renowned for his masterpiece The Last Supper (1594), in the church of San Giorgio Maggiore, Venice.

swallows . . . Smyrna . . . Hadjis: see 'Ce que disent les hirondelles: chanson d'automne' ('What the Swallows Say: An Autumn Song'), in Gautier's Émaux et camées. One of the swallows sings: 'I have my small room | Above the ceiling of a Smyrna coffee-house. | The Hadjis count their amber beads | In the doorway's warm ray of light.' Smyrna is the historical name of the ancient city of Izmir, the large Ottoman port located on the Gulf of Izmir, Turkey. Hadjis are pilgrims who have travelled to Mecca.

Obelisk in the Place de la Concorde: see 'L'Obélisque de Paris', the first part in the two-part poem 'Nostalgies d'obélisques' in Gautier's Émaux et camées. In this poem, the obelisk declares in the first person: 'In this place, tired with ennui, | I, the lonely obelisk stand; | Snow, frost, drizzle and rain | Freeze my already rusted sides.' The obelisk in the Place de la Concorde, Paris, which originally marked the entrance to the Amon temple at Luxor, Egypt, was installed in 1836.

Nile . . . Sphinxes: see 'L'Obélisque du Luxor', the second part of the two-part poem 'Nostalgies d'obélisques' in Gautier's Émaux et camées where the obelisk in the first person refers to 'l'eau morte' ('dead water'): '[T]he yawning | Of the sphinxes, weary of the attitude | That they maintain immutably'. Thousands of statues of the sphinx were built in ancient Egypt, at Al Jizah on the River Nile. The sphinx had a human face and the body of a lion.

curious status . . . Gautier . . . 'monstre charmant': the Louvre's second-century AD Roman replica of the much older Greek statue of Hermaphroditus (the beautiful son of Hermes and Aphrodite) who in classical myth was adored by Samalcis, the nymph of the fountain near Halicarnassus where he bathed. Gautier celebrates this doubly sexed statue in 'Contralto' in Gautier's Émaux et camées where the speaker declares: 'Enrapturing monster, how I wish to make love | To your multiple beauty.'

the Laboratory . . . Natural Science Tripos: the first chemical laboratory specifically built for that purpose, at the University of Cambridge, was opened in 1887. Cambridge established the Natural Sciences tripos undergraduate degree in 1851; the tripos combines two examined parts, the one lasting for a year, the other two years.

- 140 Rubinstein: Anton Grigoryevich Rubinstein (1829–94), Russian composer and piano virtuoso, who founded the St Petersburg Conservatory in 1872.
- 141 'Alan . . . Gray': Dorian's use of Alan Campbell's first name assumes an intimacy that Campbell, who addresses Dorian by his last name, does not share.

Astrakhan coat: coat trimmed or lined with fur-like woollen fabric, originating in Astrakhan, Russia.

- 143 dead-houses: mortuaries.
- 145 Richmond: Richmond-upon-Thames, Surrey; famous for its Royal Park.
- 147 Parma violets: cultivated violets with double, scented flowers, usually light or deep purple (OED).
- 148 bonnet right over the mills: the phrasing is adapted from the French expression 'jeter son bonnet par-dessus les moulins' ('to throw one's bonnet over the mills'); the idiom means 'to abandon decorum or act freely without regard for what others think'.

Homburg: Bad Homburg vor der Höhe, Germany; city famous for its mineral waters (rediscovered in 1834) and its casino (opened in 1841).

country life: in the society comedies, Wilde frequently makes jokes about the tiresome nature of country life: see, for example, The Importance of

Being Earnest, Act I, where Jack Worthing comments: 'When one is in town one amuses oneself. When one is in the country one amuses other people. It is excessively boring.'

148 Mrs. Erlynne: Wilde reused this name for the adventuress in Lady Windermere's Fan.

149 ormolu: meaning 'ground-gold' (French); gilded bronze used in the decoration of furniture, also known as 'Mosaic gold' (OED).

chaudfroid: a dish composed of cooked meat, fish, etc., served in aspic jelly or sauce (OED).

décolletée: derived from 'to expose to neck' (French); of a dress, cut low round the neck (OED).

édition de luxe: a luxurious edition of a book, with an elegant binding.

150 her hair turned quite gold from grief: a line that Wilde reused; cf. The Importance of Being Earnest, Act I, where Algernon Moncrieff remarks: 'I hear her hair has turned quite gold from grief.'

Marguerite de Navarre: Marguerite de Valois, Queen Consort of Navarre (1553–1615) (see also note to p. 40). Wilde took this reference to the monarch's notorious licentiousness and cruelty from chapter 26 of volume i of La Reine Margot (1847), a two-volume novel by Alexandre Dumas père (1802–70). Dumas provides a footnote which refers his reader to the Histoire de Marguerite de Valois in Historiettes du grand siècle (written post-1657, published 1834) by Gédéon Tallemant des Réaux (1619–92): 'She wore a hooped corset which had many pockets, and in each of these pockets she kept a box containing the heart of one of her deceased lovers; for she took care, in the event of their death, of embalming their hearts. This hooped corset she hung every night on a hook, which was padlocked, behind the head of her bed.'

trop de zèle: too much zeal (French).

Trop d'audace: too much daring (French).

'It can only be . . . excellent terms': cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act I, where Lord Illingworth comments: 'It must be the next world. This world and I are on excellent terms.'

'It is perfectly monstrous . . . true': the same line is given to Lord Illingworth in A Woman of No Importance, Act I.

151 'Nowadays all the married . . . men': in A Woman of No Importance, Act II, this line is given to Lady Hunstanton.

'Fin de siècle' . . . 'Fin du globe': fin de siècle means 'end of the century' (French). OED suggests that the term dates from 1890; it became associated with pessimism, weariness, weakening of purpose, and Decadence (see p. xx). Fin du globe means, literally, 'end of the world' (French); in the manuscript of this chapter, Wilde wrote 'Fin du monde', which is the more idiomatic expression in French.

Debrett: Debrett's Peerage and Baronetage, first published in 1802, providing information about the monarchy, aristocracy, Privy Counsellors, baronets, Scottish Lords of Session, and chiefs of Scottish clans.

The Morning Post: daily newspaper established in 1772, it was connected first with Liberal and then with High Tory politics, and it ranked second to the The Times in prestige and authority; it merged with the Daily Telegraph in 1937.

- 152 'I didn't . . . cigarette': the fact that Lady Ruxton is smoking cigarettes indicates that she is a woman of fashion, since this was not yet a widespread practice among female members of society.

Moderation is a fatal thing: in A Woman of No Importance, Act III, this line is given to Lord Illingworth.

- 153 He atones . . . absolutely over-educated: cf. The Importance of Being Earnest, Act II, where Algernon states: 'If I am occasionally a little over-dressed, I make up for it by being always immensely over-educated.'

Monte Carlo: in the principality of Monaco on the French Riviera; its famous casino was built in 1858; Wilde and Douglas visited there in March 1895.

- 154 pastilles: small rolls of aromatic paste prepared to be burnt as a perfume (OED).

lapis: minerals or gem stones (Latin).

green paste: opium.

Bond Street: in the late nineteenth century, the street was one of the most fashionable in London, noted for its jewellers and art dealers, such as Agnew's.

- 155 an address: presumably in the East End of London.

'To cure . . . the soul': see note to p. 21.

opium-dens: located in the East End of London.

gas-lamps grew fewer: gas street-lighting in London dates from 1805, when a length of Pall Mall was lit to celebrate the king's birthday; by the mid-nineteenth century most areas of London benefited from such lighting, though poorer areas, such as those in the East End, had fewer gas-lamps.

- 156 brickfields: more commonly, brick-fields; field or piece of ground in which bricks are made (OED). They were associated with the East End; hence the name of the well-known thoroughfare Brick Lane.

monstrous marionettes . . . like live things: cf. Wilde's poem 'The Harlot's House' (1885): 'Sometimes a horrible Marionette | Came out, and smoked its cigarette | Upon the steps like a live thing' (ll. 22-4).

- 159 Malay crease: also spelled 'kris'; a Malay dagger, with a blade of wavy form (OED).

- 160 morning-star of evil: in biblical theology, Satan is also known as Lucifer, the name of the morning-star that shines most brightly in the sky; see

Isaiah 14: 12. Cf. also Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 131–5, where the angel Raphael declares: ‘Know then, that, after Lucifer from Heaven | (So call him, brighter once amidst the host | Of Angels, than that star the stars among,) | Fell with his flaming legions through the deep | Into his place.’

162 Daly’s: in principle, since this allusion occurs in a scene set in the East End of London, it refers to an opium den. Yet it may be a private joke of some kind on Wilde’s part, since it would have evoked for some of Wilde’s readers the theatrical productions organized in the West End by the American playwright, director, and manager John Augustin Daly (1838–99), who opened Daly’s Theatre, New York City, in 1878.

163 Brazilian beetle: entomologists, whose prestige developed with the founding of the Entomological Society of London in 1833, prized such beetles because of their size and colour.

Robinsoniana: Anemone nemerosa ‘Robinsoniana’, named after William Robinson (1838–1935), whose studies of wild and woodland gardens appeared in 1870 and 1883.

164 Tartuffe: the male protagonist of Tartuffe (1667), a controversial play by Jean-Baptiste Poquelin, also known as Molière (1622–73); Tartuffe is an unpleasant hypocrite whose pious behaviour seeks to mask his adulterous passions.

Great things have been thrust on us: Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (II. v): ‘Some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some have greatness thrust upon them.’

survival of the pushing: an ironic rephrasing of the famous remark on the ‘survival of the fittest’ in Principles of Biology (1865) by Herbert Spencer.

165 women rule the world: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act III, where Lord Illingworth comments: ‘No man had any real success in this world unless he has got women to back him, and women rule society.’

166 We can have in life . . . experience: cf. Pater, ‘Conclusion’: ‘With this sense of the splendour of our experience and of its awful brevity, gathering all we are into one desperate effort to see and touch, we shall hardly have time to make theories about the things we see and touch’ (Renaissance, 189).

the Trojans. They fought for a woman: in Greek mythology, there are several versions of the story of Helen, the most beautiful of all women, daughter of Zeus and Leda, who was courted by the greatest heroes of Greece. Helen chose Menelaus as her spouse. During his absence in Crete, however, she deserted Greece with the Trojan prince Paris. In the Iliad Homer records how the Greeks were led by Menelaus’ brother Agamemnon to recover her. While the Greeks laid siege to Troy for nine years, they failed to take it.

167 ‘That a burnt child loves the fire’: the remark reverses a line by English poet John Lyly (?1554–1606): ‘A burnt childe dreadeth the fire’ (Euphues and His England (1580), ed. Edward Arber (1869), 319).

romanticists: adherents of romanticism in music and art; from the 1820s onward, the term was frequently used in antithesis to classical antiquity, and it was often applied to composers such as Chopin and Schubert.

‘Sphinxes without secrets’: Wilde’s works return to the idea of ‘sphinxes without secrets’: cf. ‘The Sphinx without a Secret: An Etching’, first published as ‘Lady Alroy’ in the World (25 May 1887) (CWks, vi. 123–32). Lord Illingworth uses the phrase in A Woman of No Importance, Act I.

Parthian: of or pertaining to Parthia, an ancient kingdom of western Asia (OED). In classical history, the Parthians were known for their military prowess, and they were celebrated for their skills as horsemen and archers. The ‘Parthian manner’ alludes to their custom of discharging their arrows while they were retired from the enemy at full speed; their flight was thought to be more effective than their attack.

169 to the open: the open space: the part of the country not fenced or enclosed; clear space; ground without buildings, trees, or other cover (OED).

171 beaters: men employed in rousing and driving game; usage dates from the nineteenth century (OED).

Destiny: Wilde probably has in mind Fortuna, ‘a powerful deity among the ancients, daughter of Oceanus according to Homer, or one of the Parcae according to Pindar. She was the goddess of fortune, and from her hand were derived riches and poverty, pleasures and misfortune, blessings and pain . . . The goddess of Fortune is represented on ancient monuments with a horn of plenty, and sometimes two, in her hands. She is blindfolded, and generally holds a wheel in her hand, as an emblem of her inconstancy’ (Lemprière, 268–9).

172 ‘The basis of every scandal is an immoral certainty’: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act I, where Lady Caroline remarks: ‘Lord Illingworth remarked to me last night at dinner that the basis of every scandal is an absolutely immoral certainty.’

‘You would sacrifice anybody, Harry, for the sake of an epigram’: cf. [she] would sacrifice [her] own life for an epigram’, Ouida, Othmar, 3 vols. (London: Chatto and Windus, 1885), i. 63.

Artemis: the Greek name of the goddess Diana, the virgin-huntress who defended her chastity.

173 ‘It came to you crowned’ ‘. . . strawberry leaves’: Lord Henry’s remark points to the Duchess’s aristocratic heritage; in heraldry, a duchess’s crown features four fleurs-de-lis and four strawberry leaves alternating, chased as if jewelled, with a single arch topped with a single fleur-de-lis.

174 ‘The button . . . eyes lovelier’: cf. the following exchange from A Woman of No Importance, Act I:

LORD ILLINGWORTH: You fence divinely. But the button has come off your foil.

MRS ALLONBY: I still have the mask.

LORD ILLINGWORTH: It makes your eyes lovelier.

A foil is a light weapon used in fencing; a kind of small-sword with a blunt edge and a button at the point (OED).

- 177 Perdita . . . Florizel: protagonists of Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale.

floating . . . in some star-lit mill-pond . . . like Ophelia: this image of Ophelia is reminiscent of the oil painting Ophelia by John Everett Millais (1829–96).

- 178 Scotland Yard: Great Scotland Yard, Whitehall, in the West End of London, was the Headquarters of the London Metropolitan Police until 1891.

every one who disappears . . . San Francisco: in his works, Wilde frequently makes gibes at Americans and American culture. Wilde reused some of these anti-American remarks in A Woman of No Importance, Act I.

open vinaigrette box: a small ornamental box usually containing a sponge charged with some aromatic pungent salts (OED).

- 179 Waterbury watch: in 1883 watches made by the Waterbury Watch Company, Waterbury, Connecticut, were patented as 'The Waterbury'; the company made low-priced watches and clocks.

Velasquez: Spanish painter Diego Rodríguez de Silva y Velázquez (1599–1660), famous for his naturalistic portraits and still lifes.

- 180 'Like the painting of a sorrow . . . heart': Shakespeare, Hamlet (iv. vii).

'what does it profit a man . . . his own soul': 'For what does it profit a man, to gain the whole world and forfeit his life?' (Mark 8: 36).

- 181 To get back my youth . . . be respectable: cf. A Woman of No Importance, Act III, where Lord Illingworth comments: 'To win back my youth, Gerald, there is nothing I wouldn't do—except take exercise, get up early, or be a useful member of the community.'

high stocks: stiff close-fitting neck-cloths, formerly worn by men generally; usage dates from the early eighteenth century (OED).

- 182 Chopin . . . Majorca: Chopin rented a villa in the remote village of Valldemosa in the Mediterranean island of Majorca in the autumn of 1838; he lived there with his mistress, the novelist George Sand (the pen name of Aurore Dudevant), together with her two children, until ill health meant that he had to leave for Marseilles in March 1839.

one art left to us . . . not imitative: cf. Pater, 'The School of Giorgione': 'All art constantly aspires towards the condition of music' (Fortnightly Review, NS 22 (1877), 528); the essay was added to the third edition of The Renaissance in 1888.

Apollo . . . Marsyas: in classical myth, Apollo was the god of medicine, music, poetry, and eloquence. Marsyas was a celebrated flute-player who challenged Apollo to a musical contest. The Muses judged Apollo the winner. The god tied Marsyas to a tree and flayed him alive; cf. note to p. 106: 'delicate sound of flutes'.

Life is a question of nerves, and fibres and slowly-built-up cells: cf. Pater, 'Conclusion' to Studies in the History of the Renaissance: 'Let us begin with that which is without—our physical life. Fix upon it in one of its more exquisite intervals, the moment, for instance, of delicious recoil from the flood of water in summer heat. What is the whole physical life in that moment but a combination of natural elements to which science gives their names? But those elements, phosphorus and lime and delicate fibres, are present now in the human body alone: we detect them in places most remote from it. Our physical life is a perpetual motion of them—the passage of blood, the waste and repairing of the lenses of the eye, the modification of the tissues of the brain under every ray or light and sound—processes which science reduces to simpler and more elementary forces' (Renaissance, 186).

Browning writes about that somewhere: cf. 'A Toccata of Galuppi's' (1855) by English poet Robert Browning (1812–89); the poem features a speaker who contemplates a toccata (a rapid overture designed to display the performer's mastery of the keyboard) by Venetian composer Baldassare Galuppi (1706–85). Browning's speaker comments on how Galuppi's 'cold music' makes him 'creep through every nerve' (l. 33).

lilas blanc: white lilac (French).