“External objects present us only with appearances. Concerning them, therefore, we may be said to possess opinion rather than knowledge. The distinctions in the actual world of appearance are of import only to ordinary and practical men. Our question lies within the ideal reality which exists behind appearance. How does the mind perceive these ideas? Are they without us, and is the reason, like sensation, occupied with objects external to itself? What certainty could we then have, what assurance that our perception was infallible? The object perceived would be a something different from the mind perceiving it. We should have then an image instead of reality. It would be monstrous to believe for a moment that the mind was unable to perceive ideal truth exactly as it is, and that we had not certainty and real knowledge concerning the world of intelligence. It follows, therefore, that this religion of truth is not to be investigated as a thing external to us, and so only imperfectly known. It is within us. Here the objects we contemplate and that which contemplates are identical—both are thought. The subject cannot surely know an object different from itself. The world of ideas lies within our intelligence. Truth, therefore, is not the agreement of our apprehension of an external object with the object itself. It is the agreement of the mind with itself. Consciousness, therefore, is the sole basis of certainty. The mind is its own witness. Reason sees in itself that which is above itself as its source; and again, that which is below itself as still itself once more.

“Knowledge has three degrees—Opinion, Science, Illumination. The means or instrument of the first is sense; of the second, dialectic; of the third, intuition. To the last I subordinate reason. It is absolute knowledge founded on the identity of the mind knowing with the object known.

“There is a raying out of all orders of existence, an external emanation from the ineffable One [prudos]. There is again a returning impulse, drawing all upwards and inwards towards the centre from whence all came [epistrophe]. Love, as Plato in the Banquet beautifully says, is the child of Poverty and Plenty. In the amorous quest of the soul after the Good, lies the painful sense of gall and deprivation. But that Love is blessing, is salvation, is our guardian genius; without it the centrifugal law would overpower us, and sweep our souls out far from their source toward the cold extremities of the Material and the Manifold. The wise man recognises the idea of the Good within him. This he develops by withdrawal into the Holy Place of his own soul. He who does not understand how the soul contains the Beautiful within itself, seeks to realize beauty without, by laborious production. His aim should rather be to concentrate and simplify, and so to expand his being; instead of going out into the Manifold, to forsake it for the One, and so to float upwards towards the divine fount of being whose stream flows within him.

“You ask, how can we know the Infinite? I answer, not by reason. It is the office of reason to distinguish and define. The Infinite, therefore, cannot be ranked among its objects. You can only apprehend the Infinite by a faculty superior to reason, by entering into a state in which you are your finite self no longer, in which the Divine Essence is communicated to you. This is Ecstasy. It is the liberation of your mind from its infinite consciousness. Like only can apprehend like; when you thus cease to be finite, you become one with the Infinite. In the reduction of your soul to its simplest self (aplosis), its divine essence, you realize this Union, this Identity [enosin].

“But this sublime condition is not of permanent duration. It is only now and then that we can enjoy this elevation (mercifully made possible for us) above the limits of the body and the world. I myself have realized it but three times as yet, and Porphyry hitherto not once. All that tends to purify and elevate the mind will assist you in this attainment, and facilitate the approach and the recurrence of these happy intervals. There are, then, different roads by which this end may be reached. The love of beauty which exalts the poet; that devotion to the One and that ascent of science which makes the ambition of the philosopher; and that love and those prayers by which some devout and ardent soul tends in its moral purity towards perfection. These are the great highways conducting to that height above the actual and the particular where we stand in the immediate presence of the Infinite, who shines out as from the depths of the soul.”

Plotinus appears to have been greatly indebted to Numenius for some of the ideas peculiar to his system. Numenius attempted to harmonize Pythagoras and Plato, to elucidate and confirm the opinions of both by the religious dogmas of the Egyptians, the Magi, and the Brahmins, and he believed that Plato was indebted to the Hebrew as well as to the Egyptian theology for much of his wisdom. Like Plotinus he was puzzled that the immutable One could find it possible to create the manifold without self-degradation, and he therefore (from Plato) posited a being whom he calls the Demi-urge, or Artificer, who merely carried out the will of God in constructing the universe.

Expressed in summary, the mysticism of Plotinus is as follows: One cannot know God in any partial or finite manner. To know him truly we must escape from the finite, from all that is earthly, from the very gifts of God to God himself, and know him in the infinite way by receiving, or being received into him directly. To accomplish this, and to attain this identity, we must withdraw into our inmost selves, into our own essence, which alone is susceptible of blending with the Divine Essence. Hence the inmost is the highest, and as with all systems of mysticism introversion is ascension, and God is found within.

Porphyry entered the school of Plotinus when it had become an institution of some standing. At first he strongly opposed the teachings of his master, but soon became his most devoted scholar. He directed a fierce assault on Christianity, and at the same time launched strictures at paganism, but both forces were too strong for him.

Porphyry modified the doctrine of Plotinus regarding ecstasy by stating that in that condition the mind does not lose its consciousness of personality. He called it a dream in which the soul, dead to the world, rises to a species of divine activity, to an elevation above reason, action and liberty. He believed in a certain order of evil genii, who took pleasure in hunting wild beasts, and others of whom hunted souls that had escaped from the fetters of the body, so that to escape them, the soul must once more take refuge in the flesh. Porphyry's theosophical conceptions, based on those of Plotinus, were strongly and ably traversed by the theurgic mysteries of Iamblichus, to whom the priest was a prophet full of deity. Criticizing Porphyry, Iamblichus stated:

"Often, at the moment of inspiration, or when the afflatus has subsided, a fiery Appearance is seen—the entering or departing Power. Those who are skilled in this wisdom can tell by the character of this glory the rank of divinity who has seized for the time the reins of the mystic's soul, and guides it as he will. Sometimes the body of the man subject to this influence is violently agitated, sometimes it is rigid and motionless. In some instances sweet music is heard, in others, discordant and fearful sounds. The person of the subject has been known to dilate and tower to a superhuman height; in other cases, it has been lifted up into the air. Frequently, not merely the ordinary exercise of reason, but sensation and animal life would appear to have been suspended, and the subject of the afflatus has not felt the application of fire, has been pierced with spits, cut with knives, and been sensible of no pain. Yea, often, the more the body and the mind have been alike enfeebled by vigil and by fasts, the more ignorant or mentally imbecile a youth may be who is brought under this influence, the more freely and unmixedly will the divine power be made manifest. So clearly are these wonders the work, not of human skill or wisdom, but of supernatural agency! Characteristics such as these I have mentioned, are the marks of the true inspiration.

"Now, there are, O Agathodes, four great orders of spiritual existence—Gods, Demons, Heroes or Demi-gods, and Souls. You will naturally be desirous to learn how the apparition of a God or a Demon is distinguished from those of Angels, Principalities, or Souls. Know, then, that their appearance to man corresponds to their nature, and that they always manifest themselves to those who invoke them in a manner consonant with their rank in the hierarchy of spiritual natures. The appearances of Gods are uniform, those of Demons various. The Gods shine with a benign aspect. When a God manifests himself, he frequently appears to hide sun or moon, and seems as he descends too vast for earth to contain. Archangels are at once awful and mild; Angels yet more gracious; Demons terrible. Below the four leading classes I have mentioned are placed the malignant Daemons, the Anti-gods.

"Each spiritual order has gifts of its own to bestow on the initiated who evoke them. The Gods confer health of body, power and purity of mind, and, in short, elevate and restore our natures to their proper principles. Angels and archangels have at their command only subordinate bestowments. Demons, however, are hostile to the aspirant, afflict both body and mind, and hinder our escape from the sensuous. Principalities, who govern the sublunary elements, confer temporal advantages. Those of a lower rank, who preside over matter, often display their bounty in material gifts. Souls that are pure are, like Angels, salutary in their influence. Their appearance encourages the soul in its upward efforts. Heroes stimulate to great actions. All those powers depend, in a descending chain, each species on that immediately above it. Good Demons are seen surrounded by the emblems of blessing, Demons who execute judgment appear with the instruments of punishment."

We thus see how in the process of time the principles on which the system of Plotinus rested were surrendered little by little, while divination and evocation were practiced with increasing frequency. Plotinus had declared the possibility of the absolute identification of the divine with human nature—the broadest possible basis for mysticism. Porphyry took up narrower ground and contended that in the union which takes place in ecstasy, we still retain consciousness of personality. Iamblichus diminished the real principle of mysticism still farther in theory, and denied that man has a faculty, eternally active and in accessible, to passion; the intellectual ambition so lofty in Plotinus subsided among the followers of Iamblichus into magical practice.

Proclus was the last of the Greek Neoplatonists. He elaborated the Trinity of Plotinus into a succession of impalpable triads, and surpassed Iamblichus in his devotion to the practice of theurgy. With Proclus, theurgy was the art that gave human beings the magical passwords that carried them through barrier after barrier, dividing species from species.

Above all being is God, the Non-Being, who is apprehended only by negation. When we are raised out of our weakness and on a level with God, it seems as though reason were silenced for we are above reason. In short we become intoxicated with God.

Proclus was an adept in the invocation rituals of every people in the world, and a great magical figure. With the advance of Byzantinism, he represented the old world of Greek thought, and even those who wrote against him as a heathen show the influence he exercised on their doctrines. Thus Dionysius attempted to accommodate the philosophy of Proclus to Christianity, and greatly admired his asceticism. The theology of the Neoplatonists was always in the first instance a mere matter of logic. They associated universals with causes. The highest became with them merely the most comprehensive.

As has been said, Neoplatonism exercised great power among the scholiasts and magicians of the Middle Ages. In fact most of what medievalism knew of Plato was through the medium of the Neoplatonists. In Germany in the fourteenth century it became a vivifying principle, for although its doctrine of emanation was abandoned, its allegorical explanation and its exaltation of the spirit above the letter was retained, and Platonism and mysticism together created a party within the church—the sworn foes of scholasticism and mere lifeless orthodoxy.

Neppe, Vernon M.

Vernon M. Neppe, founder of the Pacific Neuropsychiatric Institute in Seattle, Washington, is a prominent neuropsychiatrist who has also engaged in significant parapsychological research. He attended the University of Witwatersrand in Johannesburg, South Africa, where he completed his medical degree in 1973. He later served as a specialist for post-graduate training and as a senior consultant at the school. In 1982 he was named the Witwatersrand University Overseas Traveling Fellow for 1982–83. He developed a specialization in psychopharmacology, forensic psychiatry, and geriatric psychiatry.

In 1986, Neppe established and was named director of the first division of neuropsychiatry in a department of psychiatry in the United States, at the University of Washington. In 1992 he founded the Pacific Neuropsychiatric Institute, a facility that conducts both clinical and forensic consultations for patients suffering from neuropsychiatric disorders and conducts research in a variety of related fields.

Over the years, one area that attracted Neppe's interest was paranormal experience, the subject of his master's thesis in 1979. He later came to refer to such experiences as anomalous experiences, those events humans perceive as paranormal, psychic, or bizarre and not easily explained by the conventional laws of science. Such events would include ESP and psychokinesis. He has advocated the use of a new set of terms in describing such experiences that are less prejudicial than many commonly employed in discussions of psychic phenomena. For example, ESP seems to carry with it the idea of contradicting well-known laws of physics. Neppe has argued that if, in fact, such events occur they should link with natural laws. Through the institute he conducts research in anomalous experiences in the attempt to understand them, especially in relation to his own fields of specialization.

"Nessie"

Popular affectionate name for the Loch Ness monster, who is said to reside in a lake in northern Scotland. In an article in Nature titled "Naming the Loch Ness Monster," naturalist Sir Peter Scott and Robert Rines bestowed the scientific name Nesiteras rhombopteryx. They felt obliged to do this following modern photographic evidence suggesting the reality of the monster, since a British Act of Parliament (1975) requires a scientific name for any rare species of animal qualifying for conservation. Some newspapers gleefully pointed out that this scientific name may be converted to the anagram "Monster Hoax by Sir Peter."

A researcher in parapsychology, she was born on June 8, 1910, in Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts. She studied at Smith College (B.A., 1932) and Boston University (M.Ed., 1940). She was a school teacher (1933–44), a staff member of the United Service Organization, Travelers Aid Society (1944–46), a staff member of a publishing firm (1946–51), and a freelance editor and researcher (beginning in 1951). She was an associate member of the Parapsychological Association and a research assistant at the Parapsychology Foundation (1958–62) where she worked on experiments connected with survival and mediumship and assisted in a survey of death-bed hallucinations.

Nettles, Bonnie Lu Truesdale (1924–1985)

Bonnie Lu Truesdale Nettles, cofounder of the Heaven's Gate group, known for having ended its existence with the suicide of 39 members in 1997, was born in Houston, Texas. She grew up in a Baptist home, married, and became the mother of four children. She graduated from the Herman Hospital School of Professional Nursing in 1948 and subsequently worked as a registered nurse. In midlife, she developed an interest in things occult and in February 1966 joined the Houston Lodge of the Theosophical Society in America, which she remained affiliated with until she allowed her dues to lapse in 1973. She also attended a group centered upon channeling various noncorporeal entities.

In 1972 she met Marshall Applewhite. At the time Nettles was heading toward a divorce, while Applewhite had already been divorced and subsequently lost his teaching job because of an extramarital affair. The two developed a friendship and then a partnership in what was called the Christian Art Center where they offered classes in religion, art, and music. It was superseded by the Know Place, a metaphysical center, a reflection of the theosophical and occult teachings that Nettles introduced to Applewhite.

In 1973 the pair left Houston for the West Coast. They slowly began to see themselves as the Two Witnesses mentioned in the Bible (Revelation 11) who spread a message of judgment, are martyred, and then are resurrected and taken to heaven in a cloud. They identified the cloud as a flying saucer. They developed a perspective that interpreted biblical passages in light of contemporary thought about extraterrestrial contact. They believed that Jesus had ascended to heaven (the Level above Human, or T.E.L.A.H.) in a spacecraft and that Applewhite had arrived on Earth from that same T.E.L.A.H. realm and brought with him the Heavenly Father in the person of Nettles.

They began gathering followers in Los Angeles, California, and then set out on a tour that took them north to Oregon and eastward to Chicago, Illinois. Now known as Bo (Applewhite) and Peep (Nettles), they offered prospective members deliverance from Earth in a spaceship in the immediate future. Amid news coverage that ranged from hostility to ridicule, the group continued to gather members, but in 1976, Nettles announced the doors to the next level were now closed. The group did no further proselytizing and began to concentrate on teaching their followers. In 1977, they received a windfall in the form of a large inheritance received by one of the members. They began to rent houses in which to live, but moved frequently to avoid attachments to any location or home. They also withdrew contact from family and friends.

In the early 1980s, Nettles became ill from cancer. In 1983 she had one eye removed, but the cancer continued to spread. It eventually affected her liver and in June of 1985, she died in Dallas, Texas. Her death seemed to contradict the group's teachings, but Applewhite was later able to explain and justify her moving on ahead of the group. The group stayed together for another decade until the surviving members, including Applewhite, committed suicide at the spring equinox 1997.

Networking

A system of communication praised by many in the New Age movement as the best means of organizing people horizontally around common concerns (rather than vertically around leadership structures) and of data sharing. Networking of one kind or another has been practiced for many decades by means of directories, yearbooks, encyclopedias, specialized magazines, and groups, but with the development of modern computer resources, the facilities for accumulating, storing, and disseminating data on a wide scale have been greatly enhanced and accelerated. R. Buckminster Fuller observed,

"The new human networks emergence represents the natural evolutionary expansion into the just completed, thirty-years-in-its-building, world-embracing, physical communications network. The new reorienting of human 'networking' constitutes the heart and mind pumped flow of life and intellect into the world arteries."

The concept of rapid access to topical information has special value in relation to New Age beliefs and practices, since so many groups and centers flourish for a while, then change name or address or disappear, sometimes giving rise to splinter movements. Many networking guides are presented in magazine format for distribution at occult and holistic health shops. Some have related publications in different countries through international networking. Many such publications have diaries of forthcoming events, exhibitions, and lectures. Other networking publications appear in a more traditional directory format, regularly updated.

Networking makes it possible to accumulate and disseminate New Age information in a variety of formats and at local, state, or city levels. Typical networking publications in magazine and/or tabloid newspaper format include Common Ground (San Francisco), PhenomeNews (Detroit), Whole Life (New York), and Whole Life Times (Los Angeles). Such publications tend to have a relatively short life, though these mentioned have lasted for more than a decade.

The Whole Life World Fair Expo, organized annually by the Whole Life Times, publishes a catalog that includes networking information on related events, individuals, and publications. The comparable British annual Festival for Mind-Body-Spirit has a special networking feature, inviting the public to "play the Networking Game," i.e., join a network to exchange information with other people, to keep track of meetings and contacts, and to benefit from the use of computers for exchange of information.

The Networking Game charges a small fee and provides guidance notes, a personal networking diary, a networking badge, personal address labels, and information on contacts in one's local area, as well as information on such facilities as Net Workshops, Playshops, a Networking Market for goods and services, and a computer conferencing network for "screen-to-screen" meetings. The Networking Game may be contacted c/o Sabine Kurjo, 21A Goldhurst Terrace, London, NW6 3HD, England.

Neuburg, Victor (Benjamin) (1883–1940)

Poet, editor, and associate of occultist Aleister Crowley. Neuburg was born on May 6, 1883, in London, England. He was educated at the City of London School, southwest London, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. An early Freethinker, his first poems were published in the Agnostic Journal and Freethinker.

Around 1906 at Cambridge, Neuburg came in contact with Crowley, also a poet, who had read some of Neuburg's pieces in the Agnostic Journal. Crowley initiated Neuburg into his secret society, the A.:.A.:.:, giving him the name "Fratres Omnia Vincam." He also initiated a homosexual relationship with Neuburg. In 1909 Crowley took Neuburg to Algiers, and they set off into the North African desert, where they performed a series of occult rituals. In the midst of these, Crowley put the ideas of sex and "magick" together and performed his first "sex magick" ritual.

In 1913 Crowley and Neuburg again joined forces in a homosexual ritual magic operation known as "the Paris Working." Neuburg appears to have broken with Crowley some time in 1914, before Crowley left for the United States on a magick tour. Supposedly, Neuburg was ritually cursed by Crowley and suffered a nervous breakdown.

From 1916 to 1919 Neuburg served in the army in World War I. Thereafter, he avoided Crowley and spent most of his time at Vine Cottage, Steyning, Sussex, where he operated a hand printing press. Many of his poems were issued under the imprint "Vine Press." In addition to works published under his own name, he used a number of pseudonyms: Alfricobas, Benjie, M. Broyle, Richard Byrde, Christopher Crayne, Lawrence Edwardes, Arthur French, Paul Pentreath, Nicholas Pyne, Harold Stevens, Shirley Tarn, and Rold White. His books include The Green Garland (1908), The Triumph of Pan (1910), Lillygay, an Anthology of Anonymous Poems (1920), Swift Wings, Songs in Sussex (1921), Songs of the Groves (1921), and Larkspur, a Lyric Garland (1922).

In 1933 Neuburg edited a section called "The Poet's Corner" in the British newspaper the Sunday Referee. This encouraged new talent by awarding weekly prizes. A group of talented young writers and poets grew up around Neuburg. He gave an award to a then-unknown poet named Dylan Thomas. As a result of Neuburg's enthusiasm, the publisher of the Sunday Referee sponsored the first book of poems by Dylan Thomas, titled 18 Poems. The first publication is now a prized collector's item.

Although a minor poet, Neuburg's work has a magical lyric quality. Known affectionately as "Vickybird," he was a generous and warmhearted friend of other writers. Neuburg died May 30, 1940.

Neumann, Thérèse (1898–1962)

Bavarian peasant girl of Konnersreuth, whose stigmata, visions of the Passion of Christ, and other supernormal phenomena aroused worldwide attention. Neumann was born on April 8, 1898. As a young girl she was educated to have a religious mentality and aspired to become a missionary sister. Constitutionally she appeared robust.

In March 1918, while she aided in putting out a fire that had broken out in a neighboring house, she was stricken by a violent pain in the lumbar regions and collapsed. In the hospital of Waldsassen she was seized with terrible cramps, became blind, from time to time deaf, and paralyzed, first in both legs, then in the right and left cheeks. She spent miserable years at the home of her parents in constant suffering and religious meditation.

On April 29, 1923, the beatification day of St. Thérèse de Lisieux, she suddenly recovered her sight. On May 3, 1923, an ulcer between the toes of her left foot that might have caused the foot to be amputated was unaccountably healed after she put three rose leaves from the tomb of St. Thérèse in the bandage. On May 17, 1925, the canonization day of St. Thérèse, she saw a light and heard a voice that comforted her and assured her that she would be able to sit up and walk. She sat up immediately and afterward could walk about the room with the help of a stick and a supporting arm. On September 30 she dispensed with this support and went to church alone.

In December she was seized with violent intestinal pains. An urgent operation for appendicitis was recommended. She had a vision of St. Thérèse and heard a voice that told her to go to church and thank God. During the night the pus found a natural outlet and she was cured.

The stigmata appeared during Lent in 1926. An abscess developed in her ear, causing violent headaches. She saw in a vision Jesus in the Garden of Olives and felt a sudden stinging pain in the left side. A wound formed and bled abundantly. It was followed by stigmatic wounds in the hands and legs. There was no pus and no inflammation, but there was a fresh flow of blood every Friday. She also shed tears of blood and became, by Friday, almost blind.

With an awe-inspiring dramatic vividness she lived through the whole tragedy of the crucifixion; and in ancient Aramaic (which famous linguists established as such) she reproduced what were claimed to be the words of Christ and the vile swearing of the crowd as she clairaudiently heard them in that archaic language. Her pronunciation was always phonetic and many believed that she was in communication with someone who was a spectator of the events.

At Christmas in 1922, an abscess developed in Neumann's throat and neck. From this date until Christmas 1926 she abstained from solid food. She took a little liquid—three or four spoonfuls of coffee, tea, or fruit juice. After Christmas 1926, she only took a drop of water every morning to swallow the sacred host. From September 1927 until November 1928 she abstained even from this drop of water. Nevertheless she retained her normal weight. But four Roman Catholic sisters declared on oath that during the Friday ecstasies Neumann lost four pounds of weight, which she regained by the following Thursday without taking nourishment in any form. On August 15, 1927, Neumann had a vision of the death, burial, and ascension of Mary. She visualized Mary's tomb at Jerusalem and not at Ephesus, as usually assumed.

In the socialist and communist presses of Germany, Russia, and Austria, many libellous statements and quasiexposures were published about Neumann. Whenever they were followed by suits for libel the editors were found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment and fine. Neumann was something of an embarrassment to the Nazis during World War II, and the authorities made difficulties for visitors to Konnersreuth, but immediately after the war, hundreds of thousands of American and other servicemen lined up to visit her. She often gave accurate information on distant events through out-of-the-body travel, and appears to have traveled astrally to the death chamber of Pope Pius XII.

Although pilgrims presented many gifts to her, she would not use these for her own comfort and, before her death September 18, 1962, she had contributed to the church a training seminary for priests, as well as a convent. During her lifetime over 133 books or papers were written about her. (See also Catherine Emmerich; Padre Pio)

Neurypnology

James Braid's first term for hypnotism.

New Age

The New Age movement was a revivalist movement that swept through metaphysical New Thought churches and Spiritualist and occult organizations in the 1970s and 1980s. As a result, many people accepted either a metaphysical or Spiritualist perspective and both communities grew significantly. The New Age idea of replacing the present society with a coming of the golden age of peace and love for the next generation transformed both communities. By the mid-1990s, the idea of a New Age had largely died out but had left the psychic community permanently changed.

Roots of the New Age Movement

A noticeable New Age vision, the triumph of the hopes and ideals to which occultists gave their allegiance, was given a certain limited expression throughout the twentieth century. Often that hope was seen in the arrival of what was termed the Aquarian Age. In astrology, an "age" is defined by the location of the sun at the moment of the spring equinox each year. Because of the tilt of the Earth's axis, that sign changes approximately every 2,160 years. Depending upon the astrological system one uses, the sun is making the transition from the sign of Pisces to that of Aquarius sometime in this century.

Pisces, the fish sign, is often associated with Christianity, in which the fish is frequently used as a symbol of Jesus; in Greek the word for fish, ichthus, was a acronym for the phrase "Jesus Christ, God's son and Saviour." The passing of the Earth to a new astrological age would bring a new religion or spiritual perspective to dominance. However, during the last half of the twentieth century, as a new millennium loomed on the horizon, a variety of occult groups predicted the coming new age at the same time as the new millennium.

Among the early groups predicting the New Age was the London-based Universal Link, which originated in the contact of Richard Grave of Worthing, England, with a spirit entity who came to be known only as "Limitless Love." This entity first appeared in 1961 and gave Grave a variety of messages on the impending return of Christ in the midst of the seemingly destructive course of action being followed by the human race. Publicity given Grave's messages in a Spiritualist newspaper and his subsequent meeting with Spiritualist artist Libby Pugh led to the development of a network of interested individuals.

Crucial to the message was a prediction that by Christmas morning of 1967 Christ would reveal himself through the medium of nuclear evolution. That prediction brought many into the network, including Sir Anthony Brooke, the former ruler of the Indonesian island of Sarawak, who spent his retirement years traveling the world spreading the message.

When no visible event occurred to coincide with the predicted nuclear event, the most dedicated of the Universal Link members concluded that the event was an invisible one. Nellie Cane, founder of the Spiritual Research Society, and a key American figure spreading the Universal Link message, suggested that the event was the completion of the international linking of groups and individuals who need to join in a common effort to radiate God's light to the world.

Among the groups linked in the 1960s was the Findhorn Foundation, a communal association in northern Scotland in large part held together by channeling. Channeling is similar to mediumships in Spiritualism—the ability to contact spirit entities. However, in Spiritualism, a mediumship had concentrated upon the communication with a large number of spirit entities bringing greetings or messages to their still-living relatives with the aim of proving their continued existence after the transition of bodily death. Channeling, in contrast, assumed the existence of a spiritual world with which contact could be made for the purpose of learning about the nature of the world and receiving guidance on how to live. Mediumship was seen as the special prerogative of a few special individuals, while channeling was seen as possible for almost anyone.

A medium usually had a control, one or a few individual spirit entities who facilitated contact with the deceased relatives of the sitter(s). The channel usually contacted one or a few master teachers who regularly delivered philosophical discourses. The entities channeled, while usually the spirits of long-deceased individuals, could also be creatures from other planets, angelic beings, nature spirits, the channels' own higher self, or even Christ or God. The theosophical tradition had been built from the initial channelings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky from the Masters or Mahatmas. While little channeling activity took place in the post-Blavatsky Theosophical Society, numerous splinter groups emerged around a new channel, sometimes referred to as a Messenger. Most prominent of these subsequent channels were Alice A. Bailey of the Arcane School and Guy W. Ballard, founder of the I Am Movement. The practice of channeling was given a tremendous boost in the 1970s by the publication of the material channeled by Jane Roberts from an entity known as "Seth."

Findhorn had been sustained through the 1960s, its developing years, by the channeling activity of Eileen Caddy. In the early 1970s, it was joined by a young student of the Alice Bailey teachings, David Spangler, who channeled material from an entity called "John." Spangler would, during his three years at Findhorn, construct a vision of the New Age as a time when important new energies from the cosmos were available to the human race. If these energies were accepted and worked with over the next generation, a New Age could be brought to pass. According to Spangler, the coming of the New Age was dependent upon the dedicated spiritual work of the people. He published his views first in a small book published by Findhorn, The New Age Vision (1973), upon which he expanded in his widely circulated volumes Revelation: The Birth of a New Age (1976) and Towards a Planetary Vision (1977).

Through the 1970s the New Age vision as articulated by Spangler spread through the groups and individuals that had constituted the network created by the Universal Link and spread far beyond it. The basic ideas were quite simple: There is a New Age coming and this present generation is the transition generation, though most will live to see and enjoy the imminent new society of peace and love. As society goes through the birth pangs of the new society and the turmoil and displacement it will bring, individuals can experience a foretaste of the social transformation in an immediate and personal transformation occasioned by a healing, a new personal insight, or the realization of a spiritual truth. Facilitating the personal transformation were a number of New Age transformative tools: channeling, crystals, divinatory techniques (tarot cards, astrology, etc.) and a whole range of holistic health practices. Responsibility for bringing in the New Age is in the hands of individuals who must take responsibility for their lives and the direction of society.

As the New Age movement emerged through the 1970s, it had a social vision that saw the merging of New Age vision to older movements centered upon world peace, environmentalism, and multiethnic cooperation. Healing became an important metaphor of the New Age and the holistic health perspective provided an alternative program to the common scientific medicine built upon drugs and surgery. It suggested an emphasis upon preventive medicine and the eradication of disease through a natural (and frequently vegetarian) diet, healthful practices (exercise, hatha yoga, living in a nonpolluted environment), and attention to clearing problems by developing spiritually and cleansing the emotions. The various forms of body work (chiropractic, massage, and related practices) have been immensely popular in New Age circles.

Rise and Fall of the New Age

The New Age movement grew through the 1970s and by 1980s had become a recognizable social phenomena. In that year Marilyn Ferguson would describe it as The Aquarian Conspiracy, a decentralized network of people who have forsaken the past for a coming new world. They are bonded by their experience of inner transformation and their common work for the coming transformed society. Through the next decade channeling became a well-known phenomenon, the use of crystals (the effect of which was described in great detail by channeler Frank Alper) spread, the publication of metaphysical and occult books burgeoned, and hundreds of thousands of people in Europe, North America, and urban centers around the world were swept up into the movement. An estimated four million adherents could be found in the United States alone.

The movement seemed to peak in the late 1980s following the airing in 1987 of Out on a Limb, a television movie based upon the New Age awakening of actress Shirley MacLaine. MacLaine had written a series of popular New Age books and publicly identified with the movement, in which she developed an avocation as a teacher. In 1989 she released a video, Shirley MacLaine's Inner Workout.

However, through the 1980s, the New Age movement received a significant amount of criticism, the most telling accusing it of being a shallow spiritual vision built upon the questionable practices of channeling and crystals and a naive (and false) hope of a significant systemic change in society. Internally, New Age leaders began to reexamine the movement. The first of an important set of redefining articles by David Spangler began to appear in 1988. Over the next few years, prominent leaders of the movement announced their abandonment of the New Age vision of a transformed society and publicly distanced themselves from channeling and crystals. They suggested that the heart of the movement had always been the personal transformations experienced by individuals and the spiritual perspective on life it gave to people. The social vision was abandoned and the people left in the movement reoriented entirely around personal development and improvement.

By the early 1990s, it was obvious that the New Age movement was dying. The passing of the New Age movement did not leave the metaphysical, Spiritualist, and occult communities unchanged. The hundreds of thousands of individuals brought into the communities by the New Age did not leave. Hundreds of New Age bookstores still dot the landscape, and New Age publishing remains a healthy concern. Most importantly, the concept of "New Age," which largely replaced "occult" in popular parlance, gave occultism a positive image in popular culture, the lack of which was a major barrier to its growth. The New Age movement left the occult community in a most robust state.

During the nineties the New Age has shifted from its premillennialist stance where an "overnight" scenario was expected to occur to a more postmillennial outlook where each person is expected to create their own heaven on earth by personal spiritual transformation over time. This evolution can be seen in the progression of books by James Redfield starting with The Celestine Prophecy and continuing with many sequels. The new emphasis has been on the issue of ascension, but with no crystallized consensus from the many authors that promote it. Such authors grace the pages of Sedona Journal of Emergence with an eclectic mix of views. Another huge archive of New Age information is the SpiritWeb Internet site.

New Age Bible and Philosophy Center

The New Age Bible and Philosophy Center is a Rosicrucian study center in Santa Monica, California, founded in 1931 by Mary Elizabeth Shaw. Though Shaw led the center, it was also for many years a vehicle for the teaching activity of Corinne Heline and her husband, Theodore Heline. Corinne Heline was a prominent student of Max Heindel, founder of the Rosicrucian Fellowship, and she remained a member of the fellowship through the 1920s. During this period she began work on metaphysical Bible interpretation, a project that eventually resulted in a seven-volume series. In 1930 she married Theodore Heline, and they founded the New Age Press and affiliated with the center in Santa Monica. Many of the Helines' writings remain in print and may be obtained from the center.

Shaw was succeeded by Rev. Gene Sande, who after many years was succeeded by the present leader, Rev. Patricia Tallis. The center is located at 1139 Lincoln Blvd., Santa Monica, CA 90403.

New Age Church of Truth

The New Age Church of Truth was founded in the mid-1960s by Gilbert N. Holloway (b. 1915), who emerged in the 1930s as a metaphysical teacher. He was widely read in the available Rosicrucian and theosophical literature and conscious of his own psychic powers, and by the 1960s he worked as a psychic with a national following. In 1967 a Pentecostal experience (which included speaking in tongues) converted him to Christianity, though Holloway cast his faith in a metaphysical thought world. He then changed his organization's name to New Age Church of Truth, the Christ Light Community. From the headquarters of his church in Deming, New Mexico, he traveled widely as a lecturer, healer, and psychic reader into the 1980s. Current address unavailable.

New Age Retailer

New Age Retailer is the major trade journal serving the chain of metaphysical bookstores that emerged in the 1980s as the New Age Movement came into existence. From its beginning in the mid-1980s, the magazine has grown into a large bi-monthly report on new publications in the post-New Age spirituality, including books, music, and various related products from jewelry to greeting cards. For example, crystals, which lost the central place that they had in the New Age community of the 1980s, have remained popular as art objects. Each issue of New Age Retailer is built around a listing of several hundred new books, many of which come from small independent publishers. A picture of the book cover is accompanied by basic ordering information and a brief description of the content supplied by the publishers (usually the same material found on the book's cover or dust jacket). A similar treatment is offered for new cds and products. While New Age Retailer is built around providing basic information on new products, it also provides additional guidance to assist retail outlets improve their sales, the major factor affecting the health of the metaphysical wholesale community. On a regular basis, the magazine offers information on contacting sales representatives and wholesale jobbers, attending trade shows, and expanding inventory. Each issue also features a set of articles on a particular topic of interest to store owners on such diverse topics as building a store website and doing effective but inoffensive advertising. New Age Retailer generally circulates only within the psychic/occult business community, but may be ordered from Continuity Publishing, Inc., 1300 N. State St., Ste. 105, Bellingham, WA 98225-4730. Its webpage can be found at <http://www.newageretailer.com/>. It provides clear insight into the business world that undergirds the current metaphysical/spiritual community and offers a means of contacting small publishers issuing metaphysical products.

New Age Teachings

New Age Teachings, one of the original New Age organizations in the United States, was founded by New Age channel Anita Afton (b. 1922). Better known as Illiana, she regularly channeled messages for more than 25 years. As a young seeker, Illiana, a Unitarian, became interested in the teachings of Paramahansa Yogananda. She affiliated with the Self-Realization Fellowship and began the practice of kriya yoga.

She learned to meditate and became aware of her past lives in India. In 1965 she received her first channeled messages. Her early messages came from entities identifying themselves as residents of the planet Jamel. Within a few years she experienced what she described as a lifting of her own consciousness and since then the "I AM THAT I AM" has been the only voice speaking through her. After she founded New Age Teachings, she began publishing a regular bulletin containing transcripts of the messages. Illiana also became part of the original international network established in the 1960s by the Universal Link.

New Age Teachings emphasized that New Age vibrations were causing increasing light to come to Earth. The work expanded in 1976 with the addition of a Spanish edition of the bulletin, published from Houston, Texas. A music ministry began in the 1980s. Last known address: P.O. Box 346, Brookfield, MA 01506.

Newbold, William Romaine (1865–1926)

Philosopher with a special interest in psychical research. He was born November 20, 1865, at Wilmington, Delaware. He studied at the University of Pennsylvania (B.A., 1887; Ph.D., 1891) and did post-graduate study at the University of Berlin (1891–92). He was a member of the faculty of the University of Pennsylvania for 37 years, of which the last two decades were spent as the Adam Seybert Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy (1907–26). He was an authority on Oriental languages and Greek philosophy. He became famous for his achievement in deciphering a medieval manuscript, which he showed to be the work of Roger Bacon, and for his translation of Semitic scrawls on the walls of the Roman catacombs.

He was a member of both the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, and the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR). He was deeply interested in psychical research and contributed a number of important articles on the subject to the Journal and Proceedings of the ASPR and the SPR. He died September 26, 1926, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

A New York dentist who was clairvoyant and clairaudient from childhood and who, through automatic writing (on a typewriter), produced "Oahspe" (1881), a channeled volume published as a new bible. He was born on June 5, 1828, near Springfield, Ohio, the son of a schoolteacher. He was educated in the local schoolhouse, and from the age of 16 continued to educate himself. He attended the Cincinnati Medical College and practiced both medicine and dentistry.

He migrated to California in 1849 and was fortunate in becoming a gold miner. Several years later, he married Rachel Turnbull, the sister of his partner John Turnbull. They moved to New York, where Newbrough resumed his dental and medical practice. He associated himself with the emerging Spiritualist movement, and became a trustee of the New York Spiritualist Association. Eventually his Spiritualist interests led to disagreements with his wife, and some years later they divorced.

His own psychic gifts were remarkable. He could paint in total darkness with both hands at once. It was claimed that, by closing his eyes, he could read printed pages of any book in any library, that he could bring back recollections of astral travels (or astral projections), and that under control he could lift enormous weight, even a ton, without apparent effort. However, bored with the commonplace messages that dominated Spiritualist spirit contact, he was anxious to utilize the spirits' time for more metaphysical information.

Thus he initiated the events that culminated in his production of Oahspe: A Kosmon Bible in the Words of Jehovah and his Angel Ambassadors. He described these events in a letter dated January 21, 1883, to the editor of the Banner of Light:

"I was crying for the light of Heaven. I did not desire communication for friends or relatives or information about earthly things; I wished to learn something about the spirit world; what the angels did, how they travelled, and the general plan of the universe. . . . I was directed to get a typewriter which writes by keys, like a piano. This I did and I applied myself industriously to learn it, but with only indifferent success. For two years more the angels propounded to me questions relative to heaven and earth, which no mortal could answer very intelligently. . . .

"One morning the light struck both hands on the back, and they went for the typewriter for some fifteen minutes very vigorously. I was told not to read what was printed, and I have worked myself into such a religious fear of losing this new power that I obeyed reverently. The next morning, also before sunrise the same power came and wrote (or printed rather) again. Again I laid the matter away very religiously, saying little about it to anybody. One morning I accidentally (seemed accidental to me) looked out of the window and beheld the line of light that rested on my hands extending heavenward like a telegraph wire towards the sky. Over my head were three pairs of hands, fully materialised; behind me stood another angel with her hands on my shoulders. My looking did not disturb the scene, my hands kept right on printing . . . printing. For 50 weeks this continued, every morning, half an hour or so before sunrise, and then it ceased, and I was told to read and publish the book 'Oahspe.' The peculiar drawings in Oahspe were made with pencil in the same way."

He claimed that "Oahspe" came from the higher heavens, and was "directed and looked over by God, the creator's chief representative in the heavens of this earth."

A group formed around Newbrough's revelations, and in 1883 they gave themselves the name "Faithists of the Seed of Abraham" (a term used in "Oahspe"). They moved to Las Cruces, New Mexico, and established Sholam, a community to implement the "Oahspe" injunction to care for foundlings and orphans.

Newbrough married again, choosing a companion from the community. By 1891, a residential home had been completed, housing some 50 children, but in the following year an outbreak of influenza devastated the area, and Newbrough himself was struck down, dying that year. For a time, his associate Andrew M. Howland continued the community, but it soon disintegrated. However, Newbrough's very dispersed and decentralized followers continued under such names as the "Essenes of Kosmon" or "Universal Faithists" and are still active today. "Oahspe" is kept in print through the Universal Faithists of Kosmon (Box 664, Salt Lake City, UT 84110), and a journal, The Faithist Journal, is published at 2324 Suffock Ave., Kingman, AZ 86401.

New Christian Church of Full Endeavor

During the 1980s, A Course in Miracles emerged as a text around which thousands of people found guidance for their spiritual life. While many simply read the text and integrated it into a previously existing metaphysical worldview already in large agreement with the teachings, many found in the text a new profound spiritual direction. Many found their participation primarily in weekly study groups and noted how helpful the Course insights were for their life. Others found in the Course the catalyst to completely reorient their life and perception. Among the latter are the members of the New Christian Church of Full Endeavor.

Catalyst for the coming together of the church in the 1980s is Chuck Anderson, today known as simply Master Teacher. He and the members found in the Course a restatement of the perennial philosophy, a mystical visionary worldview that has appeared in other times and places as, for example, advaita vedanta, Zen, or Taoism. The perennial philosophy recognizes a Divine Reality behind the visible world of sense experience (described by Vedantists as maya or illusion). In discovering that reality behind the illusion, humans discover their essence as equal to the Divine Reality and perceive that their highest purpose is in knowledge of that Ground of Being. They see in Master Teacher a person who facilitates the enlightenment of those around him.

The church teaches that A Course in Miracles is a contemporary restatement by Christ of the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth. Church members have come into an experience of the Divine Reality and are attempting to learn always with that reality and out of that reality. In the real world, fear and evil do not exist. In that reality love is perfected and joy established. They also believe that a process of transformation is going on in their lives and in the world. The keynote of that transformation is healing and forgiveness. That process will continue through their full endeavor.

The church is headquartered in Lake Delton, Wisconsin. Also established there is the Endeavor Academy, the church's educational arm, which offers a variety of courses drawing upon A Course in Miracles and the vast literature representative of the perennial philosophy. Located in a former resort hotel, it provides residential space for students who may come to the classes that are offered on a quarterly basis. The church and academy may be contacted at P.O. Box 206, Lake Delton, WI 53940. It has an Internet site at <http://www.endeavoracademy.com/>. Besides the center in Wisconsin, there are groups related to the church across North America and in Europe.

The church emerged in the very diverse environment of the movement built around A Course in Miracles. That movement has been seen as somewhat centered in the Foundation for Inner Peace, a corporation that owned the copyright of the Course and has been primarily responsible for its printing and distribution. The New Christian Church of Full Endeavor is one of several groups that have come into conflict with the foundation for reprinting sections of the Course as part of their effort to spread the message. They are currently in litigation with the foundation over their right to reprint the material. Part of the case hinges upon the claimed authorship of the Course, namely Christ, and whether a work by a Divine Being can be copyrighted under United States law.

New Civilization Network

During the 1990s, by far the best-selling metaphysical text was The Celestine Prophecy by James Redfield. It offered the idea that an increasing number of people were gaining new insights into their own nature and the inner structure of the universe. In fact, as a critical mass of such people who shared these insights became aware of each other, they would realize a common world vision. Working together, awakened people could produce a new spiritualized world culture.

As the readership of The Celestine Prophecy and its sequels, The Tenth Insight (1996) and The Celestine Vision (1997), grew, study groups began to form. Redfield also produced several study guides and a newsletter for people who took the content of the books most seriously. At the same time he has resisted becoming the leader of a new movement.

However, in 1995, Flemming Funch, the head of a computer web development and networking company (Synchronicity Network in Van Nuys, California), sent out an e-mail letter calling for people who were interested in working toward a new spiritual culture. He received an unexpected amount of feedback and organized the New Civilization Network and a loose association of people conversing on the Internet. Since that time, the network has grown into what is described as a "self-organizing international grass-roots association" of people interested in building a better world. The members of the network share a positive vision of the future and seek appropriate means for working with each other. As the network has increased in size, in those geographical areas where members are concentrated, network members have organized salons, gatherings at which they meet and discuss their new ideas. The largest number of these are in southern California.

Members come to the network from a wide range of backgrounds and have appropriated the Redfield material in quite diverse manners. Respect for the diversity and the very different ideas being expressed is a hallmark of the network, holding it together even as commonalities are being sought. Members may join simply by submitting their name to the network, where they are placed on a membership list and begin receiving the messages posted by other members. They may also participate in Internet chat rooms and bulletin boards. In some places they may attend meetings and work with others on mutually agreed upon projects. Funch has also put together a reading list of complementary material.

As of the beginning of 2000, the network is not incorporated, its major emphasis being on providing a space in which the spontaneous cooperation of its members may occur. Contact with the network is through its webpage, <http://www.newciv.org/>.

Newcomb, Simon (1835–1909)

Astronomer, mathematician, and first president (1885–86) of the American Society for Psychical Research. He was born on March 12, 1835, at Wallace, Nova Scotia. He studied at Lawrence Scientific School (B.S., 1858), and Harvard University. He joined the U.S. Navy during the Civil War as a professor of mathematics (1861), and was later assigned to the U.S. Naval Observatory (1867). He subsequently became the director of the American Nautical Almanac (1877–97) and a professor of mathematics and astronomy at Johns Hopkins University (1884–94). A world-famous astronomer and mathematician, Newcomb's research made possible the construction of accurate lunar tables. In spite of his interest in psychical research, he remained an outspoken skeptic, a position he explained in his autobiography. He died July 11, 1909.

New Consciousness Sourcebook

Important New Age guide issued by the followers of Yogi Bhanjan (founder of the Sikh Dharmma) in the San Francisco Bay area. The original edition was issued in 1972 as the Spiritual Community Guide for North America. New editions were released periodically through the 1970s. The new name was adopted for the fifth edition in 1982. The last edition, the sixth, appeared in 1985.

The directory covered organizations concerned with spiritual growth as well as such New Age subjects as nutrition, holistic health, healing, therapies, kundalini, bodywork, lifestyles, and meditation. It listed New Age bookstores, publications, occult supply houses, records, and tapes. It was published by Spiritual Community Publications in Berkeley, California. The group also published A Pilgrim's Guide to Planet Earth, an international directory covering the same areas of concern as the Sourcebook.

New Dimensions Broadcasting Network

New Dimensions Broadcasting Network is the producer and distributor of post-New Age radio and short wave programs. New Dimensions was created in 1973, as an expression of the human potentials movement. Founders Michael and Justine Toms were, at that time, inspired by the work of parapsychologist Charles T. Tart, one of the founders of the discipline of transpersonal psychology, who had observed that a new revolution in consciousness was beginning. New Dimensions was incorporated as a nonprofit educational foundation to address the issues raised by the approaching change in culture and value systems.

New Dimensions began modestly as a program for a single station in Northern California. In 1980 the program reached a national audience with a weekly program over a satellite network. Through the 1990s more than a hundred different stations across the United States have aired the ongoing series of programs and it has been picked up by the Armed Forces Radio Network and the Radio for Peace International shortwave network. Beginning in May 2000, New Dimensions was aired by the Merlin shortwave system. It is also available on the Internet. As the twenty-first century begins, New Dimensions is the most widely heard New Age broadcast in the world.

New Dimensions programs are commonly built around an interview with one or more persons representative of what is perceived as the new consciousness. Guests have included spiritual leaders from a variety of Eastern and alternative traditions, environmental spokespersons, and exponents of various forms of esoteric wisdom and New Thought metaphysics.

The New Dimensions Broadcast is currently supported by the New Dimensions Foundation, P. O. Box 569, Ukiah, CA 95482. The Foundation issues a bi-monthly periodical, New Dimensions: The Journal of New Dimensions Radio, that provides a guide to upcoming programs. It also supports a website at <http://www.newdimensions.org/>, and makes available tape recordings of past programs. The work of the foundation is supported by a cadre of listeners known as the Friends of New Dimensions.

NewHeavenNewEarth

NewHeavenNewEarth (NHNE) is an online newsletter operating out of a post-New Age vision of planetary transformation. It was founded in 1994 by David Sunfellow out of his realization of the power of the Internet as a tool for communication and cooperation among humans on a global scale. NHNE operates through an online mailing list to which news stories are regularly sent and an extensive webpage that carries news and reports of interest to the “planetary transformation movement,” the name given by Sunfellow to the post-New Age.

NHNE has set as its mission the tracking of planetary transformation and using the Internet to bring together a group of people in cyberspace to focus upon the basic age-old religious/philosophical questions of “Who are we? “Where did we come from?” and “Why are we here?” Having rejected the use of traditional (and authoritarian) sources of religious teachings, NHNE opts instead for a new methodology for arriving at Truth. It attempts to bring together contemporary spiritual seekers, both professional and lay, to pool their wisdom in a process of encouraging enlightenment. The understanding that the planet is undergoing a period of significant change underlies the discussions pursued through NHNE.

Besides simply passing along news items on topics such as environmental concerns, the paranormal, relevant developments in science, etc., NHNE has focused on selected topics for concentrated research and reporting. NHNE has also posted its findings from investigations of A Course in Miracles court cases, crop circles, and the claims of visionary musician James F. Twyman, leader of the Community of the Beloved Disciple.

Newhouse, Flower (1909–1994)

Metaphysical teacher Flower Newhouse was born Mildred Arlene Sechler on May 10, 1909, in Allentown, Pennsylvania. From her childhood days, she told her parents that her real name was Flower, but they did not choose to follow her lead. Her father died when she was six, and two years later her mother remarried. They then moved out of Allentown and eventually settled in Scranton. Shortly after that, the still-prepubescent Mildred claimed that she was confronted by her guardian angel, who told her that he was now taking charge of her development. At the age of 13, Mildred again announced that she wanted to be called Flower, and her mother and sister finally gave in.

Through the next years, Mildred developed her own independent ways, and her family learned to trust her inner promptings. Thus, in 1924, they took very seriously the story of her encounter of a new entity in her life whom she described as John the Beloved. The spirit had come to her and called for an immediate move to California. Within weeks they were in Los Angeles. Flower found work as a salesperson in a retail store, but twice a week began to teach what she had learned from her spiritual contacts. Within a short time she was able to become a full-time teacher. In 1933, while in San Bernardino, California, to speak, she met Lawrence Newhouse, whom she would marry later that year. He would become her confidant and helpmate for the rest of his life. That same year she issued the first of many booklets, The School of Life.

By this time Newhouse had come to see herself as the product of a set of previous incarnations. She had returned this time to be a teacher and to found a teachings center. She was in contact with the broad range of spiritual entities from nature spirits to the theosophical hierarchy, but saw her special emphasis to be the enlightening of people concerning the ministry of angels.

Soon after their marriage, she and her husband began traveling throughout North America and she built a large following. She launched a periodical, the Inspiration Newsletter, in 1934, as a means to stay in contact. Finally in 1940, she found a suitable and affordable tract of land upon which to build Quest Haven, the spiritual center she had envisioned. When dedicated, it became the headquarters of the Christward Ministry, the name she gave to her far-flung work. People began to move to land close by Quest Haven so they would be able to attend the regular weekly events at the center.

The rest of her life, Newhouse concentrated her efforts on building Quest Haven, writing a series of books, and composing a set of lessons summarizing her teachings. Lawrence died in 1963, but Flower lived for another 30 years, passing away in 1994.

New Isis Lodge

An original lodge of the British OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis) organization. The New Isis Lodge was established by Kenneth Grant in 1955, during the period of turmoil that hit the organization following the death of the outer head of the order, Aleister Crowley, in 1947. During Crowley’s last years, aided by the chaos of World War II, the order virtually ceased to exist in Europe. Crowley passed his job to Karl Germer, then living in the United States. Germer operated as a caretaker for the order, but was more interested in seeing to the publication of Crowley’s manuscripts than in aiding the revival of the organization after its decimation by the Nazis. Germer had himself spent several years in a concentration camp prior to escaping to England and then the United States.

In 1951 Germer granted a charter to Kenneth Grant, a young magician who had known Crowley during the last years of his life. Originally Grant was limited to performing only the first three of the order’s eleven degrees, but he had access to copies of all of the secret material. In 1955, Grant formally organized the New Isis Lodge of the OTO. The “New” was a pun on “Nu,” or “Nuit,” a term borrowed from Egyptian mythology that symbolized absolute consciousness. It was associated with the Crowley concept of the Scarlet Woman, whose formula was “love under will.” “New-Isis” or “Nu-Isis” therefore symbolized the heavenly and earthly goddess. Grant also began to work all eleven degrees of the order.

Accompanying the organization of the lodge, Grant issued a manifesto announcing the discovery of a new planet in this solar system beyond Pluto, a planet unknown to astronomy, which he named Isis. Quickly after receiving the manifesto and news of Grant’s actions, Germer expelled Grant from the OTO. Grant ignored the expulsion and continued to build his organization. He had no competition in the United Kingdom until the 1970s.

Grant had access to Crowley’s library, which was eventually deposited at an academic library in London, and as his organization grew he began to write books both on the Crowley legacy and on his own peculiar revisions of it. He gained considerable status in the larger magical community in 1969 as the co-editor of Crowley’s autobiographical Confessions.

Grant, while working the OTO rituals, offered a new variation that had grown out of his own magical experiments with what was termed the shadowside or backside of the Kabbalistic system, work which resembled Satanism to many magicians. Since Grant’s death, the work of the British OTO has continued independently of the larger OTO movement, one branch of which is headquartered in Germany and one in the United States.

The New Motor

A strange machine constructed in 1854 by Spiritualist medium John Murray Spear in association with another medium, Charles Hammond, at the instigation of the "Association of Electricizers," one of the bands of spirits by whom he was controlled. The motor was to derive its motive power from the magnetic store of nature and was therefore to be independent of artificial sources of energy, like the human body. The machine was hailed as the "physical saviour of the race," and the "new messiah." Mrs. Alonzo Newton, wife of one of Spear's collaborators, obeyed a vision by going to High Rock, Lynn, Massachusetts, where the new motor was located, and for two hours suffering "birth-pangs," whereby she judged that the essence of her spiritual being was imparted to the machine.

At the end of that time it was claimed that pulsations were apparent in the motor. Newton continued to act as nurse to the contraption for several weeks, but the only observed movements seemed to be a slight oscillation of some of the metal balls that adorned it. One disappointed Spiritualist complained that the new motor could not even turn a coffee mill. Andrew Jackson Davis visited the new motor at High Rock and expressed the belief that the design was the work of spirits of a mechanical turn of mind, but that the machine was of no practical value.

The new motor was finally smashed by a mob at Randolph, New York, where it had been taken. In all it cost its builder some two thousand dollars. In common fairness to the Spiritualists it must be said that Spear was widely recognized as a kind and honest man who had championed many liberal reforms. His earlier experience of spirit messages was remarkable, resulting in a healing ministry. It seems that he was deceived by misleading communications from "the Association of Electricizers" (which supposedly included the spirit of Benjamin Franklin).

It is possible that the new motor may have suggested a line of research to John Worrell Keely (1837–1898), who claimed the discovery of a new motive force in his invention of the Keely motor. This force was said to be a "vibratory etheric force" or cosmic energy. After the death of Keely, evidence of fraud was revealed.

From time to time since the new motor fiasco, Spiritualists have constructed various apparatus to facilitate communication with the spirit world, sometimes basing their constructions on spirit messages. Among modern inventors who were more successful than Spear were those comprising the group known as the Ashkir-Jobson Triunion, ca. 1930, who built various apparatus that seemed to work. The psychotherapist Wilhelm Reich also claimed the discovery of a cosmic motor force in what was termed orgone energy. (See also Communiograph)

New Perspectives

New Perspectives is one of a host of periodicals established during the late 1980s as the New Age Movement peaked and one of the few to survive into the post-New Age era. In its broad statement of purpose, it focuses attention on the emergence of a new consciousness and information considered by many to be esoteric. It is also tracing the movement of the movements of the last generation, from human potentials to New Thought metaphysics, into the self-conscious and self-critical mainstream culture.

Each issue of New Perspectives is built around a set of feature articles, often grouped around a single theme, that highlight issues within the larger community of people who accept an esoteric and holistic perspective on the world. Articles treat psychic reality, various forms of spiritual and alternative healing, and varieties of esoteric practice. A strong concern for healthy living is projected with articles that advocate practices (from dietary changes to spiritual exercises) that promote a healthful lifestyle in general. Each issue also contains a set of columns that include book reviews, movie and video reviews, and evaluation of New Age/holistic health spas, hotels, and retreats. Unlike most New Age periodicals, formed with an emphasis on networking between New Age organizations, practitioners, and devotees, New Perspectives has followed a more traditional magazine format centered upon providing its readers information and a perspective on what is seen as a forward-looking emerging culture. That perspective includes the attempt to highlight the similarities between people in spite of their apparent differences.

New Perspectives has been published quarterly since its founding in 1987. Editor/publisher Allan Hartley may be contacted at P.O. Box 3208, Hemet, CA 92546. In 1999 it added an Internet presence at <http://www.newperspectivesjournal.com/>.

New Realities

New Age magazine issued through the 1980s that presented a wide range of new age topics. It was initially issued in 1969 under the name Psychic, and quickly gained the respect of the psychic-oriented community for its coverage of parapsychology and psychic phenomena and its in-depth interviews with leading personalities in the field. It had a high standard of popular presentation without the sensationalism or vulgarity of so many of the competing periodicals dealing with the occult.

In 1977, after Vol. 7, No. 6, Psychic changed its title to New Realities, indicating its new direction as an organ serving the New Age community by its stated desire to focus upon "developments in the emergent areas of human possibilities that affect our everyday lives" in addition to psychic phenomena and new psychic research. This wider view embraces "holistic health" (total approach to human well-being on all levels), aspects of consciousness, Eastern and Western mysticism, new lifestyles and parapsychology.

In 1986 editor/publisher James Bolen transferred control of New Realities, which had been published in San Francisco, to Heldref Publications in Washington, D.C. The magazine was discontinued several years later.

New Reformed Orthodox Order of the Golden Dawn (NROOGD)

The NROOGD is an American Witchcraft tradition which was founded by a group of San Franciscans interested in the occult; they banded together to perform an archetypal Witches' Sabbath for a class at a San Francisco university in 1968. Using published sources from Robert Graves, Margaret Murray, and Gerald Gardner, a ritual was composed which serves as the basis of the NROOGD practice. After repeat performances, the group created an identity for themselves and trained others in its performance. The name they chose, New Reformed Orthodox Order of the Golden Dawn, is a play on the attitudes they had toward what they were doing and upon their spiritual antecedents. NROOGD is a wholly new tradition stemming from the magical order known as the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn; they consider themselves their spiritual and magical successors.

The mother circle of NROOGD "hived off" (branched off into) daughter and granddaughter covens. In 1976, the governing body of the order, called the Red Cord Council, was dissolved and the NROOGD became known as a tradition. Those groups tracing their lines of initiation back to a member of the original group and that share certain forms of liturgy consider themselves part of the NROOGD tradition. Covens are auton-mous and recognize one another's initiates. The identities of initiates are held in strictest confidence.

Coven esbats are usually held skyklad; they work on ethical magic and the celebration of the divinity of each participant. The covens recognize and greet the force of a Goddess and God.

Initially, the ritual performance required three priestesses and one priest, but now this form is usually reserved for large public rituals; the smaller coven meetings require only one of each. Although magical workings vary in form and content, they often include charms and simple poetry. Mythic enactments corresponding to a needed transformation may also be performed.

During the late 1980s and 1990s, younger members expanded inherited liturgy by writing new poetry and songs for new rituals. The NROOGD encourages creative expression, and these new writings serve to keep the tradition alive.

The core NROOGD ritual, written by Aidan Kelly and others, begins with a line dance in the form of an inward and then outward spiral, representing death and rebirth, with coverers singing a chant—"Tout, tout, tout, throughout and about!" Afterward, conjurations of elements, which go into a central "Charging Bowl," begin with "I conjure salt for savor. . . ." Gods, demigods, or other spirits at each of the cardinal directions serve as Guardians of the Circle and of the Elements. Each coven has their own guardians that are unique from other covens. Names of the Gods are idiosyncratic to each group and the names are kept secret.

The sharing of food and drink (called a Love Feast) concludes the ritual, as members prepare themselves to reenter their daily lives.

Three initiations distinguish the practice of NROOGD. The first initiation, called the White Cord, marks the entrance either into the NROOGD community, or into a particular coven's instruction. The second initiation, called the Red Cord, is a full initiation into the Mysteries of Witchcraft. Red Cord initiates are elders of the tradition, and are empowered to lead their own covens and train and initiate. The third initiation is not bestowed by human hand but rather by the Gods themselves, and is called a Black Cord, or Taking the Garter. This last is the most intensely personal of the three.

The order holds large public ritual celebrations at each of the eight Sabbats for the benefit of the greater Pagan community. The most unique of these celebrations is the re-enactment of the Eleusinian Mysteries in the fall. Area covens also meet periodically to decide responsibilities for the coming year.

NROOGD member covens are primarily in the San Francisco Bay Area, yet elders are found all over California, the Pacific Northwest, Michigan, and on the East Coast. There is no central authority nor spokesperson for the tradition.

The order publishes a quarterly magazine called The Witches Trine, consisting of news, articles, poetry and reviews relating to the NROOGD tradition and Witchcraft in general.

Newspaper Tests

Ingenious experiments devised by séance-room communicators to exclude telepathy as an explanation of hypothesized spirit communication. Rev. C. Drayton Thomas in Some Recent Evidence for Survival (1922) published many remarkable instances as recorded in sittings with the medium Gladys Osborne Leonard.

The method of the communicators was to give in the afternoon names and dates that were to be published the next day in certain columns of The Times, or, if so requested, in coming issues of magazines. The information so obtained was immediately posted to the Society for Psychological Research (SPR), London. The results when verified were so much more striking since neither the editor nor the compositor in the offices of The Times could tell at the hour when the communication was made what text would occupy the column mentioned in the next edition.

The following tests were given on February 13, 1920:

"The first page of the paper, in column two and near the top the name of a minister with whom your father was friendly at Leek. (Perks was found, a name which verified from an old diary.)

"Lower in this column, say one quarter down, appears his name, your own, your mother's and that of an aunt; all four within the space of two inches. (John and Charles were correctly found, then came the name Emile Souret which presumably suggested Emily and Sarah, his aunt and mother.)

"Near these the word 'Grange.' (It was not found.)

"In column one, not quite half-way down, is a name which is your mother's maiden name or one very like it. (The maiden name was 'Dore,' the name found 'Dorothea.')

"Somewhat above that is named a place where your mother passed some years of her girlhood. (Hants. Correct. Shirley, where she spent her girlhood, being in Hampshire, for which 'Hants.' is the recognized abbreviation.)

"Close to the foregoing is a name, which suggests an action one might make with the body in jumping. (Cummock, a bad pun: come knock.)

"Towards the bottom of the column is named a place where you went to school. (Lincolnshire. Correct.)

"There is a word close by which looks to your father like Cheadle. (Not found.)

"Higher in column one, say two-thirds down, is a name suggesting ammunition. (Found the ecclesiastical title Canon.) Between that and the teacher's name is a place-name, French, looking like three words hyphenated into one. (Braine-le-Chateau.)

"About the middle of this page, the middle both down and across, is a mistake in print; it cannot be right. Some wrong letters inserted or something left out, some kind of mistake just there. (The word 'page' printed imperfectly: 'Paae.')

Out of the items in this test, two entirely failed, the others forecast at 3 P.M. the day previous to the publication of the paper were correct. At 6 P.M. a copy of this test was posted to the SPR. Inquiries at The Times revealed the fact that in some cases the particular notices referred to might have already been set up in type at the time of the sitting, in other cases they were probably not set up and in any case their ultimate position on the page could not be normally known until late in the afternoon.

By the spirit of his father the following explanation was furnished to Thomas:

“These tests have been devised by others in a more advanced sphere than mine, and I have caught their ideas. I am not yet aware exactly how one obtains these tests, and have wondered whether the higher guides exert some influence whereby a suitable advertisement comes into position on the convenient date. I am able to sense what appears to me to be sheets and slips of paper with names and various information upon them. I notice suitable items and, afterwards, visualise a duplicate of the page with these items falling into their places. At first I was unable to do this. It seems to me that it is an ability which throws some light upon foretelling, a visualising of what is to be, but based upon that which already is. Sometimes I see further detail upon visualising which I had not sensed from the letters. I think there is an etheric foreshadowing of things about to be done. It would probably be impossible to get anything very far ahead, but only within a certain number of hours, and I cannot say how many. I scarcely think it would be possible to get a test for the day after the morrow, or, even if possible, that it could result in more than a jumble of the morrow’s with a few of the day following. I think they should impress people more than book tests. It becomes clear that telepathy cannot explain; you find in the paper that for which you seek, but given in a form which you did not expect and about which you could, in the nature of the case, have known nothing. Two sets of memory are combined to produce them, my memories of long ago, and my memory of what I found this morning about preparations for the Press.” (See also Book Tests; Chair Test; Prediction; Prevision)

New Thought

A late-nineteenth-century religious movement that wedded the spiritual idealism of philosopher Ralph Waldo Emerson with the pursuit of healing alternatives through various mental and psychological processes. The origin of New Thought is generally traced to Phineas Parkhurst Quimby (1802–1866), a mesmerist from the state of Maine. Quimby had become fascinated with the phenomena associated with mesmerism (or hypnotism) but began to notice that its healing potential really came from the transfer of healing thoughts. He concluded that mind was the major factor in healing. The mind of the patient had come to accept thoughts that caused disease, and healing was accomplished when the mind came to believe the truth. For Quimby, the mind’s operation upon the body brought health.

Quimby lived in Portland, Maine, far from the centers of culture. He wrote down his ideas but never published them, and only a few students found their way to his door. When he died as a relatively unknown and unheralded healer in 1866 there was nothing like a movement built around either him or his ideas. One of his students, Warren Felt Evans, a Swedenborgian minister, settled in Salisbury, Massachusetts, and in 1869 wrote the first of a series of books on mental healing, acknowledging in passing his debt to Quimby. However, his developing ideas left Quimby behind for a form of pantheism.

The most notable of Quimby’s students was Mary Baker Eddy. She found significant relief from her chronic medical problems under Quimby’s tutelage, but had questioned the fact that her symptoms returned when she left Maine and tried to resume her normal life. She also was offended by Quimby’s disparagement of ministers, churches, and religion in general. She went to the Bible as a means of answering her questions.

Eddy reached a crisis in 1866 a few weeks after Quimby’s death. She slipped on some ice and injured herself to the extent that she was bedridden. Some thought she was going to die. However, during her recovery, all of her study came together in a new revelation that God was all, the sum of reality. Since God is all, and in his presence there can be no illness, she concluded that illness must be an error in the individual’s mind. The realization of this new insight led to her immediate healing. She would embody this new idealistic understanding of the universe in a booklet, The Science of Man (1870), and then more completely in her textbook, Science and Health (1875). She taught informally for several years but in 1876 encouraged the formation of the Christian Science Association, an organization of her students and the root of the Church of Christ, Scientist, which she would found three years later.

The Christian Science movement placed a new healing emphasis before the American public. Eddy regularly offered classes at which she trained people to become practitioners. Her students in turn moved out to establish offices and offer their services to their suffering neighbors. Led by the distribution of Science and Health (soon expanded with a biblical key to become Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures), the Christian Science movement spread across North America and into Europe during the 1880s.

The Emergence of New Thought

Eddy built this large movement, with which Quimby was never involved. It was built around her own particular healing vision, the core of which had been revealed to her in 1866 and which she developed throughout the rest of her life. She had little patience with students who wished to take her ideas and make personal elaborations upon them. Students who deviated from Eddy’s own presentation of Christian Science were soon separated from the organization. By the mid 1880s there were a number of independent Christian Science practitioners, including some who moved away due to Eddy’s insistence upon the centrality of Christian faith and symbols. Collectively they became known as the mind cure movement.

In 1885, one of Eddy’s most talented students, to whom she had entrusted the Christian Science Journal, broke with Eddy and moved from Boston to Chicago to establish an independent private practice. After a year as merely a practitioner, Emma Curtis Hopkins was talked into opening a school at which she could teach Christian Science and train practitioners. The school opened in 1886 as the Hopkins Metaphysical Association. By the end of 1887, affiliated associations managed by her students could be found from Maine to California. Hopkins’ efforts pulled together the independents into a coherent competing movement that grew and diversified over the next decade. Among Hopkins’s students were a number of capable leaders who, with her encouragement, founded their own independent movements. Over the years she taught Melinda Cramer (founder of Divine Science), Myrtle and Charles Fillmore (co-founders of Unity), Annie Rix Militz (founder of the Homes of Truth), and Ernest Holmes (founder of Religious Science).

Hopkins thus mobilized the followers and trained the leaders of what would in the 1890s become known as the New Thought movement and is rightly remembered as the movement’s founder. Hopkins would largely resign from any leadership role in 1895 after launching the movement, which consisted of several large associations of churches and centers (Unity, Divine Science, Homes of Truth, and later the Church of Truth and Religious Science) and many independent churches and centers. Various attempts to organize the movement were made through the early years of the twentieth century, culminating in the formation of the International New Thought Alliance in 1915. Several years later the alliance adopted a “Declaration of Principles” which guided it for forty years until the present “Declaration,” which was adopted in 1957, appeared.

The 1957 Declaration affirmed the oneness of God and humanity, a major implication being that humans can reproduce divine perfection in the body. God is defined as universal wisdom, love, life, truth, power, peace, joy, and beauty, and the universe is seen as the body of God. Mental states manifest in human life to good or ill. God manifests as the divine virtues in humans. Humans are basically an invisible spiritual dweller in the body.

Today the International New Thought Alliance is headquartered at 5003 E. Broadway Rd., Mesa, AZ 85206.

New Thought (Organ)

Quarterly organ of the International New Thought Alliance (INTA), the major ecumenical organization bringing together the congregations of the large New Thought groups (Divine Science, Religious Science, and the Unity School of Christianity) with the many small and independent congregations that follow New Thought metaphysics. It includes a directory of the affiliated congregations. Founded in 1914, it was published in Los Angeles for many years; however, its editorial offices were moved in the 1980s to the new permanent headquarters of INTA, 5003 E. Broadway Rd., Mesa, AZ 85206.

The New Times

The New Times is a post-New Age networking monthly that serves the Northwest United States, primarily Washington and Oregon. It has adopted a tabloid newspaper format and is distributed free through a variety of metaphysical and health food establishments in the Seattle metropolitan area and beyond.

Each issue of The New Times includes a host of original feature articles, most written by local authors, that cover the wide range of typical concerns that had been brought together by the New Age Movement of the 1980s with spirituality philosophies and practices heading the list. Holistic health is a close second. There is additional concern for such topics as ecology and psychic phenomena. Monthly columns cover astrology, reviews of books, music and transformational tools, and herbalism.

The heart of each issue is the "Resource Directory," the pages of advertisements that effectively delineate the range of metaphysical and health services and activities available for seekers throughout the Northwest. As is common in similar publications, the ads are classified into six major divisions: classes, workshops, and trainings; health services; intuitive arts and sciences; professional services; spiritual organizations and practices; and tools for your journey.

The New Times began publication in the mid-1970s, and continues under the leadership of publisher Deverick Martin and editor David Young. Its publishing headquarters may be contacted at P.O. Box 51186, Seattle, WA 98115-1186 and through its website at <http://www.newtimes.org/>.

New Times Network (Directory)

One of several New Age directories compiled in the early 1980s. It included sections on health and healing, growth and human potential, holistic education, spiritual traditions, New Age communities, networks, associations, and information centers. Unfortunately, like so many of the New Age directories that appeared in the 1980s, new editions were never issued and the volume quickly became outdated.

New Wiccan Church

The New Wiccan Church, originally the New Celtic Church, was founded in the early 1970s to practice Witchcraft in the British tradition. Membership is restricted to adult witches who have been initiated in the Gardnerian tradition or one of the several variations of the Gardnerian practice, the most well known being the Alexanderian. Gerald B. Gardner, generally considered the father of modern Wicca, established a new form of Witchcraft in England in the 1950s. He instituted three degrees of accomplishment, the third being admittance into the priesthood.

In the statement of belief, called the "Dedication," the New Wiccans identify themselves with a form of traditional monotheism by affirming belief in Dyghtyn, the name they give to the ultimate godhead. They follow modern Wicca, however, by noting that the godhead, who is all knowing and all pervasive, differentiates itself into male and female as the "Lady of the moon" and the "Lord of Death and Resurrection." The Lord and Lady further differentiate themselves into a myriad of lesser deities that have been recognized throughout human history in the various world mythologies. Members are free to acknowledge these lesser deities in their rites as they see fit, save only that such practice does not lead to harm to people or animals. In addition to the "Dedication," the church circulates the statement issued in 1974 by the now-defunct Council of American Witches whose "Principles of Wiccan Belief" has become a popular statement defining the community.

The actual rites used in the church are secret, but the published Gardnerian rituals provide a close approximation of typical practice. There is a degree of variation from coven (small worshipping group) to coven. Traditionally, Gardnerians worshipped in the nude, but many New Wiccan coven dress for rituals.

There are annual dues for members and each coven may ask for an additional fee to cover the small costs involved in running the coven. However, no fees may be charged for initiating anyone into the craft or for the performance of an act of magic. Church members are very active in the larger Wiccan community, especially with the covens of the Covenant of the Goddess. Most New Wiccan covens are found in the Western United States. Headquarters are at Box 162046, Sacramento, CA 95816. Information about the group can be found in its periodical, Red Garters, and on its website, <http://www.angelfire.com/ca/redgarters>.

Newton, J. R. (1810–1883)

American healing medium. He began his healing career in 1855 and is said to have cured thousands of sufferers from a variety of ailments. He claimed to be aided by Christ and other spirits. He usually healed in large halls or other areas with space to move about in and used to handle patients, often giving a sufferer a push and telling him he was cured, which he usually was.

Newton gave most of his healing free. Many of his cures were reliably recorded both in the United States and in England, which he visited the first time in 1870. The publication The Spiritualist (June 15, 1870) listed 105 cases of persons cured or benefited by Newton on that visit, while the Spiritual Magazine (July 1870) cited full particulars of many cures.

New York Circle

The first experimental Spiritualist organization in the United States. It was an exclusive body in the initial stages, later broadening its membership. The principal medium was Edward P. Fowler, who had sat with Kate and Margaretta Fox. Fowler provided the location. Early members included the judge John W. Edmonds. At one sitting of the circle, the medium Henry Gordon demonstrated the feat of floating in the air, i.e., levitation, in the presence of many unimpeachable witnesses.

At the initiative of the circle, the New York Conference was established in November 1851, providing a focal point for the growing interest in Spiritualism.

NEW ZEALAND

The Maori

Among the Maori, the indigenous inhabitants of New Zealand, (known by the Maori as “Aotearoa”) the spirits of the dead played a prominent role, with the priests (or tohungas) functioning in a manner quite similar to Spiritualist mediums. Some were born with their gift. Others were devoted to the priestly office by their parents and acquired their power after the fashion of Eastern ecstasies, by prayer, fasting, and contemplation.

Prophets emerged among the Maoris during the early colonization phase of the islands. As Great Britain established hegemony in the land, her officials frequently wrote home that the Maori would never be conquered wholly. Information of the parties sent out to attack them, the color of the boats and the hour when they would arrive, the number of the enemy, and all particulars essential to Maori safety were invariably communicated to the tribes beforehand by their tohungas.

The best prophets and seers among the Maori were female. Christian missionaries tried to account for the extraordinary powers they exhibited. For example, these women listened for the sound of the spirit voice, a common designation that occurred in their communion with the dead. Skeptical observers suggested that the women who practiced such “arts of sorcery,” were really ventriloquists; yet this attempted explanation rarely accounted for the intelligence received.

In his book Old New Zealand (1863), F. E. Maning cites an interesting case of tohungaism. A certain young chief had been appointed registrar of births and deaths, when he suddenly came to a violent end. The book of registries was lost, and much inconvenience ensued. The man’s relatives notified their intention of invoking his spirit and invited General Cummings to be present at the ceremony, an invitation he accepted. Cummings’s story continues as follows:

“The appointed time came. Fires were lit. The Tohunga repaired to the darkest corner of the room. All was silent, save the sobbing of the sisters of the deceased warrior-chief. There were 30 of us, sitting on the rush-strewn floor, the door shut and the fire now burning down to embers. Suddenly there came a voice out from the partial darkness, ‘Salutation, salutation to my family, to my tribe, to you, pakeha, my friend!’ Our feelings were taken by storm. The oldest sister screamed, and rushed with extended arms in the direction from whence the voice came. Her brother, seizing, restrained her by main force. Others exclaimed, ‘Is it you? Is it you? Truly it is you! aue! aue!’ and fell quite insensible upon the floor. The older women and some of the aged men were not moved in the slightest degree, though believing it to be the spirit of the chief.

“Whilst reflecting upon the novelty of the scene, the ‘darkness visible’ and the deep interest manifest, the spirit spoke again, ‘Speak to me my family; speak to me, my tribe: speak to me, the pakeha!’ At last the silence gave way, and the brother spoke: ‘How is it with you? Is it well with you in that country?’ The answer came, though not in the voice of the Tohunga-medium, but in strange sepulchral sounds: ‘It is well with me; my place is a good place. I have seen our friends; they are all with me!’ A woman from another part of the room now anxiously cried out, ‘Have you seen my sister?’ ‘Yes, I have seen her; she is happy in our beautiful country.’ ‘Tell her my love so great for her will never cease.’ ‘Yes, I will bear the message.’ Here the native woman burst into tears, and my own bosom swelled in sympathy.

“The spirit speaking again, giving directions about property and keepsakes, I thought I would more thoroughly test the genuineness of all this: and I said, ‘We cannot find your book with the registered names; where have you concealed it?’ The answer came instantly, ‘I concealed it between the tahuhu of my house, and the thatch; straight over you, as you go in at the door.’ The brother rushed out to see. All was silence. In five minutes he came hurriedly back, with the book in his hand! It astonished me.

“It was now late, and the spirit suddenly said, ‘Farewell my family, farewell, my tribe; I go.’ Those present breathed an impressive farewell, when the spirit cried out again, from high in the air, ‘Farewell!’

“This, though seemingly tragical, is in every respect literally true. But what is that? ventriloquism, the devil, or what!”

Emma Hardinge Britten, in her book Nineteenth Century Miracles (1883), notes:

“The author has herself had several proofs of the Mediumistic power possessed by these ‘savages’ but as her experiences may be deemed of too personal a character, we shall select our examples from other sources. One of these is furnished by a Mr. Marsden, a person who was well-known in the early days of New Zealand’s colonial history, as a miner, who grew rich ‘through spiritual communications.’ Mr. Marsden was a gentleman who had spent much time amongst the Maoris, and who still keeps a residence in ‘the King country,’ that is—the district of which they hold control.

“Mr. Marsden informed the author, that his success as a gold miner, was entirely due to a communication he had received through a native woman who claimed to have the power of bringing down spirits—the Maoris, be it remembered, always insisting that the spirits descend through the air to earth to visit mortals.

“Mr. Marsden had long been prospecting unsuccessfully in the gold regions. He had a friend in partnership with him, to whom he was much attached, but who had been accidentally killed by a fall from a cliff.

“The Spirit of this man came unsolicited, on an occasion when Mr. Marsden was consulting a native seeress, for the purpose of endeavouring to trace out what had become of a valuable watch which he had lost.

“The voice of the Spirit was the first heard in the air, apparently above the roof of the hut in which they sat, calling Mr. Marsden by his familiar name of ‘Mars.’ Greatly startled by these sounds, several times repeated, at the Medium’s command, he remained perfectly still until the voice of his friend speaking in his well-remembered Scotch accent sounded close to his ear, whilst a column of grey misty substance reared itself by his side. This apparition was plainly visible in the subdued light of the hut, to which there was only one open entrance, but no window. Though he was much startled by what he saw and heard, Mr. Marsden had presence of mind enough to gently put his hand through the misty column which remained intact, as if its substance offered no resistance to the touch. Being admonished by an earnest whisper from the Maori woman, who had fallen on her knees before the apparition, to keep still, he obeyed, when a voice—seemingly from an immense distance off—yet speaking unmistakably in his friend’s Scotch accents, advised him to let the watch alone—for it was irreparably gone—but to go to the stream on the banks of which they had last had a meal together; trace it up for six miles and a half, and then, by following its course amidst the forest, he would come to a pile which would make him rich, if he chose to remain so.

“Whilst he was waiting and listening breathlessly to hear more, Mr. Marsden was startled by a slight detonation at his side. Turning his head he observed that the column of mist was gone, and in its place, a quick flash, like the reflection of a candle, was all that he beheld. Here the séance ended, and the astonished miner left the hut, convinced that he had heard the Spirit of his friend talking with him. He added, that he followed the directions given implicitly, and came to a mass of surface gold lying on the stones at the bottom of the brook in the depth of the forest. This he gathered up, and though he prospected for several days in and about that spot, he never found another particle of this precious metal. That which he had secured he added, with a deep sigh, was indeed enough to have made him independent for life, had it not soon been squandered in fruitless speculations.

“Many degrees of superstition exist among the Maoris,” states a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette. “In the recesses of the Urewera country for example, diablerie has lost little of its early potency; the tohunga there remains a power in the land. Among the more enlightened natives a precautionary policy is generally followed; it is always wiser and safer, they say, to avoid conflict with the two mysterious powers tapu and makuta. Tapu is the less dangerous of the two; a house, an individual, or an article may be rendered tapu, or sacred, and if the tapu be disregarded harm will befall someone. But makuta is a powerful evil spell cast for the deliberate purpose of accomplishing harm, generally to bring about death. The tohunga is understood to be in alliance with the spirits of the dead. The Maori dreads death, and he fears the dead. Places of burial are seldom approached during the day, never at night. The spirits of the dead are believed to linger sometimes near places of burial. Without going to experts in Maori lore, who have many and varied theories to set forth, a preferable course is to discover what the average Maori of to-day thinks and believes respecting the strange powers and influences he deems are at work in the world around him.

“A Maori of this type—who can read and write, is under 40 years of age, and fairly intelligent—was drawn into a lengthy conversation with the writer. He believed, magistrates notwithstanding, that tohungas, somehow, had far more power than ordinary men. He did not think they got that power from the ‘tiapo’ (the devil?); they just were able to make themselves masters of men and many things in the world. There are many degrees of Tohungaism. An ordinary man or woman was powerless against a tohunga, but one tohunga could overcome another. The speaker knew of an instance of one tohunga driving the tohunga power entirely out of a weaker rival. It was a fairly recent east coast occurrence. Three Maoris had accidentally permitted their pigs to trespass into the tohunga’s potato paddock, and much damage and loss was the result. The tohunga was one of the dangerous type, and being very wroth, he makutued the three men, all of whom promptly died. Nobody was brave enough to charge the tohunga with causing the death of the men; they were all afraid of this terrible makuta. At length another tohunga was heard of, one of very great power. This oracle was consulted, and he agreed to deal effectively with tohunga number one, and punish him for killing the owner of the pigs. So, following his instructions, the first-mentioned individual was seized, and much against his will, was conveyed to the home of the greater magician. Many Maoris, it should be known, stand in awe of hot water, they will not handle it, even for purposes connected with cooking or cleaning. Into a large tub of hot water the minor tohunga struggling frantically, was placed, then he was given a page torn from a Bible, which he was ordered to chew and swallow. The hot water treatment, combined with the small portion of the white man’s sacred volume, did the expected work; the man was no longer a tohunga, and fretting over his lost powers, he soon afterwards died.”

Spiritualism in New Zealand

Among the earliest adherents to Spiritualism in New Zealand was John Logan of Dunedin. Before he had become publicly identified with the cause of Spiritualism, an association had been formed, the members of which steadily pursued their investigations in private circles and semi-private gatherings. Logan became well known when he became the subject of a church trial. Although holding a high position in the first Presbyterian church of the city, he had been attracted to Spiritualist circles and witnessed Spiritualistic phenomena. Rumors spread around the small community that one of his own near relatives was a very remarkable medium. On March 19, 1873, Logan was summoned to appear before a church convocation, to be held for the purpose of trying his case, and if necessary, dealing with his “delinquency.” That was when he was deprived of his church membership.

In many of the principal towns besides Dunedin, circles, held at first in mere idle curiosity, produced their usual fruit of mediumistic power. This again was extended into associative action, and organization into local societies. For over a year, the Spiritualists and Liberalists of Dunedin secured the services of Charles Bright as their lecturer. Bright had once been a member of the editorial staff of the Australian Melbourne Argus, and he had obtained a good reputation as a capable writer and liberal thinker. Bright’s lectures in Dunedin were highly appreciated. By their scholarly style and attractive manner they served to band together those citizens who were not attracted to orthodox Christianity, both the liberal dissenting element and those attracted to Spiritualism.

In Auckland, the principal town of the North Island, the same good service was rendered to the cause of religious thought by the addresses of a Rev. Edgar, a clergyman whose absorption of Spiritualist doctrines had tended to sever him from more traditional churches and drew around him the Spiritualists of the town.

Besides the work effected by these men, the occasional visits of well-known personalities like Rev. J. M. Peebles and J. Tyerman and the effect of the many private circles held in every portion of the islands tended to promote a general, although quiet, diffusion of Spiritualist belief and practice throughout New Zealand. In 1879, a lecture tour by Emma Hardinge Britten gave added impetus to public interest and discussion concerning Spiritualism.

By 1930, the Spiritualist Church of New Zealand, headquartered in Wellington, had branches throughout New Zealand. One of the most prominent mediums was Pearl Judd, who demonstrated direct voice phenomena in full light.

Psychical Research

Interest in New Zealand in psychical research flared briefly on the heels of the development of psychical research in Australia in the 1870s; but as in the neighboring land, soon died away. Only after World War II did interest revive. In the 1990s, there was an Auckland Psychical Research Society and a branch of the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies, as well as the Federation of Spiritual Healers. There is also a New Zealand UFO Studies in New Plymouth.

Nexus

Nexus is among the more distinctive newsstand magazines reporting on paranormal realities. This Australian-based publication takes a decidedly countercultural and antigovernment perspective and is especially attuned to what it sees as possible conspiracies operating against the public's welfare. It was born out of the New Age belief in humanity's current transition in consciousness, but believes that sinister forces are at work to block human progress. Thus Nexus has assigned itself the task of reporting on what it believes to be the news behind the news, hard-to-gather facts and suppressed information that are needed by people making the consciousness transformation.

Each issue of Nexus begins with approximately ten feature stories that cover such topics as natural health cures, UFO abductions, natural disasters and Earth changes, government wrong-doing, and possible future scientific catastrophes. Particular attention has been paid to alternative cancer therapies and government efforts to suppress their use. This overall perspective is carried over to the many short news items reprinted from around the world. Nexus is especially helpful for its extensive book review column that highlights many books on alternative science, UFOs, psychic phenomena, ancient mysteries, and conspiracy theories not generally reviewed in the mainstream UFO and New Age periodicals.

Nexus sponsors an annual conference (in Australia) that includes speakers on psychical research, holistic health, ancient mysteries, UFOs, and related topics.

Nexus was first issued as a quarterly in 1987. The present editors, Duncan M. Roads and Catherine Simons, purchased it in 1990. They adopted the present bimonthly schedule, removed articles on subjects like the environment of primary New Age interest, and gave it its present distinctive editorial perspective. Through the 1990s it gained an international audience. Nexus is published in Australia, but has developed an American and a British edition and a number of foreign-language editions (Polish, Italian, Swedish, Japanese, French, Korean, and Greek). Its editorial offices are located at P.O. Box 30, Mapleton, Queensland 4560, Australia. It has a webpage at <http://www.nexusmagazine.com/>.

Nichusch

A Kabbalistic term for prophetic indication, in accordance with the view that all events and natural happenings have a secret connection and interact upon one another. It was believed that practically everything could become an object of soothsaying—the flight of birds, movement of clouds, cries of animals, events happening to man, and so on. A person might become nichusch by saying that if such and such a thing took place it would be a good or a bad omen. (See also divination; Kabala)

“Nick” (or “Old Nick”)

A well-known British nickname for the devil, comparable with the American “Mr. Splitfoot” or “Old Scratch.” It seems probable that this name is derived from the Dutch nikken, the devil, which again comes from the Anglo-Saxon noec-an, to slay, deriving from the theological view that the devil was “a murderer from the beginning.”

In northern countries there is a river spirit named “Neck,” “Nikke,” or “Nokke,” of the same nature as the water kelpie and the merman or triton.

Nicol, Betty (Elizabeth) Humphrey (1917–1993)

Psychologist and parapsychologist. She was born Elizabeth Humphrey on June 7, 1917, in Indianapolis, Indiana. She studied at Earlham College, Richmond, Indiana (B.A. philosophy, 1940), and Duke University (Ph.D. psychology, 1946). While at Earlham she became interested in psychical research and pursued her doctoral degree at Duke in order to work with J. B. Rhine. In the early 1950s she collaborated with her future husband on attempts to discern the personality correlates of psychic ability. In 1955 she married parapsychologist J. Fraser Nicol. She undertook a detailed analysis of published precognition cases in order to ascertain optimal psychological and physical conditions for spontaneous precognition, a project sponsored by a grant from the Parapsychology Foundation. She also wrote a number of articles.

Nicol died in January 1993.

Nicol, J(ohn) Fraser (d. 1989)

Parapsychologist born in Edinburgh, Scotland. He was educated at Heriot's School, Edinburgh, and Heriot-Watt College, Edinburgh University. Quite early in his life he became a research member of the Society for Psychological Research, London (1934–51); he also became a member of its council (1948–1957). Then in 1951 he moved to the United States to spend a year as a research associate at the Parapsychology Laboratory, Duke University, where he met his future wife (known after her marriage as Betty Nicol). They worked together for many years, funded in part by grants from the Rockefeller Foundation, the American Society for Psychological Research, and the Parapsychology Foundation.

Among Nicol's early research projects carried out with his future wife—they were married in 1955—was on the personality components of psychically aware people. Besides his numerous articles, many written with his wife, Nicol is also remembered as a historian of psychological research, about which he authored several important articles.

Nicolai, Christoph Friedrich (1733–1811)

German critic, novelist, and bookseller of Berlin, who is of special interest from the occult point of view because of his peculiar experiences, described in a presentation read before the Royal Society of Berlin. The case is one of the most celebrated in the annals of psychology. Nicolai reported:

"In the first two months of the year 1791, I was much affected in my mind by several incidents of a very disagreeable nature; and on the 24th of February a circumstance occurred which irritated me extremely. At ten o'clock in the forenoon my wife and another person came to console me; I was in a violent perturbation of mind, owing to a series of incidents which had altogether wounded my moral feelings, and from which I saw no possibility of relief, when suddenly I observed at the distance of ten paces from me a figure—the figure of a deceased person. I pointed at it, and asked my wife whether she did not see it. She saw nothing, but being much alarmed, endeavoured to compose me, and sent for the physician. The figure remained some seven or eight minutes, and at length I became a little more calm, and as I was extremely exhausted, I soon afterwards fell into a troubled kind of slumber, which lasted for half an hour. The vision was ascribed to the great agitation of mind in which I had been, and it was supposed I should have nothing more to apprehend from that cause, but the violent affection had put my nerves into some unnatural state. From this arose further consequences, which require a more detailed description.

"In the afternoon, a little after four o'clock, the figure which I had seen in the morning again appeared. I was alone when this happened, a circumstance which, as may be easily conceived, could not be very agreeable. I went therefore to the apartment of my wife, to whom I related it. But thither also the figure pursued me. Sometimes it was present, sometimes it vanished, but it was always the same standing figure. A little after six o'clock several stalking figures also appeared, but they had no connection with the standing figure. I can assign no other cause for this apparition than that, though much more composed in my mind, I had not been able so soon entirely to forget the cause of such deep and distressing vexation, and had reflected on the consequences of it, in order, if possible, to avoid them; and that this happened three hours after dinner, at the time when digestion just begins.

"At length I became more composed with respect to the disagreeable incident which had given rise to the first apparition, but though I had used very excellent medicines and found myself in other respects perfectly well, yet the apparitions did not diminish, but on the contrary rather increased in number, and were transformed in the most extraordinary manner.

"The figure of the deceased person never appeared to me after the first dreadful day, but several other figures showed themselves afterwards very distinctly, sometimes such as I knew, mostly, however, of persons I did not know, and amongst those known to me, were the semblance of both living and deceased persons, but mostly the former, and I made the observation, that acquaintance with whom I daily conversed never appeared to me as phantasms; it was always such as were at a distance.

"It is also to be noted, that these figures appeared to me at all times, and under the most different circumstances, equally distinct and clear. Whether I was alone, or in company, by broad daylight equally as in the night-time, in my own as well as in my neighbour's house; yet when I was at another person's house, they were less frequent, and when I walked the public street they very seldom appeared. When I shut my eyes, sometimes the figures disappeared, sometimes they remained even after I had closed them. If they vanished in the former case, on opening my eyes again, nearly the same figures appeared which I had seen before.

"I sometimes conversed with my physician and my wife concerning the phantasms which at the time hovered around me; for in general the forms appeared oftener in motion than at rest. They did not always continue present—they frequently left me altogether, and again appeared for a short or longer space of time, singly or more at once; but, in general, several appeared together. For the most part I saw human figures of both sexes. They commonly passed to and fro as if they had no connection with each other, like people at a fair where all is bustle. Sometimes they appeared to have business with one another. Once or twice I saw amongst them persons on horseback, and dogs and birds; these figures all appeared to me in their natural size, as distinctly as if they had existed in real life, with the several tints on the uncovered parts of the body, and with all the different kinds and colours of clothes. But I think, however, that the colours were somewhat paler than they are in nature.

"None of the figures had any distinguishing characteristic, they were neither terrible, ludicrous, nor repulsive; most of them were ordinary in their appearance—some were even agreeable.

"On the whole, the longer I continued in this state, the more did the number of the phantasms increase, and the apparitions became more frequent. About four weeks afterwards I began to hear them speak. Sometimes the phantasms spoke with one another, but for the most part they addressed themselves to me, these speeches were in general short, and never contained anything disagreeable. Intelligent and respected friends often appeared to me, who endeavoured to console me in my grief, which still left deep traces on my mind. This speaking I heard most frequently when I was alone; though I sometimes heard it in company, intermixed with the conversation of real persons; frequently in single phrases only, but sometimes even in connected discourse.

“Though at this time I enjoyed rather a good state of health both in body and mind, and had become so very familiar with these phantasms, that at last they did not excite the least disagreeable emotion, but on the contrary afforded me frequent subjects for amusement and mirth, yet as the disorder sensibly increase, and the figures appeared to me for whole days together, and even during the night, if I happened to awake, I had recourse to several medicines.”

Nicolai then recounted how the apparitions vanished upon blood being let.

“This was performed on the 20th of April, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon. I was alone with the surgeon, but during the operation the room swarmed with human forms of every description, which crowded fast one on another. This continued till half-past four o'clock, exactly the time when the digestion commences. I then observed that the figures began to move more slowly; soon afterwards the colours became gradually paler; every seven minutes they lost more and more of their intensity, without any alteration in the distinct figure of the apparitions. At about half-past six o'clock, all the figures were entirely white, and moved very little, yet the forms appeared perfectly distinct. By degrees they became visibly less plain, without decreasing in number, as had often formerly been the case. The figures did not move off, neither did they vanish, which also had usually happened on other occasions. In this instance they dissolved immediately into air; of some even whole pieces remained for a length of time, which also by degrees were lost to the eye. At about eight o'clock there did not remain a vestige of any of them, and I have never since experienced any appearance of the same kind. Twice or thrice since that time I have felt a propensity, if I may be allowed to express myself, or a sensation as if I saw something which in a moment again was gone. I was even surprised by this sensation whilst writing the present account, having, in order to render it more accurate, perused the papers of 1791, and recalled to my memory all the circumstances of that time. So little are we sometimes, even in the greatest composure of mind, masters of our imagination.”

Nicolai was a greatly respected writer who became an organizer and leader of the Enlightenment in northern Germany, together with G. E. Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn. He died January 1, 1811.

Nicoll, (Henry) Maurice (Dunlap) (1884–1953)

Prominent British physician and psychologist who became a leading exponent of the teachings of G. I. Gurdjieff and his most prominent pupil, P. D. Ouspensky. Nicoll was born in 1884. He was educated at Aldenham School and Caius College, Cambridge University, going on to study medicine at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, and in Vienna, Berlin, Paris, and Zürich (B.A., M.B., B.C., Cambridge; M.R.C.S., London). He was medical officer to Empire Hospital for injuries to the nervous system, a lecturer in medical psychology at Birmingham University, England, and a member of the British Psycho Medical Society. He became a member of the editorial staff of Journal of Neurology and Psychopathy. During World War I he served in Gallipoli in 1915 and Mesopotamia in 1916.

After his study in Zürich, Nicoll emerged as an early Jungian psychotherapist. In 1923 he spent a year with Gurdjieff and later spent several years with Ouspensky. In his mature life he founded his own groups based upon his understanding of his teachers' ideas, and ultimately became known as one of the most perceptive of their interpreters. The problems of traveling and meeting with his groups during World War II spurred his putting his insights on paper, a practice he continued until his death on August 30, 1953.

Nictalopes

Name given to human beings who can see in the dark. They are extremely rare. For example, a Dr. Tentin of Paris reported in 1874 the case of Marie Verdun, a girl of 18:

“Although her eyes do not present any special morbid character she is forced to keep her eyelids closed during the day, and to cover her head with a thick veil. On the other hand, when the shutters of the room are hermetically fastened, she reads and writes perfectly in the deepest darkness.” Auguste Müller, the Stuttgart somnambulist, saw perfectly well and recognized all persons and objects in the greatest darkness.

In view of the remarkable precision with which objects move in the darkness of the séance room, it was suggested that some mediums might be nictalopes. As, however, the same precision has been observed when the medium goes into trance, the theory as a normal explanation seems untenable. (See also eyeless sight)

Nielsen, Einer (d. 1965)

Danish materialization medium whose phenomena were first publicized by the report on experiments recorded by Baron Schrenck-Notzing in his book Physikalische Phaenomene des Mediumismus (1920). In 1922 in Christiania, Oslo, Nielsen was pronounced a fraud but seemed to have completely reinstated himself in 1924 in Reykjavik, in sittings for the Psychical Research Society of Iceland. The report of the novelist Einar H. Kvaran, endorsed by scientists and other people of high standing, recorded the materialization of forms, sometimes two appearing simultaneously near the medium while he himself was within view. Levitation and other telekinetic phenomena were also seen in abundance.

After his exposure in 1922, Nielsen refused to sit with researchers. However, that did not prevent further exposure. Several years later in Copenhagen, he was accused of fraud by Johs. Carstensen, the leader of his own circle, and a convinced Spiritualist. After his exposure in a pamphlet, the medium went to court but lost his case in April 1932. He continued to work but was never considered credible again by people outside of his small circle of influence. He died February 26, 1965.

Nielsen, Winnifred Moon (1917–)

Assistant professor of psychology who experimented in the field of parapsychology. She was born on August 16, 1917, in Key West, Florida, and later studied at the University of Florida (B.A., 1958; Ph.D., 1962). Even before completing her first college degree, she worked for two years as a research fellow at the Parapsychology Laboratory, Duke University (1954–56). She later joined the faculty in psychology at Mary Washington College, University of Virginia. She was a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association. She investigated relationships between psi and personality.

Professor of theology at the University of Iceland who became convinced by experiences with the medium Indridi Indridason that modern Spiritualism was identical with primitive Christianity. Three lectures in which he affirmed this faith were published in a small book: Mes Expériences en Spiritualisme Experimentale. Nielsson died in 1928.

Niflheim

The region of everlasting cold, mist, and darkness in Teutonic mythology. It is situated north of Midgard (middle earth—the present human abode), across the river Gjol. It was into this region that the god Odin banished the goddess Hel to rule over the worlds of the dead. The lowest depths are named Nastrond—"Strand of the Dead."

Nightmare

Possibly deriving from the Old English night and mara, a specter, indicating a terrifying dream. It is said to be caused by a disorder of the digestive functions during sleep, inducing the temporary belief that some animal or demon is sitting on the chest. Among primitive people it was thought that the affliction proceeded from the attentions of an evil spirit.

Johann Georg Keyser, in his work Antiquitates selectae Septentrionales et Celticae (1720), collected interesting particulars concerning the nightmare. Nactmar, he stated, is from Mair, an old woman, because the specter which appears to press upon the breast and impede the action of the lungs is generally in that form. The English and Dutch words coincide with the German. The French cochemar is Mulier incumbens or incubus. The Swedes use Mara alone, according to the Historia de omnibus Gothorum Sueonumque Regibus of J. Magnus (1554), where he stated that Valender, the son of Suercher, succeeded to the throne of his father, who was suffocated by a demon in his sleep, of that kind which by the scribes is called Mara.

Others "we suppose Germans," continued Keyser, "call it Hanon Tramp." The French peasantry called it Dianus which is a corruption either of Diana or of Daezmonium Meridianum for it seems there is a belief which Keyser thought might not improbably be derived from a false interpretation of an expression in the 91st Psalm ("the destruction that wasteth at noonday") that persons are most exposed to such attacks at that time and therefore women in childbed are then never left alone.

But though the Daezmonium Meridianum is often used for the Ephialtes, nevertheless it is more correctly any sudden and violent attack which is deprives the patient of his senses.

In some parts of Germany, the name given to this disorder is das Alpdructen, either from the "mass" which appears to press on the sufferer or from Alp or Alf (elf). In Franconia it is die Drud or das Druddructern, from the Druid or Weird Women, and there is a belief that it may not only be chased away, but be made to appear on the morrow in a human shape, and lend something required of it by the following charm: "Druid tomorrow / So will I borrow."

These Druids, it seems were not only in the habit of riding men, but also horses, and in order to keep them out of the stables, the salutary pentalpha (which bears the name of Drudenfuss (Druids foot) should be written on the stable doors, in consecrated chalk on the night of St. Walburgh. It should also be mentioned that the English familiar appellation "Trot" as traced to "Druid," "a decrepit old woman such as the Sagas might be," and the same might perhaps be said of a Scottish Saint, Triduana or Tredwin.

In the Glossarium Suiogothicum of Johann Ihre (1769), a somewhat different account of the Mara is given. Here again, we find the "witch-riding" of horses, against which a stone amulet was suggested by the antiquarian John Aubrey, similar to one described below.

Among the incantations by which the nightmare may be chased away, Reginald Scot recorded the following in his Discovery of Witchcraft (1584):

St. George, St. George, or lady's knight,
He walked by day so did he by night:
Until such times as he her found,
He her beat and he her bound,
Until her troth to him plight,
He would not come to her that night.

"Item," continued this author, "hand a stone over the afflicted person's bed, which stone hath naturally such a hole in it, as wherein a string may be put through it, and so be hanged over the diseased or bewitched party, be it man, woman, or horse."

Readers of these lines may be reminded of the similar charm which Shakespeare put into the mouth of Edgar as Mad Tom in King Lear:

Saint Withold footed thrice the wold:
He met the night-mare and her ninefold
Bid her alight,
And her troth plight
And aroint thee, witch, aroint thee.

Another charm of earlier date occurs in Chaucer's Miller's Tale. When the simple Carpenter discovers the crafty Nicholas in his feigned abstraction, he thinks he may perhaps be haggard, and address him thus:

I crouch from the Elves and fro wikid wightes
And there with the night-spell he seide arightes,
On four halvis of the house about,
And on the dreshfold of the dore without,
'Jesus Christ, and seint Benedight,
Blesse this house from evrey wikid wight,
Fro the night's mare, the wite paternoster,
Where wennist thou Seint Peter's sister.

A later author has pointed to some other formularies, and has noticed the Asmodeus was the fiend of most evil repute on these occasions. In the Otia Imperialia of Gervase of Tilbury, some other protecting charms are said to exist.

To turn the medical history of the incubus, Pliny recommended two remedies for this complaint, one of which was the herbal remedy wild peony seed. Another, which it would not be easy to discover in any modern pharmacopoeia, was a decoction in wine and oil of the tongue, eyes, liver, and bowels of a dragon, wherewith, after it has been left to cool all night in the open air, the patient should be anointed every morning and evening.

Dr. Bond, a physician, who stated that he himself was much afflicted with the nightmare, published an Essay on the Incubus in 1753. At the time at which he wrote, medical attention appears to have been very little called to the disease, and some of the opinions hazarded were sufficiently wild and inconclusive. Thus, a certain Dr. Willis said it was owing to some incongruous matter which is mixed with the nervous fluid in the cerebellum (de Anima Brutorum), while Bellini thought it imaginary and to be attributed to the idea of some demon which existed in the mind the day before.

Both of these writers might have known better if they would have turned to Fuchsius (with whom Dr. Bond appeared to be equally acquainted), who in his work de Curandi Ratione, published as early as 1548, had an excellent chapter (I, 31) on the causes, symptoms, and cure of nightmare, in which he attributed it to repletion and indigestion, and recommends the customary discipline.

Much of Gothic literature has been ascribed to dreams and nightmares. Horace Walpole's famous story The Castle of Otranto (1764) derived from a dream in which Walpole saw upon the uppermost banister of a great staircase a vision of a gigantic hand in armor.

In 1816, Mary Shelley had a gruesome and vivid nightmare which was the basis for her story Frankenstein.

Nearly seventy years later, novelist Robert Louis Stevenson had a nightmare that inspired his famous story The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, which he completed in only three days.

Bram Stoker's immortal creation of Dracula (1897) was claimed to be the result of a nightmare after a supper of dressed crab, although clearly many of the elements in the story had been germinating in the author's mind much earlier. Many horror stories have also been inspired nightmares. (See also fiction; Succubus)

Nirmala Devi Srivastava (1923–)

Modern Hindu teacher, and wife of a United Nations diplomat. She was born on March 21, 1923, in Chindawara, a small hill station near Nagpur, India. Although born into a Christian family, she has embraced the concept of the basic truth of all religions in a universal teaching, based on ancient Hindu concepts of kundalini, the latent power believed to reside in the human organism and to be an evolutionary force in nature. Kundalini operates as a psycho-physical force in human beings, as the dynamic of sexual activity and also, when properly aroused, as the mechanism of higher consciousness and God-realization.

Kundalini yoga is concerned with the opening of chakras or psychic centers in the body, culminating in an energy flow to the highest center in the head. The arrival of kundalini energy in the top of the head is believed to result in an expansion of consciousness and mystical awareness.

On May 5, 1970, Nirmala Devi experienced the awakening of the sahasrara chakra (the highest center) through kundalini arousal and perceived a vision of her ability to communicate this arousal to other individuals (an ability generally termed shaktipat). She began teaching other people a technique called Sahaja Yoga (inborn technique) in order to transform their lives.

A center was established in New Delhi, India, and through the decade centers came into being in Great Britain, Australia, France, Switzerland, Hong Kong, Canada, and more recently in the United States. Known to her followers as "Mataji," Nirmala Devi travels to centers abroad, keeping contact in different countries. A bimonthly magazine, Nirmala Yoga, is published from the international headquarters at 43, Banglow Road, Delhi 110007, India. In the west the movement may be contacted at Nirmala Palace, 99 Nightingale Ln., Clapham South, Balham, London, SW12, United Kingdom or at 12416 Reva St., Cerritos, CA 90701.

Nixon, Queenie (ca. 1918–1989)

British transfiguration medium. Her psychic gifts manifested in childhood, when she grew up in the care of two aunts, both Spiritualist mediums. She spent 35 years as a medium, traveling widely in Europe, North America, and Australia. In addition to trance communications through her spirit guide "Paul," she manifested the rare phenomenon of transfiguration, when her features reportedly took on the appearance of deceased persons speaking through her.

These transfiguration demonstrations would sometimes last as long as three hours, with various personalities manifesting. In 1967, infrared photographs captured a record of such appearances, including what appeared to be clouds of ectoplasm around her face. Two newspapers accused her of fraud, but the reporters in each incident had neither interviewed her nor attended her sésances. She died at the age of 71, following several heart attacks.

Noah's Ark Society for Physical Mediumship

Noah's Ark Society for Physical Mediumship originated on April 25, 1990, in a Spiritualist home circle in Ilkeston, Derbyshire, England. The people sitting in attempt to communicate heard an independent voice message (heard apart from any of their member's speaking), that urged those present to form an organization specifically devoted to the promotion of physical mediumship and the development of mediums in whose present physical mediumship occurs. The voice identified himself as Noah Zerdin, a Spiritualist known for his having founded The Link, a network of Spiritualists groups built around small groups that sat for spirit contact in their homes. Zerdin had been the mentor of Leslie Flint, who died in 1994.

Physical mediumship includes those paranormal phenomena that has an effect upon the medium, others present, or an object in the immediate space where spirit contact is being attempted. It would include the materialization of spirit entities, apports, transfiguration (when a spirit's face is superimposed on that of the medium), psychic photography, direct voice through a trumpet, independent voices, and electronic voice phenomena (imposition of voices on an electronic tape). Such physical mediumship has all but disappeared in the wake of discoveries of numerous fraudulent mediums. Most of these phenomena have never been known to occur apart from stage magic.

Soon after its founding, the society began promoting what it termed the safe practice of physical mediumship and encouraged the development of home circles for the development of its practice. The society also holds weekend seminars, limited to society members, which incorporate experimental sésances. The society now claims some functioning physical mediums among its members. The Society is not affiliated with any religious body, though it recognizes its primary members appear to be Spiritualists.

Noah's Ark Society operates primarily in England, though it claims affiliates in other countries. It began publishing the Noah's Ark Society Newsletter soon after its formation. The Newsletter became The Ark Review in 1988, which includes speculative articles on physical mediumship as well as accounts of the experiences of affiliated home circles with physical mediumship. The society supports an Internet site at <http://home.clara.net/noahsark/ind1.htm>.

Noetics

Term used by scientific writer Charles A. Musès and others to denote the science of consciousness and its alterations. He noted in 1977, "Noetics is concerned with the nature, alterations and potentials of consciousness, and especially human consciousness." (This parapsychological use of "noetic" is, of course, distinct from its prior use as a synonym for "noachian," meaning pertaining to Noah and his period.)

An earlier use of the word noetic in relation to states of consciousness was in the article "Psychic and Noetic Action" by Theosophist Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891), originally published in the journal Lucifer (October–December 1890) during the last years of her life. In this article, Blavatsky equated noetic with manasic (deriving from manas, a Sanskrit term for mind) and compared materialistic psychological views of her time with ancient Hindu religious teachings and occultism. She concluded that there is a higher noetic character of the mind principle than individual ego, a "spiritual-dynamical" force relating to divine consciousness, as distinct from mechanistic psychological dogmas or passive psychicism. This interesting article was reprinted in volume 3 of Studies in Occultism, a series of reprinted articles by Blavatsky.

Musès's use of noetics has been picked up by Edgar D. Mitchell for his psychical research organization, the Institute of Noetic Sciences.

Nolan, Finbarr (1952–)

Contemporary Irish healer who is the seventh son of a seventh son, and was thus, according to folk tradition, destined to begin healing by touch. He was born October 2, 1952, at Loch Gowna, county Cavan, Republic of Ireland. His mother stated "I knew . . . God would give him the power to heal." There were requests for healing when Nolan was only three months old, but his mother insisted that healing wait until the boy was at least two years old. At that time, a man brought his five-year-old child, who was suffering from ringworm. Nolan's mother circled the spots with holy water, making the sign of the cross in the middle, then placed the two-year-old Nolan's hand on each spot in turn, while she prayed for healing and asked her son to repeat the prayers after her. She claims that the ringworm was cured after two visits.

However, Nolan did not immediately undertake regular healing, although at the age of nine he touched the paralyzed hand of a local hotel proprietor and the hand became normal in three days' time. The father of this man was confined to a wheelchair with severe arthritis, but the day after Nolan touched him he was able to use his hands, and a month later he had recovered sufficiently to resume his job as a butcher.

At the age of sixteen, while still attending school, Nolan was asked to go to Donegal to cure an aunt. She notified the local newspaper, with the result that the young Nolan arrived to find a crowd of three hundred people and a television film crew. For several weeks afterward, some five thousand people a day came to his home for healing, and he touched them in groups of 14 or 15 at a time in the kitchen of the house. After that Nolan decided to leave school and devote himself full time to healing.

His reputation as a healer spread rapidly, and visitors came from around the world for treatment. Since county Cavan is located near the border of Northern Ireland, the political unrest and disorders began to discourage visitors, so Nolan moved with his parents and brothers to a house in the suburbs of Dublin. Here the large number of visitors seeking healing soon made it difficult for the family to live a normal life in an average-sized house, so Nolan hired halls and hotel rooms for regular clinics.

In the early period, Nolan had been influenced by his mother's religious outlook and used holy water, making the sign of the cross when touching each patient, but eventually he discarded such specifically Catholic tradition. As he said: "It deterred a lot of Protestants and I have nearly as many Protestant patients at my clinic as I do Catholic." Moreover he came to believe that his healing power had nothing to do with religion, and rejected the term "faith healer." He stated: "People should understand my healing has nothing to do with faith; I believe my power is a gift . . . I've proved that faith is not needed by curing animals and babies." Indeed, he became well known for treating injured race horses, and one horse he treated won nine races afterward.

His healing power appears to be in his right hand, and he therefore places it on each part of a patient's body that is afflicted. He lays his hand on the patient for several seconds and does not himself feel anything unusual happening, although patients often state that they feel a sensation of heat. His healing technique was monitored at a Belfast hospital, and it was found that during healing sessions there were changes in his respiration, pulse rate, and the electrical potential of his skin.

Like other seventh son healers, he has found that three visits are usually necessary. Patients sometimes feel worse after the first healing session, usually a sign that some changes have commenced. Healing is usually consolidated at the second and third visits.

Most patients pay a small voluntary contribution for healing, but some wealthier individuals have been very generous. An elderly lady in New York suffering from rheumatoid arthritis paid for Nolan's 6,000-mile journey and gave him an additional check for several thousand dollars. Nolan has also flown to Washington to treat a young Vietnamese war soldier. Nolan has held clinics in London as well as the United States and is credited with some remarkable cures.

An interesting experiment with Nolan was carried out by Robert E. Willner, diplomate of the Board of Family Practice, in his office in Florida. Willner selected ten patients on the basis of severity of their disease and failure to respond to multiple attempts at medical therapy. Nolan was introduced to them as "Dr. Finn, a medical student from the medical school in Dublin, Ireland." His function was ostensibly to confirm Willner's observations and provide an independent evaluation of each patient's disease process. The ten patients were involved with the experiment for three visits a week over a period of two weeks. Under these conditions, Nolan's touching appeared part of normal medical examination, so suggestion or placebo effect was eliminated, as no therapy was indicated.

Willner reported as follows:

"Four of the ten patients were completely unaffected by the examinations; five patients showed definite response of a positive nature and the improvement was thought to be of significant nature, in some cases 60% to 100% improvement. Two of these cases were extremely difficult and showed dramatic results. . . . It is also extremely important to note that all of these patients have been under the care of extremely fine specialists in the fields to which their diseases were related. Except for the increased attention that the patients were getting, I am not aware of any other positive influencing factor on the progress of the disease in any of them. One would expect that a patient in this setting would continue with their symptomatology in the hope that they would be chosen for the continuation of the experiment because their symptoms persisted. . . . The patients were not charged for their visits. Therefore, monetary incentive was absent.”

North American UFO Federation

A short-lived organization, founded in 1983 with the object of uniting other UFO organizations in an effort (1) to study and resolve the UFO phenomenon, (2) to develop a standard manual, reporting form, and vocabulary for investigation and reporting UFO sightings, (3) to inform the general public through educational materials and speakers, and (4) to provide a forum for discussion. The federation compiled a library and planned to develop and maintain a computer file of UFO reports and to establish a speakers bureau. The federation was headquartered in Los Altos, California.

In a possible remnant of pagan beliefs, some old Christian churches in Europe have a bricked-up doorway on the north side. There is an old tradition that witches used to enter on the north, which is connected with superstitions concerning the devil.

Norton, Rosalind (1917–1979)

Rosalind Norton, an Australian occultist and avant-garde artist whose life anticipated the modern Wiccan movement, was born in Dunedin, New Zealand. As a child she had a vision of a shining dragon beside her bed, one of several events that convinced her of the existence of a spirit world. When she was seven, her family moved to Sydney, Australia. As she grew into her teen years, she felt increasingly alienated from mainstream life and by her 14th birthday decided to make her own way and express her unique vision in her art. During her years at East Sydney Technical College, she developed a deep interest in witchcraft and magic and began reading Éliphas Lévi, Dion Fortune, and Aleister Crowley.

After college Norton supported herself with a variety of menial jobs in King’s Cross, where she had moved, but increasingly lived for her art and occult life. She experimented with self-hypnosis as a means of inducing a trance state during which she would produce her art. Meanwhile she continued her reading in the occult and Eastern religion. Her paintings became increasingly demonic complete with ghouls, werewolves, and even vampires. She also increasingly focused her subconscious on Pan, the ancient Greek deity, whose spirit she felt pervaded the Earth. She decorated her apartment with a Pan mural, did rituals invoking his presence, and felt him when she entered her trance states.

In 1949 she moved with her husband, Gavin Greenlees, to Melbourne. The next year, she had her first major encounter with the law. An exhibit of her art at the University of Melbourne was raided by the police, and Norton was charged with obscenity; the court ruled in her favor. In 1952, a limited edition book of her art was judged to contain two obscene pictures; the publisher was fined, and future copies were produced with the two pages blacked out.

Then in 1955, a woman who was being questioned by police on other matters began to make statements claiming that Norton was leading black masses as part of a Satanic cult. She described her as the “black witch of King’s Cross,” a label that would be frequently repeated by the press. While the woman later recanted some of her statements, they had already made their way to the newspapers, and Norton was forced to defend her attachment to Pan. No sooner had the issue died, than a film of her and her husband performing a ritual to Pan, which had been stolen from their apartment, found its way to the police. The film included some sex scenes, and the pair were arrested again. The trials of both the men who had stolen the film and of Norton entertained the public for almost two years. In the midst of the publicity, a café where Norton’s paintings were hanging was raided and the owner fined. Norton and Greenlees were eventually found guilty of making obscene pictures.

After the lengthy court proceeding, Norton became reclusive and stayed out of the public eye for the remaining 20 years of her life. She died in King’s Cross on December 5, 1979. In the years since, her work has been reevaluated and her artistic accomplishments praised by a new generation of art critics. Her magical career has found appreciation by the expanding Australian Wiccan movement who now see her as a herald of their community.

Norton, Thomas (d. ca. 1477)

The exact date of this alchemist’s birth is wrapped in mystery, and little is recorded about his life in general. But at least it is known that he was born in Bristol, England, towards the end of the fourteenth century, and that in the year 1436 he was elected to represent that town in Parliament. This suggests that he was an upright and highly-esteemed person, and the conjecture is strengthened by the fact that Edward IV made him a member of his privy council and employed him repeatedly as an ambassador.

At an early age Norton showed curiosity concerning alchemy, demonstrating his predilection by attempting to make the personal acquaintance of George Ripley, sometime canon of Bridlington, who was reputedly a man of extraordinary learning, author of numerous alchemical works. For many months Norton sought Ripley in vain, but at length the canon, yielding to the other’s importunity, wrote to him in the following manner: “I shall not longer delay; the time is come; you shall receive this grace. Your honest desire and approved virtue, your love of truth, wisdom and long perseverance, shall accomplish your sorrowful desires. It is necessary that, as soon as convenient, we speak together face to face, lest I should by writing betray my trust. I will make you my heir and brother in this art, as I am setting out to travel in foreign countries. Give thanks to God, Who next to His spiritual servants, honours the sons of this sacred science.”

After receiving this very friendly and encouraging letter, Norton hurried straightway to Ripley's presence, and thereafter for more than a month the two were constantly together. The elder man taught the novice many things, and he even promised that, if Norton showed himself an apt and worthy pupil, he would impart to him the secret of the philosophers' stone. In due course this promise was fulfilled, though it is reported that Norton's own alchemical research met with various disappointments.

On one occasion, for instance, when he had almost perfected a certain tincture, his servant absconded with the crucible containing the precious fluid; while at a later time, when the alchemist was at work on the same experiment and thought he was just about to reach the goal, his entire paraphernalia was stolen by a mayoress of Bristol. This defeat must have been doubly galling to the unfortunate philosopher, for soon afterwards the mayoress became very wealthy, presumably as a result of her theft.

Norton himself does not appear to have reaped pecuniary benefit at any time from his erudition, but to have been a comparatively poor man throughout the whole of his life. This is a little surprising, for his Ordinall of Alchemy was a popular work in the Middle Ages and was repeatedly published. The original edition was anonymous, but the writer's identity has been determined because the initial syllables in the first six lines of the seventh chapter compose the following couplet:

Tomas Norton of Briseto A parfet master ye maie him
trowe.

Norton died circa 1477, and his predilections descended to one of his great grandsons, Samuel Norton. The younger Norton was born in 1548, studied science at St. John's College, Cambridge, and afterward became a justice of the peace and sheriff of Somersetshire. He died about 1604, and in 1630 a collection of his alchemistic tracts was published at Frankfort.

The Nostradamian

Monthly journal that analyzed the predictions of Nostradamus (1503–1566), discussing prophecies fulfilled and interpreting those that have not yet come to pass. Last known address: Nostradamus Research, P.O. Box 6463, Lincoln, NE 68506.

Nostradamus (1503–1566)

Medieval French physician and prophet. Nostradamus was born Michel de Nostredame on December 24, 1503, in St. Remey de Provence. A short time before his birth his Jewish family had changed its name from Gassonet to Nostredame as a reaction to a “convert or go into exile” order of the government in Provence. He received his medical training at Montpellier. He sometimes voiced dissension with the teachings of the Catholic priests, who dismissed the study of astrology and the assertions of Copernicus that the Earth and other planets revolved around the sun—contrary to the Christian appraisal of the heavens. Nostradamus's family warned him to hold his tongue, since he could be easily persecuted because of his Jewish background. Earlier, from his grandfathers he had secretly learned mystical areas of Jewish wisdom, including the Kabbalah and alchemy. He graduated in 1525 and was licensed as a physician. Four years later he received his full medical degree. He established his reputation by treating the ill during the plague in southern France. For a while he lived in Agen to work with Julius Caesar Scaliger, a prominent physician of the day, but moved on to Aix-en-Provence and Lyons during the 1530s. He eventually settled in Salon.

Over the years Nostradamus (the Latin version of his name) became a practitioner of astrology and related occult arts. He published his first book, an astrological almanac (issued annually for several years), in 1550. Five years later he issued a popular book of recipes for cosmetics and various medical remedies. That same year he also published the first edition of the book from which his current fame is largely derived, The Centuries.

In reference to Nostradamus's writings, a “century” referred to a grouping of one hundred verses, each verse being a four-line poem called a quatrain. It was this work that brought Nostradamus his fame. The 1555 edition contained the first three centuries and 53 quatrains of “Century Four.” A second edition two years later had 640 quatrains and Centuries Eight through Ten were published as a separate volume in 1558. The first English edition, published in 1672, also had eight additional quatrains from the “Century Seven” not in the French editions. As a result of the success of the first edition, in 1556 Nostradamus was invited to Paris as a guest of the French queen Catherine de Médicis. With the financial support she gave him, he was able to complete his writings of the prophetic verses.

The quatrains were written in a cryptic and symbolic fashion requiring some interpretation and thus offering room for a wide variety of understandings of exactly to which events and persons Nostradamus was making reference. Among the most famous of quatrains is one often seen as referring to the London Fire of 1666 (though more critical interpreters see a reference to the burning of Protestants by Queen Mary I of England, a contemporary of Nostradamus):

The blood of the just shall be wanting in London,
Burnt by thunderbolts of twenty three the Six(es),
The ancient dame shall fall from [her] high place,
Of the same sect many shall be killed.

Nostradamus died in June 1566 of congestive heart failure. He was succeeded by a colleague, Jean-Aimé de Chavigny, also a physician, who immediately began work on a biography. De Chavigny also published his interpretations of 126 of the quatrains. Over the centuries a number of additional interpreters have arisen (including Theophilus de Garencieres, who translated the quatrains into English (1672)), all of whom have championed the reputed accomplishments of Nostradamus as a seer of future events and emphasized those quatrains presaging events soon to occur. Garancieres's effort was marred by his acceptance of two fake quatrains written to attack French Roman Catholic Cardinal Jules Mazarin, who also served as the French prime minister.

Modern interest in Nostradamus, which has spawned a massive popular literature during the last generation, began with Charles Ward's work, Oracles of Nostradamus (1891). One prominent student of the quatrains, Edgar Leoni, submitted his lengthy treatise as a master's thesis at Harvard University (1961). Interpreters claim Nostradamus predicted Hitler's rise to power as well as the explosion of the U.S. space shuttle Challenger in 1986. The popular interest in Nostradamus has been countered by the observations of a variety of historians who have offered other explanations of his prophetic verse (often to the detriment of his reputation), and by some modern psychic debunkers, such as stage magician James Randi.

In ancient Irish romance, the last of the sorceress-daughters of Conaran. Having put Finn Mac Cummal under taboo to send his men in single combat against her as long as she wished, she was slain by Goll Mac Morna, her sister's slayer.

Numerology

A popular interpretive and prediction system deriving from the mystic values ascribed to numbers. In Jewish mysticism, for example, gematria refers to the traditional association of numbers with Hebrew letters, and the practice of seeking hidden meanings in words by systematically converting them into numbers.

Modern numerology was popularized by the palmist and fortune-teller "Cheiro" (Count Louis Hamon), who developed a system of what he called "fadic" numbers. These were arrived at by adding together all the digits in the subject's birth date to produce a number of destiny to which special planetary and other significance was then attached.

In general, numerology systems assign numerical values to the letters of one's name and/or birthplace. These are added together to ascertain a basic number, which has a special symbolic interpretation, much as astrological types are traditionally assigned particular characteristics of helpful and harmful influences. Sometimes lucky or unlucky numbers are also related to the 22 symbols of the major arcana of the Tarot pack.

Nurse, Rebecca (1621–1692)

Alleged witch executed at Salem Village (now Danvers), Massachusetts, in 1692. Rebecca Nurse was born Rebecca Towne in Yarmouth, England, and baptized on February 21, 1621. She was still a youth when her family moved to Massachusetts and settled at Topsfield. At some point she married Francis Nurse, and they settled at Salem. In 1678 they purchased a farm near Salem Village. They had four sons and four daughters. Until 1692 Rebecca Nurse was well-respected by her neighbors.

After several young girls in the community began to complain of being attacked by the spectres of several women who were accused of witchcraft, accounts of such affliction grew. One of the girls interrupted a church service with her accusations, and afterward the Nurses stopped going to church.

Eventually the young girls singled out Rebecca Nurse, and on March 23, 1692, she was arrested and, although sick at the time, confined to jail. During her initial hearing a number of her acquaintances spoke highly of her. The primary evidence against her were the spectral allegations, the girls' claim she afflicted them through her spirit. Possibly her deafness, a condition she developed in later years, and her subsequent inability to respond adequately to questions put to her tilted the jury against her in the end. She was finally excommunicated from her church and was hung on July 19, 1692, the same day as Goodwife Good and three other convicted witches were hung.

Oak-Apples

An oak-apple is a spongy, brightly colored gall found on the leaf bud of oak trees; it is globular in shape. In folklore, oak-apples could be used in divination. To discover whether a child was bewitched, three oak-apples were dropped into a basin of water under the child’s cradle, at the same time preserving the strictest silence. If the oak-apples floated, the child was not fascinated, but if they sank, the child was believed to be bewitched.

Oak Tree

Much folklore belief surrounds the oak tree. From ancient times it has been regarded as sacred tree. The Druids venerated the oak and performed many of their rites under the shadow of its branches. When St. Augustine (the sixth-century archbishop of Canterbury) preached Christianity to the ancient Britons, he stood under an oak tree.

The ancient Hebrews also evidently held the oak as a sacred tree. It is believed that Abraham received his heavenly visitors under an oak. Rebekah’s nurse was buried under an oak, called afterward the oak of weeping. Jacob buried the idols of Shechem under an oak. It was under the oak of Ophra that Gideon saw the angel sitting who gave him instructions as to what he was to do to free Israel.

When Joshua and Israel made a covenant to serve God, a great stone was set up in evidence under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord. The prophet sent to prophesy against Jeroboam was found at Bethel sitting under an oak. Saul and his sons were buried under an oak, and, according to Isaiah, idols were made of oak wood. Abimelech was made king beneath an oak located in Shechem.

As late as the eighteenth century the oak was used in curing diseases. It was believed that a toothache could be cured by boring the tooth or gum with a nail to draw blood, and then driving the nail into an oak tree. Another folk belief was that a child with rupture could be cured by splitting an oak branch, and passing the child through the opening backwards three times; if the splits grew together the child would be cured.

It was widely believed that carrying acorns brought long life and good luck, since the oak tree itself is used as a symbol of strength and endurance.

Oaten, Ernest W(alter) (ca. 1937)

Prominent British Spiritualist, and former president of the International Federation of Spiritualists. He was president of the Spiritualists’ National Union from 1915 and edited the journal Two Worlds (1919–36). He was also a medium and believed that his leading articles were inspired by the spirit of Emma Hardinge Britten, whose work had inspired the formation of the Union in 1890. As chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Spiritualists National Union he pressed for reform of the Fortune Telling Act, the British law relating to mediumship.

OBE (or OOB or OOB) See Out-of-the-Body Travel

Obeah

West Indian witchcraft. The term is believed to derive from an Ashanti word, obayifo, a wizard or witch, although there are claims that it refers to Obi, a West African snake god. Author M. G. Lewis (1775–1818) spent some time in Jamaica, where his father owned large estates, and reported cases of obeah. In his posthumously published Journal of a West India Proprietor (1834), he wrote an entry on January 12, 1816, describing how ten months earlier a black man “of very suspicious manners and appearance” was arrested,

“. . . and on examination there was found upon him a bag containing a great variety of strange materials for incantations; such as thunder-stones, cat’s ears, the feet of various animals, human hair, fish bones, the teeth of alligators, etc.: he was conveyed to Montego Bay; and no sooner was it understood that this old African was in prison, than depositions were poured in from all quarters from negroes who deposed to having seen him exercise his magical arts, and, in particular, to his having sold such and such slaves medicines and charms to deliver them from their enemies; being, in plain English, nothing else than rank poisons. He was convicted of Obeah upon the most indubitable evidence. The good old practice of burning had fallen into disrepute; so he was sentenced to be transported, and was shipped off the island, to the great satisfaction of persons of all colours—white, black, and yellow.”

Jamaican legislation of 1760 enacted that “any Negro or other Slave who shall pretend to any Supernatural Power and be detected in making use of any materials relating to the practice of Obeah or Witchcraft in order to delude or impose upon the Minds of others shall upon Conviction thereof before two Magistrates and three Freeholders suffer Death or Transportation.” (See also Voodoo; West Indian Islands)

Obercit, Jacques Hermann (1725–1798)

Swiss mystic and alchemist. He was born December 2, 1725, in Arbon, Switzerland, the son of a scientist keenly interested in Hermetic philosophy. Early in his life he decided to search for the philosophers' stone, hoping to resuscitate the fortunes of his family, which were at a low ebb. The young man worked strenuously, maintaining that whoever would triumph in this endeavor must not depend on scientific skill alone but rather on constant communion with God.

Notwithstanding this theory, he soon found himself under the ban of the civic authorities, who came to his laboratory and forced him to forego further experiments, declaring that these constituted a danger to public health and safety. Obercit was incensed and appears to have left and gone to live for some time thereafter with a brother of the noted physiognomist Johann Lavater. At a later date, Obercit renounced the civilized world altogether and took up residence in the Alps.

However, he did not live the solitary life of a hermit, since according to his own account, he took as bride a shepherdess named Theantis. Obercit's writings include Disquisitio de Universali Methodo Medendi (1767) and Défense du Mysticisme et de la Vie Solitaire (1775). He died at Weimar, Germany, February 2, 1798.

Oberion

One of three spirits (the others were “Andrea Malchus” and “Inchubus”) said to have been raised up by the parson of Lesingham and Sir John of Leiston in Norfolk, England, ca. 1528.

Objective Phenomena

Term used in psychical research, together with “subjective phenomena” as an alternative classification to “physical” and “mental” phenomena, terms which emerged out of the study of Spiritualism.

Object Reading

A term for psychometry, in which the operator may form impressions of events relating to an object associated with those events, usually by holding the object in his or her hand.

Obsession and Possession

Obsession, from Latin obsidere (to besiege), is a form of insanity caused, according to traditional belief, by the persistent attack of an invading spirit from outside the individual. Obsession is the opposite of possession, control by an invading spirit from within. Both, however, involve the usurpation of the person's individuality and control of the body by a foreign and incarnate entity.

In the Western Christian context, both obsession and possession, but especially possession, have been viewed as completely negative, a perspective somewhat enforced by the modern concern for the autonomous individual, possession implying a giving over of one's freedom. In most cultures, however, there is a distinction between dysfunctional possession and possession that occurs voluntarily, usually in a religious context. Numerous religions, like Spiritualism, are possession-oriented religions, in which a central feature is the voluntary possession of members by what is believed to be a deity, a spirit, or a deceased person. These religious functionaries may periodically become possessed, usually in a ritual context, during their entire active lives, but without the otherwise dysfunctional consequences so evident in pathological possessed states.

During the 1960s anthropologist Erika Bourguignon conducted a study of possession in 488 societies about which data was available. Seventy-four percent of them maintained some belief in spirit possession, of which more than half had some form of positive institutionalized structure in which possession occurred and was appropriated by believers.

Historical Background

This belief may be found in the earliest records of human history—in the ancient magic rites and in the pronouncements often used as charms against and for the exorcism of these invading influences. The oldest literary remains from India, Greece, and Rome are filled with references to possession. While there are passing references to demons and demon obsession or possession in sacred Jewish writings—such as the case of Saul, who was “troubled with an evil spirit from God” only to be relieved by the music of David's harp (1 Sam. 16:14–16)—it is with the Christian movement that a major emphasis on spirit possession emerges. Jesus regularly healed by casting possessing spirits out of the mentally ill. Crucial to later understanding of possessing spirits in the Western tradition are incidents such as Jesus' driving the legion of demons into the swine (thus demonstrating their existence apart from the psychology of the possessed individual) and Paul's driving out of the divining spirit who possessed a young woman of Thyatira (thus associating spirit possession with fortune-telling).

Plato, in the Republic, not only speaks of demons of various grades, but mentions a method of treating and providing for those obsessed by them. Sophocles and Euripides described the possessed, and mention of the subject is also found in Herodotus, Plutarch, Horace, and many other classical writers.

Appalling episodes in the Middle Ages can be traced to the unquestioned belief in possession and obsession by the Devil and his demonic legions. Many believed that all madness was caused by possession, the visible manifestation of the Evil One. Such madness had to be exorcised by charms and averted by the observance of sacred rites. In extreme cases the possessed body was to be burned and destroyed for the good of the tortured soul within. The rites of black magic, in all ages and places, deliberately evoked this possession by the Devil and his demons to obtain the benefit of the extensive knowledge it was believed they conferred and the consequent power and control over man and his destinies.

In the Middle Ages, when an intense belief in angels, saints, and devils flourished, the imagination of the individual was dominated by such beings.

A variation on the belief in obsession and possession can be found in the condition known as lycanthropy (the delusion that one has become a wolf), which afflicted large numbers of people in France and Germany in the fourteenth and sixteenth centuries.

The mania of flagellation took its rise in Perouse in the thirteenth century, caused by the panic accompanying an outbreak of the plague. Flagellants preached that there was no remission of sins (and dissipation of accompanying disasters such as epidemics) without their self-inflicted punishment offered as penance. Bands of them, gathering adherents everywhere, roamed through city and country, clad in scanty clothing on which were depicted skeletons, and with frenzied movements publicly lashed themselves. It was to these exhibitions the name "Dance of Death" was first applied.

The dancing mania, accompanied by aberration of mind and maniacal distortions of the body, was prevalent in Germany in the fourteenth century, and in the sixteenth century in Italy, where it was termed tarantism and was ascribed to the bite of the tarantula spider. The music and songs employed for the cure are still preserved. Edmund Parish, in his book Hallucinations and Illusions (1897), summarizes the activity of the dancers:

"If not reckoned as true chorea, the epidemic of dancing which raged in Germany and the Netherlands in the Middle Ages comes under this head. Appearing in Aix it spread in a few months to Liège, Utrecht and the neighbouring towns, visited Metz, Cologne and Strasburg (1418) and after lingering into the sixteenth century gradually died out. This malady consisted in convulsions, contortions accompanying the dancing, hallucinations and so forth. The attack could be checked by bandaging the abdomen as well as by kicks and blows on that part of the body. Music had a great influence on the dancers, and for this reason it was played in the streets in order that the attacks might by this means reach a crisis and disappear the sooner. Quite trifling circumstances could bring on these seizures, the sight of pointed shoes for instance, and of the colour red which the dancers held in horror. In order to prevent such outbreaks the wearing of pointed shoes was forbidden by the authorities. During their dance many of the afflicted thought they waded in blood, or saw heavenly visions."

Tying the dancing to possession, Parish continues,

"To this category also belongs the history of demoniacal possession. The belief of being possessed by spirits, frequently met with in isolated cases, appeared at certain periods in epidemic form. Such an epidemic broke out in Brandenburg, and in Holland and Italy in the sixteenth century, especially in the convents. In 1350–60 it attacked the convent of St. Brigitta, in Xanthen, a convent near Cologne, and others. The nuns declared that they were visited by the Devil, and had carnal conversation with him. These and other 'possessed' wretches were sometimes thrown into dungeons, sometimes burnt. The convent of the Ursulines at Aix was the scene of such a drama (1609–11) where two possessed nuns, tormented by all kinds of apparitions, accused a priest of witchcraft on which charge he was burnt to death [see Urbain Grandier]. The famous case of the nuns of Loudun (1632–39) led to a like tragic conclusion, as well as the Louvier case (1642) in which the two chief victims found their end in life-long imprisonment and the stake."

Religious Possession

The widespread belief in and fear of magic and witchcraft produced some hallucinations. Certain levels of religious ecstasy partake of the same character, the difference being that they involve possession by and contact with so-called angelic or good (i.e., socially approved) spirits. The sacred books of all nations teem with instances of this and history can also furnish examples. The many familiar cases of ecstatic visions and revelations in the Torah may be cited, as well as those found in the legends of saints and martyrs, where they either appear as revelations from heaven or temptations of the Devil.

In the latter case, the sexologist Richard von Krafft-Ebing pointed out the close connection of religious ecstasy with sexual disturbances, especially in situations where the sexual drive was suppressed and diverted into religious activity. The religious ecstatic condition was frequently sought and induced. Von Krafft-Ebing noted as follows:

"Among Eastern and primitive peoples such as Hindus, American Indians, natives of Greenland, Kamtschatka and Yucatan, fetish-worshipping Negroes, and Polynesians, the ecstatic state accompanied with hallucinations is frequently observed, sometimes arising spontaneously, but more often artificially induced. It was known also among the nations of antiquity. The means most often employed to induce this state are beating of magic drums and blowing of trumpets, howlings and hour-long prayers, dancing, flagellation, convulsive movements and contortions, asceticism, fasting and sexual abstinence. Recourse is also had to narcotics to bring about the desired result. Thus the flyagaric is used in Western Siberia, in San Domingo the herb coca, tobacco by some tribes of American Indians, and in the East opium and hashish. The ancient Egyptians had their intoxicating drinks, and receipts for witch's salves and philtres have come down to us from medieval times."

In many countries this condition of possession was induced for a spectrum of purposes from the higher mystical and prophetic to mere fortune-telling. Anthropologist Edward Tylor, in his Primitive Culture (1871), testifies to the extent to which this belief in obsession and possession persisted into the nineteenth century: "It is not too much to assert that the doctrine of demoniacal possession is kept up, substantially the same theory to account for substantially the same facts, by half the human race, who thus stand as consistent representatives of their forefathers back in primitive antiquity."

Such beliefs persisted in the development of Spiritualism. Pioneer Spiritualist seer Andrew Jackson Davis developed a theory of obsession to account for forms of insanity and crime. The following passage taken from his book Diakka and Their Victims (1873) indicates this belief:

"The country of the diakka is where the morally deficient and the affectionately unclean enter upon a strange probation. . . . They are continually victimizing sensitive persons still in the flesh making sport of them and having a jolly laugh at the expense of really honest and sincere people. They [these demonlike spirits] teach that they would be elevated and made happy if only they could partake of whiskey and tobacco, or gratify their burning free-love propensities. . . . Being unprincipled intellectualities their play is nothing but pastime amusement at the expense of those beneath their influence."

Davis saw some of these creatures as having such a malignant and bloodthirsty nature as to incite the beings they possessed to murder.

Recorded Instances of Possession

The sixteenth-century writer Jean Boulaese told how 26 devils came out of the body of the possessed Nicoli of Laon:

"At two o'clock in the afternoon, the said Nicoli, being possessed of the Devil, was brought to the said church, where the said de Motta proceeded as before with the exorcism. In spite of all entreaty the said Beelzebub told them in a loud voice that he would not come out. Returning to their entreaties after dinner, the said de Motta asked him how many had come out, and he answered, 'twenty-six.' 'You and your followers,' then said de Motta, 'must now come out like the others.' 'No,' he replied, 'I will not come out here, but if you like to take me to Saint Restitute, we will come out there. It is sufficient for you that twenty-six are out.' Then the said de Motta asked for a convincing sign of how they had come out. For witness he told them to look in the garden of the treasury over the front gate, for they had taken and carried away three tufts (i.e., branches) from a green maypole (a small fir) and three slates from above the church of Liesse, made into a cross, as others in France commonly, all of which was found true as shown by the Abbot of Saint-Vincent, M. de Velles, Master Robert de May, canon of the Church Notre-Dame of Laon, and others."

The same author gave an account of the contortions of the possessed woman:

"As often as the reverend father swung the sacred host before her eyes, saying, 'Begone, enemy of God,' so did she toss from side to side, twisting her face towards her feet, and making horrible noises. Her feet were reversed, with the toes in the position of the heel, and despite the restraining power of eight of the men, she stiffened herself and threw herself into the air a height of six feet, the stature of a man, so that the attendants, sometimes even carried with her into the air, perspired at their work. And although they bore down with all their might, still could they not restrain her, and torn away from the restraining hands, she freed herself without any appearance of being at all ruffled.

“The people, seeing and hearing such a horrible sight, one so monstrous, hideous and terrifying cried out, ‘Jesus, have mercy on us!’ Some hid themselves, not daring to look; others, recognising the wild cruelty of such excessive and incredible torment, wept bitterly, reiterating piteously, ‘Jesus, have mercy on us!’ The reverend father then gave permission to those who wished to touch and handle the patient, disfigured, bent, and deformed, and with the rigidity of death. Chief among these were the would-be reformers, such men as Francois Santerre, Christofle, Pasquot, Gratian de la Roche, Masquette, Jean du Glas, and others well-known for their tendencies towards reform, all vigorous men. They all endeavored, but in vain, to straighten her limbs, and bring them to a normal position, and to open her eyes and mouth—it was futile. Further, so stiff and rigid was she, that the limbs would have broken rather than give, as also the nose and ears. And then, as she said afterwards, she was possessed, declaring that she was enduring incredible pain. That is, by the soul torment, the devil makes the body become stone or marble.”

A Dr. Ese expounded on the case of Sister Mary, one of Louviers’ nuns:

“The last was Sister Mary of St. Esprit, supposedly possessed by Dagon, a large woman, slender-waisted, and of good complexion, with no evidence of illness. She came into the refectory. . . head erect and eyes wandering from side to side, singing, dancing and skipping. Still moving about and touching lightly those around her, she spoke with an elegance of language expressive of the good feeling and good nature which were his (using the person of the devil). All this was done with movements and carriage alike haughty, following it up with a violence of blasphemy, then a reference to his dear little friend Magdalen, his darling and his favourite mistress. And then, without springing or using effort of any kind, she projected herself into a pane of glass and hanging on to a central bar of iron passed bodily through it, but on making an exit from the other side the command was given in Latin, ‘est in nomine Jesu rediret non per aliam sed per eadem viam.’ After some discussion and a definite refusal to return she, however, returned by the same route, whereupon the doctors examined her pulse and tongue, all of which she endured while laughing and discussing other things. They found no disturbance such as they had expected, nor any sign of the violence of her actions and words, her coming to being accompanied with some trivial remarks. The company then retired.”

As at Louviers, nuns at Auxonne also experienced a problem with possession, an account of which is in the Relation des Ursulines possédées d’Auxonne (ca. 1660):

“. . . the bishop of Chalons, with the intention of exorcising Denise Lamy, sent for her and when she was not found, he inwardly commanded her to come to him in the chapel of St. Anne where he was. It was striking to see the prompt obedience of the demon to this command, formulated merely in the mind, for in about a quarter of an hour a violent knocking was heard at the door of the chapel, as if by one hard pressed. On opening the door this girl entered the chapel abruptly, leaping and bounding, her face changed greatly and with high colour and sparkling eyes. So bold and violent was she that it was difficult to restrain her, nor would she allow the putting on of the stole which she seized and threw violently into the air despite the efforts of four or five clerics who did their best to stop her, so that finally it was proposed to bind her, but this was deemed too difficult in the condition in which she was.

“On another occasion, at the height of her frenzy. . . the demon was ordered to stop the pulse in one of her arms, and it was immediately done, with less resistance and pain than before. Immediate response was also made to the further order to make it return. The command being given to make the girl insensible to pain, she avowed that she was so, boldly offering her arm to be pierced and burnt as wished. The exorcist, fortified by his earlier experience, took a sufficiently long needle and drove it, full length, into the nail and flesh, at which she laughed aloud, saying that she felt nothing at all. Accordingly as he was ordered, blood was allowed to flow or not, and she herself took the needle and stuck it into different parts of her arm and hand. Further, one of the company took a pin and, having drawn out the skin a little above the wrist, passed it through and through so that the two ends were only visible, the rest of the pin being buried in the arm. Unless the order was given for some no blood issued, nor was there the least sign of feeling or pain.”

As proof of the possession of the Auxonne nuns, the same account continues:

“Violent agitation of the body only conceivable to those who have seen it. Beating of the head with all their might against the pavement or walls, done so often and so hard that it causes one to shudder on seeing it and yet they show no sign of pain, nor is there any blood, wound or contusion.

“The condition of the body in a position of extreme violence, where they support themselves on their knees with the head turned round and inclined towards the ground for a foot or so, which makes it appear as if broken. Their power of bearing, for hours together without moving, the head being lowered behind below the level of the waist; their power of breathing in this condition; the unruffled expression of the face which never alters during these disturbances; the evenness of the pulse; their coolness during these movements; the tranquil state they are in when they suddenly return and the lack of any quickening in the respirations; the turning back of the head, even to the ground, with marvelous rapidity. Sometimes the movement to and fro is done thirty or forty times running, the girl on her knees and with her arms crossed in front; at other times, in the same position with the head turned about, the body is wound around into a sort of semicircle, with results apparently incompatible with nature.

“Fearful convulsions, affecting all the limbs and accompanied with shouts and cries. Sometimes fear at the sight of certain phantoms and spectres by which they say they are menaced, causes such a change in their facial expression that those present are terrified; at other times there is a flood of tears beyond control and accompanied by groans and piercing cries. Again, the widely-opened mouth, eyes wild and showing nothing but the white, the pupil being turned up under cover of the lids—the whole returning to the normal at the mere command of the exorcist in conjunction with the sign of the cross.

“They have often been seen creeping and crawling on the ground without any help from the hands or feet; the back of the head or the forehead may be touching the soles of the feet. Some lie on the ground, touching it with the pit of the stomach only, the rest of the body, head, feet and arms, being in the air for some length of time. Sometimes, bent back so that the top of the head and the soles of the feet touch the ground, the rest of the body being supported in the air like a table, they walk in this position without help from the hands. It is quite common for them, while on their knees to kiss the ground, with the face twisted to the back so that the top of the head touches the soles of the feet. In this position and with the arms crossed on the chest they make the sign of the cross on the pavement with their tongues.

“A marked difference is to be noticed between their condition when free and uncontrolled and that which they show when controlled and in the heat of their frenzy. By reason of their sex and delicate constitutions as much as from illness they may be weak, but when the demon enters them and the authority of the church compels them to appear they may become at times so violent that all the power of four or five men may be unable to stop them. Even their faces become so distorted and changed that they are no longer recognisable. What is more astonishing is that after these violent transports, lasting sometimes three or four hours; after efforts which would make the strongest feel like resting for several days; after continuous shrieking and heart-breaking cries; when they become normal again—a momentary proceeding—they are unwearied and quiet, and the mind is as tranquil, the face as composed, the breathing as easy and the pulse as little changed as if they had not stirred out of a chair.

“It may be said, however, that among all the signs of possession which these girls have shown, one of the most surprising, and at the same time the most common, is the understanding of the thought and inward commands which are used every day by exorcists and priests, without there being any outward manifestation either by word or other sign. To be appreciated by them it is merely necessary to address them inwardly or mentally, a fact which has been verified by so many of the experiences during the stay of the bishop of Chalons and by any of the clergy, who wished to investigate, that one cannot reasonably doubt such particulars and many others, the details of which cannot be given here.”

Simon Goulart, in Histoires admirables et mémorables de nostre temps (2 vols., 1610), called many stories of demonic possession from demonologist Johan Weyer, including the following:

“Antoine Benivenius in the eighth chapter of the Livre des causes cachées des maladies tells of having seen a girl of sixteen years whose hands contracted curiously whenever she was taken with a pain in the abdomen. With a cry of terror her abdomen would swell up so much that she had the appearance of being eight months pregnant—later the swelling went down and, not being able to lie still, she tossed about all over the bed, sometimes putting her feet above her head as if trying a somersault. This she kept up throughout the throes of her illness and until it had gone down by degrees. When asked what had happened to her, she denied any remembrance of it. But on seeking the causes of this affection we were of opinion that it arose from a choking of the womb and from the rising of malignant vapours affecting adversely the heart and brain. We were at length forced to relieve her with drugs but these were of no avail and becoming more violent and congested she at last began to throw up long iron nails all bent, brass needles stuck into wax, and bound up with hair and a part of her breakfast—a mass so large that a man would have had difficulty in swallowing it all. I was afraid, after seeing several of these vomitings, that she was possessed by an evil spirit, who deluded those present while he removed these things and afterwards we heard predictions and other things given which were entirely beyond human comprehension.

“Meiner Clath, a nobleman living in the castle of Boutenbrouch in the duchy of Juliers, had a valet named William who for fourteen years had the torments of a possession by the devil, and when, at the instigation of the devil, he began to get ill, he asked for the curé of St. Gerard as confessor. . . who came to carry out his little part . . . but failed entirely. Seeing him with a swollen throat and discoloured face and with the fear of his suffocating, Judith, wife of Clath and an upright woman, with all in the house, began to pray to God. Immediately there issued from William’s mouth, among other odds and ends, the whole of the front part of the trousers of a shepherd, stones, some whole and other broken, small bundles of thread, a peruke such as women are accustomed to use, needles, a piece of the serge jacket of a little boy, and a peacock’s feather which William had pulled from the bird’s tail eight days before he became ill. Being asked the cause of his trouble he said that he had met a woman near Camphuse who had blown in his face and that his illness was the result of that and nothing else. Some time after he had recovered he contradicted what he had said and confessed that he had been instructed by the devil to say what he had. He added that all those curious things had not been in his stomach but had been put into his throat by the devil despite the fact that he was seen to vomit them.

“On the 18th March, 1566, there occurred a memorable case in Amsterdam, Holland, on which the Chancellor of Guel-dres, M. Adrian Nicolas, made a public speech, from which is the following: “Two months or so ago thirty children of this town began to be strangely disturbed, as if frenzied or mad. At intervals they threw themselves on the ground and for half an hour or an hour at the most this torment lasted. Recovering, they remembered nothing, but thought they had a sleep and the doctors, sorcerers, and exorcists were all equally unable to do any good. During the exorcism the children vomited a number of pins and needles, finger-stalls for sewing, bits of cloth, and of broken jugs and glass, hair and other things. The children didn’t always recover from this but had recurrent attacks of it—the unusualness of such a condition causing great astonishment.”

Dr. Jean Languis gives the following example in the first book of his Epitres, saying they happened in 1539 in Fugenstall, a village in the bishopric of Eysteten, and were sworn to by a large number of witnesses:

“Ulric Neusser, a ploughman in this village, was greatly troubled by a pain in the side. On an incision being made into the skin by a surgeon an iron nail was removed, but this did not relieve the pain, rather did it increase so that, becoming desperate, the poor man finally committed suicide. Before burying him two surgeons opened his stomach, in front of a number of persons, and in it found some long round pieces of wood, four steel knives, some sharp and pointed, other notched like a saw, two iron rods each nine inches long and a large tuft of hair. One wondered how and by what means this mass of old iron could be collected together into the space of his stomach. There is no doubt that it was the work of the devil who is capable of anything which will maintain a dread of him.”

Views of Obsession from Psychological Research

As Nandor Fodor pointed out, obsession in psychiatry means that the mind of the patient is dominated by fixed ideas to which an abnormal mental condition corresponds. In psychological research, obsession is an invasion of the living by a disincarnate entity, tending to a complete displacement of normal personality for purposes of selfish gratification that is more or less permanent. The difference between mediumship and obsession is not in principle but in purpose, duration, and (most important) effect. Mediumship, or trance possession, does not interfere with the ordinary course of life, does not bring about a demoralizing dissociation or disintegration; it shows consideration for the medium and its length is limited. After a certain time it ceases automatically and the medium’s normal self resumes its sway.

Obsession is always abnormal; it is an accompaniment of a shock, organic lesion, or, as has been observed among psychics, of low morale and weakening will power, induced by an unstable character and debility of health. Once the existence of spirits is admitted, the possibility of obsession cannot be disregarded.

Psychical researcher James H. Hyslop in Contact with the Other World (1919), observes:

“If we believe in telepathy we believe in a process which makes possible the invasion of a personality by someone at a distance. . . . It is not at all likely that sane and intelligent spirits are the only ones to exert influence from a transcendental world. If they can act on the living there is no reason why others cannot do so as well. The process in either case would be the same; we should have to possess adequate proof that nature puts more restrictions upon ignorance and evil in the next life than in this in order to establish the certainty that mischievous personalities do not or cannot perform nefarious deeds. The objection that such a doctrine makes the world seem evil applies equally to this situation in the present life.”

How are we to distinguish obsession from multiple personality? It was explained to Hyslop by the “Imperator” group of controls of medium William Stinton Moses that even for the spirits it is sometimes difficult to state how far the subconscious self of the patient is acting under influence and suggestion from spirits or as a secondary personality. Nevertheless Hyslop claimed to have found a satisfactory method to find out the truth in cross-reference:

“I take the patient to a psychic under conditions that exclude from the psychic all normal knowledge of the situation and see what happens. If the same phenomena that occur in the patient are repeated through the medium; if I am able to establish the identity of the personalities affecting the patient; or if I can obtain indubitably supernormal information connecting the patient with the statements made through the psychic, I have reason to regard the mental phenomena observed in the patient as of external origin. In a number of cases, persons whose condition would ordinarily be described as due to hysteria, dual, or multiple personality dementia precox, paranoia, or some other form of mental disturbance, showed unmistakable indications of invasion by foreign and discarnate agencies.”

Hyslop tells the readers of his Life After Death (1918), “Before accepting such a doctrine, I fought against it for ten years after I was convinced that survival after death was proved. But several cases forced upon me the consideration of the question. The chief interest in such cases is their revolutionary effect in the field of medicine. . . . It is high time for the medical world to wake up and learn something.”

William James, shortly before his death, surrendered to the same belief. He wrote:

“The refusal of modern enlightenment to treat obsession as a hypothesis to be spoken of as even possible, in spite of the massive human tradition based on concrete experience in its favor, has always seemed to me a curious example of the power of fashion in things scientific. That the demon theory (not necessarily a devil theory) will have its innings again is to my mind absolutely certain. One has to be ‘scientific’ indeed to be blind and ignorant enough not to suspect any such possibility.”

James was affected by the account of the Thompson-Gifford case published in the Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 3, part 8, 1909). According to the report, F. L. Thompson, a Brooklyn goldsmith, was seized in 1905 with an irresistible impulse to sketch and paint. The style was that of Robert Swain Gifford. The American artist had died six months previously but this fact was unknown to Thompson, who hardly knew of him and, except for a slight taste for sketching in his early years, had never shown artistic talent.

Supposedly, Thompson had visions of scenes of the neighborhood of Gifford’s country house and often had the hallucination that he was Gifford himself. He saw a notice of an exhibition of Gifford’s paintings. He went in and heard a voice whisper, “You see what I have done. Can you take up and finish my work?” The desire to paint became stronger. Soon it was so overpowering that he was unable to follow his former occupation.

Thompson grew afraid that he was losing his sanity. Two physicians diagnosed the case as paranoia. One of them, without offering to cure it, expressed a desire to watch the progress of the malady. Thompson went to Hyslop for advice, who took him to three different mediums. They all claimed to sense the influence of Gifford, described his character and life and confirmed the vague possibility, which Hyslop wished to investigate, that the case was not the result of mental disorder. As soon as the case was determined to be spirit obsession, a course of treatment was decided upon. Reportedly, Gifford, the spirit entity, was reasoned with and persuaded to desist.

Spirit Obsession and Personality Displacement

If one assumes the possibility of obsession being actually caused by a spirit entity, the importance of such treatment as Hyslop gave Thompson and Gifford seems appropriate. The obsessing spirit entity, if driven out either by strengthened willpower of the victim or by psychotherapeutic means, would logically seek and find another subject, but if it is convinced of the error of its ways, the danger is eliminated. Work of this kind was done in the Temple of Light in Kansas City in 1910. Hyslop was impressed with the importance of this cure and established the James J. Hyslop Foundation for the Treatment of Obsession in New York. Physician Titus Bull served as its director.

The systematic practice of curing obsession through such means was soon taken up by Dr. and Mrs. Carl Wickland in their Psychopathic Institute of Chicago. The patient was brought to Mrs. Wickland, who operated as a medium. She went into trance. Her controls influenced the obsessing spirit to step into Mrs. Wickland’s body. If the obsessor was unwilling it was forced to do so by means known to the controls. Dr. Wickland then began to parley with the spirit, usually ending in convincing the invader that it did a great wrong to its spiritual evolution by strengthening ties to the Earth. The invader usually promised to depart and the patient became normal. Later Wickland moved to California and founded the National Psychological Institute for the Treatment of Obsession. His experiences are chronicled in his book Thirty Years Among the Dead (1924).

The Wicklands considered the obsessing entities to be mostly earthbound spirits—spirits of the recently deceased. They do not necessarily mean harm, the Wicklands said, but only wish to enjoy earthly existence again. Some may commit acts of revenge or do other harm, however, and if an occasional evil personality takes control, the obsessed individual could be driven to criminal, insane acts.

Just as the trance control will become perfect by practice, the obsessor will feel more at home in the victim’s organism after repeated possession and will settle as permanently as possible, said the Wicklands.

Certain historic records suggest that obsession may attain an epidemic character. The case of the Ursuline Nuns of Loudon in 1632–34 has already been cited. Several of the nuns of the convent, including the mother superior, were seized with violent convulsions, symptoms of catalepsy and demonic possession. Blasphemies and obscenities poured from their mouths, confessed to come from the devil. The priest Urbain Grandier was accused of immoralities preceding the outbreak. The devils indicated him as the cause of their troubles. He was burned alive in April 1634.

In February 1874 Franklin B. Evans was executed in Concord, New Hampshire, for the murder of a 12-year-old child. In his confession made just before his execution he said that “for some days before the murder I seemed to be attended continually by one who seemed to bear a human form, urging me on to the deed. At length it became fixed in my mind to take her life.”

Hudson Tuttle, in his book The Arcana of Spiritualism (1871), describes a suicidal obsession:

“While sitting in a circle at the home of the venerable Dr. Underhill, I was for the time in an almost unconscious state, and recognised the presence of several Indian spirits. The roar of the Cayahoga River over the rapids could be heard in the still evening air, and to my sensitive ear was very distinct. Suddenly I was seized with a desire to rush away to the rapids, and throw myself into the river. . . someone caught hold of me, and aroused me out of the impressive state I was in, so that I gained control of myself. Had the state been more profound, and had I once started, the end might have been different. The desire remained all the evening.”

On occasion the obsession might serve a beneficial end. An example is the case of Lurancy Vennum, Watseka Wonder. Her obsessors, it was said, were forced out by the spirit of Mary Roff, who had died 18 years earlier in the same city. “Mary Roff” supposedly lived in Lurancy Vennum’s body, but haunted the house of her own parents for 16 weeks and convinced everyone of her identity. Her long inhabitation somehow made Vennum’s body safe from malicious invasions, and when she finally yielded its control to the returning ego of Lurancy Vennum, the girl’s health was mentally and physically reestablished.

As a result of his twenty years' study of obsession as head of the James Hyslop Institute, Titus Bull published in 1932 some conclusions, as follows:

"An obsessing personality is not composed of the soul, mind and will of one disembodied being, but is, in reality, a composite personality made up of many beings. The pivot obsessor, or the one who first impinges upon the sensorium of the mortal, is generally one with little resistance to the suggestions of others. He or she, therefore, becomes an easy prey to those who desire to approach a mortal in this way.

"Some people, moreover, may be born with tendencies which make it easier for them to become victims of mental alterations later in life. . . . There is an influence which can be exerted upon the minds of mortals by ideas embodied in thoughts from their departed ancestors. In other words, some departed ancestors, whenever possible, attempt to mould the lives of those incarnated who are akin. . . . There is a type of mortal whose mind is easily influenced by the stronger minds of the family group. . . . The more clannish the family group, the more likely is this to be true on both sides of the veil. It is, however, not to be considered as spirit obsession in the true sense. . . . The intervention of shock, however, or anything that could upset the nerve balance of a member of such family group, would place him in actual danger of becoming a victim of true spirit obsession. . . . The primary obsessor, in this case, would likely be one who claimed the right by ties of blood, who had no desire to do anything but to keep the mortal in line with family ideals."

According to Bull, obsessors ". . . have three major points of impingement; namely, the base of the brain, the region of the solar plexus and at the center governing the reproductive organs. As there are three major points of impingement, it may be assumed that there can be three composite groups, each starting with a pivot entity. What satisfaction is to be gained this way includes the whole gamut of human emotions."

Objections to the Concept of Spirit Obsession

Much of the evidence for spirit obsession is subjective, based on the observations, feelings, and prejudices of investigators, many of whom have been reputable individuals. However, so far no conclusive evidence has been found that will resolve this question definitively.

The subconscious mind has the ability to weave convincing fantasies of personality, just as novelists create imaginary characters who seem to have lives of their own. Some cases of apparent secondary or multiple personality seem to be a dramatization of the subject's unconscious emotional desires and fears. Children often pretend to be different personalities, while even the effect of a powerful movie portrayal often awakens both conscious and unconscious imitation of personality traits in impressionable viewers.

For a time it was thought that the technique of hypnotic regression, in which a subject's memory is progressively explored into the past and then into apparent former lives, might offer reliable evidence of the continuity of personality from one life to another. However, although there are case histories, the evidence so far is not conclusive.

It may well be discovered that there is no one simple explanation for or against the concept of spirit obsessions, that certain cases may be genuinely spirit obsession, others only subconscious impersonation. The concept of spirit obsession/possession has suffered from the same doubts that have discouraged continued research on spirit communication. Such experiments as the conjuring of "Philip" by members of the Toronto Society for Psychical Research have done much to call into question the possibility of investigating spirit survival and working with a spirit hypothesis.

Exorcism

Pagan and Christian beliefs in demonic obsession and possession brought about complex rituals of exorcism, designed to drive out the diabolical entities. Although such rituals had virtually fallen into disuse in Christian countries with the more pragmatic materialist philosophy of the twentieth century, they were revived on a startling scale with the occult boom of the 1960s. The theme permeated popular books and movies through the early 1970s and led to a revival of forgotten rituals of exorcism.

Active belief in demonic possession seems to be a causative force in generating apparent cases. Among Pentecostal Christians, who discuss demons and possession regularly from the pulpit and hold periodic exorcism services, cases of possession appear to be in response to the group's belief. Among liberal Christians and conservative groups who do not believe in demon possession, members manifest no symptoms of possible possession.

Occidental Society of Metempiric Analysis

Founded in 1977, to investigate all types of anomalistic or "metempiric" phenomena (unexplained occurrences ignored or discounted by scientists) such as sightings of UFOs, space aliens, ghosts, and "Bigfoot." The society maintains a speakers bureau, museum, and charitable program, and compiles statistics. It maintains a library of 1,500 volumes on metempirical, occult, and UFO topics and issues a periodical, Beacon, semiannually. The society can be contacted at its headquarters, 32055 Hwy. 24E, Simla, CO 80835.

Occult

General term (derived from Latin occultus, occulere, to hide; the opposite of apocalypse, that which is revealed). The word has come to denote that which is hidden from the uninitiated, which is imperceptible by normal senses, and thus refers to various magical and divinatory beliefs and practices, beginning with astrology, tarot, palmistry, numerology and other divinatory arts and especially including various forms of spirit contact—Spiritualism (and the various forms of mediumship), magic, and witchcraft. It also applies to specific practices such as the prediction of the future, exploring past lives (reincarnation), casting spells, and psychokinesis (mind over matter).

The word exists as a derogatory label tending to denigrate and marginalize those against whom it is used. Those interested in the paranormal have often taken pains to isolate selected areas of paranormal activity and separate them from other areas, which are left to the “occult.” Modern practitioners have also taken the opportunity offered by the relatively open context of contemporary society to attempt the recovery of classically occult terms such as witchcraft and astrology. The New Age movement, a contemporary phase of the life of the occult community, has allowed a significant revamping of the occult. Divinatory practices such as astrology and the tarot have been redefined as counseling methodologies, and Wiccans have joined together to denounce anti-witchcraft activities as religious bigotry.

In ancient times, it was believed that apparent deviations from natural law involved mysterious and miraculous “supernatural” or occult (i.e., hidden) laws, deriving from gods, invisible entities, or the souls of the dead. The rituals of magic were designed to evoke entities and spirits, to ward off misfortune, or to perform actions in defiance of natural law, such as obtaining knowledge of distant or future events, causing injury or death to one’s enemies, or securing sudden wealth (usually in the form of gold). In most tribal cultures, shamans or similar practitioners claimed the specialized ability to work magic, especially as relating to healing the sick or obtaining useful information.

Modern Spiritualism was an attempt to substantiate the ancient belief in the continued existence of personality after death and the evolution of the individual soul to perfection, a belief challenged by modern worldviews. The Spiritism inaugurated by Allan Kardec is a form of Spiritualism with an emphasis on reincarnation. Both Spiritualism and Spiritism are essentially religious movements, endorsing the miracles cited in the Bible and citing continuing paranormal phenomena as evidence of survival.

In pre-modern cultures occultism was an integral part of a religious worldview deriving from the mystery, wonder, and fearfulness of the environment in which human beings found themselves. By the Middle Ages, the occult had been separated from its religious base and competed with the dominant religious belief and practice. The magic spells and rituals of the Middle Ages contain popular practices of pre-Christian religions in the Mediterranean Basin.

One’s opinion of the validity of the occult and the meaning of claimed paranormal phenomena depends in large part upon one’s philosophical or religious viewpoint. From the early nineteenth century on, the successes of science and technology in achieving apparent miracles led to the widespread adoption of a materialist view of life and natural law, and to some extent encouraged the growth of agnosticism and atheism. Both the irreligious and those with a religion informed by the findings of the new sciences often ridiculed simplistic and literal belief in biblical teachings, the creation story in the book of Genesis being a particular target. They disparaged the accounts of scientifically impossible events in sacred texts and publicized the many instances of the abuse of power by religious authorities, vividly illustrated by the often violent suppression of heresies and blood-thirsty religious wars.

In the twentieth century, liberal Christianity has tended to play down the question of miraculous phenomena, although conservative voices still cite persuasive evidence that such miracles still occur. At the same time worldviews not so dependent on either a personal deity and/or a law-abiding universe have emerged. Many scientists have argued that what were formerly thought of as “natural laws” were imposed upon nature as observers made note of regularities. Such a worldview leaves room for spontaneous, supernatural, or miraculous occurrences.

Belief has always appeared to be a powerful creative factor in occult practice, and it is not impossible that even initial fraud could sometimes be a stimulating factor in producing paranormal phenomena by “priming the pump,” so to speak. Ancient religions sometimes used mechanical contrivances to simulate divine power, rather like religious conjuring tricks.

Many have argued that the reputed power of prayer may be more closely connected with the creative power of the praying individual rather than derived from the action of God (or the gods). Prayers to Eastern or Western deities appear equally to produce results. The mental state appears to be a relevant factor. Closely related is the willpower of the magical practitioner, which again has some relevance to the mystical concept of concentration and meditation being preliminaries to the manifestations of paranormal phenomena.

At a secular level, psychical researchers and parapsychologists have attempted to bring scientific method into the investigation of claims of the paranormal, attempting to extract the paranormal subject from any religious context. Such scientific endeavors may in many ways be an essential step in the learning process, but sometimes tend to bypass the possible religious dimension and ignore the broader aspects of the meaning and purpose of life and the interpretation of natural phenomena. The clinical atmosphere of a parapsychology laboratory, with its scientific controls, specialized jargon, and mathematical evaluation, as has been repeatedly noted, tends to remove the paranormal from a natural setting.

Occult Americana (Magazine)

Bimonthly magazine published during the 1970s that included articles, interviews, and other material relating to occultism and psi phenomena. It was issued from Painesville, Ohio.

Occultism

A collective term for the various doctrines, theories, ideas, and principles believed to underlie and hold together the practices of magic, and related topics such as alchemy, demonology, ghosts, poltergeists, prediction, psychic powers, spells, and Spiritualism. The term “the occult” is often used synonymously with “occultism.” The term is most frequently used by those who oppose the existence of magic or the work of its practitioners. It is sometimes viewed as a derogatory label, and many involved in occultism have preferred other labels such as New Age.

Occult Observer (Magazine)

British journal first published May 1949 by Michael Houghton. Houghton was a well-known occultist and proprietor of the Atlantis Book Shop. The journal failed to find its audience and ceased publication after completion of one volume.

The Occult Review

A journal dedicated to psychic and occult topics. The Occult Review was a British monthly journal published in London beginning in 1877 and edited by Ralph Shirley. In September 1933, its title was changed briefly to The London Forum. From January 1936 to Christmas 1948, it resumed the title Occult Review, but in 1949 it changed again to Rider's Review, after which it soon ceased publication.

Ochorowicz, Julien (1850–1917)

Lecturer in psychology at the University of Lemberg, co-director from 1907 of the Institut Général Psychologique of Paris, and distinguished psychical researcher. He was born in Radzyn, Poland, on February 23, 1850, and educated at the University of Warsaw.

The medium Eusapia Palladino was his guest from November 1893 until January 1894 in Warsaw. Ochorowicz's conclusions did not favor the spirit hypothesis and he expressed his conviction that the phenomena were due to a "fluidic action" and were performed at the expense of the medium's own powers and those of the persons present.

The mediumship of Stanislawa Tomczyk was discovered by Ochorowicz. In his experiments with her, he achieved conspicuous success in psychic photography, having photographed what he believed was an etheric hand on the film, rolled together and enclosed in a bottle. Tomczyk was also successful in raising and suspending small objects in the air without contact with her hands. In 1911, Ochorowicz was awarded a prize of 1,000 francs by the Comité d'Étude de Photographie Transcendental for his experiments. A similar prize was awarded to him by the Académie des Sciences de Paris.

Ochorowicz was an honorary member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, the American Society for Psychical Research, and other societies in Hungary and Germany. He was author of over one hundred books, papers, and articles on psychology, philosophy, and psychical research. He died in Warsaw, Poland, on May 1, 1917.

Oculomancy

An obscure system of identifying thieves by the turning of their eyes when associated with certain ceremonies.

Od (Odic Force) (or Odyle)

The term first used by Baron Karl von Reichenbach to denote the subtle effluence that he claimed emanated from every substance in the universe, particularly from the stars and planets, and from crystals, magnets, and the human body. The term "od" was derived from Odin, the Norse deity, indicating a power that permeated the whole of nature. The name "od" was retained by Dr. John Ashburner (1816–1878) in his translation of Reichenbach's writings, but another translator, William Gregory (1803–1858), substituted "odyle," probably hoping it would sound more scientific than "od."

Od or odyle was perceptible to sensitives, in whom it produced vague feelings of heat or cold, according to the substance from which it radiated. A sufficiently sensitive person might perceive the odic light, a clear flame of definite color, issuing from the human fingertips, the poles of the magnet, various metals, crystals and chemicals, and seen over new graves. The colors varied with each substance; thus silver and gold had a white flame; cobalt, a blue; copper and iron, a red.

The English mesmerists speedily applied Reichenbach's methods to their own sensitives, with results that surpassed their expectations. These observations were confirmed by experiments with persons in perfect health. Prof. D. Endlicher of Vienna saw on the poles of an electromagnet unsteady flames forty inches high, exhibiting numerous colors, and ending in a luminous smoke, which rose to the ceiling and illuminated it. The experiments were controlled by Ashburner and Gregory.

According to the sources from which the energy proceeded, Reichenbach, a chemist, employed the following nomenclature: crystallo, electro, photod, thermod, and so on. He claimed that this peculiar force also existed in the rays of the sun and the moon, in animal and human bodies. The force could be conducted to distances yet unascertained by all solid and liquid bodies, bodies may be charged with od, or od may be transferred from one body to another. Reichenbach believed this transference was apparently affected by contact. But mere proximity, without contact, was sufficient to produce the charge, although to a lesser degree. The mouth, the hands, the forehead, and the skull were the main parts of the body in which the od force manifested.

Reichenbach claimed that the odic tension varied during the day; it diminished with hunger, increased after a meal, and also diminished at sunset. He insisted that the odic flame was a material something, that it could be affected by breath or a current of air.

The thoroughness of Reichenbach's many experiments made an impression on the public mind, though his colleagues saw significant methodological flaws in his work. The objections of James Braid, a British surgeon, who at this time advanced his theory of suggestion, were ignored by the protagonists of od. Years later when Spiritualism had established itself in America, there remained a group of "rational" defenders of the movement, who attributed the phenomena of Spiritualism as well as those of poltergeist to the action of odylic force.

Others, such as Samuel Guppy, regarded the so-called "spirit" intelligences producing the manifestations as compounded of odic vapors emanating from the medium, and probably connected with an all-pervading thought-atmosphere—an idea sufficiently like the "cosmic fluid" of the early magnetists.

Reichenbach's odic force clearly had possible relevance to psychical research, and in 1883 the Society for Psychical Research in London formed a committee to report on "Reichenbach Phenomena." The committee's first report was published in the society's Proceedings and contributions on the subject also appeared from time to time in the Proceedings and the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research.

Reichenbach's experiments with od made an interesting comparison with the phenomenon of the human aura reported by Walter J. Kilner, Oscar Bagnall and others, and also with the research of Wilhelm Reich and his concept of orgone energy.

O'Donnell, Elliott (1872–1965)

Author of popular books on occult subjects. Born February 27, 1872, in England, he claimed descent from Irish chieftains of ancient times, including Niall of the Nine Hostages (the King Arthur of Irish folklore) and Red Hugh, who fought the English in the sixteenth century. O'Donnell was educated at Clifton College, Bristol, England, and Queen's Service Academy, Dublin, Ireland. He had a psychic experience at the age of five, in a house where he saw a nude elemental figure covered with spots. As a young man, he claimed he was half strangled by a mysterious phantom in Dublin.

In later life he became a ghost hunter, but first he traveled in America, working on a range in Oregon and becoming a policeman during the Chicago Railway Strike of 1894. Returning to England, he worked as a schoolmaster and trained for the theater. He served in the British army in World War I, and later acted on stage and in movies.

His first book, written in his spare time, was a psychic thriller titled For Satan's Sake (1904). From this point onward, he became a writer. He wrote several popular novels but specialized in what were claimed as true stories of ghosts and hauntings. These were immensely popular, but his flamboyant style and amazing stories suggest that he embroidered fact with a romantic flair for fiction.

As he became known as an authority on the supernatural, he was called upon as a ghost hunter. He also lectured and broadcast (radio and television) on the paranormal in Britain and the United States. In addition to his more than 50 books, he wrote scores of articles and stories for national newspapers and magazines. He claimed "I have investigated, sometimes alone, and sometimes with other people and the press, many cases of reputed hauntings. I believe in ghosts but am not a spiritualist."

The O'Donnells were reputed to have a banshee—the wailing ghost that heralds a death, and O'Donnell wrote the first book devoted entirely to the subject. It is not known whether his own passing evoked this phantom, but he lived to the age of ninety-three years. He died on May 8, 1965. His entry in the British publication Who's Who, listed his hobbies as "investigating queer cases, inventing queer games, and frightening crooks with the Law." His books include: The Banshee (1926), Ghosts with a Purpose (1952), Spiritualism Explained (1917), Strange Cults & Secret Societies of Modern London (1934), Werewolves (1912), For Satan's Sake (1904), Unknown Depths (1905), Some Haunted Houses (1908), Haunted Houses of London (1909), *Reminiscences of Mrs. E. Odor of Sanctity Perfume said to be exhaled by Christian saints, even after death. The idea that sin has a disagreeable odor and holiness a sweet perfume occurs in Romance literature and reflects folk beliefs of medieval times. Over the centuries, the idea of the sweet smell has been tied to that of the incorruption of the body of some saints.

In Sir Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur (translated as History of Prince Arthur), the death of the wicked Sir Corsabrin is described as follows: "Then they smote off the head of sir Corsabrin, and therewithal came a stench out of the body, when the soul departed." And in contrast, the death of the noble Sir Launcelot is described: "When sir Bors and his fellows came to sir Launcelot's bed, they found him stark dead, and the sweetest savour about him that ever they did smell."

St. Benedicta (ca. 1643) claimed that angels had perfumes as various as those of flowers; Benedicta herself was supposed to exhale the sweet perfume of the love of God. The body of St. Clare (660 C.E.), abbot of Ferriol, exhaled a sweet odor after death, which pervaded St. Blandina's church. When St. Hubert of Brittany (714 C.E.) died, the whole province was said to be filled with sweet perfume. St. Casimir, Patron of Poland, died in 1483, and when his body was exhumed one hundred and twenty years later, it exhaled a sweet smell.

Odyssey

Odyssey, the leading New Age periodical in South Africa, was founded in 1977 by Jill Iggulden as a networking organ for the emerging New Age scene in the country. Iggulden continued as editor until June 1984 when the magazine was turned over to Rose de la Hunt, then the part-time leader of a small New Age center in the Cape Town area. In August 1986 the editorial offices moved into a new building in suburban Wynberg called The Wellstead. Within a short time, The Wellstead emerged as the center of the New Age Movement in the Cape region and offered a full range of programs. It is generally the first stopping place of spiritual teachers visiting the Cape. At first, the magazine was published informally with a staff consisting only of de la Hunt and one other. In addition, for several years the pair headed the annual "Health for Africa" holistic health conferences, though these were discontinued in the early 1990s. Then in 1994, de la Hunt was asked to take over the Cape Town Mind Body Spirit Festival, the largest New Age gathering in South Africa. She revamped the festival as the Art of Living Festival, now presented biannually in Cape Town. Odyssey has emerged as a 60-page periodical featuring articles of general interest to the post-New Age community, ranging from channelling and crystals to the wide variety of holistic health practices. South African metaphysical groups are regularly highlighted and their leaders and teachers profiled. In addition, a running list of up-coming events are included. Odyssey is published bimonthly. On alternate months, a second periodical, Link-Up, is issued as a newsletter carrying announcements of upcoming events and ongoing services offered by various esoteric/metaphysical and holistic health organizations. Link-Up is issued in six regional editions specific to the different areas of the country. The Wellstead and the editorial offices of Odyssey and Link-Up are at 1 Wellington Ave., Wynberg 7800, South Africa. Its website can be found at <http://www.odyssey.org.za/>.

Oenomancy

An ancient system of divination based on interpretations of the patterns made by wine that had been poured out as an offering to the gods.

Oesterreich, Traugott Konstantin (1880–1949)

German professor of philosophy, an authority on religious philosophy, and one of the first modern scientists in Germany to declare publicly his belief in psychic phenomena. He taught philosophy at Tübingen University in 1910 and was appointed professor in 1922. He somehow survived in Nazi Germany, in spite of his Jewish wife and his anti-militarist views, although he was dismissed from his post in 1933, reinstated in 1945 and again forced into retirement on reduced pension soon afterward.

He was originally skeptical of psychic phenomena, and in the fourth volume of Friedrich Ueberweg's Geschichte der Philosophie he referred to Baron Schrenck-Notzing, pioneer of investigations into materialization phenomena, as the dupe of tricksters. In private correspondence with Oesterreich, Schrenck-Notzing protested at this sweeping charge and submitted his entire literary and photographic material on Eva C., the medium. Oesterreich became interested, investigated the mediumships of Maria Silbert and Willi Schneider, and finally became convinced of the reality of such phenomena.

In 1921 he published two books: Grundbegriffe der Parapsychologie and Der Okkultismus im modernen Weltbild; and in the latter title testified to materializations and telekinesis as facts. He also presented his revised conclusions in Ueberweg's Geschichte der Philosophie published in 1923. His book Weltbilder der Gegenwart contained further contributions to psychic science. As an active and thorough psychical researcher, Oesterreich also published a number of scientific papers and monographs supporting psychic science.

His classic work, however, was a study of psychic obsession and possession, Possession: Demoniacal and other among Primitive Races, in Antiquity, the Middle Ages, and Modern Times, translated into English by D. Ibberson from the German publication of 1921. This is a detailed study of possession and multiple personality from earliest times onward. For many years it failed to secure other than a highly specialized readership, but following the 1966 reprint by University Books, it attracted the attention of William Peter Blatty, who derived much of the background material for his book, The Exorcist (1971), from it. After the movie of the book, there was a new wave of interest in demonic possession and exorcism, and Oesterreich's book was again reprinted by various publishers, sometimes under variant titles such as Possession and Exorcism and Possession and Obsession.

He died in 1949. His wife Maria wrote a biography of him that was published in 1954.

Office of Paranormal Investigations

The Office of Paranormal Investigations (OPI) is an organization focused upon scientific research on spontaneous occurrences of psi phenomena, an area abandoned by most contemporary parapsychologists who concentrate on repeatable laboratory results. Of primary concern are sightings of ghosts, hauntings, and poltergeists, for which the office provides consulting services, especially to people who have been disturbed by such phenomena occurring in their homes or place of business. Though aware of the problems of proving scientifically the phenomena with which it is primarily concerned, OPI personnel attempt to assist people in understanding what is happening and if possible take steps to remove it. Most on-site investigations occur in the San Francisco Bay area, but OPI associates are located across the United States.

Founder and head of OPI is Lloyd Auerbach, best known for his writings, including three books, ESP, Hauntings and Poltergeists (1986), Psychic Dreaming (1991), and Mind Over Matter (1996), and his regular column in FATE magazine. Auerbach is a graduate of Northwestern University (B.A., 1978) and JFK University (M.S. in parapsychology, 1981). Since 1983 he has been an adjunct professor at JFK University. He served as the president of the California Society for Psychical Research for four years (1988–1992), and in 1989 he became the president of the Assembly of American Magicians (the first person to serve as the head of both a professional magicians' association and a parapsychological research organization). He founded the Office of Paranormal Investigations in 1989.

OPI publishes a monthly newsletter, Invisible Signals. It maintains an Internet site at <http://www.mindreader.com/>. The office has no physical facilities but may be contacted through its website or telephone hotline.

Former quarterly publication of Ohio UFO Investigators League, Inc. It included news and discussion of UFO sightings and other mysteries such as monsters and the Bermuda Triangle.

Ointment, Witches'

It was believed in medieval times that the wonders performed by witches such as changing themselves into animals or being transported through the air (i.e., transvection) were accomplished by anointing themselves with a potent salve. As ointments had been used in the ancient world as a means of inducing visions, many believe that a similar ointment may account for the hallucinations the witches may have experienced.

At the beginning of the fifteenth century, a trial was held near Bern, Switzerland, where the accused were said to have drained the juices of stolen children to make an ointment for flying. The Witches Hammer stated that the flying ointment was made "at the devil's instruction" from "the limbs of children, particularly of those whom they have killed before baptism." Francis Bacon stated: "The ointment, that witches use, is reported to be made of the fat of children, digged out of their graves; of the juices of smallage, wolfbane, and cinque foil, mingled with the meal of fine wheat: but I suppose that the soporiferous medicines are likeliest to do it, which are hen-bane, hemlock, mandrake, moonshade, tobacco, opium, saffron, poplar leaves, etc."

Other recipes that have been handed down as flying ointments for witches include the following: 1) Parsley, water of aconite, poplar leaves and soot 2) Water parsnip, sweet flag, cinquefoil, bat's blood, deadly nightshade and oil 3) Baby's fat, juice of water parsnip, aconite, cinquefoil, deadly nightshade and soot.

It should be noted that such poisonous drugs as aconite, hemlock, and belladonna, absorbed through the skin, would probably cause mental confusion, dizziness, irregular heart action, and shortness of breath. These effects might give the sensation of flying through the air, although witchcraft authorities during the great witch hunts have claimed that witches did actually travel in the air.

Ojai Foundation

A New Age foundation founded by Dr. Joan Halifax in Ojai, California. It was situated on 40 acres of former semi-wilderness land in the Upper Ojai Valley, some 80 miles from Los Angeles. Through the 1980s, the foundation offered retreats with well-known healers, scientists, artists, and others from various religious traditions and spiritual disciplines. At the end of the 1980s the foundation ran into a zoning quarrel with the community that eventually led to its demise.

O'Key Sisters, Jane and Elizabeth (ca. 1838)

Two somnambules or hypnotized subjects of John Elliotson, an early British experimenter in animal magnetism. The two girls were supposedly put into a trance by passes on the part of Elliotson and two different states induced: a condition of coma with insensibility and lack of consciousness, and ecstatic delirium in which they spoke, sometimes making clairvoyant predictions and also being subject to the operator's suggestions. In the ecstatic condition, which occasionally lasted for days, one of the girls claimed to be able to see with the back of her hand.

After many "successful" demonstrations, Elliotson one day met with a complete failure, which excited his opponents to accusations of imposture on the part of the girls. Elliotson was stigmatized as a weak and credulous man. Eventually he was obliged to resign his position as physician at University College Hospital, London. However, Elliotson persisted with his experiments and published his conclusions in an appendix to his textbook Human Physiology (1840) in which he detailed his further experiments with the O'Key sisters.

Oki, Masahiro (1921–)

Idiosyncratic teacher-healer-philosopher, originator of a very individual system of yoga. Oki was born in Korea in 1921, and brought up in a strictly religious environment. His early education familiarized him with martial arts and Zen. He was influenced by the politician Ottama Daisojo, who played an important part in the history of Burma (now Myanmar). Oki asked him about such great individuals as Buddha, Christ, and Muhammed, and their spiritual eminence. Daisojo explained that all three practiced something called yoga, which he would understand through later experience. At the time Oki was only eight years old.

As a young man, he studied at a military academy and also took a brief course in medicine before becoming a soldier. He became a spy for the Korean government in 1939, after Japan had seized areas on the China coast. Oki's task was to enter parts of southern Asia and cooperate with Islamic independence movements. As a cover for this, he went to Tibet to train as a lama. At that time, this was a purely utilitarian move without religious significance.

His religious experience was later stimulated when he was arrested on an assignment in Iran and thrown in jail, with a leg chain and an iron ball. He shared a cell with an older man who, although facing a death sentence, was always serene and peaceful. Oki himself was scared that he would be executed, so he became a pupil of the older man, learning from his chanting, meditation, and religious observances that gave him serenity. Later, both men were freed when a raiding party liberated the jail. Oki's first teacher turned out to be Hoseini-shi, father of the Ayatollah Khomeini, the former spiritual leader of Islam in Iran.

After the war was over, Oki concentrated on earning a living. He ran a medical clinic and also operated a profitable smuggling business between Japan, Korea, and Taiwan. Becoming dissatisfied with material success, he joined a Japanese peace movement, but was soon disillusioned. He decided to become a Zen monk. He divorced his wife, built six orphanages, gave away the remainder of his money, and joined a monastery. After some time he grew restless in the monastery and concluded that he should do something more practical than simply purifying himself.

United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) officials employed him to work for peace in India and Pakistan, where he lectured, practiced medicine, and taught practical skills in housing and food production. He stayed at the ashram of Mahatma Gandhi in India, where the concept of yoga in relation to practical life matured in Oki's experience.

During 1960 he worked as a researcher for a Japanese newspaper, traveling Europe and North America and lecturing on Zen to religious groups. In 1962 the Buddhist Society of America invited him to teach yoga. Oki also taught in Brazil before returning to Japan, where he founded the International Oki Yoga Institute in Mishima in 1967. He has since authored a number of books on healing, mastered thirty-two martial arts and taught them to students from all walks of life, and has given private lectures on the Oki yoga system to the Japanese royal family.

Oki has been criticized for violence in his teaching sessions by people who are unaware of the traditional use of a training stick in the old Zen tradition. However, his success with students and his uncompromisingly individualistic attitude to teaching and living rank him as a kind of Japanese Gurdjieff.

Oki Yoga

The highly individual system of Japanese teacher-healer-philosopher Masahiro Oki. Oki Yoga is a unique blend of traditional Indian hatha yoga with Zen meditation, dancing, physical games, martial arts, and chanting. The training method emphasizes balance between opposites: tension and relaxation, heat and cold, stillness and movement. Oki's system of shusei taiso or corrective exercise through yoga postures stemmed from his detailed observations of the sleeping postures of students. He claims that during sleep people take postures that attempt to correct their physical imbalance.

The headquarters of the Oki system is The International Oki Yoga Institute in Mishima, Japan; there is another full-time center in Shimoda, on the Izu peninsula. There are over 250 centers throughout Japan, and others scattered around the world in North and South America, Europe, and Australia.

Olcott, Henry Steel (1832–1907)

Joint founder with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and William Q. Judge of the Theosophical Society. Olcott was born August 2, 1832, in Orange, New Jersey, where his father had a farm. At the age of twenty-six, Olcott was associate agricultural editor of the New York Tribune and traveled abroad to study European farming methods. Olcott served in the Civil War and afterward became a special commissioner with the rank of colonel. In 1868, he was admitted to the New York bar. In 1878, he was commissioned by the president to report on trade relations between the U.S. and India.

His first contact with psychic phenomena was in 1874. The New York Daily Graphic had assigned him to investigate the phenomena of the Eddy brothers in Vermont. He spent ten weeks at the Chittenden farm and came away convinced of the genuineness of the phenomena he witnessed. The fifteen articles in which he summarized his experiences began his career as a leader in the psychic community.

His next opportunity was the Holmes scandal, when the materialization mediums Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Holmes were accused of fraud. Olcott sifted through all the records, collected new affidavits, and concluded that as the evidence of fraudulent mediumship was very conflicting, the mediums should be tested. After conducting tests, as with the Eddy brothers, he affirmed his belief in their powers.

Olcott related accounts of his investigations to the spiritualist community in his book, People from the Other World. Included was an account of his experiences with the medium Elizabeth Compton, who allegedly was able to accomplish an entire dematerialization. While some praised his work, as a whole, the book was heavily criticized. Among his harshest critics was D. D. Home, who denounced Olcott's account in his Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism as "the most worthless and dishonest" book.

As a result of his writing on the the Eddy brothers and the Holmeses, Olcott soon became known as a person aware of the spiritualist scene. When the professors of the Imperial University of St. Petersburg decided to make a scientific investigation of Spiritualism, they asked Olcott and his associate Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, who had worked with the Eddys, to select the best American medium they could recommend. Their choice fell on Henry Slade, later to become known as one of the most notorious of frauds.

Enter Madame Blavatsky

The association between Olcott and Blavatsky began at their meeting at the Chittenden farm. Blavatsky had identified with the Spiritualists but she broke with the Spiritualist movement soon after the Theosophical Society was founded in December 1875. Olcott was elected president; he worked at founding and organizing the society worldwide. The society was firmly established in New York by the time of the Blavatsky exposure by the Society for Psychical Research.

Nobody witnessed more apparent Theosophic episodes through Blavatsky than Olcott. In those early days, she professed to have been controlled by the spirit "John King." She first specialized in precipitated writing, independent drawing, and supernormal duplication of letters and other things (among them a $1,000 banknote in the presence of Olcott and the Hon. J. L. Sullivan). Reportedly, the duplicate mysteriously dissolved in a drawer.

Olcott was convinced that Blavatsky could produce such illusions by hypnotic suggestion. Blavatsky once disappeared from his presence in a closed room and appeared again a short time afterward from nowhere. This admission called into question Olcott's observations and records and his testifying in "good faith" to the appearance of Mahatmas and to the souvenirs they left behind.

In 1878, Olcott and Blavatsky sailed for Bombay with a brief stop in London. A. P. Sinnett in his book The Early Days of The- osophy in Europe suggested that the manners of Blavatsky and Olcott caused offense in polite society and the beginning of the unfriendly attitude of the Society for Psychical Research was to be traced to a society meeting at which Olcott made a speech in his worst style.

The Blavatsky exposure in 1895 left Olcott's reputation damaged. According to Dr. Richard Hodgson, who compiled the Society for Psychical Research report, Olcott's statements were unreliable either owing to peculiar lapses of memory or to extreme deficiency in the faculty of observation. Hodgson could not place the slightest value upon Olcott's evidence. But he stated definitely also: "Some readers may be inclined to think that Col. Olcott must himself have taken an active and deliberate part in the fraud, and been a partner with Blavatsky in the conspiracy. Such, I must emphatically state, is not my own opinion." On the other hand Vsevolod Solovyoff in A Modern Priestess of Isis called Olcott a "liar and a knave in spite of his stupidity."

For his critics, a problematic instance of psychic phenomena is the story of the William Eglinton letter. From the boat Vega, the letter was claimed to be "astrally" conveyed first to Bombay, then with the superimposed script of Blavatsky carried to Calcutta, where it fell from the ceiling in Mrs. Gordon's home while Olcott pointed to the apparition of two brothers outside the window. According to Mrs. Gordon's testimony, Olcott told her that the night before he had an intimation from his chohan (teacher) that K. H. (a Mahatma) had been to the Vega and had seen Eglinton.

If the delivery of this letter was fraudulent (and it has been convincingly argued by experts that the K. H. letters were written by Blavatsky), the only excuse for Olcott is that he acted unconsciously from suggestions fed him by Blavatsky.

It is believed Olcott will be remembered in the future not so much for his leadership of the Theosophical Society as for his public espousal of Buddhism in 1880 in Sri Lanka (then known as Ceylon). His action on behalf of Buddhism began with the writing and publication of his Buddhist Catechism, which introduced the religion to many people and remains in print. He also promoted and helped pay for the presence of Buddhists at the 1893 World's Parliament of Religions which led to the founding of the first Buddhist organizations to formally receive Americans into the faith.

Olcott remained president of the society until his death on February 17, 1907, at Adyar, India. During the last years of his life he worked with Annie Besant, who succeeded Blavatsky as head of the Esoteric section and then succeeded Olcott as president.

Old, Walter G(orn) (1864–1929)

British author on astrology who became famous under his pseudonym, “Sepharial.” Originally named Walter Richard Old, he also wrote under the name Walter Gorn Old. He was born on March 20, 1864, at Harndsworth, Birmingham, England, and educated at King Edward’s School, Birmingham.

At an early age he studied books on Kabala and astrology, and became friendly with astrologer Alan Leo (1860–1917). He went on to study a variety of subjects, including medical dispensing, Orientalism, and ancient languages.

He moved to London in 1889 and joined the Theosophical Society, where he became a member of the inner group, known as the Esoteric Section, around Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. He was very interested in astral projection. Old left the Society after Blavatsky’s death.

Beginning in the 1890s, Old wrote extensively on astrology and his books remained popular through the twentieth century. In addition to his basic astrological texts, he developed a system of astrological prediction for the stock market and successfully predicted futures in basic commodities. His most profitable income came from his astrological horseracing systems. He died December 23, 1929, a year before newspaper astrology columns became popular in England. Old also wrote a number of books on general occult themes.

Old Hat Used for Raising the Devil

One mode of “summoning” the devil was to make a circle, place an old hat in the center, and recite the Lord’s Prayer backwards.

“Old Moore” (1657–ca. 1714)

Pseudonym assumed by a succession of British astrologers for more than three centuries. The original Dr. Francis Moore, a physician, was born in 1657 and published Vox Stellarum, an almanac with predictions based on astrology, in 1701. Henry Andrews was a later “Old Moore” whose editions of Vox Stellarum had a circulation of five hundred thousand. Vox Stellarum had become Old Moore’s Almanack by the twentieth century and in the 1960s, “Old Moore” was Edward W. Whitman, secretary of the Federation of British Astrologers.

There is a “Genuine Old Moore” (“Beware of Spurious Editions”) credited to John Arigho featuring a portrait of Theophilus Moore, said to have lived ca. 1764. The Irish Old Moores contained word games, by “Lady Di.” There were four rival Old Moores in Britain, all claiming “Original Editions.” Foulsham states their own original Old Moore (“Beware of Imitations”) dates back to a copyright of 1697. Their predictions are now calculated by a team of four astrologers.

A comparable American publication is the Old Farmer’s Almanac, by Robert B. Thomas and rivals Old Moore in claiming centuries of continuous publication. It maintains the tradition established by Benjamin Franklin’s Poor Richard’s Almanac, started in 1732.

The Old Religion

Folklore term popularized in the 1960s for witchcraft as an older paganism displaced by Christianity.

“Old Scratch”

One of the appellations given to the Devil. It is supposed to have been derived from Skrati, an old Teutonic faun or Satyr, a horned half-man and half-goat. (See also “Nick”; Splitfoot)

Oliveto Citra

Oliveto Citra, a town in Italy south of Naples, was the site in the 1980s of a series of apparitions of the Virgin Mary, unusual for the number of people who reported sightings. They began on May 24, 1985, the feast day of Saint Macarius, the patron saint of Oliveto Citra. In the evening, as the townspeople gathered for the celebration, some dozen boys ages eight to ten were playing at a small square just off the piazza Garibaldi, where the main celebration took place. Suddenly, behind the iron gate that led to the castle ruins that dominate the town, the boys heard a baby crying. It startled them, and they did not know what to do. Then, they saw what was variously reported as a light, or a light in the shape of a person. A few saw a young woman; several reported seeing an infant in her arms. Excited, they ran to the piazza to report that they had seen the Virgin. Two women returned to the spot, and one of them, Anita Rio, saw the young woman and the infant with a rosary in his hands. The woman spoke to Rio and said that she would see the woman in the evenings. Rio entered a state of shock and was taken to the town’s small hospital. One of the boys who had seen the woman asked her who she was, and she replied, “I am Our Lady of Graces.” The next evening, Gino Acquaviva and his twin brother, Carmine, saw the Virgin again, and asked her name. This time she replied, “I am Our Lady of Consolation.” The Lady appeared frequently over the next months. Rio saw her regularly and was told that she wished a small chapel built at the castle gate. That chapel was dedicated in 1987. As word spread of the sightings, the castle gate became a place of pilgrimage and by the end of the 1980s, a site of nightly worship services built around the recitation of the rosary and the mysteries of Mary. One resident wrote a hymn to the Virgin, and one evening as it was being sung, she supplied a new melody heard by some as coming from a heavenly choir. One man in the village, crippled since birth, was healed. A number of subsequent healings have been reported. Some 20 people saw the Virgin with some degree of regularity and by the end of the decade over 100 had signed statements recording at least one sighting. While many are children or youth, a number of adults have become a part of the group who regularly sees and/or speaks to the Virgin. Many also report a sweet-smelling perfume as indicative of her presence. Of those who have heard her speak, the Lady has spoken words of personal admonition as well as general admonitions supportive of Catholic piety. Several of the visionaries have been told secrets by the Virgin that they have not revealed to anyone. The parish priest at Oliveto Citra, Don Peppino, took a pastoral interest in the visionaries and soon took it upon himself to record all that has happened. He became convinced of the reality of the apparitions and believes the number of people who have seen the Virgin makes the sightings unique among the many reported sightings worldwide. Though the local archdiocese has made an initial investigation of the events, the archbishop has yet to make a definitive statement. The sightings continued through the 1990s, though they have remained spontaneous and sporadic. Regular services continue at the site of the chapel, and several books have been written about the sightings. Like Medjugore, in Herzegovina, it appears that Oliveto Citra will remain a site of pilgrimage well into the twenty-first century.

OM (or AUM)

A Sanskrit word of special sanctity in the Hindu religion, generally interchangeable with AUM. It is pronounced at the beginning and end of every lesson in the Vedas (ancient scriptures) and is also the introductory word of the Puranas (religious works embodying legends and mythology). The Katha-Upanishad states: "Whoever knows this syllable obtains whatever he wishes."

There are various accounts of its origin; one that it is the term of assent used by the gods and possibly an old contracted form of the Sanskrit word evam meaning "thus." The Manu-Sangita (Laws of Manu), a religious work of social laws, states the word was formed by Brahma himself, who extracted the letters a-u-m from the Vedas.

Om is also the name given by the Hindus to the spiritual sun, as opposed to Surya, the natural sun.

Omarr, Sydney (1926–)

U.S. astrologer born on August 5, 1926. He served with the Air Force in the Pacific during World War II. After predicting the death of President Roosevelt, the Armed Forces Radio assigned him to a horoscope show; he thus became the first official astrologer in U.S. Army history.

After the war, he wrote articles on astrology and appeared in radio shows. He was also a CBS radio news editor in Los Angeles. His astrology columns appeared in some 225 newspapers, and at the height of his success he moved to Hollywood. His books on astrology include: Astrology: Its Role in Your Life (1963); My World of Astrology (1965); Dream-Scope (1973); The Thought Dial Way to a Healthy & Successful Life (1973); Sydney Omarr's Astrological Guide (1974); Sydney Omarr's Astrological Guide to Sex and Love (1974).

Omen

Believed to be a sign or portent of some future event, occurring either as a result of some form of divination, or as an unusual or supernatural event prior to some great development or catastrophe. (See Paranormal Signs)

Omez, Réginald, O.P. (Order of Dominicans) (1895– ?)

Dominican priest who studied parapsychological subjects. He was born October 12, 1895, at Tourcoing (Nord), France. He studied at Le Saulchoir, Université Française des Dominicains (D. Theol., 1922), and the Dominican University, Rome, Italy (Ph.D., 1924). Omez joined the faculty of Dominican University in 1922 and taught while completing his doctorate. He remained there until the beginning of World War II. In 1942, he became the French and international chaplain of Catholic Writers and Journalists. He was a member of the French Association for Metapsychical Studies and the Society of Friends of the Institut Métapsychique International.

Omez authored a number of books and articles on religious subjects and has also published in the paranormal field. His books include: Le Subconscient (The Subconscious Mind) (5 vols., 1949–1953), Etudes sur le subconscient (Studies of the Subconscious) (1954), Peut-on communiquer avec les morts? (Can We Communicate with the Dead?) Omphalomaney

A system of divination using the navel of the first newborn child to ascertain future conceptions by the mother. Indications were obtained from the number of markings or bands on the navel.

Onec, Omnec

Omnec Onec is the name of a woman who claims to be an extraterrestrial from Venus and is the subject of a book, From Venus I Came, published by Wendelle Stevens, best known for his promotion of the claims of Swiss contactee Billy Meiers in North America. According to Onec's account, she had lived for 210 years (Earth time) on Venus prior to taking on the form of a seven-year-old Earth girl and came to Earth in 1955 in a spaceship accompanied by her uncle.

Onec claims that she was born and raised in the Venusian city of Teutonia (a city whose name reflects earlier Venus-Earth contacts that included a trip to Venus by a German scientist). From the Temple of History she learned of the long-term monitoring of Earth by scientists from many planets and of the nature of life on all of these planets. Earth, the youngest of the planets in this solar system, is plagued by the imbalance caused by its singular Moon, which works an alternating influence on people as it moves through the heavens. The other planets are organized into a Brotherhood of Planets and their monitoring of Earth includes the era of Atlantis and Lemuria. The different races of earth have ties to the inhabitants of the various planets.

According to Onec, a set of teachings called Om-Notia Zedia, the laws of the Supreme Deity, exists on Venus. These teachings start with the utterly transcendent Supreme Deity from whom there issues an audible life stream of Spirit. This life stream sustains the existence of all worlds and universes. Human beings are Soul existing in the ocean of Spirit. Souls have been placed in physical embodiment to awaken to their true nature. The Soul may learn to exist apart from its physical body and to travel in the planes of existence between the physical world and God, beginning with the astral, causal, and mental planes. Wendelle Stevens has noted the similarity of these teachings with ECKANKAR.

Onec believed in reincarnation and karma and accepted the idea of coming to Earth to balance her personal karma. After landing, she said she was substituted for a seven-year-old girl who had just been killed in an accident. She was raised in Chattanooga, Tennessee, by the grandmother of Sheila, the girl whom she had replaced. She grew up in what was to all outward appearances a normal life, never speaking of Venus, and endured the struggles that allowed her to deal with her own karmic past. As a young adult, however, she began to manifest her second mission, to offer humanity an increased awareness of their relation to spirit. As an initial step, she wrote a book published by Stevens in 1986. The account included a variety of problems, including claims of significant habitation of all of the planets of the solar system and assertions of conditions existing on these planets that contradict the repeated observations of various space probes. To defend the account, it had to be assumed that the inhabitants resided on something other than the physical plane of existence.

Oneiromancy

Term for divination by dreams, possibly the oldest of the divinatory systems. Written records exist of dream interpretation in a papyrus ca. 1250 B.C.E. Prophetic dreams involving the interpretation of symbolic images and information are also in biblical history (See Gen. 41:1–36; Matt. 2:12, 22).

Psychologists and psychoanalysts claim that dreams include symbolic hopes and fears, sexual anxieties, and recollections of past events, as well as possible precognitive images. An attempt to isolate claimed precognitive factors in dreams was made by J. W. Dunne (1875–1949) in his book An Experiment With Time (1927).

Onimancy (or Onycomancy)

An elaborate ritual of divination, possibly based on the observation of the angel Uriel. Olive oil or walnut oil mixed with tallow is put on the nails of the right hand or in the palm of a young boy or girl. To recover money or hidden objects, the face of the child must be turned toward the east; for inquiry into a crime or romance toward the south; for robbery toward the west; and for murder toward the south.

Then the child must repeat the seventy-two verses of the Psalms, which the Hebrew Kabalists (see Kabala) collected for the Urim and Thummim. In each verse the venerable name of four letters and the three lettered name of the seventy-two angels occurs. Believers claim that at the end of this process would be the answer.

Other authorities give the name onychomancy to the interpretation of the spots on the human nails.

Onion

The onion was regarded as a symbol of the universe by the ancient Egyptians, and many beliefs were associated with it. It was believed that it attracted and absorbed infectious matters and was usually hung in rooms to prevent illness. This belief in the absorptive power of the onion is still prevalent.

British folklorist James Napier noted:

“When a youth, I remember the following story being told, and implicitly believed by all. There was once a certain king or nobleman who was in want of a physician, and two celebrated doctors applied. As both could not obtain the situation, they agreed among themselves that the one was to try to poison the other, and he who succeeded in overcoming the poison would thus be left free to fill the situation. They drew lots as to who should first take the poison. The first dose given was a stewed toad, but the party who took it immediately applied a poultice of peeled onions over his stomach, and thus abstracted all the poison of the toad. Two days after, the other doctor was given the onions to eat. He ate them, and died. It was generally believed that the poultice of peeled onions laid on the stomach, or underneath the armpits, would cure anyone who had taken poison.”

Onomancy (or Onomamancy)

Divination using a person's name, satirically said to be nearer to divination by a donkey, and more properly termed onomamancy or onomatomancy. The notion that an analogy existed between men's names and their fortunes is supposed to have originated with the Pythagoreans.

Onomancy had two rules: first, that an even number of vowels in a man's name signifies something amiss in his left side; an uneven number, a similar affection on the right. Second, of two competitors, success was based on the competitor with the longest name; thus Achilles triumphed over Hector.

According to Caelius Rhodiginus, the Gothic King Theodotus practiced an unusual version of onomancy recommended by a Jew. The diviner advised the prince, on the eve of a war with Rome, to enclose 30 hogs in three different sties, having previously given some Roman and others Gothic names. On an appointed day, when the sties were opened, all the Romans were found alive, but with half their bristles fallen off; all the Goths were dead. From this, the onomantist predicted that the Gothic army would be destroyed by the Romans, who would lose half their own force.

The system uses the rationale of Jewish gematria to assign numerical values to the letters of names.

Onyx

A precious stone whose properties were believed to resemble those of jasper; it was also supposed to increase saliva in boys and cause bad dreams. If applied to the eye, it was believed to remove anything noxious.

The onyx was also believed to create strife, cause melancholy, and cure epilepsy. According to the Bible, an onyx was the eleventh stone in the breastplate of the High Priest (Exod. 28:20), but it is possible that this stone (in Hebrew, shoham) is known today as beryl.

Oomancy

A system of divination using the outer and inner forms of eggs. One method was to break an egg into a glass of water and interpret the shapes assumed by the white. (See also ooscopy)

Oom the Omnipotent

Title given to Pierre Bernard, pioneer of hatha yoga study in the United States and founder of the New York Sanskrit College in 1909.

Ooscopy and Oomantia

Two methods of divination using eggs, similar to oomancy. An example of ooscopy was related by the Roman historian Suetonius (ca. 98–138 C.E.), who stated that Livia, when anxious to know whether she should be the mother of a boy or girl, kept an egg in her bosom at the proper temperature, until a chick was born.

The name oomantia denoted a method of divining the signs or characters appearing in eggs. John Brand, an English clergyman, described the custom of giving away pasche or paste eggs at Easter. These are eggs stained with various colors. The custom was religiously observed in Russia, where it was derived from the Greek Church. Gilded or colored eggs were mutually exchanged by men and women, who kissed one another and, if any coolness existed previously, became good friends again on these occasions.

The egg is one of the most ancient symbols of new birth and has been applied to natural philosophy as well as the spiritual creation of man.

Opal

Gemstone of quartz or silica, praised by Pliny the Elder (ca. 23–79 C.E.), who wrote: “For in them you shall see the living fire of the ruby, the glorious purple of the amethyst, the green sea of the emerald, all glittering together in an incredible mixture of light.” In ancient times many legends existed around its claimed virtues. It was believed to recreate the heart, ward off airborne contagions, and dispel sadness. It was also good for weak eyes. The name poederos, applied to the opal, refers to the complexion of youth.

The superstition that opals were unlucky seems to have been popularized by Sir Walter Scott’s novel Anne of Geirstein (1829). The story claims the opal worn by Baroness Hermione of Arnheim lost its luster after a drop of water touched it.

A system of divination based on the color and movements of serpents.

Ophites

This sect of Gnostics appears to date from the second century. A system of initiation was popular among the members and they possessed symbols to represent purity, life, spirit, and fire. Beliefs were based on mysteries of the Egyptian goddess Isis, concepts of Oriental mythology, and Christian doctrine.

According to the theologian Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254 C.E.), the sect was founded by a man named Euphrates. The sect was believed to have given special prominence to serpents in their rituals.

Oracle Bones

Oracle bones were popular tools for divination in ancient China, during that period of the Shang Dynasty, 1776–1122 B.C.E. Two primary objects were utilized, the bones of a now-extinct species of tortoise (Pseudocardia anyangensis) and the shoulder bones of oxen. The tortoise was a sacred animal in China and appears as a symbol in various divinatory systems including astrology. It was symbolic of long life and was considered a guardian of graves. The ox also acquired an array of symbolic meanings.

Pseudocardia anyangensis was bred in ancient China. The part utilized for divination was the relatively soft and flat underlayer called the plastron. It was cleaned, and a number of cavities were cut into the surface. Questions would then be put to the plastron. To discover an answer, a heated rod would be pressed on one of the cavities and in a short time, a crack would appear on the reverse side of the surface. The crack would then be analyzed for its suggested portents. The majority of the surviving examples appear to have been used on behalf of the ruler by court diviners. Many exist only as fragments, as the process of divination often caused the plastron to break in two. In the case of shoulder bones, one end of which is flat, a similar process to that used on the tortoise plastrons was used. Half of the socket would be removed along with the longitudinal ridge, leaving a flat piece of bone with a handle. The first burns would be made on the end of the blade away from the handle. It also appears that the questions put to the bones would have been asked multiple times in order to determine the drift of the answers rather than simply relying on one response.

Archeologists have uncovered extensive collections of oracle bones of both varieties, in many cases bearing a number indicating the use of a filing system. At some point, however, after the fall of the Shang Dynasty, the use of oracle bones gave way to other popular systems of divination, especially the I Ching.

Oracles

Shrines where a god was believed to speak to human beings through the mouths of priests or priestesses. The concept of the god becoming vocal was not confined to ancient Greece or Egypt. The Eskimos used to consult spirits for hunting and fishing expeditions. It is believed their wizards were as familiar with the art of giving ambiguous replies to their clients as were the Oracle keepers of Greece. The direction of the gods was also sought in all affairs of private and public life.

The Oracle of Delphi at Greece

In Greek mythology, when Jupiter wished to learn where the central point of the earth was, he dispatched two eagles, or two crows, named by Strabo. The birds took flight in opposite directions from sunrise and sunset, and they met at Delphi. The site was given the title "the navel of the earth" and the central point has white marble.

Delphi became a place of distinction. It was designated as oracular when the fumes coming from a neighboring cave were first discovered by a shepherd named Coretas. His attention was attracted to the spot by his goats gambolling and bleating more than usual.

It is not known whether these fumes arose due to an earthquake or whether they were generated by human act. According to the story, Coretas, on approaching the spot, was seized and uttered words deemed to be inspired. Later as the danger of inhaling the fumes without proper caution was known, the fissure was covered by a table, with a hole in the center and called a tripod, so that those who wished to try the experiment could safely.

Eventually, a young girl became the medium for responses, now deemed oracular and called "Pythian," as proceeding from Apollo, the slayer of Python, to whom Delphi was consecrated. A wooden structure of laurel branches was erected over the spot and the Pythoness sat on throne to receive Apollo's dictation.

As the oracle became better known, the structure was constructed of more costly materials. The tripod was made of gold but the lid continued to be made of brass. The Pythoness began by drinking from a "sacred" fountain (Castalia) adjoining the crypt (the waters were reserved for her only), chewing a laurel leaf, and placing a laurel crown on her head.

The person making an inquiry from the oracle first offered a victim and then, having written his question in a notebook, handed it to the Pythoness before she ascended the tripod. The inquisitor and the priestess wore laurel crowns. Originally the oracle spoke only on the seventh day of the month "Byssus." This was regarded as the birthday of Apollo and was called "Polypthonus."

According to Diodorus, virginity was originally a prerequisite in the Pythoness, due to the purity of that state and its relation to Diana; moreover, virgins were thought better adapted than other women to keep oracular mysteries secret and inviolate. But after an accident had occurred to one of the Pythonesses, the guardians of the temple permitted no one to fulfil the duties of the office until she had attained the age of 50.

The Oracle of Dodona

Another celebrated oracle, that of Jupiter, was at Dodona in Epirus, Greece (from which Jupiter derived the name of Dodonus). It was situated at the foot of Mount Tomarus, in a grove of oaks, and there answers were given by a woman named Pelias. "Pelias" means dove in the Attic dialect. The fable arose that the doves prophesied in the groves of Dodona.

The historian Herodotus (ca. 484–425 B.C.E.) cites a legendary tale concerning the origin of the oracle. Supposedly two priestesses from Thebes, Egypt, were carried away by Phoenician merchants; one went to Libya, where she founded the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, the other to Greece. There she had a temple built at the foot of an oak in honor of Jupiter, whose priestess she had been in Thebes. Herodotus added that this priestess was called a dove, because her language could not be understood.

The Dodonic and African oracles were probably connected. Herodotus stated that the manner of prophecy in Dodona was the same as that in Thebes, Egypt. Diana was worshiped in Dodona in conjunction with Zeus, and a female figure was associated with Amun in the Libyan Ammonium. According to some authors, there was an intoxicating spring at Dodona and later other materials were employed to produce the prophetic spirit.

Several copper bowls and bells were placed on a column beside the statue of a boy. When the wind blew a chain attached to a rod or scourge with three bones struck the metallic bowls and bells, and the sound was heard by the applicants. These Dodonian tones stated the proverb: Oes Dodonoekum—an unceasing babbler.

The tree, the "incredible wonder," as Aeschylus calls it, was an oak, with evergreen leaves and edible acorns that the Greeks and Romans believed to be the first sustenance of mankind. The Pelasgi regarded this tree as the tree of life. In this tree the god was supposed to reside and the rustling of its leaves and the voices of birds showed his presence. When the questioner entered, the oak rustled and the Peliades said, "Thus speaks Zeus." Incense was burned beneath it. According to the legend, sacred doves continually inhabited the tree, like the Marsoor oracle at Tiora Mattiene, where a sacred hawk predicted the future from the top of a wooden pillar.

At the foot of the oak, a cold spring gushed and supposedly the inspired priestesses prophesied from this murmur. According to legend, when lighted torches were thrust into this fountain they would be extinguished and would rekindle without assistance. Ernst von Lasaulx in Das pelagische Orakel d. Zeus zu Dodona speculated:

"That extinction and rekindling has, perhaps, the mystical signification that the usual sober life of the senses must be extinguished, that the prophetic spirit dormant in the soul may be aroused. The torch of human existence must expire, that a divine one may be lighted; the human must die that the divine may be born; the destruction of individuality is the awakening of God in the soul, or, as the mystics say, the setting of sense is the rising of truth."

It appears predictions were drawn from the tones of the Dodonian brass bowls, the rustling of the oak, and the murmuring of the well. The Dodonian columns appear to express the following: The medium-sized brazen bowl was a hemisphere, and symbolized heaven; the boy-like male statue was a figure of the Demiurgos, or constructor of the universe; the bell-like notes were a symbol of the harmony of the universe and music of the spheres. That the Demiurgos was represented as a boy is in the spirit of Egypto-Pelasgian theology as it reigned in Samothrace (Greek Island). It is believed the bell told all who came to Dodona to question the god that they were on holy ground, must inquire with pure hearts, and be silent when the god replied. Those who questioned the god were also obliged to take a purificatory bath in the temple, similar to that of the Delphian Pythia when preparing herself for prophecy.

Besides soothsaying from signs, divination by the prophetic movements of the mind was practiced. Sophocles called the Dodonean priestesses divinely inspired. Plato (Phaedrus) stated the prophetess at Delphi and the priestesses at Dodona had done much good while in a state he termed “sacred madness,” but while in their senses accomplished little or nothing.

We may infer from this that the Delphian Pythia as well as the Dodonian priestesses did not give their oracles in the state of waking consciousness but with the assistance of incense and drink. Aristides stated the priestesses at Dodona neither knew (before being seized upon by the spirit) what would be said, nor remembered afterward when their natural consciousness returned, what they had uttered, so that all others, rather than they, knew it.

The Oracle of Jupiter Trophonius

According to Pausanias (ca. 470 B.C.E.), Trophonius was the most skillful architect of his day. There are various opinions regarding the origin of his oracle. Some say he was swallowed up by an earthquake in the cave and became prophetic; others, that after having completed the Adytum of Apollo at Delphi, he declined asking any specific pay, but requested the god to grant him whatever was the greatest benefit a man could receive—and three days later he was found dead.

This oracle was discovered after two years, when the Pytho-ness ordered the starving population who applied to her to consult Trophonius in Lebadaea. The deputies sent for that purpose could not find any trace of such an oracle until Saon, the oldest among them, followed the flight of a swarm of bees.

The responses were given by Trophonius to the inquirer, who descend into a cave. The inquirer resided for a certain number of days in a sanctuary, performed ceremonial purification, and abstained from hot baths, but dipped in the river Hercyna and was supplied with meat from the victims he sacrificed.

From an inspection of the entrails, a soothsayer decided if Trophonius could be consulted. The night of the decent a ram was sacrificed to Agamedes at the mouth of the cave. When the signal had been given, the priests led the inquirer to the river Hercyna, where he was anointed and washed by two Lebadaean youths, thirteen years of age, named “Hermai.”

He was then carried to the two spring-heads of the stream, and there he drank first of Lethe to forget all past events and present his mind to the oracle as a “tabula rasa” (cleaned tablet); and secondly of Mnemosyne, to remember every occurrence about to happen within the cave. An image, reputed to be the workmanship of Daedalus, was then shown to him. Because of its sanctity, no other eyes but those of a person about to undertake the adventure of the cave were ever permitted to see it.

Next he was clad in a linen robe, tied with ribbons, and shod with sandals peculiar to the country. The entrance to the oracle was a very narrow aperture in a grove on the summit of a mountain, protected by a marble wall about two cubits in height with brass spikes above it. The upper part of the cave was artificial, like an oven. No steps were cut in the rock; to descend a ladder was brought to the spot on each occasion.

On approaching the mouth of the temple, the adventurer lay flat, first inserting his feet into the aperture, then drawing up his knees and the remainder of his body, until caught by a hidden force and carried downward like a whirlpool.

The responses were given sometimes by a vision, sometimes by words, and a forcible exit was then made through the original entrance, feet first. Supposedly there was only one instance on record of any person who had descended failing to return.

Immediately upon returning from the cavern, the inquirer was placed on a seat called that of Mnemosyne, not far from the entrance. The priests demanded an account of everything he had seen and heard; he was then carried once again to the sanctuary of good fortune, where he remained for some time.

The antiquary Dr. Edward D. Clarke (1769–1822) during his visit to Lebadaea found everything belonging to the hieron of Trophonius in its original state, except the narrow entrance to the temple was filled with rubbish. The Turkish governor was afraid of civil unrest if he gave permission to clean the aperture. In modern times, the waters of Lethe and Mnemosyne are used for the wash of Lebadaea.

The Oracles of Delos and Branchus

The oracle of “Delos” was derived from the nativity of Apollo and Diana in that island. At Dindyma, or Didyma, near Miletus, Apollo presided over the oracle of the “Branchidae,” so called from either one of his sons or of his favorites Branchus of Thessaly, whom he instructed in soothsaying while alive and canonized after death.

The responses were given by a priestess who bathed and fasted for three days before consultation, then sat upon an axle or bar, with a charming-rod in her hand, and inhaled the steam from a hot spring. Offerings and ceremonies were necessary, including baths, fasting, and solitude.

The Oracle at Colophon

Of the oracle of Apollo at Colophon, Iamblichus (ca. 330 C.E.) left an account relating that it prophesied by drinking water:

“It is known that a subterranean spring exists there, from which the prophet drinks; after he has done so, and has performed many consecrations and sacred customs on certain nights, he predicts the future; but he is invisible to all who are present. That this water can induce prophecy is clear, but how it happens, no one knows, says the proverb.

“It is believed, God is in all things, and is reflected in this spring, thereby giving it prophetic power. Supposedly the inspiration of the water prepares and purifies the light of the soul, to receive the divine spirit. The soothsayer uses this spirit like a work-tool over which he has no control. After the moment of prediction he does not always remember what has happened. Before drinking the water, the soothsayer must fast for day and night and observe religious customs in order to receive the god.”

The Oracle of Amphiaraus

Another celebrated oracle was Amphiaraus, who distinguished himself in the Theban war. He was venerated at Oropus, in Boeotia, as a seer. This oracle was consulted more in sickness than on any other occasion. The applicants had to lie upon the skin of a sacrificed ram and during sleep had the remedies of their diseases revealed to them. Not only were sacrifices and ceremonial purifications performed here, but the priests also prescribed other preparations for the minds of the sleepers to be enlightened. They had to fast one day and refrain from wine for three.

Amphilochus, the son of Amphiaraus, had a similar oracle at Mallos, in Cilicia, which Pausanias called the most trustworthy and credible of the age. Lucian mentioned that all those who wished to question the oracle had to lay down two oboles (small silver coins).

Egyptian Oracles

The oracles of ancient Egypt were as numerous as those of Greece. Herodotus claimed that at least seven gods in Egypt spoke by oracles. Supposedly, the most reliable were considered to give an intimation of their intentions by means of “remarkable events.” These were carefully observed by the Egyptians, who recorded these events.

The Egyptians also considered the fate of a person was determined by the day of his birth—every day belonged to a special god. The oracle of Jupiter Ammon and the same deity at Thebes existed from the twentieth to the twenty-second Dynasty. He was consulted not only concerning the fate of empires but also for the identification of a thief. In all serious matters, however, it was sought to ascertain his views. Those about to make their wills sought his oracle and judgments were ratified by "his" word. For example, surviving inscriptions described what occurred when a king consulted a god:

"The King presented himself before the god and preferred a direct question, so framed as to admit of an answer by simple yes or no; in reply the god nodded an affirmative, or shook his head in negation.

"This has suggested the idea that the oracles were manipulated statues of divinities mechanically set in motion by the priests. But as yet no such statues have been found in the Valley of the Nile. It was customary for the king to visit the god alone and in secret. It is believed the king presented himself on such occasions before the sacred animal the god was incarnate, believing the divine will would be manifested by its movements." (See also moving statues)

The Apis bull also possessed oracles, as did Bes, the god of pleasure or of the senses, whose oracle was located at Abydos.

American Oracles

Among the peoples of the Americas many of the principal deities acted as oracles. For example, the ancient inhabitants of Peru, the huillcas, believed the noises made by serpents, trees, and rivers to be of the quality of articulate speech. Both the Huillcamayu and the Apurimac rivers at Cuzco were huillca oracles of this kind, as their names, "Huillcariver" and "Great Speaker," denote. These oracles often set the mandate of the Inca himself, occasionally supporting popular opinion against his policy.

As late as the nineteenth century, the Peruvian Indians of the Andes mountain range continued to believe in oracles they had inherited from their fathers. One account of this says they:

"... admit an evil being, the inhabitant of the centre of the earth, whom they consider as the author of their misfortunes, and at the mention of whose name they tremble. The most shrewd among them take advantage of this belief to obtain respect, and represent themselves as his delegates. Under the denomination of mohanes, or agoreros, they are consulted even on the most trivial occasions. They preside over the intrigues of love, the health of the community, and the taking of the field. Whatever repeatedly occurs to defeat their prognostics, falls on themselves; and they are wont to pay for their deceptions very dearly. They chew a species of vegetable called pripipi, and throw it into the air, accompanying this act by certain recitals and incantations, to injure some, to benefit others, to procure rain and the inundation of rivers, or, on the other hand, to occasion settled weather, and a plentiful store of agricultural productions. Any such result, having been casually verified on a single occasion, suffices to confirm the Indians in their faith, although they may have been cheated a thousand times."

Supposedly there is an instance on record of how the huillca could refuse on occasion to recognize even royalty itself. Manco, the Inca who had been given the kingly power by Spanish conqueror Francisco Pizarro, offered a sacrifice to one of these oracular shrines. The oracle refused to recognize him; through the medium of its guardian priest, the oracle stated Manco was not the rightful Inca. According to legend Manco had the rock shaped oracle thrown down, whereupon its guardian spirit emerged in the form of a parrot and flew away. But upon Manco commanding the parrot be pursued, the spirit sought another rock to receive it, and the spirit of the huillca was transferred.

Similar to the idols of Mexico, most of the principal huacas of Peru seem to also have been oracles. It is believed the guardians of the speaking huacas were not influenced by the Apu-Ccapac-Inca himself. There was a tradition that the Huillacumu, a venerable huillac whom the rest acknowledged as their head, at one time possessed jurisdiction over the supreme war chiefs.

Order of Elect Cohens

An occult Masonic group founded by Martinees de Pasqualy (ca.1710–1774) in Bordeaux, France, in 1760. The French title Rite des Élus Cohens refers to cohens, the Hebrew word for “priests.” The rituals for the order’s magical invocation of spirits, with the ultimate purpose of communication with the “Active and Intelligent Cause” (i.e., God), were written by Pasqually. He drew upon Roman Catholic, astrological, and various occult texts, especially the Kabbalah.

The group appears to have had a Sovereign Tribunal at Paris in 1767 with Pasqually at its head. After the death of Pasqually in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on September 20, 1774, the order was headed by J. B. Willermoz, then residing in Lyons. The order died out at Lyons following Willermoz’s death in 1815, but survived in Italy and Germany. It was later reestablished in Lyons and subsequently spread to Haiti and other islands of the Caribbean and to North America, where it survives today. The archives of the order passed to G. M. Profe Willermoz’s nephew, and then to a M. Cavernier, who finally returned them to the reestablished lodge at Lyons.

In 1887 a period of reorganization and diffusion of the order began that led in 1891 to the creation of a council of 21 members who supervised the work in France, across Europe, and in the Americas.

One of Pasqually’s students, Louis Claude de Saint-Martin, emerged as a mystic who gained much respect in Europe and is highly revered among Martinists today. Also connected with the order in the nineteenth century was Papus (Gérard Encausse).

Order of Napunsakäs in the West

The Order of Napunsakäs in the West (ON) was founded in 1996 as a special interest group (SIG) associated with the thelemic magical order the Servants of the Star and the Snake (SSS). It was inspired by the writings of the late scholar of Hinduism, Alain Daniélou (author of such books as The Gods of India: Hindu Polytheism; Shiva and Dionysus and While the Gods Play). The Hindu word “napunsakä” designates some 16 categories of non-heterosexual, gender variant types mentioned in the Sanskrit dictionary of V. S. Apete. Members of the order seek to reestablish the natural, divine order found in pre-Aryan Shaivism, but with an emphasis on gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered Tantra. The outer order is open to all napunsakäs (people who define themselves as other than heterosexual); affiliates are considered associate members. An inner order, the Cultus Skanda-Karttikeya (CS-K), is open to gay males only, and only upon formal, in-person diksha, or initiation. The focus of the CS-K is on gay Tantra with special emphasis on the sadhana (or worship or more properly, adoration) of the Hindu deity Skanda as patron of gays, in His many forms (Kumara, Marugan, etc.). The current head of the Order of Napunsakäs in the West and the Cultus Skanda-Karttikeya is known by his religious name, Sahajananda Skanda-Das. The order is headquartered at P.O. Box 1219, Corpus Christi, TX 78403-1219. It publishes a periodical, Zibaa. Information on the order can be found on the Internet through the site of the Servants of the Star and the Snake at <http://www.wild.au/sss/index.html>.

Order of New Templars

German occult sect organized between 1894 and 1907 by Austrian occultist Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels (1874–1954) at Burg Werfenstein near the river Danube. The Order used the swastika symbol, advocated master-race ideals, and developed rituals from appropriation of the Holy “Grail” traditions and Parsifal. Von Liebenfels published a journal, Ostara. The Order of New Templars survived for a generation but went underground after the German invasion of Austria in 1938.

Order of the Black Ram

The Order of the Black Ram, founded and headed by its grand magister, Rev. Seth-Klippoth, was a Satanic organization that appeared in Detroit during the 1980s. Mixing elements of Nazism and racism with the teachings of the Church of Satan and neo-paganism, the order was closely associated with the neo-Nazi National Renaissance party. It published an irregular periodical, Liber Venifica.

Order of the Cross

The Order of the Cross is a Christian theosophical group founded in 1904 by former Congregational minister J. Todd Ferrier (1855–1943). Born and raised in Scotland, Ferrier began to read theosophical and other esoteric materials that led him to a very different understanding of the purpose and mission of Jesus. He resigned from the monastery in 1903 and the following year began what was to become his life’s work. The first sign of his new ministry was the initial issue of a new periodical, The Herald of the Cross, which continues in publication to the present. He also began work on what were to become his two most important books, The Master: His Life and Teachings (1913) and The Logia, or Sayings of the Master. He moved to London, where he established the order’s headquarters. Important in Ferrier’s development was participation in the animal rights movement. He became a vegetarian, which he described as a “bloodless” diet, and campaigned against vivisection. It led him to adopt what he termed the Christ-life, a path of self-denial, self-sacrifice, and self-abandonment to the Divine Will. Ferrier believed that Jesus had come into the world to prevent its further disintegration. Over the centuries, the Earth had gradually experienced an increasing disorder in both nature and society caused by the fading of the divine light in human beings. Jesus’ work was beginning to show signs of success in the twentieth century. Ferrier saw the changes occurring as the century progressed as signs of the increase of light. Those who actively align themselves with the effort to restore the light to human life will be endowed with a sense of purpose and an ability to communicate with the unseen (i.e., psychic abilities). According to Ferrier, the message of Jesus had been missed by the mainstream of Christianity. He intended not to create the vast earthly institution, but to restore spirituality to individuals. Thus the Order of the Cross has adopted a somewhat anti-institutional bias and devoted itself to introducing people to Jesushood, a state of spiritual realization. Jesushood leads to Christhood, a state of mystical illumination. The order is focused in a number of small groups, most in the British Isles, but some in North America and other English-speaking communities worldwide. International leadership is vested in a self-perpetuating executive council that seeks assistance from an advisory committee of representatives of the groups. International headquarters is located at 10 De Vere Gardens, London W8 5AE, United Kingdom and American headquarters at P.O. Box 2477, LaGrange, IL 60525. The order has a website at <http://www.ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/GabrielBuist/OrdCross.htm>. The order has published more than 50 books and booklets of Ferrier’s writings and transcribed talks.

Order of the Cubic Stone

A group in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn tradition, founded in Britain in the 1930s by Theodore Howard and two technicians, David Edwards and Robert Turner. The Order believes in a system of Enochian magic and trains students in ceremonial magic.

In the early 1990s, Robert Turner was severely injured in a criminal assault, which has resulted in disruption of the order and its magazine, The Monolith. The order is currently attempting a comeback, more information can be found at http://guildnavigator.demon.co.uk/the_monolith.htm.

Order of the Sacred Word

A breakaway order of the society Aurum Solis, founded in 1897. The Order developed separately in 1957 but was reunited with the main Society in 1971. (See also Aurum Solis)

Order of the Silver Star

The A.:A.: (Argentum Astrum), a secret order founded by occultist Aleister Crowley.

Order of the Star

Revival of the earlier Order of the Star in the East, formed to promote Jiddu Krishnamurti as the Great World Teacher. At its peak, the old order had over 45,000 members, but was suddenly suspended in 1929 after Krishnamurti had publicly rejected the role of Great World Teacher. He maintained that people should seek the truth within themselves rather than rely upon the authority of external teachers.

The present Order of the Star was founded by a group claiming a Spiritual Hierarchy had decided to reactivate the order in preparation for the second coming of Christ. The order worked "to establish a peripheral group on the outskirts of the major ashram under the sponsorship of the Master K. H., to initiate an active unit of service in the world, to raise the banner laid down temporarily by the old Order of the Star and to hold it aloft once again and to offer groups and individuals shelter under it." The order published Star Bulletin and the Embers from the Fire. Last known address: 57 Warescot Road, Brentwood, Essex, CM15 9HH, England.

Order of the Star in the East

Organization promoting the teachings of Jiddu Krishnamurti as a World Teacher. The Order was developed by Theosophical president Annie Besant in July 1911, as an international movement, extending the scope of the Order of the Rising Sun (founded seven months earlier). The Star in the East had been founded

"...out of the rapidly growing expectation of the near coming of a great spiritual Teacher, which is visible in many parts of the world today. In all the great faiths at the present time, and in practically every race, there are people who are looking for such a Teacher; and this hope is being expressed quite naturally, in each case, in the terms appropriate to the religion and the locality in which it has sprung up. It is the object of the Order of the Star in the East, so far as is possible, to gather up and unify this common expectation, wherever and in whatever form it may exist, and to link it into a single great movement of preparation for the Great One whom the age awaits."

The Order expanded with the assistance of active branches of the Theosophical Society. A junior Order of the Servants of the Star was established for members under twenty-one years of age. Membership in the Theosophical movement peaked in the late 1920s.

Order Under Attack

Attacks by the Indian newspaper The Hindu, revived the Hodgson Report scandal of the Society for Psychical Research. The report alleged fraud by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and sex scandals involving Charles W. Leadbeater and young boys in 1906. However, in spite of the attacks, the OSE survived. In 1911, Krishnamurti was claimed to be "the chosen Vehicle of the Lord Maitreya-Bodhisattva-Christ."

In October 1912, J. Narayniah, the father of Krishnamurti, and his brother, started legal proceedings against Besant for the guardianship of the two boys. Narayniah claimed that because of Leadbeater's influence, Besant was unfit to have custody. The case was heard two years later in Madras, the judge concluded that charges of sexual immorality against Leadbeater in relation to Krishnamurti were unfounded. However, he also ruled that Leadbeater was not a suitable person to associate with children, Besant should no longer have custody, and the boys were to become wards of the court. After an appeal court upheld this decision, Besant appealed to the Privy Council in England, and in May 1914, the original judgment was reversed.

Meanwhile, Katherine Tingley, head of the American branch of the Theosophical Society also attacked Leadbeater, Besant, and the OSE, declaring that "Krishnamurti is a fine chap who has been hypnotized by Mrs. Annie Besant, and is really an unwilling follower."

In 1912, American members of the Esoteric Section of the Theosophical Society (Adyar) formed a school and community named "Krotona" ("the place of promise") in the Hollywood Hills. Krotona was similar to the community Tingley had developed at Point Loma (San Diego). The complex included a temple, vegetarian cafeteria, metaphysical library, and experimental center. Disciples invented "stereometry," a three-dimensional geometric alphabet, involving a structure weighing three tons and using redwood. After an internal conflict concerning money, the property was sold and the group relocated to the Ojai Valley, a desert in California. Krishnamurti moved Besant to Ojai in hopes of reviving the health of his brother who was suffering from tuberculosis. His brother did not recover but Krishnamurti made Ojai his American headquarters.

On January 23, 1927, Besant announced the arrival of the World Master and that a new utopian colony would be set up in Ojai. Subscriptions were requested to establish a $200,000 Happy Valley Foundation, covering 465 acres and comprising temples, an art center, places for worship and meditation, and a playground for Greek games.

During his world lecture tours, Krishnamurti was favorably received by his followers. However, in June 1927, he gave a speech that disturbed believers in the Vehicle of the Great Teacher. Krishnamurti suggested that Masters and other gurus were superfluous and there was a more direct route to the truth within every individual. Meanwhile, the objectives of OSE were revised as follows: "1. To draw together all those who believe in the presence in the world of the World Teacher." "2. To work for Him in all ways for His realization of His ideal for humanity. "The Order has no dogmas, no creeds or systems of belief. Its inspiration is the Teacher, its purpose to embody His universal life."

On June 28, 1927, the name of the Order was changed to the Order of the Star, implying the World Teacher had "arrived," but on August 1, Krishnamurti gave an address on "Who brings the truth?" In this speech, he claimed the Masters had no objective existence—they were mental images shaped by belief and imagination. Krishnamurti stated: "What you are troubling about is whether there is such a person as the World Teacher who has manifested Himself in the body of a certain person, Krishnamurti." He believed the truth must be sought inside each individual rather than relying on an external authority such as himself. In effect, he renounced the role of World Teacher as defined by Besant and Leadbeater. The following day, at the Star Camp at Ommen, The Netherlands, Krishnamurti reiterated this message.

The Order of the Star was formally suspended in 1929. However, Krishnamurti continued to teach as an independent teacher and drew followers throughout his life. Many of his speeches were transcribed and published as books.

From time to time, the messianic concept of a coming World Teacher was similar to that of the Lord Maitreya/Jesus. The concept continued to find support from various theosophical teachers such as Alice A. Bailey and was revived as one theme within the New Age movement by Bailey student Benjamin Creme. In 1982, the Order of the Star was revived similar to its earlier form by a group in Britain.

Order of the Thelemic Golden Dawn

The Order of the Thelemic Golden Dawn (OTGD) is an initiatory magical group that adheres to the teachings of Aleister Crowley. Originally known as The Thelemic Temple and Order of the Golden Dawn, it was founded in Los Angeles in 1990 by David Cherubim who now serves as its Frater Superior Chief. It exists to assist people in their initiation as thelemic magicians and to spread the Law of Thelema worldwide. Thelema (from the Greek word for will) is an approach to magic which attempts to assist the magician in the location of his/her particular destiny or True Will. The thelemic magician, having discovered his/her True Will is bound to identify with and follow it.

Members enter the order as a neophyte. Work is then pursued in seven successive grades beginning with Zelator. These grades or levels closely resemble the grades of the Ordo Templi Orientis, the order that Crowley headed during his lifetime. The seven grades are seen as corresponding to the seven chakras of the subtle body in the Indian tantric system, the seven planets found in traditional astrology, and the seven metals included in alchemy.

Members consider themselves a body of Free Warriors whose task is to extend the Law of Thelema as contained in The Book of the Law, the text of which Crowley claimed to have received from a preternatural entity named Aiwass in 1904. To this end members engage in occult research, practical mysticism, ceremonial magic, and tantric alchemy. Members are also expected to be thoroughly grounded in Crowley's thought as found in his many books.

The OTGD is headquartered in Los Angeles. Its website can be found at <http://www.tgd.org/>.

Order of the White Rose

The order of the White Rose was an esoteric Spiritualist organization that included elements of Rosicrucianism and mysticism not generally associated with Spiritualism. Its founder was Jesse Charles Fremont Grumbine (1861–1938), who created the order in the 1890s in Chicago. Around 1900 he moved to Boston, where he lived for many years. Then in 1921 he moved first to Cleveland, Ohio, and two years later to Portland, Oregon.

For Grumbine, there was a distinction between Universal Spirit and personal individual spirits. Universal Spirit does not exist as a deity outside of the universe, but as the radiant center from which spirits draw their life. Matter is the substance of form. Form defines and limits spirits, which are temporal, relative, and finite. Spiritualism reveals the spirit of God within each human spirit. By bringing evidence of survival of death and of disincarnate spirits, Spiritualism demonstrates the divinity of each spirit. Psychic abilities (clairvoyance, telepathy, healing, and prevision) are innate divine powers. Grumbine believed that the proper use and control of those powers could produce a divine manhood and womanhood.

The order was organized into two branches, the order of the Red Rose, an outer branch, and the order of the White Rose, its esoteric branch. Both branches were believed to lead members to the inner celestial branch of the order. Members were organized into chapters, though no information on the size of the order has survived. It published a number of books by Grumbine, an indication of at least some degree of success. There is no record of the order surviving Grumbine.

Ordo Rosae Rubeae et Aureae Crucis (Order of Rose of Ruby and Cross of Gold)

The second order or level of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, usually known by the initials R. R. et A. C. It included the grades of zelator adeptus minor, theoreticus adeptus minor, adeptus major, and adeptus exentis. The group was formed in 1892 by S. L. M. Macgregor Mathers, with William W. Westcott as Chief Adept.

It was kept secret from some members of the Golden Dawn and accessible only to those who had passed through the basic four grades. The R. R. et A. C. gave instructions in ritual magic. The poet, W. B. Yeats was initiated into the 5°=6° grade January 20–21, 1893. During later controversies in 1901, Yeats privately published a pamphlet titled Is the R. R. et A. C. to Remain a Magical Order?

Ordo Stellae et Serpente

The Ordo Stellae et Serpente (Order of the Star and the Serpent) is a magical order in the thelemic tradition founded on June 21 (the summer solstice), 1999, in Sacramento, California. It is headed by several advanced teachers, Adepts of the "Inner Continuum," who serve as personal mentors of the order's newer members.

Neophytes begin their work with basic studies in occult wisdom, including instruction in gemantria, numerology, astrology, and tarot. They are introduced to the understanding of the universe symbolized in the cabalistic Tree of Life diagram, the body's subtle energy system centered in the chakras and the kundalini energy, and the basics of ceremonial magic. Neophytes are expected to develop a daily practice in meditation and ritual and to broaden their knowledge with reading in the literature of Western magic. During this training period, the Adepts provide personal guidance and offer discourses that may be experienced in person (for those who live in northern California) or online. Regular rituals are held in the temple of the order. Members at a geographical distance participate in their own personal temple at an astrologically coordinated time. The goal of the basic training is the initiate's becoming an independent practitioner of ceremonial magic while at the same time learning to work in concert with others. It is the belief that both solitary and group work is necessary in the present age.

It is also the belief of the order that magical work will lead to an awareness of the meta-dimensional harmonious Unity. Encounter with the Unity does not lead to absorption, but to a more clearly defined individual who also feels at One with the totality of the universe. It is the teaching of the order that magical activity does not make us more than human, but grants knowledge of what it means to be fully human.

Advanced students are free to explore the variety of distinct magical systems, from Enochian to Egyptian to Tantric and Thelemic. In the process, the initiate remembers him/herself as a Divine Being of his/her own creation. This realization provides the entrance into the mysteries of the Inner Order that guides the Ordo Stellae et Serpente, known as the Elect Order of Melchizedek.

The order may be contacted through its Internet site at <http://members.aol.com/Yechidah37/ossintro.html>. It does not ask for set dues, but is supported by the tithing and gifts of its members.

Ordo Templi Orientis (Grant)

Aleister Crowley served as outer head of the Order of the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), until his death in 1947, when he was succeeded by Karl Germer. Germer died in 1962 without naming a clear successor, and among the people who emerged to succeed him was Kenneth Grant. Germer had given Grant a charter to begin a lodge in London to work the first three of the nine degrees of the OTO system, and in 1955 he founded New Isis Lodge. However, when Grant began working the higher degrees using his own material, Germer expelled him from the order. After Germer died in 1962, there was no one in England to challenge Grant's authority, and for a decade he operated unchallenged. In 1969 Grant co-edited The Confessions of Aleister Crowley, and in 1973 he published Aleister Crowley and the Hidden God, the first of a series of books on the thelemic magical tradition. As these books appeared, they described his work with the Kabala (the Hebrew system of magic that became very popular in western magic in the twentieth century). He described his experiences exploring the Qliphoth, the negative side of the kabalistic work. While some accused Grant of flirting with black magic, other magical students were drawn to his work. Grant also brought out new editions of the work of the eccentric artist and magician Austin O. Spare.

Grant's OTO practiced a program similar to other OTO groups. Its goal was the establishment of the Law of Thelema (Will) in the world. New members had to have been practicing magic for at least nine months prior to being accepted in the order and had to agree to disseminate Liber LXXVII, the brief statement of thelemic principles written by Crowley. Grant also dropped the masonic initiatory degree system found in most magical groups, including the American OTO. Members are expected to seek their own true will (destiny) by their magical work.

Under Grant, the OTO dominated the British ritual magic scene into the 1970s. Over the last two decades a number of other thelemic magical groups have arisen in Great Britain and Grant's OTO has come to the United States, though it has remained small.

Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO)

A ritual magic organization founded in Germany around 1904. The order found its inspiration in the medieval Knights Templar, who were suppressed through most of Europe in the fourteenth century. Among the charges made against the order were that they practiced various forms of illicit sex, specifically sodomy and bestiality. Through the nineteenth century a number of groups had emerged in both France and Germany claiming to carry on the Templar tradition. However, this order seems to have originated out of a Masonic group founded by Karl Keller and Theodor Reuss and chartered in 1902 by English Mason John Yarker. They began publishing a magazine, Oriflamme, in which the first mention of the OTO occurred. There was mention that the order possessed the key of all hermetic and Masonic secrets (i.e., sex magic).

Keller claimed to have learned his secrets from three adepts, two Hindu and one Arab. His adepts seem to have been the sex manuals from India, the Kama Sutra and Ananda Ranga, and the Arab manual the Perfumed Garden. Keller died in 1905 and Reuss succeeded him as outer head of the order.

Meanwhile, in England, magician Aleister Crowley had emerged as head of his own magic order, the Astrum Argentinum. In 1909, with one of his initiates, Victor Neuberg, Crowley conducted a series of magic spells modeled after the invocations in the Enochian language produced by Edward Kelley, the clairvoyant who worked with Elizabethan magician John Dee. Crowley would pronounce the invocation, hoping to receive a vision, the content of which Neuberg would write down. Halfway through the invocations, Crowley had the idea of the two of them performing a ritual sex act. Several years later he published a volume of free verse, The Book of Lies.

Theodor Reuss read the book and perceived that Crowley had discerned the secret of the OTO and confronted him with his discovery. Reportedly, Crowley at that point perceived that the ritual sex in which he had engaged was the key to understanding Rosicrucian, Masonic, and magic symbolism.

Crowley was invited to join the OTO and became the outer head of the order for England. He was also invited to rewrite much of the ritual material. The order was organized in a Masonic manner, with a system of ten degrees, progress upward through the degrees admitting the member to more of the inner teachings. In the first six degrees of the OTO students were taught a general occult system that prepared them for the introduction of the sexual magic presented in the seventh, eighth, and ninth degrees. The tenth degree was purely administrative. Crowley later introduced an eleventh degree based upon his homoerotic predilections.

During the 1970s the secret materials of the OTO were published. They revealed a system of sexual magic based on the use of sex to accomplish goals in magic. Crowley's system is very different from the mystical sexual practices of tantric yoga, with which it has often been compared.

Reuss resigned his position in 1922 and Crowley became the outer head of the order. The order became his major means of spreading his particular magical philosophy based on the revelatory The Book of the Law, which he claimed he had received from a disembodied intelligence in 1904. This book was translated into German in the mid-1920s, and many of the German members rejected Crowley and his perspective. They withdrew and continued as a pre-Crowleyite OTO, although enough German members accepted Crowley that he could count one German lodge in his branch of the order. Both of the German groups were destroyed by the Nazi regime. A group continuing the anti-Crowley lineage reemerged in Switzerland after the war.

During the time he headed the OTO Crowley experimented with a variety of magic practices, wrote widely, and compiled a curriculum consisting of his own books and some additional valuable works on magic for the order members. He died in 1947 and left the leadership of the order to Karl Germer, a German who had moved to the United States after a nasty encounter with the Nazis. Germer was a loyal member but the order languished under him. He did charter a lodge in England under the leadership of Kenneth Grant, but then withdrew the charter when Grant began to operate outside its dictates.

Germer died in 1962. He had initiated no new members nor arranged for a successor. He was so out of touch with the members that for many years some did not even know that he had died. The order languished and could easily have dissolved. However, in 1969 Grady McMurtry, a member residing in the San Francisco Bay area, began to reorganize the OTO. McMurtry had been given a document by Crowley containing broad emergency measures. Through the 1970s and until his death in 1985, McMurtry rebuilt the order (assisted by the publication of many of Crowley's books), and by the time of his death there were lodges across the United States and in a number of foreign countries. By 1992 the order had approximately 2,100 members in 135 lodges and local groups in some twenty countries.

Several months after McMurtry's death, the ninth-degree members met and elected a new caliph (the title assumed by McMurtry because of the way he came to head the order). The new caliph has chosen to keep his identity a secret from all except the higher-degree members and has never published his real name. He goes by his title, Hymenaeus Beta, acting outer head of the order.

One part of the organization of the OTO is an ecclesiastical structure, the Ecclesia Gnostica Catholica (or Gnostic Catholic Church). The church offers a Gnostic-like mass written by Crowley that embodies the order's perspective in a public, ritualized, and celebratory setting. Crowley was consecrated a bishop in the French Gnostic tradition of Charles J. Doinel, and he in turn passed that episcopal authority to the OTO leadership.

The order values and uses all of Aleister Crowley's writings on magic. In the 1980s it published two collections of the most important writings, one concerning the OTO and its organizational structure, and a second consisting of the "holy books" (the revelatory material received, i.e., channeled, by Crowley, as opposed to the books he consciously wrote). The first was issued as Volume 3, number 10 of The Equinox, one of the order's periodicals.

Ordo Templi Orientis (Roanoke, Virginia)

The Ordo Templi Orientis (Roanoke, Virginia) was one of several ritual magic groups to emerge in the 1970s. Karl Germer had served as outer head of the order for 15 years (1947–62), but after his death, the order endured a period of leaderlessness and corporate chaos. While several leaders stepped forward with papers and claims from either Aleister Crowley or Germer, Robert E. L. Snell put forward other credentials. He suggested that the mission of the OTO was to facilitate the movement of humanity into the new age of the Aeon of Horus, which had been announced by Crowley in 1904. Snell suggested that leaders must validate their role by their allegiance to the Law of Thelema (Will), the primary principle guiding the order. He also claimed direct contact with the secret chiefs, those preternatural beings (similar to the Theosophical Society's Great White Brotherhood) believed to be ultimately guiding the order.

Ordre Kabbalistique de la Rosecroix

A French Rosicrucian order founded by Joséphin Péladan (1858–1918) and the Marquis Stanislas de Guaita (1860–1898). The occultist Gérard Encausse (known as "Papus") was a member on the Supreme Council.

Orenda

A magical force. (See America, United States of)

Oresme, Nicole (ca. 1320–1382)

Bishop of Lisieux, France, in 1378, who published works on theology, politics, economics, mathematics, and physical science. His book Livre de Divinations expresses orthodox theological thought on various aspects of medieval occultism. The book is titled after the De Divinatione of Cicero and defines the arguments for and against belief in the occult, lists frauds and deceptions in divination, and distinguishes between astrology and astronomy. Oresme accepted alchemy and ascribed occult success to demons.

Oresme was born ca. 1320, probably in Normandy, and entered the College of Navarre in Paris in 1348. As Archdeacon of Bayeux, he accepted the Deanship of Rouen but retained his university office until obliged to relinquish it due to a decision by the Parliament of Paris. In 1378, after his translation of the works of Aristotle into French, he was given the bishopric of Lisieux. He died in 1382.

His Livre de Divinations was originally written in Latin, subsequently in French. In the absence of an English translation, there was little scholarly discussion of the work until the 1900s. In 1934, Lynn Thorndike devoted three chapters in Volume 3 of History of Magic and Experimental Science to a detailed study of Oresme's work.

Organisation pour la Recherche en Psychotronique

The Organisation pour la Recherche en Psychotronique was founded in 1987 in Toulouse, France, by the leadership of the Laboratoire Universitaire de Parapsychologie et d'Hygiene Mental to promote research in parapsychology in France and other French-speaking countries and throughout Europe. Its major contribution to the field was the formation of l'Oeil (the Eye), a library and data bank of parapsychological publications, through which it attempted to keep people in the field aware of research that had been conducted in order to avoid needless repetition of work in what has become a vast field. L'Oeil provided a mail order service for members who request articles from the library and data files.

The organization published two periodicals, including a journal, Revue Francaise de Parapsychologie, and a bulletin. Last known address: c/o Yves Lignon-OEIL, Laboratoire de Parapsychologie, UER Mathématiques, Université Toulouse-Le-Mirail 31058, Toulouse CEDEX, France.

Organization of Awareness (Canada)

The Organization of Awareness (now Cosmic Awareness Communications) underwent a splintering following the death in 1967 of its channel, William Ralph DUBY. One group, headquartered in Calgary, Alberta, Canada, under the leadership of Nick Chwelos, attempted to carry on the original effort, but it lasted only a few years.

Organization of Awareness (Federal Way)

Channel William Ralph DUBY, whose messages had tied together the Organization of Awareness (now Cosmic Awareness Communications), died in 1967. At that time the original group, which included adherents from around North America, splintered into a number of factions. One independent branch was established in Federal Way, Washington, by Frances Marcx. As with most of the splinter groups, it survived only a few years.

Organization of Awareness (Olympia)

The Organization of Awareness (now Cosmic Awareness Communications) was originally founded in the early 1960 and was built around the channeled material of William Ralph DUBY. In 1967 DUBY died, and the organization broke into a number of independent factions. One such faction, the Organization of Awareness of Olympia, Washington, was headed by David DeMoulin. It lasted only a few years.

Orgone

Primordial cosmic energy, claimed to have been discovered by Wilhelm Reich between 1936 and 1940. It is believed to be universally present and demonstrable visually (a blueness in the atmosphere), thermically, electrosopically, and by means of a Geiger-Müller counter. It manifest in living organisms as biological energy.

Reich invented what he termed an "orgone energy accumulator," a device to concentrate orgone energy in a box constructed from metallic material and covered by organic material. Reich found a temperature difference between the inside and outside of the accumulator and believed that the accumulated energy had a therapeutic effect on individuals. He performed experiments using the accumulator on cancer patients and reported substantial improvement in the health of patients. He authorized use of the accumulator for "therapeutic" purposes provided it was used in conjunction with "reputable" medical advice. As a result, he was the subject of court action instituted by the Food and Drug Administration in the United States. The FDA argued the accumulator had no demonstrable scientific effect on the human body.

As physician and psychotherapist, Reich rejected the charges against him and the accumulator and denied the right of federal inspectors to arbitrate in matters of natural science, an argument not accepted by the court. His attack upon the court's authority caused his imprisonment for contempt of court. The court also ordered the destruction of his apparatus and the burning of his books. He died in prison. Many of his writings have been republished.

Currently, the idea of a static device accumulating some form of energy is being investigated; it has yet to be demonstrated scientifically. In the 1970s and 1980s, some people experimented with pyramid forms in an effort to claim this effect and sharpen old razor blades. Reich also claimed discovery of a motor force in orgone energy comparable with similar claims by John Ernst Worrell Keely and John Murray Spear.

Compared to Other Occult Concepts

Some have noticed the similarity of orgone energy to earlier ideas of "Od" and the occult concepts of vital force. The biological manifestation of orgone energy in humans as described by Reich is comparable to the kundalini energy of Hindu yoga science, but more closely resembles the idea of prana.

An account of the construction of an orgone accumulator was given in Vol. 2 of The Discovery of the Orgone by Wilhelm Reich or the booklet The Orgone Energy Accumulator. Observations on orgone energy were published in the journal Orgonomic Functionalism edited by Paul and Jean Ritter, published between 1954 and 1963 from Nottingham, England, and in Energy and Character; the Journal of Bioenergetic Research published from 1970 onwards by David Boadella (an associate of Paul Ritter) from Abbotsbury, Dorset, England. In June 1955, the official American Association for Medical Orgonomy began publishing Orgonomic Medicine (c/o Orgonomic Publications Inc., 515 E. 88 St., New York, N.Y. 10028).

The Origin

The "Origin" is the name given the source of the channelled material received by Canadian businessman Aryn Dahya. Dahya was born to an Indian family of Muslim background living in Arusha, Tanzania, in West Africa, but as a child moved to Mombasa, Kenya, where he grew up. He was sent to England for college, and after receiving his degree in chemical engineering, he moved to Canada. Shortly thereafter he married his wife Karina, and subsequently fathered four children. In 1987 he founded the Casmyn Corporation, a company whose business took Dahya around the world. During his travels he visited his family's homeland in India and discovered firsthand the poverty in which many children were born. He developed a vision of spending his life improving the lives of others, especially children. To that end, in 1992 he founded the Bismillah Children's Fund. In 1993, Dahya began to receive messages from the Origin via automatic writing. The first messages were received when he was awakened in the middle of the night. At a later date he began to hear the messages, which he transcribed. The messages asked him to deliver the content, summarized in a "Statement of Universal Truth," to the world. The Origin is described as the Creator of All Things. Origin is believed to have given human beings all that was necessary for their service to the world, including freedom to act and flexibility to think. The Origin guides humanity and has offered a fundamental guiding principle: "Each of Us is a part of the Creator. Therefore, I am You and You are Me. Together We are Everything." The continued reception of information, at first considered merely a personal event, soon took on more expansive dimensions as Dahya understood that the messages were meant to be broadly shared. He received messages of general significance along with messages for specific groups. The most important of the latter was a set of messages on the nature of the scientific task and the problems currently faced by scientists who do not understand the consequences of their actions for the environment. The first collection of messages from the Origin was released in 1997. Further messages are expected to be released in the future.

Oris (1954–)

Oris is the spiritual name of Tsvelev Sergei Vassillievich, a psychic channel who emerged in Russia in the 1990s following the demise of the Soviet Union. Oris was born on January 25, 1954, in Mariinka, a town in the Donetsk. In 1978 he entered the Crimean Agricultural Institute, but his work in farming merely concealed his real interests. He became a student of martial arts and mastered kung-fu, karate, and judo, along with dim-mak, the art of deferred death. From his accomplishments, he wrote three books, which he were published in 1992 as A Way of Karate: From the Pupil Up to the Master (in Russian).

More importantly, Oris had become a channel, regularly receiving messages from a group of entities he came to know as the Universal Teachers. Many of these teachers come from the Pleiades and the Sirius star systems. Through the 1980s he spoke little about his channeling work for fear of being diagnosed as mentally deranged and placed in an asylum. Only in the 1990s did he begin sharing the information he had received. In 1990 he began to channel regularly and received the material for a book that he called Life After Life, or the Revelation of Aquarius. In the late 1990s, an English translation of that book, on the destiny of the human soul, was made available to a Western audience through the Internet. The book describes the movement of the soul after death into various spheres of the fiery world, its meeting with spiritual hierarchies in space, and its preparation for reincarnation.

While Oris' understanding of the destiny of the soul contradicts that of traditional Russian Christianity, he insists that his message is Christian in its emphasis on the essential truth of love and its attempt to highlight Jesus' words that his followers would surpass his deeds. The channeled messages attempt to free people from the bondage of dogmatism and conservatism. It is his belief that the One Truth had been split by various churches into competing truths. This competition will have disastrous results.

Oris believes the Earth is about to make a leap into the next dimension when many will experience ascension (known as the day of judgment in traditional religion). Those with love in their hearts and the truth of what is occurring will be able to overcome space and time and unite with the Higher Cosmic Consciousness. The continued bickering of religious groups is counterproductive to that end. While some accept ascension, others will be killed as ecological disasters and a world war wipe out a large percentage of humanity.

Oris currently resides in Yalta. His work can be accessed on the Internet at http://members.xoom.com_XMCM/orisde/English/.

Ornithomancy

The ancient Greek term for augury, the method of divination by the flight or song of birds. For the Romans, it became a part of their national religion and had a distinct priesthood. The practice was also popular among the Spanish people, the Amoganenses.

Orton

A spirit alluded to by the historian, Jean Froissart (1338–ca. 1410) as the familiar of the Lord of Corasse. According to legend a clerk whom his lordship had wronged had the spirit torment his superior, but through conversation the Lord of Corasse won the spirit over and Orton became his familiar. Nightly Orton would shake his pillow and waken him to tell him the news of the world. Froissart wrote:

"So Orton continued to serve the Lord of Corasse for a long time. I do not know whether he had more than one master, but, every week, at night, twice or thrice, he visited his master, and related to him the events which had happened in the different countries he had traversed, and the lord of Corasse wrote of them to the Count of Foix, who took a great pleasure in them, for he was the man in all the world who most willingly heard news of strange countries.

"Now it happened that the Lord of Corasse, as on other nights, was lying in his bed in his chamber by the side of his wife, who had become accustomed to listen to Orton without any alarm. Orton came, and drew away the lord's pillow, for he was fast asleep, and his lord awoke, and cried, 'Who is this?' He answered, 'It is I, Orton.' 'And whence comest thou?' 'I come from Prague, in Bohemia.' 'And how far from hence is this Prague, in Bohemia?' 'Why,' said he, 'about sixty days' journey.' 'And thou hast come so quickly?' 'Faith, I go as quickly as the wind, or even swifter.' 'And thou hast wings?' 'Faith, none.' 'How then canst thou fly so quickly?' Orton replied—'It does not concern thee to know.' 'Nay,' said he, 'I shall be very glad to know what fashion and form thou art of,' Orton answered, 'It does not concern thee to know; it is sufficient that I come hither, and bring thee sure and certain news.' 'By G—, Orton,' exclaimed the lord of Corasse, 'I should love thee better if I had seen thee.' 'Since you have so keen a desire to see me,' said Orton 'the first thing thou shalt see and encounter tomorrow morning, when you rise from your bed, shall be—I.' 'That is enough,' said the Lord of Corasse. 'Go, therefore; I give thee leave for the night.'

"When the morrow came, the Lord of Corasse began to rise, but the lady was so affrighted that she fell sick and could not get up that morning, and she said to her lord, who did not wish her to keep her bed, 'See if thou seest Orton. By my faith, I neither wish, if it please God, to see nor encounter him.' 'But I do,' said the Lord of Corasse. He leapt all nimbly from his bed, and seated himself upon the edge, and waited there to see Orton, but saw nothing. Then he went to the windows and threw them upon that he might see more clearly about the room, but he saw nothing, so that he could say, 'This is Orton.' The day passed, the night returned.

"When the Lord of Corasse was in his bed asleep, Orton came, and began speaking in his wonted manner. 'Go, go,' said his master, 'thou art a fibber: thou didst promise to show me to-day who thou wert, and thou hast not done so.' 'Nay,' said he, 'but I did.' 'Thou didst not.' 'And didst thou not see anything,' inquired Orton, 'when thou didst leap out of bed?' The Lord of Corasse thought a little while, and said—'Yes, while sitting on my bed, and thinking of thee, I saw two long straws upon the pavement, which turned towards each other and played about.' 'And that was I,' cried Orton, 'I had assumed that form.' Said the Lord of Corasse: 'It does not content me: I pray thee change thyself into some other form, so that I may see and know thee.' Orton replied: 'You will act so that you will lose me.' 'Not so,' said the Lord of Corasse: 'When I have once seen you, I shall not want to see you ever again.' 'Then,' said Orton, 'you shall see me tomorrow; and remember that the first thing you shall see upon leaving your chamber, will be I.' 'Be it so,' replied the Lord of Corasse. 'Begone with you, therefore, now. I give thee leave, for I wish to sleep.'

"Orton departed. When the morrow came, and at the third hour, the Lord of Corasse was up and attired in his usual fashion, he went forth from his chamber into a gallery that looked upon the castle-court. He cast therein his glances, and the first thing he saw was the largest sow he had ever seen; but she was so thin she seemed nothing but skin and bones, and she had great and long teats, pendant and quite attenuated, and a long and inflamed snout.

"The Sire de Corasse marvelled very much at this sow, and looked at her in anger, and exclaimed to his people, 'Go quickly, bring the dogs hither, and see that this Sow be well hunted.' The varlets ran nimbly, threw open the place where the dogs lay, and set them at the sow. The sow heaved a loud cry, and looked up at the Lord of Corasse, who supported himself upon a pillar buttress in front of his chamber. She was seen no more afterwards, for she vanished, nor did any one note what became of her. The Sire de Corasse returned into his chamber pensively, and bethought himself of Orton, and said, 'I think that I have seen my familiar; I repent me that I set my dogs upon him, for I doubt if I shall ever behold him again, since he has several times told me that as soon as I should provoke him I should lose him, and he would return no more.' He spoke truly; never again did Orton return to the Lord of Corasse, and the knight died in the following year."

Ortt, Felix (1866–1959)

Dutch engineer who developed a philosophy of "pneumatic-energetic monism," proposing that a spirit revealed itself under energy and entelechy. Ortt wrote on parapsychological subjects, including a theory of temperature drop in relation to psychical phenomena and "Philosophy of Occultism and Spiritualism," on concepts of substantiality and causality.

Osborn, Arthur W(alter) (1891– ?)

British author of books on the paranormal, higher consciousness, and mysticism. He was born March 10, 1891, in London, England, and privately educated. He became a businessman in the Dutch East Indies (1913–14) and later in Australia (1920–54). His career was interrupted by service in the British Army, Royal Field Artillery, during World War I. He received the Military Cross. Though he lived in Australia, Osborn was a member of the Society for Psychological Research, London.

Osborn was active in the Society for Psychological Research for the last decade of his life (1947–57). During this time he served on the council and edited the Journal. He also edited the society's Proceedings (1951–57). Osborn worked with the publishing company of Benn, and from 1932, with the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Osis, Karlis (1917–1997)

Parapsychologist who investigated extrasensory perception, spontaneous psi phenomena, and mediumship. He was born on December 26, 1917, at Riga, Latvia. After World War II he completed his graduate training in Germany at the University of Munich (Ph.D., 1950). His doctoral thesis concerned interpretations of Extrasensory Perception (ESP). He moved to the United States in 1950 on the displaced persons program after graduation and became a United States citizen in 1959.

His professional career in parapsychology began as a research associate at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University (1951–57). Osis subsequently became director of research at the Parapsychology Foundation in New York City (1957–62), and in 1962 became director of research at American Society for Psychical Research. He was a council member of the Parapsychological Association and served as its president for one term (1961–62).

At Duke University from 1951–1957, he worked with J. B. Rhine and explored the relationship between ESP and psychokinesis, precognition, and psi between men and animals. In 1958, Osis investigated the poltergeist phenomena at Seaford, Long Island, N.Y., and concluded the facts did not support a paranormal explanation. His report was published in the March-April 1958 Newsletter of the Parapsychology Foundation. Among his studies were those concerning the effect of distance on ESP and the relationship between meditation and ESP. Before moving to the American Society for Psychical Research he began work on deathbed experiences indicative of survival.

Osis died December 26, 1997.

Osmond, Humphrey (Fortescue) (1917–)

Psychiatrist who studied psychedelics and parapsychology. He was born July 1, 1917, at Milford, Surrey, England. He studied at the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, Canada, receiving a certificate in psychiatry in 1952; Guy's Hospital, London, England, receiving a M.R.C.S. and L.R.C.P. in 1942; and St. George's Hospital, London receiving a diploma in psychological medicine in 1949. During World War II, Osmond served as a surgeon lieutenant in the Royal Navy (1942–47), and afterward served in various positions in hospitals in London. In 1953, he moved to Canada as a physician superintendent and director of research (1953–61) at Saskatchewan Hospital, Weyburn, Canada. In 1961, he became the director of the Bureau of Research in Neurology and Psychiatry for the State of New Jersey.

In the 1950s, Osmond became interested in psychedelics, the study of mental activities and states of consciousness in relation to drugs and other pharmacological substances. His research then veered into parapsychology and the study of imagery in mediumship. He authored papers and books from his two decades of research. He was co-chairman with Emilio Servadio at the Conference on Parapsychology and Pharmacology held in 1959 at St. Paul de Vence, France.

Ossowiecki, Stephan (1877–1944)

Polish engineer and clairvoyant. Reportedly, he read thoughts from early childhood. At the Engineering Institute at Petrograd, where Ossowiecki studied, he reportedly answered questions enclosed in sealed envelopes. Supposedly he described the colored auras of people in his presence, heard raps, and could move objects telekinetically (without physical means). Reportedly when Ossowiecki practiced telekinesis, his clairvoyant powers diminished. At the age of thirty-five he “lost” his telekinetic powers and his “gift” of reading sealed papers developed.

With human subjects Ossowiecki claimed to know their most intimate thoughts and read their past, present, and future. Reportedly on several occasions, mostly involuntarily, but once by an effort of will, he projected his likeness over a distance. His friends claimed to have received the impression that he was near in flesh and blood.

Ossowiecki's “powers” were possibly psychometry rather than clairvoyance. It was claimed he never read the sealed letters word for word but perceived the ideas. He was unable to perceive ideas from typewritten or printed texts. Letters had to be written by a living person. If the writing was in a language he did not know, he could not disclose the contents but supposedly could describe the circumstances connected with the writer and the writing.

He impressed Charles Richet, Gustave Geley, and other scientists in reading sealed letters, the contents of which in many cases were unknown to the investigator. To Geley, he read the contents of a letter as follows: “I am in a zoological garden; a fight is going on, a large animal, an elephant. Is he not in the water? I see his trunk as he swims. I see blood.”

Geley said: “Good, but that is not all.”

Ossowiecki: “Wait, is he not wounded in his trunk?”

Geley: “Very good. There was a fight.”

Ossowiecki: "Yes, with a crocodile."

The sentence Geley wrote was "An elephant bathing in the Ganges was attacked by a crocodile who bit off his trunk."

In 1923, at the International Psychical Research Congress in Warsaw, Poland, Ossowiecki "read" the contents of a note sent by the Society for Psychical Research and sealed by Dr. Edwin J. Dingwall in an envelope. The note had been wrapped in several pieces of colored paper. The note contained the sketch of a flag, a bottle, and the date August 22, 1923. Reportedly Ossowiecki reproduced correctly the flag and the bottle and wrote the numerals of the date, although not in correct order. After the seal was broken, Ossowiecki was accepted by the Congress. The psychical researcher, Baron Schrenck-Notzing said: "Thank you, thank you, in the name of science."

Ossowiecki remained in Warsaw during World War II. He was killed in August 1944 during an uprising in which the Nazi occupation forces killed 9500 civilians.

Osty, Eugèn (1874–1938)

French physician and director of the Institut Métapsychique International. Osty was born May 16, 1874. He was physician at Jouet sur l'Aubor's from 1901 through 1924.

In 1910, Osty investigated psychical phenomena and summed up his research three years later in Lucidity and Intuition. Osty claimed the acquisition of knowledge through paranormal means was possible. His subsequent research was published in Supernormal Faculties in Man. He described the source of after-death communication as "crypto-psychism" (lingering after bodily death).

Osty was succeeded by Gustave Geley as the head of the Institut Métapsychique. Geley considered Osty "the first living authority on lucidity as applied to a human being, both under its practical and its theoretical aspect. His book Supernormal Faculties in Man (Une Faculté de Connaissance Supra-Normale) is truly epochal in the study of subjective metapsychics."

In 1931 and 1932, with the collaboration of his son, Marcel, Osty employed infra-red and ultra-violet rays in the study of physical and physiological phenomena of Rudi Schneider. The results were published in Les Pouvoirs inconnus de l'esprit sur la matiere. Osty died August 20, 1938.

Otani, Soji (1924–)

Japanese psychologist who founded the Japanese Society for Parapsychology. He was born on December 8, 1924, in Chiba Prefecture, Honshu, Japan. He studied at the University of Tokyo (B.A. 1949), became a research fellow at the National Institute of Education, Tokyo (1951–52), and a lecturer at Chiba University, Chiba-shi (1952–60). In 1960, Otani began his career as a professor at the Defense Academy Yokosuka-shi.

Otani was a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association and councilor at the Japan Psychic Science Association, Tokyo. Otani studied and conducted experiments in Extrasensory Perception (ESP) and Psychokinesis (PK) through the 1970s. In the late 1970s, he headed a team studying the Japanese psychic Masuaki Kiyota in metal-bending and nengraphy (psychic photography); Kiyota later admitted the results were fraudulent. Otani is generally credited with helping to establish parapsychology in Japan.

OTO See Ordo Templi Orientis

Ouija Board

Apparatus for psychic communication. The name was derived from the French word oui and the German word ja meaning 'yes.' A medium spells out messages by pointing out letters on a board with the apex of a wooden tripod on rollers. It is an ancient invention; a similar device was used in the days of Pythagoras, about 540 B.C.E. According to a French historical account of the philosopher's life, his sect held séances or circles at "a mystic table, moving on wheels, moved towards signs, which the philosopher and his pupil, Philolaus, interpreted to the audience as being revelations supposedly from the unseen world."

The original ouija board was replaced with a piece of alphabetical cardboard, and a finger-like pointer was added to the narrow end of the wooden tripod. If the pointer and the roll at the apex is replaced by a pencil to form a third leg, the ouija board becomes a planchette.

Mrs. Hester Dowden, an English medium stated: "The words come through so quickly that it is almost impossible to read them, and it requires an experienced shorthand writer to take them down when the traveller moves at its maximum speed." She also believed the cooperation of two automatists led to the best results.

It is believed the ouija board, when used as a method of communication, is slow and laborious but frequently works for those unable to receive automatic writing with a pencil.

While the ouija board remains popular and is sold commercially as a "game," it has been attacked both by critics of the occult and those within the occult community who consider it unsafe. Some mediums claim to have started with the board and "discovered" their psychic abilities as a result of using it.

“The Oupnekhat”

According to Lewis Spence in An Encyclopaedia of Occultism, the Oupnekhat or Oupnekhata (Book of the Secret) is a work written in Persian providing the following instructions for the production of visions:

“To produce the wise Maschqgui (vision), we must sit on a four-cornered base, namely the heels, and then close the gates of the body. The ears by the thumbs; the eyes by the forefingers; the nose by the middle; the lips by the four other fingers. The lamp within the body will then be preserved from wind and movement, and the whole body will be full of light. Like the tortoise, man must withdraw every sense within himself; the heart must be guarded, and then Brahma will enter into him, like fire and lightning. In the great fire in the cavity of the heart a small flame will be lit up, and in its center is Atma (the soul); and he who destroys all worldly desires and wisdom will be like a hawk which has broken through the meshes of the net, and will have become one with the great being.” Thus will he become Brahma-Atma (divine spirit), and will perceive by a light that far exceeds that of the sun. “Who, therefore, enters this path by Brahma must deny the world and its pleasures; must only cover his nakedness, and staff in hand collect enough, but no more, alms to maintain life. The lesser ones only do this; the greater throw aside pitcher and staff, and do not even read the Oupnekhata.”

This book is possibly a revision of one of the Hindu Upanishads. Oupnekhata is probably from a nineteenth-century German translation titled Das Oupnekhat; die aus den Veden zusammengefasste Lehre von dem Brahm (Dresden, 1882), derived from an earlier Latin edition of 1801.

There is no single Upanishad “Book of Secrets.” All the Upanishads contain the esoteric wisdom of Hindu metaphysics (derived from the Vedas.) Comparable forms of meditation are also found in various Hindu yoga treatises and in the Bhagavad-Gita, a Hindu scripture derived from the Mahabharata, a religious epic.

Our Lady of Endor Coven

Our Lady of Endor Coven was an early semipublic Satanic group, which grew out of the appearance of “Satanas, the Horned God,” to Herbert Arthur Sloane of Toledo, Ohio. Sloane was a child at the time. He later saw the same entity pictured on the dust jacket of a study of witchcraft, The God of the Witches. When Sloane was 25 years old, Satan appeared again.

In structuring Our Lady of Endor Coven, Sloane was heavily influenced by his reading of The Gnostic Religion, a scholarly treatise on gnosticism by Hans Jonas. In gnosticism, the creator God (of the Christians), is considered a lesser deity than another God. Satan is that God’s messenger. Satan brought knowledge of God to Eve in the Garden of Eden. That God takes no direct interest in this world, except for his concern that the sparks of deity trapped in this world return to their origin. This return occurs through gnosis, occult wisdom.

Sloane taught that this gnostic form of Satanism was the oldest religion, dating to the worship of the horned god pictured in the ancient cave paintings of Europe. As developed by Sloane, the religion emerged in the context of the neo-pagan revival of the late 1960s. It differed from Wicca by refusing to turn the Horned God into a fertility god.

The coven dissolved following Sloane’s death in the early 1980s.

Ouroboros (or Uroboros)

Ancient Greek alchemical symbol of a serpent eating his tail. The mystical work The Chrysopoeia of Kleopatra has a drawing of the Serpent Ouroboros eating his tail, with the text “One is All.” Another emblem illustrates the symbols of gold, silver, and mercury enclosed in two concentric circles with the text

“One is the serpent which has its poison according to two compositions” and “One is All and through it is All and by it is All and if you have not All, All is Nothing.” The symbol of Ouroboros has also been interpreted as the unity of sacrificer and sacrificed, relating to the symbolism of the mystical life.

The symbol dates back to Mesolithic (Azilian) culture and appeared in the symbolism of many races. The Gnostic text Pistis Sophia, describes the disc of the sun as a great dragon with his tail in his mouth. The fourth-century writer Horopollon stated the Egyptians represented the universe as a serpent devouring its own tail, a symbol of eternity and immortality, an image also found on Gnostic gems.

In alchemy, the tail-eating dragon represented the guardian of mystical treasure, symbolized by the sun. Alchemy was to destroy or dissolve this guardian as a stage towards knowledge of this treasure.

Possibly the familiar Chinese Yin-Yang symbol is related to the tail-devouring serpent—here the masculine-feminine principles throughout nature are held in balance.

Oursler died January 7, 1985, after a long illness.

Ousby, W(illiam) J(oseph) (1904–)

British investigator on hypnosis. Ousby performed field studies of yoga and African witchcraft. He was born in Liverpool, England, and worked as a journalist then as an industrial psychological consultant; he also studied hypnosis. Ousby lectured and taught self-hypnosis in Britain, Australia, and New Zealand. He spent several years in Africa, where he studied the methods of witch doctors. In India, he trained in hatha yoga and investigated fire walking and trance conditions. Ousby later practiced as a specialist in hypnosis and self-hypnosis in London.

Ouspensky, P(eter) D(emianovitch) (1878–1947)

Follower of early twentieth-century spiritual teacher Georgi I. Gurdjieff (1877–1949) and interpreter of his system. Ouspensky was born in Russia in 1878. He became a student of mathematics at Moscow University, then went on to become a journalist.

In 1907, motivated by the conviction that some higher form of knowledge must exist beyond the tangent fields of science and math, Ouspensky became aware of Theosophical literature and the possible synthesis of religion, mysticism, and science. In 1909, he published The Fourth Way, dealing with abstract mathematical concepts. He later published a book on yoga, followed by Tertium Organum; the Third Canon of Thought; a Key to the Enigmas of the World (English translation London, 1923). It offered his synthesis of time, space, relativity, Theosophy, cosmic consciousness, and Eastern and Western philosophy.

From 1913, Ouspensky traveled on an extended journey to Egypt, India, and Ceylon, searching for the miraculous, and upon his return gave a series of lectures on his experiences. In 1915, he met Sophia Grigorievna Maximenko (who later became his wife) and the mystic G. I. Gurdjieff (who became his guru).

Ouspensky became a disciple and interpreter of Gurdjieff's system (i.e., that there exists real possibilities for individuals to evolve psychologically into a state of consciousness far higher than that in which they spend the whole of their ordinary lives) until 1924, when he decided to follow his own path. He lectured, wrote books, and conducted study groups in England and the United States on the work of Gurdjieff until his death in 1947. Rom Landau attended and wrote an account of an Ouspensky lecture in London.

Out-of-the-Body Travel

A phenomenon based on the belief that individual consciousness can leave the physical body during sleep or trance and travel to distant places or into an ethereal or astral realm. Different religions in the ancient world taught that men and women were essentially spiritual beings (souls) incarnated for a divine purpose, and that they shed the body at death and survived in an afterlife or a new incarnation.

The ancient Hindus believed in the phenomenon of out-of-the-body travel, featured in such Scriptures as the Yoga Vashishta-Maharamayana of Valmiki. Hindu teachings recognize three bodies—physical, subtle, and causal. The causal body builds up the characteristics of one's next reincarnation by the desires and fears in its present life, but the subtle body may sometimes leave the physical body during its lifetime and reenter it after traveling in the physical world. Ancient Egyptian teachings also represented the soul as having the ability to hover outside the physical body in the ka, or subtle body.

In the twentieth century, psychical researchers began to study and conduct experiments on the possibility of out-of-the-body travel. Their interest was provoked by its possible contribution to evidence of the survival of death. Beginning in 1920 Hugh G. Callaway, under the pseudonym Oliver Fox, published a series of articles in The Occult Review. His articles would later become the basis of a book, Astral Projection (1939). Meanwhile, Sylvan J. Muldoon, an American experimenter who professed an ease with astral projection (another name for out-of-the-body travel), began to work with psychical researcher Hereward Carrington, their work resulting in the first of a series of books, The Projection of the Astral Body, in 1929.

Both Callaway and Muldoon gave detailed firsthand accounts of consciously controlled and involuntary journeys outside the body. Sometimes these involved appearances to other individuals or the obtaining of information that could not have been ascertained by other means. Such accounts were thus highly suggestive.

Certain techniques were also described by both Callaway and Muldoon for facilitating the release of the astral or ethereal body from the physical body. These included visualizing such mental images as flying or being in an elevator traveling upward, just before going to sleep. Some involuntary releases occurred as a result of regaining waking consciousness while still in a dream state (i.e., lucid dreaming). This was often stimulated by some apparent incongruity in the dream, such as dreaming of one's own room but noticing that the wallpaper has the wrong pattern. Such awareness sometimes resulted in normal consciousness, but with a feeling of being outside the physical body and able to look down at it.

Many individuals who claimed to have experienced astral projection describe themselves as joined to the physical body by an infinitely extensible connection—rather like a psychic umbilical cord—that would snatch the astral body back to the physical body if one were disturbed by fear.

Some cases of astral projection have reportedly occurred as a result of anesthetization (during operations) or even a sudden shock.

In spite of the significance attributed to out-of-the-body experiences (OBEs), both as a parapsychological phenomenon and for their relevance to the question of survival after death, they did not receive the acknowledged attention of the parapsychological community until British scientist Robert Crookall began to publish a number of books in which he cataloged and analyzed hundreds of cases of astral projection from individuals in all walks of life. It seems that the phenomenon is much more widespread than generally supposed, but some people are sensitive about discussing such experiences. Moreover, the majority of cases are of involuntary projection; consciously controlled projection under laboratory conditions is rare.

Crookall distinguished between the physical body of everyday life, a “vehicle of vitality,” and a “soul body,” connected by an extensible cord. Movement from one body to another is reported as often accompanied by strange sounds and sensations—a “click” in the head, a “blackout,” or a “journey down a long tunnel.” Reportedly, the projector often sees his own physical body lying on the bed and sometimes the semiphysical vehicle of vitality is observed by other people. Crookall also cited instances of the condition of consciousness in which one sees a double of oneself (see also Vardøgr).

Again, while much astral travel is supposedly in the world of everyday life, one sometimes moves into regions of otherworldly beauty or depression, characterized by Crookall as “Paradise condition” (the finer area of earth) or “Hades condition” (a kind of purgatorial area). Here one sometimes encounters friends and relatives who have died, or even angelic or demonic beings. Return to the physical body is often accompanied by violent loud “repercussion” effects. Sometimes the transition to and from the physical body appears to be assisted by “deliverers” or spirit helpers, or even obstructed by “hinderers.”

Projection may be preceded by a cataleptic condition of the body in which there are hypnogogic illusions. Because of the close association of dreaming and hallucinatory images, many people have dismissed claimed OBEs as illusory or merely dreams.

One controlled experiment in astral projection was undertaken by the medium Eileen J. Garrett in 1934, when a test was set up between observers Dr. Mühl in New York and Dr. D. Svenson in Reykjavik, Iceland. Reportedly, Garrett projected her astral double from New York to Iceland and acquired test information afterward verified as correct. The case is described in her book My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship (1939), although at the time the experimenters were not named, in order to protect their anonymity, and “Newfoundland” was substituted for Reykjavik.

Since World War II, parapsychologists have given special attention to the phenomenon of OBEs. A number of special terms were devised by Celia Green, director of the Institute of Psychophysical Research, Oxford, England, in a scientific study of approximately four hundred individuals claiming OBEs. The general term escomatic was applied where objects of perception appeared organized in such a way that the observer seemed to observe from a point of view not coincident with the physical body. Parasomatic was defined as an escomatic experience in which the percipient was associated with a seemingly spatial entity with which he felt himself to be in the same kind of relationship as, in the normal state, with his physical body. Asomatic denoted an escomatic state in which the subject was temporarily unaware of being associated with any body or spatial entity at all.

Other experiments have been conducted at the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) in New York and the Psychical Research Foundation, Durham, North Carolina. At the ASPR Dr. Karlis Osis used a special target box designed to eliminate ordinary ESP. Subjects were invited to “fly in” astrally and read the target. Over a hundred volunteers participated in the test. Although Osis reported that the overall results were not significant, some of the subjects were tested further under laboratory conditions. Among those who reportedly performed well in such tests was psychic Ingo Swann.

At the Psychical Research Foundation, brain wave recordings were taken from OBE subjects, with special attention given to detection of the subject at the target location. There is a suggestion that some subjects may have been able to manifest psychokinetic effects while projecting. PK effects had been reported earlier in the experiments of Sylvan J. Muldoon in the book The Projection of the Astral Body (1929).

In 1956 Dr. Hornell Hart made a survey of reported apparitions of the dead, which he compared with apparitions of living persons when having OBE experiences. He concluded that “the projected personality carries full memories and purposes.”

As with other laboratory experiments in parapsychology, OBE tests lack the intrinsic interest of involuntary experiences, and acceptable evidence is correspondingly reduced. Many laboratory experimenters regard OBEs as a form of traveling clairvoyance and have criticized the methodology employed in many experiments because the methodology fails to distinguish between the two. A person experiencing astral travel may be having an experience somewhat analogous to “virtual reality.” It remains to be seen whether scientists can devise techniques that can validate objectively the phenomena of OBEs.

Meanwhile, in the many cases of involuntary projection, it is believed the experience itself often has a profound effect on the outlook of the subject, since it seems to give firsthand subjective evidence for the existence of a soul that survives the death of the physical body. Such experiences have become the subject of study by psychologists such as Elizabeth Kübler-Ross and Raymond Moody, who claimed to have been affected by the intensity of the accounts and their long-term, life-changing quality. Critics of such stories have noted that ultimately there is little independent confirmation of the stories, and while there is a high degree of similarity between the experiences, there is enough divergence to call the nature of the experience into question. Others have also noted that the use of OBEs as evidence of survival is somewhat limited in that even if the consciousness could leave a living body and return there is no reason to jump to the conclusion that the consciousness could survive the death of its host body.

Some psychologists are confident that OBEs can be fully explained as hallucinatory mental phenomena. British parapsychologist Susan J. Blackmore has given special attention to the phenomenon in attempting to discover a psychological explanation. Her book Beyond the Body (1981) proposes that the experience is an altered state of consciousness characterized by vivid imagery, in which the subject’s cognitive system is disturbed, losing input control and replacing normal reality with one drawing upon memory. Blackmore’s experiments and theories have special interest to parapsychologists because, unlike so many investigators of claimed out-of-the-body phenomena, she has had such experiences herself.

Owen, Alan Robert George (1919–)

Mathematician and parapsychologist. He was born July 4, 1919 at Bristol, England. During World War II, he studied at Cambridge University (B.A. 1940, M.A. 1945, Ph.D. 1948). After graduation he became a research fellow at Trinity College, Cambridge (1948–52) and met C. D. Broad, who kindled Owen's interest in parapsychology. Owen also met and, in 1952, married Iris May Pepper. He joined and became president of the Cambridge Society for Psychical Research, and was a council member of the Society for Psychical Research. While at Cambridge, he conducted research on poltergeist. The published results, Can We Explain the Poltergeist?, received the 1964 award from the Parapsychology Foundation as the best book of the year. Owen later moved to Canada where he taught genetics and mathematics at the University of Toronto. He cofounded with his wife, Iris Owen, the New Horizons Research Foundation in Toronto and the Toronto Society for Psychical Research. Before moving to Canada, he had investigated the British psychic, Matthew Manning. He stayed in contact with Manning, and in 1974 invited him (then 18 years old) to Toronto, to be studied at a seminar on psychokinesis. During this visit, Manning successfully tried the metal-bending phenomenon popularized by Uri Geller. Electroencephalograph recordings revealed significant movements toward theta and delta frequencies prior to Manning bending metal objects. Owen retired in 1988.

Owen, George Vale (1869–1931)

British clergyman and convert of Spiritualism. Owen was born on June 26, 1869, in Birmingham, England. He was educated at the Midland Institute and Queen's College in Birmingham and ordained in the Church of England. After curacies at Seaforth, Fairfield and Liverpool, he became vicar of Orford, New Warrington. Here he created a new church and worked for twenty years.

After some psychic experiences Owen developed automatic writing, and received, from high spirits, an account of life after death and further philosophical teachings. After Lord Northcliffe published the scripts in his newspaper, the Weekly Dispatch, Owen was forced out of ministry by the Church authorities. He resigned his vicarage and went on a lecture tour in America and in England, eventually settling in a pastorate of a Spiritualist congregation in London. Through 1920, he authored a number of books about his new faith, his most notable being the five-volume Life Beyond the Veil.

He died March 8, 1931. Messages purported to emanate from the surviving ego of Owen were supposedly published in A Voice from Heaven by Frederick H. Haines. The clairvoyant Haines claimed the book contained messages he had "received automatically" from the deceased Owen.

Owen, Iris M.

Nurse and psychical researcher. As a registered nurse and volunteer in social work, Owen became a member of the governing board of schools and chairperson of governors of an approved school for delinquent boys. In 1962, she married parapsychologist Alan Robert George Owen. They shared an interest in poltergeist phenomena. She moved to Canada in the 1960s and became secretary of the Toronto Society for Psychical Research. Owen also assisted her husband's work at the New Horizons Research Foundation, Toronto.

In the early 1970s, she led the "Philip" experiment. A group of people sitting as a séance circle created a fictitious figure whom they named Philip and who then began to manifest physical phenomena. The result destroyed the "spirit" hypothesis by demonstrating that spirits were unnecessary in the production of phenomena—it could be produced by the sitters.

Owen, Robert (1771–1858)

British socialist and humanitarian. Owen was born May 14, 1771, at Newtown, Montgomeryshire. He was successful in the cotton mill industry and, in 1800, established a utopian society based on his cotton mills at New Lanark.

Owen established a community at New Lanark. This news induced the settlers of the Harmony Society in Indiana to sell land to Owen, who purchased Harmony with its mills, factories, houses, and land when the Harmonists moved to Pennsylvania. Owen came to the United States in December 1824 and established the community of New Harmony, based on socialist principles; the experiment did not succeed. For an account of New Harmony see Strange Cults & Utopias of 19th Century America by J. H. Noyes (Dover, 1966).

On May 14, 1856, at The First Meeting of the Congress of the Reformers of the World, detailed plans, based on spiritually-inspired architectural conceptions, were submitted through Owen's agency for building Homes of Harmony.

At the age of 83, Owen developed an interest in Spiritualism after several sittings with Maria B. Hayden, the first American medium who visited England. In 1853, in his journal, the Rational Quarterly Review, Owen published a formal profession of his new faith. In the same year he issued as a separate pamphlet The Future of the Human Race; or great, glorious and peaceful Revolution, to be effected through the agency of departed spirits of good and superior men and women. The periodical installments of his New Existence of Man Upon Earth (1854–55) were, for some time, the only British publications dealing with Spiritualism.

Nevertheless, Owen cannot be ranked as a typical Spiritualist. Communication with the Beyond for him was another means for the advancement of mankind. Supposedly Andrew Jackson Davis, who saw him when lecturing in America in 1846, wrote in November 1847, some months before the Rochester knockings, that according to a message he received from the spiritual spheres, Robert Owen was destined to hold "open intercourse" with the higher world. Reportedly some of the prophecy communications were printed in Owen's autobiography The Life of Robert Owen (2 vols., London, 1857–58). Owen died at Newtown November 17, 1858, and his Spiritualist interests were carried forward by his son, Robert Dale Owen.

Owen, Robert Dale (1801–1877)

Son of the British socialist Robert Owen. He was born November 9, 1801 in Glasgow, Scotland, and educated in Switzerland. Owen eventually emigrated to America. He lived for several years in his father's socialistic community, New Harmony, in Indiana. He served in the Indiana legislature and in Congress. He introduced the bill organizing the Smithsonian Institution and in 1846 became one of its regents and chairman of its Building Committee. Owen was a member of the Indiana Constitutional Convention in 1850. In 1853, Owen was appointed Chargé d'Affaires at Naples and Minister in 1855. He remained there until 1858.

Owen was disappointed to learn of his father's attachment to Spiritualism. But experiences with the famous medium D. D. Home during his stay in Naples started his career of psychic investigation. Owen worked to prove whether survival was a certainty or delusion. He published two books, Footfalls on the Boundaries of Another World (1860) and The Debatable Land Between this World and the Next (1871), in support of the Spiritualist movement. In spite of scandals, such as cheating on the part of the mediums Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Holmes in 1874, Owen continued to advocate his new faith until his death. He died June 17, 1877.

Owens, Ted (1920–)

Psychic who in the 1960s claimed contact with intelligences from flying saucers. Unlike other contactees, Owens does not claim to have taken a ride on a saucer but uses his brain as a radio set for telepathic messages, to pass on to anyone interested. According to Owens, the ultimate purpose of the space intelligences was for him to act as an ambassador for them to world governments.

As a psychic, Owens claimed to control weather, predict events, and heal the sick. He has an IQ of 150, and is a member of Mensa, a well known organization of individuals with high mental test scores.

Oxford Golden Dawn Occult Society

The Oxford Golden Dawn Occult Society is a magical order that, as its name implies, is based in Oxford, England. It takes its name (without any claim of organizational continuity) from the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn and teaches a form of magic that it describes as a modern equivalent of the Golden Dawn system, the pioneering system of modern ceremonial magic. The society has a more public program aimed at disseminating authentic information about occultism and magic that includes lectures, workshops, and conferences, and a discussion seminar on the last Friday of each month. These are open to the public and run the gamut from magic to shamanism, to qabala (or Kabbalah) and Witchcraft.

Members of the society follow different traditions of magical practice including Neo-Pagan/Wicca traditions. Many find the society a place to meet others who share their magical interests but operate different magical systems. Often meetings involve the working of various rituals on an experimental basis. The society has served as a catalyst for new groups to form by people who wish to follow up on a particular ritual or idea.

The society also teaches a system of magic that combines insights from the Western Hermetic tradition with Eastern Tantric practice. Training is open to associate members of the society who can present themselves at one of their centers in Oxford and London. There is also a correspondence course in magic. The society considers itself a sister group to AMOOKOS, which it recommends to members especially interested in Tantra.

The society meets in various venues for its different activities. The Oxford group has an Internet page at <http://www.cix.co.uk/~mandrake/ogdos.htm> and the London group maintains a page at <http://www.lawbright.com/logdos/>. The society may be contacted through either site. The society is a small organization of fewer than 100 members in the United Kingdom.

Ozanne, Charles E(uгене) (1865–1961)

History and philosophy teacher, who devoted many years to research in parapsychology after retirement from teaching. He was born April 14, 1865, in Cleveland, Ohio. Ozanne studied at Western Reserve University, Cleveland (B.A. 1889), Yale University (B.S.T. 1892), and Harvard University (M.A. 1895). He taught history and civics at Central High School, Cleveland, Ohio, until 1935. During those years he provided financial support for research in parapsychology at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, and after 1951 moved to Durham because of the research at the Parapsychology Laboratory.

In 1961, Ozanne founded the Psychical Research Foundation, Inc. at Durham, N.C. The foundation is an independent research organization concerned with mental, spiritual, or personality characteristics associated with survival after death. William G. Roll was director of the Foundation. Ozanne died April 5, 1961, at Durham, North Carolina.

Oz Factor

The Oz Factor, a term coined by ufologists and author Jenny Randles (b. 1951), refers to the experience of being isolated or transported by the real world of everyday life into another environment which is quite similar to the real world but changed enough to be noticeable and disturbing. Such reports have been common in both UFO and paranormal accounts, but had been pushed aside (their evidential value being somewhat limited) until Randles called attention to such experiences as a common element in some types of UFO encounters.

Folklorist Peter M. Rojcewicz recounted such an experience in 1980 while working on his Ph.D. dissertation, which happened to be on UFOs. While working in the library, he had a strange encounter with a man who approached the table at which he worked and engaged him in conversation. As they talked on the subject of his dissertation, the man suddenly shouted accusingly, "Flying saucers are the most important fact of the century, and you are not interested?" Shortly thereafter he left. Rojcewicz was relieved at his departure, thinking the man disturbed. However, as he tried to return to his work, he had a feeling that all was not right. Unable to stay seated, he wandered around the library. He noticed that no librarians were staffing the desks and that no patrons seemed to be in the library. In a mild panic, he returned to his working space and tried to settle his mind. An hour later when he finally left the library, all seemed to have returned to normal.

Such experiences often appear as an aspect of a longer story of paranormal encounters, doing more to describe the atmosphere surrounding more spectacular or definitive experiences. Also, such stories appear closely related to phenomena like déjà vu, which make an impact upon the person experiencing them, but only minimally impress one to whom the story is told. Stories abound of people who have felt a presence, sensed some guidance or seen something that led them to sense that they had been unwittingly pulled away from the normal sequence of experiences. It is almost impossible to further investigate the anecdotal accounts, however reality-shattering they might be to the person experiencing them.

Pacific Neuropsychiatric Institute

The Pacific Neuropsychiatric Institute, founded in 1992 in Seattle, Washington, by South African psychiatrist Vernon M. Neppe, serves primarily as a center treating patients suffering from neuropsychiatric disorders, but also as a center for research on neuropsychiatric-related phenomena, including paranormal phenomena. Prior to establishing the institute, Neppe had an outstanding career as a professor of psychiatry at the University of Witwatersrand in Johannesburg, South Africa, and the University of Washington.

Along with his work on specialized areas from forensic psychiatry to geriatric psychiatry, Neppe has had a long-term interest in paranormal phenomena that manifests as early as his masters thesis in 1979, in which he documented a correlation between the subjective experience of having a paranormal experience with the activity of the brain. Over the years he became convinced that if such experiences are real, then they should have links to more phenomena documented in psychiatric literature.

At the institute, Neppe has made use of a set of what he considers more neutral descriptive terms for phenomena such as ESP, remote viewing, or psychokinesis. The whole area of anomalous or paranormal phenomena is referred to as "delta." A clairvoyant event, an experience of reception of a delta experience, is termed an "afferent delta," and an event such as psychokinesis, or mind over matter, is termed an "efferent delta," an outgoing element of an anomalous experience. The new language recognizes the problem of researching subjective experiences of persons, which, while very real to the individual, is most difficult to understand in objective terms. Neppe has been especially concerned with correlating anomalous experience with brain activity. The institute may be contacted on the Internet at <http://www.pni.org>.

Research physicist who has experimented in the field of parapsychology. He was born on June 7, 1927, in Silver City,

New Mexico, and later attended the University of New Mexico (B.S., 1950; M.S., 1952). After graduation he became a research engineer at the Westinghouse Research Laboratories, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania (1952–85). He believes hypnosis may enable subjects to develop ESP. Pack was a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association.

Pacts with the Devil

Throughout history there have been documentations of individuals making agreements with the Devil. An agreement said to have been entered into between Louis Gaufridi and the Devil follows:

"I, Louis, a priest, renounce each and every one of the spiritual and corporal gifts which may accrue to me from God, from the Virgin, and from all the saints, and especially from my patron John the Baptist, and the apostles Peter and Paul and St. Francis. And to you, Lucifer, now before me, I give myself and all the good I may accomplish, except the returns from the sacrament in the cases where I may administer it; all of which I sign and attest."

On his side, Lucifer made the following agreement with Louis Gaufridi: "I, Lucifer, bind myself to give you, Louis Gaufridi, priest, the faculty and power of bewitching by blowing with the mouth, all and any of the women and girls you may desire; in proof of which I sign myself Lucifer."

Accounts of pacts with the devil emerged after Satan became an important figure in Christian theology and an image of the devil began to spread abroad in popular preaching. It was given a biblical basis from a reading of Isaiah 28:15, "We have entered into a league with death; we have made a covenant with hell." Thus Origen (185–254 C.E.) and, more important, St. Augustine (354–430 C.E.) could speak of a pact with demons.

The earliest Christian legend involving a pact with the devil is a story concerning St. Basil (ca. 329–379 C.E.). The most important was that of Theophilus, bursar of the church of Adam in Northern Cilicia (ca. 538 C.E.). After his bishop withdrew his employment, Theophilus sold his soul to the devil to recover the position. This story, translated into Latin in the eighth century by Paul the deacon, became a popular tale and was used as the basis of the drama Le Miracle de Théophile, by Ruteboeuf of Arras.

It was not until the medieval period however, that numerous accounts of pacts with the devil appear in literature. From the sixteenth century, the pact included homage and reverence to the devil and was thus considered a form of apostasy and heresy, crimes pursued by the Inquisition.

The first extended description of a pact with the devil seems to have been published in 1435 by Johannes Nider in his book

Formicarius. Then in 1486 the Malleus Maleficarum (The Witches' Hammer)—the main text used by the Inquisition and Protestant witch-hunters over the next centuries—tied the worship of Satan to witchcraft. Witches were branded as evil for, among other reasons, having made a pact with the devil and then having intercourse with him. The publication of The Witches' Hammer launched the great era of witch-hunts that culminated in the incidents at Salem Village, Massachusetts, three centuries later. Overwhelmingly, accounts of pacts with the devil are tied to witchcraft persecution.

In 1587 the first book appeared recounting the story of Johannes Faust, the legendary magician who made the most famous pact with a devil figure, the demon Mephistopheles. In exchange for his soul, Mephistopheles agreed to serve Faust for 24 years. He was granted every wish for that period, only to be killed by the demon when the 24 years ended. Faust has inspired a number of literary reflections upon the individual's relationship with evil.

Signs of the Devil's Presence

F. Pierre Crespet described the mark with which Satan brands his own:

"It may be assumed that it is no fallacy but very evident that Satan's mark on sorcerers is like leprosy, for the spot is insensitive to all punctures, and it is in the possession of such marks that one recognizes them as true sorcerers for they feel the puncture no more than if they were leprous, nor does any blood appear, and never indeed, does any pain that may be inflicted cause them to move the part.

"They receive, with this badge, the power of injuring and of pleasing, and, secretly or openly, their children are made to participate in the oath and connection which the fathers have taken with the devil. Even the mothers with this in view, dedicate and consecrate their children to the demons, not only as soon as born but even when conceived, and so it happens that, through the ministrations of these demons, sorcerers have been seen with two pupils in each eye, while others had the picture of a horse in one eye and two pupils in the other, and such serve as marks and badges of contracts made with them, for these demons can engrave and render in effigy such or similar lines and features on the bodies of the very young embryo."

Jacques Fontaine writes,

"These marks are not engraved on the bodies of sorcerers by the demons for recognition purposes only, as the captains of companies of light-horse know those of their number by the colour of their coats, but to imitate the creator of all things, to show his power and the authority he has gained over those miserable beings who have allowed themselves to be caught by his cunning and trickery, and by the recognition of these marks of their master to keep them in his power. Further, to prevent them, as far as possible, from withdrawing from their promises and oaths of fidelity, because though breaking faith with him the marks still remain with them and serve, in an accusation, as a means of betraying them, with even the smallest amount of evidence that may be brought forward.

"Louis Gaufridi, a prisoner, who had just been condemned to be burnt . . . was marked in more than thirty places over the body and on the loins especially there was a mark of lust so large and deep, considering the site, that a needle could be inserted for the width of three fingers across it without any feeling being shown by the puncture."

The same author claimed that the marks on sorcerers were areas that had mortified from the touch of the devil's finger.

"About 1591, Leonarde Chastenet, an old woman of eighty, was taken up as a sorceress while begging in Poitou. Brought before Mathurin Bonnevault, who deposed to having seen her at the meeting of witches, she confessed that she had been there with her husband, and that the devil, a very disgusting beast, was there in the form of a goat. She denied that she would have carried out any witchcraft, but nineteen witnesses testified to her having caused the death of five labourers and a number of animals.

"Finding her crimes discovered and herself condemned she confessed that she had made a compact with the devil, given him some of her hair, and promised to do all the harm she could. She added that at night in prison the devil had appeared to her, in the form of a cat, to which she expressed the wish to die, whereupon the devil presented her with two pieces of wax telling her to eat them and she would die, but she had been unwilling to do it. She had the pieces of wax with her, but on examination their composition could not be made out. She was then condemned and the pieces of wax burnt with her."

An Exorcism

According to French Catholic Bible scholar Dom Augustin Calmet at the Jesuit Chapel of St. Ignatius in Molsheim, a well-known inscription gave the history of a young German nobleman named Michel Louis, of the family of Boubenhoren. He was sent as a youth to the court of the duke of Lorraine to learn French, and there lost all his money at cards. Reduced to despair, he decided to give himself to the devil if that spirit would give him good money, for he was afraid that the devil would be able to supply him only with counterfeit.

While Louis was thinking this over, a young man his own age, well built and well clothed, suddenly appeared before him. Asking him the cause of his distress, the young man put out a handful of money and invited him to prove its worth, telling Louis to look him up again the next day. Louis returned to his companions, who were still playing, won back all he had lost, and won all his companions' money as well.

Then he called on his Devil who asked in return three drops of blood, which he collected in an acorn shell. Offering a pen to Louis, the devil told him to write his dictation. This consisted of unknown words, written on two different contracts, one of which the Devil retained. The other was put into Louis's arm, in the place from which the blood had been taken. The Devil then said, "I undertake to serve you for seven years, after which you belong to me without reserve."

The young man agreed, though with some dread, and the Devil appeared to him day and night in various forms, inspiring him to various strange deeds, always with a tendency to evil.

The fatal period of seven years began drawing to an end when Louis was about 20 years old. He went home, where the Devil inspired him to poison his father and mother, burn the castle, and kill himself. He tried to carry out all these crimes, but God prevented their success—the poison failed to act on his parents, and the gun with which he would have killed himself misfired twice.

Becoming more and more uneasy, he revealed his plight to some of his father's servants and begged them to get help. The Devil seized him, twisting his body around and stopping very short of breaking his bones. His mother was forced to put him in the care of monks. He soon left them and escaped to Islade, but was sent back to Molsheim by his brother, canon of Wissbourg, who again put him into the hands of the monks.

It was then that the demon made the most violent efforts against Louis, appearing to him in the form of wild animals. In one attempt the demon, in the form of a wild man covered with hair, threw on the ground a contract different from the original, trying by this false show to get Louis out of the hands of those who were looking after him and to prevent his making a full confession.

Finally, October 20, 1603, was set aside for proof in the Chapel of St. Ignatius, and for reproduction of the true contract containing the deal made with the demon. The young man made profession of the orthodox Catholic faith, renounced the demon, and received the Holy Eucharist. Then with terrible cries he said that he saw two goats of immense size standing with their forefeet in the air, each holding between its hoofs one of the contracts.

But when the exorcism began and the name of St. Ignatius was invoked, the two goats disappeared and there issued from the arm or left hand of the young man—practically without pain and leaving no scar—a contract, which fell at the feet of the exorcist. There remained the contract that had been retained by the demon. The exorcisms began once more. St. Ignatius was invoked and a mass was promised in his honor. A stork appeared—large, deformed, and ill-shapen—and dropped from its beak the second contract, which was found on the altar.

Of Magic and Medicine

There is frequent mention among ancient writers of certain demons that showed themselves, especially at midday, to those with whom they were on familiar terms. They visited such persons in the form of men or animals or allowed themselves to be enclosed in a letter, account, or vial, or even in a ring, wide and hollow within. “Magicians are known,” states Pierre Le Loyer, “who make use of them [demons], and to my great regret I am forced to admit that the practice is only too common.”

Housdorf in his Théâtre des exemples du 8e commandement, quoted by Simon Goulart, states,

“A doctor of medicine forgot himself so far as to form an alliance with the enemy of our salvation whom he called up and enclosed in a glass from which the seducer and familiar spirit answered him. The doctor was fortunate in the cure of ailments, and amassed great wealth in his practice, so much so that he left his children the sum of 78,000 francs. Shortly before his death, when his conscience began to prick him, he fell into such a frenzy that he never spoke but to invoke the devil or blaspheme the Holy Ghost and it was in this unfortunate condition that he passed away.”

A Priest's Pact

In the celebrated case of Urbain Grandier and the Nuns of Loudon, the diabolical pact between Grandier and the devils was produced as evidence in his trial in 1634. It survives today in the Bibliothèque Nationale in France. This extraordinary document is handwritten in looking-glass letters in Latin (presumably devils did everything in reverse) and bears the signatures (also reversed) of Satanus Beelzebub, Elimi Leviathan, and Astaroth. Urbain Grandier's pact, in his own handwriting and signed, states his allegiance to Lucifer and his renunciation of the Christian faith. In return, the pact promises Grandier the love of women, wealth, and worldly honor. There are, of course, doubts as to the authenticity of this document, which the prosecution at Grandier's trial claimed had been stolen by the demon Asmodeus from Lucifer's private files.

Charges of a pact with the devil were also entered in the trials of Jeanne D'Arc and Gilles de Laval.

Modern Satanism

With the revival of occultism in the nineteenth century and the emergence of Satanism in France, a new set of modern accounts of pacts with the devil began to appear. Such pacts were discussed at length by Paul Christian in his monumental History and Practice of Magic (1870). Montague Summers, for example, describes an incident reported in 1929 by Maurice Garcon, who claimed to have watched a sorcerer invoke Satan in a secluded location near Fontainebleau. At the peak of the midnight ceremony, the sorcerer offered the devil a pact written in his own blood. He offered his soul and another soul to the devil for every wish he was granted in life. However, the devil did not appear.

Gracon said he believed that the devil refused to become visible because he (Gracon) was spying upon the sorcerer.

Padrick, Sid (fl. 1965)

UFO contactee Sid Padrick rose out of obscurity in 1965 when he claimed that on January 30 a spacecraft landed near his home in Watsonville, California. A high school graduate, Padrick worked as a radio/television repairman. He was married and the father of three sons. Frightened at the sight of the ship, he dropped his guard after the being from the ship assured him that they were not hostile. He invited Padrick aboard their ship. Walking into the saucer-shaped ship, he met a humanoid being who spoke English and indicated his name was Xeno. All the entities on the craft were young. The single female among the crew was attractive. The other crew members did not speak, and Padrick concluded that they communicated by telepathy. This observation appeared to be confirmed by Xeno's slowness in answering Padrick's questions. He seemed to be receiving his answers through telepathic contact with another source.

Xeno indicated that he came from a planet hidden by another planet that could be seen from Earth. He told Padrick of his hometown on that planet. There was no crime or sickness. People lived long lives and the society practiced strict birth control. Children were trained for the single task they would work at later in life.

Unusual in contact claims, Padrick said he was led into a room on the spaceship that functioned as a chapel and was invited to “pay his respects to the Supreme Deity.” He offered prayer in the manner he had been accustomed to do through his life, but for the first time actually felt the presence of God. He concluded that these advanced beings had found the means to unite science and religion.

The contact had been made in the early morning hours while Padrick's family was asleep and he was walking outside. He was returned to his home around 4 a.m. Several days later he reported the incident to nearby Hamilton Air Force Base and announced plans to write a book, though it was never published. He lectured for several years to contactee audiences and claimed further contacts, though he did not elaborate on them. Eventually he moved back into the obscurity from which he had emerged.

Pagan Alliance

The Pagan Alliance is the major networking organization of Pagans and Witches in Australia. As in the United Kingdom and North America, nature-centered Goddess worship spread through Australia during the 1970s and 1980s. The movement was based in a number of small autonomous covens and groves and in somewhat limited associations of covens that shared the same heritage and approach to magic and witchcraft. The Pagan Alliance, founded in 1991, emerged to promote communication and cooperation between the very decentralized movement. Members affirm their love for and kinship with nature; an ethic of individual responsibility; and an acceptance of the many-faceted nature of divinity.

The alliance is organized through a set of state councils, each of which seeks to have at least three members and represent three different Pagan/Wiccan traditions. The alliance attempts to network different groups and individuals and to serve as a contact between the Pagan community and outsiders, especially the news media. On a national level, the alliance involves itself as an advocacy group on issues of interest to Pagans including freedom of religion. In this regard, it monitors news coverage and responds to attacks, especially those involving negative stereotypes. It has also compiled a list of Pagans licensed to perform official functions such as marriages and funerals.

The alliance is currently administered by Chel and Jon Bardell, who may be contacted at P.O. Box 823, Bathurst, New South Wales 2795. The alliance's Internet site is found at <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Thebes/4320>. It publishes the Pagan Times quarterly.

Pagenstecher, Gustav (1855–1942)

Nineteenth-century German physician who conducted important experiments in psychometry. He was born in Germany in 1855, and received his medical degree from Leipzig University. Shortly afterward he moved to Mexico where he practiced medicine for some four decades.

One day Pagenstecher treated a patient, Maria Reyes Zierold, for insomnia by using hypnosis. During treatment she claimed to see beyond the closed doors of her room and could describe accurately individuals and events outside the range of normal vision. With Zierold's permission Pagenstecher conducted further experiments to test this paranormal perception. He discovered her normal physical senses were blocked by hypnotic sensation; nevertheless, she reported sensations of vision, smell, taste, hearing, or feelings from objects held by her. These sensations enabled her to report information connected with the history or associations of the objects held by her.

In 1919 Pagenstecher reported on these experiments to a medical society in Mexico City, which appointed a committee to study this psychometric ability. The committee gave Zierold pumice stones to hold while in trance, and she accurately reported information concerning the stones, their origin, and other details. The committee reported favorably on Pagenstecher's view that the phenomena appeared genuinely paranormal.

The next year Pagenstecher reported the facts to the American Society for Psychical Research via an article in the Society's Journal. In 1921 Walter Franklin Prince visited Mexico to observe Pagenstecher's experiments and to conduct his own. Prince also endorsed the phenomena in his reports to the society. Pagenstecher died December 26, 1942, in Mexico City.

The Paigoels

According to Nathaniel E. Kindersley, these were devils of Hindustan mythology. Some of the Hindus believed that the paigoels were originally created devils; other believed they were individuals put out of heaven because of their great sin. Some of these devils had individual names and were the tempters of men to special sins; others entered into the bodies of men and took possession of them. It was also believed that the souls of wicked men joined the paigoels.

Palingenesis

A term employed by the philosophers of the seventeenth century to denote the "resurrection of plants," and the method of achieving their astral appearance after destruction.

The Roman poet/philosopher Lucretius (ca. 98–55 B.C.E.) attacked the popular notion of ghosts by claiming they were not spirits returned from the mansions of the dead, but nothing more than thin films, pellicles, or membranes, cast off from the surface of all bodies like the exuviae (sloughs of reptiles).

An opinion by no means dissimilar to that of the Epicureans was revived in Europe about the middle of the seventeenth century and the process was performed by the likes of Sir Kenelm Digby, Athanasius Kircher, Abbé de Vallemont, and others. The complicated and exacting procedure began with a selected plant, a rose, for example. The operator then bruised it, burnt it, collected its ashes, and, in the process of calcination, extracted from it a salt. This salt was then put into a glass vial and mixed with some peculiar undisclosed substance.

When the compound was formed, it was pulverulent (crumbly) and blue. The powder was next submitted to a gentle heat. With its particles instantly set into motion, it then gradually arose (it was claimed) from the midst of the ashes—a stem, leaves, and flowers. It appeared as an apparition of the plant, which had been submitted to combustion. But as soon as the heat was removed, the form of the plant that had been sublimed was precipitated to the bottom of the vessel. Heat was then reapplied and the plant form was resuscitated; when it was withdrawn the form once more became latent among the ashes.

This notable experiment was said to have been performed before the Royal Society of England, and to have satisfactorily proved that the presence of heat gave a sort of life to the plant apparition, and that the absence of nourishment caused its death. The poet Abraham Cowley was quite delighted with the story of the experiment of the rose and its ashes, since he believed that he, too, had detected the same phenomenon in letters written with the juice of lemons, which were revived with the application of heat. He celebrated the mystic power of calorica in a poem:

"Strange power of heat, thou yet dost show,
Like winter earth, naked, or cloth'd with snow.
But as the quick'ning sun approaching near,
The plants arise up by degrees, new line
A sudden paint adorns the trees,
And all kind nature's characters appear.

So nothing yet in thee is seen,
But when a genial heat warms thee within,
A new-born wood of various lines there grows;
Here buds an A, and there a B,
Here sprouts a V, and there a T,
And all the flourishing letters stand in rows."

The rationale of this famous experiment made on the rose ashes was attempted by Kircher. He supposed the seminal virtue of every known substance and even its substantial form resided in its salt. This salt was concealed in the ashes of the rose, and adding heat put it in motion. The particles of the salt were quickly sublimed and by being moved about in the vial like a vortex, the particles arranged themselves in the same general form they had possessed from nature. Other particles were subject to a similar law, and accordingly, by a disposing affinity, they resumed their proper position, either in the stalk, the leaves, or the flowers.

The next object of these philosophers was to apply their doctrine to explain the popular belief in ghosts. As the experimenters claimed the substantial form of each body resided in a sort of volatile salt, it was believed that superstitious notions must have arisen about ghosts haunting churchyards. When a dead body had been committed to the earth, the salts were exhaled during the heating process of fermentation. Each saline particle then resumed the same relative situation it had held in the living body, and thus a complete human form was induced.

Palingenesis was similar to the early claims of Lucretius involving a chemical explanation of the discovery of filmy substances, which he had observed to arise from all bodies. Yet, in order to prove that apparitions might really be explained on this principle, a crucial experiment was necessary.

Three alchemists obtained a quantity of earth-mould from St. Innocent's Church in Paris, believing that this matter might contain the true philosophers' stone. They subjected it to a distillatory process. They saw (it was claimed) the forms of men produced in their vials, which immediately caused them to end the project. This was brought to the attention of the Institute of Paris (under the protection of Louis XIV), which, in turn, took up the business with much seriousness. The result of its own investigations appeared in the Miscellanea Curiosa. James F. Ferrier, in a volume of the Manchester Philosophical Transactions, made an abstract of one of these French documents:

"A malefactor was executed, of whose body a grave physician got possession for the purpose of dissection. After disposing of the other parts of the body, he ordered his assistant to pulverize part of the cranium, which was a remedy at that time admitted in dispensaries. The powder was left in a paper on the table of the museum, where the assistant slept. About midnight he was awakened by a noise in the room, which obliged him to rise immediately. The noise continued about the table, without any visible agent; and at length he traced it to the powder, in the midst of which he now beheld, to his unspeakable dismay, a small head with open eyes staring at him; presently two branches appeared, which formed into arms and hands; then the ribs became visible, which were soon clothed with muscles and integuments; next the lower extremities sprouted out, and when they appeared perfect, the puppet (for his size was small) reared himself on his feet; instantly his clothes came upon him, and he appeared in the very cloak he wore at his execution. The affrighted spectator, who stood hitherto mumbling his prayers with great application, now thought of nothing but making his escape from the revived ruffian; but this was impossible, for the apparition planted himself in the way, and, after divers fierce looks and threatening gestures, opened the door and went out. No doubt the powder was missing next day."

But older analogous results are on record, suggesting that the blood was the chief part of the human frame in which those saline particles resided. These arrangements gave rise to the popular notion of ghosts. John Webster's book The Displaying of Supposed Witchcraft (1677) related an experiment, given on the authority of Robert Fludd, in which this conclusion was drawn.

"A certain chymical operator, by name La Pierre, near that place in Paris called Le Temple, received blood from the hands of a certain bishop to operate upon. Which he setting to work upon the Saturday, did continue it for a week with divers degrees of fire. But about midnight, the Friday following, this artificer, lying in a chamber next to his laboratory, betwixt sleeping and waking, heard a horrible noise, like unto the lowing of kine, or the roaring of a lion; and continuing quiet, after the ceasing of the sound in the laboratory, the moon being at the full, and, by shining enlightening the chamber suddenly, betwixt himself and the window he saw a thick little cloud, condensed into an oval form, which, after, by little and little, did seem completely to put on the shape of a man, and making another and a sharp clamour, did suddenly vanish. And not only some noble persons in the next chambers, but also the host with his wife, lying in a lower room of the house, and also the neighbours dwelling in the opposite side of the street, did distinctly hear as well the bellowing as the voice; and some of them were awaked with the vehemency thereof.

"But the artificer said, that in this he found solace, because the bishop, of whom he had it, did admonish him, that if any of them from whom the blood was extracted should die, in the time of its putrefaction, his spirit was wont often to appear to the sight of the artificer, with perturbation. Also forthwith, upon Saturday following, he took the retort from the furnace, and broke it with the light stroke of a little key, and there, in the remaining blood, found the perfect representation of an human head, agreeable in face, eyes, nostrils, mouth, and hairs, that were somewhat thin, and of a golden colour."

Regarding this narrative Webster added:

"There were many ocular witnesses, as the noble person, Lord of Bourdaloue, the chief secretary to the Duke of Guise; and he [Fludd] had this relation from the Lord of Menanton, living in that house at the same time from a certain doctor of physic, from the owner of the house, and many others."

Apart from such credulous statements, the claimed results of early experiments in palingenesis have long since been abandoned by science, but curious echoes of the subject have appeared in twentieth-century borderland researches. For example, Charles W. Littlefield, a physician of Seattle, Washington, published a book titled "M. M. M."—Man, Minerals and Masters (1937) in which he described his experiments as showing by demonstration and illustration that thoughts are things, and that their power may be expressed through certain mineral compounds occurring in organic nature. Littlefield claimed the crystallization of solutions of organic salts could be modified by mental energy, and stated that he had produced microscopic animal or human-like forms in this way.

The work of another experimenter was reminiscent of the seventeenth-century Royal Society claim of the restoration of the form of a destroyed plant. In the 1920s a British biological chemist named Morley-Martin claimed the forms of fishes, plants, and animals continued to exist in miniature in ancient azoic rocks. Morley-Martin experimented by taking fragments of such rock and submitting them to a temperature of 2,000–3,000 degrees Fahrenheit in an electric oven. He isolated what he named "primordial protoplasm" from the ashes, which he transformed into crystalloids with Canada balsam. In the course of time the crystalloids condensed and produced numerous organisms that were creature-like, even having life and movement.

These little-known and bizarre experiments are described by Maurice Maeterlinck in his book La Grande Porte (Paris, 1939), and the work of both Littlefield and Morley-Martin is described in the booklet The Morley-Martin Experiments issued by the Borderland Sciences Research Associates. In these experiments palingenesis merged with the old theory of spontaneous generation, which was considered to have been solved by Louis Pasteur's experiments on micro-organisms, although P. J. A. Béchamp in France and H. Charlton Bastian in Britain claimed Pasteur's work did not cover all the facts.

Of possible relevance to the palingenesis experiments were the "osmotic growths" produced by Dr. Stéphane Leduc of Nantes. These were formed from crystal solutions and not only presented the cellular structure of living matter, but also reproduced such functions as food absorption, metabolism, and the excretion of waste products. These beautiful growths are described in Leduc's book The Mechanism of Life (1914).

Palladino, Eusapia (1854–1918)

The public name of Signora Raphael Delgaiz, the first physical medium who stood in the crossfire of collective scientific investigation for more than twenty years all over Europe and in America. It was largely due to her career that physical phenomena was given center stage by psychical research and the psychological complex of fraud was, in the early twentieth century, introduced to an array of brilliant minds.

Palladino was born in Minervo-Murge, Italy, on January 21, 1854. Her birth cost her mother's life; her father was assassinated by brigands in 1866. As a little girl she heard raps on the furniture against which she was leaning; she saw eyes glaring at her in the darkness and was frequently frightened in the night when invisible hands stripped off her bedclothes.

When she became orphaned, a family of the upper bourgeoisie received her in Naples as a nursemaid. They soon detected that she was not an ordinary girl, but her real discovery and mediumistic education was due to Signor Damiani, a noted Italian psychic investigator. His wife went to a séance in London. "John King" manifested and spoke about a powerful medium in Naples who was his reincarnated daughter. He gave her address, street and number. In 1872 Damiani went to the house and found Palladino, of whom he had never heard before. The development of her abilities progressed at a rapid rate. In the first five or six years she devoted herself mainly to phenomena of movements without contact. Then came the famous spectral appearances, the phantom limbs so often noticed to issue from her body, and the materialization of full but incomplete figures.

Her control "John King" communicated through raps and in trance spoke in Italian alone. Palladino always knew what phenomenon was going to take place and could warn the sitters. She appeared to suffer extremely during the process and exhibited a synchronism between her gestures and the movement without contact. If she glared defiantly at a table it began to move towards her, if she warned it off it backed away. A forcible motion of her head was accompanied by raps and upward movements of her hand would cause the table to lift in the air. Another peculiarity of her séances was that any particular phenomenon had to be wished for incessantly. Strong desire on the part of the sitters present usually brought about the occurrence.

The first scientist who proclaimed the reality of her phenomena was Ercole Chiaia. An opportunity to invite public attention to Palladino was occasioned by Cesare Lombroso's article on "The Influence of Civilisation upon Genius," which concluded:

"Twenty or thirty years are enough to make the whole world admire a discovery which was treated as madness at the moment when it was made. Even at the present day academic bodies laugh at hypnotism and homeopathy. Who knows whether my friends and I, who laugh at Spiritualism, are not in error, just as hypnotised persons are?"

On August 9, 1888, Chiaia addressed an open letter to Lombroso and challenged him to observe Palladino, saying:

"The case I allude to is that of an invalid woman who belongs to the humblest class of society. She is nearly thirty years old and very ignorant; her appearance is neither fascinating nor endowed with the power which modern criminologists call irresistible; but when she wishes, be it by day or by night, she can divert a curious group for an hour or so with the most surprising phenomena. Either bound to a seat, or firmly held by the hands of the curious, she attracts to her the articles of furniture which surround her, lifts them up, holds them suspended in the air like Mahomet's coffin, and makes them come down again with undulatory movements, as if they were obeying her will. She increases their height or lessens it according to her pleasure. She raps or taps upon the walls, the ceiling, the floor, with fine rhythm and cadence. In response to the requests of the spectators something like flashes of electricity shoot forth from her body, and envelop her or enwrap the spectators of these marvellous scenes. She draws upon cards that you hold out, everything that you want—figures, signatures, numbers, sentences—by just stretching out her hand towards the indicated place.

"If you place in the corner of the room a vessel containing a layer of soft clay, you find after some moments the imprint in it of a small or a large hand, the image of a face (front view or profile) from which a plaster cast can be taken. In this way portraits of a face at different angles have been preserved, and those who desire so to do can thus make serious and important studies.

"This woman rises in the air, no matter what bands tie her down. She seems to lie upon the empty air, as on a couch, contrary to all the laws of gravity; she plays on musical instruments—organs, bells, tambourines—as if they had been touched by her hands or moved by the breath of invisible gnomes. This woman at times can increase her stature by more than four inches.

"She is like an India rubber doll, like an automaton of a new kind; she takes strange forms. How many legs and arms has she? We do not know. While her limbs are being held by incredulous spectators, we see other limbs coming into view, without her knowing where they come from. Her shoes are too small to fit these witch-feet of hers, and this particular circumstance gives rise to the suspicion of the intervention of mysterious power."

Two years later Lombroso visited Naples for a sitting. His first report stated:

"Eusapia's feet and hands were held by Professor Tamburini and by Lombroso. A handbell placed on a small table more than a yard distant from Eusapia sounded in the air above the heads of the sitters and then descended on the table, thence going two yards to a bed. While the bell was ringing we struck a match and saw the bell up in the air."

A detailed account of his observations and reflections appeared in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques (1892). Lombroso admitted the reality of the phenomena and, on the basis of the analogy of the transposition of the senses observed in hypnotic cases, suggested a transformation of the powers of the medium as an explanation. He continued his researches for many years and ended in the acceptance of the spirit theory.

In his book After Death—What? (1909) he expanded upon his observation of the medium:

"Her culture is that of a villager of the lower order. She frequently fails in good sense and in common sense, but has a subtlety and intuition of the intellect in sharp contrast with her lack of cultivation, and which make her, in spite of that, judge and appreciate at their true worth the men of genius whom she meets, without being influenced in her judgments by prestige or the false stamp that wealth and authority set upon people.

"She is ingenuous to the extent of allowing herself to be imposed on and mystified by an intriguer, and, on the other hand, sometimes exhibits, both before and during her trance states, a slyness that in some cases goes as far as deception. . . .

"She possesses a most keen visual memory, to the extent of remembering five to ten mental texts presented to her during three seconds. She has the ability to recall very vividly, especially with her eyes shut, the outlines of persons, and with a power of vision so precise as to be able to delineate their characteristic traits.

“But she is not without morbid characteristics, which sometimes extend to hysterical insanity. She passes rapidly from joy to grief, has strange phobias (for example the fear of staining her hands), is extremely impressionable and subject to dreams in spite of her mature age. Not rarely she has hallucinations, frequently sees her own ghost. As a child she believed two eyes glared at her from behind trees and hedges. When she is in anger, especially when her reputation as a medium is insulted, she is so violent and impulsive as actually to fly at her adversaries and beat them.

“These tendencies are offset in her by a singular kindness of heart which leads her to lavish her gains upon the poor and upon infants in order to relieve their misfortunes, and which impels her to feel boundless pity for the old and weak. . . . The same goodness of heart drives her to protect animals that are being maltreated, by sharply rebuking their cruel oppressors.”

Arthur Levy also left a description of Palladino in his report on a séance held in the house of Camille Flammarion in 1898:

“Two things arrest the attention when you look at her. First, her large eyes, filled with strange fire, sparkle in their orbits, or again, seem filled with swift gleams of phosphorescent fire, sometimes bluish, sometimes golden. If I did not fear that the metaphor was too easy when it concerns a Neapolitan woman, I should say that her eyes appear like the glowing lava fires of Vesuvius, seen from a distance in a dark night. The other peculiarity is a mouth with strange contours. We do not know whether it expresses amusement, suffering or scorn.”

Lombroso made a thorough psychological study of Palladino. He wrote:

“Many are the crafty tricks she plays, both in the state of trance (unconsciously) and out of it—for example, freeing one of her two hands, held by the controllers, for the sake of moving objects near her; making touches; slowly lifting the legs of the table by means of one of her knees and one of her feet, and feigning to adjust her hair and then slyly pulling out one hair and putting it over the little balance tray of a letter-weigher in order to lower it. She was seen by Faifofer, before her séances, furtively gathering flowers in a garden, that she might feign them to be ‘apports’ by availing herself of the shrouding dark of the room.”

Similar observations were made by Enrico Morselli and later investigators. Her penchant to cheat caused Palladino trouble in her later years and destroyed any contribution her career might have made in the long run.

The sittings in Naples, which started Lombroso on his career as a psychical researcher, were followed by an investigation in Milan in 1892. Professor Schiaparelli, director of the Observatory of Milan, Professor Gerosa, G. B. Ermacora, Alexander Aksakof, Baron Carl du Prel and Charles Richet were among the members of the Milan Commission. Part of the report, based on a series of seventeen sittings, observed:

“It is impossible to count the number of times that a hand appeared and was touched by one of us. Suffice it to say that doubt was no longer possible. It was indeed a living human hand which we saw and touched, while at the same time the bust and the arms of the medium remained visible, and her hands were held by those on either side of her.”

At the end of the report the committee concluded:

“1) That in the circumstances given, none of the phenomena obtained in more or less intense light could have been produced by the aid of any artifice whatever.

”2) That the same opinion may be affirmed in a large measure with regard to the phenomena obtained in complete darkness. For some of them we can well admit, strictly speaking, the possibility of imitating them by means of some adroit artifice on the part of the medium; nevertheless, according to what we have said, it is evident that this hypothesis would be not only improbable, but even useless in the present case, since even admitting it, the assembly of facts clearly proved would not be invalidated by it.”

In the following year, a series of séances took place in Naples under the direction of a Professor Wagner of the University of St. Petersburg. The next series was in Rome in 1893–94 under the direction of Mr. de Semiradski, but was interrupted by a visit to Warsaw where Julien Ochorowicz conducted additional experiments. He worked out the hypothesis of a “fluidic double” which, under certain conditions, detaches itself and acts independently of the body of the medium. In 1894, at Richet’s home on the Ile Roubaud, Sir Oliver Lodge and F. W. H. Myers had their first opportunity to witness what they believed to be genuine physical phenomena of an unusual order. Lodge reported to the Society for Psychical Research that he had no doubts that movement occurred without contact.

Richard Hodgson, of Boston, criticized the report and pointed out that the precautions described did not exclude trickery. He suggested explanations for various phenomena on the theory that the medium could get a hand or foot free. Lodge, Myers, and Richet each replied. Richet pointed out that he attended 15 séances with Palladino in Milan and Rome and held 40 at Carquieranne and in the Ile Roubaud over a period of three months under his own supervision. He concluded: “It appears to me that after three months’ practice and meditation one can arrive at the certainty of holding well a human hand.”

Palladino at Cambridge (1895)

As an outcome of the critical reception of this report, Palladino was invited to England. In August and September 1895 twenty sittings were held at Myers’s house in Cambridge. Hodgson and J. N. Maskelyne, the professional conjurer, were also invited. The sitters’ attitude was not so much to prevent fraud as to detect it. Hodgson intentionally left Palladino’s hand free. She was given every opportunity to cheat and she availed herself of this generosity.

In communicating the findings of the Cambridge investigation to the Society for Psychical Research, Myers, who on the Ile Roubaud was convinced of having witnessed supernormal phenomena, reversed himself in a most decisive fashion:

“I cannot doubt that we observed much conscious and deliberate fraud, of a kind which must have needed long practice to bring it to its present level of skill. Nor can I find any excuse for her fraud (assuming that such excuse would be valid) in the attitude of mind of the persons, several of them distinguished in the world of science, who assisted in this inquiry. Their attitude was a fair and open one; in all cases they showed patience, and in several cases the impression first made on their minds was distinctly favourable. With growing experience, however, and careful observation of the precise conditions permitted or refused to us, the existence of some fraud became clear; and fraud was attempted when the tests were as good as we were allowed to make them, quite as indisputably as on the few occasions when our holding was intentionally left inadequate in order to trace more exactly the modus operandi. Moreover, the fraud occurred both in the medium’s waking state and during her real or alleged trance. I do not think there is adequate reason to suppose that any of the phenomena at Cambridge were genuine.”

The Cambridge report was not well received by some psychical researchers. Lodge only attended two of the sittings but declared that he failed to see any resemblance between the phenomena there produced and those witnessed on the Ile Roubaud. He reaffirmed his belief in what he observed there. Ada Goodrich-Freer soon broke with the Society for Psychical Research and defended Palladino in her book Essays in Psychical Research (1899): “The Italian medium, Eusapia Palladino, may have been a fraud of the deepest dye for anything I know to the contrary, but she never had a fair chance in England. Even her cheating seems to have been badly done. The atmosphere was inimical; the poor thing was paralysed.”

In his book Metapsychical Phenomena (1905), Joseph Maxwell concluded, "I cannot help thinking that the Cambridge experimenters were either ill-guided, or ill-favoured, for I have obtained raps with Eusapia Palladino in full light, I have obtained them with many other mediums, and it is a minimum phenomenon which they could have and ought to have obtained, had they experimented in a proper manner."

Meanwhile, Ochorowitz argued that Palladino frequently released her hand for no other reason than to touch her head, which was in pain from the manifestations. It was a natural reflex and a fixed habit. Immediately before the mediumistic doubling of her personality, her hand was affected with hyperaesthesia and consequently, the pressure of the hand of another made her ill, especially in the dorsal quarter. The medium acted by autosuggestion and the order to go as far as an indicated point was given by her brain simultaneously to the dynamic hand and the corporeal hand, since in the normal state they form only one. Sometimes the dynamic hand remained in place, while her own hand went in the indicated direction. Ochorowitz concluded that "not only was conscious fraud not proved on Palladino at Cambridge, but not the slightest effort was made to do so. Unconscious fraud was proved in much larger proportion than in all the preceding experiments. This negative result is vindicated by a blundering method little in accordance with the nature of the phenomena."

It appears from the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research that the dynamic hands of which Ochorowitz spoke created a strong presumption against Palladino. The paper said: "It is hardly necessary to remark that the continuity of the spirit limbs with the body of the medium is, prima facie, a circumstance strongly suggestive of fraud."

The issue of the "phantom limbs" continued to intrigue researchers, while at the same time it was well recognized that Palladino frequently resorted to fraud whenever allowed. Camille Flammarion tried to defend her:

"She is frequently ill on the following day, sometimes even on the second day following, and is incapable of taking any nourishment without immediately vomiting. One can readily conceive, then, that when she is able to perform certain wonders without any expenditure of force and merely by a more or less skillful piece of deception, she prefers the second procedure to the first. It does not exhaust her at all, and may even amuse her. Let me remark, in the next place, that, during these experiments, she is generally in a half-awake condition which is somewhat similar to the hypnotic or somnambulistic sleep. Her fixed idea is to produce phenomena; and she produces them, no matter how."

In the very month of the exposure a new series of experiments was made at l'Agnelas, in the residence of Eugene Rochas, president of the Polytechnic School. Dr. Dariex, editor of the Annales des Sciences Psychiques, Count de Gramont, Joseph Maxwell, Professor Sabatier, and Baron de Watteville participated. They all attested that the phenomena produced were genuine. On the result of the observations, Rochas built up his theory of "externalisation of motricity."

On December 1, 1898, a séance was arranged in Richet's library in Paris for the purpose of assisting Palladino to regain her reputation. The séance took place in good light, her wrists and ankles were held by the sitters, and before each experience she warned the sitters what she was going to do in order that they might establish the phenomenon to the best of their faculties and observation. She did not cease to admonish Myers to pay the closest attention and to remember exactly afterwards what had happened. "Under these conditions," wrote Theodore Flournoy, "I saw phenomena which I then believed, and still believe, to be certainly inexplicable by any known laws of physics and physiology." When Myers was begged by Richet to state his view, he again reversed himself and avowed his renewed belief in the supernatural character of Palladino's mediumship. Lombroso adopted the spirit hypothesis and Flamma-rión became firmly convinced of the reality of Palladino's phenomena.

In 1901 Genoa was the scene of important experiments in the presence of Enrico Morselli, professor of psychology at the University of Genoa, and the astronomer Porro, director of the observatories of Genoa, Turin, and later La Plata in Argentina. Much instrumental investigation was carried on by Herdilitzka, Charles Foà, and Aggazotti; assistants of Professor Mosso, the distinguished physiologist in Turin; and by Filippo Bottazzi, director of the Physiological Institute at the University of Naples, with the assistance of six other professors.

The Institut Général Psychologique of Paris carried on extensive experiments in 43 sittings from 1905 to 1907. Pierre and Marie Curie were among the investigators. Fraud and genuine phenomena were observed in a strange mixture. Jules Courtier's report states that movements seemed to be produced by simple contact with the medium's hands; even without contact, such movements were registered by automatic recording instruments that ruled out the hypothesis of collective hallucination. The instruments show that molecular vibrations in distant external objects could be positively asserted. They explained the fraud by suggesting that Palladino was growing old and that she was strongly tempted not to disappoint her clients when genuine power failed. On the whole, the phenomena were less striking and abundant as the years passed. On one or two occasions she succeeded in discharging an electroscope without anybody being able to find out how it was done.

In consequence of this report and under the effect of a growing number of testimonies to the genuine powers of Palladino, the council of the Society for Psychical Research reconsidered its attitude and delegated in 1908 a committee of three very capable and skeptical investigators: W. W. Baggally, a practical conjurer; Hereward Carrington, an amateur conjurer, whose book The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism (1907) is a reliable authority on fraudulent performances; and Everard Feilding, who also brought many a fraudulent medium to grief. They held eleven sittings in November and December in a room of a member of the committee at the Hotel Victoria in Naples.

Finally, they admitted that the phenomena were genuine and inexplicable by fraud. Their report was published as Part 59 of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, and even Frank Podmore, the most hardened skeptic of the time, felt compelled to say: "Here, for the first time perhaps in the history of modern spiritualism, we seem to find the issue put fairly and squarely before us. It is difficult for any man who reads the Committee's report to dismiss the whole business as mere vulgar cheating."

It is sufficient, however, against any outside criticism to quote the opinion of Everard Feilding as expressed after the sixth séance:

"For the first time I have absolute conviction that our observation is not mistaken. I realise as an appreciable fact in life that, from an empty curtain, I have seen hands and heads come forth, and that behind the empty curtain I have been seized by living fingers, the existence and position of the nails of which were perceptible. I have seen this extraordinary woman, sitting outside the curtain, held hand and foot, visible to myself, by my colleagues, immobile, except for the occasional straining of a limb while some entity within the curtain has over and over again pressed my hand in a position clearly beyond her reach. I refuse to entertain the possibility of a doubt that it could be anything else, and, remembering my own belief of a very short time ago, I shall not be able to complain, though I shall unquestionably be annoyed when I find that to be the case."

By this verdict, Palladino's standing was enormously enhanced, and not without reason. Richet wrote:

"There have perhaps never been so many different, sceptical and scrupulous investigators into the work of any medium or more minute investigations. During twenty years, from 1888 to 1908, she submitted, at the hands of the most skilled European and American experimentalists, to tests of the most rigorous and decisive kind, and during all this time men of science, resolved not to be deceived, have verified that even very large and massive objects were displaced without contact.”

In discussing materializations he added: “More than thirty very sceptical scientific men were convinced, after long testing, that there proceeded from her body material forms having the appearances of life.”

The most extraordinary séance recorded with Palladino was probably the one described in full detail by Morselli in Psicologia e 'Spiritismo' (Turin, 1908, Vol. 2, pp. 214–237). The séance was held in Genoa on March 1, 1902. Besides Morselli, Ernesto Bozzano, Dr. Venzano, and six other persons were present. The cabinet was examined by Morselli and he himself tied the medium to a camp bed. In fairly good light six phantoms presented themselves in succession in front of the cabinet, the last one a woman with a baby in her arms. Each time after the phantom retired, Morselli rushed into the cabinet and found the medium tied as he left her. No doubt was left in Morselli's mind of the genuineness of the phenomena, yet strangely his materialistic attitude remained unshaken.

Palladino in America (1909–10)

Still one final blow was in store for Palladino. Owing to the success of the Naples sittings, the story of which was ably told in Hereward Carrington's Eusapia Palladino and Her Phenomena (1909), she was invited in 1909 to visit America. She landed in New York on November 10, 1909, and left on June 18, 1910.

Her first twenty séances were comparatively good ones. In the later sittings at Columbia University and at the house of Professor Lord she was caught in the use of her old trickery. The press made a tremendous sensation of the exposure. The authenticity of the published account, however, was questioned by Carrington. It said that at a sitting held on December 18, a young man crept under the cover of darkness into the cabinet and, during the movement of a small table, while Professor Hugo Munsterberg was controlling the left foot of Palladino, the young man grabbed a human foot, unshod, by the instep. Palladino's foot was pulled out of the shoe. Later she was watched from a concealed window in the cabinet and from a bureau provided with a secret peephole. She achieved the desired effect by gradual substitution, i.e., making one foot do duty for two as regards the control of her limbs, and acting freely with the loose foot.

It had not been emphasized that Paladino, at this stage, was so apprehensive of her investigators that she did not allow herself to go into trance for fear that an injury might be done to her. The psychological attitude of her sitters was reflected by the following statement of Palladino to a newspaper man: “Some people are at the table who expect tricks—in fact they want them. I am in a trance. Nothing happens. They get impatient. They think of the tricks—nothing but tricks. They put their minds on the tricks and I automatically respond. But it is not often. They merely will me to do them. That is all.”

Carrington contended that far from having been exposed in America, as the public imagined, Palladino presented a large number of striking phenomena that have never been explained; only a certain number of her classical and customary tricks were detected, which every investigator of this medium's phenomena had known to exist and had warned other investigators against for the past twenty years. No new form of trickery was discovered and Carrington had warned the sitters against the old and well-known methods in a circular letter in advance.

According to Palladino, when her power was strong, the phenomena began almost at once. When it was weak, long waiting was necessary. It was on such occasions that she was tempted to cheat. She did this so often that, as Carrington stated: “practically every scientific committee detected her in attempted fraud, but every one of these committees emerged from their investigations quite convinced of the reality of these phenomena, except the Cambridge and American investigation which ended in exposure.”

This was not the case as stated in a document from April 1910 at Columbia in which she was again exposed by a set of conjurers. Nevertheless, Palladino did not depart from America without her convert Howard Thurston, a magician, who declared: “I witnessed in person the table levitations of Madame Eusapia Palladino . . . and am thoroughly convinced that the phenomena I saw were not due to fraud and were not performed by the aid of her feet, knees, or hands.”

He also offered to give a thousand dollars to a charitable institution if it could be proved that Palladino could not levitate a table without trickery.

To the Present

In December 1910 Everard Feilding stated in documents in Naples that Palladino's observed phenomena were produced by fraud. Carrington, who had worked with Feilding earlier but was not with him in Naples, remained a supporter of her phenomena throughout his life and as late as 1930 concluded:

“To sum up the effects of these séances upon my own mind, I may say that, after seeing nearly forty of her séances, there remains not a shadow of doubt in my mind as to the reality of the vast majority of this phenomena occurring in Eusapia Palladino's presence . . . I can but record the fact that further study of this medium has convinced me more than ever that our Naples experiments and deductions were correct, that we were not deceived, but that we did, in very truth, see praeternormal manifestations of a remarkable character. I am as assured of the reality of Eusapia Palladino's phenomena as I am of any other fact in life; and they are, to my mind, just as well established.”

Paole Carrara, the daughter of Lombroso, published a biography of Palladino in 1907. A comprehensive bibliography related to her work is in Morselli's Psicologia e spiritismo (Turin, 1908).

Palladium, Order of

Said to have been a Masonic order, also entitled the Sovereign-Council of Wisdom, founded in Paris on May 20, 1737. It initiated women under the name of “Companions of Penelope.” As proof of its existence, Jean Marie Ragon, the Masonic antiquary, published its ritual.

The “Palladium” was also one name used by Leo Taxil (Gabriel Jogand-Pagés) to refer to the Masonic order he made a part of his 1880s hoax, which was aimed at showing that the Roman Catholic church secretly sponsored freemasonry.

Palmer, Raymond Alfred (1910–1977)

Entrepreneur publisher of occult and science-fiction magazines, who first published the series of stories in Amazing Stories known as the Shaver Mystery. He was born August 1, 1910, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Palmer began writing science fiction as a teenager, sold his first science-fiction story in 1930, and three years later had founded the Jules Verne Prize Club.

At age 28 Palmer became editor of Amazing Stories, which had just been bought by the Ziff-Davis Company. He transformed Amazing Stories by colorful editing, utilizing old and new science-fiction writers, and even writing much of the magazine himself under various pseudonyms such as G. H. Irwin, Frank Patton, and A. R. Steber. He is said to have boosted circulation from 25,000 to over 185,000. Although there were waves of protests from readers at the Shaver Mystery, Palmer's successor Howard Browne ended the series when he took over Amazing Stories in 1949. He later edited Fantastic Adventures for Ziff-Davis.

With fellow writer Curtis Fuller, Palmer also launched Fate Magazine a pocket-size pulp specializing in occultism. The first issue in spring 1948 contained an article by Kenneth Arnold, "I Did See the Flying Disks," which launched the flying saucer craze in North America. Palmer followed up with his own book on saucers, written in collaboration with Arnold.

With his unique flair for popular fantasy, Palmer started his own publication business from a dairy farm in Amherst, Wisconsin. In his magazines Flying Saucers and Search he generated a new mythology about saucers coming from holes in the polar ice caps. Palmer also promoted the medium Mark Probert and the New Age bible, "Oahspe." He died August 15, 1977, after suffering several strokes.

Palmistry

The art of divination by means of lines and marks on the human hand. It is said to have been practiced in very early times by the Brahmins of India and to have been known to Aristotle, who discovered a treatise on the subject written in letters of gold. He presented the treatise to Alexander the Great and was afterward translated into Latin by Hispanus. There are also extant works on the subject by Melampus of Alexandria, Hippocrates, and Galen; several Arabian commentators have also dealt with it.

In the Middle Ages the science was represented by Cocles (ca. 1054) and Hartlieb (ca. 1448). In the early modern period, by which time its practice was identified with the Gypsies, Robert Fludd (1574–1637), Indigane, Rothmann, and many others wrote on "cheiromancy," as the subject was then known. D'Arpentigny, Desbarolles, Carus, and others kept the subject alive in the earlier half of the nineteenth century. Since 1860, or thereabouts, palmistry's popularity has grown steadily and has experienced a revival.

Practicing Palmistry

Palmistry is subdivided into three lesser arts—cheirognomy, the art of recognizing the type of intelligence from the form of the hands; cheirosophy, the study of the comparative value of manual formations; and cheiromancy, the art of divination from the form of the hand and fingers, and the lines and markings thereon.

The palmist, first of all, studies the shape and general formation of the hand as a whole; afterward she regards its parts, details, lines, and markings. From cheirognomy and cheirosophy, the general disposition and tendencies are ascertained, and future events are foretold from the reading of the lines and markings.

There are several types of hands: the elementary or large-palmed type; the necessary, with spatulated fingers; the artistic, with conical-shaped fingers; the useful, the fingers of which are square-shaped; the knotted or philosophical; the pointed, or psychic; the mixed, in which the types are blended.

The principal lines are those that separate the hand from the forearm at the wrist, which are known as the rascettes, or the lines of health, wealth, and happiness. The line of life stretches from the center of the palm around the base of the thumb almost to the wrist and is joined for a considerable part of its course by the line of the head. The line of the heart runs across two-thirds of the palm, above the head line; and the line of fate between it and the line of the head runs nearly at right angles extending towards the wrist. The line of fortune runs from the base of the third finger towards the wrist parallel to the line of fate. If the lines are deep, firm, and of narrow width, the significance is good—excepting that a strong line of health shows constitutional weakness.

At the base of the fingers, beginning with the first, lie the mounts of Jupiter, Saturn, Apollo, and Mercury; at the base of the thumb the mount of Venus; opposite to it, that of Luna. If well-proportioned they show certain virtues, but if exaggerated they indicate the vices that correspond to these. The first displays religion, reasonable ambition, or pride and superstition; the second wisdom and prudence, or ignorance and failure; the third when large, makes for success and intelligence, when small for, meanness or love of obscurity; the fourth desire for knowledge and industry, or disinterestedness and laziness. The Lunar mount indicates sensitiveness, imagination, morality or otherwise, and self-will; the mount of Venus, charity and affection, or if exaggerated, viciousness.

The phalanges of the fingers are also indicative of certain faculties. For example, the first and second of the thumb, according to their length, indicate the value of the logical faculty and of the will; those of the index finger in their order—materialism, law, and order; of the middle finger—humanity, system, intelligence; of the third finger—truth, economy, energy; of the little finger—goodness, prudence, and reflectiveness.

There are nearly a hundred other marks and signs, by which certain qualities, influences, or events are believed to be recognized. The length of the line of life indicates the length of existence of its owner. If it is short in both hands, the life will be a short one; if broken in one hand and weak in the other, a serious illness is denoted. If broken in both hands, it means death. If it is much chained it means delicacy. If it has a second or sister line, it shows great vitality. A black spot on the line shows illness at the time marked. A cross indicates some fatality. The line of life coming out far into the palm is a sign of long life.

The line of the head, if long and well-colored, denotes intelligence and power. If descending to the mount of the Moon it shows that the head is much influenced by the imagination. Islands on the line denote mental troubles. The head line forked at the end indicates subtlety and a facility for seeing all sides of the question. A double line of the head is an indication of good fortune. The line of the heart should branch towards the mount of Jupiter. If it should pass over the mount of Jupiter to the edge of the hand and travel round the index finger, it is called "Solomon's ring" and indicates ideality and romance; it is also a sign of occult power. Points or dots in this line may show illness if black, and if white love affairs, while islands on the heart line indicate disease. If the line of fate or Saturn rises from the Lunar mount and ascends towards the line of the heart, it is a sign of a rich marriage. If it extends into the third phalange of Saturn's finger it shows the sinister influence of that planet. A double line of fate is ominous. There are also numerous other lesser lines and marks the hand contains, which are detailed in a number of books on the subject.

Many practitioners of palmistry have their own special interpretations. A few of these works are on scientific lines, but others are merely empirical, and their forecasts of events to come are on a par with newspaper astrology columns.

The popularity of palmistry was raised to a new height, especially in the English-speaking world, by "Cheiro," the public name of Count Louis Hamon (1866–1936), who was patronized by royalty and distinguished individuals of his time. He wrote a number of books on palmistry, which were frequently reprinted in both England and the United States and taught and inspired a generation of palmists. Modern palmistry is largely an outgrowth of his efforts.

Pansini Brothers (ca. 1904)

Italian mediumistic children, chiefly known for the reports of their mysterious bodily transportations. In 1901 their father Signor Mauro Pansini, a building contractor, went to live in an old house close to the town hall at Ruvo, in Apulia. A few days later poltergeist phenomena broke out in the house, articles were thrown about, and crockery was broken.

One evening Alfredo Pansini, then seven years of age, fell into trance and began to speak and recite in French, Latin, and Greek. These manifestations continued until he was sent to a seminary where he was entirely free from them.

When he returned home in 1904 at age ten, a new series of phenomena commenced in which, besides Alfredo, his eight-year-old brother Paolo was also involved. In a few minutes they were, according to reports, bodily transported to places ten to fifteen miles distant (see also teleportation). This phenomena created great bewilderment. The parents appealed to the bishop of Bitonto to deliver the children from the obsession of which they were supposed to be the victims. While their mother was talking to the bishop both boys mysteriously disappeared from the room.

Alfredo Pansini could answer mental questions by automatic writing. The spirit speaking through him explained that he achieved the transportation by the dematerialization of their bodies. No observer could explain the phenomena. Italian scientists who looked into the matter put forward the theory of "ambulatory automatism," moving about in a secondary state and forgetting it when returning to the normal state. This, however, did not explain how the boys ran nine miles in half an hour without anybody seeing them on the road.

Pansophic Institute

A Tibetan Buddhist educational organization founded in Reno, Nevada, in 1973 by Simon Grimes and sponsored by the School of Universal Wisdom. It received its initial corporate status through the Church of Universal Light. The institute is intended to serve as "a voice for the perennial philosophy or ageless wisdom leading to liberation and enlightenment in the New Age. It united Eastern and Western forms of gnosis (spiritual wisdom) and theurgy (techniques of enlightenment) in the light of modern science." It also provided an educational program consisting of courses in meditation, esoteric cosmology, divinations, spiritual healing, superhealth and longevity, thanatology, and empowerment. It offered courses for ministers in four types of theurgy and theurgic cosmology, and in child education, creativity, and world responsibility. The institute discouraged intellectual learning for one's own sake in favor of learning "that assists one to become enlightened for the sake of all things."

Pantomnesia

Term coined by Charles Richet to denote "regression of memory, the imagination that a thing experienced has been seen before." Richet also stated: "I propose pantomnesia to indicate that no vestige of our intellectual past is entirely effaced. Probably we are all pantomnesic. In weighing metapsychic facts it should be taken for granted that we do not absolutely forget anything that has once impressed our senses."

Pap, Lajos (1883– ?)

Hungarian carpenter and nonprofessional medium for apports and telekinesis. A resident of Budapest, his powers first manifested in 1922 in a casual sitting for table movement and were developed by Major Cornelius Seefehlner, Dr. John Toronyi, and later by Dr. Elmer Chengery Pap (not a relative), a retired chief chemist to the government and president of the Budapest Metapsychical Society. For some years Lajos Pap gave joint sittings with Tibor Molnar, another Hungarian medium. "Rabbi Isaac," his control, first communicated through table rapping, then through trance speaking.

Chengery Pap gradually developed scientific control, not only searching the medium and dressing him in a special séance robe but also providing special garments for his immediate controls and searching every sitter. The medium wore luminous stripes; the sitters tied luminous straps on their ankles and wrists. Instead of red light, a 100 watt green lamp was used; Pap permitted it to be switched on during the proceedings for repeated examination.

Under such conditions telekinetic movements of luminous baskets, strange white and colored lights, and the arrival of hundreds of living and inanimate objects were observed. The majority of the apports were small animals and insects, including living beetles, butterflies, caterpillars, frogs, lizards, birds, mice, fish, and squirrels, as well as liquids, perfumes, flowers, and other objects.

In an article in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 38), Theodore Besterman described a sitting with Lajos Pap at John Toronyi's flat on November 18, 1928. He witnessed telekinetic phenomena and the apport of three stones. However, Besterman's verdict was fraud, and his general attitude was the subject of a strongly worded protest addressed by Pap's advocates to the Society for Psychical Research.

For an amusing account of the phenomena of Lajos Pap and probable explanation of the rationale of fraud, see the chapter "Apports of a Carpenter" in Nandor Fodor's The Haunted Mind (1959). Fodor also indulged some shrewd speculations about the psychology of fraud.

Parabrahman (or Para Brahm)

Term used in Hindu religious philosophy to denote the supreme absolute transcendental reality. Brahman is the non-personal divine beyond manifestation as gods and goddesses, as distinct from Brahma, the form as divine creator of the universe. Comparable concepts exist in most forms of mysticism and Gnosticism.

Paracelsus (1493–1541)

One of the most striking and picturesque figures in the history of medicine, alchemy, and occultism, full name Auroelus Philippus Theophrastus Paracelsus Bombast von Hohenheim, this illustrious physician and exponent of the hermetic philosophy was renowned under the name of Paracelsus.

He was born December 26, 1493, in Einsideln, near Zürich, Switzerland. His father, the natural son of a prince, himself a physician, desired that his only son should follow the same profession. The fulfillment of that desire was directed during the early training of Paracelsus. The training fostered his imaginative rather than his practical tendencies, which first cast his mind into the alchemical mould.

He freed himself from the constraining bonds of medicine as practiced by his contemporaries, who chiefly applied bleeding, purging, and emetics, and set about evolving a new system to replace the old. In order to study the book of nature better, he traveled extensively between 1513 and 1524 and visited almost every part of the known world. During his travels he compiled the wisdom present at the time on metallurgy, chemistry, and medicine, and the folk wisdom of the untutored.

Paracelsus met the Cham of Tartary, conversed with the magicians of Egypt and Arabia, and is said to have even reached India. At length his protracted wanderings came to a close, and in 1524 he settled in Basel, then a favorite resort of scholars and physicians, where he was appointed to fill the chair of medicine at the university.

His inflated language, eccentric behavior, and the splendor of his conceptions attracted, repelled, and gained him friends and enemies. His antipathy to the Galenic school became ever more pronounced, and the crisis came when he publicly burned the works of Galen and Avicenna in a vase into which he had cast nitrate and sulphur. By such a proceeding he incurred the hatred of his more conservative brethren and cut himself off forever from the established school of medicine. He continued his triumphant career, however, until a conflict with the magistrates brought it to an abrupt close. He was forced to flee from Basel, and thereafter wandered from place to place, earning a living as best he could.

An element of mystery surrounds the manner of his death, which took place September 24, 1541. Some say that he was poisoned at the instigation of the medical faculty, others that he was thrown down a steep incline.

But interesting as were the events of his life, it is to his work that most attention is due. Not only was he the founder of the modern science of medicine, but the magnetic theory of Franz A. Mesmer, the "astral" theory of modern Spiritualism, and the philosophy of Descartes were all foreshadowed in the fantastic, yet not always illogical, teachings of Paracelsus.

He revived the "microcosmic" theory of ancient Greece, and sought to prove the human body analogous to the solar system by establishing a connection between the seven organs of the body and the seven planets. He preached the doctrines of the efficacy of willpower and the imagination (i.e., magic):

"It is possible that my spirit, without the help of my body, and through an ardent will alone, and without a sword, can stab and wound others. It is also possible that I can bring the spirit of my adversary into an image and then fold him up or lame him at my pleasure.

"Resolute imagination is the beginning of all magical operations.

"Because men do not perfectly believe and imagine, the result is, that arts are uncertain when they might be wholly certain."

He was thus a forerunner of New Thought teachings. The first principle of his doctrine was the extraction of the quintessence, or philosophic mercury, from every material body. He believed that if the quintessence were drawn from each animal, plant, and mineral, the combined result would equal the universal spirit, or astral body in human beings, and that a draught of the extract would renew youth.

He came to the conclusion that "astral bodies" exercised a mutual influence on each other, and declared that he himself had communicated with the dead and with living persons at a considerable distance. He was the first to connect this influence with that of the magnet, and to use the word "magnetism" with its modern application in the occult. It was on this idea that much of Franz A. Mesmer's work was built.

While Paracelsus busied himself with such problems, however, he did not neglect the study and practice of medicine, into which both astrology and the magnet entered largely. When he was sought by a patient, his first care was to consult the planets, where the disease had its origin, and if the patient were a woman he took it for granted that the cause of her malady lay in the moon.

His anticipation of the philosophy of Descartes consisted in his theory that by bringing the various elements of the human body into harmony with the elements of nature—fire, light, earth—old age, and death might be indefinitely postponed.

His experiment in the extraction of essential spirits from the poppy resulted in the production of laudanum (a popular form of opium through the nineteenth century), which he prescribed freely in the form of “three black pills.” The recipes he gives for the philosophers’ stone, the elixir of life, and various universal remedies are exceedingly obscure. He was known as the first physician to use opium and mercury, and to recognize the value of sulphur.

He applied himself also to the solution of a problem that exercised the minds of scientific men in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries—whether it was possible to produce life from inorganic matter. Paracelsus asserted that it was, and left on record a quaint recipe for a homunculus, or artificial man. By a peculiar treatment of certain “spagyric substances” (which he unfortunately omitted) he declared that he could produce a perfect human child in miniature.

Medical, alchemical, and philosophical speculations were scattered so profusely throughout his teaching that one concludes that here was a master-mind, a genius, who was a charlatan, by reason of training and temperament. Paracelsus displayed a curious singleness of purpose and a real desire to penetrate the mysteries of science.

He left on record the principal points of the philosophy on which he founded his researches in his Archidoxa Medicinæ. It contains the leading rules of the art of healing as he practiced and preached them. He stated that he had resolved to give ten books to the Archidoxa, but had reserved the tenth in his memory. He believed it was a treasure that men were not worthy to possess and should only be given to the world when it abjured Aristotle, Avicenna, and Galen, and promised a perfect submission to Paracelsus. The world did not recant, but Paracelsus relented and at the entreaty of his disciples published his Tenth Book of the Arch-Doctrines, also known as On the Secret Mysteries of Nature.

At the beginning Paracelsus hypothesized, and then attempted to substantiate, the existence of a universal spirit infused into the veins, which forms within us a species of invisible body, of which our visible body directs and governs at its will. This universal spirit is not simple—not more simple, for instance, than the number 100, which is a collection of units. The spiritual units are scattered in plants and minerals, but principally in metals. There exists in these inferior productions of the earth a host of sub-spirits that sum themselves up in us, as the universe does in God. So the science of the philosopher has to unite them to the body, disengage them from the grosser matter that clogs and confines them, and separate the pure from the impure. To separate the pure from the impure is to seize upon the soul of the heterogeneous bodies and evolve their “predestined element,” “the seminal essence of beings,” and “the first being, or quintessence.”

To understand this latter word “quintessence,” it is necessary to postulate that every body is composed of four elements. The essence compounded of these elements forms a fifth, which is the soul of the mixed bodies, or, in other words, its “mercury.” “I have shown,” stated Paracelsus, “in my book Elements, that the quintessence is the same thing as mercury. There is in mercury (soul) whatever wise men seek.” That is, not the mercury of modern chemists, but a philosophical “mercury” of which every body has its own. “There are as many mercuries as there are things. The mercury of a vegetable, a mineral, or an animal of the same kind, although strongly resembling each other, does not precisely resemble another mercury, and it is for this reason that vegetables, minerals, and animals of the same species are not exactly alike. . . .”

Paracelsus sought a plant in the vegetable kingdom that was worthy of holding the same rank as gold in the metallic—a plant whose “predestined element” united in itself the virtues of nearly all the vegetable essences. Although this was not easy to distinguish, he claimed to recognize at a glance the supremacy of excellence in the melissa, and first decreed to it the pharmaceutical crown. Then:

“He took some balm-mint in flower, which he had taken care to collect before the rising of the sun. He pounded it in a mortar, reduced it to an impalpable dust, poured it into a long-necked vial which he sealed hermetically, and placed it to digest (or settle) for forty hours in a heap of horse-dung. This time expired, he opened the vial, and found there a matter which he reduced into a fluid by pressing it, separating it from its impurities by exposure to the slow heat of a bain-marie (a vessel of hot water in which other vessels are heated). The grosser parts sunk to the bottom, and he drew off the liqueur which floated on the top, filtering it through some cotton. This liqueur having been poured into a bottle he added to it the fixed salt, which he had drawn from the same plant when dried. There remained nothing more but to extract from this liqueur the first life or being of the plant. For this purpose Paracelsus mixed the liqueur with so much ‘water of salt’ (understand by this the mercurial element or radical humidity of the salt), put it in a matrass, exposed it for six weeks to the sun, and finally, at the expiration of this term, discovered a last residuum which was decidedly, according to him, the first life or supreme essence of the plant. But at all events, it is certain that what he found in his matrass was the genie or spirit he required; and with the surplus, if there were any, we need not concern ourselves.”

Those who wished to know what this genie was like were informed that it as exactly resembled, as two drops of water, the spirit of aromatic wine known today as absinthe suisse. It was a liquid green. Unfortunately, it failed as a specific in the conditions indispensable for an elixir of immortality.

By means and manipulations as subtle and ingenious as those that he employed upon the melissa, Paracelsus learned to extract the “predestined element” of plants that ranked much higher in the vegetable aristocracy—the “first life” of the gilly-flower, the cinnamon, the myrrh, the scammony, and thecelandine. All these supreme essences, which, according to the fifth book of Archidoxa, united with a mass of “magisteries” as precious as they were rude, were the base of so many specifics, equally reparative and regenerative. This depended upon the relationship that existed between the temperament of a privileged plant and the temperament of the individual who asked of it his rejuvenescence.

However brilliant were the results of his discoveries, those he obtained or those he thought he might obtain, they were for Paracelsus but the beginning of magic. To the eyes of so consummate an alchemist, vegetable life was not important; it was the mineral—the metallic life—that was significant. Paracelsus believed it was in his power to seize the first life-principle of the moon, the sun, Mars, or Saturn; that is, of silver, gold, iron, or lead. It was equally facile for him to grasp the life of the precious stones, the bitumens, the sulphurs, and even that of animals. Paracelsus set forth several methods of obtaining this great arcanum. Here is the shortest and most simple explanation as recorded by Incola Francus:

“Take some mercury, or at least the element of mercury, separating the pure from the impure, and afterwards pounding it to perfect whiteness. Then you shall sublimate it with sal-ammoniac, and this so many times as may be necessary to resolve it into a fluid. Calcine it, coagulate it, and again dissolve it, and let it strain in a pelican [a vessel used for distillation] during a philosophic month, until it thickens and assumes the form of a hard substance. Thereafter this form of stone is incombustible, and nothing can change or alter it; the metallic bodies which it penetrates become fixed and incombustible, for this material is incombustible, and changes the imperfect metals into metal perfect. Although I have given the process in few words, the thing itself demands a long toil, and many difficult circumstances, which I have expressly omitted, not to weary the reader, who ought to be very diligent and intelligent if he wishes to arrive at the accomplishment of this great work.”

Paracelsus himself described in Archidoxa his own recipe for the completion of it, and profited by the occasion to criticize his fellow-workers.

“I omit what I have said in different places on the theory of the stone; I will say only that this arcanum does not consist in the blast [rouille] or flowers of antimony. It must be sought in the mercury of antimony, which, when it is carried to perfection, is nothing else than the heaven of metals; for even as the heaven gives life to plants and minerals, so does the pure quintessence of antimony vitrify everything. This is why the Deluge was not able to deprive any substance of its virtue or properties, for the heaven being the life of all beings, there is nothing superior to it which can modify or destroy it.

“Take the antimony, purge it of its arsenical impurities in an iron vessel until the coagulated mercury of the antimony appears quite white, and is distinguishable by the star which appears in the superficies of the regulus, or semi-metal. But although this regulus, which is the element of mercury, has in itself a veritable hidden life, nevertheless these things are in virtue, and not actually.

“Therefore, if you wish to reduce the power to action, you must disengage the life which is concealed in it by a living fire like to itself, or with a metallic vinegar. To discover this fire many philosophers have proceeded differently, but agreeing to the foundations of the art, have arrived at the desired end. For some with great labour have drawn forth the quintessence of the thickened mercury of the regulus of antimony, and by this means have reduced to action the mercury of the antimony: others have considered that there was a uniform quintessence in the other minerals, as for example in the fixed sulphur of the vitriol, or the stone of the magnet, and having extracted the quintessence, have afterwards matured and exalted their heaven with it, and reduced it to action. Their process is good, and has had its result. Meanwhile this fire—this corporeal life—which they seek with toil, is found much more easily and in much greater perfection in the ordinary mercury, which appears through its perpetual fluidity—a proof that it possesses a very powerful fire and a celestial life similar to that which lies hidden in the regulus of the antimony. Therefore, he who would wish to exalt our metallic heaven, started, to its greatest completeness, and to reduce into action its potential virtues, he must first extract from ordinary mercury its corporeal life, which is a celestial fire; that is to say the quintessence of quicksilver, or, in other words, the metallic vinegar, that has resulted from its dissolution in the water which originally produced it, and which is its own mother; that is to say, he must dissolve it in the arcanum of the salt I have described, and mingle it with the ‘stomach of Anthion,’ which is the spirit of vinegar, and in this menstruum melt and filter and consistent mercury of the antimony, strain it in the said liquor, and finally reduce it into crystals of a yellowish green, of which we have spoken in our manual.”

As regards the philosophers’ stone, he gave the following formula:

“Take the electric mineral not yet mature [antimony], put it in its sphere, in the fire with the iron, to remove its ordures and other superfluities, and purge it as much as you can, following the rules of chymistry, so that it may not suffer by the aforesaid impurities. Make, in a word, the regulus with the mark. This done, cause it to dissolve in the ‘stomach of the ostrich’ (vitriol), which springs from the earth and is fortified in its virtue by the ‘sharpness of the eagle’ (the metallic vinegar or essence of mercury). As soon as the essence is perfected, and when after its dissolution it has taken the colour of the herb called calendule, do not forget to reduce it into a spiritual luminous essence, which resembles amber. After this, add to it of the ‘spread eagle’ one half the weight of the election before its preparation, and frequently distil the ‘stomach of the ostrich’ into the matter, and thus the election will become much more spiritualized. When the ‘stomach of the ostrich’ is weakened by the labour of digestion, we must strengthen it and frequently distil it. Finally, when it has lost all its impurity, add as much tartarized quintessence as will rest upon your fingers, until it throws off its impurity and rises with it. Repeat this process until the preparation becomes white, and this will suffice; for you shall see yourself as gradually it rises in the form of the ‘exalted eagle,’ and with little trouble converts itself in its form (like sublimated mercury); and that is what we are seeking.

“I tell you in truth that there is no greater remedy in medicine than that which lies in this election, and that there is nothing like it in the whole world. But not to digress from my purpose, and not to leave this work imperfect, observe the manner in which you ought to operate.

“The election then being destroyed, as I have said, to arrive at the desired end (which is, to make of it a universal medicine for human as well as metallic bodies), take your election, rendered light and volatile by the method above described.

“Take of it as much as you would wish to reduce it to its perfection, and put it in a philosophical egg of glass, and seal it very tightly, that nothing of it may respire; put it into an athanor until of itself it resolves into a liquid, in such a manner that in the middle of this sea there may appear a small island, which daily diminishes, and finally, all shall be changed to a colour black as ink. This colour is the raven, or bird which flies at night without wings, and which, through the celestial dew, that rising continually falls back by a constant circulation, changes into what is called ‘the head of the raven,’ and afterwards resolves into ‘the tail of the peacock,’ then it assumes the hue of the ‘tail of a peacock,’ and afterwards the colour of the ‘feathers of a swan,’ finally acquiring an extreme redness, which marks its fiery nature, and in virtue of which it expels all kinds of impurities, and strengthens feeble members. This preparation, according to all philosophers, is made in a single vessel, over a single furnace, with an equal and continual fire, and this medicine, which is more than celestial, cures all kinds of infirmities, as well in human as metallic bodies; wherefore no one can understand or attain such an arcanum without the help of God: for its virtue is ineffable and divine.”

Paradise

A word derived from the old Persian (Zeud) pairēdaēza, an enclosure, a walled-in place; old Persian pairi, around, dig, to mould, form, shape (hence to form a wall of earth). The word moved into Greek (paradeisos), Latin (paradisus), and Hebrew (pardes). It literally denotes an enclosure or park planted with fruit trees and abounding with various animals, i.e., a pleasure garden or park. Josephus referred to Solomon's garden at Etham and to the hanging gardens of Babylon as paradises. Eden is not termed a "paradise" in the Hebrew text of Gen. 2:8, but a place where God planted a garden. The term, however, was inserted in the text in the Greek Septuagint translation, which read that God planted a paradise in Eden.

While the biblical paradise is located in reference to several well-known geographic reference points such as the Euphrates and Hiddekl (Tigris) rivers, the failure to find such a paradisaical place in that area in modern times has suggested the possibility that the paradise of Eden might be found elsewhere.

Paradise has been sought for or located in many regions of the earth: on the banks of the Euphrates and of the Ganges, in Tartary, Armenia, India, China, Mesopotamia, Syria, Persia, Arabia, Palestine, Ethiopia, and near the mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus. Some place it in Judea, what is now the sea of Galilee; others in Armenia or Syria, near Mount Ararat, toward the sources of the Orontes, the Chrysorrhoeas, and the Barrady. In the early nineteenth century the Island of Ceylon (now known as Sri Lanka), which was the "Serendib" of the ancient Persians and the "Taprobane" of the Greek geographers, was cited as a possibility. Robert Percival, in his book An Account of the Island of Ceylon (1803), suggested:

"It is from the summit of Hamalleel or Adam's Peak that Adam took his last view of Paradise before he quitted it never to return. The spot on which his feet stood at the moment is still supposed to be found in an impression on the summit of the mountain, resembling the print of a man's foot, but more than double the ordinary size. After taking this farewell view, the father of mankind is said to have gone over to the continent of Judea, which was at that time joined to the island, but no sooner had he passed Adam's Bridge than the sea closed behind him, and cut off all hopes of return. This tradition, from whatever source it was derived, seems to be interwoven with the earliest notions of religion entertained by the Cingalese; and it is difficult to conceive that it could have been engrafted on them without forming an original part. I have frequently had the curiosity to converse with black men of different castes concerning this tradition of Adam. All of them, with every appearance of belief, assured me that it was really true, and in support of it produced a variety of testimonies, old sayings, and prophecies, which have for ages been current among them. The origin of these traditions I do not pretend to trace; but their connection with Scripture history is very evident, and they afford a new instance how universally the opinions with respect to the origin of man coincide."

We are further informed by this writer that a large chair fixed in a rock near the summit of the mountain is said to be the workmanship of Adam. It has the appearance of having been placed there at a very distant period, but who really placed it there, or for what purpose, it is impossible to discover.

However, long before Percival travelled to Sri Lanka, this apparently oversize footprint had been venerated equally by Buddhists and Hindus, who ascribe it respectively to Gautama, Buddha, or the god Siva.

Some believed Eden represented the whole earth, which was of surprising beauty and fertility before the Fall. A curious notion prevailed to a great extent among the various nations that the Old World was under a curse and the earth became very barren. This view is reflected in the Apostle Paul's letter to the Romans (8:22) where he refers to the whole of creation groaning in pain.

Eastern Philosophies of Paradise

Some Eastern philosophies shared the idea that nature had been contaminated, and that the earth labored under some defilement—a sentiment that might have resulted from obscure traditions connected with the first human pair. The Hebrew historian Josephus stated that the Sacred Garden was watered by one river, which ran round the whole earth and was divided into four parts, but he appeared to think Paradise was merely a figurative or allegorical locality. Some of the peoples of Hindustan had traditions of a place resembling Paradise on the banks of the river Ganges; their accounts were completely blended with mythology and legends respecting the Deluge and the second peopling of the world.

One writer who had diligently studied the Indian Puranas (religious and mythological works) placed Eden on the Imaus Mountains of India. He stated:

"It appears from Scripture that Adam and Eve lived in the countries to the eastward of Eden; for at the eastern entrance of it God placed the angel with the flaming sword (Gen. 3:24). This is also confirmed by the Puranics, who place the progenitor of mankind on the mountainous regions between Cabul and the Ganges, on the banks of which, in the hills, they show a place where he resorted occasionally for religious purposes. It is frequented by pilgrims. At the entrance of the passes leading to the place where I suppose was the Garden of Eden, and to the eastward of it, the Hindoos have placed a destroying angel, who appears, and it is generally represented with a cherub; I mean Garudha, or the Eagle, upon whom Vishnu and Jupiter are represented riding. Garudha is represented generally like an eagle, but in his compound character somewhat like a cherub. He is represented like a young man, with the countenance, wings, and talons of the eagle. In Scripture the Deity is represented riding upon a cherub, and flying upon the wings of the wind. Garudha is called Vahan [literally the Vehicle] of Vishnu or Jupiter, and he thus answers to the cherub of Scripture; for many commentators derive this word from the obsolete root c'harab, in the Chaldean language, a word implicitly synonymous with the Sanscrit Vahan."

In the fabled Mount Meru of Hindu mythology there is also a descriptive representation of a Mosaic-like garden of Eden. Meru is a conical mountain; the exact locality of which is not fixed, but Hindu geographers considered the earth as a flat table with the sacred mountain of Meru rising in the middle. It became at length their decided conviction that Meru was the North Pole, from their notion that the North Pole was the highest part of the world. Some Hindu writers admitted that Mount Meru must be situated in the central part of Asia. Rather than relinquish their notion of and predilection for the North Pole as the real locality of Paradise, they actually forced the sun out of the ecliptic and placed the Pole on the elevated plains of Lesser Bokhara. However, the Hindu description of this Paradise seems to be analogous to the Mosaic account.

The traditions of Kashmir represented that country as the original site of Paradise and the abode of the first human pair, while the Buddhists of Tibet held opinions respecting the mountain Meru similar to those of the Hindus. They located the sacred garden, however, at the foot of the mountain near the source of the Ganges.

The Muslims inhabiting adjacent countries adopted the belief that Paradise was situated in Kashmir. They believed the first man was driven from it, he and his wife wandered separately for some time, then meeting at a place called Bahlaka, or Balk. Two gigantic statues, which the Moslems said were yet to be seen between Bahlaka and Bamiyan, represented Adam and Eve. A third statue was that of their son Seish or Seth, whose tomb, or its site, was pointed out near Bahlaka.

Some writers maintained that Paradise was under the North Pole. They argued over the idea of the ancient Babylonians and Egyptians that the ecliptic or solar way was originally at right angles to the Equator, and so passed directly over the North Pole. Some Moslems speculated that it was in one of the seven heavens. One commentator summed up extravagant theories respecting the locality of Paradise. "Some place it as follows: In the third heaven, others in the fourth, some within the orbit of the moon, others in the moon itself, some in the middle regions of the air, or beyond the earth's attraction, some on the earth, others under the earth, and others within the earth."

Before leaving the East, it may be observed that Oriental people generally reckoned four sites of Paradise in Asia: the first Ceylon, already mentioned; the second in Chaldea; the third in a district of Persia, watered by a river called the Nilab; and the fourth in Syria near Damascus, and near the springs of the Jordan. This last supposed site was not peculiar to Oriental writers, as it was maintained by some Europeans, especially Heidegger, Le Clerc, and Hardouin. The following are the traditions once believed by inhabitants of the city of Damascus—a city which the Emperor Julian the Apostate styled "the Eye of all the East," the most sacred and most magnificent Damascus. For example, M. de Lamartine observed:

"I understand that Arabian traditions represent this city and its neighbourhood to form the site of the lost Paradise, and certainly I should think that no place upon earth was better calculated to answer one's ideas of Eden. The vast and fruitful plain, with the seven branches of the blue stream which irrigate it—the majestic framework of the mountains—the glittering lakes which reflect the heaven upon the earth—its geographical situation between the two seas—the perfection of the climate—every thing indicates that Damascus has at least been one of the first towns that were built by the children of men—one of the natural halts of fugitive humanity in primeval times. It is, in fact, one of those sites pointed out by the hand of God for a city—a site predestined to sustain a capital like Constantinople."

According to Muslim beliefs, Damascus stood on the site of the Sacred Garden. Outside this city was a meadow divided by the river Barrady, and is alleged that Adam was formed from its red earth. This field was designated Ager Damascenus by the Latins, and nearly in the center formerly stood a pillar, intended to mark the precise spot where the Creator breathed the breath of life into the first man.

Other Philosophies of Paradise

Other traditions that existed among ancient nations of the Garden of Eden doubtless inspired the magnificent gardens that were designed and planted by Eastern princes, such as the Golden Garden, which was consecrated by Pompey to Jupiter Capitolinus of Aristobulus, King of the Jews. Nor is mythology deficient in similar legends. There are the Gardens of Jupiter, of Alcinous, of the Fortunate Islands, and of the Hesperides. These not only contain descriptions of the primeval Paradise, but also include the traditions of the Tree of Knowledge and of the original promise made to the woman. The Garden of the Hesperides produced golden fruit, guarded by a dangerous serpent—this fierce reptile encircled with its folds a mysterious tree—and Hercules procured the fruit by encountering and killing the serpent.

The story of the constellation, as related by Eratosthenes, is applicable to the Garden of Eden and the primeval history of mankind.

"This serpent," said that ancient writer, alluding to the constellation, "is the same as that which guarded the golden apples, and was slain by Hercules. For, when the gods offered presents to Juno on her nuptials with Jupiter, the Earth also brought golden apples. Juno, admiring their beauty, commanded them to be planted in the garden of the gods; but finding that they were continually plucked by the daughter of Atlas, she appointed a vast serpent to guard them. Hercules overcame and slew the monster. Hence, in this constellation the serpent is depicted rearing its head aloft, while Hercules, placed above it with one knee bent, tramples with his foot upon its head, and brandishes a club in his right hand."

The Greeks placed the Garden of the Hesperides close to Mount Atlas, and then claimed it was far into the regions of western Africa, yet all knowledge of its Asiatic site was not erased from the classical mythologists. Apollodorus states that certain writers situated it not in the Libyan Atlas, but in the Atlas of the Hyperboreans.

Others believed the world was originally a paradise, and its first inhabitants were human, whose dwelling was a magnificent hall glittering with fine gold and where love, joy, and friendship presided. But this happiness was soon overthrown by certain women from the country of the giants, to whose seductions the first mortals yielded, losing their innocence and integrity forever. The transgression of Eve was the obvious prototype of the fatal curiosity of Pandora.

The legends of Hindustan also supply accounts of the happiness of paradise in the Golden Age of classic mythology. Thomas Maurice, author of Indian Antiquities (1793–1800), observed at the end of the eighteenth century,

"There can arise little doubt that by the Satya age, or Age of Perfection, the Brahmins obviously allude to the state of perfection and happiness enjoyed by man in Paradise. It is impossible to explain what the Indian writers assert concerning the universal purity of manners, and the luxurious and unbounded plenty prevailing in that primitive era, without this supposition. Justice, truth, philanthropy, were then practised among all the orders and classes of mankind. There was then no extortion, no circumvention, no fraud, used in the dealings one with another. Perpetual oblations smoked on the altars of the Deity; every tongue uttered praises, and every heart glowed with gratitude to the Supreme Creator. The gods, in token of their approbation of the conduct of mortals, condescended frequently to become incarnate, and to hold personal intercourse with the yet undepraved race, to instruct them in arts and sciences; to unveil their own sublime functions and pure nature; and to make them acquainted with the economy of those celestial regions into which they were to be immediately translated, when the period of their terrestrial probation expired."

Parapsychic Phenomena

A term coined by psychologist Max Dessoir (1867–1947) in Germany in 1889 and picked up by psychical researcher Emile Boirac (1851–1917) and used to refer to “all phenomena produced in living beings or as a result of their action, which do not seem capable of being entirely explained by already known natural laws and forces.” According to Boirac, the term “psychical” is not satisfactory because it is synonymous with “mental.” The prefix “para” denotes that it relates to exceptional, abnormal, paradoxical phenomena. The term found some acceptance in Germany during the establishment of psychical research.

Parapsychology

The name given to the scientific study of psychic or paranormal phenomena. The Parapsychological Association, refers to it as, “The scientific and scholarly study of certain unusual events associated with human experience.” The association also pointed out in its Parapsychology FAQs, on its website in 2000, that:

In spite of what the media often imply, parapsychology is not the study of ‘anything parnormal’ or bizarre. Nor is parapsychology concerned with astrology, UFOs, searching for Bigfoot, paganism, vampires, alchemy, or witchcraft.

Parapsychology largely replaced the earlier term “psychical research,” the change indicating a significant shift in emphasis and methodology. The term “parapsychology” is an old one. It appears to have been coined in Germany in or before 1889 by psychologist Max Dessoir (1867–1947). Dessoir first used the term in an article the June 1889 issue of the German periodical Sphinx. Dessoir’s use of the term “parapsychology,” as also the term “parapsychic,” predates the later use of the term by Emile Boirac (1851–1917) in a book in 1908.

The term “parapsychology,” as used currently was popularized by J. B. Rhine (1895–1980) and fellow pioneers William McDougall and Louisa E. Rhine to distinguish the laboratory based study, including the use of careful experimental methodology, of psychic phenomena in both its mental (telepathy, clairvoyance, and precognition) and physical (psychokinesis) form. In 1927, McDougall and the Rhines began research on mediumship, survival, and telepathy in the Department of Psychology at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina.

Rhine established the now familiar outlines of laboratory method with card-guessing and dice-rolling experiments. Card-guessing had been used already in scientific tests implemented by psychical researchers in Britain. It was Rhine who popularized the use of Zener cards, devised by his colleague psychologist Karl Zener. This experiment of sorts consisted of holding 25 cards bearing simple symbols in groups of five of a kind: star, circle, square, cross and waves. The pack simplified the mathematical calculations involved in evaluating chance factors in guessing.

In addition to this work, Rhine popularized the terms “parapsychology,” “extrasensory perception” and “psi.” In the 1930s his attempts to find a statistical validation of ESP transformed parapsychology into a legitimate area for scientific research for many who had eschewed psychical research previously.

Assisted by J. Gaither Pratt, who later became a prominent parapsychologist himself, Rhine looked for psychically gifted people to study. One prominent subject was a Duke student, Hubert E. Pearce. In a significant set of 74 runs which Rhine named the Pearce-Pratt Series, the odds against the successful guesses being merely chance were estimated as 1 in 10,000,000,000,000,000,000,000. Many variants in experimental setup were developed in card-guessing, and the results were often significantly above chance expectation.

The idea for the classic psychokinetic (PK) experiments developed after a casual visitor to Duke boasted that he could will dice to fall so that he could get the numbers he needed to win. Experimental techniques were devised in which subjects threw dice for the face of their choice. The results were analyzed mathematically. The results over several years indicated strong evidence for the reality of PK. Such findings were later confirmed by experimenters elsewhere, using a variety of experimental techniques. Various methods were developed to ensure that PK tests with dice were not influenced by mechanical factors (weight of dice, etc.) or unconscious skills in throwing. Apparatus was designed which threw dice automatically.

Some special terms that have developed in the study of PK are: PK-MT (psychokinetic effect on moving targets such as dice); PK-LT (influence on living matter, such as growth in plants, healing, influencing animals); PK-ST (influence on static targets). Another initialism that grew up in evaluating PK was "QD," which indicated the division of record sheets into four equal quarters. Study of quarter divisions showed a consistent pattern of fall-off in scoring results as between upper left and lower right quarters of the record sheet, with the other two quarters bridging the gap in success fall-off. It became clear that this fall-off in success during the course of a series of tests was a characteristic feature of PK, suggesting the operation of some unknown mental process which affected the continuity of PK achievement.

In 1934, Rhine published his first book, Extrasensory Perception, which caused something of a furor in scientific and academic circles. For a time it was fashionable to attack his preliminary findings favoring ESP. The scientific community especially, and a large portion of the general public, were still much opposed to, and highly suspicious of parapsychology as a study. The identification of Duke University with such controversial and scientifically marginalized research, was also highly criticized; and eventually Rhine was obliged to open a separate Parapsychology Laboratory, seeking outside sponsorship for research. The persistent patient work of Rhine, his associates and other parapsychologists over decades eventually established a place for parapsychology as a proper scientific study, however many skeptics stood by with disbelief.

The early years of parapsychology were chronicled in a book by Rhine and others: Extrasensory Perception after Sixty Years; a Critical Appraisal of the Research in Extrasensory Perception (1940). In it they detailed the ESP research at Duke University from 1927 through 1940 in the context of the former period of psychical research from 1882 to 1927. Valuable scientific investigation of ESP and related phenomena and some laboratory research had been conducted during this earlier period by both the Society for Psychical Research, founded in London in 1882, and the American Society for Psychical Research, founded in 1885. For example, from 1921 on, an important series of card tests was conducted by G. N. M. Tyrrell in Britain. The British experimenter W. Whately Carington did important tests on telepathy and PK and developed a stimulating "association theory" of telepathy. Other British experimenters included: G. W. Fisk and Donald J. West working on PK scoring, S. G. Soal, and Kathleen M. H. Goldney.

In the United States, notable ESP pioneers included Gardner Murphy and Gertrude R. Schmeidler. Murphy joined the Society for Psychical Research, London, as early as 1917. He did graduate work at Harvard University in the field as the Richard Hodgson Fellow from 1922 to 1925, and also served as vice-president and president of the American Society (1940–62).

In 1937, Rhine began publication of the Journal of Parapsychology, devoted to original publication of experimental results and other research findings in extra-sensory perception and psychokinesis.

Rhine's early work with Eileen J. Garrett, a notable psychic whom he tested in the early days at Duke, bore fruit in 1951 when she established the Parapsychology Foundation, in New York City, to promote laboratory parapsychology and fund and sponsor research. From 1953 on, the foundation published a bimonthly newsletter, Newsletter of the Parapsychology Foundation, which was superseded in 1970 by the bimonthly journal Parapsychology Review. Between 1959 and 1968 the foundation also published a valuable International Journal of Parapsychology. The Parapsychology Foundation plays an important role in encouraging parapsychological research in universities and among scholars with established scientific reputations.

The Second Generation

A new day arrived for parapsychology with the founding of the Parapsychological Association in 1957 as the professional society for parapsychologists. The association projected a threefold effort to advance parapsychology as a scientific discipline, engage in public education, and integrate the results of their research with the findings of other branches of science.

By 1957 parapsychology and psychical research had developed a working partnership and tolerance of the particular contributions both made. Boundaries were blurred as individuals worked both areas. Researchers saw the need to investigate the claims and phenomena which emerged in the noticeable revival of the occult and occult religion in the 1960s. As psychical researchers examined a broad range of phenomena (Spiritualism, evidence for survival after death, hauntings, poltergeist occurrences, out-of-the-body traveling, reincarnation, psychical healing, and magical practices) parapsychologists expanded the range of topics covered by laboratory experimentation.

Popular interest in psychic and occult phenomena in the 1960s helped create a general climate of belief in the paranormal at both critical and uncritical levels. The most significant sign of the changing climate was the acceptance of the Parapsychological Association into membership of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in December 1969, after three previous rejections. This improved scientific status of parapsychology owed much to the patient laboratory work on ESP by Rhine and others since the 1930s.

Parapsychology and Fraud

Parapsychology, as science in general, is a very competitive field. The sense of urgency to produce results is heightened in this field. Undergirded as it is with the belief that positive results would necessitate a significant revision of currently operative scientific models of the universe the pressure is great. With such high stakes, the field has had to pay constant attention to improving its methodology and tightening its controls. Consequently, it has also had to watch out for the occasional production of fraudulent reports, especially the altering of laboratory statistics, in order to give significance to mundane or negative experimental results. With parapsychology being such a controversial field, it is not unexpected that ideological critics of the field have seized such revelations of fraud and widely publicized them. Many of these critics of parapsychology organized and affiliated with the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP).

While parapsychology has some well-publicized cases of fraud, the cases must be understood in the larger context of fraud that afflicts every field of science. Most cases of fraud go undetected as they concern peripheral matters of insignificant technological or philosophical consequence. Yet it only would follow that the temptation to fraud is everywhere. This temptation was vividly illustrated by CSICOP itself in their early investigation of the work of Michel Gauquelin in astrology. When CSICOP results confirmed Guaquelin's results, data was changed to conceal that fact. Even after the fraud was pointed out to the committee, the original papers were republished without any reference to the cheating that had occurred. That refusal to deal with internal fraud has blunted much of the usefulness that the committee might have had as a watchdog in the field.

Two revelations of fraud have had the most effect on parapsychology. The first concerned the experiments in telepathy carried out by S. G. Soal with the percipient Basil Shackleton from 1941–1943. They had been regarded as highly evidential for many years. In 1971, serious doubts were raised about the experiments and Soal's handling of them. An article by R. G. Medhurst in the Journal of the S.P.R. in 1971 questioned the method of constructing quasi-random series in the tests. Medhurst implied inaccuracy (or worse) in Soal's methods. As early as 1960, Gretl Albert, an agent at some of the sittings, had alleged that she had seen Soal "altering the figures" several times on the score sheets. Thus the Medhurst article opened a controversy within parapsychology which resulted in a 1978 article by Betty Markwick in the Proceedings of the S.P.R. Markwick presented an overwhelming case for conscious or unconscious manipulation of data by Soal, based on computer analysis of his records. (Not all parapsychologists agree that Soal was deliberately fraudulent; but the validity of his telepathy experiments with Basil Shackleton has been shown to be inadmissible.)

In another case, the research of Walter J. Levi, Jr., formerly the director of the Institute for Parapsychology offered a rival for the Soal experiments as an instance of fraud. In 1974 J. B. Rhine reported that Levi had been caught falsifying results in an experiment. Levi was asked to resign and left the field. A re-examination of all his research in the field, including independent replication of his experiments, began. His papers were from that time no longer cited as providing any evidence of psi.

During the 1980s a controversy developed around the ganzfeld psi experiments of Carl Sargent at Cambridge University. An article "A Report of a Visit to Carl Sargent's Laboratory" authored by Susan Blackmore (Journal of the S.P.R., vol. 54, 1987) cast serious doubt on the methods and validity of Sargent's experiments. A defense of Sargent against the implication of fraud, "Cheating, Psi, and the Appliance of Science; A Reply to Blackmore" by Trevor Harley & Gerald Matthews, was published in the same issue of the Journal.

Contemporary Parapsychology

The general openness to psychic and occult phenomena that led to the burgeoning of the New Age movement and the acceptance of the Parapsychological Association into the American Association of the Advancement of Science served to create a decade of heightened parapsychological research in the 1970s. The founding of new research organizations such as the Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine (1970); the Institute of Parascience (1971); the Academy of Religion and Psychological Research; the Institute for Noetic Sciences (1973); and the International Kirlian Research Association (1975) created an optimistic climate. It offered promise that new breakthroughs were imminent. The reports of new work in parapsychology at the Stanford Research Institute further inflated the hope.

Parapsychology had become an international affair before World War II. During the last half of the twentieth century it became even more intricately woven into the everyday lives of people the world over. The decade of the 1970s saw further expansion of parapsychology. By the end of the 1980s the Parapsychological Association reported approximately 300 members working in more than 30 countries. In the United States alone by 1990, the organization listed over 150 members, including many professionals and scientists. Additionally, research not affiliated with the association was being carried out in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union.

Not surprisingly, both the scope and methods of parapsychology expanded greatly by the end of the twentieth century. Notable new directions included Kirlian photography, remote viewing, the investigation of altered states of consciousness (including alpha-related states and dream experiences) prompted by the influx of spiritual teachers from the East who made extraordinary claims for the abilities produced by meditation and related disciplines; experiments in the paranormal healing of animals; and, possibly the most controversial of all, the work of Ian Stevenson in the investigation of the evidence for reincarnation. The 1970s and 1980s also saw a significant amount of attention paid to the testing of the claims of paranormal feats by psychic Uri Geller followed by the emergence of a number of others, especially in Japan, who claimed similar abilities.

Parapsychologists still found themselves faced with strong opposition from their academic colleagues. Research and teaching positions were difficult to obtain, and unstable at best. No university seemed willing to establish a parapsychological department. Continued opposition both to parapsychological findings and the lack of any formal acknowledgement to the field remained a constant aggravation and threat to the work. The core of the opposition was focused in the Committee for the Investigation of the Claims of the Paranormal, founded in 1976, (CSICOP) and in its periodical, Skeptical Inquirer.

New lines of hopeful research soon proved to be dead-ends. The effects of Kirlian photography disappeared as more stringent controls were applied, as did most of the effects produced by Geller and his imitators. Stevenson was unable to pass on the enthusiasm he had for his reincarnation research. The Stanford Research Institute abandoned its parapsychological research. The Academy for Parapsychology and Medicine disbanded and the problem of the nonacceptance of parapsychology by the academic world continued to provoke concern and debate in parapsychological circles.

Charles Thomas Cayce, the grandson of Edgar Cayce, and director of the Edgar Cayce Foundation, and the Association for Research and Enlightenment, (ARE) reported in 1995 that the foundation's Atlantic University, was expected offer the first Master's Degree in Transpersonal Studies, much of the program directed to the readings of the elder Cayce and the meaning of his psychic revelations. Much of the research that previously had been conducted at Duke University, was being conducted through Atlantic and the ARE, as well as programs and seminars around the United States, and internationally. ARE's approach to studying paranormal phenomena consisted of understanding the whole person. Through holistic medical clinics, spiritual reflection and meditation the work to develop psychic ability must be a lifelong process. Again, the true believers worked hard to overcome the impression the non-believers had that the entire pursuit of uncovering the complexities of the paranormal world was the domain of the non-thinking person. While the Parapsychological Association wanted to specifically exclude paranormal as a part of their ongoing scientific research, and disassociate from the term, "paranormal," many outside the organization insisted on using both the terms and the phenomena in conjunction with any unexplained occurrence that involved the human mind.

Yet if the experts and scientists were skeptical, in 1991, American Demographics, reported that a Gallup poll indicated that people in the age group of 30 to 49, a generation more educated than any previous one in America, were more likely than any other to believe in paranormal phenomena. According to that poll, between 1978 and 1991, certain statistics emerged: 1), the proportion of people believing in ghosts increased to 25 percent from 11 percent; 2), belief in devils increased to 55 percent from 39 percent; 3), belief in deja vu, the belief that a person holds when a new experience gives the feeling that it has already occurred, in this life or another, increased to 55 percent from 30 percent; 4) 18 percent of adults believe in the possibility of communicating with the dead; and, 5), 70 percent believe in an afterlife. That poll also indicated a decline in certain paranormal beliefs, including a drop from 51 percent to 49 percent of the people who claimed to believe in ESP. One person who appeared on television sets at the end of the 1990s was James Van Praagh. Van Praagh, a world-famous medium, wrote books and produced audio tapes, recounting his communication with the spirits of dead people. He received wide acclaim, particularly regarding his spiritual approach.

Popular television shows and movies at the end of the twentieth century belied, too, that skepticism was as rampant as CSI-COP claimed. In any case, Hollywood especially took advantage of the interest the average person seemed to have in the area of parapsychology—from ghosts to satanic possession. One popular network show, “Unsolved Mysteries,” featured at least one piece a week on some paranormal occurrence, right along with their true-crime mysteries of kidnapping, murder, and other crime-related stories. The weekly television series, “The X-Files,” had its two fictional heroes, FBI agents, experiencing the “out of the ordinary” phenomena as they hunted down mysterious criminals and sometimes supernormal forces. A 1999 hit summer movie, “The Sixth Sense,” even won an Academy Award nomination for its 11 year-old star. The line that became most infamous was familiar to those who did not see the movie, as well as those who had. “I see dead people.” A line that revealed the perplexed youngster’s dilemma, was pronounced on movie trailers for the months surrounding the picture’s opening. Indeed, the idea fascinated people enough to give the movie some of the highest ratings and biggest box office sales of the year.

Parapsychological phenomena did not abide by the constraints of time or space, according to those involved in its research. It does not distinguish between mind and matter—both are one, inextricably connected to each other. Still, the majority of parapsychologists believed that all of the unexplained experiences that included, ESP, PK, and the body surviving after death, to name only a few, would eventually be explained scientifically as scientific knowledge expanded.

Parapsychology Foundation

Founded in 1951 as a nonprofit educational organization to support "impartial scientific inquiry into the psychical aspect of human nature such as telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, and psychokinesis." The foundation stems from the work of Eileen J. Garrett, the first president, and Frances P. Bolton. The foundation provides grants for research in parapsychology and maintains an active program of publications, including monographs, books, and journals. It holds both national and international conferences. It periodically issued journals beginning with Tomorrow and more recently the International Journal of Parapsychology (1959–1968) and Parapsychology Review (1970–1990). The International Journal of Parapsychology resumed publication in the spring of 2000. The foundation's web site offers answers to frequently-asked-questions, The Parapsychology F.A.Q., and other information regarding the organization's history, research, and membership.

The foundation also maintains the Eileen J. Garrett Library, which provides valuable reference to students and researchers in the field of parapsychology. The main emphasis of the library is to disseminate information on the history of parapsychology, contemporary and experimental parapsychology, and related subjects. It warehouses publications that approach parapsychology from an objective and analytical point of view. The library also has access to various parapsychological databases, as well as, to current journals and periodicals. The foundation may be contacted at 228 E. 71st St., New York, NY 10021. Parapsychology Laboratory (Duke University)

In 1927 J. B. Rhine and his wife, Louisa Rhine, moved to College Station, North Carolina, where they had found the support of William McDougall, chairman of the psychology department, in pursuing parapsychology. By the time McDougall died in 1931 they were settled in and working on the experiments that would lead to J. B. Rhine's early important work, Extra-Sensory Perception (1934). The next year, with the cooperation of McDougall's successor, a separate division of parapsychology was established in the psychology department and designated the Parapsychology Laboratory. Rhine was placed in charge. For the next 30 years, the Parapsychology Laboratory was the primary scene of major experiments in parapsychology. Among them were those of the well-known medium, Eileen J. Garrett. She conducted a series of experiments there, known as the Zner Card Experiments, studying the phenomenon of ESP.

The laboratory's controversial work made ESP a household word. It also met with mixed reactions from the faculty at the university, mostly critical. In 1950 it was made an autonomous unit, and in 1962, when Rhine formerly retired, the laboratory was discontinued altogether and support of this field by Duke came to an end. That same year Rhine created the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man to continue the work of the laboratory and established the Institute for Parapsychology as a new laboratory.

Paraskeva, Saint

A saint of the Russian calendar, whose feast day is August 3. On that day, pilgrims from all parts of Russia used to congregate in St. Petersburg for the purpose of casting out devils. A newspaper report of the proceedings as they occurred in 1913 is as follows:

"Another St. Paraskeva's day has come and gone. The usual fanatical scenes have been enacted in the suburbs of St. Petersburg, and the ecclesiastical authorities have not protested, nor have the police intervened. Special trains have again been run to enable thousands of the lower classes to witness a spectacle, the toleration of which will only be appreciated by those acquainted with the writings of M. Pobiedonostzeff, the late Procurator of the Holy Synod.

"The Church of St. Paraskeva is situated in a factory district of the city. On the exterior side of one of the walls is an image of the Saint, to whom is attributed the power of driving out devils and curing epileptics, neurotics, and others by miraculous intervention. At the same time, the day is made a popular holiday, with games and amusements of the all sorts, booths, and lotteries, refreshment stalls and drinking bars.

"The newspapers publish detailed accounts of this year's proceedings without comment, and it is perhaps significant that the Novoe Vremya, a pillar of orthodoxy, ignores them altogether. Nor is this surprising when one reads of women clad in a single undergarment with bare arms being hoisted up by stalwart peasants to the level of the image in order to kiss it, and then having impure water and unclarified oil forced down their throats.

"The treatment of the first sick woman is typical of the rest. One young peasant lifted her in the air, two others held her arms fully extended, while a fourth seized her loosened hair, and, dragging her head from side to side and up and down, shouted 'Kiss, kiss St. Paraskeva!' The woman's garment was soon in tatters. She began groaning. One of the men exclaimed: 'Get out! Satan! Say where thou art lodged!' The woman's head was pulled back by the hair, her mouth was forced open, and mud-coloured water (said to be holy water) was poured into it. She spat the water out, and was heard to moan, 'Oh, they are drowning me!'

"The young man exultantly exclaimed, 'So we've got you, devil, have we? Leave her at once or we will drown you!' He continued pouring water into the victim's mouth, and after that unclarified oil. Her lips were held closed, so that she was obliged to swallow it. The unfortunate woman was again raised and her face pressed against the image. 'Kiss it! kiss it!' she was commanded, and she obeyed. She was asked who was the cause of her being 'possessed.' 'Anna,' was the whispered reply. Who was Anna? What was her village? In which cottage did she live? A regular inquisition.

"The physical and mental sufferings of the first victim lasted about an hour, at the end of which she was handed over to her relatives, after a cross had been given to her, as it was found that she did not own one. According to accounts published by the papers Retch and Molva, many other women were treated in the same fashion, the exercises lasting a whole day and night. The men 'pilgrims' would seem to have been less severely handled. It is explained that the idea of unclenching the woman is that there should be no knot, bow, or fastening where the devil and his coadjutors could find a lodgment. And one is left with the picture of scores of women crawling around the church on their knees, invoking the aid of the Almighty for the future of His pardon for sins committed in the past."

The treatment of the "possessed" is analogous to that employed by many peoples for the casting out of devils. Non-Western cultures such as the Chams of Cambodia forced the possessed to eat garbage in order to disgust the fiend they harbored and medieval Roman Catholic exorcisms occurred among the nuns of Loudon. Even at the end of the twentieth century similar practices that however effective are culturally offensive to most religious people can be found among contemporary Western religions that practice exorcism.

Pioneer British spiritual healer, whose profession commenced in 1929 after a surgeon warned that his wife would die from inoperable cancer within six months. A Spiritualist friend suggested psychic healing, and during a Spiritualist séance, a spirit guide informed Parish that he was a natural healer and would cure his own wife.

Parish did in fact effect a cure within nine months, after which he began regularly to practice as a healer. Over seventeen years he received more than 500,000 letters of thanks from grateful patients, many of whom had been declared incurable by doctors. He became popularly known as "Parish the Healer." He died in January 1946.

Parkes, F. M. (ca. 1872)

British Spiritualist who practiced spirit photography. In association with a Mr. Reeves, the proprietor of a dining room, he obtained recognized spirit extras in 1872 after three months of experiments. That same year Frederick A. Hudson also obtained the first such pictures in England. Without the presence of Reeves or his own wife, Parkes could not get a full form and clearly defined pictures, only white patches and cloudy appearances.

In accordance with spirit directions, Parkes set it as a condition to have the plates in his possession in the dark room prior to their being placed in the camera for purposes of magnetization. To avert suspicion he had an inspection hole cut in the dark room through which the sitters could see the plate through its entire process.

Sexton wrote enthusiastically of Parkes's powers in the Christian Spiritualist. William Stainton Moses gave the following interesting description in Human Nature:

"A considerable number of the earlier pictures taken by Messrs. Parkes and Reeves were allegorical. One of the earliest, taken in April, 1872, shows Mr. Reeves' father holding up a cross above his head and displaying an open book on which is written "Holy Bible." Another shows a cloud of light covering two-thirds of the pictures, and made up of the strangest medley of heads and arms, and flashes of light, with a distinct cross in the centre. Another, in which Mr. and Mrs. Everitt were the sitters, taken June 8, 1872, is a symbolical picture of a very curious nature. Mr. Everitt's head is surrounded with a fillet on which 'Truth' is inscribed, while three pencils of light dart up from it. There are at least two figures in the picture which blot out Mrs. Everitt altogether.

"In a later photograph, in which Mr. Burns is the sitter, is a giant hand of which the thumb is half the length of the sitter's body. It is just as if a luminous hand had been projected or flashed on the plate without any regard to focus. Another very startling picture is one which shows on a dark background a huge luminous crucifix. Then we have angels with orthodox wings hovering over some sitters. One is a very striking model: the face of great beauty and of pure classical design. The figure floats with extended arm over the sitter, and below it, almost on the ground, appear nine faces, and, strangest of all, close by the sitter's head, a large eye, with beams of light proceeding from it. The eye is larger than the head of the sitter, and the whole picture presents a most curious appearance. Some show mere faces; some heads; some, again, whole bodies floating in the air; and some partially formed bodies projected on the plate, apparently at haphazard."

Paroptic Vision

Term coined by French author Jules Romains (Louis Farigoule) for the ability to see without the use of the eyes. (See Eyeless Sight)

Parrish-Harra, Carol W. (1935–)

Carol W. Parrish-Harra—author, New Age leader, and founder of the Light of Christ Community Church—emerged in the 1980s after establishing the Sparrow Hawk Spiritual Community in Tahlequah, Oklahoma, and publishing several popular New Age books. She was born on January 21, 1935, and in 1958 had a life-changing experience. A Florida housewife at the time, she was given a pain killer during the birth of her sixth child. In an allergic reaction to the drug, her lung collapsed and she slipped into unconsciousness. She would later claim that her consciousness left her body, and a new consciousness, who retained the memories of her previous earthly years, replaced it. As a result, she emerged as a new person. Formerly passive, she became assertive and outgoing. No longer content at home, she got a job and soon worked her way into an executive position.

In 1969 Parrish-Harra attended a lecture at a Spiritualist church in St. Petersburg, Florida, and began studying there. Two years later she was ordained as a minister in the Christian Metaphysical Church, became an associate minister (medium) at the church, and through the 1970s gave lectures around the United States. In 1976 she founded the Villa Serena Spiritual Community in Sarasota, Florida.

In 1981 she founded a New Age community on 300 acres in Oklahoma with five families from Florida. Parrish-Harra's Light of Christ Community Church ministered to the spiritual welfare of the residents. Planned to be the home of approximately 150 people, the community is organized into clusters (tribes) to allow for both intimacy and community and serves as a prototype for other communities and as a training ground for future leaders.

Many people first heard of Parrish-Harra in 1983 in Ruth Montgomery's Threshold to Tomorrow. In the book Montgomery describes people who had had experiences similar to the one Parrish-Harra had in 1958. Montgomery designates such people as "walk-ins," and suggests that such changes represent the actual replacement of the consciousness of one person with the consciousness of another (rather than a new integration of the individual's personality). In any case, Parrish-Harra's experience was noted as a heretofore unrecognized type of personal event.

Parsons, Denys (1914–)

British administrator and documentary film director who for some years was joint honorary secretary of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He was born on March 12, 1914, in London, England. He was educated at Eton, the University of London (B.Sc., 1936), and the Imperial College of Science and Technology, London (M.S., A.R.I.C., 1938). He was a research chemist (1939–45); a director of scientific, medical, and industrial films (1945–51); a manager with Applied Physics Group, National Research Development Corporation, London (1952–73); and the head of press and public relations for the British Library, London (1973–80). Parsons published a number of humorous books and guides and edited The Directory of Tunes and Musical Themes (1975). Parsons took special interest in research relating to quantitative evaluation of extrasensory perception, on which he published a number of articles.

Parsons, Jack (1914–1952)

Jack Parsons, an explosives expert, pioneer in rocket propulsion, and follower of the thelemic magic of Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), was born Marvel Whiteside Parsons, the son of Marvel and Ruth Whiteside Parsons in Los Angeles, California, on October 2, 1914. Shortly after his birth, his parents separated, and his mother raised him as John Parsons. His friends and magical associates would know him as Jack.

During his teen years he developed an interest in rocketry and explosives, and carried out a number of amateur experiments. In 1932, while still in high school, he landed a job with the Hercules Powder Company. He graduated the following year and entered Pasadena Junior College and then spent two years at the University of Southern California, though he never graduated. In 1935 he married Helen Northrup and shortly thereafter left school to take a job at the California Institute of Technology, even though he lacked the formal training that such a job usually required. He took the lead in the development of liquid-fuel propellants, and made a secure place for himself in the history of rocket science.

In 1939 Parsons discovered a book by Crowley and then met Winifred Smith, a resident of Pasadena, who also led what was then the only active chapter of Crowley's organization, the Ordo Templi Orientis (OTO), then in existence. Thus began his double life, rocket scientist by day and magical student by night. In 1941 he and his wife both formally joined the OTO. From that time forward he would be the occasional object of surveillance by law enforcement officials who were concerned with his keeping explosive materials at his home. Also, neighbors and some who had attended various events at Parsons' home reported that he was engaged in immoral actions and black magic. As a whole, the police discounted them. In 1943, Parsons and his wife divorced, and he began a relationship with Helen's sister Sara Elizabeth "Betty" Northrup.

In the months immediately after World War II (1939–45), Parsons began a set of independent magical operations that would become known collectively as the Babalon Workings. These workings brought him into contact with a preternatural entity and also coincided with another shift in his personal relations. Betty was attracted to a new friend of Parsons', L. Ron Hubbard. Soon after the workings began, Marjorie Cameron came to Pasadena, and Parsons introduced her to magic work. They would eventually marry.

The results of the Babalon Workings were manifold. Parsons channeled a document, "Liber 49," which he came to believe was a fourth chapter to Crowley's basic magic text, The Book of the Law. As the workings became more involved, Crowley, then living out his last years in England, became concerned and sent a representative to examine the situation with the Pasadena OTO. Parsons formed a company with Hubbard and Betty to purchase boats on the East Coast and transport them to California. This company failed after Parsons and Hubbard had a disagreement and the assets were divided in a court settlement. Hubbard would later go on to found the Church of Scientology.

Parsons went through a period of disillusionment with magic and the OTO and resigned. He became convinced that the organization had proven itself an obstacle to reach its own magical goals. He began to work his magic outside of the OTO system. In 1948 he lost his security clearance at the California Institute of Technology. It was reinstated the following year, but in January of 1952, he lost it again. His involvement in magic was the stated reason for his lost status. Then on June 17, 1952, Parsons died when his home was destroyed in an explosion. The exact nature of what occurred has never been satisfactorily explained. His mother committed suicide after hearing of his death.

Parsons was a minor figure in the magical world at the time of his death. However, in the wake of the revival of interest in Crowley and magic in the 1970s, his work was rediscovered and in the early 1980s published. It has remained in print and been reproduced widely on the Internet. A first biography appeared in 1999.

Partridge, John (1643–1715)

John Partridge, an influential member of the large astrological community in late seventeenth-century London, was one of several people known for his production of almanacs. As a youth he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, but in his leisure moments he educated himself and learned the several classic languages. He also mastered astrology, and there is evidence that he studied with John Gadbury. In 1678 his first book, Mikropanastron, was published and became the catalyst for his leaving his shoemaking career for life as an astrologer. Two years later he published his first almanac, Merlinus Liberatus.

Political changes in 1685 (the year of the death of King Charles II) led Partridge to leave England and take up residence in Leyden, Holland. He returned four years later, having acquired a medical degree. He married a well-to-do widow and resumed his astrological practice. He is remembered as a prominent British exponent of a new system of division of the astrological house in the horoscope originated by Italian mathematician, Placidus de Tito. In the midst of several systems of house division, Placidus began by measuring the time needed for a point on the ascendent (horizon) to reach the midheaven (directly above the observer). The degree thus obtained is divided by three. The Placidian system, introduced in the late seventeenth century, was shunned by many British astrologers. It found its major exponent in Partridge.

By the end of the century, Partridge had emerged as the most prominent astrologer in England, a role he inherited from the late William Lilly (1602–1681). He also continued Lilly's attacks on fellow astrologer John Gadbury. In the early eighteenth century, his colleagues began to take advantage of Partridge's reputation by issuing competing almanacs in Partridge's name. Then in 1708 he became the victim of a vicious hoax. Author Jonathan Swift (1667–1745), writing under the pseudonym Isaac Bickerstaff, published a fake almanac that included a prediction of Partridge's death on March 29, 1708. He followed his almanac on March 30 with a brief tract that regretfully noted that the prediction of Partridge's death had been true and described Partridge's passing. Many almanac readers did not perceive the hoax, and Partridge was presented with the task of proving that he was still alive. He discontinued his almanac for several years and when he resumed, he included an attack on Swift's character.

Partridge died in London on June 24, 1715.

Pascal, Guillermo B. (1906–)

Uruguayan instructor in parapsychology. He was born on June 6, 1906, at Montevideo, Uruguay. He is a member of the Brazilian Academy of Social and Political Sciences, the Argentine College for Psychic Studies, Buenos Aires, and the International Institute for Scientific Research, Paris. Pascal was president of the Parapsychology Society of Montevideo from 1952 onward and is instructor in parapsychology at the Institute of Advanced Studies, Montevideo. He also taught parapsychology at the University of San Salvador, El Salvador. He takes special interest in telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, and mediumship.

Pasqually, Martines de (ca. 1710–1774)

French Kabbalist, Mason, and mystic, and founder of the Order of Elect Cohens. The date of his birth is not known definitely, and even his nationality is a matter of uncertainty. It is commonly supposed, however, that he was born about 1710 somewhere in the south of France, most likely Grenoble. Several writers have maintained that his parents were Jewish, but this theory has largely been dismissed.

It is said that from the outset he evinced a predilection for mysticism in its various forms, while it is certain that in 1754, at Montpellier, he founded an organization called the Scottish Judges, most likely a lodge of speculative Freemasonry. It failed, but around 1760 at Bordeaux he instituted a ceremonial magic organization that combined elements of the Catholic mass with any material from magic texts that he could gather. The members of his order were styled cohens, Hebrew for “priests.”

He propagated this Rite des élus Cohens (Order of Elect Cohens) in several Masonic lodges of France, notably those of Marseilles, Toulouse, Bordeaux, and Paris. In 1767 he settled in Paris, where he gathered around him many people ready to pursue the magic rituals he proposed. In 1772 he left after he heard that some property had been bequeathed to him on the island of Haiti, and he hastened there with the intention of asserting his rights; but he did not return to France, his death occurring in 1774 at Port-au-Prince, the principal town in Haiti. Pasqually is credited with having written a book, Traité de la réintégration des êtres, but this was not published until the end of the nineteenth century. A rather extensive summary of the rituals he proposed for the order were gathered and published by René Le Forestier in 1928.

The rituals drew heavily upon the Kabala, which Pasqually felt was the essence of true Judaism. The format, however, followed one that would have been familiar to a pious Roman Catholic. The members began the day with a reading of the office of the Holy Spirit. Around ten in the evening, following a time of prayer, the members entered a private ritual space where a ritual diagram would be drawn on the floor. The invocation would begin at midnight. Its purpose was to communicate with what Pasqually termed the “Active and Intelligent Cause” (God).

Members of the order were forbidden to consume blood, fat, or kidneys of any animal, were to refrain from fornication, and not indulge the senses.

Pasqually was succeeded as head of the order by his chief disciple, J. B. Willermoz, but is largely remembered today because of the work of a younger disciple, Louis Claude de Saint-Martin, who carried his work toward a mystical, rather than magical, direction.

Patanjali

Patanjali was an Indian teacher traditionally thought of as the person who gathered and systematized the teachings of meditation and yoga. He is believed to have lived between 200

B.C.E. and 450 C.E. However, he is credited with composing the small Sanskrit volume of Yoga Sutras from which the modern practice of yoga is derived.

The Sutras laid out a system of practice by which one can attain a pure state free of illusion. The practice begins with the adoption of a fivefold ethic (call yama), very similar to that taught by Mahavida and the Jains—nonviolence, truthfulness, non-stealing, sexual restraint, and non-attachment. It is followed by the adoption of five virtues (niyama)—purity, contentment, austerity, study, and dedication. These practices inhibit the negative influences of being in the world. After adopting a lifestyle centered on yama and niyama, one begins the step-by-step adoption of the asanas (postures), breath control, control over the sense, concentration, and meditation, each of which should lead to the goal of samadhi (variously described as absorption or liberation).

According to Patanjali, the practice of yoga has a number of side effects. For example, the practice of nonviolence will lead to the cessation of violence in one's presence. Some of these side effects involve distinctly paranormal activity. For example, truthfulness in one's life leads to the ability to speak the future. The practice of concentration and meditation grants a number of siddhas, unusual powers, such as the ability to remain hidden or to greatly increase one's strength. It also leads to an understanding of the subtle anatomy of the body, including an awareness of the mysterious psychic/spiritual centers generally referred to as chakras. The practice of yoga then leads to the valuing of the siddhas and those who practice them throughout Indian society.

The practice of yoga (especially that part of Patanjali's system that included the asanas.) reached a low point in the nineteenth century, but was reborn early in the twentieth century. Simultaneously, hatha yoga, that aspect of the teachings devoted to the postures, was exported to the West as a discipline centered upon the improvement of bodily health. Hatha yoga has actually enjoyed a greater response in non-Indian cultures than in the land of its birth.

Paterson, T(homas) T(homson) (1909–)

Scottish professor of industrial administration who took a special interest in parapsychology. He was born on September 29, 1909, at Buckhaven, Fife, Scotland. He studied at the University of Edinburgh (B.S. chemistry, mathematics, 1930; B.S. geology, zoology, anatomy, 1932) and Cambridge University (M.A. anthropology, 1938; Ph.D. anthropology, 1940).

He was a staff member of the Medical Research Council, Scotland (1948–51), senator lecturer in industrial relations, Glasgow University (1951–62), and a professor of industrial administration from 1962 onward at Royal College of Science and Technology, Glasgow. He authored many papers and books on anthropology, geology, psychology, administration, and sociology.

In the field of parapsychology he took a special interest in telepathy and clairvoyance in relation to psychedelics. He was chairman of the symposium on Methodology of Research at the Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics held in November 1958 in New York.

The Path

A popular term to indicate the way an individual leads a religious life, especially if the way is prescribed with stages leading toward a preset goal. With Theosophy this term has taken on a special meaning in that it is used to denote not only the path itself but also the probationary path along which an individual must journey before he can enter on the path proper.

In order to begin the journey down a path, the individual first must be wholeheartedly devoted to this service. At the entrance to the probationary path, one becomes the chela or disciple of one of the masters or perfected beings who have all finished the great journey, and one must devote oneself to acquiring four qualifications, which are (1) knowledge of what only is real; (2) rejection of what is unreal; (3) the six mental attributes of control over thought, control over outward action, tolerance, endurance, faith, and balance; and (4) the desire to be one with God.

During the period of efforts to acquire these qualifications, the chela advances in many ways. The master imparts wise counsel and teaches the chela through meditation how to attain divine heights unthought of by ordinary human beings. The chela constantly works for the betterment of others, usually in the hours of sleep. Striving thus and in similar directions, he or she becomes fitted for the first initiation at the entrance to the path proper. It may be mentioned that the chela has the opportunity either during probation or afterward to forego the heavenly life that is due. The chela may allow the world to benefit by the powers that he or she has gained, which in ordinary course would have been utilized in the heavenly life. In this case, the chela remains in the astral world, from whence he or she makes frequent returns to the physical world.

There are four initiations that begin a new stage on the path, and each manifests the knowledge of that stage. On the first stage there are three obstacles or, as they are commonly termed, fetters, that must be cast aside, and these are the illusion of self, which must be realized to be only an illusion; doubt, which must be cleared away by knowledge; and superstition, which must be cleared away by the discovery of what in truth is real.

After this stage is traversed, the second initiation follows, and after this comes the consciousness that earthly life will now be short; only once again will physical death be experienced and the disciple begins more and more to function in the mental body.

After the third initiation, the disciple has two other fetters to unloose—desire and aversion, and now knowledge becomes keen and piercing and the disciple can gaze deep into the heart of things.

After the fourth initiation, the disciple enters on the last stage and is finally freed of what fetters remain—the desire for life whether bodily or not and the sense of individual difference from fellow human beings. The disciple has now reached the end of the journey and is no longer trammelled with sin or with anything that can hinder him or her from entering the state of supreme bliss, where he or she is reunited with the divine consciousness.

This theosophical scheme of spiritual realization has similarities with other mystical paths both East and West, but has a special affinity with Hinduism.

Pathetism

Term used to denote mesmerism or animal magnetism by La Roy Sunderland (1804–1885), a minister and prominent public advocate of the magnetist movement in America in the middle of the nineteenth century. Sunderland is a contemporary of James Braid, who is generally credited with secularizing mesmerist practice as hypnotism.

In his book Pathetism (1843), Sunderland wrote:

“I use this term to signify, not only the AGENCY, by which one person by manipulation, is enabled to produce emotion, feeling, passion, or any physical or mental effects, in the system of another but also that SUSCEPTIBILITY of emotion or feeling, of any kind, from manipulation, in the subject operated upon, by the use of which these effects are produced; as also the laws by which this agency is governed. I mean it as a substitute for the terms heretofore in use, in connection with this subject, and I respectfully submit it to all concerned, whether this be not a far better term for the thing signified, than either Magnetism or Mesmerism.”

Most magnetists had their own favorite term, such as “etherology” (J. Stanley Grimes), “neurology” (Joseph Rhodes Buchanan), “electrobiology” (John Bovee Dods), or “electropsychology” (Dr. Fiske), but eventually the term “hypnotism,” devised by Braid, was generally adopted.

Path of Gnostic Light

The Path of Gnostic Light is a new form of Gnosticism that was originated by a man known only as Master Leo, a resident of Macedonia. In the early 1980s, after a period of working with The Book of the Law, the holy book of the thelemic magick tradition, Master Leo claimed to have made contact with the entity Aiwaz, which he described as an energetic current, the same entity who had dictated The Book of the Law to Aleister Crowley early in the twentieth century. Aiwaz provided insight into the old magical formula Abrahadabra which gave rise to a set of magical techniques that connected the energy centers in the human body, the chakras, to the energies of Abrahadabra. The communication from Aiwaz led to the founding of the Path of Gnostic Light in 1985.

The Path of Gnostic Light was created as an outer order on April 16, 1985. Subsequently, Master Leo compiled the teachings of the order into a book, Knjiga Gnoze (Book of Gnosis), and published 121 copies, all of which were distributed in the former Yugoslavia. In the meantime, Master Leo had come into contact with Michael Bertiaux, a thelemic magician residing in Chicago, Illinois, who noted that while a new form of magical Gnostic teachings, Master Leo’s perspective was very close to his own and that of Kenneth Grant, the head of the Ordo Templi Orientis organization based in London, England.

Following the opening of the Path of Gnostic Light, a set of inner orders were created. They include the Order of the Gnostic Black Serpent (for males), the Order of the Gnostic Black Dove (for females), the Order of the Gnostic Black Star (for both males and females) and a fourth order known only by its initials, P.O.K.A. Included in the work of these orders is the practice of left-hand tantra, that is, sex magick.

The teachings of the Path are a path of self-exploration that begins in the direct experience of one’s personal nature and the destruction of the illusionary presentation of the mind about oneself. Following the Path leads to the complete identification of the self to the primal It. The teachings of the Path of Gnostic Light use the symbolism of the snake and the associated kundalini energy as central to its teachings. That symbol brings together such diverse esoteric teachings as the ancient cult of Orpheus and the modern Voudou cult of Damballah. Identification with the snake (and other animals on the astral plane) involves a magical transformation, a form of lycanthropy.

Pathways

The name of a number of esoteric and New Age periodicals. Among them are Pathways, a British directory which provides a concise listing of New Age and psi events, organizations, periodicals, and meetings in England. It is published quarterly at 16 Great Ormond St., London, WC1N 3RB, England.

Pathways Journal is a quarterly publication of "ideas concerning personal and social transformation." Each issue includes a directory of services and events and book reviews. It is issued by the Yes Educational Society, P.O. Box 5719, Takoma Park, MD 20912.

A second Pathways Journal is a quarterly publication edited by B. C. Jaegers, head of the State Licensed Psychic Detective Bureau, P.O. Box 24571, Creve Coeur, MO 63141.

"Patience Worth"

A spirit entity, communicating from 1913 on through Pearl Lenore Curran (Mrs. John H.), of St. Louis, Missouri, first through the ouija board, then through automatic speaking and dictating in a late medieval English prose and poetry with extreme rapidity on a wide range of subjects.

The literary merit of the books was quite good and received favorable reviews apart from any notice of their unusual origin. Four novels were published: The Sorry Tale, Hope Trueblood, Light from Beyond, and The Pot upon the Wheel. Telka, a lengthy play of 60,000–70,000 words was considered by psychical researcher Walter Franklin Prince superior to analogous works.

"Patience Worth" claimed to have lived in Dorsetshire, England, in the seventeenth century and to have been killed in America by the Indians. Some of her statements as to her home and environment were verified. Caspar Yost, the editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, took a great personal interest in the "Patience Worth" phenomenon and edited the publication of the texts.

Out of his study of the "Patience Worth" texts, Prince concluded, "Either our concept of what we call the subconscious mind must be radically altered so as to include potencies of which we hitherto have had no knowledge, or else some cause operating through, but not originating in, the subconsciousness of Mrs. Curran must be acknowledged." Most psychical researchers today would opt for the former of Prince's two choices.

Prof. Allison of Manitoba University said of the case in a personal study that "it must be regarded as the outstanding phenomenon of the age." Dr. Usher, a professor of history at Washington University, considered The Sorry Tale, a composition of 350,000 words, "the greatest story penned of the life and times of Christ since the Gospels were finished." On occasions "Patience Worth" demonstrated before professors. Starting in March 1918, a monthly called Patience Worth's Magazine was published for ten months to provide an outlet for her prolific literary activity.

Paton, Mrs.

Nonprofessional apport medium of Melbourne, Australia, who flourished in the 1870s. She accepted no fees for her séances.

The objects apported were distinguished by the place where the objects came from. It often happened that things were brought from her own house over a distance of two miles. Occasionally, the objects were very heavy or difficult to handle like a glass of wine. A stone apported from the seashore was found to weigh 14 pounds and came with a mass of seaweed with shrimp-like creatures on it. One of the most notable apported household objects was a soup plate with twenty eggs on it.

Paton was not usually entranced during her apport phenomena, but was often markedly convulsed. She worked under strict test conditions: she was searched before a séance and completely enveloped in a large mosquito net bag, which was tied and sealed. The apports arrived on a table in the dark, but on some occasions, arrived even in bright light.

One of the most astonishing apports occurred at the house of a Miss Finlason, a resident of Castlemaine. During the séance, Paton mentioned to one of the sitters that before leaving her home, two miles away, she had made a cup of tea, but had forgotten to drink it. The cup of tea and saucer appeared as an apport on the table. At another séance on April 6, 1874, an iron wheel weighing sixteen and a half pounds fell with a crash on the table, brought from the yard outside.

Patterson, Mrs. S. E.

American slate-writing medium, the first subject of the experiments of the Seybert Commission in 1884. In two sittings, no results were obtained, and evidence of fraud appeared.

A slate given to the medium was returned six months later without any writing inside. Dr. Horace Howard Furness, a member of the commission, gave her a second slate. At the end of a fortnight, the announcement was made that the slate pencil inside had disappeared, as it was not heard rattling. This was taken as a sign of success, as in Patterson's case the completion of the writing was not indicated by raps, but by the sudden appearance of the slate fragment on the top of the slates.

When, however, the committee opened the slates, no writing was seen inside. On the other hand, according to the report, the wooden frames bore telltale marks of a knife which was inserted to force an aperture for the slate pencil.

Pauwels, Louis (1920–)

Co-author with Jacques Bergier of the sensational bestselling French work, Le Matin des Magiciens (1960), later translated into English as The Dawn of Magic (London, 1963) and reprinted in America as The Morning of the Magicians (1971). The book had a significant influence on the occult revival in Europe and elsewhere, and it contained revelations of the part played by occultism in the career of Adolf Hitler and the establishment of Nazi philosophy.

Pauwels and Bergier have also collaborated on Der Planet der unmöglichen Möglichkeiten (1968), translated into English as Impossible Possibilities (1971).

Pauwels was born in Paris, August 2, 1920, and worked in journalism and French television. As a student he was fascinated by the romance of alchemy. His collaborator Bergier was born 1912 and qualified as a chemical engineer during World War II. Pauwels was an active member of the French resistance movement. In the 1970s he was employed as the chief editor of Figaro magazine.

Pearls

Various occult properties were ascribed to pearls. Among the early Greeks and Romans, the wearing of the gem as an amulet or talisman was much in vogue, and pearls were often made into crowns. Smedley, Taylor, Thompson and Rich noted, "Pope Adrian, anxious to secure all the virtues in his favour, wore an amulet composed of a sun baked toad, arsenic, tormentil, pearl, coral, hyacinth, smarag, and tragacanth."

It was popularly believed that to dream of pearls meant many tears. The occult virtues of pearls were said to be brought forth by boiling them in meat. When bruised and taken with milk, they were believed to be good for ulcers and to clear the voice. They were also said to comfort the heart and render their possessor chaste.

The mysterious Mr. Jacob ("Jacob of Simla") (ca. 1850–1921) described himself as a "Healer of Pearls," able to restore color to a "sick" pearl.

Pederson-Krag, Geraldine Huanayra (1901–1995)

Psychoanalytic psychiatrist with interests in parapsychology. She was born on July 23, 1901, in Schenectady, New York. She was a member of the Royal College of Surgeons and a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, London. She began her medical career as an assistant surgeon and house physician at Westminster Hospital, London, but moved to New York at the beginning of the 1930s and held various positions through the next three decades. In 1960 she became the director of Huntington Township Mental Health Clinic. Over the years she has authored one book in a specialized area of concern, Personality Factors in Work and Employment (1955), and various articles in the Psychoanalytic Quarterly. She took a special interest in telepathy and clairvoyance. Pederson-Krag died June 23, 1995.

Peebles, J(ames) M(artin) (1822–1922)

Prominent American Spiritualist, author, and lecturer. He was born on March 23, 1822, in a log cabin in Whittingham, Vermont. He studied at Oxford Academy, New York, graduating with a Ph.D. and LL.D.; he subsequently practiced as a physician. He was also ordained as a minister and preached in parishes in Kellogsville, Elmira, New York and Baltimore.

After preaching a sermon in Kellogsville, he was invited by one of his parishioners to attend a séance in Auburn, New York, where he first heard spirit rapping. Soon afterwards he heard a trance lecture delivered by an uneducated boy; the subject was chosen by Peebles: "The Philosophical Influence of the Nations of Antiquity Upon the Civilization and Sciences of Modern Europe and America." As Dr. Peebles described the event: "The boy at once stepped forward and commenced, and for one hour and three-quarters one continual stream of history and philosophy fell from his lips." When Peebles preached on "The Spiritual Gifts" in his own church, the deacons and congregation protested; Peebles resigned in disgust to follow a secular career and continue his investigation of Spiritualism. He wrote and lectured for more than eighty years, mainly in the cause of Spiritualism. He was also one of the earliest temperance workers and joined the abolition movement together with John Brown and William Lloyd Garrison.

In 1866 Peebles became western editor of the Spiritualist journal Banner of Light. His brilliant editorials greatly extended circulation. He became editor-in-chief of The Spiritual Universe, a journal devoted to Freethought and Spiritualism, which frequently joined in common causes in the nineteenth century. He subsequently became editor-in-chief of The American Spiritualist, published in Cleveland. In addition to his editorial and other newspaper contributions, he also published many books and pamphlets on Spiritualism.

Peebles was an advocate of Spiritualism, and traveled around the world five times in its behalf. He died February 15, 1922, in Los Angeles, California.

Pegomancy

A branch of hydromancy (divination by water), also associated with crystalomancy (also known as crystal gazing or scrying). Interpretations were made by dropping stones in sacred pools or springs and observing their movements. (See also lecanomancy)

“Pelham, George”

Pseudonym of “George Pellew,” control of the famous medium Leonora E. Piper (1859–1950). In earthly life, Pellew was a lawyer by education but a writer by preference. He often argued with his friend, researcher Richard Hodgson, that the idea of survival after death was not only improbable but inconceivable. Hodgson claimed that if not probable, it was at least conceivable. Pellew promised that if he died first he would return and “make things lively.” In February 1892, when he was 32 years old, he was killed in New York by a fall.

On March 22, the spirit entity “George Pellew” made his first appearance in Piper’s automatic script and from 1892 to 1898 he talked with some 130 people of whom 30 had previously known him. He addressed each of them in the tone and manner which he used in his lifetime.

From 1892 until 1897 he shared control with “Phinuit.” With the appearance of the “Imperator” group, who assumed the control function in Piper’s mediumship, “Phinuit” completely disappeared and “Pellew’s” communications became rare. He said that he was “advancing” in the afterlife and thus getting farther away from the physical realm. Finally he disappeared altogether. He was originally referred to in séance reports as “Pelham” or “G.P.” to protect anonymity.

Pellet Reading (or Billet Reading)

A popular means of demonstrating psychic ability in Spiritualism. Sitters at a séance or other gathering are each requested to write the name of a deceased person or persons whom they wish to contact or know about, and/or questions to which they seek an answer, on a slip of paper. The slips are either folded into billets or tightly screwed up into pellets, which are sometimes sealed in envelopes. The medium would hold each billet or pellet (often to the forehead) and give a message relating to the deceased individual or question on the slip of paper. The American medium Charles H. Foster specialized in this type of clairvoyance.

Variants of this performance are common with stage magicians and the very nature of the procedure suggests a conjuring trick. The psychical researcher Harry Price described in his book Confessions of a Ghost Hunter (1974) how he bought the secret of the trick from a man from Oshkosh, Wisconsin.

As practiced by fake mediums, such billet-readings sessions begin with the medium taking a piece of paper, holding it in his or her hand (or at the forehead for dramatic effect) and giving an initial reading. The first reading is not for the person who wrote the billet but for a person in cahoots who agrees with whatever is said. The medium then reads the billet and places it aside. The process is repeated and the answer is now given to the first billet, pretending it to be a reading for the billet in hand. By this manner the medium is always one billet ahead. After the session, the billets are collected and become part of a file on those persons who are regular attendees at the medium’s public events.

Pellevoisen

In 1876, Pellevoisen, a town in central France, became the site of an apparition of the Virgin Mary and an accompanying spectacular healing of Constance Estelle Faguet. Faguet had been ill for several years. She was wasting away with tuberculosis (at the time an incurable disease) and related complications and had finally reached a point that she could not retain any food. She was given the last rites and a grave was being prepared. She had been the sole means of support for her aging parents and her death threatened to reduce them to beggars.

As her illness had taken its toll, she had composed a letter to the Virgin and placed it under the statue of Mary at the local church.

On the evening of February 14, as friends kept a death watch, Faguet awoke to a strange sight at the foot of her bed. A demon-like figure appeared and then the Virgin. She banished the demon and told the dying young woman not to fear. She would suffer for five more days and then be healed. The Virgin returned each evening to assure her. When she told her friends and neighbors about the apparitions, they assumed that it was the sickness talking, though many showed up on the fifth day to see what would occur. After taking Communion, Faguet announced her cure, got out of bed, put on her street clothes, and asked for food. She would live an additional 63 years.

Over the next year, Faguet had ten additional encounters with the Virgin, in one of which she was shown what is known as the red scapular, a square of red cloth with the picture of a heart pierced with a lance and surrounded by thorns. Over the next century, it would be a new item in the church’s depository of pious practices. In the last apparition, Faguet was told to make the spread of the scapular her mission in life.

Following a study of the apparitions, the local bishop reported favorably, but sent the results to the Vatican asking the pope’s blessing. Given a positive response, the bishop organized the Confraternity of Our Lady of Pellevoisen. The regular holding of services at Pellevoisen was only a matter of time, and soon a regular stream of pilgrims began to appear. It has also been added to the short list of approved Marian apparitions.

Pendulums

A divination device. Small pendulums are often used in dowsing, radiesthesia, and related divination systems instead of divining-rods. Questions can be put, and the clockwise or anticlockwise rotation of the pendulum gives an answer, rather like the raps in Spiritualist séances.

In earlier forms of pendulum divination, a wedding ring was suspended on a silk thread. Today, practitioners of radiesthesia obtain a number of subtle indications from the nature of the oscillations of the pendulum, which is used for water divining, discovery of metals, indications of health and medical remedies, and even discovery of missing persons.

Penelhum, Terence Michael (1929–)

Associate professor of philosophy who also studied in the field of parapsychology. He was born on April 26, 1929, at Bradford-on-Avon, England. He attended the University of Edinburgh (M.A., 1950) and Oxford University (B.Phil., 1952), England. Following graduation he joined the faculty of the Department of Philosophy of the University of Alberta, Edmonton, Canada.

In the field of parapsychology, he studied the question of personal identity with reference to the possibility of a purely psychical entity. He was also interested in theories of survival and discussed questions of identity and survival in his book Survival and Disembodied Existence (1970).

Pentacle (or Pantacle or Pentagram)

A five-pointed star formed from five straight lines of equal length, a symbol frequently used in magical rituals. When a single point projects upward, with two points on the base projecting downward, it is used in modern neo-paganism and Wicca (witchcraft) groups as a symbolic invocation of positive influences. When turned upside-down, it is used by post-Christian Satanic groups as symbolic of the invocation of Satan and evil (in the Christian sense of that term). Satanists frequently impose the figure of a goat with two ears pointing upward and its beard pointing downward on the reverse pentagram.

The pentacle has a wide use in religions. It has been used within Christianity in such a way that the five points represent the wounds of the crucified Christ. A more common contemporary use refers back to the star which hovered in the sky when the baby Jesus was born. It is found on the flag of many Muslim countries. In ancient Greece, the pentacle was used by the Pythagoreans to symbolize perfection. In folklore, the sign has been traced on windows and doors in order to repel witches.

In ritual magic, the pentacle has played an important part in evoking or repelling spirits. It was usually associated with holy or unholy names of power and inscribed or engraved with great care and concentration. A six-pointed version or hexagram is often known as "The Seal of Solomon." Pentecost Miracles (with D. D. Home)

Pentecostalism

A modern revival movement within free church Protestantism characterized by the appearance of the biblical gifts of the spirit as outlined in the Apostle Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians 12. These gifts include the working of miracles, healing, prophecy, and speaking in tongues. Of the several gifts, the speaking in tongues has been the most controversial.

The Pentecostal movement began in 1901 in a Bible school in Topeka, Kansas. The school's teacher, Charles Parham, assigned his students the project of researching the sign of the baptism of the Holy Spirit in the lives of the first Christian apostles. Upon questioning, the students agreed that the baptism of the spirit was always accompanied by the individual "speaking in tongues." Thus the group began to pray for the baptism, and on January 1, 1901, Agnes Oznam was the first to receive an answer to her prayer and began to speak in tongues. The other students also soon spoke in tongues, and over the next few years news of the experience was spread through Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Texas. In 1906, a student from Parham's school in Houston carried the experience to Los Angeles. William J. Seymour, an African American led a small black congregation that became the center from which the movement spread to the world. It eventually took organizational form in a number of denominational bodies such as the Assemblies of God and the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee).

It is a doctrine of Pentecostals that every person who receives the baptism of the Holy Spirit will initially speak in tongues, and then subsequently manifest one or more of the other gifts of the spirit. Within Pentecostal congregations, members look for manifestations of all of the gifts.

The early Pentecostals believed that they were living in the last days prior to the return of Jesus. Therefore they interpreted the sounds which they heard as people were speaking in tongues as a foreign language, a supernatural tool to assist them in converting the nations of the world. Numerous accounts appear in the early Pentecostal literature of someone recognizing a specific foreign language being spoken despite the ignorance of the person speaking of that language. The speaking of a foreign language while in an altered state of consciousness is termed xenoglossia. Documented cases of xenoglossia are quite rare.

However, most people who speak in tongues speak sounds not translatable into any known language. In the Bible, the words spoken are described as the "words of men and of angels," and many have suggested that the unintelligible sounds were really angelic. These unintelligible vocalizations are referred to as glossolalia.

With the popularization of Pentecostalism in the last half of the twentieth century, research on the nature of glossolalia has been done. Among the most useful was the work of linguist William Samarin who studied a number of people who spoke in tongues and discovered that their vocalizations constituted a proto-language. The sounds were related to the language they spoke every day, but had only a limited number of vowels and consonants. Their speech did not have enough different sounds from which to construct a language, but was quite distinct from the gibberish spoken by someone trying to imitate someone speaking in tongues.

Pentecostal Happenings in Spiritualism

Within Spiritualism, the full range of phenomena generally referred to as the gifts of the spirit by Pentecostals also manifest. Among notable examples is the "Martian" language spoken by French medium Helene Smith and reported by Theodore Flournoy. Smith claimed that she had astrally visited Mars and while in trance spoke "Martian." Her claim was that she exhibited an instance of xenoglossia. Flournoy demonstrated that the language was related to her everyday French, that is, she was demonstrating glossolalia.

Viscount Adare, in his book Experiences in Spiritualism with Mr. D. D. Home (1870), claimed to have witnessed a broad modern duplication of the Pentecostal experience in the mediumship of D. D. Home:

"We now had a series of very curious manifestations. Lindsay and Charlie [Charles Wynne] saw tongues or jets of flame proceeding from Home's head. We then all distinctly heard, as it were, a bird flying round the room whistling and chirping, but saw nothing, except Lindsay, who perceived an indistinct form resembling a bird. Then came a sound as of a great wind rushing through the room, we also felt the wind strongly; the moaning rushing sound was the most weird thing I ever heard. Home then got up, being in trance, and spoke something in a language that none of us understood; it may have been nonsense, but it sounded like a sentence in a foreign tongue. Lindsay thought he recognized some words of Russian. He then quoted the text about the different gifts of the spirit, and gave us a translation in English of what he had said in the unknown tongue. He told us that Charlie had that day been discussing the miracles that took place at Pentecost, and that the spirit made the sound of the wind; of the bird descending; of the unknown tongue, and interpretation thereof, and the tongues of fire to show that the same phenomenon could occur again.” (See also Daniel Dunglas Home; Luminous Phenomena; Sounds; Winds; Xenoglossis)

Peoples Temple

A congregation led by Pastor Jim Jones. It fell victim to a massive murder-suicide in November 1978. In the wake of the tragedy, the Peoples Temple has become a symbol of the dangers of cults and Jones the model of the evil, manipulative cult leader. The Peoples Temple was for the last 15 years of its existence a part of the Christian church (Disciples of Christ), a large mainstream Christian denomination. In the 1960s it was hailed by liberal Protestants for its social activism. Within the loose structure of the Christian church, however, it developed a unique internal life.

The Peoples Temple was founded in Indianapolis, Indiana, in 1955 by a youthful Jim Jones as an independent congregation. He eventually brought the congregation into fellowship with the Disciples of Christ and he was ordained as a minister in that church in 1965. The next year he led most of the congregation's members to Ukiah, California, and once settled the group began to take on the elements of its unusual life. Although Jones was white, his efforts at recruiting were focused in the African American community, and the great majority of members were black. Worship services took on the free style of black Holiness churches.

Jones had been deeply influenced by his perception of black religious leader Father Divine, both in his ability to build an interracial community and in his godlike status. At one point he even attempted to merge his efforts with those of Divine's Peace Mission. Jones also came to see himself as possessing some of the godlike abilities claimed by Divine. This new self-perception was also influenced by Jones's experience among Brazilian Spiritists, and he was seen by followers as a prophet and miracle worker. Not only could he heal, but there were a number of cases of reported resurrection from the dead. Church services came to feature psychic readings and healings by Jones. Equally strong in Jones were the Marxist leanings underlying his social idealism.

By 1972 the Peoples Temple had grown to include several congregations, with groups in San Francisco and Los Angeles joining the older groups in Indianapolis and Ukiah. That same year Jones leased land in the South American nation of Guyana and the temple initiated an agricultural colony. The colony prospered and in 1977 Jones and a number of the members moved there. Eventually approximately one thousand members resided at Jonestown, as the colony was named. Jones's move to Guyana coincided with a rising criticism of the church by former members (including accusations of violence directed toward some) and the prospect of several very negative media reports on the temple.

By this time a variety of government investigations had been launched into temple activities, including its use of the welfare checks received by many of the members. In the midst of the ongoing controversy, Congressman Leo J. Ryan went to Guyana to see the colony, claiming he was interested because many of its residents had formerly lived in his district. After what had been to all outward appearances a cordial visit, Ryan and his party were murdered as they were about to board an airplane to return to the United States. Within hours most of the temple members were dead; some committed suicide, but many were murdered. Very few survived to tell what had happened.

In the wake of the tragedy, the U.S. Congress conducted an extensive investigation. Unfortunately, though a lengthy report was issued, the mass of materials, including the files of the various government investigations of the temple, have never been made public, and the truth of what actually occurred at Jonestown remains shrouded in mystery. Substantive revelations of what occurred there will likely be made when those files become available. In the meantime, completely distancing herself from the standard anticult rhetoric concerning the temple, Patricia Ryan, Ryan's daughter, filed a lawsuit against the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, claiming that it was in large part responsible for her father's death.

Pepper, May S. (1868– ?)

Pastor of the First Spiritualist Church of Brooklyn, whose powers of clairvoyance were a subject of lively discussion in the American press for a considerable time. She was born in Mansfield, Massachusetts, in May 1868. When only 16 years old, after the death of her mother, she became controlled by the spirit "Bright Eyes." As she demonstrated her mediumistic talent at public meetings, she was ostracized by members of the public and even her father, who claimed that her phenomena were from "the evil one." She became one of the leading American mediums and president of the Rhode Island State Spiritualist Association.

According to contemporary accounts, her congregation wrote letters to deceased friends and put them in a plain envelope on a small table. After a prayer and short sermon, Pepper would take a letter and return a correct answer to the question if it was put in a spirit of serious inquiry, or declare it to be an attempt to mislead her. It also was said that she asked the spirit she clairvoyantly saw to look for the letter addressed to him. Before all eyes, the pile of letters moved and one of them was taken as though by an invisible hand and thrown on the floor.

James H. Hyslop, William James, J. D. Quackenbos and many others expressed their confidence in Pepper's supernatural faculties.

Percipient

General term in parapsychology to denote an individual taking part in a test of extrasensory perception. In the case of a subject who is involved in an experiment to receive impressions from an agent or sender of information, the term “percipient” is usually used.

Percival, Harold Waldwin (1868–1953)

Harold W. Percival, Theosophist and founder of the Word Foundation, was born April 15, 1868, at his parents' plantation near Bridgetown, Barbados, in the British West Indies. He lived on Barbados until his father's death when Harold was ten; he then moved with his mother to Boston and later New York City. As a youth he rejected the Christianity of his parents, and once in New York he discovered Theosophy and in 1892 joined the American Theosophical Society under the leadership of William Q. Judge. Four years later Judge died, and the society experienced a period of disruption in large part by members who rejected the leadership of Katherine Tingley, whom Judge wished to succeed him. Percival was among the members in New York City who left to found the independent Theosophical Society of New York. Percival founded the Theosophical Publishing Company of New York and emerged as a major writer, publisher, and distributor of theosophical literature.

In 1904 Percival launched the Word, which became the official journal of the Theosophical Society of New York. He wrote several books, including The Zodiac (1906), Karma: The Law of Life (1910), and Hell and Heaven, on Earth and After Death (1911).

Increasingly during his years with the Theosophical Society of New York, Percival worked on creating his own synthesis of knowledge. The beginning point of his thought was a personal mystical experience that had occurred in 1893. He described what happened to him as becoming “conscious of Consciousness.” It was an experience he had a number of times over the years. As early as 1902 he attempted to explain his experience in terms of Theosophy, and by 1912 was outlining a book that would contain his developing synthesis. He dictated the massive volume to a colleague, Benoni B. Gattell. A first edition appeared in 1932 as The Law of Thought. A completely rewritten edition appeared in 1946 as Thinking and Destiny. He subsequently published three books expanding upon topics in light of his system: Man and Woman and Child (1951), Masonry and Its Symbols (1952), and Democracy Is Self-Government (1952).

Percival believed that the state of being conscious of Consciousness allowed one to know about any subject simply by taking thought of that subject. Thinking, he defined, is the “steady holding of the Conscious Light within on the subject of the thinking. Briefly stated, thinking is of four stages: selecting the subject; holding the Conscious Light on that subject; focusing the Light; and the focus of the Light. When the Light is focused, the subject is known.”

In 1946 Percival founded the Word Publishing Company to print and distribute his books. In 1950 he founded the Word Foundation to perpetuate his teachings. The company and foundation have continued in the years since Percival's death on March 6, 1953.

Perelandra

Title of a 1943 science fiction story by British Christian writer C. S. Lewis, denoting Venus, planet of perfection. The book deals with the play between the forces of good and evil, and the need to resolve this conflict with harmonious balance.

The name Perelandra has also been given to a garden established by Machaelle Small Wright and Clarence Wright covering some twenty-two acres near Jeffersonton, Virginia. The garden is the showpiece of the Wrights' Center for Nature Research, which seeks to harmonize the forces of nature in a joint creative process between the Wrights, nature spirits (or fairies) and devas (divine intelligences). Perelandra has been compared to the experimental Findhorn Community, Scotland, U.K., which has also claimed gardening success due to co-operation between human beings and nature spirits. In fact, books on Findhorn stimulated the Wrights to experiment with Perelandra.

Machaelle Wright believes that devas are the architects of growth in nature: if they are contacted through meditation, they will facilitate harmonious growth, communicating instructions for seed choice and planting, arrangement of intervening space, and other data. Wright distinguishes between devas and nature spirits. The latter are “more dense in vibration” and closer to the earth, whereas the devas guide the overall development of plant forms.

Perelandra is laid out in eighteen concentric circles, the innermost circle being a herb ring with a large quartz crystal in the center. The garden does not use chemical or organic repellents of any description, but produces unusually attractive flowers and vegetables without pest problems.

In the summer of 1986, writer P. M. H. Atwater visited Perelandra. At that time, this area of Virginia had been officially declared a drought disaster, but the vegetables and roses of Perelandra flourished without added moisture. Various neighbors who did not share the Wrights' belief in nature spirits nevertheless commented that the garden always looked great and produced good food. One remarked, “It's not normal.”

Wright has refreshingly original concepts of a harmonious balance between insects, weather, climate, and soil in nature. She is quoted as saying:

“What I am finding that works best is a garden which constantly changes, that is free to breathe and grow on its own without set rules. An organic garden will selectively repel some life but an energy garden repels nothing and includes everything. It took me a long time to learn that . . . once animals and insects realize they don't have to fight for their lives, that they are free to live and grow, their aggression subsides and they regulate themselves! I had a rabbit living in the herb ring for several years. It never did any damage. I've had turtles, skunks, and all manner of animals living in the garden without difficulty. My few Japanese beetles, for instance, stick to the same flower and leave the others alone now that they are no longer threatened with extinction.” Wright leaves ten percent of all produce for animal or insect consumption, and certain sections of land are also left unmowed for their benefit.”

Perelandra is open for day-long tours and occasionally sponsors workshops. For information on activities and visiting, write Perelandra, Box 136, Jeffersonton, VA 22724. (See also crystal healing)

Perfumes

Perfumes are substances, generally made by blending plant oils, selected animal secretions, and synthetic chemicals, to produce a pleasant odor. Such substances were highly valued and sought after throughout human history, especially before regular bathing and the widespread use of deodorants altered the significance of human body odors. During earlier centuries, for a body to smell of a pleasant odor was noteworthy. Modern medicine has observed that in certain illnesses the skin gives out a scent of violets, pineapple, and musk, among others.

Whatever the explanation may be, this observation helps one understand the perfumes produced by mediums and makes the phrase “the odor of sanctity” appear in a new light. Christian saints are said to exhale a sweet perfume which increases at death and may remain for weeks, months, or even years afterwards. When the body of St. Casimir, Patron of Poland, was exhumed in 1603, 120 years after his death, it was found entire and exhaled a sweet smell. St. Cajetan emitted the scent of orange blossoms, St. Francis that of musk. Other saints stated to have given forth fragrance include St. Clare of Ferriol (660 C.E.), St. Hermann of Brittany (714 C.E.) and St. Patrick (461 C.E.).

Some Hindu yogis are credited with the ability to create perfumes by miraculous means. In his famous book Bengal Lancer (1930), F. Yeats-Brown described his encounter with a Mahatma named Babu Bisudhanan Dhan at Puri, Calcutta. With nothing more than a magnifying-glass and a piece of cotton-wool, the Mahatma conjured perfumes out of the air by focusing light on the cotton-wool through the glass. Each scent was waved away with the hand, to be succeeded by the next request. He produced in quick succession the scents of violets, musk, sandalwood, opium, heliotrope, flowering bamboo, nicotine plant, jasmine, and even cow-dung. A later book, Naked Ascetic by Victor Dane (1933), described a Tantric yogi in Bhawanipore who produced on request the smell of violets on Dane’s handkerchief without it leaving Dane’s hand; the perfume lasted for twelve hours.

In the records of William Stainton Moses, we find highly illustrative experiences recorded. For example, at the closing of a séance, scents were often found to be issuing out of his head. The more they were wiped away, the stronger and more plentiful they became. The most common scents were musk, verbena, new-mown hay and an unfamiliar odor which was assumed to be a “spirit scent.” During the séance it usually came down in showers. On Dr. Stanhope Templeman Speer’s request a good tablespoonful was once poured into a glass. Moses was fully aware that his body played an important part in the production of scents. He wrote on July 4, 1874:

“While in the garden, before we began to sit, I was conscious of scent all round me, especially on my hair. When I rubbed my hair my hand was scented strongly. I tried the experiment many times. When the peppermint came I was conscious of its presence first near my head, and it seemed, as it were, to be evolved out of the hair. I have before noticed the same thing, but not so markedly on this occasion.”

He suspected that the process was remedial, as the scent from his scalp was most marked when he was suffering pain. He believed that scents were employed to harmonize conditions. As he noted,

“If a new sitter is present, he or she is sensed, and so initiated. The chair which the stranger occupies is surrounded by luminous haze, from which issues the perfume; and very frequently wet scent, more or less pungent, according to conditions, is sprinkled from the ceiling at the same time. If a new intelligence is to communicate, or special honour to be paid to a chief, the room is pervaded by perfume which grows stronger as the spirit enters. This scenting of the room in which we are about to meet will sometimes commence many hours before we begin. There is a subtle odour in it which is perpetually being changed. Sometimes the aroma of a flower from the garden is drawn out, intensified, and insinuated throughout the house. Sometimes the odour is like nothing of this earth’s production, ethereal, delicate, and infinitely delightful. Sandalwood used to be a favourite, and rose, verbena, and odours of other flowers have been plentifully used.

“I find it difficult to convey any idea of the subtle odours that have been diffused throughout the room, or of the permanence of the scent. It is usually the first manifestation and the last. The perfume is sprinkled in showers from the ceiling, and borne in waves of cool air round the circle, especially when the atmosphere is close and the air oppressive. Its presence in a particular place is shown to me by the luminous haze which accompanies it. I can trace its progress round the circle by the light . . . and can frequently say to a certain sitter: ‘You will smell the scent directly. I see the luminous form going to you.’ My vision has always been confirmed by the exclamations of delight which follow.

“When we first observed this manifestation, it was attended by a great peculiarity. The odour was circumscribed in space, confined to a belt or band, beyond which it did not penetrate. It surrounded the circle to a few feet, and outside of that belt was not perceptible; or it was drawn across the room as a cordon, so that it was possible to walk into it and out of it again—the presence and absence of the odour and the temperature of the air which accompanied it being most marked. . . . Within it the temperature was cool and the scent strong, outside of it the air was decidedly warmer, and no trace of the perfume was perceptible. It was no question of fancy. The scent was too strong for that.

“I have known the same phenomenon to occur in the open air. I have been walking with a friend, for instance, and we have walked into air laden with scent, and through it again into the natural atmosphere . . . I have even known cases where wet scent has been produced and showered down in the open air. On one special occasion, in the Isle of Wight, my attention was attracted by the patter of some fine spray on a lady’s [Mrs. Speer’s] silk dress, as we were walking along a road. One side of the dress was plentifully besprinkled with fine spray, which gave forth a delicious odour, very clearly perceptible for some distance round.

“During a séance the scent is either carried, as it seems, round the circle, and is then accompanied by cool air, or it is sprinkled down from the ceiling of the room in liquid form. In the clairvoyant state I am able to see and describe the process before the scent is sprinkled, and can warn a special sitter not to look upwards. For, on certain occasions, when conditions are not favourable, the scent is pungent and most painful if it gets into my eye, and it has caused no more pain than water would. On the contrary, I have seen the effect caused on another [Mrs. Speer] by a similar occurrence. The pain caused was excruciating, the inflammation was most severe, and the effects did not pass off for 24 hours or more. In fact, whatever the liquid was, it caused severe conjunctivitis.

“This variety in the pungency and potency of perfume I attribute to variety in the attendant circumstances. The illness of one of the sitters will cause the scent to become coarse and pungent. Harmonious conditions, physical and mental, are signalled by the presence of delicate subtle odours which are infinitely charming. I have said that sometimes the odour of flowers, either in the house or garden, will be intensified. A vase of fresh flowers put on the table causes the natural perfume in this way. We used frequently to gather fresh flowers, and watch the process. Flowers which had a very slight smell when gathered would, by degrees, throw off such a perfume as to fill the room and strike anyone who came into it most forcibly. In this case the natural odour of the flower was intensified and the bloom received no harm. At other times, however, some liquid was apparently put upon the blossom, and an odour, not its own given to it. In that case it invariably withered and died very rapidly. I have frequently had flowers in my buttonhole scented in this way.

“Great quantities of dry musk have been from time to time thrown about in the house where our circle meets. On a late occasion it fell in very considerable quantities over a writing-desk at which a lady was sitting in the act of writing letters. It was mid-day, and no one was near at the time, yet the particles of musk were so numerous as to pervade the whole contents of the desk. They were placed, for no throwing would have produced such a result, at the very bottom of the desk, and between the papers which it contained. The odour was most pronounced; and the particles, when gathered together, made up a considerable packet. Some time after this when at a séance, I saw something which looked like luminous dust on the table. No odour was perceptible, but in my clairvoyant state I saw a heap of luminous particles which appeared to be extremely brilliant. I described it, and putting out my hand I found that there was really a heap on the table. I inquired what it was and musk was rapped out. We demurred, for no odour was perceptible, but the statement was reiterated. After the séance we gathered up the dust, which looked like musk, but had no smell whatsoever. The next morning, however, the odour was powerful enough; and the powder still exists, and is indubitably a very good powdered musk. By what imaginable process can that phenomenon have been accomplished?”

The scents were not always welcome. In his note of July 4, 1874, Moses referred to a pungent odor of peppermint which was very unpleasant. Stanhope Speer described this happening more outspokenly:

“The other evening a newcomer slipped in, and stank us out of the room by throwing down from the ceiling a large quantity of Sp. Pulegii. Everything that it touched was impregnated for 24 hours. The dining-room cloth and my own nether habiliments had to be exposed to view in the back garden; and on the following morning our dining-room floor and passage had to be freely fumigated with pastilles. That spirit has not been invited to join us again.”

The experience suggests that the stench observed in some curious cases of haunting have a similar cause. Dr. Justinus Kerner recorded the case of Frau Eslinger who, in 1835, in the prison of Weinberg, was visited and talked to by a ghost that emitted an intolerable stench, felt by many others, as well.

The sickening stench of a charnel house was reported in a house near London (Daily Chronicle, April 15, 1908). On examination it was revealed that a body had been left unburied in the house until advanced putrefaction had occurred.

Florence Marryat wrote about the phantom “Lenore” of Mary Showers: “On one occasion . . . there was a charnel house smell about her, as if she had been buried a few weeks and dug up again. . . . One evening at Mrs. Gregory’s . . . I nearly fainted from the smell. It resembled nothing but that of a putrid corpse, and when she returned to the cabinet, I was compelled to leave the room and retch from the nausea it had caused me.”

The medium Carlos Mirabelli of São Paulo once produced a skeleton via materialization. An odor as that of a cadaver was emitted from his body.

The withdrawal of the scents of flowers of which Moses wrote was the only physical phenomenon known in Leonora Piper’s mediumship. “Mrs. Piper’s fingers,” wrote Richard Hodgson, “moved near the flower, as if withdrawing something from it; and in a few hours it had withered.”

Lord Adare witnessed the famous medium D. D. Home extending his hand towards the flowers on a small table, the fingers pointing towards them. “His hand remained there for few seconds, and was then brought round, and with a motion like sprinkling, cast the perfume of the flowers towards each of us in turn; the perfume was so strong that there could be no mistake about it. This was done twice. Home then made some very curious experiments with flowers; he separated the scent into two portions—one odor smelling exactly like earth; the other being sweet.

Essences were also similarly withdrawn,

“I am going to take the strength from the brandy—and he began to make passes over the glass and flipping his fingers, sending a strong smell of spirit through the room; in about five minutes he had made the brandy as weak as very weak brandy and water, it scarcely tasted at all of spirit; both Lindsay and I tasted it, at the moment, and also some time after the séance was over.

“He withdrew the acid flavour from a half a lemon, freshly cut and tasted. He held it up above his head; a yellowish light came over it, and when offered to taste again the lemon was found most disagreeable, the flavour was like magnesia or washing soda. He then restored the acid. Holding it up, a rose coloured flame came over it. After a little while, he offered it and it was found all right.” (See Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home by Viscount Adare [1870]).

The psychical researcher Dr. Joseph Maxwell found the luminous phenomena of the medium Eusapia Palladino at the sittings of Choisy not very convincing because a strong aroma of phosphorus permeated the room. Later, however, he found this odor characteristic and discovered that it was more like the odor of ozone than that of phosphorus. It was like the odor perceptible in the vicinity of frictional electrical machines when in activity.

It is curious to note that this smell often disturbed clairvoyants during their visions. Emanuel Swedenborg was one of the first to record his annoyance over it. In the poltergeist disturbance of the Drummer of Tedworth in 1661, the manifestations were sometimes accompanied by “a bloomy noisome smell” as of sulphur.

There are early records of paranormal scents in the correspondence of Dr. G. P. Billot with J. P. F. Deleuze in 1839. Billot stated that superior intelligences presented themselves through his somnambules, presided at séances, and manifested themselves by the delicious odors which they diffused around them.

In the séances of the medium David Duguid, perfumes were administered to one sitter at a time, and the recipient felt the cooling odors gently blown over his face. The manifestation was not confined to the séance room; it was sometimes experienced in the open air.

Among later mediums in whose séances the phenomenon was often recorded the Marquis Centurione Scotto and Mina Crandon (“Margery”) stand foremost.

Pernety, Antoine Joseph (1716–1801)

Author of the Dictionnaire Mytho-Hermetique (1787) and Les Fables Egyptiennes et Grecques (1758). According to Pernety, the Golden Fleece in the Jason-Medea legend is symbolic. The labors of Jason represent human strivings towards perfection.

Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo, Count (1868–1954)

Distinguished Russian-born psychical researcher. He was born Michael Solovioy, succeeded to the title of Count, and was generally known as “Count Solovovo” among members of the Society for Psychological Research, London. He joined the society in 1890 at a time when it had commenced the collection of cases for the important Census of Hallucinations (published in vol. 10 of the society’s Proceedings), and he contributed Russian cases to this project.

He investigated the Russian medium S. F. Sambor and uncovered his methods of producing phenomena by fraud, and in 1910 he cooperated with Everard Feilding and W. Marriott in sittings with the famous medium Eusapia Palladino in Naples. He reported on these sittings in Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 25, pp. 57–69). He took a special interest in the question of whether competent researchers, qualified to detect fraud, might still be influenced by illusions induced by séance room conditions. He also contributed to the SPR Proceedings and Journal on such topics as extrasensory perception and the medium D. D. Home. He also reviewed for the Journal those continental journals devoted to psychical research. He was honorary secretary for Russia for the society for many years. In view of his eminent services, the society conferred honorary membership upon him.

In 1936, he moved to London and in his later years acquired British citizenship.

Perriman, Florence (Mrs. A. E. Perriman) (d. 1936)

Voice medium tested by Nandor Fodor, who was not favorably impressed at the time. Perriman’s séance at Victoria Hall, London, is described in Fodor’s book The Haunted Mind (1959) and was also reported in the Psychic News of May 4, 1936.

Florence Perriman, also known by her married name, Mrs. A. E. Perriman, spent many years of her life as a society clairvoyant, using the professional name Madame Faustina. Perrott-Warrick Research Unit

The Perrott-Warrick Research Unit, a parapsychological research program located within the Psychology Department at the University of Hertfordshire in England, was launched in 1995 following Richard Wiseman’s reception of a Perrott-Warrick Fellowship (administered by Trinity College Cambridge). Wiseman, a practicing stage magician, had received his Ph.D. in psychology from Edinburgh University before joining the faculty at Hertfordshire. Since receiving the fellowship, he has launched a multifaceted research program that includes probes into the paranormal, intuition, false memory syndrome, and lying and deception. He has also worked on promoting the public understanding of science and has frequently appeared on television discussing his research and related topics. In 1998 he brought together psychologists, historians, magicians, and professional actors to stage “Séance,” a show that encouraged the public to think critically about claims of the paranormal, and the following year he was awarded Britain’s first Readership in the Public Understanding of Psychology.

To carry out his research, Wiseman has assembled a team of doctoral students, each of which are exploring different topics under his supervision. Emma Greening, while pursuing a Ph.D. in psychology, possesses a scholarship funded by the Society for Psychological Research and is conducting a research project on belief in the paranormal and the development of false memories. Before beginning her graduate program, she had been the editor of The Paranormal Review (for the Society for Psychical Research), and she serves as secretary of its research activities committee.

Ciaran James O’Keefe completed his master’s thesis on the utility of psychic detectives and analyzed the style of their narrative, which he concluded tended to convince the listener that there was a higher degree of accuracy in the psychic words than actually existed. Building on this research, he is currently researching the discourse that occurs in psychic readings, both mediumistic session and phone sessions on psychic hotlines. Paul Rogers is working on people with reputed intuitive powers. He is testing their ability to size up other people’s personality relative to the ability of nonintuitive people. In the process, he is trying to discover which factors convince a person of his/her own intuitive abilities.

He became student associate (1951) and later a member of the Society for Psychological Research, London, and also became a member of the Churches’ Fellowship for Psychological and Spiritual Studies. He was coeditor of the fellowship’s periodical, Christian Parapsychologist, for a year (1977–78) prior to becoming editor in 1978. Personality Term that has three uses in describing the self: (1) the sum of the characteristics that make up physical and mental being, including appearance, manners, habits, tastes, and moral character; (2) the characteristics that distinguish one person from another (individuality); and (3) the capacity to engage in mental processes, that is, possessing consciousness (according to psychical researcher James H. Hyslop).

For psychical researchers, this last definition is of primary importance. The question of survival after death cannot be decided until the continuance of personality as a stream of consciousness is proved. A stream of consciousness is proof of the presence of a personality.

The identity of this personality, however, is inseparably bound up with the faculty of remembrance. With a complete loss of memory a new personality will develop. If the former memory returns, the new personality tends to disappear. It may be resuscitated by another attack of amnesia or under hypnosis, in which case it will act as an independent personality.

The case of Anselm Bourne, investigated by William James and Richard Hodgson in 1890, is illustrative. Bourne suddenly lost his memory in 1887 in Providence, Rhode Island, and eight weeks later awoke in Norristown, Pennsylvania, as a shopkeeper. He knew nothing of Albert John Brown, the name under which he lived, nor of the shop or the business. In hypnosis a secondary personality came forward and Bourne's movements were satisfactorily traced from the moment of his disappearance.

This was a plainly degenerative case. Bourne suffered from a postepileptic condition. He had fits of depression from childhood and in later life presented symptoms suggestive of epilepsy. Such degenerative instances are numerous. In other cases the secondary state is an improvement on the primary one.

F. W. H. Myers gave an account of such a case, that of a Dr. Azam's patient, "Felida X." She was born in Bordeaux, France, in 1843, exhibited symptoms of hysteria around age 13, felt pains in her forehead and fell into a profound sleep, from which she awoke in a secondary condition. Whereas in her original condition she exhibited a melancholy disposition, constantly thought of her maladies, and suffered acute pain in various parts of her body, in the secondary state she appeared to be an entirely different person, happy and free from pain.

Such changes at first occurred every five or six days and were marked by a more complete development of her faculties. Her memory in the secondary state was continuous. This state was her lucid one; the primary state was marked by fits of melancholy. The secondary personality became more frequent and, relapses of short duration disregarded, slowly suppressed the melancholy one.

Multiple Personality

A well-developed secondary personality is often followed by the appearance of other personalities. As many as 11 personalities were recorded in the case of "Mary Barnes" (see Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 11, p. 231; vol. 12, p. 208). They may come and go, like lodgers in a tenement house. Among the better-investigated cases of multiple personality in the literature of psychical research was that of a Miss Beauchamp, discussed by Morton Prince in Dissociation of a Personality (1906). Under emotional shocks, Beauchamp developed four personalities antithetic to her original one. They not only differed markedly in health, in memories, and in knowledge of their own life, but they were formally at war with one another. The third personality, "Sally," was the most interesting. She had all the appearance of an invading, outside entity. She wrote her autobiography, in which she claimed conscious but suppressed existence as far back as Beauchamp's infancy. She had a will of her own, could hypnotize the other personalities, had no notion of time, and exhibited complete tactile anesthesia. She persistently said that she was a spirit.

Prince attempted with hypnotic suggestion to weld the four personalities into one. Sally was bitterly resistant. After a long struggle and much reasoning, however, she agreed to be "squeezed" out of existence, and Beauchamp was restored to one personality commanding the memories of all her former selves with the exception of Sally.

In the remarkable case of Doris Fischer, Prince had to deal with five personalities. They were called "Real Doris," "Margaret," "Sleeping Margaret," "Sick Doris," and "Sleeping Doris." Real Doris barely had five minutes' conscious existence a day. The alternating personalities were veritably chasing after one another for years. After lengthy efforts, Prince finally effected a cure.

In the October 1931 issue of the British medical journal The Lancet, a case of eight distinct personalities is recorded by Robert M. Riggall, clinical psychologist at the West End Hospital of Nervous Diseases, London. The personalities were (1) "Mabel," the patient herself—good, composed, moral, and economical, without many faults, but usually unhappy; (2) "Miss Dignity," who considered it her duty to do all in her power to hurt Mabel. Miss Dignity went so far in her hostility as to write a letter to Mabel, urging her to commit suicide and saying that she had enclosed a packet of poison; (3) "Biddy"—bright, cheerful, laughing, and helpful; (4) "Hope"; (5) "Faith"; and (6) "Dame Trot," who were harmless and seldom appeared; (7) "Miss Take," so named because she did not know when she first appeared or what her name was, and added that she was just a mistake; and (8) another unnamed personality of an evil stripe.

Slight causes such as hunger, fatigue, or fever are sometimes sufficient to produce a transient but violent perturbation of personality. The novelist Robert Louis Stevenson, if ill or feverish, always felt possessed in part of his mind by another personality. According to Frank Podmore, overindulgence in daydreams is probably the first indication of a tendency to isolated and unregulated psychic activity, which, in its extreme form, may develop into a fixed idea or an obsession. Theodore Flournoy added:

"As a crystal splits under the blow of a hammer when struck according to certain definite lines of cleavage, in the same way the human personality under the shock of excessive emotions is sometimes broken along the lines of least resistance or the great structural lines of his temperament. A cleavage is produced between the opposite selves—whose harmonious equilibrium would constitute the normal condition—seriousness and gaiety; optimistic tendencies and pessimistic; goodness and egoism; instincts of prudery and lasciviousness; the taste for solitude and the love of Nature, and the attractions of civilization, etc. The differences, in which the spiritists see a striking proof of an absolute distinction between the spirits and their so-called instruments, awaken, on the contrary, in the mind of the psychologist the irresistible suspicion that these pretended spirits can be nothing but the products of the subconsciousness of the medium himself."

F. W. H. Myers argued that the first symptom of disintegration of personality is an idée fixe, the persistence of an uncontrolled and unmodifiable group of thoughts or emotions, which, from their brooding isolation, from lack of interchange with the general current of thought, become alien and intrusive, so that some special idea or image presses into consciousness with undue and painful infrequency. (Such a fixed idea has also, of course, led to some of the major new contributions by individuals to society.)

In the second stage, Myers maintained, there is a confluence of these obsessive notions overrunning the whole personality, often accompanied by something of a somnambulant change. This is the birth of the secondary personality from emotionally selected elements of the primary personality. It may attain a morbid intensity, and it may lead to so-called demonic possession. In other cases, arbitrary development of a scrap of personality is responsible for the dissociation. Its most common mode of origin, Myers believed, is in sleepwalking that is repeated until the mind acquires a chain of memories related exclusively to the sleepwalking state; this chain then alternates with the primary chain.

Sleepwalkers may display a secondary personality as the acts in repeated spontaneous somnambulism form a chain of memory. Considering the wide power and tenacious memory of the subconscious, Myers suggested that the conscious personality should be regarded as a privileged case of personality, a special phase, easiest to study because it is accessible. Its powers of perception he similarly considered a special case of the subliminal faculties.

The question of secondary personalities is unanswered, in spite of continued research over the decades. No single explanation has emerged as dominant. Within the psychic community, interest has centered on cases that seem to provide some evidence of possession or obsession by spirit entities or reincarnation. Many cases appear to be a matter of abnormal psychology in which artificial personalities are created from repressed desires, anxieties, or traumas. The question has been the center of a new debate within the psychological community with the emergence of a new set of multiple personality cases claiming origin in childhood trauma from ritual sexual abuse.

Much obscurity surrounds the development of normal personality in individuals, a situation likely to remain the case given the aversion of psychologists to researching personality using models with large groups of people. Character traits often change during the course of time. Many apparently normal individuals sometimes present different personalities in public from those exhibited in private.

The maintenance of a recognizable personality depends heavily on accumulated experiences and memories (the most obvious attribute of an individual personality) and the reassurance of a familiar body and sensory perception. If one grants the possibility of survival after death, the sudden removal of memories, sensory associations, and bodily presence must be a traumatic experience. The confusing or vague messages relating to identity received at many séances could be explained on this basis. Even the triviality of many communications seems explicable, since the departed spirit might place great value on such trivialities as reassurance of a continuation of personality.

How real are our personalities? Fantasy plays a great part in the maintenance of personality, nourished by the myriad fictions of novels, movies, and television shows. Our personalities have been shaped by fashion and role models that have had powerful influence through the modern mass media society. Talented actors and actresses have shown that it is possible to change roles night after night in a physical and psychological masquerade that becomes an intensely shared experience with an audience.

The larger implications of personality involve philosophies and religions, which often differ markedly in their understanding of personality. The imperfections and contradictions of earthly personality constitute unfinished chapters in the fascinating story of life, and it is reasonable to postulate sequels in an afterlife involving progressive evolution of personality.

Personation

The portrayal of alien personalities by a temporary assumption of their bodily and mental characteristics. It is a frequent psychical phenomenon and differs from trance possession in that it does not necessarily involve a loss of consciousness or personal identity.

Personation is an impressive indication of the communicator's identity. It is an indication rather than proof, as experiments in hypnotism suggest the need for careful consideration in attributing the phenomena of personation to an outside intelligence. Under the effect of suggestion, the subconscious displays surprising histrionic abilities. The hypnotized subject is not only capable of successfully imitating any suggested personality, but may even sometimes take on animal similitudes. Charles Richet hypnotized a friend and suggested that he was a parrot. Richet asked him: "Why do you look preoccupied?" The friend answered: "How can I eat the seed in my cage?"

Richet compared the phenomenon of personation to crystallization from a saturated solution. Remembrances and emotions concentrate upon the personality invented like crystals form around a center.

Frank Podmore, in Modern Spiritualism (1902), quoted a curious instance of personation verging on possession in which the subject of personation was alive.

A Miss A. B. had a passionate love affair with a young man, C. D., and continued to cherish the belief, even after the young man broke off the relationship that he was still profoundly attached to her. "A few weeks after the breach she felt one evening a curious feeling in the throat, as of choking, the prelude probably, under ordinary circumstances to an attack of hysteria. This feeling was succeeded by involuntary movements of the hands and a fit of long-continued and apparently causeless sobbing. Then, in the presence of a member of her family she became, in her own belief, possessed by the spirit of C. D., personating his words and gestures and speaking in his character. After this date she continually held conversation, as she believes, with C. D.'s spirit; 'he' sometimes speaking aloud through her mouth, sometimes conversing with her in the inner voice. Occasionally 'he' wrote messages through her hand, and I have the testimony of a member of her family that the writing so produced resembled that of C. D. Occasionally also, A. B. had visions in which she claimed to see C. D. and what he was doing at the moment. At other times she professed to hear him speaking or to understand by some inner sympathy his feelings and his thoughts." Podmore believed the phenomena to be a delusion.

An account of personation experiences was rendered by Charles Hill-Tout, principal of Buckland College, Vancouver, Canada, in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 11, pp. 309–16). On one occasion, during a séance, he was oppressed by a feeling of coldness and loneliness, as of a recently disembodied spirit. His misery was terrible, and he was only kept from falling to the floor by some of the other sitters. At this point one of the sitters

"... made the remark, which I remember to have overheard 'It is father controlling him,' and I then seemed to realise who I was and whom I was seeking. I began to be distressed in my lungs, and should have fallen if they had not held me by the hands and let me back gently upon the floor. As my head sunk back upon the carpet I experienced dreadful distress in my lungs and could not breathe. I made signs to them to put something under my head. They immediately put the sofa cushion under me, but this was not sufficient—I was not raised high enough yet to breathe easily—and they then added a pillow. I have the most distinct recollection of a sigh of relief I now gave as I sank back like a sick, weak person upon the cool pillow. I was in a measure still conscious of my actions, though not of my surroundings, and I have a clear memory of seeing myself in the character of my dying father lying in the bed and in the room in which he died. It was a most curious sensation. I saw his shrunken hands and face and lived again through his dying moments; only now I was both myself—in some distinct sort of way—and my father, with his feelings and appearance."

The flaw, from the viewpoint of the theory of an extraneous influence, is that Hill-Tout personated his own father with whose circumstances of death he must have been familiar. But many mediums reenact the death-bed scenes of people they have never heard of and furnish, in the process, evidential details. This was a feature of the mediumship of a Mrs. Newell of Lancashire, England. As a rule such re-enactments were accompanied by great suffering. The medium seemed to experience the symptoms of illness and the agonies of dying.

The American medium Mrs. J. H. Conant, was recorded once to have shown the signs of hydrophobia; she foamed at the mouth and snapped at the sitters. The man whom she personated had died from the bite of a mad dog.

People who practice psychometry also exhibit this curious phenomenon. The object which they hold as a clue may establish a community of sensation with both men and beasts. Mrs. Denton, in describing her impressions from a fragment of mastodon tooth felt herself to be in the body of the monster, although she could not very well personate it. Personation of a dying animal, through telepathy, was illustrated by the vivid dream of the novelist H. Rider Haggard on the night when his dog Bob was struck and killed by a train.

If the assumption of the bodily characteristics of the departed is effected by the adaptation of ectoplasm, as in materialization séances, the case is known as transfiguration. (See also personality; trance personalities)

Perty, Maximilian (ca. 1861)

Professor at the University of Berne who suggested that the supernormal manifestations of mediums were caused by communion with planetary spirits through an unconscious exercise of latent occult powers.

Pessomancy (or Psephomancy)

A system of divination using pebbles or beans marked with symbols and colors relating to issues such as health, communications, success, and travel. The stones were either thrown out after shuffling in a bag or drawn out at random. (See also aleuromancy; astragalomancy; belomancy; sortilege)

Peter of Abano (Petrus de Abano) (1250–1318)

Famous medieval philosopher, mathematician, and astrologer who also wrote treatises on magic. He was born in Abano, near Padua, and became a learned scholar. He traveled widely, visiting France, Sardina, and Constantinople, and he once met the famous traveler Marco Polo, from whom he obtained information on Asia. During his travels he also discovered one of the lost books of Aristotle and translated it into Latin.

He practiced medicine in Paris with success and became rich, but his wealth and attainments were annulled by the accusation of sorcery brought against him. He was said to receive instruction in the seven liberal arts from seven spirits that he kept in crystal vessels. Other rumors claimed that he had the curious and useful ability to make the money he spent to return to his own purse.

An act of revenge, for which he was called to account by the Inquisition, brought about his downfall. A neighbor of his had been possessed of a spring of excellent water in his garden, from which he allowed Peter to drink at will. For some reason, the permission was withdrawn, and it was claimed that with the assistance of the devil, Peter caused the water to leave the garden and flow uselessly in some distant street.

The unfortunate physician died before his trial was finished, but the inquisitors were so bitter that they ordered his bones to be dug up and burned. This public indignity to his memory was averted by some of his friends, who, hearing of the vindictive sentence, secretly removed the remains from the burying-ground where they lay. The inquisitors satisfied their animosity by burning him in effigy.

Peter had a considerable literary output. He translated the astrological work Nativities by Abraham Aben Ezra, and wrote books on physiognomy, geomancy, prophecy, and the practice of occult magic.

Peters, Alfred Vout (1867– ?)

British clairvoyant and trance medium. When still a child he was conscious of the presence of other ghostly children and remarked to his mother, "I suppose they are God's angels who come and play with me after you leave me?" He often had dreams that came true, saw visions, and heard voices. His mediumship began in 1895 when he attended a séance at his sister-in-law's house. Three years later he acted regularly as a medium controlled by a guide named "Moonstone."

Peters's mediumship figured in Sir Oliver Lodge's book Raymond, or Life & Death (1916), which largely concerned séances with Peters and Gladys Osborne Leonard. In 1899, Peters held a séance in London in which he had the strange experience of being controlled by a living person. There were two ladies at the sitting and a third, a well-known medium, acted as the control of Peters from Paris. Evidential messages were reportedly given.

Peters scored some notable success in demonstrating psychometry in connection with the box of religious enthusiast Joanna Southcott at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research in 1927, before the box was officially opened by psychical researcher Harry Price.

Phantasmagoria

Term generally used for a shifting series of imaginary or fantastic images as seen in a dream or fevered imagination. The term appears to have been derived from a magic lantern entertainment presented in 1802 by the Frenchman M. Philips-tal. Variants of the term have been used to describe the appearance of phantoms, as in the collection of stories by Jean Baptiste Eyries, Fantasmagoriana, or Collection of the Histories of Apparitions, Spectres, Ghosts, etc. (1812). This was the volume that Lord Byron read aloud to Percy Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft (later Mary Shelley), Claire Clairmont, and J. W. Polidori on the night of June 16, 1816, which, along with the consumption of opium, stimulated their imaginations after Byron suggested that each should write a ghost story. The game culminated in Mary Shelley's Frankenstein, first published in 1818.

Phelps, Eliakim (fl. 1850)

Presbyterian minister and early mesmeric healer of Stratford, Connecticut, whose house was the scene of alarming poltergeist disturbances from March 10, 1850, for a period of eight months. The documents on the phenomena consist mostly of letters written to the New Haven Journal during the progress of the events. Additional testimony from neighbors was collected and published by C. W. Elliott in his book Mysteries or Glimpses of the Supernatural (1852).

The phenomena started with the mysterious displacement of objects when the family was at church. After their return, inanimate things began to fly about and stuffed effigies were discovered in empty rooms.

The following letter in the New Haven Journal describes the early activity:

"While the house of Dr. Phelps was undergoing a rigid examination from cellar to attic, one of the chambers were mysteriously fitted up with eleven figures of angelic beauty, gracefully and imposingly arranged, so as to have the appearance of life. They were all female figures but one, and most of them in attitudes of devotion, with Bibles before them, and pointing to different passages with the apparent design of making the Scriptures sanction and confirm the strange things that were going on. . . .

"Some of the figures were kneeling beside the beds, and some bending their faces to the floor in attitudes of deep humility. In the center of the group was a dwarf, most grotesquely arrayed; and above was a figure so suspended as to seem flying through the air. These manifestations occurred sometimes when the room was locked, and sometimes when it was known that no person had been there. Measures were taken to have a special scrutiny in regard to every person who entered the room that day, and it is known with the most perfect certainty that many of these figures were constructed when there were no persons in the room, and no visible power by which they could have been produced. The tout ensemble was most beautiful and picturesque, and had a grace and ease and speaking effect that seemed the attributes of a higher creation."

The effigies were constructed from clothing and other materials in the house, stuffed with pillows to represent human figures.

The New Haven Journal correspondence reported that on another occasion, Phelps was writing in his room alone. For a moment he turned away, and resuming his seat he found the sheet of paper, which was quite clean before, now covered with strange-looking writing; the ink still wet. Thus began spirit correspondences to him which mostly came in hieroglyphs. Jocular messages on scraps of paper fluttered down from the ceiling. Other communications were scrawled on walls inside and outside the house. In one case, mysterious symbols were inscribed on a large turnip.

Phelps never discovered how the phenomena were produced. "I witnessed them," he said, "hundreds and hundreds of times, and I know that in hundreds of instances they took place when there was no visible power by which the motion could have been produced."

The family had four children: two girls; Harry, a stepson of eleven; and another son of six years of age. The phenomena mostly seemed to attach themselves to Harry. In one case, his bed was set on fire. When he was sent to school in Philadelphia he was pursued there, his books destroyed, and his clothes torn. There was such an uproar in the school that he had to be brought home. One of the girls also had some invisible share in the disturbances. When both Harry and she were away, peace reigned in the house.

Andrew Jackson Davis, the pioneer Spiritualist medium, paid a visit to the house. His explanation was that the raps were produced by discharges of vital electricity from Harry's being. Indeed he attributed an actual share in the phenomena to Harry, in saying: "Young Harry frequently failed to discriminate during certain moments of mental agitation between the sounds and effects which he himself made and those sounds which were produced by spiritual presence." Davis also offered lofty spiritual interpretations of the symbolic communications. The Philadelphia Experiment

Title of a 1979 book by Charles Berlitz and William Moore that investigated the rumor that a top secret U.S. Navy experiment in 1943 had succeeded in rendering a destroyer, most likely the Eldridge, and its crew temporarily invisible and teleported it from its berth in Philadelphia to Norfolk, Virginia.

(The name “The Philadelphia Experiment” had earlier been used by various writers to denote the classic electrical experiments of Benjamin Franklin.)

The story of the Philadelphia Experiment stems largely from Carlos Allende (born in 1925 as Carl M. Allen). He claimed to have served as a deck hand on the S.S. Andrew Furuseth in 1943 and to have witnessed the experiment that rendered the Eldridge invisible. In 1956 he initially communicated with Morris K. Jessup (1900–1959), author of The Case for the UFO (1955), citing the Philadelphia Experiment as rationale for Jessup to stop researching unified field theory. A short time afterward, a copy of Jessup’s book with numerous annotations relative to UFOs and the Philadelphia Experiment arrived in the office of Naval Research.

In 1959, Jessup committed suicide, and the issue seemed to be closed. Then in 1963, Gray Barker published a book about Jessup and his unexpected death. In 1968 Brad Steiger and Joan Whritenour wrote a second book. Allende, angry that he had received nothing as a result of either the Barker or Steiger title, allowed L. J. Lorenzen, director of the Aerial Phenomena Research Organization (APRO), to interview him in 1969. He stated that his annotations on Jessup’s book were part of the hoax as were his letters to Jessup. Allende subsequently told William Moore that his confession was made in the expectation of financial gain from its publications. However, he later retracted that confession. Gray Barker published a facsimile edition of Jessup’s book, containing the annotations, in 1973 through his Saucerian Press.

In the face of a series of inquiries concerning the Philadelphia Experiment, on July 23, 1976, the Department of the Navy, Office of Information, Washington, D.C., stated in a letter regarding the Philadelphia Experiment (reproduced in full in Berlitz & Moore’s book): “ONR [Office of Naval Research] has never conducted any investigations on invisibility, either in 1943 or at any other time. . . . In view of present scientific knowledge, our scientists do not believe that such an experiment could be possible except in the realm of science fiction. A scientific discovery of such import, if it had in fact occurred, could hardly remain secret for such a long time.”

Berlitz and Moore revealed that Albert Einstein was employed as a scientific consultant to the U.S. Navy from May 31, 1943 to June 30, 1944, and made speculations that both Einstein and philosopher Bertrand Russell might have been involved in the Philadelphia Experiment. The Philadelphia Experience has continued to be a matter of entertainment on the fringe of the UFO community. (See also invisibility; teleportation)

Philalethes (or Philaletha), Eirenaeus (ca. 1660)

The life of this alchemist is wrapped in mystery although a considerable mass of writing stands to his credit. The name, a pseudonym, is similar to the one used by Thomas Vaughan, who wrote as Eugenius Philalethes). Whoever Eirenaeus Philalethes was, however, he was not Vaughan. Others have striven to identify him with George Starkey, the doctor and author of Liquor Alchahest, but Starkey died of the plague in London in 1665, and it is known that Eirenaeus was living for some years after that date.

Philalethes appears to have been on intimate terms with Robert Boyle and, although this points to his having spent a considerable time in England, it is certain that he emigrated to America. Starkey was born in the Bermudas, and practiced his medical crafts in the English settlements in America, where, according to his contemporary biographers, he met Eirenaeus Philalethes. This meeting may have given rise to the identification of Starkey as Philalethes, while it is probably Starkey to whom Philalethes referred when, in a preface to one of his books, he told of certain of his writings falling “into the hands of one who, I conceive, will never return them,” for in 1654 Starkey issued a volume with the title, The Marrow of Alchemy by Eirenaeus Philoponus Philalethes.

It is to prefaces by Philalethes that we must chiefly look for any information about him. In the thirteenth chapter of his Introitus Apertus ad Oclusum Regis Palatium (Amsterdam, 1667) he also made a few autobiographical statements which illuminate his character and career.

“For we are like Cain, driven from the pleasant society we formerly had,” he wrote, which suggests that he was persecuted. Elsewhere he heaped scorn on most of the hermetic philosophers of his day. Elsewhere, again, he criticized the popular worship of money. “I disdain, loathe, and detest the idolizing of silver and gold, by which the pomps and vanities of the world are celebrated. Ah! filthy, evil, ah! vain nothingness.”

In his preface to Ripley Revived (London, 1678), he gave some account of those who wrote on alchemy to whom he felt himself chiefly indebted. “For my own part, I have cause to honour Bernard Trévisan, who is very ingenious, especially in the letter to Thomas of Boulogne, when I seriously confess I received the main light in the hidden secret. I do not remember that ever I learnt anything from Raymond Lully. . . . I know of none like Ripley, though Flamel be eminent.”

Lenglet du Fresnoy, in his Histoire de la Philosophie Hermétique (1742), referred to numerous unpublished manuscripts by Eirenaeus Philalethes, but nothing is known about these today.

Philalethes, Eugenius (1622–1666)

Pseudonym of alchemist Thomas Vaughan, brother of Henry Vaughan, the “Silurist” poet. Eugenius Philalethes has often been confused with Eirenaeus Philalethes (or Philaletha), another alchemist. The scholar Arthur E. Waite made this error in his book The Real History of the Rosicrucians (1887). He corrected it the following year, both in his new edition of The Lives of Alchemistical Philosophers (1888) and his edition of The Magical Writings of Thomas Vaughan (1888).

“Philip”

An experimental ghost created by Iris M. Owen and members of the Toronto Society for Psychical Research, Canada, who wanted to test the connections between living individuals and paranormal phenomena. In the past, many psychical researchers have hypothesized that the entities manifesting at séances may be artificial personalities created by the unconscious attitudes of the sitters. Many "spirit guides" and "spirits" have been self-evidently synthetic and illusory entities, although acceptance of them as real personalities often favorably influences paranormal phenomena.

In September 1972, the Toronto experimenters began meditating on "Philip," a deliberately created ghost with a personal history, idiosyncratic characteristics, and even an appearance consciously worked out by the group. The eight members of the group other than Owen (a former nurse) were Margaret Sparrow (former chairman of MENSA in Canada, an organization of individuals with high IQs), Andy H. (housewife), Lorne H. (industrial designer, husband of Andy H.), Al P. (heating engineer), Bernice M. (accountant), Dorothy O'D. (housewife and bookkeeper), and Sidney K. (sociology student). At times A. R. G. Owen (mathematician and Iris Owen's husband) or Joel Whitton (a psychologist) attended meetings as an observer.

After nearly a year without significant results, the group changed their method of sitting to conform with that of a traditional nineteenth-century Spiritualist séance, in which participants were seated around a table and sang or talked to enhance the atmosphere. This approach embodied the suggestions of British psychologist Kenneth Batchelder, who claimed that skepticism inhibited paranormal phenomena but that the conventional form of a séance tended to dispel skepticism and provide an atmosphere in which paranormal phenomena seemed natural.

Within only a few weeks, the group elicited raps from the table and communications from "Philip" on conventional yes-no lines. On one occasion this phenomenon was successfully demonstrated before a live audience of fifty individuals for a videotaped TV show. In addition, there have been instances of noises from various parts of the room, a light blinking, and an apparent levitation of the table.

The results attained by the group have provided insight on the nature of spirit personality, the phenomena of the poltergeist, hauntings, and the claims of Spiritualism.

Philips, James B. (1907–1987)

British businessman who played a prominent part in the practical affairs of the Society for Psychical Research, London (SPR). He was born on December 20, 1907. Philips traveled widely throughout his life, and at different periods he was in business in New Zealand, Nigeria, and South Africa.

He did not join the SPR until 1970, but soon became a member to the Council (June 1973) and subsequently accepted the post of deputy treasurer. His wide experience of practical business affairs proved of great value to the society. In May 1975, he became honorary secretary and treasurer. Two years later he resigned as honorary secretary, but continued as treasurer for another year. He retired in 1978, when he was elected an honorary associate. He returned to service on the executive committee for further short periods as needed. He died in London on August 7, 1987.

Phillimore, Mercy (d. 1975)

Pioneer British journalist and organizer in the field of Spiritualism and psychical research. She became a member of the staff of the London Spiritualist Alliance (since 1955 known as the College of Psychic Studies) in 1913, and she stayed with the organization for the next 39 years. She retired in 1952.

As secretary, she came in contact with such leading mediums as Eileen Garrett, as well as many well-known personalities in the British psychic scene, such as Arthur E. Waite, W. B. Yeats, Stanley De Brath, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Paul Brunton.

In 1928, Phillimore and the medium Clare Cantlon were arrested for vagrancy by two police officers who had come to the Alliance headquarters for a reading. Both were found guilty.

Phillimore contributed a number of articles to the British journal Light and gave many lectures. She was a tireless worker in the cause of Spiritualism and played a significant but unobtrusive part in the modern history of the movement. She was associated with Nandor Fodor in Britain, and after his death she wrote a tribute to him in the journal Light (Autumn, 1964).

Philosophers' Stone

A legendary substance which enabled adepts in alchemy to compass the transmutation of metals. Alchemists believed that one definite substance was essential to the success of the transmutation operation. By the application or admixture of this substance, often called the "Powder of Projection," any metal might be transmuted into gold or silver.

Zosimus, who lived at the beginning of the fifth century, was one of the first to allude to the philosophers' stone. He said that it was a powder or liquor formed of diverse metals, fused under a favorable astrological condition. The stone was supposed to contain the secrets not only of transmutation, but of health and life, for through it the elixir of life could be distilled.

The author of a Treatise on Philosophical and Hermetic Chemistry, published in Paris in 1725, stated:

"Modern philosophers have extracted from the interior of mercury a fiery spirit, mineral, vegetable and multiplicative, in a humid concavity in which is found the primitive mercury or the universal quintessence. In the midst of this spirit resides the spiritual fluid. . . .

"This is the mercury of the philosophers, which is not solid like a metal, nor soft like quicksilver, but between the two. They have retained for a long time this secret, which is the commencement, the middle, and the end of their work. It is necessary then to proceed first to purge the mercury with salt and with ordinary salad vinegar, to sublime it with vitriol and salt-petre, to dissolve it in aquafortis, to sublime it again, to calcine it and fix it, to put away part of it in salad oil, to distill this liquor for the purpose of separating the spiritual water, air, and fire, to fix the mercurial body in the spiritual water or to distill the spirit of liquid mercury found in it, to putrefy all, and then to raise and exalt the spirit with non-odorous white sulphur—that is to say, sal-ammoniac—to dissolve the sal-ammoniac in the spirit of liquid mercury which when distilled becomes the liquor known as the Vinegar of the Sages, to make it pass from gold to antimony three times and afterwards to reduce it by heat, lastly to steep this warm gold in very harsh vinegar and allow it to putrefy. On the surface of the vinegar it will raise itself in the form of fiery earth of the colour of oriental pearls. This is the first operation in the grand work.

"For the second operation, take in the name of God one part of gold and two parts of the spiritual water, charged with the sal-ammoniac, mix this noble confection in a vase of crystal of the shape of an egg; warm over a soft but continuous fire, and the fiery water will dissolve little by little the gold; this forms a liquor which is called by the sages "chaos" containing the elementary qualities—cold, dryness, heat and humidity. Allow this composition to putrefy until it becomes black; this blackness is known as the "crow's head" and the "darkness of the sages," and makes known to the artist that he is on the right track. It was also known as the "black earth." It must be boiled once more in a vase as white as snow; this stage of the work is called the "swan," and from it arises the white liquor, which is divided into two parts—one white for the manufacture of silver, the other red for the manufacture of gold. Now you have accomplished the work, and you possess the Philosophers' Stone.

"In these diverse operations, one finds many by-products; among these is the "green lion" which is called also "azoph," and which draws gold from the more ignoble elements; the "red lion" which converts the metal into gold; the "head of the crow," called also the "black veil of the ship of Theseus," which appearing forty days before the end of the operation predicts its success; the white powder which transmutes the white metals to fine silver; the red elixir with which gold is made; the white elixir which also makes silver, and which procures long life—it is also called the white daughter of the philosophers."

In the lives of the various alchemists, we find many notices of the philosophers' stone in connection with those adepts who were supposed to have arrived at the solution. Thus in the story of Alexander Seton, a Scotsman who came from Port Seton, near Edinburgh, it is stated that on his various travels on the continent he employed in his alchemical experiments a blackish powder, the application of which turned any metal given him into gold.

Numerous instances are on record of Seton's projections, the majority of which were verified by multiple observers. On one occasion, while in Holland, he went with some friends from the house at which he was residing to undertake an alchemical experiment at another house near by. On the way there, a quantity of ordinary zinc was purchased, and reportedly Seton succeeded in projecting the zinc into pure gold by the application of his powder. A similar phenomenon occurred at Cologne, and even the most extreme torture could not wring the secret from him.

Seton's pupil or assistant, Sendivogius, made great efforts to obtain the secret from Seton before he died, but without success. However, out of gratitude Seton bequeathed him what remained of his marvelous powder, which Sendivogius employed with the same results Seton had achieved.

Sendivogius fared badly, however, when the powder came to an end. He had used it chiefly in liquid form, and into this he had dipped silver coins which immediately had become pure gold. When the powder gave out, Sendivogius was driven to the practice of gilding coins, which, it was reported, he had previously transmuted by legitimate means, and this brought upon him the wrath of those who had trusted him.

There are many intriguing accounts of successful alchemical operations with the philosophers' stone, but most students of the field have surmised that the great work accomplished was a personal and spiritual transformation rather than any chemical miracle. The close association of ideas of the philosophers' stone with the elixir of life reinforces this view.

The idea of the philosophers' stone is an ancient one. In Egyptian alchemy, which seems one of the oldest, the idea of a black powder (the detritus or oxide of all metals mingled) is already found.

The ancient Chinese believed that gold was immortal and that when absorbed in the human body could bestow immortality, thus we find here ideas of the mystical value of gold again associated with the concept of the elixir of life.

The art of Chinese alchemists can be traced back to circa 100–150 B.C.E., long before records of alchemy being practiced in the West appear. Gold was regarded as a medicine for long life, and there is a story that the great Wei Po-Yang (ca. 100–150 C.E.) succeeded in manufacturing the gold medicine and he and his pupil Yu, together with the wise man's dog, thereby became immortal.

The idea that the philosophers' stone could grant wishes is found in ancient Indian religious tradition, where this magical stone was named "Chintamani" and cited in scriptures. Similar ideas were carried over into Buddhism.

The antiquarian Sabine Baring-Gould suggested that legends of the philosophers' stone ultimately could be traced to reflections upon the life-giving properties of the sun, which was a prominent symbol in many alchemical works. He reviewed such concepts in a chapter on the philosophers' stone in his book Curiosities of Olden Times (1895).

Philosophical Research Society

Founded in 1934 by Manly Palmer Hall, the Philosophical Research Society grew out of Hall's early successful work in astrology and occult philosophy and superseded the Hall Publishing Company and the Church of the People, which he had previously headed. The society was created:

"... to investigate the essential teachings of scientific, spiritual, and cultural leaders and further clarify and integrate man's body of knowledge, to apply this knowledge to the present needs of mankind by means of modern skills and the cooperation of outstanding experts, to make available these vital concepts to the public through lectures, publications and other medium to increase public awareness of the usefulness of these ideas and ideals in solving the personal and collective problems of modern man."

The society maintains a research library of over 50,000 volumes and a collection of art and rare books, conducts a weekly program of lectures, seminars, and special events, and publishes a quarterly Journal. The society has also published over 130 books, most by Hall, and produces audiocassettes. The society is located at 3910 Los Feliz Blvd., Los Angeles, CA 90027. Website: <http://www.prs.org/>.

"Philosophus"

One of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses. It was said to have been the spirit of Alexander Achillini, who succeeded Francatiano in the chair of philosophy at Padua in 1506.

"Phinuit"

A spirit entity, the earliest permanent control of the medium Leonora E. Piper. "Phinuit," who succeeded the soi-disant spirit of Sebastian Bach, said that he was French and a physician in Metz, but never furnished convincing proof of identity. His statements about himself were hazy and contradictory. As N. S. Shaler wrote in a letter to William James of "Phinuit's" first year of manifestation in 1894, "Whatever the medium is, I am convinced that this influence is a preposterous scoundrel."

Attempts to verify the statements of “Phinuit” resulted in failure. The archives of Metz were searched. No trace was found of him. He could not even speak French. When an explanation was asked, he declared that he had forgotten his maternal tongue. Later, on closer questioning, he disclosed uncertainty over whether he was born at Metz or Marseilles, and finally concluded that his name was not “Phinuit,” but “Jean Alaen Sciville.”

Richard Hodgson regarded the existence of “Phinuit” as an open question. To F. W. H. Myers, it seemed clear that the name “Phinuit” was the result of a suggestion at one of the early sésances. Other psychical researchers thought it most probable that “Phinuit” was nothing more than a secondary personality of Piper.

According to “Imperator,” a later control, “Phinuit” was an earthbound spirit who had become confused and bewildered in his first attempts at communication and had lost his consciousness of personal identity. The “Edmund Gurney” control also bore out “Phinuit’s” claim to an independent existence. He said to Sir Oliver Lodge in 1889: “Dr. Phinuit is a peculiar type of man . . . he is eccentric and quaint, but good-hearted . . . a shrewd doctor, he knows his own business thoroughly.”

“Phinuit’s” regime was exclusive from 1884 to 1892, but beginning in 1892 he shared control with George Pelham. In 1897 the “Imperator” group took over Piper’s sessions and “Phinuit” was entirely suppressed.

Phoenix, William

A direct voice medium of Glasgow, Scotland, who attempted feats of xenoglossia. Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, never known as a qualified observer of mediumistic phenomena, had a number of sittings with him and thought highly of his powers. However, Phoenix was later demonstrated to have been a clever fraud.

Lord Charles Hope of the Society for Psychical Research invited Neville Whymant, a professor of oriental literature and philosophy, to join him for a sitting with Phoenix in Glasgow and later in London. In the first Glasgow sitting, the voice of an Indian attempted to speak in a variety of Persian. In the second sitting a conversation of real import was being worked up in Italian but the control’s power failed too soon. Modern Greek was also heard. The Persian voice reappeared and was a little more explicit than on the previous occasion. Finally, a Chinese voice, that of a scribe or commentator apparently, also spoke and something was said in Japanese. Hope said of the Glasgow sittings, “Although the Glasgow sittings had not resulted in any communication of the order of importance of Dr. Whymant’s experience in New York they had apparently established a strong case for the speaking of languages unknown to the medium.”

Thereupon Phoenix was invited to London. In September and October 1927, he gave six sittings. In the first, Chinese and Japanese voices spoke to Gonoské Komai. But Whymant observed,

“I cannot truthfully say that I gathered anything at all from this voice. It was over-anxious to tell me something and probably the keenness of its desire prevented its being understood. Other voices struggled for expression without achieving more than whispering and trumpet taps. Then came a voice speaking a queer idiom; it sounded almost like a jargon of some kind and I called out that it sounded like Indo-Chinese border dialect, later giving the impression that it might have been badly spoken Yunnanese. The voice gave bugle calls of a military nature easily recognized and several people suggested that it might have been a soldier.”

Of another voice Whymant surmised, “It seemed to me that the voice was that of a Straits Chinese who had lived in Singapore.”

Hope added his own conclusion,

“I had become convinced that at any rate on most occasions the medium left his chair before voices spoke to the sitters. I had sat next to the medium on several occasions and had distinctly heard sounds like a creaking boot. After the sitting at which I had heard these sounds I noticed that one of the medium’s boots creaked as he walked. The sounds were similar.”

In a late sitting, Hope obtained proof that the medium left his chair. Phoenix protested that he was under control. Hope suggested that he should turn out his pockets to prove that he had no appliance with which to produce the psychic lights which appeared at each sitting. Upon Phoenix’s refusal, Hope gave up and concluded, “reluctantly I had come to the conclusion that Phoenix was at least in part a fraud.”

Hope published an account of the sittings in the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 40, pp. 419–427).

Phone-Voyance

A kind of psychic television, named as a special form of clairvoyance by British psychic Vincent N. Turvey in 1905, when the telephone was still a relatively new device to most people. Phone-voyance implies four things: psychic vision, physical contact, the wires and instruments of a telephone company, and simultaneity of clairvoyance with physical contact. Turvey often described things which the listener at the other end of the telephone wire did not know, for instance, what his daughter was doing in the room above him or what a man behind his back was reading in a book.

Turvey saw things habitually worn by his listener, although they may not have been on the listener at the particular time. He also claimed to see spirits in the room of his listener. Once he described the picture of a young lady known to the listener, but then at a distant location, and told him that she was not dead and yet not actually in the room.

Turvey demonstrated this faculty intermittently from 1905 to 1908, but complained that it was a great strain on the brain and that too frequent use would lead to very serious injury. In most cases, he reported that he saw

“. . . through a halo, or aura, of bright heliotrope, or pale violet-coloured fire, the flashes or sparks of which do not appear to cover all the window, so to speak, but to leave the centre clear and colourless, and in that centre appears the person or object that is seen. Another extraordinary thing is that occasionally a part of my mentality seems to ooze out of me, and to run along the line for a little distance, say a yard or two; and as “I” (his spirit) go, so little pieces of the copper wire which lay together, A-B, seem to turn over to B-A, i.e., reverse their position as if on a hinge. These pieces appear to be about four inches in length. At other times phone-voyance seems to be very like mental body-traveling, because “I” appears to be in the room at the one end of the line, and by a sort of living cord to communicate with “ME” (his body)] at the other end, and to make “ME” speak about that which “I” see.”

The famous spiritualist editor W. T. Stead, in his preface to Turvey’s Beginnings of Seership (1911), quoted the case of Mrs. A. T. Giddings, a professional music hall performer, who trained the faculty of “phone-voyance” to such perfection that it could be exercised at will under the most adverse conditions. Experiments with Giddings were carried out by a committee of investigators between the stage of the Alhambra Theater in London and the office of the Daily Mirror. Articles presented at random to Mr. Zomah (professional name of A. T. Giddings) by members of the committee in the Alhambra were immediately seen and described by his wife who was at the other end of the telephone in the newspaper office.

Of course this demonstration may have been simply long-distance telepathy or even clever stage mentalism, but according to Stead (to judge from the reports that were published), Giddings claimed to actually see the article which was held in her husband’s hand at the other end of the telephone wire.

Phouka (or Puca)

The Irish form of a European field spirit, the kornböcke, one of various kinds of animal fairies. The phouka would appear as a goat, a pig, or, most frequently, as a horse. It would lure its victims to mount it, then take them for a wild ride and throw them off. It is possible that the word puca is related to Puck, another mischievous fairy figure.

Phrenology

A nineteenth-century proto-science claiming that character and personality could be ascertained by the shape and size of various areas or “bumps” on the skull, resulting from development of the brain centers. It derives from the traditional belief that character traits are reflected in physical appearance, and was associated with physiognomy, the study of outward aspects of the individual.

Phrenology was first systematically developed by Franz Joseph Gall (1758–1828) at the end of the eighteenth century. He made observations on hundreds of heads and skulls, and in 1796 lectured in Vienna on the anatomy of the brain and the elements of phrenology. His pupil J. K. Spurzheim continued his work in England and America, where phrenology vied with mesmerism and spiritualist phenomena as a popular subject of study during the nineteenth century. Initially, Gall and Spurzheim encountered opposition from some church leaders because their system appeared to imply that personality characteristics were inborn instead of being subject to modification by leading a good life.

Gall was an accredited physician with a detailed knowledge of the brain and nervous system, and he proposed phrenology to his colleagues for their serious scientific consideration. Phrenology became the province of many original thinkers of the day. However, phrenology also was popularized and practiced by non-medical individuals and even fairground charlatans.

Essentially, phrenology defined more than thirty areas of the skull related to such instincts as amativeness, philogeniture, habitativeness, affection, combativeness, destructiveness, alimentiveness, secretiveness, acquisitiveness, and constructiveness, and to such moral faculties as self-esteem, approbateness, circumspection, benevolence, veneration, firmness, conscientiousness, hope, admiration, idealism, cheerfulness, and imitativeness.

The size and development of these areas implied strong or weak aspects of these instincts and faculties. The areas were measured by calipers and marked off on a chart, so that a complete character reading could be made.

Early exponents of animal magnetism (a precursor of hypnotism, but allied with psychic faculties) developed a new approach named “phreno-magnetism” or “phrenomesmerism.” Operators claimed that when any phrenological area of the subject was touched during a trance, the subject acted out the particular faculty associated with that area. Thus, when the operator touched the bump of “combativeness,” the entranced subject would exhibit belligerent behavior.

Although now discarded as a failed scientific option, phrenology flourished side by side with mesmerism and Spiritualism during the nineteenth century. Noted scientists were sympathetic, and additional supporters could be found among the literary elite such as Walt Whitman and Edgar Allan Poe.

Interest in phrenology continued in America well into the twentieth century, and the British Phrenological Society, founded in 1886 by Lorenzo J. Fowler, was still in existence in the 1960s, though it had long ceased to affect the culture that surrounded it.

Phreno-Magnet and the Mirror of Nature (Journal)

Nineteenth-century British journal devoted to phrenology in relation to animal magnetism. It was founded in London in 1843 and edited by S. T. Hall.

Phreno-Mesmerism (or Phreno-Magnetism or Phrenopathy)

An application of the principles of mesmerism to phrenology, a means of discerning the nature of an individual’s personality from examining the skull. Mesmerism (or animal magnetism) and phrenology, both proposed as sciences in the mid-nineteenth century, had been regarded by English mesmerists as related topics after it was observed that a sleepwalker whose phrenological “bumps” were touched would respond to the stimulus by exhibiting every symptom of the mental trait corresponding to the bump touched. Thus signs of joy, grief, destructiveness, combativeness, and friendship might be exhibited in rapid succession by the entranced patient.

Among those who claimed to have discovered the new science were Dr. R. H. Collyer, a pupil of Dr. John Elliotson, and La Roy Sunderland, although the former afterwards repudiated it. As time went on, enterprising phreno-mesmerists discovered many new cerebral organs, as many as a hundred and fifty more than those already mapped out by J. K. Spurzheim and Franz Joseph Gall.

Phreno-mesmerism numbered among its supporters James Braid (credited with demythologizing mesmerism into hypnotism), who expressed himself fully satisfied of its reality. He recorded a number of cases in which the patient correctly indicated by his actions the organs touched, although the patient was by all accounts demonstrably ignorant of phrenological principles and inaccessible to outside information.

Concerning this evidence, it would seem advisable to admit the possibility of suggestion, (or even telepathy), by means of which the expectation of the operator, reproducing itself in the mind of the patient, would give rise to the corresponding reactions.

Phrygian Cap

Hargrave Jennings, in his book The Rosicrucians: Their Rites and Mysteries (1870), argued for the common ancestry of the Phrygian Cap, which is the classic cap of the god Mithra; the sacrificial cap; and the miter. The Mithraic or Phrygian Cap is the origin of the priestly miter in all faiths. The Phrygian Cap was worn by the priest in sacrifice. When worn by a male, it had its crest, comb, or point set jutting forward; when worn by a female, the same prominent part of the cap is in reverse, or on the nape of the neck, as in the instance of the Amazon's helmet, displayed in antique sculptures, or that of the goddess Athena.

According to Jennings, the peak of caps or hats (the term "cocked hat" is a case in point) all refer to the same idea. This point had a sanctifying meaning afterward attributed to it, when it was called the christa, crista, or crest, which signifies a triumphal top or tuft. The Grenadier Cap and the loose black Hussar Cap derive remotely from the same sacred Mithraic bonnet, or high pyramidal cap.

The Phrygian Cap comes from the highest antiquity. It is displayed on the head of the figure sacrificing in the celebrated sculpture it Mithraic Sacrifice (or the Mythical Sacrifice) in the British Museum, London. This loose cap, with the point protruding, gives the original form from which all helmets or defensive headpieces, whether Greek or not, derive.

When a Phrygian Cap, or Symbolizing Cap, is bloodred, it stands for the cap of liberty, a revolutionary symbol; in another way, it is even a civic or incorporated badge. It marks the needle of the obelisk, the crown or tip of the phallus, whether human or representative. It may have had its origin in the rite of circumcision. The real meaning of the bonnet rouge or cap of liberty is obscure, but it has always been regarded as a most important hieroglyph or figure. It signifies the supernatural simultaneous sacrifice and triumph. It has descended from the time of Abraham, and it is supposed to be an emblem of the strange mythic rite of the circumcision preputii.

The Phrygian Cap stands as the sign of the Enlightened. The heroic figures in most Gnostic gems have caps of this kind. The sacrificer in the sculptured group of the Mithraic Sacrifice, among the marbles in the British Museum, has a Phrygian Cap on his head. He performs the act of striking the bull with a dagger, which is the office of the immolating priest. The bonnet conique is the miter of the Doge of Venice. Cinteotl, a Mexican god of sacrifice, wears such a cap made from the thigh-skin of a sacrificed virgin. This headdress is shaped like a cock's comb. The Scotch Glengarry cap also seems, upon examination, to be "cocked."

Besides the "bonnet rouge," the Pope's miter and other miters or conical head-coverings derive their names from the terms "Mithradic," or "Mithraic," and the origin of the whole class of names is Mittra, or Mithra.

Phyllorhodomancy

Divination by rose leaves. The ancient Greeks clapped a rose leaf on the hand and judged from the resulting sound the success or failure of their desires.

Physical World

In theosophical thought, the lowest of the seven worlds, the world in which ordinary man moves and is conscious under normal conditions (formerly known as the Sthula Plane). It is the limit of the ego's descent into matter, and the matter which composes the appropriate physical body is the densest of any of these worlds. Physical matter has the seven divisions of solid, liquid, gas, ether, super-ether, sub-atom, and atom in common with the matter of the other worlds.

Beside the physical body, familiar to ordinary vision, there is a finer body, the etheric double, which plays a very important part in collecting vitality from the sun for the use of the denser physical body through its etheric centers, the chakras. At death, the physical body and the etheric double are cast aside and slowly resolved into their components. Theosophy adopted these ideas from Hindu teachings.

Physiognomy

Physiognomy, also known today as personology, is an ancient form of divination based upon reference of the physical appearance of the individual. It was a widespread practice in the ancient Mediterranean Basin and in China, and also appears in India and the ancient Arab world. During the Renaissance, Gerolamo Cardano and Giovanni Battista della Porta emerged as popular exponents. As did other forms of divination, it came under heavy attack by the eighteenth-century Enlightenment and following the work of J. C. Lavater largely died. Its post-Enlightenment revival was delayed by the emergence of phrenology, which could be seen as a form of physiognomy that concentrated attention on the shape and appearance of the head.

In China, a form of physiognomy, called Siang Mien, developed that concentrated on face readings tied to the acupuncture points. Each of the 100 points on the face are numbered and named, assigned to a year in one's life, and carry a range of meanings. The Chinese measure life from conception, hence one must add a year to one's age to find the applicable point. At age 41, for example, one can make reference to point 42, the Delicate Cottage. It represents a place of seclusion and may be interpreted as an appropriate time to shift concentration from outer to inner concerns. A variety of face readers may be found throughout Chinese ethnic communities in the West.

In the mid-twentieth century new attention to physiognomy was proposed by Edward Vincent Jones, a judge with the U.S. Superior Court who did his primary research on defendants brought before him over a number of years. His modern development of physiognomy was called personology. During World War II (1939–45) he founded the Personology Foundation of California, which graduated its first class in 1942. Jones' work is being carried on by Paul Eisner, who founded the Personology Foundation of the Pacific. Its Learning Center is located at P.O. Box 3301, Honokaa, HI 96727. It has a website at <http://www.users.totalise.co.uk/~tmd/person.htm>.

The measurable growth of interest in physiognomy associated with the New Age Movement can be traced both to Personology and to the influx of Chinese into North America since 1965. Pushing the practice of physiognomy ahead is Rose Rosetree, a former Transcendental Meditation instructor who now teaches both aura readings and face readings and trains teachers in suburban Washington, D.C. Based on her initial study of both European and Chinese texts, she developed her own new system of physiognomy. She is the author of one of the most popular contemporary texts in the field, The Power of Face

Pickering, Edward Charles (1846–1919)

Distinguished astronomer and a founding member of the American Society for Psychical Research. He was born on July 19, 1846, in Boston, Massachusetts. He studied at the Lawrence Scientific School of Harvard University (B.S., 1865). After graduation he taught mathematics and physics at Lawrence (1865–67) and then became a professor of physics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1868–77). In 1877 he was appointed director of the Harvard Observatory, a position he held for 42 years. Pickering devised methods of measuring the magnitudes of stars and supervised the cataloguing of some 80,000 stars. He also established the Harvard Observatory auxiliary station at Arequipa, Peru, in 1891.

In the field of parapsychology, Pickering was vice president of the American Society for Psychical Research from 1885 to 1888 and served on the society's Committee on Thought Transference. He participated in the statistical analysis of experiments in telepathy using cards, dice, and numbers, a precursor to the methods later championed by parapsychology. He died on February 3, 1919, in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni (1463–1494)

Italian astrologer and Kabbalist born February 24, 1463. His family played a prominent part in a number of the civil wars which convulsed medieval Italy; they owned extensive lands in the neighborhood of Modena, the most valuable of their possessions being a castle bearing their own name of Mirandola. It was here that Giovanni was born.

He appears to have been a versatile student. According to tradition, before he was out of his teens he had mastered jurisprudence and mathematics, had studied philosophy and theology, and had dabbled in occultism.

As a young man, Mirandola soon left his brothers in charge of the family estate and proceeded to various universities in Italy and France. While in the latter country, his interest in astrology and related subjects deepened, thanks partly to his making a close study of the works of alchemist Raymond Lully. In 1486 Giovanni went to Rome, where he delivered a series of lectures on various branches of science.

While thus engaged, his erudition won high praise from some of his hearers, but certain members of the clergy suspected him of heresy, reported his doings to the Inquisition, and even sought to have him excommunicated. The pope, however, was rather averse to quarrelling with a member of so powerful a family as the Mirandolas, and accordingly he waived violent measures, instead appointing a body of church leaders to argue with the scientist.

A lengthy dispute ensued. Mirandola published a defence (under the title Apologia) of the ideas and theories promulgated in his lectures and in 1493 the pope, Alexander VI, brought the affair to a conclusion by granting him absolution.

Thereupon Mirandola went to live in Florence, and stayed there until his death in 1494, occasionally experimenting with alchemy, but chiefly busy with further study of the Kabala. He died November 17, 1494, in Florence.

Apart from the Apologia Pici Mirandoli cited above, Giovanni was author of several books of a theological nature, the most important of these being his Conclusiones Philosophicae, cabalisticae et theologicae, published in 1486, and his Disputationes adversus Astrologiam Divinaticum, issued in 1495. His works appear to have been keenly admired by those of his contemporaries who were not averse to speculative thought, and a collected edition of his writings was printed at Bologna in 1496, and another at Venice two years later.

Piddington, J(ohn) G(eorge) (1869–1952)

Officer of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He served successively as a member of council (1899–1932), secretary (1899–1907), treasurer (1917–21) and president (1924–25). He was born J. G. Smith in 1869, but he took his mother's family name in order to avoid confusion with other leading members of the Society for Psychical Research. He joined the SPR in 1890 and subsequently devoted the rest of his life to the cause of psychical research. He helped to create the SPR research endowment fund in 1902, which enabled the Society to have a full-time paid research officer. In 1905 Piddington visited the United States and assisted in the organization of the American branch of the SPR as an independent society.

In the field of psychical research, he worked with Eleanor Sidgwick, G. W. Balfour, Sir Oliver Lodge, and Alice Johnson in interpreting the scripts of the "SPR group" of automatic writers concerned with cross correspondence. The SPR group of mediums consisted of Margaret Verrall, Helen Verrall, Leonora Piper, Winifred Coombe-Tenant (usually identified in the literature as Mrs. Willett), Alice Fleming (Mrs. Holland), Dame Edith Lyttelton (Mrs. King), and Mrs. Stuart Wilson. There were over three thousand of these scripts, which became fully meaningful when correctly juxtaposed. These cross correspondences have been cited as among the very best evidence of individual survival of death.

Piddington's presidential address in 1924 was directed to the issue then dividing psychical research: the strict standards of investigation and reporting on the observation of mediums. The issue divided the American Society for Psychical Research in 1925 and would lead to the resignation of Spiritualist believer Sir Arthur Conan Doyle from the SPR. Piddington died in April 1952.

Piddington, Sydney (1918–1991) and Lesley (1925–)

A husband-wife team who gave one of the most famous stage telepathy acts of modern times. Sydney Piddington was born in Australia in 1918. During World War II he served in an artillery regiment in Singapore. After the fall of Singapore he was imprisoned for four years in the dreaded Changi Camp, immortalized by fellow prisoners Russell Braddon, author of The Naked Island (1952), and artist Ronald Searle, who drew illustrations of his life in the camp.

As a relief from harsh treatment, forced labor, malnutrition, and disease, the camp prisoners staged theatrical entertainments. An article by Dr. J. B. Rhine on parapsychology in a stray copy of Digest magazine stimulated Piddington and Braddon to experiment with telepathy, and they devised an act which became a notable feature of the prison camp entertainments. After his release from the camp, Piddington returned to Australia where he met and married radio-actress Lesley Pope in 1946. The couple worked up a telepathy act based on Sydney’s experience in Changi jail, and the Piddingtons became a successful show on 2UE in Sydney and 3K2 in Melbourne, followed by live stage shows.

In 1949 the couple went to England, where they appeared over eight weeks on BBC radio programs, which were a sensational success. The Piddingtons became a household name almost overnight. In one remarkable program, twenty million listeners waited with bated breath while Lesley Piddington, sequestered in the Tower of London, correctly stated the difficult test sentence “Be abandoned as the electricians said that they would have no current” relayed by Sydney telepathically from a BBC studio in Piccadilly, several miles away. The line had been chosen independently of the Piddingtons, and it was only revealed to Sydney when he was asked to concentrate upon it in the studio.

Throughout the BBC shows, the tests were rigorously controlled, and if there was a code (as so many theorists suggested) it would have to have been independent of aural and visual signals and able to operate at a distance. The possibility of concealed electronic devices (in a period long before micro transistor techniques) was also ruled out by searching the Piddingtons. One by one each ingenious “explanation” of trickery was eliminated under conditions that precluded codes and confederates. Everyone had his pet theories about how it might be done, and part of the success of the shows was the challenge issued to the public by the Piddingtons: “You are the judge.” Some psychical researchers (including Dr. S. G. Soal) objected to the shows, presumably on the ground that telepathy should be restricted to laboratory investigation. However, the Piddingtons made telepathy a topic of conversation throughout Britain, and years later there has been no revelation of trickery. Skeptics have not offered a viable explanation, other than a staged hoax by the BBC that could account for the Piddington’s performance.

Russell Brandon later wrote a book about his former campmate and his wife and the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research provided lengthy discussion of their work (vol. 35, pp. 83–85, 116–19, 187, 244–45, 316–18; vol. 42, p. 250).

Pienaar, Domenick Cuthbert (1926–1978)

South African personnel officer who took an active interest in parapsychology. He was born on August 2, 1926, at Krugersdorp, Transvaal, South Africa. He studied at the University of Potchefstroom (B.S., 1950) and the University of South Africa (B.S. hons., psychology 1956). After graduation he worked as an assistant personnel officer at Daggafontein Mines, Springs, Transvaal (1957), a vocational guidance officer at the Department of Labour, Johannesburg (1958–61), and in 1961 he joined the personnel study section of South African Coal, Oil and Gas Corporation.

In 1971, Pienaar received his Ph.D. from the University of South Africa for his thesis “Studies in ESP; an Investigation of Distortion in ESP Phenomena.” This study was aided by a grant from the Parapsychology Foundation and used clock cards as targets in testing for ESP. He has tested ESP ability in abnormal personalities using Zener Cards. Pienaar has also studied factors in the relationship between percipient and agent. He distinguished two primary factors: the “sheep/goat” effect and “friends/strangers” differences, as well as other agent-centered or percipient-centered factors.

He was associated with the South African Society for Psychical Research and the South African Parapsychology Institute for more than twelve years. He was a council member of the Society, served as secretary, and was president for seven years.

Piérart, Z. J. (d. 1878)

Founder of the rival branch of Spiritualism in France against the Spiritism of Allan Kardec. As a more traditional Spiritualist than Kardec, Piéart did not accept the doctrine of compulsory reincarnation.

At one time, Piérart was a professor at the College of Maubeuge and afterward secretary to Baron du Potet. In 1858, he founded the Spiritualist journal La Revue Spiritualiste which engaged Kardec’s journal La Revue Spirite in debate. Eventually Kardec’s journal was sufficiently successful to overwhelm La Revue Spiritualiste, which was discontinued during the 1860s. It was revived in 1870 under the title Concile de la Libre Pensée, but in 1873 it was suppressed under pressure generated by clerical authorities.

Among the ideas Piérart advocated was a form of psychic vampirism. He thought vampires were the ghostly or astral bodies of deceased persons which vampirized the living to keep their physical bodies (still in graves) vitalized. His idea would explain why some bodies that were later dug up showed signs of life.

Pierrakos, Eva (1915–1979)

Eva Pierrakos, a psychic channel who developed a system of spiritual development called Pathwork, was born in Vienna, Austria. Her father, Jakob Wasserman (1873–1934), was a famous Jewish novelist. As a young woman, she began to do automatic writing and developed her relationship to an entity known only as The Guide. The Guide never identified itself, and pushed away inquiries of its identity. Out of the material she received, however, she came to feel that she was called to help people with their spiritual development. As World War II (1939–45) approached, she moved to the United States and continued to work as a trance channel and produced a series of lectures that were transcribed and circulated among those who came to hear her.

In 1971 she met and married psychiatrist John C. Pierrakos, a Greek expatriate who, like her, had moved to the United States as World War II approached. He had been one of the founders of bioenergetics, a system of bodywork partially inspired by the teachings of Wilhelm Reich and based upon an understanding of the way that psychological energy is reflected in body states. She added some of the energy teachings to her own work and developed the Pathwork. In 1972 she opened the first Pathwork Center in the Catskill Mountains near Phoenicia, New York.

Pierrakos' teachings are contained in the 258 Guide Lectures, and an additional 100 transcripts of question-and-answer sessions. Through her, the Guide taught that humans have problems from a distorted picture of reality that separates us from the flow of life energy and our true feelings and prevent insights into the nature of the world. The Pathwork offers techniques for dissolving misconceptions about the world.

Pierrakos died in 1979. Since that time her work has been carried on by her students and expanded from the two centers opened in 1979 to include work across North America and Europe, with newer centers now functioning in Africa, South America, and Australia. The Pathwork Foundation is headquartered at 13013 Collingwood Ter., Silver Spring, MD 20904-1414. It has an Internet site at <http://www.pathwork.org/>. Pierrakos' husband went on to develop the Institute of Core Energetics.

Pierrakos, John C. (1921–)

Psychiatrist John Pierrakos, the husband of psychic channel Eva Pierrakos, was a student of controversial psychiatrist Wilhelm Reich and the founder of a system of bodywork called core energetics. Pierrakos was born in a small town, Neon Oitylon, in Greece. In 1939, as World War II loomed on the horizon, he left Greece for the United States. He settled in New York and attended Columbia University eventually earning an M.D. with a specialization in psychiatry. He eventually earned a Ph.D. in psychiatry. In the late 1940s, he came to know Reich and studied with him until he ran into trouble with the authorities for his teachings and practices concerning Orgone energy (his version of what was otherwise known as prana or psychic energy).

Pierrakos worked on the staff of a hospital for several years and then settled in private practice with another former Reichian, Alexander Lowen. The two created bioenergetics, a new system of bodywork that drew inspiration from Reich and dealt with the manner in which the inner life of people and energetic states were manifest in the body.

Around 1964, he was given a copy of a lecture of a medium, Eva Broch, a trance channel whose lectures were devoted to personal growth. The two were drawn to each other from their initial meeting, and he began to study with her on what she called the Pathwork. The teaching seemed to provide what he had found missing from Reich and from bioenergetics. He also began to share with her what he had learned about the body's energies. They were married in 1971.

As Eva Pierrakos (1915–1979), she opened the first Pathwork Center in 1972. He supported her work while continuing to integrate the Pathwork insights into his own practice. He has seen the Pathwork as causing a shift of emphasis toward the development of the spiritual self in his bodywork and counseling practice. According to Pierrakos, "Core Energetics is based on a deep understanding of the ways in which energy and consciousness work together in the transformative process of healing." Following his wife's death in 1979, he founded the Institute of Core Energetics, now the Institute of Core Energetics International.

The institute may be contacted c/o Joan Groom, 47 Moseman Ave., Katonah, NY 10536. It offers an expansive program of professional workshops and symposia at locations across North America, Europe, and Australia. It has a webpage at <http://www.core-energeticsintl.org/>.

Pike, Albert (1809–1891)

Albert Pike, the leading American Masonic scholar of the nineteenth century, was born on December 20, 1809, in Boston, Massachusetts, the son of an alcoholic father and a mother who tried to push him into the ministry. In 1925 he was sent to live with his uncle, who discovered that Pike had a photographic memory and was able to recall large volumes at will. He soon mastered several languages and passed his entrance exams for Harvard. Unable to afford tuition, he taught school at Gloucester. A free spirit, in 1831 he moved to New Mexico and joined several exploration expeditions. He finally settled in Fort Smith, Arkansas, in 1833 and taught school for a year while he studied law. He opened his practice in 1834.

He enjoyed some degree of prestige and in the 1850s became politically active. He organized the Know-Nothing Party (Order of United Americans), a reactionary political movement opposed to foreigners, and came to see the continuance of slavery as better for the country than farmers importing foreign laborers. At the same time he was pro-Indian, and as the representative of several tribes of Native Americans before the government, won some large settlements. At the beginning of the Civil War (1861–65), Pike, then living in New Orleans, Louisiana, was named commissioner of Indian Affairs for the Confederacy. He eventually was named a brigadier general and he organized several regiments from the Arkansas tribes. Unfortunately, some of his soldiers mutilated Union soldiers in a battle in 1862. In the midst of that controversy, he quarreled with his superiors and accused the Confederacy of neglecting its treaty obligation to the tribes. He was arrested for treason, but released as the war effort collapsed. Now hated by both sides, he retreated to the Ozark Mountains.

It is possible that Pike's sojourn into the occult started during his days in hiding. Rumors emerged that he was conjuring the devil and engaging in sexual orgies (charges discussed by Montague Summers in his History of Witchcraft and Demonology). He had joined the Freemasons in 1850 and began working seriously on reforming what he thought of as worthless rituals. He became accomplished in hermetic, Rosicrucian, and continental Masonic traditions and incorporated extensive esoteric content. His monumental textbook, Morals and Dogma of Freemasonry, appeared in 1872. Since Pike had dumped so much material acquired from his memory, he refused to claim authorship. He could not determine what was his own contribution.

He was never able to recover his prewar prominence in law, and increasingly he lost himself in Freemasonry. In 1873 he moved into the Temple of the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite in Washington, D.C. The council offered him a stipend and he would remain there the rest of his life. He dominated Scottish Rite Masonry for the next two decades. During this time he wrote several additional books on Masonry (and left behind a number of manuscripts still unpublished), but is still remembered for his early text and reformed rituals. He died in Washington on April 2, 1891.

In 1899 the Scottish Rites erected a statue of Pike in Washington. Ninety years later, civil rights activists brought up the old accusation of Pike having written the rituals of the Ku Klux Klan and demanded that it be removed. Lacking clear evidence of their accusations, they were unsuccessful.

Pike, James A(lbert) (1913–1969)

Former Episcopalian bishop of California, whose bestselling book The Other Side (1968) was a powerful argument for psychic phenomena and communication with the dead. Pike was born on February 14, 1913, in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. He was educated at the University of Santa Clara (1930–32), the University of California at Los Angeles (1932–33), the University of Southern California (A.B., 1934; LL.B., 1936), and Yale University (J.S.D., 1938). He later studied at Virginia Theological Seminary (1945–46), General Theological Seminary (1936–47), and Union Theological Seminary (B.D. magna cum laude, 1951).

Though raised a Roman Catholic, he converted to the Episcopal Church, in which he was ordained a priest in 1944. He was successively curate of St. John's Church, Washington, D.C. (1944–46), chaplain at Vassar College (1947–49), chaplain and head of the department of religion at Columbia University (1949–52), adjunct professor of religion and law (1952–58), and dean of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City (1952–58). He was elected the bishop coadjutor (i.e., with right of succession) of the diocese of California, San Francisco in 1958 and became bishop a few months later.

During his pastoral career, Pike wrote a number of popular books, but his popularity jumped significantly in 1964 with the publication of A Time for Christian Candor (1964). That volume became one of several volumes published during the 1960s that offered somewhat radical reinterpretations of traditional Christian doctrines, ideas freely discussed in a seminary context, but rarely openly discussed between pastors and church members. This volume, two subsequent titles, If This Be Heresy (1967) and You and the New Morality (1967), the admission of some failures in his personal life, and some happenings at the cathedral in San Francisco, combined to create significant enemies in the church. Pike was forced out of office. He resigned as bishop in 1966 to become theologian in residence at the Center for Study of Democratic Institutions in Santa Barbara, California.

Among the personal problems with which Pike was confronted was the death of his son Jim, who had committed suicide at the age of twenty after experimenting with LSD. In a 1967 Canadian television program, American medium Arthur A. Ford communicated a message to Pike apparently from his son Jim. The message, in the full glare of the television lights, was highly evidential and was augmented by strongly suggestive messages purportedly from several of Pike's deceased colleagues, including theologian Paul Tillich. Pike soon publicly affirmed his belief in the reality of the phenomena he had experienced, and this affirmation made up the substance of his book The Other Side (1968). More quietly he also received messages through mediums Ena Twigg in London and George Daisley in Santa Barbara.

In 1969 he founded, with his wife Diane, the Foundation of Religious Transition to focus upon people who, like himself, had problems because of their demythologizing approach to Christian belief and practice. Soon afterward, Pike died when he wandered off and became lost in the Israeli desert in 1969. (Three days before the discovery of his body a communication claiming to be from him came through medium Ena Twigg stating what had occurred and where the body would be found.)

Diane Pike changed the name of the foundation to the Bishop Pike Foundation, and it eventually (1972) merged into the Love Project (now the Teleos Foundation) led by Arleen Lorraine. Diane and Lorraine have worked together ever since.

In the early 1970s, following the medium Arthur Ford's death, author Alan Spragett (who had hosted the television show during which Ford spoke to Pike) discovered material in Ford's papers which conclusively proved that Ford had faked the séance. Ford's fraud was discovered in his papers, which had been left in the care of William Rauscher, an Episcopal minister in New Jersey, in a file of material that contained all of the "evidential" facts stated by the supposedly entranced Ford. Prior to the television séance Ford had thoroughly researched Pike's career.

Pilgrim's Guide to Planet Earth: A New Age Traveler's Handbook & Spiritual Directory

A directory published in 1981 of shrines, temples, churches, monasteries, holy places, spiritual and New Age teachings. It covers some 50 countries. It also cites schools, publications, communes, food stores, and vegetarian and macrobiotic restaurants and offers useful advice to international travelers (pilgrims) on the customs and facilities of unfamiliar countries and cultures. The guide was published by Spiritual Community Publications, formerly of San Rafael, California. Several years after the guide appeared Spiritual Community Publications went out of business, and no one has attempted an update of the original directory.

Pincott, Hugh (1941–)

British chemist and psychical researcher. He was born on October 11, 1941, in Swansea, Wales. He was educated at Pontardawe Grammar School and the Universities of St. Andrews and Dundee. He obtained the first Ph.D. from Dundee University on its foundation in 1967, and he later became a chartered chemist. He was employed for nearly a quarter of a century by the British Petroleum group of companies and occupied several commercial positions of increasing seniority, eventually becoming assistant coordinator of BP's chemicals operation in the Western Hemisphere. Following a rationalization of company interest in 1984, Pincott left BP and established his own organization, Specialist Knowledge Services (SKS), which does marketing consultancy and specialist bookselling.

Pincott joined the Society for Psychological Research in 1971, was appointed a member of its Council in 1974, and became its honorary secretary and treasurer in 1976. He was one of the founding members of the Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena (ASSAP) in 1981 and acted as the external affairs officer for two years. Since 1983 he has been the association's honorary general secretary. Among his wide research activities have been mental mediumship, paranormal metal bending, and, more particularly, regressive hypnosis to alleged previous lives.

Pio, Padre (da Pietralcini) (1887–1968)

Italian friar of the Capuchin monastery of San Rotundo, near Foggia, with reputed powers of clairvoyance and precognition, who also demonstrated the stigmata (wounds of Christ) from 1915 onward. Born Francesco Forgione, he lived a simple life and was a sympathetic personality who did not seek public notice. Among the phenomena he demonstrated that have excited some parapsychologists are instances of apparent bilocation. The most notable example occurred in 1941 when his friend Monsignor Damiani died in far-off Uruguay. On the evening of Damiani's death, the Cardinal Archbishop of Montevideo admitted a hooded Capuchin monk who Damiani testified before his death was Pio.

The phenomena surrounding Pio have been neither endorsed nor condemned by the official office of the church charged with the evaluation of such occurrences, but they have been widely accepted by the public. Pio has been the subject, especially since his death in 1968, of a large body of literature. (See also Therese Neuman)

Piper, Leonora E(velina Simonds) (1859–1950)

Trance medium of Boston, among the most renowned in the history of psychical research. Her work is credited with convincing Sir Oliver Lodge, Richard Hodgson, James H. Hyslop, and many others to believe in survival and communication with the dead.

Early Life

Piper was born Leonora Simmonds on June 27, 1859, in Nashua, New Hampshire. There has been some discussion of the correct spelling of her first name, though it is now largely agreed to have been "Leonora," rather than "Leonore," as is often found in the literature. This issue became the subject of a paper in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research.

When eight years old, playing in the garden, she suddenly felt a sharp blow on her right ear, accompanied by a prolonged sibilant sound. This gradually resolved itself into the letter s, which was then followed by the words "Aunt Sara, not dead, but with you still." The child was terrified.

Her mother made a note of the day and the time. Several days later it was found that Piper's aunt Sara had died at that very hour on that very day. A few weeks later the child cried out that she could not sleep because of "the bright light in the room and all the faces in it," and because the bed "won't stop rocking." However, discounting occasional experiences of this kind, her childhood was relatively normal.

At age 22 she married William Piper of Boston. Soon after this she consulted Dr. J. R. Croke, a blind professional clairvoyant who was attracting considerable attention by his medical diagnoses and cures. She fell into a short trance.

At the second visit to the clairvoyant's circle, which was held for effecting cures and developing latent mediumship, when Croke put his hand on her head, Piper again saw in front of her "a flood of light in which many strange faces appeared." In a trance, she rose from her chair, walked to a table in the center of the room, picked up a pencil and paper, and wrote rapidly for a few minutes before handing the written paper to a member of the circle and returning to her seat. The member was Judge Frost of Cambridge, a noted jurist; the message, the most remarkable he ever received, came from his dead son.

The report of Frost's experience spread and Piper was soon besieged for sittings. She was not at all pleased by this sudden notoriety, and apart from members of her family and intimate friends she refused to see anyone. However, when the mother-in-law of William James applied for a sitting (after hearing strange stories through servant gossip), for some inexplicable reason her request was granted. Her own experience, the subsequent experience of her daughter (i.e., James's wife), and the marvelous stories they told finally induced James to visit Piper in order to explain away her reputed psychic talents. But his impression of her supernormal powers was so strong that he not only continued sittings, but for the next eighteen months monitored Piper and controlled virtually all of her séance arrangements.

Referring mainly to this first period of his experiences, he wrote in 1890 in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 6, pt. 17): "And I repeat again what I said before, that, taking everything that I know of Mrs. Piper into account, the result is to make me feel as absolutely certain as I am of any personal fact in the world that she knows things in her trances which she cannot possibly have heard in her waking state, and that the definite philosophy of her trances is yet to be found."

James also made the famous statement: "If you wish to upset the law that all crows are black . . . it is enough if you prove that one crow is white. My white crow is Mrs. Piper."

Piper's Controls

When James began his experiments, a claimed French doctor, "Phinuit," was in exclusive control of the sittings. He appeared to have been inherited from Croke. He was known there as "Finne" or "Finnett." His manifestation was not immediate. The first of Piper's controls was an Indian girl of the strange name "Chlorine." "Commodore Vanderbilt," "Longfellow," "Lorette Penchini," "J. Sebastian Bach" and "Mrs. Sidons," the actress, were the next communicators encountered.

"Phinuit" had a deep gruff voice, in striking contrast with the voice of the medium. His exclusive regime lasted from 1884 to 1892 when "George Pelham," who had died in an accident, appeared and manifested in automatic writing. Still, the trance speaking was left for "Phinuit" and the control, speaking and writing, was often simultaneous.

In 1897 the "Imperator" group took charge of the séance proceedings. "Phinuit" disappeared and "Pelham" became relegated to the role of a minor communicator. While “Phinuit” had much difficulty in keeping back other would-be communicators, the advent of the “Imperator” group of controls made the communications freer from interruptions and from the admixture of apparently foreign elements. They excluded “inferior” intelligences (whom they spoke of as “earth-bound” spirits) from the use of the light.

Under the new regime, the communications assumed a dignity and loftiness of expression, as well as a quasi-religious character, which they had heretofore entirely lacked. Moreover, the passing in and out of the trance state, which in the earlier stages had been accomplished with a certain amount of difficulty, now, under the new conditions, became quiet and peaceful.

James called special attention to the fact that the “Imperator” group of controls not only exhibited characteristic personalities, but they could also divine the most secret thoughts of the sitters. As a lasting influence of this regime in later years, Piper showed remarkable development as spiritual adviser in her waking state. “It is almost,” wrote Alta L. Piper in 1929, “as if, since the trance state has been less and less resorted to, the cloak of ‘Rector’ has fallen upon Mrs. Piper herself, and the good that she has been able to do along these lines, during the past nine or ten years, is almost unbelievable.”

Piper did not exhibit physical phenomena, except for one single strange manifestation: she could withdraw the scent from flowers and make them wither in a short time. To establish rapport with her spirit communicators, she utilized psychometric influences (see psychometry), usually asking for an object belonging to the departed. James succeeded in hypnotizing her and found the conditions of the hypnotic and medium trances entirely different. He found no signs of thought transference either in the hypnotic condition or immediately after it.

Of the earliest trances there is no contemporary record. When, owing to other duties, James relinquished direct control of the Piper séances he wrote to various members of the Society for Psychical Research of the puzzling and remarkable facts of the mediumship. It was as a result of these letters that Richard Hodgson arrived in the United States for the express purpose of continuing the investigation on behalf of the SPR.

With his arrival began the most famous period of Piper’s mediumship. Hodgson was a keen fraud-hunter, having previously caught Eusapia Palladino and Helena Petrovna Blavatsky in trickery. He took every precaution to bar the possibility of deception including hiring a detective to follow Piper and watch for possible attempts to obtain information by normal means. On the first three days of the week, when sittings were given, Hodgson forbade her to see a morning newspaper. He arranged the sittings without communicating the name of the sitters and the sitters were in most cases unknown to her. They were introduced under the pseudonym “Smith.” The sittings were often improvised for the benefit of chance callers.

She was usually weakest precisely where the pseudo-medium is most successful. She was vague about dates, preferred to give Christian names to surnames, and mostly concentrated on the sitters’ diseases, personal idiosyncrasies, and characters. On the other hand, she often failed to answer test questions. For example, the spirit of “Hannah Wild” manifesting through her could not describe the contents of the sealed letter she wrote before her death.

The possibility of fraud was discussed at length by Hodgson, James, William R. Newbold (of Pennsylvania University), Walter Leaf, and Sir Oliver Lodge. In 1898 James wrote in the Psychological Review:

“Dr. Hodgson considers that the hypothesis of fraud cannot be seriously maintained. I agree with him absolutely. The medium has been under observation, much of the time under close observation, as to most of the conditions of her life, by a large number of persons, eager, many of them to pounce upon any suspicious circumstance for (nearly) fifteen years. During that time not only has there not been one single suspicious circumstance remarked, but not one suggestion has ever been made from any quarter which might tend positively to explain how the medium, living the apparent life she leads, could possibly collect information about so many sitters by natural means. The scientist who is confident of ‘fraud’ here must remember that in science as much as in common life a hypothesis must receive some positive specification and determination before it can be profitably discussed, and a fraud which is no assigned kind of fraud, but simply ‘fraud’ at large, fraud in abstracto, can hardly be regarded as a specially scientific explanation of concrete facts.”

He added, at a later period:

“Practically I should be willing now to stake as much money on Mrs. Piper’s honesty as on that of anyone I know, and I am quite satisfied to leave my reputation for wisdom or folly, so far as human nature is concerned, to stand or fall by this declaration.”

In 1888–89, Hyslop joined the investigation. On the first two or three occasions he took the extraordinary precaution of putting on a mask before he got out of the cab, removing it only after Piper was entranced, and resuming it before she awoke. Twelve sittings were sufficient to convince him of the untenability of the secondary personality hypothesis. He declared, without hesitation, that “I prefer to believe that I have been talking to my dead relatives in person; it is simpler.” His first report was published in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 16, pt. 41) and concluded: “I give my adhesion to the theory that there is a future life and persistence of personal identity.”

Piper in England

With unabated zeal, Hodgson sought still more stringent precautions and conceived the idea of removing Piper from her normal surroundings and placing her in a foreign country among strangers. As a result Piper made her first visit to England in November 1889. She was met at the station by Lodge and escorted the next day to Cambridge by F. W. H. Myers, at whose house she stayed. Myers later stated,

“I am convinced, that she brought with her a very slender knowledge of English affairs and English people. The servant who attended on her and on her two children was chosen by myself, and was a young woman from a country village, whom I had full reason to believe to be trustworthy and also quite ignorant of my own or my friend’s affairs. For the most part I had myself not determined upon the persons whom I would invite to sit with her. I chose these sitters in great measure by chance; several of them were not residents of Cambridge; and except in one or two cases where anonymity would have been hard to preserve, I brought them to her under false names—sometimes introducing them only when the trance had already begun.”

Piper gave, under the supervision of Myers, Lodge, and Leaf, 88 sittings between November 1889 and February 1890. Wherever she stayed in England, her movements were planned for her, and even when shopping she was accompanied by a member of the SPR Lodge, which even exceeded Myers in caution. Prior to Piper’s stay in Liverpool, Lodge’s wife engaged an entirely new staff of servants. Lodge safely locked away the family Bible, and throughout the duration of her stay, all of Piper’s correspondence passed through the hands of Lodge, who had permission to read it.

In Lodge’s first sitting, his father, his Uncle William, his Aunt Ann, and a child of his who died very young were described. There were some flaws in the descriptions that were later rectified. Many personal and intimate details of their lives were given. In subsequent sittings the names of the dead relatives were communicated in full, and supernormal knowledge of the history of the whole family was exhibited. Sir Oliver Lodge’s report, published in 1890, concluded:

“1. That many of the facts given could not have been learnt even by a skilled detective.

"2. That to learn others of them, although possible, would have needed an expenditure of money as well as of time which it seems impossible to suppose that Mrs. Piper could have met.

"3. That her conduct has never given any ground whatever for supposing her capable of fraud or trickery. Few persons have been so long and so carefully observed, and she has left on all observers the impression of thorough uprightness, candor and honesty."

Lodge enumerated 38 cases in which information not within the conscious knowledge of the sitter was given. In only five instances did the sitter acknowledge that the facts were at one time known to him. Considering the extraordinary familiarity of "Phinuit" with the boyhood days of two of his uncles, Lodge was curious how much of this knowledge might be obtained by normal means. He sent a professional inquiry agent to the scene for the purpose of making full and exhaustive inquiries. "Mrs. Piper," reported the agent, "has certainly beat me. My inquiries in modern Barking yield less information than she gave. Yet the most skilful agent could have done no more than secure the assistance of the local record keepers and the oldest inhabitants living."

In his summary, Lodge added,

"By introducing anonymous strangers and by catechising her myself in various ways, I have satisfied myself that much of the information she possesses in the trance state is not acquired by ordinary common-place methods, but that she has some unusual means of acquiring information. The facts on which she discourses are usually within the knowledge of some person present, though they are often entirely out of his conscious thought at the time. Occasionally facts have been narrated which have only been verified afterwards, and which are in good faith asserted never to have been known; meaning thereby that they have left no trace on the conscious memory of any person present or in the neighborhood and that it is highly improbable that they were ever known to such persons. She is also in the trance state able to diagnose diseases and to specify the owners or late owners of portable property, under circumstances which preclude the application of ordinary methods."

Further he stated:

"That there is more than can be explained by any amount of either conscious or unconscious fraud—that the phenomenon is a genuine one, however it is to be explained—I now regard as absolutely certain; and I make the following two statements with the utmost confidence:

"1. That Mrs. Piper's attitude is not one of deception.

"2. No conceivable deception on the part of Mrs. Piper can explain the facts."

Further Work with Hodgson

After Piper's return to the United States, Hodgson took charge again. His first report was published in 1892 in the Proceedings of the Society Psychical Research. He refused to consider spirit hypothesis acceptable. In 1892 the Piper phenomena underwent a notable evolution in the quality of trance communications. Automatic writing developed and "Pelham" a became the primary control.

Hodgson's second report, which appeared in the Proceedings of the SPR in 1897, ended with the adoption of the spirit hypothesis. His statement was quite firm:

"I cannot profess to have any doubt but that the 'chief communicators . . . are veritably the personalities that they claim to be; that they have survived the change we call death, and that they have directly communicated with us whom we call living through Mrs. Piper's entranced organism. Having tried the hypothesis of telepathy from the living for several years, and the 'spirit' hypothesis also for several years, I have no hesitation in affirming with the most absolute assurance that the 'spirit' hypothesis is justified by its fruits and the other hypothesis is not."

It is interesting to quote here the following note from Alta L. Piper's biography of her mother: "During the latter years of his investigation I more than once heard Dr. Hodgson say, ruefully, that his amour propre had never quite recovered from the shock it received when he found himself forced to accept unreservedly the genuineness of the so-called Piper phenomena."

Hodgson's intended third report was cut short by his unexpected death in 1905. J. G. Piddington came over from England to go through his papers and a committee was formed to dispose of the material on hand. The reports were filled with intimate and personal data concerning the sitters, who trusted Hodgson but would not trust anybody else. Finally, despite Hyslop's efforts, all these reports were returned to the original sitters and the valuable material was lost. Piper remained under the jurisdiction of the SPR, and the sittings were continued under Hyslop's charge.

The Hyslop Era

In 1906, Piper made a second visit to England. It was mainly devoted to elucidating the mystery of cross-correspondences. Several famous investigators (such as Myers, Edmund Gurney, and Hodgson) had died and communications of an intricate nature were purported to emanate from their surviving spirits. Piper held 74 sittings. Many others were held with Margaret Verrall and Alice K. Fleming (usually cited as Mrs. Holland in the literature to protect her privacy). The results were summed up and analyzed by Piddington and others. According to their findings, the coincidences of thought and expression in the various messages were too numerous and too detailed to be accounted for by chance.

In 1909, James published his report on the Hodgson communications jointly in the Proceedings of the SPR and the ASPR. He judged the findings to be inconclusive. Writing on the Myers, Gurney, and Isaac Thompson communications in the same number of the Proceedings, Lodge showed none of James's reserve,

"On the whole they [the messages] tend to render certain the existence of some outside intelligence or control, distinct from the consciousness, and, so far as I can judge, from the sub-consciousness also, of Mrs. Piper or other mediums. And they tend to render probable the working hypothesis, on which I choose to proceed, that the version of the nature of the intelligences which they themselves present and favour is something like the truth. In other words, I feel that we are in the secondary or tertiary touch—at least occasionally—with some stratum of the surviving personality of the individuals who are represented as sending messages."

In only one instance were aspersions cast, in public, on Piper's character and phenomena, and this happened simply as an advertising stunt. On October 20, 1901, the New York Herald published a statement by Piper, advertised as a "confession," in which she was quoted to say that she intended to give up the work she had been doing for the SPR, as fourteen years' work was not enough to clear up the subject and summed up her own views as follows: "The theory of telepathy strongly appeals to me as the most plausible and genuinely scientific solution of the problem . . . I do not believe that spirits of the dead have spoken through me when I have been in the trance state. . . . It may be that they have, but I do not affirm it."

According to the inquiries made by the editor of Light, Piper forbade the publication of the article as soon as she learned that they had advertised it with the word "confession" above it. She received a telegram from the New York Herald assuring her that the word was used for advertising only and would not appear in the article. On October 25, 1901, Mrs. Piper stated in The Boston Advertiser:

"I did not make any such statement as that published in the New York Herald to the effect that spirits of the departed do not control me. . . . My opinion is today as it was eighteen years ago. Spirits of the departed may have controlled me and they may not. I confess that I do not know. I have not changed. . . . I make no change in my relations."

As Lodge pointed out, her honesty was not in question and the New York Herald spoke of her throughout in laudatory terms, “since little value would be attached to her opinion in favour of the spiritistic hypothesis, it cannot fairly be urged that her opinion on the other side would weigh with us. Mrs. Piper in fact . . . is not in a more favourable, but even in a less favourable position for forming an opinion than those who sit with her, since she does not afterwards remember what passes while she is in trance.”

The Closing of a Career

In October 1909, Piper made her third visit to England. Prostrated by a heavy cold, she was not able to give her first sittings until the late spring and early summer of 1910. Lodge supervised these sittings, during which Piper’s return from the trance state was very difficult. Both the sitters and the controls were disturbed by these conditions and at a sitting on May 24, 1911, a coming suspension of Piper’s mediumship was announced. The last sitting was held on July 3. After the appearance of a new control, “Mme. Guyon,” the sitting was closed by “Imperator.” In the years that followed, communications by automatic writing remained intermittent but the trance state did not make its appearance until 1915 when the famous “Fau-nus” message, relating to the forthcoming death of Sir Oliver Lodge’s son Raymond, was given.

Between 1914 and 1924 Piper did no regular work. Her mother’s failing health made increasing demands upon her time and strength. Further, no suitable supervisor for her work was found. In October 1924, Dr. Gardner Murphy conducted a series of sittings, at the end of which the SPR agreed that Piper should sit with the newly formed Boston Society for Psychical Research during the season of 1926–27. She complied.

Piper’s work in the cause of psychical research was of tremendous importance. For several decades her powers were tested to a degree that no other medium had approximated. Psychical research owes an enormous debt to her generous and sustained cooperation, often under difficult circumstances. The literature covering her work is vast and is spread out over several decades of the publication of both the SPR and the ASPR. Piper died in 1950.

Placidus de Titis (or Titus) (1603–1668)

Italian astrologer, mathematician, and Roman Catholic monk, born at Perugia, Italy, into a prominent noble family. Little is known of his early life prior to his joining the Olivetan order around 1624 at age 21. He later became a reader of mathematics and physics at the University of Padua and then in 1657 was appointed professor of mathematics at the Milanese University in Pavia. He remained at Pavia for the rest of his life.

In Placidus’s lifetime, astrology was still the proper concern of scholars and churchmen, and Placidus served as astrologer to a number of prominent political leaders, including Leopold William (1614–62), the archduke of Austria. In his studies he focused upon Claudius Ptolemy’s ancient astrological work the Tetrabiblos, and in it he believed he had discerned Ptolemy’s lost method of “dividing houses.” (In reading an astrology chart, one must not only divide the chart into the 12 astrological signs but also rotate the chart to account for the rotation of the earth during a 24-hour period. Astrological houses serve as a second division system that (among other functions) facilitates that rotation. Placidus published his findings in two volumes in 1650 and 1657.

The work of Placidus had little immediate impact on astrology, which was entering a period of decline even as he was writing. At the end of the eighteenth century, however, as the revival of astrology began in England, Manoh Sibley translated some writings of Placidus into English, and a second translation, by John Cooper, was published in 1814. R. C. Smith, better known under his pen name, Raphael, used Sibley’s translation in his annual Raphael’s Ephemeris, the most popular ephemeris for the next century. (An ephemeris provides the daily charts of the planets and is used by astrologers to quickly prepare a horoscope chart.) Raphael’s Ephemeris is still published and is used by many astrologers in Great Britain. Through Raphael the Placidian system became the dominant system in astrology today.

Planchette

A simple instrument designed for the purpose of communication with spirits. It consists of a thin heart-shaped piece of wood mounted on two small wheels that carries a pencil, point downward, for the third support. The hand is placed on the wood and the pencil writes automatically, or presumably by spirit control operating through the psychic force of the medium.

In 1853, a Mr. Planchette, a well-known French Spiritualist, invented this instrument, to which he gave his name. For some fifteen years it was utilized exclusively by French Spiritualists, but then in the year 1868, a firm of American toy makers took up the idea and flooded the shops of booksellers with great numbers of planchettes. They became a popular item and the instrument sold in the thousands in the United States and Great Britain. It was used largely as a toy and any results obtained that were arresting or seemingly inexplicable were explained by animal magnetism or ascribed to the power of subconscious thought.

Amongst Spiritualists the planchette has been used for spirit communication, and automatic writing has often resulted from its use. Some mediums published books that, they claimed, were written wholly by their spirit-controls through the use of planchettes.

An early attempt to explain the phenomenon was put forward by Samuel Guppy in his book Mary Jane: or Spiritualism Chemically Explained published under the modest pseudonym "A Child at School" in 1863. He stated that the human body is a condensation of gases, which constantly exude from the skin in an invisible electrical vapor and that the fingers coming in contact with the planchette transmit to it an "odic force," and thus set it in motion. He went on to say that some people have excess phosphorus in their systems and the vapor "thus exuded forms a positively living, thinking, acting body, capable of directing a pencil."

There are variations on the planchette form, such as the dial-planchette, which consists of a foundation of thick cardboard nine inches square on the face of which the alphabet and the numerals one to ten are printed. Also printed are the words "Yes," "No," "Goodbye" and "Don't know." These letters, words, and numerals are printed on the outer edge of a circle, the diameter of which is about seven inches. In the center of this circle, firmly affixed to the cardboard, is a block of wood three inches square.

The upper surface of this block has a circular channel in which balls run. Over the balls a circular piece of hard wood, five inches in diameter, is placed and attached to the outer edge of this a pointer. The upper piece of wood is attached to the lower by an ordinary screw, upon which the upper plate revolves when used for communication.

Another form is the ouija board, on which, in a convenient order, the letters of the alphabet are printed and over which a pointer easily moves under the direction of the hand of the person or persons acting as medium. It is stated that a form of this "mystic toy" was in use in the days of Pythagoras, about 540 B.C.E. One French author described his celebrated school of philosophy, asserted that the brotherhood held frequent séances or circles at which a mystic table, moving on wheels, moved towards signs inscribed on the surface of a stone slab. The author stated that probably Pythagoras, in his travels among the Eastern nations, observed some such apparatus in use amongst them and adapted his idea from them.

Another trace of some such communicating mechanism is found in the legend told by the Scandinavian Blomsturvalla of how the people of Jomsvikingia in the twelfth century had a high priest, one Völsunga, whose predictions were renowned for their accuracy throughout the land. He had in his possession a little ivory doll that drew with "a pointed instrument" on parchment or "other substance," certain signs to which the priest had the key. The communications were prophetic utterances, and it is said in every case they came true.

The writer who recounted this legend thought it probable that the priest had procured the doll in China. In the National Museum at Stockholm there is a doll of this description that is worked by mechanism, and when wound up it walks around in circles and occasionally uses its right arm to make curious signs with a pointed instrument like a pen that is held in the hand. Its origin and use have been connected with the legend recounted above.

The planchette and ouija board are devices to assist automatic writing. Such instruments allow use by more than one individual during a sitting, as distinct from other forms of automatic writing when only the operator handles the pen or pencil.

How It Works

The content of such messages may suggest either communications from spirit entities or unconscious mental processes on the part of the individuals concerned. Sometimes artificial entities appear to be created from the combined energies and the messages, although often startling and apparently authentic, may be deceptive. It is generally assumed that the actual movement of the planchette is due to unconscious muscular effort on the part of the operator or operators using the instrument, but as in table-turning and the divining-rods used in dowsing, it is by no means certain that this explanation covers all the facts.

Clearly the actual contact between fingers and instrument can communicate subtle muscular exertion, but the conversion of this exertion to the complex movements involved in writing intelligible messages is difficult to explain. Even granting the operation of unconscious muscular effort, it is not clear how this is adapted to constructing messages which are often not visible to the operator. Again, the planchette may sometimes move at remarkable speeds, far in advance of the normal intellectual mode or reflex muscular actions of the operator. The same phenomenon also occurs in automatic writing.

There are also some cases reported of direct writing, in which there was no contact between the operator and the writing.

It should be noted that the results of the use of the planchette and similar devices often reflect the intellectual and emotional status of the operator or operators involved, and most knowledgeable people advise against use of the planchette or ouija board in the frivolous atmosphere of party games. Suggestible individuals may become obsessive about the messages obtained.

Planetary Light Association

The Planetary Light Association was founded in 1983 by Jane Weiss, a channel. She claimed that the messages she channels come from "Anoah." Described as a member of the Melchizedek Order of the White Brotherhood, the groups of advanced beings believed to be guiding the course of human history, "Anoah" spoke at Golden Circle sessions to assist the transition into the New Age, which many hoped would arrive during the next generation. These channeled messages were distributed worldwide through a newsletter and tapes. Weiss also gave psychic development workshops. Last known address: P.O. Box 180786, Austin, TX 78718.

Planetary Logos

According to the Theosophy scheme of creation, the Planetary Logos or Ruler of Seven Chains is one of the grades in the hierarchy assisting in the creation and guidance. It is the supreme Logos who initiates this work, but he is helped by the "seven." The seven receive from the Logos the inspiration and each carries on the work in his own Planetary Chain. Planetary Spirits

In Theosophy, the number of these spirits is seven. They are emanations from the Absolute and are the agents used by the Absolute to effect all changes in the Universe. (See also Logos; Planetary Logos)

Planetary Travels

Mediums in a trance state claim to travel to other planets. Descriptions of astral travel, inner vision, or spirit enlightenment and life on the planets were first given by Emanuel Swedenborg in the seventeenth to eighteenth century.

Swedenborg claimed the people of Mars were the best in the whole planetary system. Physiognomy, with them, was an expression of thought. They judged each other by it. They were God-fearing, and the Lord sometimes appeared among them. Of the inhabitants of Venus and the moon, Swedenborg said:

"They are of two kinds; some are gentle and benevolent others wild, cruel and of gigantic stature. The latter rob and plunder, and live by this means; the former have so great a degree of gentleness and kindness that they are always beloved by the good; thus they often see the Lord appear in their own form on their earth.

"The inhabitants of the Moon are small, like children of six or seven years old; at the same time they have the strength of men like ourselves. Their voices roll like thunder, and the sound proceeds from the belly, because the moon is in quite a different atmosphere from the other planets."

Swedenborg's accounts of planetary travel was limited to those planets known to exist in the eighteenth century.

Planetary exploration in the form of what appeared to be traveling clairvoyance was first recorded with Fraulein Romer, a German somnambule who in November 1813, at the age of 15, was seized with convulsive attacks and developed mediumship.

In 1921, C. Romer described how the spirits of dead relatives but more often the spirit of a living companion, Louise, led the medium to the moon. She described its flora, fauna and inhabitant and the spirits of the dead who spend there their first stage of existence in their progress to higher spheres. Romer claimed the descriptions were in accord with those offered by the subjects of Joseph Ennemoser's experiments.

Andrew Jackson Davis followed in the footsteps of Swedenborg. Victorien Sardou reportedly drew automatic sketches of houses and scenes on the planet Jupiter. Auguste Henri Jacob executed drawings of fruits and flowers he claimed grew on the planet Venus. Thomas Lake Harris, in Celestial Arcana, described the inhabitants on other planets of the solar system and also some of remote fixed stars. Harris claimed to have had conversations with them.

Statements and disclosures were also exemplified by a revelation of H el ene Smith. Theodore Flournoy in From India to the Planet Mars (1900), traced the origin of Smith's Martian Cycle to chance remarks and the desire expressed by Georges-Henri Lemaitre a Belgian astro physicist, to know more about the planet. On November 25, 1884, Flournoy noted:

"From the beginning . . . Mlle. Smith perceived, in the distance and at a great height, a bright light. Then she felt a tremor which almost caused her heart to cease beating, after which it seemed to her as though her head were empty and as if she were no longer in the body. She found herself in a dense fog, which changed successively from blue to a vivid rose color, to gray, and then to black. She is floating, she says, and the table, supporting itself on one leg, seemed to express a very curious floating movement. Then she sees a star growing larger, always larger, and becomes finally 'as large as our house.'

"H el ene feels that she is ascending; then the table gives, by raps: 'Lemaitre, that which you have so long desired!' Mlle. Smith, who had been ill at ease, finds herself feeling better, she distinguishes three enormous globes, one of them very beautiful. 'On what am I walking?' she asks. And the table replies: 'On a world—Mars.' H el ene then began a description of all strange things which presented themselves to her view, and caused her as much surprise as amusement. Carriages without horses or wheels, emitting sparks as they glided by; houses with fountains on the roof; a cradle having for curtains an angel made of iron with outstretched wings, etc. What seemed less strange were people exactly like the inhabitants of our earth, save that both sexes wore the same costume, formed of trousers, very ample, and a long blouse, drawn tight about the waist and decorated with various designs. The child in the cradle was exactly like our children, according to the sketch which H el ene made from memory after the s eance. . . .

"We are struck by two points, the complete identity of the Martian world, taken in its chief points, with the world in which we live, and its puerile originality in a host of minor details. . . . One would say that it was the work of a young scholar to whom had been given the task of trying to invent a world as different as possible from ours, but real and who had conscientiously applied himself to it loosening the reins of his childish fancy in regard to a multitude of minor points in the limits of what appeared admissible according to his short and narrow experience. All the traits that I discover in the author of the Martian romance can be summed up in a single phrase, its profoundly infantile character."

New Languages Appear

Flournoy claimed the Martian language, was not only revealed but also translated into French and bore the stamp of a "natural" language. "I will add that in speaking fluently and somewhat quickly, as H el ene sometimes does in somnambulism, it has an acoustic quality altogether its own due to the predominance of certain sounds, and has a peculiar intonation difficult to describe."

Seventeen days later a medium attempted to depict life in an undetermined planet farther away than Mars. Reportedly, medium saw a world, with a different language than the Martian, the tallest people were three feet high, with heads twice as broad as high, living in low, long cabins without windows or doors but with a tunnel about ten feet long running from it into the earth.

Flournoy believed there was an earthly origin of both the Ultra-Martian and the Uranian language and writing.

In August 1895, Hélène Smith found a rival in America. The medium, Mrs. Willis M. Cleveland (generally known as Mrs. Smead), made several revelations about the planets Mars and Jupiter. After a period of five years, the detailed descriptions according to Flournoy, presented “the same character of puerility and naive imagination as those of Mlle. Smith.”

Planetary Visitor

Isaac K. Funk, in his book The Widow's Mite (1904), wrote of a medium who impersonated “a lady eight feet tall from the planet Mars” by the use of a wire bust with rubber over it, and a false face. The wire bust fitted snugly on the shoulders of the medium and was inflated with air when in use. When not in use it could be made into a small package and concealed.

Numerous mediums have given descriptions of Martian life. Eva Harrison's Wireless Messages from Other Worlds (London, 1916) introduced planetary visitors from the constellation Orion. The medium George Valiantine, through “Dr. Barnett” predicted Martians would communicate with us before we communicated with them.

The Martian fascination of Mansfield Robinson should also be mentioned. Through a Mrs. James, the author claimed to have obtained a Martian alphabet, a Martian trance control “Oumaruru,” and gave a number of Martian revelations based on trance excursions to the red planet.

Many of the claimed spiritual revelations of life on other planets betray their terrestrial origins by everything being bigger and better than on earth. This is demonstrated in the pamphlet A Description of the Planet Neptune; or, A Message From the Spirit World by Japssa Seniel, Spiritual, from the Planet Naculo or Neptune (London, ca. 1872), from which the following quotations are typical:

“We have horses, which we call nemilis, but they stand nearly as high again as yours, and are very far superior to any that I have seen on this globe. We have a great variety of peculiar animals called denfan; they resemble your dogs; they are quite harmless, but very useful. . . . In the city of Zinting, which is distant from Vanatha about 80,000 miles, is a carnival or match factory, which employs 30,000 hands. These matches are made of wax, and can only be lighted by dipping them in water. . . .

“Now, we will return to Vanatha, and I will describe a grand piece of workmanship—namely a bridge of metal, which is in length about 59 miles. It passes over two rivers, each seven miles in width, also over corn fields, grazing pastures, and railways; its supporters are black marble pillars. The metal is composed of iron, steel, copper, gold, and silver; but we have another kind of metal we call accelity verua, which far exceeds all the rest in strength and durability. The cross supporters of this magnificent bridge are made of this durable material; they are nine feet in diameter.

“The immense bridge is only for foot passengers; its width is about 2000 feet; it has 2000 lamps of large dimensions—namely, nine feet in diameter; they are circular in form, and are lighted with gas. This bridge took 300 years to construct it, at a cost of £300,000,000 sterling; it employed about 40,000,000 workmen. It was laid out by a seraph; it is paved with pantine pardia, which is more durable than any other material we have. It is neither stone nor iron, yet it is harder than the diamond or sapphire. The pavement is all cut in stars; the balustrade is about twelve feet high, and all this stupendous bridge is covered with lemena or glass. There is on this bridge 500 drinking fountains, and about 200 filestres or water closets; these are placed over the rivers. There is about 300 approaches to this bridge, which are ascended by 300 steps, with landings and windings, and seats to recline on. In the ascent to the top, there are small houses built in the centre of this bridge, where the inhabitants can take tea or coffee, or what you call luncheon or meals. . . .”

Similar contacts with extraterrestrials and descriptions of their planets appeared throughout the first half of the twentieth century. However, a new era began in 1952 with the public attention being given to flying saucers. Claims of contacts with extraterrestrials and accompanying descriptions of their home planets, almost totally received by psychic means, began to appear with the publication of George Adamski's first book. Through the 1950s people such as Truman Bethrum, Ernest Norman, and Howard Menger described life on other planets. However, in the 1950s, a new element was added. Space aliens traveled to Earth on space ships . . . thus supplemented their telepathic and related communications with actual physical contact.

These claims of contact with aliens from other planets were concurrent with the exploration of space by improved telescopes and space probes. Such data gave a better picture than previously possible of the different planets in this solar system and disproved the history of contact literature concerning life on the moon, Venus, Mars, and the other planets. By the end of the 1960s, almost no one continued to claim such contact, but claims of contact with planets beyond the reach of contemporary science in other solar system continued. Among the few claims for life on Mars was made by Ruth Norman in her 1977 Martian Underground Cities Discovered!

Plants, Psychic Aspects of Plant life has always been of interest to mankind. Plants have provided food, medicine, and hallucinogenic substances. However, beginning in the 1970s, there was more, public interest in the behavior and psychic aspects of plant life. Evidence was presented suggesting plants may diagnose disease, react to music and human emotions, and act as lie detectors.

Legends told of the power of sound to influence plants. In Hindu mythology, the flute music of Shri Krishna made flowers bloom. Reportedly the musician Tansen, during the era of Moghul Emperor Akbar could cause the flowers to blossom by singing a particular musical raga or mode. Tamil literature described how sugarcane grew in response to the musical sounds of beetles, wasps, and bees.

Scientific interest in the sensitivities of plants dates from the experiments of Charles Darwin, who attempted to stimulate Mimosa pudica by playing a bassoon in close proximity, hoping to bring about movements of the pinnae. There was no measurable response and twenty years later in 1877 the German plant physiologist Wilhelm Pfeffer reported in his book Physiology of Plants (translated into English 1900) another unsuccessful experiment he hoped would stimulate the stamens of Cynararvae by sound.

In 1903, the Indian scientist, Jagadis Chunder Bose, reported in Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society, Britain, his results from experiments with plants. He concluded "all characteristics of the responses exhibited by the animal tissues, were also found in those of the plant." Bose devised an apparatus to demonstrate plant reactions, many of which resembled nervous responses in animal or human life. He also measured the electrical forces released in the "death-spasms" of vegetables. The American scientist George Crile also conducted experiments to measure the vital response of plant life.

Following Bose, T. C. N. Singh at Annamalai University, India, continued experiments on plants from 1950 and reported plants respond measurably to music, dance, and prayer. After publication of his papers, similar experiments were also conducted in Canada and the United States.

From 1966 onward, Cleve Backster, an American polygraph specialist, conducted experiments in plant extrasensory perception, using polygraph techniques. His experiments, as reported in the International Journal of Parapsychology, (vol. 10, 1968), supported the thesis that plants were sensitive to human thoughts. Backster's conclusions have been independently confirmed by other experimenters, including research chemist Marcel Vogel, who claimed plants and human beings shared a common energy field and may affect each other in a manner he could record with instruments. Vogel recorded the ability of Debbie Sapp, who claimed to "enter the consciousness of a plant."

Other experimenters have shown plants may be used to trigger electric relays and open doors, stimulated by emotional suggestions from human operators. Many owners of garden plots and window boxes take it for granted their plant life may be favorably affected by human feelings and talk regularly to their plants.

Plastics (Spirit Markings)

Paranormally obtained plastics may be divided into two groups: imprints and molds. The first may be produced in any soft, yielding substance or on smoked or chemically treated surfaces; for the second, melted paraffin wax is employed.

Paranormal Imprints

Johann C. F. Zöllner, in his experiments with the medium Henry Slade, placed a dish filled to the brim with flour under the table hoping the spirit hand that took hold of him might leave an impression in the flour. Baron Lazar Hellenbach testified to having seen an impression of a hand larger than Slade's or any other individual present. None of their hands had any trace of flour. Zöllner also obtained the imprint of a foot on two sheets of paper covered with lamp black between two closed slates.

The imprint of a hand with four fingers, the imprint of a bird, two feet, and a materialized butterfly were supposedly obtained during the George Valiantine-Bradley sittings in 1925, in England. Charles Sykes, the British sculptor, was unable to give an explanation, as was Noel Jaquin, a fingerprint expert. In 1931, however, the same experts claimed to have caught Valiantine in a fraud. They smeared printing ink in secret on the modeling wax, stripped Valiantine after the séance and found a large stain on his left elbow corresponding with the lines of the imprint. Other imprints were found identical to those of his toes.

Palladino's Mediumship

Eusapia Palladino produced hand and face imprints in putty and clay. Reportedly they bore her characteristics, although she was held at a distance from the tray while the impression was made. Numerous imprints were obtained by the psychical researchers Cesare Lombroso, Enrico Morselli, Ercole Chiaia, and Guillaume de Fontenay.

Camille Flammarion claimed to be a witness of the process at Monfort-l'Amaury in 1897. Supposedly the resemblance of the spirit head to the medium was undeniable, yet seemingly she could not have imprinted her face in the putty. Besides having been physically controlled, Ms. Z. Blech kissed Palladian on the cheeks, searching for the odor of putty on her face.

Julien Ochorowitz wrote of Palladino's mediumship at Rome:

"The imprint of this face was obtained in darkness, yet at a moment when I held two hands of Eusapia, while my arms were entirely around her. Or, rather, it was she who clung to me in such a way that I had accurate knowledge of the position of all her limbs. Her head rested against mine even with violence. At the moment of the production of the phenomena a convulsive trembling shook her whole body, and the pressure of her head on my temples was so intense that it hurt me."

Paranormal Molds

In normal wax molding, the technical process of the production of paraffin wax casts begins with the placement of buckets of hot and cold water placed side by side. The hot water will melt the paraffin. If one dips a hand in and withdraws it, a thin shell of the liquid will settle and congeal. If a hand is dipped alternately into the hot paraffin and into the cold water the shell will thicken. When the hand is freed, a wax glove is left behind. These gloves are fragile. They must be filled with plaster of Paris to preserve. Then if the paraffin wax is melted off, the texture of the skin appears in the plaster. The hand freed from the paraffin shell must be washed in soap and water before another experiment, or the second shell will stick to the fingernails. Altogether, it takes about twenty minutes to deliver a finished shell. The fingers of the hand must be held fairly straight, otherwise they will break the shell when withdrawn. For the same reason no full cast, up to the wrist, can be obtained.

Supposedly molds obtained by psychical researchers in séances with mediums have bent fingers, joined hands, and wrists. These molds are fine and delicate, whereas those obtained from living hands are thick and solid.

The first paraffin wax casts were obtained by William Denton in 1875, in Boston with the medium Mary M. Hardy. Hardy produced the paraffin wax gloves in public halls. To test Hardy's ability, the dish of paraffin was weighed before the mold appeared and after. In later years, another test was devised, locking up the liquid paraffin wax and cold water in a wire cage. After Denton, Epes Sargent investigated Hardy.

In England, William Oxley produced the first psychic molds in 1876 with Elizabeth d'Esperance and later with Mrs. A. H. Firman and the Rev. Francis W. Monck. Similar success was claimed with the Davenport Brothers, William Eglinton, and Annie Fairlamb around the same time. T. P. Barkas of Newcastle, England, mixed magenta dye in the paraffin wax during experiments with Fairlamb in 1876. The gloves had traces of the dye.

The psychical researcher Alexander Aksakof hypothesized that the plaster casts showed similar characteristics between the medium and the materialization. He noted that Oxley made similar observations and quoted his letter:

"It is a curious fact that one always recognises in the casts the distinctive token of youth or age. This shows that the materialised limbs, whilst they preserve their juvenile form, evince peculiarities which betray the age of the medium. If you examine the veins of the hand you will find in them characteristic indications which indisputably are associated with the organism of the medium."

It had been suggested the wax gloves may have been prepared from inflated rubber gloves. Gustav Geley produced some casts using rubber gloves for comparison. They were also put on display. The charge that the gloves may have been made previous to the séance could not be sustained.

One variety of plastics is the working of linen into the semblance of human features by psychic means. Reportedly Dr. Eliakim Phelps left a well-detailed description of an instance, including the appearance of 11 figures of "angelic beauty." Occasionally similar phenomena have been reported as a manifestation in haunted houses, with cushions assuming the shape of human forms.

There are also artistic efforts under the heading of direct paintings—the paint appears to give three-dimensional effects. Many such pictures were produced during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

There are various methods to produce imprints. Mrs. Albert Blanchard, an American medium, produced imprints by depositing sediment under water in a dish. F. Bligh Bond discussed her work in Psychic Research (October 1930) using data collected from Horace Newhart. Blanchard put clay and water in a shallow dish, stirred the sediment with her fingers, and let it settle. When the water evaporated, supposedly the clay had assumed the outlines of a human face or head in low relief.

Playfair, Guy Lyon (1935–)

Writer and investigator concerned with anomalous and paranormal phenomena. He was born on April 5, 1935, in Quetta, India and educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge University (B.A., 1959). After graduation he moved to Brazil and from 1961 through 1975 was a freelance writer and photographer. From 1967 through 1974, he also worked for the Information Office of the United States Agency for International Development in Rio de Janeiro as a writer. Playfair is a member of the the Society for Psychical Research, the Society of Authors, and the College of Psychic Studies.

Although considered by many as a writer on occultism, he has stressed that his interest actually lies in the "border areas of human experience and in anomalous phenomena of all kinds." As he stated, "I am not concerned with the 'supernatural' but with unexplored areas of nature that are by definition natural." Playfair is the author of a number of books on the psychic and related subjects and was also a contributor to the series The Unexplained.

Pleiades

The Pleiades is a star cluster an approximately 400 light-year distance from Earth and near the constellations of Orion and Taurus in the night sky. The cluster includes seven bright stars that are easily seen with the naked eyes. In more recent years, astronomers equipped with telescopes have found the cluster to contain some 400 stars and to be surrounded by a nebula. As with many of the heavenly bodies, the Pleiades has attracted the speculation of people who have imposed a mythological significance on the objects seen in the night sky. And such speculations have not been limited to prescientific cultures. Early in the twentieth century, the leader of the group later known as the Jehovah's Witnesses suggested that one of the stars of the Pleiades was actually the throne of the Lord God Jehovah.

In ancient Greece, the seven prominent stars were named after the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione. Atlas, a titan who warred against the gods, was condemned by Zeus to hold up the heavens on his shoulders. His daughters were named Alcyone, Asterope, Celaeno, Electra, Maia, Merope, and Taygete. Each has her own story from the mythological cycles.

Pleiades, largely a concern for the astronomical community in recent centuries, broke into the news in 1975 when Eduard Albert "Billy" Meier, the leader of a small metaphysical study group in his native Switzerland, announced that he had seen a saucer-shaped craft land and had communicated with its pilot, a woman named Semjase. Semjase claimed to reside on a planet in the Pleiades. Having discovered Earth in the distant past, some Pleiadians settled here and intermarried. The peace-loving Semjase was part of a group who were attempting to assist humanity out of its warlike tendencies. Meier claimed that Semjase allowed him to take pictures of the Pleiadian spacecraft, called beam ships, and that he even took a trip to the Pleiades himself. While the photographs were the most important aspect of the Meier contact claims, he also asserted that he had telepathic contacts with Semjase.

A first volume of photographs and an outline of the Meier story was published in English in 1979, and a number of additional books appeared over the next few years as ufologists debated the pros and cons of the Meier pictures. American inventor Fred Bell also claimed to have been in touch and received a variety of technological information from Semjase. But, although Meier received much support, mainstream ufologists denounced him. Kal K. Kroff authored two books condemning him as a hoaxer. Kroff's attacks on Meier were countered by Meier's supporters with more than a dozen books, illustrated with his many photos of the spaceships, and several video tapes. Together they made the Pleiades a well-known item within the lay community of people interested in flying saucers.

Beginning in the late 1980s, channelers (mediums), people who receive information from various extrasensory sources, appeared within the larger New Age community and claimed that they were channeling material from Pleiadians. The results of these contacts began to appear in 1991 with Jani King's book, The P'taah Tapes: Transmissions from the Pleiades. It was followed the next year by possibly the most influential volume, Barbara Marciniak's Bringers of the Dawn: Teachings from the Pleiadians. Additional Pleiadian contactees include Amorah Quan Yin, Nina Jenice, Susan Drew, Barbara Hand Clow, and Lyssa Royal, whose channeled material appears regularly in the monthly magazine of channeled material, Sedona: A Journal of Emergence. In 1996 Preston Nichols, the man who made some extraordinary claims concerning his secret work on a U.S. government project with mind control, materialization, and weather control known as the Montauk Project, revealed that he had also taken a trip to the Pleiades on a spaceship.

Together these New Age Channelers have led in the development of that segment of the New Age community who look to extraterrestrials as the source of the teaching material they are releasing.

Pliny the Elder (Gaius Plinius Secundus)

Roman historian who studied firsthand, and died during, the eruption of Vesuvius on August 24, 79 C.E., and was one of the earliest writers to record that animals behaved in an unusual way prior to earthquakes. Many of his writings no longer exist, but one surviving work is Naturalis Historia. It consists of 37 books, with a mathematical and physical description of the world, and covering geography, ethnography, anthropology, human physiology, zoology, botany, agriculture, horticulture, materia medica, mineralogy, painting, modelling, and sculpture. Although Pliny was skeptical about magic and astrology, he described many of the occult beliefs of his time. (See also earthquake prediction)

Plummer, George Winslow (1876–1944)

George Winslow Plummer, cofounder of the Societas Rosicruciana in America, was born August 25, 1876, in Boston, Massachusetts. He graduated from Brown University and moved to New York City as an artist. Along the way he joined the Masons. At this time there was within the Masonic movement a Rosicrucian society, but its membership was limited to Masons. In 1907 Sylvester C. Gould decided to found a Rosicrucian group that would be open to all. Plummer worked with Gould in the formation of the group, the Societas Rosicruciana in America, and the founding of a periodical, The Rosicrucian Brotherhood. Gould died in 1909, and Plummer emerged as the sole leader of the society, a position he held for the rest of his life. He also founded the First Rosicrucian Church in America. He was ordained and later consecrated as a bishop (1918) by Manuel Ferrando of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

In 1916 Plummer founded the Mercury Publishing Company and launched Mercury, a quarterly, as the official periodical of the Societas Rosicruciana in America. By 1920 he was able to quit his secular job and become the full-time executive of the society. He led in the founding of six colleges (Rosicrucian groups) in the United States and one overseas in Sierra Leone.

Plummer expanded his interest in an esoteric Christian mysticism in early 1902 with the founding of the Seminary of Biblical Research, a correspondence school, for which he wrote a series of lessons called Christian Mysticism. In 1924, with Episcopal priest Arthur Wolfort Brooks, he founded the Anglican Universal Church of Christ in the U.S.A. He and Brooks went their separate ways in 1927, and Plummer emerged as archbishop. In 1934 he was reconsecrated by William Albert Nichols of the Holy Orthodox Church in America. The Anglican Universal Church and Holy Orthodox Church in America merged and took the name of the latter body.

Plummer developed congregations of the Holy Orthodox Church in all of the cities where Rosicrucian lodges had previously been developed. He also consecrated four men to assist him, one of whom, Stanislaus Wotowski, eventually succeeded Plummer as head of the church.

Plummer wrote a number of books, including the Rosicrucian Fundamentals (1920), Principles and Practice for Rosicrucians (1947), The Art of Rosicrucian Healing (1947), and The Science of Death (1978). He also wrote the lessons for the Rosicrucian society. Plummer died January 26, 1944, and was succeeded by Witowski and his wife, Gladys Plummer. His widow eventually married Witowski and succeeded him. She was known during the last years of her life as Mother Serena.

Term used to denote direct writing mediums.

Podmore, Frank (1856–1910)

British opponent of Spiritualism, well-known psychical investigator, and author. He was born February 5, 1856, at Elstree, Hertfordshire. In 1874, he received a classical scholarship to Pembroke College, Oxford University, England. In 1879, he became a higher division clerk in the secretary's department of the post office.

His personal experiences in paranormal matters date from his academic studies at Oxford University. He believed in the survival and communication with the dead. In 1875, he became a contributor to Human Nature on Spiritualist subjects. His early belief in Spiritualism arose from his experiences with the medium Henry Slade (later discovered to be a fraud) in 1876. By 1880, in his address to the British National Association of Spiritualists, his belief was wavering.

He gradually developed into a skeptical critic and acted as a brake in the early years of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He was elected to the council of the Society for Psychical Research in 1882 and served for 27 years. F. W. H. Myers jointly held the office of honorary secretary for eighty years. He collaborated with Myers and Edmund Gurney in the producing Phantasms of the Living.

He admitted he was profoundly impressed by Slade and puzzled by David Duguid until, many years later, he considered the possibility of fraud. He did not believe the materializa-tion demonstration of Miss C. E. Wood and proved he had reason to reject manifestations in the Morell Theobald case.

Podmore's Beliefs Challenged

Podmore believed all physical phenomena were due to fraud. Ernesto Bozzano in the Annals of Psychical Science (February 1905) claimed Podmore selected as proof those single incidents or episodes fitting his proposed theories and ignoring any contradictions to his theories. Nevertheless, Bozzano held that "we cannot refuse Mr. Podmore the extenuating circumstances of comparative good faith."

Podmore concluded: "Whether the belief in the intercourse with spirits is well-founded or not, it is certain that no critic has yet succeeded in demonstrating the inadequacy of the evidence upon which the spiritualists rely." In his book The Newer Spiritualism, published posthumously in 1910, Podmore stated his research had left him of the opinion:

"So far as the evidence at present goes, clairvoyance and precognition are mere chimeras, and telepathy may be no more than a vestigial faculty, to remind us, like the prehensile powers of the newly-born infant, of a time when man was in the making."

Although, in regard to trances, he stated:

"I should, perhaps, state at the outset, as emphatically as possible that it seems to me incredible that fraud should be the sole explanation of the revelations made in trance and automatic writing. No one . . . will believe that any imaginable exercise of fraudulent ingenuity, supplemented by whatever opportuneness of coincidence and laxness on the part of the investigators, could conceivably explain the whole of these communications."

Podmore resigned his position as a post office civil servant in 1906 after 25 years to devote himself fully to literary activities. His death on August 14, 1910, was an accidental drowning in the Malvern Hills.

POLAND

Poland's history of staunch Roman Catholic beliefs has offered an interesting perspective on that country's interest in parapsychology and the paranormal. For observers, the belief in miracles and other spiritual phenomena alone might have qualified as testimony to belief in the supernatural. In 2000 the country's Roman Catholic population was estimated at 80 percent of all Poles. Eastern Orthodoxy shares the majority of the remaining population but remains isolated to the eastern frontier, representing approximately one percent-still making it second to Roman Catholicism. Other communities of Protestants and Buddhists exist on a small scale. Prior to World War II, psychical phenomena not necessarily related to religion could be found throughout Poland. In the nineteenth century, Poland was the home of psychical researcher Julien Ochrowicz (1850–1917). He investigated the medium Eusapia Palladino who visited Warsaw from 1892 through 1894. Ochrowicz testified to the levitation of Palladino. He also experimented with the medium Stanislawa Tomczyk. His 1887 book, Mental Dominance-Classics of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism was considered by experts to be the most comprehensive work on mental suggestion to appear in the nineteenth century.

After World War I, in the 1920s, a Metapsychical Society was founded in Crakow with approximately one hundred members, including authors and lecturers. The medium Stefan Ossowiecki, born in Moscow to Polish parents, served as the honorary chairman of the society. He also "demonstrated" telepathy, clairvoyance, psychokinesis, and the projection of the astral body (also known as out-of-the-body travel).

Ossowiecki was investigated by researchers such as Charles Richet, Gustave Geley, and Baron Schrenck-Notzing. His psychic abilities were also investigated by the Polish Society for Psychical Research. Ossowiecki was murdered by the Nazis in the final days of World War II.

Also active in the 1930s, was the Psycho-Physical Society in Warsaw. Its president, P. de Szmulro, edited the journal Zagadnienia Metapsychiczne.

As Poland began to recover from World War II, psychical research reappeared with an informal parapsychological network in Western Europe and North America. Psychical research in Poland has developed its own terminology.

Research on radiesthesia, hypnosis, and clairvoyance was conducted by the Bio-Electronic Section of the Copernicus Society of Naturalists, whose president was Dr. Franciszek Chmielewski. The section's activities included investigations of electric phenomena in living organisms, higher nerve activity in connection with parapsychological phenomena and hypnosis, and the influence on living organisms of cosmic and earth radiation.

Psychotronika embodies the papers of the proceedings presented at the biennial symposium of the Society of Radiesthetists held annually in Poland. Address: Towarzystwo Psychotroniczne w Warszawie, ul Noakowskiego 10 m 54, 00-666 Warszawa. The Polish monthly journal Trzecie Oko (Third Eye) is published by Stowarzyszenie Radiestetow, ul Noakowskiego 10 m 54, Warszawa.

In a country that can boast of a cultural life especially in literature and music that has crossed several centuries, and with education a top priority, Poland is shaping its future in the twenty-first century with the political freedom for which its people have fought. An economy and lifestyle that will open to more Western and American influences could broaden the landscape in a way yet to be determined.

Politi, Auguste (1855– ?)

Italian watchmaker and physical medium. His mediumship was developed by the physical researcher Captain Enrico de Albertis. In 1902, a series of experiments were conducted on Politi in Paris by de Albertis, Col. Eugene Rochas, Taton, Lemerle, Baclé, Guillaume de Fontenay, and Dariex. Photographs were taken of table levitations. In 1904, he was studied by a group in Rome under the direction of Professor Milesi.

In the Paris séances, a piano was supposedly raised several times and noisily dropped. A table of 39 pounds was lifted over the sitters' head, went through the opening of the curtain, and dropped upside down upon the floor. Supposedly luminous phenomena were also obtained. In the fifth séance, two luminous crosses, about four inches in high, appeared. The sitters were touched by a hairy hand and phantoms were seen. The medium sat in a sack fastened at the neck, wrists, and feet.

In 1908, Politi gave more than 70 séances in Milan at the Société d'Etudes Psychiques.

Poltergeist

The name of unexplained rappings, noises, and similar disturbances. The term poltergeist (Polter Geist, or rattling ghost) is indicative of the character of these "beings." It is believed poltergeists rarely cause serious physical injury, but can cause much damage by breaking fragile objects and occasionally setting fire to pieces of furniture or clothing. Supposedly a person may be pulled out of bed or levitated.

Most psychic manifestations require darkness, but poltergeists act in daylight. However, the movement of objects usually happens when no one is looking. One frequently reported claim is that objects rose or fell through the air slowly. Otherwise objects are often seen in flight but seldom beginning to move.

In the late nineteenth century, to explain the crashing noises that occurred such as the sounds of breaking crockery later found intact, Adolphe d'Assier advanced a theory in his book Posthumous Humanity (1887). He suggested inanimate objects also possess a double, a phantasmal image and it is the duplicate that is flung by the poltergeist. D'Assier stated the sum of motion a moving body possesses is found by multiplying the mass of the moving body by its velocity and its live force at the moment of fall is equal to half the bulk by the square of velocity. D'Assier's theory was discarded.

Reportedly, Italian psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano collected statistics on hauntings and claimed that out of 532 cases, 374 were ghostly manifestations and 158 were poltergeists.

Historical Poltergeists

Supposedly the poltergeist is not indigenous to any one country or any particular period. Author Andrew Lang claimed several cases belonging to the Middle Ages and at least one dates back to 856 B.C.E. In different cultures around the world, the reported phenomena are similar regardless of the country of origin.

Believers claim the disturbances are particularly active in the neighborhood of one person, generally a child, a young woman, an epileptic, or a hysterical subject. According to the theory advanced by Spiritualists, the center of the disturbances is a natural medium, through whom the spirits desire to communicate with the world of living beings. In earlier times, such a person might be regarded as a witch, the victim of a sorcerer, or even an evil spirit. Some believe the poltergeist developed out of witchcraft and is a direct forerunner of modern Spiritualism, possibly a link between the two.

Amongst the earliest poltergeist cases recorded were those of the Drummer of Tedworth (1661) and the Epworth Phenomena (1716). Supposedly the case of the Drummer of Tedworth began in 1661. A vagrant drummer was taken before a justice of the peace and deprived of his drum. The instrument was found in the house of Mr. Mompesson. Later, disturbances broke out in the house. Loud knockings and thumpings and the beating of an invisible drum were heard. Articles flew around the rooms and the beds (particularly those of the children) were shaken. After the drummer was sentenced to leave the manifestations ceased, but reoccurred when he returned.

Contemporary opinion classified the case as witchcraft by the drummer. Modern psychical researchers such as Frank Podmore believe the "two little modest girls in the bed" were responsible for the knockings and scratchings of the poltergeist rather than the drummer.

In the Epworth case, the family of the Reverend Samuel Wesley (father of Methodist founder John Wesley) reportedly described levitations, loud noises, and rappings, together with apparitions such as rabbits and badgers. Podmore was of the opinion that Hetty, one of John's sisters, was in some way responsible for the disturbances. Hetty did not give an individual account of the manifestations.

Poltergeists Around the World

Supposedly in Germany, Justinus Kerner recorded a poltergeist case in his book The Seeress of Prevorst (1845) that occurred in 1806–07 in the Castle of Slawensik, Silesia.

In Italy, the newspaper La Stampa of Turin claimed on November 19, 1900, poltergeist occurrences in a wine and spirit shop. Cesare Lombroso investigated the case and wrote:

"I went into the cellar, at first in complete darkness, and heard a noise of broken glasses and bottles rolled at my feet. The bottles were ranged in six compartments one above another. In the middle was a rough table on which I had six lighted candles placed, supposing that the spirit phenomena would cease in the bright light. But, on the contrary, I saw three empty bottles, standing on the ground, roll as though pushed by a finger, and break near the table. To obviate any possible trick, I felt and carefully examined by the light of a candle all the full bottles which were on the racks, and assured myself that there was no cord or string which could explain their movements. After a few minutes first two, then four, then two other bottles on the second and third racks detached themselves and fell to the ground, not suddenly but as though carried by someone; and after their descent, rather than fall, six of them broke on the wet floor, already soaked with wine; only two remained whole. Then at the moment of leaving the cellar, just as I was going out, I heard another bottle break."

In America, reportedly in 1850, disturbances occurred in the house of the Reverend Eliakim Phelps at Stratford, Connecticut. Twelve-year-old Harry Phelps was put in a water cistern and suspended from a tree. Mrs. Phelps was often pinched and pricked, and once, from a vacant room, a bottle of ink was thrown at her white dress.

The story known as “The Great Amherst Mystery” (after the 1888 book by Walter Hubbell) occurred between 1878–79 at Amherst, Nova Scotia, in the Teed family. The phenomena centered around Esther Cox, a sister of Mrs. Teed. A cardboard box, moving beneath the bed of its own accord, was the first manifestation. The next night Cox’s body began to swell to an abnormal size. Soon after, a noise, “like a peal of thunder” woke everyone in the house.

Supposedly the bedclothes flew off Cox’s bed, night after night; an invisible hand wrote in the plaster: “Esther Cox, you are mine to kill.” Cold water on the kitchen table bubbled and hissed like boiling water, yet its temperature remained unaffected; and a voice announced the house would be set on fire and for many days lighted matches were seen falling from the ceiling on the bed.

The spirit communicated by raps, and said he was an evil spirit bent on mischief and would torment Esther until she died. Things became so bad that Esther left. In the house of a friend, Mr. White, for a month everything was quiet. One day, while Esther was scrubbing the hall floor, the brush suddenly disappeared from under her hand. A few moments later, it fell from the ceiling. The spirit was heard to walk about the house, banged the doors, attempted to set the house on fire, stabbed Esther in the back with a knife, and piled up seven chairs in the parlor and pulled one out near the bottom allowing them to fall with a crash. This lasted for nearly a year.

Walter Hubbell, the actor, was supposedly a witness. In 1907, the psychical researcher Hereward Carrington interviewed some of the surviving witnesses at Amherst. The testimonies he gathered confirmed Hubbell’s narrative.

The Staus Poltergeist

One case occurred in the home of the Joller family in Switzerland. In 1860–62, disturbances broke out in Staus, in the home of Mr. Joller, a lawyer. Knocks were first heard by a maid, who also claimed she was haunted by grey shapes and the sound of sobbing. In the autumn of 1861, she was dismissed and another maid hired.

In the summer of 1862 the disturbances began again. Joller’s wife and his seven children claimed to have heard and seen many sights and sounds, though Joller remained skeptical. After a while he was convinced that neither trickery nor imagination would suffice as an explanation of the phenomena. Meanwhile the manifestations appeared before thousands who were attracted by stories of the phenomena circulating around town. The Land-Captain Zelger, the Director of Police Jaun, the President of the Court of Justice, and other people arrived to investigate the disturbances and some suggested a commission be appointed to examine the house.

Three of the police were to conduct a formal inquiry. They demanded the withdrawal of Joller and his family, and remained in the house for six days without witnessing anything abnormal. They drew up a report to this effect. However, after the Joller family returned to their home, the interruptions were renewed. Joller became the butt of ridicule and jokes and finally left his ancestral home.

Poltergeist Fires

Alexander Aksakof described several instances of poltergeist fires in his book Animisme et Spiritisme (1906). One occurred in 1870, at the country house of a Mr. Shcnapoff, near Orenburg, Russia and was investigated by various locals. It seems that Mrs. Shcnapoff was the medium in this case. When she was sent away from the house, the phenomena ceased. On one occasion a bluish phosphorescent spark was seen flying through the air, bursting a cotton dress into flames in her bedroom. Another time the dress she was wearing caught fire. In extinguishing it her husband was severely burned, yet she suffered no injury.

Sporadically, events were claimed to have occurred to justify the Russian belief in the “domovoy,” the Slavic house elf who performs various domestic duties during the night and watches over the sleeping household. The Shcnapoff case is similar to the Morell Theobald case where the poltergeist obligingly lit the kitchen fires. An even more domesticated poltergeist was recorded by J. A. Gridley in his book Astounding Facts from the Spirit World (1854). He wrote that on one occasion the breakfast table was laid by spirit agency.

Stone Throwing

The medieval Annales Fuldenses includes a chronicle of stone throwing approximately 858 C.E. in the town of Bingen on the Rhine. It was believed stones were thrown by a malignant spirit, and they struck dwelling walls.

Joseph Glanvill in his study Sadducismus Triumphatus (1681), recorded the witch trial of Mary London. She was a servant girl who, in addition to vomiting pins, had stones flung at her. The stones vanished after falling on the ground.

Poltergeists in the 1900s

In the early period of the Society for Psychical Research, London, opinions about poltergeist phenomena were dominated by the skeptical theories of Frank Podmore, but an alternative view was presented by Sir William Barrett in 1911. Amongst reported cases, Barrett investigated one at Derrygonnelly, in Ireland, where he claimed the phenomena had intelligence. Four times he got answers to numbers that he mentally asked.

In 1926, Eleonore Zügun, a Romanian peasant girl, was brought to London by psychical researcher Harry Price to London, and studied at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research for more than three weeks. The girl exhibited stigmata. Poltergeists stuck pins and needles into her body. Objects wandered around the room when she was in it. Reportedly no fraud was detected.

Hereward Carrington investigated the Windsor Poltergeist case involving a haunted town. Many of the Windsor residents conspired to play a prank on an old judge to mock his belief in Spiritualism. Carrington’s account of the hoax was published in his book Personal Experiences in Spiritualism (1918, pp. 112–24). As is the case with many believers confronted with evidence of having been defrauded the judge refused to accept Carrington’s explanation and insisted the manifestations were genuine.

One of the most interesting things about poltergeist phenomena is that in modern times, when there has been a marked decline in the physical phenomena of mediumship (most of which was fraudulently produced by tricks that will no longer work), poltergeists (not the product of fraud) continue to be reported, and many have been accessible to parapsychologists with modern monitoring equipment.

In Germany, the Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie (Institute for Border Areas of Psychology) under the direction of Dr. Hans Bender has studied 35 cases of poltergeists since World War II. Of these, the Rosenheim Case, 1967–68, attracted the most attention. In a lawyer’s office in Rosenheim, Bavaria electric lamp bulbs exploded, neon tubes continually went out, fuses blew, photostatic copying machines did not work, telephones rang or conversations were cut off unaccountably, and sharp bangs were reported. The focus of these events seemed to be Annemarie Sch., a nineteen-year-old employee. The disturbances ceased when she left the office, although witnesses claimed further events took place in her new office.

In Britain in 1977, the Enfield Poltergeist attracted wide attention. The poltergeist effects reportedly appeared in-house in the North London suburb of Enfield and focused its activity around the Hodgson family, Peggy Hodgson and her four children. Events recorded included inexplicable movements of objects, often flying through the air, levitation and transportation of one of the children, and noisy knockings. The case was investigated by members of the Society for Psychical Research, and author Guy Lyon Playfair who published a book on the phenomena.

In the United States, parapsychologist William G. Roll of the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man, made poltergeists one of his specializations following his initial investigation of the Seaford Poltergeist of Long Island in 1958, when disturbances took place in the family of Mr. and Mrs. James Herrmann and their two children. Bottles were uncapped and the contents spilled, and toys were broken, in addition to the usual noises and movement of objects. Roll's monograph, The Poltergeist (1976), summarized the parapsychological aspects of the subject.

POLYNESIA

The name Polynesia means "region of many islands," and Polynesia comprises a group of central Pacific islands, including the Hawaiian, Rotuma, Uved, Tokelau, Samoan, Cook, and Easter Islands as well as Tuvalu, Tonga, Niue, and New Zealand. Many traditions were also shared with Melanesians of the central and western Pacific islands. Under the impact of their discovery by the Europeans in the nineteenth century and their subsequently being drawn into affairs of the larger world, including World War II, customs, beliefs, and lifestyles have undergone radical change.

Traditional Magic and Sorcery

Magic in Polynesia used to be the preserve of the priestly and upper classes, although lesser sorcery was practiced by individuals not of these castes. There was a prevailing belief in what was known as mana, or supernatural power in certain individuals. The method of using this power was twofold. One of these was practiced by a society known as the Iniat, where certain rites were carried out that were supposed to bring calamity upon the enemies of the tribe.

The ability to exercise magic was known as agagara, and the magician or wizard was termed tena agagura. If the wizard desired to cast magic upon another man, he usually tried to secure something that the person had touched with his mouth, and to guard against this, the natives were careful to destroy all food that they did not consume. They carefully gathered up even a single drop of blood when they received a cut or scratch, and burned it or threw it into the sea, so that the wizard might not obtain it.

The wizard, having obtained something belonging to the person whom he wished to injure, buried it in a deep hole with leaves of poisonous plants and sharp-pointed pieces of bamboo, accompanying the action by suitable incantations. If he chanced to be a member of the Iniat society, he would place on the top of this package one of the sacred stones. The Iniat believed that as long as the stone was pressing down on the article that had been buried in the hole, the man to whom it belonged would remain sick.

Because of this, as soon as a man fell sick he sent to find out who had bewitched him, and there was usually someone who did not deny it. If the victim did not succeed in having the spell removed he would almost certainly die, but if he succeeded in having it taken away, he began to recover almost immediately. The strange thing was that he showed no enmity toward the person or persons who bewitched him—indeed it was taken as a matter of course, and he quietly waited until the time when he could return the "compliment."

These practices applied mostly to New Britain, now Papua New Guinea, but its system of magic was practically the same as that known in Fiji as vakadraunikau, about which very little is known. In his book Melanesians and Polynesians (1910) the Reverend Dr. George Brown, pioneer missionary and explorer, gives an interesting account of the magic systems of these people, in which he incorporated several informative letters from brother missionaries. For example, the Rev. W. E. Bromilow gives the following account of the magic system at Dobu, in southeastern New Guinea:

"Werabana (evil spirits) are those which inhabit dark places, and wander in the night, and gave witches their power to smite all round. Barau is the wizardry of men, who look with angry eyes out of dark places, and throw small stones, first spitting on them, at men, women, and even children, thus causing death. A tree falls, it is a witch who caused it to do so, though the tree may be quite rotten, or a gust of wind may break it off. A man meets with an accident, it is the werabana. He is getting better through the influence of the medicine-man, but has a relapse; this is the barau at work, as we have ascertained from the terrified shouts of our workmen, as some sleeper has called out in a horrid dream. These medicine-men, too, have great power, and no wonder, when one of our girls gets a little dust in her eye, and the doctor takes a big stone out of it; and when a chief has a pain in the chest, and to obaoba takes therefrom a two-inch nail.

"The people here will have it that all evil spirits are female. Werabana is the great word, but the term is applied to witches as well, who are called the vesses of the werabana, but more often the single word is used. I have the names of spirits inhabiting the glens and forests, but they are all women or enter into women, giving them terrible powers. Whenever any one is sick, it is the werabana who has caused the illness, and any old woman who happened to be at enmity with the sick person is set down as the cause. A child died the other day, and the friends were quite angry because the witches had not heeded the words of the lotu, i.e., the Christian religion Taparoro, and given up smiting the little ones. "These are times of peace," said they, "why should the child die then?" We, of course, took the opportunity and tried to teach them that sickness caused death without the influence of poor old women.

"Sorcerers are barau, men whose powers are more terrible than those of all the witches. I was talking to a to obaoba—medicine-man—the other day, and I asked him why his taking a stone out of a man's chest did not cure him. 'Oh,' said he, 'he must have been smitten by a barau.' A very logical statement this. Cases the to obaoba cannot cure are under the fell stroke of the barau, from which there is no escape, except by the sorcerer's own incantations.

"The Fijian sorcery of drau-ni-kau appears here in another form called sumana or rubbish. The sorcerer obtains possession of a small portion of his victim's hair, or skin, or food left after a meal, and carefully wraps it up in a parcel, which he sends off to as great a distance as is possible. In the meantime he very cunningly causes a report of the sumana to be made known to the man whom he wishes to kill, and the poor fellow is put into a great fright and dies."

The Rev. S. B. Fellows gives the following account of the beliefs of the people of Kiriwina (Trobriand Islands group):

"The sorcerers, who are very numerous, are credited with the power of creating the wind and rain, of making the gardens to be either fruitful or barren, and of causing sickness which leads to death. Their methods of operation are legion. The great chief, who is also the principal sorcerer, claims the sole right to secure a bountiful harvest every year. This function is considered of transcendent importance by the people.

"Our big chief, Bulitara, was asking me one day if I had these occult powers. When I told him that I made no such claim, he said, 'Who makes the wind and the rain and the harvest in your land?' I answered, 'God.' 'Ah,' said he, 'that's it. God does this work for your people, and I do it for our people. God and I are equal.' He delivered this dictum very quietly, and with the air of a man who had given a most satisfactory explanation.

"But the one great dread that darkens the life of every native is the fear of the bogau, the sorcerer who has the power to cause sickness and death, who, in the darkness of the night, steals to the house of his unsuspecting victim, and places near the doorstep a few leaves from a certain tree, containing the mystic power which he, by his evil arts, has imparted to them. The doomed man, on going out of his house next morning, unwittingly steps over the fatal leaves and is at once stricken down by a mortal sickness. Internal disease of every kind is set down to this agency. Bulitara told me the mode of his witchcraft. He boils his decoctions, containing numerous ingredients, in a special cooking-pot on a small fire, in the secret recesses of his own house, at the dead of night; and while the pot is boiling he speaks into it an incantation known only to a few persons. The bunch of leaves dipped in this is at once ready for use. Passing through the villages the other day, I came across a woman, apparently middle-aged, who was evidently suffering from a wasting disease, she was so thin and worn. I asked if she had any pain, and her friends said 'No.' Then they explained that some bogau was sucking her blood. I said, 'How does he do it?' 'Oh,' they said, 'that is known only to herself. He manages to get her blood which makes him strong, while she gets weaker every day, and if he goes on much longer she will die.'

"Deformities at birth, and being born dumb or blind, are attributed to the evil influence of disembodied spirits, who inhabit a lower region called Tuma. Once a year the spirits of the ancestors visit their native village in a body after the harvest is gathered. At this time the men perform special dances, the people openly display their valuables, spread out on platforms, and great feasts are made for the spirits. On a certain night, when the moon named Namarama is at the full, all the people—men, women and children—join in raising a great shout, and so drive the spirits back to Tuma.

"A peculiar custom prevails of wearing, as charms, various parts of the body of a deceased relative. On her breast, suspended by a piece of string round her neck, a widow wears her late husband's lower jaw, the full set of teeth looking ghastly and grim. The small bones of the arms and legs are taken out soon after death, and formed into spoons, which are used to put lime into the mouth when eating betel-nut. Only this week a chief died in a village three miles from us, and a leg and an arm, for the above purpose, were brought to our village by some relatives as their portion of their dead friend."

Some of the unusual magic traditions of Polynesia were also noticed by the ethnologists working in the area. In New Guinea and Fiji the custom prevailed of cutting off a finger joint in mourning a dead relative, as did the bushmen of South Africa. They firmly believed in mermaids, tailed men, and dwarfs. One group of natives in fact declared to a missionary that they had caught a mermaid, who had married a certain native, and that the pair had several children. "But unfortunately," stated the storyteller, "I could never get to see them." Another tradition connected to the Polynesian belief in magic, noted by the Europeans, was the practice of tattooing. The practice is represented widely in bodies of mythology, as being connected to the people's process of migration.

Like many other races, the Polynesians used to work themselves into a great state of terror whenever an eclipse took place, and during the phenomenon they beat drums, shouted, and invoked their gods.

In Samoa, magic was not practiced to such an extent as in other Melanesian groups, the magician being much more sophisticated. Instead of asking for any trifling object connected with the person he desired to bewitch, he demanded property, such as valuable mats and other things of use to him.

His method of working magic was to get into communication with his god, through his body, which became violently contorted and convulsed. The assembled residents of the village would then hear a voice speaking from behind a screen (possibly through ventriloquism), which indicated the presence of the god invoked.

Sickness was generally believed to be caused by the anger of some god, who could thus be concealed by the priest or wizard and duly placated. The "god" invariably required some present of substantial value, such as a piece of land, a canoe, or other property, and if the priest happened to know of a particularly valuable object belonging to the person who supposed himself bewitched, he stipulated that the property should be given up to the "god." This caste of priests was known as taula-aitu, and they also acted as physicians.

Lost Secrets of Polynesian Magic

In 1917 Max Freedom Long went as a teacher to rural Hawaii and subsequently became fascinated by the idea of discovering the lost secrets of the kahuna magician priests, whose leadership role in the social order had been disrupted in the nineteenth century. Long obtained valuable information on the fire walk ceremony from Dr. William Tufts Brigham, who had taken part in a fire walk 40 years earlier. Brigham had also investigated the ancient kahuna practice of charging wooden sticks with some vital energy, the sticks being used in combat and giving opponents some kind of electric shock that rendered them unconscious.

It was difficult for Long to obtain precise information on kahuna magic, since the laws of Hawaii had, many years earlier, outlawed it through strictures against what was termed sorcery and witchcraft, but Long continued to investigate the subject even after leaving Hawaii in the 1930s. He found his most valuable clues in the Hawaiian language, describing kahuna magic and the use of mana, or vital force.

Eventually Long believed that he had rediscovered the secrets of Polynesian magic, and the concepts of a high, low, and middle self or aka body through which power, mana, was generated and applied for magic purposes. He collated his discoveries with the information on psychic phenomena in the literature of psychical research and published his finding initially in a short work, Recovering the Ancient Magic, in 1936. In 1945 he founded the Huna Fellowship and soon issued several more substantive summaries of his conclusions, The Secret Science Behind Miracles (1948) and The Secret Science at Work (1953). The Huna Fellowship grew into Huna Research Associates for research and experiment in Polynesian magic, now continued by Huna Research, Inc.

Hawaiianists continue their efforts to recover as much of the Hawaiian magical teachings as possible before all traces of them disappear. The sacred sites of the old religion are protected by the state, and still occasionally show signs of private use. Several healing kahunas have survived and pass on the teachings to a select few.

Long's theories of huna and mana make interesting comparison with the researches of Baron Karl von Reichenbach into a vital force that he named "od," and parallels can also be found in the nineteenth-century concepts of animal magnetism.

In 1952 George Sandwith, a British exponent of radiesthesia (dowsing with pendulums) who was familiar with Long's work, visited the South Sea islands and made his own investigation of magic practices. In Fiji he investigated fire walking (see fire immunity) firsthand and discussed with local priests the concept of mana or vital energy involved. He also studied the atua or ancient phallic stones of Fiji, regarded as shrines of ancestral spirits, and their activation for magic purposes. Sandwith tested the magical charge of these stones by radiesthesia, using a pendulum. He experienced firsthand the way in which mana is used in magic when he was bewitched by a local chief.

In sharp contrast to the European accounts of the Polynesian practices and myths, today, these rich cultural tales are used as a tool to expand children's creativity, especially American children's creativity. The creation tales, specifically, are short and vivid enough to attach in a child's mind and therefore aid in their creativity. Today, the religious make-up of Polynesia is largely Catholic and Protestant, with some traditional beliefs and myths incorporated into the Christian ideology.

Polytrix

According to ancient belief, this was a stone causing hair to fall off the head of anyone who had it about his person.

Pontica

According to ancient belief, this was a blue stone with red stars or drops and lines like blood. It compelled the devil to answer questions, and also put him to flight.

Pontmain

Pontmain, a town not far from the border of Brittany and Normandy, was, in the year 1871, the scene of one of the more important of the modern apparitions of the Virgin Mary. Early on the evening of January 17, members of the Barbadette family were at work in their barn when Eugene (age 12) went to the door and looked at the starry sky. He noticed something unusual, a blank patch of sky over the house opposite theirs. Then within the patch, he saw stars appear in the shape of a triangle. Within the stars appeared a beautiful young woman. An expression of surprise brought his 10-years-old brother Joseph, who saw the Lady immediately, and his father, who saw nothing at all. The two boys began to describe what they were viewing. The Lady wore a blue dress decorated with stars and blue shoes with a gold buckle. She had a black veil on her head and a gold crown. The boys' mother arrived on the scene and saw nothing.

Their mother sent for a nun from the local convent school and she arrived with three children. Two of the three immediately saw the Lady. Soon other villagers arrived. Everyone could see the triangle of stars but not the Lady, seen only by the four children. The woman unrolled a scroll upon which a message calling for prayer was printed. She also showed the children various symbols—a red cross, some candles, and two luminous crosses. She then assumed the same position she had in the apparition to Catherine Labouré in Paris in 1830, with her arms to her side and hand extended in a blessing.

The local priest who had joined the group witnessing the apparition sent a report to his bishop, who appointed an investigating commission. Its report was positive; the bishop also ruled favorably. The Barbadette barn became a pilgrimage site. The two Barbadette children entered the priesthood and lived to see the completion and consecration of a large church near their family's house that was dedicated in 1900. Then in 1901 they participated in a second study of Pontmain ordered by Pope Leo XIII that also ruled favorably. Benedict's successor, Pius XI, gave permission for a special mass and liturgy for "Our Lady of Pontmain."

The Pontmain apparition took on special significance for many French Catholics as it occurred at the point that the Germans made their deepest penetration of the country. On January 17, 1871, the army stood on the outskirts of Lavel (just 30 miles from Pontmain) and were prepared to take it the next day. Instead, they received orders to withdraw. Many came to believe that the Virgin appeared at Pontmain to stop the German advance.

Poppy Seeds

Divination by smoke was sometimes practiced by magicians. A few jasmine or poppy seeds were flung upon burning coals; if the smoke rose lightly and ascended, straight into the heavens, it augured well; but if it hung about it was regarded as a bad omen. In parts of Europe, a pregnant woman would place poppy seeds on a window sill if she wanted a boy; sugar if she wanted a girl.

Possession

An altered state of consciousness in which the conscious personality of the individual is replaced with that of another personality, commonly thought of as a possessing spirit entity. Possession is a phenomenon common to all religious traditions but some traditions have a greater focus upon it. For example, many of the Afro-Cuban religions (Voudou, Santeria, Macumba) can be described as possession religions, and the being possessed by the deity is central to worship in these groups.

In the Christian West, possession, with rare exceptions, has been viewed as a negative phenomena. Taking the lead from New Testament examples in which several people are described as possessed by demons and are healed by Jesus, Christian leaders have largely equated possession with possession by a demonic force, or even the devil himself.

The negative evaluation of possession in the West has been reinforced by the development of secular worldviews that champion the autonomous individual, the maker of choices. Such worldviews emerged in the nineteenth century from European encounters with what were deemed “primitive” cultures with possession-oriented beliefs and practices, and by the spread of the practice of hypnotism, in which people could seemingly be made to do things that they would not or could not do if conscious. More recently, in this century, negative views of possession have been reinforced as a by-product of contemporary psychological exploration of the phenomena of multiple personalities, in which a secondary personality of the individual comes forward, usually as a result of extreme trauma.

Spiritualism

Spiritualism emerged as a possession-oriented religion in the mid-nineteenth century. In Spiritualist mediumship, and its contemporary derivations such as New Age channeling, possession is a developed form of motor automatism in which the personality of the automatist is substituted by another, usually by as a discarnate spirit. The possessing personality aims to establish communication with this world through the organism of the entranced medium, by writing or speech.

The incipient stage of possession is personation, during which the medium's own personality is still in the body but is assuming the characteristics of someone departed. The next stage is partial possession, the excitation of the medium's motor or sensory centers by a discarnate agent either through the subconscious self or in some direct way. F. W. H. Myers suggested the word “telergic” as a correlative to telepathic for such action.

Full possession postulates the vacation of the organism by the medium to allow the entrance of another spirit. Alternating personalities offer the first suggestion of the possibility of possession. An arbitrary personality may possess the organism of the hypnotic subject at the hypnotizer's suggestion. Secondary personalities are often hostile and antagonistic to the primary one.

Traveling clairvoyance in dream states points to the wandering of the spirit while the body is asleep. Cases of religious ecstasy in which an excursion is made into the spiritual world furnish another instance of the temporary separation of body and soul. Once we admit the possibility of the soul leaving the body, we have to admit the possibility of another spirit entering it.

Whether possession actually takes place or whether a secondary personality speaks through the organism is a question of evidence. Such evidence has to be furnished by the nature and content of the communications. The testimony of the medium is usually not available, as she or he often does not remember what happened.

Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg remembered his excursions into the spiritual world, but in his case there was no possession. The subjects of Alphonse Cahagnet described heavenly visions in trance, but there was not enough evidence to rule out the possibility that even when evidential communications from discarnate spirits were produced, they did not come from the subconscious self alone. If no new knowledge is shown in the trance state, there is no reason to ascribe the communication to an external intelligence. The character of the communicator alone does not furnish convincing proof.

The medium Leonora Piper never remembered her visions of the spiritual world and, the fragmentary utterances during her passing from trance to waking life aside, she was the tool for the writing and utterances of "alien entities".

Paranormal knowledge the medium could not have acquired is an indispensable condition for proving the presence of an external spirit. It is believed incoherence in the communicator does not militate against possession. It is rather in favor of it. If the spirit of the medium vacates the body, his or her brain will be left behind in a dreamlike state. To control such a brain and to make it obey the will of the communicator may not only be an enervating process, but full of pitfalls and possibilities of confusion.

Possession and Psychical Research

Taken as a phenomenon, possession presents one of the central mysteries of human life. It involves a mind using a brain. Possession is always temporary and implies a surrender of the body on the part of the medium. If possession takes place against the will of the medium and endures in the waking state, the phenomenon is called obsession.

The possibility of an instrumental test of possession was first suggested by W. Whateley Carrington. He advised the use of a galvanometer, which measured the emotional reactions of the medium to a certain set of questions. The different controls, if they are different personalities, should exhibit different emotional reactions to the same questions. It was by such tests that the independence of the controls of the medium Eileen Garrett was established at Johns Hopkins University and the New York Psychical Institute in 1933.

Postel, Guillaume (ca. 1510–1581)

A sixteenth-century visionary born around 1510 in the diocese of Avranches, France. At fourteen years of age, Postel was made master of a school. Postel believed he had been called by God to reunite all men under one law, either by reason or the sword. The pope and the king of France were to be the civil and religious heads of his new republic.

Postel was made almoner to a hospital at Venice, where he met Mére Jeanne, a woman who had visions. Because of his heterodox preachings, Postel was denounced as a heretic, but later was regarded as merely mad.

A follower of Kabbalah he spoke internationally about his belief in astrology wrote several works on the visions of his coadjutor. Postel retired to the priory of St. Martin-des-Champs at Paris, where he died penitent.

Posthumous Letters

Many investigators of psychic science, members of the Society for Psychic Research and others, have left sealed letters, whose contents are known only to the writer. On the death of the writer and before the letter is opened, an attempt is made by a medium to reveal the contents.

Since only the writer knows what the letter contains, it is presumed that on his death this knowledge can only be communicated through his discarnate spirit.

A notable posthumous letter from the escapologist Harry Houdini, was a code message apparently confirmed to his widow by the medium Arthur A. Ford. However, the genuineness of this story has been alternately confirmed, denied, and confirmed again.

Potawatomi Prophet

By the 1880s, the Native American tribes who had been pushed from their traditional homes in the East to new lands in the former Louisiana Territory had experienced a variety of new movements. Each movement had been led by a prophet/visionary who spoke to their new situation, including the loss of their land to white settlers and their forced removal to new land. Most offered some hope that the whites would be driven from the land. Among the Kickapoo, a prophet named Kanakuk had arisen calling for a heightened morality as a condition for the favor of the Great Spirit. From his visions, he had developed a new religion that came to dominate his people and found great favor among the Potawatomi. First introduced before removal to the West, it led to the Kickapoo remaining in the homeland for more than a decade after they should have moved. It continued in their new home in Kansas until Kanakuk's death in 1852, after which it appeared to die out.

At the beginning of the 1880s there appeared among the Potawatomi of Wisconsin a new prophet/visionary known only as the Potawatomi Prophet. He began to spread his message from the Great Spirit among the Winnebago and Ojibwa. In 1883 followers of the prophet introduced the prophet's teachings among the Kickapoo, and Potawatomi people then living in Kansas. The teachings appeared to have been a mixture of Christianity and traditional Native American beliefs but arose as competition to the missionary efforts of various Christian churches that were working among all the Native American people at the time. The movement spread quickly, aided by the memory of Kanakuk's teachings.

The movement called for moral living according to the Ten Commandments and offered special condemnation of some particular evils attendant upon reservation life: drunkenness, horse racing, and gambling. The apocalyptic element, offering the imminent end to white rule, had been abandoned in favor of rewards in the next life. It found a response among those Native Americans who had not joined a Christian church and who remembered Kanakuk. While surviving for some years, it was eventually overwhelmed by Christian missionary efforts.

Maritha Pottenger, a contemporary astrologer, was born on May 21, 1952, in Tucson, Arizona, the daughter of famed astrologer Zipporah Dobyns. Dobyns began the study of astrology in 1956, the year she separated from Maritha's father. She moved the family to Los Angeles, California, in 1969 and became active in the Church of Religious Science (a New Thought church in which she was eventually ordained). Maritha assumed her mother's maiden name. She attended the University of California–Berkeley, where she earned her degree in psychology (1974) and did graduate work in clinical psychology at the California School of Professional Psychology (M.A., 1976).

Pottenger learned her astrology from her mother and in the 1980s began to work with Astro Communications Services (ACS), the original astrological computer company founded in 1973 by Neil Franklin Michelsen. Through ACS she began to write computerized interpretive reports profiling various aspects of astrology interpretation, and she offers on-line interpretations of individual charts based on her profiles, the most recent being a comparison of horoscopes with the chart of the new millennium.

Pottenger is a member of the National Council for Geocosmic Research (chaired by Michelsen) and the International Society for Astrological Research. She has integrated her psychological training into her approach and encourages her clients to see their horoscope as a map of the psyche that assists them in making optimum choices. The Poughkeepsie Seer Title given to Andrew Jackson Davis (1826–1910), a pioneer Spiritualist medium from Poughkeepsie, New York.

Powder of Projection

A powder claimed to assist alchemists in the transmutation of base metal into pure gold. (See also Philosophers' Stone)

Powder of Sympathy

An occult remedy applied to the weapon that caused a wound, and which supposedly cured the hurt. This method was in vogue during the reigns of James I and Charles I, when its chief exponent was Sir Kenelm Digby. Digby published his theory in a volume entitled A late Discourse . . . by Sir Kenelm Digby, Kt. & c. Touching the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of Sympathy (London, 1658). Sir Francis Bacon had also written on the subject a generation earlier in his book Sylva Sylvarum: or, a Natural History (1627), in which he quoted a recipe for the powder:

“It is constantly Received, and Avouched, that the Anounting of the Weapon, that maketh the Wound wil heale the Wound it selfe. In this Experiment, upon the Relation of Men of Credit, (though my selfe, as yet, am not fully inclined to beleeeve it,) you shal note the Points following; First, the Ointment . . . is made of Divers ingredients; whereof the Strangest and Hardest to come by, are the Mosse upon the Skull of a dead Man, Unburied; And the Fats of a Boare, and a Beare, killed in the Art of Generation. These Two last I could easily suspect to be prescribed as a Starting Hole; That if the Experiment proved not, it mought be pretended, that the Beasts were not killed in due Time . . .”

A summary of Digby's theory was presented at an assembly at Montpellier in France. According to T. J. Pettigrew's book On Superstitions connected with the History and Practice of Medicine and Surgery (1844), his instruction for making the powder was simple:

“Take Roman vitriol six or eight ounces, beat it very small in a mortar, sift it through a fine sieve when the sun enters Leo; keep it in the heat of the sun by day, and dry by night.”

Powell, Ellis T(homas) (1869–1922)

British barrister, journalist, and Spiritualist. Powell was born in Ludlow, Shropshire, and educated at Ludlow Grammar School. He served an apprenticeship to a draper in Ludlow, then came to London, where he became a journalist on the Financial News, eventually becoming editor. He mastered several languages, including Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. In his spare time, he studied law and became a barrister. Powell was a fellow of the Royal Historical and Royal Economic Societies, the Institute of Journalists, and the Royal Colonial Institute (member of council). He lectured at the London School of Economics and Political Science (University of London).

Powell became a supporter of the Spiritualist movement, traveling throughout Britain and lecturing on psychic subjects. He was a member of the British College of Psychic Science and was a council member of the London Spiritualist Alliance. He frequently contributed to the Spiritualist journal Light.

As a good friend of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Powell's name figured in the séance conducted by Doyle and his wife for Harry Houdini. In 1922, when the Doyles were in Atlantic City, they met Houdini on the sea front. Lady Jean Doyle offered to give Houdini an automatic writing séance. This took place at the Ambassador Hotel, where they were staying.

Lady Doyle produced automatic writing purporting to come from Houdini's dead mother. At the end of the message, Houdini took up the pencil and wrote on the pad—the name “Powell.” This convinced Doyle that Houdini was a medium, since his friend Ellis Powell had died a few days earlier. Houdini later stated the message claimed to be from his mother was not evidential, since she would have been unable to communicate in fluent English, moreover he had been thinking of Frederick Eugene Powell, a fellow stage magician.

As a barrister, Powell brought his legal training to the problem of what he termed the “barbaric legislation” against mediums, campaigning to amend the Witchcraft Act of George II, still used against mediums during the twentieth century. He died June 1, 1922.

Powell, Evan (1881– ?)

British physical medium of Paignton, South Devon. Powell was originally a coal miner and later a tradesman in Wales. Powell usually sat tied to a chair before a cabinet with drawn curtains. His chief control was “Black Hawk,” a Native American. Movements of objects, psychic lights (see luminous phenomena), and direct voice phenomena were supposedly witnessed at his séances. He gave many sittings at the British College of Psychic Science.

“Black Hawk” claimed that a book had been published about him in the United States. A friend of Powell’s commissioned a book agent to locate it and present it to the medium. The title was: Life of Ma-Ka-Tai-Me-She-Kia-Kiak or Black Hawk, dictated by himself (Boston, 1834). “Black Hawk” also maintained there was a memorial to him in Illinois, a fact subsequently proven wrong. For a discussion of Powell’s mediumship, see Revue Métapsychique (1924, p. 326) and Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 44, p. 161).

Powell, Kenneth F(rancis) (1923–)

Engineer who investigated parapsychology. Powell was born on March 4, 1923, in Boston, Massachusetts, and later studied at the University of Pittsburgh (B.S., 1949; M.A., 1951). After graduation Powell became an analytical engineer at Babcock & Wilcox (1951–55) and manager at International Business Machines in Pittsburgh. He was a member of the Parapsychological Association. He took a special interest in psychokinesis.

Powell, W. H. (ca. 1879)

Slate-writing medium of Philadelphia with whom Epes Sargent conducted experiments in Boston on June 21, 1879. Under a chandelier, “without touching the surface of the slate, he made motions over it with his forefinger in the air, as if making a drawing, and then writing something. I reversed the slate, and there on the under surface, was a neat drawing of a flower, and under it in clear, bold letters, the word ‘Winona.’ ” Powell was tested by a committee, including chemists and physicians in 1879 in Philadelphia. The committee reported Powell’s slate-writing was “one of those peculiar psychological manifestations that we cannot account for.”

Power Spots

Within traditional religious thought as well as occult spirituality, different physical locations are believed to be holy sites because they possess an access to spiritual energy. Common sacred sites include many mountains, caves, springs, and the locations of unusual natural phenomena. This concept of power spots has received special emphasis in the contemporary occult community through the New Age movement. Recognized power spots are places that intensify whatever people bring to them, so that spending even short periods of time in them can lead to spiritual transformation.

The modern theory of power spots can be traced to the literature of the 1920s on the old monolithic culture in Great Britain that erected many stone monuments, of which Stonehenge is the most notable. In 1925 Alfred Watkins proposed that a system of straight lines, which he called “ley” lines, could be traced across England and from there to other parts of the world, and that these lines were aligned with the sun and various star clusters. This idea was expanded by later writers to suggest that the lines, which tended to cross at the sites of ancient pagan temples, manifested psychic energy. These writers compared the lines with the acupuncture meridians believed to crisscross the human body and hypothesized that ancient peoples intuitively chose the points where ley lines crossed as places to build their holy shrines. Archaeological evidence has proved that some straight paths actually exist, and, apart from any speculations about psychic energy, modern research has shown that magnetic forces surround the Earth relative to its magnetic pole. Published maps show those lines of forces as well as spots of strong deviation from the norm, which has led to the designation of new power points such as Sedona, Arizona, which is believed to be home to four power spots.

Power spots tend to be sites of striking natural beauty (such as Mount Shasta, in northern California), ancient holy sites (such as the Egyptian pyramids, or the Incan temple in Machu Picchu, Peru), and unexplained human constructions (such as the massive earth drawings on the plains of Nasca in Peru, which many believe were built to guide UFO landings). Such sites have become the object of pilgrimages.

PPCC Bulletin

Organ of the Planetary Professional Citizens Committee, established as an international organization concerned with UFOs and the orgone energy concepts of Wilhelm Reich. It was edited by Jerome Eden, and superseded his personal journal, the Eden Bulletin. PPCC operated as a small organization in the 1970s and 1980s and supported the idea UFOs were connected with the development of global deserts. It was published from Eden’s home in Careywood, Idaho.

Prana

According to Hindu yoga teachings, a subtle vitality contained in the air, modified by the human body to govern essential functions. In hatha yoga training, this vitality is enhanced by special yoga exercises known as pranayama. A combination of hatha yoga exercises and pranayama techniques created a latent force called kundalini in the body. Reportedly Kundalini usually supplies energy for sexual activity, but when fully aroused can be conducted up the human spine to a center in the head, resulting in higher consciousness or transcendental states.

Many writers have noted the similarity of teachings on prana and other teachings concerning subtle energies such as od or orgone.

Indian professor of psychology who investigated parapsychology. Prasad was born in 1901, in Sitapur, India, and studied at Allahabad University (Ph.D.). He was professor and head of the Department of Philosophy and Psychology of Lucknow University beginning in 1944. He was the Fulbright Visiting Professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (1954–56).

Prasad was interested in telepathy and psychokinesis and was involved in various research projects funded by the Parapsychology Foundation. These projects concerned experiments in extrasensory perception (ESP) and the influence of interpersonal relations between subject and experimenter on ESP results.

Pratt, J(oseph) G(aither) (1910–1979)

Parapsychologist and chief assistant to J. B. Rhine at Duke University. Pratt was born on August 31, 1910, at Winston-Salem, North Carolina. He entered Duke University during the 1920s with the idea of becoming a Methodist minister (Duke is sponsored by the Methodist Church) but was diverted into parapsychology and stayed to complete work with Rhine and eventually earned his Ph.D. (B.A., 1931; M.A., 1933; Ph.D., 1936). After graduation he became a research associate and the assistant director at the Parapsychology Laboratory, a position he held (except for service with the United States Navy during World War II) until joining the Department of Psychiatry at the University of Virginia in 1964. He remained at Virginia until his retirement. Pratt was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and elected its president in 1960. He also served for many years on the editorial staff of the Journal of Parapsychology.

Pratt took a special interest in quantitative experiments in extrasensory perception. His early investigations at Duke University included the Pearce-Pratt series (with Hubert E. Pearce Jr.) and the Pratt-Woodruff series (with J. L. Woodruff.) These ESP tests were critiqued by C. E. M. Hansel.

Pratt investigated the card-guesser Pavel Stepanek in Prague, Czechoslovakia. Stepanek was discovered by parapsychologist Milan Ryzl in 1961. Pratt and Ryzl collaborated on experiments with Stepanek in Prague and Charlottesville, Virginia, for several years.

As a parapsychologist, Pratt traveled in Europe, India, South Africa, and the Soviet Union. He had hoped to study the talented Russian PK subject Nina Kulagina, but did not obtain permission, although he saw her informally in a hotel. Pratt collaborated with H. J. Keil, Benson Herbert, and Montague Ullman on a monograph about Kulagina, published in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, January 1976. He died November 3, 1979, at his home near Charlottesville, Virginia.

Pratt, Morris (d. 1901)

Morris Pratt, the founder of the Morris Pratt Institute, currently the educational arm of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches, was a successful nineteenth-century businessman and Spiritualist. Little is known of his early life, but in 1851, just three years after Spiritualism emerged in the United States, he visited the Lake Mills (New York) Spiritualist Center. The visit launched his interest in psychic phenomena and he soon became a dedicated Spiritualist. Over the years he enjoyed provoking ministers with the phenomena of Spiritualism, and on at least one occasion was arrested and fined for his interruption of a church meeting to argue his position.

In the 1880s, an investment in the Ashland Mine at Ironwood, Michigan, provided him with a large amount of cash. He had made the investment due to information that had come through a medium from an Indian spirit guide. True to a promise made earlier in his life, he dedicated part of that money to Spiritualism. He constructed a large mansion in Whitewater, Wisconsin, specifically designed to house gatherings for seances and lectures. Dedicated in 1889, the "Temple," as it was known, included classrooms, office space, and dormitories. The main lecture hall could comfortably seat 400 people.

The National Spiritualist Association (later the National Spiritualist Association of Churches) was founded in 1893, the first national organization representative of Spiritualism's maturing into a religious community. In 1901, the aging Pratt offered the house and property in Whitewater to the association for the purpose of opening an educational institution modeled on the training school that Spiritualist teacher Moses Hull had led for several years in the mid-1890s in Ohio. The association felt financially unable to assume the responsibility, and Pratt incorporated the Morris Pratt Institute separately. Unfortunately, he died on December 2, 1902, before the school could open. Hull assumed control of the corporation the next year and operated the institute for the rest of his life. In spite of some shaky years following the Great Depression, the institute has continued to the present and now serves as the educational arm of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches.

Pratyahara

One of the advanced stages of the Hindu system of yoga practice. According to the Indian teacher Patanjali (ca. 200 B.C.E.), the following stages are prescribed: yama and niyama (ethical restraints and moral observances), asanas (the physical positions of hatha yoga), pranayama (breathing exercises), pratyahara (sense withdrawal), dharana (concentration), and dhyana (meditation), culminating in various degrees of samadhi (superconsciousness).

Pratyahara involves withdrawing sensory perception from external objects to concentrate on single-minded contemplation as a preliminary phase of meditation.

Prayer

Prayer is a name given to the primary means for humans to make contact with the divine. In Western religion, especially, it is the means of contact between God and the individual believer. Prayer generally consists of one or more of the following elements: adoration and praise, thanksgiving, confession of sin, intercession for others, and supplication.

The belief that God intervenes to grant the petitions of fervent prayers, especially in the matter of healing the sick, has long been a central aspect of Christian theology, although in modern times more emphasis has been laid on submission to divine will than on desire for special favors. Such intervention is seen as the cause of most miracles and raises questions of the persistence of supernaturalism. Faith remains an essential component of successful prayer.

Samuel Jackson, in his biographical sketch of Jung-Stilling (J. Heinrich Jung), records that he attained the means for his education by a succession of miracles in answer to fervent prayer. J. K. Lavater's life abounded in similar incidents. Augustus Franke of Halle erected a vast orphanage and yearly fed and educated thousands of children by the power of prayer, he said.

Christopher Blumhardt (1805–1880) of Württemberg, Germany, was not only famous for his prayer cures but also for his philanthropy, the means of which were procured by answer to prayer. Hundreds of persons reported to have been compelled by a power they could not resist to send presents of clothes or food to Blumhardt.

The Curé d'Arns, Jean Baptiste Vianney (1786–1859), furnishes a similar example of an extraordinary life of faith. He built three chapels and established a home for destitute children and another home for friendless women. Constant prayer, he said, was the source of his beneficence. When food, fuel, or money was wanted, he prayed for it and it came.

George Muller of Bristol, as related in his Life of Trust, being a Narrative of Some of the Lord's Dealings with George Muller (2 vols., 1837–41), depended on prayer for half a century for his own maintenance and that of his charitable institutions. He never asked anyone, or allowed anyone to be asked, directly or indirectly, for a penny. No subscriptions or collections were ever made. Hundreds of times there was no food in his house, yet he never took a loaf or any other article on credit even for a day. During the 30 years covered by his narrative, neither he nor the hundreds of children dependent on him for their daily food were ever without a regular meal. Secret prayer was his only resource, he claimed. The donors always described sudden and uncontrollable impulses to send him a definite sum at a certain date, the exact amount he was in want of.

F. W. H. Myers states in Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death (2 vols., 1903) that “the recorded appearances, intimations, and messages of the departing and the departed” prove that “between the spiritual and material worlds an avenue of communication does exist—that which we call the despatch and receipt of telepathic messages, or the utterance and the answer of prayer and supplication.”

Traditional prayer in Western religions (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam) that imply a direct relationship between the believer and a beneficent deity have always been severely challenged by the existence of significant evil. The idea of a loving and omnipotent God acting on behalf of human life was put to its most intense test by the Holocaust of World War II. If there is any simple efficacy to devout and heartfelt prayers to a deity, why did the inconceivably monstrous horrors of the Nazi persecutions and prison camps fail to be averted? Reflection on this question has provided a watershed in theological thinking. It led in the short term to the emergence of the “death of God” movement in theology and only as some distance and reappraisal of the Holocaust has occurred has a theological reconstruction of faith been possible for many.

Less affected by the Holocaust were those who had adopted the alternative perspective on prayer offered by the metaphysical movements of the nineteenth century. Christian Science and New Thought metaphysics jettisoned a personal deity in favor of an underlying divine principle or law undergirding the visible structures of the universe. Prayer is seen much more as atuning oneself with the underlying universal spirit, in which condition anything is believed possible, especially on a personal scale. Numerous reports indicate that prayer with faith and confidence in this metaphysical context has produced the desired results in both a religious and secular setting. One wing of New Thought has retained a religious prayerful context, while a secular wing has simply emphasized the creative powers of the mind in achieving fulfillment of desire.

It seems possible that there are factors in prayer that are applicable to both religious and secular frames of thought, that faith and confidence enhance psychic factors at present not clearly identified. Even such mundane attempts to influence events as the willing of the fall of dice in parapsychological research may hold clues to the mechanisms of prayer.

Again, it is interesting to note that in such ancient religions as Hinduism, the gods are said to be unable to avoid granting requests when the petitioner has practiced intense austerities. This idea suggests that spiritual disciplines may bring about psychophysical changes in the petitioner that influence events. Secondary aspects of traditional prayer that may also have relevance are the ritualistic forms of prayers and the need for constant repetition, which, like autosuggestion, may enhance subconscious powers. The concept of faithful prayer often gradually drifts into various attempts not just to petition the divine but to assist or coerce the deity's action.

Ultimately, however, divine will takes priority over the mundane desires of petitioners, and even in mystical Hinduism the highest wisdom is said to be transcendental awareness, which is beyond desires and fears in the mundane world and which accepts favorable or unfavorable destiny with equanimity, much as the petitioner in the Christian tradition concludes, “Thy will be done.”

“Preceptor”

Pseudonym of one of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses, who later claimed to be the biblical Elijah. “Imperator” (another control) frequently referred to “Preceptor” as his “Great Master” and director of the movement to uplift humanity through the teachings they delivered to Moses under the leadership of Jesus. Reportedly “Preceptor's” first signed communication was May 27, 1876. He was seen clairvoyantly by Moses as a communications link between himself and Malachi in the chain of spirit influence from Melchizedek to Jesus.

Precession of the Equinox

Astrology as it is known today was developed between the fourth and first centuries B.C.E. in the Mediterranean Basin. At the beginning of the year, marked by the spring equinox, the sun rose in the constellation Aries. After several centuries of observations, around 125 B.C.E., a Greek astrologer named Hipparchus discovered that very gradually the sun was moving in relation to the zodiac; that is, the precession of the equinoxes. There is some evidence that the phenomenon had been discovered earlier, but since Hipparchus, Western astrologers in general were aware of it.

The precession is caused in part by the slant of the Earth. It spins on an axis slanted at 23 degrees relative to its orbit around the Sun. That slant immediately accounts for the seasons. As the Earth moves around the Sun, where the axis is pointed toward the Sun, summer occurs, and where it is inclined away from the Sun, there is winter. However, as the Earth spins on its axis, because it is not a perfect sphere, it also wobbles slightly. It is this wobble that causes it to move slightly backward each year. That movement is hardly noticeable, being only one degree every 71 years.

Most Western astrologers use what is termed the tropical zodiac. The beginning of the year is marked by positioning 0° Aries at the point where the sun is located on the spring equinox. However, that point changes slightly every year, hence the zodiac moves slightly every year. Some astrologers use what is termed a sidereal equinox, in which the sun's true alignment with the constellations is retained. In the sidereal zodiac, the traditional relationship of the zodiac with the seasons of the year is lost.

This movement is slight from year to year but over the centuries makes a real difference. It takes approximately 2,150 years for the spring equinox to move from one sign to another and approximately 27,000 years for the wobble to make that point to return to its previously held position. The movement of the Sun's position at 0° Aries within one sign over a 2,100-year period defines an astrological age. Astrologers believe that different historical periods are ruled by different signs. In our own day we are believed to be experiencing the transition of the sun from the sign Pisces to Aquarius. The sign of Pisces the fish is often associated with Christianity, of which the fish has been a popular symbol. The contemporary revival of astrology has seen the twentieth century as the beginning of the Aquarian Age and has projected a hope that it will bring broad characteristic changes.

Precipitation of Matter

One of the phenomena of Spiritualism known as the "passing of solids through solids." The theory suggests before one solid body passes through another it is resolved into its component atoms, to be precipitated in its original form when the passage is completed. Camille Flammarion suggested a parallel: the passage of a piece of ice (a solid) through a napkin. The ice passes through the napkin in the form of water, and may afterwards be re-frozen.

Precognition

Paranormal knowledge of impending events, also referred to as prediction, premonition, and prophecy. See also retrocognition.

Prediction (Magazine)

British magazine founded in 1936 dealing with astrology and the occult. Brief features articles in each issue cover such topics as the tarot, palmistry, graphology, yoga, and magic. Astrological forecasts are featured. Prediction is published from Link House, Dingwall Ave., Croydon, CR9 2TA, England.

Pre-Existence

The question of pre-existence has come to the fore throughout Western history. Some people adhere to the Hebraic and Christian notions that the individual is created during the period between conception and birth and other people believe the human soul is somehow immortal, neither created nor destined for destruction. For example, according to Christianity, God creates the person for life in this world and prepares a person for a life extended beyond death. A variety of positions arrayed themselves against Christianity.

The question of pre-existence is often tied to the religious issue of reincarnation, a belief that individuals now living on earth have had a series of previous human lives as they have moved from body to body, a position found in the Hindu text, the Bhagavad-Gita. Traditional Spiritualism believes a new soul is created at birth and goes on to other levels of existence. However, French Spiritism and Theosophy argue for reincarnation.

It is rare to believe in pre-existence without reincarnation. One person who articulated such a belief was Sir Oliver Lodge. In Phantom Walls (1929), he wrote:

"When the question of pre-existence arises I should say that the individual as we know him is a fresh apparition, a new individualisation of something preexisting. . . . We can imagine that, every now and then, an opportunity arises for spirit to enter into relation with matter, and to become gradually an individual, and develop a character and personality which will persist; so that there is almost a kind of 'choice' whether we enter into life or what sort of life we enter into. In that sense we may be said—with apparent absurdity, but possibly with some kind of truth—to select our parentage; and thus may some facts of heredity be accounted for."

Premonition

A paranormal impression warning of a future event. Premonitions may range from vague feelings of disquiet, suggestive of impending disaster, to actual hallucinations, visual or auditory. Dreams are frequent vehicles of premonitions, either direct or symbolical, as well as veridical dreams. Spiritualists do not know if the warning comes from an external intelligent source such as a knowledgeable spirit being, from clairvoyance (precognition), the intuitive projection of the outcome of presently existing trends, or coincidence or self-fulfilling prophecy, a form of autosuggestion.

A premonition differs from prediction. Reportedly the latter has a degree of precision and tends to detail the basic who, what, when, where, and how questions. When the event foreseen is not precisely outlined or is too insubstantial to prompt a prophetic utterance, "premonition" is the more appropriate term. For vague future events of a personal nature, "presentiment" is employed.

Richet's Conditions

According to psychical researcher Charles Richet, premonitions should have two fundamental conditions:

- "1. The fact announced must be absolutely independent of the person to whom the premonition has come."
- "2. The announcement must be such that it cannot be ascribed to chance or sagacity."

Richet did not employ the term "presentiment." He also ruled out personal premonitions. It was believed subconscious perception or suggestion is possible if sickness or death were announced. Richet claimed a photograph taken of a person suffering from a slight attack of fever may show signs of a rash or eruption on the face invisible to ordinary sight. The photograph “foresees” the sickness. However, Richet accepted personal premonitions (“auto-premonitions,” to use his term) in cases when accidental death figured in the paranormal perception.

According to legend, the Earl of Hartington’s dream illustrates pseudo-premonitions. In good health, he dreamt of a skeleton that looked like him; it raised the coverlet bedclothes and slipped in bed between him and his wife. He died fifteen days later.

Premonitions where the subconscious is ruled out may be received under hypnosis, in trance, or accidentally in the dream or waking state. The Seeress of Prevorst (Frederica Hauffe), claimed while in hypnotic sleep she saw a spirit anxious to speak of misfortune threatening her daughter. Reportedly a few weeks later, the girl was almost killed by a tile falling on her head.

If the percipient is positive the event in question is about to happen, the term “precognition” is used. If it takes visual form, “prevision” is the appropriate label. When predictions involving the fate of larger units, countries, or nations are made, “prophecy” is the appropriate term. Premonition may be conceived of as the lowest degree of prophecy. Whether the premonition comes in the waking state or during sleep, it is believed the impression is usually deep and lasting. The recipient may write it down or narrate it for later verification.

In the 1880s, the Society for Psychical Research collected 668 cases of death premonitions; 252 more were added in 1922. Camille Flammarion collected 1,824 cases. From time to time, cases were registered in English, German, French, and Italian psychical periodicals. Ernesto Bozzano collected 260 cases in his Des Phénomènes Premonitoires. Count Cesar Baudi de Vesme analyzed premonition in games of chance (Le Merveilleux dans les jeux de hasard, Paris, 1930). An earlier work of William MacKenzie (Metapsichica moderna, Rome, 1923) related experiments in the same field with mediumistic intervention.

In L’Avenir et la Premonition (1931), Richet referenced Julien Ochrowicz’s experiment (Annales des Sciences Psychiques, 1909–10), stating a telekinetic explanation in stopping the roulette ball at the announced number should be considered.

Incidents of Premonitions

Many prominent people have left records illustrative of the general nature of premonitions:

Charles Dickens dreamed of a lady in a red shawl, who said: “I am Miss Napier.” He did not know who this woman was. Some hours later, he was visited by two ladies, and a girl in a red shawl was introduced as Miss Napier. (Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research, vol. 14, 1920).

Sir Oliver Lodge quoted the account of an English minister who dreamed of a terrible storm and lightning that entered the dining room and destroyed the chimneys of the roof opposite. Under the impression of the dream, although it was bright sunshine, he directed his wife to prepare lunch at an early hour. Events happened just as in the dream. Soon a storm broke out, and lightning struck through the dining room and demolished the chimneys of the neighboring roof.

Field-Marshal Earl Roberts (1832–1914), in his autobiography Forty-one Years in India (1897), related his experiences when commanding: “My intention, when I left Kabul, was to ride as far as the Kyber Pass, but suddenly a presentiment which I have never been able to explain to myself, made me retrace my steps and hurry back to Kabul, a presentiment of coming trouble which I can only characterise as instinctive. The feeling was justified when, about half way between Butkhak and Kabul I was met by Sir Donald Stewart and my Chief of Staff, who brought me the astounding news of the total defeat by Ayub Khan of Brigadier General Burrow’s brigade at Maiwand and of Lieutenant-General Primrose, with the remainder of his force, being besieged at Kandahar.”

President Abraham Lincoln had strange presentiments of his coming end. John Forster, in his Life of Dickens (3 vols., 1872), quoted a letter written to him by Dickens, dated February 4, 1868. Charles Summer had told Dickens that on the day of Lincoln’s assassination an extraordinary change was noticeable in him. Lincoln said: “Gentlemen, something extraordinary will happen, and that very soon.” Later he spoke of a dream that came to him for the third time and said: “I am on a deep, broad, rolling river; I am in a boat, and I am falling in! I am falling in!” Six weeks before his assassination he saw a great concourse of mourners in the White House in a dream. The mourners surrounded a coffin in which he saw his own body. Presidents Garfield and McKinley also had premonitions of their violent ends.

William T. Stead, the Spiritualist journalist, had a presentiment that he would not die normally. He thought he would be kicked to death by a mob. Instead, he went down in the “Titanic” in 1912. In 1892 Stead had written a fictional story about a ship called the “Majestic,” that received a psychic message from a survivor of another ship that had struck an iceberg in the Atlantic. The novelist Emile Zola always dreaded asphyxiation by gas. It was the cause of his death.

A method of experimental premonitions was described by Richet in L’Avenir et la Premonition (1931) and La Grande espérance (1933). To quote from the latter (p. 198):

“Thirty six pieces of paper, each containing a number written in pencil. They are carefully folded, all alike. Armand, a painter of my friends, the brother of Brigitta, indicates the number which Brigitta is going to draw. There are errors, certainly. Armand is not always correct, but the result is far superior to the probability. There are periods of error and periods of astonishing lucidity. At my formal recommendation Armand only makes one experiment per day which gives the probability of 1/36. Well, during a certain week, in six draws, his predictions was five times correct. This is about 1/30,000,000.”

We have no satisfactory explanation for premonitions. Possibly Richet was right when he stated: “If we knew the totality of things in the present we should know the totality of things to come. Our ignorance of the future is the result of our ignorance of the present.”

According to novelist Maurice Maeterlinck, the phenomenon of premonitions is far less exceptional than generally thought. He believed in “human foreknowledge” and observed that the great catastrophes usually claim fewer victims than the probabilities of each case would allow. He found that generally some strange chance keeps a number of people away who otherwise would be there and perish. They are warned by a mysterious, unerring instinct.

Richet concluded, from his belief in the reality of premonitions, that the future is determined. His conclusion is a possible logical surmise from his line of reasoning, but it is not the only or right one. The basis of premonitions need not be the supposition of either a closed future or an eternal present. The consideration of the presence of presupposition leads directly to questions of freedom and the nature of the future. Do premonitions announce an unalterable future or suggest a future that can with attention be altered?

More recently an extended study of precognitive dreaming was done by Mary Stowell with a group of five women tabulating 32 characteristics of such dreams. Syntheses of the narratives of interviews indicated common patterns across the dream descriptions and the responses to the experiences. Both traumatic and nontraumatic situations arose, some of which would benefit by professional counseling to assuage guilt and a sense of helplessness. In some cases intervention was possible to prevent the dreams from coming true.

Premonitions registries founded in recent decades included (with their last known address) the Central Premonitions Registry (Box 482, Times Square Station, New York, NY 10023); the Southern California SPR (via Carolyn Jones, 4325 E. Broadway, Long Beach, CA 90803); and the Toronto Society for Psychical Research (10 North Sherbourne St., Toronto 5, ON, Canada).

The Prenestine Lots

Also known as Sortes Prenestinae. A method of divination by lots, in vogue in Italy in early times. The letters of the alphabet were placed in an urn, shaken, and dropped on the floor; the words thus formed were received as omens. In the East, a similar method of divination was also common.

Presentiment

Personal premonition of vague events in the future.

Preta

Hindu term for the soul of a departed. After death the soul was said to inhabit a subtle body the size of a man's thumb and remain in the keeping of Yama, judge of the dead. Punishment or reward arises for the preta depending upon the actions of the individual's life and may involve many rebirths.

Eventually through faith and enlightenment, the soul is translated to the heaven of the Pitris (the Manes or progenitors of the human race).

Prevision

Foreknowledge of the future acquired in a visual form. Reportedly, such visions are mostly spontaneous, but there are means of experimentally inducing them through crystal gazing and other forms of divination.

In the experiments of Col. Eugene Rochas, he supposedly took his hypnotic subjects on longitudinal passes into past phases of their lives and brought them back to transversal passes. Reportedly, if these passes were continued beyond the present age the subject went into the future. These experiments are also known as "hypnotic regression."

Florence Marryat, in her book There is No Death (1892), claims her spirit was summoned by friends, sitting in a circle, while she was fast asleep in her home. Her spirit begged to be sent back with the words: "There is a great danger hanging over my children, I must go back to my children." The day after the séance, her brother-in-law accidentally discharged a rifle in the midst of her seven children and a bullet passed through the wall close to her eldest daughter's head.

The mechanism of prevision was described in Vincent Turvey's The Beginnings of Seership (1911):

"At certain times I see a sort of film or ribbon continually moving as does an endless belt in a cinematograph film. This film is in colour of a very, very pale pinky-heliotrope, and it seems to vibrate with very great velocity. Upon it are numerous little pictures, some of which appear to be engraved on the film itself, whilst others are like pale blue photographs stuck on the film. The former I have found to refer to past events, the latter to those about to happen. The locality of the event is judged by the scenery and the climatic heat. I have to estimate dates by the clearness of the pictures. I foresee more unpleasant than pleasant things. I believe the reason to be that evil, being nearer to matter than to spirit, is more ponderous in the ether than its opposite, and is therefore sensed more easily by a Seer. I not only see, but feel, the density of evil."

Price, E(lias) Alan (1918–)

Physician and radiologist concerned with parapsychology. Price was born on April 15, 1918, in Dolhinow, Poland. He moved to South Africa and studied at the University of Witwatersrand, South Africa (M.B., Ch.B).

Price served in the Israeli Army from 1948 to 1949, during the formation of the state of Israel. He then returned to South Africa as a resident house physician from 1949 to 1951 and then went to England to study at London University College Hospital (D.M.R.D. diagnostic radiology, 1953). Price became a consulting radiologist (1954–58) at Johannesburg General Hospital, South Africa. He reentered private practice in Johannesburg in 1958.

Price was a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London and a founder and leader in 1955 of the South African Society for Psychical Research (vice president, 1956–57; president, 1958; and executive member from 1959).

Price, George R(ober) (1922–1975)

Chemist and science writer, who published articles critical of parapsychology findings. Price was born on October 16, 1922, in Scarsdale, New York. He studied at Harvard University and at the University of Chicago (B.S., 1943; Ph.D. chemistry, 1946). He worked on the Manhattan Project during the last days of World War II and then from 1946 to 1957 worked at various teaching and industrial positions. In 1957, he became a full-time writer of material on science, primarily chemistry and biology.

In August 1955, Price started a controversy by publishing an article in Science magazine (the periodical of the American Association for the Advancement of Science). He dismissed parapsychologists (then attempting to gain admittance to the circles of the AAAS) with the observation that their positive results were “dependent on clerical and statistical errors and unintentional use of sensory clues” and claimed that “all extra-charge results not so explicable are dependent on deliberate fraud or mildly abnormal mental conditions.”

This article was quoted by newspapers and journals. It suggested various fraudulent methods used to show such results as those claimed by parapsychologists like J. B. Rhine and S. B. Soal, and stated their claims were not acceptable as proof of extrasensory perception. Rhine and Soal responded to these criticisms in the Newsletter of the Parapsychology Foundation (October 1955), which also published a further communication from Price.

It is believed the skeptical attitude of Price represented a backlash against parapsychology by orthodox scientists of the time, particularly by members of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, a body having refused to permit affiliation to the Parapsychological Association. Reportedly the skeptical and hostile criticisms stimulated parapsychologists to develop methods of testing extrasensory perception that could not be faulted by their colleagues in other fields on simple methodological grounds. An indication of the acceptability of parapsychology as a recognized scientific discipline was the acceptance of the Parapsychological Society into membership of the AAAS in December 1969.

In 1972, Price changed his mind about what he had written in the 1950s. In an article in Science, he apologized to Soal and Rhine for treating them unfairly. Shortly afterward, it was discovered that Price had been right about Soal, who had faked the data he had presented.

Price, Harry (1881–1948)

Prominent British psychical researcher. Price was born January 17, 1881, and was educated at London and Shropshire. His interest in conjuring dated from his boyhood, when he watched the medicine show of “The Great Sequah” at a fair-ground, a performance with quack remedies, tooth drawing, and magical tricks. At the age of fifteen, he conducted his first scientific investigation of poltergeist phenomena, staying until midnight in a reputed haunted house with photographic equipment.

Price was involved in archaeological excavations in Greenwich Park and discovered a prehistoric cave in Shropshire. He assisted the early flying experiments of José Weiss, a year before the Wright Brothers at Kitty Hawk. Price was an amateur conjurer, a member of the Magic Circle, elected to the Society of American Magicians, and from 1921 onward was honorary librarian of the exclusive Magician’s Club.

As a psychical researcher, Price investigated Stella C. (Stella Cranshaw Deacon), Eleonore Zügün, and Rudi Schneider. He was a publicist for the cause of psychical research. Price went on an expedition to the Hartz Mountains, Germany, during the Goethe centenary of 1932, to test a fifteenth-century white magic ritual said to change a goat into a “fair youth of surpassing beauty.” The goat was not metamorphosed. Price was also founder of Britain’s National Laboratory of Psychical Research (which became the University of London Council for Psychical Research).

Price also attracted attention for his investigation of Borley Rectory, Essex, “The Most Haunted House in England,” and his connection with R. S. Lambert and the story of the Talking Mongoose of the Isle of Man. Price published many books and pamphlets concerning his research and other experiences in the Spiritualist and occult community. He also made an early talking picture, Psychical Research, in 1935, contributed an article on “Faith and Fire-Walking” to the Encyclopedia Britannica (1936), and collaborated on a film script of the Borley hauntings with novelist Upton Sinclair. Price died March 29, 1948. His collection of some 20,000 volumes of works on psychical research, magic, and related subjects, was donated to the University of London as the Harry Price Library of Magical Literature.

After his death, Price was accused by fellow psychical researchers of helping out or faking some of the Borley Rectory phenomena. One of those, Trevor Hall, went on to write a biography of Price critical of every aspect of his activities. Hall presented him as a pretender, fraud, and dishonest investigator.

Price, Henry Habberley (1899–1984)

Emeritus professor of logic who also became a prominent figure in the field of parapsychology. Price was born on May 17, 1899, at Neath, South Wales, Britain. He was educated at Winchester College and New College, Oxford (B.S., M.A.). He was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford (1922–24) and a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford (1924–35) prior to beginning his long tenure as Wykeham Professor of Logic, University of Oxford and fellow of New College, Oxford (1935–59). He was named emeritus fellow of New College at the time of his retirement. Price was honored as the Gifford Lecturer at Aberdeen University for the 1959–60 school year.

Price was president of the Society for Psychical Research, London (1939–41) and subsequently a council member. He was a charter member of the Parapsychology Association. An outstanding philosopher, he lectured and wrote articles and books on the philosophical problems raised by parapsychology. He lectured on “Some Philosophical Implications of Paranormal Cognition” at the International Conference on Philosophy and Parapsychology, St. Paul de Vence, France, in 1954. He died in Oxford, England, November 26, 1984, at the age of 85.

Price-Mars, Jean (1875–1969)

Haitian educator and diplomat who also studied parapsychology. He was born on October 15, 1875, at Grande-Rivière du Nord, Haiti. Price-Mars was a professor and rector at the University of Haiti and a member of the Haitian Senate. Beginning in 1900 he served in the Haitian diplomatic service in Germany, the United States, France, the Dominican Republic, and the United Nations and served as Haiti’s Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was the founder of the Institute of Ethnology, Haiti, and president of the African Society of Culture. He published various books on the folklore, history, culture and ethnology of Haiti and took a special interest in parapsychology in relation to voodoo.

He died March 2, 1969.

Prince, Morton (1854–1929)

Physician, neurologist, and psychologist whose career peaked as psychical research was maturing. He was born on December 21, 1854, at Boston, Massachusetts. He studied at Boston Latin School, Harvard (B.A., 1875), and Harvard Medical School (M.D., 1879). He was particularly interested in the work of Jean Charcot and Pierre Janet in hysteria and hypnosis. He was a physician for diseases of the nervous system at Boston Dispensary (1882–86) and Boston City Hospital (1885–1913), an instructor in neurology at Harvard Medical School (1895–98), a professor of neurology at Tufts Medical School (1902–12), and subsequently professor emeritus. He was an associate professor in abnormal and dynamic psychology at Harvard University for two years at the end of his life (1926–28).

Prince was an outstanding neurologist. He founded and, for almost a quarter of a century, edited the Journal of Abnormal Psychology (1906–29), and in 1911 he was elected president of the American Psychological Association. His book on The Dissociation of a Personality (1906) dealt with the famous case of “Sally Beauchamp” and is considered a basic work in the field of abnormal psychology, with an important bearing on the parapsychological phenomenon of secondary and multiple personality.

Prince was a member of the American Society for Psychical Research and contributed articles to the Society’s Proceedings. He authored a number of books including The Nature of Mind and Human Automatism (1885), the title most directly related to parapsychological concerns. He died August 31, 1929.

Prince, Walter Franklin (1863–1934)

Prominent American psychical researcher, research officer of the American Society for Psychical Research (1920–25) and cofounder and research officer of the Boston Society for Psychical Research (1925–32). He was born in Detroit, Maine, April 22, 1863. After graduating from the Maine Wesleyan Seminary in 1881, he attended Yale University (B.A., 1896; Ph.D., 1899), and Drew Theological Seminary (B.D., 1896). He became the pastor of Methodist Episcopal congregations in Maine and Connecticut and then joined the Protestant Episcopal Church and served parishes in Brooklyn, Pittsburgh, and San Bernardino, California.

From church social work, he was led to study abnormal psychology and became the director of psychotherapeutics at St. Mark’s Episcopal Church in New York City (1916–17). While there, he met and became the assistant to James Hervey Hyslop, who had reestablished the American Society for Psychical Research. In 1925 he became the Society’s research officer, a post he held until the controversy over Mina Crandon (“Margery”) flared in the mid-1920s. The controversy split the society. Prince believed Margery a fraud and resigned from his position with the Society over his differences with the board on how to handle the data that it had assembled.

Along with Elwood Worcester and Gardner Murphy, Prince led in the founding of the rival Boston Society for Psychical Research in 1925 and became its research officer. While operating out of Boston, he was responsible for a remarkable cure in the multiple personality case of Doris Fischer and conducted important investigations of the cases of “Patience Worth” and the Antigonish poltergeist. His excellent work led to his twice being elected president of the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1930 and 1931. He died on August 7, 1934.

In eighteen years of research with the American Society for Psychical Research and the Society for Psychical Research, London, Prince investigated many different kinds of paranormal phenomena in hundreds of cases, but in spite of his doubts about certain phenomena, he eventually concluded that a case for the reality of telepathy and clairvoyance has been “absolutely and scientifically proved.” In addition, he was inclined to belief in survival of personality after death and considered the evidence “very promising.”

Princeton Engineering Anomalies Research (PEAR)

The Princeton Engineering Anomalies Research (PEAR) program was founded in 1979 by Robert G. Jahn, a physicist, engineer, and former dean of the School of Engineering and Applied Science, to pursue the study of the interaction of human consciousness with various mechanical devices and to measure the effects of such interaction. The ultimate goal was better understanding of the role of consciousness in establishing physical reality.

PEAR has emphasized research on attempts by humans to affect the behavior of various mechanical, electrical, and other devices apart from mundane physical forces. Utilizing various sophisticated machines that generally give random outputs, researchers found that various subjects had been able to produce outputs that varied considerably from expected random results. Among the more interesting experiments were those involving people located at some distance from the machine being affected, pairs of people with emotional bonds, and experiments in which the results were produced either prior to or after the actual attempt to make changes occurred.

PEAR also has become involved in the popular remote viewing experimentation that has dominated much parapsychological research through the 1980s and 1990s. PEAR experiments tended to be based on telepathy (rather than clairvoyance), as the experiments were set up between a recipient at one location attempting to reproduce the images perceived by a second participant who was at another location. Researchers also ran a lengthy remote viewing experiment using Urquardt Castle at Loch Ness in Scotland as a target. Repeated positive effects have been reported from these experiments.

The results of two decades of work, demonstrating the correlation of human intention and physical effects, has led Jahn and his associates to the conclusion that a larger model of reality exists, one that provides for an active role of consciousness in controlling the physical world. Jahn has called for his colleagues to alter their methodology based upon the phenomena he has explored.

The Princeton Engineering Anomalies Research program is headquartered at C-131, Engineering Quadrangle, Princeton University, Princeton, NJ 08544. It maintains an Internet site at <http://www.princeton.edu/~pear/index.html>.

The first volume was titled Lucid Dreams and the second, Out-of-the-Body Experiences. Both were by Celia E. Green and issued in 1968. The Institute of Psychophysical Research was headquartered in Oxford, England.

Proceedings of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research

The National Laboratory of Psychical Research was founded by psychical researcher Harry Price for scientific investigation of phenomena. The Proceedings published from 1927–29 contain research reports. Part 2, issued in April 1929, was the still valuable Short-Title Catalogue of Works on Psychical Research, Spiritualism, Magic, Psychology, Legerdemain and Other Methods of Deception, Charlatanism, Witchcraft and Technical Works for the Scientific Investigation of Alleged Abnormal Phenomena from circa 1450 A.D. to 1919 A.D.

In 1934, the National Laboratory of Psychical Research was taken over by the University of London Council for Psychical Research, London, and published various issues of a Bulletin concerned with psychical research. Bulletin I, issued in 1935, was a Supplement to the Short-Title Catalogue. The National Laboratory of Psychical Research also issued a Bulletin of psychical investigations.

Proceedings of the Old American Society for Psychical Research

The American Society for Psychical Research was originally formed in 1885 and existed as an independent organization until 1889, when it became a branch of the British Society for Psychical Research, under the leadership of Richard Hodgson. When Hodgson died in 1905, the branch was dissolved, and after a year of preparation, the present American Society for Psychical Research was formed under the leadership of James H. Hyslop. The main Proceedings of the original American Society for Psychical Research from 1885–89 continued reports of research by the Society and its members on such areas as thought-transference, the Supernatural Among the Omaha Tribe, hypnotic phenomena, telepathy, and automatic writing. The American Society for Psychical Research was reconstituted in 1907.

Proceedings of the Parapsychological Association

Morris and J. D. Morris. Numbers 1–7 were published by the Parapsychological Association, and subsequent issues have been published by Scarecrow Press as an annual volume of abstracts and papers under the running title Research in Parapsychology. The current address of the Parapsychological Association is: P.O. Box 3695, Charlottesville, VA 22903-3695. Proceedings of the Psychological Society of Great Britain

A volume, published in London in 1880, with reports of the papers and discussions in Sergeant Cox’s Society for 1875–79. The society dissolved in 1880, and no further papers were published. The papers offered reflection on the common concerns of psychology and parapsychology. There is a copy of this volume in the library of the Society for Psychical Research, London.

Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research

The society was founded in 1882 and has published Proceedings since then. The Journal was first published from 1883 onward and until 1949 was available only to members of the Society. The Proceedings for the first half century of the Society’s existence offer a comprehensive view of psychical research over that period. A Combined Index to the Journal and the Proceedings is issued by the society.

Procter & Gamble Logo

The familiar logo of Procter & Gamble for decades was a design of thirteen stars enclosed in a circle, with a man-in-the-moon. In the wake of the rise of a popular interest in Satanism and anti-Satanism in the late 1960s, the logo gave rise to persistent rumors that the company was run by Satan sympathizers and that the logo expressed allegiance to the devil. The rumor was spread by many conservative Christians and others who had come to believe in an international underground Satanic conspiracy, such as that described in the black magic novels of popular occult writer Dennis Wheatly. The company took a number of public relations countermeasures through the 1970s, but unable to stamp out the rumor, in 1982 it was obliged to take legal measures to defend itself. Procter & Gamble filed two libel suits in July 1982, one against a WXIA television weatherman, another against a Tennessee couple, for spreading such rumors. On April 24, 1985, Procter & Gamble dropped the suits when all three individuals publicly apologized. The logo was, nonetheless, removed from its products.

Professional Psychics United

Organization founded in 1977 by professional psychics with the object of helping police in crime solving. It provided a psychic rescue team to assist in locating missing persons, offered educational programs on the nature of extrasensory perception, and conducted teaching seminars. It maintained biographical archives and a library of 203 volumes and sponsored psychic fairs. It bestowed awards, maintained a speakers bureau, offered placement service, and conducted research programs. The organization, which survived only a few years, was headquartered in Berwyn, Illinois.

Progoff, Ira (1921–1998)

Jungian psychologist who has investigated areas of parapsychology. Progoff was born on August 2, 1921, in New York City. He studied at the New School for Social Research in the city from which he received his Ph.D. in 1951. He was a Bollingen fellow from 1952–58, during which time he spent a year in Zürich as a lecturer at the Jung Institute (1953). In 1959 he became the director of Institute for Research in Depth Psychology at Drew University, Madison, New Jersey. He was a member of the Parapsychology Association, a member of the advisory board of the Institute for Religion in an Age of Science, and a member of the board of editors of Journal of Humanistic Psychol- ogy. Progoff took a special interest in mediumship, psychedelics, religious and creative experience, personality growth and psychic sensitivity, and image-making at depth-psychological levels. He also developed a system of Process Meditation, characterized by the individuals' use of an "Intensive Journal" to record their progress. He organized Life Context Workshops and published the National Intensive Journal at Dialogue House, 80 E. 11th St., New York, N.Y. 10003. His meditation system was the subject of his book The Practice of Process Meditation (1980). Progoff died December 28, 1998.

Progressive Library & Spiritual Institution

Established by pioneer British Spiritualist James Burns in 1863. The organization included a lending library of several thousand volumes on Spiritualism and related subjects, with a reading room and rooms for séances or experiments relating to Spiritualism.

In addition, the Institution included a publishing department to assist and promote literature connected with Spiritualism. These included an edition of the writings of prominent American Spiritualist Judge Edmonds and the important Report on Spiritualism of the London Dialectical Society (1872). The Institution was an influential meeting place for nineteenth-century Spiritualists in London.

The Progressive Thinker (Newspaper)

American Spiritualist weekly, founded by J. R. Francis in 1899 and edited and published for many years by M. E. Cadwallader. The Progressive Thinking Company, headquartered in Chicago, also published a variety of Spiritualists books.

Project Starlight International

Founded in 1964, to gather and disseminate a broad range of instrumented UFO data to the scientific community. During its existence, the project has utilized magnetometers, a gravimeter, spectrometer, radar, laser-telescope-video system, and other electronic and optical systems for recording the physical effects, optical images, and location of UFOs. The project conducts in-depth analyses of motion-picture films of UFOs obtained by PSI staff members, along with magnetometric, spectrographic, and other data recorded during UFO events. Address: P.O. Box 845, College Park, MD 20740.

Project VISIT—Vehicle Internal Systems Investigative Team

Founded in 1976 with a membership of researchers, including engineers, scientists, analysts, and investigators, interested in UFOs. The project exists to conduct research in order to determine whether or not there is a correlation of engineering systems among UFO cases, to identify and evaluate such systems and determine the mode of operation of UFOs, and to share research findings with government agencies, public corporations, and the general public. The project maintains an archives containing 10,000 clippings, reports, and reviews on current UFO cases and also compiles statistics. It sponsored the 1980 Mutual UFO Network Conference. It has also published study and monographs. Project VISIT may be reached at P.O. Box 890327, Houston, TX 77289.

Prophecy

In premodern society, prophets appeared both informally as gifted individuals with a sudden prophetic insight or as functionaries identical with what Western scholars in the nineteenth and twentieth century called witchdoctors, priests or shaman. For an example of the prophet/seer/judge functionary, see the biblical book of I Samuel which traces the history of the last judge to rule the Hebrew tribe. Samuel was, as a child, dedicated to God and placed in the care of Eli, the corrupt judge/seer of Israel. His career includes a number of clairvoyant and prophetic (precognitive) utterances, but the most illustrative of his daily functions is pictured in I Sam. 9 in which Samuel helps locate the lost donkeys of the future king Saul.

In many instances prophetic utterances were made in what appeared to be a normal state (see the references to prophecy in the biblical book of Acts) but often occurred in an altered or ecstatic state of consciousness (see the opening verse of the book of Ezekiel, or the sixth chapter of Isaiah). In general the Hebrew prophets went through a period in which "the word of the Lord" spoke to them and then they in turn went among the populace and spoke what they had been told. We know that the pythonesses attached to the oracles of ancient Greece uttered prophetic words under the influences of natural gases or drugs, and when the magical practitioners in tribal cultures attempt to peer into the future they often attain a condition of ecstasy by taking some drug, the action of which is well known to them. But this was not always the case; the shaman often summoned a spirit to his aid to discover what portents and truths lie in the future.

Most often divination is not prophecy in the true sense of the term, as artificial aids are employed. Those aids can stimulate the psychic attunement, but most of the time appear merely as a pretended prediction of future events by the chance appearance of certain objects that the augur supposedly understands. We often find prophecy disassociated from the ecstatic condition, as among the priests of the Maya Indians of Central America, known as Chilan Balam, who, at stated intervals in the year, made certain statements regarding the period which lay immediately before them.

Prophecy may be regarded as a direct utterance of the deity, taking a human being as mouthpiece, or the statement of one who seeks inspiration from the fountain of wisdom. In the biblical writings, Yahweh desired to communicate with human beings and chose certain persons as mouthpieces. Again individuals (often the same as those chosen by God) applied to the deity for inspiration in critical moments. Prophecy then may be the utterances of the deity(ies) through the instrument of an entranced shaman or seer, or the inspired utterance of a seer who later repeats what has been learned while in an altered state (hearing the word of the Lord).

In ancient Assyria the prophetic class were called nabu, meaning "to call" or "announce"—a name probably adopted from that of the god Na-bi-u, the speaker or proclaimer of destiny, the tablets of which he inscribed.

Among the ancient Hebrews the prophet was called nabhia, a borrowed title probably adopted from the Canaanites. They differed little in function from similar functionaries in the surrounding cultures, but differed greatly in the particular deity to which they were attached. Prophets were important functionaries in the ancient Near East. Four hundred prophets of Baal reportedly sat at Queen Jezebel's table (I Kings 18:19). The fact that they were prophets of this deity would almost go to prove that they were also priests. We find that the most celebrated prophets of Israel belonged to the northern portion of that country, which was more subject to the influence of the Canaanites.

Association of prophets appeared in Israel quite early (see I Sam. 10:5) and records of such appear periodically through Israel's history. In the era after the death of Ahab and Jezebel they appear to have had some formal organization (see II Kings 2) with chapters in various towns (II Kings 2–5). They served to consolidate Elijah's victories over the prophets of the hated deity Baal. They seem to have died out by the time of the exile.

The general idea in Hebrew Palestine was that Yahweh, or God, was in the closest possible touch with the prophets, and that he would do nothing without revealing it to them. While often ignored or persecuted during their lifetime, their preserved written words were later given greatest veneration and still later canonized.

In ancient Greece, the prophetic class were generally found attached to the oracles and in Rome were represented by the augurs. In Egypt, the priests of Ra at Memphis acted as prophets as, perhaps, did those of Hekt. Among the ancient Celts and Teutons prophecy was frequent, the prophetic agent usually placing him or herself in the ecstatic condition. The Druids were famous practitioners of the prophetic art, and some hint of their utterances may be still extant in the so-called “Prophecies of Merlin.”

In America, as has been stated, prophetic utterance took practically the same forms as in Europe and Asia. Captain Jonathan Carver, an early traveler in North America, cited a peculiar instance where the seers of a certain tribe stated that a famine would be ended by assistance being sent from another tribe at a certain hour on the following day. At the very moment mentioned by them, a canoe rounded a headland, bringing news of relief.

A story was told in the Atlantic Monthly many years ago by a traveler among the Plains tribes, who stated that an Indian medicine-man had prophesied the coming of himself and his companions to his tribe two days before their arrival among them.

In recent years, channeling and contactees contributed more to American prophecy than any other sources. Hundreds of channeling books have been published in the past few decades, but the majority contain unspecified prophetic content. More often than not, the predictions are about millennial earth changes and a new era of spiritual transformation and peace. Prophetic channeling by Edgar Cayce, Kryon and Elizabeth Clare Prophet are considered the most prominent. More traditional psychic seers such as Jeanne Dixon, Ruth Montgomery, Gordon Scallion, Dannion Brinkley and Lori Toyne are in the forefront due to the lack of more particulars from channeled sources. Today, mass market prophecy paperbacks are just a number of hodge-podge collections of bits and pieces from Cayce, Nostradamus, Native American lore, etc. Much analysis on prophecy is rare, but works by John White and Tom Kay are considered noteworthy in their field.

“The Prophet”

A control of the medium William Stainton Moses, said to have been the biblical Haggai, a contemporary of Malachi, brought in by “Imperator” as an assistant with Vates (Daniel), another contemporary. He signed communications several times jointly with “Imperator” but never gave independent teaching.

The Prosperos

A group stemming from the “Fourth Way” philosophy of Georgei Ivanovitch Gurdjieff founded in 1956 by Thane Walker, a charismatic student of Gurdjieff, and Phez Kahlil. The Prosperos were chartered in Florida, but moved around the country, and they reported a some 3,000 members in California.

The Prosperos believed in One Mind and claimed that reality can be experienced only from its perspective by removing the distortions of the senses and memory that hide the true self. This was generally in accord with traditional mystical teaching, but whereas the way of the fakir is through willpower, the yogi through intellect and the monk through emotions, the “Fourth Way” was available to individuals within world experience. The Prosperos believed that God is pure consciousness and use five processes to achieve identification of the individual with the One Consciousness: 1) Statement of Being (the facts of reality); 2) Uncovering the Lie or Error (the claims of the senses); 3) Argument (resting of claims); 4) Summing up the Results; and 5) Establishing the Absolute.

Lectures and classes were conducted on such topics as “Translation,” and “Releasing the Hidden Splendor,” and there was also an inner circle named High Watch, for those who complete three classes of development.

The name “Prosperos” derived from the magician Prospero in Shakespeare’s play The Tempest. Through his magical powers, Prospero could interpret, project, rationalize and imagine life as he wishes, but on his island he was interconnected with Caliban the monster (who parallels the unconscious mind) and Ariel (the intuitive agent who aids Prospero when called upon).

Proxy Sitting

A consultation with a medium in which the individual uses a substitute or “proxy,” in order to avoid possible telepathic communication or other indications from the sitter.

Pruden, Laura A. (d. 1939)

Slate-writing medium of Cincinnati, widow of a judge, who practiced mediumship for well over half a century. She did not go into trance. Hereward Carrington sat with her on October 27, 1925, and in his book, The Story of Psychic Science (1930), he included an account of his experiences. After describing the result of his preliminary examination of the table and the slates, he stated that, at the medium’s request, he wrote two questions on slips of paper, one addressed to Richard Hodgson, and the other to his own father. He folded them up and placed one upon the floor under the séance table, the other on a small table to his right where it remained visible throughout the sitting, until used.

Pruden, sitting on a very low rocking chair, thrust the pair of slates, a small piece of slate pencil between them, through the slit on the tablecloth, with her right hand under the table. Her left hand rested in her lap and remained visible throughout the séance.

“The first pair of slates remained under the table for about half an hour, when they were removed and a brief message was found written upon one of the inner surfaces, signed “R. Hodgson,” and answering my question, written upon the first slip. These slates were then put to one side. I was then requested to remove the first slip from under the séance table and place the second one there. This I did. The second pair of slates was then examined and held under the table in the same manner as the first pair. At the end of about half an hour these were removed and a general message from my ‘father’ was found upon them, answering the question written upon the second slip. The slips and slates I took with me, and now have them in my possession.”

Carrington further stated:

“It is my opinion that, on any theory whatever, Pruden’s slate-writing is a very remarkable performance. The table and slates were certainly free from any previous preparation. She certainly could not have seen the written questions before they were placed on the floor under the séance table. She certainly keeps up an animated conversation with her sitter throughout the sitting. Her left hand is always visible and her body appears to be practically stationary throughout. At no time does she stoop to pick up anything from the floor.”

Carrington advanced a theory as a hypothetical explanation of the feat, but he himself admitted that his observations tended to support the genuine character of the manifestation.

A series of articles which gave a favorable impression of Pruden’s powers was published in the Journal of the American Society for Psychological Research (1926–27). The British psychical researcher Harry Price, in his report of séances held with Pruden in London in 1925, withheld favorable pronouncement, as he found fault with Pruden’s conditions. See also Journal of the Society for Psychological Research (vol. 23, pp. 76, 97, 139; vol. 24, p. 128). Pruden died March 10, 1939, at age 86.

“Prudens”

One of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses, said to be Plotinus. He contributed a Greek philosophical tone of thought to the spirit teachings. At an early stage he was appointed one of Moses’s guardians and was left in charge of him during the absence of the controls “Imperator” and “Doctor.”

Pryse, James Morgan, Jr. (1859–1942)

James Morgan Pryse, Jr., founder of the Gnostic Society, was born on November 14, 1859, in New London, Ohio, the son of a Welsh Presbyterian minister. His father, who belonged to the Welsh Order of Druid Bards, filled Pryse with the legends of the Druids along with the Presbyterian faith. As a young man Pryse pursued a law career but gave it up for journalism. He moved around frequently during his early adulthood, joined in the effort to create a colony at Topolobampo, Mexico, and from his New Jersey residence edited the Topolobampo periodical.

After moving to Los Angeles, Pryse joined the Theosophical Society in 1886. Within a few years he was one of its most active members and moved to New York to work for the society’s Aryan Press. Late in 1889 he moved on to London at the request of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the society, to work with her in the founding of HPB Press.

In 1894, following Blavatsky’s death, Pryse moved to Ireland to work with the Irish Theosophist. While there he wrote the book The Sermon on the Mount (1896), the first of a series of theosophical treatments of the Bible and Christian theology. In 1895 Pryse returned to the United States to work with William Quan Judge, then the head of the American Theosophical Society, which had broken with the international theosophical movement. Following Judge’s death in 1896, Pryse remained in New York and affiliated with the independent Theosophical Society of New York, which had broken with Judge’s successor, Katherine Tingley. Pryse’s next books were published by the society’s Theosophical Publishing Co.

After 15 years in New York, Pryse returned to Los Angeles, where he wrote his most important text, The Restored New Testament, a theosophical translation of the New Testament. It was completed and published in 1914. While continuing to flirt with the larger Theosophical Society and writing articles for its periodicals, he remained aloof and led independent gatherings in Los Angeles. In 1925 he founded the Gnostic Society with six people who met in his home to discuss his metaphysical interpretation of Christianity. The small group is important as possibly the first modern group to describe itself as Gnostic. The society disbanded soon after Pryse’s death on April 22, 1942, but has been revived by Stephan A. Hoeller.

Stanford and other parapsychologists have published a series of papers on experimental research relating to the PMIR model.

Psionics

A term coined by science-fiction editor John W. Campbell, Jr. to denote a combination of radionics and psi phenomena. His editorial "The Science of Psionics," published in the February 1956 issue of his magazine Astounding Science Fiction, discussed "psychic electronic machines." One such machine was invented by Thomas G. Hieronymus (U.S. Patent No. 2,482,773) and resembles the black box of radionics. Campbell described the machine in an article later that year. Campbell is also remembered as the publisher of L. Ron Hubbard's initial article introducing Dianetics to the public.

Psyche

Anglicization of the Greek term for soul which has been adopted in a number of ways by various parapsychological and occult authors and organizations. Among them are:

(1) A German spiritualist monthly founded in 1894 and later, following the union in 1900 of the three largest Spiritualist societies of Berlin, superseded by a joint organ, the Spiritistische Rundschau, of which Karl Obertimpfler became the editor.

(2) An English monthly magazine devoted to the philosophy and phenomena of life, beginning in 1899.

(3) An English quarterly journal which succeeded W. Whateley Carington's Psychic Research Quarterly in 1921 as a journal of general and applied psychology. It was edited by C. K. Ogden out of London.

Psychonautics

Term coined by Robert E. L. Masters and Jean Houston to denote the combination of mechanical and hypnotic techniques by means of which they have probed the psi faculty in their Foundation for Mind Research in Manhattan, New York.

Psychic

A term denoting (1) as an adjective, the paranormal character of certain phenomena and (2) as a noun, a sensitive individual, one susceptible to psychic influences. A psychic is usually not a medium and tends to attribute his/her ability to clairvoyance or ESP rather than spirit contact. The term psychic, however, is used very loosely in an inclusive manner to include the medium, the somnambule, and the magnetic or mesmeric subject, i.e., anyone who is in any degree sensitive. Camille Flammarion seems to have been the first to use the word as a French term while Edward William Cox seems to have introduced it into England.

Psychic (Magazine) See New Realities

Psychical Research

Scientific inquiry into the facts surrounding and causes underlying reports of paranormal and mediumistic phenomena. Psychical research's first concern has been to establish the occurrence of the claimed events. If such events are not due to obvious mundane causes, including fraud, observational error, or the laws of chance, the next stage of the inquiry is to establish a reason for their occurrence—whether known natural laws are sufficient to explain them or whether there is reason to assume action by an unknown force.

Determining the nature of such an unknown force and the mode of its manifestation forms a third level of investigation. If it is not a blind force but operated by intelligence, it must be determined whether this intelligence is earthly. Not until every other explanation and test fails can the claim of a paranormal source be accepted.

The Historical Background

The term psychical research covers all scientific investigation into the obscure phenomena traditionally connected with the so-called supernatural, undertaken with a view to their elucidation. Certain of these phenomena are known all over the world and have remained practically unaltered almost since prehistoric times. Such are the phenomena of levitation, fire ordeal, crystal gazing, thought reading, and apparitions. Even though the formal discipline of psychical research rests on the scientific method of the nineteenth century, these phenomena have been investigated throughout the ages.

John Gaule, in his Select Cases of Conscience Touching Witches and Witchcraft (1646), observes:

“But the more prodigious or stupendous [of the feats mentioned in the witches' confessions] are effected merely by the devil; the witch all the while either in a rapt ecstasie, a charmed sleepe, or a melancholy dreame; and the witches' imagination, phantasie, common sense, only deluded with what is now done, or pretended.”

A few other writers of the same period arrived at similar conclusions. The result of many of these medieval records was to confirm the genuineness of some of the phenomena witnessed, but here and there, even in those days, there were skeptics who refused to give them any supernatural significance.

Poltergeist disturbances received a large share of attention and investigation. The case of the Drummer of Tedworth was examined by Joseph Glanvill and the results set forth in his Saducismus Triumphatus, published in 1668. The Epworth phenomena, which occurred in the house of John Wesley's father, elicited many comments, as did the Cock Lane ghost, the Stockwell poltergeist, and many others.

Those who investigated animal magnetism and mesmerism may be considered psychical researchers, since these forerunners of hypnotism were the fruits of prolonged investigation into the phenomena connected with the trance state.

The writings of Paracelsus and Franz A. Mesmer show that they had glimpses of perspectives that were ahead of their time, foreshadowing the work of psychical researchers. Paracelsus, for example, stated in his writings,

“By the magic power of the will, a person on this side of the ocean may make a person on the other side hear what is said on this side. . . . The ethereal body of a man may know what another man thinks at a distance of 100 miles and more.”

This reads like an anticipation of telepathy, which has since attained remarkable prominence, although it is by no means attributed to “the ethereal body of a man.” Such writings would seem to entitle many of the mesmerists and the older mystics to the designation of protopsychical researchers. As knowledge increased and systematized methods came into use, such inquiries became more focused and fruitful.

The introduction of modern Spiritualism in 1848 undoubtedly set the stage for psychical research. The movement was so widespread and the reports of its effects so numerous and impressive that it was inevitable that scientists (especially those facing the spiritual questions to which the movement spoke) would be attracted to the movement and then drawn into an examination of the alleged phenomena.

Thus we find engaged in the investigation of Spiritualism such individuals as William Carpenter, Michael Faraday and Augustus De Morgan, and on the Continent, Count de Gasparin, Marc Thury and Johann C. F. Zöllner. One of the most important investigators was undoubtedly Sir William Crookes, who worked independently for some time before the founding of the Society for Psychical Research.

However, although much good work was done by independent students of psychic science, as it came to be called, more systematic investigation was inevitable. The London Dialectical Society was established in 1867, and a resolution was carried out two years later to “investigate the phenomena alleged to be Spiritual Manifestations, and to report thereon.” The committee included many distinguished individuals. An initial report was published in 1871.

In 1875 Edward William Cox, also connected with the London Dialectical Society, founded the Psychological Society of Great Britain for similar investigation. Cox included C. C. Massey, Walter H. Coffin, and Spiritualist medium W. Stainton Moses among the members. A single volume of Proceedings of the society's work was published in 1878. The society came to an end the next year, following Cox's death.

From 1878 on, the British National Association of Spiritualists, London (founded in 1873), appointed a research council that carried on significant research work with well-known mediums of the day under test conditions. Their work bore fruit early in 1882 when William F. Barrett presided over several conferences held by the association that resulted in the formation of the Society for Psychical Research.

The Establishment of Psychical Research

The Society for Psychical Research (SPR) was founded largely by a group of scientists and philosophers connected with Trinity College, Cambridge. The society was formed to "examine without prejudice or prepossession and in a scientific spirit those faculties of man, real or supposed, which appear to be inexplicable in terms of any generally recognized hypothesis."

The society's prospectus indicates its proposed aim and methods:

"It has been widely felt that the present is an opportune time for making an organised and systematic attempt to investigate that large group of debatable phenomena designated by such terms as mesmeric, psychical, and spiritualistic.

"From the recorded testimony of many competent witnesses, past and present, including observations recently made by scientific men of eminence in various countries, there appears to be, amid much delusion and deception, an important body of remarkable phenomena, which are prima facie inexplicable on any generally recognised hypothesis, and which, if incontrovertibly established, would be of the highest possible value.

"The task of examining such residual phenomena has often been undertaken by individual effort, but never hitherto by a scientific society organised on a sufficiently broad basis."

The first president of the society was Henry Sidgwick, and among later presidents were Balfour Stewart, Sir William Crookes, Arthur James Balfour, and Sir Oliver Lodge. William James and Charles Richet were the first American and French researchers to serve as presidents, respectively. Prominent among the original members were Frank Podmore, F. W. H. Myers, Edmund Gurney, William F. Barrett, W. Stainton Moses, and Eleanor Sidgwick (later the first female to become president), Lord Rayleigh, and Andrew Lang. Many of these would eventually be honored with a term in the president's chair.

James initiated work in America that was later carried on by Richard Hodgson and James H. Hyslop.

On the Continent the Italian Cesare Lombroso, and French researchers Joseph Maxwell, Camille Flammarion, and Richet—all men of the highest standing in their respective branches of science—conducted exhaustive research into the phenomena of mediumship, chiefly with the Italian medium Eusapia Palladino as a subject.

At first the members of the Society for Psychical Research found it convenient to work in concert, but as they became more conversant with the broad outlines of the subject, it was necessary to specialize in various branches. The original plan, roughly sketched in 1882, grouped the phenomena to be researched under five different heads, each of which was placed under the direction of a separate committee. The five goals and their committee chairs were as follows:

"1. An examination of the nature and extent of any influence which may be exerted by one mind upon another, apart from any generally recognized mode of perception. (Hon. Secretary of Committee, Professor W. F. Barrett.)

"2. The study of hypnotism, and the forms of so-called mesmeric trance, with its alleged insensibility to pain; clairvoyance, and other allied phenomena. (Hon. Secretary of Committee, Dr. G. Wyld.)

"3. A critical revision of Reichenbach's researches with certain organisations called 'sensitive,' and an inquiry whether such organisations possess any power of perception beyond a highly-exalted sensibility of the recognised sensory organs. (Hon. Secretary of Committee, Walter H. Coffin.)

"4. A careful investigation of any reports, resting on strong testimony, regarding apparitions at the moment of death, or otherwise, or regarding disturbances in houses reputed to be haunted. (Hon. Secretary of Committee, Hensleigh Wedgwood.)

"5. An inquiry into the various physical phenomena commonly called Spiritualistic; with an attempt to discover their causes and general laws. (Hon. Secretary, Dr. C. Lockhart Robertson.)"

A committee was also appointed to consider the literature of the subject; honorary secretaries were Edmund Gurney and Frederic W. H. Myers, who, with Frank Podmore, collected a number of historic examples.

Of the various goals of the SPR, however, the first is now generally considered the most important, and is certainly the one that has yielded the best results to investigators. In the case of hypnotism, the work of psychical researchers contributed to its admission to the sphere of legitimate physiology. It was formerly classed among doubtful phenomena, even at the time the society was founded.

The examination of Baron von Reichenbach's claims of having discovered a new psychic fluid or force, the "od" (or odyle), which issued like flame from the points of a magnet or the human fingertips, was at length abandoned since nothing was found to verify his conclusions.

The investigations in connection with apparitions, haunted houses, and Spiritualist phenomena continued for many years, although on the whole no definite conclusions were arrived at.

The members of the society attempted to carry out their investigations in an entirely unbiased spirit. Some members who had joined the society originally as avowed Spiritualists soon dropped out. After prolonged and exhaustive research the opinions of the various investigators often changed. Far from being pledged to accept the spirit hypothesis—or any other specific hypothesis—the SPR expressly stated that "membership of this Society does not imply the acceptance of any particular explanation of the phenomena investigated, nor any belief as to the operation, in the physical world, of forces other than those recognised by Physical Science."

Nevertheless, two prominent researchers, F. W. H. Myers and Sir Oliver Lodge, found evidence sufficient to convince them of the operation in the physical world of disembodied intelligences who manifest themselves through the organisms of special people generally referred to as mediums or sensitives.

Frank Podmore, on the other hand, was the exponent of a telepathic theory. Any phase of the manifestations that could not be explained by means of such known physiological facts as suggestion and hyperesthesia (the so-called subconscious whispering), exaltation of memory and automatism, or the unfamiliar but presumably natural telepathy, according to him, fell under the grave suspicion of fraud. His theory of poltergeists, for example, which he regarded as the work of naughty children, did not admit the intervention of a mischievous disembodied spirit. He considered telepathy a suitable explanation for "coincident hallucination" (hallucinatory apparitions that coincide with the death of the person represented or with some other crisis in that person's life), as well as for all cases of "personation" by the medium. His view—one shared by Andrew Lang, several of his contemporaries, and many present-day parapsychologists—was that if telepathy were established the spirit hypothesis would not only be unnecessary, but impossible to prove.

The most important of telepathic experiments were those conducted by Henry and Eleanor Sidgwick (1889–91). The percipients were hypnotized by G. A. Smith, who also acted as agent, and the matter to be transmitted consisted at first of numbers and later of mental pictures. The agent and percipient were generally separated by a screen, or were sometimes in different rooms, although the results in the latter case were perceptibly less satisfactory. On the whole, however, the percentage of correct guesses was far above what could be attributed to chance, and the experiments did much to encourage a belief that some hitherto unknown mode of communication existed.

At a later date, the trance communication of Leonora Piper seemed to point to some such theory, although Myers, Hodgson, and Hyslop, who conducted a thorough investigation into those communications, were inclined to believe that the spirits of the dead were the agencies in this case.

Telepathy was never established in the early experiments of psychical research, yet something similar to telepathy (various names have been suggested) must be working to explain the results attained by the ESP experiments carried out over the last half century by parapsychologists. During the first generations of psychical research, many worked with the idea that the machinery of telepathy existed in the form of ethereal vibrations, or brain waves, acting in accordance with natural laws (although Gerald Balfour and others argued that the action did not conform to the law of inverse squares). The remnants of such material notions of telepathy were quickly disposed of by parapsychology.

The subject of hallucinations has also been investigated over the years, and has been found to be closely connected with the question of telepathy. Apparitions were in former times regarded as the double or ethereal body of the persons they represented, but they are now mainly considered to be subjective phenomena.

Nevertheless, the study of coincidental hallucinations, now termed near-death experiences, raises the question as to whether the agent can produce such a hallucination in the mind of the percipient by the exercise of telepathic influence, which may be judged to be more powerful during an emotional crisis.

Hallucinations have been shown to be fairly common among otherwise sane and normal people, about one person in ten having experienced one or more, but the odds that a hallucination will coincide with the death of the person it represents are about one in 19,000.

The SPR undertook a Census of Hallucinations in 1889. Henry Sidgwick and a committee of members of the society conducted the investigations, with Eleanor Sidgwick collating the results and writing the final report. Printed forms were distributed among 410 accredited agents of the society, including many medical men and others belonging to the professional classes, all of whom gave their services without fees in the interest of science.

In all, some 17,000 persons were questioned, and negative as well as affirmative answers were sent in just as they were received, the agents being instructed to make no discrimination between the various replies. Out of 8,372 men, 655 claimed to have had a hallucination, as did 1,029 out of 8,628 women—9.9 percent of the total. When ample allowance had been made for defects of memory with regard to early hallucinations by multiplying the 322 recognized and definite cases by 4, it was found that 62 coincided with a death; again making allowances, this number was reduced to 30.

Thus the survey results showed one coincidental hallucination in 43 instead of the expected one in 19,000. Clearly, then, if these figures are accepted, there must be some causal connection between the death and the apparition, whether it be a Spiritualist, telepathic, or other cause.

Apart from telepathy, perhaps the most interesting field of psychical research is automatism. Trance writings and utterances have been known since the earliest times, when they were attributed to demonic possession, or, sometimes, to angelic possession. By means of the planchette, the Ouija board, and other contrivances people were able to write automatically and divulge information they were unaware of possessing.

The phenomena are purely subjective, however, and are the result of cerebral dissociation such as may be induced in hypnosis. In this state, exaltation of the memory may occur, accounting for such phenomena as xenoglossis (speaking in foreign tongues with which the medium is not acquainted). Cerebral dissociation may also produce a sensitiveness to telepathic influences, as would seem apparent in the case of the medium Leonora Piper, whose automatic productions in writing and speaking supplied investigators with plentiful material and did more in the early twentieth century, perhaps, than anything else to stimulate an interest in so-called Spiritualist phenomena.

In connection with the “physical” phenomenon—probably no less the result of automatism than the “subjective”—the Italian medium Eusapia Palladino was carefully studied by many eminent investigators, both in Great Britain and on the Continent. Camille Flammarion, Charles Richet, and Sir Oliver Lodge (to mention only a few) satisfied themselves with regard to the genuineness of some of her phenomena (although other equally eminent researchers dissented).

On the whole, even if psychical research has not succeeded in scientifically validating such matters as survival of death or the possibility of communication between the living and the dead, it can be credited with having widened the field of psychology and therapeutics and gaining support from the medical profession for the concept of suggestion.

In the United States, the American Society for Psychical Research, founded in 1885, and the Boston Society for Psychical Research, founded in 1925, were similar to the SPR of London. The American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) was founded on the initial suggestion of William F. Barrett with the active cooperation of Richard Hodgson. A number of distinguished scientists were involved, many at the request of William James, and the general attitude was at first somewhat skeptical toward psychical phenomena.

The first period of the old ASPR lasted for four years (1885–89), after which it was absorbed by the Society for Psychical Research, London. It was briefly dissolved following Hodgson’s death in 1905, but was reconstituted in 1906 as Section B of the American Institute for Scientific Research, an organization that James H. Hyslop founded at Columbia University, where he taught. Section A was devoted to abnormal psychology. The name American Society for Psychical Research was not readopted until 1922.

After Hyslop’s death in 1920, the work of the society was carried on by his assistant Walter Franklin Prince, who became director of research and edited the society’s publications. In 1921 William McDougall, a noted psychologist, became president. He was succeeded the following year by Frederick Edwards, a clergyman.

During the 1920s there were strong policy dissensions within the society, sparked by the American tour of Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle but substantively related to the controversial investigations of the mediumship of Mina S. Crandon, popularly known as “Margery.” In 1925, complaining of shoddy work and a lack of professionalism, Prince, McDougall, Elwood Worcester, and Gardner Murphy led a group that split off from the ASPR and formed the Boston Society for Psychical Research, which existed through the 1930s. During this period the most substantive psychical research was carried on by the Boston Society; the ASPR continued to be preoccupied with the problem of the “Margery” mediumship.

From Psychical Research to Parapsychology

Meanwhile, beginning in the 1930s, a new phase in American psychical research was beginning, spearheaded by J. B.

Rhine, whose experimental work at Duke University was encouraged by McDougall. This work involved using college students as subjects instead of mediums, with emphasis on statistical and scientific methods in evaluating experiments. Rhine's initial report, Extra-sensory Perception, published by the Boston Society in 1934, described 85,724 card-guessing trials. Rhine's work aroused a storm of controversy, and was attacked from every angle, most severely on methodological grounds. The sting of the controversy was removed in 1938 when the American Psychological Association (APA) upheld Rhine's testing procedures and his statistical method (if not his results). The APA report was confirmed by the American Institute of Mathematical Statistics, which issued this statement: "If the Rhine investigation is to be fairly attacked, it must be on other than mathematical grounds."

It was through the work of Rhine that the terms parapsychology, extrasensory perception, and psychokinesis became widespread. The Journal of Parapsychology was first published in 1937, and the Parapsychological Association was founded in 1957.

The work of Rhine and his associates established parapsychology—laboratory-based research on the paranormal—as a reputable field for scientific study. As another generation of researchers appeared, the boundary between parapsychology and the older concerns of psychical research became blurred. In the decades since World War II a new movement, in addition to the purely statistical studies, has embraced all the phenomena formerly associated with Spiritualist mediums, and the spontaneous phenomena of poltergeists and out-of-the-body travel has been reconsidered. In the 1970s and 1980s, a new wave of interest in psychokinesis was stimulated by widely heralded claims of psychic Uri Geller.

Psychical Research Foundation

A parapsychological research facility established in 1960 with funds from Charles E. Ozanne, a high school and college teacher interested in the question of survival of death. The foundation was created to investigate phenomena relating to the survival of human personality after death. The foundation serves as a scientific and educational research center to investigate the possibilities of continuation of consciousness after death of the physical body. Its research program includes study of sensitives, haunting and poltergeist phenomena, as well as out-of-the-body travel.

In 1960, William G. Roll became project director and is now president. Under Roll's leadership the foundation has established an outstanding record of parapsychological research on meditation, haunts, poltergeists, out-of-the-body experiences, and mediumship. Roll can be reached at Isleway House, Fairfield Plantation, Villa Rica, GA 30180.

The foundation conducts lectures, workshops and seminars on topics related to the question of survival after death. It sponsors volunteer field investigators to assist in its research. The foundation has a research division that is directed by Dr. Andrew Nichols, City College, Gainesville, Florida 32608. News of its activities are published in its quarterly bulletin Theta.

Psychic Body

A Spiritualist term loosely applied to an impalpable body which clothes the soul on the "great dissolution of death" or to the soul itself. Edward William Cox in his book Mechanism of Man (2 vols., 1876) declared that the soul (quite distinct from mind, or intelligence, which is only a function of the brain) is composed of attenuated matter and has the same form as the physical body that it permeates in every part. From the soul radiates the psychic force, by means of which all the wonders of Spiritualism are performed. Through its agency, human beings become endowed with telekinetic and clairvoyant powers, and with its aid they can affect such natural forces as gravitation. When free of the body, the soul can travel at a lightning speed, nor is it hindered by such material objects as stone walls or closed doors.

The psychic body is also regarded as an intermediary between the physical body and the soul, a sort of shell or envelope, more material than the soul itself, which encloses it at death. It is this envelope, the psychic body or nervengeist, that, some believed, became visible during materialization by attracting to itself other and still more material particles.

According to traditional Spiritualist teachings, in time the psychic body decays just as did the physical and leaves the soul free. During trance, the soul leaves the body, but the vital functions are continued by the psychic body. (See also astral body; etheric double)

Psychic Detective Bureau

State licensed organization, also known as the U.S. Psi Squad, headed by psychic Beverly Jaegers, who also edited a quarterly publication Pathways, containing articles, reports on activities, reviews and comments. The organization brought together “persons interested in utilizing mind skills such as psi to combat crime as a public service, to work with and for law enforcement officials in solving mysteries, to learn mind development to a higher, more useful stage.”

A directory published once in 1984, as a comprehensive guide to practicing psychics in Britain, with additional listing of Spiritualist churches, associations, societies, festivals and bookshops.

Psychic Esperanto League (Palka Esperantista Ligo)

Founded in Britain by Alexander W. Thomson, F.B.E.A. in August 1934, with members in eleven countries. The work of the League was carried on mainly by correspondence, and its aim was to educate individuals concerning psychic awareness in various parts of the world untouched by other means because of the language barrier. Esperanto is an artificial language created in the 1880s by L. L. Zamehof of Poland to assist communication between people with incompatible languages. It was developed from root words taken from all of the European languages. It is the most successful of all of the artificial languages, and an estimated eight million people speak it (a relatively small number but far larger than the communities which speak most of the world's hundreds of languages). The league appears to have ceased operation after World War II.

The Psychic Evidence Society

An organization for inquiry into the actuality and meaning of psychical phenomena for clergymen throughout Great Britain. It was founded in London, England, in 1931 by John Engledow, who also served as its general secretary. It existed only briefly, but its work has been assumed by the Churches' Fellowship for Psychical and Spiritual Studies.

The Psychic Eye Directory

Annual listing of psychics, healers, dowsers, and lecturers published in the 1970s by the now defunct Parapsychology League of Toledo (Ohio).

Psychic Force

Nineteenth-century psychical researchers posited the existence of a psychic force, the existence of which had a direct inspiration from the force described by Franz A. Mesmer in the previous century and which was investigated by different researchers and occultists under different names. The primary reference to such a force was as a healing power and a hypnotizing influence. It was soon discarded as having any relation to hypnotism and now survives as a psychokinetic force. In addition it was claimed by inquirers into Spiritualism that the human organism, i.e., the sitters, is in some mysterious way bound up with séance room phenomena. They posited the existence of a psychic force which operated beyond the periphery of the body, apart from any physical contact.

The researches of Baron von Reichenbach suggested the term “Odic force” to Dr. E. C. Rogers of Boston in 1852, Asa Mahan, also in America, and Count Agenor de Gasparin in France, and they accepted it as such. Marc Thury called it “ectenic force.” Mayo at the Royal College of Surgeons, London, postulated on “exo-neural action of the brain.” Edward William Cox recommended the term “psychic force” and this rather vague inclusive term came into general use by psychical research through the era of concentrated research on physical mediums.

In a letter to Sir William Crookes, Cox wrote in 1871:

“I noticed that the force was exhibited in tremulous pulsations, and not in the form of steady, continuous pressure, the indicator rising and falling incessantly throughout the experiment. The fact seems to me of great significance as tending to confirm the opinion that assigns its source to the nerve organisation, and it goes far to establish Dr. Richardson's important discovery of a nerve atmosphere of various intensity enveloping the human structure. . . . To avoid the appearance of any foregone conclusion, I would recommend the adoption for it of some appropriate name, and I venture to suggest that the force be termed Psychic Force; the persons to whom it is manifested in extraordinary power Psychics; and the science relating to it Psychism as being a branch of psychology.”

Later he added:

“The theory of Psychic Force is in itself merely the recognition of the fact that under certain conditions, as yet but imperfectly ascertained, and within limited, but as yet undefined, distance from the bodies of certain persons having a special nerve organisation, a Force operates by which, without muscular contact or connection, action at a distance is caused, and visible motions and audible sounds are produced in solid substances.”

The speculation of the existence of a nervous atmosphere to which Cox alluded was expounded by Dr. Benjamin W. Richardson in the Medical Times, on May 6, 1871. As it came from a medical source, Crookes welcomed it, and noted in the Quarterly Journal of Science,

“I think I perceive what it is that this psychic force uses up for its development. In employing the terms vital force, or nervous energy, I am aware that I am employing words which convey very different significations to many investigators; but after witnessing the painful state of nervous and bodily prostration in which some of these experiments have left Mr. Home [The medium D. D. Home—after seeing him lying in an almost fainting condition on the floor, pale and speechless—I could scarcely doubt that the evolution of psychic force is accompanied by a corresponding drain on vital force.”

Joseph Maxwell observed,

“Certain peculiar sensations accompany the emission of this nervous force, and with custom the passage of the energy expanded in a séance can be felt, just as the interruption of the flow can be discerned.”

Maxwell was inclined to discern four principal sensations in connection with the generation of the force:

- “1) The sensation of cool breezes, generally over the hands.
- “2) The sensation of a slight tingling in the palm of the hand, and at the tips of the fingers, near the mounts.
- “3) The sensation of a sort of current through the body.
- “4) The sensation of a spider's web in contact with the hands and face, and other parts of the body—notably the back and the loins. “If the sensation of the ‘passage of the current’ may be feeble, it is not so with its abrupt interruption. . . . It may even cause a sensation of sudden indisposition, if the interruption coincide with the phenomenon in course of production. . . .

The sensation of the breaking of the current is distinctly felt; and it is this which makes me think, that the feeble impression of the passage of the current is not altogether imaginary.”

The medium Gladys Osborne Leonard in her book My Life in Two Worlds (1931) wrote of a visit to a materializing medium:

“He [the control] instructed the sitter who sat at the extreme end of the left side of the horse-shoe, to release her left hand and throw it out towards him. She did so, and we could all see a stream of pale grey matter, like fog or steam from a kettle, oozing from her fingers. It was shaped like rods, about a foot long and an inch thick. The medium reached out his hands carefully towards the end of the rods, and seemed to try and coax the grey material to come farther away from the sitter, towards himself. The rods thinned slightly, as he induced them to extend, and after a couple of minutes the French control said, speaking through the medium again “No, not strong enough, link hands up, and close in the power again.”

Harry Price wrote in 1930:

“I cannot help wondering whether there is really anything in the curious stroking movements which Rudi (or Olga) [Schneider] makes during the height of the trance and when she is leaving us. She ‘gathers power’ she says, by drawing his hands down my body and legs, or those of the second controller’s. She ‘releases’ it at the end of the séance by similar movements, but in a reverse direction.”

On the basis of his observations in the Goligher Circle, W. J. Crawford elaborated a more precise theory of psychic force:

“Operators are acting on the brains of the sitters and thence on their nervous systems. Small particles, it may even be molecules, are driven off the nervous system, out through the bodies of the sitters at wrists, hands, fingers, or elsewhere. These small particles, now free, have a considerable amount of latent energy inherent in them, an energy which can react on any human nervous system with which they come into contact. This stream of energized particles flows round the circle, probably partly on the periphery of their bodies. The stream, by gradual augmentation from the sitters, reaches the medium at a high degree of ‘tension,’ energises her, receives increment from her, traverses the circle again, and so on. Finally, when the ‘tension’ is sufficiently great, the circulating process ceases, and the energized particles collect on or are attached to the nervous system of the medium, who has henceforth a reservoir from which to draw. The operators having now a good supply of the right kind of energy at their disposal, viz., nerve energy can act upon the body of the medium, who is so constituted that gross matter from her body can, by means of the nervous tension applied to it, be actually temporarily detached from its usual position and projected into the séance room.”

Crawford put both his sitters and his medium on the scale and found that the loss of weight of the sitters was, at the end of the séance, greater than that of the medium. The sitters lost, on an average, 5–10 ounces and were more exhausted than the medium. His speculations were favorably received by many when published in his 1916 volume The Reality of Psychic Phenomena as it seemed to accord with other observations.

For example, the control “Walter,” in the “Margery” sittings, (see Mina S. Crandon) always stated that he used the brain of the sitters. His assertion was no novelty. The control of the great medium Home indicated the same source of power at an early period.

Neurologist Charles Féré noticed that excitation of almost any kind tended to increase “dynamometrical” power. The average squeezing power exhibited by educated students was greater than that of robust laboring men. Maxwell observed in his 1895 sittings with the medium Eusapia Palladino that there was a marked loss in dynamometric force not only on the part of the medium, but also on the part of the sitters at the end of the séance. Sometimes the loss amounted to six kilos on the right side and fourteen on the left.

Admiral Osborne Moore complained of a drain on his vitality after his direct voice séances with medium Etta Wriedt. One of the reasons why Lord Adare retired from his researches with D. D. Home was that the séances physically exhausted him. Cromwell Varley, who assisted Crookes in his experiments with the medium Florence Cook, always felt depleted, while Crookes himself remained unaffected. James H. Hyslop had to go to bed for two days after his first sitting with the medium Leonora Piper. Richard Hodgson was also markedly affected.

Eugene Rochas said, in describing the case of levitation with Eusapia Palladino in his home: “We ought to add that one of the persons who was quite close to the table [Dr. Maxwell]; see Mediums almost completely fainted away, not from emotion, but through weakness, saying that he felt drained of his strength as the result of Eusapia’s efforts.”

The Nature of the Force

The method of the liberation of this vital force, the circumstances regulating the quantity of the supply, its use by the invisible operators of the séance room, and its relation to ectoplasm remained elusive. Reportedly, the force was subject to an ebb and flow. In some cases fasting or seclusion increased it, in some others a hearty meal. Psychological factors also enter to a great extent. In a calm, harmonious atmosphere it is more liberally generated. The operators spoke of lines of force and of a vibratory synchronization. They often asked the sitters to change places, the resulting combination frequently being surprising. Dr. Féré stated that “all our sensations are accompanied by a development of potential energy which passes into a kinetic state and externalises itself in motor manifestations.”

The observations on psychic force and its generation offered a rationale for the disappearance of the reported phenomena of the séance room when a skeptical observer was present—the cold and suspicious observer destroys the harmonious atmosphere, disrupts the psychic forces, and hence cannot witness strong manifestations. In the absence of sensations, he may not contribute to the psychic power in the same proportion as other sitters do. He may even have an effect of negative force.

It was also claimed that certain bodies and materials such as tables, linen, wood, and dresses appear to conduct the force. Perhaps this is why women’s dresses so frequently bulge out and approach the table during a séance. It also appears that some of the nervous force or fluid settles in the séance room or in the objects in use. According to the statements of controls, once the séance “room” has become charged the manifestations are easier to produce in that space at the next sitting. Controls often protested against the use of the séance room for other purposes. Again, in other instances, for reasons of their own, they had no concern for the preservation of the remains of the force.

Mrs. Stanhope Speer, in an account given to F. H. Myers, described nocturnal disturbances in her house after a séance with William Stainton Moses.

“The servants heard so much pounding in the séance room that they felt frightened and went to bed as quickly as possible. We were told afterwards that so much power had been generated that the spirits had to make the noise to get rid of it.”

She also described a similar circumstance which occurred to her and her husband. Their bedroom door was violently shaken after they went to bed and they were afterward told that a spirit had been attracted by the spiritual light over the house and had used up power that had been left by shaking the doors.

P. P. Alexander, in his book Spiritualism; A Narrative with a Discussion (1871), gave evidence of a physical phenomena that transpired after D. D. Home had left the house of a scientific friend and his wife. Chairs moved slowly across the carpet and set themselves beside his own.

In the early mediumship of Agnes Guppy-Volckman (then Agnes Nichols), powerful phenomena were witnessed in the empty séance room afterward. Displacement of furniture was recorded in the adjoining rooms. And Robert Cooper stated in his book Spiritual Experiences, Including Seven Months with The Brothers Davenport (1867):

“I have occasionally heard the furniture in the room where we had been holding a séance, in motion after retiring to bed . . . On leaving a room in which I had been with Ira Davenport for the purpose of talking with the spirits in a chair followed me into the passage, myself being the last to leave.”

When a medium-visitor of Eugene Rochas was shown into the room where the séance-suit of medium Auguste Politi was lying folded up and where, unknown to her, the investigations with Politi were going on, she became almost immediately controlled by an adverse and highly disagreeable influence. Rochas took up part of the suit and gave it to the medium. The effect was instantaneous; the controlling influence became violent and furious and was thought to be the spirit of a deceased monk who sometimes got hold of Politi and damaged the conditions as much as he could.

In one of W. J. Crawford's photographs, a vaporous substance seems to connect the medium Kathleen Goligher with the various sitters. Whether it was ectoplasmic emanation or a nervous fluid he did not attempt to answer.

The problem with the hypothesized psychic force, quite apart from the fraud committed by the mediums whose séances were the source of speculation about it, was the inability of researchers to find a way to have the force manifest in a way which would register on an instrument for measurement. The disconnection between the hypothesized source (cause) and the observed occurrence (effect) left too many explanations, quite apart from either fraud or psychic force, possible. Pierre Curie was occupied with the idea of devising an instrument which could register and direct the liberated psychic power. His death cut short his experiments. Before such an instrument could be devised, the era of the study of physical mediums ended. (See also Od)

Psychic Museums

A museum was founded in 1925 by veteran Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, (1859–1930) and located at 2 Victoria Street, London, S.W. The museum housed an interesting collection of apports, automatic scripts, automatic and direct sketches and paintings, paraffin molds, photographs and other psychic objects. Unfortunately, at a later date, the museum was closed and its collection was dispersed. A number of the items have been lost or destroyed.

Some archives of the British College of Psychic Science were also dispersed, but items from the Institute for Psychic Research (of which Nandor Fodor was Research Officer) were absorbed by the Society for Psychical Research, London. The Harry Price archives are still kept at University of London, Senate House, Malet Street, London, W.C.I., England.

There are probably many psychic collections in existence in various corners of the world. T. W. Stanford, a Melbourne millionaire, collected all the apports of the controversial medium Charles Bailey and donated them to the Psychical Research Department of Stanford University, Palo Alto, California. In Budapest (I. Mészáros u.2.) Dr. Chengery Pap established a museum of the objects apported through the mediumship of Lajos Pap. There was an Other World Museum in Rome, Lungotevere Prati 12, founded by Father V. Jouet, containing many rare objects and documents bearing upon different manifestations of the departed.

In Virginia, the Association for Research and Enlightenment has preserved for study 15,000 transcripts of the psychic readings of Edgar Cayce.

The most recent psychic museum is the Britten Memorial Museum on the grounds of the Arthur Findlay College (of the Spiritualists National Union) in Essex, England.

Psychic News (Newspaper)

The oldest Spiritualist weekly newspaper in Britain. It was founded in 1932 and for many years it was edited by Maurice Barbanell (1902–1981). After Barbanell's passing, Tony Orten became the new editor. Psychic News has always been the preeminent source for news, discussion, and controversy on Spiritualism in Britain, and, in the absence of a comparable organ in North America, exerted influence in the United States and Canada.

For many years the Psychic News maintained a bookshop for books and magazines connected with Spiritualism and psychical research. In November 1989, the proprietors, Psychic Press Ltd., acquired the long established Atlantis Book Shop, 49a Museum Street, London, WC1A 1LY, and moved their own book shop to these premises, with an augmented stock of new and secondhand books on the paranormal, Spiritualism, occult studies, and New Age topics.

The office of the Psychic News can be contacted at Clock Cottage, Stansted Hall, Stansted, Essex CM24 8UD, England.

Psychic Observer and Chimes (Magazine)

Prominent American Spiritualist magazine founded in 1974 by the merger of Chimes and the Psychic Observer. The Psychic Observer Corporation was founded in 1937 in Jamestown, New York, by Ralph and Juliette Pressing. The first issue of the Psychic Observer appeared in August 1938. In 1957 the Pressings retired and Agnes F. Reuther became editor. Two years later Tom O'Neill acquired the periodical, then issued as a tabloid. In 1960 he was informed by Andrija Puharich, then a young researcher, that he had discovered several of the more prominent mediums at Camp Chesterfield engaged in a conspiracy to conduct fake materialization séances. Puharich presented the photographic proof, pictures taken with an infrared camera. O'Neill published the pictures and announced the findings as a dark day for Spiritualism.

As a result of the exposé, O'Neill almost went bankrupt, as advertisers loyal to the camp pulled their support from the periodical. He relocated his publishing enterprise to North Carolina and for a brief period published under another title.

O'Neill died in 1965 and the Psychic Observer ceased publication. In 1968 it was purchased by Alice Tindell and moved to Washington, D.C. It was issued as an open forum magazine, but in effect it was the periodical of the National Spiritual Science Center, the church headed by Tindell. It was published by the ESPress, the church's publishing concern. Henry Nagoka edited the new publication.

Chimes began in 1942 under the editorship of Bert Welch and his wife. It was later purchased by June and Leighton Denton. Chimes, Inc., the publishing company, also had a book distribution service and facilitated the Dentons' healing ministry. Chimes faithfully served the American Spiritualist community for a generation until it was discontinued as an independent publication in 1974.

Psychic Observer and Chimes was discontinued after the July/October 1981 issue.

Psychic Research (Journal)

The Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research was published under this title for four years (1928–1932), during which time it was edited by Frederick Bligh Bond. After 1932 it returned to its former title.

Psychic Research Quarterly

British journal issued in 1920, edited by W. Whately Carington. The title was changed to Psyche in 1921, and the scope was enlarged to deal with psychology.

Psychics and Mystics Fayre

An offshoot of the Mind-Body-Spirit Festival in Britain started by Graham Wilson, comprising smaller exhibitions held regularly at different London and provincial centers, featuring practitioners and groups concerned with yoga, tarot, astrology, clairvoyance, health and healing, arts and crafts, ufology, and related topics. Wilson sold the Fayres in 1986 and similar shows are now commonplace in most major UK cities. Psychic Science

A compilation and examination of data with the aim of demonstrating the possible existence of spirits independent of the human body and to validate their ability to communicate with humanity. According to J. Hewat McKenzie's summary in his book Spirit Intercourse, (1916), the following claims fall within the proper research perimeters of psychic science:

- 1) That at the death of the body, a human being continues to function as a conscious being.
- 2) That he or she functions after death in a refined spirit-body or soul, which has substance and weight, and which can be seen and photographed.
- 3) That this soul existed within the physical body during life, and is organic, having brain, nerves, blood-vessels, heart, etc.
- 4) That the soul can communicate in various ways with persons on earth both before and after death.
- 5) That the world in which the soul dwells after the death of the body lies immediately around the physical earth.
- 6) That a man or woman while alive may leave the physical body, and by use of the soul, may explore spheres of refined physical states, commonly called the spirit world.

Abstractly, psychic science might seem to be but a focus within psychical research or parapsychology, however, in practice, it has functioned as a synonym of Spiritualism. The foundation of various British societies and colleges of "psychic science" and the dropping of the term "Spiritualist" in favor of "psychic science," without any appreciable redirection of program stems from the Spiritualist's claims that their religion can be scientifically demonstrated. Psychic Science (Journal)

Quarterly journal of the British College of Psychic Science, founded in 1920 in London by James Hewat McKenzie.

The first issue of the journal, April 1922, bore the title Quarterly Transactions of the British College of Psychic Science, but beginning with the April 1923 issue was shortened to Psychic Science. In 1945 Psychic Science was absorbed into Light, the journal of the College of Psychic Studies. Last known address: 16 Queensberry Pl., South Kensington, London, SW7 2EB England.

Psychic Science International Special Interest Group

A now-defunct group founded in 1976 from among members and associates of Mensa (persons who have established by score in a standard intelligence test that their intelligence is higher than that of 98 percent of the population). PSISIG was concerned with interest in and conducting of scientific research in the psychic sciences and arts, such as theories of existence and reality, states of mind, human auras, clairvoyance, mental and thought projection, telepathy, dowsing, psychometry, healing and defense, multiple personalities and possession, psychokinesis, survival after death, discarnate entities, and extraterrestrial life. It disseminated research findings and applied research and education for the benefit of humanity in mental health, reduction of superstition and fraud, safety, and enhancement of human relations.

PSISIG provided educational programs to promote awareness and capabilities in the psychic sciences and arts and offers grants, scholarships, and other aids to persons or organizations studying psychic sciences. It also operated a speakers bureau, provided members for surveys by responsible, noncommercial organizations, and compiled statistics. The group published the PSI-M Newsletter/Journal and a Yearbook.

Psychic Surgery

A term which is applied to two very distinct branches of psychic healing. It sometimes denotes psychic healers who believe that they are making "surgical" changes in the astral double that upon completion of the "operation" are reflected in the physical body. Such psychic surgeons believe that the spirit of a dead doctor influences them, and observers see them enter a trance state from which they mime an operation over the body of the person seeking healing.

Typical of the first type is British healer George Chapman, who claimed to be controlled by the dead surgeon "Dr. Lang." Chapman diagnosed while in trance and simply laid his hands on the patient or made movements indicative of a phantom operation.

More interesting to psychic researchers, because of their extraordinary claims, have been the psychic surgeons in the Spiritualist communities of the Philippines and Brazil. They appear to perform real operations making an incision with bare hands, removing pathological matter, and causing an instantaneous healing of the incision. Such healers in the Philippines have been the subject of numerous popular books, including vivid pictures of apparent operations, and several volumes by observers who have dismissed the phenomena as a complete hoax. The two most famous psychic surgeons of this second type have been Tony Agpaoa in the Philippines and José Arigó in Brazil.

Accounts of Tony Agpaoa began to emerge in the 1960s. He used no anesthetic or scalpel, yet appeared to make an incision in which there was a liberal flow of blood. He appeared to insert his hands into the body and either remove pathological tissue with his hands or cut it away with unsterilized scissors. He then moved his hand over the incision, which seemed to close instantaneously, leaving no scar.

Operations conducted by Agpaoa and similar psychic surgeons in the Philippines have been photographed and even filmed and are impressive, especially to the untrained eye. However, there is every reason to believe that these “operations” have been faked. There is to date no clear incident of either Agpaoa or any of the Philippine healers having ever opened the body and closed it again without leaving any evidence of their having operated. To the contrary, a spectrum of practicing magicians from a skeptic such as the Amazing Randi and Milbourne Christopher to a professional psychic such as David Hoy have agreed that the operations are done with slight of hand and have easily been able to duplicate every effect. It is suggested that if a small quantity of dried blood and a piece of animal tissue is palmed, the flesh “operated” on can be pinched and made to appear as if an incision has been made. The cure that follows would then be a matter of strong suggestion rather than actual surgery.

The issue is not so simple among the Brazilian healers. Andrija Puharich, himself a physician, visited Argio in Brazil and was the subject of a psychic operation for a small lipoma on the elbow. Arigó, who claimed to be controlled by the spirit “Dr. Fritz,” made an incision with a pocket knife without anesthetic or sterilization and removed the tumor. A small incision scar was left (thus there was no paranormal opening or closing of the body), and the elbow healed over the next four days (there was no instantaneous healing). The operation was filmed, and it was clear that the tumor had been removed by rather mundane, if crude, means, and that the extraordinary character of the event was the lack of infection. Arigó was killed in an automobile accident before he could be more completely tested.

Thousands of invalids and the merely curious travelers have visited the Philippines, especially through the 1970s and 1980s, with an interest in psychic healing. While some have been healed, many have returned disillusioned after an expensive and tiresome trip. There they have also encountered what became a highly competitive business between the various healers and those who provide transportation to the various locations (mostly outside of Manila) where the healers operate. Over the years, the number of reported healings is no higher than that reported by more domestic healers be they psychic or religious.

Australian journalist Gert Chesi investigated the Philippine healers and warned readers about the situation they will encounter should they choose to go to the Philippine Islands. In his Geistheiler auf den Philippinen (English edition as Faith Healers in the Philippines, 1981), he draws upon his prior observation of tribal magical practices in Africa.

Chesi discovered what he believed were genuine as well as fake healers, and concluded that the dividing line is often a confusing one, since although the blood and the objects apparently removed from a patient’s body may be unrelated to genuine surgery, they may still be part of a mysterious shamanistic healing process. He also discovered that some healers appeared to remove objects from a diseased body which are clearly unrelated to any genuine illness, such as coins, leaves, nails, plastic objects, or even garbage. Chesi suggests that such objects, as well as the blood, may be the products of the healer’s imagination, becoming solidified as materializations or apports. Journalist Tom Valentine found that some of the psychic surgeons in the Philippines have “removed” not only tissue from the body of their patients, but also such things as eggshells, coffee grounds and even a crayfish. Like Chesi, Valentine concluded that such phenomena might be related to apports and that healers like Agpaoa materialize and dematerialize matter. This observation offers little help as it merely introduces one equally dubious phenomenon to explain another. The tissue from the operations that has been tested has been non-human in origin, instead generally that of chickens.

Some healers have argued that patients will not believe in the healer’s power unless they see an apparent incision with plenty of blood, and a tangible object removed from the body. Other Philippine healers eschew such practices and regard such bloody operations as unnecessary. They practice a more traditional form of psychic or “magnetic healing.”

Psychic Telephone

An instrument invented by F. R. Melton of Nottingham, England, consisting of a box inside of which was a rubber bag connected with a pair of earphones from a radio set. The idea was that if a medium inflated the bag with his or her breath and then sealed it, the bag would take the place of the medium and direct voices would be heard through the earphones in his absence. The psychical researcher Harry Price subjected the instrument to a thorough test in the National Laboratory for Psychical Research, London. It did not work.

Psychode

Term proposed by psychical researcher Marc Thury to designate what others called ectoplasm.

Psychoenergetic (Journal)

Quarterly British publication edited by American parapsychologist Stanley C. Krippner, included discussions on psi phenomena by distinguished writers and parapsychologists. Last known address: Gordon & Breach, 41 William IV St., London, WC2, England.

Psychograph

Psychography

Term used by British medium William Stainton Moses (1839–1892) to denote all forms of direct writing by spirit entities.

Psychokinesis

The ability to move objects at a distance by mental power. The term has now largely displaced “telekinesis,” formerly used by physical researchers and Spiritualists. The term “psychokinesis” or “PK” was proposed by psychologist J. B. Rhine and his associates at the Psychology Department, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, in 1934 in relation to experiments with influencing the fall of dice by mental concentration.

Special terms have developed as the study of PK has expanded, such as: “PK-MT” (psychokinetic effect on moving targets, such as dice), “PK-LT” (influence on living target, such as plants, healing, influencing of animals), and “PK-ST” (influence on static targets). A “PK Placement Test” denotes a PK-MT experiment in which the subject attempts to influence falling objects to land in a designated area. (See also movement)

The Psychological Society

The Psychological Society, a precursor to the Society for Physical Research, was founded in England in April 1875 by Edward William Cox. Cox counted among his associates William Stainton Moses, Walter H. Coffin, and C. C. Massey. Cox articulated the aim of the society was the study and elucidation of those Spiritualist and related problems now grouped under the term psychical research, to which he somewhat loosely attached the designation of “psychology.”

To this end Cox proposed to collect and consider the available material bearing on psychic phenomena. In reality the members accomplished little of any practical value, as may be seen from their published Proceedings (1875–79), published in London in 1880. Cox did not possess the necessary scientific background for investigation of such phenomena. In November 1879, on his death, the society came to an end.

Although the Psychological Society regarded psychic phenomena from a more or less popular standpoint, and conducted its investigations in a somewhat superficial manner, it nevertheless contained the germ of scientific inquiry into the domain of psychic science that, a few years later with the founding of the Society of Physical Research, was to raise the study to a level where it became worthy of the attention of the academy. Up to that time, those intrigued by Spiritualist phenomena had to content themselves with the explanation of spirit intervention. The Psychological Society was the crystallization of a small body of “rationalist” opinions which had existed since the days of Mesmer.

Sergeant Cox, in his book The Mechanism of Man (2 vols., 1876–79) stated that “spirit” was refined matter, or molecular matter split into its constituent atoms, which thus become imperceptible to our physical organism; this view may have been shared by some members of the Psychological Society. (See also London Dialectical Society)

Psychology

Originally the name given to the branch of philosophy dealing with the soul (from the Greek psyche, or soul), then to the science of the mind, and now generally understood to be the science of behavior, both human and animal, and of human thought processes. Early psychical research, in contrast, concerned itself with the demonstration and investigation of paranormal faculties and the concept of the soul, with the question of survival after bodily death as a legitimate inference.

According to the criterion of Charles Richet, everything that the human intelligence can do, even when it is most profound and penetrating, is psychological. Everything of which such intelligence is incapable belongs to metapsychics.

The crux of the matter is that the greatest difficulty is experienced in drawing the line between what the human intelligence can and cannot do, because many paranormal faculties appear to originate in the subconscious mind and manifest along the same channels as the phenomena of abnormal psychology. Their difference from abnormal phenomena seems to be primarily their social functionality.

Abnormal Psychology and the Paranormal

Some would contend that an abnormal bodily condition may facilitate the function of a paranormal faculty without being the reason and cause of it. Hereward Carrington, in The Story of Psychic Science (1930), relates the story of a female acquaintance who fell into Lake Minnetonka, sank three times, and was rescued unconscious. A severe illness complicated with pneumonia followed her misadventure. During her convalescence she became clairvoyant and could tell what letters were in the mailbox in the morning and often their approximate contents. When she was completely restored her clairvoyant faculty disappeared.

Neither pneumonia nor near-drowning can be supposed the cause of such clairvoyance. Similarly it is reasonable to infer that in the clairvoyance of hysteric subjects, the abnormal bodily condition is simply a coincidental phenomenon but not the cause and explanation of the clairvoyance. An abnormal condition may open up a channel of function for paranormal faculties. If the abnormal condition becomes permanent, mediumship may develop in organisms that constitutionally were not adapted for paranormal manifestations.

The study of abnormal psychology may also have relevance to the emotional and temperamental problems of some mediums, particularly those who are disposed to fraudulent tricks, even if gifted with some genuine psychic faculties.

Parapsychology adopted much from modern behavioral studies and does not assume any particular psychological structure, as did psychical research. Its name implies that it is a branch of psychology that specializes in the study of paranormal behavior. Parapsychologists seek to use appropriate psychological methodologies and integrate their findings into the larger body of psychological knowledge.

Psychomancy

Divination by spirits or the art of evoking the dead. (See also ceremonial magic; necromancy)

Psychomanteum

A psychomanteum is a room set aside for communication with those who have died and are believed to have passed to the world beyond. It is specially designed to promote an altered state of consciousness that facilitates such contact. Essential to the décor is a mirror into which the person wishing to communicate with a deceased loved one gazes. The use of the psychomanteum is traced to the ancient Mediterranean Basin, where its use is described in various writings and to the sleep temples of the followers of Asklepios.

The modern use of the psychomanteum had been advocated by Raymond Moody, a physician most known for his study of the near-death experience. Moody had noted that having an apparition of a loved one who had recently died had a healing effect on many people. They were given a sense of peace by knowing that their loved ones were alive and in a better place. They were also, on occasion, to complete their grieving process by resolving a broken relationship that had been present at the time of the death of the other party.

Following the publication of his highly successful books, Life After Life and Reflections on Life After Life, Moody constructed a psychomanteum and developed a simple process of inducing apparitions that including sitting inside the mirrored room and sending telepathic messages to the person with whom contact was desired. He discovered that the great majority of the people who went through a process of preparation for the psychomanteum actually saw an apparition within the room or later in their bedroom. Moody reported on his research in his 1993 book, Visionary Encounters with Departed Loved Ones.

The successes of the initial attempts at encounter have led Moody to train facilitators to spread the psychomanteum work. In his book, he offers instructions on constructing a psychomanteum. He has also initiated a research program to quantify the results of contacts made within the psychomanteum. Moody believes that it will provide further evidence of communication between the living and the dead.

Psychometry

A faculty, claimed by many psychics and mediums, of becoming aware of the characters, surroundings, or events connected with an individual by holding or touching an object, such as a watch or ring, that the individual possessed or that was strongly identified with the person. Medium Hester Dowden described psychometry as “a psychic power possessed by certain individuals which enables them to divine the history of, or events connected with, a material object with which they come in close contact.”

No doubt such an ability has been manifest from ancient times, but it was first named and discussed in modern history by the American scientist Joseph Rhodes Buchanan in 1842. The term derives from the Greek psyche (soul) and metron (measure) and signifies “soul-measuring,” or measurement by the human soul. Buchanan’s theory was based on the belief that everything that has ever existed—every object, scene, or event that has occurred since the beginning of the world—has left on the ether, or astral light, a trace of its being. This trace is indelible while the world endures and is impressed not only on the ether but on more palpable objects, such as trees and stones. Sounds and perfumes also leave impressions on their surroundings, said Buchanan. Just as a photograph may be taken on film or plate and remain invisible until it has been developed, so may those psychometric “photographs” remain impalpable until the developing process has been applied. That which can bring them to light is the psychic faculty and mind of the medium, he said.

Buchanan claimed that this faculty operated in conjunction with what he termed a community of sensation of varying intensity. The psychometric effect of medicines in Buchanan’s experiments as a physician was similar to their ordinary action. When an emetic was handed to a subject, the subject could only avoid vomiting by suspending the experiment. Buchanan’s earliest experiments, with his own students, showed that some of them were able to distinguish different metals merely by holding them in their hands. Later he found that some among them could diagnose a patient’s disease simply by holding his hand. Many of his acquaintances, on pressing a letter against their foreheads, could tell the character and surroundings of the writer, the circumstances under which the letter was written, and other details.

Many mediums who have practiced psychometry have since become famous in this line. As has been said, their method is to hold in the hand or place against the forehead some small object, such as a fragment of clothing, a letter, or a watch; appropriate visions are then seen or sensations experienced.

While on rare occasions a psychometrist may be entranced, normally he or she is in a condition scarcely varying from the normal. The psychometric pictures, presumably somehow imprinted on the objects, have been likened to pictures carried in the memory, seemingly faded, yet ready to start into vividness when the right spring is touched. Some have suggested, for example, that the rehearsal of bygone tragedies so frequently witnessed in haunted houses is really a psychometric picture that, during the original occurrence, impressed itself on the room. The same may be said of the sounds and smells that haunt certain houses.

The psychological effect of the experimental objects appears to be very strong. When a Mrs. Cridge, William Denton’s subject, examined a piece of lava from the Kilauea volcano she was seized with terror and the feeling did not pass for more than an hour.

On examining a fragment of a mastodon tooth, Elizabeth Denton said,

“My impression is that it is a part of some monstrous animal, probably part of a tooth. I feel like a perfect monster, with heavy legs, unwieldy head, and very large body. I go down to a shallow stream to drink. I can hardly speak, my jaws are so heavy. I feel like getting down on all fours. What a noise comes through the wood! I have an impulse to answer it. My ears are very large and leathery, and I can almost fancy they flap my face as I move my head. There are some older ones than I. It seems, too, so out of keeping to be talking with these heavy jaws. They are dark brown, as if they had been completely tanned. There is one old fellow, with large tusks, that looks very tough. I see several young ones; in fact, there is a whole herd.”

She derived further impressions from a fragment of a meteorite: “It carries my eyes right up. I see an appearance of misty light. I seem to go miles and miles very quickly, up and up. Streams of light come from the right, a great way off. . . . Light shining at a vast distance.”

Some negative impressions can prostrate the psychic and cause illness. On occasion, if the impressions are too antagonistic, the psychic will refuse to handle the object. Some psychometrists have been known, when given an object belonging to a deceased person, to take on the personal appearance and mannerisms of the owner and even to suffer from his or her ailments.

Eugene Crowell, in The Identity of Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1875–79), writes of a sentry box in Paris in which the sentry on duty committed suicide by hanging. Another soldier was assigned to the same duty, and within three weeks took his life by similar means. Still another succeeded to the post, and in a short time met a similar fate. When these events were reported to Emperor Louis Napoleon, he ordered the sentry box removed and destroyed.

There are many instances on record in which corpses have been traced through psychometric influence. Attempts have also been made to employ it in criminology with varying results. In his book Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923), Charles Richet narrates the experience of a Dr. Dufay with a nonprofessional somnambulist called Marie. He handed her something in several folds of paper. She said that the paper contained something that had killed a man. A rope? No. A necktie, she continued. The necktie had belonged to a prisoner who hanged himself because he had committed a murder, killing his victim with a gouet (a woodman's hatchet). Marie indicated the spot where the gouet was thrown on the ground. The gouet was found in the place indicated.

While most psychometrists give their readings in a normal state, a few are hypnotized. Maria Reyes de Z. of Mexico, with whom Gustav Pagenstecher conducted a series of successful experiments, belongs to the latter class. From a shell picked up on the beach of Vera Cruz she gave the following reading: "I am under water and feel a great weight pressing upon my body. I am surrounded by fishes of all kinds, colors, shapes, and sizes. I see white and pink coral. I also see different kinds of plants, some of them with large leaves. The water has a dark green, transparent colour. I am among the creatures but they do not seem to notice my presence, as they are not afraid of me in spite of touching me as they pass by."

Many psychometrists in the Spiritualist community have asserted that they are simply instruments and that spirits do the reading. Trance mediums often ask for objects belonging to the dead to establish contact. It was a habit with Leonora Piper. But other psychics, like Pascal Forthuny, repudiated the theory of spirit intervention and considered psychometry a personal gift, a sensitivity to the influence of the objects possessed. This influence, or emanation, was likened by Waldemar Wasielewski to the "rhabdic force" that he believed bends the rod of the water-witcher while dowsing.

William T. Stead suggested that very slight contact would suffice to impart such personal influence. On one occasion he cut pieces of blank paper from the bottom pages of letters of eminent people, just below the signature of each, and sent them to a Miss Ross marked "No. 1. Lady," "No. 2. Gentleman." The readings were very successful (see Stead's journal, Borderland, October 1895).

The psychometric vision sometimes comes in quickly flashed images and requires an effort of will to slow down, say mediums. According to D'Aute Hooper in Spirit Psychometry, "It would be impossible to follow up and write the impressions as they pass through my consciousness. It is far too rapid. They are like cinematographic pictures. I seem to fly, and at other times I seem to be the piece of stone, without thinking power but seeing things and happenings around me."

The scope of the visions has been described as small or encompassing the whole room. There is no definite order in their emergence. The picture is kaleidoscopic, there is an oscillation in periods of time, but the images of more important events seem to have better sway, say mediums.

The exercise of the faculty requires a relaxed, receptive mind. After the object is touched, some psychometrists feel they are immediately at the location; others mentally travel there first. Some may tear off a piece of paper from an envelope and put it into their mouths. Others are satisfied to handle an object, or hold it wrapped up in their hands.

As a rule, a clue containing an "influence" is indispensable for psychometric readings. But experiments with exceptional psychics led Joseph Buchanan to the conclusion that the clue may be supplanted by an index, for instance, by a name written on a piece of paper. Such cases appear to be rare.

It is usually said that a medium cannot get a reading for himself or herself by psychometry. An incident told some years ago in the journal Light is therefore very interesting. E. A. Cannon was handed, without her knowing the origin, a broad piece of elastic that was actually her own. She not only gave a character reading of herself, but also made a prediction that proved to be correct.

It is said that the image of engravings is retained by the glass and that by some processes, such as the use of mercury vapor, this image can be developed. There is a suggestion of some similar effect in an incident related by Elizabeth Denton. She had entered a car from which the passengers had gone to dinner and was surprised to see all the seats occupied. She later recalled:

"Many of them were sitting perfectly composed, as if, for them, little interest was attached to this station, while others were already in motion (a kind of compressed motion), as if preparing to leave. I thought this was somewhat strange, and was about turning to find a vacant seat in another car, when a second glance around showed me that the passengers who had appeared so indifferent were really losing their identity, and, in a moment more, were invisible to me. I had sufficient time to note the personal appearance of several; and taking a seat, I awaited the return of the passengers, thinking it more than probable I might find them the prototypes of the faces and forms I had a moment before so singularly beheld. Nor was I disappointed. A number of those who returned to the cars I recognized as being, in every particular, the counterparts of their late, but transient representatives."

Psychometric impressions may come so spontaneously as to seriously distract the medium in the daily course of life. The British medium Bessie Williams complained of this trouble. The Dutch psychometrist Lotte Plaat said she could not go into the British Museum in London because she felt that the exhibits were literally shouting their history. By a strong effort of will, however, such impressions can usually be dispelled.

Buchanan made a suggestion to test direct writing by spirits by submitting it to psychometric reading. He thought that if the writing was purely the product of the medium, the reading would give the medium's character; if not, the character of the spirit author would be described. The experiments were unsuccessful, however, because he had seemingly overlooked the complications of the ectoplasm from which the "spirit" hand was said to be formed. If the writing was done by a materialized hand built out of the bodily substance of the medium, it might bear as little impression of the spirit as a dictated text bears of the dictator, he reasoned.

As already mentioned, psychometry has been utilized to gain information about hauntings. "That the victim of some century old villainy," writes Sir Arthur Conan Doyle in his book The Edge of the Unknown (1930), "should still in her ancient garments frequent in person the scene of her former martyrdom, is indeed, hard to believe. It is more credible, little as we understand the details, that some thought-form is used and remains visible at the spot where great mental agony has been endured." But he was not unmindful of the difficulties of such speculation, adding, "Why such a thought-form should only come at certain hours, I am compelled to answer that I do not know." The psychometric impression should always be there and should always be perceived, if the theory is correct. The ghost apparently is not; its ways are strange.

Searching for Explanations

Psychometry was identified by Buchanan and entered into the terminology of Spiritualism at a time when a somewhat elaborate and detailed understanding of the spirit world was being conceived in order to explain the many varied phenomena emerging in the séance room. Many of these ideas were offered in an attempt to explain one mystery, such as psychometry, by another, such as ectoplasm. Much of that speculation disappeared along with the mass of physical phenomena. Stephan Ossowiecki, a prominent modern psychometrist, has noted correctly that should the psychometric speculation be even partially true, it would explain nothing. Psychometry is just a word and not an explanation, he said. Its essential nature, its exercise, is a mystery. He writes:

“I begin by stopping all reasoning, and I throw all my inner power into perception of spiritual sensation. I affirm that this condition is brought about by my unshakable faith in the spiritual unity of all humanity. I then find myself in a new and special state in which I see and hear outside time and space. . . . Whether I am reading a sealed letter, or finding a lost object, or psychometrizing, the sensations are nearly the same. I seem to lose some energy; my temperature becomes febrile, and the heartbeats unequal. I am confirmed in this supposition because, as soon as I cease from reasoning, something like electricity flows through my extremities for a few seconds. This lasts a moment only, and then lucidity takes possession of me, pictures arise, usually of the past. I see the man who wrote the letter, and I know what he wrote. I see the object at the moment of its loss, with the details of the event; or again, I perceive or feel the history of the thing I am holding in my hands. The vision is misty and needs great tension. Considerable effort is required to perceive some details and conditions of the scenes presented. The lucid state sometimes arises in a few minutes, and sometimes it takes hours of waiting. This largely depends on the surroundings; skepticism, incredulity, or even attention too much concentrated on my person, paralyzes quick success in reading or sensation.”

Illuminating as this subjective account is, it conveys little about the specific nature of psychometric influence. Gustav Pagenstecher conjectured as follows:

“The associated object which practically witnessed certain events of the past, acting in the way of a tuning fork, automatically starts in our brain the specific vibrations corresponding to the said events; furthermore, the vibrations of our brain once being set in tune with certain parts of the Cosmic Brain already stricken by the same events, call forth sympathetic vibrations between the human brain and the Cosmic Brain, giving birth to thought pictures which reproduce the events in question.”

Spiritualist Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, in plainer language, compared psychometric impressions to shadows on a screen. The screen is the ether, “the whole material universe being embedded in and interpenetrated by this subtle material which would not necessarily change its position since it is too fine for wind or any coarser material to influence it.” Doyle himself, although by no means psychic, would always be conscious of a strange effect—almost a darkening of the landscape with a marked sense of heaviness—when he was on an old battlefield. A more familiar example of the same faculty may be suspected in the gloom that gathers over the mind of even an average person upon entering certain houses. Such sensitivity may find expression in more subtle and varied forms. “Is not the emotion felt on looking at an old master [painting] a kind of thought transference from the departed?” asked Sir Oliver Lodge. The query cannot be answered conclusively, since the labels attached to psychic phenomena are purely arbitrary.

Akashic Records

Attempts at such a synthesis have been made by Theosophists. In his introduction to W. Scott-Elliot’s The Story of Atlantis and the Lost Lemuria (1904), the first book drawn from the so-called akashic records, A. P. Sinnett explains that the pictures of memory are imprinted on some nonphysical medium; they are photographed by nature on some imperishable page of superphysical matter. They are accessible, but the interior spiritual capacities of ordinary humanity are as yet too imperfectly developed to establish touch, he says. He further notes:

“But in a flickering fashion, we have experience in ordinary life of efforts that are a little more effectual. Thought-transference is a humble example. In that case, ‘impressions on the mind’ of one person, Nature’s memory pictures with which he is in normal relationship, are caught up by someone else who is just able, however unconscious of the method he uses, to range Nature’s memory under favourable conditions a little beyond the area with which he himself is in normal relationship. Such a person has begun, however slightly, to exercise the faculty of astral clairvoyance.”

Such highly speculative ideas are beyond the scope of psychical research, but the concept of the akashic records in its philosophical depths can be partly supported by an astronomical analogy. Because of the vastness of interstellar distances it takes hundreds of thousands of years for light, traveling at the enormous speed of 186,000 miles per second, to reach us from distant stars. Anyone who could look at the Earth from such a distant star would witness, at the present moment, the primeval past. From various distances the creation of our world could be seen as a present reality. Theoretically, therefore, astronomy admits the existence of a scenic record of the world’s history. The concept of this cosmic picture gallery and that of the akashic records is similar.

There is no generally validated method of access to such records in sublimated psychometry. However, Theosophist G. R. S. Mead, in his book Did Jesus Live 100 B.C.? (1903), asserted the following regarding akashic research:

“It would be as well to have it understood that the method of investigation to which I am referring does not bring into consideration any question of trance, either self-induced, or mesmerically or hypnotically effected. As far as I can judge, my colleagues are to all outward seeming in quite their normal state. They go through no outward ceremonies, or internal ones for that matter, nor even any outward preparation but that of assuming a comfortable position; moreover, they not only describe, as each normally has the power of description, what is passing before their inner vision in precisely the same fashion as one would describe some objective scene, but they are frequently as surprised as their auditors that the scenes or events they are attempting to explain are not at all as they expected to see them, and remark on them as critically, and frequently as sceptically, as those who cannot ‘see’ for themselves but whose knowledge of the subject from objective study may be greater than theirs.”

Simultaneous Perception of “Memory Records”

One need not go to occultists for psychic experiences in which there is a clear suggestion of memory records existing independently of individual powers of cognition. Something of that nature has been perceived by several people simultaneously, thus suggesting some sort of objectivity.

The Battle of Edge Hill (on the borders of Warwickshire and Oxfordshire, England) was fought on October 22, 1624. Two months later a number of shepherds and village people witnessed an aerial reenactment of the battle with all the noises of the guns, the neighing of the horses and the groans of the wounded. The vision lasted for hours and was witnessed by people of reputation for several consecutive days. When rumors of it reached the ears of Charles I, a commission was sent out to investigate. The commission not only reported having seen the vision on two occasions, but actually recognized fallen friends of theirs among the fighters; one was Sir Edmund Varney.

A similar instance was recorded by Pausanias (second century B.C.E.), according to whom on the plains of Marathon, four hundred years after the great battle, the neighing of horses, the shouts of the victors, the cries of the vanquished, and all the noise of a well-contested conflict, were frequently to be heard.

Patrick Walker, the Scottish Presbyterian covenanter, is quoted in Biographia Presbyteriana (1827) as stating that in 1686, about two miles below Lanark, on the water of Clyde, “many people gathered together for several afternoons, where there were showers of bonnets, hats, guns and swords, which covered the trees and ground, companies of men in arms marching in order, upon the waterside, companies meeting companies . . . and then all falling to the ground and disappearing, and other companies immediately appearing in the same way.” But Patrick Walker himself saw nothing unusual occur. About two-thirds of the crowd saw the phenomena; the others saw nothing strange. “Patrick Walker’s account,” states Andrew Lang in his book Cock Lane and Common Sense (1896), “is triumphantly honest and is, perhaps, as odd a piece of psychology as any on record, thanks to his escape from the prevalent illusion, which, no doubt, he would gladly have shared.”

Under the pseudonyms Miss Morrison and Miss Lamont, Anne Moberly, daughter of the bishop of Salisbury, and Eleanor Jourdain published in 1911 a remarkable book entitled An Adventure, in which they claim that in 1901 and 1902 they had a simultaneous vision, on the grounds of Versailles, of the place as it was in 1789. Some time after the first publication of their account of their Versailles adventure, testimony was given by people who lived in the neighborhood of Versailles that they also had seen the mysterious appearances, the strange phenomena being witnessed only on the anniversary of the attack on Versailles during the French Revolution. The most inexplicable feature of the story is that the people of the eighteenth century saw, heard, and spoke to the people of the twentieth century, who never doubted at the time that they were in communication with real individuals.

Psychometric Premonitions

Another class of phenomena could be classified as psychometric foreshadowings of the future. The report on the Census of Hallucinations made by the Society for Psychical Research in Great Britain in 1889 recorded one incident concerning a solitary excursion to a lake. The individual noted:

“My attention was quite taken up with the extreme beauty of the scene before me. There was not a sound or movement, except the soft ripple of the water on the sand at my feet. Presently I felt a cold chill creep through me, and a curious stiffness of my limbs, as if I could not move, though wishing to do so. I felt frightened, yet chained to the spot, and as if impelled to stare at the water straight in front of me. Gradually a black cloud seemed to rise, and in the midst of it I saw a tall man, in a suit of tweed, jump into the water and sink. In a moment the darkness was gone, and I again became sensible of the heat and sunshine, but I was awed and felt eerie. . . . A week afterwards Mr. Espie, a bank clerk (unknown to me) committed suicide by drowning in that very spot. He left a letter for his wife, indicating that he had for some time contemplated death.”

Princess Karadjia narrates in the Zeitschrift für Metapsychische Forschung (March 15, 1931) a story of a personal experience of the late Count Buerger Moerner that contains this incident:

“Passing through the little garden and glancing in at the window as he approached the house (looking for public refreshment) the Count was horrified to see the body of an old woman hanging from a ceiling beam. He burst into the room with a cry of horror, but once across the threshold was stunned with amazement to find the old woman rising startled from her chair, demanding the reason of his surprising intrusion. No hanging body was to be seen and the old lady herself was not only very much alive, but indignant as well. . . . Some days later, being again in that locality, he decided to visit the hut once more, curious to see if by some peculiarity of the window pane he might not have been observing an optical illusion. Nearing the hut through the garden as before, the same terrible sight met his eye. This time, however, the Count stood for some minutes studying the picture, then after some hesitation knocked at the door. No answer, even to repeated knocks, until at length Count Moerner opened the door and entered to find what he saw this time was no vision. The old woman’s body was indeed hanging from the beam. She had committed suicide.”

Psychometry remains a popular practice in both psychic and Spiritualist circles. There has been little work done on it in parapsychology since it is difficult to quantify results and many consider it but a variation on clairvoyance. It may also be seen as merely a helpful tool to assist the psychic into the proper state for receiving clairvoyant impressions.

Psychophone

Term suggested by James Coates for direct voice communications at séances.

Psychophysical Research Laboratories

An organization founded in 1979 by James S. McDonnell at the Forrestal Research Center, Princeton, New Jersey. It was devoted to laboratory investigation of psi phenomena, extrasensory perception, and psychokinesis. Under its director, Charles Honorton, it became known as the location of experiments using the Ganzfeld procedures, the subject of major controversy within parapsychology in the 1980s. The center closed in the late 1980s due to a lack of financial resources.

Psychoplasm

Alternative term for ectoplasm.

Psychorrhagic Diathesis

Formidable term used by psychical researcher F. W. H. Myers for his theory of phantasmal appearances, a psychic faculty of detaching elements of personality and transforming by them a certain part of space into a phantasmogenetic center. In this center, in a manner not material or optical, the phantasm of the psychorrhagist appears and may become collectively visible. (See also apparitions)

Psychosynthesis Institute

A facility founded to promote the psychotherapeutic approach of Roberto Assagiolo, a psychiatrist who attempted to integrate theosophical ideas, especially those of Alice A. Bailey, into his psychotherapeutic work. Basic concepts in psychosynthesis include the supraconscious (a higher unconscious, source of meaning and purpose in life), the Self and the will.

Essentially psychosynthesis is a psychological and educational method of harmonizing one's relationship to environment through inner integration and synthesis. This involves a continuing process of expanding self-awareness and higher consciousness, leading from the personal to the transpersonal or universal. The approach varies according to the needs of the individual and the most suitable way of releasing inner guidance, combining the methods of psychology and spiritual disciplines.

The institute offered theoretical and practical training for professionals and concerned individuals, as well as supporting research on psychosynthesis. Last known addresses: High Point Foundation, 647 N. Madison Ave., Pasadena, CA 91101, and Nan Clark Ln., Mill Hill, London, NW7, England.

The Psycho-Therapeutic Society

Founded in London, England, on April 1, 1901, for the advocacy of health reform, medical hypnotism, suggestive therapeutics, curative human radiations, and general drugless healing. The first president was George Spriggs, whose services as healing medium were at the disposal of patients for a generation. It is no longer active.

Psychotronics

A modern term favored in Eastern Europe for what in the West is termed parapsychology. It attempts to extend parapsychology by indicating the relationship of man to the universe, interaction with other physical bodies and matter, and fields of energy, known or unknown.

The First International Conference on psychotronics was held in Prague, Czechoslovakia, in 1974. Delegates included professors of physics and psychology, doctors of medicine and psychiatry, and parapsychologists. Subjects discussed included dowsing (water-witching and location of hidden objects), radi-omics, telepathy, Kirlian aura, out-of-the body travel, and bioelectric energy fields. Psychotronics organizations now exist in Poland, the Czech Republic and several other Eastern European countries.

The Psychotronics and Folk Medicine Center

A research center dedicated to collecting and disseminating information on psi and alternative (especially folk) medicine. Since the fall of the Soviet Union, Russian study of parapsychology (or psychotronics) and contact with the West has increased measurably. The Psychotronics and Folk Medicine Center, established in the 1990s, initiated communication with Western scientists and businesses concerning psi knowledge. It developed and published relevant literature and films on these subjects, working with such prominent healers as Nickolay Kasyan and psychic Nina S. Kulagina.

Edward Naumov, president of the center, was a corresponding member of the Parapsychological Association. He was known in the West for his work on "bioinformation" and healing. He dispensed information on what he called "the mystery of Psy-weapon," and the center's literature outlined examples of former Soviet government interest in "radioson," which allegedly was capable of causing "acoustic modulations in the brain." Naumov claimed that the representatives of the KGB and the CIA reported the creation of "a generator [that can] transmit information regardless of distance."

Psylli

A class of persons in ancient Italy who had the power of charming serpents. This name was also given by various writers to the snake charmers of Africa, and it is claimed that the serpents twisted round the bodies of these Psylli without doing them any injury, although the reptiles did not have their fangs extracted or broken.

In Kahira, when a viper entered a house, the charmer was sent for, and he enticed it out by the use of certain words. At other times, music was used, and it is believed that the serpents understood what was said to them by the snake charmers, and they acted with complete obedience.

Since vipers do not have ears, thus eliminating the effect of words or music, they may instead respond to movements and body heat.

Ptolemy, Claudius (100–178 C.E.)

Greek scholar and the father of Western astrology. Ptolemy lived in the Greek community of Alexandria, Egypt, then one of the major centers of learning in the Mediterranean basin. He is most remembered as the author of Mathematiké Syntaxis.

In Mathematiké Syntaxis (also known as the Almagest.) Ptolemy synthesized current knowledge of the solar system. His earth-centered astronomy was accepted for centuries until finally overthrown by the solar-centered view of Copernicus (1473–1543).

From his earth-centered astronomy Ptolemy derived his perspective on astrology (the two disciplines not then so rigidly separated as they are today). In the Tetrabiblos, he organized the astrological knowledge then available into a unified system and tied it to a set of ethical principles that stress the proper function of astrology and the ways in which it can be properly used. Although his system has been modified in a number of ways in modern astrology, its basic structure remains.

Puharich, Andrija (Henry Karl) (1918–1995)

Physician and parapsychologist. He was born on February 9, 1918, in Chicago, Illinois, of Yugoslavian ancestry. He studied at Northwestern University (B.A., 1942) and Northwestern University Medical School (M.B. and M.D., 1946). He developed an interest in psychic phenomena in 1947 and the following year set up the Round Table Foundation, Glen Cove, Maine, to study the physico-chemical basis for paranormal phenomena. However, it was after his period of service in the army (1953–59) that his true interests emerged.

Through the 1960s, Puharich was an independent scientist and inventor operating with the funds and patronage of various funding sources including the Mind Science Foundation, San Antonio, Texas; the Belk Research Foundation, New York City; the Consciousness Research Foundation; and various industrial and scientific organizations. He holds some 50 patents. He did both psychological and non-parapsychological work; his several books reflect his exploration of hallucinogens and ESP.

In April 1971 he decided to change directions and devote himself fully to his first love, parapsychological investigation. This decision was stimulated by his brief contact in 1962 with the Brazilian psychic surgeon José Arigó, who died suddenly in an auto accident in 1971. Shortly thereafter he went to Tel Aviv, Israel, to meet metal bending psychic Uri Geller and commenced a series of tests of Geller's talents.

During these tests Geller apparently manifested psychokinetic ability and dematerialization of objects which reappeared elsewhere. Under hypnosis, a mysterious voice was heard in the same room as Geller, claiming to be a superior intelligence of an extraterrestrial nature. Similar messages had been conveyed to Puharich by a Hindu scholar and psychic Dr. D. G. Vinod in 1953, and also by Dr. Charles Laughead of Whipple, Arizona, three years later. These messages are described in detail in Puharich's biography of Geller, Uri: A Journal of the Mystery of Uri Geller (1974). It must be emphasized that these astonishing communications, claiming to originate from superior intelligences in spaceships, manifested in the Puharich's presence and seemed to follow him around from one psychic to another, and the reports of these voices led many of Puharich's colleagues to question his work otherwise.

Puharich continued to work quietly through the 1970s, and little has been published since concerning his direction or results. He died January 3, 1995.

Purce, Jill (1947–)

British biophysicist, author, editor, and lecturer on mystical aspects of sound vibration and the human voice. Purce was born October 10, 1947, in Newcastle, Staffordshire. She attended Headington School, Oxford, Reading University (B.A. Hons., 1970), the Chelsea College of Art, London (1970–71), and Kings College, London (1971–72). Her special interest in the mystical aspects of life began when she studied the fine arts at Reading University and became fascinated with relationships between form and pattern in nature, and patterns in the development of human consciousness. She was awarded a research fellowship in the biophysics departments at Kings College and studied the spiral form in science, religion, and art. This became the basis for her book The Mystic Spiral: Journey of the Soul (1974), concerned with the evolution of consciousness in spiritual traditions and in psychology.

She also investigated the effect of sound vibrations on particles and on water, a subject that had been much neglected since the early experiments of E. F. F. Chladni in 1785 and Margaret Watts Hughes between 1885–1904.

Purce first introduction to the effect of sound in matter came from seeing photographs concerning the work of Hans Jenny, a Swiss engineer and doctor who had been influenced by the teachings of Rudolph Steiner. Jenny used liquids, pastes, and fine powders to demonstrate that formless matter could be organized into exquisite and precise patterns through sound vibration. In 1885, Hughes had studied the patterns formed by lycopodium seeds, sand, and also semi-liquid pastes when vibrated by the human voice. To assist her research, she invented the eidophone, an instrument to facilitate control of and the direction of the voice vibrations on any given medium.

Purce spent a period studying music with the eminent composer Karlheinz Stockhausen in Germany. It was at this time that Stockhausen composed his Alphabet for Lieges, illustrating relationships between sound vibration and matter. Afterwards she extended her studies with special reference to vibrations of the human voice. She studied Mongolian and Tibetan overtone chanting (producing chords of simultaneous notes octaves apart, with harmonics) in the Indian Himalayas, her teacher being the chantmaster of the Gyutö Tibetan Monastery and Tantric College. She subsequently developed her studies with American Indians and shamans from various traditions.

Purce has offered her research for the light it might shed on the mystic power of sound vibrations as they have operated in ancient traditions and practices. She has also tried to show that the human voice can act as a creative link between body and mind. In her lectures and workshops in various countries, Purce demonstrates to students the manner in which understanding and liberation of the voice can transform the personality, in both a psychotherapeutic and a spiritual way. She has also used her voice techniques as a tool of positive value for women in childbirth. She has conducted workshops on the healing and meditative effects of sound and voice across Europe and North America.

In addition to this specialized work, Purce is also general editor of the Thames & Hudson series of books on sacred traditions, art, and imagination. She is married to the biologist Rupert Sheldrake who has offered some new theoretical approaches to biologists about the origin and growth of form in nature. Purohit, Swami Shri (1882–ca. 1936)

Hindu monk, poet and spiritual teacher, who greatly influenced the poet W. B. Yeats and (through him) actress Margot Ruddock, a close friend of Yeats in his later years. Swami Purohit was born on October 12, 1882, at Badnera, near Amraoti in Berar, India (Central Provinces), of a religious and wealthy Brahmin family. His father had renounced a large fortune out of respect for the memory of his own father. As a boy, Purohit grew up in a devout religious atmosphere and had several encounters with wonder-working Mahatmas.

After attending a local Anglo-vernacular school, he studied at University of Bombay, enrolling in 1898. He went on to the Morris College at Nagpur, where he entered the Arts course. After passing his examination in 1901 he joined the B.A. class and studied philosophy. After failing this examination, he took a position as teacher at Amraoti, eventually receiving his B.A. from Calcutta University in 1903. He went on to Poona and studied at Deccan College, where he obtained his LL.B. degree.

However, he was more interested in obtaining spiritual experience from yogis and mahatmas than in practicing law. He made several religious pilgrimages. At the request of his parents, he married a sixteen-year-old girl Godu Bai, but after the birth of two daughters and a son, he obtained his wife's permission to renounce the life of householder. He studied under his guru Bhagwan Shri Hamsa and in about 1923 became a renunciate and traveling monk. He practiced severe austerities and made religious pilgrimages throughout India. At the request of his guru, he traveled to Europe in 1930.

In London, he became a close friend of W. B. Yeats, then in his sixties, and strongly influenced his outlook on Hindu philosophy and mysticism. Yeats wrote introductions to the Swami's autobiography An Indian Monk (1932) and his translation of his guru's book The Holy Mountain (Faber, London, 1934).

In 1935, the Swami published a translation of Bhagavad-Gita under the title The Geeta; The Gospel of the Lord Shri Krishna (1935) which he dedicated "To my friend William Butler Yeats" on his seventieth birthday. In the same year, the Swami published a translation of the Mandukya Upanishad, for which Yeats provided an introduction. Yeats had planned to travel to India to assist the Swami in translating the ten principal Upanishads, but eventually the work was completed by the two friends at Majorca in 1936.

From 1934 onward, Yeats developed a romantic friendship with the young actress Margot Ruddock, then twenty-seven years old. He introduced her to the Swami, who thereafter became her spiritual adviser and influenced the poems which she wrote. The Swami also composed many religious poems, some of which Margot Ruddock translated into English.

The Swami featured frequently in the correspondence between Yeats and Margot Ruddock, published as Ah, Sweet Dancer; W. B. Yeats and Margot Ruddock edited by Roger McHugh (1970). Yeats corresponded with the Swami for some years before his own death. The Swami returned to India in 1936 after receiving news of the illness of his guru, who died the same year. The Swami died soon afterward.

Yeats's letters to the Swami were bought privately by Claude Driver, director of the Rosenbach Foundation, Philadelphia. Extracts from some letters were quoted in The Later Phase of the Development of W. B. Yeats by S. Mokashi-Punekar (1966).

The Purrah

A former secret society of the Tulka-Susus, a tribe whose members dwelled between the Sierra Leone river and Cape Mount in West Africa. The Tulka consisted of five small communities which together formed a kind of republic. Each group had its own chiefs and council, but all were under a controlling power that was called the purrah. Each of the five communities also had its own purrah, from which was formed the great or general purrah, which held supreme sway over the five bodies.

Before an African could join a district purrah, he had to be thirty years of age, and before being received into membership of the great purrah, he had to have reached the age of fifty. Thus the oldest members of each district purrah were members of the head purrah. On desiring admittance to the examination for the district purrah, the relations of the candidate had to swear to kill him if he did not stand the test, or if he revealed the mysteries and the secrets of the society. The explorer Leo Frobenius stated:

"In each district belonging to a purrah there is a sacred grove to which the candidate is conducted, and where he must stay in a place assigned to him, living for several months quite alone in a hut, whither masked persons bring him food. He must neither speak nor leave his appointed place of residence.

"Should he venture into the surrounding forest, he is as good as dead.

"After several months the candidate is admitted to stand his trial, which is said to be terrible. Recourse is had to all the elements in order to gain satisfaction as to his firmness and courage. We are even assured that at these mysteries use is made of fettered lions and leopards, that during the time of the tests and enrolment the sacred groves echo with fearful shrieks, that here great fires are seen at night, that formerly the fire flared up in these mysterious woods in all directions, that every outsider who through curiosity was tempted to stray into the woods was mercilessly sacrificed, that foolish people who would have penetrated into them disappeared and were never heard of again.

"If the candidate stands all the tests, he is admitted to the initiation. But he must first swear to keep all the secrets and without hesitation carry out the decisions of the purrah of his community and all the decrees of the great head purrah. If a member of the society betrays it or revolts against it, he is condemned to death, and the sentence is often carried out in the bosom of his family. When the criminal least expects it, a disguised, masked and armed warrior appears and says to him:—

"The great purrah sends thee death!"

"At these words everybody stands back, no one dares to offer the least resistance, and the victim is murdered.

"The Court of each district purrah consists of twenty-five members, and from each of these separate courts five persons are chosen, who constitute the great purrah, or the High Court of the general association. Hence this also consists of twenty five persons, who elect the head chief from their own body.

"The special purrah of each community investigates the offenses committed in its district, sits in judgment on them, and sees that its sentences are carried out. It makes peace between the powerful families, and stops their wranglings.

"The great purrah meets only on special occasions, and pronounces judgment on those who betray the mysteries and secrets of the order, or on those who show themselves disobedient to its mandates. But usually it puts an end to the feuds that often break out between two communities belonging to the confederacy. When these begin to fight, after a few months of mutual hostilities, one or other of the parties, when they have inflicted sufficient injury on each other, usually wants peace. The commune repairs secretly to the great purrah, and invites it to become the mediator and put an end to the strife.

"Thereupon the great purrah meets in a neutral district, and when all are assembled announces to the communes at war that it cannot allow men who should live together as brothers, friends and good neighbors, to wage war, to waste each others' lands, to plunder and burn; that it is time to put an end to these disorders; that the great purrah will inquire into the cause of the strife; that it requires that this should cease and decrees that all hostilities be forthwith arrested.

"A main feature of this arrangement is that, as soon as the great purrah assembles to put a stop to the feud, and until its decision is given, all the belligerents of the two districts at war are forbidden to shed a drop of blood; this always carries with it the penalty of death. Hence everybody is careful not to infringe this decree, and abstains from all hostilities.

"The session of the High Court lasts one month, during which it collects all necessary information to ascertain which commune caused the provocation and the rupture. At the same time it summons as many of the society's fighting-men as may be required to carry out the decision. When all the necessary particulars are brought in, and everything is duly weighed, it settles the question by condemning the guilty commune to a four days' sack.

"The warriors who have to give effect to this decision are all chosen from the neutral districts; they set out by night from the place where the great purrah is assembled. All are disguised, the face being covered with an ugly mask, and armed with lighted torches and daggers. They divide into bands of forty, fifty, or sixty, and all meet unexpectedly before dawn in the district that they have to pillage, proclaiming with fearful shouts the decision of the High Court. On their approach men, women, children and old people, all take to flight, that is, take refuge in their houses, and should anyone be found in the fields, on the highway, or in any other place, he is either killed or carried off and no more is ever heard of him.

“The booty obtained by such plundering is divided into two parts, one of which is given to the injured commune, the other to the great purrah, which shares it with the warriors that have executed its decree. This is the reward for their zeal, their obedience and loyalty.

“If one of the families in a commune subject to the purrah becomes too powerful and too formidable, the great purrah meets, and nearly always condemns it to unexpected sack, which is carried out by night and, as usual, by masked and disguised men. Should the heads of such a dangerous family offer any resistance, they are killed, or carried off, and conveyed to the depths of a sacred and lonely grove where they are tried by the purrah for their insubordination; they are seldom heard of again.

“Such, in part, is the constitution of this extraordinary institution. Its existence is known; the display of its power is felt; it is dreaded; yet the veil covering its intentions, decisions and decrees is impenetrable, and not till he is about to be executed does the outlaw know that he has been condemned. The power and reputation of the purrah is immense, not only in the homeland, but also in the surrounding districts. It is reported to be in league with the spirits (instead of the devil).

“According to the general belief the number of armed men who are members and at the disposal of the purrah exceeds 6,000. Moreover, the rules, the secrets and the mysteries of this society are strictly obeyed and observed by its numerous associated members, who understand and recognise each other by words and signs.”

The society died soon after Sanderson's death in 1973 and with it went Pursuit.

Purucker, Hobart Lorentz Gottfried de (1874–1942)

Hobart Lorentz Gottfried de Purucker, a prominent American theosophical author and leader, was the son of a pastor of the German Reformed church. He was born January 15, 1874, in Suffern, New York. He grew up in parsonages in several states and also as a youth lived in Geneva, Switzerland, where his father moved to become chaplain of the American church. He attended the Collège de Genève for a short time but returned to the United States during his eighteenth year. After a period of wandering, he settled in San Diego, California, where he discovered the Theosophical Society. He met the leader of the American Theosophists, William Q. Judge, and became an assistant to Judge's successor, Katherine Tingley. In 1903 Purucker moved to Point Loma, California, where Tingley had established a theosophical community.

Purucker served as Tingley's personal secretary, and in 1911 he assumed additional duties as editor of the Theosophical Path, the group's periodical. His years of work were acknowledged in 1929 when he succeeded Tingley as head of the society. He soon began a second periodical, the Theosophical Forum. He also took over Tingley's role as spokesperson of the society and began to give public lectures, which were later collected into some of his more popular books. The early 1930s were his most productive literary period. He completed Questions We All Ask (1930–31); Theosophy and Modern Science (1930); Golden Precepts of Esotericism (1931); Fundamentals of Esoteric Philosophy (1932); and The Esoteric Tradition (1935).

World War II presented a significant challenge to the community at Point Loma, which was located on Pacific coastal property adjacent to a major U.S. naval facility. The location was a vulnerable position should Japanese forces reach the West Coast, which many felt to be a real possibility at the time. That threat and the financial problems being experienced by the group led Purucker to close the community and sell the site. He died September 27, 1942, just a few weeks after new headquarters were established in Covina, California.

Following his death, the society published a variety of Purucker's writings, including Studies in Occult Philosophy (1945) and Dialogues with G. de Purucker (1948). Purucker's work is not very well known, because the branch of the society over which he presided has dwindled in size through the last half of the twentieth century.

Puthoff, Harold E. (1936–)

Physicist and parapsychologist born June 20, 1936, in Chicago, Illinois. He earned his Ph.D. from Stanford University where he worked from 1972 onward in the field of lasers. He was responsible for developing a tunable Raman laser that produced high-power radiation throughout the infrared section of the spectrum. He has supervised research for Ph.D. candidates in electrical engineering and applied physics at Stanford.

His interest in parapsychology was first manifest in his initiating research in biofeedback and biofield measurements. However, he has become most known for his research with his colleague Russell Targ at Stanford Research Institute on remote viewing, a type of test for ESP in which one person goes to a specified location and another person attempts to describe what the first person is seeing. They reported remarkable success and following the publication of their book, Mind Reach (1977), others replicated the process with equally remarkable success. Critics, however, found a methodological flaw in the giving of cues to the percipient. The critics stimulated new research which prevented the cueing and researcher Robert Jahn has also reported (in Beloff, 1988) positive results with the new format. Puthoff and Targ have also done research on Uri Geller. (See also Ingo Swann)

Pyramid Church of Truth and Light

The Pyramid Church of Truth and Light is a Spiritualist church founded in 1941 in Ventura, California, by Revs. John Kingham and Emma Kingham. They led the church through its first generation after which, in 1962, Rev. Steele Goodman became the new head. Under the Kinghams, four congregations were chartered, but none have survived. Under Goodman two centers have been noted, one in Sacramento, California, and one in Phoenix, Arizona. The Phoenix church is pastored by Isaiah Jenkins, an African American who has emerged as a popular medium in the Spiritualist community. The church has a minimal set of beliefs and emphasizes personal development. It lives by the basic principle of love, upon which laws should be based.

Pyramids and Pyramidology

The large pyramid structures built by the ancient peoples of Egypt, Peru, and Central America have fascinated scholars and lay people through the centuries. In the wake of the emergence of modern Egyptology, they have been the subject of religious and millennial speculation, and more recently occult speculation. In spite of the efforts of Egyptologists, who have done much to discover and describe the building, the structure, and the purposes of the pyramids, a number of unanswered questions, such as the unit of measurement used by the pyramid architects, remain, and provide a basis for broad speculation. The discovery and spread of public knowledge concerning the pyramids in the Americas only added fuel to the fires of imagination. Although the Egyptian pyramids served as tombs for royalty and the wealthy of society, some pyramids had no clearly discernible purpose and others had structures that seemed to have no relation to the primary burial function.

There were some eighty pyramids in Egypt, built under the reign of the Pharaohs from 3,100 to 332 B.C.E. Egyptian tombs reflect the early religious ideas about the afterlife. In predynastic times, the dead were buried in sand pits of an oval or square shape; in the dynastic era a structure called a mastaba was erected over the burial place of kings and nobles. This was made of dried mud bricks and reproduced the house or palace of the deceased, so that his soul could have a replica of earthly existence.

Eventually stone was used instead of mud bricks, and the process of development culminated in the Step Pyramid of the Third Dynasty (ca. 2686–2181 B.C.E.) The familiar square-based, triangular-sided pyramid is seen at its best in the Great Pyramid of Giza, built in the reign of Cheops (or Khufu) of the Fourth Dynasty, regarded as one of the Seven Wonders of the World. It measures 756 feet square, with a height of 480 feet. It is made of some 2,300,000 blocks of stone that average 2 1/2 tons each. The core is of local stone and the outer facing of limestone, while the granite and limestone blocks are hewn with a high level of precision.

The pyramid is entered through a shaft on the north side, where a descending corridor leads to an unfinished chamber with a blind passage; an ascending corridor leads to what is called “the Queen’s Chamber,” containing two-dead end shafts, and eventually to the “Grand Gallery,” 100 feet long and 30 feet high, and the “King’s Chamber,” containing an empty sarcophagus. It is thought that it originally contained a mummy, rifled by tomb robbers who surmounted the granite plugs, false passages and other precautions of the pyramid builders.

Occult speculations regarding the Great Pyramid have arisen mainly around its construction, dimensions, and possible use. It is certainly a remarkable engineering feat, and it has been suggested that it could have been achieved only by supernatural techniques, such as levitating the great blocks of stone by mysterious occult force. However, tomb paintings, tool marks on stone, and quarry workings suggest more conventional technology.

Ruins found near the pyramid are thought to have been the barracks for about 4,000 skilled workmen. The heavy work could have been done by conscripted labor, as depicted on other tomb paintings. One such painting depicts about 172 men shifting a sixty-ton statue. The stones were probably moved on sleds and by barges and rafts. Earthen mounds may have surrounded the pyramid in the course of construction, with ramps for elevating the stones.

Pyramidology, the attempt to impose metaphysical and cosmological meaning upon the Great Pyramid, dates back to the 1830s, after Colonel Howard Vyse blasted a way inside and took measurements. The British mathematician John Taylor and Scottish astronomer Charles Piazza Smyth claimed that the pyramid embodied divine revelations and prophecy, calculated from its measurements, assuming a unit of a “pyramid inch” which was later the Anglo-Saxon inch. After Smyth pyramidology became the domain of British Israelites (who tried to prove that contemporary Anglo-Saxons were the descendants of the fabled ten lost tribes of Israel) and various conservative Christians who looked to the pyramid to verify biblical speculations concerning the end of the world.

For example, by considering the inch a symbol for a year, the internal structures of the pyramid are calculated to indicate the important dates of the world’s past and present history. This involves identifying the pyramid itself with biblical versions of history, such as the traditional view that the world was created about 4,004 B.C.E., duly verified by pyramid measurements, that also showed that the Second Coming of Christ was due in 1881. When this prophecy was not fulfilled, pyramidologists revised their calculations to produce a score of other dates.

It was from Smyth’s calculations that Charles Taze Russell, founder of International Bible Students Association, the precursor of what today is known as the Jehovah’s Witnesses, based his own prophecy of the Second Coming of Christ. The Edgar brothers, Scottish Bible students produced a massive two volume work on pyramidology beginning with Russell’s early writings.

However, the majority of pyramidology texts were put to use by the British Israelites, and the decline of British Israelism that had followed the dismantling of the British Empire had manifested in a marked reduction of interest in pyramidology in the last half of the twentieth century. Among the last noteworthy attempts at selling pyramidology was one made by the Institute of Pyramidology. Adam Rutherford founded the institute in London, England, in 1940, and it became an international body a year later with the launching of Pyramidology Magazine, with special emphasis on "Divine Revelation" and prophecies. The Institute for Pyramidology is located at 108 Broad St., Chesham, Bucks. HP5 3ED, England.

Occult speculations on the Great Pyramid have been varied and somewhat disjuncted. For example, in the 1880s, Ignatius Donnelly had suggested that the Great Pyramid had been built by the descendants of the Atlanteans. That idea was picked up in the 1920s by Manly Palmer Hall who went one to suggest that they were the focus of the ancient Egyptian wisdom schools. Edgar Cayce built upon Hall's speculations.

Through this century, other writers have suggested that the plan of the Great Pyramid and its internal structures may have embodied a mystical symbolism of the journey of the soul, as described in the Egyptian Book of the Dead (Papyrus of Ani). It is also not unlikely that the north-south orientation of the pyramid and the nature of its dimensions reveal astronomical and geometrical knowledge of a high order. It seems clear that the Egyptians were aware of the mathematical ratio of π .

During the last generation, widespread publicity has been given to two interesting speculations about pyramids. The first was proposed by Erich von Däniken who, drawing upon popular ignorance about the broad findings of Egyptology, suggested that the pyramids had been built by extraterrestrials. Through the asking of rhetorical questions, he proposed a system by which the space visitors used anti-gravity devices to lift the very heavy block from which the structures were built. He failed to account for numerous other observations as to why the pyramids did not embody any modern technology or advanced architectural discoveries, not even the Roman arch. His speculations were soon put to rest and remain the property of a small circle of followers.

Pyramid Energy

The second set of speculations concerning pyramids have centered upon the possible existence of an unknown energy concentrated in pyramidal structures. Pyramid energy was rediscovered in the early 1970s after it was introduced in the popular best-selling Psychic Discoveries behind the Iron Curtain by journalists Sheila Ostrander and Lynn Schroeder. They described their experience with a Czech radio engineer, Karl Drbal, who had taken out a patent on a pyramid razor blade sharpener. The idea was picked up by New Age writer Lyll Wat and then a host of others including Peter Toth, Greg Nielsen, and Pat Flanagan. Through the 1970s, it was a common theme at psychic and New Age gatherings.

The idea of pyramid energy goes back to the 1920s. As early as 1928, at Lyons, a 33-year old Frenchman named Georges Gaillard demonstrated the ability to mummify two mutton chops by holding them in his hands for a minute. The French radiesthetist Antoine Bovis reported that meat, eggs and other organic substances could be mummified by placing them in a cardboard model of the Great Pyramid, which he claimed accumulated the same radiations as the King's chamber of the pyramid. It was Bovis's claims which were later picked up by Karl Drbal.

In 1950, at the Scientific and Technical Congress of Radionics and Radiesthesia, held in London, England, Noel Macbeth claimed that a cardboard model pyramid could mummify organic substances such as an egg and that this energy was connected with that radiated by the hands of gifted human healers. Such claims had also been made in Britain during World War II, when there was a shortage of razor blades.

Through the 1970s into the 1980s, experimentation with pyramids was one of the prominent New Age fads. For the most serious, pyramid tents and energy generators are marketed by Pyramid Products of Glendale, California. Interest in pyramids faded through the 1970s and exists in the mid 1990s as a mere shadow of its peak in the 70s.

In spite of all of the claims made for pyramids, from sharpening razors to the beneficial effects on the health of the persons sitting in one of the larger models, to date no scientific study has validated the reality of pyramid energy and the evidence of its effectiveness remains entirely anecdotal.

Pyromancy

Divination by fire, already alluded to in extispicy. The presage was good when the flame was vigorous and quickly consumed the sacrifice; when it was clear of all smoke, transparent, neither red nor dark in color; and when it did not crackle, but burnt silently in a pyramidal form. On the contrary, if it was difficult to kindle, if the wind disturbed it, or if it was slow to consume the victim, the presage was evil.

Besides the sacrificial fire, the ancients divined by observing the flames of torches and even by throwing powdered pitch into a fire; if it caught quickly, the omen was good. The flame of a torch was good if it formed one point, bad if it divided into two; but three was a better omen than one. Sickness for the healthy, and death for the sick, was foreshadowed by the bending of the flame and some frightful disaster by its sudden extinction.

The vestal virgins in the Temple of Minerva at Athens were charged to make particular observations on the light perpetually burning there.

A branch of pyromancy (divination by fire), based on the burn stains left on a light surface after burning a sheet of paper on it.

Qi

Qi is the Chinese name for the vital energy that undergirds the universe, analogous to the Indian prana. Its literal translation is “gas” and hence is similar to the Hebrew concept of spirit which is associated with breath. In China, qi is usually thought of as yaunqi, the original vital energy. Qi is the energy that flows through the body and is the subject of treatment in acupuncture and acupressure. Blockage of the flow of qi is the source of disease and the free natural flow of qi is the underpinning basis of health. The flow of qi, it is believed, can be stimulated by the practice of a series of exercises called qigong. Teaching about qi reaches into ancient China and much of the traditional Chinese understanding of the universe is based upon a belief in its existence. It is integral to Chinese medicine, including the understanding of the power of herbs, and basic to a vital sexual life.

Common throughout China were a wide range of practices designed to raise qi and hence invigorate the body and serve as a system of preventive medicine. These wide-ranging techniques are generally grouped under the name qigong, and include practices known elsewhere as meditation and exercise. Some form of qigong was integrated into Chinese religious practices, especially Buddhism and Taoism.

Working with qi was greatly affected by the Chinese Revolution in the mid-twentieth century, and especially during the brief period known as the Cultural Revolution. Religious institutions and practices were heavily suppressed and the secret books that held the teachings on qi were either destroyed or placed in government archives. Following the Cultural Revolution, Deng Xiao Peng went about rebuilding China’s past, but in the light of the Communist present. Most importantly, he promoted traditional Chinese medicinal practice and the revival of qigong. In the meantime, people knowledgeable of qi migrated to the West and began to talk openly about traditional Chinese practices, thus creating a demand from the West for more information. The flow of material on qi began with President Nixon’s trip to China in 1972 and the American government’s support for a new scientific look at acupuncture. Acupuncture has subsequently become a popular alternative medical practice, though its use by Western physicians remains limited.

In China in the 1980s and 1990s, extensive experimentation has proceeded aimed at gathering scientific data on the existence and beneficent effects of qi. These experiments parallel Western attempts to measure the effects of spiritual/psychic healing. Using the EEG and related instruments, Chinese scientists believe that they have documented the existence of qi and in a wide range of experiments have documented the power of qi in the treatment of different diseases. It has, for example, appeared helpful in curing cancer in experiments involving the progress of carcinoma cells and leukemia in mice. These experiments are now being offered to Western scientists for duplication and verification.

Meanwhile, the promotion of qigong among the population has proved a two-edged sword for the Chinese. In the late 1990s, it was discovered that qigong had become the basis of the creation of new unofficial religious groups built around the mental and spiritual effects of the experience of qi. The most successful, a Buddhist movement named Falun Gong, now has followers in the millions and has become very popular in many countries with Chinese expatriate communities. In 1998, the Chinese government began an effort to suppress the movement in China.

Qigong

Qigong is an ancient Chinese practice believed to invigorate the body and bring health and well-being. It is based upon the belief in the existence of qi, also called ki or ch’i, the universal energy that undergirds the cosmos. The practice of qigong is related to acupuncture, the ancient form of medicine also based upon the flow of energy through the body. Acupuncture has mapped a series of channels or meridians that exist as part of the subtle anatomy of the body. If these meridians are blocked, the qi cannot flow freely, and ill health results.

Qigong has been practiced for millenia in China and has been exported to surrounding countries. It is intimately associated with Taoism, though it also freely mixes with Buddhism. Through the centuries, the practice was kept from the general public and its secrets passed orally from teacher to master, and through various families. Very few books were written prior to the 1950s and those were closely guarded in private monastic libraries. The changes accompanying the Chinese Revolution of 1948 forced qigong into the open.

Maoist leaders moved against the monasteries and forbade many traditional practices. Within China, the secret qigong texts were largely destroyed or confiscated and buried in government libraries. However, a few qigong masters left China and some texts were smuggled out of the country. Over the next decades, these masters resurfaced and began to teach qigong openly. Also, the first Western books on the practice were published. In the meantime, China went through a generation of intensive change, culminating in the Cultural Revolution, that attempted to cut the people's ties with a large part of their religious and cultural heritage, and to eradicate what were seen as non-Chinese and particularly Western intrusions. In the wake of the Cultural Revolution, under Deng Xiao Peng, a re-evaluation of the tradition began and limited reemergence of various practices was encouraged and allowed.

The recovery of Chinese medicine in general led to the encouragement of qigong practice and hundreds of qigong groups appeared. The government also encouraged the formation of a national association of qigong groups which most joined, and as the benefits were documented, further encouragement of the practice came forth. Qigong was included, for example, in the training of fighter pilots, as it appeared to improve their reflexes. In the 1980s, a number of studies attempting to provide modern scientific underpinnings to the practices of qigong, especially documenting the existence of qi, were initiated. Qigong practitioners became guinea pigs for such research, which was similar to research done on spiritual healing in the West.

Qigong and Religion

Qigong practice had primarily been the special property of Taoist and Buddhist monasteries prior to the Chinese Revolution. When it resurfaced, inevitably the religious connections were present, in spite of efforts to keep the practice in a secular context. The existence of such a mysterious invisible force as qi is in itself encouragement to many to assume a spiritual explanation. At the same time, the Chinese government has given some limited space for the revival of religion, as long as it is kept within the confines of the several national religious organizations; there is one national Buddhist federation and one national Taoist federation.

In the mid-1990s, various popular qigong groups emerged apart from the national qigong federation. One, the Fakun Gong, operated in a Buddhist context and offered the peculiar form of qigong as taught by its Master Hongzi Lee as the superior form of qigong and as leading to a Buddhist-like enlightenment. Thus it existed as both unofficial religion and unofficial qigong. In 1999, in the midst of a nationwide crackdown on unofficial religion, the Chinese government began a systematic suppression of Falun Gong that has brought the country under the scrutiny of human rights groups around the world. By the end of 1999, a second group, Zhong Gong, was also under attack. Both groups were charged with practicing medicine without proper training and causing the death of people who used qigong in the place of modern medicine. There is little evidence to support these charges.

Qi Magazine

Qi Magazine is a newsstand periodical launched in the mid-1990s to cover the world of qigong and inform the English-speaking world of the spectrum of practice and thought being offered by various master practitioners in the West. Qigong is the collective name of a number of exercise systems that emerged through the centuries in China. On one end of the spectrum, hard qigong, designed to build the body, grades into Tai Chi and the martial arts. On the other end, soft qigong, designed to relax the body and improve health, fades into acupuncture and the practice of Chinese medicine.

Each issue of Qi Magazine is built around a number of short feature articles that provide insight from the wisdom of one of the more notable qigong masters, introduce an element of basic practice, or discuss the value of a form of Chinese medicine. Many of these are illustrated with detailed diagrams of the body or of the movements being discussed. There is a large letters-to-the-editor column in which readers are invited into a lively dialog with the editorial staff. In addition, the e-mail address of most writers for the magazine is given so that readers may respond to their articles immediately and directly. A selection of both Eastern and Western authors also write regular columns.

Qi Magazine is published by the Tse Qigong Centre in suburban Seattle, Washington. Its editor, Michael Tse, authors much of the content of each issue as well as translating material from the Chinese for inclusion. The Tse Qigong Centre offers a full range of student training, extension classes in New York and London, and teacher training and certification. Qi Magazine appears bimonthly. Address: P.O. Box 2697, Kirkland, WA 98083. Website: <http://www.qimagazine.com/>.

The word quaesitor means seeker, and the organization's workshops, courses, and sessions "are to explore this longing, to give us insight into how our lives can become more rich and more fulfilling." Last known address: Quaesitor II, Top Flat, 17 Hornsey Lane Gardens, London, N6 5NX, England.

Quest List of Esoteric Sources (Directory)

Comprehensive directory of British groups, societies, and courses, and publications and suppliers in the occult, neo-pagan, and mystical fields that appeared in 1984. It was compiled and edited by Marian Green, one of the leading neo-pagans in Great Britain and named after her neo-pagan organization and periodical. It superseded the Q Directory, which had appeared in several editions beginning in 1977. Quest still exists but no recent editions of the directory have appeared.

The Quest Society

An offshoot of the Theosophical Society, founded by scholar G. R. S. Mead (1863–1933), who had been secretary to Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and general secretary of the Theosophical Society. He resigned (in company with some 700 other members) in protest over the scandals concerning C. W. Leadbeater's love of young boys.

In March 1909, Mead founded the Quest Society as a group of sincere seekers after spiritual wisdom without any taint of charlatanry. The objects were "to promote investigation and comparative study of religion, philosophy and science on the basis of experience; to encourage the expression of the ideal in beautiful form." For 21 years (1909–30), the society published a quarterly journal, The Quest, edited by Mead and with an extremely high standard of contributions. The society faded away after the death of Mead in 1933.

Quigley, Joan (1927–)

San Francisco astrologer who claims that her astrological advice had "absolute control" over the movements, and influenced the decisions, of former United States president Ronald Reagan. She was born April 10, 1927. Her secret role as an astrological influence at the White House was referred to by Donald Regan, former chief of staff to Ronald Reagan, who was quite critical of Nancy Reagan's influence on decisions made by the president. Regan's remarks caused a major controversy that eventually led to the complete revelation of the name and role of Nancy Reagan's astrologer.

In her book, What Does Joan Say? My Seven Years as White House Astrologer to Nancy and Ronald Reagan (1990), Quigley made far-reaching claims. She advised Nancy Reagan from 1981 through 1989 and is sure that her astrological advice decided the timing of key political events, including speeches, televised campaign debates, the signing of arms control treaties, and even the dates for Ronald Reagan's cancer surgery and the announcement that he would run for a second term. Quigley claims that Air Force One would only take off if she reported a favorable alignment of the planets and that she sometimes also gave the president and his wife political advice.

Quigley states, "I was responsible for timing all press conferences, most speeches, the State of the Union addresses, the take-offs and landing of Air Force One. . . . I picked the time of Ronald Reagan's debate with Carter and the two debates with Walter Mondale, all extended trips abroad, as well as the shorter trips and one-day excursions, the announcement that Reagan would run for a second term, and briefings for all the summits except Moscow." Quigley also claims credit for influencing the president's favorable view of the Soviet leader Gorbachev, whose astrological chart indicated a genuine reformer.

The title of Quigley's book derives from the period in late 1986 when the Iran-Contra scandal broke. She claims that the president asked "What does Joan say?" and that her advice was to stay in the White House and say nothing, because his stars were bad and she feared another assassination attempt.

Although the revelations of astrological influence on a modern leader's actions and decisions may seem bizarre to Western people, it is my no means unusual in Eastern countries. Astrology plays a significant part in the life of people in India, and marriages, dates of important meetings, dedication of temples, and other decisions normally involve the services of an astrologer for millions of Indians in all walks of life, including politics.

Quimby, Phineas P(arkhurst) (1802–1866)

An early influential exponent of Mind Cure, later known as New Thought. Born February 16, 1802 in Lebanon, New Hampshire, he became a clockmaker before becoming interested in Mesmerism in 1838. He had great success in treating patients but eventually developed his own system based on mental influence. He practiced in Portland, Maine, from 1859 on, treating some 12,000 individuals during seven years.

Several of Quimby students, such as Warren Felt Evans (1817–1899), went on to pursue careers that built on Quimby's insights. Another student, Marry Baker Eddy (1821–1910), dropped Quimby's approach and developed her own system of spiritual healing which she termed Christian Science. One of Eddy's students, Emma Curtis Hopkins (1849–1925), brought a number of Eddy's former students together and created the New Thought Movement.

Quimby died January 16, 1866.

The Quincey P. Morris Dracula Society

Defunct vampire interest group in the United States. It was named for the most obscure of the major characters in the novel Dracula, the one most often written out of the story in Dracula plays and movies. The society issued a quarterly newsletter called Transfusion.

Quincunx

An astrology term denoting planets at a distance of five signs of 150 degrees from each other. The term was once generally used to denote a disposition of five objects (especially plants or trees) placed so that there is one in each corner of a square or rectangle with the fifth in the center. The use of the quincunx in various aspects throughout history was exhaustively discussed by the English physician and author Sir Thomas Browne (1605–1682) in his book The Garden of Cyrus (1658).

Quirinus (or Quirus)

A fabled precious stone, described as "a juggling stone, found in the nest of the hoopoo" (hoopoe bird). If laid on the chest of a sleeping person, it "forces him to discover his rogueries." The word quirinus is also used to describe the third of the ancient gods (after Jupiter and Mars).

Qvarnstrom, S(ven) Birger (1897– ?)

He studied at University of Lund and later held positions as an instructor in languages and political economics at colleges in the Swedish cities of Hälsingborg, Eskilstuna, Malmö, Orebro, and Norrköping.

He contributed to a number of Swedish newspapers as a columnist and literary critic, and as a member of the Swedish Society for Psychical Research he spent some years investigating psychic phenomena such as clairvoyance, telekinesis, and precognition.

R

Radcliffe, Maud Elizabeth Furse (Lady Gorell) (d. 1954)

In December 1980, an auction sale at Sotheby's, London, included a batch of over thirty letters to Bessie (Elizabeth) Radcliffe from poet William Butler Yeats, revealing that Radcliffe had acted as a Spiritualist medium for automatic writing during the occult researches of Yeats.

Radcliffe had been introduced to Yeats in the summer of 1913, possibly through Eva Fowler, friend of Olivia and Dorothy Shakespear and of Ezra Pound. The mediumship continued for some four years until Yeats married Georgie Hyde-Lees in 1917, after which his wife acted as his medium. Before his marriage, Yeats had initiated Georgie into the Stella Matutina temple of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn occult society.

Radcliffe's mediumistic activities remained through her lifetime. In 1922, she married Ronald Gorell Barnes, 3rd Baron Gorell (1884–1963); they had two sons and a daughter. Baron Gorell, C.B.E., O.B.E., had a distinguished military career, was deputy director of staff duties (Education) at the War Office (1918–20), and later served as Under-Secretary of State for Air (July 1921–October 1922). He was also the president of various societies, editor of Cornhill Magazine (1933–39), and the author of multiple volumes of poetry, fact, fiction, and religion.

The correspondence from Yeats sold at a Sotheby sale revealed that Radcliffe's mediumship had a profound influence on the poet, and in one letter he stated that her script "contained the most important evidence of the most important problem of the world" and in others: "I can never make known to you my profound gratitude. You have changed most things for me and I know not how far that change will go. A year ago your spirits saved me from serious error in a crisis of life."

Radha, Swami Sivananda (1911–1995)

Founder and spiritual leader of Yasodhara Ashram, Kootenay Bay, British Columbia, Canada. Swami Radha (born Ursula Sylvia Hellman) was born March 20, 1911, in Germany and demonstrated psychic ability when only a child. She was widowed twice during World War II and emigrated to Canada, in an effort to forget the horrors of the Nazi regime.

Hellman felt a strong urge for spiritual fulfillment, and during meditation she had a vision of a Hindu sage. A few days later, while looking at books in a Montreal store, she saw a photograph of the Hindu sage she had seen in meditation. His name was Swami Sivananda Saraswati, a famous yogi with an ashram at Rishikesh, India, in the foothills of the Himalayas.

Hellman wrote to Swami Sivananda and received a reply asking her to "come home" to India. With some considerable sacrifices, she finished up her job and traveled to Rishikesh, where she received intensive training in Hinduism and the integral yoga system taught by Sivananda. In January 1956, she was initiated as a renunciate (sannyasi) by Swami Sivananda and instructed to carry his spiritual message to the West. At that period, women swamis, particularly Westerners, were rare, and the prospect of returning to Canada without income was a daunting one, but with faith in her guru, Swami Radha returned to Canada. Slowly a society grew around her to spread yoga teachings of the spiritual life.

The Sivananda Ashram was originally founded at South Burnaby, Vancouver, British Columbia, but later moved to Kootenay Bay, British Columbia. While searching for a possible site in this area, Swami Radha found an ideal setting by the side of a lake, officially listed since 1897 as "Yasodhara." It was a good omen, since in Hinduism Yasoda is the foster-mother of Shree Krishna, an incarnation of God.

Under the name Yasodhara Ashram, the society occupied an 83-acre site with a lake, forests, and mountains, reminiscent of the foothills of India. Several acres have been cleared, and the ashram premises include residential buildings, a guest lodge, prayer room, print shop, bookstore, office, recording studio, and a Temple of All Faiths. Various workshop programs and courses are given in yoga and the spiritual teachings of East and West. There are no religious limitations, as the aim of the ashram is to integrate the spiritual ideals and practices of all major religions.

As spiritual director, Radha took steps to avoid a personality cult growing up around her and allowed no pictures of herself or of Sivananda in the prayer rooms. Instead, the basic spiritual light of different religions was emphasized by their traditional symbols. Besides her many books, Radha was responsible for issuing various recordings, including her teachings, which were available on Divine Light Invocation and Mantras: Songs of Yoga, published by Ashram Records.

Radha died November 30, 1995.

Radhasoami Satsang

An Indian spiritual movement, also known as Sat May (the way of the Saints), that emerged in the nineteenth century in northern India. It is one of the most important but least known of Indian religious movements, its teachers often being cited as either Hindus or Sikhs. The movement was founded in 1861 by Shiv Dayal Singh (1818–1878) of Agra, but had its base in the earlier teachings of Tulsi Singh who taught through the first four decades of the century. Known as "Soamiji Maharaj" by his disciples, he taught three basic principles of religious life: 1) Satguru, a term embracing the Absolute Lord and living human Master; 2) Shabd or sound current (spoken or written expression, and also inner spiritual sound); and 3) Satsang, association of devotees seeking spiritual truth.

Although drawing on Sikhism, Radhasoami had discarded the Sikh bible, the Adi Granth, in favor of a living Master Teacher (the Satguru). It has also elevated the yoga of the sound current to a preeminent position. The Satguru (or his appointed representative) initiates people into the practice. Members also gather in community, satsang, much as do Christians.

After Soamiji Maharaj passed away, he was succeeded by Rai Salig Ram, and in turn by Pandit Brahma Shankar Misra in 1907. After the passing of Brahma Shankar Misra, questions over the succession led to a division of the movement under two competing gurus: Sri Kamta Prasad Sinha (known as “Param Guru Sarkar Sahib”) and Buaji Maharaj, sister of Brahma Shankar Misra. Further divisions occurred throughout the twentieth century as different rival leaders emerged claiming a succession. Among the different Stagurus who have appeared in America seeking followers are Kirpal Singh, Guru Maharaj Ji, and Ajaib Singh. ECKANKAR and the several groups that have developed from it are Westernized groups based on Radhasoami teachings but without the Punjabi appearance of its leaders.

The two groups within the larger movement became known as the Radhasoami Satsang, Beas, and the Ruhani Satsang, both descended from the founder Shiv Dayal Singh through Baba Jaimal Singh, whose satsang was based at Beas, Punjab.

Baba Jaimal Singh passed away in 1903 and was succeeded by his disciple Sawan Singh (1858–1948). Sawan Singh had a profound influence in the spread of teachings relating to Shabd-Yoga, the pathway of sacred sound current. On the passing of Sawan Singh, he was succeeded by his grandson Charan Singh (b. 1916). Some disciples challenged Charan Singh’s leadership and began alternative movements. Amongst these was Kirpal Singh, who established the Ruhani Satsang in Delhi. Charan Singh initiated many thousands of people and the Beas groups expanded remarkably under his leadership. Kirpal Singh began the Ruhani Satsang in 1951 and in 1955 made the first of several trips to the west. An energetic leader, his movement spread around India, and because of his periodic presence, his movement grew in North America. Paul Twitchell (founder of ECKANKAR) was disciple of Kirpal Singh and left to found a movement which kept all of the substance of the tradition but had a new terminology and a Western facade. From ECKANKAR came the Movement of Spiritual Inner Awareness (MSIA) founded by John-Roger Hinkins; MasterPath founded by Gary Olsen; and the Ancient Teachings of the Masters founded by Darwin Gross. The Divine Light Mission (now known as Elan Vital), brought to the West by Guru Maharaj Ji in the early 1970s, represents a new infusion of an Indian-based Radhasoami lineage.

The teaching that a mystical sound current heard in meditation may bring about higher consciousness is central to Radhasoami beliefs and also had been an important part of the meditation techniques of traditional yoga practice, though it was a rare practice by the time of the career of Tulsi Singh. It was cited in such yoga manuals as the Hatha-Yoga-Pradipika of Svamarama Svamin and the Siva Samhita. It is also loosely related to the special significance attached to the sacred trisyllable AUM in the Hindu Vedanta.

Radiant School of Seekers and Servers

The Radiant School of Seekers and Servers was one of a number of occult groups drawn to Mount Shasta, the prominent mountain in northern California. Founded by Kenneth Wheeler in 1963, the original small group moved some years later to the village of Mount Shasta, at the base of the mountain. The school was a channeling group through whom “Phylos the Tibetan” spoke. “Phylos” is a disembodied entity who is claimed to have first spoken in the 1890s through Frederick Spencer Oliver. These channelings were collected and published in a book, A Dweller on Two Planets (1899). A second volume reported to be by “Phylos” appeared in 1940 as An Earth Dweller Returns and was channeled through one of the founders of the Lemurian Fellowship. In the 1960s “Phylos” began to speak again, and the material became the basis of the regular mailings sent to the supporters of the Radiant School.

The school taught a message of personal development in line with humanity’s ultimate life pattern, which in turn is in line with God’s universal plan. All people are expected to unfold their patterns in full. During our various lives on Earth, we are allowed to meet again all those we have previously interfered with and thus created karma (consequences). The divine plan assumes the right to health, happiness, and prosperity.

The school existed for several decades but disbanded in the early 1980s.

Radiesthesia

A development of the art of dowsing (water witching) which extends the specific use of indicators such as rod and pendulum form water finding, to various additional uses such as the tracing of missing persons, treasure hunting, and/or the diagnosis and treatment of disease. The term radiesthésie was coined in 1930 by the Abbé Bouly, in France, where the use of a pendulum has largely replaced the divining rod. L’Association des Amis de la Radiesthésie was founded in 1930 and the British Society of Dowers in 1933. International Congresses of Radiesthesia are held regularly in Europe. The terms “dowsing” and “radiesthesia” have become virtually synonymous, and in France “radiesthésie” is used to include all forms of dowsing.

The dowser or radiesthetist is an individual who is sensitive (and often unconsciously so) to hidden objects or other information and uses a simple indicator, primarily a dowsing rod or pendulum, to amplify this sensitivity. It is still not entirely clear if, or just what kind of, radiation might be involved, and many investigators believe the individual to be rather like a psychic medium, and certainly some of the special applications of radiesthesia seem nearer to ESP than conventional physics.

The pendulum is usually a small ball attached to a thread on the end of a short stick. It is best to use a nonspun thread or thin nylon since the twist in a thread may communicate extraneous movement to the pendulum bob. The stick is held just above its connection with the thread and the pendulum bob tends to gyrate or oscillate. The length of the thread can be adjusted by winding it round the stick, so that the pendulum movement is clearly visible. There are characteristic pendulum movements relating to various substances, indicated by the number of gyrations and whether their movement is clockwise or counterclockwise. Like the dowsing rod, the pendulum also seems to be drawn toward hidden objects.

The pendulum is often used to diagnose disease conditions in the body or indicate remedies. The pendulum is first adjusted over a healthy part of the body. When moved to an unhealthy area its movement changes.

Another use of the pendulum is simply to answer questions put to it, rather in the manner of a ouija board; “Yes” is usually indicated by a clockwise gyration and “No” by counterclockwise movement. An even more psychic use of the pendulum is known as “teleradiesthesia” or “superpendulism.” Instead of using a pendulum over an actual area in which underground water or minerals are sought, the operator holds the pendulum over a map of the district. Some claim that a subtle link exists between a locality and its symbolic representation on a map. Some teleradiesthetists have also used a map to trace the movements of a missing person.

Some operators use a hollow pendulum that accommodates a sample of the material sought. Others hold something connected with the object of their inquiries in one hand while using the pendulum in the other. Since the indications of a pendulum are subtle and may also be deflected by conscious or unconscious muscular movements, some preliminary study is recommended before practice. There is considerable literature on the subject and various reports of its use.

In the United States, the American Society of Dowsters, which encourages the practice of various forms of dowsing and gives guidance and information on the subject, may be contacted at P.O. Box 24, Brainerd St., Danville, VT 05828. In Great Britain, the British Society of Dowsters is concerned with all aspects of dowsing and radiesthesia and publishes a journal. It is located at Sycamore Cottage, Tamley Lane, Hastingleigh, Ashford, Kent, TN25 5HW, England.

Radiesthésie

Radiation-perception, the French word usually transliterated radiesthesia, the divining with pendulum or rod.

Radionic Association

Organization formed to promote knowledge and understanding of radionics as a method of healing at a distance using a specially designed instrument (the black box, originally developed by American physician Albert Abrams). The association also encourages use of the faculty of ESP.

The association includes a school of radionics, provides professional training, houses a library of relevant literature, and sponsors annual conventions. Publications include Radionics Quarterly, pamphlets, and monographs. Address: Baerlein House, Goose Green, Deddington, Banbury, Oxon OX15 0SZ, England.

Radionics

The instrumental detection of hypothesized vital energy patterns as a means of diagnosis and therapy of disease. In radionic theory, all living things radiate an electro-magnetic field which has different characteristics in health and disease conditions. Energy patterns are given a numerical value or “rate” usually calibrated on the dials of a diagnostic apparatus called a black box. The original black box, sometimes called the E.R.A. or Oscilloclast, was the invention of Dr. Albert Abrams, a San Francisco physician.

The black box consisted of several variable rheostats and a thin sheet of rubber mounted over a metal plate. A blood sample from the patient was put into the machine, which was connected with a metal plate placed on the forehead of a healthy person. By tapping on the abdomen of this person, the doctor determined the disease of the patient according to “areas of dullness” in relation to dial readings on the apparatus. This strange procedure brought together the special sensitivities of radiesthesia or dowsing and medical auscultation.

After the death of Abrams in 1924, his procedures were developed by Ruth Drown of the United States in the 1930s and George De la Warr in Britain. De la Warr devised black boxes that dispensed with the auscultation techniques of Abrams and even an apparatus which produced photographs relating to the condition of the patient whose sample was placed in the machine. De la Warr claimed that they registered a radiation pattern showing the shape and chemical structure of the radiating body, and given a suitable sample the camera plate would register not only regional tissue but also its pathology.

It should be noted that Abrams was attacked by the American Medical Association, but in England a committee of the British Medical Association gave him some initial approval in 1924. Then in 1950 Drown was given a test under the auspices of the American Medical Association. It was completely negative and had the effect of driving radionics out of the United States. Defenders of radionics have argued that the worth of the diagnostic techniques is based upon the consciousness of the operator, a fact which in itself takes the practice out of the realm of medical science and into the field of parapsychology and spiritual healing.

In England, the De la Warr Laboratories designs and manufactures radionic instruments and offers diagnosis and treatment for patients. It may be contacted at Raleigh Park, Oxford, UK. There is also a Radionic Association in Britain, which trains and represents radionic practitioners, located at Field House, Peaslake, Guildford, Surrey.

In the late 1960s, William A. Tiller, then chairman of the Department of Material Medicine at Stanford University, reported favorably on his experience in 1971. In 1975 an important development in American radionics studies was the U.S. Radionic Congress held in Indianapolis, Indiana, April 19–20, 1975, at which papers on research in the field were presented and discussed. Amongst those present was Thomas G. Hieronymus, regarded as the dean of American radionics researchers, whose patented invention of a machine to analyze a new type of radiation in 1949 led to American interest in radionics under the name psionics. Psionic was a term coined by John Campbell, Jr., editor of Astounding Science Fiction, to denote a combination of radionics and psi phenomena. He gave instructions for building a Hieronymus machine in the June 1956 issue of ASF.

Raelian Movement

A flying saucer religious movement that originated in France in 1973 from the claims of contact with extraterrestrials by former motor-racing journalist Claude Vorilhon. Vorilhon claimed that on December 1, 1973, he encountered a small humanoid being who arrived on Earth in a spacecraft. The entity, addressing him in French, told Vorilhon that he had been chosen to spread a message of love, peace, and fraternity to all people. The substance of their continued contacts was published in 1974 in The Message Given to Me by Extra-Terrestrials (originally published in French). Vorilhon was given a new name, Rael, by the extraterrestrials.

According to the space beings, humankind is the product of experiments by an extraterrestrial race, the Elohim (a Hebrew term generally translated in the Bible as "God"). In their scientific experiments, the Elohim succeeded in creating life and eventually produced a humanlike creature. Their governmental authorities ordered them to continue their work elsewhere, and Earth was the chosen site.

The Elohim eventually left Earth, but returned in 1973 because of the threats of atomic war. The Elohim, according to Vorilhon, now wish to assist humanity in controlling aggressive urges that threaten the race with total annihilation. They have requested that an embassy be constructed where they can meet with world leaders. The construction of such a meeting place is high on the Raelians' agenda.

Rael organized those who read his book and adhered to his message into a Raelian movement. It is structured hierarchically. Leaders are termed guides, with Rael designated a sixth-level guide. He is assisted by 12 fifth-level guides scattered around the world overseeing the spreading movement. The growth of the movement has been assisted by the translation of Rael's work into some 25 languages. The movement moved into North America through French-speaking Canada in 1976.

Ragnarok

A term meaning "rain of dust," derived from an ancient Scandinavian legend of a titanic conflict between gods and giants. It was also the title of a book by the Minnesota congressman and senator Ignatius Donnelly (1831–1901). More than a century before Immanuel Velikovsky's bestselling Worlds in Collision, Donnelly's book speculates that a comet passed close to or struck the earth in ancient times, causing cataclysmic changes dimly remembered in mythologies and scripture history.

Donnelly was an original thinker, and although some of his ideas may not stand up to modern scientific scrutiny, the theme of catastrophism has remained a persistent if minority opinion in contemporary science.

According to Hindu mythology, Rahu is a demon who swallows the sun and moon. He is the cause of eclipses, and Rahu and Ketu are the ascending and descending nodes in Hindu astronomy.

Rajneesh (Journal)

A publication formerly issued by the Shree Rajneesh Ashram located in Poona, India. It contained lectures by Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh, a controversial Spiritual teacher (guru) who expounded an eclectic teaching which combined elements of Sufism, Hinduism, and modern human potentials perspective. Translated into a variety of languages, it tied together the growing international movement through the 1970s.

During the last years of his life, Rajneesh took the name Osho and the Center in Poona became known as Osho Commune International. The worldwide Osho movement is now served by the Osho International Times.

Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shree (1931–1990)

Controversial Indian spiritual teacher, known since 1988 within the movement he established as "Osho." From modest beginnings in India, he built up a worldwide following, which experienced a major crisis in 1985 when the community he was building in Oregon fell apart after four years of conflict with residents of the town of Antelope, Oregon, and their allies throughout the state. The disintegration of the center occurred in the midst of scandal surrounding various criminal exploits planned and committed by community leaders, several of whom were later tried and convicted.

Rajneesh was born Mohan Chandra Rajneesh, on December 11, 1931, in Kutchwara, India, with a Jain religious background. At age seven he attended the Gunj School at Gadwara, where he showed great intelligence. He went on to study at Jabalpur University (B.A., 1955) and the University of Saugar (M.A., 1957).

According to those who knew him, he was a fearless child, given to playing pranks and fascinated by the occult and hypnosis. He was also said to have been obsessed with death and sex. An astrologer had predicted that he might die at age 21. In surviving that year, he was said to have achieved total enlightenment.

He read widely, was an independent thinker, and displayed an original approach to traditional Indian concepts, often at odds with authority. In 1968 he became a traveling lecturer on the theme of the importance and sacredness of sex as a step on the path to higher consciousness. He was greatly impressed with the personality and teachings of Georgei Gurdjieff, whose concepts he knew through reading the books of his disciple Peter D. Ouspensky. His absorption of Gurdjieff's philosophy affected his style of leadership as a guru (teacher). He began to write books as Acharya [Professor] Rajneesh.

Basic to his teachings was a spiritual practice called "dynamic (or chaotic) meditation," said to be especially suitable for Western consciousness and physique. This involved fast intensive breathing, intended to break through tensions and related emotional blocks, followed by a cathartic release of emotional energy (rather like the latihan in Subud). The Sufi mantra "Hoo" was then shouted intensely, to further raise the energy level, with special effects on the sexual centers of the body. This was followed by a period of absolute stillness and silence, during which a form of meditation ensued.

The concept of emotional tensions rooted in different segments of the body recalls the "muscular armoring" postulated by Wilhelm Reich, whose therapeutic techniques also involved intensive breathing to achieve catharsis. The relationship between sexual energy and higher consciousness had been charted in ancient Hindu texts on kundalini, but the idea of achieving higher consciousness through unrestrained sexual expression differs somewhat from Hindu tantric yoga teachings, which involve disciplined sexual activity under exacting conditions. Rajneesh's teachings, which seemed to offer sanction for unrestrained sexual activity, had a great appeal to Western seekers of Eastern wisdom who were experiencing the freedoms of the modern sexual revolution.

In 1970 Rajneesh established a following in Bombay, where he assumed the title "Bhagwan" (Lord) and was seen by his followers as a spiritually enlightened master. In 1974 he acquired land for an ashram in Poona (southeast of Bombay), which became his headquarters for the rest of the decade. Here Western devotees flocked for a period before returning to their homes to spread the movement worldwide. Rajneesh himself is author of more than a hundred books in Hindu, and almost as many in English (almost all transcripts of the talks he gave over the years). Many have been translated into German, Japanese, Dutch, Italian, French, Spanish, and Portuguese.

Rajneesh retained some aspects of the traditional Hindu guru-chela (teacher-pupil) relationship. He termed his devotees neosannyasins. Devotees initiated into his movement were required to don the traditional robe of a renunciate (though it was red rather than ochre) and wear a mala (rosary necklace). They assumed new spiritual names. Seeing Rajneesh's followers adopt the trappings of the renounced life (sannyas) was greatly offensive to many Hindus, since a renunciate normally renounced sex, wealth, and family ties. The neosannyasins did not renounce ties to the world; rather, they saw themselves entering into a more conscious life. The spectacle of devotees advocating wildly permissive sexual activity while clad in the robes of renunciation, however, seemed a travesty of Hindu religion.

Through the late 1970s there were many complaints from local residents about the activities of the Rajneesh Foundation. A few of the female devotees turned to prostitution in order to make enough money to stay at the ashram. Drugs were forbidden at the ashram, but some devotees succumbed to the temptation of lucrative rewards as drug runners, and several were caught and prosecuted. There were also problems of sexually transmitted diseases, especially herpes, among the promiscuous followers. At one point, a British devotee allegedly made advances to an Indian lady outside the ashram, and enraged local residents attacked the devotees. The Indian authorities questioned the charitable status of the ashram, which had reputedly acquired some $80 million in donations in only a few years, and the ashram accountants were accused of not keeping proper receipts and documentation. The state charity commissioners in Bombay ruled against the ashram, which was pursued for some $4 million in unpaid taxes.

In 1981 Rajneesh astonished and bewildered many of his followers by suddenly leaving the ashram with a handful of key workers who were involved in his secret plans and moving to the United States. Shortly thereafter the ashram was closed and many of the items accumulated there were sold. The Rajneesh Foundation was disbanded, and a new corporation, Rajneesh International, was founded in the United States.

The American Years

A prominent figure in handling Rajneesh's practical affairs was his disciple Ma Anand Sheela (Sheela Ambalal Patel), who had been a key figure in ashram activities since first joining the guru in 1972. She had found the mansion in Montclair, New Jersey, where the guru and his staff first became established in the United States, and she next set about locating a larger site for a more ambitious American ashram community.

In July 1981 she oversaw the purchase of the 64,000-acre Big Muddy Ranch and lands in eastern Oregon, near the village of Antelope, for $5.75 million. Over the next two months, some two hundred devotees settled in, building 50 new houses. Rajneesh himself had arrived in August, ostensibly "on a visit," in order to avoid immigration rules. Plans were made to construct an ashram city on 2,000 acres of the site, to be named Rajneeshpuram. Large sums of money amounting to some $120 million flowed into the project from sympathizers and Indian assets.

Local residents fiercely opposed the creation of an ashram city, and environmentalists organized against the movement. In the face of an increasingly hostile situation, with those opposed to the ashram taking every legal means to slow its development and harass its members, Sheela and her associates became increasingly paranoid and moved to solidify their position. Their plans began to take on a conspiratorial nature, and efforts were made both to subvert Oregon's liberal voting laws (which allowed new residents to vote immediately), and to organize criminal acts to stop their local detractors (including plans to spread salmonella bacteria). The commune eventually collapsed when some of the criminal plans became known to authorities and a federal court ruled against the union of religion and government implied in the Rajneeshpuram charter.

During the period of disintegration, internal conflict at the highest level broke out. It was discovered that Sheela had installed listening devices at houses in the commune and even bugged Rajneesh's own bedroom. The two severed their relationship. In September 1985 Sheela and some other officials fled from Oregon to Europe, and Rajneesh called news conferences to state that the commune was now "free from a fascist regime," accusing Sheela of maintaining a secret "poison lab" and trying to kill his personal doctor, dentist, and housekeeper. He claimed that she poisoned Jefferson County District Attorney Michael Sullivan, who had suffered a serious undiagnosed illness during a 1983 dispute with Sheela. In response, in an interview with a German magazine, Sheela denied these charges and also the accusation that she had created a $55 million debt at the commune in a fraud scheme, diverting some of the funds to a Swiss bank account. She countercharged that the commune debts arose from the guru's opulent tastes.

Meanwhile back at the Rajneesh ranch, the guru ordered the burning of 5,000 copies of The Book of Rajneeshism, along with many pendants and the red robes formerly worn by Sheela, thus symbolizing a repudiation of the ideas and projects that he attributed to Sheela rather than to himself.

In October 1985, as authorities were building a strong case against him on a variety of charges, Rajneesh suddenly left Rajneeshpuram. A Lear jet took him and a few officials of his movement to an undisclosed destination, but when the jet landed at Charlotte, North Carolina, for refueling, police had already been alerted. On October 28 he was arrested, together with six followers. Coincidentally, on the same day, Sheela and two associates were arrested in Germany. Rajneesh was handcuffed and taken back to Oregon to stand trial, but his progress in and out of jail and across several states was marked by a manner of simple dignity and became more like a triumphant procession.

The authorities were never able to connect him with crimes on the ranch, but he was found guilty of immigration violation and conspiracy to evade visa regulations (charges his followers claimed were entirely bogus). He was fined $400,000, given a suspended prison sentence of ten years, and ordered to leave the United States for a minimum of five years. Sheela was returned from Germany on charges of attempted murder, poisoning, and wiretapping. She was jailed for four and a half years. After his sentence, Rajneesh left the country on what became a world tour. He became persona non grata all over the world. Countries that refused him entry or expelled him after entry include Antigua, Australia, Bermuda, Canada, Costa Rica, England, Fiji, France, Greece, Holland, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Mauritius, Seychelles, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay, Venezuela, and West Germany. Legal proceedings growing out of the fall of Rajneeshpuram continued into the mid-1990s.

Eventually Rajneesh returned to Poona and reestablished the ashram there. Eventually the ranch and its assets were sold and the movement in the United States returned to the decentralized state it was in before the founding of the Rajneeshpuram. In the wake of the fall, a number of books, including several by former members in the leadership of Rajneeshpuram, appeared. At Poona, Rajneesh continued to teach, and his disciples published an equal number of volumes aimed at his vindication. In 1988 the first national gathering of American followers since the fall of Rajneeshpuram was held. The movement reorganized and has continued to the present.

In 1988 Rajneesh changed his name to Osho (i.e., one upon whom the heavens shower flowers). He had begun to develop some new meditation techniques that were barely shared with the followers in India when on January 19, 1990, he suddenly died amid charges that the American government had poisoned him. The international movement continued under the leadership of senior disciples in Poona, there being no guru arising to take Rajneesh's place. Osho Commune International is headquartered at 17 Koregeon Park, Poona 411 001, MS, India. The American headquarters can be reached at Osho Viha Meditation Center, P.O. Box 352, Mill Valley, CA 94942.

Raj-Yoga Math and Retreat

A monastic community founded in 1974 by Yogi Father Satchakrananda Bodhisattvaguru on an ecumenical basis, combing both Hindu and Christian traditions and practices. Satchakrananda started yoga practice in 1967 and is said to have experienced the raising of kundalini energy after only two months. He went on to spend a period at a Trappist monastery, attended Kenyon College, and became coordinator of the Northwest Free University, where he taught hatha yoga. In 1973, he was mystically initiated by the late Swami Sivananda (1887–1963), founder of the Divine Life Society, Rishikesh, India, and went on to found his own monastic community the following year. In 1977, he was ordained a priest by independent Archbishop H. Adrian Spruit of the Church of Antioch and has since combined teaching of traditional yoga practices with regular celebration of the Mass.

The small community is located in the foothills of Mt. Baker overlooking the Nooksuck River near Deming, Washington. The Math offers classes for residents and may be contacted at P.O. Box 547, Deming, WA 98244.

Rakoczi, The Master the Prince

One of the masters originally contacted by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society. According to theosophical teachings there exists a spiritual hierarchy composed of individuals who have finished their round of earthly reincarnations and have evolved to the spiritual planes, from which they guide the affairs of humanity. Those members of the hierarchy closest to humanity are the "lords of the seven rays" (of the light spectrum). Each ray represents a particular virtue, which the lord of that ray exemplifies.

The prince Rakoczi is the master of the seventh ray, concerned with ordered service or ceremonial magic. He is involved with the ceremonial aspect of religion and magic, especially the ancient mysteries. He is also occupied with the volatile political situation in Europe and North America and speaks many languages.

Reportedly, Rakoczi has had numerous incarnations. He was, successively, Saint Alban (third century C.E.), Proclus (a Neoplatonic philosopher, 410–85 C.E.), Roger Bacon (1220–92), Christian Rosencrutz (1378–1484), Hunyadi Janos (1387–1456), Robertus the monk (sixteenth century), and Francis Bacon (1561–1626). In his last incarnation he was a Hungarian prince, the last surviving member of the Hungarian Rokoczi family, and known throughout Europe as the Comte de Saint Germain. He still inhabits that body.

As Prince Rakoczi, this master was not as prominent in theosophical literature as some others, even though he became the subject of a popular book by Isabel Cooper-Oakley. He was lifted out of obscurity, however, after Guy W. Ballard claimed to have encountered him in 1929 on the slopes of Mt. Shasta. Saint Germain became the patron of the "I Am Religious Activity," and all of the groups that have emerged from it, such as the Bridge to Spiritual Freedom and the Church Universal and Triumphant, have given him a prominent place in their teachings.

Rakshasa

An Indian demon. In one of the Indian folktales he appears black as soot, with hair yellow as the lightning, looking like a thunder-cloud. He made himself a wreath of entrails and wore a sacrificial cord of hair; he gnawed the flesh of a man's head and drank blood out of a skull, thus adding him to the list of the world's vampires. In other stories, these rakshasas have formidable tusks, flaming hair, and insatiable hunger. They wander about the forests catching animals and eating them.

Rakshasas feature in the Hindu religious epic of the Ramayana. When the monkey god Hanuman goes to the city of Lanka in search of Sita, he sees rakshasas of many varied kinds, some disgusting in appearance, others quite beautiful.

"Some had long arms and fearful shapes; some were fat, others very lean, some were dwarfs, others exceedingly tall. Some had only one eye and others one ear. Some had monstrous bellies, hanging breasts, projecting teeth and crooked thighs; others were exceedingly beautiful in appearance and clothed in splendor. Some had two legs, some three legs and some four legs. Some had the heads of donkeys, some the heads of horses and some the heads of elephants."

Rama, Swami (1925–1996)

Well-known Indian teacher of yoga, meditation, and holistic health. At an early age he was ordained as a monk by a great sage of the Himalayas and later journeyed to numerous monasteries and caves, studying with many spiritual masters. Notable teachers he encountered included Mahatma Gandhi, Rabindranath Tagore, Sri Aurobindo, and Sri Ramana Maharshi. He studied psychology and philosophy in Varanasi and Prayas, India, and received a medical degree from Darbhanga Medical School in 1945. At a later date, he pursued a formal education at Oxford University, continuing his studies of Western psychology and philosophy in Germany and Holland for three years before coming to the United States in 1969. In the following year, he served as a consultant to the Voluntary Controls Project of the Research Department of the Menninger Foundation at Topeka, Kansas. Under scientific controls, he demonstrated such feats as manipulating his heartbeat at will to 300 beats per minute (effectively stopping the flow of blood) for seventeen seconds.

The publication of the results of such tests generated a new medical interest in body-mind relationships and spurred public interest in yoga techniques among young adults already involved in reacting to the steady arrival of new Indian spiritual teachers.

Swami Rama consistently sought to establish a clear scientific basis for the practice of yoga and meditation. He published books and audiotapes for the Himalayan International Institute of Yoga Science and Philosophy, first located in a Chicago suburb, which he founded in 1971. The institute later moved to Honesdale, Pennsylvania, and has a 422-acre campus in the Pocono Mountains of northeastern Pennsylvania. Branch centers have also been established throughout the United States. The Swami also continued to teach and write from his centers in India. He is widely respected in the East, where he held, and later renounced, the office of Shankaracharya, Indian's highest spiritual position. His lifetime of contributing to a reconciliation of scientific and spiritual knowledge brought him the Martin Buber Award for Service to Humanity in 1977. As the scientific interest in yoga declined through the 1980s, Swami Rama led the Himalayan Institute until his death in 1996. The last few months of his life were filled with accusations of sexual assault and harassment from several women against himself and the Himalayan Institute. In 1997, after the Swami had died, one of the women pressing charges was awarded almost two million dollars in damages posthumously.

Ramacharaka, Yogi (1862–1932)

Religious name of American writer/editor William Walker Atkinson. He was born on December 5, 1862, in Baltimore, Maryland. He went into business as a young man and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1894 and the Illinois bar 1903. He underwent a profound change after experiencing a nervous breakdown. He found healing through New Thought metaphysics and moved to Chicago where he emerged as a major advocate of the new faith. In that cause he became associate editor of the magazine Suggestion (1900–05), co-editor with his colleague Sydney Flowers of New Thought (1901–5), and later edited Advanced Thought (Chicago, 1916–19). He founded the Atkinson School of Mental Science and authored a large number of popular books on New Thought, Self-Healing, Mind-Power, and psychic phenomena.

During this time he was also introduced to yoga exercises, and the whole of the yogi philosophy. In 1903 he began to write books on yoga using the pseudonym Yogi Ramacharaka. Through the next several decades thirteen titles appeared and Atkinson thus became one of the earliest propagandists of and an important figure in the development of Hinduism in North America. His books on yoga and occultism were issued by the Yogi Publication Society, now located in Jacksonville, Florida, and continue to be reprinted. Atkinson died in California on November 22, 1932.

Ramakrishna, Sri (1836–1886)

An important Indian spiritual teacher on Vedanta and mystic of the nineteenth-century Hindu Renaissance. He was born February 18, 1836, in a village in Bengal, after the divine hero Sri Rama had appeared in a vision to an old Brahmin named Khudiram, saying that he would be reborn as his son. In due course, the boy was born and named Gadadhar. He grew up to worship the goddess Kali, the great mother, and even when he was obliged to marry, he directed his veneration toward his bride, identifying her with Kali. At the age of eighteen, Gadadhar was taken to Calcutta by his brother Ramkumar, whom he assisted as a teacher.

He settled in a temple at Dakshineswar, where he became known as “Ramakrishna,” and after a period of intense spiritual discipline had ecstatic visions and trances. He was virtually intoxicated with the bliss of samadhi or divine trance, and a number of miracles were credited to him. A group of young spiritual seekers informally gathered around him. One of these, Swami Vivekananda, went to the United States in 1893 to speak to the World’s Parliament of Religions. Given the strong public response to his presentation, he stayed on and in 1894 founded the Vedanta Society of New York, the first of a number of similar centers now present in the west. Upon his return to India he organized the followers of Ramakrishna into the Ramakrishna Order, which continues to spread the teachings of Ramakrishna and Vivekananda worldwide.

Sri Ramakrishna passed into the mahasamadhi (great sleep) of death August 16, 1886. The Ramakrishna Order is today the largest and most widely known monastic order in India, with colleges, schools, hospitals, relief projects, and publishing houses. Publications and information are available from Sri Ramakrishna Math, Mylapore, Madras 4, India, or from the American branches: Vedanta Press & Book Shop, 1946 Vedanta Pl., Hollywood, CA 90028; Vedanta Society, 2323 Vallejo St., San Francisco, CA 94123; Vedanta Society, 34 W. 71 St., New York, NY 10023.

Raman, Bangalore Venkata (1912–1998)

Prominent Indian astrologer, born in Madras, India, on August 12, 1912. His grandfather B. Suryanarain Rao was also a prominent astrologer. In 1930 Raman became coeditor with his grandfather of The Astrological Magazine, founded by Rao in 1895, and gradually assumed complete control of it and of Raman Publications, an astrological publishing house in Bangalore. He published his first book, A Manual of Hindu Astrology, in 1935.

Raman spent his life writing on astrology, challenging the Western scientific view of the field as a pseudoscience or under the umbrella of occultism. After World War II his works began to circulate in England and the United States, introducing Vedic astrology to Europe and North America. Raman died in December 1998.

Ramana Maharshi, Sri (1879–1950)

An important twentieth-century Indian spiritual teacher, whose life and teachings have been cited as an example of the classic God-realized sage. Born December 30, 1879, in the village of Tiruchuzhi, near Madura, South India, he was the second son of a pleader or solicitor. The boy attended elementary school at Tiruchuzhi and Dindigul, and went on to Scott’s Middle School, Madura, and the American Mission High School.

As a boy, he was impressed by a casual remark from a visitor that he had come from Arunachalam, a holy place in Tiruvannamalai, and his mind was directed to study of the lives of Tamil saints. At the age of seventeen, he had a strange mystical experience following a period in a trance-like condition. He felt that he was going to die, but perceived that only the body could die, the true self being independent. He lost interest in his studies and felt an intense desire to go to Arunachalam.

On August 29, 1896, he renounced his everyday life and set out for Arunachalam, where he spent the rest of his life in a condition of mystical meditation which transformed his understanding. Impervious to physical or mental discomforts, he remained in ecstatic spiritual meditation, at first in complete silence, living under a tree, or in temples, accepting minimum food which he ate mechanically.

In the course of time, the young renunciate attracted the attention of devotees, who found that he was able to answer the most abstruse metaphysical questions with wit and incisive wisdom. Eventually a religious settlement grew up around him, and he was visited by devotees from all over India and even from western countries.

He gave no formal teaching as such, but merely answered questions put to him in such a way that traditional Hindu metaphysical teachings had personal relevance to the questioner. His constant theme was the discovery of the essential Self present in all beings, summarized in the formulation “Who Am I?”

His statements combined metaphysical subtlety and simplicity, while his gentle and perceptive presence was inspiring to his devotees. Even the local creatures (monkeys, cows, peacocks, birds) were attracted to him as if to a latter-day St. Francis of Assisi. He was also visited by leading Western scholars and seekers, including Paul Brunton and W. Y. Evans-Wentz.

In his later years, he developed various illnesses and a cancerous tumor on his left elbow, but remained indifferent to intense physical pain. He passed into the mahasamadhi (great sleep) of death on April 14, 1950, after assuring devotees of continued presence. He stated “I am not going away. Where could I go? I am here.” This implied the omnipresence of the Universal Self. At the precise moment of death a large star was seen to trail slowly across the sky. It was witnessed by the famous French photographer Henri Cartier-Bresson, who was visiting the ashram at the time.

The ashram is still in existence and has published a number of books dealing with the teachings of Sri Ramana Maharshi. A biography by Arthur Osborne was published in London, 1957, and reissued by Jaico paperbacks, Bombay, 1958. The ashram is located at: Sri Ramananasramam, Tiruvannamalai, South India.

A North American branch, the Arunchala Ashrama, with centers in Canada and the United States, has been founded with headquarters at 72–63 Yellowstone Blvd., Forest Hills, NY 11375.

Name assumed by Richard Alpert, associate of Dr. Timothy Leary, after giving up the psychedelic revolution of the 1960s and embracing traditional Hindu mysticism.

Ramer, Andrew (1951–)

Andrew Ramer, a contemporary channeler and angelologist, was born into a Jewish family. He attended the University of California–Berkeley, from which he graduated in 1973 with a B.A. in religious studies. He held a variety of jobs through the next decade, but also began to teach meditation and gay spirituality in the San Francisco Bay area and emerged as a channeler of various spirit entities. In his workshops, he began to relate traditional heterosexual occult techniques such as tantra to homoeroticism. In his first book, Two Flutes Playing: Spiritual Love/Sacred Sex: Priests of Father Earth and Mother Sky (1990), his spirit guides spoke to the situation of gay men seeking a spiritual way of being. They asserted that gay men are tuned differently, a fact that allows them to be drawn to each other. The same year his book appeared, Ramer joined with three like-minded associates, including Atlanta spiritual writer John R. Stowe, to found Gay Spirit Visions, a national association of men exploring alternative spiritualities, and remains an active leader.

Through the 1990s, Ramer has become best known for his writing about and channeling of angels. He believed that angels, who neither marry nor are given in marriage, appear to be genderless or of the same gender, and that they can be considered homosexual, and thus fitting spiritual resources for gay men. He argues that there are gay guides, gay angels, and gay heavens. His speculation resulted in two bestselling books, Ask Your Angels: A Practical Guide to Working with Angels to Enrich Your Life (1992) and Angel Answers: A Joyful Guide to Creating Heaven on Earth (1995). His most recent book, Revelations for a New Millennium, appeared in 1997.

Ramirez, Richard (1960–)

Richard Ramirez, Satanist and serial killer, was born on February 29, 1960, in El Paso, Texas, the son of Julian and Mercedes Ramirez, Mexican immigrants. In his childhood, it was discovered that he was epileptic and subject to sporadic seizures. He also came under the influence of his Green Beret cousin who introduced him to marijuana and who taught him to fight and kill. He took to a life of crime, stealing money to pay for his drugs. Still in his teens, he began to imagine himself a child of Satan. At age 16 he was arrested for breaking into a room at the hotel where he worked part time, and raping a woman. He was released when the judge believed his story that the woman had lured him to the room for sex. In 1978, after turning 18, he moved to Los Angeles, California. By this time he was an accomplished burglar.

In Los Angeles, Ramirez's drug habit deepened as did the intensity of his crimes. He briefly flirted with the Church of Satan but quickly reverted to his loner ways. He did, however, have a deep belief that Lucifer would both protect and empower him. He was seemingly proved correct, as for several years he existed freely as a criminal. In June of 1984, however, he began the new phase of his life that was to bring him both notoriety and a lifetime in jail. For more than a year he operated in the Los Angeles suburbs burglarizing homes and savagely killing the residents, leaving occult symbols, usually an inverted pentagram (five-pointed star), behind.

In June of 1985, the police announced that a serial killer was loose in Los Angeles. The press called him the "Night Stalker." The following month, Ramirez finally left a clue to his identity behind, a fingerprint in a getaway car. Identified, Ramirez soon found his picture everywhere in the media, and people in the Mexican-American community where he lived recognized him and almost killed him before the police arrived to arrest him.

Ramirez was convicted on multiple counts of murder and rape and sentenced to death. Defiant, he scrawled a pentagram on the palm of his hand to show reporters. After the trial he still believed that Lucifer would avenge him. Though there was an overtone of occultism to his crimes, Ramirez proved in the end to be more like other serial killers than those involved in the occult, even the great majority of those who consider themselves Satanists.

As this edition goes to press, Ramirez remains alive and in prison while appeals to his death sentence are proceeding through the courts. In 1996 he married Doreen Lloyd, one of a handful of Ramirez female groupies who emerged over the years since his trial.

Rampa, T(uesday) Lopsang (ca. 1911–1981)

Pseudonym of British author Cyril Henry Hoskins, whose first book, The Third Eye (1956), became a sensational bestseller. It purported to be written by a Tibetan lama and described a kind of occult leucotomy in which his "third eye," in the center of his forehead, was opened surgically, resulting in his psychic powers. It was soon followed by a sequel, Doctor From Lhasa (1959).

The books were well-written, but people knowledgeable of Tibet soon began to find numerous errors and inconsistencies. There is no tradition of surgical opening of the third eye, which is considered a structure in the subtle body, a concept underlying the practice of meditation techniques in various yoga systems.

An initial perceptive review appeared in the journal Tomorrow in 1958, in which the Tibetan scholar Chen Chi Chang declared the book literary entertainment, stating: "we have here a work of interesting and highly imaginative fiction—but certainly not . . . a source of authentic information on Buddhist teachings or training."

While this review was being published, an independent inquiry was undertaken by Clifford Burgess, a Liverpool (England) detective, on behalf of a group of Tibetan scholars. Burgess tracked down Hoskins to a village overlooking Dublin Bay in the Irish Republic and revealed that Hoskins had never been in Tibet or had an operation on his forehead.

Hoskins was the son of Joseph Henry Hoskins, a plumber. After leaving school he assisted his father for a time, and when his father died in 1937 he lived with his mother in Nottinghamshire. He worked for a surgical instrument company, then became a clerk with a correspondence school, teaching time and motion studies. About this time he shaved his head, grew a beard and adopted the name of “Dr. Kuan-suo.” Later, with his wife, Sanya, he moved to Ireland. After exposure of his hoax, Hoskins attempted to recover by arguing that his own body had been taken over by the spirit of a Tibetan lama. He went on to write a number of other successful books that built on the original story and rehashed standard occult and psychic themes.

He died of heart trouble January 25, 1981, in Calgary, Alberta, Canada. His books have remained in print and continue to sell to an audience unaware of the fraud.

“Ramtha”

Spirit guide channeled through J. Z. Knight. According to Knight, “Ramtha” first made himself known in 1977 when he appeared to her one Sunday afternoon in 1977 in her home in Tacoma, Washington. Over a period of months, she became used to his presence and to his use of her body, through which he began to speak. In the 1980s he became the center of a movement that emerged in the context of the larger New Age movement. Knight became the most successful of the plethora of channels who became so definitive of the New Age.

Ramtha described himself as having lived on Earth some thirty-five thousand years previously. He was born in Lemuria, described as a section of the ancient continent of Atlatia (or Atlantis). When Ramtha was still a youth, the Atlatians misused their vast technology and created a disaster—the northern half of the continent, including Lemuria, was destroyed. The Lemurians had to seek a new home in the south; Ramtha’s family relocated to Onai, the great port city of Atlatia.

After the disaster the Atlatian social system fell apart and was replaced with a feudal-like structure with the Lemurians at the bottom. After his mother’s death, Ramtha fled to the mountains to nurture his anger. It became focused on the Atlatians, and he soon returned to Onai at the head of an army. He conquered the city and found a new life as a warrior. He became a conqueror who was stopped only by an assassin’s sword.

He survived, but had to endure a lengthy healing process. He used the time for contemplation of the Unknown God to be found in the life force. The death wish that had dominated his life to that point and led him to become a warrior was replaced with a desire to embrace life. His search for the Unknown God led him to contemplate the wind. The wind was powerful, free-moving, without boundaries, limits, or form. The image of the wind beckoned to Ramtha to exist unbounded by the common human limitations, including death. His contemplation over a number of years led first to an out-of-the-body experience. But as his concentration continued, his very bodily vibration changed and he rose as a body of light. He had conquered life, and, leaving his earthly existence, he ascended.

Now, thirty-five thousand years later, he returned to teach what he had learned, through the instrument of a young woman. The essence of his teachings was that each person is a god, a master, who has forgotten his or her origin. In remembering and coming to understand one’s true nature, the individual can become a creator who can have whatever he or she desires.

Ramtha’s teachings came forth in the mid 1980s through a series of “dialogues,” usually weekend gatherings at which Knight would channel Ramtha. These came to an end in 1987 and were replaced by Ramtha’s School of Enlightenment (RSE), a more structured course that included a program developed for students. While the dialogue sessions had been held around the country, and even overseas, RSE is centered entirely on Knight’s ranch in rural Washington, where students gather several times a year for intensive sessions of philosophical instruction and spiritual practice.

RSE allows more systematic instruction in Ramtha’s Gnostic theology. The universe emanated in stages from God, described as absolute potentiality, says Ramtha. Each stage of creation was marked by a slowing of the frequency of the energy out of which the universe has been created. Individual entities, gods, have been embodied in each stage of creation and now have come into physical embodiment to grow and experience life, he says.

The primary problem of humans is having accepted the limitation of physical existence, Ramtha teaches, when in fact, they are gods with vast powers. The spiritual practice of the school, based in concentration and pranayama-like breathing, is designed to teach students to remember and use their godly powers.

Rand, William

William Rand, prominent teacher of the Reiki system of healing and founder of the Center for Reiki Training in suburban Detroit, Michigan, was a professional astrologer and hypnotherapist living in Hawaii in the 1970s at the time that the existence of the Reiki healing system became known. Reiki, a Japanese healing system, had been developed early in the twentieth century by Mikao Usui, a Buddhist layman. He passed his teachings to several students, among whom was Dr. Chujiro Hayashi. In the 1930s Hayashi passed his succession to a Ms. Hawayo Takata (1900–1980), a Japanese-American who resided in Hawaii. Takata practiced Reiki quietly in the Japanese-American community until the 1970s, when she began to teach non-Japanese for the first time and made the Anglo world aware of its existence.

Rand took his initial Reiki class from Bethal Phaigh in Hawaii in 1981, the year after Takata’s death. Phaigh was one of the first Reiki Masters, who had the knowledge to pass on the teachings initiated by Takata. He took the second intermediate degree from Phaigh in 1982 and subsequently studied with other Reiki teachers. He received his own Reiki Master training from Diane McCumber and Marlene Schilke in 1989, and repeated the course with Cherie Prasuhn (1990) and Leah Smith (1992). Meanwhile, he met and studied with Phyllis Furumoto, Takata's daughter and one of the two people she named a Grand Master.

In the mid-1980s, Rand moved to Michigan and in 1988 opened the Center for Reiki Training (now the International Center for Reiki Training). Shortly after receiving his Reiki Master attunement, Rand created a virtual revolution in the larger community when he challenged a practice followed by Takata and both Grand Masters she initiated, of charging $10,000 to become a Reiki Master as a means of emphasizing the value of what the students were learning. At the center, Rand dropped the fee to a mere $600.00. He also authored Reiki: The Healing Touch: First and Second Degree Manual, a textbook that included most of Reiki's heretofore confidential teachings, though he refrained from revealing the unique Reiki symbols, a key esoteric element in the technique that the Reiki practitioner acquired to gain the initial attunement to the chi energy. In setting up the inexpensive training courses, Rand challenged the assumption that a Reiki practitioner Master should turn to one of the Grand Masters for Master training. His action would, in fact, stimulate the spread of the movement in the manner he envisioned.

Among the early students to take Rand's Master class was Kathleen Milner. Milner in turn became an associate of a channeler through whom she began to develop an expanded version of Reiki. Milner soon became a channel for some spirit entities known only as "Higher Beings," and under their guidance developed what became known as the Tera-Mai Reiki System. Rand began to work with Milner's system and then began to further alter it. He eventually experienced a new shift in energy and developed a further variation of the traditional Reiki system which he termed Karuna Reiki. He claimed that in his system the energy seemed "much more definite and focused" and helps release karma and deeply seated issues that are often stored at the cellular level. This difference seemed sufficient to demand he trademark the name Karuna Reiki to insure the quality of its transmission to students.

Rand heads the International Center for Reiki Training, now located at 21421 Hilltop, No. 28, Southfield, MI 48034. He has also founded Vision Publications, which issues books and the quarterly Reiki News. His second book, Reiki for a New Millennium, appeared in 1998. The website is: <http://www.reiki.org/>.

Randi, James (1928–)

Pseudonym of stage magician James Randall Zwinge who has developed what amounts to a second vocation as a co-founder and leading spokesperson of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (CSI-COP) and debunker of both psychics and their paranormal claims and religious claims of supernatural occurrences. Born August 7, 1928, in Toronto, Canada, he was exceptionally talented as a child, although he did not have the advantage of a college education. He was passionately interested in conjuring magic, and in adult life he achieved worldwide fame for his skill in legerdemain. He performed before royalty in Europe and Asia and appeared on national television programs and at college campuses under the stage name of "The Amazing Randi." In the lineage of many stage magicians over the last two centuries, Randi has assumed a watchdog role over people who would perform conjuring tricks while trying to pass them off as either supernatural or paranormal events. He has also been somewhat incensed at “experts” who have been fooled by hoaxing through their naive trust of the hoaxer, their own will to believe ideas which the paranormal event seems to confirm, or a simple lack of attention in seeing a trick being worked on them. Randi’s own skepticism concerning the paranormal has a strong foundation in the significant element of fraud which permeated Spiritualism in past generations and is still present in the world of fortunetellers and psychics. In this work, Randi performs an unquestioned public service.

According to journalist Richard Pyatt in USA Today (August 29, 1986), Randi’s interest in investigating psychic phenomena started at the age of fifteen. Randi is quoted as stating:

“When I was 15 years of age, I had already started out on my career as an amateur magician. When I attended a spiritualist church in Toronto, I saw they were using the same gimmicks that I had been reading about in the catalog and had been learning to do myself. Ministers were apparently speaking with the dead. I saw people in that congregation who really believed that the minister was able to read the contents of sealed envelopes and bring them messages from beyond the grave. I resented that highly, and I tried to expose that. I was arrested for my troubles. So at 15, I ended up in a police station, sitting there for four hours waiting for my father to come and get me out. I guess that was the worst four hours the psychic world ever spent, though they didn’t know it until recently.” Like the late Harry Houdini (1874–1926), also a brilliant stage magician, he has made his concern for psychic tricks a public issue. He has made himself available to the media to attack specific psychics and has given public demonstrations imitating their feats and explaining the means by which some of the tricks were accomplished. He has also issued challenges to psychics to perform paranormal feats under his own exacting conditions and to his satisfaction for a prize of ten thousand dollars. One of his major targets has been Uri Geller, and he has published a book claiming that Geller’s metal-bending feats are not paranormal: The Magic of Uri Geller (1975).

Among his most successful exposes were of several Christian healers, the primary one being Peter Popoff in San Francisco in 1986. In his healing crusades, Popoff actually called sufferers by name and described their ailments, claiming to receive such information directly from God. Actually he had developed a rather elaborate and involved system which Randi began to uncover when he noticed that Popoff had a “hearing aid” inside his ear. That ear piece suggested that someone might be broadcasting information to Popoff; the problem was how to obtain definite evidence that the identification of sufferers was fraudulent. Randi enlisted the aid of trusted individuals from the Bay Area Skeptics group and the Society of American Magicians. Some members of the group took up strategic places in the Civic Auditorium in San Francisco, where the crusade was held. Robert Steiner and Alexander Jason (an electronics expert) established themselves behind the balcony of the auditorium with hidden tape recorders and electronic listening equipment.

Just before the healing service started, Jason succeeded in tuning into and recording a backstage broadcast from Elizabeth Popoff to her husband, the minister. The message began: “Hello Petey. I love you. I’m talking to you. Can you hear me? If you can’t, you’re in trouble.” Here was firm evidence that the claimed messages from God were in fact information relayed to Popoff by his wife, and received through Popoff’s hearing aid. The broadcast continued: “I’m looking up the names right now.” This appeared to be a reference to the “prayer cards” which those attending the healing service were asked to fill out, giving names, description of ailments, and other information.

The tape recordings of a claimed healing from a service of the Popoff Crusade a few weeks later in Anaheim, California, on March 16, 1986, provided evidence of a backstage prompting broadcast by Elizabeth Popoff to her husband. She gave the name “Virgil Jorgenson. Virgil. . . . Way back in the back somewhere. Arthritis in knees. He’s got a cane. . . . He’s got arthritis. He’s praying for his sister in Sweden, too.”

In the auditorium, the Rev. Popoff called out: “Virgil. Is it Jorgenson? Who is Virgil?” A man, apparently in his sixties and limping with a cane, came forward, and Popoff continued: “Are you ready for God to overhaul those knees?” Jorgenson then appeared to walk more easily, and Popoff continued: “Oh, glory to God. I’ll tell you, God’s going to touch that sister of yours all the way over in Sweden.” Popoff then broke Jorgenson’s cane, while the sufferer, apparently cured of his arthritis, walked about the auditorium, praising God and the minister Popoff.

This healing was so impressive that Peter Popoff used the film clip for three consecutive weeks on his television show. Unfortunately for the Popoff Crusade, “Virgil Jorgenson” was Don Henvick, program coordinator for Bay Area Skeptics and president of Assembly #70 of the Society of American Magicians, and he does not suffer from arthritis. His disguise as “Virgil Jorgenson” was only one of several appearances that challenged the claimed divine source of Peter Popoff’s information and healing. Under the name “Tom Hendrys,” Henvick was “healed” of nonexistent alcoholism at the San Francisco Civic Auditorium. In a Detroit healing crusade, Popoff “healed” Henvick of uterine cancer when this master of disguise appeared dressed in woman’s garb under the name “Bernice Manicoff,” seated in a wheelchair.

The decisive exposure of the electronic source of Popoff’s claimed divine messages from God was made by Randi nationwide on a Johnny Carson “Tonight” show on April 22, 1986, when scenes of a claimed healing were shown with a soundtrack of the secret information broadcast identifying the sufferer.

This brilliantly organized and presented exposure of Popoff showed Randi at his best, identifying the techniques of an intricate hoax set within the trusting environment of a church service. At the same time it provided a platform for him at his worst, making broad generalizations branding all faith healers by associating them with the guilt of the few. His attempts to push his conclusions far beyond what the data would suggest has tended to sever Randi from the larger audience who would be open to his actual uncovering of hoaxing.

Randi went beyond the uncovering of hoaxes to perpetuating one himself in what was termed Project Alpha. He sent two magicians to the McDonnell Laboratory for Psychical Research at Washington University in St. Louis. Their ability to fool the researchers into believing that they were genuine psychics became a matter of great embarrassment to the parapsychological community and the university and the laboratory was closed a short time afterward. This project was based upon the idea that most people in parapsychology are ill-equipped to do psychical research and need the help of a trained magician.

Randi served as a founding member of the Committee for Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP) and a member of the editorial board of their journal The Skeptical Inquirer: The Zetetic. When he is not traveling the world performing and exposing the paranormal as fraud and conjuring, Randi lives in New Jersey in a house full of unusual and remarkable illusions, with doors that open unexpectedly on the side opposite the door knob and clocks that run backward.

On July 14, 1986, Randi was the recipient of a $272,000 award by the MacArthur Foundation of Chicago through his efforts in “alerting the unsuspecting public to hoaxers who, for example, claim to perform miracle cures of cancer, and also to support his exposure of shoddy, pseudo-science through his investigations and public lectures.” The MacArthur Fellow Awards are tax-free, no-strings grants to individuals to permit them to continue their work without economic hindrance.

In 1992, the Skeptical Inquirer noted that Randi is no longer associated with CSICOP due to two libel suits; he resigned in order to protect the committee from further suits because of legal issues. But in 1999 Randi was still in the public eye when he addressed the U.S. Congress on medical and scientific quackery.

Randles, Jenny (Jennifer Christine) (1951–)

British ufologist. She was born on October 30, 1951, in Bacup, England, and studied chemistry, mathematics, and physics, receiving advanced level General Certificates of Education in these subjects. She went on to post advanced level studies in geography and geology, receiving City and Guilds Certificates with distinctions in audio-visual technology and education. She was a teacher at a Cheshire Middle School (1972–74), a Research Coordinator on the council of the British UFO Research Association (BUFORA) (1975–77), and an audio-visual technician in a college of education, servicing teachers (1977–78). Through the 1970s she became increasingly involved in UFO research. She has held a variety of positions and has done a variety of tasks simultaneously.

In 1973 she helped form the Northern UFO Network and became the editor of the Northern UFO News in 1974. In 1977 she became a columnist for Flying Saucer Review. After 1978 she became secretary of the Northern UFO Network (NUFON) and the UFO Investigators' Network (UFOIN), concerned with procuring reports on UFO sightings in Britain. Her first book, co-authored with Peter Warrington, UFOs; A British Viewpoint, appeared in 1979.

In the 1980s Randles also allowed her interest in psychic phenomena and the paranormal to emerge. In 1983, she wrote and presented a thirty-week series of features on mysterious phenomena for the independent British radio station Radio City. She has also appeared in, researched, and helped to produce numerous other radio and television programs on British and foreign channels. During these media appearances, she met many celebrities who provided the inspiration and material of her book Beyond Explanation? (1985). This deals with the paranormal experiences of past and present public figures such as John Lennon, Edgar Allan Poe, Susannah York, Kevin Keegan, Donald Sutherland, Arthur Koestler, Winston Churchill, Anthony Hopkins, Lindsay Wagner, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, and many others. It was followed by Sixth Sense (1986).

As a result of many years of study and investigation of the UFO phenomenon and the paranormal, she advised caution in reaching firm conclusions about UFOs and stated that she had found no objective evidence to support the belief that we are visited by extraterrestrials. She suggested that there may be several different answers to the unexplained cases, some of them possibly relating to new types of natural, physical phenomena. She has now explored the UFO question from almost every angle and continues to produce a new book based on her recent research every few years.

Randolph, Paschal Beverly (1825–1875)

Paschal Beverly Randolph, an early leader of American Rosicrucianism, was born on October 8, 1825, in New York City, the son of William Beverly Randolph and Flora Beverly, a black woman who claimed descent from Madagascan royalty. At age 16 he went to sea, but this career ended five years later, when he was injured in an accident. He settled in Philadelphia and worked as a barber, while he trained as an eclectic (natural) physician and avidly studied magnetism and spiritualism. He later claimed to have been named the supreme hierarch of the Rosicrucian Fraternity in 1846.

Randolph, who traveled to Europe in 1854, claimed that he met occult magician Éliphas Lévi and began a relationship with the European Rosicrucians (a claim which can neither be proven nor contradicted). In 1858, on a trip to England, he was made the Supreme Grand Master of the Western World and Knight of L'Ordre du Lis. Following this trip he founded the first modern Rosicrucian group in the United States. In the 1850s he wrote his first articles for Spiritualist publications and in 1860 published his first independently published work, a pamphlet, The Unweiling; or, What I Think of Spiritualism. His own Rosicrucian system developed from his reading of occult texts and his dialogue with Spiritualism. Randolph, though, described the afterlife in terms quite different from the familiar Summerland of the Spiritualists. The concept of "will" and the exercising of volition dominated Randolph's mature thought. While he acknowledged the success of mediums, he suggested that they vacated their will and thus became subject to every wind of influence around them and thus reached contradictory results. He advocated a method of active mediumship called blending. Rather than operating in a trance, the medium identified with the soul of the deceased and thus developed a knowing without giving up will.

Randolph became best known for his teachings on sexuality, a largely taboo subject in public, but one about which as a physician he had some freedom to counsel and to write. At that time almost anyone who gave advice on sexual issues would be branded as an advocate of "free love." However, Randolph believed that he had discovered a great secret about the mysterious fluid produced by people when they became sexually aroused. This fluid was the secret of marital success and happiness, he contended, while its block was a bane to humankind. As a herbal physician and mesmerist, Randolph developed ways to cure the blockages to the production of this fluid. His final words on this topic were published in 1874 in his last book, Eulis! The History of Love (later reprinted under the title Affectional Alchemy). Two years earlier he had been brought to trial in Boston, charged with advocating free love, but he was found not guilty. In 1874 he reorganized the fraternity for the last time. That same year Randolph married, and his wife bore a son, Osiris Budha Randolph, for whom Randolph had great hopes. However, on July 29, 1875, despair overcame him, and for reasons not altogether understood, he killed himself. He was succeeded as head of the fraternity by Freeman B. Dowd and later Edward H. Brown and R. Swinburne Clymer. Under Clymer's leadership, the largely moribund fraternity was brought back to life and has since enjoyed a successful existence, though because of a rule against advertising itself, it has remained less known than some other groups.

Randolph is one of the lesser known but more important occult leaders of the nineteenth century. His many books were widely read. Randolph's teachings on occult sexuality were carried to Europe and fed the development of sex magic. Both his ethnicity and his manner of death, which is something of an embarrassment to occultists, have contributed to his being forgotten.

A French-language book on occult sexuality was published in Paris in 1931 under Randolph's name, claiming to be the product of his secret teachings among European students. In fact, the book, which appeared in English in 1988, was taken from several of Randolph's published works mixed with other writings. It was denounced by the Fraternitas Rosae Crucis as a fraudulent work.

Random Event Generator (REG)

Electronic apparatus which generates random numbers, used as targets in a psi test. A basic form of REG is an electronic coin-tossing machine, generating a series of "heads and tails" outputs. Other REGs have more complex outputs. Tests with REGs are often conducted in conjunction with computers, so that the timing and running of the experiment can be mechanically controlled and analyzed, thus obviating fraud on the part of the subject, and facilitating evaluation of a long series of runs.

Ransom, Champe (1936–)

Editor in a law book publishing company and writer on parapsychology. He was born in San Diego, California, and became a seaman in the Merchant Marines after leaving high school. He obtained a B.A. degree from Lawrence University with a major in history (1961) and a J.D. degree from St. Mary's University School of Law (1966). He then served as legislative counsel to the state legislature in Juneau, Alaska (1966–70). During his final year in law school he had taken an interest in parapsychology and in 1970 was finally able to become a research assistant at the Division of Parapsychology, University of Virginia (1970–72). He then became an editor with Michie Company, law book publishers, Charlottesville, Virginia, and later owned a chimney sweeping business.

While at the University of Virginia he worked off of a grant for the Parapsychology Foundation, which supported his research on parapsychology's critics. He also assisted J. G. Pratt with experiments in PK and ESP.

Rao, Bangalore Suryanarain (1856–1937)

Indian astrologer, born in Srikakulam, India, on February 12, 1856. Rao graduated from Central College in Bangalore and practiced law at Bellary, India, for a decade. He also became interested in astrology and pioneered the introduction of Vedic astrology from the several Indian languages into the dominant English-speaking culture then existing in India. He published his first book in 1882 and his Astrological Self-Instructor in 1892. In 1895 he began an English-language periodical, The Astrological Magazine. The magazine continued until 1923, when it was suspended for seven years because of Rao's ill health. It was revived with Rao and his grandson B. V. Raman serving as coeditors. Over the next few years Raman gradually assumed control of the family business.

Rao wrote some of the first English-language books on Indian astrology, and his books introduced the topic to the West. Through his grandson's books, Vedic astrology has found a large following.

Rao died in March 1937.

Rao, K(oneru) Ramakrishna (1932–)

Lecturer in philosophy and parapsychologist. Rao was born on October 4, 1932, in India. He did his college and graduate work at Andhra University, Waltair, India (B.A. hons., philosophy 1953; M.A. hons., psychology 1955; Ph.D., 1962). He was a lecturer in the Departments of Philosophy and Psychology at Andhra University from 1953–58. He left in 1958 to come to the United States as a Fulbright scholar. His stay at the University of Chicago was extended a year with a Rockefeller Fellowship. He returned to India in 1960 as chief librarian at Andhra University (1960–61), but then moved on to North Carolina to work with J. B. Rhine at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina.

He returned to Andhra University in the mid-1960s and in 1967 established the Department of Parapsychology, the only such university department of its kind in the world. In the meantime he had become a charter member of the Parapsychology Association and was elected as its secretary in 1963 and its president in 1965. (He was again elected president in 1978). In 1977 he became the director of the Institute for Parapsychology, but again in 1984 went back to Andhra to become the university's vice-chancellor. The following year he established the Institute for Yoga and Consciousness at Andhra and became its director. In 1987 he again became head of the Institute for Parapsychology, where he has remained to the present.

Rao has authored a number of papers and books on parapsychology and related fields. More than any other person, he embodies the internationalization of parapsychology and the involvement of a growing edge of the field among scholars with non-Western backgrounds in the last half of the twentieth century.

Raphael

An angel whose name means "God has healed." He first appeared in the Apocrypha, those honored but uncanonical books of the Hebrew people that were considered but not included in their Bible (i.e., the Christian Old Testament). The book of Tobit, written in the second century B.C.E., concerns a man who was blind. Raphael was the angel sent to heal him. In the pseudepigraphical (falsely ascribed) book of Enoch it was said that: "Raphael presides over the spirits of men." In Jewish rabbinical legend of the angelic hierarchies, Raphael was the medium through which the power of Tsebaoth, or the Lord of Hosts, passed into the sphere of the sun, giving motion, heat, and brightness to it.

As one of the angels named in the ancient writings, Raphael reappears in the Kabbalistic literatures of the Middle Ages. As an archangel, Raphael was identified with Hod, one of the ten sephiroth imitated by the Ein Soph (God) who implements God's creative purposes, in this case healing. He then reappears in a variety of magical operations of ceremonial magic and is one of the four angels called upon in, for example, the basic "Ritual of the Pentagram" which was taught to neophytes in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn.

The name "Raphael" was also adopted by pioneer British astrologer Robert Cross Smith (1795–1832) whose career really marks the beginning of the modern astrological revival from the low point of astrological interest in the eighteenth century. Smith founded a successful astrological publishing house and compiled Raphael's Astronomical Ephemeris, the book of sun, moon, and planet position for each day of the year, a necessary tool for the preparation of an accurate horoscope. Since his death, the publishing house continues to publish his ephemeris which remains one of the most popular used today.

Through the nineteenth century, individual astrologers also assumed the name and operated as "Raphael." Raphael II was John Palmer (1807–1837), editor of Raphael's Sanctuary of the Astral Art (1834), Raphael III was a Mr. Medhurst, who edited the Prophetic Messenger almanac (1837–ca. 1847), Raphael IV was Mr. Wakeley (d. 1853) who wrote under the name "Edwin Raphael," and Raphael V was a Mr. Sparkes (1820–1875) who edited The Oracle (May–June 1861). Raphael VI was Robert C. Cross (1850–1923) who acquired the Raphael copyrights, including the ephemeris. Since Cross's death, a company has continued the Raphael publications.

Rapping

Phenomena of knockings or rappings have usually accompanied poltergeist disturbances, even before the commencement of the modern Spiritualist movement. Thus they were observed in the case of the Drummer of Tedworth, the "Cock Lane Ghost," and other disturbances of the kind, and also in the presence of various somnambules, such as Frau Frederica Hauffe, known as the Seeress of Prevorst.

With the "Rochester Rappings"—the famous outbreak at Hydesville in 1848—to which may be directly traced the beginning of modern Spiritualism—the phenomenon took on a new importance, rapidly increasing to an epidemic, remaining throughout the earlier stages of the movement the chief mode of communication with spirits.

Although it was afterward supplanted to some extent by more elaborate and complicated phenomena, it continued to occupy a place of some importance among the manifestations of the séance-room into the early twentieth century. It is apparent from descriptions furnished by witnesses that raps varied considerably both in quality and intensity, being sometimes characterized as dull thuds, sometimes as clear sounds like an electric spark, and again as deep, vibrating tones.

It has been shown that raps may be produced by the movement of various body parts (ankle-joints, knee-joints, shoulders, and other joints), and one man, Rev. Eli Noyes, claimed to have discovered seventeen different methods.

There are also instances on record where specially constructed "medium" tables were responsible for the manifestations. Besides the Spiritualist explanation and the frankly skeptical one of fraud, there have been other scientific (and pseudoscientific) theories advanced which ascribe the raps to various forces such as od (or odyle), ectenic force, or animal magnetism. (See also Raps)

Rapport

A mystical sympathetic or antipathetic connection between two persons. It was formerly believed that for a witch to harm her victims, the latter must first have become in rapport with her, either by contact with her person or by contact with some garment she has worn. A certain Irish witch, Florence Newton (tried in 1661), was accused of establishing rapport between herself and those she sought to bewitch by kissing them, whereby she was able to compass their destruction.

In the practice of animal magnetism, it was considered that the only invariable and characteristic symptom of the genuine trance was the rapport between patient and operator. It consisted of a community of sensations—the subject perceiving the sensations of the magnetizer and also divining his thought. In modern hypnotism, rapport denotes the community of sensation between the hypnotizer and his subject.

According to the psychical researcher Julien Ochorowicz, rapport was solely a “magnetic” condition. He observed that under hypnosis his subject was indifferent to anybody with whom he came in contact but in animal magnetism he had an incontestable preference for the magnetizer. In general, the touch of the magnetizer was agreeable while that of others was painful. This condition is not found in hypnosis.

The term rapport is also used in Spiritualism, signifying sympathy between the spirit control and the medium or any of the sitters. The control (through the medium) may be placed in rapport with anyone who is absent or dead, merely by handling something which has belonged to him or her. It is for a similar reason that in crystal gazing the crystal is sometimes held for a few moments prior to the inspection by the person on whose behalf the crystal-gazer is about to examine it.

The term rapport has also been employed by spiritual healers to describe the necessary relationship between the healer and the patient as a prerequisite for the successful flow of the healing power. Rapport is thus seen as an alternative to the patient’s faith, sometimes suggested in religious healing circles as the necessary precondition for healing. Raps

Percussive sounds of varying intensity without visible, known or normal agency, a common phenomenon of nineteenth-century Spiritualism. Typtology was the name given to the “science” of communicating with spirits by means of raps. While a simple phenomenon, raps were considered to be of tremendous importance by nineteenth-century psychical researchers. Charles Richet, for example, wrote in Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923):

“The reality of these raps is of primary importance, and this phenomenon carries the implication of the whole of metapsychics. If it is established that mechanical vibrations can be produced in matter, at a distance, and without contact, and that these vibrations are intelligent, we have the truly far-reaching fact that there are in the universe human or non-human intelligences that can act directly on matter.”

Modern Spiritualism began with rappings at Hydesville, New York, in 1848 in connection with the Fox Sisters. But the history of this paranormal manifestation reaches back into antiquity and the belief that it was in the house of the Fox family that intelligent contact with the unseen world through such agency was established for the first time is shortsighted.

Historical Background

Rudolf of Fulda, a chronicle dating from 858 C.E. spoke of communications with a rapping intelligence. The sixteenth-century physician Paracelsus called it “pulsatio mortuorum”—an omen of approaching death. The early church knew of spiritus percutiens (rapping spirits). They were conjured away by old Catholic formulae at the benediction of churches.

Raps were recorded by the theologian Philipp Melancthon in 1520 at Oppenheim, Germany. Montalambert, chaplain to François I, described raps which he heard in Lyon about 1521. According to a manuscript from 1610 at the University of Glasgow, Scotland, Mr. Welsh, a clergyman in Ayr, conversed with spirits by raps and observed movements of objects without contact.

The first detailed account of the phenomenon is in Joseph Glanvill’s Saducismus Triumphatus (1681). It described the disturbances of the so-called Drummer of Tedworth in the home of Magistrate Mompesson in 1661. It was discovered that an invisible entity would answer in drumming anything that was beaten or called for. But no further progress was made.

The phenomenon was a part of the Epworth Phenomena noticed at the home of Rev. Samuel Wesley, the father of John Wesley, in 1716. In the first quarter of the nineteenth century, Justinus Kerner detected in raps a means of conversation with the spirit visitants of Frederica Hauffe, better known as the Seeress of Prevorst. Then came the historic outbreak at Hydesville, followed two years later by the Stratford disturbances chronicled by Rev. Eliakim Phelps. Amid much public acrimony a literature grew up around the reality of the strange knocks.

The theories which have been advanced to explain the phenomenon are of historic interest. The cracking of knee joints and toe joints, the snapping of fingers, and the contraction of the respiratory muscles were variously called the scientific solution to the mystery. S. L. Loomis (1822–1896) offered one of the more creative theories. He discovered the effect of the vibrations of a dam over which water plunged. These sounds, transmitted to a distance by the earth, would produce sudden alarming knocking sounds in dwellings.

Raps were very likely often the product of fraud. British surgeon William Faulkner testified before the committee of the London Dialectical Society in 1869 that he was in the habit of selling trick magnets to produce rapping sounds at Spiritualist séances. The magnets could be concealed about the person or attached to furniture. By pressing a small brass button, raps could be produced whenever desired. Methods of fraud were described in various books by Hereward Carrington, Ed Lunt, and David P. Abbott.

Underneath the scientific theories there was a physiological foundation that suggested the use of a bodily mechanism of the medium that is responsible for the raps. Still it is one of the aberrations of scientific orthodoxy that when the Seybert Commission investigated the raps of Margaret Fox, one of the Fox Sisters, in 1884, the evidence for the genuine nature of the phenomenon was ruled out because one of the members of the committee, when placing his hand on her feet, distinctly felt an unusual pulsation although there was not a particle of motion in it.

Early Explanations of the Raps

But why should spirits knock and rap? According to Andrew Lang: “Were we inventing a form for a spirit’s manifestation to take, we never should invent that.” He frankly admitted that medieval and later tales of rapping have never been satisfactorily accounted for on any theory. He advanced a theory of “spectral aphasia,” suggesting that raps may be the easiest signs which a spirit wishing to affect the physical plane may produce, though he may aim at a different effect.

In the March 1888 issue of Psyche, a Dr. Purdon reported on the curious connection he had discovered between raps and chorea. He noted the case of two soldiers in Guernsey, both of them of neurotic temperament, in whose presence rappings of an unnatural character were heard. Under the administration of iodide of potassium, salicylate of soda, and arsenic in full doses, the men improved wonderfully, and the rappings became less frequent.

E. Howard Grey, in his book Visions, Previsions and Miracles in Modern Times (1915), quoted a similar experience with a member of his own family. The attack commenced during the cutting of a child’s permanent teeth, sometimes convulsions occurred in the night, and these generally seized upon the little girl about the same hour. He stated:

“We were usually well prepared for these nocturnal troubles by explosive and other auditory sounds, either on the wall or by Drs. Drury and Purdon, indeterminate or derial. Sometimes a tinkling sound as of dropping water would be heard, but none was visible, they occurred when the child was asleep, also in her absence . . .

“When she was in bed upstairs, they heard them in a room below; sometimes her mother heard them sounding like little taps on a newspaper she was reading. They did not exhibit intelligence. The last, or departing rap was especially loud. The cure was effected in a few months by the administration of bromide of potassium.”

In speaking of the curious “thrilling” of the table in the presence of the great medium D. D. Home, Mrs. Augustus de Morgan wrote in From Matter to Spirit (1863):

“The last time I witnessed this phenomenon, an acute surgeon present said that this thrilling, the genuineness of which was unmistakable, was exactly like what takes place in that affection of the muscles called subtultus tendinum. When it ceased the table rose more than two feet from the floor.”

In the closing years of the medium Henry Slade, loud raps were heard on the bedstead, walls, and furniture while he was asleep. Chairs and other furniture moved about. The phenomena occurred even after he sank into senile dementia. The same phenomenon was observed around the deathbed of Margaret Fox. The mysterious illness of Mary Jobson started with loud rapping sounds. When D. D. Home was ill the same manifestation was continually witnessed. Many observed a connection between abnormal conditions and paranormal phenomena, but the larger percentage of such manifestations involves no bodily affliction.

The Varieties of Rapping Experience

Simple as the phenomenon appears to be, various important accounts reflect an astounding variety of manifestation. John Worth Edmonds heard raps on his own person. The Rev. Samuel Watson, a nineteenth-century British Methodist preacher, had similar experiences. “The noise made on my shirt bosom,” he wrote, “resembled more the telegraph machine than anything else.” Abby Warner, of Massillon, Ohio, was prosecuted in 1851 for disturbing the Christmas service in St. Timothy’s Church by raps which sounded in her presence.

Considerable excitement was caused in New York in 1871 in the prominent Brooklyn, New York, congregation of Henry Ward Beecher. In front of the rostrum at the reporter’s table, raps were heard for a succession of Sabbaths, and slow and deliberate motion of the table was witnessed. Eugene Crowell reported that it kept time with the preacher’s words and assented to Beecher’s demands for reform with great pushes and movement to the opposite side of the sanctuary as if to say: “That’s so, that is the truth.”

Leah Underhill, the eldest of the Fox Sisters, wrote in her book The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism (1885) that during the funeral of Calvin Brown, her second husband, raps were heard all over the room while S. B. Brittan delivered the funeral sermon and Edmonds the eulogy.

Robert Dale Owen recorded some very curious experiments in raps with Underhill in 1861. He heard raps on the seaside in a ledge of rock. “Placing my hands on the same ledge, a few steps from Mrs. Underhill and asking for raps, when this came audibly I felt, simultaneously with each rap, a slight but unmistakably distinct vibration or concussion of the rock.” Owen heard raps onboard an excursion boat and later in a sailing boat sounding from underneath. He also obtained them in the open air on the ground; “a dull sound, as of blows struck on the earth; then I asked Mrs. Underhill to touch one of the trees with the tips of her fingers and applying my ear to the tree I heard the raps from beneath the bark.” In an account of a séance on February 22, 1860, in which psychic lights were seen, Owen wrote:

“While I was looking intently at such a light, about as large as a small fist, it rose and fell, as a hammer would, with which one was striking against the floor. At each stroke a loud rap was heard in connection. It was exactly as if an invisible hand held an illuminated hammer and pounded with it.”

As to the objectivity of the raps produced by Kate Fox, Sir William Crookes argued,

“... it seems only necessary for her to place her hand on any substance for loud thuds to be heard in it, like a triple pulsation, sometimes loud enough to be heard several rooms off. In this manner I have heard them in a living tree—on a sheet of glass—on a stretched iron wire—on a stretched membrane—a tambourine—on the roof of a cab—and on the floor of a theatre. Moreover, actual contact is not always necessary. I have had these sounds proceeding from the floor, walls, &c. when the medium’s hands and feet were held—when she was standing on a chair—when she was suspended in a swing from the ceiling—when she was enclosed in a wire cage—and when she had fallen fainting on a sofa. I have heard them on a glass harmonium—I have felt them on my own shoulder and under my own hands. I have heard them on a sheet of paper, held between the fingers by a piece of thread passed through one corner.”

The membrane of which Crookes spoke was part of a complicated apparatus. A small piece of graphite was placed on it so as to be thrown upward by the slightest jar. The point of a lever registered in curves the amount of mechanical energy employed in the effect.

As to the sounds, Crookes observed:

“... delicate ticks, as with the point of a pin; a cascade of sharp sounds as from an induction coil in full work; detonations in the air; sharp, metallic taps; a cracking like that heard when a frictional machine is at work; sounds like scratching; the twittering as of a bird, &c.”

“We have been present with Kate Fox,” wrote J. J. Morse in The Two Worlds newspaper (vol. 19) “when the raps were heard on a sheet of paper, held between the thumb and forefinger of another person standing beside the medium, the paper visibly shaking from the violence of the raps produced upon its surface.”

Lord Adare’s father, in experiments with D. D. Home, heard raps upon the medium’s hand when he placed it upon his head. Raps came on a sheet of paper which they held by the corners. Adare heard raps under his feet and distinctly felt the jar while the raps were taking place. He saw a table leg rap. The spirits by raps joined into their conversation and signified approval in a most emphatic way. Adare was told to understand that by remaining in the earth’s atmosphere, spirits get so charged that it is a positive relief to make sounds. Sometimes they cannot help rapping, and cannot control them. They discharge their electricity by a whole volley of taps.

The sounds may be single or combined knockings. “It was the most singular noise,” wrote William Stainton Moses on December 5, 1873, “that the combined knockings made. The room seemed to be full of intelligences manifesting their presence.” The sounds had distinct individuality. They had characteristics as permanent as the voice, and the communicator could often be recognized by his rapping style.

Dr. J. Garth Wilkinson wrote of an inward thrill going through the table and chairs and found the sensation best conveyed by the exclamation of his daughter: “Oh, papa, there is a heart in my chair.”

“The departure of the spirits,” wrote J. H. Powell in Spiritualism; Its Facts and Phases (1864), “was preceded by an indistinguishable number of raps, loud at first, then gradually faint and fainter until, like echoes on a hill, they faded away in the echoing distance.”

In volume, the sounds may grow from a tiny tick to a loud crash. But the crashing blows leave no mark, although normally such force would be expected to smash the table. The tonality of the raps differs according to the object upon which they resound. They may resemble the slight noises made by a mouse, a fretsaw, or the scratching of a fingernail on wood or cloth, and their rhythm is as varied as their tonality.

They often sound like detonations. There are instances in which the impression is borne out by effect. Archdeacon Thomas Colley, in a slate-writing experiment with the medium Francis W. Monck, placed his foot on the slate and felt a sensation of throbbing in the enclosed space—a heaving as when the confined steam lifts the lid of a kettle—and in a moment, an explosion took place that scattered the slate in fragments over the carpet, like spray from a fountain. Such explosions and shatterings of the slate were frequently reported in séances with the medium Henry Slade.

Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, the co-founder of the Theosophical Society, was a powerful rapping medium in her teens. While later accused of reproducing Spiritualist tricks, she was said to have caused raps inside the spectacles of a skeptical professor with such force that they were sent flying from his nose. In reply to a somewhat frivolous woman who asked what was the best conductor for raps, the table spelt out “gold,” and the next moment the lady in question rushed out of the room with her hand clapped on her mouth, as she had felt the raps on the gold in her artificial teeth.

Joseph Maxwell obtained raps in restaurants and railway refreshment rooms which were loud enough to attract public attention. In his book Metapsychical Phenomena (1905), he described experiences of “Doctor X.” with the medium Meurice:

“The raps on the open umbrella are extremely curious. We have heard raps on the woodwork and on the silk at one and the same time; it is easy to perceive that the shock actually occurs in the wood—that the molecules of the latter are set in motion. The same thing occurs with the silk, and here observation is even more interesting still; and each rap looks like a drop of some invisible liquid falling on the silk from a respectable height. The stretched silk of the umbrella is quickly and slightly but surely dented in; sometimes the force with which the raps are given is such as to shake the umbrella. Nothing is more absorbing than the observation of an apparent conversation—by means of the umbrella—between the medium’s personifications. Raps, imitating a burst of laughter in response to the observer’s remarks, resound on the silk, like the rapid play of strong but tiny fingers. When raps on the umbrella are forthcoming, M. Meurice either holds the handle of the umbrella, or someone else does, whilst he simply touches the handle very lightly with his open palm. He never touches the silk.”

Maxwell concluded,

“(1) Every muscular movement, even a feeble one, is generally followed by a rap. (2) The intensity of the raps does not strike me as being in proportion with the movement made. (3) The intensity of the raps did not seem to me to vary proportionately according to their distance from the medium.”

He questioned mediums about their sensations when raps were being produced. They acknowledged a feeling of fatigue, of depletion, after a good séance, a feeling perceptible to observers. One of the mediums reported a cramp-like feeling in the epigastric region when the raps were particularly loud.

In From Matter to Spirit (1863), the wife of Augustus de Morgan wrote that once, through typtological communication (i.e., through raps), she was informed that raps would come through herself that day.

“This was not expected but it was worth trying, and I therefore went into an uncarpeted room barely furnished, and sat down by the table, on which I laid my arm. Very soon loud raps, which I called some of the family to hear, resounded on the table. There seemed to be power enough to rap the number of times desired, but not to indicate letters so as to spell anything. The sounds soon ceased and never returned. As each rap seemed to be shot through my arm it was accompanied by a feeling like a slight blow or shock of electricity and an aching pain extending from the shoulder to the hand, which remained for more than an hour after they had entirely ceased. This experiment seemed to prove that the nerves of the human body were necessary, if not for the production, at least for the propagation of the sounds.

In the experiments of W. J. Crawford, the loudness of the raps varied with weight and massiveness of the psychic “rods.” Crawford put the medium, later discovered to be producing phenomena by trickery, on a weighing machine and measured the exact amount of ectoplasm necessary for the increase of rapping strength. He also found that the raps reacted upon the medium’s body but that she was not conscious of any stress. The reaction, however, was not always the case, as he noted:

“As soon as the séance begins, we hear noises, raps, rap, rap on the floor near the medium. They become louder and louder, on the table, on the chairs of the sitters. Sometimes they are like hammerblows, so loud that they can be heard outside, and they shake the floor and the chairs. They can imitate any different sounds, the step of a man, the trot of a horse, the rubbing of a match, or the bouncing of a ball.”

Sir William F. Barrett, who like Crawford also sat in the Goligher circle, wrote in On the Threshold of the Unseen (1917): “Very soon knocks came and messages were spelt out as one of us repeated the alphabet aloud. Suddenly the knocks increased in violence, and being encouraged, a tremendous bang came which shook the room and resembled the blow of a sledge hammer on an anvil.

In Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 17, p. 726), a case of rapping was described by a Mrs. Davis who had received a letter from India with the request to forward it to a Mrs. W. She placed the letter on the mantelpiece. Some time after, raps were heard. They seemed to emanate from the neighborhood of the letter. She placed it on another spot. The raps followed the letter. It was discovered afterward that the letter had some urgency attached to it as it announced the death of Mrs. W.’s husband.

James H. Hyslop, in a sitting with a young non-professional female medium, heard loud raps in a closed piano. He wrote, in Contact with the Other World (1919):

“After getting raps under her feet I had her stand on a very thick cushion. When she was standing on the cushion, which was at least six or eight inches thick, the raps occurred exactly as before, with the same quality of sound. If made by the joints, the raps would have been muffled when the feet were on the cushion. I then had her stand with a foot on each of my hands, which rested on the cushion, and the raps occurred apparently on the floor with the same quality of sound as when her feet were on the floor. I then tried the steam radiator some distance away, and the rap had a metallic ring, as if on iron. I then tried the piano experiment again. . . . The raps were very loud, and made the string ring so that the sound could be heard perhaps a hundred feet away.”

Again Barrett, in his On the Threshold of the Unseen, observed:

“On one occasion I asked for the raps to come on a small table near me, which Florrie [the medium] was not touching, they did so; I then placed one of my hands on the upper and the other on the under surface of the table, and in this position I felt the slight jarring made by the raps on the part of the table enclosed between my hands. It made no difference whether Florrie and I were alone in the room, as was often the case, or other observers were called in.”

The distance to which the sound of raps carry may be considerable. In Southend, England, metallic raps produced on the rail in the presence of Moses and Dr. Stanhope T. Speer were audible to both of them when they were seventy yards apart. The raps were apparently made in the space between them.

An interesting non-psychic method of procuring raps was described in Psychic Research (February 1930) by John E. Springer, a attorney from Palo Alto, California:

“In one face of a small cardboard box I cut an aperture the size and shape of my ear. When fitted to the ear the box sticks on securely and becomes a sort of sounding board. Upon retiring I affix the box to the ear which is not to rest on the pillow, and I will as strongly as possible that as I fall asleep I shall be awakened by a given series of raps upon the cardboard. It frequently—but not always—happens that when I reach the stage of drowsiness where unconsciousness is about to supervene, loud and clear raps upon the box in the predetermined series bring me back to wakefulness with a start. The raps may be subjective, but it is difficult for one who experiences them to escape from the conviction that they are objective psychic raps.”

The medium Eusapia Palladino frequently rapped a certain number of times on the table with her fingers. Holding her hands about eighteen inches above the table the faint echoes of the raps were heard in the wood about two seconds later. She produced the same phenomenon with scratching sounds.

In the séances with Mina A. Crandon ("Margery"), the first raps were faint but definite, sounding like something soft inside a wooden box. Dr. Crandon listened to them through a stethoscope applied to the table. They were so magnified as to be unlike anything in his experience. Later they developed to such a degree that the control "Walter" could render tunes or rhythmical phrases with a marked syncopation upon the cabinet, the table, the arm of "Margery," the hands of the sitters, and even on the limited surface of a ring. Once he rapped out a popular tune unknown in his day and answered in explanation that they (the spirits) go everywhere, to our theaters and other places.

There are some rare cases on record in which raps were produced in the distance. The Seeress of Prevorst (Frederica Hauffe) could cause raps in the houses of others. There were similar testimonies in the mediumship of D. D. Home. Cromwell Fleetwood Varley stated before the London Dialectical Society that he heard raps in his home after his arrival from a séance with D. D. Home. The next morning he received a letter from Home which disclosed that the medium knew of the occurrence.

Countess Panaigai wrote in a letter to Human Nature (vol. 11) that in a sitting with Home the name of her deceased child was rapped out and that Home predicted the hearing of raps in her own house. The prediction not only came true, but when a friend called her attention to it she found the little boot of her child (kept in a locked box in a bureau) from which the raps appeared to proceed, imprinted by a perfect star with a letter at each of the six points forming the name "Stella," as the deceased was called. Not even the family of the Countess knew anything of the box and Home, to whom she was an utter stranger, was never in her house.

Interconnection of Psychic Phenomena

According to the hypothesis of spirit communication, raps represent the most primitive form of such communication. They may be manifest independently or through the faculties of a psychic individual. They may be obtained collectively through table-tipping or table-turning, in which a group sits round a table with their hands resting on it, and the raps indicate a letter of the alphabet, or a simple "yes" or "no" by one rap or two. This is a slow and tedious procedure.

Much more rapid communication is established through such simple devices as the ouija board or the planchette. Much swifter and more direct is automatic writing, in which the communicating entity operates the hand of the psychic.

In the presence of specially gifted mediums, direct writing by spirit hands has been reported. More direct still are the messages received vocally through a medium and, in rare instances, direct voice independent of the vocal apparatus of the medium.

It is not always clear if claimed spirit messages are the product of the subconscious mentation of the medium or the sitters, since fictitious entities can be created in séances (see "Philip"). Evaluation depends upon the detail and overall paranormal quality of the evidence in individual cases.

Rasmussen, Anna (Melloni) (1898– ?)

Danish medium for physical and intellectual phenomena. Her mediumship was first manifested at the age of twelve, when a table moved both with and without contact. Poltergeist phenomena developed, then died out to give place to a range of phenomena: telekinesis, raps, slate-writing, automatic writing, luminous phenomena and trance speech under the control of an entity "Dr. Lasaruz."

In October and November 1921, the mediumship was examined at Fritz Grünwald's laboratory at Berlin. The results were placed before the second International Congress for Psychological Research at Warsaw, Poland, in 1923. The electrical condition of the séance room was a particularly noticeable phenomenon.

In September 1922, Christian Winther, of the Polytechnic Academy of Copenhagen, commenced a series of scientific experiments in which a Professor Bondorff, of the Danish Agricultural High School, the Laboratory Director R. Dons, and Dr. A. Marner, a practicing physician also participated. According to Winther's detailed account in Psychic Research (1928) among 116 séances which he had with the medium not a single one was completely negative.

There appeared a steady outpouring of psychical energy and if a séance was not organized the medium became restless and felt ill. In many cases she gave two, three, or even four sittings in a single day. All the sittings took place in actual daylight or in very strong artificial light. The medium sat quietly in the circle at the table, took her share of the conversation, took refreshments, read a newspaper and had apparently no connection with what was going on. Trance, however, was always a great fatigue, and it was only employed when this was the special subject of study.

Some of the automatic scripts came in English. A unique feature of her mediumship was that raps emanated from her left shoulder and answered questions. The British psychical researcher Harry Price placed his ear against the medium's shoulder and distinctly heard decided thumps from her body (Psychic Research, 1928, p. 377).

Rasputin, Gregory Efimovitch (1869-1916)

Charismatic Russian monk, who became a powerful figure in the court of Czar Nicholas II, before the Romanov dynasty was swept aside by the Russian Revolution of 1917. The son of a peasant, Rasputin joined a monastery as a novice at the age of sixteen. As the Orthodox Church established hegemony in Russia, various dissenting sect groups emerged, among them the Khlysty. The Khlysty were supposedly founded in the seventeenth century by Daniel Filippov. They deviated from Orthodoxy in numerous ways. Several different splinter groups developed through the nineteenth century and by the beginning of the twentieth century the Khlysty numbered approximately 65,000 people.

Rasputin came into early contact with the Khlysty, though it is unclear just how dedicated a member he had been. Rasputin married around 1890, but his first son died when only six months old. The tragedy sent Rasputin to a strange hermit named Makary, and subsequently Rasputin became absorbed in scriptures, prayer, and meditation. One day he saw an image of the Virgin in the sky, and Makary told him, "God has chosen you for a great achievement. In Order to strengthen your spiritual power, you should go and pray to the Virgin in the convent of Afon."

The convent was at Mount Athos, in Greece, two thousand miles away, but in 1891, Rasputin made the pilgrimage on foot. Later he made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, traveling across Turkey. For the next few years he became a wandering staretz (lay priest). He was widely believed to possess occult power, which made him both loved and feared. He manifested gifts of healing and prophecy. In 1903, he traveled to St. Petersburg, where he met influential churchmen, including the monk Illiodor, who later became a hateful rival. Rasputin's reputation as a prophet and miracle worker spread widely, and he was sought by rich and poor.

In those days, Russian court life and high society were still strongly attracted to the marvels of Spiritualism which had been introduced in the 1860s by Alexander N. Aksakof, and any wonder worker was in great demand. Soon Rasputin came to the attention of the czar of Russia to whom he became an indispensable adviser and healer to the royal family.

Surrounded by the madhouse of tyranny, secret police, bomb plots, crippling wars, and the ruthless suppression of liberty of the Romanov empire, Rasputin, self-absorbed in his own sense of destiny, towered above the sycophants, bureaucrats, and plotters. He treated the czar and zarina with complete familiarity, and they welcomed Rasputin because of the healing powers he supposedly possessed; he seemed to be able to treat the couple's only son, Alexis, who was a hemophiliac. In 1911, tiring of court life, he undertook another pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and during his absence his enemies intrigued against him. In the fall of 1915, when the czar left to take command of the Russian army, Rasputin took on more power as the czarina's chief aide. Rasputin forced many of the cabinet ministers to resign, and he replaced them with his cronies. His enemies, headed by Prince Yussupov, felt he had taken on too much political power and planned his murder.

The day before Rasputin was killed, Czar Nicholas requested his blessing and with curious presence, Rasputin said, "This time it is for you to bless me." Yussupov invited Rasputin to his palace and persuaded him to eat poisoned food and drink poisoned wine. The poison was ineffectual. Thereupon the treacherous Yussupov sang gypsy songs and played the guitar before leaving the room and returning with a loaded revolver, shooting his victim in the back. Other conspirators rushed in clumsily, accidentally switching off the room light. When the light was switched on again, Rasputin appeared dead, but was still alive. Another conspirator shot Rasputin again; the body was dragged from the house and battered with a steel press. But Rasputin was still alive when he was pushed through a hole in the ice on the River Neva. And although his wrists had been bound, he had still managed to free his right hand and make the sign of the cross before drowning. He died December 31, 1916.

Ratte, Rena J(osephine) (1928–)

Instructor in philosophy who has experimented in the field of parapsychology. She was born on September 7, 1928, at Waterville, Maine. She studied at the University of Maine (B.A., 1951) and Duke University, (M.A., 1958; Ph.D., 1959). After receiving her doctorate, Ratte was a research fellow at the Parapsychology Laboratory, (1959-60), and joined the faculty in philosophy at Lewis and Clark College, Portland, Oregon, from 1960 onward.

She joined the Parapsychology Association. In her parapsychological work she focused on psychokinesis and experimented in the use of game techniques in PK to ascertain whether the PK effect would be enhanced by a game atmosphere.

Raudive, Konstantin (1909-1974)

Latvian psychologist and parapsychologist who spent many years investigating electronic voice phenomenon, involving electronic tape recordings of voices allegedly belonging to dead individuals, which has been popularly known as Raudive voices. His surname is pronounced "Row-dee-vay." Born in Uppsala, Sweden, on April 30, 1909, he studied psychology in Switzerland, Germany, and England. For some time he was a teacher at the University of Riga and also edited a Latvian newspaper. In Switzerland he had studied psychology under Carl Jung and was also a pupil of the Spanish philosopher Ortega y Gasset. He left Latvia when the Soviet Army invaded the Baltic and absorbed Latvia in 1945. With his wife, Dr. Zenta Maurina, he lived for a time in Sweden, later moving to Bad Kroningen, Germany, near the border with Switzerland.

It was during his period in Sweden in 1965 that Raudive met Friedrich Jürgenson who had pioneered the study of paranormal voice recordings. In 1959, Jürgenson tape-recorded a Swedish finch, and on playback he heard what appeared to be a human voice in addition to the bird. He thought there must be some fault in the apparatus, but subsequent recordings contained a message which seemed to be recognizably from his dead mother. Jürgenson described his experiments in his book Rösterna från Rymden (Voices From Space), published in Sweden in 1964. Prior to Jürgenson, Raymond Bayless had reported such phenomena. Raudive published an account of his research in 1968.

Starting in 1965, Raudive and his wife devoted themselves to investigating this phenomenon of paranormal voices manifesting on tape recordings, later assisted by Swiss physicist Alex Schneider and various engineers. Other scientists and parapsychologists who investigated the electronic voice phenomenon included Professor Hans Bender of the University of Freiburg, Germany, and Dr. Friedebert Karger of the Max Planck Institute in Munich. After 1969, differences of opinion arose between Jürgenson and Raudive, and thereafter they conducted their research independently.

Essentially the electronic voice phenomenon consists of paranormal voice communications (apparently from dead individuals) manifesting on recordings made on a standard tape recorder (sometimes enhanced by a simple diode circuit). The voices are also apparent on the “white noise” of certain radio bands.

The communications are usually fragmentary and ambiguous, rather like those produced by a ouija board, and need considerable amplification. The voices are sometimes in a mixture of different languages, rather like scrambled radio bands, but in many cases they appear to be recognizably from persons known to the experimenters during their lifetimes. They comment on the experimenters or convey cryptic messages in a kind of terse, disjointed telegram style. So far no communications appear to indicate high intelligence and seem relatively trivial.

Various explanations of the voices have been suggested. They may be sounds relayed back to earth from other planets by some unknown natural phenomenon or a potpourri of ordinary radio communications. Some skeptics think the voices may be imaginary, since listening to amplified electronics static and hum may suggest voices that do not really exist. Another theory is that the voices come from the subconscious of the experimenters, impressed on the tapes like the thought-forms of psychic photography.

Against such theories and criticisms, a number of highly qualified researchers have conducted and analyzed thousands of careful experiments which lead them to suggest that some of these recordings are of paranormal voices, and voice prints of communications purporting to be from the same source show matching patterns.

In June 1970, David Ellis, a Cambridge graduate, had been elected to the Perrott-Warrick Studentship which grants aid to conduct psychic research. He studied a selection of Raudive tapes in 1970. In his 1978 book, his findings were largely skeptical, and he believed that on occasion Raudive may have mistaken fragments of foreign language broadcasts for paranormal voice communications. However, Ellis was inclined to believe some of the voices might be paranormal, but their faintness and the background noise prevented positive identification.

Raudive died September 2, 1974, and his widow Dr. Zenta Maurina-Raudive published a tribute to his work. After his death, controversy arose on the question of archive storage and availability for study of the Raudive Collection, which the Society for Psychic Research expressed willingness to house.

Raudive Voices

Popular term for the electronic voice phenomenon first reported by Raymond Bayless, but rediscovered by Friedrich

Jürgenson in 1959. Voices, apparently from deceased individuals, are found to be electronically impressed on tape recordings made on standard apparatus (sometimes enhanced by a simple diode circuit). The voices are also apparent on the “white noise” of certain radio bands. The suggestion that they are communications from the dead is based on many thousands of experimental recordings made by Jürgenson and later Konstantin Raudive, and later replicated by various parapsychologists, including Hans Bender.

Konstantin Raudive (1909–1974), a Latvian psychologist, conducted joint experiments with Jürgenson between 1964 and 1969 after reading a reference to the paranormal voice phenomenon in Jürgenson's book. Subsequently the two men had some differences of opinion and conducted their further researches independently.

Raudive's researches were very extensive and included collection and study of over 100,000 recordings. After the publicity given to his book Unhörbares Wird Hörbar, translated into English in an enlarged edition as Breakthrough: An Amazing Experiment in Electronic Communication (1971), the phenomenon became generally known and discussed as “Raudive voices.” The book was translated by Peter Bander, a British psychologist who subsequently appeared on a number of television and radio programs to discuss the subject. His own book reviewed replication experiments in Britain and the Irish Republic, the attitudes of religious authorities, the experiments carried out by the electronic experts, and the alternative theories to explain the phenomenon.

Bender, working at Freiburg University in Germany, suggested that electronic impulses might be transmitted by the subconscious mind and impressed on tapes, rather like psychic photographs. However, there is some evidence tending to suggest that the communications are mainly from dead individuals.

A later development of Raudive's researches into paranormal voices were his investigation of a budgerigar (a bird) named Putzi, owned by Editha von Damaros in Germany. In March 1972, von Damaros wrote to Raudive stating that a few weeks after the death of her daughter Barbara at the age of fourteen, her pet budgerigar started giving extraordinary messages suggestive of spirit communications; one of these advised contacting “the Latvian doctor.” Raudive made a careful investigation of the budgerigar and took a number of recordings. It concluded that possibly the bird was being used as an energy field for the direct transmission of paranormal voices.

This investigation has led to some confusion, since Jürgenson's original researches into paranormal voices on tape recordings were stimulated by attempts to record bird song. “Bird voices,” however, remain a quite separate phenomenon from “Raudive Voices.”

Ray, P(ramode) C(handra) (1916–)

Psychologist who carried out research in the field of parapsychology. He was born on January 1, 1916, in East Bengal, India. He studied at the University of Calcutta (M.Sc. psychology, 1940) and did graduate work in clinical psychology at the Institute of Psychiatry, Maudsley Hospital, London, England. After graduation he joined the staff of the Anthropological Survey of India of the Government of India and rose from lab assistant to psychologist and officer in charge of the Department of Psychology. In addition to his studies and papers on psychological subjects, he carried out a research project on possession amongst the Lodha tribe of Bengal.

Rayleigh, Lord (1842–1919)

World-famous as experimental physicist, the discoverer of argon, and president of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London (1919). He was born John William Strutt on November 12, 1842. He inherited the title as the 3rd Baron Rayleigh from his father. He attended Trinity College, Cambridge (Senior Wrangler and Smith's Prizeman 1865, Fellow 1866). He was the Cavendish professor of experimental physics at Cambridge (1879–84) and a professor of natural philosophy at the Royal Institution (1887–1905). He was secretary of the Royal Society (1884–1896) and was awarded the Nobel Prize for physics in 1904 for his discovery of argon. He published many scientific papers and one important book Theory of Sound (2 vols., 1894–96).

One of several members of royalty interested in psychical research, Lord Rayleigh married Evelyn Balfour, the sister of Arthur James Balfour, one of the presidents of the SPR in the 1890s. Evelyn Balfour's other sibling was Eleanor Sidgwick, wife of SPR founder Henry Sidgwick. In 1876 in the discussion of William F. Barrett's paper on Spiritualism before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, he declared that his own interest in the subject dated from 1874. He was first attracted to it by the investigations of Sir William Crookes. "Although," he stated, "my opportunities have not been so good as those enjoyed by Professor Barrett, I have seen enough to convince me that those are wrong who wish to prevent investigation by casting ridicule on those who may feel inclined to engage in it."

Physical phenomena impressed him more than mental phenomena. He had many sittings with Kate Fox-Jencken, one of the Fox sisters, and with Eusapia Palladino. He was nonplussed by the result. Yet he never felt sufficiently convinced to declare himself in public. He paid little attention to automatic writing and trance phenomena. He did not think the evidence for telepathy conclusive, but he declared that, given irrefragable evidence for telepathy between living persons, he would have no difficulty in extending it to telepathy from the dead.

Speaking of Kate Fox-Jencken and the famous medium D. D. Home in his presidential address before the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1919 (see pp. 275–290) he said: "I repudiate altogether the idea of hallucination as an explanation. The incidents were almost always unexpected, and our impressions of them agreed" (Rayleigh, pp. 275–90). He died June 30, 1919.

Reclaiming

The Reclaiming tradition of contemporary American witchcraft developed from a working collective in San Francisco in the summer of 1980 when Diane Baker and Starhawk decided to co-teach a basic class in Witchcraft. The initial class became so popular that a series of three classes were created which became known as the original Core Classes—The Elements of Magic, the Pentacle of Iron, and Rites of Passage. Classes were team-taught within a sacred space. This group of teachers and their students shared what they learned and eventually coalesced into a Reclaiming Collective. Soon classes were offered in groups consisting of all women, all men, or mixed genders; many of these classes evolved into future covens.

During the 1980s, many Collective members and people from the larger Reclaiming community were active in anti-nuclear civil disobedience. The Collective's activities, from designing classes to dealing with domestic concerns to public political protests, stemmed from the Religious Society of Friends (Quakers). These concepts and method of decision-making fostered close bonds among participants.

Concurrently, Reclaiming Collective began four public sabbat rituals at the Cross-Quarters and four issues of a small newsletter at the Solstices and Equinoxes. The Collective wrote a statement which appeared in each issue of the Reclaiming Newsletter:

"Reclaiming is a community of San Francisco Bay Area women and men working to unify spirit and politics. Our vision is rooted in the religion and magic of the Goddess—the Immanent Life Force. We see our work as teaching and making magic—the art of empowering ourselves and each other. In our classes, workshops, and public rituals, we train our voices, bodies, energy, intuition, and minds. We use the skills we learn to deepen our strength, both as individuals and as community, to voice our concerns about the world in which we live, and bring to birth a vision of a new culture."

So unlike most other Craft traditions, Reclaiming espouses a connection between spirituality and political action.

The Core Classes of the Reclaiming Tradition

The development of the core classes derived from Starhawk's and Diane Baker's basic classes in Witchcraft. The first class, known as the Elements of Magic, teaches basic ritual, concepts and correspondences, energy sensing and projecting, shifting consciousness, spellwork, and theology.

The second, or Iron Pentacle class, based upon a Faery Witchcraft concept, focuses on trance work and the discovery of the healing powers of the human body through meditations on the five-pointed star. The points represent sex, self, passion, pride, and power. Its opposite is the Pentacle of Pearl whose points represent love, law, wisdom, knowledge, and power. Both pentacles have correspondences with the head, hands and feet, going round and transversing the human body touching the points of a five-pointed star.

The third, or Rites of Passage, is the most adaptable class; it is usually redesigned, or created anew, by different teachers.

Besides the three classes, Reclaiming developed a concept in the 1990s known as the Three Souls—a concept sharing Faery Tradition Witchcraft, Hawaiian, Jewish, and Celtic cultures. Starhawk's own adaptation of this concept is called the Three Selves: The Spiral Dance, which represents the Younger Self; the Talking Self, or unconscious mind, which gives verbal and conscious expression; and Deep Self or God Self, which deals with the Divine within oneself.

Rituals Roles of Reclaiming

The leading of public rituals teach new ways of doing magic in large groups with participants of all degrees of magical expertise and inspire the creation of methods and roles to meet these changing circumstances.

Among those roles are "Crows," who oversee everything from an individual ritual to teaching plans to overall Collective activities. Snakes view things from the ground, the "little, down-to-Earth things." "Dragons" guard the perimeters of circles in public outdoor spaces such as beaches so that participants can work undistracted by curious passersby; they do not directly participate in the work of a ritual because they are providing a buffer between the public and the inner circle. In this role, Dragons are similar to what are called in other traditions Guardians, the Summoner or the Man in Black. "Graces" act as assistant priest or priestesses; they welcome people, guide them, keep aisles clear, get people standing, sitting, chanting, dancing, assembled for a spiral dance, all in different and appropriate parts of the ritual. Graces could be compared, in some sense, to Maidens in other Craft traditions.

In recent years Reclaiming employed "Anchors" in large public rituals. Anchors are individuals who help focus and contain the energy of the circle in settings where it might be prone to fragmentation and dissolution. They act to contain the energy until it's time to release and direct it. It's important that the anchor not try to control the energy of the ritual or to ground it through their body.

Currently, some Reclaiming Witches are trained in aspecting—a technique which closely corresponds to what in traditional British Craft traditions more commonly known as Drawing Down the Moon. Not all Reclaiming Witches practice all these techniques. Many full-fledged and respected Reclaiming Witches were trained and proceeded in their personal and coven practices before some of these techniques were commonly used.

Distinguishing Features of Reclaiming

In The Pagan Book of Living and Dying, Starhawk describes Reclaiming's style of ritual as EIEIO—Ecstatic, Improvisational, Ensemble, Inspired, and Organic. Practices are constantly growing, being "extended, refined, renewed and changed as the spirit moves us and need arises, rather than . . . learned and repeated in a formulaic manner."

Distinguishing features of Reclaiming Tradition Witchcraft are:

- (1) non-hierarchical covens and group priest- or priestess-hoods;
- (2) no specific pantheon;
- (3) no requirement of initiation, and when initiations are undertaken, customized ones;
- (4) strong emphasis on political involvement and social and ecological responsibility/consciousness;
- (5) no set liturgy (except in certain large, rehearsed or semi-rehearsed public sabbat rituals) but rather training in principles of magic and the structure of ritual, and how to "speak as the spirit moves you" within that structure;
- (6) cultivation of ecstatic states (customarily without the use of entheogens or psychotropics) and divine colloquy—more shamanic than ceremonial;
- (7) cultivation of self-empowerment, self-discovery, and creativity;
- (8) extensive use of chanting and breathwork in magical rites;
- (9) intense "energy-raising," often using our trademark spiral dance (or even double helix/DNA molecule dance);
- (10) magical use of the Pentacle of Iron construct and its obverse, the Pentacle of Pearl;
- (11) concept of Three Souls;
- (13) encouragement of the creation of new ritual forms by anyone.

Reclaiming rituals are typically loose in structure, high in energy, and ecstatic in nature.

Deities

Reclaiming has no specific pantheon, rather, invokes Goddess into circles and often, but not always, God. Collective classes, covens, and community usually have had more women than men. Eventually, two particular deities seemed to have adopted the Bay Area Reclaiming community—Brigit and Lugh.

Initiation, or Not

Initiation—though not required to perform rituals—is performed by "committees" of teachers selected by the candidate who must ask for initiation; it is not offered, or even suggested. Just asking for an initiation does not guarantee that the request is granted; one or more teachers may refuse. It may take some years before all on the "committee" agree that the candidate is ready. If the candidate works in a coven, they usually are simultaneously initiated into the Craft and that coven, and any initiates within the coven are invited to be part of the initiation whether they were the candidate's teachers or not.

Reclaiming initiations are customized to the individual seeker. First, the initiators give challenges to the candidate. The candidate must accept the challenges from each initiators and fulfill them to everyone's satisfaction before the actual ceremony takes place. Each initiator creates these challenges according to what that priest or priestess feels the candidate needs to improve upon. The initiator's challenge is a task, which they have already done, or would and could do. They can also require the candidate to complete a challenge if they determine it would foster the candidate's development. It must be a task the person is actually capable of completing. A challenge is never given if it poses a danger to the candidate's health or welfare.

Reclaiming Collective Today

Over the years, Reclaiming Collective expanded from teaching Craft and providing public sabbat rituals to recording chants, publishing books, and maintaining an internet presence with website and listserves. The Reclaiming Newsletter developed into Reclaiming Quarterly,—a magazine of articles, poetry, and photos.

After years of discussion, the Collective (which varied in size from about 10 to 20 or more at its largest) dissolved itself as a collective in 1999 and turned over its authority to the Wheel—a representative body comprised of spokespersons from all the many different witchcraft groups. About 52 people had, over the years, been members of Reclaiming Collective, for greater or lesser periods of time.

With the dissolution of Reclaiming Collective and its evolution into a more inclusive complex, the Collective wrote Principles of Unity.

Reclaiming Principles of Unity

The values of the Reclaiming tradition stem from the understanding that the Earth is alive and all life is sacred and interconnected. The Goddess is seen as immanent in the Earth's cycles of birth, growth, death, decay, and regeneration. This practice comes from a deep, spiritual commitment to the Earth, to healing and to the linking of magic with political action.

Each of the members embodies the Divine. The ultimate spiritual authority is within oneself, and no other person is needed to explain its interpretation. A member's questions are welcomed, as well as, intellectual, spiritual, and creative freedoms.

Reclaiming is an evolving tradition honoring both Goddess and God. Members work with female and male images of divinity, but remember their essence is a mystery which goes beyond form. The community rituals celebrate the cycles of the seasons and their lives, and raise energy for personal, collective and earth healing.

It is known that everyone can do the life-changing, world-renewing work of magic and change one's consciousness at will. Reclaiming strives to teach and practice in ways that foster personal and collective empowerment, to model shared power and to open leadership roles to everyone. It makes decisions by consensus, and balance individual autonomy with social responsibility.

The tradition of Reclaiming honors the Wild, and calls for service to the Earth and the community. Its members value peace and practice non-violence, in keeping with the Rede, "Harm none, and do what you will." They also work for all forms of justice: environmental, social, political, racial, gender, and economic. Their feminist views include a radical analysis of power, seeing all systems of oppression as interrelated, rooted in structures of domination and control.

The organization welcomed all genders, races, ages, and sexual orientations before its disbandment. It strived to make public rituals and events accessible and safe. Members tried to balance the need for compensated labor with a commitment to make their work available to people of all economic levels.

The Reclaiming Tradition believed all living beings are worthy of respect and that the sacred Elements of Air, Fire, Water, and Earth support everything. The group worked to create and sustain communities and cultures that embody their values, that can help to heal the wounds of the earth and her peoples, and that can sustain and nurture future generations.

In the San Francisco Bay Area today Reclaiming, the entity, is the Wheel and many specialized cells or smaller groups. Several "daughter" collectives are spread over a widespread geographic area. Reclaiming Tradition Witch Camps, which began in 1985, are still conducted in the United States, Canada, and Europe. The camps are a series of intensive lessons held in a retreat-like setting. The people trained in these camps, in turn, train others in their communities. They are connected to Reclaiming's representative body called the Wheel through their Witch Camp spokescouncil called the Web.

ReCreation

ReCreation is an organization founded out of the response to the three-volume set of the metaphysical best-seller Conversations with God, received over a three-year period (1992–1995) by Neal Donald Walsch. Walsch was a radio talk show host in Ashland, Oregon, who in 1992 vented his frustration over his lot in life in a letter to God. To his surprise God answered back, and thus began his three-year dialogue. The messages from God were received by a process generally termed automatic writing. The three volumes of Conversations with God appeared in 1995, 1997, and 1998 respectively. They each became best-sellers, and Walsch was faced with a massive response by people who were positively affected by his writing. He founded ReCreation to channel that response into action.

ReCreation is based upon the notion that deep within our memory, each human carries the awareness that there once existed a race of beings who had a deep acceptance of love as the only reality and thus lived without anger, fear, struggle, and war. Bonded by love, these people lived by three rules: Love is all there is; Do harm to no one; and We are all One. They had a code of ethics based on three imperatives: Awareness, honesty, and responsibility. Having once existed, a society of such people of love can be rebuilt, and that is the goal of ReCreation.

To that end, ReCreation now sponsors a full schedule of programs (seminars, workshops, and lectures) at various locations across North America and overseas. A Conversations with God in Action program seeks to mobilize people to create centers to actualize the ideals of Conversations with God in their own community. These centers will be able to offer many of the same programs heretofore only available in Oregon. CWG in Action also has a "Little Masters" program for children. Walsch leads an annual Empowerment Week at which interested people may learn to be CWG leaders, both those who wish to work at the local level and those who wish to train other leaders. ReCreation certifies those who complete the training as Message senders.

ReCreation publishes a newsletter and study materials for people reading Conversations with God. It is headquartered at PMB #1150, 1257 Siskiyou Blvd., Ashland, OR 97520. Its Internet site is at <http://www.conversationswithgod.org/>.

"Rector"

One of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses, said to have been Hippolytus, pupil of Irenaeus, who was Bishop of Portus, the harbor of Rome opposite to Ostia. He was banished in 235 C.E., when Maximin succeeded Alexander Severus. "Rector" first manifested on January 4, 1873. His distinctive sign was his heavy tread, which shook the room. His main duty was to act as amanuensis for "Imperator" and the other spirits. After the earlier books, almost all the writing was done by him.

He had the power of reading books paranormally. The experiments which were conducted to test this ability proved highly successful. When the "Imperator" group took control of the séances of the medium Leonore E. Piper, "Rector" manifested in his old role as amanuensis and spiritual adviser again.

Recurrent Spontaneous Psychokinesis (RSP)

A term suggested by parapsychologist W. G. Roll to denote poltergeist phenomena.

Red Cap (of Witches)

The witches of Ireland used to put on a magical red cap before flying through the air to their meeting-place. It has been suggested that witches in various countries may have experienced the illusion of traveling through the air after ingesting the "red cap" hallucinatory mushroom amanita muscaria (fly-agaric).

In Scotland the red caps were bloodthirsty elves who were said to live in the castles in the Lowlands. They dyed their caps red with human blood.

Redfield, James (1950–)

James Redfield, the author of the post-New Age spiritual classic The Celestine Prophecy, was born on March 19, 1950, in rural Alabama. He grew up near Birmingham, Alabama, and attended Auburn University, where he majored in sociology. After receiving his bachelor's degree, he continued at Auburn and received a master's degree in counseling. In 1974 he began work as a therapist for abused adolescents. During his college years and subsequent period as a counselor, he became a student of Eastern religions and the human potentials movement. He increasingly turned to theories of psychic phenomena and intuition as resources to assist his clients.

In 1989, Redfield quit his job to write and to synthesize his interests. The results of his initial effort, which included a trip to the New Age sacred sites in Sedona, Arizona, were completed in 1991 as his first book, The Celestine Prophecy. He self-published the book in 1992 and within a year over 100,000 copies had been printed. Eventually Warner Books bought the rights to the title and in 1994 brought out the first hardback edition. The book soon became number one on the New York Times nonfiction best-seller list. It remained on the list for three years, was translated into several languages, and was soon joined by its sequel, The Tenth Insight (1996).

The Celestine Prophecy appeared as it became evident that the vision of a New Age that had so transformed the metaphysical community through the 1980s had died. Many who had identified themselves with the New Age sought new understanding of what had been occurring. Redfield's book appeared to provide that new direction. The Celestine Prophecy described nine insights that Redfield felt were emerging in prominence among those who chose to be aware of them. The insights suggested that since the 1960s people had become more attuned to their intuitive self and the coincidences that filled their life. As a result of the attunement to these insights, a new vision of the transformation of human consciousness would emerge in the next century. The Tenth Insight explored the results of working with these insights.

People not only read The Celestine Prophecy, but study groups formed to work with the insights. For these people, Redfield authored "experiential guides" for both The Celestine Prophecy and The Tenth Insight. He began a newsletter, The Celestine Journal, in 1994 that in 1998 became a monthly Internet newsletter on his website at <http://www.celestinevision.com>. More recently he continued to develop his perspectives in additional books, The Celestine Vision (1997) and The Secret of Shambhala (1999). He has been aided in his endeavors by his wife, Salle Merrill Redfield, who has authored several related books and who lectures with Redfield on their speaking tours around the world. Beyond supplying material for study of the nine insights, Redfield has done little toward organizing any movement out of the response to his writings. However, some readers of his works have formed the New Civilization Network, a loose association operating primarily through the Internet.

Red Man

The demon of the tempests. He was supposed to be furious when the rash voyager intruded on his solitude and would show his anger in the winds and storms. The French peasants believed that a mysterious little red man appeared to Napoleon to announce coming military reverses.

Red Pigs

It was formerly believed that Irish witches could turn wisps of straw or hay into red pigs, which they sold at the market. But when the pigs were driven homeward by the buyers, they resumed their original shape on crossing running water.

Reese, Bert (1851–1926)

American-Polish medium with whom remarkable experiments in clairvoyance were conducted by Baron von Schrenck-Notzing, Thomas A. Edison, Hereward Carrington, and Felix Hollaender. Reese was said to have manifested extraordinary psychic faculties at the age of six. According to Felix Hollaender, writing in the Annals of Psychic Science (September 1913), these abilities so terrified the people of the little town where he was born that they deserted the shop where his father sold miscellaneous goods, and to avoid ruin he had to send his son away to Posen. The people of the country town were filled with horror. They considered the child a wizard and possessed by the devil.

In America, Reese was arrested and condemned for disorderly conduct. Appealing against his sentence he appeared before Judge Rosalsky and proved his powers to him. He asked the Judge to write something on three different pieces of paper, to fold them up and place them in three different pockets, mixing them in such a way that they could not be recognized.

Then Judge Rosalsky took one of the pellets and pressed it against Reese's forehead. He immediately answered: "You have fifteen dollars in the bank mentioned in your question." He continued by reading the second paper, which contained the name of a Miss O'Connor, a former governess to Judge Rosalsky's children. He also read the third paper, whereupon Judge Rosalsky acquitted him.

Schrenck-Notzing considered him one of the most extraordinary men of the time. Thought reading could not sufficiently account for his performances as the experimenters mostly took care that they themselves should not know which piece of paper contained which question. In certain performances, “X-ray clairvoyance” also fell short as an explanation; his success must have been due to psychometry. According to the account of Felix Hollaender, he indicated to a commercial firm the pages on which there was a fraudulent entry. He was given five percent of the amount of the fraud.

However, Harry Houdini claimed Reese was a fraud, and that he knew his methods. In a letter to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Houdini wrote: “I have no hesitancy in telling you that I set a snare at the séance I had with Reese, and caught him cold-blooded. He was startled when it was over, as he knew that I had bowled him over. So much so that he claimed I was the only one that had ever detected him.”

Reese was at one time an assistant to Thomas A. Edison, who held séances with him. In his later years, Edison worked on apparatus to communicate with the dead. Reese also had a reputation for dowsing and was said to have discovered valuable oil deposits for the Rockefeller company.

Reeves, M.

London restaurant proprietor who, in association with F. M. Parkes, gained renown in 1877 as one of the earliest practitioners of spirit photography in England. He was said to have contributed a considerable part of the team’s power, as without him Parkes could not obtain recognizable spirit “extras” on his photographic plates. The association was dissolved when Reeves emigrated to Canada. Many of the psychic pictures that appeared on their plates were symbolic. (See also psychic photography)

Reflectograph

An instrument for mechanical communication with spirits, invented by George Jobson and B. K. Kirkby. It consisted of a large typewriter, the key-contacts of which were so sensitive that by merely blowing upon them they could be depressed, closing an electric circuit and making an illuminated letter appear. The machine, however, was by no means independent of human action. The presence of the medium L. E. Singleton was necessary. When she was entranced, a hand (suggestive of fraud) appeared out of the cabinet, tapped the keys, and spelled out messages which were then flashed in luminous letters on a six-foot indicator. Re-formed Congregation of the Goddess-International

The Re-formed Congregation of the Goddess-International is one expression of feminist Wicca that has emerged in stages through the 1980s and 1990s. Wicca emerged as a religion built around the worship of the Goddess. It elevated the role of the priestess as a means of balancing the more traditional all-male leadership role in Western religion. Many women found Wicca and magic to be a means of empowerment. In the early 1970s Dianic Wicca took the notion of the feminine role in the religion one step further and began to speak of Wicca as “wimmen’s” religion. Feminist leaders began to organize all-female covens with a range of opinion from all-lesbian separatist groups to those groups that merely supplied women with a place for religious self-expression without male interference.

Feminist consciousness emerged within the strongest of the Wisconsin-based Wiccan groups, Circle, but generally manifested as all-female events during gatherings in which males otherwise participated. A more separatist format of feminist Wicca emerged in 1983 with the first issue of Of a Like Mind, a periodical that became the focus of a network of goddess-worshipping women. Of a Like Mind covered such areas as women’s spirituality, Goddess religions around the world, nature-centered spirituality, and feminism. Each issue centered upon a particular Goddess and a singular theme, the subjects of feature articles, and included a number of columns that facilitated networking.

Over the years the Re-formed Congregation emerged as a network of groups (called circles) and then in the 1990s as a formal corporate structure that chartered member organizations and trained and ordained leaders. The congregation organized its own publishing house, Triple Crescent Press, and a school, the Women’s Theological Institute. The Grove is a retreat center near Madison, Wisconsin. It sponsors a number of celebrative and training events through the year.

The Re-formed Congregation is headquartered at Box 6677, Madison, WI 53726. Of a Like Mind is issued quarterly. It has an Internet presence at <http://www.cae.wisc.edu:80/~cashd/pathways/rcg.html>.

Regardie, (Francis) Israel (1907–1985)

Ritual magician, student of Aleister Crowley, and later a chiropractor who utilized the thought of Wilhelm Reich in his work. He was born in England on November 17, 1907, but emigrated to the United States with his family at age 13. He discovered the theosophical writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, which provided him an entrée into the occult. Then through the writings of Charles Stansfeld Jones, he became more aware of the occult tradition and fascinated by Crowley’s outlook and exploits.

Beginning in 1928 he traveled through Europe as Crowley’s secretary and student. Although he later parted company with Crowley, he defended him from those who disliked his exploits in magic and sexual liberties, and spoke of his “real genius and grandeur.” Regardie was well aware of Crowley’s more controversial exploits, but was willing to overlook much that might be objectionable because of what he recognized as Crowley’s true magical genius.

Regardie began to write in the early 1930s, his first books being The Tree of Life (1932) and The Garden of Pomegranates (1932). In 1934, after parting with Crowley, he joined the Stella Matutina, an offshoot of the former Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. He despaired of the corrupt nature of the order’s leadership and saw no hope of reform. Enthused with the rituals, he broke his oath of secrecy and revealed all he had learned in a book, My Rosicrucian Adventure (1935). Several years later he published the complete rituals in a four-volume set, The Golden Dawn: An Encyclopedia of Practical Occultism (1937–40). (While angering his fellow magicians, these published rituals interested only a few until the renewal of the occult revival in the 1960s, when Regardie’s compendium was reprinted in a revised and enlarged edition in 1969.)

Regardie later became a chiropractor and, following the outbreak of hostilities with Japan, served in the U.S. Army. After the war he settled in southern California, where he practiced chiropractic and psychoanalysis. He had studied with Nandor Fodor in the mid-1930s in New York City and later became an enthusiastic supporter of Wilhelm Reich and his theories of orgone energy.

In his highly individual linking of the Golden Dawn teachings with Reich's psychophysical therapy, Regardie created a unique synthesis of mysticism, occultism, and psychotherapy. In his introduction to the second edition of The Golden Dawn (1969), Regardie notes that, "Reich has succeeded in building a bridge between the modern psychologies and occultism. What he had to say, and the therapeutic method he developed and called vegetotherapy, have been found of inestimable value in my life, and the two hundred hours of therapy I had years ago comprise an experience that today, in retrospect, I would not be without."

Regardie retained his respect for the Golden Dawn teachings, and during the last years of his life he accepted a few magic students and nurtured the birth of several new organizations that drew inspiration from both the Golden Dawn and Crowley. In 1983 he visited New Zealand, where a Stella Matutina lodge had been founded by R. W. Felkin in 1912 and continued to function.

Regardie died March 10, 1985, at age 77, in Sedona, Arizona, where he lived for several years after he retired from some 30 years in practice as a Reichian therapist in Los Angeles. The forename "Francis" was adopted by Regardie in the 1930s at the suggestion of Winifred Burke (wife of the famous novelist Thomas Burke), who thought that his spiritual direction was reminiscent of St. Francis of Assisi, noted for his faith, humility, and love.

Regurgitation

An explanatory theory of materialization phenomena that suggests that the white substance issuing from a medium's body, which is taken for ectoplasm, is something that the medium swallowed before the sitting and brought up at the appropriate moment. The theory was put forward by the Society for Psychical Research, London, in the case of Eva C., accused of fraud in 1922. Wide public attention was also aroused by the case of the British medium Helen Duncan, in which the theory was considered a satisfactory explanation.

Reich, Wilhelm (1897–1957)

Austrian psychoanalyst, whose later ideas on life energy had analogies with occult and mystical concepts. Reich was born on March 24, 1897, in Dobrzycynica, Galicia. The son of a farmer, he was tutored at home for entrance to the German Gymnasium at Czernowitz (Cernauti) at the age of 14. He boarded with a family in Czernowitz and helped out on his father's farm during vacations. Reich passed his Abiturium in 1915 just as World War I was heating up. He joined the Austrian army and served on the Italian front.

In 1918, he returned to study in Vienna. He matriculated in law at the University of Vienna, then went on to study medicine. He obtained his M.D. in 1922 and after graduate studies in neurology and psychiatry became the first clinical assistant at Sigmund Freud's Psychoanalytic Polyclinic in 1922 and vice-director in 1928. He joined the Austrian Socialist Party in 1924 with the hope of reconciling Freudian and Marxist theories. He had become convinced that much neurosis was caused by poverty, bad housing conditions, and various social ills. His actions alienated him from orthodox psychoanalysts and doctrinaire Marxists.

He joined the Communist Party in 1928 and became a pioneer in advocating health centers, but after a visit to Russia in 1929 he was disappointed with Russian bureaucracy and bourgeois moralistic attitudes toward sexuality. He was expelled from the Communist party in 1933 because of his advocacy of sexual politics. Later, the International Psychoanalytic Association excluded him because of his Communist associations.

He moved to Berlin in 1930 and the following year helped establish Verlag für Sexualpolitik (Sexpol-Verlag) for the sexual education of young people. He followed the logic inherent in the original Freudian concept of the overriding importance of the sexual urge in human affairs. A vicious newspaper smear campaign centered in Scandinavia hounded him through the mid-1930s (1933–39). He left Germany to escape the Nazis in 1939, after exposing what he considered the sham Socialism and perverse character of the Hitler regime.

He escaped to the United States and settled in Forest Hills, Long Island, but moved to Oregon, Maine, in the 1940s, where he established the Orgone Institute Research Laboratories. He was once again the subject of attacks from journalists and was persecuted by the Food and Drug Administration (FDA) on charges arising from a tragi-comic misunderstanding of Reich's theories of cosmic "orgone" energy in relation to a cure for cancer.

He developed what he called an "orgone accumulator," a large box-like arrangement of materials that, he claimed, trapped orgone energy, which entered the device more rapidly than it exited. Reich believed that this energy had a tonic effect on individuals sitting in the accumulator, and that it was particularly beneficial for cancer sufferers.

He supplied this device only to individuals who would use it experimentally under the guidance of a qualified physician. But the FDA proceeded against Reich as if he were a common charlatan peddling a worthless cancer cure. Reich refused to comply with a court injunction banning the use of his "orgone accumulator" and insisting on the removal of the word "orgone" from all his books, and he was eventually sentenced to two years imprisonment for contempt of court. Most of his books (some of which had been burned in Nazi Germany) were seized by the American authorities and burned at the Gansevort Incinerator, New York, August 23, 1956.

Reich was a brilliant if eccentric thinker who continually ran up against intense social and government forces. Many of his ideas, especially those concerning sexuality, would be quite acceptable today. His championing of the importance of sexual expression in Freudianism was rejected by most psychoanalysts, although they used many of his therapeutic insights. His reconciliation of psychic and somatic aspects of psychoanalysis, long desired by Freud, was regarded with suspicion and mistrust by Freud himself. Reich's teachings on "sexual revolution," as opposed to authoritarian repression, were grossly misinterpreted after his death by cranks, pornographers, and hippies on one hand, and by a humorless orthodoxy of authoritarian Reichian physicians on the other.

Reich died in the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, November 3, 1957.

Reichenbach, Baron Karl von (1788–1869)

Nineteenth-century German chemist, expert on meteorites, and discoverer of kerosene, paraffin, and creosote. He also spent over two decades experimenting with the mysterious force which he named "od" (also known as odic force or odyle in various translations). This claimed force, which has its intellectual roots in mesmerism, had particular relevance to concepts of the human aura.

Reichenbach was born on February 12, 1788, at Württemberg and died at Leipzig on January 22, 1869. He was educated at the gymnasium (high school) in Württemberg and afterward at the State University of Tübingen, where he studied natural science, political economy, and law. During Reichenbach's student days, Germany was under the military control of Napoleon's France, and at the age of sixteen Reichenbach founded a secret society to set up a German state in the South Sea Islands. However, he was arrested by the Napoleonic police and detained for some months as a political prisoner. After his release he continued his studies and obtained his Ph.D.

He later traveled in France and Germany investigating the construction and operation of ironworks, and in 1815 he set up his own plant at Villigen in Baden. He later built a large charcoal furnace at Hausach in Baden. He established a beet-sugar factory, steelworks, and blast furnaces and devoted much time to experimental research. He discovered paraffin in 1830 and other coal-tar products such as eupion, creosote, and pittacal (pitch) in the following years. Between 1835 and 1860, he also published a long series of scientific papers on meteorites. His many contributions earned him a well-deserved reputation as a brilliant scientist and industrialist.

Meanwhile his experiments in human sensitivity from 1839 onward were not as well received by his colleagues; in fact, he was harshly criticized. These experiments involved attempts to demonstrate a mysterious vital force which he named "od," for the Norse deity Odin, indicating a power, like the animal magnetism conceived by Franz A. Mesmer, which permeates the whole of nature.

Detection and demonstration of this force depended upon sensitives—specially gifted individuals rather like psychics, although Reichenbach's sensitives were ordinary people from all walks of life. These individuals experienced specific reactions to the proximity of other people—feelings of pleasant coolness and drowsiness or, on the other hand, disagreeable, numbing, or exciting feelings. They also manifested a special right-hand/left-hand polarity, which affected their reactions to other people standing or sitting near to their right or left sides, and particularly to sleeping positions with partners. They were also sympathetic to the color blue, and antipathetic to yellow; they had particular food fetishes; were sensitive to certain metals; and unpleasantly affected by mirrors.

In a long series of experiments with some two hundred individuals, Reichenbach documented the reports of sensitives to seeing emanations from crystals and magnets in total darkness and detecting alternations of electric current. They could also perceive an aura surrounding the human body.

Reichenbach studied the various manifestations of this vital force in its relationship to electricity, magnetism, and chemistry. He experimented with its connection to water-witching (or dowsing), mesmerism, and similar psychic subjects. He tried to show that the force could move objects without conscious effort, as in the table-turning of the Spiritualists.

However, Reichenbach was neither a Spiritualist nor a mesmerist. His interest was purely scientific, his hundreds of experiments were conducted with empirical precision. Unfortunately, his experiments ran both against the dominant mechanistic view of the universe held by most mid-nineteenth-century scientists and had a significant methodological flaw. While he could and did produce a wide range of positive results, he was never able to demonstrate his major causative agent, the od. He was never able to eliminate a variety of possible causes, both paranormal and mundane, for the effects.

Reichenbach's researches were published in Germany in 1850. There were two English translations, one by William Gregory in 1850 and another by John Ashburner the following year. Both translations are good, but Gregory's was the official translation and is generally regarded as the best. Gregory translated Reichenbach's "od" as "odyle," perhaps feeling that this term would sound more acceptable to scientists. Gregory also translated Reichenbach's essays Letters on Od and Magnetism (1926), which are a simpler general introduction to Reichenbach's experiments and concepts than his main work.

Reichenbach died on January 22, 1869, at the age of eighty, and as Gustav Fechner, another scientist, commented: "Up to the last days of his life, he grieved at the thought of having to die without obtaining recognition for his system, and such was the tragic fate that actually befell him."

Some years after Reichenbach's death, there was a belated revival of interest in his work by the Society for Psychical Research in Britain, which formed a Reichenbach Committee that included William F. Barrett, Edmund Gurney, and F. W. H. Myers. In this case, it was precisely the possible connection with psychic phenomena that inspired this renewal of interest in a subject pointedly ignored by orthodox science. The committee made careful investigations, but was less fortunate than Reichenbach in obtaining suitable sensitives. Only three out of the forty-five individuals tested possessed the sensitivity postulated by Reichenbach, but these three provided interesting confirmation of Reichenbach's observations.

In 1908, Walter J. Kilner, who was familiar with the work of Reichenbach, developed a technique for making the human aura visible. In this century, Wilhelm Reich's theories of "orgone energy" seem to be about the same energy Reichenbach explored under the label "od."

Reiki

A Japanese healing system built around the use of ki, the universal life energy, analogous to the Hindu prana and the od force described in the research of Baron von Reichenbach. Reiki can be traced to the discoveries of Mikao Usui, a Christian minister working in Kyoto in the 1880s. Challenged by his contemporaries concerning the Christian claims of biblical miracles, he began a search that led him to the United States to study at the University of Chicago, where he worked toward a Ph.D. However, he did not find answers to his questing until he investigated Buddhism.

Unable to find any Buddhists practicing healing, he learned Chinese and Sanskrit in order to read the early Buddhist sutras in their original languages. There he found a discussion of the healing power, and during a 21-day retreat he welcomed the power into himself. Soon afterward he was able to be the facilitator for several spectacular healings and he settled down in Kyoto to learn about this new power he had discovered and to perfect the techniques for using it. He eventually passed his knowledge to Chijuro Hayashi.

An event of great importance to the spread of reiki occurred in the 1930s when a young Japanese American, Hawayo Takata, ill and believing herself soon to die, returned to her native land. There she met several reiki healers and they facilitated her complete recovery. As a result she became the first woman, and first American, reiki master. She returned to Hawaii and taught quietly for many years. Then in the late 1970s she moved to the Midwest, where she began to share reiki healing with a larger audience of metaphysically-oriented Americans. Virginia Samdall of Chicago became the first of a new generation of reiki masters. In 1978 Takata initiated Barbara Ray of Atlanta, Georgia, and went on to teach her the secrets of initiating other reiki masters. She had previously taught the secrets to her granddaughter, Phillis Lei Furomoto.

Takata died in 1980. Both Ray and Furomoto, as reiki grand masters, assumed leadership for the development of the movement built around what Takata had taught them. Ray founded the American Reiki Association (later renamed the Radiance Technique Association International) and Furomoto founded the Reiki Alliance. Both have initiated further masters who formed different lineages of reiki practice.

Reiki is taught in three degrees. Students having mastered the first degree are equipped to use the reiki technique to heal others. The second degree provides a deeper knowledge of the reiki work. The third degree must be taught by a reiki grand master and allows one to become a reiki master and a teacher of reiki at the first and second levels. Today, an individual may learn reiki through classes or workshops at any number of special institutes or centers designed to teach reiki healing energy and educate the public. Each institute may teach its own unique system or interpretation of reiki based on traditional teachings. Completion of a reiki class usually leads to a certificate.

Legal requirements to practice reiki usually depend on the place where it is practiced. Regulation varies from state to state and any licenses are issued primarily by governmental bodies.

There are certain procedures and guidelines that are recommended with reiki treatments and therapy, although some reiki masters claim that reiki cannot cause harm or be performed incorrectly (it is possible to perform reiki illegally if there is inappropriate touching). Some masters also claim that it makes no difference if the person receiving treatment has Eastern or Western beliefs. Several styles of reiki are practiced around the world. Different reiki styles apply different methods to conduct the flow of energy during a treatment or therapy session. Methods or tools may include meditation, prayer, use of colors or sounds, chants, mantras, applying hot and cold sensations, elements or healing rays (fire, air, water, earth), use of crystals, astrology, tantric healing, karmic body education, chakras, breathing exercises, and attunement openings.

Reincarnation

The return to a new corporeal life of a soul (the incorporeal true self) that had previously been embodied and passed through bodily death. The idea of reincarnation—that the soul passes through a series of embodiments—stands in contrast to the dominant Western Christian idea of a single corporeal embodiment followed by resurrection (reunion of the soul with a spiritual body) and life with God in heaven. Reincarnation is often associated with, but is not necessarily connected with, transmigration, the idea that at death the soul might pass into the body of an animal, a plant, or even an inanimate object such as a stone. The belief in reincarnation was tied to moral categories in ancient religions, especially the Eastern concept of karma, which viewed the present life as the working out of consequences from previous lives. Future embodiments will also be determined by the consequences of this present life. One must remove oneself from the realm of consequences through spiritual activity or be stuck in the endless cycle of reincarnation forever. The belief in a form of reincarnation is fundamental to both Hinduism and Buddhism and had some popularity in the ancient Mediterranean basin. Pythagoras, for example, claimed that he was Euphorbus in a previous existence. In modern times, reincarnation has spread in the West through the efforts of French Spiritism and Theosophy.

Reincarnation in the East

The idea of reincarnation is usually associated with India. It is found in most of the forms of Hinduism; there are hundreds, with some variation in the different theologies and schools of thought. Basically, the soul is an immortal entity that has continuity through eternity, but falls into material existence and is trapped in the illusion that this physical world is ultimately real. Through multiple lives the soul becomes subject to karma, or consequences. Good karma leads to noble birth; bad karma to a lower birth, even to rebirth as an animal. The idea of karma and reincarnation was integral to social organization in the caste system and thus had practical application in everyday life. The caste system in turn dictated proper action that was sanctioned by the rewards and punishments of karma.

In the mainstream of Hindu thought—which found truth in the timeless eternal world beyond this world of illusion—while a favorable reincarnation was desirable, the ultimate goal was to escape the wheel of reincarnation totally. The means of such escape was spiritual discipline encased within a renunciation of the world. By withdrawing and concentrating on the spiritual realm, one ceased to create karma and dissolved old karma. Eventually, one could rid oneself of karma entirely and escape.

The essential soul is said to be pure and impersonal, part of a universal soul, but overlaid by illusions of individual egoism relating to desires and fears of the body and senses. The classic statements relating to reincarnation are to be found in the Hindu scripture Bhagavad-Gita, which stresses: “The soul is never born nor dies, nor does it exist on coming into being. For it is unborn, eternal, and primeval. Even although the body is slain, the soul is not” (2:20).

Buddhism emerged as a reform movement in Hinduism. It challenged the traditional Hindu system at a number of points, including its understanding of human life. In particular, Buddhism challenged the idea of a substantial soul that existed in and of itself apart from the body. The rather sophisticated understanding of the self in Buddhism is often likened to a candle flame. Obviously, as the candle burns down the flame will eventually die out. It has no existence apart from its burning. Buddhists suggest that reincarnation is as if, just as the flame is about to go out, it finds a new candle wick—a new body within which to burn.

In the nineteenth century, during the height of British rule in India, Christianity challenged Hinduism, especially as it existed in village temple worship. Christian leaders denounced animal sacrifice and the sexual promiscuity of some tantric groups, while slowly discovering the sophistication of Hindu philosophy. One of the responses to Christianity’s invasion of the country, with the backing of colonial authorities, however, was a revival of philosophical Hinduism in light of new nineteenth century Western notions of progress, evolution, and moral striving.

In this new Hinduism of the nineteenth century, the succession of lives of the soul in different bodies is regarded as one indivisible life. The soul uses the experience of each incarnation as an opportunity for expiating sins in former lives, of balancing bad karma with good, and perfecting the soul through a process of evolution so that further incarnations will not be necessary and the individual soul can be absorbed in the divine plan. Until then, the body of the next life (whether human or animal) is shaped by actions in the present life. Moral striving is the means of gaining good karma. Ultimately, all lives may be seen as illusions of consciousness. This form of reincarnationist thought—which called for the good life, rather than the more traditional form calling for withdrawal from life—influenced Western visitors to India and was ultimately imported to the West through Theosophy and the various Indian teachers who successfully established themselves in the United States (notably Swamis Vivekananda and Yogananda).

Some religions, like Hinduism, teach that reincarnation is not always immediate, but that some souls may enjoy a period in a transitional state, either heavenly or purgatorial, before rebirth.

An idea of reincarnation, though not karma, is also found in some early Greek philosophy, including that of both Pythagoras and Plato. It actually emerges in the Mediterranean basin simultaneously with its emergence in India, around 600 B.C.E. In the fourth century, Plato’s Phaedrus presents a reincarnation myth that seems to have been derived from the ophite religion. A preexistent soul falls from the realm of the gods into earthly existence, where it migrates from one body to the next for some ten thousand years before it returns upward to a place of judgment. Plato also introduced into Greek thought the possibility of a transmigration of the soul into an animal.

In Roman literature, the idea of reincarnation is found in the writings of Ennius, probably deriving from Greek thought.

There is no trace of it in Jewish literature, although it later entered into some Kabbalistic teaching. From Greek philosophy, it came into the Gnostic tradition, and from second- and third-century Gnosticism it passed to the Manichaeans and Cathari.

The theory underlying the concept of reincarnation differs from the eschatology of rewards and punishments in Christianity. Each individual soul will eventually attain perfection, although some will take more reincarnations than others, learning by painful experience, in one life after another, the inexorable laws of karma—of cause and effect. All actions involve consequences, some immediate, others delayed, others in future lives. We punish ourselves by our actions, and the very defects and difficulties under which we suffer offer scope for expiation and perfection.

The Jewish and Christian traditions were (and largely remain) inimical to reincarnation. All of the Christian theologians who spoke of reincarnation denounced it in no uncertain terms. The only break in the antireincarnationist view appears in the early writings of Origen, the third-century theologian who as a young man had converted to Christianity. Before his conversion he was an accomplished Platonist, and he attempted to integrate Platonic philosophy and Christian thinking in his earliest writings, which, if not affirming reincarnation, do speak of the preexistence of the soul and its possible transmigration. Origen later dropped his beliefs and in his biblical commentaries emerged as hostile to reincarnationist thought.

A major controversy involving Origen’s early thought emerged in the sixth century surrounding a group of people who adopted Origen’s early writings as part of their larger challenge to the Roman Empire. Thus it was that several councils reaffirmed the church’s opinion on reincarnationist ideas and, in the style of the times, pronounced them anathema. In the early twentieth century, several proponents of reincarnation, primarily Theosophists working against the opposition of Christian leaders, countered with the story of a sixth-century plot. According to the idea, Christianity had taught reincarnation until the Roman empress Theodosia forced the church to edit the Bible and remove any reference to it. This theory shows a great ignorance of the history of the period and has no foundation in fact. In recent decades the primary presentation of this idea appeared in a book by Noel Langley, Edgar Cayce and Reincarnation, and has passed into New Age literature.

Theosophical Teachings on Reincarnation

The major conduit of reincarnationist teachings in the West during the twentieth century has been the Theosophical Society. According to Theosophy, the various manifestations in the flesh are merely small portions of one whole. The monad, the divine spark, or individuality, remains the same throughout the whole course of reincarnation and is truly a denizen of the three higher worlds—the spiritual, the intuitional, and the higher mental. In order to further its growth and the widening of its experience and knowledge, however, it is necessary for the monad to descend into the worlds of denser matter—the lower mental, the astral, and the physical—and take back with it to the higher worlds what it learns there. Since it is impossible to progress far during one manifestation, the monad must return again and again to the lower worlds.

The laws of progress, the laws that govern reincarnation, are those of evolution and of karma. The scheme of the evolution of life decrees that all shall sooner or later attain perfection by developing to the utmost their latent powers and qualities, and each manifestation in the lower worlds is but one short journey nearer to the goal. Those who realize this law shorten the journey by their own efforts while those who do not realize it, of course, lengthen the journey.

Karma decrees that both good and bad effects follow whoever caused them. Hence, what an individual has done in one manifestation he will benefit by or suffer for in another. It may be impossible that actions should be immediately effective, but each is stored up and sooner or later will bear fruit.

It may be asked why one long life in the lower worlds should not suffice in place of a multitude of manifestations, but this is explained by the fact that the dense matter that is the vehicle of these bodies becomes, after a time of progress, incapable of further alteration to suit the developing monad's needs and must accordingly be laid aside for a new body.

After physical death, the individual passes first to the astral world, then to the heavenly portion of the mental world. Most time is spent in the latter, except when descending into the denser worlds to garner fresh experience and knowledge for further development in preparation for passage into a higher sphere.

In the heaven world these experiences and this knowledge are woven together into the texture of the individual's nature. In those who have not progressed far on the journey of evolution, the manifestations in the lower worlds are comparatively frequent, but with passage of time and development, these manifestations become rarer and more time is spent in the heaven world, until at last, the great process of reincarnation draws to an end, and the pilgrims enter the path that leads to perfection.

Reincarnation and Spiritism

In France reincarnation was advocated before the time of Allan Kardec by several philosophers and mystics, such as Henri de St. Simon, Prosper Enfantin, Charles Fourier, Pierre Leroux, and Jean Reynaud. From an article by Alexander Aksakof in the London Spiritualist during 1875, it appears that Kardec adopted the doctrine of reincarnation from spirit communications that were received by the medium Celina Japhet. Japhet's mediumship was developed by one M. Roustan, a mesmerist who believed in reincarnation.

If the medium disclosed the doctrine under the effect of the mesmerist's belief, it is easy to understand how Kardec and his school could receive ample confirmation through automatists of his tenet that spiritual progress is achieved through a series of incarnations, always in the human race, that successive corporeal existences are the necessary steps to perfection and that the soul retains its individuality and memory after separation from the body.

The influence of the Kardec school was powerful and, by the appeal of its reconciliation with the apparent injustices of life, it became more popular than the teachings of the Spiritualist Z. J. Piérart and his followers, who denied reincarnation and relied on the same kind of evidence as that which the Kardecists produced. Indeed, Alphonse Cahagnet, who kept the earliest careful trance records in France, was the first to whom the communicators emphatically denied reincarnation, but admitted the existence of the soul anterior to its appearance on Earth.

Outside France, the doctrine of Allan Kardec was denounced by many Spiritualists. In the United States, Andrew Jackson Davis declared it to be "a magnificent mansion built on sand." But he also believed in preexistence and taught that "all souls existed from the beginning in the divine soul; all individuality which is, has been, or will be, had its pre-existence, has its present existence in creative being."

In England, William Howitt was the chief antagonist. He said that the doctrine was pitiable and repellent, and argued that if it were true there must have been millions of spirits who, on entering the other world, have sought in vain their kindred, children, and friends.

A very pertinent remark may be quoted from a published letter of the great medium D. D. Home: "I have had the pleasure of meeting at least twelve Marie Antoinettes, six or seven Marys of Scotland, a whole host of Louis and other kings, about twenty Great Alexanders, but never a plain John Smith. I, indeed, would like to cage the latter curiosity."

For its psychological import, it is also interesting to note that at the exact time of Kardec's death, Home claimed to have received the following communication: "I regret having taught the Spiritist doctrine. Allan Kardec." (See Home's book Lights and Shadows of Spiritualism, 1877.)

Among Spiritualists, those who favored reincarnation countered Home. His argument was no argument; reincarnation, if true, may not necessarily be a universal fact. It may not take place at once. In The Road to Immortality, by Geraldine Cummins (1932), the spirit of F. W. H. Myers, communicating from "the other side," admits reincarnation as an optional choice and as a necessity for "animal men," but not through a series of existences, and counters Theosophical notions of karma by a fascinating theory of group souls.

Regarding Howitt's objection it may be claimed that the double, in sleep, may establish meetings without recollecting them on awakening. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle pointed out that since reincarnation for the spirits is a question of their own future, they may not be more enlightened on it than we are on our own fate.

Reincarnation could be optional; it could be punitive. It could be imposed for the purposes of retribution or it could be undertaken for the fulfillment of a mission. The teachings of the spirit control "Imperator" through medium W. Stainton Moses admitted the possibility of reincarnation as another chance for souls that had sunk so low as practically to lose identity, and in the case of high spirits who descend with a mission.

The opposition to Kardec's philosophy in England was not universal; he had some followers. Theosophist Anna Kingsford translated many of his books. She believed herself to be the reincarnation of the Virgin Mary, while her follower Edward Maitland believed that he had been St. John the Divine.

Reincarnation and Spiritualism

Outside France, Spiritualist experience offered little to support the theory of reincarnation. "John King," the famous control of the medium Eusapia Palladino, claimed to have been Palladino's father in a previous existence. "John King" claimed manifestation through many different mediums at different times, however.

The experiences of Carl A. Wickland and his wife in obsession cases did not bear out the theory. They were told by earthbound spirits, brought into their rescue circles, that on passing over they had entered the auras of young children and obsessed them. The children, however, never ceased to struggle against these invaders. In those cases in which the Wickland rescue circle enlightened the obsessors of their error, the sanity of the patient quickly returned as the obsessing influence was relieved.

In the nineteenth century, however, hints of support for reincarnation began to emerge. Charles Richet gives one illustrative case from Les Miracles de la Volonté, by E. Duchatel and R. Warcollier:

"A distinguished physician of Palermo, M. Carmelo Samona, well acquainted with metapsychic science, lost his little daughter, Alexandrina, aged five, in 1910. Mme. Samona was wild with grief. Three days after she saw the child in a dream who said to her: 'I have not left you; I have become tiny like that,' designating some very small object. A fresh pregnancy was the more unlikely in that Mme. Samona had undergone a serious ovarian operation a year previously. On April 10, however, she became aware that she was pregnant. On May 4th it was predicted by Alexandrina, communicating by means of the table, that Mme. Samona would be delivered of twin girls, one of whom would entirely resemble Alexandrina. This came to pass. One of the twins had a mark on the left eye and another mark on the right ear with a symmetry of the face, precisely like the deceased child."

Among various automatic writing scripts, Frederick Bligh Bond, whose famous discovery of Edgar Chapel, Glastonbury Abbey, is described in his book The Gate of Remembrance (1918), noticed reincarnation claims in the communications he received through "Miss X." The old monks who communicated asserted that Miss X was one of the early Glastonbury monks and addressed her as “Brother Simon.” Neither Miss X nor Bond believed in reincarnation when the script came through. The incident is referred to in Bond’s book The Company of Avalon (1924).

Spiritualist J. Arthur Hill presented his reflections on scripts received by a Mrs. Cary (pseudonym), a British working woman of about 50. The scripts detailed episodes involving reincarnation. The impact of “Some Reincarnationist Automatic Scripts,” in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 38), was weak, however, since no attempt had been made to verify the historic accuracy of the names. It was also noted that Cary was a Theosophist.

The Strange Experiments of Eugene Rochas

The feeling of déjà vu has often been cited as an argument for reincarnation. However, this phenomenon yields to a variety of explanations. More interesting than the rather vague feelings of déjà vu are claimed memories of past incarnations. Eugene Rochas was among the first to explore such memories. Rochas claimed that certain subjects, if put into hypnotic sleep by means of longitudinal passes, could be made to retrace the previous phases of their existence down to their birth and beyond “into the grey” and then into an even earlier state of incarnation. By means of transversal passes the subject was brought back to his normal state by going through the same phases in order of their time. If the transversal passes were continued, the subject was led into the future.

Marie Mayo, the daughter of a French engineer, was one of Rochas’s subjects. She passed through various stages of hypnotic sleep into the first stage of lethargy, in which she was suggestible for brief moment, into the first state of somnambulism, in which she was not at all suggestible and retained the memory of what happened in her preceding state and in her waking life. She then passed into the state of rapport, in which she heard no one but the hypnotizer.

In this state she began to exteriorize herself, a half phantom formed at the left and a half at the right, the colors red and blue. In a successive state, the phantom halves united; the exteriorization of the astral body became complete but was attached to the body by a fluidic cord. In this state of exteriorization, the astral body assumed shapes in accord with the age in which the subject saw herself going through the stages of her life.

At age eight, she wrote her name in Arabic. At that age she had attended a school in Beirut. Beyond that birth she called herself Lina, the daughter of a fisherman in Brittany. She married at age 20. Her husband was also a fisherman; his name was Yvon, but she did not remember his family name. She had one child who died at the age of two; her husband perished in a shipwreck. In a fit of despair she had thrown herself into the sea from the top of a precipice. Her body was eaten by fish.

All this information was successively elicited. She first passed through the convulsions of drowning and then went back to her life as Lina, through the childbirth to girlhood, infancy, the state of “grey” and then spoke in a previous incarnation as a man, named Charles Mauville, who lived in the time of Louis XVIII. He was a clerk in a ministerial office in Paris, a bad man, a murderer who died at age 50.

Still further back, she was a lady whose husband was a gentleman attached to the court. Her name was Madeleine de Saint-Marc. Being brought back to the present by transversal passes Mayo successively reached her real age of 18 and then was pushed, by a continuation of the passes, two years into the future. Beyond this she could not go. She saw herself in a strange country with Africans, in a house far away from a railway station, the name of which she could not read. She could not give any precise information that could be used for identification.

Rochas was also possibly the first to explore the fact that similar visions occur if a hypnotized subject is moved into the future instead of into the past. He pushed Juliette Durand, a girl of 16, ahead nine years up to age 25, when she reported dying at Nice. After a time, she reportedly was reincarnated in the future as Emile Chaumette in a family of easy circumstances, studied for the ministry, and was appointed vicaire at Havre in 1940.

Rochas’s research soon reached the same dead end as did most of those to follow. It could never be proved that the past personalities enacted by the subjects had really lived, even though they were often very plausible. In some cases, the places and the families spoken of existed, but the individuals could never be traced in parish registers or family documents and the incarnations swarmed with improbabilities.

Rochas rejected the idea that the accounts were the result of suggestion:

“They certainly do not come from me, for I have not only avoided everything that could lead the subject into any determined path, but I have often tried in vain to lead her astray by different suggestions; and the same has been the case with the experimenters who have devoted themselves to this study. . . . Are we to assimilate these phenomena to mere dreams? Certainly not. There is in them a constancy, a regularity, which we do not find in ordinary dreams. . . . And besides, how are we to explain why physical causes, such as longitudinal and transversal passes should have absolutely certain effects on the memory of the subjects between the moments of their birth and that of their present life, and they produce phenomena which do not rest on any basis of fact. I believe that we must compare these manifestations with those which have been studied in the case of Mlle. Hélène Smith, and generally with all those which are provisionally attributed to spirits, and in which we see the true and the false intermingled in a way calculated to drive to despair those who do not reflect upon the darkness in which all observers have to struggle at the beginning of every new science.”

Psychical Researchers and Reincarnation

When Allan Kardec died, Leon Denis and Gabriel Delanne became the main pillars of the reincarnationist school in France. The general evidence they relied on was fourfold: (1) infant prodigies, (2) spontaneous recollection of past lives, (3) exploration of memory under hypnosis, and (4) the claims announced of coming reincarnation.

They found a powerful supporter in psychical researcher Gustav Geley. His book From the Unconscious to the Conscious (1920) was described as a veritable Bible for reincarnation by Innocenzo Calderone, founder and director of the Italian review Filosofia della Scienza, which made a widespread international inquiry on reincarnation in 1913. Geley asserted, “I am a reincarnationist for three reasons: (1) because the doctrine seems to me from the moral point of view fully satisfactory, (2) from the philosophic point of view absolutely rational, and (3) from the scientific point of view likely, or—better still—probably true.”

Reminding all that French thought was by no means unanimous on the subject, another distinguished representative of French psychical thinking, René Sudre, ranked himself definitely in the opposite camp, declaring in an article in Psychic Research (May 1930), “Even as I can admit the faith in survival from the religious point of view, I should in like measure reject as absurd the doctrine of reincarnation and I well understand how it is that the common-sense of the Anglo-Saxon refuses to bow to this teaching.”

Modern Experiments in Hypnotic Regression

Through the twentieth century, reincarnation garnered its supporters with little fanfare. Then in 1954 the subject of reincarnation became the subject of a public controversy following the serialization of the story of Bridey Murphy in the Denver Post and the subsequent publication of Morey Bernstein’s best-selling book The Search for Bridey Murphy in 1956.

Bernstein was a businessman in Pueblo, Colorado, who had hypnotized a housewife, Ruth Simmons (the pseudonym of Virginia Tighe). In those sessions Bernstein probed Tighe's memories back to childhood and then, as it seemed, to an earlier life as Bridey Murphy, an Irish girl. The book stimulated "come as you were" social parties, pop songs, and a spate of amateur hypnotic sessions. More important, it launched attempts to find remaining traces of Bridey Murphy. As the controversy seemed to be reaching a dead end, the Chicago American published a series of articles that effectively disproved the claim that Tighe was really Bridey Murphy in a former existence. Not only had the evidence for a Bridey Murphy been lacking, but an Irish woman turned up from Tighe's early life who proved the likely model from which the past life could have been constructed. Today most people consider Bridey Murphy to have been a case of cryptonesia.

A few other experimenters in hypnotic regression techniques produced more convincing results. Among these is the British hypnotherapist Arnall Bloxham, who spent more than 20 years tape recording hypnotic subjects. These sessions convinced many that they presented actual memories of former incarnations.

Reincarnation and Parapsychology

Renewed popular interest in reincarnation also led to serious research by parapsychologists, most notably that of Ian Stevenson, of the Department of Neurology and Psychiatry, School of Medicine, University of Virginia. Stevenson collected cases from around the world of people, primarily children, who remembered an immediately previous life, and was able to provide some convincing evidence when confronted with the actual locations and people in those former lives. His book Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation was initially published by the American Society for Psychical Research as the society's Proceedings for September 1966. It presented similar cases, each investigated personally by Stevenson on field trips to Alaska, Brazil, Ceylon, India, and Lebanon. Additional cases were documented in subsequent volumes.

Stevenson's research received mixed reactions. Many of his parapsychologist colleagues, having given up on the possibility of doing survival research, had moved away from that whole area of research. A few actively attacked his cases as representative of biased sources and the imposition of Stevenson's own well-known prior commitment to a belief in reincarnation. However, they remain the best contemporary attempt of psychical research to compile evidence on so complex a subject. (See also Glastonbury Scripts)

The Religio-Philosophical Journal

Prominent American Spiritualistic weekly founded in 1865 in Chicago. Its founder and publisher, Stevens J. Jones, was murdered in 1877. His son-in-law, Col. J. C. Bundy, assumed charge. Successive editors were M. E. Bundy, B. F. Underwood, and T. G. Newan. In the 1890s the Journal moved to San Francisco and a new series (vols. 34–42) began. The publication of this long-running periodical ceased on April 22, 1905. It was superseded briefly by The Mountain Pine (1906–1908).

Religious Experience Research Centre

Originally founded in 1969 as the Religious Experience Research Unit at Manchester College, Oxford, England, by Professor Sir Alister Hardy after his retirement from the chair of zoology at Oxford University. In 1985, shortly before he died, Sir Alister was named before a group of eminent churchmen and scientists at the Church Centre of the United Nations as the winner of the Templeton Prize, awarded annually for progress in religion. Following Hardy's death in 1985, the name of the unit was briefly changed to the Alister Hardy Research Centre. In 1991 the name of the organization was renamed the Religious Experience Research Centre when it moved to Westminster College.

The purpose of the Religious Experience Research Centre is "to make a disciplined study of the frequency of report of first hand religious or transcendent experience in contemporary members of human species and to investigate the nature and function of such experiences." The centre explores such questions as: How many people in the modern world report religious or transcendent experiences? What do people mean when they say they have had one of these experiences? What sort of things do they describe? How do they interpret them? What effects do they have on their lives? Are the sorts of people who report them more likely to be: Well or poorly educated; impoverished or well provided for; happy or unhappy; mentally unbalanced or stable; socially responsible or self-preoccupied; members of religious institutions or not?

Since its foundation, the centre has built up a unique body of research data consisting of more than 5,000 case histories of individuals who have had some form of such experience. Although these case histories have come mainly from Britain, and, to a lesser degree, from other English-speaking countries, many other cultural and religious traditions are represented.

The centre has also conducted a number of large scale and in-depth surveys of reports of religious experiences in Britain and the United States.

Repeated national polls indicate that between a third and a half of the adult populations in Britain and the United States claim to have been “aware of or influenced by a presence or a power, whether they call it God or not, which is different from their everyday selves.” Parallel studies in the United States and Australia (e.g., by the National Opinion Research Center at the University of Chicago, the Survey Research Center of the University of California at Berkeley, and Gallup International) have produced similarly high figures. The centre has now completed a number of in-depth studies in Britain, in which random samples of particular social groups (e.g., adult members of the population of an industrial city, a sample of postgraduate students, and a sample of nurses in two large hospitals) have been interviewed personally and at length about their experiences. In all these groups the positive response rate has been over 60 percent.

The centre believes that such research is particularly important “in view of the crisis through which Western culture (and hence the world affected by it) is now passing, in part the result of an intellectually restricted perspective which appeared at the time of the European Enlightenment, especially during the eighteenth century.” The centre claims that modern analyses of the alienation, meaninglessness, and violence increasingly endemic to society have been limited by the proscriptions enforced by this dominant (and materially successful) thought pattern, particularly in failing to comprehend or dismissing the religious or transcendent dimension of human experience.

The mailing address of the Religious Experience Research Centre is Westminster College, Oxford, OX2 9AT England.

REM

Initialism for “rapid eye movement,” a physical phenomenon during which the most active, visually rich, and bizarre dreaming occurs.

Remy, Nicolas (1530–1612)

Nicolas Remy, a French demonologist, was the author of the frequently reprinted Demonolatriy (1595), a standard reference for witch-hunters in the next centuries. He was born around 1530 at Charmes, Vosges Department, in Lorraine. His father, Gérard Remy, was provost of Charmes and his uncle held a prominent position in the department. Following their lead, he also became a lawyer. He studied at the University of Toulouse where fellow demonologist Jean Bodin (1529–1596) also studied and later taught. He married Anne Marchand with whom he had seven children. In 1563 Remy relocated to Paris where his career blossomed. In 1570 he was appointed lieutenant general of Vosges, succeeding his retiring uncle. Five years later he was also named privy councilor to the Duke Charles III of Lorraine. In 1591 he became attorney general of Lorraine.

Remy traced his interest in witchcraft to his childhood, when he first witnessed a trial of an accused witch. Once placed in a position of power in Lorraine, he persecuted them mercilessly, and bragged that he had been responsible for the condemnation of over 900. In 1582 he personally prosecuted one woman on charges of working malevolent magic after his eldest son had died, believing she was responsible for his death. In 1592 the plague hit Nancy, and he retired to the country to write his book, concerned that all should know the power of witches. He wrote in haste, and the volume was unorganized and abruptly changed subjects.

Demonolatriy covers two broad subjects, the nature of Satanism and the activities of witches, especially their sexual lives. Following the lead of the Witches Hammer, the fountainhead of witch-hunting books, Remy assumed that witches are worshipping Satan. He also assumed that a sexual relationship with His Infernal Majesty was essential to the witchcraft rites as were illicit relationships with other members of the secret witchcraft fraternity. The strength of Remy’s text was the material he brought from his personal involvement with numerous cases. His own personal reflections gave the volume an air of authority that previous witch-hunting volumes had lacked, which accounts for its widespread acceptance as a standard authority on the subject. Remy argued that the influence of Satan was everywhere, in fact that whatever was out of the normal was probably due to the devil. There are no unexplained facts, hence whatever is unknown is of the realm of demons.

Remy remained at his post until his death in April of 1612. As attorney general he was able to prioritize witchcraft cases and alter decisions in instances where local magistrates had, in his opinion, been too lenient on witches. It was noted that he retained his hatred and fear of witches to the very end.

Renier, Noreen

Contemporary professional psychic with ten years’ experience as a teacher, investigator, and lecturer. Originally from Massachusetts, Noreen lived in Florida for eighteen years, working in advertising and public relations. In 1976, she was introduced to meditation and discovered a psychic ability. She submitted her gift to scientific testing and research, working with the Psychical Research Foundation in Durham, North Carolina, and the Department of Personality Studies at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville. Her experiments in archaeology and anthropology with Dr. David Jones at the University of Central Florida were reported in his book Visions of Time (1979).

Noreen became a consultant to law enforcement agencies, and she claims to have worked on more than a hundred cases. She briefly had a weekly call-in radio program “In Touch with Noreen” (1980–82). In 1984, she began work on a book about her experiences, returning to Orlando in 1985 to continue teaching, consultation, and lecturing.

During 1985, John D. Merrell of Beaverton, Oregon, published an article in the Newsletter of the Northwest Skeptics (a group of which Merrell was co-founder) questioning Noreen’s background credentials and what he claimed were “fraudulent claims” of psychic ability. Northwest Skeptics is a group dedicated to combating pseudoscience and uncovering false claims of paranormal phenomena, with loose ties to the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal. The Newsletter was mailed to newspapers, broadcast media, and police departments.

Noreen filed a defamation suit against Merrell, claiming that the Newsletter had damaged her reputation as a practicing psychic. The case was heard in September 1986, when Noreen testified that she lost at least one lecturing job with Oregon State Police trainees because of Merrell’s article. The suit claimed that Merrell’s statements “held the plaintiff up to public ridicule, humiliation, embarrassment, and loss of reputation causing her to suffer loss of self-esteem, mental anguish, humiliation, and loss of reputation regarding her occupation.” The jury’s verdict was that Merrell knew that at least some of his story was false or written with a reckless disregard for the truth. Noreen was awarded $25,000 damages.

The case was something of a landmark in the present battle between skeptics and psychics. Militant skeptics claim that belief in paranormal phenomena is unscientific and socially irresponsible and must be exposed as pseudoscience or fraud.

Some skeptics have performed a useful service in joining with psychical researchers in exposing a variety of fraudulent claims; others have been irresponsible in attempting to use guilt by association to brand all psychics and all claims of the paranormal as frauds.

Reschith Hajalalim

The name of the ministering spirit of the angelic hierarchies in Jewish rabbinical legend. To this angel, the pure and simple essence of the divinity flows through Hajoth Hakakos; he guides the primum mobile, and bestows the gift of life on all.

Rescue Circles

Groups formed by Spiritualists for the purpose of “waking up” the dead and freeing them from their earthbound state. These spirits exist closer to the material plane than to the spiritual world and in many cases they do not realize that they are dead at all, and live in a state of bewilderment. If they are enlightened as to their true condition and if prayers are offered for them, they will progress to a higher existence. The origin of rescue circles may be traced to the Shaker communities of America.

The first such circles were held by the wife of a Col. Danskin of Baltimore and her other female acquaintances. The most renowned work was performed by a circle in Buffalo between 1875 and 1900 and by Carl Wickland and his wife.

The mediums in the Buffalo circle were Marcia M. Swain and Leander Fischer (a professor of music). The circle consisted of Daniel E. Bailey and his wife, Fischer’s mother, and Aline M. Eggleston, the stenographer. The identity of the spirit brought to be “woken” was often verified but as the search for such proof entailed considerable labor and time it was, after a while, given up. The circle’s work was described by D. E. Bailey in his book Thoughts from the Inner Life (1886). Twelve impressive records of these rescue séances were published in an appendix in Admiral Osborne Moore’s Glimpses of the Next State (1911). Similar mission work was carried on by E. C. Randall, also in Buffalo. The medium was Emily S. French.

Carl Wickland and his wife worked on literally hundreds of cases and kept detailed records which were published in his 1924 book Thirty Years Among The Dead. The work of the Tozer rescue circle in Melbourne is described by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle in Wanderings of a Spiritualist (1921).

Resurrection

The central claim of Christianity, that the pre-existent Son of God was incarnated in the man Jesus, that Jesus was the Christ (or Anointed One), and that Jesus died an agonizing death and three days later came back to life in the flesh. Underlying Christianity is a belief in the goodness of material creation and the necessity of a body for a human individual to be a complete person. Future existence will be in a “spiritual body,” though there is some disagreement as to what the Apostle Paul means by that term (I Cor. 15:44). Jesus in his resurrected body, as recorded in the gospel accounts and the books of Acts, had what appeared to be a physical body. He ate food and invited Thomas to touch his body. Again, he did extraordinary things such as suddenly appear in a closed room.

Many Spiritualists’ and Christians’ acceptance of Spiritualist claims have argued for “resurrection” in what might be termed an astral or light body, a non-corporeal body suitable for life in an existence analogous to earthly life but quite distinct from the material world.

As the theory of reincarnation has become the dominant belief within the New Age community, there has been an attempt to confuse the two terms both out of ignorance of Christian belief and in an attempt to lessen the tension in a society in which the majority believe in “resurrection” in a Christian sense.

Retrocognition

Term used in psychical research and parapsychology to indicate a form of extrasensory perception in which the subject obtains knowledge of some event in the past by paranormal cognition. This amounts to a kind of backward precognition. F. W. H. Myers combined retrocognition with his theory of “psychorrhagic diathesis” to explain the phenomena of haunting. It was also suggested that apparitions of the dead and visions of the future, owing to a curious inversion of time, may be amenable to retrocognition.

Retropsychokinesis

Retropsychokinesis (RPK) refers to the possibility of someone in the present affecting an event that occurred in the past. The study of possible RPK events grew out of the studies on psychokinesis (mind over matter) conducted by J. B. Rhine at Duke University. Rhine explored the possibility that human subjects could affect the roll of dice or the toss of coins. Rhine’s experiments raised a variety of methodological issues involving assumptions about, for example, the behavior of a pair of dice tossed numerous times under “normal” conditions and what might constitute paranormal alteration of those conditions. They also raised questions about the nature of probability. More recently, Helmut Schmidt conducted similar experiments using an electronic random number generator, which ensured the randomness of the events being altered. The use of the random number generator greatly increased the sophistication of the experiments, and while laying to rest some of the questions concerning the Rhine experiments, it raised others, especially about the nature of time.

In the case of the random number generator, a series of numbers were generated and recorded, and the experiment was actually run at a later time. Subjects were then asked to force the choice which the random generation had already selected. After a series of experiments, and a variety of philosophical discussions about the nature of reality, causation, and the contemporary state of quantum theory, Schmidt concluded that his subjects seemed to be able to influence selected events in the past.

In the later 1990s, Matthew R. Watkins and Peter Moore of Cambridge University launched the RetroPsychoKinesis Project with the idea of continuing the work that Schmidt, now retired, had initiated. It is their understanding that the existence of the Internet has created a new possibility for testing Schmidt's assertions that developed out of his two decades of work. It is Watkins' belief that the use of the Internet can overcome a host of problems previously inherent in laboratory-based research and can eliminate many of the charges brought against parapsychology by the skeptics.

The use of the computer will allow a large number of subjects to be tested and untalented ones to be screened out. By having the computer handle the numbers, the opportunity for fraud will largely disappear. A major problem will, however, be the distinguishing of RPK from precognition, the most obvious alternative explanation for any positive results once fraud is eliminated. It is yet to be seen if the project can produce any positive results and deal satisfactorily with the multitudinous methodological problems. Those wishing to participate in the experiments may contact the project at its Internet site at <http://www.fourmilab.c/rpkp/>.

Reuss, Theodor (1855–1023)

German occultist who recruited Aleister Crowley to the OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis). Reuss was a mysterious and many-sided man. He was born on June 28, 1855 and lived in Britain during the 1880s and earned a living as a music-hall singer under the name Charles Theodore. He sang at fundraising concerts organized by the British Social League (of which he was an executive member) while acting as an undercover agent for the German Secret Service, spying on the Karl Marx family. Eleanor Marx considered him a vulgar and dirty man, and he was expelled from the league when his spying was discovered.

In 1902 Reuss was one of the three people named on the charter given by John Yarker for the establishment of a German Masonic lodge, which later emerged as the OTO. Reuss, then residing in England, most likely served as liaison between Yarker and Karl Keller, the German founder and leader of the order. Reuss became head of the OTO in 1905 after the death of Karl Keller and was from then on known by his occult name, Frater Merlin.

The most closely guarded secret of the OTO was that of sex magic, the use of sexual energy for occult purposes. In 1912

Crowley published The Book of Lies, which Reuss read and from one passage inferred that Crowley had discovered and was writing about this secret. Soon thereafter Reuss visited Crowley in London and begged him to conceal the secret, inviting him to enter the OTO as head of a British branch. The British lodge was duly launched under the name Mysteria Mystica Maxima.

In 1916 Reuss chartered a North American branch, which was organized as the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosicrucians (AMORC), headed by H. Spencer Lewis. In the legal battles between the several American Rosicrucian groups, the connection with the OTO became a matter of great embarrassment to AMORC, but while denying any connection with Crowley or sex magic, it has continued to publish its charter from Reuss.

After World War II Reuss resided in Switzerland, where he claimed to be a grand master of a Masonic order. He became friendly with Heinrich Tränker, a member of a Rosicrucian society, who had links with other German occult groups such as the Fraternitas Saturni. Reuss retired as outer head of the order in 1922, a year before his death, and nominated Crowley as his successor.

Reuter, Florizel von (1893– ?)

Professor and director of the Master School for Violin at the Vienna State Academy of Music. His mother developed automatic writing, receiving messages in seventeen languages, many of them being evidential in character and often coming in mirror writing. In The Psychic Experiences of a Musician (1928), von Reuter gave a full analytical account of these phenomena.

His second book The Consoling Angel (1930), narrated the receipt of automatic-writing messages from a school friend of his mother's, including over three hundred proofs of identity, all dealing with matters totally unknown to von Reuter and his mother. Ernesto Bozzano considered the book to be one of the most evidential publications of the time.

A third book, A Musician's Talks with Unseen Friends (1931), is a record of automatic scripts received by von Reuter alone, dealing with ethical and philosophical matters, and given (as in the case of William Stainton Moses) by a band of communicators.

Later von Reuter and his mother also developed direct voice and received apport phenomena in their own circle. Von Reuter lectured on psychic matters all over Germany and the British Isles. He was associated with Baron von Schrenck-Notzing in a series of experiments with the Schneider brothers.

Revivals

Outbreaks of religious mass enthusiasm, often inspired by a new wave of spiritual fervor and/or in reaction to persecution. They have often been accompanied by a variety of paranormal manifestations, such as luminous phenomena, aerial music, miraculous healing, speaking in tongues, and prophecy.

From June 1688 to February 19, 1689, five to six hundred prophets emerged in France (in Dauphiny and in the Vivarez) as a result of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV and the consequent persecution of Protestants. Under its effect, eight thousand seers were counted in Languedoc in the first year.

There hardly was a house that did not have its inspired orators. Even children prophesied in tongues unknown to them. Heavenly music was heard day and night in the air, tongues of fire were observed and, in at least one case, the ordeal of the pyre was harmlessly undergone by the entranced leader Claris. Cavalier, Roland, and Marion, the organizers of the insurgency, were all inspired orators. The army which they assembled chose its own chief by their gifts of the spirit.

The great Irish revival in 1859 and the Welsh revival in 1904 were accompanied by similar phenomena, especially the sound of unearthly music and the sight of inexplicable lights.

The Reverend John Crapsey of Brookfield, Tioga County, was quoting the words of Jesus on the cross when:

“a mighty invisible power seemed suddenly to possess him, and a luminous appearance scintillated upon and around his hand, shining with brilliant effulgence in the eyes of all beholders. Under an impulse which I could not resist, I sprang from the desk out upon the middle of the floor into the midst of the congregation. Fire and pillars of smoke and luminous light rose up bodily in our midst; men, women and even stammering children were seized, speaking with new tongues, and uttering prophecies. Prayers and exhortations were poured forth in abundance, and many of the congregation broke out into the most marvelous and heavenly singing.”

McLoughlin, in Modern Revivalism (1959) cites three great revival periods in the United States history, each lasting about a generation, each spurred on by national periods of intellectual and cultural conflict and change. The First Great Awakening (1725–1750) followed a period of colonial growth prior to the Revolution, featuring the immigration of the religiously persecuted. The Second Great Awakening (1797–1835), emerged as the new United States sought to establish its identity, expanding its political boundaries through western expansion.

The Second Great Awakening, in particular, emerged out of the rural camp meetings of Tennessee and Kentucky, on the western borders of the burgeoning United States. One of the most famous of these camps took place over five successive days in August of 1801. As many as 10,000 to 30,000 traveled to east of Paris, Kentucky from parts throughout the East and Midwest, to listen to ministers from the Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist churches preach adherence to fundamental Christian ideals.

“. . . from rotting stumps, fallen tree trunks, horse-drawn wagons, and makeshift platforms, they sermonized and admonished, cajoled and exulted, often all at the very same time. . . As many as 3000 to 5000 made their confessions of faith right there, many displaying involuntary physical convulsions as evidence of their heart-felt conversions: they jerked and twitched, barked and bayed, sang and chanted, cried like babies, and fainted dead away, often remaining unconscious for hours on end.”

The Third Great Awakening (1875–1915) followed the Reconstruction Period after the Civil War, as the country attempted to redefine itself as it moved toward the Industrial Revolution. Each of these Awakening periods swept through the growing nation, creating new sects, reviving old ones, and inspiring an infectious spiritual fervor. Among the most famous evangelists of the Great Awakenings included Charles Finney, Dwight Moody, and Billy Sunday, each paving the way for revivalists of future generations.

A peculiar form of revivalism is said to have arisen by the late twentieth century, culminating with the explosion of television evangelists in the politically conservative 1980s. Televangelists such as Oral Roberts, Billy Graham, Jimmy Swaggert, Jerry Falwell, and Jim and Tammy Bakker reached huge audiences through broadcast and cable television, virtually recreating the Great Awakenings' revivalist meetings in the American living room. These televangelists reflected much of the same fervor, fundamentalism, and showmanship of 19th century preachers. Scandals erupted among some of them in 1987, but by then the phenomenon of the televised revival had affixed itself to the modern cultural landscape. Rhabdic Force

Name given to the force which causes muscular contortions in the hands of sensitives while dowsing. The force can violently bend a hazel switch being used as a divining-rod, or oscillate a pendulum. Sometimes called "telluric force."

Rhabdomancy

Term for divination by divining-rods. Deriving from Greek words meaning "a rod" and "divination," it was thus alluded to by Sir Thomas Browne (1605–82): "As for the divination or decision from the staff, it is an augural relic, and the practice thereof is accused by God himself: 'My people ask counsel of their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them.' Of this kind was that practised by Nabuchadonosor in that Caldean miscellany delivered by Ezekiel."

John Brand's Observations on Popular Antiquities (1777) cited a manuscript, John Bell's Discourse on Witchcraft (1705):

"They set up two staffs, and having whispered some verses and incantations, the staffs fell by the operation of demons. Then they considered which way each of them fell, forward or backward, to the right or left hand, and agreeably gave responses, having made use of the fall of their staffs for their signs."

The practice is said to have passed from the Chaldeans and Scythians to the German tribes, who used pieces from the branch of a fruit tree, which they marked with certain characters and threw at hazard upon a white cloth. Something like this, according to one of the rabbis, was the practice of the Hebrews, only instead of characters, they peeled their rods on one side and drew the presage from their manner of falling. The Scythians and the Alani used rods of the myrtle and willow, and as the latter chose "fine straight wands" according to Herodotus, it may be inferred that their method was that of the Hebrews, or some modification of it. (See also Aaron's rod)

Rhapsodomancy

Divination by means of opening the works of a poet at hazard and reading the verse which first presents itself. This is similar to bibliomancy, the well-known divination technique of opening a Bible at random and reading the verse on which the finger or other indicator lights as an oracular statement relative to the inquirer's problem.

Rhasis (or Rhazes) (ca. 825–925)

Name given to the famous Arabian physician, chemist, and alchemist Abu Bekr Muhammed Ben Zakeriyah er-Rasi. His popular name "Al-Rhasis" (Man of Ray) derives from his birthplace of Ray, near Teheran, on the frontiers of Khorassan. He first studied philosophy, logic, metaphysics, poetry, and music, and became a skilled player on the lute. At the age of thirty, he began to study medicine and soon became one of the most famous physicians of his time. He was director of the famous hospital of Baghdad, and a great many books on medicine, chemistry, and philosophy are ascribed to him.

He also wrote treatises on alchemy and the transmutation of metals. Some commentators have compared his intellectual attainments with those of Galileo and Robert Boyle. He had a great reputation for his insistence upon the importance of practical experiment over theory. He was one of the first experimenters to mention borax, orpiment, realgar, and other chemical compounds.

There is a probably apocryphal story that he dedicated an alchemical work to the Emir El Mansur, prince of Khorassan, who rewarded him with a thousand pieces of gold, but desired to witness a transmutation. Rhasis was by now an elderly man and his experiment was unfortunately unsuccessful.

El Mansur was enraged, and struck him with a whip, saying "I have rewarded you richly for your trouble, and now I must punish you for your affirmation of lies!" As a result, Rhasis was blinded. However, other explanations have been offered for his failing eyesight, including the claim that it resulted from an inordinate appetite for eating beans.

In his studies in chemistry he left some results of real value, notwithstanding the time and trouble he spent in the pursuit of the philosophers' stone. Another theory which he held in common with Geber and others was that the planets influenced metallic formation under the earth's surface.

Rhine, J(oseph) B(anks) (1895–1980)

One of the pioneers of parapsychology and co-founder with William McDougall of the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina. He was born on September 29, 1895, in Juniata County, Pennsylvania. He studied at the University of Chicago (B.S., 1922; M.S., 1923; Ph.D., 1925) where he majored in botany. In 1920 he married Louisa Ella Weckesser, who as Louisa Rhine, also became a noted parapsychologist. After graduation Rhine became an instructor in plant physiology at West Virginia University (1924–26) before moving to Duke University where he would remain for the rest of his active career with the department of psychology. Rhine's interest in parapsychology grew out of his investigations of mediumship with Dr. Walter Franklin Prince at Harvard University in 1926. Rhine went on to Duke University the following year and studied psychic phenomena with William McDougall, head of the psychology department. It was Rhine's training in plant physiology which gave him the idea that psychic faculties might be tested with scientific disciplines.

With the encouragement of McDougall, Rhine commenced a program for statistical validation of ESP (extrasensory perception), a term he invented, working in collaboration with colleagues on the psychology faculty, with students as subjects.

The emphasis was first on clairvoyance and telepathy, transmitting images from sender to receiver, and the now familiar Zener cards, the simple symbols of cross, star, circle, square and waves assisting statistical evaluation of tests. Later work included experiments in psychokinesis using dice to test the ability of the human mind to affect movement of objects at a distance. Psychokinesis or “PK” has since largely displaced the term “telekinesis” formerly used in psychical research. The publication of Rhine’s monograph Extrasensory Perception by the Boston Society for Psychic Research in 1934 was a key point in the development of parapsychology as a scientific study, and opinion sharply divided on the validity of the work. Duke, like the rest of the academic world, was home to strong opposition to parapsychology. Thus Rhine and MacDougal were obliged to open a separate Parapsychology Laboratory in 1935 and seek outside financial sponsorship for research.

From 1937, Rhine launched the Journal of Parapsychology at Duke and settled down to create the basic foundational methodology and to generate the body of knowledge upon which laboratory parapsychology would build. In 1957 he led in the foundation of the Parapsychology Association. He retired from Duke in 1965 and lost the power base that allowed him to operate the Parapsychology Laboratory. Three years before, in anticipation of the lack of support for parapsychology, he began the reorganization of the endeavor he had managed for the last three decades. He founded the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man, an organization to continue his parapsychological work. The foundation established a new research facility, the Institute for Parapsychology.

Through the years Rhine authored a set of basic texts in parapsychology, still necessary reading for any one interested in the field. Though he published many impressive reports, he was repeatedly dogged by criticism that he ignored much of the negative data he had gathered and reported only the positive. Because of these flaws, Rhine’s work was not often taken seriously. He died February 20, 1980, at the age of 84. Shortly before his death he had been elected president of the Society for Psychical Research, a recognition of his monumental contributions to the field.

Financial support for the work at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University owed much to the generosity of Charles E. Ozanne who made regular financial gifts to support research. In 1960 he helped establish the Psychical Research Foundation at Duke Station, Durham, N.C., as an independent research center to investigate phenomena relating to survival of human personality after death as well as other aspects of parapsychology. Another generous donor in the field of parapsychology was the late Chester F. Carlson, inventor of xerography, whose financial support assisted the establishment of the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man. Situated at Durham, N.C., this foundation made possible the transition from the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University to an independent world center for the study of parapsychology and related fields.

Rhine, Louisa Ella Weckesser (1891–1983)

Pioneer worker in the field of parapsychology. She was born on November 9, 1891, at Sanborn, New York. She studied at the University of Chicago (B.S., 1919; M.S., 1921; Ph.D., biology, 1923). In 1920 she married Joseph Banks Rhine. Like her husband, she found parapsychology a much more intriguing field than biology, and began to work in the area from the 1930s. She became a staff member of the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University (1948–62) and then research director of the Institute for Parapsychology which superseded it as the research branch of the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man. She was a charter member of the Parapsychology Association and co-edited the Journal of Parapsychology.

She is known for her work on spontaneous psi cases, reports of which flooded into Duke University as the work of the Parapsychology Laboratory became known across the country. She studied the reports using categories and data coming out of the laboratory’s work. In this endeavor she in effect provided the laboratory’s transition from the older psychical research and the newer parapsychology that J. B. Rhine was developing. She authored a number of articles and books. She died March 17, 1983, at the age of 91.

In addition to substantial joint contributions to parapsychology, she and her husband also raised four children. Although committed to scientific disciplines in their parapsychology work, both the Rhines shared a humane and religious view of the implications of the subject.

Rhine Research Center

The Rhine Research Center is a nonprofit organization devoted to parapsychological research and education. Established as the Foundation for Research on the Nature of Man in 1962 by J. B. Rhine and renamed in 1995, the RRC comprises two subsidiaries: The Institute for Parapsychology and Parapsychology Press. The institute is the research arm of the RRC, and its staff conducts experimental research into the apparently psychic (psi) functions of extrasensory perception (ESP) and psychokinesis (PK). As the designated successor to Rhine’s famous Duke University Parapsychology Laboratory, the institute maintains access to all records and other properties acquired by that laboratory during its three decades at Duke. The Parapsychology Press publishes the Journal of Parapsychology, a professional quarterly. Recognized worldwide as a cornerstone of the professional parapsychological community, the RRC serves the lay public as a reliable resource of authoritative information on psi research. The center is supported through private funding and is sustained in part by memberships. It is currently directed by Richard S. Broughton, 402 N. Buchanan Blvd., Durham, NC 27701-1728. Ricerca Psichica (Journal)

The title which Luce e Ombra, the oldest Italian Spiritualist monthly, assumed in 1932.

Richet, Charles (1850–1935)

Pioneer psychical researcher, honored professor of physiology at the Faculty of Medicine in Paris, and winner of the 1913 Nobel Prize in Physiology and Medicine. He was also the honorary president of La Société Universelle d'études Psychiques, president of the Institut Métapsychique Internationale, and president of the Society for Psychical Research, London (1905).

Richet was born on August 26, 1850, and educated at the University of Paris. He had an initial personal experience in lucidity (paranormal knowledge) in 1872. He confessed that although it had tremendous effect on him, he lacked the requisite intellectual courage to draw conclusions. In 1875, while yet a student, he demonstrated that the hypnotic state was a purely physiological phenomenon which had nothing to do with "magnetic fluids." "Following my article," he wrote of the result, "many experiments were widely made, and animal magnetism ceased to be an occult science."

A few years later, he published his studies in multiple personality. He sat with various mediums, including William Eglinton and Elizabeth d'Esperance, and in 1886–87 conducted many experiments in cryptesthesia with four subjects—Alice, Claire, Eugenie, and Leontine. Some were in a hypnotic, some in a waking state. They reproduced drawings enclosed in sealed envelopes. As a result of these experiments Richet formulated the theory of cryptesthesia in these words: "In certain persons, at certain times, there exists a faculty of cognition which has no relation to our normal means of knowledge."

He founded with Dr. Dariex the Annales des Sciences Psychiques in 1890, and two years later he took part in the investigation conducted by the Milan Commission with the medium Eusapia Palladino. The report admitted the reality of puzzling phenomena, expressing also the conviction that the results obtained in light, and many of those obtained in darkness, could not have been produced by trickery of any kind.

Richet did not sign the report and in his notes on it in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques carefully stated his conclusions as follows:

"Absurd and unsatisfactory though they were, it seems to me very difficult to attribute the phenomena produced to deception, conscious or unconscious, or to a series of deceptions. Nevertheless, conclusive and indisputable proof that there was no fraud on Eusapia's part, or illusion on our part, is wanting: we must therefore renew our efforts to obtain such proof."

He became convinced of the reality of materialization phenomena by his experiments with the medium Marthe Béraud (better known as Eva C.) at the Villa Carmen, Algiers, in General Noel's house. His report, published in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques (April 1906) aroused wide attention. He confirmed his experiments in later sittings at the house of Juliette Bisson and at the Institut Métapsychique of which, after the resignation of Professor Santoliquido, he was elected president. He was unable to detect Eva C.'s fraud which was conclusively revealed only in the 1950s.

He conducted experiments with a number of different mediums including Franek Kluski, Jan Guzyk, and Stephen Osowiecki, both in Paris and Warsaw.

His book Traité de Métapsychique (1922; translated as Thirty Years of Psychical Research, 1923) summed up the experiences of a lifetime. The book was dedicated to Sir William Crookes and F. W. H. Myers. It became a sign of repentance for his earlier skepticism. He stated in his work:

"The idolatry of current ideas was so dominant at that time that no pains were taken either to verify or to refute Crookes' statements. Men were content to ridicule them, and I avow with shame that I was among the wilfully blind. Instead of admiring the heroism of a recognized man of science who dared then, in 1872, to say that there really are phantoms that can be photographed and whose heart beats can be heard, I laughed."

He accepted cryptesthesia, telekinesis, ectoplasm, materializations, and premonitions as abundantly proved. On the other hand, he considered doubtful apports, levitations, and the phenomena of the double, which he had no opportunity to examine thoroughly. He was most emphatic in stating: "The fact that intelligent forces are projected from an organism that can act mechanically, can move objects and make sounds, is a phenomenon as certainly established as any fact in physics." As if to leave a loophole for more definite proofs on psychic photography, direct writing, apports, psychic music, and luminous phenomena he added, somewhat naively: "No one would have thought of simulating them if they had never really occurred. I do not hesitate to think them fairly probable, but they are not proven."

His struggle with the problem of survival was very interesting. He stated: "I admit that there are some very puzzling cases that tend to make one admit the survival of human personality—the cases of Leonora E. Piper's George Pelham, of Raymond Lodge and some others."

His basis for disbelief in survival was twofold: first, the human mind has mysterious faculties of cognition; second these mysterious cognitions have an invincible tendency to group themselves around a new personality. He explained:

"The doctrine of survival seems to me to involve so many impossibilities, while that of an intensive cryptesthesia is (relatively) so easy to admit that I do not hesitate at all. I go so far as to claim—at the risk of being confounded by some new and unforeseen discovery—that subjective metapsychics will always be radically incapable of proving survival. Even if a new case even more astounding than that of George Pelham were to appear, I should prefer to suppose an extreme perfection of transcendental cognitions giving a great multiplicity of notions grouping themselves round the imaginary centre of a factitious personality, than to suppose that this centre is a real personality—the surviving soul, the will and consciousness of a self that has disappeared, a self which depended on a brain now reduced to dust. . . .

"But except in a few rare cases, the inconsistency between the past and the present mentality is so great that in the immense majority of spiritist experiences it is impossible to admit survival, even as a very tentative hypothesis. I could more easily admit a non-human intelligence, distinct from both medium and discarnate, than the mental survival of the latter." Treating of the so-called death bed meeting cases he stated: "Among all the facts adduced to prove survival, these even seem to me to be the most disquieting."

He did not accept the facts of materialization as proof of survival.

"The case of George Pelham, though there was no materialization, is vastly more evidential for survival than all the materializations yet known. I do not even see how decisive proof could be given. Even if (which is not the case) a form identical with that of a deceased person could be photographed I should not understand how an individual two hundred years dead, whose body has become a skeleton, could live again with this vanished body any more than with any other material form."

He called the phenomena of materialization absurd, yet true, and explained:

“Spiritualists have blamed me for using this word ‘absurd’; and have not been able to understand that to admit the reality of these phenomena was to me an actual pain; but to ask a physiologist, a physicist, or a chemist to admit that a form that has a circulation of blood, warmth, and muscles, that exhales carbonic acid, has weight, speaks, and thinks, can issue from a human body is to ask of him an intellectual effort that is really painful.”

In concluding his weighty Thirty Years of Psychical Research, he was assailed by doubts:

“Truth to tell—and one must be as cautious in denial as in assertion—some facts tend to make us believe strongly in the survival of vanished personalities. Why should mediums, even when they have read no spiritualist books, and are unacquainted with spiritualist doctrines, proceed at once to personify some deceased person or other? Why does the new personality affirm itself so persistently, so energetically, and sometimes with so much verisimilitude? Why does it separate itself so sharply from the personality of the medium? All the words of powerful mediums are pregnant, so to say, with the theory of survival? These are semblances, perhaps, but why should the semblances be there?” Then, again, as if repenting his doubts, he explained:

“Mysterious beings, angels or demons, existences devoid of form, or spirits, which now and then seek to intervene in our lives, who can by means, entirely unknown, mould matter at will, who direct some of our thoughts and participate in some of our destinies, and who, to make themselves known (which they could not otherwise do) assume the bodily and psychological aspect of vanished human personalities—all this is a simple manner of expressing and understanding the greater part of the metapsychic phenomena.”

His next book, Notre Sixième Sens (1927; translated as Our Sixth Sense, 1929), was a courageous attempt to grapple with the problem of cryptesthesia. He conceived it physiologically as a new sixth sense which is sensitive to what he called the vibrations of reality. It is a sweeping theory that, in its implications, is nearly as far-reaching as the spirit theory.

In La Grande Espérance (1933), following an important monograph, L’Avenir et la Prémonition (1931), he himself admitted that this vibratory theory is far from being sufficient for “there are cases in which à la rigueur one could suppose the intervention of a foreign intelligence.”

These were the cases of veridical hallucinations. Even there he would have preferred to fall back on the vibratory explanation but for the puzzle of collective veridical hallucinations in which “one is almost compelled to admit the objective reality of the phantom.” That admission did not allow him to doubt that “in cases of simple veridical hallucinations there is an objective reality as well.” Pursuing this line of reasoning, he stated: “It appears that in certain cases phantoms are also inhabiting a house. I hesitate to write this down. It is so extraordinary that my pen almost refuses to write but just the same it is true.”

Still, after having analyzed the purely psychological phenomena, if the choice was between the spirit hypothesis and a prodigious lucidity he would lean towards the second. For that explained all cases, whereas the former, although it is the better one in a small number of cases, was inadmissible in many others.

The grand hope of humanity lay in psychical research, in that immense incertitude which we feel in face of its extraordinary, truly absurd phenomena.

“The more I reflect and weigh in my mind these materializations, hauntings, marvelous lucidity, apports, xenoglossie, apparitions and, above all, premonitions, the more I am persuaded that we know absolutely nothing of the universe which surrounds us. We live in a sort of dream and have not yet understood anything of the agitations and tumults of this dream.

“Everything came down to this:

“Either the human intelligence is capable of working miracles. I call miracles the phantoms, ectoplasm, lucidity, premonitions. Or assisting in our doings, controlling our thoughts, writing by our hand, or speaking by our voice there are, interblending with our life, mysterious, invisible entities, angels or demons, perhaps the souls of the dead, as the spiritualists are convinced. Death would not be death but the entrance into a new life. In each case we hurl ourselves against monstrous improbabilities (invraisemblances), we float in the inhabital, the miraculous, the prodigious.”

Richet died December 3, 1935.

Richmond, Cora L(inn) V(ictoria)

(1840–1923)

The most famous American Spiritualist inspirational speaker and healer, variously known under her married names as Cora Scott, Cora Hatch, Cora L. V. Tappan, and Cora L. V. Tappan-Richmond. She was born April 21, 1840, a noteworthy event in that she had a veil (membrane) covering her face, an event often seen as portending a psychically aware life. She was named Cora, a seeress. Her family was attracted to Spiritualism and in 1851, as a child of eleven, she resided some months in the Spiritualist community headed by Adin Ballou at Hopedale and at the ranch community at Waterloo, Wisconsin. Passing into a trance while at Waterloo, she was controlled by the spirit of young Ballou. Two years later, she was appearing as a public speaker. At the age of sixteen she was famous, had traveled throughout the United States, often lecturing with great elocution before scientists on randomly-selected subjects.

She married while still a teen, but soon got a divorce because of spousal abuse. She worked out of Baltimore for many years prior to moving to England in 1873. While in England, she delivered some three thousand lectures. Frank Podmore wrote of her in his book Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1902),

“That the flow of verbiage never fails is a small matter; Mrs. Tappan’s trance-utterances surpass those of almost every other automatist in that there is a fairly coherent argument throughout. Two at least of the subjects sent to her in 1874 ‘The Origin of Man’ and ‘The Comparative Influence of Science and Morality on the Rise and Progress of Nations,’ may be presumed to have been little familiar. But the speaker is never at a loss . . . Again, we find none of the literary artifices by which ordinary speakers are wont to give relief—there is no antithesis, no climax, no irony or humour in any form. And the dead level of style reflects a dead level of sentiment; there is no scorn or indignation, no recognition of human effort and pain, no sense of the mystery of things. The style is clear, as jelly is clear; it is the proto-plasm of human speech; and it is flavoured throughout with mild, cosmic emotions.

“Frequently at the close of an address Mrs. Tappan would recite an impromptu poem, again on a subject chosen at the moment by the audience. Some of these poems are strikingly melodious, and it is interesting to note how the melody continually overpowers the sense.”

After her return to America, Richmond married William Richmond and settled in Chicago. She pastored the First Society of Spiritualists and he operated as her publisher and book agent. From her platform in Chicago she became one of the movement's most famous leaders. In 1892, she officiated at the funeral of Nettie Colburn Maynard (also known as Henrietta S. Maynard), the medium who had worked with Abraham Lincoln. The next year she assisted in the founding of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches and became its first vice president and a national lecturer through the first decades of the new century.

She was equally renowned for her healing power and for her trance utterances. Of her excursions into the spirit world in trance she brought back recollections of an absorbing interest. She died January 2, 1923.

Richmond, Kenneth Forbes (1882–1945)

Scottish writer and educational psychologist who assisted the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, during the crucial years of World War II. He edited the Journal of the SPR (1939–45) and served as the Society's part-time secretary (1944–45). Richmond was born on August 8, 1882, at Glenarmond, Scotland, and was educated at Glenarmond School. His wife, Zoe Richmond, was a sensitive who was tested by the SPR.

His interest in psychical research was stimulated by the book Raymond: Or Life After Death by Sir Oliver Lodge (1916), which Richmond reviewed. He became a member of the SPR and investigated the phenomena of mediumship, especially the medium Gladys Osborne Leonard and her control, "Fedra." He wrote a number of popular articles which appeared in newspapers and magazines, one book, Evidence of Identity (1939), and several articles in the Proceedings of the SPR. He died November 30, 1945.

Richmond, Thomas (1796– ?)

United States Senator, a leading man of Chicago, and also a medium. He was author of the book God Dealing with Slavery (1870), which told the story of his psychic influence which, along with that of Henrietta S. Maynard, prevailed upon Abraham Lincoln to abolish slavery.

Richmond, Zoe Blanche Russell (1888–1986)

Honorary associate of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London. Born June 14, 1888, in London, England. In 1914 she married Kenneth Forbes Richmond, whom she assisted in investigations of mediumship, in particular the phenomena of Gladys Osborne Leonard.

She joined the Society for Psychical Research in 1922. Subsequently she developed the faculty of automatic writing and was herself the subject of SPR experiments. She contributed a number of articles to Light (published by the London Spiritualist Alliance), and published Evidence of Purpose (1938), in which she reviewed purposive messages through mediums from deceased individuals.

Ridley, Hazel (Hurd) (ca. 1900–)

American direct voice medium of Buffalo, New York. Her psychic development began at the age of 18. "Grey Wolf," an American Indian control, manifested in trance and declared that the medium would develop voices. She did. The voices were of a curious, whispering quality, coming from her larynx alone with no function of her mouth, lips, or tongue.

Wilson G. Bailey, a physician of Camden, New Jersey, wrote in his book No, Not Dead; They Live (1923): "I filled her mouth with water and then with salt, and still the voice came through without interruption or impediment and I also punctured her arm when in trance, and though I drew blood she did not feel any pain."

Ridley toured the American continent and paid three visits to England, the first in 1926, the second in 1931, and the third in 1932. While hailed by some, she also encountered strong opposition to her performances. Spiritualist author H. Dennis Bradley, not known for his critical appraisals, caustically condemned her performance as fraudulent rubbish in his book... And After (1931). Against Bradley's comments stands the testimony of Will Goldston, one of the renowned professional magicians in Europe, that she had genuine powers. In Death Unveiled, Mrs. D. U. Fletcher, wife of a senator from Florida, described how through Ridley's mediumship a violin was restored to its owner after thirty-seven years.

A much-dreaded French sorcerer of the reign of Charles IX, who, at his execution, boasted before the king that he had in France three hundred thousand confederates, whom they could not burn—meaning, perhaps, the demons of the witches sabbat. Trois-Echelles is cited in Jean Bodin's De la démonomanie des Sorciers.

Ring of Thoth

The Ring of Thoth is a contemporary Norse Pagan association founded shortly after the disbanding of the Asatru Free Assembly in 1987. The Asatru Free Assembly had been the first and most prominent organization attempting to revive the acknowledgment of the pre-Christian deities once generally worshiped throughout Germany and the Scandinavian countries. The Ring of Thoth was founded by Edred Thorsson (Stephen Edred Flowers) and James Chisholm as an explicitly non-racist organization dedicated to the promotion of the religion of the Germanic peoples. (During the 1980s racism was a persistent charge leveled against groups promoting Norse Paganism.) It sees itself as taking a more liberal and scholarly approach than that taken by the other major group formed somewhat simultaneously, the Asatru Alliance. In other respects it continues the beliefs and practices of the former Asatru Free Assembly.

The Ring allows considerable variation in belief and practice but is united by a common loyalty to, or “Troth” with, the Norse gods and goddesses; a respect for the religious, cultural, and historical heritage of the Northern Europeans; and a commitment to the virtues of Courage, Truth, Honor, Loyalty, Discipline, Hospitality, Industriousness, Self-reliance, and Steadfastness. Membership is open to all regardless of racial or ethnic background or sexual orientation, and the Ring is opposed to racist definitions of the Germanic Heathen people. The Asatru religion emerged from the experiences of the pre-Christian Germanic peoples of pre-Christian Northern Europe. While universalist in orientation, it would be impossible to understand without an appreciation of the cultural context that gave it birth.

The Ring of Thoth may be contacted at P.O. Box 25637, Tempe, AZ 85285. Its webpage can be found at <http://asatru.knotwork.com/troth/index.html>. Thorsson has authored several books on the Asatru traditions, especially on the magical practices associated with runes.

Rinpoche

An honorific used in Tibetan Buddhism meaning “precious master,” now commonly encountered among Tibetan groups operating in the West.

Ripley, George (ca. 1415–1490)

British alchemist born in Ripley, Yorkshire, England, where his kinsfolk appear to have been powerful and numerous. He entered the Roman Catholic Church, became an Augustinian monk, and was subsequently appointed Canon of Bridlington in his native Yorkshire, a priory which had been founded in the time of Henry I by Walter de Ghent.

Ripley’s priestly office did not prevent him from traveling, and he studied physical science and alchemy in France, Germany, and Italy, even voyaging as far as the island of Rhodes, where he is said to have made a large quantity of gold for the knights of St. John of Jerusalem.

Afterward he went to Rome, where he was dignified by the Pope, the result being that when he returned to Bridlington, he found his friends there intensely jealous of him. It was reported that he even resigned his position and retired to a priory at Boston, in Lincolnshire, but this story is probably unfounded, the likelihood being that Ripley the alchemist was confused with George Ripley, a Carmelite friar, who lived at Boston in the thirteenth century and wrote a biography of St. Botolph.

Ripley died in England in 1490, but his fame did not die with him; his name continued to be familiar for many years after his death. He was among the first to popularize the alchemical writings attributed to Raymond Lully, which first became known in England about 1445. An interest in alchemy was increasing steadily among English scholars at this time—the more so because the law against multiplying gold had lately been repealed.

Ripley wrote a number of learned treatises himself, notably Medulla Alchimioe, The Treatise of Mercury and The Compound of Alchemie (first printed 1591), the latter work dedicated to King Edward IV. A collected edition of his writings was issued at Kassel Germany in 1649.

Rita, A.

British private medium, who only sat with friends, in darkness, without passing into trance, and kept up a running conversation throughout with apparitions who apparently brought their own light. In 1878, in a séance in Amsterdam, Holland, he impersonated the spirit entity “John King” and was ex-

She studied at Blue Mountain College, Mississippi (B.A., 1941) and Peabody College, Nashville, Tennessee (M.A., 1942). After graduation she taught at Southwestern Louisiana Institute, Lafayette (1942–44), the Woman's College, University of North Carolina, Greensboro, (1944–47), and Mississippi State University (1947–49). In 1950 she joined the staff of the Parapsychology Laboratory, at Duke University.

Rivista Di Studi Psichici (Journal)

The first Italian psychical research periodical, founded by Dr. G. B. Ermacora with Georgio Finzi in January 1895. The journal was carefully and critically conducted on principles analogous to those of the Proceedings of the Society of Psychical Research. After the death of Ermacora in 1898, Count Cesar Baudi de Vesme became its editor, publishing a simultaneous French edition (Revue des Etudes Psychiques) until 1905, when the journal was amalgamated with the Annales des Sciences Psychiques.

Robbins, Shawn (1945–)

Shawn Robbins, a popular psychic best known for her many prophecies, was born and raised in the Queens section of New York City, the daughter of a businessman. As a child, her clairvoyant and precognitive powers began to manifest. She recalls that on her 16th birthday her mother tested her abilities by hiding all of her presents around the house. She found them quickly by simply walking around the room and pointing to where they were. As a teenager she read widely in the available literature trying to understand her gift.

She did not complete high school, and after dropping out she joined a band. For the next five years she attempted to establish herself as a musician in an all-female band. She grew bored with the grind, however, and in the early 1970s settled in New York as a professional psychic. Her first job was as a consultant to a large cosmetics company, but eventually she opened an office and began to offer psychic readings to the general public. Her career took an upward swing after she began doing call-in talk shows answering questions and giving brief readings to the audience. Her appearances led to her being featured in the pages of the popular tabloid, The National Enquirer, which regularly ran features on psychic predictions. While largely dismissed by many in the psychic community, the coverage in the Enquirer made her a national celebrity. That celebrity status was confirmed by several outstanding successes. Then, while in Boston to do a talk show, she was contacted by the local police who used her in the pursuit of some money that had been hidden by several robbers. Her success in assisting with the find created another area in which she could apply her skills.

Many of the stories of her early adventures, including her prediction of Patty Heart's arrest in 1975, were recounted in her autobiographical volume, Ahead of Myself, in 1980. During the 1990s, Robbins expanded her occasional prophecies and focused her attention on the new millennium. The effort resulted in two books filled with prophecies for the twenty-first century. It is yet to be determined how accurate she is, but by the end of her life the record she has produced will provide a wealth of material for evaluation.

Roberts, Estelle (1889–1970)

One of the more famous British Spiritualist mediums of the mid-twentieth century. Born May 10, 1889, she claimed to have first seen a spirit at the age of ten. At school, she constantly heard voices and saw apparitions. Her parents scolded her for having a too-vivid imagination. At the age of fifteen, she was employed as a nursemaid, but the visions and voices followed her wherever she went. She married at the age of seventeen and later foretold her husband's untimely death. After that she had a hard struggle to support her three children, and she took a job as a waitress, working from 7 a.m. until late at night.

One day a neighbor persuaded her to attend a Spiritualist service, where the clairvoyant said: "You are a born medium. You have great work to do in the world." In due course, she became a medium, controlled by the spirit guide "Red Cloud." She operated in complete darkness and manifested clairvoyance, clairaudience, direct voice, materialization, psychometry, psychic healing, trance oratory, automatic writing, and production of appports.

While hailed by Spiritualists, she would never allow trained observers to examine her work. She even gave a demonstration of Spiritualism in the august surroundings of the House of Commons in Britain, but she turned down a formal offer from the Society for Psychical Research to investigate her physical mediumship.

Estelle Roberts died in 1970.

Roberts, Etta

American materialization medium. After being accused of fraud she held a remarkable test séance at Onset Grove, Onset Bay, Massachusetts, on September 3, 1891, before sixty people. She was enclosed in a wire cage. Phantoms not only appeared, but the medium herself was mysteriously brought out of the cage without disturbing the seals.

Many of the phantoms were seen to build up before the cage and also to transform into other shapes. The full account of the séance, signed by twelve people present, was published in the Banner of Light (September 1891). Paul Joire wrote a brief description of this test séance in Psychical and Supernormal Phenomena (1916).

Roberts, Jane (1929–1984)

Public name of Jane Butts, an American psychic who became the medium for communications from an entity named “Seth” who claimed to be a minor pope of the fourth century.

In 1963, Roberts and her husband, Robert Butts, experimented with a ouija board and received the first “Seth” messages. Later, she started going into trance, and when “Seth” spoke through her, Roberts’s voice and features changed character. In her autobiographical work Adventures in Consciousness: An Introduction to Aspect Psychology (1975), Roberts gives the background and development of the “Seth” communications and discusses what she calls “aspect psychology,” based on the concept that human consciousness is mobile.

The “Seth” communications developed in various levels of awareness (Seth I, II, and III). They were tape recorded, and have been transcribed and published in a series of books, notably Seth Speaks; The Eternal Validity of the Soul (1972) and The Nature of Personal Reality: A Seth Book (1974). The popularity of the volumes led to the production of a series of texts through the 1970s and have been credited with generating the renewed interest in channeling so evident in the New Age movement of the 1980s. These communications cover a whole range of topics of concern to religious and metaphysical belief, from personal belief and development to mental and physical health, illumination, good and evil, sexuality, art, creativity, spiritual grace, and modern problems.

An early book by Roberts titled How to Develop Your ESP Power (1966) was reissued under the title The Coming of Seth (1976). It describes the day-to-day emergence of the personality of “Seth” and the experiments involved, with suggestions for experiments that readers can attempt. Roberts subsequently regarded this early book as occasionally naive, reflecting her own inexperience at the time. It was supplemented by The God of Jane; A Psychic Manifesto (1981), discussing her early life, psychic experiences, and outlook. Other “Seth” books include: The “Unknown” Reality (1977), The Nature of the Psyche; Its Human Expression (1979), and The Individual and the Nature of Mass Events (1981). Some of the “Seth” titles have been reprinted by Bantam in paperback.

Roberts lived a quiet life in spite of the demands of a growing readership. She rarely spoke in public and refused all suggestions that she head a “Seth” organization. She died September 5, 1984, in her home town, Elmira, New York. The Austin Seth Center was formed to spread the ideas of the “Seth” Material; it also publishes the quarterly magazine Reality Change.

In Roberts’s posthumously published book Seth, Dreams and Projection of Consciousness (1986), her husband Robert Butts stated: “I think that I’ve had a number of waking and dreaming experiences in which Jane and I have communicated with each other since her physical death. So have others.”

Robertson, Olivia (1917–)

Irish neo-pagan writer and painter who founded the Fellowship of Isis to revive worship and communication with the feminine principle in deity. She was born in London on April 13, 1917, and later worked as a play leader in Dublin Corporation playgrounds, Eire (1941–45). Her book St. Malachy’s Court (1946) is based on these experiences. Other publications include Field of the Stranger (1948, a Book Society choice and also published in a Braille edition); The Golden Eye (1949); Miranda Speaks (1950); It’s an Old Irish Custom (1954); and Dublin Phoenix (1957). She has exhibited her paintings in Dublin.

“Robert the Devil”

A popular thirteenth-century romance legend, known in France in both prose and verse forms as Robert le Diable. The story was printed in England ca. 1502 by Wynkyn de Worde (Caxton’s assistant) as Lyfe of Robert the Devyll.

According to the story, Robert was the son of a duke and duchess of Normandy. He was endowed with marvelous physical strength, which he used only for evil. Explaining to him the cause of his wicked impulses, his mother told him that he had been born in answer to prayers addressed to the devil. He sought religious advice and was directed by the Pope to a hermit, who ordered him to maintain complete silence, to take his food from the mouths of dogs, to feign madness, and to provoke abuse from common people without attempting to retaliate.

He became court fool to the Roman emperor, and three times delivered the city from Saracen invasions, having, in each case, been prompted to fight by a heavenly message. The emperor’s dumb daughter was given speech in order to identify the savior of the city with the court fool, but he refused his due reward, as well as her hand in marriage, and went back to the hermit, his former confessor.

Rocail

According to ancient Oriental legend, Rocail was the younger brother of Seth, the son of the biblical Adam. The circumstances of his history were picturesque and unique. A giant, of Mount Caucasus, finding himself in difficulties, applied for aid to the human race. Rocail offered his services to the giant, and these proved so acceptable that the giant made his benefactor his grand vizier.

For a long period Rocail successfully governed the giant’s realm and reached a position of dignity and honor. However, when he felt himself growing old, he desired to leave behind him a more lasting monument than public respect, so he built a magnificent palace and sepulcher. The palace he peopled with statues, which, by the power of magic, he made to walk and talk.

Rochas d'Aiglun, Lt.-Col. Eugene Auguste-Albert de (1837–1914)

Prominent French psychical investigator, famous for his researches in human emanations, hypnotism, reincarnation, and physical phenomena. He served as attaché to the French General Staff during the Franco-Prussian War and was administrator of the École Polytechnique of Paris, but owing to his interest in occult investigations was forced to resign.

Rochas was the first writer to acquaint the French public with the claims concerning the od made by Baron von Reichenbach. His own experiments in the exteriorization of sensitivity were preceded by those of Paul Joire, but he had unique observations to his credit.

He contributed new perspectives on the theoretical elucidation of the mystery of physical phenomena—the exteriorization of motricity. Rochas's book of the same title, in which his theory is expounded, summed up his experiments with the medium Eusapia Palladino, who was his guest in his country house at l'Agnelas, near Voiron, and sat in the presence of a large committee of scientists. Much of this work, of course, has been discarded as psychical research discounted physical phenomena as largely the product of fraud.

The interest of Rochas extended to every branch of psychical research. As an investigator he was keen and competent. Charles Victor Miller, the San Francisco materialization medium, came to Europe at his request, although he did not sit for Rochas. Nor did Rochas succeed in witnessing full materializations with other mediums. The second visit of Charles Bailey, the Australian apport medium, was arranged by him. Bailey came to Grenoble in 1910 and, as it turned out, was exposed as a fraud amid much excitement.

Rochester Rappings

The outbreak of rappings that occurred in Hydesville, near Rochester, New York, in 1848, and which became popularly known as the "Rochester Rappings," was of peculiar importance, not because of its intrinsic superiority to any other poltergeist disturbance, but because it inaugurated the movement of modern Spiritualism.

Hydesville is a small village in Arcadia, Wayne County, New York, and there, in 1848, lived John D. Fox with his wife and two young daughters, Margaretta, aged fifteen, and Kate, aged twelve. Their house was a small wooden structure previously tenanted by Michael Weekman, who afterward claimed that he had frequently been disturbed by knockings and other strange sounds in the Hydesville house.

Toward the end of March 1848, the Fox family was disturbed by mysterious rappings, and on the evening of the 31st, they went to bed early, hoping to get some undisturbed sleep. But the rappings broke out even more vigorously than they had on previous occasions, and Mrs. Fox, much alarmed and excited when the raps manifested signs of intelligence, decided to call in her neighbors to witness the phenomenon.

The neighbors heard the raps distinctly and it was decided to try to communicate with the unseen forces. Questions were asked by the "sitters" of this informal séance—if the answer was in the affirmative, raps were heard, if in the negative, there was silence. By this means the knocker indicated that he was a ghost, the spirit of a peddler who had been murdered for his money by a former resident of the house.

The raps also answered correctly other questions relating to the ages of those present and other particulars concerning persons who lived in the neighborhood. In the few days immediately following, hundreds of people made their way to Hydesville to witness the marvel.

Fox's married son, David, who lived about two miles from his father's house, recorded a statement to the effect that the Fox family, following the directions of the raps, which indicated that the peddler was buried in the cellar, had begun to dig early in April, but were stopped by water.

Later, however, hair, bones, and teeth were found in the cellar. Vague rumors were afloat that a peddler had visited the village one winter, had been seen in the kitchen of the house afterward inhabited by the Foxes, and had mysteriously disappeared without fulfilling his promise to the villagers to return the next day. There was not a scrap of real evidence, whether for the murder or for the existence of the peddler, particulars of whose life were furnished by the raps.

Soon after these happenings, Kate Fox went to Auburn, and Margaretta to Rochester, New York, where her married sister Leah lived, and at both places outbreaks of rappings subsequently occurred. New mediums sprang up, circles were formed, and soon Spiritualism started.

Rock Music

Soon after rock music began making an impact on youth during the 1950s it was denounced by parents, clergymen, educators, and others in positions of authority. The new music was antitraditional, antiauthoritarian, and disparaging of adult influence over teenagers. Pastors denounced it as evil—the product of Satan.

Rock music of the 1950s, however, did not prepare people for the upheaval of the 1960s and the open defiance against societal mores. In particular, the Rolling Stones' image as a "bad boy" band continued the identification of rock music with anti-establishment values in contrast to the "tamer" persona exemplified by the Beatles. In 1967 the Rolling Stones released Their Satanic Majesties Request. This was a harbinger of future events—two years later on December 6, 1969, some 300,000 young people gathered for a free pop music festival at Altamont Raceway, California, featuring the band. The crowd heard Mick Jagger singing "Sympathy for the Devil" while Hell's Angels, who had been engaged as bodyguards, beat up spectators and clubbed and kicked a man to death. After the event, no one was willing to take responsibility for the debacle.

Some rock bands turned up the power on their electric instruments and created the sound known as heavy metal, a name that seems to have been derived from a line in the 1968 Stephenwolf song, "Born to Be Wild." One performer, Alice Cooper, moved into shock entertainment by integrating the occult, sadomasochism, and animal abuse in his act. The shock element developed from an unplanned event in 1969. During a concert in Detroit, Michigan, Cooper released some chickens into the audience at the close of his act. The audience killed them and tore them to pieces, a fact subsequently noted in the press.

A new connection between rock music and the occult was made in the late 1960s by another British band, Led Zeppelin. Formed in 1968, their first album went gold the next year. Guitarist Jimmy Page had a strong interest in magic and the occult and upon attaining fame and fortune purchased the house on Loch Ness once owned by Aleister Crowley. Crowley's advocacy of drugs and sex magic had already earned him a reputation as a supporter of black magic and Satanism (though he was into neither), and that image began to follow Page, Led Zeppelin, and the bands that followed their lead.

In 1970 Black Sabbath followed on the heels of the Rolling Stones and Led Zeppelin. In spite of lack of interest from radio stations and the music press, their first album hit the charts and remained for 13 weeks. Other albums followed that kept the band popular for the next two decades. While its predecessors had some ties to the occult, Black Sabbath actively cultivated an image of evil and darkness—its name suggestive of a satanic mass and its use of black in their stage clothing and album covers. Lyrics explored mystical fantasy themes. Among the early members of the band was Ozzy Osbourne who would leave in 1979 and cultivate a more graphic satanic image.

Through the 1970s and 1980s, heavy metal was on the edge of the larger rock community as music expressing teenage rebellion in both England and the United States. As such, it was music enjoyed for a relatively few years before its followers reached adulthood. The music survived because there was always a new crop of teenagers entering the market each year. However, due to the rapidly changing audiences it was difficult for many bands to survive on top for more than five to seven years. In order to capture the attention of an audience with an increasingly short attention span, some bands moved into the most graphic portrayals of sex, sadism, and Satanism, themes that played predominantly to male teenagers.

Satanist themes dominated heavy metal lyrics and images, horrifying pastors and parents (even those raised on Elvis Presley and the Rolling Stones). These people saw heavy metal music as both a direct attack upon the mind and morals of their children and a new low in cultural degeneracy.

Performers such as Ozzy Osbourne were singled out for particular criticism. After leaving Black Sabbath, Osbourne formed a new band that later released the albums Talk of the Devil (1982), Bark at the Moon (1983) with Osbourne as a werwolf on the cover, and Ultimate Sin (1984). Incidents in which teen delinquency was tied to listening to heavy metal rock received wide publicity and Osbourne was accused of instigating crimes and suicides.

Another band drawn into the Satanism/antiSatanism controversy was Judas Priest. They were accused of releasing albums that contained subliminal messages encoded into the songs via a process known as backward masking. A Reno, Nevada, couple charged that their son attempted suicide after listening to their Stained Glass (1978) album, which they argued contained subliminal messages ordering the suicide. The courts dismissed the case but not before rock music received a significant amount of negative publicity.

More contemporary groups that actively cultivated the satanic image include Slayer, a relatively unknown band on the rock scene whose albums covers include an inverted satanic pentagram as their logo and other satanic symbols (such as an inverted cross) and whose lyrics cultivate satanic and black magic themes. Slayer was considered extreme, but other bands such as the obscure Possessed to the more widely recognized Motley Crüe (Shout at the Devil, 1983) also drew on satanic symbolism.

Contemporary rock has been criticized especially for the values it incorporates. However, to date, no valid evidence has been produced to link even the more objectionable form of heavy metal music as a causal agent to specific patterns of anti-social behavior or to long-term negative effects among devoted fans.

Roerich, Helena (1879–1949)

Author and channeler, born in Russia on February 13, 1879. Roerich was not formally educated but early developed a love of reading that included serious works in philosophy. She married artist Nicholas Roerich in 1901. Both she and her husband had a leaning toward Theosophy, and soon after their marriage she came into contact with Master Morya, the teacher whom Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, the co-founder of the Theosophical Society, had heralded as the primary source of theosophical teachings.

In 1915 the Roerichs left Russia for England, but moved on to New York in 1920. Through the early 1920s Helena Roerich received the messages that would constitute her first book, Leaves of Morya's Garden (a second volume appeared in 1925). Over the rest of her life she operated quietly as a channel and produced a host of books from Morya, including New Era Community (1926); Infinity (2 vols., 1930); Hierarchy (1931), and The Fiery World (2 vols., 1933–34). During these years her own work, which constituted the teachings of the Agni Yoga Society, founded in the mid-1920s, was overshadowed by that of her husband and his very public activities as an artist and peace advocate.

In 1929 she and her husband moved to the Punjab and lived near the Urusvati, the Himalayan Research Institute of the Roerich Museum. Through the 1930s she wrote letters on theosophical themes, which were assembled and published as Letters of Helena Roerich.

Roerich, Nicholas K(onstantin) (1874–1947)

Versatile Russian-born painter, poet, writer, and mystic, and founder of the Agni Yoga Society. He was born in St. Petersburg on September 27, 1874, and educated at the University of St. Petersburg, becoming a graduate of the law school. He studied drawing and painting at the Academy of Fine Arts, St. Petersburg, and in Paris, France. In 1901, he married Helena Ivanov Shaposhnikov; they had two children. Both Nicholas and Helena Roerich were initially influenced by the theosophical writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, the co-founder of Theosophy, and later by Rudolf Steiner, founder of Anthroposophy, and Alice A. Bailey.

Between 1901 and 1904, Roerich made a pilgrimage through Russia during which he produced some 75 paintings, exhibited at La Purchase Exposition, St. Louis. From 1906 to 1910, he was director of the School for Encouragement of Fine Arts, Russia, president of the Museum of Russian Arts, first president of Mir Iskusstva, and a leader in Moscow Art Theatre Diaghilev Ballet.

The Roerichs escaped Russia at the time of the revolution and in 1920 migrated to the United States under the auspices of the Art Institute of Chicago. Roerich established a number of institutions with the aim of bringing humanity together through education, art, and culture. He traveled extensively and spent much time in Eastern countries, which strongly influenced his philosophy.

He exhibited his paintings in New York in December 1920. In 1921, he showed his work at the Institute of United Arts in New York. He took an active part in the foundation of Cor Ardeus (Flaming Heart) by a group of artists in Chicago, and in September 1922, he associated himself with an international cultural center named Corona Mundi (Crown of the World), promoting cooperation among scientists and cultural workers in different countries.

In 1923, the Roerich Museum was inaugurated in New York, an occasion marked by President Calvin Coolidge with a greeting to the founders. Roerich was also concerned with the American-Russian Cultural Association. Although the Roerichs had left Russia after the revolution, they devoted much time to attempting to bring about friendly cultural relations between the newly-established Soviet Union and the United States. Their efforts were appreciated by the Soviet authorities. Georgi Chickerin, a People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, once described Roerich as "a half-Communist and a half-Buddhist."

Roerich spent five years in Central Asia as head of an expedition, making 500 paintings. He took a great interest in United States agriculture at a time when soil erosion threatened the holdings of American farmers during the thirties. Roerich had established an institute at Urusvathi, in Kulu, India, and sent specimens of drought-resistant plants collected in Central Asia to botanical research agencies in the United States. At the suggestion of the U.S. Department of Agriculture he headed an expedition to collect seeds of plants that prevented the destruction of fertile layers of soil. He also headed a further expedition to Japan in May 1934 and later continued these studies in Manchuria.

Roerich was internationally accepted at a time when his mysticism and artistic talents ranked equally with his efforts to improve agriculture and to bring about world peace. He was honored by many counties, and awards included: Commander, 1st class, Royal Swedish Order of North Star; Grand Cross, Legion of Honor (France); Order of Saint Sava, 1st class (Yugoslavia); Commander of Order of Imperial Russians of St. Stanislas, St. Anne and St. Vladimir; medal of city of Bruges, Belgium (for plan of Roerich Pact and Banner of Peace). His Roerich Pact and Banner of Peace was signed by twenty-two Pan-American countries at the White House, Washington, D.C., in 1935.

Among his many artistic activities, he was responsible for a number of works for the Chicago Opera Company, for the Russian Ballet (scenery in Prince Igor), and for Konstantin Stanislavsky (setting of Peer Gynt). He wrote libretto, and designed scenery and costumes for Sacre du Printemps, for which Stravinsky composed music. Ten Roerich Halls were established, in Paris, Belgrade, Riga, Benares, Bruges, Allahabad, Zagreb, Buenos Aires, Kyoto, and Praha. Roerich authored books on all of the artistic and social activities which he sponsored.

In all these activities, he was assisted by his wife Helena, who had in the meantime become a channel for Master Morya, one of the masters first brought forth by Blavatsky. Her channelled materials became the basis of what became known as Agni Yoga, a variation on theosophical teachings very much like those of Alice Bailey.

Roerich died December 12, 1947. The books of the Roerichs are kept in print by the Agni Yoga Society and the Roerich Museum, 319 W. 107 St., New York, NY 10025.

Roessling, Bernhardt Emil (1892–1961)

Teacher who wrote on parapsychology. He was born on November 27, 1892, in Brussels, Belgium. He completed his doctorate at Louvain University, Belgium (1914), moved to the United States and became a language teacher at St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia (1919–23), and was later an assistant to an agronomy professor at the University of Florida (1924–27) and a high school teacher in the Florida and Georgia public school systems (1929–52).

While in Florida he was executive secretary of the Florida Society for Psychical Research. During his retirement years, beginning in 1955, Roessling investigated mental and physical mediumship and contributed articles on psychical research to the Spiritualist periodical, Psychic Observer and Chimes.

He was born May 3, 1922, in Manchester, England and studied at the University of London. He traveled widely as a lecturer and teacher, particularly in Eastern countries, and became a fellow of the Royal Asiatic Society, London.

During World War II Rofé served in the Royal Air Force (1940–45) and afterward became a teacher at the London School of Languages (1945–46). He moved to Morocco in 1947 as an interpreter for the British Consulate (1947–49) and was successively a teacher in government secondary schools, Djokjakarta, Indonesia (1950–54); a Turkish lycée, Nicosia, Cyprus (1955–56); a language tutor, University of Hong Kong (1959–65); and head of the translation service for the Asian Development Bank, Manila, Philippines, through the 1970s.

He took special interest in spiritual healing and during his stay in Indonesia associated with the Subud movement, on which he published two books: Path of Subud (1959) and Reflections on Subud (1961). He also authored several other books out of his Asian wanderings and frequently contributed articles on psychical research and related topics to popular journals around the world.

Rogo, David Scott (1950–1990)

Parapsychologist and writer on psychological, scientific, and psychic subjects. Rogo was born February 1, 1950, in Los Angeles and studied at the University of Cincinnati for a year before finishing his degree at San Fernando Valley State College (B.A., 1971). Originally a musician, he became a student of parapsychology and in 1968–69 coordinated an experimental course in parapsychology at the University of California, Los Angeles. He joined the American Society for Psychical Research and the Society for Psychical Research, London. Over the years he educated himself in parapsychology and became one of the important interpreters of its findings to the public.

As a professional writer, he regularly contributed to various psychic and New Age periodicals such as Fate and Psychic (renamed New Realities), for whom he became a review editor. He authored several papers for parapsychology journals, but is most remembered for his many thoughtful books. He was tragically killed during a break-in at his apartment in Northridge, California on August 14, 1990. The Parapsychology Foundation has established the “D. Scott Rogo Award for Parapsychology Literature” in his memory.

“Rohmer, Sax”

Pseudonym of British author Arthur Henry (Sarsfield) Ward, creator of the celebrated fictional character Dr. Fu-Manchu, and a student of the occult.

Roll, William George, Jr. (1926–)

Roll, a prominent parapsychologist, was born on July 3, 1926, in Bremen, Germany. He grew up in Denmark and studied at the University of California, Berkeley (B.A., 1949) and with Henry Habberley Price at Oxford University, England (B.Litt, 1960; M.Litt., 1961). While in England, he was president of the Oxford University Society for Psychical Research (1952–57). His Oxford researches covered the effects of hypnosis and the correlation of ESP with personality traits. With the help of the Parapsychology Foundation he was able to establish a laboratory and reading room for psi experiments at the university.

In 1957 he became Louis K. Anspacher Visiting Research Fellow at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, and stayed on as a research associate at the Parapsychology Laboratory (1958–60). While at Duke he directed a research project on incorporeal personal agency concerned with survival (1960) and was a member of the editorial staff of the Journal of Parapsychology (1958–60). In 1958 he first investigated a poltergeist and launched himself upon the area of research with which he has become most identified.

While at Duke he also became a member of the founding council of the Parapsychology Association (1957) and was later the association's treasurer (1958), secretary (1959–60), vice president (1963), and president.

In 1960 Charles Eugene Ozanne chose Roll to become the new project director of the Psychical Research Foundation. In 1986 the foundation moved from Durham, North Carolina, to the campus of West Georgia College, Carrollton, Georgia.

Beginning in 1963 Roll edited Theta, a quarterly journal for research on the problem of survival after bodily death; this publication ceased in 1991. He also authored more than 100 scholarly papers on parapsychological topics, edited eleven volumes of research in parapsychology for the Parapsychology Association, and authored thirteen books.

Romains, Jules (1885–1972)

Famous French author who first studied the phenomenon of eyeless sight. Born Louis Farigoule on August 26, 1885, at Saint-Julien, Chateuil in Velay, in the Haute-Loire district of France, he grew up in Paris. He was a talented scholar and received his bachelor's degree by 1903. In that year Romains also had a sudden mystical experience of universalism, which he embodied in a philosophy he called "Unanism" and expressed in his book of poems La Vie Unanime (1908).

In 1909, he received his degree in philosophy and science, and became a professor of philosophy at the Lycée of Brest. He published more poems, a play, and a novel before World War I shattered his universalist hopes of human society. After the war he devoted much time to travel and writing.

His book on eyeless sight is his only scientific work. First published in France in the early 1920s, it deals with his research in developing vision in blind people through a little-known faculty of perception usually associated with psychics. The book was ridiculed by his colleagues and he was refused access to subjects for experiments. He abandoned his scientific research, and under the name "Jules Romains" became a universally acclaimed poet, dramatist, and novelist. He is best known for his vast series of novels surveying the world scene from the beginning of the twentieth century on, published in English as Men of Good Will in 27 volumes (1932–48). Romains died August 14, 1972.

The subject of eyeless sight was revived in the 1960s with the Soviet experiments in "fingertip vision" with Rosa Kuleshova, and Romains lived to see his own research taken up again by Dr. Yvonne Duplessis in France.

Rome (Ancient Religion & Magic)

Magical practice was widespread among the ancient Romans. Magic was integral to their worship and operated as an organized system of magical rites for communal ends. Magic formed a foundation for thought and outlook upon the world, entered daily life, and directly affected many laws and customs. This ingrained tendency eventually developed into a broad polytheistic system, which led during bad times, especially in the later years of the Empire, to a frenzied search for new gods, borrowed from various countries Rome had conquered. In times of misfortune and disaster, the Romans were always ready to utilize a non-Roman deity if his or her favors promised more than those of their own deities.

Although there was a strong conservative element in the populous, and the "custom of the elders" was strongly upheld by the priestly fraternity, this usually gave way before the momentary impulses of the people. Thus, as a rock shows its geological history by its differing strata, so the theogony of the Roman gods tells its tale of the race that conceived it. There are prehistoric nature deities, borrowed from indigenous tribes; gods of the Sabines, from whom the young colony stole its wives; gods of the Etruscans, and of the Egyptians, Greeks, and Persians. The temple of Jupiter on the capitol contained the altar of an ancient deity, a stone-god, Terminus, the spirit of boundaries. In the temple of Diana of the Grove, a fountain nymph was worshiped. Additional instances of this kind abound.

Belief in Spirits

In addition to the gods, the spirits needed to be propitiated. Indeed the objects offered to the Roman for veneration were seemingly numberless. Apuleius gave a description of popular supernaturalism when he told of a country road where one might meet an altar wreathed with flowers, a cave hung with garlands, an oak tree laden with horns of cattle, a hill marked by fences as sacred, a log rough-hewn into shape, an altar of turf smoking with libations, or a stone anointed with oil.

Every single action of man's daily life had a presiding spirit, as did commerce and husbandry. Ednea was concerned with eating and Potina with drinking. Other spirits oversaw departures, travel, approaching, and homecoming. In commerce Mercurius reigned as the spirit of gain and Pecunia of money. Farmers had to pay attention to the spirits of cutting, grinding, sowing, and bee-keeping. A deity presided over streets and highways; Cloacina served as goddess of the sewers, while the lowly Mephitis was the spirit of bad smells. Spirits of evil, such as Robigo, the spirit of mildew, also had to be propitiated by pacificatory rites. In Rome there was an altar to fever and bad fortune.

From the country came Silvanus, god of farms and woods, and his fauns and nymphs with Picus, the woodpecker god who fed the twins Romulus and Remus with berries. Each deity or spirit possessed some influence, and had to be approached with proper rites. The names of these spirits were inscribed on tablets, indigitamenta, which were in the charge of the pontiffs (priests), who thus knew which spirit to evoke according to need. Most of these spirits were animistic in origin.

Rites and Worship

Worship in ancient Rome consisted largely of magical rites destined to propitiate the powers controlling human beings, to bring people into touch with those powers, to renew life and the land that supported it, and to stop that process of degeneration constantly set in motion by evil influences. Everything connected with worship typified this restoration. The priests, who represented the life of the community, were therefore bound by strict observances from endangering it in any way. Rules as to attire, eating, and touch were numerous. Sacrifices were systematized according to the end desired and the deity invoked.

Worship instructions designated the age and gender of all animal sacrifices; oxen were to be offered to Jupiter and Mars, and swine to Juno, Ceres the corn-goddess, and Silvanus. At one shrine, a pregnant cow was sacrificed and the ashes of the unborn young were considered to be of special magical efficacy. Even human sacrifice existed within historical times. After the battle of Cannæ, the Romans sought to divert misfortune by burying two Greeks alive in the cattle-market, while in the time of Julius Cæsar, two men were put to death with sacrificial solemnities by the pontiff and flamen of Mars. Again, in the time of Cicero and Horace, boys were killed for magical purposes.

Fire possessed great virtue and was held sacred in the worship of Vesta, in early belief Vesta being the fire itself; it presided over the family hearth; it restored purity and conferred protection.

Blood had the same quality and, smeared on the face of the god, symbolized and brought about the oneness of the deity with the community. On great occasions the statue of Jupiter was treated thus: the priests of Bellona made incisions in their shoulders and sprinkled the blood upon the image. The face of a triumphant general was painted with vermilion to represent blood.

Kneeling and prostration brought one into direct contact with the earth of the sacred place.

Music was also used as a species of incantation, probably deriving its origin in sounds made to drive away evil spirits. Dancing too was of magical efficacy. In Rome there were colleges of dancers for the purposes of religion, youths who danced in solemn measure about the altars, who, in the sacred month of Mars, took part in the festivals and were sent throughout the city dancing and singing. One authority stated that there were four kinds of "holy solemnity"—sacrifice, sacred banquets, public festivals, and games. Theatrical performances also belonged to this category, in one instance being used as a means of diverting a pestilence.

Sacred banquets were often decreed by the Senate as thanksgiving to the gods. Tables were spread with a sumptuous repast in the public places and were first offered to the statues of the deities seated around.

The festivals were numerous, all of a magical and symbolic nature. In the spring there was the Parilia, when fires of straw were lighted, through which persons passed to be purified, and the Cerealia, celebrated with sacrifice and offerings to Ceres, the corn-goddess, and followed by banquets. The Lupercalia, the festival of Faunus, was held in February and symbolized the wakening of spring and growth. Goats were slain as sacrifice and with their blood the Luperci, youths clad in skins, smeared their faces. They took thongs made of the goatskin and, laughing wildly, rushed through the city striking the crowd, Roman matrons believing that the blows thus received rendered them prolific.

Juno, the goddess of marriage and childbirth, also had her festival, the Matronalia, celebrated by the women of Rome. During festivals of the dead, the door leading to the other world was opened, the stone removed from its entrance in the Comitium, and the dark spirits who came forth were appeased with offerings. On these days, three times in the year, when the gods of gloom were abroad, complete cessation from all work was decreed. No battle could be fought nor ship set sail, neither could a man and woman marry.

To the sacred games were taken the statues of the gods in gorgeous procession, chariots of silver, companies of priests, and youths singing and dancing. The gods viewed the games reclining on couches.

The chariot races also partook of the nature of rites. After the races, in the Field of Mars, came one of the most important Roman rites, the sacrifice of the October Horse. The right-hand horse of the victorious team was sacrificed to Mars, and the tail of the animal, running with blood, carried to the Altar of the Regia. The blood was stored in the temple of Vesta until the following spring and used in the sacrifice of the festival of Parilia. The sacrifice was essentially magical, all citizens present being purified by the blood-sprinkling and bonfire.

The Roman outlook upon life was largely colored by magic. Bodily foes had their counterpart in the unseen world—wandering spirits of the dead, spirits of evil, the anger of innocently offended deities, and the menace of the evil eye. Portents and prodigies were everywhere. In the heavens, strange things might be seen. The sun had been known to double, even treble itself, its light turn to blood, or a magical halo to appear round the orb. Thunder and lightning were always fraught with presage. Jove was angered when he opened the heavens and hurled his bolts to earth.

Phantoms, too, hovered amid the clouds. Upon the Campagna, the gods were observed in conflict, and afterward tracks of the combatants were visible across the plain. Unearthly voices were heard amid the mountains and groves and cries of portent sounded within the temples.

Blood haunted the Roman imagination. Sometimes it was said to have covered the land as a mantle, the standing corn dyed with blood, the rivers and fountains flowing with it, while walls and statues were covered with a bloody sweat.

The flight and song of birds might foretell the decrees of Fate; unappeased spirits of the dead were known to lurk near and steal away the souls of men, who then died. All these happenings were attributable to the gods and spirits, who, if the portent was one of menace, must be propitiated, if one of good fortune, thanked with offerings.

Down to later times, this deep belief in the occurrence of prodigies persisted. When Otho set out for Italy in 69 C.E., Rome rang with reports of a gigantic phantom rushing forth from the Temple of Juno and of the statue of Julius turning from east to west.

Divination and Augury

Divination was connected with Roman worship. There was a spot on the Capitol from which the augur, with veiled head, read the auspices in the flight of birds. Augurs also accompanied armies and fleets and read the omens before an engagement was entered upon. Divination was also practiced by reading the intestines of animals, by dreams, by divine possession, as in the case of the Oracles, when prophecies were uttered. These had been gathered together in the Sibylline Books and were consulted as oracles by the state. With the worship of fortune were connected the Lots of Praeneste. The questions put to the goddess were answered by means of oaken lots a boy drew from a case made of sacred wood. The fortune-tellers also used a narrow-necked urn that, filled with water, only allowed one lot at a time to rise. Astrologers from Chaldea were also much sought after and were attached to the kingly and noble houses.

Familiar things of everyday life took on magical import. Words and numbers, especially odd ones, were of special significance. The Kalends, Nones, and Ides were so arranged as to fall upon odd days. Touch was binding, and so recognized in the law of Rome, as the grasp of a thing sold, from a slave to a turf of distant estate. Knotting and twisting of thread was injurious, so that women must never pass by cornfields twisting their spindles.

A strange sympathy existed between the trees and human-kind, and great honor was paid to the sacred trees of Rome. On the oak tree of Jupiter, the triumphant general hung the shield and arms of his fallen foe, while the hedges about the Temple of Diana at Nemi were covered with votive offerings. The trees also harbored the spirits of the dead, who came forth as dreams to the souls of men. Pliny the Elder stated in this matter:

“Trees have a soul since nothing on earth lives without one. They are the temples of spirits and the simple countryside dedicates still a noble tree to some god. The various kinds of trees are sacred to their protecting spirits: the oak to Jupiter, the laurel to Apollo, olive to Minerva, myrtle to Venus, white poplar to Hercules.”

These trees therefore partook of the nature of their presiding spirits and it was desirable to bring about communion with their magical influence, as in the spring, when laurel boughs were hung at the doors of the flamens and pontiffs, and in the temple of Vesta, where they remained hanging until the following year. Trees and their leaves were also possessed of healing and purifying value. Laurel was used for the latter quality after triumphs, when the spears and javelins of legionaries were wreathed with its branches to purify them from the blood of the enemy.

Man himself had a presiding spirit, his genius, each woman her “Juno” and the Saturnalia was really a holiday for this “other self.” The Roman kept his birthday in honor of his genius. He would offer frankincense, cakes, and unmixed wine on an altar garlanded with flowers while making solemn prayers for the coming year. Cities and villages had their geni.

Beliefs About Death

Death was believed to be the life and soul enticed away by revengeful ghosts, hence death would never occur save by such agencies. The dead therefore must be appeased with offerings or else they wandered abroad working evil among the living.

One manifestation of this belief appeared in Ovid's lines,

“Once upon a time the great feast of the dead was not observed and the manes failed to receive the customary gifts, the fruit, the salt, the corn steeped in unmixed wine, the violets. The injured spirits revenged themselves on the living and the city was encircled with the funeral fires of their victims. The townsfolk heard their grandsires complaining in the quiet hours of the night, and told each other how the unsubstantial troop of monstrous specters rising from their tombs, shrieked along the city streets and up and down the fields.”

Beans were used in the funeral feasts. They were supposed to harbor the souls of the dead, and the bean-blossom to be inscribed with characters of mourning.

Dreams were considered of great importance by the Romans and many historical instances of prophetic dreams may be found. They were thought to be like birds, the "bronze-colored" hawks; they were also thought to be the souls of human beings visiting others in their sleep or the souls of the dead returning to earth. In Virgil much may be found on this subject. Lucretius tried to find a scientific reason for dreams; Cicero, although writing in a slighting manner of the prevalent belief in these manifestations of sleep, recorded dreams of his own.

Sorcery & Witchcraft

Sorcery in all its forms, from love-magic to death-magic, was rife among all classes, as were necromantic practices. There were charms and spells for everything under the sun. The rain-charm of the pontiffs consisted of the throwing of puppets into the Tiber. The charm against thunderbolts was compounded of onions, hair, and sprats. The charm against an epidemic required the matrons of Rome to sweep the temple-floors with their hair. There were many more charms, including the simple love-charm strung around the neck of the country maiden.

Witches were prevalent. The poets often chose these sinister figures for their subjects, as when Horace described the ghastly rites of two witches in the cemetery of the Esquiline. Under the light of the new moon they crawled about looking for poisonous herbs and bones. They called the specters to a banquet consisting of a black lamb torn to pieces with their teeth, and afterward these phantoms had to answer the questions of the sorceresses.

Witches made images of their victims and prayed to the infernal powers for help; hounds and snakes glided over the ground, the moon turned to blood, and as the images were melted so the lives of the victims ebbed away.

Virgil gives a picture of a sorceress performing love-magic by means of a waxen image of the youth whose love she desired. Lucan, in his Pharsalia, discusses Thessaly, notorious in all ages for sorcery, and drew a terrific figure of Erichtho, a sorceress of illimitable powers, one whom even the gods obeyed, and to whom the forces of earth and heaven were bond-slaves.

Both Nero and his mother Agrippina were reported to have had recourse to the infamous arts of sorcery, while in the New Testament may be found testimony as to these practices in Rome.

The attitude of the cultured class towards magic is illustrated by an illuminating passage to be found in the writings of Pliny the Elder. He states,

"The art of magic has prevailed in most ages and in most parts of the globe. Let no one wonder that it has wielded very great authority inasmuch as it embraces three other sources of influence. No one doubts that it took its rise in medicine and sought to cloak itself in the garb of a science more profound and holy than the common run. It added to its tempting promises the force of religion, after which the human race is groping, especially at this time. Further it has brought in the arts of astrology and divination. For everyone desires to know what is to come to him and believes that certainty can be gained by consulting the stars. Having in this way taken captive the feelings of man by a triple chain, it has reached such a pitch that it rules over all the world and in the East, governs the King of Kings."

Roosevelt Spiritual Memorial Benevolent Association

The Roosevelt Spiritual Memorial Benevolent Association was founded in 1949 among independent Spiritualists as a corporation to hold church charters and ministerial credentials for otherwise autonomous congregations and mediums. The association promoted Spiritualism but held a minimum of beliefs, including the idea that Spiritualist communication with the deceased is taught by the Bible. It provided a study course in Spiritualism. Last known address: P.O. Box 68-313, Miami, FL 33138.

Rose

In ancient Rome, the rose, the flower of Venus, was the badge of the sacred prostitutes. The rose additionally symbolized silence. Eros, in Greek mythology, presents a rose to the god of silence. Things spoken under the rose or sub rosa were the secrets of Venus' sexual mysteries, later generalized to refer to keeping any secret. The use of red and white roses symbolized the sexually active and virginal goddess respectively and set the stage for the later Christian sexual symbolism possessed by the rose. That symbolism survives today in the predominate use of roses at weddings and as gifts for Valentine's Day.

In Christian Rome it was the custom to bless the rose on a certain Sunday, called Rose Sunday. The custom of blessing the golden rose came into vogue about the eleventh century. The golden rose thus consecrated was given to princes as a mark of the Roman pontiffs' favor. The Christian use of the older rose symbolism achieved its most artistic expression in the rose windows of the medieval cathedrals.

In the East, it was believed that the first rose was generated by a tear of the prophet Mohammed, and it was further believed that on a certain day in the year the rose had a heart of gold.

In the west of Scotland, if a white rose bloomed in autumn it was a token of an early marriage. The red rose, it was said, would not bloom over a grave. If a young girl had several lovers and wished to know which of them would be her husband, she would take a rose leaf for each of her sweethearts, and, naming each leaf after one of her lovers, she would watch them until one after another they sank, and the last to sink would be her future husband.

Rose leaves thrown upon a fire gave good luck. If a rose bush was pruned on St. John's Eve, it would bloom again in the autumn. Superstitions respecting the rose are more numerous in England than in Scotland.

The rose became a prominent symbol in occultism at the beginning of the modern age. It appeared on the family crest of Martin Luther, seemingly the ultimate source of the Rosicrucians' juxtaposition of the rose and cross. Earlier it had been used in the symbolism of alchemy. Both pagan and Christian folklore cites the rose as a symbol of regeneration and love.

Rose, Ronald K(riss) H(ume) (1920–)

Australian author who has investigated parapsychology and written extensively on the subject. He was born on March 9, 1920, at Lakemba, New South Wales, Australia. After many years of employment in public relations for the New South Wales Railways (1935-49) he returned to school and earned his degree at the University of Queensland (B.A., 1953). In 1957 he became an information officer of the Department of Territories, Commonwealth of Australia.

His special interest involved investigating parapsychology among the original peoples of Australia, New Zealand, and Samoa, about whom he wrote extensively. He and his wife appear to have been the first to conduct ESP and PK tests with them.

"Rosemary's Baby"

The sensational Satanist novel by Ira Levin, first published in 1967. It was issued the year after the public announcement of the founding of the Church of Satan by Anton La Vey and the popular interest in Satanism evidenced by several front page stories concerning La Vey's activities (including a military funeral) and his appearance on the Johnny Carson television show.

The Paramount movie version starring Mia Farrow was directed by Roman Polanski. La Vey was hired as a consultant and appeared briefly as the devil. La Vey called the film "the best paid commercial for Satanism since the Inquisition," and saw it as contributing to the growth of his church.

Some interesting coincidental events surrounded the film's release. On June 5, 1968, ten days before Rosemary's Baby was released, Polanski and his wife Sharon Tate dined with Robert Kennedy in Malibu; shortly afterward Kennedy left for the Ambassador Hotel, where he was assassinated.

A year later, on August 7, 1969, followers of Charles Manson brutally stabbed, mutilated, and murdered Sharon Tate and her unborn baby, together with four other people at the Polanski residence, Los Angeles.

The premises of the American Society for Psychical Research were housed immediately behind the famous Dakota Apartments in Manhattan, the large Gothic building that was the setting for Rosemary's Baby.

Rosen, (Samuel) Paul

A sovereign grand inspector-general of the 33rd degree of the French rite of Masonry, who in 1888 decided that Masonry was diabolical in conception and to prove his strictures published a work called Satan et Cie. The Satanism credited to Freemasonry by Rosen was social anarchy and the destruction of the Catholic religion.

In 1890, he published a further attack titled L'ennemie sociale; Histoire documentée des faits et gestes de la Franc-Maçonnerie de 1717 à 1890 en France, en Belgique et en Italie. He made accusations of a "supreme directory" of Freemasonry in Berlin.

Such conspiracy accusations were common from the eighteenth century onward, reflecting social unrest and the involvement of Freemasons in the various revolutionary causes of the period. Freemasonry was generally pictured as anti-Catholic, pro-Jewish, subversive, and even diabolical. Substance for these accusations was provided by the prominent role of Freemasons, from George Washington to Garibaldi, in the anti-monarchical and secularizing trends of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

Rosen's delusions were soon eclipsed by the infamous and sustained hoaxes of Gabriel Jogand-Pagès, who, under the name "Léo Taxil," claimed to have exposed Satanism in Freemasonry. This plot was double-edged, since it was also designed to embarrass and compromise the Catholic Church.

Rosetree, Rose

Rose Rosetree is an innovative teacher of physiognomy, the art of face reading, who has named her own system Face Reading Secrets. Following her graduation from Brandeis University, she became initially a student and then a teacher of transcendental meditation (TM). Among the highlights of her 15-year career was her pioneering the introduction of the TM program into the high school system of Miami, Florida, in the early 1970s. In 1974–75 she authored a syndicated column on meditation for newspapers in Massachusetts, and in 1981–82 she worked with the Environmental Protection Agency to develop a meditation program for its employees. This later program coincided with the challenge in the courts of TM's role in government agencies and its eventual banishment because of its religious nature. In 1986, Rosetree left the TM movement and began teaching independently.

During this time she began the study of physiognomy. She published her first book on the subject, I Can Read Your Face, in 1989. She continued to read widely in both the Chinese Siang Mien and Western texts, only a handful of which had been written over the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Based upon her study and her own experiments in reading people's faces, she created her new system. This was also developed along with her abilities in reading the human aura, and greatly expanded the average person's ability to utilize aura reading skills.

Although teaching both physiognomy and aura reading, Rosetree, who resides in suburban Washington, D.C., has focused on teacher training, a key to spreading the practice of face reading, and upon application in the business world. The first book based upon her new system, The Power of Face Reading for Sales, Self-Esteem, and Better Relationships, appeared in 1998.

Roshier, Grace (d. 1980)

Noted British exponent of automatic writing. She was an artist who exhibited miniature paintings in the Royal Academy, London. Her psychic talent became manifest after the loss of her fiancé Gordon E. Burdick, whom she had known for many years. In June 1956, he was serving in the Canadian Navy, stationed at Vancouver, and intended to come to London to marry Roshier. A week before sailing, he died.

Fifteen months later, Grace Roshier had written a letter concerning an aunt and was wondering if she had time to write another letter before tea-time when she had a strong urge to keep her hand on the writing pad. The pen began to move without her conscious volition, and she discovered to her astonishment that it had written a letter in the handwriting of her dead fiancé. In the course of time, many other such automatic letters followed, stating that this phenomenon would be the means of bringing other people to realize that life continues after death.

Roshier was not a Spiritualist, and sought guidance from the Rev. G. Maurice Elliot, then secretary of the Churches' Fel- lowship of Psychic and Spiritual Studies. Elliot enlisted the aid of handwriting expert F. T. Hilliger who studied the automatic scripts and compared them to the handwriting of Burdick when alive. Although initially skeptical, Hilliger reported that the automatic scripts bore a close resemblance to the genuine writing of Burdick in a large number of different ways, and were so consistent that “the writing reproduced by Grace Rosher was, if it were humanly possible, genuinely inspired by the personality of Gordon E. Burdick.”

Rosher subsequently produced many other scripts, including messages from her mother, father, and three sisters, and a relative who had died in 1752. On one occasion, she produced a communication claimed to be from the famous scientist Sir William Crookes, in handwriting remarkably similar to that of Crookes in his lifetime.

A special characteristic of these automatic scripts was the way in which they were written with a pen lying loosely across the joint of Rosher's index finger, the nib resting on a writing pad. Although she did not hold the pen, it wrote swiftly and intelligently. Skeptical stage magicians have pointed out that it is possible to guide a pen under these circumstances, but it is not clear whether they are suggesting a conscious or even subconscious deception on her part. The circumstances of the production of Rosher's automatic scripts are in no way comparable with the deliberate mystification of a professional magician. Grace Rosher died in July 1980.

Rosicrucian Anthroposophical League

The Rosicrucian Anthroposophical League was founded in 1932 by Samuel Richard Parchment (b. 1881), an astrologer and occultist who trained with Max Heindel. During the 1920s, Parchment became a leader in the Rosicrucian Fellowship, founded by Heindel, which published his early writings. However, he broke away from the fellowship after Heindel's death and formed an independent organization out of the former fellowship center in San Francisco. Parchment is best remembered as the author of a classic textbook, Astrology, Mundane and Spiritual, which was used by many astrologers not affiliated with the league and later reprinted by the American Federation of Astrologers. He also wrote a number of booklets that became league texts: The Just Law of Compensation; The Middle Path, the Safest; Ancient Operative Masonry; and Steps to Self-Mastery.

The league strove to investigate occult laws, to practice the brotherhood of man, to disseminate spiritual truth, and to facilitate the attainment of self-conscious immortality by its members. During Parchment's lifetime, league centers developed on both coasts, but in recent years little has been heard of it. Its present status is unknown. In the 1970s the New York League became the independent Ausar Auset Society.

Rosicrucian Digest

The Rosicrucian Digest, the outer organ of the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis (AMORC), is one of the oldest occult magazines being published in the Western world, having been established in the early 1920s. The Digest continues The American Rosae Crucis, the original periodical established by H. Spencer Lewis (1883–1939) in 1915 when he opened the AMORC. The organization passed through an unstable initial decade before settling in San Jose, California, where its headquarters has remained and from which it has grown into a worldwide occult fellowship, possibly the largest in the contemporary world.

The Rosicrucian Digest is built around a set of feature articles expounding upon various Rosicrucian themes. The order traces its origins to ancient Egypt, and has founded an Egyptian museum that remains a popular tourist stop in San Jose. Articles discuss the museum's artifacts, its staff's archeological work, and ancient Egypt in general. The emphasis upon Egypt provides a foundation for regular treatments of the Hermetic tradition, also traced to Egyptian roots. Generally each issue begins with an article by the leader of the order, and recently each issue has reprinted an article from the many written by Lewis, the founding imperator.

Through the years, the Digest was issued as a monthly magazine. However, in the 1990s the order went through a major upheaval when it came into conflict with its imperator, Gary Stewart. Stewart was forced out of office after being accused of attempting to steal substantial funds. For several years the order faced severe financial problems. Eventually a new imperator, Christian Bernard, was named. Through the unrest, the Digest became a quarterly periodical. It currently circulates approximately 15,000 copies per issue (with parallel issues serving the order in other countries). Once a year, the Digest publishes a list of Rosicrucian lodges and centers around the world.

The Rosicrucian Digest may be ordered from the Grand Lodge of the English Language Jurisdiction, AMORC, Inc., 1342 Naglee Ave., San Jose, CA 95191.

Rosicrucian Fellowship

An occult organization founded in 1907 by Carl Louis van Grashoff who used the pseudonym Max Heindel. Born in Germany in 1865, he came to America in 1895 and in 1904 was vice president of a Theosophical Society lodge in Los Angeles.

He claimed that during a visit to Europe in 1907 he met a mysterious occult Rosicrucian who took him to a Rose Cross temple on the borders of Germany and Bohemia, where he was initiated. Heindel expounded his version of Rosicrucian teachings, with obvious roots in Theosophy, in his book The Rosicrucian Cosmo-Conception (1909) and established various Fellowship Centers. He also founded the fellowship's magazine Rays from the Rose Cross.

In 1911, the fellowship was established at Mt. Ecclesia, a plot of land in Oceanside, California, to disseminate Rosicrucian philosophy through books, magazines, lectures, and correspondence courses. The Oceanside headquarters now cover a vast estate with stucco temples, a healing department, and a vegetarian restaurant at nearby El Toro Marine base.

Much of Heindel's teachings seem to derive from the lectures he attended of Anthroposophist Rudolf Steiner (1861–1925) in Germany during the 1900s, and Steiner, who saw himself standing in the Rosicrucian tradition, may have been Heindel's mysterious Rosicrucian.

Heindel died in 1919, and his widow Augusta Foss Heindel became leader and director of the Fellowship until her own death in 1938. Another prominent official of the Fellowship during this later period was Manly Palmer Hall.

In 1995 the fellowship reported 8,000 members worldwide with 700 in the United States. Address: 2222 Mission Ave., Oceanside, CA 92054-0713. Website: <http://www.rosicrucian.com/>.

Rosicrucians

The idea of a Rosicrucian brotherhood arose in the early seventeenth century and through the succeeding decades aroused considerable interest among those with occult leanings. In the absence of an organization to coincide with the early documents that presented the basic Rosicrucian myth, numerous occultists filled the vacuum and invented a new mystical life. Over the next centuries, books appeared to present the true Rosicrucian teachings; Rosicrucian degrees appeared in speculative masonry; and different Rosicrucian orders emerged. During the nineteenth century, fiction writers found the idea of Rosicrucianism a suitable topic for romantic novels, such as Bulwar Lytton's Zanoni, Percy Shelley's St. Irvyne the Rosicrucian, and Harrison Ainsworth's Auriol.

The name Rosicrucian is derived from rosa (a rose) and crux (a cross); the general symbol of the supposed order was a rose placed on the center of a cross. In a Rosicrucian book of the nineteenth century, there is a symbol of a red cross-marked heart in the center of an open rose, which the writer Arthur E. Waite believed to be a development of the monogram of Martin Luther, which was a cross-crowned heart rising from the center of an open rose.

History of the Brotherhood

Little was known concerning the Rosicrucians before the publication of Waite's work The Real History of the Rosicrucians in 1887 (later revised and enlarged as The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross, 1924). Waite's writing on the Rosicrucians laid the groundwork for serious study of the subject. Prior to that, a great deal had been written concerning Rosicrucianism by people claiming to be Rosicrucians or representatives of the brotherhood, including the most questionable volume by Hargrave Jennings, The Rosicrucians: Their Rites and Mysteries (1870). It was typical of many writings regarding the fraternity of the Rosy Cross, and as the Westminster Review wittily commented in its notice of the volume, it dealt with practically everything under the sun except the Rosicrucians. In contrast, working as a critical historian, Waite gathered all that could be known regarding Rosicrucians at that time. Assembling all the relevant manuscripts, some of which he discovered, he was the first to put together a believable account of the origins of this branch of the occult world.

The name Rosicrucian appears to have been unknown before the year 1598. The movement originated in Germany, where, in the town of Cassel in the year 1614, the public was surprised by the publication of a pamphlet bearing the title The Fama of the Fraternity of the Meritorious Order of the Rosy Cross Addressed to the Learned in General and the Governors of Europe.

It purported to be a message from certain anonymous adepts who were deeply concerned for the condition of humankind and who greatly desired its moral renewal and perfection. It proposed that all men of learning throughout the world should join forces for the establishment of a synthesis of science, through which would be discovered the perfect method for all the arts. The squabbles and quarrels of the literati of the period were to be ignored, and the antiquated authorities of the old world to be discredited. It pointed out that a reformation had taken place in religion, that the church had been cleansed, and that a similar new career was now open to science. All this was to be brought about by the assistance of the illuminated Brotherhood, the children of light who had been initiated in the mysteries of the Grand Orient and would lead the age of perfection.

The fraternity supplied what purported to be an account of its history. The head and front of the movement was one C. R. C., a magic hierophant of the highest rank, who at age five had been placed in a convent where he studied the humanities. At age 15, he had accompanied one Frater (brother) P. A. L. on his travels to the Holy Land. To the great grief of C. R. C., Frater P. A. L. died at Cyprus, but C. R. C. resolved to continue the arduous journey himself.

Arriving at Damascus, he obtained knowledge of a secret circle of mystics, experts in all magic arts, who lived in an unknown city of Arabia called Damcar. Turning aside from his quest for the Holy Sepulcher, the lad made up his mind to trace these illuminati and sought out certain Arabians, who took him to the city of Damcar. He arrived there at age 16 and was graciously welcomed by the magi, who told him they had long been expecting him, and related to him several occurrences from his past.

They proceeded to initiate him into the mysteries of occult science, and he quickly became acquainted with Arabic, from which he translated the divine book M into Latin. After three years of mystic instruction, he departed from the mysterious city for Egypt, then sailed to Fez, as the wise men of Damcar had instructed him to do. There he fell in with other masters who taught him how to evoke the elemental spirits.

After a further two years' sojourn at Fez, his period of initiation was over, and he proceeded to Spain to confer with the wisdom of that country and convince its professors of the errors of their ways. The scholars of Spain, however, turned their backs upon him with loud laughter and intimated to him that they had learned the principles and practice of magic from a much higher authority, namely, Satan himself, who had unveiled to them the secrets of necromancy within the walls of the University of Salamanca.

With noble indignation, the young man shook the dust of Spain from his feet and turned his face to other countries, only to find the same treatment within their boundaries. At last he sought his native land of Germany, where he pored over the great truths he had learned in solitude and seclusion and reduced his universal philosophy to writing. Five years of a hermit's life, however, only served to strengthen him in his opinions and he continued to feel that one who had mastered the arts of alchemy, had achieved the transmutation of metals, and had manufactured the elixir of life was designed for a nobler purpose than rumination in solitude.

Slowly and carefully he began to gather assistants, who became the nucleus of the Rosicrucian fraternity. When he had gathered four of these into the brotherhood, they invented among them a magic language, a cipher writing of equal magic potency, and a large dictionary replete with occult wisdom. They erected a House of the Holy Ghost, healed the sick, and initiated further members, then, calling themselves missionaries, went to the various countries of Europe to disseminate their wisdom.

In course of time, C. R. C. died, and for 120 years the secret of his burial place was concealed. The original members also died one by one, and it was not until the third generation of adepts had arisen that the tomb of their illustrious founder was unearthed during the rebuilding of one of their secret dwellings. The vault in which this tomb was found was illuminated by the sun of the magi, and inscribed with magic characters. The body of the illustrious founder was discovered in perfect preservation, and a number of marvels were discovered buried beside him, which convinced the existing members of the fraternity that it was their duty to make these known to the world.

It was this discovery that immediately inspired the brotherhood to make its existence public in the aforementioned circular, and they invited all worthy persons to apply to them for initiation into their order. They refused, however, to supply their names and addresses, and asked those who wished for initiation to signify their intention by the publication of printed letters, which they would be certain to notice. In conclusion they assured the public that they were believers in the reformed Church of Christ (i.e., Lutheranism) and denounced in the most solemn manner all pseudo-occultists and alchemists.

The Fama created tremendous excitement among the occultists of Europe, and a large number of pamphlets were published criticizing or defending the society and its manifesto, in which it was pointed out there were a number of discrepancies. To begin with, no such city as Damcar existed in Arabia. Where, it was asked, was the House of the Holy Ghost, which the Rosicrucians stated had been seen by 100,000 persons but was concealed from the world? C. R. C., the founder, as a boy of 15 must have achieved great occult skill to have astonished the magi of Damcar, skeptics said.

Despite these objections, however, considerable credit was given to the Rosicrucian publication. The Confession of the Rosicrucian Fraternity, addressed to the learned in Europe, appeared one year later. This offered initiation by gradual stages to selected applicants, and revealed its ultra-Protestant character by what an old Scottish minister used to call "a dig at the Pope," whom it publicly execrated, expressing the hope that his "asinine braying" would finally be put a stop to by tearing him to pieces with nails! This impious comment did little to enhance the reputation of Rosicrucians among Roman Catholics.

A year later, in 1616, The Chemical Nuptials of Christian Rosencreutz was published, purporting to recount incidents in the life of the mysterious founder of the Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross. But the "chemical marriage" makes Christian Rosencreutz an old man when he achieves initiation, and this hardly squared with the original account of his life as given in the Fama. By that time a number of persons had applied for initiation but had received no answer to their applications. Since many believed themselves to be alchemical and magical adepts, great irritation arose with the brotherhood, and it was generally considered that the whole business was a hoax. By 1620 the Rosicrucians and their publication had lapsed into obscurity.

Numerous theories were advanced as to the probable authorship of these manifestos, and it is now known that these documents were written by Johann Valentin Andreae (1586–1654), a Lutheran pastor who had absorbed both occult and magical teachings as well as a desire for social change in Germany. His aim in producing the books seems to have derived from a plan to attempt the formation of a secret society that could encourage the reformation of values among the public, but it is not impossible that the documents were simply a hoax. It is most unlikely that they describe an actual organization existing in Germany in the early seventeenth century or that C. R. C. ever existed.

Rosicrucian Groups

So far as can be gleaned from their publications, the Rosicrucians (or the person in whose imagination they existed) were believers in the doctrines of Paracelsus. They believed in alchemy, astrology, and occult forces in nature, and their belief in these is identical to the doctrines of that great master of occult philosophy and medicine. They were thus essentially modern in their occult beliefs, just as they were modern in their religious ideas.

Waite thought it possible that in Nuremberg, in the year 1598, a Rosicrucian society was founded by a mystic and alchemist named Simon Studion, under the name Militia Crucifera Evangelica, which held periodical meetings in that city. Its proceedings were reported in an unprinted work of Studion's, and in opinions and objects it was identical with the supposed Rosicrucian Society. "Evidently," stated Waite, "the Rosicrucian Society of 1614 was a transfiguration or development of the sect established by Simon Studion." But Waite's idea remains unsupported speculation.

In 1618 Henrichus Neuhuseus published a Latin pamphlet that stated that the Rosicrucian adepts had migrated to India.

This pamphlet received little response until the nineteenth century, when some Theosophists proposed the notion that Rosicrucians still existed in the tablelands of Tibet. It was even alleged that the Rosicrucians developed into a Tibetan brotherhood, and exchanged their Protestant Christianity for esoteric Buddhism.

On a more serious level, in England the Rosicrucian idea was taken up by Robert Fludd (1574–1637), who wrote a spirited defense of the brotherhood; by the alchemist Thomas Vaughan (1622–1666), who wrote as Eugenius Philalethes and translated the Fama and the Confession; and by John Heydon (ca. 1629–1668), who furnished a peculiarly quaint and interesting account of the Rosicrucians in The Wise Man's Crown; or, The Glory of the Rosie-Cross (1664). Heydon also wrote a variety of other treatises regarding alchemical skill and medical ability in El Havareuna; or, The English Physician's Tutor (1665), and A New Method of Rosie Crucian Physick (1658). In France, Rosicrucianism was also widely discussed. It has been stated that there was a strong connection between Rosicrucians and Freemasons.

In Germany, Rosicrucianism became identified with various Pietist movements, movements that attempted to revive spiritual life above and beyond that to be found in the many parish churches. One Pietist leader was Johann Jacob Zimmerman, a theologian and occultist who emerged in the 1680s. Zimmerman also believed that Christ would return at some point in the 1690s. He found an apt pupil in Johannes Kelpius, whom he brought into the Pietist movement and with whom he organized a small disciplined brotherhood ready to accept William Penn's offer of a home in the American colonies. Zimmerman died before this small group of Rosicrucians could migrate, which they finally did in 1694. They arrived in Philadelphia on June 23, just in time to celebrate St. John's Eve.

The group settled on Wissahickon Creek in what is today the Germantown section of Philadelphia and there erected a cubic house with 40 foot sides and America's first astrological observatory on its roof. They believed that by observation of the heavens, they would be able to discern the first signs of Christ's anticipated arrival. Kelpius died in 1708, and soon thereafter, Christ having not returned, the group disintegrated. It became the basis of the continuing magic (or powwow) tradition in southeastern Pennsylvania.

Early in the eighteenth century another Rosicrucian impulse appeared in Germany. In 1710 a certain Sincerus Racatus, or Sigmund Richter, published A Perfect and True Preparation of the Philosophical Stone according to the Secret Methods of the Brotherhood of the Golden and Rosy Cross, and annexed to this treatise were the rules of the Rosicrucian Society for the initiation of new members.

Waite considered these rules additional indication of the society's existence at the period, and he believed that Richter's group continued the Nuremberg group originally established by Studion. In 1785 the publication of The Secret Symbols of the Rosicrucians of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries took place at Altona, showing, in Waite's opinion, that the mysterious brotherhood still existed, but this was their last manifesto. These bits of evidence are so scanty that any reasonable and workable hypothesis that such a society ever existed can scarcely be founded upon them.

Waite humorously stated that he was not able to trace the eastern progress of the brotherhood further than the Isle of Mauritius, where it is related in an odd manuscript that a certain Comte De Chazal initiated Sigismund Bacstrom into the mysteries of the Rose Cross Order in 1794, but nothing is known about the Comte De Chazal or his character, and it is possible that Bacstrom might have been one of those persons who, in all times and countries, have been willing to purchase problematical honors. Bacstrom's manuscripts attained a new importance later, when they passed into the hands of Frederick Hockley, an important figure in the revival of magic in the nineteenth century in England and who was later concerned with a revival of the Rosicrucian society.

Rosicrucian Theories

Rosicrucianism fit into the stream of Gnosticism that emerged in the Mediterranean basin in the second century and coexisted with Christianity through the centuries. At times, as Manicheanism or as the Cathari, it attained a significant popular following, and in the late middle ages undergirded alchemy. From the Fama and Confession, it is possible to glean some definite ideas of the occult concept of the Rosicrucians. In these documents is included the doctrine of the microcosm, which teaches that man contains the potential of the universe. This is a distinctly Paracelsian belief. There is also the belief of the doctrine of elementary spirits, which many people wrongly think originated with the Rosicrucians, but which was probably reintroduced by Paracelsus.

The manifestos contain the doctrine of the Signatura Rerum, which is also of Paracelsian origin. This is the magic writing referred to in the Fama and the mystical characters of a book of nature, which, according to the Confession, stands open for all eyes but can be read or understood by only a very few. These characters, it is written, are the seal of God imprinted on the wonderful work of creation, on the heavens and Earth, and on all beasts.

It would appear, too, that some form of practical magic was known to the brotherhood. They were also, they said, alchemists, and claimed to have achieved the transmutation of metals and the manufacture of the elixir of life.

Modern Rosicrucianism

The flurry of interest in Rosicrucianism in the century following the initial announcement of the existence of a Rosicrucian Brotherhood was followed in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries by the development of speculative masonry, especially in Scotland, and the inclusion of Rosicrucian degrees amid the mass of others. Such Rosicrucian degrees survive to the present in the eighteenth degree, "the Rose-Croix," of the Ancient and Accepted Rite and the RSYCS degree of the Royal Order of Scotland. However, the first of the modern Rosicrucian organizations was founded around 1861 by Paschal Beverly Randolph (1825–1875). Randolph claimed that in the 1850s he traveled to France, made contact with the Rosicrucian Fraternity, and was named grand master for the Americas of the organization. Unfortunately, no independent record of the Rosicrucians with whom he met was available, and some doubt exists as to from whom he received his commission. What is less in doubt is his founding the First Supreme Grand Lodge of the Rosicrucian Fraternity in San Francisco on November 5, 1861, just as the Civil War was beginning. Shortly thereafter, however, he left on a trip around the world, and then settled in Boston.

Randolph's travel required at least two reorganizations of the fraternity during his lifetime, the second in 1874 in Toledo, Ohio. Following Randolph's death in 1875, he was succeeded by Freeman B. Dowd (1875–1907) and Edward H. Brown (1907–1922). In 1922 Reuben Swinburne Clymer, under whose leadership the order found a stabilized existence, established the present headquarters in rural Pennsylvania near Quakertown. Clymer was eventually succeeded by his son Emerson Clymer. The Rosicrucian Fraternity differs from other Rosicrucian groups in its refusal to advertise or engage in self-promotional activities.

In England the idea of Rosicrucianism was passed through the masonic orders and thereby came to Frederick Hockley. In 1865 a small group of masons founded the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia (RSIA; the Rosicrucian Society of England). (There is some hint of a "Rosicrucian" society having been founded in the 1830s, but its existence is somewhat shadowy.) The RSIA published a small quarterly magazine, beginning in 1868 and continuing through the end of the 1870s, which in an early number stated that the society was "calculated to meet the requirements of those worthy masons who wished to study the science and antiquities of the craft, and trace it through its successive developments to the present time; also to cull information from all the records extant from those mysterious societies which had their existence in the dark ages of the world, when might meant right."

To join, it was necessary to be a mason. The officers of the society consisted of three magi, a master-general for the first and second orders, a deputy master-general, a treasurer, a secretary, and seven ancients. The assisting officers numbered a precentor, organists, torchbearer, herald, and so forth. The society was composed of nine grades or classes. These objects were, however, fulfilled in a very perfunctory manner, if the magazine of the association is any criterion of its work, for this publication was filled with occult serial stories, reports of masonic meetings, and verse. Waite observed (though he seemed to be speaking in heightened hyperbole) that the most notable circumstance connected with this society was the complete ignorance that seemed to have prevailed among its members concerning everything connected with Rosicrucianism.

The prime movers of the association were Robert Wentworth Little, (1840–1878); its first supreme magus, Frederick Hockley; Kenneth Mackenzie, author of The Royal Masonic Cyclopaedia (1877); and Hargrave Jennings, author of the infamous text, The Rosicrucians: Their Rites and Mysteries (1870). A Metropolitan College was founded in London in 1866, and the Soc. Ros. in Scotia about the same time. Other colleges were later formed in the provinces. W. R. Woodman succeeded Little as grand magus in 1878. Mackenzie was named honorary magus and gave many lectures to the society.

In 1891 William Wynn Westcott succeeded Woodman as supreme magus. Three years earlier, Westcott had become one of the founders of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn occult society, whose grade system and rituals drew heavily on Rosicrucian concepts. S. L. MacGregor Mathers, another of the Golden Dawn chiefs, formed a second order known as R.R. et A.C. (Rose of Ruby and Cross of Gold), supposed to be a British branch of a German occult order known as Ordo Roseae Rubrae et Aureae Crucis. The Golden Dawn was regarded as the probationary order of the R.R. et A.C. and the initiation rite dramatized the Rosicrucian legend of Christian Rosenkreutz in his tomb. When executive dissension arose in the Golden Dawn in 1901, member W. B. Yeats privately published a pamphlet titled Is the Order of R.R. et A.C. to Remain a Magical Order?

Meanwhile, in the United States, a set of Rosicrucian orders began to emerge. The first was the Societas Rosicruciana Republicae Americae (now known as the Societas Rosicruciana in Civitatibus Foederatis), established by a set of masons who received their authorization in 1878 from the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, through the college in York. Like its British counterpart, one had to be a mason to join. Out of it grew the Societas Rosicruciana in America, founded in 1907, which opened its doors to non-masons. Founder Sylvester Gould was succeeded by George Winslow Plummer (1876–1944), under whose leadership the society flourished up to World War II. Plummer was succeeded by Stanislaus Witowski (or de Witow). He was succeeded by Gladys Plummer de Witow and more recently, Lucia L. Grosch.

Also based in the Western occult tradition is the Ancient and Mystic Order of the Rosicrucians, popularly known by its acronym, AMORC. AMORC was founded in 1915 by H. Spencer Lewis, and after locating the headquarters in San Jose, California, in the mid-1920s, Lewis built the order into the largest Rosicrucian organization in the world with an aggressive program of advertising and recruitment and a popular correspondence course for members.

Several Rosicrucian groups grew out of the Theosophical Society and the teachings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Rudolf Steiner, an early theosophical leader in German-speaking Europe. Steiner was the leading champion of a Christ-centered approach to Theosophy and promoted Rosicrucian ideals. In 1907 Louis van Grashof, known under his public name, Max Heindel, founded the Rosicrucian Fellow- ship. Heindel had attended Steiner's lectures, and he incorporated Steiner's ideas in his many books. The Rosicrucian Fellowship became an important force in reestablishing astrology in the West in this century. The Rosicrucian Fellowship became the source of several other Rosicrucian groups, including the Lectorium Rosicrucianum, the Rosicrucian Anthroposophical League, and the Ausar Auset Society, unique for its adaptation of Rosicrucian teachings to the needs of the African American community.

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel (1828–1882)

English author and painter Gabriel Charles Dante Rossetti, commonly known as Dante Gabriel Rossetti, was born in London, May 12, 1828. His father was an Italian who had settled in England.

While yet a boy, Rossetti manifested artistic talent, and accordingly was sent to study drawing under John Sell Cotman. Shortly afterward he entered the Royal Academy Schools. In 1848, he commenced working in the studio of Ford Madox Brown, during which time he began to show himself a painter of distinct individuality, while simultaneously he made his first essays in translating Italian literature into English and became known among his friends as a poet of rare promise.

Meanwhile, however, Rossetti was really more interested in painting rather than writing, and soon after leaving Brown's studio he brought about a memorable event in the history of English painting by founding the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, a body consisting of seven members, whose central aim was to render precisely and literally every separate object figured in their pictures. Leaving his father's house in 1849, Rossetti went to live at Chatham Place, Blackfriars Bridge, London, and during the next ten years his activity as a painter was enormous.

The year 1860 was a notable one in his career, as it marked his marriage to Eleanor Siddal. The love between the pair was of an exceptionally passionate order, and from it sprang Rossetti's later sonnet sequence called The House of Life, published in 1881. However, Eleanor died in 1862. The loss of his wife preyed upon him persistently; he was tortured by insomnia and, in consequence, began to take occasional doses of the drug chloral. Gradually this practice developed into a habit, and it soon became evident that his death was imminent unless he gave up his addiction to the drug. He died April 9, 1882, at Birchington, near Margate, and his remains were interred in the cemetery there.

Rossetti had a marked bias for mysticism in various forms. William Bell Scott, in his Autobiographical Notes (2 vols., 1892), told how the poet became at one time much enamored of table-turning. His temperament was undoubtedly a very religious one, and once toward the close of his life he declared that he had "seen and heard those that died long ago."

A belief in the possibility of communicating with the dead may have induced him on his wife's death to have some of his love poems enclosed in her coffin. Whatever the truth of his poems, it is by his painting rather than by his poetry that Rossetti holds a place as a great mystic, for despite his fondness for precise handling, most of his pictures are essentially of a mystical nature. They embody the scenes and incidents beheld in dreams in a manner similar to the work of William Blake.

Rothe, Frau Anna (1850–1907)

German working woman who, after the death of her daughter's fiancé in about 1892, developed mediumship. She constantly saw the deceased seated on the sofa in his accustomed attitude. She saw visions as a child, too, but soon physical phenomena also developed and Rothe soon specialized in apports of flowers and fruits in quantity. Her mediumistic career, however, was a stormy one and finally her fraud led to a sensational trial and a prison sentence.

Camille Flammarion held a séance with Rothe in May 1901, at his own apartment. He wrote:

"During its continuance, bouquets of flowers of all sizes did, in truth, make their appearance, but always from a quarter in the room opposite to that to which our attention was drawn by Frau Rothe and her manager, Max Jentsch.

"Being well-nigh convinced that all was fraud, but not having the time to devote to such sittings, I begged M. Cail to be present, as often as he could, at the meetings which were to be held in different Parisian salons. He gladly consented, and got invited to a séance at the Clément Marot house. Having taken his station a little in the rear of the flower-scattering medium, he saw her adroitly slip one hand beneath her skirt and draw out branches which she tossed into the air."

He also saw her take oranges from her corsage, and ascertained that they were warm.

"The imposture was a glaring one, and he immediately unmasked her, to the great scandal of the assistants, who heaped insults upon him. A final séance had been planned, to be held in my salon on the following Tuesday. But Frau Rothe and her two accomplices took the train at the Eastern Railway station that very morning and we saw them no more."

Charles Richet stated in his book Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923):

"The first time that I saw the surprising performances of Anna Roth, The 'Blumen-medium,' I was dazzled; at a second sitting I was perplexed; at the third I was convinced that the thing was a fraud. I asked Anna Roth to allow a more complete control which would have settled the question. She refused."

The fact on which Richet based his belief in the imposture of Rothe was that he weighed her before the séance and after. The difference was two pounds, exactly the weight of the "apported" flowers. Therefore, he concludes, they must have been secreted about her person.

A serious exposure took place in Germany in 1902, as a result of which Rothe was kept in prison for over a year before the trial and was afterward sentenced to eighteen months imprisonment and a fine of 500 marks. Detectives posing as inquirers found 150 flowers and several oranges and apples in a series of bag-like folds in her petticoat.

At the trial, Judge Georges Sulzer, President of the Zurich High Court of Appeal, stated on oath that Rothe put him in communication with the spirits of his wife and father, who gave information unknown to any mortal. He also declared that the medium produced flowers in quantity in a room flooded with light. They came down slowly from above, and he saw four nebulous points on the hand of the medium condense into bonbons. Altogether forty witnesses, mostly doctors and professors, gave evidence on behalf of the medium. But the presiding judge stated in the sentence:

“The Court cannot allow itself to criticize the spiritistic theory, for it must be acknowledged that science, with the generality of men of culture, declares supernatural manifestations to be impossible.”

In Die Zukunft (April 4, 1903), journalist Maxmilian Harden criticized the sentence,

“Before the conclusion of the testimony one could not but ask: Does this Rothe case, taken as a whole, show the proof-marks of fraud? This question was answered by us in the negative; but the court answered it affirmatively after a short deliberation. The flower medium was condemned to imprisonment for a year and half—a strange transaction, an incomprehensible sentence. The court summons witnesses for the defence—dozens—although the proof-notes show that almost all testify to the same effect. They come, are sworn, and declare almost without exception ‘we feel ourselves in no way injured.’ The most say ‘we are convinced that no false representations were worked off on us by the Rothe woman.’ . . . But the sentence has been pronounced on Frau Rothe in the name of justice.”

Roy, William (1911–1977)

Pseudonym of William George Holroyd Plowright, a notorious mediumistic fraud in British Spiritualist history. He boasted that he had earned £50,000 by cheating the bereaved and others who attended his fraudulent séances. He even made money out of publishing his own confessions. It is to the credit of the British Spiritualist movement that its members took the lead in first exposing Roy.

Born in Cobham, Surrey, England, Roy was boastful and deceptive even at an early age. He was seventeen years old when he married Mary Castle, who owned a nightclub in the Soho area of London’s West End. Mary was the first of many women who were deceived by Roy’s glamorous tall tales.

During the 1930s, his wife died and Roy married again. He set up in business as a professional psychic medium. Roy used ingenious technical devices for fraudulent mediumship and also employed confederates. He concealed a microphone in the séance room and recorded the conversations of sitters before commencement of a séance.

When people wrote to ask if they could attend his séances, Roy researched at the registry of births, deaths, and marriages in order to obtain detailed information about their relatives. When they visited his house for a sitting, they would be asked to leave their bags and coats outside the séance room. These were searched by a confederate for letters, tickets, bills, or other scraps of personal information. All the facts concerning sitters were recorded in a detailed card index system, and cleverly worked into Roy’s “psychic” messages during séances.

Roy also produced “spirit voices” and “materialization” phenomena through use of amplifiers, butter muslin, masks, and tape recorders and microphones in the hands of confederates. One of Roy’s most shameless con tricks was the exploitation of a widow who attended his séances. Through a female accomplice, Roy obtained detailed information about the widow’s dead husband and son, duly relayed to the widow at séances as messages from her loved ones. At the same time, Roy made advances to the widow and claimed that he wanted to marry her as soon as he could obtain a divorce.

During a séance, the widow was given “spirit messages” advising her to offer Roy’s wife £15,000 in return for an arranged divorce. In due course, Roy produced a letter apparently from his wife through a firm of solicitors, giving consent for this arrangement. The letter and the firm of solicitors were both bogus, but the widow paid Roy £15,000, which went into his own pocket, and the pair went away on a “honeymoon.”

Meanwhile Roy’s second wife Dorothy committed suicide. Three weeks after her death, Roy married Mary Rose Halligan. Roy had rich clients and lived in style, with expensive motorcars. He separated from his third wife in 1956.

Meanwhile in August 1955, after almost 20 years of mediumistic trickery, his activity was first exposed by veteran Spiritualist Maurice Barbanell (editor of Psychic News) in an article in the journal Two Worlds. The exposure did not occur until Roy quarreled with his accomplice, who left him and supplied evidence and explained Roy’s methods and apparatus. Roy instituted libel proceedings, but withdrew the action in 1958.

In 1958, Roy unblushingly published his own confessions in the Sunday Pictorial newspaper. But he continued operating as a fake medium, using a new name “Bill Silver.” At the age of 58, Roy bigamously married Ann Clements. He finally died at Hastings, Sussex, suffering from cancer, leaving three children from his various alliances.

Roy’s ingenious apparatus for fake mediumship is now in the care of Scotland Yard, in a museum at the Metropolitan Police Detective Training School. After Roy’s death and twenty years after his original exposure, Barbanell devoted a whole front page of Psychic News (August 13, 1977) to the story of Roy’s frauds, illustrated by photographs of the apparatus and techniques used for fake mediumship.

Royal Priest Research

Royal Priest Research is an Arizona-based company that facilitates the channeling work of Lyssa Royal, one of the more prominent New Age channels to arise in the 1980s. During her college years in the later 1970s, Royal studied self-hypnosis and learned to enter altered states of consciousness for purposes of stress management. In the early 1980s, having completed her degree in psychology, she had a dream in which she was told that she would become a channel. She developed her skills over the next few years and began channeling professionally in 1985. She was one of the first and most successful of the New Age channels to rely primarily on information claimed to be from extraterrestrial sources.

Priest’s early work focused on the contactee and abductee phenomena and resulted in three books, The Prism of Lyra (1989), Visitors from Within? (1992), and Preparing for Contact: A Metamorphosis of Consciousness (1993), all written with Keith Priest, a musician, alternative health therapist, and independent researcher who works with Royal. These books explored the possibilities of human contact with space visitors through telepathic means and were among the first to suggest that the abduction experience was not necessarily negative, but could be used for personal and planetary evolution. Through the 1990s, Royal has become identified with the post-New Age channels operating out of Sedona, Arizona, and her work has frequently appeared in Sedona Journal of Emergence. Also working with Royal Priest Research is Ron Holt, Lyssa’s husband, who has been a leader in the Flower of Life organization headed by Drunvalo Melchizedek.

During the 1990s, Royal and Priest have continued to produce books based upon her channeling work. In 1997 Royal released a book, Millennium, in preparation for the changes she saw coming as the new century began. She offered a more mundane view of the changing times, noting that the millennium was a manmade marker that designates the collective recognition of a milestone in human life. However, she also believes in the post-New Age vision of coming human transformation. She views this as a movement from the third density state to the fourth density state. In the new state, humans will have a higher vibratory rate, will radiate more light, and the illusion of separation from the Divine will come to an end.

Royal Priest Research can be reached at P.O. Box 30973, Phoenix, AZ 85046. It has a website at <http://www.royalpriest.com>. Royal's books have now been translated into a number of languages.

Royce, Josiah (1855–1916)

Philosopher and a founding member of the American Society for Psychical Research. He was born on November 20, 1855, at Grass Valley, California. He studied at University of California (B.A., 1875) and later did graduate work at Johns Hopkins University (Ph.D., 1878) and in Germany at the universities of Leipzig and Göttingen. In 1880 he married Katharine Head.

After his return from Germany he became an instructor in English literature and logic at the University of California. Then in 1882 he joined the Harvard faculty where in 1914 he was named Alford Professor of Religion, Moral Philosophy, and Civil Polity. He authored a number of books and professional papers.

As a prominent modern American philosopher, Royce investigated the problem of the individual self as part of the world mind. In part due to his friendship with William James, he became a founding member of the ASPR in 1884 and served as chairman and vice president of the Committee on Apparitions and Haunting Houses. The committee's name was changed later to Committee on Phantasms and Presentiments; it classified cases sent in from individuals all over the United States and published his report in the first volume of the Proceedings of the ASPR. Royce died September 14, 1916, at Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Rudhyar, Dane (1895–1985)

Musician, painter, poet, novelist, and one of the most important voices redirecting astrology in the twentieth century.

Rudhyar was born in Paris, on March 23, 1895. At age 12 a severe illness and surgery disabled him and he turned to music and intellectual development to compensate for his lack of physical agility. He studied at the Sorbonne, University of Paris (graduating at age 16) and at the Paris Conservatoire. His early ventures into philosophy and association with the artistic community in Paris led to his conviction that all existence is cyclical in character.

His music led him to New York in 1916, where he composed some of the first polytonal music performed in the United States. He also met Sasaki Roshi, one of the early Japanese Zen teachers in America, who led him in the study of Oriental philosophy and occultism. His interest was further stimulated by his association with Theosophy, which began when he was asked to compose music for a production at the society's headquarters in Los Angeles in 1920. Rudhyar became a naturalized citizen of the United States in 1926. He stayed in California (often commuting to New York) through the 1920s and in 1930 married Marla Contento, secretary to independent Theosophist Will Levington Comfort. Comfort introduced Rudhyar to Marc Edmund Jones, who in turn introduced him to astrology.

Rudhyar learned astrology during a period when he was also studying the psychological writings of Carl G. Jung, and he began to think in terms of bringing astrology and Jungian psychology together. The marriage overcame some basic problems of astrology, including its deterministic approach to life and the trouble of designating an agreeable agent to produce the astrological effects. Rudhyar postulated that the stars did not cause the effects seen in human life but were pictures synchronistically aligned to human beings. They detailed psychological forces working in individuals, but did not override human freedom in responding to those forces, he said. At first he called his new interpretation "harmonic astrology" and as the ideas matured renamed it "humanistic astrology," the subject of his monumental volume, The Astrology of Personality, published in 1936. A friend, Alice A. Bailey, encouraged the development of his thought and published his book.

Over the next two decades Rudhyar continued to write and lecture on astrology, but while he was honored within the astrological community he was little known outside of it. It was not until the 1970s, as the New Age movement emerged, that major publishing houses discovered him and began to publish his writings: among the first was The Practice of Astrology, published in 1970 by Penguin Books.

In 1969 Rudhyar founded the International Committee for Humanistic Astrology, a small professional society that would work on the development of his perspective. He began one of the most fruitful periods of his life, turning out several books a year for the next decade. He began to absorb the insights of transpersonal astrology, which concentrated on exploring altered and exalted states of perception, and by the mid-1970s had moved beyond humanistic astrology to what he termed "transpersonal astrology." He also began to reflect upon the New Age movement and wrote several of the more sophisticated volumes on planetary consciousness and New Age philosophy.

He died September 15, 1985, in California.

Ruggles, A. D. (ca. 1853)

Early American Spiritualist medium, the subject of experiments by Prof. Robert Hare. According to testimonies in contemporary periodicals, Ruggles's abilities included xenoglossia, the skill of writing and speaking in foreign languages that one does not understand.

Ruhani Satsang

A major branch of the Radhasoami Satsang spiritual movement of India, stemming from the guru Sawan Singh (1858–1948), a disciple of Baba Jaimal Singh. Central to the teaching is the concept of an inner light and inner sound experienced in meditation. After Kirpal Singh's death in 1974, his son Darshan Singh succeeded him. The Satsang currently operates in the West as the Sawan Kirpal Ruhani Mission.

There is an international headquarters at: Kirpal Ashram, 2 Canal Road, Vijay Nagar, Delhi 11009. In the United States, the mission may be contacted at 8605 Village Way, No. C, Alexandria, VA 22309-1605.

Rumi, Jalal al-Din (1207–1273)

A Sufi poet born in 1207 in Balkh (now Afganistan). He taught the Sufi doctrine that the chief end of life is to emancipate oneself from human thoughts and wishes, human needs, and the outward impressions of the senses, so that one may become a mere mirror for the Deity. So refined an essence does one's mind become that it is as nearly as possible nothing, yet while in this state it can, by a union with the Divine Essence, mysteriously become the All.

In his teachings, Rumi declared that names and words must not be taken for the things they represent:

“Names thou mayest know; go, seek the truth they name Search not the brook, but heaven, for the moon.”

Nature figured largely in the imagery of Rumi's poems. He also used the image of the reed-pipe, which figures largely in the symbolism of the Mevlevi order Sufism, popularly known as the whirling dervishes, which his followers founded after his death in 1273.

Runes

An ancient alphabet found in inscriptions on stone in Scandinavian countries. The runic alphabet belongs to the Germanic group of languages, but is related to Greek and Latin alphabets. The earliest inscriptions were pictured in the hands of the goddess Idun, the keeper of the gods' magic apples of immortality. Dating from the 3rd century C.E., runic inscriptions have been found in areas between the Black Sea and the Baltic (territories occupied by Goths) as well as throughout Scandinavia.

At one point, Odin dies to acquire the runes for humankind, and, as men were expected to imitate his sacrifice, high praise was given to one who died in battle. In place of dying in battle, a Norse warrior might carve the runes on his body and bleed to death, that day thus being marked as a “red-letter day.”

Runes were inscribed on stone monuments to commemorate events and individuals as well as for magical purposes. They were also used on objects like brooches. Typical of runic inscriptions is the writing on an ancient Danish monument which reads: “Rolf raised this stone, priest and chieftain of the Helnaes dwellers, in memory of his brother's son, Gudmund. The men were drowned at sea. Aveir wrote (the runes).” A Norwegian monument indicates that runes were believed to give magical protection: “This is the secret meaning of the runes; I hid here power-runes, undisturbed by evil witchcraft. In exile shall he die by means of magic art who destroys this monument.”

The use of runic inscriptions has been revived in both the modern magical and New Age ideas and activities, and crated a vast contemporary literature. Among the most popular, Ralph Blum has adapted runes for divination purposes. His publications The Book of Runes (1984) and Rune Play (1985) are issued in conjunction with a package of twenty-five runic letters on ceramic counters. These counters are “cast,” rather in the manner of a simplified I Ching system, to give oracular guidance on personal questions and decisions.

The concept of “casting the runes” also occurs in Western magical practice, where spells are inscribed on a slip of paper in runic letters, to be unobtrusively delivered to and accepted by the victim of the spell. This is brilliantly described in the short story Casting the Runes by M. R. James (included in More Ghost Stories of an Antiquary, 1911) in which one character takes a ticket-case belonging to the victim and places the slip of paper with the runic spell on it inside the case. He then hands it to the victim, implying casually that he must have dropped it. The victim recognizes the ticket-case as his own, and gratefully accepts it, so the runes are cast.

Rupa

In theosophical teachings, rupa denotes form, appearance, or the physical body, the most gross of the seven principles of which personality consists. It is a term originating in Hindu philosophy denoting the subtle essence of form. (See also Mayavi-rupa.)

Rusalki

The lovely river nymph of southern Russian legend endowed with human beauty and the gentle characteristics of the Mermaids of northern European nations. Shy and benevolent, she lived on the small alluvial islands that stud the rivers or in the detached coppices of their banks. Her pastime and occupation was to aid in secret the poor fishermen in their laborious and precarious calling.

The rusalki (also spelled “rusalky” or “rusalka”) were believed to have originated with young women who met an untimely death either by suicide, drowning, or murder by strangling or were not buried in holy ground. At times the rusalki would turn on people and kill them, especially young men who would go bathing in the streams without wearing a cross around their necks.

Little is known of these beautiful creatures. Thomas Keightley, a knowledgeable source in the lore of fairies, says little of rusalki in his book The Fairy Mythology (1850) and gives only this brief notice:

“They are of a beautiful form, with long green hair; they swim and balance themselves on the branches of trees, bathe in the lakes and rivers, play on the surface of the water, and wring their locks on the green meads at the water’s edge. It is chiefly at Whitsuntide that they appear; and the people then, singing and dancing, weave garlands for them, which they cast into the stream.”

Rush, J(oseph) H(arold) (1911–)

Physicist and science writer who also studied aspects of parapsychology. He was born on April 17, 1911, at Mount Calm, Texas. He studied at the University of Texas (B.A., 1940; M.A., 1941) and Duke University (Ph.D., 1950). He worked as a physicist and teacher of physics through the 1940s, including work on the development of the atomic bomb during World War II, prior to becoming a physicist at the National Center for Atmospheric Research in Boulder, Colorado, in 1962. He has published a number of papers on astronomy and physics and is author of The Dawn of Life (1958). He was in Boulder at the end of the 1960s when the Condon Committee on UFOs was established and he was invited to participate on it.

Rush’s interest in parapsychology dates to the mid-1930s when he discovered some of the early texts on the subject by J. B. Rhine. His acceptance of parapsychology came in part because of his early experiences of clairvoyance and precognition. He became a charter member of the Parapsychology Association. In the field of parapsychology, he has studied and written about the associative aspects of psi phenomena and the functioning of psi with ordinary sensorimotor activities. He has emerged as a sympathetic critic of the field and claimed that much of parapsychology had been wasted by scientists using inadequate methodologies.

Rushton, W(illiam A(lbert) H(ugh) (1901–1980)

Distinguished British physiologist who also took an active interest in parapsychology, becoming president of the Society for Psychical Research, London, (1969–71). Rushton was born on December 8, 1901. He was educated at Gresham’s, Bolt; Emmanuel College, Cambridge and University College Hospital, London. He joined the faculty at Cambridge University in physiology and taught until 1968 when he moved to Florida State University as the Distinguished Resident Professor in Psychobiology. Following his retirement in 1977 he was named emeritus professor of physiology.

He contributed to the Journal of Physiology and took a special interest in nerve excitation and vision. In the field of psychical research, his expert physiological knowledge stimulated inquiry into the possible mechanisms of ESP. He was critical about false assumptions or unscientific thinking in study of the paranormal, but maintained a keen interest in the subject and believed in the reality of some phenomena. He died June 21, 1980.

Ruskin, John (1819–1900)

Famous British author and critic born in London on February 8, 1819, who owed his belief in survival to Spiritualism. In Pre-Raphaelitism and the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood by W. Holman Hunt (2 vols., 1913) there occurs the following conversation:

“When we last met,” said Holman Hunt to Ruskin, “you declared you had given up all belief in immortality.” “I remember well,” Ruskin replied, “but what has mainly caused the change in my views is the unanswerable evidence of spiritualism. I know there is much vulgar fraud and stupidity connected with it, but underneath there is, I am sure, enough to convince us that there is personal life independent of the body, but with this once proved, I have no further interest in spiritualism.”

Also during one summer in Switzerland Ruskin had a startling experience with a child who saw a ghost that had long been known to haunt a particular spot in the valley of Chamonix. He described the female spirit as having no eyes, but only holes where they were supposed to be.

Ruskin died January 20, 1900.

Russell, Eric Frank (1905–1978)

Prolific science-fiction writer, who based some of his stories on the ideas and data of Charles Fort; British representative of the Fortean Society. Russell was born on January 6, 1905, at Sandhurst, Surrey, England. He spent his early years at military bases abroad before returning to England, where he had a scientific and technical education. In the 1930s he published science-fiction stories, later serving in the Royal Air Force during World War II. He was active in promoting Fortean ideas at a time when Fort's books were little known in Britain and difficult to obtain.

His first major novel Sinister Barrier (1943), published serially in 1939, was built around the Fortean theme "I think we're property," suggesting that the inhabitants of Earth may be controlled by alien entities. His story Three to Conquer (1956) is a science-fiction treatment of the theme of psi powers.

Other Russell books include: Dreadful Sanctuary (1953), Sentinels From Space (1954), Deep Space (1956), Men, Martians & Machines (1956), Wasp (1958), The Space Willies (U.K. title Next of Kin) (1959), Far Stars (1961), The Great Explosion (1962), With a Strange Device (1964), and Somewhere a Voice (1965).

With the decline of the Fortean Society, his enthusiasm waned and during the 1960s he also stopped writing.

Although never officially dissolved, the work of the Fortean Society was later taken over by the International Fortean Organization in North America and the Fortean Times in Great Britain. Russell died February 28, 1978.

Russell, George W(illiam) (1867–1935)

Irish poet, essayist, and mystic, who wrote under the pseudonym "AE." Born April 10, 1867, at Lurgan, County Armagh, Northern Ireland, his family moved to Dublin when he was ten, where he was able to attend Rathmines School. He had a natural talent for painting and attended the Metropolitan School of Art in Dublin, where he met William Butler Yeats, who introduced him to Theosophy. At that time, Russell earned his living by working as a clerk and soon began contributing poems and articles to The Irish Theosophist.

Theosophical teachings and the literature of Hindu philosophy opened his mind to heightened consciousness of Celtic myth and nature spirits. He painted visionary pictures of the Irish landscape.

He felt a strange impulse to call one of his paintings "The Birth of Aeon," a Gnostic concept, and signed one of his articles "AEON." A proof reader rendered this as "AE-?" and thereafter Russell used the initials for his poems. In 1894 he allowed some of his poems to be published as a book, Homeward: Songs of the Way, and the response thrust him to the fore of Ireland's literary community. In 1913 the first edition of his collected poems was published.

He also wrote many political articles and became organizer for the Irish Agriculture Organization, successfully combining his mystical visions with everyday practical tasks, in the spirit of the ancient Hindu scripture, the Bhagavad Gita, a work which greatly impressed him. He edited the Irish Homestead for the Organization from 1906 to 1923. In 1923 he became the editor of the Irish Statesman in which he tried to steer a moderate course for the newly founded Irish Free States. He gave expression to his political idealism in two novels, The Interpreters (1922) and The Avatars (1932).

His major mystical book was The Candle of Vision (1918). His book Song and Its Fountains (1932) developed the mystical meditations of Candle of Vision and spoke of poetry as "oracles breathed from inner to outer being." The Avatars: A Futurist Fantasy (1933) indicated his debt to Hindu philosophy. Russell died July 17, 1935.

RUSSIA

Spiritualism was first introduced in Russia by people who had been introduced to the subject abroad, witnessing manifestations of psychic phenomena and acquaintance with the works of Allan Kardec, the French exponent of Spiritism.

The new doctrine found its followers chiefly among the members of the professions and the aristocracy, finally including the reigning monarch of that time, Alexander II. Members of his family and entourage also became devoted adherents. Because of the immense influence of such converts, the progress of Spiritualism in Russia was made smoother.

Much of the spiritualist propaganda, manifestations, and publications were conducted under various ruses and deceptions such as the circulation of a paper entitled "The Rebus," professedly devoted to innocent rebuses and charades and only incidentally mentioning Spiritualism, the real object of its being.

Among the distinguished devotees of the subject was Prince Wittgenstein, aide-de-camp and trusted friend of Alexander II, who not only avowed his beliefs openly but arranged for various mediums, including D. D. Home, to give séances before the emperor. The Czar was impressed, and, from that time onward he consulted mediums and their prophetic powers as to the advisability of any contemplated change or step in his life.

Another Russian of high position socially and officially was Alexander N. Aksakof, who interested himself in Spiritualism, arranging séances to which he invited the scientific men of the University, editing a paper Psychische Studien, translating into Russian the works of Emanuel Swedenborg and various French, American, and English writers of the same subject, thus becoming a leader in the movement.

Later, with his friends Boutlerof and Wagner, professors respectively of chemistry and zoology at the University of St. Petersburg, he specially commenced a series of séances for the investigation of the phenomena in an experimental manner and a scientific committee was formed under the leadership of Professor Mendeleyef, who afterward issued an adverse report on the matter. This accused the mediums of trickery and their followers of easy credulity and the usual warfare proceeded between the scientific investigators and spiritual enthusiasts.

At the other extreme of the social scale, among the peasantry and uneducated classes generally, the grossest superstition existed, a profound belief in supernatural agencies and cases were often reported in the columns of Russian papers. Stories abounded of wonder-working, obsession and various miraculous happenings, all ascribed to demoniac or angelic influence, or in districts where the inhabitants were still pagan to local deities and witchcraft.

The final years of the Romanov dynasty were dominated by the strange charismatic figure of the monk Rasputin, murdered shortly before the outbreak of the Russian Revolution of 1917. Grigory Yefimovich, was a Siberian peasant who had entered a monastery at 18, but left, married and had 4 children. He became absorbed in a peculiar sect that promoted licentious behavior—"Rasputin" was the nickname he was given because it means, "debauched one." Rasputin entered the royal circle in 1903 in the height of the popularity of the occult among the socially elite. He did not meet the royal family until 1905, but quickly gained favor particularly with the Czarina because he was able to help control the young Alexander's bleeding due to his hemophilia. Evidence suggests that Rasputin engaged his hypnotic prowess to calm the child which resulted in easing the bleeding.

During the same period, Russian philosopher and mystic, Peter Demianovitch Ouspensky, (1878–1947) who was a disciple of Georgi Ivanovitch Gurdijeff in connection with the Theosophy movement of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky began to rise to prominence in small elite circles of Europe. According to Peter Washington in his 1993 book, Madame Blavatsky's Baboon, "The self-taught Ouspensky was tempted more by Luciferian visions of self-transcendence, dreaming of a humanity remade in the image of gods by its own strenuous efforts." Ouspensky was never officially a member of the Theosophical Society, which was banned in Russia until 1908. By 1914 when World War I began and the revolution in Russia became imminent, Ouspensky moved away from Theosophy. He was in an ongoing search to raise consciousness—his own and others—in order to understand why, as was his belief, humans continued to relive past lives, and past mistakes.

In the modern era, especially during the 1960s, there was widespread modern interest in parapsychology in the USSR. Its popularity emerged again after the ultraconservative science of the Stalin era. One of the pioneers in this psychic renaissance was Leonid L. Vasiliev (1891–1966), who helped to establish the first parapsychology laboratory in the Soviet Union, at Leningrad. His book Mysterious Manifestations of the Human Psyche (1959) was published in the United States under the title Mysterious Phenomena of the Human Psyche (University Books, 1965).

One possible stimulus for Soviet interest in extrasensory perception (ESP) was the belief that ESP might have military significance. In 1959, a story was leaked in the French press that the United States Navy had experimented with telepathic communication between the atomic submarine Nautilus and a shore base.

Another surprising Soviet interest was disclosed in the readiness of the authorities to permit lectures and demonstrations by Hindu hatha yogis. This had nothing to do with prerevolutionary bourgeois cults of mysticism, but rather indicated willingness to learn about the alleged paranormal physical feats claimed for yoga. Russians have always placed great importance on physical training and sport. In addition, any system of physical culture that promised unusual feats of endurance or control of automatic nervous functions might also have relevance to the physical stresses involved in space travel.

By 1966 the Soviet Union was financing more than twenty centers for the scientific study of the paranormal, involving an annual budget of around 12 to 20 million rubles ($13 to $21 million). Soviet parapsychologists studied reports of such American psychics as Edgar Cayce, Jeane Dixon, and Ted Serios, as well as the parapsychological research of J. B. Rhine and his colleagues.

Throughout the 1960s, Soviet parapsychologists investigated the phenomena of their own sensitives in such fields as dowsings, psychokinesis, telepathy, psychic healing, and eyeless sight. Soviet individuals such as Nina Kulagina in psychokinesis and Rosa Kuleshova who claimed abilities such as fingertip vision (eyeless sight) became widely known and discussed even outside the Soviet Union.

Perhaps because of such international publicity, Soviet authorities sporadically suppressed information on parapsychological research, while a backlash of dogmatic conservatism impeded parapsychology studies. The essentially practical investigations into paranormal faculties by Soviet scientists did hold out hope through the 1970s that they might achieve a real breakthrough in such fields of study.

In his book Psychic Warfare: Threat or Illusion? (1983), Martin Ebon claims that in the early 1970s the KGB took over extensive parapsychological research to attempt to identify psi particles in order to discover unknown communication channels in living cells for the transfer of information and to conduct follow-up studies on such subjects as hypnosis at a distance. On a popular level, interest has grown in such areas as thoughtography and UFOs.

In the book Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain (1970), Sheila Ostrander and Lynn Schroeder revealed the wide range of Soviet research in parapsychology. Much of their book was based on firsthand interviews and observations during visits to the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries. The book is useful as a record of information on individuals and organizations at the peak of Communist psychic research.

Eyeless Sight and Psychokinesis

Rosa Kuleshova, exponent of fingertip vision or eyeless sight, reportedly suffered from overexposure of her talent and for a time was accused of cheating before her strange abilities were reasserted. Meanwhile, Abram Novemeisky at the Nizhny Tagil Pedagogical Institute in the Urals experimented with graphic arts students; he claimed that one in six individuals could distinguish between two colors by fingertip vision.

Yakov Fishelev of the Sverdlovsk Pedagogical Institute confirmed such findings and also experimented with subjects at the Pyshma school for the blind, starting with fingertip color recognition and then developing the ability to distinguish shapes of letters. S. N. Dobronravov of Sverdlovsk reported that he had found "skin sight" potential in 72 percent of children, mostly between the ages of 7 and 12.

At the Filatov Institute Laboratory of the Physiology of Vision, in Odessa, an experiment was conducted by Dr. Andrei Shevlev. His subject was Vania Dubrovich, an eight-year-old boy blind from early childhood, whose eyes and optical nerves had been removed. Shevlev attached a lens to Vania's forehead, and the boy learned to distinguish degrees of light through the lens. This experiment claimed to open up new possibilities of "skin glasses."

In the field of psychokinesis (PK), the unusual ability of Nina Kulagina to move small objects at a distance without contact was first discovered by L. L. Vasiliev, after Kulagina had demonstrated a talent for "skin vision." Vasiliev found that she could influence a compass needle by holding her hands over it. In further PK tests it was discovered that she could disturb or move objects at a distance. Film records were made demonstrating her PK ability. Among other feats Kulagina apparently changed the flow of sand in an hourglass and made letters appear on photographic paper by mental force. In early reports, her identity was at first hidden under the pseudonym Nelya Mikhailovna.

In March 1988 Kulagina won a libel action against the magazine Man and Law, published by the Soviet Justice Ministry. Two articles by Vyacheslav Strelkov published in the magazine described her as "a swindler and a crook." The Moscow court ruled that Strelkov had no firm evidence on which to base his allegations, and the magazine was ordered to publish an apology. In a subsequent appeal to the Moscow city court, the district court's ruling was upheld: "the articles published by Man and Law besmirch the honor and dignity of Nina Kulagina and . . . it must publish an apology."

Recent Developments

In the freer atmosphere of public debate and expression of opinion arising from the Mikhail Gorbachev policy of glasnost, public support and discussion of psychic matters increased. Psychic healing received much attention, and the healer Barbara Ivanova treated many prominent officials. She has also undertaken distant healing through the telephone.

In the field of dowsing and radiesthesia, Soviet scientists like G. Bogomolov and Nikolai Sochevanov have collected data to support the reality of such phenomena. With recently developed techniques and apparatus, dowsers have been used to locate damaged cables, water pipes, and electrical lines, as well as underground minerals and water. One series of dowsing tests suggested that women dowsers have a higher ability than men. Dowsing and radiesthetic work is now reported as the “biophysical effect.”

Soviet experiments in telepathy are well advanced. Vasiliev studied spontaneous telepathy for nearly 40 years and collected hundreds of circumstantial accounts. In 1967 Yuri Kamensky in Moscow claimed to successfully relayed a telepathic message to Karl Nikolaiev in Leningrad; the message was in a form of Morse code. Other telepathy experiments involved the transmission of emotions, monitored by EEG records. A number of experiments were conducted to ascertain optimum conditions for telepathic transmission, involving a complex of touch, visualization, and thought.

Sometimes a biological sympathy between sender and receiver (heartbeat, brain wave, and similar synchronism) was found to facilitate transmission. Even the influence of high-frequency electromagnetic waves on telepathy was studied, while the neurologist Vladimir Bekhterev experimented with telepathy between human beings and animals.

One development in Soviet parapsychology claiming a significant amount of attention in the 1970s was Kirlian photography, developed by Semyon D. Kirlian and Valentina C. Kirlian, as a method of photographing a corona discharge in human beings and other objects both living and inanimate. It was hoped that an auralike phenomena had been discovered, but the effects reported early in experimentation were later shown to be an effect of differential pressure placed on the film by objects being photographed.

In 1960 the Soviet Academy of Sciences declared that the search for UFOs was “unscientific.” However it seems that reports of UFOs were closely studied, a matter of control of Soviet air space, and some Soviet researchers were prepared to consider the possibility of extraterrestrial intelligences.

Over the past two or three decades, there have been many reports of UFO phenomena from the USSR. On October 9, 1989, the Soviet news agency, TASS, astonished the world by reporting claims that a UFO had landed on the evening of September 27, 1989, in a park at Voronezh, a city of 900,000 inhabitants some three hundred miles southeast of Moscow, and that the UFO occupants had walked about and been seen by many people (cf. Flying Saucer Review, vol. 34, no. 4, 1898).

The practical and scientific investigations of Soviet scientists into every major aspect of the paranormal was in sharp contrast to the more romantic interest of Western countries, where psychics demonstrate for entertainment. The down-to-earth Soviet approach into the how and why of the paranormal appeared to be yielding results with clearly practical applications.

The strong, and long-held folk traditions of the Russian people are expected to emerge as the country re-shapes its identity. In his book, The Russian Challenge and the Year 2000, Russian ex-patriate Alexander Yanov, living in the United States since 1975, discussed the issues facing the country since the fall of the Soviet Empire. He noted that, “Orthodox marxism has been exhausted as an ideological resource for the system, just as the ideology of tsarism was exhausted at the beginning of the twentieth century. Alternative ideological resources are needed to enable the empire to survive a ‘systemic’ crisis.” Published two years before the fall of the Berlin Wall, Yanov’s book offered an interesting perspective while reform was anticipated. As Russians continue to pursue a free, elective government as a commonwealth, political reform will begin to shape other aspects of Russian life, as well. The curiosity that they have demonstrated for centuries regarding the inner workings of their consciousness—throughout artistic, cultural and religious pursuit especially—could evolve dramatically in the area of parapsychology, as well. While continuing in the economically stressed atmosphere of the demise of the USSR and the emergence of the Commonwealth of Independent States, parapsychology has suffered and its future is as yet not discernible. (See also Slavs)

Ruysbroek (or Ruysbrock), Jan van (1293–1381)

Flemish mystic, whose name probably derived from the village of Ruysbroek, near Brussels, where he was born in 1293. As a child he showed distinct religious inclinations and spent his adolescence exploring a wealth of mystical literature. He decided to follow the clerical profession, and in 1317 he was duly ordained. A little later he became vicar of St. Gudule, a parish in Brussels.

During his long term in this capacity he became widely esteemed for his erudition and for his personal piety, while his sermons and even his letters were passed from hand to hand and perused with great admiration by many of his fellow clerics.

He did not court fame nor publicity of any kind, and at the age of sixty he retired to Groenendale, not far from the battlefield of Waterloo, where he founded a monastery. There he lived until his death, devoting himself chiefly to the study and practice of mysticism, and maintaining those charitable actions befitting a monk. Ruysbroek was known to his disciples as “the ecstatic teacher.” As a thinker he was speculative and broad-minded, and indeed was one of those who prefigured the Reformation, the result being that although he won the encomiums of many famous theologians in the age immediately succeeding his, an attempt to beatify him was sternly suppressed.

Ruysbroek wrote a great deal, and at Cologne, in 1552, one of his manuscripts found its way into print with the title, De Naptu svel de Ornatu Nuptiarum Spiritualium, while subsequently a number of his other works were published, notably De Vera Contemplatione and De Septem Gradibus Amoris (Hanover, 1848).

The central tenet of his teaching was that “the soul finds God in its own depths.” But in contradistinction to many other mystics, he did not teach the fusion of the self in God, holding that at the summit of the ascent toward righteousness the soul still preserves its identity. Ruysbroek and his teaching gave rise to many voluminous commentaries throughout the Middle Ages, and he has attracted a number of great writers.

Ruysbroek died in 1381.

Ryerson, Kevin (1953–)

Kevin Ryerson is a contemporary channel who became nationally known due to his association with actress Shirley MacLaine, who wrote about her interaction with him in her international best-seller Out on a Limb (1983). Born in 1953, Ryerson's childhood consisted of a number of psychic experiences, which he came to understand during his teen years in light of his study of occult literature. He joined a study group sponsored by the Association of Research and Enlightenment (ARE), through which he studied the Edgar Cayce materials and learned to meditate. One evening, during a meeting of his ARE study group, Ryerson slipped into a trance, and a voice claiming to be a spirit guide, "John," began to speak through him.

The study group members became fascinated with "John" and with Ryerson's channeling and began to tape the sessions. "John" identified himself as the biblical apostle John and said that he had returned to assist people in the transformational process and make them aware of the Christ within. Ryerson later sought out Richard Ireland, a Spiritualist medium from Phoenix, Arizona, and was eventually licensed as a minister by Ireland's University of Life Church. In 1976 Ryerson became a full-time professional channel.

Ryerson's career has encompassed several projects. In 1979 he met Gurudas, an herbalist and natural healing practitioner. Gurudas taped a number of channeling sessions at which "John" spoke of natural healing processes and substances, which became the basis of a series of books. Early in the 1980s Ryerson met Shirley MacLaine and conducted several channeling sessions with her. The convincing nature of these sessions was quite important to her development, and Ryerson subsequently recreated their meetings for the film version of Out on a Limb (book, 1983; movie, 1987). He has also made several other media appearances, in Poltergeist II, The Magic Boat, and Palooka. Ryerson's character is also featured in MacLaine's books Dancing in the Light (1985) and It's All in the Playing (1987). He allowed himself to be studied by Dr. Jeffrey Mishlove and William Krautz at the Center for Applied Intuition.

Ryerson has his own website at <http://www.kevinryerson.com/>.

Ryzl, Milan (1928–)

Czech biochemist who experimented in the field of parapsychology. Born May 22, 1928, at Prague, Czechoslovakia, he studied at Charles University, Prague (D.Sc., 1952). He became a biochemist at the Institute of Biology of the Czechoslovak Academy of Science, was a charter associate of the Parapsychology Association, and the winner of the 1962 McDougall Award for parapsychology research. He is considered one of the leading authorities on parapsychology in the West.

Ryzl took a special interest in paranormal cognition of subjects under hypnosis, and developed a method by which the ESP of such subjects may be brought under voluntary control. He organized a parapsychology study group in Prague, but later defected from Czechoslovakia and obtained a position as a biochemist at San José College, California. He worked for a time at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University and in 1963 wrote a series of papers with J. G. Pratt. He is credited as being the first person to write on parapsychology in Communist Europe.

Saba

In ancient Irish legend, the wife of Finn Mac Cummal and mother of Oisín. Finn captured her in the form of a fawn while hunting, but noticing that his hounds would not hurt her, he gave her shelter. The next morning he found her transformed into a beautiful woman. She told him that an enchanter had compelled her to take the shape of a fawn, but that her original form would be restored when she reached Dun Allen, where she had just spent the night. Finn made her his wife and ceased for a while from battle and hunting.

Hearing one day that the Northmen's warships were in the Bay of Dublin, he mustered his men and went to fight them. He returned victorious, but found Saba gone. The enchanter, taking advantage of Finn's absence, had appeared to her in the likeness of Finn with his hounds and lured her from the dun. Away from the dun, she became a fawn again.

Sabbats

In modern Neo-Paganism, the sabbats are the eight great festivals of the sacred year. The sabbats follow the ancient festival days that were common throughout Europe, though different cultures poured variant meanings into their celebrations. Over the centuries, as Christianity became the dominant form in the West, ancient pagan worship sites were replaced with churches and the festival days integrated into the Christian liturgical calendar. Many of these older pagan festivals survived in secularized form and many of the practices were reinterpreted by Christians, especially the Yule (winter solstice) practices that became part of the celebration of Christmas.

The eight sabbats are defined by the principal points in the changing relationship of the Sun and the Earth over the year. These points are measured by the easily observable point of the sun's daily emergence on the eastern horizon. Through the spring, as the days grow longer, the sun appears to rise at a point slightly further north each day and then as the days reach their longest, it appears to pause and then start moving south. As the shortest day of the year is reached, it again pauses and starts north. The points of the pauses (the solstices), and half way between them, when the length of the day and night are equal (the equinoxes, formed four easily marked points in the years. They, and the four additional points halfway between them that mark points in the planting and harvest process, became the eight evenly spaced holidays of the ancient world.

During the Middle Ages, the ancient Pagan practices were invoked to supply content with the new understanding of Witchcraft as Satanism advocated by the Inquisition. The sabbats were identified as a time for Witches to gather to worship His Infernal Majesty. That mythology survived in the secularized celebration of Halloween.

In the 1950s, Gerald B. Gardner introduced his modern reconstruction of Witchcraft which drew on ancient Pagan practices mixed with elements of Asian beliefs and practices. It was a nature oriented religion in which the worship of the Goddess was central. Integral to the new Witchcraft were the ancient eight festivals that became times of gathering for the emerging Pagan community. In the Wiccan faith, the years begin on the evening of October 31, Samhain. This day culminated the harvest season, and heralds the coming of winter, a period of waiting until the planting can begin a new food production cycle. It is also a night in which the veil between the living and the dead is thin and communication with spirits is facilitated. It is a time to remember the dead and complete relationships with them.

Seven other sabbats follow:

Yule (December 21)
Imbolc or Candlemas (Feb 1)
Spring equinox
Beltane (May 1)
Summer solstice
Lamas (August 1)
Fall Equinox

These festivals marked important events in agricultural communities, though most modern Pagans are urban dwellers. In the rituals, while some recognition of their past significance is still noted, the sabbats have been reinterpreted as occasions for personal magic and reformation and the veneration of the deities.

As distinct from the eight major Sabbats, witchcraft covens also hold a bi-monthly esbat at each new and full moon. These are the coven's regular meetings for its ongoing magical work and group worship. (See also litanies of the sabbat)

This angel, in the Jewish rabbinical legend of the celestial hierarchies, is assigned the sphere of Saturn. He receives the divine light of the Holy Spirit and communicates it to the dwellers in his kingdom.

Sabellicus, Georgius (ca. 1490)

A magician who lived about the same time as the legendary necromancer Faust, at the end of the fifteenth century. Sabellicus's chief claim to fame as a sorcerer rests on his own wide and arrogant advertisement of his skill in necromancy. He styled himself: "The most accomplished Georgius Sabellicus, a second Faustus, the spring and centre of necromantic art, an astrologer, a magician, consummate in chiromancy, and in agromancy, pyromancy and hydromancy inferior to none that ever lived." However, no proof is forthcoming that he ever substantiated these claims.

Sabian Assembly

Founded in Los Angeles, California, in 1923 by Marc Edmund Jones, the Sabian Assembly is dedicated to the "mastery of self and the world." The object of the assembly was the restoration of the Solar Mysteries.

Jones was a writer and exponent of astrology, and for many years students of the assembly requested him to give spontaneous interpretations of charts without study or prior knowledge of them. Five hundred of these horoscope sessions were tape-recorded and transcribed, and the first volume of The Marc Edmund Jones 500 was published in 1977 by ASI Publishers, Inc. Address: P.O. Sacha Runa

Sacha Runa is the name of a section of the Amazonian Rain Forest at the upper reaches of the Madeira River in northern Bolivia. It is an area where shamans still function as religious functionaries for the residents. The Sacha Runa people describe themselves as the people who know how to live on the Earth and who are descended from ancestors in ancient times.

Stepping into this ancient culture is Bolivian spiritual seeker/guide Miguel A. Kavlin. Kavlin grew up in Bolivia but moved to the United States when he was 17, where he resided for a time amid the ancient Anazazi site in the Southwest. At a gathering of Sun Dance followers he met Beautiful Painted Arrow, a Ute painter and visionary with whom he began to study. He moved on to complete his graduate studies in anthropology and philosophy. He also studied martial arts and traditional Chinese medicine.

In 1987, Kavlin went to Peru, where in the rain forest near Iquitos, he met and became a student of Don Agustin Rivas Vazques. He eventually was authorized by Don Agustin to conduct rituals outside of Peru, and in 1989, Kavlin began to take people to Peru to meet with Don Agustin. In the early 1990s, he returned to his homeland where he met two Bolivian shamans, Don Hector Aguanari and Don Jose Coral, and began studying with them. In 1996, Kavlin built what he termed a Peace Chamber, an underground ceremonial space for people to use and dedicated to instilling in all who come to it a heart of peace.

All of the people and events in Kavlin's life have subsequently come together in Sacha Runa Productions, the organization through which he brings people to Peru and Bolivia to meet with his teachers and to experience the shamanistic culture. Integral to that culture is the production and use of ayahuasca, a brew made from locally grown plants that have a psychedelic effect upon those who consume them.

Kavlin sees the meeting of modern Westerners with indigenous leaders as a tool in assisting them in reconnecting with the life-giving forces of the universe. It empowers them to become their own teacher as they realize their own self-knowledge and reach a point of self-realization. Self-realized people will, Kavlin believes, become pillars of the next generation and real caretakers within the culture.

Sai Baba (ca. 1856–1918)

Indian spiritual teacher and mystic who, like the celebrated spiritual poet Kabir, was accepted equally by both Hindus and Moslems. Little is known of his early life. It is believed that he was born into a Brahmin family in Hyderabad State, left home at an early age to follow a Moslem fakir, and on the death of his teacher became attached to a Hindu guru whom he called “Venkusa.” Even these details are uncertain, however, since there was a profound symbolism attached to all the utterances of Sai Baba.

It is known that in 1872 he appeared as a lad of 16 in the village of Shirdi, in the Ahmadnagar district of Bombay. He first attempted to settle at a small Hindu temple but was asked to go to a half-ruined mosque nearby.

He made his home at the mud-walled mosque, where he kept an oil lamp burning and occasionally smoked a clay pipe. He muttered to himself and performed such strange secret rites as emptying and refilling water pots, regarded by devotees as symbolic gestures relating to divine grace. His actions and instructions were unconventional and erratic but often culminated in a great many extraordinary miracles and an outpouring of divine grace. His following grew among both Hindus and Moslems.

In 1886, almost as a rehearsal for death, he told a devotee that he was going to Allah and that his body should be preserved carefully for three days against a possible return. His heart stopped beating, his breathing ceased, and local authorities pronounced him dead. On the third day he opened his eyes and started breathing again.

Sai Baba died October 15, 1918, and was buried in a Hindu shrine. Since his death, the miracle-working guru Satya Sai Baba has been regarded by many devotees as a reincarnation of Sai Baba.

Saintes Maries de la Mer

A small village in the Camargue, France, on the shores of the Mediterranean, where every year, about the 24th and 25th of May, gypsies congregate to celebrate the feast day of their patron saint Sara. Sara, seemingly a survival of the Indian deity Kali, has been tied to Christian folklore in a story of the three Marys of the Christian New Testament traveling to France. Upon their arrival they were met and assisted by Sara. Like Kali, Sara is pictured with black skin. The Gypsies gather to keep a vigil before the statue that has been set up in the basement of the church.

Saint Germain, Comte de (ca. 1710–ca. 1780)

One of the most celebrated mystic adventurers in history. Like Cagliostro and others of his kind, little is known concerning Saint Germain's origin, but there is reason to believe that he was a Portuguese Jew. There were claims that he was of royal birth, but these have never been substantiated.

It is fairly certain that he was an accomplished spy, for he resided at many European courts, spoke and wrote various languages, including Greek, Latin, Sanskrit, Arabic, Chinese, French, German, English, Italian, Portuguese, and Spanish, and was even sent upon diplomatic missions by Louis XV. Horace Walpole mentioned him being in London about 1743 and being arrested as a Jacobite spy, but later being released.

Walpole wrote: “He is called an Italian, a Spaniard, a Pole, a somebody who married a great fortune in Mexico and ran away with her jewels to Constantinople, a priest, a fiddler, a vast nobleman. The Prince of Wales has had unsatiated curiosity about him, but in vain. However, nothing has been made out against him; he is released, and, what convinces me he is not a gentleman, stays here, and talks of his being taken up as a spy.”

Saint Germain claimed to have lived for centuries and to have known Solomon, the Queen of Sheba, and many other persons of antiquity. Although regarded as a charlatan, the accomplishments upon which he based his reputation were in many ways real and considerable. He was alluded to by Baron Friedrich Melchior Grimm as the most capable and able man he had ever known. He was a composer of music and a capable performer on the violin.

This was especially the case regarding chemistry (or alchemy), a science in which he was certainly adept. He claimed to have a secret for removing the flaws from diamonds, to be able to transmute metals, and to possess the secret of the elixir of life.

Five years after this London experience, Saint Germain attached himself to the court of Louis XV, where he exercised considerable influence over the monarch and was employed on several secret missions. He was much sought after and discussed, since at this time Europe was fascinated by the occult, and Saint Germain combined mystical conversation with a pleasing, flippant character, he was extremely popular. But he ruined his chances at the French court by interfering in a dispute between Austria and France, and he was forced to leave for England.

He resided in London for one or two years, but in 1762 was in St. Petersburg, where he is said to have assisted in the conspiracy that placed Catherine II on the Russian throne. After this he traveled in Germany, where he was reported in the Memoirs of Cagliostro to have become the founder of Freemasonry, and to have initiated Cagliostro into that rite. If Cagliostro's account can be credited, Saint Germain set about the business with remarkable splendor and bombast, posing as a “deity” and behaving in a manner calculated to delight pseudo-mystics of the age.

Saint Germain died at Schleswig, Germany, somewhere between the years 1780 and 1785, but the exact date of his death and its circumstances are unknown.

Assessing Saint Germain's Career

It would be difficult to say whether Saint Germain really possessed genuine occult power. A great many people of his own time thoroughly believed in him, but we must also remember the credulous nature of the age in which he flourished. It has been said that eighteenth-century Europe was skeptical regarding everything except occultism and its professors.

Saint Germain possessed a magnificent collection of precious stones, which some considered to be artificial, but others believed to be genuine. He presented Louis XV with a diamond worth 10,000 livres (a livre is an old French monetary unit).

All sorts of stories were in circulation concerning Saint Germain. One old lady professed to have encountered him at Venice fifty years before, posing as a man of sixty, and even his valet was supposed to have discovered the secret of immortality. On one occasion a visitor teased this man, asking if he had been present at the marriage of Cana in Galilee. “You forget, sir,” was the reply, “I have only been in the Comte's service a century.”

Legend has it that Saint Germain made various appearances after his death. He is said to have appeared to Marie Antoinette and to other individuals during the French Revolution. He was also believed to have been one of the Rosicrucians, from whom he obtained his occult knowledge.

The deathless count was also resurrected in modern times by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky as one of the masters of the Great White Brotherhood, and he thus became an important figure in all of the more than a hundred theosophical splinter groups now active. Guy W. Ballard claimed that Saint Germain had appeared to him at Mt. Shasta, California, and from Saint Germain's teachings, Ballard built the I Am Movement. The centrality of Saint Germain has been common to all “I Am”- related groups such as the Bridge to Spiritual Freedom and the Church Universal and Triumphant. Within the New Age movement, a number of psychics have emerged channeling an entity called Saint Germain. In the 1970s, author Chelsea Quinn Yarbro drew on the Saint Germain story to begin production of a series of novels and short stories that describe the mysterious count as a vampire. The novels helped begin the current popular interest in the vampire as hero.

Saint-Jacques, R. P. de

A monk of the seventeenth century, who published a book entitled Lumière aux vivants par l'expérience des morts, ou diverses apparitions des âmes du Purgatoire (Light to the living by the experiences of the dead, or divers apparitions of souls from purgatory) in Lyons in 1675.

Saint-Martin, Louis Claude de (1743–1803)

French mystic and philosopher, commonly known as “le philosophe inconnu” (the unknown philosopher), the pseudonym under which his books were published. The name of Louis de Saint-Martin is a familiar one, which is partly due to his having been a voluminous author, and partly due to his being virtually the founder of a sect, the Martinistes. Literary critic Augustin Sainte-Beuve wrote about him in his Causeries du Lundi. Saint-Martin was born on January 18, 1743, at Amboise. He came from a family of some wealth, but his mother died while he was a child. Fortunately his stepmother, besides lavishing a wealth of affection on him, early discerned his rare intellectual gifts and made every effort to nurture them.

The boy was educated at the Collège de Pontlevoy, where he read with interest numerous books of a mystical order. One that impressed him particularly was Jacques Abbadie's Art de se connaître soi-même (1692). At first he intended to make law his profession, but he soon decided on a military career instead and accordingly entered the army. A little before taking this step, he affiliated himself with the Freemasons, and when his regiment was sent to the garrison at Bordeaux, he became intimate with certain mystical rites that Martines de Pasqually had introduced into the masonic lodge there. His immersion in the philosophy of Pasqually, who became his teacher, and the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg alienated him from regimental life, and thus, in 1771, he resigned his commission, determined to devote the rest of his life to philosophical speculations.

He then began writing a book Des Erreurs et de la Vérité, ou les Hommes rappelés au Principe de la Science, which was published in 1775 at Edinburgh, Scotland, at this time a center of literary activity. This initial work by Saint-Martin was brought to the notice of Voltaire, the old cynic observing shrewdly that half a dozen folio volumes might well be devoted to the topic of erreurs, but that a page would suffice for the treatment of vérité!

The next years were spent in travel to England, Italy, and Germany (where an interest in the teachings of the mystic Jakob Boehme would eventually lead to his translating a number of the German mystic's writings into French). He never married, but he appears to have exercised a most extraordinary fascination over women, and in fact various scandalous stories were told, some of them implicating various courtly women of the French nobility.

Upon returning to France, he found his outlook suddenly changed. The revolution had broken out in 1789, and a reign of terror had set in. No one was safe. Saint-Martin was arrested in Paris simply because he was a gentleman by birth, but he was saved by his affiliation with the Freemasons. He resumed writing, and in 1792 he issued a new book, Le Nouvel Homme. Two years later he was commissioned to go to his native Amboise, inspect the archives and libraries of the monasteries in that region, and draw up occasional reports on the subject.

Shortly afterward, he was appointed an élève professeur at the École Normale in Paris, in consequence of which he now made his home in that city. He became acquainted there with Chateaubriand, of whose writing Saint-Martin was an enthusiastic devotee, but who appears to have received the mystic with his usual haughty coldness.

Saint-Martin had a large circle of admirers, and he continued to work hard, publishing in 1795 one of his most important books, Lettres à un Ami, ou Considérations politiques, philosophiques et religieuses sur la Révolution, which was succeeded in 1800 by two speculative treatises: Ecce Homo and L'Esprit des Choses. What proved to be his final volume appeared in 1802 as Ministère de l'Homme Esprit. In the following year his labors were brought to an abrupt close, for while staying at Annay, not far from Paris, with a friend, he succumbed to an apoplectic seizure, and died October 23, 1803. After his death it was found that he had left a considerable mass of manuscripts, and some of these were issued by his executors in 1807. In 1862 a collection of his letters appeared.

Martinism

As a philosopher, Saint-Martin found a host of disciples among his contemporaries, who gradually formed themselves into a cult and took the name of their teacher. His teachings are best summarized in his latter volumes L'Homme du Désir (1790) and Tableau naturel des Rapports qui existent entre Dieu, et l'Homme et l'Univers (1782).

He suggests that human beings are divine, despite the fall recounted in the Hebrew/Christian scriptures. Dormant within lies a lofty quality of which we are too often scarcely conscious, and it is incumbent on us to develop this quality, striving without ceasing and avoiding the snares of materialism. This life-style is exemplified by a life of occult striving. This basic perspective is common to the Gnostic writings of the Rosicrucians, past and contemporary theosophists, and ritual magicians. In writing in this vein, Saint-Martin owed a good deal to Freemasonry, Swedenborg, and Boehme. Saint-Martin also developed a system of numerical correspondences that are easily adapted to gematria.

Saint-Martin's teaching found their greatest response, as might be expected, in French-speaking areas and the lack of English translations of his works limited his influence in a large part of the world. Martinist themes, however, permeated the occult revival of the nineteenth century and can be seen in both the writings of Éliphas Lévi and the teachings of the Gnostic churches that began to appear toward the end of the century. Gérard Encausse, who authored numerous occult texts, emerged as the primary Martinist interpreter to the next generation. In England, Arthur E. Waite developed a great appreciation for Saint-Martin and tried to make his work known to his contemporaries in the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Waite wrote three separate titles about Saint-Martin, and for the first he received an honorary doctorate from the École Hermetique, an indication of esteem from Encausse and the French Martinists. Saint-Martin's ideas spread to Haiti and from there entered the United States, where a new Martinist thrust emerged in the late twentieth century in the person of Michael Bertieaux, a thelemic magician residing in Chicago.

Salagrama

A stone credited with possessing magical properties and worn in parts of India as an amulet. This stone is black in color, about the size of a billiard ball, and pierced with holes. It is actually a fossilized ammonite, and it is valued according to the number of its spirals and holes. It is said that it is found in the Gandaki, a river in Nepal, which some, depending upon their theological perspective, believe rises at either the foot of Vishnu or the head of Siva. The stone is kept in a clean cloth and often washed and perfumed by its fortunate owner.

The water in which it has been dipped is supposed to gain the power to expel evil and is therefore drunk and greatly valued. This water possesses other occult powers, and it is a necessary ingredient of the preparations for those about to die. The departing Hindu holds it in his hand and, believing in its powers, has hope for the future and dies peacefully.

Salamander's Feather

Another name for asbestos. It is an incombustible mineral that resembles flax, being of fine fibrous texture. It was used by pagans in their temples.

He was born on September 3, 1902, at Kempton, Germany and did his college work at the University of Munich (Ph.D., 1924; M.D., 1926). He was a lecturer in anthropology and anatomy at the Universities of Kiel and Göttingen but was dismissed in 1935 for opposing Nazi racial doctrines. He entered private medical practice and became the sanatorium physician at Badenweiler (1936–39) and served in the German Army during World War II. After the war he became director of the Robert Bosch Hospital, Stuttgart (1945–48), but was able to return to teaching as a professor of anthropology and genetics at the University of Munich in 1948. Salter, Helen Woollgar de Gaudrion Verrall (1883–1959)

Daughter of medium Margaret Verrall. Salter developed the faculty of automatic writing and was a prominent member of the Society for Psychical Research, London. She was an assistant research officer (1910–16), research officer (1916–21), a member of the council (1921–57), vice president (1953–57), editor of the Journal of the SPR (1921–29), and for many years editor of the Proceedings (1921–46, 1948–54). She was born July 4, 1883, in Cambridge, England, and was educated at Newnham College, Cambridge University (M.A., 1906). In 1915 she married William Henry Salter, president of the SPR.

Some of her automatic writing scripts form part of the important "cross-correspondence" project, which involved piecing together a number of scripts from different communicators that were meaningful only as a whole. Salter also participated in various telepathy experiments. She wrote a number of articles for the SPR's publications and interpreted the SPR for American colleagues. She died April 22, 1959.

Salter, W(illiam) H(enry) (1880–1970)

British lawyer who was president of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He was born on March 19, 1880, in London, England. He was educated at St. Paul's School, London and Trinity College, Cambridge University (M.A., LL.B.). In 1915 he married Helen Woollgar de Gaudrion Verrall, the daughter of medium Margaret Verrall. Helen Salter, who actually introduced her husband to psychical research, became an important officer at the SPR and even served a term as vice president.

Salter served with the Ministry of Munitions during World War II (1916–21) and was awarded the Member of the British Empire in 1918. He joined the SPR in 1916, and was honorary treasurer (1920–31), honorary secretary (1924–48), and president (1967–68). Salter participated in a number of experiments and became an authority on the subject of automatic writing. He was also interested in telepathy, apparitions, mediumship, and the evidence for survival. Helen Salter, above and beyond her work for the society, was well-known for her automatic writing and took part in the famous “cross-correspondence” tests. After his death in 1970, William Salter left a series of papers concerned with these correspondences and his reminiscences of life at the SPR at Trinity College, Cambridge, with instructions that they were not to be opened until 1995 and 1996 respectively.

Saltmarsh, H. F. (1881–1943)

Shipping agent who became a prominent member of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He was born in London on July 16, 1881. His business career was interrupted by ill health, and in his early retirement he became interested in theosophical literature and philosophy, which eventually led him to psychical research. He joined the SPR in 1921 and served on the council for more than a decade (1931–43). Saltmarsh organized sittings with the medium Mrs. Warren Elliott, which were reported in the Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 39; parts 112, 114; 1930) and made a special study of “cross-correspondence” tests. He also classified evidence for precognition and survival. He died February 24, 1943.

Sambor, S. F. (d. 1902)

A Russian telegraph operator who was discovered and promoted as a powerful materialization and telekinesis medium. A series of his sittings between 1896 and 1902 was recorded in the Russian Spiritualist journal Rebus. Phantoms materialized from luminous vapor before the sitters and were seen together with the medium. Telekinetic phenomena were produced in abundance. Many of the experiments were conducted by Count Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo. However, the count's belief in Sambor's phenomena was considerably shaken when he discovered that one of the sitters, an accomplice, intentionally released Sambor's hand when he was supposed to be holding it.

This discovery of fraud offered a convenient general explanation for the movement of objects although not for the action of a white mandolin (as reported by Mme. Youdenitch in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques, vol. 14, 1904, p. 193), which began to play in the adjoining room and, visible in the faint light, was seen to come in and settle on the table in the séance room.

Neither Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo nor Youdenitch (who were far from trained observers) could explain the phenomena of a white column rising from the floor and turning into a human form in good light. Some other phenomena, for instance, the threading of a chair on the medium's or on a sitter's arm while all hands were held in a chain, were also difficult to explain. Such events were observed on several occasions, in conditions which caused Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo to observe in the Annales des Sciences Psychique “. . . if they do not absolutely eliminate all possibility of error, render it improbable to a degree which almost amounts to absolute certainty.” Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo also heard sounds from a piano after the lid had been locked with a key that remained on the table in the midst of the experimenters. Sambor died a few months after the séances in 1902.

Sanders, Alex(ander) (1926–1988)

Known as “the King of the Witches,” a title he gave himself during the early years of the Gardnerian Neo-Pagan Revival in the 1960s, Alexander Sanders became the originating point for a number of witchcraft covens that in acknowledgment of his leadership called themselves Alexandrian. In light of the revelations concerning the origins of modern Wicca, few Alexandrian covens now remain.

Sanders was born in Manchester, England, the son of a music hall entertainer. According to a story he told in the 1970s, when he was seven years old he discovered his grandmother in the kitchen performing a magic ritual. She was completely naked. She confided in him that she was a witch, and she initiated the young Alex then and there. She subsequently gave him a Book of Shadows, which he copied and from which he learned his magic rites. He held a number of jobs over his young adult years and became involved in ritual magic and even Satanism. In the 1960s he formed his first coven and began to initiate people into witchcraft.

In fact, Sanders encountered one of the covens of Gerald B. Gardner in the 1960s. From it he attained an initiation into the craft and a copy of Gardner's rituals. He eventually left that coven and began his own group independently. His version of witchcraft differed little from that of Gardner and included all of his distinctives.

About this same time he met Maxine Morris, a young woman some twenty years his junior. He married her and made her his high priestess. They were discovered by the media in 1969, the same year June Johns's fictionalized biography of Sanders appeared. Over the next decade he, Maxine, and their coven were the subject of numerous magazine and newspaper articles, most frequently appearing in the nude and occasionally while engaged in symbolic sexual acts.

In 1971 Sanders and Maxine separated, and he largely retired. Interestingly, that same year, a book, What Witches Do, by Stewart Farrar, a close associate of Sanders, appeared and gave Sanders his most lasting fame as a Wiccan leader. Farrar and his wife Janet moved to Ireland where they became Wiccan leaders in their own right and together wrote a number of authoritative books on Wicca.

Sanders died April 30, 1988, from lung cancer. His movement spread around the English-speaking world during the 1970s, but following the revelations of his unacknowledged use of Gardner's rituals and his plagiarizing of material from Éliphas Lévi and Franz Bardon, most of the covens that had identified themselves as Alexandrian dropped any relationship with him.

Sanders, C. B. (1831– ?)

A Presbyterian minister of Alabama, a sleeping preacher, who became subject to attacks over a 22 year period (1854–1876), during which a secondary personality, assuming the title of “ $X + Y = Z$,” developed and exhibited startling powers of telepathy and clairvoyance. His story is told in the book $X + Y = Z$; or the Sleeping Preacher of North Alabama (1876). It appears that the secondary personality had command over the memories of the normal self whereas the primary consciousness remained ignorant of the doings of “ $X + Y = Z$.” There are twelve cases on record in which this mysterious secondary personality found lost objects, money, or jewelry; he could shoot ducks at night that were invisible to his companions; and he could write letters and sermons with his hand completely concealed under the bedcloth. A review of the case was published by Walter Franklin Prince in the Bulletin of the Boston Society for Psychical Research.

Noted American trance medium. Reports on her trance phenomena were published by James H. Hyslop in Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 15, 1921) and by Walter Franklin Prince in Proceedings of American Society for Psychical Research (vol. 18, 1924).

Sanderson, Ivan T(erence) (1911–1973)

Scottish-born naturalist, traveler, collector and exhibitor of rare animals, radio and television commentator, and author. In addition to his many books on nature, travel, and zoology, Sanderson also had special interest in such anomalous mysteries as the Abominable Snowman, the Loch Ness Monster, and UFOs. In 1965 he founded the Society for the Investigation of the Unexplained.

Sanderson was born on January 30, 1911, in Edinburgh, Scotland, the son of Arthur Buchanan, a famous whisky manufacturer who also founded the first game reserve in Kenya, East Africa. He was educated at Eton College (1924–27), Trinity College, Cambridge (1930–32), and the University of London (1933–34). He started collecting animals in 1924 and traveled around the world collecting for the British Museum (1927–29). He also led the Percy Sladen Expedition to Cameron, West Africa for the British Museum, the Royal Society of London, and other institutions (1932–33). Through the 1930s he traveled widely, exploring and collecting animals, a career cut short by World War II. He served in British Naval Intelligence (1940–45) and finished the war with the rank of commander. He continued in intelligence work with the British government through 1957.

He moved to the United States in the 1950s and became a regular on television shows as a naturalist spreading knowledge about the world's animals. He also edited books and wrote widely on animals and his favorite hobby, Fortean (the study of bizarre phenomena, named for Charles Fort.) Through the last two decades of his life he averaged more than a book a year. His books were commonly illustrated with photographs he had taken on his world tours. His Fortean interests become widely known after the publication of his memorable book on the Abominable Snowman in 1961. It was followed by a series of volumes on Fortean topics.

Sanderson died on February 19, 1973. His Society for the Investigation of the Unexplained continued his work into the 1980s, collecting data and maintaining the library he had assembled.

Sandwich, The Earl of (Edward George Henry Montague) (1839–1916)

British baron who, in the later years of a life spent in diplomatic service, was prominent before the public because he claimed to be able to cure both organic diseases and functional derangement by prayer and the laying on of hands. In June 1912 he testified before the clerical and medical committee of inquiry into spiritual, faith, and mental healing, over which the Dean of Westminster presided, that his power was a divine gift that he was unable to explain. He never accepted money for his services.

Accounts of many of his cases, with letters of gratitude, are published in his autobiography.

Santa Maria

Santa Maria, California, is the site of a set of apparitions of the Virgin Mary to Barbara Matthias that began on March 24, 1990. Santa Maria, a town on California's central coast, had been the site since 1970 of several active charismatic prayer groups. Within the groups, charismatic gifts, especially spiritual healing and prophecy, had been common. Several members of the groups periodically received locutions, direct communications via telepathy, from Jesus. In the 1980s these groups had become a center of Marian piety and many had received with enthusiasm the news of the apparitions that were occurring at Medjugorje, in Yugoslavia (Bosnia). Eventually, a prayer group centered on the Medjugorje events would arise.

In 1987, a young couple, Charlie and Carol Nole, attended a Holy Spirit seminar, a class to introduce the idea of the range of charismatic spiritual gifts (as mentioned in the Bible in 1 Corinthians 12) to new members of the charismatic prayer groups. The following year, on March 24, 1988, Carol began receiving locutions from the Virgin Mary. She was subsequently told to place a cross on a hill north of Santa Maria and given instructions as to its size and exact location. The project to place a cross on the hill was tied to the message of peace from the visionaries in Medjugorje and Santa Maria was designated a "City of Peace." In September the prayer group that the Noles attended was finally informed of the messages that Carol had been receiving and plans were made to publish them. A booklet, "A Cross Will Be Built. . .," was released in March of 1989. A movement grew up around the crusade to place a cross on the designated hill, but was blocked as the site was on private land and the owner had indicated his unwillingness to cooperate with the project. Groups began to gather on the highway right away near the hill, and their daily prayer meetings became a matter of media interest. Media coverage attracted visitors from across California, among them Barbara Matthias.

Matthias reported that the Virgin had appeared to her as Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception, a popular image in Roman Catholic circles since the apparitions at Lourdes. After the first few apparitions, Mary began to appear daily, usually in the later afternoon. Matthias would enter a trance-like state and stay in that state for several hours, on occasion approaching six hours. Crowds gathered in the afternoon and often stayed late into the evening. Many reported various unusual phenomena, including a dancing sun, the well-known miracle that so many had seen the day of the last apparitions at Fatima. However, no general miracles such as those that occurred at Fatima were reported. The attention to the apparitions completely overwhelmed the movement to erect the cross on the still-inaccessible hill.

On March 29, 1990, Mgr. John H. Rohde, Matthias' spiritual director, expressed some doubts about the apparitions. As a result, the public apparitions ceased in May of 1990, but Matthias continued to receive daily apparitions privately. In 1991, a request was made for an investigation of Matthias by the Diocese of Monterey. An agreement to proceed was reached in June of 1991. In October of 1991 she went to Berkeley, California, and underwent the first of a series of tests that would be conducted over the period of a year. These ruled out a number of alternative explanations for her apparitions, and Mgr. Rohde announced that all of his questions had been favorably resolved.

While the diocese has yet to rule on the apparitions to Matthias, in 1993 a book was published that recounted the history of the apparitions, summarized the testings, and offered the opinions of various people, including Fr. René Laurentin, the famous French Mariologist. While public apparitions have not resumed, a group of people in Santa Maria now circulate the messages received and are attempting to implement the admonitions contained therein, much of which is directed to the Catholic community of the region.

Santo Daime

Santo Daime is a new religion founded in Brazil at the beginning of the twentieth century when Raimundo Irineu Serra was introduced to the use of a powerful hallucinogenic brew called ayahuasca while in the upper Amazon. The drug is made from boiling the vine Banisteriopsis Caapi in water along with various other plants. The resultant mixture contains several psychedelic substances that produce a unique ecstatic experience that has been compared to that produced by peyote. In the case of Maestre Irineu, as he is called by those affiliated with the movement, his use of ayahuasca was accompanied by an apparition of the Virgin Mary in which she began to expound the doctrine of what would become the Santo Daime religion. Mary appeared as Our Lady of Conceição and opened the way for viewing Christian teachings through the new experience.

Soon after his initial experience Maestre Irineu received the text of new songs that now comprise a hymnal for the movement. He also received the movements to three dances, each with very simple steps, that are used to accentuate the flow of divine energy. Additional hymns have been received through the years and as the group has spread to other countries, new hymns in languages other than Portuguese have begun to be received and accepted for use in the rituals.

Santo Daime rituals begin with the separation of the men and women into two groups in the meeting hall. Two lines are formed and the ayahuasca is received. Then the hymns are sung and dancing begins. Different songs have different purposes (healing, communicating with spirits, celebration). Additional sips of the sacramental substance are handed out every few hours. The ceremony may last as long as eight to twelve hours.

Maestre Irineu was succeeded by Padrinho Sabastiao de Melo, who was in turn succeeded by his son, Padrinho Alfredo Gregório de Melo, the present international leader. A second smaller group is headed by Padrinho Alfredo's brother, Paulo Roberto de Melo. The larger group was incorporated in Brazil in 1974 as the Eclectic Center of the Universal Flowing Light, the term "Eclectic" referring to the mixing of Christian and traditional beliefs within the church. It is headed by a spiritual council, and headquartered at Céu do Mapiá, a community created by Padrinho Sabastiao de Melo. Céu de Mapiá is located in the jungle on the Purus River, a tributary of the Amazon River. The branch of the movement led by Paulo Roberto has established centers in Hawaii, California, and the Netherlands.

Santoliquido, Rocco (1854–ca. 1930)

Italian scientist and Italy's director general of Public Health who became the first president of the Institut Métapsychique International, which was founded in 1919 in Paris by Jean Meyer on the initiative of Santoliquido and Gustav Geley.

Santoliquido's first experience in psychical research took place in 1906 in his own home. The table rapped out messages in the presence of his niece, "Louise." He soon became convinced that the information furnished could not have been acquired normally. Among the messages was one directed to him: "Instead of criticising my experiments you ought to be working on your report which is not yet finished." Santoliquido believed that the report had been posted, but found out that owing to the negligence of an employee, it was still in his office. He published a pamphlet on these experiments under the title Observation d'un cas de médiumnité intellectuel.

During World War I his international hygienic activities obliged him to reside in Paris. He became acquainted with Gustav Geley and took him on as a secretary. They often discussed the problems of psychical research. Santoliquido found the rich and generous Jean Meyer to endow a research facility, and in 1918 Meyer founded the Institut Métapsychique International in Paris, following up on Santoliquido's and Geley's initiative. Santoliquido remained its president for ten years and was then elected honorary president.

To provide permanent headquarters for international psychical congresses and research, he founded another center in Geneva with a provisional committee consisting of Hans Driesch, Dr. Young, Professor Grandjean and Eugen Osty. This Centre International de Conférences et de Congrès de Recherches Psychiques de Genève dissolved after his death.

Saphy (or Grigris)

Perhaps deriving from the Arabic safi ("pure, select, excellent"), saphy were charms or amulets worn by Africans as protection against thunderbolts and diseases, to procure wives, and to avert disasters of all kinds. They are composed of strips of paper on which sentences from the Koran are inscribed, sometimes intermixed with Kabbalistic signs. These strips are enclosed in silver tubes or silk bags, which are worn near the skin, often fastened in the dress. This is by no means a practice limited to Muslims; Africans of both sexes and many faiths have been believers in the occult properties of such talismans. The Scottish explorer Mungo Park (1771–ca. 1806) is said to have depended on the making of saphy or grigris, as they are sometimes called.

Sapphire

Many legends of occult properties surround this precious stone, whose name derives from the Sanskrit sanipriya, i.e., dear to the planet Saturn. Next to the diamond, it is the hardest mineral; its true color is blue, but it may also be red, yellow, violet, green, or brown. It was also known in ancient times as lapis lazuli. According to folklore, the vision seen by Moses and the Law given to him were inscribed on sapphire. The sapphire was one of the twelve stones on the Jewish high priest's breastplate, located on the second row in the middle. It attained an eschatological significance as a foundation stone for the New Jerusalem (Isaiah 54:11 and Rev. 21:19).

When Roman Catholics select a new pope, a gold ring set with a sapphire is traditionally placed on his ring finger, symbolizing marriage to the church. Buddhists ascribed sacred magical power to the sapphire and believed that it reconciled mankind to God.

It was said to be a good amulet against fear, to promote the flow of good spirits, to prevent ague and gout, and to prevent the eyes being affected by smallpox. The sixteenth-century writer Camillo Leonardo claimed: "The sapphire heals sores, and is found to discharge a carbuncle with a single touch." The occult writer Francis Barrett stated in his book The Magus (1801): "A Sapphire, or a stone that is of a deep blue colour, if it be rubbed on a tumour wherein the plague discovers itself, (before the party is too far gone) and if, by and by it be removed from the sick, the absent jewel attracts all the poison, or contagion therefrom."

Sara, St.

A patron saint of Gypsies, especially in France and Western Europe. According to Gypsy lore, she was a maid to Marie Jacobé and Marie Salomé, two sisters of the Holy Virgin. The three Maries (the biblical Marys) are thought to have come to France after the resurrection of Jesus, where Sara met and served them. In fact, she seems to be an adaptation to Christian folklore of the goddess Kali, brought by the Gypsies from India. St. Sara is a local saint at les Saintes Maries de la Mer in the Camargue, France.

Sarcognomy

A term coined by J. Rhodes Buchanan, pioneer writer on psychometry, to denote a therapeutic science of the relationship between body and brain. He advanced the ideas that the whole body is expressive; that the entire form is an embodiment of character; that each part of the evolving surface not only possesses a physiological characteristic but also psychological powers; and that each portion of this cutaneous surface exercises, through the nervous system, a direct action upon some particular part of the brain. Buchanan believed that understanding these relationships could have great value in the treatment of disease.

Sardius (or Sard)

A precious stone that is a variety of cornelian, varying in color from pale yellow to reddish orange. According to ancient tradition, it is an antidote to the onyx. It was believed to prevent unpleasant dreams, to make its possessor wealthy, and to sharpen the wit. It was one of the twelve stones in the breastplate of the Jewish high priest and a foundation stone of the New Jerusalem yet to appear (Revelation 21:20).

Sardou, Victorien (1831–1908)

Famous French dramatist and member of the Académie Française who attracted considerable attention in Spiritistic circles in the 1860s with curious automatic drawings, signed "Bernard Palissy, of Jupiter." He was born on September 5, 1831, in Paris. For a short period, he studied medicine, but gave it up in order to devote himself to writing. He was not successful at first, and was seriously ill and in great poverty when rescued by a Mlle. de Brécourt (whom he later married). She introduced him to a Mlle Déjazet, for whom he wrote successful plays.

In due course, many outstanding actors and actresses acted in a long line of successful plays by Sardou. His plays enjoyed long runs in France, England, and America, and his drama La Tosca became the basis of Puccini's opera Tosca. He wrote plays for the great actress Sarah Bernhardt. One controversial play by Sardou in which Bernhardt appeared was titled Spiritisme. It had a plot that involved mediumship, and it included a discussion between believers in occultism and skeptics.

Sardou himself was a remarkable medium and produced many intricate automatic drawings. Some of these were supposed to delineate the dwellings of people in Jupiter. He sketched the houses of Mozart, Zoroaster, and Bernard Palissy, who were country neighbors on the immense planet that, at the time, was commonly believed to be inhabited by a superior race of beings.

He made his own opinions clear in a letter published in Le Temps at the time when he was putting on his drama Spiritisme. He spoke of himself as an observer, incredulous by nature, who had been obliged to admit that Spiritism concerns itself with facts that defy any present scientific explanation. Further:

"Respecting the dwellings of the planet Jupiter, I must ask the good folks who suppose that I am convinced of the real existence of these things whether they are well persuaded that Gulliver (Swift) believed in Lilliput, Campanella in the City of the Sun, and Sir Thomas More in his Utopia."

In another letter, written to Charles Frohman on the same occasion, he spoke with much greater freedom:

"Everybody knows that for forty years I have been a wonderful medium myself, and I have had in my own house wonderful manifestations. My piano has played by itself. Flowers have fallen from my ceiling upon a table; and it is I who have brought this about, and they dare not lay at my door calumnies such as true mediums are exposed to, and say of me, as they had the impudence to say of Home, that I am a charlatan."

Sardou was elected to the French Academy in 1878. He died in Paris November 8, 1908.

Sargent, Epes (1813–1880)

Well-known American author, editor, and psychical investigator. He was born on September 27, 1813, in Gloucester, Massachusetts. He graduated from Boston Latin School in 1829 and joined the editorial staff of the Boston Daily Advertiser. He subsequently worked for the Daily Atlas as its Washington correspondent. He wrote two plays, The Bride of Genoa and Velasco, which led to a move to New York City, where he worked as a journalist, founding the short-lived Sargent's New Monthly Magazine (January–June 1843). He also published a biography of Henry Clay (1842) and a popular novel Fleetwood, or the Stain of Birth (1845).

Returning to Boston, he edited the Boston Transcript (1847–1853) and published his own works, including two volumes of verse, the song "A Life on the Ocean Wave," The Woman Who Dared (1870), and a number of widely used textbooks for schools.

His attention was drawn to mesmerism as it emerged in New England around 1837. He studied the subject and soon became convinced clairvoyance and thought-reading were actually occurring. When the phenomena at Hydesville broke out, he was editing the Boston Transcript and did much to direct public attention to the problem.

This life-long interest resulted in a set of books during his mature years beginning with Planchette; or, The Despair of Science (1869). He wrote extensively on the subject of Spiritualism. He died in Boston on December 30, 1880.

Sarkar, Probhat Ranjan (1923–1990)

Known primarily under his religious name, Shrii Anandamurti, the founder of the Hindu religious community, the Ananda Marga Yoga Society. Sarkar was born in 1923 in Jamalpur, India. His father died when he was still a youth, and he went to work for the railroad in order to provide for his family. In 1955, however, he announced to his fellow employees that he had attained enlightenment and was leaving his secular occupation to found a spiritual movement that he termed the path (marga) of bliss (ananda). The movement expanded rapidly.

Ananda Marga was envisioned as a fully integrated social-spiritual movement and members were expected to practice yoga (a form of tantric yoga) and to engage in social work. The group founded over 400 schools and 250 children's homes.

In 1958, under his given name, Sarkar launched Renaissance Universal, an organization designed to propagate his social ideals, which he presented as the Progressive Utilization Theory (Prout). Prout was offered as a political alternative to both the communists and the philosophy of the then Indian government. The Indian government became a particular target because of its perceived corruption, and in 1967 and 1969, Anandamurti's followers ran candidates. Indira Gandhi retaliated by issuing orders against any government employee joining Ananda Marga. Then in 1971 Anandamurti was arrested, ostensibly for giving orders to members to kill some former members. He was still in jail when Gandhi issued the Emergency Rule in 1975, and he was sentenced to life imprisonment in November 1976. Ananda Marga was banned, many of its members arrested, and its assets seized.

Finally, in August 1978, after the fall of the Gandhi government, Anandamurti's case was reviewed, the fictitious nature of the charges against him ascertained, and he was released. In the meantime his movement had spread around the world. He died in October 1990.

Sasportas, Howard (1948–1992)

Howard Sasportas, an important voice in contemporary astrology supportive of the psychological interpretation of astrological theory, was born in Hartford, Connecticut, on April 12, 1948. He studied at Antioch University in New York, and received his master's degree in humanistic psychology. Shortly afterward, in 1973, he moved to England, where he pursued his psychological studies at the Psychosynthesis and Education Trust. (Psychosynthesis, developed by Italian psychotherapist Roberto Assagioli, is a form of psychotherapy that has been found compatible with occult perspectives.) He also developed an interest in astrology. As his interest grew, he became an associate of the Faculty of Astrological Studies, a prominent British astrological organization founded by a group of leading astrologers including Margaret Hone and Charles E. O. Carter. He became a stellar student and in 1979 was awarded the school's gold medal. That same year he also joined the school's staff as a tutor.

Sasportas' astrological career led him to make the acquaintance of Liz Greene, another exponent of the psychological approach to astrological interpretation. Together, in 1983, they founded the Centre for Psychological Astrology in London. The school offered a spectrum of seminars and a broad course of study in psychology and mythology, in addition to a standard curriculum in astrology.

Beginning in 1985, Sasportas authored a set of books, including the three volumes of the "Seminars in Psychological Astrology" series with Liz Greene, that quickly became popular texts for his colleagues. Then in 1987 he became the series editor for the Arkana Astrology series published by Viking-Penguin. He not only assembled volumes from some of the most important voices in contemporary astrology for the series, but contributed what most consider to be his finest volume, The Gods of Change. Unfortunately, at the height of his career, he passed away in London on May 12, 1992.

Sasquatch

Another name for Bigfoot, the mysterious humanoid creature reported to inhabit remote areas of North America. (See monsters)

Sasquatch Investigations of Mid-America

An organization founded in 1976, one of several which functioned in the 1970s and 1980s whose membership was interested in the scientific study of the Sasquatch, also known as Bigfoot, a large hairy nocturnal creature allegedly sighted in thickly-wooded, mountainous regions throughout the world. Sasquatches are reportedly about eight feet tall, walk upright, and appear to be intelligent and peaceful.

About 1,000 Sasquatch sightings were documented through the 1970s in the United States, primarily in the northwestern states. SIA collected and evaluated data on Bigfoot and released findings to the general public through lectures, publications, and radio and television programs. It maintained a library of books and magazines and published Bigfoot News, in which members reported their investigations and sightings. SIA was headquartered in Edmond, Oklahoma. Satanic Bible

The basic text of the Church of Satan (founded April 1966), written and compiled by the church's founder, Anton Szandor LaVey. The book includes the basic principles, the texts of the rituals, and basic invocations and conjurations.

Satanic Ritual Abuse

Satanic ritual abuse is narrowly defined as an assault (either psychological, physical, or sexual) that takes place on an individual as part of a liturgy or ordered pattern incorporated into a ceremony of worship aimed at Satan, the Christian devil. As such, ritual abuse is one type of occult-related crime but different from other types of occult crimes such as the adoption of Satanic symbols and language by a serial killer or Satanic ceremonies that include only legal and voluntary activities.

The idea of Satanic ritual abuse was brought to the fore in the 1980s with the publication of a book, Michelle Remembers, which recounted the reputed memories/experiences of Michelle Smith (the pseudonym of Michelle Pazder, the wife of Lawrence Pazder, a psychiatrist and author of the book). The book recounted the story of Michelle's teen years in which she was forced into a Satanic cult, abused, and forced to forget her traumatic experiences. Her memory of the experience only re-emerged 20 years later when she underwent psychiatric treatment. It would be followed later in the decade by a growing number of reports of Satanic abuse following the pattern of and expanding upon Michelle's story. These reports were accompanied by additional accounts of contemporary abuse of children by parents in Satanic cults. Graphic accounts of Satanic ritual abuse were supplied in books such as Lauren Stafford's Satan's Underground (1988) and Rebecca Brown's He Came to Set the Captives Free (1993). By the end of the decade, it was apparent that a major wave of concern focused upon the belief in widespread Satanic abuse had emerged. Several cities established agencies to handle the problem.

The belief in Satanic abuse was greatly aided by the McMartin case, in which the teachers and employees of a preschool in Manhattan Beach, California, were accused of sexually and otherwise abusing the children left in their care. The case began with a letter by the Manhattan Beach police chief to the parents of children who had attended or were currently attending the preschool seeking confirmation that Ray Buckley, who worked at the school, had molested some children. When the letter became public, panic followed. Literally hundreds of children were interviewed at the Children's Institute International, a research facility that specialized in problems of child abuse, and by 1984 the doctors in charge had concluded that some 360 children had been abused over the years. Their report built upon a 1978 paper by Dr. Roland Summit who had argued that children's reports of sexual abuse were almost always factual. The accounts derived from the interviews included incidents of Satanic rituals complete with animal sacrifice and the drinking of blood.

The McMartin case lasted for six years. It was placed in the hands of prosecutor Marcia Clark (later to lose the equally high-profile O. J. Simpson case). The McMartin case fell apart when the videos of the interviews of the children revealed the manner in which interviewers planted the story of abuse in the minds of the children and in some of the factually unsubstantiated statements made by the children. Most important of the unsubstantiated claims from the interviews were the descriptions of an extensive set of tunnels under the school building. No such tunnels were ever found, in spite of the building being dismantled and the lot dug up in several different searches.

The multiplying accounts of ritual abuse began to coalesce into a very new picture of Satanism. They described an extensive Satanic network that had been in place for many decades. This picture contradicted all of the previous work that had basically described Satanism at best as a very small phenomenon on the cultural fringe. This network was seen to be responsible for thousands of kidnappings of infants and children who were then abused or killed. Adult members of these groups would give up infants for sacrifice in a black mass or allow their older children to become the object of rape by the cult. These children would otherwise seemingly lead a normal life, their trauma undetected by their friends and schoolmates, and later assume a normal role in society as an adult. They would only remember the childhood trauma years later under hypnosis or similar techniques used during psychotherapy. As the veracity of the accounts of Satanic ritual abuse was called into question, stories adopted more extreme elements to account for an increasing number of inconsistencies.

In the early 1990s, the expansive hysteria over Satanism was called into question in books by FBI agent Robert Hicks and several sociologists such as James V. Richardson and David Bromley, who specialized in the study of new religious movements. Many psychologists who reviewed these reports along with other similar cases accusing parents of sexual abuse but without the Satanic element concluded that they had been falsely diagnosed. According to the psychologists, the memories were not recovered memories, but imposed memories. These patients were not suffering from their prior abuse; they were victims of a memory disorder called the false memory syndrome. In 1992 many of these psychologists banded together to form the False Memory Syndrome Foundation. Also, beginning in 1991, a series of government reports (including reports from England and other areas where abuse reports had surfaced) reached the conclusion that no evidence of the Satanic conspiracy or of widespread Satanic abuse could be found. Controversy peaked through the early 1990s with support for the idea coming mainly from individuals identified as "survivors" of ritual abuse, therapists who were specializing in counseling such survivors, and policemen who were conducting seminars on occult-related crimes. It was noted that much of the support was from therapists and police who were affiliated with conservative Christian churches.

A significant aspect of Satanic ritual abuse was the large number of court cases that arose (as opposed to the UFO abductee cases) in which parents were tried for abusing their children. Convictions were handed down in early cases, but through the 1990s those convictions tended to be reversed and not only were accused parents found not guilty, but civil cases were launched against therapists who testified to the truth of recovered memories of ritual child abuse.

In the midst of the controversy, a series of exposés occurred demonstrating that many prominent exponents of Satanic ritual abuse were in fact lying to an extent that called their entire story into question. These hoaxes included the books by Michelle Smith, Lauren Stafford, Rebecca Brown, and self-confessed Satanic priest Mike Warnke. While these fictionalized stories did not discredit the large number of reports by survivors who have come to be seen as victims of the false memory syndrome, they did much to quiet the support of the Christian community in the widespread panic over Satanism.

The scholarly attack upon the idea of ritual abuse, the government reports on the lack of evidence for such occurrences, and the court cases directed against exponents of Satanic ritual abuse combined in the late 1990s to destroy the popular wave of interest in Satanic ritual abuse, though for many reasons, religious and otherwise, many believers remain.

Satanic Society

The Satanic Society is a small Satanic organization in the tradition of Anton LaVey and one of a number of groups that emerged out of the Church of Satan that he founded. The Satanic Society was founded in the early 1990s by its High Priestess Jessica as the Society of Sin, and took its present name toward the end of the decade. Jessica was raised in a Christian home from which she rebelled and was led to Satanism through reading the writing of LaVey and others and through guidance from several older Satanists who served as her mentors. Since the death of LaVey, she considers herself no longer a supporter of the Church of Satan, but recommends both the First Church of Satan and the First Satanic Church.

Membership in the Satanic Society follows application and screening. Members must demonstrate their possession of a set of traits and abilities, including a sense of personal responsibility, a goal-centered approach to the future, the ability to organize and manage their life, the ability to listen and work with a team, and the ability to reform and revive the self. Prospective members must complete a lengthy membership application. The Satanic Society accepts the Nine Satanic Statements originally articulated by LaVey and promotes both magic and self-aggrandizement. It is opposed to illegal acts and abusive behavior.

The Satanic Society may be contacted at P.O. Box 109, 2025 Guelph Line, Burlington, ON, Canada L7P 4X4. It has an Internet site at <http://www.thesatanicsociety.net/> which includes an extensive collection of documents on Satanism and related topics for the use of its members.

Satanism

The worship of Satan, the Christian devil. The idea that such a parody of Christian worship could and did exist emerged in several stages. Central to Satanism was the idea of magic and that extraordinary miracles, if not performed by God in answer to the prayer of one of his servants (i.e., a Christian), had to be accomplished by the devil in cooperation with someone who had made a pact with the devil. Once the idea of the pact became commonplace, it was but a short step to the notion of an organized community of devil-worshippers. Some substance was provided by the small pockets of paganism that had not succumbed to the church's evangelical efforts.

Before the fifteenth century, the magic practices (i.e., witchcraft) associated with paganism had been defined as unreal and pagan belief as disbelief. However, for several centuries the Roman Catholic Church had been engaged in a struggle to eliminate heresy, especially in southern France. That successful effort had left it with a large and efficient organization, the Inquisition, essentially bereft of a job. Thus the redefinition of witchcraft as Satanism served the purpose of providing work for those conducting the Inquisition. It transferred witchcraft from the realm of doubt to that of heresy and apostasy, and thus the concern of the Inquisition. Satanism implies the acceptance of Christianity and the subsequent transfer of allegiance to the Christian anti-God.

Immediately after the papal bull Summis desiderantes affectibus, issued in 1484, which unleashed the Inquisition, two German Dominicans, Jakob Sprenger and Heinrich Kramer, wrote a massive text, Malleus Maleficarum (The Witches Hammer), which became the textbook for witch-hunters in understanding the evil of witchcraft and in locating and identifying witches. Witches were accused of sacrificing infants and of having sexual intercourse with the devil (most witches were women). Since the Bible affirmed the existence of witchcraft, to believe it did not exist was to be considered in itself a heresy, according to the inquisitors.

Thus was initiated the era of the great witch-hunts. In spite of the Reformation, which split the church and commanded so much attention in the sixteenth century, the crusade against witches continued and was pursued by Protestants and Catholics alike. Confessions were obtained by torture and tended to conform to the image expected by the inquisitors after having read the Malleus Maleficarum.

There is no real evidence that a devil cult existed. Its description in the Malleus Maleficarum was the result of the imaginings of a group of people who had never seen what they described. The confessions were extracted from people informed as to the nature and content of what the inquisitor sought. Such has remained the case to the present. Even though some groups of Satanists emerged, they were always adult converts and created the organization de novo each generation. There was no Satanic organization to carry the tradition from generation to generation. Thus the imagination of Christian clergymen was necessary to inform each new group of Satanists as to the beliefs and activities of Satanism. Without the writings of Christian anti-Satanists, Satanism could not exist.

The anti-Satanist literature defined the practices proper to any self-respecting Satanist, including the Black Mass (a parody of the Roman Catholic Mass), the saying of the Lord's Prayer backwards, the destruction/profanation of sacred objects, the sacrifice of an infant, and the invocation of Satan for the purpose of working malevolent magic (sorcery). It was not until the late seventeenth century that something similar to the Satanism described in the Malleus Maleficarum came into being.

The Affair La Voisin

In the year 1679, King Louis XIV set up a secret court to deal with several cases of poisoning of the French nobility. The investigations and findings of the court centered around the activities of Catherine Deshayes, better known as La Voisin. La Voisin operated as an adviser and fortune-teller to ladies at the court. She supplied them with love potions, charms, and occasionally, poison. However, things turned in a more sinister direction in 1667.

In that year La Voisin was consulted by the Marquise de Montespan, Françoise-Athenais, who was ambitious in the extreme. She wanted to become the queen of France. Her goal was, through magic, to alienate Louis from both the queen and his current mistress. Reportedly, following a mass during which two doves were killed, she became Louis's mistress. Further masses were said to secure her position. Then in 1673, with the Abbé Guibourg officiating, a mass was said over Montespan's nude body, during which an infant was sacrificed and the blood used to create a host that was then added to the king's food.

These later masses seemed to have no effect, and Louis was perceived to be changing his affections to another. Finally, in 1879, she had a mass for the dead said for Louis, followed by an attempt to poison him. The plot was discovered. La Voisin was arrested and Montespan distanced from the king (though for the sake of appearances she was never publicly accused). The affair, as the extent of La Voisin's activities became known, threatened to bring down the monarchy if made public. It was handled with the utmost discretion. La Voisin was executed, but most of the people involved were merely banished.

Since the era of the affair, sporadic incidents of Satanism and ephemeral Satanic magic groups have appeared. Among the more renowned were those described in a fictionalized account in J. K. Huysman's novel La Bas in 1891. The groups that appeared were largely made of young people using Satanism as an expression of their youthful rebellion. They came and went with little sign of their existence except a desecrated graveyard or church. A few were discovered during a ceremony or soon afterward. The number of such groups seemed to rise in the years after World War II, though that may have been a result of better reporting and the correlation of the scattered accounts facilitated by improved communications. However, a new thrust developed in the 1960s.

The Church of Satan

A new era began on Walpurgis Night (May Eve), 1966. Anton LaVey announced the first day of the year of Satan (anno Satanus) marked by the founding of the Church of Satan. The very affront of such an organization in an ostensibly Christian nation was newsworthy, but LaVey, an old carnival performer, was able to make good use of publicity events—the first Satanic wedding and the first funeral—to have his picture on the front page of newspapers across the United States.

To some, the very appearance of the Church of Satan was all they needed to project it as a symbol of all that was wrong with contemporary society and to associate the new organization with every occult-related crime that was uncovered. The reality was more mundane. The Church of Satan was, in fact, a fairly small group (never more than a few thousand members), which affirmed some of the values that LaVey saw as dominant in secular society but counter to traditional values. People were trapped in a value system that affirmed mutually contradictory goals. He advocated indulgence of the senses, individual responsibility, selfishness, life in the present, and ego strength and assertion. He specifically denounced love for ingrates, turning the other cheek, and obscurantism.

The main holiday in the church was an individual's birthday. The primary ritual was the Black Mass, which served as a psychodrama for people, allowing them to overcome inhibitions and move ahead with their lives. He specifically eschewed any illegal activities and told members to pursue their goals, but to do so without harming others.

The Church of Satan gave Satanism a new respectability. Its scripture, The Satanic Bible, became a steady seller at newsstands, and LaVey attracted some celebrities to his organization. During the early 1970s, however, the church went through a period of turmoil and a number of splinter groups emerged. The most substantive of these (and the only one to survive the decade) was the Temple of Set. Founded by Michael Aquino and Lilith Sinclair, two prominent leaders in the Church of Satan, the temple became the home of a sophisticated Satanic theology developed from Egyptian thought.

Satanism in the 1980s

Satanism had plainly declined by the end of the 1970s; however, in the mid 1980s reports that it had merely gone underground began to surface. Claims of the existence of a massive Satanic underground emerged around a set of reports concerning ritual child abuse. Amid the heightened concern for child abuse generated during the era, children began to tell horrendous stories of having been abused as part of forced participation in Satanic rituals, both in homes and in day care centers. These stories were soon joined by an increasing number of stories of women, and a few men, mostly in their thirties, who told stories of having been abused as children and youth, and then having suppressed the memories until they were recalled twenty years later in sessions with counselors.

These two types of reports generated much attention in the press, a heated debate among psychological professionals, and a variety of court cases. In the end, little substance concerning Satanic activity emerged, though a core of childhood trauma was discovered at the heart of many of the reports. Some cases were discovered to be lies told to reclaim custody of children lost in a divorce settlement, and many were generated by psychological counselors using unprofessional techniques and practices. As the cases were investigated and no supporting evidence was discovered, the stories became increasingly conspiracy oriented. By the 1990s little support remained for the veracity of the accounts of widespread Satanism.

Sat B'Hai

A Masonic type of society supposed to be of Anglo-Indian origin. The name signifies "Seven Feathers," and it alludes to the bird Malaccocercis Grisis, which flies in groups of seven. The society was introduced into England about the year 1872 by J. H. Lawrence Archer. It had seven descending degrees, each of seven disciples, and seven ascending degrees of perfection, Ekata or Unity. Occult historian Arthur E. Waite believed that the rituals were compiled by Masonic writer John Yarker. Waite also believed that occultist Kenneth MacKenzie may have been involved and may have incorporated some of these rites into the Order of Light, another Masonic society.

Satchidananda, Swami (1914–)

Disciple of the late Swami Sivananda and founder of Integral Yoga International. He was born December 22, 1914, into a wealthy family. He married, but his wife died only five years later. Following World War II he began a wandering life that led him for a brief period to the monastery of the Ramakrishna order at Timpurraururai, and then to Sivananda's forest academy at Rishikesh. He was initiated as a renunciate in 1949 and emerged as Swami Satchidananda. He served as a professor of raja and hatha yoga at the academy, the educational arm of the Divine Life Society.

Toward the end of his life, Sivananda assigned different parts of the world to his leading disciples and gave them a commission to spread his yoga teaching around the globe. In 1953 Satchidananda settled in Sri Lanka, where he founded a branch of the Divine Life Society and led in the spread of its work of social service, so integral to Sivananda's life and work.

Then in 1966 he undertook a global tour sponsored by artist Peter Max, during which he visited the United States and gained popularity in the counter culture. He became widely recognized as a result of his making the opening address for Woodstock. While in America, not part of his assigned territory, he established the Integral Yoga Institute (now Integral Yoga International) in New York. Shortly thereafter he broke with the Divine Life Society and settled permanently in the United States. As a master of hatha yoga, in 1970 he wrote what has become one of the most popular yoga texts in the English language. To his students he taught the integral yoga system of Sivananda, which attempted to integrate the various branches of yoga into a unified practice.

In the 1980s Satchidananda established a new headquarters complex near Buckingham, Virginia, which included the Light of Truth Universal Shrine (LOTUS), a temple embodying the universalist religious perspective taught by Satchidananda and honoring all religious traditions. In his later years Satchidananda was known for his busy schedule of writing and lecturing, which he has since cut back.

Satya Sai Baba (1926–)

Modern Hindu guru, regarded by his devotees as a reincarnation of an early twentieth century holy man, Sai Baba (d. 1918). He was born Sathyanarayana Ratnakaru Raju, November 23, 1926, in the village of Puttaparthi, South India. As a thirteen year old, in 1940, he was bitten by a scorpion and remained unconscious for some time. He emerged from the experience, however, a changed person. He stated to those around him, "I am Sai Baba," a name hardly known to anyone in his obscure village. He then became a religious teacher and healer, manifesting extraordinary miracles.

He quite frequently "materializes" small objects out of the air—pictures, statuettes, prayer beads, or rings—which he gives to his devotees. A widespread religious movement has grown up around him, and he has directed devotees into social work, resulting in the building of a number of schools and medical centers. His fame has spread far beyond India into both African and Western countries due to the distribution of his writings and the books about him written by Indra Devi, Howard Murphet, and other Western writers. A charismatic figure, he is regarded by many devotees as a divine avatar.

Sai Baba remains something of an enigma. He has refused many parapsychologists the opportunity to study him. Many have, however, joined his audiences and reported seeing the extraordinary feats his followers have reported. C. T. K. Chari raised the question of trickery, but gathered no substantial proof of it.

Saucer and Unexplained Celestial Events Research Society

A flying saucer organization founded on paper in 1954 by James W. Moseley as the sponsoring organization for his periodical, Saucer News. SAUCERS was never established as a group. It still exists, one of the oldest in ufology. Saucer News made its most lasting contribution in the 1950s with its exposés of contactee George Adamski. Saucer News was sold to Gray Barker in 1968, and it continued to appear until 1972. In 1976 Moseley began a new periodical entitled Nexus and eventually changed the name to Saucer Smear. It was sent gratis to several hundred of Moseley's acquaintances. Address: P.O. Savage, Minot Judson (1841–1918)

Unitarian clergyman, author, and an early member of the American Society for Psychical Research. He was born on June 10, 1841, at Norridgewock, Maine. He studied at Bangor Theological Seminary, graduated in 1864, and was ordained as a Congregational minister a short time afterward. He served churches in California, Massachusetts, and Missouri. In 1873 he left Congregationalism and joined the Unitarian Church. He subsequently pastored the Third Unitarian Church, Chicago (1873–74), the Church of the Unity, Boston (1874–96), and the Church of the Messiah (now the Community Church), New York City (1896–1906).

Savage frequently advocated the examination of Darwin's evolutionary theories and their acceptance by the church. Evolution, he believed, tended to strengthen rather than weaken religious faith. His views were expressed in his books: Christianity, the Science of Mankind (1873), The Religion of Evolution (1876), and The Morals of Evolution (1880).

As were many liberal thinkers of the day, he became interested not only in the scientific approach to origins supplied by biology, but the light shed on the end of earthy life by psychical research. He wrote several books dealing with issues of religion and survival. He died May 22, 1918, in Boston, Massachusetts.

Sawyer, Carrie M.

American materialization medium with whom Paul Gibier, director of the Bacteriological Institute of New York, conducted experiments in his own laboratory for ten years. According to Gibier's report, published in 1901 in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques, he enclosed the medium in a large wire cage, the meshes of which were so small that they only admitted his little finger. The cage was darkened. After the appearance of several spirit forms, Gibier was asked to tend to the medium, who required his care.

Stepping before the door of the cage, he was astounded to see the medium fall into his arms through the door, which was locked with intact paper slip fastenings and a stamp over the keyhole. The phenomenon was repeated on three occasions. According to sitters, the wire cage felt burning hot when the medium exited it, though Gibier could not confirm this observation.

Gibier intended to take Sawyer on a three-years tour of England, France, and Egypt, but he died in an accident before the project could be realized.

E. A. Brackett, a Boston sculptor, attended a séance in the mid-1880s during which he was led into the cabinet by a spirit. Sawyer was not entranced. Arm in arm, the three of them walked out of the cabinet in full view of 25 sitters. In his account of Sawyer, Brackett also wrote of evil influences that were sometimes noticeable in her séances.

Scallion, Gordon Michael

Gordon-Michael Scallion, a contemporary prophet known for his predictions of vast changes, began his current career in 1979. As an electronic consultant, he had been meeting with a client when unexpectedly, he lost his voice. He checked into a hospital, and during his stay had an apparition of a woman who came into his room and hovered several feet above him. She began to tell him about his life, what was in store for the next month and then events that would occur over the next decades. Most importantly, she predicted major changes to the Earth that would begin at the end of the 1980s and increase annually through the 1990s. Immediately after the woman departed, Scallion's voice returned. It also appeared that he had experienced a psychic awakening. He began to see auras around people and emerged as a healer.

He continued to receive visions of future events and through the 1980s had a series of successful predictions, including the 1984 Mexico City earthquake and George Bush's election as president in 1988. In 1984, inner guidance told him to move to a location within ten miles of the New Hampshire border at an elevation 300 feet above sea level. He settled in Chesterfield, New Hampshire. Then in 1991 he had a set of disturbing dreams that took place over 29 evenings. He wrote down the contents of the dreams and sent the transcript to a number of his friends. This report is now seen as the origin of what would become his periodical, The Earth Changes Report. The subject of his dreams was worldwide changes, many of a catastrophic nature.

In the 1990s, Scallion unveiled maps of North America and the world that indicated a series of significant geographical changes that he predicted would occur between 1998 and 2012. They bear some resemblance to the I AM America map published in 1989. Scallion's map shows the American West Coast, the Mississippi River Valley, and Florida now covered by water. It also shows the emergence of new land masses east of Australia, south of the southern tip of South America, and in the midst of the South Pacific Ocean. Concurrent with the map, Scallion predicted that a great spiritual awakening would occur worldwide during the 1990s. He saw that by the year 2002 humanity would be reborn and living in harmony with each other, and that a new utopian society would arise. Many of Scallion's predicted changes are based upon his appropriation of a form of what is termed the Gaia hypothesis, the idea that the Earth is itself a living organism that reacts to human disturbance of the natural order of things.

Scallion and his wife, Cynthia Keyes, now head the Matrix Institute and send out The Earth Changes Newsletter bimonthly. The institute may be reached at P.O. Box 336, Chesterfield, NH 03443. It has a website at <http://www.matrixinstitute.com/>. A complete evaluation of Scallion's career rests on the dramatic predictions he has made for the first decade of the new millennium. Objective looks at his predictions to date note both significant hits and misses among those predictions that were falsifiable.

SCANDINAVIA

[For the early history of occultism in Scandinavia, see the entry on the Teutons.]

Witchcraft

In medieval times, Scandinavian examples of the witchcraft persecutions that arose in much of Europe were rare, but in 1669–70 a great outbreak against witchcraft commenced in Sweden, in the villages of Mohra and Elfdale in the district of Elfdale. In 1669 a strange report was circulated that the children of the neighborhood were carried away nightly to a place they called Blockula, where they were received by Satan in person. The children themselves, who were responsible for the report, pointed out numerous women, who, they said, were witches and carried them there.

The alarm and terror in the district became so great that a report was at last made to King Charles XI, who nominated commissioners, partly clergy and partly laymen, to inquire into the extraordinary circumstances that had been brought to his notice. These commissioners arrived in Mohra and announced their intention of opening proceedings on August 13, 1670.

One day preceding, the commissioners met at the parsonage-house and heard the complaints of the minister and several people of the upper class, who told them of the miserable condition they were in. They gravely told the commissioners that by the help of witches, hundreds of their children had been drawn to Satan, who had been seen to go in a visible shape through the country and to appear daily to the people. They said that the poorer people had been seduced by him feasting them with meat and drink.

The commissioners entered upon their duties the next day with the utmost diligence, and the result of their misguided zeal formed one of the most remarkable examples of cruel and remorseless persecution that stains the annals of sorcery. No fewer than 70 inhabitants of the village and district of Mohra, 23 of whom made confessions, were condemned and executed. One woman pleaded that she was with child, and many denied their guilt, but they were sent to Fahluna, where most of them were put to death.

Among those who suffered death were 15 children, and 36 more, of different ages between nine and sixteen, were forced to run a gauntlet and be scourged on the hands at the church door every Sunday for one year. Twenty more, who had been drawn into these practices more unwillingly, and were very young, were condemned to be scourged with rods upon their hands for three successive Sundays at the church door. Some 300 children were accused in all.

It appears that the commissioners began by taking the confessions of the children, and then they confronted them with the witches, whom the children accused as their seducers. Most of the latter, to use the words of the authorized report, had “. . . children with them, which they had either seduced or attempted to seduce, some seven years of age, nay, from four to sixteen years.”

“Some of the children complained lamentably of the misery and mischief they were forced sometimes to suffer of the devil and the witches.” Being asked, if they were sure that they were at any time carried away by the devil, they all replied in the affirmative. “Hereupon the witches themselves were asked, whether the confessions of those children were true, and admonished to confess the truth, that they might turn away from the devil unto the living God.” One account noted,

“At first, most of them did very stiffly, and without shedding the least tear, deny it, though much against their will and inclination. After this the children were examined every one by themselves, to see whether their confessions did agree or no, and the commissioners found that all of them, except some very little ones, which could not tell all the circumstances, did punctually agree in their confessions of particulars.

“In the meanwhile, the commissioners that were of the clergy examined the witches, but could not bring them to any confession, all continuing steadfast in their denials, till at last some of them burst into tears, and their confession agreed with what the children said; and these expressed their abhorrence of the fact, and begged pardon. Adding that the devil, whom they called Locyta, had stopped the mouths of some of them, so loath was he to part with his prey, and had stopped the ears of others. And being now gone from them, they could no longer conceal it; for they had now perceived his treachery.”

The witches asserted that the journey to “Blockula” was not always made with the same kind of conveyance. They commonly used humans, animals, and even spits and posts, according to opportunity. They preferred, however, riding upon goats, and if they had more children with them than the animal could conveniently carry, they elongated its back by means of a spit anointed with their magical ointment.

It was further stated that if the children did at any time name the names of those, either man or woman, that had been with them and had carried them away, they were again carried by force, either to “Blockula” or the crossway, and there beaten, insomuch that some of them died of it, “and this some of the witches confessed, and added, that now they were exceedingly troubled and tortured in their minds for it.”

One thing was lacking to confirm these confessions: the marks of the whip could not be found on the bodies of the victims, except on one boy, who had some wounds and holes in his back that were given him with thorns; but the witches said they would quickly vanish.

As described in the court records, the mysterious “Blockula” was situated in a large meadow, like a plain sea, “wherein you can see no end.” The house they met at had a great gate painted with many different colors. Through this gate they went into a little meadow distinct from the other, and here they turned their animals to graze. When they had used men for their beasts of burden, they set them up against the wall in a state of helpless slumber, and there they remained until needed for the homeward flight. In a very large room of this house stood a long table, at which the witches sat down, and adjoining this room was another chamber, where there were “lovely and delicate beds.”

As soon as they arrived at the ritual site, the visitors were required to deny their baptism and devote themselves body and soul to Satan, whom they promised to serve faithfully. Hereupon the devil cut their fingers, and they wrote their names with blood in his book. He then caused them to be baptized anew, by priests appointed for that purpose.

Upon this the devil gave them a purse, wherein there were filings of clocks, with a big stone tied to it, which they threw into the water, and said, “As these filings of the clock do never return to the clock, from which they were taken, so may my soul never return to heaven!”

Since few of the children had any marks on their fingers to show where they had been cut, another difficulty arose in verifying their statement. But here again the story was helped by a girl who had hurt her finger, and who declared that because she would not stretch out her finger, the devil in anger had wounded it.

When the ceremonies were completed, the witches sat down at the table, those whom the devil esteemed most being placed nearest to him, but the children were made to stand at the door, where he himself gave them meat and drink. The food with which the visitors to “Blockula” were regaled consisted of “broth, with coleworts and bacon in it, oatmeal bread spread with butter, milk and cheese.” They said that the food sometimes tasted very good, and sometimes very bad.

After meals, they danced, and it was one peculiarity of these northern witches’ sabbaths that the dance was usually followed by fighting. Those of Elfdale confessed that the devil used to play upon a harp before them. Another peculiarity of these northern witches was, it was said, that children resulted from their intercourse with Satan, and these children, having married together, became the parents of toads and serpents.

The witches of Sweden appear to have been less noxious than those of most other countries, for, whatever they confessed, there seems to have been no real evidence of mischief done by them. They confessed that they were obliged to promise Satan that they would do all kinds of mischief and that the devil taught them to “milk” in the following manner. They used to stick a knife in the wall and hang a kind of label on it, which they drew and stroked, and as long as this lasted, the persons they had power over were miserably plagued. The beasts that were milked like this sometimes died.

One woman confessed that the devil gave her a wooden knife, with which, going into houses, she had the power to kill anything she touched. However, there were few that could confess that they had hurt any man or woman. Being asked if they had murdered any children, they confessed that they had indeed tormented many, but did not know whether any of them died of these plagues. They also said that the devil had showed them several places where he had power to do mischief.

The minister of Elfdale declared that one night these witches were, to his thinking, on the crown of his head, and that from this he had a long-continued headache. One of the witches confessed that the devil had sent her to torment the minister, and that she was ordered to strike a nail into his head, but his skull was so hard that the nail would not penetrate it and merely produced that headache. The minister said further that one night he felt a pain as if he were torn with an instrument used for combing flax, and when he awoke, he heard somebody scratching and scraping at the window, but could see nobody. One of the witches confessed that she was the person who had disturbed him.

The minister of Mohra also claimed that one night one of these witches came into his house and so violently took him by the throat that he thought he would choke. Upon awaking, he saw the person that did it, but did not recognize her, and for some weeks he was not able to speak or perform divine service. An old woman of Elfdale confessed that the devil had helped her make a nail, which she stuck into a boy's knee, of which stroke the boy remained lame a long time. She added that before she was burned or executed by the hand of justice, the boy would recover.

Another circumstance confessed by these witches was that the devil gave them a beast, about the shape and size of a cat, which they called a “carrier,” and a bird as big as a raven, but white, and these they could send anywhere, and wherever they went, they took away all sorts of victuals, such as butter, cheese, milk, bacon, and all sorts of seeds, and carried them to the witches.

What the bird brought, they kept for themselves, but what the carrier brought they took to “Blockula,” where the archfiend gave them as much of it as he thought good. The carriers, they said, often filled themselves so full that they were forced to disgorge by the way, and what they thus rendered fell to the ground, and was found in several gardens where coleworts grew, and far from the houses of the witches. It was of a yellow color like gold and was called witches' butter.

Such were the details, as far as they can now be obtained, of this extraordinary occurrence, the only one known to have occurred in the northern part of Europe during the age of the witchcraft trials. In other countries, we can generally trace some particular cause that gave rise to great persecutions of this kind, but here, as the story is told, we see none, for it is hardly likely that such a strange series of accusations should have been the mere involuntary creation of a party of little children.

Suspicion is excited by the peculiar part the two clergymen of Elfdale and Mohra played in this affair, and perhaps they were not altogether innocent of fabrication. They seem to have been weak, superstitious men, and perhaps they had been reading the witchcraft books of the south until they imagined the country around them to be overrun with witches. Perhaps the two clergymen themselves became alarmed, but one thing seems certain, that the moment the commission was revoked and the persecution ceased, no more witches were heard of.

The proceedings at Mohra caused so much alarm throughout Sweden that prayers were ordered in all the churches for delivery from the snares of Satan, who was believed to have been let loose in that kingdom. A new edict of the king suddenly put a stop to the whole process, and the matter was brought to a close rather mysteriously. It is said that the witch prosecution was increasing so much in intensity that accusations began to be made against people of a higher class in society, and then a complaint was made to the king, and the mania brought to a close.

Spiritualism

In 1843, an epidemic of “preaching” occurred in southern Sweden, which provided Joseph Ennemoser with material for an interesting passage in his History of Magic (1854). The manifestation of this was similar in character to outbreaks described elsewhere. A writer in the London Medium and Daybreak of 1878 states,

“It is about a year and a half since I changed my abode from Stockholm to this place, and during that period it is wonderful how Spiritualism has gained ground in Sweden. The leading papers, that used in my time to refuse to publish any article on Spiritualism excepting such as ridiculed the doctrine, have of late thrown their columns wide open to the serious discussion of the matter. Many a Spiritualist in secret, has thus been encouraged to give publicity to his opinions without standing any longer in awe of that demon, public ridicule, which intimidates so many of our brethren.

“Several of Allan Kardec's works have been translated into Swedish, among which I may mention his Evangile selon le Spiritisme as particularly well-rendered in Swedish by Walter Jochnick. A spiritual Library was opened in Stockholm on the 1st of April last, which will no doubt greatly contribute to the spreading of the blessed doctrine. The visit of Mr. Eglinton to Stockholm was of the greatest benefit to the cause. Let us hope that the stay of Mrs. Esperance in the south of Sweden may have an equally beneficial effect.

“Notwithstanding all this progress of the cause in the neighbouring country, Spiritualism is looked upon here as something akin to madness, but even here there are thin, very thin rays, and very wide apart, struggling to pierce the darkness.”

In Norway, Spiritualism as known to modern Europe, did not seem to have become existent until about 1880. A writer in a number of the Dawn of Light published in that year states, “Spiritualism is just commencing to give a sign of its existence here in Norway. The newspapers have begun to attack it as a delusion and the ‘expose’ of Mrs. C., which recently took place at 38 Great Russell St., London, has made the round through all the papers in Scandinavia. After all, it must sooner or later take root as in all other parts of the world. Mr. Eglinton, the English medium, has done a good work in Stockholm, showing some of the great savants a new world; and a couple of years ago Mr. Slade visited Copenhagen. The works of Mr. Zollner, the great astronomer of Leipzig, have been mentioned in the papers and caused a good deal of sensation.

“Of mediums there are several here, but all, as yet, afraid to speak out. One writes with both hands; a gentleman is developing as a drawing medium. A peasant, who died about five years ago, and lived not far from here, was an excellent healing medium; his name was Knud, and the people had given him the nickname of Vise Knud (the wise Knud); directly when he touched a patient he knew if the same could be cured or not, and often, in severe cases, the pains of the sick person went through his own body. He was also an auditive medium, startling the people many times by telling them what was going to happen in the future; but the poor fellow suffered much from the ignorance and fanaticism around him, and was several times put in prison. I am doing all I can to make people acquainted with our grand cause.”

A second and more hopeful letter of 1881, addressed to the editor of the Revue Spirite, was as follows:

“My dear Brothers, Here our science advances without noise. An excellent writing medium has been developed among us, one who writes simultaneously with both hands; while we have music in a room where there are no musical instruments; and where there is a piano it plays itself. At Bergen, where I have recently been, I found mediums, who in the dark, made sketches—were dessinateurs—using also both hands. I have seen, also, with pleasure that several men of letters and of science have begun to investigate our science spirite. The pastor Eckhoff, of Bergen, has for the second time preached against Spiritualism, ‘this instrument of the devil, this psychographie’; and to give more of eclat to his sermon he has had the goodness to have it printed; so we see that the spirits are working. The suit against the medium, Mme. F., in London, is going the rounds of the papers of Christiania; these journals opening their columns, when occasion offers, to ridicule Spiritualism. We are, however, friends of the truth, but there are scabby sheep among us of a different temperament. From Stockholm they write me that a library of spiritual works has been opened there, and that they are to have a medium from Newcastle, with whom séances are to be held.”

In the London Spiritual Magazine of May 1885, is a long and interesting paper on Swedish Spiritualism by William Howitt, in which he gives quite a notable collection of narratives concerning the “Phenomenal Spiritual Manifestations in Sweden,” most of which were furnished by an eminent and learned Swedish gentleman—Count Piper. Howitt stated that the public had become so thoroughly sated with tales of hauntings, apparitions, previsions, etc., that Piper’s narrations would present few, if any, features of interest, save in justification of one assertion, that Spiritualism was rife in human experience everywhere, although it might not take the form of a public movement, as it had in America and England.

As early as 1864, the Afton Blad, one of the most popular journals circulated in Sweden, published a number of excellent leading articles commending the belief in spiritual ministry, and the study of such phenomena that would promote communion between the “two worlds.”

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

Scandinavia has produced some notable psychical researchers, including Sydney Alritz (1868–1925) of Uppsala University; Chr. Winther of Copenhagen, who was president of the Danish Society for Psychical Research (Selskapet for Psykisk Forskning) and experimented with the medium Anna Rasmussen; and Aage Slomann (died 1970), a full-time parapsychologist and president of the Danish Society. Professor Jaeger and Thornstein Wereide (who edited the Oslo Psykisk Tidsskrift) led the effort in Norway, and in Iceland could be found Harald Nielsson (died 1928), who wrote books on theological and psychic subjects; Gudmundur Hannesson of the University of Reykjavik; and Einar Hjørleifsson Kvaran (1859–1938), who founded the Icelandic Society for Psychical Research in 1918.

In 1942, the Swedish Sällskapet för Parapsykologisk Forskning (Society for Parapsychological Research) was founded in Stockholm. Well-known members included Gosta Rodhe, Rolf Ejevåg, Eric Ugglå, and Eva Hellström (who was also clairvoyant). The engineer Haakon Forwald (1897–1978) carried out valuable studies in psychokinesis. Other Swedish parapsychologists include Martin Johnson and Nils Olof Jacobson.

In Norway, there is the Norsk Parapsykologisk Selskap, under Kirsten Pauss (Dahlsgt. 33, Oslo 3). The dramatist Wiers Jensen (1866–1925) made notable contributions to the study of the “vardøgr” or “projected double” phenomenon, and also edited the journal Norsk Tidsskrift for Psykisk Forskning from 1922 to 1925.

In Finland there has also been much activity in parapsychological research, which has received favorable notice from such scientists as Sven Segerstråle, professor of biology; Sven Krohn, professor of philosophy and former president of Parapsykologinen Tutkimusseura; Väinö Auer, famous geologist; and Uno Saarnio, philosopher and mathematician. The Finnish Society for Psychical Research was established as early as 1907 under the name Sällskapet för Forsking i Finland-Suomen Psykkinen Tutkimusseura. The psychical researcher Jarl Fahler was president for a number of years, and also experimented with ESP and psychokinesis; a later president was Stefan Talqvist. In 1938, the Parapsykologinen Tutkimusseura was established and has been active ever since. In 1965, an Institute of Parapsychology was established in Helsingfors, directed by Jarl Fahler, who is also president of the Society for Hypnosis in Finland. Another parapsychological organization is Tampereen Parapsykologinen Tutkimusseura, in Tammerfors, under the presidency of Gunnar Strömmer.

Physiologist, director of the Department of Physiology, College of Medicine, University of Heidelberg, Germany, who has also written on parapsychology. He was born on August 13, 1906, in Düsseldorf, Germany, and studied at the University of Bonn (M.D., 1931). He held teaching positions beginning in 1935 at the University of Bonn (1935–40), the Kerckhoff Foundation, Bad Nauheim (1940–41), Giessen University (1941–50), and at Heidelberg University after 1950. Schepis, Giovanni (1894–1963)

Italian official who experimented in the field of parapsychology. He was born on June 3, 1894, at Catania, Italy, and studied at the University of Rome. He was a lecturer in statistics at the University of Rome for many years (1936–63). In 1963 he became the director of the mechanographic center of Italy’s Department of Elections, of the Ministry of the Interior. In 1937 he co-founded and became the first general secretary of the Società Italiana de Metapsichica. He went on to become its president (1959–63). Schepis conducted mass experiments in telepathy using radio and television. He also studied the personality of sensitives, but made his major contribution with his work on the statistical approach to parapsychological experiments. He published a number of papers in various Italian journals. He died December 1, 1963.

Scherer, Wallace B(rown) (1913–)

Director of Psychological Instrument Company and experimenter in parapsychology. He was born on January 27, 1913, in Bristol, Tennessee. He studied at Davidson College in North Carolina (B.S., 1940) and Duke University (M.A., 1948). He taught at Atlantic Christian College, Wilson, North Carolina and Richmond Professional Institute at the College of William and Mary prior to becoming the director and owner of Psychological Instruments in 1953.

Scherer took special interest in the spectrum of ESP: telepathy, clairvoyance, precognition, and psychokinesis. He conducted experiments to ascertain whether spontaneous responses enhanced ESP results, and he reported on this in the Journal of Parapsychology.

Schermann, Raphael (1879– ?)

Austrian clairvoyant mostly known as a graphologist but with powers far transcending reading character from handwriting samples. He was credited with telling the past and future with an uncanny precision. From the writing Schermann could visualize the writer, from a face he could visualize and reproduce the script. "Psycho-graphology," the term employed by E. S. Bagger as the title of his book on Schermann, was coined to refer to this strange gift of combining the science of graphology with psychic talents.

Schermann was born in Cracow, then part of Austrian Galicia, in 1879. He was self-educated, and by the age of 12 he had developed a serious study of the characteristics of handwriting. He visited the United States early in the twentieth century, but soon returned to Europe and settled down in Vienna, where he earned a living as a claims inspector for an insurance company. His privately exhibited talents as a psycho-graphologist soon earned him a considerable reputation, and he was consulted by the police to assist their work, eventually being appointed an official handwriting expert at the Vienna Central Law Court.

During World War I, Schermann served in the Austrian army. In 1923, he again visited the United States, where he delivered lectures and cooperated with the New York police in solving a murder mystery. Back in Vienna, he acted in two silent movies based on some of his most interesting cases. After this, he continued to work as a consultant for a group of insurance companies, but spent his spare time on psychographology. He charged nothing for his talents and took part in many experiments conducted by psychical researchers. Oskar Fischer, of the University of Prague, conducted between 1916 and 1918 a series of experiments in character reading from writing with Raphael Schermann.

During World War II, Schermann returned to his birthplace in Cracow and became a victim of the Nazi occupation of Poland.

Schierling, Charlotte Anna (1911–)

German archivist and evangelical Christian who conducted research in parapsychology. She was born on January 10, 1911, at Tiegenhof, West Prussia. She received her doctorate at the University of Berlin. After World War II, she joined the staff of the Danzig Library (1946) and then became the archivist of the Federal Board for Employment Service, Frankfurt am Main, West Germany. Schierling published a number of books and pamphlets for children and on religious subjects. She also studied shamanism in Asia and the United States and took special interest in telepathy and the study of poltergeist phenomena. She published an article "Red Indian Studies," in Dakota Scout (1960) and subsequently undertook research in shamanistic practices among Native Americans.

Schiller, F(erdinand) C(anning) S(cott) (1864–1937)

Author, philosopher, and president of the Society for Psychical Research, London (1914). He was born on August 16, 1864, at Ottensen, near Altona, Germany. He was educated at Rugby School, and Balliol College, Oxford University (M.A., D.Sc., LL.D.). He moved to the United States, taught philosophy at Cornell University for four years and then spent many years as a private tutor. He joined the SPR in 1884.

He became an active member of the SPR and served terms as president and vice president (1920–28). His earliest contribution to the society's Proceedings was on automatic writing experiments (vol. 4, pt. 11, 1887). He later contributed frequent reviews and articles on psychological and philosophical aspects to both the Proceedings and the Journal of the SPR and other psychic and non-psychic periodicals.

He was author of the articles on psychical research in the Encyclopedia Britannica (11th edition, 1920) and of articles on Spiritism and telepathy in Hasting's Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics. He also authored a number of books on various philosophical questions. He died August 6, 1937.

Schlatter, Francis (1855–1895)

Mystic and miracle worker of the nineteenth century. Born in Alsace in 1855, he emigrated to the United States and traveled the country with head and feet bare, preaching the love of God and peace amongst men. When imprisoned as a vagrant, he continued to preach in jail. He had a gift of healing and cured many sick individuals merely by placing his hand on their heads. He appeared in San Francisco, California, in 1894, traveled through Mexico, and crossed the Mohave Desert. He spent several weeks at Flagstaff, then wandered among the Indian tribes, staying with the chief of the Navajos five days and performing many miracles.

Thousands came to see him in Denver, Colorado, where he once identified a secret murderer. He reputedly healed blindness, deafness, diphtheria, cancer, and other diseases with a touch of the hand, and also cured a number of handicapped people. He claimed that faith was the cause of his cures, and that even touching was unnecessary. He would sometimes sensitize a piece of material or a handkerchief with healing force. He treated from three to five thousand people a day by standing with outstretched hands blessing them.

Eventually he undertook a forty-day fast, during which he continued to heal the sick. In November 1895 he disappeared from Denver without warning. He left a note at the house of Alderman Fox, where he was a guest, stating “Mr. Fox—my mission is ended, and the Father calls me. I salute you. Francis Schlatter, November 13th.” He was never heard from again.

Schmeidler, Gertrude Raffel (1912–)

Professor of psychology and parapsychologist, she was born Gertrude Raffel on July 15, 1912, in Long Branch, New Jersey. She studied at Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts (B.A. magna cum laude, 1932), Clark University, Worcester, Massachusetts (M.A., 1933), and Radcliffe College/Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts (Ph.D., 1935). She first encountered parapsychology by reading a just-published copy of J. B. Rhine's first book, Extra-Sensory Perception, in 1934. Before she completed her Ph.D. she took a course in psychical research with Gardner Murphy.

After graduation she taught at Monmouth College, Long Branch, New Jersey (1935–37), was a research associate at Harvard University (1942–44) and a research officer at the American Society for Psychical Research (1945–46) before beginning her long tenure at the City College of New York in 1945. She was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and was elected vice president (1958, 1960) and president (1959). She also received a grant for research from the Parapsychology Foundation (1955–59).

Schmeidler has conducted quantitative experiments in telepathy and clairvoyance with hundreds of students and other subjects in an attempt to evaluate connections between objective interpersonal and personality factors and success or failure in ESP experiments. She has also taken an interest in the question of theories of survival after death. She attained fame in the 1940s for her “sheep-goat” experiments based upon the hypothesis that subjects who believed in ESP scored better as subjects in ESP tests than those who did not. Also among her many noteworthy experiments were PK tests with psychic Ingo Swann. She has contributed to over 150 articles for professional journals.

Schmidt, Helmut (1928–)

Physicist who has specialized in parapsychology. He was born in Danzig, Germany, February 21, 1928. He was educated at the University of Göttingen (M.A., 1953) and the University of Cologne (Ph.D. Physics, 1958). He moved to North America in 1964 as a visiting lecturer at the University of British Columbia and stayed to become senior research physicist at Boeing Science Research Laboratory (1966–69) and a resident associate at the Institute of Parapsychology (1969–70). In 1970 he was named director of the institute, a position he held until 1973. More recently he became associated with The Mind Science Foundation in San Antonio, Texas.

Schmidt has been praised by critics of parapsychology as the person with the most sophisticated approach to the methodological design of parapsychological experiments. He has conducted research with electronic random generators (with which he is most identified), and with E. H. Walker he proposed a “psi enhancement” paradigm in which it is suggested that psi faculty is triggered at the instant of positive feedback. He also worked with Walter J. Levy, Jr. on possible PK in chickens, cockroaches, and rats, though the studies with Levy were called into question after it was discovered that he had been manipulating data.

Schneider Brothers, Willi (1903–1971) and Rudi (1908–1957)

Physical mediums of Braunau, Austria, initially discovered by Baron Schrenck-Notzing and tested by him under stringent conditions in the presence of a number of scientists. The father of the Schneider brothers was a linotype compositor. Of his six sons, four—Willi, Rudi, Hans and Karl—had psychic power, though the latter two only in a slight degree.

The trance personality of Willi was a woman, “Olga,” who said that her full name was Olga Lintner, and that she was the notorious Lola Montez, the mistress of Ludwig I, the king of Bavaria, who died in New York in 1861. Willi’s mediumistic development was taken up by Schrenck-Notzing.

Between December 3, 1921, and July 1, 1922, a hundred scientists witnessed Willi’s telekinesis and ectoplasm phenomena under very strict test conditions and declared themselves completely convinced of their reality. The room was searched, the medium was examined by specialists, and glowing pins were affixed to his clothing so that his slightest movements could be seen by witnesses even in the dark. Willi sat outside the cabinet. Two witnesses held his wrists and a third sat in front of him, holding his hands and keeping his legs between his own. Both medium and experimenters were shut off from the objects to be telekinetically moved by a gauze screen in the form of a cage. The severity of the control did not prevent the phenomena. The result of these sittings was published in Schrenck-Notzing’s Experimente der Fernbewegung in 1924.

In English-speaking countries, the mediumship of the Schneider brothers began to be known after British psychical researcher Harry Price, accompanied by Eric J. Dingwall, attended some sittings in 1922 in Munich. Both Price and Dingwall signed statements that they witnessed genuine phenomena.

Meanwhile Willi aspired to be a dentist. When he concentrated on his studies, his mediumship showed signs of weakening. Having left Schrenck-Notzing he went to Vienna where he lived with E. Holub, the head of a large asylum at Steinhof. He gave a series of sittings. When Holub died in 1924 Willi continued sitting with university professors.

Late in 1924, at the invitation of the Society for Psychical Research, Willi Schneider, accompanied by Mrs. Holub, came to London, and from November 12 to December 13 he gave twelve sittings on the society’s premises. According to E. J. Dingwall’s report in Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 36): “The only phenomena clearly observed were telekinetic, and even these were only striking upon a few occasions.”

Making every effort to find a normal explanation Dingwall stated:

“In order to raise an object 2–3 feet distant from him, the medium must have had concealed in his mouth an extensible apparatus workable by the mouth alone and by this means have supported a flat object lying on the table and raise it into the air from below. This feat must have been accomplished without any obvious interference with his breathing or speech; and when completed the rod must have been in some inexplicable manner withdrawn and again concealed in his mouth. We frankly do not believe such a device exists, and therefore are driven to the conclusion that the only reasonable hypothesis which covers the facts is that some supernormal agency produced the results.”

The development of Rudi Schneider’s powers was also under Schrenck-Notzing’s supervision. One night in a séance with Willi, “Olga” said that the power was not strong enough and that she wanted Rudi to assist. As Rudi was only eleven years of age then and was asleep in bed, the parents objected. “Olga” did not answer.

A few minutes later, however, the door opened and Rudi, in deep trance, entered and joined the circle. After that night, “Olga” permanently attached herself to Rudi and never spoke through Willi again. Her place was taken by “Mina,” another female personality.

Rudi’s first independent séance was held in November 1919, at Braunau. The materialization of a tiny hand was witnessed. One peculiarity of his sittings was the frequent intermissions that “Olga” demanded.

In 1923–24, Stefan Meyer and Karl Przibram, of the Institut für Radiumforschung der Academie der Wissenschaften, Vienna, detected Rudi evading control. After that they had no reason to believe that any of the phenomena they witnessed were of supernormal character. Actually, however, fraud was more assumed than proved. Rudi went on with his sittings and several reports of his mediumship appeared through the 1920s in the Journal of the ASPR. Then in April 1927, the journal Psyche published an article by Warren Jay Vinton that made a detailed and categorical charge of fraud through confederacy. Vinton was introduced at Braunau by Dingwall, attended a total of ten séances and concluded that the phenomena were caused by someone who secretly invaded the séance room.

The article made a stir and provoked strong comment both for and against these claims. J. Malcolm Bird, the research officer of the American Society for Psychical Research, decided to see the evidence for himself. He arrived at Braunau in October 1927, but owing to pressure of business could only stay for a single séance. His conclusion was that all the essentials of the Dingwall-Vinton theory were verified and all the conditions requisite to its operation were reproduced.

Harry Price and the VX

Some time after, Walter F. Prince attended a series of ten sittings with Rudi in Braunau and in Rudolf Lambert’s house at Stuttgart. Phenomena were scarce. In his notes in Bulletin VII of the Boston Society for Psychical Research, published under the title Experiments with Physical Mediums in Europe (1928), Prince came to the conclusion that the phenomena could not be considered genuine. He observed,

“Throughout the thirteen sittings, despite my studied and unremitting complaisance, no phenomena have occurred when I had any part in the control, save curtain movements which were capable of the simplest explanation.”

These events somewhat dimmed the luster of Rudi’s reputation. Schrenck-Notzing desired to settle the matter definitely and arranged an elaborate program of experiments for 1929. They were to be conducted in Herr Krall’s laboratory under a completed system of partly electrical, partly tactual control. Early in 1929, before the test could be conducted, both Schrenck-Notzing and Krall died. Later that year, psychical research Harry Price paid a visit to Munich. On this occasion he made arrangements with Rudi to visit the National Laboratory for Psychical Research in London. Karl Amereller, an electrician who employed Rudi, accompanied him to London and installed his electric indicator in the laboratory. This indicator was developed from Price’s electric chair idea. As developed at the beginning of 1923, it consisted of a number of electric contact-makers, normally kept apart by light springs which corresponded to various parts of the medium’s anatomy. The contacts were connected up with a row of colored indicator lights, so that should a person under test move or rise from the chair, the corresponding light immediately failed.

The plan of this indicator had been submitted to Baron Schrenck-Notzing and perfected by him and Amereller. In its latest phase, it controlled the four limbs of the medium by four separate electric circuits. In the experiments at the National Laboratory, however, Harry Price decided to control the hands and feet of the sitters in the same way, making six separate circuits and corresponding lights for all.

The first series of séances took place between April 12 and April 22, 1929. The second series lasted from November 14, 1929, to January 20, 1930. Both were eminently successful. As Harry Price stated in the conclusion to his book Rudi Schneider: A Scientific Investigation of his Mediumship (1930):

“But the fact remains that Rudi has been subjected to the most merciless triple control ever imposed upon a medium in this or any other country and has come through the ordeal with flying colours. The genuineness of the phenomena produced at his London séances has impressed nearly one hundred persons, including scientists, doctors, business men, professional magicians, journalists, etc. The triple control involved: The holding of Rudi’s hands and feet by one controller, a second person always having one hand upon the four locked hands of the medium and the controller; the electric indicator; the dressing of the medium in a pajama jacket to which metallic gloves were sewn, he being invariably searched besides.”

The phenomena witnessed were summed up by Harry Price as follows:

“. . . cold breezes felt by everyone; an occasional fall in the temperature of the cabinet . . . violent movements of the pair of curtains . . . movements and levitations of the luminous waste paper basket . . . and the coffee table . . . the ringing of the bells and the twanging of the toy zither, even in mid-air; the emergence from, and withdrawal into, the cabinet of a handkerchief, afterwards found in a far corner, tied into a tight knot, the ‘touchings’ and ‘brushings’ of the sitters at the wonderful thirteenth, fifteenth, twenty-first and other séances; the intelligent knocking of the table . . . when it was resting against a sitter’s leg near the end of the circle farthest from the medium; the tugs-of-war with Olga, and finally the emergence from, and withdrawal into, the cabinet of ‘hands,’ ‘arms,’ and ‘tubes,’ some perfectly formed. . . .

“. . . the following scientists have been present at the Rudi experiments: Lord Rayleigh, Prof. A. O. Rankine, F. C. S. Schiller, Dr. William Brown, Prof. Nils von Hofsten, Prof. A. F. C. Pollard, Mr. C. E. M. Joad, Mr. A. Egerton, Prof. A. M. Low, Dr. Braun, Dr. David Efron, Dr. Eugen Osty and Dr. Jeans.”

After the end of the séance on April 15, Price casually remarked to journalist Hannen Swaffer that he would give a thousand pounds to any person who could produce the same effects under identical conditions, provided that if the person failed he would pay a like sum to the laboratory. This was published as a challenge in the Daily Express and other papers. “No one appeared,” wrote Harry Price, “to want a thousand pounds, and the magical fraternity showed a sudden and strange lack of interest in psychic things. . . . What baffled magicians was the fact that the phenomena occurred inside the cabinet while Rudi was outside, nearly five feet away.”

Will Goldston, the famous stage magician, attended some séances and declared that under the same conditions a whole group of prestidigitators could not produce the phenomena which he witnessed.

As regards the personality, “Olga”: “After many séances and ‘confidential talks’ with her,” wrote Harry Price, “I am completely at a loss to know whether she is really a figment of Rudi’s subconscious mind or actually a discarnate entity.” After the experiments were over, Harry Price handed a certificate to Rudi Schneider on behalf of the Council of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research, stating that absolutely genuine phenomena have been produced through his mediumship. He added:

“If the Laboratory issued a ‘gold medal,’ or ‘diploma’ for genuine mediumship under our own scientific conditions, we should have no hesitation in awarding it to Rudi. I know of no other physical medium who could claim it—except perhaps Miss Stella C. . . . If Rudi were to be ‘exposed’ a hundred times in the future it would not invalidate or affect to the slightest degree our considered judgment that the boy has produced genuine abnormal phenomena while he has been at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research.”

The Schneider brothers did not accept payment for their services. In London, Rudi was only paid as much as he would have earned at his trade as a motor engineer, from which he was taken. In 1932, however, he raised his maintenance fees considerably.

In October and November 1930, Rudi sat at the Institut Métapsychique in Paris. According to Eugen Osty’s report, in the fourteenth séance infra-red photography revealed, at a distance from the medium, the existence of an invisible substance, localized in space but rigorously commanded by the psychical organism of the medium. Sound registering and recording instruments signaled the movements of this invisible substance. No screens and meshes of various materials, nor electrically charged plates, could intercept it. An increase in red light, a change in the conditions of the room, or a change in the medium’s position however, always sensibly diminished the action of the substance.

Under the conditions laid down by Osty, no fraud seemed possible. He was satisfied as to the reality of telekinetic movements. At the end of ninety sittings, Rudi was presented with a gift of 5,000 francs from the institute in recognition of the willing manner in which he had submitted to experimentations. For details of the experiments see Osty’s book Les Pouvoirs inconnus de l’esprit sur la matière (1932).

In the spring of 1932, Rudi again sat at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research. Out of twenty-seven séances, eighteen were negative. His powers appeared to be on the wane. Nevertheless Osty’s infra-red experiments were successfully duplicated and a number of distinguished scientists were convinced of the reality of the phenomena.

As, however, an automatic photograph taken in the twenty-fifth sitting apparently revealed (as disclosed a year later in Price’s report An Account of Some Further Experiments with Rudi Schneider), there was an arm free behind Rudi when both his hands were supposed to be controlled by the sitter in front. Price concluded that “it will be necessary for previous investigators to revise their findings.”

Both this conclusion and its basis were subjected to vigorous attack by Professor Fraser-Harris (Light, March 17, 1933). He gave his unqualified testimony to the genuineness of the medium. Several members of the laboratory’s council resigned to protest the report.

Strong exception to Price’s methods was also taken by Osty in an offprint from the Revue Métapsychique, April 1933, L’Etrange Conduit de M. Harry Price. It has also been suggested that Price misinterpreted or deliberately falsified this photograph.

In October–December 1932, Rudi gave 27 sittings in London to Lord Charles Hope’s research group. According to the report in Proceedings of the SPR (vol. 41, p. 131): “On the whole, the phenomena noted were weaker and less frequent than those reported as having taken place with the same medium elsewhere, but the results obtained go far to support the claims put forward by Dr. Osty in his report.” Replying to Price’s allegation of trickery, Lord Charles Hope stated in a special section of the report:

“I submit that neither the evidence Mr. Price adduces nor his method of presentation is such as to make his charges count for anything against a medium with Rudi’s record. What does emerge damaged from Mr. Price’s report is his own reputation as controller, conductor of investigations and critic.”

In an addendum, Theodore Besterman stated: “Quite apart from other and important considerations, Mr. Price’s report appears to me to be in itself quite worthless as an exposure. It can have no effect on Rudi Schneider’s standing.”

The next development was Bulletin V of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research (Rudi Schneider, the Vienna Experi- ments of Professors Meyer and Prizibram). This referred to sittings in 1924. The theories of fraud there advanced, however, had been dealt with earlier in Schrenck-Notzing's posthumous Die Phenomene des Mediums Rudi Schneider (December 1932) and by Osty in his book. The rest of the Bulletin was devoted to answering the criticism that Osty and others levelled against Price.

Meanwhile, Willi Schneider had retired from mediumship much earlier, after the sittings with Schrenck-Notzing. His psychic talents had waned, and he transferred his attention to studying dentistry. He died in 1971. Rudi gave up mediumship, married, and became an automobile mechanic, eventually owning a garage. He died April 28, 1957, at Weyer, Austria.

School of Economic Science

British-based organization that helped to promote the Transcendental Meditation technique of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi in Britain in the 1960s. The school's roots actually stem from the land reform economic theories of Henry George (author of Progress and Poverty, 1879) and the mystical theories of Georgi I. Gurdjieff and his disciple P. D. Ouspensky. It commenced primarily as a political and economic group, founded by Andrew MacLaren in Glasgow. It was developed by his son Leon (Leonardo da Vinci), who added the esoteric philosophy of Gurdjieff and later the meditation popularized by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi in the belief that the practical problems of the world could best be solved by transforming the nature of human beings.

Leon MacLaren was strongly attracted to the teachings of the Mahareshi at the latter's first visit to London in 1960, and in the following year MacLaren organized the Maharishi's first world assembly in the prestigious Albert Hall, London. In that year a school of meditation was established by members of the SES. Leon MacLaren made a pilgrimage to India and became convinced of the importance of Hindu-based meditation and philosophy. The connection with Maharishi appears to have been short lived and was eventually discarded as the school's own technique was put in place.

Leon MacLaren began to devote more time to the SES, giving up his professional work as a lawyer. The SES acquired a number of valuable properties throughout the United Kingdom and, with the success of its teachings, soon expanded abroad, with branches in Europe, Cyprus, Malta, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, North America, Trinidad, and Fiji. The organization was variously styled the "School of Philosophy," and/or the "School of Economics and Philosophy." The enormous successful expansion appears to owe much to MacLaren's systematic method and his firm control over the organization's branches.

As with the esoteric tradition in general and the Gurdjieff tradition in particular, some degree of secrecy veils much of the SES program from the uninitiated public. It appears to have an eclectic program for personal development drawing on the Sufism so central to Gurdjieff and various more or less familiar Hindu and yogic techniques.

The organization has encountered some criticism. Several people who had a bad experience with the group have branded it with the "cult" and "brainwashing" labels of the anti-cult movement, which the leadership of SES has chosen to ignore. School of Universal Philosophy and Healing

British Spiritualist organization founded in 1946 by the medium Grace Spearman-Cook, based on the teachings of her spirit guide "Ra-Men-Ra." The purpose of Universal Philosophy was to awaken the soul to its spiritual destiny so that it may participate actively in the working and unfolding of the cosmos. The school also published the monthly The Occult Gazette, Last known address: 6 Phillimore Place, Kensington, London, W8, England.

Schrenck-Notzing, Baron Albert von (1862–1929)

German pioneer of psychical research, a physician of Munich who specialized in psychiatry, which eventually led him into psychical research. He was born May 18, 1862, at Oldenburg, Germany, and educated at the University of Munich. He investigated the mysteries of somnambulism while a student, when, in hypnotic experiments, he succeeded in obtaining duplications of personality. He soon realized that there was a new realm of science awaiting discovery.

With a young woman of Munich, Lina M., he made experiments in thought-transference. They were described by Baron Carl du Prel in his books. Lina M. also presented the curious phenomenon of the transposition of the senses, when senses blocked from normal activity reappear and operate from another place on the body.

Magdeleine C., a musical medium, gave Schrenck-Notzing opportunity to study hypnotic alterations of personality. She was a dancer who, in trance, interpreted the feelings and reproduced the actions of various personalities and played any piece of music suggested mentally by a committee on the stage.

These cases, the study of which was described in Schrenck-Notzing's monograph Die Traumtänzerin Magdeleine C. (1904) marked the transition between his research on hypnosis and metapsychics. He resigned from the Gesellschaft für Wissenschaftliche Psychologie, a Spiritualist society which Carl du Prel founded, established himself as an authority in sexual anomalies and criminal psychopathy, published essays upon the importance of suggestion in medico-legal practice, and wrote many other remarkable books.

By his marriage to Gabrielle Siegle in 1892, he suddenly became financially independent, and he surrendered his medical practice and devoted himself exclusively to research. With the awakening of his interest in metapsychics he founded the Gesellschaft für Metapsychische Forschung and began the study of telekinesis and teleplastics (or ectoplasm) that rendered him famous. Up to the time of his death, there was no important medium in Europe with whom he did not conduct personal experiments.

He commenced with Eusapia Palladino, at whose séances in Rome he was present as early as 1894. He followed her all over Europe and invited her twice to Munich as his guest. But he did not declare his belief in the reality of her phenomena until 1914 and only published his Rome and Munich séance records in Physikalische Phenomene des Mediumismus in 1920.

For many years he studied the phenomena of materialization of Eva C. (Marthe Béraud), in Munich and at Juliette Bisson's house in Paris. His book, Materialisations-Phenomene, published in Germany in 1914, at the same time as Bisson's work in France, is amply illustrated with photographs. He discussed the phenomena, concluding, "I am of the opinion that the hypothesis of spirits not only fails to explain the least detail of these processes, but in every way it obstructs and shackles serious scientific research." However, he put forward the equally vague theory of teleplasmic (ectoplasmic) phenomena. (In recent years Eva C. has been shown to have been a clever fraud who seems, with Bisson's help, to have completely fooled Schrenck-Notzing.) The book evoked much public criticism. The pros and cons were summed up by Schrenck-Notzing in a later book, Der Kampf um die Materialisations Phänomene (Battle for the Phenomena of Materialization). The two main works appeared in English translation under the title Phenomena of Materialisation (London, 1920, 1923; New York, 1975).

A supplementary volume to the original book was published in 1922. In it the cases of Willi Schneider, Stanislava P., Maria Silbert and Einer Nielsen were presented. Schrenck-Notzing also sat with Stanislawa Tomczyk, Franek Kluski, Linda Gazzera, Lucia Sordi, and many other mediums. Their cases were reviewed in his book Physikalische Phänomene des Mediumismus (1920). He expressed his conclusions as follows:

"The telekinetic and teleplasmic phenomena are not only different degrees of the same animistic process, they depend in the end upon physical manifestations in the subconscious sphere of the medium. The soi-disant occult intelligences which manifest and materialize themselves in the séance, never display any higher spiritual faculty than is owned by the medium and the sitters; they are wholly of oneiric type, dream personifications that correspond to detached memories, to beliefs, to all the miscellaneous things that lie dormant in the minds of the participants. It is not on a foundation of extra-corporeal beings that one will find the secret of the psycho-dynamical phenomena of these subjects, but rather through consideration of hitherto unknown transformations of the biopsychical forces of the medium's organism."

When he discovered the mediumistic gifts of the Schneider children, he trained Willi Schneider so that the same phenomenon could be repeated under similar conditions at specified times and before varying observers. The conditions of these experiments were very strict and the records considered unimpeachable. An electrical system of control made the phenomena apparently fraud-proof. Schrenck-Notzing's work was criticized by Harry Price, but supported by a group of scientists who witnessed the phenomena in 1922 and declared themselves completely convinced of the reality of telekinesis and ectoplasm. The book, Experimente der Fernbewegung, Stuttgart, 1924, in which he summed up the story of these researches, is one of the most important works on telekinesis.

In Der Betrug des Mediums Ladislaus László, published in the same year in Leipzig, he described his experiences in Budapest with a pseudo-medium, László. At the conclusion of a series of four sittings he advised the sponsor of the medium, a Mr. Torday, of his uncertainties. Soon after László confessed to gross fraud. When Willi Schneider "lost" much of his power, the Baron trained his brother, Rudi. He discovered another subject, Karl Weber (Karl Kraus), a young man who produced levitations at will and while awake. He reported on him at the Paris Congress.

However, Malcolm Bird in Psychic Research (July 1930) accused Schrenck-Notzing of "extraordinary improprieties in the way of suppressing unfavorable evidence," and cited as one instance that Schrenck-Notzing had completely concealed at the Paris Congress that "Karl Weber" was identical to the notorious Karl Kraus.

In his last years, Schrenck-Notzing devoted much attention to the phenomena of haunting. He left behind a posthumous book, Gefälschte Wunder: Kraus-László-Schlag, in manuscript. In 1929, his widow published his collected articles; Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Parapsychologie devoted 47 pages to intellectual and more than 300 to experimental physical phenomena.

Another posthumous volume (Die Phänomene des Mediums Rudi Schneider) was published in December 1932. As René Sudre pointed out in his memorial article in Psychic Research (May 1929), Schrenck-Notzing never made any attempt at an inner interpretation of the phenomena he observed. "He lacked the spirit of the philosopher. With him there existed no urgent need for construction; he felt only the urge of accumulating material."

He died February 12, 1929, at Munich, Germany.

Schucman, Helen (1910–1981)

Helen Schucman, the psychologist and channel who received the material later incorporated into A Course in Miracles (ACIM), the most successful channelled work of the late twentieth century, was born Helen Cohn, the daughter of Sigmund Cohn, a chemist. Her mother had dabbled both in Theosophy and Christian Science, but Helen had not been interested in either. She was influenced by a Roman Catholic governess and throughout her life she periodically attended mass and possessed a number of rosaries she had collected over the years. During her teens, she was attended by an African-American maid who saw to her baptism as a Baptist. However, through most of her life, she was a professing atheist who was quite aware of the dominant secularism of her professional colleagues.

She attended New York University, aiming for a career as a writer or possibly an English teacher, but following her graduation suffered a traumatic experience from complications following a gall bladder operation. In 1933 she married Louis Schucman, the owner of an antiquarian bookstore, and settled down to life as a housewife and sometime assistant to her husband. In 1952, however, she decided to return to school and entered the psychology program at her alma mater. She specialized in clinical psychology and concentrated upon the problems of mental retardation in children.

Following her graduation with a Ph.D., in 1958 she accepted a position at Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center. Here she met William N. Tetford, the new head of the hospital's Psychology Department. The pair was temperamentally very different, and the next seven years they had an often stormy relationship. Then in 1965, Tetford, who had been dabbling in metaphysical literature, suggested that they attempt to change their relationship and shortly thereafter, at Tetford's suggestion, they began to practice meditation. Schucman began to have vivid visual experiences. Tetford suggested that she record her experiences, but on October 21, 1965, she heard an inner voice that told her, "This is a course in miracles. Please take notes." Again Tetford suggested that she do what the voice told her.

Schucman recorded what she was told in shorthand and over the next seven years read her notes to Tetford, who transcribed them. Eventually some 1,200 pages were received. She then worked with Kenneth Wapnick to edit the materials that would later be published as the three-volume A Course in Mira- cles. The material, whose teachings are very close to those found in New Thought metaphysics, claims to have been dictated by Jesus Christ. It offers a means to a more meaningful life as an awakened child of god who learns the self-recrimination that manifests as guilt and hostility can be overcome through forgiveness and learning to forgive.

Schucman was ambivalent about the material and the method of its reception, both of which contradicted her self-professed atheism. However, she slowly became more comfortable with the material and finally allowed its publication in 1975. She assigned the copyrights to the Foundation for Inner Peace, a corporation set up to publish the books and disseminate the teachings. The Course took off and quickly spread through the New Thought and New Age communities. However, Schucman continued to be in the background and, while identified as the channel, was known only to a small circle of early leaders in the New York area.

In 1980, she developed pancreatic cancer and withdrew even more and lived largely cut off from the growing ACIM community until her death in 1981. Only in the years after her death was the story of her life made known.

Scientific American (Journal)

In the summer of 1922, this New York journal, known for its outstanding presentation of scientific findings to the American lay public, decided to investigate the subject of psychical research. Contributions were invited, but as these proved to be rather contradictory, a plan was worked out for first-hand investigation, and the sum of $2,500 was promised for the demonstration of an objective psychic phenomenon before a committee of five.

The offer was to remain open from January 1923, when it was published in the Scientific American, until December 31, 1924. The committee consisted of William McDougall, a professor of psychology at Harvard; Daniel Frost Comstock, formerly of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and then a retired inventor; Walter Franklin Prince, principal research officer of the American Society of Psychical Research; Hereward Carrington, the well-known psychical investigator and author; and Harry Houdini, the stage magician and escapologist. J. Malcolm Bird, associate editor of the Scientific American, was assigned to the committee as a non-voting member to perform secretarial duties.

Psychics and mediums proved reluctant to appear before the committee, some objecting to its composition. In fourteen months, the committee had only three applicants. The verdict in each case was fraud, conscious or otherwise.

The offer of the Scientific American was enlarged in April 1924. It comprised the payment of the expenses of any high-class medium who would come forward, regardless of the verdict. No response came, but Bird succeeded in making arrangements with Mina Crandon, soon to become famous as "Margery," the wife of L. R. Crandon of Boston, to sit for investigation in Boston. In return for the change of scene, necessitated by L. R. Crandon's professional engagements, the doctor waived the Scientific American's offer to pay expenses and himself undertook to pay the committee's expenses in Boston.

The “Margery” Sitzings

The first séance was held on April 12. The committee witnessed gradual development of interesting phenomena and made good headway into the investigation by using scientific instruments. Final judgment might have been reached; however, friction, dissension, and distrust arose between the members.

One focus of tension was Houdini. He had established, at that time, a reputation in the unmasking of fraudulent mediums. In the end, possibly not without justification, he openly accused Bird with confederacy in producing the mediumistic phenomena. Other members of the committee had come to believe that Bird was at best highly incompetent.

Houdini obtained no direct proof against “Margery,” yet after two sittings in July, he published a document attacking both the Crandons and Malcolm Bird. He began to give lectures in which he claimed to have infallibly demonstrated that the rest of the committee was duped.

Orson D. Munn, the publisher of the Scientific American, now stepped in and, noting that the finality of the exposure was in no way acknowledged by the committee itself, prevailed upon Houdini to go back for further sittings in August and to make an attempt to reach a final verdict. At that stage, since Carrington had pronounced the mediumship genuine, he withdrew from further sittings. McDougall was otherwise engaged, so Comstock, Houdini, and Prince remained on the scene.

Houdini constructed a supposedly “fraud-proof” wooden cage for the critical séance, but refused to sit with it in red light, demanded total darkness, and categorically denied the request of his colleagues for its examination. The committee yielded to Houdini but some suspicion was present. In any case, after a few minutes of the séance the entire top of the cage was found open and Houdini at once stated that anybody sitting in it could throw it open with her shoulders. It appeared, therefore, that the problem at this point was Houdini’s design. This incident was followed with confrontations between Houdini and “Margery’s” spirit control “Walter,” who demanded to know how much Houdini was getting for stopping phenomena. “Walter” advised Comstock to take the bell box out into white light and examine it. Sure enough, a rubber eraser, off the end of a pencil, was found tucked down into the angle between the contact boards, necessitating four times the usual pressure to ring the bell.

At the next séance, when the top of the cage was properly secured, Houdini, on some pretext, put his arm in through the porthole at the last minute. “Walter” thereupon denounced Houdini and accused him of putting a ruler in the cage under the cushion on which “Margery’s” feet rested. The accusation was proved. A two-foot jointed ruler, of the sort used by carpenters, folded into four sections, was found at the designated spot. After this, Houdini was delivered an ultimatum for handing over the cage to the committee. Houdini refused to comply, packed the cage up, and carted it away.

The attitude of the rest of the committee towards the mediumship of “Margery” was also open to criticism. Prince sat ten times, Comstock 56 times, McDougall 22 times; none of them uncovered any fraud, yet they came increasingly to agree that the phenomena were not genuine.

Malcolm Bird’s Role

The next crisis came with Malcolm Bird’s unofficial (and very favorable) account of the investigation in the Scientific American. In the press reproductions, the distinction between the Scientific American and the committee was lost; headlines shrieked across the country that “Margery” was about to win the prize. Prince insisted that the Scientific American articles be stopped until the committee was through with the case and threatened resignation. Houdini sided with him. The articles were discontinued, and Bird was pressured to resign from further association with the committee.

When the August séances were over and still no verdict had been reached, the Scientific American insisted on its rights and demanded a statement from the committee or from its individual members. These statements were published in November 1924. Carrington pronounced the mediumship genuine and so proved, Houdini pronounced it fraudulent and so proved. Comstock said he found it interesting and wanted to see more of it. Prince disclaimed to have seen enough. McDougall could not be reached, but later sided with Comstock. After this, Prince and McDougall attended some more séances. Prince witnessed bell ringing in perfect daylight with the bell box in his lap; McDougall saw it ringing while being carried about the room, yet they still refused to commit themselves. Thus ended the investigation of the committee of the Scientific American.

In April 1925, O. D. Munn announced: “The famous Margery case is over so far as the Scientific American investigation is concerned.” The question of the “Margery” mediumship was now transferred from the Scientific American fiasco to the ASPR. Bird left the editorial board of the Scientific American and became a staff member of the ASPR. As a result the “Margery” question became central to the organization. Prince, who considered Bird incompetent, resigned, and, with others who had come to doubt Crandon’s abilities, he founded the Boston Society for Psychical Research. He was joined by William MacDougall, Gardner Murphy and Elwood Worcester. Bird’s book on “Margery” appeared in 1925.

The affair seemed to have reached a stalemate: the ASPR basically backed “Margery,” and the Boston SPR opposed her. Then Bird submitted a confidential report to the ASPR board in which he revealed that, contrary to his own book, he was aware that at least some of the phenomena produced by Margery were produced in a mundane manner and that he had been approached to become the Crandons’ accomplice. Bird soon resigned and dropped out of sight.

Scientology, Church of

In 1950 writer L. Ron Hubbard announced the discovery of Dianetics as a new system of mental health. Several years later he announced the further development of Dianetics into a comprehensive system of spiritual philosophy and religion, which he termed Scientology. Both Dianetics and Scientology now form the teachings and practice of the Church of Scientology.

Dianetics

Developed in part in reaction to the dominance of behavioral approaches to psychology and then-current psychotherapeutic practices such as electric shock therapy, Dianetics is based upon the idea that the human is identified with the soul (termed the Thetan), and Dianetics identifies what the soul does to the body through the mind. It was first exposed to the public in the article “Dianetics . . . An Introduction to a New Science” in the pages of Astounding Science Fiction (May 1950), a magazine published by one of Hubbard’s friends who had become enthusiastic about the possibilities of the new approach. Several weeks later Hubbard’s book Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health was published, on May 9, 1950, and became an overnight best-seller.

Hubbard suggested that the goal of life was what he termed “infinite survival.” Pain, disappointment, and failure are the results of actions that do not promote survival, he said. The mind operates to solve the problems relating to survival. From the information it receives, stored in mental pictures, it directs the individual in actions geared toward surviving. Such mental images are three dimensional—they have energy and mass, they exist in space, and they tend to appear when someone thinks of them, Hubbard said. They are strung together in a consecutive record accumulated over a lifetime Hubbard called a “time track.”

The theory of Dianetics is a variation on preexisting concepts of conscious and unconscious mind, using the terms analytic and reactive mind. The analytic mind, according to Hubbard, records the mental image pictures derived from our experiences. However, pictures of experience which contain pain or painful emotions are recorded in the reactive mind. Also, experiences that occur when a person is unconscious (on the operating table, for example) or partially conscious (when inebriated) are recorded by the reactive mind and are not available to the analytic mind, he said.

The problem with the reactive mind is that it stores particular types of mental images called “engrams” (a term borrowed from psychologist Richard Semon to denote a memory trace), creating a complete record of unpleasant or unconscious experiences. It also thinks in identities, equating the various elements of a painful experiences. In the future, when one experiences several elements in the engram, all of the pain and emotion of past experiences will flood back into the present. Over a lifetime, the cumulative effect of engrams can be a set of unwanted and little-understood negative conditions, including, but not limited to, pains, emotional blocks, and even physical illnesses, according to Hubbard. Armed with Hubbard’s book, any ordinary individual was considered competent to practice a simple system of psychotherapy superior to those involving specialized training.

Having discovered the nature of the human psyche, Hubbard set out to discover the means of addressing psychological disorders. His techniques are supposed to erase the contents of the reactive mind, rendering them useless in further affecting the person without his/her conscious knowledge.

The aim of the techniques is the production of a “clear,” a person whose reactive mind has been cleared, who has no engrams. The primary technique is called “auditing,” a one-on-one counseling process that uses an instrument called an “E-meter,” a modified whetstone bridge that measures the level of electrical resistance in the human body. It is the belief that such resistance is directly related to the focus upon an engram. The process of becoming a clear occurs in a series of classes and personal counseling sessions. Participants record the state of clear in degrees.

Hubbard founded the Hubbard Dianetic Research Foundation in June 1950. He spent the rest of the year traveling and lecturing and the following year opened the Hubbard College in Wichita, Kansas. By this time Hubbard had speculated that human beings are basically spiritual, and that once cleared, have great potential. These insights led to what would be termed “Scientology.” The Hubbard Association Scientology International was founded in 1952, and the first Church of Scientology opened two years later. Dianetics became the method of entering the church and discovering its teachings.

Scientology

Hubbard proposed the existence of engrams—painful impressions from past experiences, extending back into innumerable previous incarnations. According to his book The History of Man (1952), the human body houses two entities—a genetic entity (for carrying on the evolutionary line), and a Thetan, or consciousness, like an individual soul, that has the capacity to separate from body and mind. In man’s long evolutionary development the Thetan has been trapped by the engrams formed at various stages of embodiment, Hubbard says.

As soon became obvious in Dianetics, clears were not the fully liberated individuals it had been hoped they would be. The idea of engrams from past lives explained the problem, thus a new concept appeared in Scientology—the “MEST-Clear” (MEST = Matter-Energy-Space-Time). Much of Hubbard’s thinking resonates with the concepts of reincarnation and transmigration of souls found in Eastern religions. The goal of Scientology training thus became the final clearing of the individual of all engrams and the creation of what is termed an “Operating Thetan.” Among the abilities of the operating Thetan is the soul’s capacity to leave and operate apart from the body.

The exact content of the teachings of the Church of Scientology are imparted in the classes attended by church members and are not revealed to the public. Such is especially true of the highest classes (OT-4-7 levels), though jumbled accounts have been presented in books by former members, several of whom left the church with the confidential materials used in the classes and who tried to hurt the church by making these materials available to the general public. As in Dianetics, one progresses through the OT levels on a degree basis, the mastering of one level being a prerequisite to the next.

Scientology’s Controversy

Almost from its beginning, Scientology has been a controversial religion. Soon after his announcement of the discovery of Dianetics, Hubbard encountered opposition by the American Medical Association, and in 1958 a two-decade battle with the Food and Drug Administration began. The initiation of these continuing battles had immense consequences, and critics of the church used the actions in one country as a basis for initiating actions elsewhere. Also, government files, not checked for accuracy, were passed to other government agencies and to other countries. Suddenly, in the 1960s, Scientology found itself under attack from a variety of quarters and has spent 30 years in the courts in the attempt to vindicate its existence and program.

Through the 1970s and 1980s, the church fought battles with the Internal Revenue Service in the United States (finally resolved in the early 1990s) and with several former members and anticult organizations who accused it of brainwashing church members. The church itself initiated legal action against publications that it believed libeled the organization and its founder. Important international cases were fought and won in Australia, Canada, and Great Britain, and ongoing cases are pending in Germany, among the most conservative of Western countries concerning religious freedom issues.

In the midst of its fight with the U.S. government, and continually blocked in its attempt to gather documentation of covert government actions against the church, in the mid-1970s several high officials conspired to infiltrate targeted agencies and obtain copies of files on the church. The FBI, CIA, and IRS were especially high on their list. When the plan was discovered, it resulted in a massive raid on the church’s headquarters. Several church officials were arrested and convicted of theft of government property.

As of the 1990s, with the solving of its problems with the U.S. government, the church has moved to gain its rights as a viable religion in Germany and to oppose the actions of the Cult Awareness Network—which it believes is simply an anti-religious organization—and similar groups internationally.

The Church of Scientology reports members in 129 countries and the words of L. Ron Hubbard have been translated into over 30 languages. They also maintain social reform and community activities among services such as the World Institute of Scientology Enterprises (WISE), that provide professional groups with strategies to find harmony in the workplace.

Sciomancy

A somewhat obscure branch of divination concerned with the evocation of astral reflections to ascertain future events.

Scoresby, William (1789–1857)

British Arctic explorer, whaler, physicist, author, and clergyman who was also a pioneer in the study of animal magnetism. He was born on October 5, 1789, at Cropton, near Whitby, England. At the age of eleven, he accompanied his father (a master mariner) on a whaling expedition, afterward resuming his education at a simple country school. Three years later, he was apprenticed to his father on a whaler. He made annual voyages to Greenland, and became a ship's chief officer in 1806. Later in the same year, he resumed his studies, entering Edinburgh University, Scotland, and studying chemistry and natural philosophy.

In 1807, he undertook a voyage to survey and chart the Balta Sound in the Shetland Islands. Afterward he served with the fleet at Copenhagen. He left the navy a year later and became acquainted with Joseph Banks, who introduced him to other scientists of the day. Scoresby made studies of natural phenomena and resumed attendance at Edinburgh University. From 1813 to 1817, he was at sea again, in charge of whaling vessels. In January 1819, he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and in the following month he contributed a paper on variations of the magnetic needle to the Royal Society of London. The next year he published his first book, An Account of the Arctic Regions, with a History and Description of the Northern Whale-Fishery (2 vols., 1820), for many years the standard work on the subject. This was the first of a number of books that grew out of his worldwide travels.

In 1819, Scoresby moved with his family to Liverpool, where he superintended the building of the Baffin, a vessel fitted for the Greenland trade. He made three successful voyages in this vessel, but on returning to Liverpool in 1822, he found that his wife had died. Her death stimulated his strong religious convictions. Following his next voyage in 1823, he entered Queen's College, Cambridge, England, to prepare for the ministry. He was ordained in 1825, and for two years he was curé of Bessingby, near Bridlington Quay, in the north of England.

He became successively chaplain of Mariners Church, Liverpool (1827–32), incumbent of Bedford Chapel, Exeter (1832–39), and vicar of Bradford (1839–47). He resigned because of ill health, having spent six months leave on a voyage to the United States in search of a replacement. He lived his last years at the English seaside resort of Torquay when he was not traveling in search of some relief from his illness. He died at Torquay on March 21, 1857.

It was during his years at Exeter that Scoresby's interest in animal magnetism (mesmerism), arising from his observations on terrestrial magnetism during his polar voyages, emerged. During his last years at Torquay, he conducted a number of experiments, having found that he could mesmerize subjects easily. He gave the name "zoistic magnetism" to this hypnotic faculty. His third wife was one of his hypnotic subjects.

Scoresby's careful research into the possibility of clairvoyance resulted in persuasive evidence for thought transference or community of sensation between operator and subject. One entranced subject was able to describe accurately food that Scoresby tasted and also identified physical sensations in Scoresby's body. Another subject was immobilized as she sat on a sofa that had been "magnetized" by Scoresby and was unable to move outside an imaginary circle that Scoresby had traced on the floor. The power of purely imaginary diagrams to imprison hypnotized subjects was often explored by early mesmerists and suggests affinities with the magic circles of occult magicians.

Scoresby's work in the field of animal magnetism is of special importance. His book Zoistic Magnetism influenced James Esdaile, who read it while he was in India. Esdaile claimed to have successfully repeated Scoresby's experiment in "magnetizing" a sofa, using an armchair with knobs that Esdaile "magnetized." The subject was unable to remove his hands from the chair knobs until Esdaile had made mesmeric passes over him.

Scoriton Affair

As he later told the story, on April 24, 1965, at about 5:30 in the late afternoon, Ernest Arthur Bryant, a resident of Scoriton, Devonshire, England, saw a flying saucer approach. It stopped near to him, and a door opened. Three beings appeared and beckoned to him. He approached the saucer. Two of the three beings appeared to be nonhuman, but the third seemed to be a youth in his teens. The youth spoke with an accent that Bryant thought might be Russian and called himself Yamski. He said that he was from Venus, and then remarked that he wished Des was there, as he would understand what was happening. At the close of their conversation, he said that in a month he would return and bring proof of Mantell.

Ufologists who would eventually hear the story immediately associated Yamski with George Adamski, the controversial flying saucer contactee who had died on April 23, 1965. Adamski was of Polish background and had a noticeable accent. If this were Adamski, he would have immediately lost the signs of his aging. Adamski had a friend Desmond Leslie with whom he had written his first book. Captain Thomas F. Mantell, piloting an F-51, had been killed when he began chasing what he thought was a flying saucer. According to Bryant, the saucer returned in June and left some items, including several pieces of metal that could have possibly come from an F-51.

He reported the story to the British UFO Research Association (BUFORA), and an investigation was launched. The various items Bryant turned over to the two investigators proved to be mundane and of no relation to the F-51. In spite of problems with the story, one of the investigators, Eileen Buckle, rushed into print with a book. Shortly thereafter, Bryant unexpectedly took ill and died from a brain tumor. The other investigator, Norman Oliver, visited his widow. She reported that she was familiar with the story in the book as her husband has presented it to her first as the script for a science fiction novel. It was only after the investigation was well along that she realized her husband was trying to sell the story as a real event. She indicated that the supposed items related to Mantell had been purchased at a naval surplus store.

Alice Wells, head of the Adamski Foundation, dismissed the Scoriton story from the beginning, as did Desmond Leslie. Between their rejection and Oliver's uncovering of the hoax, few remained to support Bryant except Buckle. It is remembered amid the many UFO hoax attempts primarily because it extends, however briefly, the entertaining story of George Adamski.

SCOTLAND

Witchcraft

Witchcraft and, more commonly, sorcery, malevolent magic, appear to have been practiced in the earliest historical and traditional times in Scotland. It is related that during the reign of Natholocus in the second century there lived in Iona a witch of great renown, so celebrated for her marvelous power that the king sent one of his captains to consult her regarding the issue of a rebellion then troubling his kingdom. The witch declared that within a short period the king would be murdered, not by his open enemies but by one of his most favored friends, in whom he had most special trust. The messenger inquired the assassin's name. "Even by thine own hands as shall be well known within these few days," replied the witch.

So troubled was the captain on hearing these words that he abused her bitterly, vowing that he would see her burned before he would commit such a crime. But after reviewing the matter carefully in his mind, the captain arrived at the conclusion that if he informed the king of the witch's prophecy, the king might, for the sake of his personal safety, have him put to death, so thereupon he decoyed Natholocus into his private chamber and killed him with a dagger.

In about the year 388, the devil was said to be so enraged at the piety of St. Patrick that he assailed the saint with a whole band of witches in Scotland. The story goes that St. Patrick fled to the river Clyde, embarking in a small boat for Ireland. As witches cannot pursue their victims over running water, they flung a huge rock after the escaping saint, which fell harmlessly to the ground, and which tradition says now forms Dumbarton Rock.

Catholic and Protestant church leaders alike pursued the crusade against witchcraft with equal vigor, drawing their support from biblical passages such as Exodus 22:18, which commands, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." Witches were believed to have sold themselves, body and soul, to the devil. Their ceremony was said to consist of kneeling before the devil, who placed one hand on the individual's head and the other under her feet, while she dedicated all between to the service of the devil and renounced baptism. The witch (usually thought of as a female) was thereafter deemed to be incapable of reformation. No minister of any denomination whatever would intercede or pray for her. On sealing the compact, the devil then proceeded to put his mark upon her.

Writing on the "Witches' Mark," the Reverend Bell, minister of Gladsmuir, in 1705 states,

"The witches' mark is sometimes like a blew spot, or a little tale, or reid spots, like fleabiting, sometimes the flesh is sunk in and hollow and this is put in secret places, as among the hair of the head, or eyebrows, within the lips, under the armpits, and even in the most secret parts of the body."

The Reverend Robert Kirk of Aberfoyle in his Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns and Fairies (written in 1691) notes,

"A spot that I have seen, as a small mole, horny, and brown colored, throw which mark when a large brass pin was thrust (both in buttock, nose, and roof of the mouth) till it bowed [bent] and became crooked, the witches, both men and women, nather felt a pain nor did bleed, nor knew the precise time when this was doing to them (their eyes only being covered)."

In many cases the mark was invisible, and according to popular lore, no pain accompanied the pricking of it. Thus, there arose a group of experts who pretended great wisdom and skill concerning the marks. They referred to themselves as "witch prickers" and it became their business to discover and label witches.

The method employed was barbarous. First, having stripped and bound his victim, the witch pricker proceeded to thrust his needles into every part of the body. When at last the victim, worn out with exhaustion and agony, remained silent, the witch pricker declared that he had discovered the mark.

The witch pricker could also resort to trial by water. The suspects were tied, wrapped in a sheet, and flung into a deep pool. In cases where the body floated, the water of baptism was supposed to be giving the accused, while those who sank to the bottom were absolved, but no attempt was made at rescue.

If a confession was demanded, tortures was resorted to, burning with irons being generally the last torture applied. In some cases a diabolic contrivance called the "witches' bridle" was used. The "bridle" encircled the victim's head while a pronged iron bit was thrust into the mouth, piercing the tongue, palate, and cheeks. In cases of execution, the victim was usually strangled and her body later burned at the stake.

Witches were accused of a great variety of sorceries. Common offenses were bewitching milk cattle by turning their milk sour or curtailing the supply, raising storms, stealing children from their graves, and promoting various illnesses. A popular device was to make a waxen image of the victim, thrust pins into it, and sear it with hot irons, all of which the victim was supposed to feel. Upon domestic animals witches cast an evil eye, causing emaciation and refusal to take food until at length death ensued. On the other hand, to those who believed in them and acknowledged their power, witches were supposed to use their powers for good by curing disease and causing prosperity.

Witches were believed to meet weekly, at which time the devil presided. Saturday was commonly called "the witches' sabbat," as their meetings were generally believed to be held on that day in a desolate place or possibly a ruined church building (a number of which had been left by the invading Vikings). They rode to the gatherings through the air on broomsticks (see transvection). If the devil was not present on their arrival, they evoked him by beating the earth with a fir stick and saying "Rise up foul thief."

The witches appeared to see the devil in different guises; to some he appeared as a boy clothed in green, others saw him dressed in white, while to others he appeared mounted on a black horse. After delivering a mock sermon, he held a court at which the witches had to make a full statement of their doings during the week. Those who had not accomplished sufficient "evil" were beaten with their own broomsticks, while those who had been more successful were rewarded with enchanted bones. The proceedings finished with a dance, the music to which the fiend played on his bagpipes.

The poet Robert Burns in his Tale of Tam o'Shanter gave a graphic description of a witches' gathering. There were great annual gatherings at Candlemas (February 2), Beltane (April 30), and Hallow-eve (October 31). These were of an international character and the witch sisterhood of all nations assembled, those who had to cross the sea performing the journey in barges of eggshell, while their aerial journeys were on goblin horses with enchanted bridles.

Laws Against Witchcraft

Through the confessions extracted from accused witches, guided by the fantasies about witchcraft in the several manuals that circulated through Europe beginning late in the fifteenth century, a picture of witchcraft was constructed and then promulgated into a society that still strongly believed in the powers of supernatural magic. In response to the fear of sorcerers and witches, the government passed laws outlawing their reported activities. In Scotland, less than a century after the redefinition of witchcraft as apostasy by the Roman Catholic Church in the 1480s, the first witchcraft law was enacted in the form of statute passed in 1563 in the Parliament of Queen Mary. It read (in the now archaic English of the time),

"That na maner of person nor persons of quhatsumever estate, degree or condition they be of, take upon hand in onie times hereafter to use onie maner of witchcraft, sorcerie, or necromancie, under the paine of death, alswell to be execute against the user, abuser, as the seeker of the response of consultation."

Scottish Catholics then accused Protestant reformer John Knox of being a renowned wizard and having by sorcery raised up saints in the churchyard of St. Andrews, when Satan himself was said to have appeared and so terrified Knox's secretary that he became insane and died. Knox was also charged with using his magical arts in his old age to persuade the beautiful young daughter of Lord Ochiltree to marry him.

There were numerous trials for witchcraft in the Justiciary Court in Edinburgh and at the circuit courts, while session records preserved from churches all over Scotland also show that numerous cases were dealt with by local authorities and church officials.

C. Rodgers, in his book Social Life in Scotland, (3 vols., 1884-86) states:

"From the year 1479 when the first capital sentence was carried out thirty thousand persons had on the charge of using enchantment been in Great Britain cruelly immolated; of these one fourth belonged to Scotland. No inconsiderable number of those who suffered on the charge of sorcery laid claim to necromantic acts with intents felonious or unworthy."

When James VI of Scotland in the year 1603 was called upon to ascend the throne of Great Britain and Ireland (as James I), his own native kingdom was in a rather curious condition. James himself was a man of considerable learning, intimate with Latin and theology, while his book, Daemonologie marks him as a person completely absorbed in the supernatural. Moreover while education and even scholarship were comparatively common at this date in Scotland (more common in fact than they were in contemporary England), the great mass of Scottish people shared abundantly their sovereign's dread of witches and sorcery. The efforts of Knox and his associates had brought about momentous changes in Scottish life, but if the Reformation rejected certain popular beliefs, Presbyterianism (the particular form of Protestant Christianity that came to power in Scotland) undoubtedly tended to introduce others. For that stern Calvinistic faith that now began to take root in Scotland nourished the idea that sickness and accident were a mark of divine anger. This theory did not cease to be common in the north till long after King James' day.

King James mentioned few precise facts concerning the practitioners of magic who were said to flourish in Scotland during his reign. But other sources of information claimed that these people were very numerous, and whereas in Elizabethan England it was customary to put a witch to death by hanging, in Jacobean Scotland magistrates employed harsher measures. In fact, the victim was burned at the stake, and it is interesting to note that on North Berwick Law, in the county of East Lothian, there is a tall stone that, according to local tradition, was formerly used as a site for such burnings.

Yet it would be wrong to suppose that witches and sorcerers, although handled roughly, were regarded with universal hatred, for in seventeenth-century Scotland medicine and magic went hand in hand, and the man suffering from a physical malady (particularly one whose cause he could not understand) very seldom entrusted himself to a professional leech (a physician whose medical technique was the placement of bloodsucking leeches on the patient's body) and much preferred to consult one who claimed healing capacities derived from intercourse with the unseen world.

Sorcerers, however, were generally also experts in the art of poisoning, and while a good many cures are credited to them, their triumphs in the opposite direction would seem to have been much more numerous. Thus we find that in July 1702, a certain James Reid of Musselburgh was brought to trial, being charged not merely with achieving miraculous cures, but with contriving the murder of one David Libbertoun, a baker in Edinburgh. This Libbertoun and his family, it transpired, were sworn enemies of a neighboring household, by the name of Christie, and eventually their feud grew as fierce as that between the Montagues and Capulets. The Christies swore they would bring things to a conclusion, and going to Reid they petitioned his nefarious aid.

His first act was to bewitch nine stones, these to be cast on the fields of the offending baker with a view to destroying his crops. Reid then proceeded to enchant a piece of raw flesh and also to make a statuette of wax. The nature of the design is not recorded, but presumably Libbertoun himself was represented. Mrs. Christie was instructed to thrust the meat under her enemy's door, and then to go home and melt the waxwork before her own fire. These instructions she duly obeyed, and a little later the victim breathed his last. Reid did not escape justice and after his trial suffered the usual fate of being burned alive.

Isobel Grierson, a Prestonpans woman who was burned to death on the Castle Rock, Edinburgh, in March 1607, had a record of poisonings rivalling that of Cellini himself, and it is even recorded that she contrived to put an end to several people simply by cursing them.

Equally sinister were the exploits of another sorceress, Belgis Todd of Longniddry, who was reported to have brought about the death of a man she hated just by enchanting his cat. This picturesque method was scorned by notorious Perthshire witch Janet Irwing, who in about the year 1610 poisoned various members of the family of Erskine of Dun, in the county of Angus. The criminal was eventually detected and suffered the usual fate.

The wife of John Dein, a burghess of Irvine, conceived a violent aversion for her brother-in-law, Archibald, and on one occasion, when the latter was setting out for France, Margaret hurled imprecations at his ship, vowing none of its crew or passengers would ever return to their native Scotland. Months went by, and no word of Archibald's arrival reached Irvine, until one day a peddler named Stewart came to John Dein's house and declared that the baneful prophecy had been duly fulfilled.

Learning of the affair, municipal authorities arrested Stewart, whom they had long suspected of practicing magic. At first he confessed innocence, but under torture he confessed how, along with Margaret Dein, he had made a clay model of the ill-starred ship, and thrown this into the sea on a particularly stormy night. His audience was horrified at the news, but they hastened to lay hands on the sorceress, whereupon they dealt with her as noted above.

No doubt the witches of Jacobean Scotland were credited with triumphs far greater than what they really achieved. At the same time, a number of the accused sorcerers firmly maintained, when confronted by a terrible death, that they had been initiated in their craft by the devil himself, or perhaps by a band of fairies. It is not surprising that they were dreaded by the simple, illiterate folk of their day, and, musing on these facts, we may feel less amazed at the credulity displayed by King James, who declared that all sorcerers "ought to be put to death according to the law of God, the civil and imperiale Law, and municipall Law of all Christian nations."

The last execution of a witch in Scotland took place in Sutherland in 1722. An old woman residing at Loth was charged, among other crimes, with having transformed her daughter into a pony, shod by the devil, which caused the girl to turn lame both in hands and feet. Sentence of death was pronounced by Captain David Ross, the Sheriff-substitute. C. Rodgers relates: "The poor creature when led to the stake was unconscious of the stir made on her account, and warming her wrinkled hands at the fire kindled to consume her, said she was thankful for so good a blaze. For his rashness in pronouncing the sentence of death, the Sheriff was emphatically reproved."

In more recent centuries witchcraft has been dealt with under laws pertaining to rogues, vagabonds, gamesters, and practitioners of fortune-telling.

Magic and Demonology

Magic appears to have been common in Scotland until a late period. In the pages of Adamnan, Abbot of Iona (ca. 625–704 C.E.), St. Columba and his priest regarded the Druids as magicians, and he countered their sorcery with what was believed to be a superior celestial magic of his own. Thus does the religion of one race become magic in the eyes of another.

Notices of sorcery in Scotland before the thirteenth century are scanty, if we except the tradition that Macbeth encountered three witches who prophesied his fate to him. There is no reason to believe that Thomas the Rhymer (who was endowed by later superstition with adventures similar to those of Tannhäuser) was really other than a minstrel and maker of epigrams, or that Sir Michael Scott was other than a scholar and man of letters.

The rhymed fragment known as "The Cursing of Sir John Rowil," by a priest of Corstorphine, near Edinburgh, which dates perhaps from the last quarter of the fifteenth century, provides a glimpse of medieval Scottish demonology. The poem is an invective against certain persons who rifled his poultry-yard, upon whom the priest called down divine vengeance. The demons who were to torment the evildoers were Garog, Harog, Sym Skynar, Devetinus "the devill that maid the dyce," Firemouth, Cokadame, Tutivillus, Brownly, and Syr Garnega, who may be the same as Girnigo, to whom cross children are often likened by angry mothers of the Scottish working classes. The Scottish verb, "to girn" (to pull grotesque faces or grin), may find its origin in the name of a medieval fiend, the last shadow of some Teutonic or Celtic deity of unlovable attributes.

In Sym Skynar, we may have Skyrnir, a Norse giant in whose glove Thor found shelter from an earthquake, and who sadly fooled him and his companions. Skyrnir was one of the Jotunn or Norse Titans, and probably one of the powers of winter, and he may have received the popular surname of "Sym" in the same manner as we speak of "Jack" Frost.

A great deal has still to be done in unearthing the minor figures of Scottish mythology and demonology, and even the greater ones have not received the attention due to them. For example, in Newhaven, a fishing district near Edinburgh, we find the belief in a fiend called Brounger, who is described as an old man who levies a toll of fish and oysters upon the local fishermen. If he is not placated with these, he wreaks vengeance on the persons who fail to supply him. He is also described as "a Flint and the son of a Flint," which strongly suggests that, like Thor and many other gods of Asia and America, he was a thunder or weather deity. In fact his name is probably a mere corruption of an ancient Scandinavian word meaning "to strike," which still survives in the Scottish expression "make a breeng."

With regard to practical magic, a terrifying and picturesque legend tells how Sir Lewis Bellenden, a lord of session and superior of the Barony of Broughton, near Edinburgh, succeeded by the aid of a sorcerer in raising the devil in the backyard of his own house in the Canongate, somewhere around the end of the sixteenth century. Bellenden was a notorious trafficker with witches, with whom his barony of Broughton was reportedly overrun. Wanting to see the devil in person, he secured the services of one Richard Graham. The results of the evocation were disastrous to the inquisitive judge, whose nerves were so shattered at the devil's appearance that he fell ill and soon expired.

The case of Major Thomas Weir in 1670 is one of the most interesting in the annals of Scottish sorcery. Master storyteller Sir Walter Scott recounts the major aspects of the curious occurrence:

"It is certain that no story of witchcraft or necromancy, so many of which occurred near and in Edinburgh, made such a lasting impression on the public mind as that of Major Weir. The remains of the house in which he and his sister lived are still shown at the head of the West Bow, which has a gloomy aspect, well suited for a necromancer. It was, at different times, a brazier's shop and a magazine for lint, and in my younger days was employed for the latter use; but no family would inhabit the haunted walls as a residence; and bold was the urchin from the High School who dared approach the gloomy ruin at the risk of seeing the Major's enchanted staff parading through the old apartments, or hearing the hum of the necromantic wheel, which procured for his sister such a character as a spinner.

"The case of this notorious wizard was remarkable chiefly from his being a man of some condition (the son of a gentleman, and his mother a lady of family in Clydesdale), which was seldom the case with those that fell under similar accusations. It was also remarkable in his case that he had been a Covenanter, and peculiarly attached to that cause. In the years of the Commonwealth this man was trusted and employed by those who were then at the head of affairs, and was in 1649 commander of the City-Guard of Edinburgh, which procured him his title of Major. In this capacity he was understood, as was indeed implied in the duties of that officer at the period, to be very strict in executing severity upon such Royalists as fell under his military charge. It appears that the Major, with a maiden sister who had kept his house, was subject to fits of melancholic lunacy, an infirmity easily reconcilable with the formal pretences which he made to a high show of religious zeal. He was peculiar in his gift of prayer, and, as was the custom of the period, was often called to exercise his talent by the bedside of sick persons, until it came to be observed that, by some association, which it is more easy to conceive than to explain, he could not pray with the same warmth and fluency of expression unless when he had in his hand a stick of peculiar shape and appearance, which he generally walked with. It was noticed, in short, that when this stick was taken from him, his wit and talent appeared to forsake him.

“This Major Weir was seized by the magistrates on a strange whisper that became current respecting vile practices, which he seems to have admitted without either shame or contrition. The disgusting profligacies which he confessed were of such a character that it may be charitably hoped most of them were the fruits of a depraved imagination, though he appears to have been in many respects a wicked and criminal hypocrite. When he had completed his confession, he avowed solemnly that he had not confessed the hundredth part of the crimes which he had committed.

“From this time he would answer no interrogatory, nor would he have recourse to prayer, arguing that, as he had no hope whatever of escaping Satan, there was no need of incensing him by vain efforts at repentance. His witchcraft seems to have been taken for granted on his own confession, as his indictment was chiefly founded on the same document, in which he alleged he had never seen the devil, but any feeling he had of him was in the dark.

“He received sentence of death, which he suffered 12th April, 1670, at the Gallow-hill, between Leith and Edinburgh. He died so stupidly sullen and impenitent as to justify the opinion that he was oppressed with a kind of melancholy frenzy, the consequence perhaps of remorse, but such as urged him not to repent, but to despair. It seems probable that he was burnt alive.

“His sister, with whom he was supposed to have had an incestuous connection, was condemned also to death, leaving a stronger and more explicit testimony of their mutual sins than could be extracted from the Major. She gave, as usual, some account of her connection with the queen of the fairies, and acknowledged the assistance she received from that sovereign in spinning an unusual quantity of yarn. Of her brother she said that one day a friend called upon them at noonday with a fiery chariot, and invited them to visit a friend at Dalkeith, and that while there her brother received information of the event of the battle of Worcester. No one saw the style of their equipage except themselves.

“On the scaffold this woman, determining, as she said, to die with the greatest shame possible was with difficulty prevented from throwing off her clothing before the people, and with scarce less trouble was she flung from the ladder by the executioner. Her last words were in the tone of the sect to which her brother had so long affected to belong: ‘Many,’ she said, ‘weep and lament for a poor old wretch like me; but alas, few are weeping for a broken covenant.’”

Alchemy

While fearful of sorcery and witchcraft, James IV was attracted to the science of alchemy. The poet William Dunbar described the patronage the king bestowed upon certain adventurers who had studied the mysteries of alchemy and were ingenious in making “quintessence,” which should convert other metals into pure gold. In the Treasurer's Accounts there are numerous payments for the “quinta essentia,” including wages to the persons employed, utensils of various kinds, coals and wood for the furnaces, and for a variety of other materials such as quicksilver, aqua vitae, litharge, auri, fine tin, burnt silver, alum, salt and eggs, and saltpeter.

The Scottish monarch appears to have collected around him a multitude of quacks of all sorts for mention is made of “the leech with the curland hair,” of “the lang Dutch doctor,” of one Fullertone, who was believed to possess the secret of making precious stones, of a Dr. Ogilvy who labored hard at the transmutation of metals, and many other empirics, whom James not only supported in their experiments, but himself assisted in their laboratory. The most noted of these adventurers was Master John Damian, the French Leich. He probably held an appointment as a physician in the royal household.

John soon ingratiated himself with the king, who had a strong passion for alchemy. He remained in James's favor throughout the rest of his life, the last notice given to him being on March 27, 1513, when the sum of £20 was paid to him to travel to the mine in Crawford Moor, where the king had artisans at work searching for gold.

From the reign of James IV to that of Mary Stuart, no magician or alchemical practitioner of note appears to have existed in Scotland, and in the reign of James VI, too great a severity was exhibited against such to permit them to avow themselves publicly. In the reign of James VI, however, lived the celebrated Alexander Seton of Port Seton near Edinburgh, known abroad as “The Cosmopolite,” who is said to have succeeded in achieving the transmutation of metals.

Magic and Religion in the Scottish Highlands

Pagan Scotland appears to have been lacking in benevolent deities. Those representatives of the spirit world who were on friendly terms with mankind were either held captive by magic spells or had some sinister object in view which caused them to act with the most plausible duplicity. The chief demon or deity (one hesitates which to call her) was a one-eyed hag who had tusks like a wild boar. She was referred to in folk tales as “the old wife” (Cailleach), “Grey Eyebrows,” or “the Yellow Mutearteach,” and reputed to be a great worker of spells. Apparently she figured in a lost creation myth, for fragmentary accounts survive of how she fashioned the hills, brought lochs into existence, and caused whirlpools. Echoes of this boar-like hag survive in folk ballads of “Old Bangum” and “Sir Lionel” (Child No. 18), prefigured in ancient Hindu legends of the god Vishnu as the giant boar Vahara.

The hag was a lover of darkness, desolations, and winter. With her hammer she alternately splintered mountains, prevented the growth of grass, and raised storms. Numerous wild animals followed her, including deer, goats, and wild boars. When one of her sons was thwarted in his love affairs by her, he transformed her into a mountain boulder “looking over the sea,” a form she retained during the summer. She was liberated again on the approach of winter. During the spring months, the hag drowned fishermen and preyed on the food supply; she also stole children and roasted them in her cave.

Her progeny included a brood of monstrous giants, each with several heads and arms. These were continually operating against mankind, throwing down houses, abducting women, and destroying growing crops. Heroes who fought against them required the assistance of a witch who was called the “Wise Woman,” from whom they obtained magic wands.

The witch of Scottish folk tales is the “friend of man” and her profession was evidently regarded in ancient times as a highly honorable one. Wizards also enjoyed high repute; they were the witch-doctors, priests, and magicians of the Scottish Pagans, and it was not until the sixteenth century that legal steps were taken to suppress them in the Highland districts.

There seems to have been no sun-worship or moon-worship in Scotland, for neither sun nor moon was individualized in the Gaelic language; these bodies, however, were reputed to exercise a magical influence. The moon especially was a “Magic Tank,” from which supplies of power were drawn by those capable of performing requisite ceremonies. This practice has been revived by modern neo-pagan witches in the ritual referred to as “drawing down the moon.”

But although there appear to have been no lunar or solar spirits, there were numerous earth and water spirits. The “water wife,” like the English “mer wife,” (see mermaids), was a greatly dreaded being who greedily devoured victims. She must not be confused with the banshee, that Fate whose chief business it was to foretell disasters, either by washing blood-stained garments or knocking on a certain boulder beside the river.

The water wife usually confronted a late traveler at a ford. She claimed him as her own, and if he disputed her claim she asked what weapons he had to use against her. The unwary one named each in turn, and when he did so, the power to harm her passed away. One story of this character is as follows:

"The wife rose up against the smith who rode his horse, and she said, 'I have you: what have you against me?' 'My sword,' the man answered. 'I have that,' she said, 'what else?' 'My shield,' the man said. 'I have that and you are mine.' 'But,' protested the man, 'I have something else.' 'What is that?' the water wife demanded. To this question the cautious smith answered, 'I have the long, grey, sharp thing at my thigh.' This was his dirk, and not having named it, he was able to make use of it. As he spoke he flung his plaid round the water wife and lifted her up on his horse behind him. Enclosed in the magic circle she was powerless to harm him, and he rode home with her, deaf to her entreaties and promises.

"He took her to his smithy and tied her to the anvil. That night, her brood came to release her. They raised a tempest and tore the roof off the smithy, but the smith defied them. When day dawned they had to retreat. Then he bargained with the water wife, and she consented that if he would release her, neither he nor any of his descendants should ever be drowned in any three rivers he might name. He named three and received her promise, but as she made her escape she reminded him of a fourth river. 'It is mine still,' she added. In that particular river the smith himself ultimately perished."

Ever since, fishermen have not liked to name either the fish they desire to procure or those that prey on their catches. Haddocks are "white bellies," salmon "red ones," and the dog-fish "the big black fellow." It is also regarded as unlucky to name a minister, or refer to Sunday, in a fishing boat—a fact that suggests that in early Christian times fishermen might be pious churchmen on land but continued to practice paganism when they went to sea, like the Icelandic Norsemen who believed that Christ ruled their island, and Thor the ocean. Fairies must not be named on Fridays, at Halloween, or on Beltane (May Day) when charm fires were lit.

Earth worship, or rather the propitiation of earth spirits, was a prominent feature of Scottish paganism. There too magic played a leading role. Compacts were confirmed by swearing over a piece of turf, certain moors or mounds were set apart for ceremonial practices, and these were visited for the performance of child-procuring and other ceremonies, which were performed at a standing stone.

In cases of sickness, a divination cake was baked and left at a sacred place: If it disappeared during the night, the patient was supposed to recover, if it remained untouched until the following morning it was believed that the patient would die.

Offerings were constantly made to the earth spirits. In a witch trial recorded in Humbie Kirk Session Register (September 23, 1649) one Agnes Gourlay was accused of having made offerings of milk, saying, "God preserve us too; they are under the earth that have as much need of it as they that are above the earth."

The milk poured out upon the earth at magical ceremonies was supposed to go to the fairies. "Gruagach" stones survived into relatively modern times in the Highlands. These were flat stones with deep "cup" marks. After a cow was milked, the milker poured into a hole the portion of milk required by the Gruagach, a long-haired spirit who is usually "dressed like a gentleman." If no offering was given to him, the cream would not rise on the milk, or even if it did, the churning would be a failure. There are interesting records in the Presbytery records of Dingwall, Ross-shire, regarding the prevalence of milk pouring and other ceremonies during the seventeenth century.

The seer was usually wrapped in the skin of a sacrificed bull and left lying all night beside the river. He was visited by supernatural beings in the darkness and obtained answers regarding future events. Another and horrifying way to perform this divination ceremony was to roast a live cat. The cat was turned on a spit until the "Big Cat" (the devil) appeared and either granted the wish of the performer of the ceremony, or foretold what was to take place in answer to a query. In the twentieth century, there are still memories of traditional beliefs regarding witchcraft, fairies, the evil eye, second sight, and magical charms to cure or injure.

Individuals, domesticated animals, and dwellings were charmed against witchcraft by iron and certain herbs or berries. The evil eye influence was dispelled by drinking "water of silver" from a wooden bowl or ladle. The water was taken from a river or well of high repute, silver placed in it, then a charm repeated. When it had been passed over a fire, the victim was given it to drink and what remained was sprinkled around the hearth-stone with a ceremony that varied according to district.

Curative charms were handed down in families from a male to a female and a female to a male. Blood-stopping charms were regarded with great sanctity and the most persistent folklore collectors were unable to obtain them from those who were reported to be able to use these with effect.

Accounts were given of "blood-stopping" from a distance. Although the possessor of the power usually had a traditional charm, he or she rarely used it without also praying. Some Highland doctors testified in private to the wonderful effects of "blood-stopping" operations. In relatively recent times, a medical officer of Inverness-shire stated in his official report to the county council that he was watching with interest the operations of "King's Evil Curers," who still enjoyed great repute in the Western Isles. These were usually seventh sons.

Second sight, like the power to cure and stop blood, runs in families. There is scarcely a parish in the Scottish Highlands without a family in which one or more individuals are reputed to have occult powers. Some had visions, either while awake or asleep. Others heard ominous sounds on occasions and were able to understand what they signified. Certain individuals confessed, but with no appreciation of the faculty, that they were sometimes able to foretell that a person was likely to die soon.

Two instances of this kind may be cited. A younger brother caught a chill. When an elder brother visited him, he knew at once that the young man would die soon, and communicated a statement to that effect to a mutual friend. According to medical opinion, the patient, who was not confined to bed, was in no danger, but three months afterward, he developed serious symptoms and died suddenly. When news of the death was communicated to the elder brother, he had a temporary illness.

The same individual met a gentleman in a friend's house and had a similar experience; he "felt," he could not explain how, that this man was near death. On two occasions within the following week he questioned the gentleman's daughter regarding her father's health and was informed that he was "as usual." The daughter was surprised at the inquiries. Two days after this meeting, the gentleman in question expired suddenly while sitting in his chair.

Again the individual, on hearing of the death, had a brief but distressing illness, with symptoms usually associated with shock. The mother of this man had a similar faculty. On several occasions she saw lights. One day during the Boer War, an officer passing her door bade her goodbye, since he had been ordered to South Africa. She said, "He will either be slain or come back deformed," and turned ill immediately. A few months later the officer was wounded in the lower jaw with a bullet and returned home with his face much deformed.

The faculty of second sight manifests itself in various ways, as these instances show, and evidence that it is possessed by individuals may occur only once or twice in a lifetime. There are cases, however, in which it is constantly active. Those reputed to have the faculty are most reticent regarding it and appear to dread it.

At the close of the nineteenth century, "tow-charms" to cure sprains and bruises were sold in a well-known Highland town by a woman who muttered a metrical spell over each magic knot she tied as the afflicted part was treated by her. She had numerous patients among all classes. Bone-setters (the precursors of modern chiropractors) enjoyed high repute in some localities. In modern memory a public presentation was made to a Ross-shire bone-setter in recognition of his life-long services to the community. His faculty was inherited from his forbears.

Numerous instances may be gleaned in the Highlands of the appearance of the spirits of the living and the dead. The appearance of the spirit of a living person is said to be a sure indication of the approaching death of that individual. It is never seen by a member of the family, but appears to intimate friends. Sometimes it speaks and gives indication of the fate of some other mutual acquaintance.

The Supernatural in Scottish Fiction

While Sir Walter Scott frequently introduced supernatural traditions into his novels and poems, and writers like Robert Louis Stevenson published powerful stories on occult subjects (see fiction, English occult), the magical and supernatural stories of the land go back to the ancient balladry of Scotland. Many of the 305 ballads collected and classified by Francis James Child (regarded as definitive in its time) echo ancient stories and beliefs from a magical past. Some of these themes seem to have descended from Scandinavian balladry.

From Folklore to Psychical Research

The study of Scottish occultism was begun by the collectors of folklore. Among the earliest was the Reverend Robert Kirk, whose The Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns and Fairies, (written in 1691, but not published until 1815) reads like an anthropologist's report on a foreign country. The work is precise in its descriptions of fairy life and customs, and some believed that Kirk himself became a prisoner of the fairies.

Among Scottish folklorists whose research preserved ancient legends and magical traditions, the most prominent was John Francis Campbell of Islay (1822–1885). His great collection, Popular Tales of the West Highlands, Orally Collected (4 vols., 1860–62), achieved for Scotland what Jacob Grimm had done for the Household Tales of Europe. Alexander Carmichael (1832–1912) collaborated with Campbell and preserved the ancient Gaelic culture in his collection Carmina Gadelica, Hymns and Incantations, With Illustrated Notes in Words, Rites, and Customs, Dying and Obsolete, Orally Collected in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland (2 vols., 1900).

The versatile genius Andrew Lang (1844–1912) published over fifty major works concerned with poetry, book collecting, classical studies, Scottish history, English literature, anthropology, folklore, and fairy tales. Lang was a founder-member and later president of both the Society for Psychical Research, and the Folk-Lore Society. Lang was one of the earliest writers on psychical research to collate modern phenomena with the traditions and beliefs of ancient peoples, and his knowledge in this wide field was encyclopedic. He noted, for example, in regard to reports of crystal gazing that he found it difficult to understand why as long as such things rested only on tradition, they were a matter of respectable folklore, but whenever contemporary evidence was produced, folklorists dropped the subject hastily.

In 1897, he published The Book of Dreams and Ghosts, in which he collated stories from all ages dealing with the whole field of the supernatural, including uncanny dreams, hauntings, bilocation, crystal gazing, animal ghosts, and poltergeists. His classic study, Cock Lane and Common-Sense (1894), reviewed ancient spirit contact, haunted houses, the famous Cock Lane poltergeist of London in 1762, apparitions, ghosts, hallucinations, second sight, table-turning, and comparative psychical research.

Modern-day Scotland

In Scotland, the study of parapsychology has become a degree-bestowing science. Noted writer and critic Arthur Koestler provided in his will the establishment of an endowed Chair of Parapsychology at a British University. His intention was to further objective scientific research into “. . . the capacity attributed to some individuals to interact with their environment by means other than the recognised sensory and motor channels.” Following Koestler's death in 1982, his trustees advertised the post and in 1984 awarded the Chair to the University of Edinburgh. Today, The University of Edinburgh's Koestler Parapsychology Unit, a part of the Department of Psychology, offers a doctorate program in parapsychology and publishes the European Journal of Parapsychology. Similarly, St. Andrews University has also offered courses in parapsychology.

Scotland remains famous for its ghost tales and haunted dwellings, with the natives proud to quip that “ghostly spirits are second only to the drinkable kind in the hearts of Highlanders.” Cities such as Edinburgh offer organized ghost walks and haunted tours through selected castles and ancient hotels. Ghostly notoriety is shared among spectors of famous as well as common folk, male and female, young and old. It is the spirit of Mary Queen of Scots that seems to be the most prevalent among Highland hauntings. The queen's spiritual presence has reportedly appeared in nearly every castle she visited during her life. In addition to ghost tours for mortal visitors to Scotland, interested parties can learn more about Scottish hauntings at web sites devoted to the subject, as well as the bimonthly magazine, Haunted Scotland.

Scott, Christopher S(avile) O'D(onoghue) (1927–)

British sociologist who has experimented in the field of parapsychology. He was born on August 12, 1927, at Cuckfield, Sussex, England, and he studied at Cambridge University (B.A., 1948; M.A., 1952). Following his graduation, he became a statistician at UNESCO, Paris (1952–55), and a research officer of The Social Survey at the British Central Office of Information, London (1955–61), prior to returning to work with the United Nations in Africa.

He joined the Society of Psychological Research, London, and was an SPR council member during the years he lived in London (1957–60). He conducted experiments in an attempt to find a repeatable technique for the demonstration of extrasensory perception. He has also done theoretical work on models for psi and examined the work of Gertrude R. Schmeidler on the so-called “sheep-goat” effect on scoring in quantitative psi experiments.

Scott was among the first researchers to call into question the experiments of S. G. Soal based upon his statistical analysis. Based upon Scott's initial critique, much of Soal's work was re-examined and found to have been faulty and his spectacular results probably a matter of conscious fraud. Scott's conclusions were initially attacked, but later independently confirmed.

Scott, Cyril (Meir) (1879–1970)

Eminent British composer, librettist, poet, author, and Theosophist. He was born on September 27, 1879, at Oxton, Birkenhead, England. He studied music at Frankfurt-on-Main,

Germany. He was only 21 when his Heroic Suite was first performed at Darmstadt, Germany, and launched him on a successful music career. He wrote for the piano, on which he also performed capably, as well as composing orchestral pieces, chamber and choral works, and violin studies. He composed an opera, The Alchemist, a ballet and a cantata, and songs and ballads. In addition he published several volumes of his poetry: The Celestial Aftermath, The Vales of Unity, and The Voice of the Ancient.

Scott was an outspoken Theosophist, and he gave much thought to the occult meanings of music, a topic to which only a few, for example, Corinne Helene, had given any consideration. He published his conclusions in the book Music; Its Secret Influence Throughout the Ages (1933; enlarged ed. 1950), a volume dedicated to “Master Koot Hoomi Lal Singh and his pupil Nelsa Chaplin.” It dealt with occult aspects of musical inspiration and the effects on the morals and aesthetics of different periods in history.

He also authored a series of books on the occult: The Initiate (1920), The Initiate in the New World (1927), and The Initiate in the Dark Cycle (1932). His autobiography, Memoirs, Entitled My Years of Indiscretion, appeared in 1924. He died December 31, 1970.

Scott, David (1806–1849) and William Bell (1811–1890)

These two brothers displayed unusual talent in the treatment of supernatural themes in art. David Scott was born October 10 (or 12), 1806, in Edinburgh, Scotland, and lived a comparatively uneventful life, his remarkable gifts being largely unrecognized by his contemporaries. He died on March 5, 1849.

In modern times, however, connoisseurs have appreciated his paintings, perceiving in his work great technical merits. In addition, people who care for art dealing with the supernatural have noted that Scott's Paracelsus and Vasco de Gama are in the forefront of work of this kind. His beautiful drawings for The Ancient Mariner express the very spirit of Coleridge, the arch-mystic, rendering it with a skill unsurpassed in any previous or subsequent illustrations to this poem.

David's brother, William Bell Scott, was also born in Edinburgh, his birth date being September 12, 1811. His career was very different from David's, for he won worldly success from the outset, and before his death on November 22, 1890, he had received much acclaim.

Etching some of his brother's works, and painting a host of pictures, he was also a voluminous writer, and his Autobiographical Notes of the Life of William Bell Scott (2 vols., published posthumously, 1892) contains insights concerning the mystic symbolism permeating the painting of the Middle Ages. It also contains a shrewd and interesting account of D. G. Rossetti's essays on table-turning and other Spiritualist practices.

William Bell's poems are almost all of a metaphysical order, and although it is extravagant to call him “the Scottish Blake,” as many people have done, his mystical verse undoubtedly reflects a certain “meditative beauty,” as “Fiona Macleod” (William Sharp) once wrote on the subject.

Scott, Michael (ca. 1175–ca. 1234)

Scottish mathematician, physician, astrologer, and reputed magician. Although Michael Scott's life is shrouded in obscurity, his name is familiar for various reason. First, the poet Dante referred to him in his Inferno, speaking of him as one singularly skilled in magical arts, while Scott was also mentioned by Boccaccio, who hailed him as among the greatest masters of necromancy. Moreover, Samuel Taylor Coleridge planned a drama dealing with Scott, who Scott asserted was a much more interesting personality than Faust. There is a novel about him by Allan Cunningham, but above all, he figures in Sir Walter Scott's The Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Sir Walter Scott, not a very careful antiquarian, identified the astrologer with one Sir Michael Scott of Balwearie, who, along with Sir David Wemyss of Wemyss, went to bring the Maid of Norway to Scotland in 1290. However, this identification is manifestly wrong, for in a poem by Vincent de Beauvais published as early as 1235, Michael Scott was mentioned as lately deceased.

This does not altogether dispose the idea that he emanated from the family of Balwearie, whose estates were situated near Kirkcaldy, in Fife, and it is almost certain that Scott was a man of high birth, since he studied at Oxford University.

When his Oxford days were over, Scott proceeded to the Sorbonne in Paris, where he acquired the title of mathematics, and from the French capital he wandered on to Bologna, in those days famous as a seat of learning. He did not stay for long, however, but went on to Palermo. He subsequently settled for a while at Toledo to study Arabic.

He appears to have been successful with these studies, thoroughly mastering the intricacies of the Arabic language. He next went to Sicily, where he became attached to the court of Ferdinand II, probably in the capacity of state astrologer. At least, he is so designated in an early manuscript copy (now in the Bodleian Library, Oxford, England) of his book on astronomy.

Scott had also at some time taken holy orders. In 1223, Pope Honorius III wrote to the Archbishop of Canterbury, urging him to procure an English benefice for Scott. It appears that in the following year, Scott was offered the Archbishopric of Cashel in Ireland, but he declined it on account of his total ignorance of the Irish language.

Scott was clearly highly esteemed at the Vatican, for in 1227 Gregory IX, successor to Honorius, made further overtures to the English primate on behalf of Scott. Whether these proved fruitful or not, according to Roger Bacon, Scott came to England in 1230, bringing with him the works of Aristotle—at that date virtually unknown in that country—and giving them a certain popularity among scholars.

Although no documentary evidence is forthcoming to support this theory, local tradition at Melrose, Scotland, contends that the astrologer came to that town in his old age, and that he died there and was buried somewhere in the neighborhood. Various other places in the Borders area of Scotland likewise claimed this distinction, and Sir Walter Scott stated that throughout the south of Scotland, “any great work of great labour or antiquity is ascribed either to Auld Michael, Sir William Wallace, or the Devil.”

One popular story about Scott maintains that he used to ride through the air on a demon horse, and another claims that he used to sail the seas on the back of some fabulous animal. Yet a further legend recounts that Scott went as Scottish envoy to the king of France, and that the first stamp of his black steed's hoof rang the bells of Notre Dame, whereupon his most Christian majesty granted the messenger all he desired.

As regards the writings of Scott, he is credited with a translation of Aristotle's De Animalibus, but the ascription is not very well founded. However, it is almost certain that he wrote Quaestio Curiosa de Natura Solis et Lunae, which is included in the Theatrum Chemicum. He was undoubtedly the author of Mensa Philosophica, published at Frankfurt in 1602, and also of Liber Physiognomiae Magistri Michaelis Scot, a book that was reprinted nearly twenty times and translated into various languages.

Reference has already been made to a manuscript attributed to Scott in the Bodleian Library, and it should be noted that at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the Vatican, and at the Sorbonne, there are further documents purporting to have been written by the astrologer himself, at his dictation, or copied out by scribes soon after the actual author's death.

Screech Owl

A variety of owl (Megascops asio) commonly found in the United States. The cry of the screech owl at midnight is said to portend evil. In Italy, the screech owl became the basis of the stories of a night demon, which further developed into the strega, the witch/vampire who under slightly different names appears in the folklore of various southern European countries.

Scriven, Michael John (1928–)

Professor of the logic of science who has written widely on parapsychology. He was born on March 28, 1928, at Beaulieu, Hampshire, England. He studied at University of Melbourne, Australia (B.A., 1948; M.A., 1950) and returned to Oxford for his doctorate in 1956. Following his graduation he taught at Swarthmore College (1956–60) and Indiana University (1960–66) prior to joining the philosophy department at the University of California in 1966.

While in Australia, Scriven founded and served as secretary of the Melbourne University Society for Psychological Research and then presided over the Oxford University Society for Psychological Research. Scriven's interests included, research in psychokinesis and spontaneous phenomena and the theoretical and philosophical implications of parapsychology. He has contributed a variety of articles on the philosophical implications of psychical research.

Scrying

Divination by gazing into crystals or at shining surfaces. Scrying is commonly simple crystal-gazing but also includes the use of a magical mirror in ceremonial magic.

Seabrook, William (Buehler) (1886–1945)

American traveler and author who explored paranormal phenomena and occultism many years before the occult revival of the 1960s and 1970s. From the 1920s onward, he lived with a Bedouin tribe in Arabia, witnessed whirling dervish dancing at a monastery in Tripoli, saw Yezidee devil worshipers in Kurdistan, studied voudou in Haiti for a year, and also investigated black magic in West Africa. Born February 22, 1886, in Westminster, Maryland, he was educated at Mercersburg Academy; Roanoke College, Salem, Virginia (Ph.B.); Newberry College, South Carolina (M.A.); and the University of Geneva.

In 1908 he worked as a reporter on the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle and became city editor at the age of 22. He went on to become a partner in an advertising agency in Augusta, then enlisted in the French Army in 1915. He was discharged after a gas attack at Verdun and awarded a Croix de Guerre. After a period as a farmer in Georgia, he went to New York, where he worked as a reporter for the New York Times, then as a writer for King Features Syndicate.

In 1924, he visited Arabia, where he lived with a Bedouin tribe, and thereafter he devoted himself to traveling and writing. In 1933, he committed himself to a New York hospital where he was treated for alcoholism; his seven-month treatment became the basis of his book Asylum (1935). He died on September 20, 1945, at Rhinebeck, New York, by committing suicide.

Séance

A major structure of Spiritualism, the séance is a gathering of a small group of individuals who sit together to obtain paranormal manifestations or establish communication with the dead. At least one member of the group is usually a medium or at least possessed of some mediumistic powers.

In 1848 the Fox family at Hydesville, New York, called in their neighbors to listen to mysterious rapping sounds, which later became famous as the "Rochester rappings" and were responsible for inaugurating the modern Spiritualist movement. The gathering was too informal to be called a séance, although all the necessary elements were present, but within the following two or three years, the concept of spirit communication spread throughout a large part of the eastern states and many Spiritualist séance circles were formed.

In the early stages of the movement these séances were conducted by private mediums who took no fee for their performances; later, professional mediums arose whose séances were open to the public for a fee. Both public and private séances continue to be an indispensable feature of Spiritualism. Unfortunately, much of the common wisdom concerning séances was derived from sittings that later proved to be fraudulent, including the great majority of séances involving physical phenomena, and many of the conditions for a successful séance touted by Spiritualists have little relationship to the manifestation of psychic phenomena or spirit contact. Also, over the years many mediums developed personal peculiarities that they passed on to the mediums they trained. Such mannerisms have no bearing on the success or failure of a séance beyond the medium's belief in them.

The Sitters

The sitters need not have psychic powers, although the phenomena reported are generally more impressive if they do. As a rule séances are held with a single medium, because, according to Spiritualists, a second powerful medium introduces another spirit control and the ensuing conflict between the controls can lead to confusion.

The optimum number of sitters is generally believed to be eight or nine, but many mediums sit in larger circles. The great medium D. D. Home, even at the risk of offending the empress of France, refused to sit with more than eight individuals. However, the number of sitters in Indridi Indridason's séances sometimes approached seventy. Lujza Ignath demonstrated direct writing before a hundred people.

In isolated instances mediums have been known to demonstrate psychic phenomena onstage, although doubts surround the genuineness of such displays. The Davenport brothers demonstrated before as many as a thousand people, but there is no firm evidence that their phenomena were genuinely psychic. Others who held séances in public halls include the Bangs sisters, for spirit paintings; a Mrs. Suydam, for immunity to fire; Annie Eva Fay, Lulu Hurst, Annie Abbot, and a Miss Richardson, for feats of strength; Etta Roberts and a Mrs. Bliss, for materializations; Mary M. Hardy, for paraffin wax molds (see Plastics); William Eglinton, for slate writing; and Mary Murphy-Lydy, for direct voice.

Composition and Conditions of the Séance

Ideally, according to Spiritualists, males and females should be about equally represented at séances. The majority of the sitters should not be too old. Young sitters provide favorable conditions if their attitude is serious and not flippant. Persons of questionable moral character should not be admitted into the circle. Those in ill health, preoccupied, or nervous should withdraw. Skepticism does not prevent success, but the effect of a hostile or suspicious mind is not helpful and may be a hindrance.

Strangers should not be introduced frequently into the circle. A series of at least six sittings should be held without modifying the group. New sitters should be admitted one by one at intervals of three or four sittings. No more than two or three sittings should be held a week.

A favorable environment is an essential condition for a séance. Excitement or fatigue before the sitting should be avoided. The medium should not take any stimulants. He or she should be comfortable and maintain a genial frame of mind.

Both the medium and the experimenters have an equal share in success or failure. As the psychical researcher Gustav Geley aptly remarked, "Mediumistic investigations belong to the class of 'collective experiments,' for the phenomena are the result of subconscious psycho-physiological collaboration between the medium and the experimenters." Augustus De Morgan wrote to Alfred Russel Wallace at an early period: "There is much reason to think that the state of mind of the inquirer has something—be it external or internal—to do with the power of the phenomena to manifest themselves. This I take to be one of the phenomena—to be associated with the rest in inquiry into cause. It may be a consequence of action of incredulous feeling on the nervous system of the recipient; or it may be that the volition—say the spirit if you like—finds difficulty in communicating with a repellent organization; or, may be, is offended."

A dark or semi-dark séance room is believed to be favorable for phenomena, according to Spiritualists, because light often interferes with spirit manifestation. Critical observers have often noted that it favors fraud, and the demand for darkness was an early hindrance to discovering the manipulations of fake mediums. However, darkness is by no means essential for the production of psychic phenomena, and many remarkable effects have been produced in good light.

The placement of the sitters appears to be a matter of consequence. The controls often make changes to produce a better combination of “psychic currents.” After sitters form a chain by holding hands or placing them on the table with fingertips touching, they are requested to engage in general conversation or to sing. It is said that talking or singing creates vibrations that help produce the phenomena. For the same purpose, phonographs and audio tape players have been used in recent years.

Spiritualist medium W. Stainton Moses believed that the chief merit of music in the séance room was its soothing effect, that it harmonized conditions. In his own circle, music was very seldom asked for by the communicators. Harmony was effected by means of perfume and breezes of cool scented air.

The utility of general conversation, free and easy chatter, is that it prevents the sitters from concentrating too much. Tension, solemnity, eagerness, depression are obstructive. Even with the great medium D. D. Home intense attention often prevented manifestations. When everybody stopped talking and looked at him, he awoke from trance. (Mediums often enter into a trance condition during a séance, although they sometimes retain normal consciousness throughout.)

A natural, easy, relaxed attitude on the part of the sitters is most conducive to phenomena. Fear or terror usually breaks a manifestation. A table, partly levitated, may drop or a phantom may disappear at a scream. During his levitations, Home always asked the sitters not to get excited and to talk of something else because, until he had risen above their heads, any movement or excitement could thwart the force at work. Once in Nice in 1874, Home, in trance, reportedly buried his face and hands in the flames of the open fireplace. On seeing his head encircled by flames, Count de Komar started from his chair, crying, “Daniel! Daniel!” Home recoiled brusquely, and after some moments he said, “You might have caused great harm to Daniel by your want of faith; and now we can do nothing more.”

In 1867, Frederick L. H. Willis, professor of the New York Medical College, described his experience with a musical medium in The Spiritual Magazine:

“Scarcely had the medium struck the first note upon the piano when the tambourine and the bells seemed to leap from the floor and join in unison. Carefully and noiselessly I stole into the room, and for several seconds it was my privilege to witness a rare and wonderful sight. I saw the bells and tambourine in motion. I saw the bells lifted as by invisible hands and chimed, each in its turn, accurately and beautifully with the piano. I saw the tambourine dexterously and scientifically manipulated with no mortal hand near it. But suddenly . . . the medium became aware of my presence . . . instantly everything ceased. . . . A wave of mental emotion passed over her mind, which was in itself sufficient to stop the phenomena at once.”

Emma Hardinge Britten, testifying before the London Dialectical Society, narrated the case of the medium J. B. Conklin, who was invited to hold a number of séances in Washington:

“The manifestations were very marked and decisive until Mr. Conklin discovered that one of the gentlemen present was no other than President Lincoln, when his anxiety and surprise became so great as entirely to stop the manifestations which were not again renewed till a mutual explanation had restored him to his normal state of mind.”

According to Spiritualists, the medium should not be pressured to produce phenomena. Psychic researcher Sir William Crookes wrote of Home:

“I used to say [to Home], let us sit round the fire and have a quiet chat and see if our friends are here and will do anything for us; we won’t have any tests or precautions. On these occasions, when only my own family were present, some of the most convincing phenomena took place.”

Atmospheric conditions also can have an important bearing on séances. Dry climates are seemingly more favorable than wet ones, and a thunderstorm is believed inimical. Joseph Maxwell observed that dry cold is helpful and rain and wind often cause failure.

The medium William Eglinton kept a careful record of the atmospheric conditions during his séances. He found that during the 170 failures in 1884–85 the weather was either very wet, damp, or dreary in the majority of instances.

Some Spiritualists believe that the location and furnishing of the séance room are also of considerable consequence. A place saturated with historic atmosphere facilitates manifestations, as does one with powerful emotional associations. With the marquis Carlo Centurione Scotto much better results were obtained in the medieval Millesimo Castle than in Genoa. The psychic researcher Harry Price reputedly had striking clairvoyant descriptions of the life of St. Agnes in a séance held in the Roman catacombs (Psychic Research, 1928, p. 665).

The séance room, according to most practitioners, should be plainly furnished. Spiritualists have argued that the table should be entirely of wood and the chairs plain and wooden. Carpets, cushions, and heavy drapes should be dispensed with because they appear to absorb the psychic force, whereas a wooden table apparently stores it up. If possible the same room should be used on subsequent occasions and should not be disturbed in the interval.

The Phenomena of Séances

Sitters have frequently reported that the advent of different manifestations, especially physical ones, is usually preceded by a current of cold air passing through the hands of the sitters or by a chilling of the atmosphere. Sometimes there are rapping sounds or moving furniture. In some cases there are moving lights.

If there is a medium in the circle, he or she may breathe heavily or groan before becoming entranced. The medium may then speak and deliver messages in the character of a spirit entity, often with a marked change of voice. In some sittings an alleged spirit control takes charge of the proceedings and indicates how the séance may best be conducted or reveals what departed spirit is conveying a message. With certain powerful mediums, messages may be given in direct voice, supposedly without use of the medium’s vocal apparatus.

In one simple form of séance, communication is accomplished through raps or audible movements of a table. Questions are asked, and the answers are given by a single rap for “yes” or a double rap for “no,” or by some other code of communication agreed upon by the circle. The Ouija board and planchette are more sophisticated forms of such communication, suitable for one to three individuals rather than a full séance sitting. Another mode of communication for a single sitter or a small group is slate-writing, although considerable doubt surrounds the genuineness of communications received via this method because it is most amenable to fraud.

It is convenient to classify parapsychological phenomena such as automatic writing or speaking by a medium as “psychical,” as distinct from the “mental” phenomena of, say, telepathy. Such manifestations as raps, table turning, and slate writing are also largely psychical, but also partly “physical.” Physical manifestations properly involve more remarkable phenomena, such as the paranormal movement of objects (telekinesis), the levitation of objects or human beings, the summoning of small objects such as flowers, fruit, or jewels from a distance through closed doors (appings), the transformation of heavy objects or people into very light ones, or the manifestation of spirits (materialization).

Mediums who regularly manifested materialization phenomena (few have attempted such feats in the last several decades) usually sat inside a small cabinet with a heavy curtain in front. Materialized forms issued from the cabinet. The cabinet was believed to conserve and condense psychic force in the production of spirit forms. Not all materializations were of full-length spirit forms. Some were only faces or other partial human shapes, in some instances even grotesque forms. Materialization mediums were sometimes securely tied inside the cabinet as a check against fraud, but of course they frequently merely demonstrated their abilities as escape artists.

A few of the more renowned physical mediums of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries demonstrated astonishing phenomena, such as the ability to handle live coals without injury and the manifestation of spirit hands that wrote messages in clear daylight instead of the darkness or subdued light of a séance room. The most talented medium was undoubtedly D. D. Home, who was never detected in fraud. An account of one of his most remarkable séances is given by H. D. Jencken in the journal Human Nature (February 1867):

“Mr. Home had passed into the trance still so often witnessed, rising from his seat, he laid hold of an armchair, which he held at arms’ length, and was then lifted about three feet clear of the ground; travelling thus suspended in space, he placed the chair next Lord Adare, and made a circuit round those in the room, being lowered and raised as he passed each of us. One of those present measured the elevation, and passed his leg and arm under Mr. Home’s feet. The elevation lasted from four to five minutes. On resuming his seat, Mr. Home addressed Captain Wynne, communicating news to him of which the departed alone could have been cognizant.

“The spirit form that had been seen reclining on the sofa, now stepped up to Mr. Home and mesmerised him; a hand was then seen luminously visible over his head, about 18 inches in a vertical line from his head. The trance state of Mr. Home now assumed a different character; gently rising he spoke a few words to those present, and then opening the door proceeded into the corridor; a voice then said: ‘He will go out of this window and come in at that window.’

“The only one who heard the voice was the Master of Lindsay, and a cold shudder seized upon him as he contemplated the possibility of this occurring, a feat which the great height of the third floor windows in Ashley Place rendered more than ordinarily perilous. The others present, however, having closely questioned him as to what he had heard, he at first replied, ‘I dare not tell you,’ when, to the amazement of all, a voice said, ‘You must tell; tell directly.’

“The Master then said, ‘Yes; yes, terrible to say, he will go out at that window and come in at this; do not be frightened, be quiet.’ Mr. Home now re-entered the room, and opening the drawing-room window, was pushed out semi-horizontally into space, and carried from one window of the drawing-room to the farthest window of the adjoining room. This feat being performed at a height of about 60 feet from the ground, naturally caused a shudder in all present. The body of Mr. Home, when it appeared at the window of the adjoining room, was shunted into the room feet foremost—the window being only 18 inches open. As soon as he had recovered his footing he laughed and said, ‘I wonder what a policeman would have said had he seen me go round and round like a teetotum!’

“The scene was, however, too terrible—too strange, to elicit a smile; cold beads of perspiration stood on every brow, while a feeling pervaded all as if some great danger had passed; the nerves of those present had been kept in a state of tension that refused to respond to a joke. A change now passed over Mr. Home, one often observable during the trance states, indicative, no doubt, of some other power operating on his system.

“Lord Adare had in the meantime stepped up to the open window in the adjoining room to close it—the cold air, as it came pouring in, chilling the room; when, to his surprise, he only found the window 18 to 24 inches open! This puzzled him, for how could Mr. Home have passed outside through a window only 18 to 24 inches open. Mr. Home, however soon set his doubts at rest; stepping up to Lord Adare he said, ‘No, no; I did not close the window; I passed thus into the air outside.’ An invisible power then supported Mr. Home all but horizontally in space, and thrust his body into space through the open window, head-foremost, bringing him back again feet foremost into the room, shunted not unlike a shutter into a basement below.

“The circle round the table having re-formed, a cold current of air passed over those present, like the rushing of winds. This repeated itself several times. The cold blast of air, or electric fluid, or call it what you may, was accompanied by a loud whistle like a gust of wind on the mountain top, or through the leaves of the forest in late autumn; the sound was deep, sonorous, and powerful in the extreme, and a shudder kept passing over those present, who all heard and felt it. This rushing sound lasted quite ten minutes, in broken intervals of one or two minutes. All present were much surprised; and the interest became intensified by the unknown tongue in which Mr. Home now conversed. Passing from one language to another in rapid succession, he spoke for ten minutes in unknown languages.

“A spirit form now became distinctly visible; it stood next to the Master of Lindsay, clad, as seen on former occasions, in a long robe with a girdle, the feet scarcely touching the ground, the outline of the face only clear, and the tones of the voice, though sufficiently distinct to be understood, whispered rather than spoken. Other voices were now heard, and large globes of phosphorescent lights passed slowly through the room.”

The following extract is taken from an account of a séance held by Cesare Lombroso with the famous Italian medium Eusapia Palladino:

“After a rather long wait the table began to move, slowly at first—a matter explained by the skepticism, not to say the positively hostile spirit, of those who were this night in a séance circle for the first time. Then little by little, the movements increased in intensity. M. Lombroso proved the levitation of the table, and estimated at 12 or 15 pounds the resistance to the pressure which he had to make with his hands in order to overcome that levitation.

“This phenomenon of a heavy body sustained in the air, off its centre of gravity and resisting a pressure of 12 or 15 pounds, very much surprised and astonished the learned gentleman, who attributed it to the action of an unknown magnetic force.

“At my request, taps and scratchings were heard in the table. This was a new cause for astonishment, and led the gentlemen to themselves call for the putting out of the candles in order to ascertain whether the intensity of the noises would be increased, as had been stated. All remained seated and in contact.

“In a dim light which did not hinder the most careful surveillance, violent blows were first heard at the middle point of the table. Then a bell placed upon a round table, at a distance of a yard to the left of the medium (in such a way that she was placed behind and to the right of M. Lombroso), rose into the air, and went tinkling over the heads of the company, describing a circle around our table where it finally came to rest.”

At this séance the sitters also felt themselves pinched and their clothes plucked and felt invisible hands on their face and fingers. The accuracy of the account was testified to by Lombroso himself.

The Problem of Verification

It may seem surprising that a group of people sitting together can induce extraordinary phenomena that appear to defy normal physical laws. It has been argued that suggestion may play a part, and it is difficult to rule out the possibility of conscious or even subconscious suggestion as a factor. The important thing is that the paranormal character of phenomena be established, that fraud, chance, unconscious muscular action, and so on should be excluded. In the case of mental phenomena, the possibility of subconscious suggestion should also be examined. It is helpful to use visual and aural recording apparatus to register the objectivity of the manifestations. Experiments have shown that the senses may be deceived in the séance-room atmosphere and that individuals do not always remember accurately things seen or heard.

The availability of modern cameras and film, tape recorders, camcorders, and other highly sensitive electronic surveillance devices greatly simplifies accurate documentation of séances.

The Wider Implications of the Séance

As mentioned earlier, the purposes and aims of a group of people sitting together may influence the result, although little research has been done on the mechanics of séance phenomena. It is clear that the medium and the sitters frequently have reported a drain on their energies, manifested in fatigue and weakness afterward; loss of weight has also been reported.

We do not at present know how nervous energy is related to any psychic forces. There are analogies to be drawn from the séance room to the claimed currents of energy in the human body that may be modified by acupuncture techniques and result in improvements in health. There are also comparable concepts in yoga and in the psychophysical energy popularly termed kundalini, expressed alternatively in either sexual activity or transformations of higher consciousness, sometimes with paranormal side effects. Large groups of people in an atmosphere of emotional fervor may contribute to the spiritual or psychic healing of revival meetings. Analogies can also be drawn to the changed atmosphere that often exist between entertainer and audience at concerts and theaters and even the atmosphere at traditional religious services in churches.

In each case, there is a single individual (or small group of individuals) acting as a focal point for the mass vital energies of the group. Entertainer, actor, minister, or medium: all are involved in vital energy exchanges and transformations. Although the nature of such energy transformations is clearly affected by the established conventions of the group occasion, it is not clear how a street demonstration accumulates and releases the lowest common impulse of the mob, resulting in stone throwing, window smashing, or other antisocial behavior while a revival meeting may result in paranormal healing, or a séance in levitation or telekinetic phenomena.

Sea Phantoms and Superstitions

Sailors in general are often superstitious, as are fishermen and others who live by deep bodies of water. The old songs of the outer Hebrides off the coast of Scotland are full of wizardry, with figures in some of the old sea shanties as well. The novelist Captain Frederick Marryat (1792–1848), who understood sailors as few others have, testified repeatedly to their firm belief in the supernatural.

He is the not only author who has dealt with this subject: Coleridge also touched on the matter in his Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Turning from literature to painting, Scottish master David Scott, in a memorable canvas now in the seaport town of Leith, Scotland, showed Vasco de Gama and his henchmen gazing thunderstruck at an apparition rising from the waves.

It is scarcely surprising that the supernatural should be a preoccupation of sailors, as they have lived until this century with the constant possibility of sudden death.

In Cornwall, England, so rich in romantic associations of all sorts, quite a number of stories concerning marine specters have been handed down from generation to generation and are still remembered.

One of these stories relates how, on a winter's evening when a fierce gale was raging around the Cornish headlands, a fisherman chanced to see a ship in distress. The man called on some of his friends to aid him in the rescue. In a few minutes, a row boat had been manned, for Cornish fisherfolk are accustomed to being on the water in all weather despite the danger of drowning. Very soon the rescuers were almost within earshot of the distressed vessel and could see her name clearly on the stern. They planned to jump on board, their idea being that if the ship had a skillful pilot acquainted with the coast's dangers, the ship might be steered safely into Falmouth harbour. However, just as one of the fishermen stood up in the prow of the boat intending to throw a rope, the great vessel looming before him disappeared from sight.

The ship could not have sunk, for some relics would certainly have survived. Fearing that the devil had conjured up a phantom to induce them to put out to sea, the rowers put retreated speedily, and pulled for home. One and all, they were more afraid of the devil's machinations than of the more genuine perils they were encountering.

Another Cornish fishing tradition is associated with the village of Sennen Cove. This place is situated at the head of a bay flanked by two capes. Sometimes a band of misty vapor stretches across the bay, obscuring the villagers' outlook on the sea. Whenever this occurs, the fisherfolk believe that it warns them not to put out in their boats. At one time, Sennen Cove numbered among its inhabitants a group of skeptical fishermen who laughed at this superstition. Accordingly, when the warning band of vapor next made its appearance, they sailed off singing gaily. But their boat never returned, their fate remained a mystery, and they strengthened rather than weakened the belief they had ridiculed.

Scotland has stories of phantom ships. Near Ballachulish, on the west coast of Argyllshire, there is a rocky island on which the Macdonalds of Glencoe used to bury their honored dead. The tradition of the district tells that once, some hundreds of years ago, a skiff bearing a beloved chieftain's corpse to this place foundered before reaching its destination. For the Macdonalds, it was a horrible catastrophe that a leader of their clan should be denied a resting place beside his ancestors. Soon the accident came to seem supernatural, for invariably, just before any misfortune overtook the Macdonald tribe, the wrecked skiff was seen drifting about the sea, its dead oarsman clinging to it, and a coffin floating in its wake. This weird vision appeared only too often, and it was said that on the eve of the massacre of Glencoe, the specter boat bore a crew of ghostly female mourners who sang a loud coronach.

Another Scottish Highland story claims that a large ship, wrecked off the coast of Ross at the time of the first Celts voyages to Canada, still rises occasionally from the waves and, after sailing for a few minutes, suddenly lurches and sinks beneath the ocean. Dwellers by the shores of the Solway tell how a certain craft, which went down there while conveying a happy bridal party towards Stranraer, is frequently seen sailing at full speed before the gale, the bride and bridegroom clinging to the rigging as though in terror of immediate death by drowning.

Nor is this the only Solway phantom, for that treacherous seaway once witnessed the foundering of two Scandinavian pirate vessels, which are said to rise periodically from the water, the crew of each calling for mercy.

Religion has played a prominent part in some stories of specter ships. At Boulogne, France, for example, there is a tradition to the effect that on one occasion in the Middle Ages, the townspeople wanted to build a church, for they were without any public place of worship. They were anxious to choose a site God would approve, but found it difficult to come to a decision, as everyone concerned suggested a different place.

Finally, a group assembled on the beach, intending to offer up a prayer for a solution to the problem. While they were thus engaged, they happened to look out to sea, where to their astonishment a vessel was seen sailing toward them, the sacred Virgin herself on board. Standing in the bow, she pointed in a certain direction, and the devout people concluded that their petition had been answered. The mysterious phantom vanished as quickly as it had come.

Another French specter ship, however, used to remain in sight for longer periods. The vessel was manned by a crew of demons and great dogs—the perjured souls of men who had been guilty of fearful crimes. Yet the pious knew that they had little to fear, the priests having told them that the repetition of a paternoster would guard against the hideous vision.

Somewhat similar to this story is one associated with Venice, where one stormy evening about the middle of the fourteenth century, a fisherman was requested to row three saints to a neighboring village on the Adriatic. After rowing for a while, he suddenly stopped as though petrified, a galley filled with Saracens having risen beside his boat. The oarsman wanted to start back, but his godly passengers calmed him, and while they sang an Ave Maria the ominous galley was submerged by the waves. The fisherman rowed on and reached his haven. The three saints rewarded him with a present of a gold ring. That ring figures in the old coat-of-arms of the Venetian Republic.

There are legends of the sea in most countries. In Japan, there are tales of phantom junks, distinctive Chinese ships. The Chinese used to paint a pair of great eyes on the prow of each craft to detect any monsters prowling afloat. On the coasts of the United States, there are traditions of spectral vessels. Kindred stories are known in the Ionian Islands, and the folklore of the Shetlands has a wealth of such tales. Around the coast of Denmark and the fiords of Norway, many a phantom vessel was supposed to hover as well.

It was on the North Sea that the most famous of all supernatural ships was said to sail, the ship known as The Flying Dutchman.

The story goes that a sailor who had loved a woman but wronged her, left her to languish, and put forth on the high seas, where he committed many flagrant acts of piracy. But the fates condemned him to sail wearily and everlastingly from shore to shore. He was to endure this punishment until he could win the staunch affection of a virtuous woman and prove faithful to her.

The guilty man longed to walk solid ground once more, but whenever he dared to put in to port to try to win the woman who might be able to save him, the devil drove him on board ship again, and his interminable voyage commenced again.

Century after century passed in this way, the ill-fated vessel gradually becoming familiar to all who sailed the North Sea or lived by its shores. The legend did not disappear with a more skeptical age, for Richard Wagner evolved a drama from the legend, and his powerful music—charged so abundantly with the weirdness, mystery, and glamour of the surging ocean—vividly evokes the Dutchman's ship driving before a gale, the criminal sitting terrified and hopeless at his useless helm.

Sea Monsters

Among persistent legends of the sea is the belief in great monsters of the deep. The sea serpent has been reported since earliest times. The Roman historian Pliny the Elder (ca. 23–79 C.E.) described in his Naturalis Historia how a Greek squadron on a voyage for Alexander the Great saw a shoal of sea serpents, each thirty feet long, in the Persian Gulf.

Much more terrifying is the great sea serpent two hundred feet long and twenty feet broad cited by Olaus Magnus in his History of Northern People in 1555. It would be a mistake to assume that all reports of great sea serpents belong to the fabulous past or represent confused accounts of known sea creatures, like whales or giant squids. Sea serpents continued to be reported into modern times, although some accounts would indicate creatures nearer to a plesiosaurus than a serpent. This is understandable, as the prehistoric plesiosaurus had a long neck which might appear to look like a serpent. One of the most celebrated of such creatures is the famed Loch Ness Monster of Scotland.

More legendary are the ancient accounts of a gigantic sea creature named the Kraken. Bishop Eric Pontoppidan discussed the Kraken in his Natural History of Norway (1751) and concluded that it was an enormous polyp (octopus) or starfish. It is probable that it was one of the cephalopods popularly known as cuttlefish.

Less ominous are the stories of mermaids, around whom many strange myths have grown. It is generally supposed that mermaid stories grew up around the dugong or sea-cow, which superficially resembles a human form. However, there are early accounts of mermaids that do not seem to fit this description. In an old history of the Netherlands, there is the following account of a sea-woman of Harlem in the fifteenth century:

“At that time there was a great tempest at sea, with exceeding high tides, the which did drown many villages in Friseland and Holland; by which tempest there came a sea-woman swimming in the Zuyderzee betwixt the towns of Campen and Edam, the which passing by the Purmeric, entered into the straight of a broken dyke in the Purmermer, where she remained a long time, and could not find the hole by which she entered, for that the breach had been stopped after that the tempest had ceased.

“Some country women and their servants, who did dayly pass the Pourmery, to milk their kine in the next pastures, did often see this woman swimming on the water, thereof at the first they were much afraid; but in the end being accustomed to see it very often, they viewed it neerer, and at last they resolved to take it if they could. Having discovered it they rowed towards it, and drew it out of the water by force, carrying it in one of their barks unto the towne of Edam.

“When she had been well washed and cleansed from the sea-moss which was grown about her, she was like unto another woman; she was appareled, and began to accustome herself to ordinary meats like unto any other, yet she sought still means to escape, and to get into the water, but she was straightly guarded.

“They came from farrre to see her. Those of Harlem made great sute to them of Edam to have this woman by reason of the strangeness thereof. In the end they obtained her, where she did learn to spin, and lived many years (some say fifteen), and for the reverence which she bare unto the signe of the crosse whereunto she had beene accustomed, she was buried in the church-yarde. Many persons worthy of credit have justified in their writings that they had seene her in the said towne of Harlem.”

A strange superstition of seafaring life related to the caul, a thin membrane found around the head of some new-born babies. A caul was considered a good omen for the child, and also for anyone who acquired it. Many seamen considered a caul to be a powerful lucky charm against shipwrecks or death from drowning. There are many allusions to the occult power of the caul by early writers, and in Ben Jonson's play The Alchemists (act I, section 2), the character Face says to Dapper: “Ye were born with a Cawl o' your head.”
