Belief in the power of the caul persisted even into the late nineteenth century, when advertisements relating to the sale of a caul frequently appeared in British newspapers. As much as fifteen, twenty, or even thirty guineas were asked by sellers. In the Western Daily News of Plymouth (February 9, 1867) a notice offered mariners a child's caul for five guineas. The Times (May 8, 1848) offered a caul for six guineas and described it as “having been afloat with its last owner forty years, through all the perils of a seaman's life, and the owner died at last in his bed, at the place of his birth.”

Great stress was laid on the soundness of the article, thus in the Times (February 17, 1813) an advertisement stated, “A child's caul in a perfect state for sale.”

The notion that a child's caul could prevent drowning prevailed in France as well as in England. It was alluded to in a rondeau by Claude de Malleville (born 1597).

The superstition concerning the caul is from remote antiquity and was prevalent in the days of the Roman empire. Aelius Lampridius in his life of Antonine (surnamed Diadumeninus) stated that paidumeninus was so called from having been brought into the world with a band of membrane around his forehead in the shape of a diadem, and that he enjoyed perpetual happiness from this circumstance. Pagan midwives had no scruples about selling cauls, and their best market was the Forum, where they got high prices from lawyers. Many of the councils of the early Christian Church denounced the superstition. St. John Chrysostom frequently inveighed against it in his homilies.

“Il est né coiffé,” is a well-known French expression describing a lucky man, and indicating that he was born with a caul.

It was believed that so long as the child from whom the caul had been taken enjoyed good health, the caul experienced the same and was dry, flexible, and healthy, but when the caul-born person suffered from any sickness, the membrane also underwent a change, either becoming totally crisp or regaining its former flexibility, according to whether the person died or recovered. Often these cauls became heirlooms, handed down from father to son (especially if it had been born in the family), and were regarded by their owners with as much superstition as if the caul-born person were still living. (Of course, the caul, a relatively unusual birth event, meant different things in different cultures. In Poland, for example, a child born with a caul was a potential vampire and the caul had to be treated precisely to prevent that fate.) (See monsters)

Sources:

Bassett, F. S. Legends and Traditions of the Sea and Sailors. Chicago & New York: Belford, Clarke, 1886.

Benwell, G., and A. Waugh. The Sea Enchantress: The Tale of the Mermaid and Her Kin. London: Hutchinson, 1961.

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Gibson, John. Monsters of the Sea: Legendary and Authentic. London: T. Nelson & Sons, 1887.

Gould, Rupert T. The Case for the Sea-Serpent. London: Philip Allan, 1930. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1969.

Heuvelmans, Bernard. In the Wake of the Sea-Serpents. London: Rupert Hart-Davis, 1968.

Jones, William. Credulities Past and Present. London: Chatto & Windus, 1880. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1967.

Rappoport, Angelo. Superstitions of Sailors. London: Stanley Paul, 1928. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: Gryphon Books, 1971.

The Searcher

A bi-monthly publication for followers of the teachings of the New Age bible Oahspe. Address: Kosmon Publications, P.O. Box 4670, Hualapai, AZ 86412-4670.

Search Magazine

Former quarterly publication dealing with UFOs and other mysteries, founded as Mystic in the early 1950s by entrepreneur occult publisher Raymond A. Palmer. In the 1970s Search magazine absorbed Flying Saucers magazine, formerly a separate publication issued by Palmer. Search continued into the 1980s.

Sebottendorf, Rudolf Freiherr von (1875–1945)

Name assumed by Adam Glauer, founder of the occult political Thule Society in pre-war Germany, and the Germanen Order.

Second Sight

Paranormal perception at a distance in time and space, today classified by parapsychology under such labels as ESP, clairvoyance, precognition and remote viewing. Second sight, as a faculty of foreseeing future events or occurrences happening at the moment at a distance, is traditionally attributed to certain individuals in the Highlands of Scotland.

The medium Daniel Dunglas Home, who claimed descent from a Highland family, was supposed to have second sight and described it in the following way: “A deadly tremor comes over me, and there is a film on my eyes, and I not only see persons, but hear conversations taking place at a distance.” While in Paris Home saw his brother, who was then in the North Sea. He saw his fingers and toes fall off. Six months afterward tidings came of the brother having been found dead on the ice, his fingers and toes having fallen off from scurvy.

The chief peculiarity of second sight is that the visions are often of a symbolic character. For example, in March 1927, in a lecture before the Société Internationale de Philologie, Sciences et Beaux Arts, F. G. Fraser noted: “The vision of coming events which some of the Highlanders possess, used to be accompanied, in some cases, by a nerve storm and by a subsequent prostration. It must not be confused with the sight of apparitions, nor does it depend upon artificial aids, such as accompanied by the invocation of the oracles in classic times.”

Samuel Johnson took note of the phenomenon in his 1775 account of A Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland: “The foresight of the seers is not always prescience. They are impressed with images, of which the event only shows them the meaning.” He denied that “to the second sight nothing is presented but phantoms of evil. Good seems to have the same proportion in those visionary scenes as it obtains in real life.” According to some old books (Ranulf Higden's Polychronicon, 1482 and Robert Kirk's Secret Commonwealth of Elves, Fauns and Fairies, 1691) second sight is communicated by touch. Napier's Folklore or Superstitious Beliefs in the West of Scotland (1879) mentions the practice as surviving in the nineteenth century.

The belief in second sight dates back to a very early period in the history of these regions, and has not been altogether eradicated by the encroachments of the twentieth century. And, of course, apart from the name, which is used primarily in Scotland, second sight itself is not exclusive to the Celts of Scotland, for it is allied to the clairvoyance, prophetic vision, soothsaying, and so on, that have been reported from time immemorial in practically every part of the world. Yet the second sight has certain distinctive features of its own.

It may, for instance, be either congenital or acquired. In the former case, it generally falls to the seventh son of a seventh son, by reason of the potency of the mystic number seven. In the days of large families and no birth control, such a person appeared far more frequently than in modern society. Yet again, sometimes Highlanders would find themselves suddenly endowed with the mysterious faculty. A person gifted with second sight is said to be “fey.” Generally there is no apparent departure from the normal consciousness during the vision, although sometimes a seer may complain of a feeling of disquiet or uneasiness. A vision may be communicated from one person to another, usually by contact, but the secondary vision is dimmer than that of the original seer.

A frequent vision is that of a funeral, a premonition of a death shortly to occur in the community. This is an instance of the second sight taking a symbolical turn. Occasionally the apparition of the doomed person will be seen—his wraith, or double—while he himself is far distant.

Another form second-sight visions often take is that of “seeing lights.” The lights, too, may indicate death, but they may likewise predict lesser happenings. In one instance, a light was seen by two persons to hover above the mansion of an estate, then to travel swiftly in the direction of the gamekeeper’s cottage, where it remained stationary for a while. The next day the gamekeeper was found dead.

Animals also are said to possess second sight, especially dogs and horses. Two men were travelling in Scotland from Easdale to Oban on a stormy night. In making a short cut through a wood, one of them died from fatigue and exposure. That night more than one horse had to be carefully led past the spot by his driver, who as yet knew nothing of the tragedy. Many Highlanders used to believe that the faculty was common to all the lower animals, since they whine and bristle when there is nothing visible to human eyes or audible to human ears.

The march of civilization has eroded the occult beliefs of the Highlanders, but they still believe in second sight, even those who claim that they are not in the least “superstitious.”

Sources:

Campbell, John L., and Trevor H. Hall. Strange Things: The Story of Fr. Allan McDonald, Ada Goodrich Freer, and the Society for Psychical Research’s Enquiry into Highland Second Sight. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul; Philadelphia: Folklore Associates, 1968.

Mackenzie, Alexander. The Prophecies of the Brahan Seer. Stirling, Scotland: Eneas Mackay, 1935. Reprint, London: Constable, 1977.

Macrae, Norman, ed. Highland Second-Sight: With Prophecies of Conneach Odhar of Petty. Dingwall, Scotland: G. Souter, 1908.

Napier, James. Folklore, or Superstitious Beliefs in the West of Scotland, within this Century. Paisley, Scotland, 1879.

Spence, Lewis. Second Sight: Its History and Origins. London: Rider, 1951.

Sutherland, Elizabeth. Ravens and Black Rain: The Story of Highland Second Sight. London: Constable, 1986.

Thompson, Francis. The Supernatural Highlands. London: Robert Hale, 1976.

Secret Chiefs

A term which emerged in the nineteenth century to designate the superhuman adepts who were attributed with the founding of several secret magical orders. They were the real founders of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, for example, analogous to the Mahatmas or Masters who supposedly led the Theosophical Society (founded in 1875). Together they formed the Great White Brotherhood who from their lofty perspective secretly guided and influenced human history. They also had a model in the Superiores Incogniti, or hidden superiors, introduced by Baron Hund (1722–76) for his Strikt Observanz Masonic system.

The Secret Chiefs of the Golden Dawn were said to be unknown magi who were “Concealed Rulers of the Wisdom of the True Rosicrucian Magic of Light.” Human founders W. Wynn Westcott, S. L. MacGregor Mathers and W. R. Woodman are supposed to be in contact with them.

Sources:

King, Francis. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Secret Fire

Described by Philostratus (ca. 170–245 C.E.) in his Life of Apollonius as issuing from a basin in a well on the hill Athamor. A blue vapor was said to rise from the well and change into all the colors of the rainbow. The bottom was strewn with red arsenic; on it was the basin full of fire, and from it rose flame without smell or smoke. Two stone reservoirs were beside it, one containing rain, the other wind. This description is probably a symbolic one.

Secrets of Fatima

During 1917, three children in the town of Fatima, Portugal, claimed to have witnessed an apparition of the Virgin Mary some six times between May 13 and October 13. The attention of the public and the Roman Catholic Church was captured by the phenomenon in the sky over Fatima on the day of the last apparition, but as devotion to Mary as advocated at Fatima spread, a second element of the apparitions emerged to also claim widespread attention. During the July 13 apparition, the Virgin shared information with the children that they were to keep secret. This occurrence repeated the course of the apparition at La Salette several decades previously.

For a time, all that was known of the secret message was that while receiving it, the children were heard to groan aloud. Two of the children, Jacinta and Francisco Marto, died in 1919 and 1920 respectively, but did not speak of the message that they had been given. Subsequently, some years later Lucia Dos Santos, who had been the third child, made two parts of the secret message known. The first part consisted of a vision of hell, with an accompanying admonition that the children should sacrifice themselves for sinners in reparation for the many offenses against the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The second part was an admonition to spread the devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary, which has become a popular form of devotion in the Roman Catholic Church. Added to this admonition was a prediction that World War I (1914–18) would soon end, but another one would soon begin if people did not cease their offending behavior. The war would occur during the reign of Pope Pius XII. She added that five scourges would come upon the world and that as a sign they were about to appear, the night would be illuminated by an unknown light. Speaking to the three children, she asked that Russia, in particular, be consecrated to the Immaculate Heart, and that a communion of reparation be received on the first Saturday of each month. If that happened, Russia would be converted. If it did not, Russia would spread its errors throughout the world.

In 1925, Mary again appeared, this time privately to Lucia, and asked that she initiate the devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary through the Communion of Reparations on the first Saturdays. Lucia began to advocate the Communions but did not tie them to the original apparitions until 1927, when she received a further message from Christ to reveal that part of the secret. She would spend the next decade promoting the devotion.

When Lucia saw the extraordinary aurora borealis on January 25, 1938, she believed it to be the sign that the punishment of the world was about to begin. Most believers equate the Spanish Civil War (1936–39) and the succeeding Second World War (1939–45) as confirmation of the prophecy. In 1940 she wrote to Pope Pius XII, asking for the consecration of Russia to the Immaculate Heart of Mary and tied the request to the secret received in 1917. Pius XII did consecrate Russia to the Immaculate Heart in 1942 and again in 1952.

In 1941, she wrote the last of several documents recording her memories of the 1917 apparitions, apart from the third secret. But two years later, when Lucia fell ill, her bishop finally ordered her to write down the rest of the secret. The brief message was sealed in an envelope and passed to the bishop of Leiria. On several occasions through the 1940s and 1950s, the bishop indicated that the letter would be opened in 1960 and/or after Lucia's death (she is still alive as of 2000). There was great expectation that the rest of the secret would be revealed in 1960. The sealed letter was transferred to Rome in 1957 and in 1960 was presented to Pope John XXIII, who did read it. He also shared its contents with several of his close advisors. Afterwards, he placed the message in another envelope, sealed it, and returned it to the archives.

The non-publication of the final secret came as a disappointment to many who had been swept up into the international community of Fatima devotees. Speculation as to the nature of the secret ranged from the bizarre to the mundane. Some suggested that it contained prophecies of imminent world disaster. Others suggested that it was quite unspectacular, anticlimactic. The idea of the secret was integrated into many conspiracy theories already present about the papal role in secret world government intrigues.

In what became one of the most widespread of reports, the German newspaper Neues Europa claimed that the third secret spoke of important treaties to be concluded in the years 1963–65 between the Anglo-Saxon nations and the Soviet Union. Following the test ban treaty of 1963, the newspaper went on to publish what it claimed was the exact text of the third secret document. The lengthy document referred to the previous secret at La Salette, internal church conflict, and the endtimes for humanity. It suggested that this text was being circulated to the rulers of Europe and helped bring about the 1963 treaty. The article was republished in French by Le Monde de la Vie in Paris and in English in a book printed and widely circulated by a conservative Catholic businessman, Emmett Culligan. Culligan tied his own understanding of the document to the assassination of U.S. president John F. Kennedy in 1963 and the predictions of seeress Jeanne Dixon that the antichrist was born in Egypt in 1962. Many Fatima experts have pointed out that this 1963 document is far too long to be the final secret which was written in longhand on a small piece of paper.

In 1971, Ray Stanford, a psychic channel and head of the Association for the Understanding of Man in Austin, Texas, did a set of readings in which the source that spoke through him discussed Fatima. It suggested that the children had been in contact with beings from the angelic realm. It also suggested that the third secret spoke of the assassination of a pope and the end of the papacy. Many Fatima enthusiasts believe that there will be only five popes installed after 1960 (Pope John Paul II being the third). The idea that the papacy would end, also suggested by some of the interpreters of Nostradamus, has become a popular theme in speculation on Fatima.

Still others, relying primarily on statements made by people such as Lucia or those from the Vatican known to have been privy to the secret, agree that the document speaks of the last days but suggest that it refers to a falling away of the faithful and a great apostasy among church teachers. In May of 2000, Pope John Paul II revealed the third secret of Fatima. The third secret dealt with an assassination attempt on a "bishop in white" by an atheist system against the Catholic Church and Christians in the twentieth century. This was considered to be the assassination attempt of Pope John Paul II in 1981.

Apart from speculation over the content of the Fatima secret, the idea of Mary sharing a secret with the persons to whom she appears has become a common element in more recent apparitions. It was integral to the apparitions at Beauraing (1932), Lipa (1948), and Bayside (1968), among others. By its association with Fatima, the granting of a secret has come to be viewed as an element contributing to the authenticity of any given apparition.

In 2000, Pope John Paul II finally released the text of the third secret. The brief description of the vision seen by the three children in 1917 included an angel with a flaming sword. This angel spoke the words "Penance! Penance! Penance!;" a bishop dressed in white who while in prayer for the souls of the martyrs around him was killed; and an angel who gathered the blood of the martyrs to sprinkle on the faithful. At the time of the release of the third secret, the pope was quoted as identifying the image of the martyred bishop in white as a reference to himself and to the attempted assassination of him on May 13, 1981, which occurred on the anniversary of the first vision at Fatima.

It was hoped by many that the release of the third vision would end the many speculations concerning its content.

Sources:

Alonso, Joaquin Maria. The Secret of Fatima: Fact and Legend. Cambridge, Mass.: Ravengate Press, 1979.

Culligan, Emmet. The 1960 Fatima Secret. Rockford, Ill.: Tan Books and Publishers, 1967.

Francois de Marie de Anges, Frere. Tragedy and Triumph. Buffalo, N.Y.: Immaculate Heart Publications, 1994.

Martin, Malachi. The Keys of This Blood. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990.

"The Message of Fatima." <http://www.cesnur.org>. June 28, 2000.

Simpson, Victor L. "Vatican reveals third secret told at Fatima." Detroit News (May 14, 2000): 11A.

Stanford, Ray. Fatima Prophecy: Days of Darkness/Promise of Light. Austin, Tex.: Association for the Understanding of Man, 1974.

Secret Tradition

Since the medieval period, students of occultism (that which is hidden) have professed a belief that the ancient wisdom and secret tenets of the various psychic sciences have been preserved to modern times by a series of adepts, who have handed these secrets down from generation to generation in their entirety. Leaders have gained authority by claiming to be in contact with such secret adepts, for proficiency in any one of the occult sciences requires instruction from a master of that branch.

It is possible that in neolithic times, societies existed among our ancestors similar in character to the Midiwiwin of the North American Indians, the snake-dancers of the Hopi of New Mexico, or the numerous secret societies of aboriginal Australians. This is inferred from the probability that totemism existed amongst neolithic peoples. Hierophantic castes would hand down secret traditions from one generation to another.

The early mysteries of Egypt, Eleusis, Samothrace, and Cabiri were probably the elaboration of such primitive mysteries. There would appear to be what might be called a fusion of occult beliefs throughout the ages. It has been said that when the ancient mysteries are spoken about, it should be understood that the same sacred ceremonies, initiatory processes, and revelations are intended, and that what is true of one applies with equal certainty to all the others.

Thus the Greek geographer Strabo recorded that the strange orgies in honor of the mystic birth of Jupiter resembled those of Bacchus, Ceres, and Cybele, and the Orphic poems identified the orgies of Bacchus with those of Ceres, Rhea, Venus, and Isis. Euripides also mentioned that the rites of Cybele were celebrated in Asia Minor in a manner identical with the Grecian mysteries of Dionysius and the Cretan rites of the Cabiri.

The Rev. Geo. Oliver, in his book The History of Initiation (1829), asserted that the rites of Freemasonry were exercised in the antediluvian world, were received by Noah after the Flood, and were practiced by people at the building of Babel. These rites spread and were molded into a form, the great outlines of which can be traced in the mysteries of every heathen nation. These mysteries are the shattered remains of the one true system, from which they were derived.

Although there may have been likenesses between the rites of certain societies, the idea that all sprang from one common source has never been proved. One thing, however, is fairly certain. Anthropology permits us to believe that human concepts, religious and mystical, are practically identical wherever people exist, and there is every possibility that this brought about a strong resemblance between the mystical systems of the older world.

The principles of magic are universal, and these were probably handed on throughout the centuries by hereditary castes of priests, shamans, medicine-men, magicians, sorcerers, and witches. But the same evidence does not exist with regard to the higher magic. Was this handed on by means of secret societies, occult schools or universities, or from adept to adept?

This magic is that spiritual magic that, taken in its best sense, shades into mysticism. The schools of Salamanca and the mystic colleges of Alexandria could not impart the great truths of this science to their disciples. Its nature is such that communication by lecture would be worse than useless. It is necessary to suppose then that it was imparted by one adept to another. But it is not likely that this magic arose at a very early period in human history, probably not before some three or four thousand years B.C.E. The undisturbed nature of Egyptian and Babylonian civilization leads to the belief that these countries brought forth a long series of adepts in the higher magic.

We know that Alexandria was heir to the works of these adepts, but it is unlikely that their teachings were publicly disseminated in her public schools. Individuals of high magical standing would, however, be in possession of the occult knowledge of ancient Egypt, and it seems likely that they imparted this to the Greeks of Alexandria. Later Hellenic and Byzantine magical theory is distinctly Egyptian in character, and we know that its esoteric forms were disseminated in Europe at a comparatively early date, placing all other systems in the background.

Regarding alchemy, the evidence is much more sure, and the same may be said regarding astrology. These are occult studies in which it is peculiarly necessary to obtain the assistance of an adept if any excellence is to be gained in their practice, and it is known that the first originated in Egypt, and the second in ancient Babylon.

The names of those early adepts who carried the sciences forward until the days of Alexandria are not known, but subsequent to that period the identity of practically every alchemical and astrological practitioner of any note is known. In the history of no other occult study is the sequence of its professors so clear as is the case in alchemy, and the same might almost be said of astrology.

In the case of mystical brotherhoods, a long line of these have probably existed from early times, sharing the traditions. Many persons would be members of several and would import the conceptions of one society into another, as we know Rosicrucian ideas were imported into Masonry.

In the mystic societies of the Middle Ages there seem to be reflections of the older Egyptian and classical mysteries, and some support the theory that the spirit and, in some instances, even the letter of these may have descended to medieval and perhaps to present times.

Such organizations die much harder than any credit is given them for doing. We know, for example, that Freemasonry was transformed at one part of its career, about the middle of the seventeenth century, by an influx of alchemists and astrologers who crowded out the operative members and strengthened the mystical position of the brotherhood.

It is therefore possible to suppose that on the fall or disuse of the ancient mysteries, their disciples, looking eagerly for some method of saving their cults from entire extinction, would join the ranks of some similar society, or would keep the flame alive in secret.

The occult idea has been preserved through the ages, the same in essence among the believers in all religions. To a great extent, the occult's trend was in one direction, so that the fusion of the older mystical societies and their rebirth as a new brotherhood is a plausible hypothesis.

The entry on the Templars, for example, suggests the possibility of that brotherhood having received its tenets from the East. It seems very likely that its rites were oriental in origin, and certainly the occult systems of Europe owed much to the Templars, who, probably, after the fall of their own order, secretly formed others or joined existing societies.

Masons have a hypothesis that they inherited traditions from the Dionysian artificers, the artisans of Byzantium, and the building brotherhoods of Western Europe. This is not a proven theory; however, it is much more feasible than the romantic legend concerning the rise of Freemasonry at the time of the building of the Temple of Solomon.

One of the chief reasons that we know so little concerning these brotherhoods in medieval times is that the charge of dabbling in the occult arts was a serious one in the eyes of the law and the church; therefore, occultists found it necessary to carry on their practices in secret.

But after the Reformation, a modern spirit took possession of Europe, and protagonists of the occult sciences came out of their secrecy and practiced in the open light of day. In England, for example, numerous persons avowed themselves alchemists; in Germany the "Rosicrucians" sent out a manifesto; in Scotland, Alexander Seton, a great master of the hermetic art, flourished.

But it was nearly a century later when further secret societies were formed, such as the Academy of the Ancients and of the Mysteries in 1767; the Knights of the True Light, founded in Austria about 1780; the Knights and Brethren of Asia, which appeared in Germany in the same year; the Order of Jerusalem, which originated in America in 1791; and the Society of the Universal Aurora, established in Paris in 1783.

Besides being masonic, these societies practiced animal magnetism, astrology, Kabala, and even ceremonial magic. Others were political, such as the Illuminati. But the individual tradition was kept up by an illustrious line of adepts, who were more instrumental in keeping the flame of mysticism alive than even such societies as those mentioned.

Anton Mesmer, Emanuel Swedenborg Louis Claude de Saint-Martin and Martines de Pasqually all labored to that end. We may regard all these as belonging to the school of Christian magicians, distinct from those who practiced the rites of the grimoires or Jewish Kabalism. The line may be carried back through Lavater, Karl von Eckartshausen, and so on to the seventeenth century. These men were mystics besides being practitioners of theurgic magic, and they combined in themselves the knowledge of practically all the occult sciences.

With Anton Mesmer began the revival of a science that cannot be altogether regarded as occult when consideration is given to its modern developments, but that powerfully influenced the mystic life of his time and even later. The Mesmerists of the first era were in a direct line from the Martinists and the mystical magicians of France in the late eighteenth century. Indeed, for some English mystics, such as Valentine Greatrakes, mysticism and “magnetism” are one and the same thing. But when hypnotism, to give it its modern name, became numbered with the more practical sciences, persons of a mystical cast of mind appear to have deserted it.

Hypnotism does not bear the same relation to mesmerism and animal magnetism that modern chemistry does to alchemy, but those who practice it are as dissimilar to the older professors of mesmerism as the modern practitioner of chemistry is to the medieval alchemist. It is symptomatic of the occult studies that its students despise knowledge that is “exact” in the common sense of the term, that is to say, pertaining to materialistic science. Students of the occult do not delight laboring upon a science whose basic laws are already known.

The occultists of the twentieth century, however, draw upon an ancient inspiration. They recognize that their forerunners of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were influenced by older traditions and may have had access to records and traditions that are now obscure. The recovery of these is, perhaps, the great question of modern occultism. But apart from this, modern occultism strains towards mysticism. It ignores ceremony and exalts the spiritual. (See also Gnosticism; Neoplatonism)

Sources:

Hall, Manly P. An Encyclopedic Outline of Masonic, Hermetic, Qabbalistic and Rosicrucian Symbolical Philosophy. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, 1928.

Hartmann, Franz. Magic White and Black; or, The Science of Finite and Infinite Life. London: George Redway, 1886. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1970.

Maeterlinck, Maurice. The Great Secret. London: Methuen, 1922. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1969.

Shirley, Ralph. Occultists & Mystics of All Ages. London: William Rider, 1920; Reprint, New York: University Books, 1972.

Waite, Arthur E. The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross. London: William Rider, 1924; Reprint, New York: University Books, 1961.

———. The Life of Louis Claude de Saint-Martin: The Unknown Philosopher. London: Philip Wellby, 1901. Reprinted as The Unknown Philosopher: The Life of Louis Claude de Saint-Martin. Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner, 1970.

———. The Secret Tradition in Alchemy. Kegan Paul, London, Alfred A. Knopf, 1926. Reprint, New York: S. Weiser, 1969.

———. The Secret Tradition in Freemasonry. London, Rider, 1937. Reprint, New York: S. Weiser, 1969.

Yarker, John. The Arcane Schools: A Review of Their Origin and Antiquity; With a General History of Freemasonry. Belfast: William Tait, 1909.

Secret Words

According to Christian folklore, Christ communicated certain words relating to the Eucharist to Joseph of Arimathea, who was described as a secret disciple in John 19:38, and these words were committed orally from keeper to keeper of the Holy Grail. In Robert de Borron's (ca. 1170–1212) metrical romance, Joseph of Arimathea, material power is added to the spiritual efficacy of these words, and whoever could acquire and retain them had a mysterious power over all around him, could not suffer by evil judgments, could not be deprived of his rights, and need not fear the result of battle, provided his cause was good.

The words were the secret of the Grail and were either incommunicable in writing or were written only in the Book of the Grail, which, de Borron implied, was itself written by Joseph of Arimathea. These words are the chief mystery of the Lesser Holy Grail, as the prose version of de Borron's poem is called. They were most probably a form of eucharistic consecration, and there is evidence that the Celtic church, following the example of the Eastern Church, used them in addition to the usual consecration as practiced in the Latin Church, which is merely a repetition of the New Testament account of the Lord's Supper. The separate clause they are supposed to have formed was called Epiclesis and consisted of an invocation of the Holy Ghost.

De Borron's account also ties the Grail to Glastonbury, a borough in England that had also been identified with King Arthur by the reported discovery of his body and that of his queen, Guenevere. According to de Borron, the Grail was to be conveyed to the Far West, to the veils of “Avaron” (i.e., “Avalon,” i.e., Somerset).

Sources:

Furnivall, F. J., ed. The History of the Holy Grail . . . from the French prose of Sires R. de Borron. London: Early English Text Society, 1874.

Lacy, Norris J. The Arthurian Encyclopedia. New York: Garland, 1986.

Loomis, Roger Sherman. The Grail: From Celtic Myth to Christian Symbol. Cardiff: University of Wales, 1963.

Waite, Arthur E. The Holy Grail; The Galahad Quest in the Arthurian Literature. London: Rider, 1933. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1961.

Weston, Jessie L. The Quest of the Holy Grail. London: G. Bell, 1913. Reprint, London: Frank Cass, 1964.

Sedona

During the last quarter of the twentieth century, Sedona, Arizona, a small city south of Flagstaff, emerged as a center of the New Age Movement, and in the 1990s, as the New Age waned, it has become a major center of the successive focus upon ascension and human transformation. Sedona has been touted as a remnant of the ancient mythical continent of Lemuria, and contemporary psychics have claimed that it is the center of various energy vortexes that make it a place especially accommodating to psychic/spiritual awakening and channeling work.

Sedona's present role as a metaphysical center can be traced to the late 1950s when Mary Lou Keller moved to the area and opened the Sedona Church of Light. The church became a center for disseminating metaphysical teachings both by Weller and the many outside speakers who came to Sedona. She was joined in the early 1960s by Evangeline and Carmen Van Pollen, two teachers who led the Ruby Focus of Magnificent Consummation, an independent “I AM” group. The Van Pollens operated as messengers of the ascended masters, much as had Guy W. Ballard in the 1930s, and their work continues under the name Rainbow Focus.

As the New Age Movement began to identify different significant locations as power spots, places where the Earth's configuration creates a spiritual energy vortex, Sedona was touted as such a location. As the image of Sedona developed, New Age writer/publisher Dick Sutphen joined the chorus of Sedona supporters and in 1986 published a new book, Sedona Psychic Energy Vortexes. He built his discussion both upon the ancient designation of sacred spaces by Native Americans and the more modern mapping of the lines of magnetic forces on the earth's surface. The area around Flagstaff has been noted as an area of deviation from the expected pattern of the Earth's magnetic field. Sutphen argued that Sedona is a sight at which several vortexes, peculiar places where energy is emitted on the Earth's surface, are located. He identified these particular locations (while offering practical advice on visiting the more remote spots that require hiking through the snake-infested countryside). He also explained the power vortexes on the Earth as similar to acupuncture points on the human body. Others tied Sedona to UFO activity.

During the 1990s, many holistic healers and channelers settled in Sedona, while others visit regularly. Around 1989, Emergence—a Journal for the Golden Age began to feature the people, organizations, and events in the larger New Age community of Sedona. In the mid-1990s, renamed Sedona: Journal of Emer- gence, it became the voice of the new generation of channelers across North America and around the world, and has established Sedona as the vocal center of the post-New Age vision of the ascended life. Light Technology Publishing also publishes and distributes a wide range of channeled material both from the Sedona channels and other like-minded channels around the world.

Sources:

Dannelley, Richard. Sedona Power Spot, Vortex, and Medicine Wheel Guide. Sedona, Ariz.: R. Dannelley with the Cooperation of the Vortex Society, 1991.

———. The Sedona Guide Book of Channeled Wisdom. Sedona, Ariz.: Light Technology Publishing, 1991.

Dongo, Tom. The Alien Tide: The Mysteries of Sedona II. Sedona, Ariz.: Hummingbird Press, 1990.

———. The Mysteries of Sedona. Sedona, Ariz.: Color Pro Graphics, 1988.

Sutphen, Dick. Sedona: Psychic Energy Vortexes. Malibu, Calif.: Valley of the Sun Publishing, 1986.

Sedona Journal of Emergence

Sedona Journal of Emergence is one of the most important expressions of the post-New Age spirituality as it has become focused in the channeling activity of a group of channelers who have emerged to prominence in the 1990s. The monthly publication began as a local networking magazine serving the Sedona, Arizona, community which became known in the 1980s as a peculiar spot favoring psychic and spiritual activity. Over the decade it transformed into a large monthly magazine circulated nationally and throughout the English-speaking world.

Each issue of Sedona is built around excerpts of channeled material produced by a spectrum of individuals, a number of whom reside in the Sedona area, though increasingly channelers from around the world contribute material. Occasionally, this material is grouped around particular themes to which a variety of channeled entities have spoken. While these entities have their differences, they tend to speak out of the common worldview supplied by the Western Esoteric tradition as exemplified in Theosophy. In the post-New Age environment, the two strains of channeling work, that based primarily on conversations with ascended masters and that with extraterrestrials, has merged and many channelers have both members of the spiritual hierarchy and space beings speaking through them. Particularly prominent is Robert Shapiro, who channels Zoosh, Isis, and other entities. These entities are listed along with the magazine staff as the magazine's "Interdimensional Board of Directors."

Along with the channeled material, Sedona also carries a monthly astrology column and a column by New Thought metaphysician Louise Hay. There is relatively little space devoted to advertising, most of which advertises the counseling sessions and books by the channels. In the late 1990s Sedona nurtured the development of an Australia/New Zealand edition, which after a year-and-a-half, in 1999, became Elohim. Elohim continues as a sister publication following the format of Sedona.

Sedona Journal of Emergence is published at 2020 Contractors Rd., #4, Sedona, AZ 86336. Its Internet presence is found at <http://www.sedonajo.com/>.

Sources:

Sedona Journal of Emergence. Sedona, Ariz., n.d.

Sedona Journal of Emergence. <http://www.sedonajo.com/>. March 10, 2000.

The Seekers

A spiritual healing organization founded in London in 1926 by C. A. Simpson, formerly a New Zealand electrical engineer, who gave up his profession to establish this center under the direction of the spirit guide "Dr. Lascelles." The center was originally named The Guild of Spiritual Healing. Many cures were reported in cases generally classed as incurable. Associated Harmony Prayer Circles throughout Britain provided absent healing treatment. In 1933, the Seekers center moved to larger premises at West Malling, Kent, where over 5,000 members were linked in prayer circles. Last known address: Seekers' Trust, The Close, Addington Park, West Malling, Kent, England.

The Seer (Journal)

Early twentieth-century monthly review of occult and psychic sciences, founded 1928, published in Nice, France, and later in Carthage, Tunisia. It was edited by Francis Rolt Wheeler. Contributors included Ernesto Bozzano, Lewis Spence, and Jollivet Castelot.

Seer (or Seeress)

A traditional term for a person who manifests clairvoyance or precognition. In ancient Israel the term was replaced by "judge." The judges used their psychic abilities to guide the twelve tribes from the time of the settlement in Palestine until the establishment of the monarchy under Saul (I Samuel 9:9). In Scotland it is equated with the possession of second sight.

"Seer" (Software)

An astrology software program that purportedly indicates from their star signs how well business partners will perform with each other. From the proposed partners' date and place of birth, the program calculates the planetary conjunction believed to determine personal characteristics and behavior patterns. An index of business compatibility is then generated using a scale from 0 to 30. "Seer" was marketed by British-born Peter Mackenzie through the Triangle Group in California, and customers are said to have included Pizza Hut and Motorola. The package was also tested on a KOBA Television program.

Seik Kasso

Burmese evil spirits inhabiting trees. (See MYANMAR)

Seiktha

A Burmese evil spirit. (See MYANMAR)

Self-Realization Fellowship

An early American Hindu organization founded in 1920 as the Yogoda Satsang Society by Swami Paramahansa Yogananda. Yogananda was the inheritor of a tradition of kriya yoga, which had been revived in the 1860s by Mahavatar Babaji, a guru who lived in the foothills of the Himalayas and was believed to be an incarnation of Shiva, the Hindu deity. The lineage was passed to Swami Sri Yukteswar, who passed it to Yogananda.

Yogananda traveled to Boston in 1920 for the tricentennial anniversary of the Pilgrims' landing, sponsored by the International Congress of Religious Liberals, and decided to stay in the United States, one of the few Hindu teachers to settle in the country before immigration from India was stopped in 1924. He moved the headquarters to California in 1925. He wrote several books and began a magazine, East-West (later Self-Realization). He also developed a set of correspondence lessons, which facilitated the spread of the movement to all parts of the country.

The Self-Realization Fellowship was incorporated in 1935. As its name implies, it emphasizes the attainment of ananda, through self-realization, which it teaches is accomplished “through definite techniques for attaining a personal experience of God.” Central to Yogananda’s teachings is the practice of kriya yoga, which reinforces and revitalizes subtle currents of life energy in the body, enabling the normal activities of the heart and lungs to slow down naturally. It is based on a form of meditation, the details of which are taught only to students of the Self-Realization Fellowship Lessons.

The fellowship also emphasizes what it sees as the essential unity of Eastern and Western spiritual teachings. To that end, its teachers often provide interpretations of parallel passages in the Christian New Testament and the Hindu Bhagavad Gita.

Following Yogananda’s death in 1952, Swami Rajasi Janakananda (James J. Lynn) led the organization for three years but died in 1955. He was succeeded by Sri Daya Mata, who has led the organization since. SRF has more than 500 meditation centers in 56 countries, including twelve temples and ashram centers: nine in California and one each in Arizona, Virginia, and Nuremberg, Germany.

Yogananda’s Autobiography of a Yogi, first issued in 1946, has proved to be a widely popular text and has influenced people far beyond the Self-Realization Fellowship. Among the more famous members of the fellowship is W. Y. Evans-Wentz, scholar of Eastern mysticism and author of various books dealing with Tibetan and yogic texts. Website: <http://www.yogananda-srf.org/>.

Sources:

Mata, Sri Daya. Only Love. Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, 1976.

New Pilgrims of the Spirit. Boston: Beacon Press, 1921.

Self-Realization Fellowship Highlights. Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, 1980.

Self-Realization Fellowship Manual of Services. Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, 1965.

Yogananda, Swami Paramahansa. Autobiography of a Yogi. New York: Philosophical Library, 1946. Reprint, Los Angeles: Self-Realization Fellowship, 1971.

———. Descriptive Outlines of Yogoda. Los Angeles: Yogoda Satsang Society, 1928.

The Semites

This entry on the Semites applies to the more ancient divisions of the race, such as the Babylonians and Assyrians, and the Hebrews in Biblical times. For later Semitic occultism, see Arabs and Kabala.

In ancient Babylonia and Chaldea, magic was a department of priestly activity. In Mesopotamia a sect of priests named the Asipu were set apart for the practice of magic, which in their case probably consisted of hypnotism, the casting out of demons, the banning of troublesome spirits and so forth.

The caste of priests called the Baru consulted the oracles on the future by inspecting the entrails of animals, the flight of birds, “the observation of oil in water, the secret of Anu, Bel, and Ea, the tablet of the gods, the sachet of leather of the oracles of the heavens and earth, the wand of cedar dear to the great gods.”

These priests of Baru and Asipu wore clothing peculiar to their rank, which they changed frequently during the ceremonies in which they took part. In ancient tablets we find kings making frequent inquiries about the future through these priestly castes: in a tablet of Sippar, we find treated the royal Sennachrib seeking through the Baru the causes of his father’s violent death. The Asipu were exorcists, who removed taboos and laid ghosts. An Asipu’s functions are set forth in the following incantatory poem:

[The man] of Ea am I,

[The man] of Damkina am I,
The messenger of Marduk am I,
My spell is the spell of Ea,
My incantation is the incantation of Marduk,
The circle of Ea is in my hand,
The tamarisk, the powerful weapon of Anu,
In my hand I hold,
The date-spathe, mighty in decision,
In my hand I hold.
He that stilleth all to rest, that pacifieth all,
By whose incantation everything is at peace,
He is the great Lord Ea,
Stilling all to rest, and pacifying all,
By whose incantation everything is at peace.
When I draw nigh unto the sick man
All shall be assuaged.
I am the magician born of Eridu,
Begotten in Eridu and Subari.
When I draw nigh unto the sick man
May Ea, King of the Deep, safeguard me!
O Ea, King of the Deep, to see. . . .
I, the magician, am thy slave.
March thou on my right hand,
Assist [me] on my left;
Add thy pure spell to mine,
Add thy pure voice to mine,
Vouchsafe (to me) pure words,
Make fortunate the utterances of my mouth,
Ordain that my decisions be happy,
Let me be blessed where’er I tread,
Let the man whom I [now] touch be blessed.
Before me may lucky thoughts be spoken.
After me may a lucky finger be pointed.
Oh that thou wert my guardian genius,
And my guardian spirit!
O God that blesseth, Marduk,
Let me be blessed, where’er my path may be!
Thy power shall god and man proclaim;
This man shall do thy service,
And I too, the magician thy slave.
Unto the house on entering. . . .
Samas is before me,
Sin [is] behind [me],
Nergal [is] at (my) right hand,
Ninib [is] at my left hand;
When I draw near unto the sick man,
When I lay my hand on the head of the sick man,
May a kindly Spirit, a kindly Guardian, stand at my side.

The third caste was the Zammaru, and its members sang or chanted certain ceremonials.

The lower ranks of sorcery were represented by the Kassapu and Kassaptu, the wizard and witch, who, as elsewhere, practiced black magic and were fiercely combated by the priest-magician caste. In the code of Hammurabi there was a stringent law against the professors of black magic:

If a man has charged a man with sorcery and has not justified himself, he who is charged with sorcery shall go to the river, he shall plunge into the river, and if the river overcome him, he who accused him shall take to himself his house. If the river makes that man to be innocent, and he be saved, he who accused him shall be put to death. He who plunged into the river shall take to himself the house of him who accused him.

This recalls the water test for a witch in the seventeenth century: if she sank when thrown in a pond, she was innocent, but if she floated, she was a witch.

Another series of tablets dealt with the black magician and the witch, who were represented as roaming the streets, entering houses, and prowling through towns, stealing the love of men, and withering the beauty of women. The exorcist made an image of the witch and he called upon the fire-god to burn it. He seized the witch’s mouth, tongue, eyes, feet, and other members and prayed that sin would cast her into an abyss of water and fire, and that her face would grow yellow and green. He feared that the witch was directing a similar sorcery against himself, but sent the halthappan plant and sesame to undo her spells and force the words back into her mouth. The exorcist trusted that the images she had fashioned against him would assume her own character, and her spells would be turned back on her.

Another tablet expressed the desire that the god of night would strike the witch's magic, that her mouth become fat and her tongue salt, that the words of evil she had spoken be poured out like tallow, and that the magic she was working be crumbled like salt.

The tablets abound in magical matter, and in them we have a record of the actual wizardry in vogue at the time they were written, which runs at least from the seventh century until the time when cuneiform inscription ceased to be used.

Chaldean magic was renowned throughout the world, especially for its astrology. The book of Isaiah states: "Let now the astrologers, star-gazers, monthly prognosticators, stand up and save thee from the things that shall come upon thee." In the book of Daniel, magicians are called Chaldeans, and even in modern times occultists have praised Chaldean magi. The Greek geographer Strabo and the Roman rhetorician Ælian alluded to Chaldean knowledge of astrology, and it is supposed to have been the Chaldean magician Æthanes who introduced his science into Greece, which he entered with Xerxes.

The great library of Assurbanipal, king of Assyria, who died in 626 B.C.E., affords first-hand knowledge of Assyrian magic. Assurbanipal gathered together numerous volumes from the cities of Babylonia, stored them in his great library at Nineveh, and had them copied and translated. In fact, letters have been discovered from Assurbanipal to some of his officials, giving instructions for the copying of certain incantations. Many grimoires also come from Babylonia, written during the later empire, the best known of which are the series entitled Maklu (burning), Utukki limnuti (evil spirits), Labartu (hag-demon), and Nis kati (raising of the hand).

There are also many ceremonial texts available that throw considerable light on magical practice. The Maklu, for example, contains eight tablets of incantations and spells against wizards and witches—the general idea running through it being to instruct the bewitched person how to manufacture figures of his enemies and thus destroy them.

The series dealing with the exorcism of evil spirits enumerates demons, goblins, and ghosts, and consists of at least sixteen tablets. They were for the exorcist's use in driving devils out from possessed people. This was to be accomplished by invoking the aid of the gods, so that the demons might be placed under a divine taboo. The demon who possessed the unfortunate victim had to be described in the most minute manner.

The series dealing with the Labartu or hag-demon, a kind of female devil who delighted in attacking children, gave directions for making a figure of the Labartu and the incantations to be repeated over it. The magician and philosopher appear to have worked together in Assyria, for medical men constantly used incantations to drive out demons, and incantations were often associated with prescriptions. Medical magic indeed appears to have been of much the same sort as we find among the Native American.

The doctrine of the "Incommunicable Name" was established among the early Semites, as among the Egyptians. It related to the secret name of a god that, when discovered, gave the speaker complete power over him by its mere utterance. Knowing the name or description of the person or demon against whom the magician directed his charm was also essential to success. Drugs were originally ascribed the power vouchsafed by the gods for the welfare of mankind and were supposed to aid greatly in exorcism.

In Assyrian sorcery, Ea and Marduk were the most powerful gods, Marduk being an intermediary between human beings and their father, Ea; indeed the legend of Marduk going to his father for advice was commonly repeated in incantations. When working magic against an individual it was necessary to have something belonging to him or her—clippings of hair, or fingernails if possible. The possessed person was usually washed, the principle of cleansing probably underlying this ceremony. An incantation called the Incantation of Eridu was often prescribed, and this must have related to some such cleansing, for Eridu was the Home of Ea, the Sea-god.

A formula for exorcising or washing away a demon named Rabešu stated that the patient was to be sprinkled with clean water seven times. Of all water none was so sacred as that from the Euphrates river, and its water was frequently used for charms and exorcisms.

Fumigation with a censor was also employed by the Assyrians for exorcism, but the possessed person was often guarded from the attack of fiends by being placed in the middle of an enchanted circle of flour, through which it was thought no spirit could break. Wearing the glands from the mouth of a fish was also a charm against possession. In making a magic circle, the sorcerer usually formed seven little winged figures to set before the god Nergal, blessing them with a long spell that stated he had completed the usurtu or magic circle with a sprinkling of lime. The wizard further prayed that the incantation might be performed for his patient by the god. This would seem to be a prototype of the use of the circle among magicians of medieval times.

R. Campbell Thompson, in his book Semitic Magic (1908), stated:

"Armed with all these things—the word of power, the acquisition of some part of the enemy, the use of the magic circle and holy water, and the knowledge of the magical properties of substances—the ancient warlock was well fitted for his trade. He was then capable of defying hostile demons or summoning friendly spirits, of driving out disease or casting spells, of making amulets to guard the credulous who came to him. Furthermore, he had a certain stock-in-trade of tricks which were a steady source of revenues. Lovesick youths and maidens always hoped for some result from his philtres or love-charms; at the demand of jealousy, he was ever ready to put hatred between husband and wife; and for such as had not the pluck or skill even to use a dagger on a dark night, his little effigies, pierced with pins, would bring death to a rival. He was at once a physician and wonder-worker for such as would pay him fee.

"Among the more modern Semites magic is greatly in vogue in many forms, some of them quite familiar to Europeans: indeed we find the Arabian Nights edited by Lane, a story of old women riding on a broom-stick. Among Mahomedans the wizard is thought to deserve death by reason of the fact that he is an unbeliever. Witches are fairly common in Arabic lore, and we usually find them figuring as sellers of potions and philtres. . . . In Arab folk tales the moghrebi is the sorcerer who has converse with demons, and we find many such in the Old and New Testaments, as well as diviners and other practitioners of the occult arts. In the Sanhedrin, Rabbi Akiba defines an enchanter as one who calculates the times and hours, and other rabbis state that 'an enchanter is he who grows ill when his bread drops from his mouth, or if he drops the stick that supports him from his hand, or if his son calls after him, or a crow caws in his hearing, or a deer crosses his path, or he sees a serpent at his right hand, or a fox on his left.'"

The Arabs used to believe that magic would not work while he that employs it was asleep. In this belief system it is possible to overreach Satan himself, and many Arabic tales exist in which men of wisdom and cunning have succeeded in accomplishing this. The Devil Iblis once sent his son to an assembly of honorable people with a flint stone, and told him to have the stone woven. He came in and said, "My father sends his peace, and wishes to have this flint stone woven." A man with a goat-beard said, "Tell your father to have it spun, and then we will weave it."

The son went back, and Iblis was very angry and told his son never to make any suggestion when a goat-bearded man was present, "for he is more devilish than we."

Curiously enough, the rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah made a similar request in a contest against the wise men of Athens, who required him to sew together the fragments of a broken millstone. He asked in reply for a few threads made of the fiber of the stone. The good folk of Mosul, too, always prided themselves on a ready wit against the Devil. Once upon a time, the devil Iblis came to Mosul and found a man planting onions. They fell to talking, and in their fellowship agreed to divide the produce of the garden. On the day when the onions were ready, the partners went to their vegetable patch and the man said, "Master, wilt thou take as thy half that which is above ground or that which is below?"

The Devil saw the green shoots of the onions sprouting high and carried these off as his share, leaving the gardener chuckling over his bargain. But when wheat time came round, the Devil looked over the land and complained that he had made nothing out of their previous compact. "This time," he said, "we will divide differently, and thou shalt take the tops," and so the bargain fell to the gardener's advantage again.

When they visited the land together when the corn was ripe, the man reaped the field and took away the ears, leaving the Devil stubbing up the roots. After he had been digging for a month, he began to realize his error and went to the man, who was cheerily threshing his portion.

"This is a paltry quibble," said Iblis, "thou hast cozened me this twice." "Nay," said the former, "I gave thee thy desire, and furthermore, thou didst not thresh out thine onion-tops, as I am doing this." So it was a hopeful Devil that went away to beat the dry onion-stalks in vain. Iblis left Mosul sullenly, stalking away in frustrated anger, stopping once in a while to shake his hand against so crafty a town. "Cursed be he, ye tricksters! who can outmatch devilry like yours?"

"In modern times in the East," stated R. C. Thompson, "from Morocco to Mesopotamia, books of magic are by no means rare, and manuscripts in Arabic, Hebrew, Gershuni, and Syriac can frequently be bought, all dealing with some form of magic or popular medicine. In Suakin in the Soudan I was offered a printed book of astrology in Arabic illustrated by the most grotesque and bizarre woodcuts of the signs of the Zodiac, the blocks for which seem to have done duty in other places. Such books existed in manuscript in ancient days, as is vouched for by the story of the Sibylline books or the passage in Acts XIX, 19; 'Not a few of them that practised curious arts brought their books together, and burned them in the sight of all.'"

It is curious to find the charm for raising hatred was practically the same among the Semites and the peoples of Hungary and the Balkan States—that is, through the agency of the egg of a black hen.

We find, too, many minor sorceries the same among the Semites as among European races. To be invisible was on attainment much sought after, and it was thought that if one wore a ring of copper and iron engraved with certain magic signs this result would be secured. The heart of a black cat, dried and steeped in honey, was also believed to be effective.

(For various instances of potent enchantments, see Solomon.)

Sympathetic magic was often resorted to by the Arabic witch and wizard, just as it was among the ancient Hebrews and Assyrians. The great repertory of Semitic occultism is the Kabala, but here the occult has been transmuted into Hebrew mysticism.

Sources:

Thompson, C. J. S. The Mysteries and Secrets of Magic. London: Allen Lane, 1927. Reprint, Causeway, 1973.

Thompson, R. C. Devils & Evil Spirits of Babylonia 2 vols. London: Luzac, 1903–04/

———. Semitic Magic. London: Luzac, 1908.

Sensitive

The term "sensitive," often interchangeable with "psychic," refers to a person with psychic powers, but eschews communication with the dead. A sensitive is thus distinguished from the "medium," or "channel." A medium is usually also a sensitive. According to Spiritualism, a medium is not necessarily a sensitive but may be simply an instrument for spirit communication. (It must be remembered that such a distinction was made in the days in which many "mediums" accepted by the movement were frauds. This distinction explained why they made no pretense of being "psychic" except in the séance room.)

Sensitives ordinarily believe that their psychic abilities are a natural ability that they possess to a greater degree than most, either through natural endowment or a process of psychic development. Many believe in reincarnation, a belief that is often incompatible with Spiritualist contact with the dead, and they may explain many events (such as seeing an apparition) that Spiritualists ascribe to spirit agency to memories from previous lives. Sensitives may specialize in one form of psychic ability, be it psychometry, precognition, telepathy, or clairvoyance. Many emerge as healers with some ability in psychokinesis.

During the nineteenth century, prior to the rise of Spiritualism, German scientist Baron Karl von Reichenbach conducted numerous experiments with "sensitives" in order to validate his concept of a mysterious vital force in nature which he termed "od" or "odyle." These individuals, drawn from all walks of life, were selected on the basis of specific sensitive reactions—feelings of pleasant coolness or alternatively disagreeable feelings in relation to other people or to metals, as well as reactions to colors and foods.

Sources:

Reichenbach, Karl von. Der sensitive Mensch und sein Verhalten zum Ode (The sensitive man and his relation to od). 2 vols. Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1854–55.

Sensory Deprivation

The process of psychic development generally entails learning to refocus attention from the outer world of sensory input and directing attention inward in some form. One popular form is meditation, in which the person consciously withdraws attention from sensory data. Various attempts to readjust the environment to reduce sensory input have been made. Lights can be dimmed, a quiet location selected, a comfortable posture assumed, and breathing regulated.

The heightened blocking of normal sensory input has been found to result in hallucinations and vivid fantasies. Such a heightened blockage can be attained by placing a person in a sensory neutral environment. In the Ganzfeld setting, the eyes and ears are covered, and a sensory neutral environment is created with blue light and white noise.

An even more intense experience is provided by the isolation tank, in which an individual can float in water at a controlled temperature in a soundproof, lightproof chamber. While such experiments may be exhausting and affect mental process in an unstable individual, they can throw light on personality disorders and apparent paranormal experiences. An apparatus called the Witches' Cradle, devised by Robert E. L. Masters and Jean Houston of the Foundation for Mind Research, has been developed to study heightened sensory deprivation.

Sources:

Hooper, Judith, and Dick Teresi. Would a Buddha Wear a Walkman? New York: Simon & Schuster, 1990.

Solomon, P., and others eds. Sensory Deprivation. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University, 1961.

Zubeck, John P., ed. Sensory Deprivation: Fifteen Years of Research. Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1969.

“Sepharial”

Pseudonym of British astrologer and occult author Walter Gorn Old (1864–1929).

Serios, Ted (1918–)

A former Chicago bellhop, born November 27, 1918, with a claimed ability to project photographic images onto camera film by staring into the lens of a Polaroid camera. He sometimes used a piece of rolled cardboard to look into the camera lens at the moment the picture was taken. This “gismo,” as he called it, tended to arouse suspicions of fraud, although there was no evidence that it was a device for trickery. Serios also produced images using a camera without a lens.

A report of Serios’s strange talent by Pauline Oehler of the Illinois Society for Psychic Research was published in Fate magazine. Curtis Fuller, proprietor of Fate, sent a copy of the article to parapsychologist Jule Eisenbud, and as a result Eisenbud conducted an extensive investigation of Serios’s phenomena in 1964, the results of which were published in The World of Ted Serios: “Thoughtographic” Studies of an Extraordinary Mind (1966). Eisenbud found the phenomena as erratic as Serios himself, but probably genuine.

Critics charged fraud and James Randi claimed to have been able to reproduce pictures like Serios’s by use of a “gizmo-like” device. While Randi had suggested a means by which the pictures could be reproduced, at least those in which Serios held the camera in his hand and used the cardboard device, he did not explain how the pictures were produced when the camera was at some distance. Among some of the extraordinary images produced by Serios with a Polaroid camera were pictures of Mariner IV and Russian Vostok rockets. Many pictures produced by Serios are ambiguous, in soft focus, or too vague to identify. Some contained mistakes which would have been absent from a picture of an object that had merely been reproduced via the “gizmo.”

At one point, a rumor circulated that Serios had confessed to fraud, a fact that both Eisenbud and Serios staunchly denied. His work has fallen into the shadow created by the confession of Masuki Kiyota to having faked similar effects after he had passed a number of tests by both Japanese researchers and Eisenbud.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Eisenbud, Jule. “On Ted Serios’ Alleged ‘Confession.’” Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 69 (1975).

———. The World of Ted Serios: “Thoughtographic” Studies of an Extraordinary Mind. New York: William Morrow, 1966.

Serling, Rod (1924–1975)

Writer, dramatist, television producer, and creator of the classic science fiction/horror series, Twilight Zone. He was born in Syracuse, New York, on December 25, 1924. During World War II, he served with the paratroopers, and after the war he studied at Antioch College (B.A., 1950), but even before completing his degree he had become a writer for radio (beginning in 1946) and television (beginning in 1948). His plays were produced on a variety of popular drama shows such as the Kraft Theatre, Studio One, U.S. Steel Hour, Playhouse 90, Suspense, and Danger. He later became writer-producer for The Twilight Zone, and Rod Serling’s Night Gallery, and the narrator for In Search of Ancient Astronauts. He received Emmy awards for best teleplay writing in 1955–57, 1959–61, and 1963–64 and numerous additional awards for his teleplay writing. He also authored a number of books. He died on June 28, 1975.

Sources:

Serling, Rod. More Stories From the Twilight Zone. New York: Bantam Books, 1961.

———. Night Gallery. New York: Dember Books, 1987. Distributed by W. W. Norton.

———. Night Gallery Two. Toronto; New York: Bantam Books, 1972.

———. Patterns. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1957.

———. Stories from the Twilight Zone. N.p., 1960. Reprint, New York; Toronto: Bantam Books, 1986.

Servadio, Emilio (1904–1995)

Italian psychoanalyst, author, and co-founder in 1937 of the Societa Italiana Di Parapsychologia (the Italian Society for Psychic Research, now Italian Society for Parapsychology). He was born on August 14, 1904, in Genoa, Italy. He studied at Genoa University (LL.D., 1926). In private practice for much of his life, he took special interest in the psychodynamic and psychoanalytic aspects of ESP. In 1932 he investigated the phenomena of the medium Pasquale Erto, and in 1957 he investigated the miraculous healers in Lucania, South Italy.

Highlighting his outstanding career, he was named president of the Psychoanalytic Center of Rome in 1962, and he was elected to terms as vice president of the Italian Society for Parapsychology (1955–56) and vice president of Italian Psychoanalytic Society (1953–55, 1958–60). He was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and in 1982 was elected president of the Parapsychological Association of Italy. He was chairman of the International Committee for the Study of Methods in Parapsychology and a subeditor and contributor to the Enciclopedia Italiana and various scholarly and scientific journals. He is author of La Ricerca Psicica (Psychical Research, 1930, 1946), and contributed to Proceedings of an International Conference on Methodology in Psi Research: Psi Favorable States of Consciousness edited by Roberto Cavanna (Parapsychology Foundation, 1970) and Proceedings of an International Conference: Psi Factors in Creativity edited by Allan Angoff and Betty Shapin (Parapsychology Foundation, 1970).

Servadio died January 18, 1995.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Servadio, Emilio. “Le conditionnement transferentiel et contre-transférentiel des événements ‘psi’ au cours de l’analyse” (Transference and counter-transference conditioning of ‘psi’ events during analysis). Acta Psychotherapeutica (1955).

———. “Freud et la Parapsychologie.” Revue Francaise de Psychoanalyse 3 (1956).

———. “The ‘Normal’ and the ‘Paranormal’ Dream.” International Journal of Parapsychology (1962).

———. “A Presumptively Telepathic-Precognitive Dream During Analysis.” International Journal of Psycho-Analysis 1 (1955).

———. “Psychoanalyse and Telepathie” (Psychoanalysis and telepathy). Imago 4 (1935). Reprinted in Psychoanalysis and the Occult, edited by 1953 George Devereux.

———. “Transference and Thought-Transference.” International Journal of Psycho-Analysis 4, no. 5 (1956).

Servants of Awareness

The Servants of Awareness was one of a several organizations that formed in response to the turbulence in the Organization of Awareness (now Cosmic Awareness Communications) that arose after the death of William Ralph Doby in 1967. Since the Organization of Awareness's founding, Doby had served as the channel for messages from "Cosmic Awareness," upon which the group's teachings were based. Servants of Awareness was formed by David E. Worcester in Seattle, Washington. It gained some support through the 1970s but has since disappeared.

Servants of the Light (SOL)

The Servants of the Light is a contemporary ritual magic group founded by William E. Butler (1898–1978) in early 1965. Butler had studied with Dion Fortune and the Society of the Inner Light, which he founded and had gone on to establish his own direct contact with the higher magical planes. In the years following Dion Fortune's death, Butler wrote several basic magical textbooks, several of which became quite popular in occult circles for their clarity and readability: Magic: Its Ritual, Power, and Work (1952), The Magician: His Training and Work (1959), and Apprenticed to Magic (1962).

In 1965, along with fellow society member Gareth Knight, he left the society and founded the Helios Book Service and a new correspondence course of study in magic, the Helios Course, similar to that taught by Dion Fortune. In 1972, Knight departed and the following year founded a new magical group. Butler continued to offer the Helios Course, which evolved into the curriculum of the Servants of the Light School of Occult Science. He was joined in this endeavor by Michael and Delores Ashcroft-Nowicki. Together they built the school into an international training instrument with students in more than 20 countries.

Delores Ashcroft-Nowicki eventually came into direct contact with the same inner plane teacher that Butler had contacted. She decided to dedicate her life to the service of this inner plane adept. She was appointed to succeed Butler as the director of studies for the school and Michael was named the school's guardian. In the decades since assuming leadership of the school, as the school has expanded, Delores Ashcroft-Nowicki has emerged as a teacher in her own right and has authored a number of books, both beginning and advanced.

The Servants of the Light offers a 50-lesson correspondence course in magic (with each lesson taking approximately one month). The content of the course is drawn from the Kabbalah, the tarot, and the Arthurian myths. It supplies a basic understanding of the esoteric tradition and the fundamentals of magical practice. Students study in their own home but are assigned a personal teacher to whom they may direct questions and from whom they can receive guidance. The school is not sectarian and teaches a system of magic that is compatible with a variety of religious backgrounds.

As of the beginning of the new millennium, the school reports some 2,600 students in 23 countries. Contact may be made through the international headquarters at P.O. Box 215, St Helier, Jersey, Channel Islands, Great Britain JE4 9SD. An Internet site is found at <http://www.servantsofthelight.org/>.

Sources:

Ashcroft-Nowicki, Delores. First Steps in Ritual. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1982.

———. The Tree of Ecstasy. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, UK: Aquarian Press, 1991.

Butler, William E. Apprenticed to Magic. London: Aquarian Press, 1962.

———. The Magician: His Training and Work. London: Aquarian Press, 1959.

Servants of the Light. <http://www.servantsofthelight.org/>. May 16, 2000.

Servants of the Star and the Snake

The Servants of the Star and the Snake (SSS), founded in 1995, grew out of the remnants of the Ordo Templi Baphemetic (OTB), a thelemic magical order which had functioned earlier in the decade, and it retains the thelemic character of the OTB. SSS exists as a free association of magical practitioners, members variously defining themselves as ceremonial magicians, shamans, witches, neopagans, sorcerers, or tantrikas. Having jettisoned the hierarchical structures and degree systems of what is considered the Old Aeon, the magicians of the SSS come together for mutual sharing, learning, and networking. There are no leaders, no holy books, and no formal initiations; however, the group does have a special respect for the teachings of the late Sri Gurudeva Mahendrabath Paramahansa, known to his followers as Dadaji, the cofounder of AMOOKOS (the Arcane, Magikal Order of the Knights of Shambhala) and the late Alain Daniélou.

The association is overseen by an administrator-general, a revolving office; the current administrator-general of the SSS is known by his magical name, Frater Eeyore. SSS may be contacted at P.O. Box 642, Weslaco, TX 78599-0642. It publishes a periodical, Lila. Closely associated is the American Gnostic Church, founded in 1985, headed by the Rev. James M. Martin. The church serves as an umbrella organization for several closely related spiritual movements, each claiming some form of illumination by stellar-gnosis. Through it, the SSS is closely related to the Order of Napunsakas in the West (ON), a tantric Order for non-heterosexuals. The ON exists through an outer order for both males and females, though its inner order, the Cultus Skanda-Karttikeya (CS-K), is open only to males. The Tantra (from Hinduism) and Thelema (the magical system developed by Aleister Crowley) systems have a common interest in sex magick, though traditionally they approach sexuality from different perspectives.

The SSS has a webpage at <http://www.wild.au/sss/index.html>.

Sources:

Servants of the Star and the Snake. <http://www.wild.au/sss/index.html>.

Servier, Jean H(enri) (1918–)

Professor of ethnology who has written on parapsychology. He was born on November 2, 1918, in Constantine, Algeria. He moved to France and studied at the Sorbonne. After graduation he became a professor of sociology and ethnology at the University of Montpellier, France. He was a member of Société des Africanistes. In addition to his studies in ethnology and anthropology, Servier has taken special interest in clairvoyance, mediumship, and the ethnological aspects of the history of magic.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Servier, Jean H. "Geomancy, Clairvoyance and Initiation." La Tour Saint-Jacques (September–December 1956). Reprinted in the Proceedings of Four Conferences of Parapsychology (1957).

———. L'Homme et l'Invisible. Paris: R. Laffonto, 1964.

———. Les Parties de l'Année. Paris: R. Laffonto, 1962.

"Seth"

Entity channeled through the medium Jane Roberts, the public name of Jane Butts (1929–1984). The communications from Seth began in 1963, when Jane and her husband Robert Butts first experimented with an ouija board. Later, Jane went into a trance, and when “Seth” spoke through her, Jane’s voice and features changed character.

The “Seth” material comprises a mass of teachings in manuscript and on tape recordings, much of which has been edited and issued in a series of books. The philosophy presented is coherent and continuous, covering teachings on dreams, health, reincarnation, astral projection, and the relationship of human beings to their creator. The teachings are comprehensive, dealing with “aspect psychology” (different levels of awareness and grades of reality in relation to mobile consciousness), the nature of the soul, death, and after-death experiences.

In a communication titled “The Unknown Reality,” “Seth” stated:

“The individual self must become aware of far more reality, it must allow its identity to expand to include previously unconscious knowledge. Your species is in a time of change—you are now poised on the threshold from which the race can go many ways. Potentials within the body’s mechanisms, not as yet used, can immeasurably enrich the race and bring it to levels of spiritual, psychic, and physical fulfillment. But if some changes are not made, the race will not endure. . . . I am suggesting ways in which the unknown reality can become a known one.”

Sources:

Roberts, Jane. The God of Jane: A Psychic Manifesto. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1981.

———. How to Develop Your ESP Power. New York: Frederick Fell, 1966. Reprinted as The Coming of Seth. New York: Pocket Books, 1976.

———. The Nature of Personal Reality: A Seth Book. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1974.

———. Seth, Dreams and Projection of Consciousness. Walpole, N. H., Stillpoint Publishing, 1986.

———. The Seth Material. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970.

———. Seth Speaks: The Eternal Validity of the Soul. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1972.

Sethos (ca. 12th century C.E.)

According to M. A. Del Rio (1561–1608), Sethos was a diviner, who was deprived of his sight by the Emperor Manuel because of his addiction to magic. It is said that the emperor Andronicus Comnenus, cousin of Manuel, had Sethos divine by hydromancy an answer to the question of who was to succeed him. The spirit gave the letters “S I” in reply; and on being asked when, said before the feast of the exaltation of the Cross. This prediction was fulfilled, for before the date mentioned, Isaac Angelus had thrown Andronicus to the mob to be torn to pieces. It is said that when the devil spells, he spells backwards, so that “S I” may be taken to represent Isaac.

Setna, Papyrus of

An ancient papyrus said to have been discovered by Prince Setna Kha-em-ust, son of Rameses II of Egypt, under the head of a mummy in the Necropolis at Memphis. The Egyptologist Alfred Wiedemann stated in his book Popular Literature in Ancient Egypt (1902):

“The first text, which has been known to us since 1867, tells that this prince, being skilled and zealous in the practice of necromancy, was one day exhibiting his acquirements to the learned men of the court, when an old man told him of a magic book containing two spells written by the hand of Thoth himself, the god of wisdom.

“He who repeated the first spell bewitched thereby heaven and earth and the realm of night, the mountains and the depth of the sea; he knew the fowls of the air and every creeping thing; he saw the fishes, for a divine power brought them up out of the depth. He who read the second spell should have power to resume his earthly shape, even though he dwelt in the grave; to see the sun rising in the sky with all the gods and the moon in the form wherein she displays herself.

“Setna inquired where this book was to be found, and learned that it was lying in the tomb of Nefer-ka-Ptah, a son of King Mer-neb-ptah (who is nowhere else named), and that any attempt to take away the book would certainly meet with obstinate resistance. These difficulties did not withhold Setna from the adventure. He entered the tomb of Nefer-ka-Ptah, where he found not only the dead man, but the Ka of his wife Ahuri and their son, though these latter had been buried in Koptos.

“Ahuri told all the trouble that the possession of the book had brought upon her husband and herself, but her tale of woe produced no effect upon the intruder. Setna persisted in his undertaking, and at length, by the help of magic, he gained his end.

“But as in many other tales among many other peoples, success brought no blessing to the man who had disturbed the repose of the dead. Setna fell in love with the daughter of a priest at Memphis, who turned out to be a witch, and took advantage of his intimate connection with her to bring him to ignominy and wretchedness.

“At length the prince recognized and repented of the sacrilege he had committed in carrying off the book, and brought it back to Nefer-ka-Ptah. In the hope of atoning to some extent for his sin he journeyed to Koptos, and finding the graves of the wife and child of Nefer-ka-Ptah, he solemnly restored their mummies to the tomb of the father and husband, carefully closing the tomb he had so sacrilegiously disturbed.

“The second text, edited two years ago by Griffith from a London papyrus, is also genuinely Egyptian in its details. Three magic tales, interwoven one with another, are brought into connection with Saosiri, the supernaturally born son of Setna.

“In the first, Saosiri, who was greatly Setna’s superior in the arts of magic, led his father down into the underworld. They penetrated into the judgment-hall of Osiris, where the sights they saw convinced Setna that a glorious future awaited the poor man who should cleave to righteousness, while he who led an evil life on earth, though rich and powerful, must expect a terrible doom. Saosiri next succeeded in saving his father, and with him all Egypt, from great difficulty by reading without breaking the seal a closed letter brought by an Ethiopian magician, whom he thus forced to recognize the superior power of Egypt.

“The last part of the text tells of a powerful magician once dwelling in Ethiopia who modelled in wax a litter with four bearers to whom he gave his life. He sent them to Egypt, and at his command they sought out Pharaoh in his palace, carried him off to Ethiopia, and, after giving him five hundred blows with a cudgel, conveyed him during the same night back to Memphis. Next morning the king displayed the weals on his back to his courtiers, one of whom, Horus by name, was sufficiently skilled in the use of amulets to ward off by their means any immediate repetition of the outrage.

“Horus then set forth to bring from Hermopolis, the all powerful magic book of the god Thoth, and by its aid he succeeded in treating the Ethiopian king as the Ethiopian sorcerer had treated Pharaoh. The foreign magician then hastened to Egypt to engage in a contest with Horus in magic tricks. His skill was shown to be inferior, and in the end he and his mother received permission to return to Ethiopia under a solemn promise not to set foot on Egyptian territory for a space of fifteen hundred years.”

Seton (or Sethon) Alexander (d. ca. 1604)

One of the very few alchemists, reportedly, who succeeded in the great experiment of the transmutation of metals. He was said to have taken his name from the village of Seton, in the vicinity of Edinburgh, Scotland.

In the year 1601, the crew of a Dutch vessel was wrecked on the coast near Seton's dwelling, and he personally rescued several of them, lodged them in his house, and treated them with great kindness, ultimately sending them back to Holland at his own expense. In the following year, he visited Holland and renewed his acquaintance with at least one of the shipwrecked crew, James Haussen, the pilot, who lived at Arksun.

Haussen, determined to repay Seton for the hospitality he had received in Scotland, entertained him for some time in Haussen house, and to him Seton disclosed the information that he was a master of the art of alchemy and proved his words by performing several transmutations. Haussen could not keep this information to himself and confided it to Venderlinden, a physician of Enkhuysen, and showed him a piece of gold that had been transmuted from lead. Venderlinden's grandson, in turn, showed it to the celebrated author D. G. Morhoff, who wrote a letter concerning it to Langlet du Fresnoy, author of the Histoire de la Philosophie Hermétique (3 vols., 1742).

Seton visited Amsterdam and Rotterdam, traveled by sea to Italy, then went through Switzerland to Germany, accompanied by Wolfgang Dienheim, a professed skeptic of alchemy, whom Seton convinced of the error of his views at Basel, before the eyes of several of its principal inhabitants. Dienheim described Seton, and the pen picture he made resembles a typical Scot of the seventeenth century. "Seton," Dienheim said "was short but stout, and high coloured, with a pointed beard, but despite his corpulence, his expression was spiritual and exalted." "He was," added Dienheim, "a native of Molier, in an island of the ocean."

Seton demonstrated several experiments of importance. In one of these the celebrated physician Zwinger himself brought the lead that was to be transmuted. A common crucible was obtained at a goldsmith's, and ordinary sulphur was bought on the road to the house where the experiment was to take place. Seton handled none of these materials and took no part in the operation except to give those who followed his directions a small packet of powder that transformed the lead into the purest gold of exactly the same weight. Zwinger appears to have been absolutely convinced of the genuine nature of the experiment, for he wrote an account of it to his friend Dr. Schobinger, which appears in Lonig's Ephemerides.

Shortly after this Seton left Basel and, changing his name, went to Strasbourg before traveling to Cologne, where he lodged with Anton Bordemann, who was something of an alchemist himself. In this city, Seton was sufficiently imprudent to exhibit his alchemical skill openly, on one occasion producing six ounces of gold through the application of one grain of his magical powder. The incident seems to have made an impression on at least one of the savants of Cologne, for Theobald de Hoghelande in his Historie Aliquot Transmutationis Metallice, which was published in Cologne in 1604, alluded to it.

Seton then went to Hamburg and traveled south to Munich, where something more important than alchemy engaged his attention: he eloped with the daughter of a citizen of that city. Christian II, the young elector of Saxony, had heard of Seton's brilliant alchemical successes and invited him to his court, but Seton, reluctant to leave his young wife, sent his friend William Hamilton (probably a brother-Scot) instead, with a supply of the transmuting agent.

In the presence of the whole court, Hamilton undertook and carried through an experiment with complete success, and the gold manufactured resisted every known test. This excited the elector's desire to see and converse with Seton himself, and a pressing invitation, which amounted to a command, was dispatched to Seton, who, unable to refuse, came to the electoral court.

He was received there with every mark of honor, but it soon became evident to him that Christian II had only invited him for the purpose of learning his secret, but Seton, as an adept in the mysteries of alchemy, remained true to his calling and flatly refused to gratify the elector's greed.

In the end the elector ordered him to be imprisoned in a tower, where he was guarded by forty soldiers. There he was subjected to every conceivable species of torture, but it failed to extort from him his methods. The elector at last ceased the torture.

At this point, Michael Sendivogius, a Moravian chemist who happened to be in Dresden, heard of Seton's terrible experiences and possessed sufficient influence to obtain permission to visit him. Himself a searcher after the philosophers' stone, he sympathized with the adept, and proposed to him that he should attempt a rescue. Seton agreed to this and promised that if he were fortunate enough to escape, he would reward Sendivogius with his secret.

The Moravian traveled back to Cracow, where he resided, sold his property, and returned to Dresden. He lodged near Seton's place of confinement, entertaining the soldiers who guarded the alchemist and judiciously bribing those who were directly concerned in his imprisonment.

At last he judged that the time was ripe to attempt Seton's rescue. He feasted the guards and they were soon in a condition of drunken carelessness. Sendivogius hurried to the tower in which Seton was imprisoned, but found him unable to walk through the severity of his tortures. He therefore supported Seton to a carriage, which they reached without being observed. They halted at Seton's house to pick up his wife, who had in her possession some of the all-important powder, and sped to Cracow, which they reached in safety.

When quietly settled in that city, Sendivogius reminded Seton of his promise to assist him in his alchemical projects, but was met with a stern refusal. Seton explained to him that it was impossible for him as an adept to reveal to his rescuer the terms of such a great mystery. The health of the alchemist, however, had been shattered by the torture he had suffered, and upon his death he presented the remains of his magical powder to his preserver.

The possession of this powder made Sendivogius more eager than ever to discover the mysteries of alchemy. He married Seton's widow, perhaps with the idea that she was in possession of her late husband's occult knowledge, but she was absolutely ignorant of the matter.

Seton left behind him a treatise entitled The New Light of Alchymy, which Sendivogius published as his own. In its pages he thought he saw a method of increasing the powder, but he only succeeded in lessening it.

With what remained he posed as a successful alchemist. In his own country of Moravia, he was imprisoned, but escaped. His powder was rapidly diminishing, but he still continued his experiments. Pierce Borel, in his work Tresor de Recherches et Antiquites Galoises et Françoises (1655), mentioned that he saw a crown piece that had been partially dipped into a mixture of the powder dissolved in wine, and that the part steeped in the elixir was gold, porous, and was not soldered or otherwise tampered with.

The powder expended, Sendivogius degenerated into a charlatan, pretending that he could manufacture gold, and receiving large sums on the strength of being able to do so. He survived until the year 1646 when he died at Parma at the age of eighty-four. Seton's book The New Light of Alchymy would appear to deny that the philosophers' stone was to be achieved by the successful transmutation of metals. It stated:

"The extraction of the soul out of gold or silver, by what vulgar way of alchymy soever, is but a mere fancy. On the contrary, he which, in a philosophical way, can without any fraud, and colourable deceit, make it that it shall really tinge the basest metal, whether with gain or without gain, with the colour of gold or silver (abiding all requisite trials whatever), hath the gates of Nature opened to him for the enquiring into further and higher secrets, and with the blessing of God to obtain them."

Seven Principles (in Theosophy)

According to the teachings of Theosophy (derived from Hinduism), there are seven principles or parts of the human being that reflect cosmic principles. These concern the evolution of life from the unmanifest principles through creation. The seven principles of the human being are: Atman (the universal self), Buddhi (the intellectual principle), Manas (the mental principle), Kama (desire), Prana (subtle vitality), Linga-sarira (astral body), and Sthula-sarira (gross physical matter).

For convenience, these are sometimes simplified into three principles of the human being: spirit, soul, and body, as in Christianity. These three parts are first and highest, the Divine Spirit or the Divine Monad, rooted in the universe, whose spirit is linked with the All, being in a mystical sense a ray of the All; second, the intermediate part of Spiritual Monad, which in its higher and lower aspects is the spiritual and human soul; third, the lowest part of the human constitution, the vital-astralphysical part, composed of material or quasi-material life atoms. (See also Logos; Planetary Logos; Rupa)

Sources:

Besant, Annie. The Seven Principles of Man. 1892. Reprint, New York: London & Bernes; Theosophical Publishing Society, 1904.

Seven Stewards of Heaven

According to the sixteenth-century magical ritual system Arbatel, these are the spirits through whom God governs the world. They are known as the Olympian spirits, and they govern the Olympian spheres, which are composed of 196 regions. Their names in the Olympian language are: Aratron, the celestial spirit of Saturn, whose day is Saturday; Bethor, the angel of Jupiter, whose day is Monday; Phaleg, the prince of Mars, whose day is Tuesday; Och, the master of the Sun, whose day is Sunday; Hagith, the sovereign of Venus, whose day is Friday; Ophiel, the spirit of Mercury, who must be invoked on Wednesday; Phul, the administrator of affairs in the Moon, whose day is Monday. Each of these Seven Celestial Spirits may be invoked by magicians with the aid of ceremonies and preparations.

Seventh-Day Adventism

Heterodox Christian cult stemming from the teachings of William Miller (1782–1849), formerly a Baptist convert, whose simplistic interpretation of scripture led him to assert that Christ would return to earth March 21, 1843. He built up a considerable following, but lost support when the return did not take place, even for a revised calculation of October 22, 1844.

His teachings were later modified by the Millerite Hiram Edson in New York State, who claimed that he had a vision which confirmed that Miller was right about the time of redemption but wrong about the place, which should have been the “heavenly sanctuary” and not the earth. Edson’s doctrine was further developed by “Father Bates” (former sea captain), Elder James White of the S.D.A. church which had been organized in 1860 and his wife Ellen G. White.

Since then, S.D.A. has built up a membership claimed at over two million in the United States and abroad. Two of its doctrinal points influenced Charles Taze Russell (1870–1916) in the formation of his evangelical cult of ‘Russellites’ which became known as Jehovah’s Witnesses under Joseph Rutherford (1916–1942). These doctrines were those of a “soul-sleep” after death, and of annihilation of the wicked. Other specifically S.D.A. doctrines include the concept of a completion of Christ’s atonement which had remained unfinished and the need to observe the Sabbath on Saturday.

Sources:

Land, Gary, ed. Adventism in America. Grand Rapids, Mich.: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 1986.

Nichol, Francis D. The Midnight Cry. Tacoma Park, Md.: Review and Herald Publishing Association, 1944.

Seventh Son

It has long been believed in Europe and the United States that a seventh son is especially lucky or gifted with occult powers, and that the seventh son of a seventh son has healing powers. In Scotland, the seventh daughter of a seventh daughter was said to have the gift of second sight (prophetic vision). In Ireland, the saliva of a seventh son was said to have healing properties. However, in Romanian folklore, a seventh child was believed to be fated to become a vampire.

As early as the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Diary of Walter Yonge 1604–1628 (published by the Camden Society, 1847, edited by G. Roberts) had a negative reference to the healing powers of a seventh son:

“In January, 1606–7, it is reported from London by credible letters, that a child being the seventh son of his mother, and no woman child born between, heaeth deaf, blind, and lame; but the parents of the child are popish, as so many say as are healed by it. The Bishop of London, Doctor Vaughan, caused divers [various people] to be brought to the child as aforesaid, who said a short prayer as [he] imposed his hands upon, as ‘tis said he did unto others; but no miracle followeth any, so that it appeareth to be a plain lie invented to win grace to the popish faction.”

Thomas Lupton, in the second edition of his book A Thousand Notable Things (1660), noted, “It is manifest, by experience, that the seventh male child, by just order (never a girl or wench being born between) doth heal only with touching (through a natural gift) the king’s evil [scrofula], which is a special gift of God, given to kings and queens, as daily experience doth witness.”

In France, there was also a tradition that a seventh son had the power to cure the king’s evil. He was called a “Marcou” and branded with a fleur-de-lis. The Marcou breathed on the part affected, or else the patient touched the Marcou’s fleur-de-lis.

Robert Chambers, in his Domestic Annals of Scotland from the Reformation to the Revolution (1858), stated that in February 1682, a certain Hugh McGie, “. . . gave in a bill to the Privy Council, representing that, by the practice of other nations, any tradesman having seven sons together, without the intervention of a daughter, is declared free of all public burdens and taxes, and has other encouragements bestowed on him, to enable him to bring up the said children for the use and benefit of the commonwealth; and claiming a similar privilege on the strength of his having that qualification. The Council recommended the magistrates [of Edinburgh] to take Hugh’s seven sons into consideration when they laid their ‘stents’ (trade taxes) upon him.”

A tradition in Donegal, Ireland, claimed that the healing powers of a seventh son required a special ceremony at the moment of the infant’s birth. The woman who received the child in her arms should place in its hand whatever substance she decided that he should use to heal in later life. This substance could be metal (e.g., a silver coin) or a common substance like salt, or even hair; when the child was old enough, it would rub the substance and the patient would apply it to an afflicted part for healing purposes. There was also an Irish tradition similar to the Scottish belief that a seventh son of a seventh son possessed prophetic as well as healing powers.

There was a general belief in Britain that the seventh son of a seventh son was destined to be a physician and would have an intuitive knowledge of the art of healing, often curing a patient simply by touching an afflicted part. This belief also extended to the seventh daughter of a seventh daughter. A contributor to Notes & Queries (June 12, 1852) observed: “In Saltash Street, Plymouth [England], my friend copied, on the 10th December, 1851, the following inscription on a board, indicating the profession and claims of the inhabitant: 'A. Shepherd, the third seventh daughter, Doctress.'"

The belief in the healing powers of the seventh son of a seventh son has persisted into the twentieth century, and there are two Irish healers of this kind: Danny Gallagher and Finbarr Nolan. Both are "touch healers," although Gallagher additionally "blesses" soil that is to be mixed with water and applied to the afflicted area of the patient; both healers recommend a sequence of two or three visits for maximum healing. They are credited with remarkable cures. Gallagher is reported to have restored the sight of a woman blind for twenty-two years, and Nolan claims to have successfully healed injured race horses as well as human beings.

Sources:

Chambers, Robert. Domestic Annals of Scotland from the Reformation to the Revolution. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1858.

Lupton, Thomas. A Thousand Notable Things. London, 1660.

Sex Magic

The sexualization of spirituality has a long tradition in most non-Western religious traditions and is especially prominent in Hindu tantric yoga, which strongly influenced Tibetan Buddhism. Sex was utilized as a means to unite with the goddess, in one of her several guises. It also emerged in Chinese Taoist traditions, where it was integrated into speculations of longevity and immortality.

In the West, sexual activity was to a large extent denigrated and identified with original sin. Thus the idea of positively integrating sexuality and religion was considered somewhat scandalous. With the emergence of alternative forms of spirituality, however, new attention was given to sexuality.

Within Spiritualism a new attention to sexuality began quite early as the basis of the concept that would become known as "soul mates." Early speculation would be passed on to Pascal Beverly Randolph, an eclectic physician who specialized in marital problems. Randolph developed a teaching of occult sexuality centered upon a hypothesized energy transfer between couples during intercourse. His ideas led directly to a full-blown "sex magick" as embodied in the OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis), a German magic order founded in the 1890s.

Through the nineteenth century the basic problem in ceremonial magic was the building of energy for the accomplishment both of mundane goals and the great work of union with the ultimate. A variety of different methods, from chanting to using mind-altering drugs, was used. The Ordo Templi Orientis proposed that sex was the best means of raising such energy. The order developed a degree system that taught basic magic practice and then introduced sexual techniques at the eighth (autoerotic) and ninth (heterosexual intercourse) degree levels. Through the early decades of the twentieth century, sex magic was the great secret of the OTO.

Independently of the OTO, Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), a former member of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn who had formed his own small group, pursued his development of magic through attempts to repeat some of the operations described in older texts. In 1909 he was in Egypt attempting to understand works of magic originally described by Elizabethan magicians John Dee and Edward Kelly. Assisting Crowley was Victor Neuburg. In the midst of these studies Crowley was inspired to conduct his first act of sex magic, with Neuburg as his partner. Crowley's work led to the publication The Book of Lies, which contains, in allegorical phrasing, some of the insights on sex and magic he had acquired.

Following the publication of The Book of Lies, Theodor Reuss, the outer head of the order of the OTO, contacted Crowley and complained that he had published the secret of the OTO. The result of their encounter was Crowley's induction into the OTO and his quick rise to a position of power as head of the British section. He then succeeded Reuss as outer head of the order. Crowley rewrote the ritual material for the order and added an eleventh, homoerotic, degree. Crowley also experimented with sex magic at an intense level over the next decade and kept detailed journals of his endeavors.

Through the decades after World War I several other sex magic groups were born, most founded by former members of the OTO. They included the Fraternal Saturni (Germany) and the Choronzon Club, also known as the Great Brotherhood of God (United States).

The OTO itself was never a large organization and few knew about and practiced its sex magic techniques. Crowley was succeeded by Carl Germer, whose administrative leadership was almost nonexistent. Through the 1950s the secret materials were dispensed to a variety of people internationally. Germer died in the early 1960s without designating a successor, and the order fell into chaos. In the meantime a set of Crowley's papers were deposited at the Warburg Institute in London and became known to various British magicians (especially Kenneth Grant).

Then in 1969 Louis Culling, a former member of the OTO who had left to join an American offshoot, published the Complete Magick Curriculum of the Secret Order of the G.B.G., and shortly thereafter a commentary on it, A Manual of Sex Magick. Beginning with the publication in 1972 of an edited edition of Crowley's Magical Diaries, which contained the account of some of his sexual experiments, within a decade all of Crowley's writings on sex magic and all of the secret materials of the OTO were published. These books provided the basis for the spread of sex magic throughout the Western world. At the same time, through the Bihar School of Yoga in Bengal, the sexual teachings of Indian tantra were for the first time spread to the West in such detail that tantric practice could be institutionalized.

From the 1980s to the present a host of different sex magic groups drawing upon the Crowley/OTO tradition have arisen. At the same time a number of tantric groups (and a few Taoist groups) have also appeared. While each tradition seems to be aware of the other and has some superficial similarity in its use of sexual intercourse for religious and magical ends, they have remained separate. The Western and Eastern teachings on sexuality are quite different. While the same basic practices are present in both Eastern and Western forms of occult sexuality, the ideas under which they were organized do not easily mix.

Sources:

Crowley, Aleister. De Arte Magica. San Francisco: Level Press, [1974].

———. Magical Diaries of Aleister Crowley. Edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. Montreal: Next Step Publications, 1972.

———. The Magical Record of the Beast 666. Edited by John Symonds and Kenneth Grant. Montreal: Next Step Publications, 1972.

Culling, Louis, ed. A Manual of Sex Magick. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1971.

King, Francis, ed. The Secret Rituals of the O.T.O. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

———. Sexuality, Magic, and Perversion. Secaucus, N.J.: Citadel Press, 1972.

Sexton, George

British secularist teacher of the nineteenth century. Robert Owen invited his attention to the phenomena of Spiritualism. After a crusade against its doctrines, personal experiences with the Davenport Brothers convinced Sexton of their genuine validity. Continuing his experiments, he finally ended by accepting Spiritualism and proclaimed its truth in lectures with the same outspokenness with which he formerly fought against it. He denounced the pretensions of conjurers who claimed to have exposed Spiritualism and, pointing out the difference in condition and effect, he actually performed sham spiritual manifestations before his audience.

Sexton authored one pamphlet, a transcript of a lecture: Scientific Materialism Calmly Considered; A Reply to Prof. Tyndall's Belfast Address (1874). He also served as editor of the Spiritual Magazine and became a member of the British National Association of Spiritualists.

Sextus V. Pope (1521–1590)

One of the popes accused of sorcery. J. A. de Thou said of him in his Histoire Universelle (1734, Vol. II):

“The Spaniards continued their vengeance against this Pontiff even after his death, and they forgot nothing in their anxiety to blacken his memory by the libels which they flung against him. Sextus, said they, who, by means of the magical art, was for a long time in confederacy with a demon, had made a compact with this enemy of humanity to give himself up to him, on condition he was made Pope, and allowed to reign six years.

“Sextus was raised to the chair of St. Peter, and during the five years he held sway in Rome he distinguished his pontificate by actions surpassing the feeble reach of the human intellect. Finally, at the end of this term, the Pope fell sick, and the devil arriving to keep him to his pact, Sextus inveighed strongly against his bad faith, reproaching him with the fact that the term they had agreed upon was not fulfilled, and that there still remained to him more than a twelve-month.

“But the devil reminded him that at the beginning of his pontificate he had condemned a man who, according to the laws, was too young by a year to suffer death, and that he had nevertheless caused him to be executed, saying that he would give him a year out of his own life; that this year, added to the other five, completed the six years which had been promised to him, and that in consequence he did very wrong to complain.

“Sextus, confused and unable to make any answer, remained mute, and turning himself towards the ruelle of his bed, prepared for death in the midst of the terrible mental agitation caused by the remorse of his conscience.” De Thou added, “For the rest, I only mention this trait as a rumor spread by the Spaniards, and I should be very sorry to guarantee its truth.”

During his papacy, Sextus authorized very large sums to be expended on public works, including completion of the dome of St. Peter's, the loggia of Sextus in the Lateran, and the chapel of the Praesepe in Sta. Maria Maggiore. In spite of the controversy, today Sextus is ranked among the greatest popes.

Seybert Commission

A commission for the investigation of Spiritualism, appointed by the wish of Henry Seybert, a Philadelphia Spiritualist who, in his will, left $60,000 to the University of Pennsylvania to be devoted “to the maintenance of a chair in the said University to be known as the ‘Adam Seybert Chair of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy,’ upon the condition that the incumbent of the said chair, either individually or in conjunction with a commission of the university faculty will make a thorough and impartial investigation of all systems of morals, religion, or philosophy which assume to represent the truth, and particularly of Modern Spiritualism.”

The commission, which began its investigations in March 1884, was composed as follows: William Pepper, Joseph Leidy, George A. Koenig, Robert Ellis Thompson, George S. Fullerton, and Horace Howard Furness; added afterward were Coleman Sellers, James W. White, Calvin B. Knerr, and S. Weir Mitchell. Pepper, as provost of the university, was ex-officio chairman. Furness acted as chairman and Fullerton was secretary to the committee.

Seybert was represented in the committee by Thomas R. Hazard, a personal friend. Hazard was charged by Seybert to prescribe the methods to be used in the investigation, designate the mediums to be consulted, and reject the attendance of those whose presence might be in conflict with the harmony or good order of the spirit circles. In May 1887, the committee published a preliminary report with negative conclusions in the whole field of Spiritualist phenomena. No final report was ever published, nor was the investigation continued.

The committee first turned its attention to slate-writing. Two séances with Mrs. S. E. Patterson led to no result. The committee then sent to New York for Henry Slade and promptly caught him in fraud. As no other slate-writing medium was available for testing, a mock séance was arranged for the committee by Harry Kellar, one of the more capable magicians of the day, and he proceeded to deliver messages in French, Spanish, Dutch, Chinese, Japanese, Gujarati, and German, without the committee being able to discover the trick.

The committee then turned to the issue of spirit rappings. Margaret Kane-Fox (of the Fox Sisters), the medium of these experiments, stood on four glass tumblers, the heels of her shoes resting upon the rear tumblers and the soles upon the first tumblers. After many attempts, raps were heard and Furness remarked to the medium, “This is the most wonderful thing of all, Mrs. Kane, I distinctly feel them in your feet. There is not a particle of motion in your foot, but there is an unusual pulsation.” After two séances the experiments were abandoned as the medium expressed doubt that in her state of health a third meeting would bring more striking results. According to the committee, this investigation was not sufficiently extensive to warrant any positive conclusions. The report, however, points out that “sounds of varying intensity may be produced in almost any portion of the human body by voluntary muscular action. To determine the exact location of this muscular activity is at times a matter of delicacy.”

An attempt was made to study spirit photography. This was frustrated as the committee felt disinclined to accept the high fees of William M. Keeler. He asked three hundred dollars for three séances and the right to demand, if conditions made it necessary, the exclusive use of the dark room and his own instruments. The committee refused and concluded “that in these days of composite photography it is worse than childish to claim a spiritual source for results which can be obtained at any time by any tyro in the art.”

The investigations into materialization with Pierre L. O. A. Keeler, into telekinesis phenomena with Dr. Rothermel, and into direct voice with Maud E. Lord were declared to have been negative.

In 1886 Fullerton visited to Germany to reexamine psychic researcher Johann C. F. Zöllner's experiments with Henry Slade. He interviewed William Wundt, philosopher of the University of Leipzig; Gustave Theodore Fechner, emeritus physicist at the University of Leipzig; W. Schneibner, mathematician of the University of Leipzig; and Wilhelm Weber, emeritus physicist at the University of Göttingen. With the exception of Weber, the learned professors declared that Zöllner's mental condition was not normal. The results of Fullerton's investigation in Europe appeared as an appendix to the Seybert Report.

The report of the Seybert Commission was received with indignation by Spiritualists. Thomas R. Hazard, the only Spiritualist on the committee, declared that he repeatedly protested against the committee's methods, but his protests were disregarded. In the Philadelphia North American, Hazard publicly argued for the removal of Fullerton, Thompson, and Koenig as prejudiced researchers. For, he continued, “. . . had the object in view been to belittle and bring into discredit, hatred and general contempt the cause . . . the Trustees could scarcely have selected more suitable instruments for the object intended from all the denizens of Philadelphia than are the gentlemen who constitute a majority of the Seybert Commission.”

This protest was considered and rejected. The report subsequently appeared, and A. B. Richmond, a Philadelphia lawyer, replied in two books. Frank Podemore observed, “Spiritualists contend, and not apparently without justification, that the intentions of Mr. Seybert were never fairly carried out, and that the prepossessions of the committee against the subject under investigation are demonstrated by their willingness to leave the inquiry unfinished and to divert the funds entrusted to them to an object which was regarded by the testator as at most of secondary importance.”

The negative results attained by the Seybert Commission, and its implicit condemnation of the movement for harboring fraudulent mediums, which has been substantiated by later research, did much to set the intellectual community in the United States against Spiritualism and marginalize it in the religious community.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Preliminary Report of the Commission Appointed by the University of Pennsylvania to Investigate Modern Spiritualism. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1887.

Richmond, A. B. What I Saw at Cassadaga Lake; A Review of the Seybert Commissioners' Report. N.p., 1888.

Shaddai

According to the mysticism of Kabbalah, this was one of ten divine names in the angelic hierarchy. The Zohar speaks of three supernal degrees or divine hypostases (that which stands under), the first being Kether. When the world of manifest things was in the condition of Tohu, God revealed himself in the hypostasis Shaddai; when it had proceeded to the condition called Bohu, he manifested as the hypostasis Tsabaoth, but when the darkness had disappeared from the face of things he appeared as Elohim.

Shah, (Sayed) Idries (1924–1996)

Author and translator of important works on occultism and Eastern mysticism. He was born on June 16, 1924, in Simla, India. He came from an Afghan family of Arabian origin that claims descent through the prophet Mohammed to the Sasanian emperors of Persia. He was educated privately, and became a British citizen. He became the proprietor of the International Press Agency in 1953, and from 1966 until his death he was the director of studies of the Institute for Cultural Research in London. He was also the literary and film director of Mulla Nasrudin Enterprises.

Shah wrote over 30 books and translated others, and through them he became a major force in the movement of Islamic, especially Sufic, thought into the West. He also had a broad knowledge of the occult and reportedly ghostwrote the early biography of Gerald B. Gardner, the founder of the neopagan revival in the 1940s.

He was awarded the Dictionary of International Biography Certificate of Merit for Distinguished Service to Human Thought, and in 1972 he was appointed Visiting Professor in Intercultural Studies at the University of Geneva, Switzerland. He was the Professor Honoris Causa, National University of La Plata, Argentina, from 1974 to his death on November 23, 1996, in London.

Sources:

Shah, Idries. The Exploits of the Incomparable Mulla Nasrudin. London: Cape, 1966. Reprint, New York: Simon & Schuster, 1967.

———. Learning How to Learn; Psychology and Spirituality in the Sufi Way. London: Octagon Press, 1978. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1981.

———. Oriental Magic. London; New York: Rider, 1956. Reprint, New York: Penguin Arkana, 1993.

———. Reflections. London: Zenith Books; Octagon Press, 1968. Reprint, Baltimore: Penguin Books, 1972.

———. The Secret Lore of Magic. New York: Citadel Press, 1957.

———. Special Problems in the Study of Sufi Ideas. London: London Society for Understanding Fundamental Ideas, 1966. Reprint, London: Octagon Press, 1974.

———. The Sufis. New York: Anchor Books, 1940. Reprint, London: Cape, 1969.

———. Tales of the Dervishes. London: Cape, 1967. Reprint, New York, Dutton, 1969.

———. Way of the Sufi. London: Cape, 1968. Reprint, New York: Dutton, 1969.

———. trans. The Subtleties of the inimitable Mulla Nasrudin. New York: Dutton; London: Cape, 1973.

Shakers

A spiritual community established in New Lebanon, New York, near the Massachusetts line, formally known as the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing. It had its origin in England in 1747, when Jane and James Wardley became the first leaders of a Lancashire revivalist sect. They were Quaker tailors influenced by the French prophets, an enthusiastic movement that had spread through southern France earlier in the century. Ann Lee, 22-year-old daughter of a Manchester blacksmith, joined this group of “shaking Quakers” in 1758 and through her strange visionary gifts became their leader. She was imprisoned in 1772 for disturbing the Sabbath and preaching a doctrine of celibacy, an idea stemming from her own experience of losing four children at or soon after their birth.

In 1774, after visions and inspired revelations, she moved to America with a handful of followers. By 1780 the Shaker colony had grown, attracting many settlers. Men and women lived together in celibacy with common ownership of property.

Between 1781 and 1783 Lee and her elders visited 36 towns in Massachusetts and Connecticut on a missionary campaign, but the Shakers were ridiculed. They had become especially unpopular for their pacifist ideas during the Revolution.

Lee died in 1784. The community eventually prospered, especially under Lee's successor, Joseph Meacham, and established an enviable reputation for hard work, excellent furniture making, and community spirit. The most characteristic behavior of the Shakers, from which their popular name derived, was an ecstatic dance. It seems clear that much of the very genuine joy and creativeness of the Shaker community arose from the intense energy of sexual sublimation.

Starting in 1837, the Watervliet community near Albany, New York, was visited by Spiritualist-type manifestations of shaking and jerking, and some Shakers were possessed by Indian spirits and spoke in tongues (see Xenoglossis). Some of them became Spiritualists.

The Shaker community grew throughout the nineteenth century. The Shakers were able to gather many converts on the frontier and found other members among the many orphans to whom they provided a home. They originally had functioned informally as an orphanage in many areas, but the creation of a system of government and church-sponsored orphanages had a significant impact on the movement's development. The eventual decline of Shakerism owed partly to materialistic influences from outside and partly to the inevitable dwindling of a community that outlawed sexual activity.

Sources:

Andrews, Edward Deming. The People Called Shakers: A Search for the Perfect Society. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953.

Desroche, Henri. The American Shakers. Amherst, Mass.: University of Massachusetts Press, 1971.

[Evans, Frederick W.]. Autobiography of a Shaker. Mount Lebanon, N.Y., 1869.

Evans, Frederick W. Shakers and Shakerism. New York, 1859.

Flinn, H. C. Spiritualism Among the Shakers. East Canterbury, N.H., 1899.

Garrett, Clarke. Spirit Possession and Popular Religion: From the Camisards to the Shakers. Baltimore, Md.: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1987.

Holloway, Emory. "Walt Whitman's Visit to the Shakers; With Whitman's Notebook Containing his Description and Observations of the Shaker Group at Mt. Lebanon." The Colophon 1 (spring 1930).

MacLean, John P. Bibliography of Shaker Literature. 1905. Reprint, Burt Franklin, 1971.

Taylor, Michael Brooks. "43'Try the Spirits': Shaker Responses to Supernaturalism." Journal of Religious Studies 7 (fall 1979): 30–38.

Shaman

The magician or "medicine man" of primitive tribes, with powers of healing, prophecy, or paranormal phenomena. The term is thought to derive from Tungus shaman and Sanskrit sramana (ascetic). As distinct from priests, shamans have no ritualistic knowledge, but operate rather as occult adepts. Their primary ability, at least in their Siberian setting, was the power of astral travel. The gift of shamanism is often a hereditary function, and its nature is communicated orally from one shaman to another.

Shamanism has been studied among the Eskimos and in Scandinavia, Tibet, China, Japan, Korea, Siberia, Manchuria, Mexico, Yutacan, Guatemala, and the North Pacific coast. A shamanistic performance often includes dancing, a mediumistic trance, and spirit possession. The role of the shaman (and shamaness) became the subject of a new movement in the West that began in the 1980s primarily through the work of Michael Harder and a number of popular teachers (many with Matove American backgrounds) who have developed a neo-Shamanism that draws on many themes emphasized in the New Age movement. Neo-Shamanist leaders have varied: some, such as Sun-Bear, have attempted to translate traditional Native American themes into useful practice for those outside of the Native American community. Other have developed new systems claiming Native American esoteric traditions as a base (Lynn Andrews) and still others have simply taken traditional occult teachings upon which they have placed a Native American overlay.

Sources:

Andrews, Lynn V. Star Woman. New York: Warner Books, 1986.

Eliade, Mircea. Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1964.

Harder, Michael. Way of the Shaman: A Guide to Power and Healing. New York: Bantam Books, 1982.

Sun Bear. Path of Power. Spokane, Wash.: Bear Tribe Publishing, 1983.

Shaman's Drum

Shaman's Drum: A Journal of Experiential Shamanism & Spiritual Healing is a newsstand magazine that has through the 1990s emerged as the major voice of neoshamanism, the new appropriation of shamanism by modern Westerners. Shamans are the major bearers of the spiritual wisdom of pre-modern, preliterate societies (once termed primitive) that underwent a significant reappraisal in the last half of the twentieth century. Anthropologists who had led in the study of such societies discovered a level of sophistication in the thought of pre-modern peoples and others found in their holistic worldviews a wisdom they believed had much to teach contemporary society. Not a small part of the attractiveness of pre-modern cultures was their use of various psychedelic substances as an integral element in their psychic and spiritual activity. The appropriation of wisdom came from around the world, but special attention was paid to the peoples of the Amazon, Tibetan cultures, and Native Americans.

Shaman's Drum emerged in the late 1980s to provide education, information, and networking in the growing neoshamanistic community. It is published quarterly by Cross-Cultural Shamanism Network, a small nonprofit corporation whose major program is the sustaining of the magazine. Shaman's Drum is a subsidized publication, with a minimum of advertising, all directly related to the subject matter.

The majority of the space in each issue of the magazine includes a set of feature articles on such topics as traditional shamanism, environmentalism, and contemporary spiritual healing. The magazine functions in the space between the scholarly study of shamanism and its popular appropriation. Shaman's Drum has given significant space to airing the controversy of non-Indians claiming status as teachers of Native American wisdom and the business of selling Native sacred artifacts for use in secular and other non-Native contexts. Each issue also contains a news column, a book review column, and a directory of individuals and organizations that offer resources for studying shamanism.

Shaman's Drum may be contacted at P.O. Box 97, Ashland, OR 97520.

Sources:

Shaman's Drum. Ashland, Ore., n.d.

Shamballah

Fabulous mystical city of ancient legend, believed to be the site of the Garden of Eden.

Shanti Nilaya

A healing and growth center founded in Escondido, California, in 1978. The name means "final home of peace" and the organization is concerned with the work of physician Elisabeth Kübler-Ross, author of the book On Death and Dying (New York, 1970). An extension of Kübler-Ross's earlier well-known "Life-Death and Transition" workshops, Shanti Nilaya offers short- and long-term therapeutic sessions connected with the experience of death and the question of life after death. The Shanti Nilaya Newsletter, giving news of the work of Kübler-Ross and Shanti Nilaya centers, is published from the center, now located in Virginia: General Delivery, Headwaters, VA 24442.

Sharp, William (1856–1905)

Scottish poet, biographer, and editor, who also achieved fame under the name of "Fiona Mac-Leod"—not so much a literary pseudonym as virtually a psychic secondary personality. Sharp was born in Paisley, Scotland, on September 12, 1856, and spent his childhood in the Scottish Highlands. He ran away from home three times, on one occasion spending a whole summer in a gypsy encampment. He studied for two years as a student at Glasgow University before becoming an attorney's clerk.

He suffered from ill health and his family sent him on a Pacific cruise. Afterward he settled in London as a bank clerk, eventually becoming acquainted with literary circles that included B. G. Rossetti and Walter Pater.

Pater encouraged his literary work, which first appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette. Then in 1885 Sharp became the art critic for the Glasgow Herald. In the same year he married his first cousin Elizabeth Amelia Sharp, who became companion and co-worker as well as wife. They worked jointly on the anthology Lyra Celtica (1896). Sharp abandoned banking for a journalistic career, becoming editor of The Pagan Review in 1892. He traveled throughout Europe and even visited the United States, where he met Walt Whitman.

Sharp's enthusiasm for the Celtic literary revival brought him into contact with William Butler Yeats and the Isis Urania Temple of the famous Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn magical society. Here he was initiated into the Neophyte grade. This occult connection may have been a stimulus to the development of his anima personality of "Fiona MacLeod." Sharp and "Fiona" remained distinctly different identities in literary style and outlook, even corresponding with friends as separate personalities for many years.

Sharp himself kept up a correspondence with Yeats and George W. Russell on occult and mystical experiments, while also writing to them on literary, poetical, and Celtic matters as "Fiona Mac-Leod."

The identical nature of the two personalities remained a closely guarded secret among Sharp, his wife, and one or two personal friends until after Sharp's death. The "Fiona" letters were in the handwriting of Sharp's sister, but their style and personality were those of a distinct individual. "Fiona's" letters, poems, and books were quite feminine in outlook, quite unlike the masculine lifestyle and writings of the bearded Sharp.

The "Fiona" works played a leading part in the Scottish Celtic literary revival and were the product of automatic writing by Sharp, who virtually acknowledged "Fiona" as a separate personality. She was said to be a distant cousin and even had a biography in the prestigious British biographical annual Who's Who.

Sharp died December 12, 1905, after catching a cold during a visit to a friend in Sicily. His widow died a few years later, leaving two large packets of materials "to be destroyed unexamined." It is believed that these may have contained Golden Dawn documents.

Sources:

- MacLeod, Fiona. The Divine Adventure. Portland, Maine: T. B. Mosher, 1903.
- . The Dominion of Dreams. New York: F. A. Stokes, 1900.
- . Green Fire. N.p., 1896.
- . The Immortal Hour. Portland, Maine: T. B. Mosher, 1907.
- . The Mountain Lovers. N.p., 1895.
- . Pharais. Chicago: Stone & Kimball, 1895.
- . The Sin-Eater. New York: Duffield, 1910.
- . The Washer of the Ford. New York: Stone & Kimball, 1896.
- . Winged Destiny. New York: Duffield, 1910.
- Sharp, William. Earth's Voices. N.p., 1884.
- . Flower o' the Vine. N.p., 1894.
- . Human Inheritance. N.p., 1882.
- . Life of D. G. Rossetts. N.p., 1882.

Shasta, Mount

Mount Shasta is an awe-inspiring volcanic cone in northern California. Long a sacred site for Native American tribes, it became a magnet for many occult speculations in the twentieth century. As early as 1899 Mount Shasta was an element in the Spiritualist world created in a channeled book, An Earth Dweller Returns, by Phyllos (the pseudonym of Frederick William Oliver), an early text discussing the lost Pacific continent of Lemuria. After the publication of this book, California and Mount Shasta began to be seen as a remnant of Lemuria. The Lemurian hypothesis was developed by H. Spencer Lewis, who, under the penname Wishar Spenie Cerve, wrote a text for the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis, Lemuria, the Lost Continent of the Pacific (1931).

Two years before the publication of Lewis's work, Guy W. Ballard, walking the slopes of Mount Shasta, had an encounter with a mysterious person whom he later identified as Saint Germain, an ascended master of the Great White Brotherhood (the spiritual hierarchy believed by many occultists to be guiding the destiny of humankind). Out of this encounter, Ballard later led in the founding of the I Am Movement. The story of his encounter appears in Ballard's 1934 book Unveiled Mysteries, published under the penname Godfre Ray King. In recent years, the "I Am" has presented an annual pageant centered upon their unique interpretation of the life of Jesus.

Over the years since the Rosicrucian and "I Am" publications on Mount Shasta, numerous authors have described mystical experiences associated with the mountain and offered their speculations about its significance. The resort community of Mount Shasta, California, became a unique gathering place for metaphysical people, a trend further spurred by the beginning of the flying saucer era.

Sources:

- Andrews, Richard. The Truth behind the Legends of Mount Shasta. New York: Carlton Press, 1976.
- Cerve, W. S. [H. Spencer Lewis]. Lemuria, the Lost Continent of the Pacific. San Jose, Calif.: Supreme Lodge of the AMORC, 1931.
- Chaney, Earlyne. Secrets from Mount Shasta. Anaheim, Calif.: Stockton Trade Press, 1953.
- King, Godfre Ray [Guy W. Ballard]. Unveiled Mysteries. Chicago: Saint Germain Press, 1934.
- Walton, Bruce. Mount Shasta, Home of the Ancients. Mokelumna Hill, Calif.: Health Research, 1985.

Shaver, Richard S(harpe) (1907–1975)

Pennsylvania welder and author born on October 8, 1907, responsible for the series of revelations known as the "Shaver Mystery," originally published by Raymond A. Palmer in Amazing Stories from 1945 to 1949. Drawing upon "racial memories," Shaver described a race of "deros" or vicious dwarfs living in underground caverns, indulging in sexual orgies and harassing human beings by means of secret rays and telepathy.

Shaver's somewhat crude original manuscript, titled A Warning to Future Man, was extensively worked over by Palmer and emerged in the March 1945 issue of Amazing Stories as "I Remember Lemuria." At first the series boosted the magazine's circulation to a record 185,000. Many earnest readers described their own knowledge of secret influences from deros who were also apparently responsible for the disaster of Pearl Harbor. More traditional science fiction readers were indignant at such stories being presented as factual, and after thousands of protests, Howard Browne, who took over from Palmer, ended the series. Browne described the Shaver material as "the sickest crap I'd run into."

However, Palmer kept the the Shaver legend alive and revived it from time to time in Search and Flying Saucers magazines and The Hidden World, a series of periodicals in trade paperback format. For a while there was also a fanzine, the Shaver Mystery Magazine, and I Remember Lemuria and The Return of Sathanas were reissued in book format in 1948.

Shaver died on November 5, 1975.

Sources:

- Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Shavick, Nancy (1957–)

Nancy Shavick, a contemporary author and tarot counselor, was born in Englewood, New Jersey, in 1957. Following high school graduation she entered Hampshire College (Massachusetts), from which she graduated in 1979 with a degree in creative writing. Through the 1980s she taught creative writing, worked as an editor, and became an accomplished student of the tarot cards. In 1984 she founded Prima Materia Books, a publishing house, through which she published her first book, The Tarot: A Guide to Reading Your Own Cards. In the process of mastering the tarot, she became a gifted reader with a growing clientele. In 1991 she closed Prima Materia and moved to San Francisco.

Shavick felt that the tarot should be demystified and was most useful as a tool for self-transformation and personal development. These themes dominated the four best-selling books she wrote for Berkley Books between 1988 and 1993: The Tarot (1988), The Tarot Reader (1991), Traveling the Royal Road: Mastering the Tarot (1992), and The Tarot Guide to Love and Relationships (1993). Along the way she also acquired a working knowledge of astrology and in 1994 authored her first volume on it, Reach for the Stars. Her most recent work, Nancy Shavick's Tarot Universe (2000), is a comprehensive text summarizing her previous five books.

Sources:

- Shavick, Nancy. Nancy Shavick's Tarot Universe. Santa Monica, Calif.: Santa Monica Press, 2000.
- . The Tarot. New York: Berkley Books, 1988.
- . The Tarot Guide to Love and Relationships. New York: Berkley Books, 1993.
- . The Tarot Reader. New York: Berkley Books, 1991.
- . Traveling the Royal Road: Mastering the Tarot. New York: Berkley Books, 1992.

Sheargold, Richard K(empell) (1911–1988)

British parapsychologist. He was born on December 20, 1911, at Caterham, Surrey, England. He was departmental manager at McMichael Radio, Slough, England. He joined the Society for Psychical Research and took a special interest in scientific experiments relating to the question of human survival. In 1963 he became the first chairman of the Survival Joint Research Committee Trust.

Under the sponsorship of the SPR, he completed a series of card-guessing tests with mediums as percipients, in order to investigate the possibility of a relationship between telepathic faculty and the ESP demonstrated by mental mediums. These experiments were reported in the Journal of the SPR (June 1961). From 1971 on, Sheargold experimented with the electronic voice phenomenon, also known as Raudive Voices, that had just been publicized in the West by Friedrich Jürgenson and Konstantin Raudive. In September 1973, he gave a talk on "Experiments on the Jürgenson Voice Phenomena" at a symposium organized by The Institute of Parascience. He died January 25, 1988.

Sources:

- Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.
- Ellis, David J. The Mediumship of the Tape Recorder. Pulborough: The Author, 1978.
- Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.
- Sheargold, Richard K. "The Ghost of Twenty-Nine Megacycles." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 53 (1986).
- . Hints on Receiving the Voice Phenomenon. N.p., 1973.
- . "The Occultism of Occultism." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 45 (1970).

Sheep-Goat Hypothesis

A concept in parapsychology relating to the effect of belief and attitude to success in ESP scoring. The term derives from the pioneer researches of parapsychologist Gertrude R. Schmeidler in 1958. She conducted experiments in which her subjects were divided into two groups—"sheep" and "goats." The sheep had belief in the possibility of psi, while the goats rejected the possibility.

It was observed that, in individual and group tests, the sheep scored higher in ESP trials than the goats, suggesting that belief strongly influenced successful ESP. The differences in scoring were relatively small, although statistically significant. Many later experiments have been conducted by other parapsychologists to test the hypothesis, and the term "sheep-goat" has now become commonplace in parapsychological discussions.

Sources:

- McConnell, R. A., and Gertrude Schmeidler. ESP and Personality Patterns. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1958.

She-Goat

One of the branches of divination in ancient Rome dealt especially with the signs that might be derived from animals, and it was believed that if a she-goat crossed the path of a man who was stepping out of his house, it was a good omen.

Sheldrake, Rupert (1942–)

British biochemist with specialized experience in plant research who has proposed a bold new theory of formative causation, concerned with the origin and growth of form and characteristics in nature. While not denying the inheritance of characteristics through the gene complex, he has suggested a literal view of what has been termed for convenience "morphogenetic fields" as actual structures independent of time and space. Although Sheldrake's field theory applies primarily to organisms, plants, and animals, it also has important relevance to concepts of parapsychological phenomena, such as telepathy, clairvoyance and reincarnation.

Robert Sheldrake was born June 28, 1942, in Newark Notts, England. He was educated at Clare College, Cambridge University, England, becoming a fellow and director of studies in biochemistry and cell biology. In 1973, he was awarded a Rosenheim Research Fellowship of the Royal Society. Instead of taking a professorship at a university, he decided to study growing plants first hand, and he became a member of the staff of the International Crops Research Institute for the Semi-Arid Tropics in Hyderabad, India. He became a consultant to the institute in 1978.

In 1966, Sheldrake was associated with the Epiphany Philosophers, a group of scientists and philosophers at Cambridge University concerned with exploring interconnections between science, philosophy, and mysticism. This contact stimulated his early ideas on formative causation. Other influences were the theories of Henri Bergson and Hans Driesch.

Sources:

- Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.
- Sheldrake, Rupert. A New Science of Life: The Hypothesis of Formative Causation. London: Blond & Briggs; Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1981.
- . The Presence of the Past. New York: New York Times Books, 1988.
- . The Rebirth of Nature: The Greening of Science and God. New York: Bantam, 1990.

———. Seven Experiments That Could Change the World: A Do-It-Yourself Guide to Revolutionary Science. n.p.: Riverhead Books, 1995.

Sheldrake, Rupert and Matthew Fox. Natural Grace. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1996.

Shelta Thari

An esoteric language spoken by the tinkers (a Gypsy-type people) of Britain and Ireland and possibly a descendant of an “inner” language employed by the ancient Celtic Druids or bards. It was in 1876 that the first hint of the existence of Shelta Thari reached the ears of Charles Godfrey Leland. It seems strange that George Borrow, the first authority on Romany and Gypsy lore, had never stumbled upon the language, and that fact may be taken as evidence of the jealousy with which the nomadic classes guarded it.

Leland related how he and E. H. Palmer were wandering on the beach at Aberystwyth in Wales when they met a wanderer who heard them conversing in Romany. Leland questioned the man as to how he made a living, and he replied, “Shelkin gallo-pas.” The words were foreign even to Leland, and he asked what they meant. “Why,” said the man, “it means selling ferns. That is tinker’s language or minklers’ thari. I thought as you knew Romany, you might understand it. The right name for the tinkers’ language is Shelta.”

“It was,” said Leland, “with the feelings of Columbus the night before he discovered America that I heard the word Shelta, and I asked the fern-dealer if he could talk it.” The man replied “A little,” and on the spot the philologist collected a number of words and phrases from the fern-seller that gave him sufficient insight into the language to prove that it was absolutely different from Romany.

The Celtic origin of the dialect soon began to suggest itself to Leland, and he attempted to obtain from the man some verse or jingle in it, for the purpose of observing its syntactical arrangement. But all he was able to learn from his informant were some rhymes of no philological value, and he found he had soon exhausted the fern-seller’s knowledge.

It was later on in the United States that Leland terrified a tinker by speaking to him in the lost dialect. The man, questioned as to whether he could speak Shelta, admitted that he could. He proved to be an Irishman, Owen Macdonald by name, and he furnished Leland with an invaluable list of several hundred words. But Leland could not be sure upon which of the Celtic languages the dialect was based. Owen Macdonald declared to him that it was a fourth language that had nothing in common with old Irish, Welsh, or Gaelic and hazarded the information that it was the idiom of the “Ould Picts,” inhabitants of Scotland, but this did not convince the philologist.

Shelta is not a jargon, for it can be spoken grammatically without using English, as in the British form of Romany. Pictish in all probability was not a Celtic language, nor even an Aryan one, however intimately it may have been affected by Celtic speech in the later stages of its existence.

Leland’s discovery was greeted in some quarters with laughter. The Saturday Review jocosely suggested that he had been conned and that old Irish had been palmed off on him for a mysterious lingo. Leland put this view of the matter before his tinker friend, who replied with grave solemnity, “And what’d I be after makin’ two languages av thim for, if there was but wan av thim?”

Since Leland’s time, much has been done to reclaim this mysterious tongue, chiefly through the investigations of John Sampson and professor Kuno Meyer. The basis of these investigations rested on the fact that the tinker caste of Great Britain and Ireland was a separate class—so separate indeed as almost to form a “race” by itself. For hundreds of years, possibly, this caste existed with nearly all its ancient characteristics, and on the general disuse of Celtic speech had conserved its language as a secret dialect.

The peculiar thing concerning Shelta is the extent of territory over which it is spoken. That it was known rather extensively in London itself was discovered by Leland, who heard it spoken by two small boys in the Euston Road. They were not Gypsies, but Leland found out that one of them spoke the language with great fluency. Since Leland’s discoveries Shelta has been to some extent mapped out into dialects, one of the most important of which is Ulster. The Ulster dialect of this strange and ancient tongue differed from that in use in other parts of Britain and Ireland.

John Sampson, the successor to Borrow and Leland, and a linguist of repute, published in the Journal of the Gypsy Lore Society (new series, vol. 1, 1908), a number of sayings and proverbs that he had collected in Liverpool from two old Irish tinkers—John Barlow and Phil Murray. Sampson stated that these were in the Ulster dialect of Shelta.

Some of these may be quoted to provide the reader with specimens of the language: “Krish gyukera have muni Shel-dru” (Old beggars have good Shelta). “Stimera dhi-ilsha, stimera aga dhi-ilsha” (If you’re a piper, have your own pipe). “Mislo granhes thaber” (The traveler knows the road). “Thom Blorne mjesh Nip gloch” (Every Protestant isn’t an Orangeman). “Nus a dhajon dhuilsha” (The blessing of God on you). “Misli, gami gra dhi-il” (Be off, and bad luck to you).

There seems to be considerable reason to believe that the tinker (or more properly “tinkler”) class of Britain and Ireland sprang from the remnants of its ancient Celtic inhabitants and differed as completely from the Gypsy or Romany as one people can well differ from another. This is strongly suggested by the criterion of speech, for it is now generally believed that Shelta is a Celtic tongue and that Romany is a dialect of Northern Hindustan. Those who now speak Romany habitually almost invariably make use of Shelta as well, but that only proves that the two nomadic groups, having occupied the same territory for hundreds of years, gained a knowledge of each other’s languages. Who, then, were the original progenitors of the tinkers? Whoever they were, they were a Celtic-speaking people and probably a nomadic one. Shelta has been referred to as the language of the ancient bards of Ireland and the esoteric tongue of an Irish priesthood.

Leland put forward the hypothesis that the Shelta-speaking tinker is a descendant of a prehistoric guild of bronze-workers. This, he thought, accounted in part for the secretiveness as regards this language. In Italy, to this very day, the tinker class is identified with the itinerant bronze workers. The tinker fraternity of Britain and Ireland existed with perhaps nearly all its ancient characteristics until the advent of railroads. But long before this, it had probably amalgamated to a great extent with the Gypsy population, and the two languages had become common to the two peoples.

It seems to be highly probable that Shelta originated in Ireland, for in no other part of these islands during the later Celtic period was technology sufficiently advanced to permit of the existence of a close corporation of metalworkers possessing a secret language. Moreover, the affinities of Shelta appear to be with old Irish more than with any other Celtic dialect. One other theory that presents itself in connection with the origin of Shelta that it is the modern descendant of the language of the “Ould Picts” mentioned by Owen Macdonald, Leland’s tinker friend. But there are great difficulties in accepting the hypothesis of the Pictish origin of Shelta, the chief among them being its obvious Irish origin. There were, it is known, Picts in the north of Ireland, but they were almost certainly a small and primitive colony and a very unlikely community to form a metalworking fraternity that possessed the luxury of a private dialect.

It still remains for the Celtic student to classify Shelta in a definitive way. It may prove to be “Pictish,” strongly influenced by the Gaelic of Ireland and Scotland. A comparison with Basque and the dialect of the Iberian tribes of Morocco might bring affinities to light and thus establish the theory of its non-Aryan origin, but its strong kinship with Gaelic seems likely.

Sources:

Leland, Charles Godfrey. The Gypsies. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1882.

MacRithie, David. Shelta: The Cairds' Language. Transactions of Gaelic Society of Inverness 24 (1904).

Shemhamphorash

In the Talmud, the external term representing the hidden word of power, by whose virtues a new world might be. This word is lost to the human race, although even sounds approximating it have a magic power and can give to whomever pronounces them dominion in the spirit world.

Some of the old rabbis believed that the word of power contains 12 letters, others, 42, and yet others 72, but these are the letters of the divine alphabet, which God created from certain luminous points made by the concentration of the primal universal light. Shemhamphorash is, in fact, the name of this word.

In the Kabala, the Shemhamphorash, or 72 syllabled name of God, is related to three verses of the Hebrew Bible, Exodus 14, 119–21. Each of these verses, in Hebrew, contains 72 letters. If one writes the 72 letters or verse 19 in correct order, and under them write the letters of verse 20 in a similar manner in reverse order, and then the letters in verse 21 in correct order below the first two, one creates 72 three-letter names. By adding either AL or IH to these names the names of the 72 angels of Jacob's ladder were created.

This ancient Jewish mystical concept is somewhat paralleled by the ancient Hindu teachings of the creation of the world through the mystical trisyllable "AUM," said to contain the origin of the alphabet and all sounds. related to such concepts are the use of certain letters and sounds known as mantras for magical purposes. (See also Nada; Yoga)

Sources:

Poncé, Charles. Kablah: An Introduction and Illumination for the World Today. San Francisco: Straight Arrow Books, 1973.

Shepard, Jesse Francis Grierson (1848–1927)

Mystic, seer, author, and musical medium who performed before famous musicians and royal personages. His musical séances were held both in light and darkness. In darkness his renderings were marvelous. He did not always actually play the piano: the music sometimes came through the shut keyboard. He rendered duets and sang simultaneously in bass and soprano. He also played the organ and sang in cathedrals. He could give trance addresses in English, French, German, Latin, Greek, Chaldean, and Arabic on any subject.

His full name was Benjamin Henry Jesse Francis Grierson Shepard. He was born on September 18, 1848 and was of Scottish-Irish descent but moved to the United States with his family in his first year. He spent his boyhood on the Illinois prairie. At the age of 13 he became a pageboy to General John C. Frémont and made the acquaintance of both Generals Grant and Sherman.

When in his twenty-first year, he set out for Paris without any funds. Within a short time he became one of the most famous mediums in Europe, demonstrating psychometry, clairvoyance, prediction, and diagnosis of disease. He also displayed uncanny musical gifts. Without extensive formal training in music, he gave performances at the piano and claimed to be possessed by the spirits of Mozart, Beethoven, Meyerbeer, Rossini, Sontag, Persiani, Malibran, Lablache, Liszt, Berlioz, and Chopin. He performed to the rich, the famous, and the royal in Europe. The audience at one concert in Holland in 1894 included the duchess of Cumberland, the queen of Hanover, the reigning duke of Saxe-Altenburg, and the queen of Denmark.

In addition to his piano performances, Shepard sometimes sang, in every range of voice from bass to soprano. Henry Kiddle, superintendent of schools in New York, was imprudent enough to state that he heard Shepard playing a splendid piano symphony under the control of Mozart, while at the same time delivering a learned philosophical discourse under the influence of Aristotle. Kiddle was forced to resign his position.

In Catherine Berry's Experiences in Spiritualism (1876), historical fragments relating to Assyrian queen Semiramis were published as recorded after Shepard's trance statements under the control of an Egyptian spirit. In 1889 he published two volumes of which Maurice Maeterlinck declared that he knew nothing in literature more admirable or profound.

Prince Adam Wisniewski wrote in an account quoted by Light in 1894:

"After having secured the most complete obscurity we placed ourselves in a circle around the medium, seated before the piano. Hardly were the first chords struck when we saw lights appearing at every corner of the room . . . The first piece played through Shepard was a fantasia of Thalberg's on the air from "Semiramide." This is unpublished, as is all the music which is played by the spirits through Shepard. The second was a rhapsody for four hands, played by Liszt and Thalberg with astounding fire, a sonority truly grand, and a masterly interpretation. Notwithstanding this extra ordinarily complex technique, the harmony was admirable, and such as no one present had ever know paralleled, even by Liszt himself, whom I personally knew, and in whom passion and delicacy were united. In the circle were musicians who, like me, had heard the greatest pianists of Europe; but we can say that we never heard such truly supernatural execution."

Shepard was also occasionally a direct voice medium. During a séance at The Hague, Holland, in 1907, direct voices were heard speaking in Dutch. High officials of the Dutch government who were present also heard voices speaking in Sundanese and Mandarin Chinese.

In 1907, after his fabulous success in Europe and return visits to America, Shepard broke with his psychic connections and mediumship and settled in London, where he ceased his musical exhibitions and devoted himself to writing. He changed his name to Francis Grierson and made a reputation through his essays in both English and French. At the age of fifty, he published his book Modern Mysticism and Other Essays (1899), followed by The Celtic Temperament and Other Essays (1901). The latter work was adopted as a textbook by Japanese universities. Other publications included The Valley of Shadows: Recollections of the Lincoln Country, 1858–63 (1909), Portraits (1910), La Vie and Les Hommes (1911), The Humour of the Underman (1911), The Invisible Alliance (1913), Illusions and Realities of the War (1918), and Abraham Lincoln: The Practical Mystic (1918).

The quality of his literary work secured him a place in the prestigious Kunitz and Haycraft Twentieth Century Authors (1942). Many of Shepard's readers were unaware of his earlier psychic activities until he published a Spiritualist pamphlet, Psycho-Phone Messages, in 1921.

In spite of Shepard's mystical and artistic talents or perhaps because of his dedication to mystic insight rather than material things, he died in utter poverty. As an old man of 78, he died from hunger May 29, 1927, while a case worker from the Los Angeles Assistance League was knocking on his door. She was unaware of his glittering past as a musician or his fame as a writer. He had earlier pawned his last valuable—a watch given to him by the king of England.

Sources:

Endore, Guy. King of Paris. New York: Pocket Books, 1958.

Grierson, Francis [Jesse Shepard]. Abraham Lincoln: The Practical Mystic. New York: John Lane, 1918.

———. The Celtic Temperament and Other Essays. London: John Lane, 1913.

———. Modern Mysticism and Other Essays. London: G. Allen, 1899.

Shepard, Jess F. G. "How I Became a Musical Medium." Medium (May 6, 1970).

Tonner, W. "The Genius of Francis Grierison." Trend (March 1914).

Sherman, Harold (Morrow) (1898–1987)

Author, broadcaster, and lecturer in the field of parapsychology. Born July 13, 1898 in Traverse City, Michigan, he was educated at Traverse City High School and the University of Michigan. In 1920 he married Martha Frances Bain. Memberships include Authors League of America and the Dramatists Guild. After working as a freelance writer, he was employed at CBS-Radio in New York from 1935–36. He was founder and president of E.S.P. Research Associates Foundation, Little Rock, Arkansas from 1964 onward.

He conducted experiments in clairvoyance, telepathy, psychokinesis, precognition, mediumship, and survival; he lectured on ESP. With psychologist Leslie LeCron and scientists affiliated with the University of California, L.A., he investigated the question and the method of operation of ESP faculty. Sherman contributed articles to Mind Digest, Journal of Living, Success Unlimited, and Tomorrow.

By the age of twenty-two, Sherman authored approximately sixty books on such subjects as sports, adventure, and short stories, as well as books on extrasensory perception and mental power. He was also interested in the theater and produced plays and a Hollywood movie "The Adventures of Mark Twain." His book Your Key to Happiness (1935) was presented on radio and he conducted a radio series on philosophy three times a week under the title "The Man Who Helped You to Help Yourself."

Sherman died August 19, 1987, at Mountain View, Arkansas. One of his final messages to his many friends was, "I expect it will be a great moment when I greet you in the next dimension."

Sources:

Sherman, Harold. Adventures in Thinking. Master Publications, 1956.

———. How to Foresee and Control Your Future. New York: Information, Inc., 1970.

———. How to Know What to Believe. New York: Fawcett, 1976.

———. How to Make ESP Work for You. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1964.

———. How to Picture What You Want. New York: Fawcett, 1978.

———. How to Turn Failure into Success. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1958.

———. How to Use the Power of Prayer. Unity Village, Mo.: Unity Books, 1985.

———. Know Your Own Mind. New York: G. & R. Anthony, 1953.

———. TNT—The Power Within You. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1959.

———. Wonder Healers of the Philippines. Los Angeles: DeVoss, 1967.

———. You Can Communicate with the Unseen World. New York: Fawcett, 1974.

———. You Live After Death. New York: Creative Age Press, 1949.

———. Your Key to Happiness. 1935. Reprint, New Canaan, Conn.: Mulvey Books, 1990.

———. Your Power to Heal. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Shermer, Michael (1954–)

Michael Shermer, cofounder of the Skeptics Society, one of the major organizations debunking what it considers pseudoscientific claims, especially of a psychic or occult nature, was born on September 8, 1954, in Glendale, California. He attended Pepperdine University, where he majored in psychology. He later received an M.A. in experimental psychology from California State University–Fullerton and a Ph.D. in the history of science from the Claremont Graduate School (1991).

During the 1980s Shermer launched a ten-year career as a professional cyclist, the high point of which was his participation in a 30,000-mile transcontinental Race Across America. His racing activity, which led to his first media appearances on various sports broadcasts, led to his first books, including Sport Cycling (1985), Cycling for Endurance and Speed (1987), The Woman Cyclist (with Elaine Mariolle, 1989), and Race Across America: The Agonies and Glories of the World's Toughest Bicycle Race (1994).

Shermer's racing career coincided with a growing interest in the movement started by the Committee for the Scientific Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP), based in Buffalo, New York. Though he was a member, he also felt that more could be done, and in January of 1992, with Pat Linse and Kim Ziel Shermer, he founded the Skeptics Society, with its base in the Greater Los Angeles area. Several months later the first issue of Skeptic, a new periodical, joined the newsstand shelves next to CSICOP's Skeptical Inquirer. Shermer envisioned the Skeptics Society as treating traditional pseudoscience issues concerning psychic and occult claims, but also was concerned with other boundary issues in science where no such paranormal element was present (cold fusion, cryonics, nanotechnology, etc.) as well as controversial issues in social science and history, such as Holocaust denial.

Shermer has supplied much of the energy that has seen the Skeptics Society, which he directs, grow into a significant organization challenging occult claims, and the Skeptic magazine, which he edits, gain national circulation. He has authored several related books, including Why People Believe Weird Things (1997), How We Believe: The Search for God in an Age of Science (2000), and Denying History (2000). He created the Skeptics Lecture Series at the California Institute of Technology and is an adjunct professor at Occidental College in Los Angeles. Shermer also put the media attention he gained in his cycling era to good use and has been a popular guest on talk shows. Most recently he has hosted a weekly radio show, "Science Talk," on the NPR affiliate in Southern California and a national television show on the Fox Family Channel.

Sources:

Shermer, Michael. Denying History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

———. How We Believe: The Search for God in an Age of Science. New York: W. H. Freeman and Co., 2000.

———. Why People Believe Weird Things. New York: W. H. Freeman and Co., 1997.

Sherwood, Carlton M(ontgomery) (1895–1970)

Financial counselor also active in the field of parapsychology. He was born on April 12, 1895, in Buffalo, New York. After serving in the Army during World War I, he worked for various agencies, mostly Christian organizations, through the next two decades. They included the New York State Christian Endeavor Union (1919–27), the Citizens Committee of 100 (1926–36), and the International Society of Christian Endeavor (1926–34). He edited Christian Endeavour World (1930–34). After two years as the executive director of Associated Boards for Christian Colleges in China (1934–36) he began a long tenure as president of Pierce, Hedrick & Sherwood, counselors in institutional financing.

Over the years he became interested in psychical research. He joined and served on the boards of both the Parapsychology Foundation and the American Society for Psychical Research. He was also a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and chaired the Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics, New York, November 1958. He died on September 14, 1970.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Shiatsu (or Shiatzu)

A Japanese term from the root words shi (fingers) and atsu (pressure). Shiatsu is an applied system of massage which, like acupuncture, seeks to release and facilitate the flow of vital life energy, known as Qi (chi in Chinese, ki in Japanese), within the body. Shiatsu incorporates a number of massage techniques, such as pressing, sweeping, rotating, and patting. More than techniques, however, shiatsu has been described as a dance of two, a touch communication between practitioner and client, grounded in the traditional Chinese medicine concept of balance.

In the 10th century, a contingent of Japanese monks reportedly traveled to China to study Buddhism. While there, they observed the tenets of traditional Chinese medicine. They learned of the Qi (analogous to kundalini in Hindu tradition), the balancing life concepts of yin and yang, plus the body's energy pathways called meridians. They also gleaned the connections between the meridians, the five basic elements (earth, metal, water, fire, and wood) and corresponding organs of the body. The monks combined this acquired knowledge with the ancient medicinal practices of Japanese massage, which over time has become known as Shiatsu.

Shiatsu was introduced to the United States by individuals such as Wataruu Ohashi, founder of Ohashiatsu. Ohashi was a protégé of Japanese psychologist and Zen student Shizuto Masunaga. Instrumental in the repeal of governmental restrictions on massage, Masunaga reincorporated psychological and spiritual dimensions to shiatsu. Another instrumental pioneer of shiatsu was Tokujiro Namikoshi. Working as a masseur, he developed a chart comparable to the acupuncture chart, showing where the appropriate pressure could be applied to relieve pain in specific parts of the body, as well as affect underlying conditions.

In the United States a variation on shiatsu, jin shin jyutsu, has been developed by Jiro Murai. Also closely related are the Chinese system of do-in and reflexology.

Sources:

The Burton Goldberg Group Alternative Medicine: The Definitive Guide. Tiburon, Calif.: Future Medicine Publishing, Inc., 1997.

Chung, Hazel. "Shiatsu: Therapeutic Art of Japan." <http://www.doubleclickd.com/shiatsu.html>. March 31, 2000.

Namikoshi, Tokujiro. Shiatsu. Tokyo: Japan Publications, 1969.

Ohashi, Wataru. Do It Yourself Shiatsu. New York: ASI Publishing, 1976.

Tappan, Frances M. Healing Massage Techniques: A Study of Eastern and Western Methods. Reston, Va.: Reston Publishing Co., Inc., 1980.

Shiatsu: Japanese Massage. http://www.rianvisser.nl/shiatsu_e_index.htm. March 31, 2000.

Shiels, Tony ("Doc")

Well-known contemporary magician who presents conjuring and mentalism in a setting of "psychic power." In his publicity to fellow stage magicians, Shiels gives instructions on how "to bend metal in the Geller style . . . to teleport and levitate . . . to become a successful witch . . . to raise ghosts and poltergeists, etc." However, Shiels also acknowledges the reality of PK and ESP as well as the effects produced by conjuring and mentalism.

Shiels claims to have taken several photographs of the Loch Ness monster but most researchers have dismissed them as a hoax attempt. He has also been accused as the hoaxter behind some photos of fairies and Morgawr the Cornish sea serpent.

Sources:

Chorvinsky, Mark. "The Mary F. Morgawr Photographs Investigation." Strange Magazine 8 (Fall 1991): 8–9, 11, 46–48.

———. "The Shiels-Related Fairy Photos." Strange Magazine 9 (spring/summer 1992): 24–25, 60.

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Shiels, Tony. Entertaining With "ESP." UK: David & Charles, 1974.

Ship of the Dead

Similar to the idea of the death-coach is the belief that at times a phantom ship carries away the souls of men. In the form of a cloud-ship, or wrapped in a driving mist, it sails over mountains and moors, and at sea it sails without hindrance.

A story is told of a certain pirate, at whose death a spectral ship approached in a cloud. As it sailed over the roof, the house was filled with a sound as of a stormy sea, and when the ship had passed by, the soul of the pirate accompanied it. (See also Flying Dutchman)

Shipton, Mother

Legendary British prophetess, supposed to have been born in the reign of King Henry VII and to have predicted the deaths of Cardinal Wolsey and Lord Percy, as well as other events. Her prophecies had a clarity quite unlike the cryptic verses of Nostradamus. Shipton was also credited with even more remarkable prescience in the following rhymed couplets:

"Carriages without horses shall go,
And accidents fill the world with woe.
Around the world thoughts shall fly
In the twinkling of an eye.
The world upside down shall be
And gold be found at the root of a tree.
Through hills man shall ride,
And no horse be at his side.
Under water men shall walk,
Shall ride, shall sleep, shall talk.
In the air men shall be seen,
In white, in black, in green;
Iron in the water shall float,
As easily as a wooden boat.
Gold shall be found and shown
In a land that's now not known.
Fire and water shall wonders do,
England shall at last admit a foe.
The world to an end shall come,
In eighteen hundred and eighty one.

These alleged prophecies occurred in a chapbook pamphlet published in 1862 by the bookseller Charles Hindley, who claimed that they were reprinted from an earlier chapbook by Richard Head titled The Life and Death of Mother Shipton, first published in 1684.

The final couplet about the end of the world caused a great deal of panic in country districts of Britain during 1881, with people leaving their houses and spending the night in the open fields or praying in churches and chapels.

Meanwhile Hindley had already confessed that these lines were a fabrication in 1873, but by then they had passed into folk tradition, and ordinary country folk did not read learned antiquarian journals. Even in modern times, these spurious prophecies of Hindley, which seem to predict automobiles, steamships, submarines, the telegraph, radio, and aircraft, are still often quoted as Shipton's. (For details of Charles Hindley's confession of having invented Shipton prophecies, see Notes and Queries, 4th series, vol. 9.)

Richard Head's chapbook of 1684 contains an undoubtedly imaginary account of the birth of Shipton from a union between her mother Agatha and the Devil in Yorkshire, England. That account appears to be an embellished version of an earlier pamphlet of 1641 titled The Prophesie of Mother Shipton, In the Raigne of King Henry the Eighth. Fortelling the death of Cardinall Wolsey, the Lord Percy and others, as also what should happen in ensuing times.

Four years later, the famous astrologer William Lilly published A Collection of Ancient and Moderne Prophecies that included what he called "Shipton's Prophecy, after the most exact Copy." This gave 20 prophecies attributed to Shipton, most of which were said to have been fulfilled.

There is no validation that these prophecies were actually made or that Shipton was even a real person, but she rapidly became a folk heroine and even the subject of stage comedies. In The Life of Mother Shipton: A New Comedy (1660), the heroine and prophetess is named Agatha Shipton, daughter of Solomon Shipton. In a later work titled Mother Shipton and Nixon's Prophecies (1797), she is stated to have been born in July 1488 and to have been baptized Ursula Sonthiel. This account added: "Her stature was larger than common, her body crooked, her face frightful; but her understanding extraordinary."

Early chapbook portraits of Shipton represent her as an ugly woman with the characteristic hooked nose, chin, and humped back associated with Punch in the traditional Punch and Judy puppet show. Shipton is probably wholly legendary, and many prophecies attributed to her are spurious inventions.

Sources:

Harrison, William H. Mother Shipton Investigated. Reprint, London: The Author, 1881.

Hindley, Charles. Curiosities of Street Literature. 1871. London: The Broadsheet King, 1966.

Shirley, Ralph (1865–1946)

Leading British pioneer in the publication of occult and mystical literature. Ralph Shirley was born at Oxford, England, December 30, 1865, of aristocratic stock, brother of the eleventh Earl Ferrers and a direct descendant of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex. He was educated at Winchester and New College, Oxford University.

For more than three decades (1892–1925) he was director of William Rider & Son, the foremost British publishers of literature dealing with occultism, mysticism, New Thought, astrology, psychical research, and related subjects. Rider's authors included Éliphas Lévi, Arthur Edward Waite, Hereward Carrington, and Franz Hartmann in addition to many others who became legendary in the field.

In 1905, Shirley founded the Occult Review, which he edited for 21 years. It included contributions from the leading occultists of the time and set a high standard of both popular and scholarly occultism. Shirley also became vice president of the International Institute for Psychic Investigation, for whom he edited Ernesto Bozzano's important study Discarnate Influence in Human Life (1938).

It was in the pages of the Occult Review that Shirley published the important firsthand experiences of Oliver Fox (pseudonym of Hugh G. Callaway) on astral projection and out-of-the-body travel from April to May 1920. Shirley also published other pioneer writings on the subject, including his own book The Mystery of the Human Double: The Case for Astral Projection (1938; reprinted University Books, 1965).

Shirley had a special interest in astrology and had edited The Horoscope (under the pseudonym Rollo Ireton). From 1943 to 1944 he was chairman of the Spiritualist journal Light, but suffered from failing health and was obliged to retire. He also published a pamphlet The Angel Warriors at Mons (1915) reviewing the legends that accumulated around Arthur Machen's famous short story The Bowmen. He died December 29, 1946.

Sources:

Shirley, Ralph. The Mystery of the Human Double: The Case for Astral Projection. 1938. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

———. The New God, and Other Essays. N.p., 1911.

———. Occultists and Mystics of All Ages. London: W. Rider & Son, 1920.

———. The Problem of Rebirth. N.p., 1936.

———. A Short Life of Abraham Lincoln. New York: Funk & Wagnalls; London: W. Rider & Son, 1919.

Shivapuri Baba (Sri Govinananda Bharati) (1826–1963)

Hindu mystic who made a great impression on his biographer J. G. Bennett, who met him in 1961 when the sage was already a reported 135 years old. Bennett stated: "He was a true saint who produced an immediate and uplifting effect on everyone who entered his presence." Shivapuri Baba had a profound influence on many individuals during his long life, including Hindus, Buddhists, Moslems, and Christians.

When he was born, Britain was under the reign of George IV, and the future Queen Victoria was only a child of seven. Later in life, Shivapuri Baba visited England and made no fewer than 18 visits to Queen Victoria; he was possibly the first Indian holy man invited to meet the queen.

Shivapuri Baba was born in a Brahmin family in Kerala. His grandfather, a famous astrologer, announced that the boy would become a great sannyasin (renunciate or wandering monk) and became his guru until about 1840.

Shivapuri Baba decided to leave a worldly life in 1844, at age 18. After making a will leaving his rights of succession in his father's property to his sister, he joined his grandfather in the forest of the upper Deccan, near the banks of the river Narbada. The grandfather insisted that after his own death, the boy should meditate until he obtained God-realization, then make a pilgrimage on foot not only through India, but also around the world, and he set aside money for this purpose.

After the death of his grandfather, the young man received initiation as a sannyasin and took the name of Govindananda Bharati. He then retreated to the Narbada forest and spent 25 years in absolute seclusion. During this period he was even completely unaware of the Indian Mutiny of 1856. At the age of 50, he achieved the beatific vision and became aware of the divine as absolute, beyond name and form, which in Hinduism is considered the highest and most difficult stage of God-realization. He then undertook his great pilgrimages.

He visited all the holy places of India, meeting Sri Ramakrishna and Sri Aurobindo. He went on to travel through Afghanistan and Persia, then made a pilgrimage to Mecca. After this experience of the Moslem shrine, he next traveled to Jerusalem, the holy city of Judaism and Christianity. He went on to Turkey, through the Balkans into Greece and then through Italy to Rome, so that he might better understand the Christian religion. After visiting most European countries, he was invited to England by Queen Victoria's Indian Secretariat and had 18 private visits with the queen.

In 1901, after the death of the queen, Shivapuri visited the United States and met President Theodore Roosevelt. He spent two or three years in America before going to Mexico, where he met Porfirio Diaz before going on through the Andes to Colombia and Peru. After a period in South America, he embarked on a ship for the Pacific Islands, moving through New Zealand and Australia and visiting Japan in 1913. He then followed an ancient pilgrim route into Nepal, then back to India, visiting Benares. He traveled more than 25,000 miles, eighty percent on foot.

He then returned to his own home in Kerala as a wandering sannyasin after 70 years. He found no trace of his sister, who had also become a renunciate. He concluded remaining family affairs, then retired to the forests of Nepal. Although he was known as a holy man, equally at ease with the religions of Buddhism, Christianity, and Islam (a task made easier by Hindu ideas about the nature of religion), he insisted on remaining isolated, living in a small wooden hut and seeing only a few genuine seekers. Those who saw him received a sense of inner peace and realization from him, and one visitor suggested that even the wild beasts of the forest were on friendly terms with him.

J. G. Bennett, a disciple of G. I. Gurdjieff who later promoted the mission of Subud, met the Shivapuri Baba in Easter 1961 and found him, at the age of 135 years, alert, quick, and graceful, with a phenomenal memory and an inspiring spiritual presence. One of the most remarkable features of his teaching was his ability to communicate spiritual wisdom in only a few words in the idiom of his questioners. He explained his teaching in three words to S. Radhakrishnan, famous philosopher and former president of India, and afterward Radhakrishnan expounded for 15 minutes on the theme of these three words.

Shivapuri Baba died on January 28, 1963. His final message was: "Live Right Life, Worship God. That is all. Nothing more." He took a drink of water then said "Gaya" (I'm gone), laid down on his right side and passed away. His teaching of right living involved duty, morality, and worship. The sole purpose of human life was to find the Ultimate Truth, or God, and to this end a certain code of life was required—a spiritual, moral, and intellectual order.

Sources:

Bennett, John G., with Thakur Lal Manandhar. Long Pilgrimage: The Life and Teaching of Sri Govindananda Bharati known as the Shivapuri Baba. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1965.

Showers, Mary (ca. 1857– ?)

British materialization medium, daughter of General C. L. Showers of the Bombay Army. As a child she conversed with invisible people, sat for the first time in the circle of her family in the spring of 1872, produced raps and movement without contact, obtained poltergeist manifestations in daylight, performed direct writing, and saw spirit forms among which "John King" and "Peter" rose to prominence.

In 1874, Showers and her mother came from Teignmouth to London to give séances to representative Spiritualists. The test conditions in these early séances were taken charge of by the spirits. At the beginning of the séance, coils of rope or tape would be placed in the cabinet. At a signal, the curtain of the cabinet was drawn aside and the medium was discovered tightly bound.

The usual materialized spirit form was a girl, "Florence," who was eight inches taller than the medium, could vary her height, and was often seen by Florence Marryat together with the medium. Marryat describes these experiences in her book There is No Death (1891).

Marryat found herself so much in rapport with Showers that she wrote:

"We could not sit next each other at an ordinary tea or supper table when we had no thought of, or desire to hold a séance, without manifestations occurring in the full light. A hand that did not belong to either of us would make itself apparent under the table-cloth between us—a hand with power to grasp ours—or our feet would be squeezed or kicked beneath the table, or fingers would suddenly appear and whisk the food off our plates."

An attempt at exposure of Showers was made on April 2, 1874, at the house of Edward William Cox. When "Florence" appeared between the curtains of the cabinet, Cox's daughter Mrs. Edwards opened the curtains wider. The spirit resisted; in the struggle the headdress fell off and revealed Showers. Cox, however, seemed satisfied that the medium was entranced and had unconsciously impersonated the spirit.

Although Cox may have believed that the medium was entranced, the episode cast strong doubts upon the genuineness of Showers's phenomena. Cox himself reinforced such doubts in a letter dated March 8, 1876, to the medium D. D. Home (printed in full in Home's Light and Shadows of Spiritualism, London, 1877):

"I am satisfied that a large amount of fraud has been and still is practiced. Some of it is, doubtless, deliberately planned and executed. But some is, I think, done while the medium is in a state of somnambulism, and therefore unconscious. As all familiar with phenomena of somnambulism are aware, the patient acts to perfection any part suggested to his mind, but wholly without self-perception at the time, or memory afterwards. But such an explanation serves only to acquit the medium of deliberate imposture; it does not affect the fact that the apparent manifestation is not genuine.

"The great field for fraud has been offered by the production and presentation of alleged spirit-forms. All the conditions imposed are as if carefully designed to favour fraud if contemplated, and even to tempt to imposture. The curtain is guarded at either end by some friend. The light is so dim that the features cannot be distinctly seen. A white veil thrown over the body from head to foot is put on and off in a moment, and gives the necessary aspect of spirituality. A white band round head and chin at once conceals the hair, and disguises the face. A considerable interval precedes the appearance—just such as would be necessary for the preparations. A like interval succeeds the retirement of the form before the cabinet is permitted to be opened for inspection. This just enables the ordinary dress to be restored. While the preparation is going on behind the curtain the company are always vehemently exhorted to sing. This would conveniently conceal any sounds of motion in the act of preparation. The spectators are made to promise not to peep behind the curtain, and not grasp the form. They are solemnly told that if they were to seize the spirit they would kill the medium. This is an obvious contrivance to deter the on-lookers from doing anything that might cause detection. It is not true. Several spirits have been grasped, and no medium has died of it; although in each case the supposed spirit was found to be the medium. That the detected medium was somewhat disturbed in health after such a public detection and exposure is not at all surprising. Every one of the five mediums who have been actually seized in the act of personating a spirit is now alive and well. There need be no fear for the consequences in putting them to the proof.

"But I have learned how the trick is done. I have seen the description of it given by a medium to another medium who desired instruction. The letter was in her own handwriting, and the whole style of it showed it to be genuine.

"She informs her friend that she comes to the séance prepared with a dress that is easily taken off with a little practice. She says it may be done in two or three minutes. She wears two shifts (probably for warmth). She brings a muslin veil of thin material (she gives its name, which I forget). It is carried in her drawers! It can be compressed into a small space, although when spread it covers the whole person. A pocket-handkerchief pinned around the head keeps back the hair. She states that she takes off all her clothes except the two shifts, and is covered by the veil. The gown is spread carefully upon the sofa over the pillows. In this array she comes out. She makes very merry with the spiritualists whom she thus gulls, and her language about them is anything but complimentary.

“This explains the whole business. The question so often asked before was—where the robe could be carried? It could not be contained in the bosom or in a sleeve. Nobody seems to have thought of the drawers.

“But it will be asked how we can explain the fact that some persons have been permitted to go behind the curtain when the form was before it, and have asserted that they saw or felt the medium. I am sorry to say the confession to which I have referred states without reserve that these persons knew that it was a trick, and lent themselves to it. I am, of course, reluctant to adopt such a formidable conclusion, although the so-called ‘confession’ was a confidential communication from one medium to another medium who had asked to be instructed how the trick was done. I prefer to adopt the more charitable conclusion that they were imposed upon, and that it is easy to find how this was likely to be. The same suspicious precautions against detection were always adopted. The favoured visitor was an assured friend; one who, if detecting trickery, would shrink from proclaiming the cheat. But one was permitted to enter. A light was not allowed. There was nothing but the ‘darkness visible’ of the lowered gas rays struggling through the curtain. I have noted that no one of them ever was permitted to see the face of the medium. It was always ‘wrapped in a shawl.’ The hands felt a dress, and imagination did the rest. The revealer of the secret above referred to says that, when she took off her gown to put on the white veil, she spread it upon the sofa or chair with pillows or something under it, and this is what they felt and took for her body!

“The lesson to be learned from all this is, that no phenomena should be accepted as genuine that are not produced under strict test conditions. Investigators should be satisfied with no evidence short of the very best that the circumstances will permit.”

Cox’s reference to the means by which “spirit forms” were produced fraudulently in a “communication from one medium to another medium who had asked to be instructed how the trick was done” is thought by Trevor H. Hall (in his book The Spiritualists, London, 1962) to refer to Florence Cook and Mary Showers, who were known to each other and indeed collaborated with each other in a joint performance of fully materialized “spirit forms” at the house of Sir William Crookes. It is particularly significant that at the final séance with the phantom “Katie King” on May 21, 1874, Crookes himself noted that the face of the medium Florence Cook was covered with a red shawl, ostensibly to protect her from the effects of light, and that this established the separate identity of phantom and medium, seen together.

Although some sitters at the Crookes séances with Florence Cook noted marked similarities between the medium and the phantom “Katie King,” Crookes himself was at pains to establish specific differences. If the phenomena of Florence Cook was fraudulent, it is likely that her friend Showers was an accomplice at séances when the differences between medium and “spirit form” were apparent.

Both Trevor H. Hall and E. J. Dingwall are satisfied that the circumstantial evidence strongly indicates that Cook’s phenomena were fraudulent and that Showers was an accomplice. Their conclusion that such fraud was known to Crookes and that he connived at it, using the séances as a cover for an affair with Cook, is much more speculative, although it is undeniable that Crookes was tremendously impressed and captivated by the beauty of the materialized phantom “Katie King.”

The story of the connections between Showers, Cook, and the investigations of Crookes and Cox is a complex one. The best sources are the writings of Hall and Dingwall.

Sources:

Dingwall, E. J. The Critic’s Dilemma. Dewsbury, England: The Author, 1966.

Hall, Trevor H. Florence Cook and William Crookes: A Footnote to an Enquiry. London: Tomorrow Publications, 1963.

———. New Light on Old Ghosts. London: G. Duckworth, 1965.

———. The Spiritualists. New York: Helix Press, 1963. Reprinted as The Medium and the Scientist. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1984.

Marryat, Florence. There is No Death. 1891. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Thouless, R. H. “Crookes and Cook.” Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 42 (1963).

Shrine of Sothis

The Shrine of Sothis was a short-lived occult organization that made its public appearance in 1973 through ads placed in a variety of occult periodicals. It stressed a system of practical theurgy (magick) as the best form of communication between the individual and the inner self. It offered a set of lessons on the occult and magical disciplines, including the pentagram, the deities, initiation, reincarnation, black magick, divination, and the construction of talismans. Progressing through the lessons led the student to a realization of “the great concealed one,” i.e., God.

The shrine was headquartered in San Francisco. After several years it dropped out of sight.

Shrine of the Eternal Breath of Tao/ Universal Society of the Integral Way

Organization founded by Master Ni, Hua Ching, who had studied Taoism as a child in China. He moved to Taiwan after the Chinese Revolution. He continued his studies and became a teacher of Taoism and related martial and healing arts. During the 1970s, he moved to the United States and began to teach in Los Angeles.

This Taoist teaching concerns a universal law of subtle energy response. According to Master Ni, everything in the universe is a manifestation of energy in either its grosser or more subtle states. An understanding of how to develop the proper response to the energies of one’s environment will bring harmony to one’s life. The practice of Taoist meditation, martial arts (kung fu and t’ai chi ch’uan), and medical practices (acupuncture and herbs) assist in attaining a balanced relationship to life. The universal law of response is claimed to be the basis of all spiritual practices.

The shrine is located in Los Angeles and sponsors the College of Tao and the Yo San University of Traditional Chinese Medicine. Website: <http://www.usiw.org/>.

Sources:

Ni, Hua-Ching. The Subtle Universal Law and the Integral Way of Life. Malibu, Calif.: Shrine of the Eternal Breath of Tao, 1979.

Shroud of Turin Research Project

Former project founded in 1978, with a membership of professionals, logistics support personnel, and physical scientists whom acted as principal investigators in research work being performed on the Turin Shroud.

The purpose of the project was to determine the physics and chemistry of both the cloth and image in order to verify or refute the authenticity of the Shroud. The project conducted nondestructive testing and research and attempted to simulate and analyze various images and stains found on the Shroud through laboratory testings, including chemical analysis, infrared spectroscopy and thermography, optical and ultraviolet reflectance and fluorescent spectroscopy, photography, X-radiography, and X-ray fluorescence.

The project reported findings in the form of technical papers to the scientific press, sought to coordinate all activities in the field, reviewed research proposals, and distributed funding. It published a quarterly called Update. The project was formally dissolved by the Connecticut Secretary of State in 1993.

Siberia

Siberia is a vast territory of northern Asia, part of the Commonwealth of Independent States (formerly the U.S.S.R.). It is bounded by the Urals on the west, by Kazakhstan, China, and North Korea on the south, by the Pacific on the east, and by the Arctic on the north.

In former times, most of the tribal cultures of Siberia practiced the art of sorcery through the expertise of the shaman. The definitive characteristic of the shaman, as opposed to other tribal ritual leaders, was the ability to go into trance and travel in the spirit world.

The Samoyeds of Siberia believed in the existence of an order of invisible spirits called tadebtsois. These were ever circling through the atmosphere and were a constant menace to the people, who were anxious to propitiate them. This propitiation could only be effected through the intervention of a tadibe, or necromancer, who, when his services were requisitioned, attired himself in a magic costume of reindeer leather trimmed with red cloth, a mask of red cloth, and a breastplate of polished metal. He then took a drum of reindeer skin ornamented with brass rings and, attended by an assistant, walked in a circle and invoked the spirits while shaking a large rattle. The practice was very similar to that found among the Lapps in Lapland.

As the noise grew louder the spirits were supposed to draw near the sorcerer, who addressed them, beating his drum more gently and pausing in his chant to listen to their answers. Gradually he worked himself into a condition of frenzy, beat the drum with great violence, and appeared to be possessed by the spirit's influence, writhing and foaming at the mouth. All at once he stopped and oracularly pronounced the will of the spirits.

The tadibe's office was a hereditary one, but a member of the tribe exhibiting special qualifications was adopted into the priesthood, and through fasts, vigils, and the use of narcotics and stimulants—in the same manner as employed by some Native Americans—came to believe that he or she was visited by the spirits. The initiate was then adopted as a tadibe in a midnight ceremony and invested with a magic drum.

Many of the tricks of the priesthood were merely those of ordinary conjuring, such as the rope trick, but some of the illusions were exceedingly striking. With their hands and feet tied together, the tadibe sat on a carpet of reindeer skin and, putting out the light, summoned the assistance of the spirits. Peculiar noises heralded the spirits' approach, snakes hissed and bears growled, the lights were rekindled, and the tadibe's hands and feet were untied.

The Samoyeds sacrificed often to the dead and performed various ceremonies in their honor, but they believed that only the souls of the tadibes enjoyed immortality, hovering in the air and demanding frequent sacrifices.

Further to the east, inhabiting the more northerly part of Siberia, lived the Ostiaks, who nominally adopted the rites of the Greek church, but magic was also common among them. Many Ostiaks carried a kind of fetish they called schaitan.

Larger images of this kind were part of the furnishings of an Ostiak lodge, but they were attired in seven pearl-embroidered garments and suspended from the neck by a string of silver coins. In a strange sort of dualism they were placed in many of the huts cheek by jowl with the image of the Virgin Mary, and at mealtimes their lips were smeared with the blood of raw game or fish.

The Mongols, who inhabited the more southern parts of the vast expanse of Siberia, were also ancient practitioners of magic and relied greatly on divination. To prognosticate the weather they employed a stone endowed with magic virtues, called yadeh-tash, which was suspended over or laid in a basin of water with sundry ceremonies.

Many of the old beliefs and practices in Siberia died out following the Russian Revolution of 1917 and the subsequent development of the area. (See also Fetishism)

Sibley, Ebenezer (1751–1799)

Ebenezer Sibley, British astrologer, magician, and practitioner of herbal medicine, was born on January 30, 1751. He had a conservative upbringing in a Calvinist Baptist church and later attended the Aberdeen Medical College. He studied orthodox medicine, but also had an interest to study animal magnetism under Franz Anton Mesmer; he joined Mesmer's Harmonic Philosophical School. Then Sibley also taught himself the basics of occultism. In 1784 he joined the Freemasons.

Sibley is best remembered for two books. In 1784 the first volume of his four-volume magnum opus, The Complete Illustration of the Celestial Art of Astrology. It summarized the work of the previous century of astrological writing and became a steady seller for the rest of Sibley's life in spite of the reviews. The Conjuror's Magazine, the only occult periodical in England at the time dismissed it as derivative. The final volume, concerning magic, that appeared in 1792, presented an interesting variation on Emanuel Swedenborg's vision of the spiritual world. According to Sibley, spirits live in another world that is neither heaven nor hell. Magic can summon only the evil spirit. Good spirits watch over humans, but do not respond to any summoning. Sibley went on to highlight seven good spirits that watch over human affairs and noted seven corresponding wicked spirits. He noted that since God had removed his wrath through Christ, these seven spirits made but few appearances.

The same year that his fourth volume was purchased, Sibley also completed A Key to the Physic and the Occult Sciences, a systematic statement of his occult philosophy. Like Mesmer, he suggested that the world was animated by a universal spirit, the operative agent in both astrology and healing work. This spirit works on matter and can be used by the magician for his purposes. This understanding would become standard for magical thought through the century and anticipates the more heralded work of Éliphas Lévi. Also included in the Key, published a supplement to the famous work on herbal medicine by Nicolas Culpepper.

Ebenezer's brother Manoah Sibley became a prominent Swedenborgian minister.

Ebenezer Sibley styled himself an "astro-philosopher." He claimed to have cast the horoscope of the forger-poet Thomas Chatterton, and to have predicted his fatal end, such as "death by poison." Among various successful prognostications made through astrology, Sibley claimed to have foretold the American War of Independence in a symbolic picture in his book. Sibley was sufficiently enterprising to design a small notebook for astrologers, engraved from plates but with blank spaces for recording the positions of various planets and noting horoscopes.

Sources:

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Sibley, Ebenezer. Celestial Science of Astrology. 1776. Revised as New and Complete Illustration of the Celestial Science of Astrology. 2 vols. N.p., 1817.

Sibley, Ebenezer. A Key to Physic and the Occult Sciences. 1792. 5th ed. London W. Lewis and G. Jones, 1814.

———. The Medical Mirror; or, A Treatise on the Impregnation of the Human Female. N.p., 1800.

———. Uranoscopia; or, The Pure Language of the Stars Unfolded by the Motion of the Seven Erratics. N.p., 1780.

Sibley, Manoah (1757–1840)

Swedenborgian minister and astrologer, born in Bristol, England, on August 20, 1757, the younger brother of astrologer Ebenezer Sibley. Unlike his college-educated brother, Manoah Sibley had to study on his own from age 11, but through his teens he mastered several languages, which, along with shorthand, he taught through the 1760s and 1770s. He married in 1780 and opened a bookshop, which he and his wife managed. Sibley dropped his own work to align with the church that had been established in London by Robert Hindmarsh. Swedenborg's teachings were received as the end of his spiritual quest and by Easter of the next year he began preaching. He was ordained in 1790. Hindmarsh, a former Methodist, modeled his church on that which was familiar to him. Sibley found his approach too restrictive and in 1793 he left to found his own Swedenborgian congregation. He preached weekly for the next forty years.

Apart from pioneering the beliefs of Emanuel Swedenborg in England, Sibley is most remembered today for his publication of translations of the writings of Claudius Ptolemy and Placidus. Sibley's translation of the Tetrabiblos (four books) of Ptolemy, the major work from which Western astrology developed, appeared in 1786, and the writings of Placidus, whose system of arranging the astrological houses would come to dominate astrology in the next century, appeared in several volumes in 1789 and 1790.

Astrologers hail Sibley for making these works available and note their importance in directing the astrological revival in England in the nineteenth century. Critics have charged Sibley with theft, first of Whalley's earlier translation of the Tetrabiblos, and then of a manuscript of a translation of the writing of Placidus. All of his books are full of errors that, in spite of his linguistic accomplishments, he could not correct because he did not have copies of the Latin originals.

Whatever the problems with the translations, Sibley went on to an even more prestigious career with the Bank of England, beginning in 1797, and was appointed principal of the Chancery Office in 1815.

Sibley died in December 1840 in London.

Sources:

Astronomy and Elementary Philosophy, Translated from the Latin of Placidus de Titus. London: W. Justins, 1789.

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1995.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Ptolemy, Claudius. The Quadripitate, or Four Books. Translated by J. Whalley. Edited by Manoah Sibley and J. Browne. London, 1786.

Sibyl

General term for a prophetess. The original Sibyl was believed to have lived in Asia Minor in the seventh century B.C.E., but three centuries later various sibyls were claimed in different parts. Sibylline prophecies in hexameters ascribed to Sibyl were current in classical Greece and were referred to by Aristophanes and Plato.

Sibylline Books

The manuscripts that embodied the secrets of human destiny, the work of the sibyls or prophetesses of the ancient world. According to the historian Tacitus (ca. 55–120 C.E.), these books were first preserved in the Roman Capitol. When it burned down, the previous leaves were preserved and removed to the temple of Apollo Palatinus. Their subsequent fate is enshrouded in mystery, but it would seem that the Cumean books existed until 339 C.E., when they were destroyed by the consul Stilikon.

Augustus sent three ambassadors—Paulus Gabinus, Marcus Otacilius, and Lucius Valerius—into Asia, Africa, and Italy to collect whatever could be discovered of the Sibylline Oracles in order to replace those that had been lost or burned.

The books are of two kinds: the books of the elder Sibyls, (that is, of the earlier Greek and Roman times) and those of the later Sibyls, which are falsified and disfigured with numerous interpolations. Of the latter, eight books in Greek and Latin are still said to exist.

Those preserved in Rome had been collected from various places, at various times, and contained predictions of future events couched in the most mysterious of symbolic languages. At first they were permitted to be read only by descendants of Apollo, then later by priests, until their care was entrusted to certain officials.

Siddhas

According to Hindu mythology, the 88,000 semi-divine beings of great holiness dwelling between the Earth and the Sun.

Siddhis

The eight occult powers resulting from the practice of yoga, according to the system of Patanjali (ca. 200 B.C.E.). These powers are anima (to become infinitely small at will), mahima (large), laghima (light), garima (heavy), prapti (to reach anywhere), prakamya (to gratify any wishes), ishatwa (to create), and vashitwa (to command).

There are many accounts of Hindu yogis possessing and manifesting such powers, even in relatively modern times. However, at the same time the siddhis are regarded by many as obstacles to spiritual realization as they might distract the seeker from his or her true goal. In recent years, the Transcendental Meditation movement founded by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi inaugurated a controversial Siddha Course for advanced students and claimed the ability to teach students the power of levitation.

Sources:

Divededi, M. N., ed. The Yoga-Sutras of Patanjali. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1890.

Siderealist (Journal)

Former publication for professional astrologers and students concerned with sidereal aspects of astrology. Among astrologers, there are several systems of calculating the divisions of the horoscope chart and devising its relation to the actual stars that constitute the 12 signs of the zodiac. The sidereal zodiac places the division according to the present locations of these signs, which, because of a phenomenon known as the procession of the equinoxes, are constantly changing. In contrast, the tropical zodiac always measures the divisions from the position of the sun at the annual spring equinox. The Siderealist included charts of public personalities in relation to star patterns.

Siderite

An old name for a loadstone or magnet. The term has also been variously used to indicate a steel-colored stone (possibly sapphire), a blue-colored quartz, carbonate of iron, and meteorites containing iron.

Sideromancy

A branch of pyromancy (divination by fire), based on interpretation of the flame, smoke, and pattern of straws placed on a hot piece of iron.

Sidgwick, Eleanor Mildred Balfour (1845–1936)

Psychical researcher and president of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR). Sidgwick was born on March 11, 1845, the older sister of Arthur James Balfour (later British Prime Minister Premier) and Gerald William Balfour, both of whom were also elected president of the SPR. In 1876 she married Henry Sidgwick, who would go on to become a professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge and in 1882 the first president of the SPR. Though without formal training, she was of great intellect and began to participate in research alongside her husband. Her sister Evelyn Balfour married John William Strutt (Lord Rayleigh), also an SPR president.

Mathematics was her forte. With her brother-in-law Lord Rayleigh, she conducted several experiments in electricity and with him published three papers in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society. Lord Rayleigh later won the Nobel Prize for physics.

She joined the SPR, and in 1888 she assumed the duties formally assigned to her husband as editor of the society's Journal and Proceedings. In the 1890s, deemed the best at handling large masses of information, she was placed in charge of the Census of Hallucinations and was the author of the final report. She was elected president of the SPR for 1908–09. After her term of office was finished, she acted as honorary secretary until 1931. At the society's Jubilee Celebrations in 1932, she was appointed as President d'Honneur. Over a 30 year period she collected and analyzed the many communications that made up the bulk of the cross-correspondences.

Over the years she wrote a number of papers for the Journal and Proceedings of the SPR. She assisted Edmund Gurney, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore in the compilation of their key work Phantasms of the Living (2 vols., 1886) and edited an abridged edition in 1918. She also contributed the entry on Spiritualism to the 9th edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica (1875–89). She died February 10, 1936.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Gauld, Alan. The Founders of Psychical Research. New York: Schrocken Books, 1968.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Sidgwick, Eleanor. "Discussion of the Trance Phenomena of Mrs. Piper." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1899).

———. "An Examination of Book-Tests Obtained in Sitzings with Mrs. Osborne Leonard." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1921).

———. "Hindrances and Complications in Telepathic Communication." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1923).

———. "History of the SPR." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1932–33).

———. "Phantasms of the Dead." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1885).

———. "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1886).

Sidgwick, Henry (1838–1900)

First president of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, a professor at Cambridge University who filled the chair of moral philosophy, and who once was described as "the most incorrigibly and exasperatingly critical and sceptical mind in England." F. W. H. Myers (who pursued investigations with Sidgwick) and Edmund Gurney made their cooperation with the fledgling SPR contingent upon his acceptance of the presidential post.

Sidgwick was born May 31, 1838, at Skipton, Yorkshire, England. He attended Rugby and Trinity College, Cambridge (fellow, 1859–69). In 1876, he married Eleanor Mildred Balfour, the sister of Arthur James Balfour, later British Prime Minister.

In his first presidential address to the SPR, on July 17, 1882, Sidgwick used plain words:

"We are all agreed that the present state of things is a scandal to the enlightened age in which we live, that the dispute as to the reality of these marvelous phenomena of which it is quite impossible to exaggerate the scientific importance, if only a tenth part of what has been alleged by generally credible witnesses could be shown to be true—I say it is a scandal that the dispute as to the reality of these phenomena should still be going on, that so many competent witnesses should have declared their belief in them, that so many others should be profoundly interested in having the question determined, and yet the educated world, as a body, should still be simply in an attitude of incredulity."

He declared that he did not expect to produce evidence of a better quality than that of Sir William Crookes, Alfred Russel Wallace, and Augustus de Morgan, but wanted a great deal more of it. Speaking on scientific incredulity he concluded:

"We have done all that we can when the critic has nothing left to allege except that the investigator is in the trick. But when he has nothing else left he will allege that. . . . We must drive the objector into the position of being forced either to admit the phenomena as inexplicable, at least by him, or to accuse the investigators either of lying or cheating or of a blindness or forgetfulness incompatible with any intellectual condition except absolute idiocy."

For 18 years Sidgwick claimed an active share in the work of the SPR, contributed many important studies to the Proceedings, and helped the investigations by his personal means. He edited the society's Journal in 1885.

He died without admitting any reality to either telekinesis or ectoplasm. But as early as 1864 he wrote to a Mr. Dakyns, a friend: "I (fancy I) have actually heard the raps . . ." and added: "However, I have no kind of evidence to come before a jury. So keep it still till I blaze forth." He never blazed forth.

He had sittings with mediums Frank Herne and Henry Slade and materialization séances with C. E. Wood and Annie Fairlamb in his own home at Cambridge under the most stringent test conditions, as testified by Myers's notes. Eleanor Sidgwick published an account of those she attended in the SPR Proceedings (vol. 4) and admitted that it was exceedingly difficult "but not perhaps impossible" to impute the results to imposture. In justice, however, it should be added that the most astounding and conclusive phenomena, according to Myers, occurred in the absence of both Sidgwicks.

It is more widely known that Sidgwick was impressed by the phenomena of Eusapia Palladino, which he witnessed with his wife on the Ile. Roubaud in 1894, as the guest of Charles Richet. During the latter part of Palladino's stay there, her phenomena were less spectacular, and he then took a leading part in the sittings held at Cambridge in 1895 that resulted in her exposure. He had a number of sittings with Leonora Piper in 1889–90 and retained the keenest interest in her trance phenomena.

He died August 28, 1900. The first communications purporting to come from Sidgwick after his death were obtained through Rosina Thompson on January 11, 1901. According to J. G. Piddington, who was present, the diction, manner, and voice were astonishingly lifelike, and he felt that he was indeed speaking with and hearing the voice of the man he had known. The written communications that followed the oral one bear out a striking resemblance to Sidgwick's handwriting. The first such script was received through Thompson in Piddington's presence. Other messages, of varying evidential value, were received through the hand of Margaret Verrall.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Gauld, Alan. The Founders of Psychological Research. New York: Schocken Books, 1968.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Sidgwick, Henry. "Canons of Evidence in Psychical Research." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1888–90).

———. "Disinterested Deception." Journal 6 (1894).

Sidgwick, Henry, A. Johnson, F. W. H. Myers, Frank Podmore, and Eleanor Sidgwick. "Report on the Census of Hallucinations." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 10 (1894).

Sierra, Ralph U(son) (1904–1982)

Chiropractic doctor who conducted research in parapsychology. Sierra was born December 6, 1904, in San Juan, Puer Rico, and graduated from Atlantic States Chiropractic Institute of New York. He was a physical therapist at Kings County Hospital, Brooklyn, New York (1935–47), an instructor in neurology at Atlantic States Chiropractic Institute (1947–49), and a lecturer on healing and natural sciences. He wrote the Handbook of Neurology, a chiropractic text. Sierra investigated respiratory and diaphragmatic changes in mediums during manifestation of phenomena. He died in November of 1982.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Sigil

A sign or seal for an occult entity. Sigils, especially those that are the marks of angels, deities, or demons, are often used on amulets and talismans. According to occultists, such signs are like the signatures of gods and other supernatural entities, and the inscribing of such sigils evokes the entities that they symbolize. (See also Yantra)

In this century, the art of creating sigils was recreated by artist-magician Austin Osman Spare. He saw in sigils a means of concentrating the magical will. He would write his magic intention or will down in a sentence or word, and then combine the major letters (without repeating any letter) into a patterned shape, the sigil. The symbolic shape thus created could be impressed upon the subconscious for working magic.

Sources:

Drury, Nevill, and Stephen Skinner. The Search for Abraxas. London: Neville Spearman, 1972.

Gettings, Fred. Dictionary of Occult, Hermetic and Alchemical Sigils. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981.

Signs (Paranormal)

At various moments in history and in times of great stress, suffering, and persecution, reports of paranormal signs (believed to portend great events) frequently emerged. Under these conditions it was not unusual for ecstatic states to become epidemic, prophecies to be uttered, and unusual physical phenomena to appear. Many of these reports appear to be a mixture of misobservation of mundane if unusual occurrences and hallucinations.

The ancient historians Josephus and Tacitus wrote of fearful sights and great signs from heaven before the judgment on Jerusalem. When, three centuries later, Julian the Apostate attempted to rebuild Jerusalem, fiery balls burst forth upon the workmen and took strange shapes. This was recorded not only by Julian's own historian but by Jewish and non-Roman writers as well. Many accounts testify of the signs and wonders during the persecution of the Huguenots in France.

From the dawn of printing onward, unnatural events and prodigies of nature became the subject of broadside ballads, sheets and chapbook pamphlets, the street literature of poor people. Monstrous births and other signs and wonders were made the occasion for moralizing about the sins of the day and predicted divine judgment. Even in modern times, visions of the Virgin Mary are often considered signs of divine wrath at a sinful world. (See also Fatima; Garabandal)

Sources:

Eniatis. Mirabilis Annus; or, The Year of Prodigies and Wonders; Being a Collection of Several Signs That Have Been Seen in the Heavens, in the Earth, and in the Waters, Together with Many Remarkable Accidents and Judgments . . . Within the Space of One Year Last Past. London, 1661.

Grey, E. Howard. Visions, Previsions and Miracles in Modern Times. London: L. N. Fowler, 1915.

Rollins, Hyder E., ed. The Pack of Autolykus or Strange and Terrible News of Ghosts, Apparitions, Monstrous Births, Showers of Wheat, Judgments of God, and other Prodigious and Fearful Happenings as told in Broadside Ballads of the Years 1624–1693. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1927.

Thompson, C. J. S. The Mystery and Love of Monsters. London: Williams & Norgate, 1930. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

Silberhartz, Allen (1947–)

Allen Silberhartz, the host of the national New Age television show Bridging Heaven and Earth, was born on February 28, 1947, in New York City. He grew up in a Jewish home and had his Bar Mitzvah at age 13. He completed his degree at the University of Pennsylvania (1967), where he majored in accounting, and earned a law degree at George Washington University (1971). He moved to rural Maryland, where he joined a commune residing on an organic farm. While there he learned to practice meditation which has subsequently remained a part of his daily schedule.

Having joined the bar in Maryland, in 1975 Silberhartz began practicing law, but in 1980 moved to Santa Barbara, California, where he became an investment counselor. During his Maryland years, he had had a profound mystical experience of oneness that changed his outlook on life and that he has since sought to manifest in all his various activities. In 1985 he began to teach meditation and spiritual development. He became close friends with another independent spiritual teacher named Wistancia.

In 1995, along with Wistancia and a group of spiritual friends, he launched a television show on the local community access station in Santa Barbara. The show grew out of a conversation reflecting upon the negativity that appeared to dominate many of the daytime talk shows then running on national television. Silberhartz and his colleagues attempted to put together a show that would be positive and uplifting and reflect his own experience of oneness which he had come to feel transcended any particular organizational expression. In the beginning, he and Wistancia served as cohosts, but since 1997 he has been the sole host.

By the end of the decade, Bridging Heaven and Earth had become a national show, having been picked up on a number of community access stations. Silberhartz continues his financial counseling work and role as a teacher.

Sources:

Bridging Heaven and Earth. <http://www.heaveneearth.com/>. March 23, 2000.

Manville, Rhonda Parks. "Local Metaphysical Talk Show Resonates with Viewers." Santa Barbara News Press (March 7, 1999).

Silbert, Maria (d. 1936)

Austrian physical medium of Waltendorf, near Graz, mainly known for telekinesis, stigmata, apport, and trance phenomena. As a child she reportedly could predict future events, but her later physical powers were developed at the expense of her clairvoyant abilities.

Her apports were preceded by remarkable lights resembling lightning strokes. A deceased doctor, calling himself "Franciscus Nell," was her chief control. One of his curious demonstrations was engraving cigarette cases with his name when they were held under the table. However, such a feat is more reminiscent of conjuring than paranormal phenomena. Paul Sünner recorded in Psychic Science (January 1931) some sittings in which, while the medium's hands were visible above the table, the engraving feat was demonstrated five times in succession, additions being scratched on the same cigarette case on his request.

Silbert's standing on the Continent was high. But except for her three visits to the British College of Psychic Science in London, she did not have the good fortune to sit with sympathetic British investigators. Walter Franklin Prince, of the Boston Society for Psychical Research, published a negative report after two sittings in Graz in 1927. Theodore Besterman, in an account of a personal investigation in November 1928 (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 38), admitted some interesting phenomena that he could not explain but nevertheless concluded fraud.

During 1925, the British psychical researcher Harry Price was in Graz, and on November 3 he attended a sitting with Silbert. Various objects, including Price's gold cigarette lighter, were placed under the table. The lighter suddenly appeared on top of the table with the word "well" engraved on it.

Price obtained permission to look under the table to see the movement of the objects. After 30 minutes he saw Silbert's right foot outside her shoe with her toes visible where the end of a stocking had been cut off. Price was satisfied that the medium used her toes to handle objects. He did not accuse the medium of fraud because he was hoping to make further investigations later, and because he learned that five other individuals who had publicly criticized Silbert had suffered inexplicable misfortunes. (Price believed that Silbert actually possessed some paranormal powers, especially in regard to the raps she produced.)

Silbert died in September 1936.

Silva, Edivaldo Oliveira (ca. 1930–1974)

Brazilian Spiritualist healer specializing in psychic surgery. Born in Vitoria da Conquista, Bahia, he became a schoolteacher, taxidermist, and entomologist. In his later years he studied medicine and law, hoping thereby to qualify as a doctor so that his spiritual healing would be secured against prosecution for illegal medical practice. Although brought up as a Roman Catholic, he was an unconventional Christian who did not endorse the monopoly of the church authorities and developed his own personal theological approach. He did not claim to be formally aligned to Spiritism, the Brazilian form of Spiritualism, although his healing work was ascribed to spirit controls.

He first discovered his healing abilities in 1962, when he visited a neighbor who had a fit of temporary insanity. Silva went into a trance and was taken over by a spirit personality, becoming very violent. When he recovered normal consciousness, his neighbor had been cured.

Later, Silva visited a Spiritist center where he again went into trance, discovering on his way home that he had performed psychic surgery while in this state. Over the next ten years, he performed psychic healing on some 65,000 individuals.

During his healing sessions, Silva went into a trance-like condition while his spirit controls performed the work. He only learned the details of his healing afterward from conversations, photographs, or tape recordings. His spirit controls consisted of an international team that included "Dr. Calazans," "Pierre" (a Frenchman), and "Dr. Fritz" (a German), as well as an Englishman, a Japanese person, an Italian, and a Brazilian.

Silva believed that the psychic surgery operated on two planes—plasmic and ectoplasmic. In the former, red globules were actually separated from the plasma; in the latter, the operation was on a subtle body rather than a physical body. As with other psychic surgeons, he would make instantaneous incisions that were afterward apparently paranormally healed.

Silva was investigated by author Guy Lyon Playfair, a member of the Brazilian Institute for Psycho-Biophysical Research, who spent two years studying Brazilian healers firsthand. Two operations were performed on Playfair himself, who also witnessed the making of an incision in another patient and was allowed to place his fingers into the hole before the flesh was reunited.

Silva performed over 10,000 psychic operations during his lifetime. He died in 1974 after being involved in a car accident.

Sources:

Playfair, Guy Lyon. The Flying Cow. 1975. Reprinted as The Unknown Power. New York: Pocket Books, 1975.

Silvester II, Pope (d. 1003)

Silvester II (Gerbert), a distinguished scholar, statesman, and pope (999–1003 C.E.), was one of a number of popes from the tenth century on who were regarded as sorcerers. It was said that Silvester had evoked a demon who obtained for him the papacy, and who further promised him that he should die only after he had celebrated High Mass in Jerusalem.

One day while he was saying mass in a church in Rome, he felt suddenly ill, and, remembering that he was in a church called the Holy Cross in Jerusalem, suddenly knew that the demon had played him a trick. Before he died, he confessed to his cardinals his compact with the devil. However, as Silvester had been preceptor of two monarchs, and a friend of others, it is more likely that he owed his preference to one of these.

He was one of the most learned men of his day, proficient in mathematics, astronomy, and mechanics. He introduced clocks, and some writers credit him with the invention of arithmetic. It is not at all improbable that his scientific pursuits and the technical language involved might have appeared to the less educated to savor of magic. The brazen head that the chronicler William of Malmesbury stated as belonging to Silvester, which answered questions in an oracular manner, probably had its origin in a similar misinterpretation of scientific apparatus. It also recalls folk stories of the wonderful brazen head of Roger Bacon.

There is no lack of picturesque detail in some of the stories told of Silvester. He was said to have discovered buried treasure by the aid of sorcery and to have visited a marvelous underground palace, whose riches and splendor vanished at a touch. His tomb was believed to possess the powers of sorcery and to shed tears when one of the succeeding popes was about to die.

Simmonite, William Joseph (ca. 1800–ca. 1862)

Prominent leader of the nineteenth-century astrology revival in England. Little is known of Simmonite's life prior to his appearance as a schoolteacher in Sheffield, England, in the 1830s. He knew several languages and was a mathematician. It appears he also practiced herbal medicine. His first book, The Practical Self-teaching Grammar of the English Language, appeared in 1841.

Simmonite emerged as an astrologer in the mid-1840s with the publication of his first astrological text, Prognostications on Revolutions, or Solar Figures (1845). He continued to write through the remainder of his life, greatly expanding the minuscule number of books available to would-be astrologers of the era. His books went through many editions and were republished in the United States at the end of the century as the American phase of the astrology revival commenced. His work was noted for its erudite cast. Simmonite is also credited with simplifying the nature of the calculations required to construct a horoscope chart.

Simmonite lived into the early 1860s, but the date and place of his death are unknown.

Sources:

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Simmonite, W. J. The Celestial Philosopher. 2d ed. London: Simpkin, Marshall, 1847.

———. Medical Botany, or Herbal Guide to Health. London: Simpkin, Marshall, [1848].

———. The Prognostic Astronomer, or Horary Astrology. London: Simpkin, Marshall, 1851.

———. Prognostications on Revolutions or Solar Figures. London: Simpkin, Marshall, 1845.

Simon Magus (ca. 67 C.E.)

Founder of the heterodox sect of Simonites, often identified with the sorcerer mentioned in the New Testament (Acts 8) who was said to have bewitched the people of Samaria and made them believe that he was possessed of divine power.

He was born in Samaria or Cyprus and was among the number of Samaritans who came to Philip for baptism after hearing him preach. Later, when Peter and John laid their hands on the new converts, so that they received the Holy Ghost, Simon offered the disciples money to procure a similar power. But Peter sternly rebuked him for seeking to buy the gift of God with money (a practice afterward called simony) and bade him pray that his evil thought might be forgiven, whereupon the already repentant Simon said, "Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken come upon me."

Though we are not told in detail the sorceries with which Simon was supposed to have bewitched the people of Samaria, certain early ecclesiastical writers have left a record of his doings. They claimed that he could make himself invisible when he pleased, assume the appearance of another person or of one of the lower animals, pass unharmed through fire, cause statues to come alive, make furniture move without any visible means of imparting motion, and perform many other miracles. In explanation of his desire to possess the apostles' power of working miracles, he is said to have affirmed that his sorceries took a great deal of time and trouble to perform, owing to the necessity for a multitude of magical rites and incantations, while the miracles of the apostles were accomplished easily and successfully by the mere utterance of a few words.

The adept from whom Simon was supposed to have learned the art of magic was Dositheus, who pretended to be the Messiah foretold by the prophets and who was contemporary with Christ. From this person Simon was said to have acquired a great store of occult erudition, and owed his power chiefly to the hysterical conditions into which he was capable of throwing himself. Through these, he was able to make himself look either old or young, returning at will to childhood or old age.

It seems that he had not been initiated into transcendental magic, but was merely consumed by a thirst for power over humanity and the mysteries of nature. Repulsed by the apostles, he is said to have undertaken pilgrimages, like them, in which he permitted himself to be worshiped by the mob. He declared that he himself was the manifestation of the Splendor of God, and that Helena, his Greek slave, was its reflection. Thus he imitated Christianity in the reverse sense, affirmed the eternal reign of evil and revolt, and was, in fact, an antichrist.

After a while, according to popular legend, he went to Rome, where he appeared before the Emperor Nero. He is said to have been decapitated by him; however, his head returned to his shoulders, and he was instituted by the tyrant as court sorcerer. Legend also states that St. Peter, alarmed at the spread of the doctrine of Simon in Rome, hurried there to combat it. When Nero was made aware of Peter's arrival, he imagined Peter to be a rival sorcerer and resolved to bring Simon and Peter together for his amusement.

An account ascribed to St. Clement states that upon the arrival of Peter, Simon flew gracefully through a window into the outside air. The apostle made a vehement prayer, whereupon the magician, with a loud cry, crashed to the earth and broke both his legs. Nero, greatly annoyed, immediately imprisoned the saint, and it is related that Simon died of his fall. He had, however, founded a distinct school, headed by Merrander, that promised immortality of soul and body to its followers.

In the mid-nineteenth century, a sect existed in France and the United States that credited the principles of this magician.

French scholar Jacques Lacarrière viewed Simon Magus as one of the precursors of Gnosticism.

Sources:

Lacarrière, Jacques. The Gnostics. London: Owen, 1977. Reprint, San Francisco: City Lights, 1989.

SIMS See Student's International Mediation Society

Sinclair, Upton (Beall) (1878–1968)

Famous American novelist, fearless champion of many unpopular causes. He was born on September 20, 1878, in Baltimore, Maryland, and later studied at the City College of New York. He was a Socialist candidate for the U.S. House of Representatives (1906, 1920); for the Senate (1922); and for governorship of California (1926, 1930). In 1934, he was narrowly defeated as the Democratic candidate for governor of California.

He published over 80 books, some of which were translated into more than 50 languages. His most well-known books include The Jungle (1906), King Coal (1917), The Brass Check (1919), The Goose Step (1923), Oil (1927), Between Two Worlds (1941), Presidential Agent (1944), Presidential Mission (1947), and O Shepherd Speak (1947).

In his book Mental Radio: Does it Work, and How? (1930), he detailed his investigations into the phenomena of telepathy with his wife, Mary Craig Sinclair. The book, to which William McDougall wrote the introduction to the English edition and Albert Einstein to the German edition, presents a lively account of the abilities of Mary Sinclair as a sensitive, or psychic. She first became aware of her powers after the death of several intimate friends. They were further awakened by her contact with Jan, a Pole, who had studied yoga in India and performed some of the feats of the fakirs. He was, for some time, a guest in the Sinclair home.

Upton Sinclair himself was, for some time, irritated by his wife's gift. In the waking state and in her dreams she could follow her husband and describe his doings. Finally he decided to experiment. The usual method was to make half a dozen drawings of anything that came into his mind. These were folded. His wife, in a dark room, would take them one by one, place them on her abdomen and then write or draw her impression.

The curious thing was that sometimes the second drawing was registered on her mind before she finished with the first one. When, for instance, a necktie was drawn, she added puffs of smoke at the end of the tie. The next object was a burning match.

Sinclair concluded:

"We have something more than telepathy, for no human mind knows what drawings she has taken from that envelope. No human mind but her own even knows that she is trying an experiment. Either there is some super-human mind or else there is something that comes from the drawings, some way of 'seeing' other than the way we know and use all the time."

Walter Franklin Prince made the Sinclair experiments the subject matter of the sixteenth bulletin of the Boston Society for Psychic Research, dealing also with a great deal of unpublished material and giving an account of a series of control tests with ten different persons. Upton Sinclair died November 25, 1968.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S. and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Prince, Walter Franklin. The Sinclair Experiments Demonstrating Telepathy. Boston: Boston Society for Psychic Research, n.d.

Sinclair, Upton. The Autobiography of Upton Sinclair. N.p., 1962.

———. Mental Radio: Does it Work, and How? Pasadena, Calif.: The Author, 1930.

Sindonology

Term given to studies relating to the Turin Shroud, a burial shroud that some people have promoted as the one in which Jesus was wrapped after his crucifixion. A first Sindonological Congress, held in Turin in 1939, was attended by scholars, primarily Roman Catholic, who supported the claims of the Shroud, though the majority of those who have studied the cloth have pronounced it a product of the Middle Ages.

Sinnett, A(lfred) P(ercy) (1840–1921)

British journalist and occultist who played an important part in the affairs of the Theosophical Society during its first generation. He was born on January 18, 1840, in London. His father was a journalist and his mother a writer who had published numerous books. Sinnett became a journalist himself at the age of 19, working on the staff of the London Globe. Later he went to Hong Kong, where he became editor of the Daily Press. He returned to England in 1868 and became a writer on the Standard, then traveled to India to take a position as editor of the Pioneer in Allahabad in 1871.

He published some articles on Spiritualism, which led to a meeting with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Henry S. Olcott, founders of the Theosophical Society. Sinnett and his wife Patience became members. The subsequent publicity given to Theosophy in the Pioneer assisted its membership growth, but it cost Sinnett his job. He returned to London in 1883, where he became friendly with Frederic W. Myers, who (with Edmund Gurney and Henry Sidgwick) had founded the Society for Psychic Research a year earlier.

For a period, Sinnett was vice president of the Theosophical Society, but his independent views made it difficult for him to cooperate fully with other officials, although Sinnett's book The Occult World had attracted many individuals to the society. During his association with the society, Sinnett received a number of Mahatma letters, supposedly from the mysterious Masters who had directed the formation of the society. Sinnett's book Esoteric Buddhism was said to have derived from communications from the "Master K. H." on human evolution and cosmogony.

By 1887, Sinnett and his wife had formed associations with the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, the pioneering ceremonial magic society. In 1896 the poet William Butler Yeats, a prominent member of the Golden Dawn, wrote that Sinnett was in charge of the order's neophytes. Sinnett was also friendly with the important occult and mystical writer Arthur Edward Waite, and with Mary A. Atwood, who sent Sinnett her library of alchemical texts.

Sinnett died June 26, 1921, at the age of 81. He had written a number of books, including many that grew out of his theosophical experience.

Sources:

Blavatsky, H. P. Letters of H. P. Blavatsky to A. P. Sinnett. Edited by A. T. Barker. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1925.

Sinnett, A. P. The Autobiography of Alfred Percy Sinnett. London: Theosophical History Centre, 1986.

———. Early Days of Theosophy in Europe. London: Theosophical Publishing House, 1922.

———. Esoteric Buddhism. London: Trubner, 1883.

———. The Growth of the Soul: A Sequel to "Esoteric Buddhism." London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1896.

———. Incidents in the Life of Madame Blavatsky. London: George Redway, 1886.

———. The Mahatma Letters to A. P. Sinnett. Edited by A. T. Barker. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1924.

———. The Occult World. London: Trubner, 1881.

———. The "Occult World Phenomena," and the Society for Psychological Research. London: George Redway, 1886.

———. The Rationale of Mesmerism. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin, 1892.

Sirens

The sea nymphs of Greek mythology whose hypnotically sweet song lured mariners to their deaths. The island of the sirens had a meadow strewn with the bones of the victims of these deadly nymphs. In Homer's Odyssey, Odysseus has to steer his vessel past the island and takes the precaution of having his men fill their ears with wax to avoid hearing the siren song, while he himself is lashed to the vessel's mast. Jason and his band of heroes also had to sail past that island, but Orpheus sang so sweetly that he drowned out the song of the sirens. After Orpheus's song vanquished them, the sirens sprang into the sea and became rocks.

The sirens, two or three in number, were said to be the offspring of Phorcys or Achelous, and were part women, part birds. Some believed they were unhappy souls of the dead, envious of the living. The modern story of the Lorelei has something in common with the myths of the sirens.

The Sirius Mystery

Title of a book by Robert K. G. Temple (1972), discussing his discovery that a primitive African tribe, the Dogon of Mali in former French Sudan, apparently had been aware for centuries that the Dog Star Sirius was orbited by a white dwarf neighbor invisible to the naked eye and only recently discovered by astronomers. Temple claimed that this knowledge of the Dogon tribe was five thousand years old, that the white dwarf was known also to the ancient Egyptians in pre-dynastic times prior to 3200 B.C.E., and that the Dogon people may have partially descended from them. His idea was quickly integrated into the ancient astronaut hypothesis.

Sources:

Temple, Robert K. G. The Sirius Mystery. Folkstone, Kent, England: Bailey Brothers and Swinfen, 1972.

Sisters of the Amber

The Sisters of the Amber was an early New Age network around Merta Mary Parkinson. Parkinson headed two interlocking networks. The Dena Foundation catered to the general audience. The more committed female members were invited to be part of the Sisters of the Amber. Parkinson was intrigued by the healing power of amber, and she sent a piece of the fossil resin to each of the women who dedicated themselves to be linked to each other in a life of loving service.

Parkinson was among the early supporters of the Universal Link network, which developed in England in the 1960s and was active in the United States into the 1980s. She wrote several books, but her loosely organized network died soon after her death in 1983.

Sitchin, Zecharia

Zecharia Sitchin, an author of books offering an alternative history of the extraterrestrial origins of ancient humanity, was born in the 1920s in Baku, Russia. Soon after his birth his family moved to Palestine, where he grew up. He learned a variety of Near Eastern languages including Hebrew and Sumerian. He moved to England for college and attended both the London School of Economics and the University of London, from which he graduated with a degree in economics. He returned to Palestine, where he became a journalist. During World War II (1939–45) he served in the British Army. He moved to the United States in the mid-1950s.

In the 1970s, Sitchin's lifelong interest in the archeology of the Middle East culminated in a book, The 12th Planet, published in 1976. It appeared at the height of the ancient astronaut controversy that had been generated by claims of Erich von Däniken that he had discovered evidence of the presence of UFOs and extraterrestrials in the artifacts from various ancient cultures. Sitchin, out of his knowledge of ancient languages, proposed a new option concerning ancient history and lifted the debate to a new level. While the debate generated by von Däniken was largely resolved, Sitchin's hypothesis survived and has continued to be the subject of a series of books through the 1990s.

The von Däniken approach centered upon pictures from ancient sites that, taken out of context, could be seen as resembling contemporary astronauts and objects similar to items reported as unidentified flying objects. Sitchin started with a somewhat different hypothesis, that ancient mythology should be read as historical documents, as reports of actual occurrences. His starting point was the biblical book of Genesis, chapter 6, and the cryptic references to the sons of God marrying the daughters of men and the giants or nephilim who were on Earth in the era prior to the biblical flood. Using a variety of ancient documents, though primarily the Babylonian epic known as "Enuma Elish," he hypothesized the existence of another planet in our solar system, which he named Nibiru, that travels an elliptical orbit that brings it into the area between the orbits of Jupiter and Mars every 3,600 years. The planet is inhabited by a humanoid race called the Anunnaki, who created homo sapiens.

A war in the heavens, as described in the ancient Sumerian chronicles and the Bible, Sitchin believes, accounts for the ancients' knowledge of information that had only become available to modern science in recent centuries, especially the existence of the outer planets, Neptune, Uranus, and Pluto. He believes that the Anunnaki first arrived on Earth almost half a million years ago, their arrival motivated by the problem of an eroding atmosphere. They established a large gold mining operation in South Africa, and gold was shipped to Mesopotamia where the space port was set up to transport it to Nibiru. The Anunnaki created humans to work the mines, then later intermarried with their creation. The near approach of Nibiru around 11,000 B.C.E. led to the destructive flood recounted in Genesis. Noah and his family escaped in a submersible ship. After the flood, life began again with the Anunnaki's assistance.

Given the hypothesis of human interaction with the Anunnaki, Sitchin has been able to present an alternative reading of ancient history that, while ignored by the mainstream of modern archeologists and astronomers, has found a broad popular audience. The 12th Planet has been followed by five additional volumes, collectively termed the Earth Chronicles, that expand and undergird the original hypothesis. The most recent volume, The Cosmic Code, appeared in 1998.

Sitchin's hypothesis was given additional credibility by a lively debate among astronomers in the 1970s over the possible existence of an additional planet in the solar system, commonly referred to as Planet X. Sitchin identified Nibiru with the hypothesized Planet X. The astronomical debate, however, proceeded without reference to Sitchin, and by the 1990s astronomers had abandoned the search for Planet X. At the end of the 1990s, Alan F. Alford, whose 1998 book Gods of the New Millennium had been most supportive of Sitchin, attempted independently to verify Sitchin's hypothesis with his own research. In the end, however, he too abandoned Sitchin after encountering astronomical data suggesting the impossibility of some of Sitchin's claims about the way that Nibiru's close approach affected the Earth. He subsequently has produced a significant variant hypothesis that nevertheless retains much of Sitchin's alternative approach to history.

Sitchin resides in New York City. He has an Internet site: <http://www.crystalinks.com/sitchin.html>. There are a number of additional sites that discuss Sitchin's work.

Sources:

Alford, Alan F. Gods of the New Millennium. 1998. Reprint, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1999.

———. When the Gods Came Down. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 2000.

Sitchin, Zecharia. The Cosmic Code. New York: Avon, 1998.

———. The Stairway to Heaven. Santa Fe, N.Mex.: Bear & Co., 1993.

———. The 12th Planet. 1976. Reprint, Santa Fe, N.Mex.: Bear & Co., 1991.

———. The Wars of Gods and Men. Santa Fe, N.Mex.: Bear & Co., 1992.

SITU See Society for the Investigation of the Unexplained

Sivananda, Swami (1887–1963)

One of the most influential modern Hindu spiritual teachers, whose most important contribution was the wedding of the traditional concept of sannyas, the renounced life, with social service directed toward people in need. Born Kuppuswami Iyer on September 8, 1877, in Pattamadai, near Tirunelveli in southern India, he was a son of Vengu Iyer, a revenue official and devotee of the Hindu deity Siva. Kuppuswami was educated in Ettayapuram, attending the Rajah's High School, where he was a good scholar and proficient in athletics. In 1903 he matriculated and went on to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel College at Tiruchirappalli.

In 1905 he entered the Tanjore Medical Institute but was obliged to leave when the death of his father made it financially impossible to continue at the institute. He moved back to Tiruchirappalli, where he started a medical journal, Ambrosia, in 1909. Soon afterward, he supplemented his small income from the journal by working at a pharmacy in Madras.

In 1913 Kuppaswami decided to take up medical work in Malaya, where he eventually earned a reputation for combining medical work, spiritual observance, and selfless service to the poor. By 1920 he was working with three European doctors and managing a hospital. He became a member of the Royal Institute of Public Health, London, a member of the Royal Asiatic Society, London, and an associate of the Royal Sanitary Institute, London. In addition he published several books, including Household Remedies, Fruits and Health, Diseases and their Tamil Terms, Obstetric Ready Reckoner, and Fourteen Lectures on Public Health.

During his spare time, he studied traditional yoga and Vedanta, spending much time in meditation. In 1923 he became increasingly preoccupied with the desire to realize spiritual truth. He gave up his job and returned to India. He became a religious mendicant, making pilgrimages to Varanasi (Benares), Poona, Nasik, Pandharpur, and Hardwar, staying at ashrams. In Rishikesh in northern India, a traditional holy place, he was formally initiated as a sannyasi, or renunciate, by Swami Viswananda, an elderly monk, and became Swami Sivananda Saraswati on June 1, 1924.

For some time, he lived at Swargashram by the side of the river Ganges, subjecting himself to intense spiritual discipline and using his medical knowledge to help the sick. He also made pilgrimages to Kedarnath and Badrinath, holy places high in the Himalayan mountains. He excited great enthusiasm by his popular lectures, inspiring chanting and singing of spiritual verses. In 1933 he was invited to attend the birthday celebration of Swami Ram Tirtha in Lucknow, and he subsequently traveled through India inspiring a great spiritual revival.

Returning to Rishikesh, he established an ashram in abandoned cowsheds on the banks of the Ganges in March 1934. With the help of disciples and supporters, the humble premises, named Ananda Kutir (hut of bliss), grew into a large self-contained community with a temple, hospitals, a pharmacy, a printing press for literature, and even a post office. As the Divine Life Society, the ashram sent its spiritual literature all over the world.

The rapid and successful establishment of the ashram was accelerated by the swami's dynamic personality and an astonishingly simple financial routine involving the spending of all donations on the day of receipt. Hindu swamis traditionally renounce the accumulation of wealth, so all contributions were immediately applied to practical purposes—feeding the sadhus of the district, maintaining hospital and medical treatment for the poor, leper relief, building huts, and developing a printing department for literature.

Integral yoga, Sivananda's unique system, which combined the practices of the various branches of traditional yoga, and Vedanta were propagated in hundreds of books and pamphlets and in the several magazines issued by the swami. They were often printed on poor-quality paper in quaint English as well as in the vernacular, yet they powerfully influenced thousands of devotees all over the world.

The Sivananda Ashram or Divine Life Society became a kind of Shangri-La in the foothills of the Himalayas, a half unreal world poised between past and present, between materialism and religion, between popular and advanced teaching. Part of its strange power lay in its paradoxical contrasts as a world in miniature, where high government officials and maharajahs rubbed shoulders with wandering mendicants, saints, and rogues. Each day, the swami would receive visitors and resident monks, giving instructions with a few succinct words, a gift, or a good-humored joke. In the evening, he would preside over Satsang (association of the wise), a kind of religious meeting at which visitors, Indian or Western, were encouraged to lecture, sing, dance, or tell a joke. Many individuals underwent a sudden uprush of spiritual awareness in this highly charged atmosphere.

Sivananda was credited with many miracles, and his teaching was often manifested obliquely in the collective unconscious of the ashram itself. The key to someone's problem might come from a casual remark from a stranger or the events of the day. One of the quaint but practical mottoes of the swami was, "Do it now!" In the same succinct manner, he condensed all religious teachings of various creeds to the simple formula, "Serve—Love—Give—Purify—Meditate—Realise. Be Good—Do Good—Be Kind—Be Compassionate. Inquire 'Who am I?'—Know the Self, and Be Free!"

Many swamis now well known in the Western world were disciples of Swami Sivananda or were influenced by his teachings. These include Swami Vishnudevananda (famous teacher of hatha yoga), Swami Venkateshananda, Swami Hridayananda (a woman, formerly an eye surgeon), Swami Satchidananda (founder of Integral Yoga Institute), Swami Jyotir Maya Nanda, Swami Nadabrahmananda (famous for his application of yoga principles to music), and Swami Sivananda Radha (Western founder of the Yasodhara Ashram).

After the death of Swami Sivananda on July 14, 1963, his successor as president of the ashram was his leading disciple, Swami Chidananda, the secretarial work continuing in the hands of Swami Krishananda.

Sivananda wrote a great number of books, and several biographies about him have been published. There are also two recordings of life at the Sivananda Ashram: The Sounds of Yoga-Vedanta: Documentary of Life in an Indian Ashram (Folkways Records, 33 1/3 rpm, Album 8970) and Sounds of Sivananda Ashram, volumes 1 and 2 (two C60 cassette tapes), issued by Ashram Records, Box 9, Kootenay Bay, BC, Canada VOB 1X0.

Sources:

Ananthanarayan, N. From Man to God-Man. New Delhi: The Author, 1970.

Krishnananda, Swami. Swami Sivananda and the Spiritual Renaissance. Sivanandanagar, India: Sivananda Literature Research Institute, 1959.

Omkarananda, Swami. In Sivananda Literature. Rishikesh, India: Sivananda Literature Research Institute, 1960.

Sivananda, Swami. Practical Lessons in Yoga. Sivanandanagar, India: Divine Life Society, 1978.

———. Practice of Karma Yoga. Sivanandanagar: Divine Life Society, 1980.

———. Sadhana. Sivanandanagar: Divine Life Society, 1967.

———. Science of Yoga. 18 vols. Durban, South Africa: Sivananda Press, 1977.

Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers See International Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers

Sixth Sense

The theory of the existence of a sixth sense as a convenient explanation of paranormal phenomena was first put forward in the era of animal magnetism by Tardy de Monravel in his Essai sur la Théorie du Somnambulisme Magnétique (1785). Departing from his mesmerist contemporaries, he considered the sixth sense as the source and sum of all our partial senses. (His colleagues attempted to explain clairvoyance and prevision by positing the existence of a "magnetic fluid.")

More recently the sixth sense has been given prominence as Charles Richet's comprehensive term for the phenomena of telepathy, clairvoyance, psychometry, premonition, prediction, crystal gazing, and phantasmal appearances. They were, in Richet's view, manifestations of a new unknown sense that perceives the vibrations of reality. The conception is largely an attempt to do away with the spirit hypothesis, making its invocation unnecessary. Richet admitted, however, that the working of this sense is incomprehensible when a choice has to be made between vibrations of reality, for instance in the case of a book test, when the sensitive is called upon to read a certain line on a certain page in a certain book that nobody has opened.

His main argument in favor of his theory was that the hypothesis of the sixth sense as a new physiological notion contradicted nothing that we learn from physiology, whereas the spirit hypothesis does. A hint of Richet's term survived in the concept of extrasensory perception as used by J. B. Rhine.

Sources:

Richet, Charles Notre Sixième Sens. Paris: Editions Montaigne, 1928.

Sinel, Joseph. The Sixth Sense. London: T. W. Laurie, 1927.

The Skeptic (Newsletter)

Newsletter issued by a group associated with CSICOP (the Committee for Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal) and formerly named The British & Irish Skeptic. It is published four times a year, and the first issue (January/February 1987) included notes on the James Randi exposure of faith healer Peter Popoff, Ireland's claimed phenomena of Marian apparitions at Knock, and moving statues. The newsletter is edited by Wendy M. Grossman, at The Skeptic, PO Box 475, Manchester M60 2TH, England. Website: <http://www.cix.co.uk/~philmck/skeptic/>.

Sources:

The Skeptic. <http://www.cix.co.uk/~philmck/skeptic/>. March 8, 2000.

Skeptics Society

The Skeptics Society, one of the major American groups challenging claims to paranormal and supernatural reality which it considers largely in the realm of pseudoscience, was founded in 1991 by Michael Shermer, Pat Linse, and Kim Ziel Shermer. Michael Shermer, formerly a professional cyclist, completed his Ph.D. in the history of science in 1991. A former member of the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal (CSICOP), he felt that much more could be done in public education in this area by an organization that was located in the media nexus of Los Angeles and aggressively used radio and television as educational tools. He also wanted to launch a periodical that would allow for articles presenting more in-depth treatments of subjects and original research articles. Shortly after its founding, the society launched a quarterly newsstand magazine, Skeptic, which has a circulation of 40,000.

While focused upon claims of a psychic or occult nature, and the investigation of claims of supernatural miracles, the society has also involved itself in a variety of controversial issues of a scientific, psychological, historical, and religious nature, where no claim of paranormal or miraculous phenomena is present. Thus, while attacking such phenomena as claims to spirit contact or UFOs, the society has also attacked Holocaust denial as pseudo history and joined in the general denigration of minority religions (popularly called cults). Any issues that arise in public debate and include a crucial element of scientific (or social scientific) information in their resolution is considered an area of consideration.

The society currently pursues its expansive program through a monthly lecture series at the California Institute of Technology; an annual conference; a weekly radio show, "Science Talk," on the Southern California NPR affiliate, KPCC; and a national weekly television show on the Fox Family Channel. The society carries out its education through a book service that sells skeptical literature and cassette tapes. The Skeptics Society may be contacted at P.O. Box 338, Altadena, CA 91001. Its website can be found at <http://www.skeptic.com/>.

Sources:

Shermer, Michael. Denying History. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2000.

———. How We Believe: The Search for God in an Age of Science. New York: W. H. Freeman and Co., 2000.

———. Why People Believe Weird Things. New York: W. H. Freeman and Co., 1997.

Skoob Occult Review

Modern occult periodical reviving the title of the former Occult Review, which flourished in Britain from 1877 to 1948. Skoob Occult Review commenced publication in the spring of 1990 and has been published irregularly by Scoop Two Books, which has become a significant London-based occult publishing house and bookstore. The substantive periodical focuses on magic, occult, and esoteric subjects. Address: Skoob Two Books, 19 Bury Pl., London, WC1 2JH England.

Skotograph

A term (from the Greek for "dark-writing") proposed by Felicia Scatcherd for psychographs, spirit writing on photographic plates in unopened packets, and similar effects. Scatcherd was a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, and helped W. T. Stead found Julia's Bureau. She was associated with the study of psychic photography. She died in 1927.

Madge Donohoe, widow of Martin H. Donohoe, British war correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, was known to produce a bewildering variety of skotographs—landscapes (often peopled), flowers, star constellations, jewels, birds, dogs, hands, eyes, and faces. Her gift was tested by F. W. Warrick, a chemical manufacturer and well-known British psychical researcher.

SKS See Specialist Knowledge Services

Skylook Bulletin See Mutual UFO Network (MUFON)

Skynet (Project)

Founded in 1965 by a team of physicists, engineers, scientists, and other individuals interested in UFO research. Project Skynet conducted scientifically-oriented research into UFOs in the Los Angeles and southern California area, investigated sightings worldwide, engaged in statistical studies, operated a tracking system to help identify UFOs, and worked with other UFO networks. Leaders of Skynet held no socioeconomic or philosophical opinions on the sightings, though individuals associated with it had reached various conclusions. Among those associated with Skynet was Ann Druffel, now an investigator for the Mutual UFO Network.

Skywatch (Journal)

Former quarterly publication of the Manchester Aerial Phenomena Investigation Team in England. Each issue included reports on local UFO sightings, information from other areas, letters from readers, and editorial comment on ufology.

Slade, Henry (d. 1905)

Controversial American medium, best known for his slate-writing phenomena. He was familiar to the American public for 15 years when the choice fell on him to demonstrate paranormal phenomena in St. Petersburg, Russia, before the investigators of the university of that city. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky and Henry S. Olcott, cofounders of the Theosophical Society, were asked to find a suitable medium and sit with him for weeks. They testified to “messages inside double slates, sometimes tied and sealed together, while they either lay upon the table in full view of all, or were laid upon the heads of members of the committee, or held flat against the under surface of the table-top, or held in a committee man’s hand without the medium touching it.”

En route to Russia, Slade arrived in England on July 13, 1876. He gave many sittings in London and was examined by both Spiritualists and non-Spiritualists. Besides slate writing he produced partial materializations and strong telekinesis phenomena. Observers reported seeing tables being moved, matter passing through matter, levitation, and musical instruments played by invisible hands. For six weeks all went well, his fame spread, and J. Enmore Jones, the editor of The Spiritual Magazine, declared that he was taking the place vacated by the great medium D. D. Home. The World wrote in a long article on August 30, 1876:

“Then came more and violent knockings at the table, a chair at the farthest corner from Dr. Slade was lifted rapidly in the air and hurled to the ground without visible agency. My coat and trousers were plucked violently, and I was pinched and patted, all with great rapidity, and in quarters which it seemed absolutely impossible Dr. Slade could reach. A hand appeared and disappeared fitfully, but with unmistakable reality, close to me; and when the slate was produced with a similar crumb of pencil, once on it when it was held under the table, and once under it when it was placed on the table, messages of various kinds were inscribed rapidly and in different handwritings. One, the longest, was of a religious character, and inculcated the usual religious lessons. Others were in reply to questions in which I pressed hard for a communication on some subject which could be only known to myself.”

The article on the séance at which the reporter was alone with Slade and, presumably from the context, in daylight, concluded: “I had not, and have not, a glimmering of an idea how the effects described had been produced, and I came away inexpressibly puzzled and perplexed.”

Slade was visited by men of science who were unable to explain what they saw. Lord Rayleigh stated at a meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in September 1876 that he had attended a séance with Slade in the company of a professional conjurer, who admitted that he was completely puzzled. Slade convinced Alfred Russel Wallace of his genuine powers and “finally” solved the doubts of skeptic Frank Podmore as to the truth of Spiritualism.

Podmore, author of the skeptical work Modern Spiritualism (1902), preserved silence in his later writings over this stage of his beliefs, but he frankly admitted that he was profoundly impressed by Slade’s performance.

Then, early in September 1876, at the peak of his fame, Slade was entangled in a serious controversy with accusations of fraud. Ray Lankester, who was outvoted as a member of the Selecting Committee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science when William F. Barrett’s paper on Spiritualism was admitted, intended to strike a deadly blow at this new “superstition” and when Edward William Cox told him of the puzzling slate-writing demonstrations of Slade, he went to Slade with his friend Dr. Donkin determined to unmask the medium at whatever cost.

He paid the usual fee of a pound, and in the second sitting he suddenly seized the slate before the writing was supposed to have taken place. He found a message ready, published his exposure on September 16 in The Times, and brought an action against the medium for obtaining money under false pretenses.

Over this exposure a fierce controversy ensued. Besides Lankester the skeptics were represented by Henry Sidgwick,

R. H. Hatton, Edmund Gurney, and W. B. Carpenter. According to Podmore,

“... the Spiritualists were perhaps justified in not accepting the incident as conclusive. Slade defended himself by asserting that, immediately before the slate was snatched from his hand, he heard the spirit writing, and had said so, but that his words were lost in the confusion which followed. If we grant that Slade’s testimony was as good as Prof. Lankester’s or Dr. Donkin’s it was difficult summarily to dismiss this plea.”

The case came up for trial at the Bow Street Police Court, London, on October 1, 1876. Evidence in favor of the genuineness of Slade’s mediumship was given by Wallace, Cox, and George Wyld. Only four witnesses were allowed. The magistrate overruled their evidence, saying that he must base his decision on “inferences to be drawn from the known course of nature,” and, on the ground of the deposition of Lankester and Donkin, he sentenced Slade, under the Vagrancy Act, to three months’ imprisonment with hard labor.

In the course of the appeal, the conviction was nullified on technical grounds and Slade quickly left for the Continent before Lankester could obtain a fresh summons. However, Slade wrote from Prague, Czechoslovakia, offering exhaustive private tests to Lankester if he would let him come. To this he received no answer, nor did Slade come to London again until 1878, and later in 1887 under the assumed name of “Dr. Wilson.”

Armed with many testimonies of Spiritualists and other people of distinction against the blot of the conviction, Slade spent interesting months on the Continent in the Hague, in Berlin, and in Denmark. In Berlin, Bellachini, the famous conjurer, testified on oath to his powers.

In St. Petersburg the séances were satisfactory, but owing to the disturbed state of Russia the investigation did not assume the character originally intended. A successful sitting was given to the Grand Duke Constantine in the presence of Alexander Aksakof and one Professor Boutlerof. According to an account there had been accidentally two bits of pencil on the slate. When he held it under the table the writing of two pencils was heard at the same time and when he drew out the slate it was found that one pencil had written from left to right, the other from right to left.

In December 1877, the experiments of Johann Zöllner, well-known in psychical literature, commenced in Leipzig. Zöllner hoped to establish his theory of four-dimensional space. Professors Fechner, Scheibner, and Weber participated in the investigation. Writing on sealed slates was produced under the strictest test conditions, knots were tied on an endless string, there were remarkable displays of force, and the apparent penetration of matter through matter was several times demonstrated.

After this brilliant success, Slade went to Paris and placed himself at the disposal of Camille Flammarion, “but I obtained nothing certain,” stated Flammarion. He added:

“In the cases that did succeed, there was possible substitution of slates. Tired of so much loss of time, I agreed with Admiral Mouchez, director of the observatory of Paris, to confide to Slade a double slate prepared by ourselves, with the precautions which were necessary in order that we should not be entrapped. The two slates were sealed in such a way with paper of the observatory that if he took them apart he could not conceal the fraud. He accepted the conditions of the experiment. I carried the slates to his apartment. They remained under the influence of the medium, in this apartment, not a quarter of an hour, not a half hour or an hour, but ten consecutive days, and when he sent them back to us there was not the least trace of writing inside.”

Charles Richet writes of the same period:

“I saw Slade once with Gibier. Slade handed me a slate and put a small fragment of a slate-pencil on it. I held one end and Slade the other, and we put the slate under the table. In a few moments we heard a noise as of writing. There was some writing and the bit of slate-pencil was worn. But I give this experiment (my only one of the kind) under all reserves: (1) It was long ago; (2) I cannot find the notes I took; (3) Slade's honesty is open to question; and (4) Experiments with slates lend themselves to trickery."

The next stage of Slade's career was his visit to Australia. His activities there were recorded in a book by James Curtis titled Rustlings in the Golden City (1894).

In 1885, he appeared before the Seybert Commission in Philadelphia. He was caught in glaring fraud. On one occasion, the sitters distinctly saw that his foot, before he had time to get it back into its slipper, was the instrument of claimed telekinetic phenomena. Once a slate, resting against the leg of the table, was upset by a sitter. It was seen that it had a message on it prepared in advance.

The writing obtained was generally of two kinds. The general messages were very legible and clearly punctuated, but when the communication came in answer to questions it was clumsy, scarcely legible, abrupt and vague. It bore traces of hasty work under difficult conditions, as these impromptu messages could not be prepared in advance.

According to the Seybert Committee's report, Slade declared that Zöllner watched him closely only during the first three or four sittings, but afterward let him do as he pleased. This was the starting point of Fullerton's trip to Germany to interview Zöllner's surviving colleagues in an attempt to discredit his favorable findings.

The exposure by the Seybert Commission was preceded by J. W. Truesdell's revelations. In Bottom Facts of Spiritualism (1883), he claimed to have caught Slade in cheating and narrates an amusing incident. He had discovered a slate with a prepared message in the séance room. He stealthily added another message of his own: "Henry, look out for this fellow; he is up to snuff—Alcinda." He says that he enjoyed Slade's discomfort when, at the appropriate moment, the unrehearsed message came to light.

Another highly damaging incident was recorded on February 2, 1886, in the Boston Herald, namely an account of the denunciation of Slade as an impostor in Weston, West Virginia. Both Slade and his business manager were arrested but they were afterward released without prosecution.

During the last years of his life Slade fell victim to alcohol addiction; his moral standing was far from high, and he sank lower and lower. He died penniless and in mental decrepitude in a Michigan sanatorium in 1905.

Sources:

Curtis, James. Rustlings in the Golden City. Ballard, 1894.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Truesdell, J. W. Bottom Facts of Spiritualism. New York, 1883.

Slater, John (1861–1932)

American clairvoyant who, for 50 years, gave remarkable demonstrations of reading sealed letters and giving names, data, and specific information on deceased people from the platform. He traveled all over the United States and attracted big audiences. In 1930, he established his right to function as a medium in Detroit, Michigan. A clergyman had him arrested for making predictions, then a statutory offense, but he won the case with costs and continued his work thereafter undisturbed. He later moved to San Francisco.

Sources:

Slater, John. "Memories." National Spiritualist (September 1926).

Slater, Thomas (ca. 1872)

British spirit photographer, the first after the initial success of Frederick A. Hudson in England. He was an established optician and amateur photographer in London. After a sitting with Hudson in 1872, he experimented at his own home and, the family being mediumistic, obtained striking success.

By the side of a portrait of his sister two heads appeared on the plate. One of them was unmistakably Lord Brougham, the other, much less distinct, was recognized by Slater as Robert Dale Owen. The curious thing about this picture is that in 1856, when Slater was holding a séance with Lord Brougham and Robert Dale Owen, it was predicted by raps that the time would come when he would be engaged in spirit photography. Owen immediately remarked that if dead at the time he would attempt to appear.

Alfred Russell Wallace believed that the Slater pictures were genuine.

Slate Writing

A form of direct writing, or "autography," that has been one of the popular phenomena of séances. The method is the same in the majority of cases. The medium and the sitter take their seats at opposite ends of a small table, each grasping a corner of an ordinary school slate that they thus hold firmly pressed against the underside of the table. A small fragment of slate-pencil is first enclosed between slate and table, for the use of the spirit-writer. Should the séance be successful, a scratching sound, as of someone writing on a slate, is heard at the end of a few moments; three loud raps indicate the conclusion of the message; and on the withdrawal of the slate, it is found to be partly covered with writing—either a general message from the spirit world, or an answer to some question previously written down by the sitter.

Among the mediums who were most successful in obtaining spirit writing in this manner were Henry Slade and William Eglinton. The former, an American medium, came to England in 1876 and succeeded in mystifying a number of people of education and of scientific attainments. His critics attributed his success, in part at least, to his frank and engaging manner.

Ray Lankester exposed his trickery, and Henry Slade was prosecuted. Although sentenced to three months' hard labor, the omission of certain words in the accusation made the conviction of no effect. But Slade found that England had become too hot for him and speedily left.

Many of the accounts of his séances in different countries are of interest, chiefly because of the discrepancy that exists between the observations of credulous Spiritualists and those of trained investigators. Richard Hodgson, however, has pointed out that even in the latter class, instances of flawed observation were the rule rather than the exception, particularly where sleight of hand played a prominent part.

William Eglinton was a worthy successor to Slade as a medium for slate-writing manifestations and attained extraordinary popularity, with more than a hundred people testifying to his mediumistic powers in the Spiritualist journal Light. Speaking of Eglinton's performances, C. C. Massey of the Psychological Society said: "Many, of whom I am one, are of the opinion that the case for these phenomena generally, and for autography, in particular, is already complete."

Eglinton's manifestations were produced in full light, and his séances were seldom without results, so it is hardly surprising that many persons, ignorant of the lengths to which conjuring can be carried and overconfident in their own ability to observe correctly, should have seen in slate-writing a phenomenon explicable only by a Spiritualist theory.

But there was definite proof of fraud in several cases. Muslin and a false beard, part of the make-up of a "spirit," had been found in Eglinton's portmanteau, and various persons declared that they had seen his messages written on prepared slates previous to séances.

Other well-known exponents of slate-writing were Fred P. Evans and Laura A. Pruden.

Spiritualists themselves responded to exposures by asserting that fraud might occasionally be practiced by genuine mediums, owing to the uncertainty of the "power" and the constant expectation of phenomena. Particularly was this so in the case of professional mediums, who felt obliged to produce some results, and who had to resort to trickery when other means failed them.

S. J. Davey, an associate of the Society for Psychical Research, London, having discovered the tricks of slate-writing, practiced them himself and was accordingly claimed by certain Spiritualists as a medium as well as a conjurer, notwithstanding his protestations to the contrary! This was undoubtedly a powerful argument against the good faith of slate-writing. If his sitters could mistake these sleight-of-hand tricks (which Davey practiced with the express purpose of discrediting professional mediums) for genuine spirit manifestations, they might also be misled by the legerdmain of Slade and Eglinton, and other well-known mediums. It has been objected that even a skilled conjurer such as Professor Hoffmann (Angelo J. Lewis) professed himself mystified by slate-writing performances.

The methods adopted by Davey were of a simple nature, requiring little or no apparatus. In the case of a long, general message, he would prepare a slate beforehand and substitute it for the test slate. A shorter message, or a reply to a question, he would write on the reverse side of the slate, with a scrap of pencil fastened in a thimble, and so withdraw the slate that the side written on would be uppermost. There is reason to believe that similar devices were used in other séances for their simplicity and the absence of all apparatus rendered them particularly difficult to detect. But where the sitters were more credulous, intricate furniture and appliances were used and the most elaborate preparations made for the séance.

Slate writing is now a largely discredited phenomenon because it is open to conjuring fraud and it has never required anything in the nature of the reverent atmosphere of a Spiritualist séance. The businesslike way in which vague messages or answers to questions are obtained does not suggest either spirit agency or the operation of a paranormal faculty.

Sources:

Abbott, David P. Behind the Scenes with the Mediums. Chicago: Open Court; London: Kegan Paul, 1909.

———. The Revelations of a Spirit Medium. St. Paul: Farrington, 1891. Rev. ed., edited by Harry Price and E. J. Dingwall. London: Kegan Paul, 1922.

Farmer, John S. Twixt Two Worlds: A Narrative of the Life and Work of William Eglinton. London: The Psychological Press, 1886.

Owen, J. J. Psychography: Marvelous Manifestations of Psychic Power Given Through the Mediumship of Fred P. Evans. San Francisco, 1893.

Slavs

The early Slavonic races passed down an extensive demonology embedded in a polytheistic religious system. It included reference to spirits of nature. According to folklorist F. S. Krauss:

"In the vile, also known as Samovile, Samodivi, and Vilivrajci, we have near relations to the forest and field spirits or the wood and moss-folk of Middle Germany, France and Bavaria, the 'wild people' of Hesse, Eifel, Salzburg and the Tyrol, the woodwomen and woodmen of Bohemia, the Tyrolese Fanggen, Fanken, Norkel and Happy Ladies, the Roumanish Orken, Euguane, and Dialen, the Danish Ellekoner, the Swedish Skogsnufvaz, and the Russian Ljesje, while in certain respects they have affinity with the Teutonic Valkyries."

The vila were, however, more like divine beings, constantly watching over and controlling the destiny of mortals. They were prayed to or exorcised on all occasions. In short, their origin was shamanistic.

Nineteenth-century American writer and folklorist Charles Godfrey Leland remarked of this unseen spirit world, "We can still find the vila as set forth in old ballads, the incarnation of beauty and power, the benevolent friend of sufferers, the geniuses of heroes, the dwellers by rock and river and greenwood tree. But they are implacable in their wrath to all who deceive them, or who break a promise. Nay, they inflict terrible punishment even on those who disturb their rings, or the dances which they make by midsummer moonlight. Hence the proverb applied to any man who suddenly fell ill, 'he stepped on a fairy ring.'"

There were three varieties of nature spirits among the southern Slavs: the Zracne vile, or aerial spirits, which were evilly disposed to human beings and inflicted serious injuries upon them; will-'o-the-wisps, which led people astray by night; the pozemne vile, companionable spirits who gave sage counsel to humankind and dwelled in the earth; and the podovne vile, or water spirits, kindly to people on shore but somewhat treacherous in their own element.

Another water spirit was the likho, the Slavonic Polyphemus, a dreaded and terrible monster. The leshy was a wood demon, Norka was the frightful lord of the lower world, and Koschei was a kind of ogre whose specialty was the abduction of princesses.

Witchcraft

The witch was frequently mentioned in Slavonic folktales, especially among the southern Slavs. She was called vjestica (masculine viestae), meaning originally "the knowing one" or "the well-informed one." In Dalmatia and elsewhere among the southern Slavs the witch was called krstaca, "the crossed," in allusion to the idea that she was of the horned race of hell. It was said that it enraged the witches so much to be called by this word that when they heard that anyone had used it they went to his house by night and tore him into four pieces, which they cast to the four winds of heaven, and drove away all his cattle and stock. Therefore, the shrewd farmers of the country called the witch hmana zena, or "common woman."

There were many forms of Slavonic witches, however, and the vjestica differed from the macionica and the latter from the zlokobnica, or "evil-meeter," whom it was unlucky to encounter in the morning and who possessed the evil eye.

One Serbian authority related that he had often heard that "every female Wallach [Slav] as soon as she is forty years old, abandons the 'God be with us,' and becomes a witch (vjestica) or at least a zlokobnica or macionica. A real witch has the mark of a cross under her nose, a zlokobnica has some hairs of a beard, and a macionica may be known by a forehead full of dark folds with blood-spots in her face."

In southern Slavonian countries on St. George's Day, the peasants adorned the horns of the cattle with garlands to protect them from witches. They attached great importance to a seventh or a twelfth child, believing that children born in that order were the great protectors of the world against witchcraft. But children of that order were thought to be in great danger on St. John's Eve, for then the witches, having the most power, attacked them with stakes or the stumps of saplings, which is why the peasantry carefully removed everything of the kind from the ground in the autumn.

The Slavs believed that on St. George's Day the witches climbed into the steeples of churches to get the grease from the axle of the bell, which, for some reason, they greatly prized.

The krstnik, or wizards, notoriously attracted female vila, who in most instances desired to be their mistresses, just as female salamanders desired to mate with men. (See the Curiosa of Heinrich Kornmann, 1666.) The man who gained the love of a vila was supposed to be extremely lucky.

Transformation stories were also fairly common in Slavonic folklore, which indicates that this was a form of magic practiced by the witches of those countries. (See also Seventh Son)

Slawensik Poltergeist

A curious poltergeist case in 1806 in the Castle of Slawensik, Upper Silesia. Councillor Hahn, in the service of the Prince of Hohenlohe, was directed to proceed to Slawensik, where he stayed in the castle with his old friend Charles Kern, attended by John, Hahn's servant.

On the third day of their residence, the disturbances commenced with a shower of lime, apparently from the ceiling. This was repeated the next day, accompanied by the sound of heavy blows. Soon afterward, noises like a beating drum and a sound as if someone was walking around the room with slippers on and striking a stick on the door were heard. Soon various small articles in the room were thrown around, including knives, forks, brushes, caps, slippers, padlocks, funnels, snufflers, and soap, while lights darted from corner to corner. The showers of lime and heavy noises continued. Various witnesses were called and confirmed the phenomena.

One day, Kern saw a figure in the mirror staring at him, apparently interposed between himself and the glass. Another evening, Hahn was about to shave when the soapbox, razor, brush, and soap flew at him and fell at his feet. When he tried to sleep he was awakened by the heavy noises, and once it seemed as if someone had sprinkled water on him while he lay in bed, although he could find no water.

Hahn then made a journey to Breslau, but when he returned he was told that rather than be alone, Kern had asked Hahn's servant John to stay in the room with him.

As Kern lay in his bed, John was talking to him when he saw a jug of beer slowly lift to a height of about three feet and pour into a glass until it was half full. The jug was then gently replaced and the glass lifted and emptied as if by some invisible specter. John exclaimed in terrified surprise, "Lord Jesus! It swallows!" The glass was quietly replaced.

After some time, the disturbances ceased as suddenly as they had begun. Hahn wrote a detailed narrative of the events and signed it November 19, 1808. Many years later the castle was destroyed by lightning, and among the ruins was found the coffinless skeleton of a man, his skull split open and a sword by his side. It was believed by some that Kern may have been a powerful sensitive.

Sources:

Crowe, Catherine. The Night Side of Nature; or, Ghosts and Ghost Seers. N.p., 1848. Reprint, Philadelphia: R. West, 1978.

Sleep

A state of unconsciousness or partial consciousness in which, according to psychical belief, the human organism is being perpetually replenished with energy from an unseen world. Hereward Carrington, writing in Your Psychic Powers and How to Develop Them (1920), notes: "Various theories have been advanced in the past to explain sleep, but no satisfactory theory has even been fully accepted. Thus we have the so-called 'chemical theories,' which endeavor to account for sleep by assuming that certain poisonous substances are formed in the body during waking hours and are eliminated during sleep. Others have suggested that sleep is due to peculiar conditions of the circulations of blood in the brain; still others that the action of certain glands explains sleep; others that muscular relaxation accounts for it, others that the lack of external stimuli is sufficient to induce profound slumber. All these theories have been shown insufficient to explain the facts. We shall never arrive at a satisfactory theory of sleep, doubtless, until we admit the presence of a vital force and the existence of an individual human spirit which withdraws more or less completely from the body during the hours of sleep, and derives spiritual invigoration and nourishment during its sojourn in the spiritual world."

In the paranormal phenomena observed in dreams and the hypnotic state, F. W. H. Myers found indications that "the self of sleep is a spirit freed from ordinary material limitations, and this conclusion conforms to the hypothesis that we live in two worlds; the waking personality is adapted to the needs of terrestrial life, the personality of sleep maintains the fundamental connection between the spiritual world and the organism, so as to provide the latter with energy while developing itself by the exercise of its spiritual powers."

Related to theories of sleep are theories on astral projection, also known as OBE (out-of-body experience) or soul traveling, in which the soul is said to leave its body, and travel about the astral plane. People who experience this, claim OBEs eliminate their fears of death, while convincing them of their connection to the spiritual realm. Writer Sylvan J. Muldoon, explains the theory through his own experience: "the astral body disincarnates during sleep for the purpose of recharging and the depth of sleep and the amount of recuperation depend upon the distance between the astral and physical bodies; i.e., the greater the distance of separation, the freer the inflow of cosmic energy, or prana, into it." Precursors to astral projection are lucid dreaming (an awareness of the self in dream state) and interrupted sleep (in which the physical body arises during the sleep state).

Considerable study is presently being conducted in the area of Rapid Eye Movement (REM) sleep. REM sleep is said to constitute between 20 and 50 percent of sleep activity. During this type of sleep, the brain seems to behave as if the body is awake: brainwave activity is high, heart rate increases, and sexual stimulation occurs. It is during this REM period that most of the night's dream activity—and perhaps paranormal activity—occurs.

While the increased neural activity during REM sleep may facilitate the development and maturation of the nervous system in infants, the role of REM in adults remains unclear. William C. Dement of the Stanford Sleep Disorders Clinic proposes some of the possibilities:

"There is strong evidence that REM sleep plays a role in the regulation of mood and/or drive; that it is related in some way to excitability of the central nervous system; and that its suppression may in some way jeopardize the learning and memory functions. The occurrence of large amounts of REM sleep among newborn infants remains possibly the most provocative puzzle of all; it suggests a very important role for REM in the earliest stages of life."

Another subject currently receiving significant attention is sleep deprivation. Murphy, in an article written for the Atlantic Monthly (1996), asserts Americans living a century ago could sleep 20% longer than the average American today. Ten million Americans each year seek medical, alternative medical, or therapeutic help for the treatment of sleeping disorders. Also sleep deprivation is thought to be a greater contributor to traffic fatalities than intoxication. Severe sleep deprivation is known to cause substantial detrimental alterations in both behavior and perception. Since a considerable amount of people who have been deprived of sleep report paranormal experiences, there exists the question of what role sleep deprivation plays in perceived paranormal incidents.

Sources:

Angoff, Allan, ed. The Psychic Force: Essays in Modern Psychological Research from the International Journal of Parapsychology. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970.

Bigelow, J. The Mystery of Sleep. London: Unwin; New York: Harper, 1903.

Braid, James. Newrypnology; or, The Rationale of Nervous Sleep. London, 1843. Reprint, AMS Press, 1976.

Cohen, D. Sleep and Dreaming: Origins, Nature and Functions. New York: Pergamon Press, 1981.

Crookall, Robert. During Sleep: The Possibility of "Cooperation" Between the Living and the Dead. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Dement, William C. Sleepwatchers. Stanford: Stanford Alumni Association, 1992.

———. Some Must Watch While Some Must Sleep: Exploring the World of Sleep. San Francisco: San Francisco Book, 1976. Reprint, New York: Norton, 1978.

Green, Celia E. Lucid Dreams. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1968.

Hammon, A Christopher. "If You Don't Snooze, You Lose: Getting a Good Night's Sleep is Critical to Productivity and Creativity." <http://www.quantaldynamics.com>. September 27, 1997.

Jones, Richard M. The New Psychology of Dreaming. New York: Grune & Stratton, 1970.

Jyotir Maya Nanda, Swami. Waking, Dream, and Sleep. Miami, Fla.: Yoga Research Foundation, 1974.

Muldoon, Sylvan, and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Murphy, Cullen. "Hello Darkness: Dealing with Yet Another Deficit." Atlantic Monthly March 1996. 22–24.

Perl, James. Sleep Right in Five Nights. New York: William Morrow and Co., Inc. 1993.

Taylor, Albert. Soul Traveler. Covina, Calif.: Verity Press, 1996.

Ullman, Montague, and Stanley Krippner. Dream Studies and Telepathy: An Experimental Approach. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

The Sleeping Preacher (1794– ?)

Rachel Baker, known as "the Sleeping Preacher," was born at Pelham, Massachusetts, in 1794. When she was nine years old, her parents moved to Marcellus, New York. As a child she had religious training, her parents being devout people, and she manifested a strong conviction about sinfulness. In 1811 she showed symptoms of somnambulism, in which she seemed stricken with horror and despondency. But gradually her mind became calmer, and she delivered discourses of singular clarity, marked by a devout and solemn tone. Reportedly, these fits of somnambulism, or trance-speaking, seized her regularly every day.

She began and concluded her devotional exercises with prayer, between which came the discourse. Then a period of apparent physical distress appeared, characterized by shaking, sobs, and groans. At length the paroxysms passed, and she would fall into a natural sleep. Change of scene did not affect these exercises, but the administration of opium would interrupt them.

Such trance sermons later became an integral phenomenon of the Spiritualist movement. Among famous later trance speakers were Nettie Colburn (Henrietta Maynard), remembered for the trance address before Abraham Lincoln, and Louis Anne Meurig Morris in Britain. Trance addresses of an inspirational or a spiritually guiding nature became an important part of the modern New Age movement under the label channeling.

Sources:

Devotional Somnium; or a Collection of Prayers and Exhortations Uttered by Rachel Baker . . . During her Abstracted and Unconscious State. New York, 1815.

Remarkable Sermons of Rachel Baker and Pious Ejaculations Delivered During Sleep Taken Down in Shorthand. London, 1815.

Sloan, John C. (1870–1951)

British physical medium of Glasgow, Scotland. He worked as a packer in a warehouse and later operated a small shop. Unlike many professional mediums, he accepted no remuneration for his séances, and worked without the use of a cabinet. He had as a spirit control "White Feather," a Native American, a genial personality who preferred to be called "Whitey." He spoke both through the medium's vocal organs and provided direct voice phenomena through a trumpet.

To have the medium at the disposal of the British College of Psychic Science, James Hewat McKenzie found employment for Sloan in a London garage and made him accessible to various experimenters. After his return to Glasgow, Sloan cooperated in experiments with J. Arthur Findlay.

In 1924, Findlay published a small book on his findings: An Investigation of Psychic Phenomena, with a preface by Sir William Barrett. This was followed by a larger volume: On the Edge of the Etheric (1931), in which Findlay graded his evidential cases A1 and A2, according to the quality of the evidence.

Examining three of the 180 A1 communications, he stated: "An eminent mathematician on calculating the chances of correctly guessing all the facts recorded, answers that to have reached such accuracy, represented the equivalent of 1 to 5,000,000,000,000 in other words the odds were 5,000,000,000,000 to 1 against chance being the explanation."

Sources:

Findlay, J. Arthur. An Investigation of Psychic Phenomena. N.p., 1924.

———. On the Edge of the Etheric. London: Rider, 1931.

Slocum, John (1842–1897)

John Slocum, a Native American prophet and visionary, was a member of the Squaxin people who resided on Puget Sound in the state of Washington. Among his people he was known as Squ-sacht-un. As a young man he had lived on the Skokomish reservation, where he attended a Presbyterian church and also became familiar with the Roman Catholic faith. In October of 1881 he found himself giving strong consideration to the problems that afflicted the Native Americans of Puget Sound and the manner in which they had been ravaged by alcohol, gambling, and general immorality. He was himself among the guilty. As he contemplated his condition, he became ill and apparently died one morning about 4 a.m. He was considered dead by those present and preparation began for his burial. Then in the middle of the afternoon, he awoke and announced to all present that he had been to heaven. He saw the light, so frequently mentioned in accounts of near-death experiences, and faced a life review. He also, at one point, looked down upon his own body.

At the gates of heaven, according to Slocum's account, he had been turned back because of his immoral life. He encountered some angelic beings who gave him a choice of going to Hell or returning to Earth to teach his people the way to heaven. He announced that all should be Christians and requested that a church be built. Within a short time, some 50 people associated with the church. The movement subsequently spread among the various Native American groups in the area.

The teachings of the new church combined elements of Presbyterianism, Catholicism, and the traditional religion of his people. Among the traditional practices, members of a secret society were known to go into a trance and commune with various spirit entities. Slocum taught a form of Christianity, but downplayed the Bible in favor of his own contacts with heaven that he felt were more immediate and relevant than an old book. He emphasized moral living as a prerequisite to heaven.

A short time after the founding of the church, he fell ill again. His wife, Mary, began to pray for him. In her concern she began to shake and tremble. When Slocum recovered, he attributed his getting better to the shaking. Very soon afterwards, the members began to copy Mary Slocum's movements and soon were demonstrating a range of exuberant body movements that had been a familiar part of revival and camp meetings among Protestant religious groups. Because of this shaking, they became known as the Shaker religion. The members also adopted a form of ritualized prayer for the sick.

The Shaker Church was incorporated in 1892. Slocum led it for the rest of his life but as the end of his earthly life drew near, he withdrew from the public, and the exact place and date of his death is unknown. His church continues to the present.

Sources:

Barnett, H. G. Indian Shakers: A Messianic Cult of the Pacific Northwest. Carbondale, Ill.: Southern Illinois University, 1957.

Mooney, James. "The Ghost-Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890." In the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnology. Compiled by J. W. Powell. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1896.

Slomann, Aage (1891–1970)

Danish chemical engineer who was concerned with parapsychology. He was born on October 25, 1891, at Copenhagen. He graduated as a chemical engineer in 1914 at the Technical University of Denmark. He worked as a chemical engineer in Denmark (1914–18), in Bordeaux, France (1919–20), and in New York (1920–31). He returned to Denmark where he was a factory superintendent for Colgate-Palmolive in Copenhagen until his retirement (1932–56).

Slomann was particularly interested in qualitative research and philosophical aspects of parapsychology, and he lectured on psychical research throughout Scandinavia and broadcast over Danish radio. He was a member of the executive committee of the Danish Society for Psychical Research beginning in 1950, named honorary librarian and research officer in 1956, and elected president in 1961. He was a member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) and the Swedish Society for Parapsychological Research, and he was a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association.

In 1959, he completed a two-year survey of paranormal phenomena in Denmark. He published many articles on parapsychology in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research, the Journal of the SPR, and the Danish parapsychological journals Psykisk Forum and Psykisk Information.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

"Smagorad"

A mysterious book of magic power in the possession of Arnaud Guillaume in 1393, during the reign of Charles VI of France.

Smaragdine Table

Believed to be the earliest statement of the principles of spiritual alchemy, ascribed to Hermes Trismegistus. It was said to have been inscribed on emerald (smaragdine) in Phoenician letters and was generally referred to as the Emerald Table of Hermes.

Smead, Mrs. (ca. 1902)

Pseudonym of Mrs. Willis M. Cleveland, wife of an American preacher to whom James H. Hyslop's attention was invited in December 1901. Smead had occasionally practiced planchette writing from her childhood and began systematic experiments in 1895. Records were kept of the communications received and put at Hyslop's disposal. He was impressed with both Willis Cleveland and Mrs. Smead as honest, conscientious people. The communicators claimed to be the deceased children of the couple and a deceased brother of Willis Cleveland's. Their identities were very plausible.

A curious feature of Smead's mediumship began to develop when in August 1895 several references were made to the planets Mars and Jupiter. A short time before, an article by Percival Lowell was published in the Atlantic Monthly that referred to the canals of the planet Mars. This article may have had something to do with Smead's new variety of phenomena in which Jupiter played an additional but minor part.

A crude map of Jupiter's surface was given, and the planet was said to be the "babies' heaven." At the next sitting, the map of Mars was drawn, the different zones were named in Martian, and several communications were given about the inhabitants and the canals.

There followed then an incubation period of five years during which no Martian revelations were granted. In September 1900, the communications returned in a developed state. Men, boats, houses, and flowers were drawn, named in Martian, and written in hieroglyphic characters. Some of the sketches, such as one of a self-winding double clock, were very ingenious; others, like a Martian airship, were peculiar but unconvincing. A curious coincidence existed with Hélène Smith, the French medium studied by Theodore Flournoy, who also produced Martian drawings.

In general, according to Flournoy's review in Spiritism and Psychology, "the Martian revelations of Mrs. Smead present the same character of puerility and naive imagination as those of Mlle. Smith." He could only think that the psychological explanation was at basis the same. Flournoy's book was actually in the house, but it was carefully kept from the medium.

The number of Martian scripts continued to increase until a new personality, calling himself "Harrison Clark," abruptly came on the scene and shut out all other communicators. He showed great facility in inverted and mirror writing and gave his autobiography. When he was confronted by Hyslop with the findings of his investigation, he began "a battle of intellectual sparring and defiance which perhaps has hardly its equal in the annals of secondary personality."

For a considerable period, Hyslop attributed all the communications to a secondary personality. In this view Hyslop was confirmed by the controls of the medium Leonora Piper. They sent a message to Hyslop that he should be wary. "The so-called light as seen by us is not a light given from our world at all, but the conditions are hypocritic and fanciful."

Later, however, the mediumship improved, scraps and bits of paranormal information came through, and, although at first Hyslop only classified the case as an intermediate one between Smith and Piper, he later surrendered his hesitations and admitted the existence of genuinely paranormal phenomena beyond question.

Smells (Psychic)

Smells appearing in the séance room have often been ascribed to a paranormal origin. Materializations in sittings with the medium Franek Kluski were associated with strong animal odors. Psychic perfumes were reported at séances of Carlos Mirabelli and Daniel Dunglas Home. (See also Odor of Sanctity; Perfumes)

Smith, Alson Jesse (1908–1965)

Writer and lecturer on religion and parapsychology. He was born on August 12, 1908, at Danbury, Connecticut. He studied at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania (B.A., 1930) and Garrett Biblical Institute (now Garrett Theological Seminary), Evanston, Illinois (B.D., 1933). He was ordained as a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and after a year in Montana (1933–34) he served churches in New York and Connecticut for 20 years (1935–54). He retired from the active ministry in 1954 and became a full-time author and lecturer. In the years after World War II he wrote a number of books including several on the psychic. He was a member of Spiritual Frontiers fellowship (now the International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship) in its initial years. He died May 17, 1965.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Smith, Alton Jesse. Faith to Live By. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1949.

———. Immortality: The Scientific Evidence. N.p., 1954.

———. Psychic Source Book. New York: Creative Age Press, 1951.

———. Religion and the New Psychology. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1951.

Smith, Barbara Gosline (1909–1994)

Newspaper columnist who studied parapsychological subjects. She was born on November 4, 1909, in Dallas, Texas. She studied at the University of California at Los Angeles (B.A., 1929) and the University of Southern California (M.A., 1933). She was successively an elementary school teacher (1930–35), high school teacher (1935–45), and college instructor (1945–50). In 1950 she became a freelance writer. She was a member of Bema Forensic Society. With Karlis Osis she investigated possible relationships between religious backgrounds and ESP among elementary school children.

She died on January 7, 1994.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Smith, Hélène (1861–1929)

Pseudonym of Catherine Elise Muller of Geneva, the medium whose case caused much dissension among continental psychologists for many years and was considered as the Dreyfus case of science by some. Had Theodore Flournoy not written his brilliant work Des Indes à la Planète Mars (English ed. as From India to the Planet Mars, 1900), in which he psychoanalyzed and presented the more mundane explanations of some of her more extraordinary phenomena, she might have been acclaimed as the greatest medium of her time, the first human being to whom the glory was due of having established intelligent communication with Mars and of having revealed the language and writing of the red planet. Her work occurred, of course, long before the modern triumphs of interplanetary research and space probes that have revealed the actual nature of the surfaces of Mars and Venus.

Smith's father, a merchant, was a Hungarian who possessed a remarkable facility for languages; her mother had sporadic visions but showed no mediumistic powers. As a young girl, Smith was always fond of indulging in daydreams. She used to see highly colored landscapes, a lion of stone with a mutilated head, and fanciful objects on pedestals. These visions made her discontented. She asked her parents on one occasion whether she was really their child or a changeling. When 14 or 15 years old, she saw a bright light thrown against the wall of her room, which then seemed to be filled with strange and unknown things.

She heard of Spiritualism for the first time in the winter of 1891–92. An acquaintance lent her the book D'Après la Mort by Leon Denis. It excited her curiosity and led her to a Spiritualist circle. At the second séance that she attended, her hand moved automatically. Soon the table began to move and in April 1892, a spirit communicated through typology and said that he was Victor Hugo, her guide and protector. His reign as a control lasted undisturbed for about six months. Then another control appeared, "Leopold," who, against the warning of "Victor Hugo," forced the medium into trance and, after a struggle lasting for a year, completely ousted his predecessor.

At this period Smith possessed every attribute of a powerful medium. She produced telekinesis phenomena and strange appings, found lost objects, predicted future events, saw spirit visitors, clairaudiently heard their names, and received the explanation of visions that unfolded before her eyes by raps.

Flournoy was admitted to her circle in the winter of 1894–95. The séances that he attended for five years alternated with a series given to August Lemaître and one Professor Cuen-det, vice president of the Geneva Society for Psychic Studies. In his book From India to the Planet Mars (1900), Flournoy notes,

"I found the medium in question to be a beautiful woman about thirty years of age, tall, vigorous, of a fresh, healthy complexion, with hair and eyes almost black, of an open and intelligent countenance, which at once invoked sympathy. She evinced nothing of the emaciated or tragic aspect which one habitually ascribes to the sybils of tradition, but wore an air of health, of physical and mental vigour, very pleasant to behold, and which, by the way, is not often encountered in those who are good mediums."

In describing her triple mediumship (visual, auditive and typological) he admitted:

"Speaking for myself alone . . . I was greatly surprised to recognize in scenes which passed before my eyes events which had transpired in my own family prior to my birth. Whence could the medium, whom I had never met before, have derived the knowledge of events belonging to a remote past, of a private nature, and utterly unknown to any living person?"

The professor made good friends with the spirit control "Leopold." The secret of his identity, which for a long time he refused to reveal, was already known. He claimed to have been Giuseppe Balsamo, alias Cagliostro. With the exception of Flournoy, everybody believed in his existence as a spirit. Even he admitted that "it would be impossible to imagine a being more independent and more different from Smith herself, having a more personal character, and individuality more marked, or a more certain actual existence."

When "Leopold" wrote with Smith's hand she held the pen in a different way and her handwriting differed from her usual calligraphy and showed the style of the last century. The voice of "Leopold" was a deep bass. He had a strong, easily recognizable Italian accent.

But Flournoy was firm in his conviction that "there is no reason to suspect the real presence of Joseph Balsamo behind the automatism of Mlle. Smith." He traced the psychogenesis of "Leopold" to a great fright that she had when ten years old. She was attacked in the street by a big dog. She was terrified but the terror was dispelled by the sudden appearance, as if by a miracle, of a personage clothed in a long brown robe with flowing sleeves and with a white cross on the breast who chased the dog away and disappeared before she had time to thank him.

"Leopold" claimed that this was his first appearance. Whenever some unpleasant sight or a dangerous encounter lay in her way the phantom always rose at a distance of about ten yards, walked or glided in silence at the same rate as she advanced toward him, attracting and fascinating her gaze in such a manner as to prevent her turning her eyes away either to the right or left, until she passed the place of danger.

Flournoy found some curious analogies between what is known to us of Cagliostro and certain characteristics of "Leopold," but he believed that they accorded well with the subliminal medley. "Leopold" did not know Italian and turned a deaf ear if anyone addressed him in that language. His handwriting showed striking dissimilarities to that known of the real Cagliostro. His answers to questions regarding his terrestrial existence were evasive or vague. He did not furnish a single name, date, or precise fact. He was, on the other hand, as archaic in his therapeutics as in his orthography and treated all maladies in an old-fashioned way. He claimed that his sentiments for Smith were only the continuation of those of Cagliostro for Marie Antionette.

Marie Antoinette was the first great romance of Smith's mediumship. Flournoy called it the "Royal Cycle." It was roughly outlined at séances in the house of Cuendet in December 1893. The announcement that Smith was the reincarnation of the late queen was made by the table on January 30, 1894. In the interval she had for some time believed herself to be the reincarnation of Lorenze Feliciani. When, however, she was told that Lorenze Feliciani only existed in the fantasy of novelist Dumas, she quickly dropped this role.

There was less difference between the autograph of Cagliostro and "Leopold" than between the handwriting of the real Marie Antoinette and the somnambulistic one. The role of the queen was acted in a very lifelike manner. Probably Smith's tastes for everything that was noble, distinguished, and elevated made the task easier. In the surroundings of the queen, the king was conspicuous by his absence. Three personages figured most often. "Cagliostro" ("ce cher sorcier"), "Louis Philippe d'Orleans," and the "Marquis de Mirabeau." They were discovered reincarnated in two sitters: M. Eugene Demole and M. Auguste de Morsier. For the spectators, the royal somnambulism was the most interesting on account of the brilliancy and life of the role and the length of time during which it was sustained. But for lovers of the paranormal it was not in the least extraordinary.

The Hindu dream in which Flournoy was cast in the role of Prince Sivrouka Nayaka began on October 16, 1894, eight weeks before his admission to the circle. The Martian romance dated from the same period and was to be attributed, in Flournoy's view, to an involuntary suggestion of one Professor Lemaître. In the Oriental Cycle, Smith was Simandini, the daughter of an Arab sheik in the sixth century, and was courted and married by Prince Sivrouka, lord of the fortress of Tchandruguiri built in the province of Kanara, Hindustani, in 1401. After many years of married life she was burned alive on her husband's funeral pyre.

In enacting the role of the Oriental princess, Smith spoke Hindustani and wrote a few words in good Arabic. She did not speak it. While recovering in trance the use of Hindustani, which she formerly spoke at the court of Sivrouka, she appeared to have forgotten her mother tongue. Her Hindustani was a mixture of improvised articulations and of veritable Sanskrit words well adapted to the situation. This means that it expressed personal thought and was not merely a series of senseless phrases. Besides Flournoy, Professor Seipel, another investigator, also figured in the Oriental romance. He was an Arab slave.

Historians appeared to be singularly ignorant of Kanara, Sivrouka, and Simandini. One day, however, Flournoy accidentally came across an old history of India by De Marles printed in Paris in 1828 and found in it a confirmation of the main facts. It was objected that De Marles was a very unreliable historian. The fact was, however, that only two copies of the work existed in Geneva, both covered with dust. Only in a combination of absolutely exceptional and almost unimaginable circumstances could the work have found its way into Smith's hands.

Flournoy saw himself forced to admit that the precise historical information given by "Leopold" and the language spoken by "Simandini" defied normal explanation. He said:

"The Hindoo romance, in particular, remains for those who have taken part in it a psychological enigma, not yet solved in a satisfactory manner, because it reveals and implies in regard to Hélène, a knowledge relative to the costumes and languages of the Orient, the actual source of which it has up to the present time not been possible to discover."

The Martian romance, one of the outstanding modern claims of planetary travels, was the most striking of all. In November 1894, the spirit of the entranced medium was carried to the planet Mars. She described the human, animal, and floral life of the planet from night to night and supported her story by writing in Martian characters and speaking fluently in that language. Suggestive of xenoglossis, the characters were unlike any written characters used on the Earth, and the language had many characteristics of genuineness. From the translation she furnished in French, Flournoy concluded that the Martian language was a subconscious elaboration.

The vowels and consonant sounds were the same as in French, and the grammar, the inflections, and the construction were modeled on French. As a work of art Flournoy considered the subconscious construction of this language infantile, as a feat of prodigious transpose memory. The Martian descriptions he found similarly childish and the landscapes suggested Japanese lacquer and Nankin dishes.

Curiously enough, when the defects were pointed out to the medium by Flournoy, her subconscious mind appeared to be impressed and set a new task before itself. Not long afterwards an Ultra-Martian romance developed and descriptions were given of the life of still another, more distant planet (Uranus), with grotesque inhabitants and a language totally different from the former one and having apparently no relationship with the known languages of the Earth.

The medium and the other investigators of the phenomena did not share Flournoy's view of the earthly origin of the Martian romance. In articles published in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques (in March-April and May-June, 1897), Lemaître argued for the extraterrestrial origin of Smith's Martian language. The medium's defense was also taken up in an anonymous volume (Autour des Indes à la Planète Mars) published under the auspices of the Société d'Etudes Psychiques de Genève (1901). On the other hand, V. Henry, professor of Sanskrit at the Sorbonne, completely vindicated Flournoy's conclusions in his book La Langue Martien (1901) and showed how the Martian words, with the exception of a residue of two percent, were derived from known terrestrial words.

Flournoy did not stop at the claim that all the controls of the medium were secondary personalities. He proposed that the source of the incarnation dreams was to be found in the influence Allan Kardec's belief in reincarnation exercised on the minds of various automatic writers. Flournoy also disputed the paranormal character of the other manifestations. He stated:

"As to the Supernormal, I believe I have actually found a little telekinesis and telepathy. As to lucidity and spiritistic messages, I have only encountered some brilliant reconstructions, which the hypnoid imagination, aided by latent memory, excels in fabricating in the case of mediums."

At a séance in 1899, Smith had a vision of a village and a landscape that she could not recognize. At the same time, an old man whom she also saw possessed her hand and wrote: "Chaumontet Syndic." Later, further information was divulged. The old man was syndic of Chessenaz in 1839. At another séance these words came: "Burnier, Curé de Chessenaz." Flournoy made inquiries and found out there was a little village named Chessenaz in Haute Savoie, that in 1839 the syndic of the village was Jean Chaumontet, and the curé was named Burnier; furthermore the signatures resembled the authentic signatures of these two people. Nevertheless he dismissed the case, as he found out that Smith had relations in a neighboring village and had been to visit them.

To the physical phenomena of the mediumship he devoted little attention. He was inclined to admit that a force may radiate from the medium that may be capable of attracting or repelling objects in the neighborhood. How such a force could be employed to levitate a table, play on distant instruments, or apport branches of trees, leaves of ivy bearing the name of the control, shells filled with sand and still wet from the sea, a China vase full of water containing a rose, or Chinese money, he did not even attempt to explain. The physical phenomena did not last long and ceased at an early period.

In 1901, Flournoy published another extensive study on some further developments in the Archives de Psychologie (Nouvelles Observations sur un cas de Somnambulisme avec Glossolalie). He related that owing to the sensation that his previous work created, Smith was inundated with letters and requests for sittings. A rich American lady provided her with a life income. Smith resigned her position and gave many sittings to her new friends, but Flournoy and Lemaitre were not among the invited ones. In the summer of 1900 there came a complete break. Flournoy was no more accorded facilities for study. The material that he dealt with in his new book hardly covered the period of a year.

He stated that the Martian romance passed into oblivion, but the Martian personalities "Astané" and "Ramier" were retained as guides and interpreters in the exploration of the Ultra-Martian and Uranian worlds. A Lunarian phase also developed at a later period, with descriptions, language, and writing. But of this Flournoy had no firsthand information. The Ultra-Martian romance was accompanied by several painted scenes. The writing was ideographic. Its curious hieroglyphs did not express letters but words. The ideograms showed no resemblance to the objects that they represented.

In this, Flournoy found another proof of infantile imagination. This essential characteristic was omitted because the medium strove to create something defying all analysis. The Uranian language and writing differed totally from the Ultra-Martian. But, stated Flournoy, the phonetic and alphabetic system was a copy of the Martian, and the Uranian language differed less from French than French from the languages of the neighboring countries. The origin of the strange notion of Lunarian inhabitants presumably sprung from Smith reading an article in La Paix Universelle in which, after flattering allusions to Smith, mention was made of the claims of certain yogis of psychic visits to the inhabitants of that side of the moon that is turned away from the Earth.

The duration of the astronomic cycle was not long. It was superseded, after a complete break with the Spiritualists, by a religious cycle in which Christ, the Virgin, the apostles, and the archangels played the dominant roles. In 1903, a luminous vision filled Smith's room. "Christ" appeared and she heard the voice of "Leopold": "You will draw him." Two years later, Smith began with crayon. This was later changed to oil. On large wooden boards, in a state of trance, she executed 12 religious tableaux.

Lemaitre stated in a study that, according to certain mediumistic communications she had received, Smith was a reincarnation of "Raphael," or of "Michaelangelo"; the medium herself, however, did not accept his conclusion.

In May 1913, at the International Congress for Psychical Research at Geneva, eight of her striking pictures were exhibited. In a statement to Light (October 11, 1913) she said:

"On the days when I am to paint I am always roused very early—generally between five and six in the morning—by three loud knocks at my bed. I open my eyes and see my bedroom brightly illuminated, and immediately understand that I have to stand up and work. I dress myself by the beautiful iridescent light, and wait a few moments, sitting in my armchair, until the feeling comes that I have to work. It never delays. All at once I stand up and walk to the picture. When about two steps before it I feel a strange sensation, and probably fall asleep at the same moment. I know, later on, that I must have slept because I notice that my fingers are covered with different colours, and I do not remember at all to have used them, though, when a picture is being begun, I am ordered to prepare colours on my palette every evening, and have it near my bed."

A brush was very seldom used in these pictures. She put on the first coating of paint with her three middle fingers. For the second coating, she moved the same fingers very lightly from right to left and back, thus producing a very smooth surface. The outlines were made by the nails and the sky with the palm of her hand.

This last phase of Smith's mediumship was exhaustively dealt with by W. Deonna in his book De La Planète Mars en Terre Sainte (1932). As the medium did not again subject herself to scientific investigation, Deonna's psychoanalytic examination was based on the voluminous correspondence that Smith left behind and on the paintings themselves. The religious cycle was arrested in 1915 in its further progress by the shock that the medium received when her dearest Italian friend died. Her later years were dominated by visions and automatic communications of and from this friend.

Deonna attached no particular value to the paintings. He stated that their inspiration did not surpass the usual level of religious imagery. The tableaux did not have an elevating effect, indeed a striking mediocrity was often noticeable. But he also admitted certain qualities and said that the paintings were far above what Smith could produce normally. He looked for an explanation to the regression of infantile memories. He offered no explanation for certain paranormal features.

It was Smith's habit to have photographs taken of the successive stages of the pictures. To her utter despair, some of the negatives of the painting "Judas" were spoiled. Her guardian angel appeared and announced a miracle. Two days later, the portrait began to fade out. The beards, the moustache, the tears of Judas, and other details gradually disappeared until the painting returned to the stage where it was last successfully photographed. Then an inscription appeared: "God's will, November 18, 1913." The photographs were taken again. The inscription vanished and Smith finished the picture as before.

She always painted from visions. The eyes appeared first. But Judas was painted into the landscape from the leg upward. The visions were accompanied by luminous phenomena. They began with a ball of light that expanded and filled the room. This was not a subjective phenomenon. Smith exposed photographic plates that indeed registered strong luminous effects. But to Deonna, they had no scientific value as they were only supported by the good faith of the medium.

The Smith case is, on perspective, one of the more important in parapsychology. It illustrated many of the phenomena encountered by parapsychologists as they dealt with Spiritualist claims. Flournoy proved the equal of the task and was able, through his long-term observation and study, to understand the dynamics operating in Smith's life. He was able to show the mundane sources for her extraordinary material without falling into name calling and charges of fraud and to present the material fully without the need of an exposé format.

Sources:

Flournoy, Theodore. Des Indes à la Planète Mars. English ed. as From India to the Planet Mars: A Study of a Case of Somnambulism with Glossolalia. New York: Harper, 1900. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Maxwell, J. Metapsychical Phenomena: Methods and Observations. London: Duckworth, 1905.

Smith, Helene Veeder Altpeter (1890– ?)

Worker in the field of parapsychology. She was born on July 31, 1890, at Redding, California. She became a school teacher, college instructor, and secretarial worker. From 1957 on Smith was secretary, treasurer, and librarian for the California Society for Psychical Studies, meeting in Berkeley. Her own special interests included telepathy, clairvoyance, and spontaneous psi phenomena.

Smith, Robert Cross (1795–1832)

Robert Cross Smith, a pioneering modern astrologer, was the first of a lineage of British astrologers to use the pseudonym Raphael with his writings. He was born in Bristol, England, on March 19, 1795. He became a carpenter and in 1820 married Sarah Lucas. Soon after his marriage he moved to London. In the city he became interested in astrology, possibly due to his acquaintance with G. W. Graham, the balloonist. The pair authored a book on geomancy, Philosophical Merlin, in 1822. In 1824, Smith became the editor of a new magazine, The Struggling Astrologer, but it failed for lack of subscribers after only a few issues. Then, two years later, he was offered the opportunity to edit an almanac, The Prophetic Messenger. The first issue appeared in 1827 under his pen name and carried the ephemeris (chart of daily planetary positions) that was to become so identified with him.

Smith edited The Prophetic Messenger annually for the rest of his life. It was widely read and the ephemeris used by an increasing number of astrologers. Following Smith's death on February 26, 1832, in London, his work as Raphael would be continued by a series of astrologers who successively inherited the title. Eventually, Raphael's Ephemeris would be issued as a separate volume and become the standard text consulted by both British and American astrologers for the construction of their clients' horoscopes. The Ephemeris was unique in introducing in its table of houses the system of house division developed by the Italian monk Placidus de Titus (1603–1668). Through the success of Raphael's Ephemeris, the Placidian system of house division would come to dominate English-speaking countries.

Smith also wrote several books, the most important being A Manual of Astrology (1828), which joined James Wilson's Dictionary of Astrology as a basic textbook for astrology. It continued to be reprinted into the twentieth century. Raphael thus joined Wilson, his older contemporary, in creating the astrological revival that, following a century of decline, would initiate two centuries of steady growth.

Sources:

Brau, Jean-Louis, Helean Weaver, and Allan Edwards. Larousse Encyclopedia of Astrology. New York: New American Library, 1982.

Raphael [pseudonym of Robert C. Smith]. The Familiar Astrologer. London: Knight & Lacey, 1828.

———. A Manual of Astrology. London: C. S. Arnold, 1828.

———, and G. W. Graham. Philosophical Merlin. London, 1822.

Smith, Susy (1911– ?)

Journalist and author of a number of books on psychical subjects and parapsychology. She was born on June 2, 1911, in Washington, D.C. She attended the University of Texas and the University of Arizona. She was a columnist for the Salt Lake Tribune and the Desert News, in Salt Lake City, Utah, and also conducted radio programs on shopping information at Daytona Beach, Florida.

Smith has spent most of her life as a freelance writer, and for a period she worked as an editor at Sherbourne Press on the popular “. . . for the Millions” series. Besides her own many books, she edited the one-volume edition of F. W. H. Myers's Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death for University Books in 1961. She was a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London; the American Society for Psychical Research; the International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship; the Association for Research and Enlightenment; and founded the Survival Research Foundation in 1971.

In addition to her many popular books on parapsychology she also lectured on the subject and has operated as a psychic and channeled one book from William James. She is herself psychic, as related in her book Confessions of a Psychic (Macmillan, 1971). Toward the end of her life, she also had a religious awakening and renounced some of her previous psychic activity.

Sources:

Smith, Susy. The Book of James. New York: Putnam, 1974.

———. Confessions of a Psychic. New York: Macmillan, 1971.

———. The Conversion of a Psychic. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978.

———. The Enigma of Out-of-the-Body Travel. New York: Helix Press, 1965.

———. ESP. New York: Pyramid Books, 1962.

———. ESP for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1965.

———. Haunted Houses for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1967.

———. The Mediumship of Mrs. Leonard. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

———. More ESP for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1969.

———. Reincarnation. N.p., 1969.

———. A Supernatural Primer for the Millions. Los Angeles: Sherbourne Press, 1966.

———. Today's Witches. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970.

Smith, W. W. (1884–1947)

Original name of Walter Whateley Carington, British psychical researcher. He changed his name in 1933 for family reasons.

Smohalla (1815?–1907)

Smohalla, a chief of the Wanapum, a small Native American group in the state of Washington, became famous as a visionary and dreamer among the Native Americans of the Northwest in the 1880s. As a youth he attended a Catholic mission operating among the Yakima, where he learned French and absorbed some Christianity. He distinguished himself as a warrior during his early manhood and participated in the Yakima war of 1855–56. He had also become known as a powerful medicine man and possessed great occult power and the knowledge to use it.

In 1860 he had a life-changing experience. A chief of another tribe, believing that Smohalla was engaging in malevolent occultism (making medicine) against him, almost killed him and left him for dead. Smohalla was able to crawl away and after a long period of recovery, he became a wanderer. Finally reaching Mexico, he traveled for several years throughout the West. He finally returned to his people, who, believing him dead, listened in awe as he told them a story of his journeys. He claimed that he had visited the spirit world and had returned as a teacher. His message was that Saghalee Tyee, the Great Chief Above, wanted his people to return to their old ways. His teachings included a mixture of what he knew of traditional Native American beliefs along with Catholicism and Latter-day Saints teachings. Because of their departure from the old ways, whites had been allowed to come into the land, Smohalla told them.

Smohalla's message was emphasized by his falling into trance states (during which times he was stuck with sharp objects and he offered no response). During these times he would claim to visit the spirit world, much as a shaman, and upon his return relate the latest message. White people who were present at these trance sessions compared him to Spiritualist mediums. Others called him the Dreamer and his followers the Dreamers. He was also able to predict eclipses.

Smohalla's movement spread among the Native people of Washington and Oregon and westward into Idaho. It had a teaching based upon the Earth as the Mother of All and articulated a program that opposed the attempts of the U.S. government to force the various groups into reservations and favored individuals integrating into the larger economic system. Church-like buildings were constructed for the gathering of the Dreamer religion. Out of his teachings a new Native American church developed that would prosper for a generation and remnants of which, known as the Feather Religion or Seven Drums religion, can still be found. His ideas influenced the Paiute prophet Wovoka, the founder of the Ghost Dance movement. Among his converts was Old Joseph (d. 1871) of the Nez Perce who passed the Dreamer religion on to his son, Chief Joseph, who would later adopt Wovoka's message.

Smohalla lived into his 90s. He died in 1907.

Sources:

Debo, Angie. A History of the Indians of the United States. Norman, Okla.: University of Oklahoma Press, 1970.

Dictionary of American Biography. 20 vols. and 7 supps. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1928–36. 1944–81.

Mooney, James. "The Ghost-Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890." In The Fourteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnology. Compiled by J. W. Powell. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1896.

Smythies, J(ohn) R(aymond) (1922–)

University lecturer and psychiatrist who has written widely on parapsychology. He was born on November 30, 1922, at Naini Tal, U.P., India. He studied at Cambridge University and the University of British Columbia. He settled in Edinburgh and for many years was a senior lecturer at the Department of Psychological Medicine, University of Edinburgh, and a consultant psychiatrist at Royal Edinburgh Hospital, Scotland (1961–73). In 1973 he was named C. B. Ireland Professor of Psychiatry at the University of Alabama at Birmingham. In 1957 he began a lengthy tenure as editor of the International Review of Neurobiology.

In addition to his many papers on psychological and psychiatric subjects, Smythies has special interest in the theoretical basis of ESP. He was a member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, and has published various articles in the Journal of the SPR and Tomorrow. He also attended the International Conferences on Philosophy and Parapsychology and Unorthodox Healing, St. Paul de Vence, France, 1954, and the Conference on Parapsychology and Psychedelics, New York, 1958.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Smythies, John Raymond. Science and the ESP. London: Routledge & K. Paul: 1922. Reprint, New York: Humanities Publications, 1967.

Smythies, John Raymond, and Arthur Koestler, ed. Beyond Reductionism: New Perspectives in the Science of Life. London: Hutchinson, 1969. Reprint, New York: Macmillan, 1970; London: Hutchinson, 1972.

Snake Handling

Snakes played a prominent part in pagan mythologies and religious ceremonies long before the Judeo-Christian story of the Garden of Eden. The snake has often been regarded as a fertility symbol. In the Mayan scripture Popul Vuh, the plumed serpent assists in the creation of life, as it does in the beliefs of the Aztec and the Pueblo Indians. The deity Dambollah, an African deity most frequently pictured as a serpent, is central to Haitian voodoo. Various American Indian tribes have dances in which live snakes are carried, while the Yokut shamans of central California handled rattlesnakes at public ceremonies.

In the early twentieth century, among members of the Church of God (Cleveland, Tennessee), one of the early Pentecostal churches to emerge in the Appalachian Mountains of the American Southeast, the handling of poisonous snakes took on a new life and importance. These practices arose from a quite literal application of the "signs" of Jesus' disciples mentioned in the biblical gospel of Mark (16:17–18): "And these signs shall follow them that believe; In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

While Pentecostals had practiced speaking in tongues and healing—both also mentioned as gifts of the Holy Spirit in the writings of the apostle Paul—no one had paid attention to the signs in the passage in Mark until 1909. That year George W. Hensley of Tennessee captured a rattlesnake and brought it to a church service for snake handling as a test of religious faith. In 1914, Hensley was invited to an annual meeting of the Church of God, whose leader Ambrose Tomlinson gave the practice tacit approval. In 1928, the leadership of the church realized their mistake and distanced themselves from the practice, but by that time it had spread among church members throughout the Appalachian Mountains and as far south as central Florida.

Hensley, Raymond Hays, and Thomas Harden eventually founded the Dolley Pond Church of God with Signs Following, in Pine Mountain, Tennessee; it became the mother church of Southern snake handling. Pushed out of the Church of God, the "signs" people founded similar churches in a loose fellowship that became in effect a new denomination. Snake handling became clandestine after World War II, when Tennessee led other states in passing laws to forbid the practice, following the publicity given to the death of a member of the Dolly Pond church. Less known is the associated practice of drinking poison, usually a solution of strychnine, at church services, also forbidden by law.

The astonishing fact is that scores of sincere devotees of snake handling have survived the bites of deadly snakes and the effects of drinking poisons at church ceremonies. Less than 75 deaths have been recorded as of the mid-1990s. The deaths that occurred were ascribed to lack of faith. Interestingly enough, Hensley, after surviving numerous snake bites, died after being bitten during a church service in Florida in 1965. Snake handling adds a dramatic element to religious faith, and has much in common with the earlier practice of the fire ordeal in non-Christian religions.

Present-day members of the Holiness Church of God in Jesus' Name in the Southeast are more concerned about the dangers of persecution through punitive laws against snake handling than from the practice itself. They regard such laws as a breach of their freedom to exercise their religious convictions sincerely in accordance with Holy Scripture.

Estimates place the number of snake-handling church members at about 3000, living chiefly in Ohio, Indiana, and Appalachia.

Sources:

Carden, Karen W., and Robert W. Pelton. The Persecuted Prophets: The Story of the Frenzied Snake Handlers. New York: A. S. Barnes; London: Thomas Yoseloff, 1976.

Covington, Dennis. Salvation on Sand Mountain: Snake Handling and Redemption in Southern Appalachia. New York: Penguin, 1996.

Kimbrough, David L. Taking Up Serpents: Snake Handlers of Eastern Kentucky. Chapel Hill, N.C.: University of North Carolina, 1995.

La Barre, Weston. They Shall Take up Serpents. New York: Schocken Books, 1969.

Sewell, Dan. "Snake Handlers Put Bite into Religion." Santa Barbara News-Press (May 1, 1995).

Stekert, Ellen. "The Snake Handling Sect of Harlan County, Kentucky: Its Influences on Folk Tradition." Southern Folklore Quarterly 27 (December 1963).

Sneezing

There are many superstitions concerning sneezing. It is said that the custom of blessing one who sneezes originated in Italy in the time of Pope Gregory the Great (ca. 540–604) during a pestilence that proved fatal to those who sneezed. A still older date is given to this custom by some writers, who traced the idea to the biblical Adam and to his descendent Jacob, who supposedly begged that its fatal effects might be removed. On his request being granted, the people gratefully instituted the custom of saluting the sneezer.

In some diseases, sneezing was a bad omen, while in others it was a good omen. Sneezing to the right was lucky, to the left, unlucky; from noon to midnight good, from night to noon, bad. St. Augustine (d. 430) stated that the ancients would return to bed if they sneezed while putting on a shoe.

Snowdon, Ruth J(ohnson) (1896– ?)

Research associate in biophysics who published articles on parapsychology. She was born in 1896 in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and studied at Vassar College. In 1948 she became a research associate in biophysics at the University of Pittsburgh, where R. A. McConnell established his center for parapsychological research. She was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Snowdon, Ruth J., R. A. MacConnell, and K. F. Powell. "Wishing with Dice." Journal of Experimental Psychology 50 (October 1955).

Soal, S(amuel) G(eorge) (1889–1975)

Mathematician and important figure in British parapsychology whose credibility has been attacked. He was born on April 29, 1889, at Kirby Moorside, Yorkshire, England. He received his degrees at London University (B.S. first class honors mathematics, 1910; M.A. mathematics, 1914). He was for many years a lecturer in mathematics at Queen Mary College, University of London (1911–54). After his retirement he was a part-time lecturer at Queen Mary College (1954–58) and an examiner at London University (1960–62).

Soal was one of the shining stars of British parapsychology. From 1919 onward he conducted parapsychological studies, in mediumship (1919–24), automatic writing (1923–28), and statistical experiments in telepathy and clairvoyance (1927 on). He collaborated in quantitative research with Kathleen M. Goldney, Frederick Bateman, and J. G. Pratt. He lectured widely on parapsychology in Britain and the United States.

He was the Myers Memorial lecturer (1947); Perrott Student in Psychical Research, Cambridge (1948–49); Fulbright Research Scholar in Parapsychology (1951); and president of the Nottingham University Society for Psychical Research (1938). In 1950 he was elected president of the Society for Psychical Research.

Soal, at first critical of J. B. Rhine's early work, carried out some very successful experiments with Basil Shackleton. The Soal-Goldney experiments became one of the foundation stones of the emerging field. As early as 1949 critics began to complain that the results were too good, that they had to have been produced by error or fraud. In 1960, C. E. M. Hansel criticized the claimed precognitive findings in the card-guessing experiments and suggested a number of ways in which there might have been conscious or unconscious falsification of the evidence.

A March 1971 article in the Journal of the SPR by R. G. Medhurst initially pointed out inaccuracies in the method of constructing quasi-random series in the experiments. By 1974, such criticism had become hostile, with papers by other experimenters suggesting that Soal had deliberately falsified or manipulated his data.

It was also suggested that experimenters J. G. Pratt and J. B. Rhine, who had checked Soal's statistical evaluation, had failed to disclose in detail a glaring error in the assessment of probability, using instead the vague term "very significant." There may, of course, have been a number of quite valid reasons for Pratt and Rhine to have failed to be specific. Soal himself ascribed his initial error to an assistant.

Soal died in 1975. Three years later Betty Markwick, a computer expert, published a complex technical paper in which computer analysis indicated that Soal was guilty of fraud. Other researchers have attempted to defend Soal from the charge of conscious deception, but their arguments have been unconvincing. The effect has been to destroy whatever value had been attached to the Shackleton experiments and, more significantly, to call into question Soal's lifetime of contributions to the field.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Markwick, Betty. "The Soal-Goldney Experiments with Basil Shackleton: New Evidence of Data Manipulation." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 56 (1978).

Medhurst, R. G. "On the Origin of the 'Prepared Random Numbers' Used in the Shackleton Experiments." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 46 (March 1971).

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Soal, S. G. "Experiments in Supernormal Perception at a Distance." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 123 (1932).

———. "Fresh Light on Card Guessing." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 46 (1940).

———. "A Report on Some Communications Received Through Mrs. Blanche Cooper." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 35 (December 1925).

Soal, S. G., and F. Bateman. Modern Experiments in Telepathy. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1954.

Soal, S. G., and H. T. Bowden. The Mind Readers. London: Faber and Faber, 1959.

Soal, S. G., and K. M. Goldney. "Experiments in Precognitive Telepathy." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 47 (1943).

Soal, S. G., and J. G. Pratt. "ESP Performance and Target Sequence." Journal of Parapsychology (September 1951).

———. "Some Relations Between Call Sequence and ESP Performance." Journal of Parapsychology (September 1952).

Sociedad Espanola de Parapsychologia

The Sociedad Espanola de Parapsychologia (Spanish Parapsychological Society) was founded in 1973 and grew out of the fledgling interest in parapsychology that emerged in Spain in the 1960s. In 1971 Ramos Molina Perera became the first person to offer courses in parapsychology at a Spanish university, the Universidad Autónoma Madrid. Two years later Perera became one of the founders of the Sociedad Espanola de Parapsychologia.

The society was an open membership group with members from many segments of Spanish society, including psychologists, newspaper reporters, and scholars of various backgrounds. Its program had both research and educational components, and it published a journal, Psi Comunicación. Last known address: Belen 15—1 Derecha, 28004, Madrid, Spain.

Sociedad Mexicana de Parapsicología

The Sociedad Mexicana de Parapsicología (Mexican Parapsychological Society) was founded in 1974 by Carlos B. Trevino and Marcela G. de Trevino. Its formation was occasioned by the perception that the general public was being defrauded by people claiming various paranormal abilities, from tea leaf reading to witchcraft, and by various self-appointed parapsychologists. The society immediately became controversial, and many who did not believe in the existence of psychic phenomena protested the formation of the organization.

The society found an ally in the Roman Catholic Church. The church has made use of the society's expertise in cases of reported diabolical possession. It occasionally sends people to the parapsychologists for an initial assessment of their condition and psychological health. The primary objectives of the society, however, remain the battle against psychic trickery and public gullibility and the perennial attempt to gain some acceptance for psychical research from the mainstream of the scholarly world. Its major focus is education rather than research, and it sponsors frequent programs to alert the public to the tricks of fake psychics. In 1984, it sponsored its first symposium on parapsychology, at which a number of international speakers were featured. The symposium was held at the Centro Universitario México, Mexico City. Address: CDA Nicolas San Juan No. 16, D. F. Mexico 12 D.F.

Societa Italiana di Parapsicologia

The Societa Italiana di Parapsicologia (Italian Society of Parapsychology) was founded in Milan, Italy, in 1946 as the Associazione di Metapsichica. It was an educational association and does not engage in research. It sponsored an annual series of lectures on psychical research and publishes a journal, Rassegna Italiana di Ricerca Psicica (Italian Journal of Psychic Research). Last known address: Via dei Montecatini 7, Rome, Italy.

Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia

The Rosicrucian Society of England, organized in 1865 by Robert Wentworth Little (who claimed to have found some old Freemasonry rituals) and Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie (who claimed to have received Rosicrucian initiation in Austria). The Metropolitan College was founded in London in 1865 with Little as supreme magus, and a Societas Rosicruciana in Scotia was started soon afterward, followed by provincial lodges.

Some famous names associated with the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia include Sir Francis Burdett (vice president) and author-occultist-politician Lord Edward Bulwer Lytton (grand patron 1871–73). Kenneth Mackenzie became an honorary magus. William Wynn Westcott was supreme magus in 1916.

The aims of the society were:

“... to afford mutual aid and encouragement in working out the great problems of Life, and in discovering the Secrets of Nature; to facilitate the study of the system of Philosophy founded upon the Kabala and the doctrines of Hermes Trismegistus, which was inculcated by the original Fratres Rosae Crucis, of Germany; and to investigate the meaning and symbolism of all that now remains of the wisdom, art and literature of the ancient world.”

In spite of these resounding aims, the society confined itself mainly to lectures and Freemasonry rituals.

In 1887, Westcott, Mackenzie, and W. R. Woodman were concerned in the formation of the Isis-Urania Temple of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, in which the esoteric Freemasonry of the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia was expanded into a more complex occult system. The Societas Rosicruciana in America was modeled on the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia.

Sources:

King, Francia. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Societas Rosicruciana in Civitatibus Foederatis

The Societas Rosicruciana in Civitatibus Foederatis was founded in Boston in 1878 by Charles E. Meyer (1839–1908) with a Mason from Pennsylvania. The Mason had headed the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, the British branch of the society founded in the 1860s by Robert Wentworth Little. Within a few years the American group had established lodges, called colleges, across the country. With several others, Meyer traveled to England and was initiated at the college in Sheffield. When Sheffield blocked their request for a charter, they turned to the college in Edinburgh, which issued a charter in 1879. The next year a second charter was issued for a college in New York, and the two American colleges jointly founded the Societas Rosicruciana Republicae Americae. Almost immediately, colleges were chartered for Baltimore and Boston. As did the English body, the American group limited membership to Masons.

The society remained stable for a generation but experienced a schism shortly after the turn of the century. At that time some of its members, led by Sylvester C. Gould and George Winslow Plummer (1876–1944), formed the Societas Rosicruciana in America, with membership not limited to Masons. However, the losses were compensated for by the chartering of new colleges in Duluth, Minnesota (1911), and Texas (1918). The society enjoyed a brief period of growth during the 1930s when new colleges were chartered for New Jersey (1931), North Carolina (1932), Virginia (1933), Illinois (1934), and Colorado and Long Island, New York (both in 1935). The society expanded to Canada with colleges chartered in Nova Scotia in 1936 and Ontario in 1937.

The society issues the periodical Rosicrucian Fama. The membership in 1990 was 1400 and as of 1996 there were 32 active colleges. Website: <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/2092/>.

Sources:

Societas Rosicruciana in Civitatibus Foederatis. <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/2092/>. April 14, 2000.

Voohis, Harold V. B. Masonic Rosicrucian Societies. New York: Press of Henry Emerson, 1958.

Societies of Harmony

Associations formed for the practice of animal magnetism by the pupils of Franz Anton Mesmer. The first Société de Harmonie was formed in Paris, and its members seem to have acted in a manner that was anything but “harmonious.” After some quarreling among themselves, they broke their contract with Mesmer, whereby they had promised before being admitted to his lectures that they would not practice on their own account or give away the secret of his methods without his consent. Other Societies of Harmony soon sprang up, the most important being that of Strasbourg, founded in 1785 by the Marquis Chastenet de Puysegur.

Society for Astrological Research

British organization that superseded the older Astrological Society, which had been formed in 1895 but had been criticized by astrologers around England as being primarily a London operation. In 1903, the older society was disbanded and a new one reorganized with a seven-person leadership committee. The committee consisted of Walter Gorn Old, Alan Leo, Bessie Leo, H. S. Green, E. H. Bailey, Robert King, and G. T. Elliot. This body gave way to the Astrological Lodge of the Theosophical Society (now the Astrological Lodge of London).

Sources:

Naylor, P. I. H. Astrology: A Fascinating History. North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Book Co., 1970.

Society for Interdisciplinary Studies

British organization founded in 1974 to act as a link between specialists in various disciplines who are interested in the theories of Immanuel Velikovsky. The aim of the society has been “. . . to bring a rational and objective approach to the study of Velikovsky's theories and encourage the detailed evaluation which is their due in the light of the evidence accumulating in their favour.”

Meetings for members are held throughout the United Kingdom and public seminars and conferences are organized at universities. While activities are focused in England, membership comes from around the world. The society maintains an extensive archive of reviews, reports, and other material. The society publishes a journal, Chronology & Catastrophism Review and the SIS Internet Digest. Address: 10 Witley Green, Darley Heights, Stopsley, Beds, LU2 8TR England. Website: <http://www.knowledge.co.uk/sis/>.

Sources:

Society for Interdisciplinary Studies. <http://www.knowledge.co.uk/sis/>. March 8, 2000.

Society for Parapsychological Studies (Taiwan)

Organization for parapsychological investigations. It published a newsletter, Parapsychology, in Chinese.

Current address unavailable.

Society for Psychical Research (SPR)

The British organization that became the focus for the emerging field of psychical research in the nineteenth century. Its establishment was proposed on June 6, 1882, at a meeting, by Sir William F. Barrett, and on February 20, 1882, the society came into being. Henry Sidgwick, professor of moral philosophy at Cambridge, was elected president. The first council included Barrett, Edmund Gurney, Balfour Stewart, F. W. H. Myers, Richard Hutton (all non-Spiritualists) and W. Stainton Moses, Dawson Rogers, Morell Theobald, E. N. Bennett, George Wyld, and others (all Spiritualists). The investigation of Spiritualist phenomena was to be the focus of the society's work. Eleanor Sidgwick, Frank Podmore, and Richard Hodgson were among the first to join.

The objects of the society consisted of the following points:

1. An examination of the nature and extent of any influence that may be exerted by one mind upon another, apart from any generally recognized mode of perception.
2. The study of hypnotism and the forms of so-called mesmeric trance, with its alleged insensibility to pain; clairvoyance and other allied phenomena.
3. A critical revision of Reichenbach's research with certain organizations called sensitive, and an inquiry whether such organizations possess any power of perception beyond a highly exalted sensibility of the recognized sensory organs.
4. A careful investigation of any reports, resting on strong testimony regarding apparitions at the moment of death, or otherwise, or regarding disturbances in houses reputed to be haunted.

5. An inquiry into the various physical phenomena commonly called spiritualistic; with an attempt to discover their causes and general laws.

6. The collection and collation of existing materials bearing on the history of these subjects.

The early activity of the society was devoted to an experimental investigation of thought transference. They established it to their satisfaction as a fact. Equally important to this achievement was the discovery of the authors of Phantasms of the Living (Gurney, Myers, and Podmore) that between death and apparitions a connection existed that was not due to chance alone. The report of the committee on the Census of Hallucinations came to the same conclusion. It was largely attributable to the SPR's investigation that hypnotism was officially received by the British Medical Association.

Hysteria, haunted houses, Reichenbach's phenomena, the divining rod, multiple personality, automatic writing, and trance speaking were other subjects taken up in due course.

Very valuable work was done in the study of cross-correspondence and in the investigation of the mediumship of Leonora Piper. The specific subject of communication with the dead was not included in the original program of the society, but the presumption for evidence became so strong that much of the SPR's activity was devoted to its consideration.

In 1889, the American Society for Psychical Research was affiliated. From 1887 until his death in 1905, Hodgson was in charge and concentrated most of his activity on the mystery of Piper's trance communications. This investigation is one of the most memorable events in the whole existence of the society, for, to the satisfaction of many distinguished psychical researchers, it dealt with the question of survival and the possibility of holding intercourse with the departed. Hodgson himself accepted the evidence of survival, to the great jubilation of Spiritualists, for, in the words of E. Dawson Rogers, then president of the London Spiritualist Alliance, “he was a very Saul persecuting the Christians.” Officially, however, the society reached no conclusions, and in the century of its existence it has made no collective pronouncement on the question of survival, maintaining that the constitution of the society precludes a collective opinion.

At first the cooperation between the SPR and the Spiritualists was friendly. The line of distinction was that psychical researchers only attempted to establish the veracity of the phenomena whereas Spiritualists not only considered them proved but also attributed them to the action of disembodied spirits. Sympathy, however, soon changed to hostility as the society refused to endorse, and then in many ways became antagonistic to, the views of the Spiritualists (in spite of the personal views of many of the society's members).

Spiritualists objected to the extreme suspicion and the frequently voiced charges of fraud by psychical researchers and said that their standard of evidence, when they wished to prove fraud, was far more elastic than when the genuine occurrence of phenomena was in question.

Early resentment was shown for the treatment of mediums Kate Fox-Jencken (one of the Fox Sisters), Henry Slade, and William Eglinton, and that this feature of the situation remained constant through a great many years is best evidenced by the statement of Sir Oliver Lodge in his book The Survival of Man, published in 1909: “It has been called a society for the suppression of facts, for the wholesale imputation of imposture, for the discouragement of the sensitive, and for the repudiation of every revelation of the kind which was said to be pressing itself upon humanity from the regions of light and knowledge.”

It cannot be denied that a certain bias against physical phenomena was observable in the society. The exposure by Hodgson of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, cofounder of the Theosophical Society, of performing the same kind of tricks that were present throughout Spiritualism, appears to have prejudiced the society against this side of psychical research.

Eusapia Palladino was branded an impostor in 1895, and it was only after the society's commitment had been reduced to an amusing anachronism by many years of competent investigation all over Europe that the case was reopened in 1908. A committee was delegated to sit with her in Naples; the later verdict was in favor of Palladino.

E. N. Bennett, who was assistant secretary to the society for 20 years, published a book in 1904 under the title Twenty Years of Psychical Research. It is a review of the work of the society and states:

"... the question of the movement of tables without contact is exactly in the state in which it was left by the Dialectical Society in the year 1869. In all the series of the Proceedings there is no light whatever thrown on this simple phenomenon. Some investigation was made as regards direct writing and spirit photography, but to a large extent with negative result."

As far as the official attitude of the society is concerned the question is in about the same state even now. In a century of research, not a single physical phenomenon has been established as an unquestionably genuine fact. This attitude of reserve and the gradual dying out of the first famous group of psychical investigators dimmed the luster of the society for many years. The society could have never been accused of being unduly credulous. Only the most hostile and defensive of debunkers could disagree with William James in his widely read volume, The Will to Believe and Other Essays (1902), "In fact, were I asked to point to a scientific journal where hard-headedness and never-sleeping suspicion of sources of error might be seen in their full bloom, I think that I should have to fall back on the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research."

The reserve shown by the society, so necessary if the findings of psychical research were to be integrated into the larger body of scientific knowledge, led to criticism by those who had too quickly jumped to unwarranted conclusions. Otherwise outstanding scientists such as Gustav Geley scathingly criticized the society's report on Eva C. The William Hope scandal reflected on the good reputation of the society. In public protest against its methods, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle resigned his membership in 1930. His example (as pointed out in an indictment by H. Dennis Bradley) was followed by some other members supporting his views. This indictment was published in the daily press in March 1931 but elicited no public reply on the part of the society.

In his Jubilee address in June 1932, Sir Oliver Lodge remarked that up to that time, in its corporate capacity, the society had entertained no corporate conviction and reported no progress except to the extent that it might have committed itself to a corporate belief in telepathy. He also remarked:

"Many of us are now similarly convinced of the reality of a spiritual world and of its interaction with this world. I wonder whether it would be premature to say so and thus show that we are not merely working towards some unknown and perhaps unprofitable end, but are really in our opinion making progress. . . . I suggest that time has now arrived and that during the next 50 years we might announce this as a verified hypothesis and use it as an explanation of occurrences in which it is evidently an operative factor."

Against criticisms of negative or over-skeptical attitudes, it must be said that the society has maintained a high standard of investigation and discussion. The middle period of elitism and rejection has long passed; the membership has broadened and the scope of investigations is a wide one. In the middle of the twentieth century the society went through a shift from emphasis on psychical research to laboratory experimental parapsychology. The society has successfully avoided the uncritical contagion of the "occult explosion" of the 1960s and also the negative backlash of the 1980s, and has thus retained its leadership in the scientific investigation of the paranormal in England.

The style of contributions to the society's Journal and Proceedings now varies from the simple clarity of a down-to-earth investigation to the highly technical project heavily structured with statistical analysis. Members hold a wide variety of viewpoints and there are lively and stimulating controversies.

The presidential chair of the society has been filled by a veritable who's who of the leading researchers in the field and public personalities who have lent their names to the cause. They include: Henry Sidgwick, 1882–84; Balfour Stewart, 1885–87; Henry Sidgwick, 1888–92; Arthur James Balfour, 1893; William James, 1894–95; Sir William Crookes, 1896–99; F. W. H. Myers, 1900; Sir Oliver Lodge, 1901–03; Sir William Barrett, 1904; Charles Richet, 1905; Gerald William Balfour, 1906–07; Eleanor Sidgwick, 1908–09; H. Arthur Smith, 1910; Andrew Lang, 1911; The Rt. Rev. Bishop W. Boyd Carpenter, 1912; Henri Bergson, 1913; F. C. S. Schiller, 1914; Gilbert Murray, 1915–16; L. P. Jacks, 1917–18; John William Strutt (Lord Rayleigh), 1919; William McDougall, 1920–21; T. W. Mitchell, 1922; Camille Flammarion, 1923; J. G. Piddington, 1924–25; Hans Driesch, 1926–27; Sir Lawrence J. Jones, 1928–29; Walter Franklin Prince, 1930–31; Eleanor Sidgwick (President of Honour) and Sir Oliver Lodge, 1932; Dame Edith Lyttelton, 1933–34; C. D. Broad, 1935–36; R. J. Strutt (Baron Rayleigh), 1937–38; Henry Habberley Price, 1939–41; Robert H. Thouless, 1942–44; G. N. M. Tyrrell, 1945–46; W. H. Slater, 1947–48; Gardner Murphy, 1949–50; S. G. Soal, 1950–51; Gilbert Murray, 1952; F. J. M. Stratton, 1953–55; G. W. Lambert, 1955–58; C. D. Broad, 1958–60; Henry Habberley Price, 1960–61; E. R. Dodds, 1961–63; D. J. West, 1963–65; Sir Alister Hardy, 1965–69; W. A. H. Rushton, 1969–71; C. W. K. Mundle, 1971–74; John Beloff, 1974–76; A. J. Ellison, 1976–79; J. B. Rhine, 1980; Louisa E. Rhine, 1980; A. J. Ellison, 1981–83; D. J. West, 1983–87; Ian Stevenson, 1988–89; Alan Gauld, 1989–92; Archie E. Roy, 1992–95; David G. J. Fontana, 1995–98; D. J. West, 1998–2000.

In addition to the Journal and Proceedings, the society has published a number of books and pamphlets on a wide range of topics concerned with psychical research as well as recordings of important lectures. It also publishes its own quarterly Paranormal Review.

The society is headquartered at 49 Marloes Rd., Kensington, London, W8 6LA, England. Website: <http://moebius.psy.ed.ac.uk/~spr/>.

Sources:

Grattan-Guinness, Ivor, ed. Psychical Research: A Guide to Its History, Principles and Practices, in Celebration of 100 Years of the Society for Psychical Research. London: Aquarian Press, 1982.

Haynes, Renee. The Society for Psychical Research 1882–1982: A History. London: MacDonald, 1982.

Thouless, R. H. Psychical Research Past and Present. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1952.

Society for Psychic Research (Australia)

The Society for Psychic Research was founded in 1933 by Spiritualists who wished to assemble evidence that human personality survives death. Spiritualism, as a religion, has as a major objective obtaining proof that humans survive into a spirit existence. While it carried on occasional research, none of the society's work was scientifically valid, and the major effect of the organization was to stimulate the Australian public's interest in psychical research.

The society continued to function into the 1980s; however, during the last years of its existence it gave up all pretense of being a research organization. It moved its headquarters into a personal growth center and operated a referral agency for various mediums and psychic readers.

Society for Psychic Research (California)

Present name of the organization for many years known as the Southern California Society for Psychological Research. Not to be confused with the long-established British organization, the California group conducts research into extrasensory perception, altered states of consciousness, and related subjects, and it issues a monthly newsletter to members.

Current address unavailable.

Society for Research on Parapsychological Phenomena (Germany)

A parapsychological organization founded in 1976 in Freiburg, Germany. In March 1980, the society organized an International Congress of Parapsychology in Freiburg, attended by eminent parapsychologists from a number of different countries.

Current address unavailable.

Society for Scientific Exploration

Society devoted to advancing the study of anomalous phenomena of the kind Charles Fort called attention to. It operates in various areas both inside and outside established science. It publishes a semiannual Journal of Scientific Exploration. Address: P.O. Box 5848, Stanford, CA 94309-5848. Website: <http://www.scientificexploration.org/>.

Sources:

Society of Scientific Exploration. <http://www.scientificexploration.org/>. March 8, 2000.

Society for the Anthropology of Consciousness (SAC)

An interdisciplinary organization (formerly the Association for the Anthropological Study of Consciousness) interested in states of consciousness; shamanic, spiritual, and magic phenomena; indigenous healing practices; mythological and religious studies; and psi phenomena. SAC publishes a quarterly journal, The Anthropology of Consciousness (formerly the AASC Newsletter), and sponsors an annual spring meeting consisting of monograph readings, panel discussions and workshops. Address: Box 13758, Berkeley, CA 94712.

Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge

The first American Spiritualist organization, established in New York on June 10, 1854. It published the Christian Spiritualist and engaged mediums to give séances free. New York judge John Worth Edmonds and governor N. P. Tallmadge were among its members.

Society for the Investigation of the Unexplained (SITU)

An organization founded by naturalist Ivan T. Sanderson in 1965, "... for the acquisition, investigation and dissemination of information on reports of all tangible items in the fields of chemistry, astronomy, geology, biology and anthropology, that are not readily explained." For a generation it was the leading organization pursuing research on anomalous phenomena of the kind usually associated with Charles Fort. It encouraged fieldwork and on-the-spot investigation by offering advice, helping to raise funds, and arranging contacts for members who planned field trips and expeditions. Fieldwork and research were reviewed by a panel of 20 scientists.

The society disseminated information on findings through a quarterly journal, Pursuit, and through papers and reports. Investigations by society members included such areas as claims of ancient Egyptian television, ringing rocks, entombed toads, and poltergeist manifestations. The society maintained information files of original material, a map collection, and a specialized library. It was disbanded in the 1980s.

Society for the Study of Physiological Patterns

The Society for the Study of Physiological Patterns is a prominent British palmistry organization founded around 1945 by Noel Jaquin (1893–1974) and Beryl Hutchinson to further the science of hand analysis. The society arose amid the vacuum created by the demise of the Cheirological Society of Great Britain at the end of the 1930s, and many former members of the Cheirological Society joined the new organization. It differed from the older organizations in that it included a place for related occult interests such as astrology, graphology, and phrenology.

As a young man, Jaquin had studied with William G. Benham, the prominent palmist and author of The Laws of Scientific Hand Reading (1900). He later developed his own approach to palmistry based upon the idea that the shape of the fingers, palms, and nails, and the texture of the skin were the primary elements indicative of the personality traits of the individual. By the 1930s he concentrated his studies on the fingerprint and the five major patterns, the loop, whorl, arch, tented arch, and composite (a subfield of palmistry called dermatoglyphics). He published his initial findings in two books, The Hand of Man (1933) and The Signature of Time (1940). Jaquin, in particular, was an amazingly productive author and reportedly was the only palmist ever invited to work with Scotland Yard on their investigations. In addition, both Jaquin and Hutchinson worked in the field of medical palmistry, their findings being published in Jaquin's book, Hand and Disease (1926), and Hutchinson's Your Life in Your Hands (1967).

The Society for the Study of Physiological Patterns has grown into an international organization with members throughout the English-speaking world. It is headquartered at 39 Larchwood House, Baywood Sq., Chigwell, Essex IG7 4AY, United Kingdom.

Sources:

Campbell, Edward D. The Encyclopedia of Palmistry. New York: Perigee, 1996.

Hutchinson, Beryl. Your Life in Your Hands. London: Sphere, 1967.

Jaquin, Noel. The Hand of Man. London: Faber, 1933.

———. The Hand Speaks: Your Health, Your Sex, Your Life. New Delhi: Sagar Publications, 1973.

———. The Human Hand—The Living Symbol. Bombay: Taraporevala, 1958.

The Society for the Study of Supernormal Pictures

Small psychical research organization established in 1918 in London, England, to promote the scientific study and investigation of supernormal pictures. Its members consisted largely of professional photographers. The first president was Abraham Wallace. He was assisted by first vice presidents W. G. Mitchell, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, and H. Blackwell.

After many hundreds of experiments, the society reported in May 1920:

"The members here present desire to place on record the fact that after many tests and the examination of thousands of pictures, they are unanimously of opinion that results have been obtained supernormally on sensitive photographic plates under reliable test conditions. At present the members do not undertake to explain how the results have been obtained, but they assert that they have undoubtedly been secured under conditions excluding the possibility of fraud.”

The society's views were not found acceptable to other psychological researchers and it ceased operation in 1923.

Society of Metaphysicians

British organization devoted to a science of unity between physical and psychological fields, founded by J. J. Williamson, an electronic engineer, in 1948. Williamson experienced such psychic abilities as astral projection, also known as out-of-the-body travel, and clairvoyance at an early age, and in later life attempted to find a basis for integrating such faculties with normal physical science. An early associate of the society was “Oliver Fox” (Hugh G. Callaway), pioneer of astral projection, who prepared a mail-order course on the subject for the society.

The society commenced by experimenting in such areas as out-of-the-body travel, aura studies, and dowsing, and later explored biofeedback phenomena. The society concentrates largely on postal courses in conjunction with a mail-order business for books and such psychic appliances as aura goggles for viewing the human aura (as described in the books of Walter J. Kilner and Oscar Bagnall). It is headquartered at Archers Ct., Stonestile Ln., The Ridge, Hastings, East Sussex, England.

Society of Novus Spiritus

The Society of Novus Spiritus was founded in 1986 by spirit medium Sylvia Browne (1936–), who has been channeling a spirit, Francine, since the 1960s. The society was created to disseminate the teachings that have been received over the past 25 years. Novus Spiritus strives to uncover all of the “mysteries” regarding the nature of life, death, God, and the role humans play in life's scheme. Members believe that God never withholds information, though individuals may choose to ignore it.

Novus affirms the existence of an all-loving God and is dedicated to eliminating what it considers the false concepts of Satan, hell, sin, guilt, and the fear of God, all of which are contrary to its understanding of a benevolent Creator. The pain of life is not punishment from God; rather it is a learning tool, and a very necessary one in the larger scheme of life.

The society also affirms that after “death,” the human soul goes to the Other Side, which is better known as heaven. This place is the true reality, as opposed to the temporal planet Earth. The Other Side is eternal, a place of total harmony, no physical limitations. The individual's identity is intact. Life exists in its most wondrous and joyous form on the Other Side. Even though the Other Side is total beauty and happiness, the soul may not be at peace and will still seek to better itself. This seeking drives an urge again to enter life on Earth to experience God's knowledge, gaining perfection in the process. Each soul decides how much experience it wants. While some may never have a life on Earth, others will choose 50 or more lives.

Based upon the observation that everything in nature exhibits a dual nature, most notably in the pairing of male/female, the society teaches that this pattern extends even to the Most High, to God. Members believe in both Mother God and Father God who reflect the patterns of nature. While God the Father holds creation in a constant state of being, God the Mother actively works with and through human beings for learning and perfection. Each is a distinct entity, not just a nebulous force, and they are addressed as Om (male) and Azna (female).

The society exists to help prepare individuals to receive God's wisdom. It teaches that knowledge provides the key needed to unlock the mind, and considers itself to be a Gnostic organization, by which it means that members are seekers after truth (gnosis). God is the source of all truth, available to all who are ready to receive it. The society promotes a community of people who seek to be guided by the Light and dedicated to living a spiritual life.

The society holds weekly celebration services in Campbell, California, and Seattle, Washington. The work of the society is expanded through study groups which utilize a 16-volume set of books written by Browne, Journey of the Soul. Monthly, related study groups receive two cassette tapes by Browne to focus their meetings. Those who complete the Journey of the Soul lessons may choose to take more advanced lessons leading to becoming a deacon and ordained minister of the society.

The Society of Novus Spiritus is headquartered at 35 Dillon Ave., Campbell, CA 95008-3001. Its website can be found at <http://www.sylvia.org/novusdoc.htm>.

Sources:

Browne, Sylvia. Adventures of a Psychic. Carlsbad, Calif.: Hay House, 1998.

———. Journey of the Soul. 16 vols. Campbell, Calif.: Society of Novus Spiritus, 1991–94.

———. Meditation Book I. Campbell, Calif.: Society of Novus Spiritus, 1994.

———. The Other Side and Back. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1999.

Dufresne, Chris. My Life with Sylvia Browne. Carlsbad, Calif.: Hay House, 1999.

Society of Rosicrucians in America See Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia

Society of the Inner Light

The Society of the Inner Light was founded by the British occultist “Dion Fortune” (Violet Mary Firth) in 1924. Originally known as the Community then Fraternity of the Inner Light, it became the Society of the Inner Light when incorporated as a registered charity in 1946.

Firth was a member of the Stella Matutina, an outer order of the famous Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, and the Community of the Inner Light was originally intended by Golden Dawn members as a recruitment body for suitable prospects. Firth came into conflict with Golden Dawn leaders, however, and she split away from the parent body. Firth remained warden of the fraternity until her death in 1946.

The fraternity was headquartered in London and maintained a library of occultism and mysticism, including the various works on occultism by Fortune herself. It also organized public lectures and published a monthly journal, the Inner Light Magazine, devoted to esoteric Christianity, occult science, and the psychology of superconsciousness.

The fraternity purchased a site at Glastonbury, long considered a holy place in Britain, a power center associated with legends of Joseph of Arimathea. A guest house was established on this site on the side of the Tor, the famous Hill of Vision supposed to overlook the Isle of Avalon. Here, Fortune could retreat from the continued tensions she experienced from her interactions with the older, male-dominated magic community. The guest house became a meeting place and social center for those interested in mysticism.

After the death of Dion Fortune, the fraternity continued her teachings virtually unchanged for a time, but eventually its scope broadened, embracing a wider range of occult practices and dispensing with the initiation oath. The society recommenced the publishing of The Inner Light as a quarterly in 1993. Website: <http://www.innerlight.org.uk>.

Sources:

Chapman, Janine. Quest for Dion Fortune. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1993.

Fielding, Charles, and Clark Collins. The Story of Dion Fortune. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1985. Reprint, Loughborough, England: Thoth Publications, 1999.

Knight, Gareth. Dion Fortune and the Inner Light. Loughborough, England: Thoth Publications, 2000.

Richardson, Alan. Priestess: The Life and Magic of Dion Fortune. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1987.

Society Ordo Templi Orientis (SOTO)

The Society Ordo Templi Orientis (SOTO) is one of several groups to emerge following the death in 1962 of Karl Germer, the outer head of the OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis). In the English-speaking world the OTO had been headed by Aleister Crowley until his death in 1947. Crowley appointed Karl Germer as his successor. Germer, however, was inactive during much of the 15 years of his administration, which allowed contact with many of the order's members to be broken. When Germer died, several different people emerged to lead the leaderless organization. A Brazilian, Marcelo Ramos Motta (1931–1987), claimed that on his deathbed, Germer had appointed him as the new head. Motta was not at the time sufficiently advanced to assume the office, but over the next years he completed his initiate work and assumed control of a reorganized order, which he named the Society Ordo Templi Orientis.

Through the society, Motta issued in 1975 the first of four massive volumes of a revived Equinox, modeled on the journal Crowley had published early in the century. Each issue contained writings by Motta and documents that supported his claims, as well as writings by Crowley. Various issues of the Equinox also denounced the rival claimants to OTO leadership who came forward. The issue came to a head in the United States when the OTO sued the SOTO on several legal actions. The publication house Samuel Weiser was caught in the middle as the publisher of both organizations. The primary ruling occurred in 1985, when the court declared the OTO, then led by Grady McMurtry, to be the legal entity who owned all Crowley copyrights and trademarks. In effect, the court turned back all Motta's claims to OTO lineage and leadership.

It may be contacted through the Parzival XI O.T.O. Foundation, P.O. Box 979, Belconnen, ACT 2616 Australia.

Sources:

Motta, Marcelo. Letter to a Brazilian Mason. Nashville, Tenn.: Troll Publishing, 1980.

———. Manifesto. Nashville, Tenn.: Society Ordo Templi Orientis in America, 1978.

———. The Political Aims of the O.T.O. Nashville, Tenn.: Ordo Templi Orientis in America, 1980.

———. Thelemic Political Morality. Nashville, Tenn.: Society Ordo Templi Orientis in America, 1978.

Solar Systems (in Theosophy)

Theosophy has presented a unique perspective on the formation of solar systems. It postulates the existence of an all pervading ether (a popular concept of nineteenth-century science, later discarded), known as koilon, which is imperceptible to ordinary senses and indeed even to clairvoyants except the most highly-developed. It is considered dense despite its diffusion.

The Deity, intending to create a universe, invests this ether with divine force to become matter in the shape of minute drops or bubbles and the universe with its solar systems is formed. First, a mass is aggregated by the appropriate agitation of these drops and added to this mass is a rotatory motion. The formed mass contains the matter to create all the seven worlds. It may be possible to observe that these worlds are not separate in the manner we usually conceive separate worlds to be, but interpenetrate each other.

The substance in its original form is the texture of the first world and to create the texture of the second—and lower—world, the Deity sets up numerous rotatory agitations to collect 49 atoms arranged in a certain way, sufficient for the first atom to form the first world.

This process continues six times, the atoms of the succeeding lower worlds are formed from the world immediately higher and each time with a multiple of forty-nine atoms. Gradually, and with time, the aggregation containing the atoms of all seven worlds completely intermingled, contracts until it forms a nebula with the flat, circular form familiar to astronomy students.

The center is more dense than the fringes. During the process of flattening and due to the initial revolving motion, rings are formed encircling the center. From these rings the planets are formed and later these planets can support human life.

The various worlds penetrate each other substantially within the same bounds, with the exception being the worlds of finer texture that extend beyond those relatively more dense. The names of the worlds are: first, the Divine World, which has not yet been experienced by man; second, the Monad whence come the impulses that form human beings; third, the Spiritual World, which is the highest world humans have experienced; fourth, the Intuitional World; fifth, the Mental World; sixth, the Emotional or Astral World; and seventh is the world of matter familiar to us.

Some of these worlds are referred to in other entries as: Adi or Divine plane; Anupadaka plane (see Monad); Atmic, Nirvanic, or Spiritual plane; and Buddhic or Intuitional plane. (See also Evolution of Life)

Sources:

Jinarajadasa, C. The Early Teachings of the Masters. Chicago: Theosophical Society, 1923.

Leadbeater, C. W. A Textbook of Theosophy. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1956.

SOL See Servants of the Light

Solar Temple

The Solar Temple (officially the Ordre du Temple Solaire or OTS) was an obscure French-speaking initiatory occult order that made front-page headlines following the suicide death of its leaders among 52 people who died in a 72-hour period in three incidents on October 3–5, 1994, in Switzerland and Quebec. Sixteen additional members of the group died on the winter solstice in 1995 and five more on March 22, 1997, in Quebec. It appears that some of those who died committed suicide in hopes of making a transition to a higher world. A few people were murdered, considered traitors by the larger group. The remainder were considered weaker members and were assisted (i.e., murdered) to make the transition.

The Solar Temple was one of a number of groups that emerged in France and neighboring countries in the years since 1804 that traced their authority to a lineage of grand masters of the Order of the Temple, a medieval order of knights that was suppressed at the beginning of the fourteenth century. In 1804, a Parisian physician, Bernard-Raymond Fabré-Palapat (1773–1838), claimed that he was the successor to a secret line of Templar grand masters who had kept the order alive through the years since its disappearance from public view. Following his death the order began to splinter. Among the modern splinters from this milieu was the Renewed Order of the Temple founded around 1970 by Julian Origas (1920–1983).

The Solar Temple was founded in 1984 as the Ordre International Chevalresque Tradition Solaire by Luc Jouret (1947–1994) and Joseph Di Mambro (1924–1994). Jouret was born in the Belgian Congo, but as a youth his parents returned to Belgium where he attended the Free University of Brussels and became a physician. After a short time in the army, he took training as a homeopathic physician and established a practice in France. In the early 1980s he became a popular speaker on alternative medicine in French-speaking Europe and Quebec. His travels brought him into contact with Di Mambro. Di Mambro was a French jeweler and watchmaker who as a young man had joined the Ancient and Mystical Order of the Rosae Crucis (AMORC). In 1973, he founded the first of several successive organizations, the Center for the Preparation of the New Age, in Annemasse, France. One of the successor groups, the Golden Way Foundation, in Geneva, Switzerland, hosted Luc Jouret for some of his health lectures.

The Solar Temple was founded as a secret order in the 1980s. Its members were drawn from affiliates of the Amenta and Archéda Clubs, esoteric groups founded by Jouret, and the Golden Way Foundation. The Solar Temple members saw themselves as assisting in the arrival of the coming New Age. They practiced various meditative and occult disciplines and participated in elaborate rituals to achieve an enlightened state of consciousness. The rituals invoked the spiritual hierarchy of ascended masters to send light and love to bring in the New Age. The recitation of the popular "Great Invocation" that originated in the Alice Bailey's Arcane school was an integral part of their ritual life. Members also believed that the group would produce a next generation of exceptional children, including nine cosmic children who would initiate the New Age. To this end, group members listened to Di Mambro's identification of them with famous people in previous incarnations, his pairing them in cosmic marriages.

The group prospered through the 1980s, reaching a peak of 442 members in 1989, but in the early 1990s it began to lose members, a number of whom demanded the money they had contributed be returned. The leadership became increasingly pessimistic as members defected, no signs of the coming New Age appeared, and Di Mambro's health suffered.

By 1994, Di Mambro, Jouret, and a few members in their confidence began to think in terms of an alternate plan. Since the world was not responding to their message, they decided to escape the world to a higher reality via suicide. In the process, they also decided to take revenge on some of the former members.

In 1982, Di Mambro had fathered a female child, Emmanuelle, who was assigned a messianic role in the New Age. At a later date, against Di Mambro's orders not to have children, Nicki Dutoit became pregnant, and she and her husband left the order. When their child arrived, he was named Christopher Emmanuel. Di Mambro saw this act as a challenge to Emmanuelle's status and labeled the young boy the Antichrist. When the decision was made to make the transition, the Dutoits and their son were the first victims. They were murdered on October 3, 1994, and their two assailants then committed suicide in the house in Morin Heights, Quebec. On that same day, 22 people were found dead in Cheiry, Switzerland, 18 of whom were found in a room with their bodies arranged in a circular patterns as if they were the spokes of a wheel. On October 25 bodies were found in two chalets in Granges-sur Salvan, Switzerland.

It was later concluded that of the total of 52 dead, only 15 were suicides. Besides the three people murdered in Canada, the majority had been drugged and killed, many by shooting. Di Mambro and Jouret were among those who committed suicide. However, the next year 16 more who had not been invited to the original event in Switzerland died at their own hand near Grenoble, France. A final five died on March 22 (spring equinox), 1997, in Canada. In the meantime, the Solar Temple had been disbanded and its surviving members have melded back into the population.

The Solar Temple deaths were a unique event for the European Templar and occult community, though it has in the popular consciousness been tied to several other violent incidents involving small new spiritual/religious groups such as the murders committed by leaders of the AUM Shinrikyo Buddhists in Japan and the suicides of 39 members of Heaven's Gate, the American UFO contactee group. In France and Belgium, it led to a backlash against minority religions that continues to the present. The government of Switzerland carried out an extensive investigation of the deaths and concluded that it had been the outcome of the group's theological choices. Religious scholar Jean François Mayer consulted with the police in their investigation.

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo. "The Magic of Death: The Suicides of the Solar Temple." In Catherine Wessinger, ed. Millennialism, Persecution, and Violence: Historical Cases. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2000.

Meyer, Jean François. "'Our Terrestrial Journey is Coming to an End:' The Late Voyage of the Solar Temple." Nova Religio 2, 2 (April 1999): 172-196.

Palmer, Susan. "Purity and Danger in the Solar Temple." Journal of Contemporary Religion 11, 3 (October 1996): 303-318.

Wessinger, Catherine How the Millennium Comes Violently. New York: Seven Bridges Press, 2000.

Solomon

Legends have connected the biblical King Solomon, son of David, with magical practices. Although it does not possess any biblical authority, there is a considerable body of Middle Eastern folklore concerning Solomon that grows out of his reputation as one of the wisest of men, coupled with the possible identification of Solomon with a still older mythical figure named Suleiman. Arabic and Persian legends speak of a prehistoric race that was ruled by 72 monarchs by the name of Suleiman.

Nineteenth-century occultist John Yarker, author of The Arcane Schools (1909), stated: "It does not seem that these Suleimans who are par excellence the rulers of all Djinn, Afreets and other elemental spirits, bear any relationship to the Israelite King." The name, he said, is found in that of a god of the Babylonians. Dr. Kenealy, the translator of Hafiz, said that the earliest Aryan teachers were named Mohn, Bodles, or Solymi, and that Suleiman was an ancient title of royal power, synonymous with "Sultan" or "Pharaoh."

A Persian legend states that in the mountains of Kaf, there is a gallery built by the giant Arzeak, where there are statues of a race who were ruled by the Suleiman or wise King of the East. There is a great chair or throne of Solomon hewn out of the solid rock called the Takht-i-Suleiman or throne of Solomon.

It is to these older Suleimans that we must look for a connection with the tradition of occultism. It is not unlikely that the legend relating to Solomon and his temple have been confused with these, and that the protagonists of the antiquity of Freemasonry, who trace their organization to the building of Solomon's Temple, have intermingled some still older rite or mystery relating to the ancient dynasty of Suleiman with the circumstances of the Masonic activities of the Hebrew monarch. Hebrew historian Josephus notes,

"God enabled Solomon to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanative to men. He composed such incantations, also, by which distempers are alleviated, and he left behind him the manner of using exorcisms, by which they drive away demons, so that they never return. And this method of cure is of great force unto this day; for I have seen a certain man of my own country, whose name was Eleazar, releasing people that were demoniacal, in the presence of Vespasian and his sons, and his captains, and the whole multitude of his soldiers.

"The manner of the cure was this. He put a ring that had a root of one of these sorts mentioned by Solomon to the nostrils; and when the man fell down immediately, he adjured him to return unto him no more, making still mention of Solomon, and reciting the incantations which he composed. And when Eleazar would persuade and demonstrate to the spectators that he had such a power, he set, a little way off, a cup, or basin full of water, and commanded the demon as he went out of the man, to overturn it, and thereby to let the spectators know that he had left the man."

Some claimed fragments of these magical books of Solomon are mentioned in the Codex Pseudepigraphus of Fabricius, and Josephus himself has described one of the antidemoniacal roots, which appears to refer to legends of the perils involved in gathering the mandrake root, or mandragoras.

The Islamic Solomon

The Qur'an alleges that Solomon had power over the winds, and that he rode on his throne throughout the world during the day, and the wind brought it back every night to Jerusalem. This throne was placed on a carpet of green silk, of a prodigious length and breadth, and sufficient to afford standing room to all Solomon's army, the men on his right hand and the jinn on his left. An army of the most beautiful birds hovered near the throne, forming a kind of canopy over it and the attendants, to screen the king and his soldiers from the sun.

A certain number of evil spirits were also made subject to Solomon, whose business it was to dive for pearls and perform other work.

It is also stated that the devils, having received permission to tempt Solomon, in which they were not successful, conspired to ruin his character. They wrote several books of magic, and hid them under his throne, and when he died they told the chief men among the Jews that if they wished to ascertain the manner in which Solomon obtained his absolute power over men, Genii, and the winds, they should dig under his throne. They did so and found the books, abounding with the most impious superstitions.

The more learned and enlightened refused to participate in the practices described in those books, but they were willingly adopted by the common people. Muslims asserted that the Jewish priests published this scandalous story concerning Solomon, which was believed until Mahomet, by God's command, declared him to have been no idolater.

It was further maintained by some Muslims that Solomon brought a thousand horses from Damascus and other cities he conquered, although some say they were left to him by his father David, who seized them from the Amalekites; others claimed that they came out of the Red Sea and were provided with wings. The king wished to inspect his horses and ordered them to be paraded before him. Their symmetry and beauty so much occupied his attention that he gazed on them after sunset, and thus neglected evening prayers until it was too late. When aware of his omission, he was so greatly concerned at it that he ordered the horses to be killed as an offering to God, keeping a hundred of the best of them. This, we are informed, procured for him an ample recompense, as he received for the loss of his horses dominion over the winds.

The following tradition was narrated by Muslim commentators relative to the building of the temple of Jerusalem. According to them, David laid the foundations of it, and when he died he left it to be finished by Solomon. That prince employed Jinn, and not men, in the work; and this idea may relate to what is said in Kings 6:7, that the temple was "built of stone, made ready before it was brought thither, so that there was neither hammer, no axe, nor any tool of iron, heard in the house while it was building." The rabbis noticed a worm that they claimed assisted the workmen, the power of which was such as to cause the rocks and stones to separate in chiseled blocks.

While engaged in the erection of the temple, Solomon found his end approaching, and he prayed that his death might be concealed from the Jinn until the building was finished. His request was granted. He died while in the act of praying, leaning on the staff that supported his body in that posture for a whole year. The Jinn, who believed he was still alive, continued their work. At the expiration of the year the edifice was completed. When a worm that had entered the staff ate through it and, to the amazement even of the Jinn, the body fell to the ground, the king was discovered to be dead.

The inhabitants of the valley of Lebanon believed that the celebrated city and temple of Baalbec were erected by the Jinn under Solomon's direction. The object of the erection of Baalbec was variously stated, one tradition affirming that it was intended to be a residence for the Egyptian princess whom Solomon married, and another that it was built for the Queen of Sheba.

The Magical Solomon

From the sixteenth century on, occultists have studied the great grimoire known as The Key of Solomon (Clavicula Salomonis) to which tradition ascribes an ancient history before it was committed to writing. This book of ceremonial magic has two sections: the Great Key and the Lemegeton or Lesser Key. The first is concerned with magic spells, rituals, and talismans, the second with the evocation of spirits.

There is also another work known as The Testament of Solomon that was translated into German from an ancient Greek manuscript. Manuscripts of the Testament have also been reported from Greek monasteries, and the work is extremely rare in any format. The work claims to be Solomon's own story covering the period between the building of the Temple in Jerusalem and his own fall from grace. It tells the story of a vampire-like Jinn and the magic ring of Solomon and details the various spirits and the magical means of controlling them. The ring of Solomon is also the subject of stories in the Arabian Nights.

In the seventeenth century, Freemasons began to trace their work backward to Hiram, the architect of Solomon's kingdom. This indirect reference to Solomon has possibly been the single reference that has kept Solomon associated with the occult world.

Sources:

Conybeare, F. C., ed. The Key of Truth. London, 1898.

Mathers, F. L. MacGregor, ed. The Key of Solomon the King. London: George Redway, 1908. Reprint, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1972.

Shah, Sayed Idires. The Secret Lore of Magic: Books of the Sorcerers. London: Frederick Muller, 1957.

Waite, Arthur E. The Book of Ceremonial Magic. London: William Rider, 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Solomon, Mirror of Popular name given to a "magic mirror" used for divination. Various magical signs and devices have been attributed to the biblical Solomon, but they were derived from folk legends rather than any statements in the Hebrew Bible. The Mirror of Solomon is constructed from a shining and well-polished plate of fine steel, slightly concave. The blood of a white pigeon is inscribed at the four corners with the names "Jehovah," "Eloym," "Metatron," and "Adonay."

The newly constructed mirror is placed in a clean and white cloth. Its owner, when beholding a new moon during the first hour after sunset, would repeat a prayer that the angel Anaël might command and ordain his companions to act as they are instructed, that is, to assist the operator in divining from the mirror. He or she would then cast a suitable perfume upon burning coals, at the same time uttering a prayer.

After repeating this process three times, the person breathes on the mirror and evokes the angel Anaël. The sign of the cross is then made upon the operator and upon the mirror for 45 days in succession, at the end of which period, if all goes as planned, Anaël appears in the form of a beautiful child to accomplish the operator's wishes. Sometimes he appears on the fourteenth day, according to the devotion and fervor of the operator. The perfume used in evoking him is saffron.

For another method of constructing a magic mirror that does not involve the sacrifice of a white pigeon, see the appendix to The Philosophy of Natural Magic by Henry C. Agrippa (University Books, 1974).

Solomon Ibn Gabirol (ca. 1021–ca. 1058)

Spanish-Hebrew poet and mystic philosopher. He was an advocate of neoplatonism, but also ascribed to the via negativa, the mystical doctrine that holds that the deity can only be understood as a negation of all attributes (which are in themselves limiting and human in our thoughts). He considered this view essential to the preservation of Jewish monotheism.

Solovovo, Count See Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo, Count

Solstices

As ancient peoples began systematic observation of heavenly phenomena, they noticed the wandering habits of the Sun, easily measured by its changing location at its daily rising. Over half a year the rising point would be a little further to the north each day and then it would appear to pause and begin moving south. In the Northern Hemisphere, it would reach its northernmost point just as the summer began and its southernmost point as a prelude to the coldest days. The word “solstice” is derived from the apparent pause, from the Latin sistere, to stand still. The phenomena of the changing position of the rising sun is due to the 23-degree tilt to the Earth’s axis. The axis changes daily as the Earth rotates around the Sun.

The Sun’s movements were so obvious, and so equated with changing weather, that some form of acknowledgment of the solstices occurred in cultures around the world. Some of these festivals continue into the present and many were observable in the recent past. Among the oldest records of solstice celebrations are found in the remains of the ancient megalithic cultures, such as the one that led to the building of Stonehenge. Such stone monuments were frequently oriented to include an alignment to the point of the rising sun at the summer solstice, presumably an occasion for the community to gather for ritual observances.

In astrology, the solstices were important markers. The Sun entered Capricorn at the winter solstice and Cancer at the summer solstice. While important markers in constructing a horoscope, the solstices were little used in its interpretation.

In modern times, as Paganism has been revived, the summer solstice has become a major occasion for ritual gatherings, among the oldest and certainly the most famous being the gatherings of the Druids at Stonehenge. Until quite recently, the summer solstice was celebrated in Germany with a picnic and bonfire. Couples would attempt to jump the bonfire as a sign of the strength of their relationship. Neo-Pagans mark the solstices as two of the major festival occasions (called sabbats). The ancient winter solstice, called Yule, has survived in a radically altered form as the Christian’s Christmas, but is now being celebrated in its own right.

Sources:

Cunningham, Scott. Wicca: A Guide for the Solitary Practitioner. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1988.

Farrar, Stewart. What Witches Do. New York: Coward, McCann & Geoghegan, 1971.

Lewis, James R. Encyclopedia of Astrology. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.

Spicer, Dorothy Gladys. The Book of Festivals. New York: Womans Press, 1937.

Soma

A term found in the hymns of the Rig-Veda, one of the four sacred scriptures of ancient India (the others are the Sama Veda, Yajur Veda, and Artharva Veda). The essential teachings of the Vedas were recast in the form of the Upanishads, of which there are 108 principal scriptures and a number of minor ones.

The ninth chapter of the Rig-Veda comprises 114 verses in praise of soma, the ambrosia of the gods and the elixir of immortality. It is clear that soma was also an intoxicating drink (possibly made from the milk-weed asclepias acida described in the Yajur Veda as a dark, sour creeper without leaves). This drink was offered by the priests as a libation to the gods, much as wine is used sparingly in the sacraments of the Christian religion for symbolic purposes.

In the twentieth century, several writers, most notably R. Gordon Wasson in his book Soma, Divine Mushroom of Immortality (1968), have speculated that soma was the amanita muscaria (a mushroom with hallucinogenic properties) and that Hindu mysticism arose from intoxication of the priests. This suggestion stemmed from Wasson’s research in Mexico, when he discovered a Mazatec Indian religious practice based on the use of a hallucinogenic mushroom.

Wasson’s soma theory became attractive during the psychedelic revolution of the 1960s, and it became fashionable to expand upon Wasson’s view to assert that transcendental revelation had always been stimulated by the use of psychedelic drugs. Another writer, John M. Allegro, suggested in his book The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross (1970) that the crucifixion story of Jesus was a symbolic myth of the ecstasy produced by a psychedelic drug.

Intoxicating (as opposed to psychedelic) beverages have certainly been known since ancient times in Egypt, India, Greece, and Rome. Warnings about intoxication abound in ancient writings, notably in the Bible, in the Proverbs of Solomon, in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Amos, and Hosea. In the Christian religion, the apostle Paul complained of drunkenness at the agape, or love feasts, celebrated in common. Novatian, a Church father of the third century, spoke of Christians who, in the morning after fasting, began the day by drinking, pouring wine into their still “empty veins,” and were drunk before eating.

In India, the Manava Dharma Shastra (Ordinances of Manu), a code of religious and civil duties, prohibited intoxication on the part of Brahmin priests and made it clear that the soma drink was from a plant, not a mushroom. This plant is sometimes called the “moon plant,” and soma was traditionally associated with the moon.

Yoga treatises on meditation suggest that the true soma, or elixir of life, is the union of the twin currents of kundalini energy in the human body, culminating in higher consciousness. Some Hindus believe in kundalini as a latent energy situated at the base of the spine that is activated in normal life in sexual activity, but which may also be drawn upward in subtle channels of the spine to a center in the head, illuminating the consciousness with mystical awareness. The goal of some forms of yoga practice is often referred to as the union of the sun and moon, the fiery and cool kundalini currents in the spinal column. At the junction of these currents, the blissful condition is described as “drinking the soma juice,” and the energy flow as “amaravaruni” (wine drinking).

The elaborate symbolism and metaphor of Hindu mysticism has often misled commentators into literal interpretations. While intoxicants and hallucinatory drugs may produce transcendental experiences, throughout history great prophets and mystics, as well as scientists and geniuses, have been inspired by a higher consciousness that owed nothing to intoxication or hallucinogenic mushrooms. The twentieth-century discovery of psychedelic drugs and their power to transform normal consciousness have misled many people into vastly overstating the role of such substances in the history of mystical experiences. Critics of drug use have also complained that the use of drugs for mystical purposes has yet to “produce a single inspiring statement on the philosophy and meaning of life comparable with the wisdom of the prophets and mystics of history.”

In the 1960s, several groups were formed in the United States to promote the idea of the religious use of psychedelics, but most of these dissolved following negative court actions. Outside of these circles, as recently as 1988, a short-lived attempt to defend the psychedelic/soma connection was made in the journal ReVision (vol. 10, no. 4, spring 1988). There was little positive response and a strong rebuttal by Gene Kieffer, a follower of Indian teacher Gopi Krishna.

Sources:

Allegro, John M. The Sacred Mushroom and the Cross. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1970; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1970.

Gopi Krishna. The Awakening of Kundalini. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1973.

Iyengar, Yogi Srinivasa. Hatha-Yoga-Pradipika of Svātāmarama Svāmin. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1933.

Kieffer, Gene. “An Appeal for Common Sense.” SFF Newsletter [Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship] (October 1988).

———. “It’s Not the Soma that the Brahmans Know!” SFF Newsletter [Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship] (September 1988).

———. “ReVision Revisits the Sacred Mushroom.” SFF Newsletter [Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship] (August 1988).

Masters, R. E. L., and Jean Houston. The Varieties of Psychedelic Experience. New York: Delta, 1967.

Rele, Vasant G. The Mysterious Kundalini: The Physical Basis of the “Kundalini (Hatha) Yoga” in Terms of Western Anatomy and Physiology. Rev. ed. Bombay, India: D. B. Taraporevala, 1950.

Wasson, R. Gordon. Soma, Divine Mushroom of Immortality. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971.

Zaehner, R. C. Mysticism: Sacred and Profane. London: Clarendon Press, 1957. Reprint, Galaxy Book, 1961.

Somatography

A fringe medical technique deriving from study of the human aura, devised by Welsh healer Bryn Jones. The term derives from the Greek and implies “mapping-out of the soul.” Jones “massages” the auras of his patients, using a diagnostic device taken over from radionics and designed by an American named Mark Gallot. This therapy of healing through the human aura recalls an earlier technique of Hyppolite Baraduc, who used to “clip” a short distance around the face and body of his patient with large copper scissors to free the etheric body from the physical part of the aura.

Jones operates a center for healing known as the Company of Somatographers, located in Nottingham Pl., London, W.1., England.

Sommer, Robert (1929–)

Research psychologist with special interest in imagery and its relationship to paranormal experience. He was born April 26, 1929, in New York City. He studied at Hobart College, Geneva, New York (B.A., 1950), the University of Oklahoma (M.S., 1952), and the University of Kansas (Ph.D., 1956). Following his graduation he was a research psychologist at Saskatchewan Hospital, Canada (1957–63) and assistant professor, University of Alberta, Edmonton (1961–63) prior to joining the Department of Psychology at the University of California, Davis, California, in 1963. He contributed a paper on parapsychology to The Psychic Force: Essays in Modern Psychological Research edited by Allan Angoff (1970).

Sources:

Angoff, Alan, ed. The Psychic Force: Essays in Modern Psychological Research. New York: Putnam, 1970.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Somnambulism

Term derived from Latin somnus (sleep) and ambulare (to walk). A state of sleep, or half-waking trance, spontaneously or artificially induced, in which subconscious faculties take the place of normal consciousness and direct the body in the performance of various actions from the erratic (sleep walking) to the highly intellectual (solving problems). Somnambulism may start as an exaggerated dream and lead to the development of what resembles a secondary personality with a chain of memory of its own. This chain of memory will often be found as part of the hypnotic memory. The personality itself, in some cases, may exhibit wisdom beyond that of the waking subject and perform paranormal feats.

The somnambulist may have his or her eyes closed, and ears deaf to auditory impressions or sense impressions, without awakening any gleam of consciousness. This lack of attention to sensory impressions may have some effect in rousing new trains of association and suggesting a new line of action. It is suggested that the sleepwalker may see only a mental picture of what he or she is doing as in a dream instead of objective reality, and certain experimental tests have suggested that this occurs in some cases.

The somnambulist state was the discovery of the Marquis Chastenot de Puysegur in 1784 in the context of mesmerism and animal magnetism. He induced it by passes, and finally, by a simple act of will. The Abbé Faria brought it on by shouting; Chevalier de Barbarin by praying; and James Braid by staring at a bright object, usually his lancet case.

The nineteenth-century physician Alexandre Bertrand assigned somnambulism to four causes: (1) A particular nervous temperament that predisposes individuals otherwise in good health to paroxysm of somnambulism during their ordinary sleep. (2) It is sometimes produced in the course of certain diseases of which it may be considered a symptom of a crisis. (3) It is often seen in the course of the proceedings necessary to bring on the condition known as animal magnetism. (4) It may result as a consequence of a high degree of mental exaltation. Accordingly, he distinguished four kinds of somnambulism: the natural, the symptomatic, the artificial, and ecstatic. Hypnotism would fall under the artificial category, and trance under the ecstatic.

Physiologically, somnambulism differs from sleep in that the muscles retain the ordinary tension of the waking life. The eyeballs are usually in an unnatural position, drawn upward and inward so that the vision is directed to the top of the forehead. There is an insensibility to pain; taste and smell are paralyzed. The external senses are perfectly sealed. No memory is carried into the waking state.

There are various degrees of somnambulism. Charles Richet spoke of semi-somnambulism, the state in which the medium retains consciousness while automatic manifestations take place. Catalepsy is a deep stage of somnambulism. The fakirs and yogis of India induced it by an effort of will.

The mildest form of somnambulism is typified in the inarticulate murmurings or vague gestures of a dreaming child, while in the most extreme cases where all the senses are active and the actions apparently as purposive as in the normal waking state, it borders on the condition of spontaneous hypnotism.

Its affinity with hypnosis was recognized early, when the hypnotic subjects of the animal magnetists were designated “somnambules.” It is remarkable that somnambulists may walk in dangerous paths with perfect safety, but if they are suddenly awakened they are liable to fall. Spontaneous somnambulism generally indicates some tendency of the nervous system, since as a rule, only in some abnormal state could the dream ideas exercise so exciting an influence on the brain as to rouse to activity centers normally controlling voluntary movements.

Sylvan J. Muldoon (with Hereward Carrington) in The Projection of the Astral Body (1929) writes of “astral somnambulism,” a state of unconscious astral projection that, according to Muldoon, was far more common than generally supposed. It mostly occurred in the dream state.

It should be noted that in the wake of contemporary language concerning altered states of consciousness, somnambulism has dropped out of the language of psychology and parapsychology.

Sources:

Belden, L. W. Somnambulism: The Extraordinary Case of J. C. Rider, the Springfield Somnambulist. London, 1834.

Bertrand, A. Traité du Somnambulisme. Paris, 1824.

Braid, James. Neurpnoylogy; Or, The Rationale of Nervous Sleep. London, 1843. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Cahagnet, L. A. The Celestial Telegraph; Or, Secrets of the Life to Some Revealed Through Magnetism. London, 1850. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Colquhoun, J. C. Report of the Experiments on Animal Magnetism; Made By a Committee of the Medical Section of the French Royal Academy of Sciences . . . 1831. Edinburgh, 1833. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Esdaile, James. Natural and Mesmerism Clairvoyance. London, 1852. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Haddock, Joseph W. Somnolism and Psycheism; Or, The Science of the Soul and the Phenomena of Nervation as Revealed by Vital Magnetism or Mesmerism. London, 1851. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Fahnestock, W. B. Statuolism: Artificial Somnambulism. Chicago: Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, 1871.

Tuke, W. H. Sleep-walking and Hypnotism. Philadelphia: Blakiston; London: Churchill, 1884.

Weinhold, Arnold. Seven Lectures on Somnambulism. Edinburgh, Scotland, 1845.

Sons Ahman Israel See Suns Ahman Ishrael—I:A:O:

Sorcery

Term originating in the 14th century. From Middle English sovererie, and Old French soverier, derived from the Vulgar Latin sortiarius, traced back to the original Latin, sors, meaning lot, or chance, and sortis, the genitive case meaning of, or by, lots. Indicating the practice of divination by lots. Its practices date back to prehistoric and pre-Columbian religions, as well as those of the Middle East and ancient Egypt; by the Middle Ages it referred to the practice of malevolent magic, or black magic, most commonly the use of supposed supernatural power by the agency of evil spirits called forth by spells by any person with a desire for malice, often motivated out of envy or revenge. Contrasted from witchcraft, referring to the destructive methods that can be used by anyone, rather than by one with the special innate powers attributed to witches. Also connotes the use of special charms, potions, or rituals to cast a particular spell. Practices abounded in certain regions of Africa and Oceania among the tribal peoples into the 21st century.

Sources:

Encyclopedia Britannica. <http://www.brittanica.com/>. April 11, 2000.

Sordi, Signora Lucia (1871– ?)

Italian physical medium, a working-class woman controlled by “Remigio,” a spirit who specialized in giving demonstrations, under test conditions, of matter passing through matter, producing many-colored psychic lights, materializations, and telekinesis.

The clothes of the securely-fastened medium were often removed from under a labyrinth of knots while not the slightest ringing was heard from the small bells attached to her garments. Handcuffs and a straitjacket were similarly taken off, and the medium herself was repeatedly placed outside a padlocked wooden fence more than two yards high.

In 1911, the Società de Studi Psichici de Milano engaged Sordi’s services for test sittings during a period of not less than a year. During this investigation, Baron Schrenck-Notzing attended two of the sittings. He discovered no trickery but expressed an opinion in Psychische Studien that the results might have been obtained by purely mechanical means. This opinion stimulated an animated controversy. In December 1911, and in the following January, the medium sat for scientists in Rome. An interesting account of an attempted exposure is given by Professor V. Tummolo in Luce e Ombra. A sitter being touched by a solid materialized limb switched on an electric lamp and produced a dazzling light. Tummolo continues,

“Then to my sight there appeared a sort of transparent shirt, which vanished immediately, instantaneously entering the medium. The latter, who happened to be standing at some distance from the cabinet and not far from the individual responsible for the sudden illumination, fell to the ground like a corpse, and then commenced to wail in an indescribable manner. Every possible attention was hastily rendered her; but she expectorated blood, and felt terrible pains in the region of the heart until the next day—pains which forced her to utter cries which she was unable to repress. . . . In the cabinet, immediately after the event just narrated, the medium’s gown was found completely buttoned up, in spite of the fact that she was still bound in the manner previously described—bound, that is to say, in respect to her hands and body, with a network of ribbon.”

Tummolo expressed his conviction of the genuineness of Sordi’s mediumship.

Sorokin, Pitirim Alexandrovitch (1889–1968)

Professor of sociology with special interest in the supraconscious, manifestations of genius, and creativity. He was born January 21, 1889, at Turya, Vologda Province, Russia. He studied at the University of St. Petersburg (M.A. criminal law, 1916; Ph.D. sociology, 1922). He became a lecturer at the University of St. Petersburg but was eventually banished by the Soviet government in 1922.

He moved to the United States and became a professor of sociology at the University of Minnesota (1924–30). In 1930, he moved to Harvard University, where he founded and headed the department of sociology (1930–43). In 1943, he became the director of the Harvard Research Center in Creative Altruism where he remained until his retirement. Sorokin published 30 books on sociology and history.

He contributed an introduction to The Psychic Source Book, edited by Alson J. Smith, which includes an appendix in which Sorokin wrote on the importance of parapsychology. He died February 19, 1968.

SORRAT

Acronym for the Society for Research on Rapport and Telekinesis, a group founded by John G. Neihardt. Meetings were usually held at Neihardt’s home at Skyrim Farm, near Columbia, Missouri.

Neihardt’s interest in psychic matters stemmed from his close association with the Indian Rights movement from 1903 on. Neihardt was accepted as a participant in secret healing ceremonies and was actively concerned with the Indian shaman Black Elk, the subject of his book Black Elk Speaks (William Morrow, 1932). Neihardt’s wife, Mona, had been associated with Spiritualism and was mediumistic, and Neihardt investigated the phenomena of various mediums.

The SORRAT group was formed during the mid-1960s with a primary focus on the manipulation of matter by conscious mental effort. Neihardt discussed the group methods with veteran parapsychologist J. B. Rhine, in order to conduct experiments in a congenial atmosphere that would also be fraud-proof.

One technique employed was the “mini-lab”—a sealed transparent box containing target objects for testing psychokinesis. With the assistance of parapsychologist Edward William Cox, an automatic filming method was developed in which a fixed movie camera and lights were trained on a mini-lab and activated by an electrical signal. The former McDonnell Laboratory for Psychic Research also supported these techniques. From 1965 on, the SORRAT group performed experiments tending to validate psychokinesis, levitation, apport, apparitions, and communication with entities. However, the methods of recording the phenomena were so poor that most parapsychologists have dismissed the experiments as the unfortunate work of unprepared amateurs and hence of no evidential value.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Richards, John Thomas. SORRAT: A History of the Neihardt Psychokinesis Experiments, 1961–1981. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1982.

Sorrel Leaf

A sorrel leaf was sometimes used to bewitch people, as in the case of the Irish witch mentioned in George Sinclair's Satan's Invisible World Displayed (1685), who gave to a girl a leaf of sorrel that the child put into her mouth. Great torture ensued for the child and increased on the approach of the witch.

Sortilege

Divination by lots, one of the most ancient and common superstitions. It was used among Oriental nations to detect a guilty person, as when Saul by this means discovered that Jonathan had disobeyed his command by taking food, and when the sailors by a similar process found Jonah to be the cause of the tempest by which they were overtaken.

The various methods of using the lot have been very numerous, including rhabdomancy, clidomancy, the Sortes Sagittariae or belomancy, and the common casting of dice. The following are the more classical methods:

Sortes Thriaecae, or Thriaen lots, were chiefly used in Greece; they were pebbles or counters distinguished by certain characters that were cast into an urn, and the first that came out was supposed to contain the right direction. This form of divination received its name from the Thriaej, three nymphs supposed to have nursed Apollo and to have invented this mode of predicting futurity.

Sortes Viales, or street and road lots, were used both in Greece and Rome. The person that wanted to learn his fortune carried with him a certain number of lots, distinguished by several characters or inscriptions. Walking to and fro in the public ways he asked the first boy whom he met to draw, and the inscription on the lot thus drawn was received as an infallible prophecy. Plutarch declared that this form of divination was derived from the Egyptians, by whom the actions and words of boys were carefully observed as containing in them something prophetic.

Another form of the Sortes Viales was exhibited by a boy, or sometimes by a man, who positioned himself in a public place to give responses to all comers. He was provided with a tablet, on which certain predictive verses were written; when consulted, he cast dice on the tablet, and the verses on which they fell were supposed to contain the proper direction. Sometimes instead of tablets they had urns, in which the verses were thrown, written upon slips of parchment. The verse drawn out was received as a sure guide and direction. Tibullus alluded to this custom as follows: “Thrice in the streets the sacred lots she threw, and thrice the boy a happy omen drew.” This form of divining was often practiced with the Sibylline oracles, and hence was named Sortes Sibyllina.

Sortes Prenestinae, or the Prenestine lots, were used in Italy. The letters of the alphabet were placed in an urn and shaken; they were then turned out upon the floor, and the words that they accidentally formed were received as omens.

This divinatory use of letters is still known in Eastern countries. The Muslims had a divining table that they said was invented by the prophet Edris or Enoch. It was divided into a hundred little squares, each of which contained a letter of the Arabic alphabet. The person who consulted it repeated three times the opening chapter of the Qur'an, and the 57th verse of the 6th chapter: “With Him are the keys of the secret things; none knoweth them but Him; He knoweth whatever is on the dry ground, or in the sea: there falleth no leaf but he knoweth it; neither is there a single grain in the dark parts of the earth, nor a green thing, nor a dry thing, but it is written in a perspicuous book.”

Having concluded this recitation, he averted his head from the table and placed his finger upon it; he then looked to see upon what letter his finger was placed, wrote that letter; the fifth following it; the fifth following that again; and so on until he came back to the first he had touched. The letters thus collected formed the answer.

Sortes Homericae and Sortes Virgilianae involve divination by opening some poem at hazard and accepting the passage that first turns up as an answer. This practice probably arose from the esteem that poets had among the ancients, by whom they were reputed divine and inspired persons. Homer's works among the Greeks had the most credit, but the tragedies of Euripides and other celebrated poems were occasionally used for the same purpose. The Latins chiefly consulted Virgil, and many curious coincidences were related by grave historians, between the prediction and the event; thus, the elevation of Severus to the Empire is supposed to have been foretold by his opening at this verse, “Remember, Roman, with imperial sway to rule the nations.”

It is said that Charles I and Lord Falkland made trial of the Virgilian lots a short time before the commencement of the great Civil War. The former opened at that passage in the fourth book of the Aeneid where Dido predicts the violent death of her faithless lover; the latter at the lamentation of Evander over his son in the eleventh book. If the story is true, the coincidences between the responses and events are remarkable.

Sortes Biblicae was divination by the Bible, which the early Christians used instead of the profane poets. Nicephorus Gregoras recommended the Psalter as the fittest book for the purpose, but Cedrenus stated that the New Testament was more commonly used. St. Augustine denounced this practice in temporal affairs, but declared in one of his letters that he had recourse to it in all cases of spiritual difficulty. Another form of the Biblical lots was to go to a place of worship and take as an omen the first passage of Scripture read by the minister or the text from which he preached.

Muslims consulted the Qur'an in a similar manner, but one of their methods was to deduce their answer from the seventh line of the right-hand page. Others counted how often the letters kha and shin occurred in the page; if kha (the first letter of kheyr, “good”) predominated, the answer was deemed favorable, but if shin (the first letter of shim, “evil”) appeared more frequently, the inference was that the projects of the inquirer were forbidden or dangerous.

It would be easy to multiply examples of these efforts to obtain guidance from blind chance. They were once so frequent that it was deemed necessary to denounce them from the pulpit as being clearly forbidden by the divine precept, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."

Soul

The term soul is used in two senses—it indicates the ego and the spirit-body. In ancient writings, an individual was described as a triune being: body, soul, and spirit. According to this concept, the soul is just as much an envelope, animated by the spirit, as the physical body is an envelope for the soul. At death the soul withdraws and continues to function in the spiritual world. Astral body and soul are almost equivalent terms.

Some occult and Eastern teachings, however, speak of five bodies of differing degrees of refinement that will be cast away in time just as the physical body is left behind.

In his book Man and the Universe (1908), Sir Oliver Lodge defined the soul and ego as,

"... that controlling and guiding principle which is responsible for our personal expression and for the construction of the body, under the restrictions of physical condition and ancestry. In its higher development it includes also feeling and intelligence and will, and is the storehouse of mental experience. The body is its instrument or organ, enabling it to receive and convey physical impressions, and to effect and be effected by matter and energy."

Because such concepts as "soul" and "spirit" (as its animating essence) are not available for scientific scrutiny like the body or the world of matter generally, many scientists have either denied their existence as real entities or as a reality not subject to scientific scrutiny, although retaining as useful the concept of consciousness, with which the ego is associated.

Spiritualists claim that there is evidence for survival of consciousness after death, and that there is sufficient individuality in the surviving consciousness to justify the use of the term soul. A good deal of psychical research tends to confirm this position, without necessarily accepting the religious implications of such survival.

Christianity has generally taught the resurrection of the body, although, in light of Paul's mention of a spiritual resurrection body, there has been some disagreement on the exact nature of that revived body. The doctrine of the soul has always vied for attention with the Greek notion of the immortality of the soul.

In Eastern religious philosophy, there are clear distinctions between the gross ego of name and form (with individual experience) and the subtle ego that is claimed as a universal substratum of all individual souls. The gross ego, by reason of its limitations of experience and consciousness, is tied to the world of matter, which is transient. This ego is an obstruction to fuller awareness of reality and must be transcended by selfless service and refinement of consciousness. In this process, the individual soul loses its attachment to the transient desires and fears of material life and is eventually subsumed in a divine consciousness. In this progress, the world of matter becomes like an illusion that ceases to have validity when divine reality supervenes. As long as an attachment to the world of matter and sense experience remains, the soul must go through a process of reincarnation.

The concept of the soul remains unverifiable by experimental method that is based on the limitations of material existence itself. But it is a useful concept insofar as it relates to individual subjective experience, which is often more relevant to ethical goals than laboratory experiments.

For many individuals, the conviction that there is a soul that is independent of (although shaped by) the physical body occurs as they experience out-of-the-body travel or astral projection. Such an experience is an overwhelming one to most who have it and has become a profound religious experience to many individuals.

Sources:

Bernard, Theos. The Philosophical Foundations of India. London: Rider, 1945.

Broad, C. D. The Mind and Its Place in Nature. London: Kegan Paul, 1925.

Carrington, Hereward. Psychic Science and Survival. Manchester, England: Two Worlds Publishing; New York: American Psychical Institute, 1939.

Carus, Paul. The Soul of Man. Chicago: Open Court, 1900.

Crookall, Robert. Out-of-the-Body Experiences and Survival. UK: World Fellowship Press, 1970.

———. The Supreme Adventure. London: James Clarke, 1961.

Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1961.

Head, Joseph, and S. L. Cranston. Reincarnation: The Phoenix Fire Mystery. New York: Julian Press; Crown Publishers, 1977.

James, William. The Varieties of Religious Experience. London: Longmans, Green, 1903.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903.

Purohit, Swami Shri. The Geeta: The Gospel of the Lord Shri Krishna. London: Faber & Faber, 1935.

Soule, Minnie Meserve (d. 1936)

Trance medium of the American Society for Psychical Research, known in early experiments under the pseudonym "Mrs. Chenoweth." For many years J. H. Hyslop made interesting tests in cases of obsession with her mediumship. She produced excellent trance phenomena, similar to those of Leonora Piper. Soule was controlled by "Imperator" and "Sunbeam," the spirit of a child.

In the publications of the Boston Society for Psychic Research, an interesting record of séances narrates the experiences of Lydia W. Allison, with supplementary material by Walter Franklin Prince, under the title Leonard and Soule Experiments in Psychical Research (1929). An earlier work, Spirit Messages (Rochester, 1914), dedicated to the medium Hiram Corson of Cornell University, recorded unique communications received through Soule, apparently from Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Alfred Lord Tennyson, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and many other eminent minds.

Sources:

Allison, Lydia W. Leonard and Soule Experiments in Psychical Research. Boston: Boston Society for Psychic Research, 1929.

Thomas, John F. Beyond Normal Cognition. Boston: Boston Society for Psychic Research, 1937.

SoulSongs, Inc., The Center for Sound Healing

SoulSongs, Inc., The Center for Sound Healing is an organization founded and led by a woman known only as Shulamit (from the Hebrew word Shalam, meaning whole or complete), described as a gifted healer and a Kabbalistic vocal toner. Her work is based upon the Kabbalah, the ancient Jewish system of mystic wisdom. The Kabbalah pictures the universe as having emanated from God through a series of levels, each of which is entered through a gate or sephiroh (sephira). These ten gates are often pictured on a diagram called the Tree of Life. The highest of the sephiroh are named Kether and Chochmah.

As a tonal healer, Shulamit uses her voice to produce sacred tones (the sounds of the Hebrew vowels that are identified as the breath of God in the Kabbalistic literature). Her intoning the sounds allows her to access what is thought of as the Chochmah consciousness, a level of wisdom that exists beyond words and concepts, a realm that is boundless and infinite. She then brings that wisdom into a realm of verbal and conceptual understanding (the sephiroh call Binah) and relates it to each person with whom she works.

Shulamit teaches that according to Kabbalah, each person has a higher self (the Neshamah) that in most cases is dormant and must be awakened. Shulamit offers personal sessions to individuals who wish to stimulate their higher self into action or who are in need of healing.

The Center for Sound Healing may be contacted at P.O. Box 465, High Falls, NY 12440. It maintains two webpages, <http://www.soulsongs.com/> and <http://www.kabbalah.com/>.

Sources:

Soul Songs. <http://www.soulsongs.com/>. May 20, 2000.

Soul Travel

The primary spiritual experience of practitioners of EC-KANKAR, a religious system developed by Sir Paul Twitchell. While connections are denied by the organization, soul travel closely resembles astral projection or out-of-the-body travel. Travel is seen as taking place on the various planes of existence as originally described in the literature of the Radhasoami Beas.

Sounds (in Psychological Research)

Sounds produced in the séance room fall into two main categories: ordinary and psychic. In the first category belong all the natural sounds emitted by the manipulation of certain objects without any visible agency. In the second are the sounds that apparently do not relate to any visible object; both the source and the production of these sounds are unknown.

The noises that accompany the movement of objects, such as the lifting of a table or the shaking of bells or tambourines, are ordinary noises. Raps, direct voice, direct music, sounds of invisible instruments, machines, the rattle of chains, the clashing of swords, and sounds of galloping, without having the noise-producing object in the room, would be considered psychic.

Another differentiation may be made according to the intelligence required for the sound production. No intellectual effort is necessary to bang a table or shake a bell. The phonograph requires certain experience, the playing of an instrument artistic education.

The simplest psychic sounds are the raps. Their tonal scale and expressive power is surprising and their strength may increase to formidable blows. For example, as Lord Adare in Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home (1870) notes, "At one time, Miss Wynne, Home and I heard a very singular rumbling and rolling sort of sound in the air behind us, which was repeated three times."

The sounds in the séances of W. Stainton Moses showed an extraordinary range. The first sound, as distinct from raps, was heard on March 23, 1873, and resembled the plucking of a string in midair. It soon imitated a musical clock that was in the next room. Two months later, the sound became so loud that the vibration of the table was marked.

"The sound would traverse the room and seem to die away in the distance, and suddenly burst forth into great power over the table, which appeared, in some inexplicable way, to be used as a sounding board. The wood of the table vibrated under our hands exactly as it would have done had a violincello been twanged while resting upon it. . . . The sounds were at times deafening and alternated between those made by the very small strings of a harp and such as would be caused by the violent thrumming of a violincello resting on the top of a drum. . . .

With them, as with other phenomena, a great variety was caused by good or bad conditions. Just as illness or atmospheric disturbance made the perfumes and drapery coarse and unrefined, so the lyre sounds became harsh, unmusical and wooden. . . . The table was used until at times the musical twang would shade into a sort of musical knock, and finally become an ordinary dull thud upon the table. . . . When things were not all right, the sound would assume a most melancholy wailing character, which was indescribably weird and saddening. It was not unlike the southing of the wind through trees in the dead of night; a ghost-like dreary sound that few persons would sit long to listen to. That sound was always accompanied by black darkness in the room. . . . No point, indeed, connected with these strange sounds is more remarkable than the intensity of feeling conveyed by them. . . . Anger, sadness, content and mirth, solemnity and eagerness, are conveyed in a way that is quite inexplicable. . . . The wailing sounds above noticed seem at times almost to sob and shriek as if in a burst of sadness. Sometimes to a question put silence will be maintained for a while, and then little hesitating sounds will be made, very slowly and tremulously, as to convey perfectly the idea of uncertainty and doubt. Then again the reply will come clear, sonorous, and immediate as the 'I do' of a witness in the box who has no doubt as to the answer he should give.

"The sounds used always to commence near the circle, and, so to say, radiate from it as a centre into different parts of the room. Of late they have changed, and are usually audible to me before they strike the ear of any other person. How far this may be attributable to clairaudience, a faculty lately developed in me, I cannot say positively. But at any rate, they seem to me to commence by a distant rumble, not unlike the roll of a drum. This gradually draws nearer until it is audible to all, and the old sounds are in our midst.

"Hitherto I only mentioned the stringed musical sounds. . . . But there are other sounds which professedly emanate from the same source and which resemble the sound of a tambourine played over our heads, or, at times, the flapping of a pair of large wings. . . . Still later other sounds, like those made by a small zither, have presented themselves."

Charlton Speer, in an account given to F. W. H. Myers, described four kinds of musical sounds produced without any instrument in the room. The first was called "fairy bells." These resembled the tones produced by striking musical glasses with a small hammer. No definite tune was ever played, but the bells, on request, would always run up and down a scale in perfect tune. It was difficult to judge where the sounds came from, but when Speer applied his ear to the top of the table it seemed to be somehow in the wood. The second was a stringed instrument, akin to a violincello but more powerful and sonorous. It was only heard in single notes and was employed to answer questions. The third sound was an exact imitation of an ordinary handbell. It denoted the presence of a particular spirit. The fourth sound could best be described by imagining the soft tone of a clarinet gradually increasing in intensity, until it rivaled the sound of a trumpet, then by degrees gradually diminished to the original subdued tone of the clarinet, until it eventually died away in a drawn-out, melancholy wail. In no case were more than single notes, or at best isolated passages, produced. The controlling agencies accounted for this with the peculiarly unmusical organization of the medium.

Various sounds were used by some of the spirit controls as a special mark of identity. "Grocyne" produced pure sounds like those of a thick harp string; "Chom" made the sound of an old Egyptian harp with four strings; "Said" used a three stringed lyre; "Roophal" a seven-stringed one with a rippling sound; and "Kabbila's" sound was like a drum, very deep, a sort of prolonged roll.

It is said in mediumistic communications that the spirits, in their world, can create for themselves from fluidic material the things they wish. Spirits have claimed that they can produce the sound of anything in this same way.

In Gwendolyn K. Hack's Modern Psychic Mysteries at Millesimo Castle (1929), there is the interesting note that the spirit of the young aviator Vittorio Centurione always arrived and departed in his airplane. The coming of the airplane was heard from a distance, then it descended into the séance room with the characteristic noise and flew above as if there was no limit of space and finally stopped. On the first occasion when "Centurione" manifested, the approach of the plane was followed by the sound of falling, hissing, and splashing into the water illustrating the very manner by which this aviator had perished over Lake Varese.

Dancing performances and duels were executed for the sitters' entertainment at the séances at Millesimo Castle. In the notes of the séance August 12, 1928, we find:

"D'Angelo: 'Here, in the midst of you, a little battle between two Romans is going to take place' . . . we heard the sound of two swords hastily withdrawn from their scabbards. They were crossed and glanced off each other in a sinister manner. Then we heard the most formidable blows, given first by one side and then by the other. These blows rained upon metal, echoing upon the shields and helmets of the warriors. We heard rapid footsteps pounding the floor as the combatants fought, now advancing, now retreating. It was quite alarming, and one could not avoid covering instinctively, when a powerful thrust came too close, for one felt that the next blow might glance off and strike one's head or neck."

Will Goldston wrote an account of a séance with Rudi Schneider in the Sunday Graphic (December 22, 1929):

"Several heavy thuds followed, as though a giant were striking a block of marble with a mallet. The extraordinary thing was that the thuds did not seem to come from the walls, the ceiling or the floor, but from the table. They were powerful thuds, and yet they did not cause any vibration in the room, as such thuds caused by normal means would create."

Sources:

Adare, Lord. Experiences in Spiritualism with D. D. Home. Glasgow: R. Maclehose, 1924.

Hack, Gwendolyn Kelley. Modern Psychic Mysteries at Millesimo Castle Italy. London: Rider, 1929.

South African Society for Psychical Research

The first South African Society for Psychical Research was founded in 1910 but existed for only a few years. It was not until 1955 that a second attempt to form such an organization was attempted, this time by Arthur E. H. Bleksley and others at the University of Witwatersrand. The previous year an informal group had gathered to study psychic phenomena, and the interest stimulated by this group led directly to the society's formation.

No sooner had the society formed than it came under a strong ideological attack by a group of psychic debunkers, described as "Marxists, atheists, and communists," and the original program of the group was diverted to answering the challenge. It developed a public program to establish the existence of psi phenomena and the legitimacy of scientific efforts to study it. It was able to survive this crisis successfully and has continued to exist to the present. In 1968, it founded the South African Institute for Parapsychological Research and moved from an exclusive emphasis on education to the development of a research program. The institute survived for several years but eventually ran out of funds.

Over the long haul, the society has suffered from the country's former apartheid policies, which prohibited the participation of black people in the organization. Social customs also prevented research among the native population, which would have provided a unique resource for the society. Also, the relatively small white population has had difficulty keeping the society functioning on a steady basis. Its meetings and publications are sporadic, and it has been unable to establish a headquarters or hire staff. However, the society now publishes the Parapsychological Journal of South Africa, and in 1974 a branch of the society opened at the University of Natal in Durbin. It may be contacted at P.O. Box 23154, Joubert Park, Johannesburg 2044, South Africa.

Sources:

"The South African Society for Psychical Research." Journal of the Psychical Research Society 40 (1959): 43.

SOUTH AMERICA

[Note: See the related article on Native North Americans in the entry America.]

South American Indians

Throughout South America, the magician caste analogous to the medicine men or shamans of North America were known as piates or piaes. Of those of British Guiana (now Guyana), W. H. Brett gives the following account in The Indian Tribes of Guiana (1868):

"They are each furnished with a large gourd or calabash, which has been emptied of its seeds and spongy contents, and has a round stick run through the middle of it by means of two holes. The ends of this stick project—one forms the handle of the instrument, and the other has a long string to which beautiful feathers are attached, wound round it in spiral circles. Within the calabash are a few small white stones, which rattle when it is shaken or turned round. The calabash itself is usually painted red. It is regarded with great awe by the heathen Indians, who fear to touch it, or even to approach the place where it is kept.

"When attacked by sickness, the Indians cause themselves to be conveyed to some friendly sorcerer, to whom a present of more or less value must be made. Death is sometimes occasioned by those removals, cold being taken from wet or the damp of the river. If the patient cannot be removed, the sorcerer is sent for to visit him. The females are all sent away from the place and the men must keep at a respectful distance, as he does not like his proceedings to be closely inspected. He then commences his exorcisms, turning, and shaking his marakka, or rattle, and chanting an address to the yauhahu. This is continued for hours, about midnight the spirit is supposed to be present, and a conversation to take place, which is unintelligible to the Indians, who may overhear it. These ceremonies are kept up for successive nights.

"If the patient be strong enough to endure the disease, the excitement, the noise, and the fumes of tobacco in which he is at times enveloped, and the sorcerer observes signs of recovery he will pretend to extract the cause of the complaint by sucking the part affected. After many ceremonies he will produce from his mouth some strange substance, such as a thorn or gravelstone, a fish-bone or bird's claw, a snake's tooth, or a piece of wire, which some malicious yauhahu is supposed to have inserted in the affected part. As soon as the patient fancies himself rid of this cause of his illness his recovery is generally rapid, and the fame of the sorcerer greatly increased. Should death, however, ensue, the blame is laid upon the evil spirit, whose power and malignity have prevailed over the counteracting charms. Some rival sorcerer will at times come in for a share of the blame, whom the sufferer has unhappily made his enemy, and who is supposed to have employed the yauhahu in destroying him. The sorcerers being supposed to have the power of causing, as well as of curing diseases, are much dreaded by the common people, who never willfully offend them. So deeply rooted in the Indian's bosom is this belief concerning the origin of diseases, that they have little idea of sickness arising from other causes. Death may arise from a wound or a contusion, or be brought on by want of food, but in other cases it is the work of the yauhahu.

"I once came upon a Warau practising his art upon a woman inflicted with a severe internal complaint. He was, when I first saw him, blowing violently into his hands and rubbing them upon the affected part. He very candidly acknowledged his imposture when I taxed him with it, put up his implements, and went away. The fate of the poor woman, as it was related to me some time afterwards, was very sad. Though a Venezuelan half-breed, and of the Church of Rome, she was wedded to the Indian superstitions, and after trying the most noted sorcerers without relief, she inflicted on herself a mortal wound with a razor in the vain attempt to cut out the imaginary cause of her internal pain.

"Some have imagined that those men have faith in the power of their own incantations from their performing them over their own children, and even causing them to be acted over themselves when sick. This practice it is indeed difficult to account for. The juggling part of their business is such a gross imposture as could only succeed with a very ignorant and credulous people; but it is perhaps in their case, as in some others, difficult to tell the precise point where credulity ends and imposture begins. It is certain that they are excited during their incantations in a most extraordinary way, and positively affirm that they hold intercourse with spirits; nor will they allow themselves to be laughed out of the assertion however ridiculous it may appear to us.

"The Waraus, in many points the most degraded of the tribes, are the most renowned as sorcerers. The huts which they set apart for the performance of their superstitious rites are regarded with great veneration.

"Mr. Nowers, on visiting a Warau settlement, entered one of those huts, not being aware of the offense he was committing and found it perfectly empty, with the exception of the gourd, or mataro, as it is called by the tribe. There was, in the centre of the hut, a small raised place about eighteen inches high, on which the fire had been made for burning tobacco. The sorcerer being asked to give up the gourd, peremptorily refused, saying that if he did so his two children would die the same night."

Franz Keller, in Amazon and Madeira Rivers (1874), observes of the Brazilian tribes as follows:

"As with the shamans of the North Asiatic nations, the influence a Pajé may secure over his tribe depends entirely on the success of his cures and his more or less imposing personal qualities. Woe to him if by some unlucky ministration or fatal advice he forfeits his prestige. The hate of the whole tribe turns against him, as if to indemnify them for the fear and awe felt by them until then; and often he pays for his envied position with his life.

"And an influential and powerful position it is. His advice is first heard in war and peace. He has to mark the boundaries of the hunting-grounds; and, when quarrels arise, he has to decide in concert with the chieftain, sometimes even against the latter's wishes. By a majestically distant demeanour, and by the affectation of severe fasting and of nightly meetings with the spirits of another world, these augurs have succeeded in giving such an appearance of holiness to the whole caste, that their influence is a mighty one to the present day, even with the Indians of the Aldeamentos, where contact with the white race is sure by-and-by to produce a certain degree of scepticism.

"When I was at the Aldeamento of San Ignacio, on the Paranapanema, Cuyaba, chieftain and Pajé of an independent horde of Cayowa Indians made his appearance, and I had the honour of being introduced to this magnificent sample of a conjurer. He was a man of about fifty, with large well-cut features, framed within a dense, streaming mane of long black hair. The long xerimbata on his under lip (a long, thin, cylinder of a resin resembling amber), a great number of black and white beads covering his chest in regular rows like a cuirass, and a broad girdle holding his cherapi (sort of apron), which was fringed all round with rich, woven ornaments, gave him quite a stately, majestic appearance."

The Chileans called their magicians gligua or dugol, and they were subdivided into guenguenu, genpugnu, and genpiru, meaning respectively "masters of the heavens," "of epidemics," and "of insects or worms." There was also a sect called calcu, or "sorcerers," who lived in caves, and who were served by ivunches, or "man-animals," to whom they taught their terrible arts.

The Araucanians believed that these wizards had the power to transform themselves at night into nocturnal birds, to fly through the air, and to shoot invisible arrows at their enemies, besides indulging in the malicious mischief with which folklore credits the wizards of all countries. They believed their priests possessed numerous familiars who were attached to them after death—similar to the beliefs of the magicians of the Middle Ages. These priests or diviners were celibate, and led an existence apart from the tribe, in some communities being dressed as women. Many tales are told of their prowess in magic, that indicate that they were either natural epileptics or ecstasies, or that disturbing mental influences were brought about by the use of drugs. The Araucanians also held that to mention their real personal names gave magic power over them that might be turned to evil ends. Regarding the wizards of the inhabitants of the territory around the River Chaco in Paraguay, Barbrook Grubb records as follows in An Unknown People in an Unknown Land:

"The training necessary to qualify an Indian to become a witch-doctor consists, in the first place, in severe fastings, and especially in abstention from fluid. They carry this fasting to such an excess as to affect the nervous system and brain. Certain herbs are eaten to hasten this stage. They pass days in solitude, and, when thoroughly worked up to an hysterical condition, they see spirits and ghosts, and have strange visions. It is necessary, furthermore, that they should eat live toads and some kinds of snakes. Certain little birds are plucked alive and then devoured, their power of whistling being supposed to be thus communicated to the witch-doctor. There are other features in the preliminary training which need not be mentioned, and when the initiatory stage has been satisfactorily passed, they are instructed in the mysteries under pledge of secrecy. After that their future depends upon themselves.

"It is unquestionable that a few of these wizards understand to a slight degree the power of hypnotism. They appear at times to throw themselves into a hypnotic state by sitting in a strained position for hours, fixing their gaze upon some distant object. In this condition they are believed to be able to throw their souls out—that is, in order to make them wander. It seems that occasionally, when in this state, they see visions which are quite the opposite of those they had desired. At other times they content themselves with concentrating their attention for a while upon one of their charms, and I have no doubt that occasionally they are sincere in desiring to solve some perplexing problems.

"One of the chief duties of the wizard is to arrange the weather to suit his clansmen. If they want rain it is to him they apply. His sorceries are of such a kind that they may be extended over a long period. He is never lacking in excuses, and so, while apparently busy in combating the opposing forces which are hindering the rain, he gains time to study weather signs. He will never or rarely venture an opinion as to the expected change until he is nearly certain of a satisfactory result. Any other Indian could foretell rain were he to observe signs as closely as does the wizard. The killing of a certain kind of duck, and the sprinkling of its blood upwards, is his chief charm. When he is able to procure this bird he is sure that rain cannot be far off, because these ducks do not migrate southwards until they know that there is going to be water in the swamps. These swamps are filled by the overflowing of the rivers as much as by the local rainfalls, and the presence of water in the rivers and swamps soon attracts rain-clouds.

“The wizards also observe plants and animals, study the sky and take note of other phenomena, and by these means can arrive at fairly safe conclusions. They are supposed to be able to foretell events, and to a certain extent they succeed so far as these events concern local interest. By judicious questioning and observation, the astute wizard is able to judge with some amount of exactitude how certain matters are likely to turn out.

“After we had introduced bullock-carts into their country, the people were naturally interested in the return of the carts from their periodical journeys to the river. When the wizards had calculated carefully the watering-places, and had taken into consideration the state of the roads, the character of the drivers, and the condition and number of the bullocks, all that they then required to know was the weight of the loads and the day on which it was expected that the carts would leave the river on their return journey. The last two items they had to obtain from us. When they had these data, by a simple calculation they could make a very shrewd guess, not only at the time when they might be expected to arrive at the village, but also at what particular part of the road they might happen to be on any given day. A great impression was made upon the simple people by this exhibition of power, but when we discovered what they were doing, we withheld the information, or only gave them part, with the result that their prophecies either failed ignominiously or proved very erroneous. Their reputation accordingly began to wane.

“The wizards appear to be authorities on agricultural matters, and when application to the garden spirit has failed, the witch-doctor is called in. He examines the crop, and if he thinks it is likely to be a poor one, he says it is being blighted by an evil spirit, but that he will use what sorceries he can to preserve it. If, on the other hand, he has reason to believe that the crop will be a good one, he spits upon it here and there, and then assures the people that now they may expect a good harvest.

“Some of the chief duties of the witch-doctor consist in laying ghosts, driving off spirits, exorcising kilykhama in cases of possession, assisting wandering souls back to their bodies, and generally in the recognising of spirits. When a ghost is supposed to haunt a village, the wizard and his assistants have sometimes an hour’s arduous chanting in order to induce the restless one to leave. When he considers that he has accomplished this, he assures the people that it is done, and this quiets their fears. Evil spirits frequenting a neighbourhood have also to be driven off by somewhat similar chanting.”

Through the twentieth century, practices first described in the nineteenth century by anthropologists have been integrated into the Spiritualist groups of the countries of South America, especially Brazil.

Sources:

- Brett, William H. The Indian Tribes of Guiana. London, 1868.
 Grubb, W. Barbrook. An Unknown People in an Unknown Land. London, 1911.
 Keller, Franz. Amazon and Madeira Rivers. London, 1874.
 McGregor, Pedro. Jesus of the Spirits. New York: Stein & Day, 1966.
 Playfair, Guy Lyon. The Flying Cow. London, 1975. Reprint as The Unknown Power. New York: Pocket Books, 1975.

Southcott, Joanna (1750–1814)

British prophetess of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries who announced that she had a divine pregnancy. She was born on April 25, 1750, one of the daughters of a farmer in the village of Gittisham, East Devon, England. She grew up in a devout religious atmosphere, being obliged to read a chapter of the Bible daily and discuss it with her father. She became a sturdy, vivacious, self-reliant young woman.

When she was 21, her father became ill, obliging her to take charge of the farm, which she managed admirably for a couple of years until her father recovered. Southcott left the farm and went into domestic service for five years at the house of an upholsterer in Exeter, where she also became skilled in the trade. She next went to work as a maid for a couple named Taylor.

For 42 years Joanna had lived a normal life, but in 1792, at the time of her menopause, she began to have strange experiences.

Southcott’s Prophetic Career

These were apocalyptic times. In France, revolutionary mobs had stormed the king’s palace, and the houses of noblemen were in flames. Radical propagandists sought to foment revolution in Britain. Tom Paine’s The Rights of Man had just been published. Several extreme religious movements had appeared.

Among the prophetic voices was that of a young naval officer, Richard Brothers. Brothers immersed himself in Bible study and preached powerful sermons on his apocalyptic visions, with warnings of the Day of Doom. He believed that the time had come for the Jews to regain Palestine, that the British were a lost tribe of Israel, and that the Second Coming of the Lord was at hand. Brothers was eventually arrested and charged with “maliciously publishing fantastical prophecies with intent to cause disturbances,” certified as insane, and sent to a mental asylum, where he stayed for 11 years.

About this time Southcott also began to have similar apocalyptic dreams and visions. She was visited by a “voice,” which told her, “The Lord is awakened out of sleep. He will terribly shake the earth.” At first, Southcott thought she was being deluded by Satan, but the voice began to make amazingly accurate prophecies about events, both great and small.

Asked for a sign, the voice knocked three times on the bedstead—an early precursor of the raps at nineteenth-century Spiritualist séances. Then she suddenly found her hand writing messages without conscious guidance. She stated, “The writing comes extremely fast, much faster than I could keep up by voluntary effort. I have to turn over the pages and guard the lines of writing from running into each other; but, except for this, I need not look at the paper. I can talk on other subjects while writing. The mass of the writings consists in teachings on Religion. Some messages, however, deal with earthly matters.” Many of the writings were in simple verse form.

When her prophecies on domestic affairs began to be vindicated, Southcott became confident that the voice was a true guide, and she attempted to interest religious authorities in her messages. A Methodist preacher listened to her, then pronounced, “This is from Satan to disturb your peace.” She approached the Dissenters, but their minister stated that her revelations were unscriptural. She then turned to the established Church and wrote to a preacher named Joseph Pomeroy, vicar of St. Kew in Cornwall, who had himself warned of perilous times to come.

Pomeroy received her kindly and said he saw nothing diabolical in the messages, but he told her mistress, Mrs. Taylor, “She will be out of her mind soon.” On a subsequent visit, Southcott spoke to Pomeroy of impending events of an apocalyptic nature, and he said, “You have advanced things that make me shudder. It is bordering on blasphemy.” At a loss to refute her sincerity, he suggested that she have her writings examined by a jury of clergymen.

Thereupon Southcott sent Pomeroy a number of prophecies that were fulfilled. She predicted that the bishop of Exeter, then in good health, would not live until Christmas of that year. He died on December 12. In 1796 Lord Malmesbury went on a peace mission to Paris. Southcott foretold that it would fail, and so it did. At that time it would have seemed unreasonable to believe that the French revolutionary armies would conquer Italy, as predicted by Southcott, but young Bonaparte’s success brought this to pass. Southcott was sincerely convinced that her messages were from God.

In 1797, Southcott left the service of the Taylors and went to work for several Exeter tradesmen in upholstering. She was a good worker, and her income helped to support her father, who was ill again. She also saved some money for her eventual retirement.

All this time her messages continued. Joanna introduced an early feminist view into her messages, claiming that when the time was right, God would use a woman to fulfill divine purpose. She stated, "Is it a new thing for a woman to deliver her people? Did not Esther do it? And Judith? Was it not a woman that nailed Sisera to the ground?" She became convinced that she herself was the destined "Bride of the Lamb," "woman clothed with the sun" in Revelation (12:1). In 1794, her voice had stated, "Now I'll tell thee who thou art, The true and faithful Bride."

Southcott alarmed Pomeroy with what seemed to him a blasphemous claim, as well as with more prophecies. She demanded that her messages be considered by a panel of clergymen. She wrote to the bishop, the archdeacon, and the chancellor, urging them to visit Pomeroy and test her teaching. On January 5, 1801, she wrote again to five clergymen, asking them to prove within seven days that the messages were not divine revelations. After a week she heard nothing, so she took her messages to an Exeter printer, paying him £100 she had saved for her old age.

In February of that year, The Strange Effects of Faith appeared as a 48-page, nine-penny pamphlet describing how the messages had come to Southcott and how she had sought to get clerical recognition of them. The following month she published Second Part. By now, her life savings were exhausted, so she borrowed from a moneylender to sponsor publication of further parts.

Rev. T. P. Foley, fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge, an intelligent, educated man and a former follower of the unfortunate fanatic Richard Brothers, saw these modest pamphlets and was immediately impressed with them. He consulted other friends, including the engraver William Sharp (who had also been a follower of Brothers's), and they attempted to interest clergymen in forming a jury to consider Southcott's writings. Afterward, many of the prophecies and other papers were put in a box fastened with cords and sealed with seven seals. Sharp had charge of this. The sealed box was later to become a central point in controversies over the writings.

When some of Southcott's followers printed her letters, Pomeroy was alarmed to find his name frequently quoted, and in a weak moment threw her papers on the fire. Almost immediately he had a letter from Southcott demanding their return, and thereafter his life was made miserable by scores of letters from her and her followers, denouncing him as a second Johoiakim who burned the roll of the prophet and threatening him with divine and diabolical justice.

The Seals

As Southcott's followers increased, she devised a strange sign of her mission, her famous "seal." Years earlier, when working in the shop of Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, she had found a seal with the initials "I. C." and two stars. One day she formed the idea that these were the initials of Jesus Christ ("I" and "J" were then interchangeable as initials) and marked her prophecies with this seal. Now the idea came to her that this also indicated the sealing of believers as well as prophetic writings, as cited in Rev. 7:3: "Hurt not the earth till we have sealed the servants of our God."

She cut paper into squares and marked a circle on each square, writing inside, "The Seal of the Lord, the Elect and Precious, Man's Redemption to Inherit the Tree of Life, to be made Heirs of God and Joint Heirs with Jesus Christ." Her followers received one of these squares after signing it, and it was folded up like an envelope and marked with the "I. C." seal.

Within a year she had issued several thousand of these "seals." Unfortunately she was accused of selling them and making a handsome income, although she claimed the seals were freely issued without any charge. (It is possible that middlemen asked money for them, since many people regarded them as lucky charms or passports to heaven.)

The Ministry Prospers

From time to time, Southcott was genuinely tortured by doubts as to whether her inner voice was a delusion of Satan, and she toyed with the idea of giving up her mission and going back to the upholstery trade. Some of her prophecies had failed. After one period of depression, she published her doubts in a pamphlet titled "A Dispute between the Woman and the Powers of Darkness." It seemed to be an honest work by a sincere woman, caught up in a strange mission that she had never sought.

But after 18 months her mission grew rapidly, with followers in London and the provinces, and she soon enrolled more than eight thousand disciples. She continued to demand that the bishops examine her claims and prophecies and agreed to abide by their decision, but the church dignitaries were unwilling to become involved.

Her mission continued to grow in spite of various unfortunate setbacks. One of these was the case of the infamous Mary Bateman, thief and abortionist, who had obtained a seal from Southcott and claimed that her hens were laying eggs with an inscription announcing the coming of Christ. Mary Bateman was executed for the murder of Rebecca Perigo, whom she had unmercifully fleeced for years by selling her charms against evil. For a time this scandalous episode of one of the "sealed followers" caused much embarrassment to the movement.

But Southcott's writings sold well, and many people who had followed the unfortunate Richard Brothers now came to join her mission. In 1812 a legacy from a disciple gave her financial independence. During 1813 her ecstasies increased and she felt surrounded by angels.

Shiloh

Southcott was 64 years old when her "voice" commanded, "Order twelve gowns for thy wedding." She was greatly disconcerted by this, as she had no desire for matrimony, but in early 1814 the voice added, "This year in the sixty-fifth year of thy age thou shalt bear a son by the power of the Most High." Back in 1794, she had already declared her conviction that she was "the Bride of the Lamb," but now the full significance of this dawned on her. The Virgin Mary had born a divine son. Southcott's child would have a divine destiny.

In Genesis (49:10) Jacob says that the scepter will not depart from Judah "until Shiloh come." This passage has confused and comforted many religious prophets, including Richard Brothers, who had declared at one point, "I am Shiloh." Southcott believed Brothers misunderstood the passage; Shiloh was to arise in the Last Days. In March 1814 she declared her belief that Shiloh was her unborn child. By then she showed every sign of pregnancy, and astonishingly enough this was confirmed by a leading surgeon and no fewer than 20 other medical practitioners.

The followers received the news of the coming divine virgin birth with great joy, and gifts flowed in. A satinwood cradle for the baby was prepared at a cost of £200. A superbly bound Bible was presented, and dozens of christening mugs and pap spoons. Recalling her message to Pomeroy (the Cornwall vicar) that she was the bride mentioned in Scripture, Southcott concluded that she must make an earthly marriage so that Shiloh would have a foster father, as with Joseph and the child Jesus. Accordingly on November 12 she was married in her bedroom to John Smith, steward of the earl of Darnley.

Southcott expected the divine birth in July, but as late as September nothing had happened. During November, painful doubts began to manifest in her mind, and once again she began to wonder if her voice had misled her. She called her close friends to her bedside and confessed despairingly, "Now it all appears delusion." She grew weaker, and by December 16 the symptoms of pregnancy had vanished. She told her doctor she was gradually dying, and requested that after her presumed death her body be kept warm for four days, in case she was only in a trance. She died early in the morning on December 27.

After the four days had elapsed, her doctor and 14 other medical practitioners examined the body and found no organic disease beyond a condition of dropsy, which may have enhanced the false pregnancy. It is probable that Southcott suffered a deep depression and no longer wished to live after her final disillusionment with her divine mission.

Just before her death she had made a will in which she sadly claimed that she had been deceived by the Devil and directed that all the gifts intended for the coming Shiloh be returned to their donors. She was buried in Marylebone Cemetery, London, on January 2, 1815, and her tombstone, evidently supplied by a follower, predicted great wonders yet to come but inaccurately stated her age as 60 instead of 64. The tombstone was shattered in a gunpowder explosion at Regent's Park in 1874.

The Successors of Joanna Southcott

Her death and recantation left her thousands of followers in great confusion. A large number refused to believe that her mission had been a delusion. Others formed splinter groups. Among these was a group led by George Turner, "Herald of Shiloh," who claimed to be Southcott's successor. He explained that Shiloh had been taken from Southcott's womb into Paradise until the appointed time.

Turner's demented "Proclamation of the Final Days" was to be delivered in Palace Yard, London. It denounced "the Treasury, Horse Guards, Carlton House, the Playhouses, Churches and Chapels, the Tower, Somerset House, and other public places. The Angel of the Lord shall sink all by earthquake." His radical manifesto dictated, "The whole United Kingdom is to be divided to the People on the Roll. Those who are not worth a penny now must be lords of the land. No rents must be paid. No postage for letters. No turnpikes. No taxes. Porter a gallon for one half-penny. Ale the same. The dead must be carried in carts three miles from the city and put into deep pits covered with pigs' flesh."

Confined to a Quaker asylum for the insane, Turner continued with fantastic directions for his faithful followers. Shiloh's palace must have walls of pure gold adorned with precious stones. "There must be in attendance 70,000 men that play musical instruments and 70,000 singing women. He must have 500,000 servants, and his carriages must be of pure gold." Turner himself was to have 300,000 servants and accommodations similar to those of Shiloh.

In 1820 Turner was declared cured of insanity, and his followers petitioned the lord chancellor for his release, granted a few months later. After an extravagant "marriage supper," Turner promised that Shiloh would appear in London on October 14, being born as a boy already six years old. When the date passed uneventfully, the faithful took it as merely a divine test of their love. Turner's own "voice" ordered him to marry, so that Shiloh might have a foster mother. Accordingly Turner chose a wife, and a new date of April 10, 1821, was pronounced for the birth of Shiloh. When nothing happened, some followers were disillusioned; others followed rival leaders.

Visions came to a wool comber named John Wroe, another Southcott follower, who came into prominence when he challenged Turner's original prophecy of October 14, 1820, as the date of birth of Shiloh. Wroe now assumed control of Turner's group, and his followers proclaimed themselves Christian Israelites. Wroe dictated new laws for the Final Days. Males were to be circumcised, and everyone was to eat only kosher meat. Men had to wear dark, broad-brimmed hats and special clothing; even the sober dress for women was stipulated in great detail. Men were also to give up shaving and wear beards. Everyone was to give up snuff, tobacco, and alcohol. Those who transgressed these laws were to be severely beaten.

One child died after circumcision and the man performing the operation was charged with manslaughter. He was acquitted after Jewish leaders pressured the government, fearing that their own legitimate rite would be prohibited.

Eventually the movement renounced Wroe after persistent debaucheries on his part, but he emigrated to the United States and then to Australia, where his mission continued to have followers. He died in 1863. The Christian Israelite church continues in Australia, and there was one congregation in the United States as of the mid-1990s.

Meanwhile another large group of Southcott believers had followed John Ward, a pauper Irish shoemaker. He had been a disciple of George Turner's before his faith in Southcott was shaken when he read an attack on the New Testament account of Christ by the freethinker Richard Carlile. Eventually he concluded that the Scriptures were not history but prophecies, foretelling future events, and that the accounts of the birth of Jesus were allegorical. He had visions of Southcott, who told him, "Thou art Shiloh."

Ward eventually decided that he himself was the Jesus foretold in the Gospels, in part because he had been born on Christmas Day and his mother's name was Mary. Even more fantastic was Ward's belief that he was Satan before becoming Christ, and that the Devil was now the Son of God. All the Scriptures implicated him in a multiplicity of roles. He was Adam, Judah, and Elijah. He claimed, "There is no name in Scripture which I may not with propriety apply to myself." Because of the many texts using the name Zion, he chose this designation for himself, becoming known as "Zion Ward."

Ward escaped from the poorhouse where he had been confined and talked followers into supporting his mission by publishing literature and handbills. He roamed the country preaching his unique variety of messianism, which included attacks on landlords, the government, and the established Church. He was a remarkable orator and obtained considerable support for his mission. Eventually his health broke down, and he died of a stroke on March 12, 1837. Faithful followers continued to support him long after his death, and as late as 1921 one supporter published his book The Shilohites' Bible. By then there was no public mission, and a handful of the faithful simply read his books and meditated on his message.

In 1875, the Southcott followers were given a new direction by another prophet, a soldier named James White, whose friends called him "The Stranger." Like Southcott, he was inspired by a mysterious voice that ordered him to regroup the faithful. He adopted the name James Jereshom Jezreel. "Jereshom" was a misspelling of "Gershom," the name of the first child of Moses. "Jezreel" came from Hosea: "Then shall the children of Israel and the children of Judah be gathered together and appoint themselves one Head, for great shall be the day of Jezreel."

White published a book, titled The Flying Roll (derived from the book of Zechariah), outlining his new creed. In Rev. 8:2, seven angels are given seven trumpets to sound before the Day of Doom. According to White, these angels were seven prophets. The first five were Richard Brothers, Southcott, George Turner, a man named Shaw (another Southcott successor), and John Wroe. White was the sixth angel. One more prophet would arise, then Shiloh would come.

One of Jezreel's important converts was a girl of 15 named Clarissa Rogers. She too heard a mystical voice, which called on her to preach in the United States. Her beauty and eloquence converted many Americans, some of whom returned with her to Gillingham, Kent, where Jezreel had become established. Jezreel married her, and they both toured America in 1880 with six wagons, a large tent, and a hundred benches.

They collected enough financial support to enable them to buy a 20-acre site in Gillingham, where they built a housing estate for their followers, with shops and bakeries so that they could pursue a trade. They ran a successful delivery service in Gillingham and Chatham with their carts, selling bread, meat, produce, and other provisions. The Jezreel estate also had the International College for boys and girls, with special emphasis on harp playing and study of Jezreel's writings.

In 1884, after a successful tour in Australia, Jezreel returned with ambitious plans for a temple, cubic in shape, 100 feet high, 100 feet wide, and 100 feet long. It was to house printing presses, offices, and an assembly hall seating six thousand people. The walls were to be reinforced with steel girders and cement used instead of mortar, and it was to last for a thousand years. After six months' building, Jezreel died in March 1885.

His wife, who had adopted the name Esther, continued to develop the movement effectively, opening Jezreel chapels in many areas and employing hawkers to carry the movement's literature all over the country. There were Jezreel followers in the United States, Australia, and New Zealand. Esther was accepted as the seventh angel with a trumpet, to be followed by Shiloh. She died in 1888, only three years after her husband. The great temple remained unfinished.

After her death, quarrels and schisms arose in the movement. One branch followed Michael Keyfor Mills, who organized a Jezreel community in Detroit, Michigan, but it soon broke up. In 1903 Benjamin Purnell, who had been expelled from the Detroit community, founded his own colony, the House of David, in Benton Harbor, Michigan. Things went well for several years, and their orchestra and baseball team became famous.

Problems began in 1926, when the community had nine hundred colonists. Four years earlier, Purnell had stopped making public appearances and disappeared from public sight, but in 1926 he was arrested during a police raid on the community. A lengthy investigation and court proceeding followed. In 1927 the colony was declared a public nuisance and moved into receivership. Purnell and his wife, Mary, were excluded from further association with the colony. Purnell died on December 16. Mary Purnell began a lengthy fight for the return of the colony's property, and in 1930 a settlement was reached. Assets were divided between her and H. T. Dewhist, who had assumed control of the House of David following Purnell's arrest.

The House of David continues on its original land. Mary Purnell and her followers established a second community a short distance away. Both continue to the present time. An Australian branch of the House of David also survives.

The Panacea Society

The final phase of the Southcott movement commenced in 1907 and involved four ladies who became skillful propagandists for the movement. They were Alice Seymour, who edited editions of Southcott's books; Rachel Fox, a Quaker; her friend Helen Exeter, who received Spiritualistic messages about Joanna Southcott's sealed box; and Mabel Barltrop, widow of an Anglican curate, who was a godchild of the poet Coventry Patmore.

Mabel Barltrop pestered innumerable clergymen and bishops, demanding that they open Southcott's box. She joined forces with Helen Exeter, whose spirit messages through automatic writing informed her that she would be the mother of Shiloh. Exeter, who was to be the eighth prophet, adopted the name Octavia.

Octavia established a settlement at Bedford, and many supporters of the emerging suffragette movement joined her. She continued to badger the bishops to open Southcott's box and study the writings and prophecies it contained. For 20 years she propagandized with handbills, posters, and petitions.

In 1918 the bishop of Lambeth stated that he had the consent of 24 bishops to receive the box and open it on March 7 or 8. But Octavia's followers were not satisfied unless all the bishops were prepared to spend a whole week studying the contents. Not surprisingly, Bishop Carpenter could not agree, and the matter was dropped. It was the nearest the famous box ever came to being officially examined as Southcott had always desired.

By this time Octavia had been declared to be Shiloh by her followers. By 1920 she had a team of 36 residents at Bedford and a large following in Britain, Australia, and America.

In 1923 the movement took a new direction. One night Octavia tried to swallow a pill, but it slipped away and rolled under a cupboard. Accordingly she took the glass of water and prayed that it would serve the purpose of the pill. When it did, her voice proclaimed that she had been given healing powers. Thereafter the community prepared small linen squares "with the breath of prayer." These were to be dipped in water, which was to be drunk or poured onto wounds. The community adopted the name The Panacea Society, convinced that they had a universal remedy for all ills.

Octavia herself died in 1934, notwithstanding the universal remedy, but her movement continues.

The Opening of the Southcott Box

For decades, quaint notices continued to appear in British newspapers stating, "War, disease, crime and banditry will increase until the Bishops open Joanna Southcott's box."

In 1927 an attempt to resolve this persistent controversy was undertaken by the British psychical researcher Harry Price, who had a great flair for publicity. On April 28, 1927, he arrived at his National Laboratory of Psychical Research to be greeted by his secretary with the news "Joanna Southcott's box has arrived!" According to Price, it had been sent by the employer of two servants who were descendants of Mrs. Rebecca Morgan (née Pengarth), said to have been the sole companion of Southcott between 1798 and 1814. The cover letter stated that the Morgans had become custodians of Southcott's box, which had been earlier entrusted to Rebecca, and that the National Laboratory of Psychical Research should arrange for a formal opening of the box because the writer was moving to the United States.

This account has been challenged by Trevor H. Hall in his book The Search for Harry Price (1978), which suggests that the letter was a forgery by Price to obtain publicity for the box. It is true that there is no mention of Rebecca Pengarth as a companion to Southcott in histories of the movement, although the box itself appeared to be a genuine Southcott relic, however Price came into possession of it. It was a strongly built casket of walnut, stained with age, with a heavy lid with a mother-of-pearl plate bearing the engraved initials "I. S." (i.e., J. S.). The casket was secured by two rusty steel bands and by strong silk tapes secured in five places with large black seals bearing a profile of George III.

Price invited eight psychics, a psychologist, and a dowser to inspect the box and give their impressions of its contents. Most of the psychometric impressions proved reasonably accurate. When Price later x-rayed the box in his laboratory he identified the following objects: an old horse pistol, a dice box, a fob purse with coins in it, a bone puzzle with rings, some blocks (one with metal clasps), a framed painting or miniature, a pair of earrings, and a cameo or engraved pebble.

Price secured much publicity for the box, and sensational stories were published that it might contain a boobytrap bomb intended to kill the bishops. Price wrote to three archbishops and 80 bishops stating his intention to make a formal opening of the box, and asking if they would consent to be present to honor Southcott's wishes and perhaps to end the persistent superstition surrounding the box.

Some replies were noncommittal. The bishop of Derby hoped that Price could get a quorum for the opening in order to "lay to rest the Joanna Southcott legend." The bishop of Lincoln strongly advised opening the box "with or without the presence of bishops." The bishop of Liverpool wrote: "I join you in hoping that the Southcott myth will be exploded." In contrast, the bishop of Kensington was unsympathetic, saying that he did not wish to be a party to providing amusement for a public that would like nothing better than to see a company of bishops the victims of a hoax, even if it had been arranged one hundred years earlier.

However, the bishop of Chichester wrote that he would be glad if the Southcott myth could be exploded and would be willing to be present, if in London at the time. The bishop of London replied that he would try to be present. The bishop of Carlisle replied that he would be present if the archbishop of Canterbury "should be satisfied as to the propriety of bishops being present at the opening of the box."

The archbishop of Canterbury replied that his correspondence over Southcott's box had been voluminous and extended over many years. He was not sympathetic to the idea, "partly profane and partly comic," that 24 bishops representing the 24 elders in Revelation should sit around the box. He believed the box should be opened speedily, but also thought that as soon as it was opened a rival box would be found. Other bishops expressed interest in being present if in London, or if given permission by the archbishop of Canterbury.

The opening of the box took place before a large audience at the Hoare Memorial Hall, Church House, Westminster, London, on July 11, 1927. For the event, only the bishop of Grantham turned up, but the bishop of Crediton was represented by his son, the Reverend Trefusis.

As already mentioned, the psychometric impressions given by the psychics contained many accurate statements. Not surprisingly, the X-rays of the solid objects were also correct. Among the 56 objects in the box, the pamphlets and books included: The Surprises of Love, Exemplified in the Romance of a Day . . . (1765), with annotations; Rider's British Merlin (1715); Calendrier de la Cour (1773); and Ovid's Metamorphoses (1794). There was a paper souvenir "printed on the River Thames, Feb. 3rd, 1814," and a lottery ticket for 1796. Among the objects were a fob purse (containing silver and copper coins and tokens), a horse pistol, a miniature case, an ivory dice cup, a bone puzzle, a woman's embroidered nightcap, and a set of brass money weights.

Naturally the loyal Southcottians did not accept that these pathetic souvenirs were the contents of the right box, and the appeals to bishops to attend the opening of the true box continued, although it was by no means clear where this box might be. Certainly one would have expected the real Southcott box to contain voluminous prophecies, correspondence, and religious pamphlets.

The incredible story of Joanna Southcott and her prophecies has continued over nearly two centuries and is still not wholly extinct. The Southcott literature is voluminous. She herself published some 65 books and pamphlets, while her followers in the various groups added a flood of additional communications.

Sources:

Adkin, Clare E. Brother Benjamin: A History of the Israelite House of David. Berrien Springs, Mich.: Andrews University Press, 1990.

Balleine, G. R. Past Finding Out: The Tragic Story of Joanna Southcott and Her Successors. London: SPCK, 1956.

Lane, C. Life and Bibliography of Joanna Southcott. London, 1912.

Matthews, Ronald. English Messiahs. London: Methuen, 1936.

Octavia. [Helen Exeter]. Healing for All: The "Joanna Southcott Healing". London: Panacea Society, 1925.

Panacea Society. Transactions of the Panacea Society with the Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of England with Reference to Joanna Southcott. London: Panacea Society, 1935.

Pullen, Philip. Index to the Divine and Spiritual Writings of Joanna Southcott. Ashford, England: Clock House Press, 1921.

Reece, Richard. A Correct Statement of the Circumstances that Attended the Last Illness and Death of Mrs. Southcott. London, 1815.

Southcott, J. The Book of Wonders, Marvelous and True. 5 parts. London, 1813–14.

———. The Divine Writings of Joanna Southcott. 2 vols. Bolton, England, 1931.

———. Prophecies: A Warning to the Whole World from the Sealed Prophecies of Joanna Southcott. 2 parts. London, 1803.

———. The Strange Effects of Faith; with Remarkable Prophecies. 2 parts. Exeter, England, 1801–2. With three "Continuations." 1802–3.

"Xenes." Joanna Southcott and Her Box. London: W. Foulsham, 1927.

Southern California Society for Psychological Research, Inc. See Society for Psychic Research (California)

Sovereign and Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem

The Sovereign and Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem, incorporated in Belgium in 1932, is the largest group growing out of the Neo-Templar Movement launched by Bernard-Raymond Fabré-Palaprat (1773–1838) in the years following the French Revolution. The Order of the Temple, commonly called the Templars, was a medieval monastic order virtually destroyed by King Philip the Fair of France and formally dissolved by Pope Clement V in 1307. The order survived for another century in Portugal, but by the beginning of the fifteenth century had completely disappeared.

However, as Speculative Freemasonry spread through Europe in the eighteenth century, a rumor developed that the order had survived in the person of knights who sought protection in the masonic guilds of Scotland and Ireland. They were the sources of the "Templar" degrees in the Masonic initiatory structure. Then, at the time of the French Revolution, some French masons began to argue that since the Templars came before Freemasonry, it was logically independent of it and hence not subordinate to it. Their cause was championed by Fabré-Palaprat, a physician residing in Paris, who claimed to have found documents proving the existence of a lineage of grand masters who continued to operate from the time of the order's official suppression to 1792 when the then-grand master was killed by political opponents. The most important of these documents was the Lamenius charter which specifies the passing of the grand mastership by the last public master, Jacques de Molay, to one John Mark Lamenius who he met in prison while awaiting his execution.

In the freer atmosphere of post-Revolutionary France, in 1804 Fabré-Palaprat organized a new Templar Order and four years later received the approbation of Napoleon. Since the Roman Catholic Church had not changed its official stance against the Templars, he also organized an esoteric Johannite church and consecrated its first bishop. After his death in 1838, the order experienced the first of many schisms. Over the next century, a number of branches and derivative groups would appear, including the German Ordo Templi Orientis and the French-based Independent Group of Esoteric Studies founded by Gérard Encausse. Among the more than 30 Neo-Templar groups operating in the 1990s was the infamous Solar Temple whose leaders committed suicide in 1994.

Fabré-Palaprat's Order of the Temple existed as an informal association until 1932, when it was legally incorporated in Belgium as the Sovereign and Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem, under the leadership of Theodore Covais. Covais assumed the title of regent rather than grand master. Then, as Belgium was engulfed by World War II (1939–45), the regency was passed to Antonio Campello Pinto de Sousa Fontes, who resided in neutral Portugal. After the war, he continued as the regent, though not without opposition from some of the French-speaking Templars. He issued charters in many countries and the order grew significantly. An American branch was chartered in 1962.

Antonio Campello Pinto de Sousa Fontes died in 1960 and was succeeded by his son, Fernando Campello Pinto de Sousa Fontes. However, not all approved his election and in 1970, a French-speaking group gathered in Paris where Antoine Zdrojewski was elected regent of what became a rival body. This rival body included a number of people with right-wing political affiliations. They soon involved the order in their political intrigues and it was disbanded in France in 1973. Internationally it became the source of a variety of new orders.

The order that remained loyal to Antonio Campello Pinto de Sousa Fontes has grown and prospered while at the same time it has played down its occult roots. Like Freemasonry, the contemporary Templars (especially in North America) have emerged as a fraternal organization dedicated to work for their community and country, to support the poor and the unjustly accused, to stand against oppression, and to encourage the ideal of medieval chivalry. Harking back to the Templar history during the Crusades, the modern Templars see it their duty to assist Christian pilgrims and to maintain a Christian presence in the Holyland. One must be a professed Christian to be a member.

The current grand prior of the order in the United States is Col. Chev. Stewart McCarty. He may be contacted through the order's Internet site at <http://www.smotj.org/>. Internationally, the order is led by the current Grand Master MG Sir Roy Redgrave, who resides in London, England. He may be contacted through the Internet site at <http://www.osmth.org/index.html>. Grand priorities may be found in Austria, England and Wales, Scotland, Finland, France, and Italy.

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo. Il cappello del mago: I nuovi movimenti magici dallo spiritismo al satanismo. Milan: SugarCo, 1990.

Kovarik, Robert J. "Chronology of the Sovereign Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem." 1977. <http://members.aol.com/TemplarNY/TemplarNY.html>. June 11, 2000.

Sovereign and Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem (International). <http://www.osmth.org/index.html>. June 11, 2000.

Sovereign and Military Order of the Temple of Jerusalem (United States.). <http://www.smotj.org/>. June 11, 2000.

Space and Unexplained Celestial Events Research Society

A paper organization created to cover the activities of James W. Moseley, an early flying saucer enthusiast and journalist. It was founded at the time of the preparation of the first issue of his magazine, originally called Nexus but quickly changed to Saucer News. In 1968 Moseley sold Saucer News to Gray Barker of Saucerian Press in Clarksburg, West Virginia. The name Space and Unexplained Celestial Events Research Society appeared on the masthead of Barker's issues of Saucer News through 1972, but it continued as a paper organization.

In 1976 Moseley started another newsletter. Each issue of this humor- and gossip-oriented periodical had a different title, the first word being saucer and the second word rhyming with "smear." Saucer Smear can be ordered from Moseley at Box 1709, Key West, FL 33041.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. Vol. 2 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Space Intelligence

Alleged extraterrestrial entities. Prior to the 1970s such entities usually claimed to be inhabitants of the Moon, Mars, Venus, or another planet of this solar system. In the last two decades such claimed inhabitants have tended to come from far distant solar systems. Space Intelligences (SIs) allegedly communicate telepathically to chosen individual channels or through Spiritualist mediums. The most consistent Space Intelligences are those that communicate to the several contactee organizations such as the Raelian Movement, Unarius-Science of Life, the Aetherius Society, and Mark-Age, Inc.

SPAIN

Witchcraft

Modern Spain emerged in the fifteenth century. The land had previously been occupied by the Romans, Visagoths, and the Moors, who remained dominant beginning in the eighth century C.E. From early times, Spain was regarded as a special abode of superstition and sorcery, malevolent magic, and, in the Middle Ages, as the home of witchcraft, much of that reputation deriving from the notoriety of the Moorish alchemists. Spain was a major point of dissemination of Arab learning into Christian Europe. As early as 1370, the kingdom of Castile (a major component of what would become Spain) declared divination to be heresy. Writing about 1458 C.E., Alfonso de Spina, a Franciscan brother from Castile, created a work especially directed against heretics and nonbelievers, in which he gave a chapter on those articles of popular belief that were derived from ancient pagan beliefs. Among these, witches, called Xurguine (jurgina) or bruxe, held a prominent place. He stated that in his time offenders abounded in Dauphiny and Gascony, where they assembled in great numbers by night on a wild tableland, carrying candles with them to worship Satan, who appeared in the form of a boar on a certain rock, popularly known by the name Elboch de Biterne, and that many of them had been taken by the Inquisition of Toulouse and burned.

Spain reemerged as a Christian kingdom during the reign of Ferdinand V (1474–1504) and Isabella. They introduced the Inquisition, expelled the Jews, and financed Columbus's voyages to America. Their reign coincided with the redirection of the Inquisition against witchcraft in the 1480s and from that time in Spain, the charge of witchcraft and sorcery was frequently made under different forms and circumstances. Local inquisitors operated without clear guidelines, especially regarding exactly what constituted sorcery, and had considerable latitude in their prosecution of the accused.

The first auto-da-fé (act of faith) against witchcraft appears to have been that of Calahorra in 1507, when 30 women charged before the Inquisition as witches, were burned. In 1527 a great number of women were accused in Navarre of the practice of sorcery through the information of two girls, one 11, the other only nine years old, who confessed before the royal council of Navarre that they had been received into the sect of the jurginas. They promised, on condition of being pardoned, to expose all the women who were involved in these practices.

The prevalence of various magic practices in the Basque provinces became notorious, and Charles V, judging that it was to be attributed more to the ignorance of the population of those districts than to any other cause, directed that preachers should be sent to instruct them.

The first treatise in the Spanish language on the subject of sorcery was by a Franciscan monk named Martin de Castanaga, printed under approbation of the bishop of Calahorra in 1529. About this time, the zeal of the inquisitors of Saragossa was excited by the appearance of many witches who were said to have come from Navarre, and to have been sent by their sect as missionaries to make disciples of the women of Aragon. This sudden witch persecution in Spain appears to have had an influence on the fate of the witches of Italy. Pope Adrian IV, who was raised to the papal chair in 1522, was a Spanish bishop, and had held the office of inquisitor-general in Spain.

In the time of Pope Julius II (1503–13), a large sect of witches and sorcerers had reportedly been discovered in Lombardy who had their Sabbats and all the other activities of the Continental witches. The proceedings against them had been hindered by a dispute between the inquisitors and the ecclesiastical judges who claimed jurisdiction in such cases. Then on July 20, 1523, Pope Adrian issued a bull against the crime of sorcery, equating divination with its practice, and by naming both as heresy, placed sorcery clearly under the sole jurisdiction of the inquisitors. This bull freed the Inquisition to act against witches in Spain.

Of the cases that followed during more than a century, the most remarkable was that of the auto-da-fé at Logrono on November 7 and 8, 1610, which arose in some measure from a visit to the French Basque province in the preceding year. The valley of Bastan is situated at the foot of the Pyrenees on the French frontier, near Labourd. It was within the jurisdiction of the Inquisition established at Logrono in Castille. The mass of the population of this valley were said to have been sorcerers, and they held their meetings or Sabbats at a place called Zugarramurdi.

A woman who was condemned implicated a number of other persons. All the persons arrested on this occasion agreed in their description of the Sabbat and of the practices of the witches, who in their general features bore a close resemblance to the witches of Labourd. The usual place of meeting was known here, as in Labourd, by the popular name of Aquelarre, a Gascon word signifying “the meadow of the goat.” Their ordinary meetings were held on the nights of Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, every week, but they had grand feasts on the principal holidays of the church, such as Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas. All these feasts appear to have been fixed by the Christian teachers at the period of older pagan festivals. The accounts of their claimed Sabbats were similar to those given of such meetings elsewhere. They supposedly danced, sang, took part in orgies, and came into personal contact with Satan.

The auto-da-fé of Logrono, as far as it related to the sect of the sorcerers of Zugarramurdi, caused a sensation, and brought the subject of witchcraft under the consideration of the Spanish theologians. They were far more enlightened than most of their contemporaries in other countries, that they generally held the opinion that witchcraft was a mere delusion and that the details of the confessions of its victims were all creations of the imagination. They were punished because their belief was a heresy, contrary to the doctrines of the church. Llorente gave the abstract of a treatise on this subject by a Spanish ecclesiastic named Pedro de Valentia, addressed to the grand inquisitor in consequence of the trial at Logrono in 1610. It remained in manuscript among the archives of the Inquisition.

Valentia adopted the opinion that the acts confessed by the witches were imaginary; he attributed them partly to the methods in which the examinations were carried out—and to the desire of the people examined to escape by saying what seemed to please their persecutors—and partly to the effects of the ointments and draughts they had been taught to use. These were composed of ingredients that produced sleep and acted upon the imagination and the mental faculties.

Although the heresy-hunting of the Spanish Inquisition resulted in a vast number of victims being burned throughout Europe, in Spain itself witchcraft persecutions were relatively more restrained than elsewhere, and there were relatively fewer burnings. An entrenched skepticism on the part of the Suprema as to the reality of witchcraft discouraged mass persecutions from 1526 onward. During the witchcraft panic of 1610 in Navarre, the secular judges had burned their victims before the Inquisition could act. Subsequently the Suprema restrained punishment for alleged witches and in some cases denounced the charges as a delusion.

Spiritualism

A writer in the Religio-Philosophical Journal (flourished 1865–1905) states: “The language that furnishes the largest number of periodicals devoted to the dissemination of the doctrine and philosophy of modern Spiritualism, is the Spanish. This statement will be somewhat surprising to many of our readers, for we have been accustomed to look upon the Spaniards as non-progressive and conservative in the extreme. Spain, until a few years, has always been intolerant of any religions except the Roman Catholic, and was the latest of European nations to yield to the spirit of religious progress. Protestantism has with the greatest difficulty obtained a foothold in that country within the last few years, but it has been attended with annoying restrictions and persecutions, while its progress has been exceedingly slow and discouraging.”

Spiritualism in Spain began, as in many other lands, with a series of disturbances, which took place in a family residing in the outskirts of Cadiz. Stone throwing, bell ringing, and other poltergeist-style annoyances were the first means of awakening attention to the subject. Because they occurred at the house of a Spanish gentleman who had just returned from the United States, full of the marvels of the Rochester rappings, circles were at once formed, intelligent responses by rappings obtained, and a foothold for Spiritualism established. So rapidly did interest in Spiritualism spread, that the first promulgators were soon lost sight of. As early as 1854, a society was formed at Cadiz for the sole purpose of publishing the communications received from the spirits during the two preceding years.

From 1854 to 1860, Spiritualism spread through the principal towns and villages of Spain in the usual fashion, aided in large part by Spiritualism’s claim to be a nonreligious, scientific movement. Circles were held in private families, and an endless number of societies were formed and dissolved, according to the exigencies of the time.

One of the first public events of note in connection with Spanish Spiritualism deserves special mention. It was no other than a modern auto-da-fé, held on the morning of October 9, 1861, at the Esplanade Barcelona. The difference between this burning and the fiery executions of earlier centuries was that the early victims were humans, while these were all the books, pamphlets, and works of a Spiritualist character that could be procured at that period of the movement. Resting on the “funeral pyre” were the writings of Allan Kardec and Baron Ludwig von Guldenstubbe, some copies of English and American Spiritualist papers, and a large collection of tracts issued by the Spiritualists of Spain. Some change of attitude soon occurred.

Among the well-known residents of Barcelona was a Señor Navarez, whose daughter Rosa had, for many years, been the subject of spasmodic attacks, called by some of the Roman Catholic clergy “the obsession of demons,” and by the medical faculty, “an aggravated condition of epilepsy.” Within two years following the Barcelona burning, Rosa was pronounced entirely cured by the magnetic passes of a gentleman who was the medium of the private circle held in the city.

Shortly after this, Barcelona could boast of its well-approved Spiritualist publications, numerous societies for investigation, and several mediums. A journal published by a Señor Alcantara was supported by the Viscount de Torres Solanot and many other leaders of science and literature in Spain. Through this publication the opponents of Spiritualism were amazed to learn of the immense progress the cause was making, and the number of distinguished persons who assembled nightly in circles to promote its investigation.

A circular calling the attention of the Spanish public to the phenomena of Spiritualism was published in 1875 by Viscount Solanot. The authors of this circular met with no little response. However, the energetic viscount again promoted the subject before the Paris Exposition of 1878. In articles written for El Criterio, he argued for the development of an international cooperative effort by Spiritualists and named among those societies prepared to promote such a structure as including: La Federation Espirita, of Belgium; The British National Association of Spiritualists, England; La Sociedad Central Espirita, of the Republic of Mexico; and El Central General del Espiritismo. There was also an attempt to form a national association and unite all the discordant elements under the one broad banner of Spiritualism. Instead of further development, however, by the end of the century Spiritualism had ceased to exist as a vital movement in Spain.

Animal Magnetism and Mediums

In Spain, as in Italy, a considerable amount of attention was directed toward exploring mediumistic abilities by means of animal magnetism. Magnetic societies abounded in Spain prior to World War I, but internal discord eventually dissolved the bonds that had united flourishing associations.

Among the numerous groups formed in the different parts of Spain in the late nineteenth century to study Spiritualism and its phenomena was one of long standing at Tarragona called The Christian Circle. The president of this circle sent the following communication to the Revue Spirite of Paris:

"The convict prison here in Tarragona has 800 inmates sentenced to forced labour. By some means, Spiritualistic books have been introduced among the prisoners. The circulation of these books among them has been the means of bringing seventy or eighty of them to be believers in our doctrine. These converts have ceased to regard their miserable position from their old point of view; they no longer entertain schemes of revolt against the authorities. They endure their lot with resignation under the influence of the teaching that this world is but a preliminary stage to another, where, if repentant of the ill they have done, and seeking the good of others, they will be better off than here.

"Not long since one of these men died; at his death he declined the established offices of the prison priest, on the ground that he was a Spiritualist and did not need them. The priest then discovered that Spiritualism was a subject of discussion with many of the prisoners. He made a representation of the matter to his bishop, who made formal complaint of it to the commandant of the prison, and the commandant made an investigation. In the end a particular prisoner was selected for punishment in the form of an additional weight of fetters. This coming to the knowledge of the Spiritualists of Tarragona, Barcelona, and Lerida, they had a meeting upon the subject and delegated one of their number, a man of position, to interview the commandant. The representations which he made, led the commandant to cancel his order as to the additional fetters. The bishop's censure against Spiritualist books placed them under prohibition, which was maintained. It is known, however, that although never found by gaolers, the books are still there."

In April 1881 the editor of the Madrid El Criterio stated that "... great progress has been made in the cause of Spiritualism; that the hall of meeting of the Spiritual Society is completely full every Thursday evening, and is not now large enough to hold the public who come to the sessions, that Dr. Merschejewski has called the attention of the University of St. Petersburg to a psychometric phenomena of much importance; to wit: A young man deemed from childhood to be an idiot, who will in some seconds solve any mathematical problem, while if a poem be read to him, even of many hundred verses, he will repeat the whole of it without failing in a single word."

In the same issue of El Criterio Señor Manuel Lopez wrote on the progress of a society of Spiritualists in Madrid: "We have received a mediumistic work of extraordinary merit, executed by a medium of the Society of Spiritualists of Zaragoza. It consists of a portrait of Isabel the Catholic, made with a pencil, and is a work truly admirable. It is said by intelligent persons who have examined it to be an exact copy of one preserved in the Royal Museum of Painters of this court. Many thanks are tendered to the Zaragozan Society for this highly appreciated present."

It was about the end of the year 1880 that the Spiritualists of Spain sustained another series of attacks from the church. The first of these was the refusal of the clergy to accord the customary rites of interment to the remains of two women, both of irreproachable character and good standing in society, but both "guilty" of having believed in Spiritualist manifestations.

The second attack by the church about this time was the suppression of a Spiritualist paper published at Lerida, entitled El Buen Sentido. The bishop of Lerida had long threatened this step and warned the editor to beware allowing any writings reflecting upon clerical doings to appear in his columns.

One article that seemed to inflame the clergy to such threats was an article that appeared in El Buen Sentido protesting the condemnation of a working man to three years' imprisonment, leaving a family of children destitute, and all for daring to speak in public against the intolerance of the church.

In an issue of El Criterio dated 1881 was a letter from Don Migueles in which he gave a somewhat discouraging account of the cause of Spiritualism as it existed at that time in Spain. The editor commented, "Don Migueles visited many cities to examine into the state of affairs of a spiritual nature, but found many who were only to be enticed by physical phenomena, caring nothing for the esoteric beauties of our faith; many who were convinced that they knew all there was to be known concerning it, and others who were timid fearing the disapproval of neighbours."

In some places, however, excellent mediums were discovered. In Santiago, in Oviedo, in Corunna, and in Valladolid an exceptional interest was manifest. Near Santiago, there was a young girl said to be possessed of remarkable faculties. Two bars of magnetized iron held over her horizontally, half a meter distant, were reportedly sufficient to suspend her body in the air.

In 1881 the Barcelona Lux gave encouraging accounts of séances held at Cordova, Tarragona, Seville, and many other places. The editor, Madame Soler, also referred to an archbishop's prohibiting Catholics from possessing or reading the Spiritualist work of Niram Aliv of the Society of Spiritualists of Tarrasa; that of the circle of Santa Cruz of Tenerife; that of Faith, Hope, and Charity, of Andujar, and that of St. Vincent de Bogota.

Psychical Research

Psychical research emerged in Spain but had an extremely spotty existence. Some research was carried on by the Federacion Espirita Española, a Spiritualist group in Sabadel. Periodicals included Hacia La Iguidad y el Amor of Barcelona and Lumen of Tarrasa. Spain was also represented at the several international congresses of psychical research. By 1930 Don Manuel Otero of Madrid and Signor Tassi of Perugia were active psychical researchers who had investigated the phenomena of the medium Eusapia Palladino in Naples in 1899.

The Civil War and World War II disrupted developments from the 1930s on. However, interest in parapsychology reappeared in 1971 when Ramos Molina Perera began to teach courses at the Universidad Autónoma de Madrid. Two years later Perera, several colleagues, and others interested in the field founded the Sociedad Española de Parapsicología. Perera served as president for many years. The society, which at one time had several thousand members, conducts research, sponsors courses at colleges and universities, and issues Psi Comunicación.

Sources:

Baroja, Julio Caro. The World of the Witches. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Lea, Henry. History of the Inquisition in Spain. New York and London, 1906.

Llorente, J. A. History of the Inquisition of Spain. 1826.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown, 1959.

The Roots of the New Age Movement. <http://www.xs4all.nl/~wichm/newage3.html>. June 19, 2000.

Spangler, David (1945–)

David Spangler, prominent architect and theoretician of the New Age movement, was born in Columbus, Ohio, on January 7, 1945. He was raised in a family open to the psychic realm, and as a boy of seven he had his first mystical experience. As a teenager he affiliated with several theosophical groups, and through the writings of Alice A. Bailey, Spangler first learned of the coming New Age at the end of the twentieth century. In 1964 he settled in Los Angeles, where he and Myrtle Glines opened a counseling service. He began to channel an entity named "John," who would periodically emerge over the next decades, and in 1967 he authored the booklet The Christ Experience and the New Age.

In 1970, Glines and Spangler traveled to Great Britain, where Spangler decided to pay a brief visit to the Findhorn Community in northern Scotland, an early New Age center. He then canceled his travel plans and joined the 15-member community for three years. Here Spangler began to articulate an idea that the coming New Age would be a cooperative venture between humans and cosmic forces. He disagreed with Findhorn leader Peter Caddy, who believed that the New Age would be brought in by a cataclysmic event.

In 1973 Spangler returned to the United States as an apostle of the New Age movement and founded the Lorian Association in Belmont, California, based on the Findhorn model. He lectured widely and wrote a series of books about the New Age. Major titles include Revelation: The Birth of a New Age (1976), Towards a Planetary Vision (1977), Explorations: Emerging Aspects of the New Culture (1980), and his autobiography Emergence: The Rebirth of the Sacred (1980).

By the 1980s, the New Age idea had become a mass movement. Spangler, who had worked so hard on popularizing the idea, now found himself in the role of critic of the more dubious aspects of the New Age. He vilified the interest in crystals, psychic phenomena, and even channeling, as taking people away from a focus on self-transformation and upon developing a compassionate and creative life. In 1988, after several years of silence, Spangler published a series of articles in which he professed to have given up on the idea of the New Age as a social event. He now described the New Age as a metaphor for personal transformation and said that its essence would be found in the change and growth of individuals. He called upon such people to work for real change in the social order.

Sources:

Spangler, David. The Call. New York: Putnam, 1997.

———. Emergence: The Rebirth of the Sacred. New York: Delta, 1980.

———. Everyday Miracles: The Inner Art of Manifestation. New York: Bantam/Doubleday/Dell, 1996.

———. Explorations: Emerging Aspects of the New Culture. Forres, Scotland: Findhorn Publications, 1980.

———. Parent as Mystic, Mystic as Parent. New York: Berkeley Publishing Group, 2000.

———. Revelation: The Birth of a New Age. San Francisco: Rainbow Bridge, 1976.

———. Towards a Planetary Vision. Forres, Scotland: Findhorn Publications, 1977.

Spare, Austin Osman (1886–1956)

Artist and magician. Spare was born on December 13, 1886, in London. At the age of seven, he met a Mrs. Paterson, a fortune-teller and witch, with whom he kept company for many years. She eventually initiated him into her magical work. At the age of thirteen he dropped out of school and began to work in a stained glass factory while attending school at night. He won a scholarship to the Royal Academy and in 1905 published his first book of drawings, Earth Inferno. He emerged as a precursor to the surrealists by calling attention to an inner world. The book also brought him to the attention of magician Aleister Crowley, who commissioned drawings by Spare for his magazine, The Equinox.

Spare served in the British army in Egypt during World War I and then settled down to life as a poor painter, his pictures being the expression of the inner world he was exploring. Integral to that world was sexuality, and Spare took many partners through his lifelong practice of sexual magic. Spare died on March 15, 1956, in London. Though Spare wrote, illustrated, and circulated two books during his life, The Focus of Life and The Book of Pleasure, it was only after his death that some appreciation of his system could be found and his work made available to the larger magical community.

Spare's teachings have been referred to as the cult of the Zos and Kia, centered upon the polarized (positive and negative) interplay of sexual energy. The two currents are symbolized by the hand (touch) and the eye (vision). The hand and the eye become the magical instruments of the innate obsession to embody the cosmic in the flesh. Expositions of Spare's system have been offered by Kenneth Grant, head of the British OTO in several books.

Sources:

Ericson, Eric. The World, The Flesh, and the Devil: A Biographical Dictionary of Witches. New York: Mayflower Books, 1981.

Grant, Kenneth. Cults of the Shadow. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1976.

———. Images of Austin Osman Spare. London: Frederick Muller, 1975.

Spare, Austin Osman. A Book of Automatic Drawing. London: Catalpa Press, 1972.

———. The Book of Pleasure (Self-Love): The Psychology of Ecstasy. London: Co-operative Printing Society Limited, 1913. Reprint, Montreal: 93 Publishing, 1975.

———. The Focus of Life. London: The Author, 1921.

Speal Bone (Divination by)

An early form of divination used in Scotland. A speal bone, or blade bone of a shoulder of mutton, was used, but full details of the method are lacking. A soldier accompanying Lord Loudon on his retreat to Skye foretold the result of the battle of Culloden at the very moment it was decided, claiming to have seen the event by looking through the bone.

Spear, John Murray (ca. 1804–1887)

Famous American Universalist preacher and an outstanding figure in the history of early American Spiritualism. He was baptized by John Murray, the founder of the Universalist Church, whose name he bore. In the early years of his public activity he distinguished himself as an ardent abolitionist. In 1845, with his brother Charles, he published a weekly newspaper, The Prisoner's Friend, in Boston, and for many years devoted himself to helping the poor, especially prisoners and their relatives. In one year alone he delivered 80 lectures on criminal reform and against capital punishment, distributing 7,500 books to prisoners and traveling 8,000 miles in the cause.

His attention was first drawn to Spiritualism in 1851. A year later, he developed automatic writing and healing. Messages came through his hand giving addresses and names of sick people. He visited them and drove the pain out of their bodies by his touch.

Later he began to draw and deliver inspirational discourses. It was asserted that they came from John Murray. Under the title Messages from the Superior State they were published in 1852. In the following year he was made the instrument of a spirit band called the "Association of Beneficents" and produced a large work that bore resemblance in scope to the Divine Revelations of Andrew Jackson Davis (1847).

The first volume of Spear's work was published in 1857 in Boston under the title The Educator, being Suggestions, theoretical and practical, designed to promote Man-Culture and Integral Reform, with a view of the Ultimate Establishment of a Divine Social State on Earth. In the spirit world several similar organizations to the Association of Beneficents appear to have existed. One of them, the "Association of Electricizers," involved John Murray Spear in one of the strangest adventures in the history of Spiritualism.

As announced in April 1854, in The New Era, they instructed him to construct a "new motor" that would be self-generative, drawing upon the great reservoir of the magnetic life in nature and acting, like the human body, as a living organism. The machine was duly built at High Rock, near Lynn, Massachusetts, of zinc and copper at the cost of $2,000. One of Spear's disciples, Mrs. Alonzo E. Newton (the wife of one of his assistants), was appointed in a vision to be "the Mary of the New Dispensation." At High Rock, near the machine, she fell into trance and went through frightful convulsions for a period of two hours, at the end of which there were said to be indications of life in the machine. The machine was considered a newborn child; the medium nursed it for weeks and the enthusiastic band announced it as "the Art of Arts, the Science of all Sciences, the New Messiah, God's last Best Gift to Man."

Reports of a shocking nature were circulated about the birth of this modern Frankenstein-style creation and the practices by which the life principle had been infused. Andrew Jackson Davis explained ". . . that by means of a spiritual overshadowing, à la Virgin Mary, the maternal functions were brought into active operation; a few of the usual physiological symptoms followed; the crisis arrived and being in presence of the mechanism, the first living motion was communicated to it." In an anonymous article Newton's husband proceeded to show that Newton had been the subject of a set of remarkable psychological experiences and prophetic visions at the time Spear was engaged in directing the construction of the machinery at High Rock, that the coincidence between their experiences was later discovered, and that the crisis reached its apex when Newton visited the machine. She communicated, and subsequently maintained through certain mediumistic processes, an actual living principle until the machine was pronounced "a thing of life."

When the machine did not work, Davis concluded that mechanically minded spirits, deficient in practical knowledge, were conducting experiments at Spear's expense. A few months later in Randolph, where the machine was moved to have the advantage of a lofty electrical position, superstitious villagers destroyed the new motor in the night.

The destruction of the new motor had a certain advantage in silencing critics of the machine's failure to work as predicted. Other Spiritualists took the loss philosophically, S. B. Brittan commenting in the Spiritual Telegraph that, "If the New Motor is to be the physical savior of the race, it will probably rise again." John Murray Spear also projected plans for the building of a "circular city," or "perfect earthly home." These plans were also inspired by spirits. Emma Hardinge Britten, writing in Modern American Spiritualism (1869), observes,

" . . . that Mr. Spear honestly believed in a spiritual origin for the various missions he undertook, and the remarkable part he played, none who ever have come into personal relations with him can question. The unwavering patience with which he endured reproach and odium of their execution, would attest his sincerity, were other evidence wanting."

On April 15, 1869, Spear made a statement about his introduction to Spiritualism at a meeting of the London Dialectical

Society. Since the time of John Murray Spear, other individuals, such as John Worrell Keely and Wilhelm Reich, have claimed to have discovered a motor force in nature.

Sources:

Hewit, S. C. Messages from the Superior State. Boston: B. Marsh, 1853.

Report on Spiritualism of the Committee of the London Dialectical Society. London: Longmans, Green, Reader, & Dyer, 1871. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Spear of Destiny

A legendary Christian relic, the Spear of Longinus, identified in folklore with the spear that pierced the side of Christ (John 19:34) nearly two thousand years ago. Occult legend states that whoever claims this spear and understands its occult significance holds the destiny of the world in his hands. According to Houston Stewart Chamberlain, British-born propagandist for anti-Semitism and the German philosophy of an Aryan master race, this spear was claimed by Constantine the Great, Justinian, Charles Martel, Charlemagne, and various German emperors, all men of destiny.

Before World War II, the Spear of Destiny (more properly known as the Maurice Spear) was exhibited in the Hofburg Museum in Vienna. It attracted the attention of the young Adolf Hitler, who linked it with legends of the Holy Grail and made his own plans to be a man of destiny. The spear held a special fascination for Hitler and his associates in the hothouse atmosphere of occultism and evil philosophies that gave rise to the Nazi plan for world domination. In 1935, Heinrich Himmler had a replica of the spear made and kept it in his private room. Three years later, Hitler led his troops into Austria, the first stage of his plan for world conquest. One of his first acts was to remove the Spear of Destiny from the Hofburg Museum.

The spear was buried beneath the Nuremberg Fortress, where it was discovered on the day that Hitler shot himself in the Berlin bunker on April 30, 1945. It was recovered together with other treasures of the Imperial collection. On January 6, 1946, these treasures were returned to the authorities at Vienna, and the spear was reinstated in the Hofburg Museum.

Trevor Ravenscroft has compiled an exhaustive account of the story of the spear. The manner in which it influenced Hitler was integral to the occult philosophy that permeated the upper echelons of the Nazi movement and effected the actual events of World War II. Ravenscroft drew much of his unique research information from Walter Johannes Stein (1891–1957) who knew Hitler as a young man and saw Hitler's books concerned with occultism and Grail legends, with copious manuscript notes by Hitler himself indicating the beginnings of his Nazi philosophy.

Sources:

Ravenscroft, Trevor. The Spear of Destiny. London: Spearman, 1972. Reprint, New York: Putnam, 1973.

Specialist Knowledge Services (SKS)

A now-defunct British organization that conducted research, consultancy, and information in the fields of the paranormal, Fortean and anomalous phenomena, ufology, earth mysteries, and occultism. SKS was founded by Hugh Pincoff, secretary of the ASSAP (Association for the Scientific Study of Anomalous Phenomena).

Spectral Flames

Luminous phenomena seen in cemeteries and around churches, believed by some to be paranormal.

Spectrum—Society for Psychical and Spiritual Studies

Irish society that conducted study of such paranormal phenomena as haunted sites, ESP, psychokinesis, and spiritual healing. It provided a healing service for individuals in need and was available to investigate hauntings. It was also associated with the Irish UFO Organisation, with which it shares a headquarters. Last known address: 70 Glasmeen Rd., Glasnevin, Dublin 11, Republic of Ireland.

Specularii

The name by which those who engaged in crystal gazing were known in the sixteenth century.

Speculum

The crystal ball or any shining, light-refracting surface that a scryer uses for divination, i.e., crystal gazing.

Spells

Spells are incantations, written or spoken formulas of words believed to be capable of magical effects. The term “spell” derives from the Anglo-Saxon spel, a saying or story, hence a form of words; the Icelandic spjall, a saying; and the Gothic spill, a fable.

The conception of spells appears to have arisen from the idea that there is some natural and intimate connection between words and the things signified by them. Thus if one repeats the name of a supernatural being the effect will be analogous to that produced by the being itself. It is assumed that all things are in a “sympathetic” connection and act and react upon one another; things that have once been in contact continue to act on each other even after the contact has been removed. People in ancient Egypt believed that certain secret names of gods, demi-gods, and demons unknown to human beings might be discovered and used against them by the discoverer.

The power of the spoken word was a ubiquitous belief in nearly all ancient societies and continues among pre-industrial societies to the present. Magical practitioners also developed a special language, known only to them, that became an object of mystery and a source of their power in the society. Thus the magicians of ancient Egypt employed foreign words for their incantations, such as tharthar, thamara, thatha, mommon, thanabotha, opraru, brokhrex, and abranazukhel. These occurred at the end of a spell with the purpose of bringing dreams. The development of magic was integral to the development of writing, and magical writings reveal the manner in which the simple knowledge of writing, especially of a foreign language, was a magical skill of great import.

The magicians and sorcerers of the Middle Ages likewise employed words of a similar kind that were unknown to most people, as did the medicine men of the North American Indians into relatively modern times. The reason the spell was usually couched in a well-known formula may have been that it was the most efficacious. Thus in ancient Egypt not only were the formulas of spells well fixed, but the exact tone of voice in which they were to be pronounced was specially taught. The power of a spell remained until it was broken by an antidote or exorcism.

Spells belong to what modern magicians call low magic, that which attempts to effect the mundane world, as opposed to high magic, which attempts to change the consciousness of the magician and bring him or her into contact with the transcendent realm. Spells or enchantments can be divided into several classes: (1) Protective spells; (2) The curse or taboo; (3) Spells by which a person, animal, or object is to be injured or transformed; (4) Spells to procure some minor end, love-spells, or the curing of persons and animals.

Protective Spells

The protective spell commonly appeared as an incantation, usually rhymed, imploring the protection of certain gods, saints, or beneficent beings, who in waking or sleeping hours would guard the speaker from maleficent powers. For example: “Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, Bless the bed that I lie on.”

Of a deeper significance were those spells thought to be spoken by a dead Egyptian on his journey through Amenti (the kingdom of the dead), by which he warded off the evil beings who would hinder his way. The serpent who would bite the dead was addressed thus: “O serpent come not! Geb and Shu stand against thee. Thou hast eaten mice. That is loathsome to the Gods. Thou hast gnawed the bones of a putrid cat.”

E. A. W. Budge stated in his book Egyptian Magic (1899), “The Book of the Dead says, ‘Whoever readeth the spells daily over himself, he is whole upon earth, he escapes from death, and never doth anything evil meet him.’”

The deceased placed great confidence in his words of power. The gods of Thoth and Isis were the sources from which these words sprang. It will be remembered that Thoth is called the “scribe of the gods,” the “lord of writing,” the “master of papyrus,” the “maker of the palette and the ink-jar,” and the “lord of divine words,” i.e., the holy writings or scriptures. As he was the lord of books and master of the power of speech, he was considered to be the possessor of all knowledge both human and divine. The priests of Thoth were the learned magicians skilled in the written language for which Thoth had been responsible.

At the creation of the world, it was he who reduced to words the will of the unseen and unknown creative power, who uttered them so wisely that the universe came into being, and who proved himself by the exercise of his knowledge to be the protector and the friend of Osiris and of Isis, and of their son Horus.

From the evidence of the texts we know that it was not by physical might that Thoth helped these three gods, but by giving them words of power and instructing them how to use them. We know that Osiris vanquished his foes, and that he reconstituted his body and became the king of the underworld and god of the dead. It is this belief that made the deceased cry out, “Hail, Thoth, who madest Osiris victorious over his enemies, make thou Ani to be victorious over his enemies in the presence of the great and sovereign princes who are in Tattu, or in any other place.”

Without the words of power given to him by Thoth, Osiris would have been powerless under the attacks of his foes, and similarly the dead man, who was always identified with Osiris, would have passed out of existence at his death but for the words of power provided by the writings that were buried with him. In the Judgment Scene it is Thoth who reports to the gods the result of the weighing of the heart in the balance, and who has supplied its owner with the words that he has uttered in his supplications, and whatever can be said in favor of the deceased he says to the gods, and whatever can be done for him he does.

But apart from being the protector and friend of Osiris, Thoth was the refuge to which Isis fled in her trouble. The words of a hymn declare that she knew “how to turn aside evil happening,” and that she was “strong of tongue and uttered the words of power which she knew with correct pronunciation, and halted not in her speech, and was perfect both in giving the command, and in saying the word,” but this description only proves that she had been instructed by Thoth in the art of uttering words of power with effect, and to him, indeed, she owed more than this. Spells to keep away disease are of this class.

The amulets found upon Egyptian mummies and the inscriptions on Gnostic gems are, for the most part, of a protective nature. The protective spell may be said to be an amulet in words and is often found in connection with the amulet on which it is inscribed.

Taboos

The curse or taboo may appear as (a) the word of blighting, the damaging word, or (b) the word of prohibition or restriction.

The curse is of the nature of a spell, even if it is not in the shape of a definite formula. Thus we have the Highland Scottish curses: "A bad meeting to you," "Bad understanding to you," and "A down mouth be yours," which are popular as formulas.

Those who had seen old women, of the type of Madge Wildfire (in Sir Walter Scott's novel The Heart of Midlothian), cursing and banning, say their manner is well-calculated to inspire terror. Some years ago, a party of Scottish tinkers quarreled and fought, first among themselves, and then with some Tírce villagers. In the excitement, a tinker wife threw off her cap and allowed her hair to fall over her shoulders in wild disorder. She then bared her knees, and falling on them to the ground in a praying attitude, poured forth a torrent of wishes that struck awe into all who heard her.

She imprecated: "Drowning by sea and conflagration by land; may you never see a son to follow your body to the graveyard, or a daughter to mourn your death. I have made my wish before this, and I will make it now, and there was not yet a day I did not see my wish fulfilled."

Curses employed by witches usually invoked a blight upon the person cursed and their flocks, herds, and crops. Barrenness, too, was frequently called down upon women. A person under a curse or spell was believed in the Scottish Highlands "to become powerless over his own volition . . . alive and awake but moves and acts as if asleep." Curses or spells that invoked death were frequently mentioned in works that deal with Medieval magic (see summons by the dying).

The taboo was a word of prohibition or restriction. This is typified in the mystic expression "thou shalt not." Thus a number of the Biblical commandments are taboos, and the book of Leviticus teems with them. The taboo is the "don't" applied to children—a curb on basic desire for the sake of the community. To break a taboo was to bring dire misfortune upon oneself, and often upon one's family. It could even threaten the whole community and some action would have to be taken to counter the effects of a broken taboo.

Transforming Spells

There are copious examples of injury or transformation of a person, animal, or object. These were nearly always affected by a spell of a given formula. No fewer than 12 chapters of the Egyptian Book of the Dead (chapters 77 to 88) are devoted to providing the deceased with words of power, the recital of which was necessary to enable him to transform himself into various animal and human forms.

S. Baring Gould, in his Book of Folklore (1913), states that in such cases the consequence of a spell being cast on an individual required him or her to become a beast or a monster with no escape except under conditions difficult to obtain. To this category belong a number of so-called fairy tales that are actually folktales. Wherever the magical art is believed to be all-powerful, one of its greatest achievements is the casting of a spell so as to alter completely the appearance of the person on whom it is cast, so that this individual becomes an animal. One need only recall the story in the Arabian Nights of the Calendars and the three noble ladies of Baghdad, in which the wicked sisters are transformed into dogs that have to be thrashed every day. Also of this class are the stories "Beauty and the Beast" and "The Frog Prince."

Procurement Spells

Procurement spells are spells to procure some minor end. Love spells were engraved on metal tables by the Gnostics and the magicians of the Middle Ages. Instances of these are to be found in The Book of the Sacred Magic of Abraham the Jew. Spells were often employed to imprison evil spirits.

Jewish folklore has many opinions and legends relating to this subject, which appear to have derived in a great measure from the Babylonians. The ancient historian Josephus affirmed that it was generally believed by his countrymen that Solomon left behind many spells that had the power of terrifying and expelling evil spirits. Some of the old rabbis also described Solomon as an accomplished magician. It is possible that the belief in the power of spells and incantations became general among the Hebrews during the captivity, and that the invention of them was attributed to the wise Solomon, as a more creditable personage than the deities of the Assyrians.

Those fictions acquired currency, not only among the Arabs, Persians, and other Islamic nations, but, in the process of time, also in many Christian communities. They were first adopted by the Gnostics and the dualistic sects in whose beliefs pagan rituals mixed with Jewish and Christian notions. In the Middle Ages they found their way among Catholics too, principally by means of the apocryphal gospels and the hagiography of the saints.

An incident in the life of St. Margaret is typical. This holy virgin, having vanquished an evil spirit who assaulted her, demanded his name. "My name," replied the demon, "is Veltis, and I am one of those whom Solomon, by virtue of his spells, confined in a copper caldron at Babylon, but when the Babylonians, in the hope of finding treasures, dug up the caldron and opened it, we all made our escape. Since that time, our efforts have been directed to the destruction of righteous persons, and I have long been striving to turn thee from the course which thou hast embraced." The reader of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments will be immediately reminded of the story of the fisherman. The Oriental origin of many similar legends, e.g., of St. George of Cappadocia, seems equally clear.

Modern Spell Magic

Spells became a large part of popular folk magic, a fact illustrated by the magic of the Pennsylvania Dutch as compiled in The Long Lost Friend by John Hohman. This book of magic largely consists of short spells that could be easily learned and just as easily repeated at any appropriate moment. Through the nineteenth century, as Western society reoriented itself around science and technology, spells supposedly became part of the superstitious pre-scientific past. However, the survival of magic into the post-scientific world has been accompanied with a reappraisal of magic in light of its social function.

As magic has been revived in the West, one can note the spread and use of spells, especially among the Wiccans, practitioners of neo-pagan witchcraft. Much of the popular Wiccan movement is focused on the improvement of the lives of the adherents and the lives of their friends and family. Low magic is common and accompanies a program that emphasizes psychic training, self-discipline, and the development of new social skills.

In modern Wicca, the emphasis is placed upon positive spells, but there is a place for curses and negative spells. Admonitions surround the use of such spells. Some pagan priestesses speak of a threefold law of return. If one seeks out a spell, and if that spell does not take, it will rebound upon the one who sent it with a triple force.

Sources:

Abbott, John. The Keys of Power: A Study of Indian Ritual and Belief. London: Methuen, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Aima. Ritual Book of Herbal Spell. Los Angeles: Hermetic Science Center, 1970.

Budge, E. A. Wallis. Egyptian Magic. London: Kegan Paul, 1899.

- Campbell, J. G. Witchcraft and Second Sight in Scottish Highlands and Islands. Glasgow: Alex, MacLehose, 1902.
- Cohen, Daniel. Curses, Hexes and Spells. Philadelphia: Lipincott, 1974.
- De Pascale, Marc. The Book of Spells. New York: Taplinger, 1971.
- González-Wippler, Migene. The Complete Book of Spells, Ceremonies, and Magic. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1978.
- Graves, Samuel R. [Osirus]. Potions and Spells of Witchcraft. San Francisco: JBT Marketing, 1970.
- Grimm, Jacob. Teutonic Mythology. 4 vols. London: Bell, 1880–88.
- Heim, Richard, ed. Incantamenta Magica Graeca Latina. Leipzig: Teubner, 1893.
- Hohman, John George. The Long Lost Friend. Harrisburg, Pa., 1850.
- Holroyd, Stuart. Magic, Words, and Numbers. London: Aldus Books; Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1975.
- Leek, Sybil. Book of Curses. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1975.
- . Cast Your Own Spell. New York: Bee-Line Books, 1970.
- MacKenzie, William, ed. Gaelic Incantations, Charms and Blessings of the Hebrides. Inverness, Scotland, 1895.
- Malbrough, Ray T. Charms, Spells, and Formulas. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1987.
- Maple, Eric. Incantations and Words of Power. New York: Samuel Weiser, 1974.
- Martello, Leo. Curses in Verses. New York: Hero Press, 1971.
- Mickaharic, Draja. A Century of Spells. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1988.
- Morrison, Sarah Lyndon. The Modern Witch's Spellbook. New York: David McKay, 1971.
- Norris, David, and Jacquemine Charrott-Lodwidge. The Book of Spells. London: Lorrimer, 1974.
- Rose, Donna. Love Spells. Hialeah, Fla.: Mi-World Publishing Co., n.d.
- Waite, Arthur E. The Book of Ceremonial Magic. London: William Rider, 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Spence, (James) Lewis (Thomas Chalmers) (1874–1955)

Scottish journalist and scholar of the occult who took a particular interest in the Atlantis theme. Born November 25, 1874, in Forfarshire, Scotland, he was educated privately and at Edinburgh University before following a journalistic career. He was copy editor of the newspaper The Scotsman, (1899–1906), editor of The Edinburgh Magazine (1904–05), and copy editor of The British Weekly (1906–09). About this time he took to serious study of mythology and folklore, with special reference to Mexico and Central America. He published some important books on the subject, including his own study of The Popul Vuh, the sacred book of the ancient Quiché Indians of Maya (1908) and A Dictionary of Mythology (1910).

He also published more than 40 other works dealing with mythology, folklore, and the occult, including the Encyclopaedia of Occultism (1920) the first comprehensive work of its kind and ultimately one of the primary sources of this Encyclopedia of Occultism and Parapsychology.

He contributed articles to the Hibbert Journal, the Glasgow Herald, and The Times. An ardent Scottish nationalist, he contested North Midlothian as a candidate in 1929. He also found time to write romantic poetry. He was a fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland and was vice president of the Scottish Anthropological and Folklore Society. In 1951 he was awarded a royal pension for services to literature.

He is best known, perhaps, for his books exploring the Atlantis myth. He also edited the journal Atlantis Quarterly in 1932. His Magic Arts in Celtic Britain (1945) was used extensively in the early years of the modern neo-pagan witchcraft revival. He died March 3, 1955.

Sources:

- Spence, Lewis. Atlantis in America. London: E. Benn, 1925. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1972.
- . British Fairy Origins. London: Watts, 1946.
- . The Fairy Tradition in Britain. London; New York: Rider, 1948.
- . The History of Atlantis. 1926. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.
- . The Magic and Mysteries of Mexico. Philadelphia: David McKay, 1930.
- . The Occult Causes of the Present War. N.p., 1940.
- . The Occult Sciences in Atlantis. London: Rider, 1943.
- Reprint, New York: S. Weiser, 1970.
- . The Problem of Atlantis. 1924. Reprinted as Atlantis Discovered. New York: Causeway Books, 1974.
- . The Problem of Lemuria. London: Rider, 1932.
- . Scottish Ghosts and Goblins. N.p., 1952.
- . Second Sight: Its History and Origins. London; New York: Rider, 1951.
- . Will Europe Follow Atlantis? N.p., 1942.

Spheres

Divisions of the spirit world, both in spatial and moral-spiritual senses. The doctrine of spheres, in a literal sense, was integral to the ancient world, and much of occult teachings—astrology, magic, Gnosticism—emerged in such a cosmology. It was retained in the occult culture and has passed into modern theosophical and Spiritualist circles, where it has remained, though the spheres are usually thought of as levels of a multi-dimensional world.

Spiritualists have developed a doctrine of the spheres based upon the communications of spirits in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The information conflicts at many points, and there is no authority to declare for one opinion over another, but there is a general agreement as to the number of spheres. They are seven: (1) Hell, (2) Sphere of Desires, (3) Summerland, (4) Mind, (5) Abstract, (6) Meeting of the Sexes, and (7) Union of the Sexes.

There is some contradiction as to whether the Earth should be considered as the first sphere. It is said that the first sphere is the abode of gross and ignorant spirits. It is gloomy and desolate, replete with sadness and misery. After a realization of their state and the circumstances that cast them into it, the desire for progress and betterment will transfer the spirits into the second sphere where, in a scenery as natural as that on Earth, harmony, love, and kindness help to develop the higher qualities of the soul.

The period of the stay in a particular sphere varies individually. The higher spheres cannot be perceived by spirits in the lower ones. Information on the higher spheres is obtained from visitors descending to lower spheres. Owing to a lack of conception, no adequate description can be conveyed to us. It is also said that beyond the spheres are the heavens of boundless extent. These are the ultimate abodes of the glorified and blessed.

Hudson Tuttle, in his book Arcana of Spiritualism (1871), furnishes an interesting exposition of the origin of the spheres. According to Tuttle, the spirit world is built up from atomic emanations. Exhalations from all substances ascend as mist rises from a sheet of water. The spirit world therefore depends on the Earth for its existence and is formed through its refining instrumentality. Without the Earth there could not have been corresponding spirit spheres, actually zones rather than spheres. They are 120 degrees wide; that is, they extend 60 degrees on each side of the equator. If we take the sixtieth parallel of latitude each side of the equator and imagine it projected against the blue dome of the sky, we have the boundaries of these zones.

The first zone, or the innermost one, is 60 miles from the Earth's surface. The next external one is removed from the first by about the same distance. The third is just outside the moon's orbit, or 265,000 miles from the Earth. From the third sphere rise the most sublimated exhalations, which mingle with the emanations of the other planets and form a vast zone around the entire solar system, including even the unknown planets beyond the vast orbit of Neptune (the spirits had yet to inform him of the existence of Pluto).

The first zone is nearly 30 miles in thickness, the second 20, the third but two miles. While the Earth is slowly diminishing, the spheres are gradually increasing. The surface of the zones is diversified with changing scenery. Matter, when it aggregates there, is prone to assume the forms in which it existed below. Hence there are all the forms of life there as on Earth, except those, such as the lowest plants and animals, that cannot exist surrounded by such superior conditions. The scenery is of mountain and plain; river, lake and ocean; and of forest and prairie. It is like Earth with all its imperfections perfected, and its beauties are multiplied.

The first trance reference to spheres in the lineage of modern Spiritualism seems to have been made by Frederica Hauffe, the seeress of Prevorst. The second is contained in a letter from G. P. Billot to J. P. F. Deleuze in 1831. Billot wrote: "They taught that God was a grand Spiritual Sun—life on earth a probation—the spheres, different degrees of comprehensive happiness or states of retributive suffering—each appropriate to the good or evil deeds done on earth. They described the ascending changes open to every soul in proportion to his own efforts to improve."

The first exact dimensions were claimed by J. A. Gridley in his book Astounding Facts from the Spirit World (1854). According to his data, the first sphere is 5,000 miles, the sixth 30,000 miles from the Earth's surface.

Diagrams of the spheres were first drawn by Hauffe. Nahum Koons in the Koon loghouse was the second to provide detailed sketches; his information was supplemented by accounts given through the trumpet (see also Jonathan Koons).

Robert Hare differed from Gridley and agreed with Hudson Tuttle inasmuch as his communicators put the distance of the nearest sphere as 60 miles from the Earth's surface. But his further distances did not tally with Tuttle's calculations. He placed the sixth sphere within the area of the moon. He was told that the spheres are concentric zones, or circles, of exceedingly refined matter encompassing the Earth like belts or girdles. They have atmospheres of peculiar vital air, soft and balmy. Their surfaces are diversified with an immense variety of picturesque landscapes, with lofty mountain ranges, valleys, rivers, lakes, forests, trees and shrubbery, and flowers of every colour and variety, sending forth grateful emanations.

As flights of unverifiable speculation proceeded, almost every trance description of the spheres asserted something different. Eugene Crowell, in The Identity of Primitive Christianity with Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1875–79), states that he had received the following figures: the first sphere is within our atmosphere, the second is about 60 miles from the earth, the third about 160, the fourth 310, the fifth 460, the sixth 635, the seventh 865 miles.

Precise information was tendered in J. Hewat McKenzie's Spirit Intercourse (1916). The supposed spirit of William James was quoted as the authority behind the statements. The disagreement is all too apparent. "The third sphere, the Summer Land, is 1,350 miles from the earth, the fourth 2,850, the fifth 5,050, the sixth 9,450, and the seventh 18,250."

The sustenance of the body in superphysical states is derived from the atmosphere by inhalation in the ordinary act of breathing; the material for clothing and houses is manufactured; there is a union of sexes in a bond of affection, with no offspring; the animals that live there have previously existed on Earth; the spiritual worlds of each planet unite at the seventh sphere; the spheres are built of essences cast off by millions of tons of matter that condense into solid substance and float in space like vast continents, by the operation of centripetal and centrifugal attraction; and the passage from one sphere to the other is effected by gradual refinement of the spiritual body under the effect of the spirit.

An impressive conception of after-death states was disclosed in Geraldine Cummins's The Road to Immortality (1932), a book said to be dictated by the spirit of F. W. H. Myers. According to the chapter "The Chart of Existence," the journey of the soul takes place through the following stages:

1. The Plane of Matter.
2. Hades or the Intermediate State.
3. The Plane of Illusion.
4. The Plane of Color.
5. The Plane of Flame.
6. The Plane of Light.
7. Out Yonder, Timelessness.

Between each plane or new chapter in experience, there is existence in Hades or in an intermediate state when the soul reviews his past experiences and makes his choice, deciding whether he will go up or down the ladder of consciousness.

Although there is marked disagreement between different accounts of spirit worlds in the afterlife, it will be recalled that this is also characteristic of the eschatology (considerations of the afterlife) of the different Eastern and Western religions.

It has been claimed that spirits who have not become purified and refined and remain tied to earthly desires have been easier to contact and that their communications would be unreliable. Advance spirits would have moved on to more rarified planes of existence. However, that idea seems to be contradicted by the attempts to identify various spirits with advanced beings from the past.

It is interesting to note that many individuals who have experienced out-of-the-body travel, especially as part of a near-death experience, have reported a remarkable similarity of content in terms both of positive experiences of moving toward a bright light and meeting light beings, as well as negative experiences of a purgatorial realm. These experiences, however, have no relation to the spiritualist doctrine of the spheres.

Sources:

Cummins, Geraldine Dorothy. The Road to Immortality. London: I. Nicholson & Watson, 1933.

Tuttle, Hudson. Arcana of Spiritualism. N.p., 1871. Reprint, Manchester: The Two Worlds Publishing, 1900; Chicago: J. R. Francis, 1904.

Spider

Various folklore beliefs surround the spider. In England, spiders were known as "money makers." If found on clothing, they were a sign that money was on the way, provided that the spider was not killed. A similar idea prevailed in Polynesia, where a spider dropping down in front of a person was a sign of a present. An American belief is that killing a spider will bring rain.

In folk medicine, a spider was rolled in butter or molasses and swallowed. As a cure for ague, it was tied up and secured on the left arm. A spider was also traditionally used as an amulet. The insect was baked and worn around the neck.

The British antiquary Elias Ashmole stated in his Memoirs (1717): "I took early in the morning a good dose of elixir, and hung three spiders around my neck, and they drove my ague away. Deo Gratias!"

Robert Burton (1577–1640) stated:

"Being in the country in the vacation time, not many years since, at Lindly in Leicestershire, my father's house, I first observed this amulet of a spider in a nut-shell, wrapped in silk, so applied for an ague by my mother. . . . This I thought most absurd and ridiculous, and I could see no warrant in it . . . till at length, rambling amongst authors, I found this very medicine in Dioscorides, approved by Matthiolus, repeated by Aldrovandus. . . . I began to have a better opinion of it, and to give more credit to amulets, when I saw it in some parties answer to experience.”

Spiders were sacred to the ancient Egyptian goddess Maat and are used today as symbolism of a Maatian (feminist) form of ceremonial magic.

Spiegelschrift

Writing written backward, from right to left, so as to be read in a mirror. Automatic writing is frequently done in this way, and it is said that the ability to produce spiegelschrift is often found where there is a natural tendency to automatism.

Spiral Journey

Spiral Journey, a post-New Age networking periodical, serves the greater Seattle area of the state of Washington. Appearing ten times annually, Spiral Journey covers holistic health, New Thought spirituality, and alternatives designed to connect the body, mind, and spirit.

Each issue is built around a set of brief feature articles on various religious and health perspectives dominated by a New Thought positive thinking approach, chosen for their aim to empower and inform. There are also several regular columns, including a question-and-answer column by hypnotherapist Ayal Hurst, and an astrology-tarot column, “Astrocures,” by health consultant Donna Pinkston, who is also Spiral Journey’s editor and marketing director. The sensitivity to a spectrum of alternative spiritual options is demonstrated in the inclusion of a “Totem of the Month” feature highlighting the symbolic significance of various animals.

Spiral Journey initially appeared in July of 1997, and grew out of the spiritual crisis that its editor, Asara Sharon Briski, had gone through in the mid-1990s. It is published at PMB 6121, 13300 Bothell-Everett Hwy., Mill Creek, WA 98012, and distributed free at a number of bookstores, health food stores, and other businesses in its target area. It is issued monthly, with combined issues in December/January and July/August.

Sources:

Spiral Journey. Mill Creek, Wash., n.d.

SPIRICOM

Apparatus invented by research engineer George W. Meek of the METAscience Foundation as a communication system with the dead. This particular development of an electronic voice phenomenon (EVP) involves a frequency modulation system using supplementary audio tones. In contrast to the previously claimed EVP or Raudive voices system, which obtained very weak voice signals, usually of a few words spoken at higher than normal speeds, Meek and his associates claimed to have received many hours of sustained conversation at normal speed from the American scientist George Jeffries Mueller, who had died of a heart attack 14 years earlier.

The first announcement of SPIRICOM was made on April 6, 1982, following 11 years of research and development. The system was not entirely mechanical, since, like other electronic devices such as the black box, it required the psychic energies of an operator.

In a release published in the journal New Realities (vol. 4, no. 6), Meek describes his system of SPIRICOM Mark IV as consisting of three components: a transceiver operating in the 30–130 Mhz range; a special combination of 13 audio frequencies from 21 to 701 cps; and the input of energy from an operator who had certain highly psychic abilities, involving energy apparently outside present knowledge of the electromagnetic system, tentatively called “bioplasmic.” The system was developed in conjunction with the MetaScience Foundation at Franklin, North Carolina.

The inventor and his associates made their preliminary announcement in order to encourage other researchers to develop their invention beyond basic stage so that communication with the dead by means of electronic apparatus might become perfected as quickly as possible. No patent rights were filed on the equipment, and both printed and audio explanatory materials were published to facilitate the work of other experimenters. For further information, contact METAscience Foundation, P.O. Box 10749, Minneapolis, MN 55458. (See also Ashkir-Jobson Trianion; Communigraph; Friedrich Jürgen-son; Reflectograph)

Spirit

A basic concept in the Western religious traditions, in which it is often contrasted to the material aspect of existence. The Hebrew word ruah (spirit) originally meant “breath” or “wind,” and the association of spirit with breath and wind is also found in the Greek word pneuma. In the Christian tradition, biblical interpreters generally argue for one of two views of the spirit. Some see the spirit as synonymous with the soul and as the principle of all life, including the intellectual, moral, and religious, and believe that when the body dies the soul returns to God, who made it. Others tend to see a distinction between the spirit and the soul. They believe the soul (psyche) is the principle of animal life and is possessed by humans and animals alike. The spirit, in contrast, is that which humans possess which is not shared with other animals—a moral and an immortal life, a conscious relationship to God. In this view, the soul and body die, but the spirit survives and goes into God’s presence. This latter view has tended to dominate within Spiritualism.

The Spirit in Spiritualism

In Spiritualism spirit is variously defined as the inmost principle, the divine particle, the vital essence, and the inherent actuating element in life. It is seen as manifesting through its association with protoplasm and dwells in the astral body, which Spiritualists identify with the soul, the connecting link between the spirit and the physical body.

At death the connection between the spirit and the physical body is severed, and the spirit finds no ordinary means of manifestation. Spirits appear to be cognizant of space, although not conditioned by it. The same applies to time. Past, present, and future cease to exist for the spirit in the earthly sense.

Spiritualists do not see spirits in the role of Peeping Toms, keeping watch on the most private actions of the living, but have concluded that they are partly conscious of the thoughts and emotions directed toward them from the Earth.

They also maintain that spirits cannot hold communion with the living if the mental attitude of the latter is not receptive to spirit communication. In the mid-nineteenth century chemistry professor Robert Hare was told by alleged spirits that there were peculiar elementary principles out of which spiritual bodies were constructed that were analogous to material elements; that spirits have bodies, with a circulation and respiratory apparatus; and that they breathe a gaseous or ethereal matter that is also inhaled by men, beasts, and fish.

William Denton a geology professor noted for his research in psychometry, wrote: “The vision that can see through brick walls and distinguish objects miles away, does not belong to the body; it must belong to the spirit. Hundreds of times have I had the evidence that the spirit can smell, hear and see, and has powers of locomotion. As the fin in the unhatched fish indicates the water in which he may one day swim, so these powers in man indicate that mighty realm which the spirit is fitted eternally to enjoy.”

Sources:

- Crawley, A. E. The Idea of the Soul. New York: Macmillan, 1909.
- De Vesme, Caesar. A History of Experimental Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Rider, 1931.
- Driesch, Hans. History and Theory of Vitalism. New York: Macmillan, 1914.
- Hackforth, R., trans. Plato's Phaedo. Cambridge, Mass.: Cambridge University Press, 1955.
- Hare, Robert. Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestations. New York, 1856.
- Heysinger, Isaac. Spirit and Matter Before the Bar of Modern Science. London: T. Werner Laurie, 1910.
- Hyslop, James H. Contact With the Other World. New York: Century, 1919.
- King, J. H. The Supernatural. 2 vols. London, 1892.
- Mead, G. R. S. The Doctrine of the Subtle Body in Western Tradition. London: J. M. Watkins, 1919.
- . Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. London: Longmans, Green, 1903. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.
- Tweeddale, C. L. Man's Survival After Death. London, 1909. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1918.
- Tylor, E. B. Primitive Culture. 2 vols. New York: George Putnam's Sons, 1871.

Spirit and Nature (Magazine)

Bimonthly magazine dealing with the teachings of Paramahansa Yogananda and his disciple Swami Kriyananda, who left the Self-Realization Fellowship to found Ananda. Address: Ananda Cooperative Village, 14618 Tyler Foote Rd., Nevada City, CA 95959. Website: <http://www.ananda.org/>.

Sources:

Ananda. <http://www.ananda.org/>. April 14, 2000.

Spirit Children

A Spiritualist explanation for the relatively frequent phenomenon of children reporting invisible playmates. In Spiritualism, these are children who have died and, according to accounts of mediums in trance, are growing to maturity in an afterlife. Child mediums have often claimed spirit children as their playmates, and mediums have often had a “child” as one of their spirit controls.

Florence Marryat, in her book There is No Death (1891), writes of medium Bessie Williams's little girl “Mabel”: “I have watched her playing at ball with an invisible child, and have seen the ball thrown, arrested half-way in the air, and then tossed back again as if a living child had been Mab's opponent.” According to Marryat, when a still-born baby enters the other side, she is delivered over to the nearest relative of its parent to be named and brought up.

“The nurse of the little Guldenstubbe,” writes Baron Helmbach in his book Birth and Death as a Change of Perception (1886), “who afterwards became a very celebrated medium, noticed with terror that his playthings moved about by themselves, while the child declared that another child was playing with them.”

Sources:

Marryat, Florence. There is No Death. London: K Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1891. Reprint, London: Griffith, Farran, 1893.

Spirit Hypothesis

The theory that the intelligence that directs the phenomena of the medium and the séance room is a disembodied spirit. Interest in the possibility of this theory being true and of establishing proof of it energized much of psychical research in its first generations. The theory suffered greatly from the discovery that most of the more interesting phenomena was simply the product of fraud. Most of contemporary parapsychology has redirected itself away from any consideration of the spirit hypothesis and in favor of exploring psychic powers inherent in the individual and the various altered states of consciousness that accompany the exercise of such powers. Some consideration of possible spirit activity remains in the study of poltergeists and the near-death experience.

As Spiritualism developed, the spirit hypothesis stood against various psychological theories of mediumship and the diabolic theories of conservative Christian theologians. The psychological theory reduced the genuine phenomena to mental processes inherent in the mediums themselves and their associates.

Theodore Flournoy was an early champion of the psychological hypothesis:

“The state of passivity, the abdication of the normal personality, the relaxation of voluntary control over the muscular movements, and the ideas—this whole psycho-physiological attitude, where the subject is in a state of expectancy of communicating with the deceased—strongly predisposes him to mental dissociation and a sort of infantile regression, a relapse into an inferior phase of psychic evolution, where his imagination naturally begins to imitate the discarnate, utilising the resources of the subconscious, the emotional complexes, latent memories, instinctive tendencies ordinarily suppressed, etc., for the various roles it plays.”

James H. Hyslop summed up the fundamental conditions of the spirit hypothesis as follows: (1) The information acquired must be supernormal, that is, not explicable by normal perception; (2) The incidents must be verifiable memories of the deceased persons and so representative of their personal identity; (3) The incidents must be trivial and specific—not easily, if at all, duplicated in the common experience of others.

William James, in his report of the “Richard Hodgson” spirit control of Leonora Piper states:

“I myself can perfectly well imagine spirit agency, and find my mind vacillating about it curiously. When I take the phenomena piecemeal, the notion that Mrs. Piper's subliminal self should keep her sitters apart as expertly as she does, remembering its past dealings with each of them so well, not mixing their communications more, and all the while humbugging them so profusely, is quite compatible with what we know of the dreamlife of the hypnotised subjects. . . . But I find that when I ascend from the details to the whole meaning of the phenomenon . . . the notion that such an immense current of experience, complex in so many ways, should spell out absolutely nothing but the word humbug, acquires a character of unlikeness. The notion that so many men and women, in all other respects honest enough, should have this preposterous monkeying self annexed to their personality seems to me so weird that the spirit theory immediately takes on a more probable appearance. The spirits, if spirits there be, must indeed work under incredible complications and falsifications, but at least if they are present some honesty is left in the whole department of the universe which otherwise is run by pure deception. The more I realise the quantitative massiveness of the phenomenon and its complexity, the more incredible it seems to me that in a world all of whose vaster features we are in the habit of considering to be sincere at least, however, brutal, this feature should be wholly constituted on insincerity.”

In a chapter called “The Spiritistic Hypothesis” in his book My Philosophy (1933), Sir Oliver Lodge states:

“My doctrine involves the primary reality of mind in association with whatever physical mechanism it may find available. Matter constitutes only one of these mechanisms, and indeed only constitutes it in a secondary fashion; and by a study limited to matter alone we shall never get the full reality of existence.

I hold that all our actions on matter here and now are conducted through empty space, or rather through the entity which fills space; and that if our activity continues, it must be continued in the same sort of way and through the same sort of etheric mechanism that we already unconsciously utilise now. That in brief terms is the spiritistic hypothesis which I proclaim and work on."

Sources:

Beard, Paul. Survival of Death: For and Against. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1966.

Broad, C. D. Personal Identity and Survival. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1968.

Carington, Whately. The Foundations of Spiritualism. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1920.

Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case for and Against Survival. Springfield, Ill.: C. C. Thomas, 1959.

Hyslop, James H. Contact With the Other World: The Latest Evidence as to Communication With the Dead. New York: Century, 1919.

Jacobson, Nils Olof. Life Without Death? On Parapsychology, Mysticism and the Question of Survival. New York: Delacorte Press, 1973. Reprint, London: Turnstone Books, 1974.

Richmond, Kenneth. Evidence of Identity. London: G. Bell, 1939.

Rogo, D. Scott. Welcoming Silence: A Study of Psychical Phenomena and Survival of Death. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

Salter, W. H. Zoar; or, The Evidence of Psychical Research Concerning Survival. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1961. Reprint, Arno Press, 1975.

Smith, Susy. Life Is Forever: Evidence for Survival After Death. Putnam, 1974.

Spirit Intervention

Spiritualist annals contain a number of accounts of the intervention of spirits to find lost wills, other papers, or objects of importance, or to track down murderers. Boccaccio, in his Life of Dante, related that the spectral form of Dante appeared in a dream to his son Jacopo Alighiere, and on the son's inquiry whether he had finished his great poem, the thirteenth canto of which they were unable to find, the spirit took him by the hand and led him to the house and into the room where Dante had been accustomed to sleep and pointed out a blind window covered by matting. On waking, Alighiere found the missing canto, which had not been seen before, in this place.

The philosopher Kant, in his revelations on Emanuel Swedenborg, narrated the story of a Madame Marteville, a widow who was asked to pay a debt of her deceased husband. She remembered that the debt was paid but could not find the receipt. During a visit to Swedenborg, Marteville asked the seer if he had known her husband. Swedenborg answered in the negative. Eight days afterward, the spirit of the dead man appeared to the widow in a dream and showed her where she would find a casket of finest workmanship with the receipt and a magnificent pin, which was also lost, inside. She immediately got out of bed, ran to the place indicated, and found the casket and contents.

In the morning, she was hardly awake when Swedenborg was announced. Without having knowledge of her dream Swedenborg told her that during the night he conversed with many spirits, among them her deceased husband who, however, cut short the conversation by saying that he must visit his wife in order to reveal to her the whereabouts of a paper of the highest importance and of a diamond breast pin she thought lost. Swedenborg called to find out whether the spirit had kept his promise.

The Master of Lindsay, on being questioned before the committee of the London Dialectical Society on July 6, 1869, as to whether he ever obtained any information that could not have been known to the medium or to any present, told the following story:

"A friend of mine was very anxious to find a will of his grandmother, who had been dead 40 years, but could not even find the certificate of her death. I went with him to the Marshall's, and we had a séance; we sat at a table, and soon the raps came; my friend then asked his questions mentally; he went over the alphabet himself, or sometimes I did so, not knowing the question. We were told the will had been drawn by a man named William Walker, who lived in Whitechapel; the name of the street, and the number of the house were given. We went to Whitechapel, found the man, and subsequently, through his aid, obtained a copy of the draft; he was quite unknown to us, and had not always lived in the locality, for he had once seen better days. The medium could not possibly have known anything about the matter, and even if she had, her knowledge would have been of no avail, as all the questions were mental ones."

Robert Macnish, in his book The Philosophy of Sleep (1830), narrates the court case of R. of Bowland. This man was summoned to pay a sum that his father had already paid. When he was about to pay again, the spirit of his father appeared to him in a dream and informed him that the respective papers were in the hands of M. of Inveresk, near Edinburgh. If he had no recollection of it, he should be reminded of the difference of opinion that he had with the deceased about a Portuguese coin. The reminder was most helpful. With the help of it the old attorney remembered and found the papers.

Gabriel Delanne, in his book Le Spiritisme devant la Science (1885), tells the story of a spirit communication given to a descendant of Johann Sebastian Bach by the spirit of an Italian musician named Baldasarini who lived at the court of Henry III of France. The communication led to the discovery of a small strip of paper inside a spinet of 1664 with four lines of verse in the handwriting of Henry III. The authenticity of the writing was proved by comparing the strip with manuscripts in the Imperial Library.

The "Widow's Mite" incident was described by Isaac K. Funk in his book of this title, published in 1904. In February 1903, he heard of a Brooklyn family where every Wednesday evening sittings took place in the presence of a few invited guests. On his third visit, when he was getting reconciled to the notion that the mediumship was a remarkably good case of secondary personality, the control "George" asked: "Has anyone here got anything that belonged to Mr. Beecher?"

There was no reply. On his emphatic repetition of the question, Funk replied: "I have in my pocket a letter from the Rev. Dr. Hillis, Mr. Beecher's successor. Is that what you mean?"

The answer was: "No, I am told by a spirit present, John Rakestraw[,] that Mr. Beecher, who is not present, is concerned about an ancient coin, the Widow's Mite. This coin is out of place, and should be returned, and he looks to you, doctor, to return it."

Funk was greatly surprised and asked: "What do you mean by saying that he looks to me to return it? I have no coin of Mrs. Beecher's." The control then explained that he knew nothing about it, except that he was told that the coin was out of place and had been for a number of years and that Beecher had said that Funk could find and return it. The control also added that he was impressed that the coin was in a large iron safe in a drawer under a lot of papers.

Funk then remembered that when he was making the Standard Dictionary, he had borrowed a valuable ancient coin, known as the Widow's Mite, from a close friend of Beecher's. This friend had just died several days before. Funk asked if the coin had been returned. The answer came that it had not.

After Funk instituted a search, the coin was found in his office in a little drawer in his large iron safe under a stack of papers. In later inquiries through the control Funk was told that Beecher was not concerned about the return of the coin. His purpose was to give Funk a test to prove communication between the two worlds.

James H. Hyslop, in his report on the direct voice mediumship of Elisabeth Blake of Ohio (Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research, vol. 7, p. 581), quotes the following case given by L. V. Guthrie, superintendent of the West Virginia Asylum at Huntington, Blake's medical adviser:

"An acquaintance of mine, of prominent family in this end of the State, whose grandfather had been found at the foot of a high bridge with his skull smashed and life extinct, called on Mrs. Blake a few years ago and was not thinking of her grandfather at the time. She was very much surprised to have the spirit of her grandfather tell her that he had not fallen off the bridge while intoxicated, as had been presumed at the time, but that he had been murdered by two men who met him in a buggy and had proceeded to sandbag him, relieve him of his valuables, and throw him over the bridge. The spirit then proceeded to describe minutely the appearance of the two men who had murdered him, and gave such other information that had led to the arrest and conviction of one or both of these individuals."

Spiritism

A general term for the belief that the spirits or souls of the dead communicate with the living through a medium or psychically sensitive individual. The term has been used with two quite different meanings in the twentieth century. In conservative Christian circles it is often used as a derogatory term to describe Spiritualism in anticult literature. It is also used as the designation of the followers of the particular Spiritualist teachings of Allan Kardec (1804–1869), a French medium who also had immense influence on the development of Spiritualism in Spain, Portugal, and South America (especially Brazil). Kardec's thought was distinctive from British and American Spiritualism in the nineteenth century by its advocacy of belief in reincarnation.

Prior to his adoption of Spiritualist beliefs in about 1862, Kardec had been an exponent of animal magnetism and phrenology. He based his new teachings on spirit revelations received through clairvoyants, and so popular were these teachings that they rapidly spread over the Continent. In Britain, however, Spiritism obtained little hold, its only prominent exponent being Anna Blackwell, who endeavored without success to establish the doctrine of reincarnation.

Spiritism and Spiritualism should not be confused, since the adherents of each section were opposed to the tenets of the other. Even in France, where Spiritism obtained the strongest footing, there was a distinct Spiritualist party reluctant to accept the doctrine of reincarnation.

Kardec's Spiritism flourished in nineteenth-century France, and is today well established in South America, especially Brazil, where it is estimated that there are now some four million Spiritists. In contemporary South American Spiritism there is a noticeable tendency to blur formal distinctions between Spiritism and Spiritualism, particularly in Brazil, where all kinds of physical phenomena are manifest, including psychic surgery. The Spiritism of Kardec discouraged such physical mediumship as materialization in favor of automatic writing, believing this to be a more direct and unambiguous contact with departed spirits.

Modern Brazilian Spiritists also make a distinction between ordinary automatic writing (escrita automotica), which might involve the medium's own subconscious, and psicografia (dictation from a spirit entity).

Sources:

Kardec, Allan. Experimental Spiritism: The Mediums' Book. London, 1876.

———. The Spirits' Book. London, 1875.

Playfair, Guy Lyon. The Flying Cow: Research Into Paranormal Phenomena in the World's Most Psychic Country. London: Souvenir Press, 1975. Reprinted as The Unknown Power. New York: Pocket Books, 1975. Reprint, London: Panther paperback, 1977.

Spirit Messenger (Journal)

(Full name: The Spirit Messenger, and The Star of Truth.) Started in Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1849, the chief organ of Andrew Jackson Davis's "harmonial philosophy" after the Univercoelum journal expired. Rev. R. P. Amber, a Universalist minister, and Apollos Munn were joint editors.

Spirito, Ugo (1896– ?)

Professor of philosophy who wrote on parapsychology. He was born on September 9, 1896, at Arezzo, Italy, and he studied at the University of Rome (LL.B., 1918; Ph.D., 1920). He taught at the University of Pisa (1932–34), the University of Messina (1935), the University of Genoa (1936), and the University of Rome (beginning in 1937).

Spirito developed an interest in parapsychology as it related to his own scholarly discipline, and he wrote several related books. He also attended the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies in Utrecht, Netherlands, in 1953.

Sources:

Spirito, Ugo. Il Problematicismo (Problematicism). Firenze: G. C. Sansoni, 1948.

———. Scienza e Filosofia (Science and Philosophy). Firenze: G. C. Sansoni, 1950.

———. La vita come amore (Life as Love). N.p., 1953. Reprint, Firenze: G. C. Sansoni, 1970.

———. La Vita come arte (Life as Art). N.p., 1941.

———. La Vita come ricerca (Life as a Search). 2d ed. Firenze: G. C. Sansoni, 1943.

Spiritoid

Term used by psychical researcher Emile Boirac for messages that originate in the subconscious mind and appear in a dramatic and personalized form. It was also used by Cesare Lombroso and Theodore Flournoy.

Spirit Photography

The production of photographs on which alleged spirit forms are visible. When the plate or film is developed there sometimes appears, in addition to the likeness of the sitters at a séance, a shape resembling more or less distinctly the human form, which at the moment of exposure was imperceptible to normal vision.

Beginning in the late nineteenth century, Spiritualists asserted that there were photographs of spirits (the spirits of departed friends and relatives of the sitters) and that the presence of a medium was generally required to facilitate their production. Even though the main evidence in favor of spirit photography rests on recognition of the supposed spirit by the sitter and others, the "astral figure" is often very vague and indistinct, with the head and shoulders enveloped in close-clinging draperies.

The practice of "spirit photography" originated in the United States in the nineteenth century and enjoyed a fitful existence through the 1930s. It was first introduced in 1862 by William H. Mumler, a Boston photographer. A Dr. Gardner, of the same city, was photographed by Mumler, and on the plate appeared an image that the sitter identified as his cousin, who had died 12 years before. Gardner published his experience, and the new spirit photography was at once adopted by Spiritualists, who saw in it a means of proving their beliefs. In 1863, however, Gardner discovered that in at least two instances a living model was the subject of Mumler's "spirit" pictures. Although he continued to believe that some of the photographs might be genuine, his exposure of Mumler as fraudulent effectively checked the movement for a time.

After a lapse of six years, Mumler appeared in New York, where the authorities endeavored to prosecute him, but the evidence against him was insufficient to prove fraud, and he was acquitted.

Spirit photography had flourished in the United States for some ten years before it became known in Britain. Samuel Guppy and his wife, Agnes Guppy-Volckman, the well-known Spiritualist mediums, endeavored without success to produce spirit photographs in private, and at length called for the assistance of Frederick A. Hudson, a professional photographer. A photograph of Guppy revealed a dim, draped "spirit" form.

Hudson speedily became popular, and his studio was as largely patronized as Mumler's had been. He found support from several outside observers. Thomas Slater, a London optician, made careful observations of his process without being able to detect any fraud. John Beattie, a professional photographer and something of a skeptic, made the following statement concerning Hudson's performances: "They were not made by double exposure, nor by figures projected in space in any way; they were not the result of mirrors; they were not produced by any machinery in the background, behind it, above it, or below it, nor by any contrivance connected with the bath, the camera, or the camera-slide." Trail Taylor, editor of the British Journal of Photography, said that "at no time during the preparation, exposure, or development of the pictures was Mr. Hudson within ten feet of the camera or darkroom. Appearances of an abnormal kind did certainly appear on several plates."

Such testimonies as these from the lips of skilled and disinterested witnesses would naturally seem to raise spirit photography to the level of a genuine psychic phenomenon. But a careful analysis of the evidence, such as is given by Eleanor Sidgwick in her article "On Spirit Photographs . . ." in the Proceedings (no. 8, 1891) of the Society for Psychical Research shows how even a trained investigator can be deceived by sleight of hand. And it is notable that Beattie himself afterward pointed out instances of double exposure in Hudson's productions.

In spite of this, Hudson continued to practice, and various Spiritualist magazines continued to lend him their support, with the notable exception of the Spiritualist, whose editor, himself a practical photographer, had aided John Beattie in denouncing spirit photography. Another enthusiastic Spiritualist, Enmore Jones, who at first claimed to recognize a dead daughter in one of the pictured "spirits," afterward admitted that he had been mistaken.

Those who had pinned their faith to the genuineness of the photographic manifestations were naturally unwilling to relinquish their belief in what they considered sure proof of the reality of the spirit world, and ingenious explanations were offered to cover the circumstance of the apparent double exposures. The spirit aura, they said, differed from the natural atmosphere in its refracting power, and it was not to be wondered at that objects were sometimes duplicated. And so Hudson retained a considerable measure of popularity.

In 1874 the Paris photographer Édouard Buguet crossed over to London and commenced the practice of spirit photography. Many of the purported spirits in his pictures were recognized by his clients, and even when he had been tried by the French government and had admitted deception there were those who refused to regard his confession as spontaneous, inclining to believe that he had been bribed by "Jesuits" to confess to fraud of which he was innocent.

Other spirit photographers were F. M. Parkes, a contemporary of Hudson, and Richard Bournell, who produced spirit pictures in London in later years.

The principal evidence in favor of spirit photography is undoubtedly the recognition of the spirits by their friends and relatives, but the unreliable nature of such a test has been seen time and again when a single "spirit" has been claimed by several persons as a near relative.

One of the most prominent defenders of the mediumistic photographers was W. Stainton Moses (who wrote under the pseudonym M. A. Oxon), who saw in them the best proof of the reality of Spiritualism. The same view was shared by Alfred Russel Wallace, who said (Arena, January 1891), "It is that which furnishes, perhaps, the most unassailable demonstration it is possible to obtain of the objective reality of spiritual forms."

Throughout the 1920s and 1930s the whole idea of spirit photography was called into question by psychical researchers. In 1933 Fred Barlow and W. Rampling Rose presented the results of their research to the Society for Psychical Research and indicated that they had been unable to locate any spirit photographs not produced fraudulently. Their opinion has remained the consensus opinion of parapsychologists in the decades since. No set of photographs have been offered in recent decades for serious consideration as genuine spirit images.

"Spirits" are not the only paranormal effects claimed in psychic photography. Many photographs have been produced that allegedly show "spirit writing," some on photographic plates not exposed in a camera (see Skotograph). In modern times, Ted Serios of Chicago has produced what appear to be "thought pictures" of distant scenes on Polaroid film. The Japanese investigator Tomobichi Fukurai used the term thoughtography to denote "paranormal" images on photographic materials.

Sources:

Barlow, Fred, and W. Rampling Rose. "Report on an Investigation into Spirit-Photography." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 41 (1933): 121-38.

Christopher, Milbourne. Mediums, Mystics, and the Occult. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1975.

Coates, James. Photographing the Invisible: Practical Studies in Supernormal Photography, Script, and Other Allied Phenomena. London: L. N. Fowler, 1911. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1973.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The Case for Spirit Photography. London: Hutchinson, 1922. Reprint, New York: George H. Doran, 1923.

Eisenbud, Jule. The World of Ted Serios: "Thoughtographic" Studies of an Extraordinary Mind. New York: William Morrow, 1967.

Fukurai, T. Clairvoyance and Thoughtography. London: Rider, 1931. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Glendinning, Andrew. The Veil Lifted: Modern Developments of Spirit Photography. London: Whittaker, 1894.

Houghton, Miss [Georgiana]. Chronicles of the Photographs of Spiritual Beings and Phenomena Invisible to the Material Eye. London: E. W. Allen, 1882.

Mumler, William H. Personal Experiences of William H. Mumler in Spirit Photography. Boston, 1875.

Patrick, C. V. The Case Against Spirit Photography. London: Kegan Paul, 1921.

Patterson, Tom. 100 Years of Spirit Photography. London: Regency Press, 1965.

Permutt, Cyril. Beyond the Spectrum: A Survey of Supernormal Photography. Cambridge, England: Patrick Stephens, 1983.

Price, Harry. Confessions of a Ghost Hunter. 1936. Reprint, Causeway Books, 1974.

Sidgwick, Mrs. Henry [Eleanor]. "On Spirit Photographs, a reply to Mr. R. A. Wallace." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 8 (1891): 268-89.

Stead, Estelle W. Faces of the Living Dead. London, 1925.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Wilmot, T. S. Twenty Photographs of the Risen Dead. Birmingham, England: Midland Educational, 1894.

“Spirit Teachings” (by “M. A. Oxon”)

The famous book written by W. Stainton Moses that records the teachings of the “Imperator” group of spirit controls.

The Spirit World (Periodical)

The first Spiritualist periodical in England, published by W. R. Hayden in May 1853. However, only one issue appeared. The title had earlier been used by La Roy Sunderland, who changed the name of his American periodical The Spiritual Philosophy to The Spirit World in 1851.

SpiritQuest

SpiritQuest is an educational program designed to introduce people to the spiritual experiences of Peruvian shamans and curanderos (healers) who live in the upper Amazonian area of Peru near the city of Iquitos. A defining part of the SpiritQuest experience is the opportunity to work with shamans who use the consciousness expanding substances in ayahuasca, an hallucinogenic substance made from the vine of the plant Banisteriopsis Caapi, which is boiled in water along with various other plants. These plants contain different substances identified as psychedelic drugs.

The SpiritQuest program was put together by a brother/sister team, Howard E. Lawler and Sanchi Reta Lawler. Howard is a former museum curator trained in biology. Reta is a transpersonal psychologist and student of Zen. Both have many years of association with shamans in both South America and Asia. The pair also heads El Tigre Journeys, a tourist company that facilitates travel to Peru and arranges for small groups to enter into the culture, meet the indigenous religious leaders, and see the sights in a way that is sensitive to the ecology of the region. Founded in 1997, El Tigre has been designed to help enhance and restore the natural resources of eastern Peru through various programs financially supported by tourism. Howard Lawler also heads a nonprofit organization, the International BioPark Foundation, as an environmental organization dedicated to preserving the natural world and promoting an understanding of humanity’s interdependent relationship with the natural order. The foundation is working with El Tigre on a number of projects including the development of a living Museum of Western Amazonia along the banks of the Río Momón outside Iquitos.

The SpiritQuest program is focused upon small groups (limited to eight people) who travel to Peru to participate in shamanic workshop retreats. The participants have in the Lawlers experienced guides, but are assured of experiencing shamanic initiations, including ceremonies with ayahuasca, much as they have been performed prior to the arrival of Europeans in the area. The Lawlers facilitate the preparation for the journey and are present to assist people through the cleansing, cathartic, and spiritually expansive moments that may go through, some of which may be temporarily uncomfortable.

SpiritQuest (and the associated organization) may be contacted through the Lawlers offices: Reta Lawler, P.O. Box 1704, Boulder, CO 80306-1704 and Howard Lawler, Calle Loreto #337, Iquitos, Peru. They may also be contacted through the International BioPark Foundation website at <http://www.biopark.org/>, which has subpages for both SpiritQuest and El Tigre Journeys.

Sources:

International BioPark Foundation. <http://www.biopark.org/>. June 11, 2000.

Spiritual Advisory Council (SAC)

A New Age organization. The Spiritual Advisory Council (SAC) was founded in 1974 in Chicago by Paul V. Johnson and Paul Ericsson, both former national leaders in the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship (now the International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship). The council adopted a New Age perspective and built an open fellowship of like-minded people who gathered regularly for national and regional conferences and in small study groups. In 1979 Johnson relocated to Florida and opened the New Age Centre for Alternative Realities in Orlando. Also in 1979, some people who had found their primary spiritual home within the council organized the Church of the Spiritual Advisory Council and saw the first ministers of the new church ordained.

SAC has no creed or dogma but generally operates within a New Age perspective. Channeling, both for spiritual contact with the other world and for healing energies, is accepted. SAC publishes the Outreach Newsletter. Address: 2933 W. State Rd. 434, Longwood, FL 32279.

The Spiritual Age (Periodical)

Early American periodical serving the cause of Spiritualism.

Spiritual Athenaeum

Briefly the headquarters of British Spiritualists in London in 1866. The post of residential secretary was offered to D. D. Home. The real intent behind the foundation’s offer was to help Home, who was at the time struggling with financial difficulties. When, owing to a change of fortune, Home resigned his post, the institution died a natural death. John Elliotson was among those who sat on the council.

Spiritual Churches

The spiritual church movement developed in the early twentieth century among African Americans who had responded to Spiritualism and its championing of the cause of universal brotherhood. In spite of its rhetoric, however, too often Spiritualists practiced the same racism so evident in non-Spiritualist circles. By World War I, black leaders began to form their own separate churches, some of which grew into substantial denominations. Among the first to emerge was Leafy Anderson (1887–1927), who in 1913 founded the Eternal Life Christian Spiritualist Association. She moved to New Orleans in 1920, by which time her association had more than ten congregations, and founded a congregation, the first of many spiritual churches in what would become one of the most important centers of the spiritual movement.

Through the 1920s a number of new spiritual churches emerged, beginning in 1922 when the black members of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches were pushed out and formed the national Colored Spiritualist Association of Churches. The next year, in Detroit, Willie Hurley founded the Universal Hagar’s Spiritual Church, and in 1925 William Frank Taylor and Leviticus L. Boswell founded the Metropolitan Spiritual Churches of Christ in Kansas City. Also founded in the mid-1920s was the Church of God in David (later the Spiritual Israel Church and Its Army).

The spiritual movement is quite diverse. It mixes Protestantism, Spiritualism, and various elements of popular folk religions. Individual congregations and denominations use different blends of these elements. Leafy Anderson represented the more conservative wing of the movement: she used the Bible and denounced the voodoo and popular magic she found among potential members. On the other hand, her student, Mother Catherine Seals, freely incorporated elements of “hoodoo,” the popular folk magic of the Southern black community, into her church’s rituals.

George Willie Hurley incorporated Masonic elements in the mystery school that became a part of every congregation in his Universal Hagar’s Spiritual Church. He also followed Father Divine’s example and proclaimed himself God. As Jesus was the God of the Picean Age, so he was the God of the coming Aquarian Age. Hurley was also a pioneer black nationalist and incorporated Ethiopianism into his teachings, identifying black Americans with their African heritage, especially with the land of Emperor Haile Selassie.

The spiritual movement has experienced upheavals as new leaders have appeared on the scene. For example, in 1942, the Metropolitan Spiritual Churches of Christ merged with the Divine Spiritual Churches of the Southwest, making it by far the largest spiritual denomination in the country. Shortly thereafter William Taylor died, and Thomas Watson, formerly the head of the Divine Spiritual Church of the Southwest, was elected to succeed him. However, by that time Clarence Cobbs had arisen as a charismatic leader of a church in Chicago and believed that the church was his to inherit. As a result of the struggle for control between Watson and Cobbs, the church split, with Cobbs inheriting the larger group.

During the last half of the twentieth century, spiritual churches have experienced ups and downs. Both Spiritualist and spiritual churches are more susceptible than most to volatile swings in support for prominent leaders who rise and pass from the scene. While several large denominations remain, many of the young talented mediums have formed independent churches or passed into the New Age movement.

Sources:

Baer, Hans A. The Black Spiritual Movement: A Religious Response to Racism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.

Jacobs, Claude F., and Andrew J. Kaslow. The Spiritual Churches of New Orleans: Origins, Beliefs, and Rituals of an African American Religion. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1991.

Murphy, Larry G., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward. Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.

The Spiritual Clarion (Periodical)

One of the first American periodicals serving American Spiritualism. It was published in Auburn, New York.

Spiritual Community Guide See New Consciousness Sourcebook

Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship See International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship

Spiritual Gazette

Monthly publication of the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain, including reports on psychic phenomena and events of interest to Spiritualists. Address: 33 Belgrave Sq., London, SW1X 8QL, England.

The Spiritual Herald (Journal)

A short-lived British journal of Swedenborgian Spiritualists published in London from February to July 1856.

Spiritual India and Kundalini (Magazine)

Former quarterly journal published in India of international spiritual and scientific consideration in the study of kundalini, the energy believed to reside in human beings related to sexual activity and higher consciousness. The journal is published by the Kundalini Research and Publication Trust, New Delhi. This journal centers round the experience and theories of Hindu teacher Pandit Gopi Krishna (1903–1984), an advocate of kundalini who has built a following in the West.

Spiritual Institution

Established by pioneer British Spiritualist James Burns at 15 Southampton Row, London, in conjunction with a library dealing with books on Spiritualism. The organization oversaw a lending library of several thousand volumes on Spiritualism, psychic phenomena, and related subjects, with a reading room and rooms for séances or experiments connected with Spiritualism.

The organization became a center for Spiritualism in London, providing a regular program of circles, séances, concerts, and other social events; it was an influential meeting place for Spiritualists. The organization has been disbanded.

Spiritualism

A social religious movement founded in the mid-nineteenth century in New York State. According to the definition adopted by the National Spiritualist Association of Churches, Spiritualism is

The Science, Philosophy and Religion of continuous life, based upon the demonstrated fact of communication, by means of mediumship, with those who live in the Spirit World. Spiritualism is a science because it investigates, analyses and classifies facts and manifestations, demonstrated from the spirit side of life. Spiritualism is a philosophy because it studies the laws of nature both on the seen and unseen sides of life and bases its conclusions upon present observed facts. It accepts statements of observed facts of past ages and conclusions drawn therefrom, when sustained by reason and by results of observed facts of the present day. Spiritualism is a religion because it strives to understand and to comply with the Physical, Mental and Spiritual Laws of Nature[,] which are the laws of God.

According to the British medium W. Stainton Moses, a Spiritualist is “one who has proven for himself, or has accepted on adequate evidence, the fact that death does not kill the spirit.”

Spiritualism centers upon two basic teachings: the continuity of personality after the transition of death, and the possibility of communication between those living on Earth and those who have made the transition to death. Spiritualism teaches that death is a new birth into a spiritual body, the counterpart of the physical, which is gifted with new powers. Spiritualists claim that their beliefs are based upon scientific proof and communication with the surviving personalities of deceased human beings by means of mediumship.

After death, the individual faces neither punishment nor rewards. Individuality, character, and memory survive and undergo no change. Continued progression in the new life rests upon individual fitness. The rapidity of progress is in proportion to the mental and moral faculties acquired in Earth life. Every spirit is left to discover the truth for itself. Evil passions or a sinful life may chain a spirit to the Earth, but the road of endless progress opens up for these as soon as they discover the light. Higher and higher spiritual spheres correspond to the state of progress. The gradation is apparently endless. Communion with higher intelligences appears to be available, but the spirits report no particular communion with the deity.

Origins of Spiritualism

Spiritualism in its modern form dates back no further than 1848 and the Fox sisters. Its practices can be traced to attempts at spirit communication reaching back to ancient times. Such attempts at communication with both the surviving consciousness of the dead and various orders of spiritual beings, both angelic and demonic, appear in the oldest extant records of cultures worldwide. It has only been in the last few centuries that strong doubts about the possibility of life after death and communication with a spiritual world have arisen.

Spiritualism emerged as a direct counter to such post-Enlightenment doubts, which by the nineteenth century had become the subject of popular debates and literature.

In his 1993 book, Madame Blavatsky's Baboon, writer Peter Washington noted that the true momentum for the movement was given full vent in America; but, in fact, its roots sprouted up from people and places all over the world. Washington noted that it seemed to have found a particular following in America for certain reasons. He also said that,

The seance offers a new version of holy communion, in which faith is replaced by evidence, blood and wine by manifested spirits. It was therefore especially popular among the Protestant sects to the east coast of the United States, deprived as they usually were of any sensuous fulfillment in their religion and susceptible to any sign of the workings of divine grace, however bizarre. It is no coincidence that Hydesville is in the middle of the notorious 'burned-over' district of New York State, so called because of the extraordinary number of religious fashions that swept through it in the early nineteenth century. Spiritualism blends easily with millenarian Christianity: though most of its messages were trivial, the expectation remained that these were merely a prelude to news of real import from the Other World. Having confirmed its own existence through the Fox girls, that world was now expected to come through with the facts about life after death, immortality, and even the future of mankind.

As Spiritualism formed, it looked to a number of individual occurrences of Spiritualist phenomena and previous movements to show its continuity with the past. For example, many famous outbreaks of an "epidemic" nature, such as that among the Tremblers of the Cevennes and the Convulsionaries of St. Médard, which to the beholders showed clear indications of demonic possession, had in their symptoms considerable analogy with modern Spiritualism. They were accompanied by spontaneous trance or ecstasy, lengthy discourses, and speaking in tongues, all of which are phenomena to be found in the séance room.

The fluency of speech noted in such outbreaks, especially of persons lacking any formal education, has been equaled, if not surpassed, by the outpourings of the unlearned medium under the influence of a "control." In such historical cases, the conditions were generally ascribed to either angelic or diabolic possession, and most frequently to the latter. Witches were supposed to converse with the Devil, and many aspects of witchcraft, notably the part played by persecuted young women and children, show a relationship to poltergeist disturbances. These were the connecting link between early forms of possession and modern Spiritualism. Cases in which children of morbid tendencies pretended to be the victims of a witch are to be found in many records of witchcraft.

However much it seemed otherwise, still it was the poltergeist who showed affinity to the "control" of the mediumistic circle. For at least the past few centuries, poltergeist disturbances have occurred from time to time. The mischievous spirit's favorite modes of manifesting itself have been similar to those adopted by spirit controls.

Both poltergeists and spirit controls require a "medium," an agent for the production of their phenomena. It is in the immediate presence of the medium that the phenomena generally make their appearance. Both also tend to display personality, even if of an infantile nature in the case of poltergeists. Intelligent communication has often been reported to have occurred by means of raps in phenomena attributed to poltergeists.

A related manifestation also believed to be caused by spirits occurred in the practice of animal magnetism, which was said to have originated with the alchemist Paracelsus, in favor with the old alchemists. An actual magnet was rarely used, but was regarded as a symbol of the magnetic philosophy. This belief rested on the idea of a force or fluid radiating from the heavenly bodies, human beings, and, indeed, from every substance, animate or inanimate, by means of which all things act upon one another.

While Paracelsus's students were engaged in formulating a magnetic philosophy, there were others. They included the seventeenth-century healer Valentine Greatrakes, who cured diseases. He claimed such magnetic power as a divine gift and did not connect it with the ideas of the alchemists. According to Spiritualist thought, these two phases of "magnetism" united and climaxed in the work of Franz Anton Mesmer, who published De planetarium influxu, in 1776, a treatise on the influence of the planets on the human body. His ideas were essentially those of the magnetic philosophers. His cures equaled those of Greatrakes; but he infused new life into both theory and practice and won for himself the recognition, if not of the learned societies, at least of the general public. He laid the groundwork for the discovery of the induced hypnotic trance. This has considerable significance in Spiritualism.

In 1784 a commission was appointed by the French government to consider magnetism as practiced by Mesmer and his followers. Unfortunately, its report only served to cast discredit on the practice and exclude it from scientific discussion. A detailed account of the trance utterances of a hypnotic subject was given in 1787 in the journals of the Swedish Exegetical and Philanthropic Society. Members of the society inclined to the doctrines of their countryman Emanuel Swedenborg, who was the first to identify the "spirits" as the souls of the deceased.

Until the third decade of the nineteenth century, the explanations of mesmerism concerned themselves almost entirely with a fluid or force emanating from the mesmerist—and even visible to the eye of a clairvoyant. In 1823, however, Alexandre Bertrand, a Parisian physician, published his Traité du Somnambulisme. In 1826 he published the treatise Du Magnetisme Animal en France, in which he set forth a relationship between ordinary sleepwalking, somnambulism associated with disease, and epidemic ecstasy and advanced the doctrine, now generally accepted, of suggestion.

Animal magnetism was by this time receiving a good deal of attention all over Europe. A second French commission appointed in 1825 presented its report in 1831, which, although of no great value, contained a unanimous testimony as to the authenticity of the phenomena. In Germany magnetism was also practiced to a considerable extent, but rationalist explanations of the associated phenomena found some acceptance. There was a class, however, more numerous in Germany than elsewhere, who inclined toward a Spiritualist explanation of mesmeric phenomena. Indeed, the belief in spirit communication had grown up beside magnetism from its conception, in opposition to the theory of a magnetic fluid.

In the earlier phases of "miraculous" healing, the cures were ascribed to the divine gift of the person conducting the session, or the operator, who expelled the evil spirits from the patient. In epidemic cases in religious communities, as well as in individual instances, the spirits were questioned both on personal matters and on abstract theological questions.

In Germany Justinus Kerner experimented with Frederica Hauffe, "the Seeress of Prevorst," in whose presence physical manifestations took place and who described the condition of the soul after death and the constitution of man—the physical body, the soul, the spirit, and the nervengeist, an ethereal body that clothes the soul after death—theories afterward elaborated by Spiritualists. Other German investigators, such as J. H. Jung (Jung-Stilling), C. Römer, and Heinrich Werner, recorded the phenomenon of clairvoyance in their somnambules. In 1845 Baron Karl von Reichenbach published research he claimed demonstrated the existence of an emanation, which he called od or odyllic force, radiating from every substance. This effluence allegedly could be seen by clairvoyants and had definite colors and produced a sensation of heat or cold.

Animal magnetism received little attention in England until the third decade of the nineteenth century. In 1828, Richard Chevinix, an Irishman, gave mesmeric demonstrations. John Elliotson, of University College Hospital, London, practiced mesmerism with the O'Key sisters, who were somnambules, and although he first believed in the magnetic fluid, he afterward became a Spiritualist. In 1843 two journals dealing with the subject—the Zoist and the Phreno-magnet—were founded. Most of the English mesmerists of the time preferred the magnetist explanation of the phenomena to the notion of spirit agency. Within the Spiritualist community, the so-called “magnetic” phenomena were largely attributed to the agency of the spirits of the deceased.

Spiritualism as a Religious Movement

In responding to the challenge of Enlightenment thinking, Spiritualism became the first of the new “scientific” religions. Adherents talked little of faith. Rather, they asserted that they could prove Spiritualism’s central doctrine of survival of death through facts, instead of relying on traditions and the revelations of ancient times. They saw Spiritualism as a progressive and evolutionary faith reconciling religion with contemporary science. “Spiritualism,” wrote Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, “is a religion for those who find themselves outside all religions; while on the contrary it greatly strengthens the faith of those who already possess religious beliefs.”

Not long after Spiritualism swept America, it began to take over Europe. According to Washington, “In the wake of failing political revolutions in 1848—the very year of the Hydesville phenomena—it rapidly became part of an ‘alternative’ synthesis which included vegetarianism, feminism, dress reform, homoeopathy and every variety of social and religious dissent.” He noted that when Harriet Beecher Stowe, famed American abolitionist, visited Europe in 1853, the seance was “all the rage.”

Early Spiritualists also believed their religion restored primitive Christianity, pointing to inscriptions in the Roman catacombs in which the early Christians spoke of the dead as though they were still living. According to Saint Augustine, in De cura pro Mortuis, “The spirits of the dead can be sent to the living and can unveil to them the future which they themselves have learned from other spirits or from angels, or by divine revelation.” Not surprisingly, much of the movement’s motivation still rested in anti-Catholicism—not so different from the antagonism many Protestant sects harbored without Spiritualism.

Spiritualists do not believe in an afterlife of unchangeable bliss or eternal damnation. In their perspective, there is no hell with brimstone and flames of fire as some Christians teach. In like measure they deny the existence of devils, a final judgment, and the vicarious atonement. Christ was a great teacher who descended to set an example. “It is our task to do for Christianity what Jesus did for Judaism,” said a message received by W. Stainton Moses from the spirits who allegedly spoke through his automatic writing. Spiritualists also deny the resurrection of the physical body, as did the hieracites, a sect that flourished in the fourth century: they maintain that it is the soul alone that resurrected.

Spiritualism admits all the truths of morality and religion of all other sects. The moral stance is illustrated in the role of mediums. Spiritualists tend to maintain that those mediums who hold séances and become the direct mouthpieces of the spirits are only supereminently endowed with a faculty common to all humanity—that all men and woman are mediums to some degree, and that all inspiration, whether good or bad, comes from the spirits.

It is in connection with this idea of the universality of mediumship that the effect of Spiritualism on the morals and daily life of its adherents is most clearly seen. The spirits are naturally attracted to those mediums whose qualities resemble their own. Enlightened spirits from the highest spheres seek “high-souled” and earnest mediums through which to express themselves. Mediums who use their divine gifts for ignoble ends are sought by the lowest and wickedest human spirits, or by elementals, who do not even reach the human standard of goodness. Indeed, it is claimed that the lower spirits communicate with the living much more readily than do the higher, by reason of a certain gross or material quality that binds them to Earth. As with the full-fledged medium, so with the normal individual; if one is to ensure that the source of inspiration be a high one, one must live in such a way that only the best spirits will control.

In the United States, Spiritualists embraced many socialist ideals, and many resided in the socialist communities of the nineteenth century. The loose, nondogmatic approach also allowed some Spiritualists to embrace a variety of different ideals, such as free love. In England, where habit and tradition were more settled, Spiritualists emphasized its compatibility with Christianity and projected an image of affording a fuller revelation of the Christian religion. In France, Allan Kardec’s doctrine of reincarnation blended with the doctrines of Spiritualism to produce Spiritism, a form of Spiritualism highly alienated from Christianity.

These varied forms of Spiritualism are held together by two central beliefs: that the soul continues after “the great dissolution” (death of the body) and continually progresses and that the freed spirit can communicate with living human beings. The continuity of life after death is, of course, one of Spiritualism’s most important tenets. It is not a distinctive one, since most of the world’s creeds and religions also affirm such a belief. But Spiritualist ideas concerning the nature of the life of the freed soul are unique.

Spiritualists believe that the soul, or spirit, is composed of a sort of attenuated matter inhabiting the body and resembling it in form. On the death of the body the soul withdraws itself, without undergoing any direct change, and for a period remains on the “Earth plane.” But the keynote of the spirit world is progress, so after a time the spirit proceeds to the lowest “discarnate plane.” From that plane they go on to higher and higher planes, gradually evolving into a purer and nobler type. At length it reaches the sphere of pure spirit.

From the comments of mediums speaking in trance, a picture of the spirit domain has been constructed by Spiritualists. It is thought to be a somewhat attenuated version of earthly life, conducted in a highly rarified atmosphere. Automatic drawings, purporting to depict spirit scenes, afford a description no less flattering than that gleaned from mediums speaking in trance, although many such drawings appear imaginative rather than factual. From their exalted spheres the spirits are said to be cognizant of the doings of their fellow individuals still on Earth.

The other central belief of Spiritualism is that the spirits communicate with the living—primarily through the agency of mediums—offering their aid and counsel. They can produce in the physical world certain phenomena that transcend known physical laws. Most Spiritualists, in seeking proof of the reality of the creed, have been content with what is described as “subjective” phenomena, including such as trance speaking, automatic writing, clairvoyance.

Spiritualism was enlivened by more or less sensational physical manifestations through an entire period of its history. These found great favor among both believers and psychical researchers. Their success seemed to promise irrefutable proof of the extraordinary nature of Spiritualist phenomena, and they were relatively easy to investigate. They were so intimately connected with fraud unfortunately, that any hope for verifying the phenomena disappeared in the first half of the twentieth century.

Manifestation of phenomena therefore occupies a central place in Spiritualism, and the question of the genuineness of claimed phenomena remains of great importance. It is true, of course, that paranormal phenomena are also central to the development of other great religions that have claimed miracles in support of doctrine. Spiritualists point to the Judaeo-Christian Holy Bible as a book full of accounts of “miraculous” phenomena not essentially different from those demonstrated by modern mediums—inspired trance addresses, paranormal healing, apparitions, and prophetic statements. The primary difference is that traditional religions assume a perspective of awe in the presence of the occasional miraculous event, whereas Spiritualists view such events as constant aspects of a mundane world.

The Literature of Spiritualism

There is vast literature on Spiritualism. Many important works from the nineteenth century are long out of print. This literature ranges from mediumistic communications of varied value, including spirit revelations from automatic writing, trance sermons, and séances, to personal experiences of investigators and theories of psychical researchers, to histories of Spiritualism and attacks on it.

Books that chart the transition from mesmerism and animal magnetism to Spiritualism are valuable for the information and opinions of the time. Emma Hardinge Britten's Nineteenth Century Miracles (1884) and Modern American Spiritualism (1869) are full of detailed, hard-to-find information on the events of the period but are written from the viewpoint of a firm believer and worker in the field and are sometimes marred by inaccurate quotations. Alphonse Cahagnet's The Celestial Telegraph (2 vols., 1851) and Robert Hare's Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestations (1856) are also of special period interest.

Autobiographies of mediums are fascinating and well worth studying for their firsthand subjective viewpoint. A classic work of this kind is D. D. Home's Incidents in My Life (1863). Other popular works of this kind are Estelle Roberts' Fifty Years a Medium (1969) and Doris Stokes's Voices in My Ear (1980).

Various histories of Spiritualism are available, but there is no single satisfactory work. It is advisable to study different histories, bearing in mind the commitment of their writers. Cesar de Vesme's History of Experimental Spiritualism (2 vols., 1931) is a comprehensive survey of Spiritualist type phenomena in many countries from primitive times on. William Howitt's The History of the Supernatural (1863) is useful, if simplistic, in tracing the antecedents of Spiritualism in past ages. E. W. Capron's Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticism, Its Consistencies and Contradictions (1855) has special interest as an account of the movement in its early years.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's History of Spiritualism (2 vols., 1926) is an important review of the background and history of the movement, but non-critical in its presentation. Frank Podmore's Modern Spiritualism (2 vols., 1902) is a skeptical review, valuable for its detailed information of early mediumship. J. Arthur Hill's Spiritualism: Its History, Phenomena and Doctrine (1918) is useful but fragmentary. A. Campbell Holms's The Facts of Psychic Science and Philosophy (1925) is a useful tabulation of the phenomena of Spiritualism but non-critical in treatment.

In the decades since Spiritualism celebrated its centennial in 1948, a variety of scholars, primarily sociologists and historians, have taken a look at the movement and provided valuable additions to the literature. Foremost is J. Stillson Judah's The History and Philosophy of the Metaphysical Movements in America (1967), which discusses Spiritualism in the larger context of the movement, from the doctrines of Emanuel Swedenborg to Spiritualism and then to Theosophy. An excellent modern survey of nineteenth-century Spiritualism in the United States is provided in Slater Brown's The Heyday of Spiritualism (1970); and British Spiritualism is covered in Geoffrey K. Nelson's Spiritualism and Society (1969). Hans Bear supplies a most valuable discussion of the very neglected spiritual churches, the movement of Spiritualism in the African American community. Lamar Keene, a former Spiritualist, documents the continuance of fake materialization séances in some Spiritualist churches. Keene's volume joins a long list of older but still valuable literature, such as John W. Truesdell's The Bottom Facts Concerning the Science of Spiritualism (1884); Julien J. Proskauer's Spook Crooks! Exposing the Secrets of the Prophet-eers Who Conduct Our Wickedest Industry (1932); Harry Houdini's A Magician Among the Spirits (1924); and the anonymous Revelations of a Spirit Medium (1891; reissued by Harry Price and Eric J. Dingwall).

Sources:

Ancient Wisdom and Secret Sects, “Mysteries of the Unknown.” Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1996.

Barbanell, Maurice. Spiritualism Today. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1969.

Barrett, Sir William F. On the Threshold of the Unseen: An Examination of the Phenomena of Spiritualism and of the Evidence for Survival After Death. London: Kegan Paul; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1917.

Bayless, Raymond. Voices From Beyond. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1975.

Beard, Paul. Survival of Death: For and Against. London: Psychic Press, 1972.

Berger, Arthur S., J.D.; and Berger, Joyce, M.A. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Brandon, Ruth. The Spiritualists: The Passion for the Occult in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1983.

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Modern American Spiritualism: A Twenty Years' Record of the Communion Between Earth and the World of Spirits. New York, 1870. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

———. Nineteenth Century Miracles; or, Spirits and Their Works in Every Country of the Earth. London and Manchester: John Heywood, 1884. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Capron, E. W. Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticisms, Its Consistencies and Contradictions. Boston, 1855. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Carrington, Hereward. The Story of Psychic Science. London: Rider, 1930.

Crookall, Robert. The Supreme Adventure: Analyses of Psychic Communications. UK: J. Clarke for Churches' Fellowship for Psychological Study, 1961.

Dearden, Harold. Devilish But True: The Doctor Looks at Spiritualism. London: Hutchinson, 1936. Reprint, Boston: Rowan & Littlefield, 1975.

Doyle, Arthur Conan. The History of Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Cassell; York: George H. Doran, 1926. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1961.

Findlay, Arthur. On the Edge of the Etheric; or, Survival After Death Scientifically Explained. London: Psychic Press, 1931. Reprint, Corgi, 1971.

Garrett, Eileen J. My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. London: Rider, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Gauld, Alan. The Founders of Psychological Research. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1968. Reprint, New York: Schocken Books, 1973.

———. Mediumship and Survival: A Century of Investigations. London: Heinemann, 1982.

Gregory, William. Animal Magnetism; or, Mesmerism and Its Phenomena. 2d rev. ed. London: Nichols, 1877. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Hare, Robert. Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestations. New York, 1855.

Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against an After Life. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1959.

Haynes, Renee. The Society for Psychical Research, 1882–1982: A History. London: Macdonald, 1982.

Hill, J. Arthur. Spiritualism: Its History, Phenomena and Doctrine. London: Cassell; New York: George H. Doran, 1918.

Home, Daniel Dunglas. Incidents in My Life. London: Longmans, Green, 1863. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Row, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Jackson, Herbert G., Jr. The Spirit Rappers. New York: Doubleday, 1972.

Jacobson, Nils Olof. Life Without Death? On Parapsychology, Mysticism, and the Question of Survival. New York: Delacorte Press, 1973. Reprint, London: Turnstone Books; New York: Dell, 1974.

Kerr, Howard. Mediums and Spirit-Rappers and Roaring Radicals. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1972.

Lewis, James R. Encyclopedia of Afterlife Beliefs and Phenomena. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1995.

Lodge, Sir Oliver. Raymond, or Life and Death; with Examples of the Evidence for Survival of Memory and Affection After Death. London: Methuen; New York: George H. Doran, 1916.

Maryatt, Florence. There Is No Death. London, 1892. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

McCabe, Joseph. Spiritualism: A Popular History from 1847. London: Fisher Unwin, 1920.

McHargue, Georgess. Facts, Frauds, and Phantasms: A Survey of the Spiritualist Movement. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

Meek, George W., and Bertha Harris. From Séance to Science. London: Regency Press, 1973.

Mulholland, John. Beware Familiar Spirits. London: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1938. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Murchison, Carl, ed. The Case For and Against Psychical Belief. Worcester, Mass., 1927. Reprint, Arno Press, 1975.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975. Abr. ed. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Olcott, H. S. People From the Other World. American Publishing, 1875. Reprint, Rutland, Vt.: Charles W. Tuttle, 1972.

Osty, Eugene. Supernormal Faculties in Man. London: Methuen, 1923.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism: A History and a Criticism. 2 vols. London, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the 19th Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

———. The Newer Spiritualism. London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1910. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Price, Harry. Fifty Years of Psychical Research: A Critical Survey. London: Longmans, Green, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Price, Harry, and E. J. Dingwall, eds. Revelations of a Spirit Medium. London: Kegan Paul; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1922.

Proskauer, Julien J. Spook Crooks! Exposing the Secrets of the Prophet-eers Who Conduct Our Wickedest Industry. New York: A. L. Burt, 1932. Reprint, Ann Arbor, Mich.: Gryphon Books, 1971.

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research. London and New York, 1923. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Sargent, Epes. The Scientific Basis of Spiritualism. Boston: Colby & Rich, 1880.

Tabori, Paul. Companions of the Unseen. London: H. A. Humphrey, 1968.

———. Pioneers of the Unseen. London: Souvenir Press, 1972.

Thomas, John F. Beyond Normal Cognition: An Evaluative and Methodological Study of the Mental Content of Certain Trance Phenomena. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1973. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. Spirit Summonings, "Mysteries of the Unknown." Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1996.

Truesdell, John W. The Bottom Facts Concerning the Science of Spiritualism. New York: G. W. Carlton, 1883.

Wallace, Alfred Russel. On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism. London, 1875. Rev. ed. New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Washington, Peter. Madame Blavatsky's Baboon: A History of the Mystics, Mediums, and Misfits Who Brought Spiritualism to America. New York: Schocken

———. Madame Blavatsky's Baboon: A History of the Mystics, Mediums, and Misfits Who Brought Spiritualism to America. New York: Schocken

Spiritualism—France

Animal magnetism, the phenomenon so important and central to Spiritualism, manifested itself in France at a comparatively early period in the movement. From correspondence between J. P. F. Deleuze and G. P. Billot from the year 1829, it appears that phantom forms and the phenomenon of apports were well known in this early age. Deleuze more frankly admitted that his experience was more limited.

Almost the full range of the phenomena of Spiritualism are found in Baron Du Potet's Journal du Magnétisme, which records his investigations between 1836 and 1848. His magnetized subjects excelled in clairvoyance, trance speaking, healing, dermography, levitation, fire immunity, telekinesis, apports, xenoglossis, prophecy, crystal gazing, materializations, and descriptions of scenes in the spirit world.

The best early séance records come from Louis-Alphonse Cahagnet, the author of Arcanes de la vie future dévoilés (1848–54), translated as The Celestial Telegraph (1850). He received many evidential communications from departed spirits through his somnambule, Adèle Maginot.

Table turning was introduced into France by Baron Ludwig von Guldenstubbe and the Compte d'Ourches in 1850 and became an epidemic, as in England. Soon other phenomena followed. The famous direct scripts of Guldenstubbe were obtained in 1856.

In that same year Allan Kardec's book Le Livre des Esprits was published, and developments took a radically different route from that in the United States and England. Kardec founded a school of thought called Spiritism that was dominated by the idea of a series of compulsory reincarnations. This was the opposing school to Spiritualism, which followed the American and English ideas. Spiritualism was represented in France by Z. J. Piérart and La Revue Spiritualiste, founded in 1858; Spiritism was championed by Kardec's La Revue Spirite, founded in the same year.

Kardec's school eventually prevailed. Piérart, after years of bitter controversy, retired to the country. By 1864 there were ten periodicals published in France: three in Paris, the two already mentioned and L'Avenir; four in Bordeaux, which, in 1865, were merged into L'Union Spirite Bordelaise; La Médiun Evangélique, of Toulouse; L'Echo d'Outre Tombe, of Marseilles; and La Vérité of Lyons. With the exception of La Revue Spiritualiste all represented the school of Kardec.

Kardec and his followers discouraged physical phenomena. Because of that the stimulus for experimental investigators was largely provided by the visits of D. D. Home, the Davenport brothers, Henry Slade, William Eglinton, Frank Herne, Charles Williams, Elizabeth d'Esperance, Florence Cook, Lottie Fowler, and other famous mediums.

Joseph Maxwell, Camille Flammarion, Eugene Rochas, Paul Joire, Charles Richet, Emile Boirac, Gustav Geley, and Eugén Osty represented psychical research. Gabriel Delanne founded the Revue scientifique et morale du spiritisme. The first attempt at organized psychical research was La Société de Psychologie Physiologique and its journal, La Revue des Sciences Psychiques.

In 1890 the Annales des Sciences Psychiques was founded. It was replaced in 1920 by La Revue Métapsychique, the official organ of the Institut Métapsychique. In 1904 the Institut Général Psychologique was established in Paris.

The real benefactor of Spiritism and psychical research arrived during the war in the person of Jean Meyer, a rich industrialist. He founded La Maison des Spirits for spiritistic propaganda and the Institut Métapsychique for psychical research. In 1918 the institute was recognized as a public utility. Meyer endowed it with a portion of his fortune. The work it has carried on in experimentation and in demonstration of supernormal phenomena before invited scientists has been of great importance for psychical research in France.

In 1987, due to the general dissatisfaction with the nature of the research there, the Organisation pour la Recherche en Psychotronic was established. Such research has had a difficult time in France due to the university system's refusal of official recognition. Much of the work done there at the end of the twentieth century was done "underground." Prof. Remy Chauvin has been one such researcher forced to take his work out of the mainstream due to the overly critical educational establishment.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Cahagnet, Alphonse. Arcanes de la vie future dévoilés. 3 vols. 1848–54. Translated as The Celestial Telegraph; or, Secrets of Life to Come Revealed Through Magnetism. 2 vols. London, [1850]. Reprint, New York, 1851.

Kardec, Allan. Le Ciel et L'Enfer ou la justice divine selon le Spiritisme. 1865. Translated as Heaven and Hell, or The Divine Justice Vindicated in the Plurality of Existences. N.p., 1878.

———. L'Évangile selon le Spiritisme. 1864. Translated as The Gospel According to Spiritism. London: Headquarters Publishing, 1887.

———. Le Livre des Esprits. Translated as The Spirits' Book by Anna Blackwell. Reprint, São Paulo: Livraria Allan Kardec Editora, 1972.

———. Le Livre des Médioms. Translated as The Book of Mediums by Emma E. Wood. Reprint, New York: Samuel Weiser, 1970.

Osty, Eugene. Supernormal Faculties in Man. London: Methuen, 1923.

Richet, Charles. Thirty Years of Psychical Research. New York: Macmillan, 1923.

Spiritualism—Germany

In Germany Spiritualism developed very slowly, despite a rather early history of scattered individuals who conducted paranormal investigations back in the 1830s, most notably Justinus Kerner. Philosopher I. H. von Fichte believed in Spiritualism; Gustav Fechner, the founder of psychophysiology, admitted belief in personal immortality; and Edward von Hartmann, author of The Philosophy of the Unconscious (1869), desired to give Spiritualist phenomena a definite place in philosophy. Carl Du Prel, author of The Philosophy of Mysticism (2 vols., 1889) delved into the subconscious for explanation and founded the first Spiritualist monthly, The Sphinx.

Most of the Spiritualist activity was the work of a foreigner, Alexander Aksakof, imperial councilor of Russia, who, owing to Russian censorship, concentrated his work in Germany. In 1874 he began publishing Psychische Studien, which continued for many years. Its title was changed in 1926 to Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie. Spiritualistische Blätter was started in 1883.

A great impetus was given to Spiritualism by the visit of the well-known medium Henry Slade in 1877. The conversion of Johann C. E. Zöllner caused a sensation and was the subject of strong language on the part of other scientists. The visits of such mediums as William Eglinton, Elizabeth d'Esperance, Annie Fairlamb, and others kept the interest alive.

Psychical Research

Modern psychical research is best represented by Baron von Schrenck-Notzing. His book on the materialization phenomena of Eva C., Materializations-Phaenomene (Phenomena of Materialization, 1914), aroused heated scientific controversy. With this work and also the investigation of the mediumship of Willi Schneider, he convinced a hundred well-known scientists of the reality of telekinesis phenomena and of the existence of the elusive substance called ectoplasm. Other important thinkers and researchers included Hans Driesch, Konstantin Oesterreich, and Rudolf Tischner.

Prewar Germany saw the founding of a society for psychical research and also a medical society for psychical research: the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Wissenschaftliches Okkultismus and the Deutscher Spiritisten Verein. Periodicals included Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie, Zeitschrift für Metapsychische Forschung, Zeitschrift für Psychisch Forschung, Zeitschrift für Seelenleben, Psyche und die übersinnliche Welt.

Crucial to the history of post-World War I Germany, were the movements of Rudolf Steiner, founder of the Anthroposophical Society, and whose philosophy continues to be known today in the United States for the background of the Waldorf Schools. When Steiner left the Theosophists, deeming it impossible to create a spiritual science based in Eastern mysticism, he inadvertently became a favorite of Hitler's Reich. Even while living in Switzerland during World War II and attempting to maintain neutrality, his Anthroposophy became identified with German war aims. His first evolution might have led the Nazis to believe he was on their side. As Peter Washington noted, in his 1993 book, Madame Blavatsky's Baboon, "At first, Steiner shared a common view that something pure and noble might arise out of the conflict between nations; but as the apparently unstoppable carnage became ever more horrifying he modified his instinctive nationalism in favour of a broader perspective. After the war he was ready to support the League of Nations." Yet all through the rise of the Aryan model for purity and perfection, even some of the artistic renderings associated with many of the Christian-based spiritual movements, portrayed Christ, for example, as being more Aryan in features than Jewish. Steiner and his group, Washington commented, were only too willing to make Jesus an honorary German, denying his semitic origins completely, and thus lending credence to the mounting racial tensions.

Since World War II, there has been considerable German activity in the field of parapsychological research with the Lehrstuhl für Psychologie und Grenzgebiete de Psychologie at Freiburg University and the independent Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene, directed by Hans Bender. A new direction to Spiritualist beliefs in survival was stimulated by the experiments in electronic voice phenomena (Raudive voices) of Friedrich Jürgenson, who cooperated with the Freiburg Institute.

Despite many efforts, Germany's pursuit of paranormal studies and parapsychology remained rather bleak at the turn of the twenty-first century. Individual research under such people as Gerd H. Hovelmann, Eberhard Bauer, Walter von Lucadou, Klaus Kornwachs, Ulrich Timm, and Hans D. Betz, while remarkable, has not served to form a collective movement for research. All but one effort to form parapsychological associations failed. The research center, Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie und Psychohygiene, (Institute for Border Areas of Psychology and Mental Hygiene) and the organization, Wissenschaftliche Gesellschaft zur Förderung der Parapsychologie, (Scientific Society for the Advancement of Parapsychology) are the only two avenues for study currently in Germany.

Sources:

Bander, Peter. Voices from the Tapes. New York: Drake, 1973.

Bender, Hans. Unser sechster Sinn. Stuttgart: Wilhelm Goldmann Verlag, 1982.

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Schrenck-Notzing, A. von. Materialisations-Phaenomene (Phenomena of Materialization). Munich: Ernst Reinhardt, 1914.

Washington, Peter. Madame Blavatsky's Baboon: A History of the Mystics, Mediums, and Misfits Who Brought Spiritualism to America. New York: Schocken Books, 1993.

Spiritualism—Great Britain

Spiritualism was introduced from the United States to England within a few years of its emergence in New York. The transition from mesmerism into Spiritualism was effected in Britain under the impetus of visiting American mediums, the first being Maria B. Hayden, who arrived in 1852. Her way had been prepared by the publication the previous year of William Gregory's book Animal Magnetism, which contains records of supernatural occurrences, and by the accounts published from time to time in the mesmerist journal Zoist.

Table turning soon became epidemic in Britain, and society invitations, it is said, were extended to five o'clock tea and table turning. An early controversy arose when prominent scientist Michael Faraday suggested that the table movements were caused by unconscious muscular action. Another theory suggested they resulted from "unconscious cerebration."

Hayden herself was treated with derision by the press and returned to the United States in 1853. Yet, besides acting as forerunner for the great medium D. D. Home, she registered important conquests: Robert Owen, the veteran socialist; Robert Chambers, the publisher; and Agustus de Morgan, the famous mathematician. Sir Charles Isham and John Ashburner mostly owed their conversion to a belief in survival and communication with the dead to her limited powers. One Mrs. Roberts, a second American medium, and later Pascal B. Randolph and J. R. M. Squire left comparatively slight impressions.

Without Home, Spiritualism in England would probably have made but little further headway. He was received in the highest society and was visited by famous people of the day. Some of them (including novelist William Thackeray, Anthony Trollope, Robert Bell, Bulwer Lytton, and Lord Brougham) were said to have been deeply impressed but kept quiet for fear of public ridicule. Some figured in press sensations when they vented their anger for having become associated with Spiritualism before the public (e.g., Sir David Brewster and Robert Browning). Others, including William Howitt; J. Garth Wilkinson; Lord Adare, the earl of Dunraven; the Master of Lindsay, Nassau Senior; Cromwell Varley; and Alfred Russel Wallace, braved the scorn of the public.

Home first visited England in 1855 at age 23, having acted as a medium for some four years. He made an impression before returning to America in 1856. During Home's tour in 1855, London solicitor John Rymer and his wife, gathered friends at their home in the suburb of Ealing to experience the medium's gifts. Famed poets Elizabeth Barrett Browning, a devotee of the spiritualism movement, and her husband, Robert Browning, who disdained spiritualism, managed to receive an invitation to this exclusive gathering. In 1859 medium Thomas Lake Harris visited England. As early as 1854, the trance utterances of a medium named "Annie" were recorded by a circle of Swedenborgians presided over by Elihu Rich. The first British professional medium, Mary Marshall, began to offer séances, but less successfully than D. D. Home and his American colleagues. British Spiritualists, however, did not seek publicity, but practiced for the most part anonymously.

The phenomena at these séances resembled those in America—playing of instruments by unknown means, materialization of hands, table-turning, and so on, but on a less sensational scale. It was not so much these physical manifestations that inspired early British Spiritualists as it was automatic writing and automatic speaking. Although at first rare, it soon became a feature of séances.

In 1860 a new Spiritualist era commenced and the whole subject came into greater prominence. This enhanced attention was caused by an increase in the number of British mediums and the emigration to Britain of many American mediums, including the stage performers the Davenport brothers, who did not claim to be Spiritualists but were hailed as such.

Kate Fox of the original Fox Sisters who caused the whole movement to rise, married and settled in England as Mrs. Jencken. It is said that her child became a writing medium. Thomas Lake Harris, Emma Hardinge Britten, and Cora L. V. Richmond were remembered for inspirational addresses; Charles H. Foster for rather dubious pellet-reading and skin-writing phenomena (see dermography); the Davenport Brothers for noisy telekinetic demonstrations; Lottie Fowler for trance communications and predictions; and Henry Slade for slate-writing demonstrations.

British mediums were rather slow to arise. Mary Marshall was, for a long time, the only professional medium. In October 1867 the journal Human Nature knew of only one more, W. Wallace. The number of private mediums, however, was considerable. Mrs. Thomas Everitt was considered the most powerful. Edward Childs was also credited with strong powers.

William Howitt, William Wilkinson, and Mrs. Newton Crossland developed as automatists (see automatism). Agnes Nichols (later Agnes Guppy-Volckman) presented mysterious apport phenomena and the first materializations in England. The partners Frank Herne and Charles Williams produced impressive if suspect phenomena.

Frederick A. Hudson introduced spirit photography to London, and others followed in his footsteps. Marvelous things were reported to occur in the séances of Florence Cook, W. Stainton Moses, William Eglinton, Annie Eva Fay, F. W. Monck, Mary Showers, Arthur Colman, Elizabeth d'Esperance, C. E. Wood, Annie Fairlamb, Cecil Husk, and David Duguid.

Organizational Efforts

Because British mediums were slow to arise, Spiritualism as a movement was delayed until comparatively late. The Charing Cross Spirit Circle was the first experimental organization. In July 1857 it was superseded by the London Spiritualistic Union, a year later renamed the London Spiritualist Union, and in 1865 the Association of Progressive Spiritualists in Great Britain was formed. The Spiritual Athenaeum of 1866 was a temporary institution, established mainly to offer D. D. Home a paid position. The first really representative body, the British National Association of Spiritualists, was not born until 1873. In 1882 it was renamed the Central Association of Spiritualists and in 1884 the London Spiritualist Alliance.

The tardiness in organization was also manifested in the field of Spiritualist periodicals. The Spirit World, published by W. R. Hayden during his wife's visit in May 1853, was issued only once. Robert Owen's The New Existence of Man Upon the Earth, published in 1854, was spiritual but not Spiritualist. In April 1855 the Yorkshire Spiritual Telegraph was established by D. W. Weatherhead in Keighley, the chief provincial center of British Spiritualism. In 1857 it was renamed the British Spiritual Telegraph but was discontinued the next year.

Toward the end of 1860 The Spiritual Magazine was founded by William Wilkinson and became the leading organ. It ran until 1875. Thomas Shorter and William Wilkinson were the editors for the greater part of its existence, and William Howitt was the chief contributor.

The Spiritual Times ran from 1864 to 1866. In 1867 James Burns founded Human Nature, a monthly that ran until 1877, and in 1869 he brought out a weekly, The Medium, which absorbed the provincial Daybreak, founded in 1867, and was continued under the title The Medium and Daybreak until 1895.

In 1869 W. H. Harrison's paper The Spiritualist Newspaper entered the field. Under the later abbreviated title The Spiritualist, held its own until 1881. The Christian Spiritualist began its month-long run in 1871. The Pioneer of Progress lasted for ten months, appearing weekly from January 1874. In 1878 Spiritual Notes was founded and ran until 1881, the year in which Light appeared.

Light is the oldest British Spiritualist journal. It was founded by Dawson Rogers and W. Stainton Moses. Later editors included E. W. Wallis and David Gow. It was the official organ of the London Spiritualist Alliance but is now published quarterly by the College of Psychic Studies, London.

The Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research and the society's Journal had their inception in 1882. The Two Worlds began publication in 1888 at Manchester. It is now the second-oldest Spiritualist journal in Britain. (Address: Headquarters Publishing Co., 5 Alexandria Rd., West Ealing, London W13 ONP.)

Emma Hardinge Britten's Unseen Universe ran from 1892 to 1893; W. T. Stead's Borderland ran from 1893 to 1897; and, J. J. Morse's The Spiritual Review was published from 1900 to 1902. The Spiritual Quarterly Magazine was started by the Two Worlds Publishing Company in October 1902. An English edition of the Annales des Sciences Psychiques was published between 1905 and 1910 under the title Annals of Psychic Science.

In addition to Light and Two Worlds, the most important of surviving Spiritualist journals is Psychic News, founded by Maurice Barbanell in 1932 and now published at 2 Tavistock Chambers, Bloomsbury Way, London, WC1A 1LY.

The Rise of Psychical Research

Although Spiritualism arose in the United States, the effort to investigate it started in England. There was plenty to investigate. Mrs. De Morgan, Lord Adare, and Alfred Russel Wallace published the first important books. In 1869 the London Dialectical Society delegated a committee to investigate. After its favorable report, which brought the testimonies of many important people before the public, Sir William Crookes stepped to the fore and announced an investigation. His findings, which were published in 1871, and later in 1874, simply stupefied the contemporary savants.

E. W. Cox founded the Psychological Society of Great Britain in 1875; the British National Association of Spiritualists appointed a research committee in 1878; and the year 1882 witnessed a historic event, the foundation of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR).

The development of Spiritualism in Britain has been closely associated with the work of the SPR; but it has often been an uneasy relationship. Indeed, many early Spiritualists claimed that the society's initials really meant "Suppression of Psychical Research." From time to time the skepticism of some members of the SPR has seemed hostile. Still, the society has had a wide range of membership and is not tied to a sponsor's opinion on the genuineness of claimed phenomena.

The SPR was formed in 1882 to investigate psychic phenomena in a scientific and impartial spirit, free from the bias of preconceived ideas. The first president was Henry Sidgwick, and the council numbered among its members Edmund Gurney, Frank Podmore, F. W. H. Myers, William F. Barrett, Stainton Moses, Morell Theobald, George Wild, and Dawson Rogers, the latter four individuals being Spiritualists. However, avowedly Spiritualist membership in the society gradually declined over time.

Other notable presidents of the society were Balfour Stewart, A. J. Balfour, William James, Sir William Crookes, Sir Oliver Lodge, several of these being among original members of the society.

The initial scope of the SPR was defined by the areas of investigation mandated to six committees: (1) thought transference; (2) hypnotism; (3) Reichenbach phenomena; (4) apparitions; (5) physical (Spiritualist) phenomena; and (6) the history and existing literature on the subject. The scope of the society was further enlarged in later years when a committee headed by Richard Hodgson conducted an inquiry into the claimed phenomena of Theosophy.

To find alternative explanations for Spiritualist phenomena, members explored psychological theories and studied automatism, hallucinations, and thought transference. Some members were also instrumental in detecting a great deal of fraud in connection with mediumistic performances, particularly in the field of slate writing.

Many individuals had declared slate writing to be such a simple and straightforward phenomenon that fraud was impossible. But S. T. Davey, a member of the SPR, attended séances by the well-known medium William Eglinton and considered them fraudulent. He began to study the rationale for slate writing and emulated Eglinton's phenomena by conjuring methods. He then gave a number of pseudo séances, which Richard Hodgson carefully recorded.

Davey's techniques were so successful that none of the sitters could detect the fraud, even though they had been assured in advance that it was simply a conjuring trick—indeed some Spiritualist sitters refused to believe that the performances were fraudulent. After that, slate writing declined in Spiritualist circles and, like the phenomenon of spirit photography, was largely discredited.

Excellent work was done by the society in collecting evidence relating to apparitions of the dead and the living, reported in the monumental Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death, by F. W. H. Myers (2 vols., 1903) and Phantasms of the Living, by Myers, Frank Podmore, and Edmund Gurney (2 vols., 1886).

A statistical inquiry on a large scale was undertaken by a committee of the SPR in 1889, and some seventeen thousand cases of apparitions were collected. The main objective in taking such a census was to obtain evidence for the workings of telepathy in apparitions; to make such evidence of scientific value, the utmost care was taken to ensure the impartiality and responsible character of all who took part in the inquiry. From the results it was concluded that the number of apparitions coinciding with a death or other crisis greatly exceeded the number that could be ascribed to chance alone.

There was much to encourage belief in some "supernormal" agency, especially in the last decade of the nineteenth century. The two mediums whose manifestations led many in Britain, the United States, and Europe to conclude that the spirits of the dead were involved in their phenomena were the Italian medium Eusapia Palladino and the American Leonora Piper.

In 1885 William James of Harvard began a study of Piper, and he was joined a few years later by Richard Hodgson, who had moved to the United States to be the secretary of the American branch of the SPR. Of all the trance mediums, Piper offered the best evidence for spirit agency. The skeptical Hodgson himself declared his belief that the spirits of the dead spoke through the lips of the medium, and among others who held that fraud would not account for the revelations given by Piper in the trance state were James, Sir Oliver Lodge, F. W. H. Myers, and James H. Hyslop.

Frank Podmore, while not admitting any supernormal agency, suggested that telepathy, probably aided by skillful observations and carefully conducted inquiries concerning the affairs of prospective sitters, might help to explain the matter. Eleanor Sidgwick also suggested that Piper probably received telepathic communications from the spirits of the dead and reproduced them in her automatic speaking and writing.

The other medium, Eusapia Palladino, after attracting considerable attention from Cesare Lombroso, Charles Richet, Camille Flammarion, and others on the Continent, went to Britain in 1895. Several British scientists, including Lodge and Myers, had already witnessed her powers on the Continent, at Richet's invitation. Lodge, at least, said he was satisfied that no known agency was responsible for the remarkable manifestations of Palladino. The British sittings were held at Cambridge, and because it was proved conclusively that the medium made use of fraud, the majority of the investigators ascribed her “manifestations” entirely to that. Later, in 1898, more séances were held at Paris, and they were so successful that Richet, Myers, and Lodge once more declared themselves satisfied of the genuineness of the phenomena.

Perhaps the most convincing evidence for the working of some paranormal agency, however, was to be found in the famous cross correspondence experiments conducted in the early twentieth century. F. W. H. Myers had suggested before he died that if a spirit control were to give the same message to two or more mediums, it would go far to establish the independent existence of such control.

On the deaths of Sidgwick (in August 1900) and F. W. H. Myers (in January 1901) it was thought that if mediums were controlled by their spirits some agreement might be looked for in the scripts. The first correspondences were found in scripts of Rosina Thompson and a Miss Rawson, the former in London, the latter in the south of France. The Sidgwick control allegedly appeared for the first time to these ladies on the same day, January 11, 1901.

On May 8, 1901, the Myers control appeared in the scripts of both Thompson and Margaret Verrall, and later in those of Piper and others. So remarkable were the correspondences obtained in some cases where seemingly there could not possibly have been collusion between the mediums, that it is difficult to believe that some discarnate intelligence was not responsible for at least some of the scripts.

Toward the end of 1916 a great sensation was caused with the publication by Sir Oliver Lodge of a memoir about his son, Lieutenant Raymond Lodge, who was killed near Ypres in September, 1915, during World War I. The book, titled Raymond, or Life and Death, is divided into three parts, the first of which contains a history of the brief life of the subject. The second part details numerous records of sittings, both in the company of mediums and at the table, by Sir Oliver Lodge and members of his family. It was claimed that considerable evidence of the personal survival of his son were obtained in these sittings. The third part of the book deals with the scientific material relating to life after death, which is reviewed and summarized in a spirit of great fairness, although a natural bias toward belief in immortality is obvious.

Notwithstanding much useful work by the SPR on the phenomena of Spiritualism, there was frequent antagonism from Spiritualists during the first half-century or so of the society's existence. The pioneer Spiritualist W. T. Stead fulminated against it, and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, after several disputes, resigned his membership as a public protest shortly before his death in 1930. Controversies over the phenomena of “Margery” (American medium Mina Crandon) also reached across the Atlantic to involve the society in London.

Meanwhile, many independent research organizations had been formed. In 1920 the British College of Psychic Science was founded by prominent Spiritualists Hewat McKenzie and his wife Barbara. It was a source for information, advice, and guidance for consultation of reputable mediums and the investigation of psychical phenomena. The McKenzies assisted in the development of the psychic faculties of the medium Eileen J. Garrett, who was to become world-famous. Garrett was invited to the United States by the American Society for Psychical Research in 1931 and took part in parapsychological investigations with William McDougall and J. B. Rhine. In 1951 she founded the Parapsychology Foundation in New York.

Meanwhile the British College of Psychic Science performed useful work for a number of years, finally closing in 1947. Similar work was carried on by the College of Psychic Science, London (not to be confused with the former organization), founded in 1955, which grew from the London Spiritualist Alliance, which in turn was an outgrowth of the British National Association of Spiritualists, founded in 1896.

In 1970 the College of Psychic Science was renamed the College of Psychic Studies. It publishes the long-established journal Light and maintains an excellent library, organizes lectures, and conducts other activities associated with Spiritualism and psychical research.

The National Laboratory of Psychical Research was founded by Harry Price in 1925 as an independent research body and conducted investigations with such mediums as Rudi Schneider, Eleonore Zügün, Stella C., and Helen Duncan. In 1936 the laboratory, with its library collected by Price, passed to the University of London Council for Psychical Investigation. Although laboratory work ceased, the library remains at the University of London.

Ever since the famous experiments of Sir William Crookes with the mediums Daniel Dunglas Home and Florence Cook beginning in 1871, Spiritualists had hoped that science would validate the phenomena of Spiritualism. The overall trend of psychical research tended to be skeptical and sometimes hostile, however, particularly as careful investigation disclosed mediumistic frauds. The different viewpoints of researchers and Spiritualists were largely irreconcilable, because Spiritualists operated within a framework of religious belief and researchers from a largely agnostic stance.

Some interesting Spiritualist organizations did not survive the passage of time. Julia's Bureau, associated with W. T. Stead, was absorbed by the W. T. Stead Borderland Library in 1914 but closed in 1936. Other ephemeral groups included the Jewish Society for Psychical Research; the Society for the Study of Supernormal Pictures; the Link Association of Home Circles; and, the Survival League.

Spiritualism Today

The British Spiritualist movement as a whole continues to flourish. The exposure of famous mediums in the past as fraudulent or partially fraudulent proved largely irrelevant to the less-publicized activities of nonprofessional mediums in home circles and churches. The larger Spiritualist organizations are now careful to apply the strictest scrutiny to mediums and to regulate their activities through professional organizations. Any unsatisfactory conduct is firmly controlled, frauds exposed, and only the highest standards of integrity permitted.

As a result, British Spiritualist mediums and public demonstrators of evidence for survival are the most famous in the world. Such personalities as Doris Stokes became international figures on television and radio programs as well as in public demonstrations but remained dedicated to the Spiritualist cause and did not become rich. There are now more than four hundred Spiritualist churches in Britain.

Many of the Spiritualist organizations founded in the nineteenth century have continued into modern times, and new organizations have also grown up. The Marylebone Spiritualist Association, founded in 1872, became the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain, and is claimed to be the largest of its kind in the world. It is located at 33 Belgrave Sq., London, SW1.

The British Spiritualist Lyceum Union, founded in 1890, was amalgamated with the Spiritualists' National Union (SNU) in 1948. The SNU had been founded in 1891. It is now located at Britten House, Stanstead Hall, Stanstead, Essex, CM24 8UD.

White Eagle Lodge grew from the mediumship of Grace Cooke. It was founded in 1936 and includes a publishing trust. It has branches in Edinburgh, Bournemouth, Plymouth, Worthing, and Reading, as well as in New Jersey. Headquarters address: New Lands, Rake, Liss, Hampshire, GU33 7HY.

The Greater World Christian Spiritualist League was founded in 1921 around the mediumship of Winifred Moyes. It has more than 140 local branches throughout Britain, as well as in a dozen foreign countries. Headquarters address: 3 Landsdowne Rd., Holland Park, London, W11.

Associated with the Spiritualist movement are healers, represented by talented individuals and organizations. One of the most famous was Harry Edwards, who died in 1976. He claimed the assistance of spirit helpers and established a healing clinic, which is now carried on by Joan and Ray Branch, whom he had designated as his successors. Edwards had published several books on healing and the magazine The Spiritual Healer, which continues publication. The address of the Harry Edwards Spiritual Healing Sanctuary is Burrows Lea, Shere, Guildford, Surrey, GU5 9QG.

The National Federation of Spiritual Healers is located at Shortacres, Churchill, Loughton, Essex. There is also a World Healing Crusade at 476 Lytham Road, Blackpool, Lancashire, and a Churches' Council for Health and Healing at 8–10 Denman St., London, W1.

Spiritualism and the Established Churches

Throughout the history of Spiritualism in Britain the established churches have been largely antagonistic. In 1881 Canon Basil Wilberforce was the partisan of Spiritualism before the Church Congress. The reception was hostile and denunciatory.

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland was three times petitioned, by the Reverend W. A. Reid, to investigate psychic phenomena. On the first occasion, a committee was appointed, which reported that psychic phenomena did occur. Subsequent appeals, however, resulted in no fresh investigation.

Books have been published by Catholics insisting that Spiritualism is the work of evil spirits. In the period of postwar permissiveness, active opposition declined, and still today there are occasional fulminations from dogmatic clergymen that Spiritualism is the work of the Devil. The obsession with themes of possession and exorcism during the occult boom of the 1950s and 1960s confused many people.

In 1953 a group of interested clergymen led by Reginald M. Lester founded the Churches' Fellowship of Psychic and Spiritual Studies, which investigates paranormal healing, psychic phenomena, and mysticism in a sympathetic manner and publishes the Quarterly Review. Address: The Rural Workshop, South Rd., North Somercotes, Nr. Louth, Lincs., U.K. LN11 7PT.

One of the greatest obstacles to Spiritualism was the cruel, archaic legislation under which mediums were persecuted. Mediums found themselves accused under the witchcraft laws of 1735 for "pretending to communicate with spirits." Throughout the interwar years mediums were frequently brought into court under provisions of both the Witchcraft Act of 1735 and the Vagrancy Act of 1824. Disguised policewomen, posing as bereaved parents, would approach a medium, begging for some consolatory message. A small sum of money would be offered as a "love offering," and if this was accepted the medium was prosecuted and often fined or imprisoned for up to three months. This punitive legislation was finally repealed in 1951 and replaced with the new Fraudulent Mediums Act, which, although not wholly satisfactory to the Spiritualist community, implicitly acknowledged that there might be genuine mediumship.

The matter was by no means settled at the turn of the twenty-first century. The Spiritualists' National Union recently warned its churches about the possibility of prosecutions under the Vagrancy Act of 1824, which was only partially amended. The act has recently halted plans for a large commercial enterprise to combine fortune-telling with computer technology. This has revived fears that mediums are still not adequately protected by law.

Research organizations that continue to thrive were the Religious Experience Research Centre, at Manchester College, Oxford; the Brain and Perception Laboratory, at the medical school of the University of Bristol; the International Institute for the Study of Death, UK Branch, Hampnett, Northelach; the Parapsychical Laboratory, Downton, Wiltshire; and, the Society for Psychic Research, London.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Edmunds, Simeon. Spiritualism: A Critical Survey. Wellingborough, England: Aquarian Press, 1966.

Hall, Trevor H. The Spiritualists: The Story of Florence Cook and William Crookes. London: Gerald Duckworth, 1962. Reprint, New York: Garrett/Helix, 1963.

Medhurst, R. G., comp. Crookes and the Spirit World: A Collection of Writings by or Concerning the Work of Sir William Crookes. New York: Taplinger, 1972.

Roberts, Estelle. Forty Years a Medium. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1959. Rev. ed. Fifty Years a Medium. London: Corgi, 1969.

Stemman, Roy. One Hundred Years of Spiritualism: The Story of the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain, 1872–1912. London: SAGB, 1972.

———. Spirits and Spirit Worlds. London: Aldus Books, 1975.

Stokes, Doris, and Linda Dearsley. Voices In My Ear: The Autobiography of a Medium. London: Futura, 1980.

Time-Life Books. Spirit Summonings, Mysteries of the Unknown Series. Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1996.

Spiritualism—Italy

In Italy the birth of the Spiritualist movement was largely brought about by French periodicals and developed along the lines of the Kardec school. The visit of the famous medium Daniel Dunglas Home in 1855 led to the formation of many societies and to the publication of the first Spiritualist journal, L'Amore del Vero.

The Kardec school of Spiritism greatly affected the development of Italian Spiritualism. Copies of Kardec's books and French Kardecean periodicals circulated freely in Italy. Once introduced, Spiritualism developed rapidly, and by 1870 there were more than a hundred societies in different parts of the country. Both Spiritists and Spiritualists were represented.

Among the prominent organizations were La Società Spirituale di Palermo, formed in 1863. In the same year the first representative Spiritualist organ, Annali dello Spiritismo, was started in Turin by Niceforo Filalete (also known as Vincenzo Scarpa). The Magnetic Society of Florence, which had influential members, began its activity about the same time. Baron Seymour Kirkup sent many accounts of activities to the London Spiritual Magazine.

In 1873 Baron Guiterm de Bozzi founded the Pneumatological Psychological Academy at Florence, where earlier the visit of the British medium Agnes Guppy-Volckman, beginning in 1868 and extending to a period of almost three years, left a deep impression. The academy existed only a brief time.

A period of lively psychic activity began in 1872 when Signor Damiani discovered the medium Eusapia Palladino, around whom famous scientists gathered for a many years. G. B. Ermacora, founder and coeditor of the Rivista di Studi Psicici, Cesare Lombroso, Ernesto Bozzano, Enrico Morselli, Angelo Brofferio, Filippo Bottazzi, Benigno Bianchi, and many other well-known researchers worked to establish the authenticity of psychic phenomena. A succession of such powerful mediums as Auguste Politi, Francesco Carancini, Amedee Zuccarini, Lucia Sordi, and Linda Gazzera helped them in their task.

Various organizations were formed, including the Società di Studi Psicici in Rome and the Society for Psychic Studies at Florence. Ernesto Bozzano, a leading psychical researcher, presided over the Italian Spiritualists Association, and a very well-organized society, Circolo Arnaldo Vassallo, was formed in Genoa. It was named after one of the pioneers of the movement in Italy.

The formation of the Associazione Italiana Scientifica de Metapsichica (1946) at Milan and the Centro Italiano de Parapsicologia (1960) in Naples indicates the revived interest in psychic phenomena after World War II.

Spiritualism made considerable progress in Italy in spite of continual opposition from conservative Catholics, who stigmatized the movement as diabolical. Progress owed much to the open-minded investigations of psychical researchers such as Angelo Brofferio, author of Per lo Spiritismo (1892), Ercole Chiaia, and Ernesto Bozzano, who published a defense of the British medium W. Stainton Moses. In 1985 the Archivio de Documentazione Storica Della Rocerca Psichica was established in Bologna as a collection of psychological books and research records. The collection was built around the collections of Ernest Bozzano and Gastone de Boni.

According to a poll conducted in 1999, nearly a quarter of Italians believed in magic, fortune-telling, astrology, and spiritualism. They spent a total of one billion lire per year on these interests, according to the survey conducted by Confesercenti and the polling institute, SWG. The poll found that 22 percent, or more than 10 million people, believed in mystical practices in a country that counts 70,000 magicians, astrologers, clairvoyants and faith healers. About 2.5 percent of those polled, or 1.2 million, admitted that they had been victims of fraud when they turned to the supernatural to solve the more mundane difficulties of love, health, and work. For a nation whose population has been largely one of practicing Roman Catholics, their church's admonition against such practices apparently was not heeded. "While there is an understandable need for a touch of magic in life. . . action is needed to stamp out abuses, illegal behaviour and fraud widely linked to these practices," noted Confesercenti.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Bottazi, F. Nelle regioni inesplorate della Biologia Umana. Rome, 1907.

Bozzano, Ernesto. Popoli Primitivi e Manifestazioni Supernormali. Milan: Armenia Editore, 1974.

Brofferio, Angelo. Per Lo Spiritismo. 3d ed. Turin, 1903.

Carrington, Hereward. Eusapia Palladino and Her Phenomena. New York: B. W. Dodge, 1909.

De Vesme, Cesar. History of Experimental Spiritualism. 2 vols. London: Rider, 1931.

Lombroso, Cesare. After Death—What? Boston: Small, Maynard, 1909.

Morselli, Enrico. Psicologia e 'Spiritismo': Impressioni e note Critiche sui fenomeni medianici di Eusapia Palladino. 2 vols. Turin: Boca, 1908.

Reuters News Service. "Almost a Quarter of Italians Believe in Magic. . ." 13 August 1999.

Spiritualism—Phenomena

Spiritualism emerged in response to the post-Enlightenment attack on supernaturalism, which by the mid-nineteenth century had made a significant impact on the public. As part of a general assault on belief in the existence of a spiritual world, post-Enlightenment thinking had cast particular doubt on survival of bodily death. Spiritualists claimed that they had discovered a regular method of making contact with the spiritual world and could establish beyond a reasonable doubt the continuation of life beyond death.

The primary phenomenon of Spiritualism centers on mediums, individuals who can, it is believed, establish contact with spirit entities and through whom the spirits speak and act. Mediums seem to have a peculiar sensitivity to the presence of spirit forces and entities. Sometimes that sensitivity reportedly manifests early in life in such childhood experiences as knowing something is going to happen before it does or seeing spirits, sometimes described as invisible playmates. Other mediums grow to adulthood unaware of any psychic sensitivity and discover it quite by accident. For example, what occurs while playing with a Ouija board. Several report their sensitivity emerging after an accident to the head. Many have discovered their abilities while associating with Spiritualist friends or participating in a psychic ability development class.

The basic task for mediums is facilitating communication between individuals and their acquaintances in the spirit world. In either trance or a waking state, the medium mediates the conversation. When the medium is in a trance state, the spirit entity often speaks directly to an individual using the medium's vocal cords, it is said. When awake, the medium most frequently simply repeats messages from the spirits. Such communications may take place in a private session between the medium and the client, in a séance, or in "platform work," in which the medium stands in front of a large audience and gives brief readings to selected members.

Mediumship is thus meant to be a demonstration of the continued existence of persons who used to reside in a body on Earth. The problem, of course, is determining whether what appears to be happening (i.e., a simple conversation between an individual, a medium, and a spirit) is real, an elaborate hoax, or an unconscious charade stemming from the vivid imagination of the medium.

The basic evidence comes from the content of the messages. That is, the voice speaking through the medium often reveals information that only the spirit entity could have known. From a successful session with a medium, sitters often report hearing private details of their lives, possibly relating to incidents shared with the deceased. They note peculiar traits of speech of the entity assumed by the medium or the discovery of a lost object by following the directions given by the spirit. Occasionally spirits offer predictions of things that will happen to the sitter. Spirits speaking through an entranced medium often demonstrate knowledge and erudition apparently not available to the medium when awake.

In the course of a séance or platform work, the entire range of extrasensory perception (e.g., telepathy, psychometry, telekinesis, clairvoyance, and precognition) may occur; in fact, some psychical researchers have suggested that mediumship can be completely explained by ESP.

Mediumistic phenomena also include psychic or spiritual healing. Spiritualist healers generally see their healing work as originating in the work of spirit helpers who work through them. At one end of the healing spectrum is psychic surgery. Philippine psychic surgeons became famous with claims of actually opening the body of a patient and under spirit guidance removing unhealthy tissue. A tamer form, found among early American and British healers, involved an entranced medium operating on the astral body of the patient. With the patient lying on an operating table, the medium would appear to pantomime an operation several inches above the body. Corrections in this spiritual body double having been made, it was believed that appropriate changes would then occur in the physical body.

More commonly today, however, Spiritualist healers simply reach a rapport with their spirit guides and mediate healing energy from them. Spiritualists point to alleged healings as evidence of the spirit world. Critics, of course, point to similar healings in other contexts having no reference to spirits, and all contemporary research in paranormal healing has been directed toward defining a healing power without reference to any spirit agency. In actions akin to healing, mediums have demonstrated the ability to influence the growth of plants, seemingly by passing energy from their body to the plants.

Early in the Spiritualist movement various telekinetic phenomena began to appear. In fact, the initial events from which Spiritualism dates itself were rapping sounds that seemed to manifest some intelligence because they occurred in response to questions put to a supposed spirit. Such raps became commonplace over the next decades, as did various other noises, such as paranormal voices and music.

Among the most common mediumistic phenomena are various forms of automatism: agitation of the body or limbs, automatic writing, automatic drawing and painting, slate writing, and direct writing. Of these forms, automatic writing is by far the most common. Numerous texts have been produced purportedly by a medium simply allowing his or her hands to be controlled by a spirit.

The most controversial physical phenomena have been those associated with materialization and dematerialization. Throughout the early twentieth century a great deal of psychical research was devoted to the study of reported claims of full-body materializations of spirit entities created from a mysterious substance called ectoplasm. In séances where such materializations occurred, sitters were often treated to the appearance of apports, objects believed to have been dematerialized elsewhere and rematerialized in the séance room. Closely related was the occasional production of plastics imprints of fingers, hands, faces, legs, and psychic molds of faces, hands, and legs. Spiritualists have also claimed incidents of matter passing through matter and the transportation of the human body (i.e., teleportation).

Less common has been the alleged production of various chemical phenomena, including psychic lights (luminous phenomena), perfumes, catalytic phenomena, and water. Of these, incidences of psychic photography, or more particularly, spirit photography, were the most spectacular. The literature also reveals incidents of some electric phenomena, including the discharge of electroscopes and phenomena suggesting human radioactivity.

Mediums have also claimed the powers attributed to Indian fakirs, such as fire immunity and the levitation of the human body.

Finally, also reported in séances have been a wide variety of unusual but less evidential phenomena, such as the movement of objects without contact (telekinesis), vibratory effects, increase and decrease in weight, and spelling out of messages by typtology. Reports of psychophysiological phenomena include change in stature (elongation, shrinking or puffing out of the human body); stigmata; effects of personation, transfiguration, obsession, and trance; loss of weight; nervous drain; the appearance of auras; and various emanations.

Thermodynamic effects include the frequently reported variations of temperature and the less common reports of increase of heat in apported objects or, in case of penetration of matter through matter, currents of air and psychic winds.

Explanations

Although numerous fanciful explanations for mediumistic phenomena have been put forth—including one positing the existence of “planetary spirits” with whom mediums communicated and one theorizing a vast “thought reservoir” fed by human “thought rays”—most twentieth-century psychical researchers have concluded that not only were they not produced by spirit agencies, but were produced by fraud. That conclusion was reached after numerous cases of cleverly produced fraud were uncovered and information on how such phenomena could be produced through conjuring became available. The broad acceptance of that appraisal has meant the virtual abandonment by mainstream Spiritualism of physical séances and their survival only on the fringes of the movement. Revelations of fraud have called into question all of the accounts of materializations, apports, and spirit photography produced throughout the first century of Spiritualism.

Spiritualism still adheres to the spirit hypothesis, meaning the belief that the intelligence that directs the phenomena of the medium is of a disembodied spirit's. The spirit hypothesis remains the most intriguing of the explanations of such phenomena, and the possibility of finding evidence of the spirit's survival after death still motivates many parapsychologists.

Sources:

Barbanell, Maurice. This Is Spiritualism. London: Herbert Jenkins, 1959.

Garrett, Eileen. Many Voices: The Autobiography of a Medium. Reprint, Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life, Inc., 1991.

Lewis, James R. Afterlife Beliefs and Phenomena. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1995.

Spiritualism—United States

On March 31, 1848, Mrs. John Fox of Hydesville, New York, summoned her neighbors to hear strange knockings that were disturbing her family. At this time the Fox household comprised John Fox, his wife, and their two young daughters, Margaretta and Kate, aged 15 and 12 years respectively. On being questioned, the raps seemed to manifest signs of intelligence, and it was eventually deciphered from them, it was said, that the disturbing influence was the spirit of a peddler, murdered for the sake of his money by a former resident of the house. It was subsequently claimed in April of that year that the Foxes, while digging in their cellar at the instigation of the spirits, discovered fragments of human hair, teeth, and bones.

The neighbors of the Fox family were deeply impressed by these “revelations” and, by way of a test, questioned the spirits on such matters as the ages of their acquaintances, questions that were answered, apparently, with some correctness. Soon afterward the daughter Margaretta Fox visited her married sister, Mrs. Fish, at Rochester, New York, where the knockings broke out as vigorously as they had at Hydesville. Her sister Catherine visited some friends at Auburn, and there, too, the rappings were heard.

Committee after committee was appointed but could not discover the cause of the sounds or how the answers to mental questions that were posed were correctly given. Some of those who sat with the Fox sisters soon found that they had similar powers. So the movement spread. The public had already been prepared for such demonstrations by the spread of the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg and demonstrations of animal magnetism. Clairvoyants had also made use of rapping prior to the mediumship of the Fox girls. The induced trance had also recently been brought to the notice of the American people by lecturers, the clergy, and others. So, accustomed to departures from orthodoxy in every direction, many found no difficulty in admitting the intervention of good or evil spirits in human affairs, and for those who refused to accept the spirit hypothesis a satisfactory explanation of the phenomena was found in electricity, electromagnetism, or the od (odic) force.

The first experimental Spiritualist organization, the New York Circle, was formed in 1851. The New York Conference was established the same year, and the preaching of a new science and faith began to make converts among the notable personalities of the day. Wisconsin governor N. P. Tallmadge, abolitionist William Lloyd Garrison, Professors Britten, Wells, Bryant, and Bliss of the University of Pennsylvania, Chief Justice Williams, Judge John Worth Edmonds, Professor Robert Hare, Professor James Jay Mapes, General Bullard, Horace Greeley, James Fenimore Cooper, and William Cullan Bryant were some of the distinguished early converts.

According to an estimate in Spirit World, there were 100 mediums in New York and 50 to 60 private circles in Philadelphia in 1851. The North American Review wrote in April 1855 that the New England Spiritualist Association, which computed the number of Spiritualists in America as nearly two million, did not overstate the facts.

Probably the strangest developments in the early history of American Spiritualism were the new motor machine of John Murray Spear and the Mountain Cove Community of Rev. James Scott and Thomas Lake Harris. As time progressed, Spiritualists struggled with many offshoot movements that claimed justification for such ideas as free love and community ownership of the spirit communications of mediums.

Soon physical phenomena began to supplement the simpler forms of spirit communication. Table turning and tilting partially replaced the phenomenon of raps. Playing of musical instruments by invisible means, “direct” spirit writing, bell ringing, levitation, and materialization of spirit hands were just some of the phenomena witnessed and vouched for by distinguished sitters.

The levitation of the great medium Daniel Dunglas Home was recorded at an early stage in his career. Slate writing and playing of musical instruments were feats practiced by the alleged spirits that frequented the “spirit room” of Jonathan Koons in Dover, Ohio.

At Keokuk, Iowa, in 1854 two mediums spoke in tongues identified—on somewhat insufficient data—as “Swiss,” Latin, and Indian, and thereafter other mediums practiced trance speaking in foreign tongues, a phenomena known as xenoglossis. Recognized foreign tongues included Latin and Greek, French, German, Spanish, Italian, Chinese, and Gaelic, but generally the trance utterances, when they were not in English, were not recognized definitely as any known language, and frequently the “spirits” themselves interpreted the “tongue.” Speaking in pseudotongues, or glossolalia, was evidently related to the articulate but meaningless fluency of people caught up in a moment of religious ecstasy. There were a few verified cases, however, where persons in a state of exaltation spoke fluently in a language with which they were unfamiliar in their normal state.

Many of the “spirit” writings were signed with the names of great people—particularly Franklin, Swedenborg, Plato, Aristotle, St. John, and St. Paul. Trance lecturing before audiences was also practiced, books of inspirational sayings were published, and poetry and drawings were produced in abundance. These “automatic” productions had a character of their own—often vague, high-sounding, incoherent, and distinctly reminiscent. In cases where they displayed even a fair amount of merit, as in the poems of T. L. Harris, it was pointed out that they were not beyond the capacity of the medium in a normal state. As a rule they had a superficial appearance of intelligence, but on analysis were often found to be devoid of meaning.

Spiritualist Literature

With the spread of the movement, Spiritualist periodicals, most short-lived, sprung up. The Univercoelum of 1847 and the Spirit Messenger, which succeeded it in 1849, were mouthpieces of the “harmonial” philosophy as articulated by Andrew Jackson Davis. A similar paper, Disclosures from the Interior and Superior Care for Mortals, was published by Rev. James L. Scott, founder of the Mountain Cove Community, and Thomas Lake Harris. The Spiritual and Moral Instructor, by T. S. Hiatt, and Heat and Light also came into existence. The first true Spiritualist periodical was issued on July 1850 by former “magnetist” La Roy Sunderland. The title, The Spiritual Philosopher, was changed a year later to Spirit World. In 1852 the Shekinah was launched on its short career by S. B. Brittan and Charles Partridge. After 18 months it was absorbed by Joseph R. Buchanan’s Journal of Man.

The first periodical that could boast of permanence was the Spiritual Telegraph, born of a resolution of the New York Conference in 1852. It ran until 1860, when it was absorbed by Andrew Jackson Davis’s The Herald of Progress.

In 1854 the Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge, the first well-organized Spiritualist body, started the Christian Spiritualist (1854–57), and the year 1857 witnessed the appearance of The Banner of Light, which ran into the 1930s. Other early periodicals were The Spiritual Clarion, The New Eva, The Light from the Spirit World, of St. Louis, the Age of Progress, and The Sunbeam. Later ones included the Religio-Philosophical Journal, the Western Star, The Spiritual Scientist, The American Spiritualist, the New England Spiritualist, The Spiritual Age, and The Lyceum Banner.

Trends in the Movement

From the beginning of the movement those who accepted the actuality of the phenomena arrayed themselves into two separate schools, each represented by a considerable body of opinion. The theory of the first was frankly Spiritualistic, and the second tended toward mesmerism or animal magnetism under one name or another, with a flavor of contemporary scientific thought. These two schools had their foundation in the early days of animal magnetism, when the more rationalist ideas of the magnetists were pitted against the theological theories of angelic or diabolic possession.

In the United States the hypothetical “force” of the rationalists went by such names as od (odic) force, electromagnetism, and so forth. Poltergeist disturbances, occurring from time to time, were ascribed either to spirits or to odic force, as in the case of the Ashtabula poltergeist. Asa Mahan, one of the “rationalists,” suggested that a medium could read the thoughts of sitters by means of odic force. The proponents of magnetic theory attributed trance speaking to the subject’s own intelligence, but after the birth of American Spiritualism in 1848 a Spiritualist interpretation became more common.

Notwithstanding these conflicting theories, little was done in the way of scientific investigation, with the exception of the experiments conducted by Robert Hare, a professor of chemistry at the University of Pennsylvania, which resulted in Hare’s conversion to Spiritualism. His critics denounced him violently, and he was obliged to resign.

Very few exposures of fraud were made, partly because the majority of the sitters accepted the phenomena with unquestioning faith, and partly because the techniques with which such detection might be made were not available. The collaboration of skillful, trained, and disinterested investigators, such as those who later applied themselves to the elucidation of parapsychology, was entirely lacking in the early days, and the public was left to form its own conclusions.

Spiritualism in the United States was, from the first, intimately bound up with socialism. It was, in fact, the outgrowth of the same original outlook that produced socialistic communities and occasioned the rise and fall of so many strange religions. Warren Chase, Horace Greeley, T. L. Harris, and other prominent Spiritualists founded such communities, and “inspirational” writings (today called channeling) frequently gave directions for their construction.

The Problem of Fraud

American Spiritualism has been characterized by a wide range of phenomena, and there has been a problem distinguishing genuine phenomena from those that are fraudulent. For example, the Davenport brothers, who traveled far and wide, advertised Spiritualism by inexplicable noisy demonstrations but most likely were simply very good stage magicians. The medium Henry Gordon introduced levitation of the human body, and D. D. Home produced phantom hands that dissolved in the grasp of the sitters. Home’s accomplishments remain a mystery. Joseph Rhodes Buchanan discovered psychometry, which William Denton corroborated in some exciting experiments. William H. Mumler accidentally became the first exponent of spirit photography. Mary Hardy produced the first paraffin wax molds. Emma Harding Britten, Nettie Colburn (also known as Henrietta Sturdevant Maynard), and Cora Scott (later Cora L. V. Richmond) did inspirational speaking, and Mary J. Hollis and Mrs. J. H. Conant became outstanding trance mediums. The infamous Henry Slade was the major exponent of slate writing, and Charles Foster led in the art of pellet reading and skin writing (dermography).

The Fox sisters, who gave the first impetus to modern Spiritualism, were soon eclipsed in power and variety of demonstrations by these and other mediums. But they were also the first who had to bear the brunt of the backlash against Spiritualism, which was soon to come. In the sisters' first university examination, on February 17, 1851, Professors Austin Flint, Charles A. Dee, and C. B. Coventry of Buffalo University, delivered the following verdict on their phenomena: "It is sufficient to state that the muscles inserted into the upper and inner side of the large bone of the leg (the tibia) near the knee joint, are brought into action so as to move the upper surface of the bone just named, laterally upon the lower surface of the thigh bone (the femur), giving rise, in fact, to a partial lateral dislocation. This is effected by an act of the will, without any obvious movements of the limb, occasioning a loud noise[,] and a return of the bone to its place is attended by a second sound."

The revelation by Mrs. Norman Culver of an alleged confession by one of the Fox sisters cast more doubt on their credibility.

Then, in 1857, the editor of The Boston Courier offered $500 for the production of genuine phenomena and provided a committee from Harvard University be the umpire. On behalf of the Spiritualists, a Dr. Gardner accepted the challenge. The committee consisted of Professors Pierce, Louis Agassiz, and Horsford of Harvard University, N. B. Gould of the Albany Observatory, the editor of the Boston Courier, and a few friends of Gardner's. The mediums were Mrs. Brown (Leah Fox), Kate Fox, J. V. Mansfield, Mrs. Kendrick, George Redman, and the Davenport brothers.

Two days were devoted to the manifestations. They were imperfect and unsatisfactory, and the committee returned a negative verdict, promising also a later report of additional investigations, which, however, was never issued. After the failure of the Cambridge investigation, Gardner extended invitations to the press to attend séances with the same mediums. Several papers published impressive accounts.

The Progress of the Movement

Over the years important records of observations and long experiments were published by E. A. Brackett, Epes Sargent, a Dr. Wolfe, Allan Putnam, and Eugene Crowell. An early history of Spiritualism by E. W. Capron, Modern Spiritualism, was supplemented by Emma Hardinge Britten's Modern-American Spiritualism (1870), outlining 15 years of progress. Many organizations and Spiritualist churches worked for the advancement of the cause. In 1873 the first camp meeting was initiated at Lake Pleasant, Massachusetts. It was quickly followed by others.

The years between 1880 and 1890 witnessed four outstanding events: the report of the Seybert Commission; the self-exposure of Margaret and Kate Fox in 1885; the founding of the American Society for Psychical Research for systematic and organized psychical research in 1885, with the participation of a group of distinguished scientists; and the discovery of the remarkable mediumship of Leonora Piper.

The Seybert Commission was set up by the University of Pennsylvania, which received an endowment of $60,000 from the will of Spiritualist Henry Seybert to investigate Spiritualist phenomena. After issuing a preliminary negative report in 1887, which was widely resented, the committee discontinued the investigation.

The self-exposure of Margaret and Kate Fox did not result in the deathblow to Spiritualism hoped for by anti-Spiritualists, because the motives of the sisters were called into question and their confession was followed a year later by full retraction.

The emergence of psychical research with the founding of an American branch of the Society for Psychical Research in 1885 was of far-reaching importance, marking the beginning of regular attention to Spiritualist phenomena. At about the same time William James discovered and became intensely interested in Leonora Piper's powers. He wedded his research to that of the new organization and lent it the prestige of his name. Richard Hodgson joined James in the Piper investigations and acted as secretary of the American Society for Psychical Research until his death in 1905. The American branch of the society was then dissolved, but its work was quickly resumed by Columbia professor James H. Hyslop, who assumed leadership of a reorganized American Society for Psychical Research and conducted its work until his death in 1920.

Other keen and able investigators arose. Hereward Carrington established his claim to renown and Hyslop's mantle was placed on the shoulders of Walter F. Prince. In the early twentieth century, Piper's earlier role was filled by "Margery" (Mina Crandon). The controversy produced by her phenomena, focused in the investigation of the Scientific American and of Harvard committees, split the psychical research community and its major organization. Prince and other American Society for Psychical Research leaders withdrew and founded the Boston Society for Psychic Research in 1925. The Boston society competed successfully with its New York rival for 15 years until the Margery controversy had died and a merger was worked out.

Spiritualism in the Twentieth Century

The nineteenth century has been called the "heyday of Spiritualism," and the period up to World War I was certainly the time when most attention was paid to it. However, such a designation, coupled with the knowledge of the negative results of so many investigations of the movement, led many to assume that it had largely died out. Such was not the case. In 1893 the National Spiritualist Association, later the National Spiritualist Association of Churches (NSAC), began to bring some order to the organizational chaos of state and local associations, provided a united front to respond to other competing groups, such as the Theosophical Society, and presented a creed abstracted from spirit teachings.

The NSAC dominated the movement for a generation but in the 1920s began to experience internal discord arising from some mediums' belief in reincarnation. While French Spiritualists had adopted a reincarnationist position, in general British and American mediums were opposed to it. As early as 1924 it became an element of contention, with the withdrawal of Amanda Flowers and the formation of the Independent Spiritualist Association. In 1930 the NSAC passed a strong statement repudiating reincarnation only to have the majority of the New York membership withdraw and reorganize as the General Assembly of Spiritualists. The issue would arise again and again.

The twentieth century also saw the emergence of an African American presence in the Spiritualist movement. Some joined the NSAC, but as early as 1913 Leafy Anderson founded the Eternal Life Christian Spiritualist Association. Through the remainder of the decade 11 additional congregations were founded, and in 1920 Anderson moved to New Orleans to pastor the congregation there. In 1922 the NSAC pushed black members out of its fellowship, and they founded the National Colored Spiritualist Association of Churches. Over the next decade additional black denominations were founded and began to spread throughout the African American community nationally.

Among the larger Spiritualist churches that appeared over the century were the Universal Church of the Master (formed in California in 1908), the International General Assembly of Spiritualists (1936), the National Spiritual Science Center (1941), the Spiritual Episcopal Church (1941), the Universal Spiritualist Association (1956), and the United Spiritualist Church (1967).

Spiritualism seems to have spread slowly and consistently across the United States through the century. However, with the emergence of parapsychology and the refocus of psychical research away from the claims of Spiritualists and toward the laboratory production of psi phenomena, Spiritualism was largely forgotten. The last great crusade against it was conducted by the magician Harry Houdini in the 1920s. A number of Spiritualist mediums attained some public recognition as psychics but were rarely identified with their churches. One such medium was Arthur A. Ford, who first came to public notice when he claimed to have received a message left behind by Houdini at the time of his death. Ford went on to inspire the formation of the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship (now the International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship), a fellowship of non-Spiritualists who wanted the resources of the psychic world to investigate the religious life. He ended his career with a famous séance on Canadian television for Episcopal bishop James A. Pike.

The Pike séance revealed a continuing problem of Spiritualism. Several years after the séance and both Pike's and Ford's death, an examination of Ford's papers revealed that he had faked the séance. Periodically, word of similar fraudulent activity served to substantiate that Spiritualism was itself saturated with fakes and thus should simply be dismissed as a movement of consequence. In 1960, psychical researcher Andrija Puharich uncovered the fake materializations going on at Camp Chesterfield. Then, in 1976, Lamar Keene quit his career as a fake medium and offered detailed information about a circle of churches operating what amounted to a confidence scheme to provide a constant stream of phenomena for their members.

Meanwhile, during the same period, Spiritualism had to compete with the revival of occult religion in the New Age movement. Integral to the New Age has been mediumship under a new name, "channeling." However, Spiritualism has largely remained aloof from the New Age movement, its adherents not participating to any marked degree.

Sources:

Baer, Hans A. The Black Spiritual Movement: A Religious Response to Racism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.

Brandon, Ruth. The Spiritualists: The Passion for the Occult in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. New York: Alfred A. Knopf; London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1983.

Britten, Emma Hardinge. Modern American Spiritualism: A Twenty Years' Record of the Communion Between Earth and the World of Spirits. New York, 1870. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Capron, E. W. Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticisms, Its Consistencies and Contradictions. Boston, 1855. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Carrington, Hereward. The Story of Psychic Science. London: Rider, 1930.

Carter, Huntley, ed. Spiritualism: Its Present-day Meaning. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1920.

Centennial Book of Modern Spiritualism in America. Chicago: The National Spiritualist Association of the United States of America, 1948.

Gauld, Alan. The Founders of Psychical Research. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1968. Reprint, New York: Schocken Books, 1973.

Hare, Robert. Experimental Investigation of the Spirit Manifestations. New York, 1855.

Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against an After Life. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1959.

Home, Daniel Dunglas. Incidents in My Life. London: Longmans, Green, 1863. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Houdini, Harry. A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Harper & Row, 1924. Reprinted as Houdini: A Magician Among the Spirits. New York: Arno Press, 1972.

Jackson, Herbert G., Jr. The Spirit Rappers. New York: Doubleday, 1972.

Jacobson, Nils Olof. Life Without Death? On Parapsychology, Mysticism and the Question of Survival. New York: Delacorte Press, 1973. Reprint, London: Turnstone Books, 1974. Reprint, New York: Dell, 1974.

Keene, M. Lamar. The Psychic Mafia. New York: St. Martin's, 1976.

Kerr, Howard. Mediums and Spirit-Rappers and Roaring Radicals. Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press, 1972.

McHargue, Georgess. Facts, Frauds, and Phantasms: A Survey of the Spiritualist Movement. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

Pearsall, Ronald. The Table Rappers. New York: St. Martin's, 1972.

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism: A History and a Criticism. 2 vols. London, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the 19th Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

Spicer, Henry. Sights and Sounds: The Mystery of the Day; Comprising an Entire History of the American "Spirit" Manifestations. London: Thomas Bosworth, 1853.

Tabori, Paul. Companions of the Unseen. London: H. A. Humphrey, 1968.

———. Pioneers of the Unseen. London: Souvenir Press, 1972.

Spiritual Israel Church and Its Army

The beginnings of the Spiritual Israel Church and Its Army, a prominent spiritual church within the African American community of the United States, are somewhat obscure. It seems to have begun with the absorption of black Jewish ideas by Derk Field, a black Alabama man who founded the Church of God in David. Along the way he met a man named W. D. Dickson, who eventually succeeded him as head of the church. Dickson took the title "King of All Israel." According to the Spiritual Israelites, Field and Dickson restored the teachings of the ancient Israelites. They believe that "Ethiopian" is the national name of black people, and "Israel" is their spiritual name.

The Spiritual Israelites are like other Spiritualist churches in that they value contact with the spirit world and the work of mediums who serve as the pastors of their temples. They believe that they belong to the one true spiritual church, but that the Spirit dwells in all people. They believe in life after death but think that traditional ideas of heaven and hell are mere projections of the limited human mind.

The Spiritual Israelites have adopted a version of the black Jewish myth. They maintain that black people were the first people, humanity having originated in Africa. All of the biblical patriarchs and prophets were black people, but at the time of Jacob and Esau, the sons of Isaac, a division occurred. Jacob is the progenitor of the Ethiopian people and Esau of the Caucasian. Modern Jews are the product of intermarriage between the children of Jacob and Esau.

By the 1980s, the Spiritual Israelites had some 40 temples and missions. There were also several schismatic groups, all of whom carried the word Israel in their title. A number of the congregations are located in the greater Detroit area.

Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Baer, Hans A. "Black Spiritual Israelites in a Small Southern City." Southern Quarterly 23, no. 3 (1985): 103–24.

———. The Black Spiritual Movement: A Religious Response to Racism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.

Murphy, Larry G., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward. Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.

The Spiritualist (Periodical)

The name of several Spiritualist periodicals. The first was an influential British weekly, edited by W. H. Harrison (formerly coeditor of The Spiritual Times), and published in London from 1869 until 1881 (originally issued as The Spiritualist Newspaper). It was closely associated with the British National Association of Spiritualists until 1879.

The name was again used by a monthly journal published in New York and edited by C. P. Christenson, from August 1915 to November 1916. A third periodical called The Spiritualist was published monthly in England beginning in 1932 by the Spiritualist Community, London. The Community dissolved soon after the start of World War II. The Spiritualist was the bi-monthly journal of the Spiritualist Association of Great Britain, since renamed The Spiritualist and Spiritual Gazette.

Spiritualist Association of Great Britain (SAGB)

One of the oldest and largest Spiritualist associations. It grew out of the Marylebone Spiritualist Association founded in 1872. The story of the association's early struggles "to propagate spiritual truths in the Marylebone area of London" has been told in an SAGB publication One Hundred Years of Spiritualism, which also states that Queen Victoria held several sésances after the death of the Prince Consort.

Even the term "Spiritualist" led to many difficulties in the early days of the association, which had to change its name to The Spiritual Evidence Society in order to hire halls. Widespread opposition to Spiritualism was also encouraged by the Witchcraft Act of 1735, which was frequently invoked for police prosecution of mediums.

Four years after the repeal of the Witchcraft Act in 1951, the SAGB moved to its present headquarters where it now provides lectures, demonstrations of clairvoyance, healing clinics, Sunday services, a library, a bookstall, and other facilities for the study and practice of Spiritualism. It also links together "a commonwealth" of Spiritualist churches throughout Britain. Among the prominent mediums associated with the group were Ursula Roberts and healer Gordon Turner.

Membership of the association is open to interested members of the public, who are put in touch with their local Spiritualist church. Members may also attend psychic development classes or book sittings with approved mediums. The association publishes a magazine, The Spiritualist and Spiritual Gazette. Address: 33 Belgrave Sq., London, SW1X 8QL England.

Sources:

Edmunds, Simeon. Spiritualism: A Critical Survey. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

The Spiritualist Community

British organization, active in the period between the two world wars in presenting religious and educational aspects of Spiritualism. It was founded by Mrs. St. Clair Stobart, known as "the woman on the black horse," who had led one half of the Serbian Army in their retreat during World War I and was an early member of the British College of Psychic Science. She eventually became chairperson of its advisory council and published several books on Spiritualism.

The Community, under the presidency of Spiritualist Hannen Swaffer, conducted religious services with speakers, clairvoyant and healing services, and organized instruction groups, also publishing a monthly journal The Spiritualist from 1932 onward. The community is no longer active.

Spiritualist Episcopal Church

One of the most important Spiritualist churches in the United States in the mid-twentieth century, the Spiritualist Episcopal Church was founded in 1941 out of the turmoil that had plagued Camp Chesterfield, a central gathering point for Spiritualists in the midwestern United States. The founders included Revs. Clifford Bias and John Bunker of the Independent Spiritualist Association and Robert Chaney of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches. Each of these had experienced some degree of alienation over traditional Spiritualism's emphasis on the phenomena believed to constantly demonstrate and prove the existence of life after death. They wanted to emphasize the teachings and philosophy coming through their channeling activity. This new emphasis was welcomed by some, and for many years the church conducted a summer seminary at Camp Chesterfield using the materials produced by Rev. Ivy Hooper.

The church prospered through the mid-1950s, though Chaney departed in 1951 to found Astara. However, in 1956, a morals charge was brought against a prominent leader in the church who was a candidate for a church office. The leadership was split by the candidate's supporters and detractors. The tension affected the church's position at Camp Chesterfield, where the church had its headquarters. Hoping to calm the anger, prevent the divisiveness at the camp from spreading through the whole church, and to dissuade the medium from seeking office, church president Rev. Dorothy Graff Flexer moved the headquarters to Lansing, Michigan. Despite the move, the church split, and Clifford Bias founded the Universal Spiritualist Association. The Spiritualist Episcopal Church's mediums were denied access to Camp Chesterfield. Flexer left the church in 1958 and founded the Church of Metaphysical Christianity.

Formally, the Spiritual Episcopal Church has beliefs very similar to those of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches. Reincarnation is denied. However, inspiration is drawn from all of the world's religions and the influence of Buddhism, Rosicrucianism, and Theosophy is evident in the lessons produced for the summer seminary. The present status of the church is unknown.

Sources:

Chaney, Robert G. "Hear My Prayer." Eaton Rapids, Mich.: Library, Spiritualist Episcopal Church, 1942.

Development of Mediumship. Dimondale, Mich.: Spiritual Episcopal Church, n.d.

The Spiritualistic Dramatic Society

British society of the 1930s, located in London, which presented plays with a Spiritualist theme to spread knowledge of Spiritualism through the channels of dramatic art. The Duchess of Hamilton and Brandon, Ms. Lind-af-Hageby, Hannen Swaffer, and Robert McAllen were its patrons.

Spiritualistische Blaetter (Periodical)

Pioneering German Spiritualist periodical of 1883.

Spiritualist Outlook (Magazine)

Monthly publication of the First United Spiritualist Church. It included poetry, inspirational articles, and a directory of affiliated Spiritualist churches.

Spiritualists' National Union

One of the oldest British Spiritualist organizations. It was founded in July 1890 at the suggestion of Emma Hardinge Britten and focused attention on Spiritualism in Manchester and throughout northern England. In the beginning, it was known as the Spiritualists' National Federation, bringing together a number of leading Spiritualists in Manchester for an annual conference with delegates from other Spiritualist societies to discuss matters of common interest. This annual conference still takes place today.

In October 1901, the Spiritualists' National Union was incorporated under the Companies Acts, taking over the assets, rights, and obligations of the federation in July 1902.

In 1948, the British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union, founded in 1890, amalgamated with the SNU, transferring its work of spiritual education for children and young people to that organization. The SNU formulates policy through a National Executive Committee, which delegates certain responsibilities to standing and sub-committees such as Trust Property, Education, Training, and Awards, Publicity and Public Relations and Healing. The SNU also operates the Arthur Findlay College, which is based at Stansted Hall in Essex and runs courses on Spiritualist philosophy, religious practice, spiritual healing, and other related subjects.

The SNU delegates local matters to fourteen district councils, with executive committees formed by directly-elected members in the districts. Four hundred Spiritualist churches are affiliated with the SNU, most are in the UK, along with one in the US and several in Australia. The union also maintains a register of National Spiritualist ministers and mediums.

Membership in the union is open to individual Spiritualists as well as to churches and other organizations. The primary aim of the union is to promote the religion and religious philosophy of Spiritualism on the basis of the seven principles:

1. The fatherhood of God
2. The brotherhood of Man
3. The communion of spirits and the ministry of angels
4. The continuous existence of the human soul
5. Personal responsibility
6. Compensation and retribution hereafter for good and evil deeds done on earth
7. Eternal progress open to every human soul.

The Spiritualists' National Union may be contacted at Redwoods, Stansted Hall, Stansted, CM24 8UD. Website: <http://www.snu.org.uk>.

Sources:

Edmunds, Simeon. Spiritualism: A Critical Survey. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

The Spiritual Magazine

A British Spiritualist monthly (1860–77) founded by William Wilkinson, who jointly edited it with Thomas Shorter. William Howitt was its chief contributor. It was the successor to the British Spiritual Telegraph.

The Spiritual Messenger (Journal)

British Spiritualist monthly that published a few editions in London in the winter of 1858–59. It was edited by W. Carpenter.

Spiritual Notes (Journal)

Monthly official publication of the British National Association of Spiritualists, which flourished from 1878 to 1881.

The Spiritual Philosopher (Periodical)

The first Spiritualist periodical in the United States, founded by La Roy Sunderland in 1850 as a monthly, then becoming a weekly, the title changing to Spirit World after the first year.

The Spiritual Quarterly Magazine

British periodical of Spiritualism, published by the Two Worlds Publishing Company in Manchester beginning in October 1902. It was edited by Will Phillips and had only a short life.

Spiritual Regeneration Movement Foundation

Founded in 1959 to teach the philosophy of Transcendental Meditation (TM) and its technique as developed by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. It is now a section of the World Plan Executive council, the international organization that directs the TM movement from Switzerland. Address: Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, 433 South Harvard Blvd., Los Angeles, CA 90020-3402.

Spiritual Research Society

The Spiritual Research Society was an early American New Age group founded by Edwin Cain, Sr., and his wife, Nellie Cain. The society can be traced to a psychic development circle that the Cains, both Spiritualists, organized in their home. During these sessions, Nellie began to channel messages purported to be from the Great White Brotherhood, the group of advanced beings believed by Theosophists to guide the destiny of the human race. These messages were compiled and published in 1965 as Gems of Truth from the Masters. A copy was sent to Merta Mary Parkinson, head of the Sisters of the Amber. Parkinson's group was an early representative of the Universal Link, the original New Age organization headquartered in England. As a result a relationship developed between the Cains and British New Agers such as Libbie Pugh.

The Cains were introduced to the prediction that a momentous event would occur near Christmas Day 1967. The day came and went with nothing momentous having occurred. The Cains later explained to the disappointed Link members that the predictions had been fulfilled in a somewhat unexpected manner. They stated that during the years before 1967, human life had been tried and tested at every level. During the 1960s, a visible network of spiritual groups had been established through the Universal Link. The late 1960s was a time to shift the emphasis to the invisible work of spiritual practice, which would spread the spiritual energy in the world. They suggested a program termed the Nuclear Evolution Operation, through which the invisible spiritual light would be radiated to humanity.

Sources:

Cain, Nellie B. Exploring the Mysteries of Life. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Spiritual Research Society, 1972.

———. Gems of Truth from the Masters. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Spiritual Research Society, 1965.

Spiritual Review (Journal)

British monthly founded by J. J. Morse in 1900. It continued until May 1902, when Morse departed from England for an extensive lecture tour to Australia, New Zealand, and the United States.

Spiritual Science Mother Church

The Spiritual Science Mother Church grew out of an interest in Spiritualism developed by some Christian Scientists in the early twentieth century. It was organized in 1927 by Mother Julia O. Forrest, a former Christian Science practitioner who had become a Spiritualist, and Dr. Carl H. Pieres. They believed they were dealing scientifically with spiritual matters, and they felt comfortable with the organization of the Christian Science movement, which they used as a model. Forrest became the pastor of the Spiritual Science Mother Church, headquartered in New York, and head of the ecclesiastical council, which administered the church's affairs. She and Pieres also established a Spiritual Science Institute for training ministers.

Spiritual Science is specifically Christian in its belief and affirms a Trinity of God the Father and creator, the virgin-born

Son, and the Holy Spirit. Jesus is seen as the Lord, Master, and dispenser of the law of love. Humans have been given free agency and are traveling a spiritual path that includes many incarnations. Members of the church are expected to demonstrate spiritual realities in this life. Three principal demonstrations are emphasized: preaching, i.e., clairvoyant messages from God about what each member has to do; communications from other realms; and healing through the channeling of healing power. Members are expected to grow in their spiritual life, a process termed soul-unfoldment. Salvation eventually results as a cleansing process through intelligent prayer.

The Spiritual Science Mother Church was headquartered in New York City for many years and by the 1970s had some 40 affiliated congregations. It was headed at that time by Glenn Argoe, who had succeeded Forrest as pastor of the mother church. However, its present status is unknown.

The Spiritual Scientist (Journal)

Nineteenth-century American weekly founded in 1874 in Boston and edited by E. Gerry Brown.

Spiritual Telegraph (Periodical)

American Spiritualist weekly founded by S. B. Brittan and Charles Partridge and published in New York from 1852 to 1860. In 1860 it merged into the Herald of Progress, which Andrew Jackson Davis founded.

The Spiritual Times (Periodical)

British Spiritualist weekly published in London (1864–66) and edited by J. H. Powell and W. H. Harrison.

Spirituelles Addressbuch (Directory)

Annual publication in German giving comprehensive listings of mystical, spiritual, yoga, and New Age organizations all over Germany. Last known address: PARAM, Verlag Gunther Köch, Kurz Strasse 5, D-2161 Ahlerstedt 1, Germany.

Splitfoot

A facetious name for the Devil, who is traditionally depicted with hooves, sometimes expressed as “Old Splitfoot” or “Mr. Splitfoot.”

When the Fox Sisters first encountered the mysterious rappings at Hydesville, New York, that supposedly heralded the beginnings of Spiritualism, the youngest child Cathie reportedly said “Mr. Splitfoot, do as I do” and clapped her hands; the raps immediately repeated her clapping. At first, Cathie thought somebody was tricking her, since it was the day before April Fools’ Day.

Spodomancy

Divination by means of the cinders from sacrificial fires.

Spokesman (Newsletter)

Former monthly publication of the Universal Christ Church, headquartered in Los Angeles, California. It included inspirational messages, advice to readers, and a directory of affiliated churches.

Spontaneous Human Combustion

The idea that human beings can, quite apart from any outside stimulus, be consumed from an internal heat source so intense as to consume even the bones, but leave the immediate environment relatively unburned, has been a subject of controversy since the nineteenth century. Incidents had been reported since the fifteenth century and became the subject of both public and medical controversy in the 1850s following the use of spontaneous combustion as a means of disposing of a character by popular writer Charles Dickens in his novel Bleak House. During the twentieth century, with the continued if sporadic reports of burned bodies, the controversy has been pressed by writers on fortan anomalous phenomena. In a 1992 book on the subject, Jenny Randles and Peter Hough tracked some 85 cases that had occurred since 1850.

Though some incidents appear to be cases of spontaneous combustion in the ancient literature, the modern string of cases begins with the death of the Italian knight Polonus in 1470. A century and a half later, John Hillard tried to bring the issue before the public in his pamphlet Fire from Heaven (1613). The death of Nicole Millet, the wife of an innkeeper in Rheims, France, on February 20, 1725, led to the first court inquiry and ruling. In the middle of the night, Jean Millet awoke smelling fire. He awakened the inn’s guests and together they found Nicole’s body in the kitchen. All except her skull, a few vertebrae, and her lower extremities had been consumed. Wooden objects close by were untouched. Millet was tried and found guilty of murder, but on appeal the conviction was reversed based on the testimony of a physician who had been staying at the inn that night who concluded that Mme. Millet’s death was due to a “visitation of God,” that is, an unknown cause. The fact that Mme. Millet had consumed a significant amount of alcohol was seen as possibly causing the fire to start and contributing to its disastrous results. Ever since, alcohol consumption has been associated with the phenomenon.

The first American case of spontaneous combustion was that of Hannah Bradshaw in New York City in 1770; however, the most heralded case has been that of Mary Reeser, a widow residing in St. Petersburg, Florida. Her body was discovered on the morning of July 2, 1951, after her landlady’s hand found the doorknob too hot to grasp. She and two men called to assist an entry found Reeser’s body, the chair she had been sitting in, and a side table burned, along with a six-foot circle of carpet. The remainder of the room, including a pile of newspapers just outside the circle, remained unaffected. The Reeser case illustrated the essential problem raised by human combustion cases. As those in charge of crematoriums are quite aware, it takes a very high temperature applied over a period of time to consume the human body, especially the bones. Under normal conditions, such a concentration of heat would cause considerable damage in the immediate surrounding area.

In the last two centuries a variety of explanations for spontaneous human combustion have been offered, ranging from the scientific to the paranormal. Some have tied it to leys, magnetic irregularities in the Earth, and UFOs. Writing in 1995, Larry Arnold, currently the leading proponent of a paranormal explanation for the phenomenon, was not the first to suggest that the image on the Turin Shroud might have been caused by spontaneous human combustion.

Vincent Gaddis, known for his broad study of anomalous phenomena, suggested a tie to depression and even suicide. Possibly the same forces which, when directed outwardly, produce suicide, might when projected inwardly lead to the burning of the body.

Edinburgh University scientist Dougal Drysdale suggested what he termed a candle-wick theory, noting that the body, which contains a considerable amount of fat, could burn like a candle with great local intensity. This theory is favored by the major spokespersons of the skeptical community, especially Joe Nickell and John F. Fischer, as a part of their crusade to remove any paranormal explanations from anomalous phenomena. While this theory accounts for the consumption of body fats and the body’s high water content, its flaw remains in the extremely high temperatures needed even to begin to consume bone material.

Spontaneous human combustion remains a rare phenomenon, and even among those most prone to adopt occult interpretations, few have followed that lead. Several fortune-tellers have suggested that like the Bermuda Triangle, it may be a constructed problem that brings together cases that are only superficially related. Most have accepted the more telling incidents as unexplained, but view it as a natural mystery whose solving has been delayed due to the paucity of cases, the high level of diversity among cases studied, and the limitations imposed on experimenting on human subjects.

Sources:

Arnold, Larry E. Ablaze! The Mysterious Fires of Spontaneous Human Combustion. New York: M. Evans and Co., 1995.

Harrison, Michael. Fire from Heaven: A Study of Spontaneous Combustion in Human Beings. London: Sidgwick and Jackson, 1976.

Nickell, Joe, and John F. Fischer. Mysterious Realms. Amherst N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1992.

———. Secrets of the Supernatural. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1988.

Randles, Jenn, and Peter A. Hough. Spontaneous Human Combustion. London: Robert Hale, 1992.

Wilson, Damon. Spontaneous Combustion: Amazing True Stories of Mysterious Fires. Sydney: The Book Co., 1997.

Spontaneous Phenomena

Unexpected experiences of extrasensory perception (ESP), psychokinesis (PK), or other paranormal phenomena in everyday life.

The Spotlight (Magazine)

Published by the Lyceum section of the National Spiritualist Association of Churches and directed toward young people. It is published ten times a year and includes poetry, stories, cartoons, along with spiritual lessons. It is published from 1418 Hall SE, Grand Rapids, MI 49506-3960. Website: <http://www.nsa.org/>.

Sources:

NSAC Lyceum Spotlight. <http://www.nsa.org/>. March 8, 2000.

SPR See Society for Psychological Research

Sprengel, Anna (ca. 1888)

The mythical Rosicrucian adept and member of the German occult society Die Goldene Dämmerung who is supposed to have given permission to Rosicrucian William Westcott to found the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn. Westcott claimed to have found Sprengel's name and address on a sheet of paper inserted in the pages of a mysterious cipher manuscript bought from a bookstall on Farringdon Road, London, in 1887.

Correspondence exists between Westcott and Sprengel relating to the Golden Dawn, but its authenticity has been questioned, and the cipher manuscript is believed to be a forgery that nevertheless launched an occult society.

Sources:

Howe, Ellic. The Magicians of the Golden Dawn. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1972.

King, Francis. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Sprenger, Jakob (1436–1495)

Dominican inquisitor of Cologne, Germany, generally associated with Heinrich Kramer author of Malleus Maleficarum, a sourcebook directing the witchcraft persecutions in Europe. Sprenger was born in Basel, Switzerland, and became a novice in a Dominican house. He rapidly rose to a responsible position, and in 1468 the Dominican General Chapter ordered him to lecture at the University of Cologne on the sentences of Peter Lombard. He soon became master of theology at the university and was elected prior and regent of studies of the Cologne convent. On June 30, 1480, he was elected dean of the faculty of theology at Cologne University, and a year later he became an inquisitor for the provinces of Mainz, Trèves, and Cologne and traveled extensively throughout these provinces. In 1488, he was elected provincial of the whole German province.

His earlier writings included: The Paradoxes of John of Westphalia Refuted (1479) and The Institution and Approbation of the Confraternity of the Most Holy Rosary, which was first erected at Cologne on 8 September in the year 1475 (1475). This latter work recorded his activities for the Confraternity of the Most Holy Rosary, which brought him praise from leading Dominicans as an apostle of the rosary.

In 1484, at the time the pope released the Inquisition to deal with witchcraft, now redefined as Satanism, Sprenger became involved with Heinrich Kramer in trying alleged witches and sorcerers. In the following year, Kramer prepared a treatise on witchcraft (later published as the Malleus Maleficarum) that circulated in manuscript. Sprenger then added his name to the finished work, first published in 1486. Malleus Maleficarum embodied the new direction in the church's consideration of witches. It became the authoritative manual for inquisitors, judges, and magistrates in dealing with accusations of witchcraft, which multiplied over the next several centuries. Interestingly, the Reformation of the sixteenth century did not slow these accusations, as witchcraft was accepted by Protestants as thoroughly as by Roman Catholics. The book went into some thirty editions between 1486 and 1669, and it was published in French, Italian, and English editions, as well as in German.

Sprenger died December 6, 1495, at Strassbourg, where he was buried.

Spriggs, George (1850–1912)

British materialization medium. The first records of his phenomena date from 1877 to 1879. Having discovered his psychic gifts, he became a nonprofessional medium and conducted séances for The Circle of Light in Cardiff, Wales. He had two Indian controls: "Swiftwater" and "Shiwaukee," who was "captured" from the medium Mary J. Hollis (also known as Mrs. Billings), with whom Spriggs sat in London.

The unique feature of Spriggs' séances was supposedly that the phantoms that appeared moved at a distance from the medium, walked about the house, went out into the garden in evening light (on one occasion three phantoms did this simultaneously), and sometimes changed into the form of somebody else. These visitors were seen by next-door neighbors, who threatened to call the police for "dealings with the devil."

In November 1880, Spriggs went to Melbourne, Australia. Similar phenomena were reported there: spirits who held out heavy objects, drank water, ate biscuits, and wrote letters to former sitters. After six years, the materializations ceased, but other phenomena remained. Spriggs gave direct voice sittings and clairvoyant diagnosis and treatment of diseases.

In 1900, he returned to England, and from 1903 until 1905 he gave free medical advice in the rooms of the London Spiritualist Alliance. The Psycho-Therapeutic Society was largely formed through his efforts. For years he diagnosed diseases for the society without charge.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Denovan, W. C. D. The Evidences of Spiritualism. Melbourne, 1882.

Springheeled Jack

Legendary nineteenth-century British creature who supposedly harassed travelers and terrified women with his giant leaps, vicious behavior, and diabolical appearance. As the legend goes, he successfully eluded capture for many years, evading police and the army, and mocking them with his daring leaps and wild eerie laughter.

Reportedly, he was a large man in a black cloak, and when the cloak was thrown aside, blue and white flames shot from his mouth and his eyes appeared like balls of fire. His hands appeared to be metallic claws, with which he slashed at people or tore their clothing. He was able to leap across high walls and hedges with ease. Sometimes he even knocked or rang at front doors, using his athletic ability to escape after terrifying the occupant of the house. The first report survives from September 1837. A press account from 1838, quoted in Peter Haining's The Legend and Bizarre Crimes of Springheeled Jack (1977), notes a typical incidence:

"She returned into the house and brought a candle and handed it to the person, who appeared enveloped in a large cloak, and whom she at first really believed to be a policeman. The instant she had done so, however, he threw off his outer garment, and applying the lighted candle to his breast, presented a more hideous and frightful appearance, and vomited forth a quantity of blue and white flame from his mouth, and his eyes resembled red balls of fire.

"From the hasty glance which her fright enabled her to get at his person, she observed that he wore a large helmet, and his dress, which appeared to fit him very tight, seemed to her to resemble white oilskin. Without uttering a sentence he darted at her, and catching her partly by the dress and the back part of her neck, placed her head under one of his arms, and commenced tearing her gown with his claws, which she was certain were of some metallic substance.

"She screamed out as loud as she could for assistance, and by considerable exertion got away from him and ran towards the house to get in. Her assailant, however, followed her, and caught her on the steps leading to the hall-door, where he again used considerable violence, tore her neck and arms with his claws, as well as a quantity of hair from her head; but she was at length rescued from his grasp by one of her sisters."

Springheeled Jack is reported to have terrorized many people in London and the provinces with his appearances in 1843, 1845, and sporadically until 1877. He appeared again in 1904. He popped up again in 1953 in Houston, Texas, where his appearance was linked to a UFO sighting.

Some have suggested that the original Springheeled Jack was the eccentric Marquis of Waterford, Henry de la Poer Beresford, who was also Baron Tyrone of Haverfordwest (1811–1859). According to the Reverend Brewer in The Reader's Handbook (1899; reprinted Gale Research, 1966):

"The Marquis of Waterford in the early parts of the nineteenth century used to amuse himself by springing on travellers unawares, to terrify them; and from time to time others have followed his silly example. Even so late as 1877–78, an officer in her majesty's service caused much excitement, in the garrisons stationed at Aldershot, Colchester, and elsewhere, by his 'spring-heel' pranks. In Chichester and its neighbourhood the tales told of this adventurer caused quite a little panic, and many nervous people were afraid to venture out after sunset, for fear of being 'sprung' upon. I myself investigated some of the cases reported to me."

The Marquis of Waterford was known to have been responsible for a number of somewhat sadistic pranks, particularly involving offensive behavior to women. But there is no firm evidence that he devised special boots fitted with steel springs or a phosphorescent mask with provision for emitting flames or smoke (as reported by victims and onlookers).

He was, however, reported as having protuberant eyes and also a peculiar ringing laugh. Moreover, a servant gave an account of an encounter with the sinister cloaked figure with fiery eyes and claw-like hands and spoke of an ornate crest on the cloak, with the initial "W" in gold filigree.

If the original Springheeled Jack was the Marquis of Waterford, he outgrew this behavior when he met and married Louisa Stuart in 1842. The Marquis seems to have been benevolent towards the tenants on his Irish estates and like many noblemen of the period spent a good deal of time in sport and hunting. He died while hunting; his horse stumbled and threw him, dislocating his neck.

Springheeled Jack has been considered a supernatural or paranormal being by many people. In her book Stand and Deliver (1928), historian Elizabeth Villiers commented:

"A thousand tales were afloat and all lost nothing in the telling. Plenty of people definitely swore they had seen him leap right over the roofs of large houses, the cottages and hayricks were as nothing to him, the mail coaches and post chaises and family barouches were taken in his stride. Then, rather unaccountably, public opinion veered from thinking him a new form of highwayman and declared he was an inventor experimenting with a form of flying machine, while others maintained he was not flesh and blood but a haunting spirit."

After the death of the Marquis of Waterford, reports of Springheeled Jack continued, generated either through legend or a succession of imitators, which led to him being the central character of plays, "penny-dreadful" comic books, and popular thrillers. As late as 1945, a British movie was made about Springheeled Jack titled The Curse of the Wraydons, starring actor Tod Slaughter.

The suggestion that Springheeled Jack might have been a creature from outer space was made in an article in Flying Saucer Review (May–June, 1961) by J. Vyner. It cited twentieth-century reports from the United States.

An earlier suggestion was made that Springheeled Jack might have been a kangaroo that had escaped from captivity. The numerous reports of a creature breathing flames, molesting women, and laughing eerily indicated characteristics beyond the capacity of a kangaroo.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Haining, Peter. The Legend and Bizarre Crimes of Springheeled Jack. London: Frederick Muller, 1977.

Keel, John A. Strange Creatures from Time and Space. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1970. Reprint: London: Neville Spearman, 1975.

Vyner, J. "The Mystery of Springheel Jack." Flying Saucer Review (May–June, 1961).

Sprinkle, Ronald Leo (1930–)

R. Leo Sprinkle, psychologist and researcher of UFO contactee experiences, was born on August 31, 1930, in Rocky Ford, Colorado. He received his bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Colorado and in 1961 completed his doctorate in counseling psychology at the University of Missouri. After three years in the administrative department at the University of North Dakota, he moved to the University of Wyoming, where he remained until his retirement in 1989.

Sprinkle has traced his interest in UFOs to a sighting he had in 1949. He and his wife also had a sighting in 1956. During the years immediately following the completion of his formal education, he conducted several studies, including an early survey of the members of the National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena and an initial study of people who had experienced extraterrestrial encounters, both contactees and abductees. He served as a psychological consultant for the Condon Report (1969) on UFOs, which led to further work on several abduction cases through the 1970s.

Sprinkle is best known, however, for the annual conferences he has organized for UFO contactees each summer since in 1980. For a number of years, Sprinkle had corresponded with people who had claimed friendly contact with the entities who drove the flying saucers. Unlike most ufologists, he had not dismissed them; in contrast, he had responded to them sympathetically. The conferences, sponsored by the Institute for UFO Contactee Studies, brought contactees to the university and provided an open forum for them to tell their stories in a non-judgmental environment. As the number of abduction reports increased in the late 1980s, abductees were welcomed to the summer conferences and it was in these conferences that the sharp distinction between the two groups began to disappear.

Eventually, Sprinkle identified himself as a contactee. He also concluded that UFO activity was part of a larger program of what he termed “cosmic consciousness conditioning.” The UFO entities, whether one thinks of them as being from outer space or another dimension, are attempting to move humanity into an understanding of themselves as cosmic citizens.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. “Psychologist-Researcher Dr. R. Leo Sprinkle; Exclusive UFO Report Interview.” UFO Report 3, no. 2 (June 1976): 30–32, 72–76, 78.

Parnell, June O., and R. Leo Sprinkle. “Personality Characteristics of Persons Who Claim UFO Experiences.” Journal of UFO Studies 2 [new series, 1990]: 45–58.

Sprinkle, R. Leo. “The Significance of UFO Experiences.” In David Pursglove, ed. Zen in the Art of Close Encounter. Berkeley, Calif.: New Being Project, 1995.

———, ed. Proceedings of the Rocky Mountain Conference on UFO Investigation. Laramie: School of Extended Studies, 1980.

The Spunkie

A goblin similar to the Scottish kelpie. He was popularly believed to be an agent of Satan, and travelers who had lost their way were his special prey. Supposedly, he attracted his victim by means of a light, that looked like a reflection on a window not far away, but as the victim proceeded toward the light, it receded. However, the victim still followed the gleam until the spunkie lured him over a precipice or into a morass.

Sources:

Arrowsmith, Nancy, and George Moose. A Field Guide to the Little People. New York: Wallaby, 1977.

Squinting

A popular superstition that a squint was a bad omen. It was said that if you met a squint-eyed person, you should spit three times, to avert bad fortune. The superstition is an old one, and it was referred to in the treatise on Fascination (de Fascino) published in 1589 by Vairus, prior to the Benedictine Convent of St. Sophia in Benevento, Italy. In this work he stated “Let no servant ever hire himself to a squinting master.”

Squire, J. R. M. (ca. 1860)

American medium and editor of the Spiritualist weekly Banner of Light, who visited England in 1859. He was introduced into society under the auspices of the medium D. D. Home, with whom he frequently held joint sittings. In the same year, the American minister presented Squire at court.

Lockhart Robertson described in the Spiritual Magazine (1860) some displays of psychic force in his sitting with Squire. Reportedly, a heavy circular table was tossed in the air and thrown on the bed when the medium placed his left hand on the surface; his other hand was held and his legs were tied to the chair on which he sat. Afterward, the table was twice lifted onto the head of Robertson and the medium.

SRI International

Contract research firm conducting advanced research in physics, electronics, bioengineering, and parapsychology. Originally affiliated with Stanford University, it became an independent organization in 1970. Some parapsychological research was conducted at SRI by Harold E. Puthoff and Russell Targ from 1973 through the end of the decade concerning psychics Uri Geller and Ingo Swann. Address: 333 Ravenswood Ave., Menlo Park, CA 94025-3493. Website: <http://www.sri.com>.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

SRI International Home Page. <http://www.sri.com/>. April 14, 2000.

Targ, Russell, and Harold E. Puthoff. Mind Reach: Scientists Look at Psychical Research. New York: Delacorte Press, 1977.

SRU

The SRU, formerly the Synchronicity Research Unit, is a foundation founded in the Netherlands by Jeff C. Jacobs, a Dutch engineer and statistician. He brought together a team of researchers that included Scottish parapsychologist Brian Miller, who now resides in the Netherlands, to pursue theoretical speculation on the basis of psychic phenomena and to carry out a directed program of research. During the decade of its existence, research has focused on psi-guided awakenings from sleep and theoretical speculation on the problem of the possible influence of the observer on psychic events (a particular interest of Miller's). With the cutback of research at the University of Utrecht, the SRU has emerged as one of the most productive centers of Dutch psychical research. It may be contacted at P.O. Box 7625, 5601 JP Eindhoven, The Netherlands.

Stafford-Clark, David (1916–)

British consulting physician and authority on psychiatry with interests in parapsychology. He was born March 17, 1916, in Bromley, Kent, England and studied at Guy's Hospital, London, and the University of London (M.D.).

Stafford-Clark was a consulting physician at the Department of Psychological Medicine, Guy's Hospital (1950–74), Bethlem Royal and Maudsley Hospitals, and the Institute of Psychiatry from 1954. He was a member of the Archbishop of Canterbury's Commission of Divine Healing, and attended the Conferences on Parapsychology and Pharmacology in July 1959 at St. Paul de Vence, France. Stafford-Clark has authored a number of books, though none on parapsychology.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Stanford, Rex G(ale) (1938–)

Stanford was born June 21, 1938, in Robstown, Texas, and received both his B.A. (1963) and Ph.D. (1967) in psychology from the University of Texas at Austin. He received Summer

Research Fellowships from the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University in 1964, 1965, and 1966. He was a research associate at the Division of Parapsychology, Department of Psychiatry, University of Virginia School of Medicine (1968–75). From 1976 through 1980, he directed the center for Parapsychological Research, the research division of the former nonprofit corporation, and the Association for the Understanding of Man (led by his brother, psychic Ray Stanford). Stanford then joined the faculty in psychology at St. John's University, Jamaica, New York, where he currently teaches.

Stanford is especially interested in the development and experimental testing of models for spontaneous psi, the factors involved in extrasensory perception (ESP) response, and the basic nature of psi events. He was vice-president (1970–71) and then president (1973) of the Parapsychological Association. He also served on the Publication Committee of the American Society for Psychical Research. He was a participant in the symposium "Parapsychology (Psi) Processes; Towards a Conceptual Integration" held at the annual convention of the American Psychological Association, Montreal, August 27–31, 1973. Stanford is the author on numerous papers on parapsychological topics.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Stanford, Rex G. "Case Studies, Folklore and Personal Experiences of Investigators: Their Role in Experimental Research." In Spontaneous Psi, Depth Psychology and Parapsychology, edited by Betty Shapin and Lisette Coly. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1992.

———. "Scientific, Ethical and Clinical Problems in the 'Training' of Psi Ability." In Research in Parapsychology 1976, edited by William G. Roll and R. L. Morris. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1977.

———. "A Study of the Cause of Low Run-Score Variance." Journal of Parapsychology 30 (1966).

Stanford Research Institute See SRI International

Stanislawa P. (ca. 1930)

Polish medium, wife of a Polish officer, and subject of psychical experiments by Baron Schrenck-Notzing for research materialization. At the age of eighteen, Stanislaw believed she saw the phantom of a friend, Sophie M., at the exact time she died. Soon afterward spontaneous telekinesis phenomena developed. After Stanislaw joined a Spiritualist circle, "Sophie M." began to materialize through her and "Sophie" became the medium's permanent attendant, occasionally sharing control with "Adalbert" and a young Polish boy.

In 1911, P. Lebedzinski, a Polish engineer, began a series of experimental séances that lasted intermittently until 1916. His report, published in the Revue Métapsychique (1921, no. 4) was favorable. Schrenck-Notzing's experiments began in 1913. After a few months, Stanislaw's mediumship lapsed and did not return until 1915. In 1906, when Schrenck-Notzing recommended his séance observations, he became assured that Stanislaw produced flows of ectoplasm. Schrenck-Notzing took many photographs.

In 1930, her reputation, based on the early favorable reports, suffered a blow. Stanislaw appeared at the Institut Métapsychique shortly after a special automatic registering apparatus for phenomena produced in the dark was installed. She produced nearly blank séances until assured that no registering apparatus would remain in the room.

Eugene Osty suspected that the abortive phenomena noticed in séance was brought about by Stanislaw's secretly freed hand. He decided to attempt to catch her in the act. During a later séance, when Osty heard the objects on the table move, he exploded a secret flashlight and took three stereoscopic photographs. Both the sudden light and the developed photographs showed that Stanislaw's hand was free and manipulating the table.

Osty concluded in the Revue Métapsychique (Nov.–Dec. 1930): 1) Stanislaw played a joke on the Institute; 2) her fraud was persevering and organized; 3) her procedure consisted of giving the illusion of being restrained while she temporarily disengaged one of her hands from the restraints; and 4) used this procedure to displace objects and show luminous movements. Osty, however, hastened to add that his findings made no attempt to judge the phenomena of Stanislaw that were produced elsewhere.

Stapleton, Ruth Carter (1929–1983)

Evangelist, healer, and sister of U.S. president Jimmy Carter. She was born August 7, 1929, in Plains, Georgia. After two years of the Georgia State College for Women, she married Robert Stapleton, a veterinarian, and they settled in North Carolina. She became the mother of four children.

Her career as a healer dates from her own recovery from periods of deep depression. She combined attendance at group therapy sessions with an interdenominational retreat at a North Carolina hotel and "experienced God as a God of love." Some three months later she attended a second retreat and came in contact with Pentecostalism. She received the baptism of the Holy Spirit in a Pentecostal meeting and experienced its definitive manifestation, speaking in tongues.

She subsequently developed her own kind of healing technique, which might be described as a spiritually-based psychotherapy. She combined prayer with a probing of the unhappy memories of the individuals who sought her help. She taught them to recreate painful past experiences in a "guided day-dream" in which the figure of Jesus is introduced to neutralize emotional difficulties by love and forgiveness.

In her book The Gift of Inner Healing (1976), she describes her work over nine years with various Christian groups. She preached and prayed for Roman Catholics as well as Protestants at her spiritual workshops in over 70 American cities and abroad in Indonesia, Malaysia, Japan, and Britain. She rejected the label of "faith healer," since she claimed God is the healer, but was also involved in more traditional healing of physical ailments by means of prayer.

In 1977, Stapleton hit the headlines when she was instrumental in bringing religious conviction to Larry C. Flynt, editor of the pornographic Hustler magazine. On February 8, 1977, Flynt was found guilty of engaging in organized crime and pandering to obscenity. CBS News producer Joe Wershba introduced Flynt to Stapleton, and after a discussion on religion and sexual repression, Flynt claims a religious conversion was set in motion. According to his own account, Flynt discovered God at 40,000 feet while on a flight from Denver to Houston.

Subsequently, both Stapleton and Flynt appeared together on the Today program on November 23, 1977, when Flynt publicly acknowledged that God had entered his life and that henceforth his magazine would introduce a religious element. Hustler would be transformed into a religious magazine, and Flynt's multimillion-dollar empire would be turned into a nonprofit religious foundation. At a Pentecostal congregation in Houston, Flynt stated: "I owe every woman in America an apology." Flynt did not carry through, and Hustler remains a pornographic publication.

Stapleton was plunged into the spotlight by the election of her brother to the presidency in 1976. Through those years she wrote three more books and continued an active life of traveling and speaking. Then in 1983 she discovered that she had cancer, but refused standard medical treatment, turning instead to a macrobiotic diet, meditation, and reliance on God's healing power. She died September 26, 1983, at Fayetteville, North Carolina.

Sources:

Stapleton, Ruth Carter. The Experience of Inner Healing. Waco, Tex.: Word Books, 1977.

———. The Gift of Inner Healing. Waco, Tex.: Word Books, 1976.

———. In His Footsteps. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1979.

Star, Ely

Pseudonym of Eugène Jacob (1847–1942), French astrologer and medical charlatan. He was a member of the Athoor (or Athoor) Temple of the Golden Dawn. He was prosecuted and sentenced for fraud in 1914.

Star-Esseenia Temple of Ascension Mastery

The Star-Esseenia Temple of Ascension Mastery is a channeling group that grew out of the intense experience of former Reiki healer August Stahr during the 1991 solar eclipse. She has described the experience as a walk-in type experience, but one in which her own higher energy self was the entity that stepped in. At that time she was also told to abandon the Reiki and the related Seichem healing systems, as she would soon be bringing in a new set of fifth-dimensional energies that would be needed to assist in the coming ascension of the individuals on the planet. Since that time, Stahr has functioned as a healer, a channel, and Quadrant Commander of the Star Esseenia Division. She concentrates her efforts in the training of people to use these healing modalities in the effort to facilitate planetary ascension. In that effort she has discovered a number of new higher healing energies which she has named and to which she offers attunement.

Stahr has also seen herself as operating in the program developed by Solara of Starborne Unlimited around the symbol of 11:11. According to Stahr, 11:11 triggers a precoded response in humans indicating the time of completion or ascension. On January 11, 1992, Solara opened the 11:11 doorway that will remain open until December 31, 2011. The doorway includes 11 gates and levels of consciousness. The journey through the levels of consciousness will move us from the present ways of living in duality to the new way of living as ascended beings.

It is believed that at 11 moments during the period between 1992 and 2011, those on the ascension pathway will collectively experience a common issue (or set of related issues). These issues have been released for the purpose of clearing (removing them). Thus in 1992, at the first gate, financial survival issues were released. Once cleared by a realignment to God, the individual can move on to abundance. The second issues, concerning personal relationships, were released in the summer of 1993. In clearing them, everything not related to Divine Love must be abandoned. The third set of issues relates to the sense of personal power. Stahr has indicated the projected course of issue releasement through the time of the closing of the gate.

As each set of issues has been released, Stahr has developed healing modalities for dealing with them. In 1995, she also initiated the Star Team Mastery Program that would allow people to do their own clearing for ascension with her as the guide, rather than relying on Stahr alone to be their healer/facilitator for the cleansing process. Those who align with the program are initially linked up with a Star Team, a group of spirit beings specially trained for the healing needs of the ascension process. This linkup occurs in private sessions with Stahr over a year; individuals are trained to work with the Star Team and are attuned to the new healing energies with which she has come into contact since 1991. Those who complete the program and begin to work with the Star-Esseenia Technologies constitute the Star-Esseenia Temple.

Stahr has authored a number of self-published books that are used by Star-Esseenia members, including Reality Maintenance 101 (1993), Implants and Imprints: A Healer's View of Ascension Clearing (1996), Spiritual Discernment, Volume One: Sananda's Heart Initiation (1996), and Daily Ascension (1996). The Star-Esseenia Temple of Ascension Mastery is headquartered at 10064 Oglethorpe Way, Elk Grove, CA 95758. It may be contacted through its website at <http://www.star-esseenia.org/>.

Sources:

Star-Esseenia Temple of Ascension Mastery. <http://www.star-esseenia.org/>. February 28, 2000.

Stargate

Stargate is a name Americans came to know in the 1990s, first as the name of a television series concerning a doorway that allowed instantaneous travel between planets in different star systems. Then in 1995, the U.S. government announced that it had been carrying on secret parapsychological research, the last phase of which had been given the name Project STAR GATE. Not as well-known, in 1991 Mark Roberts (1934–), an independent spiritual searcher, found what he had termed the real Stargate, an ancient painting of the constellation Pleiades located at the entrance to a cave. He believes the painting to be a presentation of a cosmic-portal. The painting seems to connect decades of studies in archeology of Egypt, an ancient alphabet (Ogham), and ancient symbols of the Pleiades. The portal seems to point toward ancient visitors to Earth. The real Stargate provides a mental doorway to step into a new consciousness where massive amounts of materials may be connected, mysteries of the ancient past solved, and contact with extraterrestrials established.

Roberts grew up in Oklahoma during the Dust Bowl era. He had several experiences, which he now interprets as extraterrestrial contacts, but then interpreted as a call to the ministry. After two years as a Methodist minister, he left to become an archeologist. His life traveling the world on archeological digs allowed him to pursue his search for what he had come to see as the spirituality he believed lay behind and contrasted with the religious establishment.

He also was able to study with Arch Druid Thomas Maughn and Margaret Lumley Brown, an associate of Dion Fortune, founder of the Fraternity of the Inner Light. In the early 1970s he was led to Dianic Wicca, that form of contemporary Witchcraft that most emphasized feminism. He also changed occupation within television. Over the next quarter of a century, he moved from cameraman to stage manager to director in television programming.

Since his discovery of the Stargate, and the announcement of it at a meeting of the Mutual UFO Network in 1992, Roberts has invited others to share the Quest, especially those drawn by the keys and symbols pictured on the Stargate. From the contemplation of the Stargate, research during the 1990s reached a set of conclusions that now serves as a base for future development. Roberts believes that Earth has been visited many times, from the distant past to the present, by visitors from the Pleiades and Sirius. The set of actual artifacts denoting Sirius and the Pleiades tie together the archeology of the ancient world with the extraterrestrial presence. That presence had a primarily positive effect. The extraterrestrials made judgments about human behavior and offered positive guidelines for human evolution.

Roberts also believes that the crop circles reported around the world in the 1990s are related to extraterrestrials.

The Stargate project can be contacted through the Stargate Internet site at <http://home.earthlink.net/~pleiades/>.

Sources:

Roberts, Mark. An Introduction to Dianic Witchcraft. Dallas, Tex.: The Mother Grove, n.d.

Stargate. <http://home.earthlink.net/~pleiades/>. April 19, 2000.

Starhawk

Starhawk is the public name of Wiccan priestess Miriam Simos. She is an international spokesperson for neo-paganism, feminist concerns, and social activism. Through the 1970s she studied magic and witchcraft with a succession of prominent teachers, including Sara Cunningham of the Temple of Tip-erath, Victor H. Anderson (founder of the Faery tradition), and Zsuzsanna E. Budapest.

In the mid-1970s she founded the Compost Coven and was one of the original signers of the Covenant of the Goddess (COG), serving as COG's first officer in 1976–77. She cofounded Reclaiming: A Center for Feminist Spirituality and Counseling in Berkeley, California, for which she served as a director, teacher, and counselor.

In 1979 Starhawk wrote the first of her three books, The Spiral Dance, a textbook on witchcraft that became one of the most popular introductions to Wicca in the 1980s. In the wake of the book's success, Starhawk lectured extensively in both America and Europe. She followed it with Dreaming in the Dark (1982) and Truth or Dare (1987). During the late 1980s Starhawk figured in the conflict between Catholic priest Matthew Fox and the Roman Catholic Church. Among many complaints, church officials objected to Fox using Starhawk as a faculty member at his Institute in Culture and Creation Spirituality at Holy Names College in Oakland, California. Most recently Fox has left the Roman Catholic Church.

Sources:

Starhawk. Dreaming in the Dark. Boston: Beacon Press, 1982.

———. The Spiral Dance. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1979.

———. Truth or Dare: Encounters of Power, Authority, Mystery. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987.

Statues, Moving

The belief that images of gods, goddesses, and saints might become imbued with divine force and acquire movement is an ancient one, and such miracles have been reported of both Christian and non-Christian images. In the 1980s, the belief was revived in Ireland, where a statue of the Virgin Mary at Ballin-spittle, County Cork, attracted nationwide interest after claims by many witnesses that they had seen it move.

Moving Statues in Ancient History

Many reports of miraculous statues in pagan times were undoubtedly fraudulent, just as there are known cases of moving statue hoaxes in modern times. It is well known that ancient peoples constructed lifelike images of their gods and goddesses.

Plato and Aristotle stated that the Greek Daedalus was said to have made statues that not only walked but also needed to be tethered at night to prevent them from walking away. Aristotle described a wooden statue of Venus that moved as a result of quicksilver being poured into the interior. Pliny reported that the architect Timochares began using loadstone (magnetized ore) to construct the vaulting in the temple of Arsinoë at Alexandria, to suspended in midair an iron statue inside. Such a levitating statue would have been a great wonder if the plan had succeeded. Procopius described a complex clock that the engineers for the ancient Romans were responsible for having figures of gods and heroes that moved on the hour.

Lucian related how a certain Alexander caused a statue of Aesculapius to speak by using the gullet of a crane to transmit a voice through the mouth of the statue. In the fourth century, Bishop Theophilus described statues at Alexandria that he broke open and discovered to be hollow; they were placed against a wall in such a position that priests could slip behind them and speak.

It was believed that in ancient Egypt there were numerous statues of gods, said to deliver oracles. The Pyramider Asclepius (attributed to Hermes Trismegistus) asserted the Egyptians “knew how to make gods,” i.e., to install deities, angels, or demons in statues, with the power to do good or evil. Although such statues have not survived, it seems probable that they were animated by priests. The archaeologist Gaston Maspéro (1846–1916) stated (Journal des Debats, December 21, 1898):

“There were thus obtained genuine terrestrial gods, exact counterparts of the celestial gods, and, as their ambassadors here below, capable of protecting, punishing and instructing men, of sending them dreams and delivering oracles.

“When these idols were addressed, they replied either by gesture or by voice. They would speak and utter the right verdict on any particular questions. They moved their arms and shook their heads to an invariable rhythm. . . . And as they assuredly did nothing of all this by themselves, someone had to do it for them. Indeed, there were priests in the temples whose business it was to attend to these things. Their functions, being anything but secret, were carried out openly, in the sight and to the knowledge of all. They had their appointed places in ceremonies, in processions and the sacerdotal hierarchy; each individual knew that they were the voice or the hand of the god, and that they pulled the string to set his head wagging at the right moment. Consequently this was not one of those pious frauds which the moderns always suspect in like circumstances; no one was ignorant that the divine consultation was brought about by this purely human agency.

“Things being so, one wonders how not only the people but the kings, nobles, and scribes could have confidence in advice thus proffered. . . . The testimony afforded by monuments compels us to acknowledge that it was taken seriously until paganism died a natural death, and that all who played any part in it did so with the utmost respect. They had been brought up from childhood to believe that divine souls animated the statues, to approach these living statues only in the most respectful dread and awe. . . . Their mental attitude was that of the modern-day priest who ascends the altar. No sooner has he donned the sacerdotal garb and repeated the first few sacramental words than he no longer belongs to himself but to the sacrifice he is about to consummate; he knows that at this voice and gesture the elements will change into precious blood and flesh, and he continues unperturbed the work which he is certain he can accomplish.”

Such a reverential attitude to manipulating statues, if true, offers an alternative theory to views of either miracle or fraud. Similarly, in some societies, shamans may invoke divine inspiration by initial trickery, acting out a miraculous situation by conjuring tricks as a preliminary to creating the emotional atmosphere in which heightened consciousness and genuine phenomena may arise.

However, there are also many claims in both ancient and modern times that statues have actually moved independently of humans. In some cases, rival religions did not deny the miracles but asserted that they were demonic, not divine. In analyzing a passage from Hermes Trismegistus concerned with “statues animated by divine association, which do great things, foretell the future and heal diseases,” St. Augustine did not dispute the claims, but commented that “this art of binding genii to statues is an ungodly art . . . Instead of serving men, these would-be gods can do nothing, except as devils” (Civitas Dei, book 8, chapters 23, 24). The Synod of Laodicea defined idolatry as “the art of invoking demons and incorporating them in statues.”

Moving Statues in Modern History

Throughout history, moving statues have tended to be reported at times of civil, political, or religious crisis, in which a breakdown of morale or the imminence of national disaster seemed beyond human aid, inviting divine intervention. In 1524, Italy was overrun by French armies and coping with floods, famine, and plague. During this time, when Rome itself seemed threatened, a statue of the Virgin Mary at Brescia was reported to open and close its eyes and to move its hands, bringing them together and separating them in a gesture of sympathy. Thousands of witnesses attested to the phenomenon, and similar moving statues were reported in other towns. After the crisis, such miracles ceased.

A similar event took place in 1716, when Turkish forces threatened war on Venice. One man claimed that the Virgin Mary had appeared to him in a vision and stated that if enough prayers for souls in purgatory were offered up, the infidels would be defeated. A crowd assembled in front of a statue of the Virgin Mary, and some of those present later declared that the statue opened and closed its eyes to confirm what the visionary had stated. The senate of the city and the local bishop affirmed their belief in the reality of the phenomenon.

Eighty years later, when the French revolutionary forces threatened the Papal States during 1796–97 there were numerous reports of Virgin Mary statues opening and closing their eyes or shedding tears. These miracles were claimed in many churches in Rome and also all over the country. A papal commission examined over nine hundred witnesses and reported favorably on the reality of the phenomena. The manifestations subsided when Napoleon Bonaparte entered the Italian seaport town of Ancona and ordered the statue of the Virgin Mary, which had been one of those reported to move, to be covered up.

In 1870, at Soriano, Calabria, Spain, there were reports of a statue that appeared to move its hand and arm. In 1919, at Limpas, Santander, Spain, pictures of saints were reported to move their eyes or drip blood, some even stepping out of their panels. Hundreds of sworn statements attesting to such miracles were obtained. Many similar incidents were reported in Spain, in 1893 at Campocavallo and on five separate occasions at Rimini between 1850 and 1905. In the latter cases, paintings of saints were said to shed tears.

The reports from Limpas, Spain, were investigated by Professor A. Encinas of Santander University, who compared notes with the scientist E. R. Jaensch. These and similar cases were ascribed to collective hallucination, specifically arising from the psychological phenomenon of eidetic imagery.

In his book The Mechanism of Thought, Imagery and Hallucination (1939), J. Rosett commented: “The reports of mystics and of devotees about pictures and statues which moved and spoke like living persons and performed miracles are . . . not necessarily fraudulent. An understanding of the mechanism of attention and its relation to the state of falling asleep, and of the hallucinations associated with that state, offers a rational explanation of such reports.”

According to Jaensch in his important study Eidetic Imagery (1930):

“Topical perceptual (or eidetic) images are phenomena that take up an intermediate position between sensations and images. Like ordinary physiological after-images, they are always seen in the literal sense. They have this property of necessity and under all conditions, and share it with sensations. In other respects they can also exhibit the properties of images (Vorstellungen). In those cases in which the imagination has little influence, they are merely modified after-images, deviating from the norm in a definite way, and when that influence is nearly, or completely zero, we can look upon them as slightly intensified after-images. In the other limiting case, when the influence of the imagination is at its maximum, they are ideas that, like after-images, are projected outward and literally seen.”

Eidetic imagery has relevance to the visual faculty of artists, who can “see” their subject on the blank paper or canvas. It may also have relevance to the phenomenon of crystal gazing. The existence of various explanations for moving statues—deliberate fraud, sacramental or ritualistic manipulation, hallucination through eidetic imagery—offers a number of explanations that must be discarded before any claims of paranormal phenomena can be considered.

It would be wrong to assume that moving statues belong only to earlier history. In 1985, there were numerous reports of statues moving, bleeding, or weeping throughout Ireland. Cases were reported from over thirty localities during a few months of that year. Interestingly enough, no cases were reported from Northern Ireland during this period, although there is a large Catholic population there.

Characteristically, the period was one of cultural, political, and religious unrest. The cultural unease was focused around a 1983 referendum on amending the constitution to protect the rights of unborn children. New legislation liberalizing the availability of contraceptives and the promise of a referendum on the issue of divorce (not permitted by the constitution) had excited conservative protests. All this came to a head with the 1985 judicial inquiry into the case of an infant corpse discovered with stab wounds in Chirciveen.

It was against this background that statues of the Virgin Mary were reported as moving throughout Ireland. It began on February 14, when several children in Asdee, County Kerry, claimed to have seen a statue of the Madonna and child at the parish church of St. Mary open its eyes and move its hands. An eighty-year-old farmer also stated that he saw the Madonna blink three times. Thousands of people visited the church, but there were no further reports.

A few weeks later, children at Ballydesmond, County Cork, stated that they saw a statue move in the local church, but parents ascribed this to their imaginations. A group of tourists at Courtmacsharry, County Cork, claimed to have seen a statue near the town move, but no other movements were reported and the affair died down.

In July, two teenage girls reported seeing movement in a statue of the Virgin Mary in a grotto some 20 feet up on the side of a hill at Ballinspittle. Soon other people reported seeing the statue change expression or move, and large crowds gathered regularly to watch and recite the rosary. Many people claimed to have seen the Virgin’s eyes or hands move, or the statue to move back and forth or sway from side to side. Thousands of pilgrims visited the shrine, which became the central focus for stories of statues that moved. Pilgrimages and reports of moving statues persisted for over three months and subsided at the end of October, when vandals smashed the hands and face of the statue with an axe and a hammer.

Meanwhile, throughout August and September, further reports of phenomena associated with the Virgin Mary came from all over the Ireland. In Mitchelstown, County Cork, children stated they had seen black blood flowing from a statue of the Virgin Mary and an apparition of the devil had appeared behind the statue. Many pilgrims gathered, and other young people claimed they saw the statue move. Four teenage girls said a statue at the local Marian shrine spoke to them and called for peace.

In Dunkitt, County Waterford, a statue of the Virgin Mary in a grotto on the main Waterford to Kilkenny road was reported to have been seen moving. Some people claimed the statue breathed and the hands moved from center to right. A local publican and his wife stated the statue shimmered. Thousands of pilgrims visited the grotto.

In Waterford, two young boys stated a statue of the Virgin Mary outside the Mercy Convent School moved its eyes, which were full of tears, and spoke of Pope John Paul II being assassinated. Hundreds of people kept vigil around the statue. At Mooncoin, County Waterford, several youths stated they saw a statue move, and a girl said she saw a tear fall from the right eye of the statue and the left eye open and close. Local people gathered at the site.

In the scores of cases reported from all over the country, it seems the statues appeared to move, rather than physically shifting position. Psychologists pointed out that staring at statues in dim light, especially with a glare from an illuminated halo, could result in optical illusions. However, the essential and more elusive aspect of the phenomenon was the religious fervor associated with it, and the feelings of spiritual grace experienced by many individuals.

Staus Poltergeist

Between 1860–62, the village of Staus, on the shores of Lake Lucerne, Switzerland, was the scene of a reported case of poltergeist haunting. The outbreak occurred in the house of M. Joller, a lawyer and a member of the Swiss national council. The household comprised Joller, his wife, seven children (four boys and three girls), and a maid. One night in the autumn of 1860, the maid was disturbed by a loud rapping on her bed frame that she regarded as an omen of death. Joller ascribed the sounds to the girl's imagination and forbade her to speak about them.

A few weeks later, returning after a short absence, Joller found his family alarmed. The knocks had been repeated in the presence of his wife and daughter. A few days later, the family received news of a friend's death and they imagined this must have been what the raps portended.

The outbreak was renewed in June 1861. This time one of the boys fainted at the apparition of a white, indistinct figure. Supposedly, the children began to see and hear other strange things and a few months later the maid complained that the kitchen was haunted by dim, grey shapes who followed her to her bedroom and sobbed all night in the lumber-room.

In October of the same year, the maid was replaced, the rappings ceased, and the disturbances seemed to be at an end. The disturbances returned in August 1862, during the absence of Joller, his wife, and their eldest son on business. Reportedly, the annoyance was so bad that the children fled from the house into the garden, in spite of their father's threat of punishment.

Later, the poltergeist supposedly began to persecute Joller himself, pursuing him from room to room with loud knocks. Reportedly, items were thrown by invisible hands, locked doors and fastened windows were flung open, and strange music, voices, and the humming of spinning wheels were heard.

In spite of Joller's attempts to conceal these happenings, the news spread abroad and people came to witness the phenomena. Finding no rational hypothesis to fit the circumstances, Joller requested the Commissary Niederberger to come and investigate. Niederberger was unavailable so Father Guardian visited the house and blessed it. Reportedly, this did not stop the disturbances and Guardian suggested an inquiry be made by men of authority.

Joller privately called in several scientists he knew, but they also were unable to find a solution, although various theories of electricity, galvanism, and magnetism were advanced. Other authorities were present while Niederberger and Guardian examined the house without discovering any cause for the disturbances, which had continued unabated.

Later, Joller requested a formal examination by the police, and three police were chosen to investigate. The Joller family left and for six days the police occupied the house. At the end of that period, having neither heard nor seen any sign of the poltergeist, they wrote a report to that effect and left the house.

When the Jollers returned to the house, supposedly the phenomena started again. Joller found it impossible to carry on his business and in October 1862, he left his ancestral home forever. The following spring he found a tenant for the house in Staus, but the poltergeist outbreak was not renewed.

St. Chad (620 C.E.–672 C.E.)

According to the hagiography of the Roman Catholic church, St. Chad was a bishop born in what is now England around 620 C.E. He was the youngest of four brothers, two of whom, Cynebil and Caelin, became priests; the other, Cedd, also became a bishop. He was educated at the monastery at Lindisfarne under St. Aidain, and following the advice of his mentor, he lived close to his people and always traveled on foot. In 664, Cedd was serving as the bishop of East Saxons (London). Making his rounds, he arrived at the monastery of Lastingham where Cynebil lay dying of the plague. When Cedd also became ill, he sent for Chad, who became the new abbot at Lastingham.

Meanwhile, Chad had become the bishop of York. This was at the time when the Roman tradition was replacing the Celtic tradition in the Church in England. Five years after his consecration, the archbishop of Canterbury noted that Chad had an irregularity in his past, as he had been ordained as a priest by two Celtic bishops. He asked Chad to step down, and Chad retired to the monastery at Lastingham. His ordination problem was corrected and he soon assumed duties as bishop of Mercia (Lichfield).

In 672, the plague swept through England again and Chad became ill. At the time, he resided with a small group of monks at the monastery at Lichfield. One day Chad called the brothers together and announced that he would soon leave them and admonished them to live together in peace and observe the rules of their order after his passing. He died later that day, and one of the brothers testified that he had earlier heard angelic singing coming from the oratory where the bishop had been praying. The angels had come to summon Chad to heaven. His death occurred on March 2, 672.

Chad soon became a focus of healing stories, and he was eventually canonized. His relics (bones) were moved on several occasions but placed in a special shrine in the cathedral by the bishop of Lichfield in the fourteenth century. When Henry VIII broke with the Roman Church and outlawed the cult of relics, the bones were removed from the shrine and kept quietly in the homes of loyal Roman Catholics until 1841, when they were placed in the new Roman Catholic Cathedral, which was dedicated to St. Chad, in Birmingham.

Modern scholars have charged that Chad and his brother never existed. They allege that he and his brother Cedd are variants of the Pagan deity Ceadda and emerged as the Roman Catholics gained dominance in the formerly Celtic Pagan area. Ceadda was associated with healing springs, a theme that flowed into the legend around St. Chad. He remains a saint on the Roman calendar, however, and churches are dedicated to him throughout the English-speaking world. There are also several ancient wells in the British Midland dedicated to him.

Sources:

Brewster, H. Pomeroy. Saints and Festivals of the Christian Church. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co., 1904.

Walker, Barbara. The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets. San Francisco: Harper, 1983.

St. Clair, David (1932–1991)

Actor, journalist, writer, and lecturer on the occult. He was born on October 2, 1932, in Newton Falls, Ohio. He was educated at Columbia University and the New School for Social Research. He spent five years as a professional actor in summer stock as well as did some television work.

In 1956 he went to Mexico and started to travel by land into Central and South America; he reached Brazil, where he worked full-time for Time and Life until 1965. Afterward he became a freelance writer and lecturer. He had a strong interest in the occult and investigated local occult practices everywhere he traveled. He made expeditions into the Amazon and Mato Grosso jungles, lived with Indians, and was initiated into vou-dou temples. St. Clair stated, "I've talked to spirits, communicated with and even photographed a ghost, but the living still interest me more than the dead. I believe in the spirit world, in reincarnation, and in spirit intervention in our lives. I've seen too much of it not to believe." His experience became the basis of a number of books.

Sources:

St. Clair, David. David St. Clair's Lessons in Instant ESP. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice Hall, 1978.

———. Drum and Candle. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1971.

———. Psychic Healers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1974.

———. The Psychic World of California. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

———. Waseka: America's Most Extraordinary Case of Possession & Exorcism. Chicago: Playboy Press; 1977. Distributed by Simon & Schuster.

Stead, William T(homas) (1849–1912)

British editor, journalist, publicist, and champion of Spiritualism. He was born July 5, 1849, at Embleton, Northumberland, England, the son of a Congregationalist minister. He was first educated by his father, then attended school in Wakefield.

In 1863, Stead left school to apprentice in a merchant's countinghouse in Newcastle-on-Tyne. At the age of eighteen, he was impressed by the poems of James Russell Lowell and resolved to dedicate his life to helping other people. Throughout his subsequent career as an editor, he campaigned for truth and justice. In 1880, while editing the Northern Echo at Darlington, England, he protested against the Bulgarian atrocities. The Pall Mall Gazette of London, a pro-Turk paper, unexpectedly changed owners, and he was offered the post of assistant editor. Three years later, he received full control of the paper.

Stead founded the Review of Reviews in 1890. His interest in psychic subjects was first demonstrated in the publication (as the Christmas issue of the Review of Reviews) of his book Real Ghost Stories in 1891. Next year it was followed by More Ghost Stories.

In 1892, Stead believed he discovered his ability to receive communications in automatic writing. This was the beginning of his psychic activities. Stead claimed proof of survival in the form of a message received through his hands, from Julia Ames. Ames was a journalist acquaintance and editor of The Woman's Union Signal of Chicago, who had died shortly before. On March 14, 1893, in an address to members of the London Spiritualist Alliance, Stead made his first public confession of faith, narrating the details of his discoveries and early psychic experiences.

Reportedly, a communication from "Julia" suggested he could obtain automatic scripts from living friends as well. He noted,

"I put my hand at the disposal of friends at various degrees of distance, and I found that, although the faculty varied, some friends could write extremely well, imitating at first the style of their own handwriting, sometimes for the first few words until they had more or less established their identity, and then going on to write exactly as they would write an ordinary letter. They would write what they were thinking about—whether they wanted to see me, or where they had been."

In 1893, Stead began publication of Borderland, a quarterly psychic magazine that ran until 1897, in which the "Letters from Julia" he had obtained automatically were published for the first time. They were printed in a book in 1897 under the title After Death.

Stead was assisted in the editorial work by Miss X. (Ada Goodrich-Freer, later Mrs. Hans Spoer). In her notes on the origin of Borderland she stated:

"Mr. Stead was as definitely spiritualist as I was definitely an anti-spiritualist. He believed in everybody until they were found out, and often afterwards, and he would seek to introduce into Borderland the lucubrations of people at whom as a disciple of Lavater I shuddered."

For the 1893 Christmas issue of Review of Reviews, Stead wrote a story entitled "From the Old World to the New," a fiction concerning the dangers of icebergs in the Atlantic Ocean. The story is set on a ship named the Majestic with Captain Smith as commander. Reportedly, this is the same Captain Smith who 21 years later goes down with the Titanic. The narrative pictures the sinking of the liner and depicts the Atlantic Ocean as a grave.

Stead's eldest son, Willie, died in December 1907. It is believed this incident demonstrated to him the need for consoling the bereaved. Reportedly, "Julia" always urged Stead to establish a "bureau" where free communication with the Beyond should serve inquirers.

Julia's Bureau was opened on April 24, 1909. A small circle of sensitives supposedly chosen by "Julia" herself met every morning at ten at Mowbray House, Norfolk St., London, W.C. Strangers were not admitted to this circle. The sittings were invariably held in broad daylight. Robert King was engaged as a special clairaudient and clairvoyant. When he was unable to attend, Alfred Vout Peters attended. Records were kept of private sittings. Psychometry (divination through material objects) was believed to be successful.

In the three years of its existence about 1,300 sittings were given in the bureau. Its maintenance cost Stead 1,500 pounds a year. Besides King and Peters, Mrs. Wesley Adams and J. J. Vango were employed as psychics.

In addition to "Julia," Stead claimed an influence, calling it-self "Catherine II" of Russia, among his communicators. In the Contemporary Review for January 1909, under the title "The Arrival of the Slav," an article was published under Stead's name. It contained Catherine's "Manifesto to the Slavs," a singularly prophetic script made up of different Catherine messages obtained through the hands of Stead and his secretary.

Stead's review of Sir Oliver Lodge's book The Survival of Man (1909) disclosed an experiment. Supposedly, while writing the review, it occurred to Stead to ask one of Sir Oliver's spirit friends on the other side to write the concluding passage of the review through two automatists, one of whom had read the book and one who had not. There was a distance of 70 miles between the two automatists. The second automatists did not know where the script of the first ended. In his review, Stead concluded the two automatists had performed satisfactorily.

As a result of his article "When the Door Opened" in the Fortnightly Review, the Daily Chronicle challenged Stead on the eve of general elections to obtain Gladstone's views on the political crisis. He consulted "Julia." Supposedly, she deprecated the attempt but did not forbid it. Accordingly, King listened for a clairaudient communication that seemed to come to Stead as though from a long distance. It was published to ridicule and public derision. Stead himself did not claim that it emanated from the spirit of Gladstone, but thought that it resembled the recorded utterances of Gladstone.

The sequel to this interview was obtained from scripts through a nonprofessional automatist as letters of further explanation. They were not published at the time. But in 1911, Admiral Osborne Moore telephoned Stead and informed him that during a séance in Detroit with the medium Etta Wriedt, "Gladstone" purported to speak and ask whether Moore remembered the name of the lady in England through whose hand he had given a message. The voice then gave the correct name. As the story of the "Gladstone" interview sequel was only known to a few, Stead considered this as a good test.

There was a constant dispute between Stead and the Society for Psychical Research. "What are known as psychical research methods," wrote Edith K. Harper in her book Stead, the Man (1918), "was abhorrent to him. He held them truly unscientific in the most extended meaning of the word. He said he would rather die in the workhouse than believe that anyone would tell him a deliberate falsehood for the mere purpose of deceiving him.”

Speaking against the society in admitting evidence of communications from the dead, Stead drew, before the members of the Cosmos Club in 1909, a graphic, imaginary picture of himself, shipwrecked and drowning in the sea and calling frantically for help. He imagined that instead of throwing him a rope the rescuers would shout back: “Who are you? What is your name? ‘I am Stead! W. T. Stead! I am drowning here in the sea. Throw me the rope. Be quick!’ But instead of throwing me the rope they continue to shout back: ‘How do we know you are Stead? Where were you born? Tell us the name of your grandmother.’”

The picture of a sinking ocean liner with its attendant horrors often recurred in Stead’s writings. His earliest prediction took the form of a narrative by a survivor in the Pall Mall Gazette. It was attended by the following editorial note: “This is exactly what might take place if liners are sent to sea short of boats.” Twenty-six years afterwards 1,600 lives were lost on the Titanic, due to a shortage of lifeboats, and Stead went down among them.

He was invited to speak at Carnegie Hall, New York, on April 21, 1912, on the subject of world peace. Before his departure on the Titanic he wrote to his secretary: “I feel as if something was going to happen, somewhere, or somehow. And that it will be for good . . .”

George Henslow’s book The Proofs of the Truths of Spiritualism (1919) stated that Archdeacon Thomas Colley (who later printed a pamphlet The Foreordained Wreck of the Titanic) sent a forecast of the disaster to Stead and received the answer: “I sincerely hope that none of the misfortunes which you seem to think may happen, will happen; but I will keep your letter and will write to you when I come back.”

Reportedly, Stead intended to bring Etta Wriedt, the Detroit direct voice medium, to England when he returned. Wriedt was waiting for him in New York. The Titanic was struck by an iceberg on the night of April 14, 1912. Supposedly, two nights later, “Dr. Sharp,” Wriedt’s control, gave a detailed account of the Titanic disaster, assured sitters of Stead’s death and gave the names of some who went down with the ship. Reportedly, the following night, three days after his death, Stead himself communicated. Reportedly, his articulation was weak in the beginning but he was understood.

The messages which purported to emanate from Stead through automatic writing, direct voice, materialization, and psychic photography were summed up by James Coates in his book Has W. T. Stead Returned? (1913). Coates concluded the messages had established his identity. There was a W. T. Stead Memorial Society in Britain: c/o Victor Jones, “Rosamund,” 7A Seagrave Ave. (Hants.), Hayling Island, PO11 9EU, England.

Sources:

Coates, James. Has W. T. Stead Returned? London: L. N. Fowler, 1913.

Harper, Edith K. Stead, the Man. London: W. Rider & Son, 1914.

Stead, William T. After Death. New York: John Lane, 1907. Reprint, London: Review of Reviews, 1914.

Steen, Douglas (1925–)

Researcher in finance, weather, astropsychology, and parapsychology. Steen was born on July 22, 1925, in Los Angeles, California and studied at the University of California at Los Angeles (M.A., 1951). He served in the United States Navy and as a mathematical physicist on guided missiles for the Northrop Air Corp. (1951–54). In 1954 he became a freelance researcher. He assisted at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University in adapting four sports to dice-throwing for laboratory research in psychokinesis.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Steen, Douglas. “Success with Complex Targets in a PK Baseball Game.” Journal of Parapsychology (June 1957).

Steiger, Brad (1936–)

Popular writer on UFOs, reincarnation, and related paranormal subjects. Steiger was born Eugene E. Olson on February 19, 1936, in Bode, Iowa. He was educated at Luther College (1953–57) and the University of Iowa (1963). From 1957 to 1963 he was a high school English teacher in Clinton, Iowa, and then a literature and creative writing instructor at Luther College, Decorah, Iowa, from 1963 to 1967. In 1965 his first book, Ghosts, Ghouls and Other Peculiar People, was published. A series of paperbacks began to appear in 1966, and in 1967 Steiger became a full-time writer and lecturer on paranormal and ufological subjects.

Steiger produced a steady stream of books over the next 25 years (sometimes as many as six a year), and in their entirety they chronicle the whole range of paranormal subjects. He early turned his attention to UFOs with the 1966 Strangers from the Skies. He would go on to write more books on the subject than any other person (more than 15 titles). Three of these, Aquarian Revelations (1971), Revelation: The Divine Fire (1973), and The Fellowship (1988) remain important studies of the flying saucer contactee movement. In Gods of Aquarius: UFOs and the Transformation of Man (1976), he introduced the concept of “star people,” human beings who are tied by some means, usually past lives, to extraterrestrials. Star people have reported contacts with otherworldly individuals who are preparing them for a transition through which humanity must go. Gods of Aquarius brought Steiger numerous letters from people claiming to be star people. He produced five books on the topic in the early 1980s.

Steiger had an important role in introducing Paul Twitchell and ECKANKAR to the American public. He wrote a chapter on Twitchell in an early book and followed it with an entire biographical treatment, In My Soul I Am Free (1968).

Throughout the 1970s Steiger manifested a strong interest in American indigenous cultures and produced important and empathetic books on the paranormal world of the Hawaiian Kahuna and of Native Americans. He also documented the careers of a number of prominent psychics, such as Olof Jonsson and Irene Hughes.

While Steiger has often presented a skeptical view of many of the claims of the people he discusses in his books, the overall result of his experience in the psychic and contactee community has been a belief that some external intelligence has been interacting with humanity in order both to learn about our species and to communicate some basic metaphysical truths.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s. Vol. 1 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Melton, J. Gordon, Jerome Clark, and Aidan A. Kelly. New Age Encyclopedia. Detroit: Gale Research, 1990.

Steiger, Brad. Animal Miracles: Inspirational and Heroic True Stories.

———. Aquarian Revelations. New York: Dell, 1971.

———. Gods of Aquarius: UFOs and the Transformation of Man. New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1976.

———. Guardian Angels and Spirit Guides: True Accounts of Benevolent Beings from the Other Side. New York: Signet, 1998.

———. He Walks with Me: True Encounters with Jesus. New York: Signet, 1998.

———. Revelation: The Divine Fire. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1973.

———. The Seed. New York: Berkley Books, 1983.

———. Shadow World. New York: Signet, 2000.

———. The Werewolf Book: The Encyclopedia of Shape-Shifting Beings. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1999.

Steiger, Brad, and Sherry H. Steiger. Mother Mary Speaks to Us. n.p.: N A L, 1997.

Steiger, Brad, and Joan Whritenour. New UFO Breakthrough. New York: Award, 1968.

Steiner, Rudolf (1861–1925)

Founder of the Anthroposophical Society. He was born on February 27, 1861, at Kraljevic, Austria, but a year later his parents moved to Vienna. He grew up a Roman Catholic and attended a technical college in Vienna. While in college he attended lectures at the university, where he was attracted to the great German writer Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. He did intense study in Goethe's writings, in which he developed an expertise. Because of his technical background and his competence in the subject, he was invited to edit a critical edition of Goethe's scientific writings. Eventually he was offered a position at the Goethe Archives in Weimar.

As a young man Steiner became interested in the occult. He was a member of the OTO (Ordo Templi Orientis) for a brief period and in the late 1890s moved to Berlin, where he became affiliated with the Theosophical Society. He soon rose to leadership of the German section of the society.

Almost from the beginning Steiner had opposed what he considered a downplaying of Christ in Theosophical teachings. Theosophy considers Christ but one member of the vast spiritual hierarchy. His differences were brought to the fore, however, in 1910, with the announcement by international president Annie Besant that a young Indian boy was to be the new world savior. To Steiner, and many others who identified themselves as Theosophists, the emergence of Jiddu Krishnamurti and the formation of the Order of the Star of the East was very clearly an un-Christian statement. Steiner moved to oppose Besant and Krishnamurti by declaring that membership in the German section of the Theosophical Society and the Order of the Star were incompatible. Besant revoked the charter of the German section.

With 55 of the 65 chapters with him, Steiner in 1913 reorganized the membership as the Anthroposophical Society. The name of the organization was taken from a alchemical work by Thomas Vaughn, Anthroposophia Theomagica. He created a Gnostic-like theology and during the remaining years of his life wrote voluminously, developing his perspective in every area of life, especially art, education, natural farming, and religion. In 1922 he introduced the Christian Community as a related church structure for those members who wanted more traditional worship.

Steiner died on March 30, 1925, at Dornach, in German-speaking Switzerland. From there the movement was later able to survive the destruction of occultism in Germany by the Nazi regime. His movement began to spread internationally in the 1920s and is now represented across Europe and North America.

Sources:

Easton, Stewart. Rudolf Steiner: Herald of a New Epoch. Spring Valley, N.Y.: Anthroposophical Press, 1980.

Rittelmeyer, Friedrich. Rudolf Steiner Enters My Life. London: George Roberts, 1929.

Steiner, Rudolf. Christianity as Mystical Fact. West Nyack, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1961.

———. Cosmic Memory. West Nyack, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner Publications, 1959.

———. The Course of My Life. New York: Anthroposophical Press, 1951.

Wachmuth, Guenther. The Life and Work of Rudolf Steiner. New York: Whittier Books, 1955.

Steinschneider, Heinrich

Real name of famous clairvoyant and stage performer Erik Jan Hanussen (d. 1933), who established a reputation in Germany during the 1920s and 1930s.

Stella C. (Cranshaw) (ca. 1950)

A London hospital nurse whose mediumship was discovered by psychical researcher Harry Price in 1923. Price met Stella C. by chance when they shared a compartment on a train. During a casual conversation on psychical matters it was apparent she had psychic gifts. She gave a series of sittings in Price's National Laboratory of Psychical Research in London. Telekinesis phenomena were reportedly produced, with changes in temperature that were recorded by a self-registering thermometer. On many occasions, the temperature in the séance room was found to be lower.

Price read a paper on the subject before the Third International Congress for Psychical Research in Paris. It was entitled: "Some Account of the Thermal Variations as Recorded During the Trance State of the Psychic Stella C." The physical phenomena of raps, movements, and levitations of the table took place under stringent conditions.

Price developed a trick table that has since become famous. This table was a double table, the inner one fitting into a table rim of four legs. The space under the table was barred by strips of wood connecting the legs of the outer table. The inner table had a shelf nearly as large as the top. This shelf was surrounded on the sides by gauze of a fine mesh so that the only access to the space was through a trap door in the table top that was easy to push open from the inside but very difficult to lift from the outside. Supposedly, various musical instruments were placed on the shelf and operators of Stella C. got inside to play the instruments.

Price also developed the telekinetoscope. An electric telegraph key was placed in brass cup and connected to a red light under a hermetically sealed glass shade. A soap bubble was blown over the cup and covered with another glass shade. The red light would flash only by pressing the telegraph key. The instrument was placed on the shelf inside the double table. The telegraph key was repeatedly pressed. The soap bubble, at the end of the séance, was found unbroken.

A shadow apparatus, consisting of a battery and lamp in a metal box with a Zeiss telephoto lens as a projector and a Wratten ruby filter to project a pencil of light on a luminous screen, was employed to supposedly detect the shape of the invisible arms that moved the bell or the trumpet. When the light was switched on, the shadow of the arm appeared on screen.

To quote the result of this experiment in the words of Eric J. Dingwall:

"When the red light was switched on under the table I lay down on the floor and looked through the passage towards the luminous screen. From near the medium's foot, which was invisible, I saw an eggshaped body beginning to crawl towards the centre of the floor under the table. It was white and where the light was reflected it appeared opal. To the end nearest the medium was attached a thin white neck, like a piece of macaroni. It advanced towards the centre, and then rapidly withdrew to the shadow."

Stella C. married Leslie Deacon in 1928 and ceased to give sittings. Her last sittings in 1926 and 1928 were attended by scientists such as Julian Huxley, Edward Andrade, and R. J. Tillyard.

Sources:

Tabori, Paul. Companions of the Unseen. London: H. A. Humphrey, 1968.

Turner, James, ed. Stella C. An Account of Some Original Experiments in Psychical Research. London: Souvenir Press, 1973.

Stella Maris Gnostic Church

The Stella Maris Gnostic Church, one of a number of South American Gnostic sect groups, was founded in 1989 by Rodolfo Perez and former members of the Universal Christian Gnostic Movement. Modern Gnosticism had emerged in nineteenth-century Europe, from where it had been transferred to South America early in the twentieth century by Arnoldo Krumm-Heller and other occult leaders. The Stella Maris is headquartered in Cartagena, Colombia.

The small group rose out of its obscurity in the larger occult milieu in June of 1999. A month earlier, the mother of one of the young adult members complained to the local authorities about the group and asked them to assist her in removing her daughter from the group. They did not respond. In June, the group went on its annual retreat. The day after the small group (fewer than 100 members) departed for the retreat, Colombian papers carried stories that the group had departed for the Sierra Nevada mountains to meet a spaceship that would take them to another world. The Sierra Nevada has been the focus of UFO reports and many flying saucer buffs believe it to be a place where direct contact with extraterrestrials is possible. The story was given added credence by expectations of crazy actions by different groups as the millennium came to an end.

The story was picked up by international wire services, carried worldwide, and tied to memories of the suicide of the 39 members of Heaven's Gate. However, within 24 hours of the story breaking, Perez and several members of the group went on television, denied that they had any interest in flying saucers, and said that they would return to Cartagena as usual when their retreat was over. The retreat was taking place near San Pedro, Colombia, as the media had been informed some weeks previously. El Tiempo, the leading daily newspaper, had run the initial story without checking the facts that they had at hand. The follow-up story of the group was carried by the Colombian press, but no follow-up appeared in the English-language media for almost a year when Fortean Times finally broke the story of the hoax in its May 2000 issue. Meanwhile, the Stella Maris Gnostic Church returned to its routine life in Cartagena.

Sources:

Murdie, Alan. "The Stella Maris Cult." Fortean Times 133 (May 2000): 66.

———. "UFOs, Strange Lights, and Meteorites in Colombia." Posted at <http://www.xmo85.dial.pipex.com/colombia.htm>. May 10, 2000.

Stella Matutina (Order of the Morning Star)

A temple of the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, an offshoot of the outer order that broke with the Golden Dawn's chief S. L. M. Mathers, and rejected moving the London temple away from magic toward mysticism. It was founded by R. W. Felkin around 1903. Its members included Dion Fortune, Israel Regardie, W. B. Yeats and "E. Nesbit" (pseudonym of Mrs. Bland, author of stories for children). Some of the members of the Stella Matutina founded the healing organization, the Guild of St. Raphael.

Sources:

King, Francis. The Rites of Modern Occult Magic. New York: Macmillan, 1970.

Stella Tenebrarum

Stella Tenebrarum (Star of Darkness) is a traditionalist Satanic group that was founded on June 21 (the summer solstice), 1993, in Croatia. On that date, three medallions were struck for the three leaders of the group. Each medallion had an inverted pentagram, and they were made to be placed next to each other, at which time the full group motto was depicted: "Vexilla regis prodeunt inferi fulget Stella Tenebrarum" ("Flag of the king flies through hell, shines the Star of Darkness"). Some of the original members of the group, including one who was killed, served in the Croatian army during the Croatian war for independence.

The Stella Tenebrarum accepts the myth of Satan as the fallen angel who rebelled against the autocratic God of Jewish and Christian traditions. Satanism thus stands for the free spirit, rebellion against tyranny, standing for one's own beliefs and not allowing oneself to be forced into accepted norms simply to get along with others.

Satanism offers an active approach to living one's life, and encourages the use of magic to carry out one's ends. Members of Stella Tenebrarum are not opposed to the use of magic both to influence others (as in love spells) or to harm an enemy with curses. They promote the exchange of knowledge of effective curses with other Satanist groups. They also recommend the writings of Anton LaVey, founder of the American-based Church of Satan, as a means of getting started in magic and Satanism. Unlike most Satanist groups in the LaVey tradition, Stella Tenebrarum is not opposed to animal sacrifice, which it sees as primarily an issue between cultures.

Stella Tenebrarum may be contacted through its Internet site at <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Parthenon/2026/stella.html>.

Sources:

Stella Tenebrarum. <http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Parthenon/2026/stella.html>. May 20, 2000.

Stelle Group

The Stelle Group was founded in Chicago in 1963 by Richard Kieninger, a former student of the Lemurian Fellowship. That same year he released an autobiography, The Ultimate Frontier, under the pseudonym Eklal Kueshana. The book described Kieninger's occult accomplishments, beginning with his meetings with a Dr. White on Kieninger's twelfth birthday. Originally Stelle members were also required to join and absorb the teachings of the Lemurian Fellowship, a practice that continued until the disruptions of the mid-1970s.

White taught Kieninger about reincarnation and suggested that he was both King David and Akhnaton. He gave Kieninger his mission: to found a new nation that was to center on an ideal community, Stelle City, near Kankakee, Illinois. By 1970 there were enough members and capital to purchase land, and Stelle City began to rise out of the surrounding corn fields. Some urgency pervaded the creation of Stelle, as The Ultimate Frontier predicted a massive natural catastrophe to be triggered by the alignment of the planets on May 5, 2000. Before that, in 1999, an atomic war would occur, killing 90 percent of the Earth's population.

Stelle grew steadily until 1976, when Kieninger left and formed a second community near Dallas, Texas, called the Adelphi Organization. It later was revealed that Kieninger had been expelled from Stelle for having sexual liaisons with several married women in the community. A leadership struggle ensued among the Illinois members after Kieninger's departure. A number, including the entire board of trustees and Kieninger's ex-wife, left the community. Those remaining reconciled with Kieninger. The headquarters of the Stelle group was moved to Texas in 1982, and Kieninger was named "Chairman of the Board for Life." However, by 1986 new problems had emerged, and Kieninger was forced out again.

He resigned and founded another organization, the Builders of the Nation, in Dallas. A short time later he again assumed control of the Adelphi Organization, and the Texas and Illinois groups separated.

As of the mid-1990s, the members of the Stelle Group are concentrating on applying Lemurian philosophy to their daily lives. The group is currently led by Tim Wilhelm. Address: The Stelle Administration Building, Stelle, IL 60919.

Sources:

Kossy, Donna. Kooks: A Guide to the Outer Limits of Human Belief. Portland, Ore.: Feral House, 1994.

Kueshana, Ekklal [Kieninger, Richard]. The Ultimate Frontier. Chicago: Stelle Group, 1963.

Stendek (Journal)

A former Spanish-language publication concerned with UFOs, published from 1970–1981.

Sterner, Katherine Schmidt

Founder and president of the California Parapsychology Foundation and editor of Parapsychology News-Notes beginning in 1956. Born at Steelton, Pennsylvania, Sterner attended Akron University, Juilliard School (N.Y.), Columbia University, and San Diego City College. She was a public school teacher at in Akron, Ohio during World War II.

Stevens, William Oliver (1878–1955)

Author and educator who wrote on parapsychology. Stevens was born on October 7, 1878, in Rangoon, Burma. Stevens studied at Colby College, Waterville, Maine (B.A., 1899) and Yale University (Ph.D., 1903). He taught English for many years at the United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Maryland (1905–24), and then successively was the headmaster of Roger Ascham School, White Plains, New York (1924–27); headmaster of Cranbrook School, Bloomfield Hills, Michigan (1927–35); and dean of the School of Literature and Journalism, Oglethorpe University (1936–37).

Out of his interest in parapsychology, Stevens joined the American Society for Psychological Research. He wrote many books on naval history and other subjects, including psychic research. He died January 16, 1955.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Stevens, William O. Beyond the Sunset. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1944.

———. Mystery of Dreams. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1949. Reprint, London: Allen & Unwin, 1950.

———. Psychics and Common Sense. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1945.

———. Unbidden Guests. N.p., 1945.

Stevenson, Ian (1918–)

Physician, professor of psychiatry, and parapsychologist. His special area of study has been used as evidence for survival, and apparent memories of former incarnations. Stevenson was born on October 31, 1918, in Montreal, Quebec, Canada. He studied at McGill University, Montreal (B.S., 1943, M.D., 1944). He held positions at Cornell Medical College (1947–49), Louisiana State University (1949–1957), and the Department of Neurology and Psychiatry, University of Virginia School of Medicine, Charlottesville, Virginia, beginning in 1957.

Stevenson was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and a member of the American Society for Psychological Research. He wrote on various issues in parapsychology, but was particularly concerned with evidence supporting the belief of reincarnation. His research and writing concentrated in that area, beginning with his contest winning essay in honor of William James, “The Evidence for Survival from Claimed Memories of Former Incarnations” (1961). His publications include 8 books on parapsychology, 136 articles dealing with medicine, and 70 articles that address parapsychology.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Stevenson, Ian. “An Antagonist’s View of Parapsychology. A Review of Professor Hansel’s ‘ESP: A Scientific Evaluation.’” Journal of American Society for Psychical Research 61 (July 1967).

———. Cases of the Reincarnation Type. 3 vols. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1975–1983.

———. “A Review & Analysis of Paranormal Experiences Connected with the Sinking of the Titanic.” Journal of American Society for Psychical Research 54 (1961).

———. Telepathic Impressions: A Review and Report of Thirty-five New Cases. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1970.

———. Twelve Cases in Lebanon & Turkey. N.p., 1980.

———. Twenty Cases Suggestive of Reincarnation. 2d ed. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1974.

Stewart, Balfour (1828–1887)

Professor of natural philosophy at Owens College, Manchester, England, who received the Rumford Medal of the Royal Society for his discovery of the law of equality between the absorptive and radiative powers of bodies. He occupied the presidential chair of the Society for Psychological Research, London, from 1885 to 1887.

Stewart was born on November 1, 1828, in Edinburgh, Scotland. He was educated in Dundee and the Universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. He traveled to Australia, where he acquired a reputation as a physicist. After returning to Britain in 1856, he joined the staff of Kew Observatory, becoming a director in 1859. He also made important scientific contributions in mathematics and radiant heat.

Stewart was interested in the phenomena of the medium Daniel Douglas Home, of whom he commented to Sir William Crookes:

“Mr. Home possesses great electrobiological power by which he influences those present . . . however susceptible the persons in the room to that assumed influence, it will hardly be contended that Mr. Home biologized the recording instrument.”

Stewart coauthored with Professor Tait the anonymously published The Unseen Universe (1875), a book that created a stir as the first serious scientific attempt to establish a spiritual view of the universe to oppose the prevailing materialistic one. He died suddenly on December 19, 1887, of a cerebral hemorrhage.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Stewart, Kenneth Malcolm (1916–)

Professor of anthropology who studied possession and shamanism. He was born on June 16, 1916, in Tecumseh, Nebraska. Stewart completed his college work at the University of California (B.A., 1938, M.A., 1940, Ph.D., 1946). In 1947 he began his long tenure as a professor of anthropology at Arizona State University. Stewart conducted ethnological field work among the Native American Mohave and Pagago tribes of the American Southwest.

Sources:

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Stewart, Kenneth M. "Spirit Possession." Tomorrow (spring 1956).

———. "Spirit Possession in Native America." Southwestern Journal of Anthropology 2, no. 3 (1946).

Stewart, W(ilber) C(larence) (1936–)

Research assistant and graduate student at Duke University, Durham, North Carolina. Stewart was born on July 22, 1936, in Durham, North Carolina. He studied at Duke University (B.S. electrical engineering, 1958, M.S. electrical engineering, 1960). He is an associate member of the Parapsychological Association. He experimented with electrical devices for testing extrasensory perception.

Sources:

Stewart, W. C. "Three New ESP Test Machines and Some Preliminary Results." Journal of Parapsychology (March 1959).

Sthenometer

Instrument invented by psychical researcher Paul Joire to demonstrate the existence of a nervous force acting externally to the body. In the center of a horizontal dial, marked out in 360 degrees, is a light needle or pointer, usually of straw, balanced by a pivot on a glass support. The device is covered with a glass shade.

When the extended fingers of a hand are at a right angle to the pointer, near the shade without touching it, reportedly, after a few seconds, the pointer moves toward the hand in the majority of cases. This movement extends between fifteen and fifty degrees. Certain substances that had been previously held in the hand also produce this movement. Wood, water, linen, and cardboard appear to store up this nervous energy. Tinfoil, iron, and cotton produce no effect.

The Society for Psychical Research, London, and some French scientific groups attributed the movement of the needle to the action of radiating heat rather than psychic force. (See also Biometer of Baradoc; De Tromelin Cylinder; emanations; exteriorization of sensitivity; Magnetometer)

Stichomancy

Another term for bibliomancy (divination through random choice of words in a book).

Stigmata

Marks resembling the wounds of the crucified Christ that appear inexplicably on the limbs and body of certain sensitive individuals, especially Christian mystics. The most common stigmata are marks on a person's hands and feet resembling piercing with nails, sometimes accompanied by bleeding. Other stigmata include the weals of scourging, wounds on the shoulder and side, the bruising of the wrists (where Christ was bound with cords), and marks on the mouth (paralleling the effect of the sponge soaked in vinegar). The most dangerous stigma is the Ferita or heart wound, which under normal circumstances can cause death.

There have been hundreds of cases of stigmata over the last two thousand years, many of them on the bodies of women. In spite of some actual or suspected frauds, most of these cases seem genuine, and some individuals bearing stigmata have been canonized or beatified by the Roman Catholic Church. In those cases, the stigmata was one of many criteria used to determine canonization and church authorities have never used belief in stigmatization as a mark of holiness.

Some people believe the Apostle St. Paul was the first stigmatic. He wrote in an epistle: Ego enim stigmata Domini Jesus in corpore meo porto. In the first twelve centuries of the history of the church his words were taken figuratively. There were ascetics who had wounds attributed to the teeth and claws of the devil on their body, but it was St. Francis of Assisi (died 1226) from whom the history of stigmatic wounds really dates. He was also reported to have manifested the phenomenon of bilocation. He carried the marks of stigmata during the final two years of his life. He fasted all through the 40-day fast of St. Michael and concentrated his thoughts on the Passion of Christ.

Not only was his flesh torn and bleeding at the five places, but "... his hands and feet appeared to be pierced through the middle with nails, the heads of which were in the palm of his hands and the soles of his feet; and the points came out again in the back of the hands and the feet, and were turned back and clinched in such a manner that within the bend formed by the reversal of the points a finger could easily be placed as in a ring, and the heads of the nails were found and black. They were the source of constant pain and of the utmost inconvenience. He could walk no more and became exhausted by the suffering and loss of blood. It hastened his premature decease. . . . After the death of Francis . . . a certain cavalier, named Jeronime, who had much doubted and was incredulous concerning them . . . ventured, in the presence of the brethren and many seculars to move about the nails in the hands and feet."

The Reverend F. Fielding-Ould, in his book Wonders of the Saints (1919), conjectured that the nails were of some horny material the body is able to naturally develop.

La Bienheureuse Lucie de Narni (1476–1544) carried stigmata for seven years, from 1496 onward. Reportedly, four years after her death, her body was exhumed. It was perfectly preserved and exhaled a sweet scent. The stigmatic wounds on her sides were open and blood flowed from time to time. In 1710 she was again exhumed and the body was found still intact.

The stigmatic wounds of Johnanna della Croce, 1524, appeared every Friday and vanished the following Sunday.

St. Veronique Giuliani, born in 1660, received the crown of thorns at the age of 33. On April 5, 1679, the five wounds developed.

Seventy-five years after the death of St. Francis 30 stigmatic cases were on record, including twenty-five women. Dr. Antoine Imbert-Gourbeyre in his monograph L'Hypnotisme et la Stigmatisation (1899) recorded more than 321 cases, and men comprised a seventh of the cases. This number includes the "compatients" and not those instances in which the stigmatic wounds were considered the work of the devil.

The "compatients" or participants did not exhibit the physiological signs of stigmatization in the form of wounds. It is believed to be an inner, psychical experience, noticeable, however, by outsiders as well. For instance, the complexion of Jeanne de Marie-Jesus in the ecstatic state of the Passion became dark and blue, the blood mounted under her nails, bruises appeared on her arms and hands as if left by chains, her forehead and other parts of her body sweated blood.

Of the cases enumerated by Imbert-Gourbeyre, 29 occurred in the nineteenth century. Catherine Emmerich (1774–1821) furnished one case. Count Stolberg, the celebrated naturalist, visited her in 1821. We learn from his description that for months the nun of Dolmen ate small portions of an apple, plum or cherry and drank water daily. The thorn wounds on her head opened every Friday morning and later blood flowed continuously from eight wounds on her hands and feet.

Research in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries

Marie-Dominique Lazzari, Marie-Agnes Steiner, Marie de Moerl (1812–68), Crescenzia Nierklutsch, Victorie Courtier (1811–88), Louise Lateau (1858–83), Marie-Julie Jahenny, Therese Neumann (died 1962) and Padre Pio (died 1968) bring the line of stigmatists to the twentieth century.

Padre Pio (Francesco Forgione of Pietrelcina) was a Capucin monk in the convent of San Giovanni Rotondo. Reportedly, in 1918 bleeding scars pierced his hands and feet and produced approximately a glassful of blood and water daily. Physicians certified the fact. In 1926 the stigmata of Therese Neumann, of Konnersreuth, developed during Lent. There was no evidence of infection or inflammation and blood flowed freely every Friday from the wounds. She also shed tears of blood.

In some cases the stigmata appear as simple red marks, in others as blister-like wounds oozing blood and lymph. The flow of blood, according to many testimonies, conforms to the supposed position of a body on the cross. The individual bearing stigmata may lie in bed and the blood appears to flow up the toes in defiance of gravity. In the case of Dominique Lazzari, of Tyrol, Lord Shrewsbury testified to this fact. He also referred to the statement of a German physician that the stigmatic could not endure water and was never washed, yet the blood sometimes suddenly disappeared, leaving the stigmatic with clean skin on unsoiled bedding. The wounds were often said to be luminous and to exhale a scent. Supposedly, the wounds never produced pus and after death the entire body frequently became exempt from putrefaction.

During the nineteenth century, physicians investigated some 29 reported cases of stigmatization and were convinced of the honesty of the subjects and the objective reality of the phenomenon.

One difficulty in assessing the strictly Christian spiritual value of stigmatization is due to the perception that some stigmatics have not been especially religious. Moreover similar phenomena have been reported of Islamic ascetics, who appear to have reproduced the wounds received by Muhammed the Prophet in spreading the message of Islam. Experiments with posthypnotic suggestion have shown that burns, blisters, and similar wounds may be produced on the body as a result of strong suggestion, and it is possible that some cases of stigmatization resulted from conscious or unconscious selfhypnosis.

Professor Jean-Martin Charcot was the first to demonstrate in an experiment the role of autosuggestion in stigmatic or borderland phenomena. Hereward Carrington in Psychic Oddities (1952) cited this case from an original document:

“On the afternoon of May 1st, 1916, I was standing in my hall, preparing to go out, when I saw the knob of my front door slowly turn. I stood still, awaiting developments; gradually the door opened, and I saw a man standing there. As he saw me he quickly closed the door and ran down the stairs and out of the front door. (He was, in fact, a burglar, trying to enter my apartment.) The interesting thing about the experience is this: that during the moment he was standing in the door, although he did not actually move, I had the distinct impression that he had run up the hall and grasped me firmly by the arm, and I was for the moment petrified with fear. The next day my arm was black and blue in the exact spot where I thought he had pinched me; and this mark continued for several days until it finally wore off. I told Dr. Carrington about this two days later when he called, and showed him the mark. Louise W. Kops.”

Charles Richet stated that marks of stigmata,

“... may and do often appear on hysterical persons, bearing predetermined forms and shapes, under the influence either of a strong moral emotion, or of religious delirium. These are facts which have been thoroughly and scientifically established, and they only prove the power of the action of the brain upon the circulatory processes and upon the trophism of the skin.”

As a mediumistic phenomenon, it was reported by many experimenters, including J. Malcolm Bird, in his book My Psychic Adventures (1924). Additionally, the stigmatization of Eleonore Zügün, who had strange bites and scratches on her body, was supposedly recorded in the process of invisible production by the camera.

An experience, resembling stigmatization, was mentioned by Richet in a footnote to his book Thirty Years of Psychical Research (1923). Supposedly, Count Baschieri placed a handkerchief to his eyes and withdrew it stained with blood. His eyes had sweated blood. He was unable to discover any conjunctival ecchymosis.

Dermography (skin writing) is a phenomenon of the stigmatic class, but there is an essential difference. Reportedly, stigmata last for months, years, or throughout a lifetime, whereas skin writing disappears in a few minutes or a few hours at the most. A kindred phenomenon to stigmatization is the mark of a burn or in rare cases blood left by the touch of phantom hands.

Reportedly, some devout Christians experience stigmatization. Such individuals usually exhibit wounds that bleed on Good Friday, sometimes accompanied by a personal identification with Christ during crucifixion.

The Case of Ethel Chapman

The phenomenon of stigmatization was studied in the case of British subject Ethel Chapman. A victim of multiple sclerosis, Chapman was paralyzed from the waist down. She was unable to hold things in her hands. Chapman was a patient at the Cheshire Home in Britain, where she was interviewed by geriatrician Dr. Colin Powell, who found no indication of depression, neurosis, or psychosis. There was also no indication of the condition known as dermatitis artifacta, when subjects scratch or otherwise harm themselves for various reasons. Chapman appeared friendly, mentally stable, and far from gaining any psychological advantage from stigmata, she found it a burden. Various witnesses testified to seeing wounds on Chapman's hands and feet on Good Friday. In a BBC radio interview in 1973, Chapman gave a description of her first vision and sensations in the following words:

“I remember saying quite plainly ‘Oh Lord, please show me in some way you're there.’ In the early hours of the morning, I thought it was a dream. I felt myself being drawn on to the Cross. I felt the pain of the nails through my hands and through my feet. I could see the crowds, all jeering and shouting and, of course, it was in a foreign language, I don't know what they were saying. I felt myself all the agony and all the pain that the Lord Himself went through. . . .”

Chapman also claimed that on occasions she had been lifted up in the air and smelled supernatural sweet perfumes (see also odor of sanctity). However, it is believed that sensations of floating often occur in subjects with heightened or mystical consciousness and do not involve any actual physical levitation. Reportedly, in some cases, “astral projection” or out-of-body experience may occur in which a subtle body appears to leave the physical body.

Witnesses affirmed seeing fresh blood on Chapman's hands on Good Friday and it is believed that Chapman was unable to inflict the wounds herself due to her paralysis. Neither Chapman nor her medical adviser at the Cheshire Home seemed interested in publicity or cultism. Chapman, like some other stigmatics, seemed to regard the phenomenon as a mark of divine love due to her illness. Word spread about Chapman's stigmata and people wrote asking for her help or healing. She regularly devoted time to prayers on behalf of the afflicted.

The objective aspects of such phenomena as stigmata take second place to the spiritual issues and their resolution. The rationalistic explanation of stigmata seems to be of interest chiefly for any light it may throw on the way that the phenomenon works, but it says nothing of the mystery of the function of stigmata in the spiritual life of the subject.

Sources:

Carty, Charles M. The Two Stigmatists: Padre Pio & Therese Neumann. Dublin: Veritas, 1956.

Fielding-Ould, Fielding. The Wonders of the Saints in the Light of Spiritualism. London: John M. Watkins, 1919.

Siwek, Paul. The Riddle of Konnersreuth. Dublin: Browne & Nolan, 1956.

Summers, Montague. The Physical Phenomena of Mysticism. London: Rider, 1950.

Thurston, Herbert. The Physical Phenomena of Mysticism. London, 1952.

Wilson, Ian. The Bleeding Mind. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1988.

Stiles, Joseph D.

American printer who, in the early days of Spiritualism, received through automatic writing remarkable prophecies of the impending Civil War. The story was published under the title Twelve Messages from John Quincy Adams through Joseph D. Stiles in 1859 by Josiah Brigham. The author had met Stiles in June 1854. The messages were written by Stiles in trance from August 1854 until March 1858. They came in John Quincy Adams's handwriting and under his signature.

Stiles also produced other remarkable autographs. One prophecy—"I thus boldly prophesy the dissolution of the American Confederacy, and the destruction of slavery"—was signed "George Washington" with every peculiarity of Washington's difficult signature.

St. Irvyne; or the Rosicrucian

A turgid Gothic novel published in 1811 by Percy Bysshe Shelley under the pseudonym "Gentleman of the University of Oxford." It derives from the genre of Ann Radcliffe (1764–1823) and Matthew Gregory Lewis (1775–1881) and may also have been influenced by William Godwin's novel St. Leon; A Tale of the Sixteenth Century (1799). It tells the story of a man whose desire for the elixir of life leads him to make a compact with the devil. (See also English occult fiction; Rosicrucians)

St. John's Crystal Gold

A mysterious and possibly symbolic operation, described by alchemist Thomas Vaughan (1622–1666), who wrote under the name Eugenius Philalethes:

"In regard of the Ashes of Vegetables, although their weaker exterior Elements expire by violence of the fire, yet their Earth cannot be destroyed, but is Vitrified. The Fusion and Transparency of this substance is occasioned by the Radical moisture or Seminal water of the Compound. This water resists the fury of the fire, and cannot possibly be vanquished. 'In hac Aquâ' (saith the learned Severine), 'Rosa latet in Hieme.'

"These two principles are never separated; for Nature proceeds not so far in her Dissolutions. When death hath done her worst, there is a Union between these two, and out of them shall God raise us to the last day, and restore us to a spiritual constitution. I do not conceive there shall be a Resurrection of every Species, but rather their Terrestrial parts, together with the element of water (for 'there shall be no more sea'—Revelations), shall be united in one mixture with the Earth, and fixed to a pure Diaphanous substance.

"This is St. John's Crystal Gold, a fundamental of the New Jerusalem—so called, not in respect of Colour, but constitution. Their Spirits, I suppose, shall be reduced to their first Limbus, a sphere of pure, ethereal fire, like rich Eternal Tapestry spread under the throne of God." (See also alchemy)

St. John's Wort

General term for the plant species Hypericum. In classical mythology, the summer solstice was a day dedicated to the sun, and was believed to be a day on which witches held their festivities. St. John's Wort was its symbolic plant. People used to judge from it whether their future would be lucky or unlucky, as it grew they read in its progressive character their future lot. This traditional lore carried over into the Christian era, when this festival period was dedicated to St. John's Wort or root. It became a talisman against evil.

In one of the old Scottish romantic ballads, a young lady falls in love with a demon, who tells her:

Gin you wish to be leman mine [my lover]

Lay aside the St. John's Wort and the vervain.

When hung up on St. John's Day, together with a cross over the door, this plant was supposed to keep out the devil and other evil spirits. To gather the root at sunrise on St. John's Day and to retain it in the house, gave luck to the family in their undertakings, especially in those begun on that day.

St. Joseph of Copertino (1603–1663)

St. Joseph of Copertino, a seventeenth-century Roman Catholic monk, is still remembered for his reported levitations, many of which were seen by multiple witnesses. He was born Joseph Dasa on June 17, 1603, in Copertino in Northern Italy into a poor family and spent his youthful years preparing himself for the monastic life. His neighbors were aware of his psychic abilities, though they did not blossom until after he joined the Franciscans and was ordained in 1628.

Various incidents of levitation began to occur without planning or control by Fr. Joseph, and no overall pattern emerged. It was noted that many of his levitations occurred as he was in prayer or engaged in veneration of the Virgin Mary. On one occasion he levitated in front of Pope Urban VIII who saw him hover in the air for several minutes. The pope was merely one among many notables of the era who testified to seeing Joseph in the air. The Duke of Brunswick was even taken into the air with Joseph. While the church built much of its case for being the prime contact point with God from the miraculous occurrences that happen among its members, it was somewhat embarrassed by Joseph's paranormal life. They kept him from the public as much as possible and at one point had him examined by the Inquisition. However, in his later years, he won the support of Pope Urban VIII.

The levitations of Joseph remain baffling and inexplicable. They are difficult to dismiss, having been so thoroughly documented from so many sources. They were not promoted, and the very people who tried to keep Joseph from becoming a public spectacle were among those who left the best records of his activity. They also remain an anomaly, his levitations finding few repetitions in other lives. Several medieval monks were reported to have levitated, including St. Philip of Neri and Francis Loyola, but their examples never approached the quality or quantity of Joseph's. The most famous modern levitator was Spiritualist medium Daniel Dunglas Home (1833–1886), who also had several spectacular levitations witnessed by a number of people.

Joseph died in 1663. It would only be some years later when the church reversed its opinion of him and canonized him. His levitations were an essential part of their considerations leading to his beatification. The case against him in the beatification process was conducted by Prosper Labertini, who later as Pope Benedict XIV read the beatification decree. Joseph was canonized in 1767. His feast day was set as September 18.

Sources:

Chambers, Paul. Paranormal People. London: Blandford, 1998.

Gauch, Patricia Lee. The Little Man Who Flew. New York: Putnam, 1980.

St. Leon: A Tale of the Sixteenth Century

A Gothic novel by William Godwin (1756–1836), first published in 1799. It may have been suggested by stories of the mysterious Comte de Saint Germain and the curious book Her- mippus Redivivus; or The Sage's Triumph Over Old Age and the Grave by J. H. Cohausen (1744).

Godwin used this novel to propagate some of the ideas expressed in his work An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness (2 vols., 1793). St. Leon sought to show that “boundless wealth, freedom from disease, weakness and death are as nothing in the scale against domestic affection and the charities of private life.” (See also Signor Gualdi; occult English fiction; St. Irvyne; or the Rosicrucian)

Stobart, St. Clair (Mrs. Stobart Greenhalgh) (d. 1954)

Author, playwright, and prominent figure in British Spiritualism. She was founder of the Women's Sick and Wounded Convoy Corps during the Balkan War in 1912–13, when she served with the Bulgarian Red Cross. During World War I she organized hospitals in Belgium and France for St. John's Ambulance Association, was taken prisoner by the Germans, and condemned to be shot as a spy. She survived, and in September 1915 was appointed commander of column, First Serbian English Field Hospital.

She lectured for the British Ministry of Information in Canada and Ireland (1917–18) and was a candidate for the Westminster borough at the London County Council Election of 1913. She was a founder and vice president of the SOS Society and chairman and leader of the Spiritualist Community, London, which was concerned with religious and educational aspects of Spiritualism.

She was life patron of the British College of Psychic Science and a member of the council of the World Congress of Faiths. She was an active lecturer and campaigner for the alliance between Spiritualism and Christianity. She died December 7, 1954.

Sources:

- Stobart, St. Clair. Ancient Lights. N.p., 1923.
 ———. The Either Or of Spiritualism. N.p., 1928.
 ———. Torchbearers of Spiritualism. N.p., 1925.

Stoicheomancy

A method of divination that is practiced by opening the works of Homer or Virgil and reading as an oracular statement the first verse that presents itself. It is regarded as a form of rhapsodomancy.

Stoker, Bram [Abraham] (1847–1912)

Writer of books on occult themes and creator of the deathless vampire Dracula. He was born on November 8, 1847, in Dublin, Ireland. Stoker was named Abraham after his father but later preferred the short form “Bram.”

He was a sickly child for some years although quite athletic as a young man. Perhaps his brooding childhood first engendered those imaginative horrors that found expression in his great vampire story and other weird thrillers. His mother had told him tales of the banshee, the Irish fairy whose terrifying wails announce death in the family, and also of the great cholera plague that had claimed thousands of victims in an Ireland ravaged by starvation and foreign occupation.

Stoker studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and became a member of the college's Philosophical Society, later being elected president. His first essay delivered to the society was titled “Sensationalism in Fiction and Society.” He was auditor for the Historical Society and also developed a great interest in theater. At age 19 he was electrified by a performance of the great actor Henry Irving, whose company he later joined as a manager.

Stoker graduated with honors in science in 1870 and spent ten uneventful years as a civil servant at Dublin Castle. His first book was the prosaic but quite useful The Duties of Clerks of Petty Sessions (1879). In 1878 he married Florence Balcombe, a beautiful woman who had been on friendly terms with Oscar Wilde.

After a period as part-time drama critic, newspaper editor, and barrister at law, he became acting manager for Henry Irving, accompanying him on his British and American tours. Stoker was a hardworking manager and faithful friend to Irving for 27 years until Irving's death in 1905.

His masterpiece, Dracula, was written at odd moments and weekends during a busy career. It owed the name of its basic character to chance conversation with the intrepid Hungarian scholar-explorer Arminius Vambéry (1832–1913), who visited Dublin on a lecture tour.

It seems that Vambéry told Stoker about Romanian legends of the bloodthirsty tyrant Prince Vlad Tepes (known as Dracula, or “son of Dracul”). Stoker also researched in libraries in Whitby and London and perfected his knowledge of the background of the Transylvanian countryside, in which he set his fictional count. Some of the weird atmosphere of his story probably derived from the vampire story Carmilla, written by another Dubliner, Sheridan Le Fanu, and first published in 1871.

In addition to his immortal Dracula, Stoker published other novels and stories: The Snake's Pass (1890), The Watter's Mow (1895), The Shoulder of Shasta (1895), Miss Betty (1898), The Mystery of the Sea (1902), The Jewel of Seven Stars (1904), The Man (1905), The Gates of Life (1908), Lady Athlyne (1908), Snowbound (1908), The Lady of the Shroud (1909), and The Lair of the White Worm (1911). His volume of short stories Dracula's Guest was published posthumously in 1937; the title story was originally a chapter in the manuscript of Dracula, deleted to shorten the work. He died April 20, 1912. His greatest work, at least to himself, was his biography of his mentor, Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving (2 vols., 1906). He also wrote an interesting volume called Famous Impostors (1910).

Bram Stoker's memory and his association with Gothic literature is kept alive by various societies, notably the Bram Stoker Society (c/o David Lass, Hon. Secretary, Regent House, Trinity College, Dublin, 2, Ireland); the Dracula Society (36 Elliston House, 100 Wellington St., London, SE10 QQF, England); The Count Dracula Fan Club (29 Washington Sq. W., New York, NY 10011); and the Transylvanian Society of Dracula (P.O. Box 91611, Santa Barbara, CA 93190–1611). (See also Fiction, English Occult)

Sources:

- Dalby, Richard. Bram Stoker: A Bibliography of First Editions. London, 1983.
 Farson, Daniel. The Man Who Wrote Dracula: A Biography of Bram Stoker. New York: St. Martin's, 1976.
 Ludlam, Harry. A Biography of Dracula: The Life Story of Bram Stoker. London: Fireside Press, 1962.
 Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1994.
 Roth, Phyllis A. Bram Stoker. Boston: Twayne, 1982.
 Stoker, Bram. Dracula. London: Constable, 1897.
 ———. Dracula's Guest and Other Weird Stories. London: George Routledge & Sons, 1914.

Stokes, Doris (1920–1987)

British psychic who established a worldwide reputation for her clairaudience. Born Doris Sutton, January 6, 1920, in Grantham, Lincolnshire, she grew up in poverty. Her father was gassed in World War I and retired on a small pension; Doris's mother was obliged to take in laundry work to augment the family income. Her father died while Doris was still in school. She left school at age 14 and became a nurse. During this period she discovered she had psychic abilities, but they remained undeveloped.

At 24, she married John Stokes, an army paratrooper. During World War II, she was officially notified that her husband had been killed in action. Reportedly, her dead father appeared to her, however, and stated that her husband was alive and would return, which he did.

Later Doris had another vision, in which her father appeared again to warn her that her baby son would soon die but that he would take good care of him after death. Although the child was perfectly healthy, he died at the time and date predicted. Subsequently John and Doris attended a local Spiritualist church, where Doris claimed she was told that she would become a medium. She was unwilling at first, but gradually her mediumship developed. It principally took the form of hearing spirit voices.

In her autobiography, Voices in My Ear (1980), she describes the problems and temptations of a young medium. She was often worried about losing continuity with the spirit voices and the members of the audience for whom the messages came. She was advised by a visiting medium to use one of the "tricks of the trade" by arriving at the meeting early, listening to what people said to each other, then slipping away and writing down conversations and names, to be used later to keep contact between the spirit voices and the audience.

It seemed like cheating, she said, but at her next meeting Stokes tried it, and it was successful, until in the middle of a communication that had been "helped out" in this way contact with the spirit voice was suddenly broken. She struggled to continue, but dried up and had to break off. After two more spirit communications, her spirit guide, "Ramonov," supposedly told her to go back to the recipient of the message and apologize.

This happened at two meetings, after which Stokes determined never again to help out spirit communications in that way, in spite of the fear she felt at losing contact. After that, she openly admitted it to the audience if she lost contact with the spirit voices and simply tried to reestablish the link. She warned other developing mediums to be brave enough to admit it if no messages were being received. In 1948 her credentials as a bona fide clairaudient were endorsed by the Spiritualists National Union in England.

In more than thirty years of mediumship, Stokes attracted large and enthusiastic audiences and also appeared on popular radio and television shows in Australia, New Zealand, and the United States. She often dumbfounded skeptical reporters and presenters by the accuracy of her spirit messages. Her reputation as a Spiritualist superstar was phenomenal. On her Australian tour, she packed the massive Sydney Opera House three nights in a row, and a private plane was chartered to take her from city to city. A television soap opera was postponed to make room for her.

Yet this international fame came only in later life. Prior to the mid-1970s, she had lived in modest circumstances in Lancaster, working as a nurse, or giving her mediumistic services to Spiritualist churches for no more than modest traveling expenses, sometimes giving private consultations for £1 (two or three dollars).

Stokes moved to London and became well known as a clairaudient medium, but she never ceased to be amazed by her growing fame. She made no showbiz concessions but appeared on stage in a simple frock, sitting in an armchair, and speaking to her audience in colloquial language.

Her fame attracted derisive and often hostile criticism from skeptics, but she met controversy head on and would not be bullied. In 1980 she appeared on a British television show with professional magician James Randi, who denounced her (without evidence) as a liar and a fake. When Doris challenged Randi to appear with her and prove her a fake, he declined.

In addition to Voices in My Ear Doris Stokes wrote several other popular books of reminiscences: More Voices in My Ear (1981), Innocent Voices in My Ear (1983), A Host of Voices (1984), Whispering Voices (1985), Voices of Love (1986), and Joyful Voices (1987). Their combined sales exceeded two million copies. Unfortunately, in her last years, she was quite ill and had to go through several operations. She died May 8, 1987, two weeks after surgery for removal of a brain tumor.

Stokes, Henry Newlin (1859–1942)

Theosophist and editor, born in 1859 at Moorestown, New Jersey. Stokes attended Haverford College (B.S.) and Johns Hopkins University (Ph.D., 1884). He later did postgraduate work in Germany and Switzerland. He returned to the United States in 1889 and became a chemist for the U.S. Geological Survey. He wrote articles for scientific journals and served a term as president of the Chemical Society of Washington, D.C. He moved to the Bureau of Standards in 1903.

Early in the new century the agnostic Stokes began a search in esoteric philosophy that led him to Theosophy and the writings of Annie Besant. He joined the Theosophical Society in 1903 and the following year also became a member of a small, independent theosophical organization, the Oriental Esoteric (OE) Head Center. The OE had been headquartered in Paris but had a small group in Washington. In 1905 Stokes helped establish the Oriental Esoteric Library as a focal point of occult information in the District. In 1909 he retired from the Bureau of Standards. During this time his former wife spread rumors alleging that he was involved with Anna Marsland, the head of the OE.

Over the next three years he devoted his increased free time to the OE, especially to developing the library, into which he poured much of his own finances. In 1910 he and Marsland broke with the Paris headquarters and established the Oriental Esoteric Society as a separate entity. Then, in 1912, he and Marsland split, and he sued the OE Society for the library, claiming that he had largely built it with his own money. The court agreed and gave him the books. He then aligned the library as an independent but associated organization of the American section of the Theosophical Society.

By 1911 Stokes had begun a periodical, the O. E. Library Critic, which became his means of livelihood for the rest of his life. After his break with Marsland he conceived the Critic as an independent theosophical periodical serving the larger cause of Theosophy. All was fine for a few years, but in the wake of the founding of the theosophically based Liberal Catholic Church in 1916, he turned on the church and especially bishops Charles W. Leadbeater and James I. Wedgwood. Stokes attacked Leadbeater for the new teachings he was introducing into the society and condemned the homosexual preferences of Wedgwood. He went on to attack theosophical offshoots such as the Aquarian Foundation, the Arcane School, and the I AM Movement.

Stokes couched his criticism of the new trends in the theosophical movement under the slogan Back to Blavatsky, a phrase he first used in the November 14, 1917 issue of the Critic. He lauded the groups and independent lodges that still adhered to the writings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, the co-founder of the Theosophical Society. He did not leave the international Theosophical Society and is credited with reintroducing Blavatsky's writings to the general membership.

Stokes continued to edit the Critic until his death on September 20, 1942.

Sources:

Santucci, James. "H. N. Stokes and the O. E. Library Critic." Theosophical History 1, 6 (April 1986): 129–39.

———. "H. N. Stokes' Early Contact with the Theosophical Society." Theosophical History 2, 1 (January 1987): 4–22.

Stolisomancy

Divination from the manner in which a person dresses. In ancient Rome the emperor Augustus believed that a military revolt was predicted on the morning of its occurrence when his attendant buckled his right sandal to his left foot.

Stomach, Seeing with the

A phenomenon occasionally observed by the followers of Franz Anton Mesmer in their somnambules (hypnotic subjects). In a cataleptic state closely resembling death, the subject would sometimes show no signs of intelligence when questions were directed to the ears, but if the questions were addressed to the pit of the stomach, or sometimes to the fingertips or toes, an answer would be given immediately. Several such cases were recorded by one Dr. Pététin, of Lyons, France, who in 1808 published Électricité Animale, and by other mesmerists. Not only hearing, but seeing, tasting, and smelling were apparently performed by the stomach, independent of the sensory organs.

Pététin attributed the phenomenon to “animal electricity” and stated that objects placed on the patient’s stomach were not seen when they were wrapped in wax or silk, that is, non-conductors. It was believed that the best way to communicate with a subject in the cataleptic state was for the operator to place his hand on the subject’s stomach and address questions to the fingertips of his own free hand.

This trance phenomenon, as well as others similar to it, might now be considered to be the result of suggestion or hyperesthesia. (See also Eyeless Sight; Transposition of the Senses)

Stonehenge

Ancient prehistoric monument of standing stones located in Wiltshire, England. The name derives from the Old English hengen (“hung up”), referring to the horizontal lintel stones. Over the centuries, legend ascribed Stonehenge to Druidic, Roman, and Danish construction, but it is now generally accepted that it dates from Neolithic times and stands as the culmination of the period of megalith construction, remnants of which can be found across the British Isles. It was probably last in use about 1400 B.C.E. Megalithic (large stone) monuments exist in many locations in Europe.

A major step in understanding the use and significance of Stonehenge occurred in the 1960s when it was discovered that the alignment of the stones seems to facilitate the prediction of a variety of astronomical events, such as the summer solstice, and were thus probably related to late Neolithic worship ceremonies.

The Stonehenge site is composed of three distinct elements—an outer circle of local sarsen stones and two inner circles of blue stones from the Prescelly Mountains of Wales, 200 kilometers (125 miles) away. The first and third circles are capped with stone lintels, and the whole construction is encircled by a ditch, inside the bank of which are 56 pits known as the “Aubrey Holes” and a cemetery associated with them.

Isolated outside the stone circles is the Heel stone, over which the sun rises on Midsummer Day (June 24). It is clear that Stonehenge had special astronomical significance, since, in addition to the marking of the summer solstice by the Heel stone, the center of the great circle indicated the orbits of sun and moon, and holes were positioned for posts to mark these orbits. The whole construction indicates remarkable astronomical and mathematical knowledge on the part of the ancient builders. Like the pyramids of ancient Egypt, Stonehenge and similar monuments also involved considerable engineering skill in mining and transporting the huge stones.

Prior to modern archaeological investigations, Stonehenge was surrounded by confusing legends of origin and use. Radiocarbon dating has now established a date of around 2000 B.C.E.

for the first monument, the second a few centuries later, and the third about the middle of the second millennium B.C.E. It is possible that the Druids inherited an oral tradition of the significance of Stonehenge and used it for sacred rituals involving sun worship.

Folklore credits such sites with magical power, and they have been associated with witchcraft rites. In France young girls would slide down such ancient stones with bare buttocks in the belief that it would make them fertile.

Early Christian missionaries attempted to absorb or neutralize such occult traditions by building churches inside prehistoric mounds. In medieval times, at the great stone monument at Avebury in southern Britain, there was a ceremony in which a single stone was dislodged and ritually attacked to symbolize the victory of the Christian Church over the Devil. Most sites, including Stonehenge, have also suffered vandalism over the centuries.

Modern Stonehenge

In the 1980s Stonehenge became the center of another strange ritual every midsummer. Thousands of hippies, living a nomadic life in battered automobiles (often unlicensed), reminiscent of the American dust bowl days, descended on the fields surrounding Stonehenge and set up makeshift camps, intending to gain access to Stonehenge to celebrate the summer solstice. But the site has been fenced off with barbed wire and the solstice ceremony restricted to a modern revival Druid organization and no more than six hundred ticket-holding visitors. To prevent the hippies from overrunning the site, farmers annually barricaded paths and byways with trailers and machinery, while hundreds of police stood by in riot gear.

For many years there was a ritual battle between hippies and police. Rocks, bottles, and other objects were thrown, while police with helmets and batons forced back the intruders and arrested many of them. After the summer solstice, the hippies were obliged to retreat to their battered vehicles.

Stonehenge remains one of England’s most visited tourist sites in spite of the fence, which prevents visitors from walking among the stones.

Sources:

Burl, Aubrey. The Stone Circles of the British Isles. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1976.

Chippendale, Christopher. Stonehenge Complete. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1983.

Hawkins, Gerald. Stonehenge Decoded. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1965. Reprint, London: Souvenir Press, 1966.

Hitching, Francis. Earth Magic. London: Cassell, 1976.

Mitchell, J. Astro-Archaeology. London: Thames & Hudson, 1977.

Newham, C. A. The Astronomical Significance of Stonehenge. UK: John Blackburn, 1972.

Thom, Alexander. Megalithic Sites in Britain. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1967.

Stowe, John R. (1956–)

John R. Stowe, a spiritual teacher, cofounder of Gay Spirit Visions, and founder of EarthFriends, was born in 1956. He lived a closeted gay existence until 1979, when he began a quest to discover what it meant to live as an aware, spiritually-engaged gay man. As with many gay men, much of that struggle meant dealing with negative self images acquired from growing up in a world that does not accept homosexuality as a legitimate option amid the myriad options from which people can choose.

After coming out, he found employment as a bodyworker/masseur and pursued his spiritual and self-understanding quest through a spectrum of alternative spiritual options from the gay-informed Christianity of Episcopal priest Malcolm

Boyd to channeller Andrew Ramer. He eventually decided that people have the right to their own spiritual path and that personal spirituality begins in listening to the inner self. He found bodywork as one tool that assisted the exploration of the inner self, but also found help in Jungian reflections on archetypes. He soon emerged as a spiritual teacher serving the gay community primarily in the Atlanta, Georgia, area.

In 1990, Stowe joined with a small group of friends who had pursued similar spiritual journeys, including Ramer, to found Gay Spirit Visions. The primary program of Gay Spirit Visions is an annual conference where gay men gather to explore alternative spiritual options. The work of the group, which Stowe has described as mutual mentoring, provided the atmosphere for him to develop his focus on the archetypes that led to his book, Gay Spirit Warrior (1999). Gay Spirit Warrior was written to assist men begin an inner journey and start to experience the reality of the self, both positive and negative. Stowe views archetypes as universal characters that reside in the human consciousness. Each person carries the archetypes developed to a greater or lesser strength. By looking at each archetype successively, and assessing how each manifests in its particularity, one can come to new levels of self-understanding.

In 1984, Stowe had discovered flower essences, substances distilled from flowers and other plants by a particular method first discovered by Edward Bach, a British physician. Since Bach's death in the 1930s, the number of flowers processed in the manner he discovered has greatly expanded, especially after the formation of the Flower Essence Society in 1979. Stowe began to make his own flower essences from flowers found in the Southeastern United States and use them in his bodywork sessions. In the mid-1980s he founded EarthFriends to manufacture and sell the essences he had developed. One line of products, Exploring Gayspirit Oils, is marketed primarily to gay men.

Sources:

Nichols, Jack. "Interview with John R. Stowe." Gay Today (October 1999).

Stowe, John R. Gay Spirit Warrior. Findhorn Press, 1999.

Strange Magazine

Quarterly magazine featuring "all aspects of the inexplicable as it appears in science, art, literature, philosophy, technology, magic, religion and everything else we call reality." It gives special attention to Fortean phenomena (i.e., scientifically anomalous phenomena of the kind originally cataloged by Charles H. Fort) and includes book reviews and news. Address: P.O. Box 2246, Rockville, MD 20847. The magazine is now accessible on the Internet at <http://www.strangemag.com/>.

Sources:

Strange Magazine Online. <http://www.strangemag.com/>. March 8, 2000.

Stratton, F(rederick) J(ohn) M(arrian) (1881–1960)

Professor of astrophysics and a notable member of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London. He was born on October 16, 1881, in Birmingham, England. He studied at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge University (B.A., 1904; M.A., 1908). In 1928 he began his long tenure as professor of astrophysics and director of the Solar Physics Observatory, Cambridge (1928–47), with time out during World War II to serve with the Royal Corps of Signals. After the war he became president of Gonville and Caius College (1946–48).

An outstanding scientist of his day, Stratton took a great interest in spontaneous phenomena concerning psi and hauntings, and his reports appear in the Journal of the SPR. He was a member of the SPR for some 60 years and served as president (1953–55) and vice president (1955–60). He was also a charter member of the Parapsychological Association. He died September 2, 1960.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Stratton, F. J. M. "Four Modern Ghosts." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 39 (1938).

———. "Psychical Research—A Lifelong Interest." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (1953).

Strauch, Inge H(enriette) (1932–)

German parapsychologist and research associate in psychology. She was born on April 4, 1932, in Dresden, Germany, and studied at Freiburg University (M.A. psychology, 1956; Ph.D., 1958). While completing her doctorate she was a research associate at the Institut für Grenzgebiete der Psychologie and Psychohygiene, Freiburg (1956–58), and after graduation she became a research associate for the Department for Border Areas of Psychology at Freiburg University, where she stayed for many years. She served as managing editor of the Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie und Grenzgebiete der Psychologie and was an associate member of the Parapsychological Association.

Her special interest in dream research resulted in her 1960 paper "Investigations into Various Stages of Dream Recall," which became Report 22 at the 1960 Congress of Deutsche Gesellschaft für Psychologie. During 1961–62 she undertook a study tour in the United States and conducted electroencephalographical research on dreams at New York's Mount Sinai Hospital and electroencephalographical studies of the neurological basis of psychic phenomena at the Parapsychology Foundation, New York. She also conducted quantitative research at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Strauch, Inge H. "Dreams and Psi in the Laboratory." In Psi Favorable States of Consciousness, edited by R. Cavenna. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

———. "Medical Aspects of 'Mental' Healing." International Journal of Parapsychology 5 (1963).

Strieber, Whitley (1945–)

Best-selling author of fantasy and horror stories, several of which, including Wolfen and The Hunger, have been adapted as successful movies. In 1987 he completed a nonfiction book, Communion, in which he relates his personal experiences in encounters with what he believes to be extraterrestrials. The encounters included an abduction and examination by strange creatures in a flying craft. The response led to two follow-up books on the same theme: Transformation: The Breakthrough (1988) and a novel, Majestic (1989). All three made the best-seller lists.

Strieber was born on June 13, 1945, in San Antonio, Texas. He was educated at the University of Texas (B.A., 1968) and the London School of Economics and Political Science (certificate, 1968). From 1970 through 1977 he wrote novels while working at an advertising company, becoming account supervisor and vice president.

The idea for his novel The Wolfen (1978), later made into a successful movie, is said to have arisen from the experience of encountering a pack of feral dogs while walking through Central Park in New York. His other publications include Black Magic (1982), The Night Church (1983), Wolf of Shadows (1986) (with James W. Kunetka), and The Consequences of the Twentieth Century (1986). His novel The Hunger (1981), notable for the very different twist it gave to the vampire myth, was made into a movie in 1983. Strieber has also designed games based on various periods of history, including a game about the late Middle Ages entitled "1480: Age of Exploration" and one covering computer games. He has participated in archaeological projects in Central America and has been involved with a scientific group attempting to authenticate the Turin shroud.

Soon after the publication of Communion, Strieber received more than five hundred letters, many claiming similar experiences of contact by extraterrestrials or other creatures. His experience was further publicized in an article in the International UFO Reporter (January/February 1987), in which Strieber characterizes such reports as "visitor experiences."

Strieber eventually came to the conclusion that, in spite of the intrusive nature of the initial abduction experience, the extraterrestrials were a benevolent group. In 1989 he founded the Communion Foundation to assist in establishing a productive relationship with the space beings. Professional psychologists working for the foundation began to catalog similar reports in a database and follow-up studies involving mental and physical tests with selected volunteers were planned.

Strieber immediately ran into conflict with the ufological community, which draws a sharp distinction between the more negative abduction reports and the more positive claims of encounters with flying saucers, which are classified as contactee accounts. Strieber's account began to sound more and more like a contactee story of the type that had been written off as either fraudulent or religiously hyperbole. In 1991 he closed the Communion Foundation and returned to fiction writing. He reportedly is still interested in the field, however, and has continued having encounters with extraterrestrials.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s. Vol. 1 of The UFO Encyclopedia. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Conroy, Ed. Report on "Communion": An Independent Investigation of and Commentary on Whitley Strieber's "Communion." New York: William Morrow, 1989.

Strieber, Whitley. Communion: A True Story. New York: William Morrow, 1987.

———. Majestic. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1989.

———. Transformation: The Breakthrough. New York: William Morrow, 1988.

Striges

In Greek folklore, vampire women with the power to transform themselves into birds of prey or other sinister animals. The striges derived from the Roman strix, a night demon, named for the screech owl. It was believed to attack infants and drain their blood. The strix appears across southern Europe, where it is known variously as strega (Italy), striges (Greece), and strigoi (Romania). The striges differed from other vampire creatures in that they were thought of as living members of the community rather than the returning dead.

Sources:

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1994.

Striporta

Frankish name for a witch. (See also France)

Stroboscopes

Devices that create light pulsations at intervals varying from one flash every few seconds to several flashes per second. They have become a familiar part of the atmosphere of excitement at some dance halls and discotheques, but in different situations they have proved of some assistance in inducing hallucinatory experiences, especially when seen with half-open or even closed eyes.

Pierre Janet did pioneering work with stroboscopes. He flashed lights at mental patients and saw some immediate breakthroughs in their health. The strobes work by a process called entrainment, in which the brain tends to align itself with the frequency of the flashing light. A beam flashed at the right frequency can induce a more relaxed state and cause the brain to change its frequency.

Sources:

Hooper, Judith, and Dick Teresi. Would the Buddha Wear a Walkman? New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990.

Stroking Stones and Images

Cotton Mather (1662–1728) wrote that an Irish American witch produced pain and disease in others by merely wetting her finger with saliva and stroking small images, or sometimes a long, slender stone.

Stromberg, Gustaf (Benjamin) (1882–1962)

Astronomer, lecturer, and author of books on parapsychological subjects. He was born on December 16, 1882, at Gothenburg, Sweden, and studied at the University of Lund, Sweden (Ph.D., 1916). After assisting at the Stockholm Observatory during his school years (1906–13) as World War I began, he moved to the United States to become an astronomer at Mount Wilson Observatory in California, where he remained for the next three decades (1917–46). Above and beyond his astronomical work, he turned his scientific training toward explanations for psychic phenomena. In this endeavor he wrote a number of books and articles. He died January 30, 1962.

Sources:

Stromberg, Gustaf. Det Eviga Sökandet (The Eternal Quest). N.p., 1948.

———. God's Place in Modern Science. N.p., 1958.

———. Psychic Phenomena and Modern Science. N.p., 1957.

———. The Searchers. N.p., 1948.

———. The Soul of the Universe. N.p., 1940.

Strutt, Arthur Charles (1878–1973)

Vice-admiral of the British navy and for a quarter of a century (1933–58) the treasurer of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He was born on October 2, 1878, at Chelmsford, England. He entered the navy in 1892 and was named master of fleet during World War I. He later served as the director of navigation for the Royal Navy (1923–25) and as the naval officer in charge of Dartmouth College. He died in February 1973.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Strutt, John William (3rd Baron Rayleigh) (1842–1919)

Physicist who was president of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, 1919. He was born on November 12, 1842, at Witham, Essex, England, and was educated at Trinity College of Cambridge University (fellow, 1866). At the height of his outstanding career he was named Cavendish Professor of Experimental Physics at Cambridge (1879–84) and then professor of natural philosophy at the Royal Institution (1887–1905). He was also the secretary to the Royal Society for a decade (1887–96). In 1904 he received the Nobel Prize in physics for his isolation of argon. In 1908 he was named chancellor of Cambridge.

Lord Rayleigh became interested in psychical research after reading about the investigations of his colleague Sir William Crookes. He was present at sittings with Kate Fox and Eusapia Palladino. He died on June 30, 1919, a short time after delivering his presidential address to the SPR.

Sources:

Strutt, John William. "Presidential Address." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 30, no. 77 (1918–19).

Strutt, Robert John (4th Baron Rayleigh) (1875–1947)

Physicist and president of the Society for Psychical Research of London from 1937 to 1938. Strutt was born on August 28, 1875, at Witham, Essex, England, the son of John William Strutt. He was educated at Eton College and Trinity College, Cambridge, England (B.A. 1897, M.A. 1901), and like his notable father majored in physics. He was variously a fellow of Trinity College (1900–1906), professor of physics at the Imperial College of Science and Technology, Kensington (1908–19), and president of the Royal Institution of Great Britain (1945–47). Financially independent, he was able to create a private laboratory at which he conducted research for much of his life. He published one of the first volumes on radioactivity. Also like his father, Strutt had an intense interest in psychic research, which gave the subject some standing with fellow scientists.

He died December 13, 1947.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Strutt, Robert John. "A Method of Silhouette Photography by Infra-Red Rays for Use in Mediumistic Investigation." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 41, 128 (1932).

———. "The Problem of Physical Phenomena in Connection with Psychical Research." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 44, 152 (1938).

———. "The Question of Lights Supposed to Have Been Observed near the Poles of a Magnet." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 44, 153 (1938–39).

———. "Some Recollections of Henry Sidgwick." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 44, 156 (1936–39).

Stuart, C(harles) E. (1907–1947)

Parapsychologist. He was born on December 5, 1907, in Pennsylvania and later attended Duke University (B.A., 1932; Ph.D., 1941). He became interested in the work of J. B. Rhine as an undergraduate at Duke and conducted ESP tests on himself and friends. He went on to become a research associate in the Parapsychology Laboratory in 1934, and his doctoral thesis dealt with experimental research in ESP. He was on the laboratory staff at Duke for the rest of his life except for two years at Stanford University (1942–44) as a fellow in psychic research. He took a special interest in psychological conditions and personality factors in relation to ESP, concerning which he wrote several papers. During his many years at the Parapsychology Laboratory he was frequently called upon to answer objections to the methodology of the early ESP experiments. He died March 23, 1947.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Stuart, C. E. "A Classroom ESP Experiment with the Free Response Method." Journal of Parapsychology 9 (1945).

———. "The Effect of Rate of Movement in Card Matching Tests of Extrasensory Perception." Journal of Parapsychology 2 (1938).

———. "GESP Experiment with the Free Response Method." Journal of Parapsychology 10 (1946).

———. "An Interest Inventory Relation to ESP Scores." Journal of Parapsychology 10 (1945).

———. "A Review of Recent Criticisms of ESP Research." Journal of Parapsychology 2, no. 3 (1939).

Stuart, C. E., and J. G. Pratt. A Handbook for Testing Extrasensory Perception. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1937.

Stuart, C. E., J. G. Pratt, J. B. Rhine, B. M. Smith, and J. A. Greenwood. Extrasensory Perception After Sixty Years. New York: Henry Holt, 1940. Rev. ed. Boston: Bruce Humphries, 1966.

Student's International Meditation Society (SIMS)

Organization founded in 1965 to promote the transcendental meditation technique as taught by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. In the early years of the movement in the United States, SIMS and the Spiritual Regeneration Movement were the two major vehicles for spreading the maharishi's teachings, which were mainly focused on college and university campuses.

In 1972 the maharishi announced the World Plan, an overall strategy for sharing his teachings with the world and making them effective in the reformation of society. From that proposal, the World Plan Executive Council was formed to coordinate the different aspects of the plan. SIMS was continued as one of the five divisions of the executive council. The council had headquarters in Europe as well as the United States. Last known address: P.O. Box 390, Lake Shandeele Rd., Livingston Manor, NY 12758.

Studievereniging voor Psychical Research

The Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (Dutch Society for Psychical Research), the oldest of the Dutch parapsychological research facilities, was founded in 1920 by Gerardus Heymans and I. Zeehandelaar. The organization was soon joined by a young psychology student at the University of Utrecht, W. H. C. Tenhaeff. In 1928 Tenhaeff and Paul A. Deitz founded the society's journal, Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie.

The early work of the society focused upon the study of the phenomena generated by the spreading Spiritualist movement in the Netherlands, but over the years laboratory parapsychology found its place in the society's work. Among the impressive research reported by the society was the 1950 study of telepathy in schoolchildren conducted by J. G. Busschbach. Through the remainder of the decade parapsychology gained status in the country, as signaled by the holding of the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies at Utrecht in 1953 and the establishment of a chair of parapsychology and a Parapsychology Institute at the University of Utrecht that same year.

Tenhaeff was named to the chair in parapsychology and given the directorship of the institute at Utrecht. From that time forward he came to dominate the society and resentment grew over his authoritarian leadership. The tension between Tenhaeff and some of the other leading members culminated in 1960 with the withdrawal of a group led by George A. M.

Zorab, who founded the Nederlandse Vereniging voor Parapsychologie.

During the 1960s Tenhaeff became famous both in the Netherlands and throughout the West because of his studies of and extraordinary claims for the psychic abilities of Gerard Croiset, the psychic who became well known for his work in assisting police to solve crimes, especially cases involving missing persons. Tenhaeff authored many articles and books that initially brought him some acclaim, but as people began to give his work close scrutiny, it was discovered that he had falsified data in a number of cases. During the late 1970s his exaggerations, misrepresentations, and alterations of findings became a major scandal in European parapsychology. Tenhaeff tried to withstand the massive attack by calling the religious to his support and suggesting that Communists were behind the attacks upon him. However, by the time of his death in 1981, he had been rejected by his colleagues.

The Studievereniging voor Psychical Research survived the Tenhaeff scandal and was led by Henri van Praag from 1978–1986. Under his management the Parapsychology Institute was transformed into a private organization that existed independently from the university. In 1986, Douwe Bosga became the institute's director and he was succeeded by Dick Bierman who was appointed in 1991. The institute continues a program of lectures for the public and the publication of its journal, Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie. Address: Springweg 7, 3511 VH Utrecht, The Netherlands.

Stukeley, William (1687–1765)

William Stukeley, an antiquarian famous for his research on Stonehenge and related megalithic monuments in Western England, was born in Holbeach, Lincolnshire, England, on November 7, 1687, the son of a lawyer. As a youth, he collected and studied plants, and studied astrology. He entered Bennet College, Cambridge, in 1703 and received his degree in 1708. During his school days he made some notable contributions to the cataloguing of plant life.

After college he studied medicine and opened a medical practice in Lincolnshire in 1710. He moved to London in 1717, and soon became a member of the Royal Society. Meanwhile he continued formal studies in medicine and in 1719 received his medical degree from Cambridge. The following year he was admitted as a fellow to the College of Physicians.

While making his living as a physician, Stukeley also developed a spiritual quest centered upon a recovery of the mysteries from the ancients. He joined a speculative Freemasonry lodge in 1720, hoping to find there the answer to his questions. He also made a number of trips exploring ancient ruins in England, the first result being a book, Itinerarium Curiosum, published in 1724. His book on Stonehenge appeared in 1740.

Through the 1730s he had accepted the idea first broached by John Aubrey in the previous century tying Stonehenge and related stone monuments to ancient Druidism. He had read and made notes from Aubrey's unpublished Monumenta Britannica, and in 1719 began to make annual visits to study the stone remains in Wiltshire. In 1717 a new Druidic order had emerged in England, and John Toland was named its first chief. Stukeley became the second chief following Toland's death in 1722. He took the name Chyndonax and became known to his friends as the Archdruid. His 1740 book on Stonehenge argued that it was of Druid origin, and a later volume made a similar argument for the nearby formation at Avebury. While Aubrey had first broached the idea, it was Stukeley who popularized it and gave it substance with his publications.

In 1726 Stukeley moved back to Lincolnshire, where he laid out a temple to the Druids centered on an apple tree covered with mistletoe. His understanding of Druidism was consistent with his understanding of Christianity, and in 1730, he became a priest in the Church of England. In 1734 he published a book, Paleographia Sacra, in which he argued that Pagan mythology was derived from the biblical tradition.

He spent the rest of his life as a clergyman, though known for some unorthodox quirks. He is remembered for delaying a church service to allow his congregation to experience an eclipse of the sun and of preaching a sermon after receiving a new set of spectacles from a text in Paul's letter to the Corinthians, "Now we see through a glass darkly." He died on February 25, 1765, in Queen Square, Kent, where he had retired. Among the artifacts he left behind that were sold at auction in 1766 was a wooden model of Stonehenge he had carved.

Sources:

Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Elements of the Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element, 1991.

Sturdevant, William D(esmond) (1922–)

Professor of art who was active in the field of parapsychology. He was born July 3, 1922, in Des Moines, Iowa. He attended Drake University, Des Moines (B.S. education, 1945; M.S. education, 1947) and following graduation became an art instructor at New Mexico Western College, Silver City (1947–48). He afterward taught at Minnesota State College at Mankato (1948–55); was an art supervisor for the Joliet public schools, Joliet, Illinois (1955–59); and was assistant professor of art at California Western University, San Diego (1959–61). A practitioner as well as a teacher, Sturdevant has works in the permanent collection of the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and has exhibited widely. He made experimental studies concerning extrasensory color perception and from his findings published two monographs. He was a charter associate of the Parapsychological Association.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Sturdevant, William D. Extrasensory Color Perception. N.p., 1958.

———. Fluorescent Color Perception and Graphic Response in the Perceptually Impaired Child. N.p., 1957.

St. Winifred's Well

St. Winifred's Well, a holy healing well in northern Wales (United Kingdom), is a site related to ancient Celtic Christianity that has come back into prominence as a result of the contemporary Celtic revival. The legend of the well goes back to the fifth century C.E. and the movement of Christian hermits into the region. Among those who studied Christianity with the hermits was Winifred, the daughter of a Welsh chieftain. One day she was attacked by another chieftain and refused his advances. In his anger, he cut off her head. Where the severed head fell, a healing spring well gushed forth. Where her blood splattered the moss turned red and began to emit an odor like violets. The head rolled into a nearby chapel where Bueno, one of the hermits, retrieved it, carried it to the body, and prayed over Winifred. She returned to life. At a later date, Bueno blessed the well and promised that all who came to the well would receive an answer to their prayer.

While the story of Winifred and Bueno is set in the fifth century, it can be dated as a legend only to the twelfth century. Since that time the well has been in use as a healing spring and relics believed to belong to Winifred were placed in the church at Shrewsbury. During the Middle Ages, pilgrims would go to Shrewsbury and then to the well. Along the route they passed stones said to have been covered with her blood. The wife of Henry VII built a large building over the well in 1500. However, not long afterwards, the cult of Winifred was disrupted when King Henry VIII, who at one time had visited the well, moved against the monasteries and pilgrimage sites across his land. The stones along the pilgrimage site were scattered and the relics lost. Only a single finger believed to be Winifred's survived and was hidden away in Rome until 1852, when it was sent back to England and divided between Shrewsbury and the well.

When the Church of England replaced the Roman Catholic Church as the official state religion, Winifred's Well remained a focus of Catholicism in England. Pilgrims continued to come to the site and reported healing through the years that Catholicism was officially outlawed in England. When the church was again given legal status in the middle of the nineteenth century, the well immediately became the scene of official pilgrimages. Today, both Anglicans and Catholics utilize the well shrine. The Church of England sponsors an annual pilgrimage for the handicapped. The Catholic priest in the church adjacent to the shrine blesses pilgrims with Winifred's finger relic. Though it is not as famous as Lourdes, many healings have been reported from the shrine.

Sources:

Charles-Edwards, T. Saint Winifrede and Her Well. London: Catholic Truth Society, 1971.

David, Christopher. Saint Winifrede's Well. Slough, UK: Kenning Press, 1969.

Jones, Francis. The Holy Wells of Wales. Cardiff: University of Wales, 1992.

Subconscious

A term used by some to describe a segment of the mind below the threshold of consciousness and by others as a collective name for mental phenomena dissociated from those directly or introspectively cognized. F. W. H. Myers, an early and prominent psychical researcher, ascribed various supernormal faculties to it. During the early twentieth century, theories involving such faculties eliminated for many any need to appeal to spirit agencies. Others, however, pointed to the subconscious as a means to reconcile mental activity with spirit agencies. The subconscious may be—as J. H. Hyslop pointed out—the very instrument for receiving and transmitting foreign transcendental stimuli, to which, on favorable occasions, it becomes sensitive.

Subjective Phenomena

“Subjective,” as distinguished from “objective,” is a classification for mental phenomena that are not capable of objective validation, as in the case of physical phenomena.

Subliminal

A term first used by A. H. Pierce of Harvard University for sensations beneath the threshold of consciousness, too vague to be individually recognized. F. W. H. Myers extended the meaning to cover all that takes place beneath the consciousness threshold—sensations, thoughts, and emotions that seldom emerge but form a consciousness quite as complex and coherent as the supraliminal one, since they demonstrate processes of mentation and exhibit a continuous chain of memory.

Nevertheless, Myers did not consider the subliminal consciousness a separate self but, together with the supraliminal (normal consciousness) one, a fragment of the larger self revealed through an organism that cannot afford it full manifestation. In this concept he came close to the Hindu Vedanta concepts of jiva (individual soul) as part of atman (collective soul).

Myers attributed most supernormal psychical phenomena to the subliminal self, but not as a complete explanation or exclusion of the spirit hypothesis. On the contrary, his inference was that if our incarnate selves may act in telepathy in at least apparent independence of the fleshly body, the presumption is strong that other spirits may exist independently of the body and may affect us in a similar manner.

Myers divided the influence of the subliminal on the supraliminal into three main areas: (1) When the subliminal mentation cooperates with and supplements the supraliminal, without changing the apparent phase of personality, we have genius. (2) When subliminal operations change the apparent phase of personality from the state of waking toward the direction of trance, we have hypnotism. (3) When the subliminal mentation forces itself up through the supraliminal, without amalgamation, as in crystal vision, automatic writing, and so forth, we have sensory or motor automatism.

Subliminal Self

A term formerly used in psychical research to denote that part of the personality is normally beneath the “threshold” (limen) separating consciousness from unconsciousness. The phrase owed its popularity largely to pioneer researcher F. W. H. Myers, who made use of it to explain the psychic phenomena he had observed. The view of Myers was that only a fraction of the human personality, or soul, finds adequate expression through the ordinary cerebral processes, because the brain and physical organism have not yet reached a very advanced stage of evolution. The soul, in short, is like an iceberg, with a fraction of its bulk above water but with a much greater part submerged.

The subliminal self, according to Myers, is in touch with a reservoir of psychical energy, from which it draws forces that influence the physical organism. Thus the inspiration of genius, the exaltation of the perceptive and intellectual faculties in hypnosis, and such exercises as automatic writing and talking and table turning are caused by great influxes of these psychical forces rather than by any spirit influences.

These hypotheses have been advanced to explain telepathy and communication between the living and the dead, as well as hallucination, automatism, and all the phenomena of hypnotism. But the two former, even if they could be demonstrated, would have to be explained on other grounds, while the others, whose existence is undisputed, are more generally regarded as resulting from cerebral dissociation (i.e., the temporary dislocation of the connecting links between the various neural systems). (See also Subconscious)

Subterranean Cities

A persistent myth of modern occultism concerns the existence of societies residing underground. The myth takes many forms, including stories of underground caverns inhabited by malevolent deros (dwarfs) and subterranean cities inhabited by the survivors of Atlantis or Lemuria, or flying saucer pilots.

Much of this new mythology stems from the publications of the enterprising Raymond A. Palmer in Amazing Stories, Flying Saucers, and Search magazines. In 1945 Palmer introduced the readers of Amazing Stories to the fantasies of Richard S. Shaver, with whom Palmer collaborated in producing what were stoutly claimed to be factual “racial memories” of survivors from Atlantis and Lemuria, originally giants but now degenerated into malevolent dwarfs, influencing mankind by secret rays.

Palmer, who helped focus the first excitement about flying saucers in his magazine Fate in the spring 1948 issue, later went on to publish articles suggesting that saucers came from an underground world entered through the polar ice caps.

Other sources for subterranean mythology include the writings of Robert Ernest Dickhoff and Milenko S. Stevic. In Dickhoff's book Agharta, he describes a vast network of underground tunnels radiating from Antarctica with openings in the United States, Brazil, Tibet, and Pacific islands. These underground strongholds are inhabited by descendants of Martians, who colonized the Earth in prehistory.

Stevic, a Yugoslav-born engineer, lectures about the extensive subterranean cities beneath New York, Tokyo, Leningrad, São Paulo, and large areas of the Atlantic Ocean. Survivors of Atlantis reside in this subterranean world, where they have built huge domes of fiberglass. There are millions of inhabitants, who also contribute illegal immigrants to the United States. There are, apparently, secret entrances to the underground world through a number of churches, including, specifically, St. John the Divine at 103rd Street and Amsterdam in New York. Stevic also claims that Adolf Hitler did not die but reached the United States through a secret tunnel and now lives quietly in New Jersey.

In Livingston, Montana, W. C. and Gladys Hefferlin also publicized a Rainbow City in the Antarctic, founded two million years ago as the focal point of a network of underground tunnels. Heading the large population in Rainbow City are the Ancient Three, descendants of Martians who exercise a favorable influence on world affairs, in contrast to Shaver's malevolent deros. These powerful mystics of Rainbow City won World War II for the Allies by stopping Rommel in Egypt and halting the Japanese in the Pacific.

Early in this century, Frederick Spencer Oliver (writing as the channel for "Phylos the Tibetan") began to speak of people living inside a hollow Mt. Shasta, in northern California. His initial revelations were later strengthened by the revelations of Guy W. Ballard, founder of the I Am Movement. In 1934, writing as Godfré Ray King, Ballard published Unveiled Mysteries, in which he detailed his encounters with a godlike figure named Master Saint-Germain.

Although based somewhat on traditional fairy lore, notions of demonic realms beneath the Earth, and Asian folklore, accounts of underground worlds have emerged as an integral part of modern occult lore. (See also Subterranean Crypts and Temples)

Sources:

Chaney, Earlyne. Revelations of Things to Come. Upland, Calif.: Astara, 1982.

Dickhoff, Robert Ernest. Agharta. Boston: Bruce Humphries, 1951.

Hefferlin, W. C., and Gladys Hefferlin. A Description of the Rainbow City from the Hefferlin Manuscript. Vista, Calif.: Borderland Sciences Research Foundation, n.d.

Ramana Maharshi. Talks with Sri Ramana Maharshi. Vol. 1. Tiruvannamalai, India: Sri Ramanasramam, 1957.

Subterranean Crypts and Temples

Subterranean resorts, crypts, and places of worship have always fascinated the human mind. The mysteries of the Egyptians and other peoples were held in underground crypts, possibly to render these ceremonies still more mysterious to ordinary people, perhaps because it was essential to the privacy they required, or possibly to symbolize the exploration of the hidden parts of the self. The caves of Elephanta, the Roman catacombs, and similar subterranean edifices are also well-known examples. There are also several lesser but perhaps more interesting underground meeting places and temples in various parts of the world.

An Underworld City in Central America

The Jesuit priests of the early eighteenth century left descriptions of the palace of Mitla in Central America that leave no doubt that in their time it contained many subterranean chambers, and one especially appears to have surpassed all others in the dreadful uses to which it was put.

Father Torquemada gave the following description of the place:

"When some monks of my order, the Franciscan, passed, preaching and shriving through the province of Zapoteca, whose capital city is Tehuantepec, they came to a village which was called Mictlan, that is, underworld (hell). Besides mentioning the large number of people in the village they told of buildings which were prouder and more magnificent than any which they had hitherto seen in New Spain. Among them was the temple of the evil spirit and living rooms for his demoniacal servants, and among other fine things there was a hall with ornamented panels, which were constructed of stone in a variety of arabesques and other very remarkable designs. There were doorways there, each one of which was built of but three stones, two upright at the sides and one across them, in such a manner that, although these doorways were very high and broad, the stone sufficed for their entire construction. They were so thick and broad that we were assured there were few like them. There was another hall in these buildings, or rectangular temples, which was erected entirely on round stone pillars very high and very thick that two grown men could scarcely encircle them with their arms, nor could one of them reach the fingertips of the other. These pillars were all in one piece and, it was said, the whole shaft of the pillar measured 5 ells [about 18 feet or 6 meters] from top to bottom, and they were very much like those of the church of Santa Maria Maggiore in Rome, very skillfully made and polished."

Father Burgoa was more explicit with regard to these subterranean chambers:

"There were four chambers above ground and four below. The latter were arranged according to their purpose in such a way that one front chamber served as chapel and sanctuary for the idols, which were placed on a great stone which served as an altar. And for the most important feasts[,] which they celebrated with sacrifices, or at the burial of a king or great lord, the high priest instructed the lesser priests or the subordinate temple officials who served him to prepare the chapel and his vestments and a large quantity of the incense used by them.

"And then he descended with a great retinue, when none of the common people saw him or dared to look in his face, convinced that if they did so they would fall dead to the earth as a punishment for their boldness. And when he entered the chapel they put on him a long white cotton garment made like an alb, and over that a garment shaped like a dalmatic, which was embroidered with pictures of wild beasts and birds; and they put a cap on his head, and on his feet a kind of shoe woven of many-colored feathers.

"And when he had put on these garments he walked with solemn mien and measured step to the altar, bowed low before the idols, renewed the incense, and then in quite unintelligible murmurs he began to converse with these images, these depositories of infernal spirits, and continued in this sort of prayer with hideous grimaces and writhings, uttering inarticulate sounds, which filled all present with fear and terror, till he came out of that diabolical trance and told those standing around the lies and fabrications which the spirit had imparted to him or which he had invented himself.

"When human beings were sacrificed the ceremonies were multiplied, and the assistants of the high priest stretched the victim out upon a large stone, baring his breast, which they tore open with a great stone knife, while the body writhed in fearful convulsions and they laid the heart bare, ripping it out, and with it the soul, which the devil took, while they carried the heart to the high priest that he might offer it to the idols by holding it to their mouths, among other ceremonies; and the body was thrown into the burial-place of their 'blessed,' as they called them. And if after the sacrifice he felt inclined to detain those who begged any favor he sent them word by the subordinate priests not to leave their houses till their gods were appeased, and he commanded them to do penance meanwhile, to fast and to speak with no woman, so that, until this father of sin had interceded for the absolution of the penitents and had declared the gods appeased they did not dare to cross their threshold.

“The second [underground] chamber was the burial place of these high priests, and third that of the kings of Theozapoltan, whom they brought thither richly dressed in their best attire, feathers, jewels, golden necklaces, and precious stones, placing a shield in their left hand and a javelin in the right, just as they used them in war. And at their burial rites great mourning prevailed; the instruments which were played made mournful sounds; and with loud wailing and continuous sobbing they chanted the life and exploits of their lord until they laid him on the structure which they had prepared for this purpose.

“The last [underground] chamber had a second door at the rear, which led to a dark and gruesome room. This was closed with a stone slab, which occupied the whole entrance. Through this door they threw the bodies of the victims and of the great lords and chieftains who had fallen in battle, and they brought them from the spot where they fell, even when it was very far off, to this burial place; and so great was the barbarous infatuation of these Indians that, in the belief of the happy life which awaited them, many who were oppressed by diseases or hardships begged this infamous priest to accept them as living sacrifices and allow them to enter through that portal and roam about in the dark interior of the mountains, to seek the great feasting places of their forefather. And when anyone obtained this favour the servants of the high priest led him thither with special ceremonies, and after they had allowed him to enter through the small door they rolled the stone before it again and took leave of him, and the unhappy man, wandering in that abyss of darkness, died of hunger and thirst, beginning already in life the pain of his damnation; and on account of this horrible abyss they called this village Liyobaa, The Cavern of Death.

“When later there fell upon these people the light of the Gospel, its servants took much trouble to instruct them to find out whether this error, common to all these nations, still prevailed, and they learned from the stories which had been handed down that all were convinced that this damp cavern extended more than 30 leagues underground, and that its roof was supported by pillars. And there were people, zealous prelates anxious for knowledge, who, in order to convince these ignorant people of their terror, went into this cave accompanied by a large number of people bearing lighted torches and firebrands, and descended several large steps. And they soon came upon many buttresses which formed a kind of street. They had prudently brought a quantity of rope with them to use as a guiding line, that they might not lose themselves in this confusing labyrinth. And the putrefaction and the bad odour and the dampness of the earth were very great and there was also a cold wind which blew out their torches. And after they had gone a short distance, fearing to be overpowered by the stench or to step on poisonous reptiles, of which some had been seen, they resolved to go out again and to completely wall up this back door of hell. The four buildings above ground were the only ones which still remained open, and they had a court and chambers like those underground; and the ruins of these have lasted even to the present day.”

The Temple Hill at Jerusalem

The vast subterranean vaults under the temple hill at Jerusalem were probably used as a secret meeting place by the Templars during their occupation of the Holy City, and it was perhaps there that the strange Eastern rites of Baphomet that they later affected were first celebrated.

In his book Recent Discoveries on the Temple Hill (1884), Rev. James King gives the following account:

“On the occasion of a visit to the Noble Sanctuary, the author had an opportunity of examining the ancient masonry inside the wall at the south-east corner, as well as the vast subterranean vaults popularly known as Solomon’s stables. A small doorway, under a little dome at the south-east corner, admits by a flight of steps to a small chamber known as the Mosque of the Cradle of our Lord, from the existence of a hollowed stone which somewhat resembles a cradle, and a tradition that the Virgin Mary remained in this chamber for some time after her purification in the Temple. Passing through the chamber, the spacious vaults, which extend over an acre of ground, are reached. These subterranean substructures consist of one hundred square piers arranged in fifteen rows, each pier being five feet wide and composed of large marginal drafted stones, placed singly over each other. The rows are connected by semi-circular arches, the intercolumniations of which range from ten to twenty-three feet. The floor of these vaults is about forty-feet below the Haram Area, and more than a hundred feet above the great foundation corner-stone. They are called Solomon’s Stables by the Franks. But the Moslems call the place, Al Masjid al Kadim, that is, The Old Mosque. These vaults were used as stables by the Frank kings and the Knights Templar, and holes in which rings were fastened can still be traced on some of the piers.

“Since the floor of Solomon’s Stables is upwards of a hundred feet above the foundation stone, it seems highly probable that there exists another system of vaults below, for the vast space from the rock upwards is not likely to be filled with solid earth.

“Some allusion seems to be made to these vaults in the writings of Procopius, a Greek historian of the sixth century. He was born at Caesarea, in Palestine, about 500 A.D., and as a young man went to Constantinople, where his eminent talents brought him under the notice of the Emperor Justinian. In 529 A.D. Justinian built a splendid church on the Temple Hill, in honour of the Virgin Mary, and in the writings of Procopius there is a full and detailed account of the edifice. The historian relates that the fourth part of the ground required for the building was wanting towards the south-east; the builders therefore laid their foundations on the sloping ground, and constructed a series of arched vaults, in order to raise the ground to the level of the other parts of the enclosure. This account is eminently descriptive of the subterranean vaults at the south-east portion of the Haram, and, according to [an authority], the stone-work of these vaults certainly belongs to the age of Justinian.” (See also Subterranean Cities)

Subud

A spiritual movement that has grown up around the Indonesian mystic Muhammad Subuh, known as “Bapak” (spiritual father). Beginning in Java, it spread to Europe and elsewhere, after winning support from the Gurdjieff disciples at Coombe Springs, England, led by J. G. Bennett. Gurdjieff himself had predicted that there would be an Indonesian teacher to bring emotional warmth to his system. Subud gained public recognition in 1959 when the movement held an international congress in England. Soon afterward, the Hungarian actress Eva Bartok was initiated and claimed to be healed from childbirth complications.

The basis of the Subud movement is the latihan, an initiation ceremony for newcomers and a spiritual exercise for those already initiated. A “helper” prepares the initiate for “opening” or receptivity to the descent of spiritual energy. This often causes pronounced convulsions, similar to the “shakes” or “jerks” elicited by nineteenth century evangelists at camp meetings, or the onset of kundalini energy in traditional Hindu mysticism.

This energy is seen as having a purifying function and reportedly brings intense feelings of peace when there is submission to divine will. Subud has no creed, dogma, rules, or regulations but makes available the experience of the latihan to initiates. Subud groups meet regularly in members’ homes or in rented halls. The movement does not advertise or proselytize.

More than 70 North American cities have Subud centers, and there are many in the United Kingdom. Address in North America: Subud USA, 13701 Bel-Red Rd., Ste. B, Bellevue, WA

98005. Address in Great Britain: Subud, 342 Cricklewood Ln., London, NW2 2QH.

Sources:

- Barter, J. P. Towards Subud. London, 1967.
 Bennett, John G. Concerning Subud. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1959.
 Rofe, Husein. The Path of Subud. London: Rider, 1959.
 Van Hien, G. What is Subud? London: Rider, 1963.

Subuh, Muhammad (1901–1987)

Indonesian mystic whose spiritual mission led to the formation of the movement known as Subud. Following some years of searching for spiritual guidance in Sufi and other movements, Subuh had an initiatory experience in 1925 on his twenty-fourth birthday when a sphere of light appeared in the night and seemed to enter his head, filling him with vibrating energy and light. Three years later this strange energy source stopped abruptly, and Subuh continued his everyday life as a government official and married man, while passing through the equivalent stage of the Western mystical “dark night of the soul.” On his thirty-second birthday he had an enlightenment revealing his spiritual mission, and he devoted himself to his work.

The name Subud derives from an abbreviation of three words: susila (morality in line with divine will), budhi (enlightenment in man), and dharma (attitude of submission and sincerity toward God). Subuh’s own name actually means “sunrise,” but he is known to his followers as “Bapak,” an affectionate Javanese term meaning “father” often applied to a spiritual teacher.

Prior to 1956 Subud was little known outside Indonesia, but after that it attracted European interest. When Subuh visited the Gurdjieff headquarters of Coombe Springs in Britain, its director, J. G. Bennett, and followers were won over by his emotional and spiritual vibrancy. During his lifetime, Gurdjieff had made mysterious allusions to a forthcoming Indonesian teacher, and Bennett led many Gurdjieffian students in accepting Subuh as that teacher.

By 1960 interest in the group died out and Subuh returned to Indonesia where he died in 1987.

Sources:

- Bennett, John G. Concerning Subud. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1959.
 Muhammad-Subuh Sumohadiwidjojo. Susila Budhi Dharma. Subud Publications International, 1975.

Succubus

A demon who takes the shape of a woman, stealing the vitality of men during sleep. Old rabbinical writings relate the legend of how Adam was visited over a period of 130 years by female demons and had intercourse with demons, spirits, specters, lemurs, and phantoms.

Another legend relates how under the reign of Roger, king of Sicily, a young man was bathing by moonlight and thought he saw someone drowning and hastened to the rescue. Having drawn from the water a beautiful woman, he became enamored of her, married her, and they had a child. Afterward she disappeared mysteriously with her child, which made everyone believe she was a succubus.

In the fifteenth century, the succubus and the male demon, the counterpart incubus (which takes the form of a man, to seduce women), were associated with witchcraft, and witches were assumed to have intercourse with demons. The historian Hector Boece (1465–1536), in his history of Scotland, related that a very handsome young man was pursued by a female demon, who would pass through his closed door and offer to marry him. He complained to his bishop, who enjoined him to fast, pray, and confess, and as a result the infernal visitor ceased to trouble him.

The witchcraft judge Pierre de Lancre (1553–1631) stated that in Egypt an honest blacksmith was occupied in forging during the night when a demon in the shape of a beautiful woman appeared to him. He threw a hot iron in the face of the demon, which at once took flight.

The succubus was generally believed to appear most frequently during sleep, especially in nightmares. Roman Catholic theologian Thomas Aquinas argued for the objective existence of the incubus/succubus and believed that such intercourse could lead to the pregnancy of a woman. Twentieth-century psychology tends to see such creatures as dream symbols of repressed sexual feelings.

Sources:

- Jones, Ernest. On the Nightmare. New York: Liveright, 1951.
 Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. 2nd edition. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1999.
 Robbins, Rosell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Sudre, René (1880– ?)

Scientific writer and parapsychologist. Sudre was born April 19, 1880, at Angoulême, France. He received degrees from Poitiers Academy and the University of Paris.

As a writer and teacher he held a variety of positions between the world wars. He was a scientific commentator for Radiodiffusion Française (1926–40), a writer on psychic research for Mercur de France (1925–28), a professor at École des Hautes Etudes Sociales, Paris (1931–40), and a scientific writer for the Journal des Débats (1935–40). After the war he worked for the French Ministry of Information, the Foreign Ministry (1945–56), and for the Revue des Deux Mondes beginning in 1949. He won a number of awards for his writing.

Sudre experimented in many fields of parapsychology and spent many years attempting to show that psi phenomena were a matter for science. He argued for a coherent theoretical approach to psi and believed that the universe was permeated with a creative power that accounted for all psychic phenomena. He believed that the assumptions of Spiritualism were erroneous and that all living creatures possessed some extrasensory faculty. He was a corresponding member of the National Laboratory of Psychological Research, London University; secretary of French committees for international conferences on psychical research in Copenhagen (1922) and Warsaw (1923); and a member of the Society for Psychological Research, London. Besides his own books, he translated into French various books on parapsychology by William James, Sir William Barrett, J. B. Rhine, and T. K. Oesterreich and contributed numerous articles to such journals as Psychic Research (1926–31) and Revue Métapsychique (1922–26).

Sources:

- Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.
 Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.
 Sudre, René. Le Huitième art—Mission de la radio (The Eighth Art—Mission of Radio). N.p., 1946.
 ———. Introduction à la métapsychique humaine (Introduction to Human Metapsychics). N.p., 1929.
 ———. “Is the Soul Material?” Psychic Research 24 (1930).
 ———. La Lutte pour la métapsychique (The Fight for Parapsychology). N.p., 1928.
 ———. Les Nouvelles énigmes de l’univers (New Enigmas of the Universe). N.p., 1943.

———. Personnages d'au-delà (People from the Beyond). N.p., 1945.

———. Traité de parapsychologie. 1956. Translated as Treatise on Parapsychology: Essay on the Scientific Interpretation of the Human Phenomenon Known as the Supernatural. New York: Citadel Press, 1960.

Sufism

A mystical movement of Islam. The name derives from the woollen clothing (suf), worn by Sufis as a token of penitence, similar to the Christian penitent tradition of wearing hair shirts.

In medieval times Sufism was characterized by a complex system of striving for spiritual attainment and divine grace. The spiritual stages involved include conversion, abstinence, renunciation, poverty, patience, trust in God, and contentment; with spiritual states of meditation, nearness to God, love, fear, hope, longing, intimacy, tranquility, contemplation, and certainty. Much of this is analogous to the yama and niyama of Hindu yoga.

There were four orders of Sufis: the Qadiriyya, an orthodox wing emphasizing devotional exercises leading to spiritual experience; the Suhrawardiyya, less orthodox and with a suggestion of pantheism; the Shadhiliyya (widespread in Egypt and North Africa) with intense devotion and utter dependence on God; and the Mevlevi order, founded by the poet Rumi, which developed the special mystical dance of the dervishes.

Sufism has influenced religious movements in India, Java, and elsewhere and played a part in the development of such unorthodox prophets as Baha'u'llah of the Baha'i faith and the mystic Meher Baba. The major emphasis in Sufism is intense love for God, expressed in the perfection of the soul.

A Western Sufi organization is the Sufi Order (headed by Pir Vilayat Inayat Khan), whose traditions are said to predate Islam and to have become incorporated in it. In 1910 the Sufi Order was established in Europe and the United States through the lectures of Hazrat Pir-o-Murshid Inayat Khan. The order stresses that God is one and that there are no barriers between religions. Address: Sufi Order Secretariat, Box 574, Lebanon Springs, NY 12114. British branch: Barton Farm, Pound Lake, Bradford-on-Avon, Wiltshire, England.

A separate group of the Sufi movement is the Sufi Islamia Ruhaniat Society. Address: The Mentorgarten, 10 Precita Ave., San Francisco, CA 94110.

Another Sufi group is the Sufi Cultural Center in London, established in 1971. It places great emphasis on the mysticism of music, and encourages the teaching of classical Indian music with the more modern adjunct of health foods and alternative healing. (See also Idries Shah)

Sources:

Khan, Pir V. The Message in Our Time: The Life and Teachings of the Sufi Master, Hazrat Inayat Khan. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.

Shah, Idries. The Sufis. London: W. H. Allen, 1964.

———. The Way of the Sufi. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1970.

Subhan, John. Sufism: Its Saints and Shrines. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1973.

Williams, L. F. R., ed. Sufi Studies: East and West. London: Octagon Press, 1974.

Suggestion

Sensitivity of an entranced subject to suggestion is the characteristic and invariable accompaniment of the hypnotic state and is also a distinctive feature of hysteria. Indeed, many scientists gave to hypnotism the name "suggestion." An abnormal suggestibility implies some measure of cerebral dissociation. In this state every suggestion advanced by the operator, whether conveyed by word, gesture, or even unconscious glance, operates with abnormal force in the brain of the subject, which becomes relieved from the counterexcitement of other ideas and stimuli.

In the view of psychologist Pierre Janet, all suggestibility implies a departure from perfect sanity, but this, although perhaps true in the strictest sense, is somewhat misleading, since all individuals are more or less amenable to suggestion. In hypnotism and hysteria, however, the normal suggestibility is greatly exaggerated, and the suggestion, meeting with no opposition from the recipient's critical or judicial faculties (because there are no other ideas with which to compare it), becomes, for the time, the subject's dominant idea. The suggestion thus accepted has a powerful effect on both mind and body; hence the value of suggestion in certain complaints is incalculable.

The miracles of healing claimed by Christian Science, New Thought, and other groups, the efficacy of a pilgrimage to Lourdes, the feats of healing mediums—all testify to its powerful effect.

Posthypnotic suggestion is the term applied to a suggestion made while the subject is entranced but which is to be carried out after awakening. Sometimes an interval of months may elapse between the utterance of a command and its fulfillment, but almost invariably at the stated time or stipulated stimulus the suggestion is obeyed, the recipient usually being unaware of the source of the impulse.

Autosuggestion does not proceed from any extraneous source, but arises in one's own mind, either spontaneously or from a misconception of existing circumstances, as in the case of a person who is persuaded to drink colored water under the impression that it is poison and exhibits every symptom of poisoning. Autosuggestion may arise spontaneously in dreams, the automatic obedience to such suggestion often giving rise to stories of "veridical" dreams.

The outbreaks of religious frenzy or ecstasy that swept Europe in the Middle Ages were examples of the results of mass suggestion (i.e., suggestion made by a crowd, and much more potent than that made by an individual). Cases of so-called collective hallucination may have the same cause.

Psychical researchers have been interested in suggestion because it involves abnormal conditions of mind and body. It may be an aspect of healing by faith, for suggestion can cause and cure diseases and bad habits, remove inhibitions, mitigate deficiencies of character, stimulate the imagination, vivify the senses, and heighten intellectual powers.

William James described suggestion as "another name for the power of ideas, so far as they prove efficacious over belief and conduct." According to F. W. H. Myers, the power is exercised by the subliminal self. He defined suggestion as "successful appeal to the subliminal self." It is well known that dreams may be influenced by external stimuli applied to the sleeper, such as whispering in the ear or moving the limbs. Suggestion is also a powerful factor in advertising, particularly in the use of persuasive repetition and "subliminal suggestions" in television commercials.

Sukias

Central American witches.

Sullivan, Erin (1947–)

Erin Sullivan, a notable contemporary Canadian astrologer, was born in Vancouver, British Columbia, on November 9, 1947. She took up the study of astrology in her late teens and soon developed a thriving practice. She married and became the mother of two daughters. She also became a popular author, contributing articles to a variety of astrological periodicals. She was among the founders of the Association for Astrological Networking and the Cross Canada Council for the Fraternity of Canadian Astrologers. During the 1980s she had a radio show that originated in Victoria, British Columbia.

In 1989, Sullivan moved from Canada to the United Kingdom. She established a private practice and associated with the Centre for Psychological Astrology, for whom she taught classes in London and Zürich, Switzerland. She also travels to Australia annually to teach. Shortly after moving to London, she succeeded Howard Sasportas as editor of the Arkana Astrology series published by Viking-Penguin, and she contributed two of her own works to the series, Saturn in Transit: Boundaries of the Mind, Body and Soul (1990) and a second volume offering a psychological reevaluation of the phenomenon of retrograde planets, Retrograde Planets: Traversing the Inner Landscape (1992). Retrograde planets were a major problem for pre-modern astrologers, who assumed an earth-centered astronomy. While they moved steadily through the sky on their course, at times they appeared to come to a complete stop and begin to move backward. This unusual action came to be seen as an ill omen. Moving to a post-Copernican astronomy explained retrograde planets as an illusion created by the relative movements of the earth and other planets around the sun. Psychologically considered, retrograde became symbolic of challenges presented to the inner self.

Sources:

Sullivan, Erin. Retrograde Planets: Traversing the Inner Landscape. New York: Arkana, 1992.

———. Saturn in Transit: Boundaries of the Mind, Body and Soul. New York: Arkana, 1990.

Summerland

The land of bliss of spirits, so named by Andrew Jackson Davis, similar to the “Plane of Illusion” described by the claimed spirit of F. W. H. Myers in the book The Road to Immortality by Geraldine Cummins (1932). Summerland is the Spiritualist equivalent to the Christian heaven.

Summers, Montague (1880–1948)

Author who wrote about occult history and folklore. Alphonse Joseph-Mary Augustus Montague Summers was born on April 10, 1880, near Bristol, England. He attended a private academy that prepared him to enter Clifton College. In 1899 he entered Trinity College, Oxford, and then went on to Lichfield Theological College to prepare for the Anglican priesthood. He received his B.A. in 1905 and an M.A. the following year. After a brief stay in Italy, in 1908 he was ordained a deacon and assigned to a Church of England congregation in Bath. He later served in Bitton, a suburb of Bristol. Soon after his assignment there, he and another clergyman were accused of homosexual activity. Although acquitted, he left the church and became a Roman Catholic. At some point, he seems to have been ordained as a priest.

Summers served in a parish for a brief period but in 1911 became a teacher. Over the next decades he pursued the life of an independent scholar, which led him to become a respected authority on the literature and drama of the Restoration era and on Gothic literature. His expertise emerged fully in the 1930s with a series of texts—The Restoration Theatre (1934), A Bibliography of Restoration Drama (1935), The Gothic Quest: A History of the Gothic Novel (1938), and A Gothic Bibliography (1940).

Summers reached a more popular audience with his interest in the occult and some of the more esoteric areas of folklore. Once he retired from his teaching post in 1925, he devoted his full time to research and writing. His first important book, and possibly still his best known, A History of Witchcraft and Demonology, appeared in 1926. It was followed by Geography of Witchcraft (1927). He moved on to complete his massive surveys of vampirism: The Vampire: His Kith and Kin (1928) and The Vampire in Europe (1929). He also edited English editions of Malleus Maleficarum (The Witches' Hammer, 1928), Compendium Maleficarum (1929), Demonolatry (1930), and Reginald Scot's The Discoverie of Witchcraft (1930). His occult interests continued with his study of The Werewolf (1933) and Witchcraft and Black Magic (1946).

Summers wrote as a conservative Catholic who retained pre-Enlightenment views concerning the reality of evil supernaturalism. Such views distracted from his otherwise scholarly perspectives on witchcraft and vampires, both of which he believed existed.

Summers died August 10, 1948, in England. He wrote an autobiographical study, which was published in 1980 as The Galant Show.

Sources:

Frank, Frederick S. Montague Summers: A Bibliographical Portrait. Methuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1988.

Jerome, Joseph. Montague Summers: A Memoir. London: Cecil and Amerila Woolf, 1965.

Morrow, Feliz. “The Quest for Montague Summers.” In The Vampire: His Kith and Kin, by Montague Summer. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1960.

Smith, Timothy d'Arch. A Bibliography of the Works of Montague Summers. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1964.

Summers, Montague. The Galant Show. London: Cecil Woolf, 1980.

———. Geography of Witchcraft. London, 1927.

———. The Gothic Quest: A History of the Gothic Novel. 1938. Reprint, London: Fortune Press, 1950.

———. A History of Demonology and Witchcraft. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1926.

———. The Vampire: His Kith and Kin. London: Routledge, Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1928.

———. The Werewolf. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner, 1933.

Summit Lighthouse See Church Universal and Triumphant

Summons by the Dying

It was once maintained by theologians that if anyone who was unjustly accused or persecuted should, with his dying breath, summon his oppressor to appear before the supreme tribunal, the person thus summoned would die on the day fixed by his innocent victim. Thus the grand master of the Templars cited the pope and the king of France to appear before God on a certain date, and as the story goes, both died at the appointed time.

François I, duke of Brittany, hired assassins to murder his brother in 1450. The dying prince summoned his murderer before the highest of all courts, and François shortly expired. Yet another instance is that of Ferdinand IV of Spain, who was summoned by two nobles whom he had condemned unjustly; he died at the end of 30 days.

Many more examples could be quoted to show how firmly rooted was this belief in the power of the dying to avenge their death by supernatural means. Fear, and possibly remorse, acting on the imagination of the guilty person might well cause him to expire at the stated time, and authenticated accounts of death caused by these agents are not unknown. This conclusion is further borne out by the fact that if the condemned man was guilty—that is, if the judge's conscience was clear—the summons had no effect.

An old story tells of Gonzalo of Cordova (1453–1515), who sentenced a soldier to death for sorcery. The soldier exclaimed that he was innocent and summoned Gonzalo to appear before God. “Go, then,” said the judge, “and hasten the proceedings.

My brother who is in heaven, will appear for me.” Gonzalo did not die at that time, as he believed he had acted justly and had no fear of the consequences of the summons.

Sundari, T(irunelveli) A(vudaippan) (1934–)

School psychologist who has also taken an active interest in parapsychology. She was born on December 25, 1934, at Dindigul, Madras State, India. She studied at Presidency College, Madras (B.A. psychology, 1956) and Madras University (M.A., 1959). After her graduation she went to work as a psychologist for the Government Girls' Approved School and the Vigilance Home, Madras. Her master's thesis was titled "Experimental Studies in Time Perception," and she has attempted to train subjects in precognition. She has also collected data relating to clairvoyance and telepathy.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Sunderland, La Roy (1804–1885)

Methodist minister, abolitionist, and magnetist. Sunderland was born May 18, 1804, in Exeter, Rhode Island. He was apprenticed to a shoemaker. He became converted to Methodism and became a revivalist preacher at the age of 18. He had a reputation as an orator of great power and was prominent in the temperance and antislavery movement, presiding at the meeting in New York in October 1834 when the first Methodist antislavery society was organized. He was a delegate to the first antislavery convention at Cincinnati in 1841 and the World Convention in London in 1843.

In 1833 he withdrew from the ministry and two years later became one of the founders of Zion's Watchman, the antislavery periodical for the Methodist abolitionists in New England. He edited the tabloid for the next seven years. In 1842 he joined with a number of his socially active colleagues in withdrawing from the Methodist Episcopal Church and founding the Wesleyan Methodist Church. However, at the same time, he was undergoing a crisis of faith. A noted evangelist, he had come to feel that his abilities were a result of hypnotic powers. He had concluded that conversion was a natural, not a supernatural, action. His line of reasoning led him to the conclusion that religion was a fraud.

In 1842 he founded and also edited the Magnet in which he expounded his beliefs in mesmeric power and suggestion. He made a special study of animal magnetism and mesmerism, and in 1843 published Pathetism; With Practical Instructions: Demonstrating the Falsity of the Hitherto Prevalent Assumptions in Regard to What Has Been Called "Mesmerism" and "Neurology," and Illustrating Those Laws Which Induce Somnambulism, Second Sight, Sleep, Dreaming, Trance, and Clairvoyance, with Numerous Facts Tending to Show the Pathology of Monomania, Insanity, Witchcraft, and Various Other Mental or Nervous Phenomena.

He moved on to support Grahamism, an early school of natural diet, and Spiritualism. In 1851, he founded The Spiritual Philosopher, the first Spiritualist periodical in America. A year later, the title changed to The Spirit World. Although in the first issue he criticized the spirit theory and the evidence adduced on its behalf, he quickly became a believer when his own daughter, Margarette Cooper, became a medium. His enthusiasm cooled somewhat in the following year as a result of a hoax played upon him, and he warned his readers against believing that all the phenomena ascribed to spirit intervention had necessarily an extra-mundane cause, as many might be due to unconscious action on the part of the medium.

Sunderland was also an exponent of phrenology. Of special interest is the fact that he sometimes exhibited painless tooth extraction with entranced subjects, and on two occasions even the dentist was hypnotized. Sunderland's ideas were mentioned by James Braid, whose term "hypnotism" eventually won general consent.

In 1868, Sunderland's doubts about spirit phenomena returned, and in his book The Trance and Correlative Phenomena he states that neither mediums nor spirits have ever been able to show where human actions end and the real spiritual begins in phenomena.

In the last years of his life he became an infidel and advocated atheism. He died in Quincy, Massachusetts, on May 15, 1885, reportedly having a happy end in spite of his disbelief in any afterlife.

Sources:

Sunderland, La Roy. "An Appeal on the Subject of Slavery." Zion's Watchman (December 5, 1834).

———. The Book of Human Nature. New York: Stearns, 1853.

———. "Confessions of a Magnetizer" Exposed. Boston: Reddington, 1845.

———. Ideology. Boston: J. P. Mendum, 1885–87.

———. Pathetism; With Practical Instructions: Demonstrating the Falsity of the Hitherto Prevalent Assumptions in Regard to What Has Been Called "Mesmerism" and "Neurology," and Illustrating Those Laws Which Induce Somnambulism, Second Sight, Sleep, Dreaming, Trance, and Clairvoyance, with Numerous Facts Tending to Show the Pathology of Monomania, Insanity, Witchcraft, and Various Other Mental or Nervous Phenomena. Boston: White and Potter, 1847.

———. Testimony of God Against Slavery. Boston: D. K. Hitchcock, 1836.

———. The Trance. Chicago: J. Walker, 1868.

Suns Ahman Ishrael—I:A:O: (Organization)

A religious/magic organization drawing upon Mormon traditions. It was founded in 1981 by presiding Patriarch David Asia Israel and four other former members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. The group believes that angels continue to visit and deliver messages to humans, and David Israel claims to receive regular revelations in the form of morning and evening oracles.

Besides the Bible and the Book of Mormon, the Suns Ahman Ishrael (SAI) accepts a wide variety of materials as scripture, including ancient apocryphal writings (Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of Philip, Book of Enoch, writings from Nag Hammadi) and modern Mormon revelations (Oracles of Mohonri, The Order of the Sons of Zadok). The group believes in a secret oral tradition passed from Moses to the Essenes, to the Gnostics, and eventually to Joseph Smith Jr. That tradition is believed to be preserved in mystical books such as the Pistis Sophia and Sepher Yetzira.

A 22-item statement of SAI beliefs posits a heavenly hierarchy consisting of the Heavenly Father and Mother; their son, Jesus Christ; the Holy Spirit; angels and archangels; and ministers of the flame (righteous humans made perfect). Human beings are the literal offspring of the heavenly parents and have come into earthly existence to experience the mystery of mortality. Redemption for humans comes only through surrendering their life to Yeshu-Maria the Christ and subsequently developing a relationship with the heavenly hierarchy in the holy temple ordinances and ritualistic ceremonies. The SAI also follows the Old Testament feasts and holy days.

The SAI is headed by a presiding patriarch and matriarch under whom function (when the organization is at full strength) a first presidency, twelve apostles, seven "arch seventies," and twelve "stake princes." Each stake is headed by twelve high counselors, a "quorum of seventy," and twelve bishops. The church endorses the practice of polygamy, but also believes in perfect equality of the sexes. Women are accepted into the priesthood on an equal basis with men.

SAI publishes a monthly periodical, Stone Magazine. During the 1980s the group developed an international following in England, Norway, Japan, and the Netherlands. Address: Chevrah B'Qor Community, HC 65, Box 535, Canebeds, AZ 86022.

Superet Light Doctrine Church

The Superet Light Doctrine Church is an international religious movement that developed from the spiritual teachings of its founder, Dr. Josephine De Croix Trust (d. 1957), called Mother Trust within the movement. She is described as a Light Scientist who rediscovered Jesus' religion because of a special gift she had to see the light, vibrations, and aura of Jesus' words. According to Mother Trust, she was able to see auras, or the light emanations that psychics claim to see around all objects, from the age of four. As a teenager she developed tuberculosis, at that time an incurable disease, but she claimed she was healed by Jesus, who appeared to her in a vision. When she was a young woman living in New York City, she gained a reputation as a miracle healer. Important for her future teaching work, she discovered while reading the Bible that Jesus' words, and only Jesus' words, shone with a light.

In a later revelation she was given the secret of the Holy Spirit as the Mother God, a doctrine not previously revealed because males looked upon females as little more than breeders. In addition, the Holy Spirit told her, "This is the new name, Superet, which is the everlasting Fire in God's sacred purple Heart."

The Superet Science taught by Mother Trust is the manifestation of God's light through our light atom aura. All substances that possess magnetism, especially all life, have an aura. As an aura scientist, Mother Trust was able to see both the inner (light of the soul) and outer aura. We produce the light atom aura, which is capable of receiving God's light, by developing our inner soul aura. We can then use that light for healing and to become successful in life.

The Superet Light doctrine is presented in the more than 25 books written by Mother Trust and in several sets of lessons. Mother Trust also founded the Prince of Peace Movement, an interreligious peace movement, on Christmas Day 1938 in Bethlehem, the site of the Nativity.

The church has congregations in the United States, Canada, Mexico, Panama, and Nigeria. It issues the biennial Newsletter of the Superet Brotherhood and Sisterhood. There are Prince of Peace clubs in the United States, Nigeria, Panama, Mexico, Trinidad, and the Bahamas. It is headquartered at 2516 W. Third St., Los Angeles, CA 90057.

Sources:

Miracle Woman's Secrets. Los Angeles: Superet Press, 1949.

Superet Light Doctrine Ministry. Los Angeles: Superet Press, 1947.

Trust, Josephine C. Bible Mystery by Superet Light Science. Los Angeles: Superet Press, 1950.

———. Superet Light. Los Angeles: Superet Light Center, 1953.

———. Superet Light Doctrine. Los Angeles: Superet Press, 1949.

Super-Extrasensory Perception

Term used by parapsychologists for the hypothesis that some individuals may have unlimited powers of acquiring information from living persons or objects, thus making the conventional Spiritualist explanation of discarnate entities unnecessary.

Supernatural

An occurrence in violation of the known laws of nature. This was a concept that developed as the idea of a law-abiding nature was developed in the Middle Ages. The supernatural realm included both the heavenly world of God and the angels and the world of Satan and demons.

Many leaders of the Enlightenment of the eighteenth century were exponents of Deism, a view that drew a sharp line between the natural and supernatural realms and denied that the two interact. Spiritualism reacted to such a view: it suggested that phenomena that had previously been viewed as supernatural actually happened, and it also suggested that they occurred in accordance with natural laws, laws as yet unknown or undefined by science.

Now, the term "paranormal" is more generally used to describe such extraordinary phenomena.

Supernormal

A term substituted in psychical research for "supernatural." It was coined by F. W. H. Myers and is applied to phenomena that are beyond what usually happens—beyond, that is, in the sense of suggesting unknown physical laws. While supernormal phenomena point to new powers, abnormal phenomena indicate the degeneration of powers already acquired. The term "paranormal" is now preferred.

Supersensonics

Term devised by New Age teacher Christopher Hills to indicate a science of subtle energy therapeutics, involving radies-thesia, radionics, homeopathy, Bach flower remedies, and related fields.

Supreme Council of the Independent Associated Spiritualists

Founded in 1925 as a federation of churches and groups of churches concerned with Spiritualism. It participated in research on psychic phenomena, psychic photography, and spiritual healing. It was affiliated with Duke Research Foundation. Last known address: 7230 Fourth St. North, #2304, St. Petersburg, FL 33702.

Survival

The continued possession of personality after the change called death. It is a fundamental doctrine of Spiritualism that Spiritualist phenomena demonstrate survival, and the investigation of that phenomena has been a major aspect of psychical research. The emergence of parapsychology represented, in part, a distinct reorientation of priorities away from survival research.

The basis of survival is the contention that mind can exist independently of the brain, that thought is not the result of changes in the brain, but that these changes (as William James suggested in his book Human Immortality, 1903) merely coincide with the flow of thought through it. The brain fulfills the role of an instrument of transmission. Thought transference and experiments in telepathy furnished the first scientific support of this contention.

The trance communications received through the mediumship of Leonora Piper convinced many famous skeptical investigators that the communicators had survived the change of death. Even Eleanor Sidgwick admitted in her brilliant but extremely skeptical study of Piper's phenomena: "Veridical communications are received, some of which, there is good reason to believe, come from the dead, and therefore imply a genuine communicator in the background.” (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 28, December 1915, p. 204.)

The arguments for and against survival are mainly centered around the evidential value of such communications. The first and most powerful point of attack is made on the subconscious front. The communicating personality is said to be artificial, a masquerading secondary self, and that supernormal information lies occasionally within the bounds of acquisition of the subconscious mind.

It is also pointed out that many of the communications are erroneous, of a lying nature, uncharacteristic of the dead, and easily obtainable by fraudulent means.

Those who argue for survival deny the sufficiency of subconscious powers as an explanation for communications, pointing to the distinct personalities of the communicators, their greatly differing abilities to communicate, their recognition of old friends, their behavior, temper, memories, and ability to give information outside the mind of everybody present and perhaps of everybody living.

They also point out the inconsistency of the telepathic theory in that it gradually leads to the supposition of a cosmic mind that is tapped by the telepathist, forming thereby a more far-reaching and less justified theory than individual survival. As evidence against telepathy, the results of some cross-correspondences and book (and newspaper) tests are quoted.

Philosophic speculation has often supported the concept of survival. P. G. Tait and Balfour Stewart posit in their book, The Unseen Universe (1875), that the main realities of the universe are not in matter at all, but in the ether of space. Although the concept of the ether has since been refuted, the enigma of the relationship between matter and consciousness remains, and it is feasible that consciousness continues to survive the death and disintegrating changes of the physical body. This implies that consciousness is a superior system to matter.

According to Sir Oliver Lodge, “the marvel is that we are associated with matter at all . . . I used to say that death was an adventure to which we might look forward. So it is; but I believe that really and truly it is earth-life that is the adventure. It is this earth-life that has been the strange and exceptional thing. The wonder is that we ever succeeded in entering a matter body at all. Many fail.” (Phantom Walls, 1929). In the same book he also considers the possibility of grades of survival, stating:

“Now survival only applies to things that really exist. If there is no individuality, then there is nothing to persist. Whether all human beings have sufficient personality to make their individual persistence likely is a question that may be argued. Whether some of the higher animals have acquired a kind of individuality, a character and wealth of affection which seem worthy of continued existence, may also be argued. There may be many grades of personality, and accordingly there may be many grades of survival.”

The subjective experience of out-of-the-body travel or astral projection is often cited as presumptive evidence that the personality can exist independently of the body.

Sources:

Baird, Alexander T. One Hundred Cases for Survival After Death. New York: Bernard Ackerman, 1944.

Beard, Paul. Survival of Death: For and Against. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1966.

Broad, C. D. Personal Identity and Survival. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1968.

Crookall, Robert. Case-Book of Astral Projection, 545–746. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1972.

Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1961.

Garrett, Eileen J., ed. Does Man Survive Death?: A Symposium. New York: Helix Press, 1957.

Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against an After Life. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, 1959.

Jacobson, Nils Olof. Life Without Death?: On Parapsychology, Mysticism and the Question of Survival. New York: Delacorte Press, 1973. Reprint, London: Turnstone Books, 1974.

Myers, F. H. Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Rogo, D. Scott. Welcoming Silence: A Study of Psychological Phenomena and Survival of Death. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1973.

Salter, W. H. Zoar; or, The Evidence of Psychical Research Concerning Survival. London: Sidgwick & Jackson, 1961.

Saltmarsh, H. F. Evidence of Personal Survival From Cross Correspondences. London: G. Bell, 1939.

Smith, Susy. Life is Forever: Evidence for Survival After Death. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1974.

Survival Joint Research Committee Trust

British organization founded in 1963, “exclusively concerned with survival of human personality after bodily death.” In November 1987, the trust held a one-day E. J. Dingwall Memorial Conference on “Science and Survival.” The trust meets regularly to discuss experimental design and conduct experiments, and may be contacted at 47 Mayfield Rd., Hornsey, London, N8 9LL, England.

The Survival League

British organization founded in London by Mrs. C. A. Dawson Scott in October 1929 to affirm the unity of all religions and spread the knowledge of the scientific demonstrability of survival after death. The first chairman was Spiritualist author H. Dennis Bradley. The Survival League of America was an affiliated organization. The league published Survival Magazine. The organization did not survive World War II.

Survival Research Foundation

Incorporated in 1971 by author and psychical researcher Susy Smith and attorney Frank C. Tribbe, a long-time leader in the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship. The foundation engaged in scientific research into anomalous phenomena that lie outside the traditional disciplines of science.

The foundation works in the field of end of life care and support as well as develops protocols designed to communicate with comatose patients to determine their wishes with respect to the withdrawal or withholding of life support. The foundation also promotes a cipher test devised by Arthur S. Berger to help lessen grief during the bereavement process.

The foundation may be reached c/o the current president, Arthur Burger, P.O. Box 63-0026, Miami, Florida 33163-0026.

Swaffer, Hannen (1879–1962)

Journalist, drama critic, author, and publicist for Spiritualism. He was born on November 1, 1879, in Lindfield, Sussex, England, and was educated at Stroud Green Grammar School. The family moved to London, where young Swaffer discovered that his neighbor was a journalist; he immediately decided that this would be his profession. Many years later, that neighbor worked for Swaffer on the Weekly Dispatch.

Swaffer joined the Daily Mail in 1902 and spent a number of years working under Lord Northcliffe, becoming, in succession, news editor, art editor, night editor, and assistant editor of the Daily Mirror. He originated a gossip column in the Daily Sketch that was soon extensively copied by other newspapers. He also worked on the Daily Herald and was drama critic for the Daily Express. He was editor of the Weekly Dispatch, and later he was editor of The People. For many years, “Swaff” was a familiar and eccentric figure in London's Fleet Street, center of the national newspaper offices. He affected somewhat Bohemian dress, as befitted a drama critic, and was popularly known as “The Poet.”

He became convinced of survival in 1924, through attending direct voice sittings with the medium Gladys Osborne Leonard in the circle of H. Dennis Bradley. These sittings were strongly evidential of the survival of Swaffer’s old chief Lord Northcliffe, who had died in 1922. Swaffer published accounts of the séances in The People and created a sensation with his book Northcliffe’s Return (1924).

He became an indefatigable propagandist for Spiritualism, and argued that Spiritualism and socialism were two halves of one great whole. He succeeded Sir Arthur Conan Doyle as honorary president of the Spiritualists’ National Union and the Spiritualist Community, and he was connected with other Spiritualist organizations.

In 1932, Swaffer was one of the three cofounders of the well-known British newspaper Psychic News—the other two were his accountant Jack Rubens and his friend Maurice Barbanell (who was editor for many years). He died January 16, 1962.

Sources:

Driburg, Tom. “Swaff”: The Life and Times of Hannen Swaffer. London: Macdonald, 1974.

Swaffer, Hannen. Adventures with Inspiration. N.p., 1929.

———. Behind the Scenes. N.p., 1928.

———. Hannen Swaffer’s Who’s Who. London: Hutchinson, 1929.

———. Norcliffe’s Return. London: Hutchinson, 1925.

———. Studies in Psychology. N.p., 1933.

Swain, Marcia M. (1819–1900)

Voice medium of a rescue circle in Buffalo from 1875 to 1900 under the direction of Leander Fisher, a music teacher and medium. Daniel E. Bailey, a wealthy man, took interest in the work and at his death made provision for the support of Swain for the rest of her life. She was never a public medium and did not give séances for money. The activity of the rescue circle was largely devoted to making the dead realize their true condition.

Sources:

Bailey, D. E. Thoughts from the Inner Life. Boston, 1886.

Swaminarayan, Shree (1781–1830)

Famous saint of nineteenth-century India, born as Nilakantha at Capaiya, near Ayodhya. He developed a revised form of the traditional Vishishadvaita Vedanta of Shree Ramanujan and traveled all over India for 30 years with his disciples, initiating a religious revival that had an impact upon the masses in Gujarat, Saurashtra, and Kutch. The movement eradicated violence, drunkenness, and lawlessness among those who responded to it and attracted favorable notice from both the Christian bishop Heber and the British rulers.

Shree Swaminarayan performed miracles and was accepted by his followers as an incarnation of the Divine, the first of a succession of such incarnations, of which His Holiness Shree Pramukh Swami is the current living representative. Modern followers of Shree Swaminarayan number hundreds of thousands, and prior to the expulsion of Asians from Uganda, this faith was widespread among Indian people throughout East Africa. The Swaminarayan faith has a popular following in Great Britain and North America among Asian immigrants.

Sources:

Dave, H. T. Life and Philosophy of Shree Swaminarayan, 1781–1830. London: Allen & Unwin, 1974.

Swann, Ingo (1933–)

Prominent American psychic research subject, parapsychologist, and author. Born September 14, 1933, at Telluride, Colorado, he studied at Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah, receiving a double bachelor’s degree in biology and art. He enlisted in the U.S. Army and served three years in Korea, after which he worked for twelve years at the United Nations Secretariat while pursuing an independent art career.

Swann’s active participation in parapsychology research began in 1969 when he was 36 years old. During the next twenty years he worked only in controlled laboratory settings with scientific researchers. Although he lectured widely on the importance of psychic faculties and potentials, he has never publicly demonstrated his abilities. Because of his participation in hundreds of thousands of experimental trials, author Martin Ebon wrote of him as “parapsychology’s most tested guinea pig,” and Psychic News and other media often refer to him as “the scientific psychic.”

During the 1950s and 1960s, because of psychic potentials partly evident in childhood, he became actively interested in occult and parapsychological literature and in a variety of novel mind-development programs which took positive approaches to the enhancement of ESP potentials.

Swann early distinguished between psychic phenomenon and psychic mind-dynamic processes. He especially noticed that while parapsychology researched the existence of paranormal phenomena (such as ESP, telepathy, and psychokinesis), there was little interest in the mental processes involved in producing evidence of them. From this distinction he slowly developed unique theoretical approaches to process enhancement of psi perceptions, which was in keeping with ancient descriptions of Siddhis as found in various Eastern Yoga literature and Abraham Maslow’s developmental ability theories.

In 1970–71 Swann experimented with Cleve Backster in attempting to influence plants by mental activity. In 1971–72 psychokinetic experiments involved successfully influencing temperature recorded in a controlled setting devised by parapsychologists Gertrude Schmeidler and Larry Lewis at City College, New York. This involved PK effects upon target thermistors (temperature measuring devices) in insulated thermos bottles at a distance of 25 feet from Swann. (For a report, see G. R. Schmeidler, “PK Effects Upon Continuously Recorded Temperature,” Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research, no. 4, Oct. 1973).

Swann was also the subject of experiments in out-of-the-body travel, or psychic perception at a distance. These took place during 1971–73 at the American Society for Psychical Research. They involved Swann sitting in a chair and attempting to project his consciousness into sealed boxes on a small platform several feet above his head, in which there was a target symbol completely shielded from view. Swann was monitored by electrodes that would have recorded any movement from the chair.

Under these difficult laboratory conditions, Swann nevertheless scored significant successes in describing the targets. In one test he was actually able to state correctly that a light that should have illuminated the target was inoperative. There was no normal way of ascertaining this fact without opening the box.

In 1972–73, at the American Society for Psychical Research, Swann began suggesting experimental protocols to test for the existence of mind-dynamic processes that would enhance ESP perceptions. Together with Dr. Karlis Osis, Dr. Janet Mitchell, and Dr. Gertrude Schmeidler, he coined the term “remote viewing” to describe the experiments in which subjects attempted to view targets at a far distance. His original remote-viewing protocols were later utilized and expanded upon in collaboration with the researchers Dr. Harold E. Puthoff and Russell Targ. Other laboratories ultimately repeated various kinds of remote-viewing experiments.

Swann's successes on the East Coast attracted the attention of the quantum physicist, H. E. Puthoff, at the Stanford Research Institute, in Menlo Park, California (later renamed SRI International). From late 1973 until 1989 Swann worked principally at SRI's "psychoenergetics project" established by Puthoff to examine important psi faculties (rather than psychic phenomena per se).

One of the first most remarkable experiments involved a successful attempt to influence the stable magnetic field of a super-cooled Josephson junction inside a quark detector (a complex apparatus designed to detect subatomic particles). The apparatus was completely inaccessible, being encased in aluminum and copper containers and buried in five feet of concrete. When Swann mentally visualized the hidden target, significant variations were recorded in sine waves. This PK effect was reported at a conference on quantum physics and parapsychology.

On April 27, 1973, in another extraordinary experiment, Swann "visited" the planet Jupiter in a joint "psychic probe" shared by fellow psychic Harold Sherman. Swann's drawings made during the experiment showed a 'ring' of tiny asteroids around the planet which scientists at the time said did not exist. The existence of the ring was later scientifically confirmed in 1979.

From the first experiments, Swann was increasingly considered a very unique test subject because, at the command of the experimenters, he could reproduce and sustain the desired effects over time at a significant rate of success. Throughout the history of parapsychology, other test subjects had been temporarily or spontaneously successful. But these subjects typically suffered from the well-known "decline effect" or "psi-missing effect" which statistically erased the successes, and thus permitted skeptics to believe that the successes were due to some outside factor other than claimed human psi abilities.

Most books and articles written after 1973 about parapsychology and psychic matters refer to Swann's work in some way. Many analysts of science and parapsychology generally concede that his work and the high levels of official sponsorship it obtained gradually influenced positive reevaluations of the validity of psi in human experiencing.

After nineteen years on the cutting edge of psi developments, the "longest run" of any subject on record, Swann retired from full-time research to undertake independent research into the problems and states of consciousness. In final interviews regarding the dimensions of his past work, he stated that the long-term stresses of laboratory work and the constant need to defend the validity of psi faculties and exceptional experiencing had taken their toll. He occasionally accepts invitations to lecture but refuses to talk with the media. In a paper read at the United Nations in March 1994 (entitled "Scientists find the basis for seventeen-plus human senses and perceptions"), he stated that psi faculties and exceptional experiencing are not purely scientific issues. Their discovery and development involve larger social, philosophical, political, and religious problems not amenable to objective research and rational appreciation.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Puthoff, H. E., and Russell Targ. "Physics, Entrophy, and Psychokinesis." In Proceedings of the Conference on Quantum Physics and Parapsychology, Geneva, August 26-27, 1974. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1975.

Schmeidler, Gertrude R. "PK Effects Upon Continuously Recorded Temperature." Journal of the American Society for Psychological Research 4 (October 1973).

Swann, Ingo. Cosmic Art. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1975.

———. Natural ESP: A Layman's Guide to Unlocking the Extra Sensory Power of Your Mind. New York: Bantam, 1987.

———. To Kiss Earth Goody-bye. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1974. Reprint, New York: Laurel/Dell, 1975.

———. Star Fire. New York: Dell, 1978.

———. Your Nostradamus Factor: Accessing Your Innate Ability to See into the Future. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.

Swann, William F(rancis) G(ray) (1884–1962)

Physicist and educator who wrote on parapsychology. He was born on August 29, 1884, at Ironbridge, Shropshire, England. He studied at the Royal College of Science, London; University College; King's College; the University of London; and City and Guilds of London Institute. Swann was an authority on cosmic radiation and atomic structure and was head of the Bartol Research Foundation of Franklin Institute at Swarthmore for 32 years. He had previously taught at the Royal College of Science, London and at the University of Sheffield.

Early in his career he was successively employed as the head of the physical division of the Department of Terrestrial Magnetism at the Carnegie Institute, Washington, D.C.; the University of Minnesota (1918–23); the University of Chicago (1923–24); and Yale University (1924–27). His interest in parapsychology was by way of physics and philosophy. He died January 29, 1962, in Swarthmore, Pennsylvania.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Swann, William F. G. "Is the Universe Planned?" Journal of the Franklin Institute (May 1953).

———. "The Known and the Unknown." Journal of the Franklin Institute (May 1955).

———. "Nature and the Mind of Man." Journal of the Franklin Institute (June 1956).

———. "Reality, Imagery and Fantasy." Journal of the Franklin Institute (May 1957).

———. "The Science of Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow." Journal of the Franklin Institute (March 1960).

Swastika

One of the most important and widespread symbols in ancient religion, mysticism, and magic is the swastika or tetraskeleion. Essentially, it is a Greek cross with arms of equal length, each with four arms at right angles, either right-handed (regarded as a male symbol implying good fortune) or left-handed (female symbol). The right-handed form is sometimes known as gammadion, i.e., formed from joining four gamma letters.

The swastika is generally regarded as a symbol of the power of the sun, and it may have been derived from a circle divided into four by crossed lines. A variation of the swastika is the Triskele ("three-legged") form, often found on Sicilian coins and used as the emblem of the Isle of Man off the coast of Britain.

The swastika dates back to the Neolithic Age, when it was engraved on stone implements, but it has also been found in many cultures—in ancient Britain, Ireland, Mycenae, and Gascony, as well as among the Etruscans, Celts, Hindus, Germanic peoples, Central Asians, and pre-Columbian Americans. The Buddhists regarded it as a chakra or wheel of the law; the Tibetans called it Yun-drum or path of life. The swastika has traveled from the ancient Greek cities of Troy and Mycenae down to the 9th century in Ireland, as well as to Persia, China, North Africa, and Scandinavia.

Some authorities have interpreted the swastika as a symbol of the deity during the Iron Age, and others have associated it with agriculture, compass points, and the origin of the universe. No doubt this universally diffused symbol has acquired many secondary associations in addition to its main association with the sun wheel.

The name “swastika” derives from a long-established use in India, where the expression Su-asti means “Be well,” implying auspiciousness and good fortune. Hindu parents mark the symbol on the breast and forehead of a baby, and a swastika formed of ears of wheat is made in the birth chamber. Hindu writers often place a red swastika at the beginning and end of manuscripts; the sign is also marked on floors and paths at weddings. There is a hatha yoga sitting position known as “Swatikasana” or the auspicious posture, in which the legs are crossed and the feet rest on opposite thighs.

The use of the swastika as a Nazi symbol may have derived from German scholarship in the field of Hindu folklore and religion, distorted by such pseudo-mystical occultists as Guido von List, who originated theories of Germanic and Nordic folklore as early as the 1870s. According to List, the swastika was the symbol of a secret band of initiates called the Armanen or “children of the sun,” who flourished in ancient times.

It may also have been reputable scholarly discussions of the Indo-European migrations of ancient peoples and cultures that were perverted to the antisemitic doctrine of an Aryan master-race. Before World War I, the use of the swastika symbol was popular among romantic youth folklore movements like the Wandervögel. It was continued by political revolutionaries who had been Wandervögel members and by Hitler’s National Socialist German Workers’ Party in the post-war period.

The Nazi swastika was designed by Friedrich Krohn, formerly a member of the Germanen Order, a secret order founded by followers of Guido von List. Krohn’s design was adopted around 1920. Ever since, this ancient Hindu sacred symbol of auspiciousness has become inextricably associated with the perverse doctrines of the German Nazis.

Swawm

Burmese vampires. (See also Myanmar)

SWEDEN

Witchcraft

In 1649, Queen Christina banned witch trials, stating that witchcraft confessions of women were due to illusions or disorders of health. However, there was an extraordinary outbreak of witchcraft hysteria between 1669 and 1670 at Mora, in Dalecarlia, resulting in the burning of 85 individuals accused of transporting no fewer than 300 children by magical flights to a witches’ sabbat on the island of Blockula.

On July 5, 1668, the pastor of Elfdale in Dalecarlia stated that Gertrude Svensen, aged 18, had been accused by Eric Ericson, aged 15, of stealing children for the devil. There followed similar charges. Then in May 1669, King Charles XI appointed a commission to look into the matter and attempt to redeem the accused by prayers rather than punishment or torture. However, the prayers resulted in mass hysteria among the 3,000 people who had assembled. The commissioners claimed to have discovered 70 adult witches, who were all burned, together with 15 children. Lesser sentences were given to 56 other children who were punished by having to run a gauntlet or be lashed with rods.

The witches were said to have carried the children on goats, sticks, and the backs of sleeping men, even flying through windows. One writer recorded that “being asked how they could go with their Bodies through Chimneys and broken panes of Glass, they said, that the Devil did first remove all that might hinder them in their flight, and so they had room enough to go.” They assembled for their sabbat in a large meadow, where they feasted, danced, and performed diabolical rituals.

Commenting on the affair, Bishop Francis Hutchinson states in his book An Historical Essay Concerning Witchcraft (1718):

“Is it not plain that the people had frightened their children with so many tales, that they could not sleep without dreaming of the devil, and then made the poor women of the town confess what the children said of them.”

Other witchcraft persecutions followed, and between 1674 and 1675, individuals were burned or beheaded in three parishes. There was also a witchcraft mania in Stockholm in following years, but when it was discovered that accusations were due to the malice or greed of young informers, Charles XI once again prohibited witchcraft prosecutions.

Spiritualism and Psychical Research

Spiritualism entered Sweden at the end of the nineteenth century and progressed slowly. In the decades following World War I, there was a general apathy, and in some areas a marked hostility to Spiritualism, fortune-telling, and psychic matters.

On March 14, 1931, a bill was presented to the Swedish Parliament with the intention both of regularizing mediumship and legitimizing psychical research. It did not succeed and Spiritualism was still actively discouraged. However, there was a revival of interest after World War II.

In spite of the hostility to psychical research, the Sällskapet för Parapsykologisk Forskning was established in Stockholm after World War II. It has carried out valuable experimental work. Gosta Rodhe, the president, has now been succeeded by Rolf Evjögård. The former secretary, Eva Hellström, well known as a clairvoyant, was succeeded by Eric Uggla. The society maintains a good research library, has organized lectures and meetings, and has carried out research in psychometry and precognition. Another important experimenter was Haakon Forwald (1897–1978) of Ludvika, who in the 1950s began research in psychokinesis. More recently, a branch of the Churches’ Fellowship for Psychic and Spiritualist Studies was organized, and may be reached c/o Mrs. Eva Lejam, St. Sodergatan 17, Lund.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Swedenborg, Emanuel (1688–1772)

Swedish seer. He was trained as a scientist and became the country’s leading expert in mining and metallurgy. He was also a military engineer, learned astronomer, reputed physicist, zoologist, anatomist, financier, political economist, and biblical student.

He was born January 29, 1688, at Stockholm, son of a professor of theology at Upsala, afterward bishop of Scara. Swedenborg graduated from Upsala University in 1710 and then traveled in England, Holland, France, and Germany, studying natural philosophy. He studied and was influenced by the work of the most famous mathematicians and physicians—Sir Isaac Newton, Flamsteed, Halley, and De Lahire. He made sketches of inventions as varied as a flying machine, a submarine, a rapid-fire gun, an air pump, and a fire engine. He wrote many poems in Latin, and when after five years of study he returned to Sweden, he was appointed assessor of the Royal College of Mines.

Originally known as Swedberg, nobility was bestowed upon him by Queen Ulrica, and he changed his name to Swedenborg. He sat in the House of Nobles, his political utterances having great weight, but his tendencies were distinctly democratic. He busied himself privately in scientific gropings for the explanation of the universe. He published at least two works dealing with cosmology remembered primarily as foreshadowing many scientific facts and ventures of the future. His theories regarding light, cosmic atoms, geology, and physics were distinctly ahead of their time.

In 1734 he published Prodomus Philosophie Ratiocinatrio de Infinito, about the relation of the finite to the infinite and of the soul to the body. In this work he sought to establish a definite connection between the two as a means of overcoming the difficulty of their relationship. The spiritual and the divine appeared to him as the supreme study of man. He searched the countries of Europe for the most eminent teachers and the best books dealing with anatomy, for he considered that science the locus of the germ of the knowledge of soul and spirit. Through his anatomical studies he anticipated certain modern views dealing with the functions of the brain.

At the height of his scientific career he resigned his office to devote the rest of his life to spreading spiritual enlightenment, for which he believed himself to have been specially selected by God. He showed signs of psychic power as a child. Even at an early age he could cease breathing for a considerable period and freely enter an altered state of consciousness, possibly trance. In his book Dreams of a Spirit Seer philosopher Immanuel Kant narrates several paranormal experiences from Swedenborg's early life. He had gifts of clairvoyance. Kant also investigated and reported as authentic the story that in Gothenburg Swedenborg observed and reported a fire that was raging in Stockholm, 300 miles away.

Swedenborg's real illumination and intercourse with the spiritual world in visions and dreams began in April 1744. He claimed that in a waking state his consciousness wandered in the spirit world and conversed with its inhabitants as freely as with living men.

In later experiences he heard wonderful conversations and sensed the eyes of his spirit were so opened that he could see heavens and hells and converse with angels and spirits. He claimed that God revealed himself to him and told him that he had chosen him to unveil the spiritual sense of the whole Scriptures to man. From that moment, according to Swedenborg, he eschewed worldly knowledge and worked for spiritual ends alone. Through the next three decades, he lived in Sweden, Holland, and London.

After initially reviewing his knowledge of the Hebrew language, Swedenborg began his great works on the interpretation of the Scriptures, which were to dominate the rest of his life. A man of few wants, his life was simplicity itself, his food consisting for the most part of bread, milk, and coffee. He was in the habit of lying in a trance for days, and day and night seemed to have no distinction for him. He regularly conversed with angels in broad daylight, he said. At other times, his wrappings with evil spirits so terrified his servants that they would seek refuge in the most distant part of the house.

Swedenborg speaks of the nature of his visions and communications with the angels and spirits in his book Heaven and Hell:

"Angels speak from the spiritual world, according to inward thought; from wisdom, their speech flows in a tranquil stream, gently and uninterrupted—they speak only in vowels, the heavenly angels in A and O, the spiritual ones in E and I, for the vowels give tone to the speech, and by the tone the emotion is expressed; the interruptions, on the other hand, correspond with creations of the mind; therefore we prefer, if the subject is lofty, for instance of heaven or God, even in human speech, the vowels U and O, etc. Man, however, is united with heaven by means of the word, and forms thus the link between heaven and earth, between the divine and the natural.

"But when angels speak spiritually with me from heaven, they speak just as intelligently as the man by my side. But if they turn away from man, he hears nothing more whatever, even if they speak close to his ear. It is also remarkable that several angels can speak to a man; they send down a spirit inclined to man, and he thus hears them united."

From his ongoing conversations with the angelic beings, he wrote a number of books. These may be divided into expository books, notably The Apocalypse Revealed, The Apocalypse Explained, and Arcana Coelestia; books of spiritual philosophy, such as Inter-course between the Soul and the Body, Divine Providence and Divine Love and Wisdom; books dealing with the hierarchy of supernatural spheres, such as Heaven and Hell and The Last Judgment; and books outlining the teachings of the new church, such as The New Jerusalem, The True Christian Religion, and Canons of the New Church.

Of these works, his Divine Love and Wisdom most succinctly presents his entire religious system. God he regarded as the divine man. Spiritually God consists of infinite love, and corporeally of infinite wisdom. From the divine love, all things draw nourishment. The sun, as we know it, is merely a microcosm of a spiritual sun emanating from the creator. This spiritual sun is the source of nature; but whereas the first is alive, the second is inanimate. There is no connection between the two worlds of nature and spirit unless in similarity of construction. The causes of all things exist in the spiritual sphere and their effects in the natural sphere, and the purpose of all creation is that man may become the image of his creator, and of the cosmos as a whole.

Swedenborg believed that man possesses two vessels or receptacles for the containment of God—the will for divine love, and the understanding for divine wisdom. Before the Fall, the flow of these virtues into the human spirit was perfect, but through the intervention of the forces of evil, and the sins of man himself, it was interrupted. Seeking to restore the connection between himself and man, God came into the world as Man, for if he had ventured on Earth in his unveiled splendor, he would have destroyed the hells through which it was necessary for him to proceed to redeem man, and this he did not wish to do, merely to conquer them.

The unity of God is an essential of Swedenborgian theology, and Swedenborg thoroughly believed that God did not return to his own place without leaving behind him a visible representative of himself in the word of Scripture, which is an eternal tripartite incarnation—natural, spiritual, and celestial. Of this Swedenborg was the apostle. Nothing seemed hidden from him; he claimed to be aware of the appearance and conditions of other worlds, good and evil, heaven and hell, and of the planets. "The life of religion," he stated, "is to accomplish good. . . . The kingdom of heaven is a kingdom of uses."

Central to understanding his system is the doctrine of correspondences. There are two realms of created existence, the spiritual, which is real and substantial, and the physical, a mere reflection of the spiritual, according to this doctrine. Everything visible, Swedenborg argued, is the shadow of an appropriate spiritual reality. Between the two realms is an exact correspondence.

The work of explaining the correspondences, said Swedenborg, begins with the Scriptures; hence the prodigious amount of time he devoted to his voluminous Scripture commentaries.

Swedenborg died in London on March 29, 1772, at Prince's Square, in the parish of St. George's in East London, on the very day he had earlier predicted in a letter to Methodist leader John Wesley, who had sought an audience with him. In April 1908 his bones were removed, at the request of the Swedish government, for reburial in Stockholm.

Swedenborg wrote at a time when heretical ideas were taken seriously by state and church officials. To avoid any sanctions for his increasingly divergent ideas he initially published his works without his name. It was not until 1760, with the publication of the Treatise on Four Doctrines, that his authorship was acknowledged on the title page. Also, he wrote in Latin and argued that he was writing for the intelligentsia and church leadership and had no intention that his new approach would have a following until judged by his colleagues. Nevertheless, in his later years he found it convenient to reside outside his native land.

In England Swedenborg's ideas found some popular support, and beginning in the 1770s his major works were translated ed. The Church of the New Jerusalem was founded there in 1774, moving to the United States in 1792 soon after the Revolution.

Sources:

Sigstedt, C. O. The Swedenborg Epic: The Life and Works of Emanuel Swedenborg. New York: Bookman Associates, 1952. Reprint, London: Swedenborg Society, 1981.

Swedenborg, Emanuel. Arcana Coelestia. 12 vols. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1905–1910.

———. Heaven and Hell. New York: Swedenborg Foundation, 1979.

———. The New Jerusalem and Its Heavenly Doctrine. London: Swedenborg Society, 1938.

———. On the Divine Love and on the Divine Wisdom. London: Swedenborg Society, 1963.

———. The True Christian Religion. London: Swedenborg Society, 1950.

Woofenden, William Ross. Swedenborg Researcher's Manual. Bryn Athyn, Pa.: Swedenborg Scientific Association, 1988.

Swedenborg Foundation Newsletter See Logos

Swedenborg Society

Founded in London, England, in 1810 to translate, print, and publish the works of Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). The society organizes meetings and conferences and assists the needs of the New Church, which has grown up around Swedenborg's teachings, by keeping Swedenborg's writings in print. The society maintains a reference and lending library, with a reading room, at the London headquarters, 20 Bloomsbury Way, London, WC1A 2TH. Website: <http://www.swedenborg.org.uk>.

SWITZERLAND

[For material on ancient Switzerland, see the entry on the Teutons.]

Witchcraft and Demonology

Switzerland was by no means free from the witchcraft manias of Europe. About the year 1400, there were secular trials of people accused of sorcery, malevolent magic, in the Alps region now constituting southern and western Switzerland. During the same period, the Inquisition was pursuing heretics in neighboring valleys. One of the most active secular judges was Peter of Berne (Peter von Freyerz) in Simmenthal. Jeannette Charles was arrested as a sorceress in Geneva in 1401, and after torture she admitted evoking the devil. In Basel, in 1407, various women from well-to-do families were prosecuted for alleged sorcery in love affairs. In 1423, at Nieder-Hauenstein, near Basel, an alleged witch was condemned after a peasant testified that she had ridden on a wolf.

In the Valais area in 1428, the Bishop of Sion headed early systematic persecutions involving torture by secular authorities. Some 200 alleged witches were burned. There were many more tortures and burnings throughout the fifteenth century.

The records of the judge Peter of Berne tell of a witch named Staedelin in Boltingen (Lausanne) who confessed after torture to killing seven unborn babies in one house and preventing births in cattle. Also in Lausanne, certain witches were said to have cooked and eaten their own children, and 13 children were said to have been devoured by witches in Berne. Witches confessed to killing unbaptized children and afterwards digging up the remains and boiling them, making a transmutation ointment from the flesh.

Jakob Sprenger (1436–1495), co-author with Heinrich Kramer of the infamous Malleus Maleficarum, published in the 1480s, was born in Basel (part of German-speaking Switzerland), where he grew up in a Dominican house. While his main work was in Germany, after he was established at the University of Cologne, and his writings became the handbook of the great European witchcraft persecutions, some of which occurred in Switzerland.

The Protestant movement begun in Zürich by Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531) did not slow the prosecution of witchcraft in Switzerland, indeed, some of the Zwinglians were active propagators of the cause. Typical of such attitudes was the book Magiologia by Bartholomäus Anhorn (Basel, 1674) which endorsed the demonology of M. A. Del Rio and others. The last legally executed witch in Switzerland appears to have been Anna Göldi, who was hanged in the Protestant canton of Glarus in 1782.

Demonic Possession

A remnant of the witchcraft persecutions appeared in the nineteenth century in the form of an extraordinary outbreak of paranoia over possible demonic possession. This took place in the parish of Morzine, a beautiful valley of the Savoy near Lake Geneva, during 1860. [The following account is drawn from reports in the Cornhill Magazine, London daily journals, the Revue Spirite and an article by William Howitt titled "The Devils of Morzine."] Morzine was quite remote, and was seldom visited by tourists before 1860. Being shut in by high mountains, and inhabited by a simple, industrious, and pious peasantry, Morzine might have appeared to a casual visitor the very center of health, peace, and good order.

The first appearance of an abnormal visitation was the conduct of a young girl, who, once quiet, modest, and well-conducted, suddenly began to exhibit what her distressed family and friends supposed to be the symptoms of insanity. She ran about in the most singular and aimless way, climbed high trees, scaled walls, and was found perched on roofs and cornices that it seemed impossible for any creature but a squirrel to reach. She soon became wholly intractable, was given to fits of hysteria, violent laughter, passionate weeping, and general aberration from her customary modest behavior.

While her parents were anxiously seeking advice in this dilemma, another and still another of the young girl's ordinary companions were seized with the same malady. In the course of ten days, more than 50 females ranging from seven to fifty years of age were reported as having been seized in this way, and were exhibiting symptoms of the most bewildering mental aberration. The crawling, climbing, leaping, wild singing, furious swearing, and frantic behavior of these women soon found crowds of imitators. Before the tidings of this frightful affliction had passed beyond the district in which it originated, several hundred women and children, and scores of young men, were writhing under the contagion. The seizures were sudden, like the attacks. They seldom lasted long, yet they never seemed to yield to any form of treatment, whether harsh, kind, medical, religious, or persuasive.

The first symptoms of this malady do not seem to have been noted with sufficient attention to justify giving details that could be considered accurate. It was only when the number of the possessed exceeded 2,000 persons and the case attracted multitudes of curious inquirers from all parts of the Continent, that the medical men, priests, and journalists of the time began to keep and publish constant records of the progress of the situation.

One of the strangest features of the case, and the one that most constantly baffled the faculty, was the appearance of rugged health and freedom from all physical disease that distinguished this malady. As a general rule, the victims spoke in hoarse, rough tones unlike their own, used profane language, such as few of them could ever have heard, and imitated the actions of crawling, leaping, climbing animals with ghastly fidelity. Sometimes they would roll their bodies up into balls and distort their limbs beyond the power of the attendant physicians to account for or disentangle.

Many among them reportedly experienced levitation in the air, and in a few instances, the women spoke in strange tongues, manifested high conditions of exaltation, described glorious visions, prophesied, gave clairvoyant descriptions of absent persons and distant places, sang hymns, and preached in strains of sublime inspiration. It must be added that these instances were very rare and were only noticeable in the earlier stages of the series of events.

It is almost needless to say that the tidings of what was happening in Morzine attracted multitudes of witnesses, as well as the attention of the learned and philosophic. When the attempts of the medical faculty, the church, and the law had been tried again and again, and all had utterly failed to modify the ever-increasing horrors of this malady, Louis Napoleon, the French emperor, under whose protectorate Morzine was then governed, yielding to the representations of his advisers, actually sent out three military companies to Morzine, charged with strict orders to quell the disturbances "on the authority of the Emperor, or by force if necessary." The result of this high-handed policy was to increase tenfold the violence of the disease and to augment the number of the afflicted, including some of the soldiers themselves, who sank under the contagion they were expected to quench.

The next move of the baffled government was a spiritual one. An army of priests, headed by a venerable bishop, much beloved in his diocese, was dispatched in the company of exorcists at the suggestion of the Archbishop of Paris. This second experiment worked no better than the first. Respectable-looking groups of well-dressed men, women, and children, would pass into the churches in reverent silence and with all the appearance of health and piety, but no sooner was heard the sound of the priest's voice or the notes of the organ, than shrieks, sobbings, and frenzied cries resounded from different parts of the assembly. Anxious fathers and husbands were busy in carrying their distracted relatives into the open air, and whether in the church or the home, every attempt of a sacerdotal character seemed to arouse the mania to heights of fury before unknown.

The time came at length when the old bishop thought of a way to achieve a general victory over the diabolical adversary. He commanded that as many as possible of the afflicted should be gathered together to hear high mass, when he trusted that the solemnity of the occasion would be sufficient to defeat what he evidently believed to be the combined forces of Satan. According to William Howitt, the assemblage in question, which included at least 2,000 of the possessed and a number of spectators, recalled Milton's description of Pandemonium. Children and women were leaping over the seats and benches, clambering up the pillars, and shrieking defiance from pinnacles that scarcely admitted of a foothold for a bird.

The bishop's letter contained one remark that seems to offer a clue to these scenes of horror and madness. He stated, "When in my distress and confusion I accidentally laid my hand on the heads of these unfortunates, I found that the paroxysm instantly subsided, and that however wild and clamorous they may have been before, the parties so touched generally sunk down as it were into a swoon, or deep sleep, and woke up most commonly restored to sanity, and a sense of propriety."

The failure of episcopal influence threw the government back on the help of medical science. One Dr. Constans had published a report in which he held out hopes of a cure if his advice was strictly followed. He was commissioned to do what he could for Morzine. Armed with the powers of a dictator he returned there, and, backed by a fresh detachment of sixty soldiers, a brigade of gendarmes, and a fresh cure, he issued despotic decrees and threatened lunatic asylums and deportation for the convulsed.

He fined any person who accused others of magic, or in any way encouraged the prevalent idea of supernatural evil. He desired the curé to preach sermons against the possibility of demonica possession, but this order could not be carried out by even the most obedient priest. The persons affected with fits were dispersed in every direction. Some were sent to asylums and hospitals, and many were simply exiled from Chablais. They were not allowed to revisit except by very special favor. Howitt notes,

"We need not point to the salient facts of our narrative, or discuss the various theories that have been invented to account for them. . . . It is impossible not to see the resemblance of the Morzine epidemic with the demonopathy of the sixteenth century, and the history of the Jansenist and Cevennes convulsionnaires. . . . Some of the facts we have related were often observed in the state of hypnotism, or nervous sleep, with which physicians are familiar. The hallucinations of which we have given instances are too common to astonish us. But the likeness of this epidemic to others that have been observed does not account for its symptoms."

Psychical Research and Parapsychology

As early as the mid-nineteenth century, interest in what would later be called psychical research emerged in Switzerland, one of the earliest pioneers of research into the paranormal being Maximilian Perty, who published studies on occult phenomena and Spiritualism from 1856 on. Although originally skeptical of survival of personality after death, he later became sympathetic to the concept.

Possibly the most famous Swiss psychical researcher is Theodore Flournoy (1854–1920), a psychologist at the University of Geneva who took part in the investigations of the mediumship of Eusapia Palladino. However, his enduring fame derived from his important investigation of the famous case of the medium Hélène Smith, as recorded in his book From India to the Planet Mars; A Study of a Case of Somnambulism with Glossolalia (1900).

While Flournoy operated from French-speaking Geneva, most interest in psychical research came from the German-speaking sections of the country. Other important Swiss investigators include Marc Thury (1822–1905); Eugene Bleuler of Zürich; Georg Sulzer (d. 1929); Karl E. Müller (1893–1969); Fanny Hoppe-Moser, who published Okkultismus, Täuschungen und Tatsachen (1935), and Spuk (1950); Guido Huber (died 1953), who published studies on survival; Gebhard Frei (1905–1967), who published a useful bibliography on the psychology of the subconscious; Peter Ringger, who founded the first parapsychological society in Switzerland and published works on parapsychology; and Friedrich A. Volman, who specialized in the literature of hauntings.

The great psychologist Carl Jung also occupies a special position for his interest in reconciling occult studies with the psychology of the subconscious. Between 1899 and 1900, he experimented with a young medium and submitted a doctoral thesis On the Psychology and Pathology of the So-Called Occult. He later cooperated in experiments in psychokinesis and materialization phenomena with famous mediums. There were a number of paranormal events in his own experience.

There are two major parapsychological societies. The Schweitzer Parapsychologische Gesellschaft Zürich was founded in 1952, with Peter Ringger as president. Six years later, his place was taken by Dr. Hans Naegeli-Osjord. The SPG organizes lecture programs in Zürich, maintains a library, and issues the periodical Parapress. It may be contacted c/o Frau N. von Muralt, Weihaldenstrasse 3, CH-8700 Kusnacht, Switzerland.

The Schweizerische Vereinigung für Parapsychologie was founded in Zürich in 1966 and organizes public lectures, discussions, and high school courses in psychical subjects. Under the presidency of Theo Locher, it has conducted investigations into a variety of parapsychological subjects, results of which are published in the biannual Bulletin für Parapsychologie. The society may be contacted at Industriestrasse 5, 2555 Brug, Zürich.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Sword of Dyrnwyn

Periodical issued sporadically since 1977 by the Association of Cymmry Wicca and the Church of Y Tylwyth Teg, devoted to Welsh pagan traditions; includes articles on ley lines, astrology, megaliths, magick, ecology, and other occult subjects. It is issued by Camelot Press at PO Box 674884, Marietta, GA 30006-0006. Website: <http://www.tylwythteg.com>.

Sycomanacy

Divination by the leaves of the fig tree. Questions or propositions were written on fig leaves. If the leaf dried quickly after the appeal, it was an evil omen, but it was a good sign if the leaf dried slowly.

Symbolism (Metapsychical)

A term used by psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano in relation to:

“... cases in which, by subconscious or mediumistic methods, an idea is expressed by means of hallucinatory perceptions, or ideographic representations, or forms of language differing from the ideas to be transmitted, but capable of suggesting them indirectly or conventionally. In other words, there is metapsychical symbolism every time an idea is transmitted by means of representations which are not reproductions.”

F. W. H. Myers included one instance of such symbolic communication in his book, Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death (1903): A botanical student passing inattentively in front of the glass door of a restaurant thought he saw “Verbascum Thapsus” printed on it. The real word was “Bouillon,” and that happens to be the trivial name in French for the plant Verbascum Thapsus. The actual optical perception was thus subliminally transformed.

Symbolism often occurs in occultism, particularly in prophetic dreams, which are sometimes represented in visual or etymological puns. Sigmund Freud drew attention to such symbolic imagery in his psychoanalytical theory of dreams. Many psychics find their visions of future events occur in symbolic form. Traditional astrological predictions used to be presented in symbolic pictures called hieroglyphs.

Symmes, John Cleves (1780–1829)

Born November 5, 1780, Symmes was a captain in the U.S. Army in the war of 1812–14, nephew of the jurist of the same name. He served with distinction at the battle of Niagara and in the sortie from Fort Erie. He later devoted himself to philosophical pursuits. In 1818, he promulgated his theory that the Earth is a hollow sphere, habitable within, open at the poles to admit light, and containing within it six or seven concentric hollow spheres also open at the poles.

In May 1818, he mailed prominent people in various countries a manifesto of his theories, asking for an expedition to be equipped for exploration at the poles. He lectured widely and his convert James McBride was responsible for the anonymously published Symmes' Theory of Concentric Spheres; Demonstrating that the Earth is Hollow, Habitable Within, and Widely Open About the Poles, by A Citizen of the United States (1826). It was not favorably received, but later influenced other hollow Earth theorists.

In 1820, a pseudonymous book by “Captain Seaborn” titled Symzonia described a steamship voyage to the south polar opening. The ship goes over the rim and enters the continent of “Symzonia,” where the inhabitants live in a socialist utopia. This concept may have influenced Edgar Allan Poe’s story “Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym.”

Symmes died May 28, 1829, at the early age of 49, but his theories were revived by his son Americus Vespucci, who published The Symmes' Theory of Concentric Spheres (1878).

Sources:

A Citizen of the United States [James McBride]. Symmes' Theory of Concentric Spheres; Demonstrating that the Earth is Hollow, Habitable Within, and Widely Open About the Poles. Cincinnati, Ohio: Morgan, Lodge, and Fisher, 1826.

Symmes, Americus, ed. The Symmes' Theory of Concentric Spheres; Demonstrating that the Earth is Hollow, Habitable Within, and Widely Open about the Poles. Louisville, Ky.: Bradley and Gilbert, 1878.

Symonds, John (1914–)

British novelist, writer of children’s books, and author of important works on occultism. He met Aleister Crowley in 1945 and tried to assist publication of his writings in the last two years of Crowley’s life. He became Crowley’s literary executor, and he is the author of the standard biography of Crowley: The Great Beast (1951). He went on to write several books about Crowley—the most recent appeared in 1989—and with Kenneth Grant he edited The Confessions of Aleister Crowley and Crowley’s own book Magick (1973). Symonds was a member of the editorial board of Man, Myth, and Magic (1970) and wrote other books on occult topics, the most notable being his biography of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky: Madame Blavatsky: Medium and Magician (1960).

Sources:

Symonds, John. The Great Beast. London: MacDonald, 1951. Reprint, St. Albans, England: Mayflower, 1973.

———. The King of the Shadow Realm. London: Duckworth, 1989.

———. Light Over Water. London: J. Baker for the Unicorn Press, 1963.

———. The Magic of Aleister Crowley. London: Frederick Muller, 1958.

———. Thomas Brown and the Angels. London: Hutchinson, 1961.

Sympathy

A mutual attraction or identity of feeling between individuals and also animals, the opposite of the reaction of antipathy. The term “sympathy” has a special significance in mesmerism or animal magnetism, where it is used to indicate the rapport between operator and subject, by means of which the operator could influence and control the perceptions of the subject. It has also been suggested that a condition of sympathy might exist between agent and percipient in telepathy, particularly in the transmission of emotions.

Synchronicity

A connecting principle, expressing the linkage of events without a cause-and-effect relationship in time. In addition to the normal cause-and-effect connections observed in nature, there appears to be another principle expressed in the simultaneous arrangement or connection of events. A theory of synchronicity was developed by psychotherapist Carl G. Jung and related to certain ESP phenomena. In recent decades the concept has been widely borrowed by occultists in support of their worldview.

As an illustration of this principle, some, such as astrologer Dan Rudhyar, suggest a relationship between astrological positions and events in the life of individual human beings. The human events are not necessarily caused by the position of heavenly bodies, only linked in a causal relationship.

Sources:

Jung, Carl G., and W. Pauli. The Interpretation of Nature and the Psyche. London, 1955.

Synchronicity Foundation

Synchronicity Foundation, known for its support of an innovative high-tech form of meditation, was founded in 1983 by Master Charles, a mystic and former leading disciple of Swami Paramahansa Muktananda (1908–1982), one of the most popular spiritual teachers from India to build a following in the West in the 1970s. He taught a form of kundalini yoga. Master Charles was born on March 14, 1945, in Syracuse, New York, and raised in a Roman Catholic family. As a child he began to have mystic and visionary experiences and developed a special devotion to the Virgin Mary. He attended a Roman Catholic high school and at one point considered entering a Roman Catholic order, but became disenchanted with the church as an institution.

As he moved into adulthood, he began to explore the alternative spiritualities, especially Eastern forms, that were flowing into the country at the time. Then in 1970, some friends who had been to India showed him a photo of Swami Muktananda. He had an immediate reaction to the picture. He discovered a copy of Guru, Muktananda's autobiographical book, and laid plans to go to India himself. His meeting with Muktananda confirmed the awakening of divine energy he already experienced. He became a disciple and was given the name Arjuna. He eventually became Muktananda's private secretary.

Shortly before his passing in 1982, Muktananda instructed Arjuna to return to the West and create a form of the teachings not bound in an Indian cultural format. Thus, in 1982, Arjuna changed his name to Brother Charles and settled in rural Virginia. He began to attract a few disciples, and as his following grew he founded the Synchronicity Foundation. The name of the foundation grew out of his understanding that meditation is an experience that synchronizes the activity of the two halves of the brain. When the brain is unsynchronized, one experiences the duality of the world. When they are synchronized, one experiences the underlying unity of the Source of all.

Brother Charles (now known as Master Charles) has also considered the scientific advances in the West and the understanding of the role sound played in enhancing the meditation experience. He discovered that certain patterns of sound aid synchronization and developed recordings that could be fed to meditators in headphones. This became the basis of a growing technological approach to spirituality and mysticism.

The Synchronicity Foundation is headquartered at P.O. Box 694, Nellyford, VA 22923. It offers a program of retreats and workshops, and a network of Synchronicity centers have emerged around the world. The foundation has an Internet site at <http://www.synchronicity.org/>.

Sources:

Charles, Master. The Bliss of Freedom: A Contemporary Mystic's Enlightening Journey. Malibu, Calif.: Acacia Publishing, 1997.
Synchronicity Foundation Homepage. <http://www.synchronicity.org/>. June 28, 2000.

Synchronicity Research Unit See SRU

Szekely, Edmond Bordeaux (?–1980)

Edmond Bordeaux Szekely, the proponent of a modern spiritual pathway he ascribed to the ancient Essenes, was born in Hungary early in the twentieth century. He was the grandson of the poet Alexander Szekely. His father was the Unitarian bishop of Clug, Transylvania (now in Romania), and his mother was a French Roman Catholic. His primary education was at a parochial school, and as a young man he was sent to study in Rome. There around 1923, in the Vatican Archives, he reportedly discovered the lost gospel written in Aramaic, the language Jesus actually spoke. He also reportedly discovered a Hebrew fragment of the text in Monte Cassino. (Szekely left little information about the manuscripts and no one else has been able to locate them.) Szekely also claimed to have found a copy of the manuscript written in Old Slavonic in Vienna, but again few details have been left concerning the find or its present location.

Szekely published a section of the manuscript in 1937 as the Gospel of Peace by the Apostle John. It was later republished as the Essene Gospel of Peace, the name by which it is currently best known. Given the vague information on its discovery and the failure in locating the original manuscripts, critics have suggested that the ancient texts never existed and that the Essene Gospel is an entirely modern product of Szekely's imagination. In spite of these criticisms, many have found the book of great inspirational value.

Shortly after the publication of the Gospel, Szekely founded several communes in France which attempted to embody its teachings. However, as Hitler rose to power, Szekely left for the Americas. He settled in Tecate, Mexico, south of San Diego, and eventually became a Mexican citizen. He purchased a rural estate and opened the Essene School, built upon the idea that Jesus and the first Christians were Essenes. Here he began to systematically teach his principles for healthy living, which he termed biogenics. Keys to the system were vegetarianism and the use of whole fresh foods. His estate, Rancho la Puerta, became famous as a health spa, attracting many wealthy and famous people.

In 1958 Szekely opened the Golden Door, a health spa in Escondido, California, that became one of the most famous of the era. It was especially favored by Hollywood stars. From his base in the Essene School he founded the International Biogenic Society to perpetuate his health perspective and authored numerous books. He also founded the Academy of Creative Living, which published many of his books, including the second and third installments of the Essene Gospel of Peace (1974). He spent the last years of his life in Cartago, Costa Rica, where he died in 1980.

Following his death, his wife continued as head of the International Biogenic Society. It may now be contacted at P.O. Box 849, Nelson, BC, Canada V1L 6A5. A spiritual community emphasizing the Essene teachings was created in 1982 by his colleague Garry White in San Diego, California, as the First Christians' Essene Church (now the Essene Foundation), headquartered at 2536 Collier Ave., San Diego, CA 92116. More recently, the Essene New Life Church founded by Rev. Dr. Charles A. Thomas in 1993 is headquartered at 110 Smith St., Ste. A, Mount Shasta, CA 96067-2636. It, and its associated Awareness Institute, is the only group to have a website, to be found at <http://www.awarinst.com>.

Sources:

Berskov, Per. Strange Tales About Jesus. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1983.

Szekely, Edmond Bordeaux. The Gospel of Peace by the Apostle John. London: C. H. Daniels, 1937. Reprinted as The Essene Gospel of Peace. San Diego: Academy of Creative Living, 1971.

———. The Essene Way, Biogenic Living. Cartago, Costa Rica: International Biogenic Society, 1978.

———. Talks. San Diego: Academy of Creative Living, 1972.

T

Table-turning (or Table-tipping)

A form of psychic phenomena in which a table rotates, tilts, or rises completely off the ground by the mere contact of the fingertips of an individual or group of individuals. In exceptional cases tables have been known to move or even levitate without direct contact. The familiar form of séance in table-turning is that in which the sitters place their fingertips on the table; then the table moves without conscious exercise of muscular force. By relating the raps or tilts of the table to the alphabet it becomes possible to receive intelligent messages. (See movement)

Historical Background

Table-turning is the simplest and oldest form of communication with extraneous intelligences or the subconscious self. In ancient times tables were used for purposes of divination as “mensa divinatoriae.” In fourth-century Rome, Ammianus Marcellinus described a table with a slab, engraved with the letters of the alphabet, above which a ring was held, suspended by a thread; by swinging to certain letters, messages were spelled out. Tertullian (ca. 155–ca. 222) appears to have been one of the first who knew of table communications with the unseen world.

Table-turning in modern Spiritualism dates from the mid-nineteenth century and seems to have originated in America soon after the Rochester rappings of 1848. At that time, there was considerable interest in animal magnetism or “electro-biology,” stemming from the mesmerism of Europe.

Mesmerism established the convention of groups of individuals arranged in a circle with a variously named magnetic fluid linking them. After the phenomena of rappings in the presence of the Fox sisters became widely known, groups gathered around other individuals who possessed the same ability to generate raps.

Table-turning and rapping spread like an epidemic throughout America and was brought to England by such professional mediums as Maria B. Hayden, who came to London with a lecturer on electro-biology in 1852. An advantage of table-turning was that it did not require a paid professional medium. Amateur groups could sit round a table and obtain the intelligent rappings which had first been manifest only to specially talented individuals, i.e., mediums.

In 1852 afternoon social invitations to tea and table-turning were common. Table-turning was even more successful in France, with its tradition of mesmerism and animal magnetism. One widespread jest was that people no longer asked after each other's health, but asked instead how the table was. “Thank you, mine turns beautifully, and how goes yours?”

Mesmerists welcomed table-turning as a demonstration of animal magnetism or odic force, while Fundamentalist ecclesiastics denounced it as due to Satanic agency. Scientists and doctors thought that the new craze would be a danger to mental health and a committee was formed to find a non-Spiritualist explanation for the phenomenon. They reported in the Medical

Times and Gazette on June 11, 1853, that the motion of the table was due to unconscious muscular action.

A few weeks later the great chemist and physicist Michael Faraday reported experiments with a simple apparatus to demonstrate that the movements of the table were due to unconscious muscular action of the part of the sitters, who were by implication the automatic authors of the messages claiming to come from the spirit world. Faraday's apparatus consisted of two thin wooden boards with little glass rollers between them. The contraption was whole bound together with rubber bands and so contrived that the slightest lateral pressure on the upper board would cause it to slip a little way over the other. A hays-talk or a scrap of paper served to indicate any motion of the upper board over the lower.

The conclusion drawn from these experiments was that when the sitters believed themselves to be pressing downward, they were really pressing obliquely in the direction they expected the table to rotate. Other investigators also held the expectation that the operators had much to do with the motions of the table. James Braid pointed out in the appendix to his book Hypnotic Therapeutics (1853) that someone generally announced beforehand the direction they expected the table to rotate.

Among the earliest investigators of the phenomenon of table-turning were Count Agenor De Gasparin and Prof. Marc Thury of Geneva, who held séances and were satisfied that the movements resulted from a force radiating from the operators, to which they gave the name of ectenic force.

The public, on the whole, ignored the conclusions of Faraday and others, preferring the more popular Spiritualist explanation or the pseudo-scientific theories of “electro-biology.” Other explanations offered included od or odic force, galvanism, animal magnetism, and the rotation of the Earth. Revs. G. Sandby and C. H. Townshend claimed to have experienced a feeling of fatigue after a table-turning séance as though they had been hypnotizing someone. They reported a tingling sensation in their fingertips, while Townshend claimed somewhat vaguely that spirit rappings might be caused by a “disengagement of Zoogen (an unidentified force in nature) from the System.”

Meanwhile various Evangelical clergymen insisted that table-turning was Satanic. Revs. N. S. Godfrey, E. Gillson, and others held séances in which the “spirit” confessed themselves to be either spirits of worthless persons of evil inclination or devils. Both of the “spirits’” confessions caused the reverent gentlemen to denounce the whole practice of table-turning. One of them purposely mentioned the Faraday experiments, stating that the phenomena “appear to be whatever the investigator supposes them to be”—a saying which aptly characterized his own attitude.

The psychical researcher Camille Flammarion, whose exhaustive experiments and scientific attainments gave considerable weight to his opinion, offered an explanation of the various phases of table-turning phenomena. Simple rotation of the table he ascribed to an unconscious impulse given by the operators; other movements of the table while the fingers of the sitters rested upon it were ascribed to similar causes. The tilting of the table on the side furthest away from the operator was explained by muscular action. The vibrations in the wood of the table, its levitation under the fingers, or extent, its rotation without contact of the operator's hands, he attributed to a force emanating from the body. In the latter case, the operator was capable of acting at a distance by means of ether-waves. This force, the result of a cerebral disturbance, was greater than that of the muscles, as is seen by the levitation of tables so weighty that the combined muscular strength of the operators would not suffice to lift them.

To the dictating of messages and other intelligent manifestations he gave an origin in this psychic force, which is perhaps identical with Thury's "ectenic force," or "psychode," and which is obedient to the will and desires, or even, in some cases, the subconscious will of the operator. Flammarion did not consider the spirit hypothesis necessary.

It is possible that some fraud may have crept into the séances investigated by Flammarion, as it has done in so many other cases. There are, of course, those among the most qualified of psychological researcher, who find the hypothesis of unconscious muscular action or deliberate fraud a satisfactory explanation of the phenomena.

The Mechanics of Table-Turning

One common procedure followed by those engaged in table tipping began with those in attendance forming a circle around the table. They placed hands lightly, with fingertips touching, on the leaf, and with lowered lights or in complete darkness, waited for the manifestations. According to reports, if someone with psychic powers was present the table might show signs of animation. The first such sign was often a quivering motion under the sitters' hands; it increased until the table pulsed with a mysterious energy. The wooden surface appeared to come to act as a reservoir of externalized nervous force.

The psychical researcher Hereward Carrington said that in his séances with Eusapia Palladino the table appeared to be somehow alive like the back of a dog. In one of his stories a similar phenomenon that occurred during the mediumship of medium D. D. Home induced Alexander Dumas to fantasize the table as an intelligence itself. The conception of a spirit entering furniture became a favorite idea with French authors afterward.

After the vibratory stage the table might jerk, tilt, stumble about, and eventually become entirely levitated. Apparently, there was believed to be an intelligence behind these movements. If the letters of the alphabet were called over in the dark, the table, by tilting, knocking on the floor, or tapping, indicated certain letters that connectedly spelled out a message, often claiming to come from someone deceased. The intelligence that manifested had personal characteristics. In repeated sittings it was soon noticed by observers that the skill with which the table was manipulated or the eccentricities of its behavior were indications of the presence of the same entity. The strange, stolid, or clumsy behavior of the table immediately denoted that a new visitant was tampering with the contact.

But the table might disclose much more than that. Its motions could express humor, emotion, and personality. It might climb up into the sitter's lap as a mark of affection; it might chase others all over the room in a hostile manner. As an additional means of expression, the table could convey queer impressions by creaking. P. P. Alexander noted in his book Spiritualism: A Narrative with a Discussion (1871):

"At a particular stage of the proceedings the table began to make strange undulatory movements, and gave out, as these proceeded, a curious accompaniment of creaking sounds. Mr. Home seemed surprised. 'This is very curious,' he said, 'it is a phenomenon of which I have no experience hitherto.' Presently my friend remarked that movement and sound together—it reminded him of nothing he could think of except a ship in distress, with its timbers straining in a heavy sea. . . . This conclusion being come to . . . the table proceeded to rap out: 'It is David.' Instantly a lady burst into tears, and cried wildly: 'Oh, that must be my poor, dear brother, David, who was lost at sea some time since.'"

When the table moves under contact there is an obvious possibility for the subconscious mind or a secondary personality to convey ideas by unconscious muscular pressure of either a medium or the sitters. According to F. W. H. Myers,

"The subliminal self, like the telegraphist begins its effort with full knowledge of the alphabet, but with only weak and rude command over our muscular adjustments. It is therefore a priori likely that its easiest mode of communication will be through a repetition of simple movements, so arranged as to correspond to letters of the alphabet."

But Myers was inclined to attribute to the subconscious mind the movement of the table without contact as well. "If a table moves when no one is touching it, this is not obviously more likely to have been effected by my deceased grandfather than by myself. We cannot tell how I could move it; but then we cannot tell how he could move it either."

Certainly, there are experiences which bear out this possibility and show how singularly deceptive the interpretation of phenomena may be. George S. Long, an acquaintance of Richard Hodgson, narrated in the Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research (vol. 9, p. 65) a strange experience with a chair. Through a young lady he received what was said to be the most convincing test of spirit return:

"First the chair spelt out my name and showed a disposition to get into my lap; then it spelt out 'George, you ought to know me as I am Jim.' But I didn't, and said so. Then without my looking at the board, it spelt out 'Long Island, Jim Rowe' and 'Don't you remember I used to cary you when you were a little fellow,' or words to that effect. I had to acknowledge the truth of it and also to say that as he was an ignorant man he possibly intended 'Cary' for carry. I must own I was puzzled for the moment. To make sure of his power I asked that he count the pickets in the fence. Somehow he could not agree to this, and even the medium objected. As a last resort I asked how long he had been in the spirit land and the answer came, between thirteen and fourteen years. Now to the sequel. First it occurred to me a day or two later, that while all the incidents given were correct the name should have been given as Roe instead of Rowe. Second I was upon Long Island this summer, and the matter coming to my mind I inquired how long Jim Roe had been dead, and was informed he died last Winter; so when I received this test so convincing to the believers the man was not dead."

The material from which the chair or table was made seemed to make no difference once the available power was sufficient to manifest. The reason why a table was used for spirit communication was primarily convenience; it was piece of generally available furniture which allowed contact around it for a large number of people. Some Spiritualists also thought its surface acted as a receptacle for the generated force and compared the space underneath the table to a medium's cabinet, especially if it was surrounded by a deep hanging table cloth. In the early days of Spiritualism, they often used a table with a hole in the middle through which "materialized hands" could be thrust.

Eusapia Palladino insisted on a séance table built entirely of wood. She considered soft pine wood the best to absorb vital magnetism. She allowed no metal in the construction of the table.

The color of the table made no difference. Joseph Maxwell found an advantage in covering it with some white material of light texture. He also insisted that the table should, if possible, be fastened with wooden pegs instead of nails since mediums, supposedly, are sometimes extremely sensitive to metals.

It was reported that with a powerful medium the movement of the table could occur at any time and disclose a tremendous force in operation. Thus Gambier Bolton, writing in Psychic Force (1904) observed,

“During any meal with Mrs. Elgie Corner [i.e., Florence Cook] in one’s own house, and whilst she herself is engaged in eating and drinking—both of her hands being visible all the time—the heavy dining table will commence first to quiver, setting all the glasses shaking, and plates, knives, forks and spoons in motion, and then to rock and sway from side to side, occasionally going so far as to tilt up at one end or at one side; and all the time raps and tappings will be heard in the table and in many different parts of the room. Taking a meal with her in a public restaurant is a somewhat serious matter.”

In experiments conducted by psychical researcher Harry Price with the psychic Stella C. in 1923, powerful and rhythmical vibrations of tables were obtained, and on one occasion, after violent movements of a table, it suddenly snapped, the top breaking into two pieces, and the legs breaking off.

Table-Turning and Dowsing

The various theories about the rationale of table-turning parallel those advanced for the phenomena of dowsing and radiesthesia, where there is meaningful movement of a water-witching rod or a pendulum or similar indicator. The actual force moving the indicator is still a matter of controversy.

It is generally assumed that unconscious muscular action or nervous energy plays a significant part, but it is still far from clear how information on underground water, minerals, or buried objects is conveyed to the mind, or from the mind to the indicator.

One of the earliest investigators to link the action of table-turning with divining rods or pendulums was the French chemist Michel Eugène Chevreul, in his book De la baguette divinatoire, du pendule dit explorateur et des tables tournantes, au point de vue de l’histoire, de la critique et de la méthode expérimentale (1854).

In modern times, table-turning is a laborious method of establishing contact with unseen intelligence. Planchette and ouija board are more satisfactory and faster. Also, while a number of prominent mediums such as Betty White began their career with a ouija board, they quickly moved beyond. Messages obtained by such methods are often misleading or false. Again, the communications received at circles in general tend to reflect the general interest level of the sitters.

Sources:

Barrett, William, and Theodore Besterman. The Divining-Rod: An Experimental & Psychological Investigation. London: Methuen, 1926. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1968.

Burr, Chauncey. Knocks for the Knockings. New York: Burr Brothers, 1851.

Capron, E. W. Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticisms, Its Consistencies and Contradictions. Boston: B. Marsh, 1855. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Capron, E. W., and H. D. Barron. Singular Revelations: Explanation and History of the Mysterious Communion with Spirits. Auburn, N.Y., 1850.

Chevreul, M. E. De la baguette divinatoire, du pendule dit explorateur et des tables tournantes, au point de vue de l’histoire, de la critique et de la méthode expérimentale. Paris, 1854.

Close, F. The Tester Tested; or Table Moving, Turning, Talking, Not Diabolical: A Review of the Publications of the Rev. Messrs. Godfrey, Gillson, Vincent, and Dibdin. London and Cheltenham, 1853.

Cowan, Charles. Thoughts on Satanic Influence, or Modern Spiritualism Considered. London, 1854.

De Gasparin, Comte Agenor. Des tables tournantes, de surnaturel en général, et des esprits. Paris, 1854.

De Mirville, Marquis J. E. Pneumatologie: Des Esprits et de leurs manifestations fluidique devant la science moderne. Paris, 1853.

De Szapary, Comte F. G. Les tables tournantes. Paris, 1854.

Dewey, D. M. History of the Strange Sounds or Rappings Heard in Rochester and Western New York. Rochester, 1850.

Du Potet de Sennevoy, Baron. Traité complet de magnétisme animal. Paris, 1856.

Elliott, Charles W. Mysteries, or Glimpses of the Supernatural. New York: Harper, 1852.

Godfrey, Nathaniel S. Table Turning the Devil’s Modern Masterpiece; Being the Result of a Course of Experiments. U.K.: Thames Ditton, 1853.

Guldenstubbbe, Baron L. de. Pneumatologie positive et expérimentale; La réalité des Esprits et le phénomène merveilleux de leur écriture directe démontrées. Paris, 1857.

Hartmann, E. von. Der Spiritismus. 1855. English ed. as Spiritism. London, n.d.

Hornung, D. Neue Geheimnisse des Tages durch Geistes Magnetismus. Leipzig, 1857.

Kerner, Justinus. Die Sommambülen Tische: Zur Geschichte und Erklärungen dieser Erscheinungen. Stuttgart, 1853.

Lang, Andrew. Cock Lane and Common-Sense. London: Longmans, Green, 1894. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1970.

Mahan, Asa. Modern Mysteries Explained and Exposed. Boston, 1855.

Mattison, Hiram. Spirit Rapping Unveiled! Derby, N.Y., 1853.

Maxwell, Joseph. Metaphysical Phenomena: Methods and Observations. London: Duckworth, 1905.

Morgan, R. C. An Inquiry Into Table Miracles. Bath and London, 1853.

Page, Charles G. Psychomancy; Spirit Rappings and Tippings Exposed. New York, 1853.

Perty, Maximilien. Die Mystischen Erscheinungen der menschlichen Natur. 2nd ed., Leipzig and Heidelberg, 1872.

Price, Harry. Stella C.: An Account of Some Original Experiments in Psychical Research. Edited by James Turner. London: Souvenir Press, 1973.

Prichard, John. A Few Sober Words of Table-talk about the Spirits. Leamington, UK, 1853.

Spicer, Henry. Facts and Fantasies: A Sequel to “Sights and Sounds”. London, 1853.

Table Turning and Table Talking Considered in Connection with the Dictates of Reason and Common Sense. Bath, UK: S. Gibbs, 1853.

Table Turning by Animal Magnetism Demonstrated. London, 1853.

Tiffany, Joel. Spiritualism Explained. New York: Graham & Ellinwood, 1856.

Townsend, C. H. Mesmerism Proved True. London, 1854.

Taboo (or Tabu or Tapu)

A Polynesian word meaning “prohibited” and signifying a prohibition enforced by religious or magical power, which has come to be applied to similar usages among primitive peoples all over the world. It also has parallels in the religious codes of sophisticated societies, as in the early Hebrew term Kherem (“set apart” or prohibited), and in the highly developed social etiquette of modern society.

Taboo, or prohibition, was enforced in the cases of sacred things and unclean things. In the first instance, the taboo was placed on the object because of the possession by it of inherent mysterious power. But taboo might be imposed by a chief or priest. It would be used for the protection of important individuals, the safeguarding of the weak, women, children, and slaves from the magical influence of more highly-placed individuals, against danger incurred by handling or coming in contact with corpses, or eating certain foods, and the securing of human beings against the power of supernatural agencies, or the deprecations of thieves.

Taboo could be sanctioned by social use or instinct. The violation of a taboo made the offender taboo; taboos, like various kinds of social uncleanliness, were transmissible, but the taboo could be thrown off by magical or purificatory ceremonies. It might last for a short period, or be imposed for eternity.

It may be said that the practice of taboo was instituted through human instinct for human convenience. This applies of course merely to the most simple type of taboo. It was, for example, forbidden to reap or steal the patch of corn dedicated to an agricultural deity, for the simple reason that his wrath would be incurred by so doing. Similarly it was taboo to devour the flesh of the totem animal of the tribe, except in special circumstances with the object of achieving communion with him. It was taboo to interfere in any manner with the affairs of the shamans or medicine men, also a type of the imposed taboo for the convenience of a certain caste. It was prohibited to marry a woman of the same totem as oneself, because all the members of a totemic band are supposed to be consanguineous; such a union might incur the wrath of the patron deity. A very strict taboo was put upon the witnessing of certain ritual instruments belonging to some primitive tribes, but this only applied to women and uninitiated men. It was considered a degradation for women to behold sacred implements.

If taboo does not spring directly from the system known as totemism, it was strongly influenced by it—that is, many intricate taboos arose from the totemic system. There was also the taboo of the sorcerer; it in effect was merely a spell placed upon a certain object, which makes it become useless to others. Taboo, or its remains, can still be found even in modernized communities. From its use the feeling of reverence for ancient institutions and those who represent them is undoubtedly derived.

Sources:

Frazer, James G. The Golden Bough. Vol. 3 of Taboo and the Perils of the Soul. New York: Macmillan, 1935.

Ganzfried, Rabbi Solomon. Code of Jewish Law (Kitzur Schulchan Aruch). New York: Hebrew Publishing, 1927.

Mead, Margaret. Inquiry Into the Question of Cultural Stability in Polynesia. New York: Columbia University, 1928. Reprint, New York: AMS Press, 1981.

Webster, Hutton. Taboo: A Sociological Study. Palo Alto, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1942. Reprint, London: Octagon, 1981.

Tabori, Paul (1908–1974)

Hungarian-born British novelist, journalist, political writer, scriptwriter, and psychical researcher. Some of his books were published under the pseudonyms “Christopher Stevens” and “Paul Tabor.” Tabori was born on August 5, 1908, in Budapest, Hungary. He was educated at Kaiser Friedrich Wilhelm University (Ph.D., 1930) and Pazmany Peter University (Doctor of Economics and Political Science). He worked in various journalistic positions in Hungary (1926–1937) and London (1937–1960s). Beginning in the 1920s, Tabori wrote a number of books on various political and other subjects. He lived in the United States for several years as a 1966 visiting professor at Fairleigh Dickinson University (1966) and the City College of New York (1967). He also translated a number of books and authored 32 feature films and over a hundred television films and plays.

On the death of psychical researcher Harry Price (1881–1948), Tabori was literary executor for Price and a trustee of the Harry Price Library at London University, England. Subsequently he published a biography, Harry Price: The Biography of a Ghost Hunter (1950), the first of several books on psychic topics. He died November 9, 1974.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Tabori, Paul. Beyond the Senses: A Report on Psychical Research in the Sixties. N.p., 1971.

———. Companions of the Unseen. London: H. A. Humphrey, 1968.

———. Harry Price: The Biography of a Ghost Hunter. London: Atheneum Press, 1950.

Tabori, Paul, and Cornelius Tabori. My Occult Diary. 1951. Reprint, New York: Living Books, 1966.

Tabori, Paul, and P. Raphael. Crime and the Occult. N.p., 1974.

Tabori, Paul, and Peter Underwood. The Borley Ghosts. N.p., 1973.

Tadabtsois

Spirits believed in by the Samoyeds. (See also Siberia)

Tadibe

The name for a Samoyed magician. (See also Siberia)

Taetzsch, Robert Leonard (1931–)

Statistician, management engineer, and parapsychologist. He was born on July 6, 1931, at Irvington, New Jersey, and studied at the Newark College of Engineering, New Jersey, where he received both a B.S. (mechanical engineering, 1952) and a M.S. degree (engineering, cum laude, 1959). For many years after his graduation he was employed at Union Carbide Plastics.

Out of his interest in parapsychology, as an engineer he worked on developing statistical techniques in order to control psi phenomena, and the development of systems for transmitting messages by psi processes. Utilizing an IBM 1620 digital computer, he developed a psi communication system based on binary targets and sequential sampling. He was a member of both the Parapsychological Association and the American Society for Psychical Research.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

T'ai Chi Ch'uan

A system of ancient Chinese physical movements, designed to build up subtle energy in the body, resulting in spiritual development. For centuries it was a secret taught only to males in certain families, but by the middle of the nineteenth century it was openly taught in Peking.

The roots of T'ai Chi Ch'uan are said to go back to the breathing exercises of Taoist monks in the 2nd century B.C.E. The purported founder of the actual Tai Chi Chuan system was a fifteenth century monk named Chang San-feng.

The yielding, supple philosophy behind T'ai Chi Ch'uan is summarized in the Tao Te Ching:

“A man is born gentle and weak, at his death hard and stiff. Green plants are tender and filled with sap, at their death they are withered and dry. Therefore the stiff and unbending is the disciple of death. The gentle and yielding is the disciple of life. Thus an army without flexibility never wins a battle. A tree that is unbending is easily broken. The hard and strong will fall. The soft and weak will overcome.”

In addition to the philosophy there are 37 basic exercises and postures that are repeated with variations, culminating in some 65 or 108 exercises fusing energetic with relaxed movement. During practice, it is important to be concerned with centering the body with meditation and relaxation. T'ai Chi Ch'uan is often linked with the study of the I Ching to enhance the philosophical aspects of the system.

Although T'ai Chi Ch'uan has been facetiously referred to as “shadow boxing,” it often resembles a slow-motion ballet, and has been described as “yoga in movement.” Like the asanas of hatha yoga, T'ai Chi Ch'uan takes the names of its forms from animals or events occurring in nature: “White Crane Spreads Its Wings,” “Meteor Runs After Moon,” or “Brush Dust Against the Wind.” Both hatha yoga and T'ai Chi exercises encompass focused concentration and special breathing patterns. But while the graceful, flowing movements of T'ai Chi seem to superficially contrast with the asanas, developing forms of yoga movement bring the two regimens closer together.

T'ai Chi has become popular in the United States, as Americans realize the great health benefits of the practice. Most often the elderly do these exercises to regain strength and balance, greatly decreasing their chances of injuries from falls. The slow movements of T'ai Chi make it easy for everyone to practice and still gain health benefits.

Sources:

Cheng, Man-ching. Tai-Chi. Berkeley, Calif.: North Atlantic, 1981.

Crompton, Paul. The T'ai Chi Workbook. Boston: Shambala Publishing, Inc., 1987.

Da Liu. T'ai Chi Ch'uan and I Ching. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

———. T'ai Chi Ch'uan and Meditation. New York: Schocken Books, 1986.

Feng, Gia-Fu and Jane English. Lao Tzu: Tao Te Ching. New York: Vintage Books, 1972.

Perfetti, Ron. T'ai Chi Chuan Overview. <http://www.maui.net/~taichi4u/overview.html>. April 14, 2000.

Smith, Robert W. Chinese Boxing. New York: Kodansha, 1981.

T'ai Chi Magazine. <http://www.tai-chi.com/>. April 17, 2000.

“Tao & Tai Chi.” <http://www.chebucto.ns.ca/Philosophy/Taichi/tao-chi.html>. April 4, 2000.

“The Heaven and Earth Academy of T'ai Chi.” <http://www.taichinews.com/>. April 6, 2000.

Taigheirm

A magical sacrifice of cats to the infernal spirits, formerly practiced in the Highlands and islands of Scotland. It is believed to have been originally a ceremony of sacrifice from the more northern lands to the subterranean gods, which became in Christian times an invocation of infernal spirits. The word taigheirm signifies either an armory, or the cry of a cat, according to the sense in which it is used.

An early description of the ceremony, which must be performed with black cats, is given in George C. Horst's Deuteroscopie (1830):

“After the cats were dedicated to all the devils, and put into a magico-sympathetic condition by the shameful things done to them, and the agony occasioned them, one of them was at once put upon the spit, and, amid terrific howlings, roasted before a slow fire. The moment that the howls of one tortured cat ceased in death, another was put upon the spit, for a minute of interval must not take place if they would control hell; and this continued for the four entire days and nights. If the exorcist could hold it out still longer, and even till his physical powers were absolutely exhausted, he must do so.”

When the horrible rites had been continued for a time, the demons began to appear in the shape of black cats, who mingled their dismal cries with those of the unfortunate sacrifices. At length a cat appeared of larger size and more frightful aspect than the others, and the time had come for the exorcist to make known his demands. Usually he asked for the gift of second sight, but other rewards might be asked for and received.

The last Taigheirm was said to have been held in Mull about the middle of the seventeenth century. The exorcists were Allan Maclean and his assistant Lachlain Maclean, both of whom received the psychic gift of second sight.

Of this particular ceremony Horst stated:

“The infernal spirits appeared, some in the early progress of the sacrifices in the shape of black cats. The first who appeared during the sacrifice, after they had cast a furious glance at the sacrifices, said—Lachlain Oer, that is, ‘Injurer of Cats.’ Allan, the chief operator, warned Lachlain, whatever he might see or hear, not to waver, but to keep the spit incessantly turning. At length the cat of monstrous size appeared; and after it had set up a horrible howl, said to Lachlain Oer, that if he did not cease before their largest brother came he would never see the face of God.

“Lachlain answered that he would not cease till he had finished his work if all the devils in hell came. At the end of the fourth day, there sat on the end of the beam in the roof of the barn a black cat with fire—flaming eyes, and there was heard a terrific howl quite across the straits of Mull into Mowen.”

By this time, the elder of the two men was quite exhausted and sank down in a swoon, but the younger was sufficiently self-possessed to ask for wealth and prosperity, which both received throughout their lifetime.

Shortly before this, Cameron of Lochiel received at a taigheirm a small silver shoe which, put on the foot of a newborn son of his family, would give courage and fortitude to the child. One boy, however, had at his birth a foot too large for the shoe, a defect inherited from his mother, who was not a Cameron. His lack of the magically bestowed courage was apparent at the battle of Sheriffmuir, where he fled before the enemy.

Takata, Hawayo (1900–1980)

Hawayo Takata, the teacher who brought Reiki healing to the West, was born on December 23, 1900, to a Japanese family in Hawaii. At the age of 16, she married Saichi Takata. She gave birth to two daughters and she settled into the quiet life as a housewife in the growing Hawaiian Japanese-American community. Following her husband's death in 1930, she sought employment at a nearby plantation. She worked her way up to become the owner's housekeeper and then bookkeeper within a few years.

However, during the early 1930s Takata's health deteriorated. When in 1935 her sister died and it became her duty to travel to Japan to take the news of the death to her parents personally, she used the occasion to seek out some Japanese doctors. She located a surgeon, but just before she was to submit to an operation, she decided against it. Instead, she asked for a referral to an alternative doctor who did not do surgery. As it happened, the sister of the surgeon was a Reiki healer. The doctor referred Takata to Chujiro Hayashi (1878–1941), a former naval officer who had opened a clinic based on Reiki. After four months she was healed.

Takata asked Hayashi to train her as a healer. At first he refused, as she was considered an American. However, her persistence was rewarded, and in the spring of 1936, he included her and several others in a class for basic Reiki training. The following spring she was able to take Reiki Master training, from which she emerged as the 13th and last Reiki Master he initiated.

Shortly after becoming a Master, Takata returned home and opened a small clinic similar to Hayashi's in Kapaa, Hawaii. Hayashi visited at the beginning of 1938, and while in Hawaii named Takata as his successor. A few months later, she took the opportunity to come to the mainland as the translator for a group of Buddhist ministers making a tour of the West Coast. She stayed behind to attend the National College of Drugless Physicians, a naturopathic school in Chicago, Illinois.

Hayashi died in 1941. Meanwhile, in Hawaii, Takata operated quietly through the World War II (1939–45) and postwar years, during which time the Hawaiian Japanese received much of the anger for the bombing of Pearl Harbor.

Takata continued as a Reiki healer in Hawaii for several decades. It was only with her aging without a successor that Takata decided to start teaching others as Reiki healers. More importantly, she opened those teachings to those outside of the Japanese American community. In the fall of 1973 she traveled to Puget Sound to offer a first class on Reiki for mainland students. This class launched her brief public career and introduced the public to the Reiki system. Two years later she took the additional step and for the first time trained a new Reiki Master.

The decision to train Masters became one of her more controversial actions. She concluded that the Master status was a thing of value and that the best way to communicate its worth to Westerners was to charge for it. She asked a fee of $10,000.00 U.S. During the remaining five years of her life, she initiated 22 Masters.

In 1979, the year before she died, she named two of the Masters as Grand Masters, her daughter Phyllis Furumoto and Barbara Ray a healer from Atlanta, Georgia. Takata died on December 11, 1980.

Sources:

Haberly, Helen L. Reiki: Hawayo Takata's Story. Olney, Md.: Archedigm Publications, 1997.

Stein, Diane. Essential Reiki: A Complete Guide to an Ancient Healing Art. Freedom, Calif.: Crossing Press, 1995.

“Tales of Terror”

Title of an anonymous collection of Gothic style ballads, usually ascribed wrongly to Matthew Gregory Lewis. There are actually two books with this title. The first, published in 1799, included three of Lewis's ballads, together with others by Sir Walter Scott and Robert Southey, but does not appear to be compiled by Lewis. The three ballads later appeared in his book Tales of Wonder (1801).

A second Tales of Terror (1801) is a coarse and grotesque collection that contains parodies of the work of Lewis and others, and does not therefore seem to be compiled by Lewis either. (See also English occult fiction.)

Talisman

An inanimate object which is supposed to possess a supernatural capacity of conferring benefits or powers, in contradistinction to the amulet, the purpose of which is to ward off evil. Talismans were common in ancient Egypt and Babylon, and have been popular in magical communities to the present. Originally, talismans were usually a disc of metal or stone engraved with astrological or magical figures. In recent centuries, among practitioners of ceremonial magic, talismans inscribed in parchment have been favored.

Traditionally, three varieties of talisman have been recognized: 1. The astronomical, having the characters of the heavenly signs or constellations; 2. the magical, with extraordinary figures, occult words, or the names of angels; and 3. the mixed, engraved with celestial signs and barbarous words. To this list Thomas D. Fosbrook, in his Encyclopedia of Antiquities (1825), added two others: 4. The sigilla planetarum, composed of Hebrew numeral letters, used by astrologers and fortune-tellers and 5. one with Hebrew names and characters.

As an example of the most powerful of the latter may be the sacred name of Jehovah. The famous tephillin or phylacteries, used in Jewish devotion, which were bound on the head, the arm, and the hand, may be regarded as talismans. They were the subject of many traditional ceremonies. There is also the mezazoth or schedules for doorposts; another article of this description mentioned in the following quotation from the Talmud: “Whoever had the tephillin bound to his head and arm, and the tsitsith thrown over his garments, and the mezuzah fixed on his door-post, is protected from sin.”

On astrological talismans the figure of Mercury, engraved upon silver, which is the corresponding metal, and according to the prescribed rites, gave success in merchandise; that of Mars gave victory to the soldier; that of Venus, beauty, and so of the rest. All such talismans were seen as more powerful during the hour of their planet's ascendancy.

Writing of talismans in his book The Occult Sciences (1891), A. E. Waite stated:

“1. The Talisman of the Sun must be composed of a pure and fine gold, fashioned into a circular plate, and well polished on either side. A serpentine circle, enclosed by a pentagram must be engraved on the obverse side with a diamond-pointed graving tool. The reverse must bear a human head in the centre of the six-pointed star of Solomon, which shall itself be surrounded with the name of the solar intelligence Pi-Rhé, written in the characters of the Magi. This talisman is supposed to insure to its bearer the goodwill of influential persons. It is a preservative against death by heart disease, syncope, aneurism, and epidemic complaints. It must be composed on a Sunday during the passage of the moon through the first ten degrees of Leo, and when that luminary is in a favourable aspect with Saturn and the Sun. The consecration consists in the exposure of the talisman to the smoke of a perfume composed of cinnamon, incense, saffron, and red sandal, burnt with laurel-wood, and twigs of desiccated heliotrope, in a new chafing-dish, which must be ground into powder and buried in an isolated spot, after the operation is finished. The talisman must be afterwards encased in a satchel of bright yellow silk, which must be fastened on the breast by an interlaced ribbon of the same material, tied in the form of a cross. In all cases the ceremony should be preceded by the conjuration of the Four, to which the reader has already been referred. The form of consecration, accompanied by sprinkling with holy water, may be rendered in the following manner:—

“In the name of Elohim, and by the spirit of the living waters, be thou unto me as a sign of light and a seal of will.

“Presenting it to the smoke of the perfumes:—By the brazen serpent before which fell the serpents of fire, be thou unto me as a sign of light and a seal of will.

“Breathing seven times upon the talisman:—By the firmament and the spirit of the voice, be thou unto me as a sign of light and a seal of will.

“Lastly, when placing some grains of purified earth or salt upon the pentacle:—In the name of the salt of the earth and by virtue of the life eternal, be thou unto me as a sign of light and a seal of will.

“2. The Talisman of the Moon should be composed of a circular and well-polished plate of the purest silver, being of the dimensions of an ordinary medal. The image of a crescent, enclosed in a pentagram, should be graven on the obverse side. On the reverse side, a chalice must be encircled by the duadic seal of Solomon, encompassed by the letters of the lunar genius Pi-Job. This talisman is considered a protection to travellers, and to sojourners in strange lands. It preserves from death by drowning, by epilepsy, by dropsy, by apoplexy, and madness. The danger of a violent end which is predicted by Saturnian aspects in horoscopes of nativity, may be removed by its means. It should be composed on a Monday, when the moon is passing through the first ten degrees of Capricornus or Virgo, and is also well aspected with Saturn. Its consecration consists in exposure to a perfume composed of white sandal, camphor, aloes, amber, and pulverized seed of cucumber, burnt with desiccated stalks of mugwort, moonwort, and ranunculus, in a new earthen chafing-dish, which must be reduced, after the operation, into powder, and buried in a deserted spot. The talisman must be sewn up in a satchel of white silk, and fixed on the breast by a ribbon of the same colour, interlaced and tied in the form of a cross.

“3. The Talisman of Mars must be composed of a well-polished circular plate of the finest iron, and of the dimensions of an ordinary medal. The symbol of a sword in the centre of a pentagram must be engraved on the obverse side. A lion's head surrounded by a six-pointed star must appear on the reverse face, with the letters of the name Erotosi, the planetary genius of Mars, above the outer angles. This talisman passes as a preservative against all combinations of enemies. It averts the chance of death in brawls and battles, in epidemics and fevers, and by corroding ulcers. It also neutralizes the peril of a violent end as a punishment for crime when it is foretold in the horoscope of the nativity.

“This talisman must be composed on a Tuesday, during the passage of the moon through the ten first degrees of Aries or Sagittarius, and when, moreover, it is favourably aspected with Saturn and Mars. The consecration consists in its exposure to the smoke of a perfume composed of dried absinth and rue, burnt in an earthen vessel which has never been previously used, and which must be broken into powder, and buried in a secluded place, when the operation is completed. Finally, the talisman must be sewn up in a satchel of red silk, and fastened on the breast with ribbons of the same material folded and knotted in the form of a cross.

“4. The Talisman of Mercury must be formed of a circular plate of fixed quicksilver, or according to another account of an amalgam of silver, mercury, and pewter, of the dimensions of an ordinary medal, well-polished on both sides. A winged caduceus, having two serpents twining about it, must be engraved in the centre of a pentagram on the obverse side. The other must bear a dog's head within the star of Solomon, the latter being surrounded with the name of the planetary genius, Pi-Hermes, written in the alphabet of the Magi. This talisman must be composed on a Wednesday, when the moon is passing through the ten first degrees of Gemini or Scorpio, and is well aspected with Saturn and Mercury. The consecration consists in its exposure to the smoke of a perfume composed of benzo-in, macis, and storax, burnt with the dried stalks of the lily, the narcissus, fumitory, and marjolane, placed in a clay chafing-dish which has never been devoted to any other purpose, and which must, after the completion of the task, be reduced to powder and buried in an undisturbed place. The Talisman of Mercury is judged to be a defence in all species of commerce and business industry. Buried under the ground in a house of commerce, it will draw customers and prosperity. It preserves all who wear it from epilepsy and madness. It averts death by murder and poison; it is a safeguard against the schemes of treason; and it procures prophetic dreams when it is worn on the head during sleep. It is fastened on the breast by a ribbon of purple silk folded and tied in the form of a cross, and the talisman is itself enclosed in a satchel of the same material.

“5. The Talisman of Jupiter must be formed of a circular plate of the purest English pewter, having the dimensions of an ordinary medal, and being highly polished on either side. The image of a four-pointed crown in the centre of a pentagram must be engraved on the obverse side. On the other must be the head of an eagle in the centre of the six-pointed star of Solomon, which must be surrounded by the name of the planetary genius Pi-Zéous, written in the arcane alphabet.

“This talisman must be composed on a Thursday, during the passage of the moon through the first ten degrees of Libra, and when it is also in a favourable aspect with Saturn and Jupiter. The consecration consists in its exposure to the smoke of a perfume composed of incense, ambergris, balm, grain of Paradise, saffron, and macis, which is the second coat of the nutmeg. These must be burnt with wood of the oak, poplar, fig tree, and pomegranate, and placed in a new earthen dish, which must be ground into powder, and buried in a quiet spot, at the end of the ceremony. The talisman must be wrapped in a satchel of sky-blue silk, suspended on the breast by a ribbon of the same material, folded and fastened in the form of a cross.

“The Talisman of Jupiter is held to attract to the wearer the benevolence and sympathy of everyone. It averts anxieties, favours honourable enterprises, and augments well-being in proportion to social condition. It is a protection against unforeseen accidents, and the perils of a violent death when it is threatened by Saturn in the horoscope of nativity. It also preserves from death by affections of the liver, by inflammation of the lungs, and by that cruel affection of the spinal marrow, which is termed tabes dorsalis in medicine.

“6. The Talisman of Venus must be formed of a circular plate of purified and well-polished copper. It must be of the ordinary dimensions of a medal, perfectly polished on both its sides. It must bear on the obverse face the letter G inscribed in the alphabet of the Magi, and enclosed in a pentagram. A dove must be engraved on the reverse, in the centre of the six-pointed star, which must be surrounded by the letters which compose the name of the planetary Genius Suroth. This talisman must be composed on a Friday, during the passage of the moon through the first ten degrees of Taurus or Virgo, and when that luminary is well aspected with Saturn and Venus. Its consecration consists in its exposure to the smoke of a perfume composed of violets and roses, burnt with olive wood in a new earthen chafing-dish, which must be ground into powder at the end of the operation and buried in a solitary spot. The talisman must, finally, be sewn up in a satchel of green or rose-coloured silk, which must be fastened on the breast by a band of the same material, folded and tied in the form of a cross.

“The Talisman of Venus is accredited with extraordinary power in cementing the bonds of love and harmony between husbands and wives. It averts from those who wear it the spite and machinations of hatred. It preserves women from the terrible and fatal diseases which are known as cancer. It averts from both men and women all danger of death, to which they may be accidentally or purposely exposed. It counterbalances the unfortunate presages which may appear in the horoscope of the nativity. Its last and most singular quality is its power to change the animosity of an enemy into a love and devotion which will be proof against every temptation, and it rests on the sole condition that such a person should be persuaded to partake of a liquid in which the talisman has been dipped.

“7. The Talisman of Saturn must be composed of a circular plate of refined and purified lead, being of the dimensions of an ordinary medal, elaborately polished. On the obverse side must be engraved with the diamond-pointed tool which is requisite in all these talismanic operations, the image of a sickle enclosed in a pentagram. The reverse side must bear a bull's head, enclosed in the star of Solomon, and surrounded by the mysterious letters which compose, in the alphabet of the Magi, the name of the planetary Genius Tempha. The person who is intended to wear this talisman must engrave it himself, without witnesses, and without taking any one into his confidence.

“This talisman must be composed on a Saturday when the moon is passing through the first ten degrees of Taurus or Capricorn, and is favourably aspected with Saturn. It must be consecrated by exposure to the smoke of a perfume composed of alum, assa-foetida, cammonée, and sulphur, which must be burnt with cypress, the wood of the ash tree, and sprays of black hellebore, in a new earthen chafing-dish, which must be reduced into powder at the end of the performance, and buried in a deserted place. The talisman must, finally, be sewn up in a satchel of black silk and fastened on the breast with a ribbon of the same material, folded and tied in the form of a cross. The Talisman of Saturn was affirmed to be a safeguard against death by apoplexy and cancer, decay in the bones, consumption, dropsy, paralysis, and decline; it was also a preservative against the possibility of being entombed in a trance, against the danger of violent death by secret crime, poison, or ambush. If the head of the army in war-time were to bury the Talisman of Saturn in a place which it was feared might fall into the hands of the enemy, the limit assigned by the presence of the talisman could not be overstepped by the opposing host, which would speedily withdraw in discouragement, or in the face of a determined assault.”

Sources:

Beard, Charles R. Lucks and Talismans: A Chapter of Popular Superstition. London: Sampson, Low, 1934. Reprint, New York: Blom, 1972.

Budge, E. A. W. Amulets and Superstitions. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1930. Reprinted as Amulets and Talismans. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Fosbrook, Thomas D. Encyclopedia of Antiquities. 2 vols. N.p., 1825, 1840.

Lamb, Geoffrey. Discovering Magic Charms and Talismans. UK: Shire Publications, 1974.

Lippman, Deborah, and Paul Colin. Amulets, Charms and Talismans: What They Mean and How to Use Them. New York: M. Evans, 1974.

Lockhart, J. G. Curses, Lucks and Talismans. London: Geoffrey Bles, 1938. Reprint, Detroit: Singing Tree Press, 1971.

Pavitt, W. T., and Kate Pavitt. The Book of Talismans, Amulets, and Zodiacal Gems. London: Rider, 1914. Reprint, Detroit: Tower Books, 1971. Reprint, North Hollywood, Calif.: Wilshire Publishing, 1972.

Regardie, Israel. How to Make and Use Talismans. London: Aquarian Press; New York: Samuel Weiser, 1972.

Sepharial [W. G. Old]. The Book of Charms and Talismans. London: W. Foulsham, 1923. Reprint, New York: Arco, 1971.

Waite, A. E. The Occult Science. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co., 1891.

Talking Mongoose

A celebrated paranormal phenomenon from Cashen's Gap on the Isle of Man, United Kingdom. It was investigated by psychical researchers Harry Price and R. S. Lambert in the 1930s. Named "Gef," the mongoose manifested to the Irving family, and there is some doubt whether it was a real creature or a poltergeist phenomenon.

Sources:

Price, Harry, and R. S. Lambert. The Haunting of Cashen's Gap. London, 1936.

Tallmadge, Nathaniel Pitcher (1795–1864)

United States senator from 1833–34, governor of Wisconsin from 1844–46, and one of the early converts to Spiritualism. His experiences with the Fox sisters, recounted in a letter to a friend under the date April 12, 1853, were published in most of the newspapers of the time. He stated that he had received messages in direct writing from the spirit of John Calhoun and also witnessed very strong physical manifestations, notably the levitation of a table with himself on top of it. He also reported experiences in his own household. His thirteen-year-old daughter, who never touched the piano, began to play classical works and popular airs in trance.

In April 1854, a memorial was presented in Congress by James Shields, asking for an inquiry into the truth of Spiritualism. Tallmadge's name topped the list of the 13,000 signatures that were attached. Tallmadge contributed an introduction to The Healing of the Nations by automatic writing medium Charles Linton, published in 1855 by The Society for the Diffusion of Spiritual Knowledge. He died November 2, 1864.

Sources:

Brown, Slater. The Heyday of Spiritualism. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1970.

Jackson, Herbert G., Jr. The Spirit Rappers. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1972.

Pond, Mariam Buckner. Time Is Kind; The Story of the Unfortunate Fox Family. New York: Centennial Press, 1947. Reprinted as The Unwilling Martyrs. London: Psychic Book Club, 1947.

The Talmud

From the Hebrew lamad, to learn, the Talmud is the name of the great code of Jewish civil and canonical law. It is divided into two portions—the Mishna and the Gemara; the former constitutes the text and the latter is a commentary and supplement. But besides being the basis of a legal code, it is also a collection of Jewish poetry and legend.

The Mishna is a development of the laws contained in the Pentateuch. It is divided into six sedarim or orders, each containing a number of tractates, which are again divided into peraqim or chapters. The sedarim are:

- (1) Zeraim, which deals with agriculture;
- (2) Moed, with festivals and sacrifices;
- (3) Nashim, with the law regarding women;
- (4) Nezaqin, with civil law;
- (5) Qodashim, with the sacrificial law; and
- (6) Tohoroth or Tah, with purifications.

The Mishna is said to have been handed down by Ezra and to be in part the work of Joshua, David, or Solomon, and originally communicated orally by the Deity in the time of Moses.

There are two recensions—the Talmud of Jerusalem and the Talmud of Babylon. The latter, besides the sedarim already mentioned, contains seven additional treatises that are regarded as extra-canonical. The first is supposed to have been finally edited toward the close of the fourth century, and the second by Rabbi Ashi, president of the Academy of Syro in Babylon, sometime in the fourth century. Although revised from time to time before then, both versions have been greatly affected through the interpolation of traditions, and reinterpretations in the light of rabbinical discussions. The rabbinical decisions in the Mishna are entitled helacoth and the traditional narratives haggadah.

The cosmogony of the Talmud assumes that the universe has been developed by means of a series of cataclysms—world after world was destroyed until the Creator made the present earth. E. Deutsch, commenting on the Talmuc in the Quarterly Review, (1867) noted:

"The how of the creation was not mere matter of speculation. The co-operation of angels, whose existence was warranted by Scripture, and a whole hierarchy of whom had been built up under Persian influences, was distinctly denied. In a discussion about the day of their creation, it is agreed on all hands that there were no angels at first, lest men might say, 'Michael spanned out the firmament on the south, and Gabriel to the north.' There is a distinct foreshadowing of the Gnostic Demiurges—that antique link between the Divine Spirit and the world of matter—to be found in the Talmud. What with Plato were the Ideas, with Philo the Logos, with the Kabbalists the 'World of Aziluth,' what the Gnostics called more emphatically the wisdom (sophi), or power (dunamis), and Plotinus the nous, that the Talmudical authors call Metation.

"There is a good deal, in the post-captivity Talmud, about the Angels, borrowed from the Persian. The Archangels or Angelic princes are seven in number, and their Hebrew names and functions correspond almost exactly to those of their Persian prototypes. There are also hosts of ministering angels, the Persian Yazatas, whose functions, besides that of being messengers, were two-fold—to praise God and to be guardians of man. In their first capacity they are daily created by God's breath out of a stream of fire that rolls its waves under the supernal throne. In their second, two of them accompany every man, and for every new good deed man acquires a new guardian angel, who always watches over his steps. When a righteous man dies, three hosts of angels descend from the celestial battlements to meet him. One says (in the words of Scripture), 'He shall go in peace;' the second takes up the strain and says, 'Who has walked in righteousness;' and the third concludes, 'Let him come in peace and rest upon his bed.' In like manner, when the wicked man passes away, three hosts of wicked angels are ready to escort him, but their address is not couched in any spirit of consolation or encouragement.”

The Talmud is the supreme repository of Jewish moral and spiritual law; it also enshrines a wealth of historical, geographical, philosophical, and poetical traditions. It is one of the great documents of human history and the central focus of Jewish law.

It has been considered by some authorities that a great many of the traditional tales in the Talmud have a magical basis, and that magical secrets are contained in them, but this depends entirely upon the interpretation put upon them, and the subject is one which necessitates close study. An English translation of the Jerusalem Talmud was published in 1871, and of the Babylonian Talmud (35 vols.), 1935–52.

Tamlin, Sarah (ca. 1848)

One of the very early American rapping mediums, soon after the famous Rochester rappings of the Fox sisters. E. W. Capron visited Tamlin and attended one of her séances at which raps were heard. A table moved in various directions and “was held down to the floor so that it required the whole strength of a man to move it from its position.” At that time, the phenomenon of raps spread like a contagion. Harriet Bebee, a girl of sixteen, visited Tamlin and on returning to her own home twenty miles away, the raps broke out again in her presence. And, according to Capron’s account, about fifty mediums were soon operating in private circles.

Sources:

Capron, E. W. Modern Spiritualism: Its Facts and Fanaticisms. N.p., 1855.

Tanagras, Angelos (1875–ca. 1970)

An admiral in the Greek Navy who took an active interest in parapsychology. He was born on May 20, 1875, in Athens, Greece. Through his life he authored a number of books on Greek history and legends.

As a young man he became a corresponding member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, as well as various European psychical research societies. He founded and served as the first president (1923 on) of the Hellenic Society for Psychical Research; he edited and contributed to the society’s journal, Psychic Research. Tanagras organized the Fourth International Congress of Psychic Research in Athens during 1930, when he worked closely with Hans Driesch and Sir Oliver Lodge.

Tanagras took part in experiments in long distance telepathy, collaborating with Rene Warcollier in France and Gardner Murphy in the United States, as well as experimenters in Italian and British psychic research societies. He studied psychometry in Greece, and contributed various articles on parapsychological subjects to different psychical research journals and one book.

Sources:

Tanagras, Angelos. Destiny and Chance. N.p., 1934.

Tannhäuser

A medieval German legend about how a minstrel and knight of that name, who passed by the Hørselberg (Hill of Venus) and entered therein in answer to a call. He remained there with an enchantress and lived an unholy life. After a time he grew weary of sin, and longing to return to normal living, forswore the worship of Venus and left her.

He then made a pilgrimage to Rome to ask pardon of the Pope, but when he was told by Urban IV himself that the papal staff would as soon blossom as such a sinner as Tannhäuser be forgiven, he returned to Venus. Three days later, the Pope’s staff did actually blossom, and the Pope sent messengers into every country to find the despairing minstrel, but to no purpose. Tannhäuser had disappeared.

The story has a mythological basis that has been overlaid by medieval Christian thought, and the original hero of which has been displaced by a more modern personage, just as the Venus of the existing legend is the mythological Venus only in name. She is really a German earth-goddess, Lady Holda.

Tannhäuser was a minnesinger (love-minstrel of the middle of the thirteenth century). He was very popular among the minnesingers of that time. The restless and intemperate life he led probably marked him out as the hero of such a legend as has been recounted.

He was the author of many ballads of considerable excellence, which were published in the second part of the Minnesinger of Friedrich H. von der Hagen (Leipzig, 1838) and in the sixth volume of Moriz Haupt’s Zeitschrift für deutsches Althertum (1841). The most authentic version of this legend is given in J. L. Uhland’s Alle hoch und niederdeutsche Volkslieder (Stuttgart, 1844–45).

Tantra

A science or sadhana (spiritual practice) based on a vast collection of religious and occult Hindu scriptures that emphasize the shakti (energy of the deity), usually called kundalini, which comes from the goddess. The scriptures are generally in the form of a dialogue between the god Shiva and his wife Parvati. In treatises where Shiva answers the questions, they are called agama; where Parvati answers it is a nigama.

The tantra scriptures represent a cumulation of knowledge dating to ancient times. The majority of texts are written in Sanskrit, but are also found in Pali, Prakrit, Tibetan, Hindi, and Bengali. They are considered encyclopedias of esoteric wisdom, covering topics such as creation and destruction of the universe, worship of the gods, spiritual disciplines, rituals, occult powers, and meditations. The tantras also discuss the subtle anatomy of the body including the chakras (spiritual centers) and the connection paths between them through which the kundalini energy travels. The tantras are also supposed to be specially relevant to Kali Yuga (the present age of devolution).

As vast and varied as the scriptures appear, however, they all have one characteristic in common: “an integrative approach to sadhana, with the objective of making the best use of all available resources within and without.” Tantra can be considered the holistic approach to spiritual practice.

In opposition to traditional Judeo-Christian and aesthetic Eastern practices, Tantra does not seek to sublimate the flesh to the spirit, the physical to the metaphysical. Instead, tantra seeks to reintegrate all aspects of life, to “dissolve boundaries we’ve created, the separateness, the disconnectedness and become more connected with all of life.”

Since the tantra’s purpose is to integrate all aspects of life, it is a practice where numerous varieties of sciences can blend: hatha yoga, pranayama, medras, rituals, kundalini yoga, nada yoga, mantra, yantra, mandala, visualization of deities, alchemy, Aryurveda, and astrology can all comfortably fit within the realm of tantra. But because so many intricate sciences and techniques can be employed, it is usually advised that the tantra is studied under a competent master, who can lead the student through the complex weave of ideas and procedures.

In the West, tantra is often identified with sexuality and sexual practices. Tantric ideas are often used to help individuals and couples transform love making into a more satisfying experience, on the physical, emotional, and spiritual realm. By integrating the male and female aspect of the individual and the couple, tantra is used to raise the sexual union to a reflection of the mystical union between the shiva and shakti aspects of the divine.

A popular knowledge of tantric anatomy came to the West through Theosophy. Western scholar Sir John Woodroffe (1865–1936) wrote several pioneering books on tantra and translated tantric scriptures under a pseudonym, Arthur Avalon. The various systems of tantric yoga based on the tantras have spread in the West through the twentieth century.

Sources:

- Avalon, Arthur. The Serpent Power. London: Luzac & Co., 1919.
- . Shakti and Shakta. 3d ed. Madras, India: Ganesh, 1929.
- . Tantra of the Great Liberation (Mahānirvāna Tantra). London: Luzac, 1913. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1972.
- Chakravarti, Chintaharan. Tantras: Studies on Their Religion and Literature. Calcutta, India: Punthi Pustak, 1963.
- Feuerstein, Georg. The Shambala Guide to Yoga. Boston & London: Shambala, 1996.
- Greenwell, Bonnie, Ph.D. Energies of Transformation. Valencia, Calif.: Shakti River Press, 1990.
- Mookerjee, Ajit. Tantra Art. New York: Random House, 1971.
- Mookerjee, Ajit, and M. Khanna. The Tantric Way: Art, Science, Ritual. New York: Graphic, 1977.
- Rawson, Philip. Tantra: The Indian Cult of Ecstasy. London: Thames & Hudson, 1974.
- Tigunait, Pandit Rajmani. "The Living Science of Tantra," Yoga International (May 1998): 22-29.
- Williams, Stephen. "Tantra: An Introductory Dialogue with Raymond Powers C.T.T." Gentleman's Quarterly, August 1997, <http://home.earthlink.net/~raypows/INTERVIEW.HTM>.

Tantric Yoga

A system of Hindu yoga which emphasizes the shakti (sexual energy) associated with the female principle and usually characterized as kundalini.

There are essentially two concentrations of tantric yoga, which can be called the pragmatic and the aesthetic.

The pragmatic level focuses primarily on the sexual act and promotes a sacred style of sexuality which promotes communication, breath, and energy. In concert with the Tantra philosophy, this concentration seeks to enhance the sexual experience through integration of the male and female (shiva/shakti) aspects of each individual, and of the couple together. Hatha yoga (postures), raja yoga (meditation), pranayama (breathing techniques), and other techniques such as coitus reservatus (ejaculation control) and amrita (female ejaculation) are employed to enrich the sexual act. Participants are taught to expand their focus from the second (sexual or svadhithana) chakra to all seven chakras throughout the body. This cultivates sensitivity and kundalini throughout the body, vastly enriching the sexual experience.

The second concentration focuses on raising the kundalini energy to encompass several areas of life, including the sexual. It follows the philosophy of tantra (meaning to weave, to expand, to spread) by integrating all aspects of life. In this concentration there is no separation of the physical from the metaphysical, the female to the male, of the animate to the inanimate, of the spiritual to the corporeal. The corporeal is not seen as a barrier to spiritual growth, as in many Judeo-Christian traditions, but instead as another source of divine energy. "Whatever is in the body is also in the universe."

In addition to these concentrations of tantric yoga there exists a specifically left-hand or occult pathway of tantric yoga, known as tantrism, that involves a taboo-breaking ceremony with a female assistant. This form of tantrism tends to oppose ascetic forms of yoga that align spiritual development with the denial of the things of the world. Instead of avoiding those things normally eschewed by a sanyassin (a person living the renounced life), the tantric uses those things and converts them into a tool of tantric development. The generally avoided items, called the five "M's" consist of: Madya (wine), Mansa (flesh), Matsya (fish), Mudra (a term implying both parched grain and mystic gesture), and Maithuna (sexual intercourse). From Hinduism, tantric beliefs and practices passed into Buddhism and became a notable part of Tibetan Buddhism.

Knowledge of tantric yoga began to appear in the West in the early twentieth century within the writings of Sir John Woodroffe (who wrote under the pseudonym Arthur Avalon). However, it was not until the 1970s, with the volume of Omar Garrison, that details of the rituals of the left-hand path were written down and published in the West. Subsequently, a number of texts have appeared. A measurable number of modern tantric teachers first became familiar with tantric yoga through Bhagwan Rajneesh (later known as Osho).

Through the twentieth century, a form of sexual occultism usually associated with magician Aleister Crowley arose out of Western ceremonial magic. Because of the common use of sexual intercourse as a means of spiritual attainment in both tantra and Western sex magic, many have assumed that the two are related. As knowledge of the rituals and teaching of each system was made public through the 1980s, however, scholars are now aware that the two practices are quite different in operation and purpose and have very different historical roots.

Although there is acknowledgment between the differences between Western sex magic and tantric yoga, there must exist an understanding that the philosophy of Tantra is missing in most Western tantric yoga. Most often tantric yoga is used as a sort of sexual or marital therapy, which is ultimately missing the goal of enlightenment. News of sexual enhancement advantages has even lured such celebrities as Sting to explore the benefits of tantric yoga.

Besides Western exploitation of tantra there is also controversy surrounding teachers who allegedly take sexual advantage of students. Swami Rama of the Himalayas, for example, faced several allegations of sexual misconduct with his students, prior to his death in 1997. There have been numerous other accounts of sexual improprieties between tantric yoga teachers and their students. These stories act as a reminder of the delicate and often vulnerable relationship that can exist between the spiritual master and the student.

Sources:

- Feuerstein, Georg. The Shambala Guide to Yoga. Boston & London: Shambala, 1996.
- Garrison, Omar. Tantra—The Yoga of Sex. Causeway, 1973. Reprint, London: Academy Editions, 1974.
- Grenager, Suzanne Selby, "One Woman's Case for Gurus," Yoga Journal (August 1996): 20-23.
- Greenwall, Bonnie, Energies of Transformation, Valencia, Calif.: Shakti River press, 1990.
- Marques-Riviere, J. Tantrik Yoga. London: Rider & Co., 1940.
- Mookerjee, Ajit, and M. Khanna. The Tantric Way: Art, Science, Ritual. New York: Graphic, 1977.
- Mumford, John. [Swami Anandakapila]. Sexual Occultism. St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1975.
- O'Neill, Timothy, "A Fire in the Shadows," Gnosis, (Fall 1990): 26-31.
- Rajneesh, Bhagwan Shree. Tantra, Spirituality & Sex. San Francisco, Calif.: Rainbow Bridge, 1977.
- Selby, John. Kundalini Awakening. New York: Bantam Books, 1992.
- Tantra: The Science of Ecstasy. <http://www.tantra.com>. March 10, 2000.
- Vatasayana. "The Love Teachings of Kama Sutra," The Church of Tantra. <http://www.tantra.org/>. March 10, 2000.
- Williams, Stephen. Tantra: An Introductory Dialogue with Raymond Powers, C.T.T. <http://www.home.earthlink.net/~raypows/INTERVIEW.HTM>. March 10, 2000.

Yoga Journal Online. <http://yogajournal.com/>. April 14, 2000.

Tao

Term used in ancient Chinese religious philosophy, signifying “the Way” or pathway of life. The Tao is understood as a unity underlying the opposites and diversity of the phenomenal world. Ching Shen Li (cosmic energy) is manifest in the duality of yin and yang (negative and positive), female and male principles in nature. Yin and yang are also energies in the individual human body and the balancing of these energies is one of the tasks of life. The correct harmony between yin and yang may be achieved through diet, meditation, and a life of truth, simplicity, and tranquillity, identifying with the Tao of nature.

Taoism teaches union with the law of the universe through wisdom and detached action. Special techniques of Taoist yoga normalize and enhance the flow of vital energy in the human body. This yoga is variously named K'ai Men (open door), Ho Ping (unity), and Ho Hsieh (harmony). K'ai Men implies opening the path to the channels of mind, spirit, and body so that they reflect the balance of yin and yang and a harmony with the energy of the cosmos.

Taoist yoga is very similar to the kundalini yoga systems of India, and it is not clear whether such a parallel system originated by direct influence of traveling mystics or by spontaneous rediscovery of basic truths. Both Indian and Chinese yogas are concerned with the control of vital energy, seen as the force behind sexual activity, but which may be diverted into different channels in the body for blissful expansion of consciousness. For centuries the techniques of Chinese yoga were little known in the West; teaching manuals were closely guarded and not translated into Western languages. Teachings were usually transmitted orally from teacher to pupil.

During the twentieth century, and especially since the Chinese Revolution, teachers of Taoism and Chinese yoga have established schools in the United States and published translations of basic Chinese yoga texts. Modern teachers of Chinese yoga include Charles Luk (Lu K'uan Yü) of Hong Kong, who has translated various Chinese Buddhist and yoga texts, and Mantak Chia from Thailand, who studied with Taoist and Buddhist masters and has created a synthesis of their spiritual techniques, in conjunction with classical techniques of T'ai Chi Ch'uan. Together with his wife Maneewan Chia, Mantak Chia has been instrumental in establishing Healing Tao Centers in the United States and Europe that offer a basic self-development course of what is termed Taoist Esoteric Yoga.

In distinction to the philosophical esoteric concept of the Tao, but growing out of it, Taoism as a religious system complete with temples and popular worship, became one of the three major religious systems of China, together with Confucianism and Buddhism.

Sources:

Chang, Chung-Yuan. Tao; A New Way of Thinking. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Chia, Mantak. Awaken Healing Energy through the Tao. New York: Aurora Press, 1983.

Chia, Mantak, and Michael Winn. Taoist Secrets of Love: Cultivating Male Sexual Energy. New York: Aurora Press, 1984.

Ch'u Ta-Kao, trans. Tao Te Ching. London: Allen & Unwin; New York: Samuel Weiser, 1937.

Lu K'uan Yü. Taoist Yoga: Alchemy and Immortality. London: Rider & Co., 1970.

Soo, Chee. The Chinese Art of K'ai Men. London: Gordon & Cremonesi, 1977.

Suzuki, D. T., and Paul Carus, trans. The Canon of Reason and Virtue. La Salle, Ill.: Open Court, 1913.

Taoism

One of the three major religious systems of ancient China, together with Confucianism and Buddhism. Early Taoism derives from the Tao (“the road” or “the way”) teachings of Lao Tzu. The origins and background of Lao Tzu is uncertain; in fact, most details of his life are legendary. Some sources claim Lao Tzu was said born of poor parents in Tau (Honan) under the Emperor Ting of the Kau dynasty (ca. 605 B.C.E.). Others believe he was a philosopher who became disgusted with the world and became a pessimist, later resigning his position in the Record Department and retiring to a monastery. He also allegedly met and was taught by Gautama Buddha, and held discussions with Confucius. The name, Lao Tzu (meaning “Old Master”), may not be an actual persons name but a pseudonym for the philosophers and teachers who developed Taoism as it is known today.

Lao Tzu's book Tao-te-Ching was regarded as a sacred work in North and Central China, but was burned with other writings in 220 B.C.E. It reappeared under the Han dynasty and was reinforced by the teachings of Chuang Tzu, another Taoist classic. It is believed to have been the work of a philosopher of the same name. Lao Tzu was the first to formalize Taoism while Chuang-Tzu developed a more philosophical system, metaphysics, and epistemology. Chuang Tzu's teachings of the Tao is considered to be transcendental, while Lao-Tzu's is considered to be a natural form.

Taoism was originally an esoteric philosophy, concerned with the unity underlying the opposites and diversity of the phenomenal world. Taoism taught union with the law of the universe through wisdom and detached action. The union of cosmic and individual energies is reminiscent of the Vedanta teachings of India.

As central to the Taoist tradition as the concepts of yin and yang are the ideas of Tao and Te (“the power”). Like yin, Tao is often identified with the passive (or wu wei); because the way is often given preeminence over the power. It is said a real seeker of wisdom knows the power (Te) but seeks the way (Tao). One should not strive for wealth or prestige and that aggression is to be avoided.

As part of the Taoists' practice, followers have incorporated lifestyle rituals, such as vegetarianism, herbal and tactile medicinal approaches, good moral conduct, and the use of appropriate incantations, amulets, and charms. T'ai Chi Ch'uan, with its fusion of energetic and relaxed exercise, has provided a means of increasing and enhancing ch'i (or Qi), the vital force of life. The overall goal of Taoists' life is to attain harmony with the Tao. This means one must desire nothing, live simply, and act by not acting. It is a practice where solitude and individualism is cherished and where the “upper classes” of social standing are rejected.

Taoism has also developed its own yoga techniques, which parallel the ancient Hindu system of kundalini yoga. These involved control of ch'i, the force believed to stand behind sexual activity, but which could also be diverted into different channels in the body for blissful expansion of consciousness. The circulation of this generative force in the body, aided by breathing techniques, corresponds with Indian yoga techniques involving pranayama breathing, and the ascent of kundalini energy through the chakras or vital centers of the body. This individual alchemy was variously known as k'ai men (open door), ho ping (unity), or ho hsieh (harmony).

The extraordinary parallels between ancient Indian and Chinese Taoism in its various forms and Hinduism (Vedanta and yoga) do not appear to have been documented by historians. The yoga teachings of China descended from teacher to pupil; it is only in recent times that basic texts have been translated into English. There are now teachers of Chinese yoga in Western countries and centers for instruction. There are also many translations with commentaries of the earlier Tao teachings in the Tao-te-Ching.

Sources:

Bishop, Peter and Darton, Michael. The Encyclopedia of World Faiths: An Illustrated Survey of the World's Living Religions. London: MacDonald and Co., Inc., 1987.

Bynner, Witter, trans. The Way of Life According to Lao Tzu. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1944.

Chang, Chung-Yuan. Tao: A New Way of Thinking. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

Feng, Gia-Fu and English, Jane. Lao Tzu: Tao Te Ching. New York: Vintage Books, 1972.

Hendricks, Robert G. Lao-Tzu: Te-Tao Ching. New York: The Modern Library, 1993.

Hughes, E. R., ed. and trans. Chinese Philosophy in Classical Times. London: J. M. Dent; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1942.

Lu Kuan Yü. Taoist Yoga: Alchemy and Immortality. London: Rider & Co., 1970.

Soo, Chee. The Chinese Art of K'ai Men. London: Gordon & Cremonesi, 1977.

Taoism Information Page. <http://www.clas.ufl.cdu/users/gthursby/taoism/>. April 4, 2000.

Watson, Burton, trans. Chuang Tzu, Basic Writings. New York: Columbia University Press, 1964.

Weaverville Joss House Temple. <http://cal-parks-ca.gov/DISTRICTS/nobuttles/wjhsp/wjhshp127.htm>. March 31, 2000.

Targ, Russell (1934–)

Physicist with parapsychological interests. He was born on April 11, 1934, in Chicago, Illinois. He studied at Queens College, New York (B.S., physics, 1954) and completed his graduate study in physics at Columbia University. He worked through the 1960s as a senior physicist (plasma and microwaves) at Technical Research Group, Syosset, Long Island, New York.

In 1972 he entered Stanford Research Institute as a senior research physicist, where he collaborated with Harold E. Puthoff on parapsychological research. Their work on remote viewing (a form of clairvoyance) became well known in 1977 when they published Mind Reach; in this publication they argued for the reality of psychical phenomena. Even earlier on, their work had become controversial because of their experiments with metal-bending attempted by psychic Uri Geller. He and Targ left SRI in 1982 to become partners in Delphi Associates, which attempted to use psychic phenomena for commercial purposes, including predictions of changes in silver prices. He has become president of Bay Research Institute and a staff scientist at Lockheed Research and Development.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Puthoff, Harold E., and Russell Targ. Mind-Reach: Scientists Look at Psychic Ability. New York: Delacorte Press, 1977.

Targ, Russell. The Mind Race: Understanding and Using Psychic Abilities. New York: Villard Books, 1984.

Targ, Russell, and Harold E. Puthoff. "ESP Experiments with Uri Geller." In Research in Parapsychology 1973. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

———. "Information Transmission under Conditions of Sensory Shielding." Nature (October 1974).

———. "PK Experiments with Uri Geller and Ingo Swann." In Research in Parapsychology 1973. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1974.

Targ, Russell, Harold E. Puthoff, and Charles T. Tart. Mind at Large. New York: Praeger, 1979.

Target

Term used by parapsychologists to indicate the object (mental or physical) to which a subject attempts to respond paranormally. A mental target would relate to extrasensory perception, a physical target to psychokinesis.

Tarnas, Richard Theodore (1950–)

Richard Theodore Tarnas, a psychologist and intellectual historian best known for his work with the Esalen Institute, was born on February 21, 1950, in Geneva, Switzerland. His parents were Americans and he grew up in Michigan. His father, a professor of law, encouraged his intellectual pursuits and he completed his high school work at the University of Detroit Preparatory School, operated by the Jesuits. He entered Harvard in 1968 and graduated with an A.B. (cum laude) in 1972. He then entered the doctoral program at Saybrook Institute, the graduate school of psychology in San Francisco, California, and completed his Ph.D. in 1976.

Tarnas was able to travel for several years before settling at Esalen, where he was able to interact with some of the leading minds of the human potentials movement including Stanislav Grof, James Hillman, and Rupert Sheldrake. In 1979 he became Esalen's director of programs and education. While at Esalen he became known for his work on psychedelic therapy. In 1982 he married Heather Malcolm, a Canadian, and the following year left Esalen to enter private practice and to write. The major product of this period was The Passion of the Western Mind (1991), a narrative history of the Western worldview from the ancient Greek to the postmodern.

More recently Tarnas has joined the faculty of the California Institute for Integral Studies in San Francisco, where he became the founding director of the Philosophy, Cosmology, and Consciousness program. The program is indicative of his broad eclectic interests which include the evolution of consciousness, depth psychology, psychedelic research, astrology, and gnosticism. He has, for example, contributed essays furthering the psychological interpretation of astrology and arguing for the importance of astrology in understanding the evolution of the Western mind.

Sources:

Tarnas, Richard T. The Passion of the Western Mind. New York: Harmony Books/Random House, 1991.

———. "The Western Mind at the Threshold." The Astrotherapy Newsletter 3, no.4 (November 1990).

Tarot (or Tarots)

French term for a special pack of playing cards popularly used for the purpose of divination. These cards enjoyed a boost in popularity as a self-discovery tool of the New Age and a development tool among Wiccans and ritual magicians. The derivation of the word tarot is still debated. Some suggest that these cards were named because of the tarotes on the back, that is, the plain or dotted lines crossing diagonally. Some confirmation of this theory is indicated by the German form of the word, a tarock-karte being a card checkered on the back.

Tarot cards form part of an ordinary pack in countries of southern Europe and the name tarocchi is given to an Italian game. In its familiar form, the tarot pack consists of a pack of 78 cards, comprising four suits of 14 cards each (the extra court card in each suit being the Cavalier, Knight, or Horseman) and 22 symbolical picture-cards as atouts or trumps. The four suits, related to the modern hearts, clubs, diamonds, and spades, are swords, cups, coins, and batons (earlier represented as swords, cups, rings, and wands).

The 22 symbolic cards generally picture the Juggler or Magician, High Priestess or Female Pope, Empress, Emperor, Hierophant or Pope, Lovers, Chariot, Justice, Hermit, Wheel of Fortune, Strength or Fortitude, Hanged Man, Death, Temperance, Devil, Lightning-struck Tower, Star, Moon, Sun, Last Judgment, Fool, and Universe. These symbolic designs, which vary slightly from pack to pack according to different traditions, are popularly interpreted as follows: Willpower, Science or Knowledge, Action, Realization, Mercy and Beneficence, Trial, Triumph, Justice, Prudence, Fortune, Strength, Sacrifice, Transformation, Combination, Fate, Disruption, Hope, Deception or Error, Earthly Happiness, Renewal, Folly, and Expiation. These interpretations also vary according to different authorities. In addition, the other cards in the pack are considered to have symbolic significance.

There are many different ways of consulting the cards for divination, but they mostly involve laying out the cards after shuffling and interpreting the indications of the major symbolic cards in their relationship to each other.

Origins

Much speculation surrounds the whole question of the origins of the tarot and its relationship to the present-day set of 52 playing cards. It is not difficult to see symbolic interpretations of the 52 pack in its division into four suits, corresponding to the seasons of the year, 52 weeks, and the symbolic rulers of the court cards. Some writers have connected the pack with the ancient Eastern origins of the game of chess, with its comparable king, queen, and knight. However, within the occult community, many have looked to an origin in ancient Egypt. According to such popular lore, the priests of ancient Egypt invented the tarot cards to represent their secret doctrines and teachings. They escaped the destruction of the Christian era because the book burners did not know what they were. Later, some Egyptians brought them to Rome, and they survived in the courts of the popes and passed to France during the period when the papacy was headquartered in Avignon.

This story of the Egyptian lineage first appeared in the French occult community of the eighteenth century, having been invented by a Protestant minister, Antoine Court de Gébelin (1719–1784). De Gébelin, an occultist and Martinist, had become an early supporter of Franz A. Mesmer's ideas of animal magnetism and an amateur Egyptologist. In 1781, well before the Egyptian hieroglyphics had been deciphered, he published an eight-volume tome Le monde primitif (1781) with his speculative notions. Tarot cards had existed for several centuries in Europe with no speculation about any mysterious foreign or occult connection. But De Gébelin argued, with little evidence, that the word "tarot" actually meant royal road, a derivation he made from the Egyptian words "ta" or "way" and "tosh" or "royal." It should be noted that no such words have been found in the Egyptian language. Along with his essay on the deck, De Gébelin also published another essay by an anonymous friend, the first to label the cards the "Book of Thoth," Thoth being one name for the Egyptian god Horus.

As a result of widespread reading of Le monde primitif, the tarot cards began to be used as divination devices in Paris, though the spread of the practice was slow. It was significant that Francis Barrett did not include any mention of the deck in his 1801 catalog of magical practice, The Magus.

The next important step in the establishment of the occult tarot occurred in the mid-nineteenth century when Éliphas Lévi encountered a deck during his massive reworking of the magical tradition in light of Mesmerist thought. He identified their magical power with animal magnetism, a theory still popular to the present.

In 1853 Lévi published Dogma de la haute magie, in which he first laid out his ideas tying the tarot to the ancient Egyptian teacher Hermes Trismegistus, the legendary author of the Hermetic magical writings. He then tied the cards to the Hebrew magical/mystical Kabala (which he spelled "Qabalah"). He identified the numbered cards with the ten sephiroth. The court cards represented the stages of human life, and the suits symbolized the tetragrammaton, the four letters that made up the Hebrew name of God. The 22 trump cards were tied to the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and all of the Kabbalistic content earlier ascribed to each letter was plowed into the tarot cards.

Lévi used the Marseilles tarot deck, but grew increasingly dissatisfied with it. His early efforts to produce a new deck did not come to fruition, but Lévi did promote his project with an English Mason, Kenneth Mackenzie (1833–1886). Mackenzie, as a leader in the Societas Rosicruciana in Anglia, taught tarot to the group of men who were to found the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn (OGD), the organization most responsible for the modern magical revival.

S. L. MacGregor Mathers and his wife, Moina, collaborated on the OGD deck to go along with the order's rituals, most of which he also wrote. He produced one original, which was given to each member as they reached the grade of Adapte Minor, who in turn made their own personal copy. It is this deck that was described by Aleister Crowley in his journal, The Equinox. It was finally published in 1978.

Possibly the most important deck to date to come out of the OGD was that produced by Arthur Edward Waite in collaboration with Pamela Coleman-Smith. It was released in 1910 to accompany Waite's The Key to the Tarot (later reissued as The Pictorial Key to the Tarot) and went on to become the most popular deck for divinatory purposes in the twentieth century. Paul Foster Case (1884–1954), an OGD member who later founded the Builders of the Adytum, developed a deck, based in large part upon the Waite-Smith cards, in collaboration with Jessie Burns Parks. The deck was published in 1931.

Finally, in 1938, Aleister Crowley (1875–1947), who left the OGD and published many of its secrets, began a collaboration with Freda Harris to embody the thelemic magick of the Ordo Templi Orientis. They used both the OGD and Waite-Smith deck, but both the art and concepts went far beyond either. While the original art work was displayed at an art gallery during World War II, and a limited edition of 200 decks appeared in 1944, the Crowley-Harris tarot did not reach the public until it was finally published in 1969 by Samuel Weiser. This deck is the only one to challenge the Waite-Smith deck's popularity.

Gypsy Origins

One hypothesis, which paralleled the idea of Egyptian origins and has likewise been largely disproved, concerned the mysterious Gypsies. The idea that the tarot was introduced into Europe by the Gypsies of the Middle Ages was first suggested by an anonymous friend of de Gébelin's in the eighteenth century. It was championed in the next century by J. F. Vaillant, who had lived for many years among the Gypsies and who had been instructed by them in their traditional lore. He tied the word "tarot" to the Hungarian Gypsy tar (pack of cards), and claimed that ancient esoteric symbolism found its way throughout Europe through Gypsy migrations. Vaillant incorporated what he had been told in his books Les Rômes, histoire vraie des vrais Bohémiens (1857), La Bible des Bohémiens (1860), and La Clef Magique de la Fiction et du Fait (1863). Vaillant's theory was endorsed by the French writer "Papus" (penname of Gérald Encausse) in his book Le Tarot des Bohémiens: Le plus ancien livre du Monde, (1899) (English edition as The Tarot of the Bohemians, 1919) in which he claimed that the tarot was the absolute key to occult science. Papus notes, "the Gypsy pack of cards is a wonderful book according to Court de Gébelin and Vaillant. This pack, under the names of Tarot, Thora, and Rota, has formed the basis of the synthetic teaching of all the ancient nations successively.

The British legal authority De l'Hoste Ranking, writing in 1908, adds:

"I would submit that from internal evidence we may deduce that the tarots were introduced by a race speaking an Indian dialect; that the form of the Pope shows they had been long in a country where the orthodox Eastern Church predominated; and the form of head-dress of the king, together with the shape of the eagle on the shield, shows that this was governed by Russian Grand Dukes, who had not yet assumed the Imperial insignia. This seems to me confirmatory of the widespread belief that it is to the Gypsies we are indebted for our knowledge of playing-cards."

In 1865, E. S. Taylor added his support to the same hypothesis in his book The History of Playing Cards. However, W. H. Wilshire, in his book A Descriptive Catalogue of Playing and Other Cards in the British Museum (1876), questioned Taylor's conclusion, on the ground that "whether the Zingari [Gypsies] be of Egyptian or Indian origin, they did not appear in Europe before 1417, when cards had been known for some time." But this objection is nullified by the fact that the presence of Gypsies in Europe is now placed at a date considerably before 1417. There was, for example, a well-established feudum acinganorum, or Gypsy barony, in the island of Corfu in the fourteenth century. It is also believed that the Gypsies themselves were originally the ancient chandala caste of India.

Coincidental with the occult revival referred to as the New Age movement, the tarot has enjoyed an unprecedented period of popularity. New Agers have seen the tarot as an important additional tool for personal transformation and have interpreted the symbolism as a new map of the subconscious. The New Age approach has spurred the production of a variety of decks that explore different symbolic worlds, offer variant interpretations from the psychological to the Wiccan, and present a broad scope of artistic styles. Traditional tarot cards have gone high-tech, with digital decks for sale on the Internet for those who are curious and willing to spend a few dollars. Some of these digital decks have replaced the customary card suits and symbols (i.e. cups, wands, pentacles, swords, priestesses, magicians) with characters representing modern themes. For example, a "king" in a traditional tarot deck is replaced with a "businessman" in a contemporary deck. These modern versions may attract a broader audience to tarot, however, many will take the practice less seriously than with the more traditional decks.

Sources:

- Banzhaf, Hajo. The Tarot Handbook. Stamford, Conn.: U.S. Games Systems, Inc., 1993.
- Butler, Bill. Dictionary of the Tarot. New York: Schocken Books, 1975.
- Decker, Ronald. A Wicked Pack of Cards: The Origins of the Occult Tarot. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.
- Douglas, Alfred. The Tarot: The Origins, Meaning and Uses of the Cards. New York: Taplinger; London: Gollancz, 1972. Reprint, London: Penguin, 1974.
- Falconnier, R. Les lames hermétiques du tarot divinatoire. Paris, 1896.
- Gettings, Fred. The Book of Tarot. London: Paul Hamlyn, 1973.
- Huson, Paul. The Devil's Picture Book: The Compleat Guide to Tarot Cards; Their Origins and Their Usage. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1971. Reprint, London: Abacus, 1972.
- Hutton, Alice. The Cards Can't Lie: Prophetic, Educational and Playing-Cards. London: Jupiter Books, 1979.
- Lévi, Éliphas. La clef des grands mystères. Paris, 1861.
- MacGregor Mathers, S. L. The Tarot: Its Occult Signification, Use in Fortune-Telling and Method of Play. London: George Redway, 1888. Reprint, New York: Gordon Press, 1973.
- Ozanic, Naomi. The Illustrated Guide to Tarot. New York: Sterling Publications, 1999.
- Papus. The Tarot of the Bohemians: The Most Ancient Book in the World; The Use of Initiates. 2nd rev. ed. London: William Rider, 1919.
- Thierens, A. E. The General Book of the Tarot. London: Rider; Philadelphia: David McKay, 1928. Reprint, Hollywood, Calif.: Newcastle Publishing, 1975.
- Waite, A. E. Pictorial Key to the Tarot. London: William Rider, 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1959.

Reprint, Blauvelt, N.Y.: Rudolf Steiner, 1971. Reprint, New York: Causeway Books, 1973.

Tarot Network News

A journal serving the community of tarot card readers, Tarot Network News was founded in 1983 by Gary Ross. Ross had anticipated the new burst of enthusiasm for tarot cards largely because of the New Age movement and the neopagan Wicca movement. Throughout the twentieth century the tarot deck designed by Pamela Coleman Smith and Arthur Edward Waite and published by Rider & Co. in London (1910) has been the most popular deck. Some alternative decks were based on the Rider-Waite deck, but new designs were increasingly based on different psychologies and worldviews. Several decks adopted Egyptian motifs (including one by Oscar Ichazo, the founder of Arica), and others operated from such widely divergent realms as tantrism, the 1960s counterculture, and surrealism.

Whereas Wiccans adopted tarot decks as simply part of their magic worldview, New Agers began to see the tarot as an important tool for personal transformation. Both movements created an environment in which creation of new tarot decks was seen as an important personal exploratory activity, and readers were encouraged to find a deck that suited their individual personality and concept of truth.

Tarot Network News, 12 issues of which had appeared by 1994, reviews new decks as they appear, discusses the meaning of the cards of the major arcana, and celebrates the expansion of the world of tarot cards. The News also sponsors the Bay Area Tarot Symposium twice annually. Gary Ross continues as editor of the News, which is published by Jack and Rae Hurley. Address: c/o TAROCO, P.O. Box 104, Sausalito, CA 94966.

Sources:

Jensen, K. Frank. "A Decade with Tarot!" Tarot Network News 12 (spring 1994): 24–32.

Tart, Charles T(heodore) (1937–)

Psychophysicologist and parapsychologist. He was born on April 29, 1937, in Morrisville, Pennsylvania. He studied for two years at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) before moving to the University of North Carolina (B.A., 1960; M.A., 1962; Ph.D., 1963). During his student years he also was a research assistant at the Psychophysiology Laboratory, Department of Psychiatry, Duke University Hospital (1958–60). Following his graduation he became a lecturer at Stanford University (1964–65) and at the University of Virginia, School of Medicine (1965–66). This was prior to joining the faculty at the University of California, Davis in 1966. He is currently a professor of psychology at Davis, and the publisher of a quarterly The Open Mind.

Tart's interest in parapsychology manifested while a student in North Carolina when he became a frequent visitor at the Parapsychology Laboratory at nearby Duke University. He became a member of the American Society for Psychical Research and in the 1970s associated with Russell Targ and Harold E. Puthoff in their research at the Stanford Research Institute. He was elected president of the Parapsychology Association in 1977.

Tart's research has ranged across the field of parapsychological concerns and been the subject of numerous papers, but he is possibly most respected for his studies of states of consciousness and transpersonal psychology. This research resulted in two classic volumes Altered States of Consciousness (1969) and Transpersonal Psychologies (1975). Less known, Tart proposed an instrument for automatic testing of ESP, which was constructed at the University of Virginia and named the "ES-PATEACHER." It was set up in the Research Laboratory of the American Society for Psychical Research.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Tart, Charles T., ed. Altered States of Consciousness: A Book of Readings. New York: John Wiley & Sons, 1969.

———. The Application of Learning Theory to Extrasensory Perception. 1975.

———. Learning to Use Extrasensory Perception. 1976.

———. On Being Stoned: A Psychological Study of Marijuana Intoxication. Palo Alto, Calif.: Science & Behavior Books, 1971.

———. Psi, Scientific Studies of the Psychic Realm. N.p., 1977.

———. States of Consciousness. N.p., 1975.

———. Transpersonal Psychologies. New York: Harper & Row, 1975.

———. Waking Up: Overcoming the Obstacles to Human Potential. N.p., 1986.

Tart, Charles T., and Harold E. Puttoff. Mind at Large. New York: Praeger, 1979.

Tarhang Tulku

One of several Tibetan lamas known as a Tulku (incarnated being) who brought traditional Tibetan Buddhist teachings to the West in the wake of the Chinese takeover of the country. He came to the United States and settled in the San Francisco Bay area early in 1969, bringing with him his wife and a collection of rare Tibetan sacred texts.

With the help of a small group of students, he soon established the Tibetan Nyingmapa Meditation Center in Berkeley. Nyingmapa is one of four Tibetan Buddhism sects with an ancient tradition. It was founded in the eighth century C.E. by Guru Padmasambhava and Shantirakshita. The literature of Nyingmapa is classified as Kama (oral tradition from master to disciple) and Terma (secret books originally concealed by Padmasambhava, such as The Tibetan Book of the Dead.)

Known generally as Rinpoche (precious master), Tarhang Tulku teaches the advanced system of Buddhist doctrine known as Vajrayana. It embodies some teachings of tantra, but is essentially directed at enhancing degrees of understanding and awareness.

Tasseography

A formal term for the branch of fortune-telling of divination by tea leaves.

Tattvic Yoga

Term for the ancient Hindu science of breath, as expounded in one of the earliest texts presenting Hinduism to the West, The Science of Breath and the Philosophy of the Tattvas (1897) by Pandit Rama Prasad. The “breath” referred to is the life-giving breath of Brahman and in it are contained, according to Prasad, the five elementary principles of nature, corresponding to the five senses of man. These principles are known as tattvas, and from them the body and the physical world is composed.

The knowledge of the tattvas is believed to confer wonderful power and to this end all undertakings must be commenced at times that are known to be propitious for the movements of the tattvas or vital currents in the body.

Tavibo

Tavibo, a Native American of the Paiute people, emerged among them around 1869 as a prophet and visionary. He resided in Mason Valley, north of Virginia City, Nevada, in mountainous territory. It was common for the men to go to the mountains to seek vision and revelations from various spirit entities. Whites began to move into the area in the 1860s and the various chiefs and religious leaders among the Paiute were confronted, as had Native people before them, with the problem of losing their land to the new settlers.

Accounts of Tavibo vary, but all agree that he received a new revelation in a set of spiritual visions that offered hope to his contemporaries that the Earth would rise up and consume the whites and the land would be returned to its original state before their arrival. These visions most likely occurred in 1869 or 1870. In possibly the best account, left by a Captain J. M. Lee, an infantry officer on duty in the area in the 1870s, Tavibo had gone into the mountains and had an initial vision in which he was told that the Paiute's situation would be relieved by an earthquake. The Earth would open up and consume the white people. He enlarged upon this prediction in a second vision that suggested that all the humans in the area would be taken into the ground by the quake but that after a short while the Native people would be resurrected.

In a final third revelation, Tavibo said that only those who believed in the prophecy would be resurrected. Unbelievers would join the whites in eternal damnation. Each new revelation brought him some additional followers; however, before he was able to firmly establish his teachings, he died. His movement appeared to die with him and little was heard of it for some two decades. However, in the 1890s, his son Wokova emerged as a new prophet, teaching a variation of his father's message and what became popularly known as the Ghost Dance.

Sources:

Mooney, James. “The Ghost-Dance Religion and the Sioux Outbreak of 1890.” In The Fourteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of Ethnology. Compiled by J. W. Powell. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1896.

Taxil, Leo

Pseudonym of Gabriel Jogand-Pagès, a French journalist of the nineteenth century, who sustained a prolonged occult hoax alleging devil-worship amongst French Freemasons.

Taylor, Gordon Rattray (1911–1981)

A British author and broadcaster who served as a member of the Society for Psychical Research, London (1976–81). He was born in Eastbourne on January 11, 1911, and educated at Radley College, Trinity College, and Cambridge University. He worked as a journalist beginning in 1933 and in 1958 joined the British Broadcasting Company where he wrote and devised science television programs. In 1966 he became a full-time author. He had authored a number of books over his lifetime. Taylor died December, 7, 1981.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Taylor, John (Gerald) (1931–)

Professor of applied mathematics at King's College, London, England, who was the first British scientist to investigate the phenomena of Uri Geller. Taylor was born on August 18, 1931, in Hayes, Kent. He won his way into Christ's College, Cambridge at age 16; at 18 he enrolled at Mid-Essex Technical College, where he took his B.Sc. in general science. He completed a three-year mathematics degree course in two years at Cambridge and passed with first class honors. His academic career has included visiting professorships in the United States as well as being Professor of Theoretical Physics at the University of Southampton and a post at King's College, London.

When Uri Geller visited Britain in 1974, Taylor conducted scientific tests of Geller's feats of metal bending and interference with a Geiger counter. Taylor also experimented with some of the children and adults who manifested paranormal abilities after seeing Uri Geller's appearances on British television programs. Taylor's interest in such phenomena was not only in its scientific validation, but also in investigation of the way in which such phenomena take place and the nature of the forces involved. He suggested the phenomena may be some low-frequency electromagnetic effect generated by human beings.

Through the 1970s Taylor was regarded as fully endorsing the paranormal metal bending of Uri Geller, but gradually has made more guarded statements; then in 1980 he largely retracted his support for Geller's paranormal talents. In 1974 he noted, "The Geller effect—of metal-bending—is clearly not brought about by fraud. It is so exceptional it presents a crucial challenge to modern science and could even destroy the latter if no explanation became available." Taylor then spent three years of careful investigation of such phenomena as psychokinesis, metal bending, and dowsing, but could not discover any reasonable scientific explanation or validation that satisfied him. He was particularly concerned to establish whether there is an electromagnetic basis for such phenomena. After failing to find this he did not believe that there was any other explanation that would suffice. Most of his experiments under laboratory conditions were negative; this left him in a skeptical position regarding the validity of claimed phenomena.

In contrast to the endorsement in his first book on psi, Superminds, he published a paper expressing his doubts in a paper in Nature (November 2, 1978) titled "Can Electromagnetism Account for Extra-sensory Phenomena?" He followed this with his book Science and the Supernatural (1980) in which he expressed complete skepticism about every aspect of the paranormal. In his final chapter he stated: "We have searched for the supernatural and not found it. In the main, only poor experimentation [including his own], shoddy theory, and human gullibility have been encountered."

Taylor's new position seems to stem from his failure to find an electromagnetic explanation for paranormal phenomena. In his new book he stated: "We therefore have to accept that when science faces up to the supernatural, it is a case of 'electromagnetism or bust.'" In contrast, John Hasted, another British scientist who has tested Uri Geller, continues to support the reality of the Geller effect and also believes that there is evidence of an electromagnetic field in the phenomenon.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Taylor, John The Horizons of Knowledge. N.p., 1982.

———. Science and the Supernatural. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1980.

———. The Shape of Minds to Come. N.p., 1971.

———. Superminds. London: Macmillan, 1975.

Tea Leaves, Divination by

One of the most popular forms of fortune-telling, depending largely upon psychic intuition. After a cup of tea has been poured, without using a tea strainer, the tea is drunk or poured away. The cup should then be shaken well and any remaining liquid drained off in the saucer. The diviner now looks at the pattern of tea leaves in the cup and allows the imagination to play around the shapes suggested by them. They might look like a letter, a heart shape, or a ring. These shapes are then interpreted intuitively or by means of a fairly standard system of symbolism, such as: snake (enmity or falsehood), spade (good fortune through industry), mountain (journey or hindrance), or house (changes, success).

With the popularity of tea bags, divination by tea leaves has declined somewhat, but the bags can be opened and placed in a tea-pot and brewed in the old-fashioned way. The system can also be used for coffee grounds. This long established popular form of fortune-telling has been given the formal name of tasseography.

Sources:

Fontana, Marjorie A. Cup of Fortune: A Guide to Tea Leaf Reading. Wis.: Fantastic, 1979.

Sheridan, Jo. Teacup Fortune-telling. London: Mayflower, 1978.

Tears Painted on Shutters

It was mentioned in Thomas Pennant's book A Tour in Scotland (1769) that in some parts of Scotland it was the custom, on the death of any person of distinction, to paint on the doors and window-shutters white tadpole-like shapes on a black ground. These were intended to represent tears, and were a sign of general mourning.

Techter, David (1932–)

Museum worker who has written widely on parapsychology. Born October 5, 1932, at Morristown, New Jersey, he studied at Yale University (B.S. geology, 1954). He was an assistant in fossil vertebrates at the Chicago Natural History Museum from 1955 on. He was a member of the American Society for Psychical Research, an associate member of the Parapsychological Association, and an organizer and executive secretary of the Illinois Society for Psychic Research.

He has conducted tests for extrasensory ability with school-children and written many reviews of books on parapsychological subjects.

Sources:

Techter, David. A Bibliography and Index of Psychic Research and Related Topics for the Year 1962. Illinois Society for Psychic Research, 1963.

Teesing, H(ubert) P(aul) H(ans) (1907–1973)

Dutch professor of German literature and former president of the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (Dutch Society for Psychical Research). He was born on March 6, 1907, in Amsterdam, the Netherlands. He spent his college career at the University of Groningen (B.A., 1932; M.A., German philology and literature, 1935; Ph.D., 1948). After graduation he became a grammar school teacher of German (1935–52) before assuming a position as a professor of German literature and literary theory at the University of Utrecht in 1952. He died August 19, 1973.

Sources:

Teesing, H. P. H. "Mystiek en Literatuur" (Mysticism and Literature). Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie (1959).

Telekinesis

A term denoting the claimed faculty of moving material objects without contact, presumably by psychic force. The movement of objects, without contact or with only limited contact was frequently observed in the séance room. Phenomena included rappings, table-turning, levitations, the conveyance of apports, and other material phenomena. Spiritualists believed these were caused by the intervention of discarnate spirits. Magnetists believed in the existence of some kind of fluidic or energetic emanation as the cause of such movements. Others, discounting those phenomena that were the result of fraud, suggested some form of telekinetic theory, which held that all these varied feats are accomplished by the thoughts of mediums and sitters, independent of muscular energy, whether direct or indirect.

The term has more recently been supplanted by psychokinesis or PK.

Telepathy

Term coined by British psychical researcher F. W. H. Myers in 1882, as a result of his joint investigation with Edmund Gurney, Henry Sidgwick, and William F. Barrett into the possibilities of thought-transference. It was applied to the researchers' concept of "a coincidence between two persons' thoughts which requires a causal explanation," and it was defined as "transmission of thought independently of the recognized channels of sense."

Though the researchers never implied such a connotation, the public assumed that telepathy was an agency of communication between mind and mind, that it was a mysterious link between conscious and subconscious minds, and that it could be used to select intelligence by which incidents from the memories of persons present and familiar or distant and unknown.

The public concept of telepathy became a rival of the spirit hypothesis. This misconception spread so widely that many people considered telepathy to be distinct from thought transference, advancing the following argument:

"In telepathy the transmitter is often unaware that he acts as an agent and the receiver does not consciously prepare himself for the reception. Telepathy cannot be made a subject of experiments, while thought-transference can. Thought-transference is a rudimentary faculty. Telepathy is a well-developed mode of supernormal perception and is usually brought into play by the influence of very strong emotions."

The need for differentiation was acknowledged by the old school of telepathists, too, when they spoke of spontaneous telepathy as distinct from experimental telepathy. Frank Podmore—a hardened skeptic—in his The Newer Spiritualism (1910) suggests that: "Whilst the attempt to correlate the two kinds of phenomena is perhaps legitimate, we can hardly be justified in making the spontaneous phenomena the basis of a theory of telepathy."

Myers argued that telepathy as a faculty must certainly exist in the universe if the universe contains any disembodied intelligences at all. Prayer could be telepathic communion with higher beings, and the basis of sympathy and antipathy may be telepathy. Monitions of approach appear to be telepathic messages. The knowledge of victory or disaster in war that so inexplicably occurred among ancient Greeks may have been telepathically acquired.

Origins of Modern Telepathic Theories

The theory of thought transference is not a new one. Like the theory of gravitation, it is a daughter of astrology, but while gravitation is universally accepted by science, telepathy remains a questionable hypothesis for many. However, it is clear how both sprang from astrology, and one may trace the connection between them.

The wise men of ancient times taught that the stars radiated an invisible influence that held them together in their course and that affected men and events on our planet, receiving in turn some subtle emanation from the earth and its inhabitants. From this idea it was but a step to assume that a radiant influence, whether magnetic or otherwise, passed from one human being to another. The doctrine of astral influence was shared by Paracelsus and his alchemistic successors until the epoch of Sir Isaac Newton, whose discovery of the law of gravitation brought the age of simplistic astrology to a close.

The possible analogy between the mysterious force binding worlds together and the subtle influence joining mind with mind is obvious. The two are vastly different, however, in that while gravitation may be readily demonstrated and never fails to give definite results, experiments in telepathy cannot be depended upon to succeed uniformly even under the most favorable conditions. Nevertheless, the experiments that have been conducted from time to time have more than justified the public interest in telepathy.

In 1882 the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London, came into being, numbering among its members some of the most distinguished men of the era. Its goal was to elucidate the so-called supernatural phenomena that were exciting so much popular interest and curiosity. Foremost among these was the phenomenon of thought transference.

Viewing their subjects in a purely scientific light, trained in handling of evidence, and resolved to pursue truth with open and unbiased minds, members of the SPR did much to bring a purer and more dignified atmosphere to the study of psychic phenomena. They recognized the untrustworthiness of human nature in general, and the prevalence of fraud, even where nothing was to be gained but the gratification of a perverted vanity. Their experiments were conducted under the most rigid conditions, with every precaution taken against conscious or unconscious deception.

Among the most valuable evidence obtained from experimental thought transference was that gleaned by Professor Henry Sidgwick and his wife Eleanor Sidgwick from their experiments at Brighton in 1889 to 1891. In this series the percipients—clerks and shop assistants—were hypnotized. Sometimes they were asked to visualize, on a blank card, an image or picture chosen by the agent. At other times, the agent would choose one of a bundle of cards numbered from 10 to 90, and the percipient was required to state the number on the chosen card, which was done correctly in a surprising number of cases.

Curiously enough, the results varied in proportion as the agent and percipient were near or far apart, and were affected by the intervention of a door or even a curtain between the two. This was ascribed to a lack of confidence on the part of the percipient, however, or to such physical causes as fatigue or boredom, rather than to the limited scope of the telepathic principle. On the whole it seems probable that chance alone did not account for the number of correct replies given by the hypnotized subject.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century, criticism was leveled at these experiments by F. C. C. Hansen and A. Lehmann, of Copenhagen, who believed that the phenomenon known as "involuntary whispering," combined with hyperesthesia on the part of the percipient, would suffice to produce the results obtained by the Sidgwicks (see Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 9, p. 113).

This suggested explanation has some merit. If hypnotism causes such a refinement of the senses, may not some elements of hyperesthesia linger in the subconscious of the normal individual? If dreams contain such unusual examples of deduction, may not the mind in waking moments follow a process of reasoning imperceptible to the higher consciousness?

It seems that the "other self," which is never quite as much in the background as we imagine, sees and hears a thousand things of which we are unconscious and that come to the surface in dreams. There is no reason to suppose that it might not see and hear things too slight to be perceived in a grosser sphere of consciousness, and thus account for some cases of thought transference. On the other hand, there is evidence of telepathy acting at a distance where subconscious whispering and hyperesthesia are obviously out of the question.

Unusual Kinds of Telepathy

An example of audibly received telepathy is recorded in an early issue of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 1, p. 6): "On September 9, 1848, at the siege of Mooltan, Major-General R_____, C. B., then adjutant of his regiment, was severely wounded, and thought himself to be dying, and requested that his ring be taken off and sent to his wife. At the same time she was in Ferozepore (150 miles distant), lying on her bed between sleeping and waking, and distinctly saw her husband being carried off the field, and heard his voice saying "Take this ring off my finger and send it to my wife." The facts of the case were verified and all the names were obtained by the SPR.

The journalist and pioneer Spiritualist William T. Stead often received automatic writing from the living. Thinking of a lady with whom he was in such communication more than once, his hand wrote:

"I am very sorry to tell you that I have had a very painful experience of which I am almost ashamed to speak. I left Haslemere at 2:27 P.M. in a second-class carriage, in which there were two ladies and one gentleman. When the train stopped at Godalming, the ladies got out, and I was left alone with the man. After the train started he left his seat and came close to me. I was alarmed, and repelled him. He refused to go away and tried to kiss me. I was furious. We had a struggle. I seized his umbrella and struck him, but it broke, and I was beginning to fear that he would master me, when the train began to slow up before arriving at Guildford Station. He got frightened, let go of me, and before the train reached the platform he jumped out and ran away. I was very much upset. But I have the umbrella."

Stead sent his secretary to the lady with a note that he was very sorry to hear what had happened and added, "Be sure and bring the man's umbrella on Wednesday." She wrote in reply: "I am very sorry you know anything about it. I had made up my mind to tell nobody. I will bring the broken umbrella, but it was my umbrella, not his." The lady's decision not to tell of the painful evidence suggests that a telepathic message may not only be unconscious, but may directly counteract the desire of the conscious mind.

In many instances of cross-correspondence, where two or more people receive part of a message that only becomes clear when the parts are placed together, telepathy between the receivers would furnish an alternative to the spirit hypothesis.

The working of telepathy is apparently demonstrated in certain cases of suggestion. Hypnotization has been claimed to be effected at a distance. Myers called it telepathic hypnotism.

The Wave Theory

In his presidential address to the British Association for the Advancement of Science in September 1898, Sir William Crookes said:

"If telepathy takes place we have two physical facts—the physical change in the brain of A, the suggester, and the analogous change in the brain of B, the recipient of the suggestion. Between these two physical events there must exist a train of physical causes. . . . [and] with every fresh advance in knowledge it is shown that ether vibrations have powers and attributes abundantly equal to any demand—even to the transmission of thought."

He believed that these ether waves were of small amplitude and greater frequency than x-rays and continually passed between human brains, arousing an image in the second brain that is similar to the image in the first.

Damaging to this theory is the fact that the intensity of waves—any waves—diminishes with distance and that the telepathic image may not only be very vivid despite the remoteness of the agent, but that the picture is often modified or symbolical. A dying man may appear to the percipient in a normal state of health. As Myers noted: "Mr. L. dies of heart disease when in the act of lying down undressed in bed. At or about the same time Mr. N. J. S. sees Mr. L. standing beside him with a cheerful air, dressed for walking and with a cane in his hand. One does not see how a system of undulations could have transmuted the physical facts in this way."

In cases of collective reception, an added difficulty is presented. Why should only a few people in a room be sensitive to the waves and other strangers outside the room not at all receptive? Why should a crystal gazer get a telepathic message at the time of his own choosing, when he happens to look into the crystal? How can the pictures in the crystal sometimes be seen by others if they are only produced in his brain through telepathy?

In his book The Survival of Man (1909), Sir Oliver Lodge asserts that the experimental evidence was not sufficient to substantiate the nonphysical nature of thought transference. He had no doubt of its reality, and as early as 1903 he stated in an interview to the Pall Mall Magazine: "What we can take before the Royal Society, and what we can challenge the judgment of the world upon, is Telepathy."

Hereward Carrington suggested that telepathic manifestations may take place through a superconscious mind, that there may be a "mentiferous ether," as some writers have suggested, that carries telepathic waves, and that there is a species of spiritual gravitation uniting life throughout the universe, as physical gravity binds together all matter.

In the 1920s the Italian researcher Prof. F. Cazzamali of the University of Milan conducted experiments that appeared to show that the human brain emits short waves of high frequency under the stress of emotion. In an insulated all-metal room, he carried out a number of experiments inducing, by means of suggestion, an emotional crisis in his subjects. Delicate receivers placed in the room registered cerebral radiation in the form of waves, which were also recorded on photographic plates. The reports were published in the Revue Métapsychique, but were severely criticized. The wave theory of telepathy remains unproven, and psychical researchers have now largely discarded it, although a few modern Soviet investigators suggested an electromagnetic theory of telepathy.

Animals and Telepathy

There is some evidence indicating that telepathy is not restricted to humans. Among the better cases of telepathy from animal to man is one furnished by the novelist H. Rider Haggard in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (October 1904). Mrs. Haggard heard her husband groaning and emitting inarticulate sounds like the moaning of a wounded animal during the night of July 7, 1904. She woke him and her husband told her his dream. It consisted of two distinct parts:

In the first, the novelist only remembered having experienced a sense of grievous oppression, as though he were in danger of suffocation. Between the moment when he heard his wife's voice and that in which he regained full consciousness, the dream became much more vivid. He states: "I saw good old Bob [his dog] lying on his side among brushwood by water. My own personality seemed to me to be arising in some mysterious manner from the body of the dog, who lifted up his head at an unnatural angle against my face. Bob was trying to speak to me, and not being able to make himself understood by sounds, transmitted to my mind in an undefined fashion the knowledge that he was dying."

Bob was found dead four days later, floating in the river, his skull crushed in, and his legs broken. He had been struck by a train on a bridge and thrown into the water. His bloodstained collar was found on the bridge the morning after the dream.

William J. Long, in his book How Animals Talk (1922), produces many examples of a telepathic faculty in animals. He notes that if a mother wolf cannot head off a runaway cub because there is too much distance between them, she simply stops quiet, lifts her head high, and looks steadily at the running cub. He will suddenly waver, halt, whirl, and speed back to the pack. The famous case of the Elberfeld horses also suggests that telepathy may operate between animals and humans, and Edmund Selous, in his book Thought Transference—or What?—in Birds (1931), records many observations on the subject from bird life.

Telepathy vs. Survival

Obviously the role of telepathy is of some importance to any understanding of the paranormal, but those who tried to find in it an all-inclusive solution to paranormal manifestations faced great difficulties. If a telepathic message is followed by motor movements—for instance, the announcement of a death in automatic writing—the question is, Who executes the movements—the subconscious self or the agent who sends the message? Similar uncertainty applies if the reception of a telepathic message is accompanied by telekinetic movements.

Frank Podmore, the author of Apparitions and Thought Transference (1894)—which deals with the accumulated evidence for telepathy—became the great exponent of the theory that all apparitions could be explained as “telepathic hallucinations.” F. W. H. Myers, on the other hand, was among the first to argue that telepathy was an insufficient explanation for apparitions. Being forced to concede that collective perception of phantasmal appearances called for something objective, he worked out a theory of “psychical invasion”—the creation of a “phantasmogenetic” center in the percipients’ surroundings.

The theory was midway between telepathic and spirit explanations, and it accounted for many freakish phantasmal manifestations for which no satisfactory solution had yet been offered.

Early in the twentieth century, the problem of whether to admit telepathy could occur in both the living and the dead plagued researchers. Apparitions of the dying border between telepathy with the living and telepathy from the dead. A similar phenomenon that lacks all the conditions for evidence of telepathy is visions of the dead appearing to the dying.

The strain on the telepathic theory grew with instances that made the acquisition of certain knowledge by telepathic process wildly improbable but were easily understood on the basis of the survival theory. The question was not only how certain information could have been acquired, but also why it was associated with definite personalities or disclosed in a personified form.

In the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 35, 1926), S. G. Soal tells how, in a séance with Blanche Cooper, a voice came through, claiming to be his deceased brother. As proof of identity the voice told him that a year before in a playhut at home he had buried a lead disk which he would probably find if he dug there. Soal was satisfied that none of his brother’s surviving acquaintances knew of the incident, and dug and found the disk.

Nevertheless, he argued that this might have been a case of telepathic transmission in his brother’s earthly life, the knowledge having remained latent in his own subconscious mind. If yet another person had figured in the telepathic chain it would have been an example of the so-called three-way telepathy first advanced by Andrew Lang in his discussion of the case of the medium Leonora Piper (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 15, pp. 48–51).

Hugh J. Browne’s book The Holy Truth (1876) contains the story of his two sons, who drowned. One, in a communication through the medium George Spriggs, told the detailed story of their fatal pleasure cruise and added that his brother’s arm had been torn off by a great shark. This information could not have been telepathically conveyed by anyone living, except by the shark, yet it was found to be true. The shark was caught two days later, and a man testified to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle that he cut the shark open and found an arm, part of a waistcoat, and a watch, which were identified as belonging to the dead youth. The watch had stopped at the exact hour at which the brothers were engulfed by the sea.

There are many cases on record in which missing wills and other lost property were found through alleged spirit intervention. F. Bligh Bond’s in The Gate of Remembrance (1920) records an incident in which an entire chapel was found. The Glastonbury Abbey was in ruins; every trace of the Edgar Chapel was lost, and very little was known about its location and precise dimensions. Nevertheless, in automatic writing a series of communications came through, giving detailed information. When excavations were undertaken in 1908, a year after the communications were received, the chapel was found. (For a critical view of this case see G. W. Lambert’s “The Quest of Glastonbury” in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research, June 1966).

The personal element puts insurmountable obstacles in the way of telepathic explanation in the following case recorded by the psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano in notes on the July 14, 1928, sitting at Millesimo Castle, Italy. An unknown voice, in Genoese dialect, addressed sitter Gino Gibelli, saying, “I am Stefano’s father. You must tell my son that I insist on his giving the message to Maria with which I entrusted him. He has not carried out my request in the slightest degree.” Signor Gibelli explained that he had been in Genoa a month before. In a séance there the father had communicated with the son and charged him with a message to his mother. Very probably the young man had not dared to carry out this request. Gibelli stated that he had completely forgotten the incident, that it had nothing to do with him personally and did not interest him in the slightest degree. He was not thinking of Stefano’s father, whom he did not know in life, and was unaware that the request that the father had made to his son had not been carried out.

Some aspects of spirit communication strongly suggest that telepathy was not the means by which the medium gained knowledge. Telepathy makes no allowance for false or confused information, and it does not explain the communicator’s loss of the concept of time, nor the individual style of the different spirit controls (i.e., the biblical manner of “Imperator,” or “George Pelham’s” impatience as he spoke through Leonora Piper). In spirit communications, names are often spelled inaccurately, giving, for instance, “Margaret” instead of “Maggie.” Telepathy cannot reveal coming events, and it cannot explain how the spirits of children, if recently dead, ask for their toys and act childishly, yet behave years later as adults although no such memory of them is retained in any living mind.

If a medium operated by means of telepathy, he would have to be omniscient. There is no need for the supposition of omniscience if a telepathic message may originate as well from the dead as from the living. Once this admission is made one can well understand the futility of the “brain wave” theory. A incarnate spirit has no physical brain. The message must come from the spirit and not from the percipient. If it may come from the spirit as an agent, it may be received by the medium’s spirit and transmitted to his brain.

The insufficiency of the telepathic explanation has also been demonstrated by hundreds of strange cross correspondences and newspaper and book tests.

Many post-mortem letters have been preserved by the Society for Psychical Research and will not be opened until after a communication revealing their contents comes through a medium after the writer’s death. It is unlikely that this evidence will ever be conclusive, since in one instance the content of the letter was revealed, apparently through telepathy, by the medium while the writer was still living. The telepathist may always argue that the contents of the letter were subconsciously transferred into another brain while the writer was preparing it.

As proof of survival, cross correspondences are far more conclusive, since the partial messages coming through several mediums are by themselves nonsensical and can only be explained away by the supposition of a conspiracy between several subconscious minds.

The Arguments of James H. Hyslop

Telepathy became a rival of the spirit theory because, according to James H. Hyslop, early twentieth-century head of the American Society for Psychical Research, of the word transmission in the original definition of telepathy. He preferred to define telepathy as “a coincidence excluding normal perception, between the thoughts of two minds.” It was the word transmission, Hyslop said, that gave telepathy the implication that “it is a process exclusively between living people and not permitting the intervention of the dead, if the discarnate exist and can act on the living.”

Hyslop’s definition permits the employment of the term to describe the action of discarnate as well as incarnate minds. Hyslop further concluded, “We are not entitled to assume the larger meaning of telepathy to be a fact because we are not sure of its limitations. Here is where we have been negligent of the maxims of scientific methods and the legitimate formation of convictions.”

“Mediumistic phenomena,” he writes in his book Contact with the Other World (1919), “too often suggest the action of spirits, to be cited as direct evidence for telepathy. The possibility of spirits and the fact that an incident is appropriate to illustrate the personal identity of a deceased person forbids using it as positive evidence for telepathy. One can only insist that one theory is as good as the other to account for the facts.”

About selective telepathy, he argues:

“No evidence has been adduced. . . . and I do not see how it would be possible to adduce such evidence. Every extension of the term beyond coincidences between the mental states of two persons is wholly without warrant. The introduction of the assumption that this coincidence is due to a direct transmission from one living mind to another has never been justified, and as there is no known process whatever associated with the coincidences we are permitted to use the term only in a descriptive, not in an explanatory sense.

“There is no scientific evidence for any of the following conceptions of it: (1) Telepathy as a process of selecting from the contents of the subconscious of any person in the presence of the percipient; (2) Telepathy as a process of selecting from the contents of the mind of some distant person by the percipient and constructing these acquired facts into a complete simulation of a given personality; (3) Telepathy as a process of selecting memories from any living people to impersonate the dead; (4) Telepathy as implying the transmission of the thoughts of all living people to all others individually, with the selection of the necessary facts for impersonation from the present sitter; (5) Telepathy as involving a direct process between agent and percipient; (6) Telepathy as explanatory in any sense whatever, implying any known cause.

“The failures in experiments to read the present active states of the agent and the inability to verify any thoughts outside those states, in the opinion of science is so finite that its very existence is doubted, while the extended hypothesis requires us to believe in its infinity without evidence.

“As a name for facts, with suspended judgment regarding explanation, it is tolerable, but there can be no doubt that spirits explain certain facts, while telepathy explains nothing. At least as a hypothesis, therefore, the spiritistic theory has the priority and the burden of proof rests upon the telepathic theory.”

Dr. Richard Hodgson similarly concluded in his second report on the Piper phenomena: “Having tried the hypothesis of telepathy from the living for several years, and the spirit hypothesis also for several years, I have no hesitation in affirming with the most absolute assurance that the spirit hypothesis is justified by its fruits, and the other hypothesis is not.”

Telepathy—The Result of Spirit Agency?

Hyslop was not averse to the possibility that spirits might furnish the explanation of telepathy between the living. He stated that Myers saw this implication at the very outset of his investigations into telepathy. Hyslop said that only part of the story was told in the report on the experiments of Miss Miles and Miss Ramsden in long-distance telepathy (Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, vol. 21, pp. 60–93). Miles was an all-round psychic, and in her correspondence with Hyslop she disclosed that she could always tell when her telepathy was successful by the raps that she heard. She said she concentrated on the object Ramsden was to perceive until she heard raps. Raps are not telepathic phenomena, however, and carry an entirely different connotation.

Further, Hyslop stated that in communications through the medium Mrs. Willis M. Cleveland (also known as Mrs. Smead), the deceased Frank Podmore purported to say that telepathy was actually messages carried by spirits and that they could perform it instantly. Had Smead known Podmore, such a misstatement could not have occurred—Podmore always pressed the theory of telepathy between the living to the exclusion of spirits.

The purported spirit of F. W. H. Myers also made a strange allusion through the medium Minnie Meserve Soule (“Mrs. Chenoweth”), saying telepathy “all depended on the carrier.” When Hyslop asked for an explanation, the answer was: “Telepathy was always a message carried by the spirits.”

A more interesting and elaborate statement reportedly came from the spirit of Margaret Verrall:

“I said yesterday that I would write more about the telepathic theory as I now understand it. I am not sure of the passage of thought through space as I was once, and I had begun to question the method by which thought was transferred to brains before I came here, but you will recall that I had some striking instances of what seemed telepathy tapping a reservoir of thought direct, and the necessity for an intervening spirit was uncalled for; but there were other instances when the message was transposed or translated and the interposition of another mind was unquestionably true. I tried many experiments and I think you must know about them. I will say that I found more people involved in my work than I had known and there seemed more reason to believe that I was operated upon than that I operated, in other words, the automatic writing was less mine than I had supposed.”

The dividing line between clairvoyance and telepathy is vague. The telepathic message may take the form of visual or auditory sensation. If the content indicates future events, clairvoyance should be suspected. Past events may be both telepathic communications and the result of a reading by psychometry.

A constructive and evidential resumé of experiments in telepathy is given by Walter Franklin Prince in an appendix to the sixteenth Bulletin of the Boston Society for Psychical Research, published under the title “The Sinclair Experiments Demonstrating Telepathy” (1932).

Parapsychology and Telepathy

From the 1920s on, psychical researchers in both Great Britain and the United States investigated telepathy through intensive laboratory experiments. Card guessing was a favored testing tool, but it was not until the 1930s, after J. B. Rhine popularized the Zener Cards, a pack of five simple symbols (star, cross, circle, rectangle, and wavy lines), that statistical evaluation of experiments was simplified.

Using the Zener cards, experimenters attempted to obtain significant quantitative tests under laboratory conditions. In the experiments by C. W. Olliver with playing cards over some twenty thousand trials, a distinction was made between telepathy (between agent and percipient) and clairvoyance (perception without an agent).

In the modern period of parapsychological research, many aspects of telepathy have been investigated, including such questions as expectation, emotional incentives, and dream telepathy, in addition to the completion of many quantitative and qualitative experiments. So far researchers have not summarized their findings in a way that will definitely establish telepathy as a scientific fact, repeatable on demand. There is reasonable evidence that some telepathy has occurred under laboratory conditions, however.

Certain basic problems remain, such as the disparity in telepathic faculty between different percipients, and the problem of assessing spontaneous telepathy. In the former Soviet Union there was considerable interest in telepathy because of its possible practical applications, and experimenters gave special attention to methods of intensifying visualization on the part of the agent sending impressions to a percipient. In the United States researchers like Andrija Puharich have experimented with high-speed strobe lights on the closed eyes of subjects in order to heighten telepathic impressions.

Sources:

Braddon, Russell. The Piddingtons. London: Werner Laurie, 1950.

Carington, Whately. Telepathy: An Outline of Its Facts, Theory and Implications. London: Methuen, 1945. Reprint, New York: Gordon Press, 1972.

Ehrenwald, Jan. New Dimensions of Deep Analysis; A Study of Telepathy in Interpersonal Relationships. New York: Grune & Stratton, 1954. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living 2 vols. London: Trubner, 1886. Reprint, Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles, 1970. Abr. ed., New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Hardy, Aleister, R. Harvie, and Arthur Koestler. The Challenge of Chance: Experiments and Speculations. London: Hutchinson, 1973. Reprint, New York: Random House, 1974. Reprint, New York: Vintage Books, 1975.

Hyslop, James H. Contact With the Other World. New York: Century, 1919.

Lambert, G. W. "The Quest of Glastonbury." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 43, 728 (June 1966).

Lang, Andrew. The Making of Religion. London: Longmans, 1898.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975. Abr. ed., New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Ostrander, Sheila, and Lynn Schroeder. Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970. Reprint, New York: Bantam, 1971. Reprint as Psi: Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain. London: Abacus 1973.

Parish, Edmund. Hallucinations and Illusions: A Study of the Fallacies of Perception. London: Walter Scott Publishing, 1897.

Podmore, Frank. Apparitions and Thought Transference. London: Scott; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1895.

———. The Naturalisation of the Supernatural. New York: George Putnam's Sons, 1908.

———. Telepathic Hallucinations: The New View of Ghosts. London: Milner; New York: Stokes, 1909.

Puharich, Andrija. Beyond Telepathy. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1952. Reprint, Garden City, N.Y.: Anchor Press, 1973. Reprint, London: Souvenir Press, 1974. Reprint, London: Pan Books, 1975.

Rhine, J. B. Extrasensory Perception. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1934. Reprint, Boston: Branden, 1964.

Schmeidler, Gertrude R., ed. Extrasensory Perception. New York: Atherton, 1969.

Schwarz, Berthold Eric. Parent-Child Telepathy? Five Hundred and Five Possible Episodes in a Family: A Study of the Telepathy of Everyday Life. New York: Garrett Publications, 1971.

Sinclair, Upton. Mental Radio. The Author, 1930. Rev. ed., Springfield, Ill.: C. C. Thomas, 1962.

Targ, Russell, and Harold Puthoff. Mind-Reach: Scientists Look at Psychic Ability. New York: Delacorte, 1977.

Tenhaeff, W. H. C. Telepathy and Clairvoyance. Springfield, Ill.: C. C. Thomas, 1972.

Thomas, N. W. Thought Transference: A Critical & Historical Review of the Evidence for Telepathy. London: De La More Press, 1905.

Tischner, Rudolf. Telepathy and Clairvoyance. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1925.

Tyrrell, G. N. M. Science and Psychical Phenomena. New York: Harper, 1938. Reissued with Tyrrell's book Apparitions. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Ullman, Montague, and Stanley Krippner. Dream Studies and Telepathy: An Experimental Approach. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

Ullman, Montague, Stanley Krippner, and Alan Vaughan. Dream Telepathy. New York: Macmillan; London: Turnstone Books, 1973. Reprint, London: Penguin, 1974.

Vasiliev, L. L. Experiments in Mental Suggestion. London: Institute for the Study of Mental Images, 1963.

———. Studies in Mental Telepathy. CCM Information Corporation, 1971.

Warcollier, René. Experimental Telepathy. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1938. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. Mind to Mind. Creative Age Press, 1948. Reprint, New York: Macmillan, 1963.

Wilkins, Sir Hubert, and Harold M. Sherman. Thoughts through Space: A Remarkable Adventure in the Realm of the Mind. Hollywood, Calif.: House-Warren, 1951. Reprint, London: Frederick Muller, 1971. Reprint, Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett, 1973.

Telephone Calls (Paranormal)

The extraordinary claimed phenomenon of telephone calls from the dead, one of a variety of new forms of contact with the dead using modern technology, was raised by parapsychologists D. Scott Rogo and Raymond Bayless in their 1979 book Phone Calls From the Dead. Their research had been stimulated by a report in the September 1976 Fate Magazine from Don B. Owens of Toledo, Ohio, concerning his close friend Lee Epps. They had lived in the same neighborhood for years before Lee moved away and their contact became limited to occasional meetings or telephone calls.

On October 26, 1968 at 10:30 P.M., Don's wife Ethel answered a telephone call and immediately recognized the voice as that of Lee. He said: "Sis, tell Don I'm feeling real bad. Never felt this way before. Tell him to get in touch with me the minute he comes in. It's important, Sis." Ethel tried to ring him back but got no answer; neither did Don when he came in. That evening Don learned that Lee was in a coma in hospital, six blocks from their home and died at 10:30 P.M. It would have been impossible for Lee to have made the call himself in his condition, yet Ethel had immediately recognized his voice.

Although this case was purely anecdotal, without firm supporting evidence, Rogo and Bayless were sufficiently intrigued to follow up the phenomenon of "phone calls from the dead." After collecting a few cases, they wrote an article in the October 1977 issue of Fate Magazine titled "Phone Calls from the Dead?" More cases came to hand and led to a two-year investigation of the claimed phenomenon. It proved peculiarly difficult to establish in a manner acceptable to the present standards of psychical research, since the accounts dealt with spontaneous events, usually without the opportunity of rigid factual verification. Moreover, it was difficult to rule out coincidental hoaxes. Rogo and Bayless concluded, however, that such paranormal phone calls actually did occur and might even be more common than supposed.

A satisfactory theory to explain such cases presents difficulties. On the face of things, if one grants that mediumistic communication is possible through a trumpet at Spiritualist séances, or even by direct voice, the use of a telephone earpiece is hardly more far-fetched, but the prior ringing of the telephone announcing a call is another matter. Is there an actual PK manipulation of the telephone apparatus, or are the ringing tone and the voices actually in the subject's mind? Many individuals have experienced the hallucination of "phantom bells" when they think they hear a door bell or a telephone ringing but find no one there.

In some of the cases examined by Rogo and Bayless, it seemed that the call was placed in a normal way through an exchange that caused the phone to ring. In other cases the phone calls appeared to be placed through long-distance operators. Some subjects reported hearing the familiar “click” at the end of the call as the communicator apparently hung up. Rogo and Bayless suggested PK-mediated electromagnetic effects and discussed the possible relevance to the related phenomenon of Raudive voices or electronic voice phenomenon.

Sources:

Rogo, D. Scott, and Raymond Bayless. Phone Calls From the Dead. Englewood Cliff, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1979.

Teleplasm

An alternative term for ectoplasm.

Teleportation

The paranormal transportation of human bodies through closed doors and over a distance is a comparatively rare but still a thoroughly documented occurrence. It is a composite phenomenon fitting between levitation (frequently reported) and apports (objects which were frequently reported in séances in generations past but which were almost totally fraudulently produced). According to the testimony of the Bible, teleportation is by no means new in human experience. We find in Ezek. 11:1, “Moreover the spirit lifted me up, and brought me unto the East gate of the Lord’s house which looketh eastward.” Elijah, walking with Elisha, was carried away by a whirlwind. Habbakuk was carried from Judea to Babylon to bring food to Daniel in the lion’s den, then carried back to Judea through the air.

In the Acts of the Apostles 5:23, the warders of St. Peter’s prison testify: “The prison house we found shut in all safety, and the keepers standing before the doors; but when we opened we found no man within.” When St. Philip baptized the Ethiopian, the author of the Acts of the Apostles notes (8:39–40), “And when they were come up out of the water, the spirit of the Lord caught away Philip that the eunuch saw him no more. . . . But Philip was found at Azotus.” The distance between Gaza, the scene of the baptism, and Azotus was 30 miles.

Reports of this phenomenon reappeared very early in modern Spiritualism. J. B. Ferguson said from his observation of the Davenport brothers:

“From as good testimony as I have of any fact that I can accept without personal knowledge, I believe that these young men have been raised into the air to the ceilings of rooms, and have been transported a distance of miles by the same force and intelligence, or intelligent force, that has for 11 years worked in their presence so many marvels.”

In England, accounts of transportation were published in the Spiritualist press between 1871 and 1874 of Agnes Guppy-Volckman, Charles Williams, and Frank Herne (Spiritual Magazine, July 1871); of Lottie Fowler (The Spiritualist, March 15, 1872); and of F. W. Monck (Spiritual Magazine, 1875), the latter reportedly making an aerial journey from Bristol to Swindon.

Thomas Blyton writes in his reminiscences in Light (April 11, 1931):

“I was present on one occasion at a private home séance at Hackney in London, when without warning or preparation, in total darkness, Mr. Frank Herne was suddenly placed in the midst of the sitters; and after recovering from our surprise and resuming the séance, Mr. Herne’s overcoat, hat and umbrella were dropped on the table. John King, speaking in the direct voice, explained that his band of spirit people had found an unexpected opportunity to transport Mr. Herne from where he had been with friends, witnessing a theatrical play that evening; on his appearance at Hackney he was in a semi-conscious condition.”

Grave suspicion surrounds the mediumship of Herne and Williams, however, the latter being exposed in fraud on two occasions. In 1876 Monck was imprisoned after his fake materializations were discovered.

Very little evidential value can be attached to the episode in Catherine Berry’s Experiences in Spiritualism (1876), according to which, at the studio of Frederick A. Hudson, the spirit photographer, between the hours of 2 and 5 P.M., in the presence of Frank Herne and herself:

“Mr. Williams was seen to descend from the roof of the studio; he fell on the ground very gently. I do not think he was hurt, but sadly frightened. The spirit ‘John King’ was rather vexed with him for not obeying a summons to come into the studio, and told Mr. Williams that this putting him through the roof bodily was done as a punishment, and he hoped it would teach him not to disobey in the future. We all went immediately to see if there was an opening in the roof, but there was none, and the boards had all the appearance of not having been disturbed.”

Guppy-Volckman’s transportation must also be called into question. It occurred on June 3, 1871. There were ten witnesses, including the two fraudulent mediums, Williams and Herne, and eight sitters. It was a sequel to Herne’s previous questionable transportation to Guppy-Volckman’s house. In answer to a witty expressed wish of a sitter, in a moment of time Guppy-Volckman was apparently carried bodily from her home in Highbury (North London) to the house of Williams on Lamb’s Conduit Street (West Central London), a distance of over three miles.

The case was the occasion of much facetious comment in the daily press. The Echo printed the only serious report. The story was summed up on the basis of the sitters’ written testimony by Abraham Wallace in Light (1918, p. 259) as follows:

“Neither door nor window could have been opened without the admission of light. After various phenomena usual in dark séances had taken place someone asked Katie King, one of the controls, to bring something. Another member of the circle observed, in a joking sort of way, ‘I wish you would bring Mrs. Guppy.’ Upon which a third remarked: ‘Good gracious, I hope not, she is one of the biggest women in London.’ Katie’s voice at once said ‘I will, I will, I will.’ Then John’s voice was heard to exclaim, ‘Keep still, can’t you?’ In an instant somebody called out: ‘Good God, there is something on my head’ simultaneously with a heavy bump on the table and one or two screams. A match was struck, and there was Mrs. Guppy on the table with the whole of the sitters seated round it closely packed together as they sat at the commencement. Mrs. Guppy appeared to be in a trance, and was perfectly motionless. Great fears were entertained that the shock would be injurious to her. She had one arm over her eyes, and was arrayed in a loose morning gown with a pair of bedroom slippers on, and in a more or less décolleté condition. When telling me the story, Mrs. Volckman very naturally said how much she disliked having been brought in such a state into the presence of strangers. There was a pen in one hand, which was down by her side. From the first mention of bringing her to the time she was on the table three minutes did not elapse. It seems that Mrs. Guppy had a pen in one hand and an account book in the other. She had been making up her weekly accounts and had just written the word ‘onions,’ the ink still being wet on the page.”

After Guppy-Volckman had shaken off the effect of the shock, the séance was continued with her presence. During this part of the séance, her boots, hat, and clothes arrived from her home, as well as lots of flowers. Both Herne and Williams were levitated and disappeared in turns.

After the séance one Mr. Harrison, editor of The Spiritualist, together with three of the sitters, offered to escort Guppy-Volckman to her home. Then their inquiries convinced them that Guppy-Volckman was really sitting in the room with Miss Neyland, writing her accounts at the time that one of the séance sitters wished her to be brought. Her husband also bore testimony to the fact that his wife, shortly before her disappearance, had been up to the billiard room where he was playing with a friend. This visitor corroborated his statement.

Regarding this visit of inquiry, Frank Podmore states in his book Modern Spiritualism (1902):

“They there learnt from Miss Neyland, a friend of Mrs. Guppy’s, who had come out as a medium under her auspices, that an hour or two previously she had been sitting with Mrs. Guppy near the fire making up accounts when suddenly looking up she found that her companion had disappeared, leaving a slight haze near the ceiling.”

The report of this marvelous phenomenon gave rise to repetitions.

In another case, the authenticity of which is difficult to establish, the subject of transportation was a sitter in Guppy-Volckman’s house. His name was Henderson. Ten sitters held the séance on November 2, 1873. Suddenly it was discovered that Henderson broke the séance chain and disappeared. The doors and windows of the room were locked. About the same moment of his disappearance, he was discovered at a distance of a mile and a half in the backyard of the house of his friend, Mr. Stoke. Nine people noticed his sudden arrival. The night was wet. His boots and clothes were “almost” dry.

There is one transportation case associated with William Eglinton (also cited as a fraudulent medium). It occurred on March 16, 1878, at Mrs. Makdougall Gregory’s house. Two other mediums, Arthur Colman and J. W. Fletcher, were present with five sitters. One of the sitters suggested that Colman should be taken through the ceiling. Almost immediately Eglinton disappeared. The noise of a violent bump was heard and Eglinton was found in the room above on the floor in a trance.

Several cases were put on record in the first years of the present century. The story of one is recounted in the Annals of Psychic Science (vol. 9). The place was San Jose, Costa Rica, the date between 1907 and 1909 and the persons concerned were the children of Buenaventura Corralès. The oldest child, Ophelia Corralès, was 18 years old. There were two younger sisters and a brother. Separately and together the children frequently vanished from the séance room, found themselves in the garden and returned, to their great delight, in the same mysterious manner. To quote from the account of Alberto Brenes, a professor at the Law Academy:

“A few minutes passed in absolute silence. Suddenly we heard knocks coming from the pavilion; we turned up the gas and found the children were no longer there. The doors were examined and found to be completely closed. Two persons were deputed to look for the children. When the door of the room was opened they were found standing in a row, talking and laughing at what had taken place.

“They said that they had been brought there, one by one; first little Flora, then Berta, and finally Miguel—their respective ages being seven, twelve and ten years.

“We then asked them how they had been carried and they replied that they had felt a pressure under the arms, then they were lifted up in the air and placed where they were found, but they could not tell us anything more.

“The two investigators then asked the spirits to repeat the translation in the reverse direction; they recommended the children to remain silent where they were, and locking the door, returned to the séance room to give an account of what had happened.

“We locked the séance after taking the necessary precautions of locking the doors. Then ‘Ruiz’ came and after recommending all to keep up their spirits, said in a clear and energetic voice: ‘Let the children come.’ Immediately one of them called out: ‘We are here.’ The light was turned up and the three children appeared in a line in the same order in which they had been previously found. On this occasion all three had been transported at the same time.”

Again, we must add, considerable suspicion surrounds the mediumship of Ophelia Corralès.

Joseph Lapponi, medical officer to Popes Leo XVII and Pius X, recorded in his Hypnotism and Spiritism (1906) the case of the Pansini brothers, Paul and Alfred, eight and ten years old respectively. They experienced mysterious transportation in a half hour from Ruvo to Molfetta. Another time, at 12:30 P.M., they disappeared from Ruvo and at one o’clock found themselves on a boat at sea near Barletta, making towards Trinitapoli. Once they disappeared from the square of Ruvo and found themselves, ten minutes later, before the house of their uncle Jerome Maggiore in Trani. Several other mysterious flights took place to Gios, Biseglie, Mariotta, and Terlizzi. Once they disappeared in Bishop Berardi’s presence while he was discussing these phenomena with their mother. The windows and doors were closed. In another volume, Spedizione e Spiriti, the same author told of the flying brothers of Bari who could transfer themselves over a distance of 45 kilometers in 15 minutes.

Henry Llewellyn had a series of sittings with the medium F. G. F. Craddock at Burslem, Staffs. The medium sat in a corner of the room from which a door led into a cellar beneath. The cellar door was completely covered with a curtain tacked around the opening, so that any disturbance there would have been at once detected. The curtains were drawn over the medium.

Some time later, the medium was discovered in a cataleptic state suspended horizontally across the top of the curtained corner of the room, with his feet and head lodged on each end of about two inches of boarding. The curtain was opened so that all present could see the sight for themselves, and then closed in the hope that the medium would be put safely on the floor again. Hearing no movement for some time the curtain was opened again, when to the bewilderment of the experimenters it was found that Craddock was gone. The cellar door and its curtain were undisturbed. Shortly afterward they heard someone moving about in the next room; when the door of that room was unlocked, the medium walked out of it with his hands still tied behind him. On another occasion Craddock was found to be missing and was discovered in the bedroom directly over the place in which they were sitting. This case must also be treated with reserve, since Craddock was also exposed in fraud on several occasions.

A report of Willi Reichel’s experiences with C. V. Miller, the California materialization medium, as given in Psychische Studien (January–February 1906) states:

“‘Betsy,’ the principal control of Mr. Miller, called Herr Reichel first into the cabinet in order that he might assure himself of the presence of the medium asleep. He examined all again and considers it impossible that the medium could have quitted the cabinet in a normal way; in front of the curtains were seated the 27 persons who formed the circle on that evening, and the windows looked out on a much frequented street. The weather, moreover, was very windy and wet, and it would have been impossible, he says, to open a window without causing a current of air to be felt at once. After about four minutes ‘Betsy’ told him to go with three other persons to the first floor and Mr. Miller’s housekeeper gave them the keys. They found the medium breathing heavily on a chair; they brought him back into the séance room, where he awoke, remembering nothing.”

Franz Hartmann, the well-known Theosophist and writer on occultism, employed the term “magical metathesis.” In Occult Review (July 1906), he quoted the case of a Dr. Z., of Florence, a friend of his, who was reportedly transported from Livorno to Florence (100 kilometers) in 15 minutes and deposited in a closed room.

Stepping into the realm of occult magic, the book of Harry de Windt, From Paris to New York by Land (1904), may be cited for an ancient transportation case in which a medicine man, while he was closely watched, disappeared from a tent and was found in an unconscious condition in a tent half a mile away.

The medium Ada Besinnet was said to have been several times the subject of transportation, but there is no evidential record of the feat. Reporting on the Polish medium Franek Kluski in Psychic Science (October 1925, p. 214), one Professor Pawlovski writes:

“The most extraordinary case related to me by the members of the circle is that of Mr. Kluski having been fetched by the apparitions, or disappearing from the sealed and locked séance room. The astonished sitters found him in a rather distant room of the apartment quietly sleeping on a couch. I report the case upon the responsibility of my friends, whom I have no reason to distrust.”

Harald Nielsson states in Light (November 1, 1919), in an account of his experiences with Indridi Indridason, the Icelandic medium:

“We have had on several occasions the experience of matter being brought through matter, and one evening the medium herself was taken through the wall into a room which was locked and in darkness. This sounds incredible, but many things occur in the presence of physical mediums which must seem absurd to men who have not themselves investigated them. But they are nevertheless true.”

In Psychic Research (March 1930), an account was published by Harry Price and H. Kohn of the poltergeist persecution of an Indian boy, Damodar Ketkar, of Poona, India. According to Kohn, who was a lecturer in languages at the governmental Deccan College (Bombay University), Poona, the following transportation case occurred in April 1928 during the most violent period of the manifestations:

“At 9:45 A.M. on April 23, my sister says in a letter, the elder boy (his brother, Ramkrishna Bapat) suddenly materialised in front of [her]. . . . He looked bright but amazed, and said ‘I have just come from Karjat.’ He didn’t come through any door. My sister describes the posture of the boy as having been most remarkable. When she looked up from her letter-writing she saw him bending forward; both his arms were hanging away from his sides, and the hands hanging limp—his feet were not touching the floor, as she saw a distinct space between his feet and the threshold. It was precisely the posture of a person who has been gripped round the waist and carried, and therefore makes no effort but is gently dropped at his destination.”

This account is unique, as in no other case was the actual arrival of the transported individual seen.

Two accounts of transportation are to be found in the amazing case of Carlos Mirabelli, the South American medium. On the basis of the original Portuguese documents, psychical researcher E. J. Dingwall, in Psychic Research (July 1930), recounts:

“. . . the transportation of the medium from the railway station at Luz [São Paulo] to the town of S. Vincente, a distance of some 90 kilometers. The report states that at the time the medium was at the station at Luz in company with a number of people and was intending to travel to Santos. Shortly before the train started he suddenly disappeared to the astonishment of everybody, his presence in S. Vincente being ascertained 15 minutes later by telephone, it being proved that he was met in the town exactly two minutes after his disappearance. . . . On one occasion when the medium had been secured in his arm-chair by means of various ligatures he vanished utterly from his position, the doors and windows remaining both locked and firmly secured. Five sitters remained in the séance room whilst the rest went in search of the missing man. He was soon discovered in a side room lying in an easy chair and singing to himself.”

A well-documented case was the transportation of Marquis Carlo Centurione Scotto, at Millesimo Castle, on July 29, 1928. Psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano reported on his investigation of the case in Luce e Ombra (September–October 1928). It can be summarized as follows:

During the course of the sitting, the medium Marquis Centurione Scotto exclaimed in a frightened voice: “I can no longer feel my legs!” The gramophone was stopped. An interval of death-like silence followed. The medium was addressed, without answer, then felt for. His place was empty. The sitters turned on the red light. The doors were still securely locked with the key on the inside but the medium had disappeared.

All the rooms of the castle were searched without result. Two and a half hours passed when it occurred to the sitters to ask Gwendolyn Kelley Hack to try and get into communication, through automatic writing, with her spirit guide “Imperator.” After several attempts in which the sitters were only told, “Do not be anxious, we are watching and guarding” and that the “medium is asleep,” the correct information came through: “Go to the right, then outside. Wall and Gate. He is lying—hay—hay—on soft place.” The communication was signed by the cross of “Imperator.”

The place indicated a granary in the stable yard. The great entrance door was locked, and the key was not in the lock. They ran back to fetch it and, entering, found a small door that had been previously overlooked. This door was also locked, but the key was in the keyhole on the outside. They opened it with the greatest caution. On a heap of hay and oats, the medium was comfortably lying, immersed in profound sleep. When he first regained consciousness and found himself lying in the stable he feared that he had gone out of his mind and burst into tears.

The authenticity of the phenomenon was unexpectedly confirmed by a message from New York from the spirit guide “Bert Everitt,” who, manifesting in a sitting with the medium George Valiantine, referred to the Millesimo experiments and stated “that he had helped Cristo d’Angelo [the spirit guide] to carry out the phenomenon of the transport of the medium into the granary.” This was received a whole month before a report of the case had been published in Italy or elsewhere.

The marquis himself described his impressions as follows:

“At this instant I could not feel my legs any more, having the impression of going into trance. I asked Fabienne for her hand, which I took willingly to reassure myself. After having taken the hand I felt something descending over my brain and my face—and I felt myself light . . . light . . . light . . . but of such lightness . . . I felt myself as if fainting and I . . . Then I recall nothing more. Nothing, nothing.”

Many cases have been reported in the hagiographic literature of the transportation of saints, and sometimes their bilocation (simultaneous appearance in different places over a great distance) is noted. (See Gambier Bolton; Psychic Force)

Sources:

Begg, Paul. Into Thin Air: People Who Disappear. London: David & Charles, 1979.

Fodor, Nandor. Mind Over Space. New York: Citadel Press, 1962.

Fort, Charles. The Books of Charles Fort. New York: Henry Holt, 1941.

Harrison, Michael. Vanishings. London: New English Library, 1981.

Telergy

Term used by psychical researcher F. W. H. Myers to denote the force that is manifest in telepathy and perhaps in other supernormal operations.

Telesomatic

Term used by psychical researcher Alexander N. Aksakof for materialization.

Telesthesia

Perception from a distance through psychic rapport with the place or environment. It is less than clairvoyance since it is restricted to the perception of material things or conditions. The word was coined by psychical researcher F. W. H. Myers in 1882 to express sensation at a distance after it was found that the communication between distant persons is not a transference of thought alone, but also of emotion, of motor impulses, and of many impressions not easy to define.

Frequent instances were described during World War I. The experience of a Mrs. Fussey of Wimbledon on November 4, 1914, was typical. At home she suddenly felt in her arm the sharp sting of a wound. She jumped up and cried. There was no trace of an injury. Fussey continued to suffer pain and exclaimed: "Tab [her soldier son] is wounded in the arm. I know it." On the following Monday, confirmation arrived.

Telluric

M. Benedict's term for the rhabdic force that presumably moves the divining rod.

Tellurism

A name applied by Dietrich G. Kieser (1779–1862) to animal magnetism. He was one of the early scientific investigators who supported the reality of the phenomenon and drew attention to its legal aspects. "Téméraire," Charles (or Charles the Bold) (1433–1477)

Duke of Burgundy (1467–1477) in the fifteenth century. During his reign the state enjoyed its height of political, economic, and cultural power. According to legend, he disappeared after the battle of Morat on June 22, 1477, when he was defeated. It was said by his chroniclers that he was carried off by the devil; others maintained that he had withdrawn to a remote spot and become a hermit.

More sober accounts state, however, that he perished in the battle and that his mutilated body was discovered several days later. Charles was introduced into two novels by Sir Walter Scott—Quentin Durward and Anne of Geirstein. The latter novel contains an account of the battle of Nancy, before the fatal encounter at Morat.

Temperature Changes

Marked changes of temperature sometimes occur in the séance room, usually a sudden lowering. (See also Winds)

Templars

The Knights Templars of the Temple of Solomon were a military order founded by Hugues de Payns of Burgundy and Godefroi de St. Omer for the purpose of protecting pilgrims journeying to the Holy Land. They were soon joined by other knights; a religious chivalry speedily gathered around this nucleus. Baldwin I, king of Jerusalem, gave them as headquarters a portion of his palace, contiguous to a mosque that tradition asserted was part of the Temple of Solomon, and from this building they took their name.

One of the purposes of the society was to convert and render useful knights of evil living. So many of these entered the order as to bring it under the suspicion of the church, but there is every reason to believe that its founders were instigated by pious motives. The fact that they lived in a condition near poverty, notwithstanding the numerous rich gifts that were showered upon them, is the best evidence of their motivations.

They had properly constituted officials, a grand master, knights, chaplains, sergeants, craftsmen, sensechals, marshals, and commanders. The order had its own clergy, who like other clergy in orders were exempt from the jurisdiction of diocesan rule, and its chapters were held as a rule in secret. The dress of the brotherhood was a white cloak with a red cross for unmarried knights, and a black or brown cloak with a red cross for the others. The discipline was very strict and the food and clothing rough and not abundant.

By the middle of the twelfth century, the new order had firm footing in nearly all the Latin kingdoms of Christendom. Its power grew, and its organization became widespread. It formed a nucleus of the Christian effort against the paganism of the east. Its history may be said to be that of the Crusades. Moreover it became a great trading corporation, the greatest commercial agency between the east and west, and as such amassed immense wealth.

On the fall of the Latin kingdom in Palestine, the Templars were forced to withdraw from that country. Although they continued to harass the Saracen power, they made little headway against it, and in reality appeared to have undertaken commercial pursuits in preference to those of a more warlike character.

The Attack Upon the Templars

When the Temple was at the high point of its power, its success aroused the envy and avarice of Philip IV of France (1285–1314), who commenced a series of attacks upon it. Pope Clement V, who was devoted to Philip's interests, denounced the order for heresy and immorality and gave Philip his chance.

For several generations before this time, rumors had been circulating concerning the secret rites of the Templars, which were assisted by the very strict privacy of their meetings. They were usually held at daybreak with closely-guarded doors. It was alleged that the most horrible blasphemies and indecencies took place at these meetings, that the cross was trampled underfoot and spat upon, that an idol named Baphomet (Baphemetios, baptism of wisdom) was adored, or even that the devil in the shape of a black cat appeared. Other tales told of the roasting of children, and the smearing of the idol with their burning fat. And even wilder rumors spread through the uneducated populous.

A certain Esquian de Horian pretended to betray the "secret" of the Templars to Philip, and they were denounced to the Inquisition. Jacques de Molay, the grand master, who had been called from Cyprus to France, was arrested with 140 of his brethren in Paris and thrown into prison. A universal arrest of the Templars throughout France followed. The wretched knights were tortured en masse, as was usually the case, and confessed to the most grotesque crimes. The most damning confession of all was that of the grand master himself, who said that he had been guilty of denying Christ and spitting upon the cross, but repudiated all charges of immorality in indignant terms.

The process dragged on slowly for more than three years, in consequence of the jealousies that arose among those interested in its prosecution. The pope wished to bring it entirely under the jurisdiction of the church, and to have it decided at Rome. The king, on the other hand, mistrusting the pope, resolved on the destruction of the order so that none but himself should reap advantage from it. He decided it should be judged at Paris under his own personal influence.

The prosecution was directed by his ministers, Nogaret and Enguerrand de Marigny. The Templars asserted their innocence and demanded a fair trial, but they found few advocates who would undertake their defense. They were subjected to hardships and tortures, which forced many of them into confessions dictated to them by their persecutors.

During this interval, the pope's orders were carried into other countries, authorizing the arrest of the Templars and the seizure of their goods. Everywhere the same charges were brought against them. The same means of imprisonment and torture were used to procure their condemnation, although they were not subjected to the same severity as in France.

The Destruction of the Order in France

At length, in the spring of 1316, the grand process was opened in Paris. An immense number of Templars, brought from all parts of the kingdom, underwent a public examination. A long act of accusation was read: they denied Christ (and sometimes they denied expressly all the saints) declaring that he was not God truly but a false prophet and that they had no hope of salvation through him; they always, at their initiation into the order, spat upon the cross, and trod it under foot (they did this especially on Good Friday); they worshiped a certain cat, which sometimes appeared to them in their congregation; they did not believe in any of the sacraments of the church; they took secret oaths which they were bound not to reveal; the brother who officiated at the reception of a new brother kissed the naked body of the latter, often in a very unbecoming manner; each different province of the order had its idol, which was a head, having sometimes three faces, and at others only one, or sometimes a human skull; they worshiped these idols in their chapters and congregations, believing that they had great power; they girt themselves with cords, with which these idols had been superstitiously touched; those who betrayed the secrets of their order, or were disobedient, were thrown into prison and often put to death; they held their chapters secretly and by night, and placed a watch to prevent them from any danger of interruption or discovery; and they believed the grand master alone had the power of absolving them from their sins.

The publication of these charges, and the agitation that had been deliberately fomented, created such horror throughout France that the Templars who died during the process were treated as condemned heretics. Burial in consecrated ground was refused to their remains.

A great number of knights agreed to the general points of the formula of initiation. It seems possible that they denied Christ and spat and trod upon the cross. The alleged words of the denial were "Je reney Deu" or "Je reney Jhesu," repeated thrice. Most of those who confessed having gone through this ceremony declared that they did it with repugnance and spat beside the cross, not on it. The reception took place in a secret room with closed doors; the candidate was compelled to take off part or (in rare instances) all of his garments, and then he was kissed on various parts of the body.

One of the knights examined, Guisard de Marzici, said he remembered the reception of Hugh de Marhaud, of the diocese of Lyons. He saw him being taken into a small room, which was closed up so that no one could see or hear what took place within. After some time, he was let out; he was very pale and looked as though he were troubled and amazed. In conjunction with these strange ceremonies, however, there were others that showed a reverence for the Christian church and its ordinances, a profound faith in Christ, and the consciousness that the partaker of them was entering into a holy vow.

The historian Jules Michelet (1798–1874), who carefully investigated the materials relating to the trial of the Templars, suggested an ingenious explanation for these anomalies. He imagined that the form of reception was borrowed from the figurative mysteries and rites of the early church. The candidate for admission into the order, according to this notion, was first presented as a sinner and renegade; in the example of St. Peter, he denied Christ. This denial was a sort of pantomime, in which the novice expressed his reprobate state by spitting on the cross. The candidate was then stripped of his profane clothing, received through the kiss of the order into a higher state of faith, and re-dressed with the garb of its holiness. Forms like these would be easily misunderstood in the Middle Ages and their original meaning soon forgotten.

Another charge in the accusation of the Templars seems to have been proved by the depositions of witnesses, namely the idol or head which they were said to have worshiped; the real character or meaning of which it was difficult to explain. Many Templars confessed to having seen this idol, but as they described it differently, it must be supposed that it was not in all cases represented under the same form. Some said it was a frightful head, with long beard and sparkling eyes; others said it was a man's skull; some described it as having three faces; some said it was of wood, and others of metal; one witness described it as a painting (tabula picta) representing the image of a man (imago hominis), and said that when it was shown to him, he was ordered to "adore Christ his creator."

According to some it was a gilt figure, either of wood or metal, while others described it as painted black and white. According to another deposition, the idol had four feet. The one belonging to the order at Paris was said to be a silver head with two faces and a beard. The novices of the order were told to regard this idol as their savior. Deodatus Jaffet, a knight from the south of France, deposed that the person who performed the ceremonies of reception showed him a head or idol. It appeared to have three faces. The person from the ceremonies said, "You must adore this as your savior, and the savior of the order of the Temple," and then Jaffet was made to worship the idol, saying, "Blessed be he who shall save my soul." Cettus Ragonis, a knight received at Rome in a chamber of the palace of the Lateran, gave a somewhat similar account.

Many other witnesses spoke of having seen these heads, which, however, were perhaps not shown to everybody. The greatest number of those who spoke on this subject said they had heard others speak of the head, but that they had never seen it themselves. Many of them declared their disbelief in its existence. A friar minor deposed in England that an English Templar had assured him the order had four principal idols: one at London in the sacristy of the Temple, another at Bristellham, a third at Brueria (Bruern in Lincolnshire), and a fourth beyond the Humber.

Baron von Hammer-Purgstall indicated that Gnosticism was the secret doctrine of the Temple. His important essay Mysterium Baphometis Revelatum (The Mystery of Baphomet Revealed) was published in vol. 6 of Fundgraben des Orients (Vienna, 1811). The suggestion of Baphomet being related to the rituals of Ophite and Gnostic heresies has some plausibility.

The confessions with regard to the mysterious cat were much rarer and more vague. Some Italian knights confessed that they had been present at a secret meeting of 12 knights held at Brindisi. There a grey cat suddenly appeared among them and they worshiped it. At Nismes, some Templars declared they had been present at a chapter at Montpellier at which the demon appeared to them in the form of a cat and promised them worldly prosperity. They added that they saw devils in the shape of women. An English knight, who was examined at London, deposed that in England they did not adore the cat or the idol to his knowledge, but he had heard it positively stated that they worshiped the cat and the idol in parts beyond the sea. English witnesses deposed to other acts of "idolatry."

Such accounts suggest the witchcraft accounts of the appearance of the devil at what were basically pagan rituals. Agnes Lovecote stated she had heard that at a chapter held in Dineslee (Dynesley, in Hertfordshire), the devil appeared to the Templars in a monstrous form. It had precious stones for eyes, which shone so bright that they illuminated the whole chapter; the brethren, in succession, kissed him on the posteriors and marked there the form of the cross. She was told that one young man, who refused to go through this ceremony, was thrown into a well, and a great stone was cast upon him.

Another witness, Robert de Folde, said he had heard that 20 years ago, in the same place, the devil came to the chapter once a year. He flew away with one of the knights, whom he took as a sort of tribute. Two others stated that certain Templars confessed to them that at a grand annual assembly in the county of York, the Templars worshiped a calf. All this is mere hearsay, but it shows the popular opinion of the conduct of the order.

A Templar examined in Paris, named Jacques de Treces, said he had been informed that at secret chapters held at midnight, a head appeared to the assembled brethren, and "had a private demon, by whose council he was wise and rich."

The wretched aim of King Philippe was successful. He seized the whole treasure of the temple in France and became rich. Those who ventured to speak in defense of the order were browbeaten and received little attention. Torture was employed to force confessions. Fifty-four Templars who refused to confess were carried to the windmill of St. Antoine, in the suburbs of Paris, and there burned. Many others, among whom was the grand master himself, were subsequently brought to the stake. After having lasted two or three years, the process ended in the condemnation and suppression of the order; its estates were given in some countries to the knights of St. John.

It was in France that the persecution was most cruel. In England, the order was suppressed, but no executions took place. Even in Italy, the severity of the judges was not everywhere the same. In Lombardy and Tuscany the Templars were condemned, while they were acquitted at Ravenna and Bologna. They were also pronounced innocent in Castile; in Arragon they were reduced by force only because they had attempted to resist by force of arms. In Spain and Portugal they only gave up their own order to be admitted into others. The pope was offended at the leniency shown towards Templars in England, Spain, and Germany. The Order of the Temple was finally dissolved and abolished, and its memory branded with disgrace.

Some of the knights were said to have remained together and formed secret societies. The result, however, was much the same everywhere. Convicted of heresy, sorcery, and many other abominations, many of the wretched Templars were punished with death by fire, imprisonment, and their goods reverted to the various crowned heads of Europe. Nearly all of these nobles followed the greedy example of Philip of France.

Jacques de Molay, the grand master, was brought out onto a scaffold erected in front of Notre Dame in Paris and asked to repeat his confession and receive a sentence of perpetual imprisonment. He flared into sudden anger and recanted all he had said, protesting his innocence; he was sentenced to burn. De Molay summoned the pope and the king with his dying breath; he waited to meet them before the bar of Heaven. Both of these dignitaries shortly afterwards died and it remained in the public mind that the outcome of the grand master's summons seemed to have proved his innocence.

There is every reason to believe there was some foundation for the charges of heresy made against the Templars. Their intimate connection with the East and the long establishment of the order had in all probability rendered their Christianity not quite so pure as that of Western Europe. Numerous treatises have been written for the purpose of proving or disproving the Temple heresy, to show that it followed the doctrines and rites of the Gnostic Ophites of Islam, that "Baphomet" was merely a corruption of "Mahomet," and it has been collated with various other eastern systems.

Hans Prutz furthered the view of the rejection of Christianity in his book Geheimlehre und Geheimstatutendes Tempelherren-Ordens (1879) in favor of a religion based on Gnostic dualism, and at once raised up a host of critics.

But many defenders of the order followed, and it was proved in numerous instances that the confessions wrung from the Templars were the result of extreme torture. In a number of cases they were acquitted in Castile, Aragon, Portugal, and in many German and Italian centers. It has also been shown that the answers of a number of the knights under torture were practically dictated to them. In England, out of 80 Templars examined, only four confessed to the charge of heresy, and of these, two were apostates.

The Templars were also the victims of their own arrogance and commercial success, which excited the avarice their enemies and the superstitious ignorance and hatred of their contemporaries. There has been a steady stream of writings on the Templars, especially in the last two centuries. Contemporary writers on the order have agreed that charges of witchcraft and homosexuality directed against the order were basically lies spread to hide Philip's motives.

Modern Templarism

It has been asserted that on the death of Jacques de Molay, a conspiracy was formed by the surviving Templars. The conspiracy had for its ends the destruction of papacy and the various kingdoms of Europe. This tradition was supposedly handed on through generations of initiates through such societies as the Illuminati and the Freemasons, who in the end brought about the French Revolution and the downfall of the French throne.

After the French Revolution, people claimed the Templar tradition and founded several neo-Templar organizations that spread through the French-speaking world. In 1805 a Frenchman, Bernard-Raymond Fabr e-Palpret, founded a reconstituted Templar order with himself as the head. He also created a gnostic church to compete with Roman Catholicism and consecrated Ferdinand-Francois Chatel as the first bishop. After the death of Fabr e-Palpret in 1838, the order split. It developed even more factions in every generation. At present more than 30 operate in France, Switzerland, Belgium, and Quebec. One of these neo-Templar groups, the Solar Temple, became the subject of interest when nearly 50 of its members were murdered in Switzerland in 1994. Apparently they were killed by their leaders, who then killed themselves.

A second neo-Templar tradition began in Germany in the 1890s with the founding of the OTO, the Ordo Templi Orientis (or Order of the Eastern Temple), which spread from Germany to German-speaking Switzerland and through Aleister Crowley to Great Britain and the United States.

Sources:

Campbell, G. The Knights Templars, Their Rise and Fall. London: Duckworth; New York: McBride, 1937.

Charpentier, John. L'Ordre des Templiers. Paris: La Colombe, 1945.

Lea, Henry Charles. A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages. 3 vols. London: Sampson, Low; New York: Harper & Bros., 1888. Reprint, New York: Citadel, 1954.

Lees, B. A. Records of the Templars in England in the Twelfth Century: The Inquest of 1185 with Illustrative Charters and Documents. Vol. 9 of British Academy Records of the Social and Economic History of England and Wales. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1935.

Legman, G. The Guilt of the Templars. New York: Basic Books, 1966.

Martin, Edward J. The Trail of the Templars. London: Allen & Unwin, 1928.

Michelet, Jules. Le Proc s des Templiers. 2 vols. N.p., 1841-51.

Parker, Thomas W. The Knights Templars in England. Tucson: University of Arizona Press, 1963.

Temple Beautiful

Temple Beautiful is a channeling group currently headquartered in South Africa. It was founded in the United States by Iona Linda Day who began to channel St. Germain and other of the ascended masters associated with the Theosophical Society and the "I Am" Religious Activity. Day passed the leadership of the group to a woman named Phaeryn. In the 1980s, tapes of Day's and Phaeryn's channeled messages were received in South Africa by Mienke Riemens, a resident of Rondebosch, a suburb of Cape Town. Riemens held meetings in her home where she played the tapes for those assembled.

At one point in the early 1990s, Phaeryn visited South Africa and gave a channeled reading to Chris Erasmus, a young man who had joined the group around 1990. During the reading, St. Germain asked Erasmus to be his channel in South Africa. He began channeling in 1994 and has established special contact with St. Germain and Serapis Bey. Prior to joining the group, he had been on a spiritual search that had led him to transcendental meditation. Shortly after Erasmus began channeling, the group outgrew the space in the Riemens' home and moved to Erasmus' home. The growth of the work in the late 1990s has led the group to build a separate temple facility.

The Temple Beautiful is organized as a mystery school. It is designed to assist people in making a connection to their higher self and places initiates in a position to receive direct guidance.

Temple Beautiful is located in suburban Cape Town.

Sources:

Erasmus, Chris. "A Mystery School in the Suburbs." Odyssey 23, no.4 (August 1999): 10–14.

Temple Church (London)

The Church of the Knights Templars in London, consisting of two parts, the Round Church and the Choir. The Round Church (transition Norman) was built in 1185. The Choir (early English style) was finished in 1240.

Hargrave Jennings, in his book The Rosicrucians, their Rites and Mysteries (1870), states that the Temple Church in London presents many mythic Rosicrucian figures. One figure signifies the Virgin Mary, and displays the cross as rising like the pole or mast of a ship (argha) out of the midst of a crescent moon (navis biprora), curved at both ends.

The staff of the grand master of the Templars displayed a curved cross of four splays, or blades, red upon white. The eight-pointed red Buddhist cross was also one of the Templar ensigns.

The church's arches abound with stars with wavy or crooked flames. The altar at the east end of the Temple Church has a cross on a field of wavy stars; to the right is the Decalogue, surmounted by the initials A.O. (alpha and omega); on the left are the monograms of the Saviour, I.C., X.C.; beneath is the Lord's Prayer. The winged horse, or Pegasus, is the badge of the Templars.

The tombs of the Templars, disposed around the circular church in London, are of that early Norman shape called dos d'ane; their tops are triangular; the molding passes through the temples and issues out of the mouth and horned skull of a mask. The head at the top is shown in the cover of the tomb. There is much hidden meaning in every curve of these Templar tombs.

Temple of Set

The Temple of Set emerged during the period of internal discord that almost destroyed the Church of Satan in the early 1970s. In 1972, Michael Aquino, an officer in the U.S. Army and a priest in the church, critiqued the authoritarian leadership of church founder Anton LaVey as well as his understanding of Satanism. Claiming LaVey to be an atheist who did not believe in the literal existence of Satan, Aquino left the church. Three years later, in response to Aquino's invocation, Satan appeared under the guise of Set, the ancient Egyptian deity. Set gave Aquino a mandate in the form of a book, The Book of Coming Forth by Night, which authorized Aquino to found the Temple of Set as the Church of Satan's successor. The temple is dedicated to Set, the corrupted legends of whom became the basis of the Christian devil.

The temple teaches that the universe is a nonconscious environment possessed of mechanical consequences. However, the deity Set can on occasion violate the laws. Over the millennia, Set has altered the genetic makeup of human beings in order to produce an enhanced nonnatural intelligence. The temple works to identify and develop this enhanced ability in selected individuals. It is governed by a Council of Nine, which appoints the high priest of Set. Members are organized into six initiatory degrees: Setian, Adept, Priest(ess) of Set, Master of the Temple, Magus, and Ipsissimis.

The Temple of Set may be contacted at P.O. Box 470307, San Francisco, CA 94147. It publishes the newsletter Scroll of Set. While the work occurs primarily on the individual level, the temple provides a variety of resources for the individual to develop as a Setian.

Sources:

Aquino, Michael A. The Crystal Tablet of Set. San Francisco: Temple of Set, 1985.

———. Temple of Set Reading List XIX. San Francisco: Temple of Set, 1984.

Scott, Gini Graham. The Magicians. New York: Irvington Publishers, 1983.

Temple of the Holy Grail (THG)

The Temple of the Holy Grail (THG) is a small initiatory mystery school based upon the belief that what are now known as the "Grail" mysteries (and hence associated with the cup used by Christ at the Last Supper) existed in Western Europe long before the first century and the advent of Christianity. They were a as a graded path of initiation comparable to the Lam Rim of Tibetan Buddhism. Through the centuries, the mysteries evolved into an esoteric Christian school, the primary work being attributed to the legendary Graalmeister Treverezent in the ninth century C.E. It was later associated with chivalric orders, and the alchemical and Gnostic schools.

The Temple of the Holy Grail began its history at the end of the nineteenth century with a secret English Templar order that possessed an ancient Jewish terra-cotta cup believed to be the true Eucharistic vessel of the Last Supper. The cup was encased in gold, with two ancient silver auxiliary "grails," prepared in 1888 to do the sacred Grail Rites as had been done once each century by the order and its predecessors in the 88th year (88 being a mystical number in the Christian Kabbalah). The rite (a theurgical Eucharist) was performed with the understanding that it would reempower a channel for Divine Blessing upon the planet for the coming century and protect humanity from being overwhelmed by dark forces. However, in 1888, the elderly abbot of the order had some concern that the chalices would be stolen by people who wished to use them for less altruistic magical purposes.

The chalices were secretly transported to London, where the centennial ceremony was to be performed. However, in spite of all precautions, the three chalices were stolen and used for black magical purposes. When the primary chalice was eventually recovered, the gold was melted down, and the pottery cup smashed into the earth. (Later, one of the auxiliary chalices turned up at an antiquities auction in Antioch where it was purchased by the Metropolitan Museum in New York; it is now exhibited as the "Chalice of Antioch" with legends of it having been the Holy Grail. The third chalice was never found.)

The actual founding of the Temple of the Holy Grail as it presently exists began in the 1960s with the magical preparation undertaken by a solitary magician. He was not aware of the prior history of the destruction of the Grail and not formally connected with any traditional Grail order. However, through interior guidance, he was led over several years to construct a new chalice using white magical and theurgical preparations. Following that same guidance, in August of 1988 he traveled over 1,000 miles to a sacred site in Canada, where he used the new chalice for a theurgical Eucharist to bless the planet and humanity. Only after this event, which he performed quite unaware of its full implications, did he while returning home hear an interior voice naming him the "Grailmaster." He was unfamiliar with the term. Subsequently, he received teachings telepathically in lucid dreams from a Tibetan Lama that eventually became the First Empowerment of the First Order of THG. Shortly after this, he discovered a written account of the events of 1888. He then began to understand the impulse that led him to prepare the new vessel and conduct the 1988 centennial rite.

Soon after these events, Bishop George Boyer of the Sanctuary of the Gnosis in London contacted the new Grailmaster and transmitted to him all of the documents and information necessary to reestablish and preserve the esoteric European lineages deriving from the Grail tradition. The new Grailmaster subsequently brought forth new initiatory materials (by the process commonly called channeling) and led Bishop Boyer in undergoing them.

The new Grailmaster has also received the authority provided by both the traditional apostolic lineages passed through the Christian bishops over the centuries and newer lineages begun by bishops claiming ordination from occult realms. Various independent bishops have consecrated the new Grailmaster in 18 historical Apostolic and 22 European esoteric lineages. Additionally, the Grailmaster and Temple are Keepers of the True Grail, which is the Divine Royal Blood (San Greal in Christian esoteric tradition, and not to be confused with the Grail Chalice itself). For believers, the Grail is the normally invisible and intangible Divine sacrificial energy that nurtures evolutionary unfoldment in the physical universe and among beings developing in the physical level of existence. The Grail power sanctifies matter, and is identified with the Philosopher's Stone that transforms the lower into the Higher, expands contracted Heart-consciousness, and mediates inspiration, guidance, selfless service, and Divine Love.

The THG exists solely for a small number of individuals wishing to undertake private advanced esoteric training in order to anonymously serve human and planetary evolution. A relationship to the order is offered by invitation to people already ordained or otherwise advanced in recognized groups, or to individuals who, having prepared themselves apart from organizations, manifest a devotion to the spiritual unfoldment of humanity and of the planet. Members of the order proceed through the mysteries it perpetuates, the content of which is not disclosed to nonmembers, in an ordered sequence.

The Temple of the Holy Grail may be contacted through the Grailmaster at P.O. Box 3816, Santa Cruz, CA 95063-3816 or through Bishop George Boyer, Bishop Templar, 53 College Rd., Colliers Wood, London, UK SW19 2BP. Information on the temple may be found at its website: <http://www.hometemple.org/>.

Sources:

Temple of the Holy Grail. <http://www.hometemple.org/>. April 4, 2000.

Temple of the People

The Temple of the People formed out of the American Theosophical Society in Syracuse, New York, in 1898. The American Theosophists had broken with the international theosophical movement under William Q. Judge, who died just a few years later. Judge was succeeded by Katherine Tingley, who enjoyed strong but less than universal support. Members of the Syracuse lodge were among those who broke with Tingley and established the independent temple.

The Temple of the People was led by Dr. William H. Dower (1866–1937), known by members as “Red Star,” and Francis A. LaDue (1849–1922), known as “Blue Star.” The pair channeled the masters of the Great White Brotherhood, that group of advanced souls believed by Theosophists to guide the destiny of humankind. They had a special relationship to “Hilarion,” the master of the fifth, or red, ray. The channeled sessions were published in the massive book Theogenesis, which came to be regarded as the third volume of Madame Blavatsky's magnum opus, The Secret Doctrine, Volume 1: Anthropogenesis, and Volume 2: Cosmogenesis.

Dower outlived LaDue as the leader of the temple and was succeeded by Pearl F. Dower and Harold Forgostein. When Forgostein died in 1990, he was succeeded by Eleanor Shumway, the present guardian-in-chief. The temple may be contacted at Box 7100, Halcyon, CA 93421. It has some 200 members worldwide.

Sources:

Kagan, Paul. New World Utopias. Baltimore, Md.: Penguin Books, 1975.

Teachings of the Temple. 3 vols. Halcyon, Calif.: Temple of the People, 1947–85.

Theogenesis. Halcyon, Calif.: Temple of the People, 1981.

Temple of Universal Law

The Temple of Universal Law is a Spiritualist church founded in 1936 by the Rev. Charlotte Bright. Bright was a medium whose spirit guide “Master Nacidemus” was considered to be a member of the Great White Brotherhood, that group of evolved disembodied entities who are believed to guide the destiny of the human race. Under the brotherhood's direction, Bright erected a church on Chicago's North Side in 1956. She pastored the church until her death in 1989, when she was succeeded by her son, Rev. Robert E. Martin. Before her death she oversaw the establishment of a second congregation in Wisconsin.

The temple affirms the beliefs of metaphysical Christianity, including a belief in a God who expresses himself as a Trinity; God the Father as the universal law of life that creates, sustains, and progresses to eternal life; Christ as the perfect demonstration of divine mind; the Holy Spirit as the action of divine mind within; the variety of forms of worship; the discovery of spiritual truth in the Bible and all spiritual truths; and the immortality of humans. The church teaches that it is the essential duty of people to look within and begin to awaken the Christ Spirit. As one comes to understand universal law, oneness with God can be attained.

Address: 5030 N. Drake, Chicago, IL 60625.

Tempon-teloris (Ship of the Dead)

Among the Dayaks of Borneo, the ship of the dead, the vessel that carried the souls of the departed in search of the hereafter, was generally represented in the shape of a bird, the hornbill (rhinoplax vigil). Accompanying the souls on their journey through the fire-sea were all the stores that had been laid out at the feast of the dead (trivah), and all the slaves who had been killed for that purpose. After some chain of events in the fiery sea, the ship of the dead, with Tempon-telon at the helm, reached the golden shores of the blessed.

Some of these beliefs echo the ancient burial rites of Egypt as portrayed in the Book of the Dead.

Tenaille, Jean (1882–1962)

Engineer who was active in the field of parapsychology. He was born on April 16, 1882, in Paris, France. He followed various occupations through his life: ranching in Canada, importing and managing a department store in Paris, and managing several industrial plants near Amiens, France (1931–39). After World War II he operated as an acoustical engineer. Toward the end of his life he wrote one important book, Civilisation occidentale (Western civilization, 1957), awarded the Académie Française prize for history in 1958. He contributed several articles to the French parapsychological journal Revue Métapsychique, including “A propos des sources” (Concerning sources, 1932). He died December 31, 1962.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Tenhaeff, W(ilhelm) H(einrich) C(arl) (1894–1981)

Dutch parapsychologist, for some years director of the Parapsychology Institute of the State University of Utrecht, Netherlands (which he founded), now known as Parapsychological Division of the Psychological Laboratory. Tenhaeff was born on January 18, 1894, in Rotterdam, the Netherlands. He studied at the University of Utrecht (Ph.D. psychology, 1933). His doctoral thesis Paragnosie en infulhen was the first on parapsychology in the Netherlands.

Tenhaeff had a long career as a respected parapsychologist. He was a lecturer on psychology (1932–53), lecturer on parapsychology (1933–53), professor of parapsychology, and director of the Parapsychology Institute, University of Utrecht (1953 on). He was founder (1928) and for many years editor (1928 on) of Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie, the journal of the Stu-dievereniging voor Psychical Research (the Dutch Society for Psychical Research). He served as secretary (1929–38) of the Dutch Society for Psychical Research prior to World War II and as an advisor afterward. In 1960 a number of leading parapsychologists withdrew from the society due to his autocratic disposition and established the rival Nederlandse Vereniging voor Parapsychologie.

Tenhaeff showed an interest in parapsychology from an early age, and conducted investigations and reported on psychometry, clairvoyance, precognition, unorthodox healing, the divining rod, and the structure of personality in sensitives. Through his career he lectured in many countries on parapsychological subjects, published numerous articles in Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie and other journals, and wrote a number of books. In 1945 he commenced a long and detailed investigation of the clairvoyant Gerard Croiset. In the years after the 1960 break in the society, people began to look into his extraordinary claims for the psychic abilities of Croiset and discovered that he had been systematically doctoring data in his research. The fraud called his whole career into question. Because of his own popularity with the media and public, he was able to hold off the critics for some years, but eventually all of his colleagues acknowledged his fall. Tenhaeff died July 9, 1981, in the Netherlands; no major parapsychological journal carried an obituary.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Hoebens, P. H. "Gerard Croiset and Professor Tenhaeff." In Science Confronts the Paranormal. Edited by Kenneth Frazier. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1986.

———. "Investigation of the Mozart of 'Psychic Sleuths.'" In Science Confronts the Paranormal, edited by Kenneth Frazier. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Books, 1986.

Tenhaeff, W. H. C. Beknopte Handleiding der "Psychical Research" (Short Textbook of Parapsychology). 3 vols. N.p., 1926.

———. Beschouwingen over Het Gebruik van Paranognosten (The Use of Sensitives for Police and Other Purposes). Utrecht: Erven J. Bijleveld, 1957.

———. Telepathie en Helderziendheid. English edition as Telepathy and Clairvoyance. C. Bertelsmann, 1962.

Tenskwatawa (1775–1836)

Tenskwatawa, a Native American prophet of the Shawnee people, was the brother of the famous war chief Tecumseh. He grew up in the shadow of his more famous brother, and was a somewhat alienated soul who did not take part in traditional male activities such as hunting and fishing. At some point he also lost the use of his right eye. He compensated for this physical defect by wearing jewelry from his pierced ears and nose. He did have some oratorical abilities.

He arose out of obscurity in the first decade of the nineteenth century as American settlers moved into traditional Shawnee territory in the Midwest. He had become a medicine man in his brother's tribe and claimed additional status as a prophet after being visited by the Great Spirit in a dream. The new settlers labeled him "The Prophet." People took him seriously after he successfully predicted a solar eclipse in 1806. Especially younger Shawnee were drawn to this new leader and his new religion. He told them to reject white culture and adhere to their traditional ways. He also urged them to follow his example and give up the use of alcohol.

The white settlers, however, were more interested in his broad message that North America was a land that was held in common by all the tribes. Hence, no particular Indian group had the right to sign away its territory to the U. S. Government. It was not theirs to give. Tecumseh accepted the idea and used it to build a confederation of tribes. Meanwhile, Tenskwatawa gathered his most dedicated followers and created a new village called Tippecanoe, at the point where the Wabash and Tippecanoe Rivers met. The settlers called it Prophet's Town. As the movement focused in Tenskwatawa grew, anxiety over Indian resistance to further settlement was focused on Prophet's Town.

In the fall of 1811, Tecumseh headed south to gather the support of additional tribes for his confederacy to resist further white encroachments. Indiana governor William Henry Harrison decided to seize the opportunity and remove the heart of the movement. He sent soldiers to Prophet's Town and in what came to be known as the Battle of Tippecanoe, destroyed the village. Though not a great battle, it was later used by Harrison in his quest for the American presidency. It also led to the downfall of Tenskwatawa. Former residents of Tippecanoe almost killed him, and his influence as a man of magical power and prophetic ability waned from that moment. However, the idea of the confederation of tribes was still very much alive the next year and was used by the British to enroll Indians as allies in the War of 1812.

After the war, Tenskwatawa lived in Canada on a British pension. He returned to the United States in 1826 and attempted to reassert his authority among a group of Shawnee who were being moved from Ohio and eventually settled in Kansas. He died there in 1836.

Sources:

Drake, Benjamin. The Life of Tecumseh and of His Brother the Prophet. 1841. Reprint, N.p., 1969.

Tephillin

In Hebrew, tephillin means "attachments." They were originally prayer thongs worn by Jews at morning prayer—one on the left arm and another on the head. They came to be regarded as talismans and were used in many traditional ceremonies. The Talmud states: "Whoever has the tephillin bound to his head and arm . . . is protected from sin."

Tephramancy

A mode of divination in which sacrificed victims from a fire are used.

Teraphim

These appear to have been ancient images of household gods. They were relatively small in size and easily carried. The teraphim were taken away from Jacob by his daughter Rachel (Gen. 31). They were probably seen as bringers of good luck. They are mentioned throughout the earlier record of Hebrew society, but beginning with the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. 15:23) were condemned by association with sorcery and idolatry.

When Josiah conducted his reforms (II Kings. 23:24), the destruction of the teraphim was included among his actions. They were still being used, however, after the period of the Babylonian exile (Zech. 10:2).

Tesla, Nikola (1856–1943)

Eccentric scientific genius whose inventions in the field of electrical apparatus stemmed from inspirations received in extraordinary visions of a paranormal character. Unlike most innovators in the fields of engineering and electricity, his inventions did not require patient experiment and trial-and-error testing of models. The ideas flashed into his mind as working units, complete to the final details of component design and size. For example, as a young student of electrical engineering and physics, at a time when the concept of alternating current was considered a fallacy of the perpetual motion type, he knew that he could solve this problem. After only a few years of consideration of the problem, the complete detailed vision of an alternating current motor using a rotating magnetic field came to him while he gazed at a sunset.

He was born in July 10, 1856, in the village of Similjan in the Austro-Hungarian border area of Lika (now in Slovenia). Even as a boy, he was inventive; at the age of nine he constructed a 16-bug power motor by harnessing June bugs to a thin wooden wheel. He was educated at an elementary school, then had four years at Lower Realschule, Gospic, Lika, which was followed by three years at the Higher Realschule, Carlstadt, Croatia. He graduated in 1873. Tesla was a student for four years at the Polytechnic School, Gratz, Austria, studying mathematics, physics, and mechanics. Afterward he enrolled in philosophy studies for two years at the University of Prague, Bohemia (now the capital of the Czech Republic).

He commenced his career as an inventor in Budapest, Hungary, in 1881. There he constructed a telephone repeater and engaged in various branches of engineering and manufacture. In 1884 he immigrated to the United States, later becoming a naturalized citizen. For nearly a year he worked for inventor Thomas A. Edison, who was impressed by his skill and hard work, but the two men were diametrically opposed in temperament and method. Tesla was a visionary who solved problems in a flash of insight, whereas Edison relied on patient trial-and-error in practical experiments. Tesla insisted on the superiority of alternating current and its applications, whereas Edison believed it a dead end and championed direct current. Tesla parted company with Edison after being promised $50,000 for improving the design and efficiency of dynamos. When Tesla solved the problem and asked for the money, Edison said he was only joking. Tesla immediately resigned.

His salary at the Edison Company had been modest. For the next two years he had a difficult time, but in 1887 he was backed to form the Tesla Electric Company in New York. He was now able to construct the alternating current machines he had visualized earlier.

The Tesla system made it possible to supply electricity economically over distances of hundreds of miles, instead of the short distances of the Edison direct current powerhouses. Tesla's demonstrations made a great impression on another inventor, George Westinghouse of the Westinghouse Electric Company of Pittsburgh. Westinghouse paid Tesla $1 million for rights on his alternating current system, comprising some 40 patents, with a contract additionally stipulating a royalty of a dollar per horsepower.

In attempting to span the continent with an alternating current system, Westinghouse ran into financial difficulties; his own backers insisted that he renounce his royalty contract to Tesla, otherwise they would withdraw support. When Westinghouse explained his difficulty to Tesla, Tesla recalled how Westinghouse had believed in him. In a magnanimous gesture Tesla tore up his contract, thereby sacrificing some $12 million in unpaid royalties.

Tesla went on to invent new apparatus involving original principles. He was responsible for many important innovations: the system of electricity conversion and distribution by oscillatory dischargers, generators of high frequency current; the Tesla coil or transformer, a system of wireless transmission of intelligence; mechanical oscillators and generators of electrical oscillation; research and discoveries in radiation, material streams, and emanations; and high-potential magnifying transmitting. One of his most spectacular achievements was harnessing the water power of Niagara Falls. In 1895 the Westinghouse Electric Company installed a gigantic hydroelectric project, using the Tesla polyphase system of alternating current.

Tesla opened up many important avenues of scientific development and has rarely been properly acknowledged by later historians. His experiments with electromagnetic waves formed the basis of the development of radio. He stated that cosmic rays were responsible for the radioactivity of radium, thorium, and uranium and predicted that other substances would be made radioactive by bombardment. He thus anticipated the basic principles of X-ray apparatus and the electron microscope. In his work with wireless controlled automata he anticipated radio-controlled rocket missiles.

Not surprisingly, he had one or two blind spots. He did not accept for many years that atomic fission would produce energy. He misunderstood the mechanism of vision; he believed that visual images perceived by the brain were returned to the retina of the eye, and might be amplified or projected. However, there was no mistaking his own extraordinary visionary faculty and the discoveries associated with it. In an article titled "Making Your Imagination Work For You," he wrote:

"During my boyhood I had suffered from a peculiar affliction due to the appearance of images, which were often accompanied by strong flashes of light. . . . Then I began to take mental excursions beyond the small world of my actual knowledge. Day and night, in imagination, I went on journeys—saw new places, cities, countries, and all the time I tried hard to make these imaginary things very sharp and clear in my mind.

"This I did constantly until I was 17, when my thoughts turned seriously to invention. Then, to my delight, I found I could visualize with the greatest facility. I needed no models, drawings, or experiments. I could picture them all in my head.

"Here, in brief, is my own method: After experiencing a desire to invent a particular thing, I may go on for months or years with the idea in the back of my head. Whenever I feel like it, I roam around in my imagination and think about the problem without any deliberate concentration. This is a period of incubation.

"There follows a period of direct effort. I choose carefully the possible solutions of the problem I am considering, and gradually center my mind on a narrowed field of investigation. Now, when I am deliberately thinking of the problem in its specific features, I may begin to feel that I am going to get the solution. And the wonderful thing is, that if I do feel this way, then I know I have really solved the problem and shall get what I am after.

"The feeling is as convincing to me as though I already had solved it. I have come to the conclusion that at this stage the actual solution is in my mind subconsciously, though it may be a long time before I am aware of it consciously.

"Before I put a sketch on paper, the whole idea is worked out mentally. In my mind I change the construction, make improvements, and even operate the device. Without ever having drawn a sketch I can give the measurements of all parts to workmen, and when completed all these parts will fit, just as certainly as though I had made the actual drawings. It is immaterial to me whether I run my machine in my mind or test it in my shop.

"The inventions I have conceived in this way have always worked. In 30 years there has not been a single exception. My first electric motor, the vacuum tube wireless light, my turbine engine and many other devices have all been developed in exactly this way."

Tesla's friend and biographer John J. O'Neill stated that Tesla "was unquestionably an abnormal individual, and of a type that does have what are known as 'psychic experiences.' He was emphatic in his denial that he ever had experiences of that sort; yet he has related incidents that clearly belong in the psychic category." According to O'Neill, Tesla was fearful that admitting to having psychic experiences might cause him to be misunderstood as supporting Spiritualism or theories that something operates in life other than matter and energy.

In his later years, Tesla suffered financial difficulties and was unable to construct some of his most ambitious inventions. He claimed he had discovered an inexhaustible source of energy that could be transmitted anywhere in the world without wires or loss of power. He correctly foresaw that at some future time "it will be possible for nations to fight without armies, ships, or guns by weapons far more terrible, to the destructive action and range of which there is virtually no limit." Tesla is credited with having discovered a protective radiation principle of the kind popularly termed "death ray."

In 1912 he refused the Nobel Prize because it was to be awarded jointly to himself and Thomas A. Edison; instead the award went to the Swedish scientist Gustav Dalen.

In an unpublished article entitled "Man's Greatest Achievement" (cited in O'Neill's biographical Prodigal Genius, 1968), Telsa writes:

"Long ago he [the human being] recognized that all perceptible matter comes from a primary substance, or tenuity beyond conception, filling all space, the Akasa or luminiferous ether, which is acted upon by the life-giving Prana or creative force, calling into existence, in never ending cycles, all things and phenomena. . ."

This is the language of Theosophy or Hindu metaphysics. Tesla's states of higher consciousness, achieved by intense concentration and a celibate life, resemble Hindu concepts of cosmic energy in the universe, aroused in the human body under the name of kundalini through yoga disciplines and meditation, resulting in expanded consciousness and access to an infinity of cosmic intelligence.

Tesla died in poverty in New York on January 7, 1943. Soon afterward, FBI operatives opened the safe in his room and took away papers reputedly containing details of a secret invention of possible value in warfare.

Sources:

O'Neill, John J. Prodigal Genius: The Life of Nikola Tesla. London: Neville Spearman, 1968. Reprint, London: Granada, 1980.

Peat, David. In Search of Nikola Tesla. Bath, England: Ashgrove Press, 1983.

Tesla, Nikola. "Making Your Imagination Work For You." American Magazine (April 1921).

Wilson, Colin, ed. Men of Mystery. London: W. H. Allen, 1977.

Tetford, William N. (1923–1988)

William N. Tetford, a psychologist and transcriber of the channeled work A Course in Miracles, was born in Chicago, Illinois, into a Christian Science family. In 1931, following his older sister's death, the family disassociated themselves from Christian Science and Tetford was raised from that time in a largely secular environment. Several years later he became ill with scarlet fever, and though he survived, he was bedridden for two years with the complications. Tutored during his recovery, once back in school he soon caught up with his classmates and graduated from high school with honors.

He attended DePauw University in Indiana, where he majored in psychology. He graduated in 1944, at the height of World War II (1939–45). Deferred from military action because of his medical record, he took a position at the University of Chicago supervising the buildings at which the atom bomb research was being conducted. The week after the detonation of the first bomb in Japan, understanding the full nature of the project, he resigned.

He returned to psychology by taking a course with Carl Rogers, then on his way to psychological fame with what was termed client-centered therapy, a new form of psychotherapy that allowed the analysis to arise from the patient's growing self-understanding rather than from the more common analysis offered by Freudian systems. He went on to complete his Ph.D. at the University of Chicago in 1949. He held several positions through the 1950s before becoming the director of the Psychology Department at Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center in New York City in 1958. Within a few weeks, another person with whom he was to be intimately related also joined the staff, Helen Schucman, who had just graduated from New York University.

Tetford and Schucman were very different personalities, and their relationship was sporadically filled with anger and hostility. However, in 1965, Tetford suggested that they work on their relationship and attempt to change it. He had been reading metaphysical literature from which he offered the discipline of meditation as a tool to assist them. They began meditating and Schucman began to receive a series of vivid images. Tetford encouraged her to keep a record of whatever she received. However, on October 21, 1965, she heard a voice say to her, "This is a course in miracles. Please take notes." Tetford encouraged her to continue to record what she heard. Schucman recorded what she heard in shorthand. She read it to Tetford, who turned it into typescript.

The result of their collaboration over the next seven years was A Course in Miracles (ACIM). During this period, Schucman frequently expressed trepidation over her channeling work, but Tetford continually calmed her fears and doubts. It was published in 1975. Tetford, a quiet, somewhat passive man, was uncomfortable being in the public eye and allowed others to operate out front on the dissemination of the books and their teachings. In 1978 he moved to Tiburon, California, where the Foundation for Inner Peace, the corporation assigned the task of publishing the Course, had relocated. There he lived a quiet existence using much of his time trying to make the teachings on self-forgiveness real in his life. In 1986, he moved to LaJolla, California, and resided there for the last two years of his life. In the years since his death, his essential role in bringing forth A Course in Miracles has been widely recognized.

Sources:

A Course in Miracles. 3 vols. New York: Foundation for Inner Peace, 1975.

Miller, D. Patrick. The Complete Story of the Course: The History, The People and the Controversies Behind A Course in Miracles. Berkeley, Calif.: Fearless Books, 1997.

Skutch, Judith. "A Course in Miracles, the Untold Story." Parts 1 & 2. New Realities 4, no. 1, 2 (August, September/October 1984): 17–27; 8–15, 78.

Wapnick, Kenneth. Absence of Felicity: The Story of Helen Schucman and Her Scribing of A Course in Miracles. Roscoe, N.Y.: Foundation for "A Course in Miracles," 1991.

Teutons

Little can be gleaned from the writings of classical authors on the subject, but manuscripts of the Middle Ages by such writers as Snorri Sturluson and Saemund Sigfússon (The Eddas) and Saxo Grammaticus, and such epics or pseudohistories as The Nibelungenlied, shed some light on Teutonic magic practice and beliefs.

From these writers one can arrive at several basic conclusions: (1) that magic with the Teutons was nonhierophantic, and was not the province of the priesthood, as with the Celtic Druids, for example; (2) that women were its chief conservators; and (3) that it principally resided in the study and elucidation of the runic script. In the same manner as in early Egypt it was part and parcel of the ability to decipher the hieroglyphic characters.

It seems that all kinds of people dabbled in the practice of magic, and, to a great extent, sorcery was principally the province of women. Perhaps only those who could read the runes—that is, those who could read at all—were able to undertake the study of the occult, and therefore the unlettered warrior too restless to study was barred from all participation in the subject.

Women in all ranks of life seem to have been addicted to the practice of sorcery, from the queen on the throne to the wise-woman or witch dwelling apart from the community. Thus the mother-in-law of Siegfried bewitches him by a draught, and scores of similar stories could be imagined.

Generally ancient Teutonic magic was not very high; it was greatly hampered by human considerations and much at the mercy of the human element on which it acted and the very human desires that called it forth. In many cases it was rendered useless merely by the cunning of the object upon which it was wreaked. It does not seem to have risen very much above the type of sorcery in vogue among primitive peoples in modern times. It is surprising, with all these weaknesses, how powerful a hold sorcery had upon the popular imagination, which was literally drenched with belief in the supernatural.

Runes

In its various forms—German rune, Anglo-Saxon run, Icelandic run—the word is derived from an old Low German word raunen (to cut or to carve), since the runes in ancient times were invariably carved instead of written. It later came to designate the characters themselves.

Comparatively few people were able to decipher the runes, and the elucidation was left to the curious, the ambitious among the females, and the leisured few in general, perhaps including priests and lawmen. Consequently the power to decipher runes was a mysterious gift venerated among ordinary people who believed that the ability to elucidate them meant the reader possessed magic powers. The possessors of this ability maximized it so the belief in their prowess would flourish. A certain amount of patience and natural ability were necessary for mastery of such an intricate script, and the tradition that they were connected with sorcery lingered long in some parts of Iceland.

In later times the word runes came to be applied to all the alphabetical systems employed by the Teutonic peoples before the introduction of Christianity. Their origin is obscure; some authorities deny that it is Teutonic and assert that the runes are merely a transformation or adaptation of Greek characters, others that they have a Phoenician or even cuneiform origin.

That they are of non-Teutonic origin is inferred from their strong resemblance to other scripts. It has also been argued that it was unlikely that they could have been invented by the Teutonic race given their state of organization and learning at the time the runes first came into general use.

Runes have been divided into three systems—English, German, and Scandinavian—but the difference between these is merely local. They were not employed in early times for literary purposes, but for inscriptions only. Runes were usually found on stone monuments, weapons, implements, and personal ornaments and furniture. In England, runic inscriptions are found in the north only, where Scandinavian influence was strongest.

The first symbols of the runic alphabet are for the letters f, ú, th, ó, r, and c. For this reason the order of the runic letters is not called an alphabet but a futhorc. The system is symbolic. Thus the first letter pictures the head and horns of an ox, and is called feoh after that animal; the second is called ur, the word for bull; the third, thoru (tree), then os (door); rad (saddle); and caen (torch). The runes were probably derived or evolved from a purely pictorial system in which the figures of the animals or objects stood for the letters of the alphabet.

Since runes were carved, some connection may be possible between the Anglo-Saxon secgan (to say), and the Latin word secare (to cut), especially since secret signatures were made by merely cutting a chip from a bark manuscript. The old meaning of the word spell was “thin chip or shaving.” The Roman historian Tacitus mentioned that in Teutonic divination, a rod cut from a fruit-bearing tree was cut into slips, and the slips, having marks on them, were thrown onto a white garment to be taken up with prayer to the gods and interpreted as they were taken. A special use of light cuttings for such fateful cross-readings, or “Virgilian lots,” may have given the word spells its particular association with the words of the magician.

Belief in Nature Spirits

Among the lesser figures of mythology who were believed to have direct contact with ancient Teutonic peoples and assist them, or were connected with them in the practice of magic, were the duergar, or dwarfs, trolls, undines, nixies, and other spirits. Belief in them was distinctly animistic. The people believed that dwarfs and trolls inhabited the recesses of the mountains, caves, and the underworld. Nixies and undines were said to dwell in the lakes, rivers, pools, and inlets of the sea. In general these were friendly to humans, but objected to more than occasional intercourse with them.

Although not of the class of supernatural beings who obeyed humans in answer to magical summonses, these, especially the dwarfs, often acted as instructors in the arts of magic. Many instances of this are found in tales and romances of early Teutonic origin.

The dwarfs were usually assisted by adventitious aids in their practice of magic, such as belts that endowed the wearer with strength (like that worn by the dwarf “Laurin”), shoes for swiftness (analogous to the seven-league boots of folk tale), caps of invisibility, and so forth.

Witchcraft

Witchcraft was much more in favor among the northern Teutons than it was in Germany, and this circumstance has been attributed to their proximity to the Finns, a race notorious for its propensities toward magic. In Norway, Orkney, and Shetland, the practice of sorcery seems to have been almost exclusively in the hands of Finnish women. There is little doubt that the Finns exercised upon the Teutons of Scandinavia the mythic influence of a conquered race; that is, they took full advantage of the terror inspired in their conquerors by an alien and unfamiliar religion and ritual in which magic was an integral element.

The principal activities of Teutonic witchcraft were the raising of storms, the selling of pieces of knotted rope (each knot representing a wind), divination and prophecy, and acquiring invisibility. Since the sea was the element of the people, it became the chief element of the witch of the northern Teutons. Thus in the saga of Frithjof, the two sea witches Heyde and Ham ride the storm and are sent by Helgi to raise the tempest that will drown Frithjof. They take the shapes of a bear and a storm-eagle. In the saga of Grettir the Strong, a witch-wife, Thurid, sends adrift a magic log that comes to Grettir's island. The log leads to his downfall.

In the north of Scotland, the Teutonic and Celtic systems of magic may be said to have met and fused, but not to have clashed, since their many points of resemblance outweighed their differences.

Animal transformation also played a considerable part in Teutonic magic and witchcraft. In early Germany the witch (hexe) seems to have also acquired the characteristics of a vampire.

Second Sight

The Teutons seem to have excelled in prophecy and divination; the practice was more widespread among the northern Teutons than the southern. Prophetic utterance was usually induced by ecstasy, but it was not the professional diviner alone who was capable of supernatural vision. Anyone under stress of excitement, and particularly if near death, might become fey (prophetic), and great attention was invariably paid to utterances made while the person was in this condition. (See also Holland and Germany)

Sources:

- Berger, H. A. Nordische Mythologie. Zittau & Leipzig, Germany, 1834.
- Bugge, E. S. The Home of the Eddic Poems. London: David Nutt, 1899.
- Elliott, Ralph W. Runes: An Introduction. New York: Barnes & Noble, 1971. Reprint, Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Golther, W. Religion und Mythos der Germanen. Leipzig, 1909.
- Grimm, Jacob. Teutonic Mythology. 4 vols. London: G. Bell, 1880–1919.
- Kauffmann, D. F. Northern Mythology. London: Dent, 1903.
- Meyer, E. H. Germanische Mythologie. Berlin, 1891.
- Stephens, George. The Old-Northern Runic Monuments of Scandinavia and England. 2 vols. London, 1866–68.
- . Prof. S. Bugge's "Studies on Northern Mythology" Shortly Examined. London: Williams & Norgate, 1883.
- Wilken, Ernst. Die Prosaische Edda. Paderhorn, Germany, 1878.

Texas Monthly UFO Report

A former periodical concerned with the technical aspect of UFO investigation for individuals with some scientific background. It also included reports on parapsychological research. It was published at the Texas Scientific Research Center for UFO Studies in Waco.

Thackeray, William Makepeace (1811–1863)

This noted novelist was introduced to the phenomena of Spiritualism during a lecture tour in the United States, when he attended a séance with the famous medium D. D. Home. He also observed the rapping phenomena of Ann (Leah) Underhill, one of the Fox sisters. His sympathetic reaction was described in Underhill's book The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism (1885). This experience and subsequent observations with Home led Thackeray to endorse the sincerity of the anonymous account (written by Robert Bell) "Stranger Than Fiction." It was published in the Cornhill Magazine and edited by Thackeray. He was severely criticized for this apparent endorsement of Spiritualism.

However, it seems that, in fact, his attitude was somewhat ambiguous. In a letter to his friends Mrs. Thomas F. Elliot and Kate Perry, he states:

"Yes I have seen the Rappers, and the table moving, and heard the Spirits. The moving of tables is undoubted, the noises and knocks (continual raps following the person who has the gift of eliciting them) some natural unexplained phenomenon but the Spirits is of course dire humbug and imposture. They try to guess at something and hit or miss as may be. 1000 misses for one hit—It is a most dreary and foolish superstition. . . . But the physical manifestations are undoubted—Tables moving lifted up and men even lifted off the ground to the ceiling so some are ready to swear—but though I do not believe in this until I see it; I wouldn't have believed in a table turning 3 weeks ago—and that I have seen and swear to. . . ."

Both Thackeray and his friend Charles Dickens had the highest regard for John Elliotson, a pioneer of mesmerism who was later converted to Spiritualism after initial skepticism. Thackeray based his character "Dr. Goodenough" in Pendennis and The Newcomes on Elliotson, and dedicated the former novel to him.

Sources:

- Goldfarb, Russell M., and Clare R. Goldfarb. Spiritualism and Nineteenth-Century Letters. New Brunswick, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 1978.
- Underhill, A. Leah. The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism. New York: Thomas R. Knox, 1885. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Thanatology

The formal study of the nature of death and dying. Prior to the demarcation of thanatology as a new area of specialization, the study of various aspects of death had been included in psychology and parapsychology. Parapsychological research has concentrated on three human experiences that seem to be part of the death experience: 1) the sensation of floating out of the body; 2) feelings of peace or wholeness; and 3) meetings with someone who has died previously. Studies of what today is called the near-death experience have been made by psychical researchers since the nineteenth century, often under the label death-bed experiences.

Significant in defining the new field of thanatology has been the work of physician Elisabeth Kübler-Ross, author of the book On Death and Dying (1970), whose work began with a concern for the grief process she frequently encountered in counseling with dying patients. Her continued interest led her to questions of survival of death, traditionally an area of psychical studies. She is the founder of Shanti Nilaya, a healing and growth center in Virginia. Among the leading centers focused on research in thanatology are the International Institute for the Study of Death in Florida and the International Association for Near-Death Studies.

Sources:

- Kastenbaum, Robert, ed. Between Life and Death. New York: Springer Publishing, 1979.
- Kübler-Ross, Elisabeth. On Death and Dying. New York: Macmillan Co., 1969.
- . To Live Until We Say Goodbye. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1978.
- Osis, Karlis, and Erlendur Haraldsson. At the Hour of Death. New York: Avon Books, 1977.
- Ring, Kenneth. Heading Toward Omega—In Search of the Meaning of the Near-Death Experience. New York: William Morrow, 1984.

Thau Weza

Burmese wizards, literally "wire-man who works in wire." (See also Myanmar)

Thayer, M(ary) B(aker) (ca. 1887)

Well-known professional apport and slate-writing medium of Boston, who chiefly produced flowers and fruits, sometimes live birds. In the Banner of Light (1875) there is an account of a canary apport in answer to a mental request. In the report of the Seybert Commission, a slate-writing séance attended by one Professor Fullerton was considered a failure. There was a description of another séance, at which 30 people were present. The Seybert Commission was represented by Drs. Koenig and Leidy.

According to the Leidy's account:

"... sounds were heard of objects dropping on the table, and from time to time matches were lit and exposed, strewn before the company, cut plants and flowers. These were all of the kind sold at this season by the florists, consisting of a pine bough, fronds of ferns, roses, pinks, tulips, lilies, callas and smilax. At one time there fell on the table a heavy body, which proved to be a living terrapin, at another time there appeared a pigeon which flew about the room. . . . The proprietor of the house declared that the flowers and the other objects brought to view in the séance were not previously in the room, and their appearance could not be explained unless through spiritual agency.”

In a footnote to his translation of Adolphe d'Assier's book Posthumous Humanity (1887) Henry S. Olcott writes:

“While she [Mrs. Thayer] was enclosed in a large bag, sealed closely at her neck, and all possibility of trickery guarded against, I have seen a long table, quite covered with vines, plants and flowers, dropped out of space. I marked a certain leaf of a rare plant in the garden without her knowledge, and the same evening, in response to my mental request, it dropped upon the back of my hand, with which I was at the moment holding the medium's two hands. The above occurred in the dark; but once a tree branch was brought me in full daylight, through her mediumship, in the house of a gentleman whose guest I was.”

Due to the nature of her work with apports and slate writing and the fact that her only support came from people such as Olcott, who was never known for his critical approach to such phenomena, Thayer is considered likely to be one of the fraudulent mediums of the era.

Thee Satanic Church

Thee Satanic Church was a small Satanic organization in Chicago during the 1970s. It was formed in 1974 as a break-away group of Thee Satanic Church of the Nethilum Rite. Evelyn Paglini, one of the original founders of the Nethilum Rite group, established Thee Satanic Church, opened an occult book store in Chicago, and began the periodical Psychic Standard. The group gradually dropped their Satanic elements, the Psychic Standard ceased publication in 1980, and shortly afterwards the church was dissolved.

Thee Satanic Church of the Nethilum Rite

Thee Satanic Church of the Nethilum Rite was founded around 1970 in Chicago by High Priest Terry Taylor and Evelyn Paglini and went public in 1971. The church opposed the Satanism of Anton S. LaVey and the Church of Satan, founded in 1966, contending that LaVey did not believe in the actual existence of Satan. In contrast, the Nethilum Rite church taught that Satan was the epitome of God's creation who possessed all of the power and knowledge of the universe. Members of the church sought to acquire as much of Satan's knowledge and power as possible. Magical rituals and psychic development were the primary tools for accessing Satan.

By 1973 the church claimed 538 members. It split in 1974 when Paglini led a group out of the church and founded a rival organization, Thee Satanic Church. The Nethilum Rite church ceased to exist in the mid-1970s.

Thee Temple ov Psychick Youth (TOPY)

Thee Temple ov Psychick Youth (TOPY) grew out of the magical philosophical thought of rock musician Genesis P. Orridge, formerly with the band Throbbing Gristle. He wished to explore the possibilities of human potential and saw performance art as a fruitful means for his work. In 1981 he started a new band, Psychic TV, and TOPY. He soon reached the conclusion that humans possessed an infinite potential and were limited only by the restraints imposed upon it. That idea brought him close to one of the major tenets espoused in The Book of the Law, the Thelemic magical text that had been received by Aleister Crowley in 1904, “The word of sin is restriction.” Orridge also began to identify what he was doing with magic.

Orridge identified the human problem as the narrowing of choice by society and the movement of most people into a sleep-like state in which they lose awareness of their vast potential. He believes that religion and politics are vast systems that operate to put people to sleep. Temple members are those who have begun to awaken to their potential and are attempting to explore it even as they become more aware. A first step is coming to grips with one's mortality. Members also seek to discover their True Will (a basic concept of Thelemic Magic) and generally accept the basic Thelemic notion, “Do What thou Will shall be the whole of the Law.” TOPY has generally prescribed an intuitive approach to life rather than the following of rules, laws, and regulations.

Integral to living intuitively is sexual expression, which should follow one's wants and desires rather than social mores, according to TOPY. Correlatively, sexual magic is the single best tool for raising the energy need for liberation. TOPY has matured into a ritual magic group that espouses all of the traditional teachings of magic, though in a most modern fashion. Unlike traditional magical orders, there is no initiatory grading system, hierarchical organization, or secret rituals. TOPY is organized as a fellowship of equals with various complementary talents and abilities.

Its egalitarian stance and the constant striving of members to expand their individual potential has contributed to TOPY's instability as an organization. On several occasions it has been reported defunct. However, at least in a minimal way, it has survived. The TOPY North American headquarters is at P.O. Box 1212521, Tacoma, WA 98411-1521. It has a website at <http://www.uncarved.demon.co.uk/topy/htm>.

Sources:

Burton, Tina. “Intuitive Magick?”: A Study of the Temple ov Psychick Youth, 1981–1989. Unpublished paper in the American Religions Collection, Davidson Library, University of California—Santa Barbara, 1989.

An Introduction to Thee Temple ov Psychick Youth. Brighton, Sussex, UK: Temple Press Limited, 1989.

Theobald, Morell (1828–1908)

British Spiritualist and author of Spiritualism at Home (1884) and Spirit Workers in the Home Circle (1887), the latter describing a series of curious psychic manifestations in his home that lasted for many years.

Some of Theobald's family members reportedly possessed psychic gifts—his grandfather and father saw spirits. His own friendship with the author William Howitt and family initiated him into writing and mediumship in 1855. The psychic ties were further strengthened by intimacy with Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Everitt, and the two families held séances together for many years. Not surprisingly, the loss of three children increased the receptivity of the Theobald family. A sitting following their death led to rapping phenomena, which, in the presence of three living children, developed into movements of a heavy dining table and, eventually, intelligent communications.

The book by Theobald's sister titled Heaven Opened; or, Messages for the Bereaved from Their Little Ones in Glory (1870) contains records of these experiences. The contact with the beyond was, at this period, threefold—the elder boy fell into trance and was controlled by the deceased children and others; Theobald and his wife wrote automatically; and Mrs. Everitt produced direct voice manifestations for the family.

The strange phenomena of later years were first heralded during a joint excursion with the Everitt family to Cornwall in 1871. To quote from Spirit Workers in the Home Circle:

“As we sat on woodland slopes we had the curious sensations of rapping beneath the solid earth on which we sat. If we took a basket of sandwiches, that was moved about by our sportive invisible friends. At an inn where we stayed with our hamper of provisions we expected the waiter would be scared, for raps resounded on the window, walls and wainscoted panelling, while our hamper was bodily taken off by invisible hands into one corner of the room and there opened and partly unpacked for us.”

In 1882 Mary, a new cook, was discovered to have clairvoyant powers. When Tom, the youngest son, complained that his hair was being pulled by invisible beings, Mary saw and described the phantom visitors. Because of her gifts Mary was soon advanced to the standing of a trusted friend of the family. After the maid left, Nellie Theobald and Mary occupied the same bedroom and looked jointly after the household duties.

Morell Theobald employed many tests to verify strange occurrences in the house; he often got up in the middle of the night in an attempt to catch the perpetrators in the act, but he was unsuccessful.

For some time, Theobald resisted every request of competent psychic investigators to take Mary to their own rooms for investigation. In this resolve he was strangely strengthened by spirit advice in direct writing. The limited investigation of Frank Podmore and Frank S. Hughes of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR) was finally allowed to continue in the Theobald home in 1884, and cast considerable doubt on many of the marvelous occurrences, especially on the spirit writings, which appeared in every conceivable place—on the ceiling, on the walls, on locked drawers and receptacles, on marked papers, and came in many languages: old French, Latin, Hebrew, Greek, and Raratongan, among others.

The SPR investigators were never able to witness the actual performance of the various phenomena and found many circumstances that suggested human origin in the spirit writings. The letters were regularly formed and of normal size when they appeared in places accessible to persons of ordinary stature but became straggling and irregular on higher places as if they had been written with a broomstick with a pencil attached. The locked secretaire in which writing was produced was not fraud-proof. A piece of paper could easily be slipped in through a crack.

The investigators also contended that the small characters in certain pieces of spirit writing could have been written by anybody with a sharp pencil and patient practice. They found many crude mistakes in the Latin and Greek scripts and discovered finally the facts contained in the communications coming from “Saadi” had been published in an article, “Persian Poetry in the Past” in Part 6 of Chamber’s Repository of Instructive and Amusing Tracts. It also appeared that “Wamik,” who claimed to have been “Saadi’s” friend and contemporary poet, was a fictitious entity, the imaginary hero of the poem to which he subscribed his name. In the end it appeared that Mary was the mundane source of much if not all of the phenomena.

The findings of the two investigators were strongly criticized in Light (January, February, and March 1885). The editor concluded that the investigation was incomplete and hasty and that fraud could not explain the extraordinarily varied phenomena of the Theobald house.

Morell Theobald admitted that “many of the writings . . . are comparatively feeble compositions” and that he had found the source of the most puzzling pieces of direct writing (i.e., the Lord’s Prayer as used in the twelfth century and the Rarantongan Script) in a volume he had given Mary as a Christmas present. He refused to seek a normal explanation to the diversified styles of handwriting, even when the scripts were handed out by Mary herself from the cabinet in which she sat to develop materializations.

There was no better evidence for deep-rooted unshakable faith than Theobald’s account of the test undertaken on behalf of the SPR in 1886. He was handed two sealed envelopes by E. T. Bennett, assistant secretary of the SPR, in order to have the hidden contents deciphered by spirit agency. After some weeks, writing was obtained on the outside of the envelopes that proved to be a fairly good counterpart of the inside. Theobald was then handed a third envelope, which was in his careful keeping for some months, according to him “no one in the house besides myself and my wife knowing of its existence.”

Again the contents were revealed, but instead of triumph, a very painful accusation was made against the Theobald family: the SPR claimed that all the envelopes had been opened and gummed up again. To make matters worse, the handwriting on all three was identical in character with the well-known scripts.

Theobald believed mischievous and fraudulent spirits had spoiled the tests. He said that the family had broken the essential condition of trust and thereby had opened the door to such evil influences. This conviction of Theobald’s was apparently borne out by psychometric readings of the envelopes through a clairvoyant and by many mediumistic communications. One of the readings was obtained through the mediumship of William Eglinton, who was on more than one occasion caught in mediumistic fraud. It is a very legitimate inference that the atmosphere of blind faith that pervaded the Theobald family had allowed serious deception.

Sources:

“Alleged ‘Physical Phenomena’ in the Family of Morell Theobald.” Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 2 (1886).

Podmore, Frank. Modern Spiritualism. London: Methuen, 1902. Reprinted as Mediums of the Nineteenth Century. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

“Theologus”

One of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses, “Theologus” was said to be St. John the Divine.

Theomancy

The aspect of the study of the Kabala that deals with the mysteries of divine majesty and seeks the sacred names. He (and only males over 40 could engage in this study) who possessed this knowledge knew the future, commanded nature, had full power over angels and demons, and could perform miracles.

The Hasidic masters (zaddik) claimed that it was by this means that Moses performed so many marvels; that Joshua was able to stop the sun; that Elias caused fire to fall from heaven and raised the dead; that Daniel closed the mouths of the lions; and that the three youths were not consumed in the furnace. Even today, the leaders of some Hasidic groups are reputed to have mastered at least part of this material and are known for their miracle-working abilities.

Sources:

Dresner, Samuel H. The Zaddik. New York: Schrocken Books, 1974.

Rabinowitz, H. A Guide to Hassidism. New York: Thomas Yoseloff, 1960.

Theon, M(ax) (1850–1927)

Max Theon, the enigmatic occultist whose work initiated the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor in the mid-1880s, was born Louis Maximilian Bimstein into a Jewish family in Poland. He appears to have first received knowledge of the occult world in the thriving Hassidic communities of his homeland. As a young man he began to travel the world, but in 1873 settled in England at Saint John’s Wood, in the northern section of London. He made his living as a psychic healer and advertised himself in the Spiritual periodicals as able to cure cholera.

In 1882 he began to work with a young Scotsman named Thomas Dalton (1855–1895), later known under his pseudonym, Thomas H. Burgoyne. In their three years’ association, he awakened Burgoyne’s spiritual vision and put him in touch with some preternatural entities, the adepts who were acknowledged as the Interior Circle, the real founders of the Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor. The brotherhood's existence was announced in 1884 in a small advertisement placed in the back of an English translation of the Divine Pymander of Hermes Mercurus Trismegistus. It invited contact with Bimstein under his magical name, Theon. Theon was named Grand Master of the Exterior Circle, the human agents who carried out the instructions of the Interior Circle.

Within a short time Theon retired from any active involvement with the brotherhood, which he left to the care of Burgoyne and the Rev. William Alexander Ayton. He married a medium, Mary Christine Woodroffe Ware. Ware was the founder of the Universal Philosophical Society in London, at which she offered Spiritualist lectures. In 1886 Theon, along with his wife and secretary, Augusta Rolfe, moved to Paris and then in 1888 to Algiers.

His activities in the 1890s are largely unknown, though he probably continued to support himself as a healer and worked with his new wife in perfecting her mediumship. In 1899 he surfaced to write for the Journal du Magnétisme et de la Psychologie against the philosophy of the French Spiritists led by Allan Kardec.

Around the turn of the century Theon reappeared in Tlemcen, Algeria, and in 1901 began to issue a magazine, Cosmic Philosophy, whose content seems to have been derived from material channeled by Madame Theon. It ceased publication shortly after her death in 1908. In Algeria he also took students, among whom was Mira Alfassa (1878–1973), who as Mira Richard Ghose (1872–1950), the famed Indian spiritual teacher. Known as “The Mother,” she ran the Aurobindo Ashram for many years.

Theon passed away in March of 1927 in Algiers.

Sources:

Godwin, Joscelyn. The Theosophical Enlightenment. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1994.

———, Christian Chanel, and John P. Deveney. The Hermetic Brotherhood of Luxor: Initiatic and Historical Documents of an Order of Practical Occultism. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1995.

Theon, Max. La Tradition Cosmique. 6 vols. Paris: Bibliothèque Chacornac/Publicationes Cosmiques, 1903–20.

“Theophilus”

One of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses, “Theophilus” was said to be St. John the Apostle.

Theosophical History (Journal)

A quarterly journal founded by Leslie Price in January 1985 that reports on the historical study of the expansive theosophical movement, including individuals and impulses associated with but not a part of the Theosophical Society. The journal has an independent stance and is neutral to various expressions of Theosophy. It seeks to promote the common historical enterprise by Theosophists and non-Theosophists interested in the history of the occult.

The journal seeks to aid historical assessment of such pioneers of Theosophy as Alice Bailey, Annie Besant, William Quan Judge, J. Krishnamurti, C. W. Leadbeater, and G. R. S. Mead. By arrangement with the Society for Psychical Research, London, early issues of the journal carried items from its files on theosophical phenomena.

In 1989 funding became a problem after the death of its prime donor and subsequent difficulties with the Theosophical Publishing House, there was a brief lapse of publication in 1989 until James Santucci, a professor at California State University in Fullerton, California, commenced publication with the January 1990 issue. Santucci built a new editorial board (which includes Price) and continued publication with the same independent stance and high standards as Price originally envisioned.

Theosophical History may be ordered from Dr. James Santucci, Department of Comparative Religion, P.O. Box 6868, California State University, Fullerton, CA 92834-6868. Website: <http://idt.net/~pdeveney/>.

Theosophical Society

The major modern organization advocating gnostic-esoteric teachings. The Theosophical Society was founded in New York in 1875 by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, Henry Steel Olcott, William Quan Judge, and others. It grew out of interest in the occult generated previously by the magnetist movement and especially Spiritualism, in which both Blavatsky and Olcott had participated. The society proposed a different direction, including attention to a distinct philosophical stance drawn from Eastern teachings.

Both Blavatsky and Olcott were closely concerned with Spiritualist investigations, and they met at the house of the Eddy brothers in Vermont. They were also concerned in the claimed phenomena of the mediums Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Holmes of Philadelphia, who were accused of cheating. The Holmes partnership involved the alleged manifestation of the spirits “Katie King” and “John King,” associated with the British medium Florence Cook. Blavatsky eventually disowned the Holmes phenomena, but endorsed the reality of the spirit “John King.”

In May 1875 Blavatsky and Olcott formed the Miracle Club, which offered an alternative to prevailing scientific materialism, but the organization languished. Soon Olcott began to receive messages through Blavatsky from a mysterious “Brotherhood of Luxor,” prototypes of the famous Mahatma letters of later years. These messages claimed the support of hidden masters of wisdom in the spreading of truth.

In November 1875 the Theosophical Society was founded with Olcott as president, Blavatsky as corresponding secretary, and Judge (a lawyer) as counsel. There were approximately 20 original members. The term “theosophy” was proposed by Charles Sotheran, a well-known bibliophile and editor of the American Bibliopolist. The preamble to the society's bylaws states:

“The Title of the Theosophical Society explains the objects and desires of its founder: they ‘seek to obtain knowledge of the nature and attributes of the Supreme Power, and of the higher spirits by the aid of physical processes.’ In other words, they hope, that by going deeper than modern science has hitherto done, into the esoteric philosophies of ancient times, they may be enabled to obtain, for themselves and other investigators, proof of the existence of an ‘Unseen Universe,’ the nature of its inhabitants if such there be, and the laws which govern them and their relations with mankind. Whatever may be the private opinions of its members, the society has no dogmas to enforce, no creed to disseminate. It is formed neither as a Spiritualist schism, nor to serve as the foe or friend of any sectarian or philosophic body. Its only axiom is the omnipotence of truth, its only creed a profession of unqualified devotion to its discovery and propaganda. In considering the qualifications of applicants for membership, it knows neither race, sex, color, country nor creed.”

The stated objects of the society were “to collect and diffuse a knowledge of the laws which govern the universe.” To the society, these laws involved phenomena of a miraculous kind as claimed in the history of occultism, Rosicrucians, and other secret orders.

This preoccupation with the miraculous, which has also been the popular focal point in the establishment of great world religions, proved to be the strength as well as the weakness of the society. Over the next two years, there was a shortage of unusual phenomena and the society seemed doomed to failure, many members dropping out.

Meanwhile, Blavatsky was preparing her book Isis Unveiled, a compilation and survey of esoteric religious and occult traditions through the ages. This book, together with the amalgamation of the Theosophical Society with the Arya Samaj of Swami Dayananda Saraswati in 1878, stimulated new interest in the society.

In 1879 Blavatsky and Olcott toured India, establishing new contacts and developing an aura of the mystic East. India was traditionally associated with the supernatural feats of yogis and the esoteric wisdom of the Vedas and Upanishads. Although Swami Dayananda proved to be something of a disappointment, due to being a social reformer rather than a repository of the prized miraculous feats of yoga, extraordinary events surrounded Blavatsky over the next few years in India and reports on them attracted widespread support for the Theosophical Society.

Olcott's tour of Ceylon and acceptance of Buddhism helped to solidify the society's image as a unifying principle for all religions, though it also succeeded in exciting opposition from Christian missionaries who did not believe that religions could or should be unified.

During 1880–82 there were many letters purportedly from the mysterious Mahatmas, or Masters of Wisdom, governing the development of the society, which established headquarters at Adyar, Madras. Although the marvels associated with Blavatsky brought new and important supporters for the society, they also excited opposition and accusations of fraud, even from Swami Dayananda, who publicly repudiated Blavatsky and the society in April 1882.

Through the years the Theosophical Society suffered from various dissensions and schisms. Most notable was the controversy over the so-called Mahatma letters, which Blavatsky claimed were supernaturally produced messages from Masters or adepts. Accusations from Christian missionaries in India that these letters were fraudulent began in 1884; in the same year Richard Hodgson of the Society for Psychical Research, Britain, went to the headquarters of the Theosophical Society at Adyar, Madras, to conduct an on-the-spot investigation.

He reported the discovery of a shrine with a false back, used with the connivance of Madame Coulomb, an employee of the society, as a fake mailbox for the letters. The confession of fraud by Coulomb was dismissed by loyal members of the society as part of a Christian plot to discredit Blavatsky and the society. Coulomb's disclosure of the different methods by which the "miracles" were produced and Hodgson's own discovery of various fraudulent events proved more conclusive to most.

Blavatsky left India and settled in England, leaving the society in Olcott's hands. There she drew a group of students, and an internal controversy arose in the society over the establishment of an esoteric section for the study of arcane doctrines and practices. Meanwhile, Blavatsky worked on her massive presentation of theosophical teachings, which finally appeared as The Secret Doctrine.

Meanwhile, following the transfer of international headquarters to India, Judge had organized and was leading the American section. After Blavatsky's death in 1891, disputes arose over the production of further Mahatma letters by Judge. These letters supported his claim to take charge of the esoteric section, which Blavatsky had bequeathed to newcomer Annie Besant.

While there was a temporary agreement for Besant and Judge to share leadership, tension between Judge and the society leadership outside of the United States continued; in 1895–96 he led the great majority of the American lodges in the establishment of the Theosophical Society in America as a separate entity. Judge died a short time later and E. T. Hargrove was elected president of the Theosophical Society in America. But like Blavatsky, Judge had found a talented protégé, and Katherine Tingley's abilities were recognized by the membership and she became president of the American society—a post she would hold for the rest of her life. She led in the establishment of a Theosophical community at Point Loma, San Diego, California.

Meanwhile, Annie Besant succeeded Olcott (d. 1907) as president of the international Theosophical Society. A capable orator and administrator, she helped the society and built it into a worldwide organization. While the society was hindered by the scandals attached to Blavatsky, Besant attempted to put that history in the past. However, one of her colleagues, Charles Webster Leadbeater who impressed Besant as one possessed of occult abilities, was involved in several scandals that involved some young boys. Eventually he was exiled from India to Australia, though not before he and Besant had produced some of the standard theosophical texts. Leadbeater cost the society the considerable support of the scholar G. R. S. Mead and some 700 other members in England who left in 1908 and established a rival organization.

Besant adopted, with the aid of Leadbeater, a young Brahmin boy named Jiddu Krishnamurti, who they claimed would be the vehicle through whom the future "World Teacher" would manifest. After World War I, as Krishnamurti matured, Besant promoted him and took him on speaking tours around the world. The society's membership peaked in response to his presence and both Besant and the members were devastated in 1929 when he resigned and renounced the role she had assigned him. Krishnamurti went on to become an independent teacher in his own right with a considerable following.

Theosophy's teachings had been given to Blavatsky by a group of exalted masters. Following her death, various people, such as Leadbeater, also claimed to be in spiritual contact. One who made such claims was Alice A. Bailey, a member living in southern California. She claimed that she was serving as the amanuensis of Djual Khul, usually called the Tibetan. Her claims eventually led to her separation from the society and the establishment in the 1920s of another offshoot of Theosophy—the Arcane School.

In spite of its controversial background, the Theosophical Society itself has had a considerable influence on the spiritual and intellectual life of many individuals in India, Europe, and the United States. Much of the power of the Irish literary renaissance of William Butler Yeats and AE (George Russell) stems from their association with Theosophy, which also exercised a powerful influence on European occultism.

Perhaps its greatest contribution came during the presidency of Besant, when Theosophy provided the people of India with a feeling of pride in their own cultural and spiritual heritage and participated in the growing wave of nationalism that eventually resulted in the independence of India. Under the auspices of the Theosophical Society, many important Hindu scriptures were translated and published and the library at Adyar contains many rare manuscripts preserved by the society.

The Theosophical Society, with its international headquarters in Adyar, Madras, India, is today a worldwide body perpetuating the basic perspective and teachings of ancient Gnosticism, as promoted by Blavatsky in the 1880s and 1890s. While the society is a significant body in its own right, its influence has been extended through the hundreds of organizations that have taken the basic theosophical worldview and built variations upon it. Theosophy led directly to the founding of the Liberal Catholic Church, the Anthroposophical Society, the Alice Bailey movement, and the I Am Movement. Almost a hundred different organizations, some of which rival the parent Theosophical Society in size, have emerged from these offshoots. Less directly attached to Theosophy, but owing much to its initial impulse, is the modern magical revival whose initial major organizational expression was the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, but which has found contemporary expression in the OTO and the popular neo-pagan witchcraft movement. The single most popular expression of Theosophy has been the

New Age movement of the 1980s, which brought literally millions of people into esoteric studies.

The main theosophical bodies, i.e., those that have a specifically theosophical heritage, are the Theosophical Society (with international lodges and headquarters at Adyar, Madras, India); the Theosophical Society, American Branch (with international headquarters at Altadena, California); and the United Lodge of Theosophists (headquarters in Los Angeles, California). The American affiliate of the international society headquartered in Adyar is the Theosophical Society in America, with headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois on an estate called Olcott; the British affiliate is the Theosophical Society at 50 Gloucester Pl., London, W1H 3HJ, England.

Sources:

Besant, Annie. The Theosophical Society and H. P. Blavatsky. London, 1891.

Campbell, Bruce F. A History of the Theosophical Movement. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

Christian Literature Society. Theosophy Exposed; or, Mrs. Besant and Her Guru: Appeal to Educated Hindus. Madras, India: SPCK Press, 1893.

Coulomb, Madame E. Some Account of My Intercourse with Madame Blavatsky from 1872 to 1884. London: Elliot Stock, 1885.

Ellwood, Robert. Theosophy. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1986.

Gomes, Michael. Theosophy in the Nineteenth Century: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.

Hare, H. E., and W. L. Hare. Who Wrote the Mahatma Letters? London: Williams & Norgate, 1936.

Harrison, Vernon. H. P. Blavatsky and the SPR. Pasadena, Calif.: Theosophical University Press, 1997.

Hodgson, Richard. "Personal Investigations, in India, of Theosophical Phenomena." Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research 3 (1885); Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 1–2 (1884–1886).

Johnson, Paul. In Search of the Masters: Behind the Occult Myth. South Boston: The Author, 1990.

Kingsland, William. The Real H. P. Blavatsky. London: John M. Watkins, 1928.

Olcott, H. S. Old Diary Leaves. 6 vols. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1895–1910.

Ransom, Josephine. A Short History of the Theosophical Society. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1938.

Ryan, Charles J. H. P. Blavatsky and the Theosophical Movement. Pasadena, Calif.: Theosophical University Press, 1975.

Solovyoff, V. S. A Modern Priestess of Isis. London: Longmans, Green, 1895.

Symonds, John. Madame Blavatsky, Medium and Magician. London: Odhams Press, 1958.

Waterman, Adlai E. [Walter A. Carrithers]. Obituary: The "Hodgson Report" on Madame Blavatsky, 1895–1960; Re-examination Discredits the Major Charges Against H. P. Blavatsky. Adyar, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing House, 1963.

Williams, Gertrude Marvin. Priestess of the Occult: Madame Blavatsky. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1946.

Theosophical Society in America

The American affiliate society of the international Theosophical Society, which is headquartered in Adyar, Madras, India. It continues the tradition of Theosophy established in 1875 in New York. The American branch was organized in 1886 but became separate from the international movement in 1895–96. The few American lodges still loyal to the international headquarters in Adyar reorganized and eventually became the dominant segment of the society in the United States.

The society is headquartered in Wheaton, Illinois, where it maintains a library of more than 20,000 volumes and publishes books through the Theosophical Publishing House. It issues a magazine, Quest. Headquarters are located at 1926 N. Main St.,

Wheaton, IL 60187. The American branch of the Esoteric Section is headquartered in a small theosophical community in Ojai, California. The complex also houses a large library as well as an educational facility known as the Krotona Institute. Theosophical literature is distributed through Quest bookstores, outlets being located in several cities, including Wheaton and Ojai.

Theosophical Society of Agrippa

The famous occultist and alchemist Agrippa (1486–1535) established in Paris and other centers a secret theosophical society, the rites of admission to which were of a peculiar character.

Agrippa visited London in 1510, and there he established a branch of the order in that city.

Theosophy

Term derived from the Greek theos (god) and sophia (wisdom), denoting a philosophical-religious system that claims absolute knowledge of the existence and nature of the deity, and is not to be confused with the later system evolved by the founders of the Theosophical Society.

This knowledge, or theosophy, it is claimed, may be obtained by special individual revelation, or through the operation of some higher faculty. It is the transcendent character of the godhead of theosophical systems that differentiates them from the philosophical systems of the speculative or absolute type, which usually proceed deductively from the idea of God. God is conceived in theosophical systems as the transcendent source of being, from whom human beings in their natural state are far removed.

Theosophy is practically another name for speculative mysticism. Thus Kabalistic and Neoplatonic conceptions of divine emanations are in reality theosophical, as are the mystical systems of Jakob Boehme and Baader.

Theosophy has also come to signify the tenets and teachings of the founders of the Theosophical Society. This society was founded in the United States in 1875 by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, Col. H. S. Olcott, and others. Its objectives were to establish a nucleus of the Universal Brotherhood of Humanity, to promote the study of comparative religion and philosophy, and to investigate the mystic powers of life and matter.

The conception of the Universal Brotherhood was based upon the oriental idea of one life—that ultimate oneness underlies all diversity, whether inward or outward. The study of comparative religion had materialized into a definite system of belief, the bounds of which were dogmatically fixed. It was set forth in the theosophical system that all the great religions of the world originated from one supreme source and that they are merely expressions of a central "Wisdom Religion" vouchsafed to various races of the earth in such a manner as is best suited to time and geographical circumstances.

Underlying these was a secret doctrine or esoteric teaching, which, it was stated, had been the possession for ages of certain Mahatmas, or adepts, in mysticism and occultism. With these Blavatsky claimed to be in direct communication, and she herself manifested occult phenomena, producing the ringing of astral bells, and so forth.

On several occasions these effects were unmasked as fraudulent, but many people believed that Blavatsky was one of those rare personalities who possess great natural psychic powers, which at times failing her, she augmented by fraudulent methods.

The evidence for the existence of the Great White Brotherhood of Mahatmas, the existence of which she asserted, was unfortunately somewhat inconclusive. It rested, for the most part, on the statements of Blavatsky, Olcott, A. P. Sinnett, Charles W. Leadbeater, and other committed Theosophists, who claimed to have seen or communicated with them.

With every desire to do justice to these upholders of the theosophical argument, it is necessary to point out that in occult, or pseudo-occult experiences, the question of hallucination enters very largely, and the ecstatic condition may be responsible for subjective appearances that seem real enough to the visionary.

Again, the written communications of the Mahatmas—the Mahatma letters—give rise to much doubt. One Mahatma employed the American system of spelling, and this was accounted for by the circumstance that his English had been sophisticated by reading American books. A study of these letters leaves little doubt that their style, script, and purpose were nearer to Blavatsky than to Tibetan or Himalayan hermitages.

The revelations of Blavatsky in her books Isis Unveiled (2 vols., 1877) and The Secret Doctrine (2 vols., 1888–97) are an extraordinary mixture of Buddhistic, Brahministic, and Kabalistic matter with a basic theme of religious unity and the persistence of occult and miraculous phenomena throughout history.

The Theosophical Society has numbered among its members many persons of high ability, whose statement and exegesis of their faith has placed it upon a much higher level and more definite foundation.

The system was constructed in a manner akin to genius, and evolved on highly intricate lines. It was, to a great extent, pieced together after the death of the original founder of the society, on which event a schism occurred in the Brotherhood through the claims to leadership of William Q. Judge, of New York, who died in 1896, and who was followed by Katherine Tingley, the founder of the great Theosophical community at Point Loma, California.

Olcott became the leader of the remaining part of the original Theosophical Society in America and India, being assisted in his work by Annie Besant, but a more or less independent organization was founded in England.

A brief outline of the tenets of Theosophy may be stated as follows. It posits a rational belief in its views rather than blind faith, and allows for individual differences of opinion. It professes to be a religious philosophy that holds the germs of all others. It has also its aspect as a science—a science of life and of the soul.

The basic teaching is that there are three absolute truths that cannot be lost, but yet may remain silent for lack of speech. (1) The soul of humanity is immortal and its future is the future of the thing, whose growth and splendor has no limit. (2) The principle that gives life dwells in us and without us, is undying and eternally beneficent, is not heard, or seen, or smelt, but is perceived by the man who desires perception. (3) Each individual is his or her own absolute law-giver, the dispenser of glory or gloom to oneself, decreer of one's life, one's reward, one's punishment.

Although Theosophy posits the existence of an absolute, it does not pretend to knowledge of its attributes. In the absolute are innumerable universes and in each universe countless solar systems. Each solar system is the expression of a being called the Logos, the Word of God, or the Solar Deity, who permeates it and exists above it and outside it.

Below this Solar Deity are his seven ministers, called Planetary Spirits, whose relation to him is like that of the nerve centers to the brain, so that all his voluntary acts come through him to them. Under them are vast hosts or orders of spiritual beings called devas, or angels, who assist in many ways. This world is ruled by a great official who represents the Solar Deity, who is in absolute control of all the evolution that takes place upon this planet. When a new religion is to be founded, this being either comes or sends pupils to institute it.

In the earlier stages of the development of humanity the great officials of the hierarchy are provided from more highly evolved parts of the system, but whenever human beings can be trained to the necessary level of power and wisdom these offices are held by them. They can only be filled by adepts, who in goodness, power, and wisdom are immeasurably greater than ordinary individuals, and have attained the summit of human evolution. These advance until they themselves become of the nature of deities.

There are many degrees and many lines of activity among these, but some of them always remain within touch of the Earth and assist in the spiritual evolution of humanity. This body is called the "Great White Brotherhood." Its members do not dwell together, but live separately apart from the world and are in constant telepathic communication with one another.

Their knowledge of higher forces is so great that they have no necessity for meeting in the physical world, but each dwells in his own country, and their power remains unsuspected among those who live near them. These adepts are willing to take as apprentices those who have resolved to devote themselves utterly to the service of humankind. Blavatsky was presumed to be such an apprentice. One of these masters said: "In order to succeed the pupil must leave his own world and come into ours."

The Theosophical conception of the constitution of the human being is that he or she is in essence a spark of the divine fire belonging to the monadic world. For the purposes of human evolution, this monad manifests itself in lower worlds. Entering the spiritual world it manifests itself there as the triple spirit; one of its three aspects always remains in the spiritual sphere.

The second aspect manifests itself in the intuitional world, and the third in the higher mental world, and these two are collated with intuition and intelligence. These three aspects combined make up the ego, which is individual personality during the human stage of evolution. The way or path towards enlightenment and emancipation is known as karma.

The human personality is composed of a complex organization consisting of seven principles, which are united and interdependent, yet divided into certain groups, each capable of maintaining a kind of personality. Each of these principles is composed of its own form of matter and possesses its own laws of time, space, and motion.

The most gross of those, the physical body, is known as rupa, which becomes more and more refined until we reach the universal self, atma, but the circumstance that determines the individual's powers, tests, and advantages, or in short his or her character, is the karma, which is the sum of bodily, mental, and spiritual growth and is spread over many lives past and future. If in one existence the individual is handicapped by any defect, mental or physical, it may be regarded as the outcome of past delinquencies. This doctrine is common to both Buddhism and Brahminism, from which Theosophy derives.

Returning to concepts of the constitution of the human being, the ego existing in the higher mental world cannot enter the physical world until it has drawn around itself a veil composed of the matter of these spheres, nor can it think in any but an abstract manner without them—its concrete ideas being due to them. Having assumed the astral and physical bodies, it is born as a human being, and having lived out its Earth-life sojourns for a time in the astral world, until it can succeed in throwing off the shackles of the astral body.

When that is achieved the individual finds himself or herself living in the mental body. The stay in this sphere is usually a long one—the strength of the mental constitution depending upon the nature of the thoughts to which one has habituated oneself. But he or she is not yet sufficiently developed to proceed to higher planes, and once more descends into the denser physical sphere to again go through the same round. It is only through that descent that a full recognition of the higher worlds is developed in the individual.

In the higher mental world, the permanent vehicle is a causal body, which consists of matter of the first, second, and third sub-divisions of that world. As the ego unfolds one's latent possibilities in the course of one's evolution, this matter is greatly brought into action, but it is only in the perfect individual or adept that it is developed to its fullest extent. In the causal body, none of the possibilities of the grosser bodies can manifest themselves.

The mental body is built up of matter of the four lower subdivisions of the mental world, and expresses the individual's concrete thoughts. Its size and shape are determined by those of the causal vehicle.

While on Earth the personality wears the physical, mental, and astral bodies all at once. It is the astral that connects one with the astral plane during sleep or trance. It is easy to see how the doctrine of reincarnation arose from this idea. The ego must travel from existence to existence, physical, astral, mental, until it can transcend the mental world and enter the higher spheres.

The Theosophical path to the goal of Nirvana is derived from Buddhist teaching, but there are also other elements in it—Kabalistic and Greek. The path is the great work whereby the inner nature of the individual is consciously transformed and developed. A radical alternation must be made in the aims and motives of the ordinary mortal. The path is long and difficult, and as has been said extends over many existences. Morality alone is insufficient to the full awakening of the spiritual faculty, without which progress in the path is impossible. Something incomparably higher is necessary.

The physical and spiritual exercises recommended by Theosophy are those formulated in the Hindu philosophical system known as raja yoga. The most strenuous efforts alone can impel the individual along the path, and thus to mount by the practice of vidya, that higher wisdom that awakens the latent faculties and concentrates effort in the direction of union with the absolute.

The way is described as long and difficult, but as the disciple advances he or she becomes more convinced of ultimate success, by the possession of transcendental faculties that greatly assist in overcoming difficulties. But these must not be sought for their own sake, as to gain knowledge of them for evil purposes is tantamount to the practice of black magic. (See also Kabala)

Theta (Journal)

Scholarly journal of parapsychology published quarterly by the Psychical Research Foundation. Its title derives from the initial letter of the Greek word, Thanatos (death) and its concern is mainly with research on the problem of survival of bodily death. It was edited for many years by William G. Roll. Theta has been published since 1963. The publication can be reached c/o Dr. Andrew Nichols, P.O. Box 142193, Gainesville, FL 32614-2193.

THG See Temple of the Holy Grail

Thian-ti-hwii

The Heaven and Earth League, an ancient esoteric society in China, said to have still been in existence in 1674. The society professed to continue a system of brotherhood derived from ancient customs.

Sources:

Chesneau, Jean. Secret Societies in China in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Ann Arbor, Mich.: University of Michigan Press, 1971.

Third Eye

The mystical center behind the forehead between the eyes, which is a focus for Oriental mystical meditation. It is known in yoga philosophy as the ajna chakra (center of command) and its activation or opening through meditation is often the preliminary to activation of other chakras. The initial experience of the third eye, the seeming presence of a screen inside the head at the front of the brain, can be had by anyone who simply shuts his eyes and attempts to reach a focus.

The idea of "opening" the third eye is a common one in psychic and metaphysical circles. An interesting variation of the idea is found in the popular book The Third Eye (1956) by T. Lopsang Rampa (pseudonym of Cyril Hoskins). It states that this chakra may be opened by a physical operation. Rampa's story was a hoax and the operation complete fiction. No such operation is featured in Hindu or Tibetan mysticism (or any other system of occult thought) and it must be regarded as an imaginative fantasy.

Thomas, C(harles) Drayton (1867–1953)

British clergyman who was an active member of the Society for Psychical Research, London, for many years. He was a Council member from 1934–53 and one of the first regular sitters with the medium Gladys Osborne Leonard. He reported on her phenomena in the society's Journal and Proceedings.

He worked with W. Whateley Carington in the quantitative study of trance personalities. His many articles and several books indicate an interest in psychical research as a means of supporting his belief in life after death.

His books include: Some Evidence for Human Survival (1922), Life Beyond Death with Evidence (1928), The Mental Phenomena of Spiritualism (1930), An Amazing Experiment, Beyond Life's Sunset (1931), From Life to Life (1946), In the Dawn Beyond Death, and Precognition and Human Survival (1948).

Thomas died July 14, 1953.

Sources:

Allison, L. W. "Obituary: The Reverend C. Drayton Thomas." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 48 (1953).

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Thomas, C. Drayton. "The Volume of Byron: A Significant Book Test." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 48, 175 (1946–49).

———. "The Word Association Test with Mrs. Osborne Leonard." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 43, 141 (1935).

Thomas, John F(rederick) (1874–1940)

Psychologist and educator who studied parapsychology. He was born on July 22, 1874, in Parker City, Pennsylvania. He attended the University of Michigan (LL.B., 1898; M.A., 1915) and after a break of two decades, he went to Duke University to pursue a doctoral program (Ph.D., 1935). Thomas was a member of the Michigan Education Association (president in 1940), the National Education Association, Boston Society for Psychic Research, and Society for Psychical Research, London.

During much of his career Thomas worked for the Detroit public school system. However, he had been interested in psychical research for many years, but did not become actively involved until the 1920s when he sat with the Boston medium Minnie M. Soule (also known as "Mrs. Chenoweth"); she produced what he perceived as strong evidence of survival. He went on to sit with Gladys Osborne Leonard and Eileen J. Garrett. Sittings in 1932 formed the subject of his Ph.D. thesis at Duke: An Evaluative Study of the Mental Content of Certain Trance Phenomena. This was also the first doctoral thesis dealing with parapsychology and the first of several books and articles he contributed to the field. Thomas died November 21, 1940.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychic Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Gibson, Edmond P. "The Ethel Thomas Case." Tomorrow (summer 1954).

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Thomas, John F. Beyond Normal Cognition. Boston: Boston Society for Psychic Research, 1937. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. Case Studies Bearing Upon Survival. N.p., 1929.

Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–1274)

One of the most profound scholars and subtlest logicians of his day. Aquinas was born around 1225 in Roccasecca, Italy. He was educated under the Benedictine Monks of Monte Cassino and in the University of Naples, and entered the Society of Preaching Friars, or Dominicans, at 17 years of age. His mother, indignant that he should take the vow of poverty and thus remove himself from the world for life, employed every means in her power to induce him to change his mind. In order to remove Aquinas from her influence, the friars relocated him from Naples to Terracina, from Terracina to Anagnia, and from Anagnia to Rome.

His mother followed him in all these changes of residence but was not permitted to see him. At length she induced his two elder brothers to seize him by force. They kidnapped him while he was traveling to Paris, where he had been sent to complete his course of instruction, and they carried him off to the castle of Aquino, where he had been born. Here Aquinas was confined for two years, but he found a way to correspond with the superiors of his order, and he finally escaped from a window in the castle.

Aquinas exceeded most men in the severity and strictness of his metaphysical disquisitions and thus acquired the name of "Seraphic Doctor." He was canonized by Pope John XXII in 1323.

Because of his association with Albertus Magnus, he shared many legends of magical powers. For example, it was said that because his study was placed in a great thoroughfare where the grooms exercised their horses, Aquinas found it necessary to apply a magical remedy to this nuisance. He made by the laws of magic a small brass horse, which he buried two or three feet underground in the middle of this highway so that horses would no longer pass along the road. The grooms were compelled to choose another place for their daily exercises.

Another legend claimed that Aquinas was offended by the perpetual chattering of an artificial man made of brass, constructed by his tutor Albertus Magnus, and he dashed the automaton to pieces. Aquinas was also supposed to have written some tracts on alchemy.

However, his credulity regarding demonology and witchcraft had an unfortunate influence on witchhunters, and he was later cited as an authority by such writers as Heinrich Kramer and Jakob Sprenger, authors of the infamous Malleus Maleficarum. Although Aquinas did not accept the concept of a pact with the Devil, he endorsed the belief of diabolical association, and the incubus and succubus. He echoed Albertus Magnus in claiming that when Satan tempted Christ on the mountaintop, he carried Christ on his shoulders, and this belief was used by later witchhunters to endorse the theory of transvection, or magical transport of witches through the air. Aquinas also believed in the power of the evil eye used by old women who had an association with the Devil. His argument that heretics should be burned was later used to justify the burning of witches.

It should be stressed that Aquinas's credulity was characteristic of his time, and his theses concerning the Devil reflected the conclusions of theological dogmas of his day. Nevertheless, his discussions were used by later and lesser individuals to justify the witchcraft delusion.

The major works of Aquinas include the Summa Theologica and the Summa contra Gentiles. His great intellectual and theological achievements have somewhat overshadowed the mystical side of his character, and it should be remembered that he ended his life as a contemplative mystic.

He died March 7, 1274, in Fossanova, Italy.

Sources:

St. Thomas Aquinas and His Legacy. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America, 1994.

Stockhammer, Thomas. Thomas Aquinas Dictionary. New York: Philosophical Library, 1965.

Thomas the Rhymer (fl. 1220)

Scottish soothsayer (prophet) of the thirteenth century. It is impossible to name the exact birth date of Thomas the Rhymer, who is well known for figuring in a ballad included in Sir Walter Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border.

Thomas is commonly supposed to have lived at the beginning of the thirteenth century, that period being assigned because the name "Thomas Rimor de Ercildun" is appended as witness to a deed, whereby one "Petrus de Haga de Bemersyde" agreed to pay half a stone of wax annually to the Abbot of Melrose, and this "Petrus" has been identified with a person of that name known to have been living about 1220.

Erceldoune or Ercildun is simply the old way of spelling Earlston, a village in the extreme west of Berwickshire, near the line demarking that county from Roxburgh.

It would seem that Thomas held estates in this region, for he is mentioned as a land owner by several early writers, most of whom add that he did not hold his lands from the Crown, but from the Earls of Dunbar. Be that as it may, Thomas probably spent the greater part of his life in and around Earlston, and a ruined tower there, singularly rich in ivy, is still pointed out as having been his home, and bears his name, while in a wall of the village church there is a lichened stone with the inscription:

"Auld Rhymour's Race Lies in this Place."

According to local tradition, this stone was removed to its present resting place from one in a much older church, long since demolished.

Nor are these things the only relics of the soothsayer, a lovely valley some miles to the west of Earlston being still known as "Rhymer's Glen." It is interesting to recall that the artist J. M. W. Turner painted a watercolor of this place, and no less interesting to remember that Sir Walter Scott, when buying the lands that eventually constituted his estate of Abbotsford, sought eagerly and at last successfully to acquire the glen in question. Naturally he loved it on account of its associations with the shadowy past, and his biographer J. C. Lockhart stated that many of the novelist's happiest times were spent in this romantic place. Lockhart related that the novelist Maria Edgeworth visited it in 1823, and that thenceforth Scott used always to speak of a certain boulder in the glen as the "Edgeworth stone," the writer whom he admired so keenly having rested there. It seems probable, however, that the glen was named "Rhymer's Glen" by Scott himself.

It is thought that Thomas died in 1297, and it is clear that he had achieved a wide fame as a prophet, many references to his skill being found in writers who lived comparatively soon after him. A Harleian manuscript in the British Museum known to have been written before 1320 disclosed the significant phrase, "La Comtesse de Donbar demanda a Thomas de Eseddoune quant la guere descoce prendreit fyn," but the lady in question was not a contemporary of the prophet. In Barbour's

Bruce, composed early in the fourteenth century, we find the poet saying:

“Sekerly
I hop Thomas Prophecy
Off Hersildoune sall weryfyd be.”

The historian Andrew of Wyntoun in the Originale Cronykil of Scotland, also mentions Thomas as a redoubtable prophet, while Walter Bower, the continuator of Fordun’s Scoticronicon, recounts how once Rhymer was asked by the Earl of Dunbar what another day would bring forth, whereupon he foretold the death of the king, Alexander III, and the very next morning news of his majesty’s decease was heard.

Blind Harry’s poem Wallace, written midway through the fifteenth century, likewise contains an allusion to Thomas’s prophesying capacities.

Coming to later times, Sir Thomas Cray, constable of Norham, in his Norman-French Scalacronica, compiled during his captivity at Edinburgh Castle in 1555, spoke of the predictions of Merlin, which like those of “Banaster ou de Thomas de Ercildoune . . . furount ditz en figure.”

A number of predictions attributed to Thomas the Rhymer are still current, for instance that weird verse Sir Walter Scott made the motto of his novel The Bride of Lammermuir and also a saying concerning a family with which, as we have seen, the soothsayer was at one time associated:

“Betide, betide, whate’er betide
There’ll aye be Haigs at Bemersyde.”

It will be observed that these lines are in poetic meter, yet there is really no sure proof that the soothsayer was a poet. It is usually supposed that he acquired the nickname “Rhymer” because he was a popular minstrel in his day, but the fact remains that “Rymour” had long been a comparatively common surname in Berwickshire, and, while it may have originated with Thomas, the assumption has but slight foundation.

Again, the prophet of Earlston has been credited with a poem on the story of Sir Tristram belonging to the Arthurian cycle of romance, and the Advocate’s Library contains a manuscript copy of this probably written as early as 1300. However, while Sir Walter Scott and other authorities believed in this ascription, it is quite likely that the poem is only a paraphrase from some French troubadour.

For generations, however, the Scottish peasantry continued to be influenced by the sayings attributed to “True Thomas,” as they named him, as evidenced by the continuing publication of books and chapbook pamphlets containing his prophecies until well into the nineteenth century. For a detailed study, see The Romance and Prophecies of Thomas Erceldoune, edited by J. A. H. Murray for the English Text Society, London, 1875.

A beautiful legend credits Thomas with obtaining his prophetic powers after visiting fairyland. The ballad of “Thomas Ryner and the Queen of Elfland” in its various forms is classified as no. 37 of the collection of English and Scottish Popular Ballads, edited by Francis James Child, published in five vols., 1882–98.

Thompson, Rosina (1868– ?)

British trance medium, whose abilities developed at Frederic W. Thurstan’s Delphic Circle at Hertford Lodge, Battersea, London. In her early sittings in 1897 and 1898, the records of which in Light refer to her as Mrs. T., she exhibited startling physical phenomena, raps, movements of objects, luminous phenomena, elongation of the human body, direct voice, apports, scents, and materializations.

Her physical manifestations were discouraged by F. W. H. Myers and she was persuaded to give her services to the Society for Psychological Research as a trance medium from 1898 onward. Her chief control was her deceased daughter, Nelly, who had died in infancy. Another communicator of importance was a Mrs. Cartwright, the teacher of the school where Thompson was educated. Her trances were much lighter than those of Leonora Piper and occasionally they were scarcely distinguishable from the state of normal wakefulness. Many instances of her paranormal perceptions were recorded in the waking state.

Richard Hodgson, after six sittings, formed an unfavorable opinion of her powers; it was the skeptical Frank Podmore who hurried to Thompson’s defense. He considered Hodgson’s conclusion that Thompson was untrustworthy to go beyond the warrant of the facts. Podmore expressed his opinion in plain words: “I should perhaps add that the supernormal source of much of the information given at Mrs. Thompson’s séances seems to me to be almost beyond dispute.”

The reports of Frederik van Eeden contained many curious accounts. The results of Frederik van Eeden were very convincing. He came from Holland with an article of clothing that belonged to a young man who first cut his throat and then shot himself. He obtained dramatic communications, and Thompson spoke in Dutch (a language she did not know) with the young man.

Margaret Verrall had 22 sittings with Thompson. She made statistical calculations and found that out of 238 definite statements referring to things past and present, 33 were false, 64 were unidentified, and 141 (approximately 59 percent) were true. Of these 141 true statements, 51 could not have been ascertained from normal sources. Verrall’s general opinion of the controlling personalities was that although their characteristics were not very marked, all bore strong resemblance to the waking Thompson, the voice was hardly to be distinguished from hers, and the words and phrases were such as she herself used in the normal state. She nevertheless, admitted that many personalities bore, for the sitters, the marks of independent individuality.

Myers’s belief in survival was chiefly founded on experiments with Thompson following the death of his great love, Annie Marshall. He and his friends had 217 sittings, about two thirds of which he personally attended. After Myers’s death on January 17, 1901, Thompson, who had previously suspended sittings altogether, gave two sittings to Sir Oliver Lodge. In both of them, communications characteristic of Myers were forthcoming. She also took part in the cross-correspondence sittings.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Myers, F. W. H. “On the Trance Phenomena of Mrs. Thompson.” Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research 17 (1902).

Van Eeden, Frederik. “Account of Sittings with Mrs. Thompson.” Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research 17 (1904).

Thompson, William Irwin (1938–)

Author of books analyzing society in the light of contemporary New Age movements and founder of Lindisfarne Association, a commune based on a “new planetary culture.” Thompson was born on July 16, 1938, in Chicago, Illinois. He was educated at Pomona College (B.A., 1962) and Cornell University (M.A., 1964, Ph.D., 1966). He became an assistant professor of humanities at Massachusetts Institute of Technology for several years (1965–68). Afterward, he joined the faculty at York University, Toronto, in 1968 and remained there for many years.

In the 1970s, Thompson began to explore the possibility of a new culture emerging in the light of occult, spiritual, and new consciousness movements. In Passages About Earth (1974), he analyzed the alternative cultures of Paolo Soleri, H. G. Wells, Werner Heisenberg, Aurelio Peccei and his Club of Rome, the Integral Yoga of Sri Aurobindo, the Institute for World Order and W. Warren Wagar, C. F. von Weizsäcker of the Max Planck Institute, and the Kundalini yogi Pandit Gopi Krishna. The book contains observation into the nature and impact of various New Age movements and lifestyles of the established technological nation-states.

Thompson was most favorably impressed by the alternative culture of Findhorn Foundation, the pioneering Scottish New Age community established by Peter and Eileen Caddy in 1962 as “a training center for the embodiment of universal consciousness in those who recognize their path is one of world service.” He also visited the ruins of Lindisfarne, a monastery on Holy Island off the coast of Northumberland, England; it was founded by St. Aidan in 635 C.E. Later, Thompson founded the Lindisfarne Association in Southampton, New York, as an educational community for cultural transformation in a new synthesis.

In Thompson’s view, the original Lindisfarne typified a historic clash between esoteric Christianity and ecclesiastical Christianity—between religious experience and religious authority. As with Eileen Caddy’s experiments at Findhorn, Thompson’s Lindisfarne has great significance as an attempt to extend intellectual theories by practical community work. In such a setting, occultism and higher consciousness movements are integrated into a truly New Age “planetary culture” rather than a counterculture.

Sources:

Thompson, William Irwin. At the Edge of History. New York: Harper, 1971.

———. Coming Into Being: Artifacts and Texts in the Evolution of Consciousness. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1996.

———. Evil and World Order. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.

———. Gaia 2: Emergence: The New Science of Becoming. Hudson, N. Y.: Lindisfarne Press, 1991.

———. Islands Out of Times. Garden City, N.Y.: Dial Press, 1985.

———. Passages About Earth: An Exploration of the New Planetary Culture. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Thorogood, Brackett K(irkwood) (1881–1965)

Engineer and educator who wrote on parapsychological subjects. He was born on December 21, 1881, at Cambridge, Massachusetts and educated at the Chauncy Hall School, the Lowell Institute, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In 1922 he became a technical and technological consultant and then beginning in 1938 to 1957 was the director of the Franklin Technical Institute.

Thorogood had more than a passing interest in mediumship and became involved in the latter stages of the controversy over the mediumship of Mina Crandon (i.e. “Margery”). He also served as a consultant to American Society for Psychological Research during the turbulent years of the 1930s. He died November 1965.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Thorogood, Brackett K. “The Margery Mediumship.” Proceedings of the American Society for Psychological Research 22 (1933).

Thoughtforms

The existence of thoughtforms has been claimed by occultists, especially theosophists. The idea of thought-forms has supplied a realm for some interesting and curious speculations by physical researchers as they investigated the substance of their designated study. The suggestion of physical researcher Sir William F. Barrett that the operator may so stimulate the mind of the subject that he is able to see the thought-shape in the former’s mind is similar to what theosophist A. P. Sinnett claimed in his book The Occult World (1882): “An adept is able to project into and materialize in the visible world the forms that his imagination has constructed out of inert cosmic matter in the visible world. He does not create anything new, but only utilizes and manipulates materials which Nature has in store around him.”

And there are other similarities. James H. Hyslop, in his book Psychical Research and The Resurrection (1908), quoted a curious communication from a private source. The communicator, while commenting on the peculiarities of his spiritual life, stated that he “sometimes saw, for instance, a man reading a book, but when he approached to talk with him he found it was only a thought.” Hyslop, however, did not agree with the thought-form theory and suggested that the instance was a case of veridical, or subjective hallucination in the spiritual life.

James T. Fields in a lecture on “Fiction and its Eminent Authors,” said: “Dickens was at one time so taken possession of by the characters of whom he was writing that they followed him everywhere and would never let him be alone for a moment. He told me that when he was writing The Old Curiosity Shop the creatures of his imagination haunted him so that they would neither let him sleep or eat in peace.”

Vincent Turvey wrote in his book The Beginnings of Seership (1911; 1969) about a discussion that took place between him and a man from Christian Evidence Society on psychic matters. The man insisted that Turvey’s psychic gifts were from the devil and prayed that the devils should leave him.

“On lying down in the afternoon in order to rest and meditate, I suddenly saw three or four ‘devils’ in the room—typical orthodox fiends. Men with goats’ legs, cloven hoofs, little horns just over their ears, curly hair, . . . tails and clawlike hands. In colour they were entirely brown, like ordinary brown paper. I candidly profess that I was ‘a bit shaken’ . . . I pulled myself together and rose into the ‘higher state of consciousness.’ In this ‘state’ I was able to see not only their fronts, but also their backs. To my utter astonishment they were all hollow at the back, like embossed leather, or the ordinary papier maché mask. Then my guardians caused me to make a sign, say a word, or think a sentence—what I do not know; but directly it was done or said, these forms disintegrated or dissolved and vanished.”

Thoughtforms are often perceived in the hypnotic state. Dr. Lindsay Johnson, the celebrated British ophthalmic surgeon, described in the May 21, 1921, issue of the Spiritualist journal Light an experiment of Professor Koenig of Berlin, in a Paris hospital at which he assisted. A peasant woman was hypnotized. It was suggested that she saw an imaginary picture on a plain sheet of paper. Twenty identical sheets of paper were produced and a picture was suggested for each; a record was kept of the picture and tiny identification marks added on the back of each sheet. Johnson added five more sheets, shuffled them, and handed them back one after the other to the subject. She described the suggested picture in every case, but saw nothing on Johnson’s sheets.

A Russian investigator, Dr. Naum Kotik, made similar experiments in Wiesbaden with a fourteen-year-old girl Sophie and drew the following inference: “Thought is a radiant energy. This energy has physical and psychic properties. It may be called psycho-physical. Originating in the brain, it passes to the extremities of the body. It is transmitted through air with some difficulty, more easily through a metallic conductor and can be fixed on paper.”

Koenig’s and Kotik’s experiments echo the experience of the engineer and physical researcher René Warcollier. One evening, partially waking, he saw a large quadrangular corded package in a yellow packing paper on a chair. He inquired about the package. There was no package on the chair but it had been there some time before as described. If the image of a package can impress a chair it is no more improbable that thoughts may similarly impress a sheet of paper.

Hyppolite Baraduc informed the Academie de Médecine in May 1896 that he had succeeded in photographing thought. He experimented with many people. The subjects placed their hands on a photographic plate in the dark room and were asked to think intently of the object they wished to impress upon the plate. Many curious markings were obtained, some of them representing the features of persons and the outline of objects.

Baraduc also contended that thought photography was possible from a distance. He quoted the case of a Dr. Istrati who promised a friend of his that he would appear on a photographic plate at Bucarest on August 4, 1893, while he slept in Campana. The distance was 300 kilometers. Before closing his eyes, Istrati willed that his image should impress the plate with which his friend went to bed. The result was achieved. The plate showed a luminous spot, in the midst of which the profile of a man could be traced.

Commandant Darget, of Tours, France, obtained several good thought photographs in 1896. His procedure was to gaze attentively at a simple object for a few moments in order to engrave it firmly on the mind, then go into the dark room and (1) place a photographic plate with the glass side against the forehead for a quarter of an hour, mentally picturing the object decided upon and strongly desiring to make an impression on the plate, (2) Place the hand on a plate (or hold the plate in the hand) for a quarter of an hour, operating as before, (3) Put the plate into a developing bath, placing the fingers of one hand on the edge of the plate for ten minutes. There should always be the desire to imprint on the plate the picture of the object which is very strongly thought of.

An interesting case was quoted by James Coates from the November 1895 issue of the Amateur Photographer. W. Inglis Rogers, the experimenter, gazed for a minute at a postage stamp and then went into the dark room and gazed at a sensitive plate for twenty minutes. When the plate was developed two images of postage stamps were plainly visible.

Tomobichi Fukurai, a professor of Kohyassan University, carried out important experiments with Ikuko Nagao. If she concentrated on Japanese alphabetical symbols they were found printed on photographic plates.

Walter Franklin Prince reported in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (April 1925) the case of the Japanese artist Mikaye. Microscopic symbols were projected by some capillary action from the tip of his brush filled with fluid pigment. The artist simply held the brush downwards and he made a mental image of the intended symbol to a large scale.

In his researches with Stanislawa Tomczyk, Julien Ochorowicz was deeply puzzled to find that in several of his radiographs the medium's ring appeared on the finger of her "etheric" hand. This seemed to indicate to him: (1) That there is a kind of link between the organism and the object it wears, (2) That the occult notion that material objects have an astral body is not limited to living bodies. The ring, however, did not always appear on the radiographs. Ochorowicz tried to find out whether objects frequently worn by the sensitive were more easily produced on the plate than others. He chose a thimble that she rarely used. The medium suggested that he should himself retain the thimble on the finger of his left hand, holding her with his right hand. "Perhaps," she added, "the thimble will pass from your body on to my finger."

The experiment appeared absurd, but he was willing to try it. He took a plate from his box, marked it, and laid it on the medium's knees. She was seated on his right; with his right hand he held up her left hand about sixteen inches above the plate, the thimble being on the middle finger of his left hand, which he kept behind his left knee. After a minute had elapsed, the medium said that she felt a sort of tingling in the direction of her forearm, where their hands met. She exclaimed: "Oh, how strange. Something is being placed on the tip of my finger . . . I do not know if it is the thimble; I feel something keeps pressing the end of my finger."

When the plate was developed, it showed the hand of the medium, and on the middle finger was what he called, jokingly, "the soul of her thimble." Ochorowicz asked in some bewilderment if the image was a double of the thimble, or was it a photograph of the idea of the thimble. A close examination of the photograph and comparison with the thimble showed that the two corresponded exactly, the one "was a true copy of the other, precise in details and in dimension."

This exactness supported the idea of a direct impression from some object rather than merely a thought-image. The finger supporting the thimble was the palest of all the fingers, probably, as Ochorowicz suggests, because the light by which the radiograph was taken, proceeded from it. He inclined to the conclusion that an etheric hand wearing an etheric thimble produced the image, and that mental desire gave the direction to the light that was necessary in order to make the details of the thimble visible on the plate.

When he proceeded to test his conclusion, however, a strange thing happened. Unknown to the medium, he held in his left hand an Austrian five-crown piece. Presently she exclaimed: "I see behind you a white round object . . . it is the moon." "At the same instant," wrote Ochorowicz, "I saw a faint but distinct light pass near my left hand, which held the coin; it was not round, nor a flash, it was like a little meteor, like a thin ray, lighting up the space round my hand on the side away from the medium." When the plate was developed it showed an image of a full moon.

He considered it evident that this time a photograph of thought obtained the existence of a quasi-physical intermediary, since the image represented the medium's conception of something that existed outside her mind.

The image of the moon was once obtained previous to the experiment. On the night of September 7, 1911, the medium was much impressed by the superb sight of the starry heavens, and particularly by the full moon, which she looked at for some time with admiration. On the following day, instead of the little hand, which was desired, a full moon appeared on the plate against a background of white cloud. The cinematograph representations of the eclipse of the moon on April 17, 1912, showed the image of the moon slightly flattened in the direction of the axis of rotation. This characteristic appeared in the radiograph of September 7. The impression was double and it looked as if the cloud had not been duplicated.

Some have suggested that the psychic extras obtained by spirit photographers may be the thoughts of the sitters (though most now agree that they were more likely the product of fraud). Hereward Carrington offered some curious evidence out of his experiences with Mrs. A. E. Deane as did Frederick Bligh Bond, who experimented with the same medium. Bond prepared a diagram of four by three squares and made, in one of the twelve squares, a cross of two diagonal lines and drew a small circle over the crossed lines. After he deposited this diagram with the principal of the British College of Psychic Science, he went to meet Deane. She drew upon a blackboard a similar diagram and asked for a perfect circle over the center of the two intersecting lines.

The camera was loaded by Carrington and he did the development himself; Deane simply placing her hand during the exposures on the camera top. The first plate showed the diagram alone; the second had a sort of localized fog over the square in question; the third, possessed a circular spot of intense blackness, exactly over the intersection.

In a second trial, Bond hung a small picture frame upon the wall of the studio and asked that an image, the exact character of which he did not specify, might be recorded on the space within the frame. The idea was to preclude any successful pre-exposure of a plate for the purpose of fraud. He obtained a cloud of small size that on the first two plates was not quite rightly centered, but was well within the center of the third plate.

A Mr. Warrick, a manufacturing chemist, repeated the experiments but used no camera, only sheets of paper that he had specially sensitized. By impressing upon Deane the exact nature of the image he wanted, and placing the paper beneath Deane's hands or feet, he obtained circles, squares, triangles, or more complex images. Bond believed that his part in the success was dependent upon a power of mental visualization that he had special opportunities to cultivate.

Sources:

Besant, Annie, and Charles W. Leadbeater. Thought-Forms: A Record of Clairvoyant Investigations. Adyar, Madras, India: London Theosophical Publishing House, 1901.

Darget, Commandant. Exposé des différentes méthodes pour l'obtention des photographies fluïdo-magnétiques et spirites. Paris, 1909.

Eisenbud, Jule. The World of Ted Serios: "Thoughtographic Studies of an Extraordinary Mind". New York: William Morrow, 1967.

Fukurai, Tomobichi. Clairvoyance and Thoughtography. London: Rider, 1931. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Joire, Paul. Psychical and Supernormal Phenomena. New York: F. A. Stokes, 1916.

Kotie, Naum. Die Emanation der psycho-physischen Energie. Wiesbaden, 1908.

Ochorowicz, Julien. De la suggestion mentale. N.p., 1887. English edition as Mental Suggestion. N.p., 1891.

Schatzman, Morton. The Story of Ruth. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1980.

Thoughtography

Term devised by a Japanese experimenter Tomobichi Fukurai for thought photography, the impressing of mental images on photographic plates. His researches were embodied in his book Clairvoyance and Thoughtography (1911, English translation 1930). Modern Japanese experimenters now use the term "Nengraphy."

Sources:

Fukurai, Tomobichi. Clairvoyance and Thoughtography. London: Rider, 1930. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Thought-Reading

Thought-transference from the reverse aspect. The agent attempts to picture the contents of the subject's mind, i.e., to "read it," instead of impressing it with his own transmitted ideas.

In more modern society, where outbursts of ecstatic frenzy are and were ascribed to "demonic" possession, ecstasies are often credited with the power to read thoughts. Various psychic functionaries were supposed to possess the same faculty. In the religious revivals of the sixteenth century among the so-called Tremblers of the Cevennes, for example, thought-reading was one of the minor but very practical miracles that occurred. It was used for the detection of spies who frequently attended the meetings of the proscribed devotees.

In the fifteen century, Paracelsus had observed the phenomenon of thought-reading, and it was also reported by early experimenters in animal magnetism. More recently, Robert Baxter, a member of the Irvingite congregation, seized with Pentecostal fervor in 1831 and recorded that when he was possessed by tongues he could often read the unspoken thoughts of his hearers. Sydney and Lesley Piddington and Julius and Mrs. Zancig were two couples who also became well-known for their thought-reading abilities.

Thought-reading may occur through rapport with or the positive perception of the ideas existing in another mind. Musical strings furnish an analogy to the first mode. A note struck on one string will be taken up and echoed by another. In cases of mass panic, the sense of fear is communicated to surrounding people who may be ignorant of the original cause of the terror. It is often difficult, however, to differentiate between psychic contagion and the transmission of emotions or ideas by subconsciously perceived signs such as facial expressions and postures.

The advent of Spiritualism gave thought-reading a new driving force. It was now the spirits who read the thoughts of the sitters and replied to them with raps and table-turning messages. Sergeant E. W. Cox, an early investigator of the phenomena of Spiritualism, speculated:

"If the Darwinian theory be true, there must have been a time when man had no articulate speech. For intercommunication with his kind he must have then possessed some other faculty than language. Most probably that was what the intercourse of animals is, and the abnormal cases of thought reading that occur among ourselves may be possibly the survival of a faculty which has now almost vanished, because it has gradually fallen into disuse."

The term "thought-reading" is also popularly used for demonstrations by stage performers who actually use subtle codes for apparent telepathic communication, a practice described in a number of books such as Stuart Cumberland's 1888 text, Thought-Reader's Thoughts. It is possible that some tricks of stage performers may be similar to methods employed subconsciously by ordinary individuals who appear to manifest thought-reading or telepathic faculty. Some performers can do muscle reading, perceiving the subtle muscular movements when holding the hand of a subject or even pick up subconscious whispering. (See Rev. Edward Irving)

Sources:

Braddon, Russell. The Piddingtons. London: Werner Laurie, 1950.

Cumberland, Stuart [Charles Garner]. Thought-Reader's Thoughts: Being the Impressions and Confessions of Stuart Cumberland. London: S. Low, Marston, Searle & Rivington, 1888. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Thought-Transference

This claimed faculty was baptized telepathy in 1882 by the Society for Psychical Research, London. In the fifteenth century, for example, Paracelsus observed, "By the magic power of the will, a person on this side of the ocean may make a person on the other side hear what is said on this side . . . the ethereal body of a man may know what another man thinks at a distance of 100 miles or more."

The Swedish seer Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772) clearly stated that spiritual or sympathetic states of consciousness conquer time and space. The state of rapport discovered by the mesmerists of the nineteenth century demonstrated transference of thoughts and emotions. They sought the mechanism in a "magnetic fluid." Somnambulant (hypnotic trance) induced from a distance seemed to indicate direct action between mind and mind. The possibility that this condition might have been brought about by conscious or subconscious suggestion was not immediately apparent.

Many experiments in thought transference were recorded in Germany in the beginning of the nineteenth century. A valuable series was published by Dr. Van Ghert, Secretary of the Royal Mineralogical Society at Jena in the Archive für den tierischen Magnetismus and by H. M. Weserman, the Government Assessor and Chief Inspector of Roads in Düsseldorf with his Der Magnetismus und die allgemeine Weltsprache (1822).

William F. Barrett read a paper on the subject before the British Association in 1876. Psychical researchers Barrett, Ed- mund Gurney, and F. W. H. Myers concluded in 1881 in their first report on thought-transference: "The possibility must not be overlooked that further advances along the lines indicated may, and we believe, will, necessitate a modification of that general view of the relation of mind to matter to which modern science has long been gravitating."

It must be admitted, however, that these experiments were severely criticized for not excluding fraud.

In an 1883–84, extensive series of experiments in Liverpool, England, conducted by Malcolm Guthrie and James Birchall with a Miss Ralph and a Miss Edwards, concluded that impressions of objects and sensations of taste and pain were successfully transmitted. Sir Oliver Lodge participated in some of these experiments and initiated some original ones at a later period.

The experiments of Eleanor Sidgwick and her more famous husband Henry Sidgwick in 1889–90 were classic. In thousands of experiments, a high percentage of success was registered in transferring simple images. The increase of distance, however, apparently had a marked effect on the results. According to Frank Podmore, only Dr. Gilbert's and Professor Janet's experiments with "Leonie" at Havre in 1885 and 1886 could compare in competence, care, and precision to the results with these. In the latter case, the effect aimed at was the induction of hypnotic sleep.

Clarissa Miles and Hermione Ramsden experimented through an intervening distance of 20–300 miles in transferring complex images and obtaining cross-correspondence of thought-transference. The results were carefully noted down; in many cases, an agreement was found between the impressions of the two parties (see the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research vol. 12 and 13, and the Proceedings vol. 25).

The psychical researcher Cesare Lombroso found 12 neuropaths in 20 subjects who registered success in thought-transference experiments. In some cases, transmission was facilitated by alcoholic drinks or coffee stimulating the nerve centers. He assigned great importance to the "hysterical" state and expressed the opinion that the disequilibrium of sensibility in hysterical persons was an essential condition for the production of the phenomena. This is because these individuals imply a greater accumulation of nervous energy in certain points of the cortex of the brain, and a diminution in others. He did not, however, exclude the possible influence of other causes and held, in alluding to transmission of thought in the dying, that the greater accumulation of energy in the cortex during the period just before death may be due to ptomaines that become lodged in it.

In reviewing this theory, Dr. Guiseppe Venzano speculated (Annals of Psychic Science, January 1906) that the causes of the accumulation of greater energy in the centers of intelligence must be manifold and diverse and that disequilibrium of sensibility does not constitute more than one among these many causes. He concluded that: (1) Mediumship favored the development of the phenomenon of transmission of thought, (2) In mediumistic séances, the thought formulated by the agent may be carried out even by material actions absolutely independent both of the medium and of the experimenters, (3) Under special circumstances, thought may be transmitted to the medium in a séance—even at a considerable distance—from a person outside the séance (telepathy), (4) The unconscious transmission of thought was possible.

In Proceedings, of the Society Psychical Research (1918), Margaret Verrall reviewed 504 previous experiments in thought-transference. The Proceedings (1924) also contained Eleanor Sidgwick's report on the experiments of Gilbert Murray, which she considered "perhaps the most important ever brought to the notice of the society both on account of their frequently brilliant success and on account of the eminence of the experimenter." The percipient of these experiments was Murray himself.

On February 16, 1927, V. J. Woolley, research officer of the Society for Psychical Research, arranged interesting experiments through radio. He and the agents were in the society's office, with no means of communication with anyone outside it. Sir Oliver Lodge sat in the broadcasting office at the microphone and directed the radio listeners to record any impressions they were able to form of the objects willed. They were shown three minutes each with an interval of two minutes. The only information given to the listeners was that the first and fourth objects were playing cards of unusual design; second was a Japanese print of a skull with a bird on top; the third was a bunch of three sprays of white lilac; the fifth was of Woolley himself wearing a bowler hat and a grotesque mask. The agents remained in the society's premises through the night without access to a telephone.

The morning mail brought in 24,659 answers. According to Woolley's summary in Proceedings, vol. 38 (part 105), the card test gave no evidence of telepathic transmission but the answers disclosed the peculiarity of a strong tendency to choose an ace, especially the ace of spades and that there was a marked preference for odd-numbered cards as against even-numbered ones. Of the third object, five listeners gave a skull as the description of the picture, one adding the interesting detail that it represented a skull in a garden, and a sixth noted a human head. Of these six records, no less than three gave flowers as the third object. Of the last object of the test, five answers gave the impression of Mr. Woolley, 146 of someone present, 236 of someone dressed up or masquerading, 73 of masks or faces, 202 of hats, and 499 of feeling of amusement.

Woolley, however, believed that these numbers in themselves were of little importance as there was no definite chance of expectation with which to compare them. The number of double successes was very small. "There does seem to be an indication of a supernatural faculty," stated Woolley, "on the part of a few of those who took part, though their successes are swamped by the very large mass of failures on the part of others."

The first attempt to link thought-transference with radio was staged in Chicago some years previous to the Society for Psychical Research experiment by Gardner Murphy while at Harvard. At a later date he conducted a second similar experiment with the assistance of J. Malcolm Bird in Newark. Murphy did not publish a complete record though the Newark tests were reported in the Scientific American (June 1924).

Interesting results in thought-transference have been obtained in cross-correspondence experiments. The principle is that two people at a stated time think of something, write it down and post it to find out whether their thoughts corresponded.

Charles Richet outlined the steps for successful experiments in transferring drawings or cards: (1) The agent must be absolutely motionless and have his back turned to the percipient, (2) The choice of the number, the card, or the drawing must be made by pure chance, (3) No result, whether success or failure, should be told to the percipient before the end of the sitting, (4) Not more than twenty trials should be made on any one day, (5) All results, whatever they may be, should be stated in full, (6) The percipient must be unable to see anything, directly or indirectly; it is best that his eyes should be bandaged and his back turned.

It had been found that the success of thought-transmission depended upon the moods and health of the experimenters. This required concentration on the part of the transmitter and passivity of mind on the part of the recipient. It proved helpful if the agent tried to visualize the picture that he or she wished to convey and was best to keep an object before the eye and think of it while trying to transmit its image.

Lodge observed that the transference of drawings was much more distinct when tactual contact was maintained between the agent and the percipient. He discovered as early as 1883 that when two agents are acting, each contributes to the effect; the result is due to both combined. He put down between two agents a double opaque sheet of thick paper with a square drawn on one side and a St. Andrew's cross on the other. Each agent looked on one side without any notion what was on the other. One percipient declared that "the thing won't keep still . . . I seem to see things moving about. . . . First I see a thing up there and then one down there." Finally the percipient drew a square and drew a cross inside from corner to corner saying afterward "I don't know what made me put it inside."

He also attempted to find out what is really transmitted—the idea, or name of the object or the visual impressions. He observed the transmission of irregular drawings was very difficult and that in some cases the idea or name, and not the visual impression at all, was the thing transferred.

Engineer and psychical researcher René Warcollier made an interesting table of the comparative facility in transmission. He found the percentage of color transmission 70 percent; of attitudes, 55 percent; drawings, 45 percent; objects, 38 percent; ideas 37 percent; mental images, 10 percent; words and figures 10 percent. Russian experimenter Dr. N. Kotik found that the percentage of successes increased when the agent and percipient were linked by a wire.

Objections to the reality of thought-transference is primarily two-fold: chance and natural parallelism of kindred minds. Stage demonstrations of thought-transference are known to be explained by a secret code. Sometimes, however, more subtle sensitivity may be present. The stage performer Mrs. Zancig, for instance, was found by James Hewat McKenzie in experiments at the British College of Psychic Science to possess a marked gift of clairvoyance to the degree of reading passages in closed books.

Sources:

Braddon, Russell. The Piddingtons. London: Werner Laurie, 1950.

Gurney, Edmund, F. W. H. Myers, and Frank Podmore. Phantasms of the Living. 2 vols. London: Trubner, 1886. Reprint, Gainesville, Fla.: Scholars' Facsimiles, 1970. Abridged edition, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975. Abridged Edition, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

Ostrander, Sheila, and Lynn Schroeder. Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1970. Reprint, New York: Bantam, 1971. Reprinted as Psi: Psychic Discoveries Behind the Iron Curtain. London: Abacus 1973.

Podmore, Frank. Apparitions and Thought Transference. London: Scott; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1895.

Rhine, J. B. Extrasensory Perception. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1934. Reprint, Boston: Branden, 1964.

Schmeidler, Gertrude R., ed. Extrasensory Perception. New York: Atherton, 1969.

Schwarz, Berthold Eric. Parent-Child Telepathy: Five Hundred and Five Possible Episodes in a Family; A Study of the Telepathy of Everyday Life. New York: Garrett Publications, 1971.

Sinclair, Upton. Mental Radio. Pasadena, Calif.: The Author, 1930. Revised edition, Springfield, Ill.: C. C. Thomas, 1962.

Thomas, N. W. Thought Transference: A Critical and Historical Review of the Evidence for Telepathy. London: De La More Press, 1905.

Warcollier, René. Experimental Telepathy. Boston: Boston Society for Psychical Research, 1938. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. Mind to Mind. Creative Age Press, 1948. Reprint, New York: Macmillan, 1963.

Thouless, Robert Henry (1894–1984)

Psychologist, parapsychologist, and president of the Society for Psychical Research, London, from 1942–45. He was born July 15, 1894, in Norwich, England. He studied at Cambridge University, England (B.A. hons., 1914; M.A., 1919; Ph.D., 1922). After serving in World War I, he was a lecturer of psychology at Manchester University in 1921 and moved on to Glasgow University in 1926, and the Department of Education, Cambridge University in 1938.

His initial interest in parapsychology began about 1934 and was stimulated by contact with the experimental work of J. B. Rhine. After that, parapsychology became a prominent theme for half a century of his life. He published nearly ninety articles and book reviews in the Journal and Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research.

Through the years, Thouless conducted many experiments in card-calling, psychokinesis, and other areas of parapsychology. He created many of the current terms used in parapsychology out of the realization that some of the original terms, such as "extrasensory perception," carried with them a suggestion of their operation—in this case "perception." He coined the less-committal term "psi." He and his colleague B. P. Weiser also coined the terms "psi Gamma" and "psi Kappa" to replace ESP and PK.

In distinction to parapsychologists who disparaged the study of spontaneous phenomena, Thouless maintained that it had value in structuring experimental methods:

"The special function of the study of spontaneous cases is to serve as a guide to the problems to be investigated by experimental methods. . . . [The] choice is not between statistics and experiment on the one hand and observation of spontaneous cases on the other. Let us have much more of both. . . . New problems for experimental investigation may be suggested by new observations of spontaneously occurring phenomena."

On the question of survival, he proposed a cautious optimism, and about 1948 devised a cipher test of survival which he believed was his most significant contribution to parapsychology. The test used a standard method of encipherment with a secret key passage. It consisted of two coded sequences: INXPJ CJKGM JIRPR FBCVY WYVES NOECN SCVHE GYRJO TEBJM TGXAT TWPNH CNYBC FNXPJ LFXRV QWQL and BTYRR OOFLLH KCDXK FWPCZ KTADR GFHKA HTYXO ALZUP PYPVF AYMMF SDLR UVUB. The key to the first sequence was a passage of poetry or prose indicated by reference to its title, and the key to the second sequence consisted of two words. The key passage necessary to cipher the test might have been transmitted posthumously as a proof of survival of consciousness. This method obviated the objection that a claimed posthumous communication might be read by clairvoyance if left in a sealed envelope. The Thouless test did not involve any sealed message and only the correct key would solve the enciphered message. In the event of a claimed posthumous message, percipients were asked to contact the Society for Psychical Research so that it might be keyed into the society's computer program to see if it yielded a correct message.

Thouless was an active member of the Society for Psychical Research and served on its council. He was elected president in 1942. In the end he was willing to consider the religious implications of psi and argued that parapsychology pointed to a more interesting world in which God and what has been termed the supernatural play their part. Thouless died at the age of 90 on September 25, 1984.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Thouless, Robert Henry. Authority and Freedom. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1954.

———. Experimental Psychical Research. Baltimore, Md.: Penquin, 1963.

———. From Anecdote to Experiment in Psychical Research. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1972.

———. “The Present Position of Experimental Research into Telepathy and Related Phenomena.” Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 47 (1943).

———. “Problems of Design in Parapsychological Experiments.” Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (1955).

———. “Psychical Research Past and Present.” [Myers Memorial Lecture] Journal of the Society for Psychical Research (1952).

———. Straight and Crooked Thinking. N.p., 1930. Reprinted as How to Think Straight. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1939.

3a Visao

3a Visao (3rd Vision) is one of two newsstand periodicals serving the psychic and esoteric community of Portugal. Launched in 1997, it is designed to cover issues in the areas of mysticism, parapsychology, spiritualism, astrology, nonconventional science, and natural medicine. Each issue includes a set of feature articles that cover psychic experiences, esoteric sciences (astrology, numerology, etc.), health, and the personal appropriation of esoteric truth (an inner vision). The esoteric community in Portugal, while having a long history, remains relatively small, though it has been bolstered by the influx of immigrants from Asia and the Middle East during the last decades of the twentieth century. The older theosophical and Spiritualist organizations have been joined by groups promoting new religions, Asian healing techniques, and channeling. As the great majority of the Portuguese public is unfamiliar with the occult world, many of the articles are presented at an introductory level. While a range of literature available in Portuguese is advertised, the magazine does not include a book review column.

3a Visao is a full-color magazine published by 3a Visao Editors and edited by a man who goes by the single name of Pápalus. He is assisted by a staff of writers drawn from the Portuguese-speaking communities in Brazil and India. 3a Visao also cosponsors events in Portugal aimed at promoting its general area of interest. 3a Visao may be contacted at its editorial offices at Rua Almirante Cesar Augusto Campos Rodrigues, n.16–13 Esq., 2795 Carnaxide, Portugal.

Sources:

3a Visao. Carnaxide, Portugal, n.d.

3D Nibiruan Council

The 3D Nibiruan Council is one of several channeling organizations that, like the Ashtar Command, claim contact with a set of extraterrestrial beings. Its earthly presence dates from 1992 and a traumatic experience in the life of a trainer and entrepreneur named Jocelyn. While in the hospital for an abortion, she lost consciousness, and a second personality who called herself Jelaila emerged in her place. The new personality described herself as a walk-in. Jelaila assumed the role of mother to Jocelyn's daughter Daniele.

Jelaila describes her pre-embodied life as that of a 9th-dimensional being. When she walked in, she was unaware of her mission but in May 1993 made contact with Devin, the head of the 9D Nibiruan Council. He began training her and awakening her to her role as a channel and voice of the Nibiruan Council on earth.

The Greater Nibiruan Council is seen as the largest council of the Galactic Federation (the interplanetary authority mentioned and described in flying saucer contactee literature beginning since the 1950s). It serves as the primary governing arm of the Federation. Among its many duties are supporting Federation emissaries to various planets, developing communications between various planetary beings, and initiating training for potential new members of the Federation (such as Earth).

The Greater Nibiruan Council consists of a set of what are described as dimensional councils, among them being the 9D (or ninth dimension) Nibiruan Council. This oldest Council in the Greater Council has the task of coordinating efforts with other councils and with various Spiritual Hierarchies for the evolution of all souls. In particular it has charge of the Earth Grand Experiment. The 9D Nibiruan Council is said to be composed of two royal families, Aln and Avyon, from the Lyra constellation.

The 3D Nibiruan Council has the responsibility of representing the higher councils on Earth and of supplying the 9D tools of Integration to Earthlings. It carries out this function through the publication of books and other materials and the sponsoring of seminars and workshops. The 3D Council was formally organized in 1996 in Kansas City, Missouri, and moved to Los Angeles in 1998. That same year, Jelaila married John Starr. In December 1998, John Starr experienced a walk-in and was replaced by an entity personality named Jehowah, a 9D Council member and brother of Divan who had trained Jelaila.

The Nibiruan Council is one of a spectrum of groups that see the human race preparing for ascension to a higher dimension in the near future and who see a key to that ascension being the recodings of the individual's DNA. It offers training in what is termed the Accelerated DNA Recoding Process. This training among its many benefits, releases painful memories of the past. The Council also offers training in the realization and manifestation on compassion.

A more complete description of the larger Nibiruan Council and a presentation of its program are found on its website at <http://www.nibiruancouncil.com/>.

Sources:

3D Nibiruan Council. <http://www.nibiruancouncil.com/>. February 28, 2000.

3HO Foundation

Educational branch of the Sikh Dharma, a Sikh religious group founded by Shri Singh Bhai Sahib Harbhajan Singh Khalsa Yogiji, popularly known as Yogi Bhanjan in Los Angeles in the late 1960s. “3HO” means “Healthy, Happy, Holy Organization,” and is based on the idea that it is everyone's birthright to obtain these three characteristics. The foundation provides teacher training courses, lectures, and demonstrations in all types of yoga, with special emphasis on kundalini yoga.

The group is also focused on “the uplift of the dignity and respect of womanhood.” Programs such as the Khalsa Women's Training Camp and Young Women's Camp are specialized to unleash the inner potential of women. Publications include a journal Prosperity Paths Address: P.O. Box 2337, Espanola, NM 87532. Website: <http://www.3ho.org/>.

Sources:

Kundalini Yoga/Sadhana Guidelines. Pomona, Calif.: KRI Publications, 1978.

Healthy Happy Holy Organization. <http://www.3ho.org/>. March 8, 2000.

Thule Society

German occult society founded in Munich in 1918 by Adam Glauer (1875–1945) who styled himself Rudolf, Freiherr von Sebottendorf. This was an anti-Semitic society that had links with Adolf Hitler through the German Workers' Party (later National Socialist German Workers Party). The activities of the Thule Group were as much political as occult, and their sphere of influence included judges, police chiefs, professors, and industrialists.

Dietrich Eckart, a central figure in the Thule Group, also played a prominent part in the committee of the German Workers' Party and became one of the seven founder members of the Nazi Party. When he died in December 1923, he is reported to have said: "Follow Hitler! He will dance, but it is I who have called the tune! I have initiated him into the 'Secret Doctrine,' opened his centers in vision and given him the means to communicate with the Powers. Do not mourn for me: I shall have influenced history more than any other German."

Sources:

- Howe, Ellic. Urania's Children: The Strange World of the Astrologers. London, 1967. Reprinted as Astrology: A Recent History Including the Untold Story of its Role in World War II. Walker, 1968.
- King, Francis. Satan and Swastika: The Occult and the Nazi Party. London: Mayflower, 1976.
- Ravenscroft, Trevor. The Spear of Destiny. London, 1973.
- Webb, James. The Occult Establishment. LaSalle, Ill.: Open Court Publishing, 1976.

Thurston, Herbert Henry Charles (S. J.) (1856–1939)

Roman Catholic priest, historian, and writer on parapsychological subjects. He was born on November 15, 1856, in London. He was educated at Séminaire St. Malo, France; Mount St. Mary's, Derbyshire, England; Stonyhurst, Lancashire, England; Manresa House, Roehampton; and the University of London. He became a novice in the Society of Jesus in 1874. During his lengthy career he authored over 700 articles, essays, pamphlets, and translations.

In 1919 he joined the Society for Psychological Research, London, and was active in its deliberation for the rest of his life. He became one of its most widely read members, which compensated for the fact that as a practicing Roman Catholic he could not attend séances, even as an observer. He was particularly interested in poltergeist phenomena and Spiritualism, and also made a study of miraculous and paranormal events associated with holy people and saints in Roman Catholicism. While his opinions in general represented a minority opinion in parapsychological circles, he was a well-respected scholar.

His books include: Beauraing and Other Apparitions (1934), The Church and Spiritualism (1933), Ghosts and Poltergeists (1953), The Memory of Our Dead (1915), Physical Phenomena of Mysticism (1955), Superstition (1933), and Surprising Mystics (1955).

He died November 3, 1939.

Sources:

- Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.
- Crehan, J. Father Thurston. London: Sheed and Ward, 1952.
- Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.
- Thurston, Herbert. "The Phenomena of Stigmatization." Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research 32, no. 83 (1922).

Thury, Marc (1822–1905)

Swiss psychical researcher, professor of physics and natural history at the University of Geneva, and a pioneer of investigations into telekinesis phenomena. In a small pamphlet Les Tables tournantes (1855) he reviewed Count de Gasparin's experiments and detailed his own observations with a circle of private friends under test conditions. He was the first exponent of the theory of ectoplasm. He named the substance that he believed to be a link between the soul and body "psychode," and the force that manipulated it "ectenic force." This force, he believed, was subject to the will power of the medium.

While De Gasparin repudiated Spiritism as absurd and contrary to moral truth, Thury contended that while "the known facts are not as yet sufficient for the demonstration of the spirit theory," yet "the absurdity of the belief in the intervention of spirits has not been scientifically demonstrated." He asserted that there may exist in this world wills other than those of man and the animals, wills capable of acting on matter.

Sources:

- Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.
- Thury, Marc. Les Tables tournantes. Geneva, 1855.

TIBET

Historical Background

Tibet is a country with ancient religious and mystical traditions that, over the last two centuries, have become the focus of occult legends. The peaceful accumulation of data on Tibet was abruptly altered following the Chinese communist invasion in October 1950, when Tibet lost its independent status. On May 23, 1951, Tibetan leaders were obliged to sign a Sino-Tibetan agreement for "the peaceful liberation of Tibet."

Tibetans had formerly been a separate people with a distinctive language, culture, and religion, but had been in an uneasy relationship with China since 1720, when the Manchus entered Tibet to help drive out Mongol invaders and used the situation to become overlords. Over the subsequent period, the acknowledgment of Chinese suzerainty was the price of Tibetan autonomy, but for practical purposes Tibet was an independent state.

The 1950 invasion was justified by the Chinese as necessary in order to destroy inequitable feudalism in Tibet and to bring progress, education, and social justice. In practice, this involved suppression of the Buddhist religion, destruction of monasteries and their libraries, and the public humiliation of priests. Tibet was a theocratic society and any reorganization of its governmental system would necessarily involve the destruction of the power held by the Buddhist religious functionaries.

In all fairness, it must be said that these and other reported violations of human rights were largely paralleled by similar excesses in China itself in the early period of the communist revolution and the upheavals of the Cultural Revolution. Since then, however, the age-old Buddhist religion of Tibet has been largely suppressed and related occult practices replaced by practical socialism and exploitation of Tibetan resources and territory.

Religion and Superstition

Buddhism came to Tibet from India in the eighth century C.E. and it pushed aside the earlier polytheistic and magical religion of the Tibetan people. However, the price of the conquest was the integration of many of the old deities, beliefs, and occult practices into the unique form of Buddhism that emerged in the land. Also moving into Tibet from India was a form of Hindu tantra, with its emphasis upon the subtle energies of the body and ritualized sex. Strong superstitions, belief in ghosts, demons, and magic coexisted with deep mystical thought.

The apostle of Buddhism in Tibet was named Padmasambhava and entered the country in the 1740s. As Buddhism developed, it divided into various sects, the degree of acceptance of the local religion being an important differentiating factor. The four main groups are popularly distinguished by the color of the hats their followers wear. The older Red Caps or Ningmapas, for example, follow the Adi-Yoga or path of the Great Perfection, founded by the guru Padmasambhava, while the Yellow Cap sect or Gelugpas follow a Middle Way Buddhism; the Kargyütpas, or Followers of Successive Order (deriving from the great Tibetan saint Milarepa, died 1135, successor of the revered gurus Marpa, Tilopa, and Naropa) follow the way of Mahamudra or Great Symbol. As with the various sects of Hindu religious philosophy, with their many subtle emphases, the general overall philosophy of the four groups is the same.

By the fifteenth century a teaching had emerged in Tibet that the heads of all of the many monasteries were bodhisattvas, highly evolved beings who were refraining from entering Nirvana to assist other souls in their spiritual pilgrimage. The monastic rulers, or lamas, thus attained a unique role in Tibetan Buddhism as well as significant political power as temporal rulers.

The present spiritual leader of Tibet, the fourteenth Dalai Lama, who escaped to India in 1959, and the other lamas and their successors, are dedicated to keeping alive the spiritual traditions and the political aspirations to independence of the Tibetan people.

Like his predecessors, the Dalai Lama is claimed as a living incarnation of the Divine Spirit, and was discovered as such by traditional search and testing. When a Dalai Lama (or any lama for that matter) departs from life, priests traditionally conduct a search for his successor through signs and visions. Selected children are tested by their ability to recognize objects belonging to the former Dalai Lama. After identification, the child is brought to the holy city of Lhasa and initiated as a monk in the monastery of the Potala, which becomes a power center of the Divine Spirit, which issues forth from the Dalai Lama over the whole of Tibet. As Tibetan Buddhism has spread to the west and lamas have died in the west, the search for successors has also been conducted in the families of Western converts and several European children have been "identified" as reincarnated lamas.

The title "Dalai Lama" is from a Mongolian term meaning "Wide Ocean," and is not normally used by Tibetans among themselves, who prefer such terms as "Precious Protector" or "Precious Ruler," of Kundun (Presence), implying spiritual association. The first Dalai Lama was Tsong Ka-pa, born in Am-do in 1358. His disciples became the Yellow Hat sect, as distinct from the earlier priesthood of the Red Hats.

In addition to the regular monastic disciplines of complex prayer, meditation rites, and regular religious festivals, lamas traveling through Tibet were expected to act as oracles, fortune-tellers, and healers for the ordinary people. Prayer wheels with the mystic mantra "Om mani padme Hum" (Om, The Jewel in the Lotus) and rosaries were in use all over the country, and groups of prayer-flags fluttered around the villages. In the monasteries, tankas (complex symbolic mandala banners) became a focus for mystical meditation.

It is not difficult to understand why Lamaism should be permeated with demonology in view of the vast and terrifying grandeur of the Tibetan environment, in which the forces of nature appear to have the power of supernatural beings. Belief in magic was once universal.

The Dalai Lama came under attack in 1998 when he publicly announced that Dorje Shugden practices should no longer be performed by any sect of Tibetan Buddhism. Shugden has been regarded as a protector spirit of the Geluk sect, to which the Dalai Lama himself belongs. However, after studying ancient texts and consulting the state oracle, the Dalai Lama is convinced that Shugden is a hungry spirit and therefore incorrect to worship and regard as a protector for the Buddhist. Due to the Dalai Lama's opposing view, he is accused by some Buddhists for being a religious censor. Since the Tibetan culture and religion is thought to be near extinction, the Dalai Lama attempted to set a level of commonality between all sects of Buddhism. The great controversy that resulted from this attempted act of unification, may have also been the cause for the deaths of three monks in the Dalai Lama's inner circle.

Dissent within the Tibetan culture may be the result of the larger issues that still exist between Chinese and the Tibetan government-in-exile. The Chinese government seeks to control, and ultimately squelch, the Tibetan Buddhism religion. Ultimately the set-up of the religious hierarchy may become the demise of the religion itself. The Dalai Lama exists as the highest, top authority, while the Panchen Lama is the second in command, and the Karampa is the third in power. Presently the Panchen Lama, a boy of ten years, will be the one to choose the next Dalai Lama. However, with the aging Dalai Lama living in India, the Panchen Lama is still being held under Chinese supervision. This is a direct example of the Chinese wishing to control the Buddhist chain of command, and influence the continuity of the religion. The Chinese government conducted the search for this present Panchen Lama but the Dalai Lama announced their discovery publicly before ever having met him. The boy has never even been in Dharmasala, India. Thus, the boy has become a political pawn between the Dalai Lama (Tibetan Buddhism) and the Chinese government.

The Karampa, third in command, has been raised to heed the Chinese government as well. However, on December 28, 1999, he made his escape from Tibet to India to be united with the Dalai Lama. The two men met "as if a father was meeting his dear son after a long separation". The Dalai Lama reported his spirit as clear and strong saying after proper instruction he will be able to make great contributions. The struggle between Tibet and China continues and therefore the outcome of the survival of Tibetan Buddhism.

David-Neel's Psychic Sports

For centuries, Tibet was a forbidden territory to Westerners, and only a handful of Europeans succeeded in penetrating the country, usually in disguise. From 1912 on, an intrepid Frenchwoman, Alexandra David-Neel, began a series of travels through Tibet over fourteen years. She acquired the rank of lama.

An Oriental scholar, David-Neel learned Sanskrit and Tibetan and studied the various forms of Buddhism and Lamaism. She became the first European woman to penetrate the holy city of Lhasa. Although skeptical regarding the supernatural, she gained firsthand experience of Tibetan ghosts and demons and saw the paranormal feats of mystics. In her book With Mystics and Magicians in Tibet (1931), she revealed how Tibetan mystics acquired the ability to live naked in zero temperatures by generating a protective body heat (tumo), how they learned to float in air and walk on water, and how they brought corpses back to life or created thoughtforms that had independent existence.

She described such feats as "psychic sports," acquired by special mind and body training. Amongst such feats was the lung-gom training of "inner breathing" and meditation, which enabled an individual to travel at high speed for days and nights without stopping, sometimes with the feet hardly touching the ground. David-Neel herself witnessed a lung-gom-pa, or swift traveler. She described the special training necessary for feats of levitation and for thought-reading and telepathy ("sending thoughts on the wind").

She successfully experimented in the creation of a tulpa or phantom thoughtforms. After a period in isolation following special concentration techniques, she claimed that she succeeded in creating a phantom monk, who became a guest in her party, seen and accepted by the others. But in the course of time, this phantom form changed from a fat jolly monk, becoming lean, mocking, and somewhat malignant, and it was necessary for her to concentrate on special techniques to destroy a phantom, which was beginning to take on independent life.

She explained that Tibetans believed that such psychic phenomena were the result of utilizing natural forces by the powers of the mind. Her experiences seem to have been the result of a long and intimate association with Tibet and its peoples in a period when magic and mystery were more common. Few subsequent travelers have reported such remarkable phenomena, and her books survive as a unique record of a Tibet that has largely been destroyed. However, they helped create the image of Tibet as a place where the most successful mastery of the occult arts had been made. The spread of Buddhist masters to the west has done much to offer a more mundane picture of Tibetan life.

Tibetan medicine, the fundamentals virtually unchanged for 2,000 years, is completely intertwined with Tibetan Buddhism, in that they are based on the most essential Buddhist belief, that of karma. Thus, unhealthy human actions, such as greed, hatred, and desire can be the cause of disease. Like karma, disease can be caused from present as well as past actions. Disease is also thought to be caused by an imbalance of the three basic humors of the body—air, bile, and phlegm. Diagnosis consists of three techniques, visual observation, pulse reading, and questioning. Simply put, Tibetan medicine is highly holistic in the areas of diagnosis and treatment. Treatments are usually always of the non-invasive variety. Lifestyle changes are recommended, medicines are made of herbs, and “surgery” consists of acupuncture, cauterization, hot and cold compresses, hot springs and vapor treatments.

A lot can be learned from Tibetan medicine by Western countries, as it and its practitioners listen and are aware of the individual body, as an extension of religion. The body then exists as only part of the whole scheme of the universe.

It is still too early to predict whether the upheavals of the last half of the twentieth century will involve a permanent loss of spiritual and psychic identity for the Tibetan people. Those many Tibetans who moved into exile have established strong enclaves of traditional Tibetan culture and many people have given of their time, energy, and financial resources to see that the manuscripts and artifacts taken out of the country are preserved.

Sources:

Bernard, Theos. Land of a Thousand Buddhas. London: Rider, 1952.

Bromage, Bernard. Tibetan Yoga. London: Aquarian Press, 1952.

“A Buddha Busts Out: Inside the Dramatic Escape of a Living Buddha.” Newsweek 135 (March 6, 2000): 38.

Chang, Garma C. C., trans. The Hundred Thousand Songs of Milarepa. 2 vols. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1962.

———. Teachings of Tibetan Yoga. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1963.

David-Neel, Alexandra. My Journey to Lhasa. London: William Heinemann, 1927.

———. With Mystics and Magicians in Tibet. London: John Lane, 1931. Reprinted as Magic & Mystery in Tibet. New York: Claude H. Kendall, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1956.

David-Neel, Alexandra, and Lama Yongden. The Secret Oral Teachings in Tibetan Buddhist Sects. Calcutta, India: Maha Bodhi Society of India, n.d.

Evans-Wentz, W. Y. Tibet's Great Yogi Milarepa. London: Oxford University Press, 1928.

Gore, Donald R. “Tibetan Medicine.” Perspectives in Biology and Medicine 42 (Winter '99): 270–71.

Harrer, Heinrich. Return to Tibet. London: Weinfeld & Nicholson, 1984.

———. Seven Years in Tibet. London: Rupert Hart-Davis; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1953.

Klein, Richard. “The World's Youngest Political Prisoner.” The Humanist. 59 (March 1999): 91.

Tibet and Freedom. The Tibet Society of the United Kingdom, 1961.

Tibetan Government in Exile Official Website. <http://www.tibet.com/>. June 19, 2000.

Waddell, L. Austine. Tibetan Buddhism: With Its Mystic Cults, Symbolism and Mythology, and in Its Relation to Indian Buddhism. London: W. H. Allen, 1895. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1972.

Wilson, Mike. “Schisms, Murder, and Hungry Ghosts in Shangra-La.” Cross Currents 49 (Spring 1999): 251.

Woodward, Kenneth. “A Scratch in the Teflon Lama.” 131 (May 11, 1998): 64.

“The Tibetan”

The Master, known in theosophical circles as Dhwal Khul (under various spellings) who first spoke to Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, and in the early twentieth century spoke through Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949). Bailey, formerly a member of the Theosophical Society, withdrew in the 1920s and established the Arcane School in New York.

Tibetan Foundation

The Tibetan Foundation began in June of 1982 when Janet McClure established contact with the Ascended Master Djwal Khul. He asked her to assist him in his work of helping people in their own spiritual progress and bringing about the coming New Age. Previously she had studied with the Brotherhood of the White Light, from whom she received a doctorate degree, and was happy to join in the work. Djwal Khul is the same master who was originally identified by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891) as one of the spiritual hierarchy and later was credited with channeling a number of volumes through Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949). Bailey generally referred to Djwal Khul as The Tibetan.

While McClure was generally thought of as channeling The Tibetan, she spoke of his overshadowing her. Overshadowing is a special connection by which they became permanently linked. The Tibetan was thought to be anchored in McClure's head. He could speak through her without the necessity of her entering a trance state.

The foundation was established in Youngstown, Arizona, but soon developed affiliate centers in Colorado and California. Once launched on her new endeavor, McClure channeled a considerable amount of material from The Tibetan that was published in a number of booklets. She also began to channel from other beings such as Vywamus and Lenduce. She was among the first of the channels to receive material from both the spiritual hierarchy and the space hierarchy led by Ashtar. Receiving from both hierarchies would become common in the 1990s. The channels associated with the foundation would become part of the post-New Age Movement that was focused in the Sedona Journal of Emergence.

McClure channeled only eight years before passing away in 1990. However, by that time other channels had become associated with the Tibetan Foundation and had begun to channel the various masters previously channeled by McClure, especially The Tibetan and Vywamus. Light Technology Publishing, the parent company that produces the Sedona Journal of Emergence, published many of McClure's volumes of channeled material and keeps them in print at present.

Sources:

Bjorling, Joel. Channeling: A Bibliographic Exploration. New York: Garland Publishing, 1992.

McClure, Janet [Vywamus]. Sanat Kumara: Training a Planetary Logos. Sedona, Ariz.: Light Technology Publishing, 1989.

———. Scopes of Dimensions. Sedona, Ariz.: Light Technology Publishing, 1989.

———. The Source Adventure. Sedona, Ariz.: Light Technology Publishing, 1988.

Tii

A Polynesian vampire.

Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie

Major Dutch journal of parapsychology, founded and edited for many years by W. H. C. Tenhaeff (1894–1981) and more recently edited by Dick J. Bierman. It functions as the journal of both the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (the Dutch Society for Psychical Research) and the Parapsychology Institute. Address: Springweg 7, 3511 VH Utrecht, The Netherlands.

Tillyard, R(ubin) J(ohn) (1881–1937)

British psychical researcher and biologist, vice president of the National Laboratory of Psychical Research in 1926. He was born in Norwich, England, on January 31, 1881. He was educated at Dover College, and Queen's College, Cambridge University (M.A., Sc.D.). Following his graduation in 1903 he migrated to Australia and taught at the Sydney Grammar School for a decade (1904–13) before becoming a Fellow in Zoology at Sydney University (1914–17) and then a lecturer in zoology in 1917. In 1920 he became Chief Entomologist to the Commonwealth of Australia.

He traveled to England and the United States in the 1920s to sit with mediums, especially Mina Crandon (“Margery”). This sitting convinced him of survival of bodily death. He published his convictions in 1928 in Nature. In a “solus” sitting with “Margery” in Boston, he obtained apparent fingerprints of “Walter,” the control. In his enthusiastic letter to Sir Oliver Lodge he stated: “This séance is, for me, the culminating point of all my psychical research; I can now say, if I so desire, nunc dimittis, and go on with my own legitimate entomological work.” However, there now seems little doubt that this particular phenomenon was fraudulent.

During his association with psychical researcher Harry Price at the National Laboratory of Psychical Research, Tillyard also investigated the phenomena of Eleonore Zügün and Stella C.

In his book Confessions of a Ghost Hunter (1936; 1974), Harry Price described a visit to Jeanne Laplace, a French clairvoyant, who gave a remarkable series of correct statements about Tillyard through simply holding a letter from him (without seeing the letter itself). The impressions included the prediction, later fulfilled, that he would die in a railway accident.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Evans, J. W. The Life and Work of Robin John Tillyard, 1881–1937. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 1963.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Tillyard, R. J. “Evidence of Survival of a Human Personality.” Nature 122 (August 28, 1928).

———. “Science and Psychical Research.” Nature 118 (1926).

Timaeus of Locri (ca. 400 B.C.E.)

One of the earliest known writers on the doctrines of magic. He was a Pythagorean philosopher born in Locri, Italy, and lived ca. 420–380 B.C.E. He is credited with the work On the Soul of the Universe, although some historians believe this may be an abridgement of Plato's dialogue of Timaeus.

The Timaeian theory of God, the Universe, and the World-soul was thus set forth by A. F. Büsching:

“God shaped the eternal unformed matter by imparting to it His being. The inseparable united itself with the separable; the unvarying with the variable; and, moreover, in the harmonic conditions of the Pythagorean system. To comprehend all things better, infinite space was imagined as divided into three portions, which are—the centre, the circumference, and the intermediate space.

“The centre is most distant from the highest God, who inhabits the circumference; the space between the two contains the celestial spheres. When God descended to impart His being, the emanations from Him penetrated the whole of heaven, and filled the same with imperishable bodies. Its power decreased with the distance from the source, and lost itself gradually in our world in minute portions, over which matter was still dominant.

“From this proceeds the continuous change of being and decay below the moon, where the power of matter predominates; from this, also, arise the circular movements of the heaven and the earth, the various rapidities of the stars, and the peculiar motion of the planets. By the union of God with matter, a third being was created, namely, the world-soul, which vitalizes and regulates all things, and occupies the space between the centre and the circumference.”

Plato's Timaeus also tells the legendary story of the lost drowned continent of Atlantis.

Time (in Paranormal Perception)

Time is an element of uncertainty in paranormal functions. Yet we know from hypnotic experiments that the subconscious mind has a remarkable faculty in estimating time. J. Milne Bramwell made classical demonstrations, such as suggesting to a hypnotic subject, Miss A., that at the expiration of 11.470 minutes, she should make a cross on a piece of paper and note the time. Out of 55 similar experiments, 45 were completed successfully.

One would expect that if an entity, communicating through an entranced individual, was either a hypnotic or secondary personality, that the entity should demonstrate the same consciousness of time discovered by Bramwell. Such has not been the case. Its surprising absence needs an alternative explanation. Certainly fraudulent production of the entity by the medium would explain the lack of time consciousness. Spiritualists have suggested that the odd relationship to time, often manifesting displacements of a day or more, provides additional proof of the presence of extraneous entities in séances.

In one instance, “Pelham,” a spirit control of Leonora Piper, was often asked to go and see what a certain friend was doing at the moment. The account that he gave on his return often contained descriptions that applied to happenings a day after or what he thought a day before.

The psychical researcher S. G. Soal received through Blanche Cooper communication from Gordon Davis, a friend who, a few months after, turned up alive. Through the medium, he gave a description of his house. The description was incorrect at the time he turned up but perfectly matched his home a year after.

In clairvoyant perceptions, a similar uncertainty is often noticed. The percipients often do not know whether the visions of events that unfold themselves refer to the past or future. There is a good instance in Quaker history. George Fox cried “Woe to the bloody city of Lichfield” as he passed through it, and discovered later this was not a prophecy but a psychometric sensation of the martyrdoms in a past age. The British investigator J. W. Dunne observed a mixture of past and future elements in dreams, as described in experiments he conducted.

Sources:

Bramwell, J. Milne. Hypnotism. London: G. Richards, 1903.

Dunne, J. W. An Experiment with Time. London: A. & C. Black; New York: Macmillan, 1927.

Time Pattern Research Institute

A New York astrological corporation founded May 1967, bringing modern technology to horoscopes. The institute used an IBM 360-30 computer in conjunction with well-known astrologer Katina Theodossiou. The computer's memory banks held twenty-five million items of basic information. Individual horoscopes ran to ten thousand words, including character analysis and future trends, and the company merchandized hundreds of thousands of horoscopes, using department stores as outlets. The service provided by the institute became obsolete as the slew of astrological computers permeated the market. (See also Astroflash)

Tingley, Katherine (Augusta Westcott) (1847–1929)

Prominent American Theosophist who founded a Theosophical community at Point Loma, California. Tingley was born on July 6, 1847, at Newburyport, Massachusetts, and was educated at a public school in Newburyport and under a private instructress. She took an early interest in social work before becoming active in the fields of Spiritualism and later Theosophy. In 1887, she formed the Society of Mercy (concerned with emergency relief work on New York's East Side). At this time she became known as a Spiritualist medium.

Through her social work she met theosophist William Q. Judge, who made a profound impression on her. With the sponsorship of Judge, one of the co-founders of the Theosophical Society, she quickly became an important figure in the American branch.

After the death of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky in 1891, Judge led the majority of American Theosophists in a secession from the international society then headed by Annie Besant and Henry S. Olcott. Judge died in March 1896, and his independent Theosophical Society in America stated that he had nominated a successor, referred to in symbolic language as "The Purple Mother." A month later, E. T. Hargrove, then president of the Theosophical Society in America, confirmed that "The Purple Mother" was Katherine Tingley.

Soon afterward, Tingley began a World Crusade for Theosophy, during which she claimed to have encountered a theosophical master in Darjeeling. Upon returning to the United States, she founded the School for the Revival of the Lost Mysteries of Antiquity, at Point Loma, California. She also founded the Universal Brotherhood organization, and after taking charge of the Theosophical Society, she merged it with the Universal Brotherhood. Permanent headquarters were established at Point Loma, San Diego, California, in 1900.

During the Spanish-American War, Katherine Tingley organized the War Relief Corps and established an emergency hospital on Long Island for soldiers wounded in Cuba. In 1899 the International Brotherhood League, a department of the Theosophical Society, undertook relief work in Cuba. Later, Tingley visited Cuba and brought a group of children to Point Loma for education. She was first obliged to prove the financial and moral competence of the society to take charge of the children. She was funded by the U.S. government to establish hospitals in Cuba, and in 1925 was awarded the Medal of Honor of the German Red Cross. In 1924 she established a summer school for children at Visingsö, Sweden, and in the following year, she opened seven new Theosophical Centers in Europe.

Tingley was editor of Theosophical Path, published at Point Loma, as well as other Theosophical magazines in Holland, Germany, and Sweden. She also founded The New Way, a monthly magazine for free distribution to prisoners in penitentiaries and jails.

She died July 11, 1929, in Sweden, after an automobile accident in Germany, and was succeeded at the Point Loma community by Dr. Gottfried de Purucker. The community survived until World War II when a combination of financial difficulties and the strategic position of the community's land on the Point Loma peninsula led to its sale. The property is now the site of a college.

Sources:

Greenwalt, Emmett A. California Utopia: Point Loma, 1897–1942. San Diego, 1978.

Tingley, Katherine. The Gods Await. Point Loma, Calif., 1929.

———. Theosophy and Some of the Vital Problems of the Day. N.p., 1915.

———. Theosophy, The Path of the Mystic. Point Loma, Calif., 1922. Reprint, Pasadena, Calif.: Theosophical University Press, 1977.

———. The Voice of the Soul. Point Loma, Calif., 1928.

———. The Wine of Life. Point Loma, Calif.: Woman's International Theosophical League, 1925.

———. The Wisdom of the Heart: Katherine Tingley Speaks. Compiled by W. Emmett Small. San Diego, 1978.

Tischner, Rudolf (1879–1961)

Ophthalmologist of Munich, who entered the ranks of leading German psychical researchers in 1919 with the publication of his Über Telepathie und Hellssehen, one of the groundworks on the subject (translated into English as Telepathy and Clairvoyance, 1925). It was followed in 1920 by a small book on the clairvoyant Ludwig Aub, Einführung in den Okkultismus und Spiritismus, and Monismus und Okkultismus.

Tischner was also the author of many small monographs and of a large historic work: Geschichte der okkultistischen Forschung. Von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart (1924), which was published as the second volume to August F. Ludwig's Geschichte der okkultistischen Forschung bis zur Gegenwart . . . Mitte des 19 Jahrhunderts. It is a comprehensive and careful survey of the history of psychical research. The Society for Psychical Research, London, honored this work by making Tischner a corresponding member. He published a study under the title Fernfühlen und Mesmerismus, (1925) which deals with the experiments of Eugene Rochas on the exteriorization of sensibility.

With his research, lectures, and propaganda work Tischner did a great deal for the advancement of psychic science in Germany prior to the disruptions of the Nazi era.

His later books included: Der Okkultismus als Natur und Geisteswissenschaft (Occultism as a Natural and Philosophical Science, 1926), Ergebnisse Okkultischer Forschung (Results of Occult Research, 1950), and Geschichte der Parapsychologie (History of Parapsychology, 1960). Tischner was among the first to use the term "extrasensory perception" before it was adopted by J. B. Rhine. He died April 24, 1961 at Vierhöfen, Germany.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Tischner, Rudolf. Franz Anton Mesmer: Leben, Werk und Wirkungen. München: Verlag der Münchner Drucke, 1928.

———. Geschichte der okkultistischen Forschung. Pfülling: Johannes Baum Verlag, 1924.

Tissot, James Joseph Jacques (1836–1902)

Well-known French painter of the life of Christ, chiefly remembered in Spiritualism for his mezzotint "Apparition Medianimique," which portrayed his impressions of a materialization séance in 1885 with the medium William Eglinton. He saw the apparition of his departed fiancée accompanied by "Ernest," the guide of the medium. The painting was acquired by the London Spiritualist Alliance.

TM

Initialism for Transcendental Meditation, the popular Hindu meditation system taught by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi.

Tocquet, Robert (1898– ?)

Professor of chemistry who published books on parapsychology and the occult. He was born on June 5, 1898, in Saint-Oulph (Aube), France. He taught at the École des Travaux Publics and the École d'Anthropologie de Paris. In addition to his many books on chemistry and science, he published Encyclopédie pour la Jeunesse, a five volume encyclopedia for young people.

Tocquet had a strong interest in psychology and was a member of the board of the Institut Métapsychique International. He authored a number of articles and several books on occult topics. His titles include: Les Calculateurs prodiges et leurs secrets (The Magic of Numbers, 1957), La Médecine se tait (When Medicine is Silent, 1954), Phénomènes de médiumnité (Phenomena of Mediumship), Les Pouvoirs secrets de l'Homme (The Secret Powers of Man, 1963), and Tout l'Occultisme dévoilé (Secrets of the Occult Revealed, 1952).

Today's Astrologer

Monthly bulletin of the American Federation of Astrologers available to members of the federation. The bulletin contains news of classes, lectures, and events connected with the AFA, and substantive articles on various aspects of astrology of a professional nature. The headquarters of the federation may be reached at P.O. Box 22040, Tempe, AZ 85285 or through their web site at <http://www.astrologers.com>.

Token Object

An object associated with the subject, held by the psychic giving a reading. It might be a slip of paper with a name on it, unseen to the psychic, who gives information relative to that named person while holding the paper. It might alternatively be an object that the psychic holds while giving impressions through psychometry, i.e., apparently being sensitive to impressions from that object.

Toland, John (1670–1722)

John Toland, first chief of the revived Druid movement in England, was born on November 30, 1670, near Londonderry, Ireland. Originally named Junius Janus, he took the name John to avoid being a butt of jokes by his youthful schoolmates. Though raised a Catholic, he converted to Protestantism as a teenager. Some Irish Protestants saw to his education and eventually sent him to Glasgow. He earned his M.A. at Edinburgh in 1690. He completed his education in Leyden, Holland.

By the early 1690s, he had begun to hold liberal opinions that questioned the orthodoxy of his teachers. In 1696 he published his most famous work, Christianity not Mysterious, now considered an early classic of the Deist movement, a movement that not only denied the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, but challenged the idea of God's continued activity in the world. He soon became the subject of sermons denouncing his thought. After the Irish House of Commons voted to burn the book and sent out orders for his arrest, Toland moved to England. He made his living as an editor and writer on a variety of subjects. Though he would often attempt to distance himself from his work, he was never successful, as he basically continued to believe. However, his beliefs would lead in a different direction.

In 1717, a number of delegates from what have been described as Druidic circles across the British Isles and Brittany met in Covent Gardens (London) at the Apple Tree Tavern. There they organized the Mother Grove of a revived Druidic order, a group continuing the ancient Druidic traditions as then understood. Toland was elected the chief of this grove, called Ar Tigh Geatha Gaurdeachus. Toland's own understanding of Druidism seemed to have been summarized in his 1720 publication Pantheisticon, in which he described a nature-oriented religion. He died two years later on February 11, 1722, at Putney, where he had been living since 1718.

While there were rumors of an earlier Druidic organization, possibly traceable to John Aubrey, an early writer on Druidism whom Toland had met in 1694, from Toland's term as the Druidic leader there is an organizational continuity of modern Druidism.

Sources:

Carr-Gomm, Philip. The Elements of the Druid Tradition. Shaftesbury, Dorset, UK: Element, 1991.

Toland, John. Christianity not Mysterious. N.p., 1696.

———. Pantheisticon. Putney, 1720.

Tomczyk, Stanislaw (Mrs. Everard Feilding) (ca. 1920)

Non-professional Polish medium, the subject of the experiments of Julien Ochorowicz in 1908–9, at Wisla, Poland. Tomczyk was regularly hypnotized by Ochorowicz for therapeutic purposes, when she became controlled by an entity called "Little Stasia." She could produce movement of objects without contact (telekinesis), stop the movement of a clock in a glass case, and influence a roulette wheel to the extent that the numbers chosen by the medium turned up more often than justified by chance.

Ochorowicz hypothesized that the physical movements were performed by rigid "rays" projecting from the fingers of the medium. The medium's hands were thoroughly examined and washed before each séance. A small object, such as a ball, cork, matchbox, or scissors, was placed before her on a table. The medium then placed her fingers about six to eight inches from the sides of the object. The object would move and eventually rise in the air, floating between the medium's fingers on each side.

Sometimes investigators claimed to feel a subtle "thread," but it was a psychic line of force, not a material thread. Ochorowicz stated: "I have felt this thread on my hand, on my face, on my hair. When the medium separates her hands the thread gets thinner and disappears; it gives the same sensation as a spider's web. If it is cut with scissors its continuity is immediately restored . . . it is then seen to be much thinner than an ordinary thread." These observations have a strong resemblance to the od, the claimed "odic force" of Baron Karl von Reichenbach, which sensitive individuals claimed to see in a darkened room issuing from the fingertips. However, Tomczyk's phenomena took place in good light.

"Little Stasia" was a mischievous entity who played many tricks on the medium. She said herself that she was not the spirit of any dead person. The medium considered her, at first, as her double. This was Ochorowicz's opinion, too, until he was shaken in this view by having obtained Little Stasia's photograph, as announced by her, in an empty room with all light excluded, while the medium in a normal condition was with him in an adjoining room.

Theodore Flournoy witnessed a séance in Paris in 1909. It left him "in no doubt as to the reality of simple telekinesis." However, at a later series of séances at Geneva to which, besides Flournoy, Professors Claparède, Cellerier, Batelli, and Flournoy's son were invited, the expectations of the sitters were not fulfilled.

In 1910, Tomczyk was investigated at the Physical Laboratory in Warsaw by a group of scientists. She produced remarkable physical phenomena under strict test conditions. Baron Schrenck-Notzing described the experiments in his Physikalische Phenomene des Mediumismus, München, 1920. Charles Richet quoted his own observations in his book Traité de Métapsychique, (1922) (translated as Thirty Years of Psychical Research, 1923).

In 1919, Tomczyk married the distinguished British psychical researcher F. H. Everard Feilding (1867–1936), and seems to have discontinued séances.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Feilding, Evarard. "Note on the English Sittings with Miss Tomczyk." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 17 (1915).

Richet, Charles. Traité de Métapsychique. N.p., 1922. English edition as Thirty Years of Psychical Research. New York: Macmillan, 1923. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Tomga

Familiar spirits among the Eskimos.

TOM Religious Foundation

The TOM Religious Foundation is a Spiritualist organization founded in the 1960s by Rev. Ruth Johnson in Velarde, New Mexico. The headquarters were moved to Canon City, Colorado, in 1970, and more recently they moved back to New Mexico. The teachings are based upon Johnson's own study and exploration of her past lives, which are disseminated primarily through correspondence lessons, "Moon Time Studies in Spiritual Culture." These lessons cover subjects familiar to occult students, including psychic development, dreams, ESP, Atlantis, the Bible, and what is said to be original Christianity. According to Johnson, God is the divine One, Spirit, or Whole, who knows, loves, and cares for us and manifests that love through divine guidance. Students may pursue ordination and receive charters to establish churches. Address: P.O. Box 52, Chinmayo, NM 87522.

Tongues, Speaking in Vocalization that sounds like a language but is devoid of semantic meaning or syntax; also known as glossolalia. Glossolalia is a protolanguage based on the everyday spoken language of the person, but lacking enough sounds (vowels and consonants) upon which to build an actual language. Glossolalia often occurs in a religious context, most notably modern Pentecostalism, where it appears as a vocalized religious expression.

Glossolalia is to be sharply distinguished from xenoglossia, or xenoglossy, the speaking or understanding of a foreign language one does not normally know or recognize. In the Bible, glossolalia is referred to as the tongues of angels (1 Cor. 13:1), possibly suggesting that the unintelligible sounds are an angelic language.

Glossolalia is familiar to most from its association with the birth of Christianity at Pentecost as described in the Christian New Testament (Acts 2), though what in fact is described is an event of xenoglossia. Those listening to the apostles speak were amazed to hear the sermon each in their own language. The more obvious example of glossolalia occurred in the Corinthian church of which Paul spoke when he said, "For he that speaks in a tongue speaks not unto men but unto God; for no man understands, but in the spirit he speaks mysteries" (1 Cor. 14:2).

There are accounts of how the gift of tongues descended on the London congregation of Rev. Edward Irving in 1831. Robert Baxter, in his book Narrative of Facts Characterizing the Supernatural Manifestations in Members of Mr. Irving's Congregation (London, 1833), gives a narrative of his own experiences:

"... The power of the Spirit was so great upon me that I was obliged to call out, as in agony, for pardon and forgiveness and for strength to bear a faithful testimony. In these cryings I was, however, at the time conscious of a power of utterance carrying me beyond the natural expression of my feelings. . . . for the space of more than ten minutes I was, as it were, paralysed under a shaking of my limbs, my knees rapping one against the other, and no expression except a sort of convulsive sigh. During this period I had no other consciousness than this bodily emotion, and an inexpressible constraint upon my mind, which although it left me composed and sensible of all I was doing, yet prevented my utterance and gave no distinct impression, beyond a desire to pray for the knowledge of the Lord's will. This increased so much that I was led to fall on my knees and cry in a loud voice 'Speak, Lord, for they servant hearest,' and this I repeated many times, until the same power of the Spirit which I had before felt, came upon me, and I was made to cry out with great vehemence, both of tone and action, that the coming of the Lord should be declared, and the messengers of the Lord should bear it forth upon the mountains and upon the hills, and tell it to the winds, that all the earth should hear it and tremble before the Lord."

The utterances often began in an unknown tongue and then passed into English. As one witness described them, "The tongue invariably preceded, which at first I did not comprehend, because it burst forth with an astonishing and terrible crash, so suddenly and in such short sentences that I seldom recovered from the shock before the English commenced."

The phrases were mostly taken from the Scriptures and repeated again and again. The actual words of the tongues were not recorded. Baxter believed them to be a jargon of sounds. However, the possessed also spoke with extraordinary fluency in languages with which they were but imperfectly acquainted. The utterances were supposedly grandiose both in manner and diction.

In a pamphlet, Drei Tage in Gros Almerode (Three Days in Great Almerode), J. Busching, a theological student at Leipzig, Germany, described ten cases of glossolalia at a religious revival in 1907 at Almerode, a small town in Hesse. The phenomena began with a hissing or peculiar gnashing sound. It was said that these sounds were produced when the subject, not wishing to disturb the order of service by interrupting a prayer already commenced, tried to repress the inward impulse acting on the speech organs; but the sounds had to come out, and the momentarily repressed glossolalies only burst forth with increased vigor.

Modern American Pentecostalism began in 1901 with the speaking in tongues that occurred at the Bethel Bible School in Topeka, Kansas. While away during the Christmas season of 1900, the school's founder set a task for the students: investigate the "baptism of the Holy Spirit" and discover what, according to the Bible, is the sign(s) of its presence. When he returned on New Year's Eve, he asked what the students had discovered. They replied, "speaking in tongues." Shortly after reaching a consensus on that point, the group retired to the chapel, where they entered a time of prayer. Then, on New Year's Day, 1901, Agnes Osman became the first person in modern times to ask for and receive the gift of the Holy Spirit with the accompanying sign of speaking in tongues.

Usually accompanying speaking in tongues is the additional phenomenon of the "interpretation of tongues," in which a reputed "translation" of the glossolalia is offered. An interpretation of tongues does not always occur even when it is prayed for. When it does occur, the speaker may either envision a written translation or hear it inwardly, or perceive directly the meaning of the foreign words.

Receiving the "baptism of the Holy Spirit" accompanied by speaking in tongues became the distinguishing mark of Pentecostalism. The movement spread from Topeka to Houston, Texas, and then to Los Angeles, California, from where it spread around the world.

Although Pentecostals were denigrated as "Holy Rollers" through much of the twentieth century (see George B. Cutten's Speaking with Tongues), in the 1960s Pentecostalism began to spread through the mainline Christian churches first in North America and then in Europe. This new charismatic movement, as it was called, brought a new respectability to Pentecostalism and resulted in the acceptance of Pentecostals into the larger Evangelical movement. It also led to new attention to glossolalia by social and behavioral scientists and historians. While supernatural explanations still dominate among Pentecostal believers, a more mundane perspective has emerged from those who have observed glossolalia widely.

A few detractors put forth the idea, a remnant of religious prejudice from earlier in the century, that glossolalia was a sign of psychopathology. This idea was possibly the first laid to rest as it had no basis in empirical data. In fact, quite the opposite was found to be true, in that Pentecostals seemed to have a higher level of mental health than that of the general population.

Other detractors suggested that glossolalia was simply gibberish; however, linguistic studies, most prominently that of William Samarin, have suggested that it is in fact a very structured speech, easily distinguishable from gibberish or attempts to imitate glossolalia. It is also said to be a protolanguage, highly structured and derived from the everyday language of the speaker.

Its relation to everyday language suggests that it too, like everyday language, is a learned behavior, and experimental data, testing people's ability to learn glossolalia in a nonreligious setting, provides some substantiation of this hypothesis. Others have also suggested that glossolalia is related to altered states of consciousness. Glossolalia is not generally associated with severe alteration of consciousness as in trance or hypnosis, but it seems to involve lightly altered consciousness such as that which occurs in daydreaming.

Historians have noted the widespread appearance of glossolalia in various religious traditions from ancient Greece to modern Spiritualism, although certainly the great majority of recorded cases are in Christianity. Some Christians have countered the obvious implications of cross-cultural studies by arguing that some tongues speaking is simply a ruse by the devil to imitate the actions of the Holy Spirit.

Sources:

Christie-Murray, David. Voices from the Gods: Speaking in Tongues. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978.

Cutten, George B. Speaking With Tongues: Historically and Psychologically Considered. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1927.

Goodman, Felicitas D. Speaking in Tongues: A Cross-Cultural Survey of Glossolalia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.

Kelsey, Morton T. Tongue Speaking: An Experiment in Spiritual Experience. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1968. Reprint, London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1973.

Kildahl, John P. The Psychology of Speaking in Tongues. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Samarin, William J. Tongues of Men and of Angels: The Religious Language of Pentecostalism. New York: Macmillan, 1972.

Spanos, Nicholas O., Wendy P. Cross, Mark Lepage, and Marjorie Coristine. "Glossolalia as Learned behavior: An Experimental Demonstration." Journal of Abnormal Psychology 95 (February 1986): 21–23.

Toolemak

Familiar spirits among the Eskimos.

TOPY See Thee Temple ov Psychick Youth

Totemism

A form of religious and social organization among tribal peoples that associates groups of persons with particular animals or objects. The term derives from the language and practice of the Ojibway tribe of Native Americans, but the Ojibways' own form of totemism was not typical of the use of the term as adopted by anthropologists. A totemic tribe consists of a number of totem groups, each closely related to a totem, which may be an animal or an inanimate object. That totem is specific for that particular group, thus while every member of the tribe has a characteristic totem, it will differ from those of other totem groups within the same tribes in the same area. Plants are used as totems in some parts of the world, and other totems are sometimes only a token part of an animal (i.e., a buffalo tongue instead of a buffalo).

A totem implies some kinship between the animal or object and the members of the group, sometimes a belief in descent from an animal totem. Masks and images may reinforce this association. Members of a particular totemic group respect the animal or object used as totem, and place a taboo on its being destroyed by members of that group, although their taboo does not apply to other members of the tribe.

Totemism is practiced around the world, among Australian aborigines, some African societies, certain North and South American Indian tribes, and among the peoples of Indonesia and Melanesia. Among Australian aborigines, totemism is related to a belief in the constant reincarnation of the spirits of primary animal forms into human beings.

In North America, the totem pole, used by Native American tribes of the Northwest coast of Canada and the United States, is the most widely recognized example of totemism. These poles or pillars are carved and painted with symbolic animals or spirits to represent ancestry or to tell family legends.

Sources:

Durkheim, Emile. The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life. Reprint, New York: Collier, 1961.

Frazer, James G. Totemism and Exogamy. 4 vols. N.p., 1910.

Freud, Sigmund. Totem and Taboo. New York: Random House, 1960.

Tedlock, Dennis. Teachings from the American Earth: Indian Religion and Philosophy. New York: Liveright, 1975.

Touches, Psychic

Tactile sensations represent an allied phenomenon to the paranormal movement of objects. Spiritualists claim such touches are intentional, just as the movement of objects is characterized by perfect localization; the touch is invariably meant for the one who receives it.

While the objects by which the sitters are touched may be recognized, in psychic contacts the case is different, as there is no apparent material means for their production. If the touches are produced by rods of ectoplasm, they may cause an immense variety of sensations according to the manipulation of this substance. The tactile sensation is often announced in advance, affected by psychic lights or luminous structures, and is visible to others.

The effect of the sensation may be as though coming from a soft object, for example, a rubber ball, an animal's paw feathers, gloves, fur, powderpuff, cobwebs, flowers, or fingers. The touch itself may be sharp, soft, dry, wet, clammy, or cold. It may be a tap, a caress, a stroke, a slap, a kick, a prick, a push, a punch, or a kiss. The invisible operator may pull or rumple your hair, she may rub your legs and search your pockets.

In 1905, in the Annales des Sciences Psychiques, psychical researcher Charles Richet translated a Latin chronicle from 1656 dealing with the phenomena that happened to a young girl named Regina Fischerin of Presbourg, Hungary. The chronicle, which is still part of the records of the Venerable

Chapter in the Archbishopric of Pest, gave report on the apparitions of Jean Clement of Presbourg, who led an evil life. The chronicle contained the following dramatic passages:

"Therefore, fearing that she might be the victim of an illusion, Regina asked of the spirit, if it were truly a spirit, to touch her with its finger. Immediately it touched her right arm and she felt the contact instantly. There appeared immediately a blister, giving her the same sensation of pain as though it had been a burn; moreover, fully to attest the phenomenon, the blister remained upon the skin a long time, and all the servants of the house saw it. Thereafter, desirous to be sure that this was not the work of an evil spirit, Regina demanded as proof that the visitor was a good spirit to make the sign of the cross. 'Here then,' said the phantom 'what you ask!' At once a flaming cross appeared outside the cloak which enveloped the figure, and with this it burned deeply the hand of the young girl, leaving thereon a branded cross which everyone could see. . . .

"A little later this spirit of Jean Clement recalled with remorse a crime which he had committed during his life, declaring that the money which had been secured from this crime was not all spent [this proved afterwards to be true]; that part of it had been used for his subsistence, another part had been otherwise spent, but that some still remained and that this should be restored from the possessions which he had left.

"Regina demanded yet other proofs. Surely the proof of the cross burned on her hand, and on her mantle was sufficiently strong, but it did not suffice for the young woman, who, in order to be absolutely sure that the strange visitant was truly a good spirit, insisted that it should make the same Sign of the Cross on a piece of money. The spirit obeyed, took a coin, threw it on the ground, and snatching a piece of cloth from the girl's hands, threw this upon the coin; then, taking Regina's hand violently in his grasp, scorching her deeply as before, burned thereon through the hand and the linen cloth upon the coin the character of a triple cross. 'Here is a further sign,' said he, and launched forth a flame with so much force that it reached the heart of the young woman, while another jet of flame crossed the entire room and struck the opposite wall. Whereupon Regina fell unconscious. . . .

"This affair seems extraordinary to us; firstly because a cross and an exact form of the hand have been marked in every detail; secondly, because this brand of burning did not extend beyond limits of the marks, though, upon linen material, fire has a tendency to spread. Finally, the right hand which was thus branded in on flesh and cloth, was an exact replica of the right hand of Clement, just as though he had been operating by his own dead physical hand. And the proof of this is that, during life, the tip phalange of Clement's forefinger had been amputated by a surgeon for a disease which was then known as 'Worms' and the absence of the finger-tip is clearly indicated upon the branded hand." (This account can also be found in the English edition of Annals of Psychical Science, No. 4, April 1905).

Other chronicles contained similar accounts. In 1908 and 1910 Mrs. Zingarapoli, a Naples lawyer, published a dozen such cases in Luce e Ombra. One was recorded from the seventeenth century and the brands or scorch marks of the hands of fire preserved at the Convent St. Claire at Todi. The exhibits in Father V. Jouet's Other World Museum at Rome comprised photographic records of the marks. In another instance in 1853, a spirit left an imprint as if by an iron hand heated red-hot on the door of the convent of the Franciscan nuns of Saint Anne at Foligno. When the grave of the deceased was reopened, the hand was found to fit the scorch marks to perfection.

In William Howitt's History of the Supernatural (2 vols., 1863), a story was told of an apparition that appeared to the grandfather and father of a fellow student of Johann H. Jung. It stated in part:

"Yet there were circumstances which made the father and son believe that he was far from his purification, for fire streamed from every finger when he became angry at their resistance to his wishes. Still more, when he touched the Bible it smoked, and the marks of his thumb and finger shrivelled up the leather of the binding where he held it, and also the paper where he pointed out the place in the hymn 'From guilt of blood deliver me' was black and singed. The Bible with these marks is preserved in the family, and many creditable persons have seen it and may still see it."

Howitt added:

"The fiery touch of the spirit which induced the father and son to believe it a bad one, modern spiritualists can testify to belong to many spirits. How often have we seen fire streaming even from the finger of a medium? How often have spirits, before shaking hands with you, desired you, at Mr. Home's, to lay your handkerchief over your hand first? How often have you felt the touch of spirit fingers prick as from the sparks of electricity?"

Under the mediumship of the Rev. William Stainton Moses there are two instances of somewhat similar character. According to his note dated April 18, 1874, a psychic light touched his fingers, which resulted in the skin being broken up and the joint swollen. Mrs. Speer stated in her account in Light that a spirit of low order was responsible for the injury.

In the second instance, W. B., a friend of Stainton Moses, figured he had committed suicide. His portrait appeared on a plate on May 16, 1876, when Moses sat for spirit photography. On May 20, Moses woke up in the night and saw the spirit trying to reach him; it struggled with two other spirits. He was inspired with horror and revulsion. The spirit got nearer and stretched out his hand. Moses did not remember any more. In the morning, he found on his forehead an oblong dull red mark in the exact place where his friend wounded himself. The mark was a red discoloration and faded in two or three days.

The psychical researcher Frank Podmore quoted a similar case in Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 10, p. 204). A Miss M. P. was awakened in the night with a jump with a horrible feeling that there was someone in the room. An icy hand pressed against her face. The next moment her sister cried out and complained of a violent burn on her cheek. "The gas having been turned up higher, we saw on one side of her face, a very vivid red mark, which rapidly took the form of a hand, with fingers open."

The psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano analyzed this and many similar cases in the journal The Seer (1931) under the title 'Spirit Hands of Flame,' and drew attention to the fact that the elder sister felt an icy sensation and a minute later, apparently by the same hand, her sister was burned. Bozzano asked whether the opposed sensation felt by the two percipients might not be explained by "a rapid change in the ectoplasmic condensation of the phantom hand resulting from a sudden modification of the vibratory tonality. This vibratory tonality, under certain circumstances, seems to be very much more intense either on living or inanimate matter, and as a result, like fire, it would destroy living animal or vegetable tissue."

In a séance with Heinrich Melzer, the Dresden apport medium, as reported in the June 1906 issue of Die Unbersinnliche Welt, a plant was apported. The sitter, at the very same instant that he received the plant, felt the sensation of burning on the thumb. When the light was switched on, the mark of a burn was clearly seen and a blister formed immediately.

Emma Hardinge Britten in her book Modern American Spiritualism (1870), vouched for the following occurrences in the family of a well-known merchant of San Francisco in a séance with the eldest daughter:

"Instantly, and while every eye was fixed upon her, she sank back in her chair in a swoon and there, in the broad glare of the sunlight, appeared on her face, which the moment before was perfectly white and colorless, a large patch of wet, reeking blood, one of her cheeks being marked exactly as if struck with a bloody hand. On approaching the swooning figure, a second patch appeared on the other cheek; and as she stretched out her hand as if to ward off an invisible foe, another wet and reeking stain instantaneously became manifest on its palm.

“The ladies present procured a washbowl and removed the stains from the young woman’s face and hand; but though they replaced her in the chair, restored her to consciousness and never for one moment lost sight of her, nor suffered a single movement to escape them, this terrible phenomena was repeated five times in less than an hour.”

The house in which this occurred was haunted, and the scene of frightful disturbances at night. The younger children always insisted that these frightful marks were made “by a Spanish girl” who followed their sister about. She had her throat cut. Another apparition who helped to make the marks was their mother whom they represented as reproaching her daughter with an infamous life. The fluid was several times analyzed and found to be human blood. The phenomena lasted for many months. Finally the police interfered and the circles were terminated.

The issue of psychic touches has actually been discussed but it is such an allusive phenomena that little can be concluded from its occurrence. It has been noted that records of such occurrences in modern séances have usually be in conjunction with other fraudulent phenomena such as apports and materializations; the mundane action of a sitter or accomplice in a darkened room could account for the overwhelming psychic touches. A variety of body sensations, from the ordinary to the spectacular, can also be ascribed to actions completely internal to the person him/herself. It can even be argued that some cases of burns and bleeding might be ascribed to autosuggestion (or hypnotism).

Tower of London

Ancient British fortress on the east side of the city of London, England, scene of many executions, once used for imprisonment of high-ranking traitors. With its grim history, it is not surprising that various ghosts are associated with it.

The jewelroom at the Tower of London is reported to be haunted and in 1860 there was published in Notes and Queries by Edmund Lenthal Swifte, Keeper of the Crown Jewels, an account of a spectral appearance witnessed by himself in the tower. He stated in October 1817, he was having supper with his wife, her sister, and his little boy in the sitting room of the jewel house. Swifte stated:

“I had offered a glass of wine and water to my wife when, on putting it to her lips, she exclaimed, ‘Good God! what is that?’ I looked up and saw a cylindrical figure like a glass tube, seemingly about the thickness of my arm, and hovering between the ceiling and the table; its contents appeared to be dense fluid, white and pale azure. This lasted about two minutes, when it began to move before my sister-in-law; then, following the oblong side of the table, before my son and myself, passing behind my wife, it paused for a moment over her right shoulder. Instantly crouching down, and with both hands covering her shoulder she shrieked out, ‘O Christ! it has seized me!’

“It was ascertained that no optical action from the outside could have produced any manifestation within, and hence the mystery has remained unsolved.”

Notes and Queries also reported how “one of the night sentries at the jewel house was alarmed by a figure like a bear issuing from underneath the jewel room door. He thrust at it with his bayonet which stuck in the door. He dropped in a fit and was carried senseless to the guard-room. . . . In another day or two the brave and steady soldier died.”

In February 1933, a sentry at the Tower reported seeing the ghostly figure of a woman in white floating toward him. A newspaper report stated: “Confronted by such an apparition, the sentry fled, making his way to the guardroom, greatly unnerved.”

On February 12, 1957, a young Welsh Guardsman was on duty, and at 3 A.M. saw a “white shapeless form” forty feet up on the battlements of the Salt Tower. He called for a search party, who found nothing, although another guardsman later admitted to seeing a shapeless white apparition. The time and the date was in conjunction with the execution of Lady Jane Grey, four hundred and three years earlier.

Trance

An altered state of consciousness, either spontaneous or induced, bearing some analogy to the ordinary sleep state, but differing from it in certain marked particulars. Among tribal peoples, trance states have been common since ancient times, used by the shaman, medicine man, or other religious practitioners for demonstrations of paranormal knowledge. Such shamans were forerunners of the modern Spiritualist mediums.

The term is loosely applied to many varied mental states (e.g., hypnosis, ecstasy, cataplexy, somnambulism, certain forms of hysteria, and the mediumistic trance). Sometimes, as in catalepsy, there is a partial suspension of the vital functions; generally, there is insensibility to pain and to any stimulus applied to the sense organs. The main distinguishing feature of the trance is that the subject retains consciousness and gives evidence of intelligence, either his or her own normal intelligence or, as in cases of possession and impersonation, some foreign intelligence.

In hypnosis, the subject, although indifferent to sensory stimuli, has been known to exhibit a curious sensitivity to such stimuli applied to the hypnotist’s body (see Community of Sensation).

In ecstasy, which is frequently allied with hallucination, the subject remains in rapt contemplation of some transcendental vision, deaf and blind to the outside world. It was formerly considered to indicate that the soul of the ecstatic was viewing some great event distant in time or place or some person or scene from the celestial sphere. Today such a state is believed to be brought about by intense and sustained emotional concentration on some particular mental image, by means of which hallucination may be induced.

The mediumistic trance is recognized as being similar to hypnosis, for the hypnotic trance, induced many times in the same subject, may become spontaneous. It then strongly resembles the trance of the medium.

Some Spiritualists have objected to the term trance being applied when there is no sign of spirit possession. The entranced medium (who seems able to produce this state at will) frequently displays an exaltation of memory (hypermnnesia), of the senses (hyperesthesia), and even of the intellectual faculties.

Automatic writing and utterances are generally produced in the trance state and frequently display knowledge the medium does not normally possess, or knowledge that is said to give evidence of telepathy. Such were the trance utterances of the medium Leonora Piper, whose automatic phenomena in the late nineteenth century provided a wide field for scientific research.

Spiritualists believe these phenomena are caused by spirits of the dead acting through the medium’s physical organism, as distinct from ancient ideas that trance personalities were all the result of demonic possession. Moreover, the trance messages of Spiritualist mediums are said to come from the spirits of deceased persons, and this assertion is often supported by the medium’s exhibiting the voice, appearance, or known opinions of the dead friend or relative.

Such trance representations supply a large part of the evidence on which the structure of Spiritualism rests. In cases of fraud, however, the information concerning the deceased was probably obtained by normal means, or, in some cases, obtained telepathically from the minds of the sitters. While there is some strong evidence for a Spiritualist view, there are also many cases when other explanations seem more appropriate.

Subjective Aspects of Trance

Some light can be shed on the nature of trance from the reports of those who have experienced it. The great medium D. D. Home, for example, described his movement into trance before a committee of the London Dialectical Society in 1869: "I feel for two or three minutes in a dreamy state, then I become quite dizzy, and then I lose all consciousness. When I awake I find my feet and limbs cold, and it is difficult to restore the circulation. When told of what has taken place during the trance it is quite unpleasant to me, and I ask those present not to tell me at once when I awake. I myself doubt what they tell me."

Lord Adare, who studied Home's mediumship, observed, "The change which takes place in him is very striking; he becomes, as it were, a being of higher type. There is a union of sweetness, tenderness and earnestness in his voice and manner which is very attractive."

W. Stinton Moses, himself a medium, added his observations:

"By degrees Mr. Home's hands and arms began to twitch and move involuntarily. I should say that he has been partly paralysed, drags one of his legs, moves with difficulty, stoops and can endure very little physical exertion. As he passed into the trance state he drew power from the circle by extending his arms to them and mesmerizing himself. All these acts are involuntary. He gradually passed into the trance state, and rose from the table, erect and a different man from what he was. He walked firmly, dashed out his arms and legs with great power and passed round to Mr. Crookes. He mesmerized him, and appeared to draw power from him."

"I feel a cold shivering," stated Annie Fairlamb, "a sensation as of water running down my back, noise in my ears, and a feeling as if I were sinking down into the earth; then I lose consciousness."

Leonore Piper noted:

"I feel as if something were passing over my brain, making it numb; a sensation similar to that experienced when I was etherized, only the unpleasant odour of the ether is absent. I feel a little cold, too, not very, just a little, as if a cold breeze passed over me, and people and objects become smaller until they finally disappear; then, I know nothing more until I wake up, when the first thing I am conscious of is bright, a very bright light, and then darkness, such darkness. My hands and arms begin to tingle just as one's foot tingles after it has been 'asleep,' and I see, as if from a great distance, objects and people in the room; but they are very small and very black."

It is interesting to note that when the Seeress of Prevorst (Frederica Hauffe) awoke from trance, she said that the persons around her looked so thick and heavy that she could not imagine how they could move.

Objective Aspects of Trance

On awakening from trance, Piper often pronounced names and fragments of sentences that appeared to have been the last impressions on her brain. After that, she resumed conversations at the point where they were broken off before she fell into trance. It is significant to quote from among the mumbled remarks during her return to consciousness, "I came in on a cord, a silver cord." Before she became conscious she heard a snap, sometimes two. They were physiological experiences. She said she heard "sounds like wheels clicking together and then snaps." Similar observations have been made by individuals reporting out-of-the-body travel experiences.

Describing the development in Piper's trances, Sir Oliver Lodge writes in his book The Survival of Man (1909):

"In the old days the going into trance seemed rather a painful process, or at least a process involving muscular effort; there was some amount of contortion of the face and sometimes a slight tearing of the hair; and the same actions accompanied the return of consciousness. Now the trance seems nothing more than an exceptionally heavy sleep, entered into without effort—a sleep with the superficial appearance of that induced by chloroform; and the return to consciousness, though slow and for a time accompanied by confusion, is easy and natural. . . . For half an hour or so after the trance had disappeared the medium continues slightly dazed and only partly herself. . . . A record was also made of the remarks of Mrs. Piper during the period of awaking from trance. . . . part of them nearly always consisted of expressions of admiration for the state of experience she was leaving, and of repulsion—almost disgust—at the commonplace terrestrial surroundings in which she found herself. Even a bright day was described as dingy or dark, and the sitter was stared at in an unrecognising way, and described as a full and ugly person. . . ."

Piper's trances seemed to have three distinct stages—subliminal 1, in which the medium was partly conscious of her surroundings but saw things distorted and grotesque; subliminal 2, in which she was possessed by spirits and lost contact with the material world; and subliminal 3, a deep trance in which the loss of consciousness was complete, the body became anaesthetic, and automatic writing began.

William James found Piper's lips and tongue insensible to pain while she was in trance. Richard Hodgson later confirmed this by placing a spoonful of salt in Piper's mouth. He also applied strong ammonia to her nostrils.

James also led what became a series of more intrusive experiments, once making a small incision in Piper's left wrist. During trance the wound did not bleed and no notice was taken of the action. It bled freely afterward and the medium bore the scar for life. In England, Lodge pushed a needle into her hand. At another time, Charles Richet inserted a feather into her nostril. Harsh experiments in 1909 resulted in a badly blistered and swollen tongue that caused the medium inconvenience for several days, while another test resulted in numbness and partial paralysis of her right arm for some time afterward. Although these scientific experiments were of great importance, it is obvious that the experimenters overstepped the mark in causing inconvenience and pain to the medium.

The trance of the medium Eusapia Palladino was described by Italian researcher Cesare Lombroso:

"At the beginning of the trance her voice is hoarse and all the secretions—sweat, tears, even the menstrual secretions are increased. Hyperaesthesia . . . is succeeded by anaesthesia. . . . Reflex movement of the pupils and tendons are lacking. . . . Respiratory movements . . . passing from 18 inspirations to 15 and 12 a minute . . . heartbeats increase from 70 to 90 and even 120. The hands are seized with jerking and tremors. The joints of the feet and the hands take on movements of flexure or extension, and every little while become rigid.

"The passing from this state to that of active somnambulism is marked by yawns, sobs, perspirations on the forehead, passing of insensible perspiration through the skin of the hands, and strange physiognomic expressions. Now she seems a prey to a kind of anger, expressed by imperious commands and sarcastic and critical phrases, and now to a state of voluptuous erotic ecstasy. In the state of trance she first becomes pale, turning her eyes upward and her sight inward. . . . exhibiting many of the gestures that are frequent in hysterical fits. . . . Toward the end of the trance when the more important phenomena occur, she falls into true convulsions and cries like a woman who is lying-in, or else falls into a profound sleep while from the aperture in the parietal bone in her head there exhales a warm fluid or vapour, sensible to the touch.

"After the séance Eusapia is overcome by morbid sensitiveness, hyperaesthesia, photophobia and often by hallucinations and delirium (during which she asks to be watched from harm) and by serious disturbances of the digestion, followed by vomiting if she has eaten before the séance, and finally by true paresis of the legs, on account of which it is necessary for her to be carried and to be undressed by others.

“These disturbances are much aggravated. . . . if she is exposed to unexpected light.”

“My eyes ache a good deal after a séance,” said Annie Fairlamb, “and generally my lower limbs are thin, sometimes very thin, and usually I feel pain in the left side.”

Pioneering researcher F. W. H. Myers distinguished between three successive stages in trance. In the first stage the subliminal (subconscious) self obtains control. In the next stage the incarnate spirit, whether or not maintaining control of the whole body, makes excursions into or holds telepathic intercourse with the spiritual world. In the third stage, the body of the medium is controlled by another incarnate spirit.

The first stage is well illustrated by the case of Alabama minister C. B. Sanders, whose trance personality always called itself by the name of “X Y Z,” and claimed to represent the incarnate spirit of Rev. Sanders exercising his higher faculties. He spoke of Sanders in his normal state of consciousness as his “casket,” but showed no evidence of direct communication with discarnate spirits.

The nineteenth-century histologist Gaëtano Salvioli, investigating hypnosis, noticed for the first time that in trance the flow of blood to the brain is greater than in waking hours, which might account for the greater psychical activity and an increase in muscular excitability.

Theodore Flournoy frequently found complete allochiria, a confusion between the right and left side, with the medium Hélène Smith. In trance she would consistently look for her pocket on the left side instead of on the right. If one of her fingers was pricked or pinched behind a screen, it was the corresponding finger on the other hand that was agitated. Allochiria is one of the stigmata of hysteria.

Lombroso also called attention to the fact that Eusapia Palladino, who was usually left-handed in sittings, became right-handed in one séance and fellow researcher Enrico Morselli became left-handed. This observation served as confirmation of one doctor’s hypothesis of transitory left-handedness in the abnormal state, and the transference to the sitters of the anomalies of the medium. The left-handedness seemed to indicate the increased participation of the right lobe of the brain in mediumistic states.

Morselli measured Palladino’s left-handedness in dynamometric figures. He found, after a séance, a diminution of 6 kilograms for the right and 14 for the left hand. The spirits around Leonore Piper always communicated on the left side. The trance, as a rule, began with hissing intakes of breath and ended with deep expirations.

There is a suggestion in this of pranayama, the yoga system of breathing. “Like the fakirs,” wrote Morselli, “when they wish to enter into trance, Eusapia begins to slacken her rate of breathing.” The seer Emanuel Swedenborg believed that his powers were connected with a system of respiration. He said that in communing with the spirits he hardly breathed for half an hour at a time.

The poet Gerald Massey, who published an alternative history of humankind, wrote of his own mystical vision: “You know Swedenborg and Blake claimed a kind of inner breathing. I know that is possible. I have got at times to where I find there needs to be no further need for expiring, it is all inspiration, I consider that consciously or unconsciously we all draw life from the spirit world, just as we shall when we pass into it.”

“I have tried to simulate the deep and rapid breathing of Rudi in the trance state,” writes psychical researcher Harry Price in his book Rudi Schneider (1930). He says: “This breathing has been likened to a steam engine, a tyre being pumped up, etc. Taking off my collar and tie and with my watch in my hand, I found that in six and a quarter minutes I was exhausted and could not continue. I have known Rudi to continue this hard breathing, interspersed with spasms and the usual clonic movements, for seventy-five minutes without cessation. And this while being held and in a most uncomfortable position, while, of course, I was quite free.”

Trances did not always come at will and occasionally appeared when not desired. In Cambridge, England, at the request of F. W. H. Myers, Piper looked into a crystal before going to bed. She saw nothing but looked exhausted the next morning and said that she thought that she had been entranced during the night. The next time when she went into a trance, her spirit control “Phinuit” said that he came and called but no one answered. Piper’s trances generally lasted about an hour. On one occasion, in Sir Oliver Lodge’s experience, it lasted only for a minute.

The trance, as a rule, is continuous. In the mediumship of Mrs. J. H. Conant, much discomfort was caused at an earlier stage by the medium’s return to consciousness as soon as the control had left. She had to be entranced again for the next communicator. Each change took about ten minutes. In the case of Rudi Schneider, the trance was similarly intermittent but the same entity, “Olga,” remained in control.

To be roused from trance by a materialized spirit is exceptional. The spirit form “Katie King” was said to have roused the medium Florence Cook when the time of her farewell arrived and a tearful scene was witnessed between the two. The novelist Florence Marryat, who was present at this séance, describes a similar experience with the medium Mary Showers in her book There is No Death (1891): “The spirit [‘Peter’] proceeded to rouse Rosie by shaking her and calling her name, holding me by one hand as he did so. As Miss Showers yawned and woke up from her trance, the hand slipped from mine, and ‘Peter’ evaporated. When she sat up I said to her gently: ‘I am here! Peter had brought me in and was sitting on the mattress by my side till just this moment.’ ‘Ha, ha!’ laughed his voice close to my ear, ‘and I’m still here, my dears, though you can’t see me.’”

The medium F. W. Monck was once apparently awakened by the common consent of the materialized spirit and the sitters. However, controversy surrounds the mediumship of Florence Cook, Mary Showers, and Monck, and these unusual occurrences seem to be but further confirmation of the fraud engaged in by the three mediums.

Usually the medium has no remembrance of what has passed in the trance. To all intents and purposes he or she is an entirely distinct being while in that state, with physiological functions totally different from the normal ones. Florence Marryat wrote that the medium Bessie Williams ate like a sparrow, and only the simplest things. “Dewdrop” (her guide), on the other hand, liked indigestible food and devoured it freely, yet the medium never felt any inconvenience from it.

About 1846 the limbs of Mary Jane, servant girl of a Dr. Larkin of Wrentham, Massachusetts, were, under the spirit influence of a rough sailor, thrown out of joint in several directions in a moment and without pain. Larkin was often obliged to call in the aid of his fellow doctors and two or three strong assistants to replace them. On one occasion the girl’s knees and wrists were thrown out of joint twice in a single day. These painful feats were always accompanied by loud laughter and hoarse, profane jokes.

On the testimony of S. W. Turner of Cleveland, Ohio, in December 1847, the Spiritual Telegraph reported the peculiar adventure of a medium called William Hume. In a trance state and under the control of “Capt. Kidd,” Hume threw himself into the lake to recover a ring and was brought out of the water, still in trance, after swimming for 15 to 20 minutes, without injury to his health.

Trance in Animal Magnetism and Hypnotism

The first surgery on a subject in mesmeric trance was performed in France in April 1829, by M. Cloquet on a Mme. Plantin, a 64-year-old woman who suffered from an ulcerated cancer in the right breast. The operation lasted 10–12 minutes. The patient’s pulse and breathing remained unchanged. She was not awakened until two days later. The case was reported to the Section of Surgery of the Academy. In 1836 a Dr. Hamard invited a member of the academy, M. Oudet, to extract a tooth from a somnambulant patient. The operation was a success.

In England the first operation in mesmeric trance took place in 1842, in Nottinghamshire, on James Wombell, whose leg was amputated above the knee. W. Topham, a London barrister, was the mesmerist, and the operation was performed by Squire Ward, M.R.C.S. James Esdaile records a number of similar incidents in his book, Mesmerism in India (1846).

There is one instance on record in the mediumship of F. L. H. Willis, who later acquired a medical degree and became professor of materia medica in New York, when not the patient, but the operator was in trance. Controlled by the spirit of "Dr. Mason," Willis successfully performed a difficult operation.

Apart from Swedenborg, the first modern conversation with spirits of the departed through the use of trance was recorded in May 1778 by the Société Exegetique Philantropique of Stockholm. A 40-year-old woman was controlled in trance by her own infant daughter and another young child of the town, who gave accounts of both their Earth lives and their existence in the spirit world.

The somnambulant state in mesmerism was the discovery of the Marquis Chastenot de Puysegur. Franz Anton Mesmer himself was aware of something unknown in the "magnetic sleep" and warned against deepening it. The use of animal magnetism was primarily for healing power, and the possibility of intercourse with spirits was largely avoided. It cropped up as early as 1878 in Tardy de Montravel's writings, but he opposed it. Kaleph Ben-Nathan admitted the possibility in 1793 but contended that spirits with which a somnambule might hold intercourse would be spirits of an inferior order and that magnetists practiced sorcery and divination.

Dr. Alexandre Bertrand recorded the exclamation of his young somnambule: "There are no spirits, they are stories, yet I see them, the proof is perfect." J. P. F. Deleuze conceded in 1818 that the phenomena of clairvoyance established the spirituality of the soul, but he did not consider spirit intercourse proven by the phenomena of somnambulant trance. In later years, however, under the effect of Dr. G. P. Billot's experiments, he appeared to have changed his belief. Billot's somnambules were mediums in the present-day sense. The spirits who possessed them proclaimed themselves to be their guardian angels and on occasion produced physical phenomena.

Louis-Alphonse Cahagnet recorded fully developed trance communications through the early medium Adèle Maginot. Before Cahagnet's appearance, an official acknowledgment of trance took place in 1831 when an investigating commission of the Royal Academy of Medicine reported on the phenomena of animal magnetism and found it genuine and the state of somnambulism, although rare, well authenticated.

In Germany the theory of spiritual intercourse in trance took a quicker hold on the imagination of mesmerists. Jung-Stilling (J. H. Jung) founded the school with the theory of the psychic body and its elements, based on the luminiferous ether. Auguste Müller, of Carlsruhe, appears to have been the first somnambule whose spirit communications and other phenomena were carefully recorded; Fräulein Römer, the second. Müller was the first interplanetary traveler, making claimed clairvoyant excursions to the moon. The most stirring account of intercourse with the spirit world was the story of the Seeress of Prevorst, Frederica Hauffe, published in 1826 by Dr. Justinus Kerner.

Sources:

Cahagnet, L. A. The Celestial Telegraph; or, Secrets of the Life to Come Revealed Through Magnetism. 2 vols. London & New York, 1851. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1976.

Dingwall, E. J. Abnormal Hypnotic Phenomena. 4 vols. London: Churchill, 1967-68.

Esdaile, James. Natural and Mesmeric Clairvoyance; With the Practical Application of Mesmerism in Surgery and Medicine. London, 1852. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Fahnestock, W. B. Statuolism, or Artificial Somnambulism. Chicago, 1871.

Flournoy, Theodore. From India to the Planet Mars. New York: Harper & Bros., 1900.

Garrett, Eileen J. My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. New York: Oquaga; London: Rider, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

Goodman, Felicitas D., Jeanette H. Henney, and Esther Pressel. Trance, Healing and Hallucination: Three Field Studies in Religious Experience. Wiley-Interscience, 1974.

Gopi Krishna. The Biological Basis of Religion and Genius. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Inglis, Brian. Trance: A Natural History of Altered States of Mind. London: Grafton, 1989.

Kerner, Justinus. The Seeress of Prevorst. London, 1845.

Laski, Marghanita. Ecstasy. London: Cresset, 1961.

Salter, W. H. Trance Mediumship: An Introductory Study of Mrs. Piper and Mrs. Leonard. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1962.

Spiegel, H., and D. Spiegel. Trance and Treatment: Clinical Users of Hypnosis. New York: Basis Books, 1978.

Sunderland, La Roy. The Trance, and How Introduced. Boston, 1860.

Wavell, Stewart, Audrey Butt, and Nina Epton. Trances. London: Allen & Unwin, 1966.

Trance Personalities

Trance messages claiming to come from the medium's spirit control do not always reveal a definite personality. The control often reflects the thoughts and opinions of the medium and the sitters, possesses little knowledge that they do not possess, and is an artificial personality. Yet, frequently a trance medium is controlled by a spirit of distinct or distinguished personality, whose education level appears to be more extensive and culture of a much different quality than the medium's and whose ideas and opinions appear independent.

Such spirits are generally given distinguishing names. They may control the medium alternately with other controls. On the other hand, the medium has generally a monopoly of one or more of these spirits, though sometimes one control may seemingly appear to be shared by several mediums.

Among those who may justly be regarded as the common property of dubious mediums are the spirits of certain great men—Virgil, Socrates, Shakespeare, Milton, Benjamin Franklin, Victor Hugo, Swedenborg, and so on. The messages delivered through their control seldom resemble anything they wrote or said during their lives.

Not all the mediums involved in such counterfeit personalities are frauds; some are self-deluded. Others exhibit the faculty of the subconscious mind to weave fantasies like the characters and incidents of a novelist. Similar artificial personalities sometimes manifest in the claimed reincarnation experiences of subjects in hypnotic regression as in the famous "Bridey Murphy" case (see Morey Bernstein).

Some trance personalities assume pseudonyms, suggesting the possibility that the personality of everyday life, which is modified from year to year, may suffer radical change after death, losing the distinctive nature that the physical body, memories, and emotions normally reinforce.

Some of the most well-known pseudonymous trance personalities were those of the Rev. William Stainton Moses—"Imperator," "Rector," "Mentor," "Prudens," and others. "Imperator" and "Rector" were also among the controls of the medium Leonora E. Piper in subsequent years and indeed much of her automatic discourse did not come directly from communicating spirits, but was dictated by them to "Rector." It was suggested, however, by Sir Oliver Lodge and other investigators, that Piper's controls were not identical with those of Stainton Moses but were merely masqueraders.

Piper had, however, several interesting trance personalities of her own without borrowing from anybody. One of her earliest controls was “Sebastian Bach;” but before long he gave place to a spirit calling himself “Dr. Phinuit,” who was an influence for a considerable time, then succumbing in his turn to George Pelham (“G. P.”). Pelham was a young author and journalist who died suddenly in 1892. Soon after his death he supposedly controlled Piper, and indeed gave many striking proofs of his identity. He constantly mentioned intimate details of the affairs of Pelham, recognized his friends, and gave to each their due welcome. He never failed to recognize an acquaintance, or give a greeting to one whom he did not know. Many of Pelham’s old friends did not hesitate to recognize in him that which he claimed to be.

Only on one occasion, when asked for the names of two persons who had been associated with him in a certain enterprise, the spirit “G. P.” refused, saying that as there was present one who knew the names, his mentioning them would be referred to as telepathy. Later, he gave the names—incorrectly. When “G. P.” ceased to communicate as the principal control of Piper, his place was taken by “Rector” and “Imperator,” as mentioned above.

Another well-known trance medium, Rosina Thompson, had as her chief control “Nelly” (a daughter of hers who had died in infancy), a “Mrs. Cartwright,” and others. Thompson’s controls were said not to have shown any individual characteristics, but to resemble Thompson herself strongly both in voice and manner of speech, although Margaret Verrall, one of the sitters, stated that the impersonations gave an impression of separate identity to the sitter. Thompson’s early trance utterances were controlled by another band of spirits, with even less individuality than those mentioned.

Frequently mediums and investigators themselves, when reaching the discarnate plane, seem to become controls in their turn. The psychical researchers F. W. H. Myers, Edmund Gurney, Richard Hodgson, and Henry Sidgwick claimed to speak and write posthumously through many mediums, notably through Piper, Thompson, Verrall, and Alice K. Fleming (i.e., Mrs. Holland). Many of the statements made by these controls were correct; some matters revealed were apparently outside the scope of the medium’s normal knowledge. At the same time several fatal discrepancies were found to exist between the controls and those they were supposed to represent.

Thus the script produced by Fleming contained grave warnings, claiming to come from Myers, against the medium Eusapia Palladino and her physical phenomena, whereas Myers was known to hold opinions favorable to the physical manifestations.

On the whole, such trance personalities show themselves influenced by the personality of the medium. In cases where the latter was acquainted with the control, the trance personality was proportionately strong. When there was no personal acquaintance, it was often of a neutral tint, and sometimes bad guesses were made, as when Fleming represented the Gurney control as of a harsh and almost discourteous temperament.

But such instances must not be taken as impeaching the medium’s good faith. Instances in which the trance personality is patently the product of the medium’s own consciousness do not in themselves suggest that there is any intentional deception. In some of the most definite cases, there is evidence suggesting the operation of a discarnate intelligence, evidence that has proved convincing to careful investigators.

Among the most important pieces of evidence in evaluating the separate existence of trance personalities as spirit entities is the case of “Philip.” In 1972–73, members of the Toronto Society for Psychical Research, Canada, deliberately created an artificial séance entity named “Philip,” with a history, personal characteristics, and an appearance decided upon by the group in a quite mundane manner. Sitting as in a séance, the experimenters soon obtained raps from the séance table and communications from “Philip.” It seems that in many instances, a spirit control may simply be a convention of personality. In other cases, however, convincing evidence of true personality survival has been established.

Sources:

- Broad, C. D. Personal Identity and Survival. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1968.
- Carington, Whately. The Foundations of Spiritualism. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1920.
- Ducasse, C. J. A Critical Examination of the Belief in a Life After Death. Springfield, Ill.: C. C. Thomas, 1961.
- Garrett, Eileen J. My Life as a Search for the Meaning of Mediumship. New York: Oquaga; London: Rider & Co., 1939.
- Hart, Hornell. The Enigma of Survival: The Case For and Against an After Life. Springfield, Ill.: C. C. Thomas, 1959.
- M. A. (Oxon) [W. Stainton Moses]. Spirit Identity. London, 1879.
- Myers, F. W. H. Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green, 1903.
- Owen, Iris M., and Margaret Sparrow. Conjuring Up Philip. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.
- Penelhum, Terence. Survival and Disembodied Existence. New York, Humanities Press, 1970.
- Richmond, Kenneth. Evidence of Identity. London: G. Bell, 1939.
- Salter, W. H. Trance Mediumship: An Introductory Study of Mrs. Piper and Mrs. Leonard. London: Society for Psychical Research, 1962.

Transcendental Meditation (TM)

A popular Hindu meditation technique first taught in the West by Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, an Allahabad University physics graduate who, in the 1940s and 1950s studied among monks in the Himalayas. Emerging with his teachings in 1958, the Maharishi’s transcendental meditation spread across the United States and Europe by the mid-1960s. Due largely to the endorsements of celebrities such as the Beatles, Jane Fonda, and Mia Farrow, TM became one of the first forms of Eastern meditative practices to receive widespread media attention in the West. Essentially, TM is a streamlined form of the ancient Hindu initiation of bestowing a mantra, or sacred Sanskrit word or phrase, for the pupil to meditate upon for a short period each day.

A number of personal and social benefits have been claimed as a result of meditating. In fact, the movement has cited 508 individual scientific studies conducted since the 1970s, measuring psychological and physiological differences between meditators and non-meditators. The reports laud the physical and mental benefits of transcendental meditation, citing increased creativity, broader comprehension, improved perception, lowered blood pressure, reduced anxiety, and decreased medical visits among the meditators.

In 1977, studies such as those conducted by Fales and Markovsky at the University of Iowa question the validity of claims made by TM studies. Particularly, the analysis examines the phenomenon known as the Maharishi Effect, which asserts the effect advanced TM meditators can exercise over the social serenity of local communities. The scientific work on TM has been criticized within the academic community for methodological flaws, vague definitions, and loose statistical controls. It has been argued that the effects attributed to TM are the same effects produced by any number of yogic and meditative techniques; this places TM in the context of goals and results of traditional meditation.

The TM movement has also been criticized for lifting the time-honored Hindu practice from its religious context, mass producing it as a contemplative quick-fix for western consumers. Critics have argued that TM is disjointed from the Hindu mysticism from which it emerged, as well as from the other great world religions that have emphasized the need for patient and continuing self-purification through spiritual disciplines in order to give integrity to spiritual growth or eventual transcendental consciousness.

Traditional Hindu mysticism regards meditation as a later stage in the program of continuing spiritual discipline, and passive meditation is considered secondary to active meditation in quality and results. Moreover mantra-diksha, or initiation, is not normally given until the aspirant has proven his or her fitness to engage in meditation. Hinduism also reserves its highest transcendental experiences for those who have properly fulfilled their social and religious obligations.

Criticisms aside, the five million TM participants (as asserted by the program) seem to attest to the everyday value of TM as a simple, natural means of relaxation and a feeling of well-being. The method has received worldwide endorsement at every level of society, including support from politicians, scientists, doctors, and members of the general public. Many have brought TM to the pragmatic world of business, asserting its positive affects on productivity, job satisfaction, and employee health in the workplace.

Sources:

Akins, W. R., and George Nurnberg. How to Meditate Without Attending a TM Class. New York: Crown, 1976.

Bloomfield, Harold M., Michael Peter Cain, and Dennis T. Jaffe. TM: Discovering Inner Energy and Overcoming Stress. New York: Delacorte Press, 1975.

Chopra, Deepak, M.D. Creating Health. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1987.

Fales, Evan and Markovsky, Barry. "Evaluating Heterodox Theories." University of Iowa 1997. <http://www.trancenet.org/>. March 28, 2000.

Forem, Jack. Transcendental Meditation. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974.

Hemingway, Patricia D. Transcendental Meditation Primer. Philadelphia: McKay, 1975.

Kory, Robert B. The Transcendental Meditation Program for Business People. New York: American Management Association, 1976.

Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. Meditations of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. New York: Bantam, 1973.

Orme-Johnson, David W., and John T. Farrow, eds. Scientific Research on the Transcendental Meditation Program. Collected Papers 1. Seelisberg, Switzerland: Maharishi European Research University Press, 1977.

Kanellakos, Demetri P., and Jerome S. Lukas. Psychobiology of Transcendental Meditation: A Literature Review. W. A. Benjamin, 1974.

Scott, R. D. Transcendental Misconceptions. San Diego: Beta Books, 1978.

The Transcendental Meditation Program. <http://www.tm.org/>. March 28, 2000.

Transfiguration

The metamorphic power ascribed to certain mediums to assume facial or bodily characteristics of deceased people for their representation. The phenomenon was described in detail in the account of William J. Erwood in The National Spiritualist, at a séance in 1931 with a Mrs. Bullock, a Chicago medium. In the light, which showed every movement of the medium, he claimed to have seen more than fifty faces in an hour and a half.

He writes:

"It was as though the medium's face were of plastic material being rapidly molded from one form to another by some master worker in plastics. Oriental faces, Indians, calm, dignified, serious, spiritual, in short, almost every type of face was depicted during the most unusual séance. One of the most striking was the impersonation of a paralysed girl whom I had known in the States. The medium's entire body, as well as face, was twisted out of all semblance of its normal state, to depict the condition of this victim of paralysis."

H. Dennis Bradley, in his book The Wisdom of the Gods (1925), described an experience with the medium Mrs. Scales:

"Gradually the whole of the expression of the medium's face changed completely. It was a transformation. Whilst the outline remained, the eyes and the expression became beautiful . . . At first it was only with very great difficulty that the first few words were articulated. It was as if they were produced with considerable effort. Within a little while, however, the power strengthened considerably, and the spirit of my sister was able to assume complete control. It was my sister. It was her spirit, using the organism of another physical body, and speaking to me in her own voice."

Joseph Maxwell vouched for the following case of transfiguration in sleep, narrated by one of his colleagues in the magistry:

"On January 1, 1903, my father began to feel the first attacks of the painful disease from which he died after six months of terrible suffering . . . I watched him as he slept, and was not long in noticing that his physiognomy gradually assumed an aspect which was not his own. I finally observed that his face bore a striking resemblance to that of my mother. It was as though the mask of her face was placed over his own. My father had no eyebrows for a long time, and I noticed above his closed eyes the very marked black eyebrows which my mother had retained to the last. The eyelids, the nose, the mouth, were those of my mother. . . . My father wore his moustache and a pointed, but rather short beard. This beard and moustache, which I saw, helped, contrary to what might have been expected, in forming the features of my mother. The appearance lasted for ten or twelve minutes; then it gradually disappeared, and my father resumed his habitual physiognomy. Five minutes later he awoke, and I immediately asked him if he had not been dreaming, especially about his wife. He answered in the negative."

The phenomenon was witnessed by a woman servant who came into the room while it lasted. She was told: "Jeanne, look at Monsieur sleeping!" She cried out, "Oh, how he resembles poor Madame. It is striking, it is quite extraordinary!"

In the experiences of Allan Kardec, founder of French Spiritism, there was an extraordinary case of a young girl of fifteen whose metamorphic power extended to the duplication of the stature, mass, and weight of deceased persons, especially of her brother. Kardec recorded that another metamorphic medium, a Ms. Krooke, saw one evening her own face changed. She observed a thick black beard and by it her son-in-law recognized his dead father. A little later, her face changed into that of an old woman with white hair. She preserved her consciousness in the meantime, yet felt through her entire body a prickling like that of a galvanic battery. No such miracles are recorded in modern experience.

Transfiguration is most often reported as occurring in séances in conjunction with materializations. It involves grave risks for the medium, but no records of any harm have been reported. There is an observation based on several accounts including an experiment at the British College of Psychic Science, a Spiritualist organization, with the medium Ada Besinnet in 1921. A light was flashed on a face that was illuminated by a spirit lamp. The medium was leaning over the table and illuminated her own face with light held in her hand. The light quickly vanished, as did the white drapery which draped over her head. When awakened, she was in trance and complained of great pain in the pit of her stomach; for three days she was shaken with muscular contractions.

There are some past experiences on record of the disappearance of the medium during materialization. In such cases, Spiritualist argue, the entire bodily substance of the medium is believed to have been withdrawn for the purpose of building up phantom bodies. Such occurrences are also known as transfigurations. More rational approaches to the séance have ascribed more mundane causes to such occurrences.

Henry S. Olcott and John Newbrough experienced transfigurations with the medium Elizabeth J. Compton. While phantoms were parading in front of the sitters before the cabinet, she vanished from the chair into which she was tied in such a way that the least effort to face herself would have given her away. Not only had her body vanished, but the fastenings, threads, wax-ends, seals, and nails as well. Yet something must have been left in the chair, for Olcott was strictly forbidden to touch the chair when he was allowed to go into the cabinet.

Where was the medium? According to Olcott and Newbrough, she was transfigured into the phantom bodies. Many of the phantoms were recognized as departed relatives and divulged intimate knowledge of the lives of their relations. If they were seized, and they were sometimes, they resolved into Compton and always rendered her ill.

In 1890 Alexander N. Aksakof had a similar experience with the medium Elizabeth d'Esperance, at a séance in Gothenburg. While the phantom "Yolande" was outside the cabinet, he slipped his arm through the curtains and felt for the medium's chair. He found it empty; at the same time his hand was flung aside. At the very moment "Yolande" returned into the cabinet, the séance came to an abrupt end and the medium was discovered on her chair in her red dress ("Yolande" was in white).

Through automatic writing, Aksakof, who did not tell of his part in the sudden disturbance, was told by "Walter," d'Esperance's control, that if the contribution of the circle was insufficient there might not be enough left of the medium to be visible; the clairvoyant may still see the body, but in reality there might not be much more in her place than her organs of sense. In such cases, a simple touch may do the medium serious injury.

When Aksakof asked what would happen if in such a case he should pull the band of cloth which encircled the medium's waist, whether it would not cut her body in two, the answer was yes. D'Esperance summed up her only sensations in this sentence: "I felt as I were empty inside."

The existence of transfigurations is questionable at best, and like many of the physical phenomena with which it was associated, reports of its occurrence have become quite rare. Most psychical researchers regard it with skepticism, suggesting that its primary occurrences in séances were fraudulently produced. Reported cases have been rare and it is unsatisfactory to attempt to assess them long after the event.

Sources:

Aksakof, Alexander. A Case of Partial Dematerialization of the Body of a Medium. Boston, 1898.

Holms, A. Campbell. The Facts of Psychic Science. 1925. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Transition

Spiritualist term for death, used to emphasize survival of personality after death. Another term sometimes used is "promotion."

Transmutation of the Body

The aim of spiritual alchemy—to restore a human being to the fundamental condition of grace, strength, perfection, beauty, and physical immortality. Dedicated alchemists over the ages labored to discover the secret of the elixir of life, which occultists believed would achieve this renewal of youth, and grant immortality. Endless recipes for this medicine have been given, and some alchemists honestly believed they had attained it, but it still has not been proven.

Sources:

Aitwood, Mary Anne. Suggestive Inquiry Into the Hermetic Mystery. London, 1850. Reprint, Belfast, Ireland, 1918. Reprint, New York: Julian Press, 1960.

Redgrove, H. Stanley. Alchemy: Ancient and Modern. London, 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Transportation

Alternative term for the claimed phenomenon of teleportation, the paranormal movement of human bodies through closed doors and over a distance.

Transposition of the Senses

An extraordinary phenomenon, first reported by Tardy de Montravel. In his Essai sur la Theorie du Somnambulisme Magnetique (1785), he described how in his half-waking trance he could see with the "pit of his stomach." In 1808, Dr. Pététin reported in his book, Electricité Animale (1808), that he found the senses of taste, smell, and hearing also wandering from the pit of the stomach to the tip of the fingers and of the toes. Since then many similar cases have been recorded, especially with hysterical subjects.

Cesare Lombroso carefully observed the phenomenon of eyeless sight. C. S. was a young girl who lost the power of vision, but as a compensation she "saw" with the same degree of acuteness at the point of the nose and the left lobe of the ear. Her sense of smell was transposed under the chin and later to the back of the foot. (See also Stomach, Seeing with the)

Transvection

Term used to indicate the claim of witches flying through the air on a broomstick, but also on a distaff, a shovel, or an animal. The term was originally used in a religious sense for the transportation of saints, such as St. Joseph of Copertino. There were some seventy aerial flights claimed, but from the sixteenth century onward the flight of witches was also described as transvection.

The flight of witches was achieved with a magical flying ointment. However, if the witches heard the sound of church bells while flying to the Sabbat, they might be grounded. It is likely that the special ointments used to assist transvection may have had a hallucinatory effect, giving the illusion of traveling through the air. Such ointments could have produced experiences akin to astral projection or out-of-the-body travel.

Transylvanian Society of Dracula

The Transylvanian Society of Dracula emerged at the end of the 1990s as the largest vampire-interest organization in the world. It was founded in the early 1990s by a group of writers, Romanian scholars, tourist experts, and others interested in Dracula and vampire folklore in Romania and initially announced its existence through the sponsorship of the World Dracula Congress in 1995. Taking the lead was Nicolae Padurararu, formerly with the Romanian Ministry of Tourism. During that conference both an American and a Canadian chapter were established by J. Gordon Melton and Elizabeth Miller respectively, and a short time later an Italian chapter was founded by Massimo Introvigne. Each is a scholar in vampire studies and the author of multiple titles in the field.

The Canadian and American chapters joined with the Count Dracula Fan Club to sponsor Dracula 97, the centennial celebration of the publication of the novel Dracula, that brought some 100 scholars and more than 600 participants to Los Angeles, California, August 14–17, 1997. For three years, the two chapters cosponsored The Transylvanian Journal (1996–98). Currently, the Canadian chapter issues a newsletter,

The Borgo Post, and an annual Journal of Dracula Studies. It has an extensive Internet site at <http://www.ucs.mun.ca/~emiller/>. The American chapter has issued a set of monographs including a detailed bibliography of the English-language editions of Dracula. The Italian chapter has an Internet site (in Italian) at <http://www.cesnur.org/dracula.htm>.

The Romanian chapter sponsors an annual symposium in the Borgo Pass in May of each year. The original novel Dracula opens in May as Jonathan Harker travels to Borgo Pass to meet the Count. In May 2000, the society is sponsoring a much larger event, Dracula 2000, which will include a number of international scholars in Dracula and vampire studies.

The international headquarters of the Transylvanian Society of Dracula is at 47 Primaverii Blvd., Bucharest 1, Romania. The Canadian chapter is at P.O. Box 23240, Churchill P.O., St. John's, NF, Canada A1B 4J9; the American chapter at P.O. Box 91611, Santa Barbara, CA 93190-1611; and the Italian chapter at Via Bertola 86, 10122 Torino, Italy.

Sources:

Introvigne, Massimo. La stripe de Dracula: Indagine sul vampirismo dall'antichità ai nostri giorni. Milan: Arnoldo Mondadori Editore, 1997.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. 2nd ed. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1999.

———. The Vampire Gallery. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1998.

———. VideoHound's Vampires on Video. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1996.

Miller, Elizabeth. Dracula: Sense and Nonsense. Westcliff-on-Sea, UK: Desert Island Books, 1998.

———. Dracula: The Shade and the Shadow. Westcliff-on-Sea, UK: Desert Island Books, 1998.

———. Reflection on Dracula: Ten Essays. White Rock, B.C.: Transylvanian Press, 1997.

TREAT See Treatment and Research of Experienced Anomalous Trauma

Treatment and Research of Experienced Anomalous Trauma (TREAT)

A center focusing on UFO (unidentified flying object) abduction phenomena, TREAT was founded in 1989 by psychiatrist Rima E. Laibow. It held its first conference May 12–14, 1989, at Fairfield University in Connecticut. Laibow has suggested that such “abductions,” which she considers “experienced anomalous trauma,” are the result of an unknown factor, possibly one outside the realm of conventional psychological explanation. However, even though the cause remains unknown, it is possible to treat the effects (symptoms) which are themselves well known.

Although Laibow initially maintained a friendly relationship with ufologists, for whom abduction phenomena had emerged as a major issue of research, tension soon developed. Laibow broke with leading abduction spokespersons Budd Hopkins and David M. Jacobs and removed them from participation in TREAT. She also disagreed with other ufologists by asserting the dominant role of mental health professionals, as opposed to a cooperative (essentially equal) role between psychologists and ufologists.

In spite of the problems, TREAT has continued to function. It holds annual meetings in the United States, paralleled by a series of regional meetings in Europe and Russia. Such meetings between professionals and interested parties are intended to create a nexus of collaborators and colleagues worldwide to further research and investigate UFO and parapsychological phenomena. Address: 13 Summit Terr., Dobbs Ferry, NY 10522.

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. UFOs in the 1980s: The UFO Encyclopedia, Volume I. Detroit: Apogee Books, 1990.

Laibow, Rima E. “Dual Victims: The Abused and the Abducted.” International UFO Reporter 14, 3 (May/June 1989): 4–9.

Tree Ghosts

Tree spirits of the Indian subcontinent were among the many mythological spirit entities described by William Crooke in his book Religion and Folklore of Northern India (1926).

“These tree ghosts are, it is needless to say, very numerous. Hence most local shrines are constructed under trees; and in one particular tree, the Bira, the jungle tribes of Mirzapur locate Bagheswar, the tiger godling, one of their most dreaded deities. In the Konkan, according to Mr. Campbell, the medium or Bhagat who becomes possessed is called Jhad, or ‘tree,’ apparently because he is a favourite dwelling-place for spirits.

“In the Dakkhin it is believed that the spirit of the pregnant woman of Churel lives in a tree, and the Abors and Padams of East Bengal believe that spirits in trees kidnap children. Many of these tree spirits appear in the folk-tales. Thus, Devadatta worshipped a tree which one day suddenly split in two and a nymph appeared who invited him to go inside the tree. In there was a heavenly palace of jewels and Vidyatprabha, the maiden daughter of the king of the Yakshas [supernatural beings]; in another story the mendicant heard inside a tree the Yaksha joking with his wife.”

Sources:

Crooke, William. Religion and Folklore of Northern India. Humphrey, Milford: Oxford University Press, 1926.

The Tree of Life, and The Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil

Two of the trees said to have been planted by God in the Garden of Eden (Gen. 2:17; 3:24). They were believed by St. Ambrose to be of mystical significance. The former is understood to be the manifestation of God, and the latter of the worldly wisdom to which our human nature is too apt to incline.

Tremblers of the Cevennes

A Protestant caste of convulsionaries, who during the sixteenth century grew in numbers from their center in the Cevennes (south of Lyon, France), over almost the whole of Germany. They possessed many points of resemblance with cases of obsession and possession, and are said to have been insensible to thrusts and blows with pointed sticks and iron bars, as well as to the oppression of great weights. They had visions, communicated with good and evil spirits, and are said to have performed many miraculous cures similar to the apostolic miracles. They made use of modes of treatment called grandes secours or secours meurtriers, which were authenticated by the reports of eyewitnesses and by judicial documents.

Although they were belabored by the strongest men with heavy pieces of wood and bars of iron weighing at least thirty pounds, they complained of no injury, but experienced a sensation of pleasure. They also were covered with boards, on which as many as twenty men stood without its being painful to them. The Tremblers even bore as many as a hundred blows with a twenty pound weight, alternately applied to the breast and the stomach with such force that the room trembled; they begged the blows might be laid on harder, as light ones only increased their sufferings. It seemed only when the power of these blows had penetrated to the most vital parts that they experienced real relief.

Joseph Ennemoser explained this insensibility to pain by stating that in his experience:

“... spasmodic convulsions maintain themselves against outward attempts, and even the greatest violence, with almost superhuman strength, without injury to the patient, as has often been observed in young girls and women, where anyone might have almost been induced to believe in supernatural influence. The tension of the muscles increases in power with the insensibility of the power, so that no outward force is equal to it; and when it is attempted to check the paroxysm with force, it gains in intensity, and according to some observers not less psychical than physical. . . . I have observed the same manifestations in children, in Catholics, Protestants and Jews, without the least variation, on which account I consider it to be nothing more than an immense abnormal and inharmonic lusus naturae.” (See also Convulsionaries of St. Médard)

Sources:

Ennemoser, Joseph. The History of Magic. 2 vols., 1854. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1960.

Trench, (William) Brinsley Le Poer (1911–1995)

Distinguished British authority on UFOs. He is the 8th Earl of Clancarty and a member of the House of Lords, where he introduced a serious debate on UFOs January 18, 1979. This was a historic occasion—the first on which this subject had been discussed by the British Parliament.

Born September 18, 1911, Trench is the fifth son of the fifth Earl of Clancarty and of Mary Gwatkin. He was educated at Nautical College, Pangbourne. His interest in UFOs extends over thirty years. After World War II, he noticed many reports of UFO sightings and began to collect press cuttings on the subject. Through a meeting with Desmond Leslie, he was encouraged to attend a lecture on flying saucers at Battersea Polytechnic, London.

Trench, Derek Dempster (aviation correspondent of the British newspaper Daily Express), and other interested individuals founded a company named Flying Saucer Service Ltd. and commenced publication of a magazine Flying Saucer Review. The first edition appeared in spring 1955 with Derek Dempster as editor, followed by Trench in September 1956, then in September 1959 by Waveney Girvan. When Girvan died, the magazine was edited by Charles Bowen. After 25 years of publication, this remains the first authoritative British publication on the subject of UFOs. It is now included in the House of Lords library.

In 1967, Trench founded Contact International, a worldwide UFO organization with members in 37 different countries. His interest led to his writing a variety of books including some which moved from ufology to a consideration of the ancient astronaut hypothesis.

He died May 18, 1995.

Sources:

Trench, Brinsley Le Poer. The Eternal Subject. London: Souvenir, 1973.

———. The Flying Saucer Story. London: Neville Spearman, 1966.

———. Forgotten Heritage. London: Neville Spearman, 1964.

———. Men Among Mankind. London: Neville Spearman, 1962.

———. Operation Earth. London: Neville Spearman, 1969.

———. Secret of the Ages: UFOs From Inside the Earth. London: Souvenir Press, 1974.

———. The Sky People. London: Neville Spearman, 1960.

———. Who's Who 1996. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Trent, A. G. (1789–1850)

Pseudonym of philologist and author Richard Garnett, assistant keeper of printed books at the British Museum Library. He used this alias for his writings on astrology, at a time in which his professional reputation might have suffered if it had been known that he was actively interested in such a subject.

Trevelyan, Sir George (Lowthian) (1906–1996)

Fourth Baronet, born November 5, 1906, eldest son of the Rt. Hon. Sir C. P. Trevelyan who was Minister of Education in Ramsay MacDonald's first Labour Government in Britain. Sir George grew up with a background of liberal politics and progressive thought. He was educated at Sidcot School and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He also worked as an artist-craftsman with Peter Waals workshops 1930–1.

For four years (1932–36), he trained and worked in the Alexander Technique, the psychophysical healing system developed by F. M. Alexander. Then until World War II, he taught at Gordonstown School and Abinger Hill School. During the war, he was a Home Guard Training Captain and following the war taught at No. 1 Army College, Newbattle Abbey (1945–47). On retirement for the Army, he became principal of Attingham Park, the Shropshire Adult College, where he did pioneering work in the teaching of spiritual knowledge as adult education.

On his retirement in 1971, he founded the Wrekin Trust, one of the pioneering New Age organizations, concerned with dissolving the barriers between science and religion. The trust held important conferences on science in relation to mysticism, with papers from such distinguished individuals as Prof. Glen W. Schaefer, Prof. Joscelyn Godwin, and Pir Vilayat Inayat Khan. These conferences provided a nexus of early New Age networks. As the new age developed Trevelyan authored a number of books reflecting on the growing vision and offering the movement his mature insights.

He died February 7, 1996.

Sources:

Tarne, Ingham. “A Little Lower Than the Angels. . . and Crowned with Glory.” Meditation 3, no. 4 (Fall 1988): 24–28.

Trevelyan, George. The Active Eye in Architecture. N.p., 1977.

———. Operation Redemption. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Turnstone Press, 1981.

———. A Vision of the Aquarian Age. London: Stillpoint, 1984.

Trevelyan, George, and Edward Marchett. Twelve Seats at the Round Table. Jersey: Neville Spearman, 1976.

Trévisan, Bernard of (1406–1490)

Italian alchemist seeking to discover the philosophers' stone. Trévisan began at an early age to spend large sums of money on the pursuit.

Trévisan was born at Padua. His father was a doctor of medicine, so it is probable that Bernard received his initial training in science at home. At the age of fourteen he devoted himself to alchemy. He read the works of Eastern philosophers Gerber and Rhasis. Trévisan augmented his learning with the writings of Sacrobosco and Rupecissa. He engaged in a long course of reading and praying.

Trévisan heard that Henry, a German priest, had succeeded in creating the philosophers' stone. He went to Germany, accompanied by other alchemists. Henry claimed he would disclose all if they would supply a certain sum of money to procure the necessary tools and materials. After Henry proved fraud Trévisan decided to abandon his search. However, he visited Spain, Great Britain, Holland, and France, trying in each of these countries to learn more about creating the philosophers' stone. Eventually he went to Egypt, Persia, and Palestine and subsequently travelled in Greece.

Ultimately Trévisan found himself impoverished and was forced to sell his parental estates. He retired to the Island of Rhodes and met a priest who knew something of science. Trévisan proposed they should start fresh experiments together. The cleric agreed to help, so the pair borrowed a large sum of money to purchase the necessary paraphernalia. The two found some success.

It is believed that Trévisan was at least partly responsible for an octavo volume published in 1643, Le Bernard d'Alchmague, cum Bernard Treveso, while he is commonly credited with another work titled La Philosophic Naturelle des Metaux. In this latter work he insists on the necessity of meditation by the scientist who would create the philosophers' stone.

Bernard of Trévisan is often confused with two other individuals—Bernardo Trevisano (1652–1720), a Venetian devoted to languages, mathematics, philosophy, and painting, and Bernardinus Trivisanus (1506–1583), who studied arts and medicine at Padua and became professor of logic and medical theory.

Triad Group

Nonprofit organization founded by author Whitley Strieber to catalog and study “visitor experiences”—claims of contacts with extraterrestrials or other creatures. The project followed Strieber's claimed experiences detailed in his book Communion (1987). After the formation of the organization, rather than joining his cause, many believers in unidentified flying objects claimed Strieber was an amateur. After several years, he dissolved the group.

Triad Society

An ancient esoteric society of China. The candidate was taken to a dark room by two members to kneel before the president. He was given a living cock and a knife and took an oath to assist his brethren in any emergency, even at the risk of his life. He then cut off the head of the cock, mingled its blood with his own, and the three assisting individuals added some of their own blood.

After being warned that death is the punishment should he divulge the secrets of the society, he was initiated and given the triad signs of recognition. For example, a member had to lift any object with three fingers only. This society, originally altruistic, later became political.

Various Triad societies were revived in Hong Kong to operate criminal extortion and protection rackets. Cinema protection was a specialty of these gangs and usually involved Triad members being employed as ushers, ticket-sellers, or sub-managers.

Financial operations involve magic numerals, symbolic of the particular Triad society. For example, protection money may be demanded in sums relating to the figure 8, the lower half of the Chinese character Hung, used by some Triad societies. The numeral 3 denotes heaven, earth, and man. The word Triad originally was used as a mystical symbol.

In the 1970s, the Triad racketeering operations in Hong Kong resulted in the publication of a police manual, Triad Societies of Hong Kong, restricted to police personnel. In 1976, the Triad societies spread their operations to Britain, where cities like Birmingham, Bristol, Liverpool, Portsmouth, Southampton, Manchester, and London with large Chinese populations could be victimized. Triad protection rackets even operate in the West End cinemas and clubs of London, where vicious fights have been reported involving meat cleavers.

A muscleman in the Shing Wo Triad is known as “426,” a numerical symbol for “Red stick” or “enforcer.” In some British cities, the protection racket is being partially reduced by closing down illegal gambling clubs where Triad members meet or convert their funds.

Sources:

Chesneaux, Jean. Secret Societies in China in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1971.

Triangles (Network)

Network funded by the Lucis Trust, formed to propagate the teachings of Alice A. Bailey (1880–1949), former Theosophist who founded her own Arcane School.

The Triangles Program was inaugurated in 1937 by Bailey in which she called upon people to form groups of three who would daily unite to channel spiritual energy to the world. Address: 120 Wall St., 24th Fl., New York, NY 10005. British headquarters are at Ste. 54, 3 Whitehall Ct., London, SW1A 2EF, England. Website: <http://www.lucistrust.org/>.

Trilite Seminars

Trilite Seminars is a Canadian channeling organization built around the activity of a walk-in personality named Shaari. Prior to 1989, she had been a professional in computer graphics who was also a trance medium who led personal growth workshops. That year she was in a car accident. During her period of recovery, she decided that she had completed her life work and requested that she end her incarnation. However, rather than let her body die, she offered it for the use of someone else. That someone came to be known as Shaari.

According to Shaari, she is a commander in the Star Command, which she has worked with for more than 750 years. She had an unusual birth as a Pleiadian/Arcturan hybrid. She was not born of normal parents but created as a result of action by a Pleiadian and Arcturan council. In her early years, she traveled the universe studying various cultures. She had a family with her husband Mishar.

During what on Earth was the 1980s, she had traveled to the planet Ur to assist the development of consciousness of a primitive life form. On the return journey, she stopped at the Ashtar Command headquarters near Earth. This area is under the command of Veyares and operates under the strict directives of Ashtar, the Star Command, and the Intergalactic Council of Twelve. While here, she was offered the opportunity to assist in the leap of consciousness of Earth and humanity by consciously integrating into another life form. The Earth mission was to last 30 years, at the conclusion of which she would take over the post currently held by Veyares.

Shaari channels Abraham, a member of the Light Brotherhood and Intergalactic Command, as well as Malaya, a feminine consciousness. Together she and these two entities form the triad for which her organization is named. These two entities had previously been channeled by the person whose body she took over. The Trilite organization offers seminars and retreats, and Shaari channels in private sessions for individuals. Several times a year she leads travel seminars to power spots in order to provide a focus for the healing of the planet.

Trilite is headquartered at P.O. Box 22040, Brentwood Bay, BC, Canada, V0S 1R0. It does not have a website, but information can be found on the Internet at <http://members.spiritweb.org/Spirit/et-journey.htm>.

Sources:

Trilite Seminars. <http://members.spiritweb.org/Spirit/et-journey.htm>. February 28, 2000.

Trintzius, Rene (1898–1953)

A writer and unorthodox healer, born July 29, 1898, at Rouen, France. He became a novelist and playwright and wrote biographical studies of Rousseau, Charlotte Corday, Jacques Cazotte, and John Law. His books include: L'Astrologie à la portée de tous (Astrology for All), Lisez dans vos mains (Palmistry), La Magie a-t-elle raison (Is Magic on the Right Lines?), Les Guérisons supranormales (Supernormal Cures), Les Pouvoirs inconnus de l'Homme (Man's Unknown Powers), La Voyance et ses supports (Clairvoyance and Its Supports), and Au seuil du Monde invisible (On the Threshold of the Invisible World). He died in 1953.

Triskaidekaphobia Illuminatus Society

A defunct organization founded in 1984 concerned with superstitions about the number 13. Membership was comprised of individuals who believed the number 13 had the ability to affect the balance of world power and political structure through the "Illuminati" (persons who are or who claim to be unusually enlightened). The society sought to isolate seemingly unconnected events caused by the numerical forces inherent in the number 13, correlate the meanings of these events, and develop solutions and strategies.

The society promoted the organization of illuminated task forces for the elimination of Triskaidekaphobia (fear of the number 13) from society. It operated a think tank, bestowed an annual award for contributions concerning the "power" of the number 13, and maintained an archive collection of media clippings and videotapes from television shows. The society published The 13th Illuminated Stratum newsletter (two to five per year); Thirteen, an editorial report issued at irregular intervals; and Fear to Feel: the Illuminated Network of 13 Concealed Phantoms, a book. The society disbanded around 1990.

Trithemius (Johann) (1462–1519)

Alchemist and magician. The son of a German vine grower named Heidenberg, he received his Latin name from Tritenheim, a village in the electorate of Trêves, where he was born. He lost his father when he was a year old, and his mother remarried.

Trithemius worked all day in the vineyards and studied at night. He read whatever books he could beg or borrow. With his share of the patrimony bequeathed by his father, Trithemius went to Trêves, entered as student at the university, and assumed the name of Trithemius.

By the age of 20, Trithemius had acquired the reputation of a scholar. In the winter of 1482, he left Trêves and returned to Tritenheim to visit his mother.

On arriving at Spanheim, Trithemius found the roads impassable due to snow. He went to a neighboring Benedictine monastery. There he stayed for several days. He liked the monastery and voluntarily took the monastic vows and retired from the world. In the course of two years, he was elected abbot and devoted himself to the repair and improvement of the monastery.

After 21 years as abbot, the monks elected another abbot. Trithemius left Spanheim and wandered from place to place, until finally elected abbot of St. James of Wurzburg, where he died in 1519.

Trithemius devised a shorthand called stenogonographia, stigmatized as a Kabalistic and necromantic writing, concealing his most fearful, occult secrets. He wrote a treatise on the subject, another on the supposed administration of the world by its guardian angels, translated into English in 1647 by the astrologer William Lilly. He wrote a third book on geomancy, or divination by means of lines and circles on the ground, a fourth upon sorcery, and a fifth on alchemy. In his work on sorcery, Trithemius made an early mention of the popular story of Faust, and recorded his experiences with the spirit named Hudekin.

Reportedly, Trithemius gave the Emperor Maximilian a vision of his deceased wife, the beautiful Mary of Burgundy. Reputedly he defrayed the expenses of his monastic establishment at Spanheim by resources obtained from the philosophers' stone.

Sources:

Seligmann, Kurt. The History of Magic. New York: Pantheon Books, 1948. Reprinted as Magic, Supernaturalism and Religion. New York: Pantheon Books, 1971.

Trivah

Among the Dayaks of Borneo, the trivah, or feast of the dead, was celebrated after a death had taken place. A panel containing a representation of the tempon-teloris (ship of the dead) was generally set up at the trivah, and sacrifices of fowls were offered to it. It was believed that until the trivah had been celebrated, the souls were unable to reach the golden shores. (See also Book of the Dead; Egypt)

Trollope, Thomas Adolphus (1810–1892)

British novelist, author on travel, biography, history and frequent investigator of the medium D. D. Home. In 1855, Trollope opposed Sir David Brewster when the latter published a denial of having witnessed Home's psychic phenomena.

Eight years later, in a letter to The Athenaeum (April 1863), Trollope testified to "having seen and felt physical facts, wholly and utterly inexplicable, as I believe, by any known and generally received physical laws. I unhesitatingly reject the theory which considers such facts to be produced by means familiar to the best professors of legerdemain."

The report by a committee of the London Dialectical Society contained his written testimony on an apport of jonquil flowers through the mediumship of Agnes Guppy-Volckman in his own home in Florence, Italy.

Tromp, S(olco) W(alie) (1909–1983)

Geophysicist, director of the Bioclimatological Research Center, Leiden, Netherlands, and writer on parapsychological subjects. Tromp was born on March 9, 1909, at Djarkarta, Indonesia. He moved to Europe for his education and earned his Ph.D. at the University of Leiden in geology in 1932.

After military service (1932–33), Tromp was a field geologist for oil companies in Indonesia and Egypt from 1933 to 1940. During World War II, he worked as an advisor on oil explorations for the Turkish Government (1940–43) and then joined his country's war effort as the director of economic warfare, Netherlands Army (1943–45). After the war he held a variety of positions as an economic geologist. Related to his geological interests, Tromp specialized in the study of phenomena connected with dowsing (water divining) about which he wrote several articles and books. He died March 17, 1983, in the Netherlands.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Tromp, S. W. Dowsing and Science. N.p., 1950.

———. "First Report on Experiments Concerning the Influence of Variations in the Strength of the Magnetic Field on Muscular Contraction." Dutch Journal of Parapsychology (January 1947).

———. Fundamental Principles of Psychical Physics. N.p., 1952.

———. "The Problem of the Possible Influence of Dowsing Zones on the Health of Men." Dutch Journal of Parapsychology (November 1948).

———. Psychical Physics. N.p., 1949.

Tron, Giorgio (1884–1963)

Italian physician who studied parapsychology. Tron was born on September 12, 1884, in Turin, Italy. He studied at the University of Pavia (M.D., 1910; teaching diploma in hygiene, 1924). He was staff doctor at the Hospital for Infectious Diseases, Milan (1915–26), hygiene officer at Milan (1927–38), and director of the Istituto Sieroterapico Italiano, Naples (1940–53). Tron was a member of the Società Italiana di Parapsicologia and served as the society's secretary (1955–59).

In addition to his writings on medical subjects, Tron contributed articles to the Bulletin of the Società Italiana di Parapsicologia. He also wrote a chapter on unorthodox healing in the book Studia Parapsychologica (1956) and on physical mediumistic phenomena in Nuovi Problemi di Metapsichica (1953). He died February 5, 1963, in Rome.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Trophonios

Trophonios, a legendary Greek hero who was eventually considered a god-like being, was credited with building the original temple housing the Oracle at Delphi. At a later date, the Oracle at Delphi is said to have ordered the building of an oracle site to be established at Lebadea (known today as the town of Livadia) dedicated to Trophonios. The site would become one of the prominent oracular centers in ancient Greece, and accounts of it survive in the writings of Pausanias.

Those who consulted the oracle at Labadea followed a pattern common in the ancient world. They took up residence at the center for several days, during which they offered sacrifices of various animals. Following the sacrifices, soothsayers were present to read the entrails of the animals (a practice termed extispicy), specifically determining if Trophonios would receive the inquirer graciously or not. The night before entering the cave where the god dwelled, the person would receive a bath and was anointed with olive oil. The priests then took him to water springs where the water of forgetfulness (for the loss of memory of all that was past) and the water of memory (to recall all that would be seen) were consumed. It is believed that these waters contained doses of hallucinogenic drugs.

The inquirer was taken to the entrance of the cave and supplied with a ladder by which he went down into a room. In the floor was a small opening through which the person entered into the actual oracle space. Here the person had both visionary experiences and encounters with the deity (possibly one of the priests acting as a medium). Upon his return, the person was seated on the Throne of Memory and questioned as to what had been seen or heard.

The site of the Trophonion oracle is well known, though modern explorers of the area have been unable to locate the entrance to the caves used for divination in ancient times. Some believe that a complex of interconnected caves exist in the area.

Sources:

Pausanias. Guide to Greece. Translated by Peter Levi. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin, 1971.

Temple, Robert K. G. Conversations with Eternity: Ancient Man's Attempt to Know the Future. London: Rider, 1984.

True Black Magic, Book of the

A grimoire (manual of ceremonial magic) that is an adapted version of the Key of Solomon the King.

True World Order (TWO)

Movement started by Swami Vishnudevananda, disciple of the late Swami Sivananda of Rishikesh, India, and believer in hatha yoga.

TWO is dedicated to promoting world peace and understanding, good health, and happiness through yoga harmony and a vegetarian diet. For information: International Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Center, 673 8th Ave., Val Morin, Quebec, Canada J0T 2R0.

Trumpet

A funnel-shaped device of cardboard, aluminum, or other lightweight material used at Spiritualist séances for the manifestation of direct voice communication from spirits. Jonathan Koons, the nineteenth-century American farmer medium, appears to have been the first to use a trumpet.

Spiritualists have suggested the trumpet serves as a condenser of psychic energy and increases the volume of the spirit voice. Reportedly, weak or inexperienced spirits often have to use the trumpet. It is seldom necessary for a spirit guide. Some mediums also wet the trumpet with water, in the belief this facilitates the phenomena.

The trumpet is usually coated with a marking of luminous paint. Supposedly at séances in dark rooms the trumpet is seen levitating when there is sufficient psychic force and moving around the circle, conveying personal messages to individual sitters.

Reportedly as a safeguard against fraud, psychical researchers have devised techniques and apparatus to attempt to exclude the possibility of a medium employing ventriloquism in producing voices ostensibly from the trumpet. One method is to fill the medium's mouth with water. During the investigation of the medium Mina Crandon (better known as "Margery"), Mark Richardson of Boston invented a "Voice Control Machine."

The American direct voice medium Elizabeth Blake used a double trumpet with a saucer-shaped extension at the small end to be placed on the ear of the sitter and on her own. Another trumpet, the "Shastaphone," was developed through a psychic communication in Australia, but does not appear to have been widely used.

Trungpa Rinpoche, Chogyam (1940–1987)

Throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, teachers of the occult have portrayed Tibet as an outpost of the highest occult wisdom. However, it was not until after the Chinese invasion of Tibet in 1959 that Tibetan teachers arrived in the West, making firsthand encounters with Tibetan Buddhism available to more than a few adventurous explorers. Among the first to arrive was Chogyam Trungpa, the eleventh Trungpa Tulku. He was born in February 1929 in Geje, Tibet. Designated the reincarnation of a famous lama as an infant, he was raised in a monastery and trained in Tibetan Buddhism. He fled Tibet at the time of the invasion, and in 1963 received a Spaulding grant to attend Oxford University. While in England he wrote his autobiography, Born in Tibet (1966), and established a center in Scotland.

In 1970 Trungpa renounced his monastic vows to marry. He moved to the United States that same year and founded Karme Choling, a seed center of what would grow into Vajradhatu, an international fellowship of his students. He presented his version of Tibetan Buddhism in a number of books, including Mudra (1972); Cutting through Spiritual Materialism (1973); Visual Dharma, the Buddhist Art of Tibet (1975); The Dawn of Tantra (1975), with Herbert Gunther; and The Myth of Freedom (1976). He found ready acceptance among one segment of people who appreciated his total dedication to his spiritual teachings and his simultaneous ability to enjoy life, manifested through his love of alcohol and women. He was also a patron of the arts, especially poetry, and founded a school, Naropa Institute, which offers an alternative curriculum with college-level instruction. The institute has taught the likes of Allen Ginsberg and Ram Dass.

Trungpa possibly became best known for his denunciation of “spiritual materialism,” manifest in the spiritual seekers of alternative religions who seemed preoccupied with collecting as many varied spiritual experiences as possible. Such seekers never settle down long enough to have their search rewarded with real insight, he said.

In 1981 Trungpa expanded his teachings to Canada, where he established a community in Halifax. He died at these Canadian headquarters April 4, 1987 of cardiac arrest and respiratory failure. He was succeeded by Osel Tendzin, his chief disciple.

Sources:

Clark, Tom. The Great Naropa Poetry Wars. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Cadmus Editions, 1980.

Fields, Rick. How the Swans Came to the Lake: A Narrative History of Buddhism in America. Boulder, Colo.: Shambhala, 1981.

Queen, Edward L., Stephen R Prothero, and Gardiner H Shattuck. “Chogyam Trungpa,” Encyclopedia of American Religious History. 2 vols. New York: Facts on File, 1996.

The Tibetan Book of the Dead. Translated and with a commentary by Francesca Fremantle and Chogyam Trungpa. Berkeley, Calif.: Shambhala, 1973.

Truth Journal

Publication of the Center for Spiritual Awareness (CSA), a kriya yoga organization developed from the teachings of Swami Paramahansa Yogananda and headed by Roy Eugene Davis. CSA may be contacted at P.O. Box 7, Lakemount, GA 30552-0001. The center’s website is <http://www.csa-davis.org/>.

Sources:

Center for Spiritual Awareness. <http://www.csa-davis.org/>. March 8, 2000.

Truzzi, Marcello (1935–)

Contemporary sociologist and scholar of parapsychology and the occult. Truzzi was born on September 6, 1935, in Copenhagen, Denmark. He attended Florida State University (B.A., 1957), the University of Florida (M.A., 1962), and Cornell University (Ph.D., 1970). He taught at several universities before settling permanently in the sociology department at Eastern Michigan University, Ypsilanti. He chaired the department for 12 years (1974–86).

Born into a prominent circus family, Truzzi has interests encompassing folklore, stage magic, the history of science, popular culture, and parapsychology. He has been most identified with anomalous phenomena and coined the term annomolistics to designate the field of study.

In 1972 Truzzi began to issue a small newsletter, Explorations, renamed The Zetetic two years later. In 1976 The Zetetic was offered to the Committee for the Scientific Investigation of Claims of the Paranormal, cofounded by Truzzi, as its official publication. Within a short time, Truzzi, who viewed himself as a true skeptic, found himself in conflict with the majority of the committee members. As a skeptic, he expressed his doubts about unproven claims and withheld judgement pending definitive evidence. The majority of the committee proved themselves to be debunkers who opposed all discussion of the paranormal. Truzzi broke with the committee when it was discovered that members had falsified data that tended to support Michel Gauquelin’s views on astrology.

After separating from the committee, Truzzi founded the Center for Scientific Anomalies Research and began a new periodical, the Zetetic Scholar. He edited the Zetetic Scholar for a decade (1978–87). Besides his more conventional books on sociology, Truzzi has ventured into the sociology of witchcraft and the occult and cowritten (with Arthur Lyons) the definitive text on the use of occult powers in solving crimes, The Blue Sense: Psychic Detectives and Crime (1991).

Sources:

Clark, Jerome. Encyclopedia of Strange and Unexplained Phenomena. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Clark, Jerome, and J. Gordon Melton. “The Crusade Against the Paranormal.” Fate pt. 1, 32, 9 (September 1979): 70–76; pt. 2, 32, 10 (October 1979): 87–94.

Lyons, Arthur, and Marcello Truzzi. The Blue Sense: Psychic Detectives and Crime. New York: Mysterious Press/Warner Books, 1991.

Truzzi, Marcello. Cauldron Cookery: An Authentic Guide for Coven Connoisseurs. New York: Meredith, 1969.

———. “The Occult Revival as Popular Culture: Some Random Observations on the Old and Nouveau Witch.” Sociological Quarterly 13 (Winter 1972): 16–34.

———. Where Witchcraft Lives. London: Aquarian Press, 1962.

The Tsitsith

An article of Jewish religious apparel, the fringe or tassels attached to the outer garment, which are believed to be endowed with talismanic properties. In modern times, the fringe has survived in the praying shawl named talith and in a garment worn on the chest. A sentence in the Talmud states: “Whoever has the tephillin bound to his head and arm, and the tsitsith thrown over his garments . . . is protected from sin.” (See also Tephillin)

Tubby, Gertrude Ogden (1878–1967)

Teacher, author, and psychic researcher. Born June 18, 1878, at Kingston on Hudson, New York, Tubby studied at Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts (B.S., 1902). In 1907 she became the special research assistant to James H. Hyslop, then president of the American Society for Psychical Research (ASPR) and remained in that position for the rest of Hyslop’s life. The society split in 1925, with dissident members forming the Boston Society for Psychic Research. Tubby, who had control of Hyslop’s papers, continued to work for the ASPR as a secretary and as editor of its Journal until 1924. However, after a dispute with the leadership of the society she refused to give them the Hyslop collection for their archives. Eventually she turned that material over to the Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship (now the International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship).

Also, as a result of working as Hyslop’s assistant, Tubby investigated a wide range of psychic phenomena, including mediumship, telepathy, clairvoyance, psychokinesis, and survival. After his death, she collected communications apparently from him from various mediums. These messages are discussed in the book James H. Hyslop—X, His Book (1929). She also published the book Psychics and Mediums, A Handbook for Students (1935; British ed. 1938), as well as various articles in the Journal and Proceedings of the ASPR.

She died July 1967.

Tulku

Term for a Tibetan entity recognized in a present incarnation. Tibetan Buddhism teaches that highly evolved individuals become spiritually liberated by abandoning the sense of ego or separate identity, but the spiritual forces comprising such an individual may still elect to be reborn for the benefit of other people. It is believed they are only illusory manifestations sustained by the sense of ego.

Traditional tests exist for the identification of tulkus, especially in the case of the Dalai Lama. Other contemporary tulkus include Chogyam Trungpa (1939–1987), author of the book Born in Tibet (London, 1966) and Tarthang Tulku, both popularly known by their disciples as “Rinpoche,” a title meaning “precious master.”

Tulpa

Tibetan term for a phantom form generated by mental concentration. In her book With Mystics and Magicians in Tibet (1931), Alexandra David-Neel describes how she created a tulpa of a monk, who supposedly became a recognizable member of her party during a journey. Reportedly in the course of time this phantom took on an independent life of its own. David-Neel claimed it took six months of intense concentration to dissolve this phantom.

A tulpa may also double as the magician who created it, employed for protective purposes by appearing instead of its creator. A tulpa should be distinguished from a tulku, which is either the reincarnation of a saintly individual or the incarnation of a non-human entity, such as a god, demon, or fairy.

Sources:

David-Neel, Alexandra. Initiations and Initiates in Tibet. London, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1959.

———. The Secret Oral Tradition in Tibetan Buddhist Sects. San Francisco: City Lights, 1964. Reprint, Calcutta: Maha Bodhi Society of India, 1971.

———. With Mystics and Magicians in Tibet. 1931. Rev. ed. as Magic and Mystery in Tibet. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1956. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1971.

Tumah

According to the Kabala, the term refers to physical or moral uncleanness. The latter is divided into three main divisions—idolatry, murder, and immorality. Sin has rendered humanity imperfect, but also affected the whole of nature, even to the sphere of angels and the divinity. In physical uncleanness, there is a coarser and subtler form. The latter causes a dimness in the soul felt by those who are nearest to sacred things. Organic matter that comes into contact with the human body is more liable to tumah than remoter things. The human corpse is more unclean than lower animals, because its more complex nature involves more decay.

Tumo

The mystical practice from Tibet of generating bodily heat, so that a hermit may spend winter naked in a cave amid snow and freezing temperatures at an altitude between 11,000 and 18,000 feet. Adepts have supposedly distinguished various types of tumo: exoteric arises spontaneously in the course of mystical raptures; esoteric keeps a hermit comfortable on a snowy hill; and mystic produces experiences of paradisiacal bliss.

According to Alexandra David-Neel, tumo “is also the subtle fire with which warms the generative fluid and drives the energy in it, till it runs all over the body along the subtle channels.” This has some similarity to the Hindu teachings of the nature of kundalini energy—possibly aroused in subtle physical channels, related to the energy of sexual activity, and productive of either heat or cold in the body.

Sources:

David-Neel, Alexandra. Initiations and Initiates in Tibet. London, 1932. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1959.

———. The Secret Oral Tradition in Tibetan Buddhist Sects. San Francisco: City Lights, 1964. Reprint, Calcutta: Maha Bodhi Society of India, 1971.

———. With Mystics & Magicians in Tibet. 1931. Rev. ed. as Magic and Mystery in Tibet. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1956. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1971.

Tunisa

Burmese diviners. (See also Myanmar)

Turin Shroud

A relic housed in a chapel in Turin (or Turino), Italy, and believed by some to be the shroud in which Jesus was wrapped after his crucifixion. In the accounts of Jesus' burial in the Christian New Testament, the earliest of which appears in the Gospel of Mark 15:46, it is noted, “And he [Joseph of Arimathea] brought fine linen, and took him [Jesus] down and wrapped him in the linen, and laid him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock. . . .” There is no record of the survival of that burial cloth for the next five centuries. Then about 570 C.E., a pilgrim reported that it was kept in a monastery by the river Jordan. In 670 C.E. the French bishop Arculph, returning from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, was shipwrecked on the coast of Scotland and traveled to a monastery on the island of Iona. Here he said he had seen the shroud and been allowed to kiss it.

Subsequent references are made to a surviving shroud by the Venerable Bede, St. Willibald, St. John Damascene, and the Emperor Baldwin. In 1284, Robert de Clari, chronicler of the Fourth Crusade, described the triumphant entry of Crusaders into Constantinople and mentioned the monastery of Lady St. Mary of the Blachernes, in which a cloth claiming to be the shroud was kept. In the Middle Ages some 40 different shrouds were claimed to be the one in which Christ was buried. At this time there also existed a variety of similar relics, including tears from Jesus, milk from the Virgin Mary, thorns from the crown of thorns worn by Jesus, and enough pieces of the cross to make a number of different such instruments of execution. The reformation of the church concerning such superstitions began in earnest in the sixteenth century and continued in subsequent centuries.

Nothing is known of the particular piece of cloth known as the Shroud of Turin until its appearance in the church of Lirey, Troyes, France, during the fourteenth century. At the time between 1353 and 1356, the shroud was placed in a small wooden church at Lirey by Geoffrey de Charny, Lord of Lirey, but exhibition of the relic aroused opposition from Henry of Poitiers, Bishop of Troyes. Many years later, in 1389, the Lord of Lirey's son (Geoffrey II) obtained permission to exhibit the shroud, but Henry's successor as bishop of Troyes, Pierre d'Arcis, objected most strenuously.

In a statement to the Avignon Pope Clement VII, he complained that the exhibition was not for devotion, but for monetary gain, and that the relic was a forgery, “a certain cloth cunningly painted, upon which by clever sleight of hand was depicted the twofold image of one man, that is to say the back and the front, [the canons at Lirey] falsely declaring and pretending that this was the actual shroud in which our Saviour Jesus Christ was enfolded in the tomb.” D'Arcis claimed that Henry of Poitiers, 30 years earlier, after “diligent inquiry and examination” had established that the shroud had been “cunningly painted, the truth being attested by the artist . . . that it was a work of human skill and not miraculously wrought . . .” and that the first exhibition by Geoffrey's father had been prohibited.

Meanwhile, however, Geoffrey's widow had married Aymon of Geneva, who had ecclesiastical influence with Pope Clement, and the prohibition was bypassed, much to the anger of d'Arcis, hence his complaint in 1389. Pope Clement resolved the matter by declaring that Geoffrey II could continue exhibiting the shroud provided that it was always stated that it was only “a figure or representation” of Christ’s cloth, and that d’Arcis must keep silence in the matter under pain of excommunication.

This affair has often been revived as “proof” that the shroud was a forgery, but the accusations of d’Arcis were never proved, and the original campaign against the genuineness of the shroud had started on the somewhat flimsy grounds that if such a cloth imprinted with an image of Jesus Christ had really existed, it would have been mentioned in the Gospels, and that the exhibition at Lirey was all part of a plot to hire persons for pretended miracles of healing. The statement that diligent inquiry had revealed a cunning artist remains unconvincing, since the artist was never named or punished.

After the death of Geoffrey II, his widow Margaret claimed that the relic had only been loaned to Lirey by her grandfather, but she was eventually obliged to give it up.

In 1452, it passed into the keeping of the Duke of Savoy. In 1532 it was kept in the sacristy of Sainte Chappelle, France, where it was nearly destroyed in a fire. It was then taken to the monastery of St. Clair where it was patched by nuns. It was brought to Saint Charles Borromeo in Turin, Italy, in 1578, and for more than four centuries remained the property of the ruling House of Savoy from which came the kings of Italy. It was exhibited annually until it was feared that frequent handling might damage it. By the end of the nineteenth century it was exhibited only on very special occasions.

In 1946, Umberto II, former king of Italy and the owner of the shroud, was exiled. He settled in Portugal and in the ensuing years, the Catholic Church, in the person of the archbishop of Turin, became its custodian. In 1978 it was disclosed that Umberto was leaving the shroud to the Pope, an event that occurred in 1983 with Umberto’s passing. Italy did not challenge the will or claim the shroud for itself. Since that time, the Roman Catholic Church has had the power to respond directly to pressure to have the shroud definitively tested by modern scientific methods.

Description of the Shroud

The shroud always had vague markings indicating the outlines of a body, but these took on a special significance only at the end of the nineteenth century. Modern interest in the shroud dates from 1898, when Secundo Pia obtained permission to photograph it for the first time and discovered that his negative plate revealed a perfect image of a noble and majestic face with forehead wounds suggesting a crown of thorns, and a body with wounds in the hands and side.

The supposition is that in some unknown way, emanations from the body laid in the shroud reacted with the spices used for burial in such a way as to cause an image on the cloth, rather like a photographic negative. Although the shroud had been venerated for centuries, nobody had formerly realized that the markings might be more revealing than supposed. Pia’s negative plate showed a positive picture, virtually a full-length photograph of the occupant of the shroud.

The publication of Pia’s negative caused great excitement, and led to a scientific investigation by Paul Vignon, professor of Biology at the Institut Catholique in Paris. With his co-worker Yves Delage he presented his findings, favorable to the authenticity of the shroud, to the French Academy of Science. The collaboration was a strange one, since Delage was an agnostic and Vignon a Catholic. Since then, the shroud has received increased attention and scholarship, and Vatican experts spent some years studying and verifying historical documents connected with it.

On September 6, 1936, Pope Pius XI offered his opinion of the cloth, “These are the images of the Divine Redeemer. We might say they are the most beautiful, most moving and dearest we can imagine.”

The name sindonology has been given to studies of the shroud, and in 1939 the first Sindonological Congress was held in Turin. The Centro Internazionale di Sindonologia was created, drawing upon the highest academic, scientific, and ecclesiastical authorities.

In August 1978, the Holy Shroud was publicly exhibited again in the Cathedral of Turin, Italy. Because Turin had been a flashpoint for Red Brigade terrorism, special precautions were taken to protect the relic. In addition to extra police protection, the shroud itself was housed in a special display case with bulletproof glass. Archbishop Anastasio Ballestrero of Turin insisted that the shroud not be the subject of any form of commercialism, and the cost of the new protective case was born by a Turin exposition fund launched in the United States.

In October 1978, at the end of the exposition, a special Shroud Congress was held in Turin and attended by scientists from around the world. Advanced techniques of image analysis were discussed, including infra-red photography, photomicrography, high contrast photography, X-ray fluorescence, radiographic examination, and carbon dating.

Unfortunately much of the scientific analysis and discussion resulted in controversy and confusion. Many issues were hotly debated, such as whether the amount of iron oxide on the shroud indicated genuine bloodstains or artistic pigment. The main issue of dating the shroud was delayed through the reluctance of the authorities to permit destruction of a sample piece of the material for carbon dating. For a presentation of scientific views for and against the authenticity of the shroud, see the book The Image on the Shroud by H. David Sox (1981) and more recently The Mysterious Shroud by Ian Wilson (1986).

A significant breakthrough in the study of the shroud occurred in early 1987, when Pope John Paul II finally approved a plan to test fragments of the cloth in laboratories for radio-carbon content. Tests had been scheduled to begin in 1986, but were halted at the last minute by the Bishop of Turin.

Three major laboratories—in Switzerland, the United States, and Britain—were involved in these carbon-14 dating tests. Three other institutions were involved in statistical analysis of the results of tests, which included scientific controls using pieces of linen from known sources, ancient and modern. These included fragments of medieval cloth and a specimen from ancient Egypt, as well as modern cloth. The scientists involved did not know which cloth they were being provided with for testing until the results were correlated by the British Museum Research Laboratory and evaluated at the Vatican in Rome.

Edward Hall, of the Research Laboratory for Archaeology and Art at Oxford University, England, was one of the scientists involved in testing. He used an Accelerator Mass Spectrometer, generating a charge of two million volts. This massive new tool for radio-carbon dating is said to have influenced the Vatican decision to go ahead with the tests on actual fragments of the Turin Shroud. Earlier apparatus would have required the destruction of a sample about the size of a pocket handkerchief, whereas the new machine required a sample of only about a quarter of an inch.

In a report by Pearson Phillips in The Times, London, (April 15, 1987), Hall was quoted as stating: “If we get a medieval dating then we shall know it is a forgery and we can relax and forget the whole business. Although there will still be a mystery about how anyone in medieval times could have produced such a complex and effective fraud.” Hall assumed an agnostic viewpoint, stating: “My view of Christ as a historical individual is that he was obviously a powerful personality. I suppose it is possible that, in some way we do not currently fully understand, some kind of impression from him was transferred to the shroud. But if we produce a carbon date around the start of the first century A.D., the fat will really be in the fire. As a scientist, I would then find it difficult to dismiss the shroud’s authenticity.”

An official report on October 13, 1988, revealed that the three laboratories in Oxford, Zürich, and Arizona had independently carbon dated the cloth fragments as medieval, and not from the time of Jesus Christ. There was close agreement on the possible dates, giving an estimated span of circa 1260–1390. For most skeptics, this established once and for all that the shroud was a medieval forgery.

Die-hard believers in the authenticity of the shroud either questioned the accuracy of the scientific evidence or propounded fantastic theories to account for the dating of the cloth, e.g., that the image was formed by a burst of divine radiant energy that somehow altered the texture of the cloth.

The close concurrence in dating of three independent scientific laboratories, with the best and most accurate apparatus, cannot be dismissed lightly. The normal margin of error in carbon dating is considered to be about 100 years either way.

It is unlikely that these tests can resolve the enigma of the shroud. Critics of the carbon testing have noted that scientific tests of any kind sometimes overlook anomalies revealed by later research. In the case of the dating of the shroud, there is no reason to doubt the good faith and accuracy of reputable scientific laboratories, but it is good to remember that the centuries-old shroud has been through many vicissitudes, and we are dealing with minute fragments of material.

In 1532, for example, when the shroud was kept in a silver casket at the church of Sainte Chappelle in Chambéry, France, a fire broke out in the sacristy, melting drops of silver, which fell on the shroud and burned through folds in the cloth. In 1534, the burns on the cloth were patched by nuns at the monastery of St. Clair. The shroud has also suffered damp stains, and may have been washed or cleaned with oil at some time. Could the samples tested for carbon dating have been contaminated with threads or solutions from the later history of the shroud?

Moreover, carbon dating, accurate or misleading, cannot explain the extraordinary and awe-inspiring character of the image on the shroud as disclosed by the camera negative of Secondo Pia in 1898. There are no apparent brush marks, and other theories of production of the marks, however ingenious, hardly do justice to the beauty and accuracy of the icon. Common sense suggests that even a medieval forger of genius would be unlikely to have the prescience to produce a perfect and noble image in negative. What the pilgrims of that period in an out-of-the-way French district would surely have expected to see would have been a stylized rudimentary positive image, more like the icons in stained glass windows or the paintings in churches.

Dr. Robert Otlet, of the Atomic Energy Research Establishment at Harwell, had hoped that his famous laboratory would be included in the carbon dating tests, and later commented: "It is most unfortunate—entirely unnecessary when you put the amount of material to be taken in context. It will lead to a result which will be wide open to criticism and sadly will not be seen as definitive." It is clear that the story of the shroud has not come to an end. True believers in its authenticity have found ways to ignore and question the carbon dating evidence, while many fully accept the carbon dating results as conclusive.

Sources:

Barnes, Arthur Stapylton. The Holy Shroud of Turin. London: Burns Oates & Washbourne, 1934.

Heller, John H. Report on the Shroud of Turin. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1983.

Nickell, Joe. Inquest on the Shroud of Turin. Buffalo, N.Y.: Prometheus Press, 1983.

Reban, John. Inquest on Jesus Christ. London: Leslie Frewin, 1967.

Rinaldi, Peter M. The Man in the Shroud. New York: Vantage Press, 1972. Reprint, London: Futura, 1974. Reprinted as It Is The Lord: A Study of the Shroud of Christ. New York: Warner, 1973.

Sox, H. David. The Image on the Shroud: Is the Turin Shroud a Forgery? London: Unwin, 1981.

———. The Shroud Unmasked; Uncovering the Greatest Forgery of All Time. Basingstoke, England: Lamp Press, 1988.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Vignon, Paul. The Shroud of Christ. London: Constable, 1902. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1970.

Walsh, John. The Mysterious Shroud. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1986.

———. The Shroud. London: W. H. Allen, 1964.

Wilson, Ian. The Turin Shroud. London: Gollancz, 1978.

Wuenschel, Edward. Self-Portrait of Christ. New York: Esopus, 1954.

Zugibe, Frederick T. The Cross and the Shroud: a Medical Inquiry into the Crucifixion. New York: Paragon House Publishers, 1988.

Turner, Ann

A nineteenth-century English reputed witch. (See also England)

Turner, M(alcolm) E(lijah) (1929–)

Biometrician who experimented in the field of parapsychology. Turner was born on May 27, 1929, in Atlanta, Georgia. He studied at Duke University (B.A., 1952) and North Carolina State College (M.S. experimental statistics, 1955; Ph.D., 1959). After graduation he joined the faculty at the Medical College of Virginia. He joined the faculty of Emory University, Atlanta, Georgia, in 1963.

In the field of parapsychology, Turner experimented in model-building and statistical inference. He collaborated with Ann B. Turner and Elizabeth McMahan in experiments relating to the effects of time and distance on card-calling. Turner also worked with Karlis Osis on experiments in extrasensory perception over distance and developed a statistical model to evaluate ESP over spatial distances.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Osis, Karlis, and M. E. Turner. "Distance and ESP: A Transcontinental Experiment." Proceedings of the American Society for Psychical Research 27 (1968).

Osis, Karlis, M. E. Turner, and M. L. Carlson. "ESP Over Distance: Research on the ESP Channel." Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 65 (1971).

Turoff, Stephen

Contemporary British spiritual healer who practices psychic surgery. His healing is through an entity claimed to be "Dr. Joseph Kahn," whose healing resembles that of Philippine healers. At times, a real scalpel is manipulated; at other times, an invisible syringe or other apparatus is involved.

Purported healings effected through Turoff's mediumship include cases of fibroids in the womb, infected lungs, and liver tumor. "Dr. Kahn" is said to be one of a team of 18 spirit helpers. Turoff has demonstrated his healing before members of the Noah's Ark Society for Physical Mediumship.

Turquoise

A number of ancient beliefs surround this stone. J. B. Van Helmont stated: "Whoever wears a Turquoise, so that it, or its gold-setting touches the skin, may fall from any height; and the stone attracts to itself the whole force of the blow, so that it cracks, and the person is safe."

Medieval writers stated that turquoise became paler if its owner was ill, lost color entirely at his or her death, but recovered color when placed upon the finger of a new and healthy owner. It was believed to be a good amulet for preventing accidents to horsemen or becoming tired. Another belief was that turquoise moved itself when any danger threatened its possessor. Turquoise originally came from Persia, where it would sometimes be engraved with a motto or a verse from the Koran. The stone was also prized by Native American healers.

Turvey, Vincent Newton (1873–1912)

A British seer who refused to be classified as a medium since he was never entranced or controlled, did not develop his gifts (which he was born with), functioned not by mental passivity but mental activity, and instead of being controlled was able to control others, as a spirit might. Supposedly Turvey saw phantoms as a child. One such experience was a vision of his father while singing in church as a choir boy; the father died at the same time three hundred miles away. At the age of ten Turvey lost his visionary faculty.

Turvey studied engineering. In 1902, while engaged in his profession, he suffered a serious accident. For many years, he lived alone in his garden, in a tent, and spent ten or twelve hours a day reading, writing, and meditating on occult things.

The result is described in his own words:

“After forty thousand hours on one topic, I think I can claim to be, in a small way, a yogi. My illness and my meditation have produced, or awakened, my psychic gifts; and all the Yoga, Vedic and Gnostic teachings which I now read (and much more besides) seem to be familiar to me. I seem to have evolved them in my own mind, during meditation from a sort of ‘memory.’ In fact I often pitch a book away and say ‘Why, I know all this,’ and yet I had not read it before. Many Eastern forms come and argue with me, and, of course, I learn from them; but they do not come to teach me as a guru would. They come ‘to help you to teach yourself in this present life.’ In a word, I am ‘Self-taught’; but I owe a great deal to Eastern forms, many of whom visit me and give tests of their identity by talking to me in their own languages; and I get the messages translated.”

Turvey affiliated with Spiritualism. The Bournemouth Society of Spiritualists, of which he was vice president from 1908, gave demonstrations of clairvoyance at the end of their Sunday service. Turvey announced from the platform the presence of spirit visitors before the service was over, so that those who recognized them could stay for a closer communion.

Supposedly these spirits came to Turvey days before and impressed their appearance on his mind. Once a visitor appeared by the side of his bed, which was only a few inches from the wall. Turvey wrote: “Sometimes, they will come at dead of night and wake me up; at other times they will come when I am alone in the tent in my garden, or in my drawing room, or, what is still more obliging of them, they will look in while passing when I have earthly visitors with me who can bear witness that I described the visitants to them, before I went to the hall!”

Turvey’s 1911 book records his experiences in long-distance clairvoyance, out-of-the-body travel, predictions, spirit seeing, and a variation of clairvoyance he termed “phone-voynance.” A voucher was printed in the book by four men who testified to having inspected the original documents and controlled their reproduction. The journalist and Spiritualist W. T. Stead, declared “Mr. Turvey is a man of truth, that his testimony is trustworthy evidence as to what is within his own knowledge, and that the witnesses’ letters which are held for the scrutiny of inquirers are the genuine epistles of credible witnesses.”

Sources:

Turvey, Vincent Newton. The Beginnings of Seership. 1911. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1969.

Tutankhamen Curse

On November 26, 1922, in the Valley of the Kings, the tomb of Tutankhamen, the boy king of Egypt, was discovered. After three thousand years, four burial chambers were uncovered with nearly five thousand objects of gold, alabaster, lapis lazuli, and onyx, in addition to the mummy of the king and his gold mask. These treasures have expanded modern understanding of the art, life, religion, and history of ancient Egypt.

Two men were responsible for this discovery—Howard Carter, a British painter-archaeologist, and George E. S. M. Herbert, fifth Earl of Carnarvon. A few weeks after the excavation, Lord Carnarvon died suddenly, and this event, together with the deaths of various other individuals associated with the Tutankhamen tomb, started the story of a “Curse of the Pharaohs.” One writer claimed the curse was responsible for the lives of some three dozen scientists, archaeologists, and scholars.

Who Was Tutankhamen?

It has been claimed that Tutankhamen was a great king because his tomb contained such treasures. Others have suggested he was the pharaoh of Exodus and it was his wife, Ankhesenpa-Aten, who found Moses in the bulrushes and raised him. In fact, both claims are incorrect. Tutankhamen reigned during the Eighteenth Dynasty of the New Kingdom. He was a boy of nine when he came to the throne and his reign lasted nine years, from about 1334 to 1325 B.C.E. He was not the ruler of Egypt during the exodus described in the Bible.

It is believed Tutankhamen’s name was originally Tutankhaten (“perfect life of Aten”). He married Ankhesenpa-Aten when a child. He wife was a daughter of King Amenhotep IV (1372–1334 B.C.E.) who had earlier attempted to supplant the god Amun by the Aten, in the process changing his name to Akhenaten (“pleasing to the Aten”). At that time, the priests of Amun had more power than the ruler, so as Akhenaten he reinforced his rule and suppressed worship of Amun.

During the reign of Tutankhamen, the priesthoods dissolved by Akhenaten were partially reinstated and new images installed in temples. However, in giving pride to Amun, there was no attempt to destroy the worship of Aten, only a displacement of Aten’s former status as principal or sole god. Many of the treasures from the tomb of Tutankhamen indicate tolerance toward former gods. One inscription on a golden throne calls Tutankhamen “image of Ra, beloved of the gods,” and a cabinet inscription states “eldest son of Aten in heaven.” The memory of Akhenaten is also preserved in tomb objects such as a box bearing the name of Akhenaten, and an artist’s palette that belonged to Akhenaten’s eldest daughter Meritaten.

Tutankhamen died before a grand burial tomb could be prepared. Its importance lies in its contents—chariot bodies, state chairs, gilded couches, royal apparel, trinkets, cosmetics, statues, alabaster vessels, even food, and the golden mask of Tutankhamen himself. Most of the other royal tombs had been ravaged by robbers over the centuries.

The Excavators

Credit for discovery of the tomb was given to Howard Carter. Born May 9, 1873, in Swaffham, Norfolk, England, he was the son of a watercolor painter. At the age of 17, he was hired by Percy E. Newberry of the Egyptian Museum of Antiquities to work at the British Museum, London, to make finished drawings of Egyptian inscriptions. Carter later became assistant to Sir William Flinders Petrie, an Egyptologist, traveling in Egypt and recording in watercolors the paintings and inscriptions in temples.

In 1899, at the age of 25, Carter became inspector of monuments in Upper Egypt and Nubia, employed by the Antiquities Service, which was then administered by the French authorities. In 1904, Britain and France partitioned North Africa, the French assuming control of Morocco, and the British of Egypt. But French rights in archaeology continued, and authorization to excavate tombs required the investigator be accompanied by an inspector of antiquities and share the finds with the Antiquities Service on behalf of the Egyptians.

While Carter was an inspector of monuments, he worked for several seasons excavating the Valley of the Kings with American millionaire Theodore M. Davis. After opposition from the Egyptians, the French, and the newspapers, Carter lost his position as an inspector in 1903 due to an incident in a tomb at Saqqara.

For a time, Carter sold watercolor paintings to tourists and made paintings for Theodore Davis. In 1907, he stated working for the amateur archaeologist Carnarvon. George Edward Stanhope Molyneux Herbert became fifth Earl of Carnarvon on the death of his father in 1890. After an automobile accident he was advised by physicians to avoid the damp English winter and spent a year in Egypt, where he first became attracted to archaeological excavation.

The joint explorations of Carnarvon and Carter began in the winter of 1907–08, with excavations in the Valley of Der al-Bahari in Western Thebes. In 1910–11, they discovered an unfinished temple of Hatshepsut and other remains. In 1911–12, new ground was broken with excavations of Xoïs near the Nile delta. It was thought by 1922 that there were no more royal tombs in the Valley of Kings, but Carter persisted, and in December 1922 discovered the tomb of Tutankhamen.

On November 6, Carter sent a telegram to Carnarvon in England: "AT LAST HAVE MADE WONDERFUL DISCOVERY IN VALLEY. A MAGNIFICENT TOMB WITH SEALS INTACT. RE-COVERED SAME FOR YOUR ARRIVAL. CONGRATULATIONS." Carnarvon went to Egypt and 20 days later the entrance to the tomb was finally excavated and Carter entered, accompanied by Carnarvon, Lady Evelyn Herbert (Carnarvon's sister), and an assistant.

On February 17, 1923, Carter and Carnarvon entered the main burial chamber of Tutankhamen and found a wall of gold. The work of describing, classifying, and removing the shrine contents, including the mummy of the pharaoh himself, could not take place for another season. There were also disputes between Carter and the Egyptian authorities, notably with the Frenchman Pierre Lacau, appointed head of the Antiquities Service in Cairo in 1917. These disputes concerned the ownership of the antiquities in the Tutankhamen tomb—Carnarvon and Carter claiming rights to a proportion of them and Lacau maintaining all the contents were the property of the Antiquities Service and the Cairo Museum.

In March 1933, Carnarvon and Evelyn left for Cairo so that Carnarvon could negotiate for a "proper division" of the tomb antiquities. However, Carnarvon did not live to see the conclusion of the dispute or even the removal of the golden funerary mask of the Tutankhamen mummy. In April, he became seriously ill after his razor nicked a mosquito bite. Infection set in, followed by pneumonia. He died on April 6. The newspapers printed a story that he was a victim of the "Curse of the Pharaohs."

The Legend of the Curse of the Pharaohs

Curses were certainly known in ancient Egypt, usually invoking the wrath of the gods against those seeking to embezzle funds for guards, occasionally against thieves. Many tombs were robbed by grave robbers over the centuries. An inscription of the Fifth Dynasty of the Old Kingdom, made over five thousand years ago, reads: "As for any people who shall take possession of this tomb as their mortuary property or shall do any evil thing to it, judgment shall be had with them by the great God."

In his book The Curse of the Pharaohs (1975), Philipp Vandenberg states there were 22 other "mysterious" deaths of individuals associated with the tomb. The American archaeologist Arthur Mace, who had assisted Carter in opening the tomb, suffered from exhaustion after the death of Carnarvon and fell into a deep coma, dying in the same hotel as Carnarvon. George J. Gould, son of the financier, visited the tomb and died the next day after a high fever ascribed to bubonic plague. Joel Wood, a British industrialist who visited the tomb, died of a high fever on the ship carrying him back to England. Archibald Douglas Reid, a radiologist who worked on the Tutankhamen mummy, suffered from weakness, and died after returning to England.

Other fatalities associated with the tomb included a Professor Winlock, a Professor Foucraft, and archaeologists Garry Davies, Edward Harkness, and Douglas Derry. Carnarvon's wife, Lady Alimina, died in 1929, apparently from an insect bite, and Carter's secretary Richard Bethell died the same year with a circulatory collapse. When Bethell's father heard the news, he committed suicide, and reportedly his hearse ran over a boy on the way to the cemetery.

Vandenberg further claimed Carter had found a clay tablet in the antechamber with an inscription that Alan Gardiner deciphered as "Death will slay with his wings whoever disturbs the peace of the pharaoh." However, such a tablet was never cataloged and there is no trace of it.

One newspaper reported there was a hieroglyphic curse on the door of the inner shrine: "They who enter this sacred tomb shall swift be visited by wings of death," but this story is a fabrication. Similarly another report cited an inscription on the mud base of a candle that stated: "It is I who hinder the sand from choking the secret chamber. I am for the protection of the deceased and I will kill all those who cross this threshold," but the last phrase was another invention.

"The Curse of the Pharaohs" became a newspaper topic for many years and every death of an individual even distantly associated with the tomb long after the excavation was solemnly recorded as another victim of the curse.

Some of these claims were remote. They included the friend of a tourist who had entered the burial chamber; the friend was knocked down by a Cairo taxicab. An associate curator of Egyptology at the British Museum in London died peacefully in his bed, while an Egyptologist in France died of old age—both were reported as curse victims. A workman in the British Museum was said to have died suddenly while labeling objects from the tomb—although the British Museum did not have any of the Egyptian antiquities. For some time, such stories panicked collectors of Egyptian antiquities, who hurriedly donated their souvenirs to museums.

Carnarvon's son was interviewed on NBC Television in New York on July 14, 1977, and questioned about the "curse." Carnarvon's son stated he "neither believed it nor disbelieved it," but added that he would "not accept a million pounds to enter the tomb of Tutankhamen in the Valley of the Kings." A New York Daily News report claimed that the same evening, the younger Lord Carnarvon was attending a dinner in an apartment high above Manhattan and looked out over the city and saw all the lights flicker and black out. After candles were lit, he said to his hosts: "It is again the curse of Tutankhamen." However, Carter lived for 17 years after his great discovery, dying March 2, 1939, in his mid-sixties.

For decades, relics of Tutankhamen remained in the Cairo Museum, limited by space, and many objects were not even displayed. In June 1974, President Richard M. Nixon visited Egypt, where President Anwar Sadat suggested an exhibition of the masterpieces of Tutankhamen in the United States could affirm the friendly accord and goodwill between the two nations.

The subject of "King Tut's Curse" has been raised from time to time and still has believers. The term is also used by travelers in the Middle East to describe the hazard of diarrhea, also known in Mexico as "Montezuma's Revenge."

Sources:

Budge, E. A. W. Tutankhamen: Amenism, Atenism and Egyptian Monotheism. London: M. Hopkinson, 1923. Reprint, New York: Bell Publishing, 1979.

Carter, Howard. The Tomb of Tut-ankh-Amen. 3 vols. London: Cassell, 1923–33. Reprint, New York: Cooper Square Publishers, 1963.

Gilber, Katherine S., with Joan K. Holt and Sara Hudson, eds. Treasures of Tutankhamen. Catalog of an Exhibition between 1976 and 1979. New York: Ballantine Books; New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1976.

Herbert, G. E. S. M. (5th Earl of Carnarvon), and Howard Carter. Five Years' Explorations at Thebes, 1907–1911. London: H. Frowde, 1912.

Hoving, Thomas. Tutankhamen: The Untold Story. New York: Simon & Schuster; London: Hamish Hamilton, 1978.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Vandenberg, Philipp. Der Fluch der Pharaonen. Scherz Verlag, 1973. English edition as The Curse of the Pharaohs. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1975.

———. Der Vergessene Pharao. C. Bertelsmann Verlag, 1978. English edition as The Golden Pharaoh. New York: Macmillan; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1980.

Wynne, Barry. Behind the Mask of Tutankhamen. New York: Taplinger, 1973.

Tuttle, Hudson (1836–1910)

American seer of the early days of Spiritualism. Tuttle was born October 4, 1836, in Berlin Heights, Ohio, and spent his early years in a wilderness on the southern shores of Lake Erie. His father's house was the headquarters for itinerant Unitarian preachers and the atmosphere was burdened with dogmatic disputations. As a result young Tuttle became at an early age skeptical of organized religion.

Tuttle attended his first Spiritualist séance at the home of a retired Congregational minister who had heard of the Rochester rappings and called in a few friends for an experiment. Tuttle fell into trance and wrote spirit messages automatically. Simultaneously with his automatic writing, raps developed and the table moved. The séances were free. The communicators, in hours of seclusion, were his teachers. "It was my only source of knowledge," he wrote in the preface to his book Arcana of Spiritualism (1871), "for I had access to few books. I had attended school eleven months in all, six of which were at a district school, and five at a small academy."

In 1857, he married Emma Rood, writer, lecturer on education, composer of songs, and a frequent contributor to the Spiritualist press.

The first article Tuttle published was on prayer in The Spiritual Telegraph. He often wrote and rewrote a script several times before the communicator would declare the result satisfactory. He began writing a story founded on spirit life. It was entitled Scenes in the Spirit World (1855). In England it was published under the title Life in Two Spheres (1895). After completing it, he began a scientific work, Arcana of Nature.

His impression was that the French naturalist Lamarck and Alexander von Humboldt, along with other intelligences, were associated in the production of the book. But he knew nothing of these great minds. He was only entering his eighteenth year. When the book was completed, his spirit guides declared it to be unsatisfactory and demanded the destruction of the script. Reluctantly he burned the large bulk of the manuscript and started again.

For two years, the remaining manuscript lay on his table and he made some correction or addition to it nearly every day. The engravings in both volumes were made by the same influences that wrote the book. He claimed no merit for himself and said: "Mine has been the task of an amanuensis, writing that which has been given to me. I claim no honour, except honestly and faithfully attempting to perform my part of the task."

Arcana of Nature, two volumes, published 1860–63, was certainly a remarkable book for the time. It was quoted by F. C. L. Büchner in his own book Force and Matter (1864) to strengthen his materialistic position, while Charles Darwin in the Descent of Man quoted statements from Tuttle's later Origin and Antiquity of Physical Man. Both Büchner and Darwin were unaware that the book was produced by an uneducated farm boy.

The spirit controls were good educators. But Tuttle never gave up his modest life as a farmer and breeder of horses in Berlin Heights, Ohio. The spirit influences did not come to Tuttle at all times. He said:

"Sometimes I have prolific periods, and again, I go over a deserted country. For days, weeks, even months, I feel forsaken and alone. The very fountains of thought seem dried up. No incitement can compel me to write, or if I attempt to do so it is worthless, or worse, unreliable. It sometimes seems to me that I have never written anything of value, and I am sure I never can again. At the same time, when I study it, this experience is one of the most convincing tests that some superior intelligence comes into my life."

He died December 15, 1910, in Berlin Heights, Ohio.

Sources:

Tuttle, Hudson. Career of Religious Ideas. New York: D. M. Bennett, 1878.

———. Career of the Christ—Idea in History. Boston: Adams, 1870.

———. Career of the God—Idea in History. Boston: Adams, 1869.

———. Ethics of Spiritualism. Chicago: Religio-Philosophical Publishing, 1878.

———. Mediumship and Its Laws. Chicago: Progressive Thinker Publishing, 1900.

———. Philosophy of Spirit and the Spirit World. London: H. A. Copley; Berlin Heights, Ohio: H. Tuttle, 1896.

———. Religion of Man and Ethics of Science. New York: M. L. Holbrook, 1890.

———. Studies in Outlying Fields of Psychic Science. New York: M. L. Holbrook, 1889.

Tuttle, Hudson, and Emma Rood Tuttle. Stories from Beyond the Borderland. Berlin Heights, Ohio: Tuttle Publishing, 1910.

Twain, Mark (1835–1910)

Pseudonym of author Samuel Langhorne Clemens. Throughout his life, the great humorist and observer of the world around him often reflected upon the psychic and metaphysical events of which he was aware. In 1880 he wrote an article on "mental telegraphy" that related a personal experience of telepathy. He also had a vivid premonitory dream of the death of his brother Henry. Twain was an early and long-term member of the Society for Psychical Research, London.

After his death, various posthumous communications and writings were claimed. In 1917, the story Jap Herron was published in New York, purporting to come from the discarnate Mark Twain, as received by Emily Grant Hutchings and Lola V. Hays. Hutchings, the recorder of the Patience Worth material of Pearl Lenore Curran of St. Louis, was herself an author who greatly admired Mark Twain. She had a keen sense of somewhat similar humor and a strong tinge of melancholy like Mark Twain's. She had strongly wished him to communicate through her. All this furnished an ideal condition for subconscious production.

James H. Hyslop resolved the problem by interesting cross-reference experiments. The two women received the communications through the ouija board; the presence of both of them was necessary to operate it. They were brought by Hyslop to Boston. He gave each woman, at separate times, five sittings with the medium "Mrs. Chenoweth" (see Minnie M. Soule). But he did not admit them to the séance room until "Mrs. Chenoweth," who knew nothing of them, went into trance, and he made them sit behind her where they could not be seen.

Instead of the usual family relatives, Mark Twain purported to communicate with each of them. He used many of the same expressions that came through the ouija board, mentioned incidents in his life to prove his identity, described what he was doing through the women, and revealed the password that he gave to Hyslop in a St. Louis sitting.

“The outcome of the experiments,” concluded Hyslop in the Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research (July 1917), “is that there is abundant evidence that Mark Twain is behind the work connected with his name, though the student of psychology would probably find abundant evidence that it was colored more or less by the mind through which it came.” The conclusion also applied to Brent Roberts, another posthumous Mark Twain novel that the two women received.

In Hyslop’s Contact with the Other World (1919), a long chapter was devoted to other evidential spirit communications from Mark Twain.

Sources:

Paine, Albert Bigelow. Mark Twain. 3 vols. N.p., 1912.

Tweedale, Charles L(akeman) (d. 1944)

Prominent British writer on Spiritualism. He was educated at Durham University, England, and became the Church of England vicar of Weston, Otley, Yorkshire. A talented and versatile man, he was an astronomer, musician, and inventor. He published books on astronomy and discovered a comet. He was also a close friend of psychic photographer William Hope, whom he defended against hostile criticism. He died June 29, 1944.

Sources:

Tweedale, Charles L. Man’s Survival After Death. N.p., 1909.
———. News From the Next World. N.p., 1940.

Tweedale, Violet (1862–1936)

British novelist, granddaughter of author Robert Chambers, and a convinced Spiritualist. She attended séances with Lord Haldane, Arthur Balfour, and his brother James Balfour. W. E. Gladstone held sittings in her house. Most of her experiences came through the mediumships of Charles Williams and Cecil Husk.

She was a powerful witness in the famous trial when trance speaker Meurig Morris sued the Daily Mail for libel in 1932. In addition to many poems and novels, she published over 30 books on Spiritualist subjects. She died December 10, 1936.

Sources:

Tweedale, Violet. The Cosmic Christ. N.p., 1930.
———. Ghosts I Have Seen. N.p., 1920.
———. Mellow Sheaves. N.p., 1927.
———. Phantoms of the Dawn. N.p., 1924.

Twigg, Ena (1914–ca. 1984)

Well-known British medium. Born in Kent, England, January 6, 1914, she was a member of a psychic family in which the parents and other children had sensitive ability. She played with spirit children at the age of seven and at 14 predicted the death of her father. Her psychic gifts disturbed her marriage to Harry Twigg.

After a serious illness, spirit visitors assured her that she would be restored to health; when she was eventually healed she made a decision to devote her life to helping other people. She became a member of the Marylebone Spiritualist Association and in due course opened her own healing clinic.

Sources:

Twigg, Ena, with Ruth Hagy Brod. Ena Twigg: Medium. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1972. Reprint, London: W. H. Allen, 1973.

Twins

It has long been believed that there is a special relationship between identical twins, a belief that has become the subject of contemporary research from a variety of approaches. Research has suggested that there are startling correspondences between twins’ temperaments, personalities, lifestyles, and even sensitivity to names.

In 1979, the University of Minnesota began a study of identical twins in which twins separated for years were investigated and subjected to medical and psychological tests. The results of nine identical twin studies, involving over 15,000 questions, demonstrated affinities between the subjects.

For example, unknown to each other, Jim Spring and Jim Lewis were raised in different Ohio towns. Both married and divorced women named Linda and chose women named Betty as second wives. Each of the two Jims named his son James Allan and had a favorite dog named Toy. Both twins had remarkable similarities in medical profiles, including identical blood pressures and sleep and heartbeat patterns. Both also suddenly put on 10 pounds at the same time in their lives. At the age of 18, both Jim twins suffered similar syndromes of intermittent migraine headaches. Their drinking and smoking habits were also identical, and both chewed their fingernails.

Another pair of identical twins, Jack and Oscar, were raised apart with completely different backgrounds. Jack was brought up as an American Jew by his father after his parents separated; the mother took Oscar back to Germany (where she had been born) where he was raised as a Catholic, later joining the Nazi Youth party. In adult life, Jack ran a store in San Diego, while Oscar became a factory supervisor in Germany. But both men wore wire-rimmed eyeglasses and mustaches and two-pocket shirts with epaulets. Both were absentminded and had other matching idiosyncracies, such as storing rubber bands on their wrists.

Bridget and Dorothy were identical British twins who were raised apart after being separated soon after birth, yet when they met in 1941, each wore two bracelets on one wrist, and a watch and bracelet on the other. Each sister also wore seven rings. Each twin had married and had a family of a boy and a girl. The sons had been christened Richard Andrew and Andrew Richard, while the daughters were Karen Louise and Catherine Louise.

Many such identical twins share IQ and psychological profiles, as well as EEG tracings. It is not yet clear whether the coincidences derive from some kind of psychic bonding or simply indicate some manifestation of inheritance. It should be noted that astrologers have investigated twins, with ambiguous results to date, with the idea of verifying and informing astrology.

Sources:

Watson, Peter. Twins: An Investigation Into the Strange Coincidences in the Lives of Separated Twins. London: Hutchinson, 1981.

Twitchell, (John) Paul (ca. 1918–1971)

Founder of the ECKANKAR, a spiritual movement teaching the “ancient science of soul travel.” ECKANKAR is derived from the Radhasoami religion of the Punjab area of India. Twitchell was born in Paducah, Kentucky, around 1918. He joined the navy during World War II and then pursued a career as a journalist and the life of spiritual seeking after the war.

His spiritual search led him to the Church of Absolute Monism, a Hindu offshoot of the Self-Revelation Fellowship. He became editor of the church’s periodical, The Mystic Cross, but came into conflict with the church’s founder, Swami Premananda, in 1955. Shortly after leaving, he became a disciple of Kirpal Singh, a teacher in the Radhasoami tradition and head of the Ruhani Satsang. He also became involved with the recently founded Church of Scientology.

In 1964 Twitchell and his wife, Gail Atkinson, moved to San Francisco, where he became an independent Radhasoami teacher, and the following year founded ECKANKAR and announced that he was the Living ECK Master. He claimed that he had originally heard of soul travel from his foster father, who learned about it from an Indian holy man, Sudar Singh, originally from Allahabad, whom Twitchell later met in Paris, France. He further claimed that he had been taught soul travel by a mysterious Tibetan master named Rebazar Tarzs, who first appeared to Twitchell in 1944 while Twitchell was serving on a U.S. Navy vessel in the Pacific. He visited India after World War II and upon returning to the United States began writing books allegedly dictated by Rebazar Tarzs.

Twitchell authored a number of books in the years after the founding of ECKANKAR. He died unexpectedly on September 17, 1971, by which time ECKANKAR had become a successful new religion. He was succeeded by Darwin Gross as the new Living ECK Master.

During the 1980s David Christopher Lane made serious charges of plagiarism against Twitchell. He suggested that Twitchell not only took his basic teachings from the Radhasoami tradition but also plagiarized lengthy passages from the books of several prominent authors. Lane's well-documented charges caused much dissension within the movement and a reappraisal of Twitchell's career.

Sources:

Lane, David Christopher. The Making of a Spiritual Movement. Del Mar, Calif.: Del Mar Press, 1983.

Simpson, Patti. Paulji: A Memoir. Menlo Park, Calif.: ECKANKAR, 1985.

Steiger, Brad. In My Soul I Am Free. New York: Lancer Books, 1968.

Twitchell, Paul. The Tiger's Fang. New York: Lancer Books, 1969.

TWO See True World Order

Two Worlds (Magazine)

Spiritualist monthly magazine, founded in 1887 as a weekly newspaper in Manchester, England, by Emma Hardinge Britten. (Another weekly paper under the same title was started in London in 1858 at the beginning of the movement in England but lasted for only a brief period.) It was, for many years, the voice of Spiritualists in the north of England (the movement being dominated at the time by the London centers). It was edited for some time by Ernest W. Oaten. Beginning in the 1930s it had as its major rival Psychic News, the newspaper edited by Maurice Barbanell in London. However, in 1960 the editorial offices of the two periodicals were united, Two Worlds was transformed into a monthly magazine, and Barbanell edited both until his death in 1981. Tony Ortzen is the current editor. Address: 7 The Leather Market, Weston St., London, SE1 3ER England. Website: <http://www.users.globalnet.co.uk/~tortzen/>.

Sources:

Edmunds, Simeon. Spiritualism: A Critical Survey. London: Aquarian Press, 1966.

Two Worlds. <http://www.users.globalnet.co.uk/~tortzen/>. March 8, 2000.

Tyl, Noel (1936–)

American astrologer, born in West Chester, Pennsylvania, on December 31, 1936. Tyl attended Harvard University and received his B.A. in psychology in 1958. He worked in business for more than a decade before becoming a writer-astrologer in 1970. He developed a relationship with Llewellyn Publications, a leading publisher of astrology literature, which, beginning in 1973 with Horoscope Construction, released a 12-volume series entitled The Principles and Practice of Astrology. The series largely established his reputation in the field. Through the 1980s he edited Astrology Today, Llewellyn's astrology magazine.

In addition to operating as a consulting astrologer, Tyl has continued to write. Additional titles include The Horoscope as Identity (1974), The Missing Moon (1979), and Holistic Astrology: The Analysis of Inner and Outer Environments (1980). He has worked to redefine astrology as a psychological counseling practice.

Sources:

Tyl, Noel. Holistic Astrology: The Analysis of Inner and Outer Environments. McLean, Va.: TAI Books, 1980.

———. The Horoscope as Identity. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1974.

———. The Missing Moon. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1979.

Typtology

The science of communicating with spirits by means of raps, various codes being arranged for the purpose. The sitters may read the alphabet aloud, or slowly pass a pencil down a printed alphabet, and the rappings will indicate letters that form a message or an answer to some question. One rap may be made to mean "yes," two "no," and so on. Some relationship seems to exist between such rapping and the use of the divining rod and pendulum in dowsing.

Tyromancy (or Tiromancy)

An old form of divination based on interpretations from cheese. Unfortunately, the method does not appear to have been recorded.

Tyrrell, G(eorge) N(ugent) M(erle) (1879–1952)

Mathematician and parapsychologist. He was a member of the council of the Society for Psychical Research (SPR), London (1940–52), and was elected its president in 1945. Born in 1879, he was educated at Haileybury School, Seafeld Engineering College, and London University (where he attained degrees in physics and mathematics). A pioneer in the study of wireless telegraphy, Tyrrell worked under Guglielmo Marconi. He served in the British Army during World War I.

Tyrrell joined the SPR in 1908. After conducting a series of experiments in telepathy and precognition with Gertrude Johnson, he devoted himself exclusively to psychical research. He undertook further experiments with Johnson in 1924, using quantitative methods, and invented mechanical devices to randomize selection and scoring. His apparatus, unfortunately, was destroyed during an air raid in World War II, and in the years after the war he concentrated on the theoretical and philosophical aspects of extrasensory perception. Out of this period came possibly his single most important volume, Apparitions (1953), cited for its clarity in integrating data. He died October 29, 1952.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Salter, W. H., G. W. Fisk, and Harry H. Price. "G. N. M. Tyrrell and His Contributions to Psychical Research." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 37 (1953).

Tyrrell, George N. M. Apparitions. London: Society for Psychological Research, 1953. Reprinted in Science and Psychological Phenomena and Apparitions. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

———. "Further Research in Extrasensory Perception." Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research 44, no. 147 (1936–37).

———. Grades of Significance. N.p., 1930.

———. Homo Faber. N.p., 1951.

———. The Nature of Human Personality. London: Allen & Unwin, 1954.

———. The Personality of Man. Harmondsworth, UK: Penguin Books, 1947.

———. "Presidential Address." Proceedings of the Society for Psychological Research 47, no. 171 (1945).

———. Science and Psychological Phenomena. London, 1938. Reprinted in Science and Psychological Phenomena and Apparitions. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1961.

U

U.S. Psychotronics Association

Founded in 1975 for persons interested in the study of psychotronics, "the science of mind-body-environment relationships, concerned with the interactions of matter, energy and consciousness," psychic phenomena, free energy systems, radionics, and alternative health methodologies.

It provides a forum for the exchange of current research developments in psychotronics; seeks to maintain high standards of ethical, humanitarian, and scientific practices in the study and application of psychotronics; promotes standardization in investigation, testing, reporting, and evaluation of psychotronics; and preserves the history of the field.

The association promotes continuing education and training of members, presents members' views to the government, the public and other organizations, bestows research awards, and makes available cassette recordings of conference lectures. Research areas include: anti-gravity, agri-radionics, free energy, psychic detectors, psychic instrumentation (hardware types), radionics, and tesla waves. It publishes a quarterly newsletter and can be contacted at PO Box 45, Elkhorn, WI 53121. Website: <http://www.elknet.net/uspa>.

Übersinnliche Welt, Die (Journal)

Former German Spiritualist monthly, founded in 1893. It changed into a biweekly in 1902 and merged with Psyche under the title Psyche und die Übersinnliche Welt.

Udumbara (Center)

Alternative name for the Minnesota Zen Meditation Center and also the title of their biannual periodical.

UFO See Unidentified Flying Objects and the Occult

UFOCAT

Computerized files of reports of UFOs and related material, maintained by the Center for UFO Studies and Dr. Donald A. Johnson. UFOCAT99 contains over 109,000 UFO reports and related information, which may be retrieved by date, geographic location, and special features. The files are available at minimum cost to serious researchers. Inquiries concerning UFOCAT should be directed to the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies, 2457 W. Peterson Ave., Chicago, IL 60659.

The UFO Examiner (Journal)

Former quarterly publication of Private UFO Investigations, a group concerned with UFO reports and international sightings, headquartered in Hazelton, Iowa.

UFOIN See UFO Information Network

UFO Information Network (UFOIN)

Name adopted in the late 1970s by the Page Research Library. It published a newsletter, which merged with Ohio Sky Watcher in 1979 to become UFO Ohio. UFOIN, which existed only a few years, collected and collated information on UFOs and other Fortean phenomena. It was headquartered in Rome, Ohio.

UFO Information Retrieval Center

Founded in 1966 to collect, analyze, publish, and disseminate information on reports of unidentified flying objects and related anomalies. The center compiles statistics, conducts research programs, maintains a library and an on-line data base, runs children's and students' services, and gives referrals. From time to time it publishes Reference for Outstanding UFO Sighting Reports. Address: 3131 W. Cochise Dr., No. 158, Phoenix, AZ 85051-9501.

UFO Investigator (Newsletter)

Longtime monthly newsletter of National Investigations Committee on Aerial Phenomena. It was discontinued in 1980, a short time before the organization folded.

UFO Magazine

UFO Magazine, the primary English-language UFO newsstand periodical as the twenty-first century begins, was founded in 1985 as a quarterly California UFO periodical, but quickly moved to national prominence as the abduction phenomenon renewed public interest in extraterrestrial explanations of UFOs. Editor Vicki Ecker also demonstrated both a knowledge of the field and a genuine interest in reporting the news. Several other newsstand periodicals, since defunct, played to outlandish and sensational accounts of UFOs and contactees, and were not above fabricating stories to fill space. The magazine has adopted an objective approach that is nevertheless sympathetic to the ufological enterprise.

Each issue of UFO Magazine is built around a half-dozen or more feature articles that highlight spectacular sightings, interview celebrities concerning their views on UFOs, focus on issues of government involvement in (and cover-up of) UFO research, debate controversies within the ufological community, and inform readers on various related topics such as time travel or conspiracy theories. The magazine covers more prominent UFO conventions, especially those on America's West Coast, and provides a synopsis of presentations and pictures of participants. Regular columns review new UFO books, highlight prominent websites, and provide contact information on UFO organizations.

In the late 1990s, the magazine launched its own website at <http://www.ufomag.com/>. It provides space for timely items of interest, guest opinions, an archive of past articles from the magazine, and editorials by Ecker, her husband Don Ecker, the magazine's research director, and publisher William J. Birnes. Also, Peter Robbins continues his timely surveys of other UFO-related websites in a regular page on the UFO Magazine website. UFO Magazine may be contacted at 5455 Centinela Ave., Los Angeles, CA 90066.

Sources:

UFO Magazine. Los Angeles, California. n.d.
UFO Magazine. <http://www.ufomag.com/>. June 10, 2000.

UFO Magazine New Bulletin

Former quarterly publication reporting UFO sightings, with critical analyses, published in Cleveland, Ohio.

UFO Nachrichten (Journal)

German bimonthly publication concerned with UFOs. Last known address: Karl L. Veit, Deutsche UFO-Studiengesellschaft, Ventla-Verlag, Postfach 13185, 6200 Wiesbaden 13, Germany.

UFO Newsclipping Service

Monthly publication that reproduces North American and other newspaper reports of UFOs and other related unexplained phenomena. It may be ordered from 2 Caney Valley Dr., Plumerville, AR 72127-8725.

UFO-Nyt (Journal)

Danish-language quarterly periodical dealing with unidentified flying objects. It is published by Skandinavisk UFO Information, Postbox 6, DK-2820, Gentofte, Denmark. Website: <http://www.ufo.dk>.

UFO Quebec (Periodical)

Bilingual (French and English) Canadian quarterly concerned with UFOs. Last known address: Claude McDuff, BP 53, Dollard-des-Ormeaux, PQ Canada H9G 2H5.

UFO Reporter (Journal)

Former bimonthly publication reporting UFO sightings and related events, published in La Mesa, California.

UFO Research Newsletter

Former monthly journal edited by Gordon I. R. Lore from Los Angeles, California.

Uhland, Ludwig (1787–1862)

Famous German poet who figured posthumously in an interesting lawsuit in Berlin over ownership of a holograph parchment apport obtained in a séance with Else Arnheim in 1920. The medium, in trance, described the presence of Ludwig Uhland. There appeared in her hands, which were tightly clasped by a well-known German author, a yellowed piece of parchment with two short verses scrawled on it, signed: "Uhland, 1920."

The handwriting was pronounced identical to that of Uhland's, the parchment was of his era, and the verses were in genuine Uhland style. A clairvoyant, to whom Uhland's handwriting and the parchment were shown, declared after touching both papers that they were written by the same hand but that a long interval had elapsed between the writing of them.

The German author whose hand had encircled the medium's when the parchment appeared claimed the paper. Since witnesses stated that it had been thrust into the medium's hand, the court decided that the parchment belonged to the medium.

UHSC See Universal Hagar's Spiritual Church

Ullman, Montague (1916–)

Psychiatrist, parapsychologist, and trustee of the American Society for Psychological Research. He was born on September 9, 1916, in New York City and studied at the City College of New York (B.S., 1935), New York University College of Medicine (M.D., 1938), and New York Medical College (1948). After graduation, he joined the psychoanalytic faculty of New York Medical College (1950–62). Having encountered psi events in his counseling work, he began to work with Gardner Murphy in exploring ESP experimentally. With Murphy and Laura Dale, he helped establish the medical section of the ASPR. The section lasted until 1953.

That same year, the REM (or rapid eye movement) stage of sleep was discovered. Ullman soon had the idea of using REM sleep in a controlled experiment in telepathy. With funds provided by the Parapsychology Foundation, Ullman, Karlis Osis, and E. Douglas Dean carried out the initial experiments. Murphy then arranged for a large grant for the establishment of the famous Dream Laboratory at Maimonides Hospital in New York City. Ullman became its initial director and an associate professor of psychiatry at Downstate Medical Center, State University of New York. The work of the dream laboratory produced some striking results, leading Ullman to conclude that altered states of consciousness, such as dreaming, were associated with ESP.

In 1966 Ullman was elected president of the Parapsychological Association. He is the author of numerous papers and several books, the most important for parapsychology being his work on dream telepathy.

Sources:

Ullman, Montague. "On the Occurrence of Telepathic Dreams." Journal of the American Society for Psychological Research (April 1959).

Ullman, Montague, and Roberto Cavanna, eds. Proceedings of an International Conference on Hypnosis, Drugs, Dreams and Psi: Psi and Altered States of Consciousness. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1968.

Ullman, Montague, and Stanley Krippner. Dream Studies and Telepathy: An Experimental Approach. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1970.

Ullman, Montague, Stanley Krippner, and Alan Vaughan. Dream Telepathy. 1979. Reprint, Los Angeles: J. P. Tarcher, 1985.

Ullman, Montague, and Nan Zimmerman. Working with Dreams. London: Hutchinson, 1983.

Umbanda

A contemporary Afro-Brazilian religion. Like Santeria, it is basically a possession religion in which members assume the form of deities both for worship and magic. It was founded in 1920, at a time when a wave of anti-European feelings was sweeping through the country, fanned by the inspiration of a young man, Zélio de Moraes, by an alleged Indian spirit. Among the initial leaders were former Spiritist mediums who became known for receiving spirits of caboclos, Brazilian Indians, and pretos velhos, former African slaves.

Umbanda's stronghold is Rio de Janeiro and the surrounding area in the south of Brazil. Worship is lively with much clapping, singing, and dancing.

Sources:

Brown, Diana DeGroat. Umbanda: Religion and Politics in Urban Brazil. Ann Arbor, Mich.: UMI Press, 1986.

Hess, David J. Samba in the Night: Spiritism in Brazil. New York: Columbia University Press, 1994.

St. Clair, David. Drum and Candle. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday; London: Macdonald, 1971.

Ummo Hoax

Ummo is a planet that reputedly circles the star Iumma located some 14.6 light-years from Earth. Knowledge of this planet and the associated star emerged in 1965 through Spanish contactee Fernando Sesma, president of the Society of the Friends of Space, headquartered in Madrid. In 1967 Sesma let it be known that a spacecraft would appear near the city on the evening of June 1. Contact with the Ummites was quite different. Sesma had neither direct physical contact nor telepathic contact. Instead he was contacted via the mail or by telephone. He had received several lengthy documents in typescript that included descriptions of Ummo and insights into a variety of scientific, psychological, technological, and socio-political issues.

The messages from Ummo intersected with a series of UFO sightings that began on February 6, 1966. Several people saw the saucer near Alauche, Spain, and one, José Luis Jordan Peña, drew a sketch and reported it to the newspapers. The saucer was distinguished by a peculiar symbol. A second sighting occurred on June 1, 1967, at which time pictures were taken. One picture showed the same symbol Jordan had reported the previous year. Copies of the pictures were recovered by a Madrid newspaper photographer from an anonymous source. Adding to the mystery, a flyer signed with the name Henri Dagousset was circulated, suggesting that the 1967 UFO had left behind some small cylinders and asking anyone who found one to make contact through the general post office. One of these was sent anonymously to UFO author Marius Leugget. Inside the object was a piece of paper with the mysterious symbol.

In the days after the announcement of Sesma's contact with the Ummites others began to report intriguing but anonymous contacts with people who also claimed to be from Ummo. In the meantime the lengthy messages from the Ummites continued to appear. By 1983 the number had grown to some 6,700.

While written from a knowledgeable standpoint, the Ummo communications were always troubling because of their lack of a means of independently verifying that they were from Ummites. None of those who wrote and circulated the documents allowed any direct contact. In addition, none of the other people who claimed contact were ever located. Then, the U.S.-based Ground Saucer Watch examined the pictures of the Ummo symbol and determined that they were taken of a small object held close to the camera. The saucer appeared to be an eight-inch plate with the symbol painted on it in ink.

In spite of the finding concerning the photographs and the lack of independent verification of either the sightings or the documents, the latter have been published in both English and Spanish. The Ummo material has subsequently been integrated into the large body of flying saucer contactee material and several websites have been placed on the Internet, including one detailing the Ummite philosophy at <http://perso.wanadoo.fr/ummo.textes-essentiels/anglais/a016.htm> (as of December 1999).

Sources:

Ribera, Antonio. Ufo Contact from Planet Ummo: The Incredible Truth. 2 vols. Tucson, Ariz.: UFO Books, n.d.

Sesma, Fernando. Otro Planeta Habitado, Ummo. Madrid, Spain: Editorial Grafica Espejo, 1967.

Vallee, Jaques. Revelations: Alien Contact and Human Deception. New York: Ballantine Books, 1991.

Underhill, Leah

Married name of Leah Fox, the eldest of the famous Fox sisters, who launched American Spiritualism. She became Mrs. Underhill by her third marriage. She published the book The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism (1885; reprinted 1976).

Understanding Cults and Spiritual Movements (Research Publication Series)

A short-lived research journal published three times a year in the 1980s and designed to analyze critically new religious groups and their leaders. David Christopher Lane, its editor, defined its goals:

"With the continuing growth of new spiritual movements, it is imperative for both the scholar and the seeker to be able to discriminate between groups which are fraudulent and manipulative and those which are genuine and beneficial. The failure to do so has troublesome consequences: witness Jim Jones and Jonestown. What is necessary, therefore, in the examination of religion and its mystical claims—be they old and traditional like Roman Catholicism or new and emerging like Eckankar—with unbridled rational scrutiny. That is, the opportunity to fully investigate every facet about the particular spiritual movement: from the biography of its founder, the history of its organization, the value of its teachings, to the practical application of its techniques, etc.

"Understanding Cults and Spiritual Movements is . . . interested in promoting rational inquiries into the entire cult phenomenon. Editorially, it does not hold to any particular religious doctrine, nor does it have any church affiliation. Thus, in this way, it is an open system of study primarily concerned with documented appraisements which help in developing a keen sense of critical discrimination."

Lane established a high standard of scholarly reporting and investigation. Lane has become a leading authority on the history of the Radhasoami spiritual movement, and much of the emphasis of Understanding Cults and Spiritual Movements was directed to an examination of the new religions that emerged out of that tradition. Most of the writings originally published in the 1980s have been republished as a book, Exposing Cults. Lane now teaches in Los Angeles.

Sources:

Lane, David Christopher. Exposing Cults: When the Skeptical Mind Confronts the Mystical. New York: Garland Publishing, 1994.

Understanding Magazine

Journal published into the 1980s by Daniel W. Fry, author of the book White Sands Incident (1954), in which he claimed contact with a UFO. Understanding explored the metaphysical ideas that grew out of Fry's claimed contacts. It was the organ of World Understanding, the religious group Fry founded to promote his perspective.

Underwood, Peter (1923–)

British writer on occultism and psychical investigation. He has also written on the cinema. He is a member of the Society for Psychical Research, the vice president of the Unitarian Society for Psychical Studies, and a former member of the Research Committee of the Psychic Research Organization.

Underwood took part in investigations into a haunting, conducted worldwide tests in telepathy and ESP, and has compiled comprehensive files of hauntings in the British Isles. He has been president and chairman of the Ghost Club for many years. He has written a number of books, has lectured extensively on psychic matters, and made several hundred television appearances and radio broadcasts. His interests have reached far beyond ghosts and hauntings to include horror movies, vampires, and the occult in general.

Sources:

Underwood, Peter. The Complete Book of Dowsing and Divining. London: Rider, 1980.

———. Dictionary of the Supernatural. 1978. Reprinted as Dictionary of the Occult of Supernatural. London: Harrap, 1978.

———. A Gazetteer of British Ghosts. New York: Walker, 1975.

———. A Gazetteer of Scottish and Irish Ghosts. New York: Bell, 1985.

———. Ghosts and How to See Them. North Pomfret, Vt.: Trafalgar Square, 1995.

———. Haunted London. N.p., 1973.

———. Hauntings: New Light on the Greatest True Ghost Stories of the World. London: Dent, 1977.

———. No Common Task: The Autobiography of a Ghost Hunter. N.p., 1983.

———. The Vampire's Bedside Companion. London: Frewin, 1975.

Unguents

General term for ointments used in anointing ceremonies in various religions from Christianity to witchcraft. There are many kinds of magical unguents, each with its peculiar properties. Christians ascribed these compounds to the devil, who they believed invented them in order to harm the human race. According to medieval mythology, for example, one such unguent was composed of human (or even baby) fat and was said to be used by witches to enable them to fly through the air.

Many old recipes exist for unguents to induce sleep or visions, and these unguents were made from various obscure ingredients. Some of them are described in Des Science Occultes by Eusèbe Salverte (1829).

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Unidentified Flying Objects and the Occult

UFOs entered popular consciousness as “flying saucers”—the name an anonymous wire-service reporter gave to the silvery discs Americans were reporting by the thousands in the last week of June 1947. At 3 P.M. on June 24 private pilot Kenneth Arnold, passing over Mount Rainier, Washington, spotted nine shiny disc-shaped objects flying in formation at what he conservatively estimated to be 1200 mph. The worldwide publicity resulting from his sighting, plus the other sightings that came in its immediate wake, brought the UFO age into being.

Since then UFOs have been the focus of furious controversy. Many dispute their existence, claiming that unexplained reports exist only because of inadequate investigation or insufficient data. Proponents counter that some of the best cases have withstood the most thorough scrutiny. The debate that began in earnest in 1947 continues, with essentially the same arguments being recycled endlessly.

Early Reports of UFOs

The UFO phenomenon did not spring abruptly into being one summer afternoon in 1947. In fact, the first UFO book, Charles Fort's The Book of the Damned, was published in 1919. An eccentric social critic and keen satirist, Fort collected accounts of anomalous physical phenomena, including extraordinary aerial objects, and poked fun at scientists' sometimes labored efforts to account for them in prosaic terms. In The Book of the Damned and two subsequent books, New Lands (1923) and Lo! (1931), he theorized that visitors from other worlds are observing Earth.

Although it is often claimed that the phenomenon has been part of human history for many centuries, reports of anything resembling modern UFOs do not appear in print until the early decades of the nineteenth century. UFOs, in other words, seem to be a product of the modern age. In the twentieth century UFOs were called, successively, “airships,” “foo fighters,” and “ghost rockets” before “flying saucers” and (starting in the late 1940s, in U.S. Air Force memos), “unidentified flying objects” and (in the early 1950s) “UFOs.”

Postwar UFO Investigations

Between 1947 and 1969 the U.S. Air Force ran three successive public UFO projects. The first was code-named Sign, followed by Grudge (1949–52) and Blue Book (1952–69). A faction within Project Sign concluded by mid-1948 that UFOs were extraterrestrial spacecraft, but air force Chief of Staff Gen. Hoyt S. Vandenberg rejected its report. Reorganized as Grudge, the project took a pronounced anti-UFO line. Except for a period between 1951 and 1953, when Capt. Edward J. Ruppelt, neither pro- nor anti-UFO but committed to open-minded inquiry, directed the project (renamed Blue Book in March 1952), Air Force UFO investigations sought to debunk sightings and to explain them, if not always persuasively, as arising from misidentifications and hoaxes.

In 1966 the Air Force entered into a contract with the University of Colorado ostensibly to conduct an independent investigation under the leadership of physicist Edward U. Condon but in fact to find a way of ridding itself of its UFO albatross. The Condon committee, as it was called informally, soon became embroiled in controversy as Condon's view, which echoed the Air Force's in dismissing UFOs as nonsense, were known. Released in January 1969, the Condon Report (formally titled Scientific Study of Unidentified Flying Objects) declared the phenomenon nonexistent and further research pointless. The National Academy of Sciences endorsed the report's conclusions, and in December 1969 the Air Force cited them when it announced it was closing Blue Book. To many it appeared as if the UFO controversy had ended.

Yet the Condon Report had its critics, including University of Arizona atmospheric physicist James E. McDonald and Northwestern University astronomer (and longtime Blue Book consultant) J. Allen Hynek, who pointedly observed that fully one-third of the cases in the report were listed as unsolved. They also contended that even some of the “explained” cases had been inadequately accounted for. In November 1970 a UFO subcommittee of the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics, explicitly rejecting Condon's conclusions, remarked on the “small residue of well-documented but unexplainable cases which form the hard core of the UFO controversy.” Hynek's 1972 book The UFO Experience argued for renewed inquiry into what he thought might prove to be “not merely the next small step in the march of science but a mighty and totally unexpected quantum leap.”

A wave of sightings in the fall of 1973 served to revive popular interest. By the 1980s much of the fascination focused on abduction stories, reported in such widely read books as Budd Hopkins's Missing Time (1981) and Whitley Strieber's Communion (1987), and on alleged official cover-ups of UFO secrets, including the crash of an unidentified object near Roswell, New Mexico in 1947. In 1994 the Air Force acknowledged its cover-up of the so-called Roswell incident but said authorities at the time had been trying to conceal a classified project, Mogul, in which balloons were sent aloft to monitor possible Soviet nuclear tests. Three years later, in a follow-up study, it theorized that the humanoid bodies associated with the crash were “anthropomorphic test dummies that were carried aloft by U.S. Air Force high altitude balloons for scientific research”—though such tests had not commenced until six years later.

Though polls have consistently found that a significant plurality of Americans “believe” in UFOs, the scientific establishment continues to treat the phenomenon as illegitimate. In the fall of 1997, however, an international panel of scientists met in Tarrytown, New York, to examine a body of UFO evidence, mostly cases involving physical evidence, presented by a small group of ufologists. The panel’s report, released in June 1998, cautiously stated that “unexplained observations” exist—though it distanced itself from extraterrestrial theories—and that further evidence of the best cases is worth science’s time.

Nonetheless, UFOs remain a fringe subject. Most scientific investigations of the phenomenon since the Condon period have been conducted by individuals acting on their own or in concert with such civilian groups as the J. Allen Hynek Center for UFO Studies (CUFOS), the Mutual UFO Network, and the Fund for UFO Research. CUFOS, founded by Hynek in 1973 (Hynek died in 1986), publishes the Journal of UFO Studies, the one refereed scientific journal devoted exclusively to the subject.

Schism: Science vs. the Occult

The controversy about UFOs and their meaning has generated innumerable books, scientific papers, popular articles, specialist periodicals in many languages, and Internet websites. Much of this writing, especially in mainstream magazines, newspapers, and journals, has been from a skeptical perspective. Active UFO proponents worldwide probably number no more than several thousand, and they range from the intellectually careful to the wildly credulous. The literature they have produced since the 1940s documents a variety of approaches to the questions raised by UFO reports.

Early on, active proponents divided themselves into two camps. The first, who in the 1950s started calling themselves “ufologists,” held a relatively conservative view. In their reading of the phenomenon, UFOs were unexplained occurrences that merited conscientious study. Scientific procedures and logical analysis of the evidence would eventually yield a solution, which probably would validate the notion of extraterrestrial visitation. Ufologists thought communication with UFO intelligences might occur in the future but rejected claims that such contacts were already taking place.

The second camp consisted of individuals sometimes called “saucerians.” Saucerians typically were enthusiasts of occultism and the paranormal. Many had backgrounds as active Theosophists, Spiritualists, or followers of other esoteric doctrines. Some believed—even before the Arnold sighting put flying saucers on the world stage—that contact with otherworldly beings not only was possible but already had been accomplished. Such beings, who lived on other planets, in the spirit realm, or in the astral world (or all of these), were on the whole advanced and benevolent, concerned about the fate of the lowly, violent human race and engaged in efforts to guide our spiritual evolution in positive directions. Believers also acknowledged, however, that evil space and spirit entities, operating in concert with terrestrial allies, sought to exert malevolent influences over life on Earth.

Charles Fort’s books, especially the collective omnibus The Books of Charles Fort (1941), influenced many individuals who would go on to become ufologists. If Fort had alerted them to reports of unusual aerial phenomena, he had also piqued their interest in other mysteries of the physical world: falls from the sky, monsters, archaeological anomalies, and more. The Fortean Society continued to collect and chronicle accounts of “Fortean phenomena” after Fort’s death. In the early UFO age a few ufological theorists, most notably Morris K. Jessup (in The Case for the UFO, [1955], and The Expanding Case for the UFO, [1957]), sought a sort of unified field theory of anomalistics. Jessup wrote that spillage from “celestial hydroponic tanks” in alien spacecraft causes falls of fish, frogs, and other organic matter, and in his view archaeological evidence indicates that earth once housed an advanced civilization which has now returned to its ancestral home in flying saucers.

Both ufologists and saucerians read Fate magazine, the first issue (Spring 1948) of which featured a long article by Kenneth Arnold. A digest-sized pulp quarterly which went bimonthly in 1949 and then monthly in 1952, Fate became the only national magazine to cover UFOs on a regular basis. It also reported on Fortean occurrences. Its main interest, however, was the psychic. Even ufologists who initially had no particular interest in such matters could not help being exposed to material on ghosts, poltergeists, ESP, and psychokinesis.

The most important early saucerian theorist was California occultist N. Meade Layne, founder of the Borderland Sciences Research Foundation. To Layne, who tied the old occult idea of an “etheric world” to the new phenomenon of flying saucers, UFOs were “ether ships.” They and their occupants, the “etherians,” come from a fourth dimension of existence or atomic vibration. They enter our realm by lowering their vibratory rates. Their realm exists as an etheric counterpart of our universe. Its inhabitants are also our ethereal counterparts, but they are far more advanced than we are. In the Borderland publication Round Robin and in his book The Ether Ship and Its Solution (1950), Layne brings forth an eclectic mix of Theosophy, Swedenborgianism, Spiritualism, and Fortean events. Much of the material came from San Diego medium Mark Probert, who channeled teachings from alleged discarnates, among them the 500,000-year-old Himalayan philosopher Yada Di’ Shi’ite.

Saucerians embraced Layne’s ideas, and favorite Layne phrases such as “mat” (materialization) and “demat” (dematerialization) quickly entered their vocabulary. To southern California’s contactee subculture, which arose in the early 1950s in the wake of claimed contacts (physical and telepathic) with space people by George Adamski, George Van Tassel, and others, Layne was an intellectual hero. To ufologists, who despised the contactees and all they stood for, he was just another crackpot. Yet a modified version of his idea, called the 4D (fourth-dimensional) theory, found favor among some ufologists. Here science fiction, another important influence on first-generation ufologists, was at least as much an inspiration as watered-down Borderland doctrine.

Generally speaking, ufologists and saucerians existed in separate universes, the former as would-be (and sometimes actual) scientists, the latter as more or less open occultists. In the 1960s, however, the lines began to blur, and occultism became a major force in ufology. Before then, ufologists had assumed that they were dealing with a reasonably straightforward issue. As they saw it, the UFO phenomenon consisted of credible observations of anomalous lights and structured objects in the sky. A number of prominent ufologists went further and included reports of humanoid occupants (later called “close encounters of the third kind”) in their definition of the phenomenon. Unlike the golden-haired, angelic “space brothers” of contactee lore, these entities were both uncommunicative and strange enough—alien—to frighten those who encountered them. Such reports were consistent with the conservative version of the extraterrestrial hypothesis ufologists championed.

By the mid-1960s, however, new developments challenged ufology’s dominant view that UFOs are space visitors. For one thing, UFO encounters seemed to be getting weirder. Persons of ostensible sanity and sincerity claimed to have been abducted into UFOs and communicated with their crews, who gave odd, conflicting accounts of themselves, their motives, and their origins. Monstrous creatures showed up in areas where UFOs were being seen. UFO witnesses sometimes complained of postsighting visits by odd-looking, dark-suited individuals like the menacing “men in black” in saucerian literature. Some close-encounter percipients told investigators of poltergeistlike infestations in their homes.

Ultraterrestrials: A Malevolent Genesis

Many of these claims seemed incompatible with extraterrestrial theories, which started to fall out of favor in some circles of ufology. The principal figure in this revisionist ufology, at least initially, was writer John A. Keel, whose investigations in New York, West Virginia, and Ohio elicited scores of incredible tales that could not be shrugged off as the creations of lunatics and charlatans. On the other hand, these were extraordinary claims without extraordinary—or even ordinary—proof. Someone more cautious would have hesitated to use such material, which existed only in testimony (admittedly, for all its fantastic qualities, at times compelling testimony), to construct a phantasmagorical explanatory scheme. Brash and opinionated, Keel had no such reluctance.

Keel credited Layne with having “worked it all out in the early 1950s;” unfortunately, Keel added, “nobody would listen to him.” But ufologists, Fortean, and psychic enthusiasts were listening to Keel, whose writing and pronouncements excoriated traditional ufology as the domain of “buffs” who lacked the courage, the imagination, or even the mental health to face the truth. The truth according to Keel was that “ultraterrestrials” from the “superspectrum” (Keel’s term for the etheric realm) are entering our world and doing terrible things to us. “We are biochemical robots helplessly controlled by forces that can scramble our brains, destroy our memories and use us in any way they see fit,” he wrote. “They have been doing it to us forever.” Here he parted radically from Layne, who believed the ethereans to be largely benevolent.

To Keel the contact claims loved by saucerians were not the hoaxes suspected by ufologists; they were actual experiences, but not the sort contactees thought they were. According to Keel, “The quasi-angels of Biblical times have become magnificent spacemen. The demons, devils, and false angels were recognized as liars and plunderers by early man. These same impostors now appear as long-haired Venusians.”

He holds that Homo sapiens came into existence because of a war waged between ultraterrestrial factions. One faction took on human form so that it could more easily communicate with Neanderthals, whom this ultraterrestrial group wanted to enlist in its “physical army.” An unintended consequence of this assumption of physical form was erotic desire. Sexual intercourse between the ultraterrestrials and the protohuman Neanderthals created the modern human race. As Keel tells the tale in Our Haunted Planet (1971), “This produced strange responses in [the offspring’s] materialized nervous system. Emotions were born. Frequencies were changed. The direct control of the superintelligence was driven from their bodies. They were trapped on Earth, unable to ascend the electromagnetic scale and reenter their etheric world. With the loss of control they became animals, albeit highly intelligent animals.”

The other ultraterrestrials continue to torment us, their former adversaries, and effectively control the world, manipulating our social, political, scientific, and religious beliefs, creating all paranormal phenomena and destroying the lives of individual human beings who interact with them.

Jacques Vallee and Magicland

A more restrained, erudite occult ufology is expressed in a series of books by an equally influential theorist, Jacques Vallee. A French American educated in astronomy and computer science (with a Ph.D. in the latter), Vallee worked at Northwestern University with Allen Hynek in the mid-1960s. His first two books, Anatomy of a Phenomenon (1965) and Challenge to Science (1966, with Janine Vallee), were hailed as seminal works of scientific UFO literature. But soon Vallee’s thoughts had gone elsewhere, back to an early fascination with the esoteric. In Passport to Magonia (1969) Vallee holds that UFOs are a modern manifestation of a supernatural otherworld long ago known as Magonia (“Magicland,” according to one controversial translation), whose inhabitants other ages experienced as angels, demons, and fairies.

Passport was misread by some as an effort to depict the UFO phenomenon as a modern folklore (folklore here being equated with delusion). More careful reading reveals Vallee’s true meaning: an unknowable “other intelligence” plays to human dreams and manifests accordingly; it manipulates human consciousness and seeks to affect human affairs. Though Vallee sees nothing inherently evil in this, his idea is strikingly like Keel’s.

If Vallee at first looked less paranoid than Keel, elements of paranoia would show up soon enough. In such subsequent books as Messengers of Deception (1979) and Revelations (1991), Vallee speculates that a shadowy human group, intent on manipulating societal consciousness (for reasons Vallee never explains), may be producing fraudulent UFO encounters and paranormal occurrences. It is even conceivable, Vallee hints, that this group has some kind of link with Magonia itself. This group or the UFO phenomenon or both—again Vallee is unclear—comprise a “control system” which communicates with us on a subliminal level, employing a symbolic language of “metalogue” as well as a “schedule of reinforcement.” In his view, “UFOs can never be analyzed or conceived because they are the means through which man’s concepts are being rearranged.”

In time, Vallee persuaded his friend and onetime mentor Hynek that the quest for nuts-and-bolts extraterrestrial UFOs was doomed to certain failure. Particularly in his later years, Hynek’s pronouncements took on an increasingly occultish coloration, even to the extent of references to the astral world and to elementals. While such talk provided ammunition for his critics and made many of Hynek’s friends and colleagues uncomfortable, it also reflected a longtime, privately held interest in the occult.

Journalism on the Fringe

Under Charles Bowen’s editorship Flying Saucer Review (FSR), published in England, carried some of the best ufological writing of the 1960s and became for a time the world’s most influential UFO magazine. Two or three years into Bowen’s stewardship, FSR’s contents turned more and more to extraordinary claims and extreme speculations. Eventually, as Bowen’s health began to fail, Gordon Creighton—temperamentally much like Keel—assumed de facto (then, in 1982, actual) editorship. Sober material continued to appear, but increasingly Creighton’s openly supernaturalist approach dominated the pages of FSR. According to Creighton, the jinn, the demonic spirits of Middle Eastern mythology, are the cause of UFO, Fortean, and paranormal phenomena, and they are doing all manner of harm to the human race. Among other atrocious acts they are responsible for the AIDS epidemic. (Comparable views figure in the writings of Salvador Freixedo, sometimes called the Latin American John Keel, and of California ufologist Ann Druffel.)

By 1984 Creighton’s extremism had so alienated more conservative ufologists that one of them, John Rimmer, was led to observe, “No journal espousing the bizarre beliefs that are now emanating from [FSR’s] pages can be considered worthy to be the literary flagship of British ufology. From now on, it seems, it will be of interest largely to paranoid cultists, conspiracy-mongers, and students of fringe literature.” FSR’s readership and influence have declined markedly during Creighton’s tenure.

More UFO Theories

Not all proponents of occult ufology and anomalistics went as far as Creighton, but the notion that UFOs and other strange phenomena may be related, and all the product of paranormal forces, continued to have a wide appeal. Two popular British writers, Janet and Colin Bord, argued the case for a unified paranormal theory in a number of books. In Alien Animals (1981) they chronicle worldwide reports of anomalous creatures. All such reports, in their view, “have features in common which suggest they are all aspects of a single phenomenon, together with UFOs and other weird apparitions.” These otherworldly entities may feed on electrical power and “earth energies.”

Another theorist in what may be termed the paracryptozoological school, the late F. W. Holiday (author of The Dragon and the Disc, 1973), held that all through history good and evil entities have fought for the soul of the human race. To the ancients the disc represented the benevolent forces, the dragon the destructive ones, and the two have a sort of symbiotic relationship. Creatures such as the Loch Ness Monster are dragons in the literal sense—supernatural and evil. Discs, of course, are flying saucers. On June 2, 1973, accompanied by Holiday, the Rev. Dr. Donald Omand exorcised Loch Ness and subsequently other British and European lakes in which serpent-like beasts traditionally are believed to dwell.

Parapsychologist D. Scott Rogo offered a different sort of paranormal theory to explain UFO and Fortean occurrences. They are, he wrote, the product of mass psychic energy. If the psychokinetic energy emanated by the unconscious of a single individual can produce something so dramatic as a poltergeist, what might the psychokinesis of the entire human race produce? Rogo speculated in The Haunted Universe (1977) that “our entire culture may be projecting UFOs psychically” in response to our “needs and expectations.”

Psychologist Michael Grosso calls these psychokinetically generated entities “psychoterrestrials.” Their function is to affect the evolution of human consciousness, specifically to break down modern humanity’s excessive focus on materialism and rationalism. Grosso borrows here from the prominent Swiss psychologist-philosopher Carl G. Jung who, in Flying Saucers: A Modern Myth of Things Seen in the Skies (1959), characterizes the appearance of UFOs as indicative of “psychic change . . . which may be expected when the spring-point enters Aquarius.” According to Grosso the UFO image inspires fantasies and dreams and, more profoundly, draws archetypal material from deep within the collective unconscious. Symbolically the disc shape of the flying saucer represents psychic wholeness, a resolution of the conflict between rational (conscious) thought and intuitive (unconscious) feeling.

To Jung, however, the notion of a “materialized psychism”—Grosso’s “psychoterrestrial”—“opens a bottomless void under our feet” and “surpasses our comprehension.” It is absurd to propose that “psychic projections throw back a radar echo.” Since some UFOs seem to do just that, Jung wrote it is more probable that the “appearance of real objects affords an opportunity for mythological projections.” These “real objects” may be spacecraft whose presence only now is being noticed because our “earthly existence feels threatened [and] unconscious contents have projected themselves on these inexplicable heavenly phenomena and given them a significance they in no way deserve.”

But in Grosso’s more radical version of Jung’s hypothesis, psychic projections do show up on radar. “If UFOs are mythic constructs,” he writes, “it is not surprising that their physical effects fit the UFO construct. To look like real spaceships, they obligingly affect radar.” Psychoterrestrials also manifest as religious visions, monsters, men in black, angels, and more—all “forces of rebirth” in the service of the consciousness transformation that will save us from otherwise certain self-destruction.

Unlike Jung, but in common with Grosso and other occult-oriented theorists, folklorist Peter M. Rojcewicz rejects extraterrestrial UFOs in favor of the psychoterrestrials Grosso describes. “In the narrative accounts born of the ongoing human interaction with other worldliness,” he writes in The Boundaries of Orthodoxy (1984), “we see the articulation over time of a mental argument, both for a more cooperative and harmonious existence on the one hand, and on the other, [for] a transcendent dimension of human will and imagination.” Rojcewicz defines “UFO phenomenon” as virtually any sort of encounter with paranormal entities. He argues, “The ‘UFO Phenomenon,’ so Other, so here and now, reveals to us ourselves triggered by the intensity of unanswered longing and passionate collective desire.”

As UFO abduction stories came into prominence in the 1980s, they inspired a new round of both extraterrestrial and occult hypotheses. Among proponents of the latter, Grosso, Rojcewicz, and Dennis Stillings quickly identified the abducting entities as psychoterrestrials, while Whitley Strieber, Kenneth Ring (The Omega Project, 1992), and John E. Mack (Abduction, 1994) believed them to be genuine otherworldly supernatural intelligences bent on human betterment. In this view, abduction experiences were a variety of contact claim. The aliens may be odder-looking than the ones who figure in classic contact tales, and they may not come from outer space, and their methods may be bizarre and even cruel in the short term, but their mission is the same.

Not all ufologists have embraced occultism. Indeed, occult ufology reached its peak in the 1970s, and by the turn of the century, with Keel and Vallee growing less active and publishing little, it was no longer a significant element of mainstream ufology. Meantime, extraterrestrial theories underwent something of a revival.

Just as significantly, by the late 1970s and early 1980s some disillusioned proponents of paranormal ufology had radically altered the occult model in a way that made it possible for them to deal with extreme experiential claims without also having to embrace unverifiable supernatural explanatory schemes. Thus was born the “psychosocial” school, which proposed what were represented as psychological solutions to entity encounters. Though these solutions were themselves often speculative, they were certainly not occult-based; yet they borrowed ideas from Vallee, Grosso, and Rojcewicz, especially the relationship between alleged human needs and encounter experiences. Essentially the psychosociologists disagreed with the occults on only one point, albeit a crucial one: they did not believe dreams and visions could have physical properties.

Over time the psychosocial approach has evolved into more conventionally defined skepticism. It is more popular in Britain and the European continent than in the United States. Criticisms of occult ufology within the UFO literature have focused on its speculative nature and unfalsifiability. Beyond that, Keel and Vallee have been accused of using dubious material, including rumors and claims later exposed as hoaxes, to argue their cases. Critics have also objected that the evidence linking UFOs to other anomalous and paranormal manifestations is slight. In the Journal of UFO Studies Thomas E. Bullard writes of Rojcewicz and others:

“Claims about reality demand proof on the same terms that we treat other scientific claims. What do we find instead? The phenomenological theories of alternate realities handicap themselves with a well-nigh fatal combination of poor comparative methodology and unsound structural components, and no algebra of apologetics can transform these two minuses into a plus. Speculations about the psychoid properties of archetypes will not explain the physical effects of UFOs. If those physical effects are genuine, then prove to me first that archetypes exist and can have physical effects, or I will look for simpler and more direct solutions elsewhere. Using one unproven theory to support another is just a more sophisticated tautology, more verbose but ultimately no more informative about the physical world than identifying a bald man as hairless. In one sense this tack is even less informative. It clouds the basic questions with confusing masses of theory, distracting participants in the dialogue to talk only about theories and forget the real issues. The very proliferation of phenomenological theories with no way to sort out the right from the wrong simply underscores the danger that we may become more deeply mired in sophistry than the Athenian Academy.”

Another critic complained (in International UFO Reporter, January/February 1994) that occult theories turn the UFO argument on its head. The extreme experiential claims on which occult ufologists have been fixated comprise the least compelling evidence for the existence of UFOs. The best evidence—in the form of radar trackings, landing traces, photographs—suggests that at least some UFOs may be technological devices. The extreme claims, even when related by apparently sincere persons, amount only to stories. He went on:

“The fantastic entities described—fairies, merfolk, Blessed Virgins, apparitions of all kinds—do not bless us with physical evidence or even coherent pictures of themselves, their behaviors, and their missions. Of such things we can say only that experiences of them are possible, but the question of whether these experiences are events is another matter altogether. If events—in other words, occurrences amenable to incorporation into consensus acceptance via traditional methods of scientific documentation—they would force us to reinvent the world, and they would give us real reason to believe fourth dimensions, ethereal realms, superspectrums, and Magonias are more than words without meaning or attempts to redefine God. Nothing we have seen so far calls on us to embark on so daring an undertaking.”

Meanwhile, the saucerian movement, which in its present form began in 1952 with contactees Adamski and Van Tassel, goes on. The flamboyant figures of the early years, often suspected (and often with reason) of conscious charlatanry, are gone, but channelers and visionaries in the thousands still claim to commune with space and extradimensional personalities. An enormous literature of contactee lore and philosophy circulates in books and newsletters and now on the Internet.

Sources

Bord, Janet, and Colin Bord. Alien Animals. Harrisburg, Pa.: Stackpole Books, 1981.

Bullard, Thomas E. “Fresh Air, or Air Castles in Folklore Theories?” Journal of UFO Studies 4 (n.s., 1992): 165–73.

Clark, Jerome. The UFO Encyclopedia, Second Edition: The Phenomenon from the Beginning. 2 vols. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1998.

———. “Wagging the Dog.” International UFO Reporter 19, 1 (January/February 1994): 3, 22–24.

Gillmor, Daniel S., ed. Scientific Study of Unidentified Flying Objects. New York: Bantam Books, 1969.

Grosso, Michael. Frontiers of the Soul: Exploring Psychic Evolution. Wheaton, Ill.: Quest Books, 1992.

Holiday, F. W. The Dragon and the Disc: An Investigation Into the Totally Fantastic. New York: W. W. Norton, 1973.

Jacobs, David M. The UFO Controversy in America. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1975.

Jung, C. G. Flying Saucers: A Modern Myth of Things Seen in the Skies. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1959.

Keel, John A. The Eighth Tower. New York: Saturday Review Press, 1975.

———. Our Haunted Planet. Greenwich, Conn.: Fawcett Publications, 1971.

———. UFOs: Operation Trojan Horse. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970.

Layne, N. Meade. The Ether Ship and Its Solution. Vista, Calif.: Borderland Sciences Research Associates, 1950.

Mack, John E. Abduction: Human Encounters with Aliens. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1994.

Reeve, Bryant, and Helen Reeve. Flying Saucer Pilgrimage. Amherst, Wis.: Amherst Press, 1957.

Ring, Kenneth. The Omega Project: Near-Death Experiences, UFO Encounters, and Mind at Large. New York: William Morrow, 1992.

Rojciewicz, Peter M. “The Boundaries of Orthodoxy: A Folklore Look at the UFO Phenomenon.” 2 vols. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania, Ph.D. dissertation, 1984.

Rogo, D. Scott. The Haunted Universe: A Psychic Look at Miracles, UFOs and Mysteries of Nature. New York: New American Library, 1977.

Stillings, Dennis, ed. Cyberbiological Studies of the Imaginal Component in the UFO Contact Experience. St. Paul, Minn.: Archaeus Project, 1989.

Stupple, David M. “Historical Links Between the Occult and Flying Saucers.” Journal of UFO Studies 5 (n.s., 1994): 93–108.

Sturrock, Peter A. The UFO Enigma: A New Review of the Physical Evidence. New York: Warner Books, 1999.

Vallee, Jacques. Messengers of Deception: UFO Contacts and Cults. Berkeley, Calif.: And/Or Press, 1979.

———. Passport to Magonia: From Folklore to Flying Saucers. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1969.

———. Revelations: Alien Contact and Human Deception. New York: Ballantine Books, 1991.

Unification Church

A religious movement founded in 1954 in Korea by Rev. Sun Myung Moon, a South Korean engineer. His family had converted to the Presbyterian Church, and in 1935 he had a vision of Jesus, who reportedly told him to complete Jesus' unfinished work. He began to collect followers as early as 1944 into the Broad Sea Church. In 1946 he began a six-year stint in a North Korean prison camp. After his release, he made his way to Pusan, South Korea, where he eventually founded his church. Its basic teachings were written down in the Divine Principle, first published in 1957.

The first missionaries of the church were sent to Japan, where they had their greatest success. Members moved to the United States in 1959, and the first centers were begun in Eugene, Oregon, and Washington, D.C. Moon moved to the United States in 1971. Soon established were a headquarters in Manhattan, a seminary in Barrytown, New York, and Moon's residence in Irvington, New York.

Unification thought is based on a unique understanding of the concepts of Creation, the Fall, and Restoration. The principle of Creation asserts that God created the world and by that act became known. The world, reflecting God's nature, has two expressions, as Sung Sang (internal, invisible) and Hyung Sang (external, visible). It also is expressed as male and female. In the first set of expressions, one sees the relationship of spiritual and material; the second reveals what is traditionally known as yin and yang, the masculine and feminine. God created out of his inner nature, his heart of love. The purpose of creation is to experience the joy that comes from loving.

The Fall came about from Adam and Eve's failure to realize God's purpose in creation. The Fall placed Satan in control of creation. God has been trying to restore his primal intention ever since. The Bible is an account of God's various restoration attempts.

The principle of Restoration delineates the conditions necessary for the reestablishment of God's intention. The plan involves both God's sending of one sinless man and the response of a free and responsible humankind. The Messiah was to be born as a substantial, physical being, an example of the ideal person. He was also to take a bride and realize the ideal family and thus become the True Parent. Through the True Parent, God will implant love in the hearts of all who follow him. He will also show them how to accomplish the true purpose in life.

Throughout the 1970s the Unification Church (full name: The Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity) became one of the more controversial of the new religions. Because of its intense indoctrination, it was labeled a “cult” by many parents of the primarily youthful converts. Many were offended by the church's policy concerning sex and marriage. New members spent at least seven years in celibacy, after which Moon selected a spouse for them. Most marriage partners were drawn from a different country or race. Following their engagement, couples were married in mass weddings, the most recent of which occurred in 1995.

The church spawned a number of organizations, some evangelistic arms and others designed to carry out social policies. The church also made friends with many scholars and intellectuals. Most of the church's programs are now organized into two structures, the International Cultural Foundation and the International Religious Foundation. The former has sponsored possibly the most successful program involving nonchurch members, the International Conference on the Unity of the Sciences.

The church has spread internationally and is active in over 150 countries. It has approximately five thousand members in the United States but counts members in the hundreds of thousands worldwide. Address: HSA-UWC, 4 W. 43rd St., New York, NY 10036. Website: <http://www.unification.org/>.

Sources:

Barker, Eileen. The Making of a Moonie. Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1984.

Biermans, John T. The Odyssey of New Religious Movements. New York: Edwin Mellon, 1986.

Divine Principle. New York: Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, 1973.

Outline of the Principle, Level 4. New York: Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, 1980.

The Unification Church. <http://www.unification.org/>. March 8, 2000.

Union Esperitista Cristiana de Filipinas, Inc.

The Spiritualist church to which many of the psychic surgeons in the Philippines belong.

Current address unavailable.

Union Spirite Bordelaise (Journal)

Nineteenth-century Spiritist journal, published in Bordeaux, France, incorporating other journals.

Union Spirite Française

French Spiritualist organization, active in the 1930s, founded by Léon Chevreuil, its president, and Jean Meyer, its vice president. It published Le Bulletin de l'Union Spirite Française from its headquarters at the Maison des Spiritistes, 8 Rue Copernic, Paris, a center founded by Jean Meyer.

United Lodge of Theosophists

The United Lodge of Theosophists is an independent theosophical organization founded in 1909 by Robert Crosbie (1849–1919). Crosbie belonged to the theosophical community created by Katherine Tingley at Point Loma, San Diego, California, in the early 1900s. Before long he argued that the community had lost its direction as originally established. He moved to Los Angeles, opened the United Lodge, and founded a publishing facility, the Theosophy Company. The first issue of Theosophy Magazine appeared in 1912.

Among the people attracted to the United Lodge was B. P. Wadia, an Indian who had held a high position in the Theosophical Society. Wadia eventually succeeded Crosbie as head of the lodge and is credited with turning it into an international organization. More recently a leadership role was assumed by Rhagavan N. Iyer, now a retired professor of political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara. With his wife, Nandini, Iyer heads the lodge's Santa Barbara group and founded Concord Press, which has developed an extensive publishing program of theosophical and related materials.

The United Lodge of Theosophists has no formal membership but there are some 11 lodges in the United States and 11 more in other countries. Along with the magazine Theosophy, the group publishes the monthly, The Theosophical Movement, and the bimonthly, Vidya. Address: 245 W. 33rd St., Los Angeles, CA 90007. Website: <http://www.ult.org/>.

Sources:

Crosbie, Robert. Answers to Questions on the Ocean of Theosophy. Los Angeles: Theosophy, 1937.

———. The Friendly Philosopher. Los Angeles: Theosophy, 1934.

The Theosophical Movement, 1875–1950. Los Angeles: Cuninghame Press, 1951.

United Lodge of Theosophists. <http://www.ult.org/>. March 8, 2000.

United Lodge of Theosophists: Its Mission and Its Future. Los Angeles: Theosophy, n.d.

United Metropolitan Spiritual Churches of Christ

The United Metropolitan Spiritual Churches of Christ were founded in 1945 by Bishop Thomas Watson, but date to the earliest days of the spiritual church movement in New Orleans. The spiritual movement, the name assumed by many African American Spiritualist churches in the early twentieth century, was brought to New Orleans by Rev. Leafy Anderson in 1921. The popular leader of the Eternal Life Christian Spiritualist Association attracted many African Americans who were interested in psychic phenomena and mediumship. Among them was Thomas Watson. In 1929, two years after Anderson's death, Watson withdrew from his association and founded the St. Joseph Helping Hand Church in a New Orleans suburb. This independent congregation grew by the addition of affiliated congregations into the St. Joseph Helping Hand Missionary Association (1934) and the Divine Spiritual Church of the Southwest (1935).

In 1936 Watson was elected senior bishop of the church. Among his major decisions for the new church was a rejection of his own heritage with Anderson. In 1940, having concluded that women should not be ordained ministers, he removed all of the women mediums and pastors, many of whom left the church. Then in 1942 Watson led his church into a merger with the Metropolitan Spiritual Churches of Christ to form the United Spiritual Churches of Christ. When William F. Taylor, the former president of the Metropolitan Churches, died shortly after the merger, Watson was selected to succeed him. However, Watson immediately ran into a conflict with Clarence Cobbs, who also thought he should be president of the United Spiritual Churches.

The conflict grew over the next three years and eventually Cobbs forced Watson out of office and became the new president. With his following, Watson withdrew and reorganized his following into the United Metropolitan Spiritual Churches of Christ. There is no difference in belief and practice between the two churches, and the area of disagreement was purely administrative.

Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Jacobs, Claude F., and Andrew J. Kaslow. The Spiritual Churches of New Orleans: Origins, Beliefs, and Rituals of an African American Religion. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1991.

Murphy, Larry G., J. Gordon Melton, and Gary L. Ward. Encyclopedia of African American Religions. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.

United Spiritualist Church

The United Spiritualist Church was founded in 1967 by Rev. Floyd Humble, Edwin Potter, and Howard Mangan. Humble had earlier served a variety of independent Spiritualist congregations. The church affirms belief in Spiritualism and mediumship, both spiritual and physical, and the example of Jesus as a teacher, healer, and prophet. Humans are immortal and will bring the kingdom of God to Earth as they develop their spiritual sides.

The United Spiritualist Church differs from most Spiritualist churches by its development of a centralized form of government. Most Spiritualists have been organized into very loose fellowships of autonomous congregations. The United Church is headed by a presidency consisting of a president, first adviser-secretary, and second adviser-treasurer. They oversee the board of governors, which in turn guides the boards of publication, education, and church extension and missions. The board of governors is elected by the general conference. The church publishes a periodical, the Spiritual Outlook. Address: 813 W. 165th Pl., Gardena, CA 90247.

Sources:

Humble, Floyd. Bible Lessons. Gardena, Calif.: United Spiritualist Church, 1969.

Unity-and-Diversity World Council

An international coordinating body devoted to linking metaphysical and New Age groups. It was originally formed as the International Cooperation Council, and it has been led for three decades by its coordinator Leland Stewart. The council seeks to coordinate cultural and religious organizations that, in their own ways, "foster the emergence of a new universal person and a civilization based on unity in diversity among all peoples." Formed to propagate ideals of unity during International Cooperation Year, it was voted into being in 1965 by the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Unity-and-Diversity World Council continues its work of publicizing the aims and ideas of humanitarian groups that bring together the methods and discoveries of modern science with the insights of religion, philosophy, and the arts. Much of this synthesis is concerned with developing areas of awareness in human consciousness and unorthodox healing techniques.

In its early period, the council took part in a New Age Institute directed toward public and private education. A World-View Exploration Seminar, formed in spring 1969, grew out of the Fifth Annual International Cooperation Festival, composed primarily of professionals from the fields of science, religion, art, education, and philosophy, who met on the campus of the California State College at Los Angeles to explore "the meaning of the new universal person and the world civilization."

In place of the magazine The Cooperator, the Unity-and-Diversity Council now issues the monthly newsletter Spectrum and also publishes a World Directory of affiliated organizations from its headquarters at 5521 Grosvenor Blvd., Ste. 22, Los Angeles, CA 90066-6915.

Univercoelum (Journal)

Early Spiritualist periodical started by Andrew Jackson Davis in December 1847, in New York, for "the establishment of a universal system of Truth, the Reform and Reorganization of Society." It ran for a year and a half before being absorbed in July 1849 by W. M. Channing's The Present Age.

Univercolian (Magazine)

Quarterly publication growing out of former Pyramid Guide Newsletter, concerned with earth mysteries, featuring articles on such subjects as Easter Island, Stonehenge, Atlantis, UFOs, and energy centers. Its mailing address is P.O. Box 292, Dalton, MA 01226.

Universal Balm

An elixir sought by alchemists that was supposed to be a remedy for every malady and would even bring the dead back to life. (See also elixir of life)

Universal Christ Church

The Universal Christ Church is a small fellowship of Spiritualist congregations in Southern California. It was founded in 1970 by Rev. Anthony Benik and was unique in its acceptance of an element of ritualism in its worship. It operates out of a Spiritualist perspective and reincarnation is accepted. Most of the churches are in the Los Angeles area, but there is one large congregation reported in Australia. In the 1970s there were five congregations in the greater Los Angeles area, but recent attempts to contact the church have failed. Its present status is unknown.

Universal Church of the Master

The Universal Church of the Master, one of the largest Spiritualist churches in the United States, especially on the West Coast, was founded in 1908 in Los Angeles by Dr. B. J. Fitzgerald (d. 1966) and others. The church was incorporated in 1918 and during its first generation was largely confined to congregations on the West Coast. Fitzgerald was the author of the church's basic textbook, A New Text of Spiritual Philosophy and Religion. In 1930 the church's headquarters moved to Oakland, California, and then in 1966 to San Jose. The church was headed for many years by Birdie Peterson, who passed away in 1994.

The church has a statement of faith that affirms the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; the necessity of living in harmony with nature; life after death; communication [through mediumship] with the unseen world; the Golden Rule; individual responsibility; the continual possibility of improvement; prophecy; and the eternal progress of the soul. The implication of the emphasis on the laws of nature defies any supernaturalism in the communication with the dead or other psychic phenomena. The church also suggests the use of The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus the Christ, a channeled work by Levi Dowling, as a source for teachings.

In the 1980s it had over 300 associated congregations. The church is headquartered at 501 Washington St., Santa Clara, CA 95050.

Sources:

Dowling, Levi. The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus the Christ. Los Angeles: Leo W. Dowling, 1925.

Fitzgerald, B. J. A New Text of Spiritual Philosophy and Religion. San Jose, Calif.: Universal Church of the Master, 1954.

Universal Faithists of Kosmon

The Universal Faithists of Kosmon is one of several groups founded by believers in the authority of Oahspe: A New Age Bible. Oahspe was channeled by John Ballou Newbrough (1828–1891) and published in 1882. The first convention of Faithists, held in 1883, planned the formation of a community in New Mexico called Shalam. Initially successful, it was destroyed by a flu epidemic, which took many of its leaders, including Newbrough.

The Faithist cause has been kept alive by a variety of independent groups, the Universal Faithists among the oldest of the several presently existing organizations. It has assumed responsibility for preserving Faithist communication. The movement has had some alignment with the New Age movement, since Oahspe was originally described as a “New Age” Bible. It describes the evolution of the human race into the Kosmon Era, a time of worldwide peace and joy.

The Universal Faithists publish the periodical Kosmon Voice. The organization may be contacted at the Oahspe Information Service, Messilla, New Mexico 88046-0891.

Sources:

Dennon, Jim. Newbrough and Oahspe. Kingman, Ariz.: Faithist Journal, 1975.

———. The Oahspe Story. Kingman, Ariz.: Faithist Journal, 1975.

Stowes, K. D. The Land of Shalam: Children's Land. Evansville, Ind.: Molinet Print Shop, n.d.

Universal Hagar's Spiritual Church (UHSC)

The Universal Hagar's Spiritual Church (UHSC), a Spiritualist church operating primarily among African Americans, was founded in 1923 in Detroit, Michigan, by George Willie Hurley (1884–1943). Hurley moved to Detroit from Georgia in 1891 and affiliated with Triumph the Church and Kingdom of God in Christ and rose to become the leader of the church in Michigan. A short time later he became involved with the esoteric, left his position in 1920 to join a Spiritualist church, and three years later founded his own church. In 1924 he established the School of Mediumship and Psychology, and as new congregations developed, each also had a school attached to it. Hurley conceived of the school as a branch of the Great School of the Prophets, which he believed to be the school Jesus attended during the 18 years between his appearance in the temple in Jerusalem and the beginning of his public ministry at the age of 30.

UHSC was one of the main bodies spreading Spiritualism through the African American community in the twentieth century. Like other spiritual churches, (spiritual was the name adopted by Spiritualism in the black community), UHSC altered traditional Spiritualism by blending Catholic ritual, Holiness preaching, and elements of the folk magic culture or voodoo. Hurley also drew upon Ethiopianism, a belief that identified black people (Ethiopians) with the ancient Israelites; astrology; and insights from The Aquarian Gospel of Jesus Christ, a channeled book that purports to tell of Jesus' lost years. Unlike many spiritual leaders, Hurley took a strong stand on social issues and was an early supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The church planted congregations across the Northeast and Midwest during Hurley's lifetime. As the church expanded, Hurley acquired an increasingly grandiose self-understanding. He told his followers that his carnal flesh had been transformed into the flesh of Christ and that he had become the “God” of this Aquarian Age, just as Jesus had been the God of the previous Piscean Age. Since Hurley's death, the UHSC has been led by Prince Thomas Surbacher, Mother Mary Hatchett, Prince Alfred Bailey, and Rev. G. Latimer, Hurley's daughter. Hurley welcomed women to the ministry, and they have always been well represented on the Wiseman's Board, the church's ruling structure. State directors are called princes, a term taken over from Triumph the Church and Kingdom of God in Christ. In recent years the church has spread into the Southwest and California.

Current address unavailable.

Sources:

Baer, Hans A. The Black Spiritual Movement: A Religious Response to Racism. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1984.

Universal Harmony Foundation

The Universal Harmony Foundation is a Spiritualist church founded in New York in 1942 as the Universal Psychic Science Association. The founders, Revs. Helene Gerling and J. Bertram Gerling, were both prominent mediums at Lily Dale, the Spiritualist camp near Rochester, New York. Association headquarters were soon moved to Saint Petersburg, Florida. Helene Gerling wrote several books and a set of correspondence lessons and also opened a seminary for training mediums, through which students could receive ordination and charters for churches. Ordained positions include ministers, healers, missionaries, and teachers.

The church strives for a universal philosophy and draws insight from revelation and the teachings of all religions and prophets. Church belief is premised upon the religious and scientific demonstration of the talents and powers of the Living Spirit, that is, mediumship. The foundation affirms the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the eternalness of life, the power of prayer, spiritual healing, the reality of the psychic, soul growth as the purpose of life, and that the way of life is fraternal service.

Helene Gerling led the foundation for almost a half century. She retired in 1988 and was succeeded by Rev. Nancy Castillo. Castillo pastors the mother church, and members are encouraged to join it and support it in an annual free-will offering. The church issues the magazine Spiritual Digest. Address: c/o Rev. Nancy Castillo, 5903 Seminole Blvd., Seminole, FL 33542.

Sources:

Gerling, Helene. Healthy Intuitive Development. New York: Exposition Press, 1971.

Universal Life—The Inner Religion

Universal Life—The Inner Religion began in 1977 to spread the message of contemporary German channel Gabriele Wittek (b. 1930). In 1975, according to Wittek, the same spirit of Christ who had been present in Jesus of Nazareth stepped into her life and chose her as his prophetic instrument for this generation. He disclosed his intention to lead his children back to their eternal home and to build the kingdom of God on Earth. Wittek organized the Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ, the original name of the new religion.

Wittek, a Wurzburg housewife, received an awakening experience in 1970 when she saw the spirit of her deceased mother. Convinced of “survival of bodily death,” she began visiting a local medium, then operated as a channel herself for several years before going public with the messages she was receiving. Wittek emphasized the indwelling kingdom of God and taught a method of going within to open the kingdom and experience God in one's innermost being. She advised people to learn to live God's laws as expressed in the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount.

The mission operated for seven years, and in 1984 was superseded by Universal Life—The Inner Religion. Wittek now taught that, given the contact with God, it was possible to put the Sermon on the Mount into operation immediately. She encouraged those formerly associated with the mission to form businesses that would operate on the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. Toward the end of the decade, a school based on the same principles was opened.

During these years, the mission-turned-religion spread across Europe and into North and South America. By the early 1990s, the teachings had been translated into ten languages, and over 130 Inner-Spirit-of-Christ churches opened. Universal Life publishes the periodical Christ State-International and may be contacted through its world headquarters, Universelles Leben, Postfach 5643, 8700 Wurzburg, Germany. In the United States the address is Box 3579, New Haven, CT 06525.

Sources:

The Christian Mystery School. Pelham, N.H.: Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ, 1983.

The Divine Mystical Method of Instruction of the Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ. Pelham, N.H.: Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ, 1980.

A Formerly Spiritually Unknown Person on the Path to God: The Course of Life of the Prophetess in the Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ. Pelham, N.H.: Homebringing Mission of Jesus Christ, 1980.

Universal Religion of America

The Universal Religion of America was a Spiritualist movement founded in 1958 in Kenosha, Wisconsin, by the Rev. Marjie Koski. Koski was formerly a minister with the Spiritual Science Mother Church. She was known by the members of her church as Soraya ("Solar Ray") as a result of the channeled messages she receives from Jesus.

During the 1960s, Koski left the Kenosha congregations under the leadership of her students and moved to Florida, first to Rockledge and then to Merritt Island. The Universal Religion had some 500 members in its two centers. Last known address: Christ Universal Church, 295 North Tropical Trail, Merritt Island, FL 32952.

Sources:

Koski, Marie. Personal Talks with Jesus. Washington, DC: ES-Press, 1979.

Universal Spiritualist Association

The Universal Spiritualist Association is an association of Spiritualist churches and clergy. It was originally founded in 1956 by Clifford Bias to issue credentials for Camp Chesterfield, which housed the seminary where many Spiritualist ministers and healers were trained and licensed. Until 1956, the Spiritualist Episcopal Church was in charge of the seminary. At that point the leaders of the new association, mostly former Spiritualist Episcopalians, assumed the administrative and faculty roles at the Chesterfield school, an arrangement that was cordial until 1970, when a dispute erupted between the camp and the association. The school reverted to the control of the Chesterfield staff, and the Universal Spiritualist Association conducted its own seminary. In 1985 the association moved to the Maple Grove Spiritual Retreat near Pendleton, Indiana, and opened the Institute for Holistic Studies. In 1993 the association moved headquarters once again to the Universal Institute for Holistic Studies at Ball State University, Muncie, Indiana.

The Universal Spiritualist Association provides limited demonstrations of the physical phenomena of spiritualism for their institute registrants and candidates for the clergy, primarily for lack of demand.

Clifford Bias served as first president of the association until his death in 1986. He organized the Ancient Mystical Order of Seekers, the esoteric society for the association's ministers and more serious lay students. Bias' successor was Warren Smith, who retired in 1990. The association is presently led by T. Ernest Nichols. The president heads the association's general board, which charters churches and licenses ministers. A board of regents oversees the Institute for Holistic Studies. Both boards are elected at the annual membership-at-large meeting.

In 1990 the association reported 512 members in 14 churches, including one in Windsor, Ontario, Canada. It publishes the magazine Banner of Light, and may be contacted at the Universal Institute for Holistic Studies, 4905 W. University Ave., Muncie, IN 47304-3460. Website: <http://www.spiritualism.org>.

Sources:

Bias, Clifford. The Way Back. York Beach, Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1985.

Universal Spiritualist Manual. Universal Administration, Muncie, Ind.: Universal Spiritualist Association, n.d.

Wallace, Austin D. Thistle Presents Prince Nikeritis. Eaton Rapids, Mich.: Transcendental Science Publications, 1905.

Universe Quarterly

Former quarterly journal of the Vortex Institute of Fairbanks, Alaska, concerned with spiritual life in Alaska, self-growth techniques, and meditation.

Universities (Occult)

In many works on the occult sciences, allusions are made to schools and universities and the instruction of those who were drawn to them. The idea for such schools derived from the philosophical schools and academies of the ancient Greek teachers. In the early Christian era, Gnosticism was taught in such schools. Since that discipline was centered upon gnosis or knowledge, a school (rather than a temple or church) was the natural form that its group life assumed.

While a few similar schools might have existed in the Dark Ages, the idea of such institutions was largely a myth used to credential otherwise informally and self-taught occultists or to refer to the places where alchemists and occultists quietly gathered to consult with each other. It was the practice of those on the faculties of the universities and those who operated independently to draw students around them, and professors of the occult sciences were no different.

There is no doubt that during the Middle Ages many lecturers taught alchemy and kindred subjects at great universities. Thus Paracelsus lectured on alchemy at the University of Basel, and he was preceded and followed there and elsewhere by others who taught that and other occult arts.

Louis Figuier, in his book L'alchimie et les alchimistes (1854), alluded to a school in Paris frequented by alchemists that he himself attended in the middle of the nineteenth century. The school—an ordinary chemical laboratory during the day—became in the evening a center of the most elaborate alchemical study, where Figuier met alchemical students, visionary and practical.

The novelist Balzac alludes to an occult school in the story "The Secret of Ruggier," which he placed at the time of Catherine de Medici. He stated: "At this epoch the occult sciences were cultivated with an ardour which put to shame the incredulous spirit of our century. . . . The universal protection accorded to these sciences by the ruling sovereigns of the times was quite remarkable."

He goes on to say that at the beginning of the sixteenth century, Ruggier was a member of a secret university for the study of the occult sciences, where astrologers, alchemists, and others studied several branches of hidden knowledge. Balzac gives no details as to its locality, or as to the exact nature of its curriculum.

The College of Augurs in Rome and the Calmecac of ancient Mexico are distinct examples of institutions for the study of divination, and in this connection, the House of Wisdom of the Ismaelite sect at Cairo, Egypt, may be mentioned.

Helena Petrovna Blavatsky insisted that a great "school" of illuminated occult adepts flourished in Tibet, but nobody except herself and her immediate friends ever saw them or had any dealings with them. Prior to 1959, Tibet was the home of a large number of monasteries that were also the schools of Tibetan Buddhism and its esoteric practices.

Instructional centers for people who studied the occultism integral to Hinduism, Buddhism, and other Asian systems did exist (and continue to exist) across Asia. These centers, remote and mysterious prior to the transportation and communications revolution of the twentieth century, took on a mythical character in the occult literature of the nineteenth century. Those associated with these Asian schools were rumored to have extraordinary occult prowess.

In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries attempts have been made to recreate these ancient occult schools. For example, the School for the Discovery of the Lost Secrets of Antiquity flourished for a generation in San Diego, California. It was founded by Katherine Tingley late in the nineteenth century and taught Theosophy. A decade earlier, Blavatsky founded the Esoteric Section of the Theosophical Society, an organization carried on by Theosophists associated with the Theosophical Society.

One modern equivalent of ancient occult universities are the secret magical orders, such as the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn, where occult and mystical subjects are taught to students, with grades of advancement. Many such orders, based in part on a format adopted from Freemasonry, exist.

One outstanding attempt to recreate the ancient Gnostic schools, with an intense course in esoteric training, is Ramtha's School of Enlightenment in Yelm, Washington, opened in 1988 by JZ Knight. Ramtha, a channeled entity, instructs students through the entranced Knight.

University Books, Inc.

One of the most influential imprints in occult publishing from the 1950s on. The corporation was founded by Felix Morrow, who played a major role in the modern occult revival by reprinting rare and important scholarly works of occultism and mysticism that had long been unavailable.

In addition to being sold to libraries, the books reached a large general public through the Mystic Arts Book Club. The spokespersons of the occult revival of the 1960s and 1970s drew heavily from these texts. In 1966, the company was absorbed by Lyle Stuart, Inc., which continued occult publishing under the Citadel Press imprint.

University of London Council for Psychological Investigation

A reorganization of the National Laboratory of Psychological Research, which had been founded by psychological researcher Harry Price in 1926. The National Laboratory passed under the direction of the University of London Council on June 6, 1934. At that date the organization was still at the National Laboratory address, but by the end of 1936 the large library assembled by Price was moved to University College, London.

Later the National Laboratory's séance room and laboratory equipment were transferred to the administrative offices of the University Council, but all experimentation ceased with the outbreak of World War II. After the death of Harry Price in 1948, the library was bequeathed to the University of London.

A short-title catalogue of the library was issued as volume 1, number 2 of the Proceedings of the National Laboratory of Psychological Research, and a supplement was issued as the first bulletin of the University of London Council for Psychological Investigation. A second publication was issued by the University of London Council as Bulletin II, A Report on Two Experimental Fire-Walks; Bulletin III, Preliminary Studies of a Vaudeville Telepathist.

Last known address: University of London, Senate House, Male St., London.

University of the Trees

An experimental New Age school community for world change through consciousness research and related spiritual development. The main thrust of teaching was directed towards self-discovery and creative individual change, and in addition to community life courses, teaching was also maintained through correspondence with students all over the world. Courses were wide-ranging, including art, literature, environmental studies, changing, transpersonal awareness, alternative energy systems, health and yoga, healing, history and neurology of consciousness, philosophy, mysticism, radiational physics, and what is termed "supersensonics" (which includes radesthesia, dowsing, pyramid research, and psychotronics).

The university granted degrees in consciousness research, but aimed to provide students with methods of study that deepen their inner awareness. The term "the Trees" denoted the nerve dendrites in the brain, and the "Tree of Life" of the nervous system that can combine with knowledge to enhance direct perception of truth.

The community was founded in 1973 and grew out of the teachings of Christopher Hills, a New Age teacher, researcher, and yogi who directs the work of the university. Associated with the university is a Research Institute for Supersensonic Healing Energies. Last known address: P.O. Box 644, 13151 Pine St., Boulder Creek, CA 95006.

The Unknown (Magazine)

Former British monthly magazine "exploring strange phenomena." The first issue, published July 1985, included discussions at a popular level of spontaneous combustion, ley lines, wolf children, lost civilizations, sea serpents, alchemy, and the Fatima apparitions.

The Unknown World (Journal)

Occult and metaphysical journal founded by James Elliott and edited by Arthur Edward Waite (1857–1942). Eleven issues appeared from August 1894 to June 1895. It was devoted to "The Occult Sciences, Magic, Mystical Philosophy, Alchemy, Hermetic Archaeology, and the Hidden Problems of Science, Literature, Speculation and History."

Sources:

Gilbert, R. A. A. E. Waite: A Bibliography. Wellingsborough, Northamptonshire, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.

Unknown Worlds (Newsletter)

Bimonthly newsletter reporting strange phenomena of a Fortean kind. It was published by World Investigators of Strange Phenomena. Last known address: Rte. 2, Box 159, Vina, AL 35593.

Upanishads

The Upanishads, literally teachings received while sitting at the feet of a master, are a set of writings produced in the first millennium B.C.E. in India, which had been the most important in defining the general perspective of that set of religions generally referred to as Hinduism. Transmitted to the West in the nineteenth century, they became a major source for contemporary belief in karma and reincarnation, and through Theosophy were integrated into the teaching of Western occult thought.

The first era of Indian thought was built around the Vedas, writings which suggest that India's ancient culture was built around the celebration of nature, the activity of the deities in the world, and the propitiation of the gods in acts of devotion, temple sacrifice, and the following of rules. The Upanishads represent a radical shift in perspective that developed around 1000 B.C.E. The authors of the Upanishads launched a search for the unifying reality behind the visible universe.

There are 13 Principle Upanishads, which summarize the whole of the teachings, and numerous lesser supportive documents. They critique the Vedas and are often referred to as the Vedanta, or “end of the Vedas.” Rather than outward acts of temple worship, the Upanishads call for an inward search for the ultimate principle of reality (called Brahman) and a mystical union with that principle. Brahman is the source of the visible world that goes through a continuous process of being created, sustained, and destroyed. Brahman is hidden by maya (illusion), that aspect of the world that conceals reality from us.

The essential mystical insight offered by the Upanishads is the identification of Brahman with Atman. Atman is the essential core of the individual self. The implication is that to reach the inner essence of oneself is to discover ultimate reality. It is upon this identification that disciplines of concentration and meditation and ultimately the practice of yoga are based.

According to the Upanishads, individuals are trapped in maya. Lost in maya, we face a continuous series of incarnations, the exact nature of any incarnation being the result of the consequences of actions in prior lives (karma). To escape maya one must focus upon reality, the yogic path being the ideal process for pursuing that focus. It is also recognized that such a focus can lead to selfishness. To prevent such an error, the Upanishads recommend the cultivation of virtues such as detachment and self-control, and call for the performance of one’s social duties.

The Upanishads now exist in several translations in English and other Western languages, though the 1879 translation by world religions scholar Max Müller was the important early one which built support for Indian perspectives in the West. In 1893, Swami Vivekananda brought the teachings of the Vedanta to the West and established it throughout the Vedanta Societies that grew out of his work. Through the twentieth century, numerous commentaries on the Upanishads were published and circulated by the many Indian religions operating in the West. Equally important, insights from the Upanishads, freed from the texts, have permeated Western esoteric and metaphysical groups through which they have been popularized among a public unaware of their origin.

Sources:

Beidler, William. The Vision of the Self in Early Vedanta. Delhi: Motilal Barnarsidass, 1975.

Radhakrishnan, Sarvepalli. The Principal Upanishads. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1953.

Uphoff, Walter (1913–1998)

Professor of economics who has also written and lectured extensively in the field of parapsychology. He was born February 28, 1913, in Sheboygan County, Wisconsin, and studied at the University of Wisconsin (B.S., 1934; Ph.D., 1935). In 1938 he married Mary Jo Weiler, who co-authored some of his writings on parapsychology. He worked in business for many years before joining the faculty of the University of Minnesota in 1951. He moved to the University of Colorado in 1961. He retired in 1976 and until his death pursued the interest in psychical research that he developed during his student days.

Uphoff and his wife founded the New Frontiers Center and he served as its president. He was a member of the American Society for Psychical Research, International Spiritual Frontiers Fellowship, and the Society for Psychical Research, London. He was a board member of ESP Research Associates Foundation and a member of the former Academy of Parapsychology and Medicine. One of Uphoff’s books concerns the early experiments with Masuaki Kiyota, the metal-bending psychic who later admitted that he had fraudulently accomplished his remarkable PK effects. Uphoff died September 26, 1998.

Sources:

Uphoff, Walter, and Mary Jo Uphoff. Mind Over Matter: Implications of Masuaki Kiyota’s PK Feats with Metal and Film. Oregon, Wis.: New Frontiers Center, 1980.

———. New Psychic Frontiers: Your Key to New Worlds. Gerard’s Cross, U.K.: Colin Smyth, 1975.

The Upright Man

In the sixteenth century, the vagabonds and beggars of Britain were organized into unions with rules and grades. Of these grades, the order of the “Upright Man” seems to have had some special significance and authority, and it is believed by some authorities to have descended from the folk adherents of paganism, the “Old Religion,” or witchcraft.

Ura

A Babylonian spirit. (See also Babylonia)

Uranian Astrology

Uranian astrology is an innovative system of astrology developed early in the twentieth century by Friedrich Siegggrün (1877–1951) and Alfred Witte (1878–1943), two pioneers of the contemporary astrological revival. The system is sometimes referred to as the Hamburg School, a reference to Witte’s main teaching centre in Germany.

The Uranian system was distinguished from traditional astrology at several points. First, traditional astrology bases many of its interpretations of the chart on the angles formed between planets in the charts. Important relationships or aspects are formed when planets are apart as 0° (conjunction), 30° (semisextile), 45° (semisquare), 60° (sextile), 90° (square), 120° (trine), and 180° (opposition). There are also a set of lesser aspects. Some aspects have traditionally been regarded as beneficent and others as more malevolent. These latter, now termed the hard aspects, include the square, semisquare, and opposition. The Uranian system emphasized the role of hard aspects.

Second, the Uranian system introduced the idea of midpoints to astrological interpretation. As the name implies, a midpoint is a spot halfway between any two planets pictured on the horoscope. The midpoint is the place where the combined energies of the two planets manifest. The two planets and their midpoint form a planetary picture. The calculation of said midpoints requires an additional level of mathematical skill by the astrologer drawing up the chart, a fact that limited the spread of the Uranian approach.

Third, the most questionable aspect of the Uranian system was the introduction of hypothetical planets to the chart. Prior to the advent of space travel and the development of various means of verifying the existence of otherwise unknown planets, the existence of different as yet undiscovered planets was proposed. Such speculation was encouraged by the discovery of Uranus and Neptune and heralded the discovery of Pluto (1930) and Chiron (1977), a comet originally believed to be a planet.

Uranian astrology was unique in suggesting the existence of no less than eight hypothetical planets that were given the names Cupido, Hades, Zeus, Kronos, Apollon, Admetos, Vulcanos, and Poseidon. Each of these planets was assigned its particular role in the chart.

Uranian astrology enjoyed its greatest success in German-speaking countries during the first half of the twentieth century. It also gave birth to cosmobiology, an astrological system started by Reinhold Ebertin, one of Witte’s students. It has had little success outside of German-speaking countries, though Witte’s most important book, Rules for Planetary Pictures, was published in an English edition in 1939. Also, modern advances in astronomy made the addition of hypothetical planets to the horoscope an increasingly dubious endeavor.

Sources:

Brau, Jean-Louis, Helean Weaver, and Allan Edwards. Larousse Encyclopedia of Astrology. New York: New American Library, 1982.

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

URANTIA

A lengthy nineteenth-century channeled message published in The URANTIA Book (1955). It explains that the true name of Earth is Urantia and that we are part of the universe of Nebadon, or the larger universe of Orvonton, whose central committee of Uversa dictated the work. The book presents its own unique view of human origins, including the precursors of Adam and Eve and a claimed more accurate version of the life and teaching of Jesus (said to have been really Michael of Nebadon, one of the myriad sons of the Eternal Son). The miracles are given largely natural explanations.

The book owes its publication to William S. Sadler (1875–1969), former Seventh-Day Adventist minister, who served as a surgeon in Adventist hospitals before leaving the movement. Although skeptical of psychic phenomena, he became involved with the Urantia writings, which proceeded from an unnamed individual who “became a clearing house for the coming and going of alleged extraplanetary personalities.” These channeled communications were first studied in the 1920s by a group of individuals named The Forum. The URANTIA Foundation was formed in 1950 in Chicago, Illinois, and published The URANTIA Book five years later. The foundation promotes the study of the book and sponsors study groups of interested people. It is located at 533 Diversey Pkwy., Chicago, IL 60614, and publishes the URANTIAN NEWS . . . from URANTIA Foundation.

Sources:

Gardner, Martin. “The Great URANTIA Mystery.” The Skeptical Inquirer 14, no. 2 (winter 1990).

Myers, Martin W. Unity, Not Uniformity. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1973.

The URANTIA Book. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1955.

URANTIA Brotherhood Association

The URANTIA Brotherhood Association was founded in 1989 to continue the work of the URANTIA Brotherhood, founded in 1955. That year people attracted to the teachings of The URANTIA Book, a large volume of channeled material first published in 1955, organized to nurture their learning experience. Over the years the URANTIA Brotherhood formed a number of groups around the country. They operated in harmony with the URANTIA Foundation, the corporation established in 1950 to publish and hold the copyrights and trademarks associated with the book. However, in 1989 the brotherhood and the foundation had an irreconcilable disagreement, and the foundation withdrew the use of the name URANTIA and the associated symbols from the brotherhood. Committed to the book, the brotherhood reorganized as the Fifth Epochal Fellowship. Those students still in relation to the foundation organized a new structure, the URANTIA Brotherhood Association. It may be contacted at 529 W. Wrightwood Ave., Chicago, IL 60614. Website: <http://urantiabook.org/>.

Sources:

Special Report to the Readers of THE URANTIA BOOK: URANTIA Foundation Ends Its Relationship with the Former URANTIA Brotherhood. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1990.

The URANTIA Book. Chicago: URANTIA Foundation, 1955.

Urban, Hubert Josef (1904–)

Professor of neuropsychiatry who investigated areas of parapsychology. He was born on June 4, 1904, in Linz, Austria. He studied at the University of Vienna (B.A., 1923; M.D., 1929). He pursued post-graduate studies at several locations and in 1938 became a professor of neuropsychiatry at the University of Innsbruck, Austria. Urban took special interest in telepathy, clairvoyance, and mediumship as related to psychiatry, and studied the question of extrasensory ability before and after shock treatment or narcoanalysis. Between 1948 and 1958, he made visits to India to conduct field work in psychiatry, which allowed observation and research on spontaneous psi phenomena. He published articles on connections between psi, psychiatry, and medicine in various journals.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Urim and Thummim

Literally “lights and perfections,” a means of divination employed by the ancient Hebrews. The objects were placed on a breastplate, which bore the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, that was worn over the heart of the high priest when he went before the Lord (Ex. 28:30). It was believed to consist of a species of casting lots.

The use of Urim and Thummim was not for determining questions concerning individuals, only for questions of national import. Answers were usually given in a brief fashion, yes or no, or the designation of one tribe out of the twelve. There is no mention of the Urim and Thummim after the time of King David. Their form and method of use is uncertain, but from passages in the Hebrew Bible, it seems probable that they were used somewhat like dice to cast lots (I Sam. 10:19–22 and 14:37–42).

The Urim and Thummim reappeared in the nineteenth century in the form of two divining stones possessed by Joseph Smith, Jr., prophet and founder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, whose followers are commonly called Mormons. Smith used the stones to “translate” the Book of Mormon from what was claimed to be golden tablets with writing in a reformed Egyptian text.

Urine

Urine has long been credited with magical and medicinal properties. It has been featured in black magic rituals. It has been mixed with wine, herbs, or oils; used as an ointment and in pills; employed in amulets, talismans, and charms; and used in aphrodisiacs and fertility potions.

Medicinally, urine has unusual properties. It contains ammonia, which can neutralize acids, and is usually free from bacteria, thus has disinfectant properties. Women have drunk urine from their husbands to speed up childbirth or have been given their own urine to relieve hysteria. Male urine contains androsterone, a male hormone, and it has long been believed that drinking one’s own urine improves health and virility. Moraji Desai, former prime minister of India, openly admitted to drinking a small quantity of his own urine each morning for health reasons.

USSR See RUSSIAUsui, Mikao (1865–1926)

Mikao Usui, the creator of the Reiki system of healing, a Japanese healing discipline that became a global phenomena during the years of the New Age Movement, was born on August 15, 1865, in Yago, Yamagata district, Gifu Prefecture, Japan. As a young man he married Sadako Suzuki, with whom he fathered two children. For a while he was associated with a Japanese Spiritualist group, Rei Jyutsu Kai, whose headquarters was west of Kyoto at the base of Kurama Kai, a holy mountain. However, he spent most of his life as a Buddhist. He completed the study and reflection that led to his creation of Reiki in 1914. Then, following a mystical experience he had while meditating on Kurama, he was led to found an organization, Usui Reiki Ryoho Gakkai, to disseminate the teachings and practice of Reiki.

Reiki, a Japanese word roughly translated as “universal energy,” is a healing system based upon the subtle energy system (variously called qi, chi, or ki) within the human body as developed in Taoist China. It is the same system that underlies acupuncture, and pictures energy flowing through the body vertically from the head downward through a set of channels or meridians. The Reiki system teaches a method of attuning to the energy and assisting its flow in the body of the patient.

After developing Reiki, Usui worked in a poorer section of Kyoto for several years, but around 1921 moved to the Harajaju section of Tokyo. There he set up a school/clinic. His students would move into the school and work with Usui until they had learned the system, though occasionally he traveled to other parts of the country to teach. Anticipating a practice later popularized in the New Age Movement, Usui is remembered as using crystals in his healing work. He taught the Reiki system to some 2,000 students, several of whom opened clinics and centers around the country. Usui also wrote a brief handbook which included a description of Reiki healing (though without mentioning any of the particulars of the method), the answers to some frequently asked questions, and some poems composed by the emperor designed to advise people on a worthy life.

Usui died on March 9, 1926, of a stroke. He was buried at Saihoji Temple, a traditional Buddhist temple in a Tokyo suburb. Leadership of Usui Reiki Ryoho Gakkai was passed to a Mr. Ushida, and continues to the present. Among his last students was Dr. Chujiro Hayashi, a retired naval officer. He in turn taught Ms. Hawayo Takata, a Japanese-American who had traveled to Japan in the mid-1930s to seek help for her failing health. Hayashi named her his successor. Toward the end of her life, she initiated the first non-Japanese into Reiki and through the Reiki Masters she initiated, Reiki became a global phenomenon.

Sources:

Petter, Frank Arjava. Reiki Fire. Twin Lakes, Wis.: Lotus Light Publications, 1997.

———. Reiki: The Legacy of Dr. Usui. Twin Lakes, Wis.: Lotus Light Publications, 1998.

V

Valentine, Basil

This German adept in alchemical philosophy is commonly supposed to have been born at Mayence toward the close of the fourteenth century. As a young man he became a Roman Catholic priest and entered the Abbey of St. Peter, at Erfurt. He eventually became its prior, but otherwise very little is known concerning him, and even the date of his death is not known. His very existence is believed to be mythical by some authorities.

He appears to have been a very modest person, for according to Olaus Borrichius, the author of De Ortu et Progressu Chemicæ, Valentine hid all the manuscripts of his writings inside one of the pillars of the Abbey Church where they might have remained for an indefinite period, but they were discovered during a thunderstorm, when a flash of lightning dislodged them from their curious hiding place. Valentine's reluctance for his work to be known may have been prompted by fear of the Inquisition discovering his researches in alchemy.

Valentine's works in alchemy certainly mark him as a very shrewd man and a capable scientist. Unlike much other medieval literature, his treatises were not all in Latin, some of them being in high Dutch and others in German. Prominent among those in his own language is The Triumphal Chariot of Antimony, first published at Leipzig in 1624. In this work, Valentine extolled antimony as an excellent medicine. The volume also embodies a lengthy metrical treatise on the philosophers' stone, the writer contending that whoever should discover and use this must do charitable deeds, mortify the flesh, and pray without ceasing. Among the alchemist's further writings are Apocalypsis Chymica, De Microcosmo degue Magno Mundi Mysterio et Medecina Hominis and Practica unâ cum duodecim Clavibus et Appendice. All these were originally published in Germany at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and various passages in them demonstrate that the author understood the distillation of brandy and was acquainted with the method of obtaining hydrochloric acid from saltwater. Reverting to his faith in antimony, he has been credited with having been the first to extract this from sulphuret.

Valiantine, George (ca. 1874– ?)

Controversial direct voice medium of Williamsport, New York. He was a small manufacturer when at the age of 43 his mediumship was discovered by accident. At a hotel where he was staying he heard distinct raps on the door. No physical agency could be detected and he was deeply puzzled. A lady acquaintance who was familiar with Spiritualism later persuaded him to hold a séance.

The result was surprising. His deceased brother-in-law, Bert Everett, claimed to be present and rapped out that the spirits for a long time had been trying to attract Valiantine's attention. "Everett" then instructed Valiantine to make a cabinet. One evening, the medium went into trance and "Bert Everett" appeared in a materialized form. But direct voice communications became the chief feature of the séances as Valiantine's organism appeared to lend itself to this manifestation. "Bert Everett" found assistants in other controls: "Dr. Barnett," who often gave medical prescriptions, "Hawk Chief" and "Kokum," two Native Americans with booming voices and "Black Foot," another Native American, the last usually speaking in deep tones from the center of the floor.

In 1923 The Scientific American of New York offered a prize of $2,500 for the production of genuine physical phenomena. Valiantine was one of the mediums tested. Gardner Murphy of Columbia University and Kenneth Andrews of the New York World visited him at Wilkes-Barre for two preliminary sittings. Both sittings were successful and they returned with an initial favorable impression. Thereupon Valiantine came to New York.

During his first two séances before the committee of The Scientific American, eight distinct spirits manifested and spoke to the sitters. For the third séance, an electrical control apparatus had been secretly fixed to the medium's chair. It was meant to disclose to observers in another room whether the medium left his chair during the séance, under the cover of darkness, to reach for the trumpet. The apparatus did not register the medium's full weight for fifteen seconds on one occasion and from 1–14 seconds on other occasions.

For this reason, although the voices admittedly came from high in the air and carried on prolonged conversations, the result, in the report published in the July 1923 issue of The Scientific American, was ruled out as evidence. Over the construction of the report, which conveyed the impression that Valiantine was actually caught in fraud, a controversy arose between psychical researcher J. Malcolm Bird and British author H. Dennis Bradley, who pointed out the weaknesses of the report and its important admissions, which, however, were not sufficiently emphasized.

On several occasions, Bradley vigorously defended Valiantine. He met him at Arlena Towers, Ramsey, New York, in the home of Joseph de Wyckoff, a wealthy American financier who had been in close association with Valiantine for some years.

In November 1923, Wyckoff received long scripts from Valiantine which Valiantine said he had obtained through direct writing in his home. They were signed by "Everett" and "Dr. Barnett," and referred to a project involving an expedition to Guiana. Wyckoff discovered by chance that Valiantine's handwriting showed striking resemblance to the spirit scripts and took them to a handwriting expert who pronounced them identical. Wyckoff showed the report to Valiantine. He insisted that he did not do the writings. A test séance was arranged at his own house at Williamsport. Valiantine, at his request, was tied up. The séance was a failure. Wyckoff thereupon broke off his relations with Valiantine.

Not long afterwards, Wyckoff went to Europe. He met Bradley, who convinced him, by showing indirect evidence that he obtained in sittings with Gladys Osborne Leonard, that his evaluation of the Valiantine communications was unjust. Thereupon Wyckoff cabled to Valiantine from Europe and invited him to come and join him. Valiantine arrived in February 1924 and gave séances almost daily for five weeks in Bradley's home.

In the presence of more than fifty prominent people, over one hundred different spirit voices manifested and carried on long conversations in Russian, German, Spanish and even in idiomatic Welsh. Caradoc Evans, the Welsh novelist, spoke with his father's spirit in Cardiganshire Welsh.

But the seeds of suspicion had been sown. Wyckoff soon leveled a second charge against Valiantine, which grew out of a sitting in the St. Regis Hotel in New York on April 19, 1924. When the sitting was closed by the address of "Dr. Barnett," it was revealed that the trumpet had fallen sideways between Valiantine's legs, with the small end against the edge of the chair. As the medium was setting it upright, Wyckoff struck a match and scolded him for his action. Moreover, as Malcolm Bird pointed out in a letter to Light, "examination of the trumpet developed the facts that it was quite warm at the point where a human hand would naturally and conveniently grasp it, and that the mouthpiece was damp."

Bradley answered that this is exactly what would happen with independent voice phenomena. In his own séances, in which a luminous trumpet was seen sailing about the room, at the finish the inside was found moist, according to Bradley, for the simple reason that it is necessary for a spirit to materialize the vocal organs and breathe in order to produce its voice.

The following year, Valiantine paid another visit to England. In March 1925, he gave two test sittings before the Society for Psychological Research at Tavistock Square. Five words were spoken at the first, none at the second. They were considered blank.

Following this failure, Una, Lady Troubridge and Miss Radcliffe Hall of the society attended some sittings in Bradley's house. Later they were joined by Dr. V. J. Woolley, research officer of the society. Eleven distinct and individual voices were heard. Woolley agreed that he heard them and could not account for them. He was also satisfied that the movement of the luminous trumpet in the air was supernormal. Shortly afterward E. J. Dingwall, in company with Dr. Woolley, the other research officer of the society, obtained voices in daylight inside Valiantine's trumpet.

In his reports published in the Journal of the SPR (vol. 26, pp. 70-71; vol. 27, p. 170) and the Proceedings (vol. 36, pp. 52-53), Woolley wrote of these experiences and stated:

"Both of us heard raps which seemed similar to those she [Lady Troubridge] has described, but as I wish only to deal in this account with evidential utterances I do not propose to consider them in further detail. Both of us also heard whispering sounds, apparently in the trumpet, at times when we were convinced that Mr. Valiantine's lips were entirely closed, and I was able also to distinguish the words 'Father Woolley,' but nothing further."

The Coming of Confucius

But the most important phase of Valiantine's mediumship was yet to come. Strange languages were heard in séances in New York, and it was decided to test their nature by inviting a scholar. Dr. Neville Whyment, an authority on Chinese history, philosophy, and ancient literature, who happened to be in New York, was requested by Judge and Mrs. Cannon to come to a séance. He was slightly amused, but accepted. To quote from his notes:

"Suddenly, out of the darkness was heard a weird, crackling, broken little sound, which at once carried my mind straight back to China. It was the sound of a flute, rather poorly played, such as can be heard in the streets of the Celestial Land but nowhere else. Then followed in a low, but very audible voice the words 'K'ung-fu T'zu.' Few persons, except Chinese, could pronounce the name correctly as the sounds cannot be represented in English letters. The idea that it might be Confucius himself never occurred to me. I had imagined that it might be somebody desirous of discussing the life and philosophy of the great Chinese teacher."

When, however, correct personal information was given, Whyment decided to test the matter. He said: "There is among your writings a passage written wrongly; should it not read thus?" At this point, Whyment began to quote as far as he knew, that is to say, to about the end of the first line. At once the words were taken out of his mouth, and the whole passage was recited in Chinese, exactly as it is recorded in the standard works of reference. After a pause of about fifteen seconds, the passage was again repeated, this time with certain alterations which gave it a new meaning. "Thus read," said the voice, "does not its meaning become plain?" Previous to the voice of "Confucius," Whyment heard a Sicilian chant and conversed with one of the controls, "Cristo d'Angelo," in Italian.

At the next séance at which Whyment was present, after having been absent through illness, "Confucius" again manifested and, omitting all ceremonious expressions, referred to Whyment's indisposition, saying "the weed of sickness was growing beside thy door." This metaphor was used in ancient Chinese literature but it is no longer current in the language. Nor was the dialect in which "Confucius" spoke any longer used in the Chinese Empire.

There are only about twelve Chinese sounds of which it can be definitely said that it was known how the Chinese of Confucius' time would have pronounced them. The voice which claimed to be that of Confucius used these archaic sounds correctly. Moreover, there were at that time only about six Chinese scholars in the world whose knowledge would have been equal to the one displayed by the direct voice. None of them was in America at the time.

In 1927, when Valiantine paid a third visit to England further tests of importance took place. Countess Ahlefeldt-Laurvig brought an ancient Chinese shell to a sitting in the apartment of Lord Charles Hope. At the top of the shell, circular folds ended in a small hollow mouthpiece. In China the shell was used as a horn and blown on occasion. The sitters tried it but could produce no sound whatsoever. Yet at one period during the sitting, from high up in the room, the shell horn was blown, and the peculiar notes were rendered in the correct Chinese fashion.

But the most important Chinese test tried was in making a phonograph record of the voice of "Confucius." The attempt was successful. The voice of "Confucius," (who died in 479 B.C.E.) was recorded in 1927 in London. It has curious flute-like tones, which rise and fall, and sometimes break into a peculiar sing-song tone. Whyment could only interpret a few sentences because the voice was faint and became blurred in the recording. But he recognized a number of the peculiar intonations. He could gather the meaning of the recorded speech by the tonal values. The voice was identical with the one he heard in America.

From H. Dennis Bradley's summary of this strange occurrence it is interesting to quote:

"I have heard the K'ung-fu T'ze voice speaking on two or three occasions in archaic Chinese. I have also heard the same voice with its peculiar intonation, speaking to me personally in English. The voice has spoken slowly, but with quite beautiful cadences. It possessed an extraordinary dignity."

New Controversies

In his books Towards the Stars (1942) and The Wisdom of the Gods (1925), Bradley published many important accounts of sittings with Valiantine. On several occasions he heard Valiantine speak simultaneously with the voices. He listened to the voices of the controls of Valiantine in séances with other mediums and heard "Fedá," the control of Gladys Osborne Leonard, and "Cristo d'Angelo," who later associated himself with the Marquis Centurione Scotto, speak through Valiantine.

Including the 1927 period, Bradley conducted over a hundred experiments of which he deemed 95 percent successful.

This high percentage of success was undoubtedly partly due to the powerful direct voice mediumship which Bradley and his wife themselves developed after the first sittings with Valiantine in New York. But the physical manifestation was only part of the evidence. Bradley observed of Valiantine in his book . . . And After (1931),

“He is a man of instinctive good manners but it is essential to state that he is semi-illiterate. He possesses no scholastic education whatever, beyond the ordinary simplicities; he is ill-versed in general conversation and ideas. I mention these facts because many of the communications which have been made in the direct voice under his mediumship have been brilliant in their expressions and culture.”

On April 26, 1929, Valiantine arrived for the fourth time in England from America. He spent one day with Bradley and then left with the Bradleys for Berlin. The sittings were held in a Ms. von Dirksen's house. Bradley considered them comparatively poor in result. Some members of the Berlin Occult Society, for which the séances had been arranged, subsequently claimed imposture and supported their assertions by referring to Bradley's and Valiantine's refusal to permit strict control. These charges were published five months afterward by Dr. Kroner in the Zeitschrift für Parapsychologie. Kroner attended only three of the sittings. Two lady sitters made direct allegations of fraudulent movements on Valiantine's part. However, no definite proof of having caught Valiantine in fraud was brought forward.

In May 1929, Valiantine gave a series of séances at the house of the Marquis Centurione Scotto in Genoa. One of the sittings, held in the presence of psychical researcher Ernesto Bozzano, was rigorously controlled. Valiantine was fastened to his chair and an adhesive bandage secured over his mouth. The knots were sealed, the doors were locked.

The results were excellent. The enthusiasm, however, was soon marred by a charge made by Rossi and Scotto. Rossi claimed to have distinctly felt Valiantine in one of their sittings lean forward and speak into the trumpet. He also said that Castellani caught hold of Mrs. Bradley's hand which was touching the back of his (Castellani's) head. Both of them were furiously indignant and left immediately. Castellani later withdrew his allegation against Mrs. Bradley and Rossi also became wavering. (These allegations charged the Bradleys with being Valiantine's accomplices. Evidence that such was the case would be forthcoming.)

As Bradley pointed out there was a truly bizarre aspect in the situation:

“The Marquis Centurione Scotto, Mr. Rossi and Madame Rossi, unknown before to me or to Valiantine, visit me in England in 1927. The Marquis, to his astonishment, speaks to his [dead] son in Italian. The Marquis and Mrs. Rossi then develop voice mediumship entirely from, and because of, their meeting and initiation with Valiantine. Valiantine then, in 1929, visits them in Italy and is accused of being a fraud. The poet is right when he declares ‘It is a mad world.’”

In 1931, Valiantine was again invited to England. This visit ended on a tragic note. Bradley asked him to devote six evenings to experiments for psychic imprints (molds). Striking previous successes were recorded in the book The Wisdom of the Gods. Since then, famous people whom Bradley knew had died and their original left and right hand imprints were in the possession of palmistry authority Noel Jaquin. Scientifically, therefore, the experiments held potential promise. The claimed spirits of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Lord Dewar, and Sir Henry Segrave all apparently complied with Bradley's eager request, but the plastic substance used in the séances, unknown to Valiantine, was chemically prepared. A stain was found on Valiantine's elbow and expert examination disclosed that the spirit thumbprint of “Sir Arthur Conan Doyle” was exactly similar to the print of Valiantine's big toe on his right foot, a spirit thumbprint of “Lord Dewar” to that of Valiantine's left big toe, a spirit fingerprint of “Sir Henry Segrave” to the print of Valiantine's middle finger and another spirit impression to that of Valiantine's elbow.

antine's middle finger and another spirit impression to that of Valiantine's elbow.

Ex-Chief Detective Inspector Bell, the head of the fingerprint department at New Scotland Yard, declared that in a court of law the resemblance would be sufficient to hang a man charged with murder. According to Bradley, when Valiantine was confronted with this evidence, he broke down completely and sobbed. He would not, however, admit fraud. His only answer to questions was: “I cannot understand it.”

Bradley believed that the rapid accumulation of money and fame as a professional medium did not have a beneficial effect upon Valiantine's character. He found that he had progressively changed, becoming a conceited and arrogant man. Yet “his reason for attempting these imprint frauds will remain incomprehensible. He received no money from me, and for him to imagine that in the presence of imprint experts he could commit palpable fraud and escape detection was a sign of sheer lunacy.”

Besides Valiantine, his controls were also compromised, as on the night, just near the end of the sitting, when “Bert Everett” spoke in his usual shrill tones, announcing that an imprint had been made which was excellent. Mr. X., with whom Valiantine stayed during the visit, obtained the fingerprint of “Walter Stinson,” control of the American medium Mina Crandon (known as “Margery”). This print was identified by Noel Jaquin as identical to that of the middle finger of Valiantine's left hand.

After the exposure, Valiantine gave twelve séances to Dr. Vivian. The report stated that while two voices were speaking, Valiantine was simultaneously heard to draw the attention of the sitters to the two voices. Surgeon Admiral Nimmo had two sittings in daylight. The voice that he heard to come distinctly from within the trumpet gave intelligent and evidential communication. In the presence of a second doctor, the voices were heard again, speaking distinctly and intelligently. During the phenomena, the doctors kept Valiantine's face under acute observation but they did not discover any movement whatever on it.

The experiences of Whyment with the voice of “Confucius” came before the Society for Psychical Research in 1927. Whyment delivered a lecture, played the phonograph record of the voice, and submitted his account of twelve séances. No action was taken. Thereupon the records were the subject of a book by Whyment, published in 1931 under the title Psychic Adventures in New York. In Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research (vol. 40, pt. 125), the report of Lord Charles Hope on his sittings in 1927 concluded: “I was disappointed at the lack of evidence for survival which the voices had given me. I was left uncertain whether Valiantine was a genuine medium or not.” (For other cases of imprints and molds, see plastics.)

Sources:

Bradley, H. Dennis. . . . And After. London: T. Werner Laurie, 1931.

———. Towards the Stars. London: T. Werner Laurie, 1924.

———. The Wisdom of the Gods. London: T. Werner Laurie, 1925.

Whyment, Neville. Psychic Adventures in New York. London: Morley & Mitchell, 1931.

Valiente, Doreen (1922–1999)

Doreen Valiente, poetess and one of the founders of modern Wicca, was born on January 4, 1922, in London, England. During World War II (1939–45) she married a soldier who had been wounded fighting for the Free French and had been sent to England to recuperate from his wounds. Her rise out of obscurity began in 1952 when she was introduced to Gerald B. Gardner, who was in the process of creating a new Goddess-oriented religion that he called Witchcraft. Following her initiation into the Craft, she worked with Gardner to perfect the rituals he had assembled. Among her most important contributions was a poetic piece called "The Charge to the Goddess." After four years with Gardner, she left to become the priestess of her own coven, and in 1962 authored her first book, a small volume describing the new Wicca religion. In 1964 she accepted a second Witchcraft initiation from Robert Cochrane.

Valiente worked quietly through the 1960s but became an object of controversy in the 1970s as Wicca emerged as a popular counterculture religion and various researchers began to explore the literary origins of the Pagan rituals. This controversy grew in the 1980s after Gardner's papers were sold to Ripley's Believe It or Not. The papers indicated that Gardner had not inherited the Witchcraft rituals, but had created them with the assistance of various people, especially Valiente.

Valiente began to emerge into her own in the 1970s when she wrote a set of popular books on Witchcraft, An ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present (1973), Natural Magic (1975), and Witchcraft for Tomorrow (1978). Then, as the controversy on Gardner heated up, and speculations concerning her own role in the development of the Gardnerian rituals were rife, she published her account of the story confirming much of what had been said about the discontinuity of Gardner's work with any folk survivals of the Craft from previous centuries. At the same time, she documented one of the major aspects of Gardner's story, that he had been initiated into Witchcraft in 1939 by a woman named Dorothy Clutterbuck. Some had speculated that Clutterbuck had never existed. Valiente tracked her birth and death records and found a copy of her will. All of this material was included in her most important book, The Rebirth of Witchcraft (1989). Besides being a significant contribution to modern religious history, the book established her place in the creation of modern Wicca.

During the last decade of her life, Valiente was widely acknowledged as a matriarch within the Wiccan community internationally though she lived quietly and made few public appearances. She died on September 1, 1999.

Sources:

- Valiente, Doreen. An ABC of Witchcraft Past and Present. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1973.
- . Natural Magic. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1975.
- . The Rebirth of Witchcraft. Custer, Wash.: Phoenix Publishing, 1989.
- . Where Witchcraft Lives. London: Aquarian Press, 1962.
- . Witchcraft for Tomorrow. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1978.

Valkhoff, Marius (1905– ?)

Professor of Romance studies who investigated areas of parapsychology. He was born on January 7, 1905, at Zwolle, the Netherlands. He studied at the University of Amsterdam (D.Litt., 1931), taught at Amsterdam University for many years (1932–1950), and then moved to South Africa to become head of the Department of Romance Studies and a professor of French at the University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa. In South Africa he became chair of the South African Society for Psychical Research and published various articles on parapsychology in Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie and various publications of the South African Society for Psychical Research. He experimented with psychokinesis and with drug-induced states related to extrasensory perception.

Sources:

- Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Vallee, Jacques Francis (1939–)

French scientist and authority on Unidentified Flying Objects. He was born September 24, 1939, in Pontoise, France and attended the Sorbonne (B.S. mathematics, 1959), Lille University (M.S. astrophysics, 1961), and Northwestern University (Ph.D. computer science, 1967). He organized a computer company in northern California, and became a member of the editorial board of Telecommunications Policy.

While at Northwestern he became an associate of J. Allen Hynek and authored two important works in ufology, Anatomy of a Phenomenon (1965) and Challenge to Science: The UFO Enigma (1966). Vallee was quickly hailed as one of the most important theorists in the field and was said to be the original of the character "Lacombe" in Steven Spielberg's popular movie Close Encounters of the Third Kind.

Several years later, Vallee released Passport to Magonia (1969) in which he directed attention to the similarity of UFO reports to folklore. This volume was followed by others in the 1970s which tied some of his speculations concerning the non-physical nature of UFOs to political conspiracy theories and occultism. The Invisible College (1975) and Messengers of Deceit (1979) largely marginalized Vallee in the ufological community. There he remained through most of the 1980s, but he returned to the center with Confrontations (1990), an account of investigations of UFO-related deaths and various physical evidence cases.

Sources:

- Hynek, J. Allen and Jacques Vallee. The Edge of Reality. Chicago: Regnery, 1975.
- Vallee, Jacques. Anatomy of a Phenomenon: Unidentified Objects in Space, A Scientific Appraisal. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1965.
- . The Invisible College. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1975.
- . Messengers of Deception. Berkeley, Calif.: And/Or Press, 1979.
- . Passport to Magonia. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1969. Reprint, Chicago: Contemporary Books, 1993.
- . UFO Chronicles of the Soviet Union. New York: Ballantine, 1992.
- Vallee, Jacques, and Janine Vallee. Challenge to Science; The UFO Enigma. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1966.

Vambéry, Arminius (1832–1913)

Hungarian historian and world traveler who may have communicated to author Bram Stoker the facts and legends concerning the real Prince Dracula (Vlad V), who supplied the inspiration for Stoker's famous occult thriller. Stoker and Vambéry met at the Beefsteak Club on April 30, 1890, after a performance of Henry Irving in the play The Dead Heart, and also two years later at Trinity College, Dublin, where Vambéry was presented with an honorary degree.

Sources:

- Adler, Lory, and Richard Dalby. The Dervish of Windsor Castle. London: Bachman & Turner, 1979.
- Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: An Encyclopedia of the Undead. Detroit: Gale Research, 1994.
- Vambéry, Arminius. The Story of My Struggles: The Memoirs of Arminius Vambéry. 2 vols. New York, 1904; London: T. F. Unwin, 1905.

Vampire

Russian vampir, South Russian upuir, probably from the root pi, to drain, with the prefix va, or av. A dead person who returns in spirit form from the grave for the purpose of sucking the blood of living persons, or a living sorcerer who takes a special form for destructive purpose. Webster's International Dictio- nary defines a vampire as “a blood-sucking ghost or reanimated body of a dead person; a soul or re-animated body of a dead person believed to come from the grave and wander about by night sucking the blood of persons asleep, causing their death.”

The belief in vampires is an ancient one. It was found in ancient India, Babylonia, Greece, and for a time accepted by early Christians. The conception of the vampire was common among Slavonic peoples, especially in the Balkan countries and in Hungary, Bohemia, Moravia, and Silesia.

In these territories from 1730 to 1735, there was a claimed epidemic of vampirism, but it was by no means confined there. In Russia and the Ukraine it was believed that vampires were generally wizards or sorcerers, but in Bulgaria and Serbia it was thought that any corpse over which a cat or a dog jumped or over which a bird flew was liable to become a vampire. In Greece, a vampire was known as a broncolata or bourkabakos, which was identified with the Slavonic name for “werewolf,” vl-kodlak, or vukodlak. The vampire, too, was often supposed to steal the heart of his victim and to roast it over a slow fire, thus causing interminable amorous longings.

Marks of Vampirism

Vampirism is said to be epidemic in character: where one instance is discovered it is almost invariably followed by several others. It is believed that the victim of a vampire pines away and dies and becomes in turn a vampire after death, and so duly infects others.

After the disinterment of a suspected vampire, various well-known signs are looked for by experienced persons. Thus, if several holes about the breadth of a man's finger are observed in the soil above the grave, the vampire character of its occupant may be suspected. The corpse is usually found with wide-open eyes, ruddy, life-like complexion and lips, a general appearance of freshness, and shows no signs of corruption.

It may also be found that the hair and nails have grown as in life. On the throat, two small livid marks may be observed. The coffin is also very often full of blood, the body has a swollen and gorged appearance, and the shroud is frequently half-devoured. The blood contained in the veins of the corpse is found, on examination, to be in a fluid condition as in life, and the limbs are pliant and have none of the rigidity of death.

Examples of Vampirism

Many tales of vampirism have been recorded. Charles Ferdinand de Schertz, in his work Magia Posthuma, printed at Olmutz in 1706, related several stories of apparitions of this sort.

One, among others, was of a herdsman of the village of Blow near the town of Kadam in Bohemia, who visited several persons who all died within eight days.

At last, the inhabitants of Blow dug up the herdsman's body and fixed it in the ground with a stake driven through it. The man, even in this condition, laughed at the action of the people about him and told them they were very obliging to furnish him with a stick with which to defend himself.

The same night, he extricated himself from the stake, frightened several persons by appearing to them, and caused the deaths of many more individuals. He was then delivered into the hands of the hangman, who put him into a cart in order to burn him outside the town. As they went along, the carcass shrieked in the most hideous manner and moved as if it were alive, and upon being again run through with a stake, it gave a loud cry, and a great quantity of fresh blood issued from the wound. At last, the body was burned to ashes.

Augustine Calmet, in his Dissertation on Vampires appended to his Dissertation upon the Apparitions of Angels, Demons, and Ghosts (English translation, 1759), gave several instances of vampirism:

“It is now about fifteen years since a soldier, who was quartered in the house of a Haidamack peasant, upon the frontiers of Hungary, saw, as he was at the table with his landlord, a stranger come in and sit down by them. The master of the house and the rest of the company were strangely terrified, but the soldier knew not what to make of it. The next day the peasant died, and, upon the soldier's enquiring into the meaning of it, he was told that it was his landlord's father who had been dead and buried above ten years that came and sat down at table, and gave his son notice of his death.

“The soldier soon propagated the story through his regiment, and by this means it reached the general officers, who commissioned the count de Cabrerias . . . to make an exact enquiry into the fact. The count, attended by several officers, a surgeon, and a notary, came to the house, and took the deposition of all the family, who unanimously swore that the spectre was the landlord's father, and that all the soldier had said was strictly true. The same was also attested by all the inhabitants of the village.

“In consequence of this the body of the spectre was dug up, and found to be in the same state as if it has been but just dead. . . . The count de Cabrerias ordered its head to be cut off, and the corpse to be buried again. He then proceeded to take depositions against other spectres of the same sort, and particularly against a man who had been dead above thirty years, and had made his appearance there several times in his own house at meal-time. At his first visit he had fastened upon the neck of his own brother, and sucked his blood; at his second, he had treated one of his children in the same manner; and the third time, he fastened upon a servant of the family, and all three died upon the spot.

“Upon this evidence, the count gave orders that he should be dug up, and being found, like the first, with his blood in a fluid state, as if he had been alive, a great nail was drove through his temples, and he was buried again. The count ordered a third to be burnt, who had been dead above sixteen years, and was found guilty of murdering two of his own children by sucking their blood.

“The gentleman who acquainted me with all these particulars, had them from the count de Cabrerias himself, at Fribourg in Brisgau, in the year 1730.”

Other cases alluded to by Calmet are as follows:

“In the part of Hungary . . . on the other side of the Tibiscus, . . . the people named Heydukes have a notion that there are dead persons, called by them vampires, which suck the blood of the living, so as to make them fall away visibly to skin and bones, while the carcasses themselves, like leeches, are filled with blood to such a degree that it comes out at all the apertures of their body. This notion has lately been confirmed by several facts.

“About five years ago, an Heyduke, named Arnold Paul, an inhabitant of Medreiga, was killed by a cart full of hay that fell upon him. About thirty days after his death, four persons died suddenly, with all the symptoms usually attending those who are killed by vampires. It was then remembered that this Arnold Paul had frequently told a story of his having been tormented by a Turkish vampire, in the neighbourhood of Cassova, upon the borders of Turkish Servia (for the notion is that those who have been passive vampires in their life-time become active ones after death; or, in other words, that those who have had their blood sucked become suckers in their turn) but that he had been cured by eating some of the earth upon the vampire's grave, and by rubbing himself with his blood. This precaution, however, did not hinder him from being guilty himself after his death; for, upon digging up his corpse forty days after his burial, he was found to have all the marks of an arch-vampire. His body was fresh and ruddy, his hair, beard, and nails were grown, and his veins were full of fluid blood, which ran from all parts of his body upon the shroud that he was buried in. The hadnagy, or bailiff of the village, who was present at the digging up of the corpse, and was very expert in the whole business of vampirism, ordered a sharp stake to be drove quite through the body of the deceased, and to let it pass through his heart, which is attended with a hideous cry from the carcass, as if it had been alive. This ceremony being performed, they cut off the head, and burnt the body to ashes. After this, they proceeded in the same manner with the four other persons that died of vampirism, lest they also should be troublesome. But all these executions could not hinder this dreadful prodigy from appearing again last year, at the distance of five years from its first breaking out. In the space of three months, seventeen persons of different ages and sexes died of vampirism, some without any previous illness, and others after languishing two or three days. Among others, it was said, that a girl, named Stanoska, . . . went to bed in perfect health, but awoke in the middle of the night, trembling, and crying out that the son of the Heyduke Millo, who died about nine weeks before, had almost strangled her while she was asleep. From that time she fell into a languishing state, and died at three days' end. Her evidence against Millo's son was looked upon as a proof of his being a vampire, and, upon digging up his body, he was found to be such.

"At the consultation of the principal inhabitants of the place, . . . it was considered how it was possible that the plague of vampirism should break out afresh, after the precautions that had been taken some years before: and, at last, it was found out that the original offender, Arnold Paul, had not only destroyed the four persons mentioned above, but had killed several beasts, which the late vampires, and particularly the son of Millo, had fed upon. Upon this foundation a resolution was taken to dig up all the persons that had died within a certain time. Out of forty were found seventeen, with all the evident tokens of vampirism; and they had all stakes drove through their hearts, their heads cut off, their bodies burnt, and their ashes thrown into the river."

Methods of Extirpation

The commonest methods of extirpation of vampires are beheading the suspected corpse, taking out the heart, impaling the corpse with a white-thorn stake (in Russia an aspen), and burning it. Sometimes more than one or all of these precautions is taken.

Instances are on record where the graves of as many as thirty or forty persons have been disturbed during the course of an epidemic of suspected vampirism and their occupants impaled or beheaded.

Persons who dread the visits or attacks of a vampire sleep with a wreath made of garlic round the neck, as garlic is supposed to be especially obnoxious to the vampire.

When impaled, the vampire is usually said to emit a dreadful cry, but it has been pointed out that intestinal gas may be forced through the throat by the entry of the stake into the body, and that this may account for the sound.

The method of discovering a vampire's grave in Serbia was to place a virgin boy upon a coal-black stallion which had never served a mare and to mark the spot that the horse refused to pass. An officer quartered in Wallachia wrote to Calmet, giving him an instance of this method.

A Bulgarian belief was that a wizard or sorcerer may entrap a vampire by placing some food for which the vampire has a partiality in a bottle. When the vampire enters in the shape of fluff, the sorcerer can seal up the flask and throw it into the fire.

Scientific Views of Vampirism

The British custom of piercing a suicide's body with a stake would appear to be a remnant of the belief in vampirism. Such beliefs were also to be seen in the Polynesian tui, the Malayan hantu penyardin (a dog-headed water demon), and the kephn of the Karens, which devoured human souls.

The English anthropologist E. B. Tylor considered vampires to be "causes conceived in spiritual form to account for specific facts of wasting disease." The Russian folklorist Alexander N. Afansyev regarded them as thunder gods and spirits of the storm, who sleep during winter in cloud coffins and rise again in spring.

Calmet's difficulty in accepting vampires was that he could not understand how a spirit could leave its grave and return there with matter in the form of blood, leaving no evidence that the surface of the earth above the grave had been stirred. But this view might be combated by the theory of the precipitation of matter.

In modern times, it is easy to understand how individuals in an unrecognized condition of cataleptic trance might have been prematurely buried alive and upon regaining consciousness have struggled to escape their horrible plight. Their bodies would have exhibited many of the signs associated with vampires.

It is now also generally known that some individuals suffer from a morbid fascination with human blood, and it would have been easy in the past to associate such unnatural appetite with vampirism. The infamous Countess Elizabeth Bathory of Transylvania (d. 1614) was reputed to have murdered nearly 700 young women in the belief that their blood would keep her young.

No doubt the observed activities of the various types of vampire bats (Desmodus Rufus, Didemus Yungi, Diphylla Caudata, Desmodus Rotunda) in sucking blood from cattle and horses have helped to spread legends of vampires. The vampire bat drinks 20 ccs of blood per day and has been known to attack human beings. It also spreads rabies, thus enhancing stories of a vampire plague.

Psychic Theories of Vampires

Some individuals seem to have the ability to draw some kind of psychic energy from others. Every stage performer or public speaker is aware of the rapport which exists between performer and audience, and many have become expert at gaining confidence and power through some instinctive techniques of centralizing and transforming psychic or nervous energy.

The common experience of out-of-the-body travel or astral projection has sometimes been associated with visits to other individuals, as well as contacts with frightening elementals on the astral plane. Some occultists appear to have mastered techniques by which they can astrally project, and visit their victims while asleep and drain their vitality from them.

During the nineteenth century, the French Spiritualist Z. J. Piérart attempted to reconcile the theory of premature burial with astral projection by those who died after being buried alive. He wrote:

"Poor dead cataleptics, buried as if really dead in cold and dry spots where morbid causes are incapable of effecting the destruction of their bodies, the astral spirit enveloping itself with a fluidic ethereal body, is prompted to quit the precincts of its tomb and to exercise on living bodies acts peculiar to physical life, especially that of nutrition, the result of which, by a mysterious link between soul and body which spiritualistic science will some day explain, is forwarded to the material body lying still within the tomb, and the latter is thus helped to perpetuate its vital existence."

Adolphe d'Assier, in his book Posthumous Humanity (1887), admitted that the body of the vampire may be dead but the spirit earthbound and obsessed with the idea that the physical body must be saved from dissolution. Consequently the dense astral body feeds on human victims and, by some mysterious process, conveys the blood into the tomb.

Both speculations furnish explanations of the attestation of numerous ancient chronicles that fresh blood was found in the exhumed and uncorrupted body of dead people suspected of vampirism.

Following the occult boom of the 1950s, Bram Stoker's powerful but much neglected masterpiece Dracula was taken up again, examined by critics and found to be as full of vitality as during Stoker's own lifetime. Almost by contagion, it has generated a plethora of horror movies, plays, and other vampire thrillers.

In Britain, the Dracula Society, with its general interest in Gothic themes, pioneered tourist expeditions to Transylvania, and in Stoker's Ireland, a Bram Stoker Society was founded to honor a much neglected Irishman. Through the 1980s and 1990s, the most active organization was the Count Dracula Fan Club, headquartered in New York City. However, in 1999, the club announced its closing.

Much of the interest in vampires has also been carried by fan clubs that have grown out of television series. "Dark Shadows" fandom, from the 1960s, had retained its vitality for over 30 years and still attracts 400-600 members to its annual meeting. Another set of fan clubs sprung up from "Forever Knight," the series featuring a vampire policeman from Toronto. As the century ended, vampire fandom received an unexpected boost from the successful series, "Buffy the Vampire Slayer."

In the 1990s, interest in vampires shifted largely to the Internet where thousands of sites cover all aspects of the vampire world. Over 2000 sites alone were devoted just to the "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" show in 1999. Vampire Junction, formerly a fan magazine, was one of the first to make the transition to the Internet and emerged as one of the most complete guides to vampires. (See also Dracula; Magia Posthuma; Monsters)

Sources:

Auerbach, Nina. Our Vampires, Ourselves. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995.

Barber, Paul. Vampires, Burial, & Death: Folklore & Reality. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1988.

Burton, Sir Richard. Vikram and the Vampire, or Tales of Hindu Devilry. London: Tiltson & Edwards, 1832. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1969.

Calmet, Augustine. Dissertations Upon the Apparitions of Angels, Demons, and Ghosts, and Concerning . . . Vampires. Paris: De Burel'aine, 1746. Reprint, London, 1759.

———. The Phantom World; or, The History and Philosophy of Spirits, Apparitions, & Co. 2 vols. London: Richard Bentley, 1850; Philadelphia: A. Hart, 1850.

De Schertz, Charles F. Magia Posthuma. Olmutz, 1706.

Dresser, Norine. American Vampires: Fans, Victims & Practitioners. New York: W. W. Norton, 1989.

Dundas, Alan. The Vampire: A Casebook. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1998.

Ennemoser, Joseph. The History of Magic. 2 vols. 1854. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1970.

Frayling, Christopher, ed. Vampyres: From Lord Byron to Count Dracula. London: Faber and Faber, 1991.

Glut, Donald F. The Dracula Book. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1975.

Harenburg, Johann C. Von Vampyren. N.p., 1739.

Hartmann, Franz. Premature Burial. London: Swann Sonnenschein, 1896.

Hertz, Wilhelm. Der Werwolf. Stuttgart, 1862.

Introvigne, Massimo. La stripe de Dracula: Indagine sul vampirismo dall'antichità ai nostri giorni. Milan: Arnoldo Mondadori Editore, 1997.

Mackenzie, Andrew. Dracula Country. London: Arthur Barker, 1977.

Marigny, Jean. Vampires: Restless Creatures of the Night. New York: Abrams, 1994.

McNally, Raymond T. Dracula Was a Woman. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1983.

McNally, Raymond T., and Radu Florescu. In Search of Dracula: A True History of Dracula and Vampire Legends. New York: New York Graphic Society, 1972. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

Mannhardt, W. Über Vampirismus. (see vol. 4 of Zeitschrift für Deutsche Mythologie und Sittenkunde) Göttingen, 1858.

Masters, Anthony. The Natural History of the Vampire. London: Ruper Hart-Davis, 1972; London: Mayflower 1974.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: The Encyclopedia of the Undead. 2nd edition. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1999.

———. The Vampire Gallery. Detroit: Visible Ink Press, 1998.

———. Video Hound's Vampires on Video. Detroit, Visible Ink Press, 1996.

Miller, Elizabeth. Dracula: Sense and Nonsense. Westcliffe-on-Sea, UK: Desert Island Books, 1998.

———. Dracula: The Shade and the Shadow. Westcliffe-on-Sea, UK: Desert Island Books, 1998.

———. Reflection on Dracula: Ten Essays. White Rock, BC: Transylvanian Press, 1997.

Perkowski, Jan I., ed. Vampires of the Slavs. Cambridge, Mass.: Slavica Press, 1976.

Ralston, W. R. S. Russian Folk Tales. London: Smith, Elder, 1873.

———. The Songs of the Russian People. London, 1872. Reprint, New York: Haskell House, 1970.

Ranfft, Michael. De Masticatione Mortuorum in Tumulis. Leipzig, 1728.

Rickles, Laurence A. The Vampire Lectures. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1999.

Rohr, Philip. De Masticatione Mortuorum. N.p., 1679.

Ronay, Gabriel. The Dracula Myth. London: W. H. Auden, 1972; London: Pan 1975.

Roth, Phyllis A. Bram Stoker. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Senf, Carol A. The Vampire in Nineteenth-Century English Literature. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1988.

Shepard, Leslie. The Dracula Book of Great Vampire Stories. New York: Citadel, 1977.

Summers, Montague. The Vampire, His Kith and Kin. London: Kegan, Paul, 1928; New York: University Books, 1960.

———. The Vampire in Europe. London: Kegan, Paul, 1929; New York: University Books, 1962.

Thompson, R. Campbell. The Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia. 2 vols. London, 1903-04.

Underwood, Peter. The Vampire's Bedside Companion: The Amazing World of Vampires in Fact and Fiction. London: Leslie Frewin, 1972.

Wright, Dudley. The Book of Vampires. 2d ed. London, 1924; Causeway Books, 1973.

Zopfius, Johan Heinrich. Dissertatio de Vampiris Seruiensibus. Halle, 1733.

Vampire Information Exchange

Vampire interest group founded by Eric Held and Dorothy Nixon in 1978. In 1979 they began a newsletter which Held has continued over the years as Nixon moved on to other interests. Held has also published an annual Calendar of Vampire Events and a bibliography of vampire books for its members. For information on membership, write to Eric Held, Dir., P.O. Box 290328, Brooklyn, NY 11229-0328.

Sources:

Held, Eric. The Vampire Bibliography of Fiction and Nonfiction. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Vampire Information Exchange, 1992.

———. 1993 Calendar of Vampire Events. Brooklyn, N.Y.: Vampire Information Exchange, 1992.

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: An Encyclopedia of the Undead. 2nd edition. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

The Vampire Journal

Former publication devoted to the subject of vampires that served as the organ of the now defunct Dracula and Company, a vampire interest group headquartered in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie, Louisiana.

Vampire Quarterly (Magazine)

Magazine devoted to the subject of vampires formerly published from Toms River, New Jersey.

Vampire Studies

Founded in Chicago in 1977 as the Vampire Studies Society by Martin V. Riccardo, the organization was the first vampire fan club to use the word “vampire” in its name (there had previously been several organizations built around Dracula). For several years the society published a Journal of Vampirism. The word “society” was dropped in 1990 and Vampire Studies now exists as a correspondence network and information clearinghouse for people interested in all aspects of vampire lore. Those interested may contact Riccardo at P.O. Box 151, Berwyn, IL 60402-0151.

Sources:

“The Lure of Martin V. Riccardo.” Special issue of The Vampire Information Exchange Newsletter 53 (April 1991).

Melton, J. Gordon. The Vampire Book: An Encyclopedia of the Undead. 2nd edition. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

Riccardo, Martin V. Liquid Dreams of Vampires. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1997.

———. The Lure of the Vampire. Chicago: Adams Press, 1983.

———. Vampires Unearthed. New York: Garland, 1983.

Van Bruhesen, Peter (d. 1571)

A Dutch doctor and astrologer who died at Bruges. He published in that town in 1550 a Grand and Perpetual Almanack in which he scrupulously indicated by the tenets of judicial astrology the correct days for bathing, shaving, haircutting, and so forth. The work caused offense to a certain magistrate of Bruges, a barber by profession, with the result that there appeared against Bruhesen’s volume another Grand and Perpetual Almanack, with the flippant subtitle a scourge for empirics and charlatans. This squib was published by a rival doctor François Rapaert, but Peter Haschaerts, a surgeon and protagonist of astrological science, warmly defended Bruhesen in his Astrological Buckler.

Van Busschbach, J(ohan) G(eorge) (1896–1974)

Dutch Inspector of Schools who was winner of the first McDougall Award for Distinguished Research in Parapsychology for his work in investigating ESP between teachers and pupils in American schools. Van Busschbach was born July 3, 1896, in Amsterdam. He was a primary school teacher (1916–21), teacher in psychology (1927–39), director of training school for teachers (1940–49), and inspector of schools, Amsterdam, (1944–61). He was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association, a council member of the Parapsychologisch Onderzoek (Amsterdam Foundation for Parapsychological Studies), and a member of the Studievereniging voor Psychical Research (Netherlands Society for Parapsychology).

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Van Busschbach, J. G. “A Further Report on an Investigation of ESP in School Children.” Journal of Parapsychology 19 (1955).

———. “An Investigation of ESP Between Teacher and Pupils in American Schools.” Journal of Parapsychology 20 (June 1956).

———. “An Investigation of Extrasensory Perception in School Children.” Journal of Parapsychology 17 (1953).

Van de Castle, Robert L(eon) (1927–)

Clinical psychologist and parapsychologist. He was born on November 16, 1927, at Rochester, New York, and studied at Syracuse University (B.A., 1951), the University of Missouri (M.A., 1953), and the University of North Carolina (Ph.D., 1959). While in North Carolina he was a research associate at the Parapsychology Laboratory at Duke University (1954–55). Following graduation in 1959 he joined the faculty in psychology at the University of Denver where he remained until he became the director of the Sleep and Dream Laboratory at the University of Virginia in 1967. He is now a psychologist at the Blue Ridge Hospital in Charlottesville, Virginia.

While in Denver he did research with members of the Cuna tribe as part of research on whether people from a non-technological society would score significantly on ESP tests. He went on to conduct dream research with Calvin Itall at the Institute of Dream Research in Miami, publishing a joint work The Content Analysis of Dreams (1966). He also studied personality correlates in extrasensory perception and psychokinesis, and conducted experiments relating psychological tests to extrasensory ability, on grants from the Parapsychology Foundation.

He was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association, since 1969 a council member, and was elected its president in 1970.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Van de Castle, Robert L. “Development and Validation of a Perceptual Maturity Scale Using Figure Preferences.” Journal of Consultative Psychology 29 (1965).

———. “An Exploratory Study of Some Personality Correlates Associated with PK Performance.” Journal of the American Society for Psychical Research 52 (1958).

———. “The Facilitation of ESP Through Hypnosis.” American Journal of Clinical & Experimental Hypnosis 12 (1969).

———. “An Investigation of Psi Abilities Among the Cuna Indians of Panama.” Journal of Parapsychology 38 (June 1974).

———. Our Dreaming Mind. New York: Ballantine, 1995.

———. “Psi Abilities in Primitive Groups.” Proceedings of the Parapsychological Association 7 (1970).

Vandermeulen Spirit Indicator

One of various devices invented to facilitate communication with spirits through mechanical means. It consisted of two glass prisms—one plain, the other resinous—fixed face-to-face on a board. Between them hung a very light triangle of wire. The prisms were connected to the positive and negative poles of a dry bell battery.

If the hanging triangle swung out and touched the positive wire, the circuit was closed and the bell rang. The spirits were expected to generate electricity in the prisms. If this was done, the hanging triangle wired to the negative pole would be repelled by the negative prism and attracted to the positive wire. The bell would ring, which was taken as an indication that a spirit desired to communicate, and the observers would rush to the ouija board to obtain the message.

The young inventor died in 1930 before his apparatus could be tested properly, but it was revived by a Mr. Rutot, a Belgian professor and a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences. Rutot claimed that by means of the apparatus he had been able to contact the dead inventor. The apparatus, which came to be known as Rutot’s Spirit Indicator, was described in Revue Métapsychique (May–June, 1930, p. 256), and Rutot’s own experiences were published in the Bulletin du Conseil de Recherches Métapsychiques de Belgique (July 1930). An English-language description of the apparatus, with detailed instructions for construction, was published by Robert J. Strong in his book Spiritual Engineering (1931).

For a detailed report of tests, with photographs, see the chapter “Rutot’s Triangles” in Laboratory Investigations into Psychic Phenomena by Hereward Carrington (n.d.). It was not possible for Carrington to confirm the “instrumental communication with the dead” claimed by Rutot. Mechanical faults were not ruled out, and it was suggested that Rutot’s claimed results may have been due to experimenters with mediumistic or telekinetic powers. (See also electronic voice phenomenon)

Van Eeden, Frederik (1860–1932)

Dutch physician, author, and poet, who was also actively interested in psychiatry and psychical research and was acquainted with Frederic William Henry Myers. He conducted important research with the non-professional British medium Rosina Thompson and also made valuable contributions to the study of dreams. He coined the term “lucid dreams” to denote dreams in which the sleeper is aware of dreaming, i.e., some degree of waking consciousness persists in the dream state, often a preliminary to out-of-the-body (OOB) experiences. He appears to have had some OOB experience himself, since he described it in one of his novels (The Bride of Dreams, 1918). He also obtained cross-correspondences between his own dreams and the trance utterances of “Nelly,” Thompson’s control, while Van Eeden was in Holland and Thompson in England.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Van Eeden, Frederik. “A Study of Dreams.” Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research 26 (1913).

Vanga

The unenrolled members of the Ndembo secret society of the Lower Congo. (See Ndembo)

Van Gelder Kunz, Dora (1904–1999)

American psychic and leader in the Theosophical Society. She was born on April 28, 1904, in Java, where she grew up on her father’s sugar plantation. Here she saw and communed with fairies, unaware that this was a special psychic faculty. At the age of eleven, she left Java for Australia, where she studied with an Anglican priest who also possessed unusual psychic abilities. At the age of twenty-two, she married an American and moved to the United States, where she became president of a corporation concerned with teaching materials, while her husband became head of an educational foundation.

Van Gelder had never been a professional paid medium nor publicized her psychic abilities but instead worked unobtrusively with physicians on difficult cases for diagnostic and healing purposes. She showed a natural ability to see the psychic energy patterns in human beings and their relationship to conditions of health and disease. She also claimed the unusual ability of being able to predict specific illness, sometimes as early as eight months in advance.

She said she never lost her ability to commune with fairy life. When she was a young woman she wrote about her fairy experiences. This early manuscript was revised and published as The Real World of Fairies (1977). She stated that fairy life is still apparent, but becoming less evident with the growing pollution of cities and urban life. She even reported seeing fairies in Central Park, New York.

Van Gelder Kunz died on August 25, 1999.

Sources:

Van Gelder, Dora. The Real World of Fairies. Wheaton, Ill.: Theosophical Publishing House, 1977.

Van Helmont, Jean Baptiste (1577–1644)

Belgian physician, chemist, and physiologist, whose research was associated with occult theories. He was born to an aristocratic family in Brussels. Studying at Louvain, he attained early distinction in mathematics, lecturing on physics at the age of 17. Before he was 22, he had read Hippocrates and the Greek and Arabian authors, had become eminent in the doctrines of Aristotle and Galen, and had practiced medicine, according to Vopiscus and Plempius.

In the year 1599, he received his Ph.D. in medicine. After this, he spent some years in the practice of medicine, but meeting a follower of Paracelsus, he became interested in the theories of chemical medicine to such a degree that he retired to the castle of Vilvorde, near Brussels, to spend the rest of his life in the study of experimental chemistry, on which he wrote various treatises, becoming famous throughout Europe for his scientific knowledge.

He revolutionized medicine as known in his day, turning aside from the theories of Galen and the Arabs, and creating an epoch in the history of physiology, being the first to recognize the functions of the stomach and its relation to the other organs of the body.

Van Helmont’s many and varied experiments led him to deal with aerial fluids, to which he gave the name of gas—carbonic acid gas being his discovery—and it is said that without him the chemistry of steel in all probability would have been unknown to science.

Van Helmont is remembered as an alchemist more than a scientist. Alchemy, with its visions of the elixir of life and the philosophers’ stone, presented itself to him as another field of experiment and research. Although he never pretended to the art of making the transmuting powder, he testified his belief in the transmutation of metals, claiming to have seen the experiment performed many times.

Among other things he became a firm believer in mineral and human magnetism, anticipating Franz Anton Mesmer in almost the very terms of the later exponent of the theory, and basing his argument on the observed sympathy or antagonism that seems to spontaneously arise between individuals and the influence exerted by a firm will over a weak imagination.

In 1609, he retired to Vilvorde, near Brussels, and devoted himself to medical practice and chemical experiments. He declined to leave his retirement, although his fame brought him flattering invitations and offers from the Emperor and the Elector Palatine. Almost unknown to his neighbors, he attended anyone stricken by illness without accepting any fees for his services.

His published writings included: De Magnetica Vulnerum naturali et Legitima Curatione (1621), De aquis Leondiensibus medicatis (1624), Opuscula Medica inaudita (1641), and Febrium doctrina maudita (1642). Some of these were translated into Dutch, French, and German. English translations of his tracts include: A Ternary of Paradoxes; The Magnetick Cure of Wounds, The Nativity of Tartar in Wine, The Image of God in Man (1650), and Deliramenta Catarrihi: or the Incongruities, Impossibilities and Absurdities couched under the vulgar opinion of Defluxions (1650).

He died December 30, 1644.

Van Hoof, Mary Ann (1909–1984)

Mary Ann Van Hoof, who reported apparitions of the Virgin Mary at Necedah, Wisconsin, for a quarter of a century beginning in 1949, was born Mary Ann Bieder on July 31, 1909, in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. She grew up in Kenosha County, Wisconsin, in a German-speaking family and attended school only through the eighth grade. As a young woman she married Godfried Van Hoof, and together they had eight children. They moved to Necedah, Wisconsin, in 1942.

Van Hoof had her initial brief apparition of the Virgin on November 12, 1949, which happened to be the anniversary of the last apparition of a set of appearances by the Virgin that had occurred the previous year in Lipa, Philippines. The following spring, beginning on April 7 (Good Friday), Van Hoof experienced a set of apparitions that called for a large shrine to be established for Marian devotion. Subsequent apparitions occurred on May 28 (Pentecost Sunday), May 29 and 30, and June 6 (Trinity Sunday). By the time of the June apparition, many had heard of Van Hoof seeing the Virgin, and a large crowd gathered. With the announcement that Mary would return on August 15 (marked by Roman Catholics as the feast day of the Assumption of Mary into heaven) and October 1 (the feast day honoring the rosary), the story became news and articles began to appear in newspapers throughout the Midwest.

In the meantime, the local Roman Catholic priest became aware of the apparitions and sent an initial report to his bishop in La Crosse, Wisconsin. The bishop issued an initial statement decrying any sensationalism associated with the apparitions and launched a study of Van Hoof's claims. Van Hoof believed the apparition told her the American Catholics must rededicate themselves to prayer and piety, or the Korean War would be the beginning of the end for America. She also indicated that the Soviets would invade the United States and Alaska would be "the first stepping stone." Prior to the August apparition, the diocesan paper called them into question. In spite of many bishops discouraging the faithful from attending, crowds estimated in the tens of thousands were present for the last two apparitions of 1950. Over the next few years the apparitions continued, and not only did people travel long distances to be present, but several hundred relocated their residence to Necedah. An organization emerged and the shrine that began at the location of the apparitions grew into a set of related shrines.

In 1955 the bishop gave a more definitive ruling. He suggested that Van Hoof's claims to supernatural visitation were false and prohibited all religious worship at the shrine, now named after Mary's appearance as the Shrine of Our Lady of the Holy Rosary, Mediatrix of Peace. Van Hoof and her supporters were disappointed but continued in hope of a reversal of the ruling. Reminiscent of the apparition of Catherine Labouré in 1830, in 1957 Van Hoof was shown the design of a medal for the unity of church, home, and school, which was later struck and distributed.

Finally, in 1975, the bishop of La Crosse placed Van Hoof and her followers under an interdict, one step short of excommunication. They were denied access to all sacraments except confession. The interdict did not stop work at the shrine. Two years later Van Hoof announced plans to build a large sanctuary on her property, which she had inherited when her husband died in 1960.

In 1979, the final break with the Roman Catholic Church came as Van Hoof developed a relationship with Edward Michael Stehlik, the archbishop of a small independent church, the American National Catholic Church. She also pushed ahead with plans to build a home for infants and organized an order of nuns. Stehlik consecrated the shrine, which had grown into a sizable place of pilgrimage, but two years later Stehlik left the shrine. He denounced Van Hoof as a fraud and returned to the Roman Catholic Church. The scandal accompanying Stehlik's departure hurt Van Hoof, but did not affect many who had come to support her apparitions. Her visions of the Virgin continued, the work of the shrine grew, and several books appeared with texts of the apparitions and accounts of Van Hoof by her supporters.

In 1978, Van Hoof married Raymond Hirt. By this time, a pattern of pilgrimages to the shrine on the anniversaries of the 1950 apparitions had been established. Van Hoof died on March 18, 1984. She was buried at the shrine her visions inspired.

Sources:

Revelations and Messages as Given to Mary Ann Van Hoof. 2 vols. Necedah, Wis.: For My God and My Country, Inc., 1971, 1978.

Swan, Henry. My Work at Necedah. 4 vols. Necedah, Wis.: For My God and My Country, Inc., 1959.

Van Peursen, C(ornelis) A(nthonie) (1920–)

Dutch professor of philosophy who has written on parapsychology. He was born July 8, 1920, at Rotterdam, Netherlands. His educational career was interrupted by World War II but he completed his doctorate in 1948 at the University of Leiden. After several years with the Netherlands Committee for the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) (1948–50), he taught successively at the University of Utrecht (1950–53), the University of Groningen (1953–60), and, since 1960, at the University of Leiden. He has shown an interest in physical research and was a member of the editorial board of a Dutch parapsychology journal.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Van Peursen, C. A. Body, Soul, Spirit: A Survey of the Body-Mind Problem. Translated by Hubert H. Hoskins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1966.

———. "Parapsychologie en Wijsgerige Bezinning" (Parapsychology and philosophical reflection). Tijdschrift voor Parapsychologie 1–3 (1959).

———. The Strategy of Culture. n.p.: North-Holland Publishing, 1974.

Van Praagh, James (ca. 1960–)

James Van Praagh, a Spiritualist medium and author of two best-selling books on his experiences with psychic reality, was born into a Catholic family in Bayside, New York, around 1960. As a youth he attended Sacred Heart School. Responding to his mother's wish that he become a priest, he entered a junior seminary, Eymard Preparatory School in Hyde Park, New York. He stayed only one year, having concluded that neither the priesthood nor the Roman Catholic Church were for him. He completed his high school years in a public school.

As a child, Van Praagh had a variety of psychic experiences. One in particular stood out. At the age of eight, he had a vision of a giant hand above his bed one evening. He interpreted it as the Hand of God and from that time forward his belief in God never wavered. Also, on the first anniversary of singer Janis Joplin's death he tried to contact her. Sitting before a candle, he called her spirit to manifest and immediately afterward the flame bent in a most unusual manner.

In 1978 Van Praagh left New York to attend San Francisco State University, where he majored in broadcasting. He hoped for a career in Hollywood as a screenwriter. Following his graduation in 1982, he moved to Los Angeles and took a menial job as he began working his way up. A colleague at his workplace invited him to visit Spiritualist medium Brian Hurst, who told him that one day he would also be a medium. He was intrigued enough with the prediction that he began to pick up books on psychic development and find ways to hone his skills. Within a year he was regularly receiving calls from friends and acquaintances asking him for advice.

Within a short time, he was spending so much of his time doing readings for people who valued his talents that he was forced to make a choice to either drop his spiritual work or his plans for a Hollywood career. He chose to continue with his spirit contact and soon emerged as a Spiritualist medium. Over the years he gave private readings, conducted many development classes, and traveled frequently. He founded Spiritual Horizons in Los Angeles to coordinate his activities.

In 1997, Van Praagh took a step upward with the publication of his first book, Talking to Heaven. The book became a best-seller and he became a public personality as a result of the subsequent radio and television appearances. It was followed by a sequel, Reaching to Heaven (1999), which also became a best-seller. Both books recount some of his more successful experiences of spirit contact, discuss the view of the universe they suggest, and offer means for individuals to develop their own clairvoyance and mediumistic abilities.

Sources:

Van Praagh, James. Reaching to Heaven: A Spiritual Journey through Life and Death. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1999.

———. Talking to Heaven: A Medium's Message on Life After Death. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1997.

Van Tassel, George W. (1910–1978)

Early flying saucer contactee and author of the pioneering flying saucer volume I Rode in a Flying Saucer (1952). As people responded to his claims of extraterrestrial contact and other contactees emerged, Van Tassel organized the Giant Rock Space Convention, held annually at Giant Rock Airport, near Yucca Valley, California. Van Tassel was proprietor of the airport and had some background in aeronautics.

Van Tassel was born on March 11, 1910, in Jefferson, Ohio. He went into aviation as a young man and worked for both Howard Hughes and Lockheed. He moved to the desert in 1947 where he opened a restaurant, an airport, and a dude ranch. In 1952 he began to receive psychic messages from extraterrestrials, primarily from a group of people who made up what was called the Ashtar Command. The Ashtar Command operated very much like the Masters of theosophical traditions, but were seen as authorities in this solar system.

Over the years Van Tassel claimed to have continued contact with the Ashtar Command telepathically. He often went into a trance in his circle of friends and communicated messages allegedly from UFO entities. Such communications were published in his journal, Proceedings of the College of Universal Wisdom, and became the basis for future books.

He constructed a round domed building called an "Integraton" at Giant Rock, based on instructions from his outer space contacts. The Integraton was designed to assist the development of antigravity and time travel. The Integraton was never finished.

Van Tassel also published Into this World and Out Again; a modern proof of the origin of humanity and its retrogression from the original creation of man. Verified by the Holy Bible. Revelations received through thought communication (1956).

Van Tassel died February 9, 1978, after a sudden heart attack. The work of completing the Integraton was continued by an associate designated as successor by Van Tassel in 1977 and the building was later purchased by the Christology Church, P.O. Box 4648, San Diego, CA 92104. The work of his College of Universal Wisdom was continued by Van Tassel's widow, Doris Van Tassell.

Sources:

Barker, Gray. Gray Barker at Giant Rock. Clarksburg, W.V.: Saucarian Publications, 1976.

Clark, Jerome. The Emergence of a Phenomenon: UFOs from the Beginning through 1959. The UFO Encyclopedia. Vol. 2. Detroit: Omnigraphics, 1992.

Van Tassel, George. The Council of Seven Lights. Los Angeles: DeVorss & Company, 1958.

———. I Rode in a Flying Saucer. Los Angeles: New Age Publishing, 1952.

Van Vuurde, Wilhelm (1909– ?)

Wilhelm van Vuurde, a famous subject of parapsychological research, was born and grew up in the Netherlands. As a young man he attempted to escape the coming war by migrating to South Africa, but wound up a prisoner of the Japanese. While a prisoner he suffered from extreme malnutrition and lost some of his sight. After the war he settled in South Africa.

Van Vuurde believed he had a talent for waking himself at any unknown and randomly chosen times. He developed an experiment to test himself using two clocks, one of which would be set before he went to sleep at an unknown position and the other set to run but with a string that could be pulled to stop the clock upon awakening. The next morning the two clocks could be checked to see if the times coincided. He tested himself over 200 times between 1951 and 1954 and published a report on his effort in 1956. As a result of his claim, A. E. H. Bleksley of the South African Society for Psychical Research conducted a series of experiments between 1959 and 1967, which produced a spectacular level of positive results. During the 1980s van Vuurde moved back to the Netherlands and has most recently been involved in a new set of experiments with Jeff C. Jacobs of the Synchronicity Research Unit. Van Vuurde has thus emerged as one of a very few subjects who have been able consistently to produce positive results over a long period of time in repeated experiments.

Sources:

Bleksley, A. E. H. "An Experiment of Long-Distance ESP During Sleep." Journal of Parapsychology 27 (1963): 1.

Jacobs, Jeff C. "Psi-Guided Awakening from Sleep 1: The Original Experiments of W. Van Vuurde." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 53 (1985): 159.

Van Vuurde, Wilhelm. "ESP During Sleep." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 38 (1956): 282.

Vardøgr

A psychic double or forerunner that appears in advance to announce the arrival of an individual. Sometimes it may manifest simply as familiar sounds associated with the individual concerned. Occasionally it may appear to the individual himself or herself, as in the celebrated experience of the great German poet Johann Goethe, who met his double on the road to Drusenheim dressed in a garment which Goethe was to wear by accident eight years later on the same route. Little has been published on the curious phenomenon of the vardøgr apart from an article in 1917 by Wiers Jensen, editor of the Norwegian Journal of Psychical Research.

Varley, Cromwell Fleetwood (1828–1883)

Renowned Spiritualist and consulting electrician of the Atlantic Telegraph Company and the Electric and International Telegraph Company. He was born at Kentish Town, London, April 6, 1828, and named after two of his ancestors, Oliver Cromwell and General Fleetwood. He was educated in South London, and went on to study telegraphy, joining the Electric and International Telegraph Company in 1846.

He was first attracted to Spiritualism in 1850. He investigated the hypothesis that table rapping was the result of an electric force and demonstrated that this hypothesis was altogether unfounded. In later years, he had many curious psychic experiences, discovered that he possessed mesmeric healing power, and effected cures on his wife. She in turn had clairvoyant visions and spells of trance in which she foretold the exact course of her illness. After the birth of a son, Varley was one night aroused by three tremendous raps. He felt impelled to go into his wife's room, where he found the nurse intoxicated and his wife rigid and in a cataleptic state.

He later made the acquaintance of the famous medium Daniel Dunglas Home. Narrating his experiences before the committee of the London Dialectical Society in 1869, he concluded:

"Still, I was too astonished to be able to feel satisfied. Fortunately, when I got home, a circumstance occurred which got rid of the element of doubt. While alone in the drawing room, thinking intently on what I had witnessed, there were raps. The next morning I received a letter from Mr. Home, in which he said 'When alone in your room last night you heard sounds. I am so pleased.' He stated the spirits had told him they followed me, and were enabled to produce sounds. I have the letter in my possession now, to show that imagination had nothing to do with the matter."

Varley gave account of other personal occurrences. In the winter of 1864, at Beckenham Kent, he was awakened during the night by raps. His wife was lying by his side in trance and he saw the transparent phantom of a man in military dress in the air. He asked him, through the voice of his wife, to deliver a message to his brother in Birmingham.

Varley also had other curious experiences. In a dream state, he saw and heard the double of his sister-in-law. Next morning she confirmed everything by narrating her own dream experience. At another time, having accidentally chloroformed himself, he had vivid out-of-the-body experiences which were similarly confirmed by his wife. In 1860, at Halifax, his double, anxious to wake his physical self, made him dream of a bomb explosion; when the shock woke him he found the scene outside his window exactly corresponding to what his double saw.

In New York, he made the acquaintance of several mediums and conducted experiments in the home of C. F. Livermore, the banker, with the famous medium Kate Fox of the Fox Sisters. His efforts to find the laws that govern the physical phenomena of Spiritualism were fruitless. He began to suspect that powers other than electricity and magnetism were at work. On the basis of his varied experiences he was led to believe "that we are not our bodies; that when we die we exist just as much as before, and that under certain conditions we are able to hold communications with those on earth; but I also believe that many of the phenomena are often caused by the spirits of those whose bodies are present."

When Sir William Crookes started his famous investigation into the phenomena of Spiritualism, Varley assisted him in devising means of electric control. For his outspoken stand he was subject to abuse from the skeptical W. B. Carpenter who, in the October 1871 Quarterly Review, assured readers that there were grave doubts of his scientific ability and that these misgivings of the learned world had kept Varley out of the Royal Society. At the time of this attack, Varley had been a fellow of the Royal Society for more than three months.

In addition to his researches in Spiritualism, Varley was renowned for his important part in the successful laying of the first Atlantic cable. He died at Bexley Heath, Kent, September 2, 1883.

Varma, Devendra P. (1923–1994)

Leading authority on the Gothic novel and author and editor of over two hundred books on the subject. Dr. Varma was born on October 17, 1923, in northeastern India, on the borders of the Himalayan Mountains. He has been a professor of English in Katmandu, Nepal, and also taught at the University of Damascus in Syria and in Cairo. For many years he taught English at Dalhousie University in Halifax, Nova Scotia, specializing in the Gothic romance.

He had taken a particular interest in the study of the vampire and discussed the subject in his introduction to the three-volume reprint of Varney the Vampire by James Malcolm Rymer (often mistakenly attributed to Thomas Prest), a mid-nineteenth-century vampire novel. In 1973, he traveled to Castle Dracula in Transylvania to investigate the background of Bram Stoker's famous novel Dracula, first published in 1897.

Varma had kept in close touch with such Hollywood directors of horror movies as Curtis Harrington, Frank Cunningham, Walter Doughty, and Forrest Ackermann and was friends with such actors as Christopher Lee and Vincent Price. He edited the seven volumes of the "horrid novels" mentioned in Jane Austen's Northanger Abbey, the Gothic Studies and Dissertations Series in 36 volumes, and three series of Gothic Novels reprinted by Arno Press (including The Complete Works of Sheridan LeFanu) in 52 volumes. In 1977, he was awarded the Queen's Silver Jubilee Medal in Britain for his contributions to education and the arts.

Vsarma died in 1994.

Sources:

Varma, Devendra. "The Genesis of Dracula: a Re-Visit." In Peter Underwood, ed. The Vampire's Bedside Companion. London: Leslie Frewin, 1975.

———. The Gothic Flame. London: Arthur Barker, 1957.

———. The History of the Gothic Novel in England. N.p., 1957.

———. "The Vampire in Legend, Lore, and Literature." Introduction to Varney the Vampire; or, the Feast of Blood. New York: Arno Press, 1970.

———, ed. Voices from the Vaults: Authentic Tales of Vampires and Ghosts. Toronto: Key Porter Books, 1987.

Vasiliev, Leonid Leonidovich (1891–1966)

Soviet physiologist and parapsychologist. Born in Russia, he graduated from Petersburg University in 1914. He was a teacher of biological sciences at Ufa, Bashkir (1914–21), head of the Physiology Department, Bekhterev Brain Institute, Leningrad (1921–38), and a professor of physiology at Leningrad University from 1943 onward. Vasiliev pioneered parapsychology in the Soviet Union, and helped to establish the first parapsychology laboratory at Leningrad (now St. Petersburg). His work is both contemporaneous with and of equal quality as that of J. B. Rhine. He began by attempting to replicate some of the experiments of Pierre Janet, the nineteenth-century French psychologist. His spectacular success gave parapsychology some recognition in the highly politicized atmosphere of Stalinist Russia. He first developed a "politically correct" hypothesis of the material basis of telepathy, but his experiments to establish his theory proved quite the opposite. Financial support was withdrawn and Vasiliev's work was not published until the 1960s, after Stalin's death.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Ebon, Martin, ed. Psychic Discoveries by the Russians. New York: Parapsychology Foundation, 1963; New York: New American Library, 1971.

Pleasant, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Vasiliev, Leonid L. Experiments in Distant Influence. London: Wildwood House, 1976; New York: Dutton, 1976.

———. Experiments in Mental Suggestion. Church Crookham, Hampshire, U.K.: Study of Mental Images Publications, 1963.

———. Mysterious Manifestations of the Human Psyche. 1959. Reprinted as: Mysterious Phenomena of the Human Psyche. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Vassago

According to the Lemegeton (Book of the Spirits), a famous work attributed to King Solomon, Vassago was one of the seventy-two spirits to be conjured up by magical evocation. Vassago is described as a prince in the hierarchy of genii, favored by those who would know the unknown; he could tell of the future and find anything lost or stolen. As with other princes among the spirits, Vassago could be conjured into a mystical triangle, but kings and emperors among the spirits could be conjured into a magical crystal. (See also crystal gazing)

Vasse, Christine M(aria) Piot (1922–)

Teacher who has written on parapsychology. Born December 8, 1922, in Salouel, France, Vasse received her college degree (B.A.) in 1941 and was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association.

She experimented in extrasensory perception with children, and studied teacher-student relationships in these tests. She collaborated with her husband on experiments involving dice placement and also plant growth. She is co-author of various articles with her husband Paul M. Vasse, and translator of French the Handbook of Tests in Parapsychology by Betty Humphrey Nicols.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Vasse, Paul M. and Christine M. Vasse. "Comparison of Two Subjects in PK." Journal of Parapsychology (December 1951).

———. "ESP Test with French First-Grade School Children." Journal of Parapsychology (September 1958).

———. "Plant Growing Experiments." Revue Métapsychique (April-June 1948).

Vasse, Paul M(arie) (1910– ?)

Physician who experimented in areas of parapsychology. He was born February 17, 1910, at Amiens, France, studied at the University of Paris (B.A., 1928; M.D., 1936), and was a charter member of the Parapsychological Association and the Ordre des Médecins. In collaboration with his wife, Christine M. Vasse, Vasse conducted experiments in dice placement and in the growth of plants and lectured on his results at the Institut Métapsychique.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Vasse, Paul M. and Christine M. Vasse. "Comparison of Two Subjects in PK." Journal of Parapsychology (December 1951).

———. "ESP Test with French First-Grade School Children." Journal of Parapsychology (September 1958).

———. "Plant Growing Experiments." Revue Métapsychique (April-June 1948).

"Vates"

One of the spirit controls of William Stainton Moses. "Vates" was an assistant to the control "Imperator," said to have been the prophet Daniel.

Vaughan, Alan (1936–)

Author, editor, and psychic who has written widely on psychical and parapsychological topics. He was born on December 28, 1936, in Akron, Ohio, and studied at the University of Akron (A.B., 1958), Rutgers University (1958–59), the New School for Social Research (1966–67), and the University of Freiburg (1967–68). He held several editing jobs before going to work for Psychic magazine (later New Realities) in 1969. He was the editor of Psychic for five years (1972–77). From 1978 onward he was president of New Ways of Consciousness Founation, San Francisco. He also started a Los Angeles-based computer software company called Mind Technology Systems.

Vaughan has worked in parapsychology, especially with the Dream Laboratory at Maimonides Hospital, and he is an associate member of the Parapsychological Association. He is also a psychic, having begun his development in Europe in the 1960s. In 1983 he began channelling an entity named "Li Sung" who claimed to be an ancient Chinese healer and herbalist. Vaughan reflected upon his unusual dual life:

"The transition from a skeptical science textbook editor to a parapsychologist and practicing psychic was a painful one. I had to give up the cherished idea of traditional science to discover the more important underlying realities of consciousness and its psychic effects. The research leading to Patterns of Prophecy opened up my own prophetic talent, and enabled me to teach others how to develop their latent psi gifts. . . . Each of us has a unique consciousness and a unique task in life. We also have unique problems to solve. But only our consciousness has the answers to our problems. Your inner self has the wisdom of the universe locked up within it. By finding the key to unlock that wisdom, you will enrich your life."

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychological Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Vaughan, Alan. The Edge of Tomorrow. New York: Coward, McGann, 1982.

———. Incredible Coincidence: The Baffling World of Synchronicity. New York: Lippencott, 1979.

———. Patterns of Prophecy. New York: Hawthorn Books, 1973.

Ullman, Montague, Stanley Krippner, and Alan Vaughan. Dream Telepathy. N.p., 1973.

Vaughan, Alan, and James Bolem. Psychics. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Vaughan, Diana

The mythical figure in a famous nineteenth-century occult hoax initiated by Leo Taxil, pseudonym of Gabriel Jogand-Pagés, a French journalist. From 1885 to 1886, Taxil published a sensational story that one branch of Freemasonry was following a form of devil-worship called Palladianism, of which Diana Vaughan was the High Priestess. Allegedly, she was the descendent of the seventeenth-century alchemist Thomas Vaughan.

These revelations synchronized with Roman Catholic opposition to Freemasonry (based upon their support of democratic trends in nineteenth-century Europe) and were profitable for Taxil. Diana Vaughan was supposed to have repented to her Satanist background and embraced the Catholic Church. Her memoirs were read with satisfaction by the pope himself.

An announcement appeared that she would appear at a press conference on Easter Monday 1897. Instead, Taxil appeared and calmly revealed his hoax, stating that he was merely anxious to see how far he could dupe the church. News of this deception was badly received, for the plot had lasted three or four years, and Taxil had to be smuggled away under police protection. In Britain, the hoax was exposed by occult scholar Arthur Edward Waite in his book Devil Worship in France (1896).

Sources:

Waite, Arthur Edward. Devil Worship in France; or, The Question of Lucifer: A Record of Things Seen and Heard in the Secret Societies According to the Evidence of Initiates. London, George Redway, 1896.

Vaughan, Thomas (1622–1666)

British alchemist and poet, who wrote under the pseudonym Eugenius Philalethes. He was born April 17, 1622, at Newton, Breconshire, the younger twin brother of poet Henry Vaughan. He matriculated at Oxford and entered Jesus College, Oxford University, becoming a fellow of his college. In 1640, at the age of eighteen, he received the living [i.e., the income as parish priest] of St. Bridget's [Church of England], Breconshire, and on February 18, 1642, the B.A. degree. He was a royalist during the Civil War and in 1658 was accused of "drunkenness, swearing, and incontinency, being no preacher," and deprived of the living of St. Bridget's. However, this may have been no more than high spirits. He became a devoted student of chemistry, following his research both in Oxford and London, under the patronage of Sir Robert Murray. He died February 27, 1666, at the rectory of Albury, Oxfordshire, allegedly from inhalation of fumes of mercury, upon which he was experimenting.

Vaughan was an ardent follower of Cornelius Agrippa, to whom, as he stated, "he acknowledged that, next to God, he owed all that he had." He claimed to be a philosopher of nature rather than a vulgar alchemist. In one of his manuscripts he recorded strange dreams of premonitions that he had experienced and prayed for forgiveness of past errors, including former revels and drunkenness. Although he published a translation of a Rosicrucian work with a preface by himself, he explicitly stated that he was not a member of any such fraternity. Under the pseudonym of Eugenius Philalethes, he published a number of books including: Anthroposophia Theomagica, with Anima Magica (London, 1650; Amsterdam, 1704; and in German, Leipzig, 1749); Magia Adamica; or the Antiquities of Magic (London, 1650, 1656; Amsterdam, 1704, in German), Lumen de Lumine (London, 1651; Hof, 1750, in German), Aula Lucis; or the House of Light (London, 1652), Euphrates; or the Waters of the East (London, 1655, Stockholm & Hamburg, 1689, in German), and The Chymists Key to shut, and to open; or the True Doctrine of Corruption and Generation (London, 1657). He contributed verses for Thomas Powell's Elementa Opticæ (1651), for the English translation of Cornelius Agrippa's Three Books of Occult Philosophy (1651), and William Cartwright's Comedies (1651). A collection of his Latin verses was included at the end of Henry Vaughan's Thalia Rediviva (1678).

Vaughan was falsely identified with the mystical writer "Eirenaeus Philalethes" through the Diana Vaughan writings of Leo Taxil (pseudonym of Gabriel Jogand-Pagés), who also popularized a false legend of a pact between him and Satan.

Vaulderie

A term indicating connection with Satanic powers, so called from Robinet de Vaulx, a hermit, one of the first persons accused of the crime. In 1453, the Prior of St. Germain-en-Laye, Guillaume de l'Allive, a doctor of theology, was accused of Vaulderie, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. Six years later there was burned at Lille a hermit named Alphonse, who preached heterodox doctrines. During the fifteenth century, many accusations of "witchcraft" were directed against those who followed the heretical sect of the Waldenses or Vaudois.

Such were the preludes of a persecution which, in the following year, the Vicar of the Inquisition, administrator of the Diocese of Arras, seconded by the Count d'Etampes, Governor of Artois, directed at first against loose women, but afterwards against citizens, magistrates, knights, and especially the wealthy.

The procedures against the accused had almost always for their basis some accusation of sorcery (i.e., malevolent magic). Most of the unhappy creatures confessed to having attended the Witch's Sabbat, and the strange revelations wrung from them by torture gave some idea of the ceremonies that, according to the popular tradition, were enacted in the lurid festivals presided over by Satan.

The following are some extracts from the judgment pronounced at Arras in 1460 upon five women, a painter, a poet nicknamed "an abbé of little sense" and aged about seventy, and several others, who all perished in the flames kindled by barbarous ignorance and fed by a cruel superstition:

"And the said Inquisition did say and declare, that those hereinunder named had been guilty of Vaulderie in manner following, that is to say:—That when they wished to go to the said Vaulderie, they, with an ointment given to them by the devil, anointed a small wooden rod and their palms and their hands; then they put the wand between their legs, and soon they flew wherever they wished to go, over fair cities, woods and streams; and the devil carried them to the place where they should hold their assembly, and in this place they found others, and tables placed, loaded with wines and viands; and there they found a demon in the form of a goat, a dog, an ape, or sometimes a man; and they made their oblation and homage to the said demon, and adored him, and yielded up to him their souls, and all, or at least some portion of their bodies; then, with burning candles in their hands, they kissed the rear of the goat-devil. . . . [Here the Inquisitor becomes untranslatable].

". . . And this homage done, they trod and trampled upon the Cross, and befouled it with their spittle, in contempt of Jesus Christ, and the Holy Trinity, then turned their backs towards heaven and the firmament in contempt of God. And after they had all eaten and drunk well, they had carnal intercourse all together, and even the devil assumed the guise of man and woman, and had intercourse with both sexes. And many other crimes, most filthy and detestable, they committed, as much against God as against nature, which the said Inquisitor did not dare to name, that innocent ears might not be told of such villainous enormities."

The eagerness displayed by the inquisitor and his acolytes so excited the public indignation that at the close of the year 1460 the judges did not dare any longer to condemn to death the unfortunate wretches accused. It was said that the persecution was only for the purpose of depriving them of their property. As in the case of many great wrongs, a reaction set in favor of justice.

Thirty years later, when the country of Artois had been reunited to the Crown, the Parliament of Paris declared, on May 20, 1491, that these trials were "abusive, void, and falsely made" and condemned the heirs of the duke of Burgundy and the principal judges to an amend of 500 Parisian livres, to be distributed to a reparation among the heirs of the victims. The events as Arras stand behind the formal change of attitude toward witchcraft made by the Roman Catholic Church in 1484 in that it was redefined as Satanism. (See also Sabbat; Witchcraft)

Sources:

Robbins, Russell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Russell, Jeffrey Burton. Witchcraft in the Middle Ages. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1972.

Vay, Baroness Adelma (1840–1924)

Authoress, medium, and pioneer of Spiritualism in Hungary. Her powers, inherited from her mother, the Countess Teleki, later Duchess Solm, first blossomed in 1865. She became clairvoyant; wrote, spoke and drew in trance; had the prophetic gift; and was credited with many cures. In 1873, with her husband, she formed the Hungarian Spiritualist Association of which they became the first presidents. Her books included: Spirit, Force and Matter (1869), Studies on the Spirit World (1874), From My Life (1900), and Pictures from the Beyond (1905).

Vedanta

Vedanta is the highest teaching of the Vedas, (veda means knowledge), the ancient Sanskrit scriptures of India. There are four Vedas: the Rig-Veda, the Yajur-Veda, the Sama-Veda, and the Artharva-Veda, which are comprised of hymns, ritual texts, and philosophical treatises that are regarded as divine revelation. Vedanta is considered one of the six darshanas (viewpoints) of orthodox Hinduism. However, it is not simply a formal instruction but a revelatory experience of transcendental consciousness.

In 1893, Swami Vivekananda appeared “like an Eastern comet in the Western spiritual sky” and made a startling appearance at the Parliament of Religions at the Chicago World’s Fair. With him, he brought news of yoga and Vedanta; since then, yoga has taken solid root in the Western soil, with an estimated 2 million participants outside India. Vedanta, on the other hand, has remained relatively unknown.

The Vedas, completed between 1500–500 B.C.E., were originally an oral tradition, later codified in scriptures called the Upanishads (meaning nearness to wisdom). Of the 108 Upanishads, created between 900–500 B.C.E., some ten out of twelve books are regarded as the principle ones. The Vedanta, like the New Testament of the Bible, not only serves as the end of the Upanishads but the culmination of the scriptures.

Hindu scriptures differ from the sacred writings of other religions as they go beyond faith in particular deities (regarded as legal fictions, useful only at certain stages in life) to awareness of an Absolute, beyond time, space and causality. It is said the Vedanta’s two main themes are humanity’s true nature as divine, and this divinity as the aim of human life. The ideas of the Vedanta also introduce and reflect the traditional yogic paths.

There are three perspectives of Vedanta: One is dualistic (dvaita), the second is nondualistic (advaita), while the third is qualified nondualistic (vishishtadvaita). The advaita perspective proclaims there are no individual souls, but all are unified. It is called nondualistic because “it acknowledge[s] only one Spirit, a single underlying reality beyond which nothing else could possibly exist.”

Sources:

Advaita Vedanta. <http://www.advaita-vedanta.org/>. March 1, 2000.

Introduction to Vedanta. <http://www.geocities.com/RodeoDrive/1415/veda.html>. March 30, 2000.

Johnsen, Linda. “Tantra & Classical Yoga.” Yoga International (September 1997): 22–29.

Nikhilananda, Swami. The Upanishads. 4 vols. London: Phoenix House, 1951–59; New York: Ramakrishna-Vivekananda Center, 1975–1979.

Torwesten, Hans. Vedanta: Heart of Hinduism. New York: Grove Weidenfeld, 1985.

Vedanta Societies

American Vedanta Societies stem from the visit to the United States by Swami Vivekananda in 1893, when he lectured on Hinduism at the World Parliament of Religions held in Chicago. The Swami founded the Vedanta Society of New York in 1896, followed by the Vedanta Society of San Francisco in 1900.

Swami Vivekananda became the foremost interpreter of Yoga and Hinduism in Western countries, basing his teachings on the inspiration of his master Sri Ramakrishna.

Vedanta comprises the supreme wisdom of the Vedas, the ancient Sanskrit scriptures of India, together with the Upanishads, which derived from them. This wisdom is manifest as a revelatory experience after following spiritual disciplines (such as the various forms of yoga) in conjunction with scripture study under the guidance of a qualified guru or teacher.

There are now some sixteen Vedanta Centres in the United States which form branches of the Ramakrishna Order of India. Addresses: Vedanta Society of Northern California, 2323 Vallejo St., San Francisco, CA 94123; Vedanta Society of Southern California, 1946 Vedanta Pl., Hollywood, CA 90068. There are also Vedanta Centre/Ananda Ashrama communities providing spiritual retreats in both Massachusetts and Southern California. Addresses: Vedanta Centre, 130 Beechwood St., Cohasset, MA 02025; Ananda Ashrama, 5301 Pennsylvania Ave., CA 91214.

Vedic Astrology

Astrologers in India trace their art to the fifth millennium B.C.E. though a new shape was given to ancient astrological speculations by Parashara Muni around 1500 B.C.E. He is one of the first astrologers in the world known to have actually cast horoscopes, the personal birth charts for individuals. He also is known to have had a special interest in the application of astrology to health and longevity concerns. He wrote several books, the most important being the Brihat Parashara Hora Shastra, and composed hymns to the several planetary deities.

Muni’s work was expanded by Ranavira, who lived during the same era. Ranavira, who also operated as a clairvoyant seer, concentrated on the astrological correlated to compatible personal relationships, female astrology, and psychological astrology. Ranavira appears to be the fountainhead of Indian astrology’s continued interest in applying astrology to predicting successful marriages.

Astrology emerged in the context of the Vedas, the ancient holy writings of the Indian people, which through the Vedic hymns offered a positive worldview oriented to nature and the pastoral agricultural life. Astrology, also called Jyotisha (meaning of the shining world of light), complemented this worldview in its attempt to shine the divine light on the individual’s life. As a teacher, astrological knowledge attempted to dispel the darkness of illusion and assist the person to understand the purpose of the soul’s present incarnation.

The birth chart pictures the consequences or karma that the person brings into this incarnation (Indians believing that the soul reincarnates in a series of embodied existences either as humans or animals). While at times, as in Western astrology, astrological interpretation has fallen into a fatalistic mode, contemporary Vedic astrologers, drawing on the optimistic spirit of the Vedic literature, specifically eschew such a view. They emphasize that the natal chart offers a picture of karmic influences but also shows indicative rather than deterministic forces active in the person’s life.

The Vedic birth chart differs from the traditional Western horoscope in several ways. Most importantly, Indian astrologers use what is termed the sidereal zodiac rather than the topical zodiac. The sidereal zodiac is based upon the actual positions of the 12 signs of the zodiac in the sky. The topical zodiac is based upon the position of the Sun as it rises at the spring equinox. Over the years, that point (called O° Aires) shifts slightly year by year, one aspect of the phenomenon known as the procession of the equinoxes. Over the centuries, the two zodiacs have developed a difference of 23°, enough to throw most planets into an adjacent sign. Vedic astrologers cast a chart based upon the moment of birth (defined as the moment of the first cry of the newborn).

The most important elements in the individuals’ charts are the planets, which were in ancient times identified with lesser deities. Planets are termed graha, that which possesses a person, hence the planets are seen as symbolic of the illusions (maya) of earthly existence that obscure the individual’s divine nature. Each planet has acquired a set of associations and its particular placement in the chart indicates a variety of strengths and weaknesses. Generally, only the ancient visible planets are utilized by Vedic astrologers and thus one will not find Uranus, Neptune, or Pluto, not to mention the asteroids or hypothetical planets that occasionally appear as elements in Western horoscopes.

Besides the signs, planets, and houses that both Indian and Western astrology share, Vedic astrology also includes a unique set of divisions placed on the birth chart, the planetary periods. Vedic astrology not only divides the zodiac into the 12 signs, but it also divides it into 27 lunar mansions roughly defined by the movement of the Moon around the earth every 27 days. The planetary periods relate to the lunar mansions very much as houses relate to the traditional signs. The planetary periods are of varying lengths as they are related to the different planets. The place of the newborn in the cycle of periods is determined by the position of the Moon in the natal chart. The recognition of these periods provides Indian astrologers with an additional level of interpretation of the person's life not available to traditional Western practitioners.

The Western appropriation of Vedic astrology began early in the twentieth century but did not become prominent until the migration of large numbers of Indians to the West after World War II (1939–45) and the contemporaneous turn Eastward by numerous young spiritual seekers. The flux through which Western astrology has passed in the last decades of the twentieth century, during which time every aspect and boundary of traditional Western astrology was challenged, provided openings for the introduction of Vedic astrology. Many Westerners found it more appealing than the dominant system and a growing number of books explaining the system have been published in the West. Also, materials published in India have become freely circulated through the English-speaking world. During the 1990s, annual conventions of Vedic astrologers were held in North America.

Sources:

Braha, James T. Ancient Hindu Astrology for the Modern Western Astrology. Hollywood, Calif.: Hermetician Press, 1986.

Cameron, Barbara. Predictive Planetary Periods: The Hindu Dasa. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1984.

DeLuce, Robert. Constellational Astrology: According to the Hindu System. Los Angeles: DeLuce Publishing, 1963.

Vehm-Gerichte

A secret tribunal that during the Middle Ages, exercised a peculiar jurisdiction in Germany and especially in Westphalia. Its origin is uncertain. The sessions were often held in secret, and the uninitiated were forbidden to attend them on pain of death. Various stories have been circulated concerning the group, but these have been discounted by modern research. Far from dabbling in the occult, these courts frequently punished persons convicted of witchcraft and sorcery (malevolent magic).

Veleda (ca. 70 C.E.)

A prophetess among the ancient Germans, of whom the historian Tacitus stated:

"She exercises a great authority, for women have been held here from the most ancient times to be prophetic, and, by excessive superstition, as divine. The fame of Veleda stood on the very highest elevation, for she foretold to the Germans a prosperous issue, but to the legions their destruction! Veleda dwelt upon a high tower, whence messengers were dispatched bearing her oracular counsels to those who sought them; but she herself was rarely seen, and none was allowed to approach her. Cercalis is said to have secretly begged her to let the Romans have better success in war. In the reign of the Emperor Vespasian she was honored as a goddess."

Veleda predicted the success of Claudius Civilis in the Batavian revolt against Rome (69–70 C.E.) and the fall of the Roman Empire.

Velikovsky, Immanuel (1895–1979)

Psychoanalyst and cosmologist who emerged as a major defender of catastrophism, the idea that the earth's history and prehistory have been distorted by significant catastrophies. Catastrophism stands over against uniformitarianism, the dominant postulate of geologic sciences that the earth has developed slowly by long-term processes which are still occurring and observable. About the time of the prophet Moses in 1500 B.C.E., a comet from the planet Jupiter is supposed to have collided with Mars, formed the planet Venus, and shifted the orbit of the earth, displacing oceans and reversing the earth's poles.

Velikovsky was born on June 10, 1895, at Vitebsk, Russia. He attended the Medvednikov Gymnasium in Moscow, graduating with full honors. After a short period of study at Montpellier, France, he traveled in Palestine, then started pre-medical studies in natural science at Edinburgh, Scotland, in 1914. On the outbreak of World War I, he enrolled in the Free University in Moscow, studying law and ancient history. In 1915 he took up medical studies again at the University of Moscow and received his medical diploma in 1921. He moved to Berlin, where together with Prof. Heinrich Loewe he founded and published Scripta Universitatis, a series of scholarly volumes contributed by Jewish scholars in various countries. Velikovsky also met Albert Einstein, who edited the mathematical-physical volumes.

Velikovsky then moved to Palestine, where he practiced as a physician for fifteen years. He then spent some time in New York researching a study of Freud's own dreams and the relationship of Freud's thought to such figures as Oedipus, Akhnaton and Moses, but in the course of his researches, he became intrigued by the suggestion that there might have been a catastrophe at the time of the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt.

A new book began to develop, under the title Ages in Chaos, followed by a further manuscript, Worlds in Collision. The latter work was published in 1950 and created a storm in the scientific world, and the original publisher felt compelled to drop the book. The extraordinary campaign of suppression is fully documented in Alfred de Grazia's book The Velikovsky Affair; the Warfare of Science and Scientism (University Books, 1966). Diehard and intolerant scientists were later infuriated when various hypotheses of Velikovsky, originally sneered at as "unscientific" and inaccurate, were eventually proved correct. Velikovsky correctly predicted the existence of geomagnetic planetary fields, the negative electrical charge of the sun, the high temperature of Venus, the existence of hydrocarbon clouds surrounding Venus, and emission of radio sounds from Jupiter—all vindicated by space probes and other recent scientific developments. (At the same time, of course, many other ideas proved completely false).

Velikovsky developed a small but loyal following in the scientific community and a large public response. Two journals, including the S. I. S. Review published by the Society for Interdisciplinary Studies, appeared in the 1970s to expand the discussion of his ideas, though support has noticeably declined since his death on November 17, 1979 in Princeton, New Jersey. During his lifetime, his ideas were attacked vigorously by many of the same writers who attacked psychic research. Carl Sagan penned the most definitive refutation of Velikovsky's ideas.

Sources:

Gardner, Martin. Fads and Fallacies in the Name of Science. New York: Dover Publications, 1957.

Velikovsky, Immanuel. Ages in Chaos. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1952.

———. Earth in Upheaval. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1955.

———. Oedipus and Akhnaton: Myth and History. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1960.

———. Peoples of the Sea. N.p., 1977.

Veltis

An evil spirit who assaulted St. Margaret of Cortona (died 1297), but was overcome by her. On being asked by St. Margaret who he was and whence he came, he replied:

“My name is Veltis, and I am one of those whom Solomon by virtue of his spells, confined in a copper cauldron at Babylon, but when the Babylonians, in the hope of finding treasure dug up the cauldron and opened it, we all made our escape. Since that time our efforts have been directed to the destruction of righteous persons, and I have long been striving to turn thee from the course thou hast embraced.”

Verdelet

Said to be a demon of the second order, master of ceremonies at the infernal court. He was charged with the transport of witches to the Sabbat. He took the names of “Master Persil,” “Sante-Buisson,” and other names of a pleasant sound, so as to entice women into his snares.

Verdun, Michel (d. 1521)

A self-confessed werewolf, burned at Besançon, France, in 1521 together with his accomplice Pierre Burgot. They had stated that they had stripped naked and anointed themselves with a certain unguent, after which they changed shape and became werewolves, hunting and attacking children and adults. Verdun was discovered after attacking a traveler who wounded him while in animal form. Following the trail of the wounded creature, the traveler discovered Verdun, who had returned to human form, with his wife bathing the wound.

Sources:

Summers, Montague. The Werewolf. London, 1933. Reprint, New York: University Books, 1966.

La Vérité (Journal)

Nineteenth-century Spiritualist journal published in Lyons, France.

Verograph

One of various modern devices for experimenting with aura-electronics or kirlian photography. It is small enough to be conveniently portable.

Veronica

A religious term for a cloth bearing the likeness of Jesus imprinted miraculously. The term was coined by St. Gregory of Tours (538–594 C.E.), deriving from the Greek icon (image) and Latin vera (true).

The story of veronica is that a woman of rank, living in the Via Dolorosa, broke through the procession of Jesus' crucifixion when it stopped for Simon of Cyrene to assist in carrying the cross. The woman, usually named as Seraphia (sometimes called Veronica), wiped the face of Jesus with a cloth, and the miraculous portrait became impressed from the blood and sweat. Other versions of the story claim that the woman simply handed the cloth to Jesus, who wiped his own face and returned the cloth. A detailed and highly circumstantial version of the incident was given by Anne Catherine Emmerich (see Germany) when in an ecstatic trance.

A claimed veronica was placed in a marble coffer on the altar of a chapel attached to St. Peter's in Rome during the period of Sixtus V, but it was moved in 1440 and is said to be deposited in the Vatican. Another cloth with a similar miraculous portrait was presented by two Fathers to the seventh synod of Nice, C.E.

787. Such miraculous likenesses not made by people are also known as Acheropites.

In 1813, when a vault was opened in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, England, one of the coffins, believed to be that of Charles I, was opened and a portrait found on the grave cloth which had wrapped the body. The myth which surrounds the Turin Shroud is quite similar to that of the veronicas.

Verrall, Arthur Woollgar (1851–1912)

Classical scholar, husband of the psychical researcher and medium Margaret de Gaudrion Verrall, and father of Helen Verrall Salter, the wife of W. H. Salter. After his death he was one of the purported communicators in the famous “cross-correspondence” tests of the Society for Psychical Research, London, in which wife and daughter participated by producing automatic scripts.

Verrall was born on February 5, 1851, in Brighton, England. He studied at Wellington College and Trinity College, Cambridge University, (B.A., 1873; M.A., 1874). He lectured at Trinity, where he became First King Edward VII Professor of English Literature in 1911. He died June 18, 1912.

Verrall, Margaret de Gaudrion Merrifield (1859–1916)

Prominent British psychical researcher, medium and lecturer in classics at Newnham College. She was born December 21, 1859, at Brighton, England, and educated at Newnham College, Cambridge University. She married A. W. Verrall, the well-known classical scholar, in 1882.

Verrall joined the Society for Psychical Research, London, in 1889. She wrote a number of papers for the Proceedings at the request of Frederic William Henry Myers, held sittings with the medium Leonora S. Piper when she visited England, and was elected to the Council in 1901.

Eventually she developed psychic powers herself and in 1901 through automatic writing obtained the first significant results after the death of Myers. Afterwards she produced hundreds of scripts which often contained matter of paranormal interest. In 1906, she published an analysis of her own scripts in the society's Proceedings which formed the starting point of a serious study in cross-correspondence.

Sir Oliver Lodge paid the following tribute to Verrall in his book The Survival of Man (1909):

“The fame of Mrs. Piper has spread into all lands, and I should think the fame of Mrs. Verrall also. In these recent cases of automatism the society has been singularly fortunate, for in the one we have a medium who has been under strict supervision and competent management for the greater part of her psychical life; and in the other we have one of the sanest and acutest of our own investigators, fortunately endowed with some power herself, some power of acting as translator or interpreter between the psychical and the physical worlds.”

After years of experiments and testing, Verrall concluded:

“It cannot be denied that the ‘communicator’ of the Piper sittings and of my own scripts presents a consistent personality dramatically resembling that of the person he claims to be. I entirely acquiesce in this judgment. . . . The boundary between the two states—the known and the unknown—is still substantial, but it is wearing thin in places; . . . and we are at liberty, not indeed to announce any definite conclusion, but to adopt as a working hypothesis the ancient doctrine of a possible intercourse of intelligence between the material and some other, perhaps ethereal order of existence.”

She died July 2, 1916, at Cambridge. Her daughter Helen married W. H. Salter, another prominent psychical researcher.

Versailles Adventure

One of the most famous psychic experiences reported at the beginning of the twentieth century. In August 1901, two English ladies, C. A. E. Moberly and E. F. Jourdain, took an afternoon walk in the Gardens of Versailles, France, and found themselves transported to the Trianon of 1789, complete with buildings and other people of the period. They described their experience with much corroborative detail in their 1911 book An Adventure. In the first edition their identity was concealed by the names "Miss Morison" and "Miss Lamont."

The book went into many editions and generated much controversy, coinciding with rising British interest in psychic phenomena through the work of the Society for Psychical Research, London. In spite of many subsequent attempts to discredit the writers, the adventure still stands as a unique experience.

Sources:

Flew, Antony G. N. A New Approach to Psychical Research. London: Watts, 1953.

Gibbons, M. E., and A. O. Gibbons. The Trianon Adventure. London: Museum Press, 1958.

Iremonger, Lucille. The Ghosts of Versailles. London: Faber & Faber, 1957.

Mackenzie, Andrew. The Unexplained: Some Strange Cases of Psychical Research. London: A. Barker, 1953. Reprint, New York: Abelard, 1968.

Moberly, C. A. E., and E. F. Jourdain. An Adventure. London: Faber & Faber, 1911.

Olivier, Edith. Four Victorian Ladies of Wiltshire. London: Faber & Faber, 1945.

Parrott, Ian. The Music of "An Adventure." London: Regency Press, 1966.

"Richard's Garden Revisited." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 41, 712 (June 1962).

Sturge-Whiting, J. R. The Mystery of Versailles: A Complete Solution. London: Rider, 1938.

Vervain

A sacred herb used to cleanse the table of Zeus before a feast in ancient Greece. In Rome it was also strewn on the altars of Jupiter, and water containing vervain was also sprinkled in houses to cast out evil spirits.

Among the Druids particularly it was employed in connection with many forms of superstition. They gathered it at daybreak, before the sun had risen. Later sorcerers followed the same usage, and demonologists believed that in order to evoke demons it was necessary to be crowned with vervain.

During the Crusades it was believed that when the nails were driven into the hands of Christ, vervain sprang upon Calvary.

The old herbalists recommended vervain to ease childbirth, and for jaundice, dropsy, gout, worms, stomach complaints, wound healing, ulcers and piles. Native Americans used vervain to cure menstrual disorders.

Vestigia (Organization)

Founded in 1976, with membership that consisted of scientists, engineers, technicians, and interested individuals, to investigate and conduct research into unexplained anomalous scientific phenomena of the kind usually associated with Charles Fort. Members are trained in investigative techniques and supply speakers to universities and organizations. The name of the group is the Latin word for "investigate," which, in itself, means footprint.

The group sponsored charitable programs, maintained a library and biographical archives, compiled statistics, and offered computerized services. It had committees on photography and technical matters, and divisions on aerial phenomena, biological matters, earth sciences, and parapsychology, as well as published an annual newsletter. Last known address: 56 Brookwood Rd., Stanhope, NJ 07874.

Vett, Carl Christian (1871–1956)

Danish agriculturalist and author, who played a leading part in organizing international cooperation and spread of information in the field of parapsychology. He was born September 25, 1871, in Aarhus, Denmark. Vett became a director of textile companies in Scandinavia. During World War I he was a diplomatic courier and cultural advisor to the Danish Ministry of Education on museum acquisitions. He was also a pioneer of biodynamic agricultural methods.

Vett was intensely interested in psychical research as a proper scientific study, and it was largely through his efforts that the First International Congress on Psychic Research was held in Copenhagen in 1921, with researchers from fifteen different countries. He became general secretary of a permanent committee for the organization of later international congresses of this kind, held at Warsaw (1923), Paris (1927), Athens (1930), and Oslo (1935). A tribute was paid to his work at the First International Conference of Parapsychological Studies held in Utrecht, Netherlands, in 1953. In the years after World War II, Vett lectured and wrote on parapsychological topics. He died February 1, 1956, in Rome, Italy.

Sources:

Vett, Carl Christian. "Memoirs of Psychic Research." Tomorrow, 3, 4 (Summer 1955).

Victoria, Queen (1819–1901)

Queen of England, Scotland and Ireland (1837–1901), Empress of India (1876–1901), who presided over the great days of the British Empire. She was known to be sympathetic to Spiritualism, and to have held séances with Prince Albert and other individuals. She approved of the book Our Life After Death by medium Robert James Lees and was said to have used Lees as a personal medium. Her belief in the possibility of communication between the spirit world and the living is illustrated by an entry in her journal commenting on the story that Princess Feodora, when at the point of death, had talked about a beloved child who had died earlier: "Surely at the approach of death the veil is raised and such pure spirits are allowed to see a glimpse of those dear ones waiting for them."

A short time before the death of Prince Albert, he had told the Queen: "We don't know in what state we shall meet again, but that we shall recognize each other and be together in eternity I am perfectly certain." After Albert's death, Victoria relied heavily on the companionship of her personal servant, the rough Highlander John Brown. Rumors suggested both that he was her lover and that together they participated in Spiritualist séances. After his death in 1883, the Queen erected a statue to him at Balmoral.

The Queen's Prime Minister W. E. Gladstone was also sympathetic to psychical research and was an early member of the Society for Psychical Research, London. He once summoned the famous palmist "Cheiro" to explain his theories and also sat with the medium William Eglinton.

Sources:

Underwood, Peter. Queen Victoria's Other World. London: Harrap, 1986.

Vidya

In Theosophy, the knowledge by which man on the Path of Life can discern the true from the false and so direct his efforts correctly by means of the mental faculties which he has learned to use. It is the antithesis of avidya (ignorance). Both terms are borrowed from Hindu religious philosophy.

Viedma

A Russian name for a witch. (See Slavs)

Vila

Vili were nymphs who frequented the forests at the bases of the Eastern Alps. According to popular belief, they could be seen traversing glades, mounted on stags, or driving from peak to peak on chariots of clouds. Old Serbian ballads tell how Marko, the great hero of ancient Serbia, was joined in a bond of brotherhood with a Vila, who showed to him the secrets of the future. At that period, Serbia was a mighty nation, extending from the Alps to the Black Sea, from the Danube to the Adriatic.

Vinchon, Jean (1884– ?)

French neuropsychiatrist who published books in areas of parapsychology. He was born on June 21, 1884, in the Department of the Somme, France. He received his M.D. in 1911 at Paris. He was successively the medical director of the Neuropsychiatric Center of the French Army of the East during World War I (1917–18), director of the clinic of Paris Medical School between the wars, and director of Army Neuropsychiatric Center, Paris Region as World War II began (1939–40). He then became a neuropsychiatrist at the War Veterans Ministry and a neuropsychiatric consultant at Hôpital de le Pitié.

Through most of his career Vinchon had a lively interest in psychic phenomena. He was a member and, for a period, president of the Institut Métapsychique. He authored several books growing out of his broad interests.

Sources:

Vinchon, Jean. L'Art et la Folie (Art and Insanity). Paris: Stock, Delamain et Boutelleau, 1950.

———. La Magie du dessin: Du griffonage automatique au dessin thérapeutique (The Magic Drawing: From Automatic Scribbling to Therapeutic Drawing). N.p., 1959.

———. Mesmer et son secret (Mesmer and His Secret). Toulouse Privat, 1936.

Vinchon, Jean, and Maurice Garçon. Le Diable. 1928. English ed. as The Devil. London, 1929. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1930.

Vintras, Eugène (1807–1875)

A Normandy peasant of great devoutness, who in the year 1839 was nominated by a strange sect named the Saviours of Louis XVII as a fitting successor to their prophet Thomas Martin who had just died. The sect believed that the child of Louis XVII and Marie Antoinette did not die in prison and would be restored to the throne of France. The Saviours addressed a letter to the pretended Louis XVII and arranged that it should fall into the hands of Vintras. It abounded in good promises for the reign to come and in mystical expressions calculated to attract the attention of a naive excitable character as they believed Vintras to be. Later, in a letter, Vintras himself described the manner in which this communication reached him as follows:

“Towards nine o'clock I was occupied in writing, when there was a knock at the door of the room in which I sat, and supposing that it was a workman who came on business, I said rather brusquely, ‘Come in.’ Much to my astonishment, in place of the expected workman, I saw an old man in rags. I asked merely what he wanted. He answered with much tranquility, ‘Don't disturb yourself, Pierre Michel.’ Now, these names are never used in addressing me, for I am known everywhere as Eugène, and even in signing documents I do not make use of my first names. I was conscious of a certain emotion at the old man's answer, and this increased when he said: ‘I am utterly tired, and wherever I appear they treat me with disdain, or as a thief.’ The words alarmed me considerably, though they were spoken in a saddened and even a woeful tone. I arose and placed a ten sous piece in his hand, saying, ‘I do not take you for that, my good man,’ and while speaking I made him understand that I wished to see him out. He received it in silence but turned his back with a pained air. No sooner had he set foot on the last step than I shut the door and locked it. I did not hear him go down, so I called a workman and told him to come up to my room. Under some business pretext, I was wishing him to search with me all the possible places which might conceal my old man, whom I had not seen go out. The workman came accordingly. I left the room in his company, again locking my door. I hunted through all the nooks and corners, but saw nothing.

“I was about to enter the factory when I heard on a sudden the bell ringing for mass, and felt glad that, notwithstanding the disturbance, I could assist at the sacred ceremony. I ran back to my room to obtain a prayer book and, on the table where I had been writing, I found a letter addressed to Mme. de Generès in London; it was written and signed by M. Paul de Montfleury of Caen, and embodied a refutation of heresy, together with a profession of orthodox faith. The address notwithstanding, this letter was intended to place before the Duke of Normandy the most important truths of our holy Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion. On the document was laid the ten sous piece which I had given to the old man.”

Vintras immediately concluded that the bringer of the letter was a messenger from heaven and became devoted to the cause of Louis XVII. He became a visionary. He had bloody sweats, he saw hearts painted with his own blood appear on hosts, accompanied by inscriptions in his own spelling. Many believed him a prophet and followed him, among them several priests, who alleged that they partook of his occult vision. Doctors analyzed the fluid which flowed from the hosts and certified it to be human blood. While his enemies referred these miracles to the devil, a small band regarded Vintras as a new Christ.

But one follower named Gozzoli published scandalous accounts of his activities, alleging that horrible obscenities and sacrilegious masses took place in their private chapel at Tilly-sur-seules. The unspeakable abominations alluded to were contained in a pamphlet entitled Le Prophète Vintras (1851). The sect was formally condemned by the pope, and in response Vintras designated himself sovereign Pontiff.

He was arrested on a charge of exploiting his followers for money, tried at Caen, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. When freed in 1845, he went to England and in London resumed his leadership role. In the relative freedom provided in England, he carried on the group's affairs for some time and eventually returned to France and settled in Lyons.

Sources:

Waite, Arthur E. Studies in Mysticism. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1906.

Vishnu Devananda, Swami (1927–1993)

Disciple of the late Swami Sivananda, teacher of hatha yoga, and founder-president of the Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Centers, with branches in Canada, the United States, and Europe. He was born Swamy Kuttan Nair, on December 31, 1927, in Kerala, India. He became a school teacher at the age of 17, then later joined the Indian Army in which he served for two years. By chance he read a pamphlet by Swami Sivananda which emphasized the importance of studying the Hindu scripture Bhagavad-Gita. He did so and felt a strong impulse to visit the Sivananda Ashram. In 1946, while on army leave, he went to Rishikesh and became a disciple of Sivananda's. He decided to leave his family and become a renunciate. He was initiated, settled at the ashram, and became the professor of hatha yoga at the affiliated Yoga Vedanta Forest Academy.

At the suggestion of his guru, he undertook a tour of India, demonstrating hatha yoga asanas (positions) and training many hundreds of individuals. In 1957, he undertook a world tour, spending two years traveling throughout the U.S. and eventually settling in Canada, where he founded a Sivananda Yoga Vedanta Center. Of the several students of Sivanada operating in North America, he is the one recognized by the Divine Life Society, the Sivananda organization in India.

He became the first yoga instructor to obtain a pilot's license and flew a private "peace plane" decorated by artist Peter Max to such disturbed areas of the world as Northern Ireland, West Pakistan and the Suez Canal, dropping peace leaflets. He established yoga centers in twenty-five communities, including a large yoga camp in Quebec, Canada, and another in the Bahamas. He also founded True World Order, an organization dedicated to yoga harmony, health, peace, and vegetarianism. International headquarters of the Sivananda Yoga Ashram is at 673 8th Ave., Val Morin, PQ, Canada J0T 2R0.

Swami Sivananda died of kidney failure in 1993.

Sources:

Vishnu Devananda, Swami. The Complete Illustrated Book of Yoga. Julian Press, 1960.

———. Meditation and Mantras. New York: OM Lotus Publishing, 1978.

———. The Sivananda Upanishad. New York: OM Lotus Publishing, 1987.

Vision (Ocular and Inner)

Ocular vision is the perception of material objects in accordance with optical laws from a definite point in space. Difficult to classify are those rare cases when the sense of sight is transposed and the subject "sees" with his elbows, forehead, fingertips or stomach, since it is not clear what mechanism of vision is involved.

Inner vision is independent of space, objective existence, and, seemingly, optical laws. The simplest type of inner vision is presented by memory images, waking dreams, and images of imagination. The latter type may attain such an intensity as to emerge spontaneously and reach the pitch of hallucination.

Hallucination is the widest extent of inner vision. Dreams represent the primary type. They are hallucinations of low intensity. Generally, hallucinations appear to conform to all factors of ocular vision—space, optical laws, objectivity. The images appear externalized in space.

Indeed, objectivity in some cases of hallucinations may be more than an appearance, as some believe that a camera may register an apparition when outwardly nothing is visible and the vision must have taken place internally (see psychic photography). A still stronger proof of objectivity is furnished by cases of veridical visions in which the perception is afterward found to be a true visual representation of incidents taking place at a distance.

On the other hand, no objectivity is discoverable in degenerative hallucinations, the dogs and snakes of the drunkard, the scarlet fire of the epileptic, or the visions of the psychotic.

Inner vision may be developed empirically in crystal gazing and afford fruitful study for the determination of what elements are externalized from the subconscious mind of the sryer or of discarnate intelligences. Visions may also be distinguished as either spontaneous or induced. (See also Transposition of the Senses.)

Vision Magazine

Vision Magazine, self-described as a "Catalyst for Conscious Living," is a New Age networking tabloid serving San Diego and the surrounding counties in Southern California. Similar to other networking magazines, it attempts to keep readers informed of events and services in the constantly changing post-New Age scene. It seeks to offer a model for a more conscious, peaceful, and healthful world.

Each issue carries a series of short articles that highlight individuals and groups who are active in San Diego or who are visiting the area to put on special programming. Articles are organized so as to present the spectrum of reader interest from natural health to astrology and food. There are also one or two feature articles, often interviews conducted by one of the editors with leading figures in the national metaphysical or holistic health world.

Vision Magazine functions as a means for New Age practitioners to reach potential clients, and each issue devotes a significant amount of space to advertisements that inform readers where they may contact an astrologer, a meditation teacher, a hypnotist, a qigong teacher, or a spiritual community. Ads are selected from those organizations deemed to provide tools that are inspirational, solve problems, and provide dialogue on health, the environment, and the future course of society. The bulk of the ads are grouped into a "Monthly Calendar" and a "Community Resource Directory." The advertising supports the magazine, which is distributed freely throughout Southern California.

Vision Magazine began in 1994 and is published monthly from its headquarters at 4452 Park Blvd., Ste. 211, San Diego, CA 92116. It is edited by Sydney Murray and Kendall Klug. Vision Magazine has also extended itself into the Internet with a site found at <http://www.visionmagazine.com/>. Unlike most similar sites, however, Vision's editors have moved to transform their Internet presence into an extension of the networking services offered by the magazine rather than simply an Internet description of the magazine.

Sources:

Vision Magazine. San Diego, Calif., n.d.

Vision Magazine. <http://visionmagazine.com/>. March 15, 2000.

Visions

Term derived from Latin visus, past participle of videre, to see, indicating the appearance to human beings of supernatural persons or scenes. Of great frequency in early and medieval times, and among primitive or semi-civilized races, visions seem to have decreased proportionately with the advance of learning and enlightenment. Thus, among the Greeks and Romans of the classic period, they were comparatively rare, although visions of demons or gods were occasionally seen. On the other hand, among Oriental races, the seeing of visions was a common occurrence, and these visions took more varied shapes.

In medieval Europe, visions were almost commonplace, and directions were given by the church to enable men to distinguish visions of divine origin from false delusions which were either self-generated or the work of the demons and/or the devil.

Visions may be roughly divided into two classes—those which are spontaneous and those which are induced. The great majority belong to the latter class.

In 1854, Joseph Ennemoser, in his work The History of Magic, enumerated causative factors in the appearance of visions to an individual: (1) a sensitive organism and delicate constitution; (2) a religious education and ascetic life (fasting, penance, etc.); (3) narcotics—opium, wine, incense, narcotic salves (witch-salves); (4) delirium, monomania; and/or (5) fear and expectation, preparatory words, songs, and prayers.

Among the visions induced by prayer and fasting and the severe self-discipline of the religious ascetic, must be included many historical or traditional instances—the visions of St.

Francis of Assisi, St. Anthony, St. Bernard Ignatius, St. Catherine of Siena, St. Hildegard, and Joan of Arc. It may be noted that the convent has often been the special haunt of religious visions. A wave of apparitions of the Virgin Mary began in France early in the nineteenth century and several hundred incidents have been reported in the intervening decades to the present time. (See Garabandal; Medjugorje)

But the most potent means for the induction of visionary appearances are those discovered and used by indigenous people around the world. Over the ages people have indulged in narcotic substances, especially those with hallucinogenic properties, from opium and hashish to peyote. They have also used a variety of spiritual, psychic, and physical disciplines. Thus some fakirs, yogis, and other practitioners have been known to gaze for hours at a time at one object or remain for months in practically the same position, or practice various mortifications of the body, so that they may fall at length into a visionary state. Another ancient method of inducing visionary experience was staring into a shiny object such as a crystal or magic mirror.

The narcotic salves with which some anoint themselves are said to be similar to the witch unguents used in the Middle Ages, which induced in the witch the hallucination that she was flying through the air on a goat or a broomstick. Opium is also said to produce a sensation of flying, as well as visions of celestial delight. Alcoholic intoxication can induce visions of a more negative nature, most notably of insects or animals, as those who have experienced delirium can attest. Nitrogen may have a similar effect. The vapors rising from the ground in some places, or those found in certain caverns, are said to exercise an influence similar to that of narcotics.

Native Americans practiced external methods of inducing visions—solitude, fasting, and the use of salves or ointments. The vision quest was a popular activity of young men in many tribes. In some African, West Indian, and Arabic countries certain dances produced altered conferences, helping participants toward the desired visionary ecstasy. Rhythmic and repetitive music also assisted this process.

Spontaneous Visions

Spontaneous visions, although less common, are yet sufficiently numerous to merit attention here. The difficulty is, of course, to know just how far “fear and expectation” may have operated to induce the vision. In many cases, as in that of the seer Emanuel Swedenborg, the visions may have commenced as “visions of the night,” hardly to be distinguished from dreams, and so from vision of an “internal” nature to clearly externalized apparitions. Swedenborg himself declared that when seeing visions of the latter class he used his senses exactly as when awake, dwelling with the spirits as a spirit, but able to return to his body when he pleased. The artist Benvenuto Cellini, like Swedenborg, had a number of spontaneous visions, though little of the same positive results.

Visions are by no means confined to the sense of sight. Taste, hearing, smelling, and touch may all be experienced in a vision. Joan of Arc, for instance, heard voices encouraging her to be the deliverer of her country. Examples may be drawn from the Hebrew Bible, as the case of the child Samuel in the temple (1 Sam. 3:4), and instances could be multiplied from all ages and all times.

The visions of John Pordage (1607–1681) and the “Philadelphia Society,” or, as they called themselves later, the “Angelic Brethren,” a British organization stemming from the mysticism of Jakob Boehme in 1651, were noteworthy in this respect because they included the taste of “brimstone, salt, and soot.” In the presence of the “Angelic Brethren,” pictures were drawn on the windowpanes by invisible hands and were seen to move about.

Physiological explanations of visions have, from the earliest times, been offered. Plato observed:

“The eye is the organ of a fire which does not burn but gives a mild light. The rays proceeding from the eye meet those of the outward light. With the departure of the outward light the inner also becomes less active; all inward movements become calmer and less disturbed; and should any more prominent influences have remained they become in various points where they congregate, so many pictures of the fancy.”

Democritus held that visions and dreams are passing shapes, ideal forms proceeding from other beings. Of death-bed visions Plutarch said:

“It is not probable that in death the soul gains new powers which it was not before possessed of when the heart was confined within the chains of the body; but it is much more probable that these powers were always in being, though dimmed and clogged by the body; and the soul is only then able to practise them when the corporeal bonds are loosened, and the drooping limbs and stagnating juices no longer oppress it.”

The Spiritualist theory of visions can hardly be called a physiological one, save insofar as spirit may be regarded as refined matter. An old theory of visionary ecstasy on these lines was that the soul left the body and proceeded to celestial spheres, where it remained in contemplation of divine scenes and persons.

In modern times, the idea of the soul as an entity distinct from the physical body has been studied under the name of out-of-the-body travel. Stemming from this concept is the modern study of near-death experiences, in which individuals regarded as clinically dead have been revived and have described visionary experiences (see death).

Similar to this was the doctrine of Swedenborg, whose spirit, he believed, could commune with discarnate spirits (the souls of the dead) as one of themselves. To this may be traced the doctrines of modern Spiritualism, which thus regarded visions as actual spirits or spirit scenes, visible to the ecstatic or entranced subject whose spirit was projected to discarnate planes.

The question whether or not visions are contagious has been much disputed. It has been said that such appearances may be transferred from one person to another by the laying on of hands. In the case of those Scottish seers who claimed second sight, such a transference may take place even by accidental contact with the seer. The vision of the second person is, however, less distinct than that of the original seer.

The same idea prevailed with regard to the visions of “magnetized” patients in the days of animal magnetism. Insofar as these may be identified with the collective hallucinations of the hypnotic state, there is no definite scientific evidence to prove their existence.

Visions occur to people of all cultures and all states and positions. They come to the irreligious and educated, and by no means have they been confined to the ignorant or the superstitious. Many men of genius have been subject to visionary appearance. While Raphael was trying to paint the Madonna, she appeared to him in a vision. The famous composition known as the “Devil’s Sonata” was said to have been dictated to Tartini by the devil himself. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe also had visions. William Blake’s portraits of the Patriarchs were done from visionary beings which appeared to him in the night. There have been a number of such instances.

Sources:

Barrett, Sir William. Death Bed Visions. London: Methuen, 1926.

Besterman, Theodore. Crystal-Gazing: A Study in the History, Distribution, Theory and Practice of Scrying. London: William Rider, 1924. Reprint, New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1965.

Fielding-Ould, Fielding. The Wonders of the Saints in the Light of Spiritualism. London: John M. Watkins, 1919.

Halifax, Joan. Shamanic Voices: A Survey of Visionary Narratives. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1979.

Hall, Manly P. Visions and Metaphysical Experiences. Los Angeles: Philosophical Research Society, n.d.

Huxley, Aldous. The Doors of Perception. London: Chatto & Windus, 1954. Reprint, New York: Harper & Row, 1970.

Klonsky, Milton. William Blake: The Seer and His Visions. New York: Crown Publishers, 1977.

Lewis, David. The Life of S. Teresa of Jesus. London, 1970.

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1929.

Pordage, John. Truth Appearing Through the Clouds of Underserved Scandal. N.p., 1655.

Ring, Kenneth. Life at Death; A Scientific Investigation of the Near-Death Experience. New York: William Morrow, 1980.

Visions (Magazine)

Monthly publication containing articles on psychic phenomena, energy fields, and unorthodox healing. It was published by the American National Institute for Psychical Research. Last known address: 11222 La Cienega Blvd., Inglewood, CA 90304.

Visitants

Another term for spirit apparitions.

Vitality

Vitality is a name given that force or principle possessed by living things. In the case of human beings, controversy has long raged between those who interpret vitality mechanistically as the energy derived from food and oxygen intake and those who support theories of vitalism, a doctrine that the origin and phenomena of life derive from a vital principle as distinct from a purely chemical or physical force.

Vitalists argue that the mechanistic view appears inadequate as a matter of everyday experience, since there are limits to the vitality obtainable from oxidation of food and air. At a certain point of eating and breathing one becomes tired, and it is impossible to regain vitality without rest and sleep. Exactly what happens in the sleep state to enhance vitality is still not entirely clear. It does appear, however, that the human body is not simply an internal combustion machine, but rather an energy transforming machine. Contrary to the energy combustion view is the fact that fasting may often enhance vitality rather than deplete it.

The mind also has a profound effect on the vital condition of the body, as, vitalists further suggest, is clear from one's attitude to life, as well as the special phenomena of hypnosis and the profound effects which are possible through meditation techniques. It would seem that subtle processes are involved in energy transformation of food and air and the relationship of such transformation to the psychic life of human beings and their mental activities, states of consciousness, and sociological and spiritual aspirations.

Various great religions posit the existence of an individual soul as an essential principle of a human being, influenced by the physical and mental life as well as by environment and food intake, but independent from the physical body and surviving it after death. Spiritualists and psychical researchers have offered evidence for such survival, while materialists have argued that the phenomena presented as evidence of such apparent survival may be nothing more than mental artifacts. However, even this latter view also predicates mental life as capable of existing in a form almost as subtle as that of the claimed soul.

From a subjective point of view, the experience of out-of-the-body travel or astral projection has usually carried an overwhelming awareness of individuality as distinct from the body, which it apparently leaves, and for many individuals the experience has been one of deep religious conviction. J. Sylvan Muldoon, a pioneer writer on the subject, has argued in the light of his out-of-the-body experiences that the sleep state is a condition of vitality transfer between a "soul body" and the physical body, drawing upon some subtle life force outside the body.

Such a view is similar to the Polynesian concept of mana and the Hindu concept of prana, a subtle principle in the air and in food that is transformed into kundalini, energy in the body. A proportion of kundalini remains static in the body, but may become dynamic in sexual activity. It may also be diverted to subtle centers in the body through the spinal column by the practice of meditation in conjunction with the psycho-physical effects of purification of the mind and emotions, traditionally through self-purification and ethical living. Ancient Hindu treatises on prana have described at length the atomic structure of matter and its connection with the subtle currents of prana operating in the universe generally, as well as modified in the individual human being.

Sources:

Carrington, Hereward. Vitality, Fasting and Nutrition. New York: Rebman, 1908.

Crookall, Robert. During Sleep: The Possibility of "Co-Operation" Between the Living and the Dead. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1974.

Gopi, Krishna. The Biological Basis of Religion and Genius. New York: Harper & Row, 1972.

Hollander, Bernard. In Search of the Soul and the Mechanism of Thought, Emotion, and Conduct. 2 vols. London: Kegan Paul; New York: E. P. Dutton, 1920.

LeShan, Lawrence L. The Medium, The Mystic and The Physicist. New York: Viking; London: Turnstone Books, 1974.

Muldoon, Sylvan J., and Hereward Carrington. The Projection of the Astral Body. London: Rider, 1920.

Rama Prasad. The Science of Breath and the Philosophy of Tattvas . . . Nature's Finer Forces. 3rd rev. ed., Adhyr, Madras, India: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1897.

Wheeler, L. Richmond. Vitalism: Its History and Validity. London: Witherby, 1939.

Vitality (Magazine)

Vitality, the primary New Age networking periodical serving Toronto and surrounding communities in Ontario, Canada, emerged in the 1980s and during the 1990s grew into a substantive bimonthly magazine with more than 100 pages per issue. Vitality began as a self-described "wellness journal" primarily as an organ of the holistic health community and through the mid-1990s concentrated its attention on natural foods, herbs, nutrition, alternative psychologies, various body work therapies, and related other forms of drugless and noninvasive healing treatments. However, as the decade progressed, while the holistic health emphasis remains, the attention of the magazine grew to encompass all of the psychic and spiritual concerns of the post-New Age.

Vitality sees itself as an information organ. Each issue highlights the organizations and events that constitute holistic health and the New Age. As with most networking magazines, it is built around the advertisements placed by organizations that sponsor events and individuals who offer services to the public. Four times a year, Vitality publishes a pullout supplement, the "Vitality Resource Directory," in which coming events and major holistic organizations are listed.

Each issue carries a set of feature articles, the majority on health issues. There are also a set of columns that treat astrology, New Age lifestyles, and meetings and gatherings in the Toronto area. Vitality sees its purpose as providing an antidote to the world situation by offering a positive vision of the New Age of wholeness and health for body and soul.

Vitality is distributed as a free magazine in metaphysical and health food stores in Ontario, but subscriptions for home delivery may be obtained at 356 Dupont St., Toronto, ON Canada M5R 1V9.

Sources:

Vitality. Toronto, Ontario, Canada, n.d.

Vivekananda, Swami (1863–1902)

Hindu monk who became the leading interpreter of Yoga and Hinduism in the West; founder of the Ramakrishna Mission. Born as Narendra Nath Dutt in Calcutta in a Bengali family, January 12, 1863, he was educated at a Christian College in Calcutta. Here he was much impressed by the analytic and scientific methods of Westerners. For a time, Narendra was influenced by the Brahma Samaj movement, but its rationalistic spirit did not altogether satisfy him.

When eighteen years old, he first met his spiritual teacher Sri Ramakrishna, who was much impressed by the boy's beautiful singing. Within a couple of years, Narendra was won over by the deep spiritual realization of Sri Ramakrishna and became his follower.

He made a number of visits to Sri Ramakrishna at Dakshineswar, but after the death of his father he was obliged to take charge of family affairs and got a job in an attorney's office. Eventually he persuaded Sri Ramakrishna to use his spiritual powers to ensure that his mother and brothers would never lack food and clothing, then renounced his worldly life.

Sri Ramakrishna died in 1886 and Narendra adopted the name Vivekananda in 1893, when he sailed from Bombay on May 31 to attend the Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in connection with the World's Fair.

In his opening address he caused tumultuous applause by commencing "Sisters and Brothers of America," and thereafter his simple trenchant style and his grasp of both Hindu and Christian beliefs won over many audiences. His book on Raja Yoga attracted the attention and respect of such enlightened thinkers as William James and Leo Tolstoy. Vivekananda lectured throughout Chicago, Detroit, Boston and New York for two years, then visited England, where he also aroused great enthusiasm, before returning to Calcutta in 1897.

Back in India, he took up the cause of ordinary people with realism as well as spiritual insight, stating: "The great national sin is the neglect of the masses and that is one of the causes of our downfall. No amount of politics would be of any avail until the masses of India are once more well educated and well cared for."

Soon afterwards he established the Ramakrishna Mission for training young monks and preachers. In June 1899, he made a second journey to the West, but by now his strength was giving out. He spent some time in California, which was congenial to his health and his teachings, and in December 1900 returned to India, where he passed away July 4, 1902, in Behur Monastery.

Today there are Ramakrishna Vedanta Centers in a number of countries, and the books of Swami Vivekananda remain one of the best and clearest introductions to Hindu spiritual teachings and yoga. These books are constantly reprinted, and include such popular works as Jnana Yoga, Raja Yoga, Bhakti Yoga, and Karma Yoga. His Collected Works covers eight volumes. The standard biography is by Swami Nikhilananda: Swami Vivekananda; A Biography, Adwaita Ashram, Calcutta, India, 1975.

Vjestica

A name for a witch among the Slavs.

Voices (Paranormal)

Paranormal voices may be objective or subjective. The latter category is covered by clairaudience. The former is on the borderline of apparitions, as in the biblical statement: "And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him: Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? . . . And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, hearing a voice, but seeing no man." (Acts 9:4, 7).

According to Eusebius, a spirit voice was heard by the crowds at the martyrdom of Bishop Polycarp: "Be brave, Oh Polycarp." St. Francis, praying in a little ruined church, heard a voice from the painted wooden crucifix before which he knelt: "Francis, seest thou not that my house is being destroyed? Go, therefore, and repair it for me."

Joan of Arc was started on her mission by voices. "A very bright cloud appeared to her and out of the cloud came a voice." The sentence of death was based on admission of her monitory voices. She heard them first at thirteen years of age. They came mainly when she was awake, but also roused her sometimes from sleep. They were not always intelligible. She believed in them implicitly. The predictions of the voices were mainly fulfilled: the siege of Orleans was raised, Charles VII was crowned at Rheims and Joan was wounded, all as foretold. The preacher George Fox stated in his Journal:

"When my troubles and torments were great, when all my hopes in men were gone so that I had nothing outwardly to help me, nor could I tell what to do, then, O then, I heard a voice which said: 'There is one, even Jesus Christ, that can speak to thy condition.' When I heard it my heart did leap for joy."

Dr. Edwin Ash, in his book Faith and Suggestion (1912), described the case of Dorothy Kerin, who, after a long illness and on the point of death, suddenly heard a voice say "Dorothy." She woke up and saw the bed enveloped in light and a beautiful woman holding an Annunciation lily in her hand, saying "Dorothy, you are quite well," putting the stress on "quite." She became instantly well. For her own account, see Dorothy Kerin's book The Living Touch (1919).

There are various types of clairaudience. As a conscious subjective phenomenon, many writers, from Socrates onward, have claimed that their works were dictated by an inner voice. In automatic writing, psychics and Spiritualist mediums are usually unaware what is being written through their hands. Many Spiritualist mediums go into trance and apparently transmit messages from the spirits of the dead through their own vocal organs, sometimes with the tones and mannerisms of the deceased, but often only an approximation. Inspirational speakers, or channelers, also occasionally speak with the voices of spirit entities, while at other time employing their own vocal mannerisms with only the message being dictated by inner inspiration.

In the case of a clairvoyant, images of the deceased are perceived and described by the mediums, sometimes in conjunction with clairaudient messages. Both clairvoyance and clairaudience are classed as mental phenomena, involving extrasensory perception. In such cases, the voices may be paranormal in origin, but not in manifestation, and sometimes they may be more reasonably credited to unconscious mental activity.

Much controversy has surrounded the phenomenon of "direct voice" in Spiritualist séances, where spirits are claimed to speak independently of the medium, either through a trumpet or through a "voice box" built up from ectoplasm drawn from the medium. Both the use of trumpets and the idea of ectoplasm have been largely abandoned.

In line with modern technological developments, a new type of paranormal vocal phenomenon has emerged—" Raudive voices," or "electronic voice phenomenon." It is claimed that messages, often individual words or phrases apparently from deceased individuals, have appeared paranormally on audiotape recordings. In spite of much research, the evidence is ambiguous, as some apparent successes might be due to a mediumistic power of the investigator, rather than to some susceptibility of audiorecording to communications from deceased individuals.

A variant phenomenon which has been reported anecdotally in modern times is the "electronic visual (or video) phenomenon,” in which it is believed that paranormal images have appeared on videotape recordings. Much research remains to be done before such claims can be validated.

Sources:

Ellis, David. The Mediumship of the Tape Recorder. Pulborough, U.K.: D. J. Ellis, 1978.

Lang, Andrew. The Valet's Tragedy and Other Studies. London: Longmans Green, 1903.

Raudive, Konstantin. Breakthrough: An Amazing Experiment in Electronic Communication with the Dead. Gerrards Cross, UK: Colin Smythe; New York: Taplinger, 1971. Reprint, New York: Lancer Books, 1973.

Smith, Hester Travers. Voices from the Void. London: William Rider, 1919.

Stokes, Doris. Voices in My Ear. London: Futura, 1981.

Swaffer, Hannen. Adventures with Inspiration. London: Kennerly, Morely and Mitchell, 1929.

Volguine, Alexandre (1903–1976)

Prominent French astrologer. In 1937 he founded Les Cahiers Astrologiques, a forum of French astrological research, which he edited until his death in 1976. He wrote a number of works on astrology, some of which have now been published in English translation.

Sources:

Volguine, Alexandre. Lunar Astrology. New York: ASI Publishers, 1974.

———. The Ruler of the Nativity. New York: ASI Publishers, 1973.

———. The Technique of Solar Returns. New York: ASI Publishers, 1976.

Vollhardt, Maria (Frau Rudloff) (ca. 1925)

A physical medium whom Dr. F. Schwab, author of Teleplasma und Telekinese (Berlin, 1923) made the subject of searching studies for two years. Vollhardt, the wife of an official in the Berlin Postal Ministry, produced telekinesis (movements of objects at a distance), levitations, apports, ectoplasm and stigmata phenomena of a baffling character.

In his book My Psychic Adventures (1924), psychical researcher J. Malcolm Bird wrote of having seen a quantity of irritated-looking puncture wounds, some actually bleeding, appear in a rough square pattern on the medium's hand. The only suggestion he could make for normal duplication was a battery of three or four forks or a section of nutmeg grater. The mystery of how such wounds were produced deepened when the sitters declared that they had seen on Vollhardt's hand a small object, the shape of a bird's beak, or claw. They put a pot full of farina on the table and asked for an imprint. They got it—in the shape of a chicken's foot.

Once the medium's hand was stigmatized across the hand of one of the sitters who was controlling her. At each puncture, the medium gave a sharp cry of pain. She stated that she felt as though an electric current had entered at the skin and passed through the body.

Schwab observed the phenomenon some fifty times outside the séance room in good light. When he made photographs with a stereoscopic camera he got a picture of a sort of claw of several branches, poised upon the perfectly controlled hand of the medium. He believed it was a materialized symbol of the medium's subconscious notion of oppression and torture.

In 1925, Vollhardt figured in court proceedings. At a séance given to a number of scientists and doctors, her arms, linked up in the orthodox manner, were found, on the lights being turned up, encircled by two massive rings. Albert Moll refused to believe in the penetration of matter passing through matter and later declared in a book that the medium must have had the rings concealed under her sleeves. The medium retorted with libel proceedings and offered to demonstrate her powers before the Bench. The offer came to nothing as Moll insisted that the demonstration should be done in daylight.

Degner testified on behalf of Vollhardt. The court found Moll guilty of calumny, but acquitted him as his statement was made “in defense of justified interests.” The medium appealed against the acquittal and lost her case. Prof. Busch testified that the apports produced were fraudulently introduced by the medium while in a “semi-conscious condition.”

Sources:

Bird, J. Malcolm. My Psychic Adventures. New York: Scientific American Publishing, 1924.

Volometer

An instrument invented by Dr. Sydney Alritz (1868–1925) of Uppsala University, Sweden, to measure will as a dynamic power.

Von Däniken, Erich (1935–)

Swiss writer whose 1969 book, Chariots of the Gods, gave focus to a wave of popular interest in the idea that in ancient times the earth was visited by extraterrestrials whose presence is documented in a variety of archeological remains. Born in Zofingen, Switzerland, April 14, 1935, he was brought up in a conservative Roman Catholic setting at St. Michel College in Fribourg. At an early age von Däniken was fascinated by “inconsistencies” between religious doctrine and the accounts of mysterious events in the Bible. After leaving school, he took various jobs in hotels, and this seasonal work left him with spare time that he spent in traveling and reading. He visited South America, Russia and Egypt, seeing firsthand many of the monuments of the ancient past.

In his reading, he was particularly impressed by the biblical account of Ezekiel's fiery wheel and by Sumerian accounts of the coming of the Sun God in the ancient epic of Gilgamesh. Von Däniken began to evolve a theory of sky-borne gods in vehicles resembling accounts of flying saucers, built around the religious legends and myths of ancient civilizations. With the advent of American and Soviet space travel, such theories became much more plausible to many people.

In 1961, von Däniken started publishing articles about his theories and by 1966 had prepared a book, Erinnerungen an die Zukunft, which was published in Germany and serialized in the Swiss newspaper Die Weltwoche. This book was translated into English and published in England in 1969 and in the United States the following year under the title Chariots of the Gods? Von Däniken's introduction stated:

“I claim that our forefathers received visits from the universe in [the] remote past. Even though I do not know who these extraterrestrial intelligences were or from which planet they came, I nevertheless proclaim that these ‘strangers’ annihilated part of mankind existing at the time and produced a new, perhaps the first homo sapiens.”

As evidence, von Däniken cited accounts of cosmic battles in ancient legends and inscriptions suggestive of space travel. In later books he supported his theories by further legends, traveler's tales and photographs of ancient religious inscriptions.

Critics jumped upon von Däniken's facile interpretations such as his claims that Mayan temple figures and inscriptions represent spacemen at the controls of their vehicles. Such interpretations pulled odd artifacts out of their cultural context, revealed a significant misunderstanding of ancient cultural motifs, and falsely assumed that “ancient” astronauts would employ “twentieth-century” technology and design.

More crucial to his credibility, however, von Däniken admitted to falsifying his presentation. In an interview on the PBS

Nova science program on television in 1978, he confessed that he had not really explored an artifact-filled cave in South America as claimed in his book The Gold of the Gods (1973). In fact the artifacts were brass, not gold. He admitted:

“No that did not happen, but I think when somebody writes books in my style and in my sense, which are not scientific books, we call it in German ‘Sachbucher.’ It’s a kind of popular book but it’s not science fiction, though all the facts do exist but with other interpretations. Then an author is allowed to use effects. So some little things like this are not really important because they do not touch the facts . . .”

This astonishing defense of falsehood in order to strengthen a romantic interpretation of facts necessarily casts doubt on Von Däniken’s theories. Von Däniken has not appeared perturbed by adverse criticism from scholars and scientists. He believes that his unconventional interpretations of mythology and archaeology will be generally accepted in the course of time.

Von Däniken has found his strongest support in the writings of Zecharia Sitchin. His theories have been debunked by Ronald Story and Clifford Wilson. In light of the intense criticism the idea of ancient astronauts received in the late 1970s, the wave of interest in the idea subsided and new books on the subject have become quite rare.

Sources:

Sitchin, Zecharia. The 12th Planet. New York: Stein and Day, 1976.

———. The Wars of Gods and Men. New York: Avon, 1985.

Story, Ronald D. The Space-Gods Revealed. New York: Harper & Row, 1976; Barnes & Noble, 1978.

Von Däniken, Erich. According to the Evidence: My Proof of Man’s Extraterrestrial Origin. London: Souvenir, 1977.

———. Chariots of the Gods? London: Souvenir Press, 1969. Reprint, New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1970.

———. The Gods and Their Grand Design: the Eighth Wonder of the World. London: Souvenir, 1984.

———. The Gold of the Gods. London: Souvenir Press, 1973.

———. In Search of Ancient Gods; My Pictorial Evidence for the Impossible. London: Souvenir Press, 1974.

Wilson, Clifford. Crash Go the Chariots. New York: Lancer, 1972.

Voudou

The African-based religion of Haiti. Voudou can be traced to the first Africans brought to Haiti in the sixteenth century. However, it was during the years of French acquisition of land in Haiti that the bulk of African people were brought to the island. Between 1664 and 1830 some 1,650,000 Africans arrived in Haiti. The dominant group came from Dahomey, and the Dahomean religion became the most important element in the emergence of Voudou.

The Africans brought with them beliefs found throughout West Africa, including a belief in a supreme deity or divine power. In Haiti that deity came to be known as le Bon Diei (the Good God). This deity had largely withdrawn from human affairs, but under him were a number of greater and lesser deities. Among the major deities were Legba, Erzulie, and Damballah. The lesser deities (loas) are numerous, and are of two varieties, those of African origin (the Rada) and those of Haitian origin (Péto). Many of the African deities, especially those tied to local sites, did not survive the Atlantic crossing, and they were replaced with new local deities. The name Péto derived, according to oral tradition, from a man named Don Pédro who introduced a distinctive dance into Haitian religion.

The plantation owners in Haiti attempted to impose Catholicism on the slave population. One of the means by which Voudou survived was in the identification of the loas with various Catholic saints. Thus Legba was identified with Saint Anthony, Erzulie with the Virgin Mary, and Damballah with Saint Patrick. Damballah is pictured as a snake, and, as in Ireland, there are practically no snakes in Haiti. Hence the association with St. Patrick.

Voudou worship and practice is conducted by male (oungan) and female (manbo) priests. They operate out of a worship center called ounfo. In the center of the ounfo is a peristil, a pole that usually has a representation of Damballah coiled around it. Worship includes honoring the deities (which may involve the sacrifice of various animals), lively dancing with drum accompaniment, and the possession of priests or others in attendance by loas.

Like all West African religion, Voudou includes the practice of magic. Voudou has a particularly bad image, even among other African-based religions, as the home to much sorcery (malevolent magic), even to the extent of the calling forth of zombies, dead people brought back to life to handle menial labor in the fields.

The image of evil attached to Voudou in the popular imagination seems to have begun with what is known as the Affaire de Bizoton. On December 27, 1863, a little girl of the town of Bizoton was kidnapped and used in a sinister cannibalistic ritual. Eventually the perpetrators were caught, tried, and convicted. While the actions of the people who had killed the girl were offensive to all, in the popular press, especially the foreign press, the actions of the murderers were identified with the Voudou community. Besides the gruesome stories printed at the time, in the 1880s a volume on Haiti by Sir Spenser St. John describes the incident in vivid detail and uses it in a diatribe against Voudou. His work has been followed by a variety of writings, varying from the academic to the journalistic to the merely exploitive, that point a self-righteous finger at Voudou adherents.

There is, of course, an element of magic, even of black magic in Voudou, but it operates quite differently than outsiders have usually presented it. Besides the oungans and manbos, there are bocors (sorcerers), and caplatas (lesser magical functionaries). Most magic is used to ward off evil. Charms ward off the evil eye and various loas are seen as the cause of the different ills people suffer. Magic will be applied to discover the loa responsible and the means of getting the loa to go away. There are also accounts of evil spirits, creatures such as vampires and werewolves.

During the eighteenth century, the ruling class did not take particular notice of Voudou. They tended to identify it with the nocturnal gatherings most notable for dancing. The dancing drums, however, served as a communication system across Haiti, and in 1804 they became the means of organizing a massive and successful revolt. Haitians were able to pull off the revolution without the aid of a great leader because they were united by their religious beliefs. Those beliefs, including the protection of the loas, allowed them to rise against the better-armed rulers.

The use of Voudou in this revolt led the first black ruler of Haiti to oppose it. Later rulers embraced Voudou, most notably Jean-Claude Duvalier, who promoted his own image as a great Voudou magician and his use of Voudou priests in his militia.

Voudou was brought to the United States in 1804 and the years following the Haitian revolt. It spread through the black population of New Orleans and the surrounding countryside. It found its most famous practitioner in Marie Laveau in the mid-nineteenth century. Legal measures were taken to curb its power in the years prior to the Civil War, but they merely drove the practice underground. It survives today, both in a public mode accessible to tourists and as a semisecret religious community. In the 1920s it provided inspiration for the development of African American Spiritualism and the Spiritual Church movement.

Sources:

Bisnauth, Dale. History of Religion in the Caribbean. Kingston, Jamaica: Kingston Publishers, 1989.

David, Wade. The Serpent and the Rainbow. New York: Warner, 1985.

Denning, Melita, and Osborne Phillips. Voudou Fire: The Living Reality of Mystical Religion. St. Paul: Llewellyn Publications, 1979.

Deren, Maya. Divine Horsemen: The Voodoo Gods of Haiti. New York: Chelsea House, 1970.

Leyburn, James G. The Haitian People. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1966.

Selden, Rodman. Spirits of the Night. Dallas: Spring, 1992.

Vril

A word invented by Edward Bulwer Lytton, famous novelist, politician and occultist, to describe a kind of psychic energy.

It was featured in his book Vril: Power of the Coming Race (1871), which told how “Vril” enabled a race to reach a high degree of civilization and develop a Utopian society without poverty, inequality, or war. Lytton himself had some connections with occultism and received the magician Éliphas Lévi at his house. The idea of Vril was very much in tune with ideas of magical power that Lytton had previously espoused in his books and which continue to be used by occultists to the present time. In prewar Germany there was a Vril Society founded in Berlin.

Sources:

Lytton, Edward Bulwer. Vril: Power of the Coming Race. Edinburgh; London: W. Blackwood and Sons, 1871.

W

WADL See Witches Anti-Defamation League

Wafer (in Devil Worship)

The sacred wafer used in the Christian Eucharist is frequently cited as a prized item in devil worship for purposes of profanation. When Satanism was invented in the late fifteenth century by Roman Catholic inquisitors, no phenomenon existed which could be called Satanism. The inquisitors envisioned Satanism as a reversal of Christianity, the devil being the opposite of God. Devil worship, then, would be a reversal of Christian rituals, primarily the Roman Catholic Mass. Thus a Satanist would speak the Lord's prayer in reverse. The idea of a cult that parodied and profaned Christianity was in all likelihood built out of incidents in which different individuals, over the centuries, actually performed individual sacrilegious acts.

It was rumored that Satanists would attempt to obtain consecrated hosts or wafers from the chalice of a church altar to be profaned in some manner. Sometimes, a turnip was said to be colored black and used to imitate a host wafer.

The practice of Satanism was recorded in the memory and documents of the Christian Church in the West but no actual incident of devil worship occurred until the time of Louis XIV of France, although it was alleged that in the house of the Irish sorcerer, Dame Alice Kyteler, a wafer of sacramental bread was found bearing the name of the Devil.

Sources:

Robbins, Rossell Hope. The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology. New York: Crown Publishers, 1959.

Wagner, Edward A. (1906–1982)

Journalist and astrologer, born in Philadelphia on November 15, 1906. As a youth he moved with his family to Cleveland, Ohio, where he finished high school. In 1924 he went to work for the Cleveland Press. He emerged from obscurity to become an assistant to Harry Houdini in the exposure of Spiritualist frauds and charlatans. Houdini died in 1926 and Wagner turned his attention to astrology with the idea of publishing a Houdini-like exposé. In order to carry out that task, Wagner immersed himself in the subject, learning to cast horoscope charts and interpret them. In the process he was converted to a belief in astrology, and rather than write an exposé, he became a professional astrologer. He affiliated with the Rosicrucian Fellowship and eventually moved to Oceanside, California, as the fellowship's assistant superintendent of publications.

In the early 1930s Wagner established a business in Los Angeles and for two years published the National Astrological Journal (1933–35). In 1936 he began a nationally syndicated column, "Your Daily Forecast," which continued until the general discontinuance of astrological columns during World War II (a voluntary gesture of the journalistic and astrological community due to Hitler's use of astrology). Wagner served in the army during the war. In 1946 he established a weather forecasting business, but also became the editor-in-chief for Dell Publishing Company (1946–73). Dell published, amid its many astrological publications, Horoscope magazine. In 1973 Wagner was named consulting executive editor of Horoscope, and he was named editor emeritus in 1975. He died in May of 1982.

Sources:

Holden, James H., and Robert A. Hughes. Astrological Pioneers of America. Tempe, Ariz.: American Federation of Astrologers, 1988.

Waite, Arthur Edward (1857–1942)

A British scholar and historian of occultism and mysticism. Waite was born on October 2, 1857, in Brooklyn, New York, and brought to London, England, by his family when he was an infant. He was educated in Roman Catholic schools. As a boy, he cherished an affection for "penny dreadfuls," the romantic popular pulp literature of the day.

Waite grew up during the first European renaissance of occultism which stretched from the end of the nineteenth century to the outbreak of World War I, and his personal friends included Arthur Machen and Ralph Shirley. He also met William Butler Yeats, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, Annie Besant, Rudolf Steiner, Wynn Westcott, Algernon Blackwood, and Aleister Crowley.

Waite regularly contributed to Shirley's Occult Review, and for some twenty years he edited anonymously its monthly "Review of Periodical Literature." During this period he acquired a knowledge of the major current developments in occultism all over the world.

He was also a Freemason and authority on Masonic writings. He was responsible for the first British publication of many important occult and mystical texts. He translated and publicized the writings of occultist Éliphas Lévi (Alphonse Louis Constant).

In 1891 Waite joined the Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn but quit in less than a year believing his time was better spent studying and translating alchemical texts. He developed a negative attitude toward all magical ritual and believed that rituals differed primarily in the amount of black magic they contained.

Waite became a devoted mystic and in the wake of the collapse of the Golden Dawn in 1915, he founded the Fellowship of the Rosy Cross. He believed that suitably constructed rituals, which he endeavored to write, that had a dramatic form but were of a religious (devotional) rather than magical (manipulative) format, could assist the mystical quest.

Waite was involved in the transition from the first to the second generation of the occult revival. He was a productive occult writer and produced some historical texts and translations. Because he critiqued the magical endeavor, he was disliked and denigrated by occultists, and orthodox mystics distrusted him because of his association with the occult. Recovery of his work has been assisted by the efforts of Robert Gilbert, who has produced a biography and a bibliography of his writings.

Through the twentieth century, Waite was known for his work with Pamela Coleman-Smith in the production of a deck of tarot cards (the Waite deck) and his commentary on the tarot, The Key to the Tarot (1910). Both the deck and the book remain popular in spite of the numerous new divinatory tarot decks that have been produced in the late twentieth century as expressions of the Wiccan and New Age movements.

Waite died May 19, 1942.

Sources:

- Gilbert, Robert A. A. E. Waite: A Bibliography. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Aquarian Press, 1983.
- . A. E. Waite: Magician of Many Parts. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, England: Crucible, Thorsons, 1987.
- Waite, Arthur E. Azoth; or, The Star in the East. London: Theosophical Publishing Society, 1893.
- . The Book of Black Magic and of Pacts. London: George Redway, 1898. Revised as The Book of Ceremonial Magic. London: William Rider, 1911.
- . The Brotherhood of the Rosy Cross. London: William Rider & Sons, 1924.
- . The Hidden Church of the Holy Grail. London: Rebusman, 1909.
- . The Key to the Tarot. London: William Rider, 1910.
- . The Occult Sciences. London: George Redway, 1891. Reprint, Secacus, N.J.: University Books, 1974.
- . The Pictorial Key to the Tarot. London: William Rider, 1911.
- . The Real History of the Rosicrucians. London: George Redway, 1887.
- . Shadows of Life and Thought. London: Selwyn and Blount, 1938.
- . Studies in Mysticism and Certain Aspects of the Secret Tradition. London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1906.

Waldensians

The name of a proto-Protestant Christian sect that arose in the south of France late in the twelfth century C.E. Peter Waldo, a prosperous merchant from Lyon, appeared about 1170 as a wandering preacher. He soon built a substantial following in the same region in which the heretical Albigensians had their centers. However, the Waldensians were a Bible-centered, theologically orthodox group. The Albigensians had adopted a Gnostic religious system that rested somewhat upon that of Manichaeism, with its extreme dualism (a belief that God and evil exist as two equal and opposing forces) and severe asceticism. Waldo's complaints were against much of the undisciplined behavior of priests, and a number of "unbiblical" practices such as pilgrimages, worship of saints, and church wealth, all of which arose as items on the agenda of protestants in the sixteenth century.

Waldensianism's adherents were divided into two classes: "Christ's paupers," who left their secular lives behind; and the "friends" who accepted Waldo's teachings but remained in their secular lives. This division was similar to the two levels of membership among the Cathari. As the movement spread to Italy and Germany, it was carried by wandering preachers who went out in pairs.

After a generation in which the church attempted to win them back to the fold, the Waldensians began to experience persecution about the second decade of the thirteenth century. A number were burned in southern France and Germany, but in Italy they were able to survive by retreating into the Alpine mountain valleys. The group survived primarily in Italy, where they aligned themselves to the sixteenth-century reformation. In the last half of the twentieth century, they emerged as a recognized group in Italy and the Methodist Church of Italy recently merged with them.

During the Middle Ages the spokespersons of the Roman church believed that, like the Albigenses, the Waldensians had a diabolical element in their religion, and from time to time they were classed with the various secret societies that sprang up in medieval Europe, such as the Templars and the Rosicrucians. Although the Waldensians possessed an internal doctrine and disciple accepted by the inner core of adherents, their beliefs and practices were more of an ethical nature and were in no manner associated with the occult or magic.

Sources:

- Westin, Gunnar. The Free Church through the Ages. Nashville, Tenn.: Broadman, 1958.

Walder, Phileas

A Swiss Lutheran minister who became an occultist and Spiritualist, and a friend of French occultist Éliphas Lévi. In the anti-clerical hoax of Léo Taxil (Gabriel Jogand-Pagès), Walder and Miss Sophia Walder were represented as associates of Freemason Albert Pike in the rites of devil worship in Charleston, South Carolina. In reality, Walder was an earnest Freemason and mystic.

WALES

Wales shares with other Celtic countries an ancient mythology and traditional lore, although much of this was suppressed with the spread of Christianity from the fifth century on, and a succession of conquests by Romans, Normans, and English. Many of the enchanted stories of the King Arthur cycle are also found in Welsh tradition.

In the seventeenth century, Puritanism took a firm hold, and the spread of Methodism in the eighteenth century further worked to eradicate traditions of magic, although the religious revivals of the late nineteenth century had a wild, almost Pagan flavor about them and were accompanied by the appearance of various forms of paranormal phenomena.

Ancient Traditions

One of the great sources of Welsh legends is the Mabinogion, dating from medieval times, containing stories for oral recitation by bards in the halls of the ancient princes of Wales. Typical motifs in these tales are supernatural birth, visits to the Other World, and magic shape-changing. Rhiannon, the wife of Pwyll, possessed marvelous birds that came from the Unseen World, and their singing held warriors spellbound for 80 years. In another story, Llevelys helps his brother Ludd to eradicate three plagues that have devastated Britain—the Coranians, a strange race whose knowledge is infinite and who hear everything uttered, even the softest whisper; a horrifying shriek that penetrates every house on a May evening, caused by the battle between two dragons; and a great giant who carries off all the food from the king's palace.

A well-known story is that of the birth of Taliesin, chief of the bards of the west. The hero, Gwion Bach, goes to the Land under Waves at the bottom of Lake Bala in North Wales. There he finds the giant Tegid the Bald and his wife Ceridwen, goddess of poetry and knowledge. Ceridwen owns an immense cauldron in which she brews a mixture of science and inspiration, with the aid of her books of magic. This great brew has to simmer for a year and a day, and she sets the blind man Morda to keep the fire going and Gwion to stir the brew. It is to yield three magical drops.

Toward the end of the year, as Ceridwen is picking herbs and making incantations, three drops of the brew spurt out of the cauldron and fall upon Gwion Bach's finger. With the sudden heat on his finger, he puts it into his mouth to cool, whereupon the three drops instantly give him knowledge and meaning of all things, and he becomes aware that he must guard against Ceridwen's cunning, so he flees to his own land. Meanwhile the cauldron bursts and the rest of the brew is a black poison that overflows into the waters, poisoning the horses of Gwyddno Garanhir.

Ceridwen seizes a billet of wood and strikes blind Morda on the head, but he declares that he is innocent and that it is the fault of Gwion Bach. She runs in pursuit of Gwion, but he sees her coming and changes himself into a hare. She changes herself into a greyhound and follows him. He runs toward a river and becomes a fish, but she, in the form of an otter, chases him under the water, so he must turn himself into a bird. She becomes a hawk and gives him no rest in the sky. Just as she is going to swoop on him, he sees a heap of winnowed wheat on the floor of a barn, so he drops among the wheat and turns himself into one of the grains. She turns herself into a black hen, scratches at the wheat and swallows him.

She carries him for nine months and is delivered of him, but cannot kill him because of his beauty, so she wraps him in a leather bag and casts him into the sea to the mercy of God. He is carried into the weir of Gwyddno Garanhir and found by Prince Elphin, who has come to catch fish in his net. Elphin renames him Taliesin, which can mean “beautiful brow” or “great value.”

Druids

Wales is also considered a center for the cult of the Druids (brought by the Celts), who came into Wales as early as 200 B.C.E. They were said to practice human sacrifice, although it has also been claimed that the victims were criminals. They also employed methods of divination.

The Druids are thought to have come from ancient Gaul, where they were suppressed in the Roman Conquest as a rival source of power and prestige. The historian Pliny the Elder recorded their association with the mistletoe plant in their sacred rites.

He also mentioned a mysterious object used by the Druids, which he named the “serpent’s egg.” It was roughly the size and shape of a small apple, and it was said that a mass of hissing serpents threw this egg into the air. If it could be caught in a white cloak before touching the ground, it would convey powers of magic to the possessor, such as the ability to float against a river current, and success in legal undertakings.

Witchcraft and Demonology

Sir Dafydd Llwyd, who lived in Cardiganshire in the reign of Charles II, had studied black magic at Oxford. He practiced as a physician and was famous for his wonderful cures, but his skill was owed to a familiar spirit or demon that he kept locked up in a book of spells. One day, the story is told, he accidentally left this grimoire behind and sent his pageboy home to fetch it, commanding him to on no account open it. Like most lads the boy could not resist being inquisitive; he lifted the cover and turned over the leaves, with their weird inscriptions.

Suddenly there came forth a huge demon who frowned and in a hoarse grumbling voice asked to be set to work. In spite of his terror, the boy had the wit to say, “Fetch me some stones out of the River Wye.” In a few moments, stones and pebbles began hurtling through the air, when Sir Dafydd, aware that something was wrong, came hurrying back and conjured the spirit back into the book before any serious harm could be done.

As early as the twelfth century, Christian priests in Wales were warned about letting the Eucharistic Host get into the hands of magicians and witches, who might secretly slip it out of their mouths and hide it in a handkerchief or glove. In 1582 the wife of Edward Jones was called upon to prove to the satisfaction of the archdeacon of Lewes “that she did eat the Communion bread and put yt not in hir glove.”

As late as the opening years of the eighteenth century, two old dames were said to have attended the morning service at Llanddewi Brefi Church to partake of Holy Communion, but instead of eating it like the other communicants, they kept it in their mouths and went out. Then they walked round the church nine times, and at the ninth circuit the Devil came out of the church wall in the form of a frog, to whom they gave the Host from their mouths, and by doing this, sold themselves to Satan and became witches.

There are many stories about Dr. John Harries (1785–1839), a celebrated Welsh physician and seer of Cêrt-y-Cadno, Carmarthenshire, who was said to possess a great book of magic, which was kept locked to prevent any ignorant person from letting loose its powerful influences. Harries boasted of his knowledge of future and distant events, imparted to him by familiar spirits.

Belief in witchcraft persisted into the twentieth century in Wales, but it concerned “white witches” who cast useful spells and horoscopes, or averted evil events. In 1933 there was a wise man in Llangwrig, Montgomeryshire, who was famous throughout Wales for breaking the spells of witches. He kept his book of divination and an almanac in a rosewood casket.

In November 1936 a correspondent in John O’London’s Weekly stated that “even now belief in witchcraft in the upper parts of the Wye Valley is not quite extinct.” In the following month, another correspondent stated: “When we lived in a small village in Montgomeryshire some years ago we found a widespread belief in witchcraft among the farmers of the district.” If the cattle became sick, farmers visited the wise man to find out who had bewitched their beasts. If two farmers had a serious quarrel, one of them went to the wise man to obtain a charm to injure his neighbor.

Phenomena at Religious Revivals

Welsh preaching is celebrated for its fervor, and the traditional hwyl or peroration of a sermon is said to have magic effects. During the nineteenth century, there were reports of mysterious luminous phenomena associated with revivalism, and such accounts were given again in 1904 and 1905 during the inspired revival campaigns of Mary Jones of Egryn. Jones was a happily married peasant woman with a family, when in December 1904 she received beatific visions instructing her to undertake the work of religious revival that had earlier been the mission of the preacher Evan Roberts in Glamorgan.

The first night of Jones’ mission was marked by the appearance of a mysterious star and various lights. She herself reported seeing “a circle of small stars, encompassing a cross of diamond stars, and on this cross at times the draped figure of the Saviour.” The strange luminous phenomena were witnessed by other individuals. A skeptical businessman was driving her home one evening from a meeting, and prayed that he might be accorded a sign if she was indeed a divinely ordained preacher. Immediately there appeared above the road, in front of the car, a misty star. As the man gazed a luminous cross was formed inside it, sparkling with diamonds, and upon this was a draped figure with bowed head.

On another occasion, Jones herself reported seeing the Devil, who first appeared in the figure of a man, but when she started singing revival hymns, suddenly stopped, turned on her and became transformed into an enormous black dog. She prayed for strength, and the dog rushed growling into a hill-ock.

The star and the light were seen by many people from the first day of Jones’ mission. The star seemed to rest above particular houses where converts later came to the meetings. It also followed her on her journeys. On her trip to Criccieth, for example, the lights were witnessed by the people with her. At Bryn-crug, a few miles inland from Towyn, the gallery of the chapel was flooded during the service by the mysterious light. After the service, the light, in the form of a ball of fire casting its rays down to earth, was seen by a party of young quarrymen. Overtaking the light, which had stopped, they knelt down in the middle of the road and held a prayer meeting, bathed in the unearthly light.

Some of these lights and their movements are reminiscent of many modern accounts of UFOs.

The Gardnerian Revival

In the last generation, growing out of the initial work of Gerald B. Gardner (the witch of the Isle of Man), a new neopagan witchcraft or Wicca movement spread from England through the British Isles, the lands of the commonwealth, and the United States. As the movement grew and broke into numerous segments, there arose a number who attached themselves to Welsh witchcraft traditions. Among the early covens in the northeastern United States in the 1970s were the New York Coven of Welsh Traditional Witchcraft and the New England Coven of Welsh Traditional Witchcraft, which supplemented their Gardnerian rituals with material from folkloric, archeological, and anthropological texts on Wales. Several significant groups—the most notable possibly the Church and School of Wicca (Box 1502, New Bern, NC 28560) and the Cymry Wicca (Box 4196, Athens, GA 30605)—claim to draw on Welsh traditions. In addition, many modern witches, drawing on the Mabinogion, have chosen such names as Ceridwen and Taliesin as their religious names.

Sources:

Adler, Margot. Drawing Down the Moon. Boston, Mass.: Beacon Press, 1987.

Charlton, I. W. The Revival in Wales. London, 1905. (Pamphlet)

Graves, Robert. The White Goddess. London: Faber & Faber, 1948.

Guest, Lady Charlotte, trans. The Mabinogion: From the Llyfr Coch o Hergest. 3 vols. London, 1948.

Jones, Edmund. A Relation of Ghosts and Apparitions Which Commonly Appear in the Principality of Wales. Bristol, England: 1767.

Jones, T. Gwynn. Welsh Folklore and Folk Customs. London: Methuen, 1930.

Morgan, J. V. The Welsh Religious Revival, 1904–05. London: Chapman & Hall, 1909.

Walker, Kenneth Macfarlane (1882–1966)

Surgeon and author of books relating to parapsychology and mysticism. Walker was born in 1882 in London, England. He studied at Cambridge University (M.A., M.B., Ch.B.), the Royal College of Surgeons, and the International College of Surgeons. He was a captain in the Royal Army Medical Corps during World War I (1915–19) and later a consulting surgeon at London hospitals.

As an adult Walker was introduced to the writings and work of George I. Gurdjieff, a mystic. In England he studied with Maurice Nicoll and P. D. Ouspensky. He visited Gurdjieff in France in 1948–49 (a visit described in a 1952 article). He wrote both autobiographically of his time as a Gurdjieff student and about his philosophical conclusions. By the time of his death, January 25, 1966, he was a well-known exponent of Gurdjieff's perspective.

Sources:

Driscoll, J. Walter. Gurdjieff: An Annotated Bibliography. New York: Garland Publishing, 1985.

Walker, Kenneth. Diagnosis of Man. Harmondsworth, U.K.: Penguin Books, 1942.

———. I Talk of Dreams. London: Jonathan Cape, 1946.

———. The Making of Man. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1963.

———. Meaning and Purpose. London: Jonathan Cape, 1944.

———. A Study of Gurdjieff's Teachings. London: Jonathan Cape, 1957.

———. The Unconscious Mind. London: Rider, 1961. Reprinted as The Extra-sensory Mind. New York: Emerson, 1961.

———. Venture with Ideas. London: Jonathan Cape, 1951.

Walker, Roland (1907–1993)

Professor of biology who wrote on parapsychology. Walker was born on February 8, 1907, at Stellenbosch, South Africa. He studied at Oberlin College, Ohio (B.A., 1928; M.A., 1929) and Yale University (Ph.D., 1934). Following his graduation he began a long tenure in the biology department at Rennselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, New York. Walker developed a side interest in parapsychology and operated from a critical perspective. The primary product of that interest was an essay critical of fellow biologist J. B. Rhine's understanding of extrasensory perception (ESP) and psychokinesis (PK). He died July 30, 1993.

Sources:

Walker, Roland. "Parapsychology and Dualism." Scientific Monthly (July 1954).

Walker, Thane (ca. 1890– ?)

Founder (with Phez Kahlil) of the Prosperos, a group stemming from the philosophy of mystic G. I. Gurdjieff. Walker was born in Nowaway County, Missouri. He claimed to have been one of America's first psychologists and to have been imprisoned in a Nazi concentration camp after writing the article "I Saw Hitler Make Black Magic." He was a Marine Corps officer and entertained American troops in Japan during the occupation in World War II.

As a former pupil of Gurdjieff, Walker became a Gurdjieff-style figure, teaching students through stories and disorienting activities, but also drawing upon Freudian and Jungian psychology and occult and astrological traditions. Walker believed students should wake from the misleading reality of everyday sensory experience and limited personality to a wider reality.

The Prosperos group was founded in Florida in 1956, but the organization has since moved its headquarters to California and reported some 3,000 members at the end of the 1980s.

Sources:

Melton, J. Gordon. Encyclopedia of American Religions. Detroit: Gale Research, 1992.

Walker, William

British spirit photographer, a member of the Crewe Circle associated with William Hope. Walker was the first to perform psychic photography on which spirit "extras" appeared in full color.

Walk-ins

In 1979 popular New Age author Ruth Montgomery identified an unknown phenomenon that had occurred to a variety of unrelated individuals. They reported that the soul originally inhabiting their body had vacated it so that another could "walk in" and take over. Montgomery wrote about walk-ins in her book, Strangers Among Us (1979), suggesting that at times people with otherwise perfectly healthy bodies no longer wished to live. If they were allowed to leave, the people would turn over their physically sound bodies to some advanced (though as yet unperfected) soul. In a subsequent book, Threshold to Tomorrow (1983), Montgomery related some 17 case histories of walk-ins, including New Age leaders Dick Sutphen and Carol Parrish-Harra.

The background of a person claiming to be a walk-in often contains a traumatic, even life-threatening, event through which the person passed to a new, transformed life. Some individuals suffered a medical crisis, often to the point of clinical death and revival. Others reached the conclusion that they simply no longer wanted to live. Because the new personality emerging after the crisis retains the memory of the previous personality, some observers have suggested more mundane explanations of the walk-in experience, including a dramatic reintegration of a previously fragmented personality. The experience of walk-ins has also been compared to near-death experiences, which have led to similar life transformations, though without the feeling of being a different person.

Montgomery claims she received the concept of walk-ins from her “guides,” a group of evolved entities from whom Montgomery had channeled material for many years. According to her guides, many of the world’s leading figures have been walk-ins, including Moses, Joseph, and Jesus of Nazareth. More recent leaders include Muhammad, Christopher Columbus, Abraham Lincoln, Joseph Smith Jr., Mary Baker Eddy, and many of the founders of the American nation, notably George Washington, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and Abigail Adams.

None of the outstanding people from history identified by Montgomery as walk-ins left any hint of having experienced anything similar to the experiences of contemporary walk-ins. Montgomery believed the public nature of the contemporary phenomenon is related to the approaching New Age, which she believed would be initiated by a polar shift in the year 1999. In the past, walk-ins have not identified themselves as such, but in the light of the events of 1999, they need to know of each other so they can locate each other as the leaders who will build the new golden age.

Among the more interesting of the contemporary walk-ins is the couple who heads the Extraterrestrial Earth Mission. Over the last decade they have claimed to be inhabited by a series of extraterrestrial metaphysical teachers. In 1986, John, a metaphysical teacher in Seattle, Washington, abandoned his body to a personality known as “Avinash.” Later that year he met another walk-in, then named “Arthea.” During the next eight years Avinash would also depart and be succeeded by persons known as “Aktivar,” “Alarius,” “Savizar,” and “ZaviRah.” At the same time Arthea was followed by “Akria,” “Polaria,” “Silarra,” and “Ziva’rah.” There is every expectation that further walk-in teachers will appear in the future.

Sources:

Montgomery, Ruth. Strangers Among Us: Enlightened Beings from a World to Come. New York: Coward, McGann & Geohegan, 1979.

———. Threshold to Tomorrow. New York: G. P. Putnam’s Sons, 1983.

Parrish-Harra, Carol W. Messengers of Hope. Marina del Rey, Calif.: DeVorss, 1983.

Zuromski, Paul. “Dick Sutphen.” Body, Mind, Spirit (September/October 1987): 14–18.

Wallace, Alfred Russel (1823–1913)

British naturalist, codiscoverer with Charles Darwin of the principles of biological evolution. Wallace was a philosophical skeptic, a materialist. His experience of Spiritualist phenomena overcame his skepticism.

In the preface to his book On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism (1874) Wallace writes:

“They compelled me to accept them, as facts, long before I could accept the spiritual explanation of them: there was at that time ‘no place in my fabric of thought into which it could be fitted.’ (Argument of Dr. Carpenter). By slow degrees a place was made.”

Wallace was led to believe 1) in the existence of numerous preternatural intelligences of various grades and 2) that some of these intelligences, although usually invisible and intangible to us, can and do act on matter, and do influence our minds. It was by the latter doctrine that he accounted for some of the residual phenomena in his work Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection (1870).

Wallace was born on January 8, 1823, at Usk, Monmouthshire. After leaving school he worked as a land surveyor and architect. Around 1840 his interest in botany began and he started a herbarium. In 1845, he was an English teacher at the Collegiate School, Leicester, where he met H. W. Bates, who influenced him to collect and study beetles.

In 1848, they commenced a joint naturalist expedition to the River Amazon. On the return journey, most of Wallace’s collection was destroyed in a fire on the ship, but his book A Narrative of Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro appeared in 1853. He next traveled in the Malay Archipelago, and his large insect collections passed to Oxford University and the British Museum.

In February 1858, during a severe attack of fever, he was thinking about Malthus’ Essay on Population when, to quote his own words: “There suddenly flashed upon me the idea of the survival of the fittest.” He drafted a theory which he posted to Charles Darwin a few days later. By coincidence, Wallace’s paper was virtually an abstract of Darwin’s own theory, written in 1842.

Wallace’s earliest experiences relating to Spiritualism dated from 1844 when he was a schoolmaster in Leicester. Influenced by a lecture given by Spencer Hall on mesmerism, he tried similar experiments. Later, during twelve years of tropical wanderings in which he was occupied in the study of natural history, he heard occasionally of table-turning and spirit rapping. He decided to investigate them on his return.

His first opportunity came on July 22, 1865, in the house of a friend. After more than a dozen sittings he became satisfied that “there is an unknown power developed from the bodies of a number of persons placed in connection by sitting round a table with all their hands on it.”

The next stage of his inquiry began in September 1865 and was devoted to the physical and mental phenomena of Mary Marshall. In broad daylight, Wallace observed levitation, movement of objects without contact (telekinesis), and the alteration of weight. Although unknown to Marshall, the place name “Para,” where Wallace’s brother died, his name and that of the last friend who saw him were spelled out. Messages came spelled backwards, through direct writing.

Impressed by these occurrences, Wallace investigated in his own home with the help of a medium. Phenomena were obtained and from November 1866 onward, Wallace had the opportunity to watch mediumship of Agnes Guppy-Volckman develop. A stout woman, she was lifted noiselessly on the top of the table while sitting in her chair, with five or six persons close around her. Musical sounds were heard without the presence of instruments. A German guest, a stranger, sang several songs and the strains of this music accompanied her throughout.

Guppy-Volckman supposedly had the ability to apport flowers and fruit. In midwinter, after she sat for four hours in a small, warm, gas-lighted room in the Wallace home, a quantity of flowers appeared upon a bare table—anemones, tulips, chrysanthemums, Chinese primroses, and several ferns. Wallace stated: “All were absolutely fresh as if just gathered from a conservatory. They were covered with a fine cold dew. Not a petal was crumpled or broken, not the most delicate point or pinnule of the ferns was out of place.”

Wallace stated that the phenomenon was repeated afterward hundreds of times. The flowers sometimes arrived in large quantities. They were often brought on request, fruits as well as flowers. A friend of Wallace asked for a sunflower, and one six feet high fell on the table, with a large mass of earth about its roots.

The naturalist formed a committee of the London Dialectical Society in 1869 and witnessed, under test conditions, a variety of telekinetic phenomena. When the possibility of spirit photography was for the first time demonstrated in England in the studio of Frederick A. Hudson, Wallace was anxious to test this new phenomenon. Sitting with Guppy-Volckman he obtained a communication by raps that his mother would try to appear on Hudson's photographic plate.

He sat three times, choosing his own position, and found a male figure with a short sword on the first photographic plate, and a female figure on the two other plates. Reportedly, both of the latter images resembled his mother, and the second plate was unlike any known photograph previously taken of her. Under a magnifying glass, supposedly this second picture disclosed a special feature of his mother's face.

In view of these experiences and the large amount of testimony in the literature of Spiritualism to similar occurrences, Wallace declared it was his opinion that the phenomena of Spiritualism did not require further confirmation. "They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences."

His later attitude was in accordance with this conviction. He never missed an opportunity to test psychic phenomena. He made several attempts to convince the pillars of scientific skepticism and started by inviting W. B. Carpenter to attend some sittings in his own home. Carpenter came one evening. Raps were heard, and these were repeated, sounding, at request, in any part of the table. Carpenter sat still and made no comment. He never returned to Wallace's home.

The same thing happened with his colleague John Tyndall, another scientific skeptic. Wallace had sent Thomas Henry Huxley his paper "The Scientific Aspect of the Supernatural," which was later included in On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism. Huxley responded to Wallace, "I am neither shocked nor disposed to issue a commission of lunacy against you. It may be true, for anything that I know to the contrary, but really I cannot get up interest in the subject." G. H. Lewes accepted an invitation to the Wallace home but never went.

Between 1870 and 1880, Wallace had many opportunities to witness interesting phenomena in the houses of various friends. Through a member of his own family, automatic writing was received in his own home, purporting to come from his deceased brother William and containing many predictions which were later fulfilled.

In 1874, Wallace was asked by the Fortnightly Review to write an article on Spiritualism. It appeared under the title "A Defence of Modern Spiritualism" and also later in On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism, first published in 1875. The volume also included two new chapters on the nature and purport of apparitions. Later editions would be enlarged with accounts of the author's further personal experiences in séances with Katie Cook, W. Haxby, Francis Ward Monck, William Eglinton, and others. During much of the rest of his life, Wallace found himself defending mediums, who were increasingly seen as frauds. His defense would lead to a lively discussion with Eleanor Sidgwick in the Journal of the Society for Psychical Research in 1888.

Wallace defended Henry Slade and gave evidence of the genuineness of his phenomena at the trial in Bow Street Police Court, London, in 1876. In the same year, by casting his vote as president of the anthropological subcommittee of the British Association for the Advancement of Science he made possible the presentation of William F. Barrett's paper on Spiritualism.

In the years 1886–87, during a lecture tour of America, Wallace stayed for some time in three centers of Spiritualism—Boston, Washington and San Francisco. He attended materialization séances with a medium named Ross, and when it was rumored that she was caught in fraud he testified on her behalf in a letter to the Banner of Light.

In Washington, in the company of Elliot Coues, General Lippitt and D. Lyman, Wallace had remarkable experiences with the medium Pierre L. O. A. Keeler, and he sat in San Francisco at an outstanding slate-writing séance with Fred P. Evans in which writing was produced in five different colors and, on his impromptu suggestion, six crayon drawings were precipitated on six pieces of paper placed between a pair of slates, some of the drawings having personal relevance.

In later years, Wallace did not encounter much Spiritualist phenomena but he remained true to his convictions up to the end of his busy life. In 1910, he received the Order of Merit for his scientific researches, however, because of his advocacy of Spiritualism, his scientific contributions were largely ignored and have remained unheralded. He died at Broadstone, Dorset, on November 7, 1913.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Wallace, Alfred Russell. "Correspondence." Journal of the Society for Psychical Research 16 (1898).

———. My Life: An Autobiography. 2 vols. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1906.

———. On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism: Three Essays. London: James Burns, 1975.

Wallis, E. W. (1848–1914)

British trance medium, inspirational speaker, healer, lecturer, and author. "Lighthouse," the spirit of a South American Indian, claimed responsibility for his mediumistic development. "Standard Bearer," "Leader," and "Tom Joyce" were others of his well-known controls.

Assisted by his wife, also a notable psychic, Wallis did propaganda work for many decades. He assisted Emma H. Britten in starting the journal The Two Worlds in Manchester, which he edited until 1899. In that year he came to London and became editor of Light, a position he held until his death.

As a medium, his wife did not enter deep trance. She could hear the words she spoke but reportedly could not prevent herself from saying them. Her mediumship began at the age of eighteen in 1872. A young Spanish Indian girl, "Veina Goree," was her first control. From 1875 onward, she gave inspirational addresses at the Spiritual Institution founded by James Burns. While speaking there, she was suddenly controlled by "Morambo," an African slave who died in South America.

Wallis produced physical phenomena for many years. His wife was associated with the London Spiritualist Alliance and answered questions on Spiritualism in afternoon meetings.

Walsch, Neal Donald (1943–)

Neal Donald Walsch, the channel for receiving the material in a three-volume best-selling metaphysical book, Conversations with God, was born and raised in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. He grew up in a Roman Catholic family and for a while considered the priesthood. Instead, he went to work at a local radio station and for the next 30 years worked in a variety of jobs that took him around the United States. He also married multiple times.

At the end of the 1980s he was in Ashland, Oregon, and went to work as a talk show host. Fired from one job, he landed a job at KOPE and became known locally as a radio personality under his public name, Bob White. In 1992 he experienced a period of frustration and depression. He was, in part, upset that the success in life that he had hoped for had alluded him. He fell back on a technique that had worked for him in the past. He composed a letter in which he poured out all of his anger in a series of questions. Previously, he would address such letters to individuals with whom he had problems. This time, he decided to direct the letter to God. As he finished the letter, he received an answer. Words formed in his mind and he wrote them down. God asked if Walsch wanted answers to his questions or was merely venting. He responded that he was venting but in fact wanted answers to the questions.

Thus began a dialogue with God that would last over the next three years. Walsch would pose questions and God would reply. Walsch wrote the answers out in longhand. This process has traditionally been called automatic writing, and has more recently been seen as a variety of channeling. As the material was received, an initial batch of it was compiled as volume one of Conversations with God and published in 1995. It quickly became a best-seller and remained on the New York Times list for 91 weeks, and was subsequently translated into 27 languages. Volume two appeared in 1997 and it too reached the best-seller list. Volume three appeared in 1998.

As the response to the volumes grew Walsch founded ReCreation, an organization to put the idea of the books into action. ReCreation now sponsors a full range of lectures, workshops, retreats, and seminars across the United States and abroad. Beginning in the year 2000, it is organizing an annual Empowerment Week that includes a training session for leaders who wish to expand the work. Walsch also created the CWG in Action program to establish local centers for the work.

Walsch resides in Ashland and continues to lead ReCreation, which may be contacted at PMB #1150, 1257 Siskiyou Blvd., Ashland, OR 97520. His Internet site is at <http://www.conversationswithgod.org/>.

Sources:

Varble, Bill. "Former Rogue Valley Radio Host Finds Success in Conversations with God." Mail Tribune (Ashland, Ore.) (September 14, 1997).

Walsch, Neal Donald. Conversations with God I, II, III. Charlottesville, Va.: Hampton Roads Publishing, 1995, 1997, 1998.

"Walter"

The claimed spirit control of the medium Mina Stinson Crandon, popularly known as "Margery," the name used by those who investigated her early in the twentieth century. "Walter" was identified with Walter Stinson, the medium's brother, who had died in a railway accident in 1911 at the age of 28. He manifested at a séance for the first time during his sister's visit to a clairvoyant. "Walter" furnished proofs of personal identity and took charge of Crandon's sittings.

"Walter" was described as a spirit communicator, active, having a keen sense of humor, showing no pretence of saintliness, and, on occasions, swore and cursed. He was supposedly highly intelligent and full of energy and curiosity. He never pretended to know whether he could accomplish something new, but was always ready to try and was gratified at his own achievements.

Supposedly, "Walter" gave the impression that he himself was learning about conditions while giving a demonstration. "I don't give a damn about convincing the public or anyone. You have no idea why I am here," he said once.

Reportedly, "Walter" often threatened the sitters: "When this is done I am going away, and I shan't come back. My crowd came here because we liked you people, and you kept us here working at this damned thing." However, he never kept this threat. It is believed the satisfaction that his increasing dexterity gave him in producing high-grade psychic phenomena was enough to bind him to the "Margery" circle.

He introduced many new features into the experiments, provided cross correspondences, and gave his fingerprints (see plastics). These fingerprints were later found to be those of another living individual, prompting accusations that Crandon's mediumship was partly or wholly fraudulent.

"Walter" was also manifested at Glen Hamilton's circle in Winnipeg, being the chief control of the medium "Mary M."

Sources:

Bird, J. Malcolm. 'Margery' the Medium. New York: Maynard, 1925.

Tietze, Thomas R. Margery. New York: Harper & Row, 1973.

Walter, W(illiam) Grey (1910–1977)

Physiologist with special interests in the study of the neurophysiological correlates of such paranormal states as hypnosis, sleep, trance, and hallucination. Walter was born on February 19, 1910, in Kansas City, Missouri. He studied at Cambridge University (B.A., 1931, M.A., 1935; D.Sc., 1947). He was director of the Physiological Department at Burden Neurological Institute, Bristol, England, from 1939 onward, founder of the EEG Society, and the editor of EEG Journal. He wrote a number of books, the most famous being The Living Brain (1953), which was translated into several foreign languages. He died May 6, 1977.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Walter, W. Grey. The Living Brain. New York: Norton, 1953.

———. "The Neurophysiological Aspects of Hallucination and Illusory Experience." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research.

Walther, Gerda (1897–1977)

Psychical researcher and author. She was born on March 18, 1897, at Nordrach-Colonie, Baden, Germany. As a child she discovered she could communicate telepathically with both the living and the dead. She studied at Ludwig Maximilians University, Munich, Germany (Ph.D. summa cum laude, 1921).

In 1927, she became scientific secretary to Baron Albert von Schrenck-Notzing, the German psychic researcher, and assisted his investigations of the mediums Willi and Rudi Schneider. After Schrenck-Notzing's death, she edited his manuscripts for publication. She continued her contributions to the field over the years by writing numerous reviews of European books on psychical research for English-language journals. During 1941 in Germany, her research in parapsychology resulted in a short period of imprisonment under the Hitler regime.

Sources:

Berger, Arthur S., and Joyce Berger. The Encyclopedia of Parapsychology and Psychical Research. New York: Paragon House, 1991.

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Walther, Gerda. Zum anderen Ufer. Remagen: Otto Reichl, 1960.

The Wandering Jew

A medieval German legend that takes several forms. Although writers and details differ, the essential features of the narratives that have been handed down to us are basically the same.

The legend is that as Christ was being dragged on his way to Calvary, he passed the house of a Jew and stopped there, being weary under the weight of his cross. The Jew, however, inspired by the mob, would not allow him to rest there and drove him on. Jesus, looking at him, said, "I shall stand and rest, but thou shalt go till the last day." The Jew was compelled to wander over the Earth until this prophecy was fulfilled.

The legend of the Wandering Jew is regarded as the epic of the Semite people in the Middle Ages. Unfortunately it has often become a vehicle for crude anti-Semitic propaganda and persecution.

In some parts of Germany, the Wandering Jew theme has been identified with the wild huntsman myth, while in several French districts that mythical character is regarded as the wind of the night. This legend was treated in literary fashion by Eugène Sue in his novel Le Juif errant (10 vols., 1844–45) and by the British author George Croly in his novel Salathiel; A Story of the Past, The Present and The Future (1829). Something of the same atmosphere also pervades the legend of the Flying Dutchman.

Sources:

Barring-Gould, Sabine. Curious Myths of the Middle Ages. 1866–68. New Hyde Park, N.Y.: University Books, 1967.

Wang, Chung Yu (1880–1958)

Metallurgist, with interests in various aspects of parapsychology. Born in 1880 in Hong Kong, Wang studied at Queens College and Peiyang University and came to the United States for graduate work at the University of California and Columbia University (M.A. mining and geology). He was a member of the American Society for Psychical Research. He died August 30, 1958, in New York City.

Sources:

Wang, Chung Yu. "China's Unwanted Heritage." Tomorrow (Autumn 1955).

Wannein Nat

A Burmese evil spirit. (See also MYANMAR)

Warcollier, René (1881–1962)

Chemical engineer, author, parapsychologist, and president of the Institut Métapsychique International, Paris (1951–62). He was born on April 8, 1881, at Ormonville-la-Rogue, France. He studied at Ecole Nationale Supérieure de Chimie, Paris (Ch.E., 1903).

He became interested in psychical research, especially in telepathy, in the 1920s and collaborated with such experimenters as Cesar de Vesme and Eugene Osty on investigations of clairvoyance and related phenomena. He oversaw the European end of an experiment in telepathy jointly conducted with Gardner Murphy. He was affiliated with the Institut Métapsychique, served as its treasurer (1929–38), and edited the Revue Métapsychique for two years (1938–40) until the beginning of World War II. He died May 23, 1962, in Paris, France.

Sources:

Warcollier, René. Experimental Telepathy. London: George Allen & Unwin, 1939. Reprint, New York: Arno Press, 1975.

———. Experiments in Telepathy. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1938.

———. "Fifty Years of Telepathy." Tomorrow (summer 1961).

———. Mind to Mind. New York: Collier Books, 1963.

Warcollier, René, and Edmond Duchatel. Les Miracles de la Volonté (Miracles of the Will). N.p., 1912.

Ward, Arthur Henry (Sarsfield) (1883–1959)

Author who wrote under the pseudonym "Sax Rohmer" and created the celebrated fictional character Dr. Fu-Manchu. Ward was also a student of the occult. Born of Irish Catholic parents in Birmingham, England, on February 15, 1883, Ward had no formal schooling until the age of nine, when he attended a day school in London. As a youth, Ward stopped attending Mass and became an agnostic. His first job was as a bank clerk in London, after which he worked briefly as a newspaper reporter. He started writing short stories at the age of twenty and first used the pseudonym "Sax Rohmer" in 1912. He also wrote some successful songs for music hall comedians George Robey and Little Tich.

His famous character Fu-Manchu was based on reports of a Chinese master criminal operating an international opium racket, and the atmosphere of Limehouse, London's Chinatown district, provided local color. The first Fu-Manchu book was published in 1913, but Rohmer did not immediately settle down to developing his character. Instead, he spent much time on his nonfiction study The Romance of Sorcery (first published London, 1914; E. P. Dutton, 1915). The book brought a letter from illusionist Harry Houdini, who soon afterward became a friend.

Rohmer is said to have become a member of the Hermetic society the Golden Dawn and may also have belonged to a Rosicrucian order. However, his occult interests were eventually overshadowed by the success of his Fu-Manchu books. In 1929, Paramount Pictures first brought the character to the screen with The Mysterious Dr. Fu-Manchu, starring Warner Oland and Jean Arthur. Rohmer died June 1, 1959.

Sources:

Rohmer, Sax. The Romance of Sorcery. London, 1914. Reprint, New York: E. P. Dutton, 1915. Reprint, New York: Causeway, 1973.

Warminster UFO News

Monthly publication through the 1970s of the British UFO Society, dealing with news and sightings in the Warminster district of Britain, where hundreds of local residents have reported UFO phenomena since the 1960s.

Warner, Abby

An illiterate American orphan girl who was instrumental in arousing lively interest in Spiritualism in Ohio soon after the phenomenon of the Rochester Rappings. Mrs. Kellogg of Massillon, in whose house Warner performed domestic services, discovered that raps were produced in the girl's presence. Soon she was able to move into a trance state, and the uneducated girl, who at eighteen could only read printed characters, wrote with both hands at the same time on different subjects, while a third communication was spelled out by raps.

Reports of the séances began to be widely circulated. Abel Underhill, a physician, took the girl into his family for medical treatment and wrote her history. The occurrences at St. Timothy's Church on Christmas Eve, 1851, put her in the limelight. Supposedly, unusually powerful raps resounded in the church in her presence and attracted the attention of the whole assembly. The minister asked that "those knockings might cease." Instead, they increased in vehemence.

Warner was arrested on a charge of disturbing a religious meeting and brought before a public tribunal. The trial commenced on December 27 and lasted for three days. As "not a single witness could be found who could swear that they perceived the slightest movement in the accused party; on the contrary, when closely examined, those who professed to have scrutinized the action of the spirit rapper narrowly were compelled to admit that they could not detect the least perceptible motion, even of her dress, at the times when the knocks were most numerous and emphatic," the defendant was discharged.

Following the acquittal, Underhill announced an investigation by a selected committee, under stringent test conditions, of the medium's physical and mental phenomena. Four séances were held. The committee believed the phenomena wholly unaccountable and genuine evidences of an occult and intelligent force outside the medium.

Warner, Lucien (Hynes) (1900–1963)

Psychologist and opinion analyst who conducted surveys in parapsychology. He was born on September 9, 1900, at Irvington, New York. He studied at Oberlin College (B.A., 1922) and Columbia University (Ph.D., 1927). After graduation he held a variety of research positions prior to becoming a professor of biology and psychology at Claremont Men's College and Graduate School, Claremont, California, in 1948. He is most remembered in parapsychological circles for the 1938, 1952, and 1955 surveys he conducted among psychologists to ascertain attitudes to extrasensory perception. His reports were published in the Journal of Parapsychology (vol.2, 1938; vol.16, 1952; vol.19, 1955). He died in 1963 in Las Vegas, Nevada.

Wartime Occult Phenomena (World War I)

The emergence of Spiritualism heightened interest in the separations and deaths caused by war. Thus it was not surprising that a number of stories of supernatural events should have crystallized around the international circumstances of World War I. Perhaps the most striking of these was the alleged vision of the Angels of Mons. The first account was the story in the London Evening News of September 14, 1915, by writer Arthur Machen describing a statement by an officer who had been in the retreat from Mons. This officer saw a large body of horsemen who later vanished. Machen suggested that they were the spirits of the English bowmen who had fought at Agincourt.

Although this story was fiction, it stimulated corroborative reports of phantom armies. The most significant of these were repeated by a Red Cross nurse, Phylis Campbell, who claimed to have heard several different stories of phantom soldiers. In his book On the Side of the Angels (1915), Harold Begbie repeated the claims that soldiers saw a vision of angels during the retreat from Mons and gives the narrative of a soldier, who states that an officer came up to him "in a state of great anxiety" and pointed out to him a ". . . strange light which seemed to be quite distinctly outlined and was not a reflection of the moon, nor were there any clouds in the neighbourhood. The light became brighter and I could see quite distinctly three shapes, one in the centre having what looked like outspread wings. The other two were not so large, but were quite plainly distinct from the centre one. They appeared to have a long, loose-hanging garment of a golden tint and they were above the German line facing us. We stood watching them for about three-quarters of an hour."

All the men in the battalion who saw this, with the exception of five, were killed. Begbie went on to say that a nurse told him that a dying soldier spoke to her of the reluctance of the Germans to attack the British line, "because of the thousands of troops behind us." It is believed this man had heard these claims from German prisoners and believed in the ghostly nature of those supporting hosts.

Ralph Shirley published a pamphlet titled Prophecies and Omens of the Great War (1914; 1915) dealing with various oracular utterances on the struggle.

Stories were also common in the early period of the war regarding the appearance of saintly and protective figures resembling the patrons of the several allied countries. Thus the English were convinced that in certain engagements they had seen the figure of Saint George mounted on a white charger and the French were equally sure that the figure in question was either Saint Denis or Joan of Arc. Wounded men in base hospitals asked for medallions or coins on which the likenesses of these saints were impressed in order to verify the statements they made.

Sources:

Brown, Raymond Lemment. The Phantom Soldiers. New York: Drake, 1975.

Machen, Arthur. The Angels of Mons: The Bowman and Other Legends. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1915.

Stein, Gordon. Encyclopedia of Hoaxes. Detroit: Gale Research, 1993.

Warts

Small skin lesions on face, fingers, or elbows, and sometimes on the genitals, caused by a virus, as distinct from moles, which are birthmarks. The general medical term for a wart is verruca, but warts on the genitals or around the anus are known as condylomae, or venereal warts.

Warts often appear and disappear without any obvious cause, and this characteristic tended to reinforce belief in many old folk cures or wart-charming. In eastern Massachusetts, central New York, and parts of England, it used to be believed that warts could be removed by rubbing them with spittle. Other widespread superstitions about warts:

To cure warts, wash hands in the moon's rays in a dry metal basin, saying:

I wash my hands in this thy dish,
O man in the moon, do grant my wish
And come and take away this!

Water taken from a gravestone and rubbed on warts will cure them.

Striking warts with an undertaker's hammer will cure them.

To remove warts from the hand, watch for a funeral procession to pass and as it goes by, say secretly: "I do sincerely hope that these warts will pass off my hands as that body decays in the ground."

If a person steals an egg and secretly buries it in the ground, his or her warts will disappear when the egg decays.

Pick up an old marrow bone, touch it to your warts, walk off, throw it behind you, and don't look back.

If you take as many pins as you have warts and give them to someone else, your warts will be transferred to the other person.

Take as many pebbles as you have warts and touch each wart with a pebble, then wrap the stones in cloth or paper and throw them away in the roadway. Whoever picks up the parcel of pebbles will get your warts, and you will lose them.

Take a piece of string and tie as many knots in it as there are warts and lay the string under a stone. Whoever treads on the stone will be attached to the warts.

Such superstitions are often very ancient. Pliny (23–79 C.E.) recommended that warts be touched with chick peas on the first day of the moon, and that the peas then be wrapped in cloth and thrown away behind you. The pebble charm was known to Marcellus of Bordeaux in the fourth century, and it is cited in his book De Medicamentis.

Apart from natural remission, it is possible that many wart cures worked through a process analagous to selfhypnosis. Other wart remedies were of a pseudomedical nature, such as rubbing warts with milkweed, or the fluid from grasshoppers, or the fresh blood of mice. Modern medical remedies involve treating warts with a substance that dissolves the hard layer and cauterizes the remainder, which is then scraped off.

During the witchcraft manias of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, warts and moles were considered "devil's marks" if they did not bleed when pricked.

Washington Research Center and Parapsychology Group

The Washington Research Center and Parapsychology Group was founded in 1982 by Russian-American parapsychologist Larissa Vilenskaya (b. 1948). Vilenskaya had been involved in parapsychological research throughout the 1970s at the Research Institute of General and Pedagogical Psychology of the USSR Academy of Sciences. She moved to the United States in 1981. The center published a journal, Psi Research, which made an effort at informing an English-speaking audience of research being conducted in Russia, Eastern Europe, and China.

The center also became identified with the firewalking movement. Vilenskaya became interested in firewalking and conducted numerous events teaching attendees to experiment with the practice. Last known address: 484B Washington St. #317, San Francisco, CA 93940.

Wasserman, Gerhard Dietrich (1919–)

University lecturer in applied mathematics who experimented in the field of parapsychology. Wasserman was born December 12, 1919, at Leipzig, Germany. He studied at Queen Mary College, University of London (B.Sc. hons. math. 1942, Ph.D. quantum mechanics, 1946). In 1948 he began a tenure as an instructor in applied mathematics at King's College Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Durham University.

In the field of parapsychology he has taken special interest in the construction of theoretical models for psi phenomena. His article "An Outline of a Field Theory of Organismic Form and Behavior" was published in a Ciba Foundation symposium on extrasensory perception.

Sources:

Pleasants, Helene, ed. Biographical Dictionary of Parapsychology. New York: Helix Press, 1964.

Wasson, R(ober) Gordon (1898–1986)

Journalist and writer who argued for "ethno-mycology," the claimed relationship of wild mushrooms (especially hallucinogenic varieties) to various human cultures throughout history. Wasson was born on September 22, 1898, at Great Falls, Montana. He studied at the Columbia School of Journalism, and in 1926 he married Valentina Pavlovna Guercken, who shared his research in ethno-mycology.

Wasson worked as a reporter through the 1920s before becoming a prominent banker for the Guaranty Company of New York (1928–34) and later the Morgan Guaranty Trust Company. In the 1950s Wasson and his wife conducted field research in Mexico, studying firsthand the sacred mushroom ceremonies of the Mazatec Indians. Their record album Mushroom Ceremony of the Mazatec Indians of Mexico (Folkways Records, New York, 1957) was the first documented recording of its kind. Wasson's researches influenced the psychedelic revolution of the 1960s.

