at Senator [redacted] [redacted]

b7c

b7c

Definite possibility exists that [redacted] will continue to "peddle" allegation implicating Mr. [redacted] in Senator's recent death, it being noted [redacted] having conveyed information to Senator [redacted] and other individuals. Under normal circumstances, details of this nature would be of interest and would be disseminated to local law enforcement authorities. However, in this case such action does not appear feasible due to highly questionable reliability and integrity of [redacted] original source of data. For the same reason, interview of [redacted] for purpose of corroborating and refuting allegation would appear futile.

[redacted]

It is recommended data not be disseminated to [redacted] Police Department, [redacted], N. J., and [redacted] not be interviewed in view of his known background and prior criminal record. If you agree, no further action is necessary.

According to [redacted] the doctor had no basis for the allegation other than dissatisfaction with the published medical account. [redacted] stated that he consulted the Attorney General's office of the State of Wisconsin to determine his course of action and that he was told that there was no jurisdiction for an autopsy in Wisconsin, since the death occurred in Maryland. [redacted] stated that he so informed the doctor.

Mrs. Jean McCarthy, widow of the late Senator McCarthy, called 8-5-57. She had just received word from the County Judge at Appleton, Wisconsin, where the Senator's will was being probated, that he had received a telephone call from [REDACTED] San Francisco, telephone Mission [REDACTED] claims that she is the daughter of the late Senator McCarthy and was born on August 9, 1933 (the Senator would then have been 25 years of age).

The judge told her that he was writing to the Chief of Police in San Francisco requesting that he check into [REDACTED] background as she sounded like a crackpot. The judge also asked if Jean knew of anything concerning this. Jean stated that there was absolutely no truth to this as the Senator had told her everything and that it just was not possible for this woman to be the Senator's daughter. She further stated that during May, June, and July this woman called the office almost daily and was treated as a crackpot. Jean wondered if we could check on [REDACTED] I told her that we could not although I did check our files and found no record.

I purchased and have just finished reading your book MASTERS OF DECEIT. It is certainly a splendid book and I plan to pass it around among several friends and get them to read it too.

There is one question that I have long wanted to ask you and that is - What did you think of Joe McCarthy? I, personally, thought he did a wonderful job of exposing the communist although perhaps not as diplomatically as he might have but for years I waited for you to come to his aid but, as far as I know, you never expressed a view one way or another.

Dear Mr. Hoover:

| Congratulations on your excellent book, which I am reading.

Mr. Hoover, may I ask you, isn't some of this valuable information on Communist tactics exactly what Senator McCarthy was probing for? Didn't he ask but one question? "Who promoted the traitor Peress?" Mr. Hoover, may I ask you a question?

| Why didn't you publicly support that man in that dreadful hour of need, (i. e. Senator McCarthy)?

| Isn't this fine book just "too little, too late?" The people have known of the treachery but we have been leaderless and powerless to know how to cope with the enemies in our midst. One such book or public word from you might have done so much.

| Is it really too late to combat public apathy, defeat and fear, or am I wrong?

| I would so much welcome your comment, as the author of a good book.

Reference is made to the attached letter from the above-captioned individual dated April 22, 1958. [REDACTED] congratulated the Director on his book, "Masters of Deceit," but then asked whether this book isn't "too little, too late," in that the Director did not publicly support Senator McCarthy when the latter was investigating communism. She seems to feel that the Nation has been leaderless and powerless to cope with the communist menace and that Senator McCarthy failed to achieve support in his fight against communism. "Why didn't you publicly support that man in that dreadful hour of need, (i. e. Senator McCarthy)?"

[REDACTED] is not identifiable in Bufiles.

It is felt that [REDACTED] letter should not be acknowledged. Apparently, she has very definite opinions concerning Senator McCarthy and any letter to her might be misused for her selfish purposes. Her letter indicates that she is not so much interested in the Director's book as trying to find out Mr. Hoover's position concerning McCarthy. Moreover, she accuses the Director of "letting McCarthy down."

RECOMMENDATION:

That [REDACTED] letter not be acknowledged.

It is advertising an article on former Senator McCarthy which appears in the August, 1958, issue of the Esquire Magazine. BACKGROUND

You will recall that [REDACTED] called you on July 17, 1958, saying that the "New York Times" on that date carried an advertisement concerning an article entitled "The Last Days of Joe McCarthy" which appears in the current issue of "Esquire" magazine. This article, written by Richard Rovere, according to Lewis was very vicious, allegedly asking questions as to how McCarthy spent his last days, how he felt walking alone in the corridors of Congress and posing the question whether he drank himself to death. The advertisement carried a picture (which is also in the magazine) by Harvey Schmidt of McCarthy which Lewis also characterized as vicious. [REDACTED] stated he had some information on Rovere and wondered if there was anything else the Bureau could furnish him regarding either of these individuals. The Director commented: "Let me see summaries on Rovere and Schmidt."

It is noted that the article by Rovere (copy attached) is highly critical of McCarthy, asserting that after he was censured by the United States Senate he never was the same again. He is characterized as a master demagogue, but one without true faith in his mission. "McCarthy was a demon, but he was not, to our great good fortune, a man possessed by demons. His talents as a demagogue were great, but he lacked the most necessary and awesome of demagogic gifts - a belief in the sacredness of his own mission. He was chiefly interested in himself - the "glory drive." Hence, he could not survive his setbacks. It is to be noted that the author states that after the President's heart attack in 1955, "McCarthy said he thought it would be 'unkind' to ask the President to run again; he said he thought that either J. Edgar Hoover or Herman Welker would make a good Republican candidate."

This individual could not be identified in Bureau files or in available sources in the Bureau library.

Richard H. Rovere

The 1958-1959 edition of "Who's Who in America" contains information concerning Richard Halworth Rovere. This reflects that Rovere is a writer and editor who was born in Jersey City, New Jersey on May 5, 1915. He received an A. B. degree at Columbia University in 1937. "Who's Who" also shows that Rovere was Associate Editor of "New Masses" in 1938-1939; Assistant Editor of "The Nation" in 1940-1943, and Editor of "Common Sense" in 1943-1944. He has been a Staff Writer for "The New Yorker" since 1944 and has been U. S. Correspondent for "Spectator" of London and a Contributing Editor for "Harper's" magazine in 1949-1954. He is the author of books and numerous articles.

Jones to Nease memorandum

The February 15, 1938, issue of "New Masses" contains an article by Rovere captioned "A Biography of Jesus." (61-91812-1X) "New Masses" of August 16, 1938, carries an article by Richard H. Rovere entitled "The World Youth Congress."

"The Guild Progressive" of May 15, 1940, a publication of the Independent Progressive Members of the Newspaper Guild of New York City, contained an article by Richard H. Rovere entitled "X Masses Editor Charges Guild Leaders Run by Communists. The article states: "Candidates who consistently take political bearings from communists are ^{not} ~~unfit~~ ^{to} ~~run~~ ^{the} ~~the~~ ^{ACTIVE} Guild because their attitudes are determined according to conditions that bear ~~in~~ the slightest on the welfare of American newspaper workers." (62-88217-2479)

The October 3, 1942, issue of "The Nation" contains a special supplement concerning Martin Dies and the "Dies Committee." This consists of articles by several writers. Included among these articles is one entitled "J. B. Matthews - The Informer" by Richard H. Rovere. (62-88217-2479)

(c)

Rovere was the author of an article in "Harper's" magazine for May, 1944, entitled "Dewey, the Man in the Blue Serge Suit." (100-196902-3)

FOIA

Jones to Nease memorandum

6-1
101

Walter Winchell in his column (1948) indicated that "The New Yorker" magazine was readying a series on Lepke (Louis Buchalter) by R. H. Rovere. (100-310922-22)

The May, 1955, issue of "Harper's" magazine states that Rovere regularly writes the "Letter from Washington" article in "The New Yorker" magazine. The May, 1955, issue of "Harper's" also contained an article entitled "The Kept Witnesses" by Richard H. Rovere. The article was a discussion of the Harvey Matusow recantation. It brought out that Matusow made a good living from being a professional witness for the Department of Justice and many other groups and agencies between 1951 and 1954. Following Matusow's recantation, Rovere wrote that the Department of Justice had given no indication that this incident had led it "to reconsider the moral, juridical, and political effects of the whole practice of retaining professional witnesses." Rovere admitted the necessity for informants for the proper maintenance of order in a society such as ours but he continually decried paid witnesses. The article was full of false statements and inferences. Reprints of the article were distributed by the Fund for the Republic. It is noted that in October, 1955, the Bureau reviewed a letter which Assistant Attorney General William F. Tompkins planned to send "Harper's" magazine in protest of the Rovere article.

Jones to Nease memorandum

It is noted that Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr., has mentioned Rovere in previous radio programs. On December 7, 1955, he mentioned that Bella Dodd (former Communist Party member) had filed a libel suit against the Ford Foundation in regard to the article entitled "The Kept Witnesses" by Rovere which the Fund for the Republic was distributing. On June 19, 1956, Mr. Lewis mentioned this matter again in his broadcast. [REDACTED]

On July 21, 1955, Congressman B. Carroll Reece, of Tennessee, spoke in the House of Representatives concerning the Fund for the Republic. Included in his remarks were three articles by Fulton Lewis, Jr. One of these was dated June 13, 1955; it stated, in part:

"The next Fund for the Republic effort was to send gratis to all Federal judges copies of three leftwing books, all embodying varying facets of the overall liberal attack on the security program, on the confidential informant system and on anticommunism generally. The books were followed up by a reprint of a Harper's magazine article entitled 'The Kept Witnesses,' written by one Richard H. Rovere.

'One judge sent me his copy of the Harper's reprint with a penciled note: 'How about "kept professors" ... judges are really being bombarded.' Another jurist sent me his with a cover note describing it as 'the most obnoxious of the lot' he had received from the fund.

"I happened upon a clue to Mr. Rovere's character the next day when I discovered in the new issue of the ADA World an item about the ADA's forthcoming annual summer workshop in practical politics. One of the 'liberal speakers' (ADA World's phrase) to address the workshop, it said, would be 'Richard Rovere, New Yorker political correspondent.' [REDACTED]

THE LAST DAYS OF JOE McCARTHY

Great was his fall, and there was no putting him together again.

by RICHARD H. ROVERE

IN the spring of the year, 1954, there was the televised rumble over Private Schine, Major Peress, General Zwicker, Secretary Stevens, and others then of disputed rank and now of rapidly dimming luster. In the late summer, there were the untelevised censure hearings presided over by Senator Arthur V. Watkins, a Mormon elder from Orem, Utah, who could play variations on the crack of doom with a chairman's gavel and who was so insistent on a pure, unclouded atmosphere that he posted No Smoking signs in the Senate Caucus Room—an act wholly without precedent. In the fall, there was the censure debate on the Senate floor—ending with a vote of sixty-seven for, twenty-two against a watered-down resolution of censure from which, at the very last moment and with a swift, concealed stroke of the pen, Vice-President Nixon struck the word "censure."

By winter, Joe McCarthy was through. He had not lost his following. He had not lost, so far as anyone knows, a single true friend. Lieutenant General George E. Stratemeyer headed up a committee of "Ten Million Americans Mobilizing for Justice"; all the old militants rallied round, and by the day of the censure vote over a million signatures to a protest petition had been delivered to the Senate by armored car. McCarthy had not lost any of the appurtenances of power. He still had his seat, his seniority, and his committee assignments. (In January, 1955, the Democrats organized Congress, and of course he lost his chairmanship of the Government Operations Committee. But it wasn't his fault that the Democrats had won the elections.) Exact-reporters in the gallery would see a chance to catch lunch, play cards, or find out what Lyndon Johnson was up to. From time to time, McCarthy could be seen shambling (or lurching, for he was drinking more and holding it less well) down the corridors of the Senate Office Building en route to some committee room where photographers had been sighted. It wasn't of much use. The photographers knew he didn't have it. Mostly they ignored him; if, for old times' sake, they didn't, their editors filed the pictures. He got free television time every so often, generally on some panel or interview show with a low Trendex, and used it to call Paul Hoffman "a throwback on the human race," Sherman Adams a "pinhead," or Harold Stassen "one of the most contemptible politicians of our era." It was the old language, but in another voice and mood.

For a while, he tried statesmanship. He hired a bright and earnest young rightist, L. Brent Bozell, to write him some meaty speeches on foreign and military policy. Some of them were quite good. One, on April 25, 1956, described with remarkable prescience our lag in missile development and the political consequences of the lag; it may well have been the most prophetic speech of that year. But McCarthy felt as silly as he looked in a toga, and threw it aside. He made a pass at the farm vote. In the administration and in Congress, there were arguments over whether agricultural price supports should assure 85 or 87½ or 90 per cent of parity. McCarthy said it was a lot of cheapskate talk and came out censure debate on the Senate floor—ending with a vote of sixty-seven for, twenty-two against a watered-down resolution of censure from which, at the very last moment and with a swift, concealed stroke of the pen, Vice-President Nixon struck the word “censure.”

By ~~winning~~ Joe McCarthy was through. He had not lost his following. He had not lost, so far as anyone knows, a single true friend.
Lieutenant General George E. Stratemeyer headed up a committee of “Ten Million Americans Mobilizing for Justice”; all the old militants rallied round, and by the day of the censure vote over a million signatures to a protest petition had been delivered to the Senate by armored car. McCarthy had not lost any of the appurtenances of power. He still had his seat, his seniority, and his committee assignments. (In January, 1955, the Democrats organized Congress, and of course he lost his chairmanship of the Government Operations Committee. But it wasn't his fault that the Democrats had won the elections.) Exactly half his party in the Senate had stood by him and refused to support censure. Still and all, he was through, and everyone knew it.
He had lost the power to panic the United States Senate and to shiver the White House timbers. Sixty-seven Senators, including twenty-two Republicans, had dared to vote against him, and the President had called in Senator Watkins, the Cato of Wasatch, to “congratulate him,” in the words of James Hagerty, “for the splendid job he did.” Far more important, McCarthy had lost his nerve. His drive, his superb sense of timing, and even some of his meanness seemed to have gone from him. Where he had once been steely, he grew rubbery. He still knew what to do in a back-alley fight, but he seldom did it. He no longer clawed his antagonists but made wisecracks and played sophomoric jokes on them. Asked for comment on the Senate resolution, he said, “I wouldn't exactly say it was a vote of confidence.” He added, “I don't feel I've been lynched.” He struck back at Senator Wallace Bennett, the other Utah Senator and the author of the final draft of the resolution, when Bennett was assigned McCarthy's old office in a general shifting of quarters. In the refrigerator McCarthy had used to keep Milwaukee beer at a palatable temperature, Senator Bennett found, hanging from an ice-cube tray, a large, crudely lettered placard—WHO PROMOTED PENESS?

In the two and a half years that remained of his life, McCarthy made only a few spiritless attempts at a comeback. Now and then, he would get the Senate floor to denounce someone or something,
but never with much force and never with much of an audience.
When he rose, Senators would drift out of the chamber, and the view show with a low Trendex, and used it to call Paul Hoffman “a throwback on the human race,” Sherman Adams a “pinhead,” or Harold Stassen “one of the most contemptible politicians of our era.”

It was the old language, but in another voice and mood.

For a while, he tried statesmanship. He hired a bright and earnest young rightist, L. Brent Bozell, to write him some meaty speeches on foreign and military policy. Some of them were quite good. One, on April 25, 1956, described with remarkable pre-science our lag in missile development and the political consequences of the lag; it may well have been the most prophetic speech of that year. But McCarthy felt as silly as he looked in a toga, and threw it aside. He made a pass at the farm vote. In the administration and in Congress, there were arguments over whether agricultural price supports should assure 85 or 87½ or 90 per cent of parity. McCarthy said it was a lot of cheapskate talk and came out for 110 per cent of parity. This was a promising line for a demagogue down on his luck, but he soon dropped it. He couldn't seem to stick to anything. In the 1956 election, he played hardly any role at all. After the censure vote, he had made a “public apology . . . to the American people” for having once believed that the President was anti-Communist. After Mr. Eisenhower's heart attack in 1955, McCarthy said he thought it would be “unkind” to ask the President to run again; he said he thought that either J. Edgar Hoover or Herman Welker would make a good Republican candidate. He did not attend the San Francisco convention in 1956. Early in 1957, when Senator McClellan of Arkansas, who had taken over as chairman of Government Operations, was getting high on the front pages by making life miserable for Dave Beck, McCarthy tried to get into the act—now by championing the Fifth Amendment teamster, now by bullyingragging him. But he didn't work at it. He would come into the Caucus Room late, interrupt a line of questioning with questions of his own, some of which were incoherent, and after twenty minutes or so wander out in an almost trance-like state.

He was sick a lot of the time and frequently hospitalized, as a rule for the treatment of obscure ailments. The censure debate had been delayed for ten days because of one of these confinements. The Capitol physician, Dr. George Calver, explained that the Senator had “traumatic bursitis.” Visited in the hospital, McCarthy said he had undergone surgery to have some pieces of glass removed from his elbow. (The story was that a Milwaukee admirer had shaken hands with him a bit too vigorously, pumping McCarthy's arm so hard his elbow cracked a glass-topped table.) The hospital doctors said there had been no surgery at all. It was always that way—mixed up. There was talk of back trouble, leg trouble, liver trouble, prostate trouble, lung trouble, heart trouble, and—always—bottle trouble. He would run alarmingly to fat, then he would grow gaunt. He lost forty-one pounds in a few weeks. Not even his closest friends knew what was wrong. "All I know is he always had a flaming belly," one of them has said. It was persistently rumored that he went to the hospital only to have the booze drained off. There have been descriptions of him as having spent his last years in an unbroken alcoholic stupor. These descriptions are inaccurate. He had always been a heavy drinker, and there were times in those seasons of discontent when he drank more than before. But he was not always drunk. He went on the wagon (for him, this meant beer in place of whiskey) for days and weeks at a time. The main trouble toward the end was that he couldn't hold the stuff. Where once he had been able to "belt a fifth"—as members of his set would put it—between midnight and five a.m., sleep for a couple of hours, and be at the office at eight-thirty or nine, he now went to pieces on the second drink.

Still and all, he did not devote his life to it. He was never a sot. He was as busy in that period as the average Senator and a lot busier than many. And he had a private life. He and his wife adopted a baby. He spent a good deal of time with his personal friends, a number of whom had never been his political friends. He went deer hunting, or at least he went into the Wisconsin woods, and once he got a deer with his car.

He became much interested in money. He had always liked it, just as he had always liked liquor, but he had liked to have it in order to get rid of it. Now he developed an obsession with financial security and investments. He began thinking in terms of a quiet, cozy, nonpolitical middle age. "Jean and I have enough money for a small cattle spread in Arizona," he said. "I might open a law office for friends and neighbors." The truth was that he didn't have enough money, but he figured he could get it. He knew people who knew the money game. On their advice, he took some flares in oil and uranium. He made a sizable fraction of a million on paper. His smart friends egged him on. Visions of sugarplums danced in his head. He was on the wagon now, a dedicated speculator, all beer and no hull. Then ~~some~~ of the people who had been going along for the ride decided they had gone far enough. They quit while they were ahead and while McCarthy was in Wisconsin and, momentarily, not keeping up with his portfolio. He sustained heavy losses, not on paper but in legal United States tender. This was very close to the end. He fell off the wagon in a heap.

On April 28, 1957, he was admitted to Bethesda Naval Hospital. Mrs. McCarthy said he had gone for the treatment of a "knee injury." He was put in the neurological section. The Navy doctors announced that his condition had been diagnosed as "peripheral neuritis." Four days later, on May 2, he breathed his last, just in time for the seven o'clock news. ("In time for the seven o'clock news" was his favorite time for subsequent examination and consultation it had been found that McCarthy had been suffering from hepatitis, a chic malady formerly known as jaundice. They ascribed death to "acute hepatic infection" and "hepatic failure." Hepatitis and peripheral neuritis have about as much in common as Asian flu and a broken ankle. Hepar is Greek for liver. Hepatitis is an inflammation of that organ. It is debilitating but seldom fatal. Time reported that McCarthy had died of "cirrhosis of the liver." In cirrhosis, the liver turns into something the consistency of wet sawdust. The commonest agent for the transformation is alcohol. Many people are convinced that McCarthy drank himself to death. One way or another, he probably did—but not, perhaps, in the usual way. It is conceivable that years of drinking had given him a wet-sawdust liver, but the suddenness of his death suggests another possibility. He had had hepatitis, and for a victim of this disease alcohol even in small amounts is poison. The chances are that his last drinking bouts—begun when he got the bad news about his investments—did him in. Either way, liquor and the liver had something to do with it.

Life often hangs on desire

When he died, the true believers cried murder most foul. That is what true believers always do. They said, as one might have expected them to, that the Communists, the Truman-Acheson Democrats, the bleeding hearts, the eggheads, the Eisenhower Republicans, Americans for Democratic Action, the Army Department coddlers of Communists, the Adams-Brownell clique, all the forces of darkness, subversion, and betrayal had come together to crush this patriot and had succeeded in destroying his will to live. The McCarthyite publisher, William Loeb of Manchester, New Hampshire, said that McCarthy's enemies, among whom he numbered "that stinking hypocrite in the White House" had "worn down his adrenal and other glands." Others were less violent and less clinical. They said McCarthy had died of a broken heart, brought on by contemplation of a broken crusade. They would have said this if he had been struck by lightning or bitten by a rabid dog, but the known subjectivity of their judgment does not make it false. The will to live is, we know, a necessary condition of living. Life may endure when it is gone, but when life is challenged by disease or the ravages of time or a heedless mode of existence, it may hang on desire. There is reason to suppose that McCarthy's distress at the very end had more to do with a broken bankbook and a shattered dream of a cattle spread than with a broken crusade, but that scarcely matters. The crusade, such as it was, had ended for him two and a half years earlier. And whether drinking was a primary or a secondary cause of his death, the fact remains that he could probably have held onto life by not drinking, and he elected to drink.

To acknowledge this much, though, is to raise a whole series of questions about McCarthy. Why was he undone by the events of 1954? What was his heart made of that it should break so easily. His defeats were real enough, but they were of the sort on which the ride decided they had gone far enough. They quit while they were ahead and while McCarthy was in Wisconsin and, momentarily, not keeping up with his portfolio. He sustained heavy losses, not on paper but in legal United States tender. This was very close to the end. He fell off the wagon in a heap.

The Navy doctors announced that his condition had been diagnosed as "peripheral neuritis." Four days later, on May 2, he breathed his last, just in time for the seven o'clock news. ("In time for the seven o'clock news" was his favorite time for uncovering a new master spy, for blistering Sherman Adams, or for telling Eisenhower to watch his step.) The first obituaries gave no cause of death. They reported that he was forty-seven, having reached that age the preceding November 9. When someone checked his birth certificate in Grand Chute, Wisconsin, it was found that he had turned forty-eight the preceding November 14. Mrs. McCarthy wanted a posthumous triumph for him in the Senate. He got it. He was the first Senator in seventeen years—the last had been the old Idaho windbag, William Borah—to receive a state funeral in the Senate chamber. "This fallen warrior through death speaketh," the Reverend Frederick Brown Harris, the Senate chaplain said, and the burden of his embarrassing message was that the prophet is not without honor except, etc. The flag-draped coffin was put on a plane with the late Herman Welker and two reporters aboard and flown to Green Bay, Wisconsin. The airborne wake was provisioned as the best wakes generally are. Grief was held at bay over—literally over—McCarthy's dead body. On May 7 the fallen warrior was given a Catholic funeral at St. Mary's Church in Appleton, then laid to rest in a cemetery on a bluff overlooking the Fox River.

Mystery still surrounds the cause of death. The Bethesda doctors said they had erred in their original diagnosis of peripheral neuritis, which is an inflammation of the nerve ends furthest from the central nervous system. They explained, after the fact, that on

... of a reckless mode of existence, it may hang on desire. There is reason to suppose that McCarthy's distress at the very end had more to do with a broken bankbook and a shattered dream of a cattle spread than with a broken crusade, but that scarcely matters. The crusade, such as it was, had ended for him two and a half years earlier. To acknowledge this much, though, is to raise a whole series of questions about McCarthy. Why was he undone by the events of 1954? What was his heart made of that it should break so easily. His defeats were real enough, but they were of the sort on which most leaders of mass movements thrive. Hitler, at one end of the moral spectrum, and Gandhi, at the other, rose phoenix-like from a half-dozen such defeats. What, after all, was so terrible about the events of 1954? He was in a brawl on television, and a lot of Americans got a close look at him and set him down as a plug-ugly. But the people who found him repulsive had never been his followers anyway, and never could have been. To the hard core, and to most of those who formed around it, his nastiness was part of his charm. The more he ranted, the more they loved him, and he was a Caruso among ranters. To be scorned by the respectable, disowned by Eisenhower, half-heartedly "censured" by the Senate—why should any of this have mattered? He wasn't left to rot in a dungeon. He retained his liberties and his office. His followers were still all about him—waiting, if they were of the authentic breed of those fetched by demagogues, for a rallying cry, an order to regroup and resume the attack. Their leader was young and vigorous.

If he had been a Hitler, he might have burned down the Senate. Being McCarthy, he hired a lawyer—one of the country's best, Edward Bennett Williams—and sought an acquittal. When he didn't get it, he buckled before respectable and official opinion. He shared its view that he hadn't much of a future. And he soon died because he could not lay off liquor. This, too, is odd. Historically, it is unheard of that the leader of a crusade, or any true fanatic, should die in this way. Normally, such men—the demonic and the saintly alike—are acoustic. Their dreams of power and glory are headier brews than anything fermented or distilled.

Such questions rest, of course, on the premise that McCarthy was a man of real stature in his field. I believe it can be demonstrated that he was not only the ablest demagogue of his time but the most gifted ever bred on these shores. Most of our demagogues, in this century and the last, have been provincial and parochial figures—their influence limited to a region or a sect. In the nineteenth century, abolition, secession, populism, and nativism produced a few rabble-rousers of proficiency, but none who left a lasting impact on the country and none who are widely remembered today. It may be too early to say that McCarthy's influence will still be felt twenty years from now, but the chances seem good that it will be. In any case, consider his achievements, or ravages, between 1950 and 1954:

—Unknown in 1950, he made himself a global figure by 1952. In many parts of the world, he was the personification of all that was held to be evil in American policy and American life. He was one of the few Americans ever to be actively feared and hated by foreigners.

—Less than two years after his ascent from obscurity, he became a central issue in a Presidential campaign. He was still a first-term Senator in the minority party. He had no rank or power except that which he generated for himself, within himself.

—He gained enormous influence over American foreign policy at a time when American policy bore heavily on world history. Our diplomacy in the Far East, in many respects a key to our diplomacy elsewhere, might have borne a very different aspect if it had not been for McCarthy's power.

—He stamped with his name a tendency, a whole cluster of tendencies in American life. The name survives. To many Americans, whatever is illiberal, anti-intellectual, repressive, reactionary, totalitarian, or merely swinish will hereafter be "McCarthyism." The word is imprecise, but it conveys a meaning and a powerful image.

For all of the black arts that he practiced, McCarthy's natural endowments and his cultivated skills were of the highest order. "The qualities necessary to a demagogue," Aristophanes wrote, "are these: to be foul-mouthed, base-born, a low, mean fellow." McCarthy qualified handsomely. He was the master of the scabrous and the scatological. He understood the perverse appeal of the bum, the mucker, the dead-end kid, the James Jones-Nelson Algren hero to a nation in the midst of a vast leveling process in which everyone was sliding, from one direction or the other, into middle-class respectability, and he was quick to make it. He had some decent instincts—who hasn't?—and some yearnings of his own for lace-curtain, wall-to-wall respectability, but he overcame these with conspicuous ease. He was a fighter who used his thumbs, his teeth, and his knees. His style, I have always thought, owed a lot to that of a certain kind of American athlete: the kind who swaggers and exaggerates his swagger, the kind who looks bold and talks bold and me some "documents" that would, he said, be TNT. "Wait'll you get a load of this," he said. "It's going to rock the country." All eager, I began to look at his photostats, his clippings, his "confidential" reports, his copies of other people's correspondence. A feeling of foolishness—mine, not his—came over me when I was unable to see that any of them proved anything about anything. No TNT. "But I don't quite get it," I would say. "It doesn't seem to have much to do with what I'm after." "It has a lot to do with it," he would say, "but naturally those bastards were trying to cover up. Now look at this one, it will make the others clear. We've got a jigsaw puzzle here, see, and we've got to put the pieces together." I thought he was making sense and that my perceptions were at fault. "Please explain this," I would ask, and he would answer, "It'll all be clear when you've studied a few more of these documents." He would deal some from the bottom of the deck, and I would curse myself for my obtuseness. It was not until I had spent hours with him that it dawned on me that I was being switched, double-shuffled, and conned by one of the masters.

The cloak of sovereignty

There was an audacity about him, a sweep to his imagination that was quite simply beyond the comprehension of most of those with whom he had to deal. He cloaked himself in sovereignty—diplomatic, political, moral. He was not bound by the Constitution, the party system, or any version of the categorical imperative. In May, 1953, he advised the world of the fact that he had negotiated an agreement with the Greek maritime interests that would result in denying to Communist China goods delivered in Greek bottoms. And though he exaggerated wildly in his descriptions of what had occurred, the fact remained that he had constituted himself an agency for the conduct of foreign relations. When it suited his purposes, which was most of the time, he was an open secessionist. In 1952, 1953, and 1954, he organized among government workers a Loyal American Underground. This was an insurrectionist cabal that reported directly to McCarthy and his lieutenants and gave him their primary loyalty. McCarthy was, as all great demagogues are, a revolutionist.

He operated far outside the framework of American political morality. This is not to say that he was immoral or amoral rather than moral; it is rather to say that he ignored the conventions of American politics. Cheating of one sort or another is, of course, tolerated in politics. But there are limits of tolerance, and it was one of McCarthy's distinctions—one of the marks, if you will, of his greatness—that he simply did not consider that the No Trespassing signs were for him. It is, for example, within limits to misrepresent a fact; but the convention holds that it must be a fact that is misrepresented. For McCarthy, this silly rule had no meaning. When he wished to have it believed that Senator Tydings of Maryland consorted with Communists, he was not embarrassed by lack of the kind of evidence that could be manipulated in such a and what their deadlines were, what made a "overnight," what made a good "sidebar." He days, how to get into the news even on those invention failed him and he had no unfacts to give he would call a press conference in the morning announcing that he was going to call a press conference at noon. The reporters would come in, and McCarthy just wanted to give them the word that he had a shattering announcement in the afternoon for the papers. Headline in the afternoon papers: REVELATIONS AWAITED IN CAPITAL. The hour came, the reporters as often as not found him around. He had given his secretary a note to delay his shattering revelation in order to get documents, documents, documents, how well do Americans are for "documents"—that would shattering, when it came.

He brought himself to public notice by other inventions. He said, in his famous Wheeling speech, that there were 205 Communists in the Senate and that he had right there with him a list of their names. He claimed that he had been misunderstood, said that there were 81 and another time that it was 57, but unimportant (except that they, too, got him on the side the fact that he picked a specific number). He said, that day when he was an unknown senator, that there were three Communists in the Department, or seven, or that he had reason to believe that there might be quite a lot of them, no one would attend to him (SENATOR CHARGES COMMUNISM IN STATE DEPARTMENT might be a two-inch story on Page 15 of your local news after all, were saying something of that sort there were "205" or even "57" and that he had them in his hand (naturally, he didn't have any names; from James Byrnes to Adolph Sabath giving a single name, on loyalty investigations), they would go wild.

The very sight of a newspaperman going. Once he ran into a pair of them in the Office Building. "You two looking for a story?" he asked. "Full well that their answer would be, 'Yes, sir.' " "Ahem," he said, "now let's see." The three took an elevator to the basement and boarded a subway train to the Capitol. McCarthy was thinking of going up. "I'm going to subpoena Truman, that's all." He reached in his pocket where he always kept his subpoenas, and began making one out for the first time. "Not serious, Joe, you can't be," one of the reporters said. "You going to subpoena him for?" McCarthy

He boasted of how he had been taught to go straight for the groin by an old north-woods scamp-named Indian Charlie. The rank and file were pleased to know that the leader had been trained by this sage mentor.

Multiple lies and shell games

He had an extraordinary bag of tricks. Hitler discovered the uses of the Big Lie—the falsehood so large and round that reason, which deals in particulars, was almost powerless to combat it. McCarthy invented the Multiple Lie—the lie with so many particulars, so many moving and interchangeable parts, so many tiny gears and fragile connecting rods that reason exhausted itself in the effort to combat it. He said so many different things about so many different people (people, generally, of uncertain identity and even, so far as the public was concerned, of questionable existence) that no one could keep it all in focus.

He brought to perfection a kind of shell game to be played with facts, or what George Orwell called "unfacts." He flummoxed me with it the first time I met him, which was a year or so before he discovered communism. I wished to get certain information about one of his undertakings, and he brought me into his office to show

When he wished to have it believed that Senator Tydings of Maryland consorted with Communists, he was not embarrassed by lack of the kind of evidence that could be manipulated in such a way as to leave this impression. He fabricated the evidence: a photograph of Millard Tydings and a photograph of Earl Browder, the Communist leader, taken at a different time in a different place were mounted together and offered as a photograph of the two consorting.

I recall him once, early in his career, rising to the Senate floor and announcing that he was going to quote a letter from one government official to another. What he read had a very fishy sound, and a couple of other Senators interrupted to say they thought McCarthy must be "quoting out of context." They asked that the entire letter be made part of the record, so that Senators could judge its import for themselves. McCarthy said he would get around to that later; meanwhile, he wished to exercise his privilege of quoting what he wished to quote. When, eventually, the letter did get into the record, it turned out that he had not been quoting out of context—for he had not been quoting at all. What he had held in his hand might have been a picture of Zsa Zsa Gabor; he had simply invented, standing there on the Senate floor, lines that served his purpose at the moment. Within the framework of political morality, it is permitted for a man to deal in half-truths, words wrenched from context, and so forth, but not to deal, as he did, in wholly imaginary texts.

And of course he was a genius at that essential American strategy—publicity. He knew what it was made of, the very texture of it. He knew the newspapermen and how and when they worked

The very sight of a newspaper going. Once he ran into a pair of them in the Office Building. "You two looking for something?" full well that their answer would be "No, Mr. Mmm," he said, "now let's see." He took an elevator to the basement and led to the Capitol. McCarthy was up. "I'm going to subpoena Truman." He reached in his pocket where he kept his subpoenas, and began making one out. "Not serious, Joe, you can't be," one of the men said. "You going to subpoena him for?" McCarthy, with his forefinger several times, pointed to the name of Harry Dexter White, that was on the subpoena.

Publicity helps; indeed, without it, McCarthy would have had far more than a flair for press-agency luck that presented him with the kind of success that was largely accident. He had been a success of any sort, and a friend tipped him off about material on infiltration that had been used by an investigating committee a long time ago, forgotten because it wasn't very important. Now it belongs to the age of McCarthy—at certainly not in the aftermath of the war, not the first to pounce on it, but the first to career on it. To it, he contributed a certain amount of formidable. He was an authentic success. He may not have drawn out the full consequences Long could get; he may not have drawn out the full consequences of the American soul as a place of the German soul. There are too many American souls—no one can rally us all. But McCarthy has a certain American and very effective, and and what their deadlines were, what made a "lead," what made an "overnight," what made a good "sidebar." He knew, in his good days, how to get into the news even on those rare occasions when invention failed him and he had no unfacts to give out. For example, he would call a press conference in the morning for the purpose of announcing that he was going to call a press conference in the afternoon. The reporters would come in, and McCarthy would say that he just wanted to give them the word that he was going to make a shattering announcement in the afternoon for use in the morning papers. Headline in the afternoon papers: NEW McCARTHY REVELATIONS AWAITED IN CAPITAL. When the appointed hour came, the reporters as often as not found McCarthy nowhere around. He had given his secretary a note saying that he had to delay his shattering revelation in order to get some "documents"—documents, documents, documents, how well he knew what suckers Americans are for "documents"—that would make it even more shattering, when it came.

He brought himself to public notice by one of his most dazzling inventions. He said, in his famous Wheeling, West Virginia, speech, that there were 205 Communists in the State Department and that he had right there with him a list of them. He later claimed that he had been misunderstood, saying once that his figure was 81 and another time that it was 57, but these revisions are unimportant (except that they, too, got him in the papers) alongside the fact that he picked a specific number and a large one. Had he said, that day when he was an unknown and evidently uninteresting Senator, that there were three Communists in the State Department, or seven, or that he had reason to believe that there might be quite a lot of them, no one would have paid the slightest attention to him (SENATOR CHARGES COMMUNIST INFLUENCE IN STATE DEPARTMENT might have turned up over a two-inch story on Page 15 of your local newspaper.) Many people, after all, were saying something of that sort. But when he said there were "205" or even "57" and that he had their names in his hand (naturally, he didn't have any names; all he had was a letter from James Byrnes to Adolph Sabath giving some figures, without a single name, on loyalty investigations), the press simply had to go wild.

The very sight of a newspaperman would set his mind going. Once he ran into a pair of them idling along in the Senate Office Building. "You two looking for a story?" he asked, knowing full well that their answer would be, "Sure, have you got one?" "Atum," he said, "now let's see." The three walked along together, took an elevator to the basement and boarded the little subway that leads to the Capitol. McCarthy was thinking hard. Then he lighted up. "I'm going to subpoena Truman, that's what I'm going to do." He reached in his pocket where he always kept a wad of blank subpoenas, and began making one out for the ex-President. "You're were other issues to be exploited. He was still a young man.

Civic virtue has proposed several answers, to wit:
—Truth crushed to earth does not burrow out of sight, but in happy reality rises again. The facts, in time, found McCarthy out, and after that his cause was hopeless.

—You can't fool even many of the people all the time. No sizable number will forever put up with a lout.

—He had only slime for mortar. Demagogues, to be truly successful, must hold up to their following some hope and plan—however malign in content—for making life better and more equitable. This McCarthy failed to do. He was a mischief-maker, a destroyer, a nihilist, and in the end he could not even satisfy himself.

No doubt each of these points has merit, but even if they explain McCarthy's defeats in 1954, they do not account for his acceptance of them. Normally, demagogues, like lovers and poets, simply do not recognize rejection and repudiation. Juan Perón, thrown out of his own country and subsequently a refugee from his place of refuge, continues to inflame his followers and to stir things up in half a dozen countries.

I believe that just as the sources of McCarthy's power were to be found in McCarthy's person, there, too, may be found the principal reasons for his easy capitulation in 1954.

McCarthy was a great demagogue, but he was, in my view, an essentially frivolous one. The world took him seriously, as indeed it should have, but he never really took himself seriously. He was the leader of a fanatical movement, and he gave his name to a fanatical doctrine, but he was no kind of fanatic himself. He was a hell-raiser, a born troublemaker, a political racketeer, a con man who loved the game for its own sake. It is conceivable that in his later days he began to believe what he was saying and to imagine himself truly persecuted by his enemies; at times, during the Army-McCarthy hearings, he would fly into fits of what appeared to be genuine hysteria. He may by then have cast his spell over himself.

The cultivated tantrum

But even this is doubtful. Mostly his hysteria was for the birds. He was capable of going into a tantrum before the television cameras and screaming, "Mr. Chairman, Mr. Chairman, Point of Order, Point of Order," tearing passions to tatters, announcing that he could bear no more of "this farce" and would dignify it with his presence not a moment longer—and then making a beeline for the Cent's Halls, the objective he had had in mind when he began the outburst. Why not put nature into politics? Sometimes he would "walk out" and get no further than a corner of the room that was out of the sweep of the cameras, there to observe calmly and be amused by the commotion he had caused. He often timed his walkouts for the newspaper deadlines.

If he came to believe his own lies and to hate and fear his de-

"You're not serious, Joe, you can't be," one of the reporters said. "What are you going to subpoena him for?" McCarthy tapped his big skull with his forefinger several times. "Oh, I'm calling him to testify about Harry Dexter White, that's what."

Publicity helps; indeed, without it all is lost. But McCarthy had far more than a flair for press-agentry. And he had more than the luck that presented him with the Communist issue in 1950. (It was largely accident. He had been casting about for speech material of any sort, and a friend tipped him off to some largely unused material on infiltration that had been gathered, filed and forgotten by an investigating committee a couple of years back. It had been forgotten because it wasn't very impressive—but there it was, unused. Now it belongs to the ages.) The issue was not to be scoffed at—certainly not in the aftermath of the Hiss case. McCarthy was not the first to pounce on it, but he was the first to build a large career on it. To it, he contributed his own personality, which was formidable. He was an authentic mob organizer and galvanizer. He may not have drawn out the affection and bonhomie that Huey Long could get; he may not have been able to reach into the dark places of the American soul as Hitler could reach into the dark places of the German soul. This may have been because there are too many American souls—no one man, of good or evil bent, can rally us all. But McCarthy had his own ways, and they were very American and very effective, and he rallied a large minority.

And then he ran into some heavy weather, gave up the struggle, and shortly thereafter died. Why? The issue was still hot. There

He often timed his walkouts for the newspaper deadlines.

If he came to believe his own lies and to hate and fear his detractors as they hated and feared him, he did so only sporadically. If he fell under his own spell, the spell quickly passed. He was, to be sure, a prince of hatred. The haters rallied round him; at a word from him, their hate glands would puff and swell—fresh supplies of venom would flow into their venom sacs. But this most successful and menacing of all our apostles of hatred was himself as incapable of true rancor, spite, and animosity as a eunuch is of marriage. He just did not have the equipment for it. He faked it all and couldn't understand anyone who didn't. When he ran into Dean Acheson in a Senate elevator, he thought it cold and unfriendly of Acheson to respond to his "Hello, Dean," with clenched teeth and a crimson forehead. When, in the Army-McCarthy hearings, he sunk to what even Roy Cohn knew to be the very bottom of the pit of degradation—by trying to hurt Joseph Welch, the Army's attorney, with a wholly gratuitous smear on a young friend and associate of Welch's who had nothing whatever to do with the case—he was baffled by the way everyone shrank from him and cleared the path before him as before a leper (Unclean! Unclean!) when he left the Caucus Room. They had all been on Welch's side when he addressed McCarthy:

"Until this moment, Senator, I think I had never really gauged your cruelty or your recklessness. . . . If it were in my power to forgive you for your reckless cruelty, I would do so. I like to think that I am a gentle man, but your forgiveness will have to come from someone other than me."

When, later, McCarthy at last found someone who would speak to him, he held out his hands, palms upward, and said, "What did

"I do?" He knew what he had said, of course, but I believe he genuinely did not know what he had done. In his mind, there was a severance between words and their meanings. A year or so before he died, he met at a Washington party a former associate, a man he had publicly betrayed and ruined. He went up to this man and within the hearing of the astonished guests asked why they had not seen each other in months. "Jeanie was talking about you the other night," he said. "How come we never see you? What the hell are you trying to do—avoid us?"

I am trying to suggest—it is a perilous as well as a difficult undertaking—that there was to this ogreish creature a kind of innocence that may be one of the clues to his fate. The man was a moral vacuum. Somehow or other, he could simulate hatred and several other passions, but he was numb to the sensations they produced in others. Perhaps because of this, certainly in spite of it, he had—dare one say it now?—a certain personal charm. It must be said, for there were many people who loathed him and liked him. Among them were several of the reporters who were assigned to him regularly, who referred to themselves as the Goon Squad, and who put the Republic greatly in their debt by their scholarly and unrelenting pursuit of the truths he sought to bury with his Multiple Lies. Many of them were fond of him, as he was fond of many of them; they knifed him in their stories, they knew full well that his knife was always drawn for them, yet they could drink together and be, in a sense, friends.

There was the classic case of the celebrated English journalist, a man who had convinced himself at his desk in London that McCarthy was a great beast at large in the world—a monster that had to be destroyed, and right away, in the name of human decency. He appointed himself a St. George, grabbed up his typewriter, and boarded the first transatlantic plane he could make. He was to write a series of articles so powerful that McCarthy, exposed at last, would immediately be crushed. Naturally, he had to see the dragon. In Washington, he phoned McCarthy's office and asked for an appointment. He got one right away. Bracing himself, reminding himself that violence never solved anything, he went off to the appointment. He was shown in, and the opening conversation went something like this:

McCARTHY: They tell me you're a hell of a reporter. Have a drink?

CELEBRATED JOURNALIST: Senator McCarthy, I think you should know that I despise you and everything you stand for. I think you are the greatest force for evil in the world today.

McC: No kidding. How about the drink? What'll you have?

CJ: I have just told you, Senator McCarthy, that I loathe and detest you. I am here to expose you. It will get you nowhere to try to be kind to me.

quite so powerful an assault on McCarthy as he had hoped they would be. He was not destroyed.

The night McCarthy died, a friend of his, one with nothing but contempt for the role McCarthy had played, returned home late in the evening to find his wife sitting by the radio and weeping—not in pure grief, as it turned out, but in frustration. She had, she explained, listened to all the comments that had been made about McCarthy's death. "Everyone has said the same thing," she said through her tears, "and they have all been wrong, wrong, wrong! They have told exactly the opposite of the truth. They all hated him, but they had to find a saving grace for their obituaries, so what have they given him?—sincerity. Each one had said, 'At least he was sincere—he believed in what he was doing,' when that was the one goddam thing you couldn't say of him." She went on in lachrymose eloquence. "He was a stinker, he was never sincere, he'd never thought of believing in what he was doing. There wasn't much good you could say of him, except that he was generous to his friends and a few of us couldn't help liking him. No one has said that, and no one will. Only this junk about his being 'sincere.'"

McCarthy simulated belief for the true believers. Among those who knew him, very few thought that he spoke from any kind of conviction. He was a political speculator, a wildcatter who drilled communism and saw it come up a gusher. He liked his gusher, but he would have liked any other just as well. He was an enormously skillful manipulator of political issues, but he was almost wholly indifferent to them. He had run for the Senate with valuable assistance from the Communists ("Communists have the same right to vote as anyone else, don't they," he had said when taxed with his left-wing support, and to get more of it, he had said, "Stalin's proposal for world disarmament is a great thing"), and he had spent four years in the Senate making scarcely a mention of communism. When he found there was something in it, he worked it, but he was a lazy as well as a frivolous demagogue, and he never really mastered it. He served up what Roy Cohn gave him to serve up; most of the time, he didn't know what he was talking about or even whom he was talking about. (The late Howard Rushmore, a real specialist, left McCarthy's employ because he couldn't stand the sloppiness of the organization. "Those files," Rushmore said with a shudder. "My God, what a mess.") McCarthy was singular. Only he could say, on a spring day in 1950, that the next morning he would name "the Number One Communist spy in the United States," when in fact he had not the slightest idea of whom he would name—and then deliver the next morning the name of a man of whose very existence he had been unaware the previous day. No one but McCarthy could hold up a scrap of paper that might have been a parking ticket or a laundry list, anything but a list of Communists in a government agency—and say it was a list of Communists in a government agency.

minning himself that violence never solved anything, he went off to the appointment. He was shown in, and the opening conversation went something like this:

CJ: I have just told you, Senator McCarthy, that I loathe and detest you. I am here to expose you. It will get you nowhere to try to be kind to me.

McC: We can talk later. Now what. . . ?

CJ: I will start talking now. I wish only to warn you fairly that you can expect no quarter from me. In my opinion. . .

McC: For chrissake, are you going to have a drink or aren't you? Let's settle that first.

CJ (nearly dehydrated): If it is clearly understood that I am under no obligations, that I am retracting not one word that I have said about you, that your hospitality will not gain you my good opinion, I will join you in a drink. I will, if you please, have some whiskey, with perhaps just a dash of soda.

McC: Good.

The interview then began and proceeded without interruption for an hour or so. The Londoner could not put a question without telling McCarthy what a foul and poisonous creature he was. McCarthy could not answer without offering some more whiskey with perhaps just a splash of soda. Both were loaded almost to the muzzle when McCarthy was reminded that he had a dentist's appointment. He invited St. George to come along, and the interview went on insofar as it was possible with McCarthy's great jaw clamped open and a dentist with trembling hands worked over McCarthy's cavities and tried to keep his head in an atmosphere blue with the talk and quavering with the fumes of the bourbon he had consented to allow his patient to use as a rinse. Back in McCarthy's office, and after that in McCarthy's apartment, the interview still continued, in a much degenerated form, and carried over to the next morning. Finally it ended. The Englishman wrote his articles; they burned with moral outrage, but they were not

The demon was not possessed by one

McCarthy was a demon, but he was not, to our great good fortune, a man possessed by demons. His talents as a demagogue were great, but he lacked the most necessary and awesome of demagogic gifts—a belief in the sacredness of his own mission. To persevere in the face of adversity, a man needs the courage of his convictions, and if he has no convictions he can scarcely draw courage from them. It was the lack of conviction that made him at once a more vulnerable and interesting human being than any of his followers. The conviction he lacked was an absurd thing, and any man was the better for not having it. His friend and lawyer, Edward Bennett Williams, has always insisted that McCarthy's was a glory drive, not a power drive, and the distinction seems a valid one, in his case and in general.

The glory drive is always less dangerous because it is more easily frustrated. It is selfish, or self-seeking, in the narrowest sense, and it makes defeat and humiliation a more personal affair. "Faith in a holy cause," Eric Hoffer has written, "is to a considerable extent a substitute for the lost faith in ourselves." If McCarthy ever had faith in a holy cause he lost it early and reposed all his faith in himself. He was a cynic, a true one. Cynicism is never admirable, but it is better for the world when a man as gifted as McCarthy is contemptuous of morality than when he is aflame over a vicious and destructive one. McCarthy employed a vicious and destructive one, but it never set him afire, and he proved in the end unable to set even the United States Senate afire. #

Dear [Redacted]

Your letter dated July 7, 1959, with enclosure, has been received, and I want to thank you for bringing the editorial, "Coffin-Kickers Reopen Joe McCarthy's Grave," to my attention. I also appreciate the benefit of your observations in this regard and your thoughtfulness in affording me advance notice of the "Playhouse 90" feature to be released this fall.

Sincerely yours,

NOTE: We previously wrote to [Redacted] on November 3, 1958, expressing appreciation for his editorial which was a critical analysis of Fred Cook's story in "The Nation." Bufiles reflect prior cordial correspondence with this newspaper; however, on December 16, 1955, an item appeared in this newspaper which stated that convicted California communists claimed that the witnesses who testified against them were "pathological liars." The next item in the column began "That pathological liar J. Edgar Hoover turned down a proposal this week that he become a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination..." This matter was taken up with [Redacted] SAC, LA, since [Redacted] was a personal friend of Monsignor Robert North, managing editor of this paper. North stated the article was intended to be nothing but laudatory of the Director and that any criticism of the Director was the furthest thought from his mind. Director noted "I certainly can't agree that the article isn't critical. It certainly is clearly so. H."

Your letter of July 6, 1959, is to be kept in confidence. It is my personal opinion that these pseudo-liberals are doing a disservice to our country and America by their attacks on the Church.

I have been told that Playhouse 99 is in process of releasing some anti-McCarthy picture to be released some time in the fall. This seems to be a coincidence.

My letter, I have been told, is intended to tell the American people that they have been cruelly misled by the late Senator McCarthy.

Goffin-Kickers Reopen Joe McCarthy's Grave

This is not a book review.

It is a review of certain reviewers of what is alleged to be a book.

We'll take the word of those who have glowingly extolled what to them is an epochal production: Senator Joe McCarthy by Richard H. Rovere.

Apparently it is intended to give the impression of a documented objective appraisal of one of the most controversial political figures of this generation.

Testimony

The reviewers admit that Rovere has excoriated the late Senator McCarthy, now dead more than two years, with about every vile printable epithet in the lexicon.

Among them are: "liar," "barbarian," "thug," "bully," "bum," "vulgarian," "cynic," "demon," "bamboozler," "nihilist," "screamer," "seditionist," "ogre," "demagogue," "guttersnipe." That's what reviewers said.

It seems just about to sum up the book.

We cannot resist the observation that such name-calling was particularly typical of Communist attacks on the Senator during the days when he was exposing them.

Now Senator McCarthy is dead and cannot defend himself.

The only laugh comes when some of the reviewers review the author rather than the book.

Some Kudos

The reader in unbelieving amazement reads that the author is a temperate objective writer, "an acute and breath-takingly levelheaded reporter."

"Under his dispassionate gaze, the lifework of the ogre from Wisconsin appears in human perspective for perhaps the first time, and with a curious result," wrote Donald Malcolm in the July 3 New Yorker.

It is not surprising that he ranted on for more than five columns in undiluted raptures over Rovere who does a regular feature, "Letter from Washington," for that magazine.

But when nearly every "liberal" and left-wing publication book section joins the yelping pack, one begins to wonder.

Even New York Times reviewer Anthony Lewis has pictured Rovere as "without rancor, indeed with an air of almost sympathetic curiosity about the phenomenon that was McCarthy."

It should be noted to his credit, however, that while he lauds the author, he does not give unqualified approval of the book, albeit for the wrong implied reason.

"What the book lacks is detailed documentation and the thorough research that would be needed to give any fresh insight into Joseph R. McCarthy."

He can well say that again, but what he apparently wants is more damaging evidence.

Incongruities

Falling in line with the kit and caboodle, even such an eminent intellectual liberal as John Cogley wrote in the current issue of Commonweal:

"Millions are now persuaded that McCarthy was a menace to free government and free institutions. Obviously, I would include myself among them."

We will remember to include him, but where and by whom have the millions been so persuaded? By Rovere or by pontificating John Cogley?

The astounding aspect of the phenomenon is that these writers never seem to see the incongruities of their dictums.

On the one hand they consign McCarthy to the deepest part of the nether regions as an obnoxious meddler and on the other hand attribute to him almost superhuman powers.

Samples

As Malcolm wrote: "Those were the days when a single senator could, and did, conduct an independent foreign policy, and was allowed to make this Republic contemptible in the eyes of Europe."

Then he added, "As Mr. Rovere points out, the press was peculiarly helpless to cope with McCarthy and his kind."

One wonders what is the meaning that reporters "were angry about the system that required them to publish 'news' they knew to be fraudulent but prohibited them from reporting their knowledge of its fraudulence."

Such was Senator McCarthy's power over the press!

Also, "Democrats who opposed him were beaten at the polls, and others quaked."

Even Rovere is quoted to have said in his book: "He (McCarthy) usurped executive and judicial authority whenever the fancy struck him."

On Their Heads

Apparently striving to outdo even the author of the book, John Cogley reaches these delirious heights:

"For the fact is that all kinds of people succumbed to McCarthyism, not out of admiration and agreement—like those hardy followers of his who are still willing to stand up for him [thank you, John]—but out of fear, cowardice, complacency or indifference.

"Politicians in both parties stood in terror of what might happen to them if they spoke about him publicly the way they did privately [or after he was dead]. Many heads of academic institutions, clergymen, editors and organization leaders were just as scared.

"Some of them stood on their heads in order to avoid any possibility of being tarred with his red brush, not hesitating to betray friends, subordinates, and cherished principles as well."

What a man, that Joe McCarthy!

Why, Oh Why?

The mystery, if it is a mystery, is why did the book make its appearance at this particular time and why are certain reviewers effervescing over it?

Does it perhaps tie in with the attacks on the late John Foster Dulles, J. Edgar Hoover, Lewis L. Strauss, Sen. Eastland, Rep. Walter and anyone else who dares investigate the Red conspiracy?

Rovere makes much of Senator McCarthy's effort to get facts from the Army in the Peress case and passes it off as nothing.

By the way, who did promote Peress?

Summing up, this whole business looks from here like another pseudo-liberal assault on the citadel of American constitutional democracy.

Vindictiveness

A woman scorned hath no wrath like that of pseudo-liberals.

If exception be taken to this description, let it be ~~said that~~ when one ~~sees a~~ bird that waddles like a duck, quacks like a duck, swims like a duck and associates with ducks, well, quite naturally one forms the suspicion that this bird is being influenced by ducks.

When this bird sings out the word "McCarthyism," which is well known to have been coined by the Communists, one is constrained to think that this influence is having its desired effect.

Last Word

Richard H. Rovere flourishes a facile pen, which is never more at its best than when dipped in the blood of some anti-Communist's reputation.

When one reviewer stated that Rovere "writes without bitterness. Indeed, there are times when Mr. Rovere's detachment seems almost preternatural," what more can be said?

The Kremlin boys should give him the award denied to Pasternak and confer upon him the medal of Lenin.

And they may yet just do that—later!—G.N.K.

The "Sunday Star," May 15, 1960, contained an article entitled, "Senator McCarthy Returns as Fictional Prototype." The article commented on a new novel written by Ernest Frankel entitled "Tongue of Fire." The Director inquired, "what do we know about Frankel?"

We have not investigated Frankel and the only information in Bureau files identifiable with him is an article which appeared in the Washington "Evening Star" on May 11, 1955, which indicated that Ernest Frankel's book "Tongue of Fire" had been withdrawn from publication by G. P. Putnam's Sons. No explanation was given by Putnam's for withdrawing publication of the book. The article further commented that the author was seeking others to publish his book. (140-0-4)

EXPLOSION IN WASHINGTON

Senator McCarthy Returns As Fictional Prototype

By CARTER BROOKE JONES
Star Book Critic

TONGUE OF FIRE. By Ernest Frankel. (Dial; $4.95.)

This explosive Washington novel, while written around some events of a few years ago, could, unlike most fiction of its genre, be read without regard to recent news, simply as a story of Capitol Hill.

It's that exciting, that absorbing, although sensational in design, and sometimes descending in its swift pace to merely slick writing.

The Central Figure

But no one even vaguely informed about recent history could fail to be mindful throughout the long story of the obvious prototype of the central figure, whom the author calls Kane O'Connor, a Representative from North Carolina.

Making this character a Representative from a Southern State cannot disguise, even thinly, the man the author so certainly had in mind when he sat down at his typewriter. This is Mr. Frankel's version of the late Senator Joseph McCarthy. However accurate the picture is I cannot pretend to say, though I suspect that it differs at many points from the actual character of the fiery Wisconsinite. So many enemies of what was called McCarthyism were unable to grant the Senator a decent impulse, a touch of sincerity, even a belief in his mission, however deplorable some of his methods, however reckless some of his charges.

The Devil His Due

Frankel belongs to the school of McCarthy - nothing man O'Connor hasn't been deemed trait unless it's charm.

The author does concede his man a heroic exploit in the war. Senator McCarthy's foes tried to disparage his excellent war record and would admit no redeeming facet of his life from the age of 8 on.

The O'Connor of this novel is receiving, as we meet him, a hero's welcome to his home town, a small city. The handsome young man, bombardier on a bomber when it was set afire, took the controls as the crew jumped and brought it safely down and with it a comrade who was wounded and couldn't parachute.

Power and Glory

But young O'Connor soon decided to parlay his publicity and his DSC into power and glory. He ran for district solicitor and was elected. Then, double-crossing the uncle who was a judge and wanted to fill a vacated seat in Congress, Kane O'Connor himself ran for the seat. He dug up a phony white supremacy issue (it was before the Supreme Court school decision) and won easily. His uncle had withdrawn.

Once in Washington, Kane was strictly on the make. He managed to meet some of the wealthy and influential. Perhaps the terms are very famous - and especially pretty and bright - by Payne. I understand of Dany, the new Congressman, soon turned away from his home town girl, who was planning their early marriage.

The Un-American Issue

Dany fell hard for the charming young Southerner and worked incessantly to help him build himself into the national figure he coveted. When he stumbled on the un-American issue, more or less by accident, it was Dany and of course Tod, Kane's shrewd assistant from the home town, who saw how it could put him on the news map. Kane, at Dany's suggestion, persuaded the conservative Congressman who headed a Government monitoring committee to give him Kane, a subcommittee to investigate alleged subversion in the Government.

With the subcommittee at his command and a fanatical, scintillating counsel of his choosing, Kane quickly became the favorite subject of headlines and television cameras. The State Department, he announced, was riddled with Communists. He would prove it. But he didn't. Then he turned on the National Experimental Center, the chief Government research activity, and came up with a quiet, middle-aged chief clerk who in his youth, he admitted, had flirted with communism and had kept one friend who was still in the movement. But what infuriated the administration (then Democratic, Kane's party of course) was that subcommittee sleuths had stolen the personnel records of the agency, which were under wraps. There were demands in the House for the expulsion of Kane, and a resolution was offered.

The Perfect Scoundrel

Kane turned out to be almost 100 per cent scoundrel. He wheedled large sums from wealthy persons for his crusade and devoted some of them to settling his private debts. He used every friend in whatever way seemed to his advantage. He couldn't be true to his devoted Dany, but often slipped up to New York to be with a glamorous call girl who had a highly selective clientele.

Kane would be a more persuasive character if he had even a thin layer of virtues somewhere inside his thick crust of viciousness. People are seldom all black or white. Senator McCarthy may have been very little as he is pictured in his personal life by the average liberal. And yet so completely does the author go into Kane's mind—he comes to believe in himself through a sort of self-hypnosis—that we feel, in spite of all his derelictions, a certain sympathy for him as political and personal tragedy stalks him.

Mr. Frankel, a New Yorker who graduated from the University of North Carolina, was on duty with the Marines in Washington and during the Korean war and attended many congressional hearings. His account of the way things are done on the Hill is mostly quite accurate. This is the author's second novel. His first, "Band of Brothers," about the Korean war, was well received.

Dear Mr. Hoover:

Showing my opinion, I have chosen to write to you concerning the late Senator Joseph Mc Carthy. In a discussion, I have taken the position that Mc Carthy was nothing more than another Hitler (although, of course, not quite so successful).

I should like information to prove or disprove my contention, from your office or from any other source. Would you be so kind as to furnish me such information or to tell me where I could find such information? Thank you.

Dear Mr. Hoover:

Last Wednesday evening I heard a speech delivered by a gentleman of our community who is considered well-informed on the subject of Communism. He spoke on the Communist threat to the United States.

Later in the evening I was introduced to this gentleman and in the course of our conversation he asserted that there was some area of doubt that Senator Joseph McCarthy died of natural causes. It was his understanding that the senator's wife had requested an autopsy be performed on her deceased husband because of the strange circumstances surrounding his sudden death. This was denied. The death certificate signed by the doctor attending the senator stated - "Died of causes unknown", the inference being that Senator McCarthy had been poisoned.

Is your office in a position to send me the facts on this case? If not, would you advise where such information could be obtained?

Many thanks for your courtesy in replying.

Dear Mr. Hoover,

Recently I have had cause to enter into believe most people are wrong in their ideas of Senator McCarthy and a wish to shed a little light on the subject. At the same time I plan to do this coming semester.

Any information about Senator McCarthy, in the form of books or pamphlets, which you might also appreciate any literature which you have on hand at the moment and are able to send to me.

You may ask me why I write to you for this matter etc. I believe that, through you, I can get a clearer picture of the man himself. I do not only wish to know of what he did or tried to do but also of his personality, ideals, etc. As I have said, I feel that my best source for this material would be yourself. I want my knowledge of the man to be complete so that I may quote him

Dear Mr. Hoover:

We are writing in the hope that you might be of assistance to us concerning a book we are authoring about the late Senator Joseph R. McCarthy of Wisconsin.

Specifically what we would appreciate from you is your personal evaluation and opinion of Senator McCarthy and the goals he sought to accomplish as a United States Senator. We will, of course, give full credit to your opinions and will not in any way quote them out of context so as to misconstrue their meaning in a printed publication that we might develop.

We feel that a defense of Senator McCarthy has been too long in forthcoming. While Mr. P. Buckley Jr. and L. Brent Bozell have presented the record in their brilliant publication of McCarthy and His Enemies, no one has as yet ventured to write a defense of the man--McCarthy himself. This we propose to do in, In Defense of History, The Story of Senator Joseph R. McCarthy.

Mr. James C. Farrington

Dear Mr. Farrington:

Joseph R. McCarthy

In November, I had read a New York Times story reporting that the Attorney General had agreed to permit interested scholars to secure access to the FBI's investigative files. Being an historian specializing in post-World War II politics and internal security matters, I greeted that news with keen interest. My major research interest centers on the important internal security cases and congressional investigations of the Truman years. Noting, however, that researchers must pay for the cost of FBI personnel reviewing the files and that the cost for the Rosenbergs file was estimated as being $5,000 and the Hiss file as being $12,895, I thought it appropriate first to ascertain the approximate cost of files I would be interested in researching and, if possible, the foot length of these files.

The files that I would be interested in beyond the Hiss and Rosenbergs files include: the Amerasia case, Elizabeth Bentley, Louis Budenz, Whittaker Chambers, the Communist Eleven who went to trial in the Dennis case, Judith Coplon; and any files you have dealing with your correspondence, interviews, and responses to requests from the House Committee on Un-American Activities, the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and Senator Joseph R. McCarthy.

If you could, give me a cost breakdown for each of these requests. If it is not feasible to give me an exact breakdown, I would appreciate a rough estimate (as, for example, the total request would run in the range of xthousand to ythousand dollars).

Thank you for your assistance, I remain

"The Evening Star," Washington, D. C., of September 11, 1953, contains an allegation to the effect that Senator McCarthy disclosed classified information of the Department of the Army in releasing the full text of an intelligence study on the "psychological and cultured traits of Soviet Siberia," made in January, 1952, ~~by the~~ the Far East Command. It is said McCarthy made public portions of the document previously calling it "the best Communist propoganda I have seen in a long time." The article alleges the cover of the intelligence study contains the following:

"This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the espionage laws. Title 18, U. S. Code, Sections 793 and 794. The transmission or the revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law."

The study was reportedly marked "Restricted - Security Information." It is noted this is the lowest of the security classifications employed by the military services.

Senator McCarthy sharply brushed aside the charge he had violated security in releasing the document. Senator McCarthy is quoted as saying, "Neither the Army nor anyone else can hide dishonesty, corruption and Communism behind any stamp of secrecy." The article is attached for your information.

Security Law Violation Laid To Senator

Document Contained Red Propaganda, Legislator Retorts

The Army today charged Senator McCarthy with disclosing restricted security information in violation of the espionage laws, but the Wisconsin Republican fired right back with a blast of his own.

Army spokesmen made their charge against Senator McCarthy in releasing the full text of an intelligence study on the "psychological and cultured traits of Soviet Siberia," made in January, 1952, by the Far East Command. Senator McCarthy yesterday made public portions of the document, calling it "the best Communist propaganda I've seen in a long time."

Inside the cover of the document, these words appear:

"This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the espionage laws Title 18, U. S. Code, Sections 793 and 794. The transmission or the revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law."

Marked Restricted.

The study was marked "Restricted—Security Information." "Restricted" is the lowest of several secrecy classifications employed by the military services.

The Army said that it was declassifying the document from its restricted status now, but emphasized that this was done only "as a result of prior disclosure."

Senator McCarthy sharply brushed aside the charge that he had violated security in releasing the document. He said his Senate Investigations subcommittee has received "less cooperation from the military in digging out Communists than any other branch of the government."

"Neither the Army nor any else," the Senator added, "hide dishonesty, corruption, communism behind any stamp of secrecy."

"If we find they are putting out Communist propaganda, they can't keep it secret by stamping it restricted and using it in indoctrination courses."

Army Hits Back

But the Army in its strongly-worded statement put out at Senator McCarthy's suggestion that its intelligence study was a piece of Communist propaganda.

The Army said that if the chairman of the Senate Investigations subcommittee had released the full report—particularly its conclusion—instead of only the first 70 pages, the true purpose of the document would have been plain.

"The purpose of this study is clearly set forth in the following extract from its preamble: 'To develop an understanding of the Soviet people which will be militarily useful in case of war,'" the Army said.

The parts of the report which offended Senator McCarthy, it was explained, were designed to describe the attitude of the Soviet citizen.

"It is obvious that the necessary instruction of officers and men in this field cannot proceed without attempting to enter the mind and thought processes of the Russian citizen," the Department said. "To understand the mind of the Soviet citizen, it is essential to consider the Communist propaganda which plays such an important role in shaping that mind."

The concluding portion of the (See McCARTHY, Page A-6)

Union is as much chained to his job and local area as is the convict. He has no voice in determining his place of work, working conditions or wage.

"His only advantage over the convict is that he can live with his family and can spend his limited income as he sees fit. He has no redress against a harsh authoritarian government. He is forbidden to raise his voice in criticism, to develop independent views or to acquire unbiased information. His voting rights are a travesty on the ideals and purposes of democracy. He enjoys no acknowledged rights for his person, life or property. He is the helpless prisoner of a slave state. As was noted previously, such an existence would be intolerable to Americans. American traditions and beliefs militate against every facet of government activity in the U. S. S. R."

"British and American Communist sympathizers who visit the U. S. S. R. nearly always return in bitter disillusionment. There is no better antidote for radicalism."

Senator McCarthy's answer was that the Army document is 95 per cent Communist prop-

Department, testified that the United Nations afforded "a very nice ground" for Communist activity.

Mr. Lautner named one "American Communist" employed by the U. N. as Noel Remes. The subcommittee members said Mr. Remes had not been identified in any previous hearings as being a Communist.

Mr. Lautner said that Mr. Remes, a member of the Polish staff at the U. N., had been a high official of the Communist Party for a number of years and was an assistant editor of the party's publication "Political Affairs."

"When called to task, the Army cites the small 5 per cent," the Senator said.

He said he had found, unfortunately, the Army today is doing "what they did under the old Truman administration." He said that while there is a better attitude since President Eisenhower took office, "the political carry-overs are still functioning to cover up, protect and whitewash."

Urges Full Scale Probe

He said he thought there should be a full scale investigation of the matter and said he would place it before his subcommittee for a decision.

As his battle with the Army raged on, Senator McCarthy announced a series of hearings starting Monday in New York to look into employment of American Communists in the United Nations.

He made the announcement after a former Communist Party functionary, John Lautner, 51, now an employe of the Justice

SMALL TEMPESTS

TWO ads about nothing are tied together in the current squabble between Sen. Joe McCarthy and the Army.

The Army charges that Joe violated a law when he disclosed the partial contents of a restricted document styled "Psychological and Cultural Traits of Soviet Siberia," which the Senator called "the best communist propaganda I've seen in a long time."

The military may be correct in claiming that Joe violated the espionage act when he ignored a printed warning against the publication of this material. But if so the Army was guilty of an abuse of privilege in tagging this document with a restricted label. A lot of those labels border on the ridiculous, including this one.

On the other hand, if Joe considers this treatise "the best communist propaganda" he's seen in a long time, either he isn't a good judge of propaganda or he hasn't been doing much reading of late. Because it isn't propaganda at all. It's simply an attempt to explain Russian psychology, and seems to do a pretty good job of it.

A lot of people might profit by reading it—even if Joe did miss the point. And he might get it if he would read it again.

It's legal now, too, because the "restricted" label has been cancelled.

The Army's Weak Reed

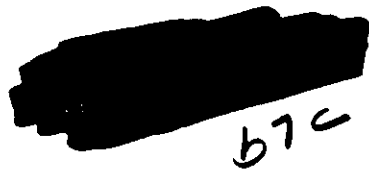

The Army will have to make out a better case if it expects to prove that Senator McCarthy has compromised national security by quoting from an intelligence document on the Soviet Union. If the pamphlet, Psychological and Cultural Traits of Soviet Russia, really had an important bearing on national security, it should have had a higher classification than "restricted."

To say this is not to sympathize with Senator McCarthy's designs. The Senator's charge that the pamphlet in question smacks of "clearcut Communist propaganda" is poppycock. It was intended by the Far Eastern Command as a guide for limited distribution to officers who might have to handle occupation problems in Russia in time of war. Some of the statements seem woolly when quoted out of context, but the document has to be judged by its over-all purpose—to convey an understanding of the feelings and motivations of the Russian people. It also appears that Senator McCarthy carefully refrained from releasing parts of the pamphlet that give it perspective—notably the statement that the average Soviet citizen lives and works almost like a convict.

It is also true that the publicity by Senator McCarthy will give the Russians a propaganda sounding board. Like the compromised diary of General Grow, this will lend itself to misrepresentation as proof of American aggressive designs, if it does not encourage Russian neuroses. In this sense, clearly, Senator McCarthy's new search for headlines at the expense of the Army has been injurious.

But the initial fault still was that of the Army. "Restricted" is the lowest security classification; as a practical matter it is often used merely for convenience, and material of this classification is publicized every day. With the wholesale abuse of "secret" and "confidential" classifications, it will be hard to convince anyone that there is vital material in a document marked only "restricted."

SEN. MCCARTHY VIEWS WITH ALARM

Sen. McCarthy has turned up so much indisputably useful evidence on Communist penetration of the government that we regret to see him pursuing what looks like a wrong trail. The senator has turned from his discoveries of Communist activity in the government printing office to an investigation of the Army, and there has come upon a restricted pamphlet entitled "Psychological and Cultural Traits of Soviet Siberia."

Only 100 copies of this have been printed and 37 have been circulated, chiefly to staff officers and commanding officers in the Far East. The pamphlet was not intended for general use and was not employed in the orientation of men in the ranks. Its stated purpose is to inform officers about the nature of a possible enemy. In pursuance of this purpose it specifically states that it does not seek "to demonstrate the political injustice and economic tyranny of the Bolshevik government but to illuminate the Russian in his existing habitat."

Mr. McCarthy is not satisfied with the approach and evidently thinks that Russia cannot be discussed properly without resort to condemnation. We suppose that a general officer is expected to have sufficient perspective to abhor the Soviet system and that the authors of the pamphlet thought it superfluous to add denunciation of their own when their simple objective was to offer estimates that might guide a commander in conducting possible operations against a people whose nature and outlook are to some degree unknown.

The senator's principal objection is that the pamphlet does not assert that all people under the Soviet tyranny are opposed to it. The booklet says that if they toe the Kremlin line and do as they are told, they can get by fairly well. They are obliged to trade political and intellectual liberty for totalitarian security, the pamphlet makes clear but this individual impression may not weigh as heavily upon their minds as it would on those of Americans, who have long known and cherished freedom.

We cannot agree with the senator's analysis that this is pro-Soviet propaganda which, if believed, would cause Americans to want to move to Russia.

In war, it is well to avoid the mistakes of embracing false assumptions about the enemy. If America and Russia were ever to go to war, it would be an error of the first magnitude to believe that every Russian except the top crust of a couple of million party members was disaffected and would turn on the regime at the first opportunity. If we thought that, we would expect a push-over, and might be greatly disappointed when it failed to materialize.

It is reasonable to assume that some elements of the Soviet population support communism because they are convinced that it is a good thing. Other Russians will certainly stand by their country simply because it is their country and nationalism is a powerful psychological force. Other Russians, again, will be ignorant or apathetic and will stay hitched because it's the easiest thing for them to do. Still other Russians will be cowed by police discipline.

That there is much dissident opinion in Russia, tho largely suppressed and latent, has been established by the reception afforded the advancing German armies in World War II by the Ukrainians and others. Stalin, after the war, wiped five "autonomous" Soviet republics off the map by transporting their populations to forced labor in Siberia because they welcomed the Germans as liberators.

The Germans made a fatal mistake in not accepting these people as allies. Instead, they were brutally treated. If American commanders were ever called upon to lead armies into Russia, it is to be hoped that they would avoid mistakes of equal magnitude. The mistake the Germans made was in rejecting assistance from occupied populations who sincerely wished to make common cause with the invader. The reverse of that mistake would be to expect that every Russian would inevitably flock to the invader's standard.

Col. R. S. Bratton, under whom this Army study was made, is an officer of good reputation who distinguished himself as one of the few men in the War department who acted energetically and with good sense on the eve of Pearl Harbor. He recognized the importance of the intercepted and decoded Japanese secret messages that came into his hands during the 24 hours before the attack and tried to get his superiors to consider them and act upon them. It was not his fault that he failed. We do not believe that this officer, knowingly or unknowingly, would lend himself to propaganda in support of a potentially hostile power.

REDS DICTATED ARMY'S REPORT, SAYS M'CARTHY

Cites Testimony of Red Aid in London

BY WILLARD EDWARDS

(Chicago Tribune Press Service)

Sen. McCarthy (R) of Wisconsin announced Saturday that his investigating subcommittee has received testimony supported by documentary evidence that Russian propagandists dictated the form of American Army indoctrination material on communism.

A witness, identified only as a former veteran employe of standing in the Russian foreign office in London, has testified, McCarthy said, that his Soviet superiors gave detailed instructions on the virtues of communism for incorporation in the material for the education of American troops.

The author of the work on communism was described as a Britisher who accepted orders on how to draft it from skilled Soviet propagandists in the Russian foreign office in London.

The result was a work extolling the benefits of Soviet-style communism, McCarthy said. It was adopted by American military authorities and was in use for instruction of American soldiers as late as December, 1952, perhaps later, McCarthy said.

Witness Called to Probe

The witness, described as highly reliable by McCarthy, will testify at a closed session next week to which Army Secretary Stevens has been invited. The precaution of an executive session was taken, McCarthy said, in order to protect the witness and also to avoid charges by the Army that the subcommittee was disclosing restricted material in violation of the law.

The witness presented copies of directives and correspondence to support his testimony, McCarthy disclosed.

The indoctrination material involved in the new testimony, McCarthy said, is distinct from an Army intelligence study of Soviet Russia and its people which he made public this week with the charge that it was clear-cut Communist propaganda.

The Army replied with a charge that McCarthy had violated the law by releasing the document. It denied that the study was Communist propaganda and noted strong criticism of the Soviet system in the report.

Bratton Signed Report

A preamble to this study had been written by Col. R. S. Bratton, a Far East intelligence expert of high repute, now retired. McCarthy said his investigation had developed that Bratton's name was affixed to the document as a matter of routine and that the real author and supervisor was an officer of general rank.

ENCLOSURE

McCarthy Revealed Secrets, Army Says

By Murrey Marder
Post Reporter

The Army declared yesterday that Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy (R-Wis.) violated security regulations in disclosing a classified intelligence report on Soviet Siberia. Furthermore, the Army said, the full text of the report refutes McCarthy's charge that it is "Communist propaganda." The Senator made the allegation on Wednesday when he released 70 pages of a 75-page report.

The "conclusion" of the study, which McCarthy did not release, especially condemns the Soviet system in the strongest terms as a slave state. The full text shows the report, dated January, 1952, was issued by the Army's Far East Command for intelligence purposes.

The Army said "The Department of the Army emphasizes that declassification of this study intended for the use and education of a limited number of officers and men specializing in the thought patterns of the Soviet citizen is a result of prior disclosure."

McCarthy fired back that the Army is employing the same kind of "whitewash" tactics he has always accused the previous Democratic Administration of using to "cover past mistakes."

Reporters noted when McCarthy made part of the report public—he said it was all of it that he had—that it was prominently marked, "Restricted—Security Information." At the time he said, jokingly, "I declassified it." The Army said it only declassified the document on Thursday, because of the previous disclosure.

The inside cover of the report bears the statement:

"This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the espionage laws, Title 18, U. S. Code, Sections 793 and 794. The transmission or the revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law."

Violation of that law is punishable by up to $10,000 fine and 10 years imprisonment.

McCarthy released the document in his role as chairman of the Senate Investigating Subcommittee. Prosecution of a congressman in such a case would probably be unprecedented. The Army in its statement yesterday made no reference to McCarthy by name.

Army concern over release of the document is very likely due in part to its possible distortion by Russia for propaganda purposes. The report is entitled, "Psychological and Cultural Traits of Soviet Siberia," and states it was issued to create an understanding of the situation to be met "in occupied areas" in event of war.

McCarthy countered: "Neither the Army or any other branch of Government is going to hide dishonesty, corruption or communism by putting a 'secret' label on it."

McCarthy insisted the document is "95 percent Communist propaganda."

He contended the document is only a small part of Communist propaganda put out in recent years to educate our military that communism is really a pretty good system."

The Army said the report itself just shows the opposite. In its statement, the Army said:

"To understand the mind of the Soviet citizen, it is essential to consider the Communist propaganda which plays such an important role in shaping that mind. Any conclusion that propaganda thus encountered reflects the views of the United States Army is refuted by a reading of the entire document and particularly the conclusion of the study, set forth on Pages 74 and 75 . . ."

That conclusion states in part: "The Soviet citizen enjoys neither the liberty nor the civil rights which we cherish and insist upon as a natural endowment of all men. The 'free' worker in the Soviet Union is as much chained to his job and local area as is the convict . . ."

"He has no redress against a harsh authoritarian Government . . . His voting rights are a travesty on the ideals and purposes of democracy . . . He is the helpless prisoner of a slave state . . . such an existence would be intolerable to Americans. American traditions and beliefs militate against every facet of government activity in the USSR. British and American Communist sympathizers who visit the USSR nearly always return in bitter disillusionment. There is no better antidote for radicalism."

McCarthy had contended that anyone reading the report would be inclined to "move to Russia."

McCarthy's attack on the Far East report turned in part on the fact that one of 14 sources listed as a reference was a book by Corliss Lamont, wealthy New Yorker, who has been accused of being a Communist and who has denied the charge.

M'CARTHY USE OF RESTRICTED DATA CHARGED

Senator Sees Attempt To Hide Communism

BY JOSEPH HEARST

The Army Friday charged Sen. McCarthy (R) of Wisconsin disclosed restricted material in violation of the law and the senator countered with the assertion that the Army "cannot hide dishonesty, corruption or communism behind any stamp of secrecy."

The row between McCarthy and the Army revolved around the senator's disclosure to reporters Wednesday of an intelligence report on the "psychological and cultural traits of Soviet Siberia." In showing reporters photostatic copies of the pages of the pamphlet, McCarthy asserted it was "clear cut Communist propaganda."

Friday the Army released the full text of the pamphlet. It said it had been declassified Thursday and then only "as a result of prior disclosure."

The Army, in a strong statement which did not mention McCarthy by name, said that if the senator had shown reporters the full text of the pamphlet it would have been clear that the intelligence study was not Communist propaganda. McCarthy told reporters he did not have the concluding pages of the study when he made it public.

Passage Quoted

The Army said the purpose of the study was clearly set forth in the preamble, which said its purpose was "to develop an understanding of the Soviet people which will be militarily useful in case of war." The concluding pages included this passage:

"The American viewpoint remains valid in all essentials. The Soviet citizen enjoys neither the liberty nor the civil right which we cherish and insist upon as a natural endowment of all men. The 'free' worker in the Soviet Union is as much chained to his job and local area as is the convict. He has no voice in determining his place of work, working conditions or wage.

"His only advantage over the convict is that he can live with his family and can spend his limited income as he sees fit. He has no redress against a harsh totalitarian government. He is forbidden to raise his voice in criticism, to develop independent views or to acquire unbiased information. His voting rights are a travesty on the ideals and purposes of democracy.

Distribution Limited

"He enjoys no acknowledged rights for his person, life or property. He is the helpless prisoner of a slave state. As was noted previously, such an existence would be intolerable to Americans. American traditions and beliefs militate against every facet of government activity in the U.S.S.R.

Communist sympathizers who visit the U.S.S.R. nearly always return in bitter disillusionment. There is no better antidote for radicalism."

The Army said 100 copies of the pamphlet were printed and original distribution was limited to 40 copies. It said 27 copies were sent to sub commands of the Far East command and 13 to the Department of the Army and Pacific commands outside the Far East command. The pamphlet was prepared in Japan. Col. R. S. Bratton, now retired and living in Honolulu, wrote the preamble. He was then deputy intelligence officer to Gen. Ridgeway.

The Army statement said it is obvious that officers and men must understand the thought processes of Russians and that to accomplish this it "is essential to consider the Communist propaganda which plays such an important role in shaping that mind."

McCarthy said the document he made public is "just a small sample of Communist propaganda put out over the past five or 15 years to educate members of our military into thinking communism was a pretty good system."

He also said that "if they are putting out Communist propaganda, they can't keep it from the public by stamping it secret or restricted and calling it an indoctrination course," he said.

McCarthy said that unfortunately the Army is doing today what it did under the Truman administration.

The senator said he thinks there has "been a more healthy attitude" at the Pentagon since President Eisenhower was elected, "but unfortunately some of the political holdovers from the old order down there still think they must whitewash those unusual activities."

Army Asserts McCarthy Handed Out Secret Data

By The United Press

WASHINGTON, Sept. 11.—The Army said today that Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy, R., Wis., showed reporters a military pamphlet on Soviet Siberia while it still carried a "restricted" label and was subject to espionage laws.

The Army also denied Sen. McCarthy's charge that the document, which has now been declassified, was "clear-cut Communist propaganda." It said any such conclusion "is refuted" in a portion of the study that the senator did not make public.

Sen. McCarthy promptly accused the Army of trying to "whitewash and cover past mistakes" of Democratic administrations. He said the document is "95 per cent Communist propaganda," but "whenever they're called to task, they call attention to the part which rightly condemns communism."

He said this was the practice "under the old Truman administration" and "the pattern is the same" although the Pentagon's attitude is "much better since Eisenhower took over."

He said the document in question was "only a small part of the Communist propaganda used over the past five, ten, fifteen years to educate the military in the idea that communism really is a pretty good system."

He accused "political people" in the Pentagon of trying to "cover up past mistakes" and said his Senate Permanent Investigations subcommittee has received "less co-operation from the military than from any other agency."

The Army's carefully worded answer to Sen. McCarthy was issued after day-long discussions Thursday that reached all the way up to Army Secretary Robert T. Stevens.

to see whether the Army should give the Senator names of persons who gave security clearance to two civilian workers accused of being Communists.

The report on Siberia was prepared by the intelligence section of the Far East Command in Jan., 1952. The preamble said its purpose was "to develop an understanding of the the Soviet people which will be militarily useful in case of war."

Sen. McCarthy displayed photostatic copies last Wednesday and told reporters the document "extolled all the virtues of Communism, with an occasional slap on the wrist." He demanded to know who wrote it and who was responsible for its distribution.

Classified as Secret

The Army said the document at the time was still classified "restricted—security information." This classification was removed Thursday because of "prior disclosure," it said.

On the inside cover was a legend in large letters which said: "This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the Espionage Laws Title 18 U. S. Code Section 793 and 794. The transmission or revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law."

Violation of the law calls for a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment and a $10,000 fine. It is considered unlikely, however, that a charge of violating the law would be pressed against a member of Congress under such circumstances.

In challenging Sen. McCarthy's interpretation, the Army called attention to the conclusion at the end of the report which compared life in Russia to that of a convict and said the Russian is "the helpless prisoner of a slave state."

The Army said only 100 copies of the document, entitled "Psychological and Cultural Traits of Soviet Siberia," were printed. It said the purpose of the study was "clearly set forth" in the preamble, which contained the observation:

"Sound military planning requires a complete, factual estimate of popular attitudes and of the people and soldiers on whom the enemy power will base his war effort."

The Army added in its statement: "To understand the mind of the Soviet citizen it is essential to consider the Communist propaganda which plays such an important role in shaping that mind. Any conclusion that propaganda thus encountered reflects the views of the United States Army is refuted by a reading of the entire document and particularly the conclusion of the study."

(SIBERIA)

SEN. JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY ACCUSED THE ARMY OF DISTRIBUTING "CLEARCUT ALL OUT COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA" IN THE FORM OF A STUDY OF RUSSIANS IN SIBERIA.

THE WISCONSIN REPUBLICAN SHOWED A PHOTOSTATIC COPY OF THE DOCUMENT TO REPORTERS AND SAID, "IF YOU READ THIS OVER AND BELIEVED IT, YOU'D MOVE TO RUSSIA." HE DESCRIBED IT AS "CLEARLY A PROPAGANDA SHEET" AND ONE OF THE BEST HE HAD SEEN "IN SOME TIME."

THE RESTRICTED DOCUMENT, ENTITLED "PHYSIOLOGICAL AND CULTURAL TRAITS OF SOVIET SIBERIA," WAS ISSUED IN JANUARY, 1952, BY THE ARMY FAR EAST COMMAND GENERAL STAFF MILITARY INTELLIGENCE SECTION.

ACCORDING TO THE PHOTOSTAT OF THE DISTRIBUTION LIST, 100 COPIES WENT TO 37 TOP COMMANDS.

A PREAMBLE, SIGNED BY COL. R. S. BRATTON, SAID THE PURPOSE OF THE STUDY WAS TO "DEVELOP AN UNDERSTANDING OF THE SOVIET PEOPLE WHICH WILL BE MILITARILY USEFUL IN CASE OF WAR."

MCCARTHY SAID HE WOULD CALL BRATTON BEFORE HIS SENATE PERMANENT INVESTIGATING SUBCOMMITTEE FOR QUESTIONING.

THE PREAMBLE SAID THAT WAR WITH RUSSIA WOULD REQUIRE "REALISTIC INSIGHT" INTO SOVIET ATTITUDES. IT POINTED OUT THAT THE RUSSIAN SOLDIER AND CIVILIAN ARE "FULLY ACCLIMATED TO SOVIET DISCIPLINE AND CONTROL" AND HAVE "NEVER KNOWN FREEDOM OF MOVEMENT, PRESS OR SPEECH." IT ADDED:

"THE PROBLEM HERE IS NOT TO DEMONSTRATE THE POLITICAL INJUSTICE AND ECONOMIC TYRANNY OF THE BOLSHEVIK GOVERNMENT BUT TO ILLUMINATE THE RUSSIAN IN HIS EXISTING HABITAT."

MCCARTHY POINTED OUT THAT A BOOK BY WRITER CORLISS LAMONT, WHO WAS NAMED AS A COMMUNIST BY MRS. HEDE MASSING, WAS LISTED AS ONE OF THE SOURCES FOR THE ARMY DOCUMENTS. LAMONT HAS DENIED MRS. MASSING'S ACCUSATIONS.

MCCARTHY SAID HE HAD NEVER READ THE LAMONT BOOK, "PEOPLES OF THE SOVIET UNION," PUBLISHED IN 1948, BUT THAT HIS STAFF FOUND MUCH OF THE ARMY DOCUMENT--WHICH WAS NOT FOOT-NOTED--WAS QUOTED VERBATIM FROM IT.

HE CHARACTERIZED THE DOCUMENT AS "EXTOLLING ALL THE VIRTUES OF COMMUNISM, WITH AN OCCASIONAL SLAP ON THE WRIST." HE SAID HE WILL TRY TO FIND OUT WHO PREPARED IT AND WHO APPROVED IT.

MCCARTHY READ EXCERPTS FROM THE PAMPHLET TO REPORTERS TO BEAR OUT HIS CLAIM THAT IT WAS "COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA." HE INCLUDED THESE:

"THE COMMUNIST REGIME HAS PROFOUNDLY ALTERED THE STATUS OF ALL ELEMENTS OF THE SOVIET POPULATION. THE 'TOILER' WAS ELEVATED TO THE HIGHEST LEVEL OF RESPECTABILITY...."

"THE ATTITUDE (IN RUSSIA) IS SOMEWHAT SIMILAR TO THAT PREVAILING IN THE U.S. ARMY, WHERE THE OFFICERS EXPECTED TO LIVE UP TO A MUCH HIGHER CODE OF SERVICE, DUTY AND CONDUCT THAN THE SOLDIER...."

"IN SUMMARY, THERE IS A HIGH DEGREE OF SOCIAL MOBILITY IN THE SOVIET UNION, AS COMPARED TO THE MORE STABLE SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN, FRANCE, OR, TO A SMALLER EXTENT, THE UNITED STATES."

Sen. Joe

Will Author Meet Critic?

McCarthy Frets Over Army Book

By United Press

Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy (R., Wis.) today demanded the Army identify the author of a classified military report on Soviet Siberia which he described as "clear-cut communist propaganda."

He said his Senate permanent investigating sub-committee is determined to pin down responsibility for the document, entitled "Psychological and Cultural Traits of Soviet Siberia."

Photostatic copies which Sen. McCarthy displayed to reporters showed the report was issued by the military intelligence section of the Far East command in Tokio in January, 1952. A distribution note on the document said 100 copies were printed and sent to 37 top commands in the Far East.

THE PURPOSE

A preamble signed by Col. R. S. Bratton said the purpose of the intelligence study was to "develop an understanding of the Soviet people which will be militarily useful in case of war." It noted the freedoms which Americans enjoy are repressed in the Soviet Union, but said:

"The problem here is not to demonstrate the political injustice and economic tyranny of the Bolshevik government but to illuminate the Russian in his native habitat."

IVAN'S MORALE

In event of war with Russia the Colonel wrote, "it will be the Allied goal to defeat the Soviet armed forces, to undermine the influence and control of the Soviet government, and to establish effective leadership in occupied areas."

The report, considering the morale factor of the average Russia, stated the position of the Communist Party member in Russian society was "more priest than ruler"; that Siberia was a land of abundant opportunity to the skilled worker, who, while not even understanding the freedom his American counterpart enjoys, was not worried about "losing his job" and who—if a loyal Russian—wasn't bothered by the secret police and felt a certain security in being a cog in a labor camp.

MCCARTHY ALARMED

Sen. McCarthy construed the document as a Red attempt "to indoctrinate our Army" and as extolling "all the virtues of communism with a slap on the wrist now and then for the Soviet government."

The Army didn't comment on Sen. McCarthy's views.

Sen. McCarthy said he has ordered his aides to locate Col. Bratton and call him before the sub-committee for questioning.

The Army said Col. Bratton is now retired and his address was not immediately available.

Sen. McCarthy was particularly concerned that a book by Corliss Lamont, wealthy left-wing writer, was cited as a source for the Army pamphlet. He said he had not read Mr. Lamont's book, "Peoples of the Soviet Union," but that his staff told him much of the Army document was taken verbatim from it.

McCarthy Cleared on One Charge

Contributors to Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy's anti-communist war chest appear to be "perfectly satisfied" with the way he has used their funds, Justice Department sources said today.

They said an eight-month investigation by the department's criminal division has failed to uncover any disgruntled contributors who might be called as "complaining witnesses" before a grand jury.

As a result, lower-echelon Government attorneys in charge of the investigation have tentatively concluded the Wisconsin Republican should be given a clean bill on one of the "questions" about his personal finances which a Senate elections sub-committee raised last January.

Security Law Violation Laid To Senator

Document Contained
Red Propaganda,
Legislator Retorts

The Army today charged Senator McCarthy with disclosing restricted security information in violation of espionage laws, but the Wisconsin Republican fired right back with a blast of his own.

Army spokesmen made their charge against Senator McCarthy in releasing the full text of an intelligence study on the "psychological and cultured traits of Soviet Siberia" made in January, 1952 by the Far East Command. Senator McCarthy yesterday made public portions of the document, calling it "the best Communist propaganda I've seen in a long time."

Inside the cover of the document these words appear:

"This document contains information affecting the national defense of the United States within the meaning of the espionage laws, Title 18, U. S. Code, Sections 793 and 794. The transmission or the revelation of its contents in any manner to an unauthorized person is prohibited by law."

Marked Restricted.

The study was marked "Restricted—Security Information." "Restricted" is the lowest of several secrecy classifications employed by the military services.

The Army said that it was declassifying the document from its restricted status now, but emphasized that this was done only "as a result of prior disclosure."

Senator McCarthy sharply brushed aside the charge that he had violated security in releasing the document. He said his Senate Investigations subcommittee has received "less cooperation from the military in digging out Communists than from any other branch of the Government."

"Neither the Army nor any one else," the Senator added, "can hide dishonesty, corruption and communism behind any stamp of secrecy."

"If we find they are putting out Communist propaganda, they can't keep it secret by stamping it restricted and using it in indoctrination courses."

Army Hits Back.

But the Army, in its strongly-worded statement, hit out at Senator McCarthy's contention that its intelligence study was a piece of Communist propaganda.

The Army said that if the chairman of the Senate Investigations subcommittee had released the full report—particularly its conclusion—instead of only the first 70 pages, the true purpose of the document would have been plain.

"The purpose of this study is clearly set forth in the following extract from its preface: 'To develop an understanding of the Soviet people which will be militarily useful in case of war,'" the Army said.

The parts of the report which offended Senator McCarthy, it was explained, were designed to describe the attitude of the Soviet citizen.

"It is obvious that the necessary instruction of officers and men in this field cannot proceed without attempting to enter the mind and thought processes of the Russian citizen," the Department said. "To understand the mind of the Soviet citizen, it is essential to consider the Communist propaganda role it plays such an important role in that mind portion of the concluding — document, ignored by Senator McCarthy, to which the Army called particular attention, was as follows:

"The American viewpoint of life in the Soviet Union remains valid in all essentials. The Soviet citizen enjoys neither the liberty nor the civil rights which we cherish and insist upon as a natural endowment of all men. The free worker in the Soviet Union is as much chained to his job as a total area as is the convict. He has no voice in determining his place of work, working conditions or wage.

"His only advantage over the convict is that he can live with his family and can spend his limited income as he sees fit. He has no redress against a harsh authoritarian government. He is forbidden to raise his voice in criticism, to develop independent views or to acquire unbiased information. His voting rights are a travesty on the ideals and purposes of democracy. He enjoys no acknowledged rights for his person, life or property. He is the helpless prisoner of a slave state. As was noted previously, such an existence would be intolerable to Americans. American traditions and beliefs militate against every facet of government activity in the U. S. S. R.

"British and American Communist sympathizers who visit the U. S. S. R. nearly always return in bitter disillusionment. There is no better antidote for radicalism."

Senator McCarthy's answer was that the Army document is "95 per cent Communist propaganda" and about 5 per cent "a slap on the wrist" against communism.

"When called to task, the Army cites the small 5 per cent," the Senator said.

He said he had found, unfortunately, the Army today is doing "what they did under the old Truman administration." He said that while there is a better attitude since President Eisenhower took office, "the political carry-overs are still functioning to cover up, protect and whitewash."

Urges Full Scale Probe.

He said he thought there should be a full scale investigation of the matter and said he would place it before his subcommittee for a decision.

As his battle with the Army raged on, Senator McCarthy announced a series of hearings starting Monday in New York to look into employment of American Communists in the United Nations.

He made the announcement after a former Communist Party functionary, John Lautner, 51, now an employe of the Justice Department, testified that the United Nations afforded "a very nice ground" for Communist activity.

Mr. Lautner named one "American Communist" employed by the U. N. as Noel Remes. The subcommittee members said Mr. Remes had not been identified in any previous hearings as being a Communist.

Mr. Lautner said that Mr. Remes, a member of the Polish staff at the U. N., had been a high official of the Communist Party for a number of years and was an assistant editor of the party's publication "Political Affairs."

ADD 3 SIBERIA

THE ARMY SAID THAT "TO UNDERSTAND THE MIND OF THE SOVIET CITIZEN IT IS ESSENTIAL TO CONSIDER THE COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA WHICH PLAYS SUCH AN IMPORTANT ROLE IN SHAPING THAT MIND. ANY CONCLUSION THAT PROPAGANDA THUS ENCOUNTERED REFLECTS THE VIEWS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY IS REFUTED BY A READING OF THE ENTIRE DOCUMENT AND PARTICULARLY THE CONCLUSION OF THE STUDY."

THE ARMY STATEMENT THEN QUOTED FROM THE FIRST PARAGRAPH OF THE DOCUMENT'S CONCLUSION WHICH COMPARED THE SOVIET CITIZEN'S LIFE WITH THAT OF A CONVICT.

THE CONCLUSION ALSO SAID "HE HAS NO VOICE IN DETERMINING HIS PLACE OF WORK, WORKING CONDITIONS OR WAGES...HE HAS NO REDRESS AGAINST A HARSH, AUTHORITARIAN GOVERNMENT...HIS VOTING RIGHTS ARE A TRAVESTY ON THE IDEALS AND PURPOSES OF DEMOCRACY...HE IS THE HELPLESS PRISONER OF A SLAVE STATE."

Did McCarthy Break the Law?

No Violation Seen in Senator's Release to Reporters Of Document Marked 'Restricted' by the Army

Sometimes, in the hurry and pressure under which news is distributed nowadays, there isn't time to look up basic law or constitutional precedents and an entirely erroneous impression is unintentionally created.

Thus, from one end of the country to the other a few days ago went dispatches implying that Senator McCarthy had violated some law when he gave to reporters a document which had been marked "restricted" or "classified information" by the Army. One editorial in an Eastern newspaper went so far as to cry out that the Wisconsin Senator had "ignored the law, that he was not "above the law," and so on.

Actually, if the Senator violated any law by publishing the document which the Army had distributed to 100 officers so that they might study the meaning of Communist philosophy, so did the newspapers and press associations which printed what he gave them.

The truth is no law was violated in either case. For there is no statute which forbids disclosure or publication of a Government document just because somebody in the Army or the Navy or the Air Force happens to mark it as "classified." A thousand executive orders may be issued by a President ordering Government personnel to keep things secret, and Government employes can be punished for violating them, but this cannot affect any citizen outside the Government who is the recipient of the information.

It so happens that in this case the Army officers were told to study certain phases of communism as an orientation course, and most of the material was taken from published books. The Army could have also taken a translation of the Koran, the Mohammedan bible, distributed copies of it and marked it "classified." No such arbitrary marking of information, however, can in any way restrain a newspaper or periodical from publishing the contents of such documents as are labeled "classified" if they can get hold of them.

The existing law says a crime is committed if any one in the Government "knowingly and wilfully communicates, furnishes, transmits, or otherwise makes available to an unauthorized person, or publishes" any "classified information" about the code or cipher system of the United States.

When the foregoing law was up for passage, members of the press pointed out the dangers of a peacetime censorship law and succeeded in narrowing the language to code communication.

It may be questioned whether a peacetime censorship law would be held constitutional. It is interesting also to note that, even in the case of "classified information" relating to codes, there is a paragraph which says that "nothing in this section shall prohibit the furnishing upon lawful demand, or information to any regularly constituted committee of the Senate or the House of Representatives of the United States of America, or joint committee thereof."

Perhaps the most significant case that got to the courts occurred when Hugo Black, then a Democratic Senator from Alabama, conducted his famous committee investigation in 1935 on the subject of lobbying. Private messages between an editor and his associates were unlawfully seized from a telegraph office and disclosed by the Federal Communications Commission to an investigator for the committee. But the United States Circuit Court of Appeals held—and the case was never reversed by the Supreme Court—that, even though the information was obtained improperly, the data could be used by the committee. The court said that "the universal rule, so far as we know it, is that the legislative discretion in the discharge of its constitutional functions, whether rightfully or wrongfully exercised, is not a subject for judicial interference."

Senator Black evidently didn't suffer for his action because, two years later, he was elevated to the Supreme Court. Now this correspondent isn't advocating that Senator McCarthy be given a place on the Federal bench, as was once facetiously mentioned in these dispatches, but merely points out that the Wisconsin Senator may look upon the 1935 precedent as his justification in parallel circumstances for using whatever information he gathers.

Release of Army Document By McCarthy Held Lawful

By DAVID LAWRENCE

WASHINGTON, Sept. 14.—Sometimes, in the hurry and pressure under which news is distributed nowadays, there isn't time to look up basic law or constitutional precedents, and an entirely erroneous impression is unintentionally created.

Thus, from one end of the country to the other a few days ago went dispatches implying that Senator McCarthy, of Wisconsin, Republican, had violated some law when he gave to reporters a document which had been marked "restricted" or "classified information" by the Army. Actually, if the Wisconsin Senator violated any law by publishing the document which the Army had distributed to 100 officers so that they might study the meaning of Communist philosophy, so did the newspapers and press associations which printed what he gave them.

Private Citizens Apart

The truth is no law was violated in either case. For there is no statute which forbids disclosure or publication of a government document just because somebody in the Army or the Navy or the Air Force happens to mark it as "classified." A thousand executive orders may be issued by a President ordering government personnel to keep things secret, and government employees can be punished for violating them, but this cannot affect any citizen outside the government who is the recipient of the information.

It so happens that in this case the Army officers were told to study certain phases of communism as an orientation course, and most of the material was taken from published books. No such arbitrary marking of information, however, can in any way restrain a newspaper or periodical from publishing the contents of such documents as are labeled "classified" if they can get hold of them.

The existing law says a crime is committed if any one in the government "knowingly and willfully communicates, furnishes, transmits, or otherwise makes available to an unauthorized person, or publishes" any "classified information" about the code or cipher system of the United States.

When the foregoing law was up for passage, members of the press pointed out the dangers of a peace-time censorship law and succeeded in narrowing the language to code communication.

Black Inquiry Cited

Perhaps the most significant case that got to the courts occurred when Hugo Black, then a Democratic Senator from Alabama, conducted his famous committee investigation in 1935 on the subject of "lobbying." Private messages between an editor and his associates were unlawfully seized from a telegraph office and disclosed by the Federal Communications Commission to an investigator for the committee. The court said that "the universal rule, so far as we know it, is that the legislative discretion in the discharge of its constitutional functions, whether rightfully or wrongfully exercised, is not a subject for judicial interference."

McCarthy Convinced Reds Infiltrate All Federal Departments

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK, Sept. 16—Senator McCarthy, Republican, of Wisconsin conferred three hours today with Secretary of the Army Stevens and said afterward he is convinced there is a "complete tie-in in Communist infiltration in Government departments."

Senator McCarthy is chairman of the Senate Permanent Investigations subcommittee holding closed hearings in New York on possible Communist influences in the armed services and on communism among Americans employed by the United Nations.

Senator McCarthy told newsmen he was sure that Mr. Stevens "is just as eager to clear out any subversive influences in the Army as we are, and I am firmly convinced he will be fully co-operative and wants to clean out of the department any improper individuals."

Senator McCarthy said Mr. Stevens had ordered the suspension of Mrs. Doris Walters Powell, an Army quartermaster employe here, because of alleged Communist affiliations.

Example of Sincerity.

"This woman's suspension is a strong indication of the fact that the Secretary of the Army was sincere in saying that he would co-operate to the fullest extent to get rid of Communist employes in the Army," Senator McCarthy said.

A member of the Senator's staff learned of the suspension through a telephone conversation with Mrs. Powell this morning. He quoted her as saying she had been suspended last week.

Senator McCarthy said Mrs. Powell told the subcommittee previously that she once held a Communist party card but did not consider herself a Communist.

When the subcommittee conducted hearings here several weeks ago it attempted unsuccessfully to obtain names of persons who cleared alleged Communists for Army civilian jobs.

Chat for Three Hours.

The Senator said that in a three-hour breakfast session with Mr. Stevens at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel he gave the Secretary a complete report on "what we are working on in his department" and that a liaison system between the two had been established.

"I still feel strongly that we should get the names of persons who gave loyalty clearances to Communists employed in the Army, as it is more important to get those who cleared Communists than to get a Communist himself," Senator McCarthy said.

"I am convinced that there is a complete tie-in in Communist infiltration in every Government department. It is all part of the conspiracy. While at times it can't be seen on the surface, there is always that inescapable tie-in."

Senator McCarthy said earlier he was seeking aid from Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr., to get the United Nations to oust an official who, Senator McCarthy says, has aided Communism.

The Senator conferred with Mr. Lodge at a luncheon yesterday.

Handwritten: All of [unclear] of [unclear]
 [unclear] of Senator Joseph McCarthy

(MCCARTHY)

A FORMER RUSSIAN FOREIGN OFFICER WHO DESERTED THE SOVIET IN WORLD WAR II SAID TODAY A U.S. ARMY INTELLIGENCE DOCUMENT GAVE A FALSE AND "DANGEROUSLY" ROSY PICTURE OF LIFE IN RUSSIA.

THE RUSSIAN REFUGEE, IGOR BOGELEPOV, TOLD THE SENATE INVESTIGATING SUBCOMMITTEE THAT "THE WORD 'UNTRUE' IS TOO MILD" TO DESCRIBE THE INFORMATION IN AN ARMY DOCUMENT ON THE CULTURE AND PSYCHOLOGY OF RUSSIANS IN SIBERIA.

THE DOCUMENT WAS THE SAME ONE COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN JOSEPH R. MCCARTHY (R-WIS.) MADE PUBLIC EARLIER THIS MONTH. IT WAS CLASSIFIED AS "RESTRICTED" AND ARMY SPOKESMEN SAID MCCARTHY VIOLATED LAW BY DIVULGING THE MATERIAL.

THE ARMY SPOKESMEN DENIED IT WAS RED PROPAGANDA.

BOGELEPOV AGREED WITH MCCARTHY THAT MUCH OF THE DOCUMENT WAS "PRACTICALLY WORD FOR WORD" TAKEN FROM THE "SOVIET BIBLE"--THE LATE JOSEF STALIN'S BOOK ON "THE PROBLEMS OF LENIN."

ADD 1 MCCARTHY (12N)

BOGELEROV SAID THAT THE AUTHORS OF THE INTELLIGENCE DOCUMENT HAD FALLEN FOR COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA.

COBLISS LAMONT, LEFT-WING NEW YORK AUTHOR, WAS LISTED AS THE SOURCE
 FOR SOME OF THE MATERIAL. AFTER A PRIVATE SESSION WITH LAMONT LAST WEEK
 MCCARTHY SAID HE WOULD ASK THE FULL SUBCOMMITTEE TO CITE HIM FOR CONTEMPT FOR REFUSING TO ANSWER HIS QUESTIONS. LAMONT DENIED HE WAS A COMMUNIST BUT CHALLENGED THE SUBCOMMITTEE'S RIGHT TO QUESTION HIM.

A GROUP OF ARMY OFFICERS--HEADED BY MAJ. GEN. RICHARD PARTRIDGE, ASSISTANT CHIEF OF STAFF FOR INTELLIGENCE--ATTENDED THE HEARING.

WHEN MCCARTHY FIRST MADE PUBLIC THE SIBERIA DOCUMENT HE DENOUNCED IT
 AS "95 PERCENT COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA."

MCCARTHY SAT TODAY AS A ONE-MAN SUBCOMMITTEE. HE SAID HE HAD INVITED
 LAMONT TO APPEAR AND "PURGE" HIMSELF OF CONTEMPT BY TESTIFYING.

LAMONT WAS NOT PRESENT. AFTER A PAUSE, MCCARTHY SAID JUSTICE DEPARTMENT ATTORNEYS ARE "IN COMPLETE AGREEMENT" THAT THE WEALTHY NEW YORKER SHOULD BE CITED.

ADD 2 MCCARTHY

AT ONE POINT, MCCARTHY STARTLED NEWSMEN BY SPEAKING TO BOGELEPOV IN RUSSIAN. HE SPOKE ONE PHRASE TO BOGELEPOV, SMILED AND TOLD THE PRESS NOT TO BOTHER TO "TRY TO TAKE THAT DOWN."

"I JUST ASKED HIM TO SPEAK A LITTLE MORE CLEARLY," MCCARTHY SAID.

"IN ANSWER TO A QUESTION, BOGELEPOV SAID HE HAD ONCE SEEN AN "ERNEST J. SIMMONS" IN THE RUSSIAN FOREIGN OFFICE IN MOSCOW.

MCCARTHY DESCRIBED SIMMONS AS EDITOR OF ANOTHER ARMY TRAINING DOCUMENT, "THE USSR--A CONCISE HANDBOOK," AND ASKED THE RUSSIAN IF SIMMONS "WAS GETTING INSTRUCTIONS THROUGH THE (RUSSIAN) FOREIGN OFFICE" ON PREPARATION OF THE MATERIAL.

"IN A WAY, THEY WERE INSTRUCTIONS," BOGELEPOV REPLIED, BUT HE SAID THE RUSSIANS WERE "CLEVER ENOUGH" TO DISGUISE THEIR PROPAGANDA.
