

Miss Yeathir Yourisag

THE LIBRARY OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LOS ANGELES

GIFT OF

FREDERIC THOMAS BLANCHARD

D 57 R65hE 1789

CONTENTS. ROSHE

BOOK NINTH.

THE HISTORY OF THE PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.

Continued during the

FIRST FIFTEEN YEARS OF THE REIGN OF ARTAXEREES MNEMON.

P	age
CHAP. I. Domestic Troubles of the Court of Persia,	I Sect. I. Coronation of Artaxerxes Mnemon. Cyrus attempts to affaffinate his Brother. Revenge of Statira.
Death and Character of Alcibiades,	ib.
Sect. II. The Thirty exercise the most horrid Cruelties at Athens. They put Theramenes to Death. Thrafybu-lus attacks the Tyrants, is Master of Athens, and re-flores its Liberty,	9
Sect. III. Lyfander abuses his Power in an extraordinary Manner. He is recalled to Sparta,	16
Chap. II. Young Cyrus, with the aid of the Grecian Troops, endeavours to dethrone his Brother Artaxerxes.
He is killed. Famous Retreat of the Ten Thousand,	19
Sect. I. Cyrus raifes Troops against his Brother Artaxerxes,	21
Sect. II. The Battle of Cunaxa. Cyrus is killed,	27
Sect. III. Eulogy of Cyrus,	35
Sect. IV. The King is for compelling the Greeks to deliver up their Arms,	38
Sect. V. Retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks from the Province of Babylon to Trefibond,	46
Sect. VI. The Greeks arrive upon the Sea Coast opposite to Byzantium. Xenophon joins Thimbron,	54
Sect. VII. Confequences of Cyrus's Death. Paryfatis's	Get.
Cruelty. Statita poisoned,	61
Chap. III. The famous Peace of Antakides prefcribed the	1
Greeks by Artaxerxes Maemon,	64
aij	-

OF THE PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.

Page

183

Sect. I. Grecian Cities of Ionia implore Aid of Lacedae-	0
mon. Agefilaus elected King. His character,
The same of the sa	64
Sect. II. Agefilaus goes to Afia. Lyfander falls out with him,	74
Sect. III. Expedition of Agefilaus in Asia,	81
Sect. IV. Agefilaus recalled by the Ephori to defend his Country,	88
Sect. V. Agesilaus returns victorious to Sparta. A Peace, fhameful to the Greeks, concluded,	99
Sect. VI. War of Artaxerxes against Evagoras,	106
Sect. VII. The Expedition of Artaxerxes against the Cadufians. History of Datames the Carian,	118
Chap. IV. History of Socrates abridged,	126
Sect. I. Birth and Education of Socrates,	127
Sect. II. Of the Daemon, or Familiar Spirit of Socrates,	133
Sect. III. Socrates declared the Wifest of Mankind by the	-33
Oracle,	706
	136
Sect. IV. Socrates devotes himself entirely to the instruction of the Youth of Athens	137
Sect. V. Socrates applies himself to discredit the Sophists	NO ALC
in the Opinion of the young Athenians,	146 Sect. VI. Socrates is accused of holding bad Opinions in regard to the Gods. He is condemned to die,	149
Sect. VII. Socrates refuses to escape out of Prison. He drinks the Poison,	163
Sect. VIII. Reflections upon Socrates and the Sentence passed upon him by the Athenians,	175
BOOK TENTH.
BOOK TEIVIL
THE HISTORY OF THE PERSIANS AND GRECIANS, Containing the
MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE GREEKS
MANNERS AND COSTOMS OF THE GREEKS

CHAP. I. Of Political Government,

Part I. Of the Government of Sparta,

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE GREEKS.	Page
Sect. I. Idea of the Spartan Government,	184
Sect. II. Love of Poverty instituted at Sparta,	188
Sect III. Laws established by Minos in Crete,	192
Art. II. Of the Government of Athens,	201
Sect. I. Foundation of the Government of Athens,	202
Sect. II. Of the Inhabitants of Athens,	205
Sect. III. Of the Council or Senate of Five Hundred,	208
Sect. IV. Of the Areopagus,	211
Sect. V. Of the Magistrates,	213
Sect. VI. Of the Assemblies of the People,	214
Sect. VII. Of Trials,	216
Sect. VIII. Of the Amphictyons,	218
Sect. IX. Of the Revenues of Athens,	22I
Sect. X. Of the Education of the Youth,	222
Chap. II. Of War,	229
Sect. I. People of Greece in all Times very Warlike,	ib.
Sect. II. Origin and Cause of the Valour and Military
Virtue of the Lacedaemonians and Athenians,	230
Sect. III. Of the different kind of Troops which composed the Armies of the Lacedaemonians and Athenians,	234
Sect. IV. Of Maritime Affairs, Fleets, and Naval Forces,	238
Sect. V. Peculiar Character of the Athenians,	244
Sect. VI. Common Character of the Lacedaemonians and
Athenians,	249
BOOK ELEVENTH.
THE HISTORY OF DIONYSIUS ELDER AND YOUNGER, TYRA	NTS OF SYRACUSE.
CHAP. I. The Hiftory of Dionysius the Elder,	255
Sect. I. Means made use of by Dionysius the Elder to pos-fefs himfelf of the Tyranny,	ib.
Sect. II. Commotions in Sicily and at Syracufe against	100
Dionysius. He finds Means to dispel them,	264
Sect. III. Dionyfius declares War against the Carthagi-	AFRET .
nians. Various fuccess of it,	275

OF DIONYSIUS ELDER AND YOUNGER.	age
Sect. IV. Violent Passion of Dionysius for Poefy. His Death and bad Qualities,	287
Chap. II. The History of Dionysius the Younger,	300
Sect. I. Dionyfius the Younger fucceeds his Father. He	BUS.
invites Plato to his Court,	ib.
Sect. II. Banishment of Dion,	310
Sect. III. Dion fets out to deliver Syracufe. His Death,	316
Sect. IV. Character of Dion,	340
Sect. V. Dionysius the Younger reascends the Throne,	342
Sect. VI. Timoleon restores Liberty to Syracuse, and in-ftitutes wife Laws. His Death,	352
BOOK TWELFTH.
THE HISTORY OF THE PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.
CHAP. I. The History of Epaminondas and Pelopidas, two illustrious Theban Generals,	362
Sect. I. State of Greece from the Treaty of Antalcides,	ib.
Sect. II. Sparta's Prosperity. Character of two illustrious Thebans, Epaminondas and Pelopidas,	367
Sect. III. Sphodrias forms a Defign against the Piraeus,	378
Sect. IV. New troubles in Greece. The Lacedaemonians declare War against Thebes,	385
Sect. V. The two Theban Generals, at their Return, are accused and absolved. Sparta implores Aid of Athens,	396
Sect. VI. Pelopidas marches against Alexander Tyrant of	200
Pherae. Is killed in a Battle. Tragical End of Alexander,	402
Sect. VII. Epaminondas chosen General of the Thebans.
His Death and Character,	413
Sect. VIII. Death of Evagoras king of Salamin. Charac-	5.0
ter of that Prince,	426
Sect. IX. Artaxerxes Mnemon undertakes the Reduction of Egypt,	428
Sect. X. The Lacedaemonians fend Agefilaus to the Aid	200
of Tachos. His Death	423

Sect XI. Troubles at the Court of Artaxerxes concerning his Successor. Death of that Prince,

438

Sect. XII. Causes of the frequent insurrections and Revolts in the Persian Empire,	440
TOOL HELD MANUATES BOOK THIRTEENTH.
THE HISTORY OF THE PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.
THE HISTORY OF THE PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.
SECT. I. Ochus afcends the throne of Persia. His Cruelties. Revolt of feveral nations,	444
Sect. II. War of the Allies against the Athenians,	446
Sect. III. Demosthenes excites the Athenians for War.
Death of Mausolus. Grief of Artemisa his Wife,	453
Sect. IV. Expedition of Ochus against Phoenicia, Cyprus, and Egypt,	460
Sect. V. Death of Ochus. Arfes succeeds him,	468
Sect. VI. Abridgement of the Life of Demosthenes,	471
Sect. VII. Digression on the manner of fitting out Fleets	Ties-
by the Athenians,	478

THE RESERVE OF THE PARTY OF THE Little to Karagas and A mark the property was millered than the court of the primer with the design and the second of the the state of the s MESAGE ADVICE WATER AND ADDRESS. IN INCHES AND AND ASSESSMENT OF THE PARTY OF

BOOK NINTH.

THE

HISTORY

OFTHE

PERSIANS AND GRECIANS,

Continued during the

FIRST FIFTEEN YEARS OF THE REIGN OF ARTAXERXES MNEMON.

CHAPTER I.

This chapter contains the domeflic troubles of the court of Persia: The death of Alcibiades: The re-establishment of the liberty of Athens: And Lysander's secret designs to make himself king.

SECTION I.

CORONATION of ARTAXERXES MNEMON. CYRUS attempts to affaffinate bis BROTHER. REVENGE of STATIRA. DEATH, and CHARACTER of ALCIBIADES.

Arsaces, upon afcending the throne, affumed the name of Artaxerxes, the fame to whom the Greeks gave the furname of * Mnemon, from his prodigious memory. a Being near his father's bed when he was dying, he asked him, a few moments before he expired, what had been the rule of his conduct during so long and happy a reign as his, that he might make it his example. "It has been," replied he, "to do "always what justice and religion required of me:" Words of deep sense, and well worthy of being fet up in letters of gold in the palaces of kings, to keep them perpetually in mind of what ought to be the guide and rule of all their actions. It is not uncommon for princes to give excellent inftructions to their children on their deathbeds, which would be more efficacious if preceded by their own example and conduct; without which they are as weak and impotent as the fick man who gives them, and feldom furvive him long.

Volume IV.

A. M. 3600. Ant. J. C. 404. Athen. l. xii. p. 458.
Which word fignifies in the Greek, one of a good memory.

b Soon after Darius's death, the new king fet out from his capital for the city of * Pasargades, in order to his coronation, according to custom, by the priests of Persia. There was in that city a temple of the goddess who presided in war, in which the coronation was folemnized. It was attended with very fingular ceremonies, which no doubt had fome mysterious sense; though Plutarch does not explain it. The prince at his confecration took off his robe in the temple, and put on that worn by the ancient Cyrus, before he came to the throne, which was preserved in that place with great veneration. After that he eat a dry fig, chewed fome leaves of the turpentine tree, and drank a draught composed of milk and vinegar. This might fignify, that the fweets of fovereign power are mingled with the fours of care and disquiet; and that, if the throne be furrounded with pleasures and honours, it is also attended with pains and anxieties. It feems fufficiently evident, that the defign in putting the robes of Cyrus upon the new king, was to make him understand, that he should also clothe his mind with the great qualities and exalted virtues of that prince.

Young Cyrus, whose soul was all ambition, was in despair upon being for ever prevented from ascending a throne his mother had given him, and on seeing the scepter which he thought his right, transferred into the hands of his brother. The blackest crimes cost the ambitious nothing. Cyrus resolved to assaurate Artaxerxes in the temple itself, and in the presence of the whole court, just when he took off his own, to put on the robe of Cyrus. Artaxerxes was apprised of this design by the priest himself, who had educated his brother, to whom he had imparted it. Cyrus was seized, and condemned to die, when his mother Parysatis, almost out of her senses; flew to the place, clasped him in her arms, tied herfelf to him with the treffes of her hair, fastened her neck to his, and by her shrieks, and tears, and prayers, prevailed so far as to obtain his pardon, and that he should be fent back to his government of the maritime provinces. He carried thither with him an ambition no less ardent than before, was animated besides with refentment of the check he had received, and the warm defire of revenge, and armed with an almost unbounded power, Artaxerxes upon this occasion acted contrary to the most common rules of policy, which do not admit * the nourishing and inflaming, by extraordinary honours, the pride and haughtiness of a bold and enterprising young prince like Cyrus, who had carried his perfonal enmity to his brother fo far as to have refolved to affaffinate him with his own hand, and whose ambition for empire was fo great as to employ the most criminal methods for the attainment of its end.

b Plut. Artax. p. 1012.

* A city of Persia built by Cyrus the Great.

c Artaxerxes had espoused Statira. Scarce had her husband ascended the throne, when she employed the power her beauty gave her over him, to avenge the death of her brother Teriteuchmes. History has not a more tragical scene, nor a more monstrous complication of adultery, incest, and murder; which, after having occasioned great disorders in the royal family, terminated at length in the most fatal manner to all who had any share in it. But it is necessary, for the reader's knowledge of the fact, to trace it from the beginning.

Hidarnes, Statira's father, a Persian of very great quality, was governor of one of the principal provinces of the empire. Statira was a lady of extraordinary beauty, which induced Artaxerxes to marry her, who was then called Arsaces. At the same time Teriteuchmes, Statira's brother, married Hamestris, Arsaces's sister, one of the daughters of Darins and Parysatis; in savour of which marriage Teriteuchmes, upon his sather's death, had his government given him. There was at the same time another sister in this samily, no less beautiful than Statira, c Ctef. c. li. lv.

Aij

* Ne quis mobiles adolescentium animos praematuris honoribus ad superbiam extelleret. Tacit, Annal. l. iv. c. 17.

and who befides excelled in the arts of shooting with the bow, and throwing the dart. Teriteuchmes her brother conceived a criminal passion for her, and to gratify it, resolved to set himself at liberty by killing Hamestris, whom he had espoused. Darius, having been informed of this project, by the force of presents and promises engaged Udiastes, Teriteuchemes's intimate friend and consident, to prevent so black a design, by assassing him. He obeyed, and had for his reward the government of him be had put to death with his own hands.

Amongst Teriteuchmes's guards was a fon of Udiastes, called Mithridates, very much attached to his mafter. The young gentleman, upon hearing that his father had committed this murder in person, uttered all manner of imprecations against him; and full of horror for fo infamous and vile an action. feized on the city af Zaris, and openly revolting, declared for the establishment of Teriteuchmes's fon. But that young man could not hold out long against Darius. He was blocked up in the place with the fon of Teriteuchmes, whom he had with him; and all the rest of the family of Hidarnes were put in prison, and delivered to Parysatis, to do with them as that mother, exaspirated to the last excess by the treatment either done or intended against her daughter Hamestris, should think fit. That cruel princess began by causing Roxana, whose beauty had been the occasion of this evil, to be fawed in two, and ordered all the rest to be put to death, except Statira, whose life she granted to the tears and the most tender and ardent folicitations of Arfaces, whose love for his wife made him share no pains for her preservation, though Darius, his father, believed it necessary, even for his own good, that she should share the same fate with the rest of her family. Such was the flate of the affair at the death of Darius.

Statira, as foon as her husband was upon the throne, caused Udiastes to be delivered into her hands. She ordered his tongue to be torn out, and made him die in the most exqusite torments she could invent, to punish the crime which had occasioned the ruin of her family. She gave his government to Mithridates, in recompence for his attachment to the interests of her family. Parysatis on her side took her revenge on the fon of Teriteuchmes, whom she caused to be poisoned; and we shall see that Statira's turn was not very remote.

We see here the terrible effects of semale revenge, and in general of what excesses they are capable, who find themselves above all laws, and have no other rule for their actions than their will and passions.

Cyrus, having refolved to dethrone his bother, employed Clearchus the Lacedaemonian general to raise a body of Grecian troops, under pretence of war, which that Spartan was to carry into Thrace. I shall defer speaking of this samous expedition, and also of the death of Socrates, which happened about the same time; intending to treat those two great events in all the extent they deserve. It was without doubt with the same view, that Cyrus presented Lysander a galley of two cubits in length, made of ivory and gold, to congratulate him upon his naval victory. That galley was conscrated to Apollo in the temple of Delphos. Lysander went soon after to Sardis, charged with magnificent presents for Cyrus from the allies.

It was upon that occasion Cyrus had the celebrated converfation with Lyfander related by Xenophon, and which Cicero after him has applied so beautifully. That young * prince, who piqued himself more upon his integrity and politeness than nobility and grandeur, pleased himself with conducting in person so illustrious a guest through his gardens, and to make him observe the various beauties of them. Lysander, struck with so fine a prospect, admired the manner in which the several parts were laid out; the height and projection of the trees; the neatness and disposition of the walks; the abundance of fruits, planted with an art which had known how to unite the useful with the agreeable; the beauty of the parterres, and the glowing variety of flowers, exhaling odours univerfally throughout the delightful fcene. " Every thing " charms and transports me in this place," said Lysander, addreffing himfelf to Cyrus; "but what strikes me most, is the " exquifite tafte and elegant industry of the person who drew " the plan of the feveral parts of this garden, and gave it the " fine order, wonderful disposition, and happiness of symme-" try, which I cannot fusiciently admire." Cyrus, infinitely pleased with this discourse, replied, " It was I that drew the " plan, and entirely marked it out: and not only that; many " of the trees which you fee were planted with my own " hands." " What," replied Lyfander, confidering him from head to foot, " is it possible, with these purple robes and splen-" did vestments, those strings of jewels and bracelets of gold, " those buskins so richly embroidered, that you could play the " gardener, and employ your royal hands in planting trees!" " Does that fuprife you," faid Cyrus? " I fwear by the god " * Mithras, that when my health admits, I never fit down " to table without having made myself sweat with some fa-" tigue or other, either in military exercise, rural labour, or " fome other toilfome employment, to which I apply with " pleasure, and without sparing myself." Lysander was amazed at his discourse, and pressing him by the hand; " Cy-" rus," faid he, " you are truly happy, and deferve your " high fortune; because you unite it with virtue."

Aij

* Narrat Socrates in eo libro, Cyrum minorem, regem Perfarum, praeftantem ingenio atque imperii gloria, cum Lyfander Lacedaemonius, vir fummae virtutis, veniffet ad eum Sardes, cique dona a fociis attulifet, et e ceteris in rebus comem erga Lyfandrum atque humanum fuiffe, et ei quemdam confeptum agrum diligenter confitum oftendiffe. Cum autem admiraretur Lyfander et proceritates arborum, et directos in quincuncem ordines, et humum fubaclam atque puram, et fuavitatem odorum qui efflarentur è floribus; tum cum diciffe mirari fe non modo diligentium, fed etiam folertiam ejus, a quo effent illa dimenfa atque deferipta. Et ei Cyrum respondifie: Atqui ego ilfa sum dimensus mei sunt ordines, mea deferiptio, multae etiam istarum arborum mea manu sunt sata. Tum Lyfandrum, intuentem ejus purpuram et nitorem corporis, ornatunque Persicum multo auro multisque gemmis, dixisse: Recic vero, te, Cyre, beatum ferunt, quoniam viruus toue sortuma conjuncta est. Cic de Senect. n. 59.

Alcibiades was at no small pains to discover the mystery of the levies made by Cyrus, and went into the province of Pharnabasus, with design to proceed to the court of Persia, and to apprise Artaxerxes of the scheme laid against him. Had he arrived there, a discovery of such importance had infallibly procured him the favour of that prince, and the assistance he wanted for the re-establishment of his country. But the Lacedaemonian partifans at Athens, that is to fay, the thirty tyrants, apprehended the intrigues of fo fuperior a genius as his, and represented to their masters, that they were inevitably ruined, if they did not find means to rid themselves of Alcibiades. The Lacedaemonians thereupon wrote to Pharnabafus, and with an abject meanness not to be excused, and which shewed how much Sparta had degenerated from her ancient manners, made pressing instances to him to deliver them at any rate from fo formidable an enemy. The fatrap complied to their wish. Alcibiades was then in a small town of Phrygia, where he lived with his concubine * Timandra. Those who were fent to kill him, not daring to enter his house, contented themfelves with furrounding and fetting it on fire. Alcibiades having quitted it through the flames fword in hand, the Barbarians , were afraid to flay to come to blows with him, but flying and retreating as he advanced, they poured their darts and arrows upon him, and he fell dead upon the fpot. Timandra took up his body, and having adorned and covered it with the finest robes she had, she made as magnificent a funeral for it as her present condition would admit.

* The Persans adored the sun under that name, who was their principal god.
† Διακίως, το Κύρι, Ιωδαιμονίς τόγαθες γιας τον Ιωδαιμονικ. Which Cicero translates: Reste vero te, Cyre, beatum serunt, queniam virtuti tuae fortuna conjusta est.

Such was the end of Alcibiades, whose great virtues were stifled and suppressed by still greater vices. † It is not easy to say, whether his good or bad qualities were most pernicious to his country; for with one he deceived, and with the other he oppressed it. In him distinguished valour was united with nobility of blood. His person was beautiful and finely made; he was eloquent, of great ability in affairs, infinuating, and formed for charming all mankind. He loved glory; but without prejudice to his inclination for pleasure; nor was he so fond of pleasure as to neglect his glory for it. He knew how to give into, or abstract himself from it, according to the situation of his affairs. Never was there ductility of genius equal to his. He metamorphosed himself with incredible facility, like a Proteus, into the most contrary forms, and supported them all with as much ease and grace as if each had been natural to him.

Aiiij

* It was faid that Lais the famous courtezan, called the Corinthian, was the daughter of this Timandra.

† Cujus nescio utrum bona an vitia patriae permiciosiora suerint; illis enim civis suos decepit, bis afflixit. Val. Mat. liii. c. t.

This convertibility of character, according to occasions, the customs of countries, and his own interests, discover an heart void of principles, without either truth or justice. He did not confine himself either to religion, virtue, laws, duties or his country. His sole rule of action was his private ambibition, to which he reduced every thing. His aim was to please, to dazzle, and be beloved, but at the same time to subject those he soothed. He savoured them only as they served his purposes; and made his correspondence and society a means for ingrossing every thing to himself.

His life was a perpetual mixture of good and evil. His fallies for virtue were ill-fustained, and quickly degenerated into vices and crimes, very little to the honour of the instructions of that great philosopher, who took no fmall pains to cultivate him into a man of worth. His actions were glorious; but without rule or principle. His character was elevated and grand; but without connection and confistence. He was successively the support and terror of the Lacedaemonians and Persians. He was either the misfortune or refuge of his own country, according to his declaring for or against it. In fine, he was the author of an universal destructive war in Greece, from the fole motive of commanding, by inducing the Athenians to befiege Syracuse, much less from the hope of conquering Sicily. and afterwards Africa, than with the defign of keeping Athens in dependence upon himfelf; convinced, that having to deal with an inconstant, suspicious, ungrateful, jealous people, averse to those that governed, it was necessary to engage them continually in fome great affair, in order to make his fervices always necessary to them, and that they might not be at leifure to examine, cenfure, and condemn his conduct.

He had the fate generally experienced by perfons of his character, and of which they cannot reafonably complain. He never loved any one, himself being his sole motive; nor ever found a friend. He made it his merit and glory to amuse all men; and no body confided in, or adhered to him. His fole view was to live with fplendor, and to lord it univerfally; and he perished miserably, abandoned by the whole world, and obliged at his death to the feeble services and impotent zeal of one only woman for the last honours rendered in his remains.

About this time died Democritus the philosopher, of whom more will be said elsewhere.

SECTION II.

The THIRTY exercife the horrid CRUELTIES at ATHENS, They put THERAMENES to DEATH.

THRASTBULUS attacks the TYRANTS, is MASTER of ATHENS, and restores its LIBERTY.

The council of thirty d, established at Athens by Lysander, committed the most execrable cruelties. Upon pretence of restraining the multitude within their duty, and to prevent seditions, they had caused guards to be assigned them, had armed three thousand of the citizens for that service, and at the same time disarmed all the rest. The whole city was in the utmost terror and dismay. Whoever opposed their injustice and violence, became the victims of them. Riches were a crime that never failed of drawing a sentence upon their owners, always followed with death, and the confiscation of estates; which the thirty tyrants divided amongst themselves. They put more people to death, says Xenophon, in eight months of peace, than the enemies had done in a war of thirty years.

The two most considerable persons of the thirty were Critias and Theramenes, who at first lived in great union, and always acted in concert with each other. The latter had some honour, and loved his country. When he saw with what an excess of violence and cruelty his colleagues behaved, he declared openly against them, and thereby drew their resentmen upon him. Critias became his most mortal enemy, and acted as informer against him before the senate, accusing him of disturbing the tranquillity of the state, and of designing to d Xenoph. Hist. 1. ii. p. 462, et 479. Diod 1. xiv. p. 235—238. Justin. 1 v. c. 8, 10.

Subvert the present government. As he perceived that the defence of Theramenes was heard with filence and approbation, he was afraid that if the affair was left to the decision of the fenate, they would acquit him. Having therefore caufed a band of young men, whom he had armed with poiniards, to advance to the bar, he faid that he thought it the duty of a supreme magistrate to prevent justice from being abused, and that he should act conformable upon this occasion. "But," continued he, " as the law does not admit, that any of the " three thousand should be put to death without the confent 46 of the fenate, I exclude Theramenes from that number, and " condemn him to die in virtue of my own and my colleagues 44 authority." Theramenes upon these words, leaped upon the altar; "I demand," faid he, "Athenians, that I may " be tried according to the laws; which cannot be refused " me without manifest injustice. Not that I imagine, that the 46 goodness of my cause will avail me any thing, or the sanc-"tion of altars protect me; but I would shew at least, that my " enemies respect neither the gods nor men. What most a-" ftonishes me is, that persons of your wisdom do not see, that your own names may as easily be firuck out of the lift 46 of the citizens, as that of Theramenes." Critias upon this ordered the officers of justice to pull him down from the altar. An universal silence and terror ensued upon the fight of the armed foldiers, that furrounded the fenate. Of all the fenators, only Socrates, whose disciple Theramenes had been, took upon him his defence, and opposed the officers of justice. But his weak endeavours could not deliver Theramenes, who was led to the place of execution, notwithstanding all he could do, through crowds of the citizens, who faw with tears, in the fate of a man equally confiderable for his love of liberty, and the great fervices he had done his country, what they had to fear for themselves. When they presented him the hemloc, that is, the poison, which was the manner of putting the citizens of Athens to death, he took it with an intrepid air, and after having drunk it, he poured the bottom upon the table, after the usual manner observed in feasts or public rejoicings;

faying, "This for the noble Critias." Xenophon relates this circumstance, inconsiderable in itself, to shew, says he, the tranquillity of Theramenes in his last moments.

The tyrants, delivered from a colleague whose presence alone was a continual reproach to them, no longer observed any measures. Nothing passed throughout the city but imprisonments and murders. * Every body trembled for themselves or their friends. The general defolation had no remedy, nor was there any hope of regaining their liberty. Where had they then as many + Harmodiuses as they had tyrants? Terror had taken entire possession of their minds, whilst the whole city deplored in fecret their lofs of liberty, without having one amonst them generous enough to attempt the breaking of its chains. The Athenian people feemed to have loft that valour, which till then had made them awful and terrible to their neighbours and enemies. They feemed to have loft the very use of speech; not daring to vent the least complaint, lest it should be made a capital crime in them. Socrates only continued intrepid. He confoled the afflicted fenate, animated the desponding citizens, and set all men an admirable example of courage and refolution; preferving the liberty, and fustaining his port in the midst of thirty tyrants, who made all elfe tremble, but could never shake the constancy of Socrates with their menaces. c Critias, who had been his pupil, was the first to declare most openly against him, taking offence at the free and bold discourses which he held against the government of the thirty. He went fo far as to prohibit his instructing youth; but Socrates, who neither acknowledged his authority, nor feared the violent effects of it, paid no regard to fo unjust an order.

e Xenoph. memorah. 1. i. p. 716, 717.

* Poteratne civitas illa conquiescere, in qua tot tyranni erant, quot satellites effent? Ne spes quidem ulla recipiendae libertatis animis poterat offerri, nec ulli remedio locus apparebat contra tantam vim malorum. Unde enim miserae civitati tot Harmodius? Socrates tamen in medio crat, et lugentes patris confolabatur, et desperantes de rebublica exhortabatur—et imitari volentibus magnum circumserebat exemplar, cum inter triginta dominos liber incederet. Senec. de tranquilanim. c. 3.

† Harmodius formed a confpiracy for the deliverance of Athens from the ty-

All the citizens of any confideration in Athens, and who retained the love of liberty, quitted a place reduced to fo hard and thameful a flavery, and fought elsewhere an afylum and retreat, where they might live in fafety. At the head of these was Thrafybulus, a person of extraordinary merit, who beheld with the most lively affection the misery of his country. The Lacedemonians had the inhumanity to endeavour to deprive those unhappy fugitives of this last resource. They published an edict to prohibit the cities of Greece from giving them refuge, decreed that they should be delivered up to the thirty tyrants, and condemned all fuch as should contravene the exexecution of this edict, to pay a fine of five talents. Only two cities rejected with disdain so unjust an ordinance, Megara and Thebes; the latter of which made a decree to punish all perfons whatfoever, who should see an Athenian attacked by his enemies without doing his utmost to assist him. Lysias, an orator of Syracuse, who had been banished by the thirty, * raised five hundred foldiers at his own expence, and fent them to the aid of the common country of eloquence.

Thrafybulus loft no time. After having taken Phyla, a fmall fort in Attica, he marched to the Piraeus, of which he made himself master. The thirty slew thither with their troops; and a battle fufficiently warm enfued. But as the foldiers on one fide fought with valour and vigour for their liberty, and on the other with indolence and neglect for the power of others, the fuccess was not doubtful, but followed the better cause. The tyrants were overthrown. Critias was killed upon the spot. And as the rest of the army were taking to slight. Thrafy bulus oried out; "Wherefore do you fly from me as " from a victor, rather than affift me as the avenger of your " liberty? We are not enemies, but fellow-citizens; nor have " we declared war against the city, but against the thirty ty-rants." He continued with bidding them remember, that they had the fame origin, country, laws, and religion; he exhortad them to compaffionate their exiled brethren, to restore their comitry to them, and refume their liberty themselves. This Quingentos milites, flipendio fuo inflructos, in auxilium patriae communis discourse had suitable effects. The army, upon their return to Athens, expelled the thirty, and substituted ten persons to govern in their room, whose conduct proved no better than theirs.

eloquentiae mifit. Justin. 1. v. c. 9.

It is a matter of furprise, that so sudden, so universal, so tenacious, and so uniform a conspiracy against the public good, fhould always actuate the feveral bodies of persons established, in the administration of this government. This we have seen in the four hundred formerly chosen by Athens; again in the thirty; and now in the ten. And what augments our wonder is, that this passion for tyranny should possess so immediately republicans, born in the bosom of liberty, accustomed to an equality of condition, on which it is founded, and principled from their earliest infancy in an abhorrence of all subjection and dependency. * There must be on the one side in power and authority fome violent impulse to actuate in this manner so many perfons, of whom many, no doubt, were not without fentiments of virtue and honour; and to banish so suddenly the principles and manners natural to them; and on the other, an excessive propensity in the mind of man to subject his equals, to rule over them imperioufly, to carry them on to the last extremes of oppression and cruelty, and to make him forget at once all laws, nature and religion.

The thirty being fallen from their power and hopes, sent deputies to Lacedaemon to demand aid. It was not Lyfander's fault, who was sent to them with troops, that the tyrants were not re-established. But king Pausanias, moved with compassion for the deplorable condition, to which a city, once so sourishing, was reduced, had the generosity to favour the Athenians in secret, and at length obtained a peace for them. It was sealed with the blood of the tyrants, who, having taken arms to reinstate themselves in the government, and being present at a parley for that purpose, were all put to the sword, and left Athens in the full possession of its liberty. All the exiles were recalled. Thrasybulus at that time proposed the celebrated amnesty, by which the citizens engaged upon oath, that all past transactions should be buried in oblivion. The government was re-established upon its ancient foot, the laws restored to their pristine vigour, and magistrates elected with the usual forms.

* Vi dominationis convulfus. Tacit.

I cannot forbear observing in this place the wisdom and moderation of Thrasybulus, so falutary and essential after so long a continuance of domestic troubles. This is one of the finest events in ancient history, worthy the Athenian lenity and benevolence, and has served as a model to successive ages in good governments.

Never had tyranny been more cruel and bloody than that the Athenians had lately thrown off. Every house was in mourning; every family bewailed the loss of some relation. It had been a feries of public robbery and rapine, in which licence and impunity had authorifed all manner of crimes. The people feemed to have a right to demand the blood of all accomplices in fuch notorious malverfations, and even the interest of the state to authorise such a claim, that by exemplary feverities fuch enormous crimes might be prevented for the future. But Thrafybulus rifing above those fentiments, from the fuperiority of his more extensive genius, and the views of a more differning and profound policy, forefaw, that by giving in to the punishment of the guilty, eternal feeds of difcord and enmisy would remain, to weaken the republic by domestic divisions, which it was necessary to unite against the common enemy, and occasion the loss to the state of a great number of citizens, who might render it important fervices from the view itself of making amends for past misbehaviour.

Such a conduct, after great troubles in a flate, has always feemed, with the ablest politicians, the most certain and ready means to restore the public peace and tranquility. * Cicero, when Rome was divided into two factions upon the occasion of Caesar's death, who had been killed by the conspirators, calling to mind this celebrated amnesty, proposed, after the example of the Athenians, to bury all that had passed in eternal oblivion. E Cardinal Mazarin observed to Don Lewis de Haro, prime minister of Spain, that this gentle and humane conduct in France had prevented the troubles and revolts of that kingdom from having any fatal consequences, and "that "the king had not lost a foot of land by them to that day;" whereas the inslexible severity of the Spaniards "was the oc-"casion, that the subjects of that monarchy, whenever they threw off the mask, never returned to their obedience but by the force of arms; which sufficiently appears," says he, in the example of the Hollanders, who are in the peace-"able possession of many provinces, that not an age ago were the patrimony of the king of Spain."

• In acdem Telluris convocati fumus; in quo templo, quantum in me fuit, jeci fundamentum pacis; Athenienflumque renovavi vetus exemplum, Graecum etiam + verbum ufurpavi, quod tum in fedandis difeordiis ufurpaverat civitas illa; atque omnem memoriam difeordiarum oblivione fempiterna delendam cenfui. Philip, i. n. 1.

† Some believe that word was μωνητία; but as it is not found in the historians who have treated this fact, it is more likely, that it was μη μηνοικακήσων, which has the fame fense, and is used by them all.

Diodorus Siculus takes occasion, from the thirty tyrants of Athens, whose immoderate ambition induced them to treat their country with the most excessive cruelties, to observe how unfortunate it is for * perfons in power to want a fense of honour, and to difregard either the present opinion, or the judgment posterity will form of their conduct: For, from the contempt of reputation, the transition is too common to that of virtue itself. They may perhaps, by the awe of their power, suppress for some time the public voice, and impose a forced filence upon censure; but the more constraint they lay upon it during their lives, the more liberal will it be after their deaths of complaints and reproaches, and the more infamy and imputation will be affixed to their memories. The power of the thirty was of a very fhort duration; their guilt immortal, which will be remembered with abhorrence throughout all ages; whilft their names will be recorded in history only to render them odious, and to make their crimes detestable. He applies the fame reflection to the Lacedaemonions, who, after having made themselves masters of Greece by a wife and moderate conduct, fell from that glory, through the feverity, haughtiness, and injustice with which they treated their allies. There is doubtless no reader, whom their abject and cruel jealoufy in regard to Athens enflaved and humbled. has not prejudiced against them; nor is there any resemblance in fuch behaviour, of the greatness of mind and noble generosity of ancient Sparta; so much power have the lust of dominion and prosperity over even virtuous men. Diodorus concludes his reflection with a maxim, very true, though very little known: "The greatness and majesty of princes," fays he, (and the same may be said of all persons in high authority) " can be supported only by humanity and justice with " regard to their subjects; as on the contrary, they are ruin-" ed and destroyed by a cruel and oppressive government, " which never fails to draw upon them the hatred of their " people."

E Let. XV. of Card. Maz.

* Cactera principibus statim adesse: unum infatiabiliter parandum, prosperam sui memoriam; nam contempta sama, contemni virtutes—Quo magis socordiam corum irrideri libet, qui praesenti potentia credunt extingui posse etiam sequentis aevi memoriam—suum cuique decus posseritas rependit. Tacit. Annal. L iv. 6, 30 ct 35.

SECTION III.

LYSANDER abuses his POWER in an extraordinary MANNER.

He is recalled to SPARTA.

As Lyfander had the greatest share in the celebrated exploits h, which had raised the glory of the Lacedaemonians to so high a pitch; so he had acquired a degree of power and authority, of which there was no example before in Sparta; but he suffered himself to be carried away by a presumption and vanity. Still greater than his power. He permitted the Grecian cities to dedicate altars to him as to a god, and to offer facrifices, and sing hymns and canticles in honour of him. The Samians ordained by a public decree, that the feasts celebrated in honour of Juno, and which bore the name of that goddess, should be called "the Feasts of Lysander." He had always a crowd of poets about him, (who are often a tribe of venal staterers), who emulated each other in singing his great exploits, for which they were magnificently paid. Praise is undoubtedly due to noble deeds; but diminishes their luftre when either forged or exceffive.

h Plut. in Lyf. p. 443-445.

This fort of vanity and ambition, had he flopt there, would have hurt only himfelf, by exposing him to envy and contempt; but a natural censequence of it was, that through his arrogance and pride, in conjunction with the incessant flatteries of those around him, he carried the spirit of command and authority to an insupportable excess, and observed no longer any measures either in rewarding or punishing. The absolute government of cities with tyrannic power were the fruits of his friendship, and the ties of hospitality with him; and only the death of those he hated, could put an end to his resentment and displeasure, without its being possible to escape his vengeance. What Sylla caused to be inscribed upon his tomb, might with equal propriety have been engraved upon Lysander's: That no man had ever surpassed him in doing good to his friends, or evil to his enemies.

Treachery and perjury cost him nothing, whenever they prompted his designs; nor was he less cruel than revengeful; of which what he did at Miletus is a sufficient proof. Apprehending that those who were at the head of the people would escape him, he swore not to do them any hurt. Those unfortunates gave credit to his oath, and no sooner appeared in public, than they were put to the sword with his consent by the noblity, who killed them all, though no less than eight hundred. The number of those in the party of the people, whom he caused to be massacred in the other cities, is incredible; for he did not only destroy to satiate his own resentments, but to serve in all places the enmity, malice, and avarice of his friends, whom he supported in gratifying their passion by the death of their enemies.

There was no kind of injuftice and violence which the people did not fuffer under the government of Lyfander; whilst the Lacedaemonians, who were fufficiently informed of his conduct, gave themselves no trouble to prevent its effects. It is too common for those in power to be little affected with the vexations and oppressions laid upon persons of low condition , and credit, and to be deaf to their just complaints, though authority is principally confided in them for the defence of the weak and poor, who have no other protectors. But if fuch remonstrances are made by a great or powerful person, from whom they may have any thing to hope or fear, the fame authority that was flow and drowly, becomes immediately warm and officious; a certain proof that it is not the love of justice that actuates it. This appears here in the conduct of the Lacedaemonian magistrates. Pharnabasus, weary of Lyfander's repeated injustices, who ravaged and pillaged the provinces under his command, having fent ambassadors to Sparta, to complain of the wrongs he had received from that general, the Ephori recalled him. Lyfander was at that time in the Hellespont. The letter of the Ephori threw him into great consternation. As he principally feared the complaints and accusations of Pharnabasus, he made all the haste he could to come to an explanation with him, from the hope of foftening him, and making his peace. He went for that purpose to him, and defired, that he would write another letter to the Ephori, intimating a fatisfaction in his conduct. But Lyfander, fays Plutarch, in fuch an application to Pharnabasus, forgot the * proverb, " Set a thief to catch a thief." The fatrap promifed all he defired; and accordingly wrote fuch a letter in Lyfander's presence as he had asked of him, but prepared another to a quite different effect. When he was to feal it, as both letters were of the fame fize and form. he dexterously put that he had wrote in secret into the place of the other, without being observed, which he fealed and gave him.

Lyfander departed well fatisfied; and being arrived at Sparta, alighted at the place where the fenate was affembled, and delivered Pharnabafus's letter to the Ephori. But he was ftrangely furprifed when he heard the contents, and withdrew in extreme confusion and diforder. Some days after he returned to the fenate, and told the Ephori, that he was obliged to go to the temple of Ammon to acquit himself of the fa-erifices he had vowed to that god before his battles. That pilgrimage was no more than a pretence to cover the pain it gave him to live as a private perfon in Sparta, and to submit to the yoke of obeying; he who till then had always governed. Accustomed long to commanding armies, and to the slattering distinctions of a kind of sovereignty exercised by him in Asia, he could not endure the mortifying equality with the multitude, nor restrain himself to the simplicity of a private life. Having obtained permission, not without great difficulties, he embarked.

The Greek proverb is, Cretan against Cretan, from the people of Crete, who passed for the greatest cheats and liers in the world.

As foon as he was gone, the kings, reflecting that he held all the cities in his dependence, by the means of their governors and magistrates established by him, to whom they were also indebted for their unlimitted authority, and that he was thereby effectually lord and master of all Greece, applied themselves vigorously to restore the government of the people, and to depose all his creatures and friends from any share in it. This alteration occasioned great tumults at first. About the same time Lysander, being apprised of the design of Thra-Tybulus to re-establish the liberty of his country, returned with the utmost diligence to Sparta, and endeavoured to engage the Lacedaemonians to support the party of the nobility at Athens. We have before observed, that Pausanius, from a more noble spirit of equity and generosity, gave peace to Athens, and by that means, fays Plutarch, clipped the wings of Lyfander's ambition.

CHAPTER II.

Young CTRUS, with the AID of the GRECIAN TROOPS, endeavours to dethrone his BROTHER ARTAXERXES.

He is killed. Famous RETREAT of the TEN THOUSAND.

Antiquity has few events fo memorable, as those I am about to relate in this place. We see on one side a young prince, abounding otherwise with excellent qualities, abandoned to his violent ambition, carry the war from far against his brother and sovereign, and go to attack him almost in his own palace, with the view of depriving him at once of his crown and life. We fee him, I fay, fall dead in the battle at the feet of that brother, and terminate, by so unhappy a fate, an enterprise equally glaring and criminal. On the other hand, the Greeks who follow him*, destitute of all succour after the loss of their chiefs, without allies, provisions, money, horse, or archers, reduced to lefs than ten thousand men, with no resource but in their own persons and valour, supported only by the warm defire of preferving their liberty, and of returning to their native countries; these Greeks, with bold and intrepid resolution, make their retreat before a victorious army of a million of men, traverse five or fix hundred leagues, notwithstanding vast rivers and innumerable passes, and arrive at last in their own country through a thousand fierce and barbarous nations. victorious over all obstacles in their way, and over all the dangers which either concealed fraud or upon force reduce them to undergo.

This retreat, in the opinion of the best judges and most experienced in the art of war, is the boldest and best conducted exploit to be found in ancient history, and is deemed a perfect model in its kind. Happily for us, it is described to the most minute circumstance by an historian, who was not only eyewitness of the facts he relates, but the first mover, the soul of this great enterprise. I shall only abridge it, and abstract its most material circumstances; but I cannot omit advising young persons, who make arms their possession, to consult the original, of which there is a good translation extant in French, though far short of the admirable beauties of the text. It is very difficult to meet with a more able master than Xenophon in the art of war, to whom may be well applied here what Homer says of Phoenix the governor of Achilles, ""That he was "equally capable of forming his pupil for eloquence or arms."

Μύθου σε έμπης εμεναι, προυππρά σέ έργου.

u Iliad. x. ver. 443.

Post mortem Cyri, neque armis a tanto exercitu vinci, neque dolo capi potuerunt; revertentesque inter tot indomitas nationes et barbaras gentes, per tanta itineris spatia, virtute se usque terminos patriae desenderunt. Justin l. v. c. 11.

SECTION I.

CYRUS raifes TROOPS against bis BROTHER ARTAXERXES.

We have already faid, that young Cyrus*, fon of Darius Nothus and Paryfatis, faw with pain his elder brother Artaxerxes upon the throne, and that at the very time the latter was taking possession of it, he had attempted to deprive him of his crown and life together. Artaxerxes was not insensible of what he had to sear from a brother of his enterprising and ambitous spirit, but could not refuse pardoning him to the prayers and tears of his mother Paryfatis, who doated upon this youngest son. He removed him therefore into Asia to his government; considing to him, contrary to all the rules of policy, an absolute authority over the provinces left him by the will of the king his father.

As foon as he arrived there, his thoughts were folely intent upon revenging the supposed affront he had received from his brother, and to dethrone himy. He received all that came from the court with great favour and affability, to induce them infenfibly to quit the king's party and adhere to him. He gained also the hearts of the Barbarians under his government: familiarizing himself with them, and mingling with the common foldiery, tho' without forgetting the dignity of their general; thefe he formed by various exercises for the trade of war. He applied particularly in fecret to raife from feveral parts, and upon different pretexts, a body of Grecian troops, upon whom he relied much more than upon those of the Barbarians. Clearchus retired to his court after having been banished from Sparta, and was of great fervice to him, being, an able experienced, and valiant captain. 2 At the fame time feveral cities in the provinces of Tissaphernes revolted from their obedience in fayour of Cyrus. This incident, which was not an effect of chance, but of the fecret practices of that prince, gave birth x A. M. 3600. Ant. J. C. 404. Diod. l. xiv. p. 243.—249, et 252. Justin. p. v. c. 11. Xcnoph. de Cyri exped. l. i. p. 243—248.

B iij

y A. M. 3601. Ant. J. C. 403. 2 A. M. 3602. Ant. J. C. 402.

to a war between them. Cyrus, under the pretence of arming against Tistaphernes, assembled troops openly; and to amuse the court the more speciously, sent grievous complaints to the king against that governor, demanding his protection and aid in the most submissive manner. Artaxerxes was deceived by these appearances, and believed that all Cyrus's preparations regarded only Tistaphernes, and continued quiet, from the assurance of having nothing to apprehend for himself.

a Cyrus knew well how to improve the imprudent fecurity and indolence of his brother, which fome people conceived the effect of his goodness and humanity. And indeed, in the beginning of his reign he feemed to imitate the virtues of the first Artaxerxes, whose name he bore: For he demeaned himfelf with great mildness and affability to such as approached him; he honoured and rewarded magnificently all those whose fervices had merited favour; when he passed sentence to punish, it was without either outrage or infult; and when he made prefents, it was with a gracious air, and fuch obliging circumstances, as infinitely exalted their value, and implied that he was never better pleafed than when he had an opportunity of doing good to his subjects. To all these excellent qualities it had been very necessary for him to have added one no less royal, and which would have put him upon his guard against the enterprifes of a brother, whose character he ought to have known; I mean a wife forefight, that penetrates the future, and renders a prince attentive to prevent or frustrate whatever may disturb the tranquillity of the state.

The emissaries of Cyrus at the court were perpetually dispersing reports and opinions amongst the people, to prepare their minds for the intended change and revolt. They said that the state required a king of Cyrus's character; a king, magnificent, liberal, who loved war, and showered his favours upon those that served him; and that it was necessary for the grandeur of the empire to have a prince upon the throne, fired with ambition and valour for the support and augmentation of its glory.

<sup>3</sup> Plut. in Artax. p. 1014.

b The young prince lost no time on his fide, and hastened the execution of his great defign. He was then twenty-three years old at most. After the important services he had done the Lacedaemonians, without which they had never obtained the victories that had made them masters of Greece, he thought he might safely open himself to them. He therefore imparted to them the present situation of his affairs, and the end he had in view; convinced that such a considence could not but incline them the more in his favour.

In the letter he wrote them, he fpoke of himself in very magnificent terms. He told them he had a greater and more royal heart than his brother: that he was better versed in philosophy and the * knowledge of the magi: and that he could drink more wine without being disordered in his senses; a very meritorious quality amongst the Barbarians, but not so proper to recommend him to the opinion of those he wrote to. The Lacedaemonians sent orders to their sleet to join that of the prince immediately, and to obey the commands of Tamos his admiral in all things, but without the least mention of Artaxerxes, or seeming in any manner privy to his design. They thought that precaution + necessary for their justification with Artaxerxes, in case affairs should happen to terminate in his favour.

The troops of Cyrus, according to the review afterwards made, confifted of thirteen thousand Greeks, which were the flower and chief force of his army, and of an hundred thousand regular men of the barbarous nations. Clearchus the Lacedaemonian, commanded all the Peloponnesian troops, except the Achaeans, who had Socrates of Achaia for their leader. Te Bocotians were under Proxenes the Theban, and the Thessalians under Menon. Can Barbarians had Persian generals, of whom the chief was Ariaeus. The sleet consisted b A. M. 3603. Ant. J. C. 401.

Biiij

 c Xenoph. Cyri. exped. l. i. p. 252.
 by the knowledge of the Magi, amongst the Persians, was meant the science of religion and government.

† Quaerentes apud Cyrum gratiam; et apud Artaxerxem, si vicisset, veniae pazrocitia, cum nihil adversus eum aperte decrevissent. Justin l. v. c. 11.

of thirty-five ships under Pythagoras the Lacedaemonian, and of twenty-five commanded by Tamos the Ægyptian, admiral of the whole sleet. It followed the land-army, coasting along the shore.

Cyrus had opened his defign only to Clearchus of all the Greeks, forefeeing aright, that the length and boldness of the enterprise could not fail of discouraging and disgusting the officers as well as foldiers. He made it his fole application to gain their affections during the march, by treating them with kindness and humanity, conversing freely with them, and giving effectual orders that they should want for nothing. Proxenes, between whose family and Xenophon's an ancient friendthip fubfilted, prefented that young Athenian to Cyrus d, who received him very favourably, and gave him an employment in his army amonst the Greeks. He set out for Sardis at length, and marched towards the upper provinces of Asia. The troops knew neither the occasion of the war, nor into what countries they were going. Cyrus had only caufed it to be given out, that he should act against the Pissdians, who had infested his province by their incursions, Tissaphernes, rightly judging that all these preparations were too great for fo fmall an enterprife as against Pisidia, had fet out post from Miletus to give the king an account of them. This news occasioned great trouble at court. Parysatis, the mother of Artaxerxes and Cyrus, was looked upon as the principal cause of this war; and all persons in her service and interest were suspected of holding intelligence with Cyrus. Statira especially, the reigning queen, reproached her incessantly in the most violent terms. "Where is now," faid she to her, " that faith you have so often engaged for your fon's beha-" viour? Where those ardent prayers you employed to pre-" ferve from death that conspirator against his king and bro-" ther? It is your unhappy fondness has kindled this war, and of plunged us into an abyfs of misfortunes." The antipathy and hatred of the two queens for each other was already very great, and much inflamed by fuch warm reproaches. We shall see what consequences they have. Artaxerxes assembled a numerous army to receive his brother.

d Xenophon. l. ii. p. 294. e Plut, in Artax. p. 1014

f Cyrus advanced continually by great marches. What troubled him most on the way was the pass of Cilicia, which was a narrow defile between very high and steep mountains, that would admit no more than one carriage to pass at a time. Syennesis, king of the country, prepared to dispute this passage with him, and would infallibly have succeeded, but for the diversion made by Tamos with his sleet, in conjunction with that of the Lacedaemonians. To defend the coasts against the insults of the fleet, Syennesis abandoned that important post, which a small body of troops might have made good against the greatest army.

When they arrived at Tarfus, the Greeks refused to march any farther, rightly fuspecting that they were intended against the king, and loudly exclaiming, that they had not entered into the fervice upon that condition. Clearchus, who commanded them, had occasion for all his address and ability to stifle this commotion in its birth. At first he made use of authority and force, but with very ill fuccess, and defisted therefore from an open opposition to their fentiments: He even affected to enter into their views, and to support them with his approbation and credit. He declared publicly, that he would not separate himself from them, and advised them to depute persons to the prince, to know from his own month against whom they were to be led, that they might follow him voluntarily if they approved his measures; if not, that they might demand his permission to withdraw. By this artful evasion he appealed the tumult, and made them easy, and they chose him and fome other officers for their deputies. Cyrus, whom he had fecretly apprifed of every thing, made answer, that he was going to attack * Abrocomas his enemy, at twelve days march from thence upon the Euphrates. When this answer was repeated to them, though they plainly faw against whom f Xenoph. 1. i. p. 248-261.

* It is not faid where he commanded. It appears to be upon the Euphrates. He marched with three hundred thousand men to join the king's army; but did not arrive till after the battle.

they were going, they refolved to proceed, and only demanded an augmentation of their pay. Cyrus, instead of one daric * a month to each foldier, promised to give them one and a half.

Some time after, Cyrus was informed that two of the principal officers, upon account of a private quarrel with Clearchus, had deserted with part of their equipage on board a merchant-ship. Many were of opinion, that it was proper to fend two gallies after them; which might be done with great ease, and that when they were brought back, they should be made an example, by fuffering death in the fight of the whole army. Cyrus, convinced that favour + was the most certain means to the attainment of affection, and that punishments, like violent remedies, ought never to be used but in extreme necessity, declared publicly that he would not suffer it to be faid, that he had detained any one in his fervice by force; and added, that he would fend them their wives and children, whom they had left as hostages in his hands. An answer of fo much wildom and generolity had a furprifing effect; and made even those his firm adherents, who were before inclined to retire. This is an excellent lesson for all who govern. There is in the mind of man a fund of natural generofity, which it is necessary to know and apply. Threats exasperate them, and chastifement makes them revolt, when endeavours are used to force them to do their duty against their will. They defire a certain degree of confidence in their honour t. and that the glory of acquitting themselves of it out of choice be left in their power. To shew that you believe men faithful, is often the best means to make them fo.

Cyrus foon after declared, that he marched against Artaxerxes. Upon which some murmuring was heard at first; but it soon gave place to the expressions of joy and satisfaction, occasioned by that prince's magnificent promises to the army.

* The daric was worth ten livres.

† Beneficiis potius quam remediis ingenia experiri placuit. Plin. in Traj.

! Nescie an plus moritus conserat princeps, qui bonas esse patitur, quam qui cogit. Plin ibid.

Plerumque habita fides ipsam obligat sidem. Liv.

8 As Cyrus advanced by long marches, he was informed from all parts, that the king did not intend to come directly to a battle, but had resolved to wait in the remote parts of Persia, till all his forces were affembled; and that to stop his enemies, he had ordered an intrenchment to be thrown up in the plains of Babylonia, with a fossé of five fathoms broad, and three deep, extending the space of twelve * parafangas or leagues, from the Euphrates to the wall of Media. Between the Euphrates and the fossé a way had been left of twenty feet in breadth, by which Cyrus passed with his whole army, having reviewed it the day before. The king had neglected to dispute this pass with him, and suffered him to continue his march towards Babylon. It was Tiribafus who determined him not to fly in fuch a manner before an enemy, against whom he had infinite advantages, as well from the number of his troops as the valour of his generals. He refolved therefore to advance against the enemy.

SECTION II.

The BATTLE of CUNAXA. CYRUS is killed.

The place where the battle was fought h, was called Cunaxa, about + twenty five leagues from Babylon. The army of Gyrus confifted of thirteen thousand Greeks, an hundred thousand Barbarians, and twenty chariots armed with seythes. The enemy in horse and soot might amount to about twelve hundred thousand, under sour generals, Tissaphernes, Gobryas, Arbaces, and Abrocomas, without including six thousand chosen horse, that sought where the king was present, and never quitted his person. But Abrocomas, who had the command

g Plut in Artax. p. 1014. Xenoph. l. i. p. 261-266.

h Xenoph. in exped. Cyr. l. 1. p. 263—266. Diod. l. xiv. p. 253, 254. Plut. p. 1014—1017.

* The parafanga is a measure of ways peculiar to the Persians. It was commonly thirty stadia, which make about a league and a half French. Some were from twenty to fixty stadia. In the march of Cyrus's army, I suppose the parafanga only twenty stadia, or one league, for reasons I shall give hereafter.

+ Five hundred stadia.

of three hundred thousand men, did not arrive till five days after the battle. In the king's army were only an hundred and fifty chariots armed with scythes.

Cyrus believed, from the enemy's not having defended the pass at the fosse, that there would be no battle; so that the next day the army marched with great negligence. But on the third, Cyrus being in his chariot, with a few soldiers in their ranks before him, and the rest marching without any order, or having their arms carried for them, an horseman came in full speed, crying out as he passed, that the enemy approached in order of battle. Upon this, great consusting ensued, from the apprehension that they should not have time to draw up the army. Cyrus, leaping from his chariot, put on his arms immediately, and getting on horseback with his javelin in his hand, he gave orders universally to the troops to stand to their arms, and fall into their ranks; which was executed with so much expedition, that the troops had not time to refresh themselves.

Cyrus posted upon his right a thousand Paphlagonian horse, supported by the Euphrates, and the light armed infantry of the Greeks; and next them, Clearchus, Proxenes, and the rest of the general officers to Menon, at the head of their several corps. The left wing, composed of Lydians, Phrygians, and other Asiatic nations, were commanded by Ariaeus, who had a thousand horse. Cyrus placed himself in the centre, where the chosen troops of the Persians and other Barbarians were posted. He had around him fix hundred horsemen, armed at all points, as were their horses, with head and breast-pieces. The prince's head was uncovered, as were those of all the Persians, whose custom it was to give battle in that manner. The arms of all his people were red, and those of Artaxerxes were white.

A little before the onset, Clearchus advised Cyrus not to charge in person, but to cover himself in the rear of the Grecian battalions. "What is it you say?" replied Cyrus; "At the time I am endeavouring to make myself king, would you have me shew myself unworthy of being so?" That wifeand generous answer proves, that he knew the duty of a general, especially on a day of battle. Had he withdrawn when his presence was most necessary, it would have argued his want of courage, and intimidated others. It is necessary, always preferving the due diffinction between the leader and the troops, that their danger should be common, and no one exempted from it, left the latter should be alarmed by a differeut conduct. Courage in an army depends upon example, upon the defire of being diftinguished, the fear of dishonour, the incapacity of doing otherwise than the rest, and the equality of danger. The retiring of Cyrus had either ruined or greatly weakened all these potent motives, by discouraging as well the officers as foldiers of his army. He thought, that being their general, it was incumbent upon him to difcharge all the functions of that office, and to shew himself worthy to be the leader and foul of fuch a number of valiant men, ready to shed their blood for his fervice.

It was now noon; and the enemy did not yet appear. But about three of the clock a great dust like a white cloud arose, followed foon after with a blackness that overcast the whole plain; after which was feen the glittering of armour, lances, and standards. Tissaphernes commanded the left, which confifted of cavalry armed with white cuiraffes, and of light-armed infantry; in the centre was the heavy-armed foot, a great part of which had bucklers made of wood, which covered the foldier entirely: these were Egyptians. The rest of the lightarmed infantry and of the horse formed the right wing. The foot were drawn up by nations, with as much depth as front : and in that order composed square battalions. The king had posted himself in the main body, with the flower of the whole army, and had fix thousand horse for his gnard, commanded by Artagerses. Though he was in the centre, he was beyond the left wing of Cyrus's army; fo much did the front of his own exceed that of the enemy in extent. An hundred and fifty chariots armed with fcythes were placed in the front of the army, at some distance from one anoter. The scythes were fixed to the axle downwards and affant, fo as to cut down and overthrow all before them.

As Cyrus relied very much upon the valour and experience of the Greeks, he bade Clearchus, as foon as he had beat the enemies in his front, to take care to incline to his left, and fall upon the centre, where the king was posted; the success of the battle depending upon that attack. But Clearchus, finding it very difficult to make his way through so great a body of troops, replied, that he need be in no pain, and that he would take care to do what was necessary.

The enemy in the mean time advanced flowly in good order; Cyrus marched in the space between the two armies, the nearest to his own, and considered both of them with great attention. Xenophon, perceiving him, spurred directly up to him, to know whether he had any further orders to give. He called out to him that the facrifices were favourable, and that he should tell the troops so. He then hastened through the ranks to give his orders, and shewed himself to the soldiers, with fuch a joy and ferenity in his countenance as inspired them with new courage, and at the same time with an air of kindness and familiarity that excited their zeal and affection. It is not easy to comprehend what great effects a word, a kind air, or a look of a general, will have upon a day of action; and with what ardour a common man will rush into danger, when he believes himfelf not unknown to his general, and thinks his valour will oblige him.

Artaxerxes moved on continually, though with a flow pace, and without noise and confusion. That good order and exact discipline extremely surprised the Greeks, who expected to see much hurry and tumult in so great a multitude, and to hear confused cries, as Cyrus had foretold them.

The armies were not diftant above four or five hundred paces, when the Greeks began to fing the hymn of battle, and to march on, foftly at first, and with filence. When they came near the enemy, they fet up great cries, striking their darts upon their shields to frighten the horse; and then moving all together, they sprung forwards upon the Barbarians with all their force, who did not wait their charge, but took to their heels, and fled universally; except Tissaphernes, who stood his ground with a small part of his troops.

Cyrus faw with pleafure the enemy routed by the Greeks, and was proclaimed king by those around him. But he did not give himself up to a vain joy, nor as yet reckon himself victor. He perceived that Artaxerxes was wheeling his right to attack him in slank, and marched directly against him with his fix hundred horse. He killed Artagerses, who commanded the king's guards of fix thousand horse, with his own hand, and put the whole body to slight. Discovering his brother, he cried out with his eyes sparkling with rage, "I see him," and spurred against him, sollowed only by his principal officers; for his troops had quitted their ranks to follow the runaways, which was an essential fault.

b The battle then became a fingle combat, in fome measure, between Artaxerxes and Cyrus; and the two brothers were feen, transported with rage and fury, endeavouring, like Eteocles and Polynices, to plunge their fwords into each other's hearts, and to affure themselves of the throne by the death of their rival.

Cyrus having opened his way through those who were drawn up in battle before Artaxerxes, joined him, and killed his horfe, that fell with him to the ground. He rose and was remounted upon another; when Cyrus attacked him again, gave him a fecond wound, and was preparing to give him a third, in hopes that it would prove his last. The king, like a lion wounded by the hunters, was only the more furious from the fmart, and fprung forwards, impetuously pushing his horfe against Cyrus, who, running headlong, and without regard to his person, threw himself into the midst of a slight of darts aimed at him from all fides, and received a wound from the king's javelin, at the inftant all the rest discharged upon him. Cyrus fell dead; fome fay by the wound given him by the king; others affirm that he was killed by a Carian foldier. Mithridates, a young Persian nobleman, afferted that he had given him the mortal stroke with a javelin, which entered his temple, and pierced his head quite through. The greatest persons of his court, resolving not to survive so good a mafter, were all killed around his body; a certain proof fays Xenophon, that he well knew how to choose his friends and that he was truly beloved by them. Ariaeus, who ought to have been the firmest of all his adherents, sled with the left wing as soon as he heard of his death.

Artaxerxes, after having caused the head and right hand of his brother to be cut off by the eunuch Mesabates, pursued the enemy into their camp. Ariaeus had not stopped there; but having passed through it, continued his retreat to the place where the army had encamped the day before, which was about four leagues distant.

Tiffaphernes, after the defeat of the greatest part of his left wing by the Greeks, led on the rest against them, and by the fide of the river passed through the light-armed infantry of the Greeks, who opened to give him passage, and made their discharge upon him as he passed, without losing a man. They were commanded by Episthenes of Amphipolis, who was esteemed an able captain. Tissaphernes kept on without returning to the charge, because he perceived he was too weak, and went forward to Cyrus's camp, where he found the king, who was plundering it, but had not been able to force the quarter defended by the Greeks left to guard it, who saved their baggage.

The Greeks on their fide, and Artaxerxes on his, who did not know what had paffed elfewhere, believed each of them that they had gained the victory; the first, because they had put the enemy to slight, and pursued them; and the king, because he had killed his brother, beat the troops he had fought, and plundered their camp. The event was soon cleared up on both sides. Tissaphernes, upon his arrival at the camp, informed the king, that the Greeks had defeated his left wing, and pursued it with great vigour; and the Greeks on their side learned that the king, in pursuing Cyrus's left, had penetrated into the camp. Upon this advice, the king rallied his troops, and marched in quest of the enemy; and Clearchus, being returned from pursuing the Persians, advanced to support the camp.

The two armies were foon very near each other, when by a movement made by the king, he feemed to intend to charge the Greeks by their left, who, fearing to be furrounded on all fides, wheeled about and halted with the river on their backs, to prevent their being taken in the rear. Upon feeing that, the king changed his form of battle alfo, drew up his army in front of them, and marched on to the attack. As foon as the Greeks faw him approach, they began to fing the hymn of battle, and advanced against the enemy even with more ardour than in the first action.

The Barbarians again took to their heels, ran farther than before, and were purfued to a village at the foot of an hill upon which their horse halted. The king's standard was observed to be there, which was a golden eagle upon the top of a pike, having its wing's displayed. The Greeks preparing to pursue them, they abandoned also the hill, sled precipitately, with all their troops broken, and in the utmost disorder and confusion. Clearchus, having drawn up the Greeks at the bottom of the hill, ordered Lycias the Syracusan and another to go up to it, and observe what passed in the plain. They returned with an account that the enemies sled on all sides, and that their whole army was routed.

As it was almost night, the Greeks laid down their arms to rest themselves, much surprised, that neither Cyrus, nor any one from him, appeared; and, imagining that he was either engaged in the pursuit of the enemy, or was making haste to possess himself of some important place, for they were still ignorant of his death, and the defeat of the rest of his army; they determined therefore to return to their camp, and sound the greatest part of the baggage taken, with all the provisions, and sour hundred waggens laden with corn and wine, which Cyrus had expressly caused to be carried along with the army for the Greeks, in case of any pressing necessity. They passed the night in the camp, the greatest part of them without any refreshment, concluding that Cyrus was alive and victorious.

The fuccess of this battle shews the superiority of valour and military knowledge to multitude without them. The small army of the Greeks did not amount to more than twelve or thirteen thousand men; but they were seasoned and disciplined troops, inured to fatigues, accustomed to confront dangers, sensible to glory, and who, during the long Peloponnesian war, had not wanted either time or means to acquire, and complete themselves in the art of war, and the methods of battle. Artaxerxes's side was computed at a million of men; but they were foldiers only in name, without force, courage, discipline, experience, or any sense of honour, Hence it was, that as soon as the Greeks appeared, terror and disorder ensued amongst the enemy; and in the second action, Artaxerxes himself did not dare to wait their attack, but shamefully betook himself to slight.

Plutarch here blames Clearchus the general of the Greeks very much, and imputes to him as an unpardonable neglect, his not having followed Cyrus's order, who recommended to him above all things to incline and charge Artaxerxes's perfon. This reproach feems groundlefs. It is not eafy to conceive, how it was possible for that captain, who was posted on the right wing, to attack Artaxerxes immediately, who, in the centre of his own army, lay beyond the utmost extent of the enemy's left, as has been faid before. It feems that Gyrus, depending as he did with great reason upon the valour of the Greeks, and desiring they should charge Artaxerxes in his post, ought to have placed them in the left wing, which answered directly to the part where the king was; that is, to the main body, and not in the right, which was very remote from it.

Clearchus may indeed be reproached with having followed the pursuit too warmly and too long. If after having put the left wing, which opposed him, into disorder, he had charged the rest of the enemy in slank, and had opened his way to the centre, where Artaxerxes was, it is highly probable, that he had gained a complete victory, and placed Cyrus upon the throne. The fix hundred horse of that prince's guard committed the same fault; and by pursuing the body of troops they had put to slight too eagerly, left their master almost alone, and abandoned to the mercy of the enemy; without considering, that they were chosen from the whole army for the immediate guard of his person, and for no other purpose whatfoever. Too much ardour is often prejudicial in a battle; and it is the duty of an able general to know how to restrain and direct it.

Cyrus himself erred highly in this respect, and abandoned himself too much to his blind passion for glory and revenge. In running headlong to attack his brother, he forgot, that there is a wide difference between a general and a private soldier. He ought not to have exposed himself, but as it was consistent with a prince; as the head, not the hand; as the person who was to give orders, and not as those who were to execute them.

I fpeak in this manner after the judges in the art of war; and would not choose to advance my own opinion upon things out of my sphere.

SECTION III.

EULOGY of CYRUS.

Xenophon gives us a magnificent character of Cyrus k; and that not upon the credit of others, but from what he faw and knew of him in his own person. He was, says he, in the opinion of all that were acquainted with him, after Cyrus the Great, a prince the most worthy of the supreme authority, and had the most noble, and most truly royal soul. From his infancy he surpassed all of his own age in every exercise, whether it were in managing the horse, drawing the bow, throwing the dart, or in the chace, in which he distinguished himself once by sighting and killing a bear that attacked him. Those advantages were exalted in him by the nobleness of his air, an engaging aspect, and by all the graces of nature, that conduce to recommend merit.

When his father had made him fatrap of Lydia, and the neighbouring * provinces, his chief care was to make the people fensible, that he had nothing so much at heart, as to keep his word inviolably, not only with regard to public treaties but the most minute of his promises; a quality very rare amongst princes, and which however is the basis of all good government, and the source of their own, as well as their people's happines. Not only the places under his authority, but the enemy themselves, reposed an entire considence in him.

k De exped. l. i. p. 266, 267.

* Great Phrygia and Cappadocia.

Whether good or ill were done him, he always defired to return it double, and that he might live no longer, as he faid himself, than whilst he surmounted his friends in benefits, and his cnemies in vengeance. (It had been more glorious for him to have overcome the latter by the force of favour and benevolence.) Nor was there ever prince, that people were more afraid to offend, nor for whose sake they were more ready to hazard their possessions lives, and fortunes.

Less intent upon being feared than beloved, his study was to make his greatness appear only where it was useful and beneficial, and to extinguish all other sentiments, but those which show from gratitude and affection. He was industrious to do good upon all occasions, to confer his favours with judgment and in season, and to shew, that he thought himself rich, powerful, and happy, only as he made other's sensible of his being so by his benovelence and liberality. But he took care not to exhaust the means by an imprudent profusion. He did not * lavish, but distribute, his favours. He chose rather to make his liberalities the rewards of merit, than mere donations; and that they should be subservient in promoting virtue, and not in supporting the soft and abject sloth of vice.

He was particularly pleafed with conferring his favours upon valiant men; and governments and rewards were only beflowed on those who had distinguished themselves by their actions. He never granted any honour or dignity to favour, intrigue, or faction, but to merit only; upon which depends not only the glory but the prosperity of governments. By these means he soon made virtue estimable, and the pursuit of men, and rendered vice contemptible and horrid. The provinces, animated with a noble emulation to deferve, furnished him in a very short time with a considerable number of excellent subjects of every kind, who under a different government would have remained unknown, obscure, and useless.

* Habebit sinum saeslem non persoratum : ex quo ulta exeant, nihil excidat. Senec. de vit. beat. c. 23.

Never did any one know how to oblige with a better grace, or to win the hearts of those who could serve him with more engaging behaviour. As he was fully fentible that he flood in need of the assistance of others for the execution of his defigns, he thought justice and gratitude required that he should render his adherents all the fervices in his power. All the presents made him, whether of splendid arms, or rich apparel, be distributed among his friends, according to their feveral tastes or occasions: and used to say, that the brightest ornament and most exalted riches of a prince, consisted in adorning and inriching those who served him well. In effect, fays Xenophon, to do good to one's friends, and to excel them in liberality, does not feem fo admirable in fo high a fortune; but to transcend them in goodness of heart and sentiments of friendship and affection, and to take more pleasure in conferring than receiving obligations: in this I find Cyrus truly worthy of esteem and admiration. The first of these advantages he derives from his rank; the other from himself, and his intrinsic merit.

By these extraordinary qualities he acquired the universal esteem and affection as well of the Greeks as Barbarians. A great proof of what Xenophon here says, is, that none ever quitted the service of Cyrus for the king's; whereas great numbers went over every day to him from the king's party after the war was declared, and even of such as had most credit at the court; because they were all convinced that Cyrus knew best how to distinguish and reward their services.

It is most certain that young Cyrus did not want great virtues, and a superior merit; but I am surprised that Xenophon, in drawing his character, has described only the most beautiful seatures, and such as are proper to excite our admiration of him, without saying the least word of his desects, and especially of that immoderate ambition that was the soul of all his actions, and which at length put arms into his hands againft his elder brother and king. Is it allowable in an historian, whose chief duty it is to paint virtue and vice in their proper colours, to relate at large an enterprise of such a nature, without intimating the least dislike or imputation against it? But with the Pagans, ambition was so far from being considered as a vice, that it often passed for a virtue.

Gin

SECTION IV.

The KING is for compelling the GREEKSto deliver up their ARMS.

THE Greeks 1, having learned, the day after the battle, that Cyrus was dead, fent deputies to Ariaeus, the general of the Barbarians, who had retired with his troops to the place from whence they had marched the day before the action, to offer him, as victors, the crown of Persia in the room of Cyrus. At the same time arrived Persian heralds at arms from the king. to fummon them to deliver up their arms; to whom they anfwered with an haughty air, that they talked a strange language to conquerors; that if the king would have their arms, he might come and take them if he could; but that they would die before they would part with them: That if he would receive them into the number of his allies, they would ferve him with fidelity and valour; * but if he imagined to reduce them into flavery as conquered, he might know they had wherewithal to defend themselves, and were determined to lose their lives and liberty together. The heralds added, that they had orders to tell them, that if they continued in the place where they were, they would be allowed a fuspenfion of arms; but if they advanced or retired, that they would be treated as enemies. The Greeks agreed, and were asked by the heralds what answer they should report. Peace in continuing here, or war in marching, replied Clearchus, without explaining himfelf further; from the view of keeping the king always in fufpenfe and uncertainty.

<sup>1</sup> Xenoph. in exped. Cyr. l. ii. p. 272-292. Diod. l. xiv. p. 255-257.

* Sin ut victis fervitium indiceretur, esse sibi ferrum et juventutem, et promptura. Ebertati aut ad mortem animum. Tacit, annal. l. iv. c. 46.

The answer of Ariaeus to the Grecian deputies was, that there were many Persians more considerable than himself, who would not suffer him upon the throne, and that he should fet out early the next day to return into Ionia; that if they would march thither with him, they might join him in the night. Clearchus, with the advice of the officers, prepared to depart. He commanded from thenceforth, as being the sole person of sufficient capacity; for he had not been actually elected general in chief.

The same night, Milthocytes the Thracian, who commanded forty horse, and about three hundred foot of his own country, went and surrendered himself to the king; the rest of the Greeks began their march under the conduct of Clearchus, and arrived about midnight at the camp of Ariaeus. After they had drawn up in battle, the principal officers went to wait on him in his tent, where they swore alliance with him; and the Barbarian engaged to conduct the army without fraud. In confirmation of the treaty, they sacrificed a wolf, a ram, a boar, and a bull; the Greeks dipped their swords, and the Barbarians the points of their javelins, in the blood of the victims.

Ariaeus did not think it proper to return by the fame rout they came; because, having found nothing for their subfishence the last seventeen days of their march, they must have suffered much more had they taken the same way back again. He therefore took another; exhorting them only to make long marches at first, in order to evade the king's pursuit; which they could not effect. Towards the evening, when they were not far from some villages where they proposed to halt, the fcouts came in with advice, that they had feen feveral equipages and convoys, which made it reasonable to judge that the enemy were not far off: upon which they stood their ground, and waited their coming up; and the next day, before fun-rifing, drew up in the fame order as in the preceding battle. So bold an appearance terrified the king, who fent heralds, not to demand, as before, the furrender of their arms. but to propose peace and a treaty. Clearchus, who was informed of their arrival, while he was bufy in drawing up his troops, gave orders to bid them wait, and to tell them that he was not yet at leifure to hear them. He affumed purpofely an air of haughtiness and grandeur, to denote his intrepidity, and at the same time to shew the sine appearance and good condition of his phalanx. When he advanced with the most shewy of his officers, expressly chosen for the occasion, and had heard what the heralds had to propose; he made answer, that they must begin with giving battle, because the army, being in want of provisions, had no time to lose. The heralds having carried back this answer to their master, returned immediately; which shewed, that the king, or whoever spoke in his name, was not very distant. They said they had orders to conduct them to villages, where they would find provisions in abundance, and conducted them thither accordingly.

The army staid there three days, during which Tissaphernes arrived from the king, with the queen's brother and three other Persian grandees, attended by a great number of officers and domestics. After having faluted the generals, who advanced to receive him, he told them by his interpreter, that being a neighbour of Greece, and feeing them engaged in dangers, out of which it would be difficult to extricate themselves, he had used his good offices with the king, to obtain permiffion to re-conduct them into their own country; being convinced, that neither themselves nor their cities would ever be unmindful of that favour: That the king, without having declared himself positively upon that head, had commanded him to come to them, to know for what cause they had taken arms against him; and he advised them to make the king such an answer as might not give any offence, and might enable him to do them fervice. " We call the gods to witness," replied Clearchus, " that we did not list ourselves to make war " with the king, or to march against him. Cyrus, conceal-" ing his true motives under different pretexts, brought us " almost hither without explaining himself, the better to sur-" prife you. And when we faw him furrounded with dan-" gers, we thought it infamous to abandon him, after the favours we had received from him. But as he is dead, we " are released from our engagement, and neither defire to " contest the crown with Artaxerxes, nor to ravage his coun-" try, provided be does not oppose our return. However, " if we are attacked, we shall endeavour, with the assistance " of the gods, to make a good defence; and shall not be un-" grateful in regard to those who render us any service." Tiffaphernes replied, that he would let the king know what they faid, and return with his answer. But his not coming the next day gave the Greeks fome anxiety: He however arrived on the third, and told them, that after much contraverfy, he had at length obtained the king's grace for them: For, that it had been represented to the king, that he ought not to fuffer people to return with impunity into their country, who had been fo infolent as to come thither to make war upon him. " In fine," faid he, " you may now affure your-" felves of not finding any obstacle to your return, and of " being supplied with provisions, or suffered to buy them; " and you may judge that you are to pass without commit-" ting any diforders in your march, and that you are to take " only what is necessary, provided you are not furnished " with it." These conditions were sworn to on both sides. Tiffaphernes and the queen's brother gave their hands to the colonels and captains, in token of amity. After which Tiffaphernes withdrew, to dispose his affairs; promising to return as foon as they would admit, in order to go back with them into his government.

The Greeks waited for him above twenty days, continuing encamped near Ariaeus, who received frequent visits from his brothers and other relations, as did the officers of his army from the Persians of the different party; who assured them from the king of an entire oblivion of the past; so that the friendship of Ariaeus for the Greeks appeared to cool every day more and more. This change gave them cause of uneasiness. Several of the officers went to Clearchus and the other generals, and said to them, "What do we here any longer?" Are we not sensible that the king desires to see us all persish, that others may be terrified by our example? Persish, that others may be terrified by our example?

" haps he keeps us waiting here, till he re-affembles his dif-" perfed troops, or fends to feize the passes in our way; for "he will never fuffer us to return into Greece, to divulge "our own glory and his shame." Clearchus made answer to this discourse, That to depart without consulting the king, was to break with him, and to declare war by violating the treaty: that they should remain without a conductor in a country where nobody would fupply them with provisions; that Ariaeus would abandon them; and that even their friends would become their enemies; that he did not know, but there might be other rivers to pass; and that, though the Euphrates were the only one, they could not get over it, were the paffage ever fo little disputed: That if it were necessary to come to a battle, they should find themselves without cavalry against an enemy, that had a very numerous and excellent body of horse; so that if they gained the victory, they could make no great advantage of it, and if they were overcome, they were utterly and irretrievably loft. "Besides, why should the "king who has fo many other means to destroy us, engage " his word only to violate it, and thereby render himself exe-" crable in the fight of gods and men !"

Tissaphernes however arrived with his troops, in order to return into his government; and they set forward all together under the conduct of that satrap, who supplied them with provisions. Ariaeus, with his troops, encamped with the Barbarians, and the Greeks separately at some distance, which, kept up a continual distrust amongst them. Besides which there happened frequent quarrels for wood or forage, that augmented their aversion for each other. After three days march, they arrived at the wall of Media, which is an hundred feet high, twenty broad, and twenty leagues * in extent, all built of bricks, cemented with bitumen, like the walls of Babylon, from which it was not very distant at one of its extremities. When they had passed it, they marched eight leagues in two days, and came to the river Tygris, after having crossed two of its canals, cut expressly for watering the country.

* Twenty Parasangas.

They then passed the *Tygris upon a bridge of twenty-seven boats near Sitacum, a very great and populous city. After four days march they arrived at another city very powerful also, called Opis. They sound there a bastard brother of Artaxerxes with a very considerable body of troops, which he was bringing from Susa and Ecbatana to his aid. He admired the fine order of the Greeks. From thence, having passed the deserts of Media, they came, after a march of six days, to a place called the lands of Parysatis; the revenues of which appertained to that princess. Tissaphernes, to insult the memory of her son Cyrus, so dearly beloved by her, gave the villages to be plundered by the Greeks. Continuing their march through the desert on the side of the Tygris, which they had on their left, they arrived at Caenae, a very great and rich city, and from thence at the river Zabates.

The occasions of distrust increased every day between the Greeks ond Barbarians. Clearchus thought it incumbent on him to come to an explanation once for all with Tiffaphernes. He began with observing upon the facred and inviolable nature of the treaties subsisting between them. "Can a man," faid he, " confcious of the guilt of perjury, be capable of " living at ease? How would he shun the wrath of the " gods, the witnesses of treaties, and escape their vengeance, " whose power is universal?" He added afterwards many things to prove, that the Greeks were obliged by their own interest to continue faithful to him, and that, by renouncing his alliance, they must first inevitably renounce not only all religion, but reason and common sense. Tissaphernes seemed to relish this discourse, and spoke to him with all the appearance of the most perfect fincerity; infinuating at the same time, that some person had done him bad offices with him. " If you will bring your offices hither," faid he, " I will shew " you those, who have wronged you in their representations."

* The march of the Greeks and the reft of the army, from the day after the battle till the paffing of the Tygris, abounds in the text of Xenophon with very great obfcurities, to explain which fully, requires a long differtation. My plan does not admit me to enter into such discussions, which I must therefore refer to those who are more able than me.

He kept him to supper, and professed more friendship for him than ever.

The next day, Clearchus proposed in the assembly, to go with the feveral commanders of the troops to Tiffaphernes. He fuspected Menon in particular, whom he knew to have had a fecret conference with the fatrap in the presence of Ariaeus; besides which, they had already differed several times with each other. Some objected, That it was not proper that all the generals should go to Tissaphernes, and that it did not confift with prudence to rely implicitly upon the professions of a Barbarian. But Clearchus continued to insist upon what he had moved, till it was agreed, that the four other commanders, with twenty captains, and about two hundred foldiers, under the pretext of buying provisions in the Persian camp, where there was a market, should be fent along with him. When they came to the tent of Tiffaphernes, the five commanders, Clearchus, Monon, Proxenes, Agias and Socrates, were fuffered to enter; but the captains remained without at the door. Immediately, on a certain fignal before agreed on, those within were feized, and the others put to the fword. Some Persian horse afterwards scoured the country, and killed all the Greeks they met, whether freemen or flaves. Clearchus, with the other generals, was fent to the king, who ordered their heads to be firuck off. Xenophon describes with sufficient extent the characters of those officers.

Clearchus was valiant, bold, intrepid, and of a capacity for forming great enterprifes. His courage was not rash, but directed by prudence, and he retained all the coolness of his temper and presence of mind in the midst of the greatest dangers. He loved the troops, and let them want for nothing. He knew how to make them obey him; but out of fear. His mien was awful and severe; his language rough; his punishments instant and rigorous: He gave way sometimes to passion, but presently came to himself, and always chastised with justice. His great maxim was, that nothing could be done in an army without a severe discipline; and from him came the saying, that a foldier ought to fear his general more than the enemy. The troops *efteemed his valour, and did justice to his merit; but they were afraid of his humour, and did not love to ferve under him. In a word, fays Xenophon, the foldiers feared him as fcholars do a fevere pedagogue. We may fay of him with Tacitus, that by an excess of feverity, he made what had otherwise been well done by him, unamiable; " 2 Cupidine feveritatis, in his etiam quae rite faceret, acer- bus."

Proxenes was of Boeotia. From his infancy he aspired at great things, and was industrious to make himself capable of them. He spared no means for the attainment of instruction, and was the disciple of Gorgias the Leontine, a celebrated rhetorician, who fold his lectures at a very high price. When he found himself capable of commanding, and of doing good to his friends, as well as of being ferved by them, he entered into Cyrus's fervice with the view of advancing himself. He did not want ambition, but would take no other path to glory than that of virtue. He had been a perfect captain, had he had to do with none but brave and disciplined men, and it had been only necessary to be beloved. He was more apprehensive of being in his soldiers displeasure than his soldiers in his. He thought it sufficient for a commander to praise good actions, without punishing bad ones; for which reason, he was beloved by the worthy; but those of a different character abused his facility. He died at thirty years of age.

† Could the two great persons we have here drawn, after Xenophon, have been moulded into one, something persect might have been made of them; retrenching their several defects, and retaining only their virtues: But it rarely happens, that the same man, † as Tacitus says of Agricola, behaves, aca Tacit. Annal. c. lxxv.

* Manebat admiratio viri et fama; sed oderunt. Tacit hist. 1. ii. c. 68.

† Egregium principatus temperamentum, fi, demptis utriufque vitiis, folae tutes miscerentur. Tacit. histor. l. ii. e. 5.

† Pro variis temporibus ac negotiis severus et comis—nec illi, quod est rariffimum, aut facilitas auctoritatem, aut severitas amorem, deminuit. Tacit. in Agric. c. ix.

tording to the exigency of times and circumflances, fometimes with gentlenefs, and fometimes with feverity, without leffening his authority by the former, or the people's affection by the latter.

Menon was a Theffalian, avaritious and ambitious, but ambitious only from the motive of avarice, purfuing honour and estimation for the mere lucre of money. He courted the friendship of the great, and of persons in authority, that he might have it in his power to commit injustice and oppression. with impunity. To obtain his ends, all means with him were virtue; falsehood, fraud, perjury; whilst fincerity and integrity of heart, stood in his scheme for weakness and stupidity. He loved nobody; and if he professed friendship, it was only to deceive. As others made their glory confift in religion, probity and honour, he valued himfelf upon injuffice, deceit, and treachery. He gained the favour of the great by false reports, whispering and calumny; and that of the foldiery by licence and impunity. In fine, he endeavoured to render himself terrible by the mischief it was in his power to do, and imagined he favoured those to whom he did none.

It was in my thoughts to have retrenched these characters, which interrupt the thread of the history. But as they are a lively image of the manners of men, which in all times are the same, I thought retaining them would neither be useless nor disagreeable to the reader.

SECTION V.

RETREAT of the TEN THOUSAND GREEKS from the PROVINCE of BABYLON to TREBISOND.

The generals of the Greeks having been feized, and the officers who attended them maffacred, the troops were in the highest consternation. They were five or fix hundred leagues from Greece, furrounded with great rivers and enemy nations, without any supplies of provisions. In this state of general dejection, they could not think of taking either nourishment or repose. In the middle of the night, Xenophon, a young b Xenoph. in exped. Cyr. l. iii. et iv.

Athenian, but of prudence and capacity superior to his years, went to fome of the officers, and reprefented to them, that they had no time to lose; that it was of the last importance to prevent the bad defigns of the enemy; that, however small their number, they would render themselves formidable, if they behaved with boldness and resolution; that valour and not multitude determines the fuccess of arms; and that it was necessary above all things to nominate generals immediately; because an army without commanders is like a body without a foul. A council was immediately held, at which an hundred officers were prefent, and Xenophon being defired to fpeak, deduced the reasons at large he had at first but lightly touched upon; and upon his advice commanders were appointed. They were, Timasion for Clearchus, Xanthicles for Socrates, Cleanor for Agias, Philefius for Menon, and Xenophon for Provenes.

Before the break of day, they affembled the army. The generals made speeches to animate the troops, and Xenophon amongst the rest. " Fellow soldiers," faid he, " the loss of " fo many brave men by vile treachery, and the being aban-" doned by our friends, is very deplorable: But we must not " fink under our misfortunes; and if we cannot conquer, let " us choose rather to perish gloriously, than to fall into the " hands of Barbarians, who would inflict upon us the greatest " miscries. Let us call to mind the glorious battles of Pla-" taca, Thermopylae, Salamin, and the many others wherein " our ancestors, though with a small number, have fought and " defeated the innumerable armies of the Persians, and there-" by rendered the name alone of Greek for ever formidable. " It is to their invincible valour we owe the honour we poffefs. " of acknowledging no mafters upon earth but the gods, nor " any happiness but what consists with liberty. Those gods, " the avengers of perjury, and witnesses of the enemy's trea-" fon, will be favourable to us; and as they are attacked in the " violation of treaties, and take pleafure in humbling the proud " and exalting the low, they will also follow us to battle, and combat for us. For the rest, fellow soldiers, as we have no

" refuge but in victory, which must be our hope, and will make us ample amends for whatever it costs to attain it; I should believe, if it were your opinion, that for the making a more ready and less difficult retreat, it would be very proper to rid ourselves of all the useless baggage, and to keep only what is absolutely necessary in our march." All the soldiers that moment listed up their hands, to signify their approbation and consent to all that had been said, and without loss of time set fire to their tents and carriages; such of them as had too much equipage giving it to others who had too little, and destroying the rest.

It was resolved to march the army without tumult or violence, if their return was not opposed; but otherwise to open themselves a passage sword in hand through the enemy. They began their march in the form of a great hollow square with the baggage in the center. Chirifophus the Lacedaemonian had the vanguard; two of the oldest captains the right and left; and Timasion with Xenephon were posted in the rear, as the youngest officers. The first day was rude; because, having neither horse nor slingers, they were extremely harassed by a detachment fent against them: But they provided against that inconvenience by following Xenophon's advice. They chofe two hundred men out of the Rhodians in the army, whom they armed with flings, and augmented their pay for their encouragement. They could throw as far again as the Perfians, because they discharged balls of lead, and the others made use of large flints. They mounted also a squadron of fifty men upon the horses intended for the baggage, and supplied their places with other beafts of burden. By the means of this fupply, a fecond detachment of the enemy were very feverely handled.

After fome days march, Tiffaphernes appeared with all his forces. He contented himself with harasting the Greeks, who moved on continually. The latter observing the difficulty of retreating in an hollow square in the face of the enemy, from the unevenness of ground, hedges, and other obstacles, which might oblige them to break it, changed their order of battle, and marched in two columns, with the little baggage they had in the space between them. They formed a body of reserve of fix hundred chosen men, whom they divided into fix companies, and sub-divided by fifties and tens, to facilitate their motions according to occasion. When the columns came close to each other, they either remained in the rear; or filed off upon the slanks on both sides, to avoid disorder; and when they opened, they fell into the void space in the rear between the two columns. Upon any occasion of attack, thay immediately ran where it was necessary. The Greeks stood several charges; but they were neither considerable, nor attended with much loss.

They arrived at the river Tygris. As its depth would not admit them to repais it without boats, they were obliged to crofs the Carducian mountains; because there was no other way, and the prisoners reported, that from thence they would enter Armenia, where they might pass the Tygris at its source, and afterwards the Euphrates, not very distant from it, To gain those defiles before the enemy could seize them, it was thought proper to fet forwards in the night, in order to arrive at the foot of the mountains by the break of day; which was done accordingly. Chirisophus continued at the head of the advanced guard, with the troops armed with missive weapons, befides his ordinary corps; and Xenophon in the rear, with only the heavy-armed foldiers, because at that time there was nothing to fear on that fide. The inhabitants of the country had taken possession of several of the heights, from whence it was necessary to drive them, which could not be done without great danger and difficulty.

The officers having held a council of war, were of opinion, that it was proper to leave behind them all the beafts of burden not abfolutely necessary, with all the flaves lately taken; because both the one and the other would retard their march too much in the great defiles they had to pass; besides which, it required a greater quantity of provisions to support them, and those who had the care of the beasts were useless in fight. That regulation was executed without delay; and they continued their march, fometimes fighting, and fometimes halting. The passing of the monntains, which took up seven days, fatigued the troops exceedingly, and occasioned some loss; but at length they arrived at villages, where they found provisions in abundance, and rested some days, to recover the severe fatigues the army had suffered; in comparison with which all they had undergone in Persia was trivial.

Volume IV:

They found themselves soon after exposed to new danger. Almost at the foot of the mountains, they came to a river, two hundred feet in breadth, called Centrites, which stopped their march. They had to defend themselves against the enemy, who pursued them in the rear, and the Armenians, the soldiers of the country, who defended the opposite side of the river. They attempted in vain to pass it in a place where the water came up to their arm-pits, and were carried away by the rapidity of the current, against which the weight of their arms made them unable to resist. By good fortune they discovered another place not so deep, where the soldiers had seen the people of the country pass. It required abundance of address, diligence, and valour, to keep off the enemy on both sides of them. The army however passed the river at length without much loss.

They marched afterwards with lefs interruption; passed the fource of the Tygris, and arrived at the little river Teleboa, which is very beautiful, and has many villages on its banks. Here began the western Armenia, which was governed by Tiribasus, a fatrap much beloved by the king, and had the honour to help him to * mount on horseback when at the court: He offered to let the army pass, and to suffer the foldiers to take all they wanted, upon condition, that they should commit no ravages in their march; which proposal was accepted and ratified on each side. Tiribasus kept always a stying camp at a small distance from the army. There sell a great quantity of show, which gave the troops some inconvenience; and they learned from a prisoner, that Tiribasus had a design to attack the Greeks at a pass of the mountains, in a defile through which they must necessarily march. They prevented him by seizing that post, after having put the enemy to slight. After some days march through deserts, they passed the Euphrates near its source, not having the water above their middles.

The French translator of Xenophon fays, "He held the king's ftirrup when he got on horfeback," without confidering, that the ancients used none.

They fuffered exceedingly afterwards from a north wind, which blew in their faces, and prevented respiration; so that it was thought necessary to sacrifice to the wind, upon which it seemed to abate. They marched on in show five or six seet deep, which killed several servants and beasts of burden, besides thirty soldiers. They made fires during the night, for they found plenty of wood. All the next day, they continued their march through the snow; when many of them, from the excess of hunger, sollowed with languor or fainting, continued lying upon the ground, through weakness and want of spirits. When something had been given them to eat, they sound themselves relieved, and continued their march.

They enemy still pursued them; of whom many, overtaken by the night, remained on the way without fire or provisions, fo that feveral died of their hardships, and the enemy who followed them took some baggage. Some foldiers were also left behind, that had loft their fight, and others their toes, by the fnow. Against the first evil it was good to wear fomething black before the eyes; and against the other, to keep the legs always in motion, and to bare the feet at night. Arriving in a more commodious place, they dispersed themselves into the neighbouring villages, to recover and repofe after their fatigues. The houses were built under-ground, with an opening at top, like a well, through which the descent was by a ladder; but there was another entrance for cattle. They found there, sheep, cows, goats, poultry; with wheat, barley, and pulse; and for drink, there was beer, which was very strong, when not mingled with water, but was agreeable to those who were used to it. They drank this with a reed out of the veffels that held the beer, upon which they faw the barley fwim. The mafter of the house where Xenophon lay, received him very kindly, and even shewed him where he had concealed some wine; befides which he made him a present of several horses. He taught him also to fasten a kind of hurdles to their seet, and to do the same to the other beasts of burden, to prevent their sinking in the snow; without which they would have been up to the girth in it at every step. The army, after having rested seven days in these villages, resumed their rout.

After a march of feven days, they arrived at the river Araxes, called also the Phasus, which is about an hundred feet in breadth. Two days after, they discovered the Phasus, the C at bes, and the Taochians, who kept the pass of the mountains, to prevent their descending into the plain. They saw it was impossible to avoid coming to a battle with them, and resolved to give it the same day. Xenophon, who had observed that the enemy desended only the ordinary passage, and that the mountain was three leagues in extent, proposed the fending of a detachment to take possession of the heights that commanded the enemy; which would not be difficult, as they might prevent all suspicion of their design by a march in the night, and by making a false attack by the main road, to amuse the Barbarians. This was accordingly executed, the enemy put to slight, and the pass cleared.

They crossed the country of the Chalybes, who are the most valiant of all the Barbarians in those parts. When they killed an enemy, they cut off his head, and carried it about in triumph, finging and dancing. They kept themselves close shut up in their cities; and when the army marched, fell fuddenly upon the rear, after having carried every thing of value in the country into places of fafety. After twelve or fifteen days march, they arrived at a very high mountain, called Tecqua, from whence they descried the sea. The first, who perceived it, raised great shouts of joy for a considerable time; which made Xenophon imagine, that the van-guard was attacked, and go up with all hafte to support it. As he approached nearer, the cry of " the fea! the fea!" was heard distinctly, and the alarm changed into joy and gaiety; and when they came to the top, nothing was heard but a confused noise of the whole army, crying out together, "the fea! the fea!" whilst they could not refrain from tears, nor from embracing their generals and officers. And then, without waiting for orders, they heaped up a pile of flones, and erected a trophy with broken bucklers and other arms.

From thence they advanced to the mountains of Colchis, one of which was higher than the rest; and of that the people of the country had possessed themselves. The Greeks drew up in battle at the bottom of it to ascend, for the access was not impracticable. Xenophon did not judge it proper to march in line of battle, but by files; because the foldiers could not keep their ranks, from the inequality of the ground, that in fome places was eafy, and in others difficult to climb, which might discourage them. That advice was approved, and the army formed according to it. The heavy-armed troops amounted to fourfcore files, each confifting of about an hundred men, with eighteen hundred light-armed foldiers, divided in three bodies, one of which was posted on the right, another on the left, and a third in the centre. After having encouraged his troops, by representing to them, that this was the last obstacle they had to furmount, and implored the affiftance of the gods, the army began to ascend the hill. The enemy were not able to support their charge, and dispersed. They passed the mountain, and incamped in villages, where they found provisions in abundance.

A very firange accident happened there to the army, which put them into great confernation. For the foldiers finding abundance of bee-hives in that place, and eating the honey, they were taken with violent vomitings and fluxes, attended with raving fits; fo that those who were least ill, feemed like drunken men, and the rest, either furiously mad, or dying The earth was strewed with their bodies as after a defeat; however, none of them died, and the distemper ceased the next day about the same hour it had taken them. The third or fourth day the soldiers got up, but in the condition people are after having taken a violent medicine.

Two days after, the army arrived near Trebifond, a Greek colony of Sinopians, fituated upon the Euxine or Black fea, in the province of Colchis. Here they lay encamped for thirty days, and acquitted themselves of the vows they had made to Jupiter, Hercules, and the other deities, to obtain an happy return into their own country. They also celebrated the games of the horse and soot races, wrestling, boxing, the pancratium; the whole attended with the greatest joy and solemnity.

SECTION VI.

The GREEKS arrive upon the SEA COAST opposite to BYZANTIUM, XENOPHON joins THIMBRON.

AFTER having offered facrifices to the feveral divinities, and celebrated the games, they deliberated upon the proper meafures for their return into Greece c. They concluded upon going thither by fea; and for that purpose Chirisophus offered to go to Anaxibius, the admirat of Sparta, who was his friend, to obtain ships of him. He set out directly; and Xenophon regulated the order it was necessary to observe, and the precautions to be taken for the security of the camp, provisions, and forage. He believed it also proper to make sure of some vessels, besides those that were expected, and made some expeditions against the neighbouring people.

As Chirifophus did not return fo foon as was expected, and provisions began to be wanting, it was resolved to proceed by land; because there was not a sufficient number of ships to transport the whole army, and those which the precaution of Xenophon had procured, were allotted to carry the women, the old and sick men, with all the unnecessary baggage. The army continued its march, and lay ten days at * Cerasus, where there was a general review of the troops, who were sound to amount to eight thousand six hundred men, out of about ten thousand; the rest having died in the retreat, of their wounds, satigues, or discases.

In the fmall time the Greeks continued in these parts, seve-

c Xenoph l. iii.

The city of Cerafus became famous for the cherry-trees, which Lucullus first brought into Italy, and which from thence have been dispersed all over the western world.

ral divisions arose, as well with the inhabitants of the country as with some of the officers, who were jealous of Xenophon's authority, and endeavoured to render him odious to the army. But his wisdom and moderation put a stop to those disorders; having made the soldiers sensible that their safety depended upon preserving union and a good understanding amongst themselves, and obedience to their generals.

From Cerasus they went to Cotyora, which is not very remote from it. They there deliberated again upon the proper measures for their return. The inhabitants of the country represented the almost insuperable difficulties of going by land, from the desiles and rivers they had to pass, and offered to supply the Greeks with ships. This seemed the best expedient; and the army embarked accordingly. They arrived the next day at Sinope, a city of Paphlagonia, and a colony of the Milesians. Chirisophus repaired thither with gallies, but without money, though the troops expected to receive some. He affured them that the army should be paid, as soon as they were out of the Euxine sea; and that their retreat was universally celebrated, and the subject of the discourse and admiration of all Greece.

The foldiers, finding themselves near enough to Greece, defired to make fome booty before they arrived there, and with that view refolved to nominate a general with full authority; whereas, till then, all affairs were determined in the council of war by the plurality of voices. They cast their eyes upon Xenophon, and caused him to be defired to accept that office. He was not insensible of the honour of commanding in chief; but he forefaw the confequences, and defired time to confider. After having expressed the highest sense of gratitude for an offer fo much to his honour, he represented, that, to avoid jealoufy and division, the success of affairs, and the interest of the army, feemed to require that they should choose a Lacedaemonian for their general; the Spartan state at that time actually ruling Greece, and, in confideration of that choice, would be disposed to support them. This reason was not relished; and they objected to it, that they were far from intending a fervile dependence upon Sparta, or to submit to regulate their enterprises by the pleasure or dislike of that state; and pressed him again to accept the command. He was then obliged to explain himself sincerely, and without evasion; and declared, that having consulted the gods by facrifice, upon the offer they made him, they had manifested their will by evident signs, from whence it appeared that they did not approve their choice. It was surprising to see the impression which the sole mention of the gods made upon the soldiers, otherwise very warm and tenacious; and who besides are commonly little affected with the motives of religion. Their great ardour abated immediately; and, without making any reply, they proceeded to elect Chirisophus, though a Lacedaemonian, for their general.

His authority was of no long continuance. Difcord, as Xenophon had foreseen, arose amongst the troops, who were angry that their general prevented their plundering the Grecian cities, by which they passed. This disturbance was principally excited by the Peloponnelians, who composed one half of the army, and could not fee Xenophon an Athenian in authority without pain. Different measures were proposed; but nothing being concluded, the troops divided themselves into three bodies, of which the Achaians and Arcadians, that is, the Peloponnesians, were the principal, amounting to four thousand five hundred heavy armed foot, with Lycon and Callimachus for their generals. Chirifophus commanded another party of about fourteen hundred men, besides feven hundred light armed infantry. Xenophon had the third, almost the fame in number, of which three hundred were light armed foldiers, with about forty horse, which were all the cavalry of the army. The first having obtained ships from the people of Heraclea, to whom they had fent to demand them, fet out before the rest to make some booty, and made a descent in the port of Calpe. Chirifophus, who was fick, marched by land; but without quitting the coast. Xenophon landed at Heraclea, and entered into the heart of the country.

New divisions arose. The imprudence of the troops and their leaders had involved them in ill measures, not without loss; from whence the address of X'enophon extricated them more than once. Being all re-united again, after various fuccefs, they arrived by land at Chryfopolis in Caledonia, facing Byzantium, whither they repaired fome days after, having paffed the fmall arm of the fea which feparates the two continents. They were upon the point of plundering that rich and powerful city, to revenge a fraud and injury which had been done them, and from the hope of enriching themselves once for all; when Xenophon made all possible haste thither. Headmitted the justness of their revenge; but he made them senfible of the fatal confequences which would attend it. " Af-" ter your plundering this city, and destroying the Lacedae-" monians established in it, you will be deemed the mortal " enemies of their republic, and of all their allies. Athens, " my country, that had four hundred gallies at fea and in the " arfenals, when it took up arms against them, great sums of " money in its treasury, a revenue of a thousand talents, and " was in possession of all the isles of Greece, and of many cities in Europe and Asia, of which this was one, has never-" thelefs been reduced to yield to their power, and fubmit to " their fway. And do you hope, who are but an handful of " men, without generals, provisions, allies, or any resource, " either from Tiffaphernes, who has betrayed you, or the " king of Persia, whom you have attempted to dethrone; can " you hope, I fay, in fuch a condition, to make head against " the Lacedaemonians? Let us demand farisfaction from the " Byzantines, and not avenge their fault by a much greater " of our own, which must draw upon us inevitable ruin." He was believed, and the affair accommodated.

* A city of Pontus,

d From thence he led them to Salmydessa, to serve Senthes prince of Thrace, who had before solicited him by his envoys to bring troops to his aid, in order to his re-establishment in his father's dominions, of which his enemies had deprived him. He had made Xenophon great promises for himself and his troops; but when they had done him the service he wanted, he was so far from keeping his word, that he did not give them the pay agreed upon. Xenophon reproached him exceedingly with this breach of faith; imputing his perfidy to his minister Heraclides, who thought to make his court to his mafter, by faving him a fum of money, at the expence of juftice, faith, and honesty; qualities which ought to be dearer than all others to a prince, as they contribute the most to his reputation, as well as to the fuccess of affairs, and the security of a state. But that treacherous minister, who looked upon honour, probity, and justice, as mere chimeras, and that there was nothing real but the possession of much money, had no thoughts, in confequence, but of enriching himself by any means whatfoever, and robbed his mafter first with impunity, and all his subjects along with him. "However," continued Xenophon, " every wife man, especially in authority and com-" mand, ought to regard justice, probity, and the faith of " engagements, as the most precious treasure he can posses; " and as an affured resource, and an infallible support in all " the events that can happen." Heraclides was the more in the wrong for acting in this manner with regard to the troops, as he was a native of Greece and not a Thracian; but avarice had extinguished all fense of honour in him.

Menoph. I. vii.

Whilft the dispute between Seuthes and Xenophon was warmest, Charminus and Polynices arrived, as ambassadors from Lacedaemon, and brought advice, that the republic had declared war against Tiffaphernes and Pharnabasus; that Thimbron had already embarked with the troops, and promised a daric a month to every foldier, two to each officer, and four to the colonels, who should engage in the service. Xenophon accepted the offer; and having obtained from Seuthes, by the mediation of the ambaffadors, part of the pay due to him, he event by fea to Lampfacus with the army, which amounted at that time to almost fix thousand men. From thence he advanced to Pergamos, a city in the province of Troas. Having met near Parthenia, where ended the expedition of the Greeks, a great nobleman returning into Persia, he took him, his wife and children, with all his equipage, and by that means found himself in a condition to bestow great liberalities amongst the foldiers, and to make them a fatisfactory amends for all the loffes they had fuftained. Thimbron at length arrived, who took upon him the command of the troops, and having joined them with his own, marched against Tissaphernes and Pharnabasus.

*Such was the event of Cyrus's expedition. Xenophon reckons from the first setting out of that prince's army from the city of Ephesus to their arrival where the battle was fought, sive hundred and thirty parasangas or leagues, and sourscore and thirteen days march; and in their return from the place of battle to Cotyora, a city upon the coast of the Euxine or Black sea, six hundred and twenty parasangas or leagues, and an hundred and twenty days march. And adding both together, he says, the way, going and coming, was eleven hundred and sifty-sive parasangas or leagues, and two hundred and sifteen days march; and that the whole time the army took to perform that journey, including the days of rest, was sifteen months.

It appears by this calculation, that the army of Cyrus marched daily, one day with another, almost fix parasangas to leagues in going, and only five in their return. It was natural that Cyrus, who defired to surprise his brother, should use all possible diligence for that purpose.

- e Xenoph. de exped. Cyr. l. ii. p. 276,
- f Ibid. l. iii. p. 355. 8 Ibid. l. vii. p. 427.

* I add, five, which are left out in the text, to make the total agree with the two parts.

† The parafanga is a measure of the ways peculiar to the Persians, and confishs of three stadia. The stadium is the same with the Greeks, and contains, according to the most received opinion, one hundred and twenty-five geometrical paces; twenty of which in consequence are required to the common French league. And this has been my rule hitherto; according to which the parafanga is a league and a half.

I observe here a great difficulty. In this calculation, we find the ordinary days marches of Cyrus, with an army of more than an hundred thousand men, would have been one day with another nine leagues, during so long a time; which, according to the judges in military affairs, is absolutely impossible. This is what has determined me to compute the parasanga at no more than a league. Several authors have remarked, and indeed it is not to be doubted, that the stadium, and all the other measures of ways of the ancients, have differed widely according to times and places, as they fill do amongst us.

This retreat of the ten thousand Greeks has always passed amongst the judges in the art of war, as I have already observed, for a perfect model in its kind, and never had a parallel. Indeed no enterprise could be formed with more valour and bravery, nor conducted with more prudence, nor executed with more success. Ten thousand men, five or fix hundred leagues from their own country, who had loft their generals and best officers, and find themselves in the heart of the enemy's vast empire, undertake, in the fight of a victorious and numerous army, with the king at the head of them, to retire through the feat of his empire, and in a manner from the gates of his palace, and to traverse a vast extent of unknown countries, almost all in arms against them, without being difmayed by the prospect of the innumerable obstacles and dangers to which they were every moment exposed; passes of rivers, of mountains and defiles; open attacks; fecret ambufcades from the people upon their rout; famine almost inevitable in vaft and defert regions; and above all, the treachery they had to fear from the troops, who feemed to be employed in efcorting them, but in reality had orders to destroy them. For Artaxerxes, who was fenfible how much the return of those Greeks into their country would cover him with difgrace and decry the majesty of the empire in the sense of all nations, had left nothing undone to prevent it; and he defired their deftruction, fays Plutarch, more passionately than to conquer Cyrus himself, or to preserve the sovereignty of his estates. Those ten thousand men, however, notwithstanding so many obstacles, carried their point, and arrived, through a thousand dangers, victorious and triumphant, in their own country. b Anthony long after, when purfued by the Parthians almost in the same country, finding himfelf in like danger, cried out in admiration of their invincible valour, "Oh the retreat of the ten 66 thousand !!!

And it was the good fuccess of this famous retreat which filled the people of Greece with contempt for Artaxerxes, by demonstrating to them that gold, filver, luxury, voluptuousness, and a numerous feraglio of women, were the sole mea-

b Plut. in Anto. p. 937. Ω μύσια

rit of the grand monarch; but that as to the rest, his opulence and all his boasted power were only pride and vain ostentation. It was this prejudice, more universal than ever in Greece after this celebrated expedition, that gave birth to those bold enterprises of the Greeks, of which we shall soon treat, that made Artaxerxes tremble upon his throne, and brought the Persian empire to the very brink of destruction.

SECTION VII.

CONSEQUENCES of CIRUS'S DEATH. PARTSATIS'S CRUELTY.
STATIRA poisoned.

I RETURN to what passed after the battle of Cunaxa in the court of Artaxerxes 1. As he believed that he killed Cyrus with his own hand, and looked upon that action as the most glorious of his life, he defired that all the world should think the fame; and it was wounding him in the most tender part to dispute that honour, or endeavour to divide it with him, The Carian foldier, whom we mentioned before, not contented with the great presents the king had made him upon a different pretext, perpetually declared to all that would hear him, that none but himself had killed Cyrus, and that the king did him great injustice in depriving him of the glory due to him. The prince, upon being informed of that infolence, conceived a jealoufy equally bafe and cruel, and had the weakness to cause him to be delivered to Parysatis, who had sworn the destruction of all those that had any share in the death of her fon. Animated by her barbarous revenge, she commanded the executioners to take that unfortunate wretch, and to make him fuffer the most exquisite tortures during ten days; then, after they had torn out his eyes, to pour melted brafs into his ears, till he expired in that cruel mifery; which was accordingly executed.

Mithridates also having boasted in an entertainment where he had heated his brain with wine, that it was he gave Cyrus his mortal wound, paid very dear for that sottish and imprudent vanity. He was condemned to suffer the punishment of the * troughs, one of the most cruel that was ever invented; and after having languished in torment during seventeen days, died at last slowly, in exquisite misery.

I Plut. in Artax. p. 1018-1021.

There only remained, for the final execution of her project, and fully to fatiate her vengeance, the punishment of the king's eunuch Mesabates, who, by his master's order, had cut off the head and hand of Cyrus. But as there was nothing to take hold of in his conduct, Parysatis laid this snare for him. She was a woman of great address, had abundance of wit, and excelled in playing at a certain game with dice. After the war, she had been reconciled with the king; played often with him; was of all his parties; had an unbounded complaisance for him; and far from contradicting him in any thing, prevented his defires, did not blush at indulging his passions, and even at supplying him with the means of gratifying them. But she took a special care never to lose fight of him, and to leave Statira as little alone with him as she could, desiring to gain an absolute ascendant over her son.

One day feeing the king entirely unemployed, and with no thoughts but of diverting himself, she proposed playing at dice with him for a thousand daries +, to which he really confented. She fuffered him to win, and paid down the money. But affecting regret and vexation, she pressed him to begin again and to play with her for an eunuch. The king, who fuspected nothing, complied, and they agreed to except five of the favourite eunuchs on each fide, that the winner should take their choice out of the rest, and the loser be bound to deliver him. Having made these conditions, they fat down to play. The queen was all attention to the game, and made ufe of all her skill and address in it; besides which the dice favoured her. She won, and chose Mesabates; for he was not one of the excepted. As foon as the got him into her hands, before the king could have the least suspicion of the revenge the meditated, the delivered him to the executioners, and commanded them to flea him alive, to lay him afterwards upon three cross bars *, and to stretch his skin at large before his eyes upon two stakes prepared for that purpose; which was performed accordingly. When the king knew this, he was very forry for it, and violently angry with his mother. But without giving herself any further trouble about it, she told him with a smile, and in a jesting way, "Really you are a great "loser, and must be highly in the right, to be so much out of "humour for a decrepit wretch of an eunuch, when I, who "lost a thousand good daries, and paid them down upon the "spot, do not say a word, and am satisfied."

* See the description of this torture in the third volume of this history."

+ The daric was worth ten livres.

All these cruelties seem to have been only essays and preparations for a greater crime Parysatis meditated. She had retained at heart a violent hatred for queen Statira, which she had suffered to escape her upon many occasions. She perceived plainly, that her credit with the king her son was only the essect of his respect and consideration for her as his mother; whereas that for Statira was sounded in love and considence, the best security of credit with him. Of what is not the jealousy of an ambitious woman capable! She resolved to rid herself, whatever it cost her, of so formidable a rival.

For the more certain attainment of her ends, she feigned a reconciliation with her daughter-in-law, and treated her with all the exterior marks of fincere friendship and real confidence. The two queens, appearing therefore to have forgot their formfuspicions and differences, lived well together, saw one another as before, and eat at each other's apartments. But as both of them knew how much the friendships and caresses of the court were to be relied upon, especially amongst the women, they were neither of them deceived in the other; and the fame fears always fubfifting, they kept upon their guard, and never eat but of the same dishes and pieces. Could one believe it possible to deceive so attentive and cautious a vigilance? Paryfatis one day, when her daughter in law was at table with her, took an extremely exquifite bird, that had been ferved up, cut it in two parts, gave one half to Statira, and eat the other herfelf. Statira foon after was feized with sharp pains, and having quitted the table, died in the most horrible con-vulfions, not without inspiring the king with the most violent fuspicions of his mother, of whose cruelty and implacable and revengeful spirit he was sufficiently sensible before He made the strictest inquiry into the crime. All his mother's officers and domestic's were seized and put to the question; when Gygis, one of Parylatis's women and confidents, confessed the whole. She had caused one side of a knife to be rubbed with poison; so that Parysatis, having cut the bird in two, put the found part into her own mouth directly, and gave Statira the other that was poisoned. Gygis was put to death after the manner the Persians punished poisoners, which is thus: They lay their heads upon a great and very broad stone, and beat upon it with another till they are entirely crushed, and have no remains of their former figure. As for Parylatis, the king contented himself with confining her to Babylon, where she demanded to retire, and told her that he would never fet his foot within it whilst she was there.

* Plutarch explains this circumstance no farther,

CHAPTER III.

The principal contents of this chapter are, the enterprises of the Lacedaemonians in Asia Minor, their defeat at Cnidos, the re-establishment of the walls and power of Athens, the famous peace of Antalcides prescribed the Greeks by Artaxerxes Mnemon, the wars of that prince against Evagoras king of Cyprus, and the Cadusians. The persons, who are most conspicuous in this interval, are Lysander and Agesilaus on the side of the Lacedaemonians, and Conon on that of the Athenians.

SECTION I.

GRECIAN CITIES of IONIA implore AID of LACEDAEMON.

AGESILAUS elected KING. His CHARACTER.

THE cities of Ionia k, that had taken party with Cyrus, apprehending the resentment of Tissaphernes, had applied to the Lacedaemonians, as the deliverers of Greece, for their support in the possession of the liberty they enjoyed, and to prevent their country from being ravaged. We have already faid that Thimbron was fent thither, to whose troops Xenophon had joined his, after their return from Persia. <sup>1</sup> Thimbron was soon recalled upon some discontent, and had for his successor Dercyllidas, surnamed Sifyphus, from his industry in finding resources, and his capacity in inventing machines of war. He took upon him the command of the army at Ephesus. When he arrived there, he was apprised that there was a difference between the two satraps, who commanded in the country.

k Xenoph. hift. Graec. 1. iii. p. 479-487.

The provinces of the Persian monarchy, of which several, fituated at the extremity of the empire, required too much application to be governed immediately by the prince, were confided to the care of the great lords commonly called Satraps. They had each of them in their government an almost fovereign authority, and were, properly speaking, not unlike the viceroys we fee in our days in some neighbouring states. They were supplied with a number of troops sufficient for the defence of the country. They appointed all officers, disposed of the governments of cities, and were charged with levying and remitting the tributes to the prince. They had power to raife troops, to treat with neighbouring states, and even with the generals of the enemy; in a word, to do every thing necessary to the good order and tranquillity of their governments. They were independent of one another; and though they ferved the same master, and it was their duty to concur to the same ends, nevertheless each being more affected with the particular advantage of his own province than the general good of the empire, they often differed among themselves, formed opposite designs, resused aid to their colleagues in necessity, and fometimes even acted entirely against them. The remoteness of the court, and the absence of the prince, gave room for these diffentions; and perhaps a fecret policy contributed to keep them up, to clude or prevent conspiracies, which too good an underflanding amongst the governors might have excited.

Folume IV.

Dercyllidas having heard therefore that Tiffaphernes and Pharnabasus were at variance, made a truce with the former, that he might not have them both upon his hands at the same time, entered Pharnabasus's province, and advanced as far as Æolia.

Zenis the Dardanian had governed that province under the fatrap's authority; and as after his death it was to have been given to another, Mania his widow went to Pharnabafus with troops and prefents, and told him, that having been the wife of a man who had rendered him great fervices, she defired him not to deprive her of her husband's reward; that she should serve him with the same zeal and fidelity; and that if the failed in either, he was always at liberty to take her goverment from her. She was continued in it by this means, and acquitted herself with all the judgment and ability that could have been expected from the most consummate person in the arts of ruling. To the ordinary tributes which her hufband had paid, the added prefents of an extraordinary magnificence, and when Pharnabasus came into her province, she entertained him more splendidly than any of the other governors, She was not contented with the confervation of the cities committed to her care; the made new conquests, and took * Lariffa, Amaxita, and Colona.

Hence we may observe, that prudence, good sense, and courage, are of all sexes. She was present in all expeditions in a chariot, and in person decreed rewards and punishments. None of the neighbouring provinces had a finer army than her's, in which she had a great number of Greek soldiers in her pay. She even attended Pharnabasus in all his enterprises, and was of no common support to him. So that the satrap, who knew all the value of so extraordinary a merit, did more honour to this lady than to all the other governors. He even admitted her into his council, and treated her with such a distinction, as might have excited jealousy, if the modesty and affability of that lady had not prevented bad effects, by throwing in a manner a veil over all her persections, which softened their lustre, and let them only appear to be the objects of admiration.

* From the Lydians and Pifidians.

She had no enemies but in her own family. Midias her fon-in-law, flung with the reproach of fuffering a woman to command in his place, and abufing the entire confidence she reposed in him, which gave him access to her at all times, strangled her with her son. After her death, he seized two fortresses, wherein she had secured her treasures; the other cities declared against him. He did not long enjoy the fruits of his crime. Dercyllidas happily arrived at this juncture. All the fortresses of Æolia, either voluntarily or by force, surrendered to him; and Midias was deprived of the possessions he had so unjustly acquired. The Lacedaemonian general having granted Pharnabasus a truce, took up his winter quarters in Bithynia, to avoid being chargeable to his allies.

m The next year, being continued in the command, he marched into Thrace, and arrived at the Cherfonefus. He knew that the deputies of the country had been at Sparta to reprefent the necessity of fortifying the Ishmus with a good wall against the frequent incursions of the Barbarians, which prevented the cultivation of the lands. Having measured the space, which is more than a league in breadth, he distributed the work amongst the soldiers, and the wall was sinished in the antumn of the same year. Within this space were inclosed eleven cities, several ports, a great number of arable lands and plantations, with pasture of all kinds. The work being sinished, he returned into Asia, after having reviewed the cities, and found them all in good condition.

a Conon the Athenian, after losing the battle of Ægospotamos, having condemned himself to a voluntary banishment, continued in the isle of Cyprus with king Evagoras, not only for the fasety of his person, but in expectation of a change in affairs; like one, says Plutarch, who waits the return of the tide before he embarks. He had always in view the re-establishment of the Athenian power, to which his deseat had given a mortal wound; and full of sidelity and zeal for his country, though little savourable to him, perpetually meditat-m A. M. 3606. Ant. J. C. 358. Xenoph. p. 487, 488.

E ij

F Plut. in Artar, p. 1041.

ed the means to raise it from its ruins, and restore it to its ancient splendor.

The Athenian general, knowing the fuccess of his views. had occasion for a powerful support, wrote to Artaxerxes to explain his projects to him, and ordered the person who carried his letter to apply himself to Ctesias, who would give it to the king. It was accordingly delivered to that phylician, who, it is faid, though he did not approve the contents of it, added to what Conon had wrote, " that he defired the king " would fend Ctefias to him, being a perfon very capable of " his fervice, especially in maritime affairs." O Pharnabasus, in concert with Conon, was gone to court to complain against the conduct of Tissaphernes, as too much in favour of the Lacedaemonians. Upon the warm instances of Pharnabasus, the king ordered five hundred talents * to be paid him for the equipment of a fleet, with instructions to give Conon the command of it. He fent Ctefias into Greece, who, after having vifited Cnidos, his native country, went to Sparta.

P This Ctefias was at first in the fervice of Cyrus, whom he had followed in his expedition. He was taken prisoner in the battle wherein Gyrus was killed, and was made use of to dress the wounds Artaxerxes had received, of which he acquitted himself fo well, that the king retained him in his service, and made him his first physician. He passed several years in his fervice in that quality. Whilst he was there, the Greeks, upon all their occasions at the court, applied themselves to him; as Conon did on this. His long residence in Persia, and at the court, had given him the necessary time and means for his information in the history of the country, which he wrote in three-and-twenty books. The first contained the history of the Assyrians and Babylonians, from Ninus and Semiramis down to Cyrus. The other feventeen treated of the Perfian affairs, from the beginning of Cyrus's reign to the third year of the ninety-fifth Olympiad, which agrees with the three hundred and ninety-eighth before JESUS CHRIST. He wrote also an history of India. Phothius has given us several extracts of both these histories, which are all that remain of Ctesias. He often contradicts Herodotus, and differs sometimes also from Xenophon. He was in no great estimation with the ancients, who speak of him as of a very vain man, whose veracity is not to be relied on, and who has inserted fables, and sometimes even lies, in his history.

Diod. l. xiv. p. 267. Justin. l. iv. c. 1.

P Strab. I. xiv. p. 656. Plut. in Artax. p. 1014—1017—1020. Diod 1. xiv. p. 273. Arift. de hist. anim. I. viii, c. 28. Phot. Cod. lxii.

* Five hundred thousand crowns, or about L. 112,000 Sterling.

q Tissaphernes and Parnabasus, though secretly each other's enemies, had upon the king's orders united their troops, to oppose the enterprises of Dercyllidas, who had marched into Caria. They had reduced him to post himself so disadvantageously, that he must inevitably have perished, had they charged him immediately, without giving him time to look about him. Pharnabasus was of this opinion: But Tissaphernes apprehending the valour of the Greeks, who had been of Gyrus's army, which he had experienced, and to whom he conceived all others resembled, proposed an interview, which was accepted. Dercyllidas having demanded that the Grecian cities should continue free, and Tissaphernes, that the army and generals of Lacedaemon should retire; they made a truce, till the answers of their respective masters could be known.

r Whilst these things passed in Asia, the Lacedaemonians refolved to chastise the insolence of the people of Elis, who, not content with having entered into an alliance with their enemies in the Peloponnesian war, prevented their disputing the prizes in the Olympic games. Upon pretence of the non-payment of a fine by Sparta, they had insulted their citizens during the games, and hindered Agis from facrificing in the temple of Jupiter Olympius. That king was charged with this expedition, which did not terminate till the third year after. He could have taken their city Olympia, which had no works, but contented himself with plundering the suburbs, and the places for the exercises, which were very sine. They demanded peace, which was granted, and were suffered to retain the superintendency of the temple of Jupiter Olympius, to which they had not much right, but were more worthy of that honour than those who disputed it with him.

Eiij

&lt;sup>q</sup> A. M. 3607. Ant. J. C. 397. Xenoph. hift. Grace, L iii, p. 489, 490a Diod. L xiv. p. 267.

F Diod. l. xiv. p. 292.

s Agis in his return fell fick, and died upon arriving at Sparta. Almost divine honours were paid to his memory, and after the expiration of some days, according to the custom, Leotychides and Agesilaus, the one son, and the other brother of the deceased, disputed the crown. The latter maintained that his competitor was not the son of Agis, and supported his affertion by the confession of the queen herself, who knew best, and who had often, as well as her husband, acknowledged as much. In effect there was a current report that she had him by Alcibiades as has been related in its place, and that the Athenian general had corrupted her by a present of a * thousand daries. Agis protested the contrary at his death. Leotychides having thrown himself at his seet all bathed in his tears, he could not refuse the grace he implored of him, and owned him for his son before all that were present.

Most of the Spartans, charmed with the virtue and great merit of Agesilaus, and deeming it an extraordinary advantage to have a person for their king, who had been educated amongst them, and passed like them through all the rigour of the Spartan education, supported him with their whole power. An ancient oracle, that advised Sparta to beware of "a lame reign," was urged against him. Lysander only made a jest of it, and turned its sense against Leotychides himself; endeavouring to prove, that as a bastard, he was the lame king the oracle intended to caution them against. Agesilaus, as well by his own great qualities, as the powerful support of Lysander, carried it against his nephew, and was declared king.

As by the laws, the kingdom had devolved to Agis, his brother Agefilaus, who feemed to be defined to pass his life as a private person, was educated like other children in the Spartan discipline, which was a very rough manner of life, and full of laborious exercise, but * taught youth obedience persectly well. The law dispensed with this education only to such children as were designed for the throne. Agesilaus therefore had this in peculiar, that he did not arrive at commanding, till he had first learned persectly well how to obey. From thence it was, that of all the kings of Sparta he best knew how to make his subjects love and esteem him, † because that prince, to the great qualities with which nature had endowed him for commanding and the sovereignty, had united by his education the advantage of being humane and popular.

<sup>8</sup> Xenoph. I. iii. p. 493. Plut, in Lyf. p. 445. In Agefil. p. 597.

* Athen. L xii. p. 534.

One thousand pistoles.

It is furprifing that Sparta, a city fo renowned in point of education and policy, should conceive it proper to abate any thing of its severity and discipline in favour of the princes who were to reign; they having most need of being early habituated to the yoke of obedience, in order to their being the better qualified to command.

"Plutarch observes, that from his infancy Agesilaus was remarkable for uniting qualities in himself, which are generally incompatible; a vivacity of spirit, a vehemence, an invincible resolution in appearance, an ardent passion for being first and surpassing all others, with a gentleness, submission and docility, that complied at a single word, and made him infinitely sensible of the lightest reprimand; so that every thing might be obtained of him from the motives of honour, but nothing by fear or violence.

He was lame; but that defect was covered by the gracefulness of his person, and still more by the gaiety with which he supported and rallied it first himself. It may even be said, that the infirmity of his body set his valour and passion for glory in a stronger light; there being no labour nor enterprise, however difficult, that he would refuse upon account of that inconvenience.

u In Agefil. p. 596.

Hence it was, that the poet Simonides called Sparta, "the tamer of men," δαμασίμβροτο as that of the Grecian cities, which rendered its inhabitants by good habits the most active and vigorous, and at the same time the most obedient to the laws, of all mankind, ως μάλισια διάντου έδων τὸς πολύτας τοῦς κομοῦς παθομένες καλ χιμρόδευς ποιδέσων.

† To ซุบ์ชน ทำงานเทนที หลา Gaziling สอุธธสาทธณ์แยงตุ พัสธ์ รักร ผ่านาที่ร รวิ อีกแย่ราหอง หลา จังเลย วิทยารา

* Praise, without an air of truth and fincerity, was so far from giving him pleasure, that it offended him, and was never received by him as such, but when it came from the mouths of those, who upon other occasions had represented his failings to him with freedom. He would never suffer during his life that his picture should be drawn, and even in dying, expressly forbad any image to be made of him, either in colours or relievo. His reason was, that his great actions, if he had done any, would supply the place of monuments; without which, all the statues in the world would do him no manner of honour. We only know that he was of small stature, which the Spartans did not assect in their kings; and Theophrastus assirms, that the Ephori laid a sine upon their king Archidamus, the father of him we speak of, for having espoused a very little woman: "*For," said they, "she will give us puppets instead of kings."

It has been remarked, that Agefilaus, in his way of living with the Spartans, behaved better with regard to his enemies than his friends; for he never did the leaft wrong to the former, and often violated justice in favour of the latter. He would have been ashamed not to have honoured and rewarded his enemies, when their actions deserved it; and was not able to reprove his friends, when they committed faults. He would even support them when they were in the wrong and upon such occasions looked upon the zeal for justice as a vain pretence to cover the resulal of serving them. And in proof of this, a short letter is cited, written by him to a judge in recommendation of a friend. The words are: "If Nicias be not guilty, acquit him for his innocence; if he be, acquit him for my sake; but however it be, acquit him."

It is understanding the rights and privileges of friendship very ill, to be capable of rendering it in this manner the accomplice of crimes, and the protectress of bad actions. It is the fundamental law of friendship, says Cicero, never to ask of or grant any thing to friends, that does not consist with

x Plut. in moral. p. 55. y Ibid. p. 191. z Plut. in Agefil. p. 598.

<sup>2</sup> Plut, in Agefil. p. 603.

Où 7 de Cariteïs, seacar, anim, attà Gariteidia 7 máss.

justice and honour: " b Hace prima lex in amicitia fanciatur,
" nt neque rogemus res turpes, nec faciamus rogati."

Agefilaus was not so delicate in this point, at least in the beginning, and omitted no occasion of gratifying his friends, and even his enemies. By this officious and obliging conduct, supported by his extraordinary merit, he acquired great credit, and almost absolute power in the city, which ran so high as to render him suspected by his country. The Ephori, to prevent its effects, and give a check to his ambition, laid a fine upon him; alleging as their sole reason, * that he attached the hearts of the citizens to himself alone, which were the right of the republic, and ought not to be possessed but in common.

When he was declared king, he was put into possession of the whole estate of his brother Agis, of which Leotychides was deprived as a bastard. But seeing the relations of that prince, on the side of his mother Lampito, were all very poor, he divided the whole inheritance with them, and by that act of generosity acquired great reputation, and the good will of all the world, instead of the envy and hatred he might have drawn upon himself by the inheritance. These fort of facrisices are glorious, though rare, and can never be sufficiently esteemed.

Never was king of Sparta fo powerful as Agefilaus; and it was only, as Xenophon fays, by obeying his country in every thing, that he acquired fo great an authority; which feems a kind of paradox, thus explained by Plutarch. The greatest power was vested at that time in the Ephori and senate. The office of the Ephori subsisted only one year; they were inflituted to limit the too great power of the kings, and to serve as a barrier against it, as we have observed elsewhere. For this reason the kings of Sparta, from their establishment, had always retained a kind of hereditary aversion for them, and continually opposed their measures. Agestlaus took a quite contrary method. Instead of being perpetually at war with them, and clashing upon all occasions with their measures, he made it his business to cultivate their good opinion, treated them always with the utmost deference and regard, never entered upon the least enterprise without having first communicated it to them, and upon their fummons quitted every thing, and repaired to the senate with the utmost promptitude and refignation: Whenever he fat upon his throne to administer justice, if the Ephori entered, he never failed to rise up to do them hononr. By all these instances of respect, he seemed to add new dignity to their office, whilst in reality he augmented his own power without its being observed, and added to the fovereignty a grandeur the more folid and permanent, as it was the effect of the people's good will and esteem for him. The greatest of the Roman emperors, as Augustus, Trajan, and Marcus Antonius, were convinced, that the utmost a prince could do to honour and exalt the principal magistrates, was only adding to his own power, and strengthening his authority, which neither should nor can be founded in any thing but justice.

<sup>* &</sup>quot;Ore rods nouvous rodiaus, idious, natus.

De amicht, n. 40.

Such was Agefilaus, of whom much will be faid hereafter, and with whose character it was therefore necessary to begin.

SECTION II.

AGESILAUS goes to ASIA. LYSANDER falls out with bim.

Agestlaus had fearce afcended the throne ', when accounts came from Afia. that the king of Perfia was fitting out a great fleet with intent to deprive the Lacedaemonians of their empire at fea. Conon's letters, feconded by the remonstrances of Pharnabasus, who had in concert represented to Artaxerxes the power of Sparta as formidable, had made a strong impression upon that prince. From that time he had it feriously in his thoughts to humble that proud republic, by raising up its rival, and by that means re-establishing the ancient balance between them, which alone could assure his safety, by keeping them perpetually employed against each other, and thereby prevented from uniting their forces against him.

&lt;sup>c</sup> A. M. 3608. Ant. J. C. 396. Xenoph. hift. Grace. l. iii. p. 495, 496. Bold. de Agefil. p. 652. Plut. in Agefil. p. 598. In Lyfand. p. 446.

Lyfander, who defired to be fent into Afia, in order to reestablish his creatures and friends in the government of the cities, from which Sparta had removed them, ftrongly disposed Agefilaus to take upon himself the charge of the war, and to prevent the Barbarian king, by attacking him remote from Greece, before he should have finished his preparations. The republic having made this propofal to him, he could not refuse it, and charged himself with the expedition against Artaxerxes, upon condition that thirty Spartan captains should be granted him, to affift him and compose his council, with two thousand new citizens to be chosen out of the haelots who had been lately made freemen, and fix thousand troops of the allies, which was immediately refolved. Lyfander was placed at the head of the thirty Spartans, not only upon account of his great reputation, and the authority he had acquired, but for the particular friendship between him and Agesilaus, who was indebted to him for the throne, as well as the honour which had been lately conferred upon him, of being elected generaliffimo.

The glorious return of the Greeks who had followed Cyrus, and whom the whole power of Persia was not able to prevent from retreating into their own country, had inspired all Greece with a wonderful confidence in their forces, and a fupreme contempt for the Barbarians. In this disposition of the people, the Lacedaemonians conceived it would reproach them, to neglect fo favourable a conjuncture for delivering the Greeks in Asia from their subjection to those Barbarians, and for putting an end to the outrages and violences with which they were continually oppressing them. They had already attempted this by their generals Thimbron and Dercyllidas; but all their endeavours having hitherto proved ineffectual, they referred the conduct of this war to the care of Agefilans. He promised them either to conclude a glorious peace with the Persians, or to employ them so effectually as should leave them neither leifure nor inclination to carry the war into Greece. The king had great views, and thought of nothing less than attacking Artaxerxes in Persia itself.

When he arrived at Ephefus, Tiffaphernes fent to demand

what reason had induced his coming into Asia, and why he had taken up arms. He replied, that he came to aid the Greeks who inhabited there, and to re-establish them in their ancient liberty. d The fatrap, who was not yet prepared, preferred art to force, and affured him, that his mafter would give the Grecian cities of Asia their liberty, provided he committed no acts of hostility till the return of the couriers. Agefilaus agreed; and the truce was fworn on both fides. Tiffaphernes, who laid no great stress upon an oath, took the advantage of this delay to affemble troops on all fides. The Lacedaemonian general was apprifed of it, but however kept his word; being convinced, that in affairs of flate, the breach of faith can have but a very short and precarious success; whereas a reputation established upon inviolable fidelity in the observance of engagements, which the perfidy itself of other contracting parties has not power to alter, will establish a credit and confidence equally useful and glorious. In effect, Xenophon remarks, that this religious observation of treaties gained him the universal esteem and opinion of the cities; whilst the different conduct of Tissaphernes entirely lost him their favour.

Agefilaus made use of this interval in acquiring an exact knowledge of the state of the cities, and in making suitable regulations. He found great disorder every where, their government being neither democritical, as under the Athenians, nor aristocritical, as Lysander hast established it. The people of the country had no communication with Agefilaus, nor had ever known him; for which reason they made no court to him, conceiving that he had the title of general for form's sake only, and that the whole power was really vested in Lysander. As no governor had ever done so much good to his friends, or hurt to his enemies, it is not wonderful, that he was so much beloved by the one and seared by the other. All therefore were eager to pay their homage to him, were every day in crowds at his door, and made his train very numerous when he went abroad; whilft Agefilaus remained almost alone. Such a conduct could not fail of offending a general and king, extremely fensible and delicate in what regarded his authority; though otherwife not jealous of any one's merit, but on the contrary, much inclined to diftinguish it with his favour. He did not dissemble his disgust. He paid no regard to Lyfander's recommendations, and ceafed to employ him himself. Lyfander prefently perceived this alteration in regard to him. He discontinued his applications for his friends to the king, defired him not to visit them any more, nor attach themselves to him, but to address themfelves directly to the king, and to cultivate the favour of those who in the prefent times had power to ferve and advance their creatures. The greatest part of them gave over importuning him with their affairs; but did not cease to pay their court to him. On the contrary, they were only more affiduous than ever about his person, attended him in throngs when he took the air abroad, and regularly affifted at all his exercifes. Lyfander, naturally vain, and long accustomed to the homage and fubmission that attended absolute power, did not take sufficient care to remove the busy crowd from his person, that continually made their addresses to him with more application than ever.

d Xenoph. p. 496, et 652.

A. M. 3609. Ant. J. C. 395.

f Plut. in Agefil. p 599, 600. In Lyfand. p. 447.

This ridiculous affectation of authority and grandeur grew ftill more and more offensive to Agesilaus, and seemed as if intended to infult him. He referred it so highly, that having given the most considerable commands and best governments to private officers, he appointed Lysander commissary of the stores, and distributor of provisions; and afterwards, to insult and deride the Ionians, he told them, "that they might now "go and consult his master-butcher."

Lyfander thought it then incumbent upon bim to speak, and to come to an explanation with him. Their conversation was brief and laconic. "Gertainly, my lord," said Lyfander, "you very well know how to depress your friends." —"Yes, "when they would fet themselves above me; but when they are studious of my dignity, I know also how to let them

" fhare in it."-" But perhaps, my lord," replied Lyfander,

"I have been injured by false reports; and things I never did * have been imputed to me. I must beg therefore, if it be to only upon account of the strangers, who have all of them

"their eyes upon us, that you would give me an employment

"in your army, wherein you shall think me least capable of

" difpleafing, and most of serving you effectually."

The effect of this conversation was the lieutenancy of the Hellespont, which Agesilaus gave him. In this employment he retained all his resentment, without however neglecting any part of his duty, or of what conduced to the success of affairs. Some small time after, he returned to Sparta, without any marks of honour and distinction, extremely incensed against Agesilaus, and with the hope of making him persectly sensible of it.

It must be allowed that Lysander's conduct, as we have here represented it, denotes a vanity and narrowness of mind on his side, much unworthy of his reputation. Perhaps Agesilaus carried too far his sensibility and delicacy in point of honour, and he was a little too severe upon a friend and benefactor, whom secret animadversions, attended with openness of heart and expressions of kindness, might have reclaimed to his duty. But as shining as Lysander's merit, and as considerable as the services he had rendered Agesilaus might be, they could not all of them give him a right, not only to an equality with his king and general, but to the superiority he affected, which in some measure tended to making the other infignissicant. He ought to have remembered that it is never allowable for an inferior to forget himself, and so exceed the bounds of a just subordination.

* Upon his return to Sparta, he had it feriously in his thoughts to execute a project which he had many years revolved in his mind. At Sparta there was only two families, or rather branches, of the posterity of Hercules, who had a right to the throne. When Lysander had attained to that high degree of power which his great actions had acquired him, he began to see with pain a city, whose glory had been so much augmented by his exploits, under the government of princes, to whom he gave place neither in valour nor birth; for he descended, as well as themselves, from Hercules. He therefore fought means to deprive those two houses of the sole succession to the crown, and to extend that right to all the other branches of the Heraclides, and even according to some, to all the natives of Sparta; flattering himself, that if his design took effect, no Spartan could be capable of disputing that honour with him, and that he should have the preference to all others.

<sup>8</sup> Plut. in Lyfand. p. 447, 448. Diod. l. xix. p. 244. 245.

This ambitious project of Lyfander shews, that the greatest captains are often those from whom a republic has most to apprehend. Those haughty valiant spirits, accustomed to absolute power in armies, bring back with victory a daring lostiness of mind, always to be dreaded in a free state. Sparta, in giving Lyfander unlimited power, and leaving it for so many years in his hands, did not sufficiently consider, that nothing is more dangerous than to conside to persons of superior merit and abilities, employments of supreme authority, which naturally exposes them to the temptation of rendering themselves independent, and absolute masters of power. Lysander was not proof against it, and practised secretly to open himself a way to the throne.

The undertaking was bold, and required long preparations. He thought it impossible to succeed without first making use of the sear of the divinity, and the terrors of superstition, to amaze and subdue the citizens into a more easy disposition to receive what he wanted to have them understand; for he knew that at Sparta, as well as throughout all Greece, nothing of the least importance was determined, without the oracle's being previously consulted. He tempted with great presents the priests and priestesses of Delphos, Dodona, and Ammon, though inessessable at that time; and the latter event sent ambassadors to Sparta, to accuse him of impiety and facrilege; but he extricated himself from that bad affair by his credit and address.

It was necessary to set other engines at work. A woman in the kingdom of Pontus, affirming that she was with child by Apollo, had been delivered fome years before of a fon, to whom the name of Silenus was given; and the greatest persons of that nation had disputed the honour of nursing and educating him. Lyfander, taking this wondrous birth for the commencement, and in a manner the foundation of the piece he miditated, fupplied the rest himself, by employing a good number of perfons, and those not inconsiderable, to disperse, by way of prologue to the performance, the miraculous birth of this infant; whereby no affectation appearing in them, people were difposed to believe it. This being done, they brought certain discourses from Delphos to Sparta, which were industriously spread abroad every where: That the priests of the temple had in their cuflody fome books of very ancient oracles, which they kept concealed from all the world, and of which it was not permitted, either for them or any other person whatfoever, to have any knowledge: And that only a fon of Apollo, who was to come in process of time, after having given undoubted proofs of his birth to those who had the books in their keeping, was to take and carry them away.

All this being well premifed, Silenus was to prefent himfelf to the priefts, and demand those oracles as the fon of Apollo; and the priefts, who were in the fecret, as actors well prepared and fully inftructed in their parts, were on their fide to make the most exact and circumstantial inquiry into every thing, not without affecting great difficulty, and asking endless questions for the full proof of his birth. At length, as abfolutely conwinced, that this Silenus was the real fon of Apollo, they were to produce the books, and deliver them to him; after which, this fon of Apollo was to read the prophecies contained in them, in the presence of all the world; and particularly that for which the whole contrivance had been cooked up. The feuse of this was, " That it was more expedient and advanta-" geous for the Spartans to elect no king for the future, but " the most worthy of their citizens." Lysander in consequence was to mount the tribunal, to harrangue the citizens, and induce them to make this alteration. Cleon of Halicarnaffus, a celebrated rhetorician, had composed a very eloquent discourse for him upon this subject, which he had got by heart.

Silenus grew up, and repaired to Greece in order to play his part; when Lyfander had the mortification to fee his piece mif-carry, by the timidity and defertion of one of his principal actors, who broke his word, and difappeared at the very inftant it was to have been performed. Though this intrigue had been carried on a great while, it was transacted with so much secrecy to the time it was to have made its appearance, that nothing of it was known during the life of Lysander. How it came to light after his death we shall soon relate; but must at present return to Tissaphernes.

SECTION III.

EXPEDITION of AGESILAUS in ASIA.

WHEN Tiffaphernes had received the troops assigned him by the king h, and drawn together all his forces, he fent to command Agefilaus to retire out of Afia, and declared war against him in case of refusal. His officers were all alarmed, not believing him in a condition to oppose the great army of the Persian king. For himself, he heard Tiffaphernes's heralds with a gay and eafy countenance, and bade them tell their mafter, that he was under a very great obligation to him "for having made " the gods, by his perjury, the enemies of Perlia, and the " friends of Greece." He promifed himfelf great things from this expedition, and would have thought it an exceeding difgrace for him, that ten thousand Greeks, under the command of Xenophon, should have passed through the heart of Asia to the Grecian fea, and beat the king of Persia, as often as he appeared against them; and that he, who commanded the Lacedaemonians, whose empire extended all over Greece by fea and land, should not execute some exploit worthy of glory and remembrance.

At first, therefore, to revenge the persidy of Tissaphernes Volume IV.

h Xenoph, hist. Graec, l. iii. p. 497—502. Idem, de Agesil. p. 652—656. Plut. in Agesil. p. 600.

by a just and allowable deceit, he made a feint of marching his army into Caria, the residence of that satrap; and as soon as the Barbarian had caused his troops to march that way, he turned short, and fell upon Phrygia, where he took many towns, and amassed immense treasures, which he distributed amongst the officers and soldiers; letting his friends see, says Plutarch, that to break a treaty, and violate an oath, is to despise the gods themselves; and that, on the contrary, to deceive an enemy by the stratagems of war, is not only just and glorious, but a sensible delight, attended with the greatest advantages.

The fpring being come, he affembled all his forces at Ephefus; and to exercife his foldiers, he proposed prizes both for the horse and foot. This small inducement set every thing in motion. The place for exercises was perpetually full of all kind of troops; and the city of Ephesus seemed only a palestra, and a school of war. The whole market place was filled with horses and arms, and the shops with different kinds of military equipage. Agesilaus was seen returning from the exercises, followed by a crowd of officers and soldiers, all of them crowned with wreaths, which they were going to deposite in the temple of Diana, to the great admiration and delight of all the world. For, says Xenophon, where picty and discipline are seen to flourish, the best hopes must be conceived.

To give his foldiers new valour from the contempt of their enemies, he made use of this contrivance. He ordered the commissaries, who had charge of the booty, to strip the prifoners, and expose them to sale. There were abundance of buyers for their habits; but for themselves, their bodies were so soft, white and delicate, having been nurtured and brought up in the shade, that they laughed at them, as of neither service nor value. Agesilaus took this occasion to approach and say to his foldiers, pointing to the men, "See there against "whom ye sight;" and shewing them their rich spoils, "and "there for what you sight."

When the feafon for taking the field returned, Agefilaus gave out, that he would march into Lydia. Tissaphernes, who had not forgot the first stratagem he had used in regard to him, and was not willing to be deceived a fecond time, made his troops march directly for Caria; not doubting but at this time Agefilaus would turn his arms that way; the rather, because it was natural for him, as he wanted cavalry, to endeavour to make a rough and difficult country the feat of action, which might render the horse of an enemy useless and unserviceable. But he deceived himfelf: Agefilaus entered Lydia and approached Sardis. Tiffaphernes hastened thither with his horse, with intent to relieve the place. Agefilaus, knowing that his infantry had not had time to arrive, thought proper to take the advantage of fo favourable an opportunity to give him battle, before he had re-affembled all his troops. He drew up his army in two lines; the first he formed of his squadrons, whose intervals he filled up with platoons of the light armed foot, and ordered them to begin the charge, whilft he followed with the fecond line, composed of his heavy armed infantry. The Barbarians did not fustain the first shock, but took to their heels immediately. The Greeks pursued them, and forced their camp, where they made a great flaughter, and a still greater booty.

i After this battle, the troops of Agesilaus were at entire liberty to plunder and ravage the whole country of the Persians, and at the same time had the satisfaction to see that prince inslict an exemplary punishment upon Tissaphernes, who was a very wicked man, and the most dangerous enemy of the Greeks. The king had already received abundance of complaints against his conduct. Upon this occasion he was accused of treason, as not having done his duty in the battle. Queen Parysatis, always actuated by her hatred and revenge against those who had any share in the death of her son Cyrus, did not a little contribute to the death of Tissaphernes, by aggravating with all her power the charges against him; for she had been entirely restored to savour by the king her son.

Fij

<sup>1</sup> Xenoph. p. 501 et 657. Plut. in Artax. p. 1022, et în Agelil. p. 601. k Diod. l. xiv. p. 299. Polyaen, Stratag. l. vii.

As Tiffaphernes had a great authority in Afia, the king was afraid to attack him openly, but thought it necessary to take fuitable precautions, in feizing fo powerful an officer, who might have proved a dangerous enemy. He charged Tithrauftes with that important commission; and gave him two letters at the same time. The first was for Tiffaphernes, and contained the king's orders in regard to the war with the Greeks, with full power to act as was requifite. The fecond was addreffed to Ariaeus, governor of Lariffa; by which the king commanded him to affift Tithraustes with his counsel, and all his forces, in feizing Tiffaphernes. He loft no time, and fent to defire Tiffaphernes would come to him, that they might confer together upon the operations of the enfuing campaign. Tissaphernes, who suspected nothing, went to him with only a guard of three hundred men. Whilst he was in a bath, without fabre or other arms, he was feized and put into the hands of Tithraustes, who caused his head to be struck off, and fent it immediately to Perfia. The king gave it to Paryfatis; -- an agreeable present to a princess of her violent and vindictive temper. Though this conduct of Artaxerxes feems little worthy of a king, nobody lamented the death of that fatrap, who had no veneration for the gods, nor any regard for men; who looked upon probity and honour as empty names; who made a jest of the most facred oaths, and believed the whole ability and policy of a statesman consisted in knowing how to deceive others by hypocrify, fraud, perfidy, and perjury.

Tithraustes had a third writing from the king, whereby he was appointed to command the armies in the room of Tislaphernes. After having executed his commission, he sent great presents to Agesilaus, to induce him to enter more readily into his views and interest; and ordered him to be told, that the cause of the war being removed, and the author of all differences put to death, nothing opposed an accommodation; that the king of Persia consented, that the cities of Asia should enjoy their liberty, paying him the customary tribute, provided he would withdraw his troops, and return into Greece. Agefilaus replied, that he could conclude nothing without the orders of Sparta, upon whom alone depended the peace; that as for him, he was better pleafed with enriching his foldiers than himfelf; that the Greeks befides thought it more glorious and honourable to take fpoils from their enemies than to accept their prefents. However, as he was not unwilling to give Tithraustes the satisfaction of removing out of his province, and of expressing his gratitude to him for having punished the common enemy of the Greeks, he marched into Phrygia, which was the province of Pharnabasus. Tithraustes had himself proposed that expedition to him, and paid him thirty talents for the charges of his journey.

e Xenoph, hift. Graec, l. iii. p. 501. Plut. in Agefil. p. 601.

Upon his march, he received a letter from the magistrates of Sparta, with orders to take upon him the command of the naval army, and power to depute whom he thought fit in his stead. By these new powers, he saw himself absolute commander of all the troops in that state in Asia both by sea and land. This resolution was taken, in order that all operations being directed by one and the same head, and the two armies acting in concert, the plans for the service might be executed with more uniformity, and every thing conspire to the same end. Sparta till then had never done the honour to any of their generals, to conside to him at the same time the command of the armies by sea and land. So that all the world agreed, that he was the greatest personage of his time, and best sufficiency that he high reputation he enjoyed. But he was a man, and had his failings.

The first thing he did was to establish Pisander his lieutenant in the seet; in which he seemed to have committed a considerable sault; because, having about him many older and more experienced captains, without regard to the service of the public, to do honour to an ally, and to please his wise, who was Pisander's sister, he intrusted him with the command of the sleet; that employment being much above his abilities, though he was not without his merit.

This is the common temptation of perfons in power, who believe they possess it only for themselves and their families;

as if the advantage of relation to them was a fufficient title and qualification for posts which require great abilities. They do not reslect, that they not only expose the affairs of a state to ruin by their private views, but facrifice besides the interests of their own glory, which cannot be maintained but by successes it were inconsistent to expect from instruments so ill chosen.

Agefilaus continued with his army in Phrygia, upon the lands of Pharnabafus's government, where he lived in the abundance of all things, and amaifed great fums of money. From thence advancing as far as Paphlagonia, he made an alliance with king Cotis, who passionately desired his amity, from the sense of his faith in the observance of treaties, and his other virtues. The fame motive had already induced Spithridates, one of the king's principal officers, to quit the fervice of Pharnabasus, and to go over to Agefilaus, to whom from his revolt he had rendered great fervices; for he had a great body of troops, and was very brave. This officer, having entered Phrygia, had laid waste the whole country under Pharnabafus, who never dared to appear in the field against him, nor even to rely upon his fortresses: But carrying away whatever was most valuable and dear to him, he kept flying continually before him, and retired from one place to another, changing his camp every day. Spithridates at length, taking with him fome Spartan troops with Herippidas, the chief of the council of thirty fent by the republic to Agefilaus the second year, watched him one day fo closely, and attacked him fo fuccessfully, that he made himfelf master of his camp, and of all the rich spoils with which it abounded. But Herippidas, injudiciously fetting himself up as an inexorable comptroller, was for bringing the booty that had been funk to an account; forced even the foldiers of Spithridates to restore what they had taken; and by visiting their tents, and searching them with an unseasonable exactitude and severity, affronted Spithridates to fuch a degree, that he withdrew directly to Sardis with his Paphlagonians.

It is faid, that in this whole expedition nothing fo fenfibly A. M. 3710. Ant. J. C. 3904. Xenoph hift, Grace I. iv. p. 507-510-affected Agefilaus as the retreat of Spithridates: For, befides his being very forry for the lofs of fo good an officer, and fo good troops, he apprehended being reproached with mean and fordid avarice: A vice equally dishonourable to himself and his country, and of which he had taken pains to avoid the slightest sufficient during his whole life. He did not think it consistent with the duty of his office to shut his eyes, through slothful ease and indolence, against all the malversations that were committed under him; but he knew at the same time, that there is an exactitude and severity, that by being carried too far, degenerate into minuteness and petulancy, and which, through an extreme affectation of virtue, becomes a real and dangerous vice.

m Some time after, Pharnabasus, who saw his country ravaged, demanded an interview with Agesilaus, which was negociated by a common friend of them both. Agesilaus arrived first with his friends at the place agreed on, and sat down in expectation of Pharnabasus upon the turf under the shade of a tree. When Pharnabasus arrived, his people spread skins upon the ground of exceeding softness from the length of their hair, with rich carpets of various colours, and magnificent cushions. But when he saw Agesilaus sitting simply upon the ground, without any preparation, he was ashamed of his esseminacy, and sat down also upon the grass. On this occasion the Persian pride was seen to pay homage to the Spartan modesty and simplicity.

After reciprocal 'falutations, Pharnabasus spoke to this effect: That he had served the Lacedaemonians in the Peloponnesian war to the utmost of his power, fought several battles for them, and supported their naval army, without giving any room to reproach him with fraud or treachery, as Tisaphernes had done: That he was surprised at their coming to attack him in his government; burning the towns, cutting down the trees, and laying waste the whole country: That if it was the custom with the Greeks, who made profession of honour and virtue, to treat their friends and benefactors in such a manner, he did not know what they might mean by just and equitable. These complaints were not entirely without foundation, and were uttered with a modest but pathetic air and tone of voice. The Spartans, who attended Agefilaus, not feeing how they could be answered, cast down their eyes, and kept a profound filence. Agefilaus, who observed it, replied almost in these terms: "Lord Pharnabasus, you " are not ignorant that war often arms the best friends " against each other for the defence of their country. Whilst " we were fuch to the king your master, we treated him as a " friend; but as we are become his enemies, we make open " war against him, as it is just we should, and endeavour to " hurt him by what we act against you. However, from the " instant you shall think fit to throw off the yoke of bondage, " and prefer being called the friend and ally of the Greeks, " before the name of the king of Persia's slave, you may rec-" kon that all the troops you fee before your eyes, our arms, " our ships, our persons, to the last man of us, are only here " to defend your possessions, and secure your liberty, which of " all bleffings is the most precious and defirable."

F iiij

Pharnabafus answered, that if the king sent another general in his place, and subjected him to the new-comer, he should very willingly accept his offer; that otherwise he would not depart from the faith he had sworn to him, nor quit his service. Agesilaus then taking him by the hand, and rising with him, replied, "That it were the pleasure of the gods, lord "Pharnabasus, with such noble sentiments, that you were "rather our friend than our enemy!" He promised to withdraw from his government, and never return into it whils he could subsist elsewhere.

SECTION IV.

AGESILAUS recalled by the EPHORI to defend his COUNTRY.

A GESILAUS had been two years at the head of the army ". and had already made the most remote provinces of Asia tremble at his name, and resound with the same of his great wisdom, difinterestedness, moderation, intrepid valour in the greatest dangers, and invincible patience in supporting the rudest fatigues. Of so many thousand soldiers under his command, not one was worse provided or lay harder than himself. He was so indifferent as to heat or cold, that he seemed * formed only to support the most rigorous seasons, and such as it pleased God to send: Which are Plutarch's express words.

<sup>n</sup> A. M. 3610. Ant. J. C. 394. Plut. in Agefil. p. 603, 604. Xenoph. in Agefil. p. 657.

The most agreeable of all fights to the Greeks settled in Asia, was to see the lieutenants of the great king, his satraps, and other great lords, who were formerly so haughty and untractable, soften their note in the presence of a man meanly clad, and at his single word, however short and laconic, change their language and conduct, and in a manner transform themselves into different creatures. Deputies from all parts were sent by the people to form alliances with him, and his army increased every day by the troops of the Barbarians that came to join him.

All Asia was already in motion, and most of the provinces ready to revolt. Agesilaus had already restored order and tranquillity in all the cities, had reinstated them in the possession of their liberty under reasonable modifications, not only without shedding of blood, but without even banishing a single person. Not content with such a progress, he had formed the design of attacking the king of Persia in the heart of his dominions, to put him in fear for his own person and the tranquillity he enjoyed in Ecbatana and Susa, and to find him so much business, as should make it impracticable for him to embroil all Greece from his cabinet, by corrupting the orators and persons of greatest authority in its cities with its presents.

O Tithraustes, who commanded for the king in Asia, seeing the tendency of Agesilaus's designs, and desiring to prevent their effects, had sent Timocrates of Rhodes into Greece, with great sums of money to corrupt the principal persons in the cities, and by their means occasion desections against Sparta. He knew that the haughtiness of the Lacedaemonians, for all their generals did not resemble Agesilaus, and the imperious manner with which they treated their neighbours and allies, especially since they considered themselves as the masters of Greece, had universally disgusted the people, and excited a jealousy that waited only an occasion to break out against them. This severity of governing had a natural cause in their education, Accustomed from their infancy to obey without delay or reply, first to their tutors, and afterwards to their magistrates, they exacted a like submission from the cities in their dependence, were easily incensed by the least opposition, and by this excessive severity rendered themselves insupportable.

O Xenoph. hist. Graec. I. iii. p. 502-508. Plut. in Lyland. p. 449-451.

* กิจหาง แอ้งอร ลิย์ หุรกิรมิลเ หลัร ย์หง มิยัย นยกอลูนย์งสเร อีกูสเร หาติบนต์ร

Tithraustes therefore did not find it difficult to draw off the allies from their party. Thebes, Argos, Corinth, entered into his measures: The deputy did not go to Athens. These three cities, influenced by those that governed them, made a league against the Lacedaemonians, who on their fide prepared vigorously for the war. The Thebans at the same time fent deputies to the Athenians, to implore their aid, and that they would enter into the alliance. The deputies, after having flightly passed over their ancient divisions, infifted strongly upon the considerable service they had rendered Athens, in refusing to join its enemies, when they endeavoured its final destruction. They represented to them the favourable opportunity that offered for reinstating themfelves in their ancient power, and to deprive the Lacedaemonians of the empire of Greece. That all the allies of Sparta, either without or within Greece, were weary of their fevere and unjust fway, and waited only the fignal to revolt. That the moment the Athenians should declare themselves, all the cities would rouse up at the found of their arms; and that the king of Persia, who had fworn the ruin of Sparta, would aid them with all his forces both by fea and land.

Thrafybulus, whom the Thebans had supplied with arms and money, when he undertook the re-establishment of the Athenian liberty, seconded their demand with great vigour, and the aid was unanimously resolved. The Lacedaemonians on their side took the field without loss of time, and entered Phocis. Lysander wrote to Pausanias, who commanded one of the two armies, to give him notice to march early the next day to Haliartus, which he defigned to besiege, and that he should be there himself at fun-rise. The letter was intercepted. Lyfander, after having waited his coming up a great while, was obliged to engage, and was killed in the battle, Paulanius received this bad news on his way; but however continued his march to Haliartus, and called a council of war to consider upon a second battle. He did not think it confiftent with prudence to hazard it, and contented himself with making a truce, to remove the bodies of those who had fallen in the former fight. Upon his return to Sparta, he was cited to give an account of his conduct; and, refufing to appear, was condemned to die. But he avoided the execution of that fentence by flight, and retired to Tegeum, where he passed the remainder of his life under the shelter and protection of Minerva, to whom he had rendered himself a suppliant, and died of difeafe.

Lyfander's poverty having been discovered after his death, did great honour to his memory; when it was known, that of all the gold and riches which had passed through his hands, of a power so extensive as his had been, of so many cities under his government, and which made their court to him, in a word, of that kind of dominion and sovereignty always exercised by him, he had made no manner of advantage, for the advancement and enriching of his house.

Some days before his death, two of the principal citizens of Sparta had contracted themselves to his two daughters; but when they knew in what condition he had left his affairs, they resulted to marry them. The republic did not suffer so fordid a baseness to go unpunished, nor Lysander's poverty, which was the strongest proof of his justice and virtue, to be treated as an obstacle to allying into his family. They were fined in a great sum, publicly disgraced, and exposed to the contempt of all persons of honour. For at Sparta there were penalties established, not only for such as resuled to marry, or married too late, but also for those who married amis: And those especially were reckoued of this number, who, instead of allying into houses of virtue, and with their own relations, had no motive but wealth and lucre in marriage: An admirable law, and highly tending to perpetuate probity and honour in families, which an impure mixture of blood and manners seldom fails to alter and essace!

It must be owned that a generous disinterestedness in the midft of all that could inflame and gratify the luft of gain, is very rare, and well worthy of admiration; but in Lyfander, it was attended with great defects, which entirely obscure its luftre. Without speaking of his imprudence in introducing gold and filver into Sparta, which he despised himself, though he rendered it estimable to his country, and thereby occasioned its ruin, what opinion can we have of a man, brave indeed, well read in men, skilful in affairs, and of great ability in the arts of government, and what is commonly called policy; but who regards probity and justice as nothing; to whom falsehood fraud, and perfidy, appear legal methods for the attainment of his ends; who does not fear, for the advancement of his friends, and the augmenting of his creatures, to commit the most flagrant injustice and oppressions, and is not ashamed to profane whatever is most facred in religion, even to the corrupting of priefts, and forging of oracles, to fatiate the empty ambition of being equal to a king, and of afcending the throne?

rupting of priefts, and forging of oracles, to fatiate the empty ambition of being equal to a king, and of afcending the throne?

P When Agefilaus was upon the point of leading his troops into Perfia, the Spartan Epicydidas arrived to let him know that Sparta was threatened with a furious war; that the Ephori recalled him, and ordered him to return immediately for the defence of his country. Agefilaus did not deliberate a moment, but returned this answer immediately to the Ephori, which Plutarch has transmitted to us. "Agefilaus to the Ephori, greeting. We have reduced part of Asia, put the Barbarians to flight, and made great preparations for war in Ionia: But as you order me to return, I am not far behind this letter, and should prevent it if possible. I received the command not for myself, but my country, and its allies. I know that a general does not deserve or possessing the state of the case of the case of the state of th

P Kenoph, hift. Grace, I. iv. p. 513. Idem in Agefil, p. 657. Plut, in Agefil, p. 603, 604. Plut, in Apoph. Laconic. p. 211.

" fefs that name really, but as he fubmits to the laws and the Ephori, and obeys the magistrates."

This ready obedience of Agefilaus has been much admired and applauded, and not without reason. Hannibal, though depressed with missfortunes, and driven almost entirely out of Italy, obeyed his citizens with great reluctance, when they recalled him to deliver Carthage from the dangers that threatened it. Here a victorious prince, ready to enter the enemy's country, and to attack the king of Persia even upon his throne, almost assured of the success of his arms, on the first order of the Ephori, renounces the most soothing hopes, and the most exalted expectations. He demonstrates the truth of what was faid, "That at Sparta the laws ruled men, and not men the "laws."

On his departure he faid, "that thirty thousand of the "king's archers drove him out of Asia;" alluding in those words to a species of Persian coin, which had on one side the sigure of an archer, thirty thousand of which pieces of money had been dispersed in Greece to corrupt the orators and persons of greatest power in the cities.

r Agefilaus, in quitting Afia, where he was regretted as the common father of the people, appointed Euxenes his lieutenant, and gave him four thousand men for the defence of the country. Xenophon went with him. He left at Ephesus, with Megabysus the guardian of Diana's temple, half the gold he had brought with him from his expedition into Persia with Cyrus, to keep it for him in trust, and in case of death to consecrate it to the goddess.

In the mean time the Lacedaemonians had raifed an army, and given the command of it to Ariflodemus, tutor to king Agefipolis, then an infant. Their enemies affembled to concert the operations of the war. Timolaus of Corinth faid, the Lacedaemonians were like a river that grew larger as it removed from its fource: or to a fwarm of bees, which it is eafy to burn in their hive, but disperse themselves a great way when they sly abroad, and become formidable by their sings.

E Xenoph. hift. Graec. l. iv. p. 513. Xenoph. de exped. Cyr. l. v. p. 350.

* Xenoph. p. 514-517.

He was therefore of opinion, that it was proper to attack them in their capital; which was approved and refolved. But the Lacedaemonians did not give them time. They took the field, and found the enemy near Nemaea, a city not very remote from Corinth, where a rude battle enfued. The Lacedaemonians had the advantage, which was very confiderable. Agefilaus having received this news at Amphipolis, as he was haftening to the relief of his country, fent it directly to the cities of Afia for their encouragement, and to give them hopes of his speedy return, if the success of affairs would admit it.

t When the approach of Agefilaus was known at Sparta, the Lacedaemonians who remained in the city, to do him honour for the ready obedience he had paid to their orders, caused proclamations to be made by found of trumpet, that all young persons who were willing to aid their king, might come and lift themselves for that purpose. Not one of them failed to enter himself immediately with the utmost joy. But the Ephori chose only sifty of the bravest and most robust, whom they fent him, and desired that he would enter Boeotia with the utmost expedition; which he did accordingly.

About the fame time the two fleets came up with each other near Cnidos, a city of Caria. That of the Lacedaemonians was commanded by Pifander, Agefilaus's brother-in-law, and that of the Perfians by Pharnabafus and Conon the Athenian. The latter, observing that the king of Perfia's supplies came flowly, and occasioned the loss of many opportunities, had resolved to go in person to the court, to iolicit the king's affistance. As he would not prostrate himself before him, according to the Persian custom, he could not explain himself but by the intervention of others. He represented to him, with a force and a spirit seldom pardoned in those who treat with princes, that it was equally shameful and assonishing, that his ministers, contrary to his intention, should suffer his affairs to be disconcerted and ruined for want of the necessary expences; that the richest king in the world should give place to his enemies in the very point he was so infinitely superior to them; that is, in riches; and that for want of remitting the sums his service required to his generals, all their designs were rendered abortive. These remonstrances were free, but just, and solid. The king received them perfectly well, and shewed, by his example, that truth may often be spoken to princes with success, if courage were not wanting. Conon obtained all he demanded, and the king made him admiral of his sleet.

t Plut. in Agefil. p. 605.

* Xenoph, hift, Graec, L iv. p. 518. Diod. l xiv. p. 302. Justin, l. vi, c. 2-et 3.

It was composed of more than fourscore and ten gallies, to which the enemy's was fomewhat inferior in number. They came in view of each other near Cnidos, a maritime city of Afia Minor. Conon who had in some measure occasioned the taking of Athens by the loss of the fea-fight near Ægospotamos, used extraordinary efforts in this to retrive his misfortune, and to obliterate by a glorious victory the difgrace of his former defeat. * He had this advantage, that in the battle he was going to give, the Persians would be at the whole expence, and bear all the loss themselves; whereas the entire fruits of the victory would redound to the Athenians, without hazarding any thing of their own. Pifander had also strong motives to shew his valour upon this occasion, that he might not degenerate from the glory of his brother-in-law, and to justify the choice he had made in appointing him admiral. In effect, he behaved with extreme valour, and had at first some advantage; but the battle growing warm, and the allies of Sparta betaking themselves to flight, he could not refolve to follow them, and died fword in hand. Conon took fifty gallies, and the rest escaped to Cnidos. The consequence of this victory was the revolt of almost all the allies of Sparta; several of whom declared for the Athenians, and the rest refumed their ancient liberty. After this battle the affairs of the Lacedaemonians daily declined. All their actions in Asia were no more than the feeble efforts of an expiring power, till the defeats of Leuctra and Matinea completed their downfal.

* Eo speciosius quod ne ipsorum quidem Atheniensium, sed alieni imperii viribus dimicet, pugnaturus periculo regis, victurus praemio patriae. Justin.

* Isocrates makes a very just reflection upon the revolutions of Sparta and Athens, which had always their fource and origin in the infolent prosperity of both those republics. The Lacedaemonians, who were at first acknowledged masters of Greece without opposition, fell from their authority only by their enormous abuse of it. The Athenians succeeded them in power and at the fame time in pride; and we have feen into what an abyls of misfortunes it precipitated them. Sparta having gained the superiority by the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, and the taking of their city, might have improved in their measures from the double experience of the past; as well in regard to what had befallen themselves, as from the recent example of their rival; but the most affecting examples and events feldom or ever occasion a people to change their conduct. Sparta became as haughty and untractable as before; and so experienced the same destiny again.

To warn the Athenians against this misfortune, Isocrates puts them in mind of the past, and of the times wherein they were fuccessful in every thing. "You imagine," fays he, "that provided with a numerous fleet, absolute masters at " fea, and supported by powerful allies always ready to " give you aid, you have nothing to fear, and may enjoy in " repose and tranquillity the fruits of your victories. For my " part, indulge me to speak with truth and freedom, I think "quite otherwife. The cause of my apprehension is, my " having observed, that the decline of the greatest republics " has always been at the time they believed themselves most " powerful, and that their very fecurity has prepared the pre-" cipice into which they have fallen. The reason of this is "evident. Prosperity and adversity never come alone, but " have each their train of very different effects. The first is " attended with vain glory, pride, and infolence, which daz-" zle the mind, and inspire rash and extravagant measures: "On the contrary, the companions of advertity, are model-" ty, felf diffidence, and circumspection, which naturally ren-" der men prudent, and apt to amend from their own failings. "So that it is hard to judge which of the two conditions we " ought to defire for a city; as that which appears unhappy, " is an almost certain path to prosperity; and the other so " flattering and splendid, generally leads on to the greatest " misfortunes." The blow which the Lacedaemonians received at the battle of Cnidos is a mournful proof of what he says.

I Ifoc. in Orat. Areop p. 278-280.

Agefilaus was in Boeotia, and upon the point of giving battle when this bad news was brought him. Apprehending that it might discourage and deter his troops, he caused it to be reported in the army, that the Lacedaemonians had gained a confiderable victory at fea; and appearing in public with a wreath of flowers upon his head, he offered a facrifice of thanksgiving for the good news, and sent part of it in presents to his officers. 2 The two armies, almost equal in strength, were in view of each other upon the plains of Coronaea, when they drew up in battle. Agefilaus gave the left wing to the Orchomenians, and took the right himself. On the other side, the Thebans were upon the right, and the Argives on the left. Xenophon fays, that this was the most furious battle in his time; and may be believed, as he was present in it, and fought near the person of Agesilaus, with whom he had returned from Afia:

The first charge was not very obstinate; nor of long continuance. The Thebans soon put the Orchomenians to slight; and Agesilaus overthrew and routed the Argives. But both parties having learned that their left wing had been very severely handled, and sled, returned immediately; Agesilaus to oppose the Thebans, and to wrest the victory out of their hands; and the Thebans, to follow their left wing, which was retired to Helicon. Agesilaus at that moment might have assured himself of a complete victory, if he would have let the Thebans pass on, and had charged them after in the rear; but carried away by the ardour of his courage, he resolved to stop them with an attack in front, and to beat them by pure

Volume IV.

G

Flut. in Agefil. p. 605.

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. Xenoph. hift. Graec. p. 518-520. et in Agefil. p. 659, 660.

force. In which, fays Xenophon, he shewed more valour than prudence.

The Thebans, feeing Agefilaus advance against them, drew all their foot immediately into one body, formed a hollow fquare, and waited his coming up in good order. The engagement was sharp and bloody on all fides, but particularly where Agefilaus fought at the head of the fifty young Spartans fent him by the city. The valour and emulation of those young men were of great fervice to Agefilaus, and may be faid to have faved his life; for they fought around him with exceeding ardor, and exposed themselves foremost in all dangers for the fafety of his person. They could not however prevent his receiving feveral wounds through his armour from pikes and fwords. Notwithstanding, after an exceeding warm dispute, they brought him off alive from the enemy, and making their bodies a rampart for him, facrificed a great number of Thebans to his defence. Many of those young men were also left upon the field. At length, finding it too difficult to break the Thebans in front, they were forced to have recourse to what they had at first rejected. They opened their phalanx to let them pass; which when they had done, as they marched afterwards in more disorder, they charged them again upon the flanks and rear. They could, however, neither break them nor put them to flight. Those brave Thebans made their retreat continually fighting, and gained Helicon, elate with the fuccess of the battle, wherein on their side they had always remained invincible.

Agefilaus, though very much weakened by the great number of his wounds, and the quantity of blood he had loft, would not retire to his tent, till he had been carried to the place where his phalanx was drawn up, and had feen all the dead bodies removed even upon their own arms. He was informed there, that many of the enemy had taken refuge in the temple of Minerva Itonienfis, which was not very distant from the field of battle, and asked what he would have done with them. As he was full of veneration for the gods, he gave orders to let them go, and even sent them a guard to escort them in safety wherever they thought fit.

The next morning Agefilaus, to try whether the Thebans would have the courage to renew the battle, commanded his troops to crown themselves with flowers, and the music of the army to play, whilst a trophy was erected and adorned in honour of his victory. At the same instant, the enemy sent heralds to demand his permission to bury their dead; which he granted, with a truce; and having confirmed his victory by that act of a conqueror, he caused himself to be carried to Delphos, where the Pythian games were then celebrated. He made there a folemn procession, which was followed by a sacrifice, and confecrated the tenth part of the booty taken in Asia to the god, which amounted to an hundred talents *. These great men, no less religious than brave, never failed to express by presents their gratitude to the gods for their fuccesses in arms; declaring, by that public homage, that they believed themselves indebted for their victories to their protection.

SECTION V.

AGESILAUS returns victorious to SPARTA. A PEACE, shameful to the GREEKS, concluded.

After the festival<sup>2</sup>, Agesilaus returned to Sparta. His citizens received him with all the marks of the most real joy, and beheld him with admiration, when they observed the simplicity of his manners, and the constant frugality and temperance of his life. At his return from foreign countries, where pomp, luxury, sloth, and the love of pleasures entirely prevailed, he was not infected with the manners of the Barbarians, as most of the other generals had been: He made no alteration in his diet, bath, equipage of his wise, ornaments of his arms, or furniture of his house. In the midst of so shining a reputation, and the universal applause, always the same, or rather more modest than before, he distinguished himself from the rest of the citizens, only by a greater submission to the laws, and a more inviolable attachment to the customs of his country; convinced, that he was only king to be the brighter example of those virtues to others.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Plut. in Agefil. p. 606.

* An hundred thousand crowns; about L. 22, 500.

b He made greatness confist in virtue only. Hearing the Great King, so the kings of Persia used to call themselves, spoken of in magnificent terms, and his power extremely extolled; "* I cannot conceive," said he, "wherein he is greater than me, unless he be more virtuous."

There were at Sparta fome citizens, who, vitiated by the prevailing tafte of Greece, made their merit and glory confift in keeping a great number of horses for the race. He perfuaded his fifter Cynisca to dispute the prize in the Olympic games, in order to shew the Greeks, that those victories on which they set so high a value, were not the effects of valour and bravery, but of riches and expence. She was the first of her sex who shared in this honour. He had not the same opinion of the exercises which contributed to render the body more robust, and inure it to labour and fatigue; and to place them in greater estimation, would often honour them with his presence.

Some time after Lyfander's death, he discovered the conspiracy formed by that captain against the two kings, which till then had not been heard of, and came to light by a kind of accident, in the following manner: c Upon forne affairs, which related to the government, it was necessary to confult Lylander's papers, and Agefilaus went to his house for that purpose. In running them over, he fell upon the sheets which contained at large the harangue of Cleon for the new method of proceeding in the election of kings. Surprised at perusing it. he gave over his fearch, and went away abruptly to communicate that cration to the citizens, and to let them fee what manner of man Lyfander was, and how much they had been deceived in regard to him. But Lacratidas, a wife and prudent person, and president of the Ephori, interposed, by telling him, That it was highly improper to raise Lylander from the dead : on the contrary, that it was necessary to bury his harangue in the fame grave with him, as of dangerous tendency, from the great art with which it was composed, and the force of persuasion that universally prevailed in it; against which it might prove no easy matter to resist. Agesilaus was of the same opinion, and the peace was configned to silence and oblivion, as the best use that could be made of it.

b Plut, de sui laud, p. 5554 c Plut, in Agefil. p. 606.

&quot; Tiổ thế ya μίζου ixteos, tì μη και δικαίστερος.

d As his credit was very high in the city, he caufed Telutias, his brother by the mother's fide; to be declared admiral of the fleet. It were to be wished, that history, to justify this choice, had mentioned any other qualities in that commander, than his nearness of blood to the king. Agesilaus soon after set out with his land-army to besiege Corinth, and took the long walls, as they were called, whilft his brother Telutias attacked it by sea. He did several other exploits against the people of Greece at war with Sparta, which always argue indeed the valour and experience of the general, but are neither very important nor decisive, and which we thought, for that reason, might be omitted.

e At the same time Pharnabasus and Conon, having made themselves masters at sea, ravaged the whole coast of Laconia. That fatrap, returning to his government of Phrygia, left Conon the command of the naval army, with very confiderable fums for the re-establishment of Athens. Conon, victorious and crowned with glory, repaired thither, where he was received with universal applause. The sad prospect of a city, formerly fo flourishing, and at that time reduced to so melancholy condition, gave him more grief, than he felt joy in feeing his beloved country again, after fo many years absence. He loft no time, but fell immediately to work, employing, befides masons and the usual artisans, the soldiers, mariners, citizens allies; in a word, all who were well inclined to Athens; providence decreeing, that this city, formerly destroyed by the Persians, should be rebuilt by their own hands; and that having been difmantled and demolished by the Lacedaemonians, it should be reinstated at their own cost, and by the spoils taken from them. What a vicissitude and alteration was this! Athens at this time had those for its allies, which had formerly been its most violent enemies, and for enemies, those with whom before it had contracted the most strict and most consumed union. Conon, seconded by the zeal of the Thebans, soon rebuilt the walls of Athens, restored the city to its ancient splendor, and rendered it more formidable than ever to its enemies. f After having offered to the gods a whole hecatomb, that is to say, a facrifice of an hundred oxen, as a thanksgiving for the happy re-establishment of Athens, he made a feast, to which all the citizens without exception were invited.

G iij

d Plut. in Agefil. p. 606.

e A. M. 3611. Ant. J. C. 393. Xenoph. hift. Grace, L. iv. p. 534-537. Died. l. xiv. p. 363. Justin. L. vi. c. 5.

Sparta could not fee without extreme affliction fo glorious a revolution. It looked upon the grandeur and power of a city, its ancient rival and almost continual enemy, as its own, ruin, which made the Lacedaemonians take the mean refolution of avenging themselves at once upon Athens, and Conon its restorer, by making peace with the king of Persia. With this view they dispatched Antalcides to Tiribasus. His commission confisted of two principal articles. The first was, to accuse Conon to that satrap of having defrauded the king of the money, which he had employed in the re-establishment of Athens; and of having formed the defign of depriving the Persians of Æolia and Ionia, and to subject them anew to the republic of Athens, upon which they had formerly depended, By the fecond, he had orders to make the most advantageous proposals to Tiribasus his master could desire. Without giving himself any manner of trouble in regard to Asia, he slipulated only, that all the islands and other cities should enjoy their laws and liberty. The Lacedaemonians thus gave up to the king, with the greatest injustice and the utmost baseness, all the Greeks fettled in Asia; for whose liberty Agesilaus had fo long fought. It is true, he had no share in this most infamous negotiation; the whole reproach of which ought to fall on Antalcides, who, being the fworn enemy of the king of f Athen. l. i. p. 3.

k Xenoph. hift. Graec. 1. iv. p. 537, 538. Plut. in Agefil. p. 609.

Sparta, hastened the peace by all manner of means, because the war augmented the authority, glory, and reputation of Agesilaus.

The most considerable cities of Greece had sent deputies at the same time to Tiribasus; and Conon was at the head of those from Athens. All of them were unanimous in rejecting such proposals. Without speaking of the interests of the Greeks of Asia, with which they were extremely affected, they saw themselves exposed by this treaty; the Athenians, to the loss of the isles of Lemnos, Imbros, and Scyros; the Thebans, to abandon the cities of Boeotia, of which they were in possession, and which would thereby regain their independence; and the Argives, to renounce Corinth, with the loss of which Argos itself would soon, in all probability, be attended. The deputies therefore withdrew without concluding any thing.

Tiribafus feized Conon, and put him in prison. Not daring to declare openly for the Lacedaemonians, without an express order to that purpose, he contented himself with supplying them underhand with confiderable fums of money for fitting out a fleet, in order that the other cities of Greece might not be in a condition to oppose them. After having taken these precautions, he fet out directly for the court, to give the king an account of the state of his negociation. That prince was well fatisfied with it, and directed him in the ftrongest terms to put the last hand to it. Tiribasus also laid before him the Lacedaemonians accufation of Conon. Some authors, according to Cornelius Nepos, have written that he was carried to Sufa, and there executed by the king's order. The filence of Xenophon, who was his cotemporary, in regard to his death, makes it doubtful whether he did not escape from prison, or fuffer, as has been faid.

Whilft this treaty was negociating, feveral actions little confiderable passed between the Athenians and Lacedaemonians. It was also at the same time that Evagoras extended his conquests in the island of Cyprus, of which we shall soon treat.

h Tiribafus at length, upon his return, fummoned the deputies of the Grecian cities to be present at the reading of the treaty. It imported, that all the Grecian cities of Asia should remain dependant on the king, and that the rest, as well small as great, should have full possession of their liberty. The king further reserved to himself the isles of Cyprus and Clazomena, and left those of Seyros, Lemnos, and Imbros, to the Athenians, to whom they had long appertained. By the same treaty the engaged to join with such people as came into it, in order to make war by sea and land against all who should resuse to agree to it. We have already said it was Sparta itself proposed these conditions.

G iiij

All the other cities of Greece, or at least the greatest part of them, rejected so infamous a treaty with horror. However, as 'they were weakened and exhausted by domestic divisions, and not in a condition to support a war against so powerful a prince, who threatened to fall with all his forces upon those who should refuse to come into this peace, they were obliged against their will to comply with it; except the Thebans, who had the courage to oppose it openly at first, but were at length reduced to accept it, with the others, by whom they found themselves universally abandoned.

Such was the fruit of the jealoufy and divisions which armed the Grecian cities against each other, and was the end proposed by the policy of Artaxerxes, in distributing sums of money amongst the several states; invincible in arms, and to the sword, but not to the gold and presents of the Persians; so remote were they in this respect from the character of the ancient Greeks their forefathers.

To comprehend aright how much Sparta and Athens differed from what they had been in former times, we have only to compare the two treaties concluded between the Greeks and Perfians; the former by Cimon the Athenian 1 under Artaxerxes Longimanus above fixty years before, and the latter by Antalcides the Lacedaemonian, under Artaxerxes Mnemon. In the first, Greece, victorious and triumphant, assures the liberty of the Asiatic Greeks, gives the law to the Persians, imposes what conditions it pleases, and prescribes bounds and limits, by prohibiting them to approach nearer to the sea with their troops than the distance of three days march; or to appear with long vessels in any of the seas between the Cyanaean and Chalidonian islands; that is to say, from the Euxine to the coasts of Pamphilia. In the second, on the contrary, Persia, grown haughty and imperious, takes pleasure in humbling its conquerors, in depriving them, with the single stroke of a pen, of their empire in Asia Minor, in compelling them to abandon basely all the Greeks established in those rich provinces, to subscribe to their own subjection, and to confine themselves in their turn within the narrow bounds of Greece.

From whence can so strange an alteration arise? Are there not on both sides the same cities, the same people, the same forces, and the same interest? No doubt there are; but they are not the same men, or rather, they have no longer the same principles of policy. Let us recall those happy times of Greece, so glorious for Athens and Sparta, when Persia came pouring like a deluge upon this little country with all the forces of the East. What was it that rendered the two cities invincible, and superior to such numerous and formidable armies! Their union and good understanding. No dissension between the two states, no jealously of command, no private view of interest; in sine, no other contests between them but of honour, glory, and the love of their country.

To so laudable an union may be added an irreconcileable hatred for the Persians, which became a kind of nature in the Greeks, and was the most distinguishing character of that nation. * It was a capital crime, and punished with death, only to mention peace, or propose any accommodation with them; and an Athenian mother was seen to throw the first stone at her son, who had dared to make such a motion, and to set others the example of stoning him.

This ftrict union of the two states, and declared abhorrence of the common enemy, were a long time the potent barriers of their fecurity, rendered them invincible, and may be said to have been the source and principle of all the glorious successes which raised the reputation of Greece to so high a pitch. But by a misfortune common to the most flourishing states, those very successes became the cause of its ruin, and prepared the way for the disgraces it experienced in the sequel.

These two states, which might have carried their victorious arms into the heart of Persia, and have attacked in their turn the great king upon his throne itself; instead of forming in concert such an enterprise, which would at once have crowned them with glory, and laden them with riches, have the folly to leave their common enemy at repose, to embroil themselves with each other upon trivial points of honour, and interests of little importance, and to exhaust the forces inessectually against themselves, which ought to have been employed solely against the Barbarians, who could not have resisted them. For it is remarkable that the Persians never had any advantage over the Athenians or Lacedaemonians, whilst they were united with each other, and that it was their own divisions only which supplied them with the means to conquer both alternately, and always the one by the other.

These divisions induced them to take such measures as neither Sparta nor Athens would ever have otherwise been capable of. We see both the one and the other dishonour themselves by their mean and abject flatteries, not only of the king of Persia, but even of his satraps; pay their court to them, earnestly solicit their favour, cringe to them, and even suffer their ill humour; and all this to obtain some aid of troops or money, forgetting that the Persians, haughty and insolent to such as seemed assaid of them, became timorous and little to those who had the courage to despise them. But in sine, what did they gain by all these mean condescensions? The treaty which gave occasion for these resections, and will for ever be the reproach of Sparta and Athens.

SECTION VI.

WAR of ARTAXERXES against EVAGORAS.

What I have faid upon the facility with which the Greeks might have rendered themselves formidable to their enemies, will be more evident, if we consider, on one side, the diversity of people, and extent of country, which composed the vast empire of the Persians, and on the other, the weakness of the government, incapable of animating so great a mass, and of supporting the weight of so much business and application. At the court every thing was determined by the intrigues of women, and the cabals of favourites, whose whole merit often consisted in slattering their prince, and soothing his passions. It was upon their credit officers were chosen, and the first dignities disposed of; by their opinion the services of the generals of armies were judged, and their rewards decided. The sequel will shew, that from the same source arose the infurrection of provinces, the distrust of the greatest part of the governors, the discontent and consequential revolt of the best officers, and the ill success of almost all the enterprises that were formed.

<sup>1. 1</sup>soc. in Panegyr. p. 132-137. In Panath. p. 524, 525.

Artaxerxes, having got rid of the care and perplexity which the war with the Greeks had occasioned, applied himself to the terminating that of Cyprus, which had lasted several years, but had been carried on with little vigour, and turned the greatest part of his forces that way.

Evagoras reigned at that time in Salamin, the capital city of the isle of Cyprus. He was descended from Teucer of * Salamin, who at his return from Troy built this city, and gave it the name of his country. His descendants had reigned there from that time; but a stranger of Phoenicia, having dispossessed the lawful king, had taken his place, and to maintain himself in the usurpation, had filled the city with Barbarians, and subjected the whole island to the king of Persia.

Under this tyrant Evagoras was born, of whose education great care was taken. He was distinguished among the youth by the beauty of his aspect, the vigour of his body, and more by the modesty and innocence of his manners +, which are the greatest ornaments of that age. As he advanced in years, the greatest virtues, valour, wisdom, and justice, were observed to m Isocrat. in Evag. p. 380.

* This Teucer was of Salamin, a little ifland near Athens celebrated for the famous battle under Xerxes.

† Et qui ornat aetatem, pudor. Cic.

brighten in him. He afterwards carried these virtues to so confipienous an height, as to give jealously to those that governed; who perceived justly that so shining a merit could not continue in the obscurity of a private condition; but his modesty, probity, and integrity, reassured them, and they reposed an entire considence in him, to which he always answered by an inviolable sidelity, without ever meditating their expulsion from the throne by violence or treachery.

A more justifiable means conducted him to it, divine prowidence, as Ifocrates fays, preparing the way for him. One of the principal citizens murdered the person upon the throne, and had contrived to feize Evagoras, and to rid himself of him, in order to fecure the crown to himfelf; but that prince efcaping his pursuit, retired to Solos, a city of Cilicia. His banishment was so far from abating his courage, that it gave him new vigour. Attended only with fifty followers, determined like himself to conquer or die, he returned to Salamin, and expelled the usurper, though supported by the credit and protection of the king of Perlia. Having re-established himself in Salamin, he foon rendered his little kingdom most flourishing, by his application to the relief of his subjects, and by protecting them in all things; by governing them with justice and benevolence; by making them active and laborious; by infpiring them with a taste for the cultivation of lands, the breeding of cattle, commerce, and navigation. He formed them also for war, and made them excellent foldiers.

He was already very powerful, and had acquired great reputation, when Conon the Athenian general, after his defeat at Egospotamos, took refuge with him; <sup>1</sup> not thinking it possible to find a safer asylum for himself, nor a more powerful support of his country. The resemblance of their manners and sentiments soon made them contract a strict amity with each other, which continued ever after, and proved equally advantageous to both. <sup>m</sup> Conon was in great credit at the king of Persa's court, which he employed with that prince, by the means of Ctefias the physician, to accommodate his differences with his host Evagoras, and happily affected it.

<sup>1</sup> A. M. 3599. Ant. J. C. 405. Hocrat. in Evag. p. 393.—395. m A. M. 3605. Ant. J. 399.

Evagoras and Conon, with the great defign of subverting, or at least of reducing the great power of Sparta, which had rendered itself formidable to all Greece, concerted together the means for the attainment of that end. They were both citizens of Athens; the latter by birth, and the other by right of adoption; which his great services, and zeal for that republic had deserved. The Satraps of Asia saw with pain their country ravaged by the Lacedaemonians, and found themselves in great difficulties, from not being in a condition to make head against them. Evagoras remonstrated to them, that it was necessary to attack the enemy as well by sea as land; and he did not contribute a little, by his credit with the king of Persia, to Conon's being appointed general of his seet. The celebrated victory over the Lacedaemonians at Cnidos was the consequence, and gave the mortal wound to that republic.

P The Athenians, in acknowledgment of the important fervices Evagoras and Conon had rendered them with Artaxerxes, erected flatues in honour of them.

<sup>9</sup> Evagoras on his fide, extending his conquests from city to city, endeavoured to make kimfelf master of the whole island. The Cypriots had recourse to the king of Persia. That prince, alarmed by the rapid progress of Evagoras, of which he apprehended the effects, and conscious of what importance it was to him to prevent an island's falling into the hands of an enemy, so favourably situated for holding Asia Minor in awe, promised them an immediate and powerful support, without declaring openly however against Evagoras.

Being employed elsewhere by more important affairs, he could not keep his word with them so soon as he expected, and had engaged. That war of Cyprus continued six years; and the success with which Evagoras supported it against the great king, ought to have banished from the Greeks all terror of the Persan name, and united them against the common enemy, It is true, the fuccours fent by Artaxerxes till then were little confiderable, as they also were the two following years. During all that time it was less a real war, than a preparation for war: But when he had difengaged himself from the Greeks, he applied to it vigorously, and attacked Evagoras with his forces.

A. M. 3606. Ant. J. C. 398.

A. M. 3610. Ant. J. C. 394.

P Paufan, l. i. p. v. q Diod. l, xiv, p. 311. FA. M. 3614. Ant. J. C. 390. Upcrat, in Paneg. p. 135, 136.

The army by land, commanded by Orontes his fon-in-law. confisted of three hundred thousand men, and the fleet of three hundred gallies; of which Tiribasus, a Persian of the highest rank and greatest reputation, was admiral. Gaos his fon-inlaw commanded under him. Evagoras on his fide affembled as many troops and ships as he could; but they were an handful in comparison with the formidable preparations of the Perfians. He had a fleet of only fourfcore and ten gallies, and his army fcarce amounted to twenty thousand men. As he had abundance of light veffels, he laid fnares for those that carried the provisions of the enemy, of which he funk a great number, took many, and prevented the rest from arriving; which occasioned a famine amongst the Persians, attended with violent feditions, which could only be appeafed by the coming of fresh convoys from Cilicia. Evagoras strengthened his fleet with fixty gallies, which he caufed to be built, and fifty fent him by Achoris king of Egypt, with all the money and corn he could have occasion for.

Evagoras with his land-forces attacked immediately a part of the enemy's army, which was feparate from the reft, and entirely routed it. This first action was soon followed by another at sea, in which the Persians were worsted for some time, till, animated by the warm reproaches and remonstrances of their admiral, they resumed courage, and obtained a complete victory. Salamin was immediately besieged by sea and land. Evagoras, leaving the desence of the city to his son Pythagoras, quitted it in the night with ten gallies, and sailed for Egypt, to engage the king to support him vigorously against the common enemy. He did not obtain from him all the aid he expected. At his return he found the city in exceeding distress; and finding himself without resource or hope, he was obliged to capitulate. The proposals made to him were, that he should abandon all the cities of Cyprus, except Salamin, where he should content himself to reign; that he should pay an annual tribute to the king, and remain in obedience to him as a servant to a master. The extremity to which he was reduced obliged him to accept the other conditions, hard as they were; but he could never resolve to comply with the last, and persisted always in declaring, that he could only treat as a king with a king. Tiribasus, who commanded the siege, would abate nothing of his pretensions.

A. M. 3618. Ant. J. C. 386. Diod. l. xv. p. 328-333.

Orontes, the other general, jealous of his colleague's glory, had written fecretly to court against him, accusing him, among it other things, of forming defigns against the king, and strengthened his accufation from his continuing to hold a fecret intelligence with the Lacedaemonians, and his manifest endeavours to make the chiefs of the army his creatures, by the force of presents, promises, and a complacency of manners not natural to him. Artaxerxes, upon these letters, believed he had no time to lofe, and that it was necessary to prevent a conspiracy ready to break out. He dispatched orders immediately to Orontes, to feize Tiribafus, and fend him to court in chains which was instantly put in execution. Tiribasus, upon his arrival demanded to be brought to a trial in form; that the heads of the accusation should be communicated to him, and the proofs and witnesses produced. The king, employed in other cares, had no leifure at that time to take cognizance of the affair.

Orontes in the mean time feeing that the befieged made a vigorous defence, and that the foldiers of the army, discontented with the removal of Tiribasus, quitted the service and resusted to obey him, was afraid affairs would take a bad turn with regard to him. 'He therefore caused Evagoras to be spoke to underhand; the negotiation was resumed; the offers made at first by the letter were accepted; and the mortifying article, which had prevented the conclusion of the treaty, retrenched. The siege was raised in consequence. Evagoras continued king of Salamin only, and engaged to pay an annual tribute.

It appears that this prince lived twelve or thirteen years after the conclusion of the treaty; for his death is dated in the year of the world 3632. His old age was attended with a happiness and tranquillity never interrupted with sickness or discase, the usual effect of a sober and temperate life. Nicocles his eldest son succeeded him, and inherited his virtues as well as his throne. He celebrated his succeeded him the utmost magnificence. The discourse, entitled Evagoras, composed by Isocrates, to inspire the young king with the desire of treading in the steps of his sather, and from which I have extracted the subsequent eulogium, served for his suneral oration. He also addressed another tract to Nicocles, which bears his name, wherein he gives him admirable precepts for governing well. I shall perhaps have occasion to speak further of them afterwards.

EULOGY and CHARACTER of EVAGORAS.

THOUGH Evagoras was only king of a little state, Isocrates, who was well able to judge of virtue and merit, compares him with the most powerful monarchs, and proposes him as the perfect model of a good king; convinced that not the extent of provinces, but extent of mind and greatness of soul, constitute great princes. He does in effect point out to us many qualities truly royal to him, and which ought to give us a very high idea of his merit.

Evagoras was not of the number of those princes, who believe, that to reign, it is sufficient to be of the blood royal, and that the birth which gives a right to the crown, gives also the merit and qualities necessary for wearing it with honour. He did not fancy, that it could be supposed, as every other condition and station of life made a kind of apprenticeship necessary to its success, the art of reigning, the most dissiputed and important of all, should require no pains and preparation for its attainment. He came into the world with the most happy dispositions; a great fund of genius, an easy conception, a lively and instant penetration which nothing escaped, a solidity of judgment, that immediately resolved what it was necessary to act: qualities, which might seem to dispense with all study and application; and yet, as if he had been born without talents, and found himself obliged to supply by study what he might want by nature, he neglected no means for the embellishment of his mind, and devoted a * considerable part of his time in instructing himself, in reslecting, meditating, and consulting the judgment and merit of others.

y Ifocrat. in Evag.

When he ascended the throne, his greatest care and application was to know mankind, in which the ability of a prince, and of those who are at the head of affairs, principally confifts. He had no doubt prepared himself for that science by the study of history, which gives a kind of anticipation of it, fupplies the place of experience, and teaches us what the men are with whom we live, by what they have been in other ages. But we study men quite differently in themselves; by their manners, characters, conduct, and actions. The love of the commonwealth rendered him attentive to all persons who were capable of ferving or hurting it. He applied himfelf to the discovery of their most secret inclinations and principles of action, and to the knowledge of their different talents and degrees of capacity, in order to affign each his proper post, to bestow authority according to merit, and to make the private and public good promote each other. He neither rewarded nor punished his subjects, says Isocrates, from the report of others; but folely upon his own knowledge and experience of them; and neither the virtues of the good, nor the vices of the bad, escaped his inquiry and penetration.

He had one quality very feldom found in those who possess the first rank in authority, especially when they believe themselves capable of governing alone: I mean a wonderful docility and attention to the sense of others, which arose from a dissidence in his own abilities. With his great qualities, he did not seem to have occasion for recourse to the counsel of others, and nevertheless made no resolution, and formed no enterprife, without having first consulted the wise persons he had placed about him in his court; instead of which, pride and presumption, the latent poisons of sovereign power, incline the greatest part of those who arrive at thrones, either to ask no counsel at all, or not to follow it when they do.

Volume IV.

* Εν τῷ ζητείν; καὶ φροντίζειν, καὶ βυλεύεσθαίς τον πλώσον χρίουν δίντριβεν.

Intent upon discovering the excellent in every form of government and private condition of life, he proposed the uniting of all their high qualities and great advantages in himself; affable and popular as in a republican state; grave and serious as in the councils of the aged and the senate; steady and decisive as monarchy after mature deliberation; a prosound politician by the extent and rectitude of his views; an accomplished warrior, from intrepid valour in battle directed by a wise moderation; a good father, a good relation, a good friend; and what crowns all his praise*, in every circumstance of his character, always great, and always himself.

He supported his dignity and rank, not with an air of pride and haughtiness, but by a serenity of aspect, and a mild and easy majesty, resulting from innate virtues, and the evidence of a good conscience. He won the hearts of his friends by his liberality, and conquered others by a greatness of soul, to which they could not refuse their esteem and admiration.

But what was most royal in him, and attracted the entire considence of his subjects, neighbours, and even enemies, was his sincerity, faith, and regard to all his engagements; and his hatred, or rather detestation, for all disguises, falsehood, and fraud. A single word on his side had as much regard paid to it as the most sacred oath; and it was universally known, that nothing was capable of inducing him to violate it in the least circumstance whatsoever.

It was by all these excellent qualities that he effectually reformed the city of Salamin, and entirely changed the face of its affairs in a very short time. He found it gross, savage, and barbarous, without any taste either for learning, commerce, or arms. What cannot a prince do who loves his people, and is beloved by them; who believes himself great and powerful only to render them happy; and knows how to set a just value upon and do honour to their labours, industry, and merit of every kind? He had not been many years upon the throne, before arts, sciences, commerce, navigation, and military discipline, were seen to slourish at Salamin; insomuch that that city did not give place to the most opulent of Greece.

Hocrates often repeats, that in the praifes he gives Evagoras, of which I have only extracted a part, far from exaggerating any thing, he always falls short of truth. To what can we attribute a reign fo wife, fo just, fo moderate, fo constantly employed in rendering his fubjects happy, and in promoting the public good? The condition of Evagoras, before he came to govern, feems to me to have contributed very much to it. The being born a prince, and the having never experienced any other condition but that of master and sovereign, are, in my opinion, great obstacles to the knowledge and practice of the duties of that high station. Evagoras, who came into the world under a tyrant, had long obeyed before he commanded. He had born in a private and dependant life the yoke of an absolute and despotic power. He had seen himself exposed to envy and calumny, and had been in danger for his merit and virtue. Such a prince had only to be told upon his ascending the throne what was said to a great emperor *; " + You have not always been what you now are. Advertity " has prepared you to make a good use of power. You have " lived long amongst us, and like us. You have been in " danger under bad princes. You have trembled for your-" felf, and known by experience how virtue and innocence " have been treated. What he had perfonally fuffered, what he had feared for himself or others, what he had feen unjust and unreasonable in the conduct of his predecessors, had opened his eyes, and taught him all his duty. It sufficed to tell him. what the emperor Galba told Pifo, when he adopted him his affociate in the empire: " ‡ Remember what you

Hij

* Trajan.

† Quam utile est ad usum secundorum per adversa venisse! Vizisti nobiscum, periclitatus es, timuisti. Quae tunc erat innocentium vita scis, et expertus es Plin. in panegyr.

† Utilissimus quidem ac brevissimus bonarum malarumque rerum delectus, cogitare quid aut nolucris sub alio principe, aut volucris. Tacit, hist. l. i. c. 16,

- " condemned or applauded in princes, when you were a pri- " vate man. You have only to confult the judgment you
- " then passed upon them, and to act conformably to it, for
- " your instruction in the art of reigning well."

TRIAL of TIRIBASUS.

WE have already faid, that Tiribafus, having been accused by Orontes of forming a conspiracy against the king, had been fent to court in chains. Gaos, admiral of the fleet, who had married his daughter, apprehending that Artaxerxes would involve him in the affair with his father-in-law, and cause him to be put to death upon mere fuspicion, conceived he had no other means for his fecurity than an open revolt. He was very well beloved by the foldiers; and all the officers of the fleet were particularly at his devotion. Without loss of time he fent deputies to Achoris king of Egypt, and concluded a league with him against the king of Persia. On another side, he folicited the Lacedaemonians warmly to come into that league, with assurances of making them masters of all Greece, and of establishing universally their form of government; at which they had long feemed to aspire. They hearkened favourably to these proposals, and embraced with joy this occafion of taking arms against Artaxerxes; the rather, because the peace they had concluded with him, by which they had given up the Greeks of Asia, had covered them with shame, and filled them with remorfe.

As foon as Artaxerxes had put an end to the war of Cyprus *, he thought of concluding also the affair of Tiribasus. He was so just as to appoint for that purpose three commissioners, who were great lords of Persia of distinguished probity, and of the highest reputation in his court. The affair came to an examination, and an hearing on both sides. For so considerable a crime as that of having conspired against the king's person, no other proofs were produced than the letters of Orontes; that is to say, of a declared enemy, studious to supplant his rival. Orontes was in hopes, from his credit at court, that the affair would not have been discussed in the ufual forms, and that upon the memorial fent by him, the accufed would have been condemned without further examination. But that was not the custom with the Persians. By an anciently-established regulation, to which amongst other privileges they had a right by birth, no person was ever to be condemned, without being first heard and confronted with his accufers. This was granted to Tiribafus, who answered to all the articles of the letter. As to his connivance with Evagoras, the treaty itself concluded by Orontes was his apology; as it was absolutely the same that prince had proposed to him, except a condition, which would have done honour to his master. As to his intelligence with the Lacedaemonians, the glorious treaty he had made them fign, fufficiently explained whether his own or the king's interests were his motives for it. He did not deny his credit in the army; but apprehended it had not been long a crime to be beloved by the officers and foldiers; and concluded his defence, in reprefenting the long fervices he had rendered the king, with inviolable fidelity; and especially his good fortune in having formerly faved his life, when he was hunting, and in great danger of being devoured by two lions. The three commiffioners were unanimous in declaring Tiribafus innocent. The king restored him to his former favour; and justly enraged at the black defign of Orontes, let the whole weight of his indignation fall upon him. A fingle example of this kind against informers convicted of falsehood, would for ever shut the door against calumny. How many innocents have been destroyed for want of observing this rule, which even the Pagans confidered as the basis of all justice, and the guardian of the public tranquillity !

Diodorus refers the decifion of this affair, till after the war with the Cadufians, of which we shall foon speak; this seems very improbable.

SECTION VII.

The EXPEDITION of ARTAXERXES against the CADUSIANS, HISTORY of DATAMES the CARIAN.

When Artaxerxes had terminated the Cyprian war *, he entered upon another against the Cadusians, who it is probable had revolted, and refused to pay the customary tribute; for authors say nothing as to the occasion of this war. Those people inhabited part of the mountains, situated between the Euxine and Caspian seas in the north of Media. The soil is there so ungrateful, and so little proper for cultivation, that no corn is sown upon it. The people subsist almost entirely upon apples, pears, and other fruits of that kind. Inured from their insancy to a hard and laborious life, they looked upon dangers and fatigues as nothing; and for that reason made excellent soldiers. The king marched against them in person, at the head of an army of three hundred thousand soot, and ten thousand horse. Tiribasus was with him in this expedition.

Artaxerxes had not advanced far into the country, when his army fuffered extremely by famine. The troops could find nothing to fubfift upon; and it was impossible to bring provisions from other places, the ways being difficult and impracticable. The whole camp were reduced to eat their carriage beafts; which foon became so fearce, that an ass's head was valued at fixty drachms*, and was very hard to be got at that price. The king's table itself began to fall short, and only a few horses remained, the rest having been entirely consumed.

In this melancholy conjuncture, Tiribasus contrived a stratagem, which saved the king and army. The Cadusians had two kings, who were encamped separately with their troops. Tiribasus, who took care to be informed of all that passed, had been apprised that there was some misunderstanding between them, and that their jealousy of each other prevented their acting in concert, as they ought to have done. After having communicated his defign to Artaxerxes, he went himself to one of the kings, and dispatched his son to the other. They each of them informed the king to whom they applied, that the other had sent ambassadors to treat with Artaxerxes privately, and advised him to lose no time, but to make his peace directly, in order that the conditions of it might be the more advantageous; promising to assist them with their whole credit. The fraud succeeded. The *Pagans thought it no crime to use it with enemies. Ambassadors set out from both princes, with Tiribassa and his son in their company.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Plut in Artax. p. p. 1023, 1024.

* Thirty livres.

As this double negotiation lasted some time, Artaxerxes began to suspect Tiribasus; and his enemies taking that opportunity, forgot nothing to his prejudice that might ruin him in the king's opinion. That prince already repented the confidence he had reposed in him, and thereby gave room for those who envied him, to vent their calumies and invectives. Upon what does the fortune of the most faithful subjects depend with a credulous and suspicious prince? Whilst this passed, arrived Tiribasus on his side, and his son on the other, each with ambassadors from the Cadusians. The treaty being concluded with both parties, and the peace made, Tiribasus became more powerful than ever in his master's favour, and returned with him.

The king's behaviour in this march was much admired. Neither the gold with which he was covered, his purple robes, nor the jewels that glittered all over him, and were worth fixand-thirty millions of livres†, prevented his having an equal fhare in the whole fatigue with the meanest foldier. He was feen with his quiver at his back, and his shield on his arm, to dismount from his horse, and march foremost in those rugged and difficult countries. The foldiers observing his patience and fortitude, and animated by his example, became so light, that they seemed rather to sy than walk. At length he arrived at one of his palaces, where the gardens were in admirable order, and there was a park of great extent and well planted, which was the more furprifing, as the whole country about it was entirely naked, and bore no kind of trees. As it was the depth of winter, and excessive cold, he gave the foldiers permission to cut down the wood in this park, without excepting the finest trees, either pines or cypresses. But the soldiers not being able to resolve to fell timber of such exceeding beauty and stateliness, the king took an ax, and began by cutting the finest and largest tree himself; after which the troops spared none, cut down all the wood they wanted, and kindled as many fires as were necessary to their passing the night without any inconvenience. When we reflect how much value great persons generally set upon their gardens and houses of pleasure, we must confess Artaxerxes's generosity in making this facrifice, which argued a very laudable goodness of heart, and a fensibility for the distresses and sufferings of his soldiers. But he did not always support that character.

Hiiij

* Dolus an virtus, quis in hoste requirat? Virgil.

† Twelve thousand talents.

The king had loft in this enterprise a great number of his best troops, and almost all his horses: And as he imagined that he was despised upon that account, and the ill success of his expedition, he became very much out of humour with the grandees of his court, and put to death a great number of them in the emotions of his wrath, and more out of distrust, and the sear of their attempting something against him: For sear in a suspicious prince is a very destructive and bloody passion; whereas true courage is gentle, humane, and averse to all jealously and suspicion.

b One of the principal officers that perished in this expedition against the Cadusians, was Camisares, by nation a Carian, and governor of Leuco-Syria, a province inclosed between Cilicia and Cappadocia. His son Datames succeeded him in that government, which was given him in consideration of the good services he had also rendered the king in the same expedition. He was the greatest captain of his time; and Cornelius Nepos, who has given us his life, does not prefer Amilcar and Hannibal to him amongst the Barbarians. It appears from his history of it, that no one ever excelled him in boldness, valour, and ability in inventing schemes and stratagems, in activity in the execution of his designs, in presence of mind to resolve in the heat of action, and to find resources upon the most desperate occasions; in a word, in every thing that regards military knowledge. It seems that nothing was wanting to his having acquired a more illustrious name, than a noble theatre, and more exalted occasions; and perhaps an historian to have given a more extensive narration of his exploits: For Cornelius Nepos, according to his general plan, could not relate them but in a very succinct manner.

Cor. Nep. in vit. Datamis.

He began to diftinguish himself particularly by the execution of a commission, that was given him to reduce Thyus, a yery powerful prince, and governor of Paphlagonia, who had revolted against the king. As he was his near relation, he thought it incumbent upon him at first to try the methods of lenity and reconciliation, which almost cost him his life, through the treachery of Thyus, by the ambuscades he laid for him. Having escaped so great a danger, he attacked him with open force; though he faw himself adandoned by Ariobarzanes. fatrap of Lydia, Ionia, and all Phrygia, whom jealoufy prevented from giving him aid. He took his enemy prisoner, with his wife and children; and knowing with what joy the king would receive the news, he endeavoured to make it the more fensible by the pleasure of a surprise. He set out with his illustrious prisoner, without giving the court any advice, and made great marches, to prevent its being known from rumour before his arrival. When he came to Sufa, he equipped Thyus in a very fingular manner. He was a man of a very tall stature, of an haggard and terrible aspect, a black complexion, with the hair of his head and beard very long. He dreffed him in a magnificent habit, put a collar and bracelets of gold about his neck and arms, and added to this equipage all the ornaments of a king, as he was in effect. For himself, in the gross habit of a peasant, and clad like a hunter, he led Thyus upon the left in a leash, like a wild beast that had been taken in the toils. The novelty of the fight drew the whole city after it: But nobody was so much surprised and pleased as the king, when he faw them approach in that pleafant mafquerade. The rebellion of a prince, very powerful in his country, had given Artaxerxes great and just alarm; and he did not expect to have seen him so soon in his hands. So sudden and successful an execution gave him an higher opinion than ever of the merit of Datames.

To express his sense of it, he gave him an equal share in the command of the army designed against Egypt, with Pharnabasus and Tithraustes, the two principal persons in the state, and even appointed him general in chief, when he recalled Pharnabasus.

When he was upon the point of fetting out for that expedition, Artaxerxes ordered him to march directly against Aspis, who had made the country revolt, which he commanded in the neighbourhood of Cappadocia. The commission was little important for an officer who had been appointed general, and besides very dangerous, because it was necessary to go in quest of the enemy into a very remote country. The king soon perceived his error, and countermanded him: But Datames had set out directly with an handful of men, and marched night and day; judging that diligence, without a great number of troops, was all that was necessary to surprise and vanquish the enemy. It happened according to his expectation; and the couriers dispatched by the king, met Aspis in chains upon the road to Susa.

Nothing was talked of at the court but Datames. It was not known which to admire most, his ready obedience, his wise and enterprising bravery, or his extraordinary success. So glorious a reputation gave offence to the courtiers in power. Enemies in secret to each other, and divided by a contrariety of interests, and a competition in their pretensions, they united together against a superior merit, which reproached their defects, and was therefore a crime in their acceptation. They conspired to ruin him in the king's opinion, and succeeded but too well. As they besieged him perpetually, and he was not upon his guard against persons who appeared so well affected to his service, they inspired him with jealousy and suspicion, to the prejudice of the most zealous and faithful of his officers.

An intimate friend of Datames, who held one of the highest posts at the court, apprised him of what passed, and of the conspiracy which had been formed against him, and had already sunk his credit considerably with the king. *He represented to him, that if the Egyptian expedition, with which he was charged, should take a bad turn, he would find himself exposed to great dangers: That it was the custom with kings to attribute good successes to themselves and their auspicious fortune only, and to impute the bad to the faults of their generals, for which they were responsible at the peril of their heads: That he ran the greater risk, as all that were about the king's person, and had any ascendant over him, were his declared enemies, and had sworn his destruction.

Upon this advice, Datames refolved to quit the king's fervice, though without doing any thing hitherto contrary to the fidelity he owed him. He left the command of the army to Mandrocles of Magnesia, departed with his own troops for Cappadocia, feized Paphlagonia which joined it, allied himfelf fecretly with Ariobarzanes, raifed troops, took possession of fortreffes, and put good garifons in them. He received advice that the Pifidians were arming against him. He did not wait their coming on, but made his army march thither under the command of his youngest fon, who had the misfortune to be killed in a battle. However lively his affliction might be up on that occasion, he concealed his death; lest the bad news should discourage his troops. When he approached near the enemy, his first care was to take possession of an advantageous post. 6 Mithrobarzanes, his father-in-law, who commanded the horfe, believing his fon entirely ruined, determined to go over to the enemy, Datames, without concern or emotion, caused a rumour to be spread throughout the army, that it was only a feint concerted between him and his father-in-law. and followed him close, as if he defigned to put his troops into a disposition for charging the enemy in two different attacks. The stratagem had all the fuccess he expected from it. When they joined battle, Mithrobarzanes was treated as an enemy on both fides, and cut to pieces, with his troops. The army of the Pisidians was put to slight, and left Datames master of the field, and of all the rich booty found in the camp of the conquered.

c Diod. L xv. p. 399.

&lt;sup>e</sup> Docet eum magno fore in periculo, fiquid, illo imperante, in Egypto adversi accidisfet. Namque eam esse consuetudinem regnum, ut casus adversos hominibus tribuant, secundos fortunae suae; quo facile sieri, ut impellantur ad eorum perniciem, quorum ductu res male gestae nuncientur. Illum hoc majore fore in discrimine, quod, quibus rex maxime obediat, cos habeat inimicissimos. Cor. Nep.

Datames had not till then declared openly against the king, the actions we have related being only against governors, with whom he might have particular differences, which we have observed before was common enough. His own eldest son. called Scifmas, made himself his accuser, and discovered his whole defigns to the king. Artaxerxes was highly apprehenfive of the confequence. He knew all the merit of this new enemy, and that he did not engage in any enterprife without having maturely confidered all its confequences, and taken the necessary measures to secure its success; and that hitherto the execution had always answered the wisdom of his projects. He fent an army against him into Cappadocia of almost two hundred thousand men, of which twenty thousand were horse, all commanded by Autophradates. The troops of Datames did not amount to the twentieth part of the king's: So that he had no resource but in himself, the valour of his soldiers, and the happy fituation of the post he had chosen; for in that confifted his chief excellence; never captain having better known how to take his advantages and choose his ground, when he was to draw up an army in battle.

His post, as I have observed, was infinitely superior to that of the enemy. He had pitched upon a situation where they could not surround him; where, upon the least movement they made, he could come to blows with them with very considerable advantage; and where, had they resolved to sight, their edds in number would have been absolutely useless to them. Autophradates well knew, that according to all the rules of war, he ought not to hazard a battle in such a conjuncture: But he observed at the same time, that it was much to his dishenour, with so numerous an army, to make choice of a reteat, or to continue any longer in inaction before an handful of enemies. He therefore gave the fignal. The first attack was rude; but the troops of Autophradates soon gave way, and were entirely routed. The victor pursued them for some time with great slaughter. There were only a thousand men killed on the side of Datames.

Several battles, or rather skirmishes, were fought afterwards, in which the latter was always victorious; because, perfectly knowing the country, and fucceeding especially in the firatagems of war, he always posted himself advantageously, and engaged the enemy in difficult ground, from whence they could not extricate themselves without loss. Autophradates feeing all his endeavours ineffectual, and his supplies entirely exhausted, and despairing of ever being able to subject by force fo artful and valiant an enemy, intreated an accomodation, and proposed to him the being restored to the king's favour upon honourable conditions. Datames was not ignorant, that there was little fecurity for him in fuch a choice. because princes are seldom reconciled in earnest with a subject. who has failed in his obedience, and to whom they fee themfelves in some fort obliged to submit. However, as only defpair had hurried him into the revolt, and he had always retained at heart the fentiments of zeal and affection for his prince, he accepted the offers with joy, which would put an end to the violent condition his misfortune had engaged him in, and afforded him the means of returning to his duty, and of employing his talents for the fervice of the prince to whom they were due. He promised to send deputies to the king; upon which enfued a ceffation of arms; and Autophradates retired into Phrygia, which was his government.

Datames was not deceived. Artaxerxes, furiously enraged against him, had changed the esteem and affection he formerly professed for him, into an implacable hatred. Finding himfelf incapable of conquering him by the force of arms, he was not ashamed to employ artifice and treachery: Means unworthy every man of honour, and how much more so of a prince! He hired several murderers to assassinate him; but Datames was so happy as to escape their ambuscades. At length Mithridates, the son of Ariobarzanes, to whom the king had made magnificent promifes, if he could deliver him from fo formidable an enemy, having infinuated himfelf into his friendfhip, and having long treated him with all the marks of the most entire fidelity to acquire his confidence, took the advantage of a favourable opportunity, when he was alone, and stabbed him with his sword before he was in a condition to defend himfelf.

Thus * fell this great captain in the snares of a pretended friendship, who had always thought it his honour to observe the most inviolable sidelity, in regard to those with whom he had any engagements. Happy, had he always piqued himself also upon being as faithful a subject, as he was a true friend and if he had not in the latter part of his life, sullied the lustre of his heroic qualities, by the ill use he made of them; which neither the fear of disgrace, the injustice of those who envied him, the ingratitude of his master for the services he had rendered him, nor any other pretext, could sufficiently authorise +.

I am surprised, that, comparable as he was to the greatest persons of antiquity, he has remained in a manner buried in silence and oblivion. His great actions and exploits are however worthy of being preserved in history: For it is in such small bodies of troops as those of Datames, that the whole soul is exerted, in which the highest prudence is shewn, in which chance has no share, and the abilities of a general appear in their sull light.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTOTY of SOCRATES abridged.

As the death of Socrates is one of the most considerable events of antiquity, I thought it incumbent on me to treat that subject with all the extent it deserves. In this view I shall premise some things, which are necessary to the reader's having a just idea of this prince of the philosophers.

* Ita vir, qui multos confilio, neminem perfidia ceperat, fimulata captus est amiuitia. Cor. Nep.

† This doctrine of Mr. Rollin's may do very well in France, where implicit obedience to the grand monarch is the law of the land; but it has too much of that exploded abfurdity, paffive obedience, founded in an erroneous acceptation of religion, to be admitted in a free nation; where, by the maxims of the law, and the conflitution of the government, the fubject in many infrances is dispensed from his obedience, and may defend himself, even in arms, against his prince; viz. in cases of life and liberty.

Two authors will fupply me principally with what I have to fay upon this subject, Plato and Xenophon, both disciples of Socrates. It is to them posterity is indebted for many of his discourses, * that philosopher having left nothing in writing, and for an ample account of all the circumstances of his condemnation and death. Plato was an eye-witness of the whole, and relates, in his Apology, the manner of Socrates's accusation and defence; in his Criton, his refusal to make his escape out of prison; in his Phaedon, his admirable discourse upon the immortality of the foul, which was immediately followed by his death. Xenophon was absent at that time, and upon his return after the expedition of young Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes: So that he wrote his Apology of Socrates only upon the report of others; but his actions and discourses, in his four books of memorable things, he repeats from his own knowledge. Diogenes Laertius has given us the life of Soerates, but in a very dry and abridged manner.

SECTION I.

BIRTH and EDUCATION of SOCRATES.

Socrates was born at Athens in the fourth year of the feventy feventh Olympiad *. His father Sophronifcus was a fculptor, and his mother Phanarete a midwife. Hence we may observe, that meanness of birth is no obstacle to true merit, in which alone folid glory and real nobility consist. It appears from the comparisons Socrates often used in his discourses, that he was neither ashamed of his father's or mother's profession, be the was surprised that a sculptor should employ his whole attention to mould an insensible stone into the likeness of a man, and that a man should take so little pains not to resemble an infensible stone. <sup>c</sup> He would often say, that he exercised the function of a midwise with regard to the mind, in making it bring forth all its thoughts, which was indeed the peculiar talent of Socrates. He treated subjects in so simple, natural, and pure an order, that he made those with whom he disputed say what he would, and find an answer themselves to all the questions he proposed to them. He at first learned his father's trade, in which he made himself very expert. <sup>d</sup> In the time of Pausanias, there was a Mercury and the Graces to be seen at Athens of his workmanship; and it is to be presumed, these statues would not have found place amongst those of the greatest masters in the art, if they had not been thought worthy of it.

&lt;sup>a</sup> A. M. 3533. Apt. J. C. 471. Diog. Laert, in Socrat. p. 100. b Ibid. p. 110.

* Socrates, cujus ingenium variofque fermones immortalitati feriptis suis Plato tradidit, literam nullam reliquit. Cic. de orat. l. iii. n. 57.

e Criton is reported to have taken him out of his father's shop, from the admiration of his fine genius, and the opinion, that it was inconfiftent for a young man, capable of the greatest things, to continue perpetually employed upon stone with a chifel in his hand. He was the disciple of Archelaus who conceived a great affection for him. Archelaus had been pupil to Anaxagoras, a very celebrated philosopher. His first study was physics, the works of nature, and the movement of the heavens, flars, and planets; according to the custom of those times, wherein only that part of philosophy was known, and Xenophon f affures us of his being very learned in it. But * after having found by his own experience, how difficult, abstrufe, intricate, and at the same time how little useful that kind of learning was to the generality of mankind, he was the first, according to Cicero, who conceived the thought of bringing down philosophy from heaven to place it in cities, and intro-

c Plat. in Theatet. p. 149, &c. d Pauf. l. ix. p. 596.

e Diod. p. 101. f Lib. iv. Mem. p. 710.

* Socrates primus philosophiam devocavit e coelo, et in urbibus collocavit, et ia domos etiam introduxit, et coeget de vita et moribus, rebusque bonis et malis quaerere. Cic Tusc. quaest. l. v. n. 10.

Socrates mihi videtur, id quod constat inter omnes, primus a rebus occultis, et ab ipsa natura involutis, in quibus omnes ante eum philosophi occupati fuerunt, avocavisse philosophiam, et ad vitam comnunem adduxisse; ut de virtutibus et vitiis, omninoque de bonis rebus et malis quaereret; coelestia autem vel procul esse a nostra cognitione censeret, vel si maxime cognita essent, nihil tamen ad bene vivendum conserve. Cie. acad. quaest. i. n. 15.

duce it into private houses; humanizing it, to use that expression, and rendering it more familiar, more useful in common life, more within the reach of man's capacity, and applying it solely to what might make them more rational, just, and virtuous, § He found there was a kind of folly in devoting the whole vivacity of his mind, and employing all his time, in inquiries merely curious, involved in impenetrable darkness, and absolutely incapable of contributing to human happiness; whilf the neglected to inform himself in the ordinary duties of life, and in learning what is conformable, or opposite to piety justice and probity; in what fortitude, temperance, and wisdom consist; and what is the end of all government, what the rules of it, and what qualities are necessary for commanding and ruling well. We shall see in the sequel the use he made of this study.

It was fo far from preventing him to discharge the duties of a good citizen, that it was the means of making him the more observant of them. He bore arms, as did all the people of Athens; but with more pure and elevated motives. He made many campaigns, was present in many actions, and always distinguished himself by his valour and fortitude. He was seen, towards the end of his life, giving in the senate, of which he was a member, the most shining proofs of his zeal for justice, without being intimidated by the greatest present dangers.

He had accustomed himself early to a sober, severe, laborious life; without which it seldom happens, that men are capable of discharging the greatest part of the duties of good citizens. It is difficult to carry the contempt of riches and the love of poverty farther than he did. <sup>h</sup> He looked upon it as a divine perfection to be in want of nothing; and believed, the less we are contented with, the nearer we approach to the divinity. * Seeing the pomp and shew displayed by luxury in certain ceremonies, and the infinite quantity of gold and silver employed in them: "How many things," said he, congratu-

Volume IV.

T

g Xenoph. Memorab. l. i. p. 710. h Ibid

* Socrates in pompa, cum magna vis auri argentique ferretur: Quam multa non defidero! inquit. Cic. Tafe. Quaest. l. 5.

lating himfelf on his condition, "do I not want!" "Quantis" non egeo!

His father left him fourfcore minae, that is to fay, four thousand livres, which he lent to one of his friends who had occasion for that sum. But the affairs of that friend having taken an ill turn, he loft the whole; and fuffered that misfortune with fuch indifference and tranquility, that he did not fo much as complain of it. k We find in Xenophon's Occonmies, that his whole effate amounted to no more than five minae, or two hundred and fifty livres. The richest persons of Athens were his friends, who could never prevail upon him to accept any share of their wealth. When he was in want of any thing, he was not ashamed to declare it: " * If I had "money," faid he one day in an affembly of his friends, "I " should buy me a cloak." He did not address himself to any body in particular, but contented himself with that general information. His disciples contended for the honour of making him this fmall prefent; which was being too flow, fays Seneca; their own observation ought to have prevented both the want and the demand.

He generously refused the offers and presents of Archelaus king of Macedonia, who was desirous of having him at his court; adding, "that he could not go to a man, who could "give him more than it was in his power to return." Another philosopher does not approve this answer. "Was it making a prince a small return," says Seneca, "to undeceive him in his false ideas of grandeur and magniscence; to inspire him with a contempt for riches; to show him the right use of them; to instruct him in the great art of reigning; in a "word, to teach him how to live and how to die? But," continues Seneca, "the true reason which prevented his going to the court of that prince, was, that he did not think it consistent for him to seek a voluntary servitude, whose liberty a free city could not suffer him to enjoy." "Noluit ire ad

i Liban in Apolog. Socrat. p. 640. k Xenoph. Oecon. p. 822.

* Socrates, amicis audientibus: Emissem, inquit, pallium, si nummos haberem. Neminem popolcit, omnes admonuit. A quo acciperit, ambitus suit.—Post hoc quisquis properaverit, sero dat; jam Socrati desuit. Senec. de benef. l. vii. c. 24:

" voluntariam fervitutem is cujus libertatem civitas libera ferre
" non potuit '."

m The peculiar auflerity of his life did not render him gloomy and morofe, as was common enough with the philosophers of those times. In company and conversation he was always gay and facetious, and the sole joy and spirit of the entertainment. Though he was very poor, he piqued himself upon the neatness of his person and house, and could not suffer the ridiculous affectation of Antisthenes, who always wore dirty and ragged clothes. He told him once, that through the holes in his cloak, and the rest of his tatters, abundance of vanity might be discerned.

One of the most distinguishing qualities of Socrates, was a tranquillity of foul, that no accident, no lofs, no injury, no ill treatment, could ever alter. Some have believed, that he was by nature hasty and passionate, and that the moderation, to which he had attained, was the effect of his reflections and endeavours to subdue and correct himself; which would still add to his merit, O Seneca tells us, that he had defired his friends to apprife him whenever they faw him ready to fall into a paffion, and that he had given them that privilege over him, which he took himself with them. * Indeed the best time to call in aid against rage and anger, that have so violent and sudden a power over us, is when we are yet ourfelves, and in cool blood. At the first fignal, the least animadversion, he either softened his tone, or was filent. Finding himself in great emotion against a flave; "I would beat you," fays he, "if I were not angry:" " P Caederem te, nifi irascerer." Having received a box on the ear, he contented himself with only saying, with a smile; Tis a misfortune not to know when to put on a helmet.

Without going out of his own house, he found enough to exercise his patience in all its extent. Xantippe his wife put it to the severest proofs by her capricious, passionate, violent

i Senec. de benef. l. v. c. 6.

n Ælian. l. iv. c. 11. et l. ix. c. 35.

m Xenoph. in conviv.
O Senec, de Ira. l. iii. c. 15.

P Ibid. 1. iii. c. 15.

q Ibid. l. iii. c. II.

* Contra potens malum et apud nos gratiofum, dum conspicimos, et nostri sutus, advocemus.

disposition. It seems, before he took her for his companion, that he was not ignorant of her character; and he fays himfelf in Xenophon, that he had expressly chosen her, from the conviction, that if he should be capable of bearing her infults, there would be nobody, though ever fo difficult to endure, with whom he could not live. Never was woman of fo violent and fantastical a spirit, and so bad a temper. There was no kind of abuse or injurious treatment, which he had not to experience from her. She would fometimes be transported with fuch an excess of rage, as to tear off his cloak in the open street; and seven one day, after having vented all the reproaches her fury could fuggeft, she emptied a pot upon his head; at which he only laughed, and faid, "That fo much thunder " must needs produce a shower."

1 Some ancient authors write, that Socrates married a fecond wife, named Myrto, who was the grand-daughter of Aristides the just; and that he suffered exceedingly from them both, who were continually quarrelling with each other, and never agreed, but in loading him with reproaches, and doing him all the offence they could invent. They pretend, that during the Peloponnesian war, after the pestilence had swept of great part of the Athenians, a decree was made, whereby, to retrieve the fooner the ruins of the republic, each citizen was permitted to have two wives at the fame time, and that Socrates took the benefit of this new law. Those authors found this circumflance folely upon a passage in a treatise on nobility, ascribed to Aristotle. But besides that, according to Plutarch himself; Panetius, a very grave author, has fully refuted this opinion, neither Plato nor Xenophon, who were well acquainted with all that related to their master, say any thing of this second marriage of Socrates; and on another fide, Thucydides, Xenophon, and Diodorus Siculus, who have treated at large all the particulars of the Peloponnesian war, are alike filent in regard to the pretended decree of Athens, which permitted biganny. We may see in the first volumes of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, a differtation of Monfieur

r Kenoph. in conviv. p. 876. s Diog. in Socrat. p. 112. t Plut, in Ariftid. p. 335. Athen. l. xiii p. 555. Diog. Laert, in Socrat, p. 153.

Hardion's upon this subject, wherein he demonstrates, that the fecond marriage of Socrates, and the decree upon bigamy, are supposititious facts.

SECTION II.

Of the DAEMON, or FAMILIAR SPIRIT of SOCRATES.

Our knowledge of Socrates would be defective if we knew nothing of the genius, which, he faid, had affifted him with its council and protection in the reatest part of his actions. It is not agreed amongst authors, what this genius was, commonly called "The Daemon of Socrates," from the Greek word Δαιμονιόν, that fignifies fomething of a divine nature, conceived as a fecret voice, a fign, or fuch an inspiration as diviners are supposed to have had. This genius diverted him from the execution of his defigns when they have been prejudicial to him, without ever inducing him to act any thing; " " Effe divinum " quoddam, quod Socrates daemonium appellat, cui semper " ipse paruerit, nunquam impellenti, faepe revocanti." Plutarch, in his treatife, intitled, "Of the Genius of Socrates," repeats the different fentiments of the ancients upon the existence and nature of this genius. * I shall confine myself to that of them which feems the most natural and reasonable. though he does not lay much stress upon it.

We know that the divinity has a clear and unerring know-ledge of futurity; that man cannot penetrate into its darkness but by uncertain and confused conjectures; that those who succeed best in that research, are such, who by a more exact and studied comparison of the different causes capable of influencing suture events, distinguish, with greater force and perspicuity, what will be the result and issue of the consist of those different causes in conducing to the success or miscarriage of an effect or enterprise. This foresight and discernment has something of divine in it, exalts us above the rest of mankind, approaches us to the divinity, and makes us participate in sometheasure in his councils and designs, by giving us an insight and prescience, to a certain degree, of wat he has ordained concerning the future. Socrates had a just and piercing judgment joined with the most exquisite prudence. He might call this judgment and prudence, Acquire, "fomething divine," using indeed a kind of equivocality in the expression, without attributing to himself, however, the merit of his wisdom in conjecturing upon the future. The Abbé Fraguier comes very near the same opinion in the differtation he has lest us upon this subject in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Letters.

The effect, or rather function of this genius, was to stop and prevent his acting, without ever inducing him to act. He received also the same impulse, when his friends were going to engage in any bad affair, and communicated it to him; and feyeral instances are related, wherein they found themselves very unfortunate from not having believed him. Now, what other figuification can be given to this, than that it implies, under mysterious terms, a mind, which by its own lights, and the knowledge of mankind, has attained a fort of infight into futurity? And if Socrates had not intended to leffen in his own person the merit of an unerring judgment, by attributing it to a kind of instinct, if at bottom he had defired any thing to be understood, besides the general aid of the divine wisdom, which fpeaks in every man by the voice of reason, would he have escaped, says Xenophon 2, the censure of arrogance and falsehood.

b God has always prevented me from speaking to you, says he to Alcibiades, whilst the weakness of your age would have rendered my discourses inessectual to you. But I conceive I may now enter into dispute with you, as an ambitious young man, for whom the laws open a way to the dignities of the republic. Is it not visible here, that prudence prevented Socrates, from treating Alcibiades seriously, at a time when grave and severe coversation would have given him a disgust, of which perhaps he might never have got the better? And when, in his dialogue upon the commonwealth, Socrates ascribes his avoid-

&lt;sup>9</sup> Tom. IV. p. 368.

<sup>2</sup> Plat. in Theag. p. 128.

<sup>3</sup> Memorab. I. i. p. 708.

<sup>b</sup> Plat. in Alcib. p. 150.

&lt;sup>c</sup> Lib. vi. de. Rep. p. 496. Apolog. Soc. p. 31, 32.

ing public business to inspiration from above, does he mean any thing more than what he says in his Apology, that a just and good man, who intermeddles with the government in a corrupt state, is not long without perishing? If, d when he appears before the judges who were to condemn him, that divine voice is not heard to prevent him, as it was upon dangerous occasions, the reason is, that he did not deem it a missfortune for him to die, especially at his age, and in his circumstances. Every body knows what his prognostication had been long before, upon the unfortunate expedition of Sicily. He attributed it to his daemon, and declared it to be the inspiration of that spirit. A wise man, who sees an affair ill concerted, and conducted with passion, may easily prophesy upon the event of it, without the aid of a daemon's inspiration.

It must be allowed, however, that the opinion which gives men genii and angels to direct and guard them, was not unknown even to the pagans. *Plutarch cites the verses of Menander, in which that poet expressly says, "That every man" at his birth has a good genius given him, which attends him during the whole course of his life as a guide and director."

> Απαντι δαίμων ἀνδοὶ συμπαρακατιῖ Έυθύς γενομένη, μυκαγωγός τὰ βία ᾿Αγαθός

It may be believed with probability enough, that the daemon of Socrates, which has been fo differently spoken of, and thereby made it a question, whether it was a good or bad angel, was no more than the force and rectitude of his judgment, which acting according to the rules of prudence, and with the aid of a long experience, supported by wise reflections, made him foresee the events of those things, upon which he was either consulted, or deliberated himself.

I conceive at the fame time, that he was not forry the people should believe him inspired, or that he knew futurity by any effect of the divinity whatsoever. That opinion might exalr him very much in the sense of the Athenians, and give him an authority, of which the greatest * persons of the pagan world were very fond, and which they endeavoured to acquire by secret communications, and pretended conferences with some divinity: But it drew the jealousy of many of the citizens upon him.

I iiij

SECTION III.

SOCRATES declared the WISEST of MANKIND by the ORACLE,

This declaration of the oracle f, for advantageous in appearance for Socrates, did not a little contribute to the inflaming envy and flirring up of enemies against him, as he tells us himself in his Apology, wherein he recounts the occasion and true fense of that oracle.

Chaerephon, a zealous disciple of Socrates, happening to be at Delphos, demanded of the oracle, whether there was a wifer man than Socrates in the world: The priestess replied there was none. This answer puzzled Socrates extremely, who could scarce comprehend the sense of it. For on the one side, he well knew, fays he of himfelf, that there was neither much nor little wisdom in him; and on the other, he could not fufpect the oracle of falfehood, the divinity being incapable of telling a lie. He therefore confidered it attentively, and took great pains to penetrate the fense of it. At first he applied himself to a powerful citizen; a statesman, and a great politician, who passed for one of the wifest men of the city, and who was himfelf as much convinced of his own merit as any body. He found by his conversation that he knew nothing, and infinuated as much to himfelf in terms fufficiently intelligible; which made him extremely odious to that citizen, and all who were present. He did the same by several others of the fame profession; and all the fruit of his inquiry was, to draw upon himself a greater number of enemies. From the f Plut. in Apolog. p. 21, 22.

Lycurgus and Solon had recourse to the authority of oracles to advance their credit. Zeleucus pretended that his laws had been dictated to him by Minerva. Numa Pompilius boasted his conferences with the goddess Egeria. The first Scipio Africanus made the people believe that the gods gave him secret counsels. Even Sertorius's hind had something divine in it.

statesman he addressed himself to the poets, whom he found still fuller of self-esteem, but really more void of knowledge and wisdom. He pursued his inquiries to the artisans, and could not meet with one, who, because he succeeded in his own art, did not believe himself very capable, and fully informed in all that was great besides; which presumption was the almost universal failing of the Athenians. As they had naturally abundance of wit, they pretended to be knowing in every thing, and believed themselves capable of pronouncing upon all things. His inquiries amongst strangers were not more successful.

Socrates afterwards entering into, and comparing himself with all those he had questioned *, discovered that the disference between him and them was, that they all believed they knew what they did not know, and that for his part he sincerely professed his ignorance. From thence he concluded, that only God is truly wise; and that the true meaning of the oracle was to signify, that all human wisdom was no great matter, or to speak more properly, was nothing at all. And as to the oracle's naming me, it no doubt did so, says he, by way of setting me up for an example, as if it intended to declare to all men, The wisest amongst you is he, who knows, like Socrates, that there is no real wisdom in him.

SECTION IV.

SOCRATES devotes himself entirely to the INSTRUCTION of the YOUTH of ATHENS.

After having related some particularities in the life of Socrates, it is time to proceed to that in which his character principally and peculiarly confisted; I mean the pains he took to instruct mankind, and particularly in forming the youth of Athens.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Socrates in omnibus fere fermonibus fic difputat, ut nihil affirmet ipfe, refellat alios: nihil fe feire dicat, nifi id ipfum, eoque praeftare caeteris, quod illi, quae nefciant, feire se putent; ipfe se nihil feire id unum feiat, ob eamque rem se arbitrari ab Apolline omnium sapientissimum esse dictum, quod haec esse una omnia sapientia, non arbitrari se feire quod nesciat. Cie acad. quaest, l. i. n. 15. 16.

- h He seemed, says Libanius, the common father of the republic; so attentive was he to the happiness and advantage of his whole country. But as it is very difficult to correct the aged, and to make people change principles, who revere the errors in which they have grown grey, he devoted his labours principally to the instruction of youth, in order to sow the seeds of virtue in a soil more sit to produce the fruits of it.
- He had no open school like the rest of the philosophers, nor let times for his lessons. He had no benches prepared, nor ever mounted a professor's chair. He was the philosopher of all times and feafons. He taught in all places, and upon all occasions. In walking, conversation, at meals, in the army, and in the midst of the camp, in the public assemblies of the fenate or people, in prison itself, and when he drank the poifon, he philosophifed, fays Plutarch, and instructed mankind. And from thence the fame judicious author takes occasion to establish a great principle in point of government, which Seneca * before him had placed in all its light. To be a public man, fays he, it is not necessary to be actually in office, to wear the robe of judge or magistrate, and to sit in the highest tribunals for the administration of justice. Many do this, who, though honoured with the fine names of orators, practors, and fenators, if they want the merit of those characters, ought to be regarded as private perfons, and often confounded with the lowest and vilest of the populace. But whoever knows to give wife counfels to those who consult him, to animate the citizens to virtue, and to inspire them with sentiments of probity, equity, generofity, and love of their country; this is, fays

<sup>5</sup> In Apol. Socrat. p. 941. h Plut. an feni fit, ger. resp. p. 796.

* Habet ubi se etiam in privato late explicet magnus animus.—Ita delituerit (vir ille) ut ubicunque otium sium absonderit, prodisse velit et singulis et universis, ingenio, voce, consilio. Nec enim is solus reip, prodest, qui candidatos extralit, et tuetur reos, et de pace belloque senser, sed uj juventutem exhortatur, qui in tanto bonorum praceptorum inopia virtute instruit animos, qui ad pecuniam luxuriannque cursu ruentes prensa ac retraint, et si nihil aliud certe moratur, in privato publicum negotium aget. An ille plus praestat, qui inter peregrinos et cives, aut urbanos praetor audeuutibus adiessoris verba pronunciat, quam qui docet, qui si lustitia, qui pictas, qui destintia, qui fortitudo, quid mortis contemptus, quid deorum intellectus, quam gratuitum bonum sit confecientia? Senec de tranquil, enim. c. iii.

Plutarch, the true magistrate and ruler, in whatsoever condition or place he be.

Such was Socrates. The fervices he did the state, by the instructions he gave their youth, and the disciples he formed, are inexpressibly great. Never had master a greater number, or fo illustrious. Plato, though alone, were worth a multitude. I Upon the point of death, he bleffed and thanked God for three things; that he had endued him with a rational foul, that he was born a Greek and not a Barbarian, and that he had placed his birth in the lifetime of Sccrates. k Xenophon had the same advantage. It is faid, that one day Socrates met him in the street, and stopping him with his staff, asked him whether he knew where provisions were fold? It was not difficult to answer this question. But Socrates having demanded in what place men learned virtue, and feeing this fecond queftion put him to a fland: "If you defire to know it," continued the philosopher, " follow me, and you shall be in-" formed." Which he did immediately, and was afterwards the first who collected and published his master's discourses.

Aristippus, upon a conversation with Ischomachus, in which he had introduced some strokes of Socrates's doctrine, conceived so ardent a passion to become his disciple, that he grew lean and wan in effect of it, till he could go to the sountainhead, and imbibe his sill of a philosophy that taught the knowledge and cure of evil.

What is reported of Euclid the Megarian, explains fill better how high the paffion of Socrates's disciples ran, to receive the benefit of his instructions. There was at that time an open war between Athens and Megara, which was carried on with so much animosity, that the Athenians obliged their generals to take an oath to lay waste the territory of Megara twice a year, and prohibited the Megarians to set foot in Attica upon pain of death. This decree could not extinguish nor suspend the zeal of Euclid. He less his city in the evening in the disguise of a woman, with a veil upon his head, and came to the house of Socrates in the night, where he conti-

Plut. in Mario, p. 433. k Diog, in Xenoph. p. 120.
 Plut. de curiof.
 p. 516.
 Plut. in Pericl. p. 163.
 Avl. Gel. Noct. Att. l. vi. c. 19.

rued till the approach of day, when he returned in the fame

The ardor of the young Athenians to follow him was incredible. They left father and mother, and renounced all parties of pleafure, to attach themselves to him, and to hear his discourses. We may judge of this in the example of Alcibiades, the most ardent and siery of all the Athenians. The philosopher however never spared him, and was always ready to calm the fallies of his passions, and to rebuke his pride, which was his great difease. I have before related some inflances of this temper of his. One day, when Alcibiades was boafting of his wealth, and the great estates in his possession, which generally blow up the pride of young people of quality, he carried him to a geographical map, and asked him to find Attica. It was fo finall it could scarce be discerned upon that draught; he found it, however, though with fome difficulty: But upon being defired to point out his own estate there, " It " is too fmall," fays he, " to be diftinguished in fo little a " space." "See then," replied Socrates, "how much you are " affected about an imperceptible port of land." This reasoning might have been urged much further still. For what was Attica compared to all Greece, Greece to Europe, Europe to the whole world, and the world itself to the vast extent of the infinite orbs which furround it? What an infect, what a nothing, is the most powerful prince of the earth in the midst of this abyss of bodies and immense spaces, and how much of it does he occupy!

The young people of Athens, dazzled with the glory of Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles, and full of a wild ambition, after having received for some time the lessons of the sophists, who promised to make them very great politicians, conceived themselves capable of every thing, and aspired at the highest employments. P One of these, named Glauco, had taken it so strongly into his head to enter upon the administration of the public affairs, though not twenty years old, that none of his samily or friends were able to divert him from a design so little consistent with his age and capacity.

<sup>9</sup> Aelian, l. iii. c. 28. P Kenoph. memorab. L iii. p. 772-774.

Socrates, who had an affection for him upon account of Plato his brother, was the only perfon who could prevail upon him to change his refolution.

Meeting him one day, he accosted him so happily with discourse, that he engaged him to give him the hearing. "You "are desirous then to govern the republic," said he to him. "True," replied Glauco. "You cannot have a more noble design," answered Socrates: "For if you succeed, you will have it in your power to serve your friends effectually, to aggrandize your family, and to extend the consues of your country. You will make yourself known not only to "Athens, but throughout all Greece; and perhaps your re-

" nown, like that of Themistocles, may spread abroad amongst the barbarous nations. In short, wherever you are, you will " attract the refpect and admiration of the whole world."

So fmooth and infinuating a prelude was extremely pleafing to the young man, who was taken by his blind fide. He flaid willingly, gave no occasion to press him on that account, and the conversation continued. "Since you defire to be " esteemed and honoured, no doubt your view is to be useful " to the public?" "Certainly." "Tell me then, I beg you, " in the name of the gods, what is the first fervice you pro-" pose to render the state?" As Glauco seemed at a loss, and meditated upon what he should answer, "I presume," continues Socrates, " it is to enrich it, that is to fay, to augment " its revenues." " My very thought." "You are well verfed " then undoubtedly in the revenues of the ftate, and know " perfectly to what they may amount: You have not failed to " make them your particular fludy, in order that if a fund " fhould happen to fail by any unforeseen accident, you might " be able to supply the desiciency by another." " I protest," replied Glauco, " that never entered into my thoughts." " At least you will tell me to what the expences of the re-" public amount; for you must know the importance of re-" trenching fuch as are superfluous." " I own I am as little " " informed in this point as the other." "You must there, " fore refer your defign of enriching the state till another " time; for it is impossible you should do it, whilst you are " unacquainted with its revenues and expences."

" But," faid Glauco, " there is still another means which " you have not mentioned. A state may be enriched by the " ruin of its enemies." "You are in the right," replied Socrates. " But that depends upon its being the strongest; " otherwise it incurs the danger of losing what it has. For " which reason, he who talks of engaging in a war, ought to " know the forces on both fides; that if he finds his own par-" ty ftrongest, he may boldly advise the war, and if weakest, " diffuade the people from undertaking it. Now, do you " know the strength of our republic and that of our enemies " by fea and land! Have you a state of them in writing? " Be fo kind as let me fee it." " I have it not at pre-" fent," faid Glauco. " I fee then," faid Socrates, " that " we shall not presently enter into a war, if you are charged " with the government; for you have abundance of inquires " to make, and much pains to go through, before you will " refolve upon it."

He ran over in this manner several other articles no less important, with which Glauco appeared equally unacquainted; till he brought him to confess, how ridiculous those people were, who have the rashness to intrude into government without any other preparation for the service of the public, than that of an high esteem for themselves, and an immoderate ambition of rising to the first places and dignities. "Have a "care, dear Glauco," said he to him, "less a too warm de-"fare of honours should deceive you into pursuits that may cover you with shame, by setting your incapacity and slen-"der abilities in full light."

Glauco improved from the wife admonitions of Socrates, and took time to inform himfelf in private, before he ventured to appear in public. This is a lesson for all ages, and may be very useful to persons in all stations and conditions of life.

<sup>a</sup> Socrates did not urge his friends to enter early upon public employments; but sirst to take pains for the attainment of the knowledge necessary to their success in them. "A man

&lt;sup>q</sup> Xenoph. Memorab. l. iv. p. 800. r lbid. p. 792.

"must be very simple," said he, "to believe that the mechanic arts are not to be acquired without the help of proper masters, and that the knowledge requisite in governing states, which is the highest degree of human prudence, demands no previous labour and application." His great care in regard to those who aspired at public employments, was to form their manners upon the folid principles of probity and justice; and especially to inspire them with a sincere love of their country, with the most ardent passion for the public good, and an high idea of the power and goodness of the gods:
Because, without these qualities, all other abilities serve only to render men more wicked, and more capable of doing evil.
Xenophon has transmitted to us a conversation of Socrates with Euthydemus, upon providence, which is one of the sinest passages to be found in the writings of the ancients.

" Did you never reflect within yourfelf," fays Socrates to Euthydemus, "how much care the gods have taken to bestow " upon man all that is necessary to his nature?" " Never, I " affure you," replied he. "You fee," continued Socrates, " how necessary light is, and how precious that gift of the " gods ought to appear to us." "Without it," added Euthydemus, "we should be like the blind, and all nature as if it " were not, or were dead: But because we have occasion for " fuspense and relaxation, they have also given us the night " for our repose." "You are in the right, and for this we " ought to render them continual praises and thanksgiving. " They have ordained that the fun, that bright and luminous " flar, should preside over the day to distinguish its different " parts, and that its light should not only serve to discover " the wonders of nature, but to dispense universal life and " heat; and at the fame time they have commanded the moon " and stars to illuminate the night, of itself dark and obscure. " Is there any thing more admirable than this variety and vi-" cistitude of day and night, of light and darkness, of labour " and rest; and all this for the convenience and good of " man?" Socrates enumerates in like manner the infinite advantages we receive from fire and water in the occasions of life; and continuing to observe upon the wonderful attention of providence in all that regards us, "What fay you," pursued he. " upon the fun's return after winter to revisit us; and that as " the fruits of one feafon wither and decay, he ripens new " ones to fucceed them? that having rendered man this fer-" vice, he retires, left he should incommode him by excess " of heat; and then, after having removed to a certain point, " which he could not pass without putting us in danger of pe-" rishing with cold, that he returns in the same track to re-" fume his place in those parts of the heavens where his pre-" fence is most beneficial to us? And because we could nei-" ther support the cold or heat, if we were to pass in an in-" flant from the one to the other, do you not admire, that " whilft this ftar approaches and removes fo flowly, the two " extremities arrive by almost infensible degrees? + Is it pof-" fible not to discover, in this disposition of the seasons of the "year, a providence and goodness, not only attentive to our " necessities, but even our delights and enjoyments?

"All these things," said Euthydemus, "make me doubt, whether the gods have any other employment than to shower down their gifts and graces upon mankind. There is one point, however, that puts me to a stand, which is, that the brute animals partake of all these blessings as well as our selves." "Yes," replied Socrates: "but do you but observe, that all these animals subsist only for man's service? The strongest and most vigorous of them he subjects at his will, he makes them tame and gentle, and uses them successfully in his wars, his labours, and the other occasions of life!" What if we consider man in himself." Here Socrates examines the diversity of the senses, by the ministry of which man enjoys all that is best and most excellent in nature; the vivacity of his wit, and the force of his reason, which exalt fpeech, by the means of which we communicate our thoughts reciprocally, publish our laws, and govern states. "From all this," says Socrates, "it is easy to discern that

him infinitely above all other animals; the wonderful gift of

† Ωρας άρμοτβάσας περός τύτο παρίχτιν, αυ ήμῖο δυ μόνου ὧν διόμιθα πολλά καὶ παντοῦν παρασκιυάζαση, άλλά καὶ δίς Ιυρςανόμιθα.

"there are gods, and that they have man in their parti-" cular care, though he cannot discover them by his senses. " Do we perceive the thunder, whilft it firikes through all "things which oppose it? Do we distinguish the winds, whilst "they are tearing up all before them in our view? Our foul " itself, with which we are so intimate, which moves and acts " us, is it visible? can we behold it? It is the same with re-" gard to the gods, of whom none are visible in the distri-" bution of their favours. The GREAT GOD himfelf;" thefe words are remarkable and demonstrate that Socrates acknowledged one supreme God, the author of all being, and superior to all others, who were only the ministers of his will; " this great God, who has formed the universe, and supports " the stupendous work, whose every part is finished with the " utmost goodness and harmony; he who preserves them per-" petually in immortal vigour, and causes them to obey him " with a never-failing punctuality, and a rapidity not to be " followed by our imagination; this God makes himself suf-" ficiently visible by the endless wonders of which he is author; "but continues always invisible in himself. Let us not then " refuse to believe even what we do not see, and let us sup-" ply the defects of our corporial eyes, by using those of the " foul; but especially let us learn to render the just homage " of respect and veneration to the divinity, whose will it seems "to be, that we should have no other perception of him "than by his effects in our favour. Now this adoration, "this homage, confifts in pleafing him, and we can only " please him in doing his will."

In this manner Socrates instructed youth; these are the principles and sentiments he inspired into them; on the one side a perfect submission to the laws and magistrates, in which he made justice consist; on the other, a profound regard for the Divinity, which constitutes religion. In things surpassing our understanding, he advises us to consult the gods; and as they impart themselves only to those that please them, he recommends above all things the making of them propitious by a wife regularity of conduct. "* The gods are wife," fays he, "and it depends upon them either to grant what we ask, or "to give us directly the reverse of it." He cites an excellent prayer from an anonymous poet: "Great God, give us, "we besecch thee, those good things of which we stand in "need, whether we crave them or not; and remove from "us all those, which is the hurtful to us, though we implore "tham of you." The vurgar imagined, that there are things which the gods observe, and others of which they take no notice: But Socrates taught, that the gods observe all our actions and words; that they penetrate into our most secret thoughts, are present in all our deliberations, and that they inspire us in all our actions.

Volume IV.

* Xenoph. memorab. l. iv. p. 203, et 305.

SECTION V.

SOCRATES applies bimself to discredit the SOPHISTS in the OPINION of the young ATHENIANS.

Socrates found it necessary to prejudice the young people against a bad taste, which had prevailed for some time in Greece. A sect of assuming men arose, who, ranking themselves as the first sages of Greece, were entirely the reverse in their conduct. For, instead of being infinitely remote from all avarice and ambition, like Pittacus, Bias, Thales, and the others, who made a study of wisdom their principal occupation, these men were ambitious and covetous, entered into the intrigues and assairs of the world, and made a trade of their pretended knowledge †. They were called Sophists, and wandered from city to city. They caused themselves to be cried up as oracles, and walked about attended by crowds of their disciples, who, through a kind of enchantment, abandoned the embraces of their parents, to follow these proud teachers, whom they paid a great price for their instruction.

t Plat. in. Apolog. p. 19, 20.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;En' Sen's feir, cluat, des mai delbat an' ar res lux queres luy x árn, nai rámartia rárar Plut. in Alcib. l. ii. p. 148.

† Sic enim appellantur hi qui ossentationis aut quaestus causa philos phantur. Cic. in. Lucul. n. 129.

There was nothing these masters did not profes: Theology, physics, ethics, arithmetic, astronomy, grammar, music, poetry, rhetoric, and history. They knew every thing, and could teach every thing. Their greatest supposed skill lay in philosophy and eloquence. Most of them, like Gorgias, valued themselves upon giving immediate answers to all questions that could be proposed to them. Their young disciples acquired nothing from their precepts, but a silly esteem for themselves, and an universal contempt for every body esse; so that not a scholar quitted these schools, but was more impertinent than when he first entered them.

It was necessary to decry the false eloquence and bad logic of these proud teachers in the sense of the young Athenians. To attack them in front, and dispute with them in a direct manner by a continued discourse, was what Socrates could well have done, for he possessed in a supreme degree the talents of speaking and reasoning; but this was no means to succeed against great haranguers, whose fole aim was to dazzle their auditors with a vain glitter, and rapid flow of words. He therefore took another courfe, and employing * the turns and address of irony, which he knew how to apply with wonderful art and delicacy, he chose to conceal, under the appearance of simplicity and the affectation of ignorance, all the beauty and great force of his genius. Nature, which had given him fo fine a foul, feemed to have formed his outfide expressly for suporting the ironic character. He was very ugly, and belides that, flad fomething very blockish and stupid in his physiognomy. The whole air of his person, which had nothing but what was very common and very poor in it, perfectly corresponded with that of his countenance.

When ‡ he happened into the company of fome one of the fophists, he proposed his doubts with a diffident and modest

Ki

Socrates in ironia diffinulantiaque longe omnibus lepore atque humanitate praestitit. Cic. l, ii. de orat. n, 270.

+ Zopyrus physiognomon—stupidum esse Socratem dixit et bardum. Cic, de Fat. n. 10.

‡ Socrates de se ipse detrahens in disputatione, plus tribuebat iis, quos volebat re-

air, asked simple questions in a plain manner, and, as if he had been incapable of expressing himself otherwise, made use of trivial comparisons, and allusions taken from the meanest employments. The sophist heard him with a scornful attention; and instead of giving him a precise answer, fell into his common places, and talked a great deal without saying any thing to the purpose. Socrates, after having praised (not to enrage) his adversary, entreated him to adapt himself to his weakness, and to descend so low as him, by satisfying his questions in a few words; because neither his wit nor memory were capable of comprehending or retaining so many sine and exalted notions, and that all his knowledge was confined to question and answer.

This passed in a numerous assembly; and the scientistic person could not recede. When Socrates had once got him out of his intrenchment, by obliging him to answer his questions succinculty, he carried him on from one to another to the most absurd consequences; and after having reduced him either to contradict himself, or be silent, he complained, that the learned man would not vouchsafe to instruct him. The young people however perceived the incapacity of their master, and changed their admiration for him into contempt. Thus the name of Sophist became odious and ridiculous.

It is easy to judge, that men of the fophist's character, of which I have now spoke, who were in high credit with the great, who lorded it amongst the youth of Athens, and had been long celebrated for their wit and learning, could not be attacked with impunity; and the rather, because they had been taken in the two most sensible points, their same, and their interest. "Socrates, for having endeavoured to unmask their vices, and discredit their salse eloquence, experienced,

u Plat. in Apolog. p. 23.

fellere. Ita, cum aliud diceret atque fentiret, libenter uti folitus est illa dissimulatione, quam Gracci ésparènes vocant. Cic. Acad. Quaest. l. iv. n. 15.

Sed et illum quem nominavi (Gorgiam) et caeteros fophistas, ut e Platone intelligi potest, luso videmus a Socrate. Is enim percontando asque interrogando elicere folebat eorum opiniones quibascum differebat, ut ad ea, quae ii respondissent, si quid videretur, diceret. Cie. de Finib. I. is. n. 2. from these corrupt and haughty men, all that could be feared or expected from the most malignant envy, and the most envenomed hatred; to which it is now time to proceed.

SECTION VI.

SOCRATES is accused of bolding bad OPINIONS in regard to the Socrates was accused a little before the first year of the 95th Olympiad, soon after the expulsion of the thirty tyrants out of Athens, in the "fixty-ninth year of his life; but the prosecution had been projected long before. The oracle of Delphos, which had declared him the wifest of mankind; the contempt into which he had brought the doctrine and morals of the sophists of his time, who were then in high reputation; the liberty with which he attacked all vice; the singular attachment of his disciples for his person and maxims; had all concurred in alienating people against him, and had drawn abundance of envy upon him.

* His enemies having fworn his destruction, and perceiving the difficulty of the attempt, prepared the way for it at a diftance, and at first attacked him in the dark, and by obscure and fecret methods. It is faid, that to found the people's disposition in regard to Socrates, and to try whether it would ever be fafe to cite him before the judges, they engaged Ariflophanes to bring him into the theatre in a comedy, wherein the first feeds of the accusation meditated against him were fown. It is not certain whether Aristophanes was suborned by Anytus, and the rest of Socrates's enemies, to compose that fatirical piece against him. It is very likely, that the declared contempt of Socrates for all comedies in general, and for those of Aristophanes in particular, whilst he professed an extraordinary esteem for the tragedies of Euripides. might be the poet's true motive for taking his revenge of the philosopher. However it were, Aristophanes, to the difgrace of poetry, lent his pen to the malice of Socrates's enemies, or his own refentment, and employed his whole genius and capacity to depreciate the best and most excellent man that ever the Pagan world produced.

K iij

u A. M. 3602. Ant. J. C. 402.

Aelian. l. ii. c. 13. Plat. in Apolog. Socrat. p. 19.

He composed a piece called "The Clouds," wherein he introduced the philosopher, perched in a basket, and hoisted up amidst the air and clouds, from whence he vents maxims, or rather the most ridiculous subtleties. A very aged debtor, who defires to escape the close pursuits of his creditors, comes to him to be taught the art of tricking them at law; to prove by unanswerable reasons that he owes them nothing; and, in a word, of a very bad, to make a very good cause. But finding himfelf incapable of any improvements from the fublime leffons of his new master, he brings his fon to him in his stead. This young man foon after quits this learned school fo well infiructed, that at their first meeting he beats his father, and proves to him by fubtile, but invincible arguments, that he has reason for treating him in that manner. In every scene where Socrates appears, the poet makes him utter a thousand impertinences, and as many impieties against the gods; and in particular against Jupiter. He makes him talk like a man of the greatest vanity and opinion of himself, with an equal contempt for all others, who out of a criminal curiofity is for penetrating what passes in the heavens, and for diving into the abysses of the earth; who boasts of having always the means to make injustice triumph; and who is not contented with keeping those fecrets for his own use, but teaches them to others, and thereby corrupts youth. All this is attended with a refined raillery, and a falt, which could not fail of pleasing a people of so quick and delicate a taste as the Athenians, who were besides naturally invidious to all transcendant merit. They were fo much charmed with it, that without waiting the conclusion of the representation, they ordered the name of Aristophanes to be fet down above those of all his competitors.

Socrates, who had been informed that he was to be acted in the theatre, went thither upon the day to see the comedy, contrary to his custom; for it was not common for him to go to those affemblies, unless when some new tragedy of Euripides was to be performed, who was his intimate friend, and whose pieces he esteemed, upon account of the folid principles of morality he took care to intersperse in them. It was, however, observed, that he had not patience to wait the conclusion of one of them, wherein the actor had begun with a dangerous maxim, and went out immediately, without confidering the injury his withdrawing might do his friend's reputation. He never went to comedies, unless when Alcibiades and Critias forced him thither against his will, offended at the unbounded licence which reigned in them, and incapable of feeing the reputation of his fellow-citizens publicly torn in pieces. He was present at this without the least emotion, and without expressing any discontent; and some strangers being in pain to know who the Socrates z intended by the play was, he rose up from his feat, and shewed himself during the whole representation. He told those who were near him, and were amazed at his indifferance and patience, that he imagined himself at a great entertainment, where he was agreeably laughed at; and that it was necessary to let raillery pass.

There is no appearance, as I have already observed, that Aristophanes, though he was not Socrates's friend, had entered into the black conspiracy of his enemies, and had any thought of occasioning his destruction. It is more probable, that a poet, who diverted the public at the expence of the principal magistrates and most celebrated generals, was also willing to make them laugh at the expence of a philosopher. All the guilt was on the side of those who envied him, and his enemies, who were in hopes of making great use of the representation of this comedy against him. The artissice was indeed prosound, and conceived with skill. In acting a man upon the stage, he is only represented on his bad, weak, or ambiguous sides. That view of him is followed with ridicule: Ridicule accustoms people to the contempt of his person; and contempt proceeds to injustice. For the world are naturally bold in insulting, abus-ing, and injuring a man, when once he becomes the object of their general contempt.

K iiij

These were the first blows struck at him, and served as an effay and trial of the great affair meditated against him. It lay dormant a long while, and did not break out in twenty years afterwards. The troubles of the republic might well occasion that long delay: For it was in that interval the enterprise against Sicily happened, the event of which was so unfortunate, that Athens was befieged and taken by Lyfander, who changed its form of government, and established the thirty tyrants, that were not expelled till a very fmall time before the affair we fpeak of.

Melitus then appeared as accuser, and entered a process in form against Socrates. His accusation consisted of two heads. The first was, that he did not admit the gods acknowledged by the republic, and introduced new divinities: The fecond, that he corrupted the youth of Athens; and concluded with inferring, that fentence of death ought to pass against him.

Never had accufation fo little probability, pretext, or foundation as this. It was now forty years, that Socrates had made it his profession to instruct the Athenian youth. He had advanced no opinions in fecret and in the dark. His leffons were given publicly, and in the view of great numbers of auditors. He had always observed the same conduct, and taught the fame principles. What then could be Miletus's motive for this accusation, after such a length of time? How came his zeal for the public good, after having been languid and drowfy for fo many years, to awake on a fudden, and become fo violent? Is it pardonable, for fo warm and worthy a citizen as Melitus would appear, to have continued mute and inactive, whilst any one corrupted the whole youth of that city, by inftilling feditious maxims into them, and by inspiring them with a difgust and contempt for the established government? For he who does not prevent an evil, when it is in his power, is equally criminal with him that commits it. b Libanius speaks thus in a declamation of his, called the Apology of Socrates. But, continues he, though Melitus, whether out of diffraction, indifference, or real avocation of his a Tairs, never thought for formany years of entering an accuration against Socrates; how came it to pass, that in a city like Athens, which abounded with wife magistrates, and what is more, with bold informers, so public a conspiracy as that imputed to Socrates, should escape the eyes of those, whom either the love of their country, or invidious malignity, render so vigilant and attentive? Nothing was ever less feasible or more void of all probability.

A. M. 3603. Ant. J. C. 401.
 Liban. in Apolog. Socrat. p. 645—648.

As foon as the confpiracy broke out, the friends of Socrates prepared for his defence. Lyfias, the most able orator of his times, brought him an elaborate discourse of his composing: wherein he had fet forth the reasons and measures of Socrates in all their light, and interspersed the whole with tender and pathetic strokes, deapable of moving the most obdurate hearts. Socrates read it with pleafure, and approved it very much; but as it was more conformable to the rules of rhetoric than the fentiments and fortitude of a philosopher, he told him frankly, that it did not fuit him. Upon which Lyfias, having asked how it was possible to be well done, and at the same time not fuit him; in the same manner, said he, using according to his custom a vulgar comparison, that an excellent workman might bring me magnificent apparel, or shoes embroidered with gold, to which nothing would be wanting on his part, but which however would not fit me. He perfifted therefore inflexibly in the refolution, not to demean himfelf by begging fuffrages in the low abject manner common at that time. He employed neither artifice nor the glitter of eloquence. He had no recourse either to folicitation or entreaty. He brought neither his wife nor children to incline the judges in his favour by their fighs and tears. Nevertheless, * though he firmly refused to make use of any voice but his own in his defence, and to appear before his judges in the fubmiffive posture of a suppliant, he did not behave in that manner out of pride, or contempt of the tribunal. It was from a noble and intrepid affurance, refulting from greatness of soul, and the consciousness of his truth and innocence. So that his defence had nothing timorous or weak in it. His discourse was bold, manly, generous, without passion, without emotion, full of the noble liberty of a philosopher, with no other ornament but that of truth, and brightened universally with the character and language of innocence. Plato, who was present, transcribed it asterwards, and without any additions composed from it the work, which he calls The Apology of Socrates, one of the most consummate masterpieces of antiquity. I shall here make an extract from it.

c Cicer. l. i. de orat. n. 231. 233. d Quint. l. xi. c. 1.

* His et talibus adductus Socrates, nec patronum quaesivit ad judicium capitis, nec judicibus supplex fuit; adhibuitque liberam contumaciam a magnitudine animi ductam, non a superbia. Cic. Tusc. Quaest. lib. i.

"Upon the day affigned, the proceeding commenced in the usual forms; the parties appeared before the judges, and Melitus spoke. The worse his cause, and the less provided it was with proofs, the more occasion he had for address and art to cover its weakness. He omitted nothing that might render the adverse party odious; and instead of reasons, which could not but fail him, he substituted the delusive shine of a lively and pompous eloquence. Socrates, in observing that he could not tell what impression the discourse of his accusers might make upon the judges, owns, that for his part he scarce knew himself, they had given such artful colouring and likelihood to their arguments, though there was not the least word of truth in all they had advanced.

I have already faid, that their accusation consisted of two heads. The first regards religion. Socrates inquires, out of an impious curiosity, into what passes in the heavens, and in the bowels of the earth. He denies the gods adored by his country. He endeavours to introduce a new worship; and, if he may be believed, an unknown god inspires him in all his actions. To make short, he believes there are no gods.

The fecond head relates to the interest and government of the state. Socrates corrupts the youth by inftilling bad fenti-

e Plat, in Apolog. Socrat. Xenoph. in Apolog. Socrat. et in Memor.

f Plat, in Apolog. p. 24.

ments concerning the Divinity into them, by teaching them a contempt of the laws, and the order established in the republic; by declaring openly against the choice of the magistrates by * lot; by exclaiming against the public assemblies, where he is never feen to appear; by teaching the art of making the worst of causes good; by attaching the youth to himself out of a spirit of pride and ambition, under the pretence of infiructing them; and by proving to children, that they may abuse their parents with impunity. He glories in a pretended oracle, and believes himself the wifest of mankind. He taxes all others with folly, and condemns without referve all their maxims and actions; constituting himself by his own authority the general cenfor and reformer of the state. Notwithstanding which, the effects of his lessons may be seen in the perfons of Critias and Alcibiades, his most intimate friends, who have done great mischiefs to their country, and have been the most wicked of citizens, and the most abandoned of men.

This concluded with recommending to the judges to be very much upon their guard against the dazzling eloquence of Socrates, and to suspect extremely the infinuating and artificial turns of address which he would employ to deceive them.

- s Socrates began his discourse with this point, and declared that he would speak to the judges as it was his custom to talk in his common conversation, that is to say, with much simplicity, and no art.
- h He then proceeds to particulars. Upon what foundation can it be alleged, that he does not acknowledge the gods of the republic; he, who has been often feen to facrifice in his own house, and in the temples? Can it be doubted whether he uses divination or not, whilst it is made a crime in him to report, that he received counsels from a certain divinity; and thence concluded that he aims at introducing new deities?

g Plat. p. 17. h Plat. p. 27. Xenoph. p. 703.

Socrates in reality did not approve this manner of electing the magistrates. He observed, that when a pilot, a musician, or an architect is wanted, nobody is willing to take him at a venture; though the faults of these people are far from being of the great importance of those errors which are committed in the administration of the republic. 'Xenoph, memorab. Li. p. 712.

But in this he innovates nothing more than others, who, putting their faith in divination, observe the flight of birds, confult the entrails of victims, and remark even words and accidental encounters: Different means which the gods employ to give mankind a foreknowledge of the future. Old or new, it is still evident, that Socrates acknowledges divinities, by the confession of even Melitus himself, who in his information avers that he believes daemons, that is to say, subaltern spirits, the offspring of the gods. Now, every man who believes the offspring of the gods, believes the gods.

As to what relates to the impious inquiries into natural things imputed to him; without defpiling or condemning those who apply themselves to the study of physics, he declares, that as for him, he had entirely devoted himself to what concerns moral virtue, the conduct of life, and the rules of government, as to a knowledge infinitely more useful than any other; and he calls upon all those who have been his hearers, to come forth and belie him, if he does not say what is true.

" I am accused of corrupting the youth, and of instilling " dangerous maxims into them, as well in regard to the wor-" ship of the gods as the rules of government. You know; " Athenians, that I never made it my profession to teach; nor " can envy, however violent against me, reproach me with " having ever fold my instructions. I have an undeniable evi-" dence for me in this respect, which is my poverty. Always " equally ready to communicate my thoughts either to the " rich or poor, and to give them entire leifure to question or " answer me, I-lend myself to every one who is desirous of be-" coming virtuous; and if amongst those who hear me, there " are any who prove either good or bad, neither the virtues " of the one, nor the vices of the other, to which I have not contributed, are to be ascribed to me. My whole employ-" ment is to persuade the young and old against too much love " for the body, for riches, and all other precarious things of " whatsoever nature they be, and against too little regard for " the foul, which ought to be the object of their affection :

i Xenoph. p. 710.

"For I inceffantly urge to you, that virtue does not proceed from riches, but on the contrary riches from virtue; and that all the other goods of human life, as well public as private, have their fource in the same principle.

"If to fpeak in this manner be to corrupt youth, I confers, Athenians, that I am guilty, and deserve to be punished. If what I say be not true, it is most easy to convict me of my falsehood. I see here a great number of my disciples; they have only to appear. But perhaps the reserve and confideration for a master, who has instructed them, will prevent them from declaring against me: At least their fathers, brothers, and uncles, cannot, as good relations and good citizens, dispense with their not standing forth to demand vengeance against the corrupter of their sons, brothers, and nephews. But these are the persons who take upon them my desence, and interest themselves in the success of my cause.

" k Pass on me what sentence you please, Athenians; but " I can neither repent nor change my conduct. I must not " abandon or fuspend a function, which God himself has im-66 posed on me, now he has charged me with the care of " instructing my fellow-citizens. If, after having faithfully " kept all the posts wherein I was placed by our generals at " Potidaea, Amphipolis, and Delium, the fear of death should " at this time make me abandon that in which the Divine pro-" vidence has placed me, by commanding me to pass my life " in the study of philosophy for the instruction of myself and " others; this would be a most criminal desertion indeed, and " make me highly worthy of being cited before this tribunal, " as an impious man who does not believe the gods. Should " you refolve to acquit me, for the future, I should not helitate " to make answer, Athenians, I honour and love you, but I " shall choose rather to obey + God than you; and to my latest " breath shall never renounce my philosophy, nor cease to " exhort and reprove you according to my custom, by telling

" each of you when you come in my way, My + good friend, 44 and citizen of the most famous city in the world for wisdom and valour, are you not ashamed to have no other thoughts " than that of amassing wealth, and of acquiring glory, credt, es and dignities, whilft you neglect the treasures of prudence, " truth, and wifdom, and take no pains in rendering your " foul as good and perfect as it is capable of being. " I am reproached with abject fear and meanness of spirit, " for being fo bufy in imparting my advice to every one in " private, and for having always avoided to be prefent in your 46 affemblies, to give my counfels to my country. I think I " have fufficiently proved my courage and fortitude both in 46 the field, where I have born arms with you, and in the fe-" nate, when I alone opposed the unjust sentence you pro-" nounced against the ten captains, who had not taken up " and interred the bodies of those who were killed or drowned " in the fea-fight near the island Arginusae; and when, upon more than one occasion, I opposed the violent and cruel or-66 ders of the thirty tyrants. What is it then that has prevent-" ed me from appearing in your affemblies? It is that daemon, " that voice divine, which you have fo often heard me mention, and Melitus has taken fo much pains to ridicule. That of fpirit has attached itself to me from my infancy: It is a voice es which I never hear, but when it would prevent me from " perfifting in fomething I have refolved; for it never exhorts " me to undertake any thing. It is the fame being that has " always opposed me, when I would have intermeddled in the " affairs of the republic; and that with the greatest reason; for I should have been amongst the dead long ago, had I been concerned in the measures of the state, without effecting any thing in the advantage of myself or our country. Do not take it ill, I beseech you, if I speak my thoughts with-

&quot; out difguise, and with truth and freedom. Every man who would generously oppose a whole people, either amongst us

&quot;would generously oppose a whole people, either amongst us or elsewhere, and who inflexibly applies himself to prevent

I Plat. p. 31.

† The Greek fignifies, O belt of men, a saist dispute; which was an obliging

"the violation of the laws, and the practice of iniquity in a government, will never do fo long with impunity. It is abfolutely necessary for him, who would contend for justice, if he has any thoughts of living, to remain in a private faction, and never to have any share in public affairs.

in For the rest, Athenians, if, in the extreme danger I is now am, I do not imitate the behaviour of those, who upis on less emergencies have implored and supplicated their is judges with tears, and have brought forth their children, it relations and friends, it is not through pride and obstinately, or any contempt for you, but solely for your honour, and for that of the whole city. You should know, that if there are amongst our citizens those who do not regard death as an evil, and who give that name only to injustice and infamy. At my age, and with the reputation, true or false, which I have, would it be consistent for me, after all the lessons I have given upon the contempt of death, to be afraid of it myself, and to belie in my last action all the principles and sentiments of my past life.

"But without speaking of my same, which I should extremely injure by such a conduct, I do not think it allowable to entreat a judge, nor to be absolved by supplications:
He ought to be persuaded and convinced. The judge does not fit upon the bench to shew favour by violating the laws, but to do justice in conforming to them. He does not swear to discharge with impunity whom he pleases; but to do justice where it is due. We ought not therefore to accustom you to perjury, nor you to suffer yourselves to be accustomed to it; for in so doing, both the one and the other of us equally injure justice and religion, and both are criminals."

"Do not therefore expect from me, Athenians, that I fould have recourse amongst you to means which I believe neither honest nor lawful; especially upon this occasion, wherein I am accused of impiety by Melitus. For if I should influence you by my prayers, and thereby induce you to violate your oaths, it would be undeniably evident that I m Plat. p. 34. 35.

- " teach you not to believe in the gods; and even in defend-
- " ing and justifying myself, should furnish my adversaries
- " with arms against me, and prove that I believe no divinity.
- " But I am very far from fuch bad thoughts. I am more " convinced of the existence of God than my accusers, and
- " fo convinced, that I abandon myfelf to God and you, that
- " you may judge of me as you shall deem best for yourselves 46 and me."

" Socrates * pronounced this discourse with a firm and intrepid tone. His air, his action, his vifage expressed nothing of the accused: He seemed the master of his judges, from the assurance and greatness of foul with which he spoke, without however losing any thing of the modesty natural to him. So noble and majestic a deportment displeased and gave offence. It is common for + judges, who look upon themselves as the absolute dispensers of life or death to such as are before them, to expect, out of a fecret tendency of mind, that they should appear in their prefence with humble fubmission and respectful awe; an homage which they think due to their fupreme authority.

This was what happened now. Melitus however had not at first the fifth part of the voices. We have reason to suppose that the judges affembled upon this occasion might amount to five hundred, without reckoning the prefident. The law condemned the accuser to pay a fine of a thousand drachms I, if he had not the fifth part of the fuffrages. This law had been wifely established to check the boldness and impudence of calumniators. Melitus had been obliged to pay this fine, if Anytus and Lycon had not joined him, and prefented themfelves also as the accusers of Socrates. Their credit drew over a great number of voices; and there were two hundred and fourfcore against Socrates; and in confequence only two hundred and twenty for him. He wanted no more than thirty-one * to have been acquitted; for he would then have had two hundred and fifty-one, which would have been the majority.

* Socrates ita in judicio capitis pro fe ipfe dixit, ut non fupplex aut reus, fed magister aut dominus videretur esse judicium. Cic l. i. de orat. n. 231.

+ Odit judex sere litigantis securitatem; cumque jus suum intelligat, tacitus reverentiam postulat. Quint. l. iv. c. i.

t Five hundred livres.

By this first sentence the judges only declared Socrates guilty, without decreeing him any + penalty. For when the law did not determine the punishment, and when a crime against the state was not in question, in which manner I conceive Cicero's terms, "fraus capitalis," may be understood, the person found guilty had a right to choose the penalty he thought he deserved. Upon his answer the judges deliberated a second time, and afterwards passed their final sentence. Socrates was informed that he might demand an abatement of the penalty, and change the condemnation of death into banishment, imprisonment, or a fine. He replied generously, that he would choose neither of those punishments, because that would be to acknowledge himself guilty. " Atheni-" ans," faid he, " to keep you no longer in suspence, as you " oblige me to fentence myself according to what I deserve, " I condemn myself for having passed my life in instructing " yourselves and your children; for having neglected with " that view my domestic affairs, and all public employments, " and dignities; for having devoted myself entirely to the " fervice of my country, in labouring inceffantly to render " my fellow-citizens virtuous. I condemn myself, I say, to be " maintained in the Prytaneum at the expence of the repub-" lic for the rest of my life." | This last answer so much Volume IV.

* The text varies in Plato; it fays, thirty-three, or thirty; whence it is pro-

† Primis sementiis statuebant tantum judices damnarent an absolverent. Erat autem Athenis, reo damnato, si fraus capitalis non esset, quas poenae actimatio. Tx sententia, cum judicibus daretur, interrogabatur reus, quam quas aestimationem commeruisse se maxime constreretur. Cic. L. i. de orat. n. 237. 232.

† It appears in Placo, that, after this difcourfe, Socrates, without doubt to remove from him all impuration of pride and contunacy, modelity offered to pay a fine proportionate to his indigence; that is to fay, one mina (fifty livres), and that, at the initiances of his friends, who had bound themfelves for him, he rofe in his offer to thirty minae. Plat in Apolog. Socrat. p. 38. But Kenophon pofitively afferts the contrary, p. 705. This difference may be reconciled perhaps, by supposing that Socrates refused at first to make any offer, and that he fuffered himself at length to be overcome by the examelt folicitations of his friends.

offended the judges *, that they condemned him to drink the hemloc, a punishment very much in use amongst them.

"This fentence did not shake the constancy of Socrates in the least. "I am going," said he, addressing himself to his judges with a noble tranquillity, "to suffer death by your or-" der, to which nature had condemned me from the first moment of my birth; but my accusers will suffer no less from infamy and injustice by the decrees of truth. Did you expect from me, that to extricate myself out of your hands, I should have employed, according to the custom, stattery and pathetic expressions, and the timorous and creeping behaviour of a suppliant? But in trials, as well as war, an honest man ought not to use all forts of means for the preservation of his life. It is equally dishonourable both in the one and the other, to ransom it only by pray"ers and tears, and all those other abject methods you see "every day practifed by people in my present condition."

Apollodorus, who was one of his friends and disciples, having advanced to him to express his grief for his dying innocent: "What!" replied he with a smile, "would you have had me die guilty?"

OPlutarch, to shew that only our weakest part, the body, is in the power of man, but that there is another infinitely more noble part of us entirely superior to their threats, and inaccessible to their inflictions, cites these admirable words of Socrates, which are more applicable to his judges than his accusers: "Anytus and Melitus may kill me, but they can"not hurt me." As if he had said, in the language of the Pagans; Fortune may deprive me of my goods, my health, and my life; but I have a treasure within me, of which no violence can deprive me; I mean virtue, innocence, fortitude, and greatness of mind.

<sup>2</sup> Plat. p. 39. O De anim. tranquil. p. 475.

* Cujus responso sic judices exarfetunt, ut capitis hominem innocentissimum condemnarent. Cic. l. i. de orat. n. 233.

This great man*, fully convinced of the principle he had fo often inculcated to his disciples, that guilt is the only evil a wife man ought to fear, chose rather to be deprived of some years which he might have to live, than to forseit in an instant the glory of his whole past life, in dishonouring himself for ever by the shameful behaviour he was advised to observe with his judges. Seeing that his own times had but a slight knowledge of him, he referred himself from it to the judgment of posterity, and by the generous sacrifice of a very advanced life, acquired and affured to himself the esteem and admiration of all succeeding ages.

SECTION VII.

SOCRATES refuses to escape out of PRISON. He DRINKS the POISON.

After the fentence had been passed upon him, † Socrates, with the same intrepid aspect with which he had held the tyrants in awe, went forward towards the prison, which lost that name, says Seneca, when he entered it, and became the residence of virtue and probity. His friends followed him thither, and continued to visit him during thiry days, which passed between his condemnation and death. The cause of that long delay was, the Athenians sent every year a ship to the isse of Delos, to offer certain facrisses; and it was prohibited to put any person to death in the city, from the time the priest of Apollo had crowned the poop of this vessel, as a signal of its departure, till the same vessel should return. So that sentence having been passed upon Socrates the day after that ceremony began, it was necessary to defer the execution of it for thirty days, during the continuance of this voyage.

Lij

Maluit vir fapientifilmus quod fupcreffet ex vita fibi perire, quam quod practeriffet : et quando ab hominibus fui temporis parum intelligebatur, pofterorum fe judiciis refervavit, brevi detrimento jam ultimae fenectutis aevum feculorum omnium confecutis. Quint. i. i. c. r

† Socrates eodem illo vultu, quo aliquando folus triginta tyrannos in ordinem tedegerat, carcerem intravit, ignominiam ipfi loco detracturus. Neque enim poterat carcer videri, in quo Socrates erat. Senec. de confol. ad Helvet. c. xiii.

Socrates carcerem intraudo purgavit, omnique honefilionem curia redidit. 14. de vit. beat. c. 27.

In this long interval, death had fufficient opportunity to present itself before his eyes in all its terrors, and to put his constancy to the proof, not only by the severe rigour of a dungeon, and the irons upon his legs, but by the continual prospect and cruel expectation of an event, of which nature is always abhorrent. **In this sad condition, he did not cease to enjoy that prosound tranquillity of mind which his friends had always admired in him. He entertained them with the same temper he had always expressed; and Crito observes, that the evening before his death, he slept as peaceably as at any other time. He composed also an hymn in honour of Apollo and Diana, and turned one of Æsop's sables into verse.

The day before, or the fame day that the ship was to arrive from Delos, the return of which was to be followed by the death of Socrates, Crito, his intimate friend, came to him early in the morning, to let him know that bad news, and at the same time that it depended only upon himself to quit the prison; that the jailor was gained; that he would find the doors open, and offered him a fafe retreat in Thesfaly. Socrates laughed at this propofal, and asked him, " whether he " knew any place out of Attica where people did not die?" Crito urged the thing very feriously, and pressed him to take the advantage of fo precious an opportunity, adding arguments upon arguments to induce his confent, and to engage him to refolve upon his escape. Without mentioning the inconfolable grief he should suffer for the death of such a friend. how should he support the reproaches of an infinity of people? who would believe that it was in his power to have faved him, but that he would not facrifice a fmall part of his wealth for that purpose? Can the people ever be perfuaded that so wife a man as Socrates would not quit his prison, when he might do it with all possible security? Perhaps he might sear to expose his friends, or to occasion the loss of their fortunes, or even of their lives or liberty. Ought there to be any thing more dear and precious to them than the preservation of Socrates? Even strangers themselves dispute that honour with them; many of whom have come expressly with considerable fums of money to purchase his escape; and declare, that they should think themselves highly honoured to receive him amongst them, and to supply him abundantly with all he should have occasion for. Ought he to abandon himself to enemies, who have occasioned his being condemned unjustly, and can he think it allowable to betray his own cause? Is it not essential to his goodness and justice, to spare his fellow-citizens the guilt of innocent blood? But if all these motives cannot alter him, and he is not concerned in regard to himself, can he be insensible to the interests of his children? In what a condition does he leave them? And can he forget the father, to remember only the philosopher?

P Plat, in Criton.

Socrates, after having heard him with attention, praifed his zeal, and expressed his gratitude; but before he could give into his opinion, was for examining whether it was just for him to depart out of prison without the consent of the Athenians. The question therefore here is, to know, whether a man condemned to die, though unjustly, can without a crime escape from justice and the laws? I do not know, whether, even amongst us, there are not many persons to be found who believe that this may be made a question.

Socrates begins with removing every thing foreign to the subject, and comes immediately to the bottom of the affair. " I should certainly rejoice extremely, most dear Crito, that " you could perfuade me to quit this place; but cannot re-" folve to do fo, without being first persuaded. We ought " not to be in pain upon what the people fay, but for what " the fole Judge of all that is just or unjust shall pronounce " upon us; and that alone is truth. All the confiderations " you have alleged, as to money, reputation, family, prove " nothing, unless you shew me, that what you propose is just " and lawful. It is a received and constant principle with us, " that all injustice is shameful and fatal to him who commits " it, whatever men may fay, or whatever good or evil may " be confequential of it. We have always reasoned from this " principle even to our latest days, and have never departed " in the least from it. Would it be possible, dear Crito, that " at our age our most ferious discourses should resemble those " of infants, who say yes and no almost in the same breath, " and have nothing of fixed and determinate?" At each proposition he waited Crito's answer and assent.

" Let us therefore resume our principles, and endeavour to " make use of them at this time. It has always been a maxim " with us, that it is never allowable upon any pretence what-" foever to commit injustice, not even in regard to those who " injure us, nor to return evil for evil, and that when we " have once engaged our word, we are bound to keep it in-" violably; no interest being capable to dispense with it. Now. " if at the time I should be ready to make my escape, the " laws and republic should present themselves in a body be-" fore me, what could I answer to the following questions which they might put to me? What are you going to do, " Socrates? To fly from justice in this manner; is it aught " else but ruining entirely the laws and the republic? Do you " believe, that a flate fublifts, after justice is not only no longer " in force in it, but is even corrupted, subverted, and trod " under foot by particulars? But, fay I, the republic has " done me injustice, and has fentenced me wrongfully. Have " you forgot, the laws would reply, that you are under an " agreement with us to submit your private judgment to the " republic? You were at liberty, if our government and con-" stitutions did not suit you, to retire and settle yourself else-" where. But a refidence of feventy years in our city fuffi-" ciently denotes, that our plan has not displeased you, and " that you have complied with it from an entire know-" ledge and experience of it, and out of choice. In effect " you owe all you are, and all you possess, to it : Birth, nur-" ture, education, and establishment; for all these proceed " from the tuition and protection of the republic. Do you " believe yourfelf free to break through engagements with " her, which you have confirmed by more than one oath?' " Though she should intend to destroy you, can you render " her evil for evil, and injury for injury? Have you a right " to act in that manner with your father and mother; and

" do you not know that your country is more considerable, " and more worthy of respect before God and man, than ei-" ther father or mother, or all the relations in the world to-" gether; that your country is to be honoured and revered, " to be complied with in her excesses, and to be treated with " tenderness and kindness, even in her most violent proceed-" ings? In a word, that she is either to be reclaimed by wife " counfels and respectful remonstrances, or to be obeyed in " her commands, and fuffered without murmuring in all she " shall decree? As for your children, Socrates; your friends " will render them all the fervices in their power; at least " the Divine Providence will not be wanting to them. Re-" fign yourfelf therefore to our reasons, and take the coun-" fel of those who have given you birth, nurture and edu-" cation. Set not fo high a value upon your children, your " life, or any thing in the world, as justice; so shall it come " to pass, that when you appear before the tribunal of Pluto, " you will not be at a loss to defend yourfelf in the presence " of your judges. But if you demean yourself otherwise, we " shall continue your enemies as long as you live, without " ever affording you relaxation or repose; and when you are " dead, our fifters, the laws in the regions below, will be as " little favourable to you; knowing that you have been guilty

Socrates observed to Crito, that he seemed to have a perfect sense of all he had said, and that the force of his reasons had made so strong and irresistible an impression upon his mind, that they entirely engrossed him, and less him neither thoughts nor words to object. Crito agreeing in effect that he had nothing to reply, continued silent, and withdrew from his friend.

" of using your utmost endeavours to destroy us."

<sup>q</sup> At length the fatal ship returned to Athens, which was in a manner the fignal for the death of Socrates. The next day all his friends, except Plato, who was sick, repaired to the prison early in the morning. The jailor desired them to wait a little, because the eleven magistrates, who had the direction of the prisons, were at that time signifying to the prisoner, that he was to die the same day. Presently after, they entered, and found Socrates, whose *chains had been taken off, sitting by Xantippe his wife, who held one of his children in her arms. As soon as she perceived them, setting up great cries, sobbing, and tearing her sace and hair, she made the prison resound with her complaints: "Oh, my dear So-" crates, your friends are come to see you this day for the "last time!" He desired that she might be taken away; and she was immediately carried home.

Liiij

Socrates passed the rest of the day with his friends; and discoursed with them with his usual cheerfulness and tranquillity. The subject of conversation was the most important, and best adapted to the present conjuncture, that is to fay, the immortality of the foul. What gave occasion to this difcourse, was a question introduced in a manner by chance, whether a true philosopher ought not to defire and take pains to die? This proposition, taken too literally, implied an opinion, that a philosopher night kill himself. Socrates shews that nothing is more unjust than this notion, and that man, appertaining to God, who formed and placed him with his own hand in the post he possesses, cannot abandon it without his permission, nor depart from life without his order. What is it then that can induce a philosopher to entertain this love for death! It can be only the hope of that happiness, which he expects in another life; and that hope can be founded only upon the opinion of the foul's immortality.

Socrates employed the last day of his life in entertaining, his friends upon this great and important subject; from which conversation, Plato's admirable dialogue, intitled "The Phae-" don," is wholly taken. He explains to his friends all the arguments for believing the soul immortal, and refutes all the objections against it, which are very near the same as are made at this day. This treatise is too long for me to attempt an abstract of it.

At Athens, as foon as fentence was pronounced upon a criminal, he was unbound, and confidered as the victim of death, whom it was no longer lawful to keep in chains.

Before he answers any of these objections, he deplores a misfortune common enough amongst men, who, in confequence of hearing ignorant perfons, who contradict and doubt every thing, dispute, and believe there is nothing certain. " Is it " not a great misfortune, dear Phaedon, that having reasons " which are true, certain, and very easy to be understood, " there should however be those in the world who are not at " all affected with them, from their having heard those fri-" volous disputes, wherein all things appear sometimes true " and sometimes false. These unjust and unreasonable men, " inftead of blaming themselves for these doubts, or charging " the narrowness of their sense with them, from ascribing the " defect to the reasons themselves, proceed at length to a de-" testation of them; and believe themselves more knowing " and judicious than all others, because they imagine they " are the only perfons who comprehend that there is nothing " true or certain in the nature of things."

Socrates demonstrates the injustice of this proceeding. He observes, that of two things equally uncertain, it consists with wissom to choose that which is most advantageous with least hazard. "If what I advance," says he, "upon the immor-" tality of the soul, proves true, it is good to believe it; and "if after my death it proves salse, I shall always have the "advantage from it, to have been less sensible here of the "evils which generally attend human life." This reasoning of Socrates *, which, "we are to suppose," can be only real and true in the mouth of a Christian, is very remarkable. If what I say is true, I gain all things, whilst I hazard very little; and if salse, I lose nothing; on the contrary, I am still a great gainer.

Socrates does not confine himself to the mere speculation of this great truth, that the soul is immortal; he draws useful and necessary conclusions from it for the conduct of life; in explaining what the hope of an happy eternity demands from man, that it be not frustrated, and that, instead of attaining the rewards prepared for the good, they do not experience the punishments allotted for the wicked. The philosopher here sets forth these great truths, which a constant tradition, though very much obscured by siction and sable, had always preserved amongst the Pagans: the last judgment of the righteous and wicked; the eternal punishments to which great criminals are condemned; a place of peace and joy without end for the souls that retain their purity and innocence, or which, during this life, have expiated their offences by repentance and satisfaction; and an intermediate state, in which they purify themselves, for a certain time, from less considerable crimes, that have not been atoned for during this life.

r Plut. p. 90. 91.

* Monfieur Pascal has expatiated upon this reasoning in his seventh article, and deduced from it a demonstration of infinite force.

" My friends, there is still one thing, which it is very just to believe; if the soul be immortal, it requires to be cultivated with attention, not only for what we call the time of life, but for that which is to follow, I mean eternity; and the least neglect in this point may be attended with endless confequences. If death were the final dissolution of being, the wicked would be great gainers in it, by being delivered at once from their bodies, their souls, and their vices: But so the foul is immortal, it has no other means of being freed from its evils, nor any safety for it, but in becoming very good and very wise; for it carries nothing away with it, but its good or bad deeds, its virtues or vices, which are commonly the consequences of the education it has received, and the causes of eternal happiness or misery.

"When the dead are arrived at the fatal rendezvous of departed fouls, whither their deamon conducts them, they are all judged. Those who have passed their lives in a manner neither entirely criminal nor absolutely innocent, are fent into a place where they suffer pains proportioned to their faults, till being purged and cleansed of their guilt, and afterwards restored to liberty, they receive the reward of the good actions they have done in the body. Those who are judged to be incurable upon account of the greatness of

* Plat. p. 107. t Ibid. p. 113. 114.

* Daemon is a Greek word, which fignifies spirit, genius, and with us angel.

" their crimes, who deliberately have committed facrileges " and murders, and other fuch great offences, the fatal " destiny, that passes judgment upon them, hurles them in-" to Tartarus, from whence they never depart. But those " who are found guilty of crimes, great indeed, but worthy of pardon; who have committed violences in the transports " of rage against their father or mother, or have killed some " one in a like emotion, and afterwards repented, thefe fuffer " the same punishment, and in the same place with the last; " but for a time only, till by their prayers and fupplications " they have obtained pardon from those they have injured. " But for those who have passed through life with peculiar " fanctity of manners, delivered from their base earthly abodes " as from a prison, they are received on high in a pure re-" gion, which they inhabit; and as philosophy has fufficiently " purified them, they live * without their bodies, through all

"What I have said will suffice, I conceive, to prove, that we ought to endeavour strenuously, throughout our whole lives, to acquire virtue and wisdom: For you see how great a reward, and how high an hope is proposed to us. And though the immortality of the soul were dubious, instead of appearing a certainty, as it does, every wise man ought to assure himself, that it is well worth his trouble to risk his belief of it in this manner. And indeed can there be a more glorious hazard? We ought to enchant ourselves with this blessed hope; for which reason I have lengthened this discourse so much."

" eternity, in a feries of joys and delights it is not easy to deferibe, and which the shortness of my time will not permit

" me to explain more at large.

Gicero expresses these noble sentiments of Socrates with his usual delicacy. † Almost at the very moment that he held the deadly draught in his hand, he talked in fuch a manner, as shewed that he looked upon death, not as a violence done to him, but as a means bestowed upon him of ascending to heaven. He declared, that upon departing out of this life, two ways are open to us; the one leads to the place of eternal misery, such souls as have sullied themselves here below in shameful pleasures and criminal actions; the other conducts those to the happy mansions of the gods, who have retained their purity upon earth, and have led in human bodies a life almost divine.

* The refurrection of the body was unknown to the Pagans.

† Cum pene in manu jam mortiferum illud teneret poculum, locutus ita est, ut non ad mortem trudi, verum in coelum videretur ascendere. Ita enim censebat, itaque disferuit: duas esse vias duplicesque cursus animorum e corpore excedentium. Nam, qui se humanis vitiis contaminassent, et e totos libidinibus dedidissent, quibus coarcati velut domesticis vitiis atque slagitiis se inquinassent, iis devium quoddam iter esse, seclusum a consilio deorum: qui autem se integros castosque servavissent,

When Socrates had done speaking, Crito desired him to give him and the rest of his friends his last instructions in regard to his children, and other affairs, that by executing them. they might have the confolation of doing him fome pleafure. " I shall recommend nothing to you this day," replied Socrates, " more than I have always done, which is to take care " of yourselves. You cannot do yourselves a greater service, " nor do me and my family a greater pleafure." Crito having asked him afterwards, in what manner he thought fit to be buried; "As you please," said Socrates, "if you can lay hold " of me, and I not escape out of your hands." At the same " time, looking upon his friends with a fmile; " I can never " perfuade Crito, that Socrates is he who converfes with you, " and disposes the several parts of his discourse; for he al-" ways imagines, that I am what he is going to fee dead in a " little while. He confounds me with my carcase; and there-" fore asks me how I would be interred." In finishing these words he rose up, and went to bathe himself in a chamber adjoining. After he came out of the bath, his children were brought to him, for he had three, two very little, and the other grown up. He spoke to them for some time, gave his orders to the women who took care of them, and then dismissed them. Being returned into his chamber, he laid him down upon his bed.

The fervant of the eleven entered at the same instant; and

a Plat. p. 115-118.

quibusque fuisset minima cum corporibus contagio, seseque ab his semper sevocassent, essentique in corporibus humanis, vitam imitati deorum, his ad illos, a quibus ossent prosecti, redditum sacilem pagere. Cic. Tusc. Quaest. L. i. n. 71. 72.

having informed him, that the time for drinking the hemloc was come, which was at fun-fet, the fervant was fo much affected with forrow, that he turned his back, and fell a weeping, " See," faid Socrates, " the good heart of this man! " Since my imprisonment he has often come to see me, and " to converse with me. He is more worthy than all his fel-" lows." How heartily the poor man weeps for me." This is a remarkable example, and might teach those in an office of this kind how they ought to behave to all prisoners, but more especially to persons of merit, when they are so unhappy as to fall into their hands. The fatal cup was brought. Socrates asked what it was necessary for him to do. " Nothing " more," replied the fervant, " than, as foon as you have " drunk off the draught, to walk about till you find your legs " grow weary, and afterwards lie down upon your bed." He took up the cup without any emotion or change in his colour or countenance, and regarding the man with a fleady and affured look, "Well, faid he, "what fay you of this drink; " may one make a libation out of it? Upon being told that " there was only enough for one dose: " At least," continued he, " we may fay our prayers to the gods, as it is our " duty; and implore them to make our exit from this world, " and our last stage happy; which is what I most ardently " beg of them," After having spoke these words, he kept filence for fome time, and then drank off the whole draught with an amazing tranquillity, and a ferenity of aspect not to be expressed or conceived.

Till then his friends, with great violence to themselves, had refrained from tears; but after he had drank the potion, they were no longer their own masters, and wept abundantly. Appollodorus, who had been in tears during almost the whole conversation, began then to raise great cries, and to lament with such excessive grief, as pierced the hearts of all who were present. Socrates alone remained unmoved, and even reproved his friends, though with his usual mildness and good nature. "What are you doing?" faid he to them, "I admire at you. "Ah! What is become of your virtue? Was it get for this

"I fent away the women, that they might not fall into these "weaknesses? For I have always heard say, that we ought to die peaceably, and blessing the gods. Be at ease, I beg "you, and shew more constancy and resolution," These words filled them with confusion, and obliged them to restrain their tears.

In the mean time he kept walking to and fro; and when he found his legs grow weary, he lay down upon his bed, as he had been directed.

The poison then operated more and more. When Socrates found it began to gain upon the heart, uncovering his face, which had been covered, without doubt to prevent any thing from diffurbing him in his last moments, "Grito," said he, which were his last words, "we owe a cock to Æsculapius; "discharge that vow for me, and pray do not forget it;" soon after which he breathed his last. Crito went to his body, and closed his mouth and eyes. Such was the end of Socrates, in the first year of the 95th Olympiad, and the seventieth of his age. Cicero * fays, he could never sead the description of his death in Plato without tears.

Plato, and the rest of Socrates's disciples, apprehending the rage of his accusers was not satisfied by that victim, retired to Megara, to the house of Euclid; where they staid till the storm blew over. Euripides, however, to reproach the Athenians with the horrible crime they had committed, in condemning the best of men to die upon such sight grounds, composed his tragedy, called Palamedes, in which, under the name of that hero, who was also destroyed by a black calumniation, he deplored the missortune of his friend. When the actor came to repeat this verse, the whole theatre, remembering Socrates in fo diffinct an image of him, melted into tears; and a decree passed, to prohibit speaking any more of him in public. Some believe Euripides was dead before Socrates, and reject this circumstance.

" You doom the justest of the Greeks to perith;

However it were, the people of Athensdid not open their eyes till fome time after the death of Socrates. Their hatred being fatisfied, their prejudices expired; and time having given them opportunity for reflection, the notorious injustice of the fentence appeared in all its horrors. Nothing was heard throughout the city but discourses in favour of Socrates. The academy, the Lycaeum, private houses, public walks, and market-places, feemed still to re-echo the found of his loved voice. Here, faid they, he formed our youth, and taught our children to love their country, and to honour their parents. In this place, he gave us his admirable lessons, and sometimes made us feafonable reproaches, to engage us more warmly in the pursuit of virtue. Alas! how have we rewarded him for fuch important fervices? Athens was in univerfal mourning and consternation, The schools were shut up, and all exercifes fuspended. The accusers were called to account for the innocent blood they had caused to be shed. Melitus was condemned to die, and the rest banished. Plutarch observes, that all those who had any share in this black calumny, were in fuch abomination amongst the citizens, that no one would give them fire, answer them any question, nor go into the same bath with them; and had the place cleanfed where they had bathed, lest they should be polluted by touching it; which drove them into fuch despair, that many of them killed themselves.

· Quid dicam de Socrate, cujus morti illacrymari folco Platonem legens? De zat Deor. lib. iii. n. 84.

h The Athenians, not contented with having punished his accusers, caused a statue of brass to be erected to him, of the workmanship of the celebrated Lysippus, and placed it in one of the most conspicuous parts of the city. Their respect and gratitude rose even to a religious veneration; they dedicated a chapel to him, as to a hero and a demi-god, which they called Eugentien, that is to say, "The Chapel of Socrates."

SECTION VIII.

REFLECTIONS upon SOCRATES, and the SENTENCE paffed upon bim by the ATHENIANS.

WE must be very much surprised, when on the one side we consider the extreme delicacy of the people of Athens, as to what regards the worship of the gods, which ran so high as to occasion their condemning the most eminent persons upon the simple suspicion of their failing in respect for them; and on the other, when we see the exceeding toleration, to call it no worse, with which the same people hear comedies every day, in which all the gods are turned into ridicule, in a manner capable of inspiring the highest contempt for them. All Aristophanes's pieces abound with pleasantries, or rather bussionaries, of this kind; and if it is true that this poet did not know what it was to spare the greatest men of the republic, it may be said also as justly he was still less favourable to the gods.

Such were the daily entertainments in the theatre, which the people of Athens not only heard without pain, but with fuch joy, pleafure, and applause, that they rewarded the poet with public honours, who diverted them fo agreeably. What was there in Socrates that came near this excessive licence? Never did any person of the pagan world speak of the Divinity, or of the adoration due to him, in fo pure, fo noble, and so respectful a manner. He did not declare against the gods publicly received and bonoured by a religion more ancient than the city; he only avoided imputing to them the crimes and infamous actions, which the popular credulity ascribed to them, and which were only proper to depreciate and decry them in the sense of the people. He did not blame the facrifices, festivals, nor the other ceremonies of religion; he only taught, that all that pomp and outward shew could not be agreeable to the gods, without uprightness of intention and purity of heart.

This wife, this illumined, this religious man, however, with all his veneration and noble fentiments in regard to the Divinity, is condemned as an impious perfen, by the fuffrages of almost an whole people, without his accusers being able to inflance one fingle avowed fact, or to produce any proof with the least appearance of probability.

From whence could fo evident, fo universal, and fo determinate a contradiction axise amongst the Athenians? A people, abounding in other respects with wit, taste and knowledge, must without doubt have had their reasons, at least in appearance, for a conduct fo different, and fentiments fo opposite to their general character. May we not fay, that the Athenians confidered their gods in a double light? They confined their real religion to the public, folemn and hereditary worship, as they had received it from their ancestors, as it was established by the laws of the state, had been practifed from immemorial time, and especially confirmed by the oracles, augurs, offerings, and facrifices. It is by this standard they regulated their piety; against which they could not suffer the least attempt whatsoever: It was of this worship alone they were jealous; it was for these ancient ceremonies they were such ardent zealots; and they believed, though without foundation, that Socrate's was an enemy to them. But there was another kind of religion, founded upon fable, poetical fictions, popular opinions, and foreign customs; for this they were little concerned, and abandoned it entirely to the poets, to the reprefentations of the theatre, and common conversation.

What grofiness did they not attribute to Juno and Venus? No citizen would have been fatisfied, that his wife or daughters should have resembled those goodesses. Timotheus, the famous musician, having represented Diana upon the stage of Athens, transported with folly, sury and rage, one of the spectators conceived, he could not make a greater imprecation against him, than to wish his daughter might become the likeness of that divinity. It is better, says Plutarch, to believe there are no gods, than to imagine them of this kind; open and declared impiety being less profane, if we may be allowed to say so, than so gross and absurd a superstition.

However it be, the fentence, of which we have related the circumstances, will, through all ages, cover Athens with infamy and reproach, that all the splendour of its glorious actions, for which it is otherwise so justly renowned, can never obliterate, and shews at the same time, what is to be expected from a people, gentle, humane, and beneficent at bottom, for fuch the Athenians really were, but warm, proud, haughty, inconflant, wavering with every wind, and every imprefion. It is therefore with reason, that their assemblies have been compared to a tempestuous sea; as that element, like the people, though calm and peaceable of itself, is subject to be frequently agitated by a violence not its own.

Volume IV.

As to Socrates, it must be allowed that the pagan world never produced any thing so great and perfect. When we observe to what an height he carries the sublimity of his sentiments, not only in respect to moral virtue, temperance, sobriety, patience in adversity, the love of poverty, and the forgiveness of wrongs; but what is far more considerable, in regard to the Divinity, his unity, omnipotence, creation of the world, and providence in the government of it; the immortality of the soul, its ultimate end and eternal destiny; the rewards of the good, and the punishment of the wicked; when we consider this train of sublime knowledge, we ask our reason whether it is a pagan who thinks and speaks in the manner, and can scarce persuade ourselves, that from so dark and obscure a fund as paganism, should shine forth such living and glorious rays of light.

It is true, his reputation was not without alloy; and it has been affirmed, that the purity of his manners did not answer those of his fentiments. c This question has been discussed amongst the learned; but my plan will not admit me to treat it in its extent. The reader may fee Abbé Fraguier's dissertation in desence of Socrates, against the reproaches made him on account of his conduct. The negative argument he makes use of in his justification, seems a very strong one. He observes, that neither Aristophanes in his comedy of the Clouds, which is entirely against Socrates, nor his vile accufers in his trial, have advanced one word that tends to impeach the purity of his manners: And it is not probable, that fuch violent enemies as those would have neglected one of the most likely methods to discredit him in the opinion of his judges, if there had been any foundation or appearance for the use of it.

d Mem o ris de l'Academie des Inscrip. Tom. IV. p. 372.

I confess, however, that certain principles of Plato his disciple, held by him in common with his master, upon the nudity of the combatants in the public games, from which at the same time he did not exclude the fair sex, and the behaviour of Socrates himself, who wrestled naked man to man with Alcibiades, gives us no great idea of that philosopher's delicacy in point of modesty and bashfulness. What shall we say of his visit to Theodota, a woman of Athens of indissert reputation, only to assure himself with his own eyes of her extraordinary beauty, which was much talked of, and of the precepts he gave her, for the attraction of admirers, and the retaining them in her snares? Do such lessons consist much with a philosopher? I pass over many other things in silence.

I am the less surprised after this, that several of the fathers have censured him in regard to purity of manners, and that they have thought fit to apply to him, as well as to his disciple Plato, what St. Paul fays of the philosophers; that God by a just judgment has abandoned them to a reprobate sense, and to the most shameful lusts for their punishment; in that having clearly known there was but one true God, they had not honoured him as they ought, by publicly avowing their belief, and were not assamed to associate with him an innumerable multitude of divinities, ridiculous and infamous even in their own opinions.

And in this, properly speaking, consists the crime of Socrates, who was not guilty in the eyes of the Athenians, but gave occasion for his being justly condemned by the eternal Truth. It had illuminated his soul with the most pure and sublime lights, of which the pagan world was capable; for we are not ignorant, that all knowledge of God, even natural, cannot come but from himself alone. He held admirable principles with relation to the divinity. He agreeably rallied the sables, upon which the ridiculous mysteries of his age were founded. He often spoke, and in the most exalted terms, of the existence of one only God, eternal, invisible, creator of the universe, supreme director and arbiter of all events, avenger of crimes, and rewarder of virtues: But * he did not dare to give a public testimony of these great truths. He perfectly discerned the false and the ridiculous of the pagan system, and nevertheless, as Seneca says of the wife man, and acted himself, he observed exactly all the customs and ceremonies, not as agreeable to the gods, but as enjoined by the laws. He + acknowledged at bottom one only divinity, and worshiped with the people that multitude of infamous idols, which ancient fuperstition had heaped up during a long fuccession of ages. He held peculiar opinions in the schools, but followed the multitude in the temples. As a philosopher, he despised and detested the idols in secret; as a citizen of Athens and a fenator, he paid them in public the fame adoration with others: By fo much the more to be condemned, fays St. Augustin, as that worship, which was only external and diffembled, feemed to the people to be the effect of fincerity and conviction.

Mij

<sup>2</sup> Xenoph. Memor. l. iii. p. 783-786. f Rem. ch. i. ver. 17-32.

And it cannot be faid that Socrates altered his conduct at the end of his life, or that he then expressed a greater zeal for truth. In his desence before the people, he declared, that he had always received and honoured the same gods as the Athenians; and the last order he gave before he expired, was to facrisce in his name a cock to Æsculapius. Behold then this prince of the philosophers, declared by the Delphic oracle the wisest of mankind, who, notwithstanding his internal conviction of one only divinity, dies in the bosom of idolatry, and with the prosession of adoring all the gods of the pagan theology. Socrates is the more inexcusable in this, that declaring himself a man expressly appointed by heaven to bear witness to the truth, he fails in the most effential duty of the glorious commission he ascribes to himself. For if there be any truth in religion, that we ought more particularly to avow, it is that which regards the unity of the Godhead, and the vanity of idol-worship. In this his courage had been well placed; nor would it have been any great difficulty to Socrates, determined besides as he was to die. But, says St. Augustin *, these philosophers were not designed by God to enlighten the world, nor to bring men over from the impious worship of salse deities to the holy religion of the true God.

Quae omnia (ait Seneca) sapiens servabit tanquam legibus justa, non tanquam diis grata—Omnem istam ignobilem deorum turbam, quam longo aevo longa superstitio congessite, se, inquit, adorabimus, ut meminerimus cultum ejus magis ad morem, quam ad rem, pertinere—Sed iste, quem philosophia quasi liberum secerat, tamen, quia illustris senator erat, colebat quod reprehendebat, agebat quod arguebat, quod culpabet adorabat—eo damnabilius, quo illa, quae mendacitur agebat, sic ageret, ut eum populus veraciter agere existimaret. St. August. de civit. Dei. l. vi. c. 10.

† Eorum fapientes, quos philosophos vocant, scholas habebant dissententes, et templa communia. Id. lib. de ver. rel. c. I.

We cannot deny Socrates to have been the hero of the pagan world in regard to moral virtues. But to judge rightly of him, let us draw a parallel between this supposed here and the martyrs of Christianity, who often were young children and tender virgins, and yet were not afraid to shed the last drop of their blood, to defend and confirm the fame truths which Socrates knew, without daring to affert in public; I mean, the unity of God and the vanity of idols. Let us alfo compare the fo much boafted death of this prince of philosophers, with that of our holy bishops, who have done the Christian religion fo much honour, by their sublimity of genius, the extent of their knowledge, and the beauty and excellence of their writings; a St. Cyprian, a St. Augustin, and fo many others who were all feen to die in the bosom of humility, fully convinced of their unworthiness and nothingness, penetrated with a lively fear of the judgments of God, and expecting their falvation from his fole goodness and condefcending mercy. Philosophy inspires no such sentiments; they could proceed only from the grace of the Mediator, which, " we are taught to believe," Socrates did not deserve to know.

M iii

* Non fie illa rati erant, ut populorum fuorum opinionem ad verum cultum reri Dei a fimulacrorum fuperflitione, atque ab huji s mundi vanitate, converterent. S. August ilio, de ver. tel. c. 2.

BOOK TENTH.

THE

HISTORY

OF THE

PERSIANS AND GRECIANS,

Containing the

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE GREEKS.

MANNERS and CUSTOMS of the GREEKS.

The most effential part of history, and which it concerns the reader most to know, is that which explains the character and manners, as well of the people in general as of the great persons in particular, of whom it treats; and this may be said to be in some fort the soul of history, of which the sacts are only the body. I have endeavoured, as occasion offered, to paint in their true colours the most illustrious personages of Greece; it remains for me to shew the genius and character of the people themselves. I shall consine myself to those of Lacedaemon and Athens, who always held the first rank amongst the Greeks, and shall reduce what I have to say upon this subject to three heads; their political government, war, and religion.

Sigonius, Meursius, Potter, and several others, who have written upon the Grecian antiquities, supply me with great lights, and are of equal use to me in the matters it remains for me to treat.

CHAPTER I.

Of POLITICAL GOVERNMENT.

THERE are three principal forms of government; Monarchy, in which a fingle person reigns; Aristocracy, in which the eldest and wifest govern; and Democracy, in which the fupreme authority is lodged in the hands of the people. The most celebrated writers of antiquity, as Plato, Aristotle, Polybius, and Plutarch, give the preference to the first kind, as including the most advantages with the fewest inconveniencies. But all agree, and it cannot be too often inculcated, that the end of all government, and the duty of every one in authority, in whatfoever manner it be, is to use his utmost endeavours to render those under his command happy and just, by obtaining for them, on the one fide, safety and tranquillity, with the advantages and conveniencies of life; and on the other, all the means and helps that may contribute to making them virtuous. As the pilot's end, fays Cicero *, is to fleer his veffel happily into its port, the physician's to preferve or restore health, the generals of an army to obtain victory; fo a prince, and every man who governs others, ought to make the utility of the governed his view and motive, and to remember, that the supreme rule of all just government is the good of the public, " a Salus populi suprema lex esto." He adds, that the greatest and most noble function in the world is to be the author of the happiness of mankind.

Plato in an hundred places efteems as nothing the most shining qualities and actions of those who govern, if they do not tend to promote the two great ends I have mentioned, the virtue and happiness of the people; and he resutes at large, in the first book of his Republic, one Thrasymachus, who advanced, that subjects were born for the prince, and not the prince for his subjects; and that whatever promoted the interest of the prince and commonwealth ought to be deemed just and lawful.

M iiii

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cic. de leg. liii. n. 8. b Page 338-£43.

* Tenesne igitur, moderatorem illum reip. quo referre velimus omnia?—Us gubernatori cursus secundus, medico salus, imperatori victoria, sie huie moderatori reip. beata civium vita proposita est, ut opibus sirma, copiis locuples, gloria ampla, itute honesta sit. Hujus enim operis maximi inter homines atque o ptimi illima este persectorem volo. Ad Attie. I. viii. epis. 10.

In the distinctions which have been made upon the several forms of government, it has been agreed, that would be the most perfect, which should unite in itself, by an happy mixture of inftitutions, all the advantages, and exclude all the inconveniencies of the reft; and almost all the ancients have believed c, that the Lacedaemonian government came nearest to this idea of perfection.

ARTICLE I.

Of the GOVERNMENT of SPARTA.

FROM the time that the Heraclides had re-entered Poloponnefus, Sparta was governed by two kings, who were always of the fame two families, descended from Hercules by two different branches; as I have observed elsewhere. Whether from pride, or the abuse of despotic power on the side of the kings, or the defire of independence, and an immoderate love of liberty on that of the people, Sparta, in its beginnings, was always involved in commotions and revolts; which would infallibly have occasioned its ruin, as had happened at Argos and Meffene, two neighbouring cities equally powerful with itself, if the wife forefight of Lycurgus had not prevented fatal confequences by the reformation he made in the state. I have related it at large d in the life of that legislator, and shall only touch here upon what regards the government.

SECTION I.

IDEA of the SPARTAN GOVERNMENT.

Lycurgus restored order and peace in Sparta by the establishment of the senate. It confisted of twenty-eight senators, and the two kings prefided in it. This august council, formed out of the wifel and most experienced men in the nation, served as a counterpose to the two other authorities, that of the kings, and that of the people; and whenever the one was for overbearing the other, the senate interposed, by joining the weakest, and thereby held the balance between both. At length, to prevent this body itself from abusing its power, which was very great, a kind of curb was annexed to it, by the nomination of five Ephori, who were elected out of the people, whose office lasted only one year, and who had authority, not only over the senators, but the kings themselves.

c Po'yb. L vi. p. 458. 459.

d Book v. Art. vii.

The power of the kings was extremely limited, especially in the city, and in time of peace. In war they had the command of the fleets and armies, and at that time greater authority. However d, they had even then a kind of inspectors and commissioners assigned them, who served as a necessary council, and were generally chosen for that office, from their being out of favour with them, in order that there should be no connivance on their fide, and the republic be the better served. There was almost continually some secret misunderstanding between the two kings; whether it proceeded from a natural jealousy between the two branches, or was the effect of the Spartan policy, to which their too great union might have given umbrage.

The Ephori had a greater authority at Sparta than the tribunes of the Roman people. They prefided in the election of the magistrates, and could call them to an account for their administration. Their power extended even to the persons of their kings, and of the princes of the blood-royal, whom they had a right to imprison, which they actually used in regard to Pausanias. When they fat upon their feats in the tribunal, they did not rise up when the kings entered, which was a mark of respect paid them by all the other magistrates, and seems to imply a kind of superiority in the Ephori from their representing the people; and it is observed of Agesilaus, that when he was seated upon his throne to dispense justice, and the Ephoricaine in, he never failed to rise up to do them honour. It is very probable, that before him it was not usual for the kings to behave in that manner, Plutarch relating this behaviour of Agesilaus as peculiar to him.

All public business was proposed and examined in the senate, and resolutions passed accordingly in the same place. But the decrees of the senate were not of sorce, unless ratisfied by the people.

There must have been exceeding wisdom in the laws established by Lycurgus for the government of Sparta, because, as long as they were exactly observed, no commotions or seditions of the people were ever known in the city, no change in the form of government was ever proposed, no private person usurped authority by violence, or made himself tyrant; the people never thought of depriving the two samilies, in which it had always been, of the sovereignty, nor did any of the kings ever attempt to assume more power than the laws admitted. This reslection ship had of the wissom of Lycurgus, in point of his policy, and the opinion we ought to have of it. In essection of the city of Greece had this advantage; and all of them experienced many changes and vicissitudes, for want of the like laws to perpetuate their form of government.

The reason of this constancy and stability of the Lacedaemonians in their government and conduct is, that in Sparta the laws governed absolutely, and with sovereign authority; whereas the greatest part of the other Grecian cities, abandoned to the caprice of private men, to despotic power, to an arbitrary and irregular sway, experienced the truth of Plato's saying s, That the city is miserable, where the magistrates command the laws, and not the laws the magistrates.

The example of Argos and Messene, which I have already related, would alone suffice to shew how just and true that reflection is. <sup>h</sup> After their return from the Trojan war, the Greeks, distinguished by the name of Dorians, established themselves in three cities of Peloponnesus, Lacedaemon, Argos, and Messene; and swore alliance and protection of each other. These three cities, governed alike by monarchical power, had the same advantages; except in the fertility of the lands where they were situated, in which the two latter carried it extremely. Argos and Messene however did not long preserve their superiority. The haughtiness of the kings, and the disobedience of the people, occasioned their fall from the slourishing condition in which they had been at first; and their example proved, says Plutarch after Plato, that it was the peculiar favour of the gods, which gave the Spartans such a man as Lycurgus, capable of prescribing so wise and reasonable a plan of government.

Kenoph, in Agefil. p. 651. Pelyb. l. vi. p. 456.
 Plat. l. iii, de leg. p. 683—685. Plat. in Lycurg. p. 43.

To support it without change, particular care was taken to educate the youth according to the laws and manners of the country, in order that they might become a second nature in them, by being eagerly ingrafted into them, and confirmed by long habitude. The hard and sober manner in which they were brought up, inspired them during the rest of their lives with a natural taste for frugality and temperance, that diffinguished them from all other people, and wonderfully adapted them to support the fatigues of war. Plato observes, that this salutary custom had banished from Sparta, and all the territory in its dependence, drunkenness, debauchery, and all their consequential disorders; insomuch that it was a crime punishable by law to drink wine to excess even in the Bacchanalia, which every where else were days of licence, whereon whole cities gave themselves up to the last excesses.

They also accustomed the children from their earliest infancy to an entire submission to the laws, magistrates, and all in authority; and * their education, properly speaking, was no more than an apprenticeship of obedience. It was for this reason Agessiaus advised Xenophon to send his children to Sparta, as to an excellent school †, where they might learn the greatest and most noble of all sciences, "to obey and to command," for the one naturally leads on to the other. It was not only the mean, the poor, and the ordinary citizens, who were subjected in this manner to the laws; but the rich, the powerful, the magistrates, and even kings; and they did not distinguish themselves from the others in any thing but a more exact obedience; convinced that such behaviour was the surest means to their being obeyed and respected themselves by their inferiors.

I Plat. l. de leg. p. 637.

<sup>* ΄</sup> Ω ετ στιν σκαθείσει είναι μελέτσει εθστειθείσε · Plut. in Lycurg. p. 58. † Μαθασομένος τῶν μαθεμάτων τὸ κάλλιτον, αρχισθαι καὶ αρχισ. · Plut. in Ages. p. 606.

Hence came the fo much celebrated answers of Demaratus. Xerxes could not comprehend how the Lacedaemonians, who had no mafter to controul them, should be capable to confront dangers and death. "They are free and indpendent of all men," replied Demaratus; "but the law is above them and commands them; and that law ordains that they must conquer or die." "Upon another occasion, when somebody expressed their surprise, that being king, he should suffer himfelf to be banished: "It is," says he, "because at Sparta the laws are stronger than the kings."

n This appears evidently in the ready obedience of Agefilaus o the orders of the Ephori, when recalled by them to the fupport of his country; a delicate occasion for a king and a conqueror; but to him it feemed more * glorious to obey his country and the laws, than to command numerous armies, or even to conquer Afia.

SECTION II.

LOVE of POVERTY instituted at SPARTA.

To this entire fubmission to the laws of the state, Lycurgus added another principle of government no less admirable, which was to remove from Sparta all luxury, profusion, and magnificence; to decry riches absolutely, to make poverty honourable, and at the same time necessary, by substituting a species of iron money to gold and silver coin, which till then had been current. I have explained elswhere the measures that were used to make so difficult an undertaking succeed, and shall conn Idem. in Agefil. p. 603. 604.

Herod. l. vii. cap. 145. 146. m Plut. in Apoph. Lacon. p. 220.

Multo gloriofius duxit, si institutis patriae paruisset, quam si bello surerasset Asiam. Cornel. Nep. in Agessl. c. iv.

fine myfelf here to examining what judgment should be passed on it, as it assects a government.

The poverty to which Lycurgus reduced Sparta, and which feemed to prohibit all conqueft, and to deprive it of all means to augment its force and grandeur, was well adapted to rendering it powerful and flourishing. Such a conflictation of government, which till then had no example, nor has fince been imitated by any flate, argues a great fund of prudence and policy in a legislator; and the medium conceived afterwards under Lysander, in continuing individuals in their poverty, and restoring to the public the use of gold and silver coin, was it not a wise amendment of what was too strained and excessive in that law of Lycurgus of which we are speaking?

It feems, if we confult only the common views of human prudence, that it is just to reason in this manner; but the event, which is an infallible evidence and arbiter in this place, obliges me to be of a quite different opinion. Whilst Sparta remained poor, and perfished in the contempt of gold and filver, which continued for several ages, she was powerful and glorious; and the commencement of her decline may be dated from the time when she began to break through the severe prohibition of Lycurgus against the use of gold and silver money.

The education which he inflituted for the young Lacedaemonians, the hard and fober life which he recommended with fo much care, the painful and violent exercises of the body prescribed by him, the abstraction from all other application and employment, in a word, all his laws and institutions shew, that his view was to form a people of foldiers, solely devoted to arms and military functions. I do not pretend to justify absolutely this scheme, which had its great inconveniencies; and I have expressed my thoughts of it elsewhere. But admitting it good, we must consess that legislator shewed great wisdom in the means he took for its execution.

The almost inevitable danger of a people solely trained up for war, who have always their arms in their hands, and what is most to be feared, is injustice, violence, ambition, the defire of increasing their power, of taking advantage of their neighbours weakness, of oppressing them by force, of invading their lands under false pretexts, which the lust of dominion never fails to suggest, and of extending their bounds as far as possible; all vices and extremes which are horrid in private persons, and the ordinary commerce of life, but which men have thought fit to applaud as grandeur and glory in the persons of princes and conquerors.

The great care of Lycurgus was to defend his people against this dangerous temptation. Without mentioning the other means he made use of, he employed two, which could not fail of producing their effect. The * first was to prohibit all navigation and war at sea to his citzens. The situation of his city, and the sear least commerce, the usual source of luxury and depravation, should corrupt the purity of the Spartan manners, might have a share in this decree. But his principal motive was to put it out of his citizens power to project conquests, which a people, shut up within the narrow bounds of a peninfula, could not carry very far without being masters at sea.

The fecond means, still more efficacious, was to forbid all use of gold or filver money, and to introduce a species of iron coin in its stead, which was of great weight and small value, and could only be current at home. How with such money should foreign troops be raised and paid, steets sitted out, and numerous armies kept up either by land or sea?

So that the defign of Lycurgus, in rendering his city warlike, and putting arms into their hands, was not, as ° Polybius observes, and Plutarch after him, to make them illustrious conquerors, who might carry war into remote regions, and subject great numbers of people. His sole end was, that shut up within the extent of the lands and dominion left them by their ancestors, they should have no thoughts, but of maintaining themselves in peace, and defending themselves successfully against such of their neighbours as should have the rashness to invade them; and for this they had occasion for neither gold nor filver, finding in their own country, and still more in their sober and temperate manner of life, all that was sufficient for the support of their armies, when they did not quit their own, or the lands of their neghbours.

O Polyb. l. vi. p. 491. Plut. de Lycurg. p. 59.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Amigere de dereis váuras clivas, nod vaupagelis. Plut. in instit. Lacon. p. 439.

Now, fays Polybius, this plan once admitted, it must be allowed, that there is nothing more wife nor more happily conceived than the inflitutions of Lycurgus, for the maintaining a people in the possession of their liberty, and to secure to them the enjoyment of peace and tranquillity. In effect, let us imagine a little republic, like that of Sparta, of which all the citizens were inured to labour, accustomed to live on a little; warlike, courageous, intrepid; and that the fundamental principle of this fmall republic, is to do no wrong to any one, nor to disturb its neighbours, nor invade their lands or interests, but, on the contrary, to declare in favour of the oppressed against the injustice and violence of oppressors; is it not certain that fuch a republic, furrounded by a great number of states of equal extent, would be generally respected by all the neighbouring people, would become the supreme arbiter of all their quarrels, and exercise an empire over them, by so much the more glorious and lasting, as it would be voluntary, and founded folely in the opinion those neighbours would have of its virtue, justice and valour.

P This was the end Lycurgus proposed to himself. Convinced that the happiness of a city, like that of a private person, depends upon virtue, and upon being well within itself, he regulated Sparta so as it might always suffice to its own happiness, and act upon principles of wisdom and equity. From thence arose that universal esteem of the neighbouring people, and even of strangers, for the Lacedaemonians, who asked of them neither money, ships, nor troops, but only that they would lend them a Spartan to command their armies; and when they had obtained their request, they paid him entire obedience, with every kind of honour and respect. In this manner the Sicilians obeyed Gylippus, the Chalcidians Brasidas, and all the Greeks of Asia, Lysander, Callicratidas, and Agefilaus; regarding the city of Sparta as a model for all others, in the arts of living and governing.

The epocha of the declenfion of Sparta begins with the open violation of Lycurgus's laws. I do not pretend that they had always been exactly observed till that time, which was fat from the case; but the spirit and genius of those laws had almost always prevailed with the majority of the persons who governed. No fooner had the ambition of reigning over all Greece inspired them with the defign of having naval armies, and foreign troops, and that money was necessary for the fupport of those forces, than Sparta, forgetting her ancient maxims, faw herfelf reduced to have recourse to the Barbarians, which till then she had detested, and basely to make her court to the kings of Persia, whom she had formerly vanquished with so much glory; and that only to draw from them fome aids of money and troops against their own brethren; that is to say, against people born and fettled in Greece like themselves. Thus had they the imprudence and misfortune to recall with gold and filver into Sparta, all the vices and crimes which the iron money had banished; and to prepare the way for the changes which enfued, and were the cause of their ruin. And this infinitely exalts the wifdom of Lycurgus, in having forefeen at fuch a distance what might strike at the happiness of his citizens, and provided falutary remedies against it in the form of government he established at Sparta. Another legislator, who had preceded him feveral ages, has a right to share this glory with him.

SECTION III.

LAWS established by MINOS in CRETE.

ALL the world knows that Lycurgus had formed the plan of most of his laws upon the model of those observed in the island of Crete, where he passed a considerable time, for the better studying of them. It is proper I should give some idea of them here, having forgot to do it in the place where it would have been more natural, that is, when I spoke for the first time of Lycurgus and his institutions.

Πρός συμπασαν τήν τῶν Σπαρτατῶν πιλὸν, ὕσπιο παιδαγωγον ή διδάκκαλον ἐυσχήμο.*
 νας βία καὶ συταγμένης αολιγείας ἀποβλάποντες.

Minos, whom fable calls the fon of Jupiter, was the author of these laws. He q lived about an hundred years before the Trojan war. He was a powerful, wife, and gentle prince, and still more estimable for his moral virtues than his military abilities. After having conquered the island of Crete, and several others in its neighbourhood, he applied himfelf to strengthen by wife laws the new state, of which he had possessed himfelf by the force of arms. The end which he proposed in the establishment of these laws, was to render his subjects happy by inaking them virtuous. He banished idleness and voluptuousness from his states, and with them, luxury and vicious pleafures, the fruitful fources of all vice. Well knowing, that liberty was justly regarded as the most precious and greatest good, and that it cannot fubfift without a perfect union of the people, he endeavoured to establish a kind of equality amongst them; which is the tie und basis of it, and very proper to remove all envy, jealoufy, hatred, and diffention. He did not undertake to make any new divisions of lands, nor to prohibit the use of gold and filver. He applied himself to the uniting of his subjects by other ties, which seemed to him neither lefs firm nor lefs reasonable.

He decreed, that the children should be all brought up and educated together by troops and bands; in order that they might learn early the same principles and maxims. Their life war hard and sober. They were accustomed to be satisfied with little, to suffer heat and cold, to walk over steep and rugged places, to skirmish with each other in small parties, to suffer courageously the blows they received, and to exercise themselves in a kind of dance, in which they carried arms in their hands, and which was afterwards called the Pyrrhic; in order says Strabo, that even to their diversions, every thing might breathe, and form them for war. They were also made to learn certain airs of music, but of a manly martial kind.

Volume IV.

N

<sup>4</sup> A. M. 2720. Ant. J. C. 1284.

s They were not taught either to ride, or to wear heavy armour; but in return, they were made to excel in drawing the bow, wich was their most usual exercise. Crete is not a flat even country, nor sit for breeding of horses, as is that of the Thessalians, who passed for the best cavalry in Greece; but a rough, broken country, full of shelves and high lands, where heavy-armed troops could not exercise themselves in the horse race. But as to archery and light-armed soldiers, fit to execute the devices and stratagems of war, the Cretans pretended to hold the foremost rank.

Minos thought proper to establish in Crete a community of tables and meals. Befides feveral other great advantages which he found in this institution, as to the introducing a kind of equality in his dominions, the rich and poor having the fame diet, the accustoming his subjects to a frugal and sober life, the cementing friendshipand unity between them by the usual gaiety and familiarity of the table, he had also in view the custom of war, in which the foldiers are obliged to eat together. 'It was the public that supplied the expences of these tables. Out of the revenues of the flate, a part was applied to the uses of religion, and the salaries of the magistrates, and the rest allotted for the public meals: So that the women, children, and men of all ages, were fed at the cost, and in the name of the republic. In this Aristotle gives the preference to the meals of Crete before those of Sparta, wherein private persons were obliged to furnish their proportion, and without it were not admitted into the affemblies; which was to exclude the poor.

u After eating, the old men discoursed upon the affairs of the state. The conversation turned generally upon the history of the country, upon the actions and virtues of the great men of it, who had distinguished themselves either by their valour in war, or their wisdom in peace; and the youth, who were present at these entertainments, were exhorted to propose those great persons to themselves as their models, for the forming of their manners, and the regulation of their conduct.

s Plat. de leg l. i. p. 623.

Arist. de rep. l. ii. c. 10.

u Athen. I. iv. p. 643.

* Minos as well as Lycurgus, is reproached with having no other view in his laws than war; which is a very great fault in a legislator. It is true, this appears to have been his principal attention, because he was convinced that the repose, liberty, and riches of his subjects were under the protection, and in a manner under the guard of arms and military knowledge; the conquered being deprived of all those advantages by the victor. But he ordained, that war should be only made for the sake of peace; and his laws are far from being confined to that sole object.

Amongst the Cretans, the cultivation of the mind was not entirely neglected; and care was taken to give the youth some tincture of learning. The works of Homer, of much later date than the laws of Minos, were not unknown amongst them, though they set small value upon, and made little use of, foreign poets. They were very curious in such knowledge as is proper to form the manners; and, what is no small praise, they piqued themselves upon thinking much and speaking little. The poet Epimenides, who made a voyage to Athens in the time of Solon, and was in great estimation there, was of Crete, and by some placed in the number of the seven sages.

One of Minos's institutions, which Plato b admires the most, was to inspire early into the youth an high respect for the maxims, customs, and laws of the state, and not to suffer them to dispute or call in question the wisdom of their institution, but to consider them not as prescribed and imposed by men, but as emanations of the Divinity himself. Accordingly he had industriously apprifed the people, that Jupiter himself had dictated them to him. He had the same attention in regard to the magistrates and aged persons, whom he recommended to honour in a peculiar manner; and in order that nothing might prevent the respect due to them, he ordained, that if any desects were observed in them, they should never be mentioned in the presence of the youth: A wise pre-

Nij

x Plat. de leg. l. i. p. 626 2 Plut. in Solon. p. 84.

y Ibid. l. ii. p. 680. E Idem, l. i. p. 642, b De leg. l. i. p. 634.

caution, and which would be very becoming in the ordinary practice of life!

The government of Crete was at first monarchical, of which Minos has left a perfect model to all ages. According to him, as a most great and excellent man * observes, the king can do every thing over the people, but the laws every thing over him. He has an absolute power to do good; and his hands are tied up from doing evil. The laws intrust the people in his hands as the most facred of deposites, upon condition that he shall be their common father. The fame laws require, that a fingle man by his wisdom and moderation shall constitute the felicity of an infinite number of fubjects; and not that the subjects, by their misery and abject slavery, shall be fubstituted to gratify the pride and low passions of a single man. According to him, the king ought to be abroad the defender of his country at the head of armies, and at home the judge of his people, to render them good, wife, and happy. It is not for himself that the gods have made him king, and he is only fo for the fervice of his people. He owes them his whole time, care, and affection; and is worthy of the throne, only as he forgets, and devotes himself to the public good. Such is the idea 'Minos had of the fovereignty, of which he was a living image in his own person, and which Hefied has perfectly expressed in two words, by calling that prince, " the most royal of mortal kings," Basilistrator Surter Bagianin; that is to fay, that he possessed in a supreme degree all royal virtues, and was a king of all things.

d It appears, that the authority of king was of no long duration; and that it gave place to a republican government, as Minos had intended. The fenate, composed of thirty fenators, formed the public council. In that assembly the public assairs were examined, and resolutions taken; but they were of no force, till the people had given them their approbation, and confirmed them by their suffrages. The magistrates, to the number of ten, established for maintaining good order in the states, and therefore called Cosmi *, held the two other bodies of the state in respect, and were the balance between them. In time of war the same persons commanded the army. They were chosen by lot, but only out of certain samilies. Their office was for life; and they were not accountable to any for their administration. Out of this company the senators were elected.

C Plat. in Min. p. 310, d Arist. de rep. l. ii. c 10.

. Monsieur de Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambry.

The Cretans made the flaves and mercenaries cultivate their lands, who were obliged to pay them a certain annual sum. They were called Perioeci, apparently from their being people in the neighbourhood, whom Minos had subjected. As they inhabited an island, and confequently a country feparate from all others, the Cretans had not fo much to fear from these vasials, as the Lacedaemonians from the Helots, who often joined the neighbouring people against them. A cuftom anciently established in Crete, from whence it was adopted by the Romans, gives us reason to believe, that the vaffals who manured the lands, were treated with great goodness and favour. In the feafts of Mercury, the masters waited on their flaves at table, and did them the fame offices as they received from them the rest of the year; precious remains and traces of the primitive world, in which all men were equal, that feemed to inform the masters, that their fervants were of the same condition with themselves, and that to treat them with cruelty or pride, was to renounce humanity.

f As a prince cannot do every thing alone, and is obliged to affociate co-operators with himfelf, for whose conduct he is accountable, Minos charged his brother Rhadamanthus with a share in the administration of justice in the capital city; which is the most effential and indispensible function of sovereignty. He knew his probity, difinterestedness, ability, and constancy, and had taken pains to form him for so important an office. Another minister had the care of the rest of the cities, who made a circuit three times a-year, to examine whether the laws established by the prince were duly observed, and the inferior magistrates and officers religiously acquitted themselves of their duty.

N iij

Grete, under so wise a government, changed its aspect entirely, and seemed to have become the abode of virtue, probity, and justice; as we may judge, from what sable tells us of the honour Jupiter did these three brothers, in making them judges of the other world; for every body knows, that sable is sounded upon real history, though disguised under agreeable emblems and allegories, adapted to recommend truth, by the ornaments of sancy.

g It was, according to fabulous tradition, a law established from all times, that men in departing out of this life should be judged, in order to their receiving the reward or punishment due to their good or evil actions. In the reign of Saturn, and in the first years of that of Jupiter, this judgment was pronounced at the instant preceding death, which left room for very flagrant injustices. Princes, who had been cruel and tyrannical, appearing before their judges in all the pomp and splendor of their power, and producing witnesses to depose in their favour; because, as they were still alive, they dreaded their anger; the judges, dazzled with this vain shew, and deceived by fuch false evidence, declared these princes innocent, and dismissed them with permission to enter into the happy abodes of the just. The same may be said in regard to the rich; but for the poor and helpless, calumny and malice purfued them even to this last tribunal, and found means to have them doomed for ever as criminals.

Fable adds, that, upon reiterated complaints and warm remonstrances made to Jupiter upon this account, he changed the form of these trials. The time for them was fixed to be the very moment after death. Rhadamanthus and Æacus, both sons of Jove, were appointed judges; the first for the Asiatics, the other for the Europeans; and Minos over them to decide supremely in cases of doubt and obscurity. Their tribunal is situated in a place called "The Field of Truth," because neither salsehood nor calumny can approach it. The greatest prince must appear there, as soon as he has resigned his last breath, deprived of all his grandeur, reduced to his naked self, without defence or protection, silent and trembling for his own doom, after having made the whole world tremble for theirs. If he be found guilty of crimes, which are of a nature to be expiated, he is confined in Tartarus for a certain time only, and with affurance of being released, as soon as he shall be sufficiently purised. But if his crimes are unpardonable, such as injustice, perjury, and the oppression of his people, he is cast into the same Tartarus, there to suffer eternal miseries. The just, on the contrary, of whatsoever condition they are, are conducted into the blessed abodes of peace and joy, to partake of a selicity which shall have no end.

<sup>8</sup> Plat. in Georg. p. 523-526. In Axioch. p 371.

Who does not fee that the poets, under the cover of these fictions, ingenious indeed, but little to the honour of the gods, intended to give us the model of an accomplished prince, whose first care is to render justice to his people; and to image the extraordinary happiness Crete enjoyed under the wife government of Minos? This happiness did not expire with him. h The laws he established subsisted in all their vigour even in Plato's time; that is to fay, more than nine hundred years after. And they were confidered as the effect of his long * convertations for many years with Jupiter, who had condescended to become his teacher, to enter into at familiarity with him as with a friend, and to form him in the great art of reigning, with a fecret complacency, as a favourite disciple, and a tenderly beloved son. It is in this manner Plato explains these words of Homer: k Διος μεγάλε i agree's, the most exalted praise, according to him, that can be given to a mortal, and which that poet ascribes only to Minos.

Notwithstanding fo shining and solid a merit, the theatres of N iiij

h Plat. in Min. p. 321. i Idem. p. 319. k Odyff. T. ver. 179.

* Et Jovis arcanis Minos admissus. Horat.

† This poetical fiction is perhaps taken from the holy feriptures, which fay of Moses: And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend. Exod. xxxiii. 11.

Athens refounded with nothing so much as imprecations against the memory of Minos; and Socrates, in the dialogue of Plato I have already often cited, observes upon, and gives the reason for them: But sirst he makes a resection well worthy of being weighed. "When either the praise or dispraise " of great men is in question, it is infinitely proper," says he, " to treat them with circumfpection and wifdom; because up-" on that depends the idea men form to themselves of vir-" tue and vice, and the diffinction they ought to make be-"tween the good and the bad. For," adds he, "God con-" ceives a just indignation, when a person is blamed who re-" fembles himfelf; and on the contrary, another praifed who " is reverse of him. We must not believe that nothing is sa-" cred but brass and marble; (he speaks of the statues that " were worthipped:) The just man is the most facred, and the " wicked the most detestable of all beings in this world."

After this reflection, Socrates observes, that the source and cause of the Athenians hatred of Minos was the unjust and cruel tribute he imposed upon them, in obliging them to send him, every nine years, seven young men, and as many maids, to be devoured by the Minotaur; and he could not avoid reproaching that prince, with having drawn upon himself the abhorrence as a city like Athens abounding with learned men, and of having sharpened the tongues of the poets against him; a dangerous and sormidable race of men, from the poisoned shafts they never fail to let sly against their enemies.

It appears from what I have repeated, that Plato imputes to Minos the impolition of that cruel tribute. Apollodorus, Strabo, and Plutarch, feem to be of the same opinion. ¹ Mcn-fieur the Abbé Banier alleges and proves that they are mistaken, and confound the first Minos, of whom we speak, with a second, his grandson, who reigned after him in Crete, and, to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, killed in Attica, declared war against the Athenians, and imposed that tribute; to which Theseus put an end by killing the Minotaur. It would indeed be difficult to reconcile so inhuman and barbarous a conduct with what all antiquity relates of the goodness, lenity, and equity of Minos, and with the magnificent praises it bestows upon the polity and institutions of Crete.

I Men. de l'Acad. des Inferip. Tom. III.

It is true the Cretans degenerated very much from their ancient reputation, which at length they absolutely lost by an entire change of their manners, becoming avaricious and self-interested, to a degree of thinking that no gain was base, enemies of labour and regularity of life, professed liars and knaves; so that to Cretise became a proverb amongst the Greeks, implying to lie and to deceive. Every body knows that * St. Paul cites against them as truth the testimony of one of their encient poets, it is believed of Epimenides, who paints them in colours much to their dishonour; but this change of manners, in whatever time it might arrive, does not at all affect the probity of the ancient Gretans, nor the glory of Minos their king.

<sup>1</sup> The most certain proof of that legislator's wisdom, as Plato observes, is the solid and lasting happiness, which was the effect of the sole imitation of his laws by Sparta. Lycurgus had regulated the government of that city upon the plan and idea of that of Crete, and it subsisted in an uniform manner for many ages, without experiencing the vicissitudes and revolutions so common in all the other states of Greece.

ARTICLE II.

Of the GOVERNMENT of ATHENS.

The government of Athens was neither fo permanent nor fo uniform as that of Sparta; but suffered various alterations, according to the diversity of times and conjunctures. Athens, after having long been governed by kings, and afterwards by archons, assumed entire liberty, which gave place, however, for some years to the tyrannic power of the Pisistratides, but was soon after re-established, and subsisted with splendor till the defeat in Sicily, and the taking of the city by the Lacedaemonians. These subjected them to the Thirty Tyrants, whose authority was not of long duration, and gave place again to liberty, which continued amidst various events, during a long series of years, till the Roman power had subdued Greece, and reduced it into a province.

<sup>1</sup> Plat. p. 320.

* Kentus del Arbeau, rand Snela, varioss deval. The Cretans are always liars, evil beafts, flow bellies. Tit. i. 12.

I shall consider in this place only the popular government, and shall examine in particular five or fix heads: The foundation of government according to Solon's establishment; the different parts of which the republic confisted; the council or senate of the five hundred; the assemblies of the people; the different tribunals for the administration of justice; the revenues or finances of the republic. I shall be obliged to be more extensive upon what regards the government of Athens than I have been upon that of Sparta, because the latter is almost sufficiently known, from what has been said of it in the life of Lycurgus.

SECTION I.

FOUNDATION of the GOVERNMENT of ATHENS.

Solon was not the first who established the popular government at Athens ". Thefeus long before him had traced out the plan, and began the execution of it. After having united the twelve towns into one city, he divided the inhabitants into three bodies; that of the nobility, to whom the superintendence in religious affairs and all officers were confided; the labourers or husbandmen; and the artisans. He had proposed the establishment of a kind of equality between the three orders: For if the nobles were considerable by their honours and dignities, the husbandmen had the advantage of their utility to the public, and the necessity there was for their labours; and the artifans had the superiority to both the other bodies in their number. Athens, to speak properly, did not become a popular state till the establishment of the nine archons, whose authority continued only for one year, whereas before it was for ten; and it was not till many years after, that Solon, by the wisdom of his laws, instituted and confirmed this form of government.

m Book v. Art. 3.

B Plut. in Thef. p. 10, 11.

O Solon's great principle was to establish as much as possible a kind of equality amongst his citizens, which he regarded with reason as the foundation and essential point of liberty. He refolved therefore to leave the public employments in the hands of the rich, as they had been till then, but to give the poor also some share in the government, from which they were excluded. For this reason he made an estimation of what each individual was worth. Those who were found to have an annual revenue of five hundred measures, as well in grain as liquid things, were placed in the first class, and called the Pentacofiomedimni, that is, those who had a revenue of five hundred measures. The second class was composed of such as had three hundred, and could maintain a horse for war; these were called Horsemen or Knights. Those who had only two hundred, were in the third class, and were called * Zugitae. Out of these three classes only the magistrates and commanders were chosen. All the other citizens, who were below these three classes, and had less revenues, were comprised under the name of Theti, hirelings, or workmen labouring with their hands. Solon did not permit them to hold any office. and granted them only the right of giving their fuffrages in the assemblies and trials of the people, which at first seemed a very flight privilege, but at length was found to be a very great advantage, as will appear in the fequel. I do not know whether Solon forefaw it; but he used to say, p that the people were never more obedient and fubmissive, than when they poffessed neither too much nor too little liberty: Which comes very near Galba's expression, q when to incline Piso to treat the Roman people with goodness and lenity, he desires him to remember, † that he was going to command men who were incapable of bearing either entire liberty or absolute subjection.

O Plut. in Solon, p. 87. P Ibid. p. 110. 9 Tacit. Hift. l. x. c. 16.

* It is believed they were so called from their being ranked between the Knights and the Theti; as in the gallies those who rowed in the middle were termed Zugitae; their place was between the Thalamitae and Thranitae.

† Imperaturus es hominibus, qui nec totam fervitutem pati poffunt, nec totam libertatem.

The people of Athens being become more haughty after their victories over the Perfians, pretended to have a right to share in all the public offices and the magistracy; and Arifides, to prevent the disorders which too senacious opposition might have occasioned, thought proper to give way to them in this point. It appears however from a passage in Xenophon, that the people contented themselves with the offices from whence some profit arose, and left those which related more particularly to the government of the state in the hands of the rich.

t The citizens of the three first classes paid every year a certain fum of money, to be laid up in the public treasury; the first a * talent, the knights half a talent, and the Zugitae ten + minae.

As the proportion of revenue determined the order of the classes, as their revenues augmented, the people were allowed to rife to a superior class.

If "Plutarch may be believed, Solon formed two councils, which were a kind of double limitation to fix and temper the affemblies of the people. The first was the Areopagus: But it was much more ancient than his institutions; and he only reformed it, and gave it new lustre by augmenting its power. The second was the council of the Four Hundred, that is, an hundred of each tribe; for Cecrops, the first king of the Athenians, had divided the people into four tribes. Clisthenes long after him changed that order, and established ten. It was in this council of the Four Hundred all affairs were confidered before they were proposed to the assembly of the people, as we shall soon explain.

I do not mention here another division of the people into three parties or factions, which till the time of Pisistratus were a continual source of troubles and feditions. One of these three parties was formed out of those who inhabited the high lands, and savoured popular government; the other out of f Xenoph de rep. Athen. p. 691.

Plut. in Aristid. p. 332.
Pollux. l. viii. c. 10.

· One thousand French crowns.

# Five hundred livres.

those who lived in the plains, and they were for oligarchy; and the third out of the people upon the coast, and these held the mean between both.

It is necessary, for the better understanding what we have now faid, to enter into a more particular account of the Athenian people.

SECTION II.

Of the INHABITANTS of ATHENS.

THERE were three forts of inhabitants of Athens *; citizens, flrangers, and fervants. In the account taken by Demetrius Phalereus in the 116th Olympiad, their number amounted to twenty-one thousand citizens, ten thousand strangers, and forty thousand servants *. The number of citizens was almost the same in the time of Cecrops, and less under Pericles.

I. Of the CITIZENS.

A CITIZEN could only be fuch by birth or adoption. To be a natural denizen of Athens, it was necessary to be born of a father and mother both free, and Athenians. We have seen that Pericles restored this law to all its force, which had not been exactly observed, and which he himself some small time after infringed. The people could confer the freedom of the city upon strangers; and those whom they had so adopted, enjoyed almost the same rights and privileges as the natural citizens. The quality of citizen of Athens was sometimes granted in honour and gratitude to those who had rendered great services to the state; as to Hippocrates; and even kings have sometimes canvassed that title for themselves and their children. Evagoras, king of Cyprus, thought it much to his honour.

When the young men attained the age of twenty, they were inrolled upon the lift of citizens, after having taken an oath; and it was only in virtue of that public and folemn act that they became members of the state. The form of this oath is exceedingly, remarkable, which Stobaeus and z Pollux have preferved in the following words: " I will never dishonour " the profession of arms, nor fave my life by a shameful slight. " I will fight to my last breath for the religion and civil inte-" rests of the state, in concert with the other citizens, and a-" lone if occasion be. I will not bring my country into a " worfe condition than I found it, but will use my utmost en-" deavours to make it more happy and flourishing. I will al-" ways fubmit myfelf to the laws and magistrates, and to all " that shall be ordained by the common consent of the peo-" ple. If any one shall violate, or make void the laws, I will " not difguife or conceal fuch an attempt, but will oppose it " either alone or in conjunction with my fellow-citizens; and " I will constantly adhere to the religion of my forefathers. " To all which I call to witness Agraulis, Enyalus, Mars, and " Jupiter." I leave the reader to his own reflections upon this august ceremony, well adapted to inspire the love of their country into the hearts of the young citizens.

* A. M. 3690. Ant. J. C. 314. Athen. l. vi. p. 272. Y Book v. Art. 8.

* The text fays, popladas τισσαράκοντα, four hundred thousand, which is a manifest error.

The whole people at first had been divided into four tribes, and afterwards into ten. Each tribe was subdivided into several parts, which were called  $\Delta \sigma_{\mu\mu}$ , Pagi. It was by these two titles the citizens were described in the public acts. "Me-"litus, è tribu Cecropide, è pago Pitthensi."

II. Of the STRANGERS.

I CALL those by that name, who being of a foreign country, came to settle at Athens, or in Attica, whether for the sake of commerce, or the exercising any trade. They were termed pirous, Inquilini. They had no share in the government, nor votes in the assembly of the people, and could not be admitted into any office. They put themselves under the protection of some citizen, as we find from a passage of * Terence, and upon that account were obliged to render him certain duties and services, as the clients did at Rome to their patrons. They were held to observe all the laws of the republic, and to conform entirely to all its customs. They paid a yearly tribute to the state of twelve * drachms, and in default of payment were made slaves, and exposed to sale. * Xenocrates, the celebrated, but poor, philosopher, was very near experiencing this misfortune, and was carried to prison; but Lycurgus the orator having paid the tax, released him from the farmers of the public revenues; a kind of men who in all times have been very little sensible to merit, with the exception of an exceeding sew of their number. That philosopher, meeting some time after the sons of his deliverer, told them, "I pay your father the favour he has done me with usury." for all the world praises him upon my account."

Z Pollux, I. viii. c. 9.

• Thais patri se commedavit ie clientelam et sidem: Nobis dedit sese. Eunuch. Act 5. seen. ult.

III. Of the SERVANTS.

THERE were two kinds of them. The one, who were free, and not able to get their bread by their work, were obliged by the bad state of their affairs to go into service; and their condition was eafy, and not laborious. The fervice, of the other was forced and unavoidable; these were slaves, who had either been taken prisoners in war, or bought of such as trafficked publicly in them. Part of their mafter's estate confifted in them, who disposed absolutely of them, but generally treated them with great humanity. b Demosthenes observes. in one of his harangues, that the condition of fervants was infinitely more gentle at Athens than any where else. There was in that city an afylum and place of refuge for flaves, where the bones of Thefeus had been interred; and that afylum fubfifted in Plutarch's time. How glorious was it for Thefeus, that his tomb should do that twelve hundred years after his death which he had done himself during his life, and continue the protector of the oppressed as he had been!

<sup>6</sup> When the flaves were treated with too much rigour and inhumanity, they had their action against their masters, who were obliged to fell them to others, if the fact were sufficiently proved. <sup>d</sup> They could ransom themselves even against their masters.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Plut, in Flamin. p. 375. b Philip. 3.

c Plant. de superstit. p. 166. d Plut. in Calin.

ters consent, when they had laid up money enough for that purpose. For out of what they got by their labour, after having paid a certain proportion to their masters, they kept the remainder for themselves, and made a stock of it at their own disposal. Private persons, when they were satisfied with their services, often gave these slaves their liberty; and the same grace was always granted them by the public, when the necessity of the times obliged the state to arm and list them for the war amongst the citizens.

The humane and equitable usage with which the Athenians treated their fervants and flaves, was an effect of the good temper natural to that people, and very remote from the auftere and cruel feverity of the Lacedaemonians in regard to their helots, which often brought their republic to the verybrink of destruction. e Plutarch, with great reason, condemns this rigour. He thinks it proper to habituate one's felf always to mercy, even with regard to beafts, were it only, fays he, to learn by that means to treat men well, and for the fake of habituating humanity and benevolence. He relates upon this occasion a very fingular fact, and very proper to explain the character of the Athenians. After having finished the temple called Hecatonpedon, they fet all the beafts of burden at liberty that had been employed in the work, and affigned them fat pasturages as consecrated animals. And it was faid. that one of these beasts having come to offer itself at the work, and put itself at the head of those that drew the carriages to the citadel, walking foremost as if to exhort and encourage them, the Athenians ordained by a decree, that the creature should be maintained at the public expence till its death.

SECTION III.

Of the COUNCIL or SENATE of FIVE HUNDRED.

In consequence of Solon's institutions, the people of Athens had a great share and authority in the government. Appeals might be brought to their tribunal in all causes; they had a right to cancel the old laws, and establish new ones; in a word, all important assairs, whether relating to war or peace, were decided in their assemblies. In order to their determinations being made with more wisdom and maturity, Solon had instituted a council, composed of four hundred senators, an hundred out of each tribe, which were then four in number; they prepared and digested the affairs which were to be laid before the people, as we shall soon explain more at large. Clisthenes, about a hundred years after Solon, having increased the number of tribes to ten, augmented also that of the senators to sive hundred; each tribe supplies the same states and the second of the second their stipend out of the public treasury.

e Plut. in Catone, p. 338. 339.

They were chosen by lot, in which they made use of black and white beans, which were mingled and shaken in an urn, and each tribe gave in the names of those who aspired to that trust, and had the revenue assigned by the laws to qualify them for it. None could be admitted under the age of thirty. After inquiry made into the manners and conduct of the candidate, he was made to take an oath, whereby he engaged to give at all times the best counsel he could to the people of Athens, and never to depart in the least from the tenor of the laws.

This fenate assembled every day, except upon the days appointed for sestivals. Each tribe in its turn furnished those who were to preside in it, called * Prytanes; and this rank was decided by lot. This presidency continued thirty-sive days, which being reckoned ten times, amounts to the number of days, except sour, of the lunar year followed at Athens. This time of the presidency, or prytanism, was divided into sive weeks with regard to the five tens of the Prytanes, who were to preside in them; and every week seven of these ten Prytanes drawn by lot presided, each their day, and were denominated Ilywidgen, that is to say, Presidents. He † who was so for the day, presided in the assembly of the senators and in that of the people. He was charged with the public seal, as also with the keys of the citadel and treasury.

The fenators, before they affembled, offered a facrifice to Jupiter, and Minerva, under the additional appellation of Goddess of Good Counsel*, to demand the prudence and understanding necessary in wife deliberations. The prefident propofed the business which was to be confidered in the affembly. Every one gave his opinion in his turn, and always standing. After a question had been settled, it was drawn up in writing, and read with a loud voice. Each fenator then gave his vote by forutiny, in putting a bean into the urn. If the number of the white beans carried it, the question passed; otherwife it was rejected. This fort of decree was called wife our, or Heodelsona, as much as to fay preparatory refolution. It was afterwards laid before the affembly of the people, where, if it was received and approved, it had the force of a law; if not, its authority subfifted only one year. This shews with what wisdom Solon established this council, to inform and direct the people, to fix their inconstancy, to prevent their temerity, and to affift their deliberations with a prudence and maturity not to be expected in a confused and tumultuous affembly, composed of a great number of citizens, most of them without education, capacity, or much zeal for the public good. The reciprocal dependency, and natural intercourse of the two bodies of the state, which were obliged to lend each other their authority, and remained equally without force when without union and a good understanding, were besides a method judiciously contrived for supporting a wife balance between the two bodies; the people not being able to institute any thing without its being first proposed and approved by the senate, nor the fenate to pass any decree into a law till it had been ratified by the people.

We may judge of the importance of this council by the matters which were treated in it; the fame, without any exception, as were laid before the people; wars, taxes, maritime affairs, treaties of peace, alliances; in a word, whatever related to government; without mentioning the account which they obliged the magistrates to give on quitting their offices, and their frequent decifions and judgments upon the most serious and important affairs.

* Búlaise, Búlais

SECTION IV. Of the AREOPAGUS.

This council took its name from the place where it affembled, called *The Quarter, or Hill of Mars, because, according to some, Mars had been cited thither in judgment for a murder committed by him. It was believed to be as ancient as the nation. Cicero and Plutarch attribute the inflitution of it to Solon; but he only re-established it, by giving it more lustre and authority than it had had till then, and for that reason was looked upon as its sounder. The number of the senators of the Areopagus was not sixed; at certain times they amounted to two or three hundred. Solon thought proper, that only those who had borne the office of archon should be honoured with that dignity.

This fenate had the care of feeing the laws duly observed, of inspecting the manners of the people, and especially of judging in criminal cases. They held their fittings in an open place, and during the night. The former, very probably to avoid being under the same roof with the criminals, and not to defile themselves by such a commerce with them; the latter, that they might not be softened by the fight of the guilty, and might judge according to justice and the laws. It was for the fame reason, the orators were not permitted to use their exordium on peroration, nor allowed to excite the passions, and were obliged to confine themselves solely to the subject matter of their cause. The severity of their judgments was exceedingly dreaded, particularly in regard to murder; and they were highly attentive to inspire their citizens with horror for that crime. They + condemned a child to be put to death for making it his paltime to put out the eyes of quails; conceiving this fanguinary inclination as the mark of a very wicked disposition, which might one day prove fatal to many, if he were suffered to grow up with impunity.

O ij

<sup>* *</sup> Apsios máyos.

† Nec mihi videntur Aeropagitae, cum damnaverunt puerum oculos coturnicum cruentem, aliud judicafie, quam id fignum esse perniciossissimae mentis, multisque malo suturae si adolevisset. Quintil. I. v. c. 9.

The affairs of religion, as blasphemies against the gods, contempt of sacred mysteries, different species of impiety, and the introduction of new ceremonies and new divinities, were also brought before this tribunal. "We read in Justin Martyr, that Plato, who in his travels in Egypt had acquired great lights concerning the unity of God, when he returned to Athens, took great care to dissemble and conceal his sentiments, for fear of being obliged to appear and give an account of them before the Areopagitae; and we know that St. Paul was traduced before them, as teaching a new doctrine and endeavouring to introduce new gods.

These judges were in great reputation for their probity, equity, and prudence, and generally respected. Cicero, in writing to his friend Atticus, upon the fortitude, constancy, and wife feverity of the Roman fenate, thinks he makes a great encomium upon it, in comparing it with the Arcopagus. " Senatus, "Agus mays, nil constantius," nil severius, nil for-" tius." Cicero must have conceived a very advantageous idea of it, to speak of it as he does in the first book of his Offices *. He compares the famous battle of Salamin, in which Themistocles had fo great a part, with the establishment of the Areopagus, that he ascribes to Solon; and makes no scruple to prefer, or at least to equal the legislator's service to that for which Athens was obliged to the general of its army. " in reality," fays he, " that victory was ufeful to the repub-" lic only for once, but the Areopagus will be fo throughout " all ages; as by the wildom of that tribunal, the laws and " ancient customs of the Athenian state are preserved. The-u Cohort. ad Grace. x Acts xvii. 18-20. y Ad Attic. l. i. ep. 13.

Quamvis Themistocles jure laudetur, et sit ejus nomen, quam Solonis, illustrius, citeturque Salamis clarislimae testis victoriae, quae anteponatur consilio Solonis ci, quo primum constituit Arcopagitas; non minus praeclarum hoc, quam illud judicandum est. Illud enim semel profuit, hoc semper proderit civitati: hoc consilio leges Athenienshum hoc majorum instituta servantur. Et Themistocles quidem nihil discrit, in quo ip se Arcopagum juverit: at ille adjuvit Themistoclem. Est enim bellum gestum consilio senatus cjus, qui a Solone erat constitutus. Offic. I. in 24.

- " miftocles did no fervice to the Areopagus; but the Areopa" gus abundantly contributed to the victory of Themistocles:
- " because the republic was at that time directed by the wife
- " counfels of that august senate."

It appears from this passage of Cicero's, that the Areopagus had a great share in the government, and I do not doubt but it was consulted upon important affairs. Cicero here perhaps may have confounded the council of the Areopagus with that of the Five Hundred. It is certain, however, that the Areopagitae were extremely active in the public affairs.

Pericles, who could never enter the Areopagus, because chance having always been against him, he had not passed through any of the employments necessary to his admission, attempted to weaken its authority, and attained his point: Which is a great blot in his reputation.

SECTION V.

Of the MAGISTRATES.

Or these a great number were established for different functions. I shall speak only of the archons, who are the most known. I have observed elsewhere, that they succeeded the kings, and that their authority at first continued during life. It was at length limited to ten years, and reduced at last only to one. When Solon was commissioned to reform the government, he found them upon this soot, and to the number of nine. He did not abolish their office; but he very much diminished their power.

The first of these nine magistrates was called THE ARCHON, by way of eminence, and the year denominated from him: "* Under such an archon such a battle was fought." The second was called THE KING, which was the remains and footsteps of the authority to which they had succeeded. The third was THE POLEMARCH, who at first commanded the armies, and always retained that name, though he had not the same authority, of which he had so long preserved some part. For we have seen, in speaking of the battle of Marathon, that the polemarch had a right to vote in the council of war, as well as the ten generals then in command. The fix other archons were called by the common name, Thesmothetae, which implies that they had a particular superintendence over the laws, in order to their being duly observed. These nine archons had each of them a peculiar province, and were judges in certain affairs allotted to their cognizance. I do not think it necessary to enter into the particulars of their duty, nor into those of many other employments and offices, established for the administration of justice, for the levying of taxes and tributes, for the preservation of good order in the city, for supplying it with provisions; in a word, for every thing relating to commerce and civil society.

O iji

* From thence he was also called Exarbus

SECTION VI.

Of the ASSEMBLIES of the PEOPLE.

These were of two forts, the one ordinary, and fixed to certain days; and for these there was no kind of summons: the other extraordinary, according to the different occasions that arose; and the people were informed of it by express proclamation.

The place for the affembly was not fixed. Sometimes it was the public market-place, sometimes a part of the city near the citadel, called not and sometimes the theatre of Bacchus.

The Prytanes generally affembled the people, Some days before the affembly, papers were fixed up, wherein the bufiness to be considered was set down.

All the citizens, poor as well as rich, had a right to give their fuffrages. They were liable to a penalty, who failed of being present at the assembly, or who came too late; and to induce their punctual attendance, a reward was annexed to it, at first of an obolus, which was the sixth part of a drachm, then of three oboli, which made about sivepence French.

The affembly always began with facrifices and prayers, in order for the obtaining from the gods the knowledge and understanding necessary to wise deliberations; and they never failed to add the most terrible imprecations against such as should wilfully advise any thing contrary to the public good.

The prefident proposed the affair upon which they were to deliberate. If it had been examined in the fenate, and drawn up there as a question, it was read; after which, those who would fpeak were invited to afceed the tribunal, that they might be the better heard by the people, and inform them in the matter proposed. The oldest general spoke first, and then the rest according to their seniority. When the orators had done speaking, and concluded that it was necessary to approve or reject the decree of the fenate, the people proceeded to vote; and the most common method of doing it was by holding up their hands, to denote their approbation; which was called xugoroviv. The affembly was fometimes adjourned till another day, because it was too late for the number of those who lifted up their hands to be distinguished, and the plurality decided. After a resolution had been formed in this manner, it was reduced to writing, and read by an officer to the people with a loud voice, who confirmed it again by holding up their hands as before; after which the decree had the force of a law: And this was called \(\pi_n\rho_1\sigma_1\rho_n\), from the Greek word \(\pi_n\rho_n\), which fignifies " a pebble, or " fmall stone," because they were fometimes used in giving suffrages by scrutiny.

All the great affairs of the republic were discussed in these affemblies. It was in them new laws were proposed and old ones amended; the religion and worship of the gods examined; magistrates, generals, and officers created; their behaviour and conduct inquired into; peace or war concluded; deputies and ambassadors appointed; treaties and alliances ratified; freedom of the city granted; rewards and honours decreed for those who had distinguished themselves in war, or rendered great services to the republic; and punishments ordained for those who had behaved themselves ill, or had violated the laws of the state, and were banished by ofsracism. In sine, justice was administered, and judgment passed there, upon the most important affairs. We see from this account, which is however very impersect, how far the people's power extended; and with what truth it may be said that the go vernment of Athens, though qualified with ariflocracy, and the authority of the elders, was by its conflictution democratical and popular.

O iiij

I shall take occasion to observe in the sequel, of what weight the a ent of eloquence is in such a republic, and in what manner orators ought to be considered in it. It is not easy to conceive how they could make themselves heard in so numerous an assembly, and where such a multitude of auditors were present. We may judge how great that was, from what has been said of it in two instances. The first relates to ostracism, and the other to the adoption of a stranger for a citizen. On each of these occasions, it was necessary that no less than six thousand citizens should be present in the assembly.

I referve for another place the reflections which naturally arise from what I have already related, and what it remains for me to say further upon the government of Athens.

SECTION VII.

Of TRIALS.

There were different tribunals, according to the difference of the affairs to be adjudged; but appeals might be brought to the people from all decrees of other judges; and this it was that rendered their power so great and considerable z. All the allies, when they had any cause to try, were obliged to repair to Athens, where they often remained a considerable time, without being able to obtain audience, from the multiplicity of affairs to be adjudged. This law had been imposed upon them, in order to render them more dependent upon the people, and more submissive to their authority; instead of which, had they sent commissioners to the places, they would have been the sole persons to whom the allies would have made their court, and paid their homage.

The parties pleaded their causes either in person, or employed advocates to do it for them. The time allowed for the hearing was generally fixed; and a water-clock, called in Greek and age, regulated its duration. The decree was passed by plurality of voices; and when the fuffrages were equal, the judges inclined to the fide of mercy, and acquitted the accused. It is remarkable that a friend was not obliged to give evidence against a friend.

Z Xenoph. de rep. Athen. p. 664.

All the citizens, even the poorest, and such as had no estates, were admitted into the number of the judges, provided they had attained the age of thirty, and were known to be persons of good morals. Whilst they sat in judgment, they held in their hands a kind of sceptre, which was the mark of their dignity, and laid it down when they withdrew.

The judges falary was different at different times. They had at first only an obolus a-day, and afterwards three, where their fee remained fixed. It was but a small matter in itself, but became in time a very great charge to the public, and exhausted the treasury without much enriching particulars. We may judge of this from what is related in Aristophanes's comedy of the Wasps, wherein that poet ridicules the passion of the Athenians for trying causes, and their eager desire for the gain arising from it, which protracted and multiplied suits to infinity.

In this comedy, a young Athenian, who was to act the part I have mentioned, of turning the judges and trials of Athens into ridicule, from a state of the revenues paid into the public treasury, finds their amount to be two thousand talents *. He then examines how much of that fum falls to the share of the judges, with whom Athens was over-run, at three oboli a-head per day. This appears to be annually, including all of them, only an hundred and fifty talents +. The calculation is easy. The judges were paid only ten months in the year, the other two being employed in festivals, when all proceedings at law were prohibited. Now, three oboli a-day paid to fix thousand men, makes fifteen talents a-month, and in confequence one hundred and fifty in ten months. According to this calculation, the most assiduous judge gained only seventyfive livres, about three guineas, a-year. " What then be-" comes of the remainder of the two thousand talents?" cries the young Athenian. " What," replies his father, who was one of the judges, " it goes to those -- but let us not ex-

* About L. 280,000 Sterling.

† About L. 7000 Sterling.

"pose the shame of Athens; let us always be for the peo"ple." The young Athenian goes on to explain that the remainder went to such as robbed the public treasury; to the orators, who incessantly flattered the people; and to those who were employed in the government and army. I have extracted this remark from the works of Father Brumoi the Jesuch tracted, with which I shall make very free, when I come to speak of public shews and dramatic representations.

SECTION VIII.

Of the AMPHICTYONS.

THE famous council of the Amphictyons is introduced here, though not particular to the Athenians, but common to all Greece, because it is often mentioned in the Grecian history; and I do not know whether I shall have a more natural occa-fion to speak of it.

The affembly of the Amphictyons was in a manner the holding of a general assembly of the states of Greece. The establishment of it is attributed to Amphictyon, king of Athens and fon of Deucalion, who gave them his name. His principal view in the institution of this council, was to unite in the facred band of amity the feveral people of Greece admitted into it, and to oblige them by that union to undertake the defence of each other, and be mutually vigilant for the happiness and tranquillity of their country. The Amphictyons were also created to be the protectors of the oracle of Delphos, and the guardians of the prodigious riches of that temple; and also to adjudge the differences which might arise between the Delphians, and those who came to consult the oracle. This council was held at Thermopylae, and fometimes at Delphos itself. It assembled regularly twice a-year, in the fpring and autumn, and more frequently when affairs required.

The number of people or cities which had a right to fit in this affembly is not precifely known, and varied, without doubt, at different times. When the Lacedaemonians, in order to pass in it what decrees they thought fit, were for excluding the Thessalians, Argives, and Thebans; a Themistocles, in the speech he made to the Amphictyons to prevent that design from taking essel, seems to infinuate, that there were only one-and-thirty cities at that time which had this right.

Each city fent two deputies, and in confequence had two votes in the council, and that without diffinction, or the more powerful having any prerogative of honour or pre-eminence over inferior states in regard to the suffrages; the liberty upon which these people valued themselves, requiring that every thing should be equal amongst them.

The Amphictyons had full power to discuss and determine finally in all differences which might arise between the Amphictyonic cities, and to fine the culpable in such manner as they thought fit. They could employ not only the rigour of the laws in the execution of their decrees, but even raise troops, if it were necessary, to compel such as rebelled to submit to them. The three facred wars undertaken by their order, of which I have spoken elsewhere, are an evident proof of this power.

Before they were installed into this body, they took a very remarkable oath, of which Æschines b has preserved the form. It runs to this effect: " I fwear that I will never deftroy any " of the cities honoured with the right of fitting in the Am-" phictyonic council, nor turn their running waters out of " their course either in times of peace or war: If any people " shall make such an attempt, I hereby engage to carry the " war into their country, to demolish their cities, towns and " villages, and to treat them in all things as the most cruel " enemies. Moreover, if at any time any persons shall dare " to be so impious as to steal and take away any of the rich " offerings preferved in the temple of Apollo at Delphos, or " abet any others in committing that crime, either by aiding " or only counfelling him therein, I will use my feet, hands, " voice, in a word, all my powers and faculties, to avenge " fuch facrilege." That oath was attended with the most terrible imprecations and execrations, " That if any one in-" fringes any thing contained in the oath I have now taken, " whether private perfen, city, or people, may that perfon, " city, or people, be deemed accurfed; and in that accepta-" tion, experience the whole vengeance of Apollo, Latona, " Diana, and Minerva the foreknower. May their country " produce none of the fruits of the earth, and their women, " instead of generating children resembling their fathers, bring " forth nothing but monsters; may their animals share in the " fame curse. May those facrilegious men lose all suits at " law; may they be conquered in war, have their houses de-" molished, and be themselves and their children put to the " fword." I am not aftonished, that after such terrible engagements, the holy war, undertaken by the order of the Amphictryons, should be carried on with fo much ardour and furv. The religion of an oath was of great force with the ancients; and how much more regard ought to be had to it in the Christian world, which professes to believe that the violation of it shall be punished with eternal torments; and yet how many are there amongst us who make a trifle of breaking through the most folemn oaths?

<sup>2</sup> Plut. in Themist. p. 122.

b Aeschin. in Orat. wiei magargeochias.

The authority of the Amphictyons had always been of great weight in Greece; but it began to decline exceedingly from the moment they condescended to admit Philip of Macedon into their body. For that prince, enjoying by this means all their rights and privileges, soon knew how to set himself above all law, and to abuse his power, so far as to preside by proxy both in this illustrious affembly, and in the Pythian games; of which games the Amphictryons were judges and Agonothetae in virtue of their office. This Demosthenes reproaches him with in his third Philippic; "When he does not deign," says he, "to honour us with his presence, he fends his slaves to preside over us:" An odious, but emphatical term, and in the spirit of the Grecian liberty, by which the Athenian orator images the base and abject subjection of the greatest lords in Philip's court.

If the reader defires a further knowledge of what relates to the Amphictyons, the differtation of Monsieur Valois <sup>a</sup> may be consulted, in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, wherein this subject is treated with great extent and erudition.

SECTION IX.

Of the REVENUES of ATHENS.

THE revenues, according to the passage of Aristophanes, which I have cited above, and in consequence as they stood in the time of the Peloponnesian war, amounted to two thousand talents, that is to say, to six millions of livres. They were generally reduced to sour species.

1. The first relates to the revenues arising from agriculture, the sale of woods, the produce of mines, and other funds of a like nature, appertaining to the public. Amongst these may be included the duties upon the import and export of merchandise, and the taxes levied upon the inhabitants of the city, as well natives as strangers.

The history of Athens often mentions the filver mines of Laurium, which was a mountain fituated between the Piraeum and Cape Sunium; and those of Thrace, from whence many persons extracted immense riches. † Xenophon, in a treatise wherein he slates this matter at large, demonstrates how much the public might gain by industriously working these mines, from the example of the many persons they had enriched. Hipponicus b let his mines and six hundred slaves to an undertaker, who paid him an obolus ‡ a-day for each slave, clear of all charges, which amounted in the whole to a mina, about two pounds sive shillings. Nicias, who was killed in Sicily, farmed out his mines and a thousand slaves in the same manner, and with the same prosit in proportion to that number.

2. The fecond species of revenue were the contributions paid the Athenians by the allies for the common expences of a Vol. III. b Pag. 925.

A TEAM.

† De ration. redituum.

‡ Six oboli made a drachm, one hundred drachms a mina, and fixty minae a salent.

the war. At first, under Aristides, they ameunted only to four hundred and fixty talents *. Pericles augmented them almost a third, and raised them to fix hundred; and some time after they were run up to thirteen hundred. Taxes, which in the beginning were moderate and necessary, became thus in a little time excessive and exorbitant, notwithstanding all the protestations made the allies, and the most solemn engagements to the contrary.

3. A third fort of revenue were the extraordinary capitation taxes, levied upon the inhabitants of the country, as well natives as firangers, in preffing occasions and emergencies of the state.

4. The fines laid upon persons by the judges for different missemeanors, were applied to the uses of the public, and laid up in the treasury; except the tenth part of them, which was consecrated to Minerva, and a fiftieth to the other divinities.

The most natural and legal application of these different revenues of the republic, was in paying the troops both by sea and land, building and sitting out seeks, keeping up and repairing the public buildings, temples, walls, ports, and citadels. But the greatest part of them, especially after Pericles's time, was misapplied to unnecessary uses, and often consumed in frivolous expences; games, feasts, and shews, which cost ammense sums, and were of no manner of utility to the state.

SECTION X.

Of the EDUCATION of the YOUTH.

I PLACE this article under the head of government, because all celebrated legislators have with reason believed that the education of youth was an essential part of it.

The exercises that served for the forming of either the bodes or minds of the young Athenians, and as much may be said of almost all the people of Greece, were, dancing, music, hunting, fencing, riding, polite learning, and philosophy. It may be observed that I speak generally, and treat very slightly these several articles.

· A talent was worth a thousand crowns.

I. DANCING. MUSIC.

Dancing is one of the exercises of the body, culivated by the Greeks with great attention. It made a part of what the ancients called the Gymnastic, divided, according to * Plato, into two kinds, the Orchestric, which takes its name from the dance, and the Palaestric +, so called from a Greek word which fignifies wrestling. The exercises of the latter kind principally conduced to form the body for the fatigues of war, navigation, agriculture, and the other uses of society.

Dancing had another end, and taught fuch rules of motion as were most proper to render the shape free and easy; to give the body a just proportion, and the whole person an unconstrained, noble, and graceful air; in a word, an external politeness, if we may be allowed to use that expression, which never fails to prejudice people in savour of those who have been formed to it early.

Music was cultivated with no less application and success. The ancients ascribed wonderful effects to it. They believed it very proper to calm the passions, soften the manners, and even humanize people naturally savage and barbarous. Colybius, a grave and serious historian, and who is certainly worthy of belief, attributes the extreme difference between two people of Arcadia, the one infinitely beloved and esteemed for the elegance of their manners, their benevolent inclinations, humanity to strangers, and piety to the gods; the other, on the contrary, generally reproached and hated for their malignity, brutality, and irreligion: Polybius, I say, ascribes this difference to the study of music, I mean, says he, the true and noble music, industriously cultivated by the one, and absolutely neglected by the other people.

After this, it is not furprifing that the Greeks confidered music as an effential part in the education of youth. ‡ Socrates himself, in a very advanced age, was not ashamed to learn to play upon musical instruments. Themistocles, however otherwise esteemed, * was thought to be wanting in point of merit, because at an entertainment he could not touch the lyre like the rest of the company. † An ignorance in this respect was deemed a defect of education; on the contrary, a capacity in it did honour to the greatest men. ‡ Epaminondas was praised for dancing, and playing well upon the flute. We may observe in this place the different tastes and genius of nations. The Romans were far from having the same opinion with the Greeks in regard to music and dancing, and set no value upon them. It is very likely the wisest and most knowing amongst the latter did not apply to them with any great industry; and Philip's expression to his son Alexander, who had shewn too much skill in music at a feast, induces me to be of this opinion; "Are you not ashamed," said he, "to sing so well?"

° Polyb. p. 288—291. * Орхый Эш. Saltare. † Пахн.

Socrates, jam senex, institui lyra non erubescebat. Quintil. l. i. c. 10.

For the rest, this esteem for dancing and music had its foundation. Both the one and the other were employed in the most august feasts and ceremonies of religion, to express their acknowledgment to their gods with the greater force and dignity, for the favours they had vouchfafed to confer upon them. They had generally the greatest share in their feasts and entertainments, which feldom or ever began or ended, without some odes being fung in honour of the victors in the Olympic games, and on other the like occasions. They had a part also in war; and we know that the Lacedaemonians marched to battle dancing, and to the found of flutes. d Plato, the most grave pli-Icropher of antiquity, confidered both these arts, not as simple emusements, but as they had a great share in the ceremonies of religion and military exercises. Hence we see him very intent, in his books of laws, to prefcribe rules upon dancing and music, and to keep them within the bounds of utility and decorum.

They did not continue long within these restrictions. The

d De leg. l. vii.

* Themistocles, cum in epulis reculasset lyram, habitus est indoctior. Cic. Tusc. Quaest. l. i. n. 4.

† Summam eruditionem Graeci sitam censebant in nervorum vocumque cantibus—discebatque id omnes; nec qui nesciebat, satis excultus doctrina putabatur. 3bid.

† In Epaminondae virtutibus commemoratum est, saltasse cum commode, scienterque tibiis cantasse—scilicet non cadem omnibus houesta sunt atque turpia, sed omnia majorum indientis judicantur. Corn. Nep. in praesat. vit. Epam.

licence of the Grecian stage, on which dancing was in the highest vogue, and in a manner prostituted to bussions and the most contemptible people, who made no other use of it, than to suggest or support the most vicious passions; this licence, I say, soon corrupted an art, which might have been of some advantage, had it been regulated by Plato's opinion. Music had a like diffiny; and perhaps the corruption of this did not a little contribute to the depraying and perverting of dancing. Voluptuousness and sensual pleasure were the sole arbiters consulted in the uses made of both; and the theatre became a school of every kind of vice.

Plutarch, in lamenting that the art of dancing was fo much fallen from the merit which rendered it estimable to the great men of antiquity, does not omit to observe, that it was corrupted by a vicious kind of poetry, and a soft essemble music, with which it was ill united, and which had taken place of the ancient poetry and music, that had something noble, majestic, and even religious and heavenly in them. He adds, that being made subservient to low taste and sensuality, by their aid, it exercised a kind of tyrannical power in the theatres, which were become the public schools of criminal passions and gross vices, wherein no regard was had to reason.

The reader, without my observing upon it to him, will make the application of this passage of plutarch to the fort of music which engrosses our theatres at this day, and which, by its effeminate and wanton airs, has given the last wound to the little manly force and virtue that remained among us. Quintilian describes the music of his times in these terms: "f Quae nunc" in scenis esseminata, et impudicis modis fracta, non exparte minima, si quid in nobis virilis roboris manebat, excidit."

II. Of the other EXERCISES of the BODY.

The young Athenians, and the general all the Greeks, were very intent upon forming themselves to all the exercises of the body, and to go through their lessons regularly with the masters of the Palaestrae. They called the places allotted for these exercises, Palaestrae or Gymnasia; which answers very near to our academies. Plato in his books of laws, after having shewn of what importance it was in war to cultivate the hands and feet, adds 8, that far from banishing from a well-regulated republic the profession of the Athletae; on the contrary, prizes ought to be proposed for all exercises, that conduce to the improvement of military virtue; fuch are those which render the body more active, and fitter for the race; more hard, robult, and fupple; more capable of supporting great fatigues, and effecting great enterprises. We must remember, that there was no Athenian, who ought not to have been capable of handling the oar in the largest gallies. The citizens themfelves did this office, which was not left to flaves and criminals, as in these days. They were all destined to the trade of war, and often obliged to wear arms of iron from head to foot, of a great weight. For this reason Plato, and all the ancients, looked upon the exercises of the body as highly useful, and even absolutely necessary to the good of the public; and therefore this philosopher excludes only those from them, who were incapable of fervice in war.

Volume IV.

P

e Sympof. l. ix. qu. 15. p. 748.

h There were also masters, who taught the youth to ride, and to handle their arms or sence; and others whose business it was to instruct them in all that was necessary to be known, in order to excel in the art military, and to become good commanders. The whole science of the latter consisted in what the ancients called the Tactic, that is to say, the art of drawing up troops in battle, and of making military evolutions. That science was useful, but did not suffice. Accompton shews its defect, in producing a young man lately come from such a school, in which he imagined he had learned every thing, though in reality he had only acquired a soolish esteem for himself, attended with perfect ignorance. He gives him, by the mouth of Socrates, admirable precepts upon the business of a soldier, and very proper to form an excellent officer.

Hunting was also considered by the ancients as a sit exercise for forming youth to the stratagems and satigues of war. It is for this reason Xenophon, who was no less a great general than a great philosopher, k did not think it below him to write a treatife expressly upon hunting, in which he descends to the lowest particular; and observes upon the considerable advantages confequential of it, from being inured to fuffer hunger, thirst, heat, cold, without being discouraged either by the length of the courfe, the difficulty of the clifts and thickets, through which it is often necessary to press, or the small success of the long and painful fatigues, which they often undergo to no purpose. He adds, that this innocent pleasure removes others equally shameful and criminal; and that a wife and moderate man would not however abandon himfelf fo much to it as to neglect the care of his domestic affairs. 1 The fame author, in the Cryopaedia, frequently praifes hunting, which he looks upon as a real exercise of war, and shews, in the example of his young hero, the good use that may be made of it.

§ Lib. viii. de leg. p. 832, 833. h Plut. in Lachete, p. 181, i Memorab. l. iii. p. 761, &c.

III. Of the EXERCISES of the MIND.

ATHENS, to fpeak properly, was the school and abode of polite learning, arts, and sciences. The study of poefy, eloquence, philosophy, and mathematics, were in great vogue there, and much cultivated by the youth.

The young people were fent first to learn grammar under masters, who taught them regularly, and upon proper principles, their own language; by which they attained a knowledge of its whole beauty, energy, number, and cadence. Hence m proceeded the universal fine taste of Athens, where, as history informs us, a simple herb-woman distinguished Theophrastus to be a stranger, from the affectation of a single word in expressing himself. And from the same cause, the orators were greatly apprehensive of letting sall the least injudicious expression, for fear of offending so refined and delicate an audience. It was very common for the young people to get the tragedies represented upon the stage by heart.

Pi

k De venatione. 1 Cyrop. i. p. 5, 6. et. l. ii. p. 59, 60.

m Cic. in Brut. n. 172. Quintil. l. viii. c. r. Plut. in. Peric. p. 156.

We have feen, that after the defeat of the Athenians before Syracufe, many of them, who had been taken prisoners and made slaves, softened their slavery by reciting the works of Euripides to their masters, who, extremely delighted with hearing such sublime verses, treated them from thenceforth with kindness and humanity. The compositions of the other poets had no doubt the same effect: and Plutarch tells us, that Alcibiades, when very young, having entered a school in which there was not an Homer, gave the master a box on the ear as an ignorant fellow, and one who dishonoured his profession.

As for eloquence, it is no wonder that it was particularly fludied at Athens. It was that opened the way to the highest offices, reigned absolute in the assemblies, decided the most important affairs of the state, and gave an almost unlimited power to those who had the talent of speaking in an eminent degree.

This therefore was the great employment of the young citizens of Athens, especially of those who aspired to the highest employments. To the study of rhetoric they annexed that of philosophy: I comprise under the latter, all the sciencs, which are either parts of, or relate to it. The persons, known to antiquity under the name of Sophists, had acquired a great reputation at Athens, especially in the time Socrates. These teachers, who were as presumptuous as avaricious, set themselves up for universal scholars. Their whole art lay in philosophy and cloquence; both of which they corrupted by the salle taste and wrong principles they instilled into their disciples. I have observed, in the life of Socrates, that philosopher's endeavours and success in discrediting them.

a In Alcib. p. 194.

CHAPTER II.

OF WAR

SECTION I.

PEOPLE of GREECE in all TIMES very WARLIKE.

No poeople of Antiquity, I except the Romans, could difpute the glory of arms and military virtue with the Greeks. During the Trojan war Greece fignalized her valour in battle, and acquired immortal fame by the bravery of the captains she sent thither. This expedition was however, properly speaking, no more than the cradle of her infant-glory; and the great exploits, by which she distinguished herself there, were only her first essays, and apprenticeship in the art of war.

There were in Greece at that time feveral small republics, neighbours to one another by their fituation, but extremely remote in their customs, laws, characters, and particulatly in their interests. This difference of manners and interests was a continual fource and occasion of divisions amongst them. Every city, little fatisfied with its own dominion, was studious to aggrandize itself at the expence of its next neighbours; according as they lay most commodious for it. Hence all these little states, either out of ambition, and to extend their conquests, or the necessity of a just defence, were always under arms, and, by that continual exercise of war, formed in the univerfal people a martial spirit, and an intrepidity of courage which made them invincible in the field; as appeared in the fequel, when the whole united forces of the East came to invade Greece, and made her fenfible what she was, and of what capable.

Two cities distinguished themselves above the rest, and held indisputably the first rank; these were Sparta and Athens: In consequence of which those cities, either successively or together, had the empire of Greece, and maintained themselves through a long series of time in a power, which the sole superiority of merit, universally acknowledged by all the other states, had acquired them. This merit consisted principally in their military knowledge and martial virtue; of which they had given the most glorious proofs in the war against the Persians. Thebes disputed this honour with them for some years, by surprising actions of valour, which had something of prodigy in them; but this was but a short-lived blaze, which, after having shone out with exceeding splendor, soon disappeared, and left that city in its original obscurity. Sparta and Athens will therefore be the only objects of our resections as to what relates to war; and we shall join them together in order to be the better able to distinguish their characters, as well in what they resemble, as in what they differ from each other.

SECTION II.

ORIGIN and CAUSE of the VALOUR and MILITARY VIRTUE of the LACEDAEMONIANS and ATHENIANS.

ALL the laws of Sparta and institutions of Lycurgus seem to have no other object than war, and tended folely to the making the subjects of that republic a body of soldiers. All other employments, all other exercises, were prohibited amongst them. Arts, polite learning, sciences, trades, even husbandry itself, had no share in their applications, and seemed in their eyes unworthy of them. From their earliest infancy, no other tafte was instilled into them but for arms; and indeed the Spartau education was wonderfully well adapted to that end. To go barefoot, to lie hard, to shift with little meat and drink, to fuffer heat and cold, to exercise continually hunting, wrestling, running on foot and horfeback, to be inured to blows and wounds so as to vent neither complaint nor groan; these were the rudiments of the Spartan youth with regard to war, and enabled them one day to support all its fatigues, and to confront all its dangers.

The habit of obeying, contracted from the most early years, respect for the magistrates and elders, a perfect submission to the laws, from which no age nor condition was exempted, prepared them amazingly for military discipline, which is in a manner the foul of war, and the principle of fuccess in all great enterprises.

Now, one of these laws was, to conquer or die, and never to furrender to the enemy. Leonidas with his three hundred Spartans was an illustrious example of this; and his intrepid valour, extolled in all ages with the highest applauses, and proposed as a model to all posterity, had given the same spirit to the nation, and traced them out the plan they were to follow. The difgrace and infamy annexed to the violation of this law, and to such as quitted their arms in battle, confirmed the observance of it, and rendered it in a manner inviolable. The mothers recommended to their fons, when they fet out for the field, to return either with or upon their bucklers. They did not weep for those who died with their arms in their hands, but for those who preserved themselves by slight. Can we be furprifed after this, that a small body of such foldiers, with fuch principles, should put an innumerable army of Barbarians to a fland?

The Athenians were not bred up fo roughly as the people of Sparta, but had no less valour. The taste of the two people was quite different in regard to education and employment; but they attained the same end, though by different means. The Spartans knew only how to use their arms, and were no more than foldiers: But amongst the Athenians, and we must fay as much of the other people of Greece, arts, trades, hufbandry, commerce, and navigation, were held in honour, and thought no difgrace to any one. These occupations were no obstacles to the valour and knowledge necessary in war; they disqualified none for rising to the greatest commands and the first dignities of the republic. Plutarch observes, that Solon, feeing the territory of Attica was barren, applied himfelf to turning the industry of his citizens, upon arts, trades, and commerce, in order to supply his country thereby with what it wanted on the fide of fertility. This tafte became one of the maxims of the government and fundamental laws of the state, and perpetuated itself amongst the people, but without lessening in the leaft their ardour for war.

The ancient glory of the nation, which had always distinguished itself by military bravery, was a powerful motive for not degenerating from the reputation of their ancestor. The samous battle of Marathon, wherein they had sustained alone the shock of the Barbarians, and gained a signal victory over them, infinitely heightened their courage; and the battle of Salamin, in the success of which they had the greatest share, raised them to the highest pitch of glory, and rendered them capable of the greatest enterprises.

A noble emulation not to give place in point of merit to Sparta, the rival of Athens, and a lively jealoufy of their glory, which during the war with the Perfians contained itself within due bonds, were another strong incentive to the Athenians, who every day made new efforts to excel themselves, and sustain their reputation.

The rewards and honours granted to those who had distinguished themselves in battle; the monuments erected in meanory of the citizens who had died in the desence of their country; the funeral orations publicly pronounced in the midst of the most august religious ceremonies, to render their names immortal; all conspired infinitely to eternize the valour of both nations, and particularly of the Athenians, and to make fortitude a kind of law and indispensible necessity to them.

Athens had a law, by which it was ordained that those who had been maimed in the war, should be maintained at the expence of the public. The same grace was granted to the fathers and mothers, as well as the children of such as had fallen in battle, and left their families poor, and not in a condition to subssift themselves. The republic, like a good mother, generously took them into her care, and, with great regard to them, supplied all the duties, and procured all the relief they could have expected from those whose loss they deplored.

This exalted the courage of the Athenians, and rendered their troops invincible, though not very numerous. In the battle of Plataea, where the army of the Barbarians, commanded by Mardonius, confifted of no lefs than three hundred thousand men, and the united forces of the Greeks of only one hundred and eight thousand two hundred men, there were in the latter only ten thousand Lacedaemonians, of which one half were Spartans, that is to say, inhabitants of Sparta, and eight thousand Athenians. It is true, each Spartan brought with him seven haelots, which made in all thirty-five thousand men; but they were scarce ever reckoned as soldiers.

&lt;sup>n</sup> Plut, in Sojon. p. 96. Ibid, in Menex. p. 248, 249. Diog. Laert. in Solon, p. 37.

This shining merit in point of martial valour, generally acknowledged by the other states and people, did not suppress in their minds all fentiments of envy and jealoufy, as appeared once in relation to the Lacedaemonians. The allies, who were very much superior to them in number, were in pain to see themselves subjected to their order, and murmured against it in fecret. Agefilaus, king of Sparta, without feeming to have any knowledge of their difgust, assembled the whole army; and after having made all the allies fit down on one fide, and the Lacedaemonians by themselves on the other, he caused proclamation to be made by an herald, that all fmiths, mafons, carpenters, and so on, through the other trades, should rise up. Almost all the allies did so, and not one of the Lacedaemonians, to whom all trades were prohibited. Agefilaus then fmiling. "You fee," faid he, "how many more foldiers Sparta fur-" nishes, than all the rest of the allies together;" thereby intimating, that to be a good foldier, it was necessary to be only a foldier; that trades diverted the artifan from applying himfelf wholly to the profession of arms and the science of war, and prevented his fucceeding fo well in it as those who made it their fole business and exercise. But Agesilaus spoke and acted in that manner from the prejudice of his opinion in favour of the Lacedaemonian education; for indeed those whom he was for having confidered only as fimple artifans, had well demonstrated in the glorious victories they had obtained over the Perfians, and even Sparta itself, that they were by no means inferior to the Lacedaemonians, entirely foldiers as they were, either in valour or military knowledge.

SECTION III.

Of the different kind of TROOPS which composed the ARMIES of the LACEDAEMONIANS and ATHENIANS.

THE armies both of Sparta and Athens were composed of four forts of troops: Citizens, allies, mercenaries, and slaves. The soldiers were sometimes marked in the hand, to distinguish them from the slaves, who had that character impressed upon their forehead. Interpreters believe, that in allusion to this double manner of marking, it is said in the Revelation, that all were obliged "o to receive the mark of the beast in their "right hand, or in their foreheads;" and that St. Paul says of himself, "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."

The citizens of Lacedaemonia were of two forts, either those who inhabited Sparta itself, and who for that reason were called Spartans, or those who lived in the country. In Lycurgus's time, the Spartans amounted to nine thousand, and the others to thirty thousand. This number seems to have been somewhat diminished in the time of Xerxes, as Demaratus, speaking to him of the Lacedaemonian troops, computes only eight thousand Spartans. The latter were the flower of the nation; and we may judge of the value they fet upon them, by the anxiety the republic expressed for three or four hundred, befieged by the Athenians in the fmall island of Sphacteria, where they were taken prifoners. The Lacedaemonians generally spared the troops of their country very much, and fent only a few of them into the armies. When a Lacedaemonian general was asked, how many Spartans there was in the army? he answered, "As " many as are necessary to repulse the enemy." They served the state at their own expence; and it was not till after a length of time that they received pay from the public.

The greatest number of the troops in the two republics were composed of the allies, who were paid by the cities which sent them.

The foreign troops in the pay of the republic, to the aid of which they were called in, were stiled Mercenaries.

o Rev. xiii, 16. P Gal vi. 17.

The Spartans never marched without haelots; and we have feen that in the battle of Plataea every citizen had feven. I do not believe this number was fixed; nor do I well comprehend for what fervice they were defigned. It would have been very ill policy to have put arms into the hands of fo great a number of flaves, generally much discontented with their masters harsh treatment of them, and who in consequence had every thing to fear from them in a battle. Herodotus, however, in the passage I have cited from him, represents them carrying arms in the field as light-armed soldiers.

The infantry confifted of two kinds of foldiers. The one were heavy-armed, and carried great bucklers, lances, half-pikes, and fcimitars. The other were light-armed, that is to fay, with bows and flings. They were commonly placed in the front of the battle, or upon the wings as a first line to shoot their arrows, and sling their javelins and stones at the enemy; and when they had discharged, they retired through the intervals behind the battalions as a second line, and continued their volleys.

• Thucydides, in describing the battle of Mantinaea, divides the Lacedaemonian troops in this manner. There were seven regiments of four companies each, without including the Squirites, to the number of fix hundred; these were horsemen, of whom I shall soon speak further. The company consisted, according to the Greek interpreter, of an hundred and twenty-eight men, and was subdivided into sour platoons, each of thirty-two men. So that a regiment amounted to sive hundred and twelve men; and the seven made together three thousand sive hundred sourseer and sour. Each platoon had sour men in front and eight in depth, for that was the usual depth of the files, which the officers might change according to occasion.

The Lacedaemonians did not actually begin to use cavalry, till after the war with Messene, where they perceived their want of it. They raised their horse principally in a small city not far from Lacedaemon, called Sciros, from whence these troops were denominated Scirites, or Squirites. They were always on the extremity of the left wing; and this was their post by right.

Cavalry was still more rare amongst the Athenians: The situation of Attica, broken with abundance of mountains, was the cause of this. It did not amount, after the war with the Persians, which was the time when the prosperity of Greece was at the highest, to more than three hundred horse; but increassed afterwards to twelve hundred; a small body for so powerful a republic.

I have already observed, that amongst the ancients, as well Greeks as Romans, no mention is made of the stirrup, which is very surprising. They threw themselves nimbly on horseback.

Subjiciunt in equos — — — Æn. l. xi. ver. 287.

"And with a leap fit fleady on the horfe."

Sometimes the horse, broke early to that kind of manage, would sloop down before, to give his master the opportunity of mounting with more ease;

Inde inclinatus collum, fubmiffus et armos

De more, inflexis praebebat feandere terga

Cruribus.

SIL, ITAL, de equo Coelii Equ. Rom.

Those whom age or weakness rendered heavy, made use of a fervant in mounting on horseback; in which they imitated the Persians, with whom it was the common custom. Gracchus caused sine stones to be placed on each side of the great roads of Italy at certain distances from one another, to help travellers to get on horseback without the affishance of any body *.

I am furprised that the Athenians, expert as they were in the art of war, did not distinguish, that the cavalry was the most essential part of an army, especially in battles; and that some of their generals did not turn their attention that way, as Themistocles did in regard to maritime affairs. Xenophon was well capable of rendering them a like service in respect to the cavalry, of the importance of which he was perfectly apprised. He wrote two treatises upon this subject; one of which regards the care it is necessary to take of horses, and how to understand and break them; to which he adds the exercise of the squadron; both well worth the reading of all who profess arms. In the latter he states the means of placing the cavalry in honour, and lays down rules upon the art military in general, which might be of very great use to all those who are designed for the trade of war.

* Αναδολίως μή δομένος. This word ἀναδολιώς, fignifies a fervant who helped his master to mount on horseback,

I have wondered, in running over this fecond treatife, to fee with what care Xenophon, a foldier and a pagan, recommends the practice of religion, a veneration for the gods, and the necessity of imploring their aid upon all occasions. He repeats this maxim in thirteen different places, of a tract in other respects brief enough; and rightly judging that these . religious infinuations might give fome people offence, he makes a kind of apology for them, and concludes the piece with a reflection, which I shall repeat entire in this place. " If any " one," fays he, "wonders that I infift fo much here upon the " necessity of not forming any enterprise without first endea-" vouring to render the Divinity favourable and propitious, " let him reflect, that there are in war a thousand unforeseen " and obscure conjunctures, wherein the generals, vigilant to " take advantages, and lay ambuscades for each other, from " the uncertainty of an enemy's motions, can take no other " counsel than that of the gods. Nothing is doubtful or ob-" scure with them. They unfold the future to whomsoever " they please, on the inspection of the entrails of beasts, by " the finging of birds, by visions, or in dreams. Now, we " may prefume that the gods are more inclined to illuminate " the minds of fuch as confult them, not only in urgent ne-" cessities, but who at all times, and when no dangers threa-" ten them, render them all the homage and adoration of " which they are capable."

It became this great man to give the most important of infiructions to his fon Gryllus, to whom he addresses the treatise we mention; and who, according to the common opinion, was appointed to discipline the Athenian cavalry.

and Hall SECTION IV.

and breek them to which be also the exercise

Of MARITIME AFFAIRS, FLEETS, and NAVAL FORCES.

Is the Athenians were inferior to the Lacedaemonians in refpect to cavalry, they carried it infinitely against them in naval affairs; and we have seen their abilities that way make them masters at sea, and give them a great superiority to all the other states of Greece. As this subject is very necessary to the understanding many passages in this history, I shall treat it more extensively than other matters, and shall make great use of what the learned father Don Bernard de Montsaucon has said of it in his books upon antiquity.

The principal parts of a ship were the prow or head, the poop or stern, and the middle, called in Latin Carina, the hulk or waist.

The PROW was the part in the front of the waist or belly of the ship; it was generally adorned with paintings and different sculptures of gods, men, or animals. The beak, called Rostrum, lay lower, and level with the water; It was a piece of timber which projected from the prow, covered at the point with brass, and sometimes with iron. The Greeks termed it

The other end of the ship, opposite to the prow, was called the Poor. There the pilot sat and held the helm, which was a longer and larger our than the rest.

The Waist was the hollow of the veffel, or the hold.

The ships were of two kinds. The one was rowed with oars, which were ships of war, the other carried sails, and were vessels of burden, intended for commerce and transports. Both of them sometimes made use of oars and sails together, but that very rarely. The ships of war are also very often called Long Ships by authors, and by that name distinguished from vessels of burden.

The long ships were further divided into two species: Those which were called Actuariae Naves, and were very light vessels like our brigantines; and those called only long ships. The first were usually termed Open Ships, because they had no decks. Of these light vessels there were some larger than ordinary; of which some had twenty, some thirty, and others forty oars, half on one side, and half on the other, all on the same line.

The long ships, which were used in war, were of two forts. Some had only one rank of oars on each side; the others two, three, four, sive, or a greater number, to forty; but these last were rather for show than use.

The long ships of one rank of oars were called Aphracti; that is to say, uncovered, and had no decks: This diffinguished them from the Cataphracti, which had decks. They had only small places to stand on, at the head and stern, in the time of action.

The ships most commonly used in the battles of the ancients, were those which carried from three to sive ranks or benches of oars, and were called Triremes and Quinqueremes.

It is a great question, and has given occasion for abundance of learned differtations, how these benches of oars were difposed. Some will have it, that they were placed at length, like the ranks of oars in the modern gallies. Others maintain, that the ranges of the biremes, triremes, quinqueremes, and fo on to the number of forty in some vessels, were one above another. To support this last opinion, innumerable passages are cited from ancient authors, which feem to leave no manner of doubt in it, and are confiderably corroborated by the column of Trajan, which reprefents these ranks one above another. Father Motfaucon, however, avers, that all the perfons of greatest skill in naval affairs, whom he had consulted, declared, that the thing conceived in that manner, feemed to them utterly impossible. But such a way of reasoning is a weak proof against the experience of so many ages, confirmed by so many authors. It is true, that in admitting these ranks of oars to be disposed perpendicularly one above another, it is not easy to comprehend how they could be worked; but in the biremes and triremes of the column of Trajan, the lower ranks were placed obliquely, and as it were rifing by degrees.

In ancient times, the ships with several ranks of oars were not known: They made use of long ships, in which the rowers, of whatever number they were, worked all upon the fame line. <sup>a</sup> Such was the fleet which the Greeks fent against Troy. It was composed of twelve hundred fail, of which the gallies of Boeotia had each an hundred and twenty men, and those of Philoctetes fifty; and this no doubt intends the greatest and smallest vessels. Their gallies had no decks, but were built like common boats; which is still practised, says Thucydides, by the pirates, to prevent their being so soon discovered at a distance.

b The Corinthians are faid to have been the first who changed the form of ships; and, instead of simple gallies, made wessels with three ranks, in order to add by the multiplicity of oars to the swiftness and impetuosity of their motion. Their city, advantageously situated between two seas, lay well for commerce, and served as a shaple for merchandise. From their example the inhabitants of Corcyra, and the tyrants of Sicily, equipped also many gallies of three benches, a little before the war against the Persians. It was about the same time the Athenians, at the warm instances of Themistocles, who foresaw the war which scon broke out, built ships of the same form, the whole deck not being yet in use; and from thenceforth they applied themselves to naval affairs with incredible ardour and success.

The beak of the prow, Rostrum, was that part of the vessel of which most use was made in sea-sights. Ariston of Corinth persuaded the Syracusans, when their city was besieged by the Athenians, to make their prows lower and shorter; which advice gained them the victory: For the prows of the Athenian vessels being very high and very weak, their beaks struck only the parts above water, and for that reason did little damage to the enemy's ships; whereas the Syracusans, whose prows were strong and low, and their beaks level with the water, at a single blow often sunk the triremes of the Athenians.

Two forts of people ferved on board these gallies. The one were employed in steering and working the ship, who were the rowers, Remiges, and the mariners, Nautae. The rest were soldiers intended for the fight, and are meant in Greek by the word iribates. This distinction was not understood in the early times, when the same persons rowed, sought, and did all the necessary work of the ship; which was also not wholly disused in latter days. For <sup>a</sup> Thucydides, in describing the arrival of the Athenian sleet at the small island of Sphacteria, observes, that only the rowers of the lowest bench remained in the ships, and that the rest went on shore with their arms.

<sup>2</sup> Thucyd. l. i. p. 3. b ibid. p. 10.

c Diod. l. xiii. p. 141.

r. The condition of the rowers was very hard and laborious. I have already faid, that the rowers, as well as mariners, were all citizens and freemen, and not flaves or firangers, as in these days. The rowers were distinguished by their several stages. The lower rank were called Thalamitae, the middle Zugitae, and the highest Thranitae. Thucydides remarks, that the latter had greater pay than the rest, because they worked with longer and heavier oars than those of the lower benches. It seems that the crew, in order to act in concert, and with better effect, were sometimes guided by the singing of a man, and sometimes by the sound of an instrument; and this grateful harmony served not only to regulate the motion of their oars, but to diminish and soothe the pains of their labour.

It is a question amongst the learned, whether there was a man to every oar in these great ships, or several, as in the gallies of these days. What Thucydides observes on the pay of the Thranitae, seems to imply that they worked single. For if others had shared the work with them, wherefore had they greater pay given them than those who managed an oar alone, as the latter had as much, and perhaps more of the labour than them? Father Montsaucon believes, that in the vessels of sive ranks there might be several men to one oar.

Volume IV.

0

4 Thucyd. I. iv p. 275.

Musicam natura ipsa videtur ad tolerandos facilius labores veluti muneri nobis dedisse. Siquidem et remiges cantus hortatur; nec solum in iis operibus, in quibus plurimum conatus praeunte aliqua jucunda voce conspirat, sedectiam singulorum fatigatio quamilibet se rudi modulatione solatur. Quintil, l, 1, c, 10,

He who took care of the whole crew, and commanded the veffel, was called Nauclerus, and was the principal officer. The fecond was the pilot, Gubernator; his place was in the poop, where he held the helm in his hand, and ficered the veffel. His fkill confifted in knowing the coasts, ports, rocks, shoals, and especially the winds and stars; for before the invention of the compass, the pilot had nothing to direct him during the night but the stars.

2. The foldiers who fought in the ships, were armed almost in the same manner with the land-forces.

The Athenians, at the battle of Salamin, had an hundred and fourfcore veilels, and in each of them eighteen fighting men, four of whom were archers, and the rest heavy-armed troops. The officer who commanded these soldiers, was called refractors and the commander of the whole fleet, reduzing of rearrants.

We cannot exactly fay the number of foldiers, mariners, and rowers, that ferved on board each ship; but it generally amounted to two hundred, more or less, as appears from Herodotus's estimate of the Persian sleet in the time of Xerxes, and in other places where he mentions that of the Greeks. I mean here the great vessels, the triremes, which were the species most in use.

The pay of those who served in these ships varied very much at different times. When young Cyrus arrived in Asia s, it was only three oboli, which was half a drachm, or sive-pence; and the streaty between the Persians and Lacedae-monians was concluded upon this foot; which gives reason to believe, that the usual pay was three oboli. Cyrus, at Lysander's request, added a sourth, which made sixpence half-penny a-day. It was often raised to a whole drachm, about tenpence French. In the sleet sitted out against Sicily the Athenians gave a drachm a-day to the troops. The sum of fixty talents *, which the people of Egesta advanced the Athenians monthly for the maintaining of fixty ships, shews that the pay of each vessel for a month amounted to a talent, that is to say, to three thousand livres; which supposes, that each ship's company consisted of three hundred men, each of whom received a drachm or tenpence a-day. As the officers pay was higher, the republic perhaps either furnished the overplus, or it was deducted out of the total of the sum advanced for a vessel, by abating something in the pay of the private men.

Plut. in Themist. p. 119. f Kenoph. hist. l. i. p. 441. Thucyd. l. vi. p. 431.

* This treaty stipulated, that the Persians should pay thirty minae a month for each ship, which was half a talent; the whole amounted to three oboli a day for every man that served on board.

The fame may be faid of the land-troops as has been faid of the feamen, except that the horse had double their pay. It appears that the ordinary pay of the foot was three oboli aday, and that it was augmented according to times and occasions. Thimbron the Lacedaemonian, when he marched against Tissaphernes, promised a datic a month to each foldier, two to a captain, and four to the colonels. Now, a daric amonth is four oboli a-day. Young Cyrus, to animate his troops, whom a too long march had discouraged, instead of one daric, promised one and a half to each foldier, which amounted to a drachm, or tenpence French a-day.

It may be asked how the Lacedaemonians, whose iron coin, the only species current amongst them, would go no where else, could maintain armies by sea and land, and where they found money for their subsistence. It is not to be doubted, but they raised it, as the Athenians did, by contributions from their allies, and still more from the cities to which they gave liberty and protection, or from those they had conquered from their enemies. Their second fund for paying their sleet and armies was the aids they drew from the king of Persia, as we have seen on several occasions.

Qij

h Thucyd. l, vi. p. 415.

i Xenoph, Esped. Cyr. l. vii,

* About L. 8400 Sterling.

SECTION V.

Peculiar CHARACTER of the ATHENIANS.

PLUTARCH furnishes us with almost all the matter upon this head. Every body knows how well he succeeds in copying nature in his portraits, and how proper a person he was to trace the character of a people, whose genius and manners he had studied with so prosound an attention.

I. "The "people of Athens," fays Plutarch *, " were ea"fily provoked to anger, and as eafily induced to refume their "fentiments of benovoleuce and compafion." History supplies us with an infinity of examples of this kind. The sentence of death passed against the inhabitants of Mitylene, and revoked the next day: The condemnation of the ten generals, and that of Socrates, both followed with an immediate repentance and the most lively grief.

II. "They + were better pleased with penetrating, and al"most guessing an affair of themselves, than to give them"selves leisure to be informed of it thoroughly, and in all "its extent.

Nothing is more furprifing than this circumstance in their character, which is very hard to conceive, and seems almost incredible. Artificers, husbandmen, soldiers, mariners, are generally a dull, heavy kind of people, and very gross in their conceptions; but the people of Athens were of a quite different turn. They had naturally an amazing penetration, vivacity, and even delicacy of wit. I have already mentioned what happened to Theophrastus. ‡ He was cheapening something of an old woman at Athens that sold herbs: "No, Mr. "Stranger," said she, "you shall have it for no less." He was strangely surprised to see himself treated as a stranger k Plut.in praecept. rep. ger. p. 793.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Ο δήμος Αθηναίων εικίνητός ες: πρός δργήν ευμετάθετος πρό; ελεον.

† Mallor Rives vermus à gibérateSus auf hougius Bulópures.

‡ Cum Theophrastus percontaretur ex anicula quadam, quanti aliquid venderet, et respondisse illa, atque addidisse: Hospes, non pote minoris ; tulit moleste, se no essigere hospitis speciem, cum aetatem ageret Athenis, optimeque loqueretur. Cic. de clar. orat. n. 17.

who had passed almost his whole life at Athens, and who piqued himself upon excelling all others in the elegance of his language. It was however from that she knew he was not of her country. We have faid, that the Athenian foldiers knew the fine passages of Euripides by heart. These artificers and foldiers, from affifting at the public deliberations, were befides verfed in affairs of state, and understood every thing at half a word. We may judge of this from the orations of Demosthenes, whose stile, we know, is ardent, brief, and concise.

III. " As * they naturally inclined to relieve persons of a " low condition and mean circumstances, so were they fond " of conversations seasoned with pleasantry, and proper to " make people laugh."

1 They affifted perfons of a mean condition, because from such they had nothing to apprehend in regard to their liberty, and faw in them the characters of equality and resemblance with themselves. They loved pleasantry, and shewed in that they were men; but men abounding with humanity and indulgence, who understood raillery, who were not prone to take offence, nor over delicate in point of respect to be paid them. One day, when the affembly was fully formed, and the people had already taken their places and fat down, Cleon, after having made them wait his coming a great while, appeared at last with a wreath of flowers upon his head, and defired the people to adjourn their deliberations to the next day. " For to-" day," faid he, " I have bufiness. I have been facrificing " to the gods; and I am to entertain some frangers, my friends. " at supper." The Athenians, setting up a laugh, rose and broke up the affembly. At Carthage, fuch a pleafantry would have cost any man his life, that had prefumed to vent it, and to take fuch a liberty with a + proud, haughty, jealous, morose people, of a genius averse to complacency, and less inclined to humour. Upon another occasion, the orator Strato-

Q iii

l Xenoph. de Athen, rep p. 691.

<sup>* &</sup>quot;Ως περ των άνδρων τοις άδοζοις και ταπεινοίς βοηθείν προθυμέτερος, ώτως των λόγων τές παιγνιώδεις καὶ γελοίν; ἀσταίζεται καὶ προτιμα.

† Πικούν, σκυθοματίν, πρόσ παιδίαν καὶ χάριν άνθευτον καὶ σκληφόν

cles, having informed the people of a victory, and in confequence caused sacrifices to be offered, three days after news came of the deseat of the army. As the people expressed their discontent and resentment upon the false information, he asked them, " of what they had to complain, and what harm he had " done them, in making them pass three days more agreeably " than they would else have done?"

IV. "They * were pleased with hearing themselves praised, "and could not bear to be railed at, or criticised." The least acquaintance with Aristophanes and Demosthenes will shew, with what address and effect they employ praises and criticism with regard to the people of Athens.

When the republic enjoyed peace and tranquillity, fays the same Plutarch in another place, the Athenian people diverted themselves with the orators who slattered them: But in important affairs, and emergencies of the state, they became serious, and gave the preference to those, whose custom it had been to oppose their unjust defires; such as Pericles, Phocion, and Demosthenes.

V. "They + kept those who governed them in awe, and "shewed their humanity even to their enemics."

The people of Athens made good use of the talents of those who distinguished themselves by their eloquence and prudence; but they were full of suspicion, and kept themselves always on their guard against their superiority of genius and ability: they took pleasure in restraining their courage, and lessening their glory and reputation. This may be judged from the ostracism, which was instituted only as a curb on those, whose merit and popularity ran too high, and which spared neither the greatest nor the most worthy persons. The hatred of tyranny and tyrants, which was in a manner innate of the Athenians, made them extremely jealous and apprehensive for their liberty with regard to those who governed.

As to what relates to their enemies, they did not treat them, with rigour; they did not make an infolent use of victory, nor m Plut. in Phocion. p. 746.

Τοϊς μὰν ἐνταινῶσο ἀυτὸν μάλισα χάιριι, τοῦς δε σκώπτυσον ἡκισα ἔυσχιράντιι.
 Φοδιφὸς ἐςτο ἀχρὸ τῶν ὡχχόντων, ιἶτα βίλακθρωτος ἀχρι τῶν πολικώνε.

exercise any cruelty towards the vanquished. The amnesty decreed after the tyranny of the Thirty, shews that they could forget the injuries which had been done them.

To these different characteristics, which Plutarch unites in the same passage of his works, some others may be added, extracted principally from the same author.

VI. It was from this fund * of humanity and benevolence, of which I have now spoken, and which was natural to the Athenians, that they were fo attentive to the rules of politeness, and fo delicate in point of just behaviour; qualities one would not expect to find among the common people. a In the war against Philip of Macedon, having intercepted one of his couriers, they read all the letters he carried, except that of Olympias his wife, which they returned fealed up and unopened, out of regard to conjugal love and fecrecy, the rites of which are facred, and ought to be respected even amongst enemies. The fame Athenians having decreed, that a strict fearch should be made after the prefents distributed by Harpalus amongst the orators, would not suffer the house of Callicles, who was lately married, to be visited, out of respect for his bride, not long brought home. Such behaviour is not very common; and upon like occasions people do not stand much upon forms and politeness,

VII. The taste of the Athenians for all arts and sciences is too well known to require dwelling long upon it in this place. Besides which, I shall have occasion to speak of it with some extent elsewhere. But we cannot see without admiration a people composed for the most part, as I have said before, of artifans, husbandmen, soldiere, and mariners, carry delicacy of taste in every kind to so high a degree of persection, which seems the peculiar attribute of a more exalted condition and a noble education.

VIII. It is no less wonderful, that this people + should have fuch great views, and rose so high in their pretentions. In the war Alcibiades made them undertake, filled with vast projects, n Plut. in Demetr. p. 898. * Πάτριον ἀντοῖς καὶ συμφυτον ἦν τὸ ζειλάνθροσον. In Pelop. p. 280.

Qii

† Μέγα φρονεί, μεγάλων δρέγελαι. Plut.

and unbounded hopes, they did not confine themselves to the taking of Syracuse, or the conquest of Sicily, but had already added Italy, Peloponnesus, Libya, the Carthaginian gates, and the empire of the sea, to the Pillars of Hercules. Their enterprise failed, but they had formed it; and the taking of Syracuse, which seemed no great dissibility, might have enabled them to put it in execution.

XI. The same people, so great, and one may say, so haughty in their projects, had nothing of that character in other respects. In what regarded the expence of the table, dress, furniture, private buildings, and in a word, private life, they were frugal, simple, modest, and poor; but sumptuous and magnificent in all things public, and capable of doing honour to the state. Their victories, conquests, wealth, and continual communication with the people of Asia Minor, introduced neither luxury, gluttony, pomp, nor vain profusion amongst them, "Xenophon observes, that a citizen could not be distinguished from a slave by his dress. The richest inhabitants, and the most famous generals, were not ashamed to go to market themselves.

It was very glorious for Athens to have produced and formfo many excellent persons in the arts of war and government; in philosophy, eloquence, poesy, painting, sculpture, and architecture: Of having furnished alone more great men, in every other kind than any other city of the world; if perhaps we except Rome, which *had imbibed learning and arts from her, and knew how to apply her lessons to the best advantage; of having been in some sort the school and tutor of almost the whole universe; of having served, and still continuing to serve, as the model for nations, which pique themselves most upon the excellency of taste; in a word, of having taught the language, and prescribed the laws of all that regards the talents and productions of the mind. The part of this histo-

O De rep, Athen. p. 653.
Graecia eapta serum victorem cepit, et artes Intulit agresti Latio.
HORAT. Epist. i. l. 2.

&quot;Greece taken, took her favoge victors hearts, "And polish'd rustic Latium with her arts,"

ry, wherein I shall treat the sciences and learned men, that rendered Greece illustrious, with the arts also, and those who excelled in them, will set this in a clear light.

X. I shall conclude this description of the Athenians with one more attribute, which cannot be denied them, and appears evidently in all their actions and enterprizes; and that is, their ardent love of liberty. This was their darling palfion and great principle of policy. We fee them, from the commencement of the war with the Persians, facrifice every thing to the liberty of Greece. They abandoned, without the least regret, their lands, estates, city, and houses, and removed to their ships in order to fight the common enemy, whose view was to enflave them. What could be more glorious for Athens, than, when all the allies were trembling at the vast offers made her by the king of Perlia, to answer his ambassador by the mouth of P Aristides, that all the gold and filver in the world was not capable of tempting them to fell their own, or the liberty of Greece? It was from fuch generous fentiments that the Athenians not only became the bulwark of Greece, but preserved the rest of Europe, and all the western world, from the invafion of the Perfians.

These great qualities were mingled with great desects, often the very reverse of them, such as we may imagine in a sluctuating, light, inconstant, capricious people, like the Athenians.

SECTION VI.

Common CHARACTER of the LACEDAEDOMONIANS and ATHENIANS.

I CANNOT refuse giving a place here to what Mr. Boffuet fays upon the character of the Lacedaemonians and Athenians. The passage is long, but will not appear so, and includes all that is wanting to a perfect knowledge of the genius of both those people.

Amongst all the republics of which Greece was composed, Athens and Lacedaemon were undoubtedly the principal. No people could have more wit than the Athenians, nor more folid sense than the Lacedaemonians. Athens affected plea-fare; the Lacedaemonian way of life was hard and laborious. Both loved glory and liberty; but the liberty of Athens tended to licence; and controlled by fevere laws at Lacedaemon. the more restrained it was at home, the more ardent it was to extend itself in rule abroad. Athens was also for reigning, but upon another principle, in which interest had a share with glory. Her citizens excelled in the art of navigation, and the fovereignty at sea had enriched her. To continue in the sole poffession of all commerce, there was nothing she would not have subjected to her power; and her riches, which inspired this passion, supplied her with the means of gratifying it. On the contrary, at Lacedaemon money was in contempt. As all the laws tended to make the latter a military republic, the glory of arms was the fole object that engroffed her citizens. From thence the naturally affected dominion; and the more the was above interest, the more the abandoned herfelf to ambition.

Lacedaemon, from her regular life, was steady and determinate in her maxims and measures. Athens was more lively and active, and the people too much masters. Their laws and philosophy had indeed the most happy effects upon such exquisite natural parts as theirs; but reason alone was not capable of keeping them within due bounds. A wife Athenian, who knew admirably the genius of his country, informs us, that fear was necessary to those too ardent and free spirits; and that it was impossible to govern them, after the victory at Salamin had removed their fears of the Persians.

Two things then ruined them, the glory of their great actions, and the supposed security of their present condition. The magistrates were no longer heard; and as Persia was afflicted with excessive slavery, so Athens, says Plato, experienced all the evils of excessive liberty.

Those two great republics, so contrary in their manners and conduct, interfered with each other in the design they had each formed of subjecting all Greece; so that they were always enemies, more from the contrariety of their interests, than the incompatibility of their humours.

<sup>9</sup> Plat. l. iii. de Leg.

The Grecian cities were against submitting to the dominion of either the one or the other; for, besides the desire of preferving their liberty, they sound the empire of those two republics too grievous to bear. That of the Lacedaemonians was severe. That people were observed to have something almost brutal in their character. 'A government too rigid, and a life too laborious, rendered their tempers too haughty, austere, and imperious in power: Besides which, they could never expect to live in peace under the influence of a city, which being formed for war, could not support itself but by continuing perpetually in arms. 'So that the Lacedaemonians were capable of attaining to command; and all the world were afraid they should do so.

The Athenians were naturally obliging and agreeable. Nothing was more delightful to behold than their city; in which feafts and games were perpetual; where wit, liberty, and the various passions of men, daily exhibited new objects: But the inequality of their conduct disgusted their allies, and was still more insupportable to their own subjects. It was impossible for them not to experience the extravagance and caprice of a statered people, that is to say, according to Plato, something more dangerous than the same excesses in a prince vitiated by statery.

These two cities did not permit Greece to continue in repose. We have seen the Pelopponnesian and other wars, which were always occasioned or somented by the jealousy of Lacedaemon and Athens. But the same jealouses which involved Greece in troubles, supported it in some measure, and prevented its falling into the dependence of either the one or the other of those republics.

The Persians soon perceived this condition of Greece; and accordingly the whole mystery of their politics consisted in keeping up those jealousies, and fomenting those divisions. Lacedaemon, which was the most ambitious, was the first that gave them occasion to enter into the quarrels of the Greeks. They engaged in them from the sole view of making them-

r Aristot. Polit. I. i. p. 4.

s Xenoph. de rep. Lacon.

e Plat, de rep. l. viii.

felves mafters of the whole nation; and industrious to weaken the Greeks by their own arms, they waited only the opportunity to crush them altogether. "The states of Greece in their wars already regarded only the king of Persia, whom they called the Great King, or "the King," by way of eminence, as if they had already been of the number of his subjects. But it was impossible that the ancient spirit of Greece should not revive, when they were upon the point of falling into slavery, and the hands of the Barbarians.

The petty kings of Greece undertook to oppose this great king, and to ruin his empire. With a small army, but bred in the discipline we have related, Agesilaus, king of Sparta, made the Persians tremble in Asia Minor, and shewed it was not impossible to subvert their power. The divisions of Greece alone put a stop to his conquests. The famous retreat of the ten thousand, who, after the death of young Cyrus, made their way in a hostile manner through the whole Persian empire, and returned into their own country; that action, I say, demonstrated to Greece more than ever, that their soldiery was invincible, and superior to all opposers; and that only their domestic divisions could subject them to an enemy too weak to resist their united force.

We shall see, in the series of this history, by what methods Philip king of Macedon, taking advantage of these divisions, came at length, between address and force, to make himself little less than the sovereign of Greece, and to oblige the whole nation to march under his colours against the common enemy. What he had only planned, his son Alexander brought to perfection; and shewed the wondering world, how much ability and valour avail against the most numerous ar, anies and the most formidable preparations.

&quot; Plut. L iii. de Leg. Isocrat. Panegyr.

Polyb. l. iii.

HISTORY

OF

DIONYSIUS ELDER AND YOUNGER,

TYRANTS OF SYRACUSE.

Syracuse had regained its liberty about fixty years, by the expulsion of the family of Gelon. The events which passed in that interval, except the invasion of the Athenians, are of no great importance, and little known; but those which follow are of a different nature, and make amends for the chasm; I mean the reign of Dionysius the father and son, tyrants of Syracuse; the first of whom governed thirty-eight, and the * other twelve, in all fifty years. As this history is entirely foreign to what passed in Greece at the same time, I shall relate it in this place altogether and by itself; observing only, that the first twenty years of it, upon which I am now entering, agree almost in point of time with the last preceding twenty years.

This hiftory will prefent to our view a feries of the most odious and horrid crimes, though it abounds at the same time with instruction. When † on the one side we behold a prince, the declared enemy of liberty, justice, and laws, treading under his feet the most facred rights of nature and religion, insticting the most cruel torments upon his subjects, beheading some, burning others for a flight word, delighting and feafting himfelf with human blood, and gratifying his favage inhumanity with the fufferings and miferies of every age and condition: I fay, when we behold fuch an object, can we deny a truth, which the Pagan world itself hath confessed, and Plutarch takes occasion to observe in speaking of the tyrants of Sicily; that God in his anger gives fuch princes to a people, and makes use of the impious and the wicked to punish the guilty and the criminal. On the other fide, when the fame prince, the dread and terror of Syracuse, is perpetually anxious, and trembling for his own life, and, abandoned to remorfe and regret, can find no person in his whole state, not even his wives or children, in whom he can confide; who will not think with Tacitus, " * That it is not without reason the oracle of wisdom " has declared, that if the hearts of tyrants could be feen, " we should find them torn in pieces with a thousand evils; " it being certain, that the body does not fuffer more from " infiitions and torments, than the minds of fuch wretches " from their crimes, cruelties, and the injustice and violence " of their proceedings."

* After having been expelled for more than ten years, he reascended the throne, and reigned two or three years.

† Erit Dionysins illic tyrannus, libertatis, justitiae, legum exitum, Allos uret, alios verberabit, alios ob levem offensam jubebit detruncari. Senec. de consol. ad Marc c. xvii.

Sanguine humano non tantum gaudet, sed pascitur; sed ut supliciis omnium aetatum crudelitatem insatiabilem explet, ld. de benef, l. vii. c. 19.

The condition of a good prince is quite different. He loves his people, and is beloved by them; he enjoys a perfect tranquillity within himfelf, and lives with his fubjects as a father with his children. Though he knows that the fword of justice is in his hands, he apprehends the use of it. He loves to turn aside its edge, and can never resolve to evidence his power, but with extreme reluctance, in the last extremity, and with all the forms and fanction of the + laws. A tyrant punishes only from caprice and passion; and believes, says Plutarch upon Dionysius, that he is not really + master, and does not act with supreme authority, but as he sets himself above all laws, has no other but his will and pleasure, and sees himself obeyed implicitly. Whereas, continues the same author, he that can do whatever he will, is in great danger of doing what he ought not.

&quot; Neque frustra praestantifimus sapientiae sirmare solitus est, si recludantur tyrannorum mentes, posse aspici laniatus et ictus; quando, ut corpora verberibus, itasaevitia, libidine, malis corsultis animus dilaceraretur. Tacit. Annal. l. vi. c. 6-

† Hace est în maxima potestate verisuma animi temperantia, non cupiditate quantum în cives suos liceat, experiendo tentare; sed hebetare aciem imperii sui—Quid interest înter tyrannum et regem, species enim îpsă fortunae ac liceatia par est, nis quod tyranni în voluptate faceiunt, reges non nisi ex causa est necessitate se se celem, îp. i. e. r.r.

Befides these characteristics of cruelty and tyranny, which particularly distinguish the first Dionysius, we shall see in his history, whatever unbounded ambition, sustained by great valour, extensive abilities, and the necessary talents for acquiring the considence of a people, is capable of undertaking for the attainment of sovereignty; the various means he had the address to employ for the maintaining himself in it against the opposition of his enemies, and the odium of the public; and lastly, the tyrant's success in escaping, during a reign of thirty-eight years, the many conspiracies formed against him, and in transmitting peaceably the tyranny to his son, as a legitimate possession, and a right of inheritance.

CHAPTER I.

THIS chapter contains the history of Dionysius the elder, who reigned thirty-eight years.

SECTION I.

MEANS made use of by DIONYSIUS the ELDER to possess himself of the TYRANNY.

Dionysius was a native of Syracuse<sup>2</sup>, of noble and illustrious extraction according to some, but others say his birth was base and obscure. However it was, he distinguished himself by his valour, and acquired great reputation in a war with the Carthaginians. He was one of those who accompanied Hermocrates, when he attempted to re-enter Syracuse by force of arms, after having been banished through the intrigues of his

d Diod. l. xiii, p. 197.

* Εξη άπολαϊκι μάλιτα της άρχης όταν τάχίως ά βάλιται πωή. Μίγας ἔν ὁ χίνδινος βόλισθαι ά μὴ διι, τὸν ὰ βάλιται ποιῖν δινάμινο. Ad. princ indoct. p. 782

his enemies. The event of that enterprife was not happy. Hermocrates was killed. The Syracufans did not spare his accomplices, several of whom were publicly executed. Dionysius was left among the wounded. The report of his death, designedly given out by his relations, saved his life. Providence had spared Syracuse an infinity of missortunes, had he expired either in the fight, or by the executioner.

The Carthaginians had made feveral attempts to establish themselves in Sicily, and to possess themselves of the principal towns of that island, as we have observed elsewhere b. Its happy fituation for their maritime commerce, the fertility of its foil and the riches of its inhabitants, where powerful inducements to fuch an enterprise. We may form an idea of the wealth of its cities from Diodorus Siculus's account of Agrigentum. The temples were of extraordinary magnificence, especially that of Jupiter Olympius, which was three hundred and forty feet in length, fixty in breadth, and one hundred and twenty in height. The piazzas, or galleries, in their extent and beauty, answered to the rest of the building. On one fide was represented the battle of the giants, on the other the taking of Troy, in figures as large as the life. Without the city was an artificial lake, which was feven stadia, above a quarter of a league, in circumference. It was full of all kinds of fish, covered with swans and other water-fowls, and afforded the most agreeable prospect imaginable.

It was the time about which we speak, that Exenetes, victor in the Olympic games, entered the city in triumph in a magnificent chariot, attended by three hundred more, all drawn by white horses. Their habits were adorned with gold and filver; and nothing was ever more splendid than their appearance. Gellias, the most wealthy of the citizens of Agrigentum, erected several large apartments in his house for the reception and entertainment of his guests. Servants waited by his order at the gates of the city, to invite all strangers to lodge at their masters house, whither they conducted them. Hospitality was much practised and esteemed by the generality of that city. A violent florm having obliged one hundred horsemen to take shelter there, Gellias entertained them all in his house, and supplied them immediately with dry clothes, of which he had always a great quantity in his wardrobe. This is understanding how to make a noble use of riches. His cellar is much talked of by historians, in which he had three hundred reservoirs hewn out of the rock, each of which contained an hundred * amphorae.

* Diod. l, xiii, p. 203, 206.

b In the History of the Carthaginians, Book II. Part I.

This great and opulent city was befieged, and at length taken by the Carthaginians. Its fall shook all Sicily, and spread an universal terror. The cause of its being lost was imputed to the Syracufans, who had but weakly aided it. Dionyfius, who from that time had no other thoughts, but of his grand defigns, and was fecretly active in laying the foundations of his future power, took the advantage of this favourable opportunity, and of the general complaints of Sicily against the Syracusans, to render the magistrates odious, and to exclaim against their administration. In a public assembly, held to confider of the present state of affairs, when nobody dared to open their mouths for fear of the persons at the helm, Dionysius rose up, and boldly accused the magistrates of treason; adding, that it was his opinion, that they ought to be deposed immediately, without waiting till the term of their administration should expire. They retorted this audacity with treating him as a feditious person, and a disturber of the public tranquillity, and as fuch, laid a fine upon him according to the laws. This was to be paid before he could be admitted to speak again, and Dionysius was not in a condition to discharge it. Philistus, one of the richest citizens, who wrote the history of Sicily, which is not come down to us, deposited the money, and exhorted him at the same time to give his opinion upon the state of affairs with all the liberty which became a citizen zealous for his country.

Dionyfius accordingly refumed his discourse with more vigour than before. He had long cultivated the habit of elo-Volume IV.

* An amphora contained about feven gallons; an hundred confequently confifled of feven hundred gallons, or eleven hogsheads feven gal lons,

quence, which he looked upon with reason as a very necessary talent in a republican government; especially in his views of acquiring the people's favour, and of reconciliating them to his measures. He began with describing in a lively and pathetic manner the ruin of Agrigentum, a neighbouring city in their alliance; the deplorable extremity to which the inhabitants had been reduced, of quitting the place under the cover of the night; the cries and lamentations of infants, and of aged and fick persons, whom they had been obliged to abandon to a cruel and merciless enemy; and the confequential murder of all who had been left in the city, whom the barbarous victor dragged from the temples and altars of the gods, feeble refuges against the Carthaginian fury and impiety. He imputed all these evils to the treachery of the commanders of the army, who, instead of marching to the relief of Agrigentum, had retreated with their troops; to the criminal protraction and delay of the magistrates, corrupted by Carthaginian bribes; and to the pride of the great and rich, who regarded nothing but establishing their own power upon the ruins of their country's liberty. He reprefented Syracuse as composed of two different bodies; the one, by their power and influence, usurping all the dignities and wealth of the state; the other, obfoure, despised, and trod under foot, bearing the same yoke of a shameful servitude, and rather slaves than citizens. He concluded with faying, that the only remedy for fo many evils was to elect persons from amongst the people devoted to their interests, and who, not being capable of rendering themselves formidable by their riches and authority, would be folely employed for the public good, and apply in earnest to the reestablishment of the liberty of Syracuse.

This discourse was listened to with infinite pleasure, as all speeches are, which flatter the natural propensity of inferiors to complain of the government, and was followed with the universal applause of the people, who always give themselves up blindly to those who know how to deceive them under the specious pretext of serving their interest. All the magistrates were deposed upon the spet, and others substituted in their room, with Dionysius at the head of them.

This was only the first step to the tyranny, at which he did not stop. The fuccess of his undertaking inspired him with new courage and confidence. He had also in view the difplacing of the generals of the army, and to have their power transferred to himself. The delign was bold and dangerous, and he applied to it with address. Before he attacked them openly, he planted his batteries against them at a distance; calumniating them by his emissaries to the people, and sparing no pains to render them suspected. He caused it to he whispered among the populace, that those commanders held secret intelligence with the enemy; that difguifed couriers were frequently feen passing and re-passing; and that it was not to be doubted, but some conspiracy was on foot. He affected on his fide not to fee those leaders, nor to open himself to them at all upon the affairs of the public. He communicated none of his defigns to them; as if he was apprehensive of rendering himself suspected by having any intercourse or correspondence with them. Persons of sense and discernment were not at a loss to discover the tendency of these undermining arts; nor were they filent upon the occasion: But the common people, prejudiced in his favour, incessantly applauded and admired his zeal, and looked upon him as the fole protector and affertor of their rights and liberties.

Another scheme, which he set at work with his usual address, was of very great service to him, and exceedingly promoted his designs. There was a great number of banished persons dispersed throughout Sicily, whom the faction of the nobility of Syracuse had expelled the city at different times, and upon different pretences. He knew what an addition of strength so numerous a body of citizens would be to him, whom gratitude to a benefactor, and resentment against those who had occasioned their banishment, the hope of retrieving their affairs, and of enriching themselves out of the spoils of his enemies, rendered most proper for the execution of his designs, and attached unalterably to his person and interest. He applied therefore earnessly to obtain their recall. It was given out, that it was necessary to raise a numerous body of troops to oppose the progress of the Carthaginians; and the people were in great pain upon the expence, to which the new levies would amount. Dionyfius took the advantage of this favourable conjuncture, and the disposition of the public. He represented, that it was ridiculous to bring foreign troops at a great expence from Italy and Peloponnesus, whilst they might supply themfelves with excellent foldiers, without being at any charge at all: That there were numbers of Syracusans in every part of Sicily, who, notwithstanding the ill treatment they had received, had always retained the hearts of citizens under the name and condition of exiles; that they preferved a tender affection and inviolable fidelity for their country, and had chose rather to wander about Sicily without support or settlement, than to take party in the armies of the enemy, however advantageous the offers to induce them to it had been. This discourse of Dionyfius had all the effect upon the people he could have wished. His colleagues, who perceived plainly what he had in view, were afraid to contradict him; rightly judging, that their opposition would not only prove inesfectual, but incense the people against them, and even augment the reputation of Dionysius, to whom it would leave the honour of recalling the exiles. Their return was therefore decreed; and they accordingly came all to Syracuse without losing time.

A deputation from Gela, a city in the dependence of Syracufe, arrived about the same time, to demand that the garrison should be reinforced. Dionysius immediately marched thither with two thousand foot, and four hundred horse. He found the city in great commotion, and divided into two factions; one of the people, and the other of the rich and powerful. The latter having been tried in form, were condemned by the affembly to die, and to have their estates conficated for the use of the public. This confiscation was applied to pay off the arrears, which had long been due to the former garrisons, commanded by Dexippus the Lacedaemonian; and Dionysius promised the troops he brought with him to Syracuse, to double the pay they were to receive from the city. This was attaching so many new creatures to himself. The inhabita arts of Gela treated him with the highest marks of honour, and sent deputies to Syracuse to return their thanks for the important service that city had done them in sending Dionysius thither. Having endeavoured in vain to bring Dexippus into his measures, he returned with his troops to Syracuse, after having promised the inhabitants of Gela, who used all means in their power to keep him amongst them, that he would soon return with more considerable aid.

He arrived at Syracuse just as the people were coming out of the theatre, who ran in throngs about him, inquiring with earnestness what he had heard of the Carthaginians. He anfwered with a fad and dejected air, that the city nourished far more dangerous and formidable enemies in her bosom; that whilst Carthage was making extrao dinary preparations for the invasion of Syracuse, those who were in command, instead of roufing the zeal and attention of the citizens, and fetting every thing at work against the approach of so potent an enemy, lulled them with trivial amusements and idle shews, and suffered the troops to want necessaries; converting their pay to their private uses in a fraudulent manner, destructive to the public affairs; that he had always fufficiently comprehended the cause of such a conduct; that however, it was not now upon mere conjecture, but upon too evident proof, his complaints were founded; that Imilcar, the general of the Carthaginians, had fent an officer to him, under pretext of treating about the ranfom of prisoners, but in reality to prevail on him not to be too strict in examining into the conduct of his colleagues; and that if he would not enter into the measures of Carthage, at least that he would not oppose them; that for his part, he came to refign his command, and to abdicate his dignity, that he might leave no room for injurious suspicions of his acting in concert, and holding intelligence with traitors who fold the commonwealth.

This discourse being rumoured amongst the troops, and about the city, occasioned great inquietude and alarm. The next day the affembly was summoned, and Dionysius renewed his complaints against the generals, which were received with universal applause. Some of the affembly cried out, that it was necessary to appoint him generalissimo, with unlimited power; and that it would be too late for so falutary a recourse, when the enemy was at the gates of Syracuse; that the importance of the war which threatened them, required fuch a leader; that it was in the same manner formerly, that Gelonwas elected generalishmo, and defeated the Carthaginian army at Himera, which confifted of three hundred thousand men; that as for the accufation, alleged against the traitors, it might be referred to another day; but that the present affair would admit no delay. Nor was it deferred in effect; for the people. who, when once prejudiced, run headlong after their opinion. without examining any thing, elected Dionysius generalissimo with unlimited power that infant. In the fame affembly he caused it to be decreed, that the foldiers pay should be doubled; infinuating that the flate would be amply reimburfed by the conquests consequential of that advance. This being done, and the affembly difinisfed, the Syracufans, upon cool reflection. on what had passed, began to be in some consternation; as ifit had not been the effect of their own choice; and comprehended, though too late, that from the defire of preferving their liberty, they had given themselves a master.

Dionysius rightly judged the importance of taking his meafares before the people repented what they had done. There remained but one step more to the tyranny, which was to have a body of guards affigued him; and that he accomplished in the most artful and politic manner. He proposed, that all the citizens under forty years of age, and capable of bearing arms, should march with provisions for thirty days to the city of Leontium. The Syraculans were at that time in possession of the place, and had a garrifon in it. It was full of fugitive and foreign foldiers, who were very fit persons for the execution of his defigns. He juftly suspected, that the greatest part of the Syracufans would not follow him. He fet out, however, and incamped in the night upon the plains near the city. It was not long before a great noise was heard throughout the camp. This tumult was raifed by perfons planted for that purpose by Dionysius. He affected, that ambuscades had been laid with defign to affaffinate him, and in great trouble and alarm retired for refuge into the citadel of Leontium, where he passed the rest of the night, after having caused a great number of fires to be lighted, and had drawn off fuch of the troops as he most confided in. At break of day the people affembled in a body, to whom, expressing still great apprehenfion, he explained the danger he had been in, and demanded permillion to choose himself a guard of fix hundred men for the fecurity of his person. Pisistratus had set him the example long before, and had used the same stratagem when he made himself tyrant of Athens. His demand seemed very reasonable. and was accordingly complied with. He chose out a thousand men for his guard upon the spot, armed them completely, equipped them magnificently, and made them great promifes for their encouragement. He also attached the foreign soldiers to his interest in a peculiar manner, by speaking to them with great freedom and affability. He made many removals and alterations in the troops, to secure the officers in his interest, and dismissed Dexippus to Sparta, in whom he could not confide. At the same time he ordered a great part of the garrison, which he had fent to Gela, to join him, and affembled from all parts fugitives, exiles, debtors, and criminals; a train worthy of a tyrant.

With this efcort he returned to Syracuse, which trembled at his approach. The people were no longer in a condition to oppose his undertakings, or to dispute his authority. The city was full of foreign soldiers, and saw itself upon the point of being attacked by the Carthaginians. To strengthen himself the more in tyranny, he espoused the daughter of Hermocrates, the most powerful citizen of Syracuse, and who had contributed the most to the deseat of the Athenians. He also gave his sister in marriage to Polyxenus, brother-in-law of Hermocrates. He afterwards summoned an assembly, in which he rid himself of Daphneus and Demarchus, who had been the most active in opposing his usurpation. In this manner Dionysius, from a simple notary, and a citizen of the lowest class made himself absolute lord and tyrant of the greatest and most opulent city of Sicily.

R iiij

SECTION II.

COMMOTIONS in SICILY and at SYRACUSE against DIONYSIUS.

He finds MEANS to dispel them.

Dionysius had a rude shock to experience d in the beginning of his usurpation. The Carthaginians having befieged Gela, he marched to its relief; and after some unsuccessful endeayours against the enemy, threw himself into the place. He behaved there with little vigour; and all the fervice he did the inhabitants was to make them abandon their city in the night, and to cover their flight in person. He was suspected of acting in concert with the enemy, and the more, because they did not purfue him, and that he lost very few of his foreign foldiers. All the inhabitants who remained at Gela were butchered. Those of Camarina, to avoid the same fate, followed their example, and withdrew with all the effects they could carry away. The moving fight of aged persons, matrons, young virgins, and tender infants, hurried on beyond their strength, ftruck Dionysius's troops with compassion, and incensed them against the tyrant. Those he had raised in Italy withdrew to their own country; and the Syracusan cavalry, after having made a vain attempt to kill him upon the march, from his being furrounded with his foreigners, made forwards, and having entered Syracuse, went directly to his palace, which they plundered, using his wife at the same time with so much violence and ill usage, that she died of it soon after. Dionysius, who had foreseen their design, followed them close with only an hundred horse, and four hundred foot; and having marched almost twenty leagues e with the utmost expedition, he arrived at midnight at one of the gates, which he found thut against him. He set fire to it, and opened himself a passage in that manner. The richest of the citizens ran thither to dispute his entrance, but were furrounded by the foldiers, and almost all' of them killed. Dionysius having entered the city, put all to the fword that came in his way, plundered the houses of his enemies, of whom he killed a great number, and forced the rest to leave Syracuse. The next day in the morning the whole body of his troops arrived. The unhappy fugitives of Gelz and Camarina, out of horror for the tyrant, retired to the Leontines. Imilcar having sent a herald to Syracuse, a treaty was concluded, as mentioned in the history of the Carthagians s. By one of the articles it was stipulated, that Syracuse should continue under the government of Dionysus; which consirmed all the suspicions that had been codsirmed of him. This happened in the year Darius Nothus died s.

It was then he facrificed every thing that gave umbrage to his repose and security. He knew, that after having deprived the Syracusans of all that was dear to them, he could not fail of incurring their extreme abhorrence; and the fear of the miseries he had to expect in consequence, increased in the usurper in proportion to their hatred of him. He looked upon all his new subjects as so many enemies, and believed, that he could only avoid the dangers which surrounded him on all sides, and dogged him in all places, by cutting off one part of the people, to intimidate the other. He did not observe, that in adding the cruelty of executions to the oppression of the public, he only multiplied his enemies, and induced them, after the loss of their liberty, to preserve at least their lives by attempting upon his.

h Dionysius, who foresaw that the Syracusans would not fail to take the advantage of the repose, in which the treaty lately concluded with the Carthaginians had left them, to attempt the re-establishment of their liberty, neglected nothing on his side in support of his power. He fortissed the part of the city, called the Isle, which was before very strong from the nature of its situation, and might be defended by a moderate garrison. He surrounded it with good walls, sianked at due distances with high towers, and separated in that manner from the rest of the city. To these works he added a strong citadel, to serve him for a retreat and resuge in case of accident, and caused a great number of shops and piazzas to be f Vol. 1.

§ A.M. 3600. Ant. J. C. 404. h Diod. p. 238, 241.

erected, capable of containing a confiderable multitude of in-

As to the lands, he chose out the best of them, which he bestowed upon his creatures, and the officers of his making, and distributed the rest in equal proportion amongst the citizens and strangers, including the slaves, who had been made free amongst the first. He divided the houses in the same manner, reserving those in the Isle for such of the citizens as he could most conside in, and for his strangers.

After having taken these precautions for his security, he began to think of fubjecting feveral free states of Sicily, which had aided the Carthaginians. He began with the fiege of Herbesses. The Syracusans in his army, seeing their swords in their hands, thought it their duty to use them for the reestablishment of their liberty. At a time when they met in throngs to concert their measures, one of the officers, who took upon him to reprove them on that account, was killed upon the fpot; and his death ferved as a fignal for their revolt. They fent immediately to Etna for the horse, who had retired thither at the beginning of the revolution. Dionysius, alarmed at this motion, raifed the fiege, and marched directly to Syracuse, to keep it in obedience. The revolters followed him close, and having seized upon the suburb Epipolis, barred all communication with the country. They received aid from their allies both by sea and land, and setting a price upon the tyrant's head, promifed the freedom of their city to fuch of the strangers as should abandon him. A great number came over to them; whom they treated with the utmost fayour and humanity. They made their machines advance, and battered the walls of the Isle vigorusly, without giving Dionyfius the least respite.

The tyrant finding himself reduced to extremities, abandoned by the greatest part of the strangers, and shut up on the side of the country, assembled his friends to consult with them, rather by what kind of death he should put a glorious period to his career, than upon the means of saving himself. They endeavoured to inspire him with new courage, and were divided ut their opinions; but at last the advice of Philistus prevailed, which was, that he should by no means renounce the tyranny. Dionysius, to gain time, sent deputies to the revolters, and demanded permission to quit the place with his adherents, which was granted, and five ships to transport his people and effects. He had however fent dispatches secretly to the Capanians, who garrisoned the places in the possession of the Carthaginians, with offers of considerable reward, if they would come to his relief.

The Syracufans, who, after the treaty, believed their bufiness done, and the tyrant entirely defeated, had disarmed part of their troops, and the rest acted with great indolence and little discipline. The arrival of he Campanians, to the number of twelve hundred horfe, infinitely furprifed and alarmed the city. After having beat such as disputed their passage, they opened themselves a way to Dionysius. At the fame time, three hundred foldiers more arrived to his affiftance: The face of things was then entirely altered; and terror and dejection changed parties. Dionyfius, in a fally, drove them vigorously as far as that part of the city Neapolis. The flaughter was not very confiderable, because he had given orders to spare those who fled. He caused the dead to be interred, and gave those who had retired to Ætna to understand, that they might return with entire security. Many came to Syracuse; but others did not think it adviseable to confide in the faith of a tyrant. The Campanians were rewarded to their fatisfaction, and difmiffed.

The Lacedaemonians at this time took fuch measures in regard to Syracuse, as were most unworthy of the Spartan name. They had lately subverted the liberty of Athens, and declared publicly in all the cities of their dependence against popular government. They deputed one of their citizens to Syracuse, to express in appearance the part they took in the misfortunes for that city, and to offer it their aid; but in reality he was sent to consirm Dionysius in supporting himself in the tyranny; expecting, that from the increase of his power he would prove of great advantage and support to their own.

Dionysius saw, from what had so lately happened at Syracuse, what he was to expect from the people for the future. Whilst the inhabitants were employed abroad in harvest-work, he entered their houses, and seized upon all the arms he could find. He afterwards inclosed the citadel with an additional wall, sitted out abundance of ships, armed great numbers of strangers, and took all possible measures to secure himself against the disassection of the Syracusans.

After having made this provision for his safety at home, he prepared to extend his conquests abroad; from whence he did not only propose the increase of his dominions and revenues, but the additional advantage of diverting his subjects from the sense of their lost liberty, by turning their attention upon their ancient and always abhorred enemy, and by employing them in losty projects, military expeditions, and glorious exploits, to which the hopes of riches and plunder would be annexed. He conceived this to be also the means to acquire the affection of his troops; and that the esteem of the people would be a consequence of the grandeur and success of his enterprises.

Dionysius wanted neither courage nor policy, and had all the qualities of a great general. He took, either by force or fraud, Naxos, Catana, Leontium, and some 1 other towns in the neighbourhood of Syracuse, which for that reason were very agreeable to his purposes. Some of them he treated with savour and clemency, to engage the esteem and considence of the people: Others he plundered, to strike terror into the country. The inhabitants of Leontium were transplanted to Syracuse.

These conquests alarmed the neighbouring cities, which saw themselves threatened with the same missortune. Rhegio, situated upon the opposite coast of the strait which divides Sicily from Italy, prepared to prevent it, and entered into an alliance with the Syracusan exiles, who were very numerous, and with the Messenians on the Sicilian side of the strait, who were to aid them with a powerful supply. They had levied a confiderable army, and were upon the point of marching against the tyrant, when discord arose amongst the troops, and rendered the enterprise abortive. It terminated in a treaty of peace and alliance between Dionysius and the two cities.

He had long revolved a great defign in his mind, which was to ruin the Carthaginian power in Sicily, a great obstacle to his own, as his discontented subjects never failed of refuge in the towns dependent upon that nation. The accident of the plague, which had lately ravaged Carthage, and extremely diminished its strength, seemed to supply a savourable opportunity for the execution of his design. But, as a man of ability, he knew that the greatness of the preparations ought to answer that of an enterprise, to assure the success of it; and he applied to them in a manner, which shews the extent of his views, and extraordinary capacity. He therefore used uncommon pains and application for that purpose; conscious that war, into which he was entering with one of the most powerful nations then in the world, might be of long duration, and have variety of considerable events.

His first care was to bring to Syracuse, as well from the conquered cities in Sicily, as from Greece and Italy, a great number of artisans and workmen of all kinds; whom he induced to come thither by the offer of great gain and reward; the certain means of engaging the most excellent persons in every profession. He caused an infinite number of every kind of arms to be forged; swords, javelins, lances, partisans, helmets, cuirasses, bucklers; all after the manner of the nation by whom they were to be worn. He built also a great number of gallies, that had from three to sive benches of rowers, and were of an entirely new invention; with abundance of other barks and vessels for the transportation of troops and provisions.

The whole city seemed but one workshop, and continually resounded with the noise of the several artisans. Not only the porches, piazzas, porticoes, places of exercise, and public places, but private houses of any extent, were full of workmen. Dionysius had distributed them with admirable order. Each species of artifts, divided by ffreets and diffricts, had their overfeers and inspectors, who, by their presence and direction, promoted and completed the works. Dionysius himself was perpetually amongst the workmen, encouraging them with praise. and rewarding their merit. He knew how to confer different marks of honour upon them, according to their diftinguishing themselves by their ingenuity and application. He would even make some of them dine with him at his own table, where he entertained them with the freedom and kindness of a friend. It is justly faid *, that honour nourishes arts and sciences, and that men of all ranks and conditions are animated by the love of glory. The prince, who knows how to put the two great fprings and strongest incentives of the human foul, interest and glory, in motion, under proper regulations, will foon make all arts and sciences flourish in his kingdom, and fill it at a fmall expence with perfons who excel in every profession. And this happened now at Syracuse; where a single person of great ability in the art of governing, excited fuch ardor and emulation amongst the artificers, as it is not easy to imagine or describe.

Dionyfius applied himself more particularly to the navy. He knew that Corinth had invented the art of building galleys with three and five benches of oars, and was ambitious of acquiring for Syracuse, a Corinthian colony, the glory of bringing that art to persection, which he effected. The timber for building his galleys was brought, part of it from Italy, where it was drawn on carriages to the sea-side, and from thence shipped to Syracuse; and part from mount Ætna, which at that time produced abundance of pine and fir trees. In a short space a seet of two hundred galleys was seen in a manner to rise out of the earth; and an hundred others formerly built were resitted by his order. He caused also an hundred and fixty sheds to be erected within the great port, each of them capable of containing two galleys, and an hundred and fifty more to be repaired.

The fight of such a sleet, built in so short a time, and sitted out with so much magnificence, would have given reason to believe, that all Sicily had united its labours and revenues in accomplishing fo great a work. On the other fide, the view of fuch an incredible quantity of arms newly made, would have inclined one to think, that Dionysius had folely employed himself in providing them, and had exhausted his treasures in the expence. They consisted of one hundred and forty thousand shields, and as many helmets and swords; and upwards of fourteen thousand cuirasses, finished with all the art and elegance imaginable. They were intended for the horse, for the tribunes and centurians of the foot, and for the foreign troops, who had the guard of his person. Darts, arrows and lances were innumerable; and engines and machines of war, in proportion to the rest of the preparations.

. Honos alit artes, omnesque incenduntur ad studia gloriae. Cic. Tusc. Quaest. 1. 1. 1. 4.

The fleet was to be manned by an equal number of citizens and strangers. Dionysius did not think of raising troops till all his preparations were complete. Syracuse and the cities in its dependence supplied him with part of his forces. Many came from Greece, especially from Sparta. The considerable pay he offered brought soldiers in crowds from all parts to list in his service.

He omitted none of the precautions necessary to the success of his enterprise; the importance as well as difficulty of which was well known to him. He was not ignorant that every thing depends upon the zeal and affection of the troops for their general, and applied himself particularly to the gaining of the hearts, not of his own subjects only, but of all the inhabitants of Sicily, and succeeded in it to a wonder. He had entirely changed his behaviour for some time. Kindness, courtesy, elemency, a disposition to do good, and an infinuating complacency for all the world, had taken place of that haughty and imperious air, and inhumanity of temper, which had rendered him so odious. He was so entirely altered, that he did not feem to be the same man.

Whilft he was haftening his preparations for the war, and applying to the attainment of his fubjects affections, he meditated an alliance with the two powerful cities, Rhegium and Messina, which were capable of disconcerting his great designs by a formidable diversion. The league formed by those cities fome time before, though without any effect, gave him some uneasiness. He therefore thought it necessary to make sure of the amity of them both. He presented the inhabitants of Messina with a considerable quantity of land, which was situated in their neighbourhood, and lay very commodiously for them. To give the people of Rhegium an instance of his esteem and regard for them, he sent ambassadors to desire that they would give him one of their citizens in marriage. He had lost his first wife in the popular commotion, as before related.

Dionyfius, fenfible that nothing establishes a throne more effectually than the prospect of a successor, who may enter into the same designs, have the same interests, pursue the same plan, and observe the same maxims of government, took the opportunity of the present tranquillity of his affairs, to contract a double marriage, in order to have a successor, to whom he might transfer the sovereignty, which had cost him so many pains and dangers to acquire.

The people of Rhegium, to whom Dionysius had first applied, having called a counsel to take his demand into consideration, came to a resolution not to contract any alliance with a tyrant; and for their final answer returned, that they had only the hangman's daughter to give him. The raillery was home, and cut deep. We shall see in the sequel how dear that city paid for their jest.

The Locrians, to whom Dionysius sent the same ambassadors, did not shew themselves so difficult and delicate, but sent him Donis for a wife, who was the daughter of one of their most illustrious citizens. He caused her to be brought from Locris in a galley with five benches of rowers, of extraordinary magnificence, and shining on all sides with gold and silver. He married, at the same time, Aristomache, daughter of Hipparinus, the most considerable and powerful of the Syracusan citizens, and sister of Dion, of whom much will be said hereafter. She was brought to his palace in a chariot drawn by four white horses, which was then a singular mark of distinction. The nuptials of both were celebrated the same day with univerfal rejoicings throughout the whole city, and was attended with feafts and prefents of incredible magnificence.

It was contrary to the manners and universal custom of the western nations, from all antiquity, that he espoused two wives at once; taking in this, as in every thing else, the liberty asfumed by tyrants of setting themselves above all laws.

Dionysius seemed to have an equal affection for the two wives, without giving the presence to either, to remove all cause of jealousy and discord. The people of Syracuse reported, that he preserved his own country-woman to the stranger; but the latter had the good fortune to bring her husband the first son, which supported him not a little against the cabals and intrigues of the Syracusans. Aristomache was a long time without any symptoms of child-bearing; though Dionysius defired so earnessly to have issue by her, that he put his Locrian's mother to death; accusing her of hindering Aristomache from conceiving by witchcraft.

Aristomache's brother was the celebrated Dion, in great estimation with Dionysius. He was at first obliged for his credit to his sister's favour; but after distinguishing his great capacity in many instances, his own merit made him much beloved and regarded by the tyrant. Amongst the other marks Dionysius gave him of his considence, he ordered his treasurers to supply him, without further orders, with whatever money he should demand, provided they informed him the same day they paid it.

Dion had naturally a great and most noble soul. An happy accident had conduced to inspire and confirm in him the most elevated sentiments. It was a kind of chance, or rather, as Plutarch says, a peculiar providence, which at a distance laid the foundations of the Syracusan liberty, that brought Plato, the most celebrated of philosophers, to Syracuse. Dion became his friend and disciple, and made great improvements from his lessons: For, though brought up in a luxurious and voluptuous court, where the supreme good was made to consist in pleasure and magnificence, he had no sooner heard the precepts of his new master, and imbibed a taste of the philofophy that inculcates virtue, than his foul was inflamed with the love of it. Plato, in one of his letters, gives this glorious testimony of him; that he had never met with a young man, upon whom his discourses made so great an impression, or who had conceived his principles with so much ardour and vivacity.

As Dion was young and unexperienced, observing the facility with which Plato had changed his taste and inclinations, he imagined, with simplicity enough, that the same reasons would have the same effects upon the mind of Dionysius; and from that opinion could not rest till he had prevailed upon the tyrant to hear, and converse with him. Dionysius consented: But the lust of tyrannic power had taken too deep a root in his heart to be ever eradicated from it. It was * like an indelible dye, that had penetrated his inmost foul, from whence it was impossible ever to efface it.

* Though the stay of Plato at the court made no alteration in Dionysius, he persevered in giving Dion the same instances of his esteem and confidence, and even to support, without taking offence, the freedom with which he fpoke to him. Dionyfius, ridiculing one day the government of Gelon, formerly king of Syracufe, and faying, in allusion to his name, that he had been the "laughing-stock+" of Sicily, the whole court fell into great admiration, and took no fmall pains in praifing the quaintness and delicacy of the conceit, infipid and flat as it was, and indeed as puns and quibbles generally are. Dion took it in a ferious fense, and was so bold as to represent to him. that he was in the wrong to talk in that manner of a prince, whose wife and equitable conduct had been an excellent model of government, and given the Syracnfans a favourable opinion of monarchical power. "You reign," added he, "and " have been trusted for Gelon's fake; but for your fake, no " man will ever be trusted after you." It was very much, that a tyrant should suffer himself to be talked to in such manner with impunity.

k Plat. p. 960.

* Τhe βαρλι δι διώντα στις τυρανιδος, δι πολλω χρόνω διμοσποδο έναο καὶ δισία πυτο. Δρομινίες δι διστας λαι διότων χρητων διστιλαμβαικε θαι λόγου Plut. in moral. p. 779. † Τέλας fignifies laughing-stock.

SECTION III.

DIONYSIUS declares WAR against the CARTHAGINIANS: Various Success of it.

Dionysius feeing his great preparations were complete, and that he was in a condition to take the field, publicly opened his defign to the Syracufans, in order to interest them the more in the fuccess of the enterprise, and told them that it was against the Carthaginians. He represented that people as the perpetual and inveterate enemy of the Greeks, and especially of those who inhabited Sicily; that the plague, which had lately wasted Carthage, had made the opportunity favourable, which ought not to be neglected; that the people in subjection to so cruel a power, waited only the fignal to declare against it; that it would be much for the glory of Syracuse to reinstate the Grecian cities in their liberty, after having fo long groaned under the yoke of the Barbarians; that in declaring war at present against the Carthaginians, they only preceded them in doing fo for some time; since, as soon as they had retrieved their losses, they would not fail to attack Syracufe with all their forces.

The affembly were unanimously of the same opinion. Their ancient and natural hatred of the Barbarians; their anger against them for having given Syracuse a master; and the hope that with arms in their hands they might find some occasion of recovering their liberty, united them in their suffrages. The war was resolved without any opposition, and began that very instant. There were, as well in the city as the port, a great number of Carthaginians, who, upon the faith of treaties and under the peace, exercised traffic, and thought themselves in security. The populace, by Dionysius's authority, upon the breaking up of the assembly, ran to their houses and ships, plundered their goods, and carried off their effects. They met with the same treatment throughout Sicily; to w' ich murders and ma acres were added, by way of reprilate for the many cruelties committed by the Barbarians on those they con usered, and to shew them what they had to expect, if they continued to make war with the same inhumanity.

After this bloody execution, Dionyfius sent a letter by an herald to Carthage, in which he signified that the Syracusans declared war against the Carthaginians, if they did not withdraw their garrisons from all the Grecian cities held by them in Sicily. The reading of this letter at first in the senate, and afterwards in the assembly of the people, occasioned an uncommon alarm, as the pestilence had reduced the city to a deplorable condition. However, they were not dismayed, and prepared for a vigorous desence. They raised troops with the utmost diligence; and Imilcar set out immediately to put himself at the head of the Carthaginian army in Sicily.

Dionyhus on his fide lost no time, and took the field with his army, which daily increased by the arrival of new troops, who came to join him from all parts. It amounted to fourscore thousand foot, and three thousand horse. The fleet consisted of two hundred gallies, and five hundred barks laden with provisions, and machines of war. He opened the campaign with the siege of Motya, a fortisted town under the Carthaginians near mount Eryx, in a little island something more than a quarter of a league * from the continent, to which it was joined by a small neck of land, which the besieged immediately cut off, to prevent the approaches of the enemy on that side.

Dionysius having lest the care of the siege to Leptinus, who commanded the sleet, went with his land forces to attack the places in alliance with the Carthaginians. Terrised by the approach of so numerous an army, they all surrendered except sive, which were Ancyra, Solos +, Palermo, Segesta, and Entella. The last two places he besieged.

Imilcar, however, to make a diversion, detached ten gallies of his fleet, with orders to attack and surprise in the night all the vessels which remained in the port of Syracuse. The commander of this expedition entered the port according to his orders without resistance, and after having sunk a great part of the veffels, which he found there, retired well fatisfied with the fuccess of his enterprise.

* Bix stadia or furlongs.

Dionyfius, after having wasted the enemy's country, returned, and sat down with his whole army before Motya; and having employed a great number of hands in making dams and moles, he reinstated the neck of land, and brought his engines to work on that side. The place was attacked and defended with the utmost vigour. After the besiegers had passed the breach, and entered the city, the besieged persisted a great while in defending themselves with incredible valour; so that it was necessary to pursue and drive them from house to house. The soldiers, enraged at so obstinate a defence, put all before them to the sword; age, youth, women, children; nothing was spared, except those who had taken refuge in the temples. The town was abandoned to the soldiers discretion; Dionysius being pleased with an occasion of attaching the troops to his service by the allurement and hope of gain.

The Carthaginians made an extraordinary effort the next year, and raifed an army of three hundred thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The fleet under Mago's command confifted of four hundred gallies, and upwards of fix hundred veffels laden with provisions and engines of war. Imilcar had given the captains of the fleet his orders fealed up, which were not to be opened till they were out at sea. He had taken this precaution, that his defigns might be kept fecret, and to prevent spies from fending advices of them to Sicily. The rendezvous was at Palermo; where the fleet arrived without much loss in their passage. Imilcar took Eryax by treachery, and foon after reduced Motya to furrender. Mcflina feemed to him a place of importance; because it might favour the landing of troops from Italy and Sicily, and bar the passage of those that should come from Peloponnesus. After a long and vigorous defence, it fell into his hands; and some time after he entirely demolished it.

Dionysius, seeing his forces extremely inferior to the enemy, retired to Syracuse. Almost all the people of Sicily, who hated him from the beginning, and were only reconciled to him in appearance, and out of fear, took this occasion to quit his party, and to join the Carthaginians. The tyrant levied new troops, and gave the flaves their liberty, that they might ferve on board the fleet. His army amounted to thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and his fleet to an hundred and eighty gallies. With these forces he took the field, and removed about eighteen leagues from Syracuse. Imilear advanced perpetually with his land-army, followed by his fleet, which kept near the coast. When he arrived at Naxos, he could not continue his march upon the sea-side, and was obliged to take a long compass round mount Ætna, which by a new irruption had fet the country about it on fire, and covered it with ashes. He ordered his fleet to wait his coming up at Catana. Dionyfius, apprized of this, thought the opportunity favourable for attacking it, whilft separate from the land-forces, and whilft his own, drawn up in battle upon the shore, might be of fervice to animate and support his fleet. The scheme was wifely concerted; but the fuccess not answerable to it. Leptinus his admiral, having advanced inconfiderately with thirty gallies, contrary to the opinion of Dionysius, who had particularly recommended to him not to divide his forces, at first funk feveral of the enemy's ships; but upon being surrounded by the greater number, was forced to fly. His whole fleet followed his example, and was warmly purfued by the Carthaginians. Mago detached boats full of foldiers, with orders to kill all that endeavoured to fave themselves by swimming to shore. The land army, drawn up there, saw them perish miserably, without being able to give them any affiftance. The lofs on the fide of the Sicilians was very great; more than an hundred gallies being either taken or funk, and twenty thousaud men perishing either in the battle or the pursuit.

The Sicilians, who were afraid to flut themselves up in Syracuse, where they could not fail of being besieged very soon, solicited Dionysius to lead them against Imilear, whom so bold an enterprise might disconcert; besides which, they should find his troops satigued with their long and hasty march. The proposal pleased him at first; but upon resecting, that Mago, with the victorious sleet, might notwithstanding advance and take Syracuse, he thought it more advisable to return thither; which was the occasion of his losing abundance of his troops, who deserted in numbers on all sides. Imiliar, after a march of two days, arrived at Catana, where he halted some days to refresh his army, and rest his sleet, which had suffered exceedingly by a violent storm.

. He then marched to Syracuse, and made his fleet enter the port in triumph. More than two hundred gallies, adorned with the spoils of their victory, made a noble appearance as they advanced; the crews forming a kind of concert by the uniform and regular order they observed in the motion of their oars. They were followed by an infinite number of smaller barks; fo that the port, vast as it was, was scarce capable of containing them; the whole fea being in a manner covered with fails. At the same time, on the other side appeared the land-army, composed, as has been said, of three hundred thou. fand foot and four thousand horse. Imilcar pitched his tent in the temple of Jupiter, and the army encamped around, at fomewhat more than half a league's * distance from the city. It is easy to judge the consternation and alarm which such a profpect must give the Syracusans. The Carthaginian general advanced with his troops to the walls to offer the city battle, and at the same time seized upon the two remaining + ports by a detachment of an hundred gallies. As he faw no motion on the fide of the Syracusans, he retired contented for that time with the enemy's confessing their inequality. For thirty days together he laid waste the country, cutting down all the trees, . and destroying all before him, He then made himself master of the fuburb called Achradina, and plundered the temples of Ceres and Proferpina. Foreseeing that the siege would be of long duration, he intrenched his camp, and inclosed it with firong walls, after having demolished for that purpose all the tombs, and amongst others, that of Gelon and his wife Demarate, which was a monument of great magnificence. He built

S iiij

o Diod. p. 285-296.

* Twelve stadia,

+ The little port, and that of Trogilus.

three forts at some distance from each other; the first at Pemmyra; the second towards the middle of the port; the third near the temple of Jupiter; for the security of his magazines of corn and wine. He sent also a great number of small vessels to Sardinia and Africa to setch provisions.

At the fame time arrived Polexenus, whom his brother-inlaw Dionyfius had dispatched before into Italy and Greece for all the aid he could obtain, and brought with him a fleet of thirty ships, commanded by Pharacides the Lacedaemonian. This reinforcement came in very good time, and gave the Syracusans new spirit. Upon seeing a bark laden with provisions for the enemy, they detached sive gallies and took it. The Carthaginians gave them chase with forty sail, to which they advanced with their whole sleet; and in the battle carried the admiral galley, damaged many others, took twenty-four, purfued the rest to the place where their whole sleet rode, and offered them battle a second time, which the Carthaginians, discouraged by the check they had received, were assay

The Syracusans, emboldened by so unexpected a victory, returned to the city with the gallies they had taken, and entered it in a kind of triumph. Animated by this success, which could be only ascribed to their valour; for Dionysius was then absent with a small detachment of the sleet to procure provisions, attended by Leptinus; they encouraged each other; and seeing they did not want arms, they reproached themselves with cowardice, ardently exclaiming, that the time was come for throwing off the snameful yoke of servitude, and resuming their ancient liberty.

Whilst they were in the midst of these discourses, dispersed in small parties, the tyrant arrived; and having summoned an assembly, he congratulated the Syracusans upon their late victory, and promised in a short time to put an end to the war, and deliver them from the enemy. He was going to dismiss the assembly, when Theodorus, one of the most illustrious of the citizens, a person of sense and valour, took upon him to speak, and to declare boldly for liberty. "We are told," said he, "of restoring peace, terminating the war, and of being de" livered from the enemy. What fignifies fuch language from " Dionyfius? Can we have peace in the wretched state of sla-" very imposed upon us? Have we any enemy more to be " dreaded than the tyrant who fubverts our liberty, or a war " more cruel than that he has made upon us for fo many years? " Let Imilcar conquer, so he contents himself with laying a " tribute upon us, and leaves us the exercise of our laws! The " tyrant that enflaves us, knows no other but his avarice, his " cruelty, his ambition! The temples of the gods, robbed by " his facrilegious hands, our goods made a prey, and our lands " abandoned to his instruments, our persons daily exposed to " the most shameful and cruel treatment, the blood of so many " citizens shed in the midst of us and before our eyes; these " are the fruits of his reign, and the peace he obtains for us! " Was it for the support of our liberties he built you citadel, " that he has inclosed it with fuch strong walls and high " towers, and has called in for his guard that tribe of ftran-" gers and Barbarians, who infult us with impunity? How long, " O Syracufans! shall we fuffer such indignities, more insup-" portable to the brave and generous than death itfelf? Bold and " intrepid abroad against the enemy, shall we always tremble " like cowards in the presence of a tyrant? Providence, which " has again put arms into our hands, directs us in the use of " them! Sparta, and the other cities in our alliance, who hold " it their glory to be free and independent, would deem us " unworthy of the Grecian name if we had any other fenti-" ments. Let us shew that we do not degenerate from our " ancestors. If Dionysius consents to retire from amongst us, " let us open him our gates, and let him take along with him " whatever he pleafes: But if he perfifts in the tyranny, let " him experience what effects the love of liberty has upon the " brave and determinate."

After this fpeech, all the Syracufans, in fufpense betwixt hope and fear, looked earnestly upon their allies, and particutarly upon the Spartans. Pharacides, who commanded their sleet, rose up to speak. It was expected that a citizen of Sparta would declare in favour of liberty: but he did quite the reverse; and told them, that his republic had sent him to the aid of the Syracusans and Dionysius, and not to make war upon Dionysius, or to subvert his authority. This answer consounded the Syracusans; and the tyrant's guard arriving at the same time, the assembly broke up. Dionysius perceiving more than ever what he had to fear, used all his endeavours to ingratiate himself with the people, and to attach the citizens to his interests; making presents to some, inviting others to eat with him, and affecting upon all occasions to treat them with kindness and familiarity.

It must have been about this time, that Polexenus, Dionyfius's brother-in-law, who had married his fifter Thefta, having without doubt declared against him in this conspiracy. fled from Sicily for the preservation of his life, and to avoid falling iuto the tyrant's hands. Dionysius fent for his sister. and reproached her very much for not apprizing him of her husband's intended flight, as she could not be ignorant of it. She replied, without expressing the least surprise or fear, " Have I then appeared so bad a wife to you, and of so mean " a foul, as to have abandoned my husband in his flight, and " not to have defired to share in his dangers and misfortnnes? " No! I knew nothing of it; or I should have been much " happier in being called the wife of Polexenus the exile, in " all places, than, in Syracuse, the fister of the tyrant." Dionyfius could not but admire an answer so full of spirit and generofity; and the Syracufans in general were so charmed with her virtue, that after the tyranny was suppressed, the fame honours, equipage, and train of a queen, which she had before, were continued to her during her life; and after her death, the whole people attended her body to the tomb, and honoured her funeral with an extraordinary appearance.

On the fide of the Carthaginians, affairs began to take a new face on a fudden. They had committed an irretrievable error in not attacking Syracuse upon their arrival, and in not taking the advantage of the consernation, which the fight of a fleet and army equally formidable had occasioned. The plague, which was looked upon as a punishment sent from a feaven for the plundering of temples and demolishing of tombs, had destroyed great numbers of their army in a short time. I have described the extraordinary symptoms of it in the history of the Carthaginians. To add to that misfortune, the Syracusans, being informed of their unhappy condition, attacked them in the night by sea and land. The surprise, terror, and even hafte they were in, to put themselves into a posture of defence, threw them into new difficulty and confusion. They knew not on which fide to fend relief; all being equally in danger. Many of their vessels were funk, and others almost entirely disabled, and a much greater number destroyed by fire. The old men, women, and children, ran in crowds to the walls, to be witnesses of that scene of horror. and lifted up their hands towards heaven, returning thanks to the gods for fo figual a protection of their city. The flaughter within and without the camp, and on board the veffels, was great and dreadful, and ended only with the day.

Imilcar, reduced to despair, offered Dionysius secretly three hundred thousand crowns * for permission to retire in the night with the remains of his army and sleet. The tyrant, who was not displeased with leaving the Carthaginians some resource, to keep his subjects in continual awe, gave his confent; but only for the citizens of Carthage. Upon which Imilcar set out with the Carthaginians, and only forty ships; leaving the rest of his troops behind. The Corinthians, discovering from the noise and motion of the gallies, that Imilcar was making off, sent to inform Dionysius of his slight, who affected ignorance of it, and gave immediate orders to pursue him: But as those orders were but slowly executed, they followed the enemy themselves, and sunk several vessels of their rear-guard.

Dionysius then marched out with his troops; but before their arrival, the Sicilians in the Carthaginian service had retired to their several countries. Having first posted his troops in the passes, he advanced directly to the enemy's camp, though it was not quite day. The Barbarians, who saw themselves cruelly abandoned and betrayed by Imilcar and the Sicilians, lost courage and fled. Some of them were taken by the troops in the passes; others laid down their arms, and asked quarter. Only the Iberians drew up, and sent an herald to capitulate with Dionysius, who incorporated them into his guards. The rest were all made prisoners.

* Three hundred talents.

Such was the fate of the Carthaginians; which shews, fays the historiant, that humiliation treads upon the heels of pride, and that those who are too much puffed up with power and fuecess, are soon forced to confess their weakness and vanity. Those haughty victors, masters of almost all Sicily, who looked upon Syracuse as already their own, and entered at first triumphant into the great port, insulting the citizens, are now reduced to fly shamefully under the covert of the night; dragging away with them the fad ruins and miserable remains of their fleet and army, and trembling for the fate of their native country. Imilcar, who had not regarded the facred refuge of temples, nor the inviolable fanctity of tombs, after having left one hundred and fifty thousand men unburied in the enemies country, returns to perish miserably at Carthage, avenging upon himself by his death the contempt he had expressed for gods and men.

Dionyfius, who was suspicious of the strangers in his service, removed ten thousand of them, and, under the pretence of rewarding their merit, gave them the city of Leontium, which was in reality very commodiously situated, and an advantageous settlement. He consided the guard of his person to other foreigners, and the slaves he had made free. He made several attempts upon places in Sicily, and in the neighbouring country, especially against Rhegium. The people of Italy, seeing, themselves in danger, entered into a powerful alliance to put a stop to his conquests. The success was tolerably equal on both sides.

* About this time, the Gauls, who some months before had burned Rome, sent deputies to Dionysius to make an alliance with him, who was at that time in Italy. The advices he had received of the great preparations making by the Carthaginians for war, obliged him to return to Sicily.

The Carthaginians having fet on foot a numerous army under the conduct of Mago, made new efforts against Syracuse, but with no better success than the former. They terminated in an accommodation with Dionysius.

y He attacked Rhegium again, and at first received no inconfiderable check. But having gained a great victory against the Greeks of Italy, in which he took more than ten thousand prifoners, he dismissed them all without ransom, contrary to their expectation; with a view of dividing the Italians from the interests of Rhegium, and of dissolving a powerful league, which might have defeated his defigns. Having by this action of fayour and generofity acquired the good opinion of all the inhabitants of the country, and from enemies made them his friends and allies, he returned against Rhegium. He was extremely incenfed against that city upon account of their refusing to give him one of their citizens in marriage, and the infolent answer with which that refusal was attended. The belieged, finding themselves incapable of refisting so numerous an army as that of Dionyfius, and expecting no quarter if the city were taken by affault, began to talk of capitulating; to which he hearkened not unwillingly. He made them pay three hundred thoufand crowns, deliver up all their vessels, to the number of seventy, and put an hundred hostages into his hands; after which he raifed the fiege. It was not out of favour and clemency that he acted in this manner, but to make their destruction fure, after having first reduced their power.

Accordingly the next year, under the false pretext, and with the reproach of their having violated the treaty, he besieged them again with all his forces, sirst sending back their hostages. Both parties acted with the utmost vigour. The desire of revenge on one side, and the sear of the greatest cruelties on the other, animated the troops. Those of the city were commanded by Phyto, a brave and intrepid man, whom the danger of his country rendered more courageous. He made frequent and rude sallies. In one of them Dionysius received a wound, of which he recovered with great difficulty. The siege went on slowly, and had already continued eleven months, when a cruel famine reduced the city to the last extremities. A meafure of wheat, of about fix bushels, was sold for two hundred and fifty livres * After having confumed all their horses and beasts of carriage, they were obliged to support themselves with leather and hides, which they boiled; and at last to feed upon the grass of the fields like beasts; a resource of which Dionyfius soon deprived them, by making his horse eat up all the herbage around the city. Necessity at length reduced them to surrender at discretion; and Dionysius entered the place, which he sound covered with dead bodies. Those who survived were rather skeletons than men. He took about fix thousand prisoners, whom he sent to Syracuse. Such as could pay fifty livres + he dismissed, and sold the rest for slaves.

Dionysius let fall the whole weight of his refentment and revenge upon Pyto. He began with ordering his fon to be thrown into the sea. The next day he ordered the father to be fastened to the extremity of the highest of his engines for a spectacle to the whole army, and in that condition he sent to tell him that his fon had been thrown into the fea. "Then he " is happier than me by a day," replied that unfortunate parent. He afterwards caused him to be led through the whole city, to be scourged with rods, and to suffer a thousand other indignities, whilst an herald proclaimed, " that the perfidious " traitor was treated in that manner, for having inspired the " people of Rhegium with rebellion." "Say rather," aufwered that generous defender of his country's liberty, "that a " faithful citizen is fo used, for having refused to facrifice his " country to a tyrant." Such an object and fuch a discourse drew tears from all eyes, and even from the foldiers of Dionyfius. He was afraid his prisoner would be taken from him before he had fatiated his revenge, and ordered him to be flung into the sea directly.

&quot; Five isinge.

SECTION IV.

VIOLENT PASSION of DIONYSIUS for POEST. His DEATH and bad QUALITIES.

AT b an interval which the fuccess against Rhegium had left, Dionysius the tyrant, who was fond of all kinds of glory, and piqued himself upon the excellence of his genius, sent his brother Thearides to Olympia, to dispute in his name the prizes of the chariot race and poetry.

The circumstance which I am going to treat, and which regards the taste, or rather passion of Dionysius for poetry and polite learning, being one of his peculiar characteristics, and having besides a mixture of good and bad in itself, makes it requisite, for a right understanding of it, to distinguish wherein this taste of his is either laudable or worthy of blame.

I shall say as much upon the tyrant's total character, with whose vices of ambition and tyranny many great qualities were united, which ought not to be disguised or misrepresented; the veracity of history requiring, that justice should be done to the most wicked, as they are not so in every respect. We have feen several things in his character that certainly deserve praise; I mean in regard to his manners and behaviour: The mildness with which he suffered the freedom of young Dion; the admiration he expressed of the bold and generous answer of his fifter Thesta upon account of her husband's flight; his gracious and infinuating deportment upon feveral other occasions to the Syracufans; the familarity of his discourse with the meanest citizens, and even workmen; the equality he observed between his two wives, and his kindness and respect for them; all which imply that Dionysius had more equity, moderation, affability and generofity, than is commonly ascribed to him. He is not fuch a tyrant as Phalaris, Alexander of Pherae, Caligula, Nero, or Caracalla.

But to return to Dionyfius's tafte for poetry. In his intervals of leifure, he loved to unbend in the conversation of perfons of wit, and in the study of arts and sciences. He was particularly fond of verfifying, and employed himself in the composition of poems, especially of tragedies. Thus far this passion of his may be excused, having something undoubtedly laudable in it; I mean in the tafte for polite learning, the efleem he expressed for learned men, his inclination to do them good offices, and the application of his leifure hours. Was it not better to employ them in the exercise of his wit and the cultivation of science, than feating, dancing, theatrical amusements, gaming, frivolous company, and other pleasures still more pernicious? Which wife reflection Dionysius the younger made when at Corinth. c Philip of Macedon being at table with him, spoke of the odes and tragedies his father had left behind him with an air of raillery and contempt, and seemed to be under fome difficulty to comprehend at what time of his life he had leifure for fuch compositions: Dionysius smartly reparteed, "The difficulty is very great indeed! Why, he " composed them at those hours, which you and I, and an in-" finity of others, as we have reason to believe, pass in drink-" ing and other diversions."

b Diod. l. xiv. p. 318.

<sup>4</sup> Julius Caesar, and the emperor Augustus, applied themfelves to poetry, and composed tragedies, Lucullus intended to have written the memoirs of his military actions in verse. The comedies of Terence were attributed to Lelius and Scipio, both great captains, especially the latter; and that report was so far from lessening their reputation at Rome, that it added to the general esteem for them.

These unbendings therefore were not blameable in their own nature; this taste for poetry was rather laudable, if kept within due bounds; but Dionysius was ridiculous for pretending to excel all others in it. He could not endure either a superior or competitor in any thing. From being in the sole possession of supreme authority, he had accustomed himself to imagine his wit of the same rank with his power: In a word, he was in every thing a tyrant. His immoderate estimation of his own merit, slowed in some measure from the overbearing turn of mind which empire and command had given him.

e Plut, in Timol. c. lxxxv. p. 243. Plut. in Lucul. p. 492.

&amp; Suct. in Caef. c. lvi. in August.

The continual applauses of a court, and the flatteries of those who knew how to recommend themselves by his darling soible, were another source of this vain conceit. And of what will not a great man *, a minister, a prince, think himself capable, who has such incense and adoration continually paid to him? It is well known that Cardinal Richelieu, in the midst of the greatest affairs, not only composed dramatic poems, but piqued himself on his excellency that way; and what is more, his jealousy in that point rose so high as to use his authority by way of criticism upon the compositions of those, to whom the public, a just and incorruptible judge in the question, had given the presence against him.

Dionysius did not reflect, that there are things, which, though estimable in themselves, and which do honour to private persons, it does not become a prince to desire to excel in. I have mentioned elsewhere Philip of Macedon's expression to his fon, upon his having shewn too much skill in music at a public entertainment : " Are not you ashamed," said he, " to " fing fo well?" It was acting inconfiftently with the dignity of his character. If Caesar and Augustus, when they wrote tragedies, had taken it into their heads to equal or excel Sophocles, it had not only been ridiculous, but a reproach to them. And the reason is; because a prince, being obliged by an effential and indispensable duty to apply himself incessantly to the affairs of government, and having an infinitude of varions business always recurring to him, he can make no other use of the sciences, than to divert him at such short intervals, as will not admit any great progress in them, and the excelling of those who employ themselves in no other study. Hence, when the public sees a prince affect the first rank in this kind of merit, it may justly conclude, that he neglects his more important duties, and what he owes to his people's happiness, to give himself up to an employment, which wastes his time and application of mind ineffectually.

We must however do Dionysius the justice to own, that he Volume IV.

<sup>* -</sup> Nihil est quod credere de se Non possit, eam landatur diis acqua potessas.

never was reproachable for letting poetry interfere to the prejudice of his great affairs, or that it made him less active and diligent on any important occasion.

I have already faid, that this prince, in an interval of . peace, had fent his brother Thearides to Olympia, to difpute the prizes of poetry and the chariot-race in his name. When he arrived in the affembly, the beauty as well as number of his chariots, and the magnificence of his pavilion, embroidered with gold and filver, attracted the eyes and admiration of all the spectators. The ear was no less charmed when the poems of Dionysius began to be read. He had chofen expressly for the occasion * readers, with sonorous, musical. voices, who might be heard far and diffinctly, and who knew how to give a just emphasis and numerosity to the verses they repeated. At first this had a very happy effect, and the whole audience were deceived by the art and fweetness of the pronunciation. But that charm was foon at an end, and the mind not long amused by the ears. The verses then appeared in all their ridicule. The audience were ashamed of having applauded them; and their praise was turned into laughter, fcorn, and infult. To express their contempt and indignation, they tore Dionysius's rich pavilion in pieces. Lycias, the celebrated orator, who was come to the Olympic games to dispute the prize of eloquence, which he had carried several times before, undertook to prove, that it was inconfifent with the honour of Greece, the friend and afferter of liberty, to admit an impious tyrant to share in the celebration of the facred games, who had no other thoughts than of subjecting all Greece to his power. Dionysius was not affronted in that manner then; but the event proved as little in his favour. His chariots having entered the lifts, were all of them either carried out of the course by an headlong impetuolity, or dashed in pieces against one another. And to complete the misfortune, the galley, which carried the perfons Dioysius had fent to the games, met with a violent storm, and did not return to Syracuse without great difficulty; when the pilots arrived there, out of hatred and contempt for the tyrant, they reported throughout the city, that it was his vile poems, which had occasioned so many miscarriages to the readers, racers, and even the ship itself. This bad success did not at all discourage Dionysius, nor make him abate any thing in his high opinion of his poetic vein. The flatterers, who abounded in his court, did not fail to infinuate, that such injurious treatment of his poems could proceed only from envy, which always fastens upon what is most excellent; and that sooner or later the invidious themselves would be convinced by demonstration, to do justice to his merit, and acknowledge his superiority to all other poets.

e Diod. l. xiv. p. 318.

* Thefa readers were called Put offi.

f The extravagance of Dionysius in that respect was inconceivable. He was undoubtedly a great warrior, and an excellent captain; but he fancied himself a much better poet, and believed that his verses were a far greater honour to him than all his victories. To attempt to undeceive him in an opinion so favourable to himself, had been an ill way of making court to him; so that all the learned men and poets, who eat at his table in great numbers, seemed to be in an extacy of admiration, whenever he read them his poems. Never, according to them, was there any comparison: All was great, all noble in his poetry: All was majestic, or, to speak more properly, all divine.

Philoxenus was the only one of all the tribe, who did not run with the stream into excessive praise and statery. He was a man of great reputation, and excelled in Dithyrambic poetry. There is a story told of him, which Fontaine has known how to apply admirably. Being at table with Dionysius, and seeing a very small sish set before him, and a huge one before the king, the whim took him to lay his ear close to the little sish. He was asked his meaning for that pleasantry: "I was "inquiring," said he, "into some affairs that happened in "the reign of Nereus; but this young native of the sloods "can give me no information; yours is elder, and without "doubt knows something of the matter."

Dionysius having read one day some of his verses to Philoxenus, and having pressed him to give him his opinion of them, he answered with entire freedom, and told him plainly his real sentiments. Dionysius, who was not accustomed to such language, was extremely offended; and ascribing his boldness to envy, gave orders to carry him to the mines; the common jail being so called. The whole court were afflicted upon this account, and solicited for the generous prisoner, whose release they obtained. He was enlarged the next day, and restored to favour.

At the entertainment made that day by Dionysius for the fame guests, which was a kind of ratification of the pardon, and at which they were for that reason more than usually gay and cheerful; after they had plentifully regaled a great while, the prince did not fail to introduce his poems into the converfation, which were the most frequent subject of it. He chose some passages, which he had taken extraordinary pains in composing, and conceived to be masterpieces, as was very difcernible from the felf-fatisfaction and complacency he expreffed whilft they were reading. But his delight could not be perfect without Philoxenus's approbation; upon which he fet the greater value, as it was not his custom to be so profuse of it as the rest. What had passed the evening before was a sufficient lesson for the poet. When Dionysius asked his thoughts of the verses, Philoxenus made no answer; but turning towards the guards, who always stood round the table, he faid in a ferious, though humourous tone, without any emotion; " Carry me back to the mines *." The prince took all the falt and spirit of that ingenious pleasantry, without being offended. The sprightliness of the conceit attoned for its freedom, which at another time would have touched him to the quick, and made him excessively angry. He only laughed at it now, and did not make a quarrel of it with the poet.

He was not in the same temper upon a gross jest of Antiphon's, which was indeed of a different kind, and seemed to argue a violent and brutal disposition. The prince in converfation asked, which was the best kind of brass. After the company had given their opinions, Antiphon said, that was the best of which the statues of *Hermodius and Aristogiton were made. This witty expressions, if it may be called so, cost him his life.

Τότε μλο διὰ σὸν εὐσηματλίων σῶν λέγων μειδήσας ὁ Διονόσως, ἡτιγκε σὴν παρρησίων τὰ γίλωτος σὸν μάμψεν ἄμελίνωντος.

The friends of Philoxenus, apprehending that his too great liberty might be also attended with fatal consequences, represented to him in the most serious manner, that those who live with princes must speak their language; that they hate to hear any thing not agreeable to themselves; that whoever does not know how to dissemble, is not qualified for a court; that the favours and liberalities which Dionysius continually bestowed upon them, well deserved the return of complaisance; that, in a word, with his blunt freedom, and plain truth, he was in danger of losing not only his fortune, but his life. Philoxenus told them, that he would take their good advice, and for the future give such a turn to his answers, as should fatisfy Dionysius without injuring truth.

Accordingly fome time after, Dionysius having read a piece of his composing upon a very mournful subject, wherein he was to move compassion and draw tears from the eyes of the audience, addressed himself again to Philoxenus, and asked him his sentiments upon it. Philoxenus gave him for answer one word h, which in the Greek language has two different significations. In one of them it implies mournful, moving things, such as inspire sentiments of pity and compassion: In the other, it expresses something very mean, desective, pitiful, and miserable. Dionysius, who was fond of his verses, and believed that every body must have the same good opinion of them, took that word in the savourable construction, and was extremely satisfied with Philoxenus. The rest of the company were not mistaken, but understood it in the right sense, though without explaining themselves.

Nothing could cure his folly for verification. It appears from Diodorus Siculus , that having fent his poems a fecond time to Olympia, they were treated with the fame ridicule and contempt as before. That news, which could not be kept from him, threw him into an excefs of melancholy, which he could never get over, and turned foon after into a kind of madnefs and phrenzy. He complained that envy and jealoufy, the certain enemies of true merit, were always at variance with him, and that all the world confpired to the ruin of his reputation. He accused his best friends with the same defign; some of whom he put to death, and others he banished; amongst whom were Leptinus his brother, and Philistus, who had done him such great services, and to whom he was obliged for his power. They retired to Thurium in Italy, from whence they were recalled some time after, and reinstated in all their fortunes, and his favour: Leptinus, in particular, who married Dionysius's daughter.

T iij

<sup>8</sup> Plut. Moral. p. 78, et 833. h Olarea. i Pag. 332.

. They had delivered Athens from the tyranny of the Pilistratides.

*To remove his melancholy for the ill success of his verses, it was necessary to find fome employment, with which his wars and buildings fupplied him. He had formed a defign of establishing powerful colonies in the part of Italy situated upon the Adriatic sea facing Epirus; in order that his fleet might not want a fecure retreat, when he should employ his forces on that fide; and with this view he made an alliance with the Illyrians, and reflored Alcetes king of the Molossians to his throne. His principal defign was to attack Epirus, and to make himself master of the immense treasures, which had been for many ages amassing in the temple of Delphos. Before he could fet this project on foot, which required great preparations, he feemed to make an effay of his genius for it, by another of the fame kind, though of much more eafy execution. Having made a fudden irruption into Tufcany, under the pretence of purfuing pirates, he plundered a very rich temple in the fuburbs of Agylum, a city of that country, and carried away a fum exceeding four millions five hundred thoufand livres *. He had occasion for money to support his great expences at Syracuse, as well in fortifying the port, and to make it capable of receiving two hundred gallies, as to inclose

k Diod 1 xv. p. 336, 337

* Fifteen hundred talents, or about L. 200,000 Sterling.

the whole city with good walls, erect magnificent temples, and build a place of exercife upon the banks of the river Anapus.

m At the fame time he formed the design of driving the Carthaginians entirely out of Sicily. A first victory which he gained, put him almost into a condition to accomplish his project; but the loss of a second battle, in which his brother Leptinus was killed, put an end to his hopes, and obliged him to enter into a treaty, by which he gave up several towns to the Carthaginians, and paid them great sums of money to reimburse their expences in the war. An attempt which he made upon them some years after, taking advantage of the desolation occasioned by the plague at Carthage, had no better success.

Another victory of a very different kind, though not less at his heart, made him amends, or at least comforted him for the ill fuccess of his arms. He had caused a tragedy of his to be represented at Athens for the prize in the celebrated feath of Bacchus, and was declared victor. Such a victory with the Athenians, who were the best judges of this kind of literature, scems to argue the poetry of Dionysius not so mean and pitiful, and that it is very possible, the aversion of the Greeks for every thing which came from a tyrant, had a great share in the contemptuous sentence passed upon his poems in the Olympic games. However it was, Dionyfius received the news with inexpressible transports of joy. Public thanksgivings were made to the gods, the temples being scarce capable of containing the concourse of the people. Nothing was seen throughout the city, but feafting and rejoicing; and Dionysius regaled all his friends with the most extraordinary magnificence. Self-satisfied to a degree that cannot be described, he believed himself at the fummit of glory, and did the honours of his table with a gaiety and eafe, and at the fame time with a grace and dignity that charmed all the world. He invited his guests to eat and drink more by his example than expressions, and carried his civilities of that kind to fuch an excess, that at the close of the Danquet he was feized with violent pains, occasioned by an indigestion, of which it was not difficult to foresee the consequences.

Opinyfius had three children by his wife Doris, and four by Aristomache, of which two were daughters, the one named Sophrofyne, the other Arete. Sophrofyne was married to his eldest fon, Dionyfius the younger, whom he had by his Locrian wife, and Arete espoused her brother Theorides. But Theorides dying soon, Dion matried his widow Arete, who was his own niece.

As Dionysius's distemper lest no hopes of his life, Dion took upon him to discourse him upon his children by Aristomache, who were at the same time his brothers-in-law and nephews, and to infinuate to him, that it was just to prefer the issue of his Syracusan wise to that of a stranger. But the physicians, desirous of making their court to young Dionysius, the Locrian's son, for whom the throne was intended, did not give him time to alter his purpose: For Dionysius having demanded a medicine to make him sleep, they gave him so strong a dose, as quite stupised him, and laid him in a sleep that lasted him for the rest of his life. He had reigned thirty-eight years.

He was certainly a prince of very great political and military abilities, and had occasion for them all in raising himself as he did from a mean condition to so high a rank. After having held the sovereignty thirty-eight years, he transmitted it peaceably to a successor of his own issue and election; and had established his power upon such solid soundations, that his son, notwithstanding the slenderness of his capacity for governing, retained it twelve years after his death. All which could not have been effected without a great fund of merit as to his capacity. But what qualities could cover the vices, which rendered him the object of his subjects abhorence? His ambition knew neither law nor limitation; his avarice spared nothing, not even the most facred places; his cruelty had often no regard to the assimity of blood; and his open and professed impliety only acknowledged the divinity to infult him.

In his return to Syacuse with a very savourable wind from plundering the temple of Proserpine at Loeris, "See," said he to his friends with a fmile of contempt, "how the immortal gods "favour the navigation of the facrilegious."

Plut. in Dion. p. 960.

P Having occasion for money to carry on the war against the Carthaginians, he risted the temple of Jupiter, and took from that god a robe of solid gold, which ornament Hiero the tyrant had given him out of the spoils of the Carthaginians. He even jested upon that occasion, saying, that a robe of gold was much too heavy in summer, and too cold in winter; and at the same time ordered one of wool to be thrown over the god's shoulders; adding, that such an habit would be commodious in all seasons.

Another time he ordered the golden beard of Æculapius of Epidaurus to be taken off; giving for his reason, that it was very inconsistent for the son to have a beard *, when the father had none.

He caused all the tables of filver to be taken out of the temples; and as there was generally inscribed upon them, according to the custom of the Greeks, TO THE GOOD GODS; he would, he said, take the benefit of their GOODNESS.

As for lefs prizes, fuch as cups and crowns of gold, which the statues held in their hands, those he carried off without any ceremony; saying, it was not taking, but receiving them; and that it was idle and ridiculous to ask the gods perpetually for good things, and to refuse them, when they held out their hands themselves to present them to you. These spoils were carried by his order to the market, and sold at the public sale: And when he had got the money for them, he ordered proclamation to be made, that whoever had in their custody any things taken out of sacred places, should restore them entire within a limited time to the temples from whence they were brought; adding in this manner to his impiety to the gods, injustice to man.

The amazing precautions that Dionysius thought necessary to the security of his life, shew to what anxiety and apprehension he was abandoned. <sup>9</sup> He wore under his robe a cuirass of brass. He never harangued the people but from the top of an high tower; and thought proper to make himself invulnerable by being inaccessible. Not daring to confide in any of his friends or relations, his guard was composed of flaves and ffrangers. He went abroad as little as possible; fear obliging him to condemn himself to a kind of imprisonment. These extraordinary precautions regard without doubt, certain intervals of his reign, when frequent conspiracies against him rendered him more timid and fuspicious than usual; for at other times we have feen that he converfed freely enough with the people, and was accessible even to familiarity. In those dark days of distrust and fear, he fancied that he saw all mankind in arms against him. A word which escaped his barber. who boafted, by way of jeft, that he held a razor at the tyrant's throat every week, cost him his life. From thenceforth, not to abandon his head and life to the hands of a barber, he made his daughters, though very young, do him that despicable office; and when they were more advanced in years, he took the feiffars and razors from them, and taught them to finge off his beard with nut-shells. 'He was at last reduced to do himself that office, not daring, it seems, to trust his own daughters any longer. He never went into the chamber of his wives at night, till they had been first searched with the utmost care and circumspection. His bed was furrounded with a very broad and deep trench, with a fmall draw-bridge over it for the entrance. After having well locked and bolted the doors of his apartment, he drew up the bridge, that he might sleep in fecurity. 'Neither his brother, nor even his fons, could be admitted into his chamber without first changing their clothes, and being vifited by the guards. Is passing one's days in fuch a continual circle of diffrust and terror, to live, to reign?

P Cic. de Nat. Deor. 1. xv. n. 83, 84. 1 Cic. Tufc. Quaest. I. v. n. 57, 63.

* Appollo's statues had no beards.

In the midft of all his greatness, possessed of riches, and surrounded with pleasures of every kind, during a reign of almost forty years, notwithstanding all his presents and profusions, he never was capable of making a single friend. He passed his life with none but trembling slaves and fordid slatterers, and never tasted the joy of loving, or of being beloved.

Plut. de gareul. p. 508. S Cic, de offic. l. ii. n. 55, t Plut. in Dion. p. 96 t.

nor the charms of focial truth and reciprocal confidence. This he owned himself upon an accasion not unworthy of repetition.

" Damon and Pythias had both been educated in the principles of the Pythagorean philosophy, and were united to each other in the strictest ties of friendship, which they had mutually fworn to observe with inviolable fidelity. Their faith was put to a fevere trial. One of them being condemned to die by the tyrant, petitioned for permission to make a journey into his own country, to fettle his affairs, promising to return at a fixed time; the other generoully offering to be his fecurity. The courtiers, and Dionysius in particular, expected with impatience the event of fo delicate and extraordinary an adventure. The day fixed for his return drawing nigh, and he not appearing, every body began to blame the rash and imprudent zeal of his friend who had bound himself in such a manner. But he, far from expressing any fear or concern. replied with tranquility in his looks, and confidence in his expressions, that he was assured his friend would return; as he accordingly did upon the day and hour agreed. The tyrant, firuck with admiration at fo uncommon an inftance of fidelity, and foftened with the view of fo amiable an union. granted him his life, and defired to be admitted as a third perfon into their friendship.

* He expressed with equal ingenuity on another occasion what he thought of his condition. One of his courtiers, named Damocles, was perpetually extolling with rapture his treafures, grandeur, the number of his troops, the extent of his dominious, the magnificence of his palaces, and the universal abundance of all good things and enjoyments in his possession; always repeating that never man was happier than Dionysius. "Because you are of that opinion," said the tyrant to him one day, "will you taste, and make proof of my selicity in "person?" The offer was accepted with joy. Damocles was placed upon a golden bed, covered with carpets of inestimable value. The side boards were loaded with vessels of gold and filver. The most beautiful slaves in the most splendid habits flood around, watching the least fignal to serve him. The most exquisite essences and perfumes had not been spared. The table was spread with proportionate magnificence. Damocles was all joy, and looked upon himself as the happiest man in the world; when, unfortunately casting up his eyes, he beheld over his head the point of a sword, which hung from the roof only by a single horse-hair. He was immediately seized with a cold sweat; every thing disappeared in an instant; he could see nothing but the sword, nor think of any thing but his danger. In the height of his sear he desired permission to retire, and declared he would be happy no longer: A very natural image of the life of a tyrant. Ours reigned, as I have observed before, thirty-eight years.

u Cic. de offic. l. iii. n. 43. Val. Max. l. iv, c. 7.

* Cic. Tufc. Quaeft. 1. v. n. 61, 62.

CHAPTER II.

This chapter includes the history of Dionysius the younger, tyrant of Syracuse, son of the sormer; and that of Dion his near relation.

SECTION I.

DIONYSIUS the Younger succeeds his FATHER. He invites PLATO to his COURT.

Dionysius the elder was fucceeded by one of his sons of his own name, commonly called Dionysius the Younger. After his father's funeral had been solemnized with the utmost magnificence, he assembled the people, and desired they would have the same good inclinations for him as they had professed for his father. They were very different from each other in their character: 2 For the latter was as peaceable and calm in his disposition, as the former was active and enterprising; which would have been no disadvantage to his people, had that mikiness and moderation been the effect of a wise and judicious understanding, and not of natural sloth and indolence of temper.

It was furprifing to fee Dionyfius the younger take quiet

<sup>7</sup> A. M. 3632. Ant. J. C. 372. Died. l. xv. p. 389.

<sup>4</sup> Id. 1. xvi. p. 410.

possession of the tyranny after the death of his father, as of a right of inheritance, notwithstanding the passion of the Syraculans for liberty, which could not but revive upon fo favourable an occasion, and the weakness of a young prince undistinguished by his merit, and void of experience. It seemed as if the last years of the elder Dionysius, who had applied himself towards the close of his life in making his subjects taste the advantages of his government, had in some measure reconciled them to the tyranny; especially after his exploits by sea and land had acquired him a great reputation, and infinitely exalted the glory of the Syracnian power, which he had found means to render formidable to Carthage itself, as well as to the most potent states of Greece and Italy. Besides which it was to be feared, that should they attempt a change in the government, the fad consequences of a civil war might deprive them of all those advantages: And at the same time the gentle and humane disposition of young Dionysius gave them reason to entertain the most favourable hopes of the future. He therefore peaceably afcended his father's throne,

England has feen fomething of this kind in the famous Cromwell, who died in his bed with as much tranquility as the best of princes, and was interred with the same honours and pomp as the most lawful sovereign. Richard his son succeeded him, and was for some time in equal authority with his father, though he had not any of his great qualities.

<sup>2</sup> Dion, the braveft, and at the fame time the wifest of the Syracusans, Dionysus's brother-in-law, might have been of great support to him, had he known how to make use of his counsels. In the first assembly held by Dionysus and all his friends, Dion spoke in so wise a manner upon what was necessary and expedient in the present conjuncture, as shewed that the rest were like infants in comparison with him, and in regard to a just boldness and freecom of speech, were no more than despicable slaves of the tyranny, solely employed in the abject endeavour of pleasing the prince. But what surprised and amazed them most was, that Dion, at a time when the whole court were struck with terror at the prospect of the storm forming on the side of Carthage, and just ready to break upon Sicily, should insist, that if Dionysius desired peace, he would embark immediately for Africa, and dispel this tempest to his fatisfaction; or if he preferred the war, that he would furnish and maintain him sifty galleys of three benches completely equipped for service.

Dionyfius admiring and extolling his generous magnanimity to the fkies, professed the highest gratitude to him for his zeal and affection; but the courtiers, who looked upon Dion's magnificence as a reproach to themselves, and his great power as a lessening of their own, took immediate occasion from thence to calumniate him, and spared no discourse that might influence the young prince against him. They infinuated, that in making himself strong at sea, he would open his way to the tyranny; and that he designed to transport the sovereignty on board his vessels to his nephews, the sons of Aristomache.

But what put them most out of humour with Dion, was his manner of life, which was a continual reproach to theirs. For these courtiers having presently infinuated themselves, and got the afcendant of the young tyrant, who had been wretchedly educated, thought of nothing but of supplying him perpetually with new amusements, keeping him always employed in feastind, abandoned to women and all manner of snameful pleafures. b In the beginning of his reign he made a debauch which continued for three months entire; during all which time, his palace, shut against all persons of sense and reason, was crowded with drunkards, and refounded with nothing but low buffoonery, obscene jests, lewd fongs, dances, masquerades, and every kind of gross and dissolute extravagance. It is therefore natural to believe, that nothing could be more offensive and difgusting to them than the presence of Dion, who gave into none of these pleasures. For which reason, painting his virtues in fuch of the colours of vice as were most likely to difguise them, they found means to calumniate him with the prince, and to make his gravity pass for arrogance, and his freedom of speech for insolence and sedition. If he advanced any wife counfel, they treated him as a four pedagogue, who took upon him to obtrude his lectures, and to school his prince without being asked; and if he refused to share in the debauch with the rest, they called him a man-hater, a splenetic melancholy wretch, who from the fantastic height of virtue looked down with contempt on the rest of the world, of whom he fet himself up for the censor.

b Athen. l. x. p. 435.

And indeed it must be confessed, that he had naturally something auftere and rigid in his manners and behaviour, which feemed to argue an haughtiness of nature, very capable not only of disgusting a young prince, nurtured from his infancy amidst flatteries and submissions, but the best of his friends. and those who were most nearly attached to him. Full of admiration for his integrity, fortitude, and nobleness of sentiments, they represented to him, that for a statesman, who ought to know how to adapt himself to the different tempers of men, and how to apply them to his purposes, his humour was much too rough and forbidding. c Plato afterwards took pains to correct that defect in him, by making him intimate with a philosopher of a gay and polite turn of mind, whose conversation was very proper to inspire him with more easy and infinuating manners. He observes also upon that failing, in a letter to him, wherein he speaks to this effect: " Consider, I " beg you, that you are cenfured of being deficient in point " of good nature and affability; and be entirely affured, that " the most certain means to the success of affairs, is to be " agreeable to the persons with whom we have to transact, " An * haughty carriage keeps people at a distance, and re-" duces a man to pass his life in solitude." Notwithstanding this defect, he continued to be highly confidered at court; where his fuperior abilities and transcendent merit made him absolutely necessary, especially at a time when the state was threatened with great danger and emergency.

<sup>d</sup> As he believed that all the vices of young Dionyfius were the effect of his bad education, and entire ignorance of his duty,

c Plat. Epift. iv.

d Plut. in Dion. p. 662. Plat, Epift. vii. 327, 328.

&quot; 'He audanua iompia corones. M. Dacier renders these words, " Pride is always the companion of solitude." I have shown elsewhere wherein this rection is faulty. Art of teaching the Belles Letters, vol. 3. p. 505.

he conceived justly, that the best remedy would be to associate him if possible with persons of wit and sense, whose solid, but agreeable conversation, might at once instruct and divert him: For the prince did not naturally want parts and genius.

The fequel will shew that Dionysius the younger had a natural propenlity to what was good and virtuous, and a taste and capacity for arts and sciences. He knew how to set a value upon the merit and talents by which men are distinguished. He delighted in converfing with persons of ability; and from his correspondence with them, made himself capable of the highest improvements. He went so far as to familiarize the throne with the sciences, which of themselves have little or no access to it; and by rendering them in a manner his favourites, he gave them courage to make their appearance in courts. His protection was the patent of nobility, by which he raifed them to honour and diffinction. Nor was he infenfible to the joys of friendship. In private, he was a good parent, relation and mafter, and acquired the affection of all that approached him. He was not naturally inclined to violence or cruelty; and it might be faid of him, that he was rather a tyrant by succession and inheritance, than by temper and inclination.

All which demonstrates, that he might have made a very tolerable prince (not to say a good one), had an early and proper care been taken to cultivate the happy disposition which he brought into the world with him. But his father, to whom all merit, even in his own children, gave umbrage, industriously suppressed in him all tendency to goodness, and every noble and elevated sentiment, by a base and obscure education, with the view of preventing his attempting any thing against himself. It was therefore necessary to find a person of the character before mentioned, or rather to inspire himself with the defire of having such an one found.

This was what Dion laboured with wonderful addrefs. He often talked to him of Plato, as the most profound and illustrious of philosophers, whose merit he had experienced, and to whom he was obliged for all he knew. He enlarged upon the elevation of his genius, the extent of his knowledge, the amiableness of his character, and the charms of his converfation. He represented him particularly as the man of the world most capable of forming him in the arts of governing, upon which his own and the people's happiness depended. He told him, that his subjects, governed for the future with lenity and indulgence, as a good father governs his family; would voluntarily render that obedience to his moderation and justice, which force and violence extorted from them against their will; and that by such a conduct he would, from a tyrant, become a just king, to whom all submission would be paid out of affection and gratitude.

Volume IV.

It is incredible how much these discourses, introduced in conversation from time to time, as if by accident, without affectation, or the appearance of any premeditated defign, inflamed the young prince with the defire of knowing and converfing with Plato. He wrote to him in the most importunate and obliging manner to that purpose; he dispatched couriers after couriers to hasten his voyage; whilst Plato, who apprehended the confequences, and had fmall hopes of any good effect of it, protracted the affair, and without absolutely refuling, fufficiently intimated, that he could not refolve upon it, without doing violence to himfelf. The obstacles and difficulties, made to the young prince's request, were fo far from difgusting him, that they only served, as it commonly happens, to inflame his defire. The Pythagorean philosophers of Graecia Major in Italy joined their entreaties with his and Dion's, who on his part redoubled his instances, and used the strongest arguments to conquer Plato's repugnance. " This is not," faid he, " the concern of a private person, but of a powerful " prince, whose change of manners will have the same effect " throughout his whole dominion, with the extent of which " you are not unacquainted. It is himself who makes all " these advances; who importunes and folicits you to come " to his affiftance, and employs the interest of all your friends " to that purpole. What more favourable conjuncture could " we expect from the divine providence than that which now " offers itself? Are you not afraid that your delays will give him to change his resolution? What reproaches would you

"the flatterers who furround the young prince, the opportunity of drawing him over to themselves, and of seducing

" not make yourfelf, and what dishonour would it not be to " philosophy, should it ever be faid, that Plato, whose coun-

" fels to Dionysius might have established a wife and equitable government in Sicily, abandoned it to all the evils of tyran-" ny, rather than undergo the fatigues of a voyage, or from

" I know not what other imaginary difficulties?"

e Plato could not refift folicitations of fo much force. Vanquished by the confideration of his own character, and to obviate the reproach of his being a philosopher in words only, without having ever shewn himself such in his actions, and conscious besides of the great advantages which Sicily might acquire from his voyage, he suffered himself to be persuaded.

The flatterers of the court of Dionyfius, terrified with the resolution he had taken, contrary to their remonstrances, and fearing the presence of Plato, of which they foresaw the confequences, united together against him as their common enemy. They rightly judged, that if, according to the new maxims of government, all things were to be measured by the ftandard of true merit, and no favour to be expected from the prince, but for the fervices done the flate, they had nothing further to expect, and might wait their whole lives at court to no manner of purpole. They therefore spared no pains to render Plato's voyage ineffectual, though they were not able to prevent it. They prevailed upon Dionyfius to recal Philiftus from banishment, who was not only an able foldier, but a great historian, very eloquent and learned, and a zealous afferter of the tyranny. They hoped to find a counterpoise in him against Plato and his philosophy. Upon his being banished by Dionyfius the elder, on some personal discontent, he retired into the city of Adria, where it was believed he composed the greatest part of his writings. f He wrote the history of Egypt in twelve books, that of Sicily in eleven, and of Dionysius the tyrant in fix; all which works are entirely loft. Cicero praifes him * much, and calls him Thucydides the Lefs, "pene pufil"lus Thucydides," to fignify that he copied after that author not unhappily. The courtiers at the fame time made complaints against Dion to Dionysius, accusing him of having held conferences with Herodotus and Heraclides, the secret enemies of that prince, upon measures for subverting the tyranny.

E This was the state of affairs when Plato arrived in Sicily. He was received with infinite caresses, and with the highest marks of honour and respect. Upon his landing, he found one of the prince's chariots, equally magnificent in its horses and ornaments, attending upon him. The tyrant offered a facrifice, as if some singular instance of good fortune had befallen him; nor was he missaken, for a wife man, who is capable of giving a prince good counsels, is a treasure of inestimable value to a whole nation. But the worth of such a person is rarely known, and more rarely applied to the uses which might be made of it.

Plato found the most happy dispositions imaginable in young Dionysius, who applied himself entirely to his lessons and counsels. But as he had improved infinitely from the precepts and example of Socrates his master, the most exquisite of all the pagan world, in forming the mind for a right taste of truth, he took care to adapt himself with wonderful address to the young tyrant's humour, avoiding all direct attacks upon his passions; taking pains to acquire his considence by kind and infinuating behaviour; and particularly endeavouring to render virtue amiable, and at the same time triumphant over vice, which keeps mankind in its chains, by the sole force of allurements, pleasures, and voluptuousness.

The change was sudden and surprising. The young prince, who had abandoned himself till then to idleness, pleasure and luxury, and was ignorant of all the duties of his character, the inevitable consequence of a dissolute life, awaking as from g Plut. in Dion. p.

Uii

&lt;sup>a</sup> Hune (Thucydidem) confecutus est Syrecusus Philistus, qui cam Dionysii tyranni familiarissimus esset, otium suum consumpsit in historia seribenda, maximeque Thucididem est, sicut mihi videtur, imitatus. Cic. de orat. I. ii. n. 57.

Siculus ille creber, acutus, brevis, pene pufillus Thycydides. Id. epift. xiii. ad Q. frat. l. ii.

a lethargic sleep, began to open his eyes, to have some idea of the beauty of virtue, and to relish the refined pleasure of conversation equally solid and agreeable. He was now as passionately fond of learning and instruction, as he had once been averse and repugnant to them. The court, which always apes the prince, and falls in with his inclinations in every thing, entered into the same way of thinking. The apartments of the palace, like so many schools of geometry, were full of the dust made use of by the professors of that science in tracing their sigures; and in a very short time the study of philosophy, and of every kind of literature, became the reigning and universal tasse.

The great benefit of these studies in regard to a prince, does not consist alone in storing his mind with an infinity of the most curious, useful, and often necessary notions of things, but has the further advantage of abstracting himself from idleness, indolence, and the frivolous amusements of a court; of habituating him to a life of application and resection; of inspiring him with a passion to inform himself in the duties of the sovereignty, and to know the characters of such as have excelled in the art of reigning; in a word, of making himself capable of governing the state in his own person, and of seeing every thing with his own eyes; that is to say, to be indeed a king; but that the courtiers and slatterers are almost always unanimous in opposing.

They were considerably alarmed by a word that escaped Dionysius, and shewed how much he was affected with the discourses he had heard upon the happiness of a king, regarded with tender affection by his people as their common father, and the wretched condition of a tyrant, whom they abhor and detest. Some days after Plato's arrival, was the anniversary, on which a solemn facrifice was offered in the palace for the prince's prosperity. The herald having prayed to this effect, according to custom, "That it would please the gods to sup-" port the tyranny, and preserve the tyrant:" Dionysius, who was not far from him, and to whom these terms began to grow odious, called out to him aloud, "Will you not give over

"curfing me?" Philiftus and his party were infinitely alarmed at that expression, and judged from it, that time and habit must give Plato an invincible ascendant over Dionysius, if the correspondence of a few days could so entirely alter his disposition. They therefore set themselves at work upon new and more effectual stratagems against him.

They began by turning the retired life which Dionysius led with Plato, and the studies in which he employed himself, into ridicule, as if intended to make a philosopher of him. But that was not all; they laboured in concert to render the zeal of Dion and Plato suspected, and even odious to him. They represented them as * impertinent censors and imperious pedagogues, who assumed an authority over him, which neither consisted with his age nor rank. † It is no wonder that a young prince like Dionysius, who, with the most excellent natural parts, and amidst the best examples, would have found it dissicult to have supported himself, should at length give way to such artful infinuations in a court, that had long been insected, where there was no emulation but to excel in vice, and where he was continually besieged by a crowd of statterers incessantly praising and admiring him in every thing.

But the principal application of the courtiers was to decry the character and conduct of Dion himself; not separately, nor in the method of whisper, but all together, and in public. They talked openly, and to whoever would give them the hearing, that it was visible, Dion made use of Plato's eloquence to infinuate and enchant Dionysius, with a design to draw him into a voluntary resignation of the throne, that he might take possession of it for his nephews, the children of Aristomache, and establish them in the sovereignty. They added, that it was very extraordinary and afflicting, that the Athenians, who had formerly invaded Sicily with great forces both by sea and land, which had all perished there without being able to take

* Fristes et superciliosos alienae vitae censores, publicos paedagogos. Sen, epist, exxiii.

† Vix artibus honestis pudor retinetur, nedum iter certamina vitiorum pudicitia, aut modestia, aut quidquam probi moris servaretur. Tacit, annal, l, iv, c. 15.

Syracufe, should now with a fingle sophist attain their point, and subvert the tyranny of Dionysius, by persuading him to dismiss the ten thousand strangers of his guard; to lay aside his sleet of four hundred gallies, which he always kept in readiness for service; and to disband his ten thousand horse, and the greatest part of his foot; for the sake of going to find in the academy, the place where Plato taught, a pretended supreme good not explicable, and to make himself happy in imagination by the study of geometry, whilst he abandoned to Dion and his nephews a real and substantial selicity, consisting in empire, riches, luxury, and pleasure.

SECTION II.

BANISHMENT of DION.

THE courtiers, intent upon making the best use of every favourable moment, perpetually befieged the young prince, and covering their fecret motives under the appearance of zeal for his fervice, and an affected moderation in regard to Dion, inceffantly advised him to take proper measures for the security of his life and throne. Such repeated discourses soon raised in the mind of Dionysius the most violent suspicions of Dion, which prefently increasad into fierce resentment, and broke out in an open rupture. Letters were privately brought to Dionyfins, written by Dion to the Carthaginian ambaffadors, wherein he tells them, "That when they should treat of peace " with Dionysius, he would advise them not to open the con-" ferences but in his prefence; because he would affist them " in making their treaty more firm and lafting." Dionyfius read theie letters to Philiftus; and having concerted with him what measures to take, h he amused Dion with the appearance of a reconciliation, and led him alone to the fea fide below the citadel, where he shewed him his letters, and accused him of having entered into a league against him with the Carthaginians. Dion would have justified himself, but he resuled to hear him, and made him immediately go on board a brigantine, which had orders to carry him to the coast of Italy, and to leave him there. Dion immediately after fet fail for Peloponnesus.

i So hard and unjust a treatment could not fail of making abundance of noise, and the whole city declared against it; especially as it was reported, though without soundation, that Plato had been put to death. b Dionysius, who apprehended the consequences, took pains to appease the public discontent, and to obviate complaints. He gave Dion's relations two vessels to transport to him in Peloponnesus his riches and numerous family; for he had the equipage of a king.

As foon as Dion was gone, Dionyfius made Plato change his lodging, and brought him into the citadel; in appearance to do him honour, but in reality to affure himself of his person, and prevent him from going to join Dion. In bringing Plato near to him, he might also have in view the opportunity of hearing him more frequently and more commodiously. For, charmed with the delights of his conversation, and studious of pleafing him in every thing, and to merit his affection, he had conceived an esteem, or rather passion for him, which rose even to jealoufy, but a jealoufy of that violence, that could fuffer neither companion nor rival. He was for ingroffing him entirely to himself, for reigning solely in his thoughts and affections, and for being the only object of his love and esteem: he feemed content to give him all his treasures and authority. provided he would but love him better than Dion, and not prefer the latter's friendship to his. Plutarch has reason to call this passion a tyrannic affection*. Plato had much to suffer from it; for it had all the fymptoms of the most ardent jealoufy. + Sometimes it was all friendship, carelles, and fond respect, with an unbounded effusion of heart, and an endless fwell of tender fentiments: Sometimes it was all reproaches, menaces, fierce passion, and wild emotion; and soon after, it

i Plat. p. 964.

k Plat. epift. vii.

U iiii

* Ηράσθη συράννικον ερωτα.

+ In amore hace omnia infunt vitia; fuspiciones, inimicitiae, injuriae, inducine, bellum, pax rutsum. Terent, in Eunuch.

In amore hace funt mala, bellum, pax rurfum. Horat.

funk into repentance, excuses, tears, and humble entreaties of pardon and forgiveness.

About this time a war broke out very conveniently for Plato, which obliged Dionysius to restore him his liberty, and send him home. At his departure, he would have laden him with presents; but Plato resuled them; contenting himself with his promise to recall Dion the following spring. He did not keep his word, and only sent him his revenues, desiring Plato in his letters to excuse his breach of promise at the time presixed, and to impute it only to the war. He affured him, as soon as peace should be concluded, that Dion should return; upon condition, however, that he should continue quiet, and not intermeddle in assairs, nor endeavour to lessen him in the opinion of the Greeks.

Plato, in his return to Greece, went to fee the games at Olympia, where he happened to lodge amongst strangers of distinction. He eat and passed whole days with them, behaving himself in a plain and simple manner, without ever mentioning Socrates or the academy, or making himself known in any thing, except that his name was Plato. The strangers were overjoyed with having met with fo kind and amiable a companion; but as he never talked of any thing out of common conversation, they had not the least notion, that he was the philosopher whose reputation was so universal. When the games were over, they went with him to Athens, where he provided them with lodgings. They were scarce arrived there, when they defired him to carry them to fee the famous philosopher of his name, who had been Socrates's disciple. Plato told them, smiling, that he was the man; upon which the strangers, surprised at their having possessed so inestimable a treasure without knowing it, were much displeased with, and fecretly reproached themselves for not having discerned the great merit of the man, through the veil of fimplicity and modesty he had thrown over it; whilst they admired him the more upon that account.

m The time Dion passed at Athens was not lost. He employed it chiefly in the study of philosophy, for which he had a great taste, and which was become his passion. *He knew however, which is not very easy, to confine it within its just bounds, and never gave himself up to it at the expence of any duty. It was at the same time Plato made him contract a particular friendship with his nephew Speusippus, who, uniting the easy and infinuating manners of a courtier with the gravity of a philosopher, knew how to affociate mirth and innocent pleasure with the most serious affairs, and by that character, very rarely found amongst men of learning, was the most proper of all men to soften what was too rough and austere in the humour of Dion.

m Plut. in Dion. p 954.

Whilft Dion was at Athens, it fell to Plato's turn to give the public games, and to have tragedies performed at the feaft of Bacchus, which was ufually attended with great magnificence and expence, from an extraordinary emulation which had grown into fashion. Dion defrayed the whole charge. Plato, who was studious of all occasions of producing him to the public, was well pleased to resign that honour to him, as his magnificence might make him still better beloved and esteemed by the Athenians.

Dion visited all the other cities of Greece, where he was present at all their seasts and assemblies, and conversed with the most excellent wits, and the most prosound statesmen. He was not distinguished in company by the lostiness and pride too common in persons of his rank, but, on the contrary, by an unaffected, simple, and modest air; and especially by the elevation of his genius, the extent of his knowlege, and the wisdom of his reslections. All cities paid him the highest honours, and the Lacedaemonians declared him a citizen of Sparta, without regard to the resentment of Dionysius, tho' he actually assisted them at that time with a powerful supply in their war against the Thebans. So many marks of esteem and distinction alarmed the tyrant's jealousy. He put a stop to the remittance of Dion's revenues, and ordered them to be received by his own officers.

* Retinnitque, quod est difficillimum, ex sapientia modum. Tacit. in vit. Agric. n. 4.

" After Dionysius had put an end to the war he was engaged in in Sicily, of which history relates no circumstance, he was afraid that his treatment of Plato would prejudice the philosophers against him, and make him pass for their enemy. For this reason he invited the most learned men of Italy to his court, where he held frequent affemblies, in which, out of a foolish ambition, he endeavoured to excel them all in eloquence and profound knowledge; venting, without application, fuch of Plato's discourses as he retained. But as he had those discourses only by rote, and his heart had never been rightly affected with them, the fource of his eloquence was foon exhausted. He then perceived what he had lost by not having made a better use of that treasure of wisdom once in his own possession and under his own roof, and by not having heard, in all their extent, the admirable lectures of the greatest philosopher in the world.

As in tyrants every thing is violent and irregular, Dionysius was suddenly seized with an excessive desire of seeing Plato again, and used all means for that purpose. He prevailed upon Architas, and the other Pythagorean philosophers, to write to him, that he might return with all manner of security; and to be bound for the performance of all the promises which had been made to him. They deputed Archidemus to Plato; and Dionysius sent at the same time two gallies of three benches of rowers, with several of his friends on board, to entreat his compliance. He also wrote letters to him with his own hand, in which he frankly declared, that if he would not be persuaded to come to Sicily, Dion had nothing to expect from him; but if he came, that he might entirely dispose of every thing in his power.

Dion received several letters at the same time from his wise and sister, who pressed him to prevail upon Plato to make the voyage, and to satisfy the impatience of Dionysius, that he might have no new pretexts against him upon that account. Whatever repugnance Plato had to it, he could not resist the warm solicitations made to him, and determined to go to Sicily for the third time, at seventy years of age.

<sup>2</sup> Plat. epift vii. p. 338, 340. Plut. in Dion. p. 994, 966.

His arrival gave the whole people new hopes, who flattered themselves, that his wisdom would at length overthrow the tyranny, and the joy of Dionysius was inexpressible. He appointed the apartment of the gardens for his lodging, the most honourable in the palace, and had so much considence in him, that he suffered his access to him at all hours, without being fearched; a favour not granted to any of his best friends.

After the first caresses were over, Plato was for entering into Dion's affair, which he had much at heart, and which was the principal motive of his voyage. But Dionysius put it off at first; to which ensued complaints and murmurings, though not outwardly expressed for some time. The tyrant took great care to conceal his sentiments upon that head, endeavouring by all manner of honours, and by all possible regard and complacency, to abate his friendship for Dion. Plato dissembled on his side; and though extremely shocked at so notorious a breach of faith, he kept his opinion to himself.

Whilst they were upon these terms, and believed that nobody penetrated their secret, Helicon of Gyzicum, one of Plato's particular friends, foretold, that on a certain day there would be an eclipse of the sun; which happening according to his prediction exactly at the hour, Dionysius was so much surprised and assonished at it, a proof that he was no great philosopher, that he made him a present of a talent *. Aristippus jesting upon that occasion, said, that he had also something very incredible and extraordinary to foretell. Upon being pressed to explain himself, "I prophesy," said he, "that "it will not be long before Dionysius and Plato, who seem to "agree so well with each other, will be enemies."

Dionyfius verified this prediction; for being weary of the conftraint he laid upon himfelf, he ordered all Dion's lands and effects to be fold, and applied the money to his own use. At the same time he made Plato quit the apartments in the garden, and gave him another lodging without the castle in the midst of his guards, who had long hated him, and would have been glad of an opportunity to kill him, because he had advised Dionysius to renounce the tyranny, to break them, and to live without any other guard but the love of his people. Plato was fentible, that he owed his life to the tyrant's favour, who reftrained the fury of his guard.

Architas, the celebrated Pythagorean philosopher, who was the principal person, and supreme magistrate of Tarentum, had no sooner heard of Plato's great danger, than he sent ambassadors with a galley of thirty oars to demand him from Dionysius, and to remind him, that he came to Syracuse only upon his promise, and that of all the Pythagorean philosophers, who had engaged for his safety; that therefore he could not retain him against his will, nor suffer any insult to be done to his person, without a manifest breach of saith, and absolutely sorseiting the opinion of all honest men. These just remonstrances awakened a sense of shame in the tyrant, who at last permitted Plato to return into Greece.

OPhilosophy and wisdom abandoned the palace with him. To the conversations, as agreeable as useful, to that taste and passion for the arts and sciences, to the grave and judicious restlections of a profoundly wise politician, idle tattle, frivolous amusements, and a supid indolence, entirely averse to every thing serious or reasonable, were seen to succeed. Gluttony, drunkenness, and debauchery, resumed their empire at the court, and transformed it from the school of virtue, which it had been under Plato, into the real stable of Circe.

SECTION III.

DION fets out to deliver SYRACUSE. His DEATH.

When P Plato had quitted Sicily, Dionysius threw off all referve, and married his fister Arete, Dion's wife, to Timocrates, one of his friends. So unworthy a treatment was, in a manner, the fignal of the war. From that moment Dion resolved to attack the tyrant with open force, and to revenge himself of all the wrongs he had done him. Plato did all in his power to make him change his resolution; but sinding his endeavours inessectual, he foretold the misfortunes he was about to occasion, and declared, that he must expect neither assistance nor relief from him; that as he had been the guest and companion of Dionysius, had lodged in his palace, and joined in the same sacrifices with him, he should never forget the duties of hospitality; and at the same time, not to be wanting to his friendship for Dion, that he would continue neuter, always ready to discharge the offices of a mediator between them, though he should oppose their designs, when they tended to the destruction of each other.

Plut. in Moral p. 52.

P A. M. 3643. Ant. J. C. 361. Plut. in Diou, p. 966, 968.

Whether prudence or gratitude, or the conviction that Dion could not justifiably undertake to dethrone Dionysius; this was Plato's opinion. On the other hand, Speusippus, and all the rest of Dion's friends, perpetually exhorted him to go and restore the liberty of Sicily, which opened its arms to him, and was ready to receive him with the utmost joy. This was indeed the disposition of Syracuse, which Speusippus, during his residence there with Plato, had sufficiently experienced. This was the universal cry; whilst they importuned and conjured Dion to come thither, desiring him not to be in pain for the want of ships or troops, but only to embark in the first merchant vessel he met with, and lend his person and name to the Syracusans against Dionysius.

Dion did not hefitate any longer upon taking that refolution, which in one respect cost him not a little. From the time that Dionysius had obliged him to quit Syracuse and Sicily, he had led in his banishment the most agreeable life it was possible to imagine, for a person, who like him had contracted a taste for the delights of study. He enjoyed in peace the conversation of the philosophers, and was present at their disputations; shining in a manner entirely peculiar to himself, by the greatness of his genius, and the solidity of his judgment; going to all the cities of the learned Greece, to see and converse with the most eminent for knowledge and capacity, and to correspond with the ablest politicians; leaving every where the marks of his liberality and magnificence; equally beloved and respected by all that knew him; and receiving, wherever he came, the highest honours, which were rendered more to his merit than his birth. It was from fo happy a life that he withdrew himfelf to go to the relief of his country, which implored his protection, and to deliver it from the yoke of a tyranny under which it had long groaned.

No enterprise perhaps was ever formed with so much boldness, or conducted with so much prudence. Dion began to raife foreign troops privately by proper agents, for the better concealment of his defign. A great number of confiderable persons, and who were at the head of affairs, joined with him. But what is very furprifing, of all those the tyrant had banished, and who were no less than a thousand, only twenty-five accompanied him in this expedition; fo much had fear got possession of them. The isle of Zacynthus was the place of rendezvous, where the troops affembled, to the number of almost eight hundred; but all of them courage-proved on great occasions, excellently disciplined and robust, of an audacity and experience rarely to be found amongst the most brave and warlike; and in fine, highly capable of animating the troops which Dion was in hopes of finding in Sicily, and of fetting them the example of fighting with all the valour so noble an enterprise required.

But when they were to fet forwards, and it was known that this armament was intended against Sicily and Dionysius, for till then it had not been declared, they were all in a consternation, and repented their having engaged in the enterprise, which they could not but conceive as the effect of extreme rashness and folly, that in the last despair was for putting every thing to the hazard. Dion had occasion at this time for all his resolution and eloquence to re-animate the troops, and remove their sears. But after he had spoke to them, and with an affured though modest tone, had made them understand, that he did not lead them in this expedition as soldiers, but as officers, to put them at the head of the Syracusans, and all the people of Sicily, who had been long prepared for a revolt, their dread and sadness were changed into shouts of joy, and they desired nothing so much as to proceed on their voyage.

Dion having prepared a magnificent facrifice to be offered to

Apollo, put himself at the head of his troops completely armed, and in that equipage marched in procession to the temple. He afterwards gave a great feast to the whole company, at the end of which, after the libations and solemn prayers had been made, there happened a sudden eclipse of the moon. Dion, who was well versed in the causes of such appearances, reassured his soldiers, who were at first in some terror upon that account. The next day they embarked on board two trading vessels, which were followed by a third not so large, and by two barks of thirty oars.

<sup>q</sup> Who could have imagined, fays an historian, that a man with two merchant-vessels should ever dare to attack a prince, who had four * hundred ships of war, an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, with magazines of arms, and corn in proportion, and treasures sufficient to pay and maintain them; who, besides all this, was in possession of one of the greatest and strongest cities then in the world, with ports, arsenals, and impregnable citadels, with the additional strength and support of a great number of potent allies? The event will shew, whether force and power are adamantine chains for retaining a state in subjection, as the elder Dionysius slattered himself; or if the goodness, humanity, and justice of princes, and the love of subjects, are not infinitely stronger and more indissoluble ties.

'Dion having put to fea with his fmall body of troops, was twelve days under fail with little wind, and the thirteenth arrived at Pachynus, a cape of Sicily, about twelve or fifteen leagues from Syracufe. When they came up with that place, the pilot gave notice, that they must land directly, that there was reason to fear an hurricane, and therefore not proper to put to fea. But Dion, who apprehended making his descent fo near the enemy, and chose to land further off, doubled the cape of Pachynus, which he had no fooner passed, than a furious florm arose, attended with rain, thunder, and lightning, which drove his ships to the eastern coast of Africa, where they were in great danger of dashing to pieces against the rocks. Happily for them, a fouth wind rifing fuddenly, contrary to expectation, they unfurled all their fails, and after having made vows to the gods, they stood out to fea for Sicily. They ran in this manner four days; and on the fifth entered the port of Minoa, a fmall town of Sicily under the Carthaginians, whose commander Synalus was Dion's particular friend and guest. They were perfectly well received, and would have flaid there some time to refresh themselves, after the rude fatigues they had fuffered during the florm, if they had not been informed that Dionysius was absent, having embarked some days before for the coast of Italy, attended by fourscore vessels. The foldiers demanded earnestly to be led on against the enemy; and Dion, having defired Synalus to fend his baggree after him when proper, marched directly to Syracuse.

q Diod. l. xvi. p. 413.

Plut. in Dion. p. 968-972. Diod. l. xvi. p. 414-417.

* It is not easy to comprehend, how the two Dionysii were capable of entertaining so great a force by sea and land, their dominions being only a part of sicily, and consequently of no great extent. It is true, that the city of Syracuse had been very much enriched by commerce; and that those two princes received great contributions both from the places of Sicily and Italy in their dependence: But it is still no easy matter to conceive how all this should suffice to the enormous expenses of Dionysius the elder, in fitting out great sleets, raising and maintaining numerous armies, and erecling magnificent buildings. It were to be wished, that historians had given us some better lights upon this head.

His troops increased confiderably upon his route, by the great number of those who came to join him from all parts. The news of his arrival being soon known at Syracuse, Timocrates, who had married Dion's wife, the sister of Dionysius, to whom he had left the command of the city in his absence, dispatched a courier to him into Italy, with advice of Dion's progress. But that courier, being almost at his journey's end, was so fatigued with having run the best part of the night, that he found himself under the necessity of stopping to take a little sleep. In the mean time, a wolf, attracted by the smell of a piece of meat, which he had in his wallet, came to the place, and ran away with both the sless and the bag, in which he had also put his dispatches. Dionysius was by this means prevented for some time from knowing that Dion was arrived, and then received the news from other hands.

When Dion was near the Anapus, which runs about half a league from the city, he ordered his troops to halt, and offered a facrifice upon the river fide, addressing his prayers to the rifing fun. All who were prefent, feeing him with a wreath of flowers upon his head, which he were upon account of the facrifice, crowned themselves also in the same manner, as animated with one and the same spirit. He had been joined on his march by at least five thousand men, and advanced with them towards the city. The most considerable of the inhabitants came out in white habits to receive him at the gates. At the same time the people fell upon the tyrant's friends, and upon the ipies and informers; an accurfed race of wretches, THE ENEMIES OF THE GODS AND MEN+, fays Plutarch, who made it the business of their lives to disperse themselves into all parts, to mingle with the citizens, to pry into all their affairs, and to report to the tyrant whatever they faid or thought, and often what they neither faid nor thought. These were the first victims to the fury of the people, and were knocked on the head with staves immediately. Timocrates, not able to throw himfelf into the citadel, rode off on horseback.

At that instant Dion appeared within fight of the walls. He marched at the head of his troops magnificently armed, with his brother Megacles on one side, and Callippus the Athenian on the other, both crowned with chaplets of slowers. After him came an hundred of the foreign soldiers, sine troops, whom he had chosen for his guard. The rest followed in order of battle, with their officers at the head of them. The Syracufans beheld them with inexpressible satisfaction, and received them as a sacred procession, whom the gods themselves regarded with pleasure, and who restored them their liberty with the democracy, forty-eight years after they had been banished from their city.

After Dion had made his entry, he ordered the trumpets to found, to appeale the noise and tumult; and filence being made, an herald proclaimed, that "Dion and Megacles were come to "abolish the tyranny, and to free the Syracusans and all the people of Sicily from the yoke of the tyrant." And being Volume 1V.

<sup>† &#</sup>x27;Ardewars avorres nai deois exhips.

defirous to harangue the people in person, he went to the upper part of the city, through the quarter called Achradina. Wherever he passed, the Syracusans had set out, on both sides of the streets, tables and bowls, and had prepared victims, and as he came before their houses, they threw all forts of flowers upon him, addressing vows and prayers to him as to a god. Such was the origin of idolatry, which paid divine honours to those who had done the people any great and fignal fervices. And can there be any fervice, any gift, fo valuable as that of liberty! Not far from the citadel, and below the place called Pentapylae, stood a fun-dial upon a high pedestal, erected by Dionyfius. Dion placed himself upon it; and in a speech to the people, exhorted them to employ their utmost efforts for the recovery and preservation of their liberty. The Syracufans, transported with what he faid, and to express their gratitude and affection, elected him and his brother captain-generals with fupreme anthority; and by their confent, and at their entreaty, joined with them twenty of the most considerable citizens, half of whom were of the number of those who had been banished by Dionysius, and returned with Dion.

Having afterwards taken the caftle of Epipolis, he set the citizens who were prisoners in it at liberty, and fortified it with strong works. Dionysius arrived from Italy seven days after, and entered the citadel by sea. The same day a great number of carriages brought Dion the arms which he had left with Synalus. These he distributed amongst the citizens who were unprovided. All the rest armed and equipped themselves as well as they could, expressing the greatest ardour and satisfaction.

Dionyfius began by fending ambassadors to Dion and the Syracusans, with proposals, which seemed very advantageous. The answer was, that by way of preliminary, he must abdicate the tyranny; to which Dionysius did not seem averse. From thence he came to interviews and conferences; which were only seints to gain time, and abate the ardour of the Syracusans by the hope of an accommodation. Accordingly, having made the deputies, who were sent to treat with him, prifoners, he fuddenly attacked, with a great part of his troops, the wall with which the Syracusans had furrounded the citadel, and made several breaches in it. So warm and unexpected an affault put Dion's foldiers into great confusion, who immediately fled. Dion endeavoured in vain to stop them; and believing example more prevalent than words, he threw himself fiercely into the midst of the enemy, where he stood their charge with intrepid courage, and killed great numbers of them. He received a wound in the hand from a spear; his arms were fcarce proof against the great number of darts thrown at him, and his shield being pierced through in many places with spears and javelins, he was at length beat down. His foldiers immediately brought him off from the enemy. He left Timonides to command them; and getting on horieback, rode through the whole city, stopped the slight of the Syracufans, and taking the foreign foldiers, whom he had left to guard the quarter called Achradina, he led them on fresh against Dionysius's troops, who were already fatigued, and entirely discouraged by so vigorous and unexpected a resistance. It was now no longer a battle, but a pursuit. A great number of the tyrant's troops were killed on the fpot, and the rest escaped with difficulty into the citadel. This victory was fignal and glorious. The Syracusans, to reward the valour of the foreign troops, gave each of them a confiderable fum of money; and those foldiers, to honour Dion, presented him with a crown of gold.

Soon after came heralds from Dionyfius, with feveral letters for Dion from the women of his family, and with one from Dionyfius himfelf. Dion ordered them all to be read in a full affembly. That of Dionyfius was couched in the form of a request and justification, intermixed however with the most terrible menaces against the persons who were dearest to Dion; his sister, wife, and son. It was written with an art and address exceedingly proper to render Dion suspected. Dionyfius puts him in mind of the ardour and zeal he had formerly expressed for the support of the tyranny. He exhorts him at a distance, and with some obscurity, though easy enough to be understood, not to abolish it entirely; but to preserve it for himself. He advises him not to give the people their liberty, who were far from affecting him at heart; nor to abandon his own fafety, and that of his friends and relations, to the capricious humour of a violent and inconstant multitude.

The reading of this letter, had the effect Dionysius proposed from it. The Syracusans, without regard to Dion's goodness to them, and the greatness of his foul in forgetting his dearest interests, and the ties of nature to restore them their liberty, took umbrage at his too great authority, and conceived injurious suspicions of him. The arrival of Heraclides confirmed them in their fentiments, and determined them to act accordingly. He was one of the banished persons, a good soldier, and well known amongst the troops, from having been in confiderable commands under the tyrant, very bold and ambitious, and a fecret enemy of Dion's, between whom and himself there had been some difference in Peloponnesus. He came to Syracuse with seven gallies of three benches of oars, and three other vessels, not to join Dion, but in the resolution to march with his own forces against the tyrant, whom he found reduced to that himself up in the citadel. His first endeavour was to ingratiate himfelf with the people; for which an open and infinuating behaviour made him very fit, whilft Dion's austere gravity was offensive to the multitude; especially as they were become more haughty and untractable from the last victory, and * expected to be treated like a popular flate, even before they could call themselves a free people; that is to fay, in the full fense of the Greek terms, they were for being used with complaifance, flattery, regard, and a deference to all their capricious humours.

What gratitude could be expected from a people, that confulted only their passions and blind prejudices? The Syracusans formed an affembly immediately upon their own accord, and chose Heraclides admiral. Dion came unexpectedly thither, and complained highly of fuch a proceeding; as the charge conferred upon Heraclides, was an abridgment of his office; that he was no longer generalissimo, if another commanded at fea. Those remonstrances obliged the Syracusans, against their will, to deprive Heraclides of the office they had so lately conferred upon him. When the assembly broke up, Dion sent for him, and after some gentle reprimands for his strange conduct with regard to him in so delicate a conjuncture, wherein the least division amongst them might ruin every thing, he summoned a new assembly himself, and, in the presence of the whole people, appointed Heraclides admiral, and gave him a guard, as he had himself.

Plut. in Dion. p. 972, 975. Diod. l. xvi. p. 419. 422.

* Πρό το δήμος ώναι, το δημαγωγείσθαι θέλοντες.

He thought by the force of kind offices to get the better of his rival's ill-will, who, in his expressions and outward behaviour, made his court to Dion, confessed his obligations to him, and obeyed his orders with a promptitude and punctuality, which expressed an entire devotion to his service, and a desire of occasions to do him pleasure. But underhand, by his intrigues and cabals, he influenced the people against him, and opposed his designs in every thing. If Dion gave his consent that Dionysius should quit the citadel by treaty, he was accused of favouring, and intending to save him: If, to satisfy them, he continued the siege without hearkening to any proposals of accommodation, they did not fail to reproach him with the desire of protracting the war, for the sake of continuing in command, and to keep the citizens in awe and respect.

Philiftus, who came to the tyrant's relief with feveral galies, having been defeated and put to death, Dionyfius fent to offer Dion the citadel with the arms and troops in it, and money to pay them for five months, if he might be permitted by a treaty to retire into Italy for the rest of his life, and be allowed the revenue of certain lands, which he mentioned, in the neighbourhood of Syracuse. The Syracusans, who were in hopes of taking Dionysius alive, rejected those proposals; and Dionysius, despairing of reconciling them to his terms, left the citadel in the hands of his eldest son Apollocrates, and taking the advantage of a favourable wind ", embarked for Italy with his treasures and effects of the greatest value, and such of his friends as were dearest to him.

Heraclides, who commanded the gallies, was very much blamed for having fuffered him to escape by his negligence. To regain the people's favour, he proposed a new distribution of lands, infinuating, that as liberty was founded in equality, so poverty was the principle of servitude. Upon Dion's opposing this motion, Heraclides persuaded the people to reduce the pay of the foreign troops, who amounted to three thousand men, to declare a new division of land, to appoint new generals, and deliver themselves in good time from Dion's insupportable severity. The Syracusans agreed, and nominated twenty-five new officers, Heraclides being one of the number.

At the fame time they fent privately to folicit the foreign foldiers to abandon Dion, and to join with them, promifing to give them a share in the government as natives and citizens. Those generous troops received the offer with disdain; and then placing Dion in the centre of them, with a sidelity and affection of which there are sew examples, they made their bodies and their arms a rampart for him, and carried him out of the city without doing the least violence to any body; but warmly reproaching all they met with ingratitude and persidy. The Syracusans, who contemned their small number, and attributed their moderation to sear and want of courage, began to attack them, not doubting but they should defeat, and put them all to the sword, before they got out of the city.

Dion, reduced to the necessity of either fighting the citizens, or perishing with his troops, held out his hands to the Syracusans, imploring them in the most tender and affectionate manner to desist, and pointing to the citadel full of enemies, who saw all that passed with the utmost joy. But finding them deaf and insensible to all his remonstrances, he commanded his foldiers to march in close order without attacking; which they obeyed, contenting themselves with making a great noise with their arms, and raising great cries, as if they were going to sall upon the Syracusans. The latter were dismayed with those appearances, and ran away in every street without being purfued. Dion haftened the march of his troops towards the country of the Leontines.

The officers of the Syracusans, laughed at and ridiculed by the women of the city, were desirous to retrieve their honour, and made their troops take arms, and return to the pursuit of Dion. They came up with him at the pass of a river, and made their horse advance to skirmish. But when they saw that Dion was resolved in earnest to repel their insults, and had made his troops sace about with great indignation, they were again seized with terror; and taking to their heels in a more shameful manner than before, made all the haste they could to regain the city.

The Leontines received Dion with great marks of honour and effeem. They also made presents to his soldiers, and declared them free citizens. Some days after which they sent ambassadors to demand justice for the ill treatment of those troops to the Syracusans, who on their side sent deputies to complain of Dion. Syracuse was intoxicated with inconsiderate joy and insolent prosperity, which entirely banished resection and judgment.

Every thing conspired to swell and inflame their pride. The citadel was so much reduced by famine, that the soldiers of Dionysius, after having suffered very much, resolved at last to surrender it. They sent in the night to make that proposal, and were to perform conditions the next morning. But at day-break, whilst they were preparing to execute the treaty, Nypsius, an able and valiant general, whom Dionysius had sent from Italy with corn and money to the besieged, appeared with his gallies, and anchored near Arethusa. Plenty succeeding on a sudden to famine; Nypsius landed his troops, and summoned an affembly, wherein he made a speech to the foldiers suitable to the present conjuncture, which determined them to hazard all dangers. The citadel, that was upon the point of surrendering, was relieved in this manner, contrary to all expectation.

The Syracufans at the fame time hastened on board their X iiii

gallies, and attacked the enemy's fleet. They funk some of their ships, took others, and pursued the rest to the shore. But this very victory was the occasion of their ruin. Abandoned to their own discretion, without either leader or authority to command them, or counsel, the officers as well as foldiers gave themselves up to rejoicing, feasting, drinking, debauchery, and every kind of loose excess. Nypsius knew well how to take advantage of this general insatuation. He attacked the wall that inclosed the citadel; of which having made himself master, he demolished it in several places, and permitted his soldiers to enter and plander the city. All things were in the utmost consusion. Here the citizens, half assep, had their throats cut; there, houses were plundered; whilst the women and children were driven off into the citadel, without regard to their tears, cries and lamentations.

There was but one man who could remedy this misfortune, and preferve the city. This was in every body's thoughts, but no one had courage enough to propose it; so much ashamed were they of the ungenerous manner in which they had driven him out. As the danger increased every moment, and already approached the quarter Achradina, in the height of their extremity and defpair, a voice was heard from the horse and allies, which said, " That it was absolutely neces-" fary to recal Dion and the Peloponnesian troops from the " country of the Leontines." As foon as any body had courage enough to utter those words, they were the general cry of the Syracufans, who, with tears of joy and grief, made prayers to the gods, that they would bring him back to them. The hope alone of feeing him again, gave them new courage, and enabled, them to make head against the enemy. The deputies fet out immediately with full speed, and arrived at the city of Leontium late in the evening.

As foon as they alighted, they threw themselves at Dion's seet, bathed in their tears, and related the deplorable extremity to which the Syracusans were reduced. Some of the Leontines, and several of the Peloponnesian soldiers, who had seen them arrive, were already got round Dion, and conceived righly, from their emotion and proftrate behaviour, that something very extraordinary had happened. Dion had no fooner heard what they had to fay, than he carried them with him to the assembly, which formed itself immediately; for the people ran thither with abundance of eagerness. The two principal deputies explained in a few words the greatness of their distress, and "implored the foreign troops to hasten "to the relief of the Syracusans, and to forget the ill treatment they had received; and the rather, because that unfortunate people had already paid a severer penalty for it, than the most injured amongst them would desire to impose."

The deputies having finished their discourse, the whole theatre, where the assembly was held, continued fad and filent. Dion rofe; but as foon as he began to fpeak, a torrent of tears suppressed his utterance. The foreign soldiers called out to him to take courage, and expressed a generous compasfion for his grief. At length, having recovered himself a little, he spoke to them in these terms: " Men of Pelopon-" nefus, and you our allies, I have affembled you here, that " you might deliberate upon what regards yourselves; as for " my part, I must not deliberate upon any thing when Syra-" cufe is in danger. If I cannot preferve it, I go to perish " with it, and to bury myself in its ruins. But for you, if " you are resolved to affift us once more; us, who are the " most imprudent and most unfortunate of mankind; come " and relieve the city of Syracuse, from henceforth the work " of your hands. If not, and the just subjects of complaint, " which you have against the Syracusans, determine you to " abandon them in their present condition, and to suffer them " to perish; may you receive from the immortal gods the " reward you merit for the affection and fidelity which you " have hitherto expressed for me. For the rest, I have only " to defire, that you will keep Dion in your remembrance, " who did not abandon you when unworthily freated by his " country, nor his country, when fallen into misfortunes." He had no fooner ceased speaking, when the foreign soldiers rose up with loud cries, and entreated him to lead them on that moment to the relief of Syracuse. The deputies, transported with joy, saluted and embraced them, praying the gods to bestows upon Dion and them all kind of happiness and prosperity. When the tumult was appeased, Dion ordered them to prepare for the march, and as soon as they had supped, to return with their arms to the same place, being determined to set out the same night, and say to the relief of his country.

In the mean time, at Syracuse, the officers of Dionysius, after having done all the mischief they could to the city, retired at night into the citadel with the loss of some of their soldiers.

This short respite gave the seditious orators new courage, who, stattering themselves that the enemy would lie still after what they had done, exhorted the Syracusans to think no further of Dion, not to receive him if he came to their relies with his foreign troops, nor to yield to them in courage, but to defend their city and liberty with their own arms and valour. New deputies were instantly dispatched from the general officers to prevent his coming, and from the principal citizens and his friends, to desire him to hasten his march; which difference of sentiments, and contrariety of advices, occasioned his marching slowly, and by small journies.

When the night was far fpent, Dion's enemies feized the gates of the city, to prevent his entrance. At the fame inftant Nypfius, well apprifed of all that passed in Syracuse, made a fally from the citadel with a greater body of troops, and more determinate than before. They demolished the wall that inclosed them entirely, and entered the city, which they plundered. Nothing but slaughter and blood was seen every where. Nor did they stop for the pillage; but seemed to have no other view, than to ruin and destroy all before them. One would have thought, the son of Dionysius, whom his father had lest in the citadel, being reduced to despair, and prompted by an excess of hatred for the Syracusans, was determined to bury the tyranny in the ruins of the city. To prevent Dion's relief of it, they had recourse to fire, the swiftest of destructions; burning with torches and lighted straw, all places within their power, and darting combustibles against the rest. The Syracusans, who sled to avoid the slames, were butchered in the streets; and those who, to shun the all-murdering sword, retired into the houses, were driven out of them again by the incroaching sire; for there were abundance of houses burning, and many that fell upon the people in the streets.

These very slames opened the city for Dion, by obliging the citizens to agree in not keeping the gates shut against him. Couriers after couriers were dispatched to hasten his march. Heraclides himself, his most declared and mortal enemy, deputed his brother, and afterwards his uncle Theodotus, to conjure him to advance with the utmost speed, there being no body besides himself to make head against the enemy, he being wounded, and the city almost entirely ruined, and reduced to ashes.

Dion received the news when he was about fixty * fladia from the gates. His foldiers upon that occasion marched with the utmost diligence, and with so good a will, that it was not long before he arrived at the walls of the city. He there detached his light-armed troops against the enemy, to reanimate the Syracusans by the sight of them. He then drew up his heavy-armed infantry, and the citizens who came running to join him on all sides. He divided them into small parties, of greater depth than front, and put different officers at the head of them, that they might be capable of attacking in several places at once, and appear stronger and more formidable to the enemy.

After having made these dispositions, and prayed to the gods, he marched across the city against the enemy. In every street as he passed, he was welcomed with acclamations, cries of joy, and songs of victory, mingled with the prayers and blessings of all the Syracusans; who called Dion their preserver and their god, and his soldiers, their brothers and fellow-citizens. At that instant, there was not a single man in the city fo fond of life, as not to be much more in pain for Dion's fafety than his own, and not to fear much more for him than for all the rest together, seeing him march foremost to so great a danger, over blood, fire, and dead bodies, with which the streets and public places were universally covered.

* Two or three leagues,

On the other hand, a view of the enemy was no less terrible: For they were animated by rage and despair, and were posted in line of battle behind the ruins of the wall they had thrown down, which made the approach very difficult and dangerous. They were under the necessity of defending the citadel, which was their fafety and retreat, and durit not remove from it, lest their communication should be cut off. But what was most capable of disordering and discouraging Dion's foldiers, and made their march very painful and difficult, was the fire. For wherever they turned themselves, they marched by the light of the houses in slames, and were obliged to go over ruins in the midft of fires; exposing themselves to being crushed in pieces by the fall of walls, beams and roofs of houses, which tottered half confumed by the flames, and under the necessity of keeping their ranks, whilst they opened their way through frightful clouds of smoke mingled with dust.

When they had joined the enemy, only a very small number on each side were capable of coming to blows, from the want of room, and the unnevenness of the ground. But at length, Dion's soldiers, encouraged and supported by the cries and ardour of the Syracusans, charged the enemy with such redoubled vigour, that the troops of Nypsius gave way. The greatest part of them escaped into the citadel, which was very near; and those who remained without, being broken, were cut to pieces in the pursuit by the foreign troops.

The time would not admit their making immediate rejoicings for their victory, in the manner fo great an exploit deferved; the Syracusans being obliged to apply to the preservation of their houses, and to pass the whole night in extinguishing the fire; which however they did not effect without great difficulty.

At the return of day, none of the feditious orators durft, stay in the city; but all fled, felf-condemned, to avoid the punishment due to their crimes. Only Heraclides and Theodotus came to Dion, and put themselves into his hands, confessing their injurious treatment of him, and conjuring him not to imitate their ill conduct: That it became Dion, superior as he was in all other respects to the rest of mankind, to shew himself as much so in that greatness of soul, which could conquer resentment and revenge, and forgive the ungrateful, who owned themselves unworthy of his pardon.

Heraclides and Theodotus having made these supplications. Dion's friends advifed him not to spare men of their vile and malignant disposition; but to abandon Heraclides to the foldiers, and in fo doing exterminate from the state that spirit of fedition and intrigue; a distemper that has really something of madness in it, and is no less to be feared, from its pernicious consequences, than tyranny itself. But Dion, to appeale them, faid, " That other captains generally made the means " of conquering their enemies their fole application; that for " his part, he had passed much time in the academy, in learn-" ing to fubdue anger, envy, and all the jarring passions of " the mind: That the fign of having conquered them, is not " kindness and affability to friends and persons of merit; but " treating those with humanity who have injured us, and in " being always ready to forgive them: That he did not de-" fire so much to appear superiour to Heraclides in power and " ability, as in wisdom and justice; for in that, true and es-" fential superiority consists. That if Heraclides be wicked, " invidious, and perfidious, must Dion contaminate and dif-" honour himself with low refentment! It is true, accord-" ing to human laws, there feems to be less injustice in re-" venging an injury, than committing it; but if we confult " nature, we shall find both the one and the other to have " their rife in the same weakness of mind. Besides, there is " no disposition so obdurate and savage, but may be vanquish-" ed by the force of kind usage and obligations." Dion upon these maxims pardoned Heraclides.

His next application was to inclose the citadel with a new work; and he ordered each of the Syracusans to go and cut a large stake. In the night, he set his soldiers to work, whilst the Syracusans took their rest. He surrounded the citadel in this manner with a strong pallisade, before it was perceived; so that in the morning, the greatness of the work, and the suddenness of the execution, were matter of admiration for all the world, as well the enemy as the citizens.

Having finished this pallisade, he buried the dead; and dismissing the prisoners taken from the enemy, he summoned an affembly. Heraclides proposed in it, that Dion should be elected generalissimo with supreme authority by sea and land. All the people of worth, and the most considerable of the citizens, were pleased with the proposal, and defired that it might have the authority of the affembly. But the mariners and artifans were forry that Heraclides should lose the office of admiral; and convinced, that although he were little estimable in all other respects, he would at least be more for the people than Dion, they opposed it with all their power. Dion, to avoid diffurbance and confusion, did not insist upon that point, and acquiesced that Heraclides should continue to command in chief at fea. But his opposing the distribution of lands and houses, which they were earnest for having taken place, and his cancelling and annulling whatever had been decreed upon that head, embroiled him with them irretrievably.

Heraclides, taking advantage of a disposition fo favourable to his views, did not fail to revive his cabals and intrigues; as appeared openly by an attempt of his to make himself master of Syracuse, and to shut the gates upon his rival: But it proved unsuccessful. A Spartan, who had been sent to the aid of Syracuse, negotiated a new accommodation between Heraclides and Dion, under the strictest oaths, and the strongest assurances of obediences on the side of the former; weak ties to a man void of faith and probity.

The Syracusans, having dismissed their sea forces, who were become unnecessary, applied solely to the siege of the citadel, and rebuilt the wall which had been thrown down. As no relief came to the besieged, and bread began to fall short with them, the foldiers grew mutinous, and would observe no discipline. The son of Dionysius, sinding himself without hope or resource, capitulated with Dion, to surrender the citadel, with all the arms and munitions of war. He carried his mother and sisters away with him, silled five gallies with his people and effects, and went to his father; for Dion gave him entire liberty to retire unmolested. It is easy to conceive the joy of the city upon his departure. Women, children, old people, all were passionately fond of gratifying their eyes from the port with so agreeable a spectacle, and to solemnize the joyful day, on which, after so many years servitude, the sun arose for the first time upon the Syracusan liberty.

Apollocrates having fet fail, and Dion begun his march to enter the citadel, the princesses, who were there, did not stay till he arrived, but came out to meet him at the gates. Aristomache led the fon of Dion; after whom came Arete, his wife, with her eyes fixed upon the ground, and full of tears. Dion embraced his fifter first, and afterwards his fon. Aristomache then presenting Arete to him, spoke thus: " The tears you " fee her flied, the shame expressed in her looks, at the time " your presence restores us life and joy, her filence itself, and " her confusion, sufficiently denote the grief she suffers at the " fight of an husband, to whom another has been substituted " contrary to her will, but who alone has always poffesfed her " heart. Shall she salute you as her uncle, shall she embrace " you as her hushand?" Aristomache having spoke in this manner, Dion, with his face bathed in tears, tenderly embraced his wife; to whom he gave his fon, and fent them home to his house; because he thought proper to leave the citadel to the discretion of the Syracusans, as an evidence of their liberty.

For himself, after having rewarded with a magnificence truly royal all those that had contributed to his success, according to their rank and merit, at the height of glory and happiness, and the object not only of Sicily, but of Carthage and all Greece, who esteemed him the wifest and most fortunate captain that ever lived, he constantly retained his original simplicity; as modest and plain in his garb, equipage, and table, as if he had lived in the academy with Plato, and not with people bred in armies, with officers and foldiers, who often breathe nothing but pleafures and magnificence. Accordingly, at the time Plato wrote to him, "That the eyes of all mankind were upon him alone;" little affected with that general admiration, his thoughts were always intent upon the academy, that school of wisdom and virtue, where exploits and successes were not judged from the external splendor and noise with which they are attended, but from the wise and moderate use of them.

Dion designed to establish a form of government in Syracuse, composed of the Spartan and Cretan, but wherein the aristocratical was always to prevail, and to decide important affairs by the authority, which, according to his plan, was to be vested in a council of elders. Heraclides again opposed him in this scheme, still turbulent and seditious according to custom, and folely intent upon gaining the people by flattery, careffes, and other popular arts. One day, when Dion fent for him to the council, he answered that he would not come; and that, being only a private person, he should be in the affembly with the rest of the citizens, whenever it was summoned. His view, in fuch behaviour, was to make his court to the people, and to render Dion odious; who, weary of his repeated infults, permitted those to kill him he had formerly prevented. They accordingly went to his house and dispatched him. We shall see presently Dion's own sense of this action.

The Syracufans were highly affected for his death; but as Dion folemnized his funeral with great magnificence, followed his body in person at the head of his whole army, and afterwards harangued the people upon the occasion, they were appealed, and forgave him the murder; convinced, that it was impossible for the city ever to be free from commotions and sedition, whilst Heraclides and Dion governed together.

<sup>2</sup> After that murder Dion never knew joy or peace of mind. An hideous spectre, which he saw in the night, filled him with trouble, terror, and melancholy. The phantom seemed a woman of enormous stature, who, in her attire, air, and haggard looks, refembled a fury fweeping his house with violence. His fon's death, who for fome unknown grief had thrown himfelf from the roof an house, passed for the accomplishment of that ominous apparition, and was the prelude to his misfortunes. Callippus gave the last hand to them. He was an Athenian, with whom Dion had contracted an intimate friendship, whilst he lodged in his house at Athens, and with whom he lived ever after with entire freedom and unbounded confidence. Callippus having given himfelf up to his ambitious views, and entertained thoughts of making himself master of Syracuse, threw off all regard for the sacred ties of friendship and hospitality, and contrived to get rid of Dion, who was the fole obstacle to his defigns. Notwithstanding his care to conceal them, they got air, and came to the ears of Dion's fifter and wife, who loft no time, and spared no pains, to discover the truth by a very strict inquiry. To prevent its effects, he went to them with tears in his eyes, and the appearance of being inconfolable, that any body should suspect him of such a crime, or think him capable of fo black a defign. They infifted upon his taking the Great ath, as it was called. The person who swore it, was wrapped in the purple mantle of the goddess Proserpine, and holding a lighted torch in his hand, pronounced in the temple the most dreadful execuations against himself it is possible to imagine.

Z Plut. p. 981-983. Diod. p. 432.

The oath cost him nothing; but did not convince the princesses. They daily received new intimation of his guilt from several hands, as did Dion himself, whose friends in general persuaded him to prevent Callippus's crime by a just and sudden punishment. But he never could resolve upon it. The death of Heraclides, which he looked upon as an horrible blot in his reputation and virtue, was perpetually present to his troubled imagination, and renewed by continual terrors his grief and repentance. Tormented night and day by that cruel remembrance, he professed, that he had rather die a thousand deaths, and present his throat himself to whoever would kill him, than to live under the necessity of continual precautions, not only against his enemies, but the best of his friends.

Calippus ill deferved that name. He hastened the execution of his crime, and caused Dion to be assassinated in his own house by the Zacynthian soldiers, who were entirely devoted to his interest. The sister and wife of that prince were put into prison, where the latter was delivered of a son, which she resolved to nurse there hersels.

<sup>a</sup> After this murder, Callippus was fome time in a splendid condition, having made himself master of Syracuse, by the means of the troops, who were entirely devoted to his fervice, in effect of the gifts he bestowed upon them. The Pagans believed, that the divinity ought to punish great crimes in a fudden and extraordinary manner in this life: And Plutarch obferves, that the fuccess of Callippus occasioned very great complaints against the gods, as suffering, calmly and without indignation, the vilest of men to raise himself to so exalted a fortune by fo detestable and impious a method. But providence was not long without justifying itself; for Calippus soon suffered the punishment of his guilt. Having marched with his troops to take Catanea, Syracuse revolted against him, and threw off so shameful a subjection. He afterwards attacked Messina, where he lost abundance of men, and particularly the Zacynthian foldiers, who had murdered Dion. No city of Sicily would receive him; but all detefting him as the most execrable of wretches, he retired to Rhegium, where, after having led for some time a miserable life, he was killed by Leptinus and Polyperchon, and, it was faid, with the fame dagger with which Dion had been affaffinated.

History has few examples of fo distinct an attention of providence to punish great crimes, such as murder, perfidy, treason, either in the authors of those crimes themselves, who commanded or executed them, or in the accomplices any way concerned in them. The divine justice evidences itself from time to time in this manner, to prove that it is not unconcerned and inattentive; and to prevent the inundation of crimes, which an entire impunity would occasion; but it does not always distinguish itself by remarkable chastisfements in this world, to intimate to mankind, that greater punishments are referved for guilt in the next.

As for Aristomache and Arete, as soon as they came out of prison, Icetes of Syracuse, one of Dion's friends, received them into his house, and treated them at first with an attention, siedelity, and generosity of the most examplary kind, had he persevered: But complying at last with Dion's enemies, he provided a bark for them, and having put them on board, under the pretence of sending them to Peloponnesus, he gave orders to those who were to carry them, to kill them in the passage, and to throw them into the sea. He was not long without receiving the chastisement due to his black treachery; for being taken by Timoleon, he was put to death. The Syracusans, fully to avenge Dion, killed also the two sons of that traitor.

h The relations and friends of Dion, foon after his death, had written to Plato, to confult him upon the manner in which they should behave in the present troubled and fluctuating condition of Syracuse, and to know what fort of government it was proper to establish there. Plato, who knew the Syracusans were equally incapable of entire liberty, or absolute servitude, exhorted them strenuously to pacify all things as soon as posfible; and for that purpose, to change the tyranny, of which the very name was odious, into a lawful fovereignty, which would make subjection easy and agreeable. He advised them, and according to him it had been Dion's opinion, to create three kings; one to be Hipparinus, Dion's fon; another Hipparinus, Dionysius the younger's brother, who seemed to be well inclined towards the people; and Dionysius himself, if he would comply with fuch conditions as should be prescribed him; their authority to be not unlike that of the kings of Sparta. By the same scheme, thirty-five magistrates were to be appointed, to take care that the laws should be duly observed, to have great authority both in times of war and peace, and to ferve as a balance between the power of the kings, the fenate, and the people.

It does not appear that this advice was ever followed, which indeed had its great inconveniencies. It is only known, that Hipparinus c, Dionyfius's brother, having landed at Syracuse with a fleet, and considerable forces, expelled Callippus, and exercised the sovereign power two years.

The history of Sicily, as related thus far, includes about fifty years, beginning with Dionysius the elder, who reigned thirty-eight of them, and continuing to the death of Dion. I shall return in the sequel to the affairs of Sicily, and shall relate the end of Dionysius the younger, and the re-establishment of the Syracusan liberty by Timoleon.

SECTION IV.

CHARACTER of DION.

It is not easy to find so many excellent qualities in one and the same person as were united in Dion. I do not consider in this place, his wonderful tafte for the sciences, his art of affociating them with the greatest employments of war and peace, of extracting from them the rules of conduct, and maxims of government, and of making them an equally useful and honourable entertainment of his leifure: I confine myfelf to the statesman and patriot; and in this view, how admirably does he appear ! Greatness of soul, elevation of sentiments, generofity in bestowing his wealth, heroic valour in battle, attended with a coolness of temper, and a prudence scarce to be parallelied, a mind vast and capable of the highest views, a constancy not to be shaken by the greatest dangers, or the most unexpected revolutions of fortune, the love of his country and of the public good carried almost to excess: These are part of Dion's virtues. The defign he formed of delivering his country from the yoke of the tyranny, and his boldness and wisdom in the execution of it, explain of what he was capable.

But what I conceive the greatest beauty in Dion's character, the most worthy of admiration, and, if I may say so, the most above human nature, is the greatness of soul, and unexampled patience, with which he suffered the ingratitude of his country. He had abandoned and facrificed every thing to come to their relief; he had reduced the tyranny to extremities, and was upon the point re-establishing them in the full possession of their liberty: In return for such great services, they shamefully expel him the city, accompanied with an handful of foreign soldiers, whose sidelity they had not been able to corrupt; they load him with injuries, and add to their base persidy the most cruel outrages and indignity: To punish those ungrateful traitors he had only a signal to give, and to leave the rest to the indignation of his soldiers: Master of theirs, as well as his own temper, he stops their impetuosity, and without disarming their hands, restrains their just rage, suffering them, in the very height and ardour of an attack, only to terrify, and not kill, his enemies, because he could not forget that they were his fellow-citizens and brethren.

There seems to be only one defect that can be objected to Dion, which is, his having something rigid and austere in his humour, that made him less accessible and sociable than he should have been, and kept even persons of worth and his best friends at a kind of distance. Plato, and those who had his glory sincerely at heart, had often animadverted upon this turn of mind in him: But notwithstanding the reproaches which were made upon his too austere gravity, and the inflexible severity with which he treated the people, he still piqued himself upon abating nothing of them: Whether his genius was entirely averse to the arts of infinuation and persuasion; or that from the view of correcting and reforming the Syracusans, vitiated and corrupted by the slattering and complaisant discourses of their orators, he chose that rough and manly manner of behaving to them.

Dion was mistaken in the most essential point of governing. From the throne to the lowest office in the state, whoever is charged with the care of ruling and conducting others, ought particularly to study the * art of managing men's tempers, and of giving them that bent and turn of mind that may best suit his measures; which cannot be done by assuming the severe master, by commanding haughtily, and contenting one's self with laying down the rule and the duty with inflexible rigour. There is in the right itself, in virtue, and the exercise of all functions, an exactitude and steadiness, or rather a kind of stiffness, which frequently degenerates into a vice when carried into extremes. I know it is never allowable to break through rules; but it is always laudable, and often necessary, to soften, and make them more convertible; which is best effected by a kindness of manners, and an infinuating behaviour; not always exacting the discharge of a duty in its utmost rigour; overlooking abundance of small faults, that do not merit much notice, and observing upon those which are more considerable, with favour and goodness; in a word, in endeavouring by all possible means to acquire people's affection, and to render virtue and duty amiable.

Y iii

* Which art the ancient poet called "flexanima, atque omnium regina rerum foratio," Cie, I, i, de divia, n. 80,

Dion's permission to kill Heraclides, which was obtained with dissiculty, or rather forced from him, contrary to his natural disposition, as well as principles, cost him dear, and brought the trouble and anguish upon him, that lasted to the day of his death, and of which they were the principal cause.

SECTION IV.

DIONYSIUS the Younger re-ascends the THRONE.

CALLIPPUS b, who had caused Dion to be murdered, and had substituted himself in his place, did not possess his power long. Thirteen months after, Hipparinus, Dionysius's brother, arriving unexpectedly at Syracuse with a numerous sleet, expelled him from the city, and recovered his paternal sovereignty, which he held during two years.

Syracufe c and all Sicily being haraffed by different factions and intestine war, were in a miserable condition. Dionysius, taking the advantage of those troubles, ten years after he had been obliged to quit the throne, had assembled some foreign troops, and having overcome Nypsius, who had made himself master of Syracuse, he reinstated himself in the possession of his dominions.

b A. M. 3467. Ant. J. C. 357. Diod, l. xvi. p. 432-436. d A. M. 3654. Ant. J. C. 330.

It was perhaps to thank the gods for his re-establishment, and to express his gratitude to them, that he sent statues of gold and ivory to Olympia and Delphos of very great value. The gallies which carried them were taken by Iphicrates, who was at that time near Corcyra swith a sleet. He wrote to Athens to know in what manner he should dispose of his facred booty, and was answered, not to examine scrupulously for what it was designed, but to make use of it for the subsistence of his troops. Dionysius complained excessively of such treatment to the Athenians, in a letter which he wrote them, wherein he reproached with great warmth and justice their avarice and sacrilegious impiety.

8 A commander of pirates had acted much more nobly and more religiously in regard to the Romans about fifty years before. After the taking of Veii, which had been ten years befleged, they fent a golden cup to Delphos. The deputies who carried that present were taken by the pirates of Lipara, and carried to that island. It was the custom * to divide all the prizes they took as a common flock. The island at that time was under the government of a magistrate more like the Romans in his manners than those he governed. He was called Timalitheus +; and his behaviour agreed well with the fignification of his name. Full of regard for the envoys, the facred gift they carried, the motive of their offering, and more for the majesty of the god for whom it was designed, he inspired the multitude, that generally follow the example of those who rule them, with the same sentiments of respect and religion. The envoys were received therefore with all the marks of diftinction, and their expences borne by the public. Timalitheus convoyed them with a good fquadron to Delphos, and brought them back in the fame manner to Rome. It is eafy to judge how fendibly the Romans were affected with so noble a proceeding. By a decree of the senate, they rewarded Timasitheus with great presents, and granted him the right of hospitality. And sifty years after, when the Romans took Lipara from the Carthaginians, with the same gratitude as if the action had been but lately done, they thought themselves obliged to do further honour to the samily of their benefactor, and resolved that all his descendants should be for ever exempted from the tribute imposed upon the other inhabitants of that island.

Y iiii

&lt;sup>e</sup> Diod. l. xvi. p. 453. f Corfu, <sup>g</sup> Tit, Liv, Decad. i. l. v. c. 28. Diod. l, xiv. p. 307.

Mors erat civitatis, velut publico latrocinio, partem praedam dividere. Forte eo anno in fummo magistratu erat Timasitheus quidam, Romanis vir similior quam suis: qui ligatorem nomen, donumque, et deum cui mitteretur, et doni causam veritus ipse, multitudinem quoque, quae semper serme regenti est similis, religionis justae implevit; adductosque in publicum hospitium legatos, com praesidio etiam navium Delphos prosecutos, Romam inde sospites resituit. Hospitium cum cos senatus consulto est sactum, donaque publice data. Tit, Liv.

This was certainly great and noble on both fides: But the contrast does no honour to the Athenians.

To return to Dionysius: Though he expressed some regard, for the gods, his actions argued no humanity for his subjects. His past misfortunes, instead of correcting and softening his disposition, had only served to instance it, and to render him more savage and brutal than before.

i The most worthy and considerable of the citizens, not being able to support so cruel a servitude, had recourse to Icetas, king of the Leontines, and abandoning themselves to his conduct, elected him their general; not that they believed he differed in any thing from the most declared tyrants, but because they had no other resource.

During these transactions, the Carthaginians, who were almost always at war with the Syracusans, arrived in Sicily with a great sleet; and having made a great progress there, the Sicilians and the people of Syracuse resolved to send an embassiy into Greece, to demand aid of the Corinthians, from whom the Syracusans were descended, and who had always openly declared against tyrants in savour of liberty. Icetas, who proposed no other end from his command than to make himself master of Syracuse, and had no thoughts of setting it free, treated secretly with the Carthaginians, though in public he affected to praise the wise measures of the Syracusans, and even sent his deputies along with theirs.

i Diod. l. xvi. p. 459, et 464. Plut. in Timol. p. 236, et 243.

Corinth k received the ambassadors perfectly well, and immediately appointed Timoleon their general. He had led a retired life for twenty years, without interfering in public affairs, and was far from believing, that at his age, and in the circumstances he then was, he should be thought of upon such an occasion.

He was descended from one of the noblest families in Corinth, loved his country passionately, and discovered upon all occasions a singular humanity of temper, except against tyrants and bad men. He was un excellent captain: And as in his youth he had all the maturity of age, in age he had all the fire and courage of the most ardent youth.

He had an elder brother called Timophanes, whom he tenderly loved, as he had demonstrated in a battle, in which he covered him with his body, and saved his life at the great danger of his own; but his country was still dearer to him. That brother having made himself tyrant of it, so black a crime gave him the sharpest assistance. He made use of all possible means to bring him back to his duty; kindness, friendship, affection, remonstrances, and even menaces. But sinding all his endeavours inessection, and that nothing could prevail upon a heart abandoned to ambition, he caused his brother to be assassinated in his presence by two of his friends and intimates, and thought, that upon such an occasion, the laws of nature ought to give place to those of his country.

That action was admired and applauded by the principal citizens of Corinth, and by most of the philosophers, who looked upon it as the most noble effort of human virtue; and Plutarch seems to pass the same judgment upon it. All the world were not of that opinion; and some people reproached him as an abominable parricide, who could not fail of drawing down the vengeance of the gods upon him. His mother especially, in the excess of her grief, uttered the most dreadful curses and imprecations against him; and when he came to console her, not being able to bear the sight of her son's murderer, she thrust him away with indignation, and shut her doors against him.

He was then struck with all the horror of the most guilty; and giving himself up to the cruellest remorfe, considered Timophanes no longer as a tyrant, but as a brother, and resolved to put an end to his life, by abstaining from all nourishment. It was with great difficulty his friends dissuaded him from that stall resolution. Overcome by their prayers and intreaties, he was at length prevailed ugon to live; but he condemned himself to pass the rest of his days in solitude. From that moment he renounced all public affairs, and for several years never came to the city, but wandered about in the most solitary and defert places, abandoned to excess of grief and melancholy: So true it is, that neither the praises of slatterers, nor the salse reasonings of ploiticians, can suppress the cries of conscience, which is at once the witness, judge and executioner of those who presume to violate the most sacred rights and ties of nature.

He passed twenty years in this condition. He did indeed return to Corinth at the latter part of that time; but lived there always private and retired, without concerning himself with the administration of the government. It was not without great repugnance that he accepted the employment of general: but he did not think it allowable to refuse the service of his country; and his duty prevailed against his inclination.

Whilft Timoleon affembled his troops, and was preparing to fail, the Corinthians received letters from Icetas, in which he told them, "that it was not necessary for them to make any "further lewies, or to exhaust themselves in great expences to "come to Sicily, and expose themselves to evident danger; "that the Carthaginians, apprized of their design, were waiting to intercept their squadron in its passage with a great sleet; and that their slowness in sending their troops, had obliged him to call in the Carthaginians themselves to his aid, and to make use of them against the tyrant." He had made a secret treaty with them, by which it was stipulated, that after the expulsion of Dionysius from Syracuse, he should take possession of it in his place.

The reading of these letters, far from cooling the zeal of the Corinthians, only incensed them more than at first, and hastened the departure of Timoleon. He embarked on board ten gallies, and arrived safe upon the coast of Italy, where the news that came from Sicily extremely perplexed him, and discouraged his troops. It brought an account, that Icetas had deseated Dionysius, and having made himself master of the greatest part of Syracuse, had obliged the tyrant to shut himself up in the citadel, and in that quarter called the Isle, where he besieged him; and that he had given orders to the Carthaginians to prevent Timoleon's approach, and to come on shore, that they might make a peaceable partition of Sicily between them, when they should have reduced that general to retire.

The Carthaginians in confequence had fent twenty gallies to Rhegium. The Corinthians, upon their arrival at that port, found ambaffadors from Icetas, who declared to Timoleon, that he might come to Syracufe, and would be well received there, provided he difmiffed his troops. The propofal was entirely injurious, and at the fame time more perplexing. It feemed impossible to beat the vessels, which the Barbarians had caused to advance to intercept them in their passage, being twice their force; and to retire, was to abandon all Sicily to extreme distress, which could not avoid being the reaward of Icetas's treachery, and of the support which the Carthaginians should give the tyranny.

In this delicate conjuncture, Timoleon demanded a conference with the ambassadors, and the principal officers of the Carthaginian squadron, in the presence of the people of Rhegium. It was only, he said, to discharge himself, and for his own security, that his country might not accuse him of having disobeyed its orders, and betrayed its interests. The governor and magistrates of Rhegium were of intelligence with him. They defired nothing more than to see the Corinthians in possession of Sicily, and apprehended nothing so much as the neighbourhood of the Barbarians. They summoned therefore an assembly, and shut the gates of the city, upon pretence of preventing the citizens from going abroad, in order to their applying themselves solely to the present affair.

The people being affembled, long speeches were made of little or no tendency; every body treating the same subject, and repeating the fame reasons, or adding new ones, only to protract the council, and to gain time. Whilft this was doing, nine of the Corinthian gallies went off, and were fuffered to pass by the Carthaginian vessels, believing that their departure had been concerted with their own officers, who were in the city, and that those nine gallies were to return to Corinth, the tenth remaining to carry Timoleon to Icetas's army at Syracuse. When Timoleon was informed in a whifper, that his gallies were at fea, he flipt gently through the crowd, which, to fayour his going off, thronged exceedingly round the tribunal. He got to the sea-side, embarked directly, and having rejoined his gallies, they arrived together at Tauromenium, a city of Sicily, where they were received with open arms by Andromachus, who commanded it, and who joined his citizens with the Corinthian troops, to reinstate the Sicilian liberties.

It is easy to comprehend how much the Carthaginians were furprifed and ashamed of being so deceived: But, as somebody told them, being Phoenicians, who passed for the greatest cheats in the world, fraud and artisice ought not to give them so much associated and displeasure.

Upon the news of Timoleon's arrival, Icetas was terrified, and made the greatest part of the Carthaginian gallies advance. They had an hundred and fifty long ships, fifty thousand foot, and three hundred armed chariots. The Syracusans lost all hope when they saw the Carthaginians in possession of the port, Icetas master of the city, Dionysius blocked up in the citadel, and Timoleon without any other hold in Sicily than by a nook of its coast, the small city of Tauromenium, with little hope and less force; for his troops did not amount in all to more than a thousand soldiers, and he had scarce provisions for their substitute. Besides which, the cities placed no considence in him. The ills they had suffered from the extortion and crucky that had been practised amongst them, had exasperated them against all commanders of troops, especially after the horrid treachery of Callippus and Pharax; who being both sent, the one from Athens, and the other from Sparta, to free Sicily and expel the tyrants, made them conceive the tyranny gentle and defirable, fo fevere were the vexations with which they had oppressed them. They were askaid of experiencing the same treatment from Timoleon.

The inhabitants of Adranon, a fmall city below mount Atna, being divided among themselves, one party had called in Icetas and the Carthaginians, and the other had applied to Timoleon. The two chiefs arrived almost at the same time in the neighbourhood of Adranon; the former with five thousand men, and the other with only twelve hundred. Notwithstanding this inequality, Timoleon, who juftly conceived that he should find the Carthaginians in disorder, and employed in taking up their quarters, and pitching their tents, made his toops advance, and without losing time to rest them, as the officers advised him, he marched directly to charge the enemy, who no fooner faw him, than they took to their heels. This occasioned their killing only three hundred, and taking twice as many prisoners; but the Carthaginians lost their camp, and all their baggage. The Adranites opened their gates at the time, and received Timoleon. Other cities fent their deputies to him foon after, and made their submission.

Dionyfius himfelf, who renounced his vain hopes, and faw himfelf at the point of being reduced, as full of contempt for Icetas, who had fuffered himfelf to be so shamefully deseated, as of admiration and esteem for Timoleon, sent ambassadors to the latter, to treat of furrendering himself and the citadel to the Corinthians. Timoleon, taking the advantage of so unexpected a good fortune, made Euclid and Telemachus, with four hundred soldiers, file off into the castle; not all at once, nor in the day-time; that being impossible, the Carthaginians being masters of the gate, but in platoons, and by stealth. Those troops, having got successfully into the citadel, took possession of it with all the tyrant's moveables, and provisions of war. For he had a considerable number of horse, all forts of engines and darts, besides seventy thousand suits of armour, which had been laid up there long before. Diony-fius had also two thousand regular troops, which with the rest he surrendered to Timoleon. And for himself, taking with him his money, and some sew of his friends, he embarked unperceived by the troops of Icetas, and repaired to the camp of Timoleon.

It was the first time of his life that he had appeared in the low and abject state of a private person, and a suppliant; he who had been born and nurtured in the arms of the tyranny, and had seen himself master of the most powerful kingdom that had ever been usurped by tyrants. He had possessed it ten years entire, before Dion took arms against him, and some years after, though always in the midst of wars and battles. He was sent to Corinth with only one galley, without convoy, and with very little money. He served there for a sight, every body running to gaze at him; some with a secret joy of heart, to feed their eyes with the view of the miseries of a man whom the name of tyrant rendered odious; others with a kind of compassion, from comparing the splended condition from which he had fallen, with the inextricable abys of distress into which they beheld him plunged.

His manner of life at Corinth did not long excite any fentiments in regard to him, but those of contempt and indignation. He passed whole days in persumers shops, in taverns, or with actresses and singers, disputing with them upon the rules of mulic, and the harmony of airs. Some people have thought that he behaved in such a manner out of policy, not to give umbrage to the Corinthians, nor to discover any thought or desire of recovering his dominions. But such an opinion does him too much honour; and it seems more probable, that, nurtured and educated as he was in drunkenness and debauchery, he only followed his inclination; and that he passed his life in the kind of slavery into which he was fallen, as he had done upon the throne, having no other resource or consolation in his misfortunes.

m Some writers fay, that the extreme poverty to which he was reduced at Corinth, obliged him to open a school there, and to teach children to read; perhaps, fays Cicero *, without doubt jestingly, to retain a species of empire, and not absolutely to renounce the habit and pleasure of commanding. Whether not that were his motive or not, it is certain that Dionysius, who had seen himself master of Syracuse, and of almost all Sicily, who had possessed immense riches, and had numerous sleets and great armies of horse and foot under his command; that the same Dionysius †, reduced now almost to beggary, and from a king become a schoolmaster, was a good lesson for persons of exalted stations not to conside in their grandeur, nor to rely too much upon their fortune. The Lacedaemonians some time after gave Philip this admonition. That prince o, having written to them in very haughty and menacing terms, they made him no other answer but "Dio-"nysius at Corinth."

<sup>1</sup> A. M. 3657. Ant. J. C. 347. M Cic. Tufc. Quaest. l. iii. n. 27.

An expression of Dionysius, which has been preserved, seems to argue, if it be true, that he knew how to make a good use of his adversity, and to turn his misfortunes to his advantage; which would be very much to his praise, but contrary to what has been related of him before. P Whilst he lived at Corinth, a stranger rallied him unseasonably, and with an indecent grossness, upon his commerce with the philosophers during his most splendid fortune, and asked him by way of insult, Of what consequence all the wisdom of Plato had been to him? "Can you believe then," replied he, "that I have "received no benefit from Plato, and see me bear ill fortune "as I do?"

n Val. Max. l. vi. c. 9.

O Demet. Phaler. de eloq. 11. l. viii.

P Plut. in Timol. p. 243.

* Dionysii Corinthi pueros docebat, usque adeo imperio carere non poterat.

† Tanta mutatione majores natu, nequis nimis fortunae crederet, magister ludi factus ex tyranno docuit.

SECTION VI.

TIMOLEON restores LIBERTY to STRACUSE, and institutes wife LAWS. His DEATH.

AFTER the retreat of Dionysius q, Icetas pressed the siege of the citadel of Syracuse with the utmost vigour, and kept it so closely blocked up, that the convoys sent to the Corinthians could not enter it without great difficulty. Timoleon, who was at Catana, fent them frequently thither. To deprive them of this relief, Icetas and Mago fet out together with defign to befiege that place. During their absence, Leon the Corinthian, who commanded in the citadel, having observed from the ramparts, that those who had been left to continue the fiege, were very remifs in their duty, he made a fudden furious fally upon them, whilft they were dispersed, killed part of them, put the rest to flight, and seized the quarter of the city called Achradina, which was the strongest part of it, and had been least injured by the enemy. Leon fortified it in the best manner the time would admit, and joined it to the citadel by works of communication.

This bad news caused Mago and Icetas to return immediately. At the same time a body of troops from Corinth landed safe in Sicily, having deceived the vigilance of the Carthaginian squadron posted to intercept them. When they were landed, Timoleon received them with joy, and after having taken possession of Messina, marched in battle array against Syracuse. His army consisted only of four thousand men. When he approached the city, his first care was to send emissaries amongst the soldiers that bore arms for Icetas. They represented to them, that it was highly shameful for Greeks, as they were, to labour that Syracuse and all Sicily should be given up to the Carthaginians, the wickedest and most cruel of all barbarians. That Icetas had only to join Timoleon, and to act in concert with him against the common enemy. Those soldiers, having spread these infinuations throughout the whole camp, gave Mago violent fufpicions of his being betrayed; befides which, he had already for fome time fought a pretext to retire. For these reasons, notwithstanding the entreaties and warm remonstrances of Icetas, he weighed anchor, and set fail for Africa, shamefully abandoning the conquest of Sicily.

&lt;sup>q</sup> A. M. 3658. Ant. J. C. 346. Plut. in Timol. p. 243—248. Diod. l. xvi. p. 465, et 474.

Timoleon's army the next day appeared before the place in line of battle, and attacked it in three different quarters with so much vigour and success, that Icetas's troops were universally overthrown and put to flight. Thus, by a good fortune that has few examples, he carried Syracuse by force in an instant, which was at that time one of the ftrongest cities in the world. When he had made himself master of it, he did not act like Dion in sparing the forts and public edifices for their beauty and magnificence. To avoid giving the same cause of suspicion, which at first decried, though without foundation, and at length ruined, that great man, he caused proclamation to be made by found of trumpet, that all Syracufans, who would come with their tools, might employ themselves in demolishing the forts of the tyrants. In consequence of which, the Syraculans confidering that proclamation and day as the commencement of their liberty, ran in multitudes to the citadel, which they not only demolished, but the palaces of the tyrant; breaking open their tombs at the same time, which they also threw down and destroyed.

The citadel being razed, and the ground made level; Timoleon caused tribunals to be erected upon it, for the dispensation of justice in the name of the people; that the same place, from whence; under the tyrants, every day some bloody edict had issued, might become the asylum and bulwark of liberty and innocence.

Timoleon was master of the city; but it wanted people to inhabit it: For some having perished in the wars and seditions, and others being sled to avoid the power of the tyrants, Syratuse was become a desert, and the grass was grown so high in the streets, that horses grazed in them. All the cities in Sicily were almost in the same condition. Timoleon and the Syratic streets was street.

Volume IV.

raculans therefore found it necessary to write to Corinth, to defire that people might be sent from Greece to inhabit Syracuse; that otherwise the country could never recover itself, and was besides threatened with a new war. For they had received advice, that Mago having killed himself, the Carthaginians, enraged at his having acquitted himself so ill of his charge, had hung up his body upon a cross, and were making great levies to return into Sicily with a more numerous army than at the beginning of the year.

Those letters being arrived with ambassadors from Syracuse. who conjured the Corinthians to take compassion of their city, and to be a fecond time the founders of it; the Corinthians did not consider the calamity of that people as an occasion of aggrandizing themselves, and of making themselves masters of the city, according to the maxims of a base and infamous policy; but sending to all the sacred games of Greece, and to all public affemblies, they caused proclamation to be made in them by heralds, that the Corinthians having abolished the tyranny, and expelled the tyrants, they declared free and independent the Syracufans, and all the people of Sicily, who should return into their own country; and exhorted them to repair thither. to partake of an equal and just distribution of the lands amongst them. At the same time they dispatched couriers into Asia, and into all the isles, whither great numbers of fugitives had ritired, to invite them to come as foon as possible to Corinth, which would provide them veffels, commanders, and a fafe convoy to transport them into their country at its own expence.

Upon this publication Corinth received univerfal praises and blessings, as it justly deserved. It was every where proclaimed, that Corinth had delivered Syracuse from the tyrants, had preserved it from falling into the hands of the Barbarians, and restored it to its citizens. It is not necessary to insist here upon the grandeur of so noble and generous an action: The mere relation of it must make the impression that always results from the great and noble; and every body owned, that never conquest or triumph equalled the glory which the Corinthians then acquired by so perfect and magnanimous a disinterestedness.

Those who came to Corinth, not being sufficiently numerous, demanded an addition of inhabitants from that city and from all Greece, to augment this kind of colony. Having obtained their request, and finding themselves increased to ten thousand, they embarked for Syracuse, where a multitude of people from all parts of Italy and Sicily had joined Timoleon. It was said their number amounted to fixty thousand and upwards. Timoleon distributed the lands amongst them gratis; but sold them the houses, with which he raised a very great sum; leaving it to the discretion of the old inhabitants to redeem their own: And by this means he collected a considerable fund for such of the people as were poor, and unable to support either their own necessities or the charges of the war.

The flatutes of the tyrants, and of all the princes who had governed Sicily, were put up to fale; but first they were cited, and sentenced in the forms of law. One only escaped the rigour of this inquiry, and was preserved; which was Gelon, who had gained a celebrated victory over the Carthaginians at Himera, and governed the people with lenity and justice; for which his memory was still cherished and honoured. If the same scrutiny were made in all statues, I do not know whether many would continue in being.

r History has preserved another sentence passed also in regard to a statue, but of a very different kind. The fact is curious, and will excuse a digression. Nicon, a champion of *. Thasos, had been crowned sourteen hundred times victor in the solemn games of Greece. A man of that merit could not fail of being envied. After his death, one of his competitors insulted his statue, and gave it several blows; to revenge perhaps those he had formerly received from him it represented. But the statue, as if sensible of that outrage, sell from its height upon the person that insulted it, and killed him. The son of him who had been crushed to death, proceeded juridically against the statue, as guilty of homicide, and punishable by the law of Draco. The samons legislator of Athens, to inspire a greater horror for the guilt of murder, had ordained that even inanimate things should be destroyed, which should occasion the death of a man by their fall. The Thasians, conformable to this law, decreed that the statue should be thrown into the sea. But som years after, being afflicted with a great famine, and having consulted the oracle of Delphos, they caused it to be taken out of the sea, and rendered new honours to it.

Zij

Syracuse being raised in a manner from the grave, and people slocking from all parts to inhabit it, Timoleon, desirous of freeing the other cities of Sicily, and finally to extirpate tyranny and tyrants out of it, began his march with his army. He compelled Icetas to renounce his alliance with the Carthaginians, obliged him to demolish his forts, and to live as a private person in the city of the Leontines. Leptinus, tyrant of Apollonia, and of several other cities and fortresses, seeing himfelf in danger of being taking by sorce, surrendered himself. Timoleon spared his life, and sent him to Corinth: For he shought nothing more great and honourable, than to let Greece see the tyrants of Sicily in a state of humiliation, and living like exiles.

He returned afterwards to Syracuse, to regulate the government, and to inflitute such laws as should be most important and necessary, in conjunction with Cephalus and Dionysius, two legislators sent to him by the Corinthians: For he had not the weakness to desire unlimited power, and sole administration. But on his departure, that the troops in his pay might get something for themselves, and to keep them in exercise at the same time, he sent them, under the command of Dinarchus and Demaratus, into all the places subject to the Carthaginians. Those troops brought over several cities from the Barbarians lived always in abundance, made much booty, and returned with considerable sums of money, which was of great service in the support of the war.

About this time, the Carthaginians arrived at Lilybaeum, under Afdrubal and Amilear, with an army of feventy thousand men, two hundred ships of war, a thousand transports laden with machines, armed chariots, horses, amunition, and provisions. They proposed no less than the entire expulsion of the Greeks out of Sicily. Timoleon did not think fit to wait their advancing; and though he could raise only fix or seven thousand men, so great was the people's terror, he marched with that small body of troops against the formidable body of the enemy, and obtained a celebrated victory near the river Crimesus; an account of which may be found in the history of the Carthaginians. Timoleon returned to Syracuse amidst shouts of joy and universal applauses.

<sup>8</sup> Plut. in Timol. p. 248, et 255.

He had before effected the conquest and reduction of the Sicilian tyrants, but had not changed them, nor taken from them their tyrannical disposition. They united together, and formed a powerful league against him. Timoleon immediately took the field, and soon put a final end to their hopes. He made them all suffer the just punishment their revolt deserved. Icetas, amongst others, with his son, were put to death as tyrants and traitors. His wise and daughters, having been sent to Syracuse, and presented to the people, were also sentenced to die, and executed accordingly. The people, without doubt, designed to avenge Dion their first deliverer by that decree. For it was the same Icetas, who had caused Arete, Dion's wise, his sister Aristomache, and his son, an infant, to be thrown into the sea.

Virtue is feldom or never without envy. The accufers funmoned Timoleon to answer for his conduct before the judges; and having assigned him a certain day for his appearance, demanded sureties of him. The people expressed great indignation against such a proceeding, and would have dispensed with so great a man's observing the usual formalities; which he strongly opposed, giving for his reason, that all he had undertaken had no other principle, than that the laws might have their due course. He was accused of malversation during his command of the army. Timoleon, without giving himself the trouble to result those calumnies, only replied, "That he "thanked the gods, who had heard his prayers, and that he at length saw the Syracusans enjoy an entire liberty of say" ing every thing; a liberty absolutely unknown to them un" der the tyrants, but which it was just to confine within due " bounds."

That great man had given Syracuse wise laws, had purged all Sicily of the tyrants which had fo long infested it, had reestablished peace and security universally, and supplied the cities ruined by the war, with the means of reinstating themfelves. After fuch glorious actions, which had acquired him an unbounded credit, he quitted his authority to live in retirement. The Syracufans had given him the best house in the city in gratitude for his great fervices, and another very fine and agreeable one in the country, where he generally refided with his wife and children, whom he had fent for from Corinth; for he did not return thither, and Syracuse was become his country. He had the wisdom, in resigning every thing, to abstract himself entirely also from envy, which never fails to attend exalted stations, and pays no respect to merit, however great and fubftantial. He shunned the rock on which the greatest men, through an insatiate lust of honours and power, are often shipwrecked; that is, by engaging to the end of their lives in new cares and troubles, of which age renders them incapable, and by choosing rather to fink under, than to lay down, the weight of them *.

Timoleon, who knew all the value of † a noble and glorious leisure, acted in a different manner. He passed the rest of his life as a private person, enjoying the grateful satisfaction of seeing fo many cities, and such a numerous people, indebted to him for their happiness and tranquillity. But he was always respected and consulted as the common oracle of Sicily. Neither treaty of peace, institution of law, division of land, nor regulation of government, seemed well done, if Timoleon had not been consulted, and put the last hand to it.

His age was tried with a very fensible affliction, which he supported with association patience; it was the loss of sight. That accident, far from lessening him in the consideration and regard of the people, served only to augment them. The Syracufans did not content themselves with paying him frequent visits; they conducted all strangers, both in town and country, to see their benefactor and deliverer. When they had any important affair to deliberate upon in the assembly of the people, they called him in to their assistance, who came thither in a chariot drawn by two horses, which crossed the public place to the theatre; and in that manner he was introduced into the assembly, amidst the shouts and acclamations of joy of the whole people. After he had given his opinion, which was always religiously observed, his domestics re-conducted him cross the theatre, followed by all the citizens beyond the gates with continual shouts of joy and clapping of hands.

? Malunt deficere quam definere. Quintil,

† Otium cum dignitate. Cie.

He had still greater honours paid to him after his death. Nothing was wanting that could add to the magnificence of the procession, which followed his bier; of which the tears that were shed, and the blessings uttered by every body in honour of his memory, were the noblest ornaments. Those tears were neither the effect of custom and the formality of mourning, nor exacted by a public decree; but slowed from a native source, sincere affection, lively gratitude, and inconsolable forrow. A law was also made, that annually for the future, upon the day of his death, the music and gymnastic games should be celebrated with horse-races in honour of him. But what was still more honourable for the memory of that great man, was the decree of the Syracusan people; that whenever Sicily should be engaged in a war with foreigners, they should fend to Corinth for a general.

I do not know, that history has any thing more great and accomplished than what it says of Timoleon. I speak not only of his military exploits, but the happy success of all his undertakings. Plutarch observes a characteristic in them, which distinguishes Timoleon from all the great men of his times, and makes use upon that occasion, of a very remarkable comparison. There is, says he, in painting and poetry, pieces which are excellent in themselves, and which at the first view may be known to be the works of a master: but some of them denote their having cost abundance of pains and application;

whereas in others an eafy and native grace is seen, which adds exceedingly to their value; and amongst the latter, he places the poems of Homer. There is something of this fort occurs, when we compare the great actions of Epaminondas and Age-silaus with those of Timoleon. In the former, we find them executed with sorce and innumerable difficulties; but in the latter, there is an easiness and facility, which distinguish them as the work, not of fortune, but of virtue, which fortune feems to have taken pleasure in seconding. It is Plutarch who still speaks.

But not to mention his military actions; what I admire most in Timoleon, is his warm and difinterested passion for the public good, and his referving only for himself the pleasure of seeing others happy by his fervices; his extreme remoteness from ambition and haughtiness; his honourable retirement into the country; his modesty, moderation, and indifference for the honours paid him; and what is still more uncommon, his aversion for all flattery, and even just praises. When * somebody extolled in his presence, his wisdom, valour, and glory, in having expelled the tyrants, he made no answer, but that he thought himself obliged to express his gratitude to the gods, who having decreed to restore peace and liberty to Sicily, had youchfafed to make choice of him in preference to all others for fo honourable a ministration: For he was fully perfuaded, that all human events are guided and disposed by the secret decrees of divine providence. What a treasure, what a happiness for a state is such a minister!

For the better understanding his value, we have only to compare the condition of Syracuse under Timoleon, with its state under the two Dionysiuses. It is the same city, inhabitants, and people; But how different is it under the different governments we speak of! The two tyrants had no thoughts but of making themselves seared, and of depressing their subjects to render them more passive. They were terrible in effect, as they defired to be; but at the same time detested and abhorred; and had more to sear from their subjects, than the subjects from them. Timoleon, on the contrary, who looked upon himself as the father of the Syracusan people, and who had no thoughts but of making them happy, enjoyed the refined pleasure of being beloved and revered as a parent by his children: And he was remembered amongst them with blessings, because they could not reslect upon the peace and selicity they enjoyed, without calling to mind at the same time the wise legislator, to whom they were indebted for those inestimable blessings,

* Cum suas laudes audiret praedicari, nunquam aliud dixit, quam se in ea re maximas diis gratias agere et habere, quod, cum Siciliam recreare constituissent, tum se potissimum ducem esse voluissent. Nihil enter rerum humanarum sine deorum numine agi putabat. Cor. Nep. in Timol. c. 4.

THE

HISTORY

OF THE

PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.

CHAPTER I.

THIS book contains principally the history of two very illustrious generals of the Thebans, Epaminondas and Pelopidas; the deaths of Agesilaus king of Sparta, and of Artaxerxes Mnemon king of Persia.

SECTION I.

STATE of GREECE from the TREATY of ANTALCIDES.

The peace of Antalcides 2, of which mention has been made in the third chapter of the ninth book, had given the Grecian states great matter of discontent and division. In effect of that treaty, the Thebans had been obliged to abandon the cities of Boeotia, and let them enjoy their liberty; and the Corinthians, to withdraw their garrison from Argos, which by that means became free and independent. The Lacedaemonians, who were the authors and executors of this treaty, saw their power extremely augmented by it, and were industrious to make further additions to it. They compelled the Mantinaeans, against whom they pretended to have many causes of complaint in the last war, to demolish the walls of their city, and to inhabit four different places, as they had done before.

The two kings of Sparta, Agefipolis and Agefilaus, were

&lt;sup>2</sup> A. M. 2617. Ant. J. C. 387. Xenoph, hift, Graec. I, v. p. 550, 553, b Dio d. l. xv. p. 341.

of quite different characters, and as opposite in their opinions upon the present state of affairs. The first, who was naturally inclined to peace, and a strict observer of justice, was for having Sparta, already much exclaimed against for the treaty of Antalcides, fuffer the Grecian cities to enjoy their liberties, according to the tenor of that treaty, and not diffurb their tranquillity, through an unjust defire of extending their dominions. The other, on the contrary, reftless, active, and full of great views of ambition and conquest, breathed nothing

b At the fame time, deputies arrived at Sparta from Acanthus and Apollonia, two very confiderable cities of Macedonia, in respect to Olynthus a city of Thrace, inhabited by Greeks, originally of Chalcis in Euboeac. Athens, after the victories of Salamin and Marathon, had conquered many places on the fide of Thrace, and even in Trace itself. Those cities threw off the yoke, as foon as Sparta (at the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war) had ruined the power of Athens. Olynthus was of this number. The deputies of Acanthus and Apollonia represented, in the general assembly of the allies, that Olynthus, fituated in their neighbourhood, daily improved in strength in an extraordinary manner; that it perpetually extended its dominions by new conquests; that it obliged all the cities round about to submit to it, and to enter into its meafures; and was upon the point of concluding an alliance with the Athenians and the Thebans. The affair being taken into confideration, it was unanimously resolved, that it was necesfary to declare war against the Olynthians. It was agreed, that the allied cities should furnish ten thousand troops, with liberty, to fuch as defired it, to substitute money, at the rate of three obolid a-day for each foot-foldier, and four times as much for the horfe. The Lacedaemonians, to lose no time, made their troops march directly, under the command of Eudamidas, who prevailed with the Ephori, that Phaebidas his brother, might have the leading of those which were to follow, and to join him foon after. When he arrived in that part of Macedonia, which is also called Thrace, he garrisoned such places as applied to him for that purpose, seized upon Potidaea, a city in alliance with the Olynthians which surrendered without making any defence, and began the war against Olynthus, though slowly, as it was necessary for a general to act before his troops were all assembled.

b A. M. 3621, Ant. J. C. 383 C Diod. l. xv. p. 554, 556. d Fivepence.

f Phaebidas began his march foon after, and being arrived near Thebes, encamped without the walls near the Gymnasium or public place of exercise. Is menius and Leontides, both Polemarchs, that is, generals of the army, and supreme magisfirates of Thebes, were at the head of two different factions. The first, who had engaged Pelopidas in his party, was no friend to the Lacedaemonians, nor they to him; because he publicly declared for popular government and liberty. The other, on the contrary, savoured an oligarchy, and was supported by the Lacedaemonians with their whole interest. I am obliged to enter into this detail, because the event I am going to relate, and which was a consequence of it, occasions the important war between the Thebans and Spartans.

This being the state of affairs at Thebes, Leontides applied to Phaebidas, and proposed to him to seize the citadel, called Cadmaea, to expel the adherents of Ismenius, and to give the Lacedaemonians possession of it. He represented to him, that nothing could be more glorious for him, than to make himself master of Thebes, whilst his brother was endeavouring to reduce Olynthus; that he would thereby facilitate the success of his brother's enterprise; and that the Thebans, who had prohibited their citizens by decree to bear arms against the Olynthians, would not fail, upon his making himself master of the citadel, to supply him with whatever number of horse and soot he should think proper, for the reinforcement of Eudamidas.

Phaebidas, who had much ambition and little conduct, and who had no other view than to fignalize himself by some extraordinary action, without examining the consequences, suffered himself to be easily persuaded. Whilst the Thebans, entirely secured under the treaty of peace lately concluded by the Grecian states, celebrated the seasts of Geres, and expected nothing less than such an act of hostility. Phaebidas, conducted by Leontides, took possession of the citadel. The senate was then fitting. Leontides went to them, and declared, that there was nothing to be feared from the Lacedaemonians, who had entered the citadel; that they were only the enemies of those, who were for disturbing the public tranquillity; that as for himself, by the power his office of Polemarch gave him of confining whoever caballed against the state, he should put Ifmenius into a place of security, who factiously endeavoured to break the peace. He was feized accordingly, and carried to the citadel. The party of Ismenius seeing their chief a prisoner, and apprehending the utmost violence for themselves, quitted the city with precipitation, and retired to Athens, to the number of four hundred and upwards. They were foon after banished by a public decree. Pelopidas was of the number; but Epaminondas remained at Thebes unmolested; being difregarded, as a man entirely devoted to the study of philosophy, who did not intermeddle in affairs of flate; and also from his poverty, which left no room to fear any thing from him. A new Polemarch was nominated in the room of Ismenius, and Leontides went to Lacedaemon.

&lt;sup>2</sup> A. M. 3621. Ant. J. C. 382. Xenoph. p. 556—558. Plut. in Agefil. p. 608, 609. ld. in Pel-p. p. 280. Diod. l. xv. p. 341, 342.

The news of Phaebidas's enterprise, who at a time of general peace had taken possession of a citadel by force, upon which he had no claim or right, had occasioned great murmurings and complaints. Such especially as opposed Agesilaus, who was fuspected of having shared in the scheme, demanded by whose orders Phaebidas had committed so strange a breach of public faith. Agefilaus, who well knew that those warm reproaches were aimed at him, made no difficulty of justifying Phaebidas, and declared openly, and before all the world, " That the action ought to be confidered in itself, in order to " understand whether it were useful or not; that whatever was " expedient for Sparta, he was not only permitted, but com-" manded to act upon his own authority, and without waiting " the orders of any body:" Strange principles to be advanced by a person, who upon other occasions had maintained, "That " justice was the supreme of virtues, and that without it, va"lour itself, and every other great quality, were useless and unavailing." It is the same man that made answer, when somebody in his presence magnified the king of Persia's grandenr; "He whom you call the great king, in what is he greater than me, unless he be more just?" A truly noble and admirable manim, that justice must be the rule of whatever excels and is great! But a maxim that he had only in his mouth, and which all his actions contradicted, conformable to the principle of the generality of politicians, who imagine, that a statesman ought always to have justice in his mouth, but never lose an occasion of violating it for the advantage of his country.

But let us now hear the fentence, which the august affembly of Sparta, fo renowned for the wisdom of its counsels and the equity of its decrees, is about to pronounce. The affair being maturely confidered, the whole discussed at large, and the manner of it fet in its full light, the affembly resolved, that Phaebidas should be deprived of his command, and fined an hundred thousand drachms*; but that they should continue to hold the citadel, and keep a good garrifon in it. What a strange contradiction was this, fays Polybius h! what a difregard of all justice and reason! to punish the criminal, and approve the crime; and not only to approve the crime tacitly, and without having any share in it, but to ratify it by the public authority, and continue it in the name of the state for the advantages arising from it! But this was not all: Commissioners, appointed by all the cities in alliance with Sparta, were difpatched to the citadel of Thebes to try Ifmenius, upon whom they passed sentence of death, which was immediately executed. Such flagrant injustice feldom remains unpunished. To act in fuch a manner, fays Polybius again, is neither for one's country's interest, nor one's own.

<sup>1</sup> Telutias, Agefilaus's brother, had been fubstituted in the place of Phaebidas to command the rest of the troops of the allies designed against Olynthus; whither he marched with all

h Lib. iv. p. 196.

<sup>1</sup> Xenoph. L. v. p. 559-565. Diod. l. av. p. 342, 343.

* About 2020 l. Sterling.

expedition. The city was ftrong, and furnished with every thing necessary to a good defence. Several sallies were made with great success; in one of which Teleutias was killed. The next year, king Agesipolis had the command of the army. The campaign passed in skirmishing, without any thing decisive. Agesipolis died foon after of a disease, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, who reigned nine years. About that time began the hundredth Olympiad. Sparta made fresh efforts to terminate the war with the Olynthians. Polybidas their general pressed the siege with vigour. The place being in want of provisions, was at last obliged to surrender, and was received by the Spartans into the number of their allies.

SECTION II.

SPARTA'S PROSPERITY. CHARACTER of two illustrious THEBANS, EPAMINONDAS and PELOPIDAS.

THE k fortune of the Lacedaemonians never appeared with greater splendor, nor their power more strongly established. All Greece was subjected to them either by force or alliance. They were in possession of Thebes, a most powerful city, and with that of all Boeotia. They had found means to humble Argos, and to hold it in dependence. Corinth was entirely at their devotion, and obeyed their orders in every thing. The Athenians, abandoned by their allies, and reduced almost to their own strength, were in no condition to make head against them. If any city, or people in their alliance, attempted to abstract themselves from their power, an immediate punishment reduced them to their former obedience, and terrified all others from following their example. Thus, mafters by sea and land, all trembled before them; and the most formidable princes, as the king of Persia and the tyrant of Sicily, seemed to emulate each other in courting their friendship and alliance.

A prosperity founded in injustice, can be of no long duration. The greatest blows that were given the Spartan power, came from the quarter where they had acted the highest injuries, and from whence they did not feem to have any thing to fear; that is to say; from Thebes. Two illustrious citizens of that state will make a glorious appearance upon the theatre of Greece, and for that reason deserve our notice in this place.

<sup>1</sup> A. M. 3624. Ant. J. C. 380.

* Xenoph. p. 565. Diod. p. 334.

These are Pelopidas and Epaminondas in; both descended from the noblest families of Thebes. Pelopidas, nurtured in the greatest affluence, and whilst young, fole heir of a very rich and flourishing family, employed his wealth from the first possession of it in the relief of such as had occasion for it, and merited his favour; shewing in that wife use of his riches, that he was really their master and not their slave. For, according to Aristotle's remark, repeated by Plutarch *, most men either make no use at all of their fortunes out of avarice: or abuse them in bad and trisling expences. As for Epaminondas, poverty was all his inheritance, in which his honour, and one might almost say his joy and delight, consisted. He was born of poor parents, and confequently familiarized from his infancy with poverty, which he made more grateful and eafy to him by his tafle for philosophy. Pelopidas, who supported a great number of citizens, never being able to prevail on him to accept his offers, and to make use of his fortune, resolved to share in the poverty of his friend, by making him his example, and became the model as well as admiration of the whole city, from the modesty of his dress, and the frugality of his table.

a If Epaminondas was poor as to the goods of fortune, those of the head and heart made him most ample amends. Modest, prudent, grave; happy in improving occasions; possessing in a supreme degree the science of war; equally valiant and wise; easy and complaisant in the commerce of the world; suffering with incredible patience the people's, and even his friends ill treatment; uniting with the ardour for military exercises, a wonderful taste for study and the sciences; piquing himself especially so much upon truth and sincerity, that he made a scruple of telling a lie even in jest, or for diversion.

m Plut, in Pelop. p. 279. n Cor. Nep. in Epam. c. iii.

• Tar wolder, of why & xearras कर जीक्षेत्रक ठीवे कामश्रीकात, of की जबहुक्त्रहर्णीया है। बक्कीया-

"Adeo veritatis diligens, ut ne joco quidem mentiretur."

OThey were both equally inclined to virtue. But Pelopidas was best pleased with the exercises of the body, and Epaminondas with the cultivation of the mind. For which reason, they employed their leisure, the one in the palaestra and the chace, and the other in conversation and the study of phialosophy.

But what perfons of fense and judgment must principally admire in them, and which is rarely found in their high rank, is the perfect union and friendship, that always sublisted between them during the whole time they were employed together in the administration of the public affairs, whether in war or peace. If we examine the government of Ariftides and Themistocles, that of Cimon and Pericles, of Nicias and Alcibiades, we shall find them full of trouble, diffention, and debate. The two friends we speak of held the first offices in the flate; all great affairs passed through their hands; every thing was confided to their care and authority. In fuch delicate conjunctures what occasions of pique and jealousy generally arise? But neither difference of sentiment, diversity of interest, nor the least emotion of envy, ever altered their union and good understanding. The reason of which was, their being founded upon an unalterable principle, that is, upon virtue; which in all their actions, fays Plutarch, occasioned their having neither glory nor riches, fatal fources of strife and division, in view, but folely the public good, and made them defire not the advancement or honour of their own families, but to render their country more powerful and flourishing. Such were the two illustrious men who are about to make their appearance, and to give a new face to the affairs of Greece, by the great events in which they have a principal share.

P Leontides, being apprized that the exiles had retired to Volume IV. A a Plut. in Pelop. p. 279.

P. A. M. 3626. Ant. J. C. 378. Xenoph. hift. Gr. l. v. p. 566—568. Plut. in Pelop. 280—284. Id. de Socrat. gen. p. 586—588, et 594—598. Diod. l. xv. p. 344—346. Cor. Nep. in Pelop. c. i—iv.

Athens, where they had been well received by the people, and were in great efteem with all people of worth and honour, fent thither certain unknown persons to affassinate the most considerable of them. Only Androclides was killed; all the rest cscaping the contrivances of Leontides.

At the fame time, the Athenians received letters from Sparta, to prohibit their receiving or affifting the exiles, and with orders to expel them their city, as they were declared common enemies by all the allies. The humanity and virtue, peculiar and natural to the Athenians, made them reject fo infamous a propofal with horror. They were transported with the occasion of expressing their gratitude to the Thebans for a previous obligation of the same nature. For the Thebans had contributed most to the re-establishment of the popular government at Athens, having declared in their favour by a public decree, contrary to the prohibition of Sparta; and it was from Thebes, Thraspbulus set out to deliver Athens from the tyranny of the thirty.

Pelopidas, though at that time very young, went to all the exiles one after another, of whom Melon was the most confiderable. He represented to them, "That it was unworthy " of honest men, to content themselves with having faved " their own lives, and to look with indifference upon their " country, enflaved and miferable: That whatever good-will " the people of Athens might express for them, it was not " fit that they should suffer their fate to depend upon the de-" crees of a people, which their natural inconfiancy, and the " malignity of orators that turned them any way at will, might " foon alter: That it was necessary to hazard every thing, af-" ter the example of Thrafybulus, and to fet before them his " intrepid valour and generous fortitude as a model: That as " he fet out from Thebes to suppress and destroy the tyrants " of Athens, fo they might go from Athens to restore The-" bes its ancient liberty."

This discourse made all the impression upon the exiles that could be expected. They sent privately to inform their friends at Thebes of their resolution, who extremely approved their defign. Charon, one of the principal persons of the city, offered to receive the conspirators into his house. Philidas found means to get himself made fecretary to Archidas and Philip. who were then Polemarchs, or supreme magistrates of the city. As for Epaminondas, he had for fome time diligently endeavoured to inspire the younger Thebans by his discourse with a passionate desire to throw off the Spartan yoke. 4 He was ignorant of nothing that had been projected; but he believed, that he ought not to have any share it, because, as he faid, he could not resolve to imbrue his hands in the blood of his country; forefeeing that his friends would not keep within the due bounds of the enterprise, however lawful in itself, and that the tyrants would not perish alone; and convinced besides, that a citizen, who should not appear to have taken either party, would have it in his power to influence the people with the better effect.

The day for the execution of the project being fixed, the exiles thought proper, that Pherenicus, with all the confpirators, should stop at Thriasium, a little town not far from Thebes, and that a small number of the youngest of them should venture into the city. Twelve persons of the best families of Thebes, all united by a strict and faithful friendship with each other, though competitors for glory and honour, offered themselves for this bold enterprise. Pelopidas was of this number. After having embraced their companions, and dispatched a messenger to Charon, to give him notice of their coming, they set out dressed in mean habits, carrying hounds with them, and poles in their hands for pitching of nets; that such as they met on the way might have no suspicion of them, and take them only for hunters, that had wandered after their game.

Their messenger being arrived at Thebes, and having informed Charon, that they were set out, the approach of danger did not alter his sentiments; and as he wanted neither courage nor honour, he prepared his house for their reception.

Aaij

One of the conspirators, who was no bad man, loved his country, and would have served the exiles with all his power, but had neither the resolution nor constancy necessary for such an enterprise, and could think of nothing but difficulties and obstacles, that presented themselves in crowds to his imagination: Much disordered with the prospect of danger, this person retired into his house without saying any thing, and dispatched one of his friends to Melon and Pelopidas, to desire them to deser their enterprise, and return to Athens till a more favourable opportunity. Happily that friend, not finding his horse's bridle, and losing a great deal of time in quarrelling with his wife, was prevented from going.

Pelopidas and his companions, difguifed like peafants, and having feparated from each other, entered the city at different gates towards the close of day. It was then early in the winter, the north wind blew, and the fnow fell; which contributed to conceal them, every body keeping within doors upon account of the cold weather; besides which, it gave them an opportunity of covering their faces. Some, who were in the secret, received and conducted them to Charon's house; where, of exiles and others, their whole number amounted to forty-eight.

Philidas, fecretary to the * Boeotarchs, who was in the plot, had fome time before invited Archias and his companions to fupper, promifing them an exquifite repaft, and the company of fome of the finest women in the city. The guests being met at the appointed time, they fat down to table. They had been free with the glass, and were almost drunk, when it was whispered about, but not known where the report began, that the exiles were in the city. Philidas, without shewing any concern, did his utmost to change the discourse. Archias however fent one of his officers to Charon, with orders to come to him immediately. It was now late, and Pelopidas and the conspirators were preparing to set out, and had put on their armour and swords, when, on a sudden, they heard a knocking at the door. Somebody went to it; and being told by the officer, that he was come from the magistrates with orders for Charon to attend them immediately, he ran to him half out of his wits to acquaint him with that terrible message. They all concluded, that the conspiracy was discovered, and believed themselves lost, before it would be possible to execute any thing worthy their cause and valour. However, they were all of opinion that Charon should obey the order, and present himself with an air of assurance to the magistrates, as void of fear, and unconscious of offence.

* The magistrates and generals who were charged with the government of Thebes, were called Bocotarchs, that is to say, commanders or governors of Bocotia.

Charon was a man of intrepid courage in dangers which threatened only himself; but at that time, terrified for his friends, and apprehending also, that he should be suspected of some treachery, if so many brave citizens, whom he had received into his house, should be destroyed, he went to his wife's apartment, and setched his only son, of fifteen years old at most, who in beauty and strength excelled all the youths of his age, and put him into the hands of Pelopidas, saying at the same time, "If you discover that I have betrayed you, and have been guilty of treachery upon this occasion, re"venge yourselves on me in this my only son, whom, as dear
"as he is to me, I abandon to you, and let him fall a victim
"without mercy to his father's persidy."

These expressions wounded them to the heart; but what gave them the most sensible pain, was his imagining there was any one amongst them so mean and ungrateful, as to form to himself the least suspicion in regard to him. They conjured him unanimously, not to leave his son with them, but to put him into some place of safety; that his friends and country might not want an avenger, if he should be so fortunate as to escape the tyrants. "No," replied the father, "he shall stay with you, and share your sate. If he must perish, what nobler end can he make, than with his sather and best friends? For you, my son, exert yourself beyond your years, and shew a courage worthy of you and me. You see here

" the most excellent of the Thebans. Make under such mas-

"be fo, to die, like them, for liberty. For the rest, I am not "without hopes; for I believe, that the justice of our cause" will draw down the savour and protection of the gods up"on us." He concluded with a prayer for them; and after embracing the conspirators, went out.

He took pains on his way to recover himfelf, and to compose his looks and voice, that he might not appear under any concern. When he came to the door of the house where the feast was kept, Archias and Philidas came out to him, and asked the meaning of a report, that disaffected people were arrived in the city, and were concealed in some house. He seemed aftonished; and finding by their answers to his questions, that they had no precise information of any thing, he assumed a bolder tone, and faid, "It is very likely the report you speak " of is only a false alarm, intended to interrupt your mirth: " However, as it ought not to be neglected, I will go im-" mediately and make the firictest enquiry possible into it." Philidas praifed his prudence and zeal; and carrying Archias back into the company, he plunged him again in the debauch, and continued the entertainment, by keeping the guests in perpetual expectation of the women he had promifed them.

Charon, on his return home, found his friends all prepared, not to conquer or to fave their lives, but to die gloriously, and to fell themselves as dear as they could. The screnity and joy of his looks explained beforehand, that they had nothing to fear. He repeated all that had passed; after which, they had no thoughts but of the instant execution of a design, to which the least delay might occasion a thousand obstacles.

In effect, at that very inftant happened a fecond florm, far more violent than the first, and which seemed as if it could not possibly fail of making the enterprise miscarry. A courier from Athens arrived in great haste with a packet, which contained a circumstantial account of the whole conspiracy, as was afterwards discovered. The courier was brought first to Archias, who was far gone in wine, and breathed nothing but pleasure and the bottle. In giving him his dispatches, he said, "My "lord, the person who writes you these letters, conjures you "to read them immediately, being ferious affairs." Archias replied laughing, "* Serious affairs to-morrow," which words were afterwards used by the Greeks as a proverb; and taking the letters, he put them + under his pillow, and continued the conversation and debauch.

The conspirators were at this time in the streets, divided into two parties; the one with Pelopidas at their head, marched against Leontides, who was not at the feast; the other against Archias, under the command of Charon. These had put on women's habits over their armour, and crowned themselves with pine and popular wreaths, which entirely covered their faces. When they came to the door of the apartment where the feast was kept, the guests made a great noise, and fet up loud shouts of joy. But they were told, that the women would not come in till the fervants were all dismissed. which was done immediately. They were fent to neighbouring houses, where there was no want of wine for their entertainment. The conspirators, by this stratagem, having made themselves masters of the field of battle, entered sword in hand. and shewing themselves in their true colours, put all the guests to the fword, and with them the magistrates, who were full of wine, and in no condition to defend themselves. Pelopidas met with more refistance. Leontides, who was asleep in bed. awaked with the noise that was made, and rising immediately, armed himself with his sword, and laid some of the conspirators at his feet; but was at last killed himself.

This grand affair being executed in this manner with fo much dispatch and success, couriers were immediately dispatched to Thriasium. The doors of the prisons were broke open, and sive hundred prisoners let out. The Thebans were called uppon to resume their liberty, and arms were given to all they met. The spoils affixed to the porticoes were taken down, and the armourers and cutlers shops broke open for that purpose. Epaminondas and Gorgidas came in arms to join them, with some old persons of great estimation, whom they had got together.

A a iiij

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Ouxชีง ธิเร ฉับคุเอง, รีอุท, ชล ฮสนอิลโล

The Greeks eat lying on beds.

The whole city was in great terror and confusion; the houses all illnminated with torches, and the streets thronged with the multitude passing to and fro. The people in a consernation at what had happened, and for want of sufficient information, waited impatiently for the day to know their destiny. The Lacedaemonian captains were therefore thought guilty of a very great error in not falling upon them during their disorder; for the garrison consisted of sisteen hundren men, besides three thousand, who had taken refuge in the citadel. Alarmed by the cries they heard, the illuminations they saw in the houses, and the tumult of the multitude running backwards and forwards, they lay still, and contented themselves with guarding the citadel, after having sent couriers to Sparta with the news of what had happened, and to demand an immediate reinforcement.

The next day at fun-rife the exiles arrived with their arms, and the people were fummoned to affemble. Epaminondas and Gorgidas conducted Pelopidas thither, furrounded with all their facrificers, carrying in their hands the fecret bandages and fillets, and exhorting the citizens to affift their country, and to join with their gods. At this fight, the whole affembly rofe up with loud acclamations and clapping of hands, and received the confpirators as their benefactors and deliverers. The fame day, Pelopidas, Melon, and Charon, were elected Boeotarchs.

Soon after the exiles, arrived five thousand foot, and sive hundred horse, sent by the Athenians to Pelopidas, under the command of Demophoon. Those troops, with others which joined them from all the cities of Boeotia, composed an army of twelve thousand foot, and as many horse; and without loss of time besieged the citadel, that it might be taken before relief could come from Sparta.

The befieged made a vigorous defence in hopes of a fpeedy fuccour, and feemed refolved rather to die than forrender the place; at leaft, the Lacedaemonions were of that opinion: But they were not the greatest number of the garrison. When provisions began to fall short, and samine to press them, the rest of the troops obliged the Spartans to surrender. The garrison had their lives granted them, and were permitted to retire whither they thought sit. They were scarce marched out, when the aid arrived. The Lacedaemonians sound Cleombrotus at Megara, at the head of a powerful army, which, with a little more expedition, might have saved the citadel. But this was not the first time the natural slowness of the Lacedaemonians had occasioned the miscarriage of their enterprises. The three commanders who had capitulated were tried. Two of them were punished with death, and the third had so great a fine laid upon him, that not being able to pay it, he banished himself from Peloponnesus.

Pelopidas had all the honour of this great exploit, the most memorable that ever was executed by furprife and stratagem. Plutarch, with reason, compares it to that of Thrasybulus. Both exiles, destitute in themselves of all resource, and reduced to implore a foreign support, form the bold defign of attacking a formidable power with a handful of men, and overcoming all obstacles to their enterprise solely by their valour, had each of them the good fortune to deliver their country. and to change the face of its affairs entirely. For the Athenians were indebted to Thrafybulus for that fudden and happy change, which freeing them from the oppression they groaned under, not only restored their liberty, but with it their ancient splendor, and put them into a condition to humble, and make Sparta tremble in their turn. We shall see in like manner, that the war which reduced the pride of Sparta, and deprived it of the empire both by fea and land, was the work of this fingle night, in which Pelopidas, without taking either citadel or fortress, and entering only one of twelve into a private house *, unloosed and broke the chains imposed by the Lacedaemonians on all the other states of Greece, though it appeared impracticable ever to produce fuch an effect.

Πελοπίδας, εἰ διῖ μέμφρορα τὸ ἀληθες εἰπιῖν, ἡλυσε καὶ δεἰκοψο τὸς δεσμός τῆς Λακιδαιμονίων ἡγραφοίας, ἀλύτας καὶ ἀἰρόκατας εικαι δαλύστας.

SECTION III.

and the description of the Bay

SPHODRIAS forms a DESIGN against the PIRAEUS.

THE Lacedaemonians, after the injury they pretended to have received by the enterprise of Pelopidas, did not continue quiet, but applied themselves in earnest to their revenge. Agesilaus, rightly judging an expedition of that kind, of which the end was to support tyrants, would not resect much honour upon him, lest it to Cleombrotus, who had lately succeeded king Agesipolis, under pretence that his great age dispensed with his undertaking it. Cleombrotus entered Boeotia with his army. The first campaign was not vigorous, and terminated in committing some ravages in the country; after which the king retired; and detaching part of his troops to Sphodrias, who commanded at Thespiae, returned to Sparta.

The Athenians, who did not think themselves in a condition to make head against the Lacedaemonians, and were assaud of the consequences in which their league with the Thebans was likely to engage them, repented their having entered into it, and renounced it. Those who persisted to adhere to the Theban party, were some imprisoned, some put to death, others banished, and the rich severely fined. The Theban affairs seemed almost desperate; not having any alliance to support them. Pelopidas and Gorgidas were then at the head of them, and were studious of finding means to embroil the Athenians with the Lacedaemonians; and this was the stratagem they contrived.

Sphodrias the Spartan had been left at Thespiae with a body of troops, to receive and protect such of the Boeotians as should revolt against Thebes. He had acquired some reputation amongst the soldiery, and wanted neither courage nor ambition; but he was rash, superficial, sull of himself, and consequently apt to entertain vain hopes. Pelopidas and Gorgidas sent privately a merchant of his own acquaintance to him with the offer, as from himself, of a considerable sum of money, and with infinuations more agreeable to him than money, as they flattered his vanity. "After having represented to him, that "one of his merit and reputation ought to form some great "enterprise to immortalize his name; he proposed to him the seizing of the Piraeus by surprise, when the Athenians had "no expectation of such an attempt: He added, that nothing could be more grateful to the Lacedaemonians, than to see "themselves masters of Athens; and that the Thebans, en-"raged at the Athenians, whom they considered as traitors "and deserters, would lend them no affistance."

&lt;sup>r</sup> A. M. 3627. Apt. J. C. 377. Xenoph. I. v. p. 568—572. Plut. in Agel. p. 609, 610. Id. in Pelop. p. 284, 285.

Sphodrias, fond of acquiring a great name, and envying the glory of Phaebidas, who, in this fense, had rendered himfelf renowned and illustrious by his unjust attempt upon Thebes, conceived it would be a much more shining and glorious exploit to seize the Piraeus of his own accord, and deprive the Athenians of their great power at sea, by an unforeseen attack by land. He undertook the enterprise therefore with great joy; which was neither less unjust nor less horrid than that of the Cadmea, but not executed with the same boldness and success. For having set out in the night from Thespiae, with the view of surprising the Piraeus before light, the day-break overtook him in the plain of Thriasium near Eleusis; and finding himself discovered, he returned shamefully to Thespiae with some booty which he had taken.

The Athenians immediately fent ambaffadors with their complaints to Sparta. Those ambaffadors found, that the Lacedaemonians had not waited their arrival to accuse Sphodrias, but had already cited him before the council to answer for his conduct. He was afraid to obey that summons, having just reason to apprehend the iffue of a trial, and the resentment of his country. He had a son, who had contracted a strict and tender friendship with the son of Agesilaus. The latter solicited his father so earnestly, or rather tormented him with such extreme importunity and perseverance, that he could not resule Sphodrias his protection, and got him fully absolved. Agesilaus was little delicate, as we have seen already, in point of justice, when the service of his friends was in question. He was befides, of all mankind, the most tender and indulgent father to his children. It is reported of him, that when they were little, he would play with them, and divert himself with riding upon a stick amongst them; and that having been surprised by a friend in that action, he desired him not to tell any body of it till himself was a father.

The unjust fentence passed in favour of Sphodrias by the Spartans, exceedingly incenfed the Athenians, and determined them to renew their alliance with Thebes immediately, and to affift them with all their power. They fitted out a fleet, and gave the command of it to Timotheus, fon of the illustrious Conon, whose reputation he well fustained by his own valour and exploits. It was he, whom his enemies, in envy of the glory he had acquired by his great actions, painted fleeping, with the Goddess Fortune at his feet, taking towns in nets for him : But upon this occasion he proved that he was not asleep. After having ravaged the coast of Laconia, he attacked the ille of Corcyra ", which he took. He treated the inhabitants with great humanity, and made no alteration in their liberty or laws, which very much inclined the neighbouring cities in favour of Athens. The Spartans on their fide made powerful preparations for the war, and were principally intent apon retaking Corcyra. Its happy fituation between Sicily and Greece, rendered that island very important. They therefore engaged Dionysius the tyrant in the expedition, and demanded aid of him. In the mean time they dispatched their fleet under Mnafippus. The Athenians fent fixty fail against them to the relief of Corcyra, under Timotheus at first; but soon after, upon his feeming to act too flowly, Iphicrates was fubfituted in his place. Mnasippus having made himself odious to his troops by his haughtiness, rigour and avarice, was very ill obeyed by them, and lost his life in an engagement. Iphicrates did not arrive till after his death, when he received advice that the Syracufan fquadron of ten gallies approached, which he attacked fo successfully, that not one of them escaped. He demanded, that the orator Callistratus, and Chabrias, one of the most renowned captains of his time, should be joined in commission with him. Xenophon admires his wisdom and greatness of soul upon that account, in being satisfied with appearing to have occasion for council, and not apprehending to share the glory of his victories with others.

&lt;sup>5</sup> Xenoph. 1. v. p. 584—589. Plut, in Agef. p. 610, 611. Id. in Pelop. 285—288, u Corfu.

Agefilaus had been prevailed upon to take upon him the command of the troops against Thebes. He entered Boeotia, where he did abundance of damage to the Thebans, not without confiderable lofs on his own fide. The two armies came every day to blows, and were perpetually engaged, though not in formal battle, yet in skirmishes, which served to instruct the Thebans in the trade of war, and to inspire them with valour, boldness, and experience. It is reported that the Spartan Antalcides told Agefilaus very juftly upon this head, when he was brought back from Boeotia much wounded, "My lord " Agefilaus, you have a fine reward for the lessons you have " given the Thebans in the art of war, which, before you " taught it them, they neither would nor could learn." It was to prevent this inconvenience, that Lycurgus, in one of the three laws which he calls Rhetrae, forbade the Lacedaemonians to make war often upon the fame enemy, left they should make them too good foldiers, by obliging them to the frequent defence of themselves.

Several campaigns passed in this manner, without any thing decisive on either side. It was prudent in the Theban generals not to hazard a battle hitherto, and to give their soldiers time to inure and embolden themselves. When the occasion was savourable, they let themselves loose like generous hounds; and after having given them a taste of victory by way of reward, they called them off, contented with their courage and alacrity. The principal glory of their snccess and this wise conduct was due to Pelopidas.

The engagement at Tegyra, which was a kind of prelude to the battle of Leuctra, added much to his reputation. Having failed in his enterprise against Orchomenos, which had joined the Lacedaemonians, at his return he found the enemy posted to intercept him near Tegyra. As soon as the Thebans perceived them from the defiles, fomebody ran in all hafte to Pelopidas, and told him, "We are fallen into the enemy's hands. " Ah!" replied he, " why should we not rather fay, that they " are fallen into ours!" At the same time he ordered his cavalry, which were his rear guard, to advance to the front, that they might begin the fight. He was affured, that his foot, which were only three hundred, and were called the Sacred Battalion, would break through the enemy, wherever they charged, though superior in number, as they were by at least two-thirds. The affault began where the generals of each party were posted, and was very rude. The two generals of the Lacedaemonians, who had charged Pelopidas, was prefently killed; all that were with them being either flain or dispersed. The rest of the Lacedaemonian troops were so daunted, that they opened a passage for the Thebans, who might have marched on to fave themselves if they had thought fit: But Pelopidas, disdaining to make use of that opening for his retreat, advanced against those who were still drawn up in battle, and made so great a slaughter of them, that they were all difmayed, and fled in disorder. The Thebans did not pursue them far, lest they should be surprised. They contented themselves with having broken them, and with making a glorious retreat, not inferior to a victory, because through the enemy dispersed and defeated.

This little encounter, for it can be called no more, was in a manner the fource of the great actions and events we are about to treat of. It had never happened till then in any war, either against the Barbarians or Greeks, that the Lacedaemonians had been descated with the superiority of number on their side, nor even with equal forces in battle array: For which reason they were insupportably proud, and their reputation alone kept their enemies in awe, who never durft shew themselves in the field before them, unless superior in number. They now lost that glory, and the Thebans in their turn became the terror and dread even of those who had rendered themselves so universally formidable.

The enterprise of Artaxerxes Mnemon against Egypt x, and the death of Evagoras king of Cyprus, should naturally come in here. But I shall defer those articles, to avoid breaking in upon the Theban affairs.

SECTION IV.

New Troubles in Greece. The Lacedaemonians declare WAR against Thebes.

Whilst? the Persians were engaged in the Egyptian war, great troubles arose in Greece. In that interval the Thebans, having taken Plataea z, and afterwards Thespiae, entirely demolished those cities, and expelled the inhabitants. The Plataeans retired to Athens with their wives and children, where they were received with the utmost favour, and adopted into the number of the citizens.

a Artaxerxes, being informed of the state of the Grecian affairs, fent a new embaffy thither to perfuade the feveral cities and republics at war to lay down their arms, and accommodate their differences upon the plan of the treaty of Antalcides. By that peace, as has been observed in its place, it was concluded, that all the cities of Greece should enjoy their liberty, and be governed by their own laws. In virtue of this article, the Lacedaemonians pressed the Thebans to restore their liberty to all the cities of Bocotia, to rebuild Plataca and Thespiae which they had demolished, and to restore them with their dependences to their ancient inhabitants. The Thebans on their fide infifted alfo, that the Lacedaemonians should give liberty to all those of Laconia, and that the city of Messene should be restored to its ancient possessors. This was what equity required; but the Lacedaemonians, believing themselves much fuperior to the Thebans, were for imposing a law upon them, which they would not fubmit to themselves.

All Greece being weary of a war, which had already lasted feveral campaigns, and had no other end than the aggrandizing of that state, was seriously intent upon a general peace, and, with that view, had sent deputies to Lacedaemon, to concert

y A. M. 3633. Ant. J. C. 371. Diod. l. li. p. 361, 362.

z Plataea a city of Bocotia. Thespiae of Achaia.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Xenoph. hist. Graec. l. vi. p. 590-593. Dion. p. 365, 366.

together the means of attaining so desirable an effect, b A mongst those deputies Epaminondas was of the first rank. He was at that time celebrated for his great erudition and profound knowledge in philosophy; but he had not yet given any very diftinguished proofs of his great capacity for the command of armies, and the administration of public affairs. Seeing that all the deputies, out of respect for Agefilaus, who declared openly for the war, were afraid to contradict him, or to differ from his opinion in any thing; a very common effect of too imperious a power on one fide, and too fervile a fubmiffion on the other; he was the only one that spoke with a wise and noble boldness, as became a statesman who had no other view but the public good. He made a speech, not for the Thebans alone, but for Greece in general; in which he proved, that the war augmented only the power of Sparta, whilst the rest of Greece was reduced, and ruined by it. He infifted principally upon the necessity of establishing the peace in equality and justice, because no peace could be folid and of long duration, but that wherein all parties should find an equal advantage.

A discourse like this, founded evidently upon reason and justice, and pronounced with a grave and serious tone, never fails of making impression. Agesilaus plainly distinguished, from the attention and filence with which it was heard, that the deputies were extremely affected with it, and would not fail to act conformably to his opinion. To prevent that effect, he demanded of Epaminondas, " Whether he thought it just " and reasonable, that Boeotia should be free and independ-" ent?" that is to fay, whether he agreed, that the cities of Boeotia should depend no longer upon Thebes. Epaminondas immedately asked in his turn with great vivacity, " Whether " he thought it just and reasonable, that Laconia should enjoy " the same independence and liberty?" Upon which Agesilaus, rifing from his feat in great rage, infifted upon his declaring plainly, " Whether he would confent that Boeotia should " be free?" Epaminondas retorted his question again, and asked, " Whether, on his side, he would consent that Laco-" nia should be free? Agesilaus, who wanted only a pretext for breaking with the Thebans, struck them directly out of the treaty of alliance, which they were about to conclude. The rest f the allies signed it less out of inclination, than not to offend the Lacedaemonians, whose power they dreaded.

D Plut. in Agefil. p. 611.

In consequence of this treaty, all the troops in the field were to be disbanded. Cleombrotus, one of the kings of Sparta, was then at Phocis, at the head of the army. He wrote to the Ephori to know the republic's refolutions. Prothous, one of the principal fenators, represented, that there was no room for deliberations; for that Sparta, by the late agreement, has made the recall of the troops indifpenfable, Agefilaus was of a different opinion. Angry with the Thebans, and particularly with Epaminondas, he was abfolutely bent on the war for an opportunity of revenge; and the present feemed most favourable, when all Greece was free and united. and only the Thebans excluded the treaty of peace. The advice of Prothous was therefore rejected by the whole council, who treated him as an honest *, well-meaning dotard, that knew nothing of the matter; the divinity, from thenceforth, as Xenophon observes, promoting their downfall. The Ephori wrote immediately to Cleombrotus to march against the Thebans with his troops; and fent orders at the fame time to all their allies to affemble their forces, who were averie to this war, and did not join in it but with great reluctance, and out of fear of contradicting the Lacedaemonians, whom they did not yet dare to disobey. Though no happy consequences could be expected from a war, vifibly undertaken contrary to all reason and justice, and from the fole motive of refentment and revenge; the Lacedaemonians however, from the fuperiority of their numbers, affured themselves of success, and imagined that the Thebans, abandoned by their allies, were in no condition to oppose them.

<sup>d</sup> The Thebans were much alarmed at first. They faw them-Volume IV. B b c Xenoph. l. vi. p. 593-592. Diod. l. xv. p. 365-37x. Plut. in Agefil. p. 611, 612. Id. in Pelop. p. 288, 289.

d A. M. 3634. Ant. J. C. 370.

* Ensivor และ Chuageir ห่าท่อนขอ หวิท ขนอ พัธ โพสะ ขอ อีนโมอาเอะ พายะ.

felves alone, without allies or support, whilst all Greece looked upon them as utterly lost; not knowing that in a single man they had more than armies. This was Epaminondas. He was appointed general, and had several colleagues joined in commission with him. He immediately raised all the troops he could, and began his march. His army did not amount to six thousand men, and the enemy had above four times that number. As several bad omens were told him to prevent his setting out, he replied only by a verse of Homer's, of which the sense is, "+ There is but one good omen, to sight for "one's country." However, to reassure the soldiers, by nature superstitious, and whom he observed to be discouraged, he instructed several persons to come from different places, and report auguries and omens in his savour, which revived the spirit and hopes of the troops.

Pelopidas was not then in office, but commanded the Sacred Battalion. When he left his house to go to the army, his wife, in taking her last adieu, conjured him with a flood of tears to take care of himself; "That," said he, "should be recommend-"ed to young people; but for generals, they have no occasion for such advice; the care of others should be recommended to them."

Epaminondas had wifely taken care to fecure a pass, by which Cleombrotus might have shortened his march considerably. The latter, after having taken a large compass, arrived at Leuctra, a small town of Boeotia, between Plataea and Thespiae. Both parties consulted whether they should give battle; which Cleombrotus resolved by the advice of all his officers; who represented to him, that if he declined sighting with such a superiority of troops, it would confirm the current report, that he secretly savoured the Thebans. The latter had an effential reason for hastening a battle before the arrival of the troops, which the enemy daily expected. However, the six generals, who formed the council of war, differed in their sentiments. The seventh, who was Epaminodas, came in very good time to join the three that were for sighting; and his opinion carrying the question, the battle was resolved upon. This was in the second year of the 102d Olympiad.

† Els diaros agisos, apivis Sai migi marens. Iliad. xi. v. 423.

The two armies were very unequal in number. That of the Lacedaemonians, as has been faid, confifted of twenty-four thousand foot, and fixteen hundred horse. The Thebans had only fix thousand foot and four hundred horse; but all of them choice troops, animated by their experience of the war, and determined to conquer or die. The Lacedaemonian cavalry, composed of men picked up by chance, without valour, and ill disciplined, was as much inferior to their enemies in courage, as superior in number. The infantry could not be depended on, except the Lacedaemonians; the allies, as has been said, having engaged in the war with reluctance, because they did not approve the motive of it, and were besides dislatisfied with the Lacedaemonians.

The ability of the generals on either fide fupplied the place of numerous armies, especially of the Theban, who was the most accomplished captain of his time. He was supported by Pelopidas at the head of the Sacred Battalion, composed of three hundred Thebans, united in a strict friendship and affection, and engaged under a particular oath never to fly, but to defend each other to the last drop of their blood.

Upon the day of battle the two armies drew up on a plain. Cleombrotus was upon the right, confifting of Lacedaemonians, on whom he confided most, and whose files were twelve deep. To take the advantage, which his superiority of horse gave him in an open country, he posted them in the front of the Lacedaemonians. Archidamus, Agesilaus's son, was at the head of the allies, who formed the left wing.

Epaminondas, who refolved to charge with his left, which he commanded in person, strengthened it with the choice of his heavy-armed troops, whom he drew up sifty deep. The Sacred Battalion was upon his left, and closed the wing. The rest of his infantry were posted upon his right in an oblique line, which, the farther it extended, was the more distant from the enemy. By this uncommon disposition, his design was to cover his slank on the right, to keep off his right wing as a kind of referved body, that he might not hazard the event of the battle upon the weakest part of his army; and to begin the action with his left wing, where his best troops were posted, to turn the whole weight of the battle upon king Cleombrotus and the Spartans. He was affured, that if he could penetrate the Lacedaemonian phalanx, the rest of the army would soon be put to the rout. As for his horse, he disposed them after the enemy's example in the front of his left.

The action began by the cavalry. As that of the Thebans were better mounted and braver troops than the Lacedaemonian horse, the latter were not long before they were broke, and driven upon the infantry, which they put into some confusion. Epaminondas following his horse close, marched swiftly up to Cleombrotus, and fell upon his phalanx with all the weight of his heavy battalion. The latter, to make a diverfion, detached a body of troops with orders to take Epaminondas in flank, and to furround him. Pelopidas, upon the fight of that movement, advanced with incredible speed and boldness at the head of the Sacred Batalion to prevent the enemy's defign, and flanked Cleombrotus himfelf, who, by that fudden and unexpected attack, was put into diforder. The battle was very rude and obstinate; and whilst Cleombrotus could act, the victory continued in suspence, and declared for neither party. When he fell dead with his wounds, the Thebans, to complete the victory, and the Lacedaemonians, to avoid the shame of abandoning the body of their king, redoubled their efforts, and a great flaughter enfued on both fides. The Spartans fought with fo much fury about the body, that at length they gained their point, and carried it off. Animated by fo glorious an advantage, they prepared to return to the charge, which would perhaps have proved fuccefsful, had the allies feconded their ardour. But the left wing, feeing the Lacedaemonian phalanx had been broke, and believing all loft, especially when they heard that the king was dead, took to flight, and drew off the rest of the army along with them. Epaminondas followed them vigorously, and kill-, ed a great number in the pursuit. The Thebans remained masters of the field of battle, erected a trophy, and permitted the enemy to bury their dead.

The Lacedaemonians had never received fuch a blow. The most bloody deseats till then had scarce ever cost them more than four or five hundred of their citizens. They had been seen, however, animated, or rather violently incensed against Athens, to ransom, by a truce of fifty years, about three hundred of their citizens, who had suffered themselves to be shut up in the little island of Sphasteria. Here they lost four thousand men, of whom one thousand were Lacedaemonians, and four hundred Spartans*, out of seven hundred who were in the battle. The Thebans had only three hundred men killed; among whom were sew of their citizens.

The city of Sparta celebrated at that time the gymnastic games, and was full of strangers, whom curiosity had brought thither. When the couriers arrived from Leuctra with the terrible news of their defeat, the Ephori, though perfectly sensible of all the consequences, and that the Spartan empire had received a mortal wound, would not permit the representations of the theatre to be suspended, nor any changes in the celebration of the festival. They sent to every family the names of their relations, who were killed, and stayed in the theatre to see that the dances and games were continued without interruption to the end,

The next day in the morning, the loss of each family being known, the fathers and relations of those who had died in the battle, met in the public place, and saluted and embraced each other with great joy and serenity in their looks; whilst the others kept themselves close in their houses; or if necessity obliged them to go abroad, it was with a sadness and dejection of aspect, which sensibly expressed their profound anguish and affliction. That difference was still more remarkable in the women. Grief, silence, tears, distinguished those who expected the return of their sons; but such as had lost their sons, were seen hurrying to the temples, to thank the gods, and congratulating each other upon their glory and good fortune. It cannot be denied, but such sentiments argue great courage and resolution: But I would not have them entirely extinguish natural tenderness, and should have been better pleased, had there been less of serocity * in them.

Bb iij

Those were properly called Spartans, who inhabited Sparta; the Lacedacmorians were fettled in the country.

Sparta was under no fmall difficulty to know how to act in regard to those who had sled from the battle. As they were numerous, and of the most powerful families in the city, it was not fafe to inflict upon them the punishments affigned by the laws, lest their despair should induce them to take some violent resolution fatal to the state. For such as sled were not only excluded from all offices and employments, but it was a difgrace to contract any alliance with them by marriage. Any body that met them in the ftreets might buffet them, which they were obliged to fuffer. They were besides to wear dirty and ragged habits, full of patches of different colours. And lastly, they were to shave half their beards, and to let the other half grow. It was a great loss to the Spartans to be deprived of fo many of their foldiery, at the time they had fuch preffing occasion for them. To remove this difficulty, they chose Agefilaus legislator, with absolute power to make such alterations in the laws as he should think fit. Agefilaus, without adding, retrenching, or changing any thing, found means to fave the fugitives without prejudice to the state. In a full affembly of the Lacedaemonians, he decreed, " That for the " present day, the laws should be suspended, and of no ef-" fect; but ever after to remain in full force and authority." By those few words he preserved the Spartan laws entire, and at the same time restored to the state that great number of its members, in preventing their being for ever degraded, and confequently useless to the republic.

After the battle of Leuctra, the two parties were industri-

c Xenoph. l. vi. p. 598. Diod. l. xv. p. 375-378

* Mr. Rollin feems to speak here en François. The sentiments of the Spartans have no exception, and are strictly consistent with true greatness of soul. None but slaves will deny, that the next glory and good fortune to defending their country against its enemies, when its ruin is at stake, is to die in its desence. Slaves have no country. That and themselves are the tyrants.

oully employed, the one in retrieving, and the other in improving their victory.

f Agefilaus, to revive the courage of his troops, marched them into Arcadia; but with a full refolution, carefully to avoid a battle. He confined himself to attacking some small towns of the Mantinaeans, which he took, and laid the country waste. This gave Sparta some joy; and they began to take courage, from believing their condition not entirely desperate.

The Thebans, foon after their victory, fent an account of it to Athens, and to demand aid at the fame time against the common enemy. The fenate was then fitting, which received the courier with great coldness, did not make him the usual presents, and dismissed him without taking any notice of aid. The Athenians, alarmed at the considerable advantage which the Thebans had gained over the Lacedaemonians, could not dissemble the umbrage and distaits faction which so sudden and unexpected an increase of a neighbouring power gave them, which might soon render itself formidable to all Greece.

At Thebes, Epaminondas and Pelopidas had been elected joint governors of Boeotia. Having affembled all the troops of the Bocotians and their allies, whose number daily increased, they entered Peloponnesus, and made abundance of places and people revolt from the Lacedaemonians; Elis, Argos, Arcadia, and the greatest part of Laconia itself. It was then about the winter-folftice, and towards the end of the last month of the year; fo that in a few days they were to quit their offices; the first day of the next month being assigned by law, for their refigning them to the perfons appointed to fucceed them, upon pain of death, if they held them beyond that term. Their colleagues, apprehending the badness of the seafon, and more the dreadful consequences of infringing that law, were for marching back the army immediately to Thebes. Pelopidas was the first, who, entering into the opinion of Epaminondas, animated the citizens, and engaged them to take the advantage of the enemy's alarm, and to pursue their enterprise in neglect of a formality, from the observance of which they might juftly believe themselves dispensed by the state itfelf, as the service of the state, when sounded in justice, is the sovereign law and rule of the people's obedience.

Bbiiij . ,

They entered Laconia therefore at the head of an army of feventy thousand good soldiers; of which the twelfth part were not Thebans. The great reputation of the two generals was the cause that all the allies, even without order or public decree, obeyed them with respectful filence, and marched with entire confidence and courage under their command. It was fix hundred years fince the Dorians had established themselves at Lacedaemon; and in all that time they had never seen an enemy upon their lands; not daring till then to set foot in them, and much less to attack their city, though without walls. The Thebans and their allies, finding a country hitherto untouched by an enemy, ran through it with fire and sword, destroying and plundering as far as the river Eurotas, without any opposition whatsoever.

Parties had been posted to desend some important passes. Ischolas the Spartan, who commanded one of these detachments, distinguished himself in a peculiar manner. Finding it impossible, with his small body of troops to support the enemy's attack, and thinking it below a Spartan to abandon his post, he sent back the young men, who were of age and condition to serve their country effectually, and kept none with him but such as were advanced in years. With these devoting himself, after the example of Leonidas, to the public good, they fold their lives dear; and after having desended themselves a long time, and made great slaughter of their enemies, they all perished to a man.

Agefilaus acted upon this occasion with great address and wisdom. He looked upon this irruption of the enemy as an impetuous torrent, which it was not only in vain, but dangerous to oppose: whose rapid course would be but of short duration, and after some ravages, subside of itself. He contented himself with distributing his best troops into the middle, and all the most important parts of the city, strongly securing all the posts. He was determined not to quit the town, nor to hazard a battle, and perfifted in that refolution, without regard to all the raillery, infults, and menaces of the Thebans, who defied him by name, and called upon him to come out and defend his country, who had alone been the cause of all its sufferings, in kindling the war.

But far greater afflictions to Agefilaus were the commotions and diforders excited within the city, the murmurs and complaints of the old men in the highest affliction and despair from being witnesses of what they faw, as well as of the women, who feemed quite distracted with hearing the threatening cries of the enemy, and feeing the neighbouring country all on fire; whilft the flames and fmoke, which drove almost upon them. feemed to denounce a like misfortune to themselves. Whatever courage Agefilaus might express in his outward behaviour, he could not fail of being fenfibly affected with fo mournful an object; to which was added, the grief of lofing his reputation; who, having found the city in a most flourishing and potent condition, when he came to the government, now faw it fallen to fuch a degree, and all its ancient glory loft under him! He was, belides, fecretly mortified at fo mournful a contradiction of a boast he had often made, " That no woman of Spar-" ta had ever feen the fmoke of an enemy's camp.

Whilft he was giving different orders in the city, he was informed, that a certain number of mutineers had feized an important post, with a resolution to desend themselves in it. Agesilaus ran immediately thither; and as if he had been enentirely unacquainted with their bad design, he said to them, "Comrades, it is not there I sent you." At the same time he pointed to different posts to divide them; to which they went, believing their enterprise had not been discovered. This order, which he gave without emotion, argues a great presence of mind in Agesilaus, and shews, that in times of trouble it is not proper to see too much, that the culpable may not want time to reslect and repent. He thought it more advisable to suppose that small troop innocent, than to urge them to a declared revolt by a too rigorous inquiry.

The Eurotas was at that time very much fwoln by the melting of the snows, and the Thebans found more difficulty in paffing it than they expected, as well from the extreme coldness of the water as its rapidity. As Epaminondas passed at the head of his infantry, some of the Spartans shewed him to Agefilaus; who, after having attentively confidered and followed him with his eyes a long time, faid only, "Wonderful " man *!" in admiration of the valour that could undertake fuch great things. Epaminondas would have been glad to have given battle in Sparta, and to have erected a trophy in the midft of it. He did not however think proper to attempt the forcing of the city; and not being able to induce Agefilaus to quit it, chose to retire. It would have been difficult for Sparta, without aid, and unfortified, to have defended itself long against a victorious army. But the wife captain, who commanded it, apprehended that he should draw upon his hands the whole force of Peloponnesus, and still more, that he should excite the jealoufy of the Greeks, who would never have pardoned his destroying so potent a republic, and "pulling out," as Leptinus fays, "one of the eyes of Greece," as a proof of his skill s. He confined himself therefore to the glory of having humbled the proud, whose laconic language added new haughtiness to their commands, and of having reduced them to the necessity, as he boasted himself, of enlarging their stile, and lengthening their monofyllables +. At his return he again wasted the country.

In this expedition the Thebans reinstated Arcadia into one body, and took Messenia from the Spartans, who had been in possession of it! very long, after having expelled all its inhabitants. It was a country equal in extent to Laconia, and as fertile as the best in Greece. Its ancient inhabitants, who

<sup>8</sup> Arift. Rhet. I. iii. c. 10. h Pauf. l. iv. p. 267, 268.

• Ω το μεγαλοπράγμετος ανθρόπε. The Greek expression is not easily to be translated; it signifies; "Oh the actor of great deeds."

† The Lacedaemonians fometimes answered the most important dispatches by a fingle monosyltable. Philip having wrote to them, "If I enter your country, "I shall put all to fire and sword." they replied, "If;" to signify they should take all possible care to put it out of his power.

† The Mcffenians had been driven out of their country two hundred and eighty seven years, were dispersed in disserent regions of Greece, Italy, and Sicily, on the first notice given them, returned with incredible joy; animated by the love of their country, natural to all men, and almost as much as by their hatred of the Spartans, which the length of time had only increased. They built themselves a city, which, from the ancient name, was called Messen. Amongst the bad events of this war, none gave the Lacedemonians more sensible displeasure, or rather more lively grief; because from immemorial time an irreconcileable enmity had subsisted between Sparta and Messen, which seemed incapable of being extinguished but by the final ruin of the one or the other.

Polybius reflects upon an ancient error in the conduct of the Messenians with regard to Sparta, which was the cause of all their misfortunes. This was their too great folicitude for the present tranquillity, and through an excessive love of peace, their neglecting the means of making it fure and lafting. Two of the most powerful states of Greece were their neighbours, the Arcadians and Lacedaemonians. The latter, from their first fettlement in the country, had declared open war against them: The others, on the contrary, always joined with them, and entered into all their interests. But the Messenians had neither the courage to oppose their violent and irreconcileable enemies with valour and conftancy, nor the prudence to treat with due regard their faithful and affectionate allies. When the two states were either at war with each other, or carried their arms elsewhere, the Messenians, little provident for the future, and regarding only their present repose, made it a rule with them never to engage in the quarrel on either fide, and to observe an exact neutrality. On such conjunctures they. congratulated themselves upon their wisdom and success in preferving their tranquillity, whilft their neighbours all around them were involved in trouble and confusion. But this tranquillity was of no long duration. The Lacedaemonians, having fubdued their enemies, fell upon them with all their forces; and finding them unsupported by allies, and incapable of defending themselves, they reduced them to submit, either to the yoke of a rigid flavery, or to banish themselves from their country. And this was several times their case. They ought to have reflected, says Polybius †, that as there is nothing more defirable or advantageous than peace, when sounded in justice and honour; so there is nothing more shameful, and at the same time more pernicious, when attained by bad measures, and purchased at the price of liberty.

i Polyb, l. iv. p. 299, 300.

SECTION V.

The two Theban Generals, at their Return, are accused and absolved. Sparta implores AID of Athens.

It might be expected, that the two Theban captains, on their return to their country after fuch memorable actions, should have been received with the general applause, and all the honours that could be conferred upon them. Instead of which, they were both summoned to answer as criminals against the state; in having, contrary to the law, whereby they were obliged to resign their command to new officers, retained it four months beyond the appointed term; during which they had executed in Messenia, Arcadia, and Laconia, all those great things we have related.

A behaviour of this kind is furprifing; and the relation of it cannot be read without a fecret indignation: But fuch a conduct had a very plaufible foundation. The zealous affertors of a liberty lately regained, were apprehensive that the example might prove very pernicious, in authorising some future magistrate to maintain himself in command beyond the established term, and in consequence to turn his arms against his country. It is not to be doubted, but the Romans would have acted in the same manner; and if they were so severe, to put an officer to death, though victorious, for giving battle without his general's orders, how would they have behaved to a general, who should have continued four months in the supreme command, contrary to the laws, and upon his own authority?

† Ειρήνη γάς, μετά μὶν τὰ δικάιε καὶ πρίποντος, κάλλισὸν ἐσι Κήμα καὶ λυσιτιλὶςατον μετὰ δι κακὰας η δελιὰας Ιποτελίζες, πάντων ἀισχισον καὶ βλαδιρώτατον.

* Pelopidas was the first cited before the tribunal. He defended himself with less force and greatness of mind than was expected from a man of his character, by nature warm and firy. That valour, haughty and intrepid in fight, forfook him before the judges. His air and discourse, which had something timid and creeping in it, denoted a man who was afraid of death. and did not in the least incline the judges in his favour, who acquitted him not without difficulty. Epaminondas appeared, and fpoke with a quite different air and tone. He feemed, if I may be allowed the expression, to charge danger in front without emotion. Instead of justifying himself, he made a panegyric upon his actions, and repeated, in a lofty flile, in what manner he had ravaged Laconia, re-established Messenia, and reunited Arcadia in one body. He concluded with faying, that he should die with pleasure, if the Thebans would renounce the sole glory of those actions to him, and declare that he had done them by his own authority, and without their participation. All the voices were in his favour; and he returned from his trial, as he used to return from battle, with glory and universal applause. Such dignity has true valour, that it in a manner feizes the admiration of mankind by force.

He was by nature defigned for great actions; and every thing he did, had an air of grandeur in it. <sup>1</sup> His enemies, jealous of his glory, and with defign to affront him, got him elected Telearch; an office very unworthy of a person of his merit. He, however, thought it no dishonour to him, and said, that he would demonstrate, that * " the office did not only shew the " man, but the man the office." He accordingly raised that employment to very great dignity, which before consisted in only taking care, that the streets were kept clean, the dirt carried away, and the drains and common sewers in good order.

m The Lacedaemonians, having every thing to fear from an enemy, whom the late successes had rendered still more haughty and enterprising than ever, and seeing themselves exposed every moment to a new irruption, had recourse to the Athenians, and fent deputies to them to implore their aid. The person who fpoke, began with describing in the most pathetic terms the deplorable condition, and extreme danger to which Sparta was reduced. He enlarged upon the infolent haughtiness of the Thebans, and their ambitious views, which tended to nothing lefs than the empire of all Greece. He infinuated what Athens in particular had to fear, if they were fuffered to extend their power by the increase of allies, who every day went over to their party, and augmented their forces. He called to mind the happy times, in which the strict union betwixt Athens and Sparta had preserved Greece to the equal glory of both flates; and concluded with faying, how great an addition it would be to the Athenian name, to aid a city, its ancient friend and ally, which more than once had generously facrificed itself for the common interest and fafety.

k Plut. de fui laude, p. 540, 1 Plut. de praecept, reip. ger. p. 811.

m Xeneph. l. vi. p. 609-613.

<sup>* &#</sup>x27;Ou piéves ล้องที่ ลังอือส อีเมียบอเง, ผิมมิส หลา ล้องทั้ง ลังท้อ.

The Athenians could not deny all that the deputy advanced in his discourse; but at the same time they had not forgot the bad treatment which they had suffered from the Spartans on more than one occasion, and especially after the deseat of Sicily. However, their compassion of the present missfortunes of Sparta carried it against the sense of the former injuries, and determined them to assist the Lacedaemonians with all their forces. <sup>n</sup> Some time after, the deputies of several states being assembled at Athens, a league and consederacy was concluded against the Thebans, conformably to the late treaty of Antalcides, and the intention of the king of Persia, who continually made instances for its execution.

O A flight advantage gained by the Spartans over their enemies, raifed them from the dejection of spirit in which they had hitherto remained, as it generally happens, when in a mortal distemper the least glimpse of a recovery enlivens hope and recalls joy. Archidamus, son of Agesilaus, having received aid from Dionysius the younger, tyrant of Sicily, put himself at the head of his troops, and defeated the Arcadians in a battle, called "The Battle without Tears?", because he did not lose a man, and killed a great number of the enemy. The Spartans before had been so much accustomed to conquer, that they became insensible to the pleasure of victory: But when the news of this battle arrived, and they saw Archidamus return victorious, they could not contain their joy, nor keep within the city. His father was the first that went out to meet him, weeping with joy and tenderness. He was followed by the great officers and magistrates. The crowd of old men and women came down as far as the river, lifting up their hands to heaven, and returning thanks to the gods, as if this action had obliterated the shame of Sparta, and they began to see those happy days again, in which the Spartan glory and reputation had risen so heaven, and respectively.

n Xenoph. 1. vili. p. 613-616.

Plut. in Agefil. p. 614, 615. Kenoph, l. vii. p. 619, 620.

q Philiscus, who had been sent by the king of Persia to reconcile the Grecian states, was arrived at Delphos, whither he summoned their deputies to repair. The god was not at all consulted in the affair discussed in that assembly. The Spartans demanded, that Messen and its inhabitants should return to their obedience to them. Upon the Thebans resusal to comply with that demand, the assembly broke up, and Philiscus retired, after having left considerable sums of money with the Lacedaemonians for levying troops and carrying on the war. Sparta, reduced and humbled by its losses, was no longer the object of the Persians sear or jealously; but Thebes, victorious and triumphant, gave them just cause of inquietude.

r To form a league against Thebes with greater certainty, the allies had sent deputies to the great king. The Thebans on their side deputed Pelopidas; an extremely wise choice, from the great reputation of the ambassador, which is no indifferent circumstance in respect to the success of a negociation. The battle of Leuctra had spread its same into the remotest provinces of Asia. When he arrived at the court, and appeared amongst the princes and nobility, they cried out in admiration of him, "This is he who deprived the Lacedaemonians of "their empire by sea and land, and reduced Sparta to conside

P Diod. l. xv. p. 383.

4 Kenoph. p. 619. Diod. p. 381.

Kenoph. l. vii. p. 620—622. Plut. in Pelop. p. 294.

" itfelf between the Eurotas and Taygetus, that not long fince, " under its king Agefilaus, threatened no lefs than to invade " us in Sufa and Ecbatana."

Artaxerxes, extremely pleased with his arrival, paid him extraordinary honours, and piqued himself upon extolling him highly before the lords of his court; in esteem indeed of his great merit, but much more out of vanity and self-love, and to infinuate to his subjects, that the greatest and most illustrious persons made their court to him, and paid homage to his power and good fortune. But after having admitted him to audience, and heard his discourse, in his opinion more nervous than that of the Athenian ambassadors, and more simple than that of the Lacedaemonians, which was saying a great deal, he esteemed him more than ever; and as it is * common with kings, who are but little accustomed to constraint, he did not dissemble his extreme regard for him, and his preference of him to all the rest of the Grecian deputies.

Pelopidas, as an able politician, had apprized the king, how important it was to the interest of his crown, to protect an infant power, which had never born arms against the Persians, and which, in forming a kind of balance between Sparta and Athens, might be able to make an useful diversion against those republics, the perpetual and irreconcileable enemies of Persia, that had lately cost it so many losses and inquietudes. Timagoras, the Athenian, was the best received after him; because, being passionately desirous of humbling Sparta, and at the same time of pleasing the king, he did not appear averse to the views of Pelopidas.

The king having pressed Pelopidas, to explain what favours he had to ask of him, he demanded. "That Messene should continue free and exempt from the yoke of Sparta; that the Athenian gallies, which were sailed to infest the coast of Boeotia, should be recalled, or that war should be decidered against Athens; that those who would not come into the league, or march against such as should oppose it, should be attacked first." All which was decreed, and the Thebans declared friends and allies of the king. Leon, Ti-magoras's colleague, faid loud enough to beheard by Artaxerxes, "Athens has nothing now to do but to find fome other ally."

* Πάθος βασιλίκου παθών.

Pelopidas, having obtained all he defired, left the court, without accepting any more of the king's many prefents, than what was necessary to carry home as a token of his favour and good will; and this aggravated the complaints which were made against the other Grecian ambassadors, who were not so reserved and delicate in point of interest. One of those from the Arcadians said on his return home, that he had seen many slaves at the king's court, but no men. He added, that all his magnificence was no more than vain ostentation; and that the so-much-boasted * plantain of gold, which was valued at so high a price, had not shade enough under it for a grashopper.

Of all the deputies, Timagoras had received the most prefents. He did not only accept of gold and silver, but of a magnificent bed, and slaves to make it, the Greeks not seeming to him expert enough in that office: Which shews that sloth and luxury were little in fashion at Athens. He received also twenty-four cows, with slaves to take care of them; as having occasion to drink milk for some indisposition. Lastly, at his departure, he was carried in a chair to the sea-side at the king's expence, who gave four talents † for that service. His colleague Leon, on their arrival at Athens, accused him of not having communicated any thing to him, and of having joined with Pelopidas in every thing. He was brought to a trial in consequence, and condemned to suffer death.

It does not appear that the acceptance of prefents incenfed the Athenians most against Timagoras. For Ipicrates, a simple porter, who had been at the Persian court, and had also received presents, having said in a full assembly, that he was of opinion a decree ought to pass, by which, instead of the nine archons annually elected, nine ambassadors should be chosen out of the poorest of the people to be sent to the king, in order to their being enriched by the voyage; the assembly only laughed, and made a jeft of it. But what offended them more, was the Thebans having obtained all they demanded. In which, fays Plutarch, they did not duly confider the great reputation of Pelopidas, nor comprehend how much stronger and more efficacious that was in persuading, than all the harangues and the rhetorical flourishes of the other ambassadors; especially with a prince, accustomed to caress, and comply with the strongest, as the Thebans undoubtedly were at that time, and who besides was not forry to humble Sparta and Athens, the ancient and mortal enemies of his throne.

Volume IV.

* It was a tree of gold, of exquisite workmanship and great value, which people went to see out of curiosity.

† Four thousand crowns.

The efteem and regard of the Thebans for Pelopidas were not a little augmented by the good fuccess of this embassy, which had procured the freedom of Greece, and the re-establishment of Messen: And he was extremely applauded for his conduct at his return.

But Theffalia was the theatre, where the valour of Pelopidas made the greatest figure, in the expedition of the Thebans against Alexander tyrant of Pherae. I shall relate it entire, and unite in one point of view all which relates to that great event, without any other interruption than the journey of Pelopidas into Macedonia, to appease the troubles of that court,

SECTION VI.

PELOPIDAS marches against ALEXANDER TYRANTOF PHERAE,
Is killed in a BATTLE. Tragical END of ALEXANDER.

The reduced condition of Sparta and Athens<sup>t</sup>, which for many years had lorded it over all Greece, either in conjunction or feparately, had inspired some of their neighbours with the desire of supplanting those cities, and given birth to the hope of succeeding them in the pre-eminence. A power had risen up in Thessaly, which began to grow formidable. Jason, tyrant of Pherae, bad been declared generalishmo of the Thessalians by the consent of the people of that province; and it was to his merit, universally known, he owed that dignity. He was at the head of an army of about eight thousand horse, and twenty thousand heavy-armed foot, without reckoning the light armed foldiers, and might have undertaken any thing with such a body of disciplined and intrepid troops, who had an entire confidence in the valour and conduct of their general. But death prevented his designs. He was assassinated by persons who had conspired his destruction.

t A. M. 3634. Ant. J. C. 370. Xenoph. l. vi. p. 579-583, et 598-601, Dad, l. xv. p. 371-373.

His two brothers, Polydorus and Polyphron, were fublituted in his place; the latter of whom killed the other for the fake of reigning alone, and was foon after killed himfelf by Alexander of Pherae ", who seized the tyranny, under the pretence of revenging the death of Polydorus his father. Against him Pelopidas was sent.

As the tyrant made open war against feveral people of Theffaly, and was fecretly intriguing to subject them all, the citizens fent ambaifadors to Thebes to demand troops and a general. Epaminondas being employed in Peloponnesus, Pelopidas took upon himfelf the charge of this expedition. He fet out for Thessaly with an army, made himself master of Larisfa, and obliged Alexander to make his submission to him. He there endeayoured by mild usage and friendship to change his disposition, and from a tyrant, to make him become a just and humane prince; but finding him incorrigible, and of unexampled brutality, and hearing new complaints every day of his cruelty, debauched life, and infatiable avarice, he began to treat him with warm reproofs and menaces. The tyrant, alarmed at fuch usage, withdrew secretly with his guard, and Pelopidas, leaving the Theffalians in fecurity from any attempts of his, and in good understanding with each other, fep out for Macedonia, where his presence had been desired.

Amyntas II. was lately dead, and had left iffue three legitimate children, Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip, and one natural fon, called Ptolemy. Alexander reigned but one year, and was fucceeded by Perdiccas*, with whom his brother

Ccij

u A. M 35. Ant. J . 369.

• Plutarch makes this quarrel between Alexander and Ptolemy; which cannot agree with Elichines' account (de Falf. Legat. p. 400.) of the affairs of Perdeca after Alexander's death, which I shall relate to the history of Philip. As Affchines was their contemperary, Ithoughtit proper to shifting Perdiceasto Alexander.

Ptolemy diffused the crown. The two brothers invited Pelopidas either to be the arbitrator and judge of their quarrel, or to espouse the fide on which he should see the most right.

Pelopidas was no fooner arrived, than he put an end to all difputes, and recalled those who had been banished by either party. Having taken Philip, the brother of Perdiccas, and thirty other children of the noblest families of Macedonia for hostages, he carried them to Thebes; to shew the Greeks how far the authority of the Thebans extended, from the reputation of their arms, and an entire considence in their justice and sidelity. It was this Philip who was father of Alexander the Great, and afterwards made war against the Greeks, to subject them to his power.

The troubles and factions arose again in Macedonia some years after, occasioned by the death of Perdiccas, who was killed in a battle. The friends of the deceafed called in Pelopidas. Being defirous to arrive before Ptolemy had time to execute his projects, who made new efforts to establish himfelf upon the throne; and not having an army, he raifed some mercenary troops in haste, with whom he marched against Ptolemy. When they were near each other, Ptolemy found means to corrupt those mercenary foldiers by presents of money, and to bring them over to his fide. At the fame time, awed by the reputation and name of Pelopidas, he went to meet him as his fuperior and matter, had recourse to careffes and entreaties, and promifed in the most solemn manner to hold the crown only as guardian to the fon of the deceafed, to acknowledge as friends and enemies all those who were fo to the Thebans; and in fecurity of his engagements, he gave his fon Philoxenus, and fifty other children who were educated with him, as hostages. These Pelopidas sent to Thebes.

The treachery of the mercenary foldiers ran very much in his thoughts. He was informed, that they had fent the greatest part of their effects, with their wives and children, into the city Pharfalus *, and conceived that a fair opportunity for being revenged of them for their perfidy. He therefore drew together fome Theffalian troops, and marched into Pharfalus, where he was fearce arrived before Alexander the tyrant came against him with a powerful army. Pelopidas, who had been appointed ambassador to him, believing that he came to justify himself, and to answer the complaints of the Thebans, went to him with only Ismenias in his company, without any precaution. He was not ignorant of his being an impious wretch, as void of faith as of honour; but he imagined, that respect for Thebes, and regard to his dignity and reputation, would prevent him from attempting any thing against his perfon. He was mistaken; for the tyrant, seeing them alone and unarmed, made them both prisoners, and seized Pharsalus.

* A city of Thessaly,

Polybius exceedingly blames the imprudence of Pelopidas upon this occasion *. There is in the commerce of fociety, fays he, certain affurances, and as it were ties of mutual faith, upon which one may reasonably rely: Such are the fanctity of oaths, the pledge of wives and children delivered as hostages, and above all, the consistency of the past conduct of those with whom one treats: When, notwithstanding these motives for our considence, we are deceived, it is a misfortune, but not a fault: But to trust one's self to a known traitor, a reputed villain, is certainly an unpardonable instance of error and temerity.

'So black a perfidy filled Alexander's subjects with terror and distrust, who very much suspected, that after so flagrant an injustice, and so daring a crime, the tyrant would spare no-body, and would look upon himself upon all occasions, and with all forts of people, as a man in despair, that needed no farther regard to his conduct and actions. When the news was brought to Thebes, the Thebans, incensed at so vile an insult, immediately sent an army into Thessay; and as they were displeased with Epaminondas, upon the groundless suspection of his having been too favourable to the Lacedaemonians upon a certain occasion, they nominated other generals; so that he served in this expedition only as a private man. The love of his country and of the public good extinguished all resentment in the heart of that great man, and would not permit him, as is too common, to abandon its fervice through any pique of honour, or perfonal discoutent.

Lib. vill. p. 512.

J Plut. in Pelop. p. 192, 293. Diod. l. xv. p. 382, 383.

The tyrant however carried Pelopidas to Pherae, and made a flew of him to all the world at first, imagining that such a treatment would humble his pride and abate his courage. But Pelopidas, seeing the inhabitants of Pherae in great consternation, perpetually consoled them, advising them not to despair, and affuring them that it would not be long before the tyrant would be punished. He caused him to be told, that it was as imprudent as unjust to torture and put to death every day so many innocent citizens, that had never done him any wrong, and to spare his life, who, he knew, would no sooner be out of his hands, than he would punish him as his crimes deserved. The tyrant, associated at his greatness of soul, sent to ask him why he took so much pains for death? "It is," returned the illustrious prisoner, "that thou mayest perish the "sooner by being still more detestable to the gods and men."

From that time the tyrant gave orders that nobody should see or speak to him. But Thebé his wife, the daughter of Jason, who had also been tyrant of Pherae, having heard of the constancy and courage of Pelopidas from those who guarded him, had a curiosity to see and converse with him; and Alexander could not refuse her his permission . He loved her tenderly, if a tyrant may be said to love any body: But notwithstanding that tenderness, he treated her very cruelly and was in perpetual distrust even of her. He never went to her apartment without a slave before him with a naked sword in his hand, and sending some of his guard to search every coffer for concealed poinards. Wretched prince, cries Cicero, who could conside more in a slave and a Barbarian, than in his own wife!

Thebé therefore desiring to see Pelopidas, found him in a melancholy condition, dressed in a poor habit, his hair and beard neglected, and void of every thing that might console him in his distress. Not being able to refrain from tears at such a sight, "Ah unfortunate Pelopidas," said she, "how I "lament your poor wise!" "No Thebé," replied he, "it

* Cic. de Offic. 1. ii. n. 25.

" is yourself you should lament, who can suffer such a mon" ster as Alexander without being his prisoner." Those words touched Thebé to the quick; for it was with extreme reluctance she bore the tyrant's cruelty, violence, and infamous way of living. Hence going often to see Pelopidas, and frequently bewailing before him the injuries she suffered, she daily conceived new abhorrence for her bushand, whilst hatred and the desire of revenge grew strong in her heart.

The Theban generals, who had entered Theffaly, did nothing there of any importance, and were obliged, by their incapacity and ill conduct, to abandon the country. The tyrant purfued them in their retreat, haraffed them shamefully, and killed abundance of their troops. The whole army had been defeated, if the foldiers had not obliged Epaminondas, who ferved as a private man amongst them, to take upon him the command. Epaminondas, at the head of the cavalry and lightarmed foot, posted himself in the rear; where, sometimes suftaining the enemy's attacks, and fometimes charging them in his turn, he completed the retreat with fuccess, and preferved · the Boeotians. The generals upon their return, were each of them fined ten thousand drachms *, and Epaminondas substituted in their place. As the public good was his fole view, he overlooked the injurious treatment and kind of affront which he had received, and had full amends in the glory that attended fo generous and difinterested a conduct.

Some days after, he marched at the head of the army into Theffaly; whither his reputation had preceded him. It had fpread already both terror and joy through the whole country; terror amongst the tyrant's friends, whom the very name of Epaminondas dismayed, and joy amongst the people, from the affurance of being speedily delivered from the yoke of the tyranny, and the tyrant punished for all his crimes. But Epaminondas, preferring the safety of Pelopidas to his own glory, instead of carrying on the war with vigour, as he might have done, chose rather to protract it; from the apprehension, that the tyrant, if reduced to despair, like a wild beast, would turn his whole rage upon his prisoner. For he knew the violence and brutality of his nature, which would hearken neither to reason nor justice; and that he took delight in burying men alive; that some he covered with the skins of bears and wild boars, that his dogs might tear them in pieces; or he shot them to death with arrows. These were his frequent sports and diversions. In the cities of Meliboea and Scotusa*, which were in alliance with him, he called an assembly of the citizens, and causing them to be surrounded by his guards, he ordered the throats of all their young to be cut in his presence.

C c iiij

About L. 225 Sterling.

Hearing one day a famous actor perform a part in the Troades of Euripides, he fuddenly went out of the theatre, and fent to the actor to tell him, not to be under any apprehension upon that account; for that his leaving the place was not from any discontent in regard to him, but because he was ashamed to let the citizens see him weep the misfortunes of Hercules and Andromache, who had cut so many of their throats without any compassion.

'Though he was little fusceptible of pity, he was much so of fear at this time. Amazed at the sudden arrival of Epaminondas, and dazzled with the majesty that surrounded him, he made haste to dispatch persons to him with apologies for his conduct. Epaminondas could not suffer that the Thebans should make either peace or alliance with so wicked a man. He only granted him a truce for thirty days; and after having got Pelopidas and Ismenias out of his hands, he retired with his troops.

* Fear is not a master whose lessons make any deep and lasting impression upon the mind of man. The tyrant of Pherae soon returned to his natural disposition. He ruined several cities of Thessay, and put garrisons into those of Phthia, Achaea, and Magnesia. Those cities sent deputies to Thebes to demand a succour of troops, praying that the command of them might be given to Pelopidas; which was granted. He was upon the point of setting out, when there happened a sudden eclipse of the fun, by which the city of Thebes was darkened at noon-day. The dread and confternation was general. Pelopidas knew very well that this accident had nothing more than natural in it; but he did not think it proper for him to expose feven thousand Thebans against their will, nor to compel them to march in the terror and apprehension with which he perceived they were seized. He therefore gave himself to the Thessalans alone, and taking with him three hundred horse of such Thebans and strangers as would follow him, he departed, contrary to the prohibition of the soothsayers, and the opinion of the most wise and judicious.

<sup>2</sup> Plat. in Pelop. p. 295-298. Xenoph. l. vi. p. 601.

* Cities of Magnesia,

He was personally incensed against Alexander, in resentment of the injuries he had received from him. What Thebé his wise had said, and he himself knew, of the general discontent in regard to the tyrant, gave him hopes of finding great divisions in his court, and an universal disposition to revolt. But his strongest motive was the beauty and grandeur of the action in itself. For his sole desire and ambition was, to show all Greece, that at the same time the Lacedaemonians sent generals and officers to Dionysius the tyrant, and the Athenians on their part were in a manner in the pay of Alexander, to whom they had erected a statue of brass, as to their benefactor, the Thebans were the only people that declared war against tyranny, and endeavoured to exterminate from amongst the Greeks all unjust and violent government.

After having affembled his army at Pharfalus, he marched against the tyrant; who, being apprifed that Pelopidas had but few Thebans, and knowing that his own infantry was twice as strong as that of the Thessalians, advanced to meet him. Pelopidas being told by somebody, that Alexander approached with a great army: "So much the better," replied he, "we shall beat the greater number."

Near a place called Cynocephalus, there were very high and fleep hills, which lay in the midft of the plain. Both armies were in motion to feize that post with their foot, when Pelopidas ordered his cavalry to charge that of the enemy. The horse of Pelopidas broke Alexander's; and whilst they pursued them upon the plain, Alexander appeared fuddenly upon the top of the hills, having outfiripped the Thessains, and charging rudely such as endeavoured to force those heights and retrenchments, he killed the foremost, and repulsed the others, whom their wounds obliged to give way. Pelopidas, seeing this, recalled his horse, and giving them orders to attack the enemy's foot, he took his buckler, and ran to those who fought upon the hills.

He prefently made way through his infantry, and passed in a moment from the rear to the front, revived his soldiers vigour and courage in such a manner, as made the enemies believe themselves attacked by fresh troops. They supported two or three charges with great resolution; but finding Pelopidas's infantry continually gaining ground, and that his cavalry were returned from the pursuit to support them, they began to give way, and retired slowly, still making head in their retreat. Pelopidas, seeing the whole army of the enemy from the top of the hills, which, though it was not yet actually put to slight, began to break, and was in great disorder, he stopped for some time, looking about every where for Alexander.

As foon as he perceived him upon his right wing, rallying and encouraging his mercenary foldiers, he could contain himfelf no longer; but fired with that view, and abandoning to his fole refentment the care of his life, and the conduct of the battle, he got a great way before his battalions, and ran forwards with all his force, calling upon and defying Alexander. The tyrant made no answer to his defiance; and not daring to wait his coming up, withdrew to hide himself amongst his guards. The battalion standing firm for some time, Pelopidas broke the first ranks, and killed the greatest part of the guards upon the fpot. The rest continuing the fight at a distance, pierced his arms and breast at length with their javelins. The Thessalians, alarmed at the danger in which they saw him, made all the haste they could from the tops of the hills to his affistance: but he was fallen dead when they arrived. The infantry and the Theban horfe, returning to the fight against the enemy's main body, put them to flight, and pursued them a great way. The plain was covered with the dead; for more than three thousand of the tyrant's troops were killed.

This action of Pelopidas, though it appears the effect of a confummate valour, is inexcufeable, and has been generally condemned, because there is no true valour without wisdom and prudence. . The greatest courage is cool and sedate. It spares itself where it ought, and exposes itself when occasion makes it necessary. A general ought to see every thing, and to have every thing in his thoughts. To be in a condition to apply the proper remedy on all occasions, he must not precipitate himself to the danger of being cut off, and of causing the loss of his army by his death.

b Euripides, after having faid in one of his pieces, that it is highly glorious for the general of an army to obtain the victory by taking care of his own life, adds, "That if it be necessary " for him to die, it must be when he resigns his life into the " hands of virtue;" to fignify, that only virtue, not passion, anger, or revenge, has a right over the life of a general, and that the first duty of valour is to preserve him who preserves others.

c It is in this fense the faying of Timotheus is so just and amiable. When Chares shewed the Athenians the wounds he had received whilst he was their general, and his shield pierced through with a pike: " And for me," faid Timotheus, " when " I befieged Samos, I was much ashamed to see a dart fall very " near me, as having exposed myself like a young man with-" out necessity, and more than was consistent for the general " of fo great an army." Hannibal certainly cannot be suspected of fear; and yet it has been observed, that in the great number of battles which he fought, he never received any wound, except only at the fiege of Saguntum.

It is therefore not without reason, that Pelopidas is reproached with having facrificed all his other virtues to his valour, by fuch a prodigality of his life, and with having died rather for himfelf than his country.

Never was captain more lamented than him. His death changed the victory fo lately gained into mourning. A profound filence and universal affliction reigned throughout the whole army, as if it had been entirely defeated. When his body was carried to Thebes, from every city by which it passed, the people of all ages and sexes, the magistrates and priests, came out to meet the bier, and to march in procession before it, carrying crowns, trophies, and armour of gold. The Thessalians, who were at the same time highly afflicted for his death, and equally sensible of their obligations to him, made it their request, that they might be permitted to celebrate at their sole expence the obsequies of a general, who had devoted himself for their preservation; and that honourable privilege could not be resuled to their grateful zeal.

b Plut. in Pelop. p. 317. $ 1bid. p. 278.

His funeral was magnificent, especially in the sincere affliction of the Thebans and Thessalians: For, says Plutarch, the external pomp of mourning, and those marks of forrow, which may be imposed by the public authority upon the people, are not always certain proofs of their real sentiments. The tears which slow in private as well as public, the regret expressed equally by great and small, the praises given by the general and unanimous voice to a person who is no more, and from whom nothing further is expected, are an evidence not to be questioned, and an homage never paid but to virtue. Such were the obsequies of Pelopidas, and, in my opinion, nothing more great and magnificent could be imagined.

Thebes was not contented with lamenting Pelopidas, but refolved to avenge him. A small army of seven thousand foot and seven hundred horse were immediately sent against Alexander. The tyrant, who had not yet recovered the terror of his defeat, was in no condition to defend himself. He was obliged to restore to the Thessalians the cities he had taken from them, and to give the Magnesians, Phthians, and Achaeans, their liberty, to withdraw his garrisons from their country, and to swear that he would always obey the Thebans, and march at their orders against all their enemies.

Such a punishment was very gentle. Nor, says Plutarch, did it appear sufficient to the gods, or proportioned to his crimes: They had reserved one for him worthy of a tyrant. Thebé his wife, who saw with horror and detestation the cruelty and persidy of her husband, and had not forgot the lessons and advice which Pelopidas had given her, whilst in prison, entered into a confpiracy with her three brothers to kill him. The tyrant's whole palace was full of guards, who kept watch in the night; but he placed little confidence in them: As his life was in fome fort in their hands, he feared them the most of all men. He lay in a high chamber, to which he ascended by a ladder that was drawn up after his entrance. Near this chamber a great dog was chained to guard it. He was exceeding fierce, and knew nobody but his master, Thebé, and the slave who fed him.

The time pitched upon for the execution of the plot being arrived. Thebé shut up her brothers during the day-time, in an apartment near the tyrant's. When he entered it at night, as he was full of meat and wine, he fell into a deep fleep immediately. Thebé went out presently after, and ordered the flave to take away the dog, that he might not diffurb her hufband's repose; and lest the ladder should make a noise when her brothers came up by it, she covered the steps of it with wool. All things being thus prepared, she made her brothers afcend, armed with daggers; who, when they came to the door, were feized with terror, and would go no farther. Thebé, quite out of her wits, threatened to awake the tyrant if they did not proceed immediately, and to discover the plot to him. Their shame and fear reanimated them: She made them enter, led them to the bed, and held the lamp herfelf, whilst they killed him with repeated wounds. The news of his death was immediately spread through the city. His dead body was exposed to all fort of outrages, trampled under foot by the people, and given for a prey to the dogs and vultures; a just reward for his violent oppressions and detestable cruelties.

SECTION VII.

EPAMINONDAS chosen GENERAL of the THEBANS.

His DEATH and CHARACTER.

THE extraordinary prosperity of Thebes d was no small subject of alarm to the neighbouring states. Every thing was at that time in motion in Greece. A new war had sprung up between the Arcadians and the Eleans, which had occasioned another between the Arcadians themselves. The people of Tegea had called in the Thebans to their aid; and those of Mantinea, the Spartans and Athenians. There were besides several other allies on each side. The former gave Epaminondas the command of their troops, who immediately entered Arcadia, and encamped at Tegea, with design to attack the Mantineans, who had quitted their alliance with Thebes to attach themselves to Sparta.

d A. M. 3641. Ant. J. C. 363. Xenoph. l. vii. p. 642-644. Plut. in Agefil. p. 615. Diod. p. 391, 392.

Being informed that Agesilaus had begun his march with his army, and advanced towards Mantinea, he formed the enterprise, which, he believed, would immortalize his name, and entirely reduce the power of the enemy. He left Tegea in the night with his army, unknown to the Mantineans, and marched directly to Sparta by a different route from that of Agesilaus. He would undoubtedly have taken the city by surprise, as it had neither walls, defence, nor troops: But happily for Sparta, a Cretan having made all possible haste to apprise Agesilaus of his design, he immediately dispatched one of his horse to advise the city of the danger that threatened it, and arrived there soon after in person.

He had scarce entered the town, when the Thebans were seen passing the Enrotas, and coming on against the city. E-paminondas, who perceived that his design was discovered, thought it incumbent on him not to retire without some attempt. "He therefore made his troops advance, and making use of valour instead of stratagem, he attacked the city at several quarters, penetrated as far as the public place, and seized that part of Sparta which lay upon the side of the river. Agesslaus made head every where, and defended himself with much more valour than could be expected from his years. He saw well, that it was not now a time, as before, to spare himself, and to act only upon the desensive; but that he had need of all his courage and daring, and to sight with all the vigour of despair; means which he had never used, nor placed his considence in before, but which he employed with great success in the present dangerous emergency. For by this happy despair and prudent audacity, he in a manner snatched the city out of the hands of Epaminondas. His son Archidamus, at the head of the Spartan youth, behaved with incredible valour wherever the danger was greatest, and with his small troop stopped the enemy, and made head against them on all sides.

e Polyb. l. ix. p. 547.

A young Spartan, named Isadas, distinguished himself particularly in this action. He was very handsome in the face, perfectly well shaped, of an advantageous stature, and in the flower of his youth. He had neither armour nor clothes upon his body, which shone with oil, and held a spear in one hand, and a fword in the other. In this condition he quitted his house with the utmost eagerness, and breaking through the press of the Spartans that fought, he threw himself upon the enemy, gave mortal wounds at every blow, and laid all at his feet who opposed him, without receiving any hurt himfelf. Whether the enemy were difmayed at fo aftonishing a fight, or, fays Plutarch, the gods took pleafure in preferving him upon account of his extraordinary valour, it is faid the Ephori decreed him a crown after the battle in honour of his exploits, but afterwards fined him a thousand drachms * for having exposed himself to so great a danger without arms.

Epaminondas having failed of his aim, forefeeing that the Arcadians would certainly haften to the relief of Sparta, and not being willing to have them with all the Lacedaemonian forces upon his hands at the fame time, he returned with expedition to Tegea. The Lacedaemonians and Athenians, with their allies, followed him close in the rear.

F That general confidering his command was upon the point of expiring; that if he did not fight, his reputation might fuffer extremely; and that immediately after his retreat, the enemy would fall upon the Theban allies, and entirely ruin them, he gave orders to his troops to hold themselves in readiness for battle.

The Greeks had never fought amongst themselves with more numerous armies. The Lacedaemonians consisted of more than twenty thousand foot and two thousand horse; the Thebans of thirty thousand soot and three thousand horse. Upon the right wing of the former, the Mantineans, Arcadians, and Lacedaemonians were posted in one line; the Eleans and Achaeans, who were the weakest of their troops, had the centre, and the Athenians alone composed the left wing. In the other army, the Thebans and Arcadians were on the left, the Argives on the right, and the other allies in the centre. The cavalry on each side were disposed in the wings.

<sup>8</sup> Xenoph. l. vii. p. 645-647.

* Five hundred livres.

The Theban general marched in the same order of battle in which he intended to fight, that he might not be obliged, when he came up with the enemy, to lose, in the disposition of his army, a time which cannot be too much saved in great enterprises.

He did not march directly, and with his front to the enemy, but in a column upon the hills, with his left wing foremost, as if he did not intend to fight that day. When he was over-against them at a quarter of a league's distance, he made his troops halt and lay down their arms, as if he designed to encamp there. The enemy in effect were deceived by that stand, and reckoning no longer upon a battle, they quitted their arms, dispersed themselves about the camp, and suffered that ardour to extinguish, which the near approach of a battle is wont to kindle in the hearts of the soldiers.

Epaminondas, however, by suddenly wheeling his troops to the right, having changed his column into a line, and having drawn out the choice troops, whom he had expressly posted in front upon his march, he made them double their files upon the front of his left wing, to add to its strenth, and to put it into a condition to attack in a point the Lacedaemonian phalanx, which, by the movement he had made, faced it directly. He ordered the centre and right wing of his army to move very flow, and to halt before they came up with the enemy, that he might not hazard the event of the battle upon troops, of which he had no great opinion.

He expected to defide the victory by that body of chosen troops, which he commanded in person, and which he had formed in a column to attack the enemy in a point like a galley, fays Xenophon. He affured himfelf, that if he could penetrate the Lacedaemonian phalanx, in which the enemy's principal force confifted, he should not find it difficult to rout the rest of their army, by charging upon the right and left with his victorious troops.

But that he might prevent the Athenians in the left wing from coming to the support of their right against his intended attack, he made a detachment of his horse and soot advance out of the line, and posted them upon the rising ground in readiness to slank the Athenians; as well to cover his right, as to alarm them, and give them reason to apprehend being taken in slank and rear themselves, if they advanced to suftain their right.

After having difposed his whole army in this manner, he moved on to charge the enemy with the whole weight of his column. They were strangely surprised when they saw Epaminondas advance towards them in this order, and resumed their arms, bridled their horses, and made all the haste they could to their ranks.

Whilst Epaminondas marched against the enemy, the cavalry that covered his slank on the left, the best at that time in Greece, entirely composed of Thebans and Thessalians, had orders to attack the enemy's horse. The Theban general, whom nothing escaped, had artfully bestowed bowmen, slingers, and dartmen, in the intervals of his horse, in order to begin the disorder of the enemy's cavalry, by a previous discharge of a shower of arrows, stones, and javelins, upon them. The other army had neglected to take the same precaution, and had made another fault, not less considerable, in giving as much depth to the squadrons, as if they had been a phalanx. By this means, their horse were incapable of supporting long the charge of the Thebans. After having made several inessectual attacks with great loss, they were obliged to retire behind their infantry.

In the mean time, Epaminondas, with his body of foot, had charged the Lacedaemonian phalanx. The troops fought on both fides with incredible ardour; both the Thebans and Lacedaemonians being refolved to perish rather than yield the glory of arms to their rivals. They began by sighting with the spear; and those first arms being soon broken in the sury of the combat, they charged each other sword in hand. The resistance was equally obstinate, and the slaughter very great on both sides. The troops, despising danger, and desiring only to distinguish themselves by the greatness of their actions, chose rather to die in their ranks, than to lose a step of their ground.

The furious flaughter on both fides having continued a great while without the victory's inclining to either, Epaminondas to force it to declare for him, thought it his duty to make an extraordinary effort in person, without regard to the danger of his own life. He formed therefore a troop of the bravest and most determined about him, and putting himself at the head of them, he made a vigorous charge upon the enemy, where the battle was most warm, and wounded the general of the Lacedaemonians with the first javelin he threw. His troop, by his example, having wounded or killed all that flood in their way, broke and penetrated the phalanx. The Lacedaemonians, difmayed by the presence of Epaminondas, and overpowered by the weight of that intrepid party, were reduced to give ground. The gross of the Theban troops, animated by their general's example and fuccefs, drove back the enemy upon his right and left, and made a great flaughter of them. But some troops of the Spartans, perceiving that Epaminondas abandoned himself too much to his ardour, suddenly rallied, and returning to the fight, charged him with a shower of javelins. Whilst he kept off part of those darts, shunned some of them, fenced off others, and was fighting with the most heroic valour, to affure the victory to his army, a Spartan, named Callicrates, gave him a mortal wound with a javelin in the breast across his cuirals. The wood of the javelin being broke off, and the iron head continuing in the wound, the torment was insupportable, and he fell immediately. The battle began around him with new fury; the one fide using their utmost endeavours to take him alive, and the other to fave him. The Thebans gained their point at last, and carried him off, after having put the enemy to slight. They did not pursue them far; and returning immediately, contented themselves with remaining masters of the field and of the dead, without making any advantage of their victory, or undertaking any thing further, as if they stayed for the orders of their general.

The cavalry, difmayed by the accident of Epaminondas, whom they believed to be dead, and feeming rather vanquished than victorious, neglected to pursue their success in the same manner, and returned to their former post.

Whilst this passed on the left wing of the Thebans, the Athenian horse attacked their cavalry on the right. But as the latter, besides the superiority of number, had the advantage of being feconded by the light infantry posted in their intervals, they charged the Athenians rudely, and having galled them extremely with their darts, they were broken and obliged to fly. After having difperfed and repulfed them in this manner, instead of pursuing them, they thought proper to turn their arms against the Athenian foot, which they took in flank, put into diforder, and pushed with great vigour. Just as they were ready to turn tail, the general of the Elean cavalry, who commanded a body of referve, feeing the danger of that phalanx, came upon the fpur to its relief, charged the Theban horse, who expected nothing fo little, forced them to retreat and regained from them their advantage. At the same time, the Athenian cavalry, which had been routed at first, finding they were not purfued, rallied themselves; and instead of going to the affistance of their foot, which was roughly handled, they attacked the detachment posted by the Thebans upon the heights without the line, and put it to the fword.

After these different movements, and this alternative of losses and advantages, the troops on both sides stood still and rested upon their arms, and the trumpets of the two armies, as if by consent, sounded the retreat at the same time. Each party pretended to the victory, and erected a trophy; the Thebans, because they had deseated the right wing, and remained massters of the field of battle; the Athenians, because they cut the detachment in pieces. And from this point of honour, both sides refused at first to ask leave to bury their dead, which, with the ancients, was confessing their defeat. The Lacedae-monians, however, sent first to demand that permission; after which, the rest had no thoughts but of paying the last duties to the slain.

Such was the event of the famous battle of Mantinea. Xenophon, in his relation of it, recommends the disposition of the Theban troops, and the order of battle, to the reader's attention, which he describes as a man of knowledge and experience in the art of war. And Monsieur Follard, who justly looks upon Epaminondas as one of the greatest generals Greece ever produced, in his discription of the same battle, ventures to call it the masterpiece of that great captain.

Enaminondas had been carried into the camp. The furgeons. after having examined the wound, declared that he would expire as foon as the head of the dart was drawn out of it. Those words gave all that were prefent the utmost forrow and affliction, who were inconfolable on feeing fo great a man about to die, and to die without iffue. For him, the only concern he expressed, was about his arms, and the success of the battle. When they shewed him his shield, and assured him that the Thebans had gained the victory; turning towards his friends with a calm and ferene air; "Do not regard," faid he, "this " day as the end of my life, but as the beginning of my hap-" pinefs, and the completion of my glory. I leave Thebes " triumphant, proud Sparta humbled, and Greece delivered " from the yoke of fervitude. For the rest, I do not reckon " that I die without issue; Leuctra and Mantinea are two il-" lustrious daughters, that will not fail to keep my name alive, " and to transmit it to posterity." Having spoke to this effect, he drew the head of the javelin out of his wound, and expired.

It may truly be faid, that the Theban power expired with this great man; whom Cicero * feems to rank above all the illustrious men Greece ever produced. * Justin is of the same opinion, when he says, That as a dart is no longer in a condition to wound when the point of it is blunted; so Thebes, after having lost its general, was no longer formidable to its enemies; and its power seemed to have lost its edge, and to be annihilated by the death of Epaminondas. Before him, that city was not distinguished by any memorable action, and afterwards, it was not famous for its virtues but misfortunes, till it sunk into its original obscurity; so that it saw its glory take birth, and expire with this great man.

* Epaminondas, princeps, meo judicio, Graeciae. Acad. Quaest. L i. n. 4.

It has been † doubted whether he was a more excellent captain or good man. He fought not power for himfelf, but for his country; and was so perfectly void of self-interest, that, at his death, he was not worth the expences of his funeral. Truly a philosopher, and poor out of taste, he despised riches, without assecting any reputation from that contempt; and if Justin may be believed, he coveted glory as little as he did money. It was always against his will that commands were conferred upon him; and he behaved himself in them in such a manner, as did more honour to dignities, than dignities to him.

Though poor himfelf, and without any estate, his very poverty, by drawing upon him the esteem and confidence of the rich, gave him the opportunity of doing good to others. One of his friends being in great necessity, Epaminondas sent him to a very rich citizen, with orders to ask him for a thousand crowns h in his name. That rich man coming to his house, to know his motives for directing his friend to him upon such h A talent.

D d iii

* Nam ficuti telo, si priman aciem praefregeris, reliquo ferro vim nocendi sustuleris; sie illo velut muerone teli ablato duce Thebanorum, rei quoque publicae vires bebetatae sunt; ut non tam illum amissise, quam cum illo omnes interiisse viderentur. Nam neque hunc ante ducem ullum memorabile bellum gesser, nec postea virtutibus, sed eladibus, insignes sucie; ut manifestum sit, patriae gloriam et matam et extinstam cum eo suisse. Justin, l. vi. e. 8.

et natam et extinclam cum eo fuisse. Jutin, l. vi. c. 8.

† Tuit incertum, vir melior an dux estet. Nam imperium non sibi semper, sed patriae quacsivit; et pecuniae adeo parcus fuit, ut sumptus suneri desuerit. Gloriae quoque non cupidior, quam pecuniae; quippe recusanti omnia imperia ingesta sunt, honeresque ita gessit, ut ornamentum non accipere, sed dare ipsi dignitati videretur. Justin.

an errand; "1 Why," replied Epaminondas, "it is because this "honest man is in want, and you are rich *."

He had + cultivated those generous and noble fentiments in himself by the study of polite learning and philosophy, which he had made his usual employment and sole delight from his earliest infancy; fo that it was furprifing, and a question frequently asked, how, and at what time, it was possible for a man, always bufy amongst books, to attain, or rather seize, the knowledge of the art military in fo great a degree of perfection. Fond of leifure, which he devoted to the fludy of philosophy, his darling passion, he shunned public employments, and made no interest but to exclude himself from them. His moderation concealed him to well, that he lived obscure and almost unknown. His merit however discovered him. He was taken from his folitude by force, to be placed at the head of armies; and he demonstrated, that philosophy, though generally in contempt with those who aspire at the glory of arms, is wonderfully useful in forming heroes. For besides its being a great advance towards conquering the enemy, to know how to conquer one's felf, in this school ‡ anciently were taught the great maxims of true policy; the rules of every kind of duty; the motives for a true discharge of them; what we owe our country; the right use of authority; wherein true courage confifts: In a word, the qualities that form the good citizen, fratefman, and great captain.

He possessed all the ornaments of the mind: He had the talent of speaking in persection, and was well versed in the most sublime sciencies. But a modest reserve threw a veil over all those excellent qualities, which still augmented their value, and of which he knew not what it was to be oftentatious. Spintharus, in giving his character, said, "That he never had met with a man, who knew more and spoke less."

It may be faid therefore of Epaminodas, that he falfified

i Plut. de praecept, reipub, ger. p. 809. k Plut. de audit. p. 39.

&quot; Ore yengos, ciaco, Gros de wring ist ou di abertis.

† Jam literarum stodium, jam philosophiae doctrina tanta, ut mirabile videretur, unde tam insignis militiae scientia homini inter literas nato. Justin.

† The works of Plato, Xenophon, and Aristotle, are proofs of this.

the proverb, which treated the Bocotians as gross and flupid. This was their common * characteristic, and was imputed to the gross air of the country, as the Athenian delicacy of taste was attributed to the subtlety of the air they breathed. Horace says, that to judge of Alexander from his bad taste of poetry, one would swear him a true Bocotian.

Bocotum in crasso jurares aere natum, Epist i. l. 2. "In thick Bocotian air you'd swear him born."

When Alcibiades was reproached with having little inclination to mufic, he thought fit to make this excuse; "It is for "Thebans+ to sing as they do, who know not how to speak." Pindar and Plutarch, who had very little of the soil in them, and who are proof that genius is of all nations, do themselves condemn the supidity of their countrymen. Epaminondas did honour to his country, not only by the greatness of his military exploits, but by that fort of merit, which results from elevation of genius, and the study of science.

I shall conclude his portrait and character with a circumstance, that gives place in nothing to all his other excellencies, and which may in some sense be preferred to them, as it expresses a good heart, and a tender and fensible spirit; qualities very rare amongst the great, but infinitely more estimable than all those splendid attributes, which the vulgar of mankind commonly gaze at with admiration, and feem almost the only objects worthy either of being imitated or envied. The victory at Leuctra had drawn the eyes and admiration of all the neighbouring people upon Epaminondas, who looked upon him as the support and restorer of Thebes, as the triumphant conqueror of Sparta, as the deliverer of all Greece; in a word, as the greatest man, and the most excellent captain that ever was in the world. In the midst of this universal applause, so capable of making the general of an army forget the man for the victor, Epaminondas, little ferfible to fo affecting and fo deferved a glory, "1 My joy," faid he, "arifes from my fenfe "of that, which the news of my victory will give my father "and my mother."

D d iiij

• Inter locorum naturas quantum interfit, videmus—Athenis tenue coelum, ex quo acutiores etiam putantur Attici; crassum 'llebis, itaque pingues Thebani. Cic. de sato, n. 7.

† They were great muficians.

Nothing in history seems so valuable to me as such sentiments, which do honour to human nature, and proceed from a heart, which neither salie glory nor salie greatness have corrupted. I confess it is with grief I see these noble sentiments daily expire amongst us, especially in persons whose birth and rank raise them above others, who, too frequently, are neither good sathers, good sons, good husbands, nor good friends; and who would think it a difference to them to express for a father and mother the tender regard, of which we have here so fine an example from a Pagan.

Until Epaminondas's time, two cities had exercised alternately a kind of empire over all Greece. The justice and moderation of Sparta had at first acquired it a distinguished preeminence, which the pride and haughtiness of its generals, and especially of Pausanias, soon lost it. The Athenians, until the Peloponnesian war, held the first rank, but in a manner scarce discernible in any other respect, than their care in acquitting themselves worthily, and in giving their inferiors just reason to believe themselves their equals. They judged at that time, and very juftly, that the true method of commanding, and of continuing their power, was to evidence their superiority only by fervices and benefactions. Those times, so glorious for Athens, were of about forty-five years continuance, and they retained a part of that pre-eminence during the twentyfeven years of the Peloponnesian war, which make in all the feventy-two or feventy-three years, which Demosthenes gives to the duration of their empirem: But for this latter space of time, the Greeks, difgusted by the haughtiness of Athens, received no laws from that city without reluctance. Hence the Lacedaemonians became again the arbiters of Greece, and continued fo from the time Lylander made himfelf mafter of Athens, until the first war undertaken by the Athenians, after their re-establishment by Conon, to withdraw themselves and the rest of the Greeks from the tyranny of Sparta, which was now grown more infolent than ever. At length, Thebes difputed the supremacy, and, by the exalted merit of a single man, saw itself at the head of all Greece. But that glorious condition was of no long continuance, and the death of Epaminondas, as we have already observed, plunged it again into the obscurity in which he found it.

Plut, in Coriol- p. 215. "Demost. Philip, ii'. p. 89.

Demosthenes remarks, in the passage above cited, that the pre-eminence granted voluntarily either to Sparta or Athens, was a pre-eminence of honour, not of dominion, and that the intent of Greece was to preserve a kind of equality and independence on the other cities. Hence, says he, when the governing city attempted to ascribe to itself what did not belong to it, and aimed at any innovations contrary to the rules of justice and established customs, all the Greeks thought themselves obliged to have recourse to arms, and without any motive of personal discontent, to espouse with ardour the cause of the injured.

I shall add here another very judicious reflection from Polybius n. He attributes the wife conduct of the Athenians, in the times I speak of, to the ability of the generals, who were then at the head of their affairs; and he makes use of a comparison, which explains, not unhappily, the character of that people. A vessel without a master, says he, is exposed to great dangers, when every one infifts upon its being fleered according to his opinion, and will comply with no other measures. If then a rude storm attacks it, the common danger conciliates and unites them; they abandon themselves to the pilot's skill; and all the rowers doing their duty, the ship is faved, and in a state of security. But if the tempest ceases, and when the weather grows calm again, the discord of the mariners revives; if they will hearken no longer to the pilot, and some are for continuing their voyage, whilft others refolve to stop in the midst of the course; if on one side they loose their sails, and furl them on the other; it often happens, that after having escaped the most violent storms, they are shipwrecked even in the port. This, fays Polybius, is a natural image of the Athenian republic. As long as it fuffered itself to be guided by the wife counsels of an Aristides, a Themistocles, a Pericles, it came off victorious from the greatest dangers. But profperity blinded and ruined it; following no longer any thing but caprice, and being become too insolent to be advised or governed, it plunged itself into the greatest missortunes,

B Po'yt. 1. vii. p. 488

SECTION VIII.

DEATH of EVAGORAS KING of SALAMIN. Admirable CHARACTER of that PRINCE.

THE third year of the 101st Olympiado, soon after the Thebans had destroyed Plataea and Thespiae, as has been observed before, Evagoras, king of Salamin in the ifle of Cyprus, of whom much has been already faid, was affaffinated by one of his eunuchs. His fon Nicocles succeeded him. He had a fine model before him in the person of his father; and he seemed to make it his duty to be entirely intent upon treading in his steps P. When he took poffession of the throne, he found the public treasures entirely exhausted, by the great expences his father had been obliged to be at in the long war between him and the king of Persia. He knew that the generality of princes, upon like occasions, thought every means just for the re-establishment of their affairs; but for him, he acted upon different principles. In his reign there was no talk of banishment, taxes, and confiscation of estates. The public felicity was his fole object, and justice his favourite virtue. He discharged the debts of the state gradually, not by crushing the people with exceffive imposts, but by retrenching all unnecessary expences, and by using a wife oeconomy in the administration of his revenue. " I am affured q," faid he, " that no citizen can complain that " I have done him the least wrong; and I have the fatisfaction " to know, that I have enriched many with an unsparing " hand." He believed this kind of vanity, if it be vanity, might be permitted in a prince, and that it was glorious for him to have it in his power to make his subjects such a defiance.

O A. M. 3630. Ant. J. C. 374. Diod. l. xv. p. 363.
P Hocrat. in Nicoc. p. 64.
Q Ibid. p. 65, 66.

He piqued himself also in particular upon another virtue, which is the more admirable in princes, as very uncommon in their fortunes; I mean temperance. It is most amiable, but very difficult, in an age and a fortune, to which every thing is lawful, and wherein pleasure, armed with all her arts and attractions, is continually lying in ambush for a young prince, and preventing his defires, to make a long refistance against the violence and infinuation of her foft affaults. Nicocles gloried in having never known any woman besides his wife during his reign, and was amazed that all other contracts of civil fociety should be treated with due regard, whilst that of marriage, the most facred and inviolable of obligations, was broke through with impunity; and that men should not blush to commit an infidelity in respect to their wives, of which should their wives be guilty, it would throw them into the utmost anguish and despair,

What I have faid of the justice and temperance of Nicocles, Isocrates puts into that prince's own mouth; and it is not probable that he should make him speak in such a manner, if his conduct had not agreed with such sentiments. It is in a discourse, supposed to be addressed by that king to his people, wherein he describes to them the duties of subjects to their princes; love, respect, obedience, sidelity, and devotion to their service; and to engage them more effectually to the discharge of those duties, he does not distain to give them an account of his own conduct and sentiments.

In another discourse, which precedes this, Isocrates explains to Nicocles all the duties of the sovereignty, and makes excellent resections upon that subject, of which I can repeat here only a very small part. He begins by telling him, that the virtue of private persons is much better supported than his own, by the mediocrity of their condition; by the employment and cares inseparable from it; by the missortunes to which they are frequently exposed; by their distance from pleasures and luxury; and particularly, by the liberty which their friends and relations have of giving them advice; whereas the generality of princes have none of these advantages. He adds, that a king, who would make himfelf capable of governing well, ought to avoid an idle and inactive life, should set apart a proper time for business and the public affairs. should form his council of the most able and experienced persons in his kingdom, should endeavour to make himself as much superior to others by his merit and wildom, as he is by his dignity, and especially acquire the love of his subjects, and for that purpose love them fincerely, and look upon himself as their common father. " Perfift," faid he, " in the religion you have re-" ceived from your forefathers; but be assured, that the most " grateful adoration and facrifice that you can offer to the " Divinity, is that of the heart, in rendering yourself good " and just. Shew, upon all occasions, so high a regard for " truth, that a fingle word from you may be more confided " in than the oath of others. Be a warrior, by your ability " in military affairs, and by fuch a warlike provision as may " intimidate your enemies; but let your inclinations be pacific, " and be rigidly exact in never pretending to, or undertaking se any thing unjustly. The only certain proof that you have " reigned well, will be the power of bearing this testimony to " yourself; that your people are become both more happy, " and more wife, under your government."

I Ifocrat, in Nicoc, p. 64.

<sup>8</sup> Ibid. ad Nicoc.

What seems to me most remarkable in this discourse, is, that the advice which Isocrates gives the king is neither attended with praises, nor with those studied reservations and artiscial turns, without which searful and modest truth dares not venture to approach the throne, This is most worthy of applaute, and more for the prince's than the writer's praise. Nicocles, far from being offended at these counsels, received them with joy; and to express his gratitude to Isocrates, made him a present of twenty talents, that is to say, twenty thousand crowns to

SECTION IX.

ARTAXERXES MNEMON undertakes the REDUCTION of EGYPT.

ARTAXERXES u, after having given his people a relaxation of feveral years, had formed the defign of reducing Egypt, which had shaken off the Persian yoke long before, and made great preparations for war for that purpose. Achoris, who then reigned in Egypt, and had given Evagoras powerful aid against the Persians, foreseeing the storm, raised abundance of troops of his own fubjects, and took into his pay a great body of Greeks, and other auxiliary foldiers, of whom Chabrius had the command x. He had accepted that office without the authority of the republic.

Plut. in vit. Ifoc. p. 838.

<sup>4</sup> A. M. 3627. Ant. J. C. 377. Diod. l. xv. p. 328, et 347.

Pharnabasus, having been charged with this war, sent to Athens to complain that Chabrias had engaged himfelf to ferve against his master, and threatened the republic with the king's refentment, if he was not immediately recalled. He demanded at the same time Iphicrates, another Athenian, who was looked upon as one of the most excellent captains of his time, to give him the command of the body of Greek troops in the service of his master. The Athenians, who had a great interest in the continuance of the king's friendship, recalled Chabrias, and ordered him, upon pain of death, to repair to Athens by a certain day. Iphicrates was fent to the Persian army.

The preparations of the Persians went on so slowly, that two whole years elapsed before they entered upon action. Achoris , king of Egypt died in that time, and was fucceeded by Pfammuthis, who reigned but a year. Nephretitus was the next, and four months after Nectanebis, who reigned ten or twelve years.

2 Artaxerxes, to draw more troops out of Greece, fent ambaffadors thither, to declare to the feveral states, that the king's intent was, they should all live in peace with each other, conformably to the treaty of Antalcides; that all garrifons should be withdrawn, and all the cities suffered to enjoy their liberty under their respective laws. All Greece received this declaration with pleasure except the Thebans, who refused to conform to it.

<sup>a</sup> At length, every thing being in readiness for the invasion

y Euseb, in Chron,

of Egypt, a camp was formed at Acae, fince called Ptolemais, in Palestine, the place appointed for the general rendezvous. In a review there, the army was found to consist of two hundred thousand Persians, under the command of Pharnabasus, and twenty thousand Greeks under Iphicrates. The forces at sea were in proportion to those at land; their sleet consisting of three hundred gallies, besides two hundred vessels of thirty oars, and a prodigious number of barks to transport the necessary provisions for the sleet and army.

The army and fleet began to move at the fame time; and that they might act in concert, they seperated from each other as little as possible. The war was to open with the siege of Pelufium; but so much time had been given the Egyptians, that Nectanebis had rendered the approach to it impracticable both by fea and land. The fleet therefore, inflead of making a descent, as had been projected, failed forwards, and entered the mouth of the Nile called Mendesium. The Nile at that time emptied itself into the sea by seven different channels, of which only two * remain at this day; and at each of those mouths there was a fort with a good garrison to defend the entrance. The Mendesium not being so well fortified as that of Pelufium, where the enemy was expected to land, the descent was made with no great difficulty. The fort was carried fword in hand, and no quarter given to those who were found in it.

After this fignal action, Iphicrates thought it advisable to reimbark upon the Nile without loss of time, and to attack Memphis the capital of Egypt. If that opinion had been followed before the Egyptians had recovered the panic, into which so formidable an invasion, and the blow already received, had thrown them, they had found the capital without any defence, it had inevitably fallen inro their hands, and all Egypt been reconquered. But the gross of the army not being arrived, Pharnabasus believed it necessary to wait its coming up, and would undertake nothing, till he had reassembled all his troops; under pretext, that they would then be invincible, and that there would be no obstacle capable of withstanding them.

. Damietta and Rosetto.

Iphicrates, who knew that in affairs of war especially, there are certain favourable and decifive moments, which it is abfolutely proper to feize, judged quite differently, and in despair to see an opportunity suffered to escape, that might never be retrieved, he made preffing instances for permission to go at least with the twenty thousand men under his command. Pharnabafus refused to comply with that demand, out of abiect jealoufy; apprehending, that if the enterprise succeeded, the whole glory of the war would redound to Iphicrates. This delay gave the Egyptians time to look about them. They drew all their troops together into a body, put a good garrifon into Memphis, and with the rest of their army kept the field, and harraffed the Perfians in fuch a manner, that they prevented their advancing farther into the country. After which came on the inundation of the Nile, which laying all Egypt under water, the Persians were obliged to return into Phoenicia, having first lost ineffectually the best part of their troops.

Thus this expedition, which had cost immense sums, and for which the preparations alone had given fo much difficulty for upwards of two years, entirely miscarried, and produced. no other effect, than an irreconcileable enmity between the two generals, who had the command of it. Pharnabasus, to excuse himself, accused Iphicrates of having prevented its succefs; and Iphicrates, with much more reason, laid all the fault upon Pharnabasus. But well assured that the Persian lord would be believed at his court in preference to him, and remembering what had happened to Conon, to avoid the fate of that illustrious Athenian, he chose to retire secretly to Athens in a small vessel which he hired. Pharnabasus caused him to be accused there, of having rendered the expedition against Egypt abortive. The people of Athens made answer, that if he could be convicted of that crime, he should be punished as he deserved. But his innocence was too well known at Athens to give him any disquiet upon that account. It does not appear that he was ever called in question about it; and fome time after, the Athenians declared him fole admiral of their fleet.

b Most of the projects of the Persian court miscarried by their slowness in putting them in execution. Their generals hands were tied up; and nothing was left to their discretion. They had a plan of conduct in their instructions, from which they did not dare to depart. If any accident happened, that had not been foreseen and provided for, they must wait for new orders from court; and before they arrived, the opportunity was entirely lost. Iphicrates, having observed that Pharnabasus took his resolutions with all the presence of mind and penetration that could be desired in an accomplished generals, asked him one day, how it happened that he was so quick in his views, and so slow in his actions? "It is," replied Pharnabasus, "because my views depend only upon me, but their execution upon my masser."

SECTION X.

The LACEDAEMONIANS fend AGESILAUS to the AID of TACHOS.
His DEATH.

A FTER the battle of Mantinea <sup>d</sup>, both parties, equally weary of the war, had entered into a general peace with all the other states of Greece, upon the king of Persia's plan, by which the enjoyment of its laws and liberties were secured to each city and the Messenians included in it, notwithstanding all the opposition and intrigues of the Lacedaemonians to prevent it. Their rage upon this occasion separated them from the other Greeks. They were the only people who resolved to continue the war, from the hope of recovering the whole country of Messenian a short time. That resolution, of which Ageslaus was the author, occasioned him to be justly regarded as a violent and obstinate man, insatiable of glory and command, who was not afraid of involving the republic again in inevitable missortunes, from the necessity to which the want of money exposed them, of borrowing great sums, and of levying great imposts, instead ot taking the favourable opportunity of concluding a peace, and of putting an end to all their evils.

b Diod. l. xv. p. 358. C Ibid. p. 375.
d Plut in Agefil. p. 616.—618. Diod. l. xv. p. 397——401.

Whilst this passed in Greece, Tachos, who had ascended the throne of Egypt, drew together as many troops as he could, to defend himself against the king of Persia, who meditated a new invasion of Egypt, notwithstanding the ill success of his pass endeavours to reduce that kingdom.

For this purpose Tachos sent into Greece, and obtained a body of troops from the Lacedaemonians, with Agesilaus to command them, whom he promised to make generalissimo of his army. The Lacedaemonians were exasperated against Artaxerxes, from his having forced them to include the Messenians in the late peace, and were fond of taking this occasion to express their resentment. Chabrias went also into the service of Tachos, but of his own head, and without the republic's participation. This commission did Agesilaus no honour. It was thought below the dignity of a king of Sparta, and a great captain, who had made his name glorious throughout the world, and was then more than eighty years old, to receive the pay of an Egyptian, and to serve a barbarian, who had revolted against his master.

When he landed in Egypt, the king's principal generals, and the great officers of his house, came to his ship to receive, and make their court to him. The rest of the Egyptians were as solicitous to see him, from the great expectation which the name and renown of Agesilaus had excited in them, and came in multitudes to the shore for that purpose. But when, instead of a great and magnificent prince, according to the idea his exploits had given them of him, they saw nothing splendid or majestic either in his person or equipage, and saw only an old man of a mean aspect and small body, without any appearance, and dressed in a bad robe of a very coarse stuff, they were seized with an immoderate disposition to laugh, and applied the sable of the mountain in labour to him.

Volume IV.

Ee

e A. M. 3641. Ant. J. C. 363. Xenoph. de reg, Agefil, p. 663. Cor, Nep. in Agefil, c, viii,

When he met king Tachos, and had joined his troops with those of Egypt, he was very much surprised at not being appointed general of the whole army, as he expected, but only of the foreign troops; that Chabrias was made general of the sea sorces, and that Tachos retained the command in chief to himself; which was not the only mortification he had experienced.

Tachos came to a refolution to march into Phoenicia, thinking it more adviseable to make that country the feat of the war, than to expect the enemy in Egypt. Agefilaus, who knew better, represented to him in vain, that his affairs were not fufficiently established to admit his removing out of his dominions; that he would do much better to remain in them, and content himself with acting by his generals in the enemy's country. Tachos despised this wise counsel, and expressed no Iess difregard for him on all other occasions. Ageislaus was so much incenfed at fuch conduct, that he joined the Egyptians, who had taken arms against him during his absence, and had placed Nectanebis his * cousin upon the throne. Agesilaus. abandoning the king, to whose aid he had been fent, and joining the rebel, who had dethroned him, alleged in justification of himfelf, that he was fent to the affiftance of the Egyptians: and that they, having taken up arms against Tachos, he was not at liberty to serve against them without new orders from Sparta. He dispatched expresses thither; and the instructions he received, were to act as he should judge most advantageous for his country. He immediately declared for Nectanebis. Tachos, obliged to quit Egypt, retired to Sidon, from whence he went to the court of Persia. Artaxerxes not only forgave him his fault, but added to his elemency the command of his troops against the rebels.

Agefilaus covered so criminal a conduct with the veil of the public utility. But, says Plutarch, remove that delusive blind, the most just and only true name which can be given the action, is that of persidy and treason. It is true, the Lacedae-monians, making the Glorious and the Good confist principally in the service of that country which they idolized, knew-no other juffice than what tended to the augmentation of the grandeur of Sparta, and the extending of its dominions. I am furprifed so judicious an author as Xenophon should endeavour to palliate a conduct of this kind, by faying only, that Ageslaus attached himself to that of the two kings, who seemed the best affected to Greece.

* Diodorus calls him his fon; Plutarch, his coufin.

At the same time, a third prince of the city of Mendes set up for himfelf, to dispute the crown with Nectanebis. This new competitor had an army of an hundred thousand men to support his pretentions. Agefilaus gave his advice to attack them, before they were exercised and disciplined. Had that counsel been followed, it had been easy to have defeated a body of people, raifed in hafte, and without any experience in war. But Nectanebis imagined, that Agefilaus only gave him this advice to betray him in confequence, as he had done Tachos. He therefore gave his enemy time to discipline his troops, who foon after reduced him to retire into a city, fortified with good walls, and of very great extent. Agefilaus was obliged to follow him thither; where the Mendefian prince befieged them. Nectanebis would then have attacked the enemy before the works he had begun were far advanced, and pressed Agesilaus to that purpose; but he refused his compliance at first, which extremely augmented the fuspicions conceived of him. At length, when he faw the work in a fufficient forwardness, and that there remained only as much ground between the two ends of the line, as the troops within the city might occupy, drawn up in battle, he told Nectanebis, that it was time to attack the enemy; that their own lines would prevent their furrounding him; and that the interval between them was exactly the space he wanted, for ranging his troops in such a manner, as they might all act together effectively. The attack was executed according to Agefilaus's expectation; the beliegers were beaten; and from henceforth Agefilaus conducted all the operations of the war with fo much fuccess, that the enemyprince was always overcome, and at last taken prisoner.

The following winter f, after having well established Necta-

E e ij

nebis, he embarked to return to Lacedaemon, and was driven by contrary winds upon the coast of Africa, into a place called the Port of Menelaus, where he fell fick and died, at the age of fourfcore and four years. He had reigned forty-one of them at Sparta; and of those forty-one, he had passed thirty with the reputation of the greatest and most powerful of all the Greeks, and had been looked upon as the leader and king of almost all Greece, till the battle of Leuctra. His latter years did not entirely support the reputation he had acquired; and Xenophon, in his eulogium of this prince, wherein he gives him the preference to all other captains, has been found to exaggerate his virtues, and extenuate his faults too much.

The body of Agefilaus was carried to Sparta. Those who were about him not having honey, with which it was the Spartan custom to cover the bodies they would embalm, made use of wax in its stead. His son Archidamus succeeded to the throne, which continued in his house down to Agis, who was the fifth king of the line of Agefilaus.

Towards the end of the Egyptian war, the greatest part of the provinces in subjection to Persia, revolted.

Artaxerxes Mnemon had been the involuntary occasion of this defection. That prince, of himself, was good, equitable, and benevolent. He loved his people, and was beloved by them. He had abundance of mildaes and sweetness of temper in his character; but that easiness degenerated into sloth and luxury, and particularly in the latter years of his life, in which he discovered a dislike for all business and application; from whence the good qualities, which he otherwise possession; from whence the good qualities, which he otherwise possession as well as his beneficent intentions, became useless, and without effect. The nobility and governors of provinces, abusing his favour and the infirmities of his great age, oppressed the people, treated them with insolence and cruelty, loaded them with taxes, and did every thing in their power to render the Persian yoke insupportable.

The discontent became general, and broke out, after long fuffering, almost at the same time on all sides. Asia Minor, Syria, Phoenicia, and many other provinces, declared themselves openly, and took up arms. The principal leaders of the conspiracy were Ariobarzanes prince of Phrygia, Mausolus king of Caria, Orontes governor of Mysia, and Autophradates governor of Lydia. Datames, of whom mention has been made before, and who commanded in Cappadocia, was also engaged in it. By this means, half the revenues of the crown were on a sudden diverted into different channels, and the remainder did not suffice for the expences of a war against the revolters, had they acted in concert. But their union was of no long continuance; and those who had been the first and most zealous in shaking off the yoke, were also the stremming it, and in betraying the interests of the others to make their peace with the king.

The provinces of Afia Minor, on withdrawing from their obedience, had entered into a confederacy for their mutual defence, and had chosen Orontes governor of Mysia, for their general. They had also resolved to add twenty thousand foreign troops to those of the country, and had charged the same Orontes with the care of raising them. But when he had got the money for that service into his hands, with the addition of a year's pay, he kept it for himself, and delivered to the king the persons who had brought it from the revolted provinces.

Reomithras, another of the chiefs of Afia Minor, being fent into *Egypt to negotiate fuccours, committed a treachery of a like nature. Having brought from that country five hundred talents and fifty thips of war, he affembled the principal revolters at Leucas, a city of Afia Minor, under pretence of giving them an account of his negociation, feized them all, delivered them to the king to make his peace, and kept the money he had received in Egypt for the confederacy. Thus this formidable revolt, which had brought the Persian empire to the very brink of ruin, dissolved of itself, or, to speak more properly, was suspended for some time.

E e iij

* Diodorus fays he was fent to Tachos; but it is more likely that it was Nettanchis.

SECTION XI.

TROUBLE of the Court of ARTAXERXES concerning bis Successor. Death of that PRINCE.

The end of Artaxerxes's reign abounded with cabals. The whole court were divided into factions in favour of one or other of his fons, who pretended to the fuccession. He had an hundred and fifty by his concubines, who were in number three hundred and fixty, and three by his lawful wife Atossa; Darius, Ariaspes, and Ochus. To put a stop to these practices, he declared Darius, the eldest, his successor. And to remove all cause of disputing that prince's right after his death, he permitted him to assume from thenceforth the title of king, and to wear the royal * tiara. But the young prince was for having something more real. Besides which, the resusal of Artaxerxes to give him one of his concubines, whom he had demanded, had extremely incensed him, and he formed a conspiracy against his father's life, wherein he engaged fifty of his brothers.

It was Tiribafus, of whom mention has been made already, who contributed the most to his taking so unnatural a resolution, from a like subject of discontent against the king; who, having promised to give him sirft one of his daughters in marriage, and then another, broke his word both times, and married them himself: Such abominable incests being permitted at that time in Persia, the religion of the nation not prohibiting them.

The number of the conspirators were already very great, and the day fixed for the execution, when an eunuch, well informed of the whole plot, discovered it to the king. Upon that information, Artaxerxes thought it would be highly imprudent to despite so great a danger by neglecting a strict inquiry into it; but that it would be much more so, to give credit to it without certain and unquestionable proof. He assured himfelf of it with his own eyes. The conspirators were suffered to enter the king's apartment, and then seized. Darius and all his accomplices were punished as they deserved,

<sup>8</sup> Plut, in Artax p. 1024-1027. Diod. l. xv. p. 400. Justin. l. x. c. I, 2.

* This tiara was a turban, or kind of head drefs, with the plume of feathers flanding upright upon it. The feven counfellors had also plumes of feathers, which they were assamt, and before. All others were them assamt, and behind,

After the death of Darius, the cabals began again. Three of his brothers were competitors, Ariaspes, Ochus, and Arfames. The two first pretended to the throne in right of birth, being the fons of the queen. The third had the king's fayour, who tenderly loved him, though only the fon of a concubine. Ochus, prompted by his reftless ambition, studied perpetually the means to rid himself of both his rivals. As he was equally cunning and cruel, he employed his craft and artifice against Ariaspes, and his cruelty against Arsames. Knowing the former to be extremely fimple and credulous, he made the eunuchs of the palace, whom he had found means to corrupt, threaten him fo terribly in the name of the king his father, that expecting every moment to be treated as Darius had been, he poisoned himfelf to avoid it. After this there remained only Arfames to give him umbrage; because his father, and all the world, confidered that prince as most worthy of the throne, from his ability and other excellent galities. Him he caused to be affassinated by Harpates, son of Tiribasus.

This lofs, which followed close upon the other, and the exceeding wickedness with which both were attended, gave the old king a grief that proved mortal: Nor is it surprising, that at his age he should not have strength enough to support so great an affliction. he funk under it into his tomb, after a reign of forty-three years, which might have been called happy, if not interrupted by many revolts. That of his successor will be no less disturbed with them.

E e iiij

SECTION XII.

CAUSES of the frequent INSURRECTIONS and REVOLTS in the PERSIAN EMPIRE.

I HAVE taken care, in relating the feditions that happened in the Persian empire, to observe from time to time the abuses which occasioned them. But as these revolts were more frequent than ever in the latter years, and will be more so, especially in the succeeding reign, I thought it would be proper to unite here, under the same point of view, the different causes of such insurrections, which sorted the approaching decline of the Persian Empire.

I. After the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, the kings of Perfia abandomed themselves more and more to the charms of voluptuousness and luxury, and the delights of an indolent and inactive life. Shut up generally in their palaces amongst women, and a crowd of flatterers, they contented themselves with enjoying, in soft effeminate ease and idleness, the pleafure of universal command, and made their grandeur consist in the splendid glare of riches, and an expensive magnificence.

II. They were besides princes of no great talents for the conduct of affairs, of small capacity to govern, and void of taste for glory. Not having a sufficient extent of mind to animate all the parts of so vast an empire, nor ability to support the weight of it, they transferred to their officers the cares of public business, the fatigues of commanding armies, and the dangers which attend the execution of great enterprises; confining their ambition to bearing alone the lofty title of the great king, and the king of kings.

III. The great officers of the crown, the government of the provinces, the command of armies, were generally beflowed upon people without either fervice or merit. It was the credit of the favourites, the feerer intrigues of the court, the folicitations of the women of the palace, which determined the choice of the perfons, who were to fill the most important posts of the empire; and appropriated the rewards due to the officers who had done the flate real fervice to their own creatures.

IV. These courtiers, often out of a base, mean jealousy of the merit, that gave them umbrage, and reproached their small abilities, removed their rivals from public employments, and rendered their talents useless to the state. + Sometimes they would even cause their fidelity to be suspected by false informations, bring them to trial as criminals against the state, and force the king's most faithful servants, for their defence against their calumniators, to seek their safety in revolting, and in turning those arms against their prince, which they had so often made triumph for his glory, and the service of the empire.

V. The ministers, to hold the generals in dependence, reftrained them under such limited orders, as obliged them to let slip the occasions of conquering, and prevented them, by attending new orders from pushing their advantages. They also often made them responsible for their bad success, after having let them want every thing necessary to the service.

VI. The kings of Persia had extremely degenerated from the frugality of Cyrus, and the ancient Persians, who contented themselves with cresses and fallads for their food, and water for their drink. The whole nobility had been infected with the contagion of this example. In retaining the single meal of their ancestors, they made it last during the greatest part of the day, and prolonged it far into the night by drinking to excess: And far from being ashamed of drunkenness, they made it their glory, as we have seen in the example of young Cyrus.

VII. The extreme remoteness of the provinces, which extended from the Caspian and Euxine, to the Red sea and Ethiopia, and from the rivers Ganges and Indus to the Ægean sea, was a great obstacle to the sidelity and affection of the people, who never had the satisfaction to enjoy the presence of their masters; who knew them only by the weight of their taxations, and by the pride and avarice of their Satraps or governors; and who, in transporting themselves to the Court, to make their demands and complaints there, could not hope to find access to princes, who believed it contributed to the majesty of their persons to make themselves inaccessible and invisible.

† Pharnabases, Tiribasus, Datames, &c.

VIII. The multitude of the provinces in fubjection to Perha, did not compose an uniform empire, nor the regular body of a state, whose members were united by the common ties of interests, manners, language, and religion, and animated with the same spirit of government, under the guidance of the same laws. It was rather a confused, disjointed, tumultuous, and even forced affemblage of different nations, formerly free and independent, of whom some who were torn from their native countries and the sepulchres of their forefathers, faw themselves with pain transported into unknown regions, or amongst enemies, where they persevered to retain their own laws and customs, and a form of government peculiar to themselves. These different nations, who not only lived without any common tie or relation amongst them, but with a diversity of manners and worship, and often with antipathy of characters and inclinations, defired nothing fo ardently as their liberty, and re-establishment in their own countries. All these people therefore were unconcerned for the prefervation of an empire, which was the fole obstacle to their fo warm and just defires, and could not affect a government, that treated them always as strangers and subjected nations, and never gave them any share in its authority or privileges.

IX. The extent of the empire, and its remoteness from the court, made it necessary to give the viceroys of the frontier provinces a very great authority in every branch of government; to raise and pay armies; to impose tribute; to adjudge the differences of cities, provinces, and vassal-kings; and to make treaties with the neighbouring states. A power so extensive and almost independent, in which they continued many years without being changed, and without colleagues or council to deliberate upon the affairs of their provinces, accustomed them to the pleasure of commanding absolutely, and of reigning. In consequence of which, it was with great repugnance they submitted to be removed from their governments, and often endeavoured to support themselves in them by force of arms.

X. The governors of provinces, the generals of armies, and all the other officers and ministers, thought it for their honour to imitate in their equipages, tables, moveables, and habits, the pomp and splendour of the court in which they had been educated. To support so destructive a pride, and to furnish out expences so much above the fortunes of private persons, they were reduced to oppress the subjects under their jurisdiction with exorbitant taxes, slagrant extortions, and the shameful traffic of a public venality, that set those offices to fale for money, which ought to have been granted only to merit. All that vanity lavished, or luxury exhausted, was made good by mean arts, and the violent rapaciousness of an insatiable avarice.

These gross irregularities, and abundance of others, which remained without remedy, and which were daily augmented by impunity, tired the people's patience, and occasioned a general discontent amongst them, the usual forerunner of the ruined states. Their just complaints, long time despised, were followed by an open rebellion of several nations, who endeavoured to do themselves that justice by force, which was resulted to their remonstrances. In such a conduct, they failed in the submission and sidelity which subjects owe to their sovereigns; but Paganism did not carry its lights so far, and was not capable of so sublime a perfection, which was reserved for a religion that teaches that no pretext, no injustice, no vexation, can ever authorize the rebellion of a people against their prince.

HISTORY

OF THE

PERSIANS AND GRECIANS.

SECTION I.

Ochus afcends the Throne of Persia. His Cruelties.

Revolt of feveral Nations.

HE more the memory of Artaxerxes Mnemon was honoured and revered throughout the whole empire, the more Ochus believed he had reason to fear for himself; convinced, that in succeeding to him, he should not find the same favourable difpositions in the people and nobility, of whom he had made himfelf the horror by the murder of his two brothers. To prevent that aversion from occasioning his exclusion, he prevailed upon the eunuchs, and others about the king's person, to conceal his death from the public. He began by taking upon himfelf the administration of affairs, giving orders, and sealing decrees in the name of Artaxerxes, as if he had been still alive; and by one of these decrees, he caused himself to be proclaimed king throughout the whole empire, always by the order of Artaxerxes. After having governed in this manner almost ten months believing himfelf fufficiently established, he at length declared the death of his father, and ascended the throne k, taking upon himself the name of Artaxerxes. Authors, however, most frequently give him that of Ochus; by which name I shall generally call him in the sequel of this history.

Ochus was the most cruel and wicked of all the princes of his race, as his actions foon explained. In a very short time the palace and the whole empire were filled with his murders. To 1 remove from the revolted provinces all means of fetting fome other of the royal family upon the throne, and to rid himfelf at once of all trouble, that the princes and princesses of the blood might occasion him, he put them all to death, without regard to fex, age, or proximity of blood. He caused his own fifter Ocha, whose daughter he had married, to be buried alive"; and having thut up one of his uncles, with an hundred of his fons and grandfons, in a court of the palace, he ordered them all to be that to death with arrows, only because those princes were much esteemed by the Persians for their probity and valour. That uncle is apparently the father of Syfigambis, the mother of Darius Codomanus: n For Quintus Curtius tells us, that Ochus had caused fourscore of her brothers, with her father, to be massacred in one day. He treated with the same barbarity, throughout the whole empire, all those who gave him any umbrage, sparing none of the nobility whom he sufpected of the least discontent whatsoever.

The cruelties exercifed by Ochus, did not deliver him from inquietude. Artabafus, governor of one of the Afiatic provinces, engaged Chares the Athenian, who commanded a fleet and a body of troops in those parts, to affift him, and with his aid defeated an army of seventy thousand men sent by the king to reduce him. Artabasus, in reward of so great a service, made Chares a present of money to defray the whole expences of his armament. The king of Persia resented exceedingly this conduct of the Athenians in regard to him. They were at that time employed in the war of the allies. The king's menace to join their enemies with a numerous army obliged them to recall Chares.

P Artabasus, being abandoned by them, had recourse to the Thebans, of whom he obtained five thousand men whom he took into his pay, with Pamenes to command them. This reinforcement put him into a condition to acquire two other victories over the king's troops. Those two actions did the

<sup>1</sup> Justin. l. x. c. 3. m Val. Max. l. ix. c. 2. n Quint, Curt, l, x. c. 5.

O A. M. 3648. Ant. J. C. 356. Diod, l. xvi. p. 433, 434-P A. M. 3651. Ant. J. C. 353.

Theban troops, and their commander, great honour. Thebes must have been extremely incensed against the king of Persia, to send so powerful a succour to his enemies, at a time when that republic was engaged in a war with the Phocaeans. It was perhaps an effect of their policy, to render themselves more formidable, and to enhance the price of their alliance. It is certain, that soon after, they made their peace with the king, who paid them three hundred talents, that is to say, three hundred thousand crowns. Artabasus, desitute of all support, was overcome at last, and obliged to take resuge with Philip in Macedon.

Ochus being delivered at length from so dangerous an enemy, turned all his thoughts on the side of Egypt, which had revolted long before. About the same time, several considerable events happened in Greece, which have little or no relation with the affairs of Persia. I shall insert them here; after which I shall return to the reign of Ochus, not to interrupt the series of his history.

SECTION II.

WAR of the ALLIES against the ATHENIANS.

Some few years after the revolt of Afia Minor, of which I have been fpeaking, in the third year of the 150th Olympiad, Chio, Cos, Rhodes, and Byzantium, took up arms against Athens, upon which till then they had depended. To reduce them, they employed both great forces and great captains, Chabrias, Iphicrates, and Timotheus. *They were the last of the Athenian generals, who did honour to their country; no one after them being distinguished by merit or reputation.

*CHABRIAS had already acquired a great name; when, having been fent against the Spartans to the aid of the Thebans, and seeing himself abandoned in the battle by the allies, who

&lt;sup>q</sup> Diod. l. xvi. p. 438. <sup>s</sup> Cor. Nep. in Chab. c. i.

<sup>1</sup> A. M. 3646. Ant. J. C. 358.

The state of the s

Hace extrema fuit actas imperatorum Atheniensum, Iphieratis, Chabriae, Timothei: neque post illorum obitum quisquam dux in illa urbe fuit dignus memoria. Cor. Nep. in Timothe c. 4.

had taken flight, he fustained alone the charge of the enemy; his foldiers, by his order, having closed their files with one knee upon the ground covered with their bucklers, and prefented their pikes in front, in such a manner, that they could not be broke, and Agesilaus, though victorious, was obliged to retire. The Athenians erected a statue to Chabrias in the attitude he had fought.

IPHICRATES was of a very mean extraction, his father having been a shoemaker. But in a free city like Athens, merit was the sole nobility. This person may be truly said to be the son of his actions. Having signalized himself in a naval combat, wherein he was only a private soldier, he was soon after employed with distinction, and honoured with a command. In a prosecution carried on against him before the judges, his accuser, who was one of the descendants of Harmodius, and made very great use of his ancestor's name, having reproached him with the baseness of his birth; "Yes," replied he, "the "nobility of my family begins in me: That of yours ends in "you." He married the daughter of Gotys, king of Thrace.

'He is † ranked with the greatest men of Greece, especially in what regards the knowledge of war and military discipline. He made several useful alterations in the soldiers armour. Before him, the bucklers were very long and heavy, and, for that reason, were too great a burden, and extremely troublesome: He had them made shorter and lighter, so that, without exposing the body, they added to its force and agility. On the contrary, he lengthened the pikes and swords, to make them capable of reaching the enemy at a greater distance. He also changed the cuirasses; and instead of iron and brass, of which they were made before, he caused them to be made of slax. It is not easy to conceive how such armour could defend the foldiers, or be any security against wounds. But that slax being soaked in vinegar, mingled with salt, was prepared in fuch a manner, that it grew hard, and became impenetrable either to fword or fire. The use of it was common amongst several nations.

&lt;sup>t</sup> Diod. l. xv. p. 360. Cor. Nep. in. Iphic. c. i.

† Iphicrates Atheniensis, non tam magnitudine rerum gestarum, quam disciplina militari nohilitatus est. Fuit enim talis dux, ut non solum actatis suac cum primis compararetur, sed ne de majoribus natu quidem quisquam anteponeretur. Con Nep.

No troops were ever better exercifed or disciplined than those of Iphicrates. He kept them always in action; and in times of peace and tranquillity, made them perform all the necessary evolutions, either in attacking the enemy, or defending themselves; in laying ambuscades, or avoiding them; in keeping their ranks even in the pursuit of the enemy, without abandoning themselves to an ardour which often becomes pernicious; or to rally with fuccess, after having begun to break and give way: So that when the battle was to be given, all was in motion with admirable promptitude and order. The officers and foldiers drew themselves up without any trouble, and even in the heat of action performed their parts, as the most able general would have directed them. A merit very rare, as I have been informed, but very estimable; as it contributes more than can be imagined to the gaining of a battle, and implies a very uncommon superiority of genius in the general.

Timotheus was the fon of Conon, fo much celebrated for his great actions, and the important fervices he had rendered his country, + He did not degenerate from his father's reputation, either for his merit in the field, or his ability in the government of the state; but he added to those excellencies, the glory which results from the talents of the mind, having distinguished himself particularly by the gift of eloquence, and a taste for the sciences.

"No captain at first ever experienced less than himself the inconstancy of the fortune of war. He had only to undertake an enterprise, to accomplish it. Success perpetually attended his views and desires. Such uncommon prosperity did not fail u Plut. in Sylla, p. 454.

† Hie a patre acceptam gloriam multis auxit virtutibus. Fuit enim difertus, impiger, laboriofus, rei militaris peritus, neque minus civitatis regendae. Cor. Nep. c. i.

Timotheus Cononis filius, cum belli laude non inferior fuisset quam pater, ad cam laudem doctrinae et ingenii gloriam adjecit. Cic. l. i. de offic. s. 116, to excite jealoufy. Those who envied him, as I have already observed, caused him to be painted asleep, with Fortune by him taking cities for him in nets. Timotheus retorted coldly, "If I take places in my sleep, what shall I do when I am a-"wake?" He took the thing afterwards more seriously, and, angry with those who pretended to lessen the glory of his actions, declared in public, that he did not owe his success to fortune, but to himself. That goddess, says Plutarch, offended at his pride and arrogance, abandoned him entirely, and he was never successful afterwards. Such were the chiefs employed in the war of the allies.

* The war and the campaign opened with the fiege of Chio. Chares commanded the land, and Chabrias the fea forces. All the allies exerted themselves in sending aid to that island. Chabrias, having forced the passage, entered the port, notwithstanding all the endeavours of the enemy. The other gallies were assaid to follow, and abandoned him. He was immediately surrounded on all sides, and his vessel exceedingly damaged by the assaults of the enemy. He might have saved himself by swimming to the Athenian sleet, as his soldiers did; but from a mistaken principle of glory, he thought it inconsistent with the duty of a general to abandon his vessel in such a manner, and preferred a death, glorious in his sense, to a shameful slight.

This first attempt having miscarried, both sides applied themselves vigorously to making new preparations. The Athenians sitted out a sleet of fixty gallies, and appointed Chares to command it, and armed sixty more under Iphicrates and Timotheus. The sleet of the allies consisted of an hundred sail. After having ravaged several islands belonging to the Athenians, where they made a great booty, they sat down before Samos. The Athenians on their side, having united all their forces, besieged Byzantium. The allies made all possible haste to its relief. The two sleets being in view of each other, prepared to sight, when suddenly a violent storm arose; notwithstanding which, Chares resolved to advance against the enemy. The two other captains, who had more prudence and experience than him, thought it improper to hazard a hattle in such a conjuncture. Chares, enraged at their not following his advice, called the soldiers to witness, that it was not his fault they did not fight the enemy. He was naturally vain, oftentatious, and full of himself; one who exaggerated his own services, depreciated those of others, and arrogated to himself the whole glory of successes. He wrote to Athens against his two colleagues, and accused them of cowardice and treason. Upon his complaint, the people, * capricious, warm, suspicious, and naturally jealous of such as were distinguished by their extraordinary merit or authority, recalled those two generals, and brought them to a trial.

* Diod. l. xvi. p. 412, Cor. Nep. in Chab. c. iv.

Volume IV.

The faction of Chares, which was very powerful at Athens, having declared against Timotheus, he was sentenced to pay a fine of an hundred talents; a worthy reward for the noble disinterestedness he had shewn upon another occasion, in bringing home to his country twelve hundred talents; of hooty taken from the enemy, without the least deduction for himfelf. He could bear no longer the fight of an ungrateful city; and being too poor to pay so great a fine, retired to Chalcis. After his death, the people, touched with repentance, mitigated the fine to ten talents, which they made his son Conon pay, to rebuild a certain part of the walls. Thus, by an event sufficiently odd, those very walls which his grandsather had rebuilt with the spoils of the enemy, the grandson, to the shame of Athens, repaired in part at his own expence.

7 Iphicrates was also obliged to answer for himself before the judges. It was upon this occasion, that Aristophon, another Athenian captain, accused him of having betrayed and fold the fleet under his command. Iphicrates, with the considence an established reputation inspires, asked him, "Would

y Arift. Rhet. I. ii. c. 23.

* Populus acer, suspicax, mobilis, adversarius, invidus etiam potentiae, domum revocat. C v. Nep.

* An hundred thousand crowns.

$ Twelve hundred thousand crowns.

"you have committed a treason of this nature?" "No," replied Aristophon, "I am a man of too much honour for such an action!" "How!" replied Iphicrates, "could Iphicrates do what Aristophon would not do?"

<sup>2</sup> He did not only employ the force of arguments in his defence; he called in also the assistance of arms. Instructed by his colleague's ill success, he saw plainly that it was more necessary to intimidate than convince his judges. He posted round the place where they assembled, a number of young persons, armed with poniards, which they took care to shew from time to time. They could not resist so forcible and triumphant a kind of eloquence, and dismissed him acquitted of the charge. When he was afterwards reproached with so violent a proceeding; "I had been a sool, indeed," said he, "if having made war "successfully for the Athenians, I had neglected doing so for "myself,"

Chares, by the recall of his two colleagues, was left fole general of the whole army, and was in a condition to have advanced the Athenian affairs very much in the Hellespont, if he had known how to refult the magnificent offers of Artabasus. That viceroy, who had revolted in Asia Minor against the king of Persia his master, besieged by an army of seventy thousand men, and just upon the point of being ruined from the inequality of his forces, corrupted Chares. That general, who had no thoughts but of enriching himself, marched directly to the affiftance of Artabafus, effectually relieved him, and received a reward suitable to the service. This action of Chares was treated as a capital crime. He had not only abandoned the fervice of the republic for a foreign war, but offended the king of Persia, who threatened by his ambassadors to equip three hundred fail of ships in favour of the islanders allied against Athens. The credit of Chares faved him again upon this, as it had done feveral times before on like occasions. The Athenians, intimidated by the king's menaces, applied themfelves seriously to prevent their effects by a general peace.

Prior to these menaces, Isocrates had earnestly recommended this treaty to them in a fine discourse a, which is still extant. wherein he gives them excellent advice. He reproaches them with great liberty, as does Demosthenes in almost all his orations, of abandoning themselves blindly to the infinuations of orators, who flatter their passions, whilst they treat these with contempt, who give them the most falutary counsels. He applied himfelf particularly to correct in them their violent paffion for the augmentation of their power and dominion over the people of Greece, which had been the fource of all their misfortunes. He recalls to their remembrance those happy days, fo glorious for Athens, in which their ancestors, out of a noble and generous difinterestedness, facrificed every thing for the support of the common liberty, and the preservation of Greece, and compares them with the prefent fad times, wherein the ambition of Sparta, and afterwards that of Athens, had fucceffively plunged both states into the greatest misfortunes. He represents to them, that the real and lasting greatness of a state does not confift in augmenting its dominions, or extending its conquests to the utmost, which cannot be effected without violence and injustice; but in the wife government of the people, in rendering them happy, in protecting their allies, in being beloved and effected by their neighbours, and feared by their enemies. "A ftate," fays he, " cannot fail of becoming the " arbiter of all its neighburs, when it knows how to unite in " all its measures the two great qualities, justice and power, " which mutually support each other, and ought to be insepar-" able. For as power, not regulated by the motives of rea-" fon and justice, has recourse to the most violent methods " to crush and subvert whatever opposes it; so justice, when " unarmed and without power, is exposed to injury, and nei-"ther in a condition to defend itself, nor protect others." The conclusion drawn by Isocrates from this reasoning, is, that Athens, if it would be happy, and in tranquillity, ought not to affect the empire of the fea for the fake of lording it over all other states; but should conclude a peace, whereby every city and people should be left to the full enjoyment of their liberty; and declare themselves irreconcileable enemies of those who should presume to disturb that peace, or contravene fach measures.

a De pace, seu socialis.

a The peace was concluded accordingly under fuch conditions; and it was flipulated, that Rhodes, Byzantium, Chio, and Cos, should enjoy entire liberty. The war of the allies ended in this manner, after having continued three years.

SECTION III.

DEMOSTHENES excites the ATHENIANS for WAR. DEATH of MAUSOLUS. GRIEF of ARTEMISA bis WIFE.

This peace did not entirely remove the apprehension of the Athenians with regard to the king of Persia. The great preparations he was making gave them umbrage; and they were afraid so formidable an armament was intended against Greece, and that Egypt was only a plausible pretext with which the king covered his real defing.

Athens took the alarm upon this rumour. The orators increased the fears of the people by their discourses, and exhorted them to have an immediate recourse to their arms, to prevent the king of Persia by a previous declaration of war, and to make a league with all the people of Greece against the common enemy. Demosthenes made his first appearance in public at this time, and mounted the tribunal for harrangues to give his opinion. He was twenty-eight years of age. I shall speak more extensively of him by and by. Upon the present occafion, more wife than those precipitate orators, and having undoubtedly in view the importance to the republic of the aid of the Perhans against Philip, he dared not indeed oppose in a direct manner their advice, lest he should render himself fusspected; but admitting as a principle from the first, that it was necessary to consider the king of Persia as the eternal enemy of Greece, he represented that it was not confishent with prudence, in an affair of fuch great confequence, to precipitate any thing; that it was very improper, by a refolution taken upon light and uncertain reports, and by a too early declaration of war,

F f iij b A. M. 3649 Aut. J. C. 355. to furnish fo powerful a prince with a just reason to turn his arms against Greece; that all which was necessary at present, was to fit out a fleet of three hundred sail (in what manner, he proposed a scheme *), and to hold the troops in a readiness and condition to make an effectual and vigorous desence, in case of being attacked; that by so doing, all the people of Greece, without further invitation, would be sufficiently apprized of the common danger to join them; and that the report alone of such an armament would be enough to induce the king of Persia to change his measures, admitting he should have formed any designs against Greece.

For the rest, he was not of opinion, that it was necessary to levy any immediate tax upon the estates of private persons for the expence of this war, which would not amount to a great sum, nor suffice for the occasion. "It is better," said he, to rely upon the zeal and generosity of the citizens. Our city may be said to be almost as rich as all the other cities of Greece together? (He had before observed, that the estimate of the lands of Attica amounted to six thousand talents, about eight hundred and sifty thousand pounds Sterling.) When we shall see the reality and approach of the danger, every body will be ready to contribute to the expences of the war; as nobody can be so void of reason, as to prefer the hazard of losing their whole estate with their liberty, to sarrising a small part of it to their own, and their country's preservation.

"And we ought not to fear, as some people would infinuate, "that the great riches of the king of Persia enabled him to "raise a great body of auxiliaries, and render his army for-"midable against us. Our Greeks, when they are to march against Egypt, or Orontes and the other Barbarians, serve willingly under the Persians; but not one of them, I dare be assured, not a single man of them, will ever resolve to bear arms against Greece."

This discourse had all its effect. The refined and delicate address of the crator in advising the imposition of a tax to be deferred, and artfully explaining, at the same time, that it would fall only upon the rich, was highly proper to render abortive an affair, which had no other foundation than in the over-heated imagination of some orators, who were perhaps interested in the war they advised.

* I referve this scheme for the seventh section, being enrious, and very proper to explain in what manner the Athenians fixed out, and subsisted their fleets.

f Two years after, an enterprise of the Lacedaemonions against Megalopolis, a city of Arcadia, gave Demosthenes another opportunity to fignalize his zeal, and display his eloquence. That city, which had been lately established by the Arcadians, who had settled a numerous colony there from disferent cities, and which might serve as a fortress and bulwark against Sparta, gave the Lacedaemonions great uneasiness, and alarmed them extremely. They resolved therefore to attack and make themselves masters of it. The Megalopolitans, who without doubt had renounced their alliance with Thebes, had recourse to Athens, and implored its protection: The other people concerned, sent also their deputies thither; and the affair was debated before the people.

Demosthenes founded his discourse from the beginning of it upon this principle; that it was of the last importance to prevent either Sparta or Thebes from growing too powerful, and from being in a condition to give law to the rest of Greece. Now, it is evident, that if we abandon Megalopolis to the Lacedaemonians, they will soon make themselves masters of Messene also, two strong neighbouring cities, which are a check upon Sparta, and keep it within due bounds. The alliance we shall make with the Arcadians, in declaring for Megalopolis, is therefore the certain means to preserve so necessary a balance between Sparta and Thebes; because, whatever happens, neither the one nor the other will be able to hurt us, whilst the Arcadians are our allies, whose forces, in conjunction with ours, will always be superior to those of either of them.

A weighty objection to this advice of Demosthenes, was the alliance actually subfishing between Athens and Sparta. For, in fine, said the orators who opposed Demosthenes, what idea will the world have of Athens, if we change in such a manner with the times; or is it consistent with justice to pay no regard to the faith of treaties? "We ought," replied Demosthenes, whose very words I shall repeat in this place, "we * ought "indeed always to have justice in view, and to make it the "rule of our conduct; but, at the same time, our confermity to it should consist with the public good and the instruction of the state. It has been a perpetual maxim with us "to assist the oppressed." He cites the Lacedaemonians themselves, the Thebans and Eubocans as examples. "We have "never varied from this principle. The reproach of changing "therefore ought not to fall upon us, but upon those whose "injustice and usurpation oblige us to declare against them."

F f iiij

I admire the language of politicians. To hear them talk, it is always reason and the strictest justice that determine them; but to see them act, makes it evident that interest and ambition are the sole rule and guide of their conduct. Their discourse is an effect of that regard for justice which nature has implanted in the mind of man, and which they cannot entirely shake off. There are sew who venture to declare against that internal principle in their expressions, or to contradict it openly. But there are also sew, who observe it with sidelity and constancy in their actions. Greece never was known to have more treatics of alliance than at the time we are now speaking of, nor were they ever less regarded. This contempt of the religion of oaths in states, is a proof of their decline, and often denotes and occasions their approaching ruin.

<sup>b</sup> The Athenians, moved by the eloquent discourse of Demosthenes, sent three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, to the aid of the Megalopolitans, under the command of † Pammenes. Megalopolis was re-instated in its former condition, and its inhabitants, who had retired into their own countries, were obliged to return.

The peace, which had put an end to the war of the allies,

h Diod. l. xv. p. 402.

 $^{}$  Δει σκοπένι μλι ἀιὶ καὶ πράτξειι τὰ δίκαια $^{}$  συμπαρατητέιι  $\hat{c}$ ι, όπως άμα καὶ συμφίοριτ $\hat{c}$ ις ει τάθχε.

† This is not the Pammenes of Thebes, of whom mention has been made before.

did not procure for all of them the tranquillity they had reason to expect from it. The people of Rhodes and Cos, who had been declared free by that treaty, only changed their master. Mausolus, king of Caria, who assisted them in throwing off the Athenian yoke, imposed his own upon them. Having publicly declared himself for the rich and powerful, he enslaved the people, and made them suffer exceedingly. He died the second year after the treaty of peace, having reigned twenty-four years. Artemisa his wife succeeded him; and as she was supported with all the influence of the king of Persia, she retained her power in the isles lately subjected.

In fpeaking here of Artemifa, it is proper to observe, that the must not be confounded with another Artemifa, who lived above an hundred years before, in the time of Xerxes, and who distinguished her resolution and prudence so much in the naval battle of Salamin. Several celebrated writers have fallen into this error through inadvertency.

k This princes immortalized herself by the honours she rendered to the memory of Mausolus her husband. She caused a magnificent monument to be erected for him in Halicarnassus, which was called the Mausolaeum, and for its beauty was esteemed one of the wonders of the world, and gave the name of Mausolaeum to all future great and magnificent structures of the same kind.

<sup>1</sup> She endeavoured also to eternize the name of Mausolus by other monuments, which she believed more durable than those of brass or marble, but are often no better proof against the injuries of time; I mean works of wit. She caused excellent panegyries to be made in honour of her husband, and proposed a prize of great value for the person whose personnance should be the best. Amongst many others, the celebrated Isocrates, and Theopompus, his disciple, were competitors for it.

Theopompus carried it from them all, and had the weakness and vanity to boast in public of having gained the prize

<sup>1</sup> A. M. 3650. Ant. J. C. 354. Diod. l. xvi. p. 435.

k Plin. l. xxxvi. c. 5.

<sup>1</sup> Aul. Gel. l. x. c. 18. Plut, in Isocrat, p., 838.

Egainst his master: preferring, as is too common, the same of fine parts to the glory of a good heart. He had represented Mansolus in his history as a prince most fordidly avaricious, to whom all means of amassing treasure were good and eligible. He painted him without doubt, in very different colours in his panegyric, or else he would never have pleased the princess.

That illustrious widow prepared a different tomb for Maufolus, than what I have been speaking of. Having gathered his ashes, and had the bones beaten in a mortar, she mingled some of the powder every day in her drink, till she had drank it all off; desiring by that means to make her own body the sepulchre of her husband. She survived him only two years; and her grief did not end but with her life.

Instead of tears, in which most writers plunge Artemisa, during her widowhood, there are some who say she made very con-Ederable conquests. 1 It appears by one of Demosthenes's orations, that she was not considered at Athens as a forlorn relift, who neglected the affairs of her kingdom. But we have Something more decifive upon this head. O Vitruvius tells us, that after the death of Mausolus, the Rhodians, offended that woman should reign in Caria, undertook to dethrone her. They left Rhodes for that purpose with their fleet, and entered the great port of Halicarnassus. The queen being informed of their delign, had given the inhabitants orders to keep within the walls, and when the enemy should arrive, to express by shouts and clapping of hands a readiness to surrender the city to them. The Rhodians quitted their ships, and went in all haste to the public place, leaving their fleet without any to guard it. In the mean time, Artemisa came out with her gallies from the little port through a small canal, which she caused to be cut on purpose, entered the great port, seized the enemy's fleet without refistance, and having put her foldiers and mariners on board of it, she set fail. The Rhodians, having no means of escaping, were all put to the sword. The queen all the while advanced towards Rhodes. When the inhabizants faw their vessels approach, adorned with wreaths of laurel, they raifed great shouts, and received their victorious and triumphant sleet with extraordinary marks of joy. It was so in effect, but in another sense than they imagined. Artemisa, having met with no resistance, took possession of the city, and put the principal inhabitants to death. She had caused a trophy of her victory to be erected in it, and set up two statues of brass; one of which represented the city of Rhodes, and the other Artemisa, branding it with a hot iron. Vitruvius adds, that the Rhodians dared never demolish that trophy, their religion forbidding it; but they surrounded it with a building which prevented it entirely from being seen.

m Cie. Tufc, Quaeft. l. iii. n. 7c. Val. Max. l. iv. c. 6.

Demost. de Libertat. Rhod. p. 145. P Vitruv. de Architest. l. ii, c. &

All this, as Monsieur Bayle observes in his Dictionary, does not express a forlorn and inconsolable widow, that passed her whole time in grief and lamentation; which makes it reasonable to suspect, that whatever is reported of excessive in the mourning of Artemisa, has no other soundation, but its being advanced at a venture by some writer, and afterwards copied by all the rest.

I should be better pleased, for the honour of Artemisa, if it had been said, as there is nothing incredible in it, that by a fortitude and greatness of mind, of which her sex has many examples, she had known how to unite the severe affliction of the widow with the active courage of the queen, and made the affairs of her government serve her instead of consolation. "P Negotia pro solation accipiens."

The Rhodians being treated by Artemifa in the manner we have related, and unable to fupport any longer fo fevere and shameful a servitude, they had recourse to the Athenians, and implored their protection. Though they had rendered themselves entirely unworthy of it by their revolt, Demosthenes took upon him to speak to the people in their behalf. He began with setting forth their crime in its sull light; he enlarged upon their injustice and persidy; he seemed to enter into the people's just sentiments of resentment and indignation, and it might have been thought was going to declare himself in the strongest terms against the Rhodians: But all this was only the art of the orator, to infinuate himself into his auditors opinion, and to excite in them quite contrary sentiments of goodness and compassion for a people, who acknowledged their fault, who confessed their unworthiness, and who nevertheless were come to implore the republic's protection. He sets before them the great maxims, which in all ages had constituted the glory of Athens; the forgiving of injuries, the pardoning of rebels, and the taking upon them the desence of the unfortunate. To the motives of glory, he annexes those of interest; in shewing the importance of declaring for a city, that savoured the democratic form of government, and of not abandoning an island so powerful as that of Rhodes: Which is the substance of Demosthenes's discourse, intitled, For the liberty of the Rhodians.

PTacit. 9 A. M. 3653. Ant. J. C. 351. Demost. de Libert. Rhod.

<sup>q</sup> The death of Artemifa, which happened the fame year, it is very likely, re-established the Rhodians in their liberty, She was succeeded by her brother Idriaeus, who espoused his own sister Ada, as Mausolus had done Artemifa. It was the custom in Garia for the kings to marry their sisters in this manner, and for the widows to succeed their husbands in the throne, in preference to the brothers, and even the children of the defunct.

SECTION IV.

Expedition of OCHUS against PHOENICIA, CYPRUS, and EGYPT.

Ochus meditated in earnest the reduction of Egypt to his obedience, which had long pretended to maintain itself in independence. Whilst he was making great preparations for this important expedition, he received advice of the revolt of Phoenicia. That people, oppressed by the Persian governors, resolved to throw off so heavy a yoke, and made a league with Nectanebis king of Egypt, against whom Persia was marching its armies. As there was no other passage for that invasion but through Phoenicia, this revolt was very seasonable for Nectanebis, who therefore sent Mento the Rhodian to support the rebels, with four thousand Grecian troops. He intended by that means to make Phoenicia his barrier, and to ftop the Persians there. The Phoenicians took the field with that reinforcement, beat the governors of Syria and Cilicia, that had been sent against them, and drove the Persians entirely out of Phoenicia.

<sup>9</sup> Strab. 1 xiv. p. 656, FA. M. 3653. Ant. J. C. 351.

* Diod. l. xvi. p. 439.

The Cyprians, who were not better treated than the Phoenicians, feeing the good faccefs which had attended this revolt, followed their example, and joined in their league with Egypt. Ochus fent orders to Idriaeus king of Caria, to make war against them; who soon after fitted out a fleet, and fent eight thousand Greeks along with it, under the command of Phocion the Athenian, and Evagoras, who was believed to have been the fon of Nicocles. It is probable that he had been expelled by his uncle Protagoras, and that he had embraced with pleafure this opportunity of reascending the throne. His knowledge of the country, and the party he had there. made the king of Perfia choose him very wifely to command in this expedition. They made a descent in the island, where their army increased to double its number by the reinforcements which came from Syria and Cilicia. The hopes of enriching themselves by the spoils of this island, which was very rich, drew thither abundance of troops; and they formed the fiege of Salamin by fea and land. The island of Cyprus had at that time nine cities, confiderable enough to have each of them a petty king. But all those kings were however subjects of Persia. They had upon this occasion united together to throw off that yoke, and to render themselves independent Ochus, having observed that the Egyptian war was always unfuccessful from the ill conduct of the generals sent thither, he resolved to take the care of it upon himself. But before he set out, he signified his desire to the states of Greece, that they would put an end to their divisions, and cease to make war upon one another.

It is a just matter of furprise, that the court of Persia should insist so earnestly and so often, that the people of Greece should live in tranquillity with each other, and observe inviolably the articles of the treaty of Antalcides, the principal end of which was the establishment of a lasting union amongst them. It had formerly employed a quite different policy.

* Diod, I. xvi. p. 440, 441.

From the miscarriage of the enterprise against Greece under Xerxes, judging gold and silver a more proper means for subjecting it than that of the sword, the Persians did not attack it with open force, but by the method of secret intrigues. They conveyed considerable sums into it privately, to corrupt the persons of credit and authority in the great cities, and were perpetually watching occasions to arm them against each other, and to deprive them of the leisure and means to invade themselves. They were particularly careful to declare sometimes for one, sometimes for another, in order to support a kind of balance amongst them, which put it out of the power of any of those republics to aggrandize itself too much, and by that means to become formidable to Persia.

That nation employed a quite different conduct at this time, in prohibiting all wars to the people of Greece, and commanding them to observe an universal peace, upon pain of incurring their displeasure and arms, to such as should disobey. Persia, without doubt, did not take that resolution at a venture, and had its reasons to behave in such a manner with regard to Greece.

Its defign might be to foften their spirit by degrees, in disarming their hands; to blunt the edge of that valour, which spurred them on perpetually by noble emulation; to extinguish in them their passion for glory and victory; to render languid, by long inertion and forced ease, the activity natural to them; and, in fine, to bring them into the number of those people, whom a quiet and esseminate life enervates, and who lose in sloth and peace that martial ardour, which combats and even dangers are apt to inspire.

The king of Persia who then reigned, had a personal interest, as well as his predecessor, in imposing these terms upon the Greeks. Egypt had long thrown off the yoke, and given the empire just cause of inquietude. Ochus had resolved to go in person to reduce the rebels. He had the expedition extremely at heart, and neglected nothing that could promote its success. The famous retreat of the ten thousand, without ennmerating many other actions of a like nature, had left a great idea in Persia of the Grecian valour. That prince relied more upon a small body of Greeks in his pay, than upon the whole army of the Persians, as numerous as it was; and he well knew, that the intestine divisions of Greece would render the cities incapable of supplying the number of soldiers he had occasion for.

In fine, as a good politician, he could not enter upon action in Egypt, till he had pacified all behind him, Ionia especially, and its neighbouring provinces. Now, the most certain means to hold them in obedience, was to deprive them of all hope of aid from the Greeks, to whom they had always recourse in times of revolt, and without whom they were in no condition to form any great enterprises ".

When Ochus had taken all his measures, and made the necessary preparations, he repaired to the frontiers of Phoenicia, where he had an army of three hundred thousand foot, and thirty thousand horse, and put himself at the head of it. Mentor was at Sidon with the Grecian troops. The approach of so great an army staggered him, and he sent secretly to Ochus, to make him offers, not only of surrendering Sidon to him, but of serving him in Egypt, where he was well acquainted with the country, and might be very useful to him. Ochus agreed entirely to the proposal; upon which he engaged Tennes king of Sidon in the same treason; and they surrendered the place in concert to Ochus.

The Sidonians had fet fire to their ships upon the approach of the king's troops, in order to lay the people under the necessity of making a good desence, by removing all hope of any other security. When they saw themselves betrayed, that the enemy were masters of the city, and that there was no possibility of escaping either by sea or land, in the despair of their condition, they shut themselves up in their houses, and set them on sire. Forty thousand men, without reckoning women and children, perished in this manner. The sate of Tennes their king was no better. Ochus, seeing himself master of Sidon, and having no further occasion for him, caused him to be put to death; a just reward of his treason, and an evident proof, that Ochus did not yield to him in persidy. At the time this missortune happened, Sidon was immensely rich. The sire having melted the gold and silver, Ochus sold the cinders for a considerable sum of money.

W Diod. I. xvi, p. 441-443.

The dreadful ruin of this city cast so great a terror into the rest of Phoenicia, that it submitted, and obtained conditions reasonable enough from the king; Ochus made no great difficulty in complying with their demands, because he would not lose the time there, he had so much occasion for in the execution of his projects against Egypt.

Before he began his march to enter it, he was joined by a body of ten thousand Greeks. From the beginning of this expedition he had demanded troops in Greece. The Athenians and Lacedaemonians had excused themselves from furnishing him any at that time; it being impossible for them to do it, whatever desire they might have, as they said, to cultivate a good correspondence with the king. The Thebans sent him a thousand men under the command of Lachares. The Argives three thousand under Nicostratus. The rest came from the cities of Asia. All these troops joined him immediately after the taking of Sidon.

* The Jews must have had some share in this war of the Phoenicians against Persia; for Sidon was no sooner taken, than Ochus entered Judaea, and besieged the city of Jericho, which he took. Besides which, it appears that he carried a great number of Jewish captives into Egypt, and sent many others into Hyrcania, where he settled them along the coast of the Caspian sea.

7 Ochus also put an end to the war with Cyprus at the same time. That of Egypt so entirely engrossed his attention, that in order to have nothing to divert him from it, he was satisfied to come to an accommodation with the nine kings of Cyprus, who submitted to him upon certain conditions, and were all continued in their little states. Evagoras demanded to be reinstated in the kingdom of Salamin. It was evidently proved, that he had committed the most flagrant oppressions during his reign, and that he had not been unjuftly dethroned. Protagoras was therefore confirmed in the kingdom of Salamin, and the king gave Evagoras a remote government. He behaved no better in that, and was again expelled. He afterwards returned to Salamin, and was feized, and put to death. Surprifing difference between Nicocles and his fon Evagoras!

Solin. c. xxxv. Euseb. in Chron. &c. I Diod. l. xvi. p. 443.

<sup>2</sup> After the reduction of the ifle of Cyprus, and the province of Phoenicia, Ochus advanced at length towards Egypt.

Upon his arrival, he encamped before Pelufium, from whence he detached three bodies of his troops, each of them commanded by a Greek and a Persian with equal authority. The first was under Dachares the Theban, and Rofaces governor of Lydia and Ionia. The fecond was given to Nicostratus the Argive, and Aristazanes one of the great officers of the crown. The third had Mentor the Rhodian, and Bagoas one of Ochus's eunuchs, at the head of it. Each detachment had its particular orders. The king remained with the main body of the army in the camp he had made choice of at first, to wait events, and to be ready to support those troops in case of ill success, or to improve the advantages they might have.

Nectanebis had long expected this invasion, the preparations for which had made fo much noise. He had an hundred thoufand men on foot, twenty thousand of whom were Greeks, twenty thousand Lybians, and the rest of Egyptian troops. Part of them he bestowed in the places upon the frontiers, and posted himself with the rest in the passes, to dispute the enemy's entrance into Egypt. Ochus's first detachment was sent against Pelusium, where there was a garrison of five thousand Greeks. Lachares befieged the place. That under Nicostratus, on board of four-and-twenty ships of the Persian sleet, entered one of the mouths of the Nile at the same time, and sailed into the heart of Egypt, where they landed, and fortified themselves well in a camp, of which the fituation was very advantageous. All the Egyptian troops in these parts were immediately drawn Volume IV. E Diod. l. xvi. p. 444, et 450. together under Clinias, a Greek of the isle of Cos, and prepared to repel the enemy. A very warm action ensued, in which Clinias with five thousand of his troops were killed, and the rest entirely broke and dispersed.

This action decided the fuccess of the war. Nectanebis, apprehending that Nicostratus after this victory would embark again upon the Nile, and take Memphis the capital of the kingdom, made all the hafte he could to defend it, and abandoned the passes, which it was of the last importance to secure, to prevent the entrance of the enemy. When the Greeks that defended Pelusium, were apprised of this precipitate retreat, they believed all lost, and capitulated with Lachares, upon condition of being sent back into Greece with all that belonged to them, and without suffering any injury in their persons or effects.

Mentor, who commanded the third detachment, finding the passes clear and unguarded, entered the country, and made himself master of it without any opposition. For, after having caused a report to be spread throughout his camp, that Ochus had ordered all those who would submit, to be treated with favour, and that such as made resistance should be destroyed, as the Sidonians had been; he let all his prisoners escape, that they might carry the news into the country round about. Those poor people reported in their towns and villages what they had heard in the enemy's camp. The brutality of Ochus seemed to confirm it; and the terror was so great, that the garrisons, as well Greeks as Egyptians, strove which should be the foremost in making their submission.

<sup>a</sup> Nectanebis, having lost all hope of being able to defend himself, escaped with his treasures and best effects into Æthiopia, from whence he never returned. He was the last king of Egypt of the Egyptian race, fince whom it has always continued under a foreign yoke, according to the prediction of Ezekiel<sup>b</sup>.

Ochus, having entirely conquered Egypt in this manner, diffmantled the cities, pillaged the temples, and returned in triumph to Babylon, laden with spoils, and especially with gold and filver, of which he carried away immense fums. He left the government of it to Pherendates, a Persian of the first quality.

&lt;sup>2</sup> A. M. 3654. Ant. J. C. 350. b Ezek. xxix. 14, 15.

c Here Manethon finishes his commentaries, or history of Egypt. He was a priest of Heliopolis in that country, and had written the history of its different dynasties from the commencement of the nation to the times we now treat of. His book is often cited by Josephus, Eusebius, Plutarch, Porphry, and several others. This historian lived in the reign of Ptokmaeus Philadelphus king of Egypt, to whom he dedicates his work, of which * Syncellus has preserved us the abridgement.

Nectanebis lost the crown by his too good opinion of himfelf. He had been placed upon the throne by Agesilaus, and afterwards supported in it by the valour and c unsels of Diophantes the Athenian, and Lamius the Lacedaemonian, who, whilst they had the command of his troops, and the direction of the war, had rendered his arms victorious over the Persians in all the enterprises they had formed against him. It is a pity we have no account of them, and that Diodorus is silent upon this head. That prince, vain from so many successes, imagined, in consequence, that he was become sufficiently capable of conducting his own affairs in person, and dismissed them to whom he was indebted for all those advantages. He had time enough to repent his error, and to discover that the power does not confer the merit of a king.

d Ochus rewarded very liberally the fervice which Mentor the Rhodian had rendered him in the reduction of Phoenicia, and the conquest of Egypt. Before he left that kingdom, he dismissed the other Greeks laden with his presents. As for Mentor, to whom the whole success of the expedition was principally owing, he not only made him a present of an hundred † talents in money, besides many jewels of great value, but gave him the government of all the coast of Asia, with the e Syncel. p. 265. Voff, de hift. Graec. I, i. c. 14.

Ggij

d A. M. 3655. Ant. J. C. 349.

* Gearge, a monk of Constantinople, so called from his being Syncellus, or vicar to the Patriarch Tarasus, towards the end of the ninth century.

† An hundred thousand crowns.

direction of the war against some provinces, which had revolted in the beginning of his reign, and declared him generalifsimo of all his armies on that side.

Mentor made use of his interest to reconcile the king with his brother Memnon, and Artabasus, who had married their fifter. Both of them had been in arms against Ochus. We have already related the revolt of Artabasus, and the victories he obtained over the king's troops. He was, however, overpowered at last, and reduced to take refuge with Philip king of Macedon; and Memnon, who had borne a part in his wars, had also a share in his banishment. After this reconciliation, they rendered Ochus and his fucceffors fignal fervices; efpecially Memnon, who was one of the most valiant men of his times, and no lefs excellent in the art of war. Neither did Mentor want his great merits, nor deceive the king in the confidence he had reposed in him. For he had scarce taken possession of his government, when he re-established every where the king's authority, and reduced those who had revolted in his neighbourhood to return to their obedience; fome he brought over by his address and stratagems, and others by force of arms. In a word, he knew so well how to take his advantages, that at length he subjected them all to the yoke, and reinstated the king's affairs in those provinces.

In the first year of the 108th Olympiad, died Plato, the famous Athenian philosopher. I shall defer speaking of him at present, that I may not interrupt the chain of the history.

SECTION V.

DEATH of OCHUS. ARSES succeeds bim.

Ochus f, after the conquest of Egypt, and reduction of the revolted provinces of his empire, abandoned himself to pleature and luxurious ease during the rest of his life, and left the care of affairs entirely to his ministers. The two principal of them were the eunuch Bagoas, and Mentor the Rhodian, who divided all power between them; so that the first had all the provinces of the Upper, and the latter, all those of the Lower Asia under him.

8 After having reigned twenty-three years, Ochus died of poison given him by Bagoas. That eunuch, who was by birth an Egyptian, had always retained a love for his country, and a zeal for its religion. When his master conquered it, he flattered himself, that it would have been in his power to have softened the destiny of the one, and protected the other from insult. But he could not restrain the brutality of his prince, who acted a thousand things in regard to both, which the eunuch saw with extreme forrow, and always violently resented in his heart.

Ochus, not contented with having difmantled the cities, and pillaged the houses and temples, as has been said, had besides taken away all the archives of the kingdom, which were dcposited and kept with religious care in the temples of the Egyptians; and in a derision of their worship, he had caused the god Apis to be killed, that is, the facred bull which they adored under that name. What gave occasion for this last action was, I that Ochus being as lazy and heavy as he was cruel, the Egyptians, from the first of those qualities, had given him the shocking surname of the stupid animal they found he refembled. Violently enraged at this affront, Ochus faid that he would make them fensible that he was not an afs but a lion; and that the ass, whom they despised so much, should eat their ox. Accordingly he ordered Apis to be dragged out of his temple, and facrificed to an afs. After which he made his cooks dress, and serve him up to the officers of his household. This piece of wit incenfed Bagoas. As for the archives, he redeemed them afterwards, and fent them back to the places where it was the custom to keep them: But the affront which had been done to his religion, was irreparable; and it is believed, that was the real occasion of his master's death.

k His revenge did not stop there: He caused another body to be interred instead of the king's; and to avenge his having made the officers of the house eat the god Apis, he made cats eat his dead body, which he gave them cut in small pieces; and for his bones, those he turned into handles for knives and swords, the natural symbols of his cruelty. It is very probable, that some new cause had awakened in the heart of this monster his ancient resentment; without which it is not to be conceived, that he could carry his barbarity so far in regard to his master and benefactor.

g A. M. 3666. Ant. J. C. 338. i Plut. de Ifid. et Ofir. p. 363. Ggiij
h Ælian. l. iv. c. 8.

After the death of Ochus, Bagoas, in whose hands all power was at that time, placed Arses upon the throne, the youngest of all the late king's sons, and put the rest to death, in order to possess, with better security, and without a rival, the authority he had usurped. He gave Arses only the name of king, whilst he reserved to himself the whole power of the sovereignty. But perceiving that the young prince began to discover his wickedness, and took measures to punish it; he prevented him, by having him assassinated, and destroyed his whole family with him.

Bagoas, after having rendered the throne vacant by the murder of Arses, placed Darius upon it, the third of that name, who reigned in Persia. His true name was Codomanus, of whom much will be said hereafter.

We see here in a full light the sad effect of the ill policy of the kings of Persia, who, to ease themselves of the weight of public business, abandoned their whole authority to an eunuch. Bagoas might have more address and understanding than the rest, and thereby merit some distinction. It is the duty of a wise prince to distinguish merit; but it is as consistent for him to continue always the entire master, judge, and arbiter of his affairs. A prince, like Ochus, who had made the greatest crimes his steps for ascending the throne, and who had supported himself in it by the same measures, deserved to have such a minister as Bagoas, who vied with his master in persidy and cruelty. Ochus experienced their first effects. Had he desired to have nothing to sear from him, he should not have been so imprudent as to render him formidable, by giving him an unlimited power.

SECTION VI.

ABRIDGEMENT of the LIFE of DEMOSTHENES.

As Demostenes will have a great part in the history of Philip and Alexander, which will be the subject of the ensuing volume, it is necessary to give the reader some previous idea of him, and to let him know by what means he cultivated, and to what a degree of persection he carried his talent of eloquence; which made him more awful to Philip and Alexander, and enabled him to render greater services to his country, than the highest military virtue could have done.

1 That orator, born * two years before Philip, and two hundred and fourscore before Cicero, was not the son of a dirty fmoky blackfmith, as + Juvenal would feem to intimate, but of a man moderately rich, who got confiderably by forges. Not that the birth of Demostenes could derogate in the least from his reputation, whose works are an higher title of nobility than the most splendid the world affords. m Demosthenes tells us himself, that his father employed thirty flaves at his forges, each of them valued at three minae, or fifty crowns; two excepted, who were without doubt the most expert in the business, and directed the work; and those were each of them worth an hundred crowns. It is well known that part of the wealth of the ancients confifted in flaves. Those forges, all charges paid, cleared annually thirty minae, that is, fifteen hundred crowns. To this first manufactory, appropriated to the forging of fwords and fuch kind of arms, he added another, wherein beds and tables of fine wood and ivory were made, which brought him in yearly twelve minae. In this only twenty flaves were employed, each of them valued at two minae, or an hundred livres ".

Gg iiij

Iuv. 1. iv. fat. 10.

i A. M. 3623. Ant. J. C. 381. Plut. in Demost. p. 847—849.

m In Orat. i. cost. Aphob. p. 896.

n About 4l. 10s.

* The fourth year of the ninty-ninth Olympiad.

† Quem pater ardentis massae fuligine lippus, A carbone et forcipibus, gladiosque parante Incude, et luteo Vulcano ad rhetora missi.

Demosthenes's father died possessed of an estate of sourteen talents *. He had the missortune to fall into the hands of fordid and avaricious guardians, who had no views but of making the most out of his fortune. They carried that base spirit so far as to resuse their pupil's masters the reward due to them; So that he was not educated with the care which so excellent a genius as his required; besides which, the weakness of his constitution, and the delicacy of his health, with the excessive fondness of a mother that doted upon him, prevented his masters from obliging him to apply much to his studies.

The school of socrates †, in which so many great men had been educated, was at that time the most famous at Athens. But whether the avarice of Demosthenes's guardians prevented him from improving under a master, whose price was very high ‡, or that the fost and peaceful eloquence of Isocrates was not to his taste, at that time he studied under Isaeus, whose character was strength and vehemence. He sound means however to get the principles of rhetoric taught by the former: But || Plato in reality contributed the most in forming Demosthenes; he read his works with great application, and received lessons from him also; and it is easy to distinguish in the writings of the disciple, the noble and sublime air of the master.

<sup>q</sup> But he foon quitted the school of Isaeus and Plato for another, under a different kind of direction; I mean, to frequent the bar; of which this was the occasion. The orator Callistratus was appointed to plead the cause of the city Oropus, situated between Boeotia and Attica. Chabrias, having disposed the Athenians to march to the aid of the Thebans, who were in great distress, they hastened thither, and delivered them from the enemy. The Thebans forgetting so great a service

q Aul. Gel. l. iii. c. 13.

· Fourteen hundred crowns.

† Isocrates-cujus e ludo, tanquam ex equo Trojano, innumeri principes exierunt. De orat. n. 94.

‡ About L. 22 : 10 s.

| Lectitavisse Platonem studiose audivisse etiam, Demosthenes dieltur; idque apparet ex genere et granditate sermonis. Cic, in Brut. n. 121.

Illud jusjurandum, per caesos in Marathone ac Salamine propugnatores reipfatis manifesto docet, pracceptorem ejus Platonem suisse. Quint, l. xii. c. 10. took the town of Oropus, which was upon their frontier, from the Athenians. r Chabrias was suspected, and charged with treason upon this occasion. Callistratus was chosen to plead against him. The reputation of the orator, and the importance of the cause, excited curiofity, and made a great noise in the city. 5 Demosthenes, who was then fixteen years of age, earnestly entreated his masters to carry him with them to the bar, that he might be present at so famous a trial. The orator was heard with great attention; and having had extraordinary fuccess, was attended home by a crowd of illustrious citizens, who feemed to vie with each other in praifing and admiring him. The young man was extremely affected with the honours. which he faw paid to the orator, and still more with the fupreme power of eloquence on the minds of men, over which it exercises a kind of absolute power. He was himself sensible of its effects; and not being able to refift its charms, he gave himself wholly up to it; from henceforth renounced all other studies and pleasures; and during the continuance of Callistratus at Athens, he never quitted him, but made all the improvement he could from his precepts.

The first essay of his eloquence was against his guardians, whom he obliged to refund a part of his fortune. Encouraged by this success, he ventured to speak before the people, but with very ill success. He had a weak voice, a thick way of speaking, and a very short breath; notwithstanding which, his periods were so long, that he was often obliged to stop in the midst of them for respiration. This occasioned his being histed by the whole audience; from whence he retired entirely discouraged, and determined to renounce for ever a function of which he believed himself incapable. One of his auditors, who had observed an excellent fund of genius in him, and a kind of eloquence which came very near that of Pericles, gave him new spirit from the grateful idea of so glorious a resemblance, and the good advice which he added to it.

He ventured therefore to appear a fecond time before the people, and was no better received than before. As he withdrew, hanging down his head, and in the utmost confusion, Satyrus, one of the most excellent actors of those times, who was his friend, met him, and having learned from him the cause of his being so much dejected, he assured him that the evil was not without remedy, and that the case was not so desperate as he imagined. He desired him only to repeat some of Sophocles or Euripides's verses to him, which he accordingly did. Satyrus spoke them after him, and gave them such graces by the tone, gesture, and spirit, with which he pronounced them, that Demosthenes himself sound them quite different from what they were in his own manner of speaking. He perceived plainly what he wanted, and applied himself to the acquiring of it.

r Demost. in Midi. p. 613. s A. M. 3639. Ant. J. C. 365.

His efforts to correct his natural defect of utterance, and to pefect himself in pronunciation, of which his friend had made him understand the value, feemed almost incredible, and prove, that an industrious perfeverance can furmount all things 5 He stammered to fuch a degree, that he could not pronounce fome letters, amongst others, that with which the name of the art the studied begins; and he was so short-breathed, that he could not utter a whole period without stopping. He overcame these obstacles at length, by putting small pebbles into his mouth, and pronouncing feveral verses in that manner without interruption; and that walking, and going up fleep and difficult places; fo that at last so letter made him hesitate, and his breath held out through the longest periods. " He went also to the sca-fide; and whilst the waves were in the most violent agitation, he pronounced harrangues, to accustom himself, by the confused noise of the waters, to the roar of the people, and the tumultpous cries of the public affemblies.

Demosthenes took no less care of his action than of his voice. He had a large looking glass in his house, which served to teach him gesture, and at which he used to declaim, before he spoke in public. To correct a fault, which he had contracted by an ill habit of continually shrugging his shoulders, * Cic. 1. i. de orat. n. 260, 261.

! Rhetoric.

m Quintil. I. x. c. 3.

* Ibid. 1. xi. c. 3.

he practifed standing upright in a kind of very narrow pulpit or rostrum, over which hung a halbert in such a manner, that if in the heat of action that motion escaped him, the point of the weapon might serve at the same time to admonish and correct him.

His pains were well bestowed; for it was by this means, that he carried the art of declaiming to the highest degree of perfection of which it was capable; whence it is plain he well knew its value and importance. When he was asked three feveral times, which quality he thought most necessary in an orator, he gave no other answer than Pronunciation; infinuating, by making that reply * three times fuccessively, that qualification to be the only one of which the want could be least concealed, and which was the most capable of concealing other defects; and that pronunciation alone could give confiderable weight even to an indifferent orator, when without it, the most excellent could not hope the least success. He must have had a very high opinion of it, as to attain a perfection in it, and for the instruction of Neoptolemus, the most excellent comedian then in being, he devoted fo confiderable a fum as ten thousand drachms +, though he was not very rich.

His application to study was no less surprising. To be the more removed from noise, and less subject to distraction, he caused a small chamber to be made for him under ground, in which he sometimes shut himself up for whole months, shaving on purpose half his head and face, that he might not be in a condition to go abroad. It was there, by the light of a small lamp, he composed the admirable orations, which were faid by those who envied him to smell of the oil; to imply that they were too elaborate. "It is plain," replied he, "yours "did not cost you so much trouble." ‡ He rose very early in the morning, and used to say, that he was forry when any workman was at his business before him. <sup>2</sup> We may judge of his extraordinary efforts to acquire an excellence of every kind, from the pains he took in copying Thucydides's history eight times with his own hand, in order to render the style of that great man familiar to him.

Actio in dicendo una dominatur. Sine hac fummus orator esse in numero nullo potest: mediocris hac instructus summos saepe superare. Huic primas dedisse Demosshenes dicitur, cum rogaretur quid in dicendo esset primum; huic secundas, huic tertias. Cie, de orat. i, iii. n. 213.

† About 240 l. Sterling.

† Cui mon sunt auditae Demosthenis vigiliae ? qui dolere se aiebat, si quando orificum antelucana victus esset industria. Tuse, quaest l. iv. n. 44.

Demosthenes, after having exercised his talent of eloquence in several private causes, made his appearance in full light, and mounted the tribunal of harangues, to treat there upon public assairs; with what success we shall see hereafter. Cicero * tells us that success was so great, that all Greece came in crowds to Athens to hear Demosthenes speak; and he adds that merit, so great as his, could not but have had that effect. I do not examine in this place into the character of his eloquence; I have enlarged sufficiently upon that elsewhere *; I only consider its wonderful effects.

If we believe Philip upon this head, of which he is certainly an evidence of unquestionable authority b, the eloquence of Demosthenes alone did him more hurt than all the armies and fleets of the Athenians. His harangues, he faid, were like machines of war, and batteries raifed at a distance against him; by which he overthrew all his projects, and ruined his enterprifes, without its being possible to prevent their effect. "For " I myfelf," fays Philip of him, " had I been prefent, and " heard that vehement orator declaim, should have concluded 44 the first, that it was indispensably necessary to declare war ee against me." No city seemed impregnable to that prince, provided he could introduce a mule laden with gold into it: But he confessed, that to his forrow, Demosthenes was invincible in that respect, and that he always found him inaccessible to his prefents. After the battle of Chaeronea, Philip, though victor, was struck with extreme dread at the prospect of the great danger to which that orator, by the powerful league he had been the fole cause of forming against him, exposed himself and his kingdom.

Lucian. Advers. Indoct. p. 639. 2 Art of studying the Belles Lettres, Vol. II, Lucian. in Encom. Demost. p. 940, 941.

Ne illud quidem intelligant, non modo ita memoriae proditum esse, sed ita necesse fuisse, cum Demosshenes disturus esset, ut concursus, audiendi causa, ex tota Graecia sierent. In Brut. n. 239.

c Antipater spoke to the same effect of him. "I value not," faid he, " the Piraeus, the gallies and armies of the Athe-" nians: For what have we to fear from a people continually " employed in games, feafts, and Bacchanals? Demosthenes " alone gives me pain. Without him the Athenians differ in " nothing from the meanest people of Greece. He alone ex-" cites and animates them. It is he that rouses them from " their lethargy and stupefaction, and puts their arms and oars " into their hands almost against their will : Incessantly repre-" feuting to them the famous battles of Marathon and Sala-" min; he transforms them into new men by the ardour of his " discourses, and inspires them with incredible valour and for-" titude. Nothing escapes his penetrating eyes, nor his con-" fummate prudence. He foresees all our defigns; he coun-" termines all our projects; and disconcerts us in every thing: " and did Athens entirely confide in him, and wholly follow " his advice, we were undone without remedy. Nothing can " tempt him, nor diminish his love for his country. All the " gold of Philip finds no more access to him, than that of " Perfia did formerly to Ariftides."

He was reduced by necessity to give this glorious testimony for himself in his just defence against Æschines, his accuser and declared enemy. "Whilft all the orators have fuffered " themselves to be corrupted by the presents of Philip and " Alexander, it is well known," fays he, " that neither deli-" cate conjunctures, engaging expressions, magnificent pro-" mises, hope, fear, favour, any thing in the world, have ever " been able to induce me to give up the least right or interest " of my country." He adds, that instead of acting like those mercenary persons, who, in all they proposed, declared for such as paid them best, like scales, that always incline to the side from whence they receive most; he, in all the counsels he had given, had folely in view the interest and glory of his country, and that he had always continued inflexible and incorruptible to the Macedonian gold. The fequel will shew how well he supported that character to the end.

c Lucian, in Encom. Demost. p. 934-936.

Such was the orator who is about to ascend the tribunal of harangues, or rather the statesman, to enter upon the administration of the public affairs, and to be the principle and soul of all the great enterprises of Athens against Philip of Macedon.

SECTION VII.

DIGRESSION on the MANNER of fitting out FLEETS by the

THE subject of this digression ought properly to have had place in the fourth section of the tenth book, where I have treated of the government and maritime affairs of the Athenians. But at that time, I had not the orations of Demosthenes which speak of them in my thoughts. It is a deviation from the chain of the history which the reader may easily turn over, if he thinks sit.

The word Trierarchs * fignifies no more in itself than Commanders of galleys. But those cities were also called Trierarchs, who were appointed to fit out the galleys in time of war, and to furnish them with all things necessary, or at least with part of them.

They were chosen out of the richest of the people, and there was no fixed number of them. Sometimes two, sometimes three, and even ten trierarchs were appointed to equip one vessel.

d At length the number of trierarchs was established at twelve hundred, in this manner. Athens was divided into ten tribes. An hundred and twenty of the richest citizens of each tribe were nominated to furnish the expences of these armaments; and thus each tribe furnishing six score, the number of the trierarchs amounted to twelve hundred.

Those twelve hundred men were again divided into two parts, of fix hundred each; and those fix hundred subdivided into two more, each of three hundred. The first three hundred were chosen from amongst such as were richest. Upon pressing occasions they advanced the necessary expences, and were reimburfed by the other three hundred, who paid their proportion, as the flate of their affairs would admit.

· Tomeatxos.

A law was afterwards made, whereby those twelve hundred were divided into different companies, each confishing of fixteen men, who joined in the equipment of a galley. That law was very heavy upon the poorer citizens, and equally unjust at bottom; as it decreed that this number of fixteen should be chosen by their age, and not their estates. It ordained that all citizens from twenty-five to forty, should be included in one of these companies, and contribute one fixteenth; so that by this law the poorer citizens were to contribute as much as the most opulent, and often found it impossible to supply an expence so much above their power. From whence it happened, that the sleet was either not armed in time, or very ill sitted out; by which means Athens lost the most favourable opportunities for action.

f Demosthenes, always intent upon the public good, to remedy those inconveniencies, proposed the abrogation of this law by another. By the latter, the trierarchs were to be chosen, not by the number of their years, but by the value of their fortunes. Each citizen, whose estate amounted to ten talents *, was obliged to sit out one galley; and if to twenty talents, two; and so in proportion. Such as were not worth ten talents, were to join with as many others as were necessary to complete that sum, and to sit out a galley.

Nothing could be wifer than this law of Demosthenes, which reformed all the abuses of the other. By these means the sleet was sitted out in time, and provided with all things necessary; the poor were considerably relieved; and none but the rich displeased with it: For, instead of contributing only a sixteenth, as by the first law, they were sometimes obliged by the second to equip a galley, and sometimes two or more, according to the amount of their estates.

The rich were in consequence very much offended at Demosthenes upon this regulation; and it was, without doubt, an instance of no small courage in him to disregard their complaints, and to hazard the making himself as many enemies, as there were powerful citizens in Athens. Let us hear himfelf. " 5 Seeing," fays he, speaking to the Athenians, " your " maritime affairs are in the greatest decline, the rich possessed of an immunity purchased at a very low rate, the citizens " of middle or small fortunes eat up with taxes, and the re-" public itself, in consequence of these inconveniencies, never " attempting any thing till too late for its fervice; I had the " courage to establish a law, whereby the rich are restrained " to their duty, the poor relieved from oppression, and, what " was of the highest importance, the republic enabled to make " the necessary preparations of war in due time." He adds, that there was nothing the rich would not have given him to forbear the proposing of this law, or at least to have suspended its execution: But he did not suffer himself to be swaved either by their threats or promifes, and continued firm to the public good.

f Demost. in orat. de Classib.

&quot; Ten thousand crowns,

Not having been able to make him change his refolution, they contrived a firatagem to render it ineffectual: For it was without doubt at their infligation, that a certain person, named Patroclus, cited Demosthenes before the judges, and prosecuted him juridically as an infringer of the laws of his country. The accuser having only the fifth part of the voices on his side; was according to custom fined five hundred drachms *, and Demosthenes acquitted of the charge; who relates this circumstance himself.

It is doubtful, whether at Rome, especially in the latter times, the affair would have taken this turn: For we see, that whatever attempts were made by the tribunes of the people, and to whatever extremity the quarrel arose, it never was possible to induce the rich, who were far more powerful and enterprising than those of Athens, to renounce the possession of the lands, which they had usurped in manifest contravention of the institutions of the state. The law of Demosthenes was approved and confirmed by the senate and people.

<sup>8</sup> Demost. pro. Ctelip. p. 419.

* About L. 12:5 %.

We find, from what has been faid, that the trierarchs fitted out the gallies and their equipage at their own expence. The flate paid the mariners and foldiers, generally at the rate of three oboli, or five pence a-day, as has been observed elsewhere. The officers had greater pay.

The trierarchs commanded the vessel, and gave all orders on board. When there were two of them to a ship, each commanded fix months.

When they quitted their office, they were obliged to give an account of their administration, and delivered a state of the vessel's equipage to their successor, or the republic. The successor was obliged to go immediately and fill up the vacant place; and if he sailed to be at his post by a time assigned him, he was fined for his neglect.

As the charge of trierarch was very expensive, those who were nominated to it, were admitted to point out some other person richer than themselves, and to demand that they should be put into their place; provided they were ready to change estates with such person, and to act in the function of trierarch after such exchange. This law was instituted by Solon, and was called the Law and Exchanges:

Befides the equipment of gallies, which must have amounted to very great sums, the rich had another charge to support in the time of war; that was the extraordinary taxes and imposts laid on their estates; upon which, sometimes the hundredth, sometimes a sistieth, and even a twelfth were levied, according to the different occasions of the state.

h Nobody at Athens, upon any pretence whatfoever, could be exempted from these two charges, except the Novemviri, or nine Archontes, who were not obliged to fit out gallies. So that we see, without ships or money, the republic was not in a condition, either to support wars, or defend itself.

There were other immunities and exemptions, which were granted to fuch as had rendered great fervices to the republic, and fometimes even to all their defcendants: As maintaining public places of exercise with all things necessary for fuch as frequented them; inflituting a public feast for one of the ten tribes; and defraying the expences of games and shows; all which amounted to great fums.

Volume IV. H

These immunities, as has already been said, were marks of honour and rewards of services rendered the state; as well as statues which were erected to great men, the freedom of the city, and the privilege of being maintained in the Prytaneum at the public expence. The view of Athens in these honourable distinctions was to express their high sense of gratitude, and to kindle at the same time in the hearts of their citizens a noble thirst of glory, and an ardent love for their country.

Befides the statues erected to Harmodius and Aristogiton, the deliverers of Athens, their descendants were for ever exempted from all public employments, and enjoyed that honourable privilege many ages after.

i As Aristides died without any estate, and left his son Lysimachus no other patrimony but his glory and poverty, the republic gave him an hundred acres of wood, and as much arable land in Euboea, besides an hundred minae * at one payment, and sour drachms, or forty pence a-day.

Athens, in these services which were done it, regarded more the good-will than the action itself. A certain person of Cyrene, named Epicerdus, being at Syracuse when the Athenians were deseated, touched with compassion for the unfortunate prisoners dispersed in Sicily, whom he saw ready to expire for want of food, distributed an hundred minae amongst them, that is, about two hundred and forty pounds. Athens adopted him into the number of its citizens, and granted him all the immunities before mentioned. Some time after, in the war against the thirty tyrants, the same Epicerdus gave the city a talent †. These were but small matters on either occasion with regard to the grandeur and power of Athens; but they were infinitely affected with the good heart of a stranger, who without any view of interest, in a time of public calamity, exhausted himself in some measure for the relief of those, with whom he had no affinity, and from whom he had nothing to expect.

Demost. in Orat. ad Lep. p. 558.

* L. 22: 10s. Sterling.

† A thousand crowns.

The fame freedom of the city of Athens, granted an exemption from customs to Leucon, who reigned in the Bosphorus, and his children, because they yearly imported from the lands of that prince a considerable quantity of corn, of which they were in extreme want, substituting almost entirely upon what came from other parts. Leucon, in his turn, not to be outdone in generosity, exempted the Athenian merchants from the duty of a thirtieth upon all grain exported from his dominions, and granted them the privilege of supplying themselves with corn in his country in preference to all other people. That exemption amounted to a considerable sum. For they brought only from thence two millions of quarters of corn, of which the thirtieth part amounted to almost seventy thousand.

The children of Conon and Chabrias, were also granted an immunity from public offices. The names only of those illustrious generals sufficiently justify that liberality of the Athenian people. A person, however, called Leptinus, out of a mistaken zeal for the public good, proposed the abrogation by a new law of all the grants of that kind, which had been made from immemorial time; except those which regarded the posterity of Harmodius and Aristogiton; and to enact, that for the future, the people should not be capable of granting such privileges.

Demosthenes strongly opposed this law, though with great complacency to the person who proposed it; praising his good intentions, and not speaking of him but with esteem; a much more efficacious manner of resuting, than those violent invectives, and that eager and passionate stile, which serve only to alienate the people, and to render an orator suspected, who decries his cause himself, and shews its weak side, by substituting injurious terms for reasons, which are alone capable of convincing.

After having shewn, that so odious a reduction would prove of little or no advantage to the republic, from the inconsiderable number of the exempted persons; he goes on to explain its conveniencies, and set them in a full light.

Hhij

<sup>1</sup> Demost in Orat. ad Lept. p. 545, 546.

"It is first," fays he, "doing injury to the memory of those great men, whose merit the state intended to acknowledge, and reward by such immunities; it is in some manner calling in question the services they have done their county; it is throwing a suspicion upon their great actions, injurious to, if not destructive of, their glory. And were they now alive, and present in this assembly, which of us all would presume to offer them such an affront? Should not the results of the second sec

" But if we are little affected with what concerns them, " can we be infentible to our own interest? Besides that can-" celling fo ancient a law, is to condemn the conduct of our " ancestors; what shame shall we bring upon ourselves, and " what an injury shall we do our reputation? The glory of "Athens, and of every well-governed state, is to value itself " upon its gratitude, to keep its word religiously, and to be " true to all its engagements. A private person who fails in " these respects, is hated and abhorred; and who is not afraid " of being reproached with ingratitude? And shall the com-" monwealth, in cancelling a law that has received the fanc-" tion of public authority, and been in a manner confecrated "by the usage of many ages, be guilty of so notorious a pre-" varication? We prohibit lying in the very markets, under " heavy penalties, and require truth and faith to be observed " in them; and shall we renounce them ourselves by the re-" vocation of grants, passed in all their forms, and upon " which every private man has a right to infift.

"To act in fuch a manner, would be to extinguish in the hearts of our citizens all emulation for glory, all defire to distinguish themselves by great exploits, all zeal for the homour and welfare of their country; which are the great fources and principles of almost all the actions of life. And it is to no purpose to object the example of Sparta and Thebes, which grant no such exemptions: Do we repent

" our not refembling them in many things? And is there any wisdom in proposing their defects, and not their virtues for our imitation?"

Demosthenes concludes with demanding the law of exemptions to be retained in all its extent; with this exception, that all persons should be deprived of the benefits of it, but those who had a just title to them; and that a strict inquiry should be made for that purpose.

It is plain that I have only made a very flight extract in this place of an exceeding long discourse, and that I designed to express only the spirit and sense, without confining myself to the method and expressions of it.

There was a meanness of spirit in Leptinus's desiring to obtain a trivial advantage for the republic, by retrenching the moderate expenses that were an honour to it, and no charge to himself; whilst there were other abuses of far greater importance to reform.

Such marks of public gratitude perpetuated in a family, perpetuate also in a state an ardent zeal for its happiness, and a warm desire to distinguish that passion by glorious actions. It is not without pain I find amongst ourselves, that part of the privileges granted to the family of the Maid of Orleans, have been retrenched. Charles VII. had ennobled her, her father, three brothers, and all their descendants, even by the female line. In 1614, at the request of the attorney-general, the article of nobility by the women was retrenched.

m Mezerai.

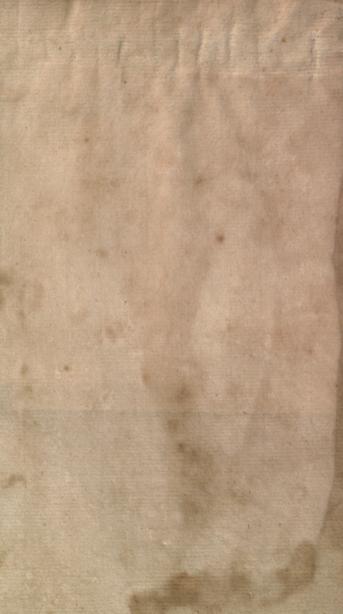

A CONTRACTOR OF THE PARTY OF TH the parties of the parties of the second of the second of and country of the company of the control of the co The state of the s and profession in the profession of the party of the same The set of the American Control of the Control of t Licent to in form your Min The Control of the State of th THE RESIDENCE WAS A PROPERTY OF THE PARTY OF All and the state of the property of the second conflict of the second all of mind, he said out a fill the lay and the a constitution of the animal structure for the restrict, in recognitive sales entitle a line of or element he early mit termen by the black eschantenty and he whole there were seen with the that a at the true congress they attitude to sent a second host drawinged at our free trains as and, and the grantered a said a said of the said all to still a said and a said a said and a mount and her heart man fait to deep the contact and estiblishing a standard and a support of the THE PARTY OF THE P a training the confidence and the training of the confidence and the the Langue will the San and the capable of the san

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY Los Angeles

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

TEOD CO-DIR

OCT 08 1987

Form L9-32m-8,'58(5876s4)444

