ALBRECHT DÜRER

SECOND son of Albrecht Dürer, goldsmith (d. 1502), and Barbara Holper; born at Nuremberg, May 21, 1471; pupil of his father and of the painter Michel Wolgemut, 1486-1489; travelled 1490-1494, visiting Colmar, Basle, and probably Strasburg; returned to Nuremberg in May, and married Agnes Frey, July 1494; visited Venice, probably towards the end of the same year, being at home again in 1495; paid a second visit to Venice 1505-1507; except for a journey to the Netherlands, 1520-1521, remained at Nuremberg for the rest of his life; died April 6, 1528.

LIKE most of his predecessors in engraving, Dürer was brought up as a goldsmith, and it was this tradition which did most in directing the channel and shaping the character of his art. He turned to painting quite early, and Germany has produced no greater painter, but it is as an engraver and designer for woodcut that he holds the really unique place in art. His contemporary, Hans Holbein the younger, was unquestionably the greater painter, but Holbein's work for engraving (the Old Testament Illustrations and the Dance of Death, which will be completely illustrated in another volume of this series) cannot, in spite of its unique style and charm, compare with Dürer's for greatness of design and conception.

As an engraver, Dürer worked directly on the copper, but in the case of his woodcut, it is fairly certain that he was only responsible for the drawing of the design on the block. The block-cutters in Dürer's day were of a different class to the engraver and goldsmith, and their work was so much a mere matter of faithful translation of the lines, that the mechanical factor of cutting on the wood is of very secondary importance. In fact, with woodcut in which there is any complexity of design, I feel that the artist would sacrifice spontaneity if he is submitted to the drudgery of clearing away the negative parts of the design. Treated as pure design, Dürer's woodcuts form the noblest part of his whole work. There is a large simplicity in the line (seen at its best in later work such as the Last Supper, LXIV), which one sometimes lacks in the elaboration of the line-engraving. But even in his most elaborately finished plates, Dürer never let the quality of line be lost in the attempt to render mere tonal values. This tendency to submerge the natural quality of the engraved line in the general tone accounts for many of the supreme pieces of bravoure of the century that followed Dürer, but sounds at the same time an ill-omened note to the truly artistic limits and conventions of line-engraving. If Dürer comes near the border-line, it is in some of the plates of his middle period (e.g. the Virgin seated by a Town Wall, Pl. xxvii), where the rendering of surface texture is carried so far; and if he ever elaborates too much and overloads with detail, it is in such pieces as the St. Jerome in his Study (xxiv) of the same period. But in his latest work in engraving, as in woodcut, he comes back to a simplicity of treatment that makes a print like the St. Christopher (xxxii) so absolute a masterpiece and so perfect a model of what line-engraving technically should be.

The less experienced amateur may be helped to a clearer appreciation of Dürer's place in art, if we take this opportunity of interpolating a short survey of the development of engraving, and some description of the various processes.

There is no evidence to show that impressions were ever taken on paper from cut or engraved blocks or plates before the late fourteenth century, and very little probability of any general practice of engraving for the sake of taking prints before the fifteenth. Wood-blocks were cut and used for impressing patterns on textiles at an earlier period, and it is the craft of these pattern-block cutters that was the cradle of the art of woodcut.

In woodcut the printing is from the surface, and little pressure is needed to transfer the ink; in fact, in the earlier stages of the art, hand pressure directly applied to the back of the block laid face downwards on the paper, or the method of rubbing the back of the paper laid on the face of the block with a flat piece of wood, or leather ball, sufficed to give a clear enough result. The process of cutting necessitates the removal by the knife of the white parts of the design, leaving the lines standing in relief, a process more or less laborious according to the amount of close work or crossing of lines (cross-hatching). It is only at a later period when greater use was made of a white line on a black ground that the graver (or burin), the original tool of the line-engraver, was also used to any extent on wood.

In line-engraving, on the other hand, the lines to print black are the furrows ploughed up by pushing the graver before the hand through the surface of the copper. The graver is a short steel rod of square or lozenge section, with cutting-point and edges obtained by sharpening the head in an oblique section. The furrows are filled with ink, the surface of the plate wiped clean, and damp paper forced into the lines by great pressure (obtained by a double roller-press) to pull out the ink. In the surface printing from a woodcut there is naturally little depth of ink on the impression ; it is like a pen drawing with an added regularity of tone. But the impressions from an engraved plate show the ink in more or less high relief according to the depth of the line from which the ink was pulled, a remark which applies to all the other intaglio processes, such as etching and dry-point. Printing from intaglio plates with its less immediately evident process was not introduced until considerably later than the printing of woodcuts, probably not until the second quarter of the fifteenth century. In this case, the art was the offspring of the craft of the goldsmiths, by whom engraving, as a method of decoration in itself, had been practised throughout the Middle Ages as well as in Antiquity. If the line-engraver owed any of his inspiration to the woodcutter (who sprang from an entirely different class and belonged to a different guild, that of the wood-carvers and joiners), it could have been little but the suggestion of duplicating his designs through the medium of the press.

In dry-point, the artist obtains his furrow on the copper by scratching the surface with a steel point sharpened in the form of a pencil. He does not push his tool before his hand like the graver, but draws with it as with a pencil, scratching with more or less pressure according to the required depth of line. An essential factor in the dry-point process is the ridge of copper thrown up at the side of the line. This curved ridge holds the ink, and enwraps the lines in a dark cloud-like effect called burr. This burr is very delicate and soon worn down in the printing, so that plates treated in this manner can only yield a very small number of good impressions. Burr is also thrown up at the side of the line by the graver (and may often be seen in unfinished outline proofs of line-engravings), but one of the virtues of line-engraving is clear distinction of line, and the ridge of metal is always scraped away before the completion of the plate.

Etching is an intaglio process where the furrow is obtained by the use of acid ; a method which seems to have had its origin in the armourers' workshops. The plate is first covered with a thin "ground" (or coating of wax composition), and the artist draws the lines through this ground with a needle, exposing the surface of the plate where it is to be bitten (etched, i.e. eaten) by the acid. The resistance to the needle in drawing through the ground is so slight that the etcher works with the freedom of the draughtsman, with the result that etching is characterised by spontaneity of expression as against the studied formalism of line-engraving.

Dürer's work on copper is chiefly limited to line-engraving, but he also left a few plates in etching and dry-point. With dry-point he had an immediate predecessor in the anonymous Master of the Amsterdam Cabinet (as he is called from the locality of the largest collection of his prints), an artist more abounding in vitality of expression than any other engraver of the fifteenth century.

One of Dürer's three dry-point plates, the St. Jerome by the Willow Tree (xxi) was so successful that it is a matter of wonder why the process was so little used by Dürer, or in fact any other engraver, until the time of Rembrandt, a century later. But Dürer's aims were more in harmony with the clear line than with the vague suggestions of tone and atmosphere given by dry-point, and perhaps the small number of good impressions which a good dry-point yields may also account for Dürer's avoidance of a method which could not pay him so well in the market (and he was always the most practical of men).

Etching gives the clear line, as in line-engraving, but here again Dürer may have felt the comparative coarseness of the medium that he used, for all his six etchings are on iron. Why he did not try to etch on copper is curious, for the same mordant would act on either metal; but as the etcher's suggestion came from the armourers, iron may have seemed the more natural material.

An etching by Urs Graf bears the date 1513, and some of those by the Hopfers (a famous Augsburg family of armourers) possibly belong to the preceding decade; but that being said, Dürer's etchings, which all date between 1515-1518, are among the earliest works in this process.

The plates that are given to illustrate Dürer's work on metal and wood are arranged in two chronological series, and will show better than any description the natural progress of his style. The early work is essentially Gothic in its tendency to the pointed and angular, the direct offspring of the style of his master Wolgemut and the artistic entourage of his native town. The background in the engraving of St. Anthony (xxx) is made up of a variety of sources, but it gives us the Gothic flavour of the Bavarian city more truly than any accurate topography. Dürer always remained a true Nuremberger at heart, but, like Rembrandt, he was susceptible to the best influences of Italian art in relation to form, spacing, and composition. He gradually freed himself from the medieval "fantasy devoid of form and foundation" which disfigured his early work as it does so much of the fifteenth-century engraving north of the Alps. And he managed to ennoble his art by an appreciation and adoption of Italian standards of form and beauty without falling a victim to their more local and superficial qualities, and without sacrificing the inherent Teutonism of his nature.

It is not for expression in relation to human emotion that we go to Dürer. Here Rembrandt will always touch us far more deeply. But while Rembrandt spent the deepest feeling of which he was capable on his artistic creation, Dürer seems to have reserved a large part of the expression of his spiritual energies for the strenuous life and thought of the Reformation. He was the friend of Luther and Melancthon, and the latter used to say of him that "though he excelled in the art of painting, it was the least of his accomplishments." As a man he must have been a splendid type of the national character; this division of interest, nevertheless, may have drained something of the spiritual force that might have lived more permanently and effectively in his creative work.

But art is not so directly concerned with the expression of human emotion or with the understanding of life as with the presentation of beauty; and beauty, less in the sense of grace of form or feature (in which Dürer could hardly claim attainment) than in the absolute harmony with which the various elements from life are combined in the artist's composition. In this harmony, and in the conscious thought with which every line is laid in a relation seemingly so absolute that we can imagine no detail altered without disturbing the balance of the whole, Dürer was a supreme artist. Here and there Dürer's subjects strike a more humanly expressive note, as in the woodcut of Christ saying Farewell to His Mother (LI), or in the intense spiritual atmosphere that holds one spellbound in the Melancholia (XXXIII), but in general his aim, like that of the great sculptors, has essentially to do with the outward form of things.

From his work we obtain an increased sense of the beauty and dignity of life, and the restlessness of thought and uncertainty of artistic dogma and convention so common at the present time could find no better antidote than the balanced style and intense conviction that characterise Dürer's engraved work.

A COMPLETE CHRONOLOGICAL LIST OF DÜRER'S ENGRAVINGS

The conjectural period of the undated works is for the most part left to be inferred from their relative position in the list. The order of the line-engravings is that of a recent exhibition of Dürer's work in the British Museum. The Woodcuts are also given in the British Museum order, with references to Mr. Campbell Dodgson's Official Catalogue. The other references B., P., and R., are to Bartsch, Passavant, and Retberg respectively. The Roman numeral immediately following the title of a print refers to the plate in this volume on which it is reproduced
