I. GENERAL NATURE AND THEORY OF DAMAGES.

As a general rule the theory upon which the law allows damages for the violation of a civil right is based upon the doctrine that where a civil injury has been sustained the law provides a remedy that should be commensurate to the injury sustained.[1] The inquiry must always be, What is an adequate remedy to the party injured? and the answer to that inquiry cannot be affected by the form of the action in which the remedy is sought.[2]

II. PRESUMPTION OF DAMAGES.

Where the evidence shows the violation or infringement of a legal right the Dec. 596; Smith v. Sherwood, 2 Tex. 460. See also Bussy v. Donaldson, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 206, 1 L. ed. 748; Milwaukee, etc., R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374. In Finch v. Heermans, 5 Luz. Leg. Reg. (Pa.) 125, "damage" was defined to be the loss caused by one person to another, either to his person, property, or relative rights, through design, carelessness, or default, and damages are the indemnity recoverable by the injured party from the party who has caused the injury. And see infra, VI.

De minimis non curat lex.— In Fullam v. Stearns, 30 Vt. 443, which was an action for trespass committed while levying execution, it appeared that defendant, in removing machinery from a building which did not belong to the execution debtor, cut certain thongs which belonged to the building. These thongs were of small value but could have been easily untied. It was held that the maxim "de minimis non curat lex" did not apply to preclude the plaintiff from recovering, since it is not applicable because the damage is small, but only where the wrong itself is slight.

law will presume damages sufficient to sustain an action,[3] even though such damages may be only nominal,[4] and not capable of exact measurement.[5]

III. Damnum Absque Injuria.

While the law as a general rule allows damages for the violation of civil rights, it does not always follow that every civil right invaded will be compensated in damages. There are cases classified under the legal maxim damnum absque injuria where, although a right may be infringed, no damages will be implied.[6]

IV. General Damages.

General damages are such as the law implies and presumes to have occurred from the wrong complained of.[7]

V. Special Damages.

Special damages are such as actually result from the commission of the wrong, but are not such a necessary result that they will be implied by law.[8] It

No legal right invaded.— Where the extension of a cemetery was duly authorized by law, although such extension was prejudicial to the interests of the owner of land adjoining the cemetery, and depreciated the value of said land, he could not recover damages therefor in the absence of evidence that any legal or conventional right pertaining to him had been invaded. is often a very difficult matter to distinguish general damages from special damages.[9]

VI. NOMINAL DAMAGES.[10]

A. In General. Although the common law only gave actual damages where an actual loss had been sustained, yet the law is now well settled that where a legal right has been invaded the plaintiff may recover nominal damages, although there may be no evidence of actual damages sustained;[11] for a damage is not Aggravation of damages sued for.— Special damage is that which may be given in evidence to aggravate the damages sued for in an action already pending, or which may be itself a distinct cause of action. Smith v. Sherman, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 408.

9. The necessary result of an injury is often and easily confounded with the general and proximate result, and all legal damage, whether general or special, must naturally and proximately result from the act or default complained of. It is difficult to lay down any general rule by which to determine when the law implies the damage and when it does not. It would seem, however, that when the consequences of an injury are peculiar to the circumstances and condition of the injured party, the law could not imply the damage simply from the act causing the injury. Tomlinson v. Derby, 43 Conn. 562.

Wrongful act proximate cause of both.— All damage of which the law takes notice must be the natural and proximate effect of the wrongful act charged, and the only difference between general and special damage is that the former necessarily results from the wrongful act, while the latter does not; the wrongful act being still the natural and proximate cause of both. Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Gridley, 28 Conn. 201.

10. In treating of nominal damages a class of cases also arises where substantial damages are claimed and the defendant seeks, not to defeat the action altogether but desires to reduce the damages claimed by showing that they are in fact nothing more than nominal. This class of cases is merely a question of compensation or measure of damages and will be treated under those respective heads. See infra, VII; XI.

Contract for services.— Only nominal damages can be recovered by an employee for the breach of a contract of employment for an indefinite time. Atkins v. Van Buren School Tp., 77 Ind. 447. So in an action for services rendered plaintiff can only recover nominal damages, where there is no proof of what the services are worth. Gill v. New York Cab Co., 48 Hun (N. Y.) 524, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 202. See also Bash v. Bash, 9 Pa. St. 260.

In an action of trespass for wrongfully killing plaintiff's dog, an instruction that it is incumbent on plaintiff to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the dog was of some pecuniary value is properly refused, as the law recognizes the right of property in a dog, and if it is destroyed without legal justification the owner is entitled to at least nominal damages. Brent v. Kimball, 60 Ill. 211, 14 Am. Rep. 35.

The opening of a private letter by a person ages claimed are so small that they cannot be readily estimated.[14] In such cases if the plaintiff has evidently sustained some damage and the jury being unable to ascertain the amount finds a verdict for the defendant, the court will permit the plaintiff to enter a verdict for nominal damages.[15]

B. Benefit Resulting From Wrong. Even where a benefit has resulted from the wrong done or the right violated the plaintiff can recover nominal damages,[16] as such fact should be rightly considered by the jury in estimating the amount to which he is entitled.[17]

C. Loss Subsequently Repaired. So where the loss for which the action is brought has been subsequently repaired the plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages upon proof of the invasion of some legal right on the part of the defendant.[18]

D. In Actions For Torts. In actions for torts the law does not regard trifling and small inconveniences, but regards only sensible inconveniences, injuries which sensibly diminish the comfort, enjoyment, or value of life, limb, or property.[19] In the absence of proof of actual injury a party may at times recover nominal damages for the infringement of a legal right;[20] but where a

Brown v. Clark, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 443.

Omission to present contribution box in church.— A person performing a voluntary and gratuitous service, such as the collection of the offertory in a church, will not be permitted to make use of his office to offend and humiliate a member of the congregation, and an action of damages will lie for such offense. A wilful and marked omission to present the plate to a member of the congregation was held to be an offense for which an action at law would lie. Lebeau v. Turcotte, 7 Montreal Leg. N. 259.

In Pond v. Merrifield, 12 Cush. (Mass.) 181, the defendant having contracted to have a building erected for himself within a certain time, and according to certain specifications, borrowed money from plaintiff for the purpose of completing it and secured the loan by a mortgage thereon, and also gave plaintiff a penal bond to complete said building by a certain time and according to the contract. The work was not done exactly according to the time or terms of the contract, and plaintiff was compelled to pay extra insurance on the building; but the extra work of defendant on the building increased its value as a security to plaintiff to an amount more than all the deficiencies and delay in not exactly complying with the contract, including also the extra insurance. Under such circumstances it was held that the plaintiff could recover only nominal damages for breach of the bond.

For a trespass in putting dirt on plaintiff's lot, where the lot was benefited thereby, he is not entitled to damages "equal to the cost of removing the dirt," but is only entitled to nominal damages. Murphy v. Fond du Lac, 23 Wis. 365, 99 Am. Dec. 181.

18. Dow v. Humbert, 91 U. S. 294, 23 L. ed. 368. In Murphy v. Jarvis, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 84, subsequent to the commencement of an action, the debt was paid, but the plaintiff claimed for costs and expenses at law and in equity, counsel fees, etc. It was held under the charge of the court that a verdict for only nominal damages was proper, and a motion for a new trial was refused.

Satisfaction of mortgage.— In an action by a grantor against a grantee in a deed on an agreement therein by which the grantee assumed and agreed to pay a mortgage on the land, nominal damages only can be recovered after the mortgage has been satisfied out of the land or extinguished by the act of the mortgagee. the rule even in cases where such property is returned by the wrong-doer to the owner thereof.[27]

G. In Actions Involving Real Property — 1. In General. The right to nominal damages in case of injury to real property is especially applicable.[28] In such cases, while no actual damages may result, the question of the title may be involved and the decision of such question rests upon the recovery or non-recovery of damages for the injury complained of.[29] It is the invasion of the right which gives the action, and the law in the absence of any special injury gives nominal damages on the ground that the undisturbed enjoyment or continuation of such acts without the consent of the owner would ripen into evidence of title.[30]

Stock certificates.— If the transfer of a certificate of stock is void, so as to render the holder liable in trover for the sale of the stock, it is the shares of stock that he is to be considered as having converted, and not merely the paper certificate, so as to render him liable only for nominal damages. Morton v. Preston, 18 Mich. 60, 100 Am. Dec. 146. But the conversion of an unindorsed certificate of stock, not being a conversion of the stock itself, justifies only nominal damages. But in the case of flowing, the owner of the land flowed can maintain no process, unless he has sustained damages in his lands by their being flowed. The common law remedy is taken away and the only remedy for redress is by this process of complaint. The owner's hands are tied. The flowing may continue without license, till damage is suffered."

Diversion of water.— Where the plaintiff is entitled to the use of a spring of water on the land of the defendant, although until he has appropriated the water himself he may not maintain an action for transitory acts of the defendant in using the water, he is entitled to recover nominal damages for the acts of the latter in laying an aqueduct and diverting the water, which acts amount to an open denial of the plaintiff's right, and

2. Trespass to Land. In the case of trespass to land nominal damages may be recovered, even though no actual damage is shown in evidence,[31] and the party complaining may have benefited by the alleged trespass.[32]

3. Overflow of Land — Riparian Owners. In considering the question of injury caused by the overflow of lands or injury to riparian rights, the question of damages is frequently very hard to determine in the absence of any special damages proved, but in all such cases the complainant is at least entitled to nominal damages,[33] even though the land may have benefited by the overflow.[34]

Flowage of land.— Nominal damages may be recovered by plaintiff in an action for flowing land, where there is an infringement of his right, although no actual damages are sustained, especially where the continuance of the flowage might result in an easement on his land. Not restricted to nominal damages.— In Ketcham v. Cohn, 2 Misc. (N. Y.) 427, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 181, defendant employed a contractor to shore up plaintiff's wall, to prevent it from falling into an excavation which defendant was making on an abutting lot. The contractor's employees, without permission from plaintiff, entered plaintiff's premises, and put beams through the wall, whereby plaintiff's property was injured. It was held that plaintiff would not be restricted to nominal damages because defendant was not obliged to shore up the wall, and his doing so saved plaintiff from greater damages.

judgment will not be reversed[35] or a new trial granted to enable a party to recover nominal damages only.[36] Especially is this the case where no permanent legal right is involved.[37] Where, however, a permanent right is at issue and a judgment entered thereon would be conclusive and binding upon the rights of the parties, the appellate court will reverse or set aside an erroneous judgment, although no actual damages are proved.[38] A reversal or new trial will sometimes also be allowed where only nominal damages have been allowed in cases of tort.[39]

2. Effect of Carrying Costs. In some states an award of nominal damages has the effect of carrying the costs of the action, and in such cases where a judgment is erroneously awarded it should be reversed;[40] and the court may add nominal damages to the verdict of the jury when such course is necessary to protect the rights of the plaintiff in this regard.[41] On the other hand where the recovery of nominal damages does not have the effect of carrying the costs of the action, an omission to assess the same will not be ground for reversing

Nonsuit.— For the bare breach of a contract, unaccompanied by proof by which actual damage may be inferred or measured, a recovery for nominal damages may be had. Hence in such case it is error to nonsuit the plaintiff. New Jersey School, etc., Furniture Co. v. Board of Education, 58 N. J. L. 646, 35 Atl. 397.

39. Moore v. New York El. R. Co., 4 Misc. (N. Y.) 132, 23 N. Y. Suppl. 863, 30 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 306. The rule that in an action of tort a new trial will be granted for improperly disallowing nominal damages does not prevail in all its strictness in cases of contract; and in such a case a reviewing court will not constrain the court below to grant a new trial, in order that mere nominal damages may be recovered. Eiswald v. Southern Express Co., 60 Ga. 496.

Action of trespass.— Judgment rendered on a verdict of a jury for defendant in an action of trespass will be reversed on appeal, although it appears that the plaintiff would be entitled to nominal damages only. Searles v. Cronk, 38 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 320.

Overflow of land.— Where plaintiffs were largely and seriously damaged by water flowing on their land, a large part of which was caused to flow there by defendants, although a larger part came from other sources, a finding that plaintiffs' damage from the acts of defendants was but one dollar cannot be sustained. Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11.

Damages covering costs.— In Hickey v. Baird, 9 Mich. 32, the plaintiff agreed to find property on which defendant could satisfy a judgment for one-third the amount collected thereon. He pointed out property which was levied on. Subsequently defendant discharged the judgment on receiving a conveyance of lands which were of no value. Plaintiff sued to recover one-third the amount of the judgment. There was no proof of the value of the property levied on, and judgment was given for defendant, from which plaintiff brought error, claiming to have been entitled to at least nominal damages. Under such circumstances it was held that as nominal damages are only given for the purpose of carrying costs, and under Mich. Comp. Laws, c. 174, such damages do not entitle plaintiff to costs, nothing could be awarded.

Recovery on two causes of action.— Where a substantial recovery of damages is had on one cause of action, and a nominal recovery on another cause of action in the same case, the judgment will not be reversed for error in the latter recovery, the question of costs not being dependent thereon. the judgment,[42] unless a judgment for nominal damages would not affect such costs.[43]

VII. COMPENSATORY DAMAGES.

A. In General. It is always the object of the law in the absence of any evidence of fraud, malice, or oppression, to award compensatory damages or such damages, as the word employed to characterize them indicates, as make good or replace the loss caused by the wrong or injury.[44] They proceed from a sense of natural justice and are designed to repair that of which one has been deprived by the wrong of another.[45] They are such as indemnify the plaintiff, including injury to property, loss of time, necessary expenses, counsel fees, and other actual losses.[46] To this species of damages the legislature or the courts

No costs involved.— In an action for damages for removing cattle from an inclosed tract of pasturage belonging in alternate sections to the government and defendant, when it appears that no injury was done in the removal, and that the land to which they were removed was superior to that inclosed, and plaintiff would not in any event be entitled to more than nominal damages, if any, a judgment for defendant with costs to neither party will not be reversed. Compensation under penalty.— In Jemison v. Governor, 47 Ala. 390, 406, the court said: "It may, therefore, be laid down as a settled rule, that no other sum can be recovered under a penalty than that which shall compensate the plaintiff for his actual loss."

Fraud without damage gives no cause of action; and the probability that a vendee of lands will not be able to procure a title when the time arrives at which he will be entitled to receive it is not the subject of present compensation in damages. Wiley v. Howard, 15 Ind. 169.

45. Reid v. Terwilliger, 116 N. Y. 530, 22 N. E. 1091. In Henderson v. Kentucky Cent. R. Co., 5 S. W. 875, 9 Ky. L. Breach of contract.— The rule is well laid down in Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 489, 494, 69 Am. Dec. 718 [quoted in Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B. N. S. 445, 11 Jur. N. S. 267, 34 L. J. C. P. 169, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 771, 13 Wkly. Rep. 386, 114 E. C. L. 445], as follows: "It is an error to suppose that 'the law does not aim at complete compensation for the injury sustained,' but 'seeks rather to divide than satisfy the loss' (Sedg. on Dam. ch. 3). The broad, general rule in such cases is, that the party injured is entitled to recover all his damages, including gains prevented as well as losses sustained."

Personal injuries.— In Bowas v. Pioneer Tow Line, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,713, 2 Sawy. 21, the court said: "The damages he sues for were the natural and inevitable effects of that injury which would have followed without the intervention of any other cause to enhance or modify them. They necessarily include a compensation for pain and suffering, for loss of time, for medical attendance and support during the time that he has been disabled, and for such permanent injury or continued disability as he has sustained."

Speculation in damages.— La. Code, art. 1928, providing that where the object of the contract is anything but the payment of money, the damages due the creditor for its have from time to time in certain classes of wrongs added another kind of damage when the wrong complained of was prompted or characterized by motives of malice, cruelty, oppression, wantonness, or recklessness.[47] While it is the theory of the law that compensatory damages are given to indemnify a party for all loss or injury suffered, it does not follow in all cases that "the remedy is commensurate with the injury."[48]

B. Direct Consequences — 1. In General. It may be stated as a general rule that a party is entitled to damages for all actual pecuniary loss or personal injury which may directly result from the wrongful act or omission of another and which are the natural result of the act or omission complained of.[49] In such breach are the amount of the loss he has sustained, and the profit of which he has been deprived, undertakes merely to secure a full indemnity to the aggrieved party, and does not authorize a speculation upon the default of the other contracting party. Reading v. Donovan, 6 La. Ann. 491.

47. Reid v. Terwilliger, 116 N. Y. 530, 22 N. E. 1091. See infra, IX. In Cole v. Tucker, 6 Tex. 266, 268 [quoted in Smith v. Bagwell, 19 Fla. 117, 125, 45 Am. Rep. 12], the court said: "Compensatory damages are given when the injury is not tainted with fraud, malice, or willful wrong; but where either of these elements intervene another ingredient is added to the ordinary constituents of injury, viz, the sense of wrong and insult, and damages are given as well for compensation to the sufferer as for the punishment of the offender."

Mere accident.— Where the act causing the injury is not accompanied by malice but is contributable to mere accident, the court will only condemn the defendant to damages actually suffered. Shakel v. Drapeau, 33 L. C. Jur. 55.

48. To allow the jury to assess damages for all loss sustained, whether directly or indirectly connected with the injury complained of, would in effect allow them a "roving commission" to apply their own measure of damages instead of that provided by law. Camp v. Wabash R. Co., 94 Mo. App. 272, 68 S. W. 96. In Sale v. Eichberg, 105 Tenn. 333, 59 S. W. 1020, 52 L. R. A. 894, it was held error to charge the jury that a party was entitled to "full and complete and ample compensation," etc.

Interest as compensation.— The general policy of the law forbids that a debtor should be subjected to all the loss consequent on his failure to fulfil a promise to pay a debt. Such breaches are so often the result of events which could neither have been prevented or foreseen by the debtor that interest is generally considered as compensation which must content the creditor. case a party is entitled to recover substantial damages, commensurate with the loss or injury sustained,[50] and is not confined in his recovery to nominal damages only.[51]

2. Damage Through Agency of Third Party. Damages to be recovered must be both the natural and proximate consequence of the wrong complained of and must not arise from the wrongful act of a third party remotely induced thereby.[52] The intervention of the independent act of a third person between the wrong complained of and the injury sustained, which act was the immediate cause of the injury, is made a test of that remoteness of damage which forbids its recovery.[53]

Continuance of nuisance.— In an action on the case by reversioners for a serious injury to their reversionary interest by the erection of a nuisance in a public highway the jury are not necessarily restricted to a verdict for nominal damages on the first trial, but may give damages commensurate to the injury which the plaintiffs may sustain by the possible continuance of the nuisance. This doctrine, however, does not exclude responsibility when the damage results to the party injured through the intervention of the legal and innocent acts of third parties, for in such instances damage is regarded as occasioned by the wrongful acts.[54] Where the intermediate cause of the damage has resulted from an act of God, the original party cannot be held liable for the loss sustained,[55] as such intervention cannot be considered the natural and proximate cause of the injury inflicted, or to have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time.

C. Proximate and Remote Damages — 1. In General. A proximate loss or injury is usually a consequential loss or injury, but is one so nearly connected with the original wrong that the law concerns itself to award damages therefor.[56] It is a fundamental principle of law, applicable alike to breaches of contract and to torts, that in order to found a right of action there must be a wrongful act done and a loss resulting from that wrongful act; the wrongful act must be the act of the defendant, and the injury suffered by the plaintiff must be the natural and not merely a remote consequence of the defendant's act.[57] While it is the

In this case it appeared that the defendant threw a lighted squib in a crowded market house, which fell in the stall of a neighboring seller; he in order to save himself threw it on, and so it was passed from hand to hand until it struck the plaintiff and put out his eye. It was held that the plaintiff could recover from the original wrong-doer, because the natural and probable consequence of his act was to injure someone, and being unlawful he was answerable for the consequences, whether the injury was mediate or immediate.

I wish to guard against laying down the proposition so universally; but of this I am quite clear, that every person who does a wrong, is at least responsible for all the mischievous consequences that may reasonably be expected to result, under ordinary circumstances, from such misconduct." In Neal v. Atlantic Refining Co., 4 Pa. Dist. 49, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 241, oil escaped from defendant's oil refinery, without its negligence, to a river, mingled there with other inflammable matter, for the presence of which defendant was not responsible, and was ignited by the act of a third person, whereby plaintiff's boat was burned. It was held that defendant was not liable for the loss, as his permitting the oil to escape to the river was not the proximate cause of the loss.

perform a stipulated duty or service would be a serious hindrance to the operations of commerce and to the transaction of the common business of life.[59] The question as to what damages will be considered the natural and proximate consequence of the injury and what damages will be considered remote is one difficult of decision.[60] It may be stated as a general rule, however, that where the result of an unlawful act is a natural one, and one that would naturally flow from the act done, it is not remote but proximate. If upon the contrary the damages complained of would not naturally or usually flow from the negligent act, but were brought about by some unforeseen casualty, then they would be remote.[61] Within the rule which limits a recovery for injury to those damages which are its natural and proximate effects, the natural effects are those which might reasonably be foreseen, those which occur in the ordinary state of things, and proximate effects are those between which and the injury there intervenes no culpable and efficient agency.[62] The matter is usually one of evidence[63] which should be left to the decision of the jury.[64]

A rule to be of practicable value in the administration of the law must be reasonably certain. It is impossible to trace any wrong to all its consequences. 2. In Actions For Tort — a. In General. The general rule in actions for torts is that the wrong-doer is liable for all injuries resulting directly from the wrongful acts, whether they could or could not have been foreseen by him,[65] provided the particular damages in respect to which he proceeds are the legal and natural consequences of the wrongful act imputed to the defendant, and are such as according to common experience and the usual course of events might reasonably have been anticipated.[66] Remote, contingent, or speculative damages will not be considered in conformity to the general rule above laid down.[67] To render a wrong-doer liable in damages, where the connection is not immediate between the injurious act and the consequence, such nearness in the order of events and closeness in the relation of cause and effect must subsist, as that the influence of the injurious act will predominate over that of Damages after commencement of suit.— In an action for trespass done by defendant's sheep grazing on plaintiff's lands, evidence of damages which according to plaintiff's evidence ensued directly from the trespass was admissible, although ensuing after the commencement of the suit. Direct, although not natural, consequences of tort.— In an action to recover damages for forcible dispossession of the plaintiff, under a warrant in summary proceedings which were afterward reversed, it appeared that a sum of money, kept by the plaintiff in a box in a building on the premises which was destroyed by the defendants in the removal, was lost. It was held that although the money was kept in an unusual place, and defendants may not have suspected its presence, they were still liable for its loss, which was the direct result of their acts. Probable consequences of deceit.— Where a passenger who had purchased passage on defendant's ship, but had determined to forfeit it on the subsequent outbreak of cholera, was induced to take the passage on the false representation of defendant's agent that no steerage passengers would be carried, he may recover from defendant actual damages resulting from the ship being quarantined at the port of destination because of the existence of cholera on board. Deceit.— A contractor who had agreed to build a railroad for a specified sum could not recover from the company, in an action for deceit, for loss resulting to him by reason of a rise in the price of rails during the delay in the work caused by the failure of the other causes, and concur to produce the consequence, or be traceable to those causes.[68]

b. Injury to Property. The same rule obtaining in actions of tort is applied in cases of injuries to property, the defendant being liable in damages for such faults and omissions as are the natural and proximate result of his wrong[69] and such as might have been foreseen as likely to follow.[70] Remote and contingent damages will not be considered.[71]

Loss in market value.—In an action against a railroad company for having negligently blown an engine whistle so as to frighten plaintiff's horses, which ran away, injuring themselves and the hack to which they were harnessed, loss in the market value of such horses is a proximate result of the injury, which plaintiff is entitled to recover. c. Personal Injuries — (I) In General. In actions for personal injuries the same rule obtains as in tort. It is not necessary that the result of the injury should have been foreseen.[72] A wrong-doer is responsible for the natural and proximate consequences of his misconduct and not for such damages only as might reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as a probable result of the accident.[73] Where actual damages have been proved in an action for personal injuries, the motive of the defendant will not be considered.[74] It is sufficient if the injury complained of was the natural or proximate consequence of the wrongful act,[75] and is not too remotely connected with the original injury complained of.[76]

(II) Disease Resulting. The question of damages for personal injury is sometimes very difficult of solution, where one is injured by the fault or omission of another and in consequence thereof becomes diseased or in delicate health. In such cases, however, the disease is considered the proximate although not the

(III) One Already Diseased. Where one already diseased has suffered from a personal injury, the mere fact of personal condition will not deny him all the damages suffered from the accident.[78] The rule remains the same whether the injury supervenes and proximately results in the defendant's wrong, or whether the disease existed at the time of the injury and was aggravated by it.[79]

(IV) Future Consequences. As a general rule compensation will be awarded only for what a party has actually suffered by reason of his injuries up to the date of trial,[80] and future consequences are not to be considered when no proof of such consequences has been introduced in evidence.[81] While future consequences which are reasonably to be expected to follow an injury may be given in evidence for the purpose of enhancing the damages to be awarded,[82]

At the end of that time he committed suicide, and it was attempted to hold the railroad company responsible in damages on the ground that the accident was the proximate cause. It was held that his act was not the actual probable consequence and could not have been foreseen in the light of the circumstances attending the negligence, and that his subsequent insanity and suicide were casual and unexpected causes intervening between the act which injured him and his death.

may reasonably be supposed to have been contemplated by the parties, when making the contract, as the probable result of the breach.[85] In other words when two parties have made a contract which has been broken, the damages to be received for the breach should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered as arising naturally therefrom, that is, according to the usual course of business, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time that the contract was made, and as a probable result of its breach.[86]

b. Notice of Special Damage. Outside of the general rule for the recovery of damages for breach of contract there has been evolved another rule of general application. Where special circumstances have been communicated to a party at the time of the making of a contract which go to show that its breach will involve special damage, such damage may be recovered, although not the natural result of an ordinary breach.[87] When a contract is made under special circumstances, and those circumstances are communicated by one of the contracting parties to the other, the damages resulting from the breach of the contract which they would reasonably contemplate are the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under those special circumstances.[88] Mere notice as such does not have the effect of rendering a party liable to more than ordinary damages; but in order to do so it must be given under such circumstances as to make it a term of the contract that the party will be liable for such damages if the contract is broken.[89] The general rule is that a party who fails to comply with his contract to furnish goods is liable for the value of the goods in the open market at the time of the failure.[90]

The effect of this rule is more often to limit than to extend the liability for a breach of contract, although sometimes, where the special circumstances under which the contract was made have been communicated, damages consequential upon a breach made under those circumstances will be deemed to have been contemplated by the parties and may be recovered of the defendant. Where the vendor contracts with the purchaser for the delivery of building materials at a given time and place, with knowledge of the special circumstances under which the contract is made, the damages resulting from a breach of such contract which the parties would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of the contract under the special circumstances. c. Notice of Subcontract. Where a party makes a contract and at the time notifies the defendant that such contract is made with reference to a subcontract already entered into or contemplated, upon the breach of the original contract he will not be confined to nominal damages, but may recover such damages as necessarily result from its breach;[91] and the same rule has been held to apply where the original contract was entered into with notice of a special use for the goods[92] or of resale.[93]

d. Remote Damages. Remote damages[94] not connected directly with the breach of contract and such as cannot be said to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made will be invariably denied.

e. Profits. In order to recover profits in case of a breach of contract, such profits must have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time that the contract was made, and where such profits do not enter into the contract itself they will be denied.[95] Anticipated damages, different from those which would ordinarily be sustained, are not always recoverable, but will only be awarded when in view of special circumstances they may be regarded as the natural and direct result of the breach, and are not problematical, but are capable of being foreseen and of being estimated with reasonable accuracy.[96] In all cases the damages claimed should be capable of being definitely ascertained.[97] Where the damages claimed are so speculative and dependent upon numerous and changing contingencies that their amount is not susceptible of actual proof with any reasonable degree of certainty no recovery can be had.[98]

D. Certain and Uncertain Damages — 1. In General. Where a party claims damages by reason of injury inflicted either in actions ex delicto[99] or ex contractu,[1] he must not only show an injury sustained, but must also show with reasonable certainty the amount of damages he has sustained in consequence thereof.[2] It is not, however, a sufficient reason for disallowing damages claimed that a party can state their amount only proximately; it is enough if from proximate estimates of witnesses a satisfactory conclusion can be reached.[3] The rule of recovery is compensation. Where the loss is pecuniary and is present and actual and can be measured, but no evidence is given showing its extent, or from which it can be inferred, the jury can allow nominal damages only.[4] It is not

The question what damages are speculative and therefore not recoverable is for the court and not for the jury. Mississippi, etc., R. Co. v. Prince, 34 Minn. 71, 24 N. W. 344.

99. Where from the nature of the case the amount of the damages in an action of tort cannot be estimated with certainty, or only a part of them can be so estimated, all the facts and circumstances of the case having any tendency to show damages or their probable amount may be placed before the jury, so as to enable them to make the most intelligible and probable estimate which the nature of the case will permit. Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542.

1. The cardinal principle in relation to the damages to be compensated for on the breach of a contract that the plaintiff must establish the quantum of his loss, by evidence from which the jury will be able to estimate the extent of his injury, will exclude all such elements of injury as are incapable of being ascertained by the usual rules of evidence to a reasonable degree of certainty. 3. Satchwell v. Williams, 40 Conn. 371. In Duke v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 99 Mo. 347, 351, 12 S. W. 636, the court said: "Where there is no evidence showing the amount, or the proximate amount, of expenses incurred for medicines, medical attention or like services, the jury have no basis upon which to form an estimate of the damages that ought to be assessed on account thereof, and damages of this kind cannot be found except upon such proof. Y. 26, 29, the court said: "For pain and suffering, or injuries to the feelings, there can be no measure of compensation, save the arbitrary judgment of a jury. But that is a rule of necessity. Where actual pecuniary damages are sought, some evidence must be given showing their existence and extent. If that is not done the jury cannot indulge in an arbitrary estimate of their own."

necessary to show the exact amount of damages to an absolute certainty;[5] but the amount of damages claimed must be shown with reasonable certainty in order to warrant a recovery.[6]

A. 199], it was said: "We cannot readily understand how there can be pain without mental suffering. It is a mental emotion arising from a physical injury. It is the mind that either feels or takes cognizance of physical pain, and hence there is mental anguish or suffering inseparable from bodily injury, unless the mind is overpowered and consciousness is destroyed. The mental anguish which would not be proper to be considered is where it is not connected with the bodily injury, but was caused by some mental conception not arising from the physical injury." In an action for personal injuries mental suffering not connected with the injury, but caused by some conception arising from a different source, the natural consequence that flows from it,[12] and damages for prospective mental anguish are not recoverable as being too speculative.[13] So the anguish of mind arising as to the safety of others who may be in personal peril from the same cause cannot be taken into consideration.[14] There is a certain line of cases, however, in which recovery may be had for mental anguish, although there is no damage capable of actual proof. Thus a parent may recover for mental anguish for the loss of the possession of his children, however small the value of their services may have been.[15] So a party may recover for the mental anguish experienced in the removal or mutilation of a dead body or any infringement of his rights connected therewith.[16]

b. Accompanying Fright. As a general rule injuries from fright accompanying a physical injury furnish a basis for the recovery of damages.[17] There seems to be some difference of opinion among the courts as to whether fright unaccompanied by personal injury can be compensated in damages.[18] The better rule on Additional recovery.— In Washington, etc., R. Co. v. Dashiell, 7 App. Cas. (D. C.) 507, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover for an impairment of the nervous system resulting from a nervous shock at the time of a collision in addition to damages for physical pain and suffering.

plaintiff by the defendant.[21] In other words in order to warrant a recovery the physical injury must be either contemporaneous with the occasioned fright, or the fright and mental anguish occasioning the injury must have been inflicted in a spirit of wanton disregard or negligence.[22]

c. Resulting From Disfigurement of Person. In considering the question whether a party can recover compensation in damages for mental suffering and distress of mind caused by a disfigurement of his person the courts have not entirely agreed.[23] The rule on this subject would seem to be that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation for mental anguish connected with the disfigurement itself,[24] but the mental anguish that results from the contemplation of a maimed body and the humiliation of going through life in a crippled condition is considered a sentimental state of mind too remote from the original injury to constitute an element of damages.[25]

d. Humiliation or Insult. In case of humiliation or insult, the right of recovery for mental anguish depends somewhat upon the circumstances under which the damages are claimed; but a recovery on such ground will usually be Miscarriage resulting.— In Nelson v. Crawford, 122 Mich. 466, 81 N. W. 335, 80 Am. St. Rep. 577, defendant, dressed in woman's clothes, went to the residence of plaintiff, whom he frightened by following her into her house, and striking the floor with his parasol; the fright, as alleged, having the effect of producing a miscarriage on plaintiff. There was no attempt to do bodily injury, and it did not appear that defendant intended any wrong, or contemplated the alleged consequences of his acts. It was held that directing a verdict for defendant, on the ground that the evidence showed no assault, and that fright, unaccompanied by physical injury, is not a basis for damages, is proper. The mental pain which comes from the contemplation of a maimed body and the humiliation of going through life in a crippled condition is too remote to be considered an element of damage. The mental pain that may be considered and allowed for in this class of cases is such as is the direct result or concomitant of the physical pain suffered. Mental pain is always an attendant upon severe physical pain — such is the relation of mind and body — and the mental pain that is the direct and necessary result of the physical pain, but not otherwise, is a proper element of damages in personal injury cases. Chicago City R. Co. v. Anderson, 80 Ill. App. 71.

allowed,[26] unless the claim is too remotely connected with the injury complained of.[27]

e. In Case of Wilful Torts. While the general rule obtains that a recovery for mental anguish must generally be connected with the personal physical injury, it is also true that where the injury is accompanied by circumstances of malice, insult, or wilfulness, a recovery may be had therefor.[28]

In an action by a husband for alienation of the affections of his wife, even where no precise amount of specific damages is proved, the court is justified in awarding substantial damages for the disgrace and humiliation brought upon the plaintiff, and for the deprivation of his wife's society. Hart v. Shorey, 12 Quebec Super. Ct. 84.

"Wounding a man's feelings is as much actual damage as breaking his limbs. The difference is, that one is internal and the other external, one mental, the other physical; in either case the damage is not measurable with exactness. There can be a closer approximation in estimating the damage to a limb than to the feelings, but at the last the amount is indefinite. The jury would have a much wider discretion in dealing with feelings than with an external injury. At common law, compensatory damages include, upon principle, and I think upon authority, salve for wounded feelings, and our code has no purpose to deny such damages where the common law allowed them." f. In Case of Breach of Contract. Mental anguish and distress disconnected with physical injury cannot as a general rule be made the basis for a recovery of damages for a breach of contract.[29] An exception to this rule is found, however, in breaches of contract of marriage,[30] and in some exceptional cases of contract where the breach alleged amounts practically to a wilful tort.[31]

g. Failure to Deliver Telegram. As a general rule no damages can be recovered for mental anguish unaccompanied with other injury caused by neglect or failure of a telegraph company to send or deliver a message,[32] although in some states it has been provided by statute or declared the law that recovery can be had in such cases, and it would seem that the object of such statutes is to fix the measure of damages, and also the mode of procedure for their recovery.[33]

personal injuries is more specifically treated under the section on impairment of earning capacity;[40] but in all actions where a loss of time has resulted as a direct consequence of the injury inflicted, upon proper evidence thereof the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages therefor.[41] In all cases, however, in order to recover for loss of time the plaintiff must show proof of business, its extent, and the particular part transacted by himself.[42] While there seems to be no distinction between loss of earnings and loss of time in respect to the necessity of making proof as to the time lost, yet in an action for personal injuries it will be held error to award the plaintiff damages for loss of time unless some evidence of the value of the time is introduced.[43]

F. Impairment of Earning Capacity. Under the general rule that the party injuring another by a wrongful act is liable for all the direct injury consequent thereto, although it may not have been contemplated as the probable result, the loss or diminution of capacity to follow one's usual business or employment is a proper subject for compensation.[44] In those cases where the plaintiff is a professional man, great difficulty has been experienced in arriving at the amount calculated to compensate him for his impaired earning capacity. It has been held, however, that inability to compute the amount with accuracy is no reason why evidence of all the circumstances and business surroundings of the plaintiff may not be given to the jury, since it is not the plaintiff's fault that the inquiry has become necessary;[45] and where such evidence is capable of being produced it may be shown what his average annual or monthly earnings were.[46] In actions of tort, where the quantum of damages is very much within the discretion of the jury,[47] evidence of the nature and extent of the plaintiff's business, and the general rate of profit he has realized therefrom, which has been interrupted by the defendant's wrongful act, is properly received, not on the ground of its furnishing a measure of damages to be adopted by the jury, but to be taken into consideration by the jury, to guide them in the exercise of that discretion which to a certain extent is always vested in them.[48]

G. Loss of Profits — 1. In General. The earlier cases, both English and American, have generally concurred in excluding, as well in actions of tort as in actions on contracts, from the damages recoverable, profits which might have been realized if the injury had not been done or the contract had been performed.[49] Especially did this rule obtain where loss of profits was claimed as damages in case of an interrupted sea voyage.[50] Under the latter-day decisions recovery of profits as damages is not excluded because they are claimed as profits per se;[51] but they must be the natural and proximate causes of the acts complained of, and when this can be ascertained without uncertainty the principle of compensation will be adopted.[52] Indeed, whenever profits are rejected as an item of damages it is because they are subject to too many contingencies and are too dependent upon the fluctuations of markets and the chances of business to constitute a safe criterion for an estimate of damages.[53] Expected profits are in their nature contingent upon many changing circumstances, uncertain and remote at best. They can be recovered only when they are made reasonably certain by the proof of actual facts with present data for a rational estimate of their amount,[54] and when this is made to appear they may be recoverable as damages.[55] The mere specu-

The general rule has been laid down as follows: "The age and occupation of the injured person, value of his services — that is, the wages he has earned in the past, whether he has been employed at a fixed salary or as a professional man — are proper to be considered. He is entitled to recover for the disabling effect of the injury upon his capacity to earn, not only up to the time of the trial, but for all probable future disability in that respect." Executory contract.—Although profits cannot be recovered unless shown to be the direct fruits of the broken contract, a plaintiff should not be excluded from making such proof of loss of profits as he can, although he has not entered upon the performance of the contract or spent money upon it. 52. Medbury v. New York, etc., R. Co., 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 564. In Morey v. Metropolitan Gas Light Co., 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. 185, 188, the court said: "The rule in any action, which allows the loss of profits to be estimated as damages, confines such loss to the immediate cause or breach. If they can not be traced directly to the breach of contract or duty, or are not the immediate result of the breach, then they are regarded as too remote, uncertain and unreliable, to form the basis of damage (Lacour v. New York, 3 Duer (N. Y.) 406)." In Armistead v. Shreveport, etc., R. Co., 108 La. 171, 32 So. 456, the plaintiff chartered a boat to convey some cotton seed to his mill. Defendant's bridge obstructed the passage of the boat and deprived plaintiff of the profits he expected to realize. It was held that he could recover therefor. In the same case, however, it was held that the party could not recover for profits on seed that he expected to procure.

In an action for tort damages for loss of profits in business may be recovered if they are susceptible of definite ascertainment and are the direct result of the injury. Wolff Shirt Co. v. Frankenthal, 96 Mo. App. 307, 70 S. W. 378.

S.) 305, 344, 14 L. ed. 157 [quoted in Watson v. Gray's Harbor Brick Co., 3 Wash. 283, 28 Pac. 527] the court said: "Wherever profits are spoken of as not the subject of damages, it will be found that something contingent upon future bargains, speculations, or states of the market, are referred to, and not the difference between an agreed price of something contracted for and its ascertainable value, or cost."

Exclusive right of sale.— Where defendant had the exclusive right to sell plaintiff's goods in certain territory, and plaintiff made sales in violation of such right, defendant is entitled to the profits that he would have realized on the sales which the violation of such right prevented (Russell v. Horn, etc., Mfg. The contract was for three years. It was held that where defendant after procuring several customers refused to go on with the contract, although the profits were wholly prospective, plaintiffs were entitled to damages.

may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties when they made the contract, that is, must be such as might naturally be expected to follow its violation; and they must be certain, both in their nature and in respect to the cause from which they proceed.[64] It is against the policy of the law to allow profits as damages where such profits are remotely connected with the breach of contract alleged[65] or where they are speculative, resting only upon conjectural evidence or the individual opinion of parties or witnesses.[66]

b. Within Contemplation of Parties. direct and immediate result of its fulfilment they form a proper item of damages.[68] But if they are such as would have been realized by the party from other independent and collateral undertakings, although entered into in consequence of the principal contract, they are too uncertain and remote to be considered as part of the damages.[69] Where a party has entered into a contract to perform certain work and is, without fault of his own, prevented from completing the work by a breach of the contract, he is entitled to recover profits which can be readily determined and such as may be reasonably inferred to have been contemplated by the parties to the contract.[70]

c. Notice of Special Damage. The question as to notice of special damage at the time of making a contract has also been applied where profits are claimed after a breach.[71] Thus where goods or property are purchased for the purpose of resale and the vendor is aware of such purpose at the time of the contract, a failure or delay in performing his part of the contract will render him liable in damages for the certain profits that would have accrued.[72] Where goods are

W. 447, plaintiffs operated defendant's elevator under a written contract providing for a compensation to them of half a cent per bushel for all grain transferred by them from defendant's cars to vessels, each party having the right to terminate the contract on giving ninety days' notice. Without giving such notice defendant took possession of the elevator. The previous day defendant had written plaintiffs as to certain grain expected to arrive, directing them what lots to keep separate and requesting them to load certain portions thereof on steamers named. It was held that the jury were properly allowed to consider whether this did not contemplate the immediate handling of the grain in question so that, in estimating damages for defendant's breach of contract, the loss of the profits of such handling might be considered.

72. Jordan v. Patterson, 67 Conn. 473, 35 Atl. 521. In Borries v. Hutchinson, 18 C. B. N. S. 445, 453, 11 Jur. N. S. 267, 34 L. J. C. P. 169, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 771, 13 Wkly. Rep. 386, 114 E. C. L. 445, the court said: "The question is, not what profit the plaintiff might have made, but what profit he professed to be purchasing. Not what damage he actually suffered, but what the other contemplated, and undertook to pay for. It is quite clear that loss of profits by a resale can delivered to a common carrier to be delivered at a certain destination and such carrier has notice of the nature of the goods or the purpose for which they are to be transported, it is liable for failure or delay to so deliver them, and expected profits which have been prevented by its negligence may be recovered.[73]

d. Breach of Original Contract as Affecting Subcontracts. As a general rule a breach of the original contract will not entitle the plaintiff to recover as damages the gains or profits of collateral enterprises or subcontracts into which he has been induced to enter, such profits or gains being entirely too speculative and contingent[74] and not the natural and probable consequence of the original never be contemplated, unless the resale has actually taken place at the time, and is communicated to the other party. The reason is, that such a profit is utterly incapable of valuation. It may depend upon a change of weather, a scientific discovery, an outbreak of war, a workman's strike. It will depend upon the energy and sagacity of the person who purchases the goods, and the solvency of the person to whom he sells them again."

No notice of resale.— Where the state fails to deliver its bonds to a purchaser in accordance with a contract for their sale, and such purchaser has a contract for immediate resale of the bonds to a third person, the state is not liable to him for the amount of his profits on such resale, in the absence of any notice to or knowledge by the state's agents that such purchaser contemplated a resale. 73. In Jameson v. Midland R. Co., 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426, the plaintiff delivered a parcel at a receiving office of the defendants in London, addressed to "W. H. Moore & Co., Stand 23, Show Grounds, Lichfield, Staffordshire; van train." Nothing was said by the person who delivered the parcel at the receiving office as to the purpose for which it was being sent to Lichfield, or to draw attention to the label. It was held that the label was sufficient notice to the defendants that the goods were being sent to a show, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages for loss of profits and expenses incurred by the goods being delayed, and not delivered at Lichfield in time for the show. In Schulze v. Great Eastern R., 19 Q. B. D. 30, 56 L. J. Q. B. 442, 57 L. T. Rep. N. S. 438, 35 Wkly. Rep. 683 [following Wilson v. Lancashire, etc., R. Co., 9 C. B. N. S. 632, 7 Jur. N. By the negligence of the defendants, who had notice that the parcel contained samples, it was delayed on the way until the season at which the samples could be used for procuring orders had elapsed, and they had in consequence become valueless. The plaintiffs could not have procured similar samples in the market. In an action for the non-delivery in a reasonable time, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as damages the value to them of the samples at the time when they should have been delivered.

No notice of purpose.— In a suit against a carrier of passengers upon a steamboat for the loss of baggage, the plaintiff claimed for the loss of a set of dentist's instruments and special damages in the loss of the profits and earnings which he might have made if the instruments had not been lost. It was held upon demurrer that such special damages could not be recovered, but only such damages as were contemplated or might reasonably be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties to the contract of carriage. Brock v. Gale, 14 Fla. 523, 14 Am. Rep. 356. So where, in an action against a railroad for negligently failing to deliver machinery, which caused the shutting down of a flouring-mill, the complaint did not allege nor the evidence show that any definite profit was lost, nor that the contract was such as to inform defendant that any loss of special profit would ensue, it was error to admit evidence showing what the special profit would have been during the time the mill was shut down, as the proper measure of damages was the legal interest on the capital invested, and such other damages as were the direct and necessary result of defendant's negligence. breach.[75] Where, however, the knowledge of the subcontract is within the contemplation of the parties when the original contract is made, and is known to have been made in reference thereto, another rule exists and the anticipated gains or profits may be recovered.[76]

e. From Expected Crops. As a general rule where damages are claimed for the destruction of a growing crop the plaintiff can only recover the value of the crop at the time it was destroyed.[77] Profits expected to be realized from crops that have not matured are too speculative and uncertain to be estimated as damages,[78] and especially is this so where no crop has matured upon which a reasonable estimate may be based.[79] In some cases the courts have allowed damages for the injured crop, based upon estimates of other crops raised in the immediate neighborhood and not affected by the injury complained of.[80]

f. From Use of Money. The actual damages arising out of the breach of a contract for the non-payment of money is usually measured by the interest of the money.[81] Anticipated profits in its use are too speculative to be allowed.[82]

What necessary to be shown.— To warrant recovery, as damages for breach of an agreement to make a loan, of the profits on a contemplated purchase of land, it would be necessary to show that plaintiff had a binding contract for the purchase; that defendant with knowledge of such fact agreed to make the loan; that after compliance with all the requirements and without fault on his part defendant refused to make the loan; that by reason thereof plaintiff was unable to make the purchase; and that he actually lost the benefits claimed by him. In an action by a lessee of farming land to recover for a breach of a covenant in the lease to be let into possession, the court at the request of the plaintiff instructed the jury in effect that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the crop that might have been raised on the land by an average farmer during the term, less the cost of raising it, and that they might consider the fact that the plaintiff had the stock and utensils to work and cultivate the land, without hiring it done. At the request of the defendant the court further instructed the jury that in assessing the plaintiff's damage they could not consider damages resulting from the loss of his labor or of the use of his teams. It was held that the instructions were proper and were not conflicting. Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, 16 Pac. 501, 5 Am. St. Rep. 479. In Page v. Pavey, 8 C. & P. 769, 34 E. C. L. 1011 [cited in Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753], the plaintiff sued for a breach of warranty in the sale of wheat. The declaration alleged a sale of old cone wheat for seed, with a warranty that it would grow, and a breach that it did not grow, whereby the wheat became of no value to the plaintiff and he was deprived of great gains which would have arisen from the straw and corn which would have been produced if it had grown; and it was held that the plaintiff could give evidence of what the value of the crops might have been, with a view to make out his damages, claimed in his declaration. H. Interruption of Business — 1. In General. The reputation and credit of a man in business is of great value, and is as much within the protection of the law as property or other valuable rights. Where the defendant has maliciously and by his wrongful act destroyed the business, credit, and reputation of the plaintiff the law will require him to make good the loss sustained.[84] As a general rule the loss of profits to a business which has been wrongfully interrupted by another is an element of damages for which a recovery may be had, where such profits can be made to appear with reasonable certainty;[85] but the evidence must afford the jury some data from which they can with reasonable certainty determine the loss. Outside of this rule no certain guide for estimating such damages can be established.[86] In an action to recover damages for a loss of profits, no evidence can be given as to the uncertain future profits of a commercial business, difficulties and sustained injuries unforeseen at the time, and have suffered, like thousands of others. Theirs is not a loss, in the just sense of the term, but the deprivation of an opportunity for making money, which might have proved beneficial, or might have been ruinous; and it is of that uncertain character, which is not to be weighed in the even balances of the law, nor to be ascertained by well established rules of computation among merchants."

In an action for the wrongful seizure by a sheriff of the stock in trade of plaintiff, and the closing of his place of business, which involves damages for trespass as well as the conversion, the loss of profits during the time plaintiff was kept out of possession is a proper element of damages. Growing business.— Where the business which had been destroyed by the tort of defendants was a growing one, had been running about two years, the selling price of the machines which plaintiff sold was fixed, and the cost to plaintiff fixed at a given percentage of such price, and a large number of orders were on hand at the time defendants committed such wrongful acts, and a number of orders were received by plaintiff after that time, it was held proper, in estimating plaintiff's damages, to consider his future profits of the business for such time as would elapse before the contract could be legally terminated. Oliver v. Perkins, 92 Mich. 304, 52 N. W. 609.

Malicious tort.—In trespass for damages on the execution of a distress warrant, plaintiff may recover as special damages the loss suffered by the interruption of business and injuries received, where books of peculiar value and files of papers indispensable to the business are maliciously taken. Sherman v. Dutch, 16 Ill. 283. So in an action to recover damages for loss of trade, where the evidence showed that the plaintiff was a horseshoer; that one R was a customer of his; that defendant, with the intent of making R believe that the work of plaintiff was badly done, secretly loosened a shoe on R's horse shortly after it had been placed there by plaintiff; and that R was thereby induced to believe that plaintiff was not a skilful workman, it was held that plaintiff was entitled to damages resulting from the loss of R's custom. Hughes v. McDonough, 43 N. J. L. 459, 39 Am. Rep. 603.

86. In Lehman v. McQuown, 31 Fed. 138, personalty of a debtor was sold at sheriff's sale, and bought by the debtor's wife for less than its value. A creditor thereupon secured nor can the amount of past profits derived therefrom be shown to enable the jury to conjecture what the future profits might be.[87] The plaintiff in such action has a right to prove the business in which he was engaged, its extent, and the particular part transacted by him, and if he can, the compensation usually paid to persons doing such business for others. These circumstances the jury have a right to consider in fixing the value of his time. But they ought not to be permitted to speculate as to the uncertain profits of commercial ventures in which the plaintiff, if uninjured, would have been engaged.[88] Past profits[89] cannot be taken as an exact measure of future profits; but all the various contingencies by which the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property so bought and restrained interference, alleging fraud. The bona fides of the transaction was afterward established, and the receiver settled his accounts, and was discharged, and turned over to the purchaser the residue of the property in his hands. Under such circumstances it was held in an action on the injunction bond that the profits which might have been made by the use of the property if the possession of the receiver had not been disturbed are so far speculative that in the absence of clear testimony they could not be measured by any exact standard.

Loss of rent.— One whose tenants have left because of the encroachment of a defective and dangerous retaining wall on his property may recover his loss of rents as part of the damages. Goldschmid v. New York, 14 N. Y. App. Div. 135, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 447. So in Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 413, 26 S. E. 875, it was held that damages might be recovered for the net rental value for delay in construction of a building on plaintiff's lot, caused by defendant's building overhanging the lot and defendant's delaying removal thereof, construction having been contracted for and commenced, and the building having been rented in advance, from a certain time, for a definite period, at a specified rent. But in an action for failure to construct an elevator in an office building according to contract, damages from failure to rent the rooms are too speculative to be recoverable. Clifford v. Leroux, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 340, 37 S. W. 172, 254.

Seizure of property.— Loss sustained by a mercantile firm, from the seizure of their property, in the diminution of their business and its consequent profits, subsequent to the release of the property from the seizure, is not an element of damage susceptible of computation with any reasonable degree of accuracy, and evidence concerning it is properly excluded from the jury. Selden v. Cashman, 20 Cal. 56, 81 Am. Dec. 93.

The mere opinion of a witness as to the prospective profits which might have been realized from the use of property if the same had not been taken from his possession is inadmissible, such evidence being too uncertain and speculative to furnish a safe guide to the jury in estimating damages. See also Lincoln v. Saratoga, etc., R. Co., 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 425.

89. Past profits have been allowed for the purpose of measuring future profits both in actions ex contractu and ex delicto, although more frequently in the latter, where from the nature of the case no element of greater certainty appeared, and the actual damages must be more or less a matter of opinion. Allison v. Chandler, 11 Mich. 542. In es-

such profits would probably be affected should be taken into consideration by the jury.[90]

2. Established Business. Where an established business is wrongfully injured, destroyed, or interrupted, the owner of such business can recover damages sustained;[91] but in all such cases it must be made to appear that the business which is claimed to have been interrupted was an established one; that it had been successfully conducted for such a length of time and had such a trade established that the profits thereof are reasonably ascertainable.[92]

3. New Business. Where a new business or enterprise is floated and damages by way of profit are claimed for its interruption or prevention, they will be denied for the reason that such business is an adventure, as distinguished from an established business, and its profits are speculative and remote, existing only in anticipation.[93]

4. Illegal Business. No damages, exemplary or otherwise, should be allowed for the interruption of an illegal business.[94]

5. Riparian Rights. Where interruption of business occurs through neglect of or interference with riparian rights, and the loss of profits can be definitely established, they may be included in the estimate of damages.[95]

I. Expenses — 1. In General. As a general rule a party is entitled to recover as damages all reasonable expenses to which he may have been put in consequence timating the losses sustained by reason of the destruction of plaintiff's business, it is proper for the jury to take into consideration the extent of plaintiff's business, and his profits for a reasonable period next preceding the time when the injury was inflicted, leaving the defendant to show that by depression in trade or from other causes the profits would have been less. of the wrong or injury inflicted;[96] but this rule is not one of universal application. There are certain expenses which are recognized by the law as reasonable, legitimate, and necessary, while others are regarded with suspicion and are only recoverable upon positive proof.[97]

The theory of the cases which hold that medical services cannot be included as damages, where there is no evidence of payment or liability therefor, is based upon the ground of compensation in damages, the theory being that a party ought not to be permitted to recover for a loss which he has never sustained and for which there is no apparent liability. Morris v. Grand Ave., etc., R. Co., 144 Mo. 500, 46 S. W. 170; Smith v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 108 Mo. 243, 18 S. W. 971. See also Lee v. Western Union Tel. Co., 51 Mo. Co., 144 Mo. 500, 46 S. W. 170], it was held that there could be no recovery for medical expenses incurred to a physician who had no license, because under such circumstances there was no legal liability to pay on the part of the plaintiff. In Belyea v. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co., 61 Minn. 224, 63 N. W. 627 [quoted in Morris v. Grand Ave. R. Co., 144 Mo. 500, 46 S. W. 170], it was held that a married woman could not recover her medical expenses because the liability therefor was that of her husband and not her own. In Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 177 Pa. St. 1, 35 Atl. 191, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705 [quoted in Morris v. Grand Ave. R. Co., 144 Mo. 500, 46 S. W. 170], the court announced the double proposition that the plaintiff could neither recover for the value of the services of his family in nursing him, in the absence of express agreement on his part to remunerate them therefor, nor would he be allowed his claim for time lost if it could be shown that during the period he was prevented from attending to business on account of his injuries, he received his regular salary.

Charity hospital.— In Drinkwater v. Dinsmore, 80 N. Y. 390, 36 Am. Rep. 624, it was held that the defendant might show that the plaintiff was doctored at a charity hospital, or at the expense of the town or county gratuitously, and in such case the doctor's bill would not be an element of damage.

In an action by a minor, by his next friend, for personal injuries, it was error to allow the jury in estimating the damages to consider medical bills, it not being shown that the minor's estate was liable therefor. Bering Mfg. Co. v. Peterson, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 194, 67 S. W. 133. See also Newbury v. Getchel, etc., Lumber, etc., Co., 100 Iowa 441, 69 N. W. 743, 62 Am. St. Rep. 582. Where a child does not live with its parents, and they have not undertaken to pay any of the expenses resulting from an injury, and all reasonable inferences would show that the infant's estate is liable for the same, an instruction, in an action by such child by its next friend, is proper which authorizes a recovery "for expenses incurred in and about being healed, if any are shown by the evidence." Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Jernigan, 101 Ill. App. 1 [affirmed in 198 Ill. 297, 65 N. E. 88].

In case of a married woman where the expenses are not paid out of her private estate, and in the case of an infant under the control of its parents, the expenses for medical attention and assistance must be paid before the suit is brought, for the reason that such husband or parent is presumed to pay on his own behalf all necessary expenses and that he might recover them in a separate suit. all cases where expenses for medical attention are claimed, it must be clearly shown that such expenses are reasonable and necessary.[16] It is not the reasonable charge for medical services which the plaintiff may recover, but the expense to him of such services, not to exceed their reasonable value,[17] and in determining the reasonable value of services rendered all the circumstances under which such services were rendered should be taken into consideration.[18] In addition to expenses incurred for medical help and assistance in connection with the alleged injury, the party is further entitled to expenses incurred in the employment of assistance in his ordinary duties or business.[19]

J. Matters in Aggravation or Mitigation of Damages — 1. In General. In considering the question of compensation, there is a difference between a person inflicting an injury through negligence so slight that it almost approaches to an accident, and damage which is accompanied by insult. The courts have always recognized the difference between awarding damages with a sparing or a liberal hand,[20] and in all cases they have taken into consideration the particular circumstances of the case presented for adjudication.[21] The question of aggrava-

Distinction as to services.— In Robertson v. Wabash R. Co., 152 Mo. 382, 53 S. W. 1082 [citing Murray v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 101 Mo. 236, 13 S. W. 817, 20 Am. St. Rep. 601], the distinction was drawn between the services of a nurse and the services of a physician, the court holding that in the former case it might be presumed that jurors were familiar with the value of such services, while in the latter there could be no such presumption. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Marion, 104 Ind. 239, 3 N. E. 874, the plaintiff, having testified that the nurses who attended him while prostrate from the injury did so voluntarily and without charge, was nevertheless permitted, over objection, to prove by his attending physician what their services were worth. It was held that this evidence was admissible under the rulings in Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Dickerson, 59 Ind. 317; Indianapolis v. Gaston, 58 Ind. 224. So it was held in Copithorne v. Hardy, 173 Mass. 400, 53 N. Evidence of the price agreed upon to be paid for nursing an injured party is admissible, but the reasonable value of the services and not the contract price is the true measure of damages. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Short, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 58 S. W. 56.

18. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Short, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 58 S. W. 56. Plaintiff and his wife occupied berths in a sleeping-car. At five o'clock A. M. the train stopped at a water-tank a half mile from their destination. The porter and conductor of the sleeping-car awoke them suddenly, and told them they were at the depot. They were hurried off, partially dressed, and the train left them before they discovered where they were. The exposure resulted in injury to the wife's health. It was held that the husband was entitled to recover for time necessarily lost while attending his wife during her sickness, and might give evidence of the salary he was earning at the time. tion or mitigation of damages is evidently one of evidence and not of law. No general rule can be laid down for the reason that what might mitigate damages in one case would aggravate them in another.[22] Whether facts can be set up in mitigation of damages depends entirely upon the evidence produced in support thereof. As a general rule there must be some circumstances connected with the evidence that will impress the judge or jury that the defendant has not been entirely in fault,[23] and that some circumstance has entered into the case which renders the injury less serious than would ordinarily result from its infliction.[24]

Tyler v. Pomeroy, 8 Allen (Mass.) 480.

Illegal seizure of property.— Knowledge upon the part of the officer that property levied upon by him is exempt from execution may properly go in aggravation of damages. Lynd v. Picket, 7 Minn. 184, 82 Am. Dec. 79.

Joint ownership.— In an action on the case for causing water to flow back on plaintiff's land, injuring building materials thereon, he cannot prove, in aggravation of damages, injury to the building materials, if they belonged to him and another in partnership. Trimble v. Gilbert, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 218.

Malicious intention.— In an action for throwing poisoned barley upon the plaintiff's premises in order to poison his poultry, the jury is not confined in their verdict to the actual damages sustained, but may consider the malicious intention of the defendant. Sears v. Lyons, 2 Stark. 317, 20 Rev. Rep. 688, 3 E. C. L. 426.

Obstinacy of plaintiff.—Although the plaintiff, in an action for an injury done, really has a right of action against the defendant, the jury is entitled to look at all the circumstances of the case and at the conduct of both parties, and if they think that in going on with the action the plaintiff has acted in an obstinate and perverse manner they may take that into consideration when estimating the damages. Davis v. North-Western R. Co., 4 Jur. N. S. 1303, 7 Wkly. Rep. 105.

Plea of justification.— In Warwick v. Foulkes, 1 D. & L. 638, 8 Jur. 85, 13 L. J. Exch. 109, 12 M. & W. 507, which was an action for false imprisonment, the defendant, in addition to the general issue, pleaded a justification, on the ground that the plaintiff had committed a felony, for which the defendant had him taken in custody; but at the trial his counsel abandoned this latter plea, and exonerated the plaintiff from the imputation contained in it. It was held that the putting this plea on the record was a persisting in the original charge, and proper to be taken into consideration by the jury in estimating the amount of damages.

Galion v. Lauer, 55 Ohio St. 392, 45 N. E. 1044. Allegation of matter in mitigation of damages is not material. It requires no reply, and is not the subject of demurrer. Admission against malice.— An admission by plaintiff's counsel, on the trial of an action of trespass, that the defendant acted without malice, precludes the plaintiff from recovering vindictive damages, and therefore evidence on the part of the defendant in the nature of a justification of the act is admissible by way of mitigation of damages. Hoyt v. Gelston, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 141.

False representations.—Where plaintiff was induced to purchase bonds secured by a real-estate mortgage on the false representations of defendant that the title to the land was perfect, while in fact there was a prior mortgage thereon, it was not error to refuse to allow defendant to show, in mitigation of damages, that he had procured an assignment of the prior mortgage, and had tendered a discharge of it to plaintiff at the trial. Nash v. Minnesota Title Ins., etc., Co., 163 Mass. 574, 40 N. E. 1039, 47 Am. St. Rep. 489, 28 L. R. A. 753.

On the other hand it is not every circumstance of mitigation that can be introduced to reduce the damages claimed. The question is usually one of evidence, and each case must be determined upon its own peculiar merits.[25]

2. Joint Liability. Where there is a joint liability and part of the damages have been paid or accounted for, evidence of such payment or accounting can be introduced in mitigation of the whole demand.[26] Satisfaction by one joint tort-feasor is a bar to an action against another, and a partial satisfaction by one may be shown in mitigation of damages.[27]

Act done under license.— In an action for damages for diverting the course of a stream which ran through the plaintiff's land, the defendant may show in mitigation that the diversion was made on his own land, that it was a benefit rather than an injury to the plaintiff, and that it was done under a license from the plaintiff. Addison v. Hack, 2 Gill (Md.) 221, 41 Am. Dec. 421.

Injury to mortgaged property.— In a mortgagee's action against one who has injured the mortgaged property by a removal of fixtures, evidence that the mortgagee, after the alleged injury, and before the action was brought, under the power in his mortgage, sold the mortgaged premises for more than enough to pay his debt and all prior encumbrances is admissible in mitigation of damages. King v. Bangs, 120 Mass. 514.

Issuance of void execution.— In an action against a magistrate to recover damages for his wrongful act in issuing an execution which was invalid on its face, he may show in mitigation that the condition and circumstances of the judgment debtor were such that nothing could have been collected upon a valid execution. Noxon v. Hill, 2 Allen (Mass.) 215.

Transfer without consideration.— In an action against an agent to whom a note was given for collection, and who without authority and without consideration delivers it up to the maker, who is insolvent, such insolvency may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages. Andrews v. Pardee, 5 Day (Conn.) 29.

Trespass to real estate.— If the plaintiff has sold the standing trees upon the soil, this may be shown, in mitigation of damages, in an action of trespass for breaking the close against the purchasers of the trees; and his admission that he has sold them is evidence of the fact. Wallace v. Goodall, 18 N. H. 439.

Co., 60 Fed. 993, 9 C. C. A. 314. In an action by a husband and wife on account of injuries received by the latter in being forcibly prevented from entering her house, evidence that the husband some time before had obtained possession of the house fraudulently from one of defendants is inadmissible in mitigation of damages. Jacobs v. Hoover, 9 Minn. 204. In an action by a tenant against his landlord for an injury to the crop caused by trespassing animals, evidence that the tenant in dividing the residue had retained a portion to which the landlord was entitled is inadmissible in mitigation of damages. Frout v. Hardin, 56 Ind. 165, 26 Am. Rep. 18.

House of ill-fame.— In an action of trespass for demolishing certain dwelling-houses, it was held incompetent for the defendant to prove in mitigation of damages that they were occupied as houses of ill-fame. Johnson v. Farwell, 7 Me. 370, 22 Am. Dec. 203. So where defendant broke into the house of his tenant on Sunday, and carried away furniture to distrain for rent, the fact that the tenant had been found guilty of keeping the place as a disorderly house, and was at that time in jail, and was therefore not disturbed by defendant's entry would not reduce or mitigate the tenant's damage's for the trespass. Mayfield v. White, 1 Browne (Pa.) 241.

Improper attachment.— In a suit against a town for a failure of its constable to have property attached ready to meet execution, it is not competent for the town to show in mitigation of damages that the creditor may still by a new process or new judgment obtain satisfaction of his debt, for the creditor has the right to proceed against the specific property attached until his judgment and execution are satisfied. Bowman v. Barnard, 24 Vt. 355.

No proof of actual benefit.— In an action for damages against a railroad for killing an animal, the value of the dead animal cannot be shown in diminution of damages unless it appears that the owner derived an actual benefit therefrom. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Mustard, 34 Ind. 50.

27. Knapp v. Roche, 94 N. Y. 329. If a defendant neglects to avail himself of the non-joinder of one or more joint tenants in an action of tort, he cannot give it in evidence in reduction of damages. Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322, 64 Am. Dec. 551.

In trover against two for a joint conversion, the plaintiffs obtained judgment by default against one, and then withdrew their action against the other, upon receiving from him partial satisfaction for the wrong, and agreeing no further to prosecute him personally therefor. It was held that damages might be assessed against the defaulted defendant for the value of the goods converted, with interest from the time of conversion, deducting therefrom the amount received

3. For Breach of Contract. As a general rule one who has been injured by breach of contract may set up in mitigation of damages any loss that has resulted to him from such breach.[28] Especially is this so where the action is brought in a court of equity. A benefit derived by one party from a part performance of the contract will always be taken into consideration in estimating the damages for the breach.[29]

4. Return of Property After Conversion. Where property has been wrongfully taken and is returned before suit brought, the plaintiff will be considered to have received it in mitigation of damages, upon the principle that he has thereby received a partial recompense for the injury suffered.[30] The fact, however, that a party has received the whole or a portion of the converted property or the proceeds arising from its sale is not a bar to an action for the wrongful from his co-defendant by way of compromise, for his liability. Heyer v. Carr, 6 R. I. 45.

So in an action of trespass evidence of a sum received by the plaintiff in consideration of the release of a co-trespasser, which did not discharge the defendant, is admissible in mitigation of damages. Bloss v. Plymale, 3 W. Va. 393, 100 Am. Dec. 752.

Acceptance necessary.— In trover the right of action is complete when a conversion is shown; and no tender of the property after conversion, or mere agreement of the owner, without consideration, to receive it, will defeat the action or mitigate the damages. But if the owner accepts the property when tendered it may be shown in mitigation. Norman v. Rogers, 29 Ark. 365.

Notice of relinquishment of claim.— If in an action for the conversion of machinery in a workshop it does not appear that the defendant has ever appropriated the same to his own use, removed the same, or had the actual possession thereof, otherwise than by being in the rightful possession of the workshop, and the alleged conversion consists in the refusal to allow the plaintiff to remove the same upon demand, a subsequent notice to the plaintiff by the defendant that he has relinquished all claim to the machinery should be considered in mitigation of damages. Delano v. Curtis, 7 Allen (Mass.) 470.

Plaintiff not compelled to accept.— In an action for breach of contract the court cannot, unless so authorized by statute, compel the plaintiff to accept, in mitigation of damages, when tendered to him by the defendant in open court, property for the non-delivery of which the action was brought. Colby v. Reed, 99 U. S. 560, 25 L. ed. 484.

Time of return of property.— In an action of trover, after the testimony and argument of counsel have been heard by the jury, and before the judge has delivered his charge, it is too late for the defendant to tender the article which is the subject of the action in mitigation of damages. Tracey v. Good, 1 Pa. L. J. Rep. 472, 3 Pa. L. J. 135. See also Park v. McDaniels, 37 Vt. 594.

taking; but only evidence in mitigation of the entire damage sustained.[31] Where the conversion of property has been wilful or wrongful, or wilful refusal to surrender it on demand has been made,[32] or where property has suffered injury or deterioration in value,[33] the wrong-doer cannot compel the adverse party to accept the property, even in mitigation of damages.

5. Proceeds of Property Applied to Benefit of Owner. Where property has been converted or levied upon, and the proceeds applied to the payment of a party's debt, or otherwise to his use, such fact may be set up in mitigation of damages.[34]

6. Contributory Negligence. Contributory negligence may be considered in mitigation of damages.[35]

7. Payment of Salary and Expenses. The courts are not quite agreed as to whether a payment of salary or expenses in case of personal injury can be introduced in mitigation of damages. Some courts have held that such payment cannot be set up in mitigation of damages;[36] while others have laid down the doctrine that there could be no compensation in damages for injuries which have never been suffered.[37]

8. Insurance. The rule seems to be well established by the authorities that the fact of insurance cannot be set up in mitigation of damages,[38] whether

The tender by an officer of a part of the value of property sold under void process does not entitle him to a mitigation of damages. Clarke v. Hallock, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 607. In an action for the conversion of chattels to the defendant's use the measure of damages is not affected by the defendant's having after the conversion attached them on mesne process against the plaintiff and then discontinued that action and offered to restore them to the plaintiff who refused to receive them. Apportionment of negligence.—In Georgia Cent. R. Co. v. McKenney, 116 Ga. 13, 42 S. E. 229, it was held that if a passenger was not guilty of such negligence as would bar his recovery, and the carrier was negligent, the jury could apportion the damages, as they would apportion the amount of negligence each had been guilty of to reduce the amount of damages plaintiff would otherwise be entitled to recover.

Where the damages resulting from a trespass are aggravated or increased by the folly, wilful obstinacy, or gross carelessness of the injured person, such part of his loss as is directly attributable to his own fault cannot be recovered. Lord v. Carbon Iron Mfg. Co., 42 N. J. Eq. 157, 6 Atl. 812.

K. Duty to Prevent or Reduce Damages — 1. In General. Where an injured party finds that a wrong has been perpetrated on him, he should use all reasonable means to arrest the loss. He cannot stand idly by and permit the loss to increase, and then hold the wrong-doer liable for the loss which he might have prevented.[43] It is only incumbent upon him, however, to use reasonable exertion and reasonable expense,[44] and the question in such cases is always whether the act was a reasonable one, having regard to all the circumstances of the particular case.[45] The application of this rule sometimes has the effect of enhancing the damages rather than reducing them, but where a reasonable and bona fide attempt has been made on the part of the plaintiff to reduce the damages or provide for his own safety in case of personal injury, it does not relieve the defendant from a full recovery of the damages sustained.[46]

Exposure to weather.—In an action against a railroad company for injuries to plaintiff caused by exposure while waiting for the opening of defendant's depot, it is error to refuse to charge, on the facts of the case, that if plaintiff was informed that the depot would not be opened that night for the train on which she desired to take passage it was her duty to protect herself from the consequences of exposure to the inclement weather. Duty to sell live stock.— One whose beef cattle are driven from their feed yard by an overflow caused by the fault of another, while he must take such care of them that the loss will be as slight as possible, is not bound to put them on what he regards a poor market, although they be in a marketable condition. contract must make reasonable exertions to render the injury as light as possible; and he cannot recover for any loss which he might have avoided with ordinary care and reasonable expense.[47] This rule is especially applicable where one of the contracting parties has acquired notice of the breach of contract and makes no reasonable effort to mitigate the damages claimed.[48] If, however, a contract has been practically broken, the fact that the other party has from time to time made promises leading to a belief that it would be fulfilled will not prevent a full recovery, although the plaintiff may have taken no action to prevent the injury.[49]

A mechanic undertaking to make and deliver a crank to a steamer as soon as possible is only liable for the damages caused by her detention during the time actually necessary to obtain a suitable crank, after a reasonable period has elapsed for the performance of his agreement. Cable v. Leeds, 6 La. Ann. 293.

Easy sale assured.— In Halstead Lumber Co. v. Sutton, 46 Kan. 192, 26 Pac. 444, defendant contracted to deliver a certain kind of lumber to plaintiff. He failed to deliver it at the time agreed upon, but did deliver it later. Plaintiff refused to accept it, and returned it. Lumber of that sort was still very much in demand at plaintiff's place of business. It was held that it was plaintiff's duty to have reduced the damages by keeping the lumber and using it, and that he could only recover for the loss suffered by the delay.

Leaky barrels.— In an action on a note for the price of barrels furnished plaintiff's distillery, an instruction that if the barrels were leaking and defendant could not have transferred the contents without considerable loss to herself, then she was not bound to do so, but might still recover for the leakage, is properly refused, as a party cannot stand by and see his property go to waste, when, by reasonable exertion and expense, he might save it. b. Contract For Services. Where a contract for services has been broken, it is the duty of the plaintiff to use all reasonable effort to secure another contract if he can do so by ordinary means and the use of proper opportunity;[50] and the defendant may show in mitigation of damages that the plaintiff has obtained other employment.[51] It has been held that this rule does not require a party to accept employment of a different kind altogether from that in which he was originally engaged, but only to use reasonable diligence in securing other services of like nature.[52]

c. Covenant to Repair. The question as to the duty of a tenant to avoid the consequences of a breach of contract of covenant to repair depends upon the contract of covenant and the circumstances of the particular case; where the agreement on the part of the landlord is express, and the premises rented in considera-tain temperature. On the representation that it was ready for use defendant placed his meats therein, and so continued to keep them, on the continued promise of plaintiff that he would get the temperature down as agreed, until at the end of six weeks, when the system was abandoned and another put in. It was held in an action for the price that defendant might set off his damages from spoiled meat, caused by the high temperature, he having been induced to keep his meat in the refrigerator by the continued promises of plaintiff to bring the temperature down.

Loss of profits.— Where a person contracts to do a certain amount of work at a stipulated price, on materials to be furnished by his employer within a specified time, and is ready and willing to perform, but is prevented by the failure of the employer to furnish materials as promised, he cannot claim the amount of profits he would have had if the contract had been fully performed by both parties, he having been offered other employment of the same kind during such time. Heavilon v. Kramer, 31 Ind. 241. The rule that one who has been damaged by a breach of a contract should do all that reasonably lies within his power to protect himself from loss by seeking another contract of like character, the profits of which should be applied in mitigation of such damages, does not apply to a contract which is simply for the delivery of certain logs at a certain place, which might have been performed by the parties undertaking such delivery with their own teams and personal labor, or by any other means or agency to which they might have seen fit to intrust the performance of the same, when there is nothing in the contract to show that the execution of the same required all or any great portion of the time or personal attention of such parties or any of them. Sullivan v. McMillan, 37 Fla. 134, 19 So. 340, 56 Am. St. Rep. 239.

No personal performance.— The rule requiring a party, on a breach of contract of employment, to accept other employment, which shall be considered in mitigation of damages, does not apply to a building contractor, where the work under the contract was not to be performed by him personally, but by his employees under his superintendence. Profits — No reduction.— Where one who has contracted to do a specific piece of work at an agreed price is prevented from doing so by the wrongful act of the other party, the profit made by the contractor out of other jobs during the time he would have spent on the one in suit, had it been carried out, cannot be shown in mitigation of damages. Y.) 609, 4 Am. Dec. 758; Leatherberry v. Odell, 7 Fed. 641. In Strauss v. Meertief, 64 Ala. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 8, it was held that the principle involved in the text that a party wrongfully discharged must accept other employment of a similar nature in reduction of damages did not apply where a minor had been wrongfully discharged, and that the father should be allowed to take into consideration the habits and morals of the person to whom he subsequently apprenticed his son.

Special engagement.— Where a defendant employed the plaintiff to furnish a concert in a hall which defendant was to furnish, and on account of a snow-storm defendant concluded that plaintiff and his musicians would be unable to come, and failed to furnish the hall, it was held that plaintiff was not obliged, on finding that the hall was not fur-tion of such agreement, the tenant cannot be held liable, although the costs of preventing injury would have been comparatively small.[53]

3. INJURIES TO PROPERTY — a. In General. One whose property is endangered or injured by the negligence of another must exercise reasonable care to protect it from further injury;[54] and especially is this rule true where notice of the wrong or injury has been brought home to the party seeking to recover damages, and he has taken no steps to protect himself from further loss.[55] The rule only requires a party to protect himself from the injurious consequences of the wrong-

nished, to seek for other employment for his musicians. Hathaway v. Sabin, 63 Vt. 527, 22 Atl. 633.

Heaney v. Heeney, 2 Den. (N. Y.) 625.

Unlawful excavation.— A party is entitled to recover for special injury to the use and occupation of premises caused by the unlawful excavation and removal of soil only the damages accruing for such length of time as will afford him a reasonable opportunity to stop the excavation. Karst v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 22 Minn. 118.

Where defendant obstructed plaintiff's drain, and plaintiff could have indemnified himself for twenty-five dollars, but by delaying to repair, the damages amounted to one hundred dollars, plaintiff could recover only twenty-five dollars, as he should have protected himself. Lloyd v. Lloyd, 60 Vt. 288, 13 Atl. 638.

Where plaintiff's horses were unlawfully seized at a time when plaintiff could not procure other means of cultivating his crop, and thereby it was damaged in excess of the value of the use of the horses, the damage to the crop was the proper measure; but if plaintiff could have procured other horses the measure of recovery would be the value of the use or hire of the horses during the time he was deprived of them. Steel v. Metcalf, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 313, 23 S. W. 474.

55. A lessee, in an action against one who has laid gas-pipes in neighboring streets so imperfectly that gas escapes therefrom through the ground and into the water of a well upon premises hired and used by him for a livery stable, and therefore renders it unfit for use, and makes the enjoyment of his estate less beneficial, may recover for the inconvenience to which he has thereby been subjected, and expenses incurred in reasonable and proper attempts to exclude the gas from the well, but not for injury caused by allowing his horses to drink the water after he knew that it was corrupted by the gas. Sherman v. Fall River Iron Works Co., 2 Allen (Mass.) 524, 79 Am. Dec. 799.

Notice of fraud.— Where an action was brought to recover the value of certain horses alleged to have died from eating corn mixed with arsenic, which the plaintiff bought from the defendant, it was held that notwithstanding the defendant had fraudulently concealed from the plaintiff the fact that arsenic was so mixed with the corn, yet, if the plaintiff was informed of the fact before he gave it to his horses he could only recover damages to the value of the corn. Stafford v. Newsom, 31 N. C. 507.

Where plaintiffs knew of the infringement of a trade-mark, but took no steps to arrest it, damages will only be given for such sales as took place after the commencement of the action. Enoch Morgan's Sons' Co. v. Troxell, 57 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 121.

ful act by the exercise of ordinary effort and care and moderate expense;[56] such rule has no application where the injury could only be prevented by extraordinary effort or cost.[57]

b. Defective Construction. Where a party seeks to recover damages caused by defective construction of property, it is his duty to use reasonable efforts to protect himself therefrom, and he can only recover for such expenses as he could not have avoided by the exercise of reasonable diligence.[58]

4. Personal Injuries — a. In General. One who has been injured by the negligence of another must use ordinary diligence to effect a cure, and there can be no recovery for damages that might have been avoided by the exercise of such care.[59]

Civ. App. 1893) 21 S. W. 1013; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Borsky, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 545, 21 S. W. 1011. One whose animals have been killed by a railroad train through the fault of the company, and who does not discover their bodies until swollen, is not bound to use dilligence to dispose of the same in order to entitle him to recover their full value. Rockford, etc., R. Co. v. Lynch, 67 Ill. 149.

In an action for inducing the plaintiff, by means of false and fraudulent representations, to purchase for value corporate shares which the defendant knew to be worthless, the proper measure of damages is the difference in value of the stock as the condition of the company issuing it really was and as the purchaser was fraudulently induced to believe it was. The market price of the stock about the time of or soon after the purchase is strong evidence of its value, and in the absence of other proof will control. But where the real pecuniary condition of the company is shown, from which it appears that the stock was worthless, such market price is entitled to no weight upon the question of value. The purchaser, after discovery of its worthlessness, is not bound to mitigate the loss of him by whose fraud he was induced to purchase, by himself cheating some ignorant purchaser. Hubbell v. Meigs, 50 N. Y. 480.

Speculation.— On a reference to ascertain the damages caused by an injunction against the sale of an option on real estate, evidence that defendant by a further speculation with regard to the realty might have reduced his loss is properly excluded. Extraordinary care.— An owner of growing crops destroyed or injured by a railway company's failure to maintain proper cattle-guards as required by Iowa Laws (1862), c. 169, § 3, is not bound to the exercise of extraordinary care to save his crops, even though that might have been successful. Neglect not pleaded.— Evidence of the negligence of one injured to attend to his injuries, whereby they were aggravated, may be introduced by defendant in mitigation of damages, although such neglect was not pleaded. Waxahachie v. Connor, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 35 S. W. 692.

Personal injuries increased by failure to follow advice of physician.— In an action for personal injuries, where it appears that plaintiff employed a reputable physician to care for the injuries, defendant is not liable for any aggravation of the injuries caused by negligence of plaintiff in failing to follow

Only ordinary care is required;[60] and where there has been no neglect on the part of the injured party, and his injuries were more serious, or resulted more seriously than it was at first supposed they would, there can be a full recovery for the entire result.[61]

b. Duty to Summon Medical Aid. While it is the duty of an injured party to summon medical aid and attention, yet the fact that such course was not adopted will not defeat a recovery where there are no circumstances to indicate their absolute necessity.[62]

c. Unskilful Treatment by Physician. Where a party has used reasonable care in selecting a physician or surgeon, but owing to unskilful treatment the injury has been increased, the party causing the original injury will be held liable in damages for the latter.[63]

A party injured cannot be held guilty of contributory negligence for having returned to work and used the injured limb before complete recovery, in the absence of bad faith, and from mere ignorance. Toledo Electric St. R. Co. v. Tucker, 13 Ohio Cir. Ct. 411, 7 Ohio Cir. Dec. 169. So where one whose hand was injured by the negligence of defendant employed at the time a physician or surgeon competent to treat an injury of that kind, and obeyed his instructions, and was not negligent on his part in treating the wound, which progressed from causes beyond the control of the surgeon until the arm had to be amputated he is entitled to recover for the loss of his arm. Radman v. Haberstro, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 605, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 561. In Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Hulsey, 132 Ala. 444, 31 So. 527, where plaintiff in an action for damages resulting from a broken leg became afflicted with nausea before he was able to sit up, and upon turning partially over in bed to avoid vomiting on the bed, rebroke the leg, it was held that the accident causing the original fracture was the proximate cause of the rebreakage.

62. The fact that plaintiff delayed for some time in calling a physician and treated her injury herself is not conclusive of negligence on her part, although the injury was one which required prompt surgical treatment, where there was nothing to indicate that fact to a person of average experience. Galesburg v. Rahn, 45 Ill. App. 351.

Illustrations.—An injured person, who from the circumstances might reasonably believe that his injury is of such a character that rest alone will afford a speedy recovery, is not required to incur the expense of nursing and medical attendance, as a condition to his right to recover adequate damages, if any, against the wrong-doer. Kennedy v. Busse, 60 Ill. App. 440. So where a pregnant woman fell by reason of a hole in the floor in defendant's station, it was not negligence on her part to fail to send for a physician at the time, the injury not creating an apprehension of immediate danger to her life or health. Liberty of choice.— One who has been hurt by the negligence of another is not bound in law to undergo a serious and critical surgical operation which would necessarily be attended with some risk of failure and of death, but must be permitted to exercise the liberty of choice in the matter, and his refusal to submit to the operation, although under the evidence it would probably lessen the effects of the injury, cannot be considered in mitigation of damages recoverable therefor. 5. Expenses Incurred in Reducing Damages. As a general rule a party is entitled to all legitimate expenses that he may show to have been incurred by him in an honest endeavor to reduce the damages flowing from or following the wrongful act.[64] This rule applies equally to actions ex delicto and actions ex contractu.[65] Thus a party may recover expenses legitimately incurred in attempting to prevent loss and injury to property,[66] or expenses incurred in following up property which has been wrongfully taken.[67] So in actions for personal injuries or injuries to live stock a party is entitled to recover time or expenses incurred in effecting a cure.[68]

L. Costs and Expenses of Litigation — 1. In General. As a general rule the expenses of litigation incurred in the prosecution of the suit are not ordinarily recoverable as damages.[69] In cases of civil injury or breach of contract, in which there is no fraud, wilful negligence, or malice, the courts have considered that an award of the costs in the action is sufficient to cover the expenses of litigation and make no allowance for time, indirect loss, and annoyance.[70]

2. Fraud or Wilful Wrong. In case of fraud, wilful wrong, or gross negligence, the courts have sometimes allowed the expenses of the suit to be taken into consideration in estimating the damages.[71]

Appeal.— The grantor in a deed of trust executed to secure a debt is not responsible for the damages or costs which the grantee was compelled to pay on account of the prosecution of an appeal from a judgment in favor of creditors of the grantor's husband subjecting the property conveyed, where she did not request that the appeal be prosecuted. Expenses unnecessary.— Where the expenses should not have been incurred, such expenses have been denied by the courts. Holmes v. Balcom, 84 Me. 226, 24 Atl. 821.

Loss of time.— The damages recoverable in an action cannot include an allowance to plaintiff for loss of time in bringing it. Blackwell v. Acton, 38 Ind. 425. So in an action against a corporation for refusal to allow plaintiff to inspect its stock-book, the value of plaintiff's time in attempting to secure the right to inspect the stock-book of defendant corporation, and sums paid to his attorney therefor, are not recoverable as actual damages. Boardman v. Marshalltown Grocery Co., 105 Iowa 445, 75 N. W. 343.

Malicious prosecution.— In an action for malicious prosecution the jury are not at liberty in assessing damages to estimate the traveling expenses and loss of time of defendant in preparing his defense and in attending court. 3. Attorney's Fees — a. In General. Upon the same principle as heretofore stated the courts will not as a general rule allow attorney's fees to be recovered as part of the damages in an action,[72] unless the wrong or injury complained of jury, only because the law furnishes no definite rule of damages in such a case, in consequence of which the jury is at liberty, in the exercise of its discretion, to consider such a known and actual incident of the injury, although not its natural consequence.

Actions for fraud.— Where a party is obliged to bring suit to relieve himself from the consequences of another's fraud, he may recover his attorney's fees as special damages (Flack v. Neill, 22 Tex. 253; Bracken v. Neill, 15 Tex. 1097); but where a defendant in an action on contract pleads fraud as a defense thereto he is not entitled to recover attorney's fees as special damages (Flack v. Neill, 22 Tex. 253).

Damages for an injury from a defect in a highway should be compensatory merely unless the jury should find gross negligence on the part of the town, in which case they may increase the amount by considering the expenses of the plaintiff's suit, not including the taxable costs. Wilson v. Granby, 47 Conn. 59, 36 Am. Rep. 51; Beecher v. Derby Bridge, etc., Co., 24 Conn. 491.

Fraudulent dispossession.—The trouble and expense to which plaintiff is subjected in establishing his title to property, of which defendant has attempted fraudulently to dispossess him, form a good ground for estimating the damages. Copley v. Berry, 12 Rob. (La.) 79.

In an action for the value of property irregularly sold on execution, plaintiff is entitled to recover not only the amount for which the property sold, but also the costs of summoning witnesses to prove its value. Zent v. Smith, 83 Ind. 442. See also White v. Givens, 29 La. Ann. 571.

In an action on the case for obstructing a highway, whereby plaintiff was injured, the jury in estimating damages can take into consideration the necessary trouble and expenses of plaintiff in the prosecution of the action. Linsley v. Bushnell, 15 Conn. 225, 38 Am. Dec. 79.

In a suit for damages on account of a trespass, the trouble and expense the plaintiff has been illegally put to are to be considered in estimating the damages. Attorney's fees are a part of such expense. Cooper v. Cappel, 29 La. Ann. 213.

Referee's fees.— Where a reference is ordered, under N. Y. Code, § 222, to ascertain damages upon an undertaking given on the granting of an injunction, the referee's fees are a part of the damages, and are recoverable as such. Lawton v. Green, 64 N. Y. 326. So under a contract to submit a question to the decision of a referee pendente lite, and then, if the decision is adverse to plaintiff, the suit is to be dismissed, the damages for plaintiff's breach of the contract will properly include expenses incurred in resisting further prosecution of the case, a reasonable counsel fee, and the necessary attendant expenses. Scott v. Reedy, 5 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 388, 5 Am. L. Rec. 367, 1 Cinc. L. Bul. 331.

Recovery by statute.— Plaintiff purchased a horse from defendant, who warranted it to be sound. Afterward the horse was returned, plaintiff taking another in exchange, and this was also returned as worthless. Defendant kept both horses and refused to return the purchase-money. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to recover his counsel fees under Ga. Code, § 2942, providing that they may be recovered where defendant has acted in bad faith. is connected with some circumstance of aggravation or malice,[73] but even in such cases the courts are very loathe to depart from the well established rule, and when only compensatory damages are sought counsel fees will usually be denied as an element of damages.[74]

b. Actions of Contract. It seems that expenses of litigation and attorney's fees will never be allowed in case of the breach of a simple contract.[75]

c. Actions of Tort. The courts have been far from uniform in their decisions in allowing expenses and attorney's fees in cases of tort.[76] Thus in actions of trover,[77] trespass,[78] and deceit[79] the right of recovery has been denied; while in the same or other cases involving no more injury or loss the right of recovery has been affirmed.[80] The ruling principle which usually guides the courts in this regard is the distinction drawn as to the malice or negligence of the act com-

73. If a lessor breaks a covenant for quiet enjoyment by suing lessee to recover possession, lessee's costs and counsel fees are properly allowed as damages in an action for a breach. Levitzky v. Canning, 33 Cal. 299. Where a landlord's refusal to deliver either the check or the baggage is capricious, or puts the guest to unnecessary expense, the latter may recover attorney's fees as part of his damages. Fraudulent compromise.— One who has compromised a judgment obtained against him through the fraud of another is entitled to recover from such person as damages the counsel fees paid in effecting the compromise. Hynes v. Patterson, 95 N. Y. 1.

Spoliation of will.— In an action by the devisees and legatees under a will against one for the spoliation of such will, after the death of the testator, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the attorney's fees reasonably expended in having said will admitted to probate. Taylor v. Bennett, 1 Ohio Cir. Ct. 95.

Under Cal. Civ. Code, § 3336, providing that the damages recoverable for wrongful conversion shall include "a fair compensation for the time and money properly expended in pursuit of the property," reasonable attorney's fees properly expended by one in recovering a large part of a sum of money, obtained from him through the fraud of another's agent, for which the principal is liable, are recoverable as an element of compensatory damages in an action against the principal. 77. Trover.— In trover the jury are not at liberty to give additional damages in consideration of plaintiff's trouble and expenses incurred in the prosecution of his suit. Hurd v. Hubbell, 26 Conn. 389. So where defendant paid a note which plaintiff had given for his accommodation, and then attempted to hold it against plaintiff as a valid obligation, it was held that the plaintiff could recover the note in trover, together with the actual damages sustained by him; but he was not entitled to recover the expenses of the suit beyond taxable costs. Park v. McDaniels, 37 Vt. 594.

78. Trespass.— In an action of trespass, where it does not appear that the injury was wanton or malicious, the expenses of the plaintiff in the prosecution of his suit cannot be included in the damages. Dibble v. Morris, 26 Conn. 416; St. Peter's Church v. Beach, 26 Conn. 355. See also Fairbanks v. Witter, 18 Wis. 287, 76 Am. Dec. 765. Compare Cooper v. Cappel, 29 La. Ann. 213. In estimating damages in an action for trespass committed by breaking into plaintiff's rooms and destroying property, plaintiff's attorney's fees and other expenses of litigation cannot be included. Falk v. Waterman, 49 Cal. 224.

79. Deceit.— In an action for deceit, where there was no evidence that defendant had been stubbornly litigious, or had caused plaintiff unnecessary trouble or expense, it was error to charge that plaintiff might be allowed damages for unnecessary trouble and expense put on him by defendant's stubborn litigation. Smith v. Dudley, 69 Ga. 78. See also Warren v. Cole, 15 Mich. 265.

80. Attorney's fees and expenses incurred in good faith by a bank in saving itself from loss occasioned by the fraud of a party who obtained from it a draft, and then caused the same to be cashed, are compensatory and not exemplary, and may be re-

plained of, and upon that ground alone can be predicated the lack of harmony that seems to exist between the various decisions.[81]

4. Expenses of Prior Litigation — a. In General. As far as the recovery of the expenses of prior actions are concerned, as a general rule there can be no recovery, unless there is shown some mitigating circumstances which warrant the institution of the suit, or the defense thereof.[82] The allowance of expenses in such cases depends entirely upon the circumstances of the case as presented to the court. Where the prevailing party has acted bona fide in his action or defense his expenses formerly incurred will be allowed.[83] In order to be entitled to

Death of juror.— Where it appeared in an action of assault and battery that there had been a former trial of the cause, and by reason of the death of one of the jurors no verdict was rendered, it was held that the jury might properly take into consideration the expenses of a prior suit by way of damages, they must be the natural and reasonable consequence of the wrong or injury complained of.[84]

b. Prior Litigation Unnecessary. Where the prior litigation was unnecessary, there can be no recovery for expenses therein.[85]

c. In Case of Exemplary Damages. There is a decided conflict of authority as to whether expenses and attorney's fees can be awarded in those cases in which exemplary damages are given by the jury. In Alabama, Connecticut, Kansas, Mississippi, and Ohio such practice is allowed.[86] The better rule on this subject, however, seems to be that such expenses and fees are no more allowable where exemplary damages are given than in ordinary cases.[87]

the amount due is not susceptible of ascertainment by computation or by reference to market values.[89] The old common-law rule which required that a demand should be liquidated or its amount in some way ascertained before interest could be allowed has been modified to some extent, however, by general consent,[90] and under the latter-day decisions, even though the amount of damages be unliquidated, yet if it can be ascertained by computation and reference to established market values, interest may be recoverable thereon.[91] faith[94] will not warrant a recovery of interest by way of damages;[95] but where the delay has been unreasonable and vexatious such interest may be recovered.[96]

4. In Actions For Breach of Contract. The decisions are very conflicting as to the allowance of interest by way of damages in case of breach of contract, unless the rate or amount is fixed in the contract itself.[97] The allowance of interest in such cases was formerly a question somewhat within the discretion of the jury;[98] but it is now considered more a question of law for the court.[99] The better rule on this subject seems to be that such interest as damages will be allowed, especially where the damages are capable of being definitely ascertained.[1]

No. 8,280, 1 Brock. 212, it was held that the question whether a jury should allow interest must depend upon the circumstances of the case, of which they are the proper judges, and it is competent for the defendant to give in evidence to the jury any circumstances tending to show that interest should not be allowed. A purchaser who has paid in advance, and recovers damages for non-delivery, cannot recover interest on his advances, he affirming the contract. Dobenspeck v. Armel, 11 Ind. 31. negligence.[5] On the other hand some of the courts have allowed interest, so far as actions ex delicto in general are concerned, where the amount of the damages inflicted are capable of being ascertained with any degree of certainty.[6] The better rule on this subject seems to be that while the jury should not be allowed to award interest as damages eo nomine in actions sounding in tort,[7] yet they may take into consideration the length of time that has elapsed since the injury complained of,[8] and in some cases may exercise their own discretion in rendering the verdict.[9]

b. For Personal Injuries. As a general rule in an action for personal injuries interest cannot be allowed on the amount of damages recovered, prior to the judgment.[10] Only special damages which may be computed from evidence of actual values can be thus increased.[11]

7. Discretion of Jury. Interest as damages in a great number of cases is left to the discretion of the jury under all the circumstances of the particular case.[16] In some cases, however, interest by way of damages is a matter of law and in such cases the court may instruct the jury on this point.[17]

VIII. Liquidated Damages and Penalties.

A. In General. Before the passage of 8 & 9 Wm. III, in an action of debt on an agreement, performance of which was secured by a penalty, the recovery was for the entire penalty. Relief was solely in equity, and originally was only the total sum at two hundred and seventy-seven and forty-one one-hundredths dollars. It was held that it would be presumed that the excess of the total sum over the damages found was added by the jury as interest, which addition the jury may make in an action of tort, no exemplary damages having been found, and the amount added not increasing the damages so much as to be clearly unjust. By statute.— In an action for damages to property caused by negligence, the giving or withholding of interest is by S. D. Comp. Where plaintiff is not entitled to damages by way of interest as matter of law, yet if the jury in the case could in their discretion allow interest, and the court is satisfied on inspection that they should have allowed it, the judgment will be affirmed, notwithstanding the judge at the trial instructed the jury to allow interest as a matter of law. granted in cases of fraud, extremity, or accident.[18] The effect of this statute was to put actions for the recovery of penalties for default in the performance of agreements upon the same basis as actions directly upon the agreement to recover damages, with respect to the quantum of recovery; in other words, to provide substantially the same measure of relief in an action at law as the defendant might have obtained in a court of equity.[19] There are two excellent rules given for inferring that the parties intended the sum as liquidated damages: (1) Where the damages are uncertain, and not capable of being ascertained by any satisfactory and known rule, whether the uncertainty lies in the nature of the subject itself, or in the particular circumstances of the case; or (2) where from the nature of the case and the tenor of the agreement, it is apparent that the damages have already been the subject of actual and fair calculation and adjustment between the parties.[20]

B. Intention of the Parties. As to whether a sum agreed to be paid as damages for the violation of an agreement shall be considered as liquidated damages or only as a penalty is held to depend upon the meaning and intent of the parties as gathered from a full view of the provisions of the contract, the terms used to express the intent, and the peculiar circumstances of the subject-matter of the agreement.[21] The contract is to govern; and the true question is, What was the contract? Whether it was folly or wisdom for the contracting parties thus to bind themselves is of no consequence if the intention is clear. If there be no fraud, circumvention, or illegality in the case the court is bound to enforce the agreement.[22] In order to determine whether the sum named in a contract as a forfeiture for non-compliance is intended as a penalty or as liquidated damages, it is necessary to look at the whole contract, its subject-matter, the ease or difficulty in measuring the breach in damages and the magnitude of the stipulated sum, not only as compared with the value of the subject of the contract, but in proportion to the probable consequence of the breach.[23]

In an action for false imprisonment the recovery of interest on money paid to procure a release is a question of fact for the jury, and where allowed is part of the damages and not strictly interest; so that a direction by the court that interest be added is error. It has been well said in a leading case that "where unliquidated damages are claimed, whether by the plaintiff, as his cause of action, or by the defendant, in reduction of the verdict, it is very difficult to apply a rule that will do full justice to the parties; the most that courts can accomplish is to approximate that result, with the limited and imperfect aids that the parties may furnish. As a general proposition, one who has so suffered, is entitled to be placed as nearly as money can do it, in the same plight as if the contract had been faithfully executed. But there are many transactions in which this is wholly impracticable, because of the impossibility of determining, after the occurrence, what might have happened under a different state of things." Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 314, 332, 71 Am. Dec. 635.

Construed according to justice.—Where the word "penal" or "penalty" is used in a contract it must be construed as being so intended by the parties, but where a sum named is called "liquidated damages" it will be held as a penalty, if it seems from the contract that it was so intended by the parties, and the justice of the case requires such a construction. White v. Arleth, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 17,536, 1 Bond 319.

In an action to recover advanced payments for tuition of plaintiff's son, who had been expelled from defendant's school, the evidence showed that it was the understanding of the parties that in case of expulsion of the pupil for misconduct advanced payments should be liquidated damages and not recoverable. The rules of the school provided that there would be no reduction in case of withdrawals, and for the forfeiture of all payments in case of expulsion. It was held that plaintiff could not recover. Where an agreement grants the privilege of taking clay from land for a certain number of years, for which the grantees are to pay a certain amount per ton and a definite sum at the end of every six months, whether or not they have taken away enough clay to amount to that sum, the latter payments are liquidated damages, since it is the sum stipulated to be paid for the privilege and does not depend on the exercise of such privilege. Proof of extrinsic facts.— In determining whether a penalty or liquidated damages is intended by a provision for the forfeiture of a certain sum, upon failure to perform a contract, the actual intention of the parties in view of the whole subject-matter is chiefly to be looked to; and if this is doubtful upon the face of the instrument the writing may be aided and the real intention ascertained by proof of extrinsic facts. Shute v. Hamilton, 3 Daly (N. Y.) 462. In Sainter v. Ferguson, 7 C. B. 716, 728, 13 Jur. 828, 18 L. J. C. P. 217, 62 E. C. L. 716 [quoted in Whitfield v. Levy, 35 N. J. L. 149], Coltman, J., says: "Although the word 'penalty,' which would prima facie, exclude the notion of stipulated damages, is used here, yet we must look at the nature of the agreement, and the surrounding circumstances, to see whether the parties intended the sum mentioned to be a penalty or stipulated damages. Considering the nature of this agreement, and the difficulty the plaintiff would be under in showing what specific damage he has sustained from the defendant's breach of it, I think we can the intention of the parties is fairly to be gathered from the instrument.[24] The name given by parties will not have a controlling effect, if their intention appears otherwise, from the consideration of the whole agreement.[25] The use of the word "penalty" in connection with the sum named is not decisive on the point;[26] reasonably construe it to be a contract for stipulated and ascertained damages."

24. Smith v. Bergengren, 153 Mass. 236, 26 N. E. 690, 15 L. R. A. 768; St. Albans v. Ellis, 16 East 352. In Jaquith v. Hudson, 5 Mich. 123, 138, the court said: "In this class of cases, where the law permits the parties to ascertain and fix the amount of damages in the contract, the first inquiry obviously is, whether they have done so in fact? And here, the intention of the parties is the governing consideration; and in ascertaining this intention, no merely technical effect will be given to the particular words relating to the sum, but the entire contract, the subject matter, and often the situation of the parties with respect to each other and to the subject matter, will be considered." In an action on a contract binding the parties "in a penal sum as fixed damages" for failure to perform, it was held that actual damages as shown by the evidence could alone be recovered. "Fine" equivalent to "penalty."— The defendant at the time of purchasing from the plaintiff certain village lots entered into a written agreement not to sell upon said lots any kind of spirituous liquors in quantities less than a half barrel, and that in case he did so he should be "liable to pay the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, in the first case a fine of ten dollars, in the second case a fine of twenty dollars, and for every further case the sum of fifty dollars;" and by a further clause he promised to "pay the said punishment" for non-performance of his covenant. It was held that the sums named must be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages, the word "fine" being equivalent to "penalty." Laubenheimer v. Mann, 19 Wis. 519.

Remedy double.— A penal obligation being secondary to a primary one, the performance of which it is intended to assure, the creditor cannot, except in two contingencies, avail himself of the double remedy in the event of the debtor's failure to fulfil the primary obligation to accept the subsequent performance of that and exact the penalty at one and the same time; and those two contingencies are: First, when the penalty is expressly stipulated for the mere delay; and, second, when by a special stipulation the penalty may be exacted if the principal obligation is not executed. Barrow v. Bloom, 18 La. Ann. 276.

nor is the use of the words "liquidated damages" conclusive.[27] In determining whether an amount named in a contract is to be taken as penalty or liquidated damages courts are influenced largely by the reasonableness of the transaction, and are not restrained by the form of the agreement nor by the terms used by the parties, nor even by their manifest intent.[28] If the instrument provide that a larger sum shall be paid, on the failure of the party to pay a less sum, the larger sum is a penalty.[29] So where the agreement imposes several distinct duties or obligations of different degrees of importance, and the same sum is named as damages for a breach of either indifferently, the sum is to be regarded as a penalty.[30] Where the agreement is made for the attainment of another object or purpose, to which the stipulated sum is wholly collateral, such sum will be treated as a penalty.[31] Where the damages are capable of being known and estimated, the sum fixed upon as damages will be treated as a penalty, although declared to be intended as liquidated damages.[32] Where the parties have agreed on the amount of damages, ascertained by fair calculation and adjustment, and have

D. Rule of Construction in Doubtful Cases. It is the tendency and preference of the law to regard a sum stated to be payable if a contract is not fulfilled as a penalty and not as liquidated damages; for by treating such sum as a penalty, the recovery can be apportioned to the actual damages or loss actually sustained.[36] If it is called a penalty it will be held to be such, unless that construction is overcome by very clear evidence of an intention to the contrary, derived from other parts of the agreement.[37]

E. Damages Capable of Being Ascertained — 1. In General. Whatever the nature of the contract or the terms in which it has been expressed, the courts will as a rule construe the damages as a penalty, where they are capable of being accurately ascertained.[38]

Double designation.— Where one is employed as a superintendent of a factory by a written contract which is to run for ten years, and the parties bind themselves to performance in a certain sum as liquidated damages, and in an earlier arrangement of a similar kind the parties have called the sum both a penalty and liquidated damages, the amount so stipulated will be regarded as a penalty. Ex p. Pollard, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,252, 2 Lowell 411.

No recovery beyond stipulated sum.— In an action to recover money deposited with defendant, where the answer alleges that the deposit was made as a forfeit or liquidated damages to secure the performance of a contract by plaintiff, defendant is not entitled to introduce evidence showing damage from the breach of contract in addition to the liquidated damages agreed on. There was a stipulation in the contract that "whosoever of the two contracting parties breaks this contract without sufficient cause, and which is contained in said contract, has to pay to the other party the sum of five hundred dollars in cash." It was held that the sum thus stipulated to be paid should be construed to be a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. Hammer v. Breidenbach, 31 Mo. 49.

The general disposition of courts in this country is to regard the sum expressed in a bond as a penalty or security for the performance of the condition and not as liquidated damages, in cases where the parties have not expressly declared it to be certainly the one or the other. Therefore, if the agreement assumes the form of a bond, with condition that it shall be void upon the performance or non-performance of an act, the prima facie presumption is that the sum of money mentioned therein is intended merely as a security, and not as liquidated damages; and this presumption will stand until controlled by very strong considerations. 2. Provisions of Agreement Partially Capable of Determination. Where damages for breach of some of the covenants of an agreement can be readily ascertained, yet there are others where the loss would be difficult to estimate, the damages will usually be construed as a penalty and not as liquidated.[39]

F. Actual Damages in Proportion to Sum Claimed — 1. In General. While parties are allowed to fix their own measure of damages in certain cases so far as they are deemed reasonable,[40] yet the amount of damages claimed must be proportionate to the breach alleged.[41]

See 15 Cent. Dig. tit. "Damages," § 154 et seq.; and cases cited supra, note 32.

No division of provisions.—Where the damages resulting from not complying with part of the stipulations of a contract — as here, to convey land — are capable of being measured, the sum fixed upon will be treated as a penalty. The sum named cannot be regarded as a penalty as to part of the provisions and as liquidated damages as to the other part. State v. Dodd, 45 N. J. L. 525.

Where a man agreed to do three things of different degrees of importance, or pay two thousand five hundred dollars as stipulated damages, and the breach assigned was omitting to do one of the things, the value of which was readily ascertainable, and was less than the sum specified as damages, the stipulation was held to be a penalty. Thoroughgood v. Walker, 47 N. C. 15.

Where a note referred to in a contract is to be paid on breach of such contract by defendant, and the contract contains several covenants to be performed by defendant, some of more, and some of less, importance than others, and the actual amount of damages which plaintiff would sustain by a breach of some of the covenants would be easily ascertained, the sum mentioned in the note is not liquidated damages, but in the nature of a penalty. The recital in a contract that in consequence of the difficulty of ascertaining the injury which would result from a nonperformance the parties agree upon a sum as stipulated damages is no evidence of the difficulty, etc.; yet since it shows that the parties intended to liquidate the damages by contract, if the sum agreed is a reasonable compensation, it is proper that the intention of the parties should be given effect. Watt v. Sheppard, 2 Ala. 425.

No more than compensation.— When parties to a contract stipulate that in case of a violation thereof the party making default shall pay to the other a stipulated sum, the sum so fixed will be taken as the innocent party's measure of damages only when it appears that to do so will no more than compensate his losses. Lord Eldon, in delivering the judgment of the court in Astley v. Weldon, 2 B. & P. 346,

2. Damages Disproportionate to Covenants. Where the damages provided for in the agreement are disproportionate to the several covenants therein provided, in some cases being grossly excessive and in others entirely inadequate, they will be construed as a penalty rather than as liquidated.[42]

G. Uncertainty as to Amount of Damages. Where the damages are uncertain in their nature, difficult to ascertain or impossible to be estimated with certainty, by reference to any pecuniary standard, and where the parties themselves are more intimately acquainted with all the peculiar circumstances, and are therefore better able to compute the actual or probable damages,[43] it has been the 5 Rev. Rep. 618 [quoted in Morse v. Rathburn, 42 Mo. 594, 97 Am. Dec. 359], said that he had felt much embarrassment in ascertaining the principle of the decisions, and that "this appeared to him the clearest principle: that where a doubt is stated, whether the sum inserted be intended as a penalty or not, if a certain damage less than that sum is made payable upon the face of the same instrument in case the act intended to be prohibited be done, that sum shall be construed to be a penalty, though the mere fact of the sum being apparently enormous and excessive would not prevent it from being considered as liquidated damages." He added further: "Prima facie, this certainly is contract, and not penalty, but we must look to the whole instrument;" and it was held a penalty.

In terrorem.— Where a contract provides for a forfeiture of a sum so great that it is apparent that the provision was inserted in terrorem, it will be treated as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. Bradstreet v. Baker, 14 R. I. 546.

No decision necessary.— In Georgia Land, etc., Co. v. Flint, 35 Ga. 226, it was held that where the actual damage proved was equal to the sum awarded in an action for breach of contract, it became unnecessary to determine whether the condition of the contract was in fact stipulated damages or a penalty.

Sum above market value.— Where an aggregate sum was agreed to be paid in the event of the non-return of certain state bonds received on loan, and such aggregate sum was greatly above the market value of the bonds, it was regarded as a penalty. Baird v. Tolliver, 6 Humphr. (Tenn.) 186, 44 Am. Dec. 298.

Violation of rule of compensation.— In Doane v. Chicago City R. Co., 51 Ill. App. 353, it was held that where the amount stipulated in a bond is such that it violates the fundamental rule of compensation, it will be treated as a penalty, without reference to the name given it by the parties.

H. Delay in Performance — 1. In General. Where a party has defaulted in the performance of some contract involving a stipulation of forfeiture, the courts as a general rule construe the same as liquidated damages rather than as a penalty,[44] unless it can be seen from the evidence that the forfeiture is disproportionate to the breach.[45]

Damages disproportionate to breach.— Where a vendor contracted to do certain work on the lot sold, and in case he failed to perform, agreed to pay "as liquidated damages" twenty dollars a day for each day the work remained incomplete after the expiration of the stipulated time, such amount to be deducted from the purchase-price for which the vendee had given his note, and the vendor performed about sixty per cent of the agreed work, and then stopped, it was held that since the actual damages sustained by the vendee could readily be ascertained, the amount named in the contract as "liquidated damages" should be regarded as a penalty, especially as its enforcement would deprive the vendor not only of the purchase-money due him, but a large sum in excess thereof. Hahn v. Horstman, 12 Bush (Ky.) 249.

Where a railroad, instead of condemning land under the statute, contracted with the owner for the land on condition of doing certain work on specified streets within a certain time, agreeing that for every day after default it would pay the owner one dollar, the agreement was for a penalty, and not for feiture of a certain amount for each day in which the work is delayed. The courts have usually construed such forfeiture clauses as liquidated damages rather than as a penalty;[46] and this principally on the ground of the uncertainty in calculating the damages claimed.[47] Where, however, from a consideration of the contract, and the intention and circumstances of the parties, it can be determined that the agreement was really intended or should be construed as a penalty, the courts have not hesitated so to construe it.[48]

Building of vessel.—In Curtis v. Brewer, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 513, it was held that in a contract for building a vessel, where it was stipulated that if it was not completed by a specified date defendant was to pay therefor to plaintiffs at a certain rate per month for any delay in its completion after that time, and the parties bound themselves to the faithful performance of the contract in a specified sum, the damages for such delay were liquidated by the agreement.

Under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1671, which provides that parties to a contract may agree on an amount as liquidated damages when from the nature of the case it would be impracticable to fix the actual damages, taken in connection with section 1670, which provides that every contract by which the damages to be paid for a breach are determined in anticipation is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in section 1671, a building contractor's bond, stipulating that if the building is not completed on a day certain he should pay one hundred dollars for each day of delay as liquidated damages does not of itself, in the absence of all other evidence, make it clear that it would be impracticable to fix the actual damages. Patent Brick Co. v. Moore, 75 Cal. 205, 16 Pac. 890.

48. K contracted with C for the building of a mill, agreeing to furnish to him all materials, as fast as needed, etc., and to pay him one thousand dollars "fixed and stipulated damages" for any failure in performance upon his part. It was held that the one thousand dollars was in the nature of a penalty, and plaintiff was entitled to recover only his actual damages. Fitzpatrick v. Cottingham, 14 Wis. 219.

Agreement resembling bond.— Where by written instrument A acknowledged his indebtedness in a specific sum, with condition, to be void if B should be put in possession of a certain house and lot on a certain day, it was held that the amount was a penalty and not liquidated damages, the form of the instrument, which was not unlike a bond, precluding the idea of assessed damages. Bearden v. Smith, 11 Rich. (S. C.) 554.

Rental value.— Where defendant failed to finish the building of a house for plaintiff in the time agreed on, and it does not appear that he knew plaintiff expected to move in the house at such time, the only damages recoverable by plaintiff is the rental value of the house for the time it remained uncompleted after the date fixed for its completion, although there was an agreement in the con-

stated limits, it has been the policy of the courts to construe such an agreement as liquidated damages rather than as a penalty,[49] in the absence of any evidence to show that the amount of damages claimed is unjust or oppressive,[50] or that the amount claimed is disproportionate to the damages that would result from the breach or breaches of the several covenants of the agreement.[51] While the decisions in this class of cases are usually based upon the fact that the damages are uncertain and cannot be estimated,[52] it has also been held that where there is a promise to pay a particular sum in case of breach, or where the payment of the sum named is the very substance of the agreement, a recovery may be had for the sum named.[53]

Person entitled to recover or liable on stipulation.— Where a livery-stable keeper sold out his stock to two persons, agreeing not to engage in the business in the same stable, title to which he had retained for five years, it was held that after one of the buyers had retired from the business and broken his agreement the other buyer could sue in his own name for the recovery of the whole sum named, as liquidated damages in the original agreement. It was held to provide a penalty, and not liquidated damages, in the absence of strong evidence to show a contrary intention.

Thus Lord Mansfield held in Lowe v. Peers, 4 Burr. 2225, 2229 [quoted in Smith v. Bergengren, 153 Mass. 236, 26 N. E. 690, 18 L. R. A. 768], that if there is a covenant not to plow, with a penalty in a lease, a court of equity will relieve against the penalty; "but if it is worded — 'to pay 5*l.* an acre for every acre plowed up,' there is no alternative, no room for any relief against it, no compensation; it is the substance of the agreement." In Stafford v. Shortreed, 62 Iowa 524, 17 N. W. 756, defendant sold plaintiff his business and good-will, and gave a bond in the penalty of one hundred dollars not to engage in the same business in the same place. It was held that the one hundred dollars was in the nature of stipulated damages, and that defendant was liable in the full sum for a single breach, and that plaintiff could not maintain an injunction under Iowa Code, § 3386, for a "continuation" of the breach, the whole liability having been incurred by a single breach.

J. Default in Payment of Money — 1. In General. As a general rule the doctrine of liquidated damages is not applicable to contracts for the payment of money alone; in such case the court construe the damages as a penalty.[54] In cases where the parties to a contract stipulate for the payment of a large sum of money as damages for the failure or non-payment of a smaller sum at a given time, no matter what may be the language of the parties, the large sum agreed upon will be deemed a penalty, and not liquidated damages.[55]

2. Usurious Damages. Where liquidated damages are claimed for the non-payment of a sum of money and such damages exceed the lawful rate of interest, they are necessarily in violation of the law of usury and will not be allowed.[56]

K. Non-Performance of Any One of Several Acts. Where the agreement contains several distinct and independent covenants upon which there may be several breaches, and one sum is stated to be paid upon breach of performance, that sum will be considered a penalty and not liquidated damages.[57]

Arbitration of claim.— A claimed a balance to be due him from B and they referred their dispute to referees with an agreement to abide by the result, and that if either party refused to fulfil the agreement he should pay the other five hundred dollars as "liquidated damages." The referees reported that A should pay B three hundred and ten dollars. It was held that on the refusal of A to pay the amount awarded against him B might maintain suit for its recovery, but not for the "liquidated damages" specified in the agreement. Debt actually due.— If a note be payable at a specified day, for a certain sum, which may be discharged by the payment of a less sum at an earlier day, the greater sum is not in the nature of a penalty, but is the debt actually due, and is recoverable if the less sum be not paid according to the terms of the note. Not a matter of equity.— Where a note stipulates for payment of a certain per cent as liquidated damages for non-payment, if it is not paid promptly at maturity, the increased interest is merely liquidated damages from which relief can be had at any time by payment, and involves no special hardship calling for the interference of a court of equity. Bane v. Gridley, 67 Ill. 388.

The stipulation of the parties as to the rate of interest after maturity may be accepted as the measure of damages, provided they adhere to what may be reasonably sufficient to compensate the loss arising from the breach of contract. If, however, the rate of interest specified in the contract greatly exceeds the real value of the money, it is to be regarded as a penalty for the non-payment of the principal sum, rather than a just recompense for detaining it. L. Breach of Contract of Sale. In determining whether a sum claimed upon a breach of contract for sale is liquidated damages or a penalty, the court should look at the nature of the contract and the words and intentions of the parties;[58] but such sums have usually been held liquidated damages for the reason that the damages sustained are in almost all cases uncertain and very difficult to estimate.[59]

Partial performance.— Where a contract specifies a certain sum to be paid as damages on failure of either party to perform "all and every one of the covenants and agreements resting upon him" and does not provide for part performance, plaintiff's waiver of complete, and his acceptance of part, performance changes the agreement for liquidated damages into one for a penalty, and entitles him to recover only for damages actually sustained by a partial breach of the contract. Wibaux v. Grinnell Live-Stock Co., 9 Mont. 154, 22 Pac. 492. So where a contract prescribed payment of one and the same round sum, for a default of the promisor to obtain for the promisee title to any of certain lands, or to obtain a privilege of selection between certain lands, and made no difference between a total and a partial default, it was held that the sum must be considered a penalty, not liquidated damages. Cal. Civ. Code, § 1670, provides that "every contract by which the amount of damages to be paid . . . for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in next section." Section 1671 provides that "the parties to a contract may agree therein upon an amount which shall be presumed to be the amount of damages sustained by a breach thereof, when from the nature of the case it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage." Under such statute it was held that a contract for the sale of grain bags, which provides that the vendor shall pay the vendee three cents for each bag which he refuses or neglects to deliver, as liquidated damages, is void, although it recites that from the nature of the case it will be extremely difficult to determine the damages. M. Breach of Contract of Hiring. The courts have usually construed the damages as liquidated in breaches of contract for hiring on the ground that they can be rarely estimated,[60] but in such cases the stipulation must be reasonable and bear some proportion to the breach complained of.[61]

N. Breach of Contract of Lease. The same general rule obtains in cases of breach of contracts of lease, since damages in such cases can rarely be correctly estimated. Parties are allowed to fix their own terms;[62] but the stipulation must be a reasonable one, and some substantial damage must have resulted.[63] longing to plaintiff, the latter agreeing to pay in addition thereto a named sum, and in case the harvester should not do good work plaintiff was not to pay any money in consideration of the exchange, it was held that such contract did not come within the exception of the above statute, and that evidence was admissible of the actual damage sustained by plaintiff from a breach of the warranty. Where an agreement to employ an attorney in a very important suit, after providing for a liberal compensation in case of success, stipulated that in case the suit should be settled, discontinued, or taken from the attorney's control, he should be paid fifteen thousand dollars, it was held that this sum was not a penalty, but liquidated damages, in lieu of damages of an uncertain and doubtful nature. Ryan v. Martin, 16 Wis. 57.

Intoxication.— In Henderson v. Murphree, 109 Ala. 556, 20 So. 45, defendants took plaintiff, who had theretofore been their clerk, into partnership. Plaintiff, who had been addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquor, but who had reformed, again became intoxicated, whereupon the parties entered into an agreement which provided that if he should again use liquor to excess he should forfeit to plaintiff all interest in the partnership and in the profits, and should instead be paid a certain salary for his services, it was held that the forfeiture of plaintiff's interest in the partnership in case of his becoming intoxicated would be enforced as liquidated damages, since the actual damages were uncertain. See also Keeble v. Keeble, 85 Ala. 552, 5 So. 149.

61. A contract of employment between a waiter and the proprietors of a hotel which stipulates that if the waiter leave their service without giving three days' notice he shall forfeit all moneys owing him provides for a penalty, and not for liquidated damages, since the amount is greatly in excess of the actual damage. Wagner v. Kingsley, 7 Misc. (N. Y.) 744, 27 N. Y. Suppl. 1124; Schmieder v. Kingsley, 6 Misc. (N. Y.) 107, 26 N. Y. Suppl. 31.

62. In Mawson v. Leavitt, 16 Misc. (N. Y.) 289, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 1138, it was held that a provision in a contract (by which defendant agreed to furnish his theater for a week, and plaintiff agreed to furnish his theatrical company and play in the theater for said week, proceeds to be divided) that on any violation of the above-mentioned covenants by either party the sum of five hundred dollars on demand as liquidated damages is not a covenant for a penalty, but for liquidated damages, since it was competent for the parties to fix their liability in a reasonable amount.

Fine in addition to actual damages.—Where a contract by defendants for the use of electrotype plates provides that they shall be liable for any damages caused by a wrongful use thereof, and shall pay in addition a fine equal to ten times the price of the electrotypes wrongfully used, the fine is a penalty, and not liquidated damages, since it is in addition to the actual damage sustained. Meyer v. Estes, 164 Mass. 457, 41 N. E. 683, 32 L. R. A. 283.

Lessee remaining in possession.— Where the lessee covenants to pay double rent for such time as the lessor shall be kept out of possession, after the term is ended, by a forfeiture, such double rent will not be considered as a penalty, but as liquidated damages, since the lessee by remaining in possession evidently considers the property of greater value than the rent. A bark was chartered to respondents, the charter providing that it should be "entered at New York, by the respondent's agents, or, on default thereof, the owner should pay £20 estimated damages." It was held that the stipulation was a reasonable one, and that the stipulated damages should be allowed without further proof of specific damage than the delay of one day. Gallo v. McAndrews, 29 Fed. 715.

A clause in a lease of water-power, that in default of a sufficient supply of water the lessor shall forfeit a pro rata proportion of the water-rents accruing during the existence of such deficiency, is not a provision for liquidated damages, such as will prevent recovery of other damages by the lessee, when it appears that the deficiency was the result of the lessor's failure to repair injuries to the race and dam caused by an unusual freshet, and that the rental value of the lessee's mill, which was useless without the power, was

O. Partial Breach of Agreement. Where the agreement has been partially performed, it is the policy of the courts to regard the damages as a penalty, and allow the plaintiff to recover only such damages as he has actually sustained.[64] Where the contract contains several distinct agreements or stipulations, the mere omission or failure to perform the contract in its entirety will not entitle the plaintiff to liquidated damages.[65] So a claim for a stipulated sum as liquidated damages for a non-performance of a partially performed contract cannot be enforced where its completion can be effected at small expense compared to the liquidated sum.[66]

P. Accrual of Right. As a general rule the right to claim damages as liquidated damages or a penalty accrues after an offer and refusal to perform the agreement, coupled with a present ability to do so.[67] In all cases, however, regard should be had to the terms of the contract itself,[68] and to the intention of the parties and the surrounding circumstances under which the agreement was made.[69] twenty dollars per day, while the rent of the power was but three dollars. Pengra v. Wheeler, 24 Oreg. 532, 34 Pac. 354, 21 L. R. A. 726.

No substantial damages.— A provision in a lease for five thousand dollars' damages, to cover interruption of earnings and other losses in addition to unpaid rent, in case of breach by the lessee, when, on an actual breach, no substantial damage has been suffered, must be held to be a penalty. Gay Mfg. Co. v. Camp, 65 Fed. 794, 13 C. C. A. 137.

Terms unreasonable.— Where a contract for the hiring of a cow for a year provides that the borrower is to return the cow in a year with six dollars, and if not then delivered pay six dollars a year until delivered, the damages allowed for failure to return the cow will be the first six dollars and interest thereafter on that amount and the value of the cow, since the terms of the contract are unconscionable and void. Baxter v. Wales, 12 Mass. 365.

64. McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 177, 40 Pac. 231; Shute v. Taylor, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 61. In Lampman v. Cochran, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 388, A agreed to convey certain premises to B, upon certain payments being made. A stipulation in the agreement was "to pay one to the other, the sum of $500, as liquidated damages, in case, if one of the parties shall fail to perform said contract." B paid one hundred dollars of the purchase-money. It was held that the five hundred dollars was to be deemed liquidated damages, but payable only in case of a total failure to perform the contract, and that part payment having been made, B was only liable for damages.

65. Cook v. Finch, 19 Minn. 407. So where an agreement contains several stipulations of different degrees of importance, and a sum is named as liquidated damages, an intention to make the sum so determined payable on the breach of minor and unimportant parts of the agreement will not be imputed, in the absence of language declaring such intention with precision. Construction of contract.—Where the members of a firm agreed with plaintiff that he should have the exclusive sale within certain territory, for a certain period, of an article manufactured by them, with a provision that if they should sell or assign their business before the termination of the agreement, without securing an adoption thereof by the purchaser, plaintiff should be entitled to receive a certain sum as liquidated damages, it was held that one of the partners having died during the life of the contract, the sale of his interest to the survivors was not within the meaning of the contract. Murdock v. Martin, 147 Pa. St. 203, 23 Atl. 804.

Where a contract for the construction of a railroad reserved to the company the right to terminate the contract at any time by formal notice in writing, and upon payment to the contractor for all labor performed, and the further sum of three thousand dollars as liquidated damages, it was held, where the company suspended the work and then failed to resume it, that the contractor could not recover the three thousand dollars, since a payment of liquidated damages was not reserved for a breach of the contract, but as a means to dissolve it. Curnan v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 138 N. Y. 480, 34 N. E. 201.

69. In Amedon v. Gannon, 6 Hun (N. Y.) 384, the defendant agreed not to practise medicine in a certain town for ten years, the contract providing for a bond on request conditioned that he should not practise as aforesaid. The bond was not given. In an action by plaintiff to recover damages, it was held that as the bond was only to be given if required by plaintiff, and as he never demanded the same, it could not be assumed that the rights of the parties were the same, so as to authorize plaintiff to recover the penalty of the bond as liquidated damages.

No recovery.— Where a land contract provided that a wharf to be erected on the land by the vendor should be finished, ready for business, within thirty days, under a penalty

Q. Necessity of Actual Damage. In an action to recover liquidated damages, there is no necessity to prove that actual damages have been suffered.[70] In such cases upon a failure to perform the contract the stipulated damages may be recovered with interest,[71] unless the parties have expressly agreed upon a certain sum under the terms of their contract.[72]

IX. EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.[73]

A. In General. "Punitive damages," "vindictive damages," and "exemplary damages" are in legal contemplation synonymous terms.[74] The kind of wrongs to which exemplary damages are applicable are those which besides the violation of a right, or the actual damages sustained, import insult, fraud, or oppression, and are not merely injuries, but injuries inflicted in the spirit of of ten dollars for each day exceeding the thirty days, and there was no evidence that the vendee, a dealer in kindling wood, could not have gone on to the wharf, received his wood, stored it, erected his kiln, and transacted his business within the thirty days, it was held that, although the entire lot had not been graded to the vendee's satisfaction, and although there was a projection of about six feet along the lower part of the bulkhead, the vendee was not entitled to recover anything, either as liquidated damages or as a penalty. McCullough v. Manning, 132 Pa. St. 43, 18 Atl. 1080.

St. Rep. 716. Compare Hathaway v. Lynn, 75 Wis. 186, 43 N. W. 956, 6 L. R. A. 551.

Amount not unreasonable.— In Louisville Water Co. v. Youngstown Bridge Co., 16 Ky. L. Rep. 350, a water company, having in course of erection two large buildings to hold the boilers, machinery, and engines for a new pumping station, contracted with defendant to furnish it two sets of steel and iron trusses for the two roofs. By the terms of the contract the work was to be finished on a certain day, and it was agreed that defendant was to receive a bonus of one hundred dollars for each day that the work was finished before contract time, and that for each day its completion was delayed beyond the day named one hundred dollars was to be deducted from the contract price as liquidated damages. It was held that the work not being completed until eight days after the agreed time the plaintiff was entitled to the liquidated damages agreed upon, although no damage was shown, the amount stipulated not being unreasonable.

Nominal damages.— In the absence of proof that the owner of a house is damaged by delay in its completion, he can only recover nominal damages, although the builder's contract stipulates for a payment of twenty dollars per day for every day's delay in completing it. Wilcus v. Kling, 87 Ill. 107.

72. Interest is not allowable upon a sum named in an agreement, not as a penalty, but as liquidated damages, and recoverable, not as the representative of an actual debt, or as the measure of actual compensation, but as the damages fixed by the parties to be recovered on a breach. The verdict must be for that precise sum. Hoagland v. Segur, 38 N. J. L. 230.

Set-off.— The amount of damages recoverable in an action brought for a sum fixed by agreement as liquidated damages may be reduced by proving that a certain portion of the consideration expressed in the agreement has not been paid. Baker v. Connell, 1 Daly (N. Y.) 469.

Waiver of right and defenses.— The mere fact that a contract was terminated by agreement rather than by notice, as provided for in the contract, does not constitute a waiver of the right to retain the amount named therein as liquidated damages. Wolf v. Des Moines, etc., R. Co., 64 Iowa 380, 20 N. W. 481.

Where parties submitted their matters in controversy to arbitration, with the agreement that one thousand dollars should be the amount of stipulated damages in case of a refusal to abide the award, it was held that no interest at all should be allowed, as the parties had fixed their own damages. Devereux v. Burgwin, 33 N. C. 490.

wanton disregard.[75] On the point of exemplary or vindictive damages there has been some discussion between law writers, some contending that punitive damages are intended as a personal punishment to the offender; others that the object should rather be a lesson to the public.[76] The better doctrine seems to be that they are usually given as a punishment to the offender, for the benefit of the community and a restraint to the transgressor.[77] Such damages are only given in cases where malice, fraud, or gross negligence enter into the cause of action;[78]

Rep. 373, the court said: "The point was met and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Milwaukee R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374, in which the lower court had charged the jury that 'if you find that the accident was caused by the gross negligence of the defendant's servants controlling the train, you may give to the plaintiffs punitive or exemplary damages.'" In Southern R. Co. v. Kendrick, 40 Miss. 374, 390, 90 Am. Dec. 332 [quoted in Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Scurr, 59 Miss. 456, 463, 42 Am. Rep. 373], it is said that "a neglect of duty, clearly not attended with any circumstances of insult, of aggravation of feelings, of injury to the person or his property, or of bodily or mental suffering, would not justify vindictive damages; yet if there be any evidence tending to show such circumstances, its weight and force rest peculiarly in the discretion of the jury."

Rep. 1615, it was held that while plaintiff was entitled to an instruction authorizing punitive damages if the negligence was gross, it was error to tell the jury that they might give such damages "by way of punishing the defendant and to deter others from like practices." In an action for personal injuries, exemplary damages may be recovered, not as a penalty for a public wrong, but in vindication of a private right which has been wilfully invaded, and as a warning to others. case out of the ordinary rule of compensation. The question of whether an act was wilful, wanton, or malicious relates only to damages, and not to the right of recovery; and, if the act complained of can be so classified, the jury is authorized by law to award smart money or punitive damages.[79] Unless there is some element of malice, or gross negligence, or circumstances of aggravation, the measure of damages is the measure of compensation for the loss sustained and nothing more;[80] and an instruction as to punitive damages when there is no sub-

Malice necessary.— In Curl v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 63 Iowa 417, 16 N. W. 69, 19 N. W. 308, it was held error to give an instruction to the jury which did not make the recovery of exemplary damages depend upon the malice of the wrong-doer.

No intention to injure.— Exemplary damages cannot be recovered of a constable for the seizure and sale of the wife's household goods under an attachment against the husband, where it appears that the goods were believed to belong to the husband, and that there was nothing wanton or malicious in the conduct of the constable or of the attachment plaintiff, nor any unnecessary humiliation inflicted upon the wife, nor any force used. Brown v. Allen, 67 Ark. 386, 55 S. W. 143. So in Wallace v. New York, 18 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 169, which was an action against the city for personal injuries caused by defects in the sidewalk, it was held that exemplary damages could not be recovered unless the circumstances showed a deliberate and positive intention to injure, or a reckless disregard of personal safety.

Burden of proof.— If damages beyond compensation are sought, in an action of tort, the burden is on plaintiff to show, or at least the evidence must establish, facts proving oppression, outrage, or vindictiveness by the wrong-doer before such damages can be awarded. stantial evidence that the negligent act complained of was wanton or malicious has been held to be erroneous.[81] Although the courts have not been uniform in awarding exemplary damages where the injury is purely nominal, yet where the law implies sufficient damages to sustain an action, it has been held sufficient ground to warrant the imposition of vindictive damages;[82] but as a rule it must be shown by the evidence that actual damages are due.[83]

B. Acts Done in Good Faith. Where an act has been done in good faith, although it may result in serious injury to the defendant, there can be no recovery of exemplary damages.[84] The question whether an act was wilfully or wantonly committed is important in considering the damages. Where the wrong is wilful or wanton, the jury are authorized to give any amount of damages beyond the actual injury sustained as a punishment and to preserve the public tranquillity. But where the wrong-doer acts in good faith, with honest intentions, and with prudence and proper caution, although he may invade the rights of another, exemplary damages cannot be recovered.[85] Thus where an officer in discharge of his duty acts in good faith no exemplary damages can be awarded against him.[86]

C. Negligent Acts. It is only in cases of gross negligence that the theory of exemplary damages will be applied.[87] Where the negligence is accidental, or no wantonness or circumstances of malice enter into the wrong, there can be no recovery of exemplary damages.[88]

D. In Actions For Injury to Property — 1. In General. The question whether exemplary damages will be allowed in actions for injuries to property depends upon the nature of the injury complained of. As a general rule they will only be allowed where such injury is attended by circumstances of wilful fraud, malice, or gross negligence.[89]

2. Injuries to Personal Property. Exemplary damages are not confined to injuries to the person, but may be awarded in case of injury, seizure, or conversion of personal property, where such injury, seizure, or conversion is attended with circumstances of aggravation.[90]

3. Injuries to Real Property. Vindictive or exemplary damages will not be usually given where the injury complained of is connected with real property.[91]

In an action for conversion in order that exemplary damages may be recovered, it must appear from the evidence that the act complained of was a wilful and malicious wrong, and that there was an intent to injure. Inman v. Ball, 65 Iowa 543, 22 N. W. 666.

Where, however, the wrongful act complained of is accompanied with certain circumstances of aggravation and is wantonly or recklessly committed, exemplary damages may be recovered.[92] The question in this class of cases depends entirely upon the maliciousness of the trespass.[93] Especially are exemplary damages awarded in cases where a private home or residence has been invaded.[94]

E. In Actions For Personal Injury — 1. In General. Exemplary damages can only be awarded in case of personal injuries where the negligence or injury complained of is malicious or wanton or the negligence gross. The act must partake of a criminal or wilful nature, and in the absence of any evidence to that effect the damages must be confined to compensation only.[95] If the jury find as a fact from the evidence that defendant has been guilty of negligence so gross as would show a reckless indifference to human life or human society, or to indicate recklessness, wantonness, or ill-will, they are at liberty to add exemplary damages.[96]

2. Railroad Accidents. Exemplary damages have often been claimed in case of a railroad accident, but in order to recover the same there must be shown such an entire want of care as amounts to "gross negligence."[97]

F. In Actions Ex Contractu — 1. In General. Exemplary damages have been almost universally denied in actions ex contractu.[98] No more can be recovered as damages than will fully compensate the party injured.[99] There exists, however, an exception to this general rule in case of a breach of contract to marry, in which exemplary damages may be allowed.[1]

2. Actions Against Common Carriers. As a general rule where there is a breach of contract on the part of a carrier for negligence on his part, and there are no circumstances to aggravate the case, exemplary damages will not be allowed.[2] Where, however, there is a breach of contract on the part of a common carrier to deliver a passenger at his destination within a certain time, and such breach of contract is attended with gross negligence, insult, or indignity, the passenger may recover exemplary damages for the injury sustained.[3]

G. Liability of Principal For Act of Agent — 1. In General. How far a principal is liable in exemplary damages for the acts of his agent is a question about which there is the utmost contrariety, and not a little confusion of authority. This results to some extent from a failure to classify the cases, many of which have been decided upon principles of public policy.[4] Some of the courts have laid down the broad doctrine that a principal is liable in exemplary damages for the acts of his agent, however tortious or unauthorized, where they are performed in the course of his regular business, on the ground that the principal is liable for all acts so done by his agent;[5] and this too whether such acts are previously authorized or subsequently ratified by the principal.[6] The better rule on this subject seems to be that a principal will not be held liable in exemplary damages for the act of an agent,[7] unless it be shown that he authorized or

The rule has gradually grown more stringent as against common carriers, and especially railroad companies, on the ground that public policy and the safety of the traveling public require that they should not only exercise the highest degree of care in the conduct of their affairs, but should even "guarantee that none of their servants should commit crimes or wilful torts." In Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 271, 292, the court said: "Principals are not generally held liable for such damages by reason of the evil motive of an agent, unless the act of the agent was fully ratified with a knowledge of its malicious, aggravating, or grossly negligent character; or these matters of aggravation were probably consequent on the doing of the wrongful act ordered by the principal; or unless the agent was employed with a knowledge of his incompetency." In Fisher v. Metropolitan El. R. Co., 34 Hun (N. Y.) 433, it was held that a master will not be liable in punitive damages for the misconduct of his servant, unless he is shown to have himself been guilty of gross neglect or misconduct.

No knowledge on part of principal.— In an action for damages for fraud in the sale of a horse, it appeared that defendant's agent sold the horse to plaintiffs, representing that it belonged to defendant, whereas the latter had given a note for it, and agreed that the title should remain in the vendor until the note was paid. Plaintiffs took an assignment of the note from the vendor, and recovered judgment thereon against defendant. There was no evidence that defendant authorized the agent to misrepresent the title, or that he knew that the agent had done so at the time he ratified the sale. It was held that plaintiffs were not entitled to exemplary damages. Colvin v. Peck, 62 Conn. 155, 25 Atl. 355.

9. Lienkauf v. Morris, 66 Ala. 406; Becker v. Dupree, 75 Ill. 167; Eviston v. Cramer, 57 Wis. 570, 15 N. W. 760; Kilpatrick v. Haley, 66 Fed. 133, 13 C. C. A. 480. In Craker v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 36 Wis. 658, 675, 17 Am. Rep. 504 [quoted in Eviston v. Cramer, 57 Wis. 570, 15 N. W. 760], the learned chief justice, in considering this question, says: "It is said in Milwaukee, etc., R. Co. v. Finney, 10 Wis. 388, that the plaintiff in such a case is not entitled to exemplary damages against the principal, for the malicious act of the agent, without proof that the principal expressly authorized or confirmed it. Without now discussing what would or would not be competent or sufficient evidence of such authority or confirmation, we may say that we have, on very mature consideration, concluded that the rule in Milwaukee, etc., R. Co. v. Finney, [supra], is the better and safer rule. We are aware that there is authority, and perhaps the greater weight of authority, for exemplary damages in such cases, without privity of the principal to the malice of the agent; and that reasons of public policy are strongly urged in support of such a rule. Jeffersonville R. Co. v. Rogers, 38 Ind. 116, 10 Am. Rep. 103; Goddard v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 57 Me. 202, 2 Am. Rep. 39; Sanford v. Eighth Ave. R. Co., 23 N. Y. 343, 80 Am. Dec. 286; and other cases. But we adhere to what is said on that point in Milwaukee, etc., R. Co. v. Finney, [supra]. We think that in justice there ought to be a difference in the rule of damages against principals for torts actually committed by agents, in cases where the principal is, and in cases where the principal is not, a party to the malice of the agent. In the former class of cases, the damages go upon the malice of the principal: malice common to principal and agent. In the latter class of cases, the recovery is for the act of the principal through the agent, in malice of the agent not shared by the principal; the principal being responsible for the act, but not for the motive of the agent." In Staples v. Schmid, 18 R. I. 224, 26 Atl. 193, 19 L. R. A. 824, defendants' salesman, erroneously suspecting plaintiff of having stolen certain goods from the store which was in his charge, detained her and had her sent to the police station and there searched. It was held that a verdict awarding plaintiff seven hundred and fifty dollars damages was grossly excessive; punitive damages not being allowable except where the master participates in or approves the wrongs of his servant.

Texas.— Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Woodall, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 471.

2. As Between Attorney and Client. The liability for exemplary damages as between attorney and client is much the same as in other cases of agency. The question depends upon the good faith of the attorney in his actions,[11] and whether such actions are or are not subsequently ratified or sanctioned by the client.[12]

H. Liability Between Joint Defendants. Where the liability is joint as to the actual damages sustained, exemplary damages can as a general rule only be awarded against those who have participated in or contributed to the malicious act or the gross negligence involved;[13] but where all have acted in concert and are equally guilty they are all liable to the same extent.[14]

I. Liability of Public Officials. Where a public official has acted in good faith and there is no evidence in his acts of fraud or maliciousness, exemplary damages should not be awarded.[15] If, however, an officer in the exercise of his official duties oversteps and abuses his powers and is guilty of oppression under color of his office exemplary damages will be allowed.[16]

J. Liability of Sureties on Bonds. Exemplary damages are not generally recoverable against sureties upon bonds,[17] even though the breach on the part of the principal was malicious or tortious.[18]

11. In Jones v. Lamon, 92 Ga. 529, 18 S. E. 423, it was held that where property seized on attachment belonged, not to defendant in attachment, but to his daughter, and the attorney authorizing the levy knew or had reasonable grounds for believing that it belonged to her, his client would be liable for the actual damages sustained by the daughter, and might be subject to exemplary damages, if the tort was attended with circumstances of aggravation. On the other hand, if attaching plaintiff's attorney, ordering a levy on the property of defendant's daughter, was ignorant of the daughter's title, and believed in good faith that the title was in defendant in attachment, and caused the levy to be dismissed without any unreasonable delay on being informed of her title, his client would be liable for actual damages only. In Marks v. Culmer, 6 Utah 419, 24 Pac. 528, it was held that the claimant of premises, who institutes the proceeding, and the attorney, who directs the constable to execute a writ of restitution, which is void, are liable for actual damages necessarily incurred in the proper execution of the writ, and not for exemplary damages arising from the acts of the constable unauthorized by the mandate of the writ.

K. Liability of Corporations. While there has been some question as to whether corporations can be held liable in exemplary damages for the acts of their servants, the better rule seems to be that where a wrong is committed in the ordinary course of the servant's duty, and is committed wilfully and wrongfully, the corporation can be held liable as in ordinary cases of tort.[19] Since a corporation can only act through its agents or servants a stricter rule has sometimes been applied than in cases of individual liability,[20] and they have been held liable in exemplary damages, although there was no previous authorization of the wrong or subsequent ratification of it.[21] The better rule on the subject seems to be that they are liable only as in case of an individual, and it must be shown that the corporation has either authorized or ratified the act or been negligent in the employment of its agents or servants.[22]

but in order to warrant a recovery under such statutes it is necessary to show that the conduct of the wrong-doer was reckless or that he omitted intentionally some duty which he owed to the public or to the person injured.[24]

M. Acts Punishable as Crimes. The courts have been very divided in their opinions as to whether exemplary damages may be recovered for an act that may be punishable as a crime. The better opinion seems to be that they may be recovered,[25] although there seems to be judicial opinion to the contrary.[26] In some cases the question has arisen, where exemplary damages were allowed and the act complained of was a criminal offense, whether such recovery was constitutional, as subjecting the defendant to a double punishment. In most cases it has been so held on the ground that damages recovered in a private suit are wholly uninfluenced by anything that may have transpired in the proceeding carried on by the state.[27]

N. Question For Jury. In all cases in determining whether exemplary damages shall be awarded the question as to gross negligence or the wilfulness or wantonness of the act should be left to the jury.[28] Whether the evidence in a case tends to warrant exemplary damages is a question for the court to determine in its instructions, but the sufficiency of the evidence to establish such facts is a question for the jury.[29]

Therefore such damages can in no just sense be said to be in conflict with the constitutional or common-law inhibition against inflicting two punishments for the same offense, although the defendant is liable to a criminal prosecution for the act on account of which the damags are given.

O. Amount of Damages. In assessing the amount of exemplary damages to be awarded, the jury should take into consideration the malice or wantonness of the act complained of, and all the particular circumstances which go to aggravate the case;[30] but the damages awarded should bear some reasonable proportion to the real damage sustained.[31] The amount is usually left to the discretion of the jury[32] under instructions by the court.[33] In case the damages as Southern R. Co. v. Kendrick, 40 Miss. 374, 90 Am. Dec. 332.

Social standing of parties.— The value and influence of an example set by awarding exemplary damages for a wilful injury depend upon the social standing of the parties, and the jury may consider that circumstance in determining the amount. In an action of trespass, where the evidence disclosed that the defendants, in the nighttime, had thrown stones and eggs through the plaintiff's windows, and that her family consisted of herself, her four daughters, and young son, it was proper to instruct the jury to award such exemplary damages as they deemed proportionated to the alleged insult, etc., on a consideration of all the circumstances. Ellsworth v. Potter, 41 Vt. 685. Malicious prosecution.—In fixing exemplary damages for malicious prosecution, the jury should exercise a fair and reasonable discretion, keeping in view the nature of the wrong committed, and the enormity, or otherwise, of such aggravating circumstances as may be shown, rather than the measure of compensation to the plaintiff. Where, in an action for trespass to personal property, there is some evidence that defendants' conduct was reckless, oppressive, or awarded are grossly excessive or indicate prejudice they may be set aside by the court.[34]

P. No Survival. As exemplary damages are given as a punishment to the wrong-doer and not as compensation, there can be no survival after the death of the guilty party.[35]

Q. Matters in Mitigation. Punitive or exemplary damages being only allowed because of the malicious motive which is supposed, from the circumstances attending the wrong, to have animated the wrong-doer and prompted his act,[36] they are the last to be assessed in the elements of injury to be considered by a jury, and should be the first to be rejected by facts in mitigation.[37] If the plaintiff may enhance the damages by showing circumstances of aggravation, a defendant may also give such evidence as he has tending to explain the circumstances which are relied upon to aggravate the damages.[38] So he may show that he acted in good faith and with no malicious intent,[39] that he acted under the advice of counsel,[40] or that he did acts of reparation or restoration which lay in wanton, and the jury are instructed to assess plaintiff's damages at no more than compensation for the injury, unless they believe that the defendants committed the trespass wilfully or recklessly, or in wanton disregard of the plaintiff's rights, a verdict for one thousand three hundred and fifty dollars damages, where the actual damage proved is only nine hundred and fifty dollars, should not be set aside as excessive, since it must be presumed that the jury found that the defendants' conduct was reckless, oppressive, or wanton. Contrary to advice of counsel.— Evidence that the defendant acted under the advice of counsel is not admissible in mitigation of exemplary damages, when instead of following the advice as given he acted contrary to it. Carpenter v. Barber, 44 Vt. 441.

It must appear that the advice was given upon a full and fair statement of the facts, his power.[41] Where the cause of offense or the objectionable cause of action is discontinued or withdrawn with such reasonable promptness as the circumstances of the case allow, such fact should go either in mitigation of exemplary damages, or as an absolute bar to their recovery.[42]

X. EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A. In General. Since damages as a general rule are regarded as a compensation for the injury or wrong inflicted, when not connected with matters of aggravation or malice, they are considered a matter within the discretion of the jury, under instructions by the court,[43] and an appellate court will seldom interfere with the verdict as rendered. The general rule on this point as expressed

41. In an action against an officer for irregularities in making a distress warrant, where tender of the rent was made at the trial, and the person entitled to receive it signified a willingness to do so, punitive damages cannot be recovered. Tripp v. Grouner, 60 Ill. 474. Where it appears in an action by tenants against their landlord for wrongful eviction that the amount of the verdict could only have been reached by an allowance of punitive damages, and that defendant voluntarily assumed to make repairs rendered necessary by the acts of an adjoining owner in breaking the partition wall, and immediately put in a temporary wooden wall, with as little inconvenience to plaintiffs as possible, such verdict cannot be permitted to stand, although defendant be liable for actual damages for loss of and injury to stock, and expense of moving; since, under Colo. Acts (1889), p. 64, § 1, exemplary damages are allowed only when "the injury complained of shall have been attended by circumstances of fraud, malice, or insult, or a wanton and reckless disregard of the injured party's rights and feelings." Second trial.— Where on a former trial the verdict is fair and reasonable, and in the exercise of sound discretion, under all the circumstances of the case; and it will be so presumed, unless the verdict is so excessive or outrageous with reference to those circumstances as to demonstrate that the jury have acted against the rules of law or have suffered their passions, their prejudices, or their perverse disregard of justice to mislead them.[45] In some states the courts have taken an extreme position on the subject of setting aside excessive verdicts.[46] While the general rule is as stated above, the courts must be governed in a measure by the circumstances of the particular case presented for their consideration;[47] yet where the circumstances of the case or jury awarded the respondent three thousand dollars damages, but the verdict was set aside by the supreme court on the ground of misdirection, and on the second trial the jury awarded six thousand five hundred dollars damages, the amount was not so excessive that the court should set aside the verdict and order a new trial. Inflammatory address to jury.—Where complaint is made that counsel at the trial has improperly inflamed the minds of the jurors by remarks addressed to them, objection must be lodged at the time the remarks are made, and the intervention of the trial judge claimed; and where this has not been done, the court will not interfere upon appeal. The injuries having been severe and caused much suffering, a verdict of six thousand five hundred dollars was not one that should be disturbed as excessive. Sornberger v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 24 Ont. App. 263.

46. In California it has been held that, the right of trial by jury in civil cases being secured by the bill of rights, it was doubtful whether a judgment could be set aside as excessive. Payne v. Pacific Mail Steamship Co., 1 Cal. 33.

In New Mexico it has been held that the appellate court does not sit to pass upon the amount of the verdict, but only to correct errors on the trial. Schofield v. Territory, 9 N. M. 526, 56 Pac. 306.

In New York it has been held that the trial court having power to review the facts presented by the evidence, the appellate court would not pronounce a verdict excessive if it could be upheld in any view of the evidence presented. Maher v. Central Park, etc., R. Co., 67 N. Y. 52. See also Slavin v. State, 152 N. Y. 45, 46 N. E. 321. In Starbird v. Barrows, 62 N. Y. 615, it was held that if the jury gave excessive damages it could only be corrected in the lower court and the appellate court would not interfere.

Mere opinion as to value.— A verdict for damages for injury to an untrained horse, which at the time of his injury was being shipped for training purposes, must be set aside as excessive, the only evidence of value approaching the amount of the verdict consisting chiefly of opinions based upon the idea that the horse had a good pedigree, and would when trained make good time. "Every case must necessarily depend, to a great extent, upon its own peculiar facts. An examination of the decided cases in actions to recover damages for personal injuries clearly shows that the courts have differed in opinion as much as juries, as to the amount of damages that should be allowed in such cases. Extreme cases are found in the books upon both sides of this vexed question. The

B. Injuries to Property or Damages For Breach of Contract. Where an injury to property is involved, or damages are sought for a breach of a specific contract, the courts are little inclined to interfere with the verdict as rendered,[49] especially where the evidence is conflicting;[50] where, however, the verdict as rendered is in excess of the evidence of loss the court may set it aside.[51] No tendency of some of the state courts is to allow only small damages. Other states are more liberal. What is considered as proper in one state is deemed excessive in another. The argument that juries . . . are disposed to give heavy damages in actions for personal injuries against corporations is undoubtedly true. But the records of this court will show that it has never hesitated, where the amount was deemed excessive, to set such verdicts aside." Engler v. Western Union Tel. Co., 69 Fed. 185, 187.

that it is excessive.[56] The reason of this rule being based upon the fact that by reason of the injury the plaintiff has been rendered less capacitated for earning his own living,[57] it is only where the verdict is grossly excessive that the appellate court will interfere to reduce or set it aside.[58]

d. Loss of Both Legs. In cases where a plaintiff has suffered by reason of the wrongful act sued for such a serious injury as the loss of both legs, the jury are apt to be more or less governed by prejudice or bias in delivering their verdict, yet even in such cases the verdict will not be set aside by the court,[59]

unless the damages as rendered by the jury are so clearly excessive as to shock the sense of justice.[60]

2. Paralysis or Injury to the Nervous System. In cases of paralysis or injury to the nervous system a verdict will rarely be considered excessive.[61] So in injuries to the spine that have resulted from a personal injury, the court is little inclined to interfere with a verdict on the ground that it is excessive.[62]

3. Epileptic Fits. Where as the result of a personal injury the plaintiff has become subject to epileptic fits and his general health ruined, a verdict will not be set aside as excessive.[63]

Progressive and incurable disease.— A verdict of ten thousand dollars for personal injuries is not excessive, the evidence showing that plaintiff had sustained a fracture of two ribs, contusion on the whole chest, bruises on the back, head, and hand, and had developed pleurisy from the rib fracture, and a nervous tremor, indicating chronic sclerosis of the spinal cord and brain, which was progressive and incurable. Chance of recovery.— In McKenna v. North Hudson County R. Co., 64 N. J. L. 106, 45 Atl. 776, it was held that a verdict for nine thousand dollars damages against a street-railroad company would be held excessive where it appeared that plaintiff at the time of the accident was a machinist, twenty-nine years of age, earning from forty-seven to seventy-five dollars per month, although there was evidence that since the accident he had been nervous, sleepless, and troubled with defective eyesight, hearing, and smell, headache, and loss of memory, and that he is liable at any time to epilepsy and paresis, the

4. Loss or Impairment of Sight or Hearing. Where there has been a total loss of sight or hearing, or where such faculties have been materially impaired, the courts have, in view of the affliction, considered verdicts as compensation rather than as excessive damages,[64] and in no case will they be set aside unless they are grossly inadequate or savor of malice.

5. Permanent Injuries. In actions for personal injuries in deciding whether a verdict is excessive or not, the court will usually take into consideration whether the injuries are permanent or only temporary.[65] Where it appears from the evi-result of a fracture of the skull, since there was also evidence that his chances for recovery were very fair, and that he might be able to do as much work as before the accident.

Some evidence of permanent injury.—Plaintiff was struck by a window frame and some bricks falling from the upper story of a building. His head was cut and he was badly bruised. He was confined to his bed for two weeks, and to the house for three weeks longer. After the accident he was subject to violent headaches several times a week, and to fits of dizziness, neither of which had he been subject to before the accident, and there was some evidence that these conditions would be permanent. It was held that a verdict for one thousand dollars was not excessive. Bishof v. Leahy, 54 N. Y. App. Div. 619, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 342.

b. Loss of Earnings or Services of Family in Action by Husband. Where an action is brought by a husband or father for the loss of earnings or services of his wife or infant child, the question whether the verdict will be deemed excessive depends first, upon the age and earning capacity of the party injured;[72] second, upon the expenses incurred;[73] and thirdly, upon the nature and extent of the injuries as inflicted.[74] The court should take into consideration all the elements of the particular case, and where the damages awarded are entirely out of proportion to the injury inflicted the verdict should either be set aside or reduced.[75]

7. Excessive Damages Reduced. Where the damages awarded by the jury are excessive, but the plaintiff is entitled to recover, the court in the exercise of its control over the verdict may suggest a reduction of the damages; or where the suggestion is not accepted may order a new trial on the ground of excessive damages alone.[76] The trial court may require a verdict to be abated on the ground that it is excessive, although it is not excessive to a degree which necessarily implies that it was returned under the influence of passion or prejudice.[77] It seems that in some cases the consent of the plaintiff is taken into consideration in reducing damages, although it would seem that the court should itself judge of the reduction in question.[78]

8. INADEQUATE DAMAGES. Jur. 124, it was held that where damages have been appraised by the court of first instance, and the court of review has reduced the amount, the court of appeal would not interfere with the award of the intermediate court unless it appears that gross injustice has been done.

As to reducing amount of damages in appellate court see APPEAL AND ERROR, 3 Cyc. 430.

Reduction to nominal damages.—Where defendant had induced a person with whom a deed had been intrusted as an escrow to prove and record it, and the jury found that in so inducing her he was actuated by a fraudulent and malicious motive toward plaintiff, the latter had a good cause of action, and the jury were not confined to the actual pecuniary damages which plaintiff had sustained in consequence. It was held that the deed, although registered, could not operate to pass the title, and as plaintiff had proved no actual legal damage the verdict should be reduced to nominal damages. 78. Where, in an action for damages for the non-delivery of a telegram announcing the death of plaintiff's son, the jury awarded such large damages as to indicate that it was the result of passion, prejudice, corruption, or caprice, the action of the court in reducing the verdict to a proper amount with the consent of the plaintiff is proper, and a new trial is not necessary. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Frith, 105 Tenn. 167, 58 S. W. 118.

Reducing verdict.— In Miller v. Manitoba Lumber, etc., Co., 6 Manitoba 487, a verdict was rendered which could not be impeached except upon the ground of excessive damages, and it was held that the court might with the plaintiff's consent reduce the damages.

Where a verdict is found against the charge of the judge, and the uncontradicted evidence of the only witness examined at the trial for a larger amount than the evidence warrants, the court will either order a new trial, or if the plaintiff consents, reduce the damages to the sum warranted by the evidence. The court have power so to reduce the damages with the consent of the plaintiff alone, and against the will of the defendant. The question of costs in such cases will depend on the particular circumstances. Risser v. Hart, 5 Nova Scotia 727.

Where a verdict is so flagrantly excessive as to be only accounted for on the grounds of prejudice, passion, or misconception, a remittitur by the trial court as a condition of entering judgment does not remove the prejudice, passion, or misconception. These elements may have entered and probably did enter into the finding of other facts important to the issue, if not to the issue itself. Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Story, 104 Ill. the amount awarded is so small that it is evident the jury must have overlooked some material element of damage, the courts have extended such relief, either by increasing the verdict or granting a new trial.[80] The more general proceeding in such cases, however, is to set aside the verdict as being inadequate under the circumstances.[81]

XI. MEASURE OF DAMAGES.[82]

A. In General. The elementary rule for the measure of damages rests upon the principle of compensation to the party injured for the loss sustained, with the least burden to the party guilty of the breach consistent with the idea of fair compensation, and with the duty upon the party injured to exercise reasonable care to mitigate the injury, according to the opportunities that may fairly be or appear to be within his reach.[83] The measure of damages is governed, not by a fanciful price, but by the actual loss sustained,[84] and the same rule obtains whether the loss be claimed for injury to property, personal injury, or breach of contract.[85]

B. For Injuries to Person — 1. In General. In actions for personal injuries the law does not attempt to fix any precise rule for the measurement of damages, but from the necessity of the case leaves their assessment to the good sense and discretion of the jury.[86] The damages recoverable are dependent upon the circumstances of each particular case, and although the discretion of the jury must be largely depended on, the amount of the recovery must be based on evidence.[87] While, however, there is no absolute measure of damages in actions for personal injuries, the damages awarded should bear a fair basis of compensation for the injury sustained,[88] and should include everything of which a party has been deprived as a direct and natural consequence of the injury.[89] The jury should take into consideration the age and condition in life of the plaintiff, the physical injury inflicted, the bodily pain and mental anguish endured, all expenses incurred in the treatment of the case, and any and all damages which it may appear from the evidence have resulted or will result from the injury.[90] Whether the injury is temporary or permanent and whether a capacity to earn money has been reduced by the accident may also be taken into consideration.[91]

2. PHYSICAL AND MENTAL SUFFERING — a. In General. In estimating damages in cases of injury to the person, the jury may take into consideration the physical pain[92] and mental suffering[93] undergone by the plaintiff as a result of the injury inflicted; and although physical pain and mental anguish cannot be measured by money, and no established rule has been laid down for such measure, yet when properly shown in evidence they have always been considered an element of damage.[94] While mental suffering as distinguished from bodily pain is usually Consideration of motive.— In Craker v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 36 Wis. 657, 17 Am. Rep. 504 [overruling Wilson v. Young, 31 Wis. 574], it was held that in actions for personal torts, in awarding the compensatory damages recoverable of the principal for the agent's act, no distinction is to be made between other forms of mental suffering and that which consists in "a sense of wrong or insult" arising from an act really or apparently "dictated by a spirit of willful injustice or by a deliberate intention to vex, degrade or insult."

Time of suffering.— The pain of being fastened for half an hour in the wreck of a rail-

an element of damages in an action for personal injury,[95] some of the courts have declared that in order to warrant a recovery therefor a personal injury, however slight, must have resulted,[96] and such mental anguish must be the direct, necessary, and proximate result of the physical injuries sustained.[97] Mere anxiety of mind, unconnected with bodily injury, cannot as a general rule be included in the assessment of damages, unless the injury complained of is accompanied by circumstances of malice or wanton disregard of the rights of others.[98] The jury must consider the mental anguish which accompanies the injury itself, and are not allowed to take into consideration any sentimental anguish that may accompany or flow from the injury.[99]

96. Canning v. Williamstown, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 451. So where in an action to recover damages for a personal injury the plaintiff testified, "I was not hurt," yet the facts as he detailed them showed that he did sustain physical injury, and that he meant that he had sustained no serious injury, the court did not err in telling the jury that they might consider the mental suffering as an element of damage. City Transfer Co. v. Robinson, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 555.

In an action to recover for being bitten by a dog, pain and solicitude occasioned by the bite, including apprehension of poison and evil results therefrom, may be considered in estimating damages, although the dog was not shown to be rabid. Godeau v. Blood, 52 Vt. 251, 36 Am. Rep. 751.

No damages can be given by reason of peril and fright, not accompanied by some actual injury caused thereby and traceable directly thereto. Hall v. Manson, 90 Iowa 585, 58 N. Future of family.— In Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Douglass, 69 Tex. 694, 7 S. W. 77, it was held error to permit plaintiff to testify that since his injury his mind has been troubled by feelings of fear as to the future of his family, such mental suffering not being the natural result of the injury. So in an action for personal injuries, a recovery cannot be had on account of mental suffering of the injured party, because of his fear of dying as a result of the injuries and leaving his wife and children without means of living. Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Chance, 57 Kan. 40, 45 Pac. 60.

as must necessarily result from the injury inflicted.[1] The jury should assess damages for all injuries, past and prospective, bodily and mental, believed to be the necessary results of the injury inflicted.[2] What compensation may be fairly said to be adequate, on the evidence in any particular case, is a question of very great difficulty;[3] but only such future damages can be recovered as the evidence makes reasonably certain will necessarily result from the injury sustained.[4]

Duration of illness.— In awarding damages to a married woman, in an action by a husband and wife for an injury sustained by the defendant's negligence, the jury may consider the length of time she will be ill in consequence. Hunt v. Hoyt, 20 Ill. 544.

3. Loss of Time.[5] Where a party has by reason of personal injuries lost time from his ordinary employment through the negligence of another person he is entitled to damages therefor.[6]

4. Expenses Incurred[7] — a. In General. As a general rule, in cases of personal injury, a party is entitled to the medical expenses and treatment incurred, and the jury should take such expenses into consideration in estimating the same.[8] This consideration should also extend to the nursing and attendance upon the injured party, so far as the same is reasonably necessary as the result of the injury inflicted,[9] and in estimating such damages it is not necessary that such fees should have been paid where the evidence shows that they are due and payable.[10] While the question of gratuitous service has not been firmly settled, it seems that the jury in estimating the damages may allow for services thus performed,[11] and

"Reasonable probability."— In an action for injuries suffered from a brick falling on plaintiff's head from a building in course of erection, it was error to instruct that plaintiff was entitled to compensation "for the pain and suffering which she had endured, also for the pain which she might be likely" to, or that there is "a reasonable probability" that she will, endure, for she can recover only for such future pain as the evidence shows that she is reasonably certain to endure. Time measured by actual loss of wages.— The measure of damages for personal injuries, causing loss of time, is the wages actually lost, and not the market value of the average wages of a person of plaintiff's average capacity, working in the same employment. Board as an expense.— In Graeber v. Derwin, 43 Cal. 495, it was held in an action for personal injuries that the jury could not include in their admeasurement of damages money paid by the plaintiff for his board during the time he was disabled.

Payment of wages.— In an action to recover for personal injuries, the defendant is not relieved by the fact that a third person continued to pay the plaintiff wages during his disability. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the expenses of his cure, the value of his time, and for other elements of damages that result from the injury complained of. Drinkwater v. Dinsmore, 16 Hun (N. Value of husband's services.— It has been held that where a husband, while not allowed to introduce evidence as to the amount of salary or wages which he might have earned by working at his trade or profession, might recover the value of the services of a competent servant or nurse to perform the same duties. Salida v. McKinna, 16 Colo. 523, 27 Pac. 810; Hazard Powder Co. v. Volger, 58 Fed. 152, 158, 7 C. C. A. 130, 136.

10. See supra, VII, I, 5.

Physician not qualified.— In Chicago v. Honey, 10 Ill. App. 535, the plaintiff sought to recover a bill for medical attendance which had not been paid. From the evidence it appeared that the attending physician was not qualified to practice under the statutes of the state, and in such case it was held that the amount of the bill was not an element of damages to be considered by the jury. To the same effect see San Antonio St. R. Co. v. Muth, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 443, 27 S. W. 752.

Unskilful treatment.— In Leighton v. Sargent, 31 N. H. 119, 64 Am. Dec. 323, upon the question of damages, the increased amount paid to a surgeon to effect a cure, by means of injuries resulting from the unskilful treatment of another surgeon, was properly considered by the jury. in some states compensation will be allowed for services performed by members of the plaintiff's own family.[12]

b. Recovery by Married Woman. As a general rule a married woman cannot recover expenses incurred by reason of a personal injury, since such expenses are presumed in law to result to the husband.[13] While this may be stated as the general rule, in some jurisdictions a married woman has been allowed to recover expenses for personal injuries under such circumstances;[14] and her right of recovery for such expenses will never be denied where they are liable to become a charge upon her separate estate.[15]

5. Impairment of Earning Capacity[16] — a. In General. Where the result of the injury has been such as to impair the earning capacity of the plaintiff the jury in estimating the damages may take such fact into consideration,[17] but the rule as to the admeasurement of damages in such cases is very difficult to be defined. Various courts have adopted different rules varying somewhat according to the circumstances of the particular case presented for investigation.[18]

17. See supra, VII, F.

No additional recovery.— In an action for damages for personal injuries plaintiff cannot recover for his own loss of time and capacity to labor, and in addition what he has to pay another to supply that loss of labor. Blackman v. Gardiner, etc., Bridge, 75 Me. 214. Loss to a person injured of profits in conducting a business in which he hired other persons to work is not a necessary consequence of the injury. The extent of his recovery on such ground would be what his services were worth in conducting the business. Silsby v. Michigan Car Co., 95 Mich. 204, 54 N. W. 761.

No evidence of earning ability.— Where it appears that plaintiff's right arm has been rendered useless by the accident, it is proper to instruct the jury to take into consideration in estimating the damages plaintiff's future inability to labor or transact business, although at the time of the injury he was not engaged in any business or occupation and there was no evidence of his earning ability. Fisher v. Jansen, 128 Ill. 549, 21 N. E. 598.

The administrator in whose name an action for personal injuries has been revived may recover the same damages the intestate could have recovered had she lived, including damages for mental and physical suffering up to the time of death, and for diminution of earning power during a period of life which she would probably have lived had the accident not occurred. Maher v. Philadelphia Traction Co., 181 Pa. St. 617, 37 Atl. 571.

18. Thus it has been held that the measure of damages for the loss of earning power is not a sum the income from which would be equal to the difference between the amount he could have earned if uninjured and that which he is able to earn in his injured condition. Morrison v. Long Island R. Co., 3 N. Y. App. Div. 205, 38 N. Y. Suppl. 393. In an action against a city for personal injury from a defective sidewalk, the measure of damages was considered to be the direct expenses, the inconvenience, pain, and pecuniary loss sustained and likely to be sustained during life, and the plaintiff's actual permanent loss of earning power from the accident; and it was held that the wages which he might be receiving would not go in mitigation of damages, but might be considered with other things to prove his earning powers. McLaughlin v. Corry, 77 Pa. St. 109, 18 Am. Rep. 432. In Baltimore etc., R. Co. v. Henthorne, 73 Fed. 634, 19 C. C. A. 623, it was held that the proper measure of damages for loss of earning capacity of one who has been injured by another's wrongful act is the sum required to purchase for such person an annuity equal to the difference between his probable yearly earnings during his entire life in his actual condition and as he would have been had he not suffered the injury.

Fluctuating profits.— In an action for personal injuries it is error to permit plaintiff to make an estimate of the annual value of his labor, and the jury to find a verdict, based on the business of a steam thresher in which plaintiff at one time had an interest, but which he had parted with before he met his injuries, where no allowance was made for the cost and wear of machinery, where the amounts earned in the business fluctuated widely, and where plaintiff had partners who divided with him, but it did not appear in what proportions. Boston, etc., R. Co. v. O'Reilly, 158 U. S. 334, 15 S. Ct. 830, 39 L. ed. 1006.

Reference to mortuary tables.— In an ac-

The jury may consider evidence as to plaintiff's age, probable expectancy of life, and earnings, but cannot fix a basis of computation without regard to plaintiff's capacity, if any, to earn money since the injuries and in the future, nor should such facts be considered otherwise than as circumstances to be weighed in arriving at a fair pecuniary compensation for the loss to plaintiff from the injuries received.[19]

b. Age, Condition in Life, and Earning Capacity. In estimating the damages the jury should take into consideration the age[20] and condition in life of the party injured.[21] They should also take into consideration the ordinary business of the plaintiff and his manner of living,[22] together with a consideration of the tion for personal injuries, the jury was instructed that, if plaintiff is "permanently injured, you may refer to the mortality tables in evidence to ascertain the number of years which a man of plaintiff's age may be expected to live. Then ascertain from this what his earning capacity is for one year. If his earning capacity has been diminished, then take the proportion of what he could have earned and multiply it by the number of years of his expectancy." It was held proper. Columbus v. Sims, 94 Ga. 483, 20 S. E. 332.

19. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Cooper, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 42, 20 S. W. 990; Grant v. Union Pac. R. Co., 45 Fed. 673. In a personal injury case, a physician called by plaintiff testified that if the injured foot was used "as we ordinarily use ours" the irritation would produce an open ulcer. He had previously testified that the foot was permanently weakened. It was held that the evidence, being admissible on the question of impairment of earning capacity, was not objectionable as permitting a recovery both for the permanent impairment of the foot and for the consequences of an attempt to use it in the ordinary fashion, it not appearing that the jury had in fact so interpreted it. Injury to social position.— In an action for false imprisonment and compelling plaintiff by assault and menaces to execute and deliver a promissory note, compensatory damages may include delay in business, permanent disability and disfigurement, bodily pain, mental anguish from a sense of humiliation, and any injury to the plaintiff's business, profession, reputation, or social position. Wealth of parties.— In assessing damages the jury cannot take into consideration the "condition in life" of the parties, that is, whether they are rich or poor. Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409; Shea v. Potrero, etc., R. Co., 44 Cal. 414.

The rule that the reduction of one's earning powers, mental or physical, may be considered in estimating his damages in case of personal injury was applied where a passenger, a dealer in lands, was injured by a collision on a railroad; and it was held that the loss of anticipated profits from a quantity of land on hand was not mere speculative profits, but a proper subject of compensation in damages. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Dale, 76 Pa. St. 47.

Particular profession.— In an action for personal injuries plaintiff will not be entitled to recover special damages on account of his particular calling or profession. Holyoke v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 48 N. H. 541. Where the evidence shows that plaintiff was a practising lawyer, that his injury confined him to the house for four days, and rendered his shoulder so stiff that he could write for only a few minutes at a time, and that this earnings of the plaintiff at his trade or profession before and after the injury was inflicted.[23]

c. Recovery by Married Woman. The question whether a married woman living with her husband can recover damages for an injury which incapacitates her for labor is one not well settled by the courts. The better opinion on this subject seems to be that she has such an interest in her working capacity as to entitle her to the damages claimed.[24] Some of the courts have drawn the dis-disability interfered with the practice of his profession, it is proper to instruct the jury in determining the damages to consider the nature and extent of plaintiff's injuries, the loss of time occasioned thereby, and any disability to labor or engage in his usual vocation. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Butler, 10 Ind. App. 244, 38 N. E. 1.

No license.— In an action by a woman who kept a lying-in hospital, where she delivered, nursed, and boarded her patients, to recover damages for personal injuries, it is not error for the trial court to exclude from the recovery the money earned by her as midwife, on the ground that she had no license, and to permit the question of her losses as nurse and boarding-house keeper to go to the jury. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Lambert, 119 Ill. 255, 10 N. E. 219.

Skill at another trade.— The fact that a person when injured was engaged as a section-hand and was earning but one dollar and twenty-five cents a day will not prevent his pleading and proving that he was skilled in another trade and capable of earning more at such trade. Diminution of ordinary receipts.— In an action for injuries to the plaintiff, caused by the negligence of the defendant's servants in operating a railroad, evidence of the nature and extent of the plaintiff's business, and the loss resulting to him from inability to attend to it by reason of the injury may properly be admitted; and it is not error to instruct the jury that "if a man has an ordinary business yielding ordinary receipts, he will be entitled to recover the diminution of those receipts resulting from such injury." Kinney v. Crocker, 18 Wis. 74.

Evidence of amount of earnings.—A teacher of languages, in his suit for an injury caused by defendant's negligence, may show on the question of damages the number of his pupils and the amount of his earnings in the years prior to the accident. Simonin v. New York, etc., R. Co., 36 Hun (N. Y.) 214.

Present worth.— Where future payments for the loss of earning power are to be anticipated and capitalized in a verdict, the plaintiff is entitled only to their present worth. Goodhart v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 177 Pa. St. 1, 35 Atl. 191, 55 Am. St. Rep. 705.

Wages continued.—Evidence that the hearing in one of plaintiff's ears had been permanently destroyed, that the sight of one eye had been seriously impaired, and that his nervous system had received a shock from which he might never recover, and which at the time of the trial impaired his capacity for transacting his former business, warrants the granting of substantial damages, although the wages of plaintiff were not cut off or diminished by the injury, and he has not been subjected to any pecuniary loss. Domestic services.— In a suit by a husband for personal injuries to his wife, brought since the act of 1860, providing that earnings of any married woman from her labor shall be her sole and separate property, he can recover only for the loss of her society, and for the loss of such domestic services as are usually performed by a wife in the household of her husband, having regard to their surroundings and condition in life, but for the loss of her earning power over and above such services an action can be maintained only by the wife, without regard to whether such earning power is expended in the service of her husband or of another. London v. Cunningham, 1 Misc. (N. Y.) 408, 20 N. Y. Suppl. 882.

Injuries before marriage.— In an action by a husband and wife to recover for injuries sustained by the wife before her marriage, the jury may take into consideration the loss of the wife's capacity to earn money, as the right of the wife to be supported by her hustinction between the separate and independent employment on the part of the wife and a mere claim of recovery while under the husband's protection. In such latter cases it has been held that where a married woman lives with her husband and has no business of her own, there can be no recovery for impaired capacity for labor.[25]

6. PERMANENT INJURIES — a. In General. In assessing damages the jury may take into consideration whether the injury complained of is permanent or merely temporary in its nature, and award damages according to the circumstances of the particular case under consideration.[26] In order to justify the assessment of damages for future or permanent disability, it must appear that a continued or permanent disability is reasonably certain to result from the injury complained of.[27]

Personal services.— In Minick v. Troy, 19 Hun (N. Y.) 253, it was held that although, in an action to recover damages against a city, a married woman could not recover on the ground of her inability to render services which belong to her husband, yet she might recover for the loss of such as are personal to herself.

No independent employment.— A married woman cannot recover damages, in an action in her own right, for an injury to her person, for the permanent diminution of her earning capacity, if at the time of the injury she was living with her husband, and was not engaged in any independent employment. Such suit must be in the husband's name under the Pennsylvania act of June 3, 1887. Carr v. Easton, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 403.

b. Disfigurement of Person.[28] In estimating damages in cases of personal injury where a disfigurement or deformity of the person has occurred, the jury may take such fact into consideration.[29]

7. Injuries to Health. In estimating the damages the jury may take into consideration the effect upon the health of the party injured[30] and may consider not only the present but also the future effect upon the health of the party injured.[31]

8. Suit by Husband For Injuries to Wife. While as a general rule the husband may recover for the loss of his wife's services on account of a personal injury,[32] yet in estimating the amount of damages the jury should take into consideration the nature of the services and the circumstances under which they were rendered.[33] The jury in estimating damages should also consider the necessary expenses incurred,[34] unless such expenses are made a charge upon the separate estate of the Millinery business.— In an action for injuries to plaintiff's wife, where the complaint alleges that plaintiff was conducting a large millinery business, and his wife acted as manager thereof, that by reason of her injuries he was deprived of her services as such manager, to his damage, plaintiff can recover for such loss of service, and evidence tending to show the amount of damage sustained on that account is admissible. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Twiname, 121 Ind. 375, 23 N. E. 159, 7 L. R. A. 352.

34. Hopkins v. Atlantic, etc., R. Co., 36 N. H. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 287. In an action by the husband against a town for the loss of the wife's services, etc., the result of injuries received by her, occasioned by reason of the insufficiency of a highway, he may recover the sum paid for necessary labor substituted for the ordinary service of the wife, and for his own services in attending upon her. Lindsey v. Danville, 46 Vt. 144.

Value of husband's services.—While a husband may, in an action for damages resulting from injuries sustained by his wife by reason of the negligence and carelessness of another, in some cases recover for the loss of his own time in attending and nursing his wife, the value of his time while so engaged is determinable with reference to its value as a nurse; and he cannot recover, in addition, for the loss of his time, as such, its value in wife.[35] While mental anguish in some states is considered an element of damages when the suit is on the part of the husband for injuries to the wife,[36] yet the more favored rule[37] and the one of more general acceptation[38] denies compensation for such cause.

9. Suit by Parent For Injuries to Child. In an action by a parent to recover damages for an injury to an infant child, the jury may assess damages for all reasonable expenses incurred by the parent in treatment of the injury;[39] and where the injury is of such a serious nature as to render the infant a burden upon the hands of his parent the latter may recover for the additional expense to which he is subjected.[40] The parent may also recover damages for the loss of the infant's service.[41] The weight of authority in England is to the effect that in an action by a parent for injuries to his minor child under his care, the gravamen of the action is the loss of service; as incidental to which he may recover the expense of nursing and healing the child. But if the child be of such tender years that it was incapable of rendering any service whatever there could be no recovery even for the expenses.[42] But in this country a more liberal rule has been adopted; and the best considered cases hold that inasmuch as it is a duty enjoined by the law of the land as well as by the laws of nature upon the parent to care for and heal his injured minor child, he who wilfully or negligently occasioned the injury his ordinary occupation, nor for the reasonable value of his time which he may have lost from his business. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Morris, 10 Kan. App. 61, 61 Pac. 972. So it was held in Walker v. Philadelphia, 195 Pa. St. 168, 45 Atl. 657, 78 Am. St. Rep. 801, that the recovery to which a husband was entitled against one through whose negligence his wife is injured, because of his employment of a person to wait on her, is the ordinary wages for such attendance, not what such person could have earned in the employment which she gave up so that she might wait on the wife.

should be held responsible for the expenses incurred without reference to the capacity of the child to render service to the parents.[43] It seems, however, that the parent is only entitled to recover for the loss of services up to the time that the infant shall acquire his majority;[44] although in an action brought by the infant in his own behalf the jury may take into consideration his loss of earnings after he shall have attained his majority.[45] The right of a parent to recover in case of physical injuries to a minor child is founded solely upon the assumption

In an action to recover damages for the death of a child five years of age, it was error to instruct the jury, if they should find for plaintiff, to fix the damage at a fair equivalent in money for the power of deceased to earn money, lost by reason of the destruction of his life, and that in fixing the damages they should "take into consideration the age of the deceased at the time of his death, his earning capacity, and the probable duration of his life," as the words "his earning capacity" were probably misleading, and should have been omitted, in view of the tender years of decedent. Increased wages.— Where plaintiff's infant son received injuries while in defendant's employ, which caused loss of time and rendered him unable to perform home duties formerly performed, and there was evidence that defendant paid him for some work after the injury at a less rate than before, a loss sufficient to authorize a recovery was established, although the boy may have received more wages after the injury than before. No recovery for nursing.— A mother is entitled to recover, as damages for an injury to her minor son, occasioned by the negligence of defendant, for the loss of the son's services until he is twenty-one years of age, the cost of medical attendance, whether the same has been paid or not, and for the diminished ability of the son to earn money, in consequence of the injury, up to the time of his twenty-first year. But the mother is not entitled to recover the loss to her from having to nurse her son, and being prevented from earning anything outside. Cincinnati Omnibus Co. v. Kuhnell, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 197, 11 Cinc. L. Bul. 189.

No recovery for support.— In an action brought by a mother to recover damages for injuries sustained by her minor son through defendant's negligence, she will be entitled to have the wages he could have earned during his minority assessed as damages in her favor, without deduction for his support, which legally devolved upon her. Mauerman v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 41 Mo. App. 348.

Permanent injury.— Where a boy nine years old is injured so as to be a cripple for life, it is proper for the jury in estimating damages to consider the resulting impairment of capacity to earn a living after his majority. Schmitz v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 119 Mo. 256, 24 S. W. 472, 23 L. R. A. 250.

45. Where an injury to a minor child results in the loss of its services for a period during its minority, the parent may recover for loss of services during the minority, and the child for their loss after coming of age. Traver v. Eighth Ave. R. Co., 4 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 422, 3 Keyes (N. Y.) 497, 3 Transcr. App. (N. Y.) 203, 6 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 46. So in an action by an infant in the care and custody of its father for personal injuries it is error to instruct the jury that his lessened earning capacity is an element of damages, unless it is limited to the period from which the child would be entitled to his own earnings. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Krayenbuhl, (Nebr. 1902) 91 N. W. 880. In Rosenkranz v. Lindell R. Co., 108 Mo. 9, 17, 18 S. W. 890, 32 Am. St. Rep. 588, the court said: "The impairment of the earning capacity of one in his infancy is as great a damage to him, as though he had not been injured until the day he reached his majority. That he would have an equal right to compensation logically follows. This plaintiff had never earned anything, and what his ability to labor or his capacity for earning money in business pursuits will be in the future no one can tell with any certainty. It is properly held in such case, in the absence of the existence of direct evidence, that much must be left to the judgment, common experience and 'enlightened conscience of the jurors, guided by the facts and circumstances in the case.'" In Western, etc., R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 7 S. E. 912, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320, it was held that for a personal injury to a child nine years of age, including loss of a member, the law furnishes no measure of damages other than the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, guided by all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. Among the results of the injury to be considered are pain and suffering, dis-that such injury has wrought pecuniary loss to the parent, and is not affected by the extent of the pain and suffering of the child,[46] or the mental anguish he may have endured.[47]

10. Suit by Personal Representative. In actions by a personal representative to recover damages for injuries to the deceased, damages may be allowed for pain and suffering,[48] for loss of time,[49] and for all items of expense which were a proper charge and which were paid in consequence of the injury;[50] but it seems that in such cases his death must have resulted from some other cause than the injuries which he has suffered.[51]

C. For Injuries to Property — 1. Personalty — a. In General. In measuring the damages for injury to or destruction of personal property, the jury should take into consideration the character of the injury and under what circumstances rendered as well as the length of time that damages have been withheld.[52] It seems, however, that evidence furnishing a basis for a money estimate must be produced in all cases before substantial damages can be recovered for the injury claimed.[53] Where property has been lost or destroyed through the negligent act of another, the usual rule as to the measure of damages is the reasonable worth of the property at the time of its destruction;[54] and the courts have in some figurement and mutilation of the person, and impaired capacity to pursue the ordinary avocations of life at and after attainment of majority.

instances allowed interest for the use of the property.[55] The general rule adopted as a measure of damages for injury to property is the difference between its value before and after the injury alleged,[56] although in some cases the rule of restoration has received the sanction of the courts.[57]

b. Animals.[58] In cases of injury to animals the question of damages depends somewhat upon the question whether there is a market for the animal injured or destroyed. Where there is a market for the animal injured or destroyed, the measure of damages is the difference between its market value before and after the injury.[59] When no circumstances of aggravation appear, the courts have held that the damages should be confined to the value of the animal at the time of the injury[60] or its reduction in value by reason of such injury.[61] Where an animal is killed and its body possesses a monetary value, the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the animal alive and its monetary value after death.[62] Where the animal is only injured, the measure of damages is to be measured by the difference in value before and after the injury inflicted;[63] but the owner is entitled to recover for all reasonable care and expense attendant upon the injury.[64] At times the courts have taken into consideration the duration of the disability occasioned by the injury[65] and the value of the time spent and the reasonable expense incurred;[66] and again they have considered the market value of the animal injured and have measured the damages from such standard.[67]

2. Real Property — a. In General. In an action for damages to a house, occasioned by the melting of ice stored in the adjoining building, plaintiff cannot recover for the depreciation in the rental value up to the time of the trial, the permanent depreciation in the value of the property, and also the cost of repairing the house, so that in the future it will be unaffected by the proximity of the ice, as the two latter elements are inconsistent and practically give plaintiff double damages. Rental value of buildings.— The courts

In order, however, for the court to consider the difference in rental value there must be some evidence to that effect, and mere speculative rent will not be considered.[70] In some cases the cost of repair or restoration has been adopted as the measure of damages;[71] but in such event the cost of repair must be reasonable and bear some proportion to the injury sustained.[72]

b. By Excavation and Carrying Away Soil. As a general rule the measure of damages for unlawful excavation or removal of soil from real estate is the diminution in value of the land,[73] although some courts have held that the real measure is the value of the land removed[74] or the cost of restoring it to its former condition.[75]

c. By Obstruction to Premises or Place of Business.[76] The measure of damages in case of obstruction to premises or places of business has usually been held to be the difference in the rental value or the receipts and profits before and after the injury complained of,[77] and the value of the business obstructed is a

The application of this rule depends upon whether the injury or loss is partial or total. In an action for damages to residence property by reason of dirt being deposited thereon, thereby demolishing the outhouses, fences, and shrubbery, the measure of damages is not the difference between the market value of the lot just before and after the injury, but it is the amount it would take to put the premises in as "good" a condition as before the injury, allowing deductions therefrom for any increased value of the lot arising from the deposit of the dirt thereon. In an action by a grantee to recover damages of his grantor for his refusal for a number of years to remove a large amount of heavy machinery, whereby plaintiff is deprived of the use of the property, he may recover the annual loss by reason of his inability to use it or obtain any income therefrom, but not for loss of capital, value, dilapidation, or destruction. In a suit for damages for obstructing a ferry landing, where it appears that the lease under which the ferry was operated had ex-proper item of damages to be taken into consideration by the jury in arriving at a conclusion.[78]

d. By Removal of Lateral Support. In measuring the damages for unlawful removal of lateral support, the courts have considered the diminution in value of the land injured rather than the cost of repairs.[79]

e. From Fire. In cases of damages resulting from fire the courts have differed in their measure; some holding that the plaintiff can recover whatever amount of damages he is shown to have sustained,[80] while other courts have held that the measure of damages is the difference in the value of the land before and after the fire occurred.[81]

f. From Overflow. In measuring the damages for the overflow of land the pired, the measure of damages is the actual loss by the obstruction, as shown by the loss of tolls. Jones v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., (Pa. 1887) 11 Atl. 608; Pittsburgh, etc., R. By reason of the undermining of plaintiff's land by defendant, and the consequent subsidence of the natural strata of rock below the surface thereof, it became impracticable to erect on the land very heavy buildings, for which purpose it was otherwise adapted, except by the construction of foundations of extraordinary depth, extending below the disturbed strata. It was held that the damages recoverable for the injuries were to be measured by the diminution in the market value of the property, not by the cost of construction of such foundation walls, although less than such diminution. Consent of owner.— Where a lot owner in excavating on his lot injures the wall of the adjacent owner standing three inches back from the line, such adjacent owner cannot recover even nominal damages for injury to his building on account of the displacement of the three inches of ground, if such displacement was with his consent. Where a city excavates a street so negligently as to take away the support of an abutting lot, and to cause the soil thereof to slide into the street, the owner is entitled to recover for damage to the buildings on the lot, unless their own weight contributed to the sliding of the soil and their consequent injuries. Meadow land.— Where a meadow is destroyed by fire, the measure of damages is the cost of reseeding the meadow and its rental value until it is restored; and it is error to charge that in determining the damages its condition before the fire should be compared with its condition thereafter. St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Jones, 59 Ark. 105, 26 S. W. 595. Where in an action for the burning of land the evidence of damages relied on tends to show its depreciation in value as meadow land, it is not error to charge the jury to find such sum as will compensate for the injury done to the turf and roots, taking into consideration the purposes to which the land was appropriated or adapted, instead of declaring the damages to be the difference in the market value of the land immediately before and after the injury. courts have not been consistent in their rulings. As a general rule it may be stated that the measure of damages for a wrongful act of this kind is the actual damage which the land has sustained by the overflow.[82] In some cases the courts have held that the measure of damages should be the difference in the market value of the land before and after the overflow;[83] while in other cases the fair rental value of the land has been considered the criterion by which the damages should be measured.[84] injury,[85] although in some cases the courts have allowed interest from the date of destruction.[86] While the general rule is as above stated, other standards of measurement have been adopted, such as the market value of the crop less the cost of producing, harvesting, and marketing it;[87] but the measure of damages will not be extended to the conjectural value of the crops at the time of their maturity.[88]

Where in an action for the destruction of a growing crop the only evidence offered by which the value of the crop could be ascertained was the cost of planting and cultivating up to the time of the destruction the judgment will be reversed, as the proper method of determining the value of such crop is to prove its probable yield under proper cultivation, the value of the yield when matured and ready for sale, the expense of producing it, harvesting it, and preparing it for, and transporting it to, market. Co., 38 Iowa 518, the measure of damages against a railroad company for injuries to growing crops caused by defendant's failure to construct cattle-guards was held to be the market value of the crops when matured, less the expense of fitting them for market from the time of the injury, and diminished by the value of the portion of the crops saved.

88. Gresham v. Taylor, 51 Ala. 505; International, etc., R. Co. v. Benitos, 59 Tex. 326; Taul v. Shanklin, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 1135. Where growing corn was destroyed by cattle after the owner had expended on the crop all the labor it was necessary to expend before harvesting, it was held that, although the destruction of the corn at that stage of its growth was the loss of all the corn that would have matured had it not been destroyed, the owner could recover only the value of the corn at the time of the injury. Richardson v. Northrup, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 85. In an action to recover damages for injuries done to growing crops by the defendant's hogs, it was held to be error to admit evidence of what the crops injured in June would have been worth in the fall if uninjured. Hays v. Crist, 4 Kan. 350.

In those cases where the crop is of a permanent nature, such as growing grass, and its destruction has injured the land itself, it has been held that the measure of damages is the diminished value of the land after the injury;[89] but if the thing destroyed, although it is part of the realty, has a value which can be accurately measured and ascertained, without reference to the value of the soil in which it stands or out of which it grows, the recovery must be for the value of the thing thus destroyed, and not for the difference in the value of the land before and after such destruction.[90]

h. Injury to Riparian Owners.[91] Riparian rights are property and are valuable, and although they must be enjoyed in due subjection to the rights of the property they cannot be arbitrarily or capriciously destroyed or impaired, and where damages are claimed for loss of such rights they may be recovered.[92] The measure of damages in such cases depends upon the amount of injury inflicted and the nature of the rights violated.[93] While the courts have not been agreed as to whether the true measure of damages would be the depreciation in value of the property or the cost of restoration,[94] they have been inclined to the latter view,[95] unless the cost of remedying the injury equals or exceeds the cost of the thing injured, in which case such value becomes the measure of damages.[96]

Permanent injury.— Where an overflow of land only damages the crops thereon and causes no permanent injury to the land except as showing a liability on its part to further similar overflows, it is error to instruct the jury that they may compensate the owner for permanent injury to his land by estimating its value before and after the overflow. is a question of law to be determined by strict legal rules.[98] Where parties have fixed the measure of damages in the contract itself such measure will usually be adopted;[99] and so where the parties to a contract of sale have such knowledge of special circumstances affecting the question of damages as that it may be fairly inferred they contemplated a particular rule for estimating them and entered into the contract on that basis, that rule should be adopted.[1] The general rule as to the measure of damages in case of a breach of contract, where there is no bad faith or fraud in evidence, is the amount of damages which naturally result or flow from the breach complained of; and must be such as the parties contemplated as a probable consequence of a breach, and which are capable of being reasonably ascertained.[2] In other words the measure of damages is the damage which actually results from the breach, and which will compensate the party for the injury sustained,[3] together with the expense or cost to which he may have been subjected as a consequence of the breach.[4] In such actions the question is not what the plaintiff paid because of the breach but the value of that for which he paid.[5] Remote, speculative, or consequential damages are not allowed, unless they

No measure.— The general rule as to the measure of damages in an action for breach of contract is the actual loss sustained; but where from the nature of the contract no possible mode is left of ascertaining the damage the court will adopt the only measure of damages which remains, and that is the price agreed to be paid. Amount of hire of similar property.— Where A contracted to furnish B a boat at a specified time to be used in conveying excursionists to and from different points, an excursion train being expected to arrive at the time fixed, it was held that if A knew of the excursion and the use to which B intended to put the boat, the measure of damages would be what a boat like A's would be worth at such a time. Damages accruing after institution of suit. — In Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Dunman, 85 Tex. 176, 19 S. W. 1073, plaintiff conveyed certain land to defendant in consideration of defendant's agreement to fill a certain tank belonging to plaintiff with water at fixed intervals. Defendant failed to perform. It was held that plaintiff's measure of damages, accruing after termination of the contract by institution of suit, is the reasonable value of the use of the land and privileges.

In case of uncertainty as to the value of an amount claimed the rule is to assess on the basis of the lowest sum. Jones' Appeal, 62 Pa. St. 324.

Nothing paid.— The rule of damages for the breach of special contracts, where nothing has been paid, is to give the difference between what was to be paid by one party and the value of what was to be done by the other party. Royalton v. Royalton, etc., Turnpike Co., 14 Vt. 311.

can be traced solely to the breach of the contract, or are capable of exact computation.[6] Thus speculative profits are too remote to be included in the estimate of such damages.[7]

2. PARTIAL PERFORMANCE. In cases where there has been a partial performance of the contract before the breach, the defendant should be charged with the costs and expenses of the plaintiff in completing that part of the contract remaining unperformed,[8] provided such expenses are reasonable[9] and are not too remotely connected with the breach complained of.[10]

3. DELAY IN PERFORMANCE. Where there has been a delay in the performance of a contract, the owner of the property may recover as damages the value of its

Contract to forbear or dismiss suit.— The damages for a breach of an agreement to forbear to collect a debt cannot be greater than the amount of such debt with interest and costs, and cannot include damages arising from a forced sale on execution. Indiana, etc., R. Co. v. Scearce, 23 Ind. 223. In Deyo v. Waggoner, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 241, A for a consideration of five dollars promised to forbear the payment of a note given by B for six months. A did not forbear, but sued B on the note within the time stipulated. It was held in an action for a breach of this agreement that A was entitled to recover the five dollars paid by him and the costs in the suit on the note, but not for any consequential damages, or for the trouble, inconvenience, and expense he had been put to in being obliged to leave his business and in raising money to pay the note.

Expenses in acquiring professional knowledge.— In an action by an artist to recover the value of a portrait of children, painted for a father, who refused to accept it, it is error to instruct the jury to give as damages what the picture was worth, and what the artist's services were worth, taking into consideration the exhausting studies necessary to acquire skill as an artist and the time consumed and expenses incurred in acquiring professional knowledge and distinction. Turner v. Mason, 65 Mich. 662, 32 N. W. 846.

The idleness of workmen, delay in business, and expenses in attempting to procure elsewhere the articles contracted for are not to be considered in estimating damages for the non-fulfilment of a contract. Walker v. Ellis, 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 515.

The reason stated for discarding expected profits as an element in the estimation of the loss is that the party charged is not presumed to have made his contract with reference to such results, unless the special circumstances are communicated to him at the time; but where they are such as he ought to have contemplated, as a reasonable and probable result of his breach, they will affect the measure of damages in favor of the complaining party. Allowance for inferior work.— In Bush v. Jones, 2 Tenn. Ch. 190, it was held that the measure of damages in cases of partial performance of a special agreement is ordinarily the difference between the contract price and the value of the work done, estimating the latter upon the basis of the contract price for the class of work contracted for and allowing for inferior work accordingly.

Service of city employees.— Where a city completed the construction of waterworks after the contractors had failed to carry out their contract, as it had a right to do under such contract, in a suit by the city on the contractors' bond, it was held that a charge was properly made for the services of men permanently in the employ of the city, they having done much extra work for which the contractors would have had to pay an equal amount, and that sums of money paid in settlement of claims for damages from blasting, etc., were chargeable, although no notice was given to the contractors before settling. Conjectures of witnesses.— Where a slave was hired for the purpose of making a crop and then taken away by the owner, it seems that the measure of damages is the hire of the slave, the rent of the land, all the expenses incurred, and actual loss sustained, rather than the conjecture of a witness as to what the crop would have been worth. Hobbs v. Davis, 30 Ga. 423.

use during the period covered by the delay;[11] and such damages have usually been measured by a sum equal to the rental value of the property during the period of delay.[12] It seems, however, that in order to recover the rental value of the property during the time of delay, some evidence of opportunity to rent must be introduced in evidence.[13] Where no time is specified in the contract as to the completion of the work, it should be performed within a reasonable time, and the measure of damages for an unreasonable delay is the difference between the market value of the property at the time of delivery and when it should have been delivered under the terms of the contract.[14] Where there has been a delay under a contract for the construction of vessels, the measure of damages will usually be the ordinary hire of the vessel during the time of delay,[15] and there can be no recovery for speculative or prospective profits claimed as a result of the delay.[16]

4. Defects in Performance. Where a contract has been defectively performed and damages are claimed for such reason, the damages should be measured by the difference between the value of the property in its defective condition and its value if it had been completed in compliance with the contract;[17] and

Rental value of machines.— In an action for a breach of contract to furnish ice machines by a certain time, the set-off of the fair rental value of the machines for the time they were used before acceptance cannot be estimated on the actual number of days they were worked, when it appears they were not worked the whole of each day; but the total product during that time, divided by the full daily capacity of the machines, will show the number of days that ought to be reckoned. Suppl. 174, it was held that, where the plaintiff had rented part of the premises before the time for completing the contract for repairs, and had also rented other portions of the premises after the repairs were made, loss of rent as an item of damage could not be allowed.

It is not sufficient to prove merely the conjectural rental value to entitle a recovery on that ground. The plaintiff must show what amount in rents he would probably in fact have recovered. Savage v. Glenn, 10 Oreg. 440.

this rule obtains even where the property as delivered has no market value.[18] The measure of damages in such cases has been held to be the costs and expenses reasonably necessary to make the work conform to the requirements of the contract, on the principle that plaintiff is entitled to work such as he contracted for.[19]

5. PREVENTION OF PERFORMANCE. Where a party has contracted to perform certain work and is prevented by the other party to the contract from entering on or completing the same the measure of damages is usually considered to be the amount that might have been realized had the contract been carried to completion.[20] The compensation agreed upon is prima facie the measure of dam-

Decrease in value after repair.— Where in an action to recover for sawing logs the defense rests upon bad sawing, the measure of plaintiff's recovery was held to be the contract price, deducting therefrom the cost of resawing the logs and the decrease in value still existing after such resawing. Grice v. Noble, 66 Mich. 700, 33 N. W. 768.

Loss of profit during delay.—Where A contracted to put up certain machinery in a mill and promised to pay plaintiffs all damages which they should sustain by reason of its insufficiency, it was held that if the machinery was insufficient plaintiffs were entitled to recover such sum as would be sufficient to put the machinery in such condition as was contemplated by the contract, and such sum as the mill would have earned during the time it was necessarily delayed in consequence of the breakage or defects in the machinery, taking the fair, ordinary net profits. Davis v. Talcott, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 611. See also Wade v. Haycock, 25 Pa. St. 382. So also it was held in Blanchard v. Ely, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 342, 34 Am. Dec. 250, which was an action to recover the price stipulated for building a steamboat, that the plaintiff might recover the full amount, without any deduction for damages to the defendant for the loss of trips and the profits resulting therefrom on account of defects in the boat or its machinery.

Rebuilding not in conformance with contract.— If the machinist has failed to fulfil his contract as to capacity, and has abandoned it, but the mill has not thereupon been shut down and adjusted to such capacity, he is not liable for the time that would reasonably have been required for that purpose, nor for the time actually consumed, more than two years after, for repairs and rebuilding not made to conform to his contract. Partial use of preparatory work.— Where in an action for a breach of contract to cut and haul logs the evidence showed that the contractor had used the preparatory work after its completion for the delivery of part of the logs, an instruction that such contractor was entitled to the cost of his preparatory work, without any deduction of the value that he had derived from its use prior him to perform his agreement.[24] If profits form a constituent element of the contract and their loss is a natural and proximate result of the breach, and such as may be reasonably presumed to have been contemplated by the contract and the parties, they are usually considered the measure of damages;[25] but in order to warrant a recovery they must be such as may be estimated with reasonable certainty, and where they are merely speculative, conjectural, or too remote they will not be allowed.[26] If the proof shows that profits would have been realized had the party not been prevented from performing the contract they are recoverable, and the measure of profits as damages is the difference between the cost of doing the work and the price agreed to be paid.[27] In considering items of profit or expense the courts are inclined to regard the magnitude of the contract and other elements of loss that may affect the defendant[28] as well as the release from to his discharge, was erroneous. Brent v. Parker, 23 Fla. 200, 1 So. 780.

Attempt at performance.— In an action by an advertising agent for breach of a contract under which he was to place all of defendants' advertising as defendants might direct in consideration of certain commissions on the amount of advertising, the plaintiff can, in the absence of proof of special damage, recover commissions only for such advertisements as were actually published, and not for advertisements which he contracted to publish but was unable to place on account of defendants' withdrawing their advertisements from him. Savage v. Drs. K. & K.'s U. S. Medical, etc., Assoc., 59 Mich. 400, 26 N. W. 652.

Theatrical engagement.— When a theatrical contract is broken the damages recoverable are; (1) The value of the labor done under it, and (2) such further damage as may be legally assessed for the breach; and this must be such only as arises from facts existing at the time of the breach. Escott v. Cram, 13 Pittsb. Leg. J. (Pa.) 412. In Schonberg v. Cheney, 3 Hun (N. Warranty.— Where the defendant agreed if a harvester failed to do good work to furnish another in its place, on his failure so to do the measure of damages is the value of the new machine. Plano Mfg. Co. v. Kesler, 15 Ind. App. 110, 43 N. E. 925.

Value of new contract.— Where a firm which has entered into a contract with a city for the construction of waterworks fails to begin the work the amount of damages to it would reasonably cost the plaintiff to restore the property to its original condition.[32]

7. Contract For Board, Lodging, or Support. One who has entered into a contract for board, lodging, or support is not entitled as a matter of course to recover the whole price stipulated to be paid to the end of the period specified in the contract, but only for such damages as properly and necessarily result from the breach of the contract.[33] In such cases the measure of damages is the profits that would have resulted over and above the cost of the board during the time when other boarders could not have been obtained.[34] Where damages are claimed for a breach of contract of support during life, the measure thereof must necessarily depend upon the terms of the contract and the relative situations of the parties.[35] It seems, however, if a contract by one person to support another for life is entirely broken the person entitled to support may recover damages for the full value of the contract,[36] which damages are not measured by the consideration which the city is entitled is at least equal to the difference between the contract price and the compensation provided for in a new contract made in pursuance of a bid, secured by a subsequent advertisement of the same work. Goldsboro v. Moffett, 49 Fed. 213.

Value of repairs.— Where a contractor for keeping a public bridge in repair commits a breach of his contract and the county court has caused the necessary repairs to be made, the rule of damages in an action for the breach is the value of the repairs needed and not the sum the county might have spent for them. In Haggin v. Price, 8 Dana (Ky.) 48, A agreed to board B a year for five hundred dollars, and B quit in three months without cause. It was held that A could only recover pro rata for the time B continued to board with him, and compensation for the loss of the contract to the end of the year.

No deduction for absence.— Where plaintiff contracted to furnish defendant with board and lodging at a stipulated price, "with no deduction in case of absence," and defendant left before the expiration of the time agreed upon without notice to plaintiff, the latter may recover the contract price for the time the rooms remained vacant after defendant's departure, and is not limited to the profits she might have made had defendant carried out his agreement. Wilkinson v. Davies, 146 N. Y. 25, 40 N. E. 501.

Suit before expiration of term.—Where one after engaging rooms with board for a definite term vacates the rooms in violation of his contract and is sued, damages are recoverable up to the time of trial, not merely to the time of the commencement of the action, the action having been brought before the expiration of the term. Cummins v. Hanson, 10 Daly (N. Y.) 493.

34. Lydecker v. Valentine, 71 Hun (N. Y.) 194, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 567; Strakosch v. Wray, 6 Misc. (N. Y.) 207, 26 N. Y. Suppl. 537; Crane v. Powell, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 220.

A party cannot refuse to rent rooms to other lodgers, leaving them idle, and then recover against defendant as for use and occupation, for the reason that he has no right to conduct himself in such a manner as to make the damages unnecessarily burdensome. De Lavalette v. Wendt, 11 Hun (N. Y.) 432; Wilson v. Martin, 1 Den. (N. Y.) 602. The measure of damages for breach of a contract by which defendant agreed to board with plaintiff for one year, where he broke the agreement after boarding only a few days, and the plaintiff some time afterward and before the expiration of the year gave up the house, would be the profits she would have made up to the time she gave up the house had the defendant performed his contract, after deducting the profits on boarders put in defendant's rooms. Wetmore v. Jaffray, 9 Hun (N. Y.) 140.

35. In an action for failure to support and bury decedent according to contract, it is proper to allow plaintiff to show the reasonable worth of keeping decedent to the time of his death and of providing a decent burial. Baughan v. Brown, 122 Ind. 115, 23 N. E. 695. The measure of damages for the breach of a contract under which defendant for a sum paid was to keep and maintain in his own family the infant daughter of plaintiff for life and in case of her death to pay her funeral expenses, the infant being dead at the institution of the action, is the difference between the value of the care and maintenance actually given and the value of such care, etc., stipulated for in the contract. Vancleave v. Clark, 118 Ind. 61, 20 N. E. 527, 3 L. R. A. 519. The measure of damages where plaintiff seeks to recover on an agreement to support and maintain another during the term of his natural life is the amount which his board and nursing during his last illness were reasonably worth less the value of any services rendered by him. Shakespeare v. Markham, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 311.

36. Parker v. Russell, 133 Mass. 74; Amos v. Oakley, 131 Mass. 413; Schell v. Plumb, 55 N. Y. 592; Morrison v. McAtee, 23 Oreg. 530, 32 Pac. 400. Where plaintiff had lived with that is expressed in the contract, but are measured by the value of the services rendered.[37]

8. Contract Restricting Competition. In a contract restricting competition an exclusive right to profits may be reasonably supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made;[38] hence the party is as a general rule entitled to all damages necessarily resulting from a breach of such contract.[39] In such cases the measure of damages has been held to be the reasonable and certain profits that would have resulted to the plaintiff had the contract been performed;[40] but this does not extend to speculative or remote profits depending upon market values and the amount of sales.[41] and been maintained by defendant for several years under a verbal contract by which in return for his services plaintiff was to be maintained during the rest of his life, it was held that on a breach of the contract by defendant plaintiff's measure of damages was not the value of his services over the value of the maintenance furnished for the period he had lived with defendant, but that he could recover the expense of his support which defendant had failed to furnish according to contract before the commencement of the action, and the prospective expense for such maintenance during the remainder of his life. Carpenter v. Carpenter, 66 Hun (N. Y.) 177, 20 N. Y. Suppl. 928. In Freeman v. Fogg, 82 Me. 408, 19 Atl. 907, it was held that the damages for breach of contract for a life-support are such sum as if invested at a reasonable rate of interest will yield an annual income during the plaintiff's life sufficient for his support, leaving nothing remaining at the time of his death.

Expectancy of life.— Where a mother conveyed land to her daughter in consideration of a life-support, such maintenance is measured by the mother's expectant life rather than by the value of the land conveyed to the daughter in consideration thereof. Shover v. Myrick, 4 Ind. App. 7, 30 N. E. 207.

Where one who had been sued for an infringement of a patent for putting up cemented hams agreed that in consideration of the dismissal of the suit and of a right to the partial use of the patent for a year he would not manufacture or put up cemented hams during the existence of the patent, it was held in an action on such contract that the measure of damages was properly declared to be the amount that the plaintiff's hams had depreciated in price by the cemented hams put up and sold for defendants, after the expiration of the year mentioned in the contract, and before the commencement of the suit. Billings v. Ames, 32 Mo. 265.

Cost of handling goods.— On the breach of an agreement between a railroad company and an elevator company that the latter should have the handling of all grain transported over the railroad, the measure of damages is the difference between the cost of handling the grain in the elevator and the price stipulated to be paid. Richmond v. Dubuque, etc., R. Co., 26 Iowa 191.

Evidence of loss.— Although an agreement not to engage in business in competition with plaintiff is broken by defendant, causing it to be believed that he is a member of a competing firm, the damages would not include all loss of business caused by the competition of that firm, and plaintiff cannot recover substantial damages for such a breach, without evidence of a loss of business resulting from an understanding that defendant is a member of the firm. 9. Contract For Division of Profits and Losses. Where the parties to a contract have entered into an agreement to share the profits, losses, and expenses resulting therefrom, the measure of damages for its breach is the amount of profits which the plaintiff would have received under the contract if the same had been carried to completion.[42] The measure of damages is the market value of the property when the contract is completed;[43] and while the plaintiff may be allowed for actual expenditures and services,[44] there can be no allowance upon expected sales or doubtful offers.[45]

Amount of privilege.— In an action for the breach of an agreement to allow the plaintiff to work the defendant's farm on shares, the measure of damages depends on the question, How much is such a privilege (whether it is called a lease or right of occupation, or by whatever name) worth? And such action may be maintained immediately on the refusal of the defendant to perform his part of the agreement. Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129, 100 Am. Dec. 415.

Corporate stock.— In Murphy v. Craig, 76 Mich. 155, 42 N. W. 1097, plaintiff and defendant bought two boilers to be sold and the proceeds divided between them. One of the boilers was sold and the proceeds were divided. Defendant sold the other boiler, receiving one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars in the capital stock of a corporation in payment, any part of which he refused to deliver to plaintiff. It was held that plaintiff could recover in assumpsit as damages for breach of contract one half of the value of the stock.

Enhanced value.— Where hides of plaintiff were to be delivered to another to be tanned and returned, and the net proceeds of the sales, after deducting costs and expenses, were to be the profit or loss to the tanner, and the latter made an assignment to defendant for the benefit of his creditors, the measure of damages in an action by plaintiff was the value of his interest in the hides and not the enhanced value thereof when manufactured into leather. Hyde v. Cookson, 21 Barb. (N. Y.) 92.

Partnership accounts.— In an action by a clerk against his employer, on an agreement whereby the former was to receive as compensation a certain portion of the net profits of the business, it was held that the rule for ascertaining damages was precisely the same as that which applied to partnership accounts. Wiggins v. Graham, 51 Mo. 17.

43. Beckwith v. Talbot, 2 Colo. 639.

Demand at subsequent period.— The measure of damages for the breach of a covenant to give the superintendent of a farm a certain portion of the crop "raised and secured" in a certain year is the value of his share when he was first entitled to it, although he demanded the same at a subsequent period when the articles had risen. Owens v. Durham, 5 Dana (Ky.) 536.

Increase of business.— Where one contracted to pay another for three years twenty per cent of the gross receipts from the sales of compressed yeast which the latter was to manufacture for the former, the measure of damages for the breach is such sum as the latter might have made as his share of the contract during that time, less what he might have reasonably earned, and in estimating the same, sales made since the contract may be considered with other evidence showing the probability of an increase or decrease of business. Goldman v. Wolff, 6 Mo. App. 490.

44. Reed v. McConnell, 62 Hun (N. Y.) 153, 16 N. Y. Suppl. 586.

No evidence of value of time.— In an action for breach of a contract to form a partnership, whereby plaintiff was to contribute her labor as against a hennery plant to be furnished by defendant, evidence of the per diem value of plaintiff's services while awaiting the completion by defendant of his agreement cannot be considered in estimating the damages, where there was no evidence introduced to show the value of the time lost or the kind of employment out of which plaintiff could have made the sum claimed. Rockwell Stock, etc., Co. v. Castroni, 6 Colo. App. 521, 42 Pac. 180.

Removal of family.— In an action to recover damages for the breach of a special contract by which upon certain terms and conditions therein mentioned defendant agreed to furnish and keep plaintiff supplied with a stock of goods for carrying on business in the defendant's store, and plaintiff undertook to carry on the same for one-half the profits for the term of two years, it was held that in estimating the damages it was competent for the arbitrators to whom the action was referred to allow plaintiff compensation for the loss of his time and for the expenses of removing his family to and from the place where the business was to be carried on. Johnson v. Arnold, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 46.

45. Beck v. West, 87 Ala. 213, 6 So. 70.

10. Failure to Pay Money. The measure of damages in case of failure to pay money under a contract depends somewhat upon the terms of the contract itself and the present worth of the money as contracted for,[46] but such measure of damages has usually been regulated by the legal rate of interest during the time of delay.[47] Where the breach of contract consists in a failure to pay the debt of another, the measure of damages has usually been considered the amount lost in pursuance of the contract on the part of the injured party;[48] and especially does this rule obtain where the payment is not contracted in money for a specific debt, but involves property rights that are or may be endangered by a breach.[49]

11. Failure to Pay in Property. Where the contract provides that a sum

Amount payable in gold.— In Kaufman v. Myers, 38 Ga. 133, it was held in a proceeding by a distress warrant to recover an amount due for rent, payable under the contract in "American gold coin," that plaintiff could recover the market value of that amount of coin reckoned in United States legal tender treasury notes. In Brown v. Welch, 26 Ind. 116, under a contract for the payment of a sum of money in gold, or if paid in paper the amount thereof necessary to purchase the gold at the place of payment, it was not incumbent on the promisor in case he failed to pay the stipulated sum in gold to pay a greater sum in legal tender notes.

Confederate money.— In Hudspeth v. Johnson, 34 Ga. 403, it was held that where an officer had been negligent in collecting an execution after the depreciation in value of Confederate money he was not liable for the whole amount in United States currency, but only for such amount as the jury might decide that the Confederate money so collected was worth at that time.

English money.— In Reiser v. Parker, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,685, 1 Lowell 262, which was an action to recover English money payable in the United States, it was held that the measure of damages was the intrinsic value of the English money measured by our own.

Interest at contract price.— In Beckwith v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 29 Conn. 268, 76 Am. Dec. 599, it was held that where a railroad company by legislative authority had issued bonds with the interest payable semiannually, at a rate of interest beyond the legal rate, the measure of damages was the contract price and not the legal rate of interest.

Two sums contracted for.— In White v. Green, 3 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 155, it was held that where a party had contracted to pay one of two sums, one in paper and the other in specie, the damage upon the breach of such contract is the value of the less valuable of the two with interest.

shall be paid in a specified article of property, there has been much division of opinion as to the true measure of damages.[50] Some of the courts have measured the damages by the value of the property at the time of the stipulated delivery[51] or demand,[52] while others have assessed the value of the property at the time of the contract.[53] The question of damages in such cases has usually been governed

Market value.—Under an agreement to pay or deliver a certain quantity and quality of a commodity — gold coin or anything else — upon failure to perform the promisee may recover the market value of the article at the time and place when and where it should have been delivered; but when the agreement is to pay so many dollars, whether in a commodity or in money, the amount of money agreed to be paid is the only measure of damages for a breach of the covenant. Murray v. Gale, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 427.

Place of delivery not fixed by contract.— The measure of damages for the breach of a special contract, by which plaintiff loaned to defendant a specified quantity of cotton of a certain quality and defendant agreed to deliver to plaintiff on a certain future day the same quantity of cotton of like quality, is the value of the cotton on the day fixed for delivery; and this rule is not varied because the place of delivery is not fixed by the contract, nor because the cotton is to be returned in kind. Bozeman v. Rose, 40 Ala. 212.

Stipulation as to price.— In an action on a contract providing for the payment of a debt in wheat of a certain quality, to be delivered in specified amounts at specified times annually, at a stipulated price per bushel, the measure of damages is its actual value when due and not merely its value at the price stipulated. Starr v. Light, 22 Wis. 433, 99 Am. Dec. 55.

52. Safely v. Gilmore, 21 Iowa 588, 89 Am. Dec. 592; West v. Wentworth, 3 Cow. (N. Y.) 82.

Extraordinary price at time of demand.— In Miller v. Cassady, 25 Iowa 323, it was held that, where a party had stored wheat for another during several years whereby the latter was to pay him five bushels of wheat for every one hundred bushels stored, a rule of damages allowing the plaintiff for the value of the wheat at the time he demanded it, the wheat at that time bearing an extraordinary price, was erroneous.

No proof of demand.—Wherever a contract is entered into for the delivery of a specific article, the value of that article at the time fixed for the delivery is the amount of damages to be recovered on a breach of the contract; and if no time is fixed for the delivery and no demand proved the commencement of the suit must be considered the demand, and the value of the article at the time of commencing the action with interest is the proper rule of estimation. Davis v. Richardson, 1 Bay (S. C.) 105.

Time of demand.— Where plaintiff sold property to A, relying for security on the undertaking of defendants to deliver to plaintiff certain goods at specified prices on demand, and these goods at the time of the demand had fallen in value below the prices so specified, in an action for the non-delivery of such goods it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to stand in the same situation as if he had paid defendants the amount of the property sold to A; and consequently if the goods had risen in value after the demand plaintiff would have been entitled to recover the value of them at the time of trial, but where they had fallen after the contract he could recover only their value at the time of the demand. by the market price at the time of delivery;[54] but some courts have allowed the highest market value between the breach and the time of trial.[55] Where the obligation is in the alternative, that is, to pay in money or in property, the sum stipulated rather than the market value of the commodity has been considered the true measure of damages.[56]

12. Failure to Deliver or Convey Property — a. In General. Where there has been a failure to deliver or convey property according to contract, the value of the property has usually been considered the measure of damages.[57] In other

Change in market value.— Where a debtor in consideration of forbearance agrees to deliver to the creditor goods at a future day to a specified amount, to be applied in payment of his debt to that extent, and he breaks his agreement, the creditor is entitled to recover as damages for the breach of the agreement the amount so agreed to be paid, although the market value of the goods is the same or even less than the price at which they were to be received. Where defendants agreed to pay to plaintiffs a perpetual annual rent of a certain number of ounces of silver of a specified fineness or an equivalent in gold, it was held that this was a contract for the delivery of a commodity and not for the payment of money, and that the measure of damages for its breach was the market value of the silver or gold at the time when it should have been delivered with interest. Essex Co. v. Pacific Mills, 14 Allen (Mass.) 389. In Pepper v. Peytavin, 12 Mart. Cost of transportation.— On the breach of a contract to deliver an article of merchantable quality at a specified place distant from market, the measure of damages is the market price of the article at the nearest markets and the necessary cost of transportation from thence to the place specified. Agreement as to value.— Where a person, in consideration of property (not money) to be assigned by another, agrees to give a certain number of shares of stock having on the day of the contract a fixed market value, and refusing to give the stock is sued at law for a breach of the contract, evidence of the value of the stock at any other time than at the date of the contract is rightly excluded, its value at that date being agreed on and admitted. Face value of bond.— Where the contract provided for the delivery of a bond issued by a railroad company, and guaranteed the payment of the bond in full, the measure of damages for the breach of the contract to deliver was the value of the bond as thus guaranteed by defendant, and as against defendant was the face of the bond and interest. Shelton v. French, 33 Conn. 489.

Nominal damages.—In an action for breach of a contract to deliver corporate stock, the measure of plaintiff's damages is the actual value of the stock, and if it appears that no corporation was formed and no stock was ever issued, or if stock was issued that it was valueless, plaintiff can recover only nominal damages. the highest value of the stock between the refusal to deliver and the time of trial.[63]

E. For Conversion of Personalty — 1. In General.[64] Where property has been wrongfully converted to the use of another the measure of damages has been usually held to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion together with the interest from the date of detention,[65] unless the property has been returned,[66] or the conversion is merely nominal and results in no serious injury or loss to the owner.[67]

Addition of dividends.— In Montgomery Bank v. Reese, 26 Pa. St. 143, it was held that the measure of damages for withholding bank-stock from a party entitled to it is the highest market value of the stock between the breach and the trial, less the par value, and that any dividends that may have been declared are to be added to this if the stock was paid for.

No deduction for interest.— On a subscription to mortgage bonds of a railroad extension to be built, the measure of damages for a breach of contract to deliver said bonds is their highest market value at any time from the completion of the extension to the time of trial with interest. The fact that such bonds do not bear interest for three years does not warrant a deduction of three years' interest from the damages, since to that extent the market value must have been impaired already. 67. The measure of damages for the conversion of a mere certificate of stock cannot be placed at the value of the shares which it represents if the ownership of the shares themselves is not affected. Daggett v. Davis, 53 Mich. 35, 18 N. W. 548, 51 Am. Rep. 91. In Mowry v. Wood, 12 Wis. 413 [quoted in Daggett v. Davis, 53 Mich. 35, 18 N. W. 548, 51 Am. Rep. 91], the owner of a certificate issued by the state, and which entitled the holder to receive from the state a deed of certain lands when specified payments were made, was held entitled to recover, in an action for its conversion, not the value of his interest in the land under the certificate, but such sum as would recompense him for any actual loss he had sustained, and for the trouble and expense of establishing and per-erty is of fluctuating value, a rule for the measure of damages has arisen called "the rule of higher intermediate value." Under the early interpretation of this rule a party was allowed the highest value of the property between the time of conversion and the time of trial.[68] This early interpretation of the rule has, however, been much modified by subsequent decisions,[69] and the doctrine as applied to stock deals has been allowed as a measure of damages only for such time after the injury as the plaintiff might by the exercise of due diligence have replaced himself in the market.[70]

b. Fluctuating Property — (i) In General. In actions for the conversion of property other than stocks, which is of a fluctuating value, the authorities are too conflicting to lay down any general rule. In some states it has been held that the measure of damages in such cases is the value of the property at the time of conversion,[71] together with interest thereon;[72] in other states the measure of damages in such cases has been held to be the highest value of the property from the time of the conversion up to the time of trial;[73] while still other states petuating the evidence of his title. In other words he was held entitled to recover only his actual damages.

(II) Conversion of Stock. In actions for conversion of stock, the weight of authority seems to support the rule allowing the recovery of the highest value of such stock from the time of the conversion up to a reasonable time after knowledge of such conversion;[75] but while this rule has been more generally received as the measure of damages, cases are not lacking where the value of the stock at the time of conversion has been considered the true criterion of damages,[76] and it has been held that where there is a refusal to deliver stock upon demand, the value of such stock should be the market value of the same at the time of demand.[77] Some of the states have adhered to the original rule of highest intermediate value, even in stock transactions,[78] although as a general rule it will be found that such decisions are of a qualified nature or that the doctrine therein announced has been modified by more recent holdings. In some states statutes have been passed allowing the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict without interest;[79] but even under such statutes, it has been held that the action must be prosecuted with reasonable diligence, otherwise the measure of damages will be the value of the property at the time of conversion, with interest.[80]

This rule may be considered to have been, to some extent, modified as to stocks, railroad bonds and other securities of a similar nature. . . . The rule, however, is not changed but only modified to this extent, that wherever there is a duty or obligation devolved upon a defendant to deliver such stocks or securities at a particular time, and that duty or obligation has not been fulfilled, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the highest price in the market between that time and the time of the trial." clusion of the pleader being insufficient.[84] It must show facts sufficient to form a basis for estimating damages,[85] although of course the sufficiency of the phrascology employed in stating such facts is dependent entirely upon the particular case before the pleader;[86] and so far at least as general damages are concerned little technicality of averment is required.[87] So too it may be said that a complaint will be construed as a whole,[88] and while a complaint must allege loss which is recognized in law as the proper subject of damages,[89] a complaint alleging damages too remote or consequential to be recoverable is not demurrable if under the allegation therein it is possible that plaintiff may be able to prove damages which are recoverable;[90] and the court will, after verdict, construe a complaint as alleging damages which are recoverable if the language employed will admit thereof.[91]

to so allege reference might be had to the writ.[93] But a complaint which prays for judgment in a specified amount is sufficient, although it fails to allege in express terms that the plaintiff was damaged.[94] It is unnecessary to insert a claim for damages at the end of each count or paragraph of the complaint. It is sufficient to state the amount demanded at the conclusion thereof.[95]

c. Mistake in Designation of Rule or of Kind of Damages. Where the facts are so clearly stated in the complaint that the law attaches a well defined meaning thereto, an error or mistake of the pleader as to the true rule or theory by which his damages should be determined or of their kind is not fatal;[96] and while a complaint must not state inconsistent theories of the damages sustained, it may state two theories as to the measure thereof, dependent upon how the jury shall find the facts.[97]

sion to so plead cannot be supplied by statements in a bill of particulars.[4] But an allegation of general damages for a breach of contract does not preclude an allegation of special damage incurred in preparing to execute the same.[5]

(III) Of Damages Accruing After Commencement of Suit. The assessment of damages is usually governed by the situation or condition of affairs existing at the time the action is brought;[6] hence for a recovery of loss or damages occurring thereafter plaintiff should amend or file a supplementary petition.[7] In some jurisdictions, however, this is rendered unnecessary by statute.[8]

(IV) Of Interest or Liquidated Damages. Interest is generally regarded as an incident to the debt and may be recovered under the general allegation of damages without being specially claimed,[9] although if interest beyond the legal rate is sought as damages by virtue of a special contract between the parties the declaration must declare specially therefor.[10] So too a penalty construed by the court as liquidated damages is an incident to and follows the principal in the same manner as interest, and may be awarded without special averment,[11] although the action must be brought on the contract and not on the common counts.[12]

(V) Of Punitive or Exemplary Damages. While it is essential that the facts alleged and proved be such as will warrant the assessment of punitive or exemplary damages,[13] such damages are not special in the sense that they need ordinarily be claimed eo nomine in the complaint, but may be recovered under a claim for damages generally.[14] It has, however, in one jurisdiction been declared the better practice to claim such damages separately in the petition,[15] although a failure so to do was held not fatal on demurrer.[16] So in at least one jurisdiction such separate allegations are expressly required by statute,[17] and defendant's pecuniary condition cannot be shown if this statute is not complied with;[18] but this does not apply to an action instituted before its passage, although the trial is had thereafter.[19]

(vi) Of Statutory Damages. Where damages sought to be recovered arise by virtue of statute, or the amount thereof is determined or augmented by reason of statutory enactments, the complaint must allege facts sufficient to bring the case clearly within such statute,[20] and as defendant should be apprised of the extent of the demand against him it is the better practice, and in most jurisdictions necessary, that reference be made thereto,[21] especially if the injured party has also a remedy at common law;[22] and if the complaint contains counts both at common law and under the statute, and entire damages are assessed by the jury, the statutory augmentation cannot be allowed;[23] although if a case on such pleadings is tried without a jury, the court may, if it finds that the plaintiff is so entitled, give the statutory damages, even if there has been no election of counts by the plaintiff.[24]

2. Sufficiency — a. In General. The failure to make an averment of special damages is fatal to the pleader only when the cause of action depends upon the existence of such special damages, and the right to maintain the action depends upon their existence; upon breach of a contract a right of action arises which carries with it at least nominal damages, and therefore a failure to allege special damages is not ground for a dismissal of the action.[25] Hence where the complaint, whether it be for general or special damage, is objected to because of vagueness, indefiniteness, or insufficiency, it cannot, if it alleges a contract and breach thereof, be assailed by general demurrer or motion for nonsuit,[26] as plaintiff would at least be entitled to nominal damages.[27] Nor for a like reason should a failure to prove special damages as alleged prevent a recovery of nominal damages.[28] So too a party is entitled to at least nominal damages where a simple trespass is shown to have been committed against him,[29] although it has been held that where the action is for exemplary damages no judgment for actual damages can be rendered.[30]

b. Averment of Special Damages — (i) In General. As the sufficiency of the allegations of special damages must necessarily be determined by the facts and circumstances of the particular case, no general rule can be formulated by which the sufficiency of the complaint may be judged; it is necessary that facts showing how the special damages arose be stated,[31] although it is not required that one should set forth his evidence;[32] and where such damages are properly pleaded they may be recovered, although the prayer for relief be a general one.[33] Inasmuch as the purpose of alleging such damages with particularity is to prevent surprise to the opposite party,[34] it may be broadly stated that where the allegations are definite enough to fully apprise such party of the probable evidence which will be introduced by the pleader, and to enable him to prepare his defense accordingly, the allegations will be deemed sufficient;[35] nor will the obvious purpose of the pleader to allege special damages be controlled by an informality in stating the items constituting such damages.[36]

(ii) For Personal Injuries. While the rules of good pleading require that the facts which constitute special damage, where the plaintiff has sustained personal injuries, shall be stated specifically,[37] it is neither necessary nor proper to set forth the evidence on which the pleader relies.[38] And where the complaint

Nor as it is said is it necessary to specify every muscle that ached and every nerve that clearly shows the nature and manner in which the injuries complained of were received, so that there does not exist any uncertainty as to the cause of the special damage complained of, or of the effect which the injury produced, the complaint will be held sufficient.[39]

c. To Authorize Exemplary Damages. In those jurisdictions where exemplary damages can be recovered only when actual damages are shown,[40] a complaint failing to allege damages of the latter kind is insufficient, regardless of the allegations of the former;[41] and as the theory of such damages is that of punishment to the wrong-doer,[42] the complaint must allege acts or circumstances indicating either fraud, malice, gross negligence, or oppression;[43] but no specific form of allegation is required, and an averment that the acts were wantonly, wilfully, and maliciously done is sufficient to authorize a recovery of such damages.[44]

3. Amount Recoverable as Affected by Allegation of Damages. While the evidence offered need not support every allegation of injury and damage set forth in the complaint,[45] and the damages may of course usually be less than the amount asked,[46] and must not exceed the sum fixed by specific proof, where such amount is determined with certainty, regardless of the amount asked in the complaint,[47] it is well settled that the amount of the recovery cannot exceed that claimed in the complaint[48] or counter-claim,[49] although from the merits of the case it is probable that a greater sum could have been recovered had it been asked.[50] This is true whether the judgment be entered upon a finding of a jury or by default,[51] and it is improper after judgment to allow an amendment to the complaint increasing the sum claimed.[52] But the legal interest[53] or costs[54] may be included, although such inclusion swells the recovery to an amount beyond that alleged in the complaint. So the amount demanded in negotiating for a settlement for a personal injury before the plaintiff has brought his action does not limit or restrict his recovery in the action.[55] Proof of certain of the damages which go to make up the whole sum claimed should be limited to the amount paid for such items as alleged in the complaint, but if evidence showing a greater expenditure for a particular item is given, the defendant must ask a special charge of the court as to the matter or he cannot afterward complain.[56]

happening of a certain contingency, judgment may be rendered for the stipulated sum whenever it is admitted by demurrer that the event upon which it was to be paid has happened;[58] but where the complaint is for damages for a personal injury, it has been held that while a demurrer admits the truth of every material and well pleaded statement of fact, and is therefore conclusive so far as the right to maintain the action and recover nominal damages is concerned, it is only a prima facie admission as to substantial damages.[59]

D. Plea or Answer — 1. In General. A denial that plaintiff has suffered damages in the exact sum alleged in the complaint is insufficient to make an issue as to damages.[60] But where the action is brought for unliquidated damages, an answer containing a general denial, together with a special denial that the plaintiff has been damaged in the amount claimed, has been held sufficient to raise such issue.[61] In some jurisdictions it is held that the failure to deny the amount of damages alleged to have been sustained does not admit them, and the plaintiff must prove the amount sustained by him or he will be entitled only to nominal damages;[62] and that in any event, defendant by not denying damages cannot be held to admit greater damages than on the face of the complaint he is legally liable to pay.[63] Under the practice of other states, however, where there is no issue made as to the damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff no proof as to damages is required, but plaintiff may be awarded the amount he claims.[64] Matters set up by way of recoupment are taken to be admitted, if not denied in the replication.[65]

2. Matters in Mitigation. Matters in mitigation of damages may in most jurisdictions be shown under an answer containing a general denial only, and need not be specially pleaded,[66] but in some jurisdictions the opposite rule prevails.[67]

E. Issues and Proof[68] — 1. In General. The damages recovered must be warranted by the pleadings,[69] and a defendant is entitled to know from the declaration the character of the injury for which he must answer. Evidence of damages for an injury not mentioned therein or for which no claim for damages is alleged,[70] or for which the claim has been abandoned,[71] cannot be admitted.[72] So in an action for personal injury where plaintiff describes in his petition the different parts of his body injured, it is presumed that this specification covers the whole cause of action, and proof of an injury to a wholly different part of the body cannot be shown;[73] and an analogous rule has been applied to allegations of damages to property,[74] or of a breach of a contract.[75]

2. Matters Admissible Under Particular Averments — a. Of General Damages. As damages naturally or necessarily arising from a certain act or state of facts need not be specially pleaded,[76] a general allegation of damages will authorize

An allegation of injury to a "pasture" will permit, however, proof of injury to the ground or sod as well as to the grass, as the term "pasture" includes both. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Jones, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 372, 21 S. W. 145.

Evidence of the qualities or uses of a thing which add to its value is admissible when recovery is sought for the loss, destruction, or injury of such thing, without an allegation of such qualities or uses. Lanning v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa 502, 27 N. W. 478.

If injury to both person and property is caused by the same act, and no averment of damages is made for the injury to the latter, evidence thereof cannot be received. Freeland v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 54 N. Y. App. Div. 90, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 321.

Immaterial variance.— In the absence of direct proof that the defendant has been misled, proof of an anteflection instead of an alleged retroflection of the womb is if a variance at all harmless. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Turley, 1 Indian Terr. 275, 37 S. W. 52.

Where a petition claims damages for injuries to furniture, injuries to articles not properly included within that term, such as coffee, sugar, and apples, cannot be shown. Whitmore v. Bowman, 4 Greene (Iowa) 148.

Where the manner of erecting a building adjoining that of plaintiff is complained of as causing the damage to his property, proof that plaintiff's property has been damaged by the fact of the erection of the building mentioned in the declaration cannot be given. Wilson v. Hinsley, 13 Md. 64.

71. Whorley v. Tennessee Centennial Exposition Co., (Tenn. Ch. App. 1901) 62 S. W. 346.

72. Proof of partial loss under allegation of total loss.— Under an allegation of total loss of materials for the building of a tank, by reason of the failure of a railroad company to use water therefrom, the plaintiff may show a partial loss or deterioration in the value of said materials, as such proof could not prejudice defendant. New Orleans, etc., R. Co. v. Echols, 54 Miss. 264.

73. Texas State Fair v. Marti, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 132, 69 S. W. 432; International, etc., R. Co. v. Beasley, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 569, 29 S. W. 1121.

"Otherwise injured," etc.— In one jurisdiction it was held that where allegation of specific personal injuries is made a further allegation that plaintiff was "otherwise greatly hurt and wounded" does not authorize proof of injuries, other than those specifically alleged (Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Hanmer, 66 S. W. 375, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1846), although in another jurisdiction the rule seems to be otherwise (Mauch v. Hartford, 112 Wis. 40, 87 N. W. 816). And where, after a specific designation of an injury, a general allegation that plaintiff was otherwise internally and permanently injured is made, it has been held that the defendant is required merely to meet evidence tending to show that the internal and permanent injuries related to and resulted from the alleged specific injury. O'Connor v. Prendergast, 99 Ill. App. 531. See also Fuller v. Jackson, 92 Mich. 197, 52 N. W. 1075. But see Salina v. Kerr, 7 Kan. App. 223, 52 Pac. 901.

proof of all damages necessarily resulting or which may be legally implied from the act complained of;[77] and the fact that the pleader unnecessarily specifies items of general damages will not preclude him from giving evidence of other general damage not specified.[78]

b. Of Special Damages. As, however, it is necessary to make specific averments of special damages,[79] any attempt to introduce evidence of such damages under a general averment of damages would present a fatal variance between the pleadings and proof, and is therefore not permissible,[80] although proof of special injuries not alleged is often competent for the purpose of showing the extent of the injuries, and not as an item of damages.[81] So too special damages must be proved as alleged,[82] and therefore averments of special damages of a certain nature will not authorize proof of special damages not suggested by such averments;[83]

c. Of Personal Injuries — (i) Statement of Rule. Where damages are claimed for a personal injury the only difficulty lies in the proper application of the well-settled rule that all the results of the act or injury complained of need not be set forth in detail to be admissible, so long as such results are necessarily or legally implied from the injuries alleged,[85] while all effects not the natural and Impairment of the power of speech.— Garbaczewski v. Third Ave. R. Co., 5 N. Y. App. Div. 186, 39 N. Y. Suppl. 33.

Incapacity for marriage.— Proof that plaintiff's injuries were so serious as might prevent her from marrying may be shown under an averment that she was "bruised, hurt and wounded, and that divers bones of her body were broken, and that she was grievously wounded internally, and became sick, sore, lame and disordered." Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 135 Ill. 511, 518, 26 N. E. 520. So too the loss of a general prospect of marriage by reason of an injury which disfigures the plaintiff may be taken into consideration as an element of special damage without a special allegation. Smith v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 90 Fed. 783.

Increased injury.— Campbell v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 137 Cal. 565, 70 Pac. 624.

Injury to the ovaries may be shown under an allegation that plaintiff's leg and back were greatly bruised and injured, and that she received terrible nervous shocks and became sick, sore, and lame (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. McDonnell, 194 Ill. 82, 62 N. E. 308 [affirming 91 Ill. App. 488]); or under an allegation of serious internal and permanent injuries where there is no motion to make the complaint more specific (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Pendery, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 36 S. W. 793).

Injuries to the womb.— Wolf v. Third Ave. R. Co., 67 N. Y. App. Div. 605, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 336.

Loss of hearing.— Evidence of a loss of hearing is admissible under a complaint alleging that by reason of the explosion of a powder-house two hundred and fifty feet from where plaintiff lived she received great and permanent injury and was made sick, sore, lame, and disabled, and continued so, although it does not specify deafness as one of her injuries (Cibulski v. Hutton, 47 N. Y. App. Div. 107, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 166); so too proof of the fact of injury to the spine on the sense of hearing is admissible where the complaint alleges injury to the spine (Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Hawk, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 142, 69 S. W. 1037).

Loss of weight.— San Antonio R. Co. v. Weigers, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 344, 54 S. W. 910.

Miscarriage.— Proof that a miscarriage was the result of an injury may be shown under an allegation that plaintiff sustained serious physical injuries, causing great pain and suffering and impairment of bodily health, strength, and ability to labor (Chicago City R. Co. v. Cooney, 196 Ill. 466, 63 N. E. 1029 necessary result of the injury complained of constitute special damages, and hence must be specially averred.[86]

(II) Application of Rule—(A) Future Pain and Inconvenience. The future effect of an injury, and the pain and suffering which it will presumably cause in the future need not, if they are the legal result of the injury, be specially averred, but proof thereof is admissible under the general allegation of damages;[87] and an allegation that plaintiff has not yet recovered from his injuries is sufficient to present to the jury the question of future disability.[88]

(B) Heart Disease. It has been held that proof that the injury resulted in a permanent disorder of the heart is admissible, under an allegation that plaintiff's head, side, and ribs,[89] or his spine, chest, head, and limb,[90] were injured.

(C) Injury or Impairment of Eyesight. Proof of injury or impairment of the eyesight may of course be shown without being specifically averred, if such result is necessarily implied from the injuries alleged,[91] but there is little uni-

[affirming 95 Ill. App. 471]); also under an allegation that plaintiff received internal injuries of a permanent nature, that she was hurt in and about the breast, waist, and abdomen, and that she had unnatural internal bleeding (Clukey v. Seattle Electric Co., 27 Wash. 70, 67 Pac. 379). For other illustrations see Tobin v. Fairport, 12 N. Y. Suppl. 224; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 72 Tex. 171, 10 S. W. 411.

Pleurisy.— Hunter v. Third Ave. R. Co., 21 Misc. (N. Y.) 1, 46 N. Y. Suppl. 1010 [affirming 20 Misc. 432, 45 N. Y. Suppl. 1044].

formity in the reported cases as to the nature of the injuries from which this result should be implied. It has been held in some cases that it should not be implied from an allegation of injury to the spine,[92] or from an allegation of injury to the head and brain.[93] On the other hand some courts have held such proof admissible under allegations of serious and lasting bodily injuries to the head, limbs, and nervous system,[94] or serious and painful internal and other bodily injuries.[95] So too evidence of injury to the eyes may be shown as tending to prove an alleged injury to the spine or nervous system,[96] although not itself considered an element of damage.[97]

(D) Impairment of Earning Capacity. Where the injury alleged will necessarily render a person less capable of performing his usual business duties in the future, proof of the impairment of his general earning capacity may ordinarily be given under the general allegation of the injury, and damages resulting therefrom, such as the inability to attend to his ordinary business, without a special averment that plaintiff will be unable to earn as much in the future as in the past,[98] or without specially averring the nature of his occupation or employment,[99]

although a few courts seem to require a greater strictness and definiteness in the allegation.[1] Proof of impairment of capacity to fulfil the obligation of a certain contract or to pursue a special employment, it has been held, cannot be given without a special averment.[2]

(E) Loss of Time. In some jurisdictions it is necessary, in order to admit proof of loss of time, or loss of earnings for a time,[3] that the same be specially pleaded.[4] In others it would seem that proof of this nature is admissible without a special allegation,[5] more particularly where the injury suffered would necessarily import a loss of time.[6] The quantum of damages or value of the time or earnings lost need not, however, be specifically stated.[7] So it has been held that evidence of such loss is admissible under allegations of inability and incapacity to perform one's usual and ordinary business or occupation for a given length of time.[8]

But it is not error to admit proof of this nature where it is clearly shown that it was not intended as an item of damage, or where the purpose of its introduction is not clear, as it is admissible for the purpose of showing the extent of the injury, although under the pleadings it might not be admissible for the purpose of augmenting the damages. Nor is an allegation in the complaint of the character of plaintiff's occupation indispensable.[9]

(F) Medical Attendance and Nursing. In perhaps the greater number of jurisdictions it is essential to the admissibility of proof of payment or incurment of doctor's bills occasioned by personal injury that these facts be specially alleged;[10] in some jurisdictions, however, particularly if the injury is a severe one, such expenses are considered as a reasonably necessary result of the injury, and may be proved under a general allegation of damages.[11] The precise amount expended need not be alleged; an allegation of expense for medical attendance is sufficient,[12] at least in the absence of a motion to make more specific;[13] nor need the day or place at which the services were rendered be averred.[14] If the amount expended is alleged the complaint need not in the absence of a special demurrer allege that such expenditures were reasonable.[15]

(G) Mental or Nervous Affection. As the mind and nervous system are so intimately connected with the body, and so likely to be affected by physical injuries, proof of impairments of these faculties are usually held admissible under allegations in substance of grievous or permanent physical injury.[16]

(H) Pain, Mental Anguish, and Suffering. In most jurisdictions it is held that the law implies that pain and injury to the feelings necessarily follow bodily harm, and that therefore proof of mental anguish may be given under a general allegation of bodily injuries of this nature.[17]

permanent, proof thereof is of course admissible;[18] and the authorities all concede that no express averment to this effect is necessary to authorize the introduction of evidence that it is so; the averment of facts from which the permanency of the injury would be necessarily implied brings the case within this rule and is sufficient. It is difficult, however, to deduce from the decisions a general rule as to the sufficiency of an averment of injuries to invoke the application of the rule, and while in many cases statements to the effect that permanent injuries may be shown under a general allegation of damages are found,[19] other cases seem to require more specific averments.[20]

d. Of Injury to Property — Rents. Loss of rents arising from injuries to property are special damages, and proof thereof cannot be admitted unless such loss is specially averred,[21] and an averment of loss of profits is insufficient to admit proof of loss of rents.[22] water from overflowing a certain tract of land, the only damage claimed to result from the overflow itself,[25] proof of expenses incurred for doctoring and taking care of injured chattels,[26] or proof of expenses incurred in rounding up or driving off cattle trespassing on plaintiff's land[27] cannot be introduced unless specially averred. But under an allegation of expenses incurred or paid because of an injury, proof of liabilities incurred and the amount and nature thereof is admissible in the absence of a motion to make the complaint more specific.[28]

(II) Attorney's Fees. Attorney's fees not usually being a necessary or legally implied result of a wrong, cannot be shown unless such expenditure is specially averred.[29]

b. Loss of Profits to Business. Whether or not proof of loss of profits may be shown under a general allegation of damages depends of course upon whether or not such damages are upon the facts involved to be considered general or special.[30] In some jurisdictions it is held that where the wrong complained of occasions the breach of a contract the loss of profits arising from the breach may be recovered under a general allegation of damage.[31] But loss of profits in a business, arising from an injury to one's person, cannot ordinarily be shown without being specially pleaded.[32] A recovery cannot be had for prospective loss of profits only, if no actual damage is alleged or sought to be proved.[33]

XIII. Evidence.[34]

A. Presumptions and Burden of Proof — 1. Presumptions. Where a legal right is invaded the law will presume some damage.[35] So too in a question of doubt as to the nature of damages the law will presume that a bond provides for a penalty as distinguished from liquidated damages.[36] Where plaintiff suf-

Readiness to comply with contract. — A party cannot recover an allowance for mill rent as an item of the profits which he would have made by virtue of a contract to furnish him logs to be made into lumber, unless he pleads that he has held the mill in readiness to do such sawing during the time of the contract; and an allegation that he has at all times and in all things kept and performed his contract is not sufficient. fered from a disease or affliction at the time of the injury, there is no presumption of law that the disease alone caused the death rather than that the disease, augmented and aggravated by the injury, produced the result.[37]

2. Burden of Proof. Where an action is for damages which are uncertain or have not been admitted the burden of establishing the amount thereof[38] and that they resulted from the act of the defendant[39] is upon the plaintiff. But where defendant claims damages by way of recoupment or sets up matters in reduction or mitigation, the burden is upon him to establish his claim and the amount thereof by evidence of sufficient certainty to enable the jury to intelligently determine the same.[40]

B. Admissibility — 1. In General — a. In Behalf of Plaintiff. In actions for damages the general and well-settled rules of evidence apply in that the testimony must conform to the pleadings, be responsive to the issue,[41] and be relevant to the nature or kind of damages claimed.[42] All testimony tending to establish a legitimate item of damage is of course, under proper pleadings, relevant and admissible.[43] Error in admitting incompetent testimony on the measure of damages is not cured by an instruction to disregard the same where from the verdict rendered it is not clear but that such evidence nevertheless influenced the jury in their findings;[44] but if it clearly did not so influence the jury, its admission is not reversible error, although not withdrawn from the jury.[45]

b. In Behalf of Defendant. All evidence having a legitimate tendency to meet the evidence of loss or injury should be received in rebuttal.[46] But the reception of irrelevant testimony on the part of the plaintiff will not authorize the admission of irrelevant rebuttal testimony.[47]

2. In Particular Kinds of Actions — a. Ex Contractu. In actions for breach of contract, the admissibility of evidence concerning the damages therefor is governed by the general rules of evidence.[48] Generally speaking all evidence bearing

Failure or defect of title.— Inasmuch as the rule of estimating damages for a failure or defect of title to a portion of a tract of land conveyed is the relative value of the part to which the defect applies as compared to the whole, and is to be estimated with regard to the price fixed by the parties for the whole tract, evidence of peculiar advantages or disadvantages of the part lost is admissible on behalf of either party, and reasonable latitude should be given to the extent of such inquiry. Beaupland v. McKeen, 28 Pa. St. 124, 70 Am. In an action for non-delivery of certain bonds, of which there are no sales and hence no market value, evidence is admissible to show what such bonds are worth as collateral security, and also to show that the obligors pay the principal thereof in gold, as such evidence tends to show what sum the plaintiff has lost by the wrongful act of the defendant. In an action for a breach of promise, the defendant is not bound in offering evidence in mitigation of damages to declare that he offers it for that purpose; if the evidence is competent for this purpose it must be received, although it is incompetent for other purposes (Button v. McCauley, 1 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 282, 4 Transcr. App. (N. Y.) 447, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. directly upon the damages occasioned by the breach and constituting legitimate items of damage is admissible;[49] and as all damages which the parties in reasonable contemplation can be presumed to have foreseen would be the probable consequence of the breach are recoverable[50] evidence thereof is admissible.[51] The evidence must of course be confined to matters relevant to the contract in suit,[52] and evidence of previous contractual relations between the parties,[53] or of an agreement between the plaintiff and a third party concerning the subject-matter of the contract,[54] cannot be shown for the purpose of estimating the damages, unless the contract is one where such agreement would have been in contemplation of the parties at the time of making the original contract.[55]

b. Ex Delicto — (i) For Personal Injuries — (a) Statement of Rule. In actions for personal injuries a considerable latitude in the introduction of evidence is of course necessarily allowed, and inasmuch as evidence which would be material and relevant in one case would upon the facts of another be entirely irrelevant and immaterial, it follows that no rule of inclusion or exclusion can be formulated; but broadly speaking, it may be said that all evidence tending to connected with the one in suit by a reference thereto, or have existed between the same parties concerning a similar subject-matter, evidence of the terms of such former contract may be shown for the purpose of furnishing a basis for estimating damages for a breach of the latter. (B) Application of Rule—(1) APPEARANCE OF INJURED PARTY. Testimony of a witness concerning the appearance of an injured party where he has had opportunity to observe his physical condition is admissible upon the question of damages and is not objectionable as being an opinion or conclusion.[61]

(2) CHARACTER AND HABITS OF INJURED PARTY—(a) ON BEHALF OF PLAINTIFF. In some jurisdictions it is held that plaintiff in an action for personal injury may show his previous habits of sobriety and industry,[62] while in other jurisdictions the opposite view is held.[63]

(b) ON BEHALF OF DEFENDANT. Whether or not the vicious or immoral habits or character of plaintiff can be shown by defendant depends largely upon the nature of the damages claimed in the complaint and the certainty of the resultant physical effect of the wrong.[64] Such evidence to be admissible must clearly show the connection or relation between the habit and the injury.[65] Hence evidence of the disreputable character of the injured party is usually immaterial so far as the action for bodily injury is concerned.[66] So too it is held that the intemperate habits of plaintiff prior to an injury cannot be shown in mitigation,[67] although evidence that the injury has been aggravated by a subsequent indulgence in such practices may be shown.[68] But where the complaint also claims damages for loss of wages which one would have received, and loss from being incapacitated from pursuing his usual trade or business, defendant has a right to show any facts concerning plaintiff's habits or conduct which might throw light on the probability of his securing employment or the continuity of the same, or show that by previous intemperance he had partially incapacitated himself from performing labor.[69] So it has been held that where plaintiff claims damages for humiliation from exposure of her person, evidence of her disreputable character is admissible.[70]

(3) DOMESTIC RELATIONS OF INJURED PARTY. Inasmuch as the damages for a personal injury must be only such as the injured party himself has sustained, it follows that evidence that such party has a family not only has no legitimate

In an action of trespass for biting and bruising plaintiff's finger, whereby amputation became necessary, defendant cannot show that the plaintiff was a habitual drunkard, upon the theory that the jury might infer that the loss resulted from a state of health produced by his intemperance rather than by the injury. bearing upon the issue, but is likely to have a tendency to arouse the sympathies of the jury, and unduly enhance the damages, and is therefore irrelevant and incompetent.[71] Where, however, from the instructions given by the court regarding such evidence and the verdict rendered it is probable that the jury was in no way influenced by its introduction in estimating the damages, the error in admitting it is not fatal.[72]

(4) Diseased Condition of Plaintiff. Evidence of the diseased condition of plaintiff is immaterial in the absence of evidence connecting such condition with the injury,[73] although such condition may be considered on behalf of defendant as showing that it would tend to retard plaintiff's recovery[74] or shorten his probable period of life and diminish his earning capacity.[75]

(5) Financial Condition of Party Injured. As the damages recoverable should depend upon the nature of the injury received, and not upon the wealth or poverty of plaintiff, it follows that evidence of the pecuniary condition or financial embarrassment of the party injured is irrelevant and inadmissible for the purpose of estimating the damages,[76] unless the case justifies the imposition of exemplary damages;[77] and although he may show the nature of his business and the wages he commonly earned,[78] he cannot show that he has no other means of support than such labor, as this would in an indirect way bring his poverty before the jury.[79]

(6) Expectancy of Life — (a) Right to Show. Where the injury is such as to permanently diminish one's earning capacity, and will end only with his life or with his inability to labor on account of old age, it is clear that the expectancy of life should be considered in estimating the amount of damages sustained, and proper evidence thereof is admissible.[80] Nor is it necessary to confine such expectation to a particularly dangerous employment, where it is not shown that plaintiff will continue in such employment.[81] The admissibility of such evidence for the purpose of showing the length of time plaintiff is likely to suffer has, however, been denied.[82]

bb. Mortality Tables. Standard and recognized mortality tables[85] are usually held admissible where a proper foundation is laid for their introduction[86] and proper instruction given as to their use[87] as an aid to the jury in determining the life expectancy of an injured party and thereby estimating his damages when there is proper evidence of the permanency of the injury.[88] They are of course

Sufficient authentication of tables.— In at least one jurisdiction it is said that the admission in evidence of the Carlisle or any other similar tables for the purpose of showing the expectation of life shall be received upon judicial notice of their genuineness and authoritativeness, and that legal proof thereof was not required. Scheffler v. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co., 32 Minn. 518, 21 N. W. 711. In other jurisdictions, while it does not appear affirmatively in the reported decisions that the court would not take judicial notice of the authenticity of such tables, it has been held that they were sufficiently authenticated by being presented in the Encyclopedia Britannica (Haden v. Sioux City, etc., R. Co., 99 Iowa 735, 48 N. W. 733; Worden v. Humeston, etc., R. Co., 76 Iowa 310, 41 N. W. 26); in Johnson's New Universal Encyclopedia (Seagel v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 83 Iowa 380, 49 N. W. 990; Gorman v. Minneapolis, etc., R. Co., 78 Iowa 509, 43 N. W. 303), or when printed in a law-book of general acceptance and authority in the courts of the state where offered (Sellars v. Foster, 27 Nebr. 118, 42 N. W. 907). So too a showing that the table is used by all life-insurance companies as a basis for life expectancy is sufficient (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 644), and if not properly authenticated the error is not prejudicial where the table is more favorable to the party excepting than a properly authenticated table (Sellars v. Foster, 27 Nebr. 118, 42 N. W. 907).

86. Thus mortality tables are not proper evidence unless evidence has been introduced showing plaintiff's incapacity to earn money (Macon, etc., R. Co. v. Moore, 99 Ga. 229, 25 S. E. 460), and unless plaintiff's age has been proved (Atlantic, etc., R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 93 Ga. 6, 19 S. E. 24).

inadmissible in the absence of evidence tending to show that the injuries complained of are permanent.[89]

(7) Expenses Incurred. As expenses necessarily or naturally following an injury are a legitimate item of damages,[90] it follows that under proper averments[91] evidence tending to accurately show the actual or reasonable amount of such expenditures is ordinarily admissible;[92] and while it is for the jury to determine whether or not future attendance will be required, evidence tending to show the value of such services is admissible,[93] and where the action is brought by a parent for the loss of a minor's services, and for expenses incurred in caring for him, evidence of the extent of the injury is admissible to show the extent of the trouble and expenses probably incurred.[94]

(8) Exclamations of Pain and Suffering. Declarations or exclamations of pain or suffering caused by an injury when made at the time of the happening thereof or so soon thereafter as to be considered part of the res gestæ are of course admissible as such.[95] It is not, however, necessary that they fall within the above rule of evidence to be admissible. All such declarations and exclamations of present pain or suffering as would ordinarily and probably be caused by such injury are admissible as original evidence[96] when made under ordinary circum-

Although it must be admitted that there is little uniformity among the courts as to the sufficiency of evidence of permanency of the injury to render the tables of computations admissible, from some cases it would seem that if the evidence would warrant a finding that the injury was permanent they are admissible (Collins Park, etc., R. Co. v. Ware, 112 Ga. 663, 37 S. E. 975; Ronn v. Des Moines, 78 Iowa 63, 42 N. W. 582. But see Leach v. Detroit, etc., R. Co., 125 Mich. 373, 84 N. stances, although it be a considerable time after the injury; declarations of past pain and suffering[97] or such declarations when made after the controversy has arisen or suit has been brought[98] are not ordinarily admissible.

(9) Statements of Injured Party to Physician. While mere narratives of past events concerning the injury[99] or statements of the injured party as to the cause of his condition[1] cannot be shown, although made to a physician, as such, the rule is well settled that a physician or attendant may testify to the injured party's statement as to his symptoms, ills, and the locality and character of his pain, when made for the purpose of medical advice and treatment, as such statements are made with a view to be being acted on in a matter of grave personal concern, in relation to which the party injured has a strong and direct interest to adhere to the truth.[2] When, however, the statements to the physician are made after the suit is brought, considerations arise destroying the force and effect of the reasons on which such evidence is admissible.[3]

Statements as distinguished from exclamations of suffering.— Some cases appear to draw a distinction between exclamations of the patient of pain and suffering when undergoing an examination by a physician for the purpose of qualifying him to testify upon the trial, and similar statements made by the patient to the physician. to know, not as furnishing an arbitrary measure of damages, but as a guide or assistance in enabling the jury to exercise a sound and just discretion in determining the proper amount; nor does the fact that because of the injury plaintiff may engage in intellectual pursuits, which may ultimately prove more remunerative than the labor in which he was engaged, render such evidence immaterial.[6] And he may show that he has not sufficient education to pursue a clerical vocation.[7] So the average earnings in plaintiff's regular employment may be shown, although at the time of the injury he was temporarily engaged in other work;[8] but evidence of his previous earnings in the aggregate should not be received, where they result in part from the use of his capital.[9] So evidence of wages paid for a certain kind of employment is not admissible, where the plaintiff has not followed such employment for a considerable length of time,[10] and there is no reason-

10. West Chicago R. Co. v. Maday, 188 Ill. 308, 58 N. E. 933 [affirming 88 Ill. App. 49] (where plaintiff did not follow a former emable certainty of his being able to return to such former employment,[11] although if such employment was of a nature that he could in all probability return to it, evidence thereof would seem to be admissible, although an intent to return is not shown.[12] So too opinions of witnesses as to what plaintiff would be capable of earning in vocations in which he has never been employed are inadmissible.[13]

bb. To Professional Work. Where the plaintiff is engaged in professional pursuits, proof of his earnings in that capacity before the injury and the effect thereof upon his ability to continue his profession, or to do so as profitably as before, is admissible;[14] but as the value of a professional man's time depends to a great extent upon his individual exertions, such evidence should be confined to what he himself has earned, and not to what members of his profession generally are able to earn.[15] Hence it may be shown that in connection with his practice he was a contributor to various professional journals,[16] while on the other hand defendant may show that his practice was an unlawful one and that his professional reputation was bad.[17]

(c) Effect Upon Probable Increase of Earnings — aa. As Dependent Upon Personal Fitness. Where a person has fitted himself for, and has the capacity to earn more money in another employment or calling than he is at the time of the injury receiving, evidence of such fact is admissible.[18]

bb. As Dependent Upon Promotion. Where by virtue of the contract of employment plaintiff will, if found satisfactory, be promoted or given an increase of salary within a stipulated or reasonable time, this fact is admissible on the question of damages;[19] but where an employee can only show that when a vacancy occurs the place is usually filled by a faithful subordinate, and that he had at the time of the injury such chance of promotion, the evidence is generally held to be but problematical and uncertain and is inadmissible.[20]

after[22] the infliction of an injury, or a comparison of one's health before and after such time is admissible as tending to prove the extent, nature, and probable effects of the injury;[23] provided of course a sufficient relationship is shown between the subsequent condition and the injury.[24]

(12) To Show Mental Suffering. Inasmuch as a party is a competent witness to testify to his physical sufferings there would seem to be no reason why he may not also give affirmative evidence of his mental anguish as well,[25] although it has been held that this item of damage is a subject of inference to be drawn by the jury and not of direct proof.[26]

(13) To Show Permanency of Injury. Evidence of the condition of plaintiff both before and after the injury has a direct bearing upon the probable permanency of the injury,[27] and where there is other evidence that the injury is permanent, testimony concerning plaintiff's earning capacity before and after the injury may be shown for this purpose.[28] So too testimony of a physician as to the proportion of persons with plaintiff's affliction who ultimately recover their health is competent on this point;[29] and where a trial is a considerable period of time after the infliction of the injury, there is no error in allowing plaintiff to directly and affirmatively testify that the injury is permanent.[30]

(14) To Show Proper Medical Attention. As it is incumbent upon an injured party to use ordinary care and diligence in securing medical attention, and not to permit the injury to be aggravated by his own negligence,[31] it follows that evidence that the injured party procured a good and reputable physician and obeyed his directions,[32] or that owing to the peculiar nature of the injury he should not be expected to at once fully realize its gravity, is admissible.[33] So too while evidence of the financial condition of plaintiff cannot ordinarily be offered,[34] yet evidence of such condition is admissible for the purpose of showing the reason for plaintiff's failure to procure such attendance, or to procure medical attendance of the highest grade.[35]

(c) Testimony of Physician[36] — (1) In General. The opinion of a physician who has been called to give professional attention to an injured party as to the gravity or extent and probable result of the injury is admissible, whether it be formed from his examination and diagnosis alone, or based also upon statements made to him by the patient for the purpose of securing the proper treatment;[37]

Evidence in mitigation.— While it is competent for defendant to show in mitigation of damages that the plaintiff's injuries were wholly or partially the result of improper treatment on the part of his physician, he cannot establish this fact by evidence of the general reputation of such physician (Thorne v. California Stage Co., 6 Cal. 232); nor can he show that the husband of the injured party was advised by the attending physician that she was too ill to be moved, where such advice was not in her hearing, and there was no evidence that it was communicated to her (Thrasher v. Postel, 79 Wis. 503, 48 N. Testimony of a physician as to the opinion of other consulting physicians with whom he made an examination of plaintiff is ob-

nor is it necessary that the testimony of the physician be confined to the result of the examination. He may go into details concerning the same.[38] So where there is evidence of the permanency of the injury, the fact that the physician was called a considerable period after the infliction thereof does not render his testimony incompetent;[39] but a physician's testimony as to the probable effect of an injury should show that such result is reasonably certain and not a mere likelihood,[40] and must be confined to the particular injury in question.[41] So too defendant has a right to show by medical testimony that the diseased condition probably arose from another source and was not caused by the injury complained of.[42] But while the condition of an injured person, especially soon after the injury, is usually proven by expert medical testimony,[43] there is no rule limiting the evidence to the testimony of witnesses of this class, and the mother of a child may testify to the extent of its injuries;[44] and as the injured party himself is ordinarily the person best acquainted with his own condition,[45] he may testify to such condition and to the extent of his injuries.[46]

(2) Physical Examination of Plaintiff. In an action for personal injuries it is not error to allow an expert witness to examine plaintiff's injuries in the presence of the jury.[47]

(II) For Injuries to Property — (A) In General. Where property is injured or destroyed the admissibility of evidence to prove the extent of the damages is dependent very largely of course upon the particular facts involved. Hence evidence clearly showing that the damage is not trivial or temporary should not be excluded,[48] and all circumstances connected with the injury bearing upon an item of damage may generally be considered.[49] If the property has a lease or rental value during the time plaintiff is deprived of its use, evidence of a loss of or depreciation in such value is competent.[50] The evidence must, however, ordinarily be confined to the property affected,[51] and the diminished rental value of other property similarly situated belonging to third parties cannot be shown.[52] So a party claiming damages for an obstruction to a road cannot show that other persons were troubled with the same obstruction.[53]

(B) Particular Kinds of Injuries — (1) Injuries to Animals. Where the action is for the negligent killing of or injury to an animal, the plaintiff may, on the question of damages, show its pedigree,[54] and testimony as to the value of an injured animal at the time of the trial is competent as bearing upon the extent and permanency of the injury.[55] So too the change in the disposition of an animal may be shown on the question of damages,[56] and evidence of a probable change in its disposition has been held admissible.[57] But the value of the animal must be shown by the best evidence attainable,[58] and it is not permissible to show the value of an injured animal by comparing its appearance with other animals of a stated valuation, where other and better evidence is obtainable.[59]

(2) Injuries to Crops. In an action for an injury to fully matured crops evidence of their value in the entirety is admissible,[60] and while the measure of damages in an action for growing crops is their value at the time of their destruction,[61] yet in determining this amount evidence of the probable yield and value of the crop had it progressed to maturity is admissible;[62] and proof of the yield in that part of the field not destroyed,[63] or of the value of matured crops of the variety destroyed,[64] is admissible. But evidence of the cost of putting in and cultivating a like crop to the same state of maturity is inadmissible.[65]

(3) Injuries to Fruit Trees. In an action for the recovery of damages to an orchard evidence of the amount of fruit that trees of like nature would produce in a seasonable year and the market value thereof has been condemned as too uncertain,[66] although later cases in the same jurisdiction hold that direct evidence of the value of the orchard as a part of the realty is admissible, and that one is not confined in his evidence to a showing of the market value of the land before and after the injury.[67] Nor would it seem to be material whether the action is brought for injury to or destruction of a single tree or of an orchard.[68] It has also been held competent, in addition to showing the value of the farm before and after the injury to the trees, to offer testimony as to the income from the orchard for several years prior to the injury.[69]

(4) Injuries to Fences. As the measure of damages for the destruction of a fence is the value thereof, evidence that some other kind of a fence might be as efficient for protection as the one destroyed and would cost less has been held not admissible.[70]

(5) Injuries to Grass and Meadow. Where grass or meadow has been injured or destroyed through the negligence of defendant, the value of the same for hay or grazing purposes is admissible as a basis for estimating the amount of damages,[71] and if the roots of the grass are destroyed evidence of the cost of reseeding the meadow and that no crop could be produced the first year is admissible.[72] As the value of the partial use of a pasture could best be determined by a knowledge of the value of it as an entirety, evidence of such entire value is admissible, where plaintiff has had a partial use thereof,[73] but evidence as to the effect of a fire upon an adjacent meadow is not admissible.[74]

overflowage of plaintiff's land, due to the negligent or unlawful act of defendant, it is competent to show the diminished products of the land during the succeeding year as compared with the year previous;[75] and the unfitness of the land to immediately produce crops as it had done previously;[76] and as further showing the effect upon the land for agricultural purposes unsuccessful attempts to raise a crop may be shown.[77] While damages accruing after the commencement of a suit are not recoverable,[78] evidence of injury caused by a similar flowage is admissible as showing the consequences of the act complained of.[79] If the flowage is occasioned by a nuisance, evidence of the previous condition of the land before the erection of the same is competent;[80] and when the nuisance cannot for proper reasons be abated, plaintiff may recover for the costs of rendering his premises secure therefrom.[81] Damages for overflow of land contiguous or in a near-by locality cannot be inquired into,[82] unless the condition of the two tracts with regard to productiveness be proved in every material particular.[83] So where the damages are temporary only, evidence of the general depreciation of the property should not be admitted.[84]

(c) Expenses Incurred. Where, because of a wrong or injury to property, expenses are incurred, either in repairing the same or otherwise, evidence thereof is admissible on the question of damages;[85] and while ordinarily it must also be shown that the amount expended is reasonable,[86] yet where the amount thus expended was small and consisted of expenditures fully understood by the jury an omission of such proof was held not to be error.[87] So where the repairs have actually been made, proof of the actual expenditure must be given, and the estimated cost thereof is inadmissible.[88]

(d) Value Before and After Injury. Where property has been injured by the unlawful act of another, evidence of its comparative value before and after the injury, if confined within a reasonable space of time, is admissible;[89] but as it

The price plaintiff paid for property twelve years before the injury complained of is too remote to be competent for the purpose of determining the damages for an injury cannot be presumed that a municipality will allow its sewers to remain permanently defective, evidence of the value of the property before and after the sewer became defective would not furnish the proper criterion for estimating the damages.[90]

(E) Testimony of Amount in Aggregate. After a party has stated not only that there is damage to his property, but in what particular such damages have arisen, it is sometimes permissible to allow him to make a general estimate of the amount, leaving it to the cross-examiner to develop the assumed amount of each item,[91] but where no such previous evidence has been introduced, a general and sweeping statement as to the amount of damages is not permissible.[92]

3. FOR PARTICULAR PURPOSES — a. To Establish Exemplary Damages and Amount Thereof — (I) In General. A plaintiff has of course a right to inquire into the motives of defendant and bring the same before the jury for the purpose of recovering exemplary or punitive damages in all actions where damages of this nature are recoverable,[93] and all acts and circumstances connected with the transaction tending to exhibit or explain the motive of the defendant, and showing that he acted wantonly or maliciously, or was flagrantly or criminally negligent are generally speaking admissible.[94] On the other hand evidence on behalf of defendant tending to show a justification and the absence of gross negligence or malice is admissible.[95] Thus defendant[96] or his agent[97] may testify in person as to what his intent was. Nor can malice be inferred from the mere doing of an unlawful act.[98]

(II) Pecuniary Condition of Defendant. Evidence of the pecuniary condition and financial circumstances of defendant is usually held to be relevant and admissible as bearing upon the amount of punitive or exemplary damages which may be awarded;[99] but when no such damages are in issue and recovery of compensatory damages only is permissible the admission of such evidence is error;[1] and where there are several defendants sued jointly in trespass, inasmuch as the same amount of damages must be assessed against all, it is error to instruct the jury that they may take into consideration the pecuniary ability of each individual defendant to pay punitive or exemplary damages.[2]

b. To Show Lost Profits. Whether or not evidence of loss of profits is or is not admissible depends in many cases upon the extremely troublesome and unsettled question of whether or not such profits are a legitimate item of damages.[3] When they are clearly such, evidence bearing thereon is of course admissible;[4] but such evidence must not be uncertain or speculative.[5] So too in some actions, such as for the breach of a contract of employment to sell certain articles upon commission, or a certain percentage,[6] or for the breach of an agreement not to use certain property or pursue a certain business in competition with plaintiff,[7] evidence of loss of profits is the best and most certain proof of the damage attainable; and in many jurisdictions evidence of profits which would probably have been received is admissible, not as the measure of damages, but as affording the best guide or aid to the jury of which the nature of the case admits in the exercise of a proper discretion in estimating the damages;[8] and for like purpose evidence of the actual past profits and receipts is ordinarily admissible,[9] if not too remote from the injury or wrong complained of.[10]

C. Sufficiency — 1. In General. It is a general rule, applicable in all actions, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, that the amount of damage which a plaintiff is entitled to recover must not only be alleged, but proved with reasonable certainty by competent evidence as well;[11] although exemplary or punitive damages may be determined from the character and attendant circumstances of the acts themselves, without evidence of an estimate of the amount thereof, or data upon which the amount should be reckoned.[12]

2. In Particular Actions — a. Ex Contractu. In actions for damages for breach of a contract, while it is not ordinarily necessary to prove the exact amount of loss to an absolute certainty,[13] yet whenever substantial damages are claimed, their amount is the subject of proof, and must be shown with reasonable certainty;[14] and evidence, to be sufficient to authorize a recovery, must furnish some criterion or data whereby the jury may make rational deductions and calculations to determine the amount without danger of gross injustice, or reliance on their own speculations or conjecture of the probable loss sustained.[15] The jury are not, however, obliged to follow the evidence introduced absolutely and blindly, nor base their verdict upon the opinion of any one of the witnesses, nor upon an average of the different amounts of damages testified to, but may consider all the facts properly brought before them at the trial.[16]

b. Ex Delicto — (i) In General. Evidence sufficient to authorize a recovery of damages arising ex delicto must show the extent and amount thereof or furnish facts and data as a basis upon which the jury may approximate the proper amount with reasonable certainty;[17] and if damages are implied or proved, but no evidence as to the amount is offered, a recovery of nominal damages only can be had.[18] If, however, there is evidence to warrant a jury in finding that the plaintiff has been damaged by the wrongful act, he should not be nonsuited.[19]

(ii) For Personal Injuries — (A) In General. In actions for personal injuries the existence of the bodily hurt or defect complained of must not be left to mere conjecture, surmise, or speculation.[20] An estimate of the amount of the damages is not, however, essential, it being sufficient to furnish the jury with data sufficient for an intelligent assessment,[21] and in many instances the jury may, upon proof of the injury, fix the amount from their general knowledge;[22] nor is it essential that there be a uniformity of evidence as to the nature of the injury, where its existence and the cause thereof is not disputed.[23]

There is no need of direct or express evidence of the value of a wife's services, either by the day, week, or any other stated period, in order to entitle the husband to recover for the loss thereof, as the relation which she sustains to him is a special and peculiar one, and the actual facts and circumstances of each case should guide the jury in estimating for themselves, in the light of their own observation and experience, and to the satisfaction of their own consciences, the amount which would fairly and justly compensate the husband for his loss. Standard Oil Co. v. Bowker, 141 Ind. 12, 40 N. E. 128.

23. Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Suggs, 62 Tex. 323. Where an injured person in good faith does certain injudicious acts through a mistaken judgment, it is not necessary to his recovery that he should by evidence discriminate between the actual injuries and their natural consequences, and the injuries with their consequences resulting from such acts, as it would probably be impossible even by expert testimony to accurately describe and

(B) Of Effect of Injury — (1) In General. The evidence, to justify a court in submitting to the jury the question of whether or not a certain bodily condition complained of is the result of the injury, should show the connection between the two with reasonable certainty, and not leave it to vague speculation[24] or conjecture.[25] It may be said, however, that evidence of good health prior to the injury, and of suffering or ailments immediately or shortly thereafter, which are shown by competent testimony to be reasonably imputed to it, and are not shown by expert testimony to be an impossible effect of the injury, is sufficient to carry the question to the jury.[26]

(2) As Cause of Disease. Sufficiency of the evidence to prove that a disease from which the injured party is suffering or from which he died was caused by the injury depends of course upon the distinguishing facts of each individual case; the mere fact that a certain diseased condition might consistently arise from the injury is insufficient.[27] The evidence should so exclude other causes, and the circumstances be such that a reasonable inference arises that the injury caused the disease,[28] and if the party is addicted to habits which might induce the disease this fact will be considered.[29] On the other hand a substantial conflict in the testimony as to the cause of the disease, which by a substantial number of equally credible witnesses on both sides is attributed to the injury, will ordinarily carry the question to the jury.[30]

(C) Of Expectancy of Life. While affirmative proof of the probable duration of life is admissible,[31] such evidence is not absolutely essential, but the jury may arrive at a conclusion from evidence as to the health of plaintiff and the other facts of the case properly before them.[32]

(D) Of Future Pain and Suffering. The evidence, to justify a recovery of damages because of future pain and suffering, must be so certain and definite that its existence is not left to the mere imagination or guess-work of the jury.[33]

(E) Of Impaired Earning Capacity. To authorize a recovery of damages for the impairment of earning capacity the party must show facts from which the jury can intelligently determine the amount.[34] Proof of his earning capacity before the injury and the extent to which it has been affected is sufficient,[35] although ordinarily proof of these two points is required.[36]

(F) Of Loss of Time. Where one claims loss of time as an element of damage, as the result of personal injuries, it is incumbent upon him to establish by competent evidence the value of such time, or facts from which the value may be estimated with reasonable accuracy,[37] unless his occupation or business is such that the value of his time is not susceptible of definite proof.[38]

(G) Of Mental Suffering. Direct testimony of mental anguish and suffering, while proper,[39] is not indispensable to a recovery therefor. Damages for the same are ordinarily determined from the circumstances of the case as disclosed by the evidence, the amount thereof depending upon the seriousness of the injury;[40] but the evidence must show such suffering to be reasonably certain and not merely imaginary.[41]

(H) Of Permanency of Injury. While the evidence, to authorize a recovery because of the permanency of the injury, must establish such condition with rea-

Mere testimony of the condition of the plaintiff up to the time of the trial, with no evidence that his condition would continue, has been held to be insufficient to justify the jury in considering this item. Shultz v. Griffith, 103 Iowa 150, 72 N. W. 445, 40 L. R. A. 117.

Evidence that a married woman made from five to ten dollars a month by taking in sewing is sufficient evidence of a separate employment to allow a recovery for the loss of earning capacity, in an action for personal injury prosecuted by her. Bailey v. Centerville, 108 Iowa 20, 78 N. W. 831.

sonable certainty,[42] it is well settled that direct expert testimony of the certainty of such effect is not necessary, but the jury may be authorized to take such probability into consideration when from the entire evidence such effect appears to be the probable result of the injury.[43] So too where the evidence concerning the permanent effect of the injury is conflicting the jury may ordinarily consider the same.[44]

(III) For Injury to Property. Where plaintiff sues for a loss of or injury to his property, caused by the negligent or unlawful act of defendant, while the complaint should not be dismissed, if the evidence shows damage to any extent,[45] any substantial recovery must not be based on guess-work or inference, but must be supported by evidence of facts, circumstances, and data justifying an inference that the damages awarded are a just and reasonable compensation for the injury suffered;[46] and plaintiff's mere assumption that he has been damaged to a certain amount without stating any facts upon which the estimate is made is too uncertain.[47] So too it must clearly appear that the damage was the result of the act complained of,[48] and that the assessment includes only damage arising from the unlawful act;[49] and where it is clear to the court that the assessment has been made through a misconception of the law the verdict will be set aside.[50]

As anticipated profits, to be considered as a legitimate item of damage, must be shown with some degree of certainty and not be left to mere conjecture,[51] the facts and circumstances showing the grounds and reason for the expected profits must appear with such certainty and fulness that the jury may estimate their amount without resorting to speculation or conjecture.[52] Mere estimates, speculations, or conjectures of witnesses, not founded upon knowledge of actual facts,[53] or testimony that plain-

b. Counsel Fees. So too where counsel fees and the expenses of litigation are sought to be recovered the amount expended therefor must be proved with certainty,[55] and it must be shown that the amount so expended was a fair and reasonable compensation for the services rendered.[56]

c. Medical Expenses. As a general rule mere proof that medical expenses have been incurred, without proof that such expenses are a reasonable charge, is insufficient to authorize their submission to the jury as an element of damage,[57] although in some jurisdictions the courts are inclined to the opposite view.[58] Again some courts hold that if the charges have actually been paid by the plaintiff evidence thereof would be sufficient to carry the item to the jury.[59] As to the sufficiency of testimony of the reasonableness of the charge some courts seem to hold that the testimony of the physician himself as to its reasonableness will suffice;[60] while on the other hand others are inclined to the opposite view.[61]

but an interlocutory judgment must be ordinarily entered,[63] and evidence taken or inquiry made as to the quantum of damages.[64]

2. By Whom Made — a. In General. The practice of determining the amount of damages in such cases in England, in the absence of statutory modification, seems to have been fairly well settled and defined.[65] In this country there seems to be no universal practice; procedure similar to that of the common law has in some states been invoked, in the absence of express statutory provisions;[66] while in the greater number of states the proper proceedings must be determined by reference to statutes.[67] In some cases a jury is necessary,[68] while under other circumstances the determination of the amount may be made by the court[69] or by some one appointed by it. Thus in some jurisdictions it may submit such determination to an auditor, assessor, or master,[70] or in certain instances to a referee.[71]

Where this procedure is invoked the form of the judgment entry is "that the plaintiff ought to recover his damages, but because the court know not what damages the said plaintiff hath sustained, therefore the sheriff is commanded, that by the oaths of twelve honest and lawful men, he inquire into said damages, and return such inquisition into court." 65. In cases where the defendant suffers judgment to go against him by default or nil dicit or by non sum informatus, in actions where the specific thing sued for is recovered, as in actions of debt for a sum certain, the judgment is complete; but where damages are to be recovered a jury must be called in to assess them unless the defendant, to save charges, will confess the whole damages laid in the declaration. This process of assessment is called a writ of inquiry, in the execution of which the sheriff sits as a judge and tries by a jury, subject to nearly the same law and conditions as the trial by jury at nisi prius, and ascertains the damages which the plaintiff has really sustained; and when his verdict is returned it is entered upon the roll in the manner of a postea, and the plaintiff is usually awarded the sum so assessed. In an equity suit a writ of inquiry was never ordered, and a sheriff's jury had no jurisdiction to assess the damages; if the court required information on any subject it sent the case to a court of common law on a feigned issue, and had such subject submitted to a jury regularly summoned and impaneled before a judge. Kreitz v. Frost, 55 Barb. (N. Y.) 474. See Forsyth v. Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 318, where it is held that on the principle that a court of equity, having taken jurisdiction of the subject-matter, will settle all the rights of the parties in relation thereto, if a question of damages sustained prior to the institution of the suit is involved the court should ascertain by a commissioner or an issue quantum damnificatus the amount thereof and render judgment accordingly.

70. Price v. Dearborn, 34 N. H. 481 [approved in Begg v. Whittier, 48 Me. 314], holding that it was no objection to the report of such auditor that one of two or more amounts were reported as damages dependent upon questions of law, raised by the facts stated in the report, and submitted to the court for its decision.

71. Ratté v. Booth, 16 Ont. Pr. 185.

Under the earlier practice of New York the court would not direct the inquest of damages to be held by the referee unless the examination of some long account was necessary (Boyce v. Comstock, Code Rep. N. S. (N. Y.) 290); and in such case a copy of the account itself must be shown the court (Brown v. Miller, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 24). And see Waterbury v. Bouker, 10 Hun (N. and delay,[72] the practice, either by virtue of statute or by judicial innovation,[73] has been changed, and it is now usually conceded that where the action is brought for a sum certain or for a sum that may be made certain by computation,[74] and in many cases where judgment is entered against defendant by default[75] the court may enter up judgment after computation or after proper inquiry as to the amount of damages, and no jury is necessary; and the same rule is applicable on demurrer overruled, as upon default.[76] In the application of this rule the court has dispensed with the jury and assessed the damages where the amount has been conceded by confession or agreement of the parties,[77] in actions on promissory notes,[78] in actions on certificates of deposit,[79] in actions on stock subscriptions,[80] in actions on judgments,[81] in actions on bonds,[82] in actions for statutory penalties,[83] in actions on a covenant for rent in a deed,[84] in actions of replevin where plaintiff fails to appear,[85] and also on the dissolution of an injunction and dismissal of the bill.[86]

c. By Clerk. In many jurisdictions where the amount may be determined by mere computation, an assessment may be made by the clerk of the court.[87] Such procedure is usually[88] invoked upon motion or at the instance of the court, and rests upon the theory that the act of the clerk is fiduciary and is really that of the court.[89] Hence any assessment which may be referred to the clerk may be made by the court in the first instance if it so desires.[90] But as this practice is usually founded upon statutory provision it cannot be invoked in cases where the authority is not given.[91]

d. By Jury. Where the demand in the complaint is for unliquidated damages and the amount cannot be determined without passing upon and adjudging questions of fact, it is the usual, and in some jurisdictions necessary, practice, to enter an interlocutory judgment, and to issue a writ of inquiry, or by some analogous procedure to have the amount determined and assessed by a jury.[92] This practice has been followed in actions where the declaration contained both special and common counts;[93] in actions on notes payable in current bank-notes,[94] in actions on obligations payable in currency of an uncertain value,[95] and in actions on bonds conditioned otherwise than for the payment of a specified sum, or where the truth of the breaches assigned should be inquired into.[96] Again in some jurisdictions it has been held necessary to submit to the jury the assessment of interest on the obligation in suit;[97] yet in other jurisdictions it seems that this item may be computed by the court.[98]

e. By Court or Jury at Option of Parties. It is also a well-established practice in many jurisdictions that the assessment will be made either by a jury or by the court at the option of plaintiff, who may state his preference by motion at the rendition of the interlocutory judgment.[99] On the other hand by statute[1] in some jurisdictions defendant may insist upon an assessment by a jury.[2] The right of either of the parties, however, to demand a jury to assess the damages may of course be waived by them and the matter left to the court.[3]

1. A provision that a court may assess the damages when a judgment is taken by default, without the intervention of a jury, must be construed as subordinate to a clause in the state constitution providing that the right of trial by jury of all issues of fact in civil proceedings shall be inviolate, and therefore the court may assess the damages only when the defendant has not appeared in court, or when, having appeared, he waives or fails to assert his right to have the assessment made by a jury. Under the English practice plaintiff is entitled as a matter of right to a writ of inquiry, and the subsequent assessment of damages by a jury (Blackmore v. Flemyng, 7 T. R. 446); while it has been said that defendant, by having suffered default, has no election in the case, and cannot demand a jury (Begg v. Whittier, 48 Me. 314; Price v. Dearborn, 34 N. H. 481).

Such right is waived altogether by failing to submit a motion therefor until after the assessment has been made by the clerk or auditor (Palmer v. Harris, 98 Ill. 507; Price v. Dearborn, 34 N. H. 481), or by failing to comply with a statute requiring the demand to be made at a certain time or stage of the proceedings (Decatur, etc., Imp. Co. v. Crass, 97 Ala. 524, 12 So. 41. disposition of any pleas made;[4] and it is usually necessary that the record show that an interlocutory judgment by default or its equivalent was entered before the assessment was made.[5]

b. On Writ of Inquiry — (I) Nature and Requisites. A writ of inquiry is in substance an order of the court that a jury be sworn to assess damages,[6] and should show the preceding steps that have been taken in the case.[7] It has been held that it can only lawfully issue where the record shows a judgment by default[8] and a rule or order of the court awarding it,[9] although it has also been held that if an inquest of damages has been properly taken it cannot be vitiated by showing that no positive award of the writ was made.[10]

(II) Proceedings Under — (A) Nature of Jury. Under common-law procedure a jury to assess the damages on a writ of inquiry was a special one consisting of twelve men, summoned by the sheriff for that particular purpose from his county;[11] but under the practice prevailing in some of the states the jury for this purpose may be taken from the regular panel.[12]

(B) Before Whom Jury Sits. It was the usual practice at common law for the jury in executing a writ of inquiry to make the assessment in the presence and under the instruction of the sheriff, although it might be made under the supervision of a deputy.[13] In this country it is the practice in some jurisdictions to have the assessment made under the instructions and in the presence of the Swearing such jury to do more than is required of them does not vitiate the acts which they properly perform, and therefore, while it is informal, it is not erroneous to swear them to try the issues joined, instead of to determine the amount of damages. Roberts v. Swearengen, Hard. (Ky.) 121.

7. Boyer v. Jones, 1 Woodw. (Pa.) 498, holding that while it was not necessary that the writ should recite the whole of the plaintiff's declaration, yet where it merely directed the sheriff to inquire as to the damages sustained by plaintiff "by occasion of the premises," where the only "premises" set out consisted in an allegation that defendant had been attached to answer plaintiff in a plea of trespass, it is insufficient, as it does not appear that judgment had been entered.

court,[14] and this procedure will generally be adopted where important questions of law are likely to arise, or the questions of law and fact are mixed.[15]

c. Time of Assessment. Under some statutory provisions it has been held that the assessment must be made at the succeeding term after judgment has been entered,[16] although it may usually be made at the same term,[17] or at the discretion of the court at either term.[18]

d. Notice to Defendant. In some jurisdictions the practice rests upon the theory that a defendant who has not entered an appearance must himself keep watch and make it his business to appear upon the assessment of damages, if he would contest the amount thereof;[19] in other jurisdictions, however, either by virtue of statute or by rules of practice, notice to defendant of the assessment proceedings is necessary,[20] and such notice has been held necessary, in the absence of an express provision of the code, where a prior rule of court provided for the same.[21] So too if the general practice has been to order the writ executed at a subsequent term, and an order is made for its execution at the term that it is awarded, notice should be given defendant, although no statute specifically requires it.[22]

In New York, under the practice prior to the code, requiring that the same notice as the notice for trial should be given of the assessment of damages by the clerk, or of the execution of the writ of inquiry (Green v. Guthrie, 10 Johns. 128), it was necessary, to entitle a defendant to such notice, that he should make some appearance in the case before the expiration of the statutory time for answering (Lynde v. West, 12 Wend. 235). 23. For after the overruling of a demurrer the case stands, with reference to the evidence necessary for the plaintiff and admissible for the defendant, the same as it would not any particular sum more than a nominal amount.[24] Defendant may introduce proof to reduce the claim to nominal damages;[25] he may cross-examine the opposite party's witnesses;[26] and in most jurisdictions he may introduce witnesses in his own behalf,[27] may address the jury,[28] may ask instructions of the court concerning the law,[29] may challenge a juror,[30] and may move for a new trial and by a bill of exceptions reserve any questions affecting the damages;[31] but inasmuch as a defendant has a right to appear and object to the introduction of testimony, he cannot after a failure so to do have the judgment struck out because of the admission of illegal testimony on the ground of surprise or irregularity,[32] although it would seem that if such evidence induces a judgment clearly excessive he is entitled to relief.[33]

This is the extent of the advantage

the default admits a cause of action, proof thereof need not be offered,[36] and plaintiff is entitled to nominal damages without introducing evidence.[37] His petition is not, however, to be taken as true, and if he would recover a greater amount he must prove the same.[38] Generally speaking all evidence conforming to the pleadings and tending to show the amount of the demand or matters in aggravation of the injury is admissible;[39] while under like limitations evidence tending to mitigate or reduce the damages is admissible on behalf of defendant.[40] Evidence of matters which would have constituted a good plea in bar to the cause of action is generally held to be inadmissible.[41] It may, however, happen gained by the plaintiff from that omission; if he is not satisfied with nominal, and seeks greater damages, he must proceed to prove the amount, and the declaration, so far forth as the increased amount is concerned, remains subject to the rules of pleading and evidence, and the proof must follow the allegations as closely as if the case stood upon the general issue. If therefore, in proving the greater damages, the plaintiff proves that they resulted entirely from a wrong which he has not declared upon, this evidence forces him back to the nominal judgment." A statutory writ of inquiry to assess damages on subsequent breaches of covenants in that evidence which might if used have been available to prevent a judgment may after judgment be available to reduce the damages to a mere nominal sum.[42]

f. Verdict or Finding. A verdict after default or demurrer overruled must be in favor of plaintiff,[43] and damages in some amount should be awarded, although they may be merely nominal.[44] A finding of the facts is not essential to such verdict;[45] and where the action is against several jointly, some of whom only plead, the assessment should also be made against the defaulting parties by the court or jury who tried the issue.[46]

4. Setting Aside Inquest. If a party is dissatisfied with the assessment he should move the court for its correction,[47] and if he desires a review by the appellate court his objections should be brought up by a bill of exceptions.[48] An inquest or order for the assessment of damages like any other judicial proceeding will be set aside where unjust injury is or would be done to a litigant by allowing it to stand;[49] in which case an affidavit of merits should ordinarily be made by the movant,[50] and in some instances terms may be exacted;[51] but an inquest will not ordinarily be set aside for mere irregularity which may be raised on appeal.[52]

or not the court has the power in an action for damages for a personal injury to require the injured party to submit to a physical examination for the purpose of determining the extent thereof. In some of the adjudicated cases the rule of the court is announced without extensive reasoning, while in others the research and deliberations have been exhaustive. So too a variance in the decisions may in some instances be accounted for by a difference in the circumstances under which the examination is requested, as the earlier holdings in some of the states, whether they be for or against the power, have respectively been departed from in later cases.[54] Some of the courts, relying upon the absence of common-law precedents for such a course, and having in view the right of privacy and the sacredness of the person, deny the power;[55] while in perhaps a greater number of jurisdictions the courts, having confidence that the judiciary may be relied upon to prevent an improper shock to the modesty or feelings of delicacy of an injured party, and recognizing that the best evidence possible should always be produced, affirm the power.[56]

54. Notable instances of the above phase of the evolution of the law on this subject are shown by the change of judicial opinions in Missouri, Indiana, and New York.

In Missouri, the pioneer case of Loyd v. Hannibal, etc., R. Co., 53 Mo. 509, holds that such proceedings were unknown to the practice and to the law, and deny the power of the trial court to enforce such an order. This decision was, however, afterward receded from and the doctrine was thoroughly established in that court that the power exists. Sidekum v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 93 Mo. 400, 4 S. W. 701, 3 Am. St. Rep. 549; Shepard v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 85 Mo. 629, 55 Am. Rep. 390; Hill v. Sedalia, 64 Mo. App. 494.

In Indiana a similar evolution of the law is shown by an examination of the cases. In Pennsylvania Co. v. Newmeyer, 129 Ind. 401, 28 N. E. 860, the court, commenting upon and distinguishing the prior cases, in which the point had been only suggested or raised collaterally, decide that the power does not exist; but in the later case of South Bend v. Turner, 156 Ind. 418, 60 N. E. 271, 83 Am. St. Rep. 200, 54 L. R. A. 396, the court with similar elaborations overrule their former holding and decide that the power exists.

In New York, on the other hand, the evolution of the law was the reverse. In that state, in the earlier case of Walsh v. Sayre, 52 How. Pr. 334, the power was affirmed. This case was approved obiter in Shaw v. Van Rensselaer, 60 How. Pr. 143. But these cases were repudiated and the power denied in McQuigan v. Delaware, etc., R. Co., 129 N. Y. 50, 29 N. b. Right of Defendant to Demand Examination — (i) In General. The fact, however, that many courts concede their power to compel an examination does not authorize the defendant to demand the same as a matter of absolute right.[57] In a few jurisdictions, however, it would seem that under certain circumstances such right exists;[58] but in the absence of statute [59] the rule is that the matter rests within the sound discretion of the court.[60] Where the power to order an examination is conceded, the important question, what state of facts is to be presented to make a refusal to so order an abuse of discretion, arises.[61] On such question each case is governed largely by its own facts, the necessity of the examination for the attainment of justice being of course the guiding star.[62] Nor will

If it becomes a question of probable violence to the refined and delicate feelings of plaintiff on the one hand, and probable injustice to defendant on the other, justice must prevail; and while the court will order the examination with respect to time, place, and persons in every case, with due regard for the feelings of plaintiff, the examination will not be dispensed with at the expense of truth and justice. 57. For, as said in Joliet St. R. Co. v. Call, 42 Ill. App. 41, 45 [affirmed in 143 Ill. 177, 32 N. E. 389], "If it be a matter of right, then, necessarily, the right extends to all cases wherever a defendant demands his right, and the court is powerless to judge of the necessity or propriety of it, but must enforce the right even where such examination is clearly needless or improper. . . . There are many cases, where to hold it an absolute right to have an examination of a sensitive person in matters of a delicate nature by doctors selected by others, would only enable a wrongdoer to add insult to injury and compel a party to give up substantial rights rather than submit."

58. Sibley v. Smith, 46 Ark. 275, 55 Am. this prerogative be exercised where the plaintiff is willing to submit to a proper and competent examination without such order,[63] or where the examination requested may injure or imperil the health of plaintiff.[64] So too a request for the examination should be submitted at such a time that the granting of the same will not retard the administration of justice, or work an injustice to plaintiff in the presentation of his case and, in the absence of a good excuse for the delay, it will rarely be complied with when made after the commencement of the trial;[65] especially after the plaintiff has offered his evidence in chief.[66] Where the statute provides that the plaintiff, when a female, is entitled to be examined by a physician of her own sex, such plaintiff need not make any special application to be examined by such physician, and an order providing otherwise is erroneous.[67] A physician appointed by the court to make an examination is an officer thereof and should be sworn.[68] As a rule the examiners should be agreed upon by the parties or designated by the court, and it will rarely order the examination to be made by a party of the defendant's choosing only,[69] especially if he be personally objectionable to plaintiff.[70]

(II) After Voluntary Exhibition to Jury. Plaintiff may, with due regard to the proper bounds of propriety and decency, exhibit the injured portion or members of his body to the jury for the purpose of showing the extent of his injuries,[71] but by voluntarily doing so he confers upon defendant a right to require further physical examination of the same;[72] and where an exposure of the injury is in no way indelicate, and seems to be essential to a proper conception of the injury in dispute, it would seem that it is the right and duty of the court to order such an exposure to the jury.[73]

2. Questions of Law and Fact. The question as to what constitutes proper and legitimate items of damage in the case at bar is for the court;[74] but where an issue is made by the pleadings and is tried by a jury the estimation and determination of the amount of the injury sustained is usually a question of fact for their sound and reasonable discretion,[75] and they usually assess the damages if any are to be awarded.[76] If the jury which tries the issue of facts fails to make an assessment of damages, it would seem that the practice in some jurisdictions is to award a venire de novo,[77] although it has been held more comportable with the liberal practice of this country, and equally promotive of the ends of justice, to direct a reference to a jury for the purpose of assessment only.[78] It is especially true that they must exercise a large discretion in actions for personal injury,[79] and the court will not interfere with the result unless the amount awarded by the verdict is clearly excessive and disproportionate to the injury sustained by the plaintiff.[80]

3. INSTRUCTIONS — a. In General. Instructions applying the law of damages should of course contain no irrelevant statements, especially such as may be construed as an intimation of the court adverse to either litigant;[81] although where the evidence concerning an injury is practically undisputed it is not error for the court to express its opinion as to the inference deducible therefrom.[82] The instructions should be so framed that the jury may readily understand the item of damages to which they allude.[83] In personal injury cases the jury should be fully and fairly informed as to the items or elements of damage they may consider;[84] and no items for which under the evidence there is a clear liability should

The amount of damages which will carry costs should not be considered by the jury in determining their verdict. Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. (U. S.) 363, 14 L. ed. 181.

81. Bray v. Latham, 81 Ga. 640, 644, 8 S. E. 64, holding that for a judge to say to the jury, "I have charged you fully upon the subject of damages, because the trial judge cannot tell in advance what view the jury will take of the evidence," is error, inasmuch as it might be understood by the jury as an intimation that the judge thought the evidence did not require any charge at all, and that he therefore mentioned it because they might disagree with him.

An instruction to consider the plaintiff's "condition in life," as shown by the evidence in estimating his damages, has been held not objectionable. Ward v. Steffen, 88 Mo. App. 571; Smith v. Butler, 48 Mo. App. 663. And see Nutt v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 25 Oreg. 291, 35 Pac. 653, where an instruction that the jury should consider plaintiff's "condition and station in life" in estimating the damages was held misleading and susceptible of the construction that they were authorized to consider his wealth or poverty, and rank or station, and should upon a subsequent trial be modified.

Explanation of terms used. — In instructions concerning the law of damages, certain terms or expressions are often used by the court the import or legal significance of which should be explained if their meaning is not likely to be fully comprehended by the jury. Thus where the issue as to whether or not a party is entitled to exemplary damages is submitted to the jury the meaning of the words "actual and exemplary damages" should be explained (King v. Sassaman, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 304); but an objection that an instruction uses the word "compensatory" instead of "actual" damages is not well founded, inasmuch as the term "compensatory damages" refers to all other than such as are exemplary (Mogle v. Black, 5 Ohio Cir. Ct. 51); and as the term "compensatory damages" includes all those recoverable as a matter of right it is error in an instruction to divide them into three kinds, that is, actual, compensatory, and exemplary (Gatzow v. Buening, 106 Wis. 1, 81 N. W. 1003, 8 Am. St. Rep. 1, 49 L. R. A. 475). It is not error to instruct to assess such damages as plaintiff has sustained as the "direct" result, as this word is used synonymously with "natural and proximate." Lovett v. Chicago, 35 Ill. App. 570. And in an instruction to assess moneys expended "for professional services, physicians and nurses" the words "physicians and nurses" will be understood as used in apposition with the words "professional services." When technical names are applied to the result of an injury complained of, it is proper to charge the jury not to be misled by such terms, but to consider the real condition of plaintiff resulting from the injury. Spear v. Sweeney, 88 Wis. 545, 60 N. W. 1060.

Where an instruction would involve a principle of law which has not been explained to the jury, the party offering such instruction should embody the principle therein, and if he fails to do so it may be properly refused. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, 99 Ala. 593, 12 So. 786, holding that a charge that plaintiff cannot recover for loss of time while confined to his bed because of an injury may be properly refused, although the plaintiff is himself a minor, if there is no reference in the charge to the fact of his minority.

b. Requisites and Limitations — (i) In General — (a) Should Conform to Pleadings.[87] An instruction must limit plaintiff in his recovery to such damages as are the effect of the injury complained of in his declaration or complaint,[88] and is erroneous if based upon evidence offered which is unauthorized by the pleadings.[89] Likewise a refusal to instruct the jury to disregard damages shown by evidence unauthorized by the pleadings is error.[90] So too regardless of the amount of damages which the evidence submitted would justify, an instruction

If the complaint or declaration contains different counts or paragraphs, some of which allege damages of a special nature, an instruction that the jury should consider such special damages in estimating the amount of recovery, without limiting such instruction to the paragraphs or counts which allege the special damages, is error. Where the evidence reveals facts not constituting a legitimate item of damage under the pleadings, it is the duty of the court in its instructions to eliminate such irrelevant matter from the consideration of the jury (Delphi v. Lowery, 74 Ind. 520, 30 Am. which does not clearly limit the recovery of damages to the amount claimed in the petition is erroneous.[91]

(B) Should Lay Down Measure of Damages. The rules by which damages are to be estimated should be laid down by the court, and it is its duty to explain to the jury the basis on which the assessment should be made, the proper elements of the damages involved, and within what limits they may be estimated in the case involved.[92] Thus a jury cannot be left to determine of their own volition whether a defendant should be punished by an infliction of exemplary damages, without being informed as to what facts and circumstances would render him liable for such damages, or without any other rules to govern them in the application of the evidence.[93] It is improper to lay down an erroneous rule of damages, even though given merely by way of illustration,[94] and not

A failure to so instruct the jury is usually ground for reversal, especially if the evidence is uncertain or conflicting (Comstock v. Price, 103 Ill. App. 19; McGhee v. Smith, 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 315), although a failure of the court to do so of its own motion has been held not reversible error (Wheeler v. Bowles, 163 Mo. 398, 68 S. W. 675. Compare Southern R. Co. v. O'Bryan, 112 Ga. 127, 37 S. E. 161), especially if it has given a general instruction concerning damages (Ellis v. Tone, 58 Cal. 289). intended to be controlling on the judgment of the jury;[95] but where an erroneous application of a certain method of estimating damages is suggested by counsel, the court may explain to the jury the correct application of such method should they desire to utilize the same.[96] It is not objectionable to state a rule arising on the hypothesis of the evidence showing certain facts before any damages can be awarded,[97] or before they can be awarded on a particular theory[98] or for a particular item;[99] and where there are two hypotheses under which the damages may be estimated, depending upon the finding of certain facts by the jury, it is proper for the court to submit the rules applicable to each.[1]

(c) Should Confine Jury to Consideration of Evidence. A jury cannot arbitrarily fix the amount of compensatory damages either for the breach of a contractual relation or for a tortious injury, and it is therefore error to instruct that they are the sole judges of the amount recoverable without confining their discretion to a consideration of the evidence adduced;[2] but an instruction that the jury may assess plaintiff's damages at such sum as they believe from the evidence to be just is not ordinarily objectionable on this ground,[3] at least in the absence of a request for a more specific instruction;[4] nor is it reversible error to charge the jury that the amount of compensation is wholly or entirely within their province, when such statement is qualified by a full antecedent or subsequent enumeration of the proper items or elements of damage.[5]

Where a full and specific enumeration of the various items of damage has been made by the court, it is improper for it to conclude its instruction by allowing the jury to consider such other elements or causes of damage as would be just and proper, inasmuch as the court might be understood as indicating that there was still something else that the jury in its discretion could throw into the award (Wilburn v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 36 Mo. App. 203); but if it does not enumerate all the evidence and items of damage, a sweeping conclusion of this nature is permissible (Fordyce v. Jackson, 56 Ark. 594, 20 S. W. 528, 597).

(D) Must Be Warranted by Evidence — (1) RULE STATED. It is proper to refuse an instruction concerning the damages recoverable, no matter how sound the proposition of law which it states may be, where there is no evidence properly adduced at the trial upon which the instruction may be predicated, as its tendency would be to confuse or mislead the jury.[6] On a parity of reasoning the giving of an instruction upon an item or element of damages which is unsupported by evidence is equally misleading, and is therefore erroneous.[7]

(2) APPLICATION OF RULE — (a) AS TO LOSS OF TIME. An instruction authorizing the jury to consider loss of time on the part of plaintiff as an element of damages is error in the absence of proof that time has actually been lost,[8] or of the value of such time.[9] It has, however, been held that although the amount lost by plaintiff is not shown, yet if no request is made to instruct that the award therefor should be limited to nominal damages, and there is nothing to show that the damages awarded for this item exceeded a nominal sum, defendant cannot complain.[10]

(b) As to Medical Expenses, Nursing, Etc. An instruction authorizing a recovery for expenditures for medical attention, nursing, etc., as elements of damage is erroneous in the absence of evidence of the incurment of such liabilities,[11] and of their necessity and reasonableness.[12] The jury should be charged that the amount recovered for such items must be a reasonable one,[13] although an instruction so worded that the jury could not have been misled is not fatally defective for failing to use the word "reasonable."[14] So too an instruction must not dispense with the specific proof required to be made where such expenditures are sought to be recovered as damages.[15]

(c) As to Permanency and Affected Earning Capacity. An instruction must not ignore the rule of law that the permanency of a disability and the impairment of one's earning capacity must be found with reasonable certainty before damages can be awarded on these grounds,[16] although care should be taken not to Sufficiency of such evidence see supra, XIII, C, 2, b, (II), (E), (H).

It is sufficient that the jury be charged that their conclusion must be based on the evidence, and that they must follow the evidence and reasonable inferences drawn therefrom, exact too high a degree of proof,[17] the propriety of an instruction permitting the jury to consider these items in estimating damages, or the refusal of an instruction expressly prohibiting their consideration, being largely dependent upon the nature and certainty of the evidence thereof introduced.[18]

(d) As to Punitive Damages. Where from the evidence introduced the case is one which would not justify the allowance of exemplary or vindictive damages, it is error to refuse to charge that such damages are not recoverable.[19] On the other hand an instruction is equally erroneous which authorizes or permits the jury to find such damages, where they are clearly unwarranted either by the evidence[20] or by law;[21] and under evidence not warranting the recovery of exemplary damages it is improper to instruct the jury that if they find for plaintiff they may award him such damages as they believe him entitled to under the evidence.[22] and that in order to authorize a recovery for future consequences of such an injury it must appear reasonably certain from the evidence that they will occur. Hoyt v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 73 N. Y. App. Div. 249, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 832.

(E) Must Not Invade Province of Jury — (1) In General. An instruction on the award or measure of damages may be objectionable as invading the province of the jury. Thus a charge, the purport and effect of which is to assume the existence and proof of disputed facts,[23] or to restrict or interfere with the discretion of the jury,[24] is erroneous and is properly refused.[25]

(2) Commanding Award of Damages. As the allowance of exemplary damages is within the discretion of the jury, an instruction as to their award should in most jurisdictions be permissive and not mandatory,[26] but the rule is otherwise where only compensatory damages are sought;[27] and while an instruction requiring the jury to consider the question of assessment of damages before they have

An inference of an award of exemplary damages does not follow where no such damages are claimed or pretense made on the part of plaintiff that he is entitled to the same (Pennsylvania Co. v. Frana, 112 Ill. 398), or where plaintiff in the presence of the jury expressly disclaims such damages (Taylor v. Scherpe, etc., Architectural Iron Co., 133 Mo. 349, 34 S. W. 691, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 170, 12 Am. St. Rep. 480. See also Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Holland, 122 Ill. 461, 13 N. previously passed upon the issues of the case may be regarded as erroneous, as assuming that there are damages,[28] it is not error, where the wrong is clearly established or admitted, to instruct the jury to ascertain the amount of damages.[29]

(3) Tending to Diminish or Augment Recovery. An instruction should be so worded that it does not have a tendency to limit or restrict a recovery the amount of which is within the discretion of the jury.[30] An instruction is objectionable if from the language employed an improper or exaggerated idea of the amount of recovery is likely to be inferred by the jury, or from which they may be led to infer that the court is of the opinion that the verdict should be a certain sum or as generous as the evidence could possibly warrant.[31] It is not, however,

An instruction that no sane man would lose a leg for any corporation, but that the jury were not to be guided by such consideration in arriving at the amount of damages, is objectionable on this ground. Dooner v. Delaware, etc., Canal Co., 164 Pa. St. 17, 30 Atl. 269.

The poverty of the plaintiff should not be alluded to by the court in an action for personal injury, as such fact has no bearing upon the care to be exercised by defendant and should not be allowed to affect the measure of damages. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Young, 57 Kan. 168, 45 Pac. 580.

The use of the term "fully" in a charge that the jury if they found for plaintiff should assess such amount as would fully compensate him means no more than such damages as were proven, and, while unnecessarily used, is not objectionable. Harrington v. Eureka Hill Min. Co., 17 Utah 300, 53 Pac. 737.

A charge that the verdict must not exceed the amount claimed in the pleadings is not to be commended, as the jury are apt to take such expression as an intimation on the part of the court that the evidence authorizes a verdict for such sum. Rost v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 10 N. Y. App. Div. 477, 41 N. Y. Suppl. 1069, 4 N. Y. Annot. Cas. 19; Lee v. Yandell, 69 Tex. 34, 6 S. W. 665; Willis v. McNeill, 57 Tex. 465. See also Morris v. Williford, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 70 S. W. 228.

Instructions bringing the amount claimed in the ad damnum prominently before the jury have in some cases been held to constitute reversible error (Glasscock v. Shell, 57 Tex. 215), and especially is this true if a statement that the damages awarded must not exceed a certain sum is reiterated in each of a series of statements (Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. May, 33 Ill. App. 366).

The repetition of an instruction which keeps before the jury an invitation to allow punitive damages is improper. Mensur-Tebbetts Implement Co. v. Smith, 65 Ill. App. 319.

To charge that the verdict must not exceed the amount claimed is not error; a reversal will not be ordered unless there is something in the instruction which tends to error for the court to express an opinion that the evidence justifies more than mere nominal damages.[32]

(F) Should Exclude Remote or Speculative Damages. In giving instructions care must be taken to use such phraseology as will not tend to lead the jury into unwarranted speculation as to the amount of damages, or to consider fanciful or remote items.[33] It has been held that a charge to consider the effects "likely" to accrue from an injury is not objectionable on this ground,[34] although the opposite has also been held;[35] but in any event the error if any may be cured by a subsequent charge containing proper restrictions.[36] So too an instruction authorizing compensation for pain which "may" accrue is erroneous,[37] although such inaccuracy may also be cured by a subsequent restrictive statement.[38]

(G) Must Not Permit Double Recovery. Care must also be taken to frame an instruction so as not to mislead the jury into awarding damages twice for the same loss,[39] although in determining whether or not such award has likely lead the jury to understand that they ought to or may be allowed to award the full amount so claimed regardless of a just and proper consideration of the evidence before them (Central R. Co. v. Bannister, 195 Ill. 48, 62 N. E. 864; Calumet Electric St. R. Co. v. Van Pelt, 173 Ill. 70, 50 N. E. 678; North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Burgess, 94 Ill. App. 337; Texas Cent. R. Co. v. Stuart, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 642, 20 S. W. 962. See also Lanning v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa 502, 27 N. W. 478); and in determining whether or not the jury were misled the amount of the verdict rendered will be considered by the court (Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Owen, 90 Ga. 265, 15 S. E. 835; East St. Louis Connecting, etc., R. Co. v. O'Hara, 150 Ill. 580, 37 N. E. 917; Tudor Iron-Works v. Weber, 129 Ill. 535, 21 N. E. 1078; Nash v. Yonkers R. Co., 63 N. Y. A charge that the jury might apportion damages with a liberal hand, but should not violate their duty by giving more damages than the plaintiff is fairly entitled to, is not fatally objectionable where the particular items of damage have been fully and ably specified by the court, and the jury have been guarded against considering any illegitimate items of damage. Little Schuylkill Nav. R., etc., Co. v. French, 81* Pa. St. 366.

33. Ramsey v. Burns, 27 Mont. 115, 69 Pac. 711. See also Ramsey v. National Contracting Co., 49 N. Y. App. Div. 11, 63 N. Y. Suppl. 286. "Inconvenience" (Root v. Des Moines City R. Co., 113 Iowa 675, 83 N. W. 904) or "personal enjoyment" (Columbus v. Strassner, 124 Ind. 482, 25 N. E. 65) are subject to the objection that they are vague terms as a basis for the allowance of damages.

App. 642, 20 S. W. 962; Stewart v. Ripon, 38 Wis. 584. An instruction that been made the appellate court will consider the whole charge, evidence and verdict.[40]

(H) Need Not Be Repetitious. It is not error to refuse an instruction stating a proper exposition of the law of damages, where the same has in substance been covered by the charge,[41] to restate the same instruction in slightly different terms,[42] or, where it has been given in a sufficiently full manner, to give a special instruction in more detail, covering the same ground of damages.[43]

(II) Particular Instructions — (A) As to Exemplary Damages. Instructions concerning a recovery of vindictive or punitive damages need be couched in no particular phraseology, although they should clearly state the conditions under which such damages are authorized.[44] Care must, however, be taken to instruct the jury as to the necessary intent or motive of defendant,[45] and the degree of wantoness, negligence, or misconduct necessary to render him liable to such damages;[46] and where the grounds on which such damages may be awarded plaintiff may recover for the personal injuries sustained, followed by an enumeration of the elements of damage which may be considered, is not objectionable (Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Hundt, 140 Ill. 525, 30 N. E. 458; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 93, 40 S. W. 608); nor is it ordinarily objectionable to charge that in estimating the damages the jury may consider, if proven, plaintiff's loss of time and his diminished capacity for labor, as such expressions are usually so used that a jury could not be supposed to understand them as referring to one and the same period or loss (Denver v. Hyatt, 28 Colo. 129, 63 Pac. 403; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Wilson, 79 Tex. 371, 15 S. W. 280, 23 Am. St. Rep. 345, 11 L. R. A. 486; San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Belt, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 281, 59 S. W. 607; Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. White, 22 Tex. App. 606, 49 S. W. 935).

are determined by statute an instruction must clearly conform thereto,[47] and it would seem that the better practice would be to use the phraseology employed.[48] So too an instruction must not tend to mislead the jury into the belief that vindictive damages may be recovered without proof of actual damages.[49]

(B) As to Permanency. An instruction should not be given, the purport and effect of which is to confine plaintiff to his probable future earnings in any one capacity or avenue of employment.[50]

(C) As to Pain and Suffering — (1) IN GENERAL. As physical pain and mental suffering are legitimate items of damage when caused by an injury,[51] an instruction authorizing the jury to consider the same in actions for personal injury is ordinarily proper;[52] and a charge to consider plaintiff's suffering in body and mind refers only to mental suffering caused by and inseparable from physical pain.[53] As it is impossible to offer specific evidence of the pecuniary amount of such damages,[54] it is proper to instruct that they should be left to the sound discretion[55] and enlightened conscience of impartial jurors;[56] but this does not mean that the jury should be allowed to consider them as an independent item of damage, to be compensated by a sum of money that may be regarded as a pecuniary equivalent.[57]

See Bamford v. Pittsburg, etc., Traction Co., 194 Pa. St. 17, 44 Atl. 1068 (holding that where there is no suggestion that pain and suffering have a positive price or market value, an instruction that an allowance may be made therefor by way of compensation is not error); Giblin v. McIntyre, 2 Utah 384 (holding that an instruction that "if the jury find for the plaintiff they may, in computing the damages, take into consideration the expenses of his care, and a fair compensation for the physical and mental suffering caused by the injury" did not imply that they should consider mental suffering as a distinct item). Hence where the court has stated that it is difficult to give a money value to pain and suffering, and that perhaps no person would voluntarily endure the pain and suffering involved in the case in question for any amount, it is

(2) Future Pain and Suffering. As it is not incumbent upon an injured party to wait until all his damages from the injury have accrued before bringing his action, it follows that where there is any evidence from which the jury may fairly infer that plaintiff will with reasonable certainty[58] endure pain and suffering after the trial, an instruction permitting the jury to allow damages for the same is proper and should be given;[59] otherwise of course in the absence of such evidence.[60]

(D) As to Mortality Tables. Whenever mortality tables are introduced it is the duty of the court to fully instruct the jury concerning the use of and weight which should be accorded such evidence.[61] If both a mortuary and an annuity table are in evidence, an instruction should inform the jury with certainty which of the two should be consulted.[62] So too the jury should be told to take into consideration the plaintiff's decrease in earning capacity from advancing age,[63] and that the full expectancy of life as shown by such tables is not applicable unless plaintiff brings himself clearly within the class of lives tabulated.[64]

(E) As to Duty to Mitigate Damages. Where the issue that the damages have been aggravated or increased is involved, it is the duty of the court to error to add that if the jury find for plaintiff they should fix some sum which would be a compensation for his pain and suffering. Baker v. Pennsylvania Co., 142 Pa. St. 503, 21 Atl. 979, 12 L. R. A. 698.

Proper or necessary instruction.— It must be clearly brought before the jury that while such tables are admissible, they are not conclusive, upon the expectancy of life; but that they may be varied, modified, or even entirely contradicted as to the expectancy of the life of the individual plaintiff by any other competent evidence introduced on the subject, such as proof that plaintiff was unhealthy or diseased at the time of the injury (Friend v. Ingersoll, 39 Nebr. 717, 58 N. Co., 146 Pa. St. 504, 23 Atl. 239, 28 Am. instruct the jury that the plaintiff must have used prudence and reasonable care and diligence not to augment the same,[65] and also to tell them what damages can and cannot be recovered where plaintiff has been negligent.[66]

(F) Where Injury Aggravates Previous Disability. Where the plaintiff in a personal injury case has been suffering from a previous disability or infirmity, the court should take care to clearly and fully state the rule of recovery in such cases,[67] and a refusal to so instruct is error.[68]

c. Construction. It is rarely ever that error can be predicated upon a single statement or paragraph of an instruction concerning the law of damages alone, but the meaning of each paragraph or statement of a charge will be determined largely by reference to its context, and the instruction will be considered in its entirety,[69] and in connection with the pleadings and evidence,[70] and will be viewed and interpreted as a jury would most likely understand it and not from a technical legal point of view.[71] Hence it is immaterial that one paragraph of a charge is

Where there is evidence showing that plaintiff desired to aggravate the damages, it is reversible error to refuse to instruct that he cannot recover for the damages accrued from the act which he sought to bring about. While such instructions must not absolve plaintiff from acts clearly negligent (Crete v. Childs, 11 Nebr. 252, 9 N. W. 55), a requirement of him of conduct befitting a reasonably prudent man under like circumstances is sufficient (Moore v. Kalamazoo, 109 Mich. 176, 66 N. W. 1089; Smith v. Smith, 10 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 494, 21 Cinc. L. Bul. 295; Vallo v. U. S. Express Co., 147 Pa. St. 404, 23 Atl. 594, 30 Am. St. Rep. 741, 14 L. R. A. 743; Page v. Sumpter, 53 Wis. 652, 11 N. Co., 44 N. Y. App. Div. 163, 60 N. Y. Suppl. 732).

A failure to instruct that the burden of proving a lack of care upon the part of the plaintiff is on defendant, after a proper instruction as to the necessary care required of plaintiff, is not error, although such instruction might properly be given. confined to a single item of damage, where the other items are properly submitted in the following paragraphs;[72] and expressions which if standing alone would be susceptible of an erroneous construction may by subsequent instructions be cured,[73] although if the several paragraphs or statements are inconsistent or contradictory with each other, and there is nothing to show but that the jury were left in doubt as to which was correct, the error is not cured.[74]

d. Exceptions to Erroneous Instruction. An erroneous omission to include in the instruction the proper elements of damage may be brought up under a general exception,[75] but an objection for this error cannot be first made on appeal,[76] nor can the defendant object to the inclusion of an erroneous item of damages when he himself makes the request for the instruction permitting their award.[77]

4. Verdict — a. Form and Requisites — (i) In General. The jury should assess the damages or make sufficient finding of data from which the assessment may be made by the court, and a mere finding for plaintiff is insufficient.[78] So too if a finding indicates that it is based on an erroneous measure of damages it is defective.[79] The verdict must conform to the evidence, instructions, and pleadings,[80] but it need not conform to counts defectively pleaded,[81] and an objection on these grounds will not be sustained upon unnecessary inference.[82] So too it has been held that an objection that a verdict is general and not special cannot

A contingent assessment need not be made where there is an issue of law and of fact in the same cause, and the latter is tried before the former, if such issue of fact goes to the whole declaration. Bates v. Green, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 630.

If the declaration contains two counts, one of which is bad, and damages are assessed generally, the judgment must be reversed (Johnson v. Greenough, 33 N. H. 396), although it has been held that where both counts related to the same cause of action, and one of them was defective, a verdict on the whole declaration would be applied to the good count, inasmuch as a judgment rendered thereon would be a bar to the same cause of action however stated (Aldrich v. Lyman, 6 R. I. 98).

be raised by an exception that it is a conclusion of law and not a conclusion of fact.[83]

(II) Necessity of Itemization of Damages. Where the circumstances of the case are such that successive suits have been or may be brought for injury to the same subject-matter, the court may submit the case on special issues and have the different items of damages distinctly passed upon, so that there would be no danger of a subsequent recovery for the same damage.[84] In some actions statutes[85] have provided for an itemization or special classification of damages, and when this is the case the verdict must comply with such provision.[86]

(III) Inconsistency, Ambiguity, or Uncertainty. Where the verdict in an action for damages is so uncertain or ambiguous that it is impossible to tell what sum the jury intended to allow, a new trial must of course be ordered.[87] A verdict in an action for damages is objectionable on the ground of uncertainty, when the exact sum of damages is not eo nomine stated or sufficient data is not given from which the amount may be computed with certainty;[88] but it is sufficient when such computation can be made, or the language employed is such that the meaning or intent of the jury to award a specific amount cannot well be misunderstood;[89] and in determining the sufficiency of a verdict as to certainty the

The fact that the jury separately states the amount intended by it to be awarded for a particular item of injury is not error. Ray v. Lake Superior Terminal, etc., R. Co., 99 Wis. 617, 75 N. W. 420. See also Appleton v. Lepper, 20 U. C. C. P. 138.

This condition arises where special findings are conflicting and inconsistent with the general verdict rendered at the same time (Parkinson Sugar Co. v. Riley, 50 Kan. 401, 31 Pac. 1090, 34 Am. St. Rep. 123; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Dickey, 1 Kan. App. 770, 41 Pac. 1070), although if a special verdict in itself consistent is inconsistent with the general verdict, the latter will be disregarded and the damages assessed according to the former (Hall v. Harlow, 66 Ind. 448; Taylor v. Lehman, 17 Ind. App. 585, 46 N. E. 84, 47 N. E. 230). instructions of the court and the proof given in evidence will be considered in connection therewith.[90]

(iv) When Against Joint Defendants. If the suit is against joint tort-feasors, the assessment of damages must be for a lump sum against those found guilty, and cannot, in the absence of statute,[91] be severally apportioned between them;[92] and when compensatory damages only are recoverable, it should be for the amount for which the most culpable is liable.[93] An assessment against a part only of the defendants is equivalent to a finding in favor of the others;[94] but when different parties have each a distinct cause of action, covered by the same judgment, separate assessments should be made.[95]

b. Remedy For Erroneous or Excessive Verdict[96] — (i) Setting Aside. A verdict in an action for damages will be set aside when it is directly contrary to the charge of the court and the evidence in the case.[97] It will not, however, be disturbed because of the giving of objectionable instructions, where it is not larger than the legitimate and preponderating evidence clearly warrants,[98] especially where defendant fails to request a charge which would be unobjectionable.[99]

(ii) Remission of Excess — (a) In General. Where the damages awarded are greater than the amount claimed in the declaration, or from the facts disclosed by the evidence are clearly excessive, and the illegal portion is distinguishable from the legal, the defect may usually be remedied by a remittitur of the excess,[1]

if it can be readily calculated with reasonable certainty,[2] whether the action be one of tort or of contract,[3] and although such act of the successful litigant obviates an otherwise prejudicial error.[4] So too the allowance of items of damage not authorized by the pleadings may be cured by remittitur.[5] On an offer to remit it is the duty of the court to look to the evidence in the case, and if therefrom it can clearly distinguish the amount which the succeeding party should recover, and the remission will in no way prejudice the opposing party, it should be allowed.[6] It will not, however, be allowed, where it clearly appears that the object is to defeat an appellate jurisdiction;[7] nor should the practice be carried so far as to allow the court, when a jury has obviously mistaken the law or evidence and rendered a verdict which ought not to stand, to substitute its own judgment for theirs, unless there be some recognized rules and principles of law by which the excess may be ascertained,[8] or to require the defendant to submit to harsh or onerous terms or stipulations.[9] Nor will this course be permitted where the verdict is so excessive that it was clearly the result of passion or prejudice.[10]

(B) Time of Remittitur. There is little uniformity of practice with regard to the time at which a remittitur may be made. The better practice is to make the offer of remission during the same term at which the judgment is rendered,[11] and thereby defeat any motion for a new trial.[12] In some jurisdictions it must be made at the term at which the judgment is entered,[13] while in others it may be done at a subsequent term.[14] So too in some jurisdictions it cannot be made after an appeal,[15] writ of error,[16] or new trial [17] has been granted, although it may be made after a new trial has been refused;[18] and in some jurisdictions it has been held that the remission may be made after motion for a new trial, or even in the appellate court after a writ of error.[19]

(C) Sufficiency. A remittitur, to cure the error of excessive damages, must be actually made, and a mere offer to remit is insufficient.[20] So too it must be for a sum certain.[21] It is the plaintiff's duty to see that a new judgment for the amount of the original, minus the remittance, is properly entered;[22] but if the record does not show the remittitur to have been made in open court, in conformity to a statutory requirement, it may be amended before a writ of error is sued out.[23]

C. Determination and Computation of Amount — 1. Of Interest — a. In General. When allowed interest should be included in the verdict as a part of the whole amount,[24] and not as interest eo nomine;[25] hence the court should not add interest from a time anterior to the verdict.[26] For breach of contract interest from the time of the breach is recoverable,[27] while for conversion it may be computed from the time suit is brought.[28]

b. Rate Recoverable. Where interest is awarded as an element of damages, it should be estimated at the legal rate[29] existing at the time the verdict is rendered[30] and according to the lex fori;[31] and if the statute has fixed no rate it should be at the usual one.[32] Such rate must be applied regardless of the rate drawn by securities in which the money withheld was invested,[33] or which it was drawing on deposit.[34] If the rate has been changed after the wrongful act or injury complained of, but before final determination, the interest should be computed at the former rate up to the time of the change in the law, and at the latter rate for the period thereafter.[35]

2. Of Double or Treble Damages. Statutes allowing double or treble damages mean double or treble the amount of actual injury specially found by the jury as damages.[36] In some jurisdictions it is the practice for the jury to assess the actual single damages, and the court to double or treble them;[37] but a variance from this practice is not ordinarily fatally erroneous.[38] If single damages only are intended by the verdict, this fact should clearly appear, or the presumption will be that the jury have doubled or trebled them,[39] especially where the jury are informed that it is their prerogative to double or treble their finding, and the declaration contains both general and special counts.[40]

3. Time to Which Damages Are Allowed. Whether damages should be assessed only up to the institution of the suit or to the rendition of the verdict, or compensation should also be allowed for injury likely to be occasioned by the wrongful act, depends upon the facts of the particular case; if the damages arising subsequent to the date of the writ are merely incidental to the cause of action, or are so closely connected with it that they would not of themselves be the basis of a distinct action, and will continue independent of any subsequent wrongful act, they should be assessed up to the time of the verdict, and when certain to accrue, for the future as well;[41] but if the future damages are contingent only, or if damages sustained after the date of the writ do not necessarily arise from the injury complained of, and form the basis of a new cause of action, the assessment should be made up to the date of the writ only.[42]

It is true that a broader meaning has, in many cases of insurance, been given to it; and it would not be practicable to fix any definition of the phrase which would be justly applicable to it in all contracts. The words have a strict sense, in which they include only the natural accidents peculiar to the sea. They have also a more extended sense in which they import accidents occurring upon the sea." 62. Bement v. Trenton Locomotive, etc., Mfg. Co., 32 N. J. L. 513, 515, where it is said: "The primary signification of the word date, is not time in the abstract, nor time taken absolutely, but, as its derivation plainly indicates, time given or specified, time in some way ascertained and fixed; this is the sense in which the word is commonly used. When we speak of the date of a deed, we do not mean the time when it was actually executed, but the time of its execution, as given or stated in the deed itself. The date of an item, or of a charge in a book account is not necessarily the time when the article charged was, in fact, furnished, but simply the time given or set down in the account, in connection with such charge. And so 'the date of the last work done, or materials furnished, in such claim,' in the absence of anything in the act indicating a different intention, must be taken to mean the time when such work was done or materials furnished, as specified in the plaintiffs' written claim."

to the like effect," Willes, J., said: "The date here is required for a purpose, and comprises two things — time and the place of abode of the person signing the notice. Although, when a date is mentioned, some time is generally intended, as in speaking of the date of a letter, the term just as much includes place. The time may mean the precise time when the instrument is signed, or it may mean the time when it is given or delivered, so as to become operative. . . . The date here may equally well mean the day on which the objector signed the notice, or the day on which he used it; but it can hardly have been intended that it should mean the latter, for if so he would be obliged to have with him when he served it an ink-horn in order to put on the date, and an almanac to know that it was right." But see Swift v. Tousey, 5 Ind. 196, 197, where it is said: "Blackstone says that though the bissextile or leap year consists properly of three hundred and sixty-six days, yet by stat. 21 H. 3 the increasing day in the leap year, together with the preceding day, shall be accounted only as one day."

Natural and solar day.— "Though the natural day consists of twenty-four hours; yet, as it comprehends the solar day and the night, we speak of day and night within the period of the natural day, to distinguish the different parts of the day. Hence, the propriety of the expression, the evening of a day, or, the evening following a day; and they have both the same import in common understanding, and are used with equal propriety in reference to the solar day, and the night, as comprehended in the natural day. We make use of language appropriate to the solar day, not because we adopt it, but for the purpose of distinguishing certain portions of the natural day." C. 317, 322 [citing Coke Litt. 135], where it is said: "The division of time which most strikes us, is that into day and night. One rotation of the earth in twenty-four hours produces a period of light and a period of darkness of about equal length, and it is entirely conventional at what point of the circle we begin to make the count; but of the two periods, that of light, the artificial day, is the most important to us, and from this or some other cause we habitually, in common parlance, speak of the night which succeeds a day as the night 'of' that day — that is to say, the night that follows, that belong to that day. Selling liquor on election day.— In an action under a statute which rendered it unlawful "to sell to any person any intoxicating drink on any day on which elections are now required to be held," the trial judge instructed the jury "as matter of law, distinctly and positively, that any sale of liquor made upon the day upon which elections are held, is a misdemeanor under [a statute cited]; and that the word 'day,' as used in that section, applies to the whole twenty-four hours, beginning at midnight of election morning and ending at midnight of election night." 1. Bouvier L. Dict. [quoted in People v. Hatch, 33 Ill. 9, 137], where the term is applied to the artificial as distinguished from the natural day.

Natural distinguished from artificial day.—"The English appear to have always divided days into natural and artificial: but at different periods, have affixed contrary meanings to those terms. The time, from the rising to the setting of the sun, was, by ancient authors, called dies solaris, and the night, dies lunaris. The solar day was termed the natural day; and the whole twenty-four hours, consisting of the solar day and the night succeeding it, was called the artificial day. But afterwards, and to the present time, the solar day was termed the artificial day, and the twenty-four hours, commencing from the rising of the sun on one day, and continued through the night succeeding, was styled the natural day." Fox v. Abel, 2 Conn. 541, 546 [citing Coke Litt. 135*a*]. And see Pulling v. People, 8 Barb. (N. Y.) 384, 385.

"The natural day has no fixed time of commencement, in which mankind in general, or the different denominations of Christians, are agreed. . . . The solar day is ascertained by fixed and known limits; it is subject to no difficulties, respecting its commencement and close; and is always understood, in common parlance, by the word, day, as distinguished from evening, or night." 2. Benson v. Adams, 69 Ind. 353, 354, 35 Am. Rep. 220 [citing Sadler v. Leigh, 4 Campb. 195; 2 Bl. Comm. 141; Bouvier L. Dict.], where it is said: "The fractions of a day in statutes, or legal proceedings, or in contracts, are not generally considered; but when the rights of parties depend upon the precedence of time in the same day, or upon a given hour or fraction of a day, it may be alleged or proved, as any other fact. But, unless the meaning of the word is in some way restricted, it will be held to include the twenty-four hours."

Applied to legislative session.—In an action by an employee of the legislature to enforce a claim for "extra" services rendered, the court said: "We think it too clear for discussion that the word 'day,' as used in the statute, covers whatever period of the twenty-four hours the legislators choose to remain in session." Robinson v. Dunn, 77 Cal. 473, 475, 19 Pac. 878, 11 Am. St. Rep. 297.

Applied to use of a machine.—Where a reaping machine was sold with leave to test the same by using it for one day, the court said: "The purpose of this provision in the contract was to give the purchaser a fair opportunity to test the machine: he was to have it during an entire day. The word day is to be understood with reference to the usage of farmers in the working of such machines." Fuller v. Schroeder, 20 Nebr. 631, 646, 31 N. W. 109. See also Fay v. Brown, 96 Wis. 434, 441, 71 N. Repairs on a dwelling.— Where, in an action to recover compensation for repairs to a dwelling, a contest arose over the question as to what constituted a day's work, the court said: "And when we find a universal usage in this business to call ten hours' labor a day's work, we have arrived at the true meaning of the word day, as used in this contract." A. 242, that an action of replevin will not lie for a corpse under statutes requiring an affidavit in replevin to state the unlawful taking or detention of personal goods and chattels, and providing that a judgment for defendant shall be for a return of property or for its value.

The remains of deceased persons are not "exports" within the meaning of the term as used in the United States constitution. The term refers only to those things which are profitable. There is not property in any sense in the dead body of a human being. In re Wong Yung Quy, 2 Fed. 624, 6 Sawy. 442.

In portions of Europe during the semi-barbarous state of society of the middle ages the law permitted a creditor to seize the dead body of his debtor, and in ancient Egypt a son could borrow money by hypothecating his father's corpse; but no evidence appears burial of such dead body it becomes a part and parcel of the ground to which it was committed.[3]

III. RIGHT TO POSSESSION AND DISPOSITION OF.

A. In General. Nevertheless the right to bury a corpse and preserve its remains is a legal right which the courts will recognize and protect.[4] While the body is not property in the usually recognized sense of the word, yet it may be considered as a sort of quasi-property, to which certain persons may have rights, as they have duties to perform toward it,[5] and the right to dispose of a corpse by decent sepulture includes the right to the possession of the body in the same condition in which death leaves it.[6]

B. Jurisdiction of Courts. In England from an early date the ecclesiastical law governed and conferred exclusive jurisdiction of all matters relating to the burial of corpses upon the ecclesiastical courts.[7] In the United States, how-to exist in modern jurisprudence of a legal right to convert a dead body to any purpose of pecuniary profit. Law of Burial, 4 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 503 et seq.

In England the law has been laid down that after the death of a man his executors have a right to the custody and possession of his body (although they have no property in it) until it is properly buried. Right to possession defined.— In Foley v. Phelps, 1 N. Y. App. Div. 550, 551, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 471, the right to the possession of a corpse is thus defined: "The right is to the possession of the corpse in the same condition it was in when death supervened. It is the right to what remains when the breath leaves the body, and not merely to such a hacked, hewed and mutilated corpse as some stranger, an offender against the criminal law, may choose to turn over to an afflicted relative." In Law of Burial, 4 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 503, 529, Ruggles, the referee, said: "The real question is not of the disposable, marketable value of a corpse, or its remains, as an article of traffic, but it is of the sacred and inherent right to its custody, in order decently to bury it, and secure its undisturbed repose. The dogma of the English ecclesiastical law, that a child has no such claim, no such exclusive power, no peculiar interest in the dead body of its parent, is so utterly inconsistent with every enlightened perception of personal right, so inexpressively repulsive to every proper and moral sense, that its adoption would be an eternal disgrace to American jurisprudence."

Mandamus for delivery of body.— Where a prisoner in jail on execution died and the jailer refused to deliver the body to the executors of the deceased, unless they would satisfy certain claims made against him, the court of queen's bench issued a mandamus peremptory in the first instance demanding that the body should be delivered up to the executors. By the old English law the dead body was not recognized as property, but the charge of it belonged exclusively to the church and the ecclesiastical courts. Reg. v. Sharpe, 7 Cox C. C. 214, Dears. & B. 160, 3 Jur. N. S. 192, 26 L. J. M. C. 47, 5 Wkly. Rep. 318.

ever, where there are no ecclesiastical courts, the charge of a dead body is regarded as a trust which is subject to regulation by a court of equity to the extent of securing it a proper burial and restraining interference after interment.[8]

C. Persons Having Right and Upon Whom Duty of Burial Devolves — 1. In General. It is a universally recognized principle that there is a duty owing both to society and to decedent that the body of a deceased person shall be decently buried.[9]

2. At Common Law. The common law casts the duty of providing the sepulture for and the decent interment of the deceased upon the person under whose roof the death takes place;[10] or if the death takes place in the house of a parish or other union, the duty of providing sepulture devolves on such parish or union.[11]

3. In the United States. The right and corresponding duty to select a place of burial and to see to the proper interment of the deceased rests primarily with the next of kin, rather than with a stranger to the blood.[12] Where there is a

In every reported case where the remains of a deceased person have been the subject of successful dispute in matters arising after burial, the questions have been addressed to the equitable jurisdiction of the court, and unquestionably a court of equity is the proper forum. Buchanan v. Buchanan, 28 Misc. (N. Y.) 261, 59 N. Y. Suppl. 810.

L. 383, the court said: "Every person dying in this country, . . . has a right to Christian burial; and that implies the right to be carried from the place where the body lies to the parish cemetery."

By the canon law which prevailed in such matters over so large a part of Europe everyone was to be buried in the parish churchyard, or in his ancestral sepulcher (if any), or in such place as he might elect. A wife was to be buried with her last husband, if more than one. If a person permanently changed his residence, then he was to be buried in the parish churchyard of his new residence. Pierce v. Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 14 Am. Rep. 667.

By the civil law of ancient Rome, the charge of burial was first upon the person to whom it was delegated by the deceased; second, upon the scripti hærdes (to whom the property was given), and, if none, then upon the hærdes legitimi or cognati in order. L. R. A. 221. In O'Donnell v. Slack, 123 Cal. 285, 55 Pac. 906, 43 L. R. A. 388, the court said that the duty of the burial of the dead is made an express legal obligation (Pen. Rep. 658, which reaches the conclusion that upon principle where there is a contest between the widow and the heir to the estate the right to determine the place of burial belongs to the heir rather than to the widow; assigning as the reason therefor that the heir could protect the remains from harm if they were buried upon his land, whereas upon the death of the widow the land might pass to strangers who would have no interest in protecting the remains.

Cal. Pen. Right of husband.— In Durell v. Hayward, 9 Gray (Mass.) 248, 69 Am. Dec. 284, the court said that it was the indisputable and paramount right as well as the duty of a husband to dispose of the body of his deceased wife by decent sepulture in a suitable place. In Fox v. Gordon, 16 Phila. (Pa.) 185, 187, the court said: "It may be laid down as a general proposition, however, deducible from all the adjudicated cases upon this subject, as well as from the opinions of the most learned writers, that where the relations subsisting between husband and wife and parent and child are of a normal character, they have respectively the right to determine to the exclusion of all others the place in which shall repose the remains of those who were nearer and dearer to them in life than they were to any others, and in the absence of these relationships the same right belongs to the next of kin of the deceased."

Right of wife.— In Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 309, 50 N. W. 328, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 14 L. R. A. 85, the court said: "The wife is certainly nearer in the point of relationship and affection than any other person. She is the constant companion of her husband during life, bound to him by the closest circumstances of the case, or the waiver of such right by consent or otherwise.[14] Again, in the absence of testamentary disposition,[15] where the deceased has indicated a preference, selecting the place of interment or expressing a wish that it should take place in a spot fixed upon, the courts will effectuate this expressed desire if possible, even in the face of opposition by the husband, the widow, or the next of kin.[16]

D. Change in Place of Interment — 1. In England. Under the English ecclesiastical law neither the husband, wife, nor relatives can disinter the corpse without first obtaining a faculty from the ordinary.[17]

2. In the United States — a. In General. Except in cases of necessity or for laudable purposes the policy of the law is that the sanctity of the grave should be maintained, and that a body once suitably buried should remain undisturbed.[18]

b. Consent to Original Interment. Where the interment takes place by the consent, express or implied, of those most nearly interested, it is regarded in law as a final sepulture, and the courts as a rule will not allow a disinterment against the will of those who have the right to object,[19] generally the next of kin, on ties of love, and should have the paramount right to render the last sacred services to his remains after death."

(N. Y.) 368, 372, the right to select the place of burial was awarded to a son instead of the widow. In this case the son was born of a former marriage, and the widow was a second wife who had been married to the deceased but four years with no children, and the last two years of his life had been spent in a lunatic asylum. In delivering the opinion of the court the judge said: "I mean to recognize the fact that circumstances may exist which should give the widow the preference over the son, but in this case I think the claim of the son is to be preferred." In Fox v. Gordon, 16 Phila. (Pa.) 185, 186, the court says: "No general rule to be applied absolutely in all cases can be laid down upon the subject, for what is fit and proper to be done in each case must depend upon the special circumstances of that case. It is a jurisdiction that belongs to equity, and the chancellor will exercise it with great care, having regard to what is due to the natural feelings and sensibilities of individuals as well as to what is required by considerations of public propriety and decency." Compare Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Estoppel by consent.— Where a husband consented to his wife's request that she be buried in the same plot as her parents, and she was buried in a plot reserved for them, which plot the parents afterward exchanged for another one in the same cemetery, where a place was prepared for her remains at considerable expense, and the husband had knowledge of the exchange and the preparation made, and offered no objection to the removal until the preparations were complete, it was held that he was precluded from interfering with the transfer of the remains. Toppin v. Moriarty, 59 N. J. Eq. 115, 44 Atl. 469. See also In re Richardson, 29 Misc. (N. Y.) 367, 60 N. Y. Suppl. 539. While it is the paramount right of a husband to determine upon the place of burial for his wife, yet when that duty has been performed and the body has been buried in the lot of another with the consent both of the husband and of the owner of the lot, the husband has not the right, without the consent of the lot owner, to enter thereon and remove the body. Pulsifer v. Douglass, 94 Me. 556, 48 Atl. 118, 53 L. R. A. 238. In Wynkoop v. Wynkoop, 42 Pa. St. 293, 82 Am. Dec. 506, it was held that a wife had no authority to have the body of her deceased husband transferred after burial from one cemetery to another, and this decision was based upon the ground that the disposition of the body after burial belongs exclusively to the next of kin. This decision was criticized in Lowry v. Plitt, 2 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 675, the court stating that the reasoning which transfers this right from the widow is not satisfactory, because it does not seem to be based upon principle or reason and is repugnant to the best feelings of our nature; that such a right must necessarily be in the next of living kin; that moreover it is a matter in which all of the next of kin have an equal interest. In Fox v. Gordon, 16 Phila. (Pa.) 185, 191, the court in referring to Wynkoop v. Wynkoop, 42 Pa. St. 293, 82 Am. Dec. 506, said: "While we do not agree either with the syllabus or with all the dicta of that case, the principle upon which it was ruled must be regarded as the law of this State, and it is applicable to this case." And see Smith v. Shepherd, 64 N. J. Eq. 401, 54 Atl. 806; Matter of Bauer, 68 N. Y. App. Div. 212, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 155 [affirming 72 N. Y. Suppl. 439].

Expense of changing place of burial.— It has been held in Indiana that a widow is not entitled to an allowance for expenses incurred in removing the body of the decedent from one cemetery to another, where the former grave was suitable, had been selected by the decedent, was nearer his home, and was the one where his first wife was buried, and where his children desired that he should be interred. Watkins v. Romine, 106 Ind. 378, 7 N. E. 193.

Interment at husband's request.— A widow's removal of her husband's body from a cemetery lot owned by his daughter, in which he was buried by his own request, may be enjoined by the daughter, if there is no reason for the removal except their disagreement respecting a monument and the care of the grave. Thompson v. Deeds, 93 Iowa 228, 61 N. W. 842, 35 L. R. A. 56.

Right of access to grave.— The fact that a widow has no right to remove the remains of her husband from a lot in which they have been placed with the consent of the owner thereof does not affect her right in respect to access or care or adornment of the grave of her deceased husband. Smith v. Shepherd, 64 N. J. Eq. 401, 54 Atl. 806.

A tomb owner is without right to cause the removal of the remains of the dead transferred from the places of sepulture first selected by the surviving relatives and deposited by him in the tomb, under his assurance, accepted by such relatives and on the faith of which they permitted the transfer, that the remains should rest forever in the tomb. Choppin v. Dauphin, 48 La. Ann. 1217, 20 So. 681, 55 Am. St. Rep. 313, 33 L. R. A. 133.

is interred without the consent of the person having the right to control and select the place of burial, in the absence of testamentary disposition the courts will permit the removal of the corpse by such person, even in the face of opposition by the next of kin or the owner of the land.[21]

c. Statutory Regulations. Some of the states provide by statute for the disinterment and removal of dead bodies with the consent of the owner of the cemetery, the lot owner, and the consent of all the next of kin,[22] and in the absence of such consent, on an order of the court upon a proper showing.[23]

Erection of headstone not a waiver.— It was held in Matter of Bauer, 68 N. Y. App. Div. 212, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 155, that the erection of a headstone was not a waiver of the right to apply to the supreme court for permission to remove a dead body, under N. Y. Laws (1895), c. 559, § 51, authorizing the court to grant such permission, when the consent of interested persons cannot be obtained.

Membership corporation law, art 1, § 2, defines the term "membership corporation" as including corporations incorporated under the chapter, or previously incorporated under any laws repealed by the chapter, but as excluding a membership corporation created by special law. Article 3, section 40, referring to cemetery corporations, defines such corporation to be any corporation previously created for cemetery purposes under a law repealed by the chapter or hereafter created under that article; and section 51 authorizes the removal of bodies from a cemetery owned by a cemetery corporation, as defined by that act. It was held that such statute conferred no authority on the court to authorize the removal of a body from a cemetery controlled by a corporation created by special law not repealed by the membership corporation law. In re Owens, 79 N. b. General Rule in United States. The well-nigh universal rule in the United States is that the husband is liable for the necessary funeral expenses of his deceased wife, where she left no separate estate.[30]

c. Rule as Affected by Statutory Provisions. In some jurisdictions the rule is laid down that the statutes creating the wife's separate estate do not absolve the husband from his common-law obligation to provide suitable sepulture for his deceased wife and to defray the funeral expenses, where she leaves such separate estate, provided he is solvent;[31] and he is not entitled to any credit on the settlement of his administration of her estate for such expenditures;[32] and where the husband is insolvent such expenses should be deducted from his distributive share of his wife's separate estate.[33] In other jurisdictions, however, it is held that while it is primarily the duty of the husband to bury his deceased wife, nevertheless the wife's separate estate is liable for her funeral expenses, and the husband

A husband is primarily liable for the funeral expenses of his wife, even where she has a separate estate, and her estate is liable only in case the husband is insolvent. Waesch's Estate, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 387. It was held in Sears v. Giddey, 41 Mich. 590, 2 N. W. 917, 32 Am. Rep. 168, that a husband is proximately liable for the expense of his wife's funeral, even where he is not her legatee.

Marking place of burial.— It has been held in California that included in the obligation to give his wife decent burial is the duty of placing some mark of identification over her last resting-place. In re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345, 34 Pac. 825.

Provision in wife's will.— The liability of a husband for the funeral expenses of his wife is not discharged as against a creditor by a provision in her will directing payment out of her estate. Such a provision, it is true, gives him the right to call upon her executor for exoneration as between himself and mere legatees, but it can only be after all claims for which he is in any way responsible, whether primarily or as surety, have been fully satisfied. Wheeler's Estate, 4 Pa. Dist. 265.

33. Waesch's Estate, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 387.

In California it has been held that while it is the duty of the husband to bury his deceased wife and to defray the necessary funeral expenses, etc., yet where the husband is poor and the deceased leaves a considerable estate, it is proper for the court to fix a

IV. OFFENSES.[35]

A. Against Right of Burial. It is a misdemeanor for one upon whom the duty is imposed to have a dead body buried to refuse or neglect to perform such duty if he has sufficient means to do so,[36] to deprive a dead body of decent burial by disgraceful exposure, or to dispose of the body in a manner contrary to long sanctioned usage.[37] Thus it is an indictable offense both at common law and by statute[38] to dispose of or to sell a dead body for the purpose of dissection.[39] It is reasonable amount to be allowed out of her estate toward funeral expenses and a suitable monument. In re Weringer, 100 Cal. 345, 34 Pac. 825.

In Pennsylvania it has been held that in the settlement of the estate of a deceased wife, as between the creditor and the decedent her estate was liable for necessaries furnished in her lifetime, and the expense of interment, etc., yet the husband is primarily liable therefor, and can be called upon to reimburse the estate. But to prevent circuity of action this is accomplished by deducting from his distributive share the amount the estate was compelled to pay, and for which he is liable. Weber's Estate, 20 Phila. 8.

The selling or disposing of a dead body for gain or profit was a misdemeanor at common law and indictable. 3 Jacob Fisher Dig. 3507. In Thompson v. State, 105 Tenn. 177, 183, 58 S. W. 213, 80 Am. St. Rep. 875, 51 L. R. A. 883, the court said: "It may be safely stated that the authorities are harmonious on the proposition that the unauthorized disposition and sale of the dead body of a human being for gain and profit, is a common law misdemeanor of high grade, and malum in se." It has been held that the selling for dissection of the dead body of one executed when the death sentence did not so direct was an indictable offense. Rex. v. Cundick, D. & R. N. P. 13, 16 E. C. likewise an indictable offense for a person to receive a dead body, knowing that it has been unlawfully removed for the purpose of dissection.[40]

B. Violation of Sepulture. It may be stated as the universal rule of law in civilized countries that it is an indictable offense to disinter and remove dead bodies wantonly or for the sake of gain,[41] and by the old common law, even the fact that the motive of the person removing the body is laudable is no defense.[42] In most of the states of the Union the violation of sepulture is made a specific offense by statute.[43] But these statutes are not directed against and do not apply

An unsuccessful attempt to commit that offense is itself a misdemeanor and punishable at common law. Thompson v. State, 105 Tenn. 178, 58 S. W. 213, 80 Am. St. Rep. 875, 51 L. R. A. 883; Clark Cr. L. 104; 1 Russell Crimes 47.

Disinterring dead bodies.— A dead body by law belongs to no one and is therefore under the protection of the public. If it lies in consecrated grounds, the ecclesiastical law will interpose for its protection, but whether in ground consecrated or unconsecrated, indignities offered to human remains in improperly and indecently disinterring them are the grounds of an indictment. Constitutionality of the statute.— "The exhumation and removal of the dead is not a matter of public indifference, harmless in itself, like the style of wearing the hair, as in the Queue Case, but it affects the public health, and its regulation is, like the regulation of slaughter-houses and other noxious pursuits, strictly within the police powers to exhumations made by public officials, with a view to ascertaining whether a crime has been committed;[44] nor do they apply to a person who having obtained the necessary permit from the constituted authorities removes the dead body of a relative or friend for reinterment.[45]

C. Prosecution For Offenses — 1. Indictment or Information[46] — a. In General. The material elements of the offense charged, as prescribed by the particular statute, must be covered by the allegations in the indictment or information; but it is sufficient if it alleges all the facts which the statute requires to constitute the offense.[47] of the state." In re Wong Yung Quy, 2 Fed. 624, 629, 6 Sawy. 445.

"Disinter" defined.— In People v. Baumgartner, 135 Cal. 72, 74, 66 Pac. 974, the court said: "I think there can be little doubt that the common understanding of the act 'to disinter a buried human body' is not only to expose it to the elements where it lies, but to remove it. The statute is aimed at the crime commonly called 'body snatching.' The motive in removing the body may not be material, but the offense is not complete unless the body is removed from its resting-place."

Accomplices.— Under an Indiana statute in order to constitute the offense, it is not necessary that a party to it should be actually present aiding and abetting in the commission of the fact. If with the intention of giving assistance a person be near enough to afford it should it be needed, he is in construction of the law present aiding and abetting. Tate v. State, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 110.

Commission of act conclusive as to intent. — Under N. C. Acts (1895), § 1, c. 90, providing that any person who shall without due process of law, or the consent of the next of kin of the deceased, open any grave for the purpose of removing anything therein interred, shall be guilty of a felony, it was held that the doing the forbidden act itself is conclusive as to the intent with which it was done. State v. McLean, 121 N. C. 589, 28 S. E. 140, 42 L. R. A. 721.

Lack of consent, gravamen of offense.— Under the Indiana statute of 1841, it has been held that the unlawful disinterment of a dead body consists not merely in the removal of the dead body, but its removal without the consent of the deceased given during his lifetime, or of his near relatives given since his death. Tate v. State, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 110.

Removal for the purpose of dissection.— It has been held in Massachusetts that the removal of a dead body is not an offense within the meaning of Mass. St. (1830) c. 57, unless done with the intent to use or dispose of the body for the purpose of dissecting. Com. v. Slack, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 304.

Where body was not removed.— Where a person merely dug down to a coffin to search the body for valuables without removing the body, it was held that he could not be convicted of a felony, under Cal. Pen. Code, § 290. People v. Baumgartner, 135 Cal. 72, 66 Pac. 974.

44. People v. Fitzgerald, 105 N. Y. 146, 11 N. E. 378, 59 Am. Rep. 483; Rhodes v. Brandt, 21 Hun (N. Y.) 1; Hayes v. State, 112 Wis. 304, 87 N. W. 1076; Palmer v. Broder, 78 Wis. 483, 47 N. W. 744.

On application of defendant, and on affidavits sufficient to give jurisdiction, the coroner directed the exhumation of a body for the purpose of a post-mortem examination to determine whether the deceased was murdered, and the body was accordingly exhumed and a public examination had without impaneling a jury. It was held not to be body-stealing. People v. Fitzgerald, 105 N. Y. 146, 11 N. E. 378, 59 Am. Rep. 483, 5 N. Y. Cr. 335.

45. People v. Dalton, 58 Cal. 226; Sonntag v. Shonhoft, 14 Ohio Cir. Ct. 354; Fox v. Gordon, 16 Phila. (Pa.) 185.

46. See, generally, Indictments and Informations. An indictment charging that defendant in a churchyard interrupted and obstructed C, clerk, in reading the order for the burial of the dead and interring a corpse, and unlawfully, and by threats and menaces, hindered the burial of the corpse, is bad in arrest of judgment, for not averring that C was a clerk in holy orders, and lawfully acting as such in the burial of the corpse, and for not setting out the particular threats and menaces used. Rex v. Cheere, 4 B. & C. 902, 7 D. & R. 461, 4 L. J. K. B. O. S. 79, 10 E. C. L. 851.

47. Where the act charged as the offense is set forth in ordinary concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended and to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction according to the right of the case, the indictment is sufficient. People v. Dalton, 58 Cal. 226.

Under the Massachusetts statute, which makes it an offense to remove a dead body for the purpose of dissection, it is necessary that the indictment allege that such disinterment was wrongful, or to conclude contra formam statuti. Com. v. Cooley, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 37.

Surplusage.— Facts alleged in an indictment or information which are not necessary to the commission of the offense charged, and which do not change the offense, but only make its description more definite, may be regarded as mere surplusage. McNamee v. People, 31 Mich. 473, where the court said:

b. Stating Offense in Language of Statute. It is sufficient if the charge in the indictment or information pursues the language of the statute creating the offense and prescribing the elements thereof.[48]

c. Allegation of Intent. An indictment drawn under a statute making it an offense to remove a dead body with the intent to use or dispose of it for the purpose of dissection must aver such intent or it will be fatally defective.[49]

d. Description of Body. An indictment or information charging the disinterring of a dead body need not allege that it was the body of a human being; it is sufficient to state the name of the deceased.[50] Nor is it necessary to allege the death of the person whose body defendant is charged with having disinterred, where it is alleged that defendant entered and unlawfully dug up the grave and carried away the body.[51]

e. Designation of Place of Burial. Where the burial-place is described in the indictment as being in a certain town, it is no material defect that the particular graveyard is not designated by name.[52]

f. Negativing Exceptions. It is not necessary for an indictment for a common-law offense to negative exceptions contained in a statute.[53]

2. Evidence[54] — a. Burden of Proof. It is a general rule applicable to the trial of criminal cases that where there is an exception in a general statute it is not incumbent on the prosecution to prove that defendant is not within the exception; the fact being peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused, it is incumbent on him to show that he is not criminally liable for the act, because he is within the exception.[55]

"It cannot vitiate an indictment to include allegations which do not change the offense charged, and only make its description more definite. The prisoner cannot be damnified by that which throws no new burden on him, and, if it makes any difference, only calls for more proof from the prosecution." See also Thompson v. State, 105 Tenn. 177, 58 S. W. 213, 80 Am. St. Rep. 875, 51 L. R. A. 883. It has been held in Massachusetts that an indictment for disinterring a dead body need not allege the ownership of the burial-ground in which the body was interred, and that such allegation not being material may be regarded as surplusage, and therefore need not be proved. Com. v. Cooley, 10 Pick. 37.

48. Com. v. Dalton, 58 Cal. 226.

In Indiana it has been held that the indictment need not allege that the disinterment was unlawful, the term "unlawful" not being used in the statute. State v. McClure, 4 Blackf. 328.

In Massachusetts it was held that in an indictment under a statute (St. (1814) c. 175) forbidding any person to dig up a human body "not being authorized by the selectmen of any town in this Commonwealth" it was sufficient to allege that defendant was not authorized by the selectmen of the town where the body had been buried, this evidently being in accordance with the intention of the legislature. Com. v. Loring, 8 Pick. 370.

49. Com. v. Slack, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 304.

50. State v. Little, 1 Vt. 331.

An indictment under Tex. Pen. Code, art. 367, declaring a penalty for one who without authority disinters, removes, or carries away a human body, should state the name of the person whose body was disinterred. Williamson v. State, (Cr. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 600. If the indictment does not state or give a reason for not stating whose body was removed it is insufficient. Leach v. State, (Cr. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 600.

Failure to allege that body was "a human being."— It was held, in People v. Graves, 5 Park. Cr. (N. Y.) 134, that an indictment for the felonious disinterment of the body of B was not defective because of an omission to allege that she was "a human being." That fact would be assumed.

Unchristened infant.—Where the indictment charged the defendant with removing from its grave a certain deceased child of N. H. Burke "that had yet no name given to it," without the consent, etc., it was held to be sufficient. Tate v. State, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 110.

51. People v. Graves, 5 Park. Cr. (N. Y.) 134.

52. Where the burial-place was described as "a graveyard in the town of Bristol, Ontario county," it was held that the indictment was not materially defective in failing to designate the particular graveyard. People v. Graves, 5 Park. Cr. (N. Y.) 134.

54. See, generally, Criminal Law.

55. Thus upon the trial of an indictment under a statute making it an offense for any person without lawful authority to dig up, disinter, remove, or carry away any human body, etc., it is incumbent on defendant to show that he had lawful authority for such act. State v. Schaffer, 95 Iowa 379, 64 N. W. 276.

b. Admissibility — (i) As to Unlawful Disinterment. In a prosecution for body-stealing it is proper to submit to the jury evidence which tends to show that the body was disinterred without lawful authority.[56]

(ii) Aiding and Abetting. It has been held that under an indictment charging defendant as principal evidence is admissible showing him to have been an accessary.[57]

(iii) As to Intent. It is always competent to prove facts constituting a motive for the commission of any alleged crime.[58]

c. Weight and Sufficiency — (i) In General. It is not necessary to prove an allegation contained in the indictment which is entirely superfluous;[59] but where on the other hand the indictment contains an unnecessary allegation, and such allegation is descriptive of a material allegation, the prosecution is bound to prove it.[60] Under a statute directed against the unlawful receiving of a dead body removed from its grave for the purpose of dissection, the only facts essential to be established to warrant a conviction are that the body was so removed and that defendant received it knowing that it had been so unlawfully removed for such purpose, or knowingly aided, concealed, abetted, or assisted some other person in receiving it.[61]

(ii) Proof of Corpus Delicti. Under some statutes the unlawful disinterment of a dead body for the purpose of selling the same, for dissection, or for anatomical experiment constitutes the corpus delicti and must be established beyond a reasonable doubt, and suspicion founded upon inconclusive circumstances will not be sufficient.[62]

56. State v. Pugsley, 75 Iowa 742, 38 N. W. 498, such as evidence that the disinterment was made secretly during the night, that the body was concealed for several days, and that an attempt was then made to burn it.

57. State v. Pugsley, 75 Iowa 742, 38 N. W. 498, for the reason that the distinction between accessaries before the fact and principals was abolished by statute.

58. Thus evidence tending to prove the presence of defendant near the place where the offense was committed, with the intent of giving assistance should it be required, should be submitted to the jury. Tate v. State, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 110.

If intent is material, any fact is competent against the accused which tends to show the motive of the criminal act charged, and in such case the evidence is not incompetent, because it may tend to show the accused guilty of another offense than the one charged. State v. Lowe, 6 Kan. App. 110, 50 Pac. 912.

Introduction of policies of insurance. — In a prosecution for body-stealing, where the theory of the state was that the crime was a part of a plan for procuring insurance upon the life of a person who was not in fact dead, and there was evidence tending to establish such theory, it was held that the policies of insurance were properly admitted in evidence. State v. Pugsley, 75 Iowa 742, 38 N. W. 498.

59. Com. v. Cooley, 10 Pick. (Mass.) 37. In this case, a prosecution for disinterring a dead body, the ownership of the burial-ground in which the offense was committed was alleged in the indictment, and it was held that such ownership need not be proved, since the allegation was entirely superfluous.

60. Pringle v. State, 1 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 283, 7 West. L. J. 67. In this case the indictment charged the violation of a grave without the consent of the relatives "there being a widow and children," and it was held that although the indictment need not have alleged that the deceased left a widow, yet it was descriptive of a material allegation, and the prosecutor having alleged it was bound to prove it.

61. State v. Johnson, 6 Kan. App. 119, 50 Pac. 907; Schneider v. State, 40 Ohio St. 336. Under an indictment framed under the section of the Massachusetts statute of 1814, which imposed a penalty for receiving, concealing, or disposing of any human body which should be dug up, removed, or carried away contrary to the provisions of a previous section, it was held that evidence tending to prove, but not conclusively proving, that defendant dug up, etc., the body did not entitle him to an acquittal, where it was fully proven that the body was received by him. Com. v. Loring, 8 Pick. 370.

Prima facie evidence of guilty possession. — The unexplained possession of a dead body unlawfully removed from its grave, soon after such removal, is prima facie evidence of guilty possession and applies equally to a person charged with receiving and the one charged with taking it; and such possession need not be exclusive, but a joint possession may in connection with other circumstances justify a conviction. State v. Johnson, 6 Kan. App. 119, 50 Pac. 907.

62. State v. Baker, 144 Mo. 323, 46 S. W. 194. In this case a sack or waist with the peculiar buttons on it like those on the one in which the deceased was buried, whose body was missing from the grave, and who had

(III) Proof of Intent. The general rule is that where a specific intent is required to make an act an offense, the mere doing of the act will not raise a presumption that it was done for such prohibited purpose; but such specific intent must be proved.[63] It has been held, however, that the specific criminal intent may be presumed from the manner in which the act is performed and from the attending circumstances.[64]

V. CIVIL LIABILITY.

A. At Common Law. Since at common law there can be no such thing as property in human remains,[65] no action for civil damages will lie for an injury to a dead body;[66] although courts of law have afforded remedies through formal legal actions wherever any element of trespass to property real or personal has been associated with the molestation of the remains of the dead.[67]

B. In United States — 1. In General. It follows as a corollary to the well-recognized rule in the United States of the right of possession of a corpse for the purposes of interment and the care of such remains after burial[68] that the invasion or violation of that right furnishes a ground for a civil action for damages.[69] been dead a year, was found in the brick-yard of defendant, which was accessible to the public. Several witnesses testified that the waist was like the one in which deceased was interred. One witness also testified to the fact that he saw defendant in the graveyard on the night on which it was charged that the body was disinterred. It was held that the evidence was wholly inconclusive and did not suffice to establish the corpus delicti of the offense charged in the indictment. See also State v. Fox, 136 Mo. 139, 37 S. W. 794.

63. State v. Baker, 144 Mo. 323, 46 S. W. 194; State v. Fox, 136 Mo. 139, 37 S. W. 794. See also State v. Gibson, 111 Mo. 92, 19 S. W. 980; Lawson Presumptive Ev. 271.

A conviction of securing and concealing a dead human body at a college, knowing it to have been unlawfully removed, in violation of Ohio Rev. St. § 7034, is not sustained by mere proof that arrangements participated in by defendant with outside parties had been made for the delivery of bodies at the college, without proof that he contemplated an unlawful delivery, or of his knowledge of the presence of the body in question. Schneider v. State, 40 Ohio St. 336.

Where an indictment drawn under Mo. Rev. St. (1899) § 3842, charged defendant with removing a dead body from the grave for the purpose of dissection or for surgical or anatomical experiments, etc., it was held not to be sufficient to show that he removed the body from the grave, but that it was also necessary to show what his purpose was in removing the body; and further that such purpose could not be inferred from the fact that defendant dug up the body and had it in his possession. State v. Fox, 148 Mo. 517, 50 S. W. 98.

64. Where the evidence showed that three persons in the night-time dug open a grave and removed therefrom a dead body, that the act was done in a secret and clandestine manner, that the parties engaged in the enterprise were armed with revolvers, and that they were arrested while in the act of removing the body to a hack which they had provided to carry the remains away, it was held that the proof of the criminal intent and the want of authority was manifest in the manner in which the act was performed. State v. Schaffer, 95 Iowa 379, 64 N. W. 276.

Commission of act proof of intent.— Under N. C. Acts (1885), c. 90, § 1, providing that any person who shall without due process of law or the consent of the next of kin of the deceased open any grave for the purpose of removing anything therein interred shall be deemed guilty of a felony, it has been held that the forbidden act itself is conclusive proof of the intent with which it is done. 2. Mutilation of Corpse Before Burial — a. Action by Husband, Wife, or Next of Kin. An unauthorized and unlawful[70] mutilation of a corpse before burial gives rise to an action for damages in favor of the surviving husband or wife[71] or next of kin.[72] So the next of kin of a dead person has a cause of action against a carrier for an injury to the body of such deceased person, caused by the negligent act of the carrier while transporting it for hire.[73]

b. Action by Personal Representative. It has been held in some jurisdictions that since there can be no property in a dead body,[74] a personal representative of decedent cannot maintain an action for damages for the wilful or negligent mutilation of the body of the decedent, although he may sue for injury to the wearing apparel of decedent.[75]

3. Interference With Right of Burial.[76] And again it is well settled that the withholding of the body of the deceased human being from those who have a right to the possession of the body for the purpose of proper interment is an real right is violated a real remedy is afforded by the law. Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 14 L. R. A. 85. See also Pierce v. Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227. In Foley v. Phelps, 1 N. Y. App. Div. 551, 555, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 471, the court said: "In more recent times the obdurate common-law rule has been very much relaxed, and changed conditions of society, and the necessity for enforcing that protection which is due to the dead, have induced courts to re-examine the grounds upon which the common-law rule reposed, and have led to modifications of its stringency. The old cases in England were decided when matters of burial and the care of the dead were within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and they are no longer absolutely controlling."

70. A physician, however, who performs an autopsy upon a dead body with ordinary care and skill, and in pursuance of the authority of the coroner or a city ordinance, is not liable in an action to the family of the deceased for the mutilation of the body without their consent. Cook v. Walley, 1 Colo. App. 163, 27 Pac. 950; Young v. Physicians, etc., College, 81 Md. 358, 32 Atl. 177, 31 L. R. A. 540.

71. Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 28 Am. St. Rep. 370, 14 L. R. A. 85. Where plaintiff's husband, having fallen through an elevator shaft, was taken to Bellevue hospital where he died three hours later; and plaintiff applied at the hospital for his body and begged those in charge not to allow an autopsy to be performed, and without her knowledge and consent defendant procured, assisted, aided, and abetted in performing an autopsy on her husband's body without any authority of law, it was held that the unlawful and unauthorized mutilation of the body was a clear invasion of plaintiff's right and irrespective of any statutory enactment entitled her to bring an action for damages. Foley v. Phelps, 1 N. Y. App. Div. 551, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 471. In Farley v. Carson, 8 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 119, 7 West. L. J. 67, this principle was recognized, but the court held in this case, where the deceased died of abscess of the liver, and the attending physician made an incision shortly after death to ascertain the exact cause of death, there being no dismemberment or removal of any part or organ, that this was not such mutilation of the body as to give the widow cause of action against defendant.

Fragmentary remains — Where amputation was necessary. — A railroad company is not liable for failure to deliver to the representative of a person killed in its service fragments necessarily amputated from his body because of an accident which resulted in his death, because its employees summoned an ambulance and a surgeon, and its surgeon performed the amputation at the hospital to which he was removed by those in charge of the ambulance upon his request not to be taken home, where the fragments were cremated according to the custom of the hospital without the knowledge or direction of the company's surgeon. 72. Burney v. Children's Hospital, 169 Mass. 57, 47 N. E. 401, 61 Am. St. Rep. 273, 38 L. R. A. 413. In this case a child died in a Boston hospital, and the hospital authorities, without any authority from the parents of the child, performed an autopsy upon its body. It was held that the father of the child was its natural guardian, and after its death had a right to the possession of the child's body for burial, and that he could maintain an action for damages against the hospital authorities for such unauthorized autopsy.

73. Beam v. Cleveland, etc., R. Co., 97 Ill. App. 24, holding that a brother of a deceased person who undertakes to pay for the transportation of his body from the place of his death to that of his burial has such an interest in the dead body as entitles him to damages for an injury to it by the negligent act of the carrier while transporting it for hire.

injury which will give a cause of action against the person or persons so withholding such body.[77]

4. Disinterment and Removal. Since a dead body is not the subject of property at common law,[78] it has been held that the only action that can be maintained for unlawfully disturbing and disinterring a dead body is trespass quare clausum fregit.[79]

Action by stranger.— A, at the request of B upon his death-bed, promised him, in case he died, to send his body home to be buried with his mother. After B's death A obtained a coffin from the city, purchased a box in which to forward it, and put the coffin with the body into the box and shipped them on board a vessel. He paid to the owners of the vessel the price they had agreed upon with a sister of the deceased since his death to carry the body, if inclosed in such box, to the desired place, the sister having informed him of such agreement. It was held that A had no legal interest in the dead body of B, by reason of which he could maintain an action against the carrier for failure to transport the body to such destination without proof of a special contract with himself. Defense of good faith.— In an action of trespass by next of kin for entering a private burial-ground and removing the dead bodies therefrom, where defendants plead and proved that they were the owners of and in possession of the premises at and prior to the time of the alleged trespass, and that the bodies were removed in good faith and with care and decency, it was held that plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Excessive damages.— It was held in Bessemer Land, etc., Co. v. Jenkins, 111 Ala. 135, 18 So. 565, 56 Am. St. Rep. 26, that a verdict of one thousand seven hundred dollars for damages for removal of the body of a deceased child from a discontinued graveyard to one provided in lieu thereof without notice to the parents to remove it was excessive. But it was held in Thirkfield v. Mountain View Cemetery Assoc., 12 Utah 76, 41 Pac. 564, on a suit against the cemetery company for wilfully removing the body of plaintiff's child from a lot which defendant sold to him, without notice to plaintiff, that a verdict for plaintiff for eleven hundred and fifty dollars would not be set aside as excessive. So in an action for unlawful disinterment of a dead body, where the jury found for plaintiff, and assessed the damages at one cent, on appeal the court refused to disturb the verdict of the lower court, where no special damages and no expense incurred was shown. Applied to assets of banks.— In a statute reviving the charters of certain banks it was enacted that "with a view of enabling the banks effectually to secure their debts, it shall be lawful for their respective boards of directors to consider the whole of the debts due them on the passage of this act, as forming part of their dead weight." New Orleans City Bank v. Barbarin, 6 Rob. (La.) 289, 291.

Applied to cargo of a vessel.— Where a charter-party provided that the ship should "with all convenient speed, after loading dead-weight at Malta," sail, etc., Bramwell, L. J., said: "Those words were inserted for the purpose of protecting the shipowner if the ship went to Malta instead of going direct to a Spanish port, and loaded dead-weight there. The fair construction of the document is that the ship might take on board any sort of dead-weight; there is no restriction." Brett, L. J., after alluding to the fact that the ship was under contract to load military stores which were "dead-weight," said: "We are, therefore, entitled to notice that the word 'dead-weight,' which includes these military stores, was put in with a knowledge of the fact that such stores were to be shipped at

DEAD-WOOD.[30] A wooden block fastened to the end of a railroad car;[31] the fixture or part of the respective cars which comes in contact when coupling is done.[32] (See DEAD BLOCK; and, generally, RAILROADS.)

DE ÆTATE PROBANDA. Writ of (about) proving age.[33]

30. "Double dead-woods."— In Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Boland, 96 Ala. 626, 627, 11 So. 667, 18 L. R. A. 260, the court said: "These 'double-deadwoods' or 'buffers' are horizontal timbers at the end of the car, projecting, one on each side of the drawhead, the latter extending three or four inches beyond the deadwoods. In coupling, the drawhead yields to the impact of the two cars, and the deadwoods or buffers of the opposing cars coming together arrest the force of the blow."

"Double dead-wood" distinguished from "single dead-wood."— In Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Smithson, 45 Mich. 212, 215, 7 N. W. 791, the court said: "A car of this construction has a horizontal timber at the end with projecting blocks bolted to each end of the timber, and the draw-bar for coupling extends but little beyond the faces of these blocks. In coupling, the blocks come together and receive the blow of the cars. The coupling-pin is dropped between the blocks from above. Distinguished from the car with double dead-woods is that known as the single dead-wood, which dispenses with the projecting blocks, and leaves the draw-bar to receive the concussion when the cars are coupled."

33. An old writ which lay to the escheator or sheriff of a county, to summon a jury to inquire whether the heir of a tenant in capite, claiming his estate on the ground of full age, was, in fact, of age or not. Burrill L. Dict.

34. "A man who is born deaf, dumb and blind, is looked upon by the law as in the same state with an idiot; he being supposed incapable of any understanding, as wanting all those senses which furnish the human mind with ideas." 1 Blackstone Comm. 304.

35. Century Dict.

The expression "deaf," as defined by statute (56 & 57 Vict. c. 42, § 15) means too deaf to be taught in a class of hearing children in an elementary school.

37. Nelson v. State, 111 Wis. 394, 399, 87 N. W. 235, 87 Am. St. Rep. 881 [citing Webster Dict.].

"The plain meaning of the word 'deal' unquestionably extends to buying as well as selling; there must be two parties to what is called a 'deal;' a man cannot deal with himself; there must be some one else for him to deal with." McKenzie v. Day, [1893] 1 Q. B. 289, 291, 17 Cox C. C. 604, 57 J. P. 216, 62 L. J. M. C. 49, 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 345, 5 Reports 161, 41 Wkly. Rep. 384.

Y.) 524, 526 [quoting Johnson Quarto Dict.], where it is said: "And the illustration given by Johnson, supposes that this may be a third person: 'It is generally better to deal by speech than by letter; and by a man himself than the mediation of a third person.'"

"To deal in the selling of a thing is to traffic, to trade in the selling of it, to make a business of it. A single act of selling, then, will not constitute a person a merchant; he must deal in the business to be one." State v. Martin, 5 Mo. 361, 363.

"To deal in tickets."— In State v. Ray, 109 N. C. 736, 738, 14 S. E. 83, 14 L. R. A. 529, the court in construing a statute regulating the sale of railroad tickets said: "The phrases, 'to sell tickets, to deal in tickets,' imply, in business parlance, the business of selling or buying and selling such tickets; they imply not particulars — simply a sale — but a multiplicity of such sales in the sense of a business."

39. McKenzie v. Day, [1893] 1 Q. B. 289, 17 Cox C. C. 604, 57 J. P. 216, 62 L. J. M. C. 49, 68 L. T. Rep. N. S. 345, 346, 5 Reports 161, 41 Wkly. Rep. 384, where Lord Coleridge, C. J., said: "I am of opinion, and hold, that 'dealing' unquestionably extends to buying as well as selling, and it means a buyer as well as a seller."

"To deal in metals."— In Com. v. Hood, 183 Mass. 196, 198, 66 N. E. 722, it is said: "The keeper of every shop where old metals are bought by him deals there in such metals, and each of the defendants dealt in old gold and silver articles by purchasing them at their shops and sending them away to be refined. Every such purchase was a 'deal,' and the defendants were traffickers or dealers in old gold and silver."

DEALER.[40] A person who buys to sell again, and not one who buys to keep, or makes to sell;[41] one who trades, buys or sells;[42] one whose business it is to buy and sell;[43] one who buys to sell to others at a profit; one who acts between man and man, to have transactions of any kind with;[44] one who distributes;[45] a trader;[46] a keeper;[47] one who makes successive sales as a business.[48] A term which implies an habitual course of dealing.[49] (Dealer: In Liquors, see INTOXICATING LIQUORS. License and Taxation of, see LICENSES.)

40. Distinguished from "merchant."— In Kansas City v. Ferd Heim Brewing Co., 98 Mo. App. 590, 594, 73 S. W. 302, the court in construing the term "merchant" as used in a city charter and in a statute, said: "It does not follow that because a merchant is a dealer, a dealer is also a merchant. A merchant must have a store, stand, or other place where he sells his goods. A dealer need not have such store, stand, or place to keep and sell his goods. He may buy and sell without such aids to his business. A merchant, under the definition, is not required to be a purchaser; but the dealer, at common law, is both a buyer and seller."

43. Barton v. Morris, 1 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 543, 544, where it is said: "It is a term of trade having as distinct and well known signification as that of merchant, mariner or broker. He is the middleman, who stands between the producer and consumer; his profit is not derived from selling the produce of his farm or his factory, but from his skill in knowing when to buy and how to sell the products of others." But compare Rex v. Excise Com'rs, 2 T. R. 381, 386, where Buller, J., said: "What is meant by a dealer in this act of parliament? I am of opinion that according to the true construction of it a buyer is a dealer for this purpose. This bears no analogy to the case of bankrupts within the bankrupt laws; for there the words of the statutes are 'a person who seeks his living by buying and selling;' therefore to constitute a trader within those acts there must be both a buying and selling. But here the words are in the disjunctive, 'deal in or sell;' and we cannot vary the meaning of them by construing them to be buying and selling; dealing must mean something which does not include selling."

Applied to a dealer in wine.— Where it is enacted "that no person shall deal 'in or sell foreign wine by wholesale, without first taking out a licence for that purpose,'" Ashurst, J., said: "For the purposes of this act I think a man does commence to be a dealer from the moment when he buys the wine with an intention to sell it again." Others are variously called by brokers 'puts,' 'calls,' 'options,' etc. In all cases the customer (if the deal is with a broker) pays and risks something for the purpose of securing a profit from an expected rise in the market value of stocks. I. Definition.

Death has been defined as the termination of life.[1]

II. Evidence of Death and Survivorship.[2]

A. As to Death — 1. Presumption of Continuance of Life — a. Rule Stated. As a general rule, when a person is shown or appears to have been living at one time, the presumption is that he is still alive,[3] at least for such time as is not contrary to the laws of nature in respect to the duration of human life.[4] This rule is not confined in its application to any particular class of individuals, but applies to children[5] and persons of advanced age[6] as well as to persons in the prime of life, and to persons in bad health as well as to those whose health is good.[7]

b. A Presumption of Fact. The presumption of continuance of life is at most merely a presumption of fact which is subject to be controlled by facts and circumstances and other legitimate evidence,[8] and it is a presumption by no means of equal strength at all times and under all circumstances.[9]

c. Presumption Rebuttable. The presumption of continuance of life may be overcome by proof of facts and circumstances raising a contradictory presumption.[10]

d. Conflicting Presumptions. In case the presumption of continuance of life conflicts with the presumption of innocence the presumption of innocence must prevail over that of continuance of life;[11] as for instance when a person whose husband or wife has not been absent and unheard-of for a sufficient time to over-

Presumption of life up to one hundred years.— Under both the common and the civil law, a person was presumed to be living for a period of one hundred years from the time of his birth, that being the longest limit of an ordinary life. Matter of Bd. of Education, 173 N. Y. 321, 66 N. E. 11. This rule still prevails in Louisiana, where a person will not be presumed to have died under the age of one hundred years (Willet v. Andrews, 51 La. Ann. 486, 25 So. 391; Martinez v. Vives, 32 La. Ann. 305; Owens v. Mitchell, 5 Mart. N. S. (La.) 667; Sassman v. Aime, 9 Mart. (La.) 257; Hayes v. Berwick, 2 Mart. (La.) 138, 5 Am. Dec. 727), although the lapse of a century since a person's birth raises a presumption of his death (Miller v. McElwee, 12 La. Ann. 476).

come the presumption of life marries again, and is thus guilty of bigamy if the former spouse is alive.[12]

2. Presumption of Death Arising From Absence — a. General Rule. Opposed to the presumption of the continuance of life, and of sufficient force to overcome it,[13] is the presumption of death which arises in the case of a person who has been absent from his last or usual place of residence and from whom no tidings have been received for a considerable length of time.[14]

12. Rex v. Twyning, 2 B. & Ald. 386, 20 Rev. Rep. 480. See also Smith v. Knowlton, 11 N. H. 191; Chapman v. Cooper, 5 Rich. (S. C.) 452.

The correctness of the application of this rule in Rex v. Twyning, 2 B. & Ald. 386, 20 Rev. Rep. 480, to a case where a wife married again after her husband had been absent a little over twelve months was questioned in Rex v. Harborne, 2 A. & E. 540, 1 Hurl. & W. 36, 4 L. J. M. C. 49, 4 N. & M. 341, 29 E. C. L. 255; but the principal objection seems to have been that in the former case the rule was laid down as a strict rule of law and not a presumptio juris, good until rebutted.

California.— Garwood v. Hastings, 38 Cal. 216, seventeen years. Sprague, J., dissented on the ground that, as the testimony of the wife that she had not heard from her husband for seventeen years, during which she was absent from his last known place of residence, living under various assumed names, and never bearing that of her husband, suggested the probability that she had endeavored to conceal herself from him, it was insufficient to justify the presumption of his death.

(III) Time From Which Period Runs. The period which must elapse in order to give rise to the presumption of death runs from the time when the last tidings of or from the person were received.[22]

c. Absence From Residence Necessary. It is necessary that the person as to whose death it is sought to raise a presumption shall have been absent from his home or the place where he has established a residence.[23] Thus where a person has changed his residence from one state or country to another, the fact that he has not been heard of in the place of his former residence for seven years raises no presumption of his death,[24] at least in the absence of evidence that inquiries have been made for him at his last known place of residence without success;[25] and the mere absence of a person from a place where his relatives reside, but which is not his own place of residence, and the fact that his relatives have not received letters from him for seven years, does not raise any presumption of his death.[26]

d. Absence From State or Country. Some of the statutes creating a presumption of death after an absence, unheard from, for seven years, by their terms apply only to cases of absence from the state or country or beyond the seas;[27] but such statutes do not exclude all presumptive evidence of death unless the person is shown to have left the state or country.[28]

e. Necessity For Efforts to Find Person. There can be no presumption of the death of a person from the mere fact of his absence unless there have been some efforts to find him,[29] such as inquiries at the place where he was last known to be alive,[30] at least where the relations between him and his family are not shown to be such as would reasonably be supposed to induce him to correspond with them if alive,[31] or the person was known to have a fixed place of residence abroad.[32]

f. Who Must Have Been Without Tidings. In order to raise the presumption of a person's death from his absence, it must appear that he has not been heard of by those persons who would naturally have received tidings from him if he had been alive;[33] but the rule does not confine the tidings to his family or any particular class of persons;[34] and a person may be absent and unheard of for

Effect of statute.— A statute declaring that the death of a person shall be presumed after a certain time if he has remained beyond the sea, absented himself from the state, or concealed himself within the state does not alter the common law so as to require proof of one of these three alternatives, for such proof would necessarily show that the person was living, and thus rebut the very presumption the statute designed to create. The failure of strangers to hear from a person in any number of years or the fact that his present whereabouts may not be known to one of his acquaintances in a place of former residence who is not shown to have made any inquiry about him does not establish the fact of absence for seven years successively, as required by the Texas statute, and does not therefore authorize the presumption of death. seven years without any presumption of his death arising when he has no near or intimate friends with whom he has been accustomed to correspond.[35]

g. Presumption Rebuttable — (i) In General. The presumption of death resulting from absence, unheard of, is not conclusive, but may be rebutted,[36] although the burden of proof is upon the person denying the death.[37]

(ii) Admissibility of Evidence in Rebuttal. In order to rebut the presumption of death arising from absence it may be shown that the person supposed to be dead was a fugitive from justice,[38] was in a financial condition which might have induced him to abscond,[39] or was a speculator or visionary in his business.[40] Testimony of persons not members of the family that a person who has not been heard from was living within seven years is admissible,[41] as is also testimony of a witness who saw a person bearing the name of the person supposed to be deceased as to such person's appearance and conversations had with him in regard to his family connections.[42]

(iii) Sufficiency of Circumstances to Rebut Presumption. The presumption that a person who has been absent and unheard of for more than seven years is dead necessarily disappears entirely upon his return home alive.[43] The presumption is also overcome by the testimony of several disinterested witnesses who are not contradicted or impeached to the effect that he returned and was seen alive less than seven years before,[44] or even, it has been held, by the testimony of one credible witness who has received a letter in the absentee's handwriting within that time.[45] But proof that a person having the name of the absentee was alive within seven years is not sufficient to overcome the presumption of death in the absence of proof of the identity of such person with the absentee,[46] nor is such presumption rebutted by the fact that a person on whose will the action is founded supposed the absentee to be living at a later period.[47]

(iv) Question For Jury. Where there are circumstances tending to rebut the presumption of death, the question whether the person is dead or alive is for the jury on all the evidence.[48]

h. To Whom Presumption Applies. It has been said that a statute creating a

A failure to claim deposits in bank and being otherwise unheard from for over twenty years will raise a presumption of death. Louisville Bank v. Public Schools Trustees, 83 Ky. 219.

Where a wife has moved out of the community where she and her husband had lived, the fact that she has not heard from him for over seven years is not sufficient to sustain a presumption of his death, but it must be shown that he had not been heard from by his friends and relatives who remained at or near his last known residence. presumption of death after seven years' absence or concealment refers only to persons having volition and the right of free locomotion.[49]

i. Burden of Proof as to Lack of Tidings. The burden of establishing the presumption of death arising from seven years' absence unheard from rests upon the person who makes the assertion that the person alleged to be dead has not been heard from for that time.[50]

j. Removal With Family. Where a person removed with his wife and child from the neighborhood where he had formerly resided, and was not heard from for over thirty years, it was held that while the law would raise a presumption of his death it would not presume that all his family were dead.[51]

k. Time of Death. With regard to the time when death will be presumed to have occurred, the decisions are by no means uniform. It has been asserted that the presumption is that the person died at the time of his disappearance,[52] or at least a considerable time before the expiration of the seven years;[53] and in the case of a passenger on a ship which was never heard from after the time of sailing, it has been held that the death must be deemed to have occurred within the longest usual duration of the voyage from the port of departure to that of the ship's destination.[54] Again it has been said that the inference of death from seven years' absence does not necessarily imply that death occurred at the end of that period, but the circumstances of each case are to be weighed, and if they warrant an inference of the death of the individual at an earlier date than the close of the seven years' absence, a finding that the death so occurred may stand.[55] The Distinction between statutory and common-law presumption.— In Chapman v. Cooper, 5 Rich. (S. C.) 452, 459 [citing Doe v. Nepean, 5 B. & Ad. 86, 2 L. J. K. B. 150, 2 N. & M. 219, 27 E. C. L. 45], Evans, J., delivering the opinion of the court, after stating that in the construction of 1 Jac. 1, c. 11, § 2, of which the South Carolina statute was an exact copy, it has been held that the only presumption which arises is that of death, and none as to the time of death, continued as follows: "Whether that construction arises from the peculiar wording of the statute I know not, but I can see no reason why, when the presumption depends on the common law acquiescence of twenty years and upwards, we should be restrained from giving the presumption the same effect as to time, that we give to other presumptions." Namely, that death occurred at the commencement of the period.

53. See Nepean v. Doe, 7 L. J. Exch. 335, 340, 2 M. & W. 894, Thayer Ev. 109, in which case the court said: "When nothing is heard of a person for seven years, it is obviously a matter of complete uncertainty, at what point of time in those seven years he died: of all the points of time, the last day is the most improbable and most inconsistent with the ground of presuming the fact of death. That presumption arises from the great lapse of time since the party has been heard of; because, it is considered extraordinary if he was alive, that he should not be heard of. In other words, it is presumed, that his not being heard of has been occasioned by his death, which presumption arises from the considerable time that has elapsed. If you assume that he was alive on the last day but one of the seven years, then there is nothing extraordinary in his not having been heard of on the last day; and the previous extraordinary lapse of time, during which he was not heard of, has become immaterial by reason of the assumption, that he was living so lately. The presumption of the fact of death seems, therefore, to lead to the conclusion, that the death took place some considerable time before the expiration of the seven years."

majority of the cases, however, are those which assert either that where the presumption of death arises from absence and being unheard of for a number of years there is no presumption as to the time of death,[56] and the party alleging death before the expiration of the seven years must prove it,[57] or that there is no presumption of the person's death at any time during such period but he must be presumed to have died at the expiration thereof.[58] When the true meaning of these latter expressions is considered, it will be seen that they amount to the same thing. The true rule may be properly stated as follows: The presumption of law is always in favor of the continuance of life, but this presumption is overcome by the presumption of death that arises in the case of a person who has been absent and unheard of for seven years. This latter presumption does not, however, arise until the full period has elapsed, and when it does arise there is no reason why it should have a retroactive effect, so as to defeat the other presumption which was in full force during the waiting period.[59]

ularly and frequently for an annuity upon which he was dependent for support, left his home in May, without indicating an intent to be absent, and was never afterward heard from, and his physician testified that, when he disappeared, he was suffering from an incurable disease, under which he could not have survived more than three months, the facts were sufficient to raise a presumption of his death during the fall of the same year.

Where suicide seems probable under circumstances attending the disappearance, a presumption is warranted that death occurred at about the time of the disappearance. Sheldon v. Ferris, 45 Barb. (N. Hence, unless it be shown that death occurred prior to the expiration of the seven years' absence, or some conflicting presumption arises from the facts proved which would overcome the presump-

1. When Presumption Does Not Arise. The presumption of death does not in all cases necessarily arise from the mere fact that a person has been absent and unheard of for seven years or more, for there may be a variety of circumstances which will prevent any such presumption;[60] such as improbability that the person who has been absent would have communicated with his home,[61] or the fact that he was a fugitive from justice,[62] or that there was a cloud upon his or her character.[63]

3. Evidence as to Fact of Death — a. Circumstantial Evidence. In civil cases death, like any other fact, may be proved by circumstantial evidence, and it is not necessary to produce an eye-witness of the death.[64]

b. Best Evidence. The rule requiring the best evidence which from the nature of the case must be supposed to exist to be introduced applies to cases where it is sought to prove a person's death.[65]

tion of the continuance of life, the presumption of life would obtain until the full expiration of the period, when the contrary presumption of death, from the continued absence, would arise. While, therefore, it is true that there is no presumption that death occurred at any particular time within the seven years, it is also true that, in the absence of contravening facts or controlling presumptions, it will be presumed that life continued during the entire period."

But see Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Martin, 108 Ky. 11, 55 S. W. 694, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1465, holding that such fact does not as a matter of law prevent the application of a statute creating a presumption of death after seven years' absence, although it is admissible in evidence to rebut the presumption of death.

63. See Schwarzhoff v. Necker, 1 Tex. Unrep. Cas. 325.

64. Boyd v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co., 34 La. Ann. 848; Bailey v. Bailey, 36 Mich. 181; John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Moore, 34 Mich. 41.

Thus the cessation of communication of friends is a fact from which an inference of death more or less strong may arise. And hence on the question as to the death of a certain person a letter addressed to him at the place where he was accustomed to receive letters and returned to the writer as not called for is admissible. Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, 63 Vt. 667, 22 Atl. 850.

Similarly absence, without being heard from, although not of sufficient duration to create a legal presumption of death, may yet be one of other attendant and supporting circumstances which taken together would satisfy the mind and conscience of the judge or jury that the person was dead (Boyd v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co., 34 La. Ann. 848); but in such case there must also be evidence of diligent inquiry at the place of the person's last residence in the country and among his relatives and any others who probably would have heard of him if living, and also at the place of his fixed foreign residence if he was known to have any (Bailey v. Bailey, 36 Mich. 181).

So also any facts or circumstances relating to the habits, character, condition, affections, attachments, prosperity, and objects in life, which usually control the conduct of men and are the motives of their actions, are competent evidence from which may be inferred the death of one absent and unheard from, whatever may have been the duration of such absence (Reedy v. Millizen, 155 Ill. 636, 40 N. E. 1028; Tisdale v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 26 Iowa 170, 96 Am. Dec. 136; Stouvenel v. Stephens, 2 Daly (N. Y.) 319, holding that where there is evidence of a character, considered by itself, to create a reasonable probability that a party was dead on a certain day, and the evidence that he was seen afterward is contradicted, everything, however slight, which tends to strengthen the former evidence, such as the habits of the person itself, should be received in evidence); but these facts must have occurred or the character have been recognized within such reasonable time prior to the principal fact (death) sought to be proved that they may justly be supposed to afford some light tending to establish or refute it, for remote acts as well as remote consequences are alike excluded from the consideration of the jury (Tisdale v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 28 Iowa 12).

c. Hearsay Evidence. Death may be proved by hearsay evidence;[66] hence evidence that witness was informed by a person since dead of the death of another person is admissible to prove the death of the latter.[67] But evidence of a witness that he was told by another person that a certain person was dead is not sufficient to prove the death, where the person making such statement was not a member of the family of the person supposed to be dead and it is not shown what means he had of knowing the fact.[68]

d. Report and General Belief. Evidence that a person was missing at a particular time and of a report and general belief that he is dead is admissible to establish the fact of death;[69] but a mere rumor that a person died at a certain time has been held to be no evidence of his being dead.[70]

e. Administration on Estate. It has been frequently asserted that letters of administration are in themselves prima facie evidence of the death of the person on whose estate they are granted;[71] but they constitute at best evidence of a very weak and unsatisfactory character and are easily overcome;[72] and it has also been asserted that the fact that letters of administration have been granted upon the estate of a person does not afford sufficient[73] or even prima facie proof of death.[74] And some courts have gone even farther than this, and have held that while, in an action brought by an executor or administrator touching the collection and settlement of the estate, the letters of administration are admissible and are conclusive evidence of his right to sue for and collect whatever is due the deceased,[75] in a collateral action brought, not as administrator, but in an individual character, where the right of action depends upon the death of a third person, as in the case of an action upon a policy of life insurance, letters of administration upon the estate of the assured issued by the proper probate court do not afford any legal evidence of his death and are not admissible;[76] and even where the death is admitted, letters of administration are not admissible to prove the time of death.[77]

A recital in a deed that the record owner of the fee is dead and that one of the subscribing grantors is her daughter and heir at law is admissible to prove the death of such person, the deed being signed not only by the daughter but by the brothers and sisters of the person alleged to be dead, since the oral declarations of the persons so related would be competent proof of the death.[79]

j. Sufficiency of Evidence. The usual rules with reference to the weight and sufficiency of evidence[82] apply to evidence introduced upon the question of life or death.[83]

4. Evidence as to Time of Death. Upon the question of the time of death, the age, habits of life, and habits as to the use of stimulants and drugs, from which a presumption as to the continuance or destruction of life would arise, are proper to be considered;[84] and the condition of health of a person when last seen or heard from is also an important subject of inquiry, for if the person is afflicted with some disease liable to immediately produce death or some specific malady which would necessarily undermine and destroy health, the presumption of an early dissolution would be greatly increased.[85]

B. As to Survivorship — 1. Presumptions — a. Under the Civil Law. The civil law indulged in various presumptions as to the survivorship between persons who perished in the same disaster, based upon the age, sex, and physical strength of the individuals, and the assumption that the stronger would survive the weaker.[86] And in California and Louisiana such presumptions have been established by statute.[87]

b. Under the Common Law. At common law, however, where several persons perish in a common disaster, notwithstanding differences of age, sex, and physical strength, there is no presumption as to survivorship,[88] but it is a fact to be proved by the party asserting it.[89] It will not be presumed that one individual survived another,[90] or, it has been said, that they all died at the same moment,[91] although this latter proposition is controverted by several cases which hold that

Survivorship between persons who have disappeared, but were not lost in a common disaster.— It has been held that where two persons have disappeared and have both been absent a sufficient time to raise a presumption of death, no presumption of survivorship arises from the fact that one was heard from after the disappearance of the other, where at such time the other had not been absent a sufficient time to raise a presumption of his death. there is a presumption that all the persons died at the same moment.[92] However this may be, it is certain that where two or more persons have perished in a common disaster, and there is no evidence as to which died first, the courts will dispose of property rights as though death occurred at the same time,[93] and this being true it seems to be of little practical importance whether the courts arrive at this conclusion through the roundabout method of saying that the fact is incapable of proof, and hence the party upon whom the onus lies fails, and the property is disposed of as though both died together, not because of the fact that this is proved, or because there is any presumption to that effect, but merely because there is no evidence and no presumption to the contrary;[94] or adopt the simple and direct method of saying that there is a presumption that death occurred at the same time, and this, not having been overcome, must be acted upon by the court.[95]

Illustrative cases on the sufficiency of evidence as to survivorship.— A husband and his wife went into a certain timber between eleven and twelve o'clock A. M., the husband carrying a rifle, and shortly thereafter two reports were heard. Their bodies were found about six P. M., the wife shot through the body from behind, while the husband was in a squatting position, with his rifle across his knees, and the top of his head blown off. It was conceded that the husband had shot the wife, either accidentally or intentionally, and then committed suicide. The evening was rainy, and was nearly freezing. Two heirs of the wife and another witness testified that the body of the wife was warm at six o'clock, and that there were leaves and grass in her hands, as if she had struggled in dying. One witness for the heirs of the husband testified that he reached the bodies at eight P. M., and that they were both cold and stiff, and there were no signs of a struggle. It was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that the wife survived the husband, and his property descended to her (Broome v. Duncan, (Miss. 1901) 29 So. 394). Testator devised land to his son J for life, remainder to J's three infant children in fee. All the persons named were burned to death together. On the night of the fire, which was very cold, testator, if he followed his usual custom, slept in a room in the northwest part of the house; J and his wife and children sleeping in another room east of and divided by a hall from testator's room. Testator was eighty-two years old, and, in cold weather, a fire was kept up in an unsafe stove in his room, and a lamp burned there all night. There was a closet, with a curtain instead of a door, in his room, to which he often went in the night for medicine, lighting a candle kept there to enable him to see. His remains were found under the ruins at the closet. The only person who escaped from the house stated that the fire was under the greatest headway in testator's room, and a wind driving it eastward, in which direction partitions and doors would obstruct its progress. The only outcry heard by this witness was J's voice, and he saw no one at all. It was shown that death would result quicker from excessive heat than smoke. It was held that testator probably died before any of the others. Ehle's Estate, 73 Wis. 445, 41 N. W. 627. Upon a question of survivorship, it appeared that the testatrix and her two grandchildren, together with the father of the latter, perished in the disaster to the steamer Schiller. They were all in the pavilion on the deck after the steamer struck. The testatrix was washed out of the pavilion, but the evidence did not disclose whether she was carried out into the sea or to some other part of the deck. The children, with their father, were seen alive in the pavilion some ten or fifteen minutes after the testatrix was swept away. Her dead body was afterward recovered, but the remains of the chil-

age, health, etc., may be resorted to to aid conjecture;[97] but where there is any evidence whatever as to the survivorship between two persons who perished in a common disaster it must govern in the decision of the facts.[98]

b. Recital in Order of Probate Court. A recital in the order of a probate court, appointing an administrator, that the intestate is the "surviving wife" of her husband raises no presumption of survivorship of the wife, where both she and her husband perished in a common disaster.[99]

c. Opinion Evidence. In California, where the statute establishes certain presumptions as to the survivorship among persons who perish in the same calamity, opinion evidence is inadmissible on the question of survivorship.[1]

III. ACTIONS FOR CAUSING DEATH.

A. Right of Action — 1. At Common Law. At common law no action will lie for damages caused by the death of a human being by the wrongful or negligent act of another, in favor of the heirs, distributees, or personal representatives of the decedent, in conformance with the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona.[2] In some jurisdictions, however, the doctrine has been enunciated that dren were never found. It was held that the evidence of survivorship of the grandchildren was insufficient. In re Ridgway, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 226. But see Stinde v. Ridgway, 55 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 301, in which it was held that the same evidence would sustain a finding that the testatrix died first.

97. Pell v. Ball, Cheves Eq. (S. C.) 99. See also Moehring v. Mitchell, 1 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 264, in which case the court held that where a husband, wife, and daughter perished at sea by the same disaster, and there was no evidence as to who was the survivor, there was no presumption of law that the daughter survived the mother, but expressed the opinion, although it did not decide, that it would be presumed that the husband survived his wife.

Where the calamity consists of a series of successive events separated from each other in point of time and character, and each likely to produce death upon the several victims according to the degree of exposure to it, the difference of age, sex, and physical strength becomes a matter of evidence and may be considered. Smith v. Croom, 7 Fla. 81.

An infant of tender years may be presumed to have been survived by a person of middle age and in the full vigor of life, where both perish in a shipwreck. Coye v. Leach, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 371, 41 Am. Dec. 518.

98. Pell v. Ball, Cheves Eq. (S. C.) 99, holding that where a husband and wife had perished in a shipwreck, the wife must be held to have survived where there was evidence that she was seen and was heard to call loudly for her husband immediately after the disaster and that he was not heard to answer, nor was he heard or seen at any time after the explosion which caused the shipwreck.

where the death of a wife or child, caused by wrongful act, is not instantaneous, the husband or father may recover for the loss of services and for medical and other expenses up to the time of death, without the aid of any statute;[3] but this doctrine has never been carried to the extent of holding that recovery might be had for mental suffering of the father or husband, or the deceased, in such a case.[4]

The right of action to recover damages for death caused by wrongful act was first given in England by a statute known as Lord Campbell's Act;[5] and this statute has been, with various modifications, incorporated in the legislation, it is believed, of all the American states, and under these statutes and constitutional provisions, whenever the death of any person is caused by any wrongful act or neglect, the party who would have been liable if death had not ensued is liable to an action for damages,

In Higgins v. Butcher, Yelv. 89, 90, the court, by Tanfield, J., said: "If a man beats the servant of J. S. so that he dies of that battery, the master shall not have an action against the other for the battery, and loss of service because the servant dying of the extremity of the battery, it is now become an offence to the crown, being converted into felony, and that drowns the particular offence, and private wrong offered to the master before, and his action is thereby lost."

See 15 Cent. Dig. tit. "Death," § 10.

The reason which led the courts at common law to refuse damages to a member of a family for the death of the family head or the family support was because the injury which resulted from the death of the member of the state was regarded as the public injury, that is, the injury to the state itself; that the justice to be satisfied was the public justice. notwithstanding the death of the party injured, even though the act be felonious.[6]

b. Constitutionality and Interpretation of Statutes. Where statutes giving a right of action for damages for death by wrongful act have been assailed on constitutional grounds, they have usually been upheld;[7] although particular statutes have been declared to be unconstitutional on the ground of their being class legislation, or for other objectionable provisions contained therein.[8] Statutes giving a right of action for damages for the death of a person caused by the wrongful act or default of another are generally held to be remedial and not penal in their nature, and therefore to be liberally interpreted.[9]

Proceedings by indictment.— Under the Maine statute, providing that an indictment of railroad corporations for the negligent killing of any person, and the forfeiture on conviction of a sum of not more than five thousand dollars, nor less than five hundred dollars, to the use of his widow, children, etc., it has been held that the same rules of evidence and the same principles of law should be applied as in analogous civil actions for

3. Conditions Precedent[10] — a. Action Must Have Been Maintainable by Deceased. Under Lord Campbell's Act, and statutes framed thereon, the personal representative of the deceased can only maintain an action where, had the deceased survived, he himself at common law could have maintained such action.[11]

b. Notice of Claim. In some jurisdictions the statute provides, as a condition precedent to a right of action for the death of a person by wrongful act, that notice shall be given of the time, place, and cause of the injury to the party sought to be charged therefor, by the administrator or heir of the deceased within a specified period.[12]

c. Criminal Prosecution. Again in some jurisdictions, by statute, where the injury amounts to a felony, the person injured must concurrently with or previous to his action for damages for death by wrongful act prosecute defendant therefor, or allege a good excuse for failure to so prosecute.[13]

4. What Law Governs — a. General Rule. Under the various statutes permitting a recovery for death by wrongful act, the question has frequently arisen in the American courts whether, in the case where the death of a human being control as to the right of action, while all matters pertaining merely to the remedy will be governed by the lex fori.[16]

b. Death on High Seas. Where the statute of a state causes a survival to the next of kin of the right of action for damages for death wrongfully caused, such statute can have no application to a case where the death was caused outside the jurisdiction of such state and on the high seas.[17] However, by the weight of modern authority, the state laws follow the domestic vessel upon the high seas until she comes within another jurisdiction, and therefore an action will lie, under a statute of that state, for a death caused by negligence on board a vessel whose home port is in that state, even though upon the high seas, without the jurisdiction of any other sovereignty;[18] and therefore if the laws of the place where such negligent killing occurred give a right of action therefor it may be enforced in the courts of that state by an administrator there appointed.[19]

5. Grounds of Action — a. Creation of New Cause of Action. In many jurisdictions, under statutes providing that whenever death shall be caused by wrongful act, such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action, the persons who would have been liable had death not ensued shall be liable notwithstanding such death, and designating the beneficiaries, it is held that such action is not a survival of the former right of action, but that a new cause of action arises, since there is an element in it, in addition to that which constituted the cause of action in favor of the person injured; namely, death must ensue as a consequence of the injury, and also because only the damages which ensue from the death are recoverable;[20] and under these statutes, creating a new cause of action in favor of designated beneficiaries, the right of action thereunder is not affected by the fact that the deceased is instantaneously killed.[21] Often, however, the statutes, unlike Lord Campbell's Act and the statutes modeled upon it, do not create a new cause of action for the death, but are survival statutes under which the personal representatives of the deceased may bring an action to recover damages for the injury which caused the death, in cases where the party injured was entitled to bring such action, but died before

Where conscious suffering precedes death. — It was held in Massachusetts that where the decedent, an employee, while descending from a car which was traveling at about four miles an hour, fell and caught his feet in the car and was carried about one hundred and eighty feet and was then instantly killed, there could be no recovery under the Employers' Liability Act, allowing recovery by such persons where an employee was instantly killed, or died without conscious suffering, as the result of the employer's negligence, since defendant's death could not be said to be without conscious suffering. Martin v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 175 Mass. 502, 56 N. E. 719.

exercising such right.[22] And in several jurisdictions, under the peculiar wording of the statute, the personal representative can only recover such damages as the deceased suffered up to the time of his death, and hence no action can be maintained under such a statute where the death was instantaneous.[23]

b. Acts or Omissions For Which Recovery May Be Had — (i) General Rule. In most cases the question of the right to recover for the death of a person by wrongful act is merely a question of negligence, and is to be governed by the same principles and considerations as questions of negligence where the results are less serious.[24]

(ii) Ordinary Neglect or Omission. Where the statute gives a right of action for death caused by wrongful act, by reason of the negligence, unskilfulness, or default of defendant or his agent, recovery may be had for ordinary negligence or carelessness.[25]

See also Showers v. Yeancy, 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 69.

(iii) Wilful Neglect. Under a statute giving a right of action for death by wrongful act, where the killing is wilful, wilful neglect of defendant or his agent must be shown in order to maintain the action.[26]

(iv) Unlawful Homicide. Under a statute giving designated persons a right of action for the unlawful, wilful homicide of a person, such action may be maintained where such homicide amounts to murder or only voluntary manslaughter.[27] Where, however, the homicide is either justifiable or excusable, no cause of action for damages will arise under such a statute.[28] Under a statute of this nature, defendant is liable in an action for damages, although he may also be liable to criminal prosecution.[29]

c. Proximate Cause. The wrongful act, neglect, or default must have been the proximate cause of death in order to give a right of action therefor, but such act, neglect, or default is the proximate cause of death within the rule if it inflicts a fatal injury, although the death that would have resulted therefrom is hastened

Passive neglect.— It has been held under the Rhode Island statute, giving a right of action where death ensues for an "injury inflicted by the wrongful act of another," that such action cannot be maintained against one charged only with passive neglect or a mere omission of duty. Myette v. Gross, 18 R. I. 729, 30 Atl. 602; Bradbury v. Furlong, 13 R. I. 15, 43 Am. Rep. 1. Under the Texas statute, providing that an action for death may be brought where the death is caused by the negligence or carelessness of the proprietor or owner of any railroad, or by the unfitness, negligence, or carelessness of his servants or agents, it was held that the recovery under this act was not limited to a death resulting from the railroad's operation of its road in its capacity as a carrier only, but extended to a death resulting from the negligence of a servant of the railroad company employed to nurse a smallpox camp in connection with a hospital maintained by the railroad as a part of the legal department. Unfitness of employee.—Under a Massachusetts statute, giving a right of action against a railway company for the death of a passenger if such death is caused through the unfitness of an employee, it has been held that the fact that the death of an aged passenger was caused by the conductor's negligence in starting the car too soon, while he was getting into the car, was not alone sufficient evidence of the employee's unfitness to justify a recovery under the statute. See also Chiles v. Drake, 2 Metc. (Ky.) 146, 74 Am. Dec. 406.

Where killing was intentional.— It was held in Spring v. Glenn, 12 Busn (Ky.) 172, under a statute giving a right of action against one by whose "wilful neglect" another is killed, that such statute did not authorize a suit by a personal representative of one killed intentionally; that the element of negligence must enter into the act of killing. See also Winnegar v. Central Pass. R. Co., 85 Ky. 547, 4 S. W. 237, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 156 (holding that under the Kentucky statute, giving to an administrator the right of action for the death of his intestate, when caused by the neglect of servants or agents of a corporation, an action cannot be maintained against a railroad company for the death of a passenger caused by an employee wilfully assaulting him and throwing him off the car); Morgan v. Thompson, 82 Ky. 383, 6 Ky. Wilful neglect defined.— "Wilful neglect," within the meaning of Ky. Gen. St. c. 57, § 3, making persons or corporations liable in an action, by the widow or personal representative, for punitive damages for loss of life through their "wilful neglect," or that of their agents or servants, has been defined to be intentional neglect or recklessness evidencing an intent to injure. S. 249, 252, 26 L. ed. 1070 (where a person was so injured in a railroad collision that he subsequently became deranged and eight months afterward committed suicide, and the court held that the proximate cause of his death was his own act, and that no action would lie against the railroad company for negligently causing his death. Miller, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The argument is not sound which seeks to trace this immediate cause of the death through the previous stages of mental aberration, physical suffering, and eight months' disease, and medical treatment to the original accident on the railroad. Such a course of possible or even logical argument would lead back to that 'great first cause least understood' in which the train of all causation ends. . . . His insanity, as the cause of final destruction, was as little the natural or probable result of the negligence of the railway officials, as his suicide, and each of these are casual or unexpected causes, intervening between the act which injured him, and his death"); The Onoko, 100 Fed. 477.

Proximate cause defined.— In Seifter v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 169 N. Y. 254, 258, 62 N. E. 349, the court, by Parker, C. J., said: "It will be well to have in mind the rule upon that subject as it was last expressed by this court in Laidlaw v. Sage, 158 N. Y. 73, 52 N. E. 679, 688, 44 L. R. A. 216: 'A proximate cause is one in which is involved the idea of necessity. It is one the connection between which and the effect is plain and intelligible; it is one which can be used as a term by which a proposition can be demonstrated, that is, one which can be reasoned from conclusively. A remote cause is one which is inconclusive in reasoning, because from it no certain conclusion can be legitimately drawn. In other words, a remote cause is a cause the connection between which and the effect is uncertain, vague or indeterminate. . . . The proximate cause being given, the effect must follow.'"

Two or more concurrent causes.— To attribute death to two or more concurrent causes, each must be a prominent, efficient cause; for if one of the alleged causes operates slightly with another, which is a prominent, efficient cause, then the proximate cause of death should be traced to the latter. Ellyson v. International, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 75 S. W. 868.

shall deem a fair and just compensation with reference to pecuniary injury resulting from the death to such beneficiaries, some pecuniary loss must have resulted to the beneficiaries named in the statute in order to entitle them to maintain the action,[31] although according to the better rule it need not be shown that such beneficiaries had a legal claim on the deceased for support.[32] Under some statutes, however, giving a right of action for death by wrongful act to persons who were dependent upon deceased for support, it has been held that there can be no recovery by such next of kin where no legal obligation rested upon decedent to support them.[33]

35. Death without conscious suffering.— In some jurisdictions, by express statutory provision, in case of an employee's death, without conscious suffering, caused by the negligence of a co-employee, an action can be maintained against the employer in the name of the widow or dependent next of kin, and of course under these statutes such defense is bad. Conley v. Portland Gaslight Co., 96 Me. 281, 52 Atl. 656; Sawyer v. Perry, 88 Me. 42, 33 Atl. 660 (differentiating the terms "immediate and instantaneous," as used in the Maine statute, permitting recovery for immediate death resulting from injuries received by wrongful act of another, and holding that the statute does not require the death to be instantaneous); Martin v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 175 Mass. 502, 56 N. E. 719 (holding, however, that in order to maintain an action under this statute, it is essential that death should have occurred without conscious suffering); Welch v. Grace, 167 Mass. 590, 46 N. E. 387; Clark v. New York, etc., R. Co., 160 Mass. 39, 35 N. Gross negligence.—It has been held in Kentucky that the implied undertaking of employees in the same service to risk the contingencies which the ordinary skill and care of each, in his line of service, could not avert, does not exonerate the master from liability for death resulting to one of such fellow servants from the gross negligence of another.

b. Contributory Negligence — (I) Of Deceased — (A) General Rule. The principle is well settled that if the negligence of the deceased contributed proximately to the injury causing his death no action can be maintained under a statute giving a right of action for death by wrongful act, because he himself could not have brought such an action had the injury not proved fatal.[37] Under some statutes, however, it has been held that contributory negligence of the deceased is no defense to an action for death by wrongful act, although it may go in mitigation of damages.[38]

Contributory negligence indirect cause of death.— It has been held in Missouri that where the evidence showed that the deceased only remotely contributed to the accident, and that the agents and employees of defendant were the direct and immediate cause, and might have prevented it by the exercise of prudence and care, defendant was liable. Artenberry v.

(II) Of Beneficiary. The rule is well recognized that where the injury causing the death of the deceased is due to the contributory negligence of a beneficiary under the statute, there can be no recovery by such beneficiary.[40] However, under statutes giving the right of action to the personal representative of the deceased, it has been held that contributory negligence on the part of the beneficiary is not a defense to an action by such personal representative.[41]

c. Release or Accord and Satisfaction[42] — (I) By Decedent — (A) General Rule. Upon the question as to whether a release, executed by the deceased for the injury received by him, will continue a bar to an action by his representative or heirs for his death, there is considerable conflict of authority. However, the better rule is that where the party injured has compromised for the injury and accepted satisfaction previous to his death, there can be no further right of action, and consequently no suit under the statute, unless it be shown that such compromise or release was procured by fraud or duress.[43]

(B) By Contract. It has been held in some jurisdictions that the value of the interest of beneficiaries in the life of the decedent given by statute, and the amount they may recover for his death caused through negligence of another, cannot be affected by any contract made by him in his lifetime, nor will the acceptance of money in pursuance of such contract, nor the execution of a release of liability by one of such beneficiaries affect the administrator's right of action on behalf of the other beneficiaries.[44]

(II) By Beneficiaries. By decided weight of authority, a release to the person liable, by those entitled to the amount recoverable for death caused by wrongful act, is a bar to a subsequent action brought by the personal representative or the beneficiaries of the decedent.[45] However, where a release has been executed by one of the beneficiaries without the consent of the others, as for instance by the widow without the concurrence of the children or next of kin, it has been held that such release will not be a bar to an action by such other beneficiaries, or by the personal representative of the deceased in their behalf.[46]

d. Pendency of Other Actions.[47] Since the general rule is that an action for damages for an injury to the person of the plaintiff, in the absence of statute, abates by his death,[48] the pendency of such action cannot be pleaded in bar of an action, brought by his personal representative or beneficiaries designated under the statute, for his death resulting from such injury and caused by the wrongful act or omission of the defendant.[49] In some jurisdictions, however, it has been held that the right of action given by statute to an administrator to sue for his intestate's loss of life, for the benefit of the widow and children, is independent of his right to sue for damages suffered by the intestate during his lifetime from the injury which caused his death, and that both actions may proceed at the same time.[50]

e. Former Recovery[51]—(i) By or on Behalf of Decedent. While the authorities are by no means unanimous upon the point,[52] the better doctrine seems to be that where one in his lifetime recovers damages for personal injuries caused by negligence, and death subsequently results therefrom, his personal representatives or beneficiaries designated under statute are barred from recovery under a statute giving them a right of action for death by wrongful act.[53] Likewise, where the plaintiff, in an action for personal injuries, dies from such injuries pending the action, and his administrator recovers judgment therein, such judgment is a bar to an action by the administrator or the beneficiaries for the death by wrongful act.[54]

(ii) By One of Several Beneficiaries. The prevailing rule is that, although a right of action for death by wrongful act may by statute be given to several different persons, or to the same persons in several different rights, there is but one cause of action, and there can be but one recovery for such death.[55]

f. Self-Defense. The rule applied in criminal cases as to the right to protect life may be invoked with equal force in a civil action for damages resulting from death, and homicide is justifiable when committed on a person in the lawful defense of himself or of his wife and children.[56]

7. Abatement or Survival[57] — a. On Death of Plaintiff or Beneficiary. The better doctrine seems to be that where the beneficiary dies in whose name an action is pending for death by wrongful act, the action cannot be revived for the benefit of the surviving next of kin or for the estate of such beneficiary.[58] In some jurisdictions, however, by statutory provision, a right of action given to a designated beneficiary survives to his personal representatives or heirs.[59]

b. On Death of Defendant. The better rule seems to be that where a statute gives a right of action for death by wrongful act, such action abates upon the death of defendant therein.[60] In several cases, however, it has been held that an

8. PARTIES[62] — a. Plaintiffs — (i) IN GENERAL. Since the right of action for death by wrongful act is purely statutory, such action must be brought by the person who is designated in the statute.[63] However, any one of the parties to whom the statute gives a right of action is entitled to maintain such action for the benefit of all the beneficiaries designated therein.[64]

(ii) NECESSARY PARTIES. Under some statutes, where only one right of action is given against the person or corporation whose wrongful act, neglect, or default causes the death of another, where one of the beneficiaries designated in the statute brings such action, all the other beneficiaries designated therein are necessary parties plaintiff.[65] In other cases, however, it has been held that where an action is brought by one of the beneficiaries designated in the statute, it is not necessary to join the other beneficiaries as parties plaintiff.[66]

Former rule in Georgia.— Under a former statute in Georgia providing that the widow, or if no widow, the child or children, might recover for the homicide of a husband or parent, it was held that the right to recover damages for such homicide was limited to the widow or children and did not extend to the personal representative. Miller v. Southwestern R. Co., 55 Ga. 143.

In the absence of father, mother, or guardian, an administrator of a child may bring an action for the death of the child by wrongful act, under the Indiana statute, although section 27 thereof provides that the action for the death of a child must be brought by the father, the mother, or the guardian. Letters of administration.— Where an indictment, under the Maine statute against a city for the loss of a life by defect in a highway, describes the deceased person as late of B, in the county of P, the right of his administrator to prosecute the indictment may be proved by letters of administration granted by probate court of another county. State v. Bangor, 30 Me. 341.

Suit for death of minor.— It has been held under an Indiana statute, giving parents the right of action for the negligent injury or killing of a child, that unless a minor has been emancipated by his parents, the father cannot, instead of suing as such for the death of the minor, sue as the minor's administrator, under section 284, giving the personal representative of one killed by the wrongful a resident of another state may maintain an action for the death of his intestate by wrongful act in the state where such wrongful death occurred.[68]

(B) Widow. In some jurisdictions the statutes give the right of action for death by wrongful act primarily to the widow of the deceased.[69] Under some statutes, however, while the action is brought solely for the benefit of the widow, or the widow and next of kin, yet the widow cannot maintain such action in her own name; it must be brought in the name of the personal representative of the decedent for the widow's benefit.[70]

(C) Heirs and Next of Kin. Some of the statutes give a right of action to the heirs at law or next of kin of the deceased, for death by wrongful act, in act of another the right to sue therefor. Berry v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 128 Ind. 484, 28 N. E. 182; Mayhew v. Burns, 103 Ind. 328, 2 N. E. 793.

case there are no personal representatives of such deceased,[71] while under other statutes such right of action is given to the widow, heir, or personal representative.[72]

(D) Parents. In construing statutes giving a right of action for death by wrongful act, many of the courts limit the right to bring such action to the persons expressly authorized in the statute, and hold that where the parents are not specifically designated in the statute, they cannot bring the action in their own names, even where the recovery is for their own benefit.[73] In other jurisdictions, however, statutes specifically provide for the maintenance of an action by the parents for the death of their child caused by wrongful act,[74] some of the statutes being construed to give the right of action to the spouse having the custody of the child, where the parents have been divorced, or one has deserted the other.[75]

(E) Aliens.[76] The general rule seems to be that a right of action given by statute to certain designated persons, for death caused by wrongful act, may be brought by an alien who otherwise comes within the statutory designation.[77]

(iv) What Law Governs. In some jurisdictions, by construction of the statute, foreign administrators and executors are permitted to prosecute actions for death by wrongful act wherever such actions might be prosecuted by a personal representative appointed in the jurisdiction.[78] The better rule, however, seems to be that the question of who may sue, being a matter of right and not of remedy merely, the question as to the proper party to bring an action in the courts of a state to recover for death occurring in another state depends solely on the statutes of the latter state, and must be prosecuted by the person or persons designated in such statutes.[79]

b. Defendants. Under statutes giving a right of action against any person, company, or corporation, their agents or servants, for the wrongful death of another, it is proper to join any two of such persons as parties defendant in an action for death.[80]

9. BENEFICIARIES — a. In General. By a great weight of authority, where a statute gives a right of action for death by wrongful act, if no such persons or class of persons exist as are specified in the statute as the beneficiaries of the recovery the action cannot be maintained.[81] Thus it has been held that a statute giving the widow a right of action to recover for the death of her husband does not confer a like right on the husband for the death of the wife;[82] and it has

Collateral kin.— It has been held in Illinois that to entitle an administrator to sue for the wrongful death of his intestate, it is not necessary that the deceased should have left a surviving wife and children entitled to be supported by him, or that his parents should have the legal right to his services by reason of his being a minor. W. 458, holding that under a statute providing that damages recovered for negligence causing death shall be paid to the husband or widow of deceased, or if no husband or widow survive, such damages shall be paid over to the lineal descendants of deceased, where deceased leaves a widow, the damages sustained by her alone are all that can be recovered. See, however, St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Henson, 58 Fed. 531, 7 C. C. A. 349.

A wife by common-law marriage, and the issue of such marriage, may recover damages for the death of the husband as though been held, under a statute giving a right of action to the next of kin of the deceased, that a husband is not next of kin to his wife, within the meaning of the statute.[83] In some jurisdictions the father has no cause of action for the death of his child in case the mother survives, or where he is not dependent or partially dependent upon such child for support.[84]

b. Children[85] — (i) In General. Under statutes giving a right of action for the benefit of the children of the deceased, it has been held that grandchildren are not included within the purview of the statute, and that no recovery can be had for their benefit;[86] although it has been held that posthumous children are included, and a recovery may be had for their benefit.[87] Where the statute gives a right of action for the benefit of the heir or heirs of the deceased, it has been held that the words "heir or heirs" mean child or children, and limits the right of action to lineal descendants of deceased.[88]

(11) Illegitimate Children. It is a well-recognized rule of construction that prima facie the word "child" or "children," when used in a statute, means legitimate child or children, and that bastards are not within the meaning of the term, and therefore where parents are given a right of action for the death of a child such action cannot be maintained by a parent for the death of a bastard.[89]

c. Decedent's Estate. Where, however, the statute gives the personal representative of the deceased a right of action generally, or for the benefit of his estate, such action will lie where decedent left neither widow, children, nor next of kin.[90]

10. Persons Liable. The doctrine seems to be well-nigh universally recognized that where a statute gives a right of action for death by wrongful act, a person or corporation is liable for its torts, and those of agents or servants, resulting in the death of another.[91] In one jurisdiction, however, it is held that a support defendant had not contributed, it was held that the administrator was not entitled to any damages whatever.

Married children.— Under the Texas statute, a daughter, although married, can recover for the death of her father, it not being provided by the statute that as a condition precedent to recovery deceased must have been bound to contribute to the support of the beneficiaries designated. See 15 Cent. Dig. tit. "Death," § 49.

Action against steamboat.— It has been held under the Minnesota statute, providing that any person having a demand against a vessel for injuries done by it, instead of proceeding "against the master, owner, agent, or consignee," may institute suit against such vessel by name, and the statute giving a right of action for wrongful act causing death, such action may be maintained against the steamboat by name. Boutiller v. The Milwaukee, 8 Minn. 97.

Acts or omissions of agents.— It has been held under the Texas statute, giving cause of action for death when death is caused by the "wrongful act, negligence, unskillfulness, or default of another," a person is not liable for the acts or omissions of his agents or employees causing death, but death must result from his own immediate act. Cole v. Parker, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 563, 66 S. W. 135.

Express company.— It has been held under the Texas statute, giving an action for death caused by the negligence of the proprietor, owner, charterer, or hirer of any railroad or other vehicle for the conveyance of goods or passengers, no action will lie against an express company which under contract had a particular car or part of a car of a train exclusively controlled by a railroad. Prisoner killed by mob.—It was held under the Indiana statute that the legal representative of a prisoner who was murdered by a mob might maintain an action on the bond of the sheriff, in whose custody the deceased was at the time, for a failure of the sheriff to perform his official duty in protecting his prisoner. Indiana v. Gobin, 94 Fed. 48.

Receiver of private corporation.— It has been held under the Texas statute that an action cannot be maintained against the receiver of a private corporation for death caused by the negligence of the agents or employees of such corporation. Parker v. Dupree, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 341, 67 S. W. 185.

The person aiding or abetting the wrongful act is under the Missouri statute equally liable in damages with the person who actually perpetrates it, where death ensues from such wrongful act. Gray v. McDonald, 104 Mo. 303, 16 S. W. 398 [affirming 28 Mo. App. 477].

Where killing was wilful or malicious.— Where plaintiff's intestate was shot and killed by an agent of defendant, while the latter two were endeavoring, under claim of right, to enter upon the premises of the deceased, if there was no evidence that the fatal shot was fired by the express direction or assent of defendant, it was held that defendant was not liable in an action for causing the death of the intestate. Death caused from neglect of sanitary precautions on the part of public authorities in the construction and maintenance of a sewer system has been held in New York not to come within the purview of the statute permitting actions for damages by reason of death caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, where such action is attempted to be brought against the city by the representatives of one who died from disease superindueed by such sanitary neglect. Hughes v. Auburn, 161 N. Y. 96, 55 N. E. 389, 46 L. R. A. 636 [reversing 21 N. Y. App. Div. 311, 47 N. Y. Suppl. 235].

Action against state of New York.— It was held in Bowen v. State, 108 N. Y. 166, 15 N. E. 56, that the fact that a special statute, giving the personal representatives a right of action for the death of the decedent by wrongful act, omits to include actions against the state does not affect the right of an administratrix to proceed before the board of claims to recover damages for the drowning of her husband in a canal, the state assuming, under Laws (1870), c. 321, the same measure of liability incurred by individuals and corporations engaged in similar enterprises.

Action against township.— It was held in Merkle v. Bennington Tp., 58 Mich. 156, 24 N. W. 776, 55 Am. Rep. 666, that the Michigan statute, giving a right of action for a fatal injury, although in derogation of the common law, is a remedial statute, and establishes a general rule which applies as well to townships as to other defendants, even though at the time of its adoption townships were not liable for such injuries, but became so afterward. See also Davis v. Rumney, 66 N. H. 331, 29 Atl. 542, to the same effect.

C. Limitation of Actions[96] — 1. General Rule. Where the statute giving a right of action for death by wrongful act limits the time within which such action must be brought to a certain designated period, and contains no saving clause, an action sought to be brought after the expiration of such period is barred, and no excuse will be recognized for such delay.[97]

2. When Statute Begins to Run — a. General Rule. The better rule seems to be that the statute of limitations begins to run against the statutory right of action for death by wrongful act only from the time that such death occurs,[98]

although that event may take place long after the time of the infliction of the injury causing such death. This rule has been applied, under statutes creating no saving clause for the benefit of parties under disability, to the case of infants, and they are barred from their right of action unless the same is brought within the prescribed statutory period.[99]

b. Modification of Rule. In some jurisdictions, however, it has been held that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against a cause of action for death by wrongful act until after an executor has qualified or an administrator has been appointed.[1]

3. What Law Governs. In an action for death by wrongful act occurring in another state the statute of limitations of the forum governs, unless the statute giving the right of action in such other state itself prescribes a limitation, in which case such limitation will govern, as the period during which the action must be brought relates to and qualifies the right itself instead of affecting the remedy.[2]

D. Pleading[3] — 1. Declaration, Complaint, or Petition — a. Necessary Allegations — (I) In General. In statutory actions for damages for death by wrongful act, the plaintiff must bring himself strictly within the statutory requirements necessary to confer the right, and this must appear by proper allegations in the declaration or complaint.[4]

Defect in machinery.— In an action for death caused by defect in machinery, where the nature of the defect is peculiarly within defendant's knowledge, the declaration is sufficient where it points out its general character. Willey v. Boston Electric Light Co., 168 Mass. 40, 46 N. E. 395, 37 L. R. A. 723.

Gross negligence.— In an action under the Massachusetts statute, making a company liable for death occasioned by the "gross negligence" of its servants, it was held that a complaint was fatally defective if it failed to allege that the negligence of defendant's servants which caused the death was "gross." Hicks v. New York, etc., R. Co., 164 Mass. 424, 41 N. E. 721, 49 Am. St. Rep. 471.

Negativing self-defense.— Under a Kentucky statute, which provides "that the widow and minor child or children . . . of a person killed by the careless or wanton or malicious use of fire-arms, or other deadly weapons, not in self-defense, may have an action against the person or persons who committed the killing, . . . for reparation of the injury, and in such action the jury may give vindictive damages," the declaration need not allege that the killing was not in self-defense. Becker v. Crow, 7 Bush (Ky.) 198, 201.

Surplusage.— In an action under the Kentucky statute, giving compensatory damages only to personal representatives for death caused by negligence, it was held that an allegation in a complaint of wilful negligence might be disregarded as surplusage. Morris v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 12 S. W. 940, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 698.

action it is necessary that the declaration or complaint shall aver that there are persons in existence answering such description and entitled to the damages.[7] Where the statute gives a right of action in favor of a designated class of beneficiaries, provided there are none of a certain other designated class of beneficiaries in existence, the failure to aver in the declaration or complaint the non-existence of any of such latter class is fatal on demurrer.[8]

(B) Names of Beneficiaries. Under some statutes it has been held that it is not only necessary to allege the existence of the beneficiaries designated in the statute, but also to give the names of all such beneficiaries entitled to share in the recovery.[9]

Injury to business of decedent.— It has been held in Ohio that in an action for damages for death by wrongful act, in the absence of any special averment, no recovery can be had for any injury to the business of decedent, and recovery can only be had for the general value of the life of the individual, growing out of the situation of those who are dependent on him. McClardy v. Chandler, 3 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 1, 2 Wkly. L. Gaz. 1.

Medical and funeral expenses.—It has been held in Minnesota that in an action for death by wrongful act, in order to recover for the support of deceased and funeral expenses, under the Minnesota statute (Gen. St. (1878) c. 77, § 2, as amended by Laws (1891), c. 123), the amount thereof must be alleged in the complaint. Sykora v. J. I. Case Threshing-Mach. Co., 59 Minn. 130, 60 N. W. 1008.

Special damages.— It has been held in

(B) Application of Rule. In some jurisdictions the rule is laid down that it is necessary to aver in the declaration or complaint a loss of means of support where, from the relation of the survivors of the deceased to him, the law would not presume that from his death such survivors had been deprived of their means of support.[13] And under some statutes, where the only right of action given a parent for the negligent killing of a minor child is for the loss of services of such child, it has been held that a declaration which fails to allege such loss of services is fatally defective.[14]

(C) Modification of Rule. Under statutes giving the damages recovered to the next of kin of the deceased, it has been held that it is not necessary that the declaration or complaint should contain a special allegation showing the manner in which the next of kin had sustained pecuniary loss,[15] the intention of the statute clearly being not to limit the damages to those persons who sustained loss.

(VII) Negativing Contributory Negligence. In a majority of jurisdictions an allegation as to the absence of contributory negligence on the part of the Texas that while, in an action for death of plaintiff's wife, damages for loss of her services generally may be recovered as general damages, yet where her services are not such as are usually performed by a wife, or are of peculiar value to him in his trade or profession, they should be pleaded and proved. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Younger, (Civ. App. 1897) 40 S. W. 423.

Where both actual and exemplary damages for causing death are sought, the allegation should be in the nature of two distinct counts on different causes of action (Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Le Gierse, 51 Tex. 189); and where a party claims exemplary damages, he must set up, by proper averments in his petition, the facts which if true entitle him to such damages (Campbell v. Houston, etc., R. Co., 2 Tex. Unrep. Cas. 473).

13. Loss of support.— Union Pac. R. Co. v. Roeser, (Nebr. 1903) 95 N. W. 68 (holding that in an action for wrongful death a petition is not demurrable because it alleges a contract to support the next of kin, made by deceased in his lifetime, without alleging that the estate of deceased was insufficient for that purpose); Chicago, etc., R. Expenses resulting from wrongful death.— It has been held in New York that in an action to recover for expenses resulting from deceased is unnecessary.[16] In several jurisdictions, however, where allegations of absence of contributory negligence are held to be essential in all actions for personal injuries, the absence of such allegations will render the declaration or complaint demurrable.[17]

(VIII) Statute Creating Right of Action. The general rule is that it is not necessary, in the declaration, complaint, or petition, to set forth or refer to the statute of the forum under which the action is brought, where facts sufficient are pleaded to bring the case within the statute.[18] Where, however, the action is based upon a foreign statute, the existence of such statute and its similarity to the statute of the forum must be alleged and proved.[19]

(IX) Compliance With Statute as to Limitation of Action. The better rule seems to be that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to allege in the declara-wrongful death, an omission to state that they were necessary and reasonable will not vitiate the complaint on demurrer. Roeder v. Ormsby, 22 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 270.

tion or complaint that the action was brought within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations.[20]

b. Amendment — (i) In General. Where the declaration or complaint states a good cause of action,[21] it is proper for the court to allow an amendment thereto in order that the pleadings may conform to the evidence, or to cure a formal defect;[22] but it is error to permit an amendment which sets up a new cause of action, or, where two causes of action are given, to allow a declaration or complaint, drawn under one statute, to be amended so as to bring it within the provisions of another statute.[23]

(ii) Bringing in New Parties. The declaration or complaint may be amended in order to add a new party plaintiff, where such amendment sets up no new matter or claim.[24]

2. Indictment. Under statutes imposing a fine or forfeiture upon a corporation for wrongfully causing death, and authorizing recovery therefor by indictment for the benefit of designated beneficiaries, the indictment should contain an allegation that there are in existence persons answering to such statutory designa-

Action barred by statute of limitations.— Where an action has been improperly commenced by a father, as such, to recover for the wrongful death of his son, and a demurrer has been filed, an amendment substituting the personal representative of the deceased as plaintiff will not be allowed, where the statutory period in which the new action by the representative could be brought has expired. Fitzhenry v. Consolidated Traction Co., 63 N. J. L. 142, 42 Atl. 416.

Nominal interest in cause of action.— It has been held in Texas that where an attorney performs services for a widow in the prosecution of an action for the wrongful death of her husband, the claim of such attorney for compensation is not such an interest in the cause of action as would ention.[25] Likewise the indictment should allege the negligence of defendant for which the fine or forfeiture is imposed by the statute,[26] and where the statute imposes a fine or penalty for gross negligence, it is insufficient to allege facts which would merely indicate ordinary negligence on the part of defendant or his agents.[27] It is not necessary, however, for the indictment to allege that the deceased was in the exercise of ordinary care, where it sets out the particular acts of negligence causing the death.[28]

3. Bill of Particulars. In some jurisdictions, by statutory provision, a bill of particulars must be furnished when demanded by defendant.[29]

4. Plea or Answer.[30] Pleading the general issue puts in issue the fact of there being a widow or next of kin surviving, as well as the commission of the act complained of.[31] Where the complaint is in the name of the plaintiff as administrator, defendant, by pleading the general issue, admits the capacity in which the plaintiff sues.[32] The question of the due commencement of an action, under a statute giving the right of action for death by wrongful act, is properly raised by a plea in bar.[33] By demurring and omitting to deny the facts defendant admits the existence of sufficient negligence to give a right to recover under the statute.[34]

The fact of the appointment of an administrator may be challenged by defendant in a plea ne unques administrator. Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Woodward, 4 Colo. 1.

Unverified denial.— It was held in Kansas, in an action by a widow to recover for the death of her husband, who was a resident of the state, that an allegation that no personal representative of the estate had been appointed was put in issue by the unverified denial, and without proof of such fact a demurrer to the evidence was rightfully sustained; the court holding that such right to sue not being "an appointment" or "an authority" within Kan. Code Civ. Proc. § 108, providing that an allegation of any appointment or authority, duly verified, shall be taken as true, unless the denial of the same be verified by the affidavit of the adverse party. 33. County v. Pacific Coast Borax Co., 67 N. J. L. 48, 50 Atl. 906.

34. Hence in an action for death by wrongful act, where, after a demurrer has been interposed and overruled, the court on a hearing on the merits finds as a fact that defendants are not guilty of negligence, plaintiff is nevertheless entitled to recover the minimum

5. Issues, Proof, and Variance. The rule is elementary that whatever it is indispensable to allege in order to entitle a party to recover must be proved upon the trial unless admitted by defendant, and it must be proved substantially as alleged.[35] Any material variance between the declaration or complaint and the proof will be fatal to the action;[36] but where the variance between the allegations and the proof is immaterial it will be disregarded.[37] An issue should not be submitted to the jury unless there is some evidence to support it.[38]

E. Evidence[39] — 1. Presumptions and Burden of Proof — a. Presumptions — (I) As to Family Relationship. In an action by a parent for the death of a child by wrongful act, where the child is under age the law presumes the family relation to exist, and that stands for proof until the contrary appears; but where the deceased child is over age, the family relation must be shown to exist in point of fact, and is to be proved by evidence like any other fact.[40]

(II) As to Pecuniary Loss. The general rule is that where the relation of husband and wife or parent and child exists, provided the child is shown to be a minor, the law presumes a pecuniary loss to the survivor from the fact of death, and it is not necessary to submit proof as to such loss.[41] However, under some statutes there must be some proof of pecuniary loss to the beneficiary conforming to such allegation in the declaration or complaint, in order to justify recovery of even nominal damages.[42]

b. Burden of Proof — (I) Of Defendant's Negligence. The burden is upon the plaintiff in the first instance to prove that decedent's death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of defendant or his agents or servants.[43] Likewise where the contributory neglect of deceased is established the burden of proof is upon plaintiff to show that the injury could have been avoided by ordinary care on the part of defendant, and that it was due to the wilful or reckless neglect of defendant.[44]

(II) Of Decedent's Contributory Negligence. Where plaintiff by proper proof makes out a prima facie case of negligence, and does not disclose contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, the better rule seems to be that it is a presumption of law that the deceased, killed by the negligence of defendant, exercised due care, and was not guilty of contributory negligence, and the burden is upon defendant to show such negligence on the part of the deceased.[45] In some jurisdictions, however, the rule is that the burden of proof is upon plaintiff to show that deceased was using ordinary care when he was killed by the alleged negligence of defendant.[46]

2. ADMISSIBILITY — a. In General. Where the object of a statute is to give only such pecuniary damages as the designated beneficiaries have suffered by the loss of the person killed, it is usual to permit the evidence to take a wide range[47] in order to give the jury the fullest insight into the circumstances of such beneficiaries to determine to what extent they are injured by the loss.

b. Cause of Death. The general rule is that the question as to the cause of death is one of evidence, which is admissible under the general issue in an action for death by wrongful act.[48] The result of a post-mortem examination of deceased is competent evidence to prove the cause of such death,[49] although it has been held that the verdict of a coroner's jury which investigated such death was inadmissible to show the cause of death.[50]

Expert testimony.— It has been held in South Carolina that it is not error to permit a physician to give his opinion, founded on the testimony of others, that deceased was dead before the accident occurred. State v.

c. Condition of Body. There being no controversy as to the fact or manner of death, it has been held that evidence as to the condition of the body of the deceased, when found after the accident, is inadmissible;[51] but where defendant has by general denial put in issue every fact, it is not error to admit evidence as to the appearance and condition of the body of the deceased tending to throw light upon the cause of the accident.[52]

d. Declarations of Deceased — (i) General Rule. By the great weight of authority the declarations of a person fatally injured by acts or omissions of another, as to the facts or circumstances attending the injury, are not admissible in evidence against defendant in a civil suit brought to recover damages for death by wrongful act.[53] However, such declarations have been held to be admissible Declaration as to character of sufferings.— It was held in Gray v. McLaughlin, 26 Iowa 279, that in an action for damages for injuries received by plaintiff's intestate, her declarations as to the nature and character of her sufferings, made while in that condition, were admissible. See also McKeigue v. Janesville, 68 Wis. 50, 31 N. See, however, Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 388, 47 Pac. 139, holding that declarations of deceased as to his sufferings are admissible to show the extent of his injuries.

Declaration not affecting cause of death.— It was held in Disbrow v. Ulster Tp., (Pa. 1887) 8 Atl. 912, that in order to prove the value of decedent's life to his family, defendant might introduce in evidence declarations of deceased that he was tired of life, that his life had been a failure, and that his family was a failure.

in certain cases in actions of this character on the ground that they constituted a part of the res gestæ.[54]

(II) Against Interest. The rule seems to be well settled that self-disserving declarations of the deceased, made after the injury,[55] are admissible on behalf of defendant to show that the injury was not the cause of death,[56] or that the injury was caused by contributory negligence on the part of the deceased,[57] the reason being that the beneficiary is to be considered in privity with the deceased, in so far as his right to complain of the death is concerned.

e. Whether Death Was Instantaneous. It is within the discretion of the court to allow a medical expert to testify as to whether in his opinion deceased had a period of conscious suffering before death.[58]

f. Life Expectancy — (I) In General. Since the reasonable probability of the continuance of the life of the deceased is a factor in estimating the damages sustained by his death, evidence is admissible tending to show the probable duration of decedent's life, without being specially pleaded.[59] Likewise evidence is

55. Made before injury.— Where the death of plaintiff's intestate was caused by a displaced switch, and it appeared that a few days before the accident defendant had inserted the switch in lieu of a patent switch, it was held proper on the question of negligence to admit against plaintiff declarations of his intestate, made before such removal, to the effect that the patent switch was unsafe, and that he wanted it taken out and one inserted similar to the one which caused the injury. Evidence in rebuttal.— It was held in Texas, in an action for death by wrongful act, that testimony that deceased proposed to work for witness for a certain sum was admissible to rebut plaintiff's evidence that the earnings of deceased were greater than said sum. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Harris, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 36 S. W. 776.

Where act is punitive in nature.— It has been held in Alabama that in an action under Code (1896), § 27, evidence of the age, physical and mental condition, earning capacity and occupation of deceased, and amount contributed by him to the support of those dependent on him, was properly rejected as irrelevant, since the act is not compensatory, but punitive in its nature. See 15 Cent. Dig. tit. "Death," § 88. See also Burns v. Ashboro, etc., R. Co., 125 N. C. 304, 34 S. E. 495, holding that where evidence had been introduced showing that deceased had occupied a more remunerative position than that which he filled at the time of his death, it is competent for defendant to show by cross-examination or direct proof that he was not competent to fill a better position than the one he occupied at the time of his death.

Decedent in line of promotion.— It was held in Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Ford, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 46 S. W. 77, that in an action for the death of a locomotive fireman, it might be shown that deceased was in the line of promotion to engineer, and that engineers received a certain fixed amount of wages.

Profits from temporary business or employment.— It was held in Read v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 32 N. Y. App. Div. 503, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 209, that evidence of profits of deceased from a temporary partnership, engaged in doing work under public contract secured by competitive bidding, involving the use of capital, where his part in the operations was not shown, was incompetent, being too speculative.

k. Value of Services Where Deceased Was a Minor. Likewise, in an action by parents to recover for the wrongful death of a minor child, evidence of the value of such child's services or of his capacity to render service is admissible for the purpose of enhancing the damages, although the recovery is not necessarily limited to the value of such services.[72]

l. Number and Condition of Persons Dependent on Deceased. Where the statute allows compensatory damages, the general rule seems to be that evidence is admissible to show the number and ages of the children of deceased and others immediately dependent upon him.[73]

Speculative opinion.— In an action for the death of a minor, where plaintiff's counsel asked witness, "What would the services of the deceased have been worth when he reached twenty-one years of age, if he had lived?" it was held that objection to such question was properly sustained, since the answer thereto would be purely speculative opinion based upon contingencies too remote and uncertain to furnish a basis for the measurement of damages. n. Pecuniary Condition of Defendant. The general rule is that where the pecuniary loss to the designated beneficiaries is made the sole measure of damages, evidence as to the pecuniary condition of defendant is inadmissible,[76] since the amount of defendant's property cannot in any manner increase or diminish the pecuniary loss or change the measure of damages.

3. Weight and Sufficiency — a. As to Cause of Death. In an action for death by wrongful act, the same evidence as to the cause of the injury is required as though the action were brought by the deceased for injuries which he survived, and the evidence to justify the court in submitting to the jury the question as to whether or not death was caused by the injury complained of should show the connection between the two with reasonable certainty, and not leave it to vague speculation or conjecture.[78]

b. As to Damages.[79] The general rule is that in order to authorize a recovery of damages for death by wrongful act, the evidence must show the extent and amount thereof or furnish facts and data as a basis from which the jury may approximate the proper amount with reasonable certainty.[80] However, where a foundation for the recovery of damages has been laid by the introduction of evidence tending to show the earning capacity of the deceased,[81] or the existence of persons who were dependent upon him for support,[82] it is not necessary to show

F. Damages[85] — 1. Nature of — a. Nominal Damages.[86] Where the statute expressly gives the right of action for death by wrongful act, the general rule in the United States is that at least nominal damages may be recovered.[87] And under statutes giving a right of action for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, where it is shown that such beneficiaries are in existence, the rule is that nominal damages may be recovered, although no actual or substantial loss to them be shown.[88] uniform rule for measuring the value of the life of the deceased to the designated beneficiaries is impossible. The elements which go to make up the value are personal to each case.[10]

b. Recovery For Benefit of Estate. Under some statutes the recovery is measured by the amount which would probably have been saved to decedent's estate if he had lived, taking into consideration his occupation, age, health, and habits as to industry, sobriety, and economy, the amount of his property, and the probable duration of his life.[11] However, no arbitrary rule can be laid down in regard to damages, since the elements which enter into the question of the value of a life to the estate of the deceased are so various that the matters must be left under proper instructions from the court to the sound discretion of the jury.[12]

10. All that can well be done is to allow the jury to take into consideration all the matters which go to make the life taken away of pecuniary value to the survivors, and limited by the amount named in the statute, where there is a statutory limitation, and award compensation therefor; and the damages awarded must depend very much on the good sense and sound judgment of the jury upon all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. That the jury may have proper data from which a pecuniary compensation may be fixed, it is proper to admit evidence of the age, probable duration of life, habits of industry, means, business, earnings, health, skill of the deceased, and reasonable future expectations; and perhaps there are other facts which would exert a just influence in determining the pecuniary damage sustained." Cost of maintaining.—It was held in Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Yarbrough, (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 73 S. W. 844, that an instruction as to the damages recoverable for the negligent death of plaintiff's minor son, which failed to state that the cost of the boy's "keep" should be deducted in estimating the value of his services, was not misleading, as any jury would presumably so understand.

(III) Loss of Society. By the great weight of authority, in an action by parents for the wrongful death of their child,[19] by a husband or wife for the death of his or her spouse,[20] or by next of kin for the wrongful death of the decedent,[21] damages cannot be recovered for the loss of the society of the deceased.

(IV) Loss of Prospective Intellectual and Moral Culture. The rule seems to be well recognized that in an action for the wrongful death of a parent, the loss to the minor children of instruction, and physical, intellectual, and moral training by such parent, is a proper element to be considered in estimating the damages for the death, where it is shown that the deceased was of industrious habits, good character, and a dutiful parent.[22] In some jurisdictions,

The ordinary services of a wife in a household are not a pecuniary benefit to the children or the next of kin, so as to be an element of damages for her death, recoverable by them. May v. West Jersey, etc., R. Co., 62 N. J. L. 67, 42 Atl. 165.

b. Statutory Limitations. Many of the statutes giving a right of action for death by wrongful act fix the maximum limit of recovery,[39] five thousand dollars being a common limitation.[40] In some jurisdictions, however, by constitutional provision, the limitation of the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death by any legislative act is specifically forbidden.[41]

c. What Law Governs. The better rule seems to be that in an action for death by wrongful act, where the death occurred out of the state in which the action is pending, the amount of the recovery is governed by the lex loci and not by the lex fori.[42]

Code, §§ 2291, 2292, giving a right of action for death to the widow, and if there is no widow, to the children "or" personal representative for the benefit of the widow or next of kin, does not affect the right of children to share with the widow the damages recovered.

See 15 Cent. Dig. tit. "Death," § 132 et seq. See Trafford v. Adams Express Co., 8 Lea (Tenn.) 96 (holding that damages awarded for injuries resulting in the death of a married woman go exclusively to the husband, and not to the next of kin); Gores v. Graff, 77 Wis. 174, 46 N. W. 48 (holding that under the Wisconsin statute the widow alone is entitled to the damages recovered, and it is error to direct the jury to give damages to recompense the estate of the deceased, since such instruction in fact directs them to compensate the children as well as the widow).

"Child" or "children" construed.— Under Ga. Code, § 3828, providing that a widow or a child or children may recover for the homicide of a husband or parent, and that they may recover where the death results from a crime, or from criminal or other negligence, it has been held that the children intended

(III) Apportionment by Jury. In some jurisdictions the statute provides that the jury may direct in what proportion the damages awarded shall be distributed among beneficiaries designated in the statute.[46] However, under these statutes it has been held that in an action by parents for the death of a child, there being no other interested parties, the amount recovered is community property, and a finding by the jury of a separate amount for each is unnecessary.[47]

b. What Law Governs. The rule is well recognized that in an action for death by wrongful act brought under the statute of a foreign state, the distribution of the amount recovered in such action should be made in accordance with the law of the foreign state.[48]

Next of kin.— Under Minn. Gen. St. (1894) § 5913, providing that damages recovered for wrongful act of a person causing the death of another shall be for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin, it has been held that the husband is not the next of kin of the deceased wife within the meaning of this statute. Watson v. St. Paul City R. Co., 70 Minn. 514, 73 N. W. 400. See also Drake v. Gilmore, 52 N. Y. 389. See, however, Steel v. Kurtz, 28 Ohio St. 191, holding that the Ohio act authorizing an action for causing the death of a person, and providing that it shall be brought for the exclusive benefit of "the widow and next of kin," does not exclude the widower from all benefit from the recovery, when the person killed was a married woman.

In the absence of surviving children, it has been held under the Pennsylvania act that the widow alone is entitled to the damages recovered, and that the parents of deceased are entitled to no part thereof. Lehigh Iron Co. v. Rupp, 100 Pa. St. 95.

Beneficiaries omitted from petition.— In an action brought by one of the beneficiaries designated in the statute, or the personal representative of the deceased, the fact that plaintiff in his petition for damages fails to name all the legal beneficiaries provided for in the act will not bar any of such beneficiaries not named in the petition from receiving his distributive share of the judgment recovered. Wilful negligence.— It was held in Claxton v. Lexington, etc., R. Co., 13 Bush (Ky.) 636, that to make out a case of wilful negligence under Gen. St. c. 57, giving punitive damages for death caused by wilful negligence, it must be shown that the conduct of the party in fault was such as to evidence reckless indifference to the safety of the public, or an intentional failure to perform a plain duty, in the performance of which the public or the party injured has an interest, and that in this case the question whether the negligence was wilful or not was a question for the jury to determine.

Self-defense.— Where by defendant's own testimony it is shown that he brought on the difficulty, used the first offensive language, and struck the first blow, and that he pursued and shot deceased while the latter was trying to escape, it was held not to be error for the court to refuse to submit the issue of self-defense to the jury. 68. In some jurisdictions the rule is laid down that it is within the discretion of the court whether it will direct the jury to make render judgment accordingly, provided the special finding is of an ultimate and not a mere probative fact.[69]

J. Appeal and Error. Applying the general rules relating to review on appeal or by writ of error[70] to actions for death by wrongful act it has been held that questions not raised in the trial court will not be considered on appeal;[71] and that a judgment will not be reversed for error which results in no prejudice to the party urging the objection on appeal.[72] Nor will the judgment be reversed for errors which on the consideration of the whole record are shown not to have affected the judgment.[73]

11. "The verb 'to debauch' is a word of French origin, compounded of the preposition 'de,' from, and 'bauche,' an old Armorican word in use in Brittany, meaning shop, and signifying, in its compound sense, to entice or draw one away from his work, employment, or duty. It is in this sense of enticing and corrupting that it came into use in our language, as will be found by a reference to one of the earliest authorities for the meaning of English words, (Phillips' New World of Words, 1696,) where it is defined 'to corrupt one's manners, to make lewd, to mar or spoil;' a sense in which it had been previously used by Ben Jonson and by Shakspeare." I do not mean a new term in the English language, because there is a passage in Swift which has been mentioned to me where the term 'debenture' is used. . . . But although it is not a term with any legal definition, it is a term which has been used by lawyers frequently with reference to instruments under Acts of Parliament." See also British India Steam Nav. Co. v. Inland Revenue Com'rs, 7 Q. B. D. 165, 50 L. J. Q. B. 517, 519, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 378, 29 Wkly. Rep. 610, where Grove, J., said: "The question [in the case under consideration] apparently a simple one and certainly easy to state, is not free from difficulty, owing to the curious fact that the word 'debenture' does not appear to admit of any accurate definition. A very general definition is given in the dictionaries, and neither the counsel in the case nor any information that we have been able to obtain defines exactly what 'debenture' means. The difficulty arises from the fact that in the Act of Parliament (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97) the word 'debenture' is mentioned in the schedule of duties in two senses, namely, 'Debenture for securing the payment or repayment of money, or the transfer or retransfer of stock,' and 'Debenture or certificate for entitling any person to receive any drawback,' etc.; and — in another portion of the schedule, where mortgages are spoken of — 'Mortgage, bond debenture, covenant, warrant of attorney, and foreign security of any kind." Lindley, J., said: "Now what the exact meaning of 'debenture' is I do not know. I do not find any particular definition of it, and we know that there are various classes of instruments called 'debentures.' You may have mortgage debentures, which are charges of some kind on property; you may have debentures which are bonds, and if this were under seal it would be a debenture of this kind. You may have a debenture which is nothing more than an acknowledgment of debt. You may have an instrument like this which is something more — it is a statement by two directors that a company will pay. I think any instruments of that sort may be debentures."

Distinguished from "promissory note."— In British India Steam Nav. Co. v. Inland Revenue Com'rs, 7 Q. B. D. 165, 50 L. J. Q. B. 517, 44 L. T. Rep. N. S. 378, 381, 29 Wkly. Rep. 610, Grove, J., said: "Now it seems to me that there is a real difference here between what the company themselves call a 'debenture' and a promissory note. The statute contemplates in a debenture something different from a promissory note, because in the former case it imposes a higher duty. The document may be a promissory note in one sense of the word, but it may also be something more, for there are matters attached to it which have a purpose in them and which may be attached to a promissory note, and yet make it none the less a promissory note." J., said: "That these debentures are 'agreements by which a right in equity to a charge or security on personal chattels is conferred,' appears to be clear."

No distinction between "debentures" and "mortgage debentures."— Where the articles of association conferred power upon the company "to borrow money and to issue transferable bonds to bearer, or otherwise debentures and mortgage debentures based on all or any of the assets real or personal of the company," Jessel, M. R., said: "I do not feel myself bound to put a different meaning on the words 'debentures' and 'mortgage debentures' used in this article. I do not know what the difference can be if you get 'bonds,' 'debentures,' and 'mortgage debentures,' and I do not feel myself concerned to inquire." In re Florence Land, etc., Co., 10 Ch. 56. "Accruing debt."—In Webb v. Stenton, 11 Q. B. D. 518, 524, 52 L. J. Q. B. 584, 49 L. T. Rep. N. S. 432 [citing Tapp v. Jones, L. R. 10 Q. B. 591, 44 L. J. Q. B. 127, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 201, 23 Wkly. Rep. 694], the court said: "There again it is obvious that in 1875 that learned judge construed the words 'accruing debt' to mean a debt debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro. Now that is a debt known to the law and which the law has always recognised. The law has always recognised as a debt two kinds of debt, a debt payable at the time, and a debt payable in the future, and unless the legislature intended to invent a new kind of debt not known to the law, 'accruing debt' can only be what the judges have so stated."

57. Eppright v. Nickerson, 78 Mo. 482, 488 [citing Abbott L. Dict.; Bouvier L. Dict.; Burrill L. Dict.; Wharton L. Lex.].

DE BONE MEMORIE. Of good memory; of sound mind.[58]

DE BONIS ASPORTATIS. For goods taken away; for carrying away goods.[59]

DE BONIS NON ADMINISTRATIS. Of the goods not administered.[60] (See Executors and Administrators.)

DE BONIS NON AMOVENDIS. A writ for not removing goods.[61]

DE BONIS PROPRIIS. Of his own goods.[62]

DE BONIS TESTATORIS AC SI. From the goods of the testator, if he has any, and, if not, from those of the executor.[63]

"Whatever, therefore, the laws order any one to pay, that becomes instantly a debt, which he hath beforehand contracted to discharge." Powell v. Oregonian R. Co., 36 Fed. 726, 730, 13 Sawy. 535, 2 L. R. A. 270 [citing 3 Blackstone Comm. 158].

"The word 'debt' has generally been confined to a contract obligation." Latimer v. Veader, 20 N. Y. App. Div. 418, 425, 46 N. Y. Suppl. 823 [citing Blackstone Comm.].

Imprisonment for "debt."— Where a statute provided that "no person shall be imprisoned by debt in any action," the court said that the provision "is not confined to the technical meaning of debt; it includes debt in the popular sense of a demand founded on contract express or implied, and comprises all actions ex contractus." Perry v. Orr, 35 N. J. L. 295, 298. And where a statute provided that "no person shall be imprisoned for debt," etc., the court said: "The term 'debt,' as employed in § 15, is manifestly used in a broad sense, and hence will embrace such obligations to pay money as arise upon the law, as well as those which arise upon contract." Granholm v. Sweigle, 3 N. D. 476, 479, 57 N. W. 509. For effect upon bail of statute abolishing imprisonment for debt see 5 Cyc. 34.

A. 270 [citing 3 Blackstone Comm. 154], where it is said: "And where the agreement to pay is implied by law, the sum to be paid is also a debt"]; U. S. v. Colt, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,839, Pet. C. C. 145 [quoting 3 Blackstone Comm. 154].

71. Erie's Appeal, 91 Pa. St. 398 [quoted in State v. Hiskman, 11 Mont. 541, 551, 29 Pac. 92]; Morimura v. Traeger, 11 Pa. Dist. 378, 382.

"Debt owing" distinguished from "debt due."— "Standing alone the word 'debt' is as applicable to a sum of money which has been promised at a future day as to a sum now due and payable. If we wish to distinguish between the two, we say of the former that it is a debt owing, and of the latter that it is a debt due. In other words, debts are of two kinds: solvendum in præsenti and solvendum in futuro. Whether a claim or demand is a debt or not, is in no respect determined by a reference to the time of payment. A sum of money which is certainly and in all events payable is a debt, without regard to the fact whether it be payable now or at a future time. A sum payable upon a contingency, however, is not a debt, or does not become a debt until the contingency has happened." People v. Arguello, 37 Cal. 524, 525.

Under legal tender act.— Speaking of the intent of the act of congress declaring treasury notes to be legal tender in payment of debts, except, etc., the court said: "We think the term 'debt' employed in the Act of Congress is not limited to a demand, for which a personal liability exists against the party offering or making the payment, but that it comprehends, also, all liens, claims and charges upon property for the payment of money." People v. Mayhew, 26 Cal. 655, 661.

"Debt" may include: The year's allowance to a widow and minor children (Watts v. Watts, 38 Ohio St. 480, 491); a cause of action whereon judgment was rendered within the homestead exemption statute (Warner v. Cammack, 37 Iowa 642, 644); certificates issued by a municipal corporation for a temporary loan (Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385, 393); cotton due by tenant to the landlord for rent (State v. Barden, 64 S. C. 206, 208, 41 S. E. 959);

a charge upon a specific parcel of a person's property for the payment of a sum of money (People v. Mayhew, 26 Cal. 655, 661); damages for property taken for public use (State v. Beackmo, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 246, 249. But see Lowell v. Street Com'rs, 106 Mass. 540, 542); a judgment (McHarg v. Eastman, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 137, 140, 35 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 205); judgments for money (State v. Mace, 5 Md. 337, 338; Rhodes v. O'Farrell, 2 Nev. 60, 61); judgments for pecuniary fines (Walsh v. Ringer, 2 Ohio 328, 334, 15 Am. Dec. 555. But see McCool v. State, 23 Ind. 127, 131; In re McDonald, 4 Wyo. 150, 158, 38 Pac. 18); mortgage debts under the provisions of a will (Turner v. Laird, 68 Conn. 198, 200, 35 Atl. 1124); the liability of a person who obtained money from another by reason of false and fraudulent representations in the sale of a patent-right within the meaning of the word, as used in the homestead exemption statute (Warner v. Cammack, 37 Iowa 642 [cited in Commercial Nat. Bank v. Taylor, 64 Hun (N. Y.) 499, 502, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 533]); an equitable obligation to pay (Longworth v. Mitchell, 26 Ohio St. 334, 343; Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Ohio St. 333, 351. Contra, see People v. Halsey, 37 N. Y. 344, 347); the obligation to pay freight (Wilson v. Morgan, 4 Rob. (N. Y.) 58, 68); penalties recoverable by civil action (Western Union Tel. Co. v. Sullivan, 70 Miss. 447, 449, 12 So. 460); a promise to pay a certain or definite sum in U. S. gold coin (Milliken v. Sloat, 1 Nev. 573, 590); and a specific legacy (Morton v. Church Home, 70 S. W. 841, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1122).

"Debt" does not include: A claim for damages (Clark v. Nevada Land, etc., Co., 6 Nev. 526, 529); a claim for unliquidated damages (Bolden v. Jensen, 69 Fed. 745, 746; Powell v. Oregonian R. Passing that line, it does not seem to me easy to say, that if cases of unliquidated damages may be treated as debts, because they end in the ascertainment of a fixed sum of money, that we are at liberty to say, that the doctrine is not equally applicable to all cases of unliquidated damages, whether arising ex contractu or ex delicto. Debt also means that which is due from one person to another, and the word due does not necessarily vary the meaning; as that means, in one sense, simply owed. It may, when used with that intent, mean a debt actually payable, the time for the payment of which has arrived. The context and the circumstances under which it is used must determine in what sense it is used. Due, when used as a noun, is synonymous with debt."

A debt is money owing by the garnishee to the defendant which may be paid over to the sheriff, while credits are something belonging to the defendant, but in the possession and under the control of the garnishee, like promissory notes or other evidences of indebtedness of third parties, which may be delivered up or transferred to the sheriff." In Alabama.— "'Debt,' in subdivision 1 of section 524 of the Code of 1896, may import only such demands as arise from contract, express or implied, but 'any money demand' as used in subdivision 2 is much more comprehensive than debt, and includes all rightful claims, whether founded upon contract, tort, or penalties given by statute, and may be enforced by attachment when the amount is fixed or can be certainly ascertained." Defined in reference to an assessment of taxes.— Where a statute in relation to an assessment of taxes contained the words "debts due from solvent debtors," the court said: "The term 'debts,' in the statute, is to be understood in its usual legal sense, and means nothing more nor less than sums of money due from inhabitants of the state, to the non-residents mentioned, by certain and express agreements or judicial sentence, and for the purchase of real estate. Primarily, it looks to the relation of vendor and purchaser, by contract valid in law, and to no other relation." People v. Halsey, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 547, 554.

Includes demands or obligations upon contracts.— In Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 25, 53 Pac. 416, it is said: "So far as we have observed, wherever the term 'debt' is used in our code it is so used in that broader sense which includes demands or obligations upon contracts payable in money. "Debt" against a decedent.— In Emerick's Estate, 172 Pa. St. 191, 194, 33 Atl. 550, the court, in speaking of a debt against a decedent, said: "The 'debt' must be established or admitted, and susceptible of enforcement, — not a debt barred by the statute."

I. DEFINITION.

"Debt," as used in this article,[1] is a form of action which lies at law to recover

1. For debt, like assumpsit or covenant, is a name both for a right of action and for a remedy allowed for enforcing it. Abbott L. Dict.; Bacon Abr. tit. "Debt."

a certain specific sum of money, or a sum that can readily be reduced to a certainty.[2]

II. HISTORY.

Debt is among the oldest actions known to the common law, and in its origin was of a droitural or proprietary nature.[3] The enforcement of what is now considered a mere contractual right, by an action in form proprietary, did not arise, however, by mere chance; as the action of covenant would lie only on sealed instruments,[4] there was an urgent necessity of employing some existing form of action for the enforcement of parol or implied obligations.[5] After the evolution and development of the action of assumpsit[6] that action for a time supplanted debt on simple contracts, for the reason that in the former a defendant could not invoke trial by wager of law,[7] a right which he retained in the latter until the abolition of that procedure in the reign of King William the fourth,[8] when it

"An action, . . . which is a remedy for the recovery of a debt eo nomine and in numero, though damages, generally nominal, are awarded for its detention." Bacon Abr. tit. "Debt." 3. Martin Civ. Proc. 34; 2 Pollock & M. Hist. Eng. L. 173, where the authors, after discussing the action of detinue, say: "This action slowly branches off from the action of debt. The writ of debt as given by Glanvill is closely similar to that form of the writ of right for land which is known as a Præcipe in capite. The sheriff is to bid the defendant render to the plaintiff so many marks or shillings, 'which, so the plaintiff says, the defendant owes him, and whereof he unjustly deforces him;' and if the defendant will not do this, then he is to give his reason in the king's court. The writ is couched in terms which would not be inappropriate were the plaintiff seeking the restoration of certain specific coins, of which he was the owner, but which were in the defendant's keeping." Further (p. 205) the same learned authors continue: "The creditor is being 'deforced' of money just as the demandant who brings a writ of right is being 'deforced' of land. There may be trial by battle in the one case as in the other. The bold crudity of archaic thought equates the repayment of an equivalent sum of money to the restitution of specific land or goods. To all appearance our ancestors could not conceive credit under any other form. The claimant of a debt asks for what is his own. . . . If we would rethink the thoughts of our forefathers we must hold that the action of debt is proprietary, while at the same time we must hold, as we saw in the last chapter, that there is no action for the recovery of a chattel that would be called proprietary by a modern lawyer."

5. Martin Civ. Proc. 35, 36.

Until Slade's Case, 4 Coke 92*b*, on all simple contracts for money demands, actions of debt were in general use, and it was not without a contest between the courts in Westminster Hall, that assumpsit was ever permitted in such cases. By the ancient common law all matters of personal contract were considered as binding only in the light of debts, and the only means of recovery in a court was by action of debt. Norris v. Windsor School Dist. No. 1, 12 Me. 293, 28 Am. Dec. 182 [citing 1 Reeve Hist. Eng. L. 159]. See also Gregory v. Thomson, 31 N. J. L. 166 [citing 1 Reeve Hist. Eng. L. 159].

6. See ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF, 4 Cyc. 317. See also Mahaffey v. Petty, 1 Ga. 261, 264, where the court said: "Originally, debt was the only form of action for money demands; and assumpsit was not generally introduced to recover money, until the latter end of the reign of Elizabeth or the beginning of that of James, her successor. It is asserted that Slade's Case, in 4 Coke 92*b*, is the first to be found, where the Court of King's Bench held that assumpsit would lie concurrently with debt, for the recovery of money."

again came to be used as well in actions on simple contracts as in actions on specialties under seal.

III. NATURE AND SCOPE OF REMEDY.

A. In General. At common law there was perhaps no action which had so extensive and varied an application as that of debt;[9] and while it would perhaps be unwise in modern procedure to extend this form of remedy where its limits are definite and clearly established,[10] it has nevertheless been given a much wider scope than the language of the elementary writers would seem to justify.[11] In some jurisdictions statutes have expressly declared this remedy to be appropriate for the enforcement of certain obligations or the recovery of designated penalties.[12]

B. Concurrent With Assumpsit.[13] It has long been held, and is now so well recognized by the courts as a whole that it may be said to be a general rule, that debt is a concurrent remedy with assumpsit upon all simple contracts where the sum to be recovered is certain or may readily be ascertained either from the contract itself or by operation of law.[14]

To revive a judgment, recovered by a deceased administrator, it was the proper remedy. Austin v. Townes, 10 Tex. 24.

10. Gregory v. Thomson, 31 N. J. L. 166, 170, where the court, in refusing to sanction the maintenance of the action upon collateral undertakings, and after referring to the opinion of Story, J., in Bullard v. Bell, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,121, 1 Mason 243, said: "The limits of the action, in the nature of things, must be arbitrary; the chief concern being to have those limits definite and stationary. To extend the formula is merely to unsettle its boundaries — a result which would, at least, be attended with the mischief of inconvenience. . . . If this form of action is liable to change, so is every other, and the consequence would be that the lines of demarkation between the several forms would soon become so obscure as not to be easily definable."

11. Thus Blackstone defines a debt which is properly enforceable by this action to be a sum of money due by certain and express agreement where the amount is fixed and specific, and does not depend upon any subsequent valuation to settle it; and that in the action of debt plaintiff must prove the whole debt he claims, or recover nothing at all. The limited scope by which this language would seem to circumscribe the action has not been acquiesced in by many of the courts, either in England or in this country. 3 Blackstone Comm. 154. And see Mahaffey v. Petty, 1 Ga. 261; U. S. v. Colt, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,839, Pet. C. C. 145.

Distinguished from case.— In all cases where the consideration has been executed and there is an express or implied promise to pay in money the value thereof, debt or assumpsit is the proper remedy; but in cases where the consideration is not executed, or if executed, the promise to be performed in consideration thereof is not to pay money but to do some other thing, then the remedy is by a special action on the case.
