2. Character of Intent. This does not, however, presuppose an intent to make the new place his permanent home,[28] or to end his days there.[29]

3. Change of Nationality. Nor does it involve a change of nationality by requiring an intent to cast off all allegiance to the country of the former domicile.[30]

4. Intention to Return — a. Definite Intent. This excludes any definite intention to return to the place of the previous domicile.[31]

b. "Floating" Intent. When once removed to his new domicile, however, the party's purpose to remain need not be fixed and unalterable. If it becomes a place of fixed present residence, it will not be sufficient to defeat the domicile that there may be a floating intention to return to their former place of abode at some future and indefinite period.[32]

Residence for purpose of selecting homestead claim.— S left Missouri for Oklahoma, in August, 1893, and was there at the opening of that territory to settlement. Selecting a claim, he went upon it, and plowed the land for a few days. He went to the land-office to file his homestead claim and finding his rights contested then abandoned them. He went from there to Kansas where he rented a house and remained until Dec. 20, 1893, when he started back to Missouri where he arrived in January, 1894. He never moved his family into the claim selected nor into the territory, and testified that when he went to Oklahoma it was his intention if he was successful in securing a homestead to remain and if not to return to Missouri. It was held that his mere residence for the purpose of selecting a claim would not be sufficient to constitute domicile. Lankford v. Gebhart, 130 Mo. 621, 32 S. W. 1127, 51 Am. St. Rep. 585. Nor does the intent at the time of removal necessarily decide anything, since the party's intentions may change at a subsequent period. Rep. 368, where the court said, per Wilde, J.: "I can find no authority which defines the effect of a change of domicile in a father upon a lunatic son. It would probably depend upon circumstances. If a man had grown up, married and established himself in business in the country of his original domicile, and had afterwards become lunatic and in that state had been taken charge of by his father, the emigration of his father to a foreign country with the view of becoming domiciled there, taking his son with him, might fail to work a change in the domicile of that son. It is not difficult to conceive cases in which great injustice might be done to the interests of others, if the general proposition were admitted that the custody of a lunatic necessarily carried with it the power of changing his domicile at will. But the hypothesis under which I am now considering the circumstances of the present case is free from the necessity of asserting any such general proposition. For I am assuming that George Crispin was of unsound mind throughout his majority,— in other words, that there never was a period during which he could think and act for himself in the matter of domicile otherwise than as a minor could. And if this be so, it would seem to me that the same reasoning which attaches the domicile of the son to that of his father while a minor would continue to bring about the same result, after the son had attained his majority, if he was continuously of unsound mind."

live with the guardian in New York, and died during minority, while attending school in Connecticut. In passing upon the question the court said: "I think the determination of the question as to the domicile of the testator's daughter at the time of her death does not depend upon the determination of any question as to her power, while a minor and a ward, or the power of her guardian to choose or create a new or another domicile. It is manifest, from the will, that her father expected and intended that she should, upon and after his death, during her minority, reside in New York, under the care and protection of her guardian residing there. It is evident that her father intended, by his will, upon and after his death, to change her domicile from Connecticut to New York." But see contra, Wood v. Wood, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 596, 28 Am. husband, when she is permitted to establish a domicile for herself;[58] and in New York it seems to have been repudiated altogether.[59]

(11) Under Judicial Decree. On the other hand, where husband and wife are living apart under a judicial decree of divorce or separation, the wife may acquire a separate domicile of her own which will remain unaffected by any change of residence on the part of the husband.[60]

c. Domicile For Purposes of Divorce. Where the husband has been guilty of such dereliction of duty in the marital relation as entitles the wife to have it either partially or totally dissolved, she may acquire a separate domicile of her own for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction on the proper tribunal in a proceeding for divorce or separation.[61]

d. Widows. After the husband's death, the wife has of course a right to elect her own domicile.[62]

3. Persons Non Compos Mentis. The mere fact that a person is of unsound mind does not necessarily preclude him from establishing his domicile, as the question must depend entirely upon the extent to which his reason has been impaired. In general it may be stated that but a comparatively slight degree of understanding is required in order that his action may be recognized.[63]

C. Quasi-Incapacity — 1. Soldiers. In general it can be said that a domicile is neither gained nor lost during military service, and although a soldier, if both the fact and intent concur, can establish a new domicile during his term of enlistment, this will not be deemed to have occurred in the absence of the clearest and most unequivocal proof. No domicile will be acquired merely from having been stationed in the line of duty at any particular place.[64]

2. Sailors. The roving occupation of a mariner necessarily precludes the idea of his establishing any fixed domicile during his short stoppage in various ports. His abode as established upon the adoption of his career is deemed to continue unchanged, although he can of course, if he so desires, fix upon a residence elsewhere which will be considered as his home.[65]

"The selection of a home . . . draws after it no very important consequences, and may be changed by the party at pleasure, and under the influence of very slight reasons. For an act of so slight importance, a high grade of intellectual power could hardly be required. The mind of a party might be much impaired, or it might be very generally under the influence of insane delusions, and yet if those insane influences had no bearing upon the selection of a home, the legal capacity to choose a place of residence might not be affected. 'If it were admitted . . . that idiots and persons wholly bereft of understanding are incapable of changing their domicile, it would not follow that the same incapacity would attach to all degrees of mental imbecility. There are those, and not a few, who may be unable to manage their property and other concerns with good judgment and discretion, and may need guardians to protect them from imposition, and who nevertheless have sufficient understanding to choose their homes.' This question is therefore a matter of fact to be settled by a jury." Concord v. Rumney, 45 N. H. 423, 428.

Masters of vessels.— "There is a wide difference between a mariner shipping from one port to another, and equally at home in any, without a single tie to attach him — and the master of a vessel, a man of substance, having his business always centered in one spot, from which he is absent only for a temporary purpose, to which he constantly returns, where he marries and lives with his wife, where he describes his residence in a sworn official document, and where he dies. The home of the former is about as unstable and floating as the element on which he earns his livelihood, that of the latter as determined, constant, and settled as the nature of his pursuits admits. As to the former, we may be compelled to resort to the domicile of origin in default of finding any other, as to the latter, there can be no difficulty in discovering his usual abode and habitation." "Going to a public institution, and residing there solely for the purpose of education, would not, of itself, give him a right to vote there, because it would not necessarily change his domicile; but in such case, his right to vote at that place would depend upon all the circumstances connected with such residence. If he has a father living; if he still remains a member of his father's family; if he returns to pass his vacations; if he is maintained and supported by his father; these are strong circumstances, repelling the presumption of a change of domicile. So, if he have no father living; if he have a dwelling-house of his own, or real estate, of which he retains the occupation; if he have a mother or other connexions, with whom he has before been accustomed to reside, and to whose family he returns in vacations; if he describes himself of such place, and otherwise manifests his intent to continue his domicile there; these are all circumstances tending to prove that his domicile is not changed. But if, having a father or mother, they should remove to the town where the college is situated, and he should still remain a member of the family of the parent; or if, having no parent, or being separated from his father's family, not being maintained or supported by him; or, if he has a family of his own, and removes with them to such town; or by purchase or lease takes up his permanent abode there, without intending to return to his former domicile; if he depend on his own property, income or industry for his support;— these are circumstances, more or less conclusive, to show a change of domicile, and the acquisition of a domicile in the town where the college is situated. In general, it may be said that an intent to change one's domicile and place of abode is not so readily presumed from a residence at a public institution for the purposes of education, for a given length of time, as it would be from a like removal from one town to another, and residing there for the ordinary purposes of life; and therefore stronger facts and circumstances must concur to establish the proof of change of domicile, in the one case than in the other. But where the proofs of change of domicile, drawn from the various sources already indicated, are such as to overcome the presumption of the continuance of the prior domicile, such preponderance of proof, concurring with an actual residence of the student in the town where the public institution is situated, will be sufficient to establish his domicile, and give him a right to vote in that town." VI. WHERE RESIDENCE IS ON THE BORDER LINE.

When the boundary line between two localities passes through the residence of one whose domicile is at issue, if the portion of the house on one side of the line is sufficient to constitute a habitation by itself while the other portion is not, the first will be considered the domicile. If the line divides more equally, then that portion is deemed the domicile where the occupant mainly and substantially performs those offices which characterize his home (such as sleeping, eating, sitting, and receiving visitors); but in the event of a still closer division, then that part where he habitually sleeps is so considered in the absence of other facts showing a positively contrary intention.[68]

VII. LOSS.

A. In General. A domicile of origin is retained until changed by acquiring another. So each successive domicile of choice continues until another is obtained, and the acquisition of a new domicile at the same instant terminates the preceding one.[69] that person's domicile to another place. All the conditions which are required to constitute the domicile in the given place must be transferred to the new place. When this is done the domicile is changed, and until this is done the domicile is not changed.[71]

2. Intention to Abandon. It follows as a corollary therefore that there must exist a present fixed intent to abandon the former domicile, for where there is a purpose either secret or open to return no change will result.[72]

3. Motive of Change Immaterial. So long, however, as the intent to abandon has actually existed, the law will not scrutinize the motives which prompted the change.[73]

Intention to ultimately abandon.—A domicile is not lost by removing therefrom and locating in a new place with the possible purpose to make the latter a permanent home at some future time. The intent must be present and fixed, not ultimate. Astley v. Capron, 89 Ind. 167. Thus where plaintiff, a resident of Kansas, went to Colorado intending if successful in obtaining a situation in the public schools to remain there, and if not to return to Kansas, but was seriously injured before the result of the civil service examination which she had taken was known and thereupon went back to Kansas where she has since remained, it was held that at no time did she cease to be a resident of Kansas. "A man has a right to change his domicile for any reasons satisfactory to himself. In determining whether there has been such a change from one place to another, the test is to inquire whether he has in fact removed his home to the latter place with the intention of making it his residence permanently or for an indefinite time. If he has he loses his old domicile and acquires a new one with all its rights and incidents; and the law does not inquire into the purposes or motives which induced him to make such change. It may be because he prefers the laws of the new place of domicile, or because he can diminish his taxes and other burdens, or because he desires to bring a suit in a court which would not otherwise have jurisdiction. His status as an inhabitant depends upon the fact that he has made a change of his home, and not upon the motives or reasons which influenced him to do so." Frame v. Thormann, 102 Wis. 653, 666, 79 N. W. 39. See also McConnell v. Kelley, 138 Mass. 372. Contra, however, where the motive was to make valid a testamentary disposition which would not have been sustained under the laws of the former domicile, in which case the motive may be considered as reflecting on the bona fides of the intent. Plant v. Harrison, 36 Misc. (N. Y.) 649, 74 N. Y. Suppl. 411.

74. Thus the fact that one has left his wife and is living with another woman will not prevent the court from holding that a removal has taken place. Greene v. Windham, 13 Me. 225. And see Richmond v. Vassalborough, 5 Me. 396.

An unpaid helper in a public hospital who merely receives board and lodging in exchange for certain labor is "kept" there within the meaning of the New York constitution, art. 2, § 3, declaring that "for the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence, by reason of his presence or absence, while . . . kept at any almshouse, or other asylum, or institution wholly or partly supported at public expense, or by charity." People v. Hagan, 165 N. Y. 607, 58 N. E. 1091 [affirming 48 N. Y. App. Div. 203, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 816].

Escaping arrest.— Where the party has fled from his home to escape arrest for a violation of the criminal law, his removal will not be considered as having been effected under compulsion. Young v. Pollak, 85 Ala. 439, 5 So. 279. Compare Loustalan v. Loustalan, [1900] P. 211, 69 L. J. P. 75, 82 L. T. Rep. N. S. 806, 48 Wkly. A refugee in time of war will not be considered, in the absence of a definitely proven intent to the contrary, as having lost his domicile, whether his removal be under compulsion of one of the belligerent powers (In re Duleep-Singh, 7 Morr. Bankr. Cas. 228. And see Hardy v. De Leon, 5 Tex. 211. [But removal from a conquered country where there was no compulsion and merely because of a dislike to the new sovereignty will not be deemed involuntary. Ennis v. Smith, 14 How. (U. Ill-health is not such compulsion as will prevent the acquiring of a new domicile. C. Death or Abandonment of Intention In Itinere. A domicile not being lost until another is actually acquired, where death occurs,[79] or the intention is abandoned while on a journey to the new locality no change results.[80] An exception to the foregoing rule has been made where a domicile of choice was definitely abandoned with an intent to resume the original domicile, in which event the latter immediately reverts, even although a return to the original abode is not consummated.[81]

Limits of rule.—When offered by the grantor in a suit against the grantee "the acceptance of a deed by a grantee is slight evidence that the description of his residence therein is correct. He is presumed to know his own residence, and to have an interest in having it correctly stated. But a grantee cannot be presumed to know the residence of the grantor, and his acceptance of the deed, therefore, cannot be held to be an implied admission that the grantor's residence is correctly stated." b. Conflict Between These Presumptions. It is obvious that these two presumptions may at first blush be deemed to conflict; therefore it is held that residence elsewhere,[5] particularly when it is of such a length[6] or characterized by such circumstances as indicate an intention to adopt the new locality as a domicile,[7] rebuts the presumption as to the continuance of the original abode; but mere residence elsewhere will not rebut the presumption as to continuance, unless it is inconsistent with an intent to return to the original domicile.[8]

Choice in deference to wife's wishes.— "The rule that a man will be considered as domiciled in the place where his wife permanently resides, and in which he has fixed his establishment, is not affected by the circumstance that the choice of residence has been made in deference to the wishes of the wife, and that the house has been bought and furnished at her instance and with her money." Aitchison v Dixon, L. R. 10 Eq. 589, 39 L. J. Ch. 705, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97, 18 Wkly. Rep. 989.

Presumption from residence of mistress.— D in 1860 began living with R as her husband, although not actually married, and had one child born. In August, 1863, he married her. Speaking of an attempt to draw a conclusion as to his residence from that of the wife, Wickens, V. C., said: "It may not be immaterial to remark, that the relation between the testator in this case and his wife and children was not quite the normal one, so that the general rule, if it existed, might not apply to this quite so strongly as in ordinary cases." Douglas v. Douglas, L. R. 12

but where a separation has taken place the presumption will cease.[12] This presumption is by no means conclusive and may be rebutted by facts showing a contrary intent.[13]

4. That Domicile of Unmarried Man Is Where He Transacts Business, Etc. The place where an unmarried man transacts business and exercises his political rights is presumed to be his domicile, although like the foregoing this is not conclusive.[14]

5. That Domicile Is at Place of Decease. It has been said that the domicile of a decedent in his lifetime must ordinarily be presumed to be at the place of his decease;[15] but this proposition has been as authoritatively denied.[16]

C. Weight and Sufficiency — 1. In General. Domicile is a question of so exceedingly complex a character, depending as it does almost wholly upon intent, that precedents with necessarily varying facts are of but slight assistance. A fact of controlling importance in one case is more than likely to have but slight significance in relation to all the facts of another. The problem therefore depends for its solution not upon a consideration of any single circumstance but upon all

Speaking of the effect of a removal of the family Shaw, C. J., observed: "The actual change of one's residence, with his family, and the taking up of a residence elsewhere, without any intention of returning, is one of the strong indications of change of domicile, and, unless controlled by other circumstances, is decisive. It was for the jury to determine whether there were any circumstances sufficient to control such conclusion." Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 242, 246.

IX. PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

The existence or non-existence of a domicile in a given locality, where the facts are conflicting, is a mixed question of law and fact. So far as it involves questions of fact, including the ascertainment of the intention of the party, it is solely within the province of the jury whose determination is conclusive, unless the verdict is set aside as having been against the evidence.[30] But while the question is one of mixed law and fact, yet in proceedings to procure the appointment of an administrator, the question is to be decided by the court.[31] And generally speaking the question what shall be considered the domicile of a party is in all little weight. Smith v. Croom, 7 Fla. 81; Chambers v. Prince, 75 Fed. 176. I. DEFINITION.

Dower has been defined as that portion of lands or tenements which the wife hath for the term of her life of the lands or tenements of her husband after his decease, for the sustenance of herself and the nurture and education of her children.[1] It consists at common law of a third part of all the lands and tenements of which the husband was seized in fee simple or fee tail at any time during the coverture, and of which any issue which she might have had might by possibility have been heir, to be held by the wife for the term of her natural life.[2] The term "dower," in its proper sense, is applicable only to real property, and to the widow's life-estate therein;[3] but it is sometimes applied in statutes, wills, or contracts, to a widow's share in the personal property of her deceased husband, and in some states "dower" is expressly given in personal property.[4]

II. CLASSIFICATION AND GRADES.

A. Kinds of Dower — 1. In General. Blackstone and Littleton speak of five species of dower: (1) Dower by the common law; (2) dower by particular custom; (3) dower ad ostium ecclesiæ; (4) dower ex assensu patris; and (5) dower de la pluis beale.[5]

2. Dower by the Common Law. Dower by the common law has already been defined as a one-third part of all the lands and tenements of which the husband was seized in fee simple or fee tail at any time during the coverture, and of which any issue which she might have had might by possibility have been heir, to be held by the wife for the term of her natural life.[6]

3. Dower by Particular Custom. Dower by particular custom was where by the custom of a particular locality the wife was entitled to a peculiar and unusual allotment of dower; in some places one half of the husband's lands being allotted to her, and in others one third, and in others one quarter.[7]

4. Dower Ad Ostium Ecclesiæ. Dower ad ostium ecclesiæ, or at the church door, was where a tenant in fee simple of full age, openly at the church door, where all marriages were formerly celebrated, after affiance made and troth plighted between them, endowed his wife with the whole, or such quantity as he pleased, of his lands, at the same time specifying and ascertaining the same; on which the wife, after the husband's death, might enter without further ceremony.[8]

5. Dower Ex Assensu Patris. Dower ex assensu patris, or by assent of the father, was where the father was seized of lands in fee, and his son by his consent expressly given, at the time of his marriage, and at the church door, endowed

"The words 'dower,' 'dowery,' and 'dowry' are regarded by lexicographers as etymologically different forms of the same word; 'dowery' has become obsolete, and 'dower' and 'dowry' have in modern times acquired both in law and in popular use distinct significations. The various senses in which the word dos was used by the old common-law writers are well known. Sir Edward Coke in his Commentary on Littleton, 31*a*, says: 'And at this day dos or dower is not taken by the professors of the common law, either for the land which the wife bringeth with her in marriage to her husband, for then it is either called in frank-marriage or in marriage, as hath been said, nor for the portion of money or other goods or chattels which she bringeth with her in marriage, for that is called her marriage portion. And yet of ancient time dos mulieris, the dower or dowrie of the woman was also applied to them. But it is commonly taken for her third part, which she hath of her husband's lands or tenements.'" his wife of a portion of the same. This species of dower bore a close relation to dower ad ostium ecclesiæ.[9] As in the case of dower ad ostium ecclesiæ the wife entered upon her dower immediately upon the death of her husband, although the father still lived.[10]

6. Dower De La Pluis Beale. Dower de la pluis beale was where the husband was seized of lands, part in socage and part by knight's service, and died leaving a widow and a son within the age of fourteen years, in which case the widow took her dower wholly out of the lands in socage, and the lord of whom the land was held by knight's service entered upon that portion as guardian in chivalry during the nonage of the infant.[11]

7. Species Abolished. Dower ad ostium ecclesiæ and dower ex assensu patris were abolished in England by a statute of William IV,[12] while dower de la pluis beale had previously been abolished together with the military tenures, of which it was a consequence;[13] and of all these species dower by the common law is the only one which has ever prevailed in the United States, being either expressly continued or modified or enlarged by statutory enactment.[14]

B. Grades of Estate. Dower is: (1) Inchoate after seizin of the husband and during coverture; (2) consummate after the death of the husband, but prior to its assignment, when the widow's right to demand and enter upon the enjoyment of her dower interest commences; and (3) assigned or vested, when the widow enters into possession of the estate assigned to her for use during her life, either by process of law or by the acts of interested parties.[15] The nature of these particular interests is hereinafter considered.[16]

III. Origin and Development.

A. In General. The origin of dower is involved in much doubt and obscurity. Its introduction in England is of such antiquity that its origin cannot be traced with any degree of certainty.[17] Blackstone does not attempt to definitely declare its origin, but rests content with the statement that in England it may be the relic of an early Danish custom.[18] It is certain that dower is recognized in the Magna Charta of King John, granted June 15, 1215, and subsequently amended and confirmed in the reigns of Henry III and Edward I.[19] In the Magna Charta, as thus amended and confirmed, the law of dower in its modern sense and enlarged extent, as applying to all the lands of which the husband was seized during the coverture, was clearly defined and firmly established.[20] Since the Magna Charta was declaratory of existing customs and regulations and was enacted for their preservation, dower must have existed as a distinct institution prior to the enactment of that instrument. Coke says that it was certainly the law of England before the Norman conquest that a widow should continue a whole year in her husband's house, after his death, within which time her dower was to be assigned her.[21]

B. In the United States — 1. Adoption, Modification, and Abolition. In many of the United States dower, exactly or substantially as it existed at common law, has been recognized as in force or adopted by judicial declaration or by express constitutional or statutory provisions, while in others it has been very materially changed by statute.[22] In other states dower has been abolished altogether, and a different right or interest substituted, as for example a certain portion of the husband's real property in fee simple,[23] or a certain portion of community property or both.[24]

2. Effect of Modification or Abolition — a. In General. In some states, as in California, where property acquired by the husband after marriage becomes community property and jointly vests in both husband and wife, the common-law right of dower is done away with entirely and the wife's interest in the common property becomes absolute at the death of her husband.[25] In some states a statute substituting for dower a fee simple estate in one third or other portion of the husband's lands abolishes dower.[26] In other states such a statute is regarded not as abolishing but merely as enlarging the dower estate.[27] Even where dower is expressly abolished the word may still be properly used in pleadings to designate the wife's interest given by the statute in the lands of her deceased husband.[28]

b. As to Existing Interests. It has been held that a statute abolishing dower and substituting a fee simple in one third of the deceased husband's lands takes away the inchoate right of dower existing at the time of the enactment of the statute.[29] Some of the statutes, however, do not have this effect but expressly or impliedly save preëxisting rights.[30] A statute abolishing dower cannot defeat a widow's dower right after it has become consummate by the death of her husband.[31]

c. Construction of Statutes. A statute in derogation of a widow's common-law right of dower should be so construed if possible as to protect her fully in such right.[32] All statutes relating to dower are to be considered as parts of an entire system and are to be construed in pari materia.[33]

d. Constitutionality of Statutes. It is within the power of the legislature to diminish, alter, or abolish dower, where the right thereto is merely inchoate and has not become consummated by the death of the husband; but a statute taking away the right of dower after it has already become consummate and vested by the death of the husband is unconstitutional and void.[34] And it has been held that a statute restoring to married women the common-law right of dower is unconstitutional so far as applicable to marriages contracted and land acquired by

A conveyance in fee simple by the husband or sale on execution or foreclosure prior to the passage of the act abolishing dower has been held in Indiana to divest the wife of her right to dower. Although the husband dies after the taking effect of the act substituting a fee simple right in her, in place of dower, this does not entitle her to take one third in fee of the lands so conveyed by her husband, although she did not join in his deed. "Vested" right under statute.— But where a statute expressly provided that the right of dower should become "vested" in the wife before the husband's death as to all land acquired by him during coverture, it was held that the legislature could not affect her right of dower by an act passed after marriage and the acquisition of property by the husband, and before his death. the husband previous to its passage,[35] although not so applicable to land acquired by him after its passage, although the marriage was entered into before.[36] A statute divesting a grantee of land of one third of the fee and vesting the same in the deceased grantor's widow is unconstitutional and void.[37] Dower does not result from contract, and therefore a statute enacted in the lifetime of a husband, modifying or otherwise affecting his wife's inchoate right of dower, is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract.[38] Nor is the inchoate right of dower during the lifetime of the husband "property" within the constitutional guaranties for the protection of property.[39]

IV. NATURE AND OBJECT.

A. In General. The object in allowing dower is to furnish means and sustenance for the wife and for the nurture and education of the younger children after the death of the husband and father,[40] and looking to this object dower is held sacred and has been strongly fortified against invasion.[41] As has often been said, it is a legal, an equitable, and a moral right, favored in a high degree by law, and next to life and liberty held sacred.[42] But dower exists also for reasons of public policy, not dependent entirely upon the maintenance and nurture of the widow and her children; it is recognized in this country as a positive and definite institution of the state.[43] Although there is early authority to the contrary,[44] it must now be regarded as settled that dower is not the result of any contract between husband and wife, either express or implied, but is an institution of the state, founded upon public policy, and made by positive law an incident of the marriage relation.[45] We shall consider in subseqnent sections the nature and incidents of the inchoate right of dower,[46] the right of dower consummate before assignment,[47] and the right after assignment.[48]

B. Extent of Estate. The common-law right of dower, as we have seen, entitles the wife to a life-estate, and a life-estate only, in one third of all the lands and tenements of which the husband was seized of an estate of inheritance at any time during the coverture.[49] In some states this is still the extent of the widow's interest, but in other states her estate has been enlarged or modified by statute.[50] In some states the widow's right to dower is unaffected by a statute permitting the widow of an intestate who leaves no deseendants to inherit a certain portion of the real property of which the intestate died seized, and she is entitled to both,[51] while in other states such provision is in lieu of dower [52] or ineludes dower.[53] Upon the assignment of dower the widow acquires no new freehold, but her title is a continuation of that of her husband,[54] and relates back to the time of the marriage, if her husband was then seized, and if not it relates back to the time when he was first seized.[55]

C. Right of Non-Resident Widow.[56] At common law and under the statutes in most of the states the widow of a citizen of one state is entitled to dower in lands situated within another state of which the husband was seized at any time during coverture, or at the time of his death.[57] But under a statute giving

dower to a widow residing out of the state in lands within the state of which her husband died seized, it has been held that the widow is not entitled to dower in lands so situated, but which have been conveyed by the husband in good faith prior to his death.[58]

D. Law Governing Estate — 1. Law in Force at Death of Husband. Since it is within the power of the legislature to diminish, alter, or abolish dower so long as the right thereto is merely inchoate, but not after it becomes consummate by the death of the husband,[59] it follows as a general rule that the widow's right to dower in lands of which the husband died seized is governed by the law in force at the time of his death.[60] But in North Carolina it is held that a statute giving or enlarging a right to dower cannot affect the husband's right to convey land, where the marriage was entered into and the land was acquired by him before the enactment of the statute, although it is otherwise as to land acquired after its enactment.[61] And where real property is aliened or mortgaged by the husband during his lifetime the right of the widow to dower as against the alienee or mortgagee will be determined by the laws in force at the time the property was conveyed or mortgaged.[62] The rule as applicable in all cases seems to be that a widow takes dower in her husband's estate, as against those whose rights to such estate originate at the same time as her right of dower, according to the laws in force at the death of the husband; but as against those who have specific rights against such estate prior to the death of the husband her right to dower will depend upon the law in force at the time such rights originated.[63]

2. LOCATION OF PROPERTY. The widow's right to dower, in her husband's lands, the time and manner of assigning the same, and the causes by which it may be defeated are all determined by the law of the place where the property subject to dower is located.[64] But dower in personal property is governed by the law of the domicile of the husband.[65]

3. ACTS OF CONGRESS AND TERRITORIAL LAWS. The right to dower in lands situated in the territories is governed by the laws of the territories except in so far as they have been superseded by act of congress.[66]

V. REQUISITES.

A. In General. Three things are necessary to the consummation of the widow's right of dower: A valid marriage, seizin of the husband, and his death. This is the rule at common law, and is very generally followed in the states where the estate is recognized or created by statute.[67] The estate in all its grades demands for its existence the marriage and seizin, but it does not become perfect until after the husband's death.[68]

B. Marriage[69]— 1. In General. There can be no right of dower unless there is a valid marriage.[70] There must have been legal capacity in the parties to enter into the relationship, and therefore if at the time of the marriage either party was incapable of consenting thereto because of idiocy or lunacy, and the marriage is absolutely void for this reason in the particular jurisdiction, no right of dower will accrue.[71] The same is true if for any other reason the marriage of the parties is absolutely void.[72] Unless it is otherwise by express statutory enactment, a marriage is valid and is sufficient to entitle the wife to dower, although without ceremonial celebration.[73]

2. Voidable Marriages. It is a well-established rule that all marriages which are not absolutely void but merely voidable, and which have not been annulled during the lifetime of the parties confer a right to dower upon the wife.[74] But such right is not conferred, in the absence of a statute, where the marriage is annulled in their lifetime.[75]

3. Bigamous Marriages. As a rule a woman acquires no right to dower by a marriage with a man who has a former wife living at the time, as such second marriage is absolutely null and void.[76] The same is true where a woman marries a second time while her first husband is living.[77] By the weight of authority the rule is not changed, in the absence of a statute, by the fact that the marriage was contracted by the parties in good faith, in the belief that the former husband or wife was dead;[78] but it has been held that, although at the time of the second marriage the former wife was living, a continuance of the marital relation after the death of the first wife is sufficient to raise a presumption of marriage in fact after the death of the former wife, and to give dower to the second wife.[79] A statute authorizing divorce or annulment in the case of bigamous marriages does not necessarily render such marriages voidable and not void.[80] In some jurisdictions, by express provision, they are made void only after their annulment, where they are entered into in good faith after long absence of the former spouse;[81] but their annulment bars the second wife's right to dower.[82] The fact that a woman had married a man knowing that he had a wife living does not render invalid or bar her right of dower as an incident to her subsequent marriage to another man.[83]

4. Remarriage of Divorced Persons. Where the remarriage of a husband or wife who has been divorced for his or her misconduct is prohibited by statute for a period prescribed therein, the subsequent remarriage of either of such parties within the period which is prescribed is not sufficient to support a claim for dower.[84] This does not apply, however, where the parties marry in another state where the marriage is valid.[85]

5. What Law Governs. As a general rule, if a marriage was valid in the state in which it was contracted, its validity will be recognized in another state

Lands held under contract of purchase.—A widow is not entitled to dower in lands which were held by her husband under a contract of purchase, where the husband's interest was aliened during coverture. Hicks v. Stebbins, 3 Lans. (N. Y.) 39. See infra, VI, B, 5, d, (I).

Rights of widow of heir.— If a father die and his land descends to his son as heir, subject to the dower of the mother, and dower is assigned to her in the premises, and the son dies during the continuance of her estate, the widow of the son will be entitled to dower in the remaining two thirds, but will not be entitled to dower in the reversion of that part which was assigned to the mother as tenant in dower. As to that part the moment the mother is endowed her seizin relates back to the death of the husband, and is considered a continuance of his seizin, so that there never was any seizin in the son. Dunham v. Osborn, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 634. But possession of a widow under an unassigned right of dower does not prevent the vesting of the estate of inheritance in the son, and the son's wife is vested with the inchoate right of dower in such land, which right becomes consummate upon the son's death. Null v. Howell, 111 Mo. 273, 20 S. W. 24. The heir at law, however, will not acquire seizin of the lands of his ancestor so long as the same remains in the possession death.[88] Seizin at common law need not be actual, as in the case of curtesy;[89] but a seizin in law is sufficient without a seizin in fact.[90] In other words there must be either an actual possession of a freehold estate, or a right to immediate possession or enjoyment of such an estate.[91]

2. OF ESTATE OF INHERITANCE. The seizin at common law must have been of an estate of inheritance, with a freehold vested in the deceased husband.[92]

3. REMAINDER OR REVERSION. There can be no seizin sufficient to endow the widow of a remainder or a reversion, expectant upon an estate for life, although vested, unless by a surrender or purchase of the outstanding estate to or by her husband, or by the death of the immediate fee-holder, the estate becomes entire during coverture, or unless the rule has been changed by statute.[93] The rule does not apply to a reversion after a term of years only.[94]

4. RIGHT OF ENTRY. A mere right of entry, or a right of action to obtain seizin, in the husband, is not sufficient to entitle his widow to dower,[95] unless, as is the case in some jurisdictions, the common-law rule in this respect has been changed by statute.[96] Thus where the seizin of a man is divested by the entry and control of the administrator and there are outstanding debts. Nor will the widow of the heir acquire a right of dower in land so held. Tate v. Jay, 31 Ark. 576.

Title by adverse possession.— Where the husband by length of adverse possession has acquired the right to possession of land, dower therein is assignable to the wife. Hawkins v. Page, 4 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 136.

See 17 Cent. Dig. tit. "Dower," § 10.

The reason given for the distinction on this point between dower and curtesy, it being essential for curtesy that there should have been a seizin in fact, is that it is not in the wife's power to procure an actual seizin by the husband's entry, whereas the husband has always the power of procuring seizin of the wife's land. 4 Kent Comm. 37.

91. If the husband had a complete and perfect title to the estate, whether he was in actual possession, or someone else holding in subordination to his title, the wife is endowable. Day v. Solomon, 40 Ga. 32; Nolen v. Rice, 67 S. W. 36, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2321. While the true and substantial test of the right of dower is whether the issue of the wife by the marriage might inherit the estate from the husband as his heirs, there must nevertheless be an actual seizin or the right thereto by the husband. Butler v. Cheatham, 8 Bush (Ky.) 594. Possession by the husband under a warranty deed and the making of improvements with claim of ownership is sufficient prima facie evidence of title for the purpose of a claim of dower as against a party showing no better right. Wheeler v. Smith, 50 Mich. 93, 15 N. W. 108. Mere possession by the husband, the title being in another, although he paid for the land, is insufficient. Nichols v. Park, 78 N. Y. of a disseizor before his marriage, and continues thus divested during the coverture, the husband has a right of entry upon the lands, but unless such right is exercised prior to his death, the want of seizin in him deprives his widow of her right to dower.[97] Where seizin is lost before marriage by a conveyance of land on a condition subsequent, and such condition is not complied with, thus vesting the grantor with a right of reëentry, the widow of the grantor is not entitled to dower in the lands conveyed unless the grantor has exercised such right during his lifetime.[98]

5. Unrecorded Conveyances. The general rule in the United States is that an unrecorded deed is good not only as against the grantor, his heirs and devisees, but also as against all persons having notice of the rights of the grantee, and therefore as against all such persons the wife is entitled to her dower, although the deed to her husband was not recorded;[99] although it will be otherwise if bona fide purchasers or judgment creditors acquire rights as against the unrecorded conveyance.[1] On the other hand an unrecorded deed made and delivered by the husband before marriage will divest his seizin and prevent a right of dower from attaching.[2] In North Carolina, however, it has been held that seizin is not complete, so as to entitle the widow to dower, unless the deed vesting title in the husband was duly recorded.[3]

6. Beneficial Seizin. It is well settled that to entitle a widow to dower the seizin of the husband must have been for his own use and benefit, and not in trust for another.[4]

7. Duration of Seizin. If the title to land becomes vested in the husband for his own use and benefit, although but for a moment, the right of dower attaches.[5]

97. 4 Dane Abr. 669; 1 Washburn Real Prop. § 390. And see Thompson v. Thompson, 46 N. C. 430.

Seizin of heir.— So where an ancestor has been disseized during his lifetime and dies before entry, a mere right of entry descends to the heir, and in respect of such right it makes no difference whether it comes to him before or after the marriage. In either case until he has prosecuted the right to an actual seizin the wife will not be entitled to dower. Park Dower 26; 1 Scribner Dower 256. But if land descends to a husband as heir, and he dies before entry, his wife will be entitled to her dower, and this would be the case even if a stranger should in the intermediate time by way of abatement enter upon the land, for the law contemplates a space of time between the death of the ancestor and the entry of the abator, during which time the husband has a seizin in law as heir. 4 Kent Comm. 38; Perkins, §§ 371, 372; Coke Litt. 31*a*.

But such a seizin in the husband is not sufficient to sustain a claim of dower unless it be for the use and benefit of the husband.[6]

8. Transitory Seizin — a. In General. Where the seizin of the husband is merely transitory, as where the same act which gives him the estate conveys it out of him, or where he is only a mere conduit for the passage of the title, the wife is not entitled to dower.[7]

b. Simultaneous Deed and Mortgage. A familiar illustration of the doctrine that transitory seizin is not sufficient to confer upon the wife the right of dower is where a deed for land is executed and simultaneously therewith the purchaser gives to the vendor or any other person a mortgage upon the same lands to secure the payment of any portion of the purchase-money. In such a case the purchaser acquires no such seizin, as against the holder of the mortgage, as will entitle his wife to dower.[8] The deed and mortgage, although in themselves separate and Seizin for purpose of passing title.— A widow is not entitled to dower of land of which her husband was never beneficially seized, and was only seized as a mere conduit for the passage of the title (Edmondson v. Welsh, 27 Ala. 578); as where the husband merely received title to the land as agent or trustee for the purpose of conveying it to another (Bartlett v. Gouge, 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 152). And where a disseizor employs an agent to procure a deed of land from the owner for the purpose of confirming his possession, and the agent takes the deed in his own name, the agent does not thereby acquire a seizin sufficient to confer the right of dower upon his wife. Small v. Procter, 15 Mass. 495. This principle applies where a conveyance is effected by two deeds, delivered at the same time, one conveying title to the husband and the other conveying it from him. Fontaine v. Boatmen's Sav. distinct instruments, are nevertheless regarded as parts of the same contract. They are held to constitute a single act and to result in clothing the purchaser with a transitory seizin only.[9] The two instruments need not correspond in date, provided they are delivered at the same time, since they take effect from the time of delivery only.[10] The fact that other premises of the mortgagor are included in the same mortgage as a further security for the purchase-money is not material.[11]

9. Joint Seizin. At common law the seizin of the husband must be sole. Upon estates held in joint tenancy no right of dower will attach.[12] The mere Acceptance of purchaser's notes in payment.— In McClure v. Harris, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 261, where the purchaser of lands gave to the vendor his notes for the payment of the purchase-price, which notes were secured by a mortgage upon the property purchased, it was held that the acceptance of the notes amounted to a waiver of the vendor's equitable lien, and that the title of the purchaser therefore was clear and unencumbered, and the purchaser was seized with such an interest as to confer upon the wife the right of dower, although the original consideration had not been actually paid.

Under the Georgia Code, § 1944, which declares that a mortgage is only a lien and conveys no title, the doctrine that the right of the widow to dower does not attach where a deed and mortgage are executed simultaneously because the seizin of the husband is only transitory does not apply. In Rawlings v. Lowndes, 34 Md. 639, land was conveyed by deed executed and acknowledged on a certain date, and recorded on the following day, and as security for the purchase-money the purchaser executed a mortgage of like date upon the same land, but the mortgage was not acknowledged and delivered until sixteen days after the execution and acknowledgment of the deed. It was held that the purchaser acquired such a seizin in the land as would entitle his widow to dower. The rule was laid down that the deed and mortgage should be executed and delivered simultaneously, or if executed on different days should be delivered at the same time. Compare, however, Wheatley v. Calhoun, 12 Leigh (Va.) 264, 37 Am. If the husband, being a joint tenant, conveys his interest to another, and thus at once destroys the right of survivorship and deprives himself of the property, his wife will not be entitled to dower. Mayburry v. Brien, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 21, 10 L. ed. 646. See infra, VIII, D, 15, b, (III).

possibility of the estate being defeated by survivorship prevents any dower from attaching.[13] The statutes in most of the states affecting the doctrine of survivorship in joint tenancy, and in effect changing what at common law would be a joint tenancy to a tenancy in common, have produced a modification of this rule, so that in nearly all the states at the present time a widow is entitled to dower in lands of which her husband was seized as joint tenant or tenant in common.[14]

D. Death of Husband. The last essential for the consummation of the wife's dower is the death of the husband, and by this a natural death is intended.[15] Civil death, as where the husband became a monk,[16] or where he has been convicted of a crime and sentenced for life, is not sufficient to authorize the recovery of dower,[17] unless by statutory provision.[18] In claims for dower as in other cases the husband's death may be proved presumptively by absence for a certain number of years without knowledge concerning his whereabouts.[19]

VI. PROPERTY AND ESTATES OR INTERESTS SUBJECT TO DOWER.

A. In General — 1. Lands and Tenements. As a general rule dower attaches to all lands and tenements of which the husband was seized of an estate of inheritance at any time during coverture, or under some statutes at the time of his death.[20]

The reason for the rule is thus stated in Coke Litt. 37*b*: "It is to be understood, that the wife shall not be endowed of lands or tenements, which her husband holdeth joyntly with another at the time of his death; . . . [and] the reason of this diversity is, for that the jointenant, which surviveth, claimeth the land by the feoffment, and by survivorshippe, which is above the title of dower, and may plead the feoffment made to himselfe without naming of his compagnion that died."

2. Hereditaments, Corporeal and Incorporeal. It has been said that all hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal, which savor of the realty are as a general rule subject to dower.[23] Thus certain incorporeal hereditaments which belong to the husband as an inheritance, such as rights of fishing,[24] rents,[25] or any other similar right appendant to and growing out of the realty may be allotted to a widow for her dower.[26]

3. Estates at Will and Revocable Licenses. If the husband's interest in lands is in the nature of an estate at the will of the grantor, or is a revocable privilege or license to use lands for a certain specified purpose, there can be no dower under the common law.[27]

4. Corporate Stock. It was formerly held that shares of stock in land, ferry, and railroad corporations, whose property consisted entirely or chiefly of land, were real estate and as such subject to dower.[28] But it is now generally agreed, and in some states expressly provided by statute, that such shares are personal property, and a widow therefore is not entitled to dower therein.[29]

5. Crops and Timber. Crops growing upon the land at the time it was assigned to the widow as dower will pass with the land and be deemed a part of her dower estate.[30] Timber while standing on the land is of course part of the realty and the widow's dower attaches; but if severed prior to the death of the husband it becomes personalty and the widow cannot claim dower therein.[31]

6. Mines and Quarries. Mines and quarries owned by the husband in fee and opened and worked at any time during coverture are subject to dower;[32] but at common law there can be no dower in unopened mines or quarries on the husband's lands, even if such lands have been assigned to the widow as her dower.[33]

no wise valuable except for the timber thereon.[34] In some of the states, however, statutes have excluded the widow from dower in wild and uncultivated lands, unless used in connection with the dwelling-house or with cultivated lands, in which case she is entitled.[35]

8. Proceeds of Sale or Condemnation of Land — a. In General. Where the husband's lands are sold after his death under a statute or by order of court, courts of equity will generally allow a widow her dower out of the proceeds of such sale, rather than assign it out of the real estate itself.[36] And where lands are sold for a specific purpose after the husband's death free from the widow's dower, her dower nevertheless attaches to the surplus proceeds of such sale,[37] the general rule being that such surplus shall be considered as land so far as to vest it in the persons who would have been entitled if the land had remained unsold.[38] Where land has been sold for a specific purpose, although the wife joined in the conveyance, the surplus has been held subject to her right of dower,[39] but this doctrine is not universally accepted.[40] Where a husband conveys his lands by voluntary assignment for the benefit of his creditors, without his wife joining with him in such conveyance, she is entitled to dower in the entire proceeds of the sale;[41] and where the wife joins with her husband in a deed of trust of lands for the benefit of creditors, she is entitled upon the death of the husband to Statutes in Kentucky provide that if the wife joins in a conveyance creating a lien upon her husband's lands, and the lands so encumbered are sold to satisfy such lien, she shall not be endowed thereof, but may have compensation out of the surplus. Gen. St. c. 52, art. 4, § 5. See Schweitzer v. Wagner, 94 Ky. 458, 22 S. W. 883, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 229; Tisdale v. Risk, 7 Bush 139.

In Virginia the statute provides that if a states such surplus is held to belong absolutely to the husband freed from dower rights and subject to the claims of the husband's creditors and heirs.[48] As a general rule the widow is entitled to dower in the surplus proceeds of her husband's lands after satisfying a mortgage for the purchase-money.[49]

9. Personal Property and Choses in Action. As has already been noticed[50] the definition of dower at common law and generally under the statutes confines its application to real property, and a widow is not entitled to dower in her husband's personal property or choses in action.[51] In a few states, however, the statute gives "dower" in personal property also.[52] Where personalty settled, upon marriage, to the use of the parties for life, with remainder to their issue, is converted into land by the husband after the death of the wife, his second wife will be entitled to dower in the land, although it is in other respects to be treated as personalty.[53]

10. Insurance Money. Where insured buildings on an estate in which the widow is entitled to dower have been burned after the death of the husband, she is entitled to a portion of the insurance money.[54]

B. Estates and Interests — 1. Estates of Inheritance — a. In General. Dower, from its nature and essential characteristics, only applies to estates of inheritance, legal or equitable, and the husband must have had such an estate, at some time during the coverture, or by statute in some states at the time of his death, or the widow has no dower.[55] Since the dower of the widow is a mere continuance of the estate of her husband, if his estate were less than one of inheritance her right could not extend beyond his own life.[56] While birth of issue is in no way a prerequisite to the existence of the widow's dower, the estate of the husband to which her dower attaches must be one to which her issue by possibility may or might have inherited if living.[57]

b. Exclusion of Dower by Will. Where a testator violates no rule of law he may so dispose of his lands for the benefit of a particular person that the latter's wife will not be entitled to dower therein.[58]

c. Estates Exchanged. The common law recognizes the rule that if a husband exchanges lands of which he is seized of an estate of inheritance for other lands his widow shall not have dower of both, but must make her election between the lands given or those taken in exchange.[59] To put the wife to her election there must be a mutual grant of equal interests in the respective parcels of land.[60] The statutes in some of the states recognize this rule.[61]

d. Estates in Common or Joint Tenancy. As has already been noticed, a wife is not entitled at common law to dower in an estate held by her husband as a joint tenant; but she is entitled to dower in estates held by him in common, and in most states the same is now true of estates in joint tenancy under statutes abolishing the right of survivorship and providing that the share of a joint tenant shall go to his heirs, or changing estates in joint tenancy to estates in common.[62] If partition of an estate in common is made during the lifetime of the husband his wife's dower is limited to the portion set apart to him.[63] But partition need not precede the setting aside of the widow's dower. It may first be set aside and partition be afterward made.[64]

What does not constitute exchange.—A conveyance of lands in which the wife of the grantor joins in consideration of a note, for which the grantee transfers an undivided interest in other lands and also other property, does not constitute an "exchange" of the lands so as to prevent the wife from claiming dower in the lands aequired, and also retaining the consideration received for the release of her dower in the lands conveyed. Hartwell v. De Vault, 159 Ill. 325, 42 N. E. 789. f. (ii) When Dower Rights Attach. The general rule seems to be in this country that after the satisfaction of the debts of the partnership and the claims of the other partners the widow of the deceased partner is entitled to dower in the partnership real estate.[68] Prior to the payment of the partnership debts dower will not attach, although the title to the property was taken in the individual

See 17 Cent. Dig. tit. "Dower," § 62; and cases cited in the notes following.

In Arkansas, where the statute gives dower on personal property, it has been held that upon the death of a member of a partnership his widow will take her dower in the surplus of the real estate of the partnership which remains after paying the partnership debts, for life, as in real estate, and not absolutely, as in personal property, unless there was an agreement between the partners for a conversion and sale of the lands after the partnership affairs should be settled, and a distribution of the proceeds. In that case she name of the husband and not in the name of the firm.[69] But where the real estate has once vested in the husband, the dower right of the wife cannot be defeated by a subsequent appropriation of the property by a firm of which the husband was a member.[70] The entire question of the widow's right of dower in partnership property is controlled by the agreement of the parties that the property is to be applied and treated as assets of the firm. If it is understood and agreed that such property is to remain the individual property of the members of the firm it retains its character as realty and will be subject to dower in the same manner and to the same extent as other real property.[71]

(III) ENGLISH RULE. The English rule as to partnership real property seems to be that whether purchased or used for partnership purposes or not, provided only that it was intended by the partners to constitute a part of the partnership property, it becomes ipso facto in the view of a court of equity converted into personalty for all purposes, as well for the purpose of the adjustment of the partnership debts and the claims of the partners inter se as for the purpose of determining the rights of the personal representatives or widows of deceased partners.[72] The English rule is recognized in Canada,[73] and has been to a limited extent adopted in Virginia.[74]

2. ESTATES LESS THAN OF INHERITANCE — a. Interests in Public Lands. A preëmption interest in public lands under the laws of the United States or of a state is a preferential right created by statute to purchase such land at a fixed price within a limited time. It is not in law or equity an estate of inheritance prior to making the payments of which a widow can be endowed.[75] The same is true of the interest of the locator of a mining claim prior to the payment of money for the grant of a patent as required by statute. It is only a right to the exclusive possession of the land, based on the performance of certain conditions subsequent, and is not an estate which can be subjected to dower.[76] The rule does not apply, however, where the husband had complied with the statutory requisites, but a title in him was not perfected at the time of his death.[77]

b. Estates For Life. Where an estate is created in a husband for his life only, and there is no inheritable quality attached thereto, and the title to the property passes to another, there is no estate in him to which dower can attach;[78] but if the title passes to his heirs the widow may have her dower therein.[79] It has been held that a husband cannot deprive his wife of her dower by taking a conveyance of land purchased with his own money during coverture to himself for life, with remainder to his child.[80]

c. Leasehold Interests. A perpetual leasehold estate is not an estate of inheritance within the meaning of the statute allowing dower in all lands of which the husband was seized as of an estate of inheritance.[81] Nor is a leasehold estate for a term of years an estate to which dower will attach, although the term is for ninety-nine years,[82] or for nine hundred and ninety-nine years,[83] unless it is otherwise provided by statute.[84]

84. In Arkansas where dower is given in personal property, it is held that a lease of whatever duration is but a chattel interest, and upon the death of the leaseholder his widow will take dower in it absolutely as in personal property, and not for life as in real estate. Lenow v. Fones, 48 Ark. 557, 4 S. W. 56.

In Missouri dower is assignable in leasehold estates, and the assignment thereof is right of dower; but when that estate by reason of its determinable quality is avoided or defeated the right of dower falls with it.[85]

b. Estates Defeasible by Reëntry. Where the rightful owner of land is disseized by wrongful entry of the disseizor, the estate of the disseizor is terminated by the reëntry of the rightful owner, and the owner is restored to all his original rights. By such restoration therefore the right of dower of the disseizor's wife is defeated.[86]

c. Conditional Estates. If the husband's estate of inheritance is held upon condition, by the happening of which the estate will be terminated, the wife's dower will also be dependent upon the happening of such condition, so that if the estate is terminated upon the happening of the condition and entry therefor the right of dower which depends upon it is also terminated.[87]

d. Termination of Estate by Exercise of Power of Appointment. Where lands are granted to a person to such uses as such person shall by deed or will appoint, and in default of and until such appointment to the use of such person in fee the exercise of such power during his lifetime defeats his wife's right of dower;[88] but if he dies before exercising such power his wife will be entitled to dower.[89]

e. Executory Devise. The question as to whether the widow of one to whom by executory devise an estate is given in fee simple, then over to another if he should die without issue, is entitled to dower in such estate, is one which has given rise to great diversity of opinion and elicited much learned discussion.[90] The prevailing doctrine both in this country and in England is that the widow's dower is not thus defeated.[91]

The leading case in England on this question is Buckworth v. Thirkell, 3 B. & P. 652 note, 4 Dougl. 323, 10 Moore C. P. 235 note, 28 Rev. Rep. 674, 26 E. C. L. 502, where the principle was declared that the determination of an estate by operation of an executory devise does not defeat the right of the husband to be tenant by the curtesy, nor the widow of her right of dower. This case was followed in Doe v. Timins, 1 B. & Ald. 530; Moody v. King, 2 Bing. 447, 10 Moore C. P. 233, 9 E. C. L. 654; Goodmorst v. Goodmorst, 3 Prest. Abs. 392.

The reason for the rule.— In Kentucky where there was a devise to A and his heirs, with a proviso that if he should die without heir, the estate should go to his sisters, it was held that A's widow was entitled to dower upon the ground that in all cases where the husband is seized of such an estate that the issue of the wife, if she had any, would inherit it, she is entitled to dower, although the estate is limited over, upon his dying without issue, and he does die without issue. Northcut v. Whipp, 12 B. Mon. 65.

Estate for life only.— Where there is an express estate for life to one, and a power to him to appoint the estate among certain persons, the first taker gets but an estate for life, and his widow is not entitled to dower; and where the estate is not given expressly for life, but indefinitely to a devisee, with power to appoint, at his discretion or as he pleases, among certain named persons, or to a certain class, the better opinion in England is that the devise should be construed to be a devise for life, with a power to appoint the inheritance, unless the words of the will clearly negative such a construction. b. Dower Out of Dower — (i) In General. It is a maxim of the common law of ancient origin and of common application that "dower ought not to be sought for out of dower." [97] The maxim is closely related to the doctrine excluding the right of dower from reversionary estates. It only applies, however, when dower has been actually assigned.[98]

(ii) Lands Descending Subject to Dower. It is not a bar to an action of dower that the widow of an earlier proprietor has already been assigned or recovered dower against the tenant;[99] but where lands descend subject to dower, and the dower is assigned, and the heir dies during the continuance of the estate in dower, his widow is endowable only out of the remaining two thirds.[1] The estate of the heir in the lands so descending is an estate in reversion expectant upon the life-estate of the widow of the decedent, and under the rule applicable to reversionary estates the widow of the heir can have no dower therein, if the

"Dos de dote peti non debit, is a maxim of the common law. The principle on which it rests is this: although by the descent, the seizure is cast upon the heir, yet when dower is assigned to the widow, her estate is an elongation of the estate of the husband, and her seizure relates back, so as wholly to defeat the seizure of the heir; and in respect to the part of which dower is assigned, the heir was not in contemplation of law, seized at any time during coverture." The application of this maxim is illustrated by Lord Coke as follows: "If there be grandfather, father, and sonne, and the grandfather is seised of three acres of land in fee, and taketh wife, and dieth, this land descendeth to the father, who dieth either before or after entry, now is the wife of the father dowable. The father dieth, and the wife of the grandfather is endowed of one acre and dieth, the wife of the father shall be endowed onely of the two acres residue, for the dower of the grandmother is paramount the title of the wife of the father, and the seisin of the father which descended to him (be it in law or actuall) is defeated, and now upon the matter the father had but a reversion expectant upon a frechold, and in that case, dos de dote peti non debit: although the wife of the grandfather dieth living the father's wife." Coke Litt. 31*a*.

Assignment of dower to first widow after assignment to second.— Where A acquired title to land subject to the dower right of the complainant, and after his death dower was assigned to his widow in the same, and the court subsequently assigned the same land to the elder dowress that had been assigned to A's widow, it was held that this was a fatal error, and that the subsequent assignment of dower should have been such that a proportionate part only would have been taken from the dower first assigned, and the residue from the owners of the other parts of the premises. Steele v. La Frambois, 68 Ill. 456.

99. Manning v. Laboree, 33 Me. 343.

On the other hand it is no defense as against a demand of dower that dower has been assigned in the premises to a widow whose right was subsequent to that of the demandant. Young v. Tarbell, 37 Me. 509.

1. Manning v. Laboree, 33 Me. 343; Safford v. Safford, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 259, 32 Am. Dec. 633; Dunham v. Osborn, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 634.

heir dies prior to the death of the widow of the decedent.[2] If dower has not been assigned to the ancestor's widow, the seizin of the heir is not defeated and consequently his widow is entitled to dower in the entire premises.[3] But the assignment of such dower may be made at any time either before or after the death of the heir, and when so made precludes recovery of dower by the widow of the heir.[4]

(III) LANDS ACQUIRED BY DEVISE. The rule applies as well where the lands are acquired by devise as where they come by descent.[5]

(IV) LANDS ACQUIRED BY PURCHASE. Where lands subject to dower are conveyed by the owner, the purchaser becomes seized of the whole premises, and his wife is entitled to dower in two thirds thereof, and also in the remaining one third if she survive the wife of the grantor.[6]

5. EQUITABLE ESTATES — a. Rule at Common Law. At common law seizin of a legal estate is an essential requisite to the right of dower, and therefore the widow is not entitled to dower in lands to which her husband had only an equitable title.[7]

b. Statutory Rule. The right of dower in equitable estates, however, is now in nearly every jurisdiction regulated by statute. The principle has been usually adopted of giving to the widow her equitable dower, in the descendible equitable interests of her husband of which he died seized.[8]

c. Essentials in General. To entitle the wife to dower under the statutes the husband's equity in the lands must be perfect and complete,[9] and of such a character that a court of equity would compel a conveyance of the legal title to him.[10] In most states the equitable estate of the husband must exist at the time of his death, in order to entitle his widow to dower; and therefore if the estate is alienated during his lifetime the wife's right is destroyed.[11] The statutes making equitable estates subject to dower refer to equitable estates of inheritance only.[12] Under some statutes a widow is not dowable out of an equitable estate of her husband except in intestate lands.[13]

At common law an executory contract for the purchase of lands, even with possession delivered, does not constitute such a seizin executory contract, or if for any reason he would not have been entitled to a specific performance during his lifetime, it is generally held that the right of dower will not attach.[15] In most states a widow is not entitled to dower out of lands held under contract of purchase where the husband's interest was alienated during coverture.[16]

(11) Trust Estates Held by Husband. The rule is that in equity the wife of a trustee is not dowable of the lands held by him in trust, although he holds the legal title.[17] This rule applies, although the wife had no knowledge of the trust.[18] But if there be coupled with the legal estate of the husband a substantial beneficial interest in the trust estate, it has been held that the wife's dower will attach to the extent of such beneficial interest, if it can be decreed to her without interfering with the trust estate, or defeating the purposes of the trust.[19] Where the husband as trustee acquires by purchase or otherwise the estate or interest of the beneficiary, the equitable estate is merged in the legal estate and the wife becomes entitled to dower.[20]

(III) Trust Estates Held For Benefit of Husband — (A) In General. The common law, limiting the right of dower to legal estates,[21] did not recognize a widow's claim of dower in an estate held by another in trust for her deceased husband.[22] The common-law rule remained in force in England until the passage of the Dower Act of 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 105. In many of the states the rule of the common law is either entirely abrogated or modified. In those states where the right of dower in equitable estates is declared the courts have invariably held that a wife is endowed with lands held in trust for the benefit of her husband,[23]

Where a husband in his lifetime entered into a contract for the sale of land and gave bond for title, and the purchase-money was due and unpaid at the time of his death, it was held that the legal title remained in the vendor, and that the purchaser held the land in subordination to the right of the vendor, who was in contemplation of law seized and possessed of the land at his death, so that his widow was entitled to her dower out of it. Day v. Solomon, 40 Ga. 32. See also Ragsdale v. O'Day, 61 Mo. App. 230. But where a husband had before marriage given an unconditional bond for conveyance of title to land and put the vendee in possession, it was held that the husband was to be considered as mere trustee or title-holder for use of his vendee, so that the wife of the vendee, and not the wife of the vendor, was entitled to dower. It was further held that no lien for purchase-money which the vendor might have could entitle his wife to dower. Stevens v. Smith, 4 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 64, 20 Am. Dec. 205. In those states which have not otherwise provided by statute, the common-law rule is applied and dower is excluded from the estate of the cestui que trust.[24] Where a statute confers dower in all real estate whereof the husband or any other to his use was seized of an estate of inheritance, it should be construed as conferring the right of dower in estates held in trust for the benefit of the husband.[25] The nature and object of the trust will often control the widow's right to dower in lands devised by will or conveyed by deed.[26]

(B) Lands Held by Executor, Administrator, or Guardian. Lands under the control of an executor,[27] administrator,[28] or guardian are not subject to dower unless within the statute creating such estate.[29]

(IV) LANDS PURCHASED BY HUSBAND FOR ANOTHER. Where land is purchased by one person in his name for the benefit of another, with the latter's money, the wife of the former has no dower therein;[30] but if such lands are purchased with the purchaser's own money in his own name, although held by him subject to the performance of certain agreed conditions by another person, whereupon the lands are to be again conveyed, the right of dower of the purchaser's wife attaches.[31] Where lands purchased with the husband's money are taken in the name of another person, with the fraudulent purpose of depriving his wife of her dower therein, equity will commonly intervene to protect the wife,[32] although, as in other cases where it sought to attach estates held in trust

Knickerbacker v. Seymour, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 198. Where several persons agreed to purchase lands to be held in the name of one of them, and to be sold for their joint benefit, the profits to be divided equally among them, it was held that the lands were to be treated in equity as personalty, and that upon the death of one of the cestuis que trustent his widow was not entitled to dower. for the benefit of the husband, sufficient statutory authority must be shown therefor.[33] Where lands are purchased by a husband and deeded to another in fraud of the husband's creditors, and the husband continues in possession under a life lease or other arrangement, the husband has no seizin and the wife's dower does not attach.[34]

e. Equity of Redemption — (i) In General. The right of redemption from mortgages being regarded as a mere equitable title, the common law did not recognize dower right of a widow in her husband's equity of redemption.[35] The rule which now prevails, however, in nearly all the states, either by virtue of express statutory enactment or by judicial declaration, gives to the widow her dower in an equity of redemption held by her husband, and this rule applies whether the mortgage be made before or after the marriage.[36] As will be hereafter

In this case it was held that under the statute providing that a widow shall be endowed of the third part of land of which her husband was seized of an inheritance during coverture, such widow is not entitled to have dower declared in lands which the husband pays for, and has conveyed to a third person for the purpose of depriving her of dower, under an agreement by him that the husband shall receive all the benefits of and have full control over such lands. But in an earlier New York case it was held that where a husband paid the purchase-money, but had not obtained the legal title, or had paid the consideration for the purchase of lands conveyed to a third person, his widow was entitled to dower in such equitable interest, under the Revised Statutes, provided the husband continued seized to the time of his death. noticed,[37] the widow's right of dower is subjected to the prior lien of the encumbrance; or in other words the dower attaches only to the equity of redemption and not to the property itself.[38] If the equity of redemption has been united by the lease or conveyance to the legal title of the mortgagee,[39] or if the equity did not exist in the husband at the time of his death, the widow is not entitled to dower in such equity.[40]

B. Lien of Vendor — 1. In General. Where land is sold under a contract by which the vendor retains the legal title as security for the unpaid purchase-money, or where he has an equitable lien, the lien of the vendor is paramount to the right of dower of the wife of the vendee in the lands so sold.[44]

2. Extinguishment of Lien — a. Acceptance of Other or Additional Security. If the contract of sale provides other security for the payment of the amount due, as by an indemnity bond,[45] the execution and delivery of promissory notes, secured by a mortgage on the premises sold or other lands,[46] or by any other arrangement whereby the vendee agrees to secure the performance on his part of the terms of the contract,[47] the vendor's lien is extinguished, and the wife of the vendee has her dower in the lands sold. The rule is that the acceptance of other or additional security by a vendor amounts to a waiver of his equitable lien.[48]

The lien of a wife, under the laws of Louisiana, on the future acquisitions of her husband, is superior to a second wife's right of dower in such acquisitions. Kendall v. Coons, 1 Bush (Ky.) 530.

The Georgia statute (Code, § 4694) provides that "no lien created by the husband in his life-time, though assented to by the wife, shall in any manner interfere with her right to dower," and under such statute it has been held that the widow's dower prevails as against a vendor's equitable lien. Clements v. Bostwick, 38 Ga. 1. The widow is entitled to dower in lands bargained by the husband in his lifetime to a third person, the purchase-money remaining unpaid, and the title to the land being retained by the husband in himself until his death. Slaughter v. Culpepper, 44 Ga. 319. See also Reese v. Burts, 39 Ga. 565.

48. McClure v. Harris, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 261; Hollis v. Hollis, 4 Baxt. (Tenn.) 524.

The vendor's lien exists as against the widow's dower only in those cases where the vendor's object is money, and where, having no other security, he relies on his lien for security. Meigs v. Dimock, 6 Conn. 458. So where a vendor absolutely conveys land, reserving no lien in the deed, and reciting the payment of the purchase-money, which was secured by a deed of trust on the same land executed by the vendee, the vendor has no lien, and the dower of the vendee's widow prevails. Gregg v. Jones, 5 Heisk. (Tenn.) 443.

Where a vendor waives his lien for the unpaid purchase-money to enable the vendee to raise money by a mortgage on the property, the widow of the vendee is entitled to dower in the premises. Carpenter v. Kearns, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 825.

b. Judgment For Recovery of Unpaid Purchase-Money. It has been held that if the vendor sues at law to recover the amount due upon the contract, and under a judgment recovered therein the land is sold by the sheriff after the vendee's death, the purchaser takes such land subject to the right of dower of the vendee's widow.[49]

3. Sale to Satisfy Lien. Where under the contract of sale the land is sold by the vendor to satisfy his lien, the purchaser takes free from the dower rights of the vendee's wife, whether such sale be made before or after the death of the vendee.[50] But if the sale to satisfy the vendor's lien be had subsequent to the vendee's death, his wife may have dower in the surplus, if any, remaining after the discharge of the lien.[51]

C. Rights of Mortgagees — 1. In General. The widow of a mortgagor who died seized of the mortgaged premises is entitled to dower as against all persons except the mortgagee and those claiming under him.[52]

2. Mortgages in Which Wife Did Not Join. A mortgage is a conveyance within the terms of statutes prescribing the manner in which an inchoate right of dower may be divested,[53] and therefore where a husband executes a mortgage upon lands owned by him in which his wife does not join, the wife does not thereby lose her right of dower, and upon his death she may enforce her claim against the mortgagee and those claiming under him.[54] The rights of the widow as against the mortgagee, however, are subject to control by statutory provision, and in some of the states the widow's dower is subordinated to a mortgage executed by the husband in good faith for a valuable consideration.[55]

3. WIFE JOINING IN EXECUTION OF MORTGAGE. It is usually provided by statute that where a wife joins in the execution of a conveyance, she thereby releases her dower interest in the lands conveyed, so that where a wife joins with her husband in the execution of a mortgage upon lands owned by him, she thereby loses her right of dower as against the mortgagee and those claiming under him.[56] But if the mortgage, in the execution of which the wife joined, contains provisions limiting the extent of her release, she may still claim her dower in the lands mortgaged, except as therein specified.[57] Notwithstanding the fact of her joining in the execution of a mortgage, her dower rights are paramount as against all other persons than the mortgagees, and those legally substituted in their places.[58]

4. RULE AS TO PURCHASE-MONEY MORTGAGES. As already observed, where the husband purchases land and at the time of the purchase and as a part of the same transaction executes a mortgage to the grantor for the unpaid purchase-money, the husband is only instantaneously or transitorily seized with the absolute title of the land conveyed, which is not sufficient to create in the wife a right of dower in such lands.[59] The rule therefore is invariable that where a husband purchases land and at the same time executes to the grantor a mortgage for the unpaid purchase-money, such mortgage is superior to the wife's right of dower,[60] unless there

Improvements.— A mortgage by the husband alone does not preclude dower from attaching to improvements thereafter made. Powell v. Monson, etc., Mfg. Co., 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,357, 3 Mason 459.

Void or fraudulent mortgages.— Since a deed of trust executed by the husband to secure the payment of a usurious debt is void, it does not divest the seizin of the husband, and therefore the widow's claim for dower accruing at his death is not defeated. Norwood v. Marrow, 20 N. C. 578. is statutory provision to the contrary.[61] The conveyance to the husband and the mortgage from him must be in legal effect one and the same transaction, in order to preserve the superiority of the mortgage over the wife's dower right.[62] It has been held, and the holding seems to be supported by the weight of authority, that the rule is the same where, instead of the mortgage being executed directly to the grantor, it is executed to a third person who furnishes the purchase-money.[63]

5. Redemption and Contribution by Widow — a. Right of Redemption. The right of a widow to redeem lands belonging to her husband from all charges and encumbrances thereon, valid and effectual against her, follows as a necessary incident to the right of the widow to be endowed in the equity of redemption. It is practically the universal American doctrine that the widow may redeem the husband's lands from an existing encumbrance, and thus entitle herself to dower even as against the mortgagee.[64] It has also been held that the inchoate right of

Where money is borrowed of a third person, however, and invested in the purchase of lands, it has been held that it is not purchase-money within the meaning of the statute, and hence a mortgage given to secure the same is not superior to the widow's right of dower. dower of a wife is a sufficient interest to sustain an application by her to redeem the mortgage of her insolvent husband during his lifetime.[65] This principle has also been applied to purchase-money mortgages.[66]

b. Necessity of Redemption. Where under the rule as already stated a mortgage against a husband's lands is paramount to his widow's claim for dower, it will be necessary for the widow in order to assert her claim as against the mortgagee and those claiming under him to redeem such lands by paying the amount of the mortgage.[67] She must redeem the entire premises by paying the whole of the mortgage debt in order to entitle herself to dower as against the mortgagee.[68] A mortgagee cannot be compelled to accept payment of a part only of his debt, and surrender a proportionate interest in the mortgaged estate.[69]

c. Contribution by Widow — (i) General Rule. Where a person having the right to redeem has redeemed lands from a mortgage which was superior to the dower interest of the widow of the mortgagor, the widow must contribute her ratable proportion of the amount paid before she can be endowed of any portion of the mortgaged lands.[70]

(II) Redemption Out of Estate of Husband. If the mortgage be paid either by the husband during his lifetime,[71] or after his death by his administrators or executors out of the estate, the widow is entitled to dower without contribution.[72]

(III) Effect of Purchase of Equity of Redemption. Where a purchaser of the equity of redemption, under a mortgage in which the wife of the mortgagor joined, is not bound to pay the mortgage debt, but does in fact pay it, in aid of his own title and estate, whereby the mortgage is discharged, the wife's claim of dower is subject in equity to a just contribution.[73]

(IV) Extent of Contribution. To preserve her dower the widow must contribute an amount sufficient to keep down the interest on one third of the amount paid in satisfaction of the mortgage.[74] In other words she must pay a part of the sum paid upon the mortgage, proportionate to the value of her dower, which will be the interest on one third of the mortgage debt for her life or a gross sum equivalent thereto.[75]

(V) Reimbursement of Widow. If the widow, in the exercise of her right to redeem, pays the whole of the mortgage debt, she may take and hold possession of the mortgaged premises as against all those whose duty it is to contribute, until she has been reimbursed to the extent of the proportionate shares properly chargeable against the other parties in interest.[76]

d. Mortgage Satisfied Out of Husband's Estate — (I) ENGLISH DOCTRINE. In England the doctrine has been declared that a dowress, like an heir or devisee, has a right to have the personal estate of her husband applied so far as it will go in discharge of mortgages and other debts contracted by the husband, which are charges upon the land which she holds in dower.[77]

(II) AMERICAN RULE. The English doctrine, however, has not been universally accepted in the United States. The weight of authority, independent of statutory enactment, is against the right of a widow to have mortgages and other encumbrances satisfied from the personal estate of the husband in order to preserve her right of dower in her husband's lands.[78] The question is controlled to a certain extent by the statutes in the several states.[79]

D. Mechanics' Liens. In most jurisdictions a widow's dower is not affected by the statutory mechanic's lien for labor performed or materials furnished in the improvement of her husband's lands.[80]

E. Partnership Claims. As has already been shown, the doctrine as applied in most of the states gives to the widow of a deceased partner her right of dower in the partnership real estate after the satisfaction of the partnership debts and the possessing in contemplation of law many of the incidents of property to be estimated and valued as such.[4]

2. MODIFICATION BY STATUTE. As we have seen, before the death of the husband and while the right of dower is in the inchoate stage, it is subject to legislative control, and may be enlarged, diminished, or altered.[5]

3. ACCRUAL OF RIGHT. Marriage and seizin are essential to the existence of an inchoate right of dower, as has already been noticed in respect to a widow's dower right.[6]

4. DETERMINATION OF VALUE OF RIGHT. When it becomes necessary to determine the value of the wife's inchoate dower interest in her husband's lands it is competent to show the age, health, and habits of both the husband and the wife,[7] and also to consult mortality tables of recognized authority.[8]

B. Preservation of Right — 1. IN GENERAL. An inchoate right of dower is a subject of judicial protection.[9] It has been held therefore that the wife may sue in her own name to set aside a deed or other instrument made by her husband in fraud of her dower.[10] On the other hand, however, it has been held that a wife's inchoate interest in her husband's lands cannot be the subject of a suit by her to quiet title.[11]

2. IN PROCEEDS OF SALE OF HUSBAND'S LANDS. The cases are not entirely uniform as to the right of a wife to have set apart for her a proportionate interest in the surplus remaining after the sale of her husband's lands and the disposition of the proceeds thereof to satisfy mortgages or other encumbrances upon such lands superior to her dower right. Effect as to rights of creditors— A statute which attempts to convert a wife's inchoate right into a vested one upon a sale under a mortgage executed before its passage is unconstitutional, as impairing the creditor's contract right to all the land, subject only to the wife's inchoate interest. Rule of computation.— It has been held that where the husband and wife are both living, the rule for computing the present value of the wife's inchoate right of dower is to calculate the expectation of life of the wife, and the probability of the joint lives of the husband and wife, and from the present value of an annuity payable while the wife lives deduct the present value of an annuity payable while both are living. Strayer v. Long, 86 Va. 557, 10 S. E. 574. authority is in favor of protecting the wife's inchoate dower right to this extent.[12] This subject is controlled by statute in some of the states.[13]

3. In Condemnation Proceedings. According to the better view, where proceedings are instituted to condemn real estate for a public use, and an award of damages is made, the inchoate right of dower of the owner's wife will be protected, and her interest in the award will be preserved to her.[14]

4. As Against Husband's Creditors. It has also been held that where lands are sold on foreclosure and a surplus remains after satisfying the mortgage debt the wife's portion thereof may be invested for her benefit free from the claims of creditors, judgment or otherwise, the income thereof to be paid to the husband during their joint lives, and to her during her own life if she survive her husband.[15] If a wife receives real estate or other property in consideration of her release of dower, she holds the same free from the claims of her husband's creditors to the extent of the value of the right released by her.[16]

C. Right Absolute During Life of Husband — 1. Judicial Sale of Husband's Lands. In Indiana it is provided by statute that the wife's inchoate interest in her husband's lands, unless directed by the court to be sold or barred by the court's judgment, becomes absolute in all cases of judicial sale, in the same manner and to the same extent as such inchoate interest becomes absolute on the death of the husband.[17] The statute applies to lands conveyed to an assignee in bankruptcy, such a conveyance being in legal effect a judicial sale.[18] The absolute interest thus conferred is free from the demands of her husband's general creditors, but not from prior conveyances by way of mortgage.[19] The interest of the wife becomes vested and absolute on the day of the sale.[20] Such a statute is not retroactive in effect and does not apply where the encumbrance under which the sale was had was created prior to its enactment.[21]

2. DIVORCE FOR HUSBAND'S MISCONDUCT. The statutes in some of the states provide that in case the wife procures a divorce from her husband on account of his misconduct her inchoate interest shall become absolute, and she is entitled to dower in his land in the same manner as if he were dead.[22] Such statutes have no retroactive effect, and consequently as to all lands conveyed by the husband before they were enacted a claim for dower must be postponed until his actual decease.[23] The divorce to render the wife's interest in her husband's real property absolute must be granted for the misconduct of the husband alone.[24] The wife under such statutes is entitled to have dower set off to her at the time the divorce is granted.[25]

provided that when a marriage is dissolved by the husband being sentenced to imprisonment for life, the wife shall be entitled to her dower in his lands in the same manner as if he were dead.[26]

D. Bar, Release, or Forfeiture — 1. IN GENERAL. In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, when the wife's inchoate dower right has once attached it cannot be divested except by some act of her own, done according to the forms and in the manner prescribed by statute.[27] Any subsisting claim or encumbrance existing before the inception of the wife's interest, which would have defeated the husband's seizin, will be a bar to her dower; but the wife's right remains unaffected by any act of the husband subsequent to the marriage.[28]

2. ALIENAGE OF HUSBAND OR WIFE. At common law, alienage on the part of the husband or wife was a disability preventing the attachment of dower to the husband's lands, but this disability is removed by statute in most of the states.[29]

3. ATTAINDER OF HUSBAND. The common law precluded the attachment of dower to the real property of a man convicted of treason or felony,[30] but this principle has never been introduced into the law of this country.[31]

4. BAR OF JUDGMENT IN ACTION AGAINST WIFE — a. In General. If in an action to which the wife is a party facts are alleged as a bar to the wife's right of dower, the judgment therein based upon such facts precludes a subsequent assertion of her rights;[32] but it is otherwise if the wife's right of dower is not in issue in the action;[33] and as a rule she will not be precluded by judgments in actions to which she is not a party.[34]

b. Partition Proceedings. An inchoate right of dower may be determined in a partition suit to which the wife is made a party,[35] but if the wife is not made a party she will not be bound by the decree,[36] although she may be precluded by an actual partition.[37] The effect of a decree of sale in a partition suit as against the wife's dower right will be hereafter considered.[38]

5. EFFECT OF SEPARATE ESTATE. In Alabama it is provided that if a wife have a separate estate which, exclusive of the rents, income, and profits, is equal to or greater in value than her dower interest in her husband's estate, she shall not be entitled to dower therein; and if her estate be less in value than her dower she is only entitled to such share of her husband's property as will with her separate estate be equal to her dower interest in case she had no separate estate.[39] There is a somewhat similar provision in Mississippi under which the ownership of a separate estate will diminish or defeat the dower right.[40]

6. Unrecorded Deeds. The rights of a widow to dower in lands held by her husband under an unrecorded deed will largely depend upon the effect accorded to unrecorded conveyances by the recording acts of the several states.[41] But ordinarily the failure or neglect of a husband to record a deed will not deprive his widow of her dower rights as against subsequent purchasers with notice that the deed was not recorded,[42] nor as against a purchaser of the land at a sheriff's sale, under execution against the husband.[43]

7. Adverse Possession. Loss of title to lands of which the husband was seized during coverture by adverse possession does not affect his widow's right to dower therein.[44] The statute of limitations applicable to realty actions cannot be applied so as to prejudice the wife's claim by the laches of her husband.[45] Nor is a wife's dower barred by adverse possession and payment of taxes after a transfer of a husband's lands by means of a tax deed during his lifetime.[46]

8. Dedication or Appropriation to Public Use — a. Dedication by Owner. Where land is dedicated by the owner to a public use, as for a street, highway, or market-place, such dedication divests the wife's right of dower.[47] And where a quasi-public corporation, such as a railroad company, having authority to acquire lands for a public use and hold the same in fee, takes lands by grant from the owner for a right of way or other public purpose, the wife's right of dower is effectually barred.[48]

b. Condemnation. So, by the weight of authority, where lands are lawfully taken by virtue of the right of eminent domain, in pursuance of proceedings provided by statute, by a municipal, railroad, or other corporation for a public use, the corporation, upon payment of the appraisal value to the owner of the fee, acquires an absolute title to such lands, divested of any inchoate right of dower existing in the owner's wife.[49]

9. Estoppel of Wife — a. In General. As a general rule acts of the wife during coverture to operate as a bar of dower by way of estoppel must in effect amount to one of the modes pointed out by the common law or recognized by statute as constituting a bar.[50] It has been held, however, that acts and conduct sufficient to constitute an equitable estoppel will bar the right.[51]

b. Acquiescence or Silence of Wife. If a wife during coverture merely acquiesces in an adverse possession of lands alleged to belong to her husband,[52] or remains silent when lands in which she claims dower are sold or advertised for sale,[53] she is not precluded thereby from asserting her dower rights. But it is otherwise where she knowingly permits the purchaser to pay for lands to which her dower has attached and accepts and enjoys her portion of the purchase-money,[54] or fraudulently misrepresents or conceals facts for the purpose of induc-

Acceptance by wife of lands sold under execution under a trust deed conveying it to a trustee for her separate use, and her entry into possession of such lands under such deed, does not constitute an acceptance of an estate inconsistent with her inchoate dower right, since the purchaser at the execution sale takes only the judgment debtor's interest in the land, which is subject to his wife's inchoate right of dower, and can convey nothing more to the trustee. ing the purchaser to buy.[55] And where as administratrix of her husband's estate she sold land by order of a court, and in her deed covenanted to warrant the title, she was held to have thereby barred herself of dower.[56]

c. Express Waiver of Dower at Sale. A public oral announcement by the wife at a judicial sale of her husband's lands that she will not claim dower therein against a purchaser at such sale estops her from asserting dower against one purchasing in reliance on such announcement.[57] Any unequivocal act or declaration on her part, inducing the purchaser to act upon the belief that she had no claim for dower, will be sufficient.[58]

d. Agreements Between Husband and Wife. An indenture or an agreement made by a wife with her husband, either before or after marriage, to release her dower in his lands is not effectual as an estoppel of her claim for dower, unless ratified by her subsequent to the husband's death.[59]

e. Failure to Assert Marital Rights. It has been held that a wife will not be estopped in a court of law from asserting her claim for dower by a recognition on her part, after a voluntary separation from her husband, of his right to marry another woman, or of the validity of his supposed subsequent marriage;[60] but this doctrine is not universally sustained.[61]

10. Misconduct of Wife — a. Elopement and Adultery — (i) In General. In the absence of a statute mere adultery of the wife cannot be set up as a bar of dower, either at common law or in equity,[62] even though she elope with the adulterer.[63] And where adultery of the wife proved in an action for divorce is a statutory bar of dower it will not be sufficient to prove such adultery in any other action.[64]

(II) Statutory Provisions. The English statute, 13 Edw. I, c. 34, commonly called the Statute of Westminster Second, provided that if a wife elope from her husband and continue with an adulterer, she shall be barred of her dower, unless her husband willingly, and without coercion of the church, reconcile her, and suffer her to dwell with him. A number of the states have expressly reënacted this provision of law, either in substance or effect,[65] while in other states it is impliedly recognized as a part of the American common law without such reënactment.[66] In some of the states, however, notably Massachusetts[67] and Rhode Island,[68] the courts have refused to give it effect and have held that the statutory law controlling the subject of dower has superseded or is inconsistent with it.[69] Under the statute of Westminster and like statutes in the United States, mere adultery without desertion or elopement or cohabitation with the coadulterer does not bar dower.[70]

(III) Elopement Must Be Voluntary. It will be noticed that the statutes of the states which have adopted adulterous elopement as a bar provide that the departure of the wife must be voluntary on her part, so that, where the wife's desertion was caused by the husband's cruelty or neglect, her subsequent adultery will not constitute a bar.[71]

(IV) Continued Adultery. Under such statutes it is not necessary that the adulterous cohabitation be continuous with one man, but it is sufficient if the wife has sexual intercourse with any man or men periodically or when convenient.[72]

b. Desertion, Abandonment, or Murder of Husband. Except as otherwise provided by statute, mere desertion by the wife of the husband does not bar her dower, for the widow's estate does not depend upon the existence of the family relation at the death of the husband.[73] In some of the states, however, it is expressly required by statute that the wife shall be living with her husband at the time of his death, unless absent with his consent or by his default, in order to entitle her to dower.[74] It has been held that a widow who has murdered her husband is not thereby barred of her dower.[75]

not operate as a bar to the right of dower.[81] Of course dower is not barred by a decree of divorce which is void for want of jurisdiction or otherwise,[82] or which is set aside because fraudulently obtained by the husband in his lifetime;[83] but this does not apply where the decree is merely voidable and has not been set aside.[84]

b. Statutory Provisions. It is sometimes provided by statute that a wife who procures a divorce for the misconduct of her husband shall be protected in her dower rights,[85] and also provided, or left as in the absence of any statute, that a divorce procured by the husband for the wife's misconduct bars absolutely her claim for dower.[86] In some states divorce a vinculo matrimonii for the misconduct of either party bars dower,[87] but provision is made by statute for an immediate disposition of the husband's property by way of alimony in lieu of dower.[88] Statutes prescribing or changing the dower rights of a woman in case of divorce do not operate retrospectively.[89]

d. Effect of Remarriage. If under the statute a divorced wife is entitled to dower in her former husband's real estate, such right will be protected notwithstanding the remarriage of the husband, the dower rights of the second wife being subject to the encumbrance of the first wife's prior rights.[91] Unless the divorce bars dower, the wife's subsequent remarriage does not preclude recovery of dower in the estate of her former husband.[92]

e. Effect of Foreign Divorce. Whether a statute of one state, securing or denying the right of dower in case of divorce, extends to a divorce obtained in a court of another state, having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties, depends very much upon the terms of the statute, and upon its interpretation by the courts of the state by the legislature of which it is passed, and in which the land is situated.[93] The authorities are therefore more or less conflicting, but they seem to favor the proposition that unless otherwise provided by statute a decree of divorce granted in one state, effectual as determining the status of the parties, cannot operate extraterritorially to deprive a wife of dower in her husband's lands situated in another state.[94]

f. Bar by Agreement or Estoppel. Although by statute the wife may be entitled to dower after obtaining a divorce for her husband's misconduct, her right to dower may be barred where, by agreement or by a consent decree in the divorce proceeding, she accepts alimony or other provision in lieu of dower.[95]

12. JOINTURES — a. Definition and Effect in General. Dower may be barred by settling upon the wife previous to marriage a provision to be accepted by her in lieu of dower. This is commonly called a jointure, although strictly speaking the term signifies a joint estate, limited to both husband and wife.[96] There are two kinds of jointure, legal and equitable.

b. Legal Jointure — (I) STATUTE OF USES. The statute of uses in effect fastened the legal estate to the use and attempted to combine both the legal and equitable estates in the person in whose favor the use had been declared. To avoid an endowment of the wife of all the husband's estate, leaving her also her separate provision, the statute provided that if lands were conveyed for the benefit of a wife before marriage as her jointure she could not claim dower unless evicted from her jointure lands.[97] The provisions of this act have been substantially adopted as a part of the statute law of nearly all the states, with conditions and requirements conforming to a greater or less extent with those of the original statute of uses.[98]

(II) REQUISITES OF LEGAL JOINTURE. Four requisites are prescribed by the original statute, and are either expressly enacted as a part of the statutes of the several states upon the subject or are declared by the courts to be the law in this country, as follows: (1) The jointure must take effect immediately upon the death of the husband;[99] (2) it must be for her own life at least, and not for the life of another, or for any term of years, or other smaller estate;[1] (3) it must be made Definition.— Jointure is defined by Lord Coke as "a competent livelihood of freehold for the wife of lands and tenements; to take effect, in profit or possession, presently after the death of the husband, for the life of the wife at least." 1 Inst. 36. The term "jointure" as used in the Revised Statutes of Kentucky has been held to denote any species of estate, in real or personal property, created by conveyance or devise, intended to be in lieu or satisfaction of dower. Tevis v. McCreary, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 151. It means such an estate as may be conveyed or devised to the wife in lieu of dower. Pepper v. Thomas, 85 Ky. 539, 4 S. W. 297, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 122. The term in the Maine statute has been held to be used in its well-known and established legal sense. Vance v. Vance, 21 Me. 364. As used in the Nebraska statute the term signifies an estate or property settled on a woman in consideration of marriage and to be enjoyed by her after her husband's decease. Fellers v. Fellers, 54 Nebr. 694, 74 N. W. 1077. When a marriage contract does not amount to more than a reservation of the right to dispose of the individual property at death, and no disposition is made by the parties, it is not a jointure which will bar the wife's claim to dower. It must be such an estate as to certainty and kind that the wife on the death of the husband may take possession thereof, and hold it in severalty and not in common with others (Grogan v. Garrison, 27 Ohio St. 50); and where the jointure is not absolutely and completely settled on the wife by deed, but rests on the articles or on her husband's covenant, she may at her election disregard it and claim dower (Woodward v. Woodward, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 49).

to herself and not to another in trust for her;[2] and (4) it must be made in satisfaction of the whole dower and not of any portion of it, and should so appear in the deed.[3]

(III) MADE AFTER MARRIAGE. Jointure to be a complete bar to dower must have been made before marriage.[4] If it be made after marriage the widow has her election either to accept it or to take her dower at common law.[5]

e. Equitable Jointures. As a rule an equitable jointure to bar dower must be a provision to take effect in possession or profit immediately upon the death of the husband, and to continue during the life of the widow;[6] although if the intended wife be of age, and expressly consent to accept a less advantageous provision in lieu of dower, either as to the time when the jointure is to take effect,[7] or as to the period for which it is to continue,[8] she will be barred of a recovery of her dower. In any event the provision to constitute an equitable jointure must be a reasonable and competent livelihood for the wife, having reference to the circumstances and situation in life of the parties, the value of the husband's estate, and the value of the property received by the husband from or through his wife.[9] In many of the states the distinction between legal and equitable jointures is abolished by statute.[10]

d. Eviction or Deprivation of Jointure. If a wife is evicted of her jointure, she will be entitled to dower as if no jointure had been made.[11] In Kentucky, by statute, if she is lawfully deprived of any part of her jointure, without any act of her own, she is entitled to indemnity out of her husband's estate;[12] but this does not entitle her to be indemnified for such loss by way of dower out of lands conveyed to third persons by the husband.[13]

13. ANTENUPTIAL SETTLEMENTS OR AGREEMENTS[14]— a. In General. It has been held that at common law the right of dower could not be waived or lost by an agreement in lieu of dower made before marriage,[15] upon the ground that the intended wife could not alien or dispose of her dower right in consequence of two maxims of the common law: (1) That no right can be barred before it accrues; and (2) that no right or title to an estate of freehold can be barred by a collateral satisfaction.[16] But other cases are to the effect that a feme sole of full age and competent to contract may bar her dower by antenuptial contract, the consideration of marriage, or of the settlement upon the wife of a portion of her intended husband's estate in lieu of dower, being deemed sufficient.[17] And in equity the general rule is that any reasonable and bona fide agreement made before marriage between parties competent to contract, whereby the wife is secured in the enjoyment of a portion of her husband's estate, either during coverture or after his death, in lieu of her dower, will be enforced.[18] To be effectual as a bar the provision must be clearly shown in the instrument itself to have been made in lieu or in satisfaction of dower.[19] The provisions of a statute that a jointure is a bar of dower do not ordinarily deprive an intended wife of the power to bar her dower by any other form of antenuptial contract.[20]

b. Statutory Provisions. It is provided by statute in many states that any pecuniary provision, made for the benefit of an intended wife and in lieu of dower, if assented to by her as prescribed therein, bars her right or claim of dower in all the lands of her husband.[21]

c. Fairness and Reasonableness of Provision. An antenuptial agreement making provision for the wife in lieu of dower must be reasonable in itself and founded on adequate consideration,[22] and must be made fairly, without fraud or imposition, and with a full understanding of its force and effect on the part of the wife.[23] Such agreements will be regarded with the most rigid scrutiny and will not be enforced against the wife where the circumstances show that she has Sufficient performance.— The execution of a conveyance in trust to a trustee to convey certain lands to a wife after the husband's death is sufficient performance of an antenuptial agreement whereby the wife agreed to take such lands after the husband's death in lieu of dower. Worrell v. Forsyth, 141 Ill. 22, 30 N. E. 673. And where the contract provided that the parties should retain their respective estates, and that in case of the husband's death the wife surviving a certain sum should be paid her, and she covenanted to release all claims against his estate except the payment of such sum, it was held that upon the death of the husband without assets the wife was nevertheless barred of dower. enforce such an agreement and exclude her from dower unless she relinquishes or accounts for the pecuniary benefits received by her as a consideration therefor,[29] provided it specifically appear that the settlement or provision was made and accepted in lieu of dower,[30] and provided it is shown that the agreement was made with full knowledge on her part of the value of the interests she was receiving and giving up, and that there was no inequality.[31] An acceptance and enjoyment of such benefits by the wife may be deemed an election to waive dower and take under the agreement.[32]

b. Statutory Provisions. In some states power to bar dower by post-nuptial agreement has been held to be impliedly conferred by the married women's acts of the several states, permitting married women to dispose of their interests and to make contracts as if they were single,[33] while in other states such acts have been construed as not conferring this power.[34] In some jurisdictions the validity and effect of such agreements is regulated and determined by special statutory

In Maine before dower was abolished the widow's right of dower could be barred by a pecuniary provision made for her benefit and consented to by her, or if she should not within six months after her husband's death make her election to waive such provision and file the same in writing in the probate court. marriage are made free of the claim of dower,[39] even if according to some authorities such conveyances had not been recorded.[40] And although a deed executed before marriage is not delivered until after marriage, if it is devoid of fraudulent intent as against the wife, the grantee will take the land unincumbered by the dower right.[41]

(II) Contracts For Sale of Land. Where a contract for the sale of land is executed by the owner before marriage, but the land is conveyed subsequent thereto, the conveyance constitutes an equitable bar of the wife's right of dower,[42] if the contract, not being in writing, has been in part performed by the purchaser.[43]

marriage have been sustained, where the intention is to reasonably provide for the children, and not to defraud the wife, but it is otherwise where there is concealment or fraud as against the wife.[45]

(IV) Conveyance Fraudulent as to Creditors. A conveyance of lands by a husband before marriage in fraud of his creditors effectually bars his widow's dower therein, for the conveyance is binding on him, and she can claim only through his title.[46] This has been held, although such conveyance was subsequently set aside by the husband's creditors.[47]

b. After Marriage — (I) In General. At common law the wife's inchoate dower right attaches on the marriage and seizin of the husband during coverture,[48] and after it has thus attached the general rule is that no act of the husband alone in the nature of an alienation, conveyance, or other charge will defeat it.[49]

(II) Statutory Modification of Rule. In many jurisdictions the common-law rule has been modified by statutory provision that the widow's dower attaches only to the lands of which the husband died seized, and in effect providing that the husband's alienation of his lands during coverture deprives the wife of her dower.[50] Under such a statute a wife is not entitled to dower in land conveyed by the husband with intent to defraud his creditors, although the conveyance is set aside after his death at the suit of creditors.[51] In Kentucky the husband is authorized to convey his lands after marriage, free from dower, to satisfy a lien created by a deed in which she joined, or to satisfy a lien for purchase-money.[52]

(III) Conveyances of a Special Character. In those jurisdictions in which dower does not attach to lands held in joint tenancy, the conveyance by a joint tenant of his interest in such lands deprives his wife of her dower;[53] but where dower attaches to such lands there cannot be a valid conveyance by one joint tenant alone to preclude his wife's dower.[54] Where an equal and fair division is made of the lands held in common among the tenants, the right of dower of the wife of either of them will only attach to the part assigned to her husband.[55] A conveyance of partnership lands required for the payment of partnership debts and for the purpose of winding up the affairs of the partnership deprives the wives of the partners of their dower interests in such lands.[56] And a reconveyance of lands to satisfy an encumbrance created by a prior conveyance,[57] or a lien for the purchase-money,[58] terminates the wife's inchoate right of dower, although she did not join therein.

(IV) Conveyances to Children or Heirs. Conveyances to children or heirs made by a husband after marriage are subject to the same rules as conveyances to strangers, and unless otherwise provided by statute do not affect the dower right of the wife.[59]

(V) Conveyances With Intent to Bar Dower. It has been held in jurisdictions in which the widow's dower depends upon the seizin or possession of the husband at the time of his death, that any conveyance made in fraud of the wife's dower is void as to her.[60]

The inchoate right of dower attaches at common law to all lands acquired by the husband during coverture and cannot be divested either by the voluntary act of the husband,[63] or by a decree or judgment rendered in a proceeding instituted by creditors for the payment of the husband's debts, or a sale thereunder, unless there is a statutory provision to the contrary.[64] This rule does not apply, however, under statutes giving the wife dower of those lands only of which the husband dies seized and possessed.[65] And a sale under a judgment or decree to satisfy a lien which existed upon land at the time of the owner's marriage, or at the time he acquired the land, will defeat his wife's right to dower,[66] except out of the surplus proceeds after satisfaction of the debt.[67] Where by statute, as in some jurisdictions, there is no right of dower in land held by the husband by executory contract or other equitable title unless he had such title at the time of his death,[68] a judicial sale during marriage of land so held bars dower.[69] Where land is sold under a decree of court for purchase-money, the purchaser takes it discharged of the widow's right of dower.[70]

b. Under Mortgage Foreclosure Proceedings — (I) In General. Except as already noted mortgages executed by the husband alone on his lands during coverture cannot impair the wife's right of dower,[71] and it necessarily follows that where, under the rules as already stated, the wife's right of dower is paramount to the mortgage, a decree in foreclosure directing a sale of the mortgaged premises and an application of the proceeds to the payment of the mortgage debt will not divest the wife of her interest.[72] It is otherwise where the mortgage existed at the time of the marriage, or where by statute it is paramount to the wife's dower right.[73] If the wife joins with her husband in the mortgage, how-

In Tennessee, in order to exclude the widow's right of dower in mortgaged lands under the Code (1896), § 4140, giving dower in mortgaged land where the husband dies before foreclosure of the mortgage, it is not necessary that her husband's title shall have been divested and vested formally by a decree of court. ever, she is bound by its terms and her dower interest may be divested by a foreclosure sale.[74]

(II) PURCHASE-MONEY MORTGAGE. A purchase-money mortgage executed by the husband alone is generally held to be a superior encumbrance to the wife's right of dower,[75] so that a decree of sale in proceedings for the foreclosure of such a mortgage and a sale thereunder bar the right of dower of the mortgagor.[76]

(III) WIFE AS A PARTY. Where a wife did not join in a mortgage she cannot be divested of her right of dower by being made a party to the proceedings to foreclose the mortgage unless her right is put in issue.[77] In some jurisdictions it is held that the right of dower of a widow is not assertable in a suit for foreclosure of a mortgage,[78] and that, although a party to such a suit, she is not estopped by the decree from establishing her right of dower in an action at law.[79] A wife's inchoate right of dower in premises conveyed to her husband will not be barred by a decree in a suit to foreclose a mortgage in existence at the time of the conveyance unless she is made a party thereto.[80]

voluntary conveyance of the husband at the date of the inception of the lien.[83] But if the lands are sold under an execution for the enforcement of a lien paramount to the wife's right of dower, such sale effectually bars such right.[84]

(11) Law Governing Right of Dower. Where lands are sold upon execution during the lifetime of the husband, the law in force at the time of the death of the husband will control the right of dower of the widow as against the purchaser at such sale.[85]

d. Sale or Division in Partition. As has already been noticed the seizin of a husband who acquires title to land as a tenant in common is subject to the paramount right of his cotenants to demand partition;[86] and therefore his wife's right of dower in such land is subject to be defeated by a sale of such land in proceedings instituted by one of the cotenants for a partition, although the wife be not a party. This is the rule laid down by a majority of the cases, and seems based upon the better reasoning and generally accepted as the true doctrine.[87]

e. Tax-Sale. The effect of a sale of lands for unpaid taxes upon the inchoate right of dower of the owner's wife will depend upon the character of the title secured by the purchaser under the statute authorizing the sale. If the purchaser is vested under the statute with an absolute title to the lands, regardless of the condition of title at the time of the sale, the wife's dower is barred in the same manner and to the same extent as are the rights of other parties in interest.[88] But if the statute only authorizes a sale for unpaid taxes of the right, title, and inter-

f. Sale by Guardian. A sale by a husband's guardian by order of court to pay the balance of the unpaid purchase-price and other debts will not bar the wife's dower where she was not a party to the proceeding had to procure the order.[90]

17. Release by Wife[91]— a. In General. The power of a wife to release her inchoate right of dower by her own voluntary act has always been recognized. As may be inferred from references already made it is as a general rule only by her own act in person that this right may be relinquished.[92] But a wife's inchoate right of dower cannot be the subject of grant or assignment,[93] and a grantee or mortgagee, claiming under an instrument in which a married woman has released her dower, acquires no title to or interest in her dower when the estate becomes absolute.[94] A valid release operates only as an extinguishment of the dower right, and the grantee and all those claiming under him take the land freed from the encumbrance of such right.[95]

b. Methods Employed — (I) Joining With Husband in Execution of Deed — (A) In General. The usual way of barring dower in this country by the voluntary act of the wife has always been by her joining with her husband in a properly executed and acknowledged deed of conveyance of the land.[96] This mode is either authorized by statutory enactment variously expressed in the several states, or is inferentially recognized by provisions pertaining to the power of a husband to divest his wife of her dower right.[97] Where the statute points out the mode of release by joining with the husband in the deed of conveyance, there must be a substantial compliance therewith.[98]

(B) Sufficiency of Deed. If the deed in the execution of which the wife joined is insufficient to pass title,[99] or was undelivered at the husband's death,[1] or the husband had no title in the lands attempted to be conveyed,[2] the relinquishment of dower therein contained becomes inoperative.[3]

(C) Sufficiency of Release by Wife. To determine the sufficiency of the release expressed in a deed in the execution of which the wife has joined, recourse must be had to the statute under which the release was executed. The release is as a rule required to be executed with the same formality as any other instrument conveying an interest in real property, and there must be a formal acknowledgment in the manner required by statute for the acknowledgment of instruments conveying interests in real property by married women.[4] Where Subsequent release of dower.— A release of dower executed by the wife alone long after the conveyance of the land by the husband, and for a new consideration, was formerly held in Massachusetts not to be an extinguishment of dower (Page v. Page, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 196; Powell v. Monson, etc., Mfg. Co., 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,356, 3 Mason 347); but it is now provided by statute that a wife may release her dower in lands already conveyed, "by a subsequent deed executed separately or jointly with her husband" (Mass. Rev. L. (1902) c. 132, § 5). The former Massachusetts rule was followed in Maine (French v. Peters, 33 Me. 396; Shaw v. Russ, 14 Me. 432); but under the existing law in Maine a wife may bar her interest in her husband's estate by her sole deed (Rev. St. (1903) c. 77, § 9). But the Maine act was held not to authorize the wife to divest by her sole deed a right of dower existing prior to the taking effect of that act. A power to sell, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of lands given by a non-resident married woman, who is given by statute the authority to convey real estate by power of attorney, is broad enough to include her husband.[17] A wife, acting under such a statute, may appoint her husband as such attorney with full power to release her dower.[18]

(iv) Joining With Husband's Representative. A wife of a lunatic cannot bar her dower by joining with her husband's guardian in the execution of a deed.[19] But a release may be made by the wife joining in a deed with a representative of her husband acting under a duly executed power of attorney.[20]

c. Release by Infant Wife. In the absence of a statute to the contrary a release of dower by an infant married woman is ineffectual to divest her rights, because of her incapacity to bind herself.[21]

d. Release Where Wife Is Insane. Except as authorized by statute the dower of an insane wife cannot be divested by the guardian of such wife or by an order of the court.[22] But provision is made by statute in many jurisdictions for the release of an insane wife's dower by judicial proceedings, or by act of the wife's guardian under the court's control.[23]

e. Fraudulent Representations. False representations as to the character of the deed,[24] the lands conveyed thereby,[25] or the consideration received for the lands conveyed[26] will invalidate the wife's release, except as against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice of the fraud.[27]

f. Consideration. The wife's release of dower is valid and effectual without consideration inuring solely to herself, if supported by an adequate consideration moving to the husband,[28] although the wife may demand the payment of a named consideration before consenting to the execution of such release.[29]

g. Extent of Release. The wife's release of her dower by joining with her husband in the execution of a conveyance will only operate as an extinguishment dower right without express mention of it. Parker v. Baker, 12 N. Y. St. 598. And see Platt v. Finck, 60 N. Y. App. Div. 312, 70 N. Y. Suppl. 74.

A release to one tenant in common is not effectual as a release in favor of the other tenants. Fletcher v. Shepherd, 174 Ill. 262, 51 N. E. 212; White v. White, 16 N. J. L. 202, 31 Am. Dec. 282. One who holds under an attachment issued prior to the execution of a deed of release is not entitled to protection from the wife's dower (French v. Crosby, 61 Me. 502); nor will a release contained in a mortgage or deed of the husband's lands be available in behalf of a purchaser of such lands at a sale under a judgment against the husband (Kitzmiller dower by a release to her husband,[34] nor could the result be accomplished indirectly by an agreement made between the husband, the wife, and a trustee of the latter.[35] The married women's acts, however, have by removing the common-law disabilities as to the power of married women to contract with respect to their separate estates materially modified this rule, and in many jurisdictions it is now held that a married woman may release to her husband her right of dower in his lands.[36] In other jurisdictions, however, such power is denied unless the enabling act contains language reasonably interpreted as including the wife's right of dower in the estate made subject to her control.[37] After a wife has procured an absolute divorce from her husband, she may make to him a valid release of her dower rights.[38]

i. Compelling Release. The wife's right of dower being subject to release by her own voluntary act only,[39] she cannot be compelled by a court to execute such a release,[40] unless she has by consent placed herself under its jurisdiction,[41] or unless she has by voluntary contract bound herself so to do.[42]

E. Restoration of Right — 1. In General. The deed or conveyance in which the wife joins is operative as a release of her dower only to the extent of the validity of the grant of her husband's lands therein made, and therefore if for any reason such deed or conveyance fails her right of dower remains

v. Van Rensselaer, 10 Ohio St. 63; Taylor v. Fowler, 18 Ohio 567, 51 Am. Dec. 469). A person in possession under authority of a deed executed by the husband alone may avail himself of a release (Saunders v. Blythe, 112 Mo. 1, 20 S. W. 319), but if he has no title a release cannot be made to him (Mobley v. Mobley, 14 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 280). A son of the husband has such a privity in the estate of his father after his death as would entitle him to the benefit of a release of dower executed by the widow. Gray v. McCune, 23 Pa. St. 447. unaffected,[43] subject to the possible exception where an indefeasible title is conveyed, and such title is subsequently lost solely by the fault and neglect of the grantee.[44] If the conveyance becomes inoperative by reason of an outstanding superior title, the right to dower will remain barred.[45]

2. SETTING ASIDE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE. It is in recognition of the principle above stated that where a conveyance or deed executed by a husband or wife is set aside as fraudulent as to the husband's creditors the wife's dower in the land is restored.[46] This rule does not apply, however, where creditors do not impeach the conveyance, since it is valid as between the parties.[47] Nor does the rule apply where the conveyance is not set aside at the instance of creditors until after the husband's death, if the statute only gives dower in land of which the husband dies seized.[48]

3. DISCHARGE OR ASSIGNMENT OF ENCUMBRANCE. Where a mortgage or other lien is absolutely discharged and no longer subsists as an encumbrance upon a husband's lands, the wife's right of dower is restored notwithstanding the priority of such lien or mortgage,[49] whether such discharge be effected by the husband direct or by his legal representatives after his death,[50] by payment from the proceeds of a judicial or other sale of the husband's property for the payment of his debts,[51] or by payment and the entry of satisfaction by the husband's grantee or the purchaser of an equity of redemption.[52] But the acquisition of the fee of an estate by the owner of an encumbrance thereon does not necessarily extinguish the encumbrance or preclude such owner from asserting its priority as against the dower of the wife of his grantor; he may take the estate subject to such encumbrance and keep up the same for his own benefit.[53] Where the grantee of mortgaged premises pays the mortgage and takes an assignment thereof, the mortgage is not discharged, and the grantor's wife is not restored to her dower right in such premises.[54]

IX. DOWER CONSUMMATE BEFORE ASSIGNMENT.

A. Nature and Essentials of Estate — 1. In General. Upon the death of the husband the widow's right of dower in her husband's realty becomes consummate and perfect. From that time her right is no longer merely inchoate or contingent, but attaches absolutely to the dowable lands of the husband subject to assignment or admeasurement by the requisite judicial proceedings.[55]

2. Not a Freehold Estate. Prior to the assignment of her dower the widow has no vested freehold estate under the common law.[56] She is not seized of

B. Rights and Liabilities of Widow — 1. Rights in General. Since the right of dower before assignment is not an estate, but a mere right of action,[61] the widow cannot maintain an action for partition against her husband's cotenant.[62] Nor can she maintain an action to compel the purchase by a railroad company of her alleged dower right in a right of way granted by her husband.[63] The rule is that until dower is assigned she has no right which she can lawfully exercise over the land.[64] But she has such an interest in the lands before assignment of dower as will entitle her to maintain a suit for an injunction against trespass, waste, or other injuries thereto.[65]

2. Right of Entry or Possession. Until the assignment of dower a widow has no right under her claim of dower to enter and occupy any portion of her husband's estate, unless such right is given by statute.[66] She has, however, the right of quarantine, which at common law is the right to remain in the mansion-house for forty days after the husband's death, during which dower is to be assigned to her,[67] and in some jurisdictions it is provided by statute that the widow may remain in possession of certain portions of her deceased husband's estate until the assignment of dower.[68] Under such a statute the widow's possession is a valid defense to an action of ejectment brought by her husband's heirs.[69]

3. Liability For Taxes and Repairs. Taxes accruing against the husband's estate subsequent to his death and prior to an assignment of dower are not as a general rule chargeable to the widow.[70] Nor is the widow bound to pay for repairs necessary to keep the buildings on her husband's lands in a tenantable condition.[71]

A widow who occupies lands before assignment of dower without paying rent therefor should not be permitted to charge against the heirs an amount paid by her for taxes and improvements where the rental value exceeds the amount so paid (Wheeler v. Dawson, 63 Ill. 54); and if during her occupancy prior to assignment of dower she receives rents from her husband's lands the payment of taxes should be offset against the amount so received (Strawn v. Strawn, 50 Ill. 256).

are sold by his legal representative[72] or by order of a probate court for the payment of his debts the widow's right of dower in most states remains unimpaired.[73] It has been held, however, that where the wife prior to the husband's death joined him in a mortgage, a sale of the mortgaged lands by his administrator for the payment of his debts extinguishes the right of dower.[74] A tax-sale made after the death of the husband but before assignment of dower will not preclude recovery of dower by the widow.[75] And where land is sold after the death of a husband under a judgment rendered against his administrator, the wife's right of dower is unimpaired.[76] Nor is such right divested by a sale under a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage in which the wife did not join.[77]

2. Estoppel or Waiver. A widow may be precluded from asserting her right of dower by acquiescence in arrangements for the disposition of her husband's estate,[78] or by an acceptance of the benefits of such an arrangement, when entered into with full knowledge of the condition of her husband's estate.[79] But she will not be estopped from claiming dower by receiving under leases executed by her in conjunction with the trustees of the heirs a certain portion of the rents for a number of years.[80] The failure of a widow to announce at a sale conducted by her as administratrix that the land was sold subject to her dower does not estop her from asserting her claim;[81] nor will she be estopped if not present at the sale by a statement made by an administrator without her authority that the sale of the land was free of her claim.[82] Her mere presence at a public sale of lands in which she claims dower will not estop her,[83] although it is otherwise where she concurs in a representation that the purchaser will acquire a clear title, and receives a portion of the purchase-money.[84]

In Pennsylvania, however, dower is in all respects subordinate to the rights of creditors, so a sale under an order of the orphans' court for the payment of debts bars the widow's dower, whether the party from whom the lands descended died testate or intestate (Mitchell v. Mitchell, 8 Pa. D. Election by Widow Between Dower and Other Provision — 1. Between Dower and Jointure or Settlement. We have already considered the effect of a jointure or a settlement upon a wife in lieu of dower.[85] If such jointure or settlement is made during coverture the widow is, under the statute in most jurisdictions, given a certain time to elect whether she will take under the jointure or settlement, or under her right of dower, on condition that she return the property received by her from her husband,[86] for she cannot have both the benefits of the jointure or settlement and her dower.[87]

2. Between Dower and Pecuniary Provision. Where a pecuniary provision is made by a husband for his wife in lieu of dower during coverture, it is usually provided by statute that the widow may elect either to take the provision or her dower.[88] The rules applicable in the case of an election between a devise under a will and dower are also applicable to an election by the widow between dower and a pecuniary provision made by her husband for her benefit during coverture.[89] An acceptance of pecuniary provisions and a retention for an unreasonable length of time after the husband's death without offering to return them will bar the widow's right to elect.[90] Where the widow elects to receive money in lieu of dower under an impression that her husband's estate is solvent, it has been held that she may upon discovering the insolvency of such estate recall her election and have her dower assigned.[91] But the mere fact that the property taken in lieu of dower turns out of less value than dower is not sufficient in itself to set aside her election.[92]

E. Assignment, Conveyance, or Release — 1. Assignability of Interest — a. Rule at Law. Prior to the assignment of dower the widow's right is not an estate in the lands but is a mere right of action,[93] and is not at law assignable to a person not vested with the fee.[94]

b. Rule in Equity. Although even courts of equity recognize the rule that at law the widow's right of dower before assignment cannot be aliened in any of the ordinary methods of conveying freehold estates so as to vest a legal interest in the grantee,[95] she can make such contracts in reference thereto as will in equity under certain circumstances be enforced;[96] and thus it is held that such an interest is subject to an equitable assignment.[97]

c. Rights of Assignee. While it is a generally recognized doctrine that a widow's right of dower cannot be assigned before admeasurement so as to enable the grantee to bring an action in his own name,[98] yet equity will protect his rights and sustain an action in the widow's name for his benefit.[99] A purchase of the widow's dower interest before assignment and possession of the lands by the purchaser is no defense to an action of ejectment brought against him by the heirs.[1]

2. Consideration. An agreement by a widow to relinquish her unadmeasured interest in her late husband's estate will not be binding upon her if without consideration,[2] but a nominal consideration will be sufficient to sustain a conveyance to the owner of the fee;[3] and where a widow as administratrix conveys her husband's lands, her release of dower to the grantee has been sustained, although without pecuniary consideration.[4]

3. Conveyance or Mortgage. Although, as has been stated,[5] a widow's dower cannot at law be assigned before assignment, yet equity will intervene to sustain such conveyances as against a subsequent suit for an allotment of dower.[6] A conveyance by a widow as executrix and individually of her husband's lands, including all her own right and interest therein, is effectual to preclude her from a recovery of dower.[7] If a widow join with the heir and owner of the fee in to statutory modifications,[16] or materially departed from by the courts.[17] In many jurisdictions it is held that an unassigned right of dower may be reached by a judgment creditor in equity by means of a creditor's bill or other suitable remedy,[18] but it is there usually provided by statute that courts of equity may decree satisfaction of a judgment at law out of a thing of action, whenever execution has been issued against other property and returned unsatisfied.[19] As a person may stand upon his legal rights without violating any rule of equity, a mere neglect or refusal of the widow to have her dower assigned is not such a fraud against her creditors as to confer jurisdiction upon a court of equity to subject it before assignment to the payment of her debts.[20]

G. Damages For Detention of Dower — 1. In General. At common law damages could not be recovered by a widow for the detention of her dower,[21] the widow only being entitled to the profits of her third part of the land from the time of the recovery of judgment.[22] This rule, however, was at an early date modified by the so-called statute of Merton, which authorized the recovery of damages by the widow for the detention of her dower from the time of the death of her husband to the time of the judgment setting off her dower.[23] The pro-

A bill in equity may be maintained by a judgment creditor to obtain the appointment of a receiver and the institution of measures whereby an unassigned right of dower may be changed into property, sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of the judgment. 23. The statute of Merton (20 Hen. III, c. 1) provides that where widows after the death of their husbands are deforced of their dowers, "and cannot have their Dowers or Quarantine without Plea, whosoever deforce them of their Dowers or Quarantine of the Lands, whereof their Husbands died seised, and that the same Widows after shall recover by Plea, they that be convict of such wrongful Deforcement shall yield Damages to the same Widows; that is to say, the Value of the whole Dower to them belonging, from the time of the Death of their Husbands unto the Day that the said Widows, by Judg-visions of this statute have been substantially incorporated in the dower acts of most of the states.[24] In other states the statute has been applied, although not expressly adopted by legislative enactment.[25] In other jurisdictions the courts in the absence of statutory authority have denied the right of the widow to recover damages at law, but have afforded a remedy in equity by holding the person in possession of the lands liable to the widow as trustee for damages to be measured by the rents and profits received during the period of detention.[26]

2. Recovery of Damages. The statutes permitting the recovery of damages for a detention of dower usually authorize the assessment of such damages upon a petition for the assignment of dower, or in an action for dower,[27] and if she fail to pursue the remedy thus provided, she cannot subsequently by a separate proceeding, either at law or in equity, procure an assessment of such damages,[28] unless a separate action is authorized by statute.[29] The petition for the assignment of dower should allege facts sufficient to sustain a recovery of damages, if damages are sought,[30] although, if both parties introduce evidence without objection upon the question of damages, they may be allowed notwithstanding the petition does not ask for them.[31]

3. Abatement by Death of Widow. Where an action for dower is abated by the death of the widow there can be no recovery at law of damages for detention;[32] but in such cases the value of the dower for the time it was wrongfully detained may be recovered in equity.[33]

4. Husband Must Die Seized. Under the statute in most jurisdictions damages cannot be recovered for detention of dower where the husband did not die seized.[34] Usually under such a statute damages cannot be recovered against a grantee of lands conveyed by a husband during coverture,[35] although in many

jurisdictions damages may be recovered against the husband's grantee, from the time of a demand and refusal to assign dower.[36]

5. Measure of Damages. The determination of damages for the detention of dower will depend upon the statutory rule existing in the jurisdiction where the recovery is sought. The amount of damages will depend upon the rental or yearly value of the lands to which the widow's dower has attached, the widow being allowed her proportionate interest therein.[37] In assessing such damages the widow's proportion of the taxes assessed on the lands for the period of detention should be deducted.[38]

6. Period For Which Allowed — a. Under the Statute of Merton. Under the statute of Merton damages are given from the death of the husband to the day on which the widow recovers seizin by judgment,[39] and this provision has been adopted in a number of the states.[40]

b. Other Statutory Provisions. Where recovery is sought from the heir computation is made under the statutes in many of the states from the death of the husband;[41] but as against the alienee of the husband damages can only be awarded from the time of making a demand for dower.[42] The commencement of a suit may be regarded as a demand.[43] Under the statutes in some jurisdictions damages are recoverable against a purchaser who acquires title subsequent to such demand only from the time of his purchase, and a separate action may be maintained against the prior tenant to recover damages from the time of the demand to the time of his conveyance.[44] As against an alienee of an heir of the husband it is provided by statute in some states that the damages are to be computed from the time of the alienation, the heir being liable for the damages from the time of the husband's death until the alienation.[45]

c. Plea of Tout Temps Prist. Under the statute of Merton the husband's heir could plead tout temps prist, that is, allege that he was at all times ready to render dower if it had been demanded, and thus preclude the recovery of damages for detention from the time of the husband's death to the time of the commencement of the suit.[46] But the alienee of the heir could not plead such plea, because he had not the land from the time of the death of the husband and could not truthfully say that he had always been ready to assign the widow her dower.[47]

H. Rents, Mesne Profits, and Arrears — 1. In General. The principles already enunciated in respect to damages for detention of dower are to a certain extent applicable to the right of a widow to her proportionate share in the rents and mesne profits of her husband's estate after his death and before the assignment of her dower.[48]

2. Statutory Provisions. In many of the states the damages awarded to the wife are based upon the annual value of the mesne profits,[49] so that the right to damages for detention of dower and the right of the widow to her share of the rents and profits are both the subject of statutory regulation and controlled by the same provisions. And there are statutes in many jurisdictions expressly allowing to the widow her interest in the rents and profits of her husband's estate prior to the assignment of her dower.[50]

3. Jurisdiction of Courts. Irrespective of statutory provisions equity will intervene to secure to the widow her proportion of the mesne profits for the use and occupation of her husband's lands by the heir or terre-tenant,[51] although at common law there was no such remedy.[52] But in some jurisdictions it has been held that where dower has been assigned on a petition at law equity will not entertain a bill for mesne profits unless there exists some equitable circumstance

A dowress cannot maintain an action of assumpsit for use and occupation against a tenant from year to year for rents which accrued after the death of her husband, and before the assignment of her dower, although calling for equitable relief,[53] although under a statute giving the widow absolutely one third of the rents and profits of her husband's dowable real estate from his death until dower is assigned, it has been held that such rents and profits may be recovered in an independent proceeding commenced a number of years after an allotment of dower.[54]

4. Right to Rents and Mesne Profits. The widow's right to her proportionate share of the rents and mesne profits of her husband's estate from his death until dower is assigned is not impaired by the existence of a vendor's lien.[55] The alienation of her right of dower pending suit for rents and profits is a bar to recovery;[56] but a judgment of a probate court allotting her lands in addition to dower cannot be pleaded in bar to such a suit as to the rents and profits accruing prior to the confirmation of such judgment.[57] And the fact that a widow has been put to her election between dower and a devise under her husband's will does not affect her right to an account of the mesne profits.[58]

5. Seizin at Death of Husband. Courts of equity, following the analogy as to damages under the statute of Merton,[59] will not entertain a bill for mesne profits where the husband did not die seized.[60] This rule has been modified in effect by statutes in many states so that such profits are recoverable as damages, although the lands in which dower is claimed had been aliened by the husband prior to his death.[61]

6. Period For Which Recoverable. In equity the rule seems to have been generally applied that the widow may recover of the heir or devisee mesne profits from the death of her husband until dower is assigned, although no demand was made previous to the commencement of the suit.[62] But where the husband had aliened his lands during coverture mesne profits can only be recovered by the widow against the alienee from the time of her demand for her

Recovery against alienee of husband.— At law the widow cannot recover mesne profits as damages; but in equity the established doctrine is to allow the widow mesne profits as against a purchaser from her husband during coverture; and this not by analogy to the allowance of damages under the statute of Merton, but on the ground of title. dower,[63] or from the time she commences her suit to recover dower.[64] There are also authorities to the effect that a widow can recover mesne profits against a purchaser from the heirs only from the time of his purchase.[65]

7. Portion Recoverable. The widow's proportionate share of the rents and profits of the dowable estate of her husband will be based upon the actual annual rental value of such estate for the period for which she is entitled thereto, and will not necessarily depend upon the amount received as rents.[66] The portion recoverable is in most jurisdictions expressly fixed by statute, in some instances being one third of the rents and profits accruing during the period prior to assignment,[67] or the rents and profits arising from one undivided third part of her husband's dowable estate.[68]

8. Right to Growing Crops. Before dower has been assigned the right to growing crops does not attach in favor of the widow,[69] except as otherwise expressly provided by statute.[70] If before assignment the widow receive the crops growing on her husband's lands at the time of his decease, she cannot retain one third on account of her right of dower in the lands, but is liable to the heir for their full value.[71]

9. Interest on Arrears. As a general rule interest will not be allowed on arrears of dower;[72] but circumstances may exist where interest may properly be allowed as a substitute for mesne profits, as where the lands to which dower has attached are sold and the widow is given a gross sum in lieu of her dower.[73]

X. ASSIGNMENT OF DOWER.

A. Necessity and Effect of Assignment — 1. In General. As has already been noted a widow is entitled to have dower allotted to her immediately upon the death of her husband, and until such allotment is made she is not vested with an absolute title to any specific part of her husband's estate, nor can she enter upon or occupy any part of it.[74]

2. Necessity of Assignment. Before a deceased husband's lands are decreed to be sold for the payment of his debts his widow's dower in such lands should be assigned to her,[75] and partition should not be decreed in proceedings brought in behalf of the husband's heirs before an assignment,[76] unless the widow assents thereto.[77]

3. Effect of Assignment. Where dower has been in fact assigned to a widow by a party competent to assign it, such assignment is conclusive as against him and all claiming under him,[78] and against the widow herself, in the absence of fraud and undue influence;[79] and even if such assignment be made without due authority long acquiescence in it will bind the parties to it and their alienees,[80] including the widow, if she occupy the portion of the lands allotted to her, and there is no evidence of fraudulent imposition.[81] But an assignment of dower by judicial proceedings is not conclusive upon the widow if she be evicted by one having a better title.[82] If the assignment be voluntarily made by a competent person, and is duly accepted by the widow, she cannot have a new assignment because of eviction by paramount title. This is the doctrine of the English common law and has been recognized in this country.[83]

B. Assignment by Agreement of Parties — 1. Authority in General. On the widow's right to dower becoming fixed upon the death of the husband, the person whose duty it is to make the assignment may at once proceed to set apart to the widow her proportion of the estate without legal proceedings being instituted by either party.[84] The common law recognizes such an assignment,[85] and it is expressly authorized by statute in many of the states.[86] In many jurisdictions it is provided by statute that an assignment by the tenant is not binding upon the widow unless it is accepted by her, and in New Hampshire this rule is applied by the courts.[87]

2. Assignment by Parol. Dower may be assigned by parol,[88] since as the widow is entitled of common right nothing is required but to ascertain her dower, and when this is done and she has entered the freehold vests in her without livery of seizin or writing.[89]

3. Who May Make Assignment — a. Tenant of Freehold. The general rule is that no one is legally competent to assign dower unless he has an estate of freehold,[90] such as an heir, devisee, or grantee of the husband, or one who is in privity of title with him;[91] although we find this rule modified by statute, authorizing an assignment by a tenant in possession under a lease for a term of years,[92] or permitting an agreement by the widow with her husband's creditors to accept a portion of her husband's real estate to be assigned to her for her life or of his personal estate to be hers absolutely in lieu of dower.[93] But it is not essential that the tenant's title be valid. If one in wrongful possession as tenant of the freehold makes the assignment, as the rightful tenant ought to have done, it will be good and binding upon such tenant,[94] in the absence of fraud or collusion with the widow.[95]

b. Guardian. At common law an assignment of dower by a guardian in socage was invalid,[96] but it has been frequently held in this country that a guardian may make an assignment which will be binding upon his ward.[97]

c. Infant. An infant can assign dower at common law and the assignment will be held good, subject to be corrected, if excessive, by writ of admeasurement of dower.[98]

C. Assignment in Probate Courts Upon Administration — 1. In General. In many states concurrent jurisdiction in matters pertaining to the assignment of dower is conferred by statute on probate courts so that such assignment may be summarily made in connection with and as an incident of the administration of the deceased husband's estate.[99] A probate court may consider and pass upon a question of dower, where it becomes necessary in the adjustment or settlement of an executor's account.[1]

2. Jurisdiction — a. Control by Statute. The extent of the jurisdiction of a probate or other like court to admeasure and assign dower will be governed by the statute conferring such jurisdiction, and will consequently differ in the several states. It becomes difficult therefore to enunciate rules and principles of uniform application.[2] It may be stated, however, that no relief can be afforded or action taken which is not within the statute,[3] and the proceedings instituted must be in strict conformity therewith.[4]

b. Contested Assignment. Whether or not a probate court has jurisdiction to determine the right of a widow to dower when that right is contested by a stranger to the administration of the deceased husband's estate must depend upon the wording of the statute. Generally speaking such questions are not within the jurisdiction of the court.[5] And the court cannot entertain equitable defenses against an assignment of dower,[6] nor can a counter-claim against the widow be set up in proceedings brought therein for such assignment.[7]

c. Seizin of Husband. In such courts the seizin of the husband at the time of his death is generally held under the statute to be a requisite to the exercise of jurisdiction.[8] And where lands were mortgaged by the widow's husband, it has been held that the seizin of the husband was not such as to confer jurisdiction.[9]

3. Application. Under statutes authorizing an admeasurement of dower by a court of probate in connection with the administration of a decedent's estate, application for such admeasurement is usually required to be made by the widow or heirs, or someone having a legal interest in the lands.[10]

4. Necessity of Notice. The statutes authorizing the assignment of dower in connection with the administration of a decedent's estate as a rule provide for the giving of due notice to the persons interested in the decedent's estate. A compliance with this statutory requirement is essential to the validity of an assignment of dower by such courts.[11]

5. Effect of Decree. An order or decree assigning dower is conclusive of the existence of the statutory requisites of dower,[12] and will bind all parties who were duly notified of the proceedings and who did not object thereto or appeal therefrom.[13]

XI. Recovery of Dower.

A. Demand For Assignment — 1. Necessity. At common law both in England and in this country a demand of dower is not necessary to the maintenance of an action for its recovery,[14] although the failure to make such demand prevents recovery of damages for the detention of dower, upon a plea of tout temps prist.[15] The rule, however, that demand is not necessary has been modified by statute in some jurisdictions, so that a demand of a tenant of the freehold is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action against him.[16]

2. Sufficiency. Where a demand for dower is required by statute, but no particular form is required, the form thereof is generally immaterial. It may be either in writing or by parol,[17] and in any form sufficient to apprise the tenant with reasonable certainty of the claim that is made upon him.[18] It is not defective, unless otherwise required by statute, because it fails to correctly state the legal measure of the dower to be assigned.[19] The demand, however, should given to a temporary administrator having no authority over the real property (Langford v. Langford, 82 Ga. 202, 8 S. E. 76). Where the statute requires notice to the "person or persons interested" the husband of the dowress is a person interested. Hess v. Cole, 23 N. J. L. 116. Notice should be given to the minor children individually in case no guardian has been appointed. Pierson v. Hitchner, 25 N. J. Eq. 129; Rutherford v. Richardson, 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 609. Where a statute requires notice to the owners claiming a freehold estate in the land, a tenant for years would not be entitled to such notice. Ward v. Kilts, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 137.

Sufficiency of service.— The assignment is not affected by a failure to record in the proceedings the fact that notice was individually given to the heirs, if such service be shown to have been in effect made. Shawhan v. Loffer, 24 Iowa 217. The probate judge may determine as to the sufficiency of the notice under a statute providing that the notice may be given "in such manner as the judge of probate shall direct." Serry v. Curry, 26 Nebr. 353, 42 N. W. 97. Where all the persons interested in the estate reside in the state, notice by publication is a nullity. Pierson v. Hitchner, 25 N. J. Eq. 129. The admission of service by the general guardian of minor heirs will bind such heirs. Board v. Board, 4 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 295.

18. Davis v. Walker, 42 N. H. 482. A general demand of dower is sufficient to support the action. Luce v. Stubbs, 35 Me. 95; Newton v. Cook, 4 Gray (Mass.) 46. It is not sufficient, however, to show that negotiations have been entered into and conducted by the parties on the subject of dower, so long as such negotiations did not reach a conclusion. Merrill v. Shattuck, 55 Me. 370. Where a statute does not require that the dower be set off within a certain period of time, it is not a fatal defect for the demand to specify a certain time within which it shall be set off, as the requirement may be treated as surplusage. Stevens v. Reed, 37 N. H. 49.

19. Davis v. Walker, 42 N. H. 482; Matthews v. Duryee, 3 Abb. Dec. (N. Y.) 220, 4 Keyes (N. Y.) 525. A demandant in dower designate the premises in which dower is claimed with reasonable certainty, so as to give notice as to the lands which are to be affected.[20]

3. By Whom and on Whom. A demand of dower may be made by an agent authorized thereto by parol.[21] It must be made according to the statute in some jurisdictions upon the person seized of the freehold, if within the state, otherwise on the tenant in possession.[22] Usually where land is held by a foreign corporation a demand upon the tenant in possession is sufficient.[23] It has been held that where there is more than one person seized of the freehold, a personal demand must be made on each of them.[24] A demand of dower made upon two persons who own in severalty the land described, and which embraces the entire tract, will not support an action against either for dower in his part of the land.[25] A demand of dower in land owned by minor children, made of them and of their guardian, is held sufficient in some jurisdictions,[26] but not in others.[27]

4. At What Place. Unless otherwise provided by statute, the demand of dower on the person seized of the freehold or on the tenant in possession need not be made on the land.[28]

B. Form and Nature of Remedies — 1. In General. If a valid and effectual assignment of dower has not been made voluntarily by the heir or tenant of the dowable estate,[29] or the widow has not been allotted her dower in the probate court upon the administration of her husband's estate,[30] she may proceed at law or in equity to recover her dower.[31]

2. Forms of Remedy — a. In General. In addition to the assignment by summary process in a court of probate as an incident of the administration of the husband's estate, dower in some jurisdictions may be recovered by the common-law action of dower, while in others there is substituted for the common-law writ an action of ejectment against the tenant of the lands in which dower is claimed, and in still others courts of equity possess to a certain extent concurrent or auxiliary jurisdiction with courts of law as to dower.[32]

b. Common-Law Action of Dower. At common law if dower be not assigned within the period of quarantine by the heir or devisee or other person seized of the lands subject to dower, the widow had her action at law by writ of dower unde nihil habet or by writ of right of dower against the tenant of the freehold,[33] upon which, if the demandant obtained judgment, dower was assigned by the sheriff, and she then proceeded to recover possession by ejectment.[34] The writ of dower unde nihil habet is the writ uniformly adopted where the common-law action of dower is in use,[35] and is available in every case except where the widow is entitled to recover according to her title, although in her demand on the tenant to have dower assigned she claimed dower in the whole premises, when entitled to dower in a moiety only. Hamblin v. Bank of Cumberland, 19 Me. 66.

has received part of her dower of the tenant of the lands sought to be charged.[36] These common-law writs of dower have been abolished in England,[37] and although the substance of the common-law action is found in the statutes of many of the states in this country, its form has been materially modified, and in many of them an entirely different proceeding has been substituted.[38]

c. Action of Ejectment. Ordinarily ejectment will only lie on behalf of the widow where her dower has been assigned;[39] but in some jurisdictions provision is expressly made for the recovery of dower by an action of ejectment.[40]

d. Partition Proceedings. As a general rule dower cannot be assigned in partition proceedings;[41] but under the Pennsylvania statute the orphans' courts of the several counties of the state are authorized to entertain proceedings for the partition of a deceased husband's estate and to decree therein the allotment of dower.[42] It is also provided by statute in other states that dower may be assigned in partition proceedings.[43]

e. Statutory Action For Recovery of Real Property. Statutes authorizing actions for the recovery of real property sometimes expressly recognize the right to recover unassigned dower. Such remedy is in addition to other remedies at law and in equity.[44] For the purpose of determining the nature of the action a widow's unassigned dower is deemed real property.[45]

f. Proceedings in Equity. Courts of equity and courts of law exercise a concurrent jurisdiction in the assignment of dower. This doctrine generally prevails in England, and is recognized in many jurisdictions in this country.[46] And where the jurisdiction of a court of equity has once attached, and a decree has been entered assigning dower, a probate court cannot order the lands assigned to be sold with the other lands of the deceased husband for the payment of his debts.[47] If the estate in which dower is claimed is one recognized in equity alone, the assignment of dower therein is within the exclusive jurisdiction of equity.[48] Equity in exercising its jurisdiction as to the assignment of dower will treat it as a strictly legal right, and will be governed by the same rules as are courts of law.[49]

3. SPECIAL STATUTORY PROVISIONS. The statutes of the several states contain varying provisions prescribing the forms of actions and proceedings available for the assignment of a widow's dower.[50] These statutes do not generally deprive courts of equity of their long established jurisdiction in assigning dower.[51]

C. Defenses — 1. PURCHASE IN GOOD FAITH. If the widow's title to dower in land is established such title cannot be impaired by the fact that defendant purchased such land without notice of the claim for a valuable consideration.[52] This rule is now well established in this country, although doubt has been expressed as to whether equity ought not to interfere in favor of such purchaser, especially where the widow seeks equitable relief in asserting her claim.[53]

2. EQUITABLE DEFENSES. Where a widow's claim for dower is not founded upon a legal right, cognizant in a court of law, and she applies for equitable relief, the general rule is that defendant may avail himself of an equitable defense existing in his favor.[54]

3. DENIAL OF EXISTENCE OF DOWER RIGHT — a. In General. If one's lands are purchased subject to an inchoate right of dower in the grantor's wife a purchaser cannot deny the existence of such dower right, especially where he has paid less than its fair value by reason of such claim.[55] The fact that a partition suit has been commenced for the partition of the land in which dower is claimed, to which suit the widow is a party, is no defense;[56] nor is an outstanding title purchased after the commencement of the action,[57] or a release of dower by the widow to a stranger.[58] The sufficiency of the husband's estate to satisfy the widow's claim is not a defense to an action against her husband's grantee.[59]

b. Denial of Seizin or Title. According to the weight of authority the heirs or devisees of the deceased husband or those claiming under them cannot set up want of seizin of the husband as a defense to a widow's claim of dower.[60] It is also a well established doctrine in most states that a tenant in possession of the lands in which dower is claimed under a title by conveyance from the husband is estopped from denying the validity of the husband's title.[61] But it has been held that this rule does not apply where the husband's grantee is in possession under a different and paramount title; so that where the tenant holds under a quitclaim deed from the husband obtained by him to protect a superior title under which he already holds, he is not precluded from showing that the husband was not seized of such an estate as to entitle his widow to dower.[62] A grantee acquiring a leasehold rather than a freehold estate by conveyance from the widow's husband may set up the nature of such estate to preclude her recovery of dower therein.[63]

4. Set-Off and Counter-Claim. The owner of lands in which dower is claimed cannot set up by way of counter-claim the payment of encumbrances subject to which the lands were sold to him by the husband;[64] nor can the rents and profits received by the widow subsequent to the husband's death be set off against the widow's claim;[65] nor can an administrator set off against arrearages of dower due

The widow's dower right in surplus moneys realized on foreclosure cannot be reduced by an equitable claim against her, although, if she elect to take a gross sum equal to the

the widow the amount of overpayments made by him on account of her distributive share in decedent's estate, if the period of limitations had run after the making of such payments.[66]

D. Statutes of Limitations and Laches — 1. In General. There is considerable difference of opinion as to the application of general statutes of limitations to actions for dower. There seems to be a weight of authority, however, in favor of the doctrine that such statutes are applicable.[67] Statutes of limitation are not applied to suits in equity,[68] but courts of equity will if called upon to administer a right strictly legal follow such statutes, so that in those jurisdictions where general statutes of limitation are held to apply to suits to recover dower, if such suits are brought in equity the widow will be barred unless they are brought within the prescribed time.[69]

2. Special Statutes of Limitation — a. In General. In a number of the states statutes are in force prescribing the time within which an action to recover dower or a proceeding for the admeasurement of dower must be instituted.[70]

b. Application. A statute prescribing the time within which a suit or proceeding for dower may be commenced has been held not to apply where the cause of action arose prior to the passage of the act.[71]

c. Statutes Relating to Real Actions. In most jurisdictions it is held that in the absence of special statutes expressly prescribing the time within which actions for dower may be brought, such actions are to be treated as actions for the recovery of real property and must be brought within the time prescribed in statutes of limitations applicable to such actions.[72] But if the statute by its terms begins value of her dower in the surplus, a surrogate may recognize such counter-claims against her. Taylor v. Bentley, 3 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 34.

to run from the time when the right to enter upon the lands involved in the suit first accrued, it can have no application to an action for the recovery of dower, because the widow has no right of entry until dower is assigned.[73]

d. Statutes Relating to Actions Not Specified. It has been held that a statute requiring actions not provided for to be brought within a prescribed time does not apply to actions for the assignment of dower.[74]

3. When Statute Begins to Run — a. Death of Husband. A widow's right of action for dower in lands not in her possession accrues at the time of her husband's death, and according to the weight of authority the statute of limitations commences to run against her from that time;[75] and the rule has been held to apply, although title by adverse possession had fully ripened as against the husband before his decease.[76]

b. Demand of Dower. Where a demand upon the tenant for possession of the land is a prerequisite to the commencement of a suit for the recovery of dower therein,[77] it has been held that the statute begins to run from the date of the demand rather than the date of the death of the husband.[78]

4. Length of Time. In determining whether an action for dower is barred under a statute prescribing the time within which an action for dower should be brought the time during which the widow is under disabilities should be deducted.[79] The tenant's possession of the land must be open, notorious, undisputed, and continuous for the required time,[80] and must be adverse as against the widow.[81]

unreasonable length of time before commencing the action will raise the presumption that the widow's dower has been relinquished or otherwise barred or cut off, or will constitute such laches as to bar relief in a court of equity.[82]

E. Parties — 1. In General. The statutes of the several states prescribing the procedure for the recovery or assignment of dower authorize the instituting of proceedings either by the widow or by the heirs, devisees, or other persons interested in the lands to which dower has attached, and also usually provide the parties against whom such proceedings may be brought.[83]

2. Plaintiffs — a. At Common Law. The writ of dower unde nihil habet can only be issued in behalf of the widow.[84] The widow's right to dower after the death of the husband and before assignment being at common law non-transferable, the common-law action of dower cannot be maintained by the widow's assignee.[85]

b. In Equity. The widow may institute proceedings in equity for the assignment of her dower,[86] and where the widow before assignment has transferred her right, it has been held that equity will entertain a suit instituted by the transferee for the allotment of the widow's dower;[87] and in equity the husband's heir or devisee or any other person having an interest in the lands to which dower has attached may for the purpose of quieting title institute proceedings for the admeasurement of dower.[88] In those jurisdictions in which a widow's right to have dower assigned is held subject to execution by her creditors,[89] a court of equity may at the instance of such creditors cause the widow's dower to be assigned.[90] Where a widow marries during the pendency of a suit in equity for her dower it is not erroneous to make her husband a co-complainant.[91]

3. Defendants — a. Tenants of Freehold. In those jurisdictions where the common-law action of dower is retained, the action must be brought against the tenant of the freehold at the time of the commencement of the action;[92] but it may be brought against a tenant holding under color of title, although wrongfully by the husband, does not bar the wife's dower (Boling v. Clark, 83 Iowa 481, 50 N. W. 57); but possession by a purchaser is adverse to the widow of the vendor (Anderson v. Sterritt, 79 Ky. 499). Possession under sheriff's deed which conveys a mere interest which the judgment debtor had on a certain day is not adverse to the dower right of one who was the debtor's wife before that day. in possession.[93] A vendor in possession under a contract of sale has such a legal seizin in the land as constitutes him a tenant of the freehold, and he is a proper party defendant.[94] But the writ cannot be maintained against a tenant for years,[95] unless by statute.[96]

b. Persons in Possession. In equity and under the statutes in many jurisdictions all persons actually occupying any portion of the lands in which dower is claimed are proper defendants.[97]

c. Purchasers or Owners. Where there are no adverse interests in the land, the owner at the time the action is commenced is the proper and the only necessary party defendant.[98]

d. Heirs or Devisees. Where the husband's heirs or devisees are in possession of the lands they are necessary parties to the widow's action of dower;[99] but where the lands have been conveyed by the husband in his lifetime[1] or have been sold at an administrator's sale the deceedent's heirs are not necessary parties.[2]

e. Persons Adversely Interested in the Lands. In equity and under the statutes in many of the states all parties interested in the lands in which the widow seeks dower are properly made parties defendant.[3] So where suit is brought against a married woman to recover dower in lands owned by her, her husband, having an interest therein by the curtesy, should be made a defendant.[4] Administrators and executors of the husband have not such an interest in the husband's lands as will entitle them to be made parties;[5] and the husband's creditors, whose claims are not secured by an encumbrance upon the lands, are not necessary parties,[6] although they may be made parties if they so desire.[7] If at the time of the husband's death the lands were held by a trustee for the benefit of creditors,[8] or if lands are devised in trust by the decedent,[9] or are held in trust under an agreement between the husband and wife for her benefit,[10] the trustee is a necessary party defendant in the action brought by the widow for her dower.

4. Joinder of Parties. In some jurisdictions dower cannot be claimed in one action against several alienees of the husband, each holding a separate tract or parcel of land.[11] In other jurisdictions the widow is permitted to join as defendants in one suit the tenants of each of the parcels of land in which she claims dower.[12] Marriage of the widow during the pendency of her suit has been held not to render it necessary to unite her husband in the proceeding, although it is not error to do so.[13] If the lands in which dower is claimed are held in joint tenancy, the joint tenants should be joined as defendants.[14]

F. Pleadings — 1. Declaration, Petition, Complaint, or Bill — a. In General. The form and sufficiency of a petition or complaint in a proceeding for the admeasurement or recovery of dower will depend upon the statutory requirements, if any, in the jurisdiction where the proceeding is brought, or the nature of the proceeding by which the remedy is sought.[15]

b. Requisites and Sufficiency — (I) In General. The declaration, complaint, petition, or bill must set forth with reasonable certainty and precision all the essential facts and circumstances on which the claim for dower rests, or which are required by statute to be set forth.[16] If the suit be brought in equity it is proper to insert a general allegation as to existing impediments to a recovery at law.[17] All the facts essential to the existence of dower, such as the marriage,[18] the seizin of the husband during coverture or at his death, according to the statute,[19] and the husband's death,[20] should be clearly set forth in precise terms.[21] It is not necessary that the complainant should negative in her bill all or any of the facts by which her dower might be avoided.[22] Where the action is in ejectment against the occupant of the premises or one exercising acts of ownership therein, the complaint must allege facts sufficient to show that defendant either occupies or exercises acts of ownership in respect to the lands in controversy.[23]

(II) JOINDER OF CAUSES. A declaration in a writ of dower is not bad because it sets out and claims dower in several separate and distinct parcels of land.[24]

(III) MARRIAGE. The widow should allege her marriage, with the facts and circumstances as to time and place.[25] It has been held insufficient for the demandant to simply allege that she is the widow of the decedent.[26]

(IV) SEIZIN OR TITLE OF HUSBAND. The petition, complaint, or bill must allege seizin in the husband during coverture or at the time of his death, according to the statute in the particular jurisdiction, of an estate of which the wife is dowable.[27]

(V) DESCRIPTION OF PREMISES. It is sometimes provided by statute that the complaint or bill shall describe the property claimed with certainty and accuracy, so that it may be delivered if plaintiff is entitled thereto,[28] and independently of statutory provision the lands in which dower is claimed should be sufficiently definite to permit a delivery of the premises without reference to any description outside of the writ;[29] but it is not necessary that they be described by metes and bounds, where they can be sufficiently distinguished by any other description.[30]

(VI) DEMAND FOR ASSIGNMENT. In those jurisdictions where a demand upon the tenant or other person who may be compelled to assign dower is a prerequisite to the commencement of an action for dower,[31] the demandant must show that such demand has been made.[32] Except as thus required by statute a demand, being unnecessary, need not be alleged,[33] although it may be desirable because of its effect upon the claim for damages for withholding the dower.[34]

2. Plea or Answer — a. In General. Where the common-law action by writ of dower unde nihil habet is retained defendant may plead in abatement or in bar, as in other actions. For instance, where a previous demand is necessary, defendant may plead in abatement that no such demand was made.[35] If the suit be in equity, or under statutes providing special forms of action, defendant's pleading must conform to the requirements of the practice in the court where the suit is brought.[36]

b. Requisites and Sufficiency — (i) In General. The plea or answer should be responsive to the allegations of the declaration, complaint, or bill.[37]

(ii) Release or Relinquishment, Bar, and Assignment. A release of dower by the wife must be pleaded, and cannot otherwise be given in evidence;[38] and if the statutes require any particular formality upon the part of the wife to constitute a valid release, conformity with such requirements must be alleged.[39] A plea that dower has been assigned by the tenant is insufficient if it is not alleged that the widow entered and agreed to the assignment, that she accepted it, or that it was made to her satisfaction;[40] but it is not necessary to allege that the assignment was in writing, since a parol assignment is valid.[41] That demandant received compensation for the annual value of her dower during the heir's possession is not pleadable, but should be given in evidence in mitigation of damages on the writ of inquiry.[42] An answer which admits that the lands were owned by the husband, but does not aver that the widow had conveyed her interest therein, or that it had been sold away from her by legal process, is insufficient on demurrer.[43]

(iii) Non-Tenure. By the common law of England non-tenure could only be pleaded in abatement,[44] but in this country such plea may be also made in bar,[45] unless, as in Maine, it is provided by statute that it can only be pleaded in abatement.[46]

(iv) Marriage. The tenant may in his plea controvert the validity of the demandant's marriage with the person of whose lands she claims dower;[47] but if the plea conclude to the country it will be adjudged bad on demurrer.[48]

(v) Tout Temps Prist. At common law, if the widow has made no demand of dower prior to the commencement of her action, the heir may plead tout temps prist, and if such plea be sustained be thereby relieved from damages for the detention of her dower.[49]

(vi) Jointure or Other Provision For Wife. A jointure or a fair and reasonable antenuptial contract or other agreement whereby pecuniary provision is made for the wife in lieu of her dower[50] may, if in conformity with statutory requirements or otherwise legally binding upon the parties, be pleaded by way of equitable defense to an action for dower.[51] In pleading such contracts or agreements the pleader must state the facts upon which their validity depends.[52]

(vii) Title or Seizin of Husband. Under the common law the plea of ne unques seisie puts in issue only the seizin of the husband during coverture.[53] A tenant cannot allege in defense that the demandant's husband under whom he claims was only colorably seized of the lands held by him.[54] Except as otherwise provided by statute a plea that the husband did not die seized of the land is no bar to the action.[55]

(viii) Statute of Limitations. Where the statute does not run against a widow in continuous possession of the lands, a mere averment that more than the period specified in the statute has elapsed since the death of the husband is insufficient.[56] Under the South Carolina statute a plea that "the defendant has been five years in quiet and peaceful possession of the premises," without stating it to have been an actual and adverse possession, was held bad.[57]

3. Replication or Reply. As in other cases plaintiff should controvert by her reply all material new matter in the answer.[58] Where equitable defenses are set up in an answer in a special proceeding for the admeasurement of dower, it has been held that there is no necessity for filing a reply.[59]

4. Cross Bill. Under a statute authorizing an equitable allotment of dower to be made in one or more parcels of the husband's lands in lieu of the whole, defendants owning the lands conveyed by the husband under a general warranty may prosecute a cross bill against the husband's heirs to compel the latter to indemnify them for an allotment of dower out of the lands so conveyed to them.[60]

5. Issues, Proof, and Variance — a. Issues Raised. Unless the seizin of the husband is alleged by the widow there can be no inquiry as to damages upon defendant's default,[61] but under an averment that the husband was "seized and possessed" of the lands described, evidence is admissible to show that the seizin was in fee.[62] The service upon a widow in mortgage foreclosure proceedings of a bill setting forth that she among others has or claims to have some interest in the premises, but making no mention of the widow's right of dower, does not present to the court the dower issue.[63]

b. Variance. As in other cases a variance will not be held fatal unless it is of matters legally essential to the issue or claim, so as to materially and injuriously affect the substantial rights of the parties, or unless it is misleading and prejudicial in character.[64] So an allegation in an answer that the dower has been released will be sustained, although varying from the evidence, if the main allegation is proved;[65] and the rule applies where the proof as to the lands in which dower is claimed varies from the description or designation contained in the pleading.[66]

G. Evidence — 1. Presumptions and Burden of Proof — a. In General. All the elements essential to establish the widow's right of dower, such as the marriage of the wife to the alleged husband, the seizin of the land by the husband, and the death of the husband must be affirmatively proved by the widow.[67] When the widow shows such facts she is entitled to her dower unless defendant can show affirmatively something which defeats her claim.[68] And where issue is taken on the demandant's marriage and her husband's seizin, and an allegation of demand in her writ was not controverted, she is not held to a proof of such demand.[69] If it be sought to bar the widow's dower by an alleged pecuniary provision in lieu of dower taking effect on the husband's death, the burden of proving its fairness is upon the husband's executor.[70] If the widow's dower depends upon the value of the lands at the time of alienation, the presumption is that the value at such time was substantially the same as at the time of bringing the action.[71]

b. Marriage. Proof of an actual marriage with the deceased husband, either under statutory forms and solemnities, or as prescribed by the common law, must be made by the widow in her action to recover dower,[72] unless the plea is of such a nature as to admit the fact;[73] and the burden of proof is not shifted by her establishment of a prima facie case.[74]

c. Title or Seizin of Husband. A widow cannot recover either at law or in equity unless it be affirmatively shown that her husband was seized of the lands in which dower is claimed at some time during coverture, or under some statutes at the time of his death;[75] although she will not be held to strict proof of her husband's title to make out a prima facie case,[76] particularly where defendant is in possession under a conveyance from the husband.[77] A constructive seizin or a right to seizin of the husband during coverture if shown will be sufficient.[78] If defendant alleges that the husband's seizin was instantaneous or transitory, by deed and mortgage back,[79] it is for him to show that the deed and mortgage constituted one and the same transaction.[80] Where the husband conveyed the lands upon the same day that they were granted to him, the widow is not required to prove actual possession by him, where no adverse possession is shown.[81] Possession by the husband during coverture of the lands in controversy raises a presumption of seizin, and if uncontroverted will of itself be sufficient to establish the husband's title.[82]

d. Death of Husband. If the death of the husband is denied, the burden generally rests upon the widow to show it by proof;[83] but under a plea of ne unques seisie, the husband's death is admitted and need not be proved;[84] and the presumption of death arising from long continued absence without being heard from is available to the widow in seeking to recover her dower.[85]

e. Release or Bar. Where a pecuniary or other provision in lieu of dower is unreasonably disproportionate to the husband's means, the presumption is against its validity, and the burden is upon those asserting it as a bar to establish its validity.[86] A presumption may arise against the widow's claim of dower by a failure to assert it for an unreasonably long period of time.[87]

f. Misconduct of Wife. A defendant interposing the wife's elopement and continued adultery as a bar of dower must prove all the essential facts constituting the offense.[88]

by circumstantial evidence.[89] Recitals in the deed by which defendant holds the lands recognizing the widow's right of dower can only be resorted to in the case of loss of primary evidence.[90] The statute of limitations is inadmissible unless it be pleaded.[91] Duly recognized mortality tables showing the probabilities of life are admissible to prove the value of dower rights.[92]

b. Marriage. In an action for dower cohabitation, reputation, and reception by the family as husband and wife are all evidence of marriage,[93] the rule in this respect not differing from that applicable in other civil actions.[94]

c. Title or Seizin of Husband. Office copies of deeds are admissible to prove the title and seizin of the husband,[95] without proof of the loss of the original, since a wife has no right to the custody of her husband's deeds.[96] Where the tenant claims to hold under a deed antedating the widow's marriage it is competent for her to show the date of the delivery of the deed.[97] The recitals in a mortgage in which the wife did not join are inadmissible to affect her right of dower in the lands mortgaged.[98] The tenant cannot show that the widow's husband, under whom he claims, was only colorably seized by virtue of a deed made to defraud the creditors of his grantor.[99] And the oral declarations of the husband after seizin are not competent for the purpose of showing that he held the lands in trust, although they are admissible for some purposes.[1] Parol evidence

Validity of marriage.— The issue being as to whether plaintiff, claiming dower as the wife of a decedent, was married to him, evidence that plaintiff had knowledge of her husband's reputed marriage with another is admissible only so far as it affects the bona fides and intent of her previous cohabitation with decedent. is admissible to prove that the land granted to the husband of the demandant is the land as to which she claims dower.[2]

d. Death of Husband. The general rules governing the admissibility of evidence to prove death may be applied in determining the admissibility of evidence to establish the death of the husband in an action for dower.[3] The demandant's own testimony as to her husband's death is admissible;[4] and reputation in the family as to the death of the husband is competent to show prima facie that fact.[5] As a general rule in most jurisdictions the records of a court of probate showing the probate of the will of the husband or the administration of his estate are competent evidence to prove his death;[6] but it has been held that in an action for the admeasurement of dower such records are only evidence in proceedings arising out of the will or connected with the estate, except in cases where from lapse of time they are competent under the rule for the admission of ancient records.[7]

e. Release or Bar of Dower. Where an antenuptial contract or a pecuniary provision in lieu of dower is relied upon as a bar, parol or other evidence outside the instrument is admissible as tending to show the circumstances of the parties and the intention of the husband.[8] Where a husband has a right to defeat dower by a bona fide conveyance, the motive of the husband may be shown by evidence of family disturbances between the husband and wife;[9] and where it is alleged that the husband conveyed his lands in fraud of plaintiff's dower right, to the knowledge of the grantees, the husband's letters to the wife containing evidence that he was clandestinely conveying his property are admissible in her behalf.[10]

f. Misconduct of Wife. Where a wife living in adultery is barred of dower, proof of adultery may be given in an action at law for dower;[11] but where by statute, as in New York, a wife can be barred of dower only by a conviction of adultery in an action for divorce, the forfeiture of dower cannot be established by proof of adultery in any other action.[12]

3. Weight and Sufficiency — a. In General. Proof of service of summons upon defendants and their default will not alone sustain a judgment in an action for dower, but the material allegations of the petition must be proved.[13] Proof that the husband died in the exclusive possession of the lands makes out a prima facie case for dower therein.[14] Where a demand for dower is a prerequisite to the commencement of an action proof that a paper addressed to the tenant and subscribed by the widow demanding dower was seasonably left at his dwelling-house, where it was read by some of the inmates, taken in connection with his admission that the dower had been demanded of him, will authorize the inference that the paper was duly received and its contents understood by him.[15]

b. Marriage. The rules controlling the sufficiency of evidence to establish marriage in ordinary civil actions involving property rights may be applied in actions for the recovery of dower.[16] As in other actions general reputation, cohabitation, and acknowledgment are sufficient to establish the marriage.[17] But an allegation that the widow had been divorced cannot be established by reputation or by the statements of the parties.[18]

c. Title or Seizin of Husband — (i) In General. The widow is not required to make strict proof of her husband's title or seizin by a production of the deeds, but it will be sufficient if she produces such evidence as raises a fair presumption thereof.[19] Deeds are admissible, however, and a deed from a person having previous possession of the lands, conveying the lands to the husband in fee simple, and a possession by the husband under such deed is sufficient prima facie evidence of seizin to entitle the widow to dower, in the absence of proof to the contrary.[20] But it has been held that a conveyance to the husband without evidence that he entered into possession is insufficient.[21] The seizin of the husband is established as against the tenant by proof of the husband's possession of the lands, and a subsequent sale thereof under an execution levied by one of his creditors, and the holding of title by the tenant under such sale.[22] Instantaneous seizin only[23] is sufficiently proved to defeat dower as against a purchase-money mortgagee by showing that the deed to the husband and the purchase-money mortgage were executed, acknowledged, and recorded on the same day, although the deed was dated several days before acknowledgment.[24]

(ii) Possession During Coverture. Possession of land by the husband during coverture under a claim of title is sufficient prima facie evidence of Carter v. Parker, 28 Me. 509; Ward v. Fuller, 15 Pick (Mass.) 185. In the absence of other evidence the deed of the husband conveying real estate is sufficient prima facie evidence of seizin. Bolster v. Cushman, 34 Me. 428.

23. Instantaneous seizin see supra, V, C, 8.

24. Pendleton v. Pomeroy, 4 Allen (Mass.) 510. Proof of instanteous seizin must be made by showing that the deed and mortgage were parts of the same transaction, and this is not done where it is shown that the husband on the day that land was conveyed to him by his grantor executed a mortgage thereon to secure a note given seizin, and unless impeached or explained is conclusive against the tenant and will entitle the widow to dower.[25]

d. Death of Husband. The death of the husband in an action to recover dower may be proved as in other actions.[26] Reputation in the family is prima facie evidence of the fact,[27] and a long continued absence without being heard from will as in other cases authorize a presumption of death sufficiently establishing that fact in an action by the wife to recover dower.[28]

H. Trial — 1. In General. The trial of the issues in an action or proceeding for the recovery of dower will be conducted in accordance with the practice followed in the court where it is brought. If the action is in ejectment the practice will conform to that prescribed for such actions.[29] In any event the conduct of the trial will be governed by special statutory provisions made therefor, if any there be, and if none, by the provisions of codes and practice acts applicable thereto. If the action be at law and the practice is not controlled by statute, the practice at common law will prevail. The dilatory proceedings by essoin, allowed in real actions at common law, are not permitted in the practice in actions for dower in this country, and have been expressly abolished by statute in some jurisdictions.[30] The common law does not give defendant in an action of dower a right to view as a matter of course,[31] and it will not be granted unless sufficient cause be shown by affidavit to satisfy the court that it is necessary.[32] Issues of fact should be tried at the bar of the court, even if the clerk of the court is given by statute jurisdiction to assign dower.[33]

2. Questions of Law and Fact. The rule as to the determination of questions of law by the court and questions of fact by the jury applies to actions for dower.[34] The jury is not to determine the amount to be awarded as dower; it is for them to determine as to the facts in issue required to be established to sustain the widow's claim.[35] The practice, however, in some jurisdictions authorizes the assessment of the value of dower by a jury.[36] It is for the jury to decide whether from the facts and circumstances of the case the widow intended to release or waive her right of dower.[37]

3. VERDICT AND FINDINGS. As in other cases the verdict should conform to the pleadings, and find as to all the material points in issue between the parties.[38] If damages for detention of dower are sought and the jury find that the husband died seized, they should also find the time when he died, the nature of his estate, and the annual value of the land.[39] It has been held that where a husband did not die seized of the lands the jury has nothing to do with the value thereof at any time, so that a finding among others as to the value of the premises will be considered as surplusage,[40] but will not invalidate the verdict.[41] The verdict of a jury as to the yearly value of lands, which have been reported as not susceptible of division by commissioners appointed for the allotment of dower, is like the finding of a fact at law, and is binding on all parties until set aside by the court.[42] A verdict in favor of one of several defendants on his separate plea will not avail another who has suffered a default.[43] The verdict may be for a part of the premises, either as to quantity of interest or the extent of the premises, but in such case it should specify the part affected.[44]

I. Interlocutory Judgment or Decree. If it appear by the verdict or decision that the widow is entitled to dower in the lands described in her petition or complaint, an interlocutory judgment, order, or decree is usually rendered directing that her dower be admeasured by a referee, master, or commissioners appointed for the purpose.[45] The form and requisites of such judgment or order will necessarily vary in the several states. The decree declaring the widow entitled to dower and directing its admeasurement is in no sense a final decree, but remains under the control of the court until the admeasurement is made and duly confirmed.[46] The judgment or decree should conform to the statutory requirements, although an immaterial variance will not impair its validity.[47] An order for the maintenance of the widow pendente lite cannot be made in an action for dower,[48] although where dower is claimed in a trust estate, it has been held proper to direct payment of one third of the income to the widow pending the litigation.[49]

J. Admeasurement, Allotment, or Assignment — 1. IN GENERAL. The methods employed in the several jurisdictions to assign or allot a widow's dower are various and generally expressly prescribed by statute.[50] At common law after a judgment in favor of the widow, she might have a writ of habere facias seisinam, directed to the sheriff, commanding him to cause her dower to be set out and seizin thereof delivered to her.[51] In some jurisdictions it is provided that the evidence is so overwhelming that a verdict for him would be set aside. Chase v. Alley, 82 Me. 234, 19 Atl. 397.

writ shall direct the sheriff to cause the dower to be set out by commissioners,[52] but in nearly all the states the common-law practice has been departed from to a greater extent, and the admeasurement is made by either referees or commissioners, who are required to report their action to the court for its approval.[53]

2. APPOINTMENT AND QUALIFICATIONS OF COMMISSIONERS OR REFEREES. The usual statutory method is for the court in which the action or proceeding for the recovery of dower was commenced to designate a referee or commissioners to make the admeasurement. The commissioners are usually required to be freeholders and residents of the county where the lands to be admeasured are situated,[54] and it is sometimes provided that they shall not be connected by affinity or consanguinity with those interested in the estate.[55] And even if not required by statute it would seem that in analogy to the requirements as to the qualifications of referees and jurors they should be ineligible for such cause.[56] They should be sworn, and a statement of that fact and the oaths taken by them should accompany their report.[57] Vacancies can be filled by the court or officer making the original appointment, even if not expressly authorized by statute.[58] Less than the statutory number may act with full force and effect, especially where notice is given to the interested parties and there are no objections.[59] If the widow's right to dower is uncontested and there has been no trial, notice of the widow's application for the appointment of commissioners is required under the statutes in some states to be given to persons interested.[60] Objection to the appointment or the qualifications of the commissioners should be made at the time of their appointment, and cannot be made by a party who intervened by permission of the court after the commissioners had reported.[61] In a probate court objections to such appointment amounting to an equitable bar which the widow denies will not be considered.[62]

62. In re Fritts, 32 N. J. Eq. 293.

In proceedings in probate courts for the appointment of commissioners there can be no inquiry as to whether a pecuniary provision by the husband in lieu of dower is a bar. All defenses to the widow's claim of dower must be set up when she brings her action for the recovery of the part assigned to her. Hyde v. Hyde, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 630.

The order or decree appointing commissioners should show upon whose application it was made,[63] and may contain general rules for the guidance of the commissioners not interfering with the exercise of a proper discretion.[64] Notice of the time that the commissioners propose to act in the performance of their duties is not generally required.[65]

3. Valuation of Property For Assignment — a. In General. In determining the proportion of the lands which should be assigned to the widow for her dower, the quantity and quality thereof should both be considered. This was the rule at common law and is expressly declared by statute in many jurisdictions.[66] The allotment should be made according to the value of the lands as determined by the rents and profits thereof, such part being set off to the widow as will yield her one third of such income.[67] If the widow under the statute elects to take a gross sum in lieu of dower the value of the land may be determined by the price obtained at a sale conducted by an administrator in the manner prescribed by law, or under an agreement of the parties interested therein.[68] In determining the annual value of the widow's interest her age and health are not to be taken into consideration.[69] When the value of the lands has been once adjudged it cannot be modified by the increase or decrease of the rental value.[70]

b. Extent of Interest. Generally speaking the widow is entitled to one third in value of all the lands of which her husband was seized during coverture,[71] without regard to advancements made to her by the husband,[72] or encumbrances which are not paramount to her right.[73] Where the husband was seized of an undivided portion of a tract of land which had not been partitioned during his lifetime, his widow is entitled to dower in one third of his undivided interest.[74]

c. Time of Valuation — (i) As Against Heirs. As against the husband's heirs the widow is entitled to have her dower assigned to her according to the value of the land at the time of the assignment, and not at the time of her husband's death, unless the delay of assignment was due to her own fault.[75]

C. 268, 11 S. E. 764).

It is not necessary that the writ of seizin should contain specific directions to the commissioners. Their duties are prescribed by law, and it would be inconvenient or impossible to incorporate them all in the writ of seizin. Skolfield v. Skolfield, 90 Me. 571, 38 Atl. 530.

(II) As Against Husband's Alienees. But, as a general rule, where the lands were aliened by the husband, the widow is entitled to dower according to their value at the date of alienation.[76] This rule has direct application to the determination of the value of lands which have been improved by the labor and money of the alienee,[77] but is subject to the exception hereafter noted in respect to the appreciation of the value of such lands by natural causes.[78] If the husband mortgaged the lands, remaining in possession, but afterward released the equity of redemption, the date of the release will be deemed the date of alienation.[79] Where an assignment of lands is made for the benefit of creditors, the wife reserving her dower, and the lands are subsequently sold by the assignee, the value of the lands at the time of the assignment will determine the value of her right.[80] For most purposes the time when the husband was deprived of his title will be deemed the time of alienation.[81]

d. Appreciation or Depreciation of Value — (I) As Against Heirs. Since the widow is entitled to her dower as against the heirs according to the value of the premises at the time of the assignment,[82] she has the advantage of the natural appreciation of value while such lands are in the possession of the heirs and must bear her proportion of the unavoidable diminution of such value during such period.[83]

(II) As Against Husband's Alienees. If the value of the lands in which the widow is entitled to dower has increased since the date of alienation by the deceased husband because of circumstances not connected with the expenditure of labor or money by the alienee, the widow may have her dower in such lands according to their value at the time of the assignment rather than at the time of

If the delay of assignment was caused by the widow's own fault, as where, being executrix, she sold the husband's real estate under an agreement with the heirs to retain her dower out of the proceeds, the value of her dower may be computed according to its value at the time of her husband's death. Proceeds of insurance.— Where buildings subject to dower had been insured, and after the death of the husband they were destroyed by fire, it was held that the widow was entitled to a share of the insurance money, to be estimated according to the proportion of alienation.[84] This rule is subject to modification in those jurisdictions in which it is provided by statute that the dower interest as against the husband's alienee is to be determined according to the value of the lands at the time of alienation.[85] Since the widow under the rule stated profits by an increase in the value of the lands from natural or extrinsic causes, she is also held to her proportion of the loss occasioned by a depreciation in value, either from natural causes or from mere negligence of the alienee in keeping the property in repair.[86]

e. Value Enhanced by Improvements — (i) As Against Heirs. The rule is well settled both in England[87] and in the United States, unless modified by statute,[88] that if the heirs after the husband's death enhance the value of the estate the widow will be entitled to her dower in such estate without allowance to the heirs for the value of such improvement.[89] A devisee under the husband's will[90] and a purchaser at an administrator's sale[91] have been held to be subject to the same rule. 85. The words "enhanced in value after alienation" as used in these statutes have been construed as being limited in its meaning to appreciation in the value of real estate by reason of improvements put thereon by the alienee; and it has been held that in estimating the value of real estate aliened by the husband, for the purpose of assigning his widow's dower therein, the value of the real estate is to be estimated as of the time of the assignment of dower, excluding therefrom the increase in value resulting from improvements made thereon subsequent to the date of alienation. by the common law, carry everything annexed to the freehold as an incident; the tenant in dower therefore like any other tenant of the freehold takes upon a recovery whatever is then annexed to the freehold, whether it be so annexed by folly, mistake, or the purest innocence.[92]

(II) As Against Husband's Alienees. An entirely different rule has been declared or provided by statute in this country in respect to improvements made upon lands aliened by the husband in his lifetime. In such a case the widow's dower must be admeasured or assigned according to the value of the lands exclusive of such improvements;[93] the policy of the law being that the purchaser of land from a married man should not be discouraged from enhancing its value.[94] It has been held that only special improvements, such as buildings and orchards,[95] and not those necessary to keep the lands in ordinary repair, should be excluded.[96]

bounds, where the qualities and condition of the lands and the nature of the husband's estate therein will admit of it.[97] The allotment should be made with equal justice to all interested parties, regard being had not only to the value of the estate, but also to the annual productiveness of the several parcels,[98] so that the annual income of the portion assigned shall equal at least one third of the annual income of the whole property.[99] The interests of the heirs and devisees should be considered and should be as little affected by the allotment as is possible;[1] and where the widow's dower attaches to lands of which the husband died seized, such lands should be assigned as her dower instead of lands conveyed by her husband to one who paid the purchase-price in full.[2]

(II) Consent of Parties Interested. The application of this rule may be waived by the consent of the widow, and an allotment may be made to her in a single tract, or in such other parcels as may be agreed upon by the parties interested.[9]

(III) Statutory Modification. The effect of this rule has been modified by statute so that in many jurisdictions a distinct parcel may be allotted as dower, where this is practicable and for the best interests of all the parties concerned.[10]

e. Allotment by Metes and Bounds. Dower according to common right is required by the common law to be set out in the lands of which the widow is dowable by metes and bounds, where practicable.[11] This is the rule in equity where resort is had thereto,[12] and is declared by statute in most jurisdictions.[13] The interest of the widow alone is not to determine the question whether an assignment by metes or bounds would be unjust;[14] but the interests of the whole estate and all parties interested should be considered.[15] That lands were sold under an execution against the husband, and the purchaser made valuable improvements, is a sufficient reason against assignment by metes and bounds.[16]

f. Allotment of Portion of Building. Particular rooms in a dwelling-house on lands in which the widow is entitled to dower may be assigned to her, with the use of hall, passageways, and doors, so as to secure to her a proper enjoyment of such rooms, in a case where there are no other lands in which the dower may be assigned,[17] and when she consents thereto.[18]

Where several parcels are held by the same person it is proper to assign dower out of only one of the parcels. Cazier v. Hinchey, 143 Mo. 203, 44 S. W. 1052. This rule is recognized by statute in some states. See R. I. Gen. L. (1896) c. 264, § 3.

g. Allotment of Homestead or Dwelling. The widow is not entitled as of right to have the mansion-house or dwelling included in the dower assigned to her,[19] unless it is allowed by statute.[20]

h. Effect of Homestead Exemption. A widow who is entitled to both dower and homestead should be assigned her dower out of the whole of her deceased husband's estate, without excluding the homestead, already allotted to her,[21] unless the statute is to be construed as providing that the homestead should be first allotted to her, and then her dower in the residue.[22]

i. Sufficiency of Allotment. The allotment should be definite and state with certainty and precision the portion awarded to the widow. A description of the tracts allotted by their number as designated at a land-office has been held sufficient,[23] but the measurements and boundaries should be set forth where it is possible.[24]

5. Assignment Where Lands Are Incapable of Division — a. In General. The common law recognized the rule that where the property in which the widow is entitled to dower was incapable of division her dower might be assigned by giving her a share in the rents, issues, and profits in common with the other owners, or an alternate occupation, or in such other manner as will best serve the purposes of the law.[25] The statutes in nearly all the states, however, provide methods for the assignment of dower in such cases, either by a division of the rents and profits, an allowance of an annuity based upon the annual value of the lands, the acceptance of a gross sum, or a sale of the lands and an allotment to the widow of her share in the proceeds.[26]

b. Division of Rents and Profits — (i) In General. A common method of providing for the dower of the widow where the lands are incapable of division is to secure to her the payment of a third part of the rents, issues, and profits of such lands.[27] Where the property is rented for a fixed sum she is entitled to one third thereof for her dower.[28] If the property be a mill[29] or a ferry a third of the profits would be a proper assignment of dower.[30] A report by the commissioners that the property cannot be set off consistently with the interests of the estate has been held not a condition precedent to an award of dower out of the rents.[31] Deductions for reasonable repairs and taxes should be made from the gross rents;[32] and where the rental value has been increased by permanent improvements by a purchaser from her husband there should be deducted from the net rental value the proportion which the cost of such improvements bears to the value of the lands.[33]

(II) Mines and Quarries. The rule in respect to the assignment of dower in open mines as laid down at an early date in England [34] and as adopted to a certain extent in this country is that the sheriff or commissioners in setting off the dower shall estimate the annual value of such mines as a part of the estate of which the widow is dowable and award the widow her portion of such mines by metes and bounds if practicable, and if not, allot to her a proportion of the profits, or a separate alternate enjoyment of the whole for short proportionate periods.[35]

c. Payments in the Nature of Annuities — (I) In General. In some jurisdictions statutes provide that where the lands are incapable of division the court may in its judgment direct that a sum equal to one third of the annual or rental value of the lands be paid to the widow, annually or oftener, during the widow's life, for her dower therein.[36]

(II) Determination of Amount. The amount in some jurisdictions is to be determined by ascertaining the value of the lands at the time of alienation, if aliened during the husband's lifetime, or at the time of his death if he died seized, and awarding the widow one third of the legal interest on such value.[37] In other jurisdictions it has been held that the amount to be paid the widow should be based upon the yearly value of such lands as ascertained by the gross annual product thereof after deducting all proper charges, such as taxes and repairs.[38] But there it has also been held that it is not error to base an assignment of dower upon the actual rather than the rental value of the lands.[39]

(III) Security For Payment. The amount directed to be paid should be secured in some form; if necessary, by a lien on the lands.[40] Where the widow

On failure to pay the interest or allowance as directed by the court after an election by the widow to receive such payment in lieu of

has her one-third of the interest of the money on the valuation of her deceased husband's real estate decreed to her, it is in the nature of a rent charge.[41]

(IV) Time of Payment. It is for the court to determine the number of instalments in which the annual allowance may be paid.[42] The date of payment should be fixed in the decree or judgment,[43] but should not be made payable in advance.[44] Where the statute requires the payment of interest upon a fixed sum, it has been held that the interest begins to run from the time of the commencement of the suit.[45] If the annual allowance is not paid when due, interest upon the amount unpaid may be allowed from the date of payment.[46]

d. Award of Gross Sum — (I) In General. Without express statutory provision a sum certain cannot be awarded the widow in lieu of dower, except with her consent.[47]

(II) Statutory Provisions. The statutes in the several states, however, have materially modified this rule, either by authorizing the widow at her option to take a gross sum in satisfaction of her dower,[48] or by permitting it to be done by the consent of all parties interested.[49] In some states the award of a gross sum in lieu of dower seems to be left to the discretion of the court.[50] Even without special statutory authority there seems no doubt that the parties may agree among themselves for the allowance and acceptance of a gross sum.[51]

(III) Computation of Amount. Where the lands have been sold for the payment of the deceased husband's debts, for the settlement of his estate, or for any other purpose sanctioned by law, it is proper to assign to the widow a gross sum based upon the legal interest upon her portion of the proceeds of the sale, dower, she is entitled to have her dower assigned as if she had never made such an election. Dickenson v. Gray, 100 Va. 526, 42 S. E. 298.

for the period of her expectancy of life.[52] Where the lands have not been so sold it becomes necessary to estimate their value, using as a basis either the rental or actual value, according to the method employed in the particular jurisdiction,[53] and to award the widow a gross sum equivalent to her portion of such value for the period of her expectancy, to be determined in many jurisdictions by legally recognized annuity tables.[54] The estimate should be made upon the basis of her age at the time of her husband's death,[55] without deduction for any supposed charges which have since accrued.[56] It has been held that the amount to be paid according to the annuity tables is subject to be varied on account of unusual vigor or frailty of the constitution and health of the widow,[57] or other circumstances affecting the application of such tables.[58]

e. Sale of Land For Purpose of Assignment — (i) In General. It is not competent for a court of equity in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction to decree the sale of land in which a widow is entitled to dower, and provide for her a gross sum in lieu of dower, without her consent, however much it may be for the interests of the heirs.[59] Nor can a widow, merely on her right to dower, maintain a bill to sell the heirs' fee simple and get money from its sale in lieu of dower in kind. A decree of sale in such case is not merely erroneous but void, and confers no title.[60]

(ii) Statutory Provisions. But it is provided by statute in New York and other states that by the consent of the widow and upon the application of a party interested in the land, the whole or a portion thereof may be sold and the proceeds distributed according to the respective interests of the parties, where it appears that the land cannot be divided without injuring the interests of the parties.[61]

K. Return or Report as to Assignment — 1. Requisites and Sufficiency. The sheriff, commissioners, or other officers designated to make an assignment or admeasurement are required to make a return or report of their proceedings to the court,[62] or file the same with the clerk of the court[63] at the time required by the statute, or by the order, judgment, or decree directing the assignment or admeasurement to be made.[64] The report or return should show on its face that all statutory requirements have been complied with, as that the commissioners before entering upon the performance of their duties took the oath prescribed by law.[65] It should properly be signed by all the commissioners, but a majority may act, and if signed by a majority the report is valid.[66] There should be included a particular description of the land admeasured and laid off to the widow,[67] although errors in description, as a mistake in lot or section number, will not be fatal.[68] If a gross sum is awarded in lieu of dower the report should specify the entire value of the land as well as the sum awarded.[69] When it is confirmed and no appeal is taken it cannot be afterward questioned.[70]

2. Effect of Return or Report. The return or report unless objected to by the parties in interest will be conclusive upon them.[71]

3. Confirmation or Vacation — a. Objections. Objections should be raised if at all when the return or report is made to the court.[72] They may be raised by the husband's heirs at law,[73] by devisees occupying the lands assigned as dower,[74] by executors or administrators,[75] or by creditors.[76]

until the allotment of the commissioners has been confirmed by the court.[77] Where the commissioners have been guilty of no misbehavior and have proceeded in conformity with correct principles, their return will ordinarily be confirmed by the court, although the sum awarded may appear excessive.[78]

(II) NOTICE. Where the order appointing the commissioners designates the day when the report shall be made, it has been held to operate as an adjournment or continuance of the proceedings, and confirmation may be had on motion of either party without notice to the other.[79]

c. Vacating Return — (I) IN GENERAL. The return remains under the control of the court. It is intended to satisfy its judicial discretion and conscience, and on ex parte affidavits showing error or injustice the court may refuse to confirm it, and may order a reference to a master for further evidence,[80] or may set it aside and appoint a new commission to proceed as in the first instance.[81] A return or report may be set aside where by mistake it sets apart lands not embraced in the bill[82] or where the allowance to the widow is unreasonably large,[83] but not where the excess is trifling.[84] After a return has been received, confirmed, and ordered to be recorded it cannot be set aside.[85] If in the opinion of the court injustice will result from a confirmation of the report it may be set aside, although the grounds are not such as would have entitled the parties in interest to such relief as a matter of right.[86]

(II) PROCEEDINGS. Courts of chancery have power to set aside excessive assignments of dower.[87] Affidavits both for and against vacating a report may be heard.[88] Under the practice in some jurisdictions copies of such affidavits must be served upon the opposite parties.[89]

L. Abatement and Revival. Except as modified by statute an action for dower abates on the death of the demandant, and at common law, although in some jurisdictions not in equity, it cannot be prosecuted for the recovery of mesne rents and profits as damages for the detention of dower, since damages in such an action are incident to the principal right and fall with it on the death of the widow.[90] But if the proceedings had passed to such a stage before her death as to vest in her an absolute right to the money representing the value of her estate in the land, the right passes to her personal representative.[91]

M. Final Judgment or Decree — 1. IN GENERAL. The judgment in an action at law for the recovery of dower is for an award to the widow during her natural life of the distinct parcel set off for her dower, or for the payment to her, annually or otherwise, of a specified sum equal to her proportion of the rental value of the lands during such period, together with the damages awarded to her for withholding her dower.[92] The award of lands by metes and bounds being founded on the common law, and an award of damages on the statute of Merton, they are separate and distinct parts of the same judgment; and it has been held that the award of land may be affirmed and that of damages reversed.[93]

2. Sufficiency and Requisites. The judgment should be based upon the return or report of the commissioners,[94] but should not include matters not in issue in the proceedings.[95] A description of the lands set off with no specification of quantity is insufficient.[96] If the decree award damages it should state the amount to be paid by each defendant;[97] and if the yearly value of the dower in indivisible city lots is assessed the amount should be apportioned ratably among defendants and a separate decree entered against each for his share.[98]

3. Amendment. Errors in entering up a judgment may be cured by amendment;[99] and a judgment in the widow's favor may be amended by setting off against the costs awarded her the costs of a reference in which her claim for damages was disallowed.[1] But after final judgment the court cannot alter it as to the sum directed to be paid the widow.[2]

4. Execution of Writ. Where the judgment or decree directs that lands be set off to the use of the widow for her natural life, a writ may issue to the sheriff directing that the widow be placed in possession of such lands.[3] Where the judgment or decree awards damages for the withholding of dower, execution may be had thereon as in other cases.[4]

N. Costs and Fees — 1. In General. The rule in England[5] and in some states in this country, except as modified by statute, is that a widow must pay her own costs if she obtains judgment for dower alone, without damages for its detention.[6] In other jurisdictions costs are allowed to follow the judgment as in other cases.[7] In equity the allowance of costs is in the discretion of the court, and may be apportioned among all the parties according to their interests,[8] or may be taxed in favor of or against any of them, according to their conduct and the circumstances of the case.[9]

2. Statutory Provisions. In nearly all the states special provisions are made by statute for awarding costs either for or against the widow, and providing for the payment of the expenses of the admeasurement of dower. The statutes differ in subject-matter and effect, some providing that the costs and expenses be paid by the parties according to their respective interests,[10] while others provide that they be paid by the person claiming the property or in possession of the land.[11] An action for dower is an action to recover real property within the meaning of a statute respecting the taxation of costs in such an action.[12]

3. Attorney's Fees. Unless authorized by statute,[13] the court cannot allow the widow any sum for the payment of an attorney's fees. A statute directing the payment of all the costs in an action for dower in case of resistance by defendant, if dower is recovered, does not include attorney's fees.[14]

O. Appeal and Error — 1. In General. The general rules of practice pertaining to appeals and writs of error in civil cases are applicable to actions or proceedings for the recovery of dower.[15] An appeal or writ of error, according to the practice in the particular jurisdiction, will lie from the court's erroneous refusal to assess damages for an unlawful detention of dower,[16] from a judgment setting aside an antenuptial contract relinquishing the wife's dower,[17] from a decree dismissing the widow's cross bill in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien,[18] or from any other judgment or decree which finally determines and declares the rights of the parties to the suit.[19] An order confirming the report of commissioners assigning

An appeal will lie from a judgment of the circuit court reversing, on the ground that demandant has made out a prima facie case, a decree of the probate court dismissing a petition demanding dower on the ground that the demandant had failed to show seizin in the husband during coverture. Stark v. Hopson, 30 S. C. 370, 9 S. E. 345. A proceeding for the assignment of dower dower, but leaving the damages undetermined, is not final and has been held not to be appealable.[20]

2. Scope and Extent of Review. It must be clearly shown that the action of the trial court in confirming the report of commissioners was an abuse of discretion before an appellate court will disturb it.[21] The determination of questions of fact by the court or jury in awarding dower[22] or by the commission in assigning it[23] will not ordinarily be disturbed on appeal, unless it be without testimony to support it or against the manifest weight of testimony.[24] On a review of proceedings in a probate court for the admeasurement of dower only the regularity and fairness of such proceeding can be examined.[25] The objection that the statute did not authorize the appointment of commissioners at the instance of the person who made application therefor cannot be raised for the first time on appeal;[26] and it is too late to question for the first time on appeal the propriety of a decree assigning dower because of a want of formal pleadings between defendants or because of defects in the pleadings.[27]

XII. TENANCY IN DOWER.

A. Nature of Estate — 1. In General. After assignment of dower in particular lands by metes and bounds and entry thereon,[28] the widow is seized of an immediate freehold,[29] and is vested with a life-estate therein.[30] The estate becomes absolute and she cannot be compelled to commute or sell it,[31] but it may be leased, sold, or assigned by her as any other life-estate.[32] Her estate is not dependent on her continued occupancy or possession of the lands.[33] As soon as it is assigned she may sue for the specific lands awarded.[34] If the widow is awarded a sum payable annually in lieu of dower, based upon the annual value of her dower, and charged as a lien upon the lands, it has been held that such sum may be recovered by distress or otherwise as rents are recoverable from the person in possession of the lands.[35] Where a fund equivalent to the widow's dower interest is set aside for her use, she must treat the fund as real estate and will not be permitted to encroach on the principal.[36]

Presumptions.— Campbell v. Gullatt, 43 Ala. 57 (that lands set out in a decree assigning dower are the lands described in an amended petition); Osborne v. Horine, 17 Ill. 92 (presumption, where no evidence is shown in the record, that the decree refusing to assign dower was erroneous, where the answer to the petition admits the right); Lawrence v. Miller, 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 516 (presumption that a sale will not be ordered or confirmed by the probate court unless the circumstances under which it is authorized shall exist).

2. CONTINUANCE OF HUSBAND'S SEIZIN. The widow takes her estate from her husband, and not from the heirs or from the person assigning, and her seizin is deemed a continuance of the seizin of her husband,[37] relating back either to the date of coverture or the acquisition of the husband's seizin during coverture,[38] the seizin of the heir being defeated ab initio by the assignment of dower.[39] All the rights, appurtenances, and easements pertinent to the lands assigned pass to the widow, even though they are not mentioned in the assignment.[40]

B. Encumbrances. The estate assigned to the widow is subject to all liens and encumbrances which are paramount to her dower,[41] and it is her duty to pay her proportion of the interest accruing thereon,[42] and contribute according to the proportionate value of her interest, in case it is necessary during her possession of the estate to discharge such liens and encumbrances.[43]

C. Rights and Liabilities of Widow — 1. RIGHT TO CROPS.[44] Crops growing on the lands at the time of the assignment will pass to the widow and be considered a part of her dower estate.[45]

2. LIABILITY FOR WASTE — a. In General. The widow, like any other tenant for life, is liable to the reversioner for waste committed upon the lands assigned, and an action will lie against her therefor.[46] It has been held that the widow is not liable for waste committed by her assignee,[47] or by third persons without her permission.[48] And where the reversioner takes possession under a lease from the widow he waives all claim of forfeiture because of waste.[49]

b. Statutory Provisions. The statute of Gloucester,[50] adopted at an early day in England, provided that the tenant in dower in case of waste forfeited her estate and was liable for treble damages. It has been held that this statute never became a part of the common law in this country,[51] but it has been substantially reenacted in a number of states.[52]

c. What Constitutes Waste. The rules applying to waste committed by a tenant for life apply generally to waste committed by a widow holding under her dower right.[53] The widow may cut and take from the dower estate wood and timber necessary for firewood and for repairs to buildings and fences,[54] but she cannot take it for sale,[55] unless by statute,[56] or for use on another estate.[57] Where the lands assigned consist chiefly of wood-lands, a portion thereof may be cleared and the timber removed, where it is necessary for the proper enjoyment of the dower estate;[58] and it has been held that if the whole estate is not injured by the cutting of timber it is not waste.[59]

d. Permissive Waste. A negligent and unreasonable failure to repair buildings and to keep up the lands may constitute actionable waste;[60] but the tenant in dower will not be held liable for permitting buildings and lands to become out of order where the inheritance is not permanently injured thereby.[61]

3. Right to Work Mines. A widow may work mines upon the dower estate opened in the husband's lifetime and receive and enjoy their products.[62] She may penetrate to a new seam in an opened coal mine,[63] and may cut and take timber for use in mining.[64]

4. Liability For Taxes and Other Charges. The widow in possession of her dower is liable for the taxes assessed thereon[65] after the final judgment confirming the report of commissioners assigning the dower[66] The widow should not be required to pay taxes assessed after her husband's death and before assignment of her dower,[67] unless she is in possession during such time,[68] or unless it is otherwise provided by statute.[69] In respect to taxes and other charges on the property arising during the husband's lifetime, the tenancy in dower does not differ from other freehold estates, and the widow standing in the place of her husband must necessarily be subject, as to such estate, to the charges, duties, and services to which it is liable.[70]

5. Rights of Creditors. Dower after assignment being a vested estate for life in the widow is like other life-estates[71] subject to levy and sale under execution issued on a judgment for her debts;[72] although it has been held otherwise as to a dower interest in an equitable estate.[73]

D. Termination of Estate. The widow's dower estate is terminated by her death;[74] and therefore a lease of her estate becomes inoperative at that time.[75]

I. DEFINITION.

A drain is an artificial channel or trench through which water or sewage is caused to flow from one point to another;[1] a ditch,[2] or as sometimes defined by statute, an open ditch.[3] In a more restricted sense, as applied to houses, the term "drain" is sometimes applicable to a conduit used for the drainage of one building only.[4] To drain land is to rid it of its superfluous moisture.[5] Hence drain-

II. ESTABLISHMENT AND MAINTENANCE.

A. Power of Legislature to Establish — 1. In General. It is within the power of a state to require local improvements to be made which are essential to the health and prosperity of any community within its borders. To this end it may provide for the construction of canals or drains for draining marshy and malarious districts, and of levees to prevent inundations.[8]

Mr. Justice Peckham, in speaking of the power of a legislature to authorize the reclamation of swamp lands, in Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 163, 17 S. Ct. 56, 41 L. ed. 369, said: "The power does not rest simply upon the ground that the reclamation must be necessary for the public health. That indeed is one ground for interposition by the state, but not the only one. Statutes authorizing drainage of swamp lands have frequently been upheld independently of any effect upon the public health, as reasonable regulations for the general advantage of those who are treated for this purpose as owners of a common property. Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co., 113 U. S. 9, 5 St. Ct. 441, 28 L. ed. 889; Wurtz v. Hoagland, 114 U. S. 606, 5 S. Ct. 1086, 29 L. ed. 299; Cooley Taxation. (2d ed.) 617. If it be essential or material for the prosperity of the community, and if the improvement be one in which all the landowners have to a certain extent a common interest, and the improvement cannot be accomplished without the concurrence of all or nearly all of such owners by reason of the peculiar natural condition of the tract sought to be reclaimed, then such reclamation may be made and the land rendered useful to all and at their joint expense. In such case the absolute right of each individual owner of land must yield to a certain extent or be modified by corresponding rights on the part of other owners for what is declared upon the whole to be for the public benefit." See also Matter of Tuthill, 36 N. Y. App. Div. 492, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 657.

Act held unconstitutional.—Where the act authorizing the formation of a drainage district did not require that the proposed drainage should benefit the public health, or otherwise be of public utility, and did not even require that the lands within the proposed district should be swamp or wet lands, it was held to be unconstitutional. Gifford Drainage Dist. v. Shroer, 145 Ind. 572, 44 N. E. 636.

2. Source of Power. The legislative authority to enact this class of laws is derived from the police power, the right of eminent domain, or the taxing power of the state.[9]

3. Test as to Validity. The test as to the validity of such laws is found in the object and purposes thereof.[10]

4. Upon Whom Conferred. The power to construct drains is in no proper sense a part of the usual powers belonging to town and county governments; but is a special authority given for a particular purpose, which may be conferred upon any person or body upon which the legislature may see fit to confer it.[11]

B. Purposes Justifying Establishment — 1. Public Benefit or Utility. Under the various constitutional provisions and acts conferring power upon local authorities to establish drains, it must be shown that such drain is necessary and conducive to public health, convenience, or welfare, or of public benefit or utility.[12]

Police power.— It has been held in Indiana that the reclamation of wet lands and the drainage of ponds and marshes is of public utility, and is for the benefit of the public health and welfare, and that it is by virtue of the police power that the authority of the state is exercised to enact drainage laws. Under the Indiana statute it has been held that it is not necessary that a drain shall be of public utility, benefit highways, and promote public health, in order to authorize a special assessment. It is sufficient if it accomplishes any one of these things. Perkins v. Hayward, 124 Ind. 445, 24 N. E. 1033.

2. Benefit to Community or Neighborhood. It is not necessary, in order that the use may be regarded as public, that the whole community or any large portion of it may participate in it.[13]

C. Drainage Companies or Reclamation Districts — 1. Legislative Power to Create. As the legislature has power to drain and reclaim swamp and overflowed lands directly or by its own agents,[14] so it has the power to do so through the intervention of companies or drainage districts created for that purpose,[15] and these companies or districts are held to be quasi-public corporations.[16]

2. Articles of Association. In some states the articles of association of a company organized to reclaim wet or overflowed lands must distinctly state the purposes intended to be accomplished, the mode and manner of draining, and contain a plain description of the commencement, the line, and the termination of the drain.[17]

struction of a county ditch would afford needed drainage to a considerable body of low lands, to several public highways, and to certain public school grounds, and the existing drainage was inadequate for such purpose, such facts were sufficient to sustain a finding that the ditch would be conducive to the public health, convenience, and welfare. Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Hancock County, 63 Ohio St. 23, 57 N. E. 1009.

Benefit of public health only.— Under the old New York Drainage Act the object for which drainage might be had by its provisions was solely the benefit of the public health. In re Ryers, 72 N. Y. 1, 28 Am. Rep. 88; Matter of Penfield, 3 N. Y. App. Div. 30, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 1056.

Enforcing a servitude.—The authority given to police juries to open up or remove obstructions from ancient natural drains does not give them the power to institute suit to enforce a servitude by a servient estate, or to have embankments leveled, in matters of a private nature, and not included in their powers. Concordia Parish v. Natchez, etc., R. Co., 44 La. Ann. 613, 10 So. 809.

13. If the drain be of public benefit, the fact that some individuals may be specially benefited above others affected by it will not deprive it of its public character. Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 79; Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Hancock County, 63 Ohio St. 23, 57 N. E. 1009.

Under an Ohio statute authorizing the construction of a ditch if "conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare," it has been held that the public health, etc., "of the neighborhood" is meant. Chesbrough v. Putnam, etc., County, 37 Ohio St. 508.

Public highway.— It has been held in Indiana that the gravel road of an incorporated turnpike company is a public highway within the meaning of the drainage law; hence a ditch, beneficial to such road, will benefit a public highway as required by statute. Neff v. Reed, 98 Ind. 341.

3. Officers and Commissioners — a. Legislative Authority to Appoint. The legislature having authority to provide for the organization of drainage districts, in the absence of constitutional provision to the contrary, this general power carries with it by necessary implication all other powers necessary to make the general authority effective, and to accomplish the results intended. Hence the legislature may designate the officers and the mode of their selection to construct and maintain drains and levees.[18]

b. Reduction of Number and Removal. Some of the statutes provide for the substitution of one commissioner for the board of commissioners.[19] The legislature may likewise provide for the removal of one set of officers and the appointment of others in a different mode.[20]

c. Eligibility. Drainage commissioners are not disqualified to act as such by the mere fact of their ownership of lands lying in such drainage district, on the ground that they are an interested tribunal.[21]

d. Authority — (I) Over Drain Situated in Different Counties. Where a petition was filed for the construction of a drain in three different counties and dismissed as to a portion of one county because beyond the jurisdiction, a joint session by the commissioners of the remaining counties without the commissioners from the county as to which the dismissal was had was a proper joint session.[22]

(II) To Divide State Into Drainage Districts. A statute delegating to a board of executive officers called drainage commissioners the power to divide up the state into drainage districts, according to their own discretion, has been held to be unconstitutional.[23]

(III) Ultra Vires — (A) Creating Indebtedness in Advance. Commissioners

Later Indiana doctrine.— It has, however, been held in Indiana, under the act of March 10, 1873, that the survey provided for in this act, which the board of directors must cause to be made after the corporation is organized, entirely supersedes and renders unnecessary that extreme particularity and accuracy in the description of the proposed work in the articles of association which were held to be indispensable under former legislation to the validity of the proposed corporation; and the description of the proposed drain need only be reasonably certain. Land Owners v. People, 113 Ill. 296.

A legislative act directing certain county or township officers to act as drainage commissioners does not violate a constitutional clause prohibiting the legislature from appointing or electing any person to an office, since it simply imposes additional duties upon officers already elected by the people. Under a Michigan statute which gave the county board of supervisors supervision over the action of the drainage commissioners and power of removal for cause, it was held that a member of such board was not eligible for the office of drain commissioner, since one of the objects of their power of review would be defeated if they could appoint one of their own number as member of such board. or officers of a drainage district have no power to create an indebtedness in advance, and then levy an assessment for the purpose of meeting it.[24]

(B) Employment of Special Attorneys. It has been held that the board of supervisors[25] are not the general agents of a drainage district, and that they are not empowered to bind the district by the employment of a special attorney to enforce the collection of an assessment.[26]

e. Official Bonds. Most of the statutes providing for the organization of drainage districts require the officers appointed under such acts to give bond with good and sufficient surety.[27]

f. Liability For Trespass. Where drainage commissioners usurp powers not given them under the statute, they may become trespassers, and may be restrained as other trespassers, if they are about to inflict irreparable injury.[28]

4. Drain Warrants or Orders — a. Out of What Fund Payable. Drain orders or warrants issued to pay for the construction of a public drain can only be paid out of the particular assessment on the credit of which they were drawn, and which constitute a separate fund.[29]

b. By Whom Approved. In several of the states the statutes require that drain warrants shall be drawn by the land trustees and approved by the board of supervisors.[30]

c. Presumption as to Validity. Under statutes authorizing drain commissioners to draw orders or warrants on the county treasurer they are prima facie valid.[31]

Set-off.— In an action upon a commissioner's official bond for conversion of drainage assessments collected, he is entitled to a credit for all moneys expended for work done under the contract in constructing the drain, and for costs and expenses of the action. Harris v. State, 123 Ind. 272, 24 N. E. 241.

Where the drainage commissioners deviate from the plans and specifications approved for the construction of a drain, without proper authority to do so, and damages result therefrom, they are liable on their official bonds for such damages. The proper measure of damages in such case would be the amount required to complete the work in the manner originally approved and ordered, for those who pay the assessments have the right to insist upon the construction of the work as established by the report of the commissioners and the approval of the court, or other proper reviewing tribunal. Smith v. State, 117 Ind. 167, 19 N. E. 744.

Dist., 24 Wash. 80, 64 Pac. 1009, holding that the board of directors of an irrigation district had authority to consent to the cessation of work on a drain, where the contractor was to be paid from a sale of bonds and sufficient funds had not been raised by such sales to meet payments due.

Invalid warrants.— It was held in Badger v. Inlet Drainage Dist., 141 Ill. 540, 31 N. E. 170, that drainage commissioners had no authority to contract for the removal of a dam built by private parties, and to issue warrants for the payment of the same, without notice to the landowners, and that the fact that the commissioners had availed themselves of the removal of such dam did not

5. Drainage Bonds. Some statutes provide that the drainage commissioners or other proper officers may postpone the payment of drainage taxes, borrow money for the construction of drains, and issue bonds or notes therefor, secured by them on such unpaid taxes.[32]

6. Liability of Members For Corporate Debts. In some of the states it is provided by statute that each member of a drainage company shall be individually liable for all debts contracted by, and all damages assessed and accrued against, the company during his membership.[33]

7. Collateral Attack on Organization. The legality of the organization of a drainage district cannot be attacked collaterally, as in an action by it to enforce assessments.[34]

D. Proceedings For Establishment — 1. Jurisdiction — a. In General. In some states a petition signed and filed by the requisite number of landowners[35] is the foundation of the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors or commissioners, in proceedings for the construction of drains or levees, and in the absence of a showing by record there is no presumption of such jurisdictional fact.[36]

Bonds issued without petition.— An Illinois act provided in certain sections that drainage commissioners might upon petition asking therefor issue bonds to the full amount of an assessment, and in another section that the commissioners might issue bonds not to exceed ninety per cent of an assessment, such bonds to bear six per cent interest and not to run more than one year after the maturity of the assessment. Liability primary.— It has been held that the liability of members of a drainage company for debts of the company is primary and that it is no defense to an action against them for such debt that the uncollected assessments upon lands for benefits accruing thereto by the construction of the work are sufficient to pay the indebtedness. Shafer v. Cravens, 46 Ind. 171; Shafer v. Moriarty, 46 Ind. 9.

Contesting de facto organization.— Where plaintiff instituted quo warranto proceedings against a reclamation district, claiming it included land embraced in an earlier district, but failed to show that the latter had a de jure existence, and then relied on a de facto organization, it was held that defendant was not precluded from controverting the de facto organization by the rule prohibiting collateral attacks. b. Over Drains Located in Two Counties or in Two Townships. The court of the county in which the petitioner resides and the proceeding is commenced has jurisdiction and authority to establish a drain extending into another county.[37] In the absence, however, of a statute conferring jurisdiction, joint action by different townships in the construction of drains through them, such action extending over more than one township, is illegal, and a tax assessed for works done thereunder cannot be enforced.[38]

2. Parties. In proceedings to establish a drain all persons interested have a right to be heard.[39]

3. Petition — a. Form and Sufficiency — (i) Description of Land. The petition for the organization of a drainage district must contain among other things a description of the lands to be included in the proposed district by legal subdivisions or other boundaries;[40] and in one jurisdiction the statute requires Sample v. Carroll, 132 Ind. 496, 32 N. E. 220.

Description of different tracts.—It has been held in Illinois that it is not necessary to the validity of the petition that it should contain the description of the different tracts of land severally belonging to the petitioners. Craig v. People, 188 Ill. 416, 58 N. E. 1000.

Agricultural drainage.— It has been held under Mo. Rev. St. (1899) § 6968, that in proceedings before a justice of the peace to ditch land for agricultural drainage, no statement or petition is required to be filed with the justice, but a rough sketch or plat of the land to be drained and of the lands across which the drain is to be constructed minutes of the survey of the land affected by the proposed drain to accompany the petition.[41]

(II) NAMES OF LANDOWNERS. Some statutes provide that the petition shall contain the names of the owners of the several tracts of land intended to be included therein, with their post-office addresses, so far as known.[42]

(III) LOCATION OF DRAIN. The statutes usually require that the petition shall contain a general description of the beginning, the route, and the terminus of the proposed drain.[43]

(IV) NECESSITY OF DRAIN. Under some statutes it is necessary for the petition to allege that the proposed drain will be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare, or that the same will be of public benefit or utility;[44] but

Schedule annexed.— It has been held sufficient if the names and post-office addresses so far as known of the landowners are included in a list or schedule annexed to the petition and referred to in the petition as part of it. Craig v. People, 188 Ill. 416, 58 N. E. 1000.

Allegation of ownership.—Under Burn Rev. St. Ind. (1894) § 5656, that the sufficiency of a petition is not affected by the failure of the petitioner to allege that he was the owner of land liable to be assessed, since the qualification might as well be affixed to his signature as expressed in the body of the petition. Shoemaker v. Williamson, 156 Ind. 384, 59 N. E. 1051. Drainage of lakes.— Where the petition for a drain, for which remonstrant as a benefited landowner was to be assessed, did not ask for the drainage of the lakes, it was held that the mere fact that the proposed route ran through several small water basins or courses did not invalidate the proceedings as being for the drainage of lakes. "Necessity" defined.— In Corey v. Swagger, 74 Ind. 211, it was held that where the under other statutes it has been held that it is not essential for the petition to state that the drain is necessary for the public health or highways, or that it is a public necessity.[45]

(v) Method to Be Adopted. Again some statutes require the petition to state generally the method by which it is believed the contemplated drainage can be accomplished in the cheapest and best manner.[46]

(vi) Signatures and Verification. The petition must also be signed by the requisite number of landowners or voters,[47] in order to give the court or board of supervisors jurisdiction. And the statutes usually direct that the petition shall be verified by the affidavit of one of the petitioners.[48] petition stated that the construction of the ditch would be "conducive to the public health, convenience and welfare," and would be "of public benefit and utility," the necessity might be fairly inferred; that as used in the statute, the word "necessity" did not mean that which is "absolutely" requisite, but that which is "essentially" requisite. Under the Indiana act of March 9, 1875, a petition which states that the ditch would be of public utility need not further state that it would benefit the public health. Coolman v. Fleming, 82 Ind. 117.

Public health.— In New York the statute (3 Rev. St. § 2448) requires the petition to set forth that the drain sought to be established is necessary for the public health. Matter of Beehler, 3 N. Y. St. 486.

Allegation of particular necessity not essential.— Where a statute authorized the court on petition to lay out a drain through a city when it could not be otherwise "accomplished without extraordinary labor and expense," it was held that the petition need not allege the particular circumstances making it necessary to construct the drain through the city to avoid extraordinary labor and expense. In California the petition must be signed by owners of one-half the acreage in the district. Yolo County Reclamation Dist. No. 537 v. Burger, 122 Cal. 442, 55 Pac. 156.

In Iowa the statute requires the petition to be signed by one hundred legal voters of the county in which the proposed drain or drains are to be located. Butts v. Monona County, 100 Iowa 74, 69 N. W. 284; Seibert v. Lovell, 92 Iowa 507, 61 N. W. 197.

In Michigan.— Where the statute provided that the petition should be signed by five freeholders of the town or townships in which such drain or the lands to be drained thereby may be situated, one or more of whom should be owners of lands liable to be assessed for the benefits, it was held that the signature of five freeholders of each township, where the drain traversed more than one township, was not required. Brady v. Hayward, 114 Mich. 326, 72 N. W. 233. In Michigan the statute requires, in addition to the signatures of five freeholders, a statement in the body of the petition that the petitioners are such freeholders and the omission of such statement will render all proceedings thereunder void. Frost v. Leatherman, 55 Mich. 33, 20 N. W. 705; Whiteford Tp. v. Monroe County, 53 Mich. 130, 18 N. W. 593. See also Harbaugh v. Martin, 30 Mich. 234.

Names signed by proxy.— The fact that the names of some landowners were signed by other parties does not invalidate the petition, if they were signed by the authority of such landowners. People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 136, 121 Cal. 522, 50 Pac. 1068, 53 Pac. 1085.

"Adjacent owners."— Under a former Iowa statute requiring a petition for a drain to be signed by "a majority of persons resident in the county, owning land adjacent to such improvement," it was held that "adjacent owners" are the owners of the land abutting on the improvement, and not the owners of all the land within the congressional subdivisions through which it runs. Wormley v. Wright County, 108 Iowa 232, 78 N. W. 824.

Signature of christian names by initials to a petition for the establishment of a drain has been held not to invalidate proceedings thereunder. Sample v. Carroll, 132 Ind. 496, 32 N. E. 220.

Residence not essential.— Under the Michigan act it is not necessary that the petitioners should be residents of the township where the proposed drain is to be located; it is sufficient if they are freeholders thereof. Kinnie v. Bare, 68 Mich. 625, 36 N. W. 672.

48. Rogers v. Venis, 137 Ind. 221, 36 N. E. 841; Updegraff v. Palmer, 107 Ind. 181, 6 N. E. 353; Carr v. State, 103 Ind. 548, 3 N. E. 375; Shields v. McMahan, 101 Ind. 591.

(VII) SURPLUSAGE. Where the petition states all the material facts required by the statute, the inclusion of some fact not jurisdictional or material will be treated as mere surplusage and will not invalidate the proceedings.[49]

(VIII) AMENDMENT. It has been held that the petition may be amended by leave of the board, even as to jurisdictional facts;[50] and upon appeal from the board, it is in the discretion of the circuit court to permit an amendment of the petition.[51]

b. Petition in Duplicate. Statutes providing for the establishment of a drainage system embracing two townships sometimes require that the petition for such drain, signed by the requisite number of landowners, shall be drawn in duplicate.[52]

c. Supplemental Petition and New Proceedings. Some of the statutes provide that any one interested in drainage proceedings may file a supplemental petition;[53] but a petition which has once been acted on by the board, proceedings under which have been declared void, cannot be used to commence new proceedings for the establishment of such drain,[54] the original petition having performed its function.

4. BOND. One or more of the petitioners is required to file a bond with the petition, with good and sufficient sureties, payable to the state, to be approved by a designated officer, conditioned to pay all expenses in case the board or court shall fail to establish the proposed drain or ditch.[55]

5. NOTICE OF HEARING — a. General Rule. In all legislative enactments on the subject of drainage, notice of the proposed proceedings for the establishment of drains is required to be given by the petitioners to all parties whose lands will be affected thereby.[56]

49. Craig v. People, 188 Ill. 416, 58 N. E. 1000; Smith v. Carlow, 114 Mich. 67, 72 N. W. 22.

51. Metty v. Marsh, 124 Ind. 18, 23 N. E. 702; Williams v. Stevenson, 103 Ind. 243, 2 N. E. 728.

Objections to the amendment of a petition to be available, on appeal, must be filed at the time the amendment is allowed. Williams v. Stevenson, 103 Ind. 243, 2 N. E. 728.

52. State v. Graffam, 74 Wis. 643, 43 N. W. 727, a failure to do so rendering the proceedings under the petition void.

53. As for example, to show that lands not mentioned in the original report or order are affected by such drainage, and that the proceedings had thereon are the same as if it were an original petition. Osborn v. Maxinbuckee Lake Ice Co., 154 Ind. 101, 56 N. E. 33.

54. State v. Graffam, 74 Wis. 643, 43 N. W. 727.

Defective bond.— It was held in Casey v. Burt County, 59 Nebr. 624, 81 N. W. 851, that proceedings for the drainage of swamp lands and the levy of a tax thereunder were void where the provisions of the Nebraska statute requiring a bond in such proceedings are not strictly complied with, a bond not being sufficient which has no sureties thereon, liability of principal limited, and not being conditioned for the payment of costs that occur in case the board of county commissioners finds against such improvements, but only providing that if on a view of the route the commissioners find in favor of the location of the ditch, the obligation to be void, otherwise to be in force.

Where all obligors are petitioners.—Where there is a bond sufficient in form and substance, signed by solvent obligors and affording ample security, and taken and approved by the auditor, the proceedings will not be dismissed because all the obligors are petitioners. Sample v. Carroll, 132 Ind. 496, 32 N. E. 220.

b. Statutes Strictly Construed. Where the mandate of the statute is that notice shall be given in a manner and for a time therein prescribed, before the time fixed for the hearing of the petition, failure in any respect to give the notice thus required will render invalid the hearing on and granting of the petition.[57]

c. Failure to Notify Parties Interested. In some states it has been held that failure to notify one or more interested landowners will not vitiate the proceedings as to those who were properly notified unless it appears that such failure would prevent the construction of the drain.[58]

d. Constructive Notice. Some statutes require that after the petition is filed ilton, 20 Ohio St. 349. But see Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463.

See 17 Cent. Dig. tit. "Drains," § 25 et seq.

Failure to give notice, actual or constructive, to an owner of land affected by a proposed drain is not a mere informality, but a jurisdictional error. Bixby v. Goss, 54 Mich. 551, 20 N. W. 581.

"Affected" defined.— In Neff v. Sullivan, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 765, 768, 17 Cinc. L. Bul. 168, the court said: "Those land owners whose lands are affected by the proposed improvement, are not confined within the meaning of the act to those whose lands are assessed therefor. The term has a broader signification, and includes all whose property rights are thereby appropriated. The extent of the appropriation is not material. If 'affected' the landowner is entitled to have his day in court to have his damages assessed."

Ex parte proceedings are unconstitutional. Rutherford's Case, 72 Pa. St. 82, 13 Am. Rep. 655.

Notice by commissioners.— In New York the commissioners are appointed by the court, upon the filing of a proper petition, and it is their duty to give notice to the petitioners and all others interested of the time and place of hearing on such petition. Matter of Beehler, 3 N. Y. St. 486.

Former owner.— Where a married woman's lands had been sold under foreclosure and conveyed without change of possession, notice of application to establish a drain affecting such land given to the owner and to the husband who occupied the land with his wife was held to be sufficient. Berryman v. Little, 49 N. J. L. 182, 6 Atl. 519.

Mortgagees.— It has been held under the Michigan statute that mortgagees do not come within the description of persons entitled to notice of hearing on application for the establishment of a drain. Kinnie v. Bare, 80 Mich. 345, 45 N. W. 345.

Purchaser pendente lite.— One who obtains title to land after the filing of the petition for the establishment of a drain in which the then holder of the legal title was named, and who had notice, is a purchaser pendente lite, and is bound by the proceedings to the same extent as if he had the legal title when they were begun. Chaney v. State, 118 Ind. 494, 21 N. E. 45.

Service on agent.— It has been held under Ohio statutes relating to township ditches that notice of the proceedings to a railroad company, by service upon its local agent, is not a valid service, and the company and its receiver, having no other notice and no knowledge of the proceedings until after the order of apportionment is made, is not bound thereby. Where hearing was adjourned.—It was held in Kinnie v. Bare, 80 Mich. 345, 45 N. W. 345, that one who was served with a citation to appear on a given day had sufficient notice to appear on a subsequent day which was fixed by adjournment announced in open court.

58. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Machler, 158 Ind. 159, 63 N. E. 210; Carr v. Boone, 108 Ind. 241, 9 N. E. 110; Grimes v. Coe, 102 Ind. 406, 1 N. E. 735. Where a party has been properly served with notice he cannot raise the objection of defective service on others, who having assented and released their right of way are themselves not in a position to object. Wolpert v. Newcomb, 106 Mich. 357, 64 N. W. 326.

Parties without notice.—Where petitioners fail to give the statutory notice, even though some of the parties interested have waived such notice, it is proper, upon motion of a party who has not made such waiver, to set aside all proceedings had under the petition. Sites v. Miller, 120 Ind. 19, 22 N. E. 82.

Tenants in common.— Where the proceedings are void as to one of several tenants in common, who are owners of the land affected, for want of notice, they are void as to all. Brosemer v. Kelsey, 106 Ind. 504, 7 N. E. 569.

the auditor, clerk, or other designated officer shall give notice of such petition by publication in a newspaper and by posting copies of such notice in a mode specifically set forth, and this constructive mode of service is provided in lieu of personal service upon the interested landowners.[59]

e. Waiver. Where parties appear without objecting to the sufficiency of the notice or to its omission, they waive their right to question it;[60] but parties who enter a special appearance and object to the sufficiency of the notice cannot be deemed to have waived objections.[61]

f. Estoppel. When notice to parties interested is defective, such parties are not estopped to have the judgment therein set aside on motion.[62] And while the better doctrine seems to be that, although an interested landowner might by his actions be estopped from denying the validity of an assessment on account of want of notice, if he should stand by without objection until considerable money had been expended in the construction of the drain, yet, in the absence of evidence showing the value of the work or the amount of money expended, such estoppel cannot be claimed.[63]

g. Form and Requisites. Some statutes require the notice to contain a pertinent description of the terminus of such drain, its direction and course, and the names of the landowners who will be affected thereby.[64]

Constitutional authority.— It has been held in Indiana that it is competent for the legislature to declare that constructive notice shall be sufficient. Carr v. State, 103 Ind. 548, 3 N. E. 375.

Non-residents.— It was held in Otis v. De Boer, 116 Ind. 531, 19 N. E. 317, that drainage proceedings under the Indiana act of March 13, 1879, were actions in rem, and constructive notice only by publication of the filing of the petition was necessary as against the land of non-residents.

Where a party joins in a remonstrance against the establishment of a drain, it is an appearance which waives notice. Sunier v. Miller, 105 Ind. 393, 4 N. E. 867; In re Drainage Application, etc., 35 N. J. L. 511.

Motion to amend petition.— Where, however, a party, after appearing specially to move to set aside the notice of petition for insufficiency, makes another motion, pending the first, to require the petition to be amended for non-conformity to the statute, he thereby waives such defects in the notice. Gilbert v. Hall, 115 Ind. 549, 18 N. E. 28.

62. Carr v. Boone, (Ind. 1886) 6 N. E. 626.

Jurisdictional defect.— This was held to be the case under an act which provided that the judgment should be deemed conclusive as to the regularity of the proceedings; the decision being placed on the ground that such a defect was jurisdictional and could not be cured. Scott v. Brackett, 89 Ind. 413.

Where a landowner is one of the petitioners he is estopped from setting up any defect in the notice, or that he did not have proper notice of the hearing, on the petition. Hackett v. State, 113 Ind. 532, 15 N. E. 799; Carr v. Boone, 108 Ind. 241, 9 N. E. 110; Carr v. Boone, (Ind. 1886) 6 N. E. 626.

Personal knowledge of proceedings.—It was held in Rice v. Wellman, 5 Ohio Cir. Ct. 334, that personal knowledge of proceedings for the establishment of a ditch will not excuse the want of service of notice on a contesting landowner, where it does not appear that the ditch has been completed, or that it was located on the land of the contestant. See also Porter v. Durham, 98 N. C. 320, 3 S. E. 832.

Clerical error will not invalidate the notice or subsequent proceedings thereunder. Marsh v. Clark County, 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 290, 26 Cinc. L. Bul. 3.

Names of landowners.— In Featherston v. Small, 77 Ind. 143 [overruled in Vizzard v. Taylor, 97 Ind. 90], it was held that the provision of the statute requiring the notice to contain the names of the owners of lands affected by the proposed drain was not mandatory.

No form of notice being prescribed by statute, the fact that the form of notice provided by the board contains more details than is necessary is no ground for complaint. Erickson v. Cass County, (N. D. 1902) 92 N. W. 841.

h. Proof of Service. In some states the statutes require proof of the service of notice by affidavit showing the manner of service, and failure to furnish such affidavit will render all subsequent proceedings void.[65] In other states, however, the statutes do not require the proof of proper service of notice to be made by affidavit, but permit it to be made by oral testimony as well.[66]

i. Second Notice. It has been held that where the first notice is not sufficient, the court may order a second notice.[67]

6. Remonstrance to Petition — a. In General. Some statutes provide that where a designated number of the landowners named in a petition, resident in the county or district, remonstrate against the construction of the drain, the petition shall be dismissed.[68] A remonstrance in drainage proceedings is in the nature of a pleading,[69] and its office is to tender some pertinent issue of fact upon which a trial may be had.[70]

b. Parties. Where one who was not named as a landowner in the petition is admitted as a party before remonstrance is made, he has a right to join with the other parties in a remonstrance against the proposed drain.[71]

c. Statement of Objections. A general statement of objections to the petition in drainage proceedings is not sufficient.[72]

Order for notice by publication.— Where the statute required the court to make an order prescribing the notice to be given of the time and place of hearing the petition it was held that the publication of the order itself instead of a formal notice was a substantial compliance with the statute, where the order contained all the essentials of a valid notice. Muskego v. Drainage Com'rs, 78 Wis. 40, 47 N. W. 11.

Where the notice to a non-resident owner was by publication, from which the name of such owner was omitted, it was held that the notice was insufficient to confer jurisdiction, under a statute requiring the citation to be addressed to such owner. Campau v. Charbeneau, 105 Mich. 422, 63 N. W. 435.

65. Bennett v. Drain Com'rs, 56 Mich. 634, 23 N. W. 449. See also Lampson v. Drain Com'r, 45 Mich. 150, 7 N. W. 772; Taylor v. Burnap, 39 Mich. 739; Lane v. Burnap, 39 Mich. 736; People v. Burnap, 38 Mich. 350; Porter v. Durham, 98 N. C. 320, 3 S. E. 832.

Where the jurat was omitted from the affidavit of service of notice, it was held that the court had power to cause the clerk to supply such omission, upon oral proof that such affidavit had been sworn to before him. Williams v. Stevenson, 103 Ind. 243, 2 N. E. 728.

Under a former Indiana act proof of posting notice of petition could be made only by affidavit. Scott v. Brackett, 89 Ind. 413.

Where the court sets the commissioners' report aside for cause and orders them to make a second report, it is not necessary that any further notice be given to the landowners. Chaney v. State, 118 Ind. 494, 21 N. E. 45.

68. Hinchman v. Wilson, 156 Ind. 476, 60 N. E. 36; Sauntman v. Maxwell, 154 Ind. 114, 54 N. E. 397.

A township which is not named in a petition to establish a drain, and which is subject to an assessment therefor, payable from the township fund, is a "landowner," within the meaning of the provision that the petition shall be dismissed upon the remonstrance of two thirds of the landowners. Zumbro v. Parnin, 141 Ind. 430, 40 N. E. 1085.

Under a statute requiring that two thirds of the landowners named in the petition, resident in the county, should join in the remonstrance, it was held error to dismiss the petition where the two thirds required was made up by including some non-residents. Bell v. Cox, 122 Ind. 153, 23 N. E. 705.

69. See, generally, Pleading.

70. Ford v. Ford, 110 Ind. 89, 10 N. E. 648. See, however, Sauntman v. Maxwell, 154 Ind. 114, 54 N. E. 397.

71. Zumbro v. Parnin, 141 Ind. 43, 40 N. E. 1085.

An owner who fails to put his title of record cannot complain if the petitioners do not make him a party, but his failure to put his title on record does not estop him from applying for leave to be admitted to defend. Bell v. Cox, 122 Ind. 153, 23 N. E. 705; Stewart v. White, 98 Mo. 226, 11 S. W. 568.

But where new parties are admitted pursuant to the report of the commissioners that their lands will be affected, their being made parties to the case will not enlarge the rights of those brought in by the original petition, so as to enable them to remonstrate after their day for remonstrance has passed. Yancey v. Thompson, 130 Ind. 585, 30 N. E. 630.

72. Objections must be specifically stated. Updegraff v. Palmer, 107 Ind. 181, 6 N. E. 353. A cause of remonstrance that the report of the commissioner does not show with sufficient certainty the method of drainage is too uncertain. Meranda v. Spurlin, 100 Ind. 380.

d. Evidence to Support. The evidence in support of a remonstrance will be confined to the issues tendered by it.[73]

e. Time of Filing. The various statutes prescribe a stipulated time after the filing of the petition for any person named in the petition as a landowner to file any demurrer, remonstrance, or petition thereto; and all objections not made within the statutory period are deemed to be waived.[74]

7. Appointment of Commissioners or Viewers — a. Power of Appointment — (I) In General. Under statutes providing for the formation of drainage districts or for the construction of drains, the county court[75] or the board of supervisors is usually required to appoint a designated number of commissioners or viewers, disinterested persons,[76] residents of the county in which the district or some part of it lies, or in which the drain is to be constructed, whose duty it is to view and assess upon the lands situated within the district, or benefited by the drain, a charge proportionate to the whole expense, and to the benefits which will result from such work.

(II) Effect of Interest. It has been held that the judge of a court designated by statute to appoint drainage commissioners is not disqualified from exercising such power of appointment because he is an owner of lands to be affected by the proceedings.[77]

b. Order of Appointment. The order appointing drain commissioners should contain a description of the lands belonging to the several owners respectively.[78] The proposed drain should likewise be identified or described in the order.[79] But the order need not affirmatively show that they are disinterested freeholders and not of kin to the parties.[80]

An allegation that costs and damages would exceed benefits presents a legal objection to the proposed work sufficient to justify a remonstrance against the establishment of the drain. Trittipo v. Beaver, 155 Ind. 652, 58 N. E. 1034.

Signers of a remonstrance cannot withdraw their names therefrom after such period has elapsed. Hinchman v. Wilson, 156 Ind. 476, 60 N. E. 36; Sauntman v. Maxwell, 154 Ind. 114, 54 N. E. 397.

75. King's Lake Drainage, etc., Dist. v. Jamison, 176 Mo. 557, 75 S. W. 679, decided under a statute giving the power of appointment to the county court.

Appointment by court of record.—However, under a constitutional provision requiring that commissioners to ascertain the value of private property taken for public use be appointed by a court of equity, drainage commissioners appointed by a justice of the supreme court or county judge have no power to construct drains on the land of non-consenting owners. Matter of Lent, 47 N. Y. App. Div. 349, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 227.

76. "Disinterested person."— Under a statute of this character it was held that a person who acted as secretary of the board of trustees of the district, for which he received a salary but who owned no lands in the district, was a "disinterested person" within the meaning of that phrase as used in the statute. High v. Big Creek Ditching Assoc., 44 Ind. 356. Where a party was engaged in the manufacture of tile, it was held that this presented no legal objection to his qualifications to act as commissioner in a drainage proceeding, in the absence of a showing that he had some interest in the particular ditch then under consideration. c. Power of Removal. It has been held that a court having power to appoint drainage commissioners has power likewise to remove them for good cause shown.[81]

d. Power to Fill Vacancies. The court has power to appoint another commissioner to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of a commissioner.[82]

8. Proceedings of Commissioners or Viewers — a. Viewing Land. It is the duty of commissioners or appraisers to go upon the lands to be affected by the proposed drain and make such an examination as will enable them to form an intelligent judgment as to the benefits or damages which each part will receive from the completed work and then to make assessments accordingly.[83] They need not, however, act jointly in viewing the lands, but it will be sufficient if they view the land singly.[84]

b. Securing Releases. The statute may require the commissioners, after making personal examination of the lands proposed to be drained, to try to obtain a release of the right of way and other damages from every person through whose land such drain is to pass, and failure to do so is fatal to all subsequent proceedings.[85]

c. Discretion as to Construction. The question as to whether a proposed ditch is more comprehensive, or whether it embraces and affects more land than is necessary in order to accomplish the drainage of the land of the petitioners in the cheapest and best manner, is a question exclusively for the viewers.[86]

d. Misconduct. It has been held that it is not misconduct for a commissioner to subpœna witnesses,[87] or to be guided by the advice or petition of counsel merely as to the necessary legal steps required to be taken.[88] Nor will the report and award of commissioners be vitiated by the fact that one of the petitioners paid their hotel bill during the hearing.[89]

9. Report of Commissioners or Viewers — a. What It Must Contain — (I) Description of Lands. The description of the lands affected by a proposed drain in the commissioners' or viewers' report should be sufficiently accurate to enable the auditor to describe such lands on the tax duplicate and have the tax collected.[90] They need not, however, report as to lands not affected by the proposed drains, although such lands were mentioned in the petition.[91]

(II) Description of Drain. The report should also set forth the width, depth, length, commencement, and termination of the proposed drain.[92]

(III) Description of Petitioners. It has been held that it is not essential that the commissioners should make a finding to the effect that the petitioners are owners of lands to be affected, if such fact can be gathered from the petition and other proceedings.[93]

(IV) Public Necessity. Where the report adopts the language of the statutory forms in stating that the proposed drain will benefit public health and be of public utility, it is sufficient,[94] without stating how the public health will be benefited or its usefulness become general.

(V) Estimated Cost. Under some statutes the commissioners are required to find and report that the estimated expense of the proposed drain will be less than the supposed benefits.[95]

(VI) Verification. Where the report is adverse to the establishment of the drain petitioned for, it is not necessary for them to verify it.[96]

proposed drain is to be located in more than one county, a majority of the board of commissioners of each county may in joint session order the location and establishment of the same, it is essential to the validity of the proceedings in joint session that a majority of each board concur in such order.[97]

c. Time of Filing. The commissioners must present their report at the time fixed by the court,[98] unless their time is extended by the court.[99] Where the statute requires the commissioners to make a detailed statement of the costs, expenses, damages, and compensations of the drain, this statement is to be of the entire expense, and should not be made until the entire work is completed or practically so.[1]

d. Amended or Supplemental Report. The report of the drainage commissioners or viewers may be amended,[2] even after the report has been confirmed and the work of construction begun.[3] And under some statutes it is expressly provided that the commissioners may present a supplemental report where it is necessary.[4]

10. Jury in Lieu of Commissioners. In several states a jury is summoned to pass upon the question of the necessity of a proposed ditch and to assess damages and benefits;[5] and it has been held that such proceedings are void where the venire for the jury fails to give the dimensions of the proposed drain or to identify its course with some precision.[6] Where a jury makes a finding that a proposed drain is not necessary, the court has no power to review and set aside such verdict.[7]

11. Remonstrance to Report — a. Who May Remonstrate. Upon filing the report a certain time designated by statute is allowed to any owner of lands affected by the work proposed to remonstrate against the report.[8]

b. Form and Requisites. The remonstrance should state the particulars in which the report is not according to law.[9] It must be duly verified by the affidavit of one of the remonstrants, or by an agent or other person having authority to do so, and until it is so verified it cannot be regarded as a statutory remonstrance.[10]

c. Time of Filing. The statutes designate the period after the filing of the commissioners' report during which remonstrances against such report may be filed, and after the lapse of such period it is too late for any interested party to remonstrate against the report.[11]

d. Effect of Withdrawal of Parties. Where some of the parties to the remonstrance afterward withdraw therefrom, such action on their part will not defeat the remonstrance.[12]

Amendment.— A paper which lacks an essential statutory element of a remonstrance cannot be amended into a statutory remonstrance after the expiration of the time fixed by statute for filing a remonstrance. Morgan Civil Tp. v. Hunt, 104 Ind. 590, 4 N. E. 299.

Bond for costs.— Under the Indiana statute the remonstrance to the report of the board of commissioners or viewers must be accompanied by bond for costs, and failure to file such bond with the remonstrance is sufficient ground to authorize the dismissal of the remonstrance. Where report is delayed.—The time allowed by statute for filing remonstrances to the commissioners' report commences to run from the time the report is filed, and where the report is not filed at the time fixed, and a remonstrance is offered within the statutory period after the report is actually filed, the court should permit it to be filed. Munson v. Blake, 101 Ind. 78. See also Breitweiser v. Fuhrman, 88 Ind. 28.

Where land is partially described.— The provision of the Indiana drainage law requiring the remonstrance to be filed within ten days after the filing of the final report of the commissioners does not apply to cases where all the owner's land so affected is not described in the petition; but these cases are governed by another provision of the act (section 3) which leaves the entire case open until the notice there specified has been given, and it is error to admit a remonstrance as to land not described, and strike it out as to land described. Goodwine v. Leak, 114 Ind. 499, 16 N. E. 816.

Presentation to court.— Under the Indiana statute it has been held that the remonstrance must not only be filed in the clerk's office, but presented to the court within the prescribed time, provided such presentation is not prevented by adjournment of court or other circumstance beyond remonstrant's control. Gilbert v. Hall, 115 Ind. 549, 18 N. E. 28.

12. Nor will it impair or affect in any manner the right of the other remonstrants to proceed with the remonstrance just as if no such withdrawal had occurred. Munson v. Blake, 101 Ind. 78. See also Little v. Thompson, 24 Ind. 146.

the filing of a remonstrance, the court may for cause shown direct the commissioners to amend their report or to bring in a new report, it is necessary for the remonstrant to file an additional remonstrance to the amended or new report.[13]

f. Waiver. A cause of remonstrance against the report of the commissioners may be waived.[14] So where the commissioners fail to file their report at the time fixed, the motion to reject the report should be made at the earliest opportunity, and a party waives this irregularity by remonstrating or asking leave to remonstrate against the report on its merits.[15]

12. Hearing — a. In General. Where authorized by statute, it is proper for the court or the clerk to hear evidence as to the sufficiency of the commissioners' report.[16]

b. Striking Out Causes in Remonstrance. It is proper to strike from a remonstrance to the commissioners' report matters that are not statutory causes for remonstrance.[17]

c. Referring Report Back. Under a statute with a provision for referring the report back to the commissioners for amendment, under certain circumstances, it has been held that this can only be done at time of hearing upon the question of confirmation of the report.[18]

d. Evidence — (i) Burden of Proof. On the hearing to confirm the report, where a remonstrance has been filed controverting material allegations of the petition, the burden of proof is upon the petitioner;[19] but where the only issue presented by the remonstrance is as to the amount of the remonstrant's assessment, it has been held that the burden of proof is on the remonstrant.[20]

(ii) Report of Commissioners. The report of the commissioners as to the advisability of establishing a drain is not competent evidence to prove the utility of the drain, where the remonstrant is contesting both the petition and the report.[21]

(iii) Former Assessment. Under a statute providing that under certain circumstances parties shall not be assessed the second time for the drainage of the

E. 822, where the objection was that one of the board was also a surety on the bond of the petitioner. But it was held in Wright v. Rowley, 44 Mich. 557, 7 N. W. 235, that the delay of a party in complaining of the establishment of a drain, in consequence of which water was drawn from a lake adjacent to his lands, leaving an unhealthy mud-hole, would not affect his rights, where the injury was not apparent until the work was done, and complainant had been assured that the drain would not lower the water.

Matters not reviewable.— The questions as to whether a system of drainage is more comprehensive and costly than need be in order to drain petitioner's lands, and as to whether a more natural outlet for drainage existed than the one decided on, are matters for the determination of the commissioners alone, and their decision is not reviewable by the court. same lands, evidence is admissible that remonstrants have already been assessed for the construction of the same ditch or one on the same line, with the same beginning and terminus as the one proposed to be established.[22]

(IV) CONFINED TO ISSUES RAISED. Upon the hearing the remonstrator's proof must be restricted to the issues raised by his remonstrance.[23]

e. Motion to Dismiss Proceedings. A motion to dismiss the proceedings should not be sustained merely on the ground that the report of the commissioners is invalid or that the orders of the court based thereon are erroneous,[24] that the commissioners or reviewers failed to perform their duty and file their report at the proper time,[25] or that the clerk of the court failed to perform a ministerial duty.[26] But a petitioner may withdraw his petition and dismiss proceedings if his motion be made at the proper time.[27]

f. Decision — (I) DISMISSAL OF PROCEEDINGS. Where the special commissioners or the jury impaneled for the purpose decide that the drain applied for is unnecessary they must so state in their return, and the proceedings will thereupon be dismissed at the costs of the petitioners.[28] And where a remonstrance has been filed against the establishment of a drain, and the court, having been requested to make a special finding, fails to find the existence of any of the statutory grounds warranting the establishment of the drain, the judgment must be for the remonstrants.[29]

(II) REMANDING REPORT. Where in the opinion of the court the commissioners' report is not according to law, it is within its province to refer the same back to the commissioners for amendment, or for a new report.[30]

(III) MODIFICATION OF ORDER. Where the court enters an order confirming the commissioners' order, and authorizing them to expend the funds to be raised subject to approval of the court, it does not thereby divest itself of jurisdiction, so as to prevent it from modifying such order at a subsequent term.[31]

g. Record of Proceedings — (I) IN GENERAL. Many of the statutes provide that all of the findings of the board of commissioners or trustees shall be reduced to writing and entered of record by the clerk of the board; and a drain is not legally established in the absence of such written record showing the action of the board, and also showing the existence of one of the statutory grounds requisite for the establishment of a drain.[32] The record must affirmatively show that proper notice of the hearing has been served upon all parties entitled thereto, and failure to do so makes such record fatally defective.[33] It has been held, however, that it is not necessary for the board of commissioners to enter a formal finding or order that the proper notice has been given.[34]

(II) Time of Making Up. The clerk may make up the record of proceedings for the establishment of a drain during their progress, or at their conclusion, and making memoranda or a partial record does not preclude him from completing the record.[35]

13. New Trial. As to questions of fact tried upon issues raised by remonstrances[36] to the report of the commissioners, it has been held that a motion for a new trial is allowable as in ordinary cases.[37]

14. Appeal[38] — a. Right to Review. An appeal from the orders and judgment in a drainage proceeding is a direct attack, and where any of the jurisdictional facts required by statute are wanting, the proceedings when thus attacked will fail.[39] However as a rule the courts will not examine the proceedings generally of drainage commissioners on sweeping allegations of irregularity, but will presume them to be legal and regular unless expressly attacked on specific grounds.[40]

b. Matters Reviewable — (I) Questions Not Properly Presented to Board. Questions not properly presented to the board of commissioners cannot be raised upon appeal, unless they go to the jurisdiction over the subject-matter.[41]

(II) Where Discretion Is Given to Officers. It is wholly within the province of the inferior tribunals and their officers to decide questions as to the practicability of a proposed route for a drain, and as to whether such drain is necessary or conducive to public health or welfare, and in the absence of fraud such questions are not subject to review on appeal.[42]

(III) On Appeal to Higher Court. On an appeal from the judgment of the circuit or other like court to a higher court only the action of that tribunal will be reviewed; alleged erroneous rulings of the board of commissioners will not be considered.[43]

Cir. Ct. 36, holding that the finding of county commissioners in ditch improvement proceedings is a final order from which error will lie.

Appeal from justice's court.— It has been held in Illinois that an appeal will lie from the judgment of a justice of the peace to the circuit court; that section 6 of this act, which provides that the judgment as to the right to construct a drain shall be final and conclusive between the parties until after the expiration of two years from the finding in the former case, does not declare that the judgment of the justice shall be necessarily final, but that the final judgment, which may be the judgment on appeal, shall be conclusive. c. Requisites to Perfect — (I) In General. The general rules as to the necessity as well as the sufficiency of assignments of error,[44] exceptions,[45] appeal-bonds,[46] and motions for new trial[47] in order to perfect an appeal[48] have been applied to appeals to an appellate court in drainage proceedings.

(II) Negligence of Court Officer. Where the appellant has complied with the provisions of the statute, the failure of the officer of the court or board to perform the functions of his office will not affect the rights of the appellant.[49]

(III) Notice of Appeal. Under some statutes it has been held that, when an appeal is taken from the decision of the board of commissioners in drainage proceedings, no notice or summons is required to be issued or served upon the appellee;[50] and under other statutes requiring notice of appeal, it has been held that such notice need not specify the errors complained of.[51]

(IV) Time of Appeal. Where the statute fixes the time within which an appeal may be taken, an appeal taken after the expiration of such time is without jurisdiction, unless there be some subsequent action of the commissioners to which the appeal is applicable.[52]

d. Board of Review. Where the statute provides for an appeal from the commissioners' decision to a board of review,[53] such appeal must be availed of before complaint can be made in another form.[54]

W. 1091 (holding that objections to proceedings for the establishment of a drain on the ground that the drain commissioners were interested parties cannot be considered on appeal, unless the matter was raised by a proper assignment of error). Thus, where no motion to dismiss or written objection appeared in the record, an assignment of error "that the court erred in overruling appellant's motion to dismiss appellee's petition for drainage, and the report of the commissioners of drainage," it was held that no question was presented which could be considered on appeal. Williams v. Stevenson, 103 Ind. 243, 2 N. E. 728.

45. The proper mode of reserving questions upon the evidence for the decision of the appellate court in drainage proceedings is by saving exceptions to the findings of the lower court, and the proper assignments of error for presenting such questions are those predicated upon such exceptions. 53. Whole board must qualify and participate.— Where the statute provided for the appointment of five commissioners to hear appeals from the order of the board of supervisors in drainage proceedings, it was held that it was essential to the validity of their decision that all five of the commissioners so appointed should qualify and participate in the hearing and decision. e. Supersedeas. Where the statute provides for an appeal to the circuit court, it has been held that all proceedings taken pending the appeal are void, even though the order be sustained on appeal.[55]

f. Trial De Novo on Appeal — (i) In General. Under some statutes, on appeal to the circuit or like court from the order of the board of commissioners establishing a drain, the case stands for trial de novo, and not as a case on review;[56] and upon rendition of final judgment, it may remand the case to the board of commissioners, with directions to enforce its judgment, or it may retain jurisdiction of the cause and hear and determine the whole case and execute its orders made therein.[57]

(ii) Qualifications of Appraisers. While the question as to the statutory qualifications of appraisers appointed by the board may be raised on trial on appeal, in proceedings de novo, such a question cannot be raised by demurrer;[58] and on such appeal such parts of the proceedings below as can be considered as pleadings to show the issues are admissible in evidence.[59]

(iii) Restricted to Questions as to Regularity of Appeal. In proceedings de novo, on appeal to the probate court, that court cannot review and pass upon the regularity of the proceedings of the trustees or commissioners, but can only determine whether the proceedings relating to the appeal are regular, and if it so finds must issue a venire for a jury and proceed with the trial as provided by the statute.[60]

(iv) Right to Open and Close. On appeal to the circuit court from a decision of the board of commissioners in favor of petitioners, where the case is tried de novo, it has been held that the petitioners are entitled to open and close the case.[61]

(VI) EVIDENCE. In proceedings de novo, on appeal from the order of the county board, the jury may, in examining and determining the matter appealed from, consider in evidence facts made known to them personally from an actual view of the premises;[63] and the burden is upon the petitioner to establish by evidence such facts as were necessary to be established before the board, if such facts are controverted by the remonstrance.[64]

(VII) JUDGMENT. Where on appeal there is no issue presented for trial, it is proper for the court, after the question of the jurisdiction of the commissioners has been determined, to render judgment on motion affirming the decision of the commissioners upon the petition and report.[65]

(VIII) FURTHER APPEAL. The determination of the circuit court, on appeal from the board of commissioners, as to whether the facts set forth by the remonstrants are sufficient to abate the action, is final.[66]

15. CERTIORARI[67] — a. When Writ Will Lie. Certiorari will lie to review the proceedings of drain commissioners who have acted without jurisdiction.[68] So where the action taken by the judge of probate and a drainage commissioner appointed by him is void, because of want of jurisdiction, certiorari is the proper remedy.[69]

b. Who May Sue Out Writ. Proceedings to establish a drain cannot be quashed or their validity questioned by certiorari at the instance of one who will not be injured thereby.[70]

16. EXPENSES OF PROCEEDINGS[71] — a. Attorney's Fees. Under some statutes attorney's fees in proceedings for the establishment of a drain cannot be made

Legality of organization of drainage district.— It was held in Sanner v. Union Drainage Dist., 175 Ill. 575, 51 N. E. 857 [reversing 64 Ill. App. 62], that certiorari is the proper remedy to test the legality of the organization of a drainage district which includes land owned by persons who were not parties to the petition and received no notice thereof, since there is no remedy by appeal.

Notice of certiorari.— However, where the notice of certiorari is not served on the commissioner within the statutory period after his determination, the legality of his determination cannot thereafter be questioned by such writ. Blumfield Tp. v. Brown, 130 Mich. 504, 90 N. W. 284.

Matters in discretion of officers.— Where any of the steps in proceedings to lay out a drain are left by statute to the discretion or judgment of designated officers, their determination is final and conclusive, and hence such matters are not reviewable on certiorari, except for fraud or partiality. Stout v. Hopewell Tp., 25 N. J. L. 202.

Parties to proceedings.— In Michigan two drain commissioners of different counties who are acting jointly, as required by statute, in laying out a drain through the counties represented by them, must both be made parties to a certiorari brought to remove proceedings by them to the circuit court of one of the counties. Duflo v. Lillibridge, 114 Mich. 350, 72 N. W. 181.

71. Costs generally see COSTS.

A county surveyor is not entitled to compensation for services rendered in connection with allotments which were valid under the part of the cost of construction and charged against either the landowners affected or the county.[72] While under other statutes it is held that attorney's fees are properly included under the item "incidental expenses," and are chargeable under the statute.[73]

b. Jury Fees. The fact that a drainage district lies in several counties does not affect the matter of jury fees in drainage proceedings brought in one of such counties, but the entire burden must be borne by said county as a governmental agency.[74]

c. Commissioners' Fees. Under one statute it has been held that where commissioners appointed by the court have reported, and the court declared the proposed system of drainage to be impracticable, the commissioners have no recourse against the county for pay or expenses.[75]

17. Costs.[76] The general rule is that where on appeal the finding of the court is against the remonstrance for any cause, such finding and judgment necessarily involves a judgment against the remonstrant for costs;[77] and the same rule applies where the petitioners are unsuccessful.[78] Where the one appealing from the report of the board, under a statute which provides four grounds of appeal, succeeds only on one ground, such appellant is entitled to judgment only for one quarter of his costs.[79]

18. Waiver and Estoppel — a. In General. And one who has made no objection to the construction of a drain, but who has had notice of every step in the proceedings and received all the benefits of it, is estopped in equity to contest his assessment for irregularities in the proceedings.[80]

b. Illegal Incorporation. It has been held that where there is no legal incorporation of a drainage association, owners of land assessed are not estopped from resisting the collection of the assessments because a part of the work has been completed at great expense, thereby benefiting the lands of such owners, with their knowledge, and without objection.[81]

19. Collateral Attack on Proceedings. The general rule is that proceedings under a statute providing for the establishment of drains cannot be collaterally attacked for mere informalities.[82] Thus if a court which has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and which is required to determine all jurisdictional questions, either expressly or impliedly, adjudges that notice was given, its decision will repel a collateral attack, unless the record of the court shows affirmatively that no notice was given; and this is so, although the record shows a defective and irregular notice.[83] However, where jurisdictional questions are involved,

The circuit court has jurisdiction of the construction of drains, and objections to its assumption thereof in a specific case must be made directly by appeal, and a party cannot after judgment make collateral objection to its authority to direct the construction of a partial drain, which it has assumed, by holding the petition sufficient to give the jurisdiction. Indianapolis, etc., Gravel Road Co. v. State, 105 Ind. 37, 4 N. E. 316.

Recital of jurisdictional facts in judgment.— A motion in a drainage proceeding to set aside a judgment entered on the report of the commissioners assessing benefits, on the ground that no notice was given to the moving parties, must show that the judgment record does not state facts giving jurisdiction to their persons, as such recitals would be conclusive in a collateral proceeding, and the circuit court is presumed to have had jurisdiction. Long v. Ruch, 148 Ind. 74, 47 N. E. 156.

an inquiry into such jurisdictional facts cannot be cut off, even on a collateral attack.[84]

E. Location, Construction, Maintenance, and Use — 1. Location and Plan — a. In General. It is the duty of the commissioners or viewers to locate the drain upon such line as they may deem best to accomplish the object sought, and while they should as far as practicable locate it on the division lines between lands owned by different persons, and thus avoid laying the same diagonally across the lands, they are not to sacrifice the general utility of the ditch to avoid diagonal lines.[85]

b. Discretion of Commissioners. In locating the route for a drain, the commissioners are not confined to that prayed for in the petition, but may in their sound discretion change either terminus.[86]

c. Utilizing Line of Former Drain. The fact that a proposed ditch is to be over the line of a ditch previously constructed has been held under some statutes to be no bar to the proceedings.[87]

d. Where Drain Makes Adjoining Property Servient. The various statutes providing for the establishment of drainage systems, public and private, do not contemplate the authorization of drains which will collect water on one landowner's property and discharge it upon an adjoining landowner's property.[88]

W. 510, holding that the determination of the board of supervisors that a petition for a drain was signed by the required number of legal voters in the county may be reviewed by appeal or certiorari, but cannot be attacked collaterally.

Under a Missouri act authorizing county courts to appoint commissioners to make contracts to drain swamp lands, under certain prescribed conditions, it was held that the jurisdiction of the court under the act was limited, and where the record failed to show the facts conferring jurisdiction, such proceedings were subject to collateral attack. Land already dedicated to public use.— In Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. North, 103 Ind. 486, 3 N. E. 144, it was held that in the absence of statutory authority a drain cannot be ordered to be constructed longitudinally on the right of way of a railroad. This decision is placed on the ground that lands once taken for a public use cannot under general law, without an express act of the legislature for that purpose, be appropriated by proceedings in invitum to a different public use. See, generally, Eminent Domain.

Ultra vires.— Township trustees in establishing a drain have no authority to agree, in order to avoid litigation, that no more than a certain amount of water shall be allowed to come down in the drain, and that all surplus water shall be turned into an old watercourse; hence such an agreement is not binding on their successors. Using old drain as outlet.— Drain commissioners may appropriate and use an established drain as the outlet for a new drain to be established, without the consent of the landowners on each side of the established drain, where they will not be damaged by the use of the drain, but on the contrary will be materially benefited, and where the dimensions of the ditch are not changed. e. Straightening and Widening Natural Streams. Most of the statutes contemplate that natural streams may be straightened, widened, and deepened, where in the judgment of the drainage commissioners the proposed system of drainage can be more effectually accomplished in that manner.[89]

2. Construction — a. Compliance With Plans. A deviation from approved plans in constructing a drain, where no injury results therefrom, is a discretion usually vested by statute in the commissioners or trustees, and a drain constructed, with a deviation justifiable under the circumstances, is a substantial compliance with the original approved plan;[90] but where the drain when completed shows a substantial deviation from the approved plan and specifications or from the order of court the report of the commissioners may be rejected, and assessments thereunder cannot be enforced.[91]

b. Contracts[92] — (i) Notice and Time of Letting. Most of the statutes provide for public notice of the letting of contracts for the construction of drains, and where such notice is omitted all proceedings thereunder are void.[93] ditch so as to prevent overflow in time of high water was erroneous; defendant's duty being to so construct it as to prevent the overflow of plaintiff's land except in cases of extraordinary high water); Burton v. Jensen, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 120, 11 Cinc. L. Bul. 26.

Under a Massachusetts statute, providing for a system of drainage for swamp, meadows, and wet lands, it was held that the drain constructed must discharge the water where it will not interfere with the rights of others; hence a ditch from one owner's land that merely discharges the water upon the lands of an adjoining owner is unauthorized. Cleaning out, deepening, or widening stream. — Under the Michigan statute providing that where a natural watercourse needs cleaning out, deepening, or widening, and there have been no proceedings to establish such watercourse, it is immaterial whether the first proceedings shall be to clean out, deepen, or widen, "but the commissioner shall take such steps as may be necessary to obtain a right of way, [as heretofore provided] and go on with his proceedings in the manner provided by law," the commissioners under a petition to lay out a drain along the general course of the creek may include portions of the creek, and deepen, widen, or straighten the same. Hauser v. Burbank, 117 Mich. 463, 76 N. W. 109.

Meandered body of water. — Where by an early statute it was made a criminal offense for any person to drain a meandered body of water, it was held that such statute was not applicable to persons acting under the express authority of a law subsequently enacted, and for the accomplishment of public purposes. Dowlan v. Sibley County, 36 Minn. 430, 31 N. W. 517.

Straightening watercourses. — It has been held in Indiana that the primary object of the drainage laws is the reclamation of wet lands, and the power to alter and straighten watercourses is a mere incident, and that a proceeding to establish a drain where the primary purpose is to straighten a watercourse, and the drainage is a mere incident, is not within the jurisdiction conferred on the courts. Advertisement for bids by sections. — Where the advertisement for the letting of a county contract for the digging of a ditch read,

It has been held that drainage commissioners have no authority to contract for work to be done until they have made an assessment, unless they have the money in their hands for the purpose.[94]

(II) Liability of Commissioners. Commissioners or trustees who execute contracts for the labor in cutting drains under acts authorizing drains to be constructed under certain conditions are not personally responsible upon such contracts or for the value of the labor.[95] However, a drainage district, created by statute, which is a body corporate, is liable in damages for a breach of contract lawfully made by its commissioners under the powers conferred by the statute.[96]

(III) Drainage Certificates. A contractor employed in the construction of a drain cannot compel the officer designated by statute to issue certificates for work done until he has completed the contract according to its specifications within the time agreed upon.[97]

c. Collateral Attack on Imperfect Construction. It is no defense to an action to recover drainage assessments that the work of construction was not completed according to the plans and specifications and the order of the court, such proceedings not being vulnerable to collateral attack.[98]

d. Bridges. Some of the statutes require that there shall be constructed and maintained by the commissioners at least one bridge or proper passageway over each open drain where the same crosses any inclosed field or parcel of land, and the cost of construction shall be charged as part of the cost of construction of such drain.[99]

See, however, Smith v. Carlow, 114 Mich. 67, 72 N. 3. Extension or Enlargement — a. In General. Most of the statutes require the same preliminary steps, such as filing petition, notice, etc., to be taken in proceedings for the improvement, extension, and enlargement of an existing drain as were required for its original establishment.[1]

b. Limit of Authority. Where the designated officers are empowered by statute, or by appropriate proceedings instituted for the purpose,[2] to repair or clean out a drain, they have no power to construct the new drain, or to deepen, widen, or extend one already constructed.[3] And in determining whether a drain has been enlarged or improved the original specifications must be taken as the guide.[4]

4. Repairs — a. Authority of Officers — (1) In General. Under some statutes a discretionary authority to determine when repairs to and cleaning out of drains are necessary is vested in the commissioner, surveyor, or other designated officer, without even requiring notice to be given of the intention to order such work.[5]

Defective petition.— Thus it has been held in Michigan that the failure of the petition for widening and deepening a drain to allege that the petitioners were assessed for the construction of the drain which they ask to have widened and deepened is fatal to the proceedings, as the requirement is jurisdictional. Tinsman v. Monroe County Probate Judge, 82 Mich. 562, 46 N. W. 780.

Failure to object to complaint.— Where the drainage commissioners of a county sought to annex certain lands to the district, and the owner failed to appear at the time the complaint was filed and object on the ground that the lands would not be benefited, after annexation of the district such owner cannot insist on objections to the assessments that the lands so annexed were not benefited. Trigger v. Drainage Dist. No. 1, 193 Ill. 230, 61 N. E. 1114.

Where drain lies in two counties.— It has been held in Ohio that where a ditch lies through two counties, having been located and constructed by the joint boards of commissioners of the two counties, that the commissioners of one county have no authority to enlarge, deepen, or widen the part of the ditch running through their county so as to overtax the outlet to such ditch in the other county, without notice to, agreement with, or consent of, the board of commissioners of such county, and that such action, not being warranted by statute, is void. Redfern v. Hancock County, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. 233, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 45.

2. Under the Michigan statute, however, it is held that it is not necessary in order to clean out, repair, or extend an existing drain, for the officers charged therewith to institute the proceedings required in the original establishment of such drain, but that they may upon their own initiative make such improvements as they deem necessary, and levy the proper assessments to cover same. (11) WHERE DRAIN IS INCOMPLETE. Under some statutes the officer designated is not authorized to repair a public ditch until after the construction of such work.[6]

b. Allotment of Work Among Landowners. Under the statute of at least one state the county surveyor is authorized to allot to the owner of each tract of land originally assessed for the construction of a drain the portion he should annually clean out and keep in repair.[7] And the statute also provides that the surveyor shall give notice to the landowners of the time when and place where he will hear objections to such allotments, giving to any person aggrieved the right to appeal from such order of the surveyor to the circuit or superior court.[8]

c. Notice of Letting of Contracts. In the absence of statutory directions the commissioner or surveyor need not give notice of the letting of the contract for repairing a drain.[9]

5. USE OF DRAIN BY OUTSIDERS. Many of the drainage statutes provide that landowners outside a drainage district, or who have not been assessed for the construction of a drain, may connect with drains already constructed on the payment of such amount as they would have been assessed if originally included in the Drain in several counties.— It has been held under Ind. Rev. St. (1894) § 5631, imposing upon "the surveyor of the county in which the proceedings were had for construction" the duty of keeping in repair a drain in one or several counties, that this section referred to the surveyor of the county in which the proceedings for the original construction were begun. E. 59, it was held that the fact that a drain was not completed under an original petition therefor, but was finished under a second petition for a drain to be constructed over the course outlined in the original petition, did not deprive the county surveyor of the right to clean out at least the portion originally built.

Landowners not originally assessed.—It has been held that the fact that lands in the vicinity of a public drain were not assessed for its original construction, it having been adjudged that they would not be benefited by the drain, does not exempt them from liability for its maintenance, where it is shown that they will derive benefit therefrom by reason of natural or artificial changes in their condition since the construction of the drain. district.[10] In some jurisdictions the right is likewise granted by statute to a drainage district to connect with drains of another district already constructed.[11]

F. Damages[12] — 1. Compensation For Appropriation and Injury — a. In General. The entry upon land and construction of a ditch, when obtained in proceedings instituted for that purpose under provisions of the statute applicable thereto, constitute in law a taking and appropriation of a perpetual easement in such land, and all damages both direct and consequential, which necessarily result from such taking and appropriation, are actual damages occasioned by the construction of such drain.[13]

b. Measure of Damages. Damages to a landowner caused by the construction of a drain are to be awarded for the full value of land actually appropriated for such drain, but only for the actual damage as to land not thus appropriated.[14]

Under the Illinois Farm Drainage Act the jury is to hear evidence as to the value of the land to be taken, and the consequent damages, and return the amount of damages found, if any. Farm bridges.— Under an Illinois statute which did not require the commissioners to construct farm bridges, it was held that a charge that the jury should take into consideration the benefits arising from the construction of such bridges in estimating the damages caused by the proposed ditch to any tract of land was erroneous. Persons must be party to action.— Under a Massachusetts statute it was held that commissioners who are appointed to effect improvements in meadows or lowlands have no authority to assess damages in favor of any one who is not a party to the proceedings instituted for such improvements with certain specified exceptions — persons whose land was damaged during the construction of the drain. c. Deductions For Benefits. The general rule is that the owner of land appropriated for a drain cannot recover damages for such land independent of an assessment of benefits to the remainder of his land, and if the latter exceed the former he has no valid claim to receive any damages, but must pay the difference.[15]

2. Proceedings to Award — a. Notice. The statutes usually require that, in proceedings to assess damages for land taken for a drain, notice shall be served on all persons interested in the same manner and with like effect as process in civil cases.[16]

b. Appeal.[17] The proper remedy of the landowner aggrieved by the award of the appraisers as to the damages is by appeal.[18]

3. Injuries From Defects or Torts. A county is not liable for a defect or want of efficiency in the plan of a drain, established pursuant to statute; neither is it liable for the negligence or failure of the contractor to whom the work of construction is let to perform such work in accordance with the plan adopted.[19] Nor is a county or a drainage district liable in damages for injuries caused by the tortious acts of its officers, but the remedy is against them personally;[20] although the trustees, under whose control and supervision the district is, may be enjoined if they act without authority or wilfully or maliciously.[21]

4. Injury to Drains.[22] Many of the statutes make it a misdemeanor for any

III. ASSESSMENT OR LEVY.

A. Constitutionality of Acts Authorizing — 1. In General. Legislative acts authorizing counties or certain designated officers to construct drains where necessary for the public health, welfare, or utility, and assess the cost of such construction upon the adjacent lands benefited thereby, have uniformly been held to be constitutional.[25]

2. Where Made by Private or Quasi-Public Corporations. In some jurisdictions it has been held that the legislature has no power to grant a private corpo-

Malice need not be shown in a prosecution under the Indiana act, making it a penal offense to unlawfully obstruct and injure a public ditch. Toops v. State, 92 Ind. 13.

Under the Indiana statute it has been held that an owner of land is not liable for obstructing a ditch thereon, unless it is wilfully done, and a person who has stood by and allowed his crops to be spoiled by reason of such obstruction, which he might easily have removed, has no remedy. App. 120, where it was held that injunction will not lie to prevent cattle from passing through a public drain crossing land of the cattle-owner; the remedy being for damages, if the owner fails to repair the damages.

Injunction generally see INJUNCTIONS.

Where a drain is constructed by agreement of parties, under the Illinois act of July 1, 1809, which prohibits any person from interfering in any manner with it without the consent of the parties thereto, it has been held that an injunction will lie to prevent the owner of the land from filling up the drain without general consent. When the damage or compensation for lands taken for drains has been constitutionally ascertained, the legislature can lawfully direct the mode of assessing damages on the property benefited thereby. People v. Nearing, 27 N. Y. 306.

Land not benefited by improvement.— It was held in Oliver v. Monona County, 117 Iowa 43, 90 N. W. 510, that the Iowa drainage law is not invalid for permitting the levying of an assessment on land which is not benefited by the improvement, where the land is located in the drainage district; the theory of the law being that the drainage will promote the public health and welfare and not ration the right to construct drains without the owner's consent and assess them therefor.[26] While in other jurisdictions it has been held that it is not essential to the validity of an assessment for drainage that it should have been made by a municipal corporation.[27]

B. Nature of Benefits — 1. In General. In the assessments of benefits in drainage proceedings, the landowner should not be charged with general benefits which accrue to him as a member of the community, but only with such as are special.[28] The benefits for which an assessment may be made must relate to the betterment of the land for the purposes to which it may reasonably be put, and lands not benefited are not subject to assessment.[29]

2. Apportionment According to Special Benefits — a. In General. In levying assessments to cover the cost of the construction of a drain, each tract of land should be assessed its proportionate share of the entire cost, the amount of each share being governed by the amount of special benefits conferred by the drain upon each separate tract.[30]

Ct. 663, 28 L. ed. 569.

In Illinois it has been held that the clause of the constitution of 1870, authorizing the passing of "laws permitting the owners or occupants of lands to construct drains or ditches, for agricultural or sanitary purposes," implies that the community whose property is to be taxed may have the right of election in the matter, and a law authorizing a drainage and the imposition of taxes or special assessments without any previous vote of the persons affected thereby is unconstitutional. Updike v. Wright, 81 Ill. 49.

It was formerly held in Illinois that a drainage company, being a private corporation, could not be empowered by the legislature to levy taxes or assessments, even on the lands within the district benefited by the drain. Harward v. St. Clair, etc., Drainage Co., 51 Ill. 130. See also Hessler v. Drainage Com'rs, 53 Ill. 105.

Special benefits are those which increase the value of the land, relieve it from a burden, or make it especially adapted to a purpose which enhances its value. Lipes v. Hand, 104 Ind. 503, 1 N. E. 871, 4 N. E. 160.

In California it has been held that the question as to whether or not the mode of assessment in a reclamation district is in accordance with proper apportionment or equality of burden or benefit is for the consideration of the legislative department, in the absence of a palpable violation of private rights. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 54, 4 Pac. 945.

In Illinois it has been held that not only the benefit to lands assessed by the drainage thereof, but also the benefit which the owner may derive by the drainage of a slough separating such land from other lands so as to render it unnecessary for him to bridge the slough to reach such other lands, may be considered by the jury on the trial of an appeal from an assessment of benefits to such owners' land by the proposed drainage. Spear v. Drainage Com'rs, 113 Ill. 632.

Where lands by reason of their situation are provided with sufficient natural drainage they are not liable for the cost and expense of a ditch necessary for the drainage of other lands, simply for the reason that the surface water of his lands naturally drain therefrom to and upon the lands requiring artificial drainage. Blue v. Wentz, 54 Ohio St. 247, 43 N. E. 493.

No. 108 v. West, 129 Cal. 622, 62 Pac. 272. So it has been held in New York that an assessment by the commissioners upon lands benefited by a drainage system at the same rate per acre, without making a personal examination thereof, or without regard to its quality or location, is erroneous. People v. Jefferson County Ct., 1 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 603. Where the estimate of the referee as to benefits accruing to a landowner from a ditch contemplated the full construction of such ditch, whereas it was never fully completed, it was held that the landowner could only be required to pay for the benefits conferred by the ditch as actually constructed. Peck v. Watros, 30 Ohio St. 590. Where the statute provided that the commissioners "shall jointly view and assess, upon each and every acre to be reclaimed or benefited thereby, a tax proportionate to the whole expense, and to the

b. Division of Lands For Assessment. An act providing that the commissioners should assess each tract of land its proportionate share of the entire cost of the construction of a drain was construed as not requiring a tract to be divided into the smallest legal subdivisions in making the assessments, but only as prohibiting the assessment of two or more disconnected tracts together.[31]

3. Omission of Lands Subject to Assessment. As a general rule the omission to assess a portion of the lands subject to assessment under the provisions of the drainage law renders the entire assessment made invalid.[32]

C. Property Liable — 1. Lands Outside Drainage District. Since, where landowners outside of a drainage district connect their drains with the district drains they are deemed to have voluntarily applied to be included in the district,[33] the drainage commissioners have jurisdiction to classify and assess such lands as other lands of the district, even where such lands are in another township.[34]

2. Townships and Villages. An assessment for the benefits for the construction of a drain may be made against a township[35] or a village[36] when the benefit is apparent.

3. Highways and Railroads. It has been held that drainage commissioners have jurisdiction to assess highways and railroads where they are specially benefited by the establishment of a drain.[37]

4. Public School Lands. It has been held in some jurisdictions that school property or school lands held in trust for school purposes are exempt from special assessments for drainage purposes as well as from general taxation.[38]

D. For Repairs — 1. Apportionment — a. In General. The assessments for repairs to a drain are to be levied in proportion to the benefits received there-benefit which will result from such works," it was held that this provision was within the rule requiring an apportionment according to benefits. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 4 Fed. 366, 6 Sawy. 567.

In North Carolina, however, it has been held that in the passage of a general law the legislature is not bound to provide that the right of taxation for benefits shall be upon each landowner within the locality according to the benefit that it may be estimated he will receive, and therefore a drainage law providing for such taxation according to the number of acres owned by each individual benefited is valid. Brown v. Keener, 74 N. C. 714.

Total cost exceeding aggregate benefits.— Where the reported benefits by a proposed drain exceed the reported cost thereof and the several property-owners do not question the benefits assessed against them, remonstrants against the drain cannot, upon the ground that the expense of the drain will exceed the aggregate benefits, question the amount of the benefits, but only the cost of the drain. 36. It has been held that lands in an incorporated village may be assessed by the trustees of a township in which the village is situated for the construction or enlargement of a drain outside the village limits. And the fact that the village has a board of health will make no difference. Kent v. Perkins, 36 Ohio St. 639.

b. Lands Not Assessed For Construction. It is expressly provided by statute in some states that lands not assessed for the construction of a drain cannot be assessed for its repairs.[40]

2. Assessments in Excess of Benefits — a. General Rule. The general rule is that the expense of construction of a drain cannot be assessed against particular lands to an amount in excess of the benefits received by such land,[41] and an assessment upon a tract of land in excess of the benefits received is void as to such excess.[42]

b. Where They Exceed Estimated Cost. It has been held in one jurisdiction that in levying an assessment for drains a drainage company is not limited to the estimate of the probable cost of the work required to be made by their charter, provided the total assessments are within the benefits conferred;[43] and in another that the fact that an assessment for the benefits conferred by a drain exceeds the value of the land so assessed does not invalidate the law or assessment made thereunder.[44]

3. Where Amount Is Fixed at Organization of District. It has been held under one statute that where an annual assessment for repairs is made at the organization of a district and confirmed, the court has no power thereafter to enlarge such assessment, although it is less than the maximum amount authorized by the statute.[45]

E. Time of Assessment — 1. Instalments. Where the statute authorizes the drainage commissioners to levy and enforce assessments from time to time as the work of construction progresses, they have authority to exercise a reasonable discretion in levying assessments, and the exercise of such power is not inhibited until the money is required to pay for work actually done.[46]

841. See, however, State v. Henry, 28 Wash. 38, 68 Pac. 368, holding that under the Washington act (Sess. Laws (1895), p. 142), providing for the construction of drainage ditches, and that all state, county, and school lands shall be subject thereto, the school lands cannot be excluded from the assessment for the costs of the improvement.

If a court should compel an arbitrary sum to be assessed on the lands of a district, regardless of the question of benefits, its action could not be sustained. Hosmer v. Hunt Drainage Dist., 135 Ill. 51, 26 N. E. 587.

In New Jersey it has, however, been held that an assessment for drains does not have to be limited in amount to the actual benefit received from the drain by the land so assessed in order to be constitutional. In re Pequest River, 42 N. J. L. 553; Britton v. Blake, 35 N. J. L. 208.

Where benefit is evident.— Special assessments for the drainage of lands of individuals to be made in advance of the completion of the work can be made only where the benefit is demonstrably certain, and not where the intended benefits are speculative and doubtful.

Creating indebtedness in advance.— It has been held in Illinois that drainage commissioners have no power to create an indebtedness in advance for the repairs to a drain, and then levy an assessment for the purpose of meeting it. Winkelmann v. Moredock, etc., Drainage Dist., 170 Ill. 37, 48 N. E. 715;

2. When Work Is Completed. In some jurisdictions it has been held that assessments to defray the expenses of the construction of a drain cannot be made until the work is completed and the damages are ascertained.[47]

3. For Repairs. The rule seems to be that an assessment for the repair of a drain should not be made until it is completed and accepted.[48]

F. Additional Assessments. Under most of the drainage acts the commissioners are not confined to one assessment, and if the first assessment proves insufficient to complete the drain additional assessments may be ordered;[49] but in making subsequent assessments, the previous assessments should be considered, and in no case should the aggregate amount exceed the benefits to the lands assessed.[50]

G. Jurisdiction — 1. Assessment by Jury. Where the statute prescribes that assessments for annual repairs shall be made by jury, the court has no jurisdiction to make such assessment without the intervention of a properly impaneled jury.[51]

2. Acquired by Notice. Under some statutes it is held that jurisdiction to assess highways for special benefits conferred by the construction of a drain is acquired by service of notice of the proceedings on the highway commissioners.[52]

In New York it has been held that drainage commissioners cannot collect an assessment for the expense of a drain until they have acquired title to the required lands, and that a mere license from landowners to construct the drain is insufficient. Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 378. Although it has been held that land damages need not necessarily be paid before the assessment is levied. Matter of Swan, 35 Hun (N. Y.) 625.

48. Under one statute it has been held that a county surveyor has no jurisdiction to make assessments for the repair of a drain until it is completed, accepted, and approved by the court. Morrow v. Geeting, (Ind. App. 1894) 37 N. E. 739. This decision was placed on the ground that the surveyor had no jurisdiction over the drain until it was completed and accepted.

When there is delay.— Where the statute fails to provide within what time after making repairs the trustees shall make assessments therefor, it has been held that the lapse of a considerable length of time after the completion of such repairs will not invalidate the assessment, if the rights of parties concerned or of third parties have not been affected thereby. So held in Geiger v. Bradley, 117 Ind. 120, 19 N. E. 760, where there was a delay of eighteen months.

Some of the statutes required that personal notice shall be given of an assessment, or notice by publication in a newspaper published in the county where the lands are situated, a specified time before payment is due, stating when and where such payment shall be made. Hayes v. State, 96 Ind. 284.

Notice of second assessment.— Under a statute requiring notice of an assessment, it has been held that no notice is necessary of a second assessment occasioned by a change of plans, when such change becomes necessary to protect all of the lands assessed. Reynolds v. Milk Grove Special Drainage Dist., 134 Ill. 268, 25 N. E. 516; People v. Chapman, 127 Ill. 387, 19 N. E. 872.

Notice of assessment for repairs.— In Iowa it is held that assessments for repairs of a drain are in the nature of a tax, and that it is not necessary in the absence of a statutory agreement that notice of the levy be given to the landowners affected. Yeomans v. Riddle, 84 Iowa 147, 50 N. W. 886.

Waiver of notice.— Taking an appeal from given of an assessment, as well as its requisites,[54] are usually prescribed by statute.

I. Assessment Roll or Return — 1. List of Lands Affected. Some statutes require that the appraisers should show in their schedule that they have included therein all lands the intrinsic or market value of which will in their judgment be liable to be affected by the proposed drain.[55]

2. Description of Lands. It has been held that the assessment roll of the commissioners or appraisers must describe the land benefited with such reasonable certainty as will make the record of it notice to all affected thereby.[56] A description of land in a drainage assessment by well understood abbreviations is not bad for uncertainty.[57]

3. Recital of Benefits. Where the assessment roll contains the amount of the charge assessed against each tract, it is not necessary for the assessment report to recite that the assessments were made proportionate to the resulting benefits.[58]

the decision of the commissioners in the matter of a special assessment is a waiver of notice of the meeting of the commissioners, since the appellant is thereby given an opportunity to be heard and a right to a trial on the merits. Kilgour v. Drainage Com'rs, 111 Ill. 342.

54. Notice is sometimes required to be given of the time and place of letting contracts, for the construction of a drain must contain a statement that at such times the assessment of benefits will be subject to review, and an assessment without such notice is void. Cook v. Covert, 71 Mich. 249, 39 N. W. 47.

Partial notification.— Under a statute requiring notice of assessment to be given to all parties whose lands are affected thereby, it has been held that failure to notify a party interested in an assessment will not invalidate the assessments of other parties properly notified. Grimes v. Coe, 102 Ind. 406, 1 N. E. 735.

Where the statute failed to provide any mode by which the party assessed should have notice of the proceeding and an opportunity to object to the amount charged against his land, this was held not to render the statute unconstitutional, since the owner might contest the assessment in the action to collect it. Where no lands are injured by the construction of a drain the appraisers may so declare in their return, and if in such case the schedule returned contained all the lands benefited it will be sufficient. Pigeon Creek Draining Assoc. v. Lagrange, 41 Ind. 272.

Where the schedule merely included certain lands which it was alleged would be benefited, without showing that they were all the lands that would be benefited, and without showing whether any lands would be injured or not, it was held that such appraisement was invalid. Bannister v. Grassy Fork Ditching Assoc., 52 Ind. 178.

56. Drake v. Schoenstedt, 149 Ind. 90, 48 N. E. 629 (holding that it was proper when only two acres of a forty-acre tract were benefited by a drain, to assess such benefit against and describe the whole tract); Ross v. State, 119 Ind. 90, 21 N. E. 345; Boatman v. Macy, 82 Ind. 490; Eel River Draining Assoc. v. Topp, 16 Ind. 242; Atwell v. Zeluff, 26 Mich. 118.

Description by legal subdivisions.— Under a statute requiring assessment lists to contain a description by legal subdivisions, swamp-land surveys, or natural boundaries, it has been held that a description naming the adjoining proprietors on the respective boundaries is insufficient. Swamp Land Reclamation Dist. No. 407 v. Wilcox, 75 Cal. 443, 17 Pac. 241 [affirming (1887) 14 Pac. 843]. And under this statute it has been held that the land need not be described in the smallest legal subdivisions. Lower Kings River Reclamation Dist. No. 531 v. McCullah, 124 Cal. 175, 56 Pac. 887.

Incomplete schedule.— It has been held in Indiana that, although the description of a tract of land in the appraisers' schedule was incomplete, yet where it clearly referred to the description of such tract in the petition for the establishment of the drain, which was complete, the assessment would not thereby be invalidated. Bate v. Sheets, 50 Ind. 329.

57. Frazer v. State, 106 Ind. 471, 7 N. E. 203.

In California it has been held that the fact that in the description of land in the assessment list the abbreviations used are not those ordinarily used will not vitiate the description, if they are uniformly used in the same manner in the list, and must have been understood by all taxpayers who examined them. Lower Kings River Reclamation Dist. No. 531 v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335.

Sufficient description.— An assessment returned by appraisers which described the land assessed as "S. 1/2 S. E., Sec. 27, T. 27, R. 6 E., 20 Acres," was held to be a sufficient description upon which to base a judgment for the amount of the assessment. Etchison Ditching Assoc. v. Jarrell, 33 Ind. 131. See also Smith v. State, 8 Ind. App. 661, 36 N. E. 298.

58. Swamp Land Reclamation Dist. No. 407 v. Wilcox, 75 Cal. 443, 17 Pac. 241 [affirming (1887) 14 Pac. 843], for in the absence of evidence to the contrary this will be presumed.

4. Amendment and Surplusage. In a proper case the assessment roll may be amended,[59] and immaterial statements therein may be regarded as surplusage.[60]

J. Remedy of Parties Seeking Relief From Assessment — 1. Waiver and Estoppel. An objection as to the classification of lands in a drainage district should be made to the commissioners, and comes too late on application for judgment for unpaid special assessments; such objection is then deemed to have been waived.[61]

2. Collateral Attack. The decision of the commissioners in making assessments and determining what property is benefited is conclusive as against a collateral attack on application for judgment for non-payment of the assessment.[62]

3. Application to Court of Equity. So irregularities[63] in a drainage assessment which do not affect the jurisdiction of the tribunal imposing it are not sufficient to warrant the interference of a court of equity;[64] the statutory remedies of appeal and quo warranto being the proper methods of testing such alleged errors.[65]

Balance of benefits over damages.— Under an act directing the jury to assess the damage and benefits against each tract separately in the proportion in which such tract will be damaged or benefited, it has been held that it is not required that the amount of each shall be entered in the roll, but that it is only necessary that the balance or excess of one over the other be carried forward to a column prepared for that purpose. Huston v. Clark, 112 Ill. 344.

59. Huston v. Clark, 112 Ill. 344, where it was held that the amendment of the assessment roll by the foreman of the jury after the jury has separated, correcting an obvious clerical error, will not invalidate the assessment. See also McCaleb v. Coon Run Drainage, etc., Dist., 190 Ill. 549, 60 N. E. 898.

60. Under an act empowering a jury impaneled under said act to assess benefits and damages, where the jury reported that only a portion of a certain tract of land was benefited, it was held that such statement was outside the jury's power, and would be treated as a mere nullity, and would not invalidate the assessment. Where no opportunity was given to be heard.— A landowner may set up as a defense to an action to enforce a drainage assessment the fact that the assessment is unjust or excessive, provided he was given no opportunity to make such defense when the assessment was made. Such an attack on the assessment is only apparently not really collateral. Lower Kings River Reclamation Dist. No. 531 v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335; Payson v. People, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588; Robeson v. People, 161 Ill. 176, 43 N. E. 619.

In California, under a statute requiring the board to jointly view and assess the land, where the board's report stated that they had jointly viewed and assessed the land, when in fact they were not all present, it was held that this recital was not conclusive of the question, if the statute did not require them to thus report, nor even prima facie evidence of the fact, but that the assessment might be attacked in a collateral action to recover the tax. People v. Hagar, 49 Cal. 229. See also Swamp Land Dist. No. 307 v. Gwynn, 70 Cal. 566, 12 Pac. 462.

63. Irregularities.—Neither an irregularity in the assessment nor the failure of the surveyor to make out a certified copy of the assessment can be made available in a suit to enjoin its collection. Davis v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 114 Ind. 364, 16 N. E. 639.

4. Appeal[66] — a. Right in General. In some jurisdictions it has been held that a statute providing for the ex parte assessment and apportionment of the cost of drainage repairs upon the lands benefited, without any right of appeal or hearing to the landowner so assessed, is unconstitutional.[67] In other jurisdictions, however, it has been held that it is not essential to the validity of an act to authorize the drainage of lands that the landowners should be given the right of appeal from assessments.[68]

b. Questions to Be Raised. Under some statutes giving an appeal from assessments of benefit on lands drained, it has been held that the only question which can be considered on appeal or review is whether the assessment is greater than the benefit accruing to the land in question.[69] So also it has been held that the appellate court can hear evidence showing that the ditch was not repaired on the line designated in the original specifications, but on a different one.[70]

5. Certiorari.[71] It has been held in some jurisdictions that certiorari is a proper method of testing the legality of an attempted tax levy by the board of supervisors for the construction of a drain,[72] and in others that certiorari does not lie to review assessments made upon lands by drainage commissioners if they have proceeded on no erroneous principle and have violated no property rights.[73]

K. Proceedings in Review — 1. Parties. Where the statute provides that drainage assessments shall be made by the county surveyor, and appeals therefrom prosecuted against him, it has been held that the county is the real party at interest, and is entitled to defend in the name of the surveyor, or to employ counsel to appear for him and resist the appeal.[74]

Judgment of county court conclusive.— Under the Illinois statutes the judgment of the county court confirming assessments of benefits and damages for drainage purposes is conclusive, and an objection that an assessment is in excess of the estimated cost of such work cannot be raised after judgment of the county court. Amount of assessment.— It has been held in Massachusetts that the amount of an assessment for a drain cannot be considered on an application for a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings of the selectmen in making such assessment, but should be by a petition for an abatement. 2. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. The proper presumptions will be indulged in favor of the legality and regularity of the assessment.[75] And on an appeal from the confirmation of an assessment for the construction of a drain, the burden of proof is on the appellant, and where the evidence is conflicting the appellate court will not disturb the findings of the lower court.[76]

3. Pleadings. Under one statute it has been held that on appeal by a landowner from the decision of the commissioners in assessing his lands no issues can be made by pleadings.[77]

4. Trial De Novo. Under some statutes the trial of an appeal from the confirmation of an assessment is a trial de novo.[78]

5. Decision. Where on appeal assessments are found to be based on an erroneous method or rule of assessment, it is not necessary to set aside the assessment entirely, but the court may order a reassessment.[79]

IV. Collection and Enforcement of Assessments.

A. Lien. An assessment upon lands for the construction of a drain as approved and confirmed by the court constitutes and becomes a lien on the lands so assessed.[80] In some states this lien upon the approval and confirmation by the sioner of another county, who acted in conjunction with the former in laying out the drain, is not a necessary party. Thomas v. Walker Tp., 116 Mich. 597, 74 N. W. 1048.

75. Thus where assessments levied for repairs to a drain are less than the amounts actually paid for the repairs, the appellate court will presume in the absence of evidence to the contrary that appellants' lands were not assessed in an amount greater than their just proportion for such repairs. Scott v. Stringley, 132 Ind. 378, 31 N. E. 953. See also Erickson v. Cass County, 11 N. D. 494, 92 N. W. 841. 78. And the introduction of the assessment roll in evidence makes out a prima facie case in favor of its confirmation and it is then necessary for the objectors to introduce evidence to impeach such assessment. In Indiana, however, it has been held that on appeal to the circuit court in a proceeding to assess benefits for the construction of a drain, the report of the appraisers is not admissible. Beck v. Pavey, 69 Ind. 304; McKinsey v. Bowman, 58 Ind. 88.

Where the appellant adduced convincing evidence that his land was in no wise benefited by a drain, but had theretofore been drained by appellant at his own expense, and the only showing to the contrary is the report of the commissioners, unaccompanied by any evidence to sustain it, the court is bound to review such assessment. In re New York Cent., etc., R. Changing drainage district boundaries.—It has been held in Michigan, under a statute empowering the township board to review the action of the commissioner in making assessments, that such board has no power to change the boundaries of the drainage district, and to exclude land which the drainage commissioner has determined were benefited. Under an Indiana statute, providing that on failure of a landowner to perform his allotment of work on the repair of a public drain, the township trustee shall perform the work and certify the costs to the auditor, etc., it has been held that the claim becomes a lien on its entry on the tax duplicate, although court of the assessment attaches from the date of filing the petition for the drain, provided such lands are named in the petition.[81]

B. Priorities. Under some statutes a mortgage executed by a person not a party to and having no notice of drainage proceedings before the approval of the assessments by the court will take precedence thereof.[82] While under other statutes it is held that, drainage assessments being liens upon each and every tract of land assessed, such liens are superior to any preëxisting encumbrances.[83]

C. Payment. Some of the statutes provide that the drainage commissioners may require assessments made in aid of the construction of a drain to be paid in instalments.[84] It has been held under one statute that an assessment for the drainage of swamp-lands may properly be made payable in gold coin.[85]

D. Interest on Delinquent Assessment. Most of the statutes fail to provide an interest penalty for the non-payment of drainage assessments.[86]

E. Assessments Illegally Collected. It has been held in one jurisdiction that an action will not lie against a township for the recovery of illegal drain assessments paid to its treasurer under protest.[87]

F. Actions and Summary Remedies — 1. Right of Action — a. In General. The lien of a drainage assessment may be enforced by suit in the manner provided by statute for the enforcement of liens arising from other taxes.[88]

b. Conditions Precedent. It has been held in some jurisdictions that the completion of the drain is not a condition precedent to the right to collect assessments therefor,[89] and that it is not necessary that an estimate of the final cost of completing the work contemplated should be made before suit is brought.[90]

c. Consolidation of Actions. It has been held that two assessments for drainage made on the same lands at different times may be recovered in one action.[91]

2. Defenses — a. In General. It has been held that premature commencement of the work of construction,[92] unnecessary expenditures,[93] or the fact that the surveyor exceeded his jurisdiction in matters of detail[94] is no defense to an action for the collection of an assessment. Proof that the assessment is too high, although otherwise valid, will not defeat the action.[95]

b. Excessive Assessment on Third Parties' Lands. It is no defense to an action to recover drainage assessments that more land of other parties was assessed for the drain than was mentioned in the petition for the drain.[96]

3. Time to Institute. Some statutes provide that if a drainage assessment is not paid on or before the annual sale of lands for the non-payment of taxes, the commissioners shall file a petition in the circuit court of the proper county for a foreclosure of such lien.[97]

4. Jurisdiction — a. In General. In the absence of a statute to the contrary an action to collect a drain assessment by enforcing a lien upon the land should be brought in the county where the land is situated, even where the drainage proceedings were instituted in another county.[98]

b. Failure to Obtain. Where the authorities attempting to impose a drainage assessment have failed to obtain jurisdiction of the person or subject-matter, but are nevertheless proceeding to sell and thereby cast a cloud on the title to the property, such sale will be enjoined.[99]

5. Parties.[1] In some jurisdictions it is held that the drainage district, as the Liberty Tp. Draining Assoc. v. Brumback, 68 Ind. 93; Smith v. Duck Pond Ditching Assoc., 54 Ind. 235.

93. Under the Illinois act which provides that the lien of taxes on land may be foreclosed by suit in equity in the name of the people when the land has been forfeited to the state at tax-sale for two years, it has been held that the lien of special assessments for drainage purposes may be foreclosed by such suit. It was held in Indiana where a copy of the county surveyor's certificate of acceptance of a ditching job was placed upon the tax duplicate, as provided in Rev. St. (1881) § 4305, in August, that such tax became delinquent on the failure of the landowner to pay it on or before the first Monday of November, as required by section 6426; and it was the duty of those charged with its collection to cause the land to be sold to enforce payment. (II) UNNECESSARY AVERMENTS. Where the petition for the construction of the drain and the proceedings of the board show the specifications on which the assessment was made, the interest of plaintiff in the work, the description of defendant's lands sought to be charged, and his ownership of the land, it has been held that it is not necessary for the complaint to contain allegations relative to these matters;[12] nor need the complaint set out the articles of association of a drainage association.[13]

b. Demurrer. The fact that plaintiff is not duly organized cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer.[14] Where the complaint alleges that the petition for the drain stated that the lands to be drained were in the county, such allegations must be taken as true on demurrer, and the petition cannot be looked to, although filed with the complaint.[15]

c. Answer or Set-Off. Damages caused by failure to construct and fully complete a drain as petitioned for are not proper subjects of counter-claim or set-off in a suit to collect a drainage assessment and enforce the statutory lien thereof.[16]

7. TRIAL.[17] Upon the trial of an action to enforce a drainage assessment the court has no power to determine the amount the owners of an old drain should be credited for its use in the construction of the new drain.[18] The court having jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the merits of the controversy may reform an erroneous and insufficient description of the land in the original petition for the drain;[19] or, where the complaint clearly shows the land intended to be benefited, and shows the mistake in the assessment describing it, may correct such mistake.[20]

8. EVIDENCE — a. Admissibility. In an action to collect a drainage assessment the report and assessments of benefits made by the commissioners or assessors, the entry showing the assessments made for the construction of the drain,[21] the original petition filed, and the order-book entries in the proceedings for the location and construction of the drain are admissible.[22]

b. Sufficiency. Where the statute provided that drainage assessments might be required to be paid after thirty days' notice thereof, to be given by personal notice, or by one publication in a newspaper stating when and where such payment shall be made, proof that a notice was sent by mail, without evidence of its contents, or when or where it was sent, was held to be insufficient.[23]

c. Burden of Proof. In an action to recover an assessment for repairs to a drain, where it is shown that the officer had jurisdiction to make the repairs, the burden of proof is on defendant to show that the assessments were not in proportion to the benefits received, that there was error in their computation, or that they were excessive.[24] But the burden of proof is on the party asserting the lien to show a substantial compliance with the statute as to notice to the landowner of the drain proceedings.[25]

9. Effect of Default. A default in a suit to enforce a drainage assessment does not admit the amount claimed to be due.[26]

10. Judgment[27] — a. Nature of. Under most of the drainage acts in an action to enforce an unpaid drainage assessment, the judgment must be in rem only against the property affected and not in personam.[28]

b. How Enforced.[29] The statutes usually provide that any judgment received in an action for a drainage assessment may be enforced and collected as other judgments in the same court.[30] Where the statute provides that no property shall be sold on execution for less than two thirds of its appraised value, a sale without appraisement under a judgment for the enforcement of a drainage assessment in illegal.[31]

Lien on railroad.— In Illinois it has been held that upon a foreclosure of a drain lien on a railroad passing through a drainage district, it is proper to decree a sale of that portion of the road within the district in satisfaction of the lien. Wabash East R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist., 134 Ill. 384, 25 N. E. 781, 10 L. R. A. 285.

Under the Pennsylvania act drainage assessments might be enforced and collected by levy, distress, and sale of the goods and chattels of the delinquent (Rutherford v. Mynes, 97 Pa. St. 78), although it was held that this did not authorize a distress upon the goods of a tenant to satisfy assessments imposed prior to his tenancy.

Under a former Indiana statute, however, it was held that in an action to recover a drainage assessment, a judgment in personam might be had against the landowner, if a resident, as well as a judgment in rem. Bate v. Sheets, 64 Ind. 209.

Approval of deed.— Under the Illinois Revenue Act the circuit court, which is given jurisdiction to foreclose for drainage assessments, has jurisdiction to approve a deed made under the decree in a suit to foreclose, and to place the purchaser in possession, where there has been proper notice and demand therefor. Hammond v. People, 178 Ill. 503, 53 N. E. 308.

Against highway commissioners.—In an action against the highway commissioners to recover a special assessment for benefits to a highway, the judgment against the commissioners is not a charge on the highway so benefited, and upon such judgment no execution can issue. It is simply a charge against the municipality, and payment may be enforced by mandamus. Colfax v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist., 127 Ill. 581, 21 N. E. 206. And see, generally, Mandamus.

Where land was injured.— In some jurisdictions it has been held that a judgment for a drainage tax will not be enforced, when it is shown that the property assessed was injured rather than benefited by the drain. Davidson v. New Orleans, 34 La. Ann. 170.

Where drainage proceedings are wholly void, a purchaser of lands at a sale made to enforce payment of a tax therefor acquires no title to such lands. Mitchell v. Lane, 62 Hun (N. Y.) 253, 16 N. Y. Suppl. 707.

As to corporate existence.— Under an act requiring courts in counties where their articles of association are filed to take judicial notice of the existence of drainage associations or districts, the appellate court will presume that the action of the lower court in determining this question was correct. Delawter v. Sand Creek Ditching Co., 26 Ind. 407.

As to purpose of drain.— In an action to enforce a drainage assessment, the record on appeal not showing the facts of the case, the appellate court will presume that the object designed to be attained by the establishment of the drain was one authorized by statute.

rule against raising objections for the first time on appeal[33] has been applied in appeals in actions to enforce drainage assessments.

G. Remedies For Wrongful Enforcement — 1. Injunction[34] — a. In General. If proceedings for the establishment of a drain are absolutely void, a suit to enjoin the collection of an assessment for its construction is maintainable.[35] So where it appears that the proposed drain will not be of benefit to the lands assessed by the commissioners,[36] injunction will lie to prevent them from apportioning any of such assessment upon such lands, and oral testimony is admissible on the hearing of the application for the injunction as to the justice of the apportionment. Where, however, the property assessed for the expenses of a drainage ditch has received all the benefits of the ditch, the assessment will not be enjoined merely for an irregularity in the acceptance of the work by the surveyor,[37] or on the ground that the work on the drain was not completed according to plans and specifications.[38]

b. Parties. An action to enjoin the sale of a landowner's property under a void drainage assessment may be brought against the county treasurer without making the county a party defendant.[39] It has been held that two persons owning separate tracts of land, both subject to a drainage assessment, cannot join in Anderson v. Kerns Draining Co., 14 Ind. 199, 77 Am. Dec. 63, where in the absence of facts in the record the court presumed that the object to be attained was the promotion of public health and not the benefit of agriculture.

33. See, generally, Appeal and Error.

Error not in record.— A variance between the number of acres in a tract of land assessed and the number of acres named in the assessment roll cannot be urged for the first time on appeal, where it is not shown that the assessment was levied upon the lands by acreage. 35. Drummer v. Cox, 165 Ill. 648, 46 N. Laches.— Where a bill to enjoin the collection of drainage assessments does not affirmatively allege fraud, and is delayed until the work has been almost completed, and the assessment, or almost the entire assessment, has been collected, it will be dismissed. An allegation in a complaint, in a suit to enjoin an assessment for benefits of a drainage ditch, that plaintiff had no notice of the time set for the hearing of the petition, without stating that the constructive notice provided for by statute was not given, is insufficient. Sarber v. Rankin, 154 Ind. 236, 56 N. E. 225.

Gross injustice in apportionment.— Under the Ohio statute an action may be maintained to enjoin the placing on the duplicate for collection of an assessment made to pay the cost and expense of locating and constructing a ditch improvement, on the single ground of gross injustice in the apportionment, and if the fact of gross injustice is established on the trial, plaintiff is entitled to injunctive relief. But it has been held under this statute that if upon the trial it is established that plaintiff derived a substantial benefit from the improvement it is not a gross injustice to apportion some part of the necessary cost and expense of the improvement to plaintiff, and where substantial benefit is made to appear, the remedial right changes, and it becomes a proposition not of gross injustice, but of equitable apportionment between the persons mutually benefited, and the party must then pursue such remedy as is provided for by law, and is not entitled to the extraordinary remedy of injunction. one action to enjoin the collection of the assessments, their causes of action being separate and distinct, and held in separate rights.[40]

2. ACTION TO SET ASIDE SALE. In an action to set aside a sale of land made under an execution on a judgment in a drain assessment action, it will be presumed that the order of sale did not direct a sale without an appraisement where it is required by statute.[41]

H. Drainage Certificates — 1. NATURE OF. Some of the statutes provide that if any one shall fail to construct the portion of the ditch set off to him, the work shall be let, and on completion and acceptance thereof by the proper officer, a certificate shall be issued to the one doing the work for the amount due, which amount is then entered on the tax duplicate against the land.[42]

2. ACTION ON. A contractor holding a drainage certificate cannot sue the landowner for the amount due, but should file a copy of the certificate with the auditor, who is required to place it on the tax duplicate, to be collected as other taxes are collected.[43]

3. ACTION TO SET ASIDE LIEN OF. In a suit to set aside and annul the lien of a drain certificate, the invalidity of the certificate is not shown by an averment that the contractor did not complete the work, it not appearing that he had not done work to the full amount of the certificate.[44]

I. DEFINITION.

A druggist is one who deals in drugs and medicines.[1] The term is synonymous with "pharmacist" or "chemist." In the United States, as also in Scotland, the term "apothecary" is likewise synonymous with "druggist." In England and Ireland, however, the term "apothecary" is applied to a member of an inferior branch of the medical profession licensed to practise medicine as well as to dispense and sell drugs.[2]

II. REGULATION.

A. Registration — 1. VALIDITY OF STATUTES REQUIRING. Statutes which require the retailer of drugs, medicines, and poisons to submit to examination and to procure a registration certificate or license from a board created for the purpose of conducting such examination have been uniformly upheld as a valid exercise of police power;[3] and such acts are not invalid as attempting to delegate legislative power to the pharmacy board.[4] It is held, however, that the provisions of pharmacy acts which confer upon registered pharmacists the exclusive right to sell patent or proprietary medicines and domestic remedies not compounded by them, without requiring such pharmacists to make any examination or analysis thereof, are invalid as conferring a special power in violation of the constitution;[5] and a provision that the board might in their discretion issue permits to parties engaged in business in villages or other localities to sell domestic remedies and proprietary medicines was held invalid as conferring discretionary and legislative power upon such board.[6]

1. Bouvier L. Dict.; Century Dict.

It is said that the term "druggist" properly means one whose occupation is to buy and sell drugs without compounding or preparation (State v. Holmes, 28 La. Ann. 765, 26 Am. Rep. 110), but in its usual acceptation, it means one who deals either in medicines or in the materials that are used in compounding medicines (Mills v. Perkins, 120 Mass. 41; Black L. Dict.).

It is not essential that a druggist or apothecary shall compound or manufacture medicines in order to constitute him a druggist. Hainline v. Com., 13 Bush (Ky.) 350.

A commission merchant dealing principally in alcohol is not a druggist within the meaning of the Massachusetts act regulating the sale of alcohol by druggists. Mills v. Perkins, 120 Mass. 41.

2. Appointment and Powers of Board. The appointment of a state board of pharmacy is governed by constitutional or statutory provisions.[7] The board has implied power to do such acts as are necessary to the enjoyment of the powers expressly conferred upon it;[8] but under an act empowering the board to fix a fee for the required certificate for druggists, the board is not authorized to fix the fees arbitrarily or to discriminate between individuals.[9]

3. Right to Be Registered. Some of the pharmacy acts provide that those who have graduated in pharmacy or who have practised as druggists for a certain number of years before the passage of such acts shall be entitled to be entered as registered pharmacists without examination;[10] and mandamus will lie to compel the state board of pharmacy to enter a graduate in pharmacy as a registered pharmacist, the board having no discretion in the matter.[11]

4. Necessity of Registration — a. In General. An article, such as borax, which, although often used in compounding medicines and prescribed for medical purposes, is extensively and generally used for domestic and household purposes, may be sold by one not a registered pharmacist;[12] and under some statutes there is no prohibition against the sale of drugs other than poisons or patent medicines containing poison by one not a registered pharmacist, provided he does not describe himself as "druggist," "chemist," or "pharmacist."[13] So too it has been held that an unregistered clerk may aid a pharmacist under his immediate personal supervision.[14] And where a pharmacist entitled to registration pays his fee, he is entitled to proceed in his business until the expiration of the year, and cannot be held liable in a criminal prosecution because of the non-action of the board of pharmacy in issuing his certificate.[15] Where a license required by statute is for the protection of the public, and not for revenue only, the imposition of a penalty amounts to a prohibition of a contract in violation of the statute;[16] and where the owner of a stock of drugs transferred the same to another, to be held and treated by him as its ostensible owner, for the purpose of evading the law relating to registered pharmacists, and the property is levied upon under execution as that of the person so in possession, the real owner will be estopped from claiming any title thereto.[17] On the other hand an insurance policy on a stock of drugs kept for sale by an unregistered pharmacist is not void, as the owner may employ a duly registered pharmacist to conduct his business;[18] and a law providing that only registered pharmacists shall sell drugs has no reference to a sale of a stock of drugs under foreclosure or judicial sale.[19]

b. By Physician Compounding Prescription. A physician has no vested right, from the nature of his profession, to keep a drug store;[20] and under a statute[21] prohibiting the selling or compounding of drugs, except by a registered pharmacist, and providing that nothing in the act should interfere with the business of any licensed practising physician, or prevent him from applying to his patients such articles as might seem to him proper, or with his compounding his own prescriptions, a physician was held liable to the penalty prescribed if, not being a registered pharmacist, he filled prescriptions sent to him by others.[22] One sued for an alleged violation of the pharmacy law, and shown to have compounded prescriptions without a pharmacist's license, if he claims the right as a physician to compound them, must show registration or license as a physician.[23]

c. For Sale of Patent, Domestic, and Commonly Used Medicines. No registration is probably necessary for the sale of patent medicines,[24] and under an act exempting the vendor of "domestic remedies" from its penalties, it has been held that a drug prepared by skilled chemists and scientific apparatus may come into such common use and be so well understood in its effects by people without medical knowledge as to make it a domestic remedy, and accordingly it was left to the jury to determine whether iodine and quinine were "domestic remedies."[25] So too an act[26] permitting shopkeepers, not pharmacists, whose places of business are more than one mile from a drug store to sell the commonly used medicines and poisons, if put up by a registered pharmacist, but prohibiting such sales within that distance, was held reasonable.[27]

6. Violations of Registration Acts — a. By Owner — (i) What Constitute. Where the owner of a drug store[30] takes no part in conducting the same himself, but employs a duly certified pharmacist for said purpose, he is not subject to indictment for engaging as manager in the business of apothecary without the certificate of qualification required by the act.[31] The owner of a drug store is not liable for the statutory penalty where medicine was sold therein by one in his employ not a registered pharmacist if the sale was made without such owner's knowledge or assent.[32]

(ii) Defenses. In a prosecution for keeping a pharmacy without being registered, under the New York statute, it is no defense that there was no board of pharmacy for examination and registration, as defendant could have compelled the appointment of such a board.[33]

(iii) Indictment. An allegation that defendant "carried on the business of a druggist without a license therefor," using the language of the statute, is sufficient.[34] An indictment for keeping a pharmacy without being registered is not void for duplicity, although it charges that defendant, not being a registered pharmacist, "did unlawfully open and conduct a certain pharmacy," and not being registered "did unlawfully keep open shop for retailing medicines," etc.[35]

(iv) Actions to Enforce Penalty. Under a statute[36] providing for the licensing of pharmacists, and authorizing a recovery of a penalty for "every" violation of the act, there may be a recovery of accumulated penalties.[37] Under a similar statute providing for an action of debt[38] the declaration[39] must allege

b. By Clerk. Where a registered pharmacist is employed and placed in charge of a drug store, he becomes personally liable for the statutory penalty if he permits one who is not a registered pharmacist to vend medicines or poisons.[42]

B. Privilege or Occupation Tax[43] — 1. In General. In addition to requiring a certificate of registration from a board of pharmaceutical examiners, an additional license is required of druggists in some states, either by statute[44] or municipal ordinance.[45] The object of the license is to produce revenue, while the object of the registration is to restrict the sales of drugs and poisons to those who are capable of dispensing them properly.[46]

Statutes requiring itinerant vendors of drugs, who publicly profess to cure diseases thereby, to pay a license-fee, have been upheld as a valid exercise of police power, and are applicable alike to articles produced within the state and to those brought in original packages from another state.[47]

45. Reasonableness of municipal tax.—Under a statute authorizing a city to levy and collect a just and reasonable license-tax on druggists, an ordinance imposing an annual tax of five hundred dollars on a business, the gross receipts of which were one thousand dollars per year, was held unreasonable. Lyons v. Cooper, 39 Kan. 324, 18 Pac. 296. A municipal tax was held reasonable in Tulloss v. Sedan, 31 Kan. 165, 1 Pac. 285.

46. Accordingly it was held that W. Va. Va. 253. So under the South Carolina act of 1881 (17 St. 582) authorizing a city council to impose a license on citizens engaged in any calling, business, or profession, a city could impose a license-tax on druggists, although they already had a license from the board of pharmaceutical examiners, as required by S. 48. In Ohio the reference in section 3 of the Pure Drug Statute (87 Ohio Laws 248) is to the edition of the United States Pharmacopœia in use when the statute was enacted — that of 1880 — so that the sale of a drug equal to the standard of strength, quality, and purity laid down in that edition is not rendered unlawful because it is below a standard set in a subsequent edition. State v. Emery, 55 Ohio St. 364, 45 N. E. 319.

2. Right to Prescriptions and Manner of Keeping Them. A statute[49] requiring every druggist to keep all prescriptions, numbering and filing them in order, and to produce them when required, is constitutional.[50] Nevertheless a druggist has such an interest in his file of prescriptions, notwithstanding the qualified right of the persons who deposited them, that he may transfer such file to another; and it was held that a mortgage of a stock of drugs does not include a file of prescriptions.[51]

B. Right to Discriminate as to Customers. A drug store in which soda-water is sold is not a place of public accommodation, within the Civil Rights Act, and the keeper thereof may refuse to sell soda-water to a colored person.[52] So a druggist may refuse to fill the prescriptions of a certain physician without rendering himself liable in damages.[53]

C. Right to Practise Medicine. Where there are acts regulating the practice of medicine, druggists are usually confined in the exercise of their business to the preparing, compounding, dispensing, and vending of drugs and medicines. They cannot give advice to or attend a patient, or administer medicines for profit; nor can they recover for the value of medicines so prescribed by them, unless they are also qualified to act as physicians.[54]

IV. Liability of Druggists.

A. Ex Contractu. A druggist undertaking to sell a certain drug to a customer impliedly warrants the good quality of the drug sold, that the article sold and delivered is of the kind he contracted to sell, and if a prescription that it is compounded secundum artem. The rule caveat emptor does not apply.[55] In case of a breach of such warranty the vendee may recover for such losses as naturally and proximately resulted therefrom,[56] but the vendor is liable on the contract only to those with whom he has contracted or their privies.[57]

Distinction between liability in contract and tort.— Where a druggist substitutes a harmful drug in lieu of a harmless one, he commits a breach of warranty of the contract; if he is guilty of negligence in so doing he is also guilty of a tort. See infra,

B. Ex Delicto — 1. In General — a. Degree of Care and Skill Exacted of Druggists.[58] In a number of cases it has been held that apothecaries, druggists, and all persons engaged in manufacturing, compounding, or selling drugs, poisons, or medicines are required to be extraordinarily skilful, and to use the highest degree of care known to practical men to prevent injury from the use of such articles and compounds.[59] In others it is held that when a druggist assumes to put up a prescription for a customer he undertakes that he possesses the ordinary skill of a druggist, and that he will exercise proper care and skill in putting up the medicine required, the degree of care being proportionate to the gravity of the injury that would naturally result from a want of care.[60]

b. What Constitutes Negligence — (I) Delivering Deleterious For Harmless Drug — (A) In General. A druggist who negligently delivers a deleterious drug when a harmless one is called for is responsible to the customer for the consequences, as being guilty of a breach of the duty which the law imposes on him to avoid acts in their nature dangerous to the lives of others.[61] Thus while the mere sale of tartaric acid to one who called for Rochelle salts was in one case held not sufficient to show negligence,[62] yet in another it was held that the sale of strychnine, when a preparation of camphor was called for, was sufficient to show negligence, in the absence of explanation.[63] So where a prescription called for snakeroot and Peruvian bark, and the druggist ran them through a mill in which he knew cantharides, a poisonous drug, had shortly before been ground without being properly cleansed, he was liable to the party injured.[64]

(B) Mistake in Label. If a druggist on application sells a harmful drug as and for a harmless one, he is liable to one who relying upon his label uses the drug and is injured thereby;[65] and the mistaken label of the manufacturer will not protect a retailer if he was negligent in failing to discover the mistake.[66]

(II) Failure to Analyze Patent or Proprietary Medicine. A druggist is not required to analyze the contents of each bottle or package of a patent or proprietary medicine which he gets from the manufacturer. If he delivers to the customer the article called for, with the label of the proprietary or patentee on it, he cannot justly be charged with negligence in so doing.[67]

IV, B. In an action on the warranty plaintiff must allege and prove privity of contract, but not negligence; while in an action of tort he must allege and prove negligence, but not privity of contract. See Howes v. Rose, 13 Ind. App. 674, 42 N. E. 303, 55 Am. St. Rep. 251.

58. The case of Fleet v. Hollenkemp, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 219, 56 Am. Dec. 563, which holds that a druggist cannot escape liability in tort by proving that there was an accidental or innocent mistake, and that he used extraordinary care and diligence in compounding the medicine which caused the injury seems to stand alone.

(III) Failure to Notify Customer of Dangerous Character of Drug. No liability attaches to a druggist for injuries to a customer for lack of instruction as to the safe method of handling an article called for and sold to him, the dangerous qualities of which are generally known, where he has reached the age of discretion, and there was nothing to apprise the seller that he was unfit to be intrusted with the substance.[68]

(IV) Filling Illegible Prescription. If the prescription of a physician is so illegibly written that a druggist, notwithstanding the exercise of ordinary care, makes such a mistake in mixing the ingredients as to cause or hasten the death of the patient who partook thereof the druggist is not liable in damages.[69]

(V) Recommending Prescription. Where a druggist in good faith recommended the prescription of another person to the owner of a sick horse, who ordered him to put it up and paid him, the owner had no cause of action because the horse was injured by the medicine, which had been properly prepared according to the prescription.[70]

c. Privity of Contract as Affecting Recovery. While a contract ordinarily creates no duty except as to the parties and their privies, actions for damages may be maintained by persons who are neither parties nor privies to a contract when the injury complained of arises from want of care in the sale of a thing imminently dangerous.[71] Thus a manufacturing druggist selling a poisonous or dangerous drug labeled as a harmless one is liable in damages to any person who, without carelessness and relying on the erroneous label, takes such drug as a medicine, on the ground of a breach of public duty, and whether the injured one is an immediate customer of defendant or not.[72] So the proprietor of a patent medicine is liable to one who, having purchased it from a retailer and used it as prescribed, is injured by reason of some harmful ingredient contained in the medicine;[73] and a druggist was held liable where he recommended and put up a hairwash for a customer which was to be used by the latter's wife, and which injured her hair.[74]

In Davidson v. Nichols, 11 Allen (Mass.) 514, certain wholesale druggists sold to a retailer a quantity of sulphide of antimony for black oxide of manganese, and the retailer sold it to plaintiff, who supposing it to be what it purported to be used it in combination with chlorate of potassa, causing an explosion and injuring him. It was held that the wholesalers were not liable, because the article was not in itself dangerous, and they had no notice that it was intended to be used in the combination which rendered it dangerous. The distinction is criticized as unsound in a note to Thomas v. Winchester, 57 Am. Dec. 461, 462.

Selling laudanum to wife.— An action may be maintained by a husband against a druggist to recover damages for selling to plaintiff's wife secretly, from day to day, large quantities of laudanum to be used by her as a beverage, and which was so used by her to defendant's knowledge, without plaintiff's knowledge, whereby she was made sick and unable to perform her duties as wife, and

d. Defenses — (I) IN GENERAL. If a druggist sell one drug for another, and injury result, it is no defense that he was careful and prudent in handling drugs,[75] or that plaintiff's case was negligently treated,[76] although it would be a defense that the mistake caused no injury.[77] The fact that morphine was sold for quinine on private application, and not on prescription, did not excuse the druggist.[78]

(II) CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE. One who is injured by the negligence of a druggist in substituting an injurious drug where a harmless one was called for cannot recover if he was guilty of contributory negligence in taking the medicine;[79] but the contributory negligence of a husband in the purchase of a drug to be used by his wife is not to be imputed to her in an action by her administrator against the dealer for her death resulting from the use of such drug.[80]

2. NEGLIGENCE OF EMPLOYEE. Where a druggist's clerk, in the course of his employment, negligently supplies a harmful drug in lieu of a harmless one called for, either by prescription or otherwise, and injury results from taking it, the druggist will be liable in damages.[81] In such case it is no defense that the clerk is a registered and competent pharmacist.[82]

I. DEFINITIONS.

A. "Drunkards," "Habitual Drunkards," and "Common Drunkards." A drunkard is one with whom drunkenness has become a habit; one who habitually drinks to intoxication; a sot;[1] one who habitually gets drunk.[2] The material difference between the terms "drunkard" and "habitual drunkard" is not well defined.[3] The latter appears to be the stronger term. A habitual drunkard is one who has acquired a fixed habit of drunkenness;[4] one who has formed the

"An habitual drunkard means more than being drunk on two or three occasions within a given time,—two or three times within a given number of months; that it means the habit of drinking liquor to excess and of becoming intoxicated;[5] one who is in the habit of getting drunk or who commonly or frequently is drunk.[6] The term "common drunkard" has been considered as synonymous with "habitual drunkard."[7]

B. "Drunkenness" and "Habitual Drunkenness." Drunkenness is the state of being drunk or overpowered by intoxicants; the habit of indulging in intoxicants;[8] ebriety, inebriation, intoxication; the result of the excessive drinking of intoxicating liquors;[9] the term does not include the physical state resulting from the use of drugs.[10] Habitual drunkenness is the fixed habit of freuse of intoxicating liquors to such an extent as to in some manner disqualify a man from pursuing his avocation; but you can perhaps define it as well as the court." Rude v. Nass, 79 Wis. 321, 330, 48 N. W. 555, 24 Am. St. Rep. 717, 721. This was a charge to the jury and was objected to on the ground that the court left the jury to define for themselves the words "habitual drunkard." To this objection the supreme court answered that the trial court had already defined those words in a sufficiently favorable manner to plaintiff, and what was added was merely to indicate that the words were not such as to admit of a precise definition, although well understood by the public.

"Drunkenness is that effect produced on the mind, passions, or body, by intoxicants taken into the system, which so far changes the normal condition, as to materially disturb and impair the capacity for healthy, rational action or conduct; which causes abnormal results, or such as would not ensue, in the absence of the intoxicants — the changed effect produced by the immoderate, or excessive use of intoxicants, as contrasted with normal status and conduct." State v. Savage, 89 Ala. 1, 8, 7 So. 7, 183, 7 L. R. A. 426 [approved in State v. Robinson, 111 Ala. 482, 20 So. 30].

Drunkenness is the physical state which results from taking into the body excessive quantities of intoxicating liquor. Youngs v. Youngs, 130 Ill. 230, 234, 22 N. E. 806, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313, 6 L. R. A. 548; Smith v. Bigelow, 19 Iowa 459.

One is "intoxicated" when intoxicating liquor has "affected" his faculties or caused him to lose self-control, etc. (State v. Huxford, 47 Iowa 16), but not when his potations do not affect — disturb or interfere with — his mental or physical faculties (Roden v. State, 136 Ala. 89, 90, 34 So. 351).

The word "intoxicated" as used in the statute declaring it a misdemeanor to be found intoxicated means that the condition described therein has been produced by the drinking of intoxicating spirituous liquors. State v. Kelley, 47 Vt. 294.

quently getting drunk;[11] the term does not necessarily imply a state of continual drunkenness.[12]

II. THE CRIME OF DRUNKENNESS OR OF BEING A DRUNKARD.[13]

A. At Common Law. By the early common law of England public drunkenness was not an offense.[14] In some of the states, however, public drunkenness has been declared to be an offense at common law;[15] but some cases hold that public drunkenness is not an offense unless it is a public nuisance.[16]

B. The Statutory Offense[17] — 1. "Public" Commission. Where a statute provides a penalty for being drunk in a public place, the phrase "a public place" means a place where the public has a right to go and to be and does not include all places where people may be congregated.[18] To violate an ordinance against Habitual intemperance is a persistent habit of becoming intoxicated from the use of strong drink. Burns v. Burns, 13 Fla. 369, 376. "The phrase 'habitual intemperance' scarcely requires an interpretation; it is easily understood. It means the custom or habit of getting drunk. The constant indulgence in such stimulants as wine, brandy and whiskey, whereby intoxication is produced. Not the ordinary use, but the habitual abuse of them. The habit should be actual and confirmed. It may be intermittent. It need not be continuous, or even of daily occurrence." Mack v. Handy, 39 La. Ann. 491, 497, 2 So. 181. See also Mahone v. Mahone, 19 Cal. 626, 81 Am. Dec. 91; Dennis v. Dennis, 68 Conn. 186, 193, 36 Atl. 34, 57 Am. St. Rep. 95, 34 L. R. A. 449.

14. It was made an offense by 4 Jac. 1, c. 5. See 4 Blackstone Comm. 864 (where drunkenness is classed under offenses against God and religion); Jacob L. Dict. See also argument of counsel in Com. v. Miller, 8 Gray (Mass.) 484, 485.

15. See State v. Brown, 38 Kan. 390, 397, 16 Pac. 259, where it was said: "Voluntary drunkenness in a public place was always a misdemeanor at common law; and it was always wrong morally and legally. It is malum in se." In Tipton v. State, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 542, 543, holding that public drunkenness was an indictable offense at common law, the court said: "The pernicious influence of an evil example is plain to every reflecting mind, and the powerful influence of this vice upon society, not only in its effect on the relations of private life, but also as being the origin, the fomenter, and the promoter of the greater portion of public crime of the country, proves it to be what it is, an indictable offence."

Even a single act of open and notorious drunkenness has been held indictable. Smith v. State, 1 Humphr. (Tenn.) 396 [citing 4 Blackstone Comm. 61]. The principle is recognized in State v. Graham, 3 Sneed (Tenn.) 134. Subsequently by statute in Tennessee a single act of drunkenness was made not indictable. State v. Smith, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 465; Hutchison v. State, 5 Humphr. (Tenn.) 142.

16. Thus a single act of drunkenness, although it was in the presence of a crowd, was held not indictable if the persons assembled are not annoyed or disturbed. State v. Deberry, 27 N. C. 371.

A single instance of an innkeeper being drunk in his own inn is not indictable at common law unless it becomes a nuisance. State v. Locker, 50 N. J. L. 512, 14 Atl. 749 [citing 2 Wharton Prec. 778].

17. Conflict of laws.— A municipal by-law for the punishment of persons intoxicated on the public streets is not rendered inoperative by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 28, which was an act against vagrants. Winslow v. Gallagher, 27 N. Brunsw. 25. The crime of being drunk and disorderly is an entirely different offense from the crime of being simply found "drunk or grossly intoxicated" in any street, highway, etc. Therefore an ordinance describing a penalty for the first offense is not repealed by a statute defining the second offense. Ex p. Schmidt, 24 S. C. 363.

A public place does not mean a place devoted solely to the uses of the public, but it means a place which in point of fact is public as distinguished from private — a place that is visited by many persons and is usually accessible to the neighboring public. Murchison v. State, 24 Tex. App. 8, 5 S. W. 508.

A grand jury room is a public place. Murchison v. State, 24 Tex. App. 8, 5 S. W. 508.

A room in a hotel is not a public place in this sense. Bordeaux v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 37, 19 S. W. 603.

Highways and streets.— Under such a statute a public highway is a public place and a street is a public highway and therefore a public place. See State v. Stevens, 36 N. H.

"public drunkenness," it is not necessary to be drunk in a public place; public drunkenness is not equivalent to drunkenness in a public place.[19]

2. Intent. To constitute the offense of being "found" intoxicated, it is not necessary that the liquor should have been drunk with the intent to become and to be found intoxicated.[20]

3. Defenses. It has been held to be no defense to an offense to be found in a public place in a state of intoxication that defendant became drunk from liquor taken by a physician's prescription.[21] On the other hand, it has been held that an honest mistake as to the intoxicating qualities of the liquor taken may constitute a good defense.[22]

C. Arresting Without Warrant. Under a statute requiring an officer who arrests an intoxicated person without a warrant to make a complaint against such person, an officer who in good faith has arrested a person who was not intoxicated or who fails to make such a complaint is liable for assault.[23]

D. Indictment, Information, or Complaint[24] — 1. Charging Within and Following Terms of Statute. Generally where the offense is charged in the terms of the statute it will be sufficient.[25] Where, however, a statute makes it an offense to be drunk under certain conditions, the indictment must charge the offense within the conditions prescribed.[26] But the complaint, indictment, or

22. State v. Brown, 38 Kan. 390, 397, 16 Pac. 259, where the court quoted the maxim ignorantia facti excusat and cited 1 Bishop Cr. L. 301. But the court took the precaution to say that intoxication through an honest mistake might not constitute a complete defense to the action: "If after becoming drunk, he was still sufficiently in the possession of his faculties to know what he was doing, and to know the character of his acts, and went voluntarily into a public place, he would be guilty."

Indictment or information generally see Indictments and Informations.

25. Gallatin v. Tarwater, 143 Mo. 40, 44 S. W. 750. See also Com. v. Boon, 2 Gray (Mass.) 74; State v. Kelly, 12 R. I. 535, where a complaint under R. I. Gen. St. c. 232, § 25, for being a common drunkard is set out. Especially is this so when the words of the statute creating and defining the offense are fully descriptive of it. Such words are then technical and may therefore be used to describe the offense. Com. v. Boon, 2 Gray (Mass.) 74. But see Com. v. Whitney, 5 Gray (Mass.) 85.

An exception to the rule that it is sufficient to charge the offense in the language of the statute defining it is that where the statute is not to be taken in the broad meaning of the words used, but limited by construction to a special subject or matter; in which case the indictment should charge the crime so as to bring it within the construction placed upon the act. State v. Welch, 88 Ind. 308.

A complaint under Mass. Gen. St. c. 165, § 25, alleging that on a day named defendant "was guilty of the crime of drunkenness by the voluntary use of intoxicating liquor" is sufficient. Com. v. McNamara, 116 Mass. 340 [citing Com. v. Miller, 8 Gray (Mass.) 484].

Being a "habitual drunkard" need not be charged in an indictment under a statute which makes it an offense to be a drunkard. People v. Radley, 127 Mich. 627, 86 N. W. 1029.

26. Thus under a statute which made it an offense to be "found" intoxicated a complaint which alleges that on a specified day information charging one with the offense of being drunk should be free from duplicity.[27]

2. Particular Averments — a. As to Place. An indictment at common law for drunkenness should show that the offense was common and public;[28] and under a statute which makes it a penal offense to be found intoxicated in a public place it is necessary that the indictment should with reasonable certainty describe the place[29] where the accused was found, so that the court may see that such place is a public place within the meaning of the statute.

b. As to Time. A complaint that on a certain day defendant "was and is a common drunkard, having been at divers days and times" since said day drunk and intoxicated by the voluntary and excessive use of intoxicating liquors, charges that defendant was a common drunkard on the day named only.[30]

c. Of Means of Intoxication. It is not necessary to allege the means by which or the thing upon which the accused became intoxicated.[31] defendant was drunk and intoxicated whereby he was disabled and deprived of his reason but does not aver that he was found in that condition is insufficient. State v. Bromley, 25 Conn. 6; State v. Carville, (Me. 1888) 14 Atl. 942; State v. Austin, 62 Vt. 291, 19 Atl. 117.

Alleging annoyance.— Where a statute makes it an offense to be drunk on any street, avenue, or public place within the city or in any private house to the annoyance of any citizen or any person, a report of a police officer which does not allege defendant's drunkenness was to the annoyance of any person and which is unaccompanied by the names of witnesses is insufficient. St. Joseph v. Harris, 59 Mo. App. 122.

Substantial compliance.— That defendant was "indecently drunk contrary to the provisions of a statute" is equivalent to averring the "being intoxicated under such circumstances as amount to a violation of decency," the offense defined by the statute. Alexander v. Card, 3 R. I. 145.

27. See Criminal Law; Indictments and Informations.

No duplicity.— Where a complaint charges the offense of being drunk in several different public places enumerated conjunctively, it charges only one offense, although such enumeration is made disjunctively in the forbidding ordinance under which the complaint was brought. Gallatin v. Tarwater, 143 Mo. 40, 44 S. W. 750.

28. Tipton v. State, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 542 [approved in Smith v. State, 1 Humphr. (Tenn.) 396]. See also State v. Waller, 7 N. C. 229, to the effect that an indictment for common drunkenness must charge that the offense was in view of the public.

Allegation of disturbance of the good order of a city.— Under Ohio Rev. St. § 2108, authorizing city councils to punish persons disturbing the good order and quiet of the corporation by clamor and noise in the night season and by intoxication and drunkenness, a person who is charged with the violation of an ordinance passed in pursuance of the power granted by this provision of the statute must be accused of disturbing the good order and quiet of the city. An affidavit which contains no such averment charges no offense. Jefferies v. Defiance, 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 144, 25 Cinc. L. Bul. 68.

29. State v. Welch, 88 Ind. 308; State v. Waggoner, 52 Ind. 481.

Alleging that defendant was found intoxicated in a public highway and on a sidewalk sufficiently charges the commission of the offense in a public place. State v. Moriarty, 74 Ind. 103; State v. Waggoner, 52 Ind. 481. See also Rosenstein v. State, 9 Ind. App. 290, 36 N. E. 652.

Alleging the name of the town is not a sufficient description of the place. State v. McLoon, 78 Me. 420, 6 Atl. 601.

Private house.— Indictment which charges that defendant "was then and there found unlawfully in a state of intoxication in a public place, to wit, at a social party held and had at the residence of Jackson Simmons" is insufficient in that it charges that defendant was intoxicated only at the private house of a gentleman which is not a public place. State v. Sowers, 52 Ind. 311, 312.

Street and court-house.—An allegation that defendant was drunk in a street in a certain city and in another count that he was drunk in the court-house of said city is sufficient. State v. Brown, 38 Kan. 390, 16 Pac. 259.

The name of the street need not be set out. State v. Brown, 38 Kan. 390, 16 Pac. 259.

A description which would be good in an affray ought to be sufficient in an indictment for being found intoxicated, for to constitute an affray the fighting must be in a public place, and there is no reason why the description of the public place should be different in the two offenses. State v. Waggoner, 52 Ind. 481. See also 2 Cyc. 41, 45.

30. The indictment does not allege in proper form that defendant was a common drunkard at any other time, the words "having been at divers days and times since," etc., are not sufficient to charge him with being a "common drunkard" in those times. Com. v. Foley, 99 Mass. 499, 500 [citing Com. v. Boon, 2 Gray (Mass.) 74].

31. A complaint which alleged that defendant "became and was intoxicated" was held sufficient. State v. Kelley, 47 Vt. 294.

d. "Force and Arms." The indictment need not allege that the offense was committed with "force and arms."[32]

e. Of Previous Conviction. An indictment for a second drunkenness by voluntary use of intoxicating liquors which charges that defendant at a certain time and before a certain court "was duly and legally convicted of the crime of drunkenness" committed at a certain time and place is a sufficient allegation of a former conviction.[33]

E. Evidence[34] — 1. Admissibility. The evidence must be confined to the charge of the indictment.[35] Evidence of defendant's demeanor at other times when intoxicated is admissible to show the character of the acts relied upon in the case.[36] A witness may state whether or not in his opinion defendant was drunk.[37] On a prosecution for a second offense, evidence that defendant had formerly pleaded guilty to similar charges is competent as admissions of fact tending to support the charge.[38]

2. Sufficiency. On a charge of being a common drunkard, proof of habitual intoxication is sufficient, without showing any disturbance of the public peace and good order.[39]

F. Instructions. An instruction that the presumption of innocence stands good against everything except what is specifically proved beyond a reasonable doubt sufficiently protects one accused of being a drunkard, as to his innocence on the days during a certain period in question in which he is not proved to have been intoxicated.[40]

G. Questions For Jury. Whether the charge has been sustained by the evidence is a question for the jury.[41]

32. Tipton v. State, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 542.

33. Com. v. Miller, 8 Gray (Mass.) 484.

Statute abolishing the necessity of alleging former conviction.— A statute which provides that it shall not be necessary, in complaints under it for drunkenness, to allege two previous convictions of a like offense within the next preceding twelve months, upon which the extent of the punishment depends, is repugnant to that article of the declaration of rights which provides that no subject shall be held to answer for any crime until fully and plainly described to him; for a statute which imposes a higher penalty on a third conviction makes the former convictions a part of the description and character of the offense intended to be punished. Com. v. Harrington, 130 Mass. 35.

34. Evidence generally see Criminal Law; Evidence.

35. Thus where defendant was charged with being on a specified day a common drunkard, "having been at divers days and times since," etc., "drunk," etc., the evidence must be confined to the acts of defendant on the day specified, for he was not charged with being a common drunkard on the "divers days and times since," etc. Com. v. Foley, 99 Mass. 499.

Whether a man is a habitual drunkard being in issue, evidence that the alleged drunkard used liquor to excess at some particular times; that he has been seen the worse for liquor some number of times; and that the alleged drunkard was a dissipated man, has a legal tendency to show that the alleged person was a habitual drunkard. State v. Pratt, 34 Vt. 323.

36. State v. Huxford, 47 Iowa 16.

37. He is not confined to a statement of the conduct and demeanor of the party inquired about. State v. Huxford, 47 Iowa 16 [citing People v. Eastwood, 14 N. Y. 562].

39. Com. v. Conley, 1 Allen (Mass.) 6. But evidence of habitual intoxication from the use of chloroform will not sustain a complaint under Mass. Rev. St. c. 143, § 5, charging a person with being "a common drunkard." Com. v. Whitney, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 477.

On trial for drunkenness by the voluntary use of liquor, where two previous convictions are alleged, evidence that defendant was found in the street behaving in a drunken manner, and that his breath smelt of liquor, and evidence that he was twice convicted before under pleas of guilty, is sufficient to warrant a finding that defendant's drunkenness was caused by the voluntary use of liquor. Com. v. Hughes, 133 Mass. 496.

Proof of intoxication five to seven times within a period of between three and four months is insufficient to support a conviction as a mere drunkard, without evidence of his condition at other times. Com. v. McNamee, 112 Mass. 285.

40. Thus where the evidence showed that defendant had been drunk from five to seven times on as many different days within a period of three to four months, it is not error to refuse to instruct that he was presumed to have been sober on those days on which he was not proven to have been drunk. Com. v. McNamee, 112 Mass. 285.

41. See State v. Pratt, 34 Vt. 323. Where the jury are furnished with the evidence of the attendant circumstances, such as defendant's character, conduct, and behavior, it is

H. Punishment. The punishment for this offense is regulated by statute and, the offense being a misdemeanor, the offender is usually punished by fine or imprisonment or both.[42] The power of the court to modify a sentence in furtherance of justice may be exercised in cases of conviction for drunkenness.[43]

I. Compelling Defendant to Disclose. In some jurisdictions the statutes provide that a person arrested for drunkenness may be compelled to disclose whence and from whom he obtained the liquor which intoxicated him.[44]

III. GUARDIANSHIP[45] AND STATUS OF HABITUAL DRUNKARDS.[46]

A. Proceedings to Determine Status and to Obtain Guardianship — 1. PETITION FOR COMMISSION. A petition[47] for a commission or for a writ de inebrietate inquirendo must be supported by affidavits of the truth of its averments.[48]

2. THE COMMISSION — a. Requisites. The commission should specify a time within which the commissioners are required to make return.[49]

b. Execution of by Inquisition — (i) NOTICE TO AND PRESENCE OF ALLEGED DRUNKARD. It is the privilege of the party against whom a commission de inebrietate inquirendo is issued to be present at[50] and to have notice of its execution.[51] Notice must be given as required by statute.[52]

State v. Brown, 38 Kan. 390, 16 Pac. 259.

Warrant of commitment for the statutory offense of intoxication is not insufficient because the word "drunkenness" is used instead of "intoxication." Smith v. Bigelow, 19 Iowa 459. A mittimus which recites merely that respondent had been "duly convicted of the crime of a second offense of intoxication" is defective in that it fails to state an essential element of the offense, viz., that defendant was "found intoxicated." But the prisoner has no right to be released because of a defect in the mittimus. (II) FUNCTIONS OF COMMISSIONERS. As incident to their duties the commissioners under the chancery practice have full power to issue subpœnas for witnesses and to compel their attendance.[53] In relation to every legal question arising in the execution of the commission, the majority of the commissioners must decide.[54] After the testimony is closed, the commissioners should submit the question to the jury in the form of a charge, stating the law applicable to the case.[55]

(III) THE JURY. Misconduct in the selection[56] of the jurors or in respect to their deliberations[57] will vitiate the proceedings.

(IV) EVIDENCE.[58] When habitual drunkenness is shown, evidence that respondent is still able to take care of himself and manage his estate is inadmissible.[59] If a fixed habit of drunkenness is proved upon an inquisition, it is sufficient without showing that the respondent was always drunk.[60]

(V) THE FINDING. If the finding establishes the habitual drunkenness, it will be sufficient, although no reference to the respondent's incapacity is made.[61]

(VI) COSTS.[62] The court is not authorized to allow the solicitor of the petitioner anything beyond the ordinary taxable costs and disbursements.[63] The

56. Thus the proceedings will be set aside if the commissioners dictate to the sheriff what jurors to summon. Matter of Wager, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 11.

57. The deliberations of the jury must be secret. If the sheriff or other officer who summons the jury goes into the jury-room during their deliberations or converses with the jury in relation to the matter under consideration the verdict will be set aside. Matter of Arnhout, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 498. But in Pennsylvania it has been held that the mere fact that the commissioner at the request of the jury went into the room into which they had retired to deliberate to further instruct them upon certain points and retired immediately after having done so was not ground for setting aside the finding of the inquest. In re Burr, 3 Lack. Leg. N. 162.

The fact that jurors took notes of the testimony, no objection having been made by counsel for respondent, and the fact that the jurors, while deliberating upon their verdict, remarked upon the consequences to the respondent and his family, in case of a finding favorable to him, are not grounds for setting aside the inquest. In re Burr, 3 Lack. Leg. N. (Pa.) 162.

Priorities in payment.— The real estate of a habitual drunkard was sold by order of the court, he having no personal estate with which to pay the costs of the inquisition that found him such drunkard. B. Legal Consequences of Status Adjudicated — 1. Control and Custody of Drunkard's Person and Property. Although a traverse be put in, the adjudication that the respondent is a habitual drunkard and an incompetent places the custody of his person and estate in the hands of the court.[65] The committee or guardian appointed by the court is entitled to the actual control and custody of the drunkard, subject to the direction of the court, and the court will sustain the committee in the proper exercise of his authority.[66] The property of the drunkard, upon inquisition found, being in custodia legis, the court will see that the drunkard's family will be provided for as he himself were he sane would provide for them;[67] but the real estate the court cannot order to be sold except where a sale is necessary.[68]

2. Contractual Disability of Drunkard[69] — a. Obligations Subsequently Incurred — (i) In General. One found by inquisition to be a habitual drunkard is thereby rendered incompetent subsequently to enter into a contract;[70] and a contract so entered into by him is void, even though at the time of the attempt to form the contract the drunkard was sober.[71]

(ii) With Persons Without Actual Notice. The rule just stated applies even against persons who have not actual notice of the adjudication.[72]

Laches.— A person under guardianship for habitual drunkenness is not a person who is of such incompetency as will exonerate him from the consequences of his own laches. Therefore a delay of twenty years on the part of a person who is a habitual drunkard and spendthrift and whose mind is alleged to be weak will defeat a suit instituted by him to set aside conveyances of his property to one who had conveyed to a third person who has made valuable improvements thereon in the belief that his title was good. St. 243; Cockrill v. Cockrill, 92 Fed. 811, 34 C. C. A. 254 [affirming 79 Fed. 143]. It is not necessary that the statute which provides for the inquisition and for the guardianship of the drunkard should in express terms declare his subsequent contracts void. The judicial finding is conclusive evidence that such contracts are void. Devin v. Scott, 34 Ind. 67 [following Wadsworth v. Sherman, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 169]. See also Contracts, 9 Cyc. 461.

And this, even though a statute provides that a contract made by one who has been adjudged a drunkard upon an inquisition is invalid, "for such construction [of a statute] might expose the party to actual suffering . . . or oblige the town to maintain him and his family as paupers for a time, when he had ample means for their support; and thus produce the very mischief it was intended to prevent." McCrillis v. Bartlett, 8 N. H. 569, 571.

Attorney's services.— A contract made by the agent of a man whose intellect had become debilitated through the use of intoxicating liquors for the services of an attorney to procure the appointment of a guardian for the drunkard and for his estate may be upheld where the statute provides for the appointment of a guardian for such persons. Darby v. Cabanne, 1 Mo. App. 126.

Necessity of pleading necessaries.— Since the general rule is that contracts made by a person who has been found incapable of conducting his affairs on account of drunkenness and placed under guardianship are void, it is the duty of the party who relies upon this exception to the rule as to necessaries to allege and prove that it came within the exception. 75. L'Amoureux v. Crosby, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 422, 22 Am. Dec. 655. It was held that the preponderance of the evidence was in the creditor's favor and overcame the presumption arising from the finding that the debtor was a habitual drunkard. Y.) 398.

Where the guardian asks for more than five per cent commissions, the burden is generally on him to show that his services are worth more. "But it would be a harsh rule which would limit the compensation of the committee of the person and estate of an habitual drunkard to five per cent." Thus, where the estate of a habitual drunkard is small and the committee is compelled to repair the buildings which are old, to collect monthly the rent, which averages about five hundred and eighty dollars a year, a compensation of forty-five dollars a year is just. In re Keiper, 7 Kulp (Pa.) 60.

An exception to the rule of proper practice of proceeding by petition may exist where it is shown that a trial is necessary in order to settle some disputed question or right which cannot be properly determined and adjusted on a reference to ascertain the amount due in a proceeding by petition. In such a case an order should be obtained authorizing the bringing of an action in the nature of a suit in equity before such action should be permitted against either the committee or the habitual drunkard. Where the demand is already in judgment, no action is necessary to determine the amount due. Hall v. Taylor, 8 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 428.

The former rule in New York was that the drunkard could be sued at law notwithstanding the appointment of a committee, but when the creditor had obtained his judgment he was compelled to stop and could proceed no further with it. Clarke v. Dunham, 4 Den. 262; Robertson v. Lain, 19 Wend. 649. See also Sternbergh v. Schoolcraft, 2 Barb. 153.

After an action for separation had been begun against a person by his wife, the former was adjudged a habitual drunkard upon proceedings begun before the action for separation was brought, and a committee of the adjudged drunkard's estate was appointed with authority given him, by order of the court, to assist in the defense of the action for separation. On a suit to restrain the action for separation the court refused to do so. "So far as such separation may be followed by a provision for alimony, such provision is entirely within the power of the court. And the court is fully competent in this action to protect the estate of the lunatic, now within its control. We do not see why the court cannot act as wisely in regard to alimony in this action as it could in an application by way of motion to direct the committee. And since the plaintiff is plainly entitled to proceed in this action, so far as the principal matter, that of separation, is concerned, it is highly proper that the subject of alimony be also disposed of in the same action." Gregg v. Gregg, 48 Hun (N. Y.) 451, 452, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 453.

Enforcement of payment after decree.— Where the court has decreed payment, by the committee of a drunkard, of a debt due from a drunkard, payment should be enforced by summary process. 3. Requisites of Complaint.[92] A complaint against the committee which omits to allege or show by what court or authority the debtor was declared a habitual drunkard and the custody of his person awarded to defendant does not state a cause of action,[93] and is therefore bad on demurrer.

E. Proceedings For Release From Guardianship[94] — 1. In General. According to the old chancery practice in this country[95] the allowing of a traverse to an inquisition found rests in the discretion of the court.[96] The practice in proceedings to supersede a commission in cases of habitual drunkenness should be substantially the same as in cases of lunacy.[97]

2. Notice. Want of notice[98] upon such a proceeding cannot be taken advantage of in a collateral proceeding.[99]

3. Proof.[1] The fact of the finding of the inquisition is prima facie and on

The drunkard should be made a party to a suit for partition brought by his committee; for a decree in such a suit will not transfer the legal title to the drunkard's undivided share of the premises which may be set off to defendants in severalty unless he is made a party. Gorham v. Gorham, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 24.

91. Thus where a statute gives guardians of habitual drunkards all the powers and duties of a guardian of a minor, and makes it the duty of a guardian of a minor to defend all suits against his ward, and provides that if he does so a guardian ad litem need not be appointed, it was held that in ejectment by the guardian of a drunkard that a guardian ad litem need not be appointed to defend against a cross complaint seeking to quiet cross complainant's title. Makepeace v. Bronnenberg, 146 Ind. 243, 45 N. E. 336.

Where, pending a suit by a creditor to reach the assets of his debtor, the latter is, by proceedings previously commenced in another court, adjudged to be a habitual drunkard and a committee is appointed, the court in which the creditor's action is pending cannot properly proceed to final judgment. While plaintiff in such case, if he commenced his action in good faith, may be permitted to retain it, yet his proceedings therein should be stayed until the reformation of defendant and the discharge of the committee, if such event should occur. And a receiver appointed in such creditor's suit should be discharged on paying the moneys in his hands into court. Niblo v. Harrison, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 668.

96. In all cases of doubt, where a jury trial would be proper, it is a discreet exercise of the power of the court to direct an issue instead of having a formal traverse. Matter of Tracy, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 580. Where the decision of the court declaring a person a habitual drunkard was acquiesced in, without appeal, on application by the committee of the drunkard for the custody of his person, defendant, who had harbored the drunkard against the wishes of the committee, thereby interfering with his control of the drunkard, was not allowed to traverse the finding of the jury, which was the basis of the vice-chancellor's decision. the trial of a traverse throws the burden of disproof on respondent.[2] After a respondent has given evidence in answer to the inquisition, the relator may give evidence in rebuttal to establish the finding.[3] The court will not discharge the committee and restore the possession and control of the property to the drunkard upon mere proof of the fact that he is competent to manage his affairs, without evidence of a permanent reformation.[4]

IV. Intoxication as a Defense to Contracts.[7]

A. In General. Intoxication which is so deep and excessive as to deprive one of his understanding is a good defense to an alleged contract made while defendant was in that condition.[8]

B. Degree of Intoxication Necessary. If, however, intoxication alone is relied on as a defense, it must be to such a degree that the party who wishes to avoid his contract on this ground must have been deprived of his reason and Suspension of guardianship.—In the case of In re Roberts, 197 Pa. St. 621, 47 Atl. 987, upon proceedings and proofs, under the act of June 13, 1836, as amended by the act of June 15, 1897, a commission, inquisition, and appointment of committee were suspended until further order, the time being too short to grant a complete restoration of capacity. It was held that this decree did not prevent a reinstatement of the proceedings.

understanding.[9] Whether this degree of intoxication existed is always a question for the jury.[10]

C. Contract Rendered Void or Voidable in Law. As to whether a contract entered into by a person so intoxicated as to be incapable of understanding its nature is void or voidable, the authorities differ. The modern trend seems in many instances to be toward regarding it as only voidable.[11] Under this theory the party setting up this defense should show that he has in some way rescinded the contract or, where the status of the parties has changed so that the other party is prejudiced, that he has attempted to restore the status in quo.[12] A number of the earlier common-law authorities in this country and in England take the more logical ground that such contracts are void absolutely.[13]

Rule in the civil law.— The above cases take the ground of the civil law on this question, namely, that if a man is so intoxicated that he is incapable of understanding what he is doing, he cannot give his assent to the contract, and therefore no contract can exist. Pothier Traité des Obligations, p. 1, c. 1, art. 4, says: "Il est evident que l'ivresse, lorsqu'elle va jusqu'au point de faire perdre l'usage de la raison, rend la personne qui est en cet etat, pendant qu'il dure, incapable de contracter, puisque elle rend incapable de consentement." (It is clear that intoxication, when it reaches the point of causing the loss of reason, makes the person who is in that condition, while it lasts, incapable of contracting, since it renders him incapable of assent.)

The Scotch law follows the civil law in this. Thus Erskine, in his Institutes (p. 822), says: "An obligation granted by a person in a state of absolute and total drunkenness is ineffectual because the grantor is incapable of consent."

14. Intoxication as a defense at law see supra, IV, C.

A court of law can interfere, only by avoiding the contract. It cannot, like a court of equity, accommodate itself to the particular case and oblige him who seeks relief to do equity. Burroughs v. Richman, 13 N. J. L. 233, 23 Am. Dec. 717.

L. 652, it was held that a publican could not recover for beer furnished to third persons by the order of an individual who has previously become intoxicated by drinking in his house, because the publican in such a case would be taking advantage of an offense which he himself had been instrumental in producing. Nevills v. Nevills, 6 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 121.

Surprise and mistake.— Plaintiff and defendant, occupying adjoining farms, met at night at a public house, where plaintiff drew up an agreement between defendant and himself for the sale and purchase of forty-five acres of land for £2000. The agreement was executed by both parties and attested by two witnesses, and a check for £200 deposit was drawn by plaintiff on a plain piece of paper. This was the next day exchanged for one drawn on the banker's ordinary form. No abstract was asked for for nearly four months, and three months after that defendant asked for a copy of the contract, and he then objected that he had only thirty-five acres to sell, and was so drunk when he entered into the agreement that he did not know what he was doing. He offered to sell for the £2000, or give up the agreement and return the deposit. This was refused and an abatement claimed in respect of the ten acres short, and a bill filed for specific performance. It was held that on the evidence defendant was incapable of contracting at the time, and the circumstances were such as to bring the case the contract. But where there has been no fraud practised equity will not set aside a contract on the ground of the intoxication of defendant.[18]

E. Against Innocent Third Persons. It has been held that a party to a contract cannot set up the defense of intoxication so as to prejudice an innocent third person.[19]

F. Evidence.[20] Evidence of incapacity by reason of intoxication is admissible under the general issue.[21] Where the person who sets up intoxication as a defense to his contract is able to remember the morning after the contract was made what he had done,[22] or where he was able to testify as to the circumstances attending the transaction,[23] a case of sufficient intoxication is not made out.

Parol trust raised to defeat a conveyance.— A, who was addicted to drinking, gave to B a mortgage to secure a small debt, the property being worth at least seven times the debt, and the rent of half the property for three years being sufficient to pay off the claim. Five years before the debt was payable, A, without any additional consideration, released his equity of redemption to B, and B was allowed to remain in possession for seven or eight years after the mortgage debt was paid off by rents. It was held that the facts and evidence showed that the release was given on a parol trust for the benefit of the mortgagor and his family, and that to set up the release as an absolute purchase was fraud on B, against which the court should relieve, notwithstanding the lapse of time and death of some of the witnesses. Crippen v. Ogilvie, 18 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 253.

Specific performance refused.— A contract procured by plaintiff and prepared and written by him, the other party to the contract being an illiterate man, and at the time of the execution of the agreement considerably in liquor, and being without professional advice and without any knowledge of its nature and consequences, which were highly favorable to plaintiff, and the agreement being somewhat vague and obscure, will not be enforced specifically in a court of equity. Plaintiff will be left to his remedy (if any) at law for damages for non-performance. Vivers v. Tuck, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 794, 1 Moore P. C. N. S. 516, 15 Eng. Reprint 794. But where, after a contract fairly entered into with a man addicted to drinking to sell to plaintiff leasehold premises for £735, another person with notice of this contract, within a few days prevailed on the vendor to sell and execute an assignment thereof to him for £760, the court decreed specific performance of the first contract on the ground that it could not assist in getting rid of the first agreement on the mere ground of intoxication, no fraud being alleged. Shaw v. Thackray, 17 Jur. 1045, 1 Smale & G. 537. See also, generally, SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Sufficient relief at law.— In Lacy v. Garrard, 2 Ohio 7, the court said that, although a bond was executed by one who was intoxicated, and the intoxication was procured by the obligee, the bond might be avoided at law, and therefore there was no reason for coming into a court of equity.

Equity doctrine followed by law courts.— Where it appeared that a note was made under suspicious circumstances, by a person of weak intellect and a habitual drunkard, it was held that the circumstances of the case wore a strong badge of fraud; that it was incumbent upon the payee to make out a fair case and good consideration, it having been previously shown that the note was given on settlement of accounts and the presumption created either that nothing was due or a less sum than the note called for. Hale v. Brown, 11 Ala. 87. See also Holland v. Barnes, 53 Ala. 83, 25 Am. Rep. 595.

I. DUELING PROPER.

A. Definition. Dueling is the act of fighting with deadly weapons[1] between two persons[2] in pursuance of a previous agreement.[3]

B. Nature and Elements of Offense — 1. At Common Law. Dueling as a specific offense was unknown in the common law;[4] but was treated, when not resulting in homicide[5] or a maiming,[6] as a breach of the peace[7] or as an assault and battery.[8] Considered as either one of these offenses, it of course constituted a misdemeanor.[9]

2. By Statute.[10] Where a statute provides that a person who shall fight a duel and kill his antagonist shall be subject to a penalty, the offense consists in fighting the duel with the result stated in the statute.[11]

3. Necessary Elements — a. The Agreement. It is necessary to establish only the fact of an agreement in pursuance of which a fight with deadly weapons took place to constitute the crime.[12]

1. As to the weapons see infra, I, B, 3, b.

2. Under Cal. Pen. Code, § 225, the definition of "duel" does not confine the combat to one between two persons only.

3. State v. Herriott, 1 McMull. (S. C.) 126; Anderson L. Dict. See also Abbott L. Dict.; Bouvier L. Dict.

"What we now call a duel, is, a fighting between two, upon some quarrel precedent." Jacob L. Dict.

The origin of the practice of dueling is said to be the ancient battel, or judicial combat of feudal times. Century Dict.; 7 Encycl. Britt. But the modern duel is distinguished from the battel in that the latter was a proceeding at law, sanctioned by the sovereign power. 2 Pollock & M. Hist. Eng. L. 600, 610; 1 Pollock & M. Hist. Eng. L. 146. See also speech of Sir Francis Bacon, attorney-general, in The Case of Duels, 2 How. St. Tr. 1033, 1039. And see 3 Coke Inst. 159.

Assault and battery see 3 Cyc. 1014.

9. Rex v. Darcy, 1 Keb. 694, Sid. 186; 3 Coke Inst. 158; 2 Comyns Dig. 270.

Distinguished from affray.— It has also been treated by the text-book writers as an aggravation of an affray. 4 Blackstone Comm. 145; 1 Hawkins P. C. c. 63, § 1; 4 Stephen Comm. (12th ed.) 181. But dueling is distinguished from affray in that it may and usually does lack the essential element of a public place and in that deadly weapons are not a necessary element of affray. See AFFRAY, 4 Cyc. 43.

It might be prosecuted as an attempt at murder. See 2 How. St. Tr. 1033, 1041.

10. See 1 Archbold 60, 835 (Pomeroy's notes) for results of legislation in the different states. See also 2 Bishop New Cr. L. § 316.

Dueling has never been the subject of special legislation in England. Hence a duel which did not result in death or maiming remained in all cases a misdemeanor until 43 Geo. III, c. 58, which imposed a special penalty for one who shot at another with a pistol. 3 Stephen Cr. L. 100.

11. The offense specified in such statute was not designed to fall within the definition of murder given in the statutes, but has its own separate definition given, in the specific act, as a separate and distinct offense. People v. Bartlett, 14 Cal. 651.

12. It is immaterial at what time prior to the encounter the agreement was made. State

b. The Weapons. The weapons used must be of a kind which is hazardous to life.[13]

4. Seconds, Aiders, and Abetters. At common law the seconds were equally guilty with the principals.[14] Where a statute imposes a penalty for any one who shall consent to be a second in a duel, if the consent is given within the state the offense is complete irrespective of where the duel was fought.[15] Mere presence at a duel will not be sufficient to make one guilty of a crime, but if one is present, encouraging the principals by advice or assistance, he is equally guilty with the principals.[16]

C. Indictment or Information[17] — 1. In General.[18] At common law an indictment which charges that defendant did fight a duel with pistols is insufficient.[19] The date of the offense should be correctly alleged.[20]

2. For Aiding and Abetting.[21] An indictment for aiding and abetting in fighting a duel which does not state with clearness and certainty that a duel was fought is bad on general demurrer.[22]

D. Trial — 1. Privilege of Witness. Where by statute the statement of a witness who was concerned in a duel otherwise than as principal cannot be used against him, he can nevertheless at the trial of the principal refuse to testify on the ground that his answer might incriminate him.[23]

2. Question For Jury. Whether under all the circumstances of the case a fight with pistols was actually a duel is a question for the jury.[24]

E. Punishment. At common law the punishment was by fine and imprisonment.[25]

In Rex v. Taverner, 3 Bulstr. 171, where defendant was convicted, after returning from being outlawed for murder resulting from a duel, it is said that the second, one Thomas Musgrove, stood outlawed. All these authorities hold the seconds equally guilty with the principals, who were charged with murder. It would seem equally good law that they should be held equally guilty with the principals when the latter are charged with a breach of the peace or an assault and battery. See Assault and Battery, 3 Cyc. 1033. In Case of Duels, 2 How. St. Tr. 1033, 1041, Sir Francis Bacon, attorney-general, said, in the star chamber, that he would prosecute any one who, in the future, should "accept to be a second in a challenge of either side." They were certainly equal in guilt to the principals when the duel amounted to an affray. See Affray, 2 Cyc. 44.

And even if he goes to the ground for the purpose of encouraging and forwarding the unlawful conflict, although he neither does nor says anything, yet if he is present assisting and encouraging the principals by his presence, he is guilty of a crime. II. CHALLENGE TO FIGHT.[26]

A. Nature and Elements of Offense — 1. In General. Duels are usually preceded by a formal challenge which with the acceptance thereof constitutes the necessary precedent agreement. The challenge is simply the invitation to fight. This was an offense at common law of the same denomination as actually engaging in the duel,[27] for it tended to provoke a breach of the peace.[28] It could be prosecuted equally as well upon the theory of an attempt to commit a felony.[29] But to constitute an offense the words used must be intended as a demand or request to fight,[30] and the request must be to fight with deadly weapons[31] and communicated or delivered to another.[32]

2. Form of Challenge. The form of the challenge is immaterial. At common law[33] or under a statute forbidding without qualification the sending of one,[34] it may be verbal or written or by message,[35] or it may consist not only of words or writings but of acts,[36] the various acts together forming the offense.

3. Place of Duel. The place where the duel is to be fought is immaterial,[37] for the offense consists in the invitation to fight and is complete upon the delivery of the challenge.

B. Indictment or Information[38] — 1. Circumstances Governing Relief by Information. Upon producing verified copies of the letters in which the challenge was contained, a rule to show cause why an information shall not be granted will Accepting challenge.—In The Case of Duels, 2 How. St. Tr. 1033, Bacon said that he would prosecute any man who in the future should accept a challenge to fight. By his course of reasoning an acceptance should be a misdemeanor just as challenging was.

27. Norton's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. (N. Y.) 90; Rex v. Rice, 3 East 581; 3 Coke Inst. 158; 1 Hawkins P. C. c. 63, § 3; Stephen Dig. Cr. L. 40. See Brown v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 516. And compare Smith v. State, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 506, which recognized challenging as an offense at common law, but held that as the statute of 1807 against challenging was repealed by the statute of 1819, because under the earlier statute a greater penalty was attached to challenging than was attached to dueling under the later. This conclusion is contrary to the usual rule of interpretation see Bishop St. Cr. § 155. In Norton's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. (N. Y.) 90, the court said in its charge that the New York statute against dueling did not take away the common-law remedy.

be made.[39] But the court will not grant a criminal information to a prosecutor who has himself sent a challenge in connection with the same affair, but will leave him to the ordinary remedy by indictment.[40]

2. Charging Offense — a. In General. The offense may be described in any or all of the ways in which it may have been committed.[41] It is sufficient, however, at common law to charge the offense generally.[42] Where a statute makes a challenge to fight an offense, it is not necessary to follow the words of the statute;[43] but it is absolutely necessary that the offense as defined by the statute should be charged.[44]

b. Particular Averments — (i) Intent. Intent on the part of defendant to send a challenge or to accept one, as the case may be, need not be specifically alleged where such intent appears on the face of the indictment;[45] otherwise a particular averment of the intent is necessary.[46]

(ii) Citizenship. Citizenship of defendant or of the other parties concerned in the duel need not be alleged.[47]

(iii) Place of Intended Duel. Where it is an offense by statute to give a challenge to fight a duel within or without the state, it is not necessary to aver where the duel is to be fought.[48]

C. Defenses. Provocation is no excuse for the offense.[49]

D. Evidence.[50] The note which is alleged to be a challenge is admissible in evidence, together with all testimony of the circumstances of the case, and the conduct and declarations of defendant relating thereto.[51] Likewise the oral

40. As where upon affidavits it appeared that the party applying for an information had himself given the first challenge. Rex v. Hankey, 1 Burr. 316, where the court said that "it would have been right . . . to have granted cross-informations, in case each party had applied for an information against the other."

Where a prosecutor sent a challenge to a third person connected in the transaction with the party against whom he moved, the information was not granted, even though the prosecutor's challenge was sent into another country without any intention of breaking the peace in England. Rex v. Larrieu, 7 A. & E. 277, 34 E. C. L. 161.

41. For since the challenge may be given by word, or by a verbal message communicated by a friend of the challenger, or it may be in writing delivered by the party himself, or sent to a third person, or it may be given in any other manner by which it may be understood that one challenges or provokes another to a deadly contest; and as it may be uncertain what the manner of challenging was, it may be described in each of these ways in separate counts, so as to meet the evidence at the trial in any aspect in which it may appear. See Charge of Thacher, J., in Com. v. Hooper, Thach. Cr. Cas. (Mass.) 400, 405.

42. Hence an indictment for sending a challenge in the form of a letter to fight a duel need not set out the words of the letter or the substance thereof. State v. Farrier, 8 N. C. 487; Brown v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 516.

50. As to what the state should prove on a trial for challenging another see 1 Archbold 835 (Pomeroy's notes). In Aulger v. People, 34 Ill. 486, it was said, obiter dictum, that it was necessary to prove that defendant "sent" the challenge, and to prove this the bearer of the challenge should have been called to show by what authority he bore it.

declarations[52] and the letters[53] of the seconds when acting as such are admissible. But a witness' statements as to what were the rules of the code duello in relation to sending and accepting challenges are inadmissible.[54]

E. Variance. A slight variance, resulting in no change of meaning, between the copy of the challenge set out in the indictment and the original challenge offered in evidence is not a material one.[55]

F. Question For Jury. Whether the alleged challenge under all the circumstances of the case was intended as or amounted to a challenge is always a question for the jury.[56]

G. Punishment. Challenging to fight was punished at common law by fine and imprisonment, and the offender was usually bound over to keep the peace.[57] But the punishment was within the discretion of the court; and in exercising its discretion the court was guided by such circumstances of aggravation or mitigation as were to be found in the case.[58]

III. CARRYING CHALLENGE.

A. Nature of Offense. One who knowingly[59] carries a challenge is guilty of a misdemeanor at common law.[60]

52. State v. Taylor, 3 Brev. (S. C.) 243 [followed in State v. Dupont, 2 McCord (S. C.) 334].

53. Moody v. Com., 4 Metc. (Ky.) 1.

Sufficient foundation for the admission of the copies of such letters was laid when it was shown that the originals when last seen were in the possession of an officer of the United States army, who was absent in the performance of his duties. Moody v. Com., 4 Metc. (Ky.) 1.

54. Moody v. Com., 4 Metc. (Ky.) 1, where the court said in this case that it had no judicial knowledge of any such code. Whether or not the code itself if properly proved would have been admissible the court did not decide; but if admissible the code itself should have been produced instead of the witness' testifying as to its contents.

55. Thus the misspelling of certain words in the indictment which constituted a variance from the words as spelled in the challenge, as "differences" for "difference," "immgined" for "imagined," "clumny" for "calumny" and "there" for "their," was held an immaterial variance. State v. Farrier, 8 N. C. 487.

56. Com. v. Hart, 6 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 119; Com. v. Hooper, Thach. Cr. Cas. (Mass.) 400; Norton's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. (N. Y.) 90. See Com. v. Pope, 3 Dana (Ky.) 418. Whether a challenge to fight in single combat with deadly weapons was intended, or whether it was the mere effusion of passion or folly, or the idle boast of a braggart, not intended at the time to lead to any result, or to be understood by the other party to be a challenge to fight a duel, are questions which the jury must determine. Ivey v. State, 12 Ala. 276; State v. Strickland, 2 Nott & M. (S. C.) 181. See also Com. v. Tibbs, 1 Dana (Ky.) 524.

Nolle prosequi.— When by statute complainant in assault and battery or other misdemeanors to injury and damage of party complaining can appear before the court and acknowlege satisfaction for an injury, and the court in such case may in its discretion order a nolle prosequi, a challenge is not a misdemeanor of kind in statute, and the court will not order a nolle prosequi. In re Wood, 3 City Hall Rec. (N. Y.) 139.

What not included in sentence.— The provisions of the act that prohibits an offender from holding an office of honor, profit, or trust, or in exercising any trade, profession, or calling, does not constitute a part of the sentence to be passed on one convicted; and whether constitutional or not can only be determined by a person so convicted attempting to hold any such office, etc. State v. Dupont, 2 McCord (S. C.) 334.

B. Indictment or Information.[61] Where a statute provides that "if any person resident in or being a citizen of this state, shall send, give or accept a challenge, or bear such a challenge as a second" he shall be guilty of a crime, it is unnecessary to allege in the indictment for carrying a challenge that the challenger was at the time of the alleged challenge "a resident in or a citizen of this state."[62]

C. Evidence. Evidence of a custom for a second to deliver a challenge,[63] or evidence tending to show that defendant had acted as a friend to the principal in a previous difficulty,[64] is inadmissible; but declarations of the principal which tend to establish the guilt of the second are admissible, although such declarations were made in the absence of the second.[65] And it must appear from the evidence that the court had jurisdiction of the offense charged.[66]

D. Questions For Jury. Whether a note which defendant is charged with carrying is a challenge to fight a duel[67] and whether he knew it to be a challenge[68] are questions for the jury.

E. Punishment. The punishment at common law was by fine or imprisonment.[69]

IV. PROVOKING A CHALLENGE.

To provoke another to commit the misdemeanor of challenging to a duel is itself a misdemeanor,[70] particularly where the provocation was given by a writing containing libelous matter.[71] ther provided that "all and every other person or persons directly or indirectly concerned in fighting a duel, sending, giving, accepting, or carrying any challenge" shall likewise be subject to a penalty, the bearing of a challenge within the state is an offense, no matter by whom the challenge was sent. State v. Yancey, 2 Speers (S. C.) 246.

As to the form of the challenge the rule heretofore stated (see supra, II, A, 2) should apply. It is as much an offense to carry a verbal as a written one. See Case of Duels, 2 How. St. Tr. 1033, 1041.

Rex v. Williams, 2 Campb. 506.

Averring intent.— An allegation in the prefatory part of the indictment that the provoking letter was sent with intent to do the receiver bodily harm and to break the king's peace is a sufficient averment of the intent of the act. Rex v. Philipps, 6 East 464.

Hick's Case, Hob. 299.

Mere words of provocation, however, as "liar" and "knave" are not sufficient to constitute the offense, as not tending immediately to the breach of the peace. King's Case, 4 Coke Inst. 181. But if it can be shown that such words were intended to provoke a challenge, it would seem that a case

The indictment for the statutory offense of leaving the state for the purpose of eluding the provisions of the act against dueling must state the venue.[72]

VI. SUPPRESSION OR PREVENTION OF DUELS.

At common law it is the duty of a sheriff, justice of the peace, constable, or other peace officer, when he sees a duel in progress, to endeavor to part and apprehend the persons engaged.[73] And, where a judge has reason to suspect that a duel is about to take place, he can call upon any person for his affidavit on which to ground a warrant against those concerned.[74]

96. Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 10, 16 Pac. 345.

Compared with obligation.— "In reference to the payment of taxes the terms duty and obligation are used in two senses, the first being in reference to the sovereign imposing the tax, the second being in reference to individuals. The matter of duty to the sovereign is fixed by the legislative enactment imposing the tax. The matter of obligation to individuals arises from the legal or equitable relation of the parties. In neither case is the measure of the obligation fixed by the mere fact of an interest or estate in the land." Certain duty.— "A duty is certain, when, by law, it must be absolutely performed, and the occasion, mode and term of its exercise are fixed so that nothing remains subject to the discretion of the officer." Morton v. Comptroller Gen., 4 S. C. 430, 473.

"A duty imposed by law is specific when a case or state of circumstances exists proper for its discharge. A specific duty may arise in two ways. It may be imposed directly, as when a public officer is directed by statute to execute a particular conveyance to a person by name, or it may arise out of a general duty imposed by law, as where a case or state of circumstances has arisen such as was in the contemplation of the law imposing such general duty as the object and occasion of its exercise. In either case the duty becomes specific the moment a proper occasion arises for its exercise." Morton v. Comptroller Gen., 4 S. C. 430, 473. nate a tax or impost due to the government upon the importation or exportation of goods;[1] an indirect tax imposed on the importation, exportation or consumption of goods; having a broader meaning than custom, which is a duty imposed on imports or exports.[2] (See, generally, CUSTOMS DUTIES; INTERNAL REVENUE; TAXATION.)

DUTY ON TONNAGE. A charge upon a vessel, according to its tonnage, as an instrument of commerce, for entering or leaving a port, or navigating the public waters of the country;[3] a tax graduated according to the capacity of the ship or vessel;[4] tonnage.[5]

DWELL.[6] To inhabit; to reside;[7] to remain; to be domiciled;[8] to live in a place; to have a habitation;[9] to have a fixed place of residence, &c.;[10] to abide as a permanent resident, or to inhabit for a time, to live in a place;[11] to have a habitation for some time or permanence.[12] (See DWELLING-HOUSE; and, generally, DOMICILE.)

DWELLING AND LANDS. One's home — the place where he lives — where he is settled.[13]

nification of trespass, tort or damage. In the statute, it is not contra-distinguished from debt, but merely presents the same idea by another term of equivalent meaning, that it may be the more intelligible. The word 'duty' obviously must be construed with some limitation; otherwise it will include the natural, moral and social obligations, for which no one will contend. So usual is it to understand it as commensurate with debt, that the pecuniary demands of government for the most part receive that appellation."

50. Thomson-Houston Electric Co. v. Western Electric Co., 65 Fed. 615, 616, where it is said: "It has a revolving part, called the 'armature,' usually driven from a steam engine. At one end of the armature there is a projecting part, called the 'commutator,' standing out something like the hub of a wagon wheel. Upon two opposite sides of this commutator are placed two copper strips, bars, or bundles of thin copper leaves, called 'commutator brushes,' which press upon the surface of the commutator during its revolution. A wire joined to one of these brushes leads away from the machine through the lamps or motors in which the current is used, and back to and through the other brushes. Thus the electric current which is generated in the armature by its revolutions passes out through one brush and back through the other."

"Each block," in an ordinance providing for assessments for paving a street between two blocks, means each block on the street between each block for the distance of a block; each block on two half blocks divided by the street the distance of a block. Blair v. Atchison, 40 Kan. 353, 355, 19 Pac. 815.

"Each case."— In a policy of marine insurance exempting the underwriters from liability "for any partial loss on other goods, or on the vessel or freight unless it amount to 5 per cent., exclusive, "in each case," of all charges and expenses incurred for the purpose of ascertaining and proving the loss" apply to goods, vessel and freight, and require 5 per cent damage to justify a claim in each case. Donnell v. Columbian Ins. Co., 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,987, 2 Sumn. 366, 375.

"Each offense" in a statute imposing a fine for each offense, means every violation of either of the prohibitions of the statute (Suydam v. Smith, 52 N. Y. 383, 389); but where but one penalty can be recovered under the act, relates to the description of the offense and not to repetitions of either of the offenses (Washburn v. McInroy, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 134).

"Each party" in a statute allowing "each party" a certain number of peremptory challenges, means either party to the action, whether plaintiff or defendant, regardless as to whether one, or more than one person is included as plaintiff or defendant. People v. O'Loughlin, 3 Utah 133, 142, 1 Pac. 653. "On the one hand, to include all persons named as plaintiffs, and on the other, all who are joined as defendants." EADEM MENS PRÆSUMITUR REGIS QUÆ EST JURIS ET QUÆ ESSE DEBET, PRÆSERTIM IN DUBIIS. A maxim meaning "The mind of the sovereign is stance, be more than one week asunder." State v. Stiles, 12 N. J. L. 296, 297.

"Each year" in a statute inhibiting the catching of trout "between the 1st day of October of each year and the 1st day of June of each year," shows a legislative intention that the close season shall run from October of one year to June of the succeeding year. Ex p. Hewlett, 22 Nev. 333, 335, 40 Pac. 96. In a statute requiring corporations to make report, each year means annually. Allen v. Clark, 21 N. Y. Suppl. 338, 340.

55. State v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 66 Me. 488, 510; Potter v. Berthelet, 20 Fed. 240, 242 [citing Webster Dict.], where the court, in construing a contract by which a lessee was given the right of purchasing certain machinery and apparatus said: "Then follow the words 'and each of them;' the word 'each,' as a distributive adjective pronoun, denoting every one of the several letters patent composing a whole, considered separately from the rest."

Distinguished from "all."— Where a statute provided that each of the justices of the supreme court and judges of the circuit should have the same power at chambers to issue writs of habeas corpus as when in open court, the court said: "The term 'each' is used in contradistinction to 'all' of the Justices, as implied, necessarily, in the term 'Court,' which is made up of 'all' of the Justices; the term 'chambers,' in contradistinction to 'open Court;' and the power of the several Justices, in granting interlocutory orders at chambers, is the same 'as' the 'Court,' when it is 'open,' in considering an application for an interlocutory writ or order of injunction." Salinas v. Aultman, 49 S. C. 378, 386, 27 S. E. 407 [quoted in Lamotte v. Smith, 50 S. C. 558, 561, 27 S. E. 933].

Applied to the taxation of express companies.— Where a city charter provided for the taxation and licensing of "each intelligence office, . . . express company," etc., the court said: "It is true that the word 'each' denotes every one of the two or more comprising the whole; but in this instance it must be regarded as indicating that the license fee for each of the companies intended to be included in the provision of the charter, and which were not exempted from city taxation by the then existing law, should be so much. It includes the whole of the class which were not then exempt from such taxation." Adams Express Co. v. Lexington, 83 Ky. 657, 660.

In a contract to furnish certain specified articles of different kinds at a designated price each, the term refers to all the articles named which precede it. Beck, etc., Lithographing Co. v. Evansville Brewing Co., 25 Ind. App. 662, 58 N. E. 859, 861. I. DEFINITION.[1]

An easement is a liberty, privilege, or advantage without profit which the owner of one parcel of land may have in the lands of another;[2] or to state it from the opposite point of view it is a service which one estate owes to another — or a right or privilege in one man's estate for the advantage or convenience of the owner of another estate.[3] Again an easement or a servitude has been defined as a right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit, or beneficial use, out of, in, or over the estate of another proprietor.[4] But this definition seems to be too broad as applied to pure easements from which a great majority of the cases exclude the suggestion of profit. Rights to profits à prendre are easements of a peculiar kind and are treated in another place.[5] An easement, although only an incorporeal right and appurtenant to another, the dominant, tenement, is yet properly denominated an interest in land which constitutes the servient tenement, and the expression, "estate or interest in lands," when used in a statute is broad enough to include such rights,[6] for an easement must be an interest in or over the soil.[7]

II. ESSENTIAL QUALITIES.

The essential qualities of easements are: (1) They are incorporeal; (2) they are imposed upon corporeal property and not upon the owner of it; (3) they confer no right to a participation in the profits arising from such property; (4) they are imposed for the benefit of corporeal property; (5) there must be two distinct tenements — the dominant, to which the right belongs, and the servient, upon which the obligation rests.[8] In order to constitute an easement there must be two estates, the one giving and the other receiving the advantage, denominated respectively the servient and the dominant estates.[9]

III. CLASSES OF EASEMENTS AND RIGHTS IN THE NATURE OF EASEMENTS.

A. Easements Appurtenant. Easements appurtenant inhere in the land, concern the premises, and are necessary to the enjoyment thereof.[10] Such easements are incapable of existence separate and apart from the particular messuage or land to which they are annexed, there being nothing for them to act upon.[11] They are in the nature of covenants running with the land, attach to the land, to which they are appurtenant, and pass by a deed of conveyance.[12]

B. Easements in Gross — 1. In General. It has been contended that there can be no such thing according to the common law or the civil law as an easement in gross.[13] But there is a class of rights which one may have in another's land without their being exercised in connection with the occupancy of other lands, and they are therefore called rights or easements in gross. In such cases the burden rests upon one piece of land in favor of a person or an individual; the principal distinction between an easement proper (the class of easements considered in the preceding section) and a right in gross is found in the fact that in the first there is and in the second there is not a dominant tenement.[14] Furthermore, unlike easements appurtenant, an easement in gross cannot ordinarily be assigned or transmitted by descent, nor can the owner of the right take another person into company with him.[15] Thus a right of way which has neither of its termini on the premises of the owner and is not appurtenant to any estate is called a right of way in gross. It is a mere personal right and is neither assignable nor inheritable, nor can it be made so by any terms in the grant.[16] But there are cases where it was the manifest intention of the parties to create an assignable Illustrations.— Where two persons held land in partnership under an agreement that mills thereon should be kept up during their joint lives and the life of the survivor at their joint expense, and on one of them dying the mill site was partitioned to the survivor and the rest of the tract to heirs of the deceased, it was held that any easement which the survivor might have under the agreement to overflow the lands of the heirs was personal and terminated at his death (McDaniel v. Walker, 46 S. C. 43, 24 S. E. 378); so a grant of a right to lay down an aqueduct upon the land of the grantor and draw water therefrom for the use of the grantee does not convey an assignable interest, unless words of inheritance are used or it can be inferred from the language of the whole deed that such was the intent of the parties (Wilder v. Wheeler, 60 N. H. 351); and the grant of a right to transport stone from a designated tract of land over a certain tract owned by the grantor cannot be used with the permission of the grantee by a third person for the purpose of carrying stone quarried in another tract of land (Hoosier Stone Co. v. Malott, 130 Ind. 21, 29 N. interest, and in such cases the courts have given effect to that intention. Thus a grant of the right to draw water from a spring or well for family use or any other purpose in terms to a person his heirs and assigns forever has been held to be an easement in gross which is assignable, inheritable, and devisable.[17]

Right to take seaweed.— The heirs of an owner of real estate which was bounded in part by a sea beach divided the estate by deed and assigned to some of them parcels of land bounded by the beach and to the others different parcels. The deeds assign-right or is to be construed to be appurtenant to some other estate must be determined by the fair interpretation of the grant or reservation creating the easement aided if necessary by the situation of the property and the surrounding circumstances; and here, in the case of a right of way, the terminus ad quem is of especial significance.[19]

C. Continuous and Discontinuous Easements. Continuous easements are those of which the enjoyment may be continued without the necessity of any actual interference by man. Discontinuous easements are those the enjoyment of which can be had only by the interference of man.[20]

D. Affirmative and Negative Easements. Easements are also classified as affirmative and negative. An easement is affirmative when the servient estate must permit something to be done thereon; it is negative when the owner of the servient estate is prohibited from doing something otherwise lawful on his estate because it will affect the dominant estate.[21]

E. Private and Public Easements. Easements may also be classified as private or public, accordingly as they are enjoyed by an individual or by the public.[22] The distinguishing feature here is that in case of private easements there must be two distinct tenements — one dominant and the other servient.[23] Public easements on the other hand are in gross,[24] and in this class of easements there is no dominant tenement.[25]

F. Profits à Prendre — 1. In General. The right to profits, denominated profits à prendre, consists of a right to take a part of the soil or produce of the land, in which there is a supposable value.[26] The right to enter upon the land of another for any of the following purposes has been held to be a profit à pren-

ing the latter parcels granted the privilege of getting seaweed from the beach below the lands granted by the deeds of the former parcels. It was held that this was a grant of incorporeal hereditament appurtenant to the land to which it was annexed and not a right in gross, and that it could not be severed and sold separate from that land, and that the sale of the right to a stranger would either be void or would extinguish the right. Presumption from absence of words of inheritance how overcome.— The fact that a right of way given by a deed was intended for the benefit of the grantee's land, and was to be used in connection with its occupancy, and has been so used, and is useless for any other purpose, will overcome any presumption that might otherwise arise from the absence of the words, "heirs and assigns," that it was intended to be in gross. Apparent or continuous easements are those depending upon some artificial structure upon, or natural formation of, the servient tenement, obvious and permanent, which constitutes the easement or is the means of enjoying it; as the bed of a running stream, an overhanging roof, a pipe for conveying water, a drain, or a sewer. Non-apparent or non-continuous easements are such that have no means specially constructed or appropriated to their enjoyment, and that are enjoyed at intervals, leaving between these intervals no visible sign of their existence; such as a right of way or the right of drawing a seine upon the shore. Fetters v. Humphreys, 18 N. J. Eq. 260.

dre; to cut grass,[27] to depasture the land,[28] to shoot over the land and take game or wild fowl,[29] to fish in an unnavigable stream,[30] to take away drifting sand from the beach,[31] or seaweed thrown upon the shore,[32] to take iron ore from the land,[33] to mine metals generally,[34] to search for and dig coal,[35] and to take timber from the land.[36] Running water, whether above or below the surface, is not a product of the soil. It does not remain for any appreciable period of time in any one place and has no appreciable value. Consequently the right to enter upon the land of another and take water for domestic purposes from any natural fountain is not a profit à prendre, but merely an easement.[37] On the other hand the right to water artificially produced as by means of cisterns or wells would seem to be an interest in the land or a right to a profit à prendre.[38]

2. NATURE OF RIGHT. A right of profit à prendre, if enjoyed in connection with a certain estate, although not a pure easement, for that is a right without profit, is frequently spoken of as an easement or at least a right in the nature of an easement, which is appurtenant to the estate in connection with which it is enjoyed, and passes with it as in the case of an easement proper.[39]

3. HOW CREATED. The right is incorporeal and incapable of creation except by grant or prescription.[40] In order to acquire the right by prescription, there must be a dominant estate to which it attaches. The inhabitants of a town cannot so acquire the right for themselves and their successors; and this for the further reason that there is no one to whom a grant can be presumed to have been made, for the unorganized public is incapable of taking by grant.[41] A custom to take a profit in the land of another has uniformly been held bad, for although custom

Eliz. 180, that the inhabitants cannot prescribe for a profit in the soil. This doctrine was affirmed four years later, and the satisfactory reason given that there could be no presumption of a grant for an inhabitant cannot purchase to himself and his successors. Fowler v. Dale, Cro. Eliz. 362. See also Whittier v. Stockman, 2 Bulstr. 86;

may support a claim for an easement, nothing less than prescription can sustain a claim for a profit à prendre. The owner of the fee can be divested of his right only by a grant from himself, or by such enjoyment in another as raises the presumption of a previous grant.[42]

4. Whether Assignable. Where this right is appurtenant to an estate it cannot be severed and assigned separately.[43] But if the right be granted to one in gross it is treated as an estate or interest in land which may be assignable or inheritable if granted in fee.[44]

IV. Distinction Between Easement and License.

An easement is a liberty, privilege, or advantage in land without profit existing distinct from the ownership of the land, and because it is a permanent interest in the land of another with the right to enter at all times and enjoy it, it must be founded upon a grant by writing or upon prescription which presupposes a grant; but a license is an authority to do a particular act or series of acts upon the land of another without possessing any estate therein. A license is founded in personal confidence and is not assignable and requires no writing, as it is not within the statute of frauds, and is revocable at will,[45] while the grant of an easement is within the statute of frauds and must be in writing.[46] The distinction between a license and an easement is often very subtle and difficult to discern, but it is mainly important where the right in question has been conferred by parol and the question is, whether the agreement creates a mere authority to do acts upon the land of another and hence may be given by parol, or creates a privilege in the land and hence is void, because not in writing.[47]

V. CREATION AND EXISTENCE.

A. By Prescription — 1. IMMEMORIAL USAGE. According to the principles of the common law a right to an incorporeal hereditament may be acquired by lapse of time. This mode of acquisition is denominated prescription and is founded on uninterrupted use and enjoyment time out of mind, or in the quaint langnage of the early writers, "for a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."[48] No presumption of a lost grant of a right of way or other easement would be tolerated at common law so long as a time could be shown when it was not in use.[49] At an early date the time for the commencement of memory was fixed by statute at the beginning of the reign of Richard I who ascended the throne in the year 1189.[50] At length by Lord Tenterden's Act the time of prescription was shortened and fixed at twenty, thirty, forty, and sixty years for the different classes of cases.[51]

2. DOCTRINE OF LOST GRANT. The doctrine of lost grant grew up in this way. The common-law judges hesitated to apply the statute of limitations to easements as well as to estates in the soil itself, but for a series of years prior to the passage of Lord Tenterden's Act they were in the habit of instructing juries that if they found that the use of an incorporeal right had been enjoyed continuously and uninterruptedly for a time sufficient to acquire title to the soil by adverse possession, adopting the period of twenty years by analogy to the statute of limitations, they were at liberty to presume a grant.[52] Under this doctrine if it were known that there was no grant, or the circumstances were such that the jury could not find one, the alleged easement failed for want of proof.[53] The purpose of the statute was to relieve the consciences and good sense of juries from the heavy tax which they were called on to incur for the sake of administering substantial justice by making that enjoyment a bar or title of itself which was so before only by the intervention of a jury.[54] In the United States it is generally held in analogy to

Sufficiency of actual uninterrupted enjoyment without title.— It is not necessary that "any person claiming right" to an easement under section 2 of the prescription act of 1832 should, during the whole period of the twenty or forty years, have claimed to be legally entitled against the owner of the servient tenement. Actual uninterrupted enjoyment for the prescribed period, without any title or justification, is enough. Gardner v. Hodgson's Kingston Breweries Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 592, 64 J. P. 344, 69 L. J. the origin of the easement is known a lost grant is not to be presumed.[56] Nevertheless the open, notorious, uninterrupted, adverse use of land under a claim of right for the statutory period may ripen into a title by prescription to an easement, although originally known to be a trespass.[57] Statutes of limitation prescribing the time within which an entry shall be made into lands, tenements, or hereditaments and within which every real, possessory, ancestral, mixed, or other action for any lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be brought are not deemed to comprehend in terms and within their purview incorporeal rights; but upon the wise principle of such statutes and in analogy to them to quiet men's possession and to put an end to and fix a limit to strife, a rule has been established that after the lapse of the period mentioned in those statutes a grant will be presumed, not that in such cases the court really thinks a grant has been made, but presumes the fact for the purpose of and upon the principle of quieting the possession.[58] It has been held that the presumption, unrebutted, arising from the adverse possession of an incorporeal right continued for so long a time as is fixed by statute as a bar to the recovery of land held adversely is a presumption of law, and is conclusive or sufficient evidence to warrant the court in holding that it confers a right on the possessor to the extent of his use.[59] The owner of the servient tenement cannot overcome the presumption of right arising from an uninterrupted user for the prescriptive period by proof that no grant was in fact made. He may rebut the presumption by contradicting or explaining the facts upon which it rests, but he cannot overcome it by proof in denial of a grant.[60] While the presumption of a grant arising from a long continued adverse and uninterrupted use and enjoyment operates in analogy to the statute of limitations, it differs from the case of title to land claimed by adverse possession. There the owner is disseized, and if such disseizin continues long enough the title becomes complete. A mere verbal protest or prohibition to occupy the premises will not be sufficient without entry. The owner in such case would still be disseized. But title to an easement by adverse user stands on a somewhat different ground. There the owner remains in possession of the premises. The title rests chiefly on his acquiescence in the adverse use, and evidence which disproves such acquiescence rebuts the title to the easement.[61]

some act or fact exists giving the party against whom the prescriptive right is set up a cause of action.[62] The use by the grantee of an easement in land previously mortgaged by the grantor does not begin to be adverse as against the mortgagee until he takes possession of the land.[63] Where a private right of way is claimed by prescription over a former highway the adverse use commences from the abandonment of the highway.[64] If an easement is enjoyed under a deed there can be no adverse enjoyment until the expiration of the right under the deed,[65] although an easement created by grant or reservation may be enlarged by prescription.[66]

4. No Prescription Against Public. No prescriptive right can be acquired against a sovereign nation or state.[67] But where by the express terms of the statute title by disseizin may be acquired against the state as readily as against a private person, by analogy, there seems to be no good reason why prescriptive rights may not be acquired in real property of the state.[68]

5. Characteristics of the User — a. Must Be With the Knowledge and Acquiescence of Owner. A user to ripen into a prescriptive right must be continued under a claim of right, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner of the servient tenement,[69] or at least must be so visible, open, and notorious that knowledge will be presumed.[70] The enjoyment must be of such a character that an ordinary owner of land, diligent in the protection of his interests, would have or must be taken to have, a reasonable opportunity of becoming aware of that enjoyment.[71] The word "clam" as applied to the enjoyment by which an easement may be acquired does not mean surreptitiously or fraudulently, but only in such a manner as could not reasonably be expected to attract the notice of the servient owner.[72]

b. Must Be Continuous and Uninterrupted. To acquire an easement by prescription the use must be continuous and uninterrupted. It is one of the essential ingredients of a valid prescription that it must have a continuous and peaceable use and enjoyment.[73] A total cessation of the enjoyment of an easement for a considerable time such as to give the owner good reason to believe that the claim was abandoned is such an interruption of the user as will prevent the maturing of a prescriptive right,[74] and if an obstruction to an unauthorized way be put up before the time of prescription has run the running of the time will be interrupted, although the obstruction is very soon torn down and the use of the way resumed.[75] Interruptions of the use of an easement when brought to the knowledge of the claimant rebut the presumption of a grant, unless such interruptions are promptly contested by the claimant and the easement reasserted.[76] An easement cannot arise by prescription if the owner of the servient estate has habitually broken and interrupted the use at will[77] or denied the right and threatened to put an end to the use and enjoyment of it,[78] for it cannot be said that the owner has acquiesced in a right which has been exercised against his protest.[79] But it has been held that mere denials of the right, complaints, remonstrances, or prohibitions of user unaccompanied by any act which in law would amount to a disturbance and be actionable as such will not prevent the acquisition of a right by prescription.[80] It has also been held that an isolated instance of attempted inter-

Obstruction of opening through fence.—The running of the statute so as to give a right of way across a railroad by prescription is interrupted by the company's obstructing the opening through its fence, although the obstruction is torn down within a short time. Brayden v. New York, etc., R. Co., 172 Mass. 225, 51 N. E. 1081.

Thus where a party enjoys the use of an easement in a manner otherwise sufficient to gain a right by adverse use he will not be prevented from acquiring the right even if the other party owning the servient estate ruption of the user resulting in no actual interruption and followed by no attempt to test the right will not as a matter of law necessarily destroy the presumption of a grant founded on a user in other respects sufficient.[81]

c. Must Be Adverse. A user to ripen into a prescriptive right must be adverse, not by license or favor, but under a claim or assertion of right hostile to the rights of the owner, so as to expose the claimant to an action of trespass if his claim is not well founded.[82] Continuance for the statutory period of a use permissive in its inception will not ripen into a hostile right,[83] and the use of a way over the land of another will not be deemed adverse where it is also used by the verbally objects or denies the right occasionally during such user, if he does not in any way interfere with or interrupt that enjoyment, having the power to do so, and the easement being of such a character that the owner of the dominant estate had only to enjoy the use without other adversary acts on his part. owner.[84] So a user by an individual which is not distinguished from that of the public will be considered permissive and not adverse, unless there is evidence that it was under a claim of right in himself and that the owner knowing of such claim acquiesced in it.[85] If one offers to purchase a right adversely used before the full period of prescription has elapsed it is evidence of an admission that he at that time had no title.[86] But negotiations in regard to the purchase of the right after it has matured by prescription will not conclude the party from relying upon the presumption of a grant.[87]

A parol license, given before the commencement of the prescriptive period, under Prescription Act (1832), § 2, whether gratuitous or for a consideration, will suffice to defeat actual, uninterrupted enjoyment in respect to a twenty-year title, but is insufficient to defeat such enjoyment for forty years, which is absolute and conclusive evidence of title, in the absence of any written consent or agreement. Gardner v. Hodgson's Kingston Breweries Co., [1900] 1 Ch. 592, 64 J. P. 344, 69 L. J. Ch. 368, 82 L. T. Rep. N. S. 455, 48 Wkly. Rep. 469.

As a guardian cannot acquire an interest hostile to his wards in their estate it will be conclusively presumed that a passway which he opened over their lands for his and their convenience was permissive merely, and that it so continued throughout the term of the exist.[89] When a licensee renounces the authority under which he began the use and claims it as his own right, and that fact is brought to the knowledge of the licensor, after which the licensee continues the use under such adverse claim exclusively, continuously, and uninterruptedly for the full prescriptive period, the right will become absolute.[90] Nevertheless to transform a permissive use into an adverse one there must be a distinct and positive assertion of a right hostile to the rights of the owner, and such assertion must be brought to his attention.[91] Although a parol grant of an easement is invalid under the statute of frauds, yet where a person under such grant uses the land of another in a manner hostile to the rights of the owner for a sufficient length of time, he thereby acquires an easement by prescription,[92] for the use of an easement under a claim of right by virtue of a parol contract is adverse and not permissive.[93] And where by parol agreement the owners of adjacent lots have dedicated an alley to the common use of the lots and have erected their buildings in reference to the alley, the easement becomes appurtenant to each lot and is not defeated by the statute of frauds, and a subsequent purchaser of one of the lots takes an easement as an appurtenance.[94] Where a use is substantially in accordance with the terms of a grant or reservation, it will be deemed to have been under the same and not adverse, and no prescriptive right will be gained.[95]

e. User by Successive Occupants. In order that the periods of user of successive occupants may so accumulate as to make up the full period of prescription, there must be a privity of estate between them.[96] The periods of enjoyment by an ancestor and his heir may be added to make out the full period of prescription,[97] and so of the periods of enjoyment of vendor and purchaser or persons

Thus where plaintiff by his deed had a right of way over a certain lot, the fact that he used other portions of the lot for teams to stand upon does not give him a right by prescription, the use being substantially in accordance with the grant was deemed to be adverse. Smith v. Wiggin, 52 N. H. 112.

96. Bryan v. East St. Louis, 12 Ill. App. 390. Thus where a former owner of land had enjoyed an easement for less than twenty years, when the commonwealth confiscated his land and conveyed it to plaintiff, who likewise enjoyed the easement, it was held that the time of enjoyment by the former owner could not be added to the time of enjoyment by plaintiff in order to make up the twenty years (Sargent v. Ballard, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 251); and an easement cannot be acquired by adverse possession while the owner of the servient tenement as agent of the owner of the dominant tenement lets the latter to third persons for short and not continuous terms (Holland v. Long, 7 Gray (Mass.) 486).

Dominant estate owned by unincorporated association.— Where a fishing-place and fishing implements were owned by sundry persons as an unincorporated association, and the different interests were from time to time transferred as personal property, involving frequent changes in the membership of the association, it was held that the adverse use of a way to the fishing-place by the successive owners was to be regarded as a continuous use, and that thereby a right of way might be acquired appurtenant to the fishing-place and accruing to the benefit of the persons who should be owners at the end of the period of prescription. claiming under the same title may be added to make out the complete prescriptive period.[98]

f. Disability of Party to Resist Use or Make Presumed Grant. Since a prescription presumes a grant and cannot exist where there is no power to grant, it follows that a prescriptive right cannot be acquired against a person who is under legal disability and unable in law to resist the adverse claim if it is not well founded.[99] And moreover it must be of something which one party could lawfully have granted to the other.[1] Inasmuch as the acquisition of an easement by adverse use follows the analogy of the acquisition of the title by adverse possession, it has been held that a disability arising after the adverse use has commenced and has become known to the owner of the servient estate does not suspend the acquisition of the right or extend the time necessary to acquire it.[2] This doctrine has been denied in another decision which holds that the adverse user is suspended during the period of disability.[3]

g. Unity of Title to Dominant and Servient Estates. The time during which the alleged dominant and servient estates were owned by the same person cannot be considered in determining whether or not an easement has been acquired by prescription.[4] Where the adverse enjoyment of an easement has been for a time interrupted by the unity of seizin and possession of the dominant and the servient estates, the times of enjoyment before and after such interruption cannot be added together to make out the full period of prescription.[5] Neither can time be Cumulative disabilities.— No presumption of a grant arises from the adverse enjoyment of an easement against a minor or a feme covert, but a second disability added to or assumed during the existence of the one operating when the adverse use began is to be disregarded. Mansur v. Blake, 62 Me. 38.

Effect of wrongful occupancy.— The time for acquisition of an easement by prescription does not run while the dominant and servient tenements are in the occupation of the same person, even though the occupation of the servient tenement be wrongful and without the privity of the true owner. counted during which the claimant of the right was in possession of the alleged servient estate as tenant of the owner.[6] But the fact that the lessee of the dominant estate is at the same time the lessee of the servient estate will not break the continuity of the adverse use and interrupt the running of the statute.[7] A person may, however, acquire by prescription an easement in land of which he is tenant in common.[8] So also sundry tenants in common may acquire by adverse user for the benefit of and as appurtenant to the land owned in common an easement over land owned by one of them in severalty.[9]

h. Extent and Manner of User. In order to acquire an easement by prescription, the adverse user must not only be continuous in point of time, but substantially identical during the whole of the statutory period with respect to manner and extent.[10] It has been held, however, that a more extensive and burdensome use for a portion of the prescriptive period will not impair the effect of such user as has been continuous for the full prescriptive period.[11] No prescriptive right can be acquired which is so extensive in its character and the manner of its user as to destroy the ordinary use of the whole property by the owner.[12]

(B) Public Ways. A private right of way cannot be acquired by prescription in a street or public highway while it is in use as such.[14] But after the discontinuance of a public highway a private right of way may be acquired by prescription over the same route.[15] And the creation of a public right to be enjoyed in futuro whenever the public authorities shall see fit to adopt the extension of a proposed street or avenue as a public highway, is not inconsistent with private easements which inure to the grantees immediately upon delivery of their deeds.[16]

(C) Way Across Railroad Tracks. One whose land abuts on a strip of land acquired by a railroad for its right of way may acquire by prescription a private right of way across the railroad tracks.[17]

(D) Way Through Uninclosed Lands. The mere use of a road through open woodland will not give a right of way by prescription; there must be some notorious assertion of right by an act done which would be equivalent to a possessio pedis;[18] but if the circumstances make it evident that the way was used adversely under claim of right a user for the prescriptive period will confer an easement by prescription.[19]

(II) NATURE, EXTENT, AND TIME OF USE—(A) In General. As in the case of other easements the user of a private way to ripen into an easement must be adverse under a claim of right, continuous, uninterrupted, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner of the soil, for the full prescriptive period.[20] In those easements which require the repeated acts of man for their enjoyment as rights of way, it may be sufficient if the user is of such a nature and takes place at such intervals as to afford an indication to the owner of the servient tenement that a right is claimed against him.[21] Inasmuch as a man may not wish to travel every day, the use of a way over the land of another whenever one sees fit and without asking leave is deemed continuous and adverse.[22] But the use must be continuous within the bounds of reason; thus a use in one year cannot be connected with a use five years afterward, so as to give a right of way by prescription.[23]

(B) Indefinite Line of Travel. To establish a private right of way by prescription the line of the traveled road must be definite.[24] The practice of passing over land in different directions, however long continued, does not establish a right of way by prescription.[25] In order to acquire a prescriptive right to a private way by constant and uninterrupted use of the same, the use must relate strictly to the same identical strip of land over which such right is claimed, and the claimant cannot tack together the use of two or more strips to make out the prescriptive period.[26] But the user is not affected by an occasional

(c) Use of Way in Common With Others. The mere use of a way in common with the general public, although it may establish a public road, cannot establish a private right of way.[28] Such use is regarded as being under an implied license and is not adverse, unless there is some act on the part of the claimant indicating an independent assertion of right more pronounced and more clearly indicative of a claim of right than his open and notorious use of the way.[29] But it is not necessary that the party claiming an easement or a right of way shall be the only one who can or may enjoy that or a similar right over the same land, although his right should not depend for its enjoyment upon a similar right in others. He must exercise it under some claim existing in his own favor independently of all others.[30] The fact that certain persons have a right of way by grant does not prevent other persons from acquiring a prescriptive right to the use of the way.[31]

b. Easements of Light and Air.[32] At common law a prescriptive right to the unobstructed flow of light and air to ancient windows might be acquired; but for the obstruction of prospect, which was said to be a matter of delight only, no action would lie,[33] and now by the Prescription Act it is provided that when the access and use of light to and for any dwelling-house, work-shop, or other building shall have been actually enjoyed therewith for the full period of twenty years without interruption the right thereto shall be deemed absolute and indefeasible, any local usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding, unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly made or given for that purpose, by deed or writing;[34] and a right of light and air may be acquired by enjoyment for the statutory period against a statutory company or other servient owner incapable of granting it.[35] At any time before the expiration of the full period of twenty years the owner of adjoining land has the right to build on it as he pleases or to erect a wall to prevent the acquisition of prescriptive rights.[36] But one has no right to obstruct new lights unless he can do so without obstructing ancient ones.[37] The right to light and air coming through windows of a building which may grow into the statutory right acquired by twenty years' user and enjoyment, as of right and without interruption, commences when the exterior walls of the building with the spaces for the windows are completed and the building is properly roofed in, although the window-sashes and the glass may not be put in and the interior may not be finished until some time afterward.[38] To support an action for obstructing light plaintiff must show that there is such a diminution of light and air as makes his premises sensibly less fit for occupation.[39] The English doctrine that an easement for light and air may be acquired by user or prescription has been very generally rejected in the United States.[40] Such a rule, it has been said, is not adapted to the circumstances or

In Delaware it has been decided that the doctrine of presumptive title to light and air received over land of another person arising from the uninterrupted enjoyment of it for twenty years and upward through the windows of a dwelling-house was part of the common law of England and of the Colonies at the period of American independence and as such continued to be the law of Delaware existing state of things in this country, and cannot be applied without working the most mischievous consequences.[41]

B. Express Grants, Reservations, and Covenants — 1. Easements Lie Only in Grant. An easement lies not in livery but in grant, and a freehold interest in it cannot be created or passed otherwise than by deed or by prescription which presupposes a grant.[42]

2. Requisites and Validity of Grant. No one but the owner of land can create an easement over it.[43] It is beyond the scope of the power of executors or administrators to create incidental rights or easements of this character.[44] An instrument creating a real servitude to be valid should express and describe the estate in favor of which it was established, especially where it is shown that the party claiming such servitude was the owner of several estates at the time the servitude was acquired.[45] But it has been held that a failure to describe the dominant estate in an instrument granting a right of way is not fatal, where it clearly appears what estate was intended.[46] A grant of a right of way de novo must be acknowledged and recorded the same as other formal instruments affecting the title to real estate.[47] And in order to create an easement the instrument must be under seal, otherwise it will create a license only.[48] An instrument creating a servitude need not mention accessory rights, since they pass as incidents to the contract.[49]

3. Acceptance of Grant. The acceptance by a grantee of a deed conveying a right of way in express terms and defining with precision the exact piece of land over which the easement is to extend is an acceptance of all it conveys, and no act is required of him to show his acceptance of the easement as the owner of the dominant tenement.[50] A grantee in a deed creating an easement over the granted premises by its acceptance becomes bound by all its restrictions, reservations, and exceptions.[51] In other words one who acquires title through a deed expressly reserving a right of way through the land is estopped by the deed from denying the existence of the right of way.[52] And the same principle applies to the acceptance of a deed reserving an easement of any other nature.[53]

4. Construction and Operation of Grant — a. In General. The determination of the extent of an easement granted or reserved in express terms by deed depends upon a proper construction of the language of the instrument.[54] If a grant of a right of way will not convey all that was intended it will not therefore be entirely void, but will be construed to convey all that it was in the power of the grantor to convey.[55] A deed providing that the grantor shall open and use as a private alley a certain described strip of land leading from the street over other land of the grantor to the rear of the grantee's lot to be used as a private alley so long as the grantee, his heirs and assigns, shall require the same for such purpose, and reserving title to such strip in the grantor, conveys a private right of way.[56] A deed cannot be construed as granting a right of way over land which the grantor does not own.[57] A right of way in esse will pass by a deed of bargain and sale of the premises to which it is appurtenant.[58] But a right of way de novo cannot be created by deed of bargain and sale. This can be accomplished only by grant or lease.[59] Where a right of way appurtenant to land is plainly conveyed by the terms of a deed it is not competent to prove by parol evidence that it was not the intention of the parties that it should be conveyed.[60]

b. In Location of Right of Way. Where a right of way is specifically bounded and defined in the grant or reservation, the terms of the deed will control and the question of convenient use is immaterial.[61] Where a right of way is granted or reserved, but not specifically defined, the rule is that the way need be only such as is reasonably necessary and convenient for the purpose for which it was created. When the right of way is not bounded in the grant or reservation, the law bounds it by the line of reasonable enjoyment.[62] Thus the owner of the soil of an alley or passageway over which another has a right of way may lawfully cover it with a building, provided he leaves a space so wide, high, and light that the way is substantially as convenient as before for the purpose for which it was granted or reserved,[63] unless it is clear from the language of the grant and the surrounding circumstances that the parties intended to have the passageway remain open to the sky.[64] It is a familiar rule that when a right of way is granted without defined limits, the practical location and use of such way by the grantee under his deed acquiesced in for a long time by the grantor will operate as an assignment of the right.[65] But this rule, which is a rule of practical construction adopted to ascertain the intent of the parties, will not be permitted to defeat an intention fairly expressed in the terms of the grant controlling the future location.[66]

c. What Title Passes by Grant — (i) In General. It is true that in some cases the grant of an estate designated and described only by the particular use or purpose for which the land is appropriated will be held to pass a fee.[67] But a different rule of construction is applicable when a particular or special right or easement in land is conveyed which may well coexist and be enjoyed and used by the grantee consistently with the ownership of the fee in the grantor. In such cases the fee is not passed in express terms and it does not pass by implication, because it is not incidental or essential to the right or interest which is described in the deed. Whenever a grant is made of a right or easement in land which falls within the class sometimes described as non-continuous, that is, where the use of the premises by the grantee for the purpose designated in the deed will be only intermittent and occasional, and does not embrace the entire beneficial occupation and improvement of the land, the reasonable interpretation is that an easement in the soil and not the fee is intended to be conveyed. Among the most prominent of this class of easements is a private way.[68] An owner whose land is burdened with a right of way has all the rights and benefits of the soil consistent with the reasonable use of the way, and the owner of the easement cannot prevent even a trespasser from using the land if his use does not impede the free exercise of the right of passage.[69] So also a reservation of a right of way over land described in the granting clause of a deed reserves only an easement and the title in fee passes to the grantee.[70] There is, however, nothing in the fact that a strip of land is to be used by the grantee for a road to prevent its being conveyed in fee; and the fee will pass if the language of the deed shows that the parties so intended.[71] The grant of the right to construct a flume of dimensions sufficient for a specified purpose and to a flow of water through the flume sufficient to accomplish that purpose does not carry with it the fee in the land through which the flume is to be constructed.[72]

It was held that plaintiff as the dominant owner had no right to light and air above the way, and that she had only the right of passage and repassage with such incidental rights as are necessary to its enjoyment. In Atkins v. Bordman, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 457, 475, 37 Am. Dec. 100, Shaw, C. J., said: "We may conceive of a covered passage of eight or ten feet high, of a length so considerable, that unless openings were left, there would not be light enough admitted at the ends to enable persons to use it with comfort, for the purposes of a passageway. But unless darkened to that extent, it is not a case for damage."

(II) On Grant of Right of Way to Railroad Company. The grant of a right of way to a railroad company is the grant of an easement merely and the fee to the soil remains in the grantor.[73] Although the language used in the granting part of the deed and in the habendum is appropriate and that commonly used to convey the fee, yet the clause descriptive of the use to be made of the land may so limit or qualify the grant as to change it from a fee to an easement.[74] And if the right of way be obtained by condemnation proceedings the company still takes only an easement and not the fee of the soil.[75]

5. Covenant Operating as Grant. It is settled law that easements may be created by agreements or covenants, that one shall have a right or privilege in the estate of another as well as by express grants; such agreements are grants in effect.[76] But words strictly of covenant will not be construed into the grant of Mutual covenants operating as negative easements.—Mutual covenants of persons, one owning one side, the other the other side of a building, that no change in the front of the building or in the principal entrance thereto shall be made by either without the consent of the other are grants of negative easements. Applications of rule.— An agreement by a turnpike company to give the owner of a ranch the right to use the road free of toll for all the purposes of the ranch in consideration of his giving the company a right of way over the ranch does not give the ranch-owner an easement in the road. Kellett v. Ida Clayton, etc., Wagon Road Co., 99 Cal. 210, 33 Pac. 885. So a covenant not to sell marl from a certain tract of land or not to carry on any specific business on it does not create an easement, but is merely a personal covenant. Brewer v. Marshall, 18 N. J. Eq. 337. And where one covenants with adjoining landowners to reserve an open space in front of their lots and makes a subsequent conveyance subject to the conditions of party-wall agreements that the walls shall commence eight feet back from the street line, but which does not prohibit building on the eight feet, it cannot be inferred that he agreed that the eight feet adjoining the street was to be kept open. Bradley v. Walker, 138 N. Y. 291, 33 N. E. 1079. A landlord may by contract under seal impose on lands which he leases burdens which will not only be binding on the tenant, but also on subtenants, they being covenants real running with the land; but except between landlord and tenant no burdens can be imposed on lands by any covenant of the owner which will run with the land and bind a grantee, for such covenants are personal and are not covenants real running with the land. Imposition of conditions as to erection of buildings.— Where a tenant in common of a tract of land has leased to his cotenant for a term of years a portion of the tract, on condition that a building contemplated by the lessee shall not be reared above the third floor of a hotel on the other portion of the tract, and afterward conveys the demised

a right of way over the land conveyed by the deed and does not affect any other land of the grantee.[79] So a condition imposed on a grant of lands to a railroad company for its track or embankment that it shall maintain an under-grade crossing is a covenant of the company and operates to grant a new easement back to the grantor.[80] A grant of land by metes and bounds with full covenants of warranty, excepting or reserving a roadway for the use of the public, or a right of way for a railroad, passes the fee to the land subject to the easements reserved.[81] But it is otherwise where it clearly appears from the language of the deed that the grantor intended to reserve to himself the fee in the soil of the roadway.[82] A reservation is always something issuing or coming out of the thing or property granted and not part of the thing itself, and it must be to the grantor or party executing the conveyance and not to a stranger.[83] It has been distinctly held that a reservation of a right of way in favor of one not a party to the deed is void,[84] although there are cases upholding such reservations.[85] So an easement appurtenant to the grantor's remaining land may be created by a condition in the deed limiting and restricting the use to be made of the land granted.[86]

b. Distinction Between Reservation and Exception. The distinction between a reservation and exception is considered in a subsequent section.[87]

premises to a third person subject to the lease, the condition creates an easement, the due enjoyment of which will be protected against encroachment by injunction. Thruston v. Minke, 32 Md. 487. Where the owner of two lots conveyed one of them with the restriction that no building should be erected thereon within a certain distance of the other lot such reservation creates an easement in the lot granted for the benefit of the second lot. Herrick v. Marshall, 66 Me. 435.

A reservation in a deed of "the rangeway if ever wanted for a road" is not the reserving of a private way, but is for a public highway. Morgan v. Palmer, 48 N. H. 336.

Across railroad track.—A railroad company obtained a right of way through plaintiff's land, the track cutting the land into two tracts; a clause in the deed granting the right of way reserved a crossing to pass to the back tract; and the evidence disclosed no way to the back tract except this crossing from the front tract. It was held that the court should find the back tract inaccessible except by the way reserved in the deed. Knowlton v. New York, etc., R. Co., 72 Conn. 188, 44 Atl. 8.

Reservation not enlarged by construction.—The city of New York made a grant of certain land fronting on the East river and situated between the original high-water mark and the harbor commissioner's line giving the grantee the wharfage rights along the river boundary of the premises except those at the bulkhead in front of two streets extending to the river and reserving a street along the bulkhead line between these two streets. It was held that the reservation of this street did not also reserve for the city an easement over the premises granted to the end of the piers in front of the two streets. Instances.— A deed containing the words "excepting the roads laid out over said land" conveys the fee within the limits of the road, subject to the easement of the public incident to the uses of the way. Wellman v. Dickey, 78 Me. 29, 2 Atl. 133. 85. Where a conveyance of lands reserved a passway to a third person, an adjoining owner, in terms, "Be it known that R is to have the privilege of a passway from R's orchard round to a gate during her life or [till] she sells," it was held that R had the right to use the passway during her life or till she should sell the land occupied by her. Griffith v. Rigg, 37 S. W. 58, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 463. 7. Necessity of Words of Inheritance. Unless this necessity has been removed by statute, it is the settled rule that in a deed to an individual the word "heirs" is necessary to create an estate of inheritance in the grantee, if he takes to his own use and not in trust,[88] and in the grant of an easement the use of the word "heirs" is necessary in order to create an easement in fee.[89] By the strict rules of law, in the absence of statutory interference, an instrument creating an easement in fee by way of reservation must contain words of inheritance, for here the whole estate is granted and the legal effect of the reservation is that of a grant from the vendee back to the vendor, vesting some new interest in him not before possessed.[90] But if created by way of exception words of inheritance are not necessary to create an easement in fee if the grantor owned the fee of the premises at the time of the conveyance, for the simple reason that the thing excepted is not granted, and the grantor retains a part of the estate by virtue of his original title.[91] But as an exception may be created by words of reservation little reliance can be placed upon the language used in the deed in determining whether the right is by way of exception or by way of reservation. The intention of the parties must govern, and this is to be ascertained from all the facts and circumstances in the case. Where by the construction of the grant it fairly appears that it was the intention of the parties to create or reserve an easement appurtenant to the grantor's remaining land, and not merely a personal right for the life of the grantor, the courts will give effect to that intention no matter in what language it may be expressed.[92]

Tenny, C. J., in Winthrop v. Fairbanks, 41 Me. 307, 311, said: "It is well settled, that in giving construction to instruments in writing, the intention of the parties is to be effectuated, and if a deed cannot effect the design of them in one mode known to the law, their purpose may be accomplished in another; provided no rule of law is violated. Hence, the distinction between an exception and a reservation is so obscure in many cases, that it has not been observed; but that which in terms is a reservation in a deed is often construed to be a good exception, in order that the object designed to be secured may not be lost."

C. By Implication — 1. By Implied Grant — a. In General. Upon the principle of construction that where a man grants a thing he grants with it everything necessary to its enjoyment, it is held that by a grant of land easements necessary for its enjoyment are created ex necessitate and pass by the grant, although no expressly named.[93] The rule of the common law upon this subject is that where the owner of two heritages or of one heritage consisting of several parts has arranged and adapted these, so that one derives a benefit or advantage from the other of a continuous and obvious character, and he sells one of them without making mention of those incidental advantages or burdens of one in respect to the other, there is in the silence of the parties an implied understanding and agreement that these advantages and burdens respectively shall continue as before the separation of the title.[94] In other words upon the grant by the owner of a tenement of part of that tenement as it is then used and enjoyed, there will pass to the grantee all those continuous and apparent quasi-easements which are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted and which have been and are at the time of the grant used by the owner of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted,[95] which are easements appurtenant to the land granted and fix the rights not only of the immediate parties but of those claiming under them,[96] and, whether the severance is by voluntary alienation or by judicial proceedings, the use is continued by operation of law.[97]

A deed of a railroad right of way releasing all claim for damages but "reserving" to the grantor a private crossing over the track along the course of a previously existing cartway, excepts the cartway from the grant, and does not create a new right in the grantor by way of reservation, and hence the word "heirs" is not necessary to make the easement of crossing perpetual. b. Simultaneous Conveyances. Two deeds executed and delivered at the same time by the same grantor to different grantees, one conveying one parcel of real estate with an easement in another parcel, and the other deed conveying the latter parcel, but reserving the easement, are to be construed together.[98] So where there are several grants not absolutely at the same moment, but so far at the same moment that they are to be considered as one transaction and done at the same time, then each of the grantees gets the benefit of an implied grant of easements. It is sometimes said that this is a reservation, but in reality it is not; for in order to make all those grants which are looked upon as one transaction available and effectual it is considered that each of the grantees is to be looked upon as taking from the grantor, while he has still the power to give each what it is right he should give; so that there is an implied grant against all the other grantees of those easements which will be reasonably necessary for the property which is conveyed.[99] But when there has once been a severance of the unity of title by a conveyance of a portion of a tenement, the grantee of the residue can take nothing by implication except what may have been reserved by the grantor.[1]

c. Partition Among Heirs. A right by implication sometimes arises in case of a partition among heirs when it would not arise in the case of a conveyance of a part of a heritage to a stranger.[2] So, although a right of way is extinguished

98. Knight v. Dyer, 57 Me. 174, 99 Am. Dec. 765. When two properties belonging to the same owner are sold at the same time, and each purchaser has notice of sale to the other, the right to any continuous easement passes with the sale as an absolute legal right. But the easement must have been enjoyed by the former owner at the time of the sale. Therefore one purchaser could not claim the right to use a dam on his land in such a way as to cause the water to flow back on the other property, where such right, if it had ever been enjoyed by the former owner, had been abandoned years before the sale. Illustration.— On a natural mill stream there were three successive dams and mills. E being the owner of the upper and lower mills only, dug and opened a raceway on his own land from the dam of his lower mill to the stream above the dam of the middle mill belonging to another person, so as to tap the stream there and partially to divert its waters from the middle mill; subsequently he purchased the middle mill and became the owner of the three mills and of all the land affected by them, their dams, races, and appurtenances, and continued to use said raceway as an actual appurtenance to the lower mill, until by deeds of even date he conveyed said mills with their appurtenances to his three sons. The upper mill to J F, the middle mill to J, and the lower mill to W. In an action by the owner of the middle mill, the grantee of J, against the owner of the lower mill, the grantee of W, to recover damages for the continued partial diversion of the water from the middle mill by means of said raceway, it was held that the grantees of E and those holding under them respectively took and each was entitled to hold his mill with its appurtenances as it actually existed in fact and in use at the time of the conveyance from E. Elliott v. Sallee, 14 Ohio St. 10 [following Morgan v. Mason, 20 Ohio 401, 55 Am. Dec. 464].

Severance by mortgage.— The rule that when the owner of two tenements severs the same by conveyance to two different persons the purchaser of the one takes subject to apparent easements in favor of the other is not varied by the fact that the severance is by mortgage merely. Havens v. Klein, 51 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 82.

1. Brakely v. Sharp, 9 N. J. Eq. 9.

Conveyance of servient part first.— Where a common grantor owned two tracts of land and on one of the tracts a spring was located, the water from which was conducted by underground pipes and discharged in a receptacle on the other tract, and conveyed the tract on which the spring was located to one person and thereafter the other tract to another, and neither deed contained any mention of the spring or water, it was held that since at the time of the second conveyance the grantor owned no property rights in the spring, the grantee of the second tract acquired no easement therein, or in the flow of the water to the receptacle as appurtenant to the land. Illustration.— Thus in Brakely v. Sharp, 10 N. J. Eq. 206, the intestate owned two farms at his death with a house on each, and had constructed an aqueduct from a spring upon one of them to both of these houses. Upon his death the farm upon which the spring was located was set apart to the widow and one heir, and the other farm to the other heir. The question arose as to the effect of this partition upon the right which the owner of

by unity of possession, it may be revived if the estates descend to daughters who make partition by which the dominant estate is allotted to one and the servient to the other.[3]

d. Character of Easements Which Pass by Implied Grant — (I) Necessity of Permanency. All easements of whatever class which pass by implication or construction of law must not only be reasonably necessary and apparent, but also permanent in their character. A mere temporary provision or arrangement made for the convenience of the entire estate will not constitute that degree of necessity and permanency required to burden the property with a continuance of the same when divided or separated by conveyance to different parties.[4] Three things are essential to the creation of an easement in this way: (1) A separation of the title; (2) that before the separation takes place the use which gives rise to the easement shall have been so long continued and so obvious as to show that it was meant to be permanent; and (3) that the easement shall be necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land granted or retained.[5]

(II) Necessity of Continuity — (A) In General. The distinction between easements which are apparent and continuous and those which are not apparent and continuous is well established by adjudicated cases. The former pass on the severance of the two tenements as appurtenant without the use of the word "appurtenances," but the latter do not pass unless the grantor uses language in the conveyance sufficient to create the easement de novo;[6] or as has been said discontinuous easements not constantly apparent are continued or created by a severance only when they are necessary, and that necessity cannot be obviated by a substitute constructed on or over the dominant premises.[7] In order that an easement may pass by implication it must be annexed to the estate granted, must be reasonably necessary for the beneficial enjoyment of the same, and must be in open, apparent, and continuous use at the time of the grant.[8]

the second farm had to the benefit of this aqueduct. The chancellor held that if the ancestor while owning both farms had conveyed to a stranger the one which was set apart to the widow, he would have lost all benefit of the aqueduct as an easement if he had not expressly reserved it in his deed; but the widow and heir did not stand in the light of purchasers from the ancestor; all the heirs came in with equal rights and no preference arose from mere priority of assignment, as all took title from the same partition proceedings.

(B) What Easements Considered Continuous — (1) DITCHES AND DRAINS. If the owner of land makes an artificial, open ditch across it for the purpose of drainage and afterward sells either the upper or lower portion of the land without reference to the ditch, neither he nor his grantee can afterward stop up the drain, and an attempt to do so by the occupant of the lower tenement is ground for injunctive relief.[9] So if he sells the two portions to different parties the easement passes with the title to the land and the grantee of the servient tenement takes it subject thereto.[10] But it is otherwise in the case of a subterranean drain not open to observation. If the owner of land under which there is such a drain conveys a part of it with full covenants of warranty without reference to the drain no easement is either granted or reserved.[11]

(2) RIGHTS OF WAY. According to the weight of authority a right of way is not such a continuous easement as will pass by implication upon the severance of an estate, inasmuch as it is enjoyed merely at intervals, leaving in the interim no visible sign of its existence.[12] But this distinction between ways and other easements which are enjoyed without any active intervention of the party entitled to enjoy them has not been uniformly regarded; and there are cases in which it has been held that ways which are visibly and permanently established on one part of an estate for the benefit of another will, upon a severance of the estate, pass as implied or constructive easements appurtenant to the part of the estate for the benefit of which they were established.[13] This has been put upon the ground that the way being a formed and inclosed road is considered a continuous and apparent easement which will pass by implied grant without any large general words or indeed without any general words at all.[14] But no such easement will pass by implication if it is necessary to change the physical condition of the property in order to create the way claimed.[15] In other cases it has been held that a grant of a right of way cannot be inferred merely from the fact that there is a way leading to the premises purchased,[16] even though the grant of the land be with all privileges and appurtenances, for the use of the word "appurtenances," although appropriate in the conveyance of an existing easement, is not sufficient to create one where none exists.[17]

tween easements, such as a right of way or easements used from time to time, and easements of necessity or continuous easements. The cases recognize this distinction, and it is clear law that, upon a severance of tenements, easements used as of necessity, or in their nature continuous, will pass by implication of law without any words of grant; but with regard to easements which are used from time to time only, they do not pass, unless the owner, by appropriate language, shews an intention that they should pass."

(III) Degree of Necessity Required. In some cases it is held that easements will not pass by implication except in cases of strict necessity.[18] But the weight of authority sustains a rule less exacting than that of strict and indispensable necessity, namely, that the degree of necessity is such merely as renders the easement necessary for the convenient and comfortable enjoyment of the property as it existed when the severance was made, not that it shall be absolutely necessary for the enjoyment of the estate granted.[19]

2. By Implied Reservation. As regards implied reservations of easements the matter stands on principle in a position very different from implied grants. If the grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. To say that a grantor reserves to himself in entirety that which may be beneficial to him, but which may be most injurious to his grantee, is quite contrary to the principle upon which an implied grant depends, which is that a grantor shall not derogate from or render less effectual his grant or render that which he has granted less beneficial to his grantee.[20] Accordingly where there is a grant of land with full covenants of warranty without express reservation of easements, the best considered cases hold that there can be no reservation by implication, unless the easement is strictly one of necessity,[21]

In this last case the Lord Chancellor said: "Many rules of law are derived from fictions, and the rules of the French Code, which Mr. Gale has copied, are derived from the fiction of the owner of the entire heritage, which is afterwards severed, standing in the relation of père de famille, and impressing upon the different portions of his estate mutual services and obligations which accompany such portions when divided among them, or even as it is used in French law, when aliened to strangers. But this comparison of the disposition of the owner of two tenements to the destination du père de famille is a mere fanciful analogy, from which rules of law ought not to be derived. And the analogy, if it be worth grave attention, fails in the case to be decided, for when the owner of two tenements sells and conveys one for an absolute estate therein, he puts an end by contract to the relation which he had himself created between the tenement for the operation of a plain grant not pretended to be otherwise than in conformity with the contract between the parties ought not to be limited and cut down by the fiction of an implied reservation.[22] There are, however, many cases which hold that an easement will be reserved by implication where all the conditions and circumstances exist under which it would be granted by implication.[23]

3. Particular Easements Created by Implication — a. Ways of Necessity — (i) Grant as a Basis of Existence. A way of necessity such as the law recognizes derives its origin from a grant or reservation and cannot exist where there was never any unity of ownership of the alleged dominant and servient estates, for no one can have a way of necessity over the land of a stranger.[24] Necessity alone without reference to any relations between the respective owners of the land is not sufficient to create this right.[25] So where land is taken by condemnation proceedings, no way of necessity arises, because there has been no grant from which it could be implied.[26] Where easements have been created by sold and the adjoining tenement; and discharges the tenement so sold from any burden imposed upon it during his joint occupation; and the condition of such tenement is thenceforth determined by the contract of alienation, and not by the previous user of the vendor during such joint ownership."

Compare Dutton v. Tayler, 2 Lutw. 1487, which seems to assert the doctrine that strict necessity alone is sufficient to maintain a way of necessity. An examination of the English cases above cited will, however, reveal the fact that this is not now the law of England. So also in Snyder v. Warford, 11 Mo. 513, 49 Am. Dec. 94, it was held that a right of way of necessity exists in all cases where an individual owns land surrounded by other lands excluding it from any public highway. See also Adams v. Harrison, 4 La. Ann. 165; Miller v. Thompson, 3 La. Ann. 567; Broussard v. Etie, 11 La. 394, decided under a statute in that state regulating this subject.

The fact that one's land is completely surrounded by the land of another does not of itself give the former a way of necessity over the land of the latter where there is no privity of ownership. Ellis v. Blue Mountain Forest Assoc., 69 N. H. 385, 41 Atl. 856, 42 L. R. A. 570.

the sale of lots abutting upon a proposed street or alley way, a purchaser of the land set apart for such street or alley way at a tax-sale is not estopped to interfere therewith, inasmuch as he does not claim under the original owner by whose grants the easements were created.[27] So a right of way from necessity from one part of the claimant's land to another part of the same tract over the land of another cannot exist.[28]

(II) Convenience as Ground For Claim. No implication of a grant of a right of way can arise from proof that the land granted cannot be conveniently occupied without it. Its foundation rests in necessity not in convenience.[29] It follows that a party cannot have a way of necessity through the land of another when the necessary way to the highway can be obtained through his own land, however convenient and useful another way might be.[30] And the same is true strip one hundred feet wide through the same, theretofore taken by a railroad company under condemnation proceedings under a statute by which the railroad obtained title in fee, it was held that the grantee was not entitled to a way of necessity from one part of the land to another divided by the strip so condemned.

Degree of convenience immaterial.— Where it appears that one claiming a way of necessity over the land of another can easily reach a portion of his land by such way, but that otherwise it is necessary for him to cross a hill, which can only be done by making many turns and then with very light loads, he is not entitled to a way of necessity inasmuch as mere inconvenience, however great, is not sufficient to entitle one to such a way. Dee v. King, 73 Vt. 375, 50 Atl. 1109.

Immateriality of expense.— The fact that the construction of any other road than the one used as a means of ingress and egress from certain land would be inconvenient and expensive does not give the owner of such land a right to such road through the doctrine of necessity. Cotton, L. J., in Russell v. Watts, 25 Ch. D. 559, 573, 50 L. T. Rep. N. S. 673, 32 Wkly. Rep. 626, said: "Take the common case of a man having a field, which he does not sell, in the midst of land which he sells; of course it is implied that he intends to have the power of using the field not sold, and not to give the exclusive right or control over it to the person to whom he sells the surrounding land, and a way over that is said to be a way of necessity, and that is reserved without express words as an implied reservation."

Applications of rule.— One claiming lands under a mortgage foreclosure sale, to which access cannot be had except over the lands of third persons, or over the homestead of the mortgagor, which was included in the mortgage, but was not sold, because the proceeds of the other lands were sufficient to pay the debt, is entitled to a way of necessity over such homestead, although the declaration of homestead was filed prior to the decree of foreclosure and although the statute provides that a homestead can only be encumbered or conveyed by an instrument signed by both husband and wife and is exempt from execution or forced sale. San Joaquin Valley Bank v. Dodge, 125 Cal. 77, 57 Pac. 687. So where the owner has established and used a private way over his land which is the only means of access to his house from the highway, such fact being known to the grantee of a portion of the land over which the way necessarily passes, the way is reserved from the grant by implication, although it contains a covenant against encumbrances. Meredith v. Frank, 56 Ohio St. 479, 47 N. E. 656.

Where a person conveys to another a piece of land completely surrounded by land of the grantor the grantee and those claiming under him may have a right of way by necessity through the lands of the grantor as an incivoluntary or by sale under execution.[34] So also leasing premises which cannot be approached except across the lessor's land gives a right of way across it of necessity in order that the tenement may be rendered beneficial.[35] And a deed of land bounded on all sides by lands of other owners passes as appurtenant, an existing prescriptive right of way over one of the adjoining lots to other land of the grantor and a way by necessity over that.[36] A right of way by necessity is always one over the surface of the servient estate. The owner of the dominant estate has no right to tunnel under the surface of the servient estate in order to reach coal or minerals lying beneath the surface of his own estate.[37] A right of way of necessity may be acquired over the land of another, although the road to which the way leads is not a county road, but a mere by-road open to the public.[38] It has been held that a right of way cannot exist by necessity in any case in favor of the state's grantee of lands over other adjoining vacant lands held by the state.[39]

bb. Necessity Created by Party. This necessity must not be created by the party claiming the right of way.[40] A grantee cannot so improve his land as to convert a way of convenience into a way of necessity; whether or not it is a way of necessity depends upon the state of things at the date of his deed.[41]

dent of the grant. Rock Island, etc., R. Co. v. Dimick, 144 Ill. 628, 32 N. E. 291, 19 L. R. A. 105; McEwan v. Baker, 98 Ill. App. 271; Brigham v. Smith, 4 Gray (Mass.) 297, 64 Am. If the land is partly surrounded by that of the grantor and partly by that of strangers, a right of way over the remaining land of the grantor exists by necessity (McEwan v. Baker, 98 Ill. App. 271; Fairchild v. Stewart, 117 Iowa 734, 89 N. W. 1075; Pleas v. Thomas, 75 Miss. 495, 22 So. 820; Palmer v. Palmer, 150 N. Y. 839, 44 N. E. 966, 55 Am. Rep. 653; Mosher v. Hibbs, 24 Ohio Cir. Ct. 275; Wooldridge v. Coughlin, 46 W. Va. 345, 33 S. E. 233); and this right is not affected by a contract of sale of part of the surrounding lands of the grantor made prior to the conveyance to the grantee but of which he had no notice (Fairchild v. Stewart, 117 Iowa 734, 89 N. W. 1075).

Access by water only.— It has been held that the fact that the only way of access to land is over navigable water is not such necessity as calls for another right of way. Hildreth v. Googins, 91 Me. 227, 39 Atl. 550; Kingsley v. Gouldsborough Land Imp. Co., 86 Me. 279, 29 Atl. 1074, 25 L. R. A. 502; Turnbull v. Rivers, 3 McCord (S. C.) 131, 15 Am. But if it appears that the way by water is not available for the transportation of all such things as may be needed for the use of the land in a reasonable way, a way of necessity over the land will be deemed to be granted or reserved by implication. Ipswich Grammar School v. Jeffrey's Neck Pasture, 174 Mass. 572, 55 N. E. 462. And see Jay v. Michael, 92 Md. 198, 48 Atl. 61, holding that where the owner of a life-estate in one piece of land which was surrounded by another tract except at two points where it was bounded by water, conveyed the surrounding tract, it was held that there was an implied reservation of a right of way over the tract conveyed to the piece surrounded, although the deed contained full covenants of warranty.

Pipe line for natural gas.— Where a landowner conveyed a right of way through his farm in fee to a railroad company and years afterward natural gas was found on his land situated on the further side of such right of way from his residence, it was held that the law would imply a way of necessity by which he might pipe such gas to his residence for use therein, the pipes to be so laid and constructed as not to interfere in any wise with such railroad company's proper use and occupation of its right of way. (b) On Sale of Something to Be Removed From Land. So where the owner of land grants to another some product of the soil, such as growing timber, stone in a quarry, iron ore, or the like, the grant necessarily carries with it such a reasonable way over the surface of the land as will render the right to enter and take away the thing granted available.[42] But in such case the purchaser is not at liberty to use any way he chooses; his right to use a particular way depends upon its being reasonably necessary.[43] The grantee of a wreck has of necessity a right of way to it over the land of another.[44] Upon a like principle a contract to permit the use of a wall for a sign space creates an easement and implies the right of such access to the wall as is necessary to use it for that purpose.[45]

(2) Halls and Stairways. If a building consisting of several apartments is so constructed that all the occupants must enter and depart by the same hall and stairway these become a way of necessity upon the sale or lease of part of the building.[46] But it is otherwise if the building be so constructed that the grantee can readily construct an entrance and stairway in his own part.[47] Where the owner of two adjoining lots on one of which there is a building with an outside stairway projecting over the other lot grants this lot with the building and the right to maintain the stairway, the grantee takes a perpetual easement or a right of way to the second story of the building over the stairway on the adjoining lot.[48]

(B) When Ways Exist in Behalf of Grantor. If the owner of an estate grants a portion of it to another, leaving other land of the grantor to which he can have access only by passing over the land granted, a way of necessity is reserved in the grant by implication.[49] And a deed of warranty does not estop the grantor to claim such way over the land granted.[50] Although the owner cannot subject one part of his land to another by an easement because he cannot have an easement on his own property, yet if a person owns two tenements with a road from one over the other to the highway and sells the latter without reserving in the deed any right of way, he may, if he has no other, use the road over the latter as a way of necessity.[51] But the reservation in such case is confined to a way of strict necessity.[52]

b. Ways Created by Sale by Reference to Map or Plat or Bounding on Road or Highway — (1) Sale by Reference to Map or Plan — (A) In General. Where the owner of a tract of land lays it out in streets and lots delineated on a

an incipient dedication to the public, which according to the great weight of authority the grantor cannot revoke, although there has been no formal acceptance by the public authorities, or by user by the general public.[54] Notwithstanding the fact the streets are never used or accepted by the public, the purchasers nevertheless acquire the same right in the streets so described as against the grantor and each other as they would if they were in fact public streets. removal of the soil therefrom in front of his premises clearly amounts to a trespass for which he may have an action for damages.[57] So also the words "rights, liberties, privileges and appurtenances" are sufficient to create a right of common when the deed refers to a plat and papers which show that a right of common in a described lot is annexed to the land.[58]

(B) Grant of Municipal Corporation. So where a municipal corporation acting through its properly constituted authorities sells or conveys a town or city lot bounded by streets or alleys marked out on a plat, and the grantee enters upon it and expends money in improving it he is entitled to a right of way over such street or alley as appurtenant to the land and any subsequent conveyance by his grantor of the portions of such street or alley by which the grantee's lot is bounded will be held void.[59] But the rule is different where the plat is made by municipal officers whose powers in the premises are limited and defined by statute; for if they exceed their authority, no estoppel can arise, inasmuch as every person is presumed to know the nature and extent of the powers of municipal officers and therefore cannot be deemed to have been deceived or misled by acts done without legal authority.[60]

(C) Extent of Right — (1) IN GENERAL. The right acquired by a purchaser of land sold by reference to a map or plat is not merely coextensive with the land conveyed, or necessarily merely so with the street upon which it abuts. It may extend over such other streets and avenues designated on the plat by reference to which the land was sold as are reasonably necessary to afford the grantee a convenient way to a public street or highway as far as the grantor's title extends.[61] And indeed it has been held that where a sale of lots is made by reference to a public map of a town every purchaser of a lot takes as appurtenant thereto, every advantage, privilege, and easement represented on the map or plat as belonging to it and is entitled so far as any interference by the grantor is concerned to have all streets remain public which were designated as such on the plat.[62] And if under such circumstances the purchaser's lot be bounded by a cul

Where the owner of land in a city constructs a road therein, and designates it as a street in a plat, laying out the tract in lots, and reserves such street in the sale of the lots, an owner of a lot so sold has an easement in the entire way so created, as against the owners of the other lots so sold, which is violated by the obstruction of the way, although the city never accepts the way as a street. Collins v. Buffalo Furnace Co., 73 N. Y. App. Div. 22, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 420.

Where the owner of land in a city made a plat thereof on which was designated a street named W Place, connecting at its western end with a public street, but terminating at its eastern end on the land of such owner and not connecting with any other street, and the city expressly refused to accept such plat, but the owner nevertheless graded W Place and sold lots thereon, but afterward he and his grantees of the land abutting on the eastern third of W Place treated such portion as private property and were compelled by the city to pay assessments upon it as such for the opening and improvement of another street and such eastern portion of W Place was never used by the public as a highway and had been fenced off from the western portion before plaintiff acquired title by mesne conveyance to a lot fronting on the latter, it was held that such eastern portion of W Place never became a public street and that plaintiff had no right to remove the fence, or to have it abated as a nuisance. It should be observed that section 2204 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin declares that no covenant shall be implied in any conveyance of real estate, whether such conveyance contains special covenants or not, due account of which was taken by the majority of the court in this decision. de sac he has a right to have the whole of it kept open and not merely that part which is necessary for his use in reaching some other highway.[63] The purchasers acquire a legal right to have the streets kept open to the full width delineated on the map.[64] Although it has been held that the purchaser of a lot calling to bind on a street not yet opened by the public authorities is entitled to a right of way over it, if it be of the lands of his vendor, to its full extent and dimensions, only until it reaches some other street or public way,[65] and is not entitled to such right of way at all if his lot fronts on another street which is opened.[66] And generally there are limits to the easements raised in this way by implication. A reference to a plan laying out a large tract of land does not necessarily give every purchaser of a lot a right of way over every street laid down upon it. Although a grantee is sometimes entitled to have ways kept open which his land does not touch if they are necessary or convenient in order to reach a highway, he acquires no right of way by implication over streets which his land does not touch and which do not lead to a public street or highway.[67] In determining whether or not a conveyance of a lot in which an unopened and unused street, the fee of which is in the grantor, is named as a boundary is a dedication of the street to the public, or conveys an easement over it to the grantee, the controlling question is the intention of the parties. Illustration.— Where the owner of property filed a map thereof, which stated that the streets and avenues designated thereon were shown for convenience in description only, and not with the intent of dedicating the same to public use, and after the conveyance of certain blocks as shown on said map the owner executed a declaration to the effect that the indorsement on the map was not intended to restrict the free use of the said streets and avenues by the grantee of said block, his heirs and assigns for the purpose of access and egress to and from any of the lots designated on the map or mentioned in the deed, it was held that the declaration gave lot-owners, purchasers from such grantee, a right of necessity over the streets on which their lot abutted, so far as to enable them to reach the next open street, but that they acquired no easements over other streets to which it has been put, and all the attendant facts and circumstances should also be considered in connection with the terms of the deed.[68] Such a grant contains an implied covenant that a street has been laid out, but not that it has been graded or rendered fit for travel.[69] And the grantor is not bound to grade and work the way so that it shall be fit for travel, unless he has promised to do so.[70] If, however, he has made such a promise, it may be proved by parol evidence.[71]

(2) WHETHER FEE TO SOIL PASSES. Unless there are express words to the contrary such grants convey also the fee of the soil to the center of the street or alley subject to the right of way of the grantor and those claiming under him; for the presumption of ownership ad medium filum viæ, in the absence of proof to the contrary, applies to private as well as to public ways.[72] But if there are express words in the deed showing an intent not to grant title to the soil of the streets or dedicate the same to the public, the grantee acquires only a way of necessity over so much of the street as is necessary to gain access to and egress from his lot.[73]

(II) SALE OF LAND BOUNDED BY ROAD. Where a grantor conveys land by a deed describing it as bounded by a road the fee of which is vested in the grantor and which is mentioned or referred to in the deed, the grantee acquires a right of way over the road.[74] This it has been held is true, whether the road is in exist-

Presumption as to grantor's intent.—"In the construction of deeds, where lands are bounded on or by a way, either public or private, the law presumes it to be the intention of the grantor to convey the fee of the land to the centre of the way, if his title extends so far. This presumption is of course controlled, whenever there are words used in the description showing a different intention. But it has been held that giving measurement, in the deed, of side lines, which reach only to the outer line of the way, are not alone sufficient to overcome it." ence or is to be made by the grantor over lands retained by him,[75] and it is sufficient that the beneficial use of the premises requires the use of the way. Such use need not be in absolnte necessity.[76]

(III) Whether Private Easement Survives Public Easement. There is some controversy as to whether the private right of way in grantees holding by conveyances bounding their lands on streets and highways is merged in the public right when the dedication is consummated by a public acceptance, or whether it is merely suspended thereby and will revive if the public right is afterward abandoned.[77] According to one view when the public right attaches the preceding private right is thereby extinguished, and if the public right is subsequently surrendered the owners of adjoining property take the land to the middle of the street discharged of all right of way. In other words the grantees of lots bounded by a street or streets take by their deeds no private right of way in and over the public street distinct from and independent of the public right of way.[78] But according to the better opinion if the road be a public highway the easement so granted survives the extinguishment of the public easement by the discontinuance of the highway by act of law; for these private easements are independent of the public easement, and are in their nature as indestructible by acts of the public authorities or of the grantor of the premises as is the estate itself which is the subject of the grant.[79] And if a man grant land bounding expressly on the side of the highway, so that the title to the soil under the highway remains in him and the highway is discontinued by competent authority, the grantor cannot so use the soil of the highway as to defeat his grantee's right of way, or render it substantially less beneficial; whether this should be deemed to operate as an implied grant, warranty, covenant, or an estoppel is immaterial, for the right itself is inferred from that great principle of construction that every grant and covenant shall be so construed as to secure to the grantee the benefits intended to be conferred by the grant and that the grantor shall do nothing to defeat or essentially impair his grant.[80] But a right of way by necessity is construed strictly, and it has been held that such a right of way acquired by the grantee of a lot of land to a highway crossing an adjoining lot of the grantor, terminates at

Land bounded by road which is closed.— Where a grantor bounds his land by a road which the grantee knows is closed, he does not convey an easement in it, unless there is an express covenant in regard to it in the deed. King v. New York, 102 N. Y. 171, 6 N. E. 395.

Y. 65, 73, was ejectment to recover a strip of land which by construction of a street under the direction of the public authorities remained between the new and the original street lines. Defendant was the owner of the abutting property and took possession up to the new street line and plaintiff claiming as the owner of the soil of the street sought to eject him. It was held that by the original grant of the lot to defendant's predecessor in the title its boundary was confined to the exterior line of the street, but that he had the right to an easement of which he could not be deprived and which consisted in the right to have the space of ground left open forever as a street and to use the way for every purpose that may be usual and reasonable for the accommodation of the granted premises. Plaintiff's recovery it will be seen was a barren one, for, although it obtained a judgment that the fee was in it, the judgment subjected it to defendant's easement. The original grant was of premises as shown upon a map of the block made by the grantors on which streets were designated, and while that circumstance entered into the discussion of the question of defendant's right to an easement, nevertheless it was laid down by Allen, J., as a general rule that "when land is granted bounded on a street or highway there is an implied covenant that there is such a way, that so far as the grantor is concerned it shall be continued, and that the grantee, his heirs and assigns shall have the benefit of it."

the side of the highway, and when that is discontinued and a new highway laid out beyond it over the grantor's lot it will not be enlarged so as to enable the grantee to use the discontinued portion for the purpose of reaching the new highway, his remedy being a claim for damages for the destruction of his easement.[81]

c. Right of Use of Park or Open Square. Land represented on a map or plat as a park, public square, or common, with reference to which the adjacent lots are sold, is irrevocably dedicated to the public for the use designated, and the purchasers of adjoining lots acquire as appurtenant thereto a vested right to have the space so designated kept open for the purpose and to the full extent which the designation imports. The sale and conveyance of lots according to such plat implies a covenant that the land so designated shall never be appropriated by the owner or his successors in interest to any use inconsistent with that represented on the original map.[82] And the purchaser of an adjoining lot acquires such an easement in the park or public square in front of it as entitles him to proceed in equity to prevent by injunction the appropriation of the park or square to any use other than that designated on the map or plat by reference to which he purchased his lot. He is not a mere volunteer seeking to enforce the rights of the public; he has a special interest of his own to protect.[83]

d. Right to Water Through Pipes or Conduits. If the owner of land devises a system of pipes or conduits through which water is conveyed from a spring on one portion of his premises to another portion for the benefit of the latter, and then alienates the portion to which the water is thus conveyed the right to receive water through such pipes or conduits over the land not conveyed will pass to the grantee by general words.[84]

a plan on which a public street is laid out as one of the boundaries and a conveyance describing the lot as a lot on W street, as the same shall be opened and bounded on the south by W street, does not create a covenant on which the grantors are liable where the street was subsequently vacated by legislative authority, and the grantors entered upon and occupied the land over which it was laid out. e. Milling Rights. By conveyance of a mill the whole right of water enjoyed by the grantor as necessary to its use passes along with it as a necessary incident.[85] So also by the grant or reservation of a mill the land under it and so much of the adjacent land as is necessary for its use and commonly used with it will pass or be reserved by implication, unless there is in the conveyance language indicating a different intention.[86]

VI. TRANSFER OF THE RIGHT.

A. Passes as Appurtenant to Dominant Estate. Where an easement is annexed as appurtenant to land it passes as an appurtenance with a conveyance upon demurrer, that if one erect a house and build a conduit thereto in another part of his land, and convey water by pipes to the house, and afterward sell the house with the appurtenances, excepting the land, or all the land to another, reserving to himself the house, the conduit and pipes pass with the house; because it is necessary, and quasi-appendant thereto; and he shall have liberty by law to dig in the land for amending the pipes or making them new, as the case may require. So it is if a lessee for years of a house and land erect a conduit upon the land, and after the term determines the lessor occupies them together for a time, and afterward sells the house with the appurtenances to one and the land to another, the vendee shall have the conduit and pipes, and liberty to amend them. So in Toothe v. Bryce, 50 N. J. Eq. 589, 25 Atl. 182, it appeared that complainant contracted to purchase from defendant and that defendant contracted to convey to complainant a tract of land, which was part of a larger tract owned by him, by deed, to be delivered and the price paid at a future day and at a place distant from the premises. At the date of the contract and thence until it was executed there were upon the premises conveyed a dwelling, stable, and greenhouse, the two latter of which were supplied with continuous streams of water forced up through an underground pipe from two hydraulic rams driven by the waters of a spring on the part of the land retained by defendant. This feature was seen by complainant and formed an item of value in his estimation of the property. Nothing was said at any time between the parties as to this flow of water. Defendant gave orders to his employees on the premises to stop the flow of water on the morning of the delivery of the deed and he stopped it at the stable about ten o'clock and at the greenhouse about three o'clock. The deed was delivered at eleven o'clock. It was held that the flow of water so driven up by the rams was an apparent and continuous easement which passed with the land conveyed as necessary for the beneficial use of the premises and with it as a secondary easement the right to enter upon the land retained to repair and maintain the rams and that defendant did not alter complainant's rights by stopping the flow at the barn just before the delivery of the deed.

Limitation of rule.—At the time defendant conveyed a part of his land to plaintiff's predecessor with the appurtenances thereto, a fish-pond on the part so conveyed was supplied with water conducted from springs on the adjoining lot by conduits, some of which were on land retained by defendant and others on land which he had previously conveyed to a third person. Subsequently defendant regained title to the latter tract and then diverted the water from the pond by destroying all the conduits. It was held that such act was not unlawful in respect to the conduits on the land not owned by defendant when plaintiff took his deed. Spencer v. Kilmer, 151 N. Y. 390, 45 N. E. 865.

Use of word "appurtenances" in conveyance.—A water right passes by the word, "appurtenances," which is considered as comprehensive of the water right as if the privilege of using the water had been expressly inserted in the conveyance, even though the vendor declared when he executed the conveyance that he neither bought nor sold the water right. Pickering v. Stapler, 5 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 107, 9 Am. Dec. 336. And see Blaine v. Chambers, 1 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 169.

By the conveyance of a mill eo nomine no other land passes in fee except the land under the mill and its overhanging projections, but the term "mill" may include the free use of the head of water existing at the time of its conveyance, or any other easement which has been used with it and which is necessary to its enjoyment. Blake v. Clark, 6 Me. 436.

By the conveyance of a sawmill and the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, the land on which the mill stands and as much as is necessary for its use passes by the deed with the mill. Maddox v. Goddard, 15 Me. 218, 33 Am. Dec. 604.

Sheppard Touchstone, p. 89, says: "By the grant of mills, the waters, flood gates and the like that are of necessary use to the mill do pass."

A grant or a reservation of a house, mill, or other building annexed to land and to be used while thus annexed includes the land under it and not a mere easement therein. Esty v. Currier, 98 Mass. 500; Johnson v. Rayner, 6 Gray (Mass.) 107; Stockwell v.

or devise of the dominant estate and need not be specifically mentioned in the deed or will.[87] And according to one view this is true, although it may not be necessary to the beneficial enjoyment of the land by the grantee or devisee.[88] It has been held, however, that an easement of convenience merely does not pass by implication.[89]

B. Severance From Dominant Estate. A pure easement can exist only as an appurtenance to land, and it follows that an existing easement cannot be severed from the land to which it is appurtenant and made the subject of a separate grant or a reservation.[90]

VII. TERMINATION AND REVIVAL OF LOST RIGHT.

A. Abandonment and Non-User — 1. By Acts In Pais. A party entitled to a right of way or other mere easement in the land of another may abandon and extinguish such right by acts in pais and without deed or other instrument in writing.[91] The act or acts relied on, however, to effect such a result must be of a

Thus in Jennison v. Walker, 11 Gray (Mass.) 423, it was held that the non-user of an easement created by grant by the owners of the dominant estate for more than thirty years united with a use of the servient estate inconsistent with and adverse to the existence of the easement during that period of time was sufficient decisive character.[92] And whether a party has abandoned his right to an easement is a question of fact for the determination of the jury.[93] An abandonment is to be more readily presumed where the easement is granted for the public benefit than where it is held for private use, otherwise an inactive corporation might deprive the public of useful and beneficial improvements.[94]

2. By Non-User — a. In General. Non-user for a period sufficient to create an easement by prescription will raise a presumption to defeat the right.[95] But this non-user is open to explanation and may be controlled by proof that the owner had no intention to abandon his easement while thus omitting to use it.[96] Abandonment is a question of intention and to constitute an abandonment the facts or circumstances must clearly indicate such an intention. Non-user is a fact in determining it, but, although continued for twenty years or more, is not conclusive evidence in itself of an abandonment.[97]

b. Where Easement Was Acquired by Prescription. But some of the cases make a distinction where the easement has been acquired by prescription. Thus it has been held that if the right to a road be acquired by adverse user for twenty years, its non-user for a like space of time with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner of the inheritance will extinguish the right so acquired, because such cesser to use the road affords legitimate presumption of a release of the right.[98] There would seem to be no good reason for this distinction, as prescription is based on the presumption of a grant.[99] But irrational as it may seem it has been adopted by statute in some of the states and territories wherein it is in substance provided that a servitude acquired by enjoyment is to justify the inference that the right originally conveyed by grant had been released and extinguished by a subsequent non-appearing deed.

What does not amount to abandonment.— A city having acquired an easement for a slope for a street grade, the erection of a retaining wall by the city does not of itself establish an abandonment of the easement. Kuschke v. St. Paul, 45 Minn. 225, 47 N. W. 786. So where defendant had for more than thirty years used a passway over plaintiff's land it was held that his right to the way by prescription was not affected by the fact that for a short time he discontinued the use of a part of the passway by going over his own land. Bowen v. Cooper, 66 S. W. 601, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 2065.

What amounts to abandonment.— Where windows to which an easement of air and light pertains had been permanently closed for more than forty years and no effort to reopen them had been made, it was held that equity would not enjoin the erection of a building on an adjoining lot which would interfere with such easement if it still existed. extinguished by disuse by the owner for the period prescribed for acquiring title by enjoyment.[1]

c. Where Easement Was Created by Grant. However this may be mere non-user of an easement created by deed for a period however long will not amount to an abandonment. To show this there must be acts of the owner showing an intention to abandon or an adverse user by the owner of the servient estate acquiesced in by the owner of the dominant estate.[2] Nothing short of a use by the owner of the servient estate which is adverse to the enjoyment of the easement by the owner thereof for a period sufficient to create a prescriptive right will destroy the right granted.[3]

Application of rule.— Where the grantee under a deed is by the same instrument given an easement in land adjoining, his mere acquiescence in the occupancy and control of such land by others for a shorter period than twenty years, unaccompanied by other and active evidences of an intention to abandon the same, will not of itself constitute an abandonment of the easement and estop him from claiming a right thereto. Right to dig ore.— In the case of a grant by deed of the right to dig ore in the land of another, the mere neglect of the grantee for forty years to exercise his right without any act of adverse enjoyment on the part of the owner of the land will not extinguish such right, and the occupation and cultivation of the land by the owner during such period are not evidence of adverse enjoyment to the required by the statute of limitations for the perfection of the easement raises no presumption of an abandonment.[4] It seems, however, to be settled that when the non-user is accompanied by acts manifesting a clear intention to abandon, and which destroy the object for which the easement was created or the means of its enjoyment, an abandonment will take place.[5] A cesser of the use, coupled with any act clearly indicative of an intention to abandon the right, will have the same effect as an express release of the easement without any reference whatever to time,[6] and in case of continuous easements, or those of which the enjoyment is or may be continued, without the necessity of any interference of man, the presumption of their abandonment may arise from a period of time much less than it will take to acquire them.[7]

B. Merger by Unity of Title — 1. In General. An owner of land cannot have an easement in his own estate in fee, for the plain and obvious reason that in having the jus disponendi — the full and unlimited right and power to make any and every possible use of the land — all subordinate and inferior derivative rights are necessarily merged and lost in the higher right.[8] Accordingly when the owner of an estate enjoys an easement over another and acquires title to the Littledale, J., said: "I think, that if a party does any act to show that he abandons his right to the benefit of that light and air which he once had, he may lose his right in a much less period than twenty years. If a man pulls down a house, and does not make any use of the land for two or three years, or converts it into tillage, I think he may be taken to have abandoned all intention of rebuilding the house; and, consequently, that his right to the light has ceased."

latter the easement is thereby extinguished.[9] Where an easement exists in favor of the owners of several parcels of land, and one of them acquires title to the servient estate, there is a merger as to his interests; but this does not affect the rights of the owners of the other parcels of land.[10] But the owner of an easement does not by asserting his right to the fee of the servient estate and by taking possession of it destroy his right to the easement. No acts of such owner will extinguish his right save those that indicate an intention to abandon them.[11] If one who has a right of common appurtenant purchase part of the land subject to the easement all his right of common is extinguished.[12]

2. NECESSITY FOR ESTATES OF SAME DIGNITY. Upon principle it seems that in order to extinguish an easement by the unity of title and possession of both the dominant and servient tenements in the same person, he should have a permanent and enduring estate, an estate in fee in both. At any rate, to perpetuate the extinguishment incident to unity of possession, the estates thus united must be respectively equal in duration and all other qualities, and not liable to be again disjoined by the act of the law.[13]

When unity of ownership merely suspends easement.— Where a right of way has been created by deed and it has been open, visible, and necessary and in continuous use for nearly twenty-five years, except during a brief interval when both the dominant and servient estates became united in the same owner who for his convenience took a shorter route, such unity of ownership does not extinguish the right of way, but merely suspends it, and when both estates have subsequently been conveyed without reference to it by deeds absolute, it is revived and must be read into them. Applications of rule.—Where the mortgagor of a dominant tenement becomes the owner in fee of the servient tenement, the unity of the two estates does not extinguish the easement so as to affect the rights of one claiming an interest in the easement under a foreclosure of the mortgage on the dominant tenement in which the easement was expressly included. Duval v. Becker, 81 Md. 537, 32 Atl. 308. So where a person holds land by a defective title and an easement in

3. Severance After Merger. If therefore after such merger by the unity of title to the dominant and servient estates the owner grants the former dominant estate to another it passes without the former incidents unless they are revived by force of the grant itself, by such words of description as could bring them into being by way of new grant.[14] But although the old easement is not revived by the severance, yet if the necessity continues a new easement will be granted by implication upon the same principle and under the same circumstances that easements are granted by implication upon the severance of an estate originally entire.[15] No easement exists so long as the unity of possession remains, because the owner of the whole cannot have an easement in his own property, and he may at any time rearrange the quality of the several servitudes; but upon severance by the sale of a part the right of the owner to redistribute ceases and easements or servitudes are created corresponding to the benefits or burdens existing at the time of sale.[16]

C. By Act of God or Operation of Law. An easement may be extinguished by the act of God, by operation of law, or by the act of the party.[17] Where an easement is granted to a particular person, to be enjoyed during the continuance of certain conditions, it is extinguished whenever these conditions cease to exist.[18]

D. Termination of Title to Dominant Estate. If an easement is appurtenant merely to an estate for life[19] or for years[20] the right ceases upon the termination of that estate; but if appurtenant to the land itself and not to the particular estate it will remain as an appurtenance to the reversion.[21]

tion of that estate may claim the right so far as it is applicable to his part of the property, provided the right can be enjoyed as to the separate parcels without any additional burden upon the servient estate;[22] accordingly a right of way which is appurtenant to an estate is appurtenant to every part of it, no matter into how many parts it may be subdivided, and it inures to the benefit of the owners of all subdivisions so situated that it can be used.[23] And a right of common of pasture appendant or appurtenant to an estate is apportionable upon a division of the dominant estate.[24] But where the use will increase the burden upon the servient estate the right to the easement will be extinguished,[25] and therefore common of estovers cannot be apportioned, because it would increase the burden on the servient tenement.[26]

Where tenants in common of an estate to which an easement is appurtenant make a partition thereof and execute mutual deeds of release stipulating that neither the grantor nor his heirs nor any other person claiming under him will ever claim or demand any right or title to such premises or their appurtenances, the easement is extinguished and cannot be revived by a grantee of one cotenant against the other. Where a mortgagor reserves in the mortgage deed the right to release certain easements appurtenant to the mortgaged premises, but the deed also contains a power of sale authorizing the mortgagee upon a breach of conditions to sell and convey the mortgaged estate absolutely and in fee simple, if the power reserved is not executed prior to such sale it will be extinguished by the sale and the purchaser will take the estate with its appurtenant easements. Bull's Petitioner, 15 R. I. 534, 10 Atl. 484.

General covenants of warranty will not be presumed to have relinquished the right to a way of necessity from the part of a tract of land retained by the grantor over the part is within the provisions of the recording acts and if not recorded will not be binding upon a subsequent purchaser of the dominant estate in good faith and without notice of the transaction.[28] A lessee of the dominant estate cannot release an easement appurtenant thereto except to the extent of his own interest.[29] An easement cannot be extinguished or released by a mere unexecuted parol agreement,[30] but an intention on the part of the owner to abandon the right in whole or in part may be so established.[31] A license given by the owner of an easement to the owner of the servient estate to do any act on his land which prevents the further enjoyment of the easement is when executed irrevocable and extinguishes the right to the easement.[32] So if the owner of an easement agrees that the owner of the servient estate may erect an obstruction of a permanent character,[33] or if he agrees that a way to which he is entitled may be closed up and another way substituted,[34] these agreements when carried into effect will extinguish the right. In cases where the law would imply a grant or reservation of a way of necessity the right may be waived by parol agreement at the time of the conveyance.[35] An easement acquired by adverse use will not be defeated by obtaining a license for its further enjoyment,[36] although the application for such license is evidence that the former use was not adverse but permissive.[37]

G. Alterations or Obstructions Inconsistent With Easement. An easement may be extinguished by an act of the owner of the easement which is incompatible with the existence of the right claimed.[38] If the owner of an easement himself obstructs it in a manner inconsistent with its further enjoyment,[39] or permits the owner of the servient estate to do so,[40] the easement will be con-conveyed. McEwan v. Baker, 98 Ill. App. 271.

sidered as abandoned. But to constitute such an abandonment the acts relied on must be of a decisive and conclusive character.[41] So the erection of an obstruction which is not of a material or permanent character,[42] or which constitutes only an occasional interference,[43] or which was erected merely for a temporary purpose,[44] will not constitute an abandonment of the right. An obstruction on the part of the owner of the servient estate to which the owner of the easement does not consent will not extinguish the right.[45] If the owner of an easement so alters the condition of the dominant estate as to necessarily increase the burden upon the servient estate to its injury and without the consent of the owner thereof, it will extinguish the easement;[46] but alterations which do not materially increase the servitude will not extinguish the right.[47]

A judgment in partition establishing a new way extinguishes a former way of necessity. Carey v. Rae, 58 Cal. 159.

The fact that a former way of necessity continues to be the most convenient way will not prevent its extinguishment when it ceases way of necessity acquires other property of his own over which he may pass,[49] or if a public way is laid out which affords access to his premises,[50] his right to the way of necessity ceases. But a mere revocable permission to use a way over the land of another person will not extinguish the right.[51] The rule that the right ceases with necessity has no application to ways acquired by express grant[52] or by prescription.[53]

2. EASEMENT FOR A PARTICULAR PURPOSE. If an easement is granted for a particular purpose the right terminates as soon as the purpose for which it was granted ceases to exist.[54] So if the purpose is abandoned,[55] or its accomplishment is rendered impossible,[56] the right is extinguished.

I. Removal or Destruction of Servient Tenement. Where a piece of land subject to an easement is washed away by the encroachment of a river the easement is extinguished;[57] and where an easement has been granted for a particular purpose in connection with a particular building it is extinguished by a destruction of that building.[58] So a grant of the right to use the hall or stairway of a certain building gives no interest in the soil which will survive a destruction of the building, and the right ceases whenever the building is destroyed without the fault of the owner of the servient estate,[59] and the owner of the easement will not acquire any right in any new building which may be erected in the place of the one destroyed.[60] An easement may survive a partial destruction of the servient tenement if there is anything remaining upon which the dominant tenement may operate.[61] If the easement is of such a nature that its enjoyment is not wholly dependent upon the building with which it is connected, and the reasons for its existence do not cease with the destruction of the building, the right will not be extinguished.[62] A prescriptive right to use a cer-

The fact that in a conveyance of the servient estate it is stated that the estate is subject to a right of way, which right of way is a way of necessity, will not enlarge the right of the owner of the way, which will cease as soon as the way is no longer necessary. J. Forfeiture For Misuser. The right to an easement is not lost by using it in an unauthorized manner[65] or to an unauthorized extent.[66] Such a misuser does not authorize the owner of the servient estate to prevent a further use of the easement by erecting obstructions,[67] or by restraining the owner of the easement by force or violence;[68] the proper remedy being an action on the case for damages.[69]

K. Adverse Possession. The right to an easement may be lost by an occupation on the part of the servient owner adverse to and inconsistent with the right claimed;[70] but the right will not be lost where the occupation is not clearly adverse,[71] or where it is not continued for the period prescribed by statute.[72] The maintenance for the necessary period of an obstruction of a permanent character which prevents the enjoyment of the easement is such an adverse possession,[73] but an obstruction which constitutes only a slight interference and is not in its nature inconsistent with the easement will not extinguish the right.[74]

L. Dedication or Appropriation to Public Use. The right to an easement will be extinguished by a lawful appropriation to a public use of the land where the easement is located,[75] or of other land which will render the enjoyment of the easement impossible.[76] The owner of the servient estate may also make a lawful dedication of a private easement to public use provided the owner of the easement consents,[77] but not otherwise.[78] The action of public authorities in discontinuing a way as a public highway cannot affect any private right of way over the land secured to the owner of adjoining property by contract or otherwise, independently of any action of the public authorities in establishing or maintaining the way as a public highway.[79]

M. Revival of Lost Right.[80] Where an easement is once extinguished the right is forever gone and cannot be revived, and the use can be reëstablished only by the acquisition of a new title;[81] but if the right is merely suspended it may be revived.[82]

VIII. EVIDENCE AND DETERMINATION.

A. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. Where an easement is claimed by prescription the burden is upon the party claiming it to prove the facts essential to the acquisition of a prescriptive title;[83] but proof of an uninterrupted use for the necessary period without evidence to explain how it began raises a presumption that it was adverse and under a claim of right, and the burden is upon the owner of the land, if he relies on such a defense, to show that it was by virtue of some license, indulgence, or agreement inconsistent with the right claimed.[84] Disability on the part of the servient owner to resist an adverse use of his land will not be presumed, and if relied on as a defense to the claim of an easement by prescription, the burden is upon him to establish the fact by a preponderance of evidence.[85] Where there have been interruptions by the owner of the servient estate in the use of an easement the burden is upon the party claiming the easement to show that they were consistent with the right claimed and not of such a character as to prevent his use of the easement from ripening into a prescriptive right.[86] Where a way of necessity is shown to have once existed, the continuance of the necessity will be presumed until the contrary is shown.[87] Where the owner of the servient estate relies upon an abandonment of the easement as a defense to plaintiff's claim, he has the burden of proving the defense;[88] but it has been held that where the servient owner alleges a loss of the right by a prescription of non-usage, it is not incumbent upon him to establish the defense, but that the person claiming the easement must prove a user during the time necessary to prevent the establishment of such prescription.[89] Where the right to an easement is pleaded as a defense to an action for damages, it is an affirmative defense which it is incumbent upon the party claiming the easement to establish.[90]

B. Admissibility — 1. In General. Evidence to be admissible must be pertinent to the allegations of the pleadings and tend to prove or disprove the particular matters in issue.[91] In determining whether the use of a way has been adverse or permissive evidence is admissible of the existence of other ways leading from the premises of the claimant over the land of other persons to the public highway;[92] and it is also competent for a relative of the claimant who is familiar with the location of the way to testify that he was never aware of any adverse claim of right to the use of the way.[93] A plan showing the positions of the different tracts of land and the highway is competent evidence in determining whether a right of way exists by necessity;[94] and evidence of the purchase of other land by the owner of a way of necessity, over which he might have access to the public highway, is admissible to show that his right to the way has ceased to exist.[95] Where an abandonment of an easement by the predecessor in title of the person claiming it is relied on, it is competent for the predecessor to testify as to his intent in doing the acts which are relied on as showing an abandonment.[96] Evidence of interruptions in the use of a way is inadmissible where it does not appear that the person causing the interruptions had any title to the servient estate which has been transmitted to the present owner.[97]

2. Evidence as to Use. Where a right of way is claimed under a grant, evidence of the manner in which it has been used by the grantee is not admissible to establish the right to the way, but is admissible to show the extent and character of the right;[98] and evidence of its use by persons other than the person claiming it is admissible to show the existence of the way and its location.[99] Where a way is claimed by prescription evidence is not admissible on the part of defendant to show a permissive use by other persons not in privity with the present claimant or his grantors,[1] and where a prescriptive right of way is claimed at a particular point evidence is not admissible to show that such persons have been accustomed to cross the land at other and different places;[2] but where a prescriptive right of way is sought to be established by evidence of a beaten visible path made by those from whom the present owner derived title, this evidence may be explained by proof that other people were in the habit of crossing the land at the same place.[3]

3. Acts and Declarations of Former Owners. Declarations of a former owner of the servient estate, if made during his ownership,[4] and which tend to show the existence of the easement claimed are admissible against a subsequent owner;[5] but where they tend to disprove the existence of the easement they are not admissible in his favor.[6] Declarations of a former owner of the dominant estate made during his ownership are admissible to show an abandonment of the easement,[7] and in establishing an easement by prescription evidence of the acts of former owners of the dominant estate is admissible.[8]

which it was made is admissible to show the intention of the parties.[10] Where the proprietor of two estates between which there exists an apparent servitude sells one of the estates, and the deed is silent as to the servitude, its existence may be shown by parol evidence.[11] Parol evidence is also admissible to establish the fact of plaintiff's possession of the dominant estate.[12] The use of an easement may be established by parol evidence,[13] and all agreements in regard to the use of easements may be proven by parol unless it is shown that they were reduced to writing.[14]

C. Sufficiency. If the easement is claimed by prescription proof of the adverse user may be by circumstantial as well as direct evidence, and no greater amount of proof is required than is necessary to prove other facts in civil cases.[15] It is unnecessary to give direct evidence of the actual use of an easement during every year of the period necessary to establish a prescriptive title, if the circumstances are such as to satisfy the jury that the use was continuous.[16] The presumption of a grant arising from the uninterrupted enjoyment of an easement for the period necessary to establish a prescriptive title may be overcome by evidence contradicting or explaining the facts upon which it rests,[17] but not by evidence that no grant was in fact made.[18] Where an easement is claimed by virtue of an express grant, the rights of the parties must be ascertained from the deed itself.[19] Where an easement is claimed under a lost grant, the proof of its contents must be clear, strong, and convincing.[20] Where a way is claimed by necessity, proof that plaintiff has purchased other land, over which he may have access to the public highway is sufficient to show that the way claimed is not a way of necessity.[21] A judgment for plaintiff in an action for disturbing a right of way is sufficient evidence of the existence of his right to the way at the time the judgment was rendered.[22] Proof that the owner of land over which another has a right of way did not object when the owner of the way used a different route from the one to which he was entitled is not sufficient to establish an agreement to substitute the route used for the other.[23] Where an abandonment of an easement is relied on there must be clear and convincing proof of an intention to abandon it as such.[24]

19. Voorhees v. Burchard, 6 Lans. (N. An exception in a covenant against encumbrances of "such rights of way, if any, as may exist of record," is not an admission

D. Questions of Law and Fact. What constitutes an easement or a right thereto is a question of law, but whether the facts necessary to the existence of the right have been proved is a question of fact for the jury.[25] Whether a person is estopped by his acts from contesting another's right to an easement is a question of law for the court.[26] Where an easement is claimed by prescription, the questions whether the character of its use has been adverse or permissive,[27] and whether a prescriptive right has in fact been acquired by such use[28] are questions of fact for the jury under proper instructions from the court as to the nature of adverse possession.[29] Whether an easement has been abandoned by the owner,[30] or in the case of a prescriptive right, whether it has been lost by nonuser,[31] are questions of fact for the jury. Where there have been interruptions by the owner of the servient estate to the use of an easement claimed by prescription, it is a question for the jury whether under the circumstances of the case they were of such a character as to have defeated the acquisition of the claimant's right.[32] Where a private right of way is pleaded as a defense to an action of trespass the existence of the right is a question of fact for the jury.[33] If there is any evidence which is reasonably sufficient to authorize the jury to find the fact to which it is pertinent, it must be left to them to determine its credibility, force, and effect.[34] determined by the user in which it originated,[35] and cannot be extended except by a user which has been acquiesced in for the requisite length of time,[36] or where additional rights have been acquired by some other title.[37] Where an easement is claimed under a prescriptive right, but the occupation is substantially in accordance with a grant or reservation, it will be presumed to be held under the grant or reservation, and the extent of the right will be limited by the terms of that instrument.[38]

b. Easements by Express Grant. Easements by express grant or reservation must be limited to the matters contained in the deed.[39] Nothing passes by implication as incident to the grant except what is reasonably necessary to its fair enjoyment.[40] The extent of the rights acquired must therefore depend upon the construction placed upon the terms of the grant,[41] and in construing such instruments the court will look to the circumstances attending the transaction, the situation of the parties, and the state of the thing granted to ascertain the intention of the parties.[42] In cases of doubt the grant must be taken most strongly against the grantor.[43]

The owner of the way may erect railings when necessary to render the way safe, provided they do not interfere with the rights determining the extent of the way granted the grant will be construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances to give effect to the intention of the parties.[46]

b. Ways of Necessity. In the case of ways of necessity the extent of the right is limited by the necessity which creates it,[47] and cannot be extended to suit the convenience of the owner beyond what is actually necessary.[48]

c. Ways Not Touching Land Conveyed. The reference in a deed to a plan laying out a large tract does not give every purchaser of a lot a right of way over every street laid down upon it,[49] but only over such ways as have an immediate connection with the property conveyed,[50] except in the case of an interior lot, in which case the grantee is entitled to use such other connecting ways indicated upon the plan as may be necessary for the purpose of reaching public highways.[51]

d. Width of Ways. In determining the width of a way a grant will be construed with reference to the place in which the way is granted and the circumstances under which the grant was made.[52] Thus where a way is granted over a piece of land of a certain stated width it will depend upon the circumstances of the case whether the reference is to the width of the way,[53] or is merely descriptive of the property over which the grantee may have such a way as may be reasonably necessary.[54] The grant of a right of way without stating its width will be held to be a suitable and convenient way,[55] what is suitable and convenient being dependent upon the circumstances of the case.[56] If the grant merely states the object for which the way is granted the dimensions must be inferred to be such as are reasonably sufficient for the accomplishment of that object.[57] If the grantee at the time of the grant practically locates the width by the erection of fences or other structures, and this location is acquiesced in by the grantor, it will operate as an assignment of the way and have the same legal effect as if its width had been fixed by the deed.[58]

3. Easements For Light, Air, and View. The extent of the right to light, air, and view when claimed under an express grant or reservation, must depend entirely upon the construction of the terms of the conveyance.[59] In the absence of an express grant or reservation there is no particular amount of light or air to which the law can say a building is entitled,[60] and the right must be limited by whatever is reasonably necessary for the purposes of habitation or business, due regard being paid to usage and the circumstances of the particular case.[61]

4. Secondary Easements. The express grant of a particular right carries with it by implication the additional right, sometimes called a secondary easement, of doing whatever is reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the right granted.[62]

B. Location — 1. Who May Locate. If the grant of an easement does not fix its location, the owner of the servient estate has the right in the first instance to designate the location, and in the event of his failure to do so, it may be selected by the owner of the easement; but in either case the location must be a reasonable one.[63]

In Louisiana under Rev. Civ. Code, art. 779, if the location of an easement is not fixed

The same rule applies to the location of easements by necessity, such as ways of necessity.[64]

2. Location of Ways by Express Grant. In determining the location of a way by express grant the court will give effect to the intention of the parties as disclosed by the surrounding circumstances, provided such intention is not inconsistent with the language of the grant.[65] The words of the grant will be taken according to their common meaning, unless it appears that the parties intended to use them in a different sense.[66] If no location is specified in the grant, a reasonably convenient and suitable location will be implied.[67]

3. Ways Existing at Time of Grant. When a right of way is granted over certain land without fixing its location, but there is a way already located at the time of the grant, this will be held to be the location of the way granted,[68] and the grantee cannot be compelled to accept a substitute therefor.[69]

4. Ways of Necessity. The owner of the land over which a way of necessity is to pass has the right to determine its location,[70] subject to the restriction that the way located must be reasonably convenient;[71] but in the event of his failure to do so the person entitled to the way may make the location.[72] The fact that the owner of the servient estate has himself formerly used a particular way will not prevent his assigning any other practical and convenient way.[73] In some jurisdictions the location of ways of necessity is regulated by statute.[74]

Under the Louisiana statute the way should be located on the side where the distance is shortest to the public road and at the place least injurious to the person on whose estate it is granted (Adams v. Harrison, 4 La. Ann. 165; Miller v. Thompson, 3 La. Ann. 567; Broussard v. Etie, 11 La. 394), due regard being paid at the same time to the interest of the other party (Littlejohn v. Cox, 15 La. Ann. 67).

5. Location by Agreement of Parties. Where the grant of a way does not designate its location, the location may be subsequently fixed by an express agreement of the parties,[75] or by an implied agreement arising out of the use of a particular way by the grantee and acquiescence on the part of the grantor.[76] The location thus determined will have the same legal effect as if it had been fully described by the terms of the grant.[77]

6. Change of Location — a. In General. The location of an easement cannot be changed by either party without the other's consent, after it has been once established either by the express terms of the grant[78] or by the acts of the parties.[79]

b. Ways. The location of a way when once established cannot be changed by either party without the other's consent,[80] except under the authority of an express grant or reservation to this effect.[81] It is competent, however, for the owner of the land and the person having a right of way over it to change the route or location of the way by mutual consent,[82] and such consent may be implied from their acts and acquiescence.[83]

C. Use — 1. Easements by Express Grant — a. In General. Where an easement exists by express grant its use must be confined to the terms and purposes of the grant.[86] And it must further be used in a reasonable manner and so as not unnecessarily to injure the rights of the other party.[87] The extent of the use, when unlimited by the grant, must be governed by what is reasonable and customary in such cases.[88]

grant is for a particular purpose he cannot use it for any other,[90] or if it is granted for the benefit of some particular land, it cannot be used to accommodate some other tract of land adjoining or lying beyond.[91] In determining the uses contemplated by the grant the court will look to the surrounding circumstances to ascertain the intention of the parties,[92] and in the absence of facts indicating a contrary intention it will be presumed that the parties intended the words of the grant to be taken according to their ordinary meaning.[93] Where a way is granted or reserved without any limitation as to its use it will not necessarily be confined to the purposes for which the land was used at the time the way was created,[94] but may be used for any purpose to which the land accommodated by the way may naturally and reasonably be devoted.[95] It may be used for all the ordinary purposes of a way,[96] subject to the general rule that the use must be reasonable;[97] but it cannot be used for any other separate and distinct purpose.[98] What shall be deemed a reasonable and proper use of a way depends largely on the local situation and on public usage,[99] and also upon the nature and condition of the premises over which the way is granted.[1] right was established. The unauthorized use of the easement beyond the limits prescribed for does not, however, in any way affect the lesser rights actually acquired.[4]

b. Ways. The use of ways by prescription is limited to the user by which the right was created.[5] If the way has been used for a particular purpose it cannot be subsequently used for any other.[6] If it has been used for a variety of purposes covering generally all the purposes required by the dominant estate, it may be used for all the purposes which may reasonably be required for the use of that estate while substantially in the same condition;[7] but if the condition and character of the dominant estate are substantially altered the right of way cannot be used for new purposes required by the altered condition of the property and imposing a greater burden upon the servient estate.[8]

3. Who May Use. The owner of a way is not limited to its use by himself, but it may be used by his servants or employees in conducting his business, or he may permit persons transacting business with him to use it.[9] The grant of a right of way to a married woman for life includes her husband and the members of her family residing with her.[10] Where a way is appurtenant to an estate it may be used by those who own or lawfully occupy any part thereof,[11] and by all persons lawfully going to or from such premises, whether they be mentioned in the grant or not.[12]

4. Rights of Owner of Servient Estate. The owner of the servient estate may use his property in any manner and for any purpose consistent with the enjoyment of the easement.[13] Thus in the case of a way the owner of the servient estate may use the land over which it passes in any manner which does not materially impair or unreasonably interfere with its use as a way.[14] He may himself use it as a

The same legal rights apply to subterranean ways as to surface ways, and the owner of coal lands through which another has a right of way may cross that way by an entry if he does not substantially interfere with the use way,[15] or may permit others to do so,[16] unless the rights of the owner of the easement are exclusive.[17] The owner of the servient estate cannot, however, make any use of his property incompatible with the existence of the easement by which, under an adverse holding for the statutory period, the easement would be defeated.[18]

5. Use Unconnected With Dominant Estate. An easement can be used only in connection with the estate to which it is appurtenant and cannot be extended by the owner to any other property which he may then own or afterward acquire.[19] A right of way cannot be used by the owner of the dominant tenement to pass to other land adjacent to or beyond that to which the easement is appurtenant,[20] and so cannot be extended by him to accommodate land which he did not own at the time the right of way was acquired.[21]

D. Maintenance and Repairs — 1. Duty to Maintain and Repair — a. In General. b. Maintenance of Gates and Fences. In the absence of any stipulation in the grant or agreement to this effect the owner of the servient estate is under no obligation to construct fences along the course of a way,[26] or to erect gates across the same,[27] for the benefit of the owner of the way. He may, however, subject to certain restrictions, erect such gates and fences for his own convenience and the protection of his property.[28] It is the duty of the owner of the way to close and fasten such gates after he has passed through, and on his failure to do so he may be enjoined from using the way,[29] and will be liable for any damages resulting thereby to the servient estate.[30] He will also be liable in an action of trespass removing or injuring the gates.[31]

2. Right to Make Repairs. enlarged.[34] This includes a right of entry upon the servient estate for the purpose of making repairs whenever such repairs are necessary,[35] but at no other time and for no other purpose.[36]

E. Alterations. Ordinarily when the character and location of an easement are once definitely fixed, no material changes can be made by either party without the other's consent.[37] If, however, at the time of the grant the condition of the place where the right is to be exercised is unfit for the purposes of the grant, the grantee may make such alterations as will render the grant effectual;[38] and if the condition of the surrounding property is subsequently changed by lawful authority so as to interfere with the enjoyment of the easement, he may make such alterations as will render it effectual under the new conditions.[39] Where there are several owners in common of an easement neither one can make any alterations which will render it less convenient and useful to any appreciable extent to any one of the others.[40] The owner of the servient estate, while he may use his property in any manner consistent with the existence of the easement,[41] cannot make any alterations in his property by which the enjoyment of the easement will be materially interfered with.[42] The owner of the easement may, however, by acquiescing in the alteration, be deemed to have consented thereto.[43]

F. Obstructions and Disturbance — 1. In General. An obstruction or disturbance of an easement is anything which wrongfully interferes with the privilege to which the owner of the easement is entitled by making its use less convenient and beneficial than before.[44] To constitute an actionable wrong it must, however, be of a material character such as will interfere with the reasonable enjoyment of the easement.[45]

Where a way is only used occasionally and for a particular purpose it is not necessarily an obstruction for the owner of the land to cultivate the same or to erect a fence across the way, where he offers to remove it whenever it is necessary to use the way. McTavish v. Carroll, 7 Md. 352, 61 Am. Dec. 353.

right to erect any buildings or other structures on or adjacent to the way.[46] One of several owners in common has the right as against the other owners in common to erect such structures for his own benefit as do not interfere with the exercise of the others' rights.[47] The rights of the owner of the servient estate in this regard are limited to the erection of such structures as are compatible with the rights of those entitled to use the way.[48] If by the terms of the grant or reservation the way must be of a certain width, no structures can be erected which encroach upon the width stated.[49] But where there is merely a general undefined right of way, it is only necessary that there should be sufficient space left to afford a convenient passage.[50]

3. Extending Structures Over Ways. Except in cases where there is an agreement or stipulation in the grant or reservation to the contrary,[51] the owner of the servient estate may extend buildings or other structures over a way, provided in so doing he does not interfere with the free use of the way.[52] He cannot, however, erect any structure which renders the way so low and dark, or otherwise interferes with and obstructs it, as to make its use for practical purposes less convenient and beneficial than before.[53]

4. Fences and Gates — a. In General. The owner of the servient estate may erect fences along the sides of a way,[54] but not across the way so as to entirely obstruct it.[55] In the case of a ditch or artificial watercourse he may erect fences across its course, provided the owner of the easement does not have an open right of way along the same.[56] The grant of a way without any reservation of a right to maintain gates does not necessarily imply that the owner of the land may not do so.[57] Unless it is expressly stipulated that the way shall be an open

The right of the grantee to have the way unobstructed by gates depends upon the terms of the grant, the purposes for which it was made, the nature and situation of the property subject to the easement, and the manner in which it has been used and occu-

one,[58] or it appears from the terms of the grant or the circumstances of the case that such was the intention of the parties,[59] the owner of the servient estate may erect gates across the way,[60] provided they are so located and constructed as not unreasonably to interfere with the right of passage.[61] The owner of the easement has no right either to build fences along the sides of a way[62] or to erect gates across it.[63]

b. Prescriptive Rights. In the case of ways of prescription some of the authorities hold that since the extent of the right is commensurate with and determined by the use, the owner of the servient estate cannot erect a gate across a private way acquired by prescription, where no gates were constructed during the time necessary to acquire the right of way.[64] Others, however, hold that the nature of the easement gained and not the particular use which created the right should control, and that a gate may be constructed across the way if it is not an unreasonable obstruction to the purposes for which the way has been used.[65]

5. Obstructions to Light, Air, and View. There is no particular amount of light or air of which a building may be deprived,[66] or any particular angle from its windows up to which an adjoining owner may build[67] without causing a disturbance of the easement. Whether there has been a disturbance is essentially a question of comparison, and if there has been a deprivation of light or air by which the house is rendered substantially less comfortable than before the owner is entitled to relief,[68] notwithstanding there may be as much left as a house ordinarily requires for purposes of inhabitancy or business.[69]

6. Right to Remove Obstructions. An obstruction placed in a private way is a nuisance and may be removed by any person having a right to use the way,[70] provided he can do so without a breach of the peace.[71] He may also remove any natural obstructions existing in or along the way which interfere with its use for the purposes for which it was granted.[72] Where the owner of the land has covenanted to keep the way open the grantee need not in case of an obstruction resort to an action for a breach of the covenant, but may himself remove the obstruction.[73]

establish an adverse right the law will presume that he has been damaged.[74] A right of action exists as against a mere stranger who uses or intrudes upon the easement, for as to such persons the rights of the owner of the easement are exclusive.[75] The owner of the servient estate may use his property, including the easement itself, in any manner consistent with the rights of the other party;[76] but any use of a character adverse to that of the owner of the easement is actionable without proof of special damage.[77] The owner of the servient estate also has the right to obstruct the unauthorized extension of an easement, and if in so doing he obstructs the whole he is not liable unless the unauthorized extension might have been obstructed without interfering with the original right.[78]

b. By Owner of Servient Estate. If the owner of an easement exceeds his rights either in the manner or the extent of its use,[79] or if he enters upon[80] or uses[81] the land of the servient estate for any unauthorized purpose, he is guilty of a trespass and the servient owner may maintain such action, although no actual damages have been sustained by him.

c. Conditions Precedent — (i) Removal of Obstructions on Plaintiff's Property. Where there are obstructions on plaintiff's property without the removal of which nothing that defendant could lawfully be required to do would restore the enjoyment of the easement, plaintiff in order to maintain his action must either remove the obstructions or show his readiness to do so.[82]

(ii) Notice to Owner of Servient Estate to Remove Obstructions. A demand for the removal of an obstruction erected by the owner of the servient estate is not necessary to give plaintiff a right of action,[83] except where the easement is granted for a special purpose which requires only an occasional use, in which case no action will lie until after a reasonable notice to have the obstruction removed.[84] Notice is also necessary where the servient owner is not the original creator of the obstruction.[85]

2. Defenses. After a right of action for obstructing an easement has once accrued, an offer on the part of defendant to remove the obstruction,[86] or an agreement on the part of plaintiff that the obstruction may remain for a certain time,[87] is no defense to an action for the damages sustained prior to such offer or agreement. So the fact that there is another road which plaintiff might use is no defense to an action for obstructing a way to which he is entitled;[88] and where the construction of a railroad obstructs a private way the fact that the company provided the best crossing possible under the circumstances is no defense to an action for the damages actually sustained.[89] Coverture is no defense to an action against a married woman who is the owner of the servient estate for obstructing an easement thereon.[90] Recovery and collection of a judgment for obstructing an easement is a bar to any other recovery for the same obstruction during the same period.[91]

3. JURISDICTION. A justice of the peace has no jurisdiction of an action for the obstruction or disturbance of an easement where the controversy involves plaintiff's title to the right.[92] But where the existence of the easement is not in dispute, and the action is merely to recover damages for an injury thereto, it may be brought in a court having no jurisdiction of actions for the recovery of land.[93]

4. NATURE AND FORM OF ACTION — a. At Law. The proper remedy for the injury or disturbance of an easement is an action on the case,[94] and not trespass[95] or ejectment.[96] So a writ of entry cannot be maintained for disturbing an easement,[97] and an action of forcible entry and detainer will not lie for obstructing a right of way.[98] In cases where a penalty is provided by statute for the particular injury complained of plaintiff will be confined to his remedy under the statute and cannot maintain an action for damages.[99]

b. In Equity — (1) In General. It is well settled that injunction will lie to protect the owner of an easement in its enjoyment.[1] Wherever the injury complained of is irreparable,[2] or the interference is of a permanent or continuous character,[3] or the remedy at law by an action for damages will not afford adequate relief,[4] injunction is a proper remedy. In most cases of disturbance and interference with easements, however, an action on the case for damages is an adequate remedy, and an injunction should be denied where the injury is not irreparable,[5] or where the action at law would afford adequate relief;[6] and to entitle plaintiff to equitable relief his right to the easement in question must be clear,[7] but in this event, it need not be first established in an action at law.[8] If it is neither admitted nor established by an action at law but is expressly denied by defendant, equity will not usually afford any relief until it has been so established,[9] unless perhaps the case be one of very pressing necessity in which it seems relief by way of an injunction may be properly granted.[10]

(II) To Protect Rights of Way. Injunction will lie to protect a right of way against interference or obstruction,[11] and is the proper remedy whenever the rights of plaintiff are clear,[12] and the obstruction is of a permanent or constantly recurring character so that an action for damages would not afford adequate relief.[13] It will also lie to restrain the owner of the servient estate from changing the grade of the way so as to render it less convenient,[14] or from using it in an improper manner inconsistent with the rights of the owner of the easement.[15] Relief by injunction will not be granted where the injury complained of is not an actual or threatened obstruction to the right of passage.[16]

(III) To Protect Easements of Light and Air. Equity will enjoin any obstruction of an easement of light and air which will materially impair the complainant's enjoyment of his property,[17] or which is in violation of a covenant in the deed under which he holds.[18] Where plaintiff fails to show that he will suffer a substantial deprivation of light or air by the threatened obstruction the injunction should be denied.[19]

(IV) Mandatory Injunction. Equity will not only enjoin a threatened

A mere tendency to obstruct the free passage of light or air is not sufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction. Gwin v. Melmoth, Freem. (Miss.) 505.

The obstruction of a window which is seldom used and of little value is not such a material injury as to demand the interveninterference but will in a proper case require defendant to repair an injury already done,[20] or to remove an obstruction already erected and restore things to their former condition.[21] It is not every case, however, of a permanent obstruction that will call for such relief. Each case must be decided upon its own circumstances and it rests in the sound discretion of the court whether a mandatory injunction shall issue.[22] The court should consider the relative expense and inconvenience which it would occasion to the parties,[23] and should refuse to grant the injunction wherever it would operate inequitably and oppressively.[24]

(v) Time to Sue and Laches. A party seeking equitable relief against interference with an easement must be prompt in doing so. Any long delay not satisfactorily explained or accounted for will bar his right to such relief,[25] particularly where he is seeking by means of a mandatory injunction to compel the removal of a valuable structure.[26]

will[29] may maintain the action. The lessor or owner of the dominant estate, although not in possession, may also maintain an action whenever he can show that he is damaged by the injury complained of;[30] but one who is not in possession and whose interest is merely reversionary cannot maintain an action for any injury except to the reversion.[31]

b. Joinder of Parties Plaintiff. In a suit to enjoin an interference with an easement all who are affected in the same way by the acts of defendants and seek the same remedy against them may join as plaintiffs, although they hold their rights under separate titles.[32] A husband may join with his wife in an action for damages for an injury to an easement appurtenant to the wife's property.[33] A cotenant in possession may maintain an action for the obstruction of a way appurtenant to his property without joining the other cotenant as a party plaintiff.[34]

c. Who May Be Sued. Any person creating or assisting to create or maintain an obstruction to an easement may be sued whether he has any interest in the premises on which the easement is located or not.[35]

d. Joinder of Parties Defendant. Where the injury to plaintiff's easement is caused by the separate action of several others claiming the same easement under the same grant, they are properly made co-defendants.[36] In an action for damages for injury to an easement which is not caused by the owner of the servient estate but by a third person, the person who committed the wrongful act must be made a defendant.[37] The special administrator of the deceased owner of the servient estate who assists in maintaining an obstruction caused by such owner may be joined as a party defendant.[38] Where an action is brought by an abutting owner to have an alley opened and to remove obstructions, all the abutting owners having the right to object to such removal should be made parties defendant.[39]

6. Pleading — a. It is a sufficient allegation of ownership to state that defendant has given plaintiff a private right of way and that plaintiff had entered upon and used such way for sixteen years without objection or hindrance (Nowlin v. Whipple, 79 Ind. 481) or that plaintiff is the owner of certain land and that the way in question has been used by him and those under whom he claims for fifty years continuously and that during all of this title was acquired,[41] it being sufficient to allege generally plaintiff's right to the easement and a violation of this right by defendant.[42] If, however, plaintiff undertakes to set out his source of title the complaint must allege all the facts necessary to be proved to establish the same.[43] So where an easement is claimed by prescription the complaint must allege facts showing a user under such conditions as are necessary for the acquisition of a prescriptive title.[44]

(II) DESCRIPTION AND LOCATION OF EASEMENT. The complaint must describe the easement so as to show the nature, extent, and location of the right claimed.[45] So in an action for obstructing a private way the complaint must allege that it is a private and not a public way,[46] and must give its location [47] and termini.[48]

(III) ALLEGATIONS OF INJURY SUSTAINED. The complaint must show that the rights of plaintiff have been violated.[49] If plaintiff seeks to recover special

In alleging a prescriptive title it is not essential that the word "adverse" should be used, if facts showing that the possession was adverse are set out (Mitchell v. Bain, 142 Ind. 604, 42 N. E. 230), nor is it necessary to expressly state that plaintiff enjoys the right by prescription where he avers that he has enjoyed the right for a period long enough to have established a prescriptive title (Chollar-Potosi Min. Co. v. Kennedy, 3 Nev. 361, 93 Am. Dec. 409).

A right of way by prescription is not shown by alleging a habit of crossing another's land, without defining the way, or stating that its use had been by right and open and notorious. Johnson v. Lewis, 47 Ark. 66, 14 S. W. 466.

47. Fox v. Pierce, 50 Mich. 500, 15 N. W. 880.

Where a way is not claimed as appurtenant to the premises of plaintiff to which it leads, it is not necessary to describe these premises in the complaint (Smith v. Wiggin, 51 N. H. 156), and such description may be stricken out as surplusage (Lamphier v. Worcester, etc., R. Co., 33 N. H. 495).

48. Lamphier v. Worcester, etc., R. Co., 33 N. H. 495. But see Harding v. Cowgar, 127 Ind. 245, 26 N. E. 799, holding that a description of a way as a well defined road thirty feet wide which had been in use for more than twenty years is sufficiently definite without setting out the course and termini of the way.

damages they must be specifically set out in the complaint.[50] Where the action is simply for an injury to the possessory interest and not to the reversion, no allegation of damages to the reversionary interest is necessary.[51]

(iv) Prayer For Relief. The complaint is not demurrable for want of facts because it demands the wrong relief or greater relief than plaintiff is entitled to.[52]

b. Answer. Where defendant in an action for interference with an easement relies as a defense upon a right to use the same, the right must be specially pleaded;[53] but it has been held that the owner of the servient estate who claims as a defense an extinguishment of an easement through a prescriptive right to maintain the obstruction complained of, need not specially plead this defense.[54] A pleading is demurrable if it purports to answer the entire complaint and the matters therein pleaded, but amounts only to a partial defense.[55]

7. Evidence — a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. Where an easement is claimed by prescription the burden is upon the party claiming it to prove an uninterrupted assertion of the right under a claim of title with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner of the land for the necessary period;[56] but proof of such adverse enjoyment, without evidence to explain how it began, raises a presumption of a full and unqualified grant, and the owner of the land has the burden of proving that the use was under some license, indulgence, or special contract, inconsistent with a claim of right by the other party.[57] Where an easement is claimed as appurtenant to certain land, the burden is upon the party claiming it to show that the original grantee of the easement was the owner of the land in question at the time of the grant.[58] In a suit for a mandatory injunction to compel the removal of an obstruction, if defendant desires a judgment for damages in lieu of the injunction he has the burden of showing a state of facts which would justify such relief.[59]

b. Admissibility. On the question of plaintiff's right to an easement, evidence of an admission of such right by a former owner of the servient estate during his ownership is admissible against the present owner,[60] and on the other hand defendant may give evidence of admissions by plaintiff inconsistent with the right claimed.[61] Where a way is claimed as a way of necessity, evidence is admissible for defendant to show the purchase of other land by plaintiff over which access to the public highway might be had.[62] Where the extent or location of a way is in question evidence of the manner in which it has been used by the owner of the easement and acquiesced in by the owner of the servient estate is admissible, whether the way be one by express grant[63] or a way of necessity.[64] On the question of damages due to the obstruction of a way, evidence of the injury caused thereby to persons other than plaintiff is not admissible;[65] but evidence is admissible of any expenditures made by plaintiff in improving the way,[66] or to show that defendant acted maliciously,[67] or with a knowledge of plaintiff's rights.[68] Evidence is admissible on the part of defendant to show in mitigation of damages that the way obstructed was not plaintiff's only means of access to his premises.[69] No evidence is of course admissible which is not covered by the allegations of the pleadings.[70] Evidence of special damages is not admissible unless such damages are specially set out in the complaint.[71]

c. Sufficiency. To warrant a recovery the evidence must establish both the right of plaintiff and also an unlawful interference with it by defendant.[72] But to establish his right, it is not necessary that plaintiff should show any title other than the actual use and occupation of the premises to which the easement is appurtenant,[73] unless from the nature of the proceedings the title is directly put in issue;[74] neither is it necessary in order to show a violation of his right for him to prove that any actual damages have been sustained.[75]

d. Variance. A material variance between the pleading and the proof is fatal to a recovery;[76] but proof of a right of a less extent than that claimed by plaintiff on the trial is not fatal to a recovery if the complaint is so general that the proof is not inconsistent with its allegations.[77]

8. TRIAL — a. Questions of Law and Fact. Whether plaintiff has an easement in defendant's land is, when the essential facts are in dispute, a question for the jury.[78] And in the case of an easement by express grant if the terms of the grant are uncertain the jury must determine the extent and location of the right intended to be conveyed.[79] Whether the owner of the servient estate has used his property in a manner inconsistent with the rights of the owner of the easement,[80] or whether the owner of the easement has used it for an unauthorized purpose;[81] whether the use of the alleged easement has been adverse or merely permissive,[82] or whether there has been any change of ownership of the estates that would convert a use that was previously permissive into an adverse use;[83] whether the width of a way has been established by acquiescence of the grantor,[84] and, in an action for obstructing an alleged private way, whether the way is public or private,[85] are all questions of fact for the jury.

b. Instructions. The instructions of the court must fully inform the jury as to the nature of the right in issue between the parties.[86]

c. Verdict and Judgment. In an action to secure the removal of obstructions from a private way a verdict for plaintiff is not insufficient because no damages are found in his favor.[87] In a suit to enjoin the obstruction of an existing way, the judgment need not state its exact location by metes and bounds as in an original proceeding for its establishment.[88] A judgment assessing certain damages for the obstruction of an easement and also conferring authority, upon a contingency, to apply for further damages is unauthorized.[89] The judgment is conclusive only as to the matters directly in issue and passed upon by the jury.[90]

9. DAMAGES. The owner of an easement which has been injured or its enjoyment interfered with is entitled to recover from the wrong-doer the actual damages which he has sustained,[91] and if no actual damages be proved he is entitled to recover nominal damages.[92] No damages can be assessed for any injuries not alleged in the complaint,[93] and the recovery will be limited to the damages sustained up to the time of the commencement of the action,[94] except in certain cases where the obstruction is permanent and a necessarily continuous injury.[95] No special damages can be recovered unless alleged in the complaint.[96] Exemplary damages may be awarded for the interference with an easement whenever it is shown that defendant has acted in an oppressive or malicious manner,[97] or where he has persisted in an interference after plaintiff's right to the easement has been established by a prior action.[98] If plaintiff is owner of the easement only, he cannot recover for any injury resulting to the servient estate,[99] and if his interest is merely reversionary, and he is not in possession, he can only recover damages for the injury done to the reversion.[1] Where a private way is used by a trespasser without interfering with the owner's free use of it during the same period, the ordinary measure of damages is the injury done to the way or to the land by the wrongful use, including any increased cost of repairs caused by such use.[2] In the case of a temporary obstruction of a way, if the dominant estate is rented and there is no physical injury to the property, the measure of damages to the owner of the estate is the difference in rental value during the continuance of the obstruction;[3] but if occupied by the owner, the measure of damages is the diminution of the value of the use during the period of the obstruction.[4]

10. Appeal and Error.[5] A failure to give a requested instruction which states a correct proposition of law but is not applicable to the matters in issue,[6] or to give a particular instruction the substance of which is covered by the other instructions given,[7] is not error; but a failure to give a proper instruction requested which is not covered by the general charge, whereby a party is deprived of an important instruction to which he is entitled, is ground for reversal.[8] Error

Plaintiff is not limited to nominal damages in an action for the obstruction of a way (Smiles v. Hastings, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 44), except in cases where no actual injury has been sustained (McDonnell v. Cambridge R. Co., 151 Mass. 159, 23 N. E. 841).

This tribunal is frequently resorted to in the settlement of clergymen, in reconciling and healing differences and divisions in churches, and in adjusting and terminating controversies between pastors and their churches and parishes. Stearns v. Bedford First Parish, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 114, 124, where it is said: "But notwithstanding the frequency of their occurrence, it is not easy accurately to define their powers, or to ascertain the precise force and effect of their adjudications. It is frequently called an advisory court. Its determination or result is often called advice, and is usually if not uniformly given in the form of counsel to the parties."

Functions pertain to marriage and divorce. —"Of the several branches of the unwritten law of England, there is one, properly to be deemed common law, yet technically called ecclesiastical law; another, technically, the common law; another, the law of admiralty; and another of very great importance, is known as equity. To the branch of the common law called ecclesiastical the subject of marriage and divorce, in England, pertains." De Witt v. De Witt, 67 Ohio St. 340, 346, 66 N. E. 136, 138 [quoting 1 Bishop Marr. & Div. § 114]. See also Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Paterson, 41 Ga. 338, 364, 5 Am. 31. Derivation of term. — "The description of a libeller in our indictments seems to me to have been borrowed from the civil law, and of delivery, which precedes the manifestation of the contents.[32] (See, generally, LIBEL AND SLANDER.)

EDGE. The border or part adjacent to a line of division; the part nearest some limit.[33]

EDIBLE. Eatable; fit to be eaten as food; esculent.[34]

EDICTA MAGISTRATUM, CONSTITUTIO PRINCIPIS. A maxim meaning "The ordinance of the magistracy (or civil government) is the constitution (or decree) of the Emperor."[35]

EDICTS OF JUSTINIAN. Thirteen constitutions or laws of this prince, found in most editions of the Corpus Juris Civilis, after the Novels.[36] (See CORPUS JURIS.)

EDITION. As applied to a publication, the total number of copies issued or published at once;[37] a republication, sometimes with a revision and correction; any publication of a book before published.[38] (See, generally, COPYRIGHT.)

EDITION DE LUXE. As applied to a publication, an elaborate and costly edition, often limited; a sumptuous edition, as regards paper, illustrations, binding, etc.;[39] a generic expression, meaning simply an elegant edition of some kind.[40] (See EDITION; and, generally, COPYRIGHT.)

EDITION OF A BOOK. The publication of it.[41] (See COPY; EDITION; and, generally, COPYRIGHT.)

EDITOR. A person who superintends the publication of a newspaper.[42] As applied to the production of bronze statuary the term is used to designate the

I agree that their word edo is represented by our word publish; but I deny that edere means to manifest the contents of a paper." Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, 128, 6 E. C. L. 404.

32. Rex v. Burdett, 4 B. & Ald. 95, 128, 6 E. C. L. 404, per Best, J., where it is said: "And the subsequent manifestation is expressed by some other term, as exponere or manifestare. Thus, in Cicero, De Legibus, lib. 3, art. 20, he says, 'apud eosdem qui magistratu abierint edant et exponant quid in magistratu gesserint.' Here, the word 'edant' means 'they uttered,' and the word 'exponant,' 'they exposed to public view what was so uttered.'" And, after quoting from the civil law, in Codex, lib. 9, tit. 36, the court continued: "Here, the word ediderit is not used, but manifestaverit. Why? because it constituted no crime for a person who found a paper, and, being ignorant of its contents, delivered it to another. To punish him with death would have been a species of cruelty of which the worst of the Romans were incapable; but if, instead of destroying it, he manifested it, then he was to be considered as the author. The reason I quote this passage is to show that where 'ediderit' is used, it means a delivery only; but when they intend to express a disclosure of the contents of a paper, they use the word manifestaverit."

33. Century Dict.

A deed of land defining one of its boundaries as the "edge of the mill pond" means the bank of the pond, and gives the land a defined boundary without regard to the contingent subsidence of the water constituting a pond, thereby leaving the land dry, and passes no title to the land under the pond. Holden v. Chandler, 61 Vt. 291, 294, 18 Atl. 310.

34. Century Dict.

An edible spice is a spice which is eaten as spices are eaten, namely, as a sauce, a condiment, a relish, not as a food product capable of sustaining life. In re Cruikshank, 54 Fed. 676, 677, where it is said: "The adjective 'edible' found in this connection must be considered as a relative term qualified somewhat by the noun which follows it."

The word "edible" in the tariff act of 1890, relating to the duties on certain drugs, etc., which are not edible, etc., is intended to exclude from the exemption such of the enumerated articles as are edible according to the common understanding. The 'edition' means, whenever you have in your store-house a certain quantity of copies, you issue them to the public, and there are various modes of doing this recognized by the trade."

EDMUNDS-TUCKER LAW. See BIGAMY.

EDUCATE. To prepare and fit for any calling or business, or for activity and usefulness in life.[44] (See, generally, COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES; SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL-DISTRICTS.)

EDUCATION.[45] The bringing up;[46] the process of developing and training the powers and capabilities of human beings.[47] In its broadest sense, the word comprehends not merely the instruction received at school or college, but the whole course of training, moral, intellectual and physical;[48] is not limited to the ordinary instruction of the child in the pursuits of literature. It comprehends a proper attention to the moral and religious sentiments of the child.[49] And it is sometimes used as synonymous with "learning."[50] (See COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES; SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL-DISTRICTS.)

EDUCATIONAL. Pertaining to education.[51] (Educational Purposes: Charitable Gifts For, see CHARITIES. Exemption From Taxation of Property Devoted to, see TAXATION.)

is said: "And the term sometimes includes not only the person who wrote or selected the articles for publication, but the person who published the paper and put it into circulation."

The editor of a newspaper is a person who, while he may not furnish as the production of his mind the words, sentences, and ideas printed, or set the type or work the press, superintends the correction of the proof sheet of the printer, and who, in regard to the publication of the paper, selects the matter for publication. Extended use of term.— In Barnes v. Ross, [1896] A. C. 625, 638, Lord Halsbury, L. C., said: "I take in the first place the education of the boy; and I think it is necessary to give to that word 'education' a very wide signification. It is not a question simply of what literary accomplishments he may become the master of, but he is to be fitted for life as a gentleman inheriting ample means and having duties in the place in which he is to exercise his functions afterwards, and it may be . . . he should also be accustomed to the amusements and habits of those with whom he has afterwards to associate and among whom he is to live. . . . Passing on to another matter, one cannot help thinking that during his education at Eaton (still using the word 'education' in a very extended sense) it may have been very proper and appropriate that he should be familiar with the amusements which are there in vogue."
