I. PRELIMINARY DEFINITIONS.*

A. Evidence — 1. In General. Evidence, broadly defined, is the means from which an inference may logically be drawn as to the existence of a fact. It is that which makes evident or plain.[1]

2. Judicial Evidence. Judicial evidence is that portion of evidence in general which under the rules of legal procedure is received by tribunals as tending to establish the existence of a fact involved in an issue submitted to judicial determination.[2]

3. Rule of Evidence. A "rule of evidence" may be defined to be the mode and manner of proving the competent facts and circumstances upon which a party relies to establish the fact in dispute in judicial procedure.[3]

4. Relevant Evidence. Evidence is "relevant" when it touches upon the

1. Bentham's definition.— "Any matter of fact, the effect, tendency or design of which, when presented to the mind, is to produce a persuasion concerning the existence of some other matter of fact; a persuasion either affirmative or disaffirmative of its existence." 1 Bentham Rationale Jud. Ev. 17.

Best says: "The word 'evidence' signifies, in its original sense, the state of being evident; i. e., plain, apparent, or notorious. But by an almost peculiar inflection of our language, it is applied to that which tends to render evident or to generate proof. This is the sense in which it is commonly used in our law-books, and will be used throughout this work. Evidence, thus understood, has been well defined,— any matter of fact, the effect, tendency, or design of which is, to produce in the mind a persuasion, affirmative or disaffirmative, of the existence of some other matter of fact." Best Ev. § 11 [quoted in State v. Ward, 61 Vt. 153, 185, 17 Atl. 483; Gordon v. Denison, 24 Ont. 576, 583].

Greenleaf's definition is: "All the means by which any alleged matter of fact, the truth of which is submitted to investigation, is established or disproved." 1 Greenleaf Ev. c. 1, § 1 [quoted in Tift v. Jones, 77 Ga. 181, 190, 3 S. E. 399; State v. Thomas, 50 La. Ann. 148, 153, 23 So. 250; Auditor-Gen. v. Menominee County, 89 Mich. 552, 618, 51 N. W. 483; Glenn v. State, 64 Miss. 724, 726, 2 So. 109; Lapham v. Marshall, 51 Hun (N. Y.) 36, 41, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 601; Hill v. Watson, 10 S. C. 268, 274; Horbach v. State, 43 Tex. 242, 249].

"Evidence is defined to be that which makes a matter in dispute clear, evident." Holland v. Ingram, 6 Rich. (S. C.) 50, 52.

"Evidence" and "facts" are not synonymous terms, but they are sometimes so used. Gates v. Haw, 150 Ind. 370, 372, 50 N. E. 299.

Definitions as to degrees of proof and weight of evidence, as "prima facie evidence," "satisfactory evidence," "conclusive proof," "demonstration," "partial evidence," "preponderance of evidence," "proof beyond a reasonable doubt," etc. See infra, XVII.

2. Best's definition is: "A species of the genus 'evidence' and for the most part nothing more than natural evidence, restrained or modified by positive law." Best Ev. (Chamberlayne ed.) § 34.

Blackstone's definition is: "That which demonstrates, makes clear, or ascertains. . . . The truth of the very fact or point in issue, either on the one side or on the other." 3 Blackstone Comm.*367. This definition seems incomplete in not recognizing the existence of evidence as to facts which are merely relevant to the facts directly in issue.

Taylor's definition is: "All the legal means, exclusive of mere argument, which tend to prove or disprove any matter of fact the truth of which is submitted to judicial investigation." Taylor Ev. (Chamberlayne ed.) § 1.

Professor Thayer's definition is: "Any matter of fact which is furnished to a legal tribunal . . . otherwise than by reasoning or a reference to what is noticed without proof . . . as the basis of inference in ascertaining some other matter of fact." 3 Harv. L. Rev. 142, 147.

Wharton's definition is: "The reproduction, before the determining tribunal, of the admissions of parties, and of facts relevant to the issue." Wharton Ev. § 3.

Stephen says that the term "evidence" as used in his treatise means: "(1) Statements made by witnesses in court under a legal sanction, in relation to matters of fact under inquiry; such statements are called oral evidence: (2) Documents produced for the inspection of the Court or judge; such documents are called documentary evidence." Stephen Dig. Ev. art. 1. This definition seems inaccurate in excluding any consideration of facts which the tribunal learns for itself; "real evidence," so called. See infra, XIII.

The California code of civil procedure declares that judicial evidence is: "The means, sanctioned by law, of ascertaining in a judicial proceeding the truth respecting a question of fact." Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1823.

3. Lapham v. Marshall, 51 Hun (N. Y.) 36, 41, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 601.

* By Charles F. Chamberlayne. Revised and edited by Wm. Lawrence Clark.

issues which the parties have made by their pleadings, so as to assist in getting at the truth of the facts disputed.[4]

5. MATERIAL EVIDENCE. Evidence offered in a cause, or a question propounded, is "material" when it is relevant and goes to the substantial matters in dispute, or has a legitimate and effective influence or bearing on the decision of the case.[5]

6. COMPETENT EVIDENCE. By "competent" evidence is meant that which the very nature of the thing to be proved requires as the fit and appropriate proof in the particular case, such as the production of a writing, where its contents are the subject of inquiry.[6] The term has also been used and construed as synonymous with "admissible,"[7] with "relevant,"[8] and with "sufficient" or "adequate."[9]

7. DIRECT AND CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. Direct and circumstantial evidence differ merely in their logical relation to the fact in issue; evidence as to the existence of the fact is direct, while circumstantial evidence relates to the existence of facts which raise a logical inference as to the existence of the fact in issue.[10] The distinction is of little practical value, and has been abandoned by Stephen.[11]

8. POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE EVIDENCE. The term "positive" as applied to evidence has been held in many cases to mean direct as distinguished from circumstantial evidence,[12] but it is also and more accurately used to denote affirmative as distinguished from negative evidence.[13]

B. Testimony. While "testimony" is frequently employed as equivalent, in legal effect, to "evidence,"[14] it is more accurately used to designate a species of it, viz., that which comes to the tribunal through living witnesses under oath.[15]

C. Proof. Judicial "evidence" stands to "proof," when the latter term is properly employed, in the relation of means to an end. Proof is the result; evidence, the means for attaining it.[16] "Evidence" and "proof" are often used as synonymous terms,[17] and this has caused much of the confusion attending the use of the phrase "burden of proof."[18]

II. JUDICIAL NOTICE.*

A. Definition. Judicial notice or knowledge may be defined as the cognizance of certain facts which judges and jurors[19] may, under the rules of legal procedure or otherwise, properly take and act upon without proof because they already know them.[20] In the case of judges the term "fact" in this definition includes certain constitutional and statutory laws and rules of common law, which will be considered in subsequent sections.[21]

B. Matters of Fact — 1. In General. Judicial knowledge is not reached by the use of evidence; it is a matter pertaining to the judicial function and its existence, like that of an admission, stipulation, or rule of presumption, dispenses with evidence as to the point covered.[22] It is necessary, however, that the community throughout which the fact to be judicially known is supposed to be commonly known should be one whose extent bears some reasonable relation to the territorial jurisdiction of the court itself.[23] It is the duty of the court to charge evidence, recognize the existence and truth of certain facts, having a bearing on the controversy at bar, and which, from their nature, are not properly the subject of testimony, or which are universally regarded as established by common notoriety, e. g., the laws of the state, international law, historical events, the constitution and course of nature, main geographical features, etc." Black L. L. 216, where Coleridge, J., said: "Judges are not necessarily to be ignorant in Court of what everyone else, and they themselves out of Court, are familiar with; nor was that unreal ignorance considered to be an attribute of the Bench in early and strict times. We find in the Year Books the Judges reasoning about the ability of knights, esquires, and gentlemen to maintain themselves without wages: distinguishing between private chaplains and parochial chaplains from the nature of their employments: and in later days we have ventured to take judicial cognizance of the moral qualities of Robinson Crusoe's 'man Friday' (Forbes v. King, 1 Dowl. P. C. 672), and Esop's 'frozen snake' (Hoare v. Silverlock, 12 Q. B. 624, 12 Jur. 695, 17 L. J. Q. B. 306, 64 E. C. L. 624). We may certainly therefore take upon ourselves to pronounce that a singer at operas, or a dramatic artiste to the owner and manager of Her Majesty's theatre, is not a messor, falcator aut alius operarius vel serviens, within either the letter or the spirit of the Statute of Labourers. And, if we were to hold to the contrary, as to the profession of Garrick and Siddons, we could not refuse to hold the same with regard to the sister arts of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture."

23. Banks.— The court cannot take notice of the presence of banks in a given town. Bartholomew v. Everett First Nat. Bank, 18 Wash. 683, 52 Pac. 239.

Irrigation.— Every person in the locality immediately affected may know that a particular tract of land must be irrigated in order to produce crops, and yet the fact be not so generally known through the entire community for which the court is sitting as to authorize or require the judge to know it judicially. Slattery v. Harley, 58 Nebr. 575, 79 N. W. 151; McGhee Irr. Ditch Co. v. Hudson, 85 Tex. 587, 22 S. W. 398. But a court may judicially notice the more general fact that light sage-brush soil will not produce agricultural crops without irrigation. Prescott Irr. Co. v. Flathers, 20 Wash. 454, 55 Pac. 635.

Mail-service.— Every member of the community may know the nature of the local mail service but a state court will not know it judicially. Ferrier v. Storer, 63 Iowa 484, 19 N. W. 288, 50 Am. Rep. 752. Yet where a community, although in a sense local, is so large territorially or commercially that the salient facts affecting it may be regarded as of general interest, courts will judicially know them; and a letter mailed in New York city at six-fifty P. M. on May 29 the court knows will be delivered in the due course of mails on the morning of May 30. Morel v. Stearns, 37 Misc. (N. Y.) 486, 75 N. Y. Suppl. 1082.

Railroad fences.— The court will not take judicial notice of the fact that a railroad was or was not fenced at a certain point. Texas Cent. R. Co. v. Childress, 64 Tex. 346.

the jury in the trial of a cause as to the existence of facts of which judicial cognizance is taken.[24]

2. Facts Once Judicially Known. Facts notorious in a community because connected with protracted or celebrated litigation naturally come within the knowledge of judges and are accepted as true without proof.[25] A judge will assume judicial knowledge of facts which he has learned through former litigation in the same jurisdiction,[26] or at an earlier hearing in the same case.[27] And he may take judicial cognizance of what he has himself done as judge,[28] as for example that he has in his official capacity signed a certain paper.[29]

3. Personal Knowledge of Judge.[30] Early conceptions of the scope of judicial knowledge excluded the personal knowledge of the judge,[31] but in later jurisprudence facts generally known in the legal profession of which he is a member, a judge may judicially know, although such knowledge be largely confined to lawyers.[32] Modern cases permit a judge who knows a rule of common or statutory law in force in a sister state[33] or foreign country[34] to take judicial cognizance of the same. Judicial knowledge, however, is limited to what a judge may properly know in his judicial capacity, and he is not authorized to make his individual knowledge of a fact not generally or professionally known the basis of his action.[35]

4. Agreed Facts. It has been declared doubtful whether a case can properly

Local facts.— A court, especially one of general jurisdiction, cannot notice judicially the state of the weather, condition of the roads, or the price of particular articles at a particular time and place. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Jacobson, 77 Iowa 582, 42 N. W. 499. But the New York supreme court sitting in New York city took judicial notice of a general depression in the value of real estate in that city. Walker v. Walker, 3 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 12.

Illustrations.—Thus a judge, where the fact has been ascertained in previous cases, will take judicial notice of a foreign statute (Graham v. Williams, 21 La. Ann. 594; U. S. v. Teschmaker, 22 How. (U. S.) 392, 16 L. ed. 353), a colonization contract (Hatch v. Dunn, 11 Tex. 708), the procedure in taking up unoccupied lands (U. S. v. Teschmaker, 22 How. (U. W. 161), or that a certain lawyer has ceased to practice (Day v. Decousse, 12 L. C. Jur. 265). But a judge is not at liberty to use as judicial knowledge his personal knowledge that certain attorney's fees charged by an administrator in his probate account are higher than customary for like services against the uncontradicted evidence that such fees are reasonable. Applications of the rule.— Thus a judge cannot judicially know a person's age from inspection (Stephenson v. State, 28 Ind. 272), nor act on his personal knowledge that facts are not truly stated in a pleading (State v. Chase County School Dist. No. 24, 38 Nebr. 237, 56 N. W. 791; Griffing v. Gibb, 2 Black (U. S.) 519, 17 L. ed. 353), or that ground exists for abating a writ (Bank of British North America v. Sherwood, 6 U. C. Q. B.

be determined on an agreed statement of facts, unless the facts agreed conform to what is judicially known to be the truth;[36] and on the other hand that an appellate court will abstain from exercising judicial knowledge in such a case.[37]

5. JUDICIAL KNOWLEDGE AGAINST EVIDENCE. Uncontroverted evidence produced to establish a fact does not preclude the court from finding the fact to be otherwise by resorting to judicial knowledge.[38]

6. KNOWLEDGE OF JURORS. Jurors may act upon matters of common observation within their general knowledge without any testimony on those matters;[39] but contrary to the ancient doctrine[40] a juror cannot give a verdict founded on fact in his own private knowledge.[41]

7. MATTERS OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE — a. In General. Courts may properly take judicial notice of facts that may be regarded as forming part of the common knowledge of every person of ordinary understanding and intelligence;[42] but not of facts merely because they may be ascertained by reference to dictionaries, ency-

213). This rule applies even in respect of facts which the court gathers from an inspection of its own records, as for example that an account declared on is suitable for a reference as involving the consideration of a long account. Cassidy v. McFarland, 139 N. Y. 201, 34 N. E. 893. A judge of probate cannot legally refuse administration to the next of kin of a deceased because he personally knows that such next of kin is afflicted with mania a potu. Smith v. Moore, 3 How. (Miss.) 40. See also Wheeler v. Webster, 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 1. The same strictness, however, is not observed as to proof of collateral matters and those of discretion. Thus it has been held that a judge who knows the handwriting of a signature may admit it as prima facie genuine. Brown v. Lincoln, 47 N. H. 468.

c. Established Standards[50] — (I) Of Reasonable Care. The court will assume to know the standard which the community sets up as to reasonable care.[51] Ordinarily, however, the question of reasonable care under particular circumstances is a question of fact for the jury on the evidence.[52]

(II) Of Prudent Business Methods. Judicial notice will also be taken of the community's standard of prudent business methods.[53]

d. Literary Matters. Courts will take the same knowledge as the community at large of matters of literature embraced in average education or reading.[54]

e. Human Conduct. What incentives commonly operate upon human conduct are part of the general information of intelligent persons and may be judicially noticed by the courts.[55]

8. Course and Laws of Nature. Judicial knowledge is taken of the existence of facts which must have happened according to the constant course of nature,[56]

In other words, courts are bound judicially to know and apply such laws and principles as part of the law of the land. They are bound to know that there is a difference between reasonable care and no care at all, or utter negligence, and that a prudent man, in the presence of danger, naturally and ordinarily makes some use of his faculties to ascertain and avoid it; and if, upon any occasion, he does not, when he has good reason to apprehend danger, he does not exercise the ordinary or reasonable care demanded by the circumstances"); Davey v. London, etc., R. such as the alternation of day and night, the return of the respective seasons with the concomitants of heat or cold, and the varying changes in animal and vegetable life.[57] The natural law which enables frost to arrest decay in animal or vegetable tissues will be noticed by the courts.[58] But variations of climate in particular places at particular times cannot be judicially known.[59]

9. Qualities and Properties of Matter. It is judicially known that natural gas is explosive,[60] and that dynamite is intrinsically dangerous,[61] but not that the same property under exceptional conditions characterizes substances normally harmless.[62] Unless controlled by statute,[63] courts will judicially notice the inflammable quality of substances like coal oil,[64] but not whether other substances not usually so regarded are inflammable within the meaning of a certain phrase.[65] A court knows that certain forms of matter are opaque;[66] the usual effect of time and use on asphalt on the streets of a populous city;[67] and that certain liquors are spirituous or intoxicating, etc.[68] The well known qualities of tobacco,[69] and the use commonly made of it[70] are judicially recognized. Courts do not assume to know the color of natural butter[71] or of oleomargarine.[72] Nor can a court know judicially that coal or wood, free in their constituent parts from poison, would not have a tendency to produce death if taken into the stomach of an animal.[73]

10. Scientific Facts.[74] The fact that there is a magnetic meridian,[75] that the compass varies therefrom in a particular direction,[76] that coal mines generate gas,[77] and other scientific facts universally conceded[78] are judicially noticed. The rule applies to facts of medical science which are matters of common knowledge, such as in what vaccination consists.[79]

11. Time, Days, and Dates. Most prominent perhaps among the facts of science judicially known to the court are those so to speak of the almanac.[80] Courts take judicial notice of the computation of time,[81] as for example the coin-

capacity of measures not standard or commonly known is not judicially noticed.[90] Courts recognize the value of the circulating medium,[91] the premium on gold coin,[92] and the equivalents in currency of the United States of current gold coin of other countries.[93] Judicial knowledge of value extends, however, only to the standard, and does not cover the value of particular articles[94] or services.[95]

13. Geographical Facts — a. In General. A state court will take judicial notice of the boundaries of the United States, at least where they coincide with the state line.[96] Courts have judicial knowledge of the prominent geographical features of the territory over which or state in which they exercise jurisdiction[97] and of the country at large;[98] the location of cities outside the state, at least if they are well known commercial centers,[99] and their situation as related to tide-water.[1] Geographical facts of common knowledge relating to cities of commercial impor-

d. Location and Operation of Railroads. As a fundamental fact of general knowledge a court knows of the existence and location of railroads, whether they are wholly within its jurisdiction[21] or only partly so,[22] and knows to what system, if any, they belong.[23] Courts will also to a not very well defined extent notice the minor facts connected with railroad locations in their jurisdiction.[24] Thus it has been held that the courts may know that railroads are in operation between two places,[25] the distance between them,[26] that these points are within a certain county,[27] the geographical positions of towns on the line of a railroad,[28] and that a railroad cannot be located in a given direction from one place to another without passing through a third.[29] In like manner courts will notice that a town contains a station on a certain railroad[30] or that it is a railroad terminus[31] or center.[32] But they cannot notice more minute facts.[33]

Reason of the rule.—"Railways are public highways; and it is a matter of history that important lines of railways once established have remained as fixed and permanent in their course as the rivers themselves. Their locality becomes so notorious and indisputable that the courts will take notice thereof. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. State, 72 Tex. 404, 10 S. W. 81, 1 L. R. A. 849, 13 Am. St. Rep. 815. Co., 83 Tex. 518, 520, 18 S. W. 954, per Garrett, P. J.

e. Lakes, Streams, and Mountains, and Navigability of Waters. Courts take judicial notice of the existence and location within the states in which they exercise jurisdiction of great lakes and rivers,[34] and their relation to county[35] or city[36] lines, and to the distribution of population;[37] of the navigability of streams constituting great national highways of commerce,[38] as well as of smaller streams within the jurisdiction,[39] and other notorious facts concerning the latter.[40] The existence and location of prominent mountains in the jurisdiction[41] and of great mountain ranges[42] will also be judicially known.

f. Location of Streets, Blocks, Lots, Etc. It has been held that courts will take notice of the blocks and lots in towns and cities.[43] The particularity, how-or commercial notoriety as to render it so indisputable that the courts ought to take judicial knowledge that such was the fact); Texas Cent. R. Co. v. Childress, 64 Tex. 346 (holding that courts do not take notice whether a railroad was fenced at a particular point).

See also State v. Jones, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 496.

38. Neaderhouser v. State, 28 Ind. 257; Wood v. Fowler, 26 Kan. 682, 40 Am. Rep. 330 (where the court said: "To attempt to prove that the Mississippi or the Missouri is a navigable stream, would seem an insult to the intelligence of the court"); Bennett v. Bryan, 1 Ky. L. Rep. 274.

Federal courts know judicially "what streams are public navigable waters of the United States." U. S. v. The Monello, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 411, 20 L. ed. 191. To the same point see Lands v. A Cargo of Two Hundred and Twenty-seven Tons of Coal, 4 Fed. 478; King v. American Transp. Co., 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,787, 1 Flipp. 1. In U. S. v. Rio Grande Dam, etc., Co., 174 U. S. 690, 698, 19 S. Ct. 770, 43 L. ed. 1136, Brewer, J., said: "It is reasonable that the courts take judicial notice that certain rivers are navigable and others not, for these are matters of general knowledge. But it is not so clear that it can fairly be said, in respect to a river known to be navigable, that it is, or ought to be, a matter of common knowledge at what particular place between its mouth and its source navigability ceases. And so it may well be doubted whether the courts will take judicial notice of that fact."

In England judicial notice has been taken of geographical facts and navigability with respect to the St. Lawrence river and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Birrell v. Dryer, 9 App. Cas. 345, 5 Aspin. 267, 51 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130.

Rep. 330 (where the court said: "The presumption of general knowledge weakens as we pass to smaller and less-known streams; and yet, within the limits of any state the navigability of its largest rivers ought to be generally known, and the courts may properly assume it to be a matter of general knowledge, and take judicial notice thereof"); Browne v. Scofield, 8 Barb. 43. Gardner v. Eberhart, 82 Ill. 316. And see People v. Kelly, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 549. But the court cannot take judicial notice of the precise location of a mere city lot or sub-ever, of the knowledge called for in order that the court may judicially know the location of streets, their direction, numbering, etc., is so great that much diversity of decision exists on the point. What would be eminently proper to expect on the part of a local court of limited jurisdiction would be unreasonable in case of an appellate court or one of general jurisdiction.[44]

g. Distance and Time of Travel Between Places. It follows from their knowledge of the locality of counties, cities, towns, etc., that courts judicially know the distance between places within their jurisdiction,[45] particularly where such dis-division of city lands with reference to township or other political subdivision lines. Gunning v. People, 189 Ill. 165, 59 N. E. 494 [reversing 86 Ill. App. 676].

44. California.— The courts of California judicially know the location of streets as platted on a plan approved by statute (Whiting v. Quackenbush, 54 Cal. 306), the relation of such streets to one another, and the directions in which they run (Brady v. Page, 59 Cal. 52); but not the correct location on the ground of the streets therein platted (Diggins v. Hartshorne, 108 Cal. 154, 41 Pac. 283).

Illinois.— The court cannot take judicial notice of the place of intersection of a street in a city with a railroad track (Pennsylvania Co. v. Frana, 13 Ill. App. 91), nor of the distance between the streets of a city like Chicago (West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Vandehouten, 58 Ill. App. 318).

Iowa.— The court will not take judicial notice of the names of streets and public places in the towns and cities of the state (Baily v. Birkhofer, 123 Iowa 59, 98 N. W. 594), nor of the width of the streets of a city where they are not established by special charter (Coe College v. Cedar Rapids, 120 Iowa 541, 95 N. W. 267).

Louisiana.— Courts in Louisiana take notice of the streets and of the names and location of the suburbs from time to time brought within the limits of New Orleans. Poland v. Dreyfous, 48 La. Ann. 83, 18 So. 906.

Michigan.— The courts of Michigan do not take judicial notice of the relative situation of lots and blocks on a map or plat not introduced in evidence, nor as to how they apply on the surface of the ground. Shepard v. Shepard, 36 Mich. 173.

Missouri.— Courts will take judicial notice of old established and well known streets of the city in which they sit, as their existence must be a matter of common knowledge throughout the city (State v. Ruth, 14 Mo. App. 226); but not of less well known streets or their direction (Breckinridge v. American Cent. Ins. Co., 87 Mo. 62). Compare Allen v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App. 229, holding that judicial notice will be taken of the locality of a particular number on a certain street in a given ward or district of a city.

New York.— New York courts will take judicial notice of the fact that the streets of New York city are numbered east and west from Fifth avenue, and that the odd numbers are on the north side of the street. Canavan v. Stuyvesant, 7 Misc. 113, 27 N. Y. Suppl. 413. They also notice the general direction of the streets, and where they begin and end (Skelly v. New York El. R. Co., 7 Misc. 88, 27 N. Y. Suppl. 304); and that premises described by a street are within a particular judicial district (People v. Kelly, 20 Hun 549). The doctrine, however, seems a flexible one. In landlord and tenant proceedings, in the district courts, although the boundaries of the several judicial districts are within the supposed judicial knowledge of the courts, the locality of the streets and avenues, their termini, and the numbers of houses situated thereon are not matters of judicial notice. People v. Callahan, 23 Hun 581, 60 How. Pr. 372.

Wisconsin.— In this state, where certain lots were sold by designation in a town subsequently incorporated into a city, the supreme court, while taking notice of the facts of incorporation, declined to take judicial notice that the numbering would designate the same lots in the new municipality. Ritchie v. Catlin, 86 Wis. 109, 56 N. W. 473.

England.— An English court will not take judicial notice that a particular street is not in a certain county, although it may be generally known to be situate in another. Humphreys v. Budd, 9 Dowl. P. C. 1000, 5 Jur. 630. See Reg. v. Holborn Union, 6 E. & B. 715, 2 Jur. N. S. 571, 25 L. J. M. C. 110, 4 Wkly. Rep. 606, 88 E. C. L. 715. But such courts will take judicial cognizance that a place lies east or west of Greenwich, and consequently has a time different from that of Greenwich. Curtis v. March, 3 H. & N. 866, 4 Jur. N. tances are established by law,[46] and will take cognizance of the length of time consumed in travel between places by present modes of conveyance.[47]

14. Facts of History — a. In General. The main facts of history known to the community at large are known to judges and jurors. Facts of world history, sacred and secular, and of local history, national, state, county, or town, which are generally known, judges or jurors will know. The minuteness of the knowledge will be found to vary with the size of the community for which a court is sitting. A fact of distinctly local history may properly be known to the judge of a local court. Under certain circumstances the judge of a court of general jurisdiction sitting within and for that locality may take notice of it. Such knowledge would not be required in a judge sitting at a distance. Subject to these considerations, courts may take judicial notice of matters of public history.[48] Thus courts judicially know the historical facts concerning the political action of their own country in foreign affairs,[49] and the history of prominent religious organiza-

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 14.

Contra.— In Maine, however, the court declines to take judicial notice of the local situation and distances of places in counties from each other (Goodwin v. Appleton, 22 Me. 453); and in Virginia it was held that the court would not take judicial notice of the fact that a point at a given distance from a certain unincorporated village was in a particular county (Anderson v. Com., 100 Va. 860, 42 S. E. 865).

Distance between places on railroad.— Wainright v. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co., 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 530. See supra, II, B, 13, d.

46. Courts in California will take judicial notice of the legal distances from place to place in the state of California, as established by the political code in sections 150–202, for the purpose of computing the time within which notice of intention to move for a new trial must be served. Foreign history.— Courts will notice salient events of foreign history, such as the existence of civil war in a foreign state at a certain time and its result. Underhill v. Hernandez, 168 U. S. 250, 18 S. Ct. 83, 42 L. ed. 456, in Venezuela.

Treaties, proclamations, foreign acts, etc.— In U. S. v. Reynes, 9 How. (U. S.) 127, 147, 13 L. ed. 74, the court said: "We come now to the inquiry, whether the grant in question was protected either by the treaty of retrocession from Spain to the French Republic, or by the treaty of Paris, by which the Territory of Louisiana was ceded to the United States. The treaties above mentioned, the public acts and proclamations of the Spanish and French governments, and those of their publicly recognized agents, in carrying into effect those treaties, though not made exhibits in this cause, are historical and notorious facts, of which the court can take regular judicial notice; and reference to which is implied in the investigation before us."

Rules of navigation.— Courts will take judicial notice of the historical fact that by common consent of mankind there has been a general acquiescence in the rules of navigation established in the British orders in council, Jan. 9, 1863, prescribing the kinds of lights to be used on British vessels, and subsequently reënacted by the act of congress of April 29, 1864. Occupation of Cuba.— Judicial notice may be taken that the island of Cuba was, at the date of the act of congress of June 6, 1900, tions.[50] It will be noticed that slavery existed in certain of the American states prior to the Civil war,[51] that it was abolished as a result of the war,[52] that methods of instruction have changed in the last twenty-five years, and that one who was competent to teach twenty-five years ago would not necessarily be qualified now,[53] and that steamboats, first used in 1807, were in 1824 freely employed in transporting merchandise, and were not confined to carrying passengers.[54] Courts cannot assume knowledge of the secondary and more minute circumstances connected with historical events, although of general interest.[55] Minor matters of questionable general interest or knowledge constitute a debatable border land between judicial knowledge and its absence, and involve cases where the personal equation of the individual judge has greater weight in determining cognizance than any very definite rule.[56]

b. Facts of Civil War. Among the more prominent facts of modern American history is the Civil war between the states of the Union. The courts know judicially the fact of such war, the period covered by it, and the other main facts concerning it,[57] as the historical causes which led up to it,[58] the proclamations of the executive connected with its outbreak,[59] the relative position of the several states on the issue,[60] and its leading battles and other incidents.[61] The courts cannot take judicial notice of the more minute circumstances connected with the

and for some time thereafter, occupied by and under the control of the United States. Neely v. Henkel, 180 U. S. 109, 21 S. Ct. 302, 45 L. ed. 448 [affirming 103 Fed. 631].

Matters in relation to Philippines.— In La Rue v. Kansas Mut. L. Ins. Co., (Kan. Sup. 1904) 75 Pac. 494, it was held that courts will take judicial notice that under the treaty of Paris the Philippine Islands became a part of the territory of the United States, and after that time were in a state of insurrection against the government, which insurrection had not ended in the island of Mindanao in 1902.

50. Humphrey v. Burnside, 4 Bush (Ky.) 215.

The separation of the methodist episcopal church, in 1844, into two methodist episcopal churches, the one north and the other south of a common boundary line, was an event that connected itself with and formed a part of the history of the country, and from its notoriety courts will take judicial notice of it without proof. Humphrey v. Burnside, 4 Bush (Ky.) 215.

56. Values.— In Dayton v. Multnomah County, 34 Oreg. 239, 55 Pac. 23, it was held that the court would not take judicial notice that values had been unreasonably increased or diminished under the system adopted in the state for ultimate equalization of assessments by a state board. But in Ludlow v. Brewster, 3 Ohio Cir. Ct. 82, 2 Ohio Cir. Dec. 47, it was held to be part of the history of the country "of which courts must take judicial notice" that lands leased some time ago at much less than their present value. Compare infra, II, B, 14, e.

61. Thus it has been held that the courts of particular states would notice the time of termination of the war and of the reëstablishment of the United States mails (Turner v. Patton, 49 Ala. 406); the suspension of the mail service in the Confederate states

Civil war,[62] but secondary facts of more general importance connected with the war may be noticed.[63]

c. National Expositions and Institutions. Notice will be taken of the holding of great national expositions, such as the Columbian or "World's Fair," so called,[64] and of the existence, location, and objects of great national institutions, such as universities.[65]

d. Nature and History of Circulating Medium. Courts will notice as a historical fact of great notoriety and importance the nature of the circulating medium at a particular time,[66] the popular language in reference to it,[67] and its value.[68]

(Donegan v. Wood, 49 Ala. 242, 20 Am. Rep. 275); Sherman's march to the sea and its date (Williams v. State, 67 Ga. 260); the elimination of gold and silver from circulation and the issue, use, and depreciation of Confederate currency (see infra, II, B, 14, d); the abolition of slavery (Morgan v. Nelson, 43 Ala. 586; Rose v. Pearson, 41 Ala. 687; Glover v. Taylor, 41 Ala. 124; Ferdinand v. State, 39 Ala. 706) and its effect on the colored race (Hunt v. Wing, 10 Heisk. (Tenn.) 139); the date of the war's termination (Turner v. Patton, 49 Ala. 406); although on this last point it has been held that what should constitute the conditions of war and peace are purely for political determination, and that courts would not take judicial notice that hostilities ceased and peace was restored by the surrender of any particular army (U. S. v. Fifteen Hundred Bales of Cotton, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,958 [reversing 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,957]).

62. Kelley v. Story, 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 202. See also supra, II, B, 14, a. Thus it has been held that the courts will not take judicial notice of the position of the lines of armies in the field at any particular period of the Civil war (Kelley v. Story, 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 202; McDonald v. Kirby, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 607; Wood v. Cooper, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 441); of the fact that civil law was suspended in a certain county at a particular time, or that at such time clerks could not issue process and sheriffs could not levy executions and sell lands (Smart v. Mason, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 223); that civil law was suspended and the courts of a particular county were closed (Gross v. Sabin, 13 Fed. 308. Contra, Killebrew v. Murphy, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 546); or that a Union or Confederate sympathizer was not safe in his person or property in some particular county at a particular time (Simmons v. Trumbo, 9 W. Va. 358).

63. Turner v. Patton, 49 Ala. 406; Rice v. Shook, 27 Ark. 137, 11 Am. Rep. 783; Wood v. Cooper, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 441. Thus it has been held that a court will judicially notice that certain localities or portions of a Confederate state were in the possession and under the control of the forces of the United States, although they will not infer therefrom that individuals resided there, or in the territory over which the government had re-established its authority, as against the averments of a plea that they were public enemies. Rice v. Shook, 27 Ark. 137, 11 Am. Rep. 783. Courts will take judicial notice that the state of Missouri had representatives in the provisional congress of the Confederate states prior to 1861, and was represented there until the end of the war. Wood v. Cooper, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 441. And see other cases cited supra, note 61.

Georgia.— Mallory v. State, 62 Ga. 164,

The reason for the court's knowledge of standards of value is in part at least that they are established by law.[69] The courts, it has been held, will also take judicial notice of the change from a gold basis to a paper standard and the consequent rise in prices,[70] of the different classes of notes and bills in circulation as money at any particular time,[71] and of the elimination of gold and silver and United States paper currency from circulation in the Confederate states and the general facts connected with the issuing, use, and depreciation of the Confederate currency.[72]

e. General History of State. The courts of a state, including federal courts, will judicially know the general history of the state.[73] This principle has been applied to the history of land ownership in the state,[74] the cession to the national

The rule has also been applied to such facts as the local feeling against a street railway (Geist v. Detroit City R. Co., 91 Mich. 446, 51 N. h. Facts Aiding in the Construction of Statutes, Contracts, and Other Documents. In construing statutory provisions judges make constant use of their knowledge of state history in ascertaining the mischief for which the legislature has sought to provide relief.[93] The construction of contracts is aided in the same way by judicial knowledge as to what shall be considered, in view of historical facts, to have been the intention of the parties.[94]

i. Facts Bearing on Conduct of Parties. Historical facts are also judicially noticed as bearing on the conduct of the parties.[95]

j. Facts Bearing on Railroad and Telegraph Matters.[96] In like manner facts of state history have been judicially noticed as bearing on the opening of railroads,[97] the relative priority in construction among railroads,[98] the permanence of railroad locations,[99] the increase of traffic and business,[1] the change in motive power on street railways,[2] and that a telegraph line is necessary to the operation of a railway, and usually consists of wires strung on posts set alongside the railroad,[3] but not of the space required for the repair of such a line.[4]

k. Rates of Interest. The current rate of interest at a given date on moneyed securities is part of the history of a state of which the courts will take judicial notice.[5]

l. Tenures of Office. As part of the general history of the state, courts know of the tenure of office of the chief executive and prominent facts connected with the same,[6] and even of that of local officials.[7]

m. Facts Relating to Elections. The court will not require proof but will take judicial notice of the date of a general state election,[8] or of an election to

Y.) 633, 724 (where it is said that evidence derived from public records, statutes, legislative journals, historical works, etc., is restricted to historical evidence concerning facts of a public and general nature); Morris v. Edwards, 1 Ohio 189; Morris v. Harmer, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 554, 8 L. ed. 781; Stainer v. Droitwich, 1 Salk. 281.

Private ownership.— Among facts which are not of sufficient general interest to warrant the assumption of judicial knowledge are those relating to the history of private titles. The court in New York for example declines to admit evidence from local histories on a claim of private ownership to a tract of land said to have been granted to Sir William Johnson prior to his decease in 1774. 95. Thus it was held that the courts of Alabama would take judicial notice of the increased responsibility of a trustee by the condition of affairs during the Civil war (Lyon v. Foscue, 60 Ala. 468); the disturbed condition of business during that period, and the difficulty of making safe and productive investments (Foscue v. Lyon, 55 Ala. 440); and the fact that the people of the state were in 1867 in a condition of very great pecuniary embarrassment and insolvency, and that in consequence of this state of affairs it may have been impracticable for a guardian at that time to make a safe loan of a large sum of money without delay after its receipt (Ashley v. Martin, 50 Ala. 537).

congress,[9] and it will take judicial notice of a contest in such an election.[10] It has also been held that the courts will take judicial notice of the result of a general election,[11] and of other facts in relation thereto,[12] and of the powers of state conventions as the highest party organization.[13]

n. Facts of Incorporation. The rule that courts will take judicial notice of historical facts applies to matters of history with respect to corporations.[14]

15. Facts Established by Statistics — a. Census. Courts know the facts generally known to have been established by statistics in much the same way and for much the same reason that they know the facts set forth in the almanac. The court cannot verify the facts; but where statistics are official, prepared by public officers acting under provision of law, the duty of the court to know the law and recognize the existence of acts done under it stimulates and indorses the court's knowledge of the facts established by such statistics, in which the community shares. Courts therefore will take judicial knowledge of the results of a census taken under federal,[15] state,[16] or municipal[17] authority. The court will take judicial notice of the population of counties,[18] cities,[19] and towns,[20] and of the approximate rate at which the population of such places increases.[21] Other facts

It has been held, however, that the court cannot take judicial notice of the fact that a county contains more than one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants, where the last public record shows the population to be less than that in number, although in point of fact it may have been more at the time of the trial, as the court must be governed by the facts of general interest obtained from the official census will be noticed, such as the amount of capital in the jurisdiction, the form in which it is held,[22] etc.

b. Law of Averages. The law of averages as established by statistics will be recognized by the judge, so that for example he will take notice of the average duration of life as indicated by mortality tables showing the natural expectancy of life at a given age.[23] But the average must be one which is definitely fixed and not subject to violent fluctuations,[24] and the facts to be known to the court must be such as are generally known.[25]

16. Phenomena of Life — a. Human Life — (I) In General. Well known facts concerning the phenomena of human life in its various forms need not be proved. Thus courts take judicial notice of the ordinary period of gestation,[26] the ordinary length and limitation of human life,[27] the ordinary proportions of the human body and its consequent height in different positions,[28] the diseases to which men are subject,[29] and in a general way the causes of such diseases so far as they are generally known;[30] the nature and effect of injuries and diseases so far as they are matters of common knowledge;[31] the increased power of certain shown by the public records. Adams v. Elwood, 176 N. Y. 106, 68 N. E. 126.

22. Wasson v. Indianapolis First Nat. Bank, 107 Ind. 206, 8 N. E. 97, holding that courts will take judicial notice of the fact that national bank stock constitutes a material portion of the moneyed capital of the state.

Newspapers.— But courts will not take judicial notice of the number of newspapers printed in a county or that any newspaper is published therein. Atkeson v. Lay, 115 Mo. 538, 22 S. W. 481.

24. Kokes v. State, 55 Nebr. 691, 76 N. W. 467, holding that the ratio which the number of voters at an annual election bears to the whole population in a county or state is not so definitely fixed that courts can take judicial notice of it.

25. Price v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 48 Mo. App. 281, holding that the rule that courts will take judicial notice of ordinary mathematical propositions, as well as of scientific facts which universal experience has rendered axiomatic, is not applicable to the ascertainment of the present net value of a life-insurance policy, depending partly on extraneous facts and partly on the accuracy of an intricate computation.

Certainty of knowledge and the importance of the fact known are factors in determining judicial knowledge. Thus that a certain disease is hereditary will not be noticed (Birmingham Southern R. Co. v. Cuzzart, supra), while judicial notice will be taken that the public health is deeply concerned in the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands because of their tendency to cause malarial and malignant fevers (Leovy v. U. S., supra).

Labor in unsanitary places.— The supreme court will take judicial notice that the manufacture of wearing apparel in improperly ventilated, unsanitary, and overcrowded apartments is likely to promote the spread of disease. State v. Hyman, (Md. 1904) 57 Atl. 6.

31. McDaniel v. State, 76 Ala. 1 (holding that the fact that a fracture of the skull

(II) Articles in Common Use.[41] The courts judicially notice articles in common use and the facts in relation to them which are commonly known, such as the use of tobacco in its various forms,[42] the fact that oleomargarine is an article of commerce,[43] etc. Courts also know judicially the nature and use of common mechanical devices,[44] such as the telephone,[45] the bicycle,[46] hoppers and pressing upon the brain is a dangerous wound which may cause death, but which does not necessarily and in all cases produce it, is a matter of common knowledge of which the court will take notice); Lidwinofsky's Petition, 7 Pa. Dist. 188 (holding that the court will take judicial notice of the location and functions of the scrotum in the male human body, and find as a fact, against all the evidence, that varicose veins in that region do not as a matter of law entail such disability for manual labor as would justify granting a license to peddle under a statute authorizing the granting of such a license to persons who by disease or otherwise have become disabled, and who by reason of such disability are unable to procure a livelihood by manual labor).

32. Matter of Cross, 85 Hun (N. Y.) 343, 32 N. Y. Suppl. 933, holding that the court will take judicial notice of the fact that persons engaged in business who cannot read and write have their faculties of memory more acutely educated because they are compelled to depend on their memory and cannot rely on written memoranda.

33. Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 34 N. E. 765, 22 L. R. A. 182, for the purpose of determining the offensive nature of a particular business, such as the undertaking business. See also infra, II, B, 18.

34. Spengler v. Williams, 67 Miss. 1, 6 So. 613, holding that the court would notice the fact that a lumber pile in a street is calculated to attract children.

(III) Social Customs.[54] The general social customs in vogue through the community are known to the court,[55] but local, provincial, or foreign customs cannot be noticed.[56]

(IV) Facts of Travel. The usual route and approximate duration for journeys are judicially noticed.[57]

(V) Facts of Business.[58] The usual methods of doing business prevailing in the community will be judicially known and therefore require no proof,[59] and

53. The state of the art, of which a court may take judicial notice in a suit relating to a patent, and as to which it can be assisted by the statements of the parties or their counsel, without proofs furnished in accordance with the rules of law, is confined to matter of general knowledge; and such judicial notice cannot extend to a single patent relating to a particular fact in a limited art. Parsons v. Seelye, 100 Fed. 452, 40 C. C. A. 484.

Illustrations.—Thus it has been held that a court will notice that "habitual drunkenness" is a distinct habit from common excess in the use of morphine or chloroform (Youngs v. Youngs, 130 Ill. 230, 22 N. E. 806, 17 Am. St. Rep. 313, 6 L. R. A. 548; Com. v. Whitney, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 477); that liquor saloons are resorted to for sale of liquor as a beverage (Zapf v. State, 11 Ind. App. 360, 39 N. E. 171); that the yachting season in northern waters closes before November 1 (The Conqueror, 166 U. S. 110, 17 S. Ct. 510, 14 L. ed. 937); and that a postal card or telegram is likely to be read by others than the one to whom it is addressed (Williamson v. Freer, L. R. 9 C. P. 393, 43 L. J. C. P. 161, 30 L. T. 56. De Tolna v. De Tolna, 135 Cal. 575, 67 Pac. 1045 (holding that the court would not take judicial notice that a defendant was a resident of Austria because he affixed to his name a title of nobility); State v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 70 Conn. 590, 40 Atl. 465, 66 Am. St. Rep. 138 (holding that because the names of parties show them to belong to the English-speaking race judicial notice will not be taken that they are citizens of the United States).

the court knows, as every one does, what business it is necessary to do on Sunday.[60]

(VI) GAMING ENTERPRISES. It has been held that courts judicially know the peculiar nature of gaming enterprises and the mode in which they are generally carried on,[61] but in some instances courts have declined to take such judicial knowledge.[62]

b. Animal Life. The courts take judicial notice of prominent facts concerning animal life[63] and its progress,[64] the diseases with which animals are commonly afflicted,[65] and ordinary psychological characteristics of animals.[66]

c. Vegetable Life. Courts will also take judicial notice of the prominent facts of vegetable life,[67] as for example that crops require cultivation,[68] that a particular crop such as rice cannot be grown to maturity without water,[69] that crops mature at a particular time,[70] and that they are attacked by certain diseases.[71] But facts

S.) 384, 12 L. ed. 1123 (that, in collecting the price of goods sold, a bill of sale may be remitted to an agent of the vendors in the vendee's neighborhood).

Blockade.— A prize-court will take judicial notice of the notorious course of trade between a certain neutral port and blockaded ports of the enemy. The Mersey, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,489, Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 187 [reversed on other grounds in 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,490, Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 658].

63. State v. Gould, 26 W. Va. 258, that a mule is a domestic animal and that there are no wild mules in the state.

64. Thus in customs duties cases the court will take judicial notice of the general facts of natural history, including the fact that the unimproved native sheep of all countries produce fleeces whose value is depreciated more or less by the undue quantity of hair growing on the belly, flanks, and parts of the thighs and arms of the animals. Lyon v. Marine, 55 Fed. 964, 5 C. C. A. 359. See, generally, CUSTOMS DUTIES, 12 Cyc. 1117, 1165.

65. As for example the disease of cattle known as "Texas fever." Grimes v. Eddy, 126 Mo. 168, 28 S. W. 756, 47 Am. St. Rep. 653, 26 L. R. A. 638; Kimmish v. Ball, 129 U. S. 217, 9 S. Ct. 277, 32 L. ed. 695. Such notice, however, cannot properly be taken when the matter is one on which competent authorities differ in opinion (Bradford v. Floyd, 80 Mo. 207); and minor facts attending a disease will not be judicially noticed until they are well established in general knowledge (Grimes v. Eddy, 126 Mo. 168, 28 S. W. 756, 47 Am. St. Rep. 653, 26 L. R. A. 638; Bradford v. Floyd, 80 Mo. 207; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 10 S. Ct. 862, 34 L. ed. 455 [affirming 39 Fed. 64]). In Minnesota v. Barber, supra, the theory upon which a certain statute was alleged to be based, viz., that inspection of an animal on the hoof within a short time before it is slaughtered is necessary to ascertain whether it is diseased, was held not to be a fact which the court could judicially notice.

66. Judicial notice has been taken that a mule is a domestic animal of a treacherous and vicious nature (Borden v. Falk Co., 97 Mo. App. 566, 71 S. W. 478); that a trolley-car will frighten an otherwise well broken horse (Meyer v. Krauter, 56 N. J. L. 696, 29 Atl. 426, 24 L. R. A. 575); that a box-car standing at a crossing will not frighten horses of ordinary gentleness (Gilbert v. Flint, etc., R. Co., 51 Mich. 488, 16 N. W. 868, 47 Am. Rep. 592); and that cattle on a highway, approaching a railroad crossing, will sometimes be arrested or frightened back by the sight and sound of a coming train, and sometimes will not be by the whistling and ringing in addition (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Hurst, 25 Ill. App. 181, 182).

17. LANGUAGE — a. Meaning of Words. A judge judicially knows the ordinary meaning of English words[73] at any given time.[74] He may even decline to hear the evidence of experts on the subject,[75] and dictionaries are used, not as evidence, but at his option to refresh his memory.[76]

b. Meaning of Phrases. The judge will also judicially know the meaning of phrases used in ordinary speech[77] and of legal phrases and expressions in common use,[78] but he cannot notice the meaning of phrases without well established significance.[79]

c. Meaning of Abbreviations. The meaning of customary abbreviations and diminutives of christian names,[80] of other abbreviations in common use,[81] of initials commonly employed in the community,[82] and of initials and abbreviations of printers[83] and surveyors,[84] will be within the knowledge of judges and jurors. Judges may properly decline to hear evidence to establish a meaning of an ordinary word, abbreviation, or other symbol which is contrary to the judicial knowledge of the judge.[85] In Texas it has been held that courts do not know that "La." is an abbreviation for "Louisiana,"[86] nor that "Mo." represents the state of Missouri.[87] These rulings, however, apparently rest upon a misapprehension of the point decided in an earlier case in the same state.[88]

18. Management and Conduct of Occupations. times of the year, during the ordinary hours of labor, burn rubbish on the railroad right of way (Baxter v. Great Northern R. Co., 73 Minn. 189, 75 N. W. 1114); that it is within the agency of a section foreman to keep both track and right of way in proper condition (Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Stinson, 74 Miss. 453, 21 So. 14, 522); that the maintenance of gates and a flagman at a crossing of the tracks of a railroad and a street railway on a city street diminishes the danger of accidents (Richmond Union Pass. R. Co. v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 96 Va. 670, 32 S. E. 787); that there is no device which will wholly prevent escape of sparks and cinders from locomotives (Menominee River Sash, etc., Co. v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 91 Wis. 447, 65 N. W. 176); and that the practice is to separate freight and passenger trains (Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Headland, 18 Colo. 477, 33 Pac. 185, 20 L. R. A. 822. But judicial notice is not taken of the time which railroad trains require to run between different places (Wiggins v. Burkham, 10 Wall. (U. S.) 129, 19 L. ed. 884), the time of the arrival or departure of trains (Bishop v. Covenant Mut. L. Ins. Co., 85 Mo. App. 302); nor of the details of internal management and regulation not immediately in contact with the public, such as the duties of the superintendent (Southern R. Co. v. Hagan, 103 Ga. 564, 29 S. E. 760; Brown v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 67 Mo. 122), or a passenger brakeman (Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. McLean, 1 Ohio Cir. Ct. 112, 1 Ohio Cir. Dec. 67); that the footboard in front of a switch engine is the post of duty of the yard-master (Highland Ave., etc., R. Co. v. Walters, 91 Ala. 435, 8 So. 357); that freight trains of diverse length upon roads of varying grade can (Moore v. Saginaw, etc., R. Co., 115 Mich. 103, 72 N. W. 1112) or cannot (Jonas v. Long Island R. Co., 21 Misc. (N. Y.) 306, 47 N. Y. Suppl. 149) be stopped without a "jerk."

2. Judicial notice is taken that contracts to buy real estate are often made with the expectation on the part of the purchaser of reselling at a profit before he is compelled to complete his contract. Anderson v. Blood, 86 Hun (N. Y.) 244, 33 N. Y. Suppl. 233.

3. "The court takes judicial notice of the fact that champagne, as ordinarily served from an ice chest or in coolers, is liable to lose its labels before the bottle is shown to the customer." Von Mumm v. Wittemann, 85 Fed. 966, 967, per Townsend, D. J.

4. Judicial notice is taken that the owners of cattle are accustomed to depasture unsurveyed public lands (Mathews v. Great Northern R. Co., 7 N. D. 81, 72 N. W. 1085), and that mere pasturage upon uninclosed western plains is very slight evidence of possession (Whitney v. U. S., 167 U. S. 529, 17 S. Ct. 857, 42 L. ed. 263); but not whether a partition fence sufficient to restrain and inclose sheep will also restrain and inclose hogs (Enders v. McDonald, 5 Ind. App. 297, 31 N. E. 1056).

5. Judicial notice is taken that passengers ride on the platforms (Metropolitan R. Co. v. Snashall, 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 420, 433), and that a cable car on an up grade through a reverse curve cannot cross another track without a sudden start, that the cable cannot be kept taut, and that jerks are common and unavoidable (Pryor v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 85 Mo. App. 367); but not whether an electric car can be stopped or its speed so checked within one hundred and fifty feet as to avoid injury to persons or animals on the track (Kotila v. Houghton County St. R. Co., (Mich. 1903) 96 N. W. 437).

6. The owner of an omnibus line is known to be a common carrier of passengers and their baggage. Parmelee v. McNulty, 19 Ill. 556.

7. The court takes judicial notice that a particular undertaking establishment as described in the evidence would be offensive to the sensibilities of persons dwelling in its vicinity. Rowland v. Miller, 139 N. Y. 93, 34 N. E. 765, 22 L. R. A. 182.

8. The fact that the sale of proprietary medicines and nostrums depends less upon the merits of the medicines themselves than upon the expedients used to recommend them to the public is so notorious that the court will take judicial notice thereof. Fowle v. Park, 48 Fed. 789.

9. About managing horses, refractory or otherwise, a court knows no more judicially than it does of navigating a steamship in a storm upon the Atlantic. Chicago City R. Co. v. Smith, 54 Ill. App. 415, 417, per Gray, J.

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 25.

Assessment and payment of taxes.— That taxpayers do not fix the value of their own property for assessment purposes, but that this duty usually devolves upon municipal or state officers (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 6 Ind. App. 262, 33 N. E. 241), and that they do not always pay in the year of assessment (Mullen v. Sackett, 14 Wash. 100, 44 Pac. 136), are facts of which judicial notice is taken.

Public usage to fish in private ponds unless the owner has given public notice that it will not be allowed is judicially noticed. Marsh v. Colby, 39 Mich. 626, 33 Am. Rep. 439.

Usage once judicially known.— Where a usage has been proved in a previous case, so as to leave no doubt as to its existence, the court will take judicial notice of it. Consequa v. Willings, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,128, Pet. C. C. 225. See supra, II, B, 2.

14. Courts will take judicial notice of those general methods, which are common to all districts, of locating and designating mines by serial number above and below a common base, known as "discovery" or "No. 1." Butler v. Good Enough Min. Co., 1 Alaska 246. Compare, as to purely local usages, infra, this section, note 23.

15. Jones v. Peppercorne, 5 Jur. N. S. 140, Johns. 430, 28 L. J. Ch. 158, 7 Wkly. Rep. 103.

Custom of brokers, as part of the general custom of merchants, is judicially noticed. Jones v. Peppercorne, 5 Jur. N. S. 140, Johns. 430, 28 L. J. Ch. 158, 7 Wkly. Rep. 103.

Negotiability of bonds payable to bearer.— It is no longer necessary to tender evidence as to the negotiability of bearer bonds, foreign or English. The existence of the usage has been so often proved that it must now be taken to be part of the law of which the courts ought to take judicial notice. Edelstein v. Schuler, [1902] 2 K. B. 144, 71 L. J. K. B. 572, 87 L. T. Rep. N. S. 204, 50 Wkly. Rep. 493.

Sundays and festivals.— A general usage to observe Sundays and great festivals like Christmas in the protest of commercial paper is judicially known. Sasscer v. Farmers' Bank, 4 Md. 409.

Banking hours are judicially noticed. Salt Springs Nat. Bank v. Burton, 58 N. Y. 430, 17 Am. Rep. 265; Calisher v. Forbes, L. R. 7 Ch. 109, 41 L. J. Ch. 56, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 772, 20 Wkly. L. 65; Parker v. Gordon, 7 East 385, 6 Esp. 41, 3 Smith K. B. 358, 8 Rev. Rep. 646.

Time of presentment of commercial paper.— The practice of all banks and merchants in a county to present negotiable paper for payment on the day following the third day of grace is judicially noticed. Columbia Bank v. Fitzhugh, 1 Harr. & G. (Md.) 239.

The custom of the vendors of property to ask more for it than it is worth has been judicially noticed. State v. Chingren, 105 Iowa 169, 74 N. W. 946.

Otherwise of usages of limited adoption such as local customs as to days of grace upon instruments not entitled to grace by general mercantile law (Tranter v. Hibbard, 108 Ky. 265, 56 S. W. 169, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1710), especially when payable in another state (Goddin v. Shipley, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 575), the regulations of a brokers' board (Goldsmith v. Sawyer, 46 Cal. 209), or the allowance of commissions on bills of exchange received in payment of a judgment (Ward v. Everett, 1 Dana (Ky.) 429).

16. Judicial notice is taken of the custom of assessors to assess real estate for taxation at a percentage below its real value. Bureau County v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 44 Ill. 229; Cummings v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 153, 25 L. ed. 903; Railroad, etc., Co. v. Tennessee, 85 Fed. 302; Cincinnati Southern R. Co. v. Guenther, 19 Fed. 395.

17. That it is a general custom among churches to keep a record of their official acts (Sawyer v. Baldwin, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 492), that seventh-day baptists do not work on Saturday (State v. South Kingstown, 18 R. I. 258, 273, 27 Atl. 599, 22 L. R. A. 65), and that religious exercises and bible readings are customarily employed in the daily exercises of the public schools and other state institutions of learning (Pfeiffer v. Detroit Bd. of Education, 118 Mich. 560, 77 N. W. 250, 42 L. R. A. 536) may be judicially noticed; but customs of particular religious denominations, of limited application, such as the practice of the episcopal church as to the tenure of a parish minister (Youngs v. Ransom, 31 Barb. (N. Y.) 49), the authority of vestrymen over the affairs of their parish (Hill Estate Co. v. Whittlesey, 21 Wash. 142, 57 Pac. 345), the general organization and administration of the methodist episcopal church (Sarahass v. Armstrong, 16 Kan. 192), the through which the custom is general be of limited extent.[18] Judicial notice is not taken, however, of purely local usages,[19] such as those relating to local municipal improvement of streets,[20] the use of private premises[21] or the preëmption of lands,[22] and local customs relating to mining,[23] or the appropriation of water-rights,[24] and the local laws of Indian tribes.[25] Judicial knowledge of customs and usages may enable the court to declare that there is no such custom or usage as is claimed;[26] but such knowledge may not extend to the details which attend a custom itself known to exist,[27] except it seems to the extent of limitations forming part of the custom.[28]

20. Matters Relating to Private Corporations and Associations[29]— a. State Courts. Since as we shall presently see the courts judicially know the public laws laws (Katzer v. Milwaukee, (Wis. 1899) 79 N. W. 745) and powers of the Roman catholic church (Baxter v. McDonnell, 155 N. Y. 83, 49 N. E. 667, 40 L. R. A. 670), require proof.

Historical facts.— Judicial notice will be taken of the creeds and general doctrine of the mormon church, and of the principles of celestial marriage peculiar to that church, as being matters of general history, which may be presumed to be subjects of common knowledge. Hilton v. Roylance, 25 Utah 129, 69 Pac. 660, 95 Am. St. Rep. 821, 58 L. R. A. 723.

Judicial notice of historical facts see supra, II, B, 14.

18. Thus the custom as to demurrage charges in a particular port (Union Bank v. Union Ins. Co., Dudley (S. C.) 171), the custom of the merchants of Philadelphia (Koons v. Miller, 3 Watts & S. (Pa.) 271) or Pittsburgh (Watt v. Hoch, 25 Pa. St. 411) to charge interest on open accounts after a certain date, and the usage that permits those admitted to certain colonies to make selections of lands already surveyed (Chadoin v. Magee, 20 Tex. 476) have been judicially noticed.

Contra.— The courts of Arizona, however, take judicial notice of the "local customs, laws, and decisions of courts" as to water-rights, as these terms are used in the act of congress of March 26, 1866, providing for the protection of such vested rights. Clough v. Wing, (Ariz. 1888) 17 Pac. 453. In Nebraska the supreme court will take judicial notice of the fact that since the early settlement of the western portion of the state, where irrigation has been found necessary to successful agriculture, the custom has existed of appropriating and diverting waters from the natural channels into irrigation canals, and the application of such waters to the soil for agricultural purposes. Crawford Co. v. Hathaway, (Nebr. 1903) 93 N. W. 781.

26. A court will take judicial notice that it is not customary to require from a vendor an affidavit as to the condition of his title on making a contract of sale or to deposit earnest money in a trust company pending the execution of a deed. Livingston v. Spero, 18 Misc. (N. Y.) 243, 41 N. Y. St. 606.

27. While a court knows that railroads are in the habit of carrying "drummers' samples" as baggage, it will not know the conditions and limitations under which it is done. McKibbin v. Great Northern R. Co., 78 Minn. 232, 80 N. W. 1052.

statute requires them to do so,[35] or under which one of several laws it was organized,[36] whether it has adopted the provisions of some other act,[37] that corporations have consolidated under a statute authorizing them to do so,[38] that the existence of a corporation whose charter has not expired by limitation has ceased,[39] or that a corporation has taken certain action with respect to property or otherwise.[40] Nor will the courts notice the by-laws of a private corporation,[41] or the existence, powers, or duties of officers of a corporation,[42] unless such facts are matters of public law,[43] or other facts of like character.[44]

b. Federal Courts. The federal courts, including the supreme court of the United States, judicially know the existence, name, and powers of a corporation created by an act of congress,[45] the existence and powers of corporations created by a public act of a state,[46] and the powers or privileges conferred by act of congress on a state corporation.[47] It has also been held that federal courts take see CORPORATIONS, 10 Cyc. 236 et seq. Compare U. S. v. Williams, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,706, 4 Biss. 302, referred to infra, II, B, 20, b.

35. Statutes sometimes require the existence of corporations formed under a general law to be judicially noticed by the courts of the county or counties in which their articles or certificates are recorded. Cicero Hygiene Draining Co. v. Craighead, 28 Ind. 274 (such a statute does not require this notice by the supreme court); Delawter r. Sand Creek Ditching Co., 26 Ind. 407 (supreme court on appeal presumes action of lower court in this respect was correct).

Illustrations.— Thus it has been held that the court will not take judicial notice that a railroad company under its charter condemned or acquired title to any particular land (Chapman v. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co., 18 W. Va. 184); that an assignment has been made by a banking corporation, a trustee appointed, etc., as authorized or required by statute (Topp v. Watson, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 411); of the existence or operation of telegraph lines of a corporation outside of the state, or that a telegraph company under authority of an act of congress has entered into certain business relations with the United States (People v. Tierney, 57 Hun (N. Y.) 357, 589, 10 N. Y. Suppl. 940, 948); or of the insolvent condition of a bank in another state (Market Nat. Bank v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 465).

Seal.— The court cannot know judicially that a corporation (a railroad company) has a seal other than a scrawl, purporting to be a seal, which appears upon an appeal-bond. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Johnson, 40 Ill. 35. Courts do not judicially notice the seals of private corporations, but they must be proved. See CORPORATIONS, 10 Cyc. 1076.

The action of the board of directors of a corporation cannot be judicially noticed. Crawford v. Mobile Branch State Bank, 7 Ala. 205; Dunlap v. Wilson, 32 Ill. 517; Topp v. Watson, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 411.

42. Crawford v. Mobile Branch State Bank, 7 Ala. 205 (holding that a person appointed by the legislature to be a director of the state bank could not be judicially recognized as president, when chosen pro tempore by the board, and that his authority to perform an act belonging to that office must be established by proof); Brown v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 67 Mo. 122 (holding that courts will not know judicially the powers of officers of a corporation whose office is not created by the charter).

43. Douglass r. Mobile Branch Bank, 19 Ala. 659, holding that the courts of Alabama were bound to take judicial notice that the assets of the state bank and branches were placed by law in the hands of commissioners, who were authorized to sell or lease its real estate and to appoint assistant commissioners to aid in the adjustment and settlement of its affairs.

44. The courts do not know judicially that the members of a corporation are all citizens, although they may all be residents of the state (Lexington Mfg. Co. v. Dorr, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 256); or the general organization of churches, their administration and control over local churches of the denomination, and their property, etc. (Sarahass v. Armstrong, 16 Kan. 192, methodist episcopal church). e. Historical Facts. Judicial notice will be taken by state and federal courts of facts in relation to corporations which come within the rule that courts take notice of matters of history, as elsewhere explained.[49]

C. Of Matters of Law — 1. Unwritten Law — a. In General. The rules of the common law are judicially known to the courts in England[50] and in the United States;[51] and the same is true of the doctrines of equity jurisprudence.[52] In England the common law of Ireland and of Scotland is known to the house of lords, without proof,[53] but not to lower courts.[54]

b. Of the Forum. Courts judicially know as of course the unwritten law of the forum, which it is their function to administer,[55] and on appellate review of a judgment of a state court the United States supreme court takes judicial notice of course of the law of that state.[56] A common-law court as well as courts of equity will judicially notice the doctrines of equity jurisprudence and practice;[57] and conversely a court sitting in equity judicially knows the doctrines of the common law and the general rules for their administration.[58] A common-law court, however, does not judicially know the ecclesiastical law, even when dealing with matters affected by ecclesiastical law referred to in public acts of upon a railroad company to construct a bridge over a navigable river.

49. Thus judicial notice will be taken that the incorporation of companies of a certain class has frequently taken place under certain conditions. Ohio L. Ins., etc., Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. (U. (11) Mode of Proving the Law. In a few cases it has been held that the unwritten law[72] of a sister state or foreign country may be proved by the production of reports of decisions accredited therein;[73] but according to most of the authorities proof should be made by the testimony of witnesses speaking from their own knowledge,[74] who may, however, refer to printed reports or to text-books in order to refresh their memory,[75] and only for that purpose.[76] In this manner unwritten law consisting of mere practice and usage[77] may be proved as well as that which has received formal judicial sanction. The witnesses testify as experts,[78] and the court decides upon their qualifications.[79] Lawyers who are practising in the foreign jurisdiction[80] or other lawyers who are specially informed in the

Upon a subject of maritime law, especially of some country with which our own has little intercourse, perhaps the testimony of ship-masters and supercargoes would be considered competent. Perhaps, in a case like the present, the testimony of a president or secretary of an insurance company, as to a point of customary law, affecting mercantile rights, might be deemed competent, if given under a profession of being acquainted with it, and with the intent of stating his own knowledge of the law, with his means of knowledge." S.) 607, 625, 9 L. ed. 246, the court said: "The circuit courts of the United States are created by Congress, not for the purpose of administering the local law of a single State alone, but to administer the laws of all the States in the Union, in cases to which they respectively apply. The judicial power conferred on the general government by the Constitution, extends to many cases arising under the laws of the different States. . . . That jurisprudence is, then, in no just sense, a foreign jurisprudence, to be proved, in the courts of the United States, by the ordinary modes of proof by which the laws of a foreign country are to be established; but it is to be judicially taken notice of in the same manner as the laws of the United States are taken notice of by these courts.

the written law of another state for the purpose of giving full faith and credit, as required by the constitution of the United States, to a judgment of the other state;[21] but this view has been repudiated by the supreme court of the United States and by many of the state courts;[22] and the supreme court of the United States when reviewing on appeal or error a judgment of a state court does not take judicial notice of laws not thus noticed in the court below.[23]

c. Written Laws of Foreign Countries. It is also well settled as a general rule that courts do not take judicial cognizance of the written laws of a foreign country.[24] This is true of foreign laws creating corporations as well as of other

21. In State v. Hinchman, 27 Pa. St. 479, it was held that when an action is brought in a state court upon a judgment rendered by a court of another state, the written law of the latter must be judicially noticed so far as to determine whether or not the judgment is valid under that law; for the reason that the court cannot otherwise comply with the "full faith and credit" clause of the federal constitution (U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1), and furthermore because, the validity of the judgment being involved, a federal question is presented so that a decision declaring the judgment invalid may be reviewed on appeal or error by the United States supreme court, in which event the latter court would take judicial notice of the written law of the state where the judgment was rendered. This ruling and the reasons therefor were approved or the same conclusion reached independently in the following cases:

Previous knowledge of the court.— Where a court has once been properly informed of the terms of a private act and recognized it in a written opinion, the same court in subsequent cases will take judicial cogni-

requirement to the contrary;[29] and the same is true of private acts of congress.[30] The rule applies of course in the absence of a statute to the contrary to private acts creating or relating to private corporations,[31] and to private acts creating or conferring powers upon municipal corporations.[32] If a statute of a private nature contains a clause declaring it to be a public act, or if there is such a provision in a general law, it will be noticed by the courts as a public act.[33] Courts will also take judicial notice of a private statute which is recognized by a public act,[34] or by the constitution,[35] or which is recognized and amended by a public act.[36] The characteristics which distinguish private from public statutes are considered in another part of this work.[37]

e. Legislative Resolutions. Courts take judicial notice of legislative resolutions of a public character,[38] but not of private resolutions.[39]

29. In Junction R. Co. v. Ashland Bank, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 226, 230, 20 L. ed. 385, it was observed that "the courts in Indiana are authorized by the Constitution of that State to take judicial notice of all its laws;" consequently the federal court takes judicial notice of a private Indiana statute in accordance with the rule governing federal courts in respect of public state statutes. See supra, II, C, 2, b. In Miller v. Johnston, 71 Ark. 174, 72 S. W. 371, it was held that a statute requiring courts to take judicial notice of the laws of other states does not apply to private statutes of those states.

Contract with state.— In Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 578, 46 Pac. 670, 34 L. R. A. 262, it was held that where a complaint alleged that plaintiff, at the special instance and request of defendant state, rendered certain services as its agent, and sought to recover the agreed compensation therefor, the objection that the alleged employment was illegal might be raised by demurrer, since the court would take cognizance of the fact that there could be no valid contract without legislative authority, and by Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subds. 2, 3, was charged with knowledge of all public and private acts.

3. Government as Established by Law — a. In General. In some of the states courts are expressly required by statute to take judicial notice of whatever is established by law, and of public and private official acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the state and of the United States.[47] Excepting the provision for judicial notice of private official acts, these statutes seem to be merely declaratory of the preëxisting rule upon the subject.[48]

(D) Federal Officers. Courts judicially know who is or was the executive head of the United States;[84] the principal officers of state in the national government;[85] the heads of departments and of bureaus therein;[86] the permanent[87] or pro tempore[88] commissioner of patents; the commissioner of the general land-office,[89] his pro tempore substitute,[90] and principal subordinate officials;[91] the comptroller of the currency or a deputy acting as comptroller.[92] It has been held, however, that the state courts at least do not judicially notice a deputy United States marshal.[93]

(II) Elections and Appointments.[94] Since judicial knowledge of official position[95] implies knowledge of the methods by which it is legally obtained, state courts judicially know the date of holding a general election,[96] or a special election provided for by a general law,[97] and what officers are then to be elected, such as governor,[98] secretary of state,[99] county superintendent,[1] prosecuting attorney,[2] sheriff,[3] township trustee,[4] or president of the United States;[5] what party "tickets" were before the voters at a general election;[6] and the result of the election as shown by official returns.[7] A state court also judicially notices the gov-

Officers appointed by the power, and in conformity with the principles of the general government, are officers for the whole United States collectively, and for each state separately, so far as their functions relate to the interest of the states separately, or that of the citizens of each state, and quoad hæc, they are officers of the state, and as such are presumed to be generally known and recognized; for the government ought to know their governors and the authority by which they act."

or of a state,[56] and is one of general public interest, such as the selection of a tract of land to be donated by the federal government for the benefit of a state university,[57] sale of land scrip certificates,[58] or withdrawal of public lands from sale,[59] judicial notice thereof will be taken by state and federal courts. But executive acts of the same officials, if of slight general importance,[60] as for instance issuing land scrip under an Indian treaty by authority of the president,[61] filing a map of a railroad location in the interior department,[62] changing the name of a railroad corporation,[63] or regulating freight rates on a particular railroad[64] must be proved. While courts do not take judicial notice of the modes by which executive officers carry into effect a public statute,[65] the practice of the great executive departments or bureaus of the national government has much the force of unwritten law and may become so notorious as to be judicially known to the courts;[66] and where the fact is one that the court may judicially recognize its existence may be ascertained from the official records.[67]

(B) Inferior Officials. While a court of general jurisdiction will as a rule take judicial notice of an act of a local or inferior officer or board which nearly concerns the general public, such as the issuance of paper currency,[68] the assessment of taxes,[69] and other acts of general public interest,[70] it will decline to notice judicially the acts of inferior officers of purely local interest.[71]

(VII) PUBLIC SURVEYS. All courts in the United States take judicial notice of the original surveys of public lands under acts of congress;[72] the area,[73] location,[74]

as being within a state,[75] county,[76] or township,[77] of the lands surveyed; their numbering,[78] and the relative position[79] of counties[80] or townships[81] to meridian lines[82] or points of the compass;[83] the nomenclature[84] and relative size[85] of the territorial divisions thus established; how the divisions are constituted in particular instances,[86] including the position of the range lines;[87] their relation to the principal meridian;[88] and the location of fractional townships,[89] or, on the other hand, that a particular legal subdivision of a section of land is not fractional,[90] or that the township lines coincide with the sectional.[91] Judicial notice cannot be taken of the topography of the land surveyed,[92] or of its minor subdivisions,[93] nor probably of the position, on the ground, of a particular lot.[94] English courts take judicial notice of the geographical position of and general names applied to districts as shown on the admiralty chart made by public officials under requirement of law.[95]

c. Legislative Department — (1) Existence, Composition, and Proceedings. State and federal courts judicially recognize the existence of a state legislature,[96] and the time when a particular session thereof terminated;[97] and they know in a general way who constitute its members,[98] as well as the number composing the different branches;[99] but judicial notice is not taken that a particular person is privileged from arrest because he is a member of the legislature.[1] Subsidiary matters relating to the internal working of the legislature rather than to its law-making function will not be judicially noticed. Thus it has been held that reports of committees[2] and the proper methods of influencing legislation[3]

Although the court has not the power to decide who are the members of the general assembly, yet the judges thereof are bound to know what assemblage of men constitute the state legislature; for they are bound to know what the laws of the state are, in order to adjudicate upon the rights of the litigants under the law. 3. The court has no judicial knowledge whether or not there are proper and legiti-are matters which must be established by evidence. Nor can the court, in determining the validity of appropriations, know the amount of revenue raised.[4]

(II) Legislative Journals. Journals of the legislature being not only the official records of a coördinate branch of government kept under requirement of law, but also important as bearing on the validity and meaning of statute law which it is the function of courts to know and enforce, are according to the weight of authority judicially noticed by the courts.[5]

(III) Political Divisions[6] — (A) In General. Courts judicially know the boundaries claimed by[7] and the political divisions[8] of the government within which they exercise jurisdiction, whether these divisions exist for election pur-mate modes of expending money in procuring the passage of an act of the legislature, and therefore it cannot say that an averment in an answer of such expenditure, with such purpose and result, is either immaterial or vicious. Judah v. Vincennes University, 16 Ind. 56.

4. Validity of appropriations.— Although the court must take judicial notice of the constitutional methods provided for raising revenue, it cannot take notice of the amount so raised and received until it is shown that the income for the two years for which the legislative appropriations are made is not sufficient to meet such appropriations, but will assume that the legislature kept within the constitutional limits. (B) Counties and County-Seats.[16] Courts judicially notice counties,[17] their area,[18] boundaries,[19] location,[20] names,[21] and date of organization;[22] but notice cannot be taken that a particular piece of land is within a certain county.[23] In

d. Judicial Department — (I) Judicial Notice by State Courts — (A) In General. Judges of state courts take judicial notice of the organization, jurisdiction, and powers of their own court,[48] and of other tribunals created by the constitution or established by statute,[49] and of the official seals of state and federal courts,[50] but not of the private seals of judges or their clerks,[51] nor the seals of foreign municipal courts.[52] Federal courts are regarded as domestic tribunals by the state courts, and judicial notice is taken of their jurisdiction,[53] including jurisdiction over places ceded by the state,[54] but not of their jurisdiction over land purchased or condemned by the United States.[55] State courts recognize in a general way the notorious jurisdiction of superior tribunals in other states[56] or in Canada,[57] and salient facts regarding them, as that the supreme courts are courts of record.[58] held that officers such as deputy sheriffs, not commissioned in the name of the state, are not judicially recognized ;[12] but other cases are to the contrary.[13]

(4) Prosecuting and Other Attorneys. Courts judicially recognize prosecuting attorneys[14] and their assistants[15] within the jurisdiction, and also their signatures,[16] although the official designation be erroneously given ;[17] and the commencement and duration of their terms of office.[18] An attorney at law is judicially recognized by the court in which he is admitted to practice.[19] His signature in his professional capacity when attached to pleadings, etc., is likewise known ;[20] but not his signature in a personal capacity,[21] as for example when he is acting as his own attorney.[22] A court cannot judicially know particular facts concerning an attorney of its bar, as that he is in actual practice[23] or has removed from the state ;[24] and a superior court will not take judicial notice of attorneys admitted to practice in lower courts but not members of its own bar.[25]

(F) Practice and Procedure. While courts take judicial cognizance of the practice prevailing in their own tribunal,[26] and assume a general similarity in the procedure of other courts,[27] including those of equity,[28] in the same jurisdiction, they do not, in the absence of statutory requirement,[29] take judicial notice of the rules of practice in other courts of equal or inferior authority,[30] or of the practice or procedure of courts in another state.[31]

(c) In Supplementary Proceedings. Where proceedings supplementary to an original action are practically part of it, such as garnishment proceedings,[62] or proceedings against a stock-holder on a judgment against a corporation of which he is a member,[63] the court takes judicial cognizance of the record in the original suit and of the facts shown by it;[64] and it is not prejudicial error to reject the record altogether when offered as evidence.[65] Where, however, garnishment[66] or other supplementary proceedings[67] are independent, a judgment recovered in the main action must be duly proved in the new proceeding.[68]

(d) In Other Suits in Same Court. A judge is not at liberty to give one of the parties the benefit of a fact known to himself, simply because it is a matter of record in his own court.[69] Courts, including those of probate,[70] cannot in one case take judicial notice of their records in another and different case,[71] even though the cases are connected.[72] But where a fact, such as the pendency of an indictment against a juryman,[73] concerns the proper administration of justice; or where the interests of the public in ascertaining the truth are of paramount importance, the court may properly resort to an inspection of its record in other cases.[74]

99. National recognition binding on courts. — In the case of a foreign government, "who is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory is not a judicial, but a political, question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges, as well as all other officers, citizens, and subjects of that government." and great seal[2] of that nation or its provinces.[3] For a like reason,[4] reinforced by the construction of a federal statute,[5] all courts in the United States take judicial notice of the seals of the several states and territories,[6] but these seals are not judicially known in the courts of a foreign nation.[7] The seal of the United States is judicially noticed by state courts.[8] Seals of foreign municipalities[9] or of executive departments in other states or countries[10] will not be judicially noticed in the absence of statutory requirement.[11] The seal of a court of admiralty[12] or vice-admiralty[13] will be judicially noticed, as those courts are recognized by the law of nations. The seal of a notary public is in the same legal position.[14]

D. How Acquired — 1. By the Judge — a. Matters of Fact. Judicial knowledge is distinctive and technical; that which a judge has qua judge, part of the mental equipment which the ideal judge would have in order to discharge perfectly the duties of his position. In matters of fact the knowledge of a particular judge may vary from that of the ideal judge by being either greater or less. Except as to quasi-matters of law, such as the existence of a foreign law[15] or facts directly established by the law of the forum; or in order to prevent loss of time in proving a fact on which the parties are already agreed by an announcement from the judge that he already knows it, a judge is not at liberty to treat as judicial knowledge any personal knowledge of a fact not generally known.[16] Where, on the other hand, as frequently happens,[17] the actual knowledge of the judge is less than the knowledge of the ideal judge, or where he regards the fact as not sufficiently notorious to be made a subject of judicial cognizance,[18] a judge may decline to know it. This he may do, either absolutely,[19] in which case the party to whose cause the fact is relevant must establish its existence by evidence,[20] or conditionally, that is, until he may become satisfied that the fact is as it is.

claimed to be. To attain mental certainty, he may require the assistance of the party who invokes his judicial knowledge; he may investigate the matter for himself, or he may pursue both courses.[21] The scope, direction, and details of such investigation are entirely within the discretion and under the direction of the judge, uncontrolled by the rules of evidence or the wishes or suggestions of the parties,[22] who have no right to produce evidence on the subject.[23] This is especially true as to the significance of words of ordinary meaning, such as "drugs and medicines"[24] or "peach yellows."[25] Although, in discharge of the court's function of construction, the evidence may properly be received and such reception is not erroneous because unnecessary,[26] it is just as much an error for the court to mistake a fact of which it has taken cognizance as to mistake a principle of law.[27] This power of the court is not only valuable in shortening trials of fact, but it is useful to an appellate court by preventing reversals where the evidence on the record fails to establish a result which is in accordance with substantial justice.[28] The judge may resort to or obtain information from any source of knowledge which he feels would be helpful to him,[29] including public official documents of all kinds, whether of the state[30] or national government; such as those in the state[31] or navy[32] departments, census bureau,[33] or land-office.[34] Indeed he may resort to any public document[35] properly authenticated;[36] to dictionaries,[37] books, periodicals, and public addresses.[38] He may even inquire of others.[39] On matters of public history he may examine public documents,[40] histories,[41] or other writings or historical data. Production of histories in evidence.— The earlier practice in England was that facts of history, if ancient, were shown by the production in jury trials of the history itself in evidence. Brounker v. Atkyns, Skin. 14; In re St. Catherine's Hospital, 1 Vent. 149. Such also has been decided to be the proper course in several states of the United States. McKinnon v. Bliss, 21 N. L. 587), and it has been suggested that he must be dead (Morris v. Harmer, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 554, 8 L. ed. 781). The fact that the matter is one of judicial cognizance is shown in the rule that a history is only admissible in evidence to show a notorious fact of general public interest, that is, precisely the matters as to which judicial cognizance is taken. 58. "There was no error in the admission of Webster's International Dictionary. logical facts may resort to an almanac [59] or calendar,[60] which is not evidence [61] any more than the date on a newspaper would be if used for the same purpose, but which may be admitted into the evidence in the case if so superfluous an act should be deemed advisable.[62] A recognized source of information as to certain matters to be judicially known may be established by law. Thus Canadian courts take judicial cognizance of appointments promulgated in the official gazette.[63]

b. Matters of Law. In the absence of statutory regulation [64] the only required judicial cognizance is that the judge should know the law. Such knowledge is of the essence of the judicial office. If a particular judge does not know what the law is on a given point, as where a statute is recent,[65] it is his duty to ascertain. In so doing he may, as in cases of optional cognizance, resort to any source of information which he thinks enlightening,[66] such as documents in the office of the secretary of state,[67] election returns and records,[68] etc.; "always seeking first for that which in its nature is most appropriate, unless the positive law has enacted a different rule." [69] But a judge may require the assistance of the parties; as where it is prescribed by rule of court that all statutes relied on shall be set out in a party's brief.[70] He cannot be required to hear evidence to guide him in exercising his judicial function of knowing a matter of law.[71] No evidence is necessary, for while statutes, opinions, and text-books are frequently read to the court, it is "not because that is evidence, for no evidence is necessary, as the judges are presumed to know the law, but the book is read to refresh their memory." [72]

2. By the Jury. While, contrary to the early practice,[73] a jury in finding the existence of a controverted fact are to be confined as a rule to the evidence submitted to them during the trial, and will not be permitted to use as evidence facts within the merely individual knowledge of particular jurymen,[74] including facts bearing on the character of witnesses[75] or facts of a historical nature[76] — the rule being that where a juror knows a fact material to the issue he must disclose and testify to it in court[77] — jurors are entitled to use the facts which are part of common knowledge,[78] experience,[79] and observation[80] in the community, and, indeed, must necessarily do so.[81] They may utilize such facts not only at the stage of inference[82] or judgment[83] in deciding what the facts in evidence establish,[84] but may also use such notorious facts in correlating,[85] supplementing,[86] and giving coherence to other facts in evidence,[87] or in determining the credit to be given to witnesses;[88] but these facts cannot be used to take the place of any essential evidentiary facts.[89] Among facts of such common notoriety that a jury may take cognizance of them are the attractiveness to children of an irregularly piled heap of lumber;[90] the ordinary motives influencing men,[91] such as the instinct of self-preservation,[92] the desire not to waste time, as in playing faro with no hope of gain[93] or searching for a horse which has no value;[94] the general price of land;[95] that certain beverages are intoxicating;[96] that sea-water damages dry-goods;[97] the effect of obstacles in deflecting currents of air;[98] or that a lighted pipe in the

III. BURDEN OF PROOF.[2]*

A. Confusion of Terms. While the phrase "burden of proof" is one of double meaning and, although the attendant confusion has been so great as to suggest the propriety of adopting one less objectionable,[3] it has a firmly established place in legal phraseology and cannot well be superseded. The ambiguity lies in the word "proof," when used indifferently as representing either the effect of introducing sufficient evidence or the means employed or required to obtain this result.[4] "Burden of proof," as a phrase, means therefore either: (1) The necessity of establishing the existence of a certain fact or set of facts by evidence which preponderates to a legally required extent;[5] or (2) the necessity which rests on a party at any particular time during a trial to create a prima facie case in his own favor or to overthrow one when created against him. In this article the phrase "burden of evidence" will be applied to this second meaning, and the phrase "burden of proof" to the necessity of finally establishing a fact or facts in issue. "Burden of evidence" represents a very ordinary and, indeed, inevitable incident of any contest which is to be decided by the use of reason as influenced by facts and argument. Confusion can, to a certain extent, be avoided, and apparent contradictions reconciled, by bearing in mind the distinction between "burden of proof" and "burden of evidence," to be hereinafter stated, and also the fact that in the vast majority of cases any such distinction is entirely ignored by the courts.[6]

B. Burden of Proof Properly So-Called — 1. In General. The general rule is that w[illegible]r has the affirmative of the issue, as determined by the pleadings, or, where there are no pleadings, by the nature of the investigation, has the burden of proof.[7] It never shifts from that party either in civil[8] or in

Shifting under statutory pleading.— When under statutory pleading a defendant sets up an affirmative defense in his evidence it is said that the burden of proof is shifted. criminal[9] cases. Where a party erroneously assumes the burden of proof as to a particular allegation or the burden of evidence as to a particular fact, the mistake will not be corrected in the appellate court.[10]

2. Negative Allegations.[11] What allegations are necessary to constitute a sufficient case is a question of substantive law;[12] but whenever, under the rules of substantive law applicable to the rights or liabilities in dispute between the parties, an affirmative case requires proof of a material negative allegation, the party, whether plaintiff[13] or defendant,[14] has the burden of proving it,[15] so far as sell, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 69, 77. In like manner when plaintiff in his evidence makes an affirmative reply, in confession and avoidance, to defendant's affirmative defense, it is said that the burden of proof is again shifted. But the burden of proof is not shifting. The parties are merely trying to find where it really is. They are doing the work at the trial which it was the preliminary function of pleading to do. Practically they are pleading ore tenus. Thayer Prelim. Treat. Ev. 379. This explains the apparent necessity for a distinction which was early suggested and still may be traced in the decisions to the effect that where the party who does not have the burden of proof contents himself with introducing evidence directly negativing the existence of facts essential to the case against him, the burden of proof continues to be on the party having the affirmative of the issue; but that where the party having the negative of the issue undertakes to establish some independent fact inconsistent with those which his opponent claims the burden of proof shifts to him. Affirmative of issue, not of proposition.— The phrase "he who affirms must prove — ei incumbit probatio qui dicit non qui negat" (Marigny v. Union Bank, 12 Rob. (La.) 283; Sowell v. Cox, 10 Rob. (La.) 68; Crowninshield v. Crowninshield, 2 Gray (Mass.) 524), occasionally put in the form of a presumption, "presumitur pro negante" (Union Nat. C. 299; McKinnon v. Burrows, 3 U. C. Q. B. O. S. 114); or that the burden of proof is on the party who has the "affirmative of any proposition" (People v. Schryver, 42 N. Y. 1, 1 Am. Rep. 480). But this is not an adequate statement of the law. See infra, III, C, 3.

but not necessarily to explain or disprove the allegations of his opponent.[22] It follows that where a defendant denies an allegation material to the plaintiff's case, the burden is on the plaintiff to establish its truth,[23] whether the action be in contract[24] or in tort.[25] Should defendant not traverse, generally or specifically, the allegations of plaintiff's case, but on the contrary rely upon an affirmative defense in abatement,[26] or confession and avoidance,[27] which plaintiff denies, the reached by the constructive admission, peculiar to that system, implied in not traversing a particular allegation, a plaintiff in equity has the burden of proving all allegations of his bill not expressly admitted by the answer.[34] Where a defendant pleads an affirmative defense or sets up in his answer facts in avoidance the burden of proof is upon him.[35]

5. Under Statutory Pleading — a. In General. A division, by no means exact, exists between jurisdictions where statutory modification of the common-law rules of pleading has been comparatively slight, and those in which divergence is more radical, and a result reached which has been denominated "statutory pleading." Under this system analogies in equity pleading are usually followed. The doctrine of constructive admission is rejected; each allegation in the statement of a plaintiff's claim not distinctly admitted being regarded as denied,[36] and the burden of proof is on plaintiff to establish such allegations,[37] even though the denial be argumentative,[38] as by setting up a new contract,[39] or a price differing from that claimed,[40] and although it is accompanied by a plea qualifying the denial, but not admitting the truth of the allegation.[41] A defendant may, instead of a distinct affirmative plea, state in his answer a sufficient number of express admissions to establish plaintiff's prima facie case and so transfer the burden of proof to himself.[42]

b. Set-Off or Counter-Claim. Where a defendant pleads a set-off or counter-claim which is denied the burden of proving it is upon him;[43] but if no fact essential to the counter-claim or set-off is denied, and an affirmative defense to it is relied on, the burden of proof as to such defense is on plaintiff.[44] In either case where the burden of proof on the issue is finally placed by the pleadings it remains throughout the trial.[45]

6. In Special Judicial Proceedings. The rule regulating the burden of proof in special judicial proceedings is the same that governs where an issue has been formulated by pleadings. He who asks affirmative relief — one for example who

C. Burden of Evidence — 1. In General. As the burden of proof is invariably determined by the rules of pleading, so the position of the burden of evidence is controlled by the logical necessities of making proof which a party is under at the time the question of its position becomes important; the burden of evidence being always upon that party against whom the decision of the tribunal would be given if no further evidence were introduced,[53] or, to speak more accurately, if no evidence were introduced which the judge would permit the jury to consider as the basis of their verdict.[54] It results from this that at the beginning of every trial the burden of proof and the burden of evidence are on the same party as to the existence of every fact essential to the affirmative case,[55]

having the burden of proof may establish a prima facie case in several ways. (1) He may prove facts which give rise to an inference of that probative weight;[61] or (2) he may establish the existence of some legal substitute for such an inference of fact;[62] or (3) he may proceed by a combination of these methods as to the whole or different parts of his case. When such a prima facie case is established, the burden of evidence is then shifted upon the party who does not have the affirmative of the issue,[63] the position of the burden of proof being in no way affected.[64] Since affirmative action of the tribunal demands that the party who has the burden of proof shall at the end of the trial stand possessed of a prima facie case in his favor, the party who has not the affirmative of the issue succeeds, for the time being, if he can impair the prima facie quality of the case against him, and the burden of evidence thereupon returns to the party having the burden of proof;[65] and this process continues until the stock of relevant facts is exhausted.[66]

inference of fact which the law assumes to be correct, establishes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a prima facie case and thereby sustains the burden of evidence on the point which it covers,[68] it is frequently said that presumptions of law shift the burden of proof,[69] meaning the burden of evidence; but no special function, however, in this regard attaches to a presumption of law. Any substitute for legal evidence which regulates the burden of evidence or establishes a prima facie case produces the same result. Among these substitutes for evidence are judicial admissions,[70] stipulations,[71] rules of substantive law,[72] and statutory regulations prescribing what shall constitute prima facie evidence of specified facts.[73] On the position of the burden of proof, properly so called, the existence of any particular inference of fact can have no effect, even should it constitute a prima facie case;[74] or should further proof be excused by a rule of law.[75]

3. PROOF OF NEGATIVE FACTS. The party whose contention requires proof of a negative fact has the burden of evidence to prove that fact.[76] In deciding, however, what quantum of evidence shall be deemed sufficient, the practical limitations on proof imposed by the nature of the subject-matter or the relative situation of the parties will be considered,[77] and the burden of evidence will be sustained by proof which renders probable the existence of the negative fact;[78] circumstantial evidence being sufficient[79] and nothing in the nature of a demonstration being required.[80]

the existence of facts which the party having that burden is called upon to negative,[81] or where for any reason the evidence to prove a fact is chiefly if not entirely within the control of the adverse party,[82] it has been held that the burden of proof, meaning the burden of evidence, is on the party who knows or has special opportunity for knowing the fact,[83] even in criminal cases,[84] although he is obliged to go no further than necessity requires.[85] It is, however, entirely anomalous that mere difficulty in discharging a burden of making proof should under all circumstances and to any extent displace it.[86] As a matter of principle the difficulty only relieves the party having the burden of evidence from the necessity of creating positive conviction entirely by his own testimony. Should he produce the evidence in his power its probative effect is enhanced by the silence of his opponent.[87] Conversely, where the party on whom rests the burden of evidence as to a particular fact has the essential documents or evidence within his control, a peculiar clearness of proof is demanded,[88] although the fact be negative.[89] Ambiguity, concealment, or evasion react with peculiar force on a pleader who asserts a fact and fails to produce the evidence which if his assertion were true would be in his possession.[90]

IV. ADMISSIONS.*

A. Definitions. "Admissions," in the law of evidence, have been defined as being concessions or voluntary acknowledgments made by a party [91] of the existence of certain facts,[92] and have been said to be direct or express,[93] implied or indirect,[94] or incidental,[95] and either judicial or extrajudicial, the former being such admissions as appear of record in the proceedings of a court.[96] More accurately regarded, they are statements by a party or someone identified with him in legal interest, of the existence of a fact which is relevant to the cause of his adversary. "Admissions" have been distinguished from "confessions" in that the latter term is applied only in criminal cases, and by the fact that even in criminal cases it is properly applied only to acknowledgments of guilt.[97] The 92. Bouvier L. Dict.

Other definitions are: "A voluntary acknowledgment, confession, or concession of the existence of a fact or the truth of an allegation made by a party to the suit." Black L. Dict.

"An admission may be defined as a statement or act which amounts to the affirmance of some fact material to the issue, where such affirmance would be against the interest of the party making it." McKelvey Ev. 90.

"An admission is a statement oral or written, suggesting any inference as to any fact in issue or relevant or deemed to be relevant to any such fact, made by or on behalf of any party to any proceeding." Stephen Dig. Ev. art. 15.

93. "Direct, called also express, admissions are those which are made in direct terms." Bouvier L. Dict.

"An admission made openly and in direct terms." Anderson L. Dict.

94. "Implied admissions are those which result from some act or failure to act of the party." Bouvier L. Dict.

An implied admission "results from an act done or undone; as, from character assumed, from conduct or silence." Anderson L. Dict.

"Admissions may be expressed in language or in conduct. The former may be called 'direct,' the latter 'indirect,' admissions." McKelvey Ev. 91.

95. "Incidental admissions are those made in some other connection, or involved in the admission of some other fact." Bouvier L. Dict.

96. Black L. Dict.; Bouvier L. Dict.

Other definitions.— A "judicial or solemn admission" is one "so plainly made in pleadings filed, or in the progress of a trial, as to dispense with the stringency of some rule of practice." Anderson L. Dict.

"As to the different kinds of self-harming statements. In the first place, they are either 'judicial' or 'extra judicial,' — in judicio or extra judicium — according as they are made in the course of a judicial proceeding, or under any other circumstances." Best Ev. (Chamberlayne ed.) § 522.

"In the law of pleading and evidence, an admission is an acknowledgment that an allegation is true. It may be made extra-judicially, as where a person admits his indebtedness. An admission in judicio may be made by a party to an action either expressly by a notice or pleading, or impliedly by failure to deliver a pleading or to traverse an allegation made by his opponent; sometimes the parties agree to make admissions of facts or documents in order to save the expense of proving them." Rapalje & L. L. Dict.

"In addition to estoppels by deed, there are two classes of admissions which fall under this head of conclusive presumptions of law; namely, solemn admissions, or admissions in judicio, which have been solemnly made in the course of judicial proceedings, either expressly, and as a substitute for proof of the fact, or tacitly, by pleading; and unsolemn admissions, extra judicium, which have been acted upon, or have been made to influence the conduct of others, or to derive some advantage to the party, and which cannot afterwards be denied without a breach of good faith. Of the former class are all agreements of counsel, dispensing with legal proof of facts." 1 Greenleaf Ev. § 27.

"Judicial admissions, or those made in court by the party's attorney, generally appear either of record, as in pleading, or in the solemn admission of the attorney, made for the purpose of being used as a substitute for the regular legal evidence of the fact at the trial, or in a case stated for the opinion of the Court." 1 Greenleaf Ev. § 205.

Ev. art. 21 (where a confession is defined as "an admission made at any time by a person charged with a crime, stating or suggesting the inference, that he committed that crime"). "The

B. Extrajudicial Admissions — 1. IN GENERAL. A voluntary,[99] and certain [1] statement, oral or written,[2] of the existence of any relevant [3] matter of fact [4] is competent evidence against the party by whom or by whose authority it is made, as a fact tending to show the truth of the statement.[5] Admissions made in civil may be used in criminal cases [6] and admissions made in criminal may be used in civil cases.[7] So also those made in equity may be used at law and vice versa.[8] Admissions are equally competent whether offered in real [9] or personal [10]

term 'admission' is usually applied to civil actions, and 'confession' to acknowledgments of guilt in criminal prosecutions. actions or in probate[11] or divorce[12] proceedings. Testimony of a party on a trial may be used against him on a subsequent trial of the same case.[13] A party cannot ordinarily put his own declarations in evidence,[14] nor are they made admissions of the other party merely by being communicated to him,[15] unless his conduct in connection with such a communication should itself be a relevant fact.[16] An oral admission may be proved by any one who heard it,[17] unless it was a legally privileged communication to the witness,[18] and the fact that a statement is intended for private or confidential use[19] does not exclude it. The weight and sufficiency of extrajudicial admissions is considered in a subsequent section.[20]

3. Relevancy, Certainty, and Voluntary Character — a. Relevancy. It is essential to admissibility that the statement offered should supply the place of a relevant fact in a party's burden of evidence,[24] at the time when the evidence is offered.[25] The statement may be excluded for remoteness in point of time,[26] or because it relates to a fact not included in the issue or relevant to it.[27]

b. Certainty. An admission should possess the same degree of certainty as would be required in the evidence which it represents, and mere conjectures,[28] suggestions as to what might have happened if certain circumstances had not occurred,[29] what was the understanding, and the like,[30] are not competent.[31] But it is not essential that the statement should be absolutely precise.[32] Nor is it

Statements by way of impeachment.— A somewhat looser test of relevancy is adopted where a party's statement is not offered as independent proof but to discredit his testimony by showing that he has made prior statements on a material point inconsistent therewith. Proof of these statements is very frequently allowed a wide range. Skillman v. Leverich, 11 La. 517; Lord v. Bigelow, 124 Mass. 185; Glenn v. Lehnen, 54 Mo. 45; Wiseman v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 30 Mo. App. 516; Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Eckles, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 651; Arnold v. Caldwell, 1 Manitoba 81, 155. But the range is not so extended as to cover clearly irrelevant facts. Zonker v. Cowan, 84 Ind. 395. And see, generally, Witnesses. Admissible inconsistent statements of a party are not as in case of an ordinary witness simply destructive of the effect of the testimony of the witness; but they may be used as admissions whenever they cover a fact which is included in the burden of evidence of his opponent. Copeland v. Taylor, 99 Mass. 613; Fowler v. Middlesex County Com'rs, 6 Allen (Mass.) 92. Hence it is not necessary to lay the foundation usually required in case of an ordinary witness when an inconsistent statement of a party is to be introduced in evidence. But the rule of exclusion does not apply where plaintiff's record title is conceded and defendant in ejectment sets up an independent title acquired by acts in pais, in which case defendant's statements in disparagement of his title are competent (Mann v. Cavanaugh, 110 Ky. 776, 62 S. W. 854, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 238); and no good reason is perceived why defendant's admission of the validity of plaintiff's title should not be received quantum valebit, or why the statements of plaintiff as to the weakness of his own title should not be competent (Clarke v. Vankirk, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 354. But see Paull v. Mackey, 3 Watts (Pa.) 110).

Fact of damage.— A statement by a party that he will claim no damages is not an admission that he has suffered none. Driscoll v. Taunton, 160 Mass. 486, 36 N. E. 495.

Admission of indebtedness.— The statements of a partner, when informed that a balance sheet taken from the firm's books showed him to be indebted in a certain sum, that if they were in the handwriting of the bookkeeper who as a matter of fact made them they must be correct could not of itself amount to an admission of a specific indebtedness appearing thereon, the sheets not being present at the time. Nichols v. Allen, 112 Mass. 23.

necessary that it should be a direct admission; it may be an indirect admission, as where it bears on the issue incidentally or circumstantially.[33]

c. Voluntary Character. An admission is not of sufficient probative weight to be competent unless it is voluntary.[34] But an admission is none the less voluntary because it was made by a witness testifying on a trial in court in obedience to compulsory process,[35] or during any other legal proceeding,[36] or because the declarant was in the custody of an officer.[37] A statement is admissible, although made in response to a false suggestion of fact.[38]

4. Oral or Written — a. Oral Admissions. Oral admissions of a party are competent evidence against him,[39] even if there is an admission in writing to the same effect,[40] such as a bill of exchange,[41] a promissory note,[42] a book entry,[43] or a written agreement;[44] and although a writing might be required to achieve the same result in another way.[45] Whether the competency of oral evidence is confined to admissions of facts which may properly be proved or includes the contents of written instruments is a question upon which authorities are in conflict.[46] The existence of any facts which are legally competent at law or in equity to affect the operation of a written instrument may be established by oral admissions.[47] A competent oral admission may be made through an interpreter,[48] through a telephone operator,[49] or by means of the telephone itself.[50]

b. Written Admissions — (i) In General. Admissions may be written as well as oral. They may be contained in any writings,[51] including those which are customarily employed in mercantile affairs,[52] in proceedings in probate courts,[53]

The evidence is primary.— The written admission is of no higher grade than the oral, although under most circumstances of greater probative force; and therefore it is not necessary to produce or account for the writing itself. Fryer v. Brown, R. & M. 145, 21 E. C. L. 720.

57. Returns for taxation are indeed statements of the party, and good faith requires, it is said, that they be regarded as true. On the other hand it has not escaped judicial attention that tax lists are not, at least in all instances, compiled with the object of giving an exact list of property at its full value, that the declarant is often not a competent judge of value, and that consequently a liberal range of estimate may be consistent with entire good faith. These considerations have led many courts to reject these lists as evidence on the question of value. Swaim v. Swaim, 134 Ind. 596, 33 N. E. 792; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. McDougall, 108 Ind. 179, 8 N. E. 571; German Mut. Ins. Co. v. Niewedde, 11 Ind. App. 624, 39 N. Independent relevancy.— It may be observed that tax lists are frequently said to contain a party's admissions when the real point is that the entries or admissions from such a list are circumstantial evidence that the party at a particular time claimed (Washburn v. Dannenberg Co., 117 Ga. 567, 44 S. E. 97; Lefever v. Johnson, 79 Ind. 554; Painter v. Hall, 75 Ind. 208) or did not claim (Lefever v. Johnson, 79 Ind. 554; Whitfield v. Whitfield, 40 Miss. 352) to own certain property.

W. 979, where the court said: "Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of an obituary notice, published with the sanction of one of the contestants, reciting the intelligence and remarkable memory of testatrix during the latter part of her life. It is argued that this was an admission by the contestant that when this will was executed testatrix was of sound mind. It seems to us that this evidence was objectionable. . . . Such a notice does not purport to be, and is not understood as, a statement of facts from which any one is justified in drawing legal conclusions."

written statement as an admission the "best evidence rule," so called, does not apply; and a copy of a letter for example is competent when identified without accounting for the original.[62]

(II) Specialties. A competent admission may be made in a sealed instrument, such as a bond,[63] a deed,[64] a release,[65] or an assignment of judgment.[66]

(III) Promissory Notes. A promissory note or an indorsement thereon may embody an admission of the amount lent[67] or paid[68] on the note.

(IV) Letters. Letters may constitute written admissions,[69] and to render them admissible in evidence it is not necessary that they shall have been sent to the party offering them,[70] nor that a letter to which they are replies shall be produced or accounted for;[71] and they are admissible even if, the sender being dead, the party receiving them cannot testify against his estate.[72] But the letters must be affirmatively shown otherwise than by regularity of business dealings[73] to have been written by the party against whom they are offered,[74] or by someone for whose act he is proved to be responsible,[75] either originally or by ratification.[76] A party is entitled to select such relevant statements in his adversary's letter as he chooses to rely upon, and other statements therein are not competent when self-serving,[77] except so far as reasonably necessary to explain the admissions.[78] Letters addressed to a party are not competent evidence against him,[79] unless they are shown to have been received by him,[80] and in connection with his reply,[81]

An offer to do something by way of compromise cannot be called an admission,[90] as it is made tentatively and hypothetically[91] to avoid controversy and save the expense of litigation.[92] Therefore the fact of an unaccepted offer of compromise is irrelevant on the issue of liability,[93] whether the offer be made by the party against

A reason frequently assigned for rejecting offers of compromise is that public policy requires that a party shall be able to "buy his peace," without danger of being prejudiced should the effort fail. Condition attached.— But a proposal to compromise a matter in controversy does not cease to be such merely because it is coupled only questions discussed. A promise to do "the fair thing," [11] or a suggestion of submitting the matter to arbitration,[12] is a competent fact, failure to deny liability being the significant circumstance.[13] Suggestions of suppressing incriminating evidence,[14] of compounding a crime,[15] of marrying the complainant in bastardy proceedings,[16] or of the party's ability to use indirect influences "to divide the jury," [17] are admissible as facts independent of an offer to adjust a controversy.[18] In order to secure exclusion of a statement as an offer of compromise it is not essential that it shall have been made expressly on the faith of compromise negotiations.[19] It is sufficient if this fact can be satisfactorily inferred from the circumstances under which the statement was made;[20] for example the existence of negotiations for a settlement,[21] the pendency of litigation,[22] a distinct denial of liability,[23] or the fact that the claim is for a stipulated amount, so that the entire sum is due, if anything.[24]

b. Independent Relevancy of Offer. An offer of compromise may be admissible as relevant circumstantial evidence to prove a fact other than that of liability,[25] such as due diligence,[26] waiver,[27] good faith in making a claim, validity of claim,[28] reliance upon an alleged promise,[29] or interest in the event of the suit.[30] Evidence of a compromise offered by plaintiffs is properly rejected, where it does not appear that defendant himself made the offer or authorized it or knew that an offer was made.[31]

c. Statements of Independent Facts in Offer. Statements of facts independent of the concession involved in an offer of compromise are competent as admissions,[32] since they are supposed to have been made because of belief in their truth.[33] Although such statements directly relate to a compromise offer,[34] or were made pending compromise negotiations,[35] or at an interview during which the terms of a compromise were discussed,[36] or probably would not have been made at all except upon the assumption that they would facilitate a settlement,[37] they are nevertheless admissible. In other words, an admissible statement of fact need not be independent of the subject-matter of the controversy; it is sufficient if the statement is a distinct admission of a fact, as distinguished from an offer to buy peace or settle a controversy.[38] If a letter contains a statement of fact which cannot be separated from an offer of compromise associated with it, the objectionable part will exclude the whole letter;[39] and the same result occurs where the parts are separable but the letter is offered in evidence as an entirety.[40]

d. Admissions Made in Offer "Without Prejudice." A party's admission of liability or of other facts in the course of negotiations for a compromise is not competent evidence against him when the admission is expressly stated to be made "without prejudice."[41] Nor can it be used even for a collateral purpose,[42] for example to avoid the statute of limitations,[43] or to prove knowledge on the part of the declarant.[44] The words "without prejudice" are not indispensable, an equivalent expression being equally efficacious,[45] and, indeed, an agreement not to make prejudicial use of an admission may be inferred from circumstances.[46] The rule of exclusion covers negotiations made in a letter,[47] and where correspondence is begun with a statement that the negotiations are "without prejudice," a letter in reply, although not so limited, is within the same privilege.[48] Conversely a reservation in one letter may protect the statements of a prior letter in the same correspondence.[49] A party may use his letter written "without prejudice" if he reserves the right to do so under stated conditions or for certain purposes;[50] but the other party will be at liberty to use it for a similar purpose.[51] So if the effect of a statement as an admission of a particular fact or set of facts is expressly restricted this limitation will be regarded as the only one and the statement will be competent for other purposes.[52]

The protection afforded by Canadian courts to a party in making statements in communications made "without prejudice" is liberal, provided such statements are made fairly and in good faith. All communications expressed to be written without prejudice, and fairly made for the purpose of expressing the writer's views on the matter of litigation or dispute, as well as overtures for settlement or compromise, and which are not made with some other object in view or wrong motives, are not admissible in evidence. Where therefore a letter written without prejudice and coming within the above rule was admitted at the trial, and the court was not able to say that defendant was not prejudiced thereby, a new trial was directed. Pirie v. Wyld, 11 Ont. 422. The rule in England is more strict. An express statement that the offer is by way of compromise is required. is not within the rule hereinbefore stated [54] which excludes offers of compromise as evidence.[55] Letters, although written "without prejudice," may be used to prove the terms and binding force of a completed agreement for settlement of the differences involved.[56]

f. Functions of Court and Jury. Where it appears that a jury may reasonably find on the evidence that a statement claimed to have been made as an offer of compromise was in fact an independent admission, the statement may be received in evidence and the jury instructed not to consider it if found to be a mere offer.[57] So if a letter or an entire correspondence introduced in evidence includes negotiations for compromise and independent admissions of fact connected therewith, the irrelevant portion should be pointed out to the jury with instructions to disregard it.[58]

6. Admissions by Conduct — a. In General. A party's conduct, including statements, so far as definitely connected with a fact in issue,[59] is often relevant [60] as circumstantial evidence of an admission.[61] The range of this class of evidence is limited by no more definite tests than (1) that the fact is relevant, and (2) that it was done by the opposite party or by someone for whose act he is responsible. It may be shown for example on an issue as to whether a definite relation exists that a party has recognized its existence.[62] Title to an office may be shown as against the incumbent by evidence that he has discharged its duties.[63] Conversely where the question is whether a third person is entitled to an office [64] or to sustain a certain character [65] or relation,[66] the fact that a party has recognized such a right is as to him a competent fact. fraud,[80] ratification,[81] or waiver;[82] and on the other hand admissions directly establishing the truth of the facts asserted.[83] While these several functions of the same act or statement may blend, the act or statement which is circumstantially relevant presents and may usually be distinguished by two persistent characteristics: (1) The act or statement is equally competent, whether it is in accordance with the truth of the matter or is not. (2) If not rendered irrelevant by the existence of a controversy or in some cases by the absence of adequate means of knowledge, the act or statement is equally competent on behalf of the declarant, although self-serving.[84]

b. Inconsistent Conduct. Conduct of a party inconsistent with his present contention may tend to show that the latter is an afterthought, and proof of such conduct is therefore competent as an admission.[85] Thus where a defendant denies liability it may be shown that he made no denial on a particular occasion when a denial would have been natural,[86] but that he rested his defense on some other Settlements with others.— Unless objectionable as being in the nature of a compromise (Slingerland v. Norton, 58 Hun (N. Y.) 578, 12 N. Y. Suppl. 647. See supra, IV, B, 5), it may be shown that the party claimed to be liable has settled with others in the same position as plaintiff (Howland v. Bartlett, 86 Ga. 669, 12 S. ground,[87] or endeavored to gain time by promises of settlement,[88] or tried to arrange favorable terms of payment.[89] In case of a plaintiff or other claimant it may be shown that he has failed under suitable circumstances to advance the demand upon which he now relies.[90] And generally it may be shown as to either party that he has not acted in accordance with a present position,[91] but has recognized as valid a claim which he now resists.[92] Precautions taken to avoid loss by threatened litigation, as by demanding a bond of indemnity,[93] efforts to buy off a conflicting claim,[94] offers to purchase property which is perishable before it Irrelevant conduct.— Mere failure to pay a bill (Pleasanton v. Simmons, 2 Pennew. (Del.) 477, 47 Atl. 697), or to vacate an arrest by furnishing bail (Talcott v. Harris, 93 N. Y. 567), or payment on a claim while denying liability or not conceding it (Camp v. U. S., 113 U. S. 648, 5 S. Ct. 687, 28 L. ed. 1081), has no probative effect. Providing an injured servant with a nurse does not tend to prove liability for the injury. Sias v. Consolidated Lighting Co., 73 Vt. 35, 50 Atl. 554.

spoils,[95] insuring one's self against liability for accidents,[96] or paying a mechanic in order to avoid the enforcement of a lien[97] are irrelevant for much the same reason that excludes an offer of compromise,[98] namely, no concession of liability is implied. Likewise the receipt of money implies no concession by the receiver that the payer is the party primarily liable.[99] Admissibility of evidence of repairs or similar conduct subsequent to an accident as tending to prove negligence is considered elsewhere.[1] The party charged with inconsistent conduct may explain it.[2]

7. Admissions by Silence or Acquiescence — a. In General. A statement made in the presence of a party, but not connected with his conduct at the time when it was made, is mere hearsay and not evidence against him of any fact narrated in such statement.[3] But where a definite[4] statement of a matter of fact[5] is made in the presence or hearing[6] of a party so that he understands it,[7] in regard to facts affecting him or his rights,[8] and the statement is of such a nature as to call for a

A statement made in the party's hearing, although not in his presence, is admissible if otherwise within the rule. Neile v. Jakle, 2 C. & K. 709, 61 E. C. L. 709.

Duty to speak.— Where parties meet for settlement of their differences (Darlington v. Taylor, 3 Grant (Pa.) 195), or it otherwise sufficiently appears that the party must have known that his opponent would alter his position in the event of non-denial (Des Moines Sav. Bank v. Colfax Hotel Co., 88 Iowa 4, 55 N. W. 67; Hendrickson v. Miller, 1 Mill (S. C. 142; Andres v. Lee, 21 N. C. 318), silence may be construed as an admission.

Statements by strangers.— A party is not, however, called upon to answer the statements of a third person who may see fit to project himself into a matter which in no way concerns him. are relevant where he expresses acquiescence therein.[17] Even where a party is justified in keeping silence, so that his failure to reply is without probative force,[18] still, if he ventures a statement upon the subject-matter the entire conversation becomes admissible.[19] The fact of non-denial or other conduct being the essential element, it is comparatively immaterial by whom the statement itself is made.[20] Silence of an agent,[21] especially in the presence of his principal who also remains silent,[22] is imputable to the principal. Inferences may be drawn against a husband or wife from silence or acquiescence where statements are made by either in the other's presence under the conditions stated above.[23] of a criminal act,[25] or would inflict a civil injury,[26] or injuriously affect his title to real[27] or personal[28] property, or limit his right to recover damages for a serious injury,[29] it would be reasonable to expect a denial of the statement if it were not true. attaches to a failure to deny. But if a party testifying or being able to testify has an adequate opportunity to controvert testimony previously heard by him, the fact of non-denial is relevant,[45] although the statements not denied are not therefore necessarily established as facts.[46] A party's failure to deny a statement is not relevant where he has bound himself not to make any reply,[47] or is acting under advice[48] or orders[49] to the same effect.

c. Proof and Effect. Proof of a statement made in the presence of a party should be stricken out if it is not followed by proof of the party's conduct on the occasion.[50] Whether the situation was one from which the jury may reasonably find his conduct relevant to a fact in issue is a preliminary question for the court,[51] to be determined in view of all the evidence in the case, direct or circumstantial;[52] for a person is not at liberty to make evidence for himself by the simple expedient of saying something to his opponent and then supporting the truth of his statement by proof that it was not denied.[53] Silence or acquiescence is a species of evidence to be received with caution,[54] and the weight to be given to it is a question for the jury.[55] In the absence of estoppel[56] it is not conclusive upon the rights involved,[57] but is open to explanation.[58]

d. In Respect of Written Statements — (1) Letters. The general rule is that omission to answer a written communication is not evidence of the truth of the facts therein stated, and that under ordinary circumstances a party is not required to reply to a letter containing false statements of fact.[59] There are circum-

Oral declarations distinguished.— "It may well be that under most circumstances what is said to a man to his face, which conveys the idea of an obligation upon his part to the person addressing him, or on whose behalf the statement is made, he is at least in some measure called upon to contradict or explain; but a failure to answer a letter is entirely different, and there is no rule of law which requires a person to enter into a correspondence with another in reference to a matter in dispute between them." 60. St. Joseph Hydraulic Co. v. Globe Tissue-Paper Co., 156 Ind. 665, 59 N. E. 995; Keen v. Priest, 1 F. & F. 314, concerning which case Miller, J., in Learned v. Tillotson, 97 N. Y. 10, 49 Am. Rep. 508, said: "The letter then in question was from the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant, demanding redress for 'an illegal seizure of sheep,' and it was admitted on the ground that it was evidence of the conduct of the defendant, of which silence was sometimes evidence. It will be seen that the case was one of a tortious nature, and in this respect differs from an action upon a contract, where the letter is offered to show the plaintiff's version of the contract and its admission by the mere silence of the defendant."

"Ordinary practice of mankind" the test. —"There are cases — business and mercantile cases — in which the Courts have taken notice that, in the ordinary course of business, if one man of business states in a letter to another that he has agreed to do certain things, the person who receives that letter must answer it if he means to dispute the fact that he did so agree. So, where merchants are in dispute one with the other in the course of carrying on some business negotiations, and one writes to the other, 'but you promised me that you would do this or that,' if the other does not answer the letter, but proceeds with the negotiations, he must be taken to admit the truth of the statement. But such cases as those are wholly unlike the case of a letter charging a man with some offence or meanness. Is it the ordinary habit of mankind, of which the Courts will take notice, to answer such letters; and must it be taken, according to the ordinary practice of mankind, that if a man does not answer he admits the truth of the charge made against him? If it were so, life would be unbearable. A man might day by day write such letters, which, if they were not answered, would be brought forward as evidence of the truth of the charges made in them. The ordinary and wise practice is not to answer them — to take no notice of them. Unless it is made out to be the ordinary practice of mankind to answer, I cannot see that not answering is any evidence that the person who receives such letters admits the truth of the statements contained in them." Wiedemann v. Walpole, [1891] 2 Q. B. 534, 537, 60 L. J. Q. B. 762, 40 Wkly. Rep. 114, per Lord Esher, M. R.

A dunning letter written to a debtor and incidentally stating the terms of the contract under which the money was alleged to be due was held admissible in connection with a failure to reply. Murphey v. Gates, 81 Wis. 370, 51 N. W. 573. See Draper v. Crofts, 15 L. J. Exch. 92, 93, 15 M. & W. 166, where Parke, B., said: "My own opinion is, that no attention need be paid to a letter asking for money which is not due. It is a different case if a party is bound by circumstances or by his situation to return an answer.

Independent relevancy.—A letter, the statements of which are not competent in connection with non-denial or other conduct of the party, may still be relevant for other reasons; for example to prove demand (Hand v. Howell, 61 N. J. L. 142, 38 Atl. 748; Hill v. Pratt, 29 Vt. 119), notice (Com. v. Jeffries, 7 Allen (Mass.) 548, 83 Am. Dec. 712; Allen v. Peters, 4 Phila. (Pa.) 78; Hand v. Howell, 61 N. J. L. 142, 38 Atl. 748), or the like (Dutton v. Woodman, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 255, 57 Am. Dec. 46; Hulett v. Carey, 66 Minn. 327, 69 N. W. 31, 61 Am. St. Rep. 419, 34 L. R. A. 384).

Probative force.— "The omission of a party to reply to statements in a letter about which he has knowledge, and which if not true he would naturally deny, when he replies to other parts of the letter, is evidence tending to show that the statements so made and not denied are true. So where there has been a correspondence between parties in regard to some subject matter, and one of the parties writes a letter to the other making statements in regard to such subject matter, of party receiving a letter has in any way invited the same,[61] or when there is any ground to infer that he has acted on the letter[62] by partly answering[63] or otherwise recognizing it;[64] or when with such letters goods or other articles are forwarded with bills and these are received without return or protest,[65] or where money is sent upon terms and conditions stated in the letters and is not returned and there is no objection to or denial of the statements contained in the inclosing writing.[66]

which the latter has knowledge, and which he would naturally deny if not true, and he wholly omits to answer such letter, such silence is admissible as evidence tending to show the statements to be true. Still all such evidence is of a lighter character than silence when the same facts are directly stated to the party. Men use the tongue much more readily than the pen. Almost all men will reply to and deny or correct a false statement verbally made to them. It is done on the spot and from the first impulse. But when a letter is received making the same statement, the feeling, which readily prompts the verbal denial, not unfrequently cools before the time and opportunity arrive for writing a letter. Other matters intervene. A want of facility in writing, or an aversion to correspondence, or habits of dilatoriness may be the real causes of the silence. As the omission to reply to letters may be explained by so many causes not applicable to silence when the parties are in personal conversation, we do not think the same weight should be attached to it as evidence." Fenno v. Weston, 31 Vt. 345, 352, per Aldis, J. The effect of failure to deny the truth of written statements is much increased if other statements in the same document are disputed.[76] But where all liability is denied no inference of acquiescence in the correctness of amounts charged can be drawn from failure to object to them specifically.[77] In order that failure to correct a written statement should be a relevant fact it must appear that some duty exists to make corrections and some power to do so. access to the books is not sufficient,[78] and simply disregarding a claim leaves the positions of the parties entirely unaffected.[79]

C. Judicial Admissions — 1. In General. Procedure attaches to judicial admissions[80] the effect of a levamen probationis, establishing either, (1) in lieu of evidence, the point covered, or (2) a waiver of evidence in regard to it; somewhat different statements of the same result. Unlike extrajudicial admissions, which have no definite probative value, judicial admissions in either aspect sustain the burden of evidence, and until the court permits them to be withdrawn, because shown to have been made under a mistake or improvidently,[81] are binding on parties[82] and counsel,[83] and even on the court itself.[84] Since judicial admissions relate to procedure, all matters pertaining to their receipt,[85] withdrawal,[86] enforcement,[87] or effect are largely within the administrative control of the court. The opposing party in a civil[88] or the government in a criminal[89] case is not required to accept a judicial admission but may insist upon proving the fact.[90] When the statement becomes functus officio as a judicial admission, it still retains any legitimate probative effect it may have as the statement of the party, that is, as an extrajudicial admission.[91] A judicial admission is a perfectly competent independent fact, being received, although the declarant is present in court as an available witness.[92]

Favored as evidence.— In Holley v. Young, 68 Me. 215, 216, 28 Am. Rep. 40, the court said: "It would be wiser to adopt some rule by which more admissions could be obtained, than to allow parties, at their own will and pleasure, to withdraw the few now made." And in Prestwood v. Watson, 111 Ala. 604, 608, 20 So. 600, it was declared that when admissions "are made deliberately and intelligently, in the presence of the court and reduced to writing, they are of the best species of evidence, and parties cannot be permitted to retract them, as they are not permitted at pleasure to retract admissions of fact, made in any form." To substitute for such a picture a naked admission might have the effect to rob the evidence of much of its fair and legitimate weight. No exception lies to the admission of relevant evidence under such circumstances." Dunning v. Maine Cent. R. Co., 91 Me. 87, 97, 39 Atl. 352, 64 Am. St. Rep. 208. The party by whom the benefit of an admission is declined is as fully entitled to insist that the court shall receive relevant evidence as if it had not been open to him to accept the admission. 91. Perry v. Simpson Water Proof Mfg. Co., 40 Conn. 313.

An admission is not judicial merely because made in the course of legal proceedings. The effect of the judicial admission is limited to the purposes of the case in which it is made, although not necessarily to the particular trial of the cause. When contained in a party's testimony, affidavits, or pleadings in another case, statements in court may have merely the force of extrajudicial admissions, in the legal operation of which logic as well as procedure plays a part. 2. By Whom Made — a. Parties. Relevant judicial statements made or adopted[93] by a party,[94] although made without the consent or knowledge of his attorney,[95] are, when received by the court,[96] admissible not only in the case in which they are made but in any subsequent trial[97] or proceedings connected with it,[98] and in other cases in which the facts covered thereby are relevant.[99] The statements may be made not only in the course of a trial as usually conducted but in bankruptcy,[1] probate,[2] or other special proceedings, and are competent, although made in a representative capacity,[3] provided they are offered against the party when acting in the same capacity in which he made them. When a party, however, is sued individually it is not material that the admissions were made by him in a different capacity.[4]

b. Counsel or Attorneys.[5] Judicial admissions are frequently those of counsel or attorneys of record.[6] When these are made in good faith,[7] in the counsel's professional capacity,[8] for the purpose of dispensing with evidence,[9] and to that end are distinct and formal, they bind the client,[10] whether made before,[11] on,[12] or after[13] the trial, and in the exercise of a wide discretion with which the client has as a rule so little personal connection as to establish in many cases no real relation of agency.[14] It is within the appropriate function of counsel to make admissions dispensing with strict rules of law or practice as to matters incidental to the issue, such as the formal proof of a statute,[15] corporation record,[16] or other document;[17] or as to uncontroverted facts about which a client knows nothing, such as the existence of a foreign law;[18] or as to facts about which the client cannot exercise a trained judgment, for example what an absent[19] or deceased[20] witness would testify if present; or in general as to technical matters relating to the machinery of a trial.[21] The anomalous relations of agency existing between counsel and client impose an important limitation upon the use of judicial admissions made by counsel when these are offered in subsequent cases. It is considered that the original concession may well have been made for other reasons than because it states the fact truly, for example to save time[22] or to avoid a continuance[23] or that the truth of facts may have been admitted only provisionally to raise an issue of law, as on an agreed statement of facts,[24] a bill of exceptions,[25] demurrer,[26] or special verdict,[27] or in order to formulate a request for a charge to the jury.[28] The judicial admission as originally made is not therefore so necessarily connected with the party himself as to be deemed competent in another action as an extra-judicial admission;[29] unless it was formally made, without limitation to the pur-

There must be an unequivocal statement.— An act indicating an unwillingness to contend is consistent with a belief that there is no liability and cannot be used as an admission. Harrison v. Baker, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 250. At common law if on a prosecution for assault and battery defendant pleaded guilty the record was competent in a civil action for the same assault and battery to prove it, but when the accused without pleading to a charge of assault and battery throws himself on the mercy of the court and submits to a fine the record is not evidence in a civil action for the same act to prove it or to enhance the damages. 44. In an action for slander, a plea alleging the truth of the words charged to have been spoken cannot be read in evidence as an

as necessary to effectuate its purpose, it is, even if not offered in evidence,[45] conclusive by way of estoppel as sometimes said,[46] until changed by amendment or otherwise,[47] on the specific issue to which it applies. Allegations material on one issue may be immaterial on another.[48] But a distinct statement of facts contained in a pleading, apparently relied on because actually existing, is admissible,[49] although voluntary and unnecessary,[50] or not bearing on the plea on which the issue is tried,[51] and although the pleading was filed by a party without the knowledge of his attorney.[52] One who desires to avail himself of admissions in a pleading must accept them as an entirety; he cannot select such portion as may suit him and reject the remainder[53] should the latter qualify and explain the admission offered.[54] Nor on the other hand can a party insist on the receipt of declarations in his own favor because contained in a pleading.[55] And it would be pushing the relations of attorney and client to an unwarranted extent to hold the client responsible for any inconsistency between statements made in the pleadings.[56]

(II) In Same Case. Except so far as prevented by statute,[57] statements which are satisfactorily shown to be those of a party[58] or to have been approved by him[59] are, when made in the pleadings of a case, admissible in lien of evidence, against the party making them or against his successor in interest.[60] They are received also on any subsequent trial of the case,[61] including a trial in an appellate court,[62] and are equally competent whether the pleader be plaintiff[63] or admission that they were spoken. Craig v. Burris, (Del. 1902) 55 Atl. 353.

71. New York v. Fay, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 553, 554, 6 N. Y. Suppl. 400, where it is said: "It is true that admissions in pleadings in an action between other and different parties have been received in evidence by the courts. The ground upon which these admissions have been received has been because they were admissions against the interest of the party making them, and because of the great probability that a party would not admit or state anything against himself or against his own interest unless it was true. And, furthermore, these admissions have been confined to these cases where the admissions contained the assertion of facts which, from the nature of the case, if true, must have been within the knowledge of the party making the admission and the pleading is verified by him. These rules are laid down in the case of Cook v. Burr, 44 N. Y. 156, and their application is apparent. Therefore, an admission contained in pleadings between other said to be not essential that the party against whom the admission is offered should have had actual knowledge of the existence of the pleading,[72] for the act of his attorney will bind him.[73] In some jurisdictions, however, a distinction is taken between statements contained in pleadings in another case which are emanations of counsel and those fairly to be regarded as statements by the party.[74] To be admissible in those jurisdictions in which this distinction is taken, the statement must affirmatively be connected with the party as one which he has made because it was true, as shown by the fact that he has verified it under oath[75] or authenticated it by his signature;[76] or as indicated by the fact that the statement is of such a nature that information could have come to the legal adviser only from the client.[77] Statements made in a former pleading may be competent evidence apart from their character as extra judicial admissions.[78] For example they may be competent to show that a suit was brought[79] and its general nature,[80] or that the issues in two actions are the same,[81] provided that the record affirmatively shows relevancy in the statements offered.[82] In like manner these statements may show that a former position was inconsistent with the one now taken;[83]

parties simply founded upon information and belief, where there is no presumption that the facts alleged or denied must have been within the knowledge of the party making the allegation or denial, and where the allegation or denial is not against the interest of the party making the same, cannot be received in evidence as establishing any fact." Compare Pope v. Allis, 115 U. S. 363, 370, 6 S. Ct. 69, 29 L. ed. 393, holding, on the authority of Doe v. Steel, 3 Campb. 115, 13 Rev. Rep. 768, that "when the averment is made on information and belief, it is nevertheless admissible as evidence, although not conclusive. . . . that the amount claimed in two suits is different;[84] that a party has failed to advance a present claim under suitable circumstances;[85] that a defense entirely obvious if true was not suggested at an earlier stage;[86] or that a party has suffered a default, when if certain facts were true he probably would not have done so.[87] The statements in an answer in equity may be used as admissions in an action at law,[88] and admissions made in the pleadings filed in a federal are competent in a state court and vice versa.[89]

(IV) Abandoned, Superseded, or Inchoate Pleadings.[90] Although a pleading which has been withdrawn or superseded by amendment is out of the case in its capacity as pleading and the pleader is no longer concluded by it,[91] relevant statements therein may still be competent as extrajudicial admissions.[92] To be so used, the superseded pleading must be introduced in evidence,[93] must be shown to have been originally made as a statement of fact, and connected directly with the party himself,[94] as having been made or authorized and inspired by him. It is not sufficient that the attorney signed and filed the original pleadings.[95]

Reason for the rule.— "Being only evidence, and subject to explanation, it seems that it should be introduced as any other evidence, and unless so introduced, should not be considered. To hold otherwise is to permit a party to spring a surprise upon his adversary, by presenting the admissions when the opportunity to explain has passed. Surely the law does not contemplate such an unfair practice that would deprive a party of the privilege of explaining how and why the admission was made." Indeed in many instances the very necessity for amendment arises because counsel has failed to apprehend the facts correctly.[96] Therefore in some of the states where an original has been superseded by an amended pleading,[97] or has been withdrawn,[98] the allegations of the former pleading, in the absence of special circumstances, such as payment of money into court[99] or verification by oath,[1] are not admissible as evidence even in the same action; and where a pleading is not abandoned voluntarily but because the party is required to elect,[2] or the pleading is stricken out by order of court,[3] the statements contained in it are not admissions.[4] Other courts, while conceding the truth of the considerations on which the foregoing rulings are based, regard them rather as affecting the weight than the competency of the statements and hold that after making all due allowances there may remain a residuum of probative force in statements in abandoned or superseded pleadings, to the benefit of which the opposite party is entitled,[5] in the absence of evidence that the pleading was unauthorized.[6] The statement will thereupon be received, even though the suit has been discontinued,[7] the judgment in it annulled for want of jurisdiction,[8] or, in case of a suit in equity, the bill has been dismissed.[9] Nor is it material that the case is being heard on appeal from a lower court,[10] or whether the pleading has [11] or has not [12] been verified, or even that the pleading has been withdrawn absolutely from the files,[13] or has not been filed at all.[14] This probative force has even been given a prima facie value.[15] But if it affirmatively appears that the former pleading was filed without authority it is not admissible.[16] While as before stated there is some difference of opinion as to the probative force of extrajudicial admissions contained in superseded or abandoned pleadings, it is agreed that in the absence of statute [17] such statements may be admissible to impeach a witness,[18] or to raise unfavorable inferences as to good faith in a belated claim or defense.[19] In like manner the statement may be admissible to show that the party made a different claim at another time.[20] The fact to be proved must have some evidentiary weight, that is, it must be relevant.[21]

c. Stipulations. An agreed statement of facts [22] or other stipulations by counsel or attorneys [23] as to matters of fact within the scope of their professional function [24] bind the party as a judicial admission, although made before issue joined,[25] and is competent evidence against him even on a second trial.[26] Where these agreements are made to avoid continuances [27] or for some other specific purpose, and are by their terms limited to a particular occasion or temporary object,[28] they possess no force beyond the occasion or after the purpose has been accomplished.[29] But if the admissions are on their face unqualified no limitation to the pending trial is implied,[30] and they are receivable as judicial admissions, in ity of the officer before whom the affidavit was sworn is not proved,[44] or that the affidavit was irregularly taken.[45] Statements of a party contained in his affidavit in another case have no force as judicial admissions and are merely admissions in pais.[46]

(II) Depositions. Statements made by a party in his deposition in the cause may contain relevant judicial admissions, although not based on his personal knowledge, but on belief in the accuracy of an accountant.[47] His deposition is competent, although taken in a personal capacity and offered against him in a representative capacity,[48] or taken in perpetuam[49] or de bene esse.[50] If the deposition was not taken with statutory formalities,[51] or the cause for taking it no longer exists,[52] and, even if the deposition be suppressed,[53] a statement contained therein is still competent as an admission in pais. The same effect attaches to a statement in a deposition taken in another suit, whether the deposition was used as such in that suit or not,[54] and whether made by the deponent as a party in the case or by an agent expressly instructed.[55] A statement made in a deposition taken in a suit where the deponent was only a witness is competent as an admission in a later action to which he is a party.[56]

(III) Answers to Interrogatories. Where interrogatories are filed for the purpose of obtaining discovery, the party's answers have the force of judicial admissions in the suit in which they are made,[57] although the answers are not made with the formality required by statute,[58] or the interrogatories themselves put in evidence.[59] In another action such statements are admissions in pais,[60] although the issues in the two cases be different;[61] and statements thus used have been accorded the weight of prima facie evidence.[62] A party cannot use answers relevant.[76] Testimony of third persons as witnesses in another case are admissible against a party if the latter is bound thereby because of agency, or because of joint or common interest, but not otherwise.[77] What a party said in giving his testimony may be stated by any one who heard it, including the judge,[78] but the statement must be affirmatively connected with him.[79] The admission is absolutely primary evidence. It is immaterial therefore upon principle that the party who made it is present in court and can be called as a witness.[80] Statements in the testimony are not the less competent, because no legal warrant exists for taking it[81] or because the witness was refused an opportunity at the time to explain his statements,[82] although it is otherwise where the testimony is elicited contrary to law.[83] But the party may prove if he can in any competent way that he made explanations at the time which were not taken down.[84] There is a valid distinction between a completed statement, which merely requires qualification or explanation, and a statement which was never fully made.[85] Accordingly, where the evidence of a party as to certain facts has not been completed, statements in it cannot be introduced as admissions; it will not suffice that the party may for the first time complete his statement on the trial at which it is offered.[86] A party is entitled to show that his opponent is now concealing a fact to which he has previously testified[87] or has given testimony on another occasion inconsistent with his present evidence.[88] So the statement may be admissible because it shows knowledge[89] or is in some other way circumstantially relevant.[90]

90. It frequently happens that neither statement is any part of the case of the party who brings it out. It may be indifferent to him which, if either, of the statements is true. His only purpose may be to establish the fact of contradiction, with the merely negative object, in a probative sense, of destroying the reliability of the contentions of the party making such conflicting statements. The fact of self-contradiction may be salient, properly proved by statements, and the result greatly against the interest of the declarant, without such statements constituting admissions, properly so called.

of,[5] or after[6] the transaction to which the statement relates. A party is not bound to present an absolute unity of testimony between his witnesses; and he may introduce admissions of his opponent, although these be not entirely consistent with the testimony of his own witnesses.[7] But the declarant must at the time his admissions are offered be a party to the record,[8] and duly served with process.[9] In actions in rem, or to establish a status, where parties are of less importance than in cases of mere personal concern, admissions are received with greater restrictions.[10]

b. Declarations as to Title. Under some circumstances a statement may not possess sufficient probative weight to be relevant as an admission. Thus in an action involving title a party's statement in disparagement is irrelevant if made before he was possessed of the particular interest,[11] or after he had parted with it.[12] will not make them competent even where, as in an action for a joint tort,[20] or for divorce on the ground of adultery,[21] the act charged, if committed at all, must have been committed by both parties; or where a common interest exists in a given property[22] or claim[23] under a legal or equitable[24] title, or under a will,[25] or by descent.[26] The rule is the same in equity as at law,[27] and applies to judicial[28] as well as to extrajudicial admissions. The reason for inadmissibility of statements by one of two or more coparties, severally liable, as against the others is still clearer where they are parties in different capacities; for example where one is sued as principal defendant and another as garnishee.[29] The rule of exclusion has no application to a statement by one coparty made in the hearing of the others and not denied by them under circumstances rendering a reply appropriate if the facts were thought to have been incorrectly stated.[30] Nor can it be applied to any statement which can be fairly deemed to have been made, authorized, or adopted by all the coparties.[31] jointly interested. There is, however, no relation of agency between a tenant for life and a remainder-man when joined in the same action.[33]

(c) Joint Liability. In an action against two or more on a joint contract the admissions of one, however small his interest,[34] are evidence against all.[35] The scope of agency is limited to matters concerning the joint interest,[36] and does not extend to creating a new contract,[37] reviving an obligation presumably paid,[38] waiving performance of a contract or condition,[39] or enlarging a preëxisting obligation or liability.[40] But the admission is competent to show that an obligation or liability has not been discharged or has been discharged in part only.[41] Where the admission is not made within the scope of the common purpose, it is merely hearsay as regards the other joint obligors;[42] and if the circumstances are such that no agency between joint obligors may be taken to exist the statements of one are not competent as against the others.[43] A mere obligation to contribution or indemnity does not take the place of joint liability.[44]

tion, or common design may establish a relation of agency so as to make the statements of one party competent against the others concerned,[45] provided such statements are made within the scope of the common enterprise.[46]

(III) Admissibility in Favor of Coparty. As a general rule parties cannot avail themselves of the statements of their coparties.[47] But the admission of a defendant against his own interest and in favor of a co-defendant is competent for the latter.[48]

d. Nominal Parties — (I) In General. The general rule is that admissions of a nominal plaintiff cannot be given in evidence to affect rights of the person beneficially interested.[49] Nor can admissions of a nominal defendant be permitted to affect the party really entitled to defend.[50] But admissions of a nominal party made while he possessed a beneficial interest are competent.[51] The admission of a nominal defendant is received to establish against the real defendant a fact in which the latter has no interest.[52] And admissions of a sole plaintiff on the record that he has no interest are provable to defeat the action, where there is no proof that any one else has an interest.[53] That a party's interest is small does not make it nominal; if he owns a substantial, although not the sole or principal interest involved on his side, his admissions are competent.[54] Whether a party is formally or beneficially interested is a question for the jury.[55]

(II) Guardian Ad Litem or "Next Friend." The general rule excluding statements made by nominal parties applies to the admissions of a guardian ad litem[56] and also to the admissions of a prochein ami,[57] when they are subsequently offered in evidence as against the infant.

(III) Trustees. It has been held that statements of one who is a trustee on the record are not competent to prejudice the trust fund or the cestui que trust,[58] but the prevailing rule is otherwise;[59] and admissions of a party acting in a representative capacity, such as administrator,[60] executor,[61] or guardian,[62] are competent, provided he has duly qualified to discharge the duties of his trust.[63]

2. Persons Beneficially Interested and Real Parties in Interest. Declarations of a person beneficially interested in the result of litigation are admissible against the nominal party representing his interest,[64] unless it is impossible to admit them without prejudicing the interests of non-declarants.[65] A person who will be called upon to pay the judgment in case of an adverse issue,[66] or who will receive the whole or a portion of the proceeds in the case of a successful one,[67] is a real party in interest. The fact of interest in a third party should be established prima facie by evidence exclusive of his own declarations.[68] The interest must be financial; a sentimental interest due to relationship,[69] a moral obligation to indemnify,[70] or possession of an interest similar to the one involved in the suit[71] is not sufficient. Where a trustee on the record has a purely nominal position in relation to the action, declarations of the cestui que trust are competent.[72] So where an administrator or executor is a formal party statements of the person beneficially interested are admissible.[73] On the other hand, where the administrator or executor is actually representing the interests of the estate, declarations of an heir at law, next of kin, or devisee are inadmissible.[74] Statements of an interested person are not admissible after his interest has ceased.[75]

3. Privies — a. In General. Statements of relevant facts made by persons identified in legal interest with a party to the record by reason of privity[76] are competent evidence.[77] The modern rule is that admissions made by a person while he is the owner of property, real or personal, are competent against a party claiming under him.[78] As in case of other admissions, the declaration of the person in privity is according to the weight of authority primary evidence and admissible, although the declarant be available as a witness.[79] The prima facie existence of privity must be shown, as a preliminary to admitting statements of persons said to stand in that relation.[80]

b. Real Estate — (I) GRANTORS — (A) In General. Subject to the effect of the land registry laws,[81] statements of a former owner of real estate are competent against the party who claims under him by an interest acquired since the declaration was made,[82] but not against a party who claims adversely to the former owner.[83] The grantor's statement is not admissible unless made on his own knowledge.[84] Declarations of a grantor before obtaining title are not admissible against a subsequent holder claiming under him,[85] even, it is said, in cases of alleged fraud.[86] The party offering the evidence has the burden of showing that the necessary conditions for admissibility exist; for example that the declaration was made while the declarant was owner of the property to be affected by his statement.[87]

(B) Before Alienation. Declarations of an owner of land prior to his conveyance are competent as against his grantee and other privies, in disparagement of his title.[88] They are also competent to show the existence of easements on the

are inadmissible to affect the title of the grantee,[99] except on some ground of independent relevancy, as for example in contradiction of other declarations of the same person already admitted in evidence.[1] Abandonment[2] or dedication[3] is under the rule regarded as equivalent to a conveyance. If the party has acquiesced by word or deed in the statement of the grantor, although made subsequent to the conveyance, it is competent against the party as his own statement.[4]

(D) Form of Statement. Competent declarations of a former owner may be oral or written, judicial[5] or extrajudicial.[6] If the declaration is contained in a written instrument it is not material that the latter is not effective for the purpose for which it is designed.[7] The statement may even be that of another person acquiesced in by silence under circumstances which give the silence a probative value.[8]

(II) Mortgagors or Other Encumbrancers. Declarations of a mortgagor, so far as they affect the estate conveyed but no farther,[9] are competent as against the mortgagee if made prior to the execution of the mortgage.[10] But his declarations made after execution of the mortgage are not admissible to affect the rights of the mortgagee,[11] except in cases where retention of possession by the mortgagor,[12] or other facts point prima facie to the existence of a conspiracy between of creditors or of one who takes advantage of a state or national law for the relief of insolvent debtors are, when made before the assignment, competent evidence against the assignee;[49] but declarations made subsequent to the assignment are incompetent to affect the rights of those claiming under it.[50]

(c) Of Negotiable Instruments—(1) As to Transferees Before Maturity. In most states an admission by the holder of a negotiable instrument is or is not competent against a subsequent holder according as the latter may or may not by the rules of substantive law governing negotiable instruments[51] be affected by proof of the fact admitted. Thus declarations of a holder tending to show the existence of equitable defenses[52] are not admissible against a subsequent bona fide holder for value before maturity,[53] while his declarations that the instrument represented money lost at gaming[54] or other admissions of facts which would constitute a defense as against a bona fide purchaser might be admissible.[55] Admissions of a prior owner, made while he was owner, are competent against one who is a holder without consideration,[56] or who acquired title with notice of the fact

such a creditor seeks to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance declarations of the debtor are not admissible on behalf of the alleged fraudulent transferee, being regarded as made in the declarant's favor.[72]

(II) As Affecting Grantors, Vendors, and Other Transferrers. Fraudulent intent of the grantor or other alienor may be shown circumstantially by his declarations. While these are frequently classed as admissions by one standing in privity, they are relevant independently.[73] Intention with which the transfer was made being the essential fact, declarations probative as to its existence at the time of transfer may be made either before[74] or after[75] that time, provided the statement is not in the opinion of the court too remote to be relevant.[76]

altogether, if no further evidence is forthcoming to show that fact.[79] When declarations of an alleged fraudulent transferrer made subsequent to the transfer are offered against his transferee, the doctrine of admissions by privity is removed from the case,[80] and, unless ratified or acquiesced in by the transferee under circumstances which make them in effect his own admissions,[81] such statements are rejected under the ordinary rule that declarations of an alienor made after alienation[82] do not affect and are inadmissible as against the alienee.[83]

gestæ" has imported into this subject a proposition frequently maintained in connection with statements properly "part of the res gestæ,"[41] namely, that a transaction is not yet past so long as its immediate effects may be supposed to exert a controlling influence on the mind of the declarant.[42]

(IV) NARRATIVE STATEMENTS. Declarations of an agent, in order to be admissible, must be made dum fervet opus,[43] while he is actually employed on the business of his principal,[44] although the authority of the agent continues until the work intrusted to him is fully completed.[45] Under the res gestæ rule, properly so called, in the law of evidence, narrative statements are excluded on the ground of irrelevancy.[46] But it is to be observed that in the law of agency it is no part of an agent's duty to prejudice his principal by narrative statements construing[47]

41. As the statements of an agent are competent only when made by one engaged on the principal's business and concerning the subject-matter of the agency, it is merely necessary to call any particular business of the principal a transaction or "res gestæ" to stretch the rules as to declarations, "part of the res gestæ," so as to cover any competent declaration by an agent; although it is evident that such a use of the phrase "res gestæ" in effect removes from it any very distinctive meaning — an unfortunate complication in a subject already greatly confused.

notice[75] or relevant[76] mental states, such as anger,[77] intent,[78] intention,[79] malice,[80] motive,[81] understanding,[82] or willingness.[83] Statements to one party by an agent of the other may be admissible on behalf of the former to prove that he made a particular claim at the time.[84]

b. General and Special Agency — (i) In General. A general agent's power to affect the principal by his statements is not impaired by undisclosed instructions or other limitations unknown to the person with whom the agent is dealing, nor by the fact that the principal is ignorant of his acts.[85] The scope of such an agency is extended where the principal is at a distance or out of the country.[86] The authority of a special agent is more restricted. Where authority has been delegated for a particular work, the statements of the agent to be competent must be within its precise scope and must be made while discharging its duties.[87] Declarations of general as well as of special agents are subject to the rule said to exclude declarations which are not part of the res gestæ as those which are mere narrative statements.[88]

(II) SUBAGENTS. While as a general rule a delegated authority cannot without the assent of the principal be itself delegated,[89] statements of relevant facts by a subagent employed by the agent within the reasonable scope of his agency may bind the principal.[90]

(III) PARTICULAR OCCUPATIONS—(A) In General. The scope of agency between persons standing in definite business relations varies under the general rules above stated with the substantive law or mercantile usages applying to the particular relation, and eludes more precise statement. Admissibility of declarations of agents and employees has been considered in various connections,—for example in relation to building trades, involving the authority of architects[91] and building contractors;[92] mechanical occupations,[93] touching statements by foremen,[94] chief engineers,[95] or superintendents;[96] mercantile affairs[97] covering relations between a principal and bookkeepers,[98] general managers,[99] collection

91. Within the scope of a particular employment (Ahern v. Boyce, 26 Mo. App. 558) an architect may make declarations which affect the owner (Hudspeth v. Allen, 26 Ind. 165; Turney v. Baker, 103 Mo. App. 390, 77 S. W. 479; Wright v. Reusens, 60 Hun (N. Y.) 585, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 504, 590 [affirmed in 133 N. Y. 298, 31 N. E. 215]).

92. Building contractors on the contrary are not agents for the owners. Happy v. Mosher, 48 N. Y. 313. Their statements, however, may be competent, not as admissions, but because they are in themselves relevant; for example, to show receipt of material, services, etc. Trensch v. Shryock, 51 Md. 162; Forbes v. Willamette Falls Electric Co., 19 Oreg. 61, 23 Pac. 670, 20 Am. St. Rep. 793; Dickinson College v. Church, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 462. If not relevant such a statement will necessarily be excluded. Philibert v. Schmidt, 57 Mo. 211; Schulenburg v. Hawley, 6 Mo. App. 34.

93. Admissible statements by employees in manufacturing and other mechanical occupations do not include declarations as to the condition of the works, ways, or machinery of the establishment. McCarthy v. Muir, 50 Ill. App. 510; Hall v. Murdock, 119 Mich. 389, 78 N. W. 329; McCulloch v. Dobson, 133 N. Y. 114, 30 N. E. 641; Ballard v. Hitchcock Mfg. Co., 15 N. Y. Suppl. 405. Workmen do not affect the employer by statements as to matters with which their employment gives them no concern, such as the merits of the article (Smith v. Barber, 153 Ind. 322, 53 N. E. 1014) or the condition of the property with which they are dealing (Bedell v. The Steamship Potomac, 8 Wall. (U. S.) 590, 19 L. ed. 511; Maury v. Talmadge, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,315, 2 McLean 157).

94. Foremen are prima facie not concerned with the quality of the articles on which work is done. Page v. Parker. 40 N. H. 47.

95. Hupfer v. National Distilling Co., 119 Wis. 417, 96 N. W. 809, chief engineer at distillery.

96. Statements of agents intrusted with the general oversight of manufacturing establishments, who have been commissioned to discharge the duty of the principal to provide safe and convenient tools and appliances for carrying on the work affect the principal. Black v. Des Moines Mfg, etc., Co., (Iowa 1898) 77 N. W. 504; Van Dusen v. Letellier, 78 Mich. 492, 44 N. W. 572. But declarations not made in the course of discharging these duties are incompetent. Beasley v. San Jose Fruit-Packing Co., 92 Cal. 388, 28 Pac. 485. Mere superintendency of a number of men, as by a "pit boss" (Smith v. Little Pittsburg Coal Co., 75 Mo. App. 177) or "underground captain" (Andrews v. Tamarack Min. Co., 114 Mich. 375, 72 N. W. 242) does not establish a relation of general agency.

97. Employees in general affect a principal by relevant statements only when acting on the specific duty with which they have been charged. A hostler for example may speak regarding the horses which he is working upon (McPherrin v. Jennings, 66 Iowa 622, 24 N. W. 242); a hotel clerk may declare regarding the deposit of valuables at his hotel (Weeks v. Barron, 38 Vt. 420); but a porter is not concerned with the condition of the water-pipes, even of the house in which he is employed (Cleveland Coöperative Stove Co. v. Wheeler, 14 Ill. App. 112); and a bartender for an innkeeper has no connection with the valuable packages intrusted to his employer (Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 221, 52 Am. Dec. 303), or with his employer's title to the liquors he is himself handling (Charter v. Lane, 62 Conn. 121, 25 Atl. 464).

Declarations of the driver of a team as to the cause of a collision will be competent against the owner. Toledo, etc., R. Co. v. Goddard, 25 Ind. 185. But admissions by a teamster as to the condition of goods received by him for his employer are not competent against the latter. Sibley Warehouse, etc., Co. v. Durand, etc., Co., 200 Ill. 354, 65 N. E. 676 [affirming 102 Ill. App. 406].

98. Bookkeepers are presumably entitled to give receipts stating on what account property was received (Myers v. Brice, 2 Pennyp. (Pa.) 382), or to state whether a principal's books were correctly kept (Ellis v. Garvey, 76 Tex. 371, 13 S. W. 320).

99. General managers have authority to make statements as to the ordering of goods (Henderson Woolen Mills v. Edwards, 84 Mo. App. 448), as to the condition of goods sold agents,[1] agents for buying, letting, or selling property,[2] or bailees;[3] agency for the care and management of property;[4] nautical employments,[5] involving the relation between owners and captains,[6] pilots,[7] crew,[8] or clerical assistants.[9] It

(Standefer v. Aultman, etc., Machinery Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 552); the employment of men (Western Union Beef Co. v. Kirchevalle, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 147), or the care and management of the property under their control (St. Louis Nat. Stock Yards v. Tiblier, 39 Ill. App. 422); but not as to the principal's title to the stock in trade (Winchester, etc., Mfg. Co. v. Creary, 116 U. S. 161, 6 S. Ct. 369, 29 L. ed. 591); and in no event are their declarations competent when made apart from the transaction of business of and for the principal (People's Nat. Bank v. Harper, 114 Ga. 603, 40 S. E. 717; Warner v. Warren, 46 N. Y. 228).

1. Receiving a claim for collection implies as a rule authority to make declarations concerning its payment (Cheney v. Beaty, 56 Ill. App. 90), but mere authority to receive money confers no right to make statements about it (Hyland v. Sherman, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 234).

2. Acts, verbal or otherwise, of an agent for buying, letting, or selling property affect the principal when done within the scope of the agency and while engaged in discharging its duties. Barnesville Mfg. Co. v. Love, 3 Pennew. (Del.) 569, 52 Atl. 267; Rahm v. Deig, 121 Ind. 283, 23 N. E. 141; Murray v. Weber, 92 Iowa 757, 60 N. W. 492; Gimbel v. Salomon, 54 Iowa 389, 6 N. W. 582; Lohdell v. Baker, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 193, 35 Am. Dec. 358; Webster v. Clark, 30 N. H. 245; Standefer v. Aultman, etc., Machinery Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 552 (agent of seller of machinery); Goddard v. Crefield Mills, 75 Fed. 818, 21 C. C. A. 530; Garth v. Howard, 8 Bing. 451, 21 E. C. L. 616, 5 C. & P. 346, 24 E. C. L. 599, 1 L. J. C. P. 129, 1 Moore & S. 628. But an agent is not concerned with the title which his employer has acquired to the goods he is employed to sell. Bowman v. Griffith, 35 Nebr. 361, 53 N. W. 140; Sharp v. Lamy, 37 N. Y. App. Div. 136, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 784; Pier v. Duff, 63 Pa. St. 59.

Common agent of buyer and seller.— A passbook kept by a teamster and collector who was the common agent of the buyer and sellers of milk, showing the amount of milk purchased, was held admissible in an action by the seller against one of the purchasers for the price of milk alleged to have been sold to him. Copeland v. Boston Dairy Co., 184 Mass. 207, 68 N. E. 218.

3. While mere possession of property does not constitute a relation of agency (Brooks v. Taylor, 65 Mich. 208, 31 N. W. 837; Sheaffer v. Eakman, 56 Pa. St. 144; Warren v. Frederichs, 76 Tex. 647, 13 S. W. 643; Mooring v. McBride, 62 Tex. 309), it is an important circumstance as to whether an agency exists and its general scope; and an owner will be assumed to have conferred upon his bailee all usual and customary powers necessary for the safety of the property (Morrison v. New York, etc., R. Co., 32 Barb. (N. Y.) 568), and its proper and profitable use (Corson v. Berson, 86 Cal. 433, 25 Pac. 7; Pierce v. State, 109 Ind. 535, 10 N. E. 302; Salvini v. Legumazabel, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 68 S. W. 183).

4. Peterson v. Mineral King Fruit Co., 140 Cal. 624, 74 Pac. 162 (excluding admissions as to the condition of goods sold made by the superintendent of a prune ranch whose duties were to prepare the prunes for market and to manage the ranch generally, but who had neither actual nor ostensible authority with respect to sales); Sweeney v. Sweeney, 119 Ga. 76, 46 S. E. 76 (holding that the declarations of an agent in possession of real property to manage and care for the same only are not admissible against the principal to disparage his title); Diehl v. Watson, 89 N. Y. App. Div. 445, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 851 (excluding declarations of the janitor of an apartment house to the effect that disagreeable odors, on account of which a constructive eviction was claimed, came from a particular source or cause).

5. Declarations of workmen employed for a specific purpose, such as storage of cargo, do not affect the principal. Mallory v. Perkins, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 572.

6. In maritime affairs the captain of a vessel is general agent for her owners, and his declarations are competent against them if made in the course of his employment. Gerke v. California Steam Nav. Co., 9 Cal. 251, 70 Am. Dec. 650 (damages caused by fire set by vessel); Price v. Thornton, 10 Mo. 135 (stealing slave); Western Ins. Co. v. Tobin, 32 Ohio St. 77; Union Ins. Co. v. Smith, 124 U. S. 405, 8 S. Ct. 534, 31 L. ed. 497; Eads v. The H. D. Bacon, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,232, 1 Newb. Adm. 274. His declarations as to the payment of passage money (Holladay v. Littlepage, 2 Munf. (Va.) 316) and the handling (Price v. Powell, 3 N. Y. 322) and disposition (Burpee v. Carvill, 16 N. Brunsw. 141) of cargo are therefore within his authority. But the rule falls with the reason for it, and where a captain has chartered a vessel and is no longer sailing it as agent for the owners his declarations cease to affect them. Tucker v. Stimson, 12 Gray (Mass.) 487. Statements of facts not connected with the transaction of his business, such as who the owners are, do not come within his commission. Chambers v. Davis, 3 Whart. (Pa.) 40.

7. A pilot is not usually the agent of the owners. Ready v. The Highland Mary, 20 Mo. 264.

8. Statements of the crew do not affect the owners. Maltby v. The R. R. Kirkland, 48 Fed. 760.

9. Declarations by employees who have only specific clerical duties to perform cannot affect the principal. Ward's Cent., etc., has also been considered in relation to the service of legal process by sheriffs,[10] deputy sheriffs,[11] or constables.[12]

(B) Insurance Business.[13] In order to render the statement of an agent of an insurance company admissible against the company it must affirmatively appear to have been within the scope of his authority[14] at the time when it was made,[15] and that he made it while engaged on the business of the company.[16] The agency conferred by a particular employment is broad in proportion as the range of the duties assigned is general rather than specific — a rule best understood by its applications.[17] As between the assured under an insurance contract

Co. v. Elkins, 34 Mich. 439, 22 Am. Rep. 544.

10. Sheriffs employed for the service of civil as distinguished from criminal process may affect the person employing them within the scope of the employment by statements made in a reasonable discharge of the duties of the agency. Chrisman v. Carney, 33 Ark. 316; Reisan v. Mott, 42 Minn. 49, 43 N. W. 691, 18 Am. St. Rep. 489. But it is not within the agency of a sheriff to characterize the bona fides of a sale conducted by him. Kean v. Newell, 2 Mo. 9.

11. Declarations of a deputy or under-sheriff affect the sheriff (Savage v. Balch, 8 Me. 27; Mantz v. Collins, 4 Harr. & M. (Md.) 65; Somervell v. Hunt, 3 Harr. & M. (Md.) 113; Tyler v. Ulmer, 12 Mass. 163; Terral v. McRae, 6 Sm. & M. (Miss.) 136; Mott v. Kip, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 478; State v. Allen, 27 N. C. 36; Wheeler v. Hambright, 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 390; Lyman v. Lull, 20 Vt. 349), if made within the scope of the declarant's official duty and while engaged in discharging it (Grimshaw v. Paul, 76 Ill. 164; Barker v. Binninger, 14 N. Y. 270; Snowball v. Goodricke, 4 B. & Ad. 541, 2 L. J. K. B. 53, 1 N. & M. 234, 24 E. C. L. 238), and when the process is in force (Mott v. Kip, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 478), and in the officer's hands, although service has already been made (Wheeler v. Hambright, 9 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 390).

12. A sheriff who intrusts a constable with the service of a writ is affected by the latter's declarations while serving it. Walker v. Howell, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 238. But a constable is not, simply by having process committed to him for service, authorized by his principal to tamper with witnesses. Green v. Woodbury, 48 Vt. 5.

Self-serving statements by an agent are not regarded as being made within the scope of his agency. Neuendorff v. World Mut. L. Ins. Co., 69 N. Y. 389.

17. General agents are so far identified with the principal that their statement may be competent even as to a past transaction. Bartlett v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 77 Iowa 155, 41 N. W. 601; Sussex County Mut. Ins. Co. v. Woodruff, 26 N. J. L. 541. A letter written by the general agent of a life-insurance company to its home office, announcing the death of insured, referring to the failure of insured to pay a premium, and stating, "In response to three visits of our collector he promised to pay the renewal within a few days," is admissible in an action on the policy as a declaration of the general agent in the line of duty. Knarston v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co., 140 Cal. 57, 73 Pac. 740.

Medical examiners.— Statements by a company medical examiner (McGowan v. Supreme Ct. I. O. of F., 104 Wis. 173, 80 N. W. 603) or an examining physician (Rhode v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 129 Mich. 112, 88 N. W. 400) made in connection with the examination as to the condition of the assured affect the principal.

and the beneficiary to whom the loss is payable, no general relation of agency as a rule exists.[18] Therefore statements of the assured are not in general competent against the beneficiary,[19] especially if made before the inception of the insurance contract.[20] But declarations intimately connected with the existence of the contract, as that it has lapsed,[21] or that statements made in the application on which the policy issued were untrue,[22] are competent. Where the assured reserves a jus disponendi as to the beneficial interest in the policy the number of relevant facts as to which his declaration may affect the beneficiary is much increased.[23] Admissions of one beneficiary are received against the others if adopted by them.[24] The record of a coroner's inquest attached to proofs of death is competent against the beneficiary if the proofs are made by him,[25] but not where such proofs are furnished by the company's agent.[26]

be in any form, oral[27] or written,[28] including a statement made in a pleading[29] or as a witness on a former trial;[30] in which latter case he stands in the same position as any other witness and his absence must be satisfactorily explained,[31] unless the declarant is a party to the second case.[32] An incompetent admission does not become competent merely because it was made by a witness.[33]

(II) Statements of Person to Whom Reference Is Made. A declaration competent as an admission may be made by one to whom the party to be affected by it has sent another for information on a given point, agreeing expressly or by implication to be so affected;[34] a relation of agency within the scope of the reference being established by it[35] as to declarations subsequent to the reference,[36] provided that the declarant states facts rather than his opinion,[37] and is possessed of adequate information on the subject.[38] The result is the same where a party agrees that the decision of a body of men[39] shall be binding.[40] The range of permissible subjects of reference is extensive, and may include the sender's "sentiments,"[41] or his legal liability under certain facts.[42] The referring party is affected only by what the person referred to sees fit to state, and is not responsible for the fact that the answer might more properly have been different.[43] Like

d. Agents For Private Corporations[47]— (i) In General. Since a corporation necessarily acts by agents, the legality of corporate action is largely a question of agency.[48] The powers of its general and special agents are as a rule limited (1) by the powers of the corporation itself, and (2) by the scope of authority conferred by corporate action.[49] Relevant[50] statements of an agent within the scope of his duty to the corporation are admissible against it.[51] Financial managers, like cashiers are general agents,[52] and their statements made while discharging their duties, affect the corporation.[53] A corporation as principal cannot take advantage of the acts of one who has purported to act as its agent without at the same time conceding that it is affected by declarations or other acts of the agent.[54]

(II) Officers.[55] A private corporation will be affected by the relevant declarations of its proper officers[56] of general or limited authority, if made in the line of the declarant's official duty.[57] In the absence of regulation by the corporation an officer has the powers usually attaching to the office among similar corporations.[58]

While the books of a corporation may not as between it and third persons be competent against the company (Columbus Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Kriete, 87 Ill. App. 51), they may as between it and its stock-holders be competent against the stock-holders as admissions (Steam Stone-Cutter Co. v. Scott, 157 Mo. 520, 57 S. W. 1076); and so confidential communications by the officers (In re Devala Provident Gold Min. Co., 22 Ch. D. 593, 52 L. J. Ch. 434, 48 L. T. Rep. N. S. 259, 31 Wkly. Rep. 425) or receiver (Ft. While limitations may be imposed by law or by the by-laws of the corporation, the authority of the president is that of a general officer and extends to the doing of acts of general management.[59] Competent declarations of all officers relate properly only to the routine business of the corporation. Its fundamental interests, such as the ownership of the corpus of the property, cannot be deemed within the control of declarations by agents however general may be their powers.[60]

(III) Agents For Railroad Corporations[61] — (A) In General. A railroad corporation is affected by the statements of an agent, provided the agent is duly qualified to act in the matter concerning which the statement is made, and makes the statement while he is acting in regard to that particular matter and in the reasonable discharge of his duties.[62] Subject to these conditions the declarations of agents of general authority, such as general managers,[63] superintendents,[64] general freight or passenger agents,[65] or claim agents,[66] may be competent as admissions of the company, while, on the other hand, the statements of agents or employees within the scope of his ordinary powers, or some special agency relative to the subject-matter is shown. Haney-Campbell Co. v. Preston Creamery Assoc., 119 Iowa 188, 93 N. But the statements of a railroad claim agent required to make investigations are not as a rule competent to determine the liability of the principal upon the facts which he has ascertained of more limited authority connected with the engineering,[67] operating,[68] station,[69]

(Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Klein, 43 Ill. App. 63; Chesapeake, etc., R. Co. v. Smith, 101 Ky. 104, 39 S. W. 832, 18 Ky. L. Rep. 1079; Doyle v. St. Paul, etc., R. Co., 42 Minn. 79, 43 N. W. 787), or to waive the advantage of any beneficial adjustment which the principal has reached (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Belliwith, 83 Fed. 437, 28 C. C. A. 358).

67. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Sulphur Spring Independent School Dist., 96 Pa. St. 65, 42 Am. Rep. 529. But see Brehm v. Great Western R. Co., 34 Barb. (N. 68. A baggage-master's statements concerning the loss of baggage may affect the company if made in reply to legitimate inquiries by the passenger (Morse v. Connecticut River R. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 450; Curtis v. Avon, etc., R. Co., 49 Barb. (N. Y.) 148), but the declarations of a train baggage-master as to the running of his train are incompetent (N. N. & M. V. R. Co. v. Decker, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 108).

A brakeman's declarations are ordinarily incompetent (Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Carrow, 73 Ill. 348, 24 Am. Rep. 248; Patterson v. Wabash, etc., R. Co., 54 Mich. 91, 19 N. W. 761), but they are admissible when made within the scope of actual authority (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Flaherty, 202 Ill. 151, 66 N. E. 1083).

Conductors.— The duties of conductors of freight (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Carlisle, (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 553) or passenger trains do not require or permit them to make narrative statements involving the legal liability of the railroad (Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Ashcraft, 48 Ala. 15; East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Maloy, 77 Ga. 237, 2 S. E. 941; Griffin v. Montgomery, etc., R. Co., 26 Ga. 111; Chicago, etc., R. Their declarations made prior to the occurrence are equally incompetent. Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Ashcraft, 49 Ala. 305. A conductor's statements as to matters immediately connected with his employment, as the giving of information to a proper person concerning the time of the arrival of trains (San Antonio, etc., R. Co. v. Barnett, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 498, 66 S. W. 474), or other matters relating to the movement of the train in his present charge (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Gore, 202 Ill. 188, 66 N. E. 1063, 95 Am. St. Rep. 224), enforcing the payment of fares (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Flaharty, 96 Ill. App. 563; Beckham v. Southern R. Co., 50 S. C. 25, 27 S. E. 611), or attaching a car to his train (Beckham v. Southern R. Co., 50 S. C. 25, 27 S. E. 611) are admissible.

The engineer of a train is not the agent of the company to discourse on its account as to the condition of his engine (Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Stein, 133 Ind. 243, 31 N. E. 180, 32 N. E. 831, 19 L. R. A. 733; Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Parker, 55 Fed. 595, 5 C. C. A. 220), or as to the facts attending an accident caused by his train (Carroll v. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co., 82 Ga. 452, 10 S. Firemen are not competent declarants as to the knowledge on the part of the company of defects in the machinery under their charge. Lyter v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 6 Ky. L. Rep. 223.

Trainmen may while discharging their duties make competent statements as to matters relating thereto (Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Consolidated Cattle Co., 59 Kan. 111, 52 Pac. 71; Pullman Car Co. v. Gardner, 3 Pennyp. (Pa.) 78), but statements made under other circumstances are not admissions of the principal (Drake v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 80 Hun (N. Y.) 490, 30 N. Y. Suppl. 671).

69. Station agents are not concerned with the company's demands for cars on account of its through traffic (Branch v. Wilmington, etc., R. Co., 88 N. C. 573), and a station freight agent is not merely by virtue of his employment entitled to affect the principal by his statements (Boston, etc., R. Co. v. Ordway, 140 Mass. 510, 5 N. E. 627). So long, however, as anything remains to be done by the company in delivering at its destination freight shipped by its line, statements by station freight agents of the company in reply to questions of the shipper relating to the freight are competent as being within the duty of the agency (Central R., etc., Co. v. Skellie, 86 Ga. 686, 12 S. E. 1017; Green v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 128 Mass. 221, 35 Am. Rep. 370; Lane v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 112 Mass. 455), and the rule is the same as to the baggage of passengers (Gott v. Dinsmore, 111 Mass. 45; Morse v. Connecticut River R. Co., 6 Gray (Mass.) 450; Thompson v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 59 Mo. App. 37; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Campbell, 36 Ohio St. 647, 38 Am. Rep. 617). See also Hampton v. Pullman Palace Car Co., 42 Mo. App. 134. The statements of a ticket agent as to track,[70] or other specific departments of the railroad company's work would under the same circumstances be incompetent as admissions of the principal.

(B) Officers.[71] Relevant statements of the president,[72] secretary,[73] general solicitor,[74] or specially authorized director[75] of a railroad corporation affect the latter if made within the scope of the officer's employment and while engaged in discharging its duties.[76]

(C) Agents For Street Railways — (1) IN GENERAL. An agent[77] or employee[78] of a street railway corporation may affect it by his declarations only when they concern matters connected with his duty and are made in the course of discharging the same.[79]

(2) OFFICERS. Statements of officers, even though general officers, of a street railway corporation, if not made in pursuance of some duty to the corporation are inadmissible against it.[80]

the stopping of trains are said to affect the company, and even to be conclusive. Miller v. King, 84 Hun (N. Y.) 308, 32 N. Y. Suppl. 332. A station agent's duties do not include making statements as to the condition of the station (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Barger, 52 Ark. 78, 12 S. W. 156, 20 Am. St. Rep. 155), the transportation facilities of the company (Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Osborn, 58 Kan. 768, 51 Pac. 286), or the cause of an accident (Meyer v. Virginia, etc., R. Co., 16 Nev. 341).

70. Trackmen.— An employee upon the road-bed and right of way or sections thereof, as a foreman (Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Osborn, 58 Kan. 768, 51 Pac. 286; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 108 Ky. 47, 55 S. W. 716, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1476; Rowe v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 82 Md. 493, 33 Atl. 761), a road master (Mundhenk v. Central Iowa R. Co., 57 Iowa 718, 11 N. W. 656), section boss (Halverson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 57 Minn. 142, 58 N. W. 871; Waldrop v. Greenwood, etc., R. Co., 28 S. C. 157, 5 S. E. 471), or a superintendent (Livingston v. Iowa Midland R. Co., 35 Iowa 555) can make as against the company only such statements of fact as are fairly called for by his employment. Declarations as to new construction (Livingston v. Iowa Midland R. Co., 35 Iowa 555), the condition of the road-bed (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 108 Ky. 47, 55 S. W. 716; Rowe v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 82 Md. 493, 33 Atl. 761) or rolling-stock (Atchison, etc., R. Co. v. Osborn, 58 Kan. 768, 51 Pac. 286), the cause of an accident (Mundhenk v. Central Iowa R. Co., 57 Iowa 718, 11 N. W. 656), or the value of stock killed (Halverson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 57 Minn. 142, 58 N. W. 871) are not competent. Agents in charge of the construction or repair of the road-bed may, however, affect the company by declarations as to the manner in which this specific work was done. Matteson v. New York Cent. R. Co., 62 Barb. (N. Y.) 364.

e. Agents For Public Corporations.[81] Statements of a public officer in the absence of express authority are not competent against the national[82] or state[83] government; and even where authority is conferred on a public officer which would enable him to affect the national,[84] state, or municipal[85] government by his statement, it must affirmatively appear that the statement was made within the scope of his authority.[86] Public corporations, such as counties,[87] cities, or towns,[88] being instrumentalities of government rather than institutions for profit-making purposes, are in a measure relieved from liability for acts or statements of officers, agents, or employees who are regarded rather as public functionaries than as agents of the municipality itself.[89] But with this qualification the municipality may be affected by declarations of public officers within the scope of their authority as to the ownership of its property[90] or the management of its business enterprises.[91] A committee specially commissioned for a particular duty has the general powers of the municipality relating to the matter intrusted to it, and may make competent declarations regarding this duty while engaged in discharging it.[92]

f. Special Forms of Agency — (i) Attorneys. An attorney in civil cases may make admissions of fact which will affect his client, provided that his authority be made affirmatively to appear[93] either by direct evidence, not includ-

(II) Conspirators and Persons Acting Together — (A) In General. Where it is proved that parties have a community of interest and object, the declarations of one of them, if fairly within the scope of the common design and made while engaged in an attempt to effectuate it, are evidence against the others.[99]

(B) Proof of Common Purpose — Province of Court and Jury. To render the statements of one alleged to be engaged in furtherance of a common design competent against other persons than himself it is essential that there be proof of an agreement, express or implied, to carry out the common purpose in a definite way by united efforts.[1] If there is evidence, direct or circumstantial,[2] from which a jury might reasonably infer the existence of such agreement, and the other conditions of admissibility[3] exist, the court may admit the declarations of any one of the persons interested.[4] Declarations of one of the persons alleged to be engaged in the common design are not admissible to prove it,[5] but may be received in corroboration if sufficient evidence be produced aliunde.[6] Declarations made before an agreement was formed are not admissible against others than the declarant,[7] although it is otherwise if the declarations and the overt acts showing the existence of a conspiracy are contemporaneous.[8] Whether sufficient evidence has been produced to authorize a jury to find the existence of a conspiracy is ordinarily a preliminary question for determination by the court.[9] Declarations of one alleged conspirator may in the discretion of the court be admitted against another prior to proof of a conspiracy between them, upon assurance by counsel that such proof will be made during the trial.[10] The fact of conspiracy is ultimately a question for the jury.[11]

object and while engaged in carrying it out is the act and declaration of all.[12] On the other hand declarations of one conspirator, if not made in pursuance of the common design, are not admissible against the others because, as is said, they constitute no part of the res gestæ.[13] A competent declaration may be made at any time before the common object is attained or definitely abandoned;[14] completion of a stage in the projected enterprise does not exclude an otherwise relevant statement.[15]

(D) Independent Relevancy. The statement of a fellow conspirator may be not so much an admission as a verbal act in the transaction relevant in and of itself.[16] It may for example tend to establish circumstantially the existence of a relevant mental state, such as the intention with which an act was done,[17] motive,[18] purpose,[19] or adulterous disposition,[20] and thus affect not only the declarant, but so far as connected with the statement[21] all his associates in the common enterprise. The statement being relevant in itself may be competent, although made prior to the conspiracy.[22]

(E) Narrative Statements. Statements concerning past transactions are not in general within the scope of agency conferred by unity of purpose.[23] A statement by a conspirator made when the common purpose has been accomplished[24] is incompetent against his associates, although given as a witness in court.[25]

59. Wood v. Braddick, 1 Taunt. 104, 105, 9 Rev. Rep. 711, where Mansfield, C. sible against all the partners,[60] although incompetent to create a new or additional liability,[61] or alone to prove indebtedness of the firm.[62] But the prevailing opinion in the United States is that such declarations cannot be received,[63] in the absence of prior authority or subsequent ratification,[64] against any partner other than the declarant,[65] even as to matters pending at the time of dissolution.[66] When one of the partners acts as agent of the others in winding up the business of the late firm he has no agency to bind his former associates as to new business,[67] or to create a new partnership contract;[68] but his declarations as to firm debts or lia-dence? and that those who are to-day as one person in interest, should to-morrow become entirely distinct in interest with regard to past transactions which occurred while they were so united."

(VII) TRUSTEES AND CESTUIS QUE TRUSTENT—(A) In General. It is essential to the competency of statements made by a trustee as agent for a beneficiary that he should not only have been appointed to his trust,[85] but have fully qualified to discharge its duties,[86] and that the declaration should have been made in discharge of those duties.[87] The powers conferred by the nature of the trust, or the instrument under which the trustee is acting, generally determine the competency of particular statements,[88] although it has been held that the authority of a trustee must be express.[89] Statements as to his conduct in discharge of his duties,[90] or in his own favor,[91] or impairing the rights of his beneficiaries,[92] are incompetent. Declarations of a trustee without interest in the estate do not affect the cestui que trust.[93]

(B) Administrators. Statements by an administrator made under conditions applying to trustees generally [94] are competent against the estate.[95] It has been held that an administrator cannot, without his own consent, be affected by statements of a predecessor in the trust.[96] Declarations of one of several administrators are incompetent against the estate,[97] even where they were severally appointed by courts in different jurisdictions.[98] The agency of an administrator does not in general authorize him to make statements injuriously affecting the interests of the trust estate.[99]

E. Proof and Effect* — 1. Mode and Requisites of Proof — a. Preliminary Evidence. Before a statement can be used against a party as an admission there must be at least prima facie proof that it was made by him, by his authority,[8] or by some person whose statements may legally affect the party.[9]

b. Proof of Admissions. An oral admission may be proved by any person who heard it.[10] If a witness cannot give the exact words of a conversation he may state the substance of it,[11] but not merely his understanding of the admission,[12] or his conclusion of what it would prove.[13] Testimony to an admission in conversation may be received for what it is worth, although the witness states that he did not hear the whole conversation.[14] But a witness cannot testify to an admission if he is unable to state whether it was made by a party or by a person whose statement would be hearsay and incompetent.[15] An alleged admission should not be considered where the subject-matter to which it refers is left uncertain.[16] Contents of a document cannot be established by admission thereof, when the document itself can be produced.[17] Where a person claims a beneficial interest under a written instrument to which he is not a party, not having signed it, his admission as to the purpose for which it was executed may be used against him without first proving the execution of the instrument by those who signed it.[18] When admissions of a predecessor in title are offered in evidence[19] it is material to show accurately or approximately when they were made.[20] The general rule is that a party need not put in any mode of an admission, oral or written, other than he desires to use; and he may leave it to the other party to put in the remainder.[21] Pleadings are not evidence unless they are introduced on the trial at the proper time and in the proper way.[22] Admissions by a party to a suit may be proved against him without laying a predicate therefor by examining him touching such admissions.[23]

ments made on another and separate occasion,[33] and the burden is upon him to prove that statements offered by him were not thus made.[34] Where part of a conversation containing no admission is introduced for another proper purpose, the remainder is not admissible unless it be necessary that all shall be taken together.[35]

3. Entire Statement to Be Considered. When an entire statement is admitted in evidence under the rule hereinbefore stated,[36] the self-serving part of it must be duly considered and weighed together with the unfavorable part.[37] But all parts of the statement are not necessarily to be regarded as worthy of equal credit.[38] The triers of fact may reject such portions, if any, as appear to be inconsistent, improbable, or rebutted by other circumstances in evidence;[39] but they are not at liberty to disbelieve the self-serving part capriciously and without any reasonable grounds.[40] The assertion of a legal right to do an act, coupled with an admission that the party did the act, does not neutralize the admission.[41]

4. Construction of Admissions. In order to deduce an admission from the statement of a person his language must be reasonably capable of construction as an admission,[42] and a statement should not be extended by strained construction beyond the fair import of its terms.[43] It should be construed in view of the pur-

"Where a man admits the justice of an account, but contends that he has paid it, all his statements must go to the jury; yet if he can give no reason for his belief, nor show any thing in support of it, the jury are not bound to believe it, and may give judgment on the admission." Craighead v. State Bank, Meigs (Tenn.) 199, 206, per Turley, J. Admission of correctness of account is prima facie neutralized by accompanying positive statement that it has been paid (Smith v. Jones, 15 Johns. (N. Admission of receipt of money from a testator does not authorize an inference that it was not a gift or that it was obtained surreptitiously and fraudulently. Miller's Estate, 151 Pa. St. 525, 25 Atl. 144.

Party's admission that another person is the wife of the other party is not an admission of marriage in fact, but only of marriage by reputation. Morris v. Miller, 4 Burr. 2057, action of criminal conversation. Compare Forney v. Hallacher, 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 159, 11 Am. Dec. 590.

Admission of service of notice is no admis-pose for which it was made,[44] and is competent evidence of all that can be justly inferred from it.[45] Thus an admission of the correctness of an account for goods sold admits the sale and delivery of the goods.[46] Ambiguous oral statements should not, it seems, be construed contrary to the contention of their author.[47] An admission in a party's testimony may be construed by the subsequent course of both parties on the trial.[48] No presumption of a fact can be drawn from a statement expressly denying the fact.[49] Construction of a statement, either oral[50] or written,[51] which is introduced as an admission is for the jury.

5. Sufficiency to Establish Fact Admitted. Proof of a party's express and unqualified admission of a fact, either orally or in writing, suffices to establish the fact as against him, in the absence of opposing evidence,[52] unless a statute pre-sion as to time of service. Hensel v. Johnson, 94 Md. 729, 51 Atl. 575.

Admission that claim is made does not admit its validity. Siebert v. Steinmeyer, 204 Pa. St. 419, 54 Atl. 336.

party, does not impair the effect of an admission.[56] Nor is this effect of an admission vitiated by a qualifying statement of a fact irrelevant to the issue in the case.[57] But an admission evidently made without personal knowledge of the fact admitted,[58] or a statement inconsistent and contradictory,[59] indefinite,[60] or equivocal and not elucidated by further proof,[61] may have little or no weight as evidence. An admission is of no benefit to the opposite party where witnesses of the latter prove the fact to be otherwise.[62] Admissions properly introduced in evidence may be used by either side in support of its views,[63] and their weight is wholly a question of fact for the jury.[64] Circumstances affecting the weight of testimony to oral admissions of a party and also the weight of written admissions are considered elsewhere in this article.[65]

6. Conclusiveness of Admissions — a. Extrajudicial Admissions — (i) In General. When no element of estoppel exists,[66] extrajudicial admissions,[67] whether oral or written, are not conclusive upon the party making them, but may be explained, limited, or qualified, or their effect may be weakened by proof of the attending facts and circumstances or by other evidence relevant to that purpose.[68]

evidence is competent, although the admission was in writing.[75] But evidence thus to overcome a clear admission must be full and unquestionable;[76] and evidence which does not in any way impugn or qualify a fact admitted is irrelevant.[77] An admission of a party introduced in evidence by the other party is not conclusive on the latter.[78]

On subsequent trial.— Admissions by counsel for the purpose of dispensing with proof are usually binding upon a subsequent trial by admissions in the pleadings on which he goes to trial.[88] But admissions in withdrawn, abandoned, or superseded pleadings are treated as extrajudicial admissions[89] by which the pleader is not concluded.[90] A party is not bound by the admission of his adversary in a pleading, but may use it as far as it makes in his favor and disprove the residue.[91]

Admission by party in his testimony on the trial dispenses with proof of the fact admitted. Roach v. Burgess, (Tex. Civ. App. 1901) 62 S. W. 803. But an admission which is really an estimate or guess by the party may well be overcome by evidence of the facts and circumstances constituting the basis of the admission. Culberson v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 50 Mo. App. 556. And it has been held that the testimony of a party against his interest is not as a matter of law to be taken as true. Ephland v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 71 Mo. App. 597.

Admission of a conclusion of law made on the trial is not binding on the court (Rice v. Ruddiman, 10 Mich. 125), nor is it binding on the party if made under a mistaken belief as to the law (Hays v. Cage, 2 Tex. 501. See also Rawlings v. Neal, 122 N. C. 173, 29 S. E. 93).

Admission in deposition taken before trial does not conclude the deponent on the trial. McCombs v. Foster, 62 Mo. App. 303.

Bill of exceptions in a cause is not necessarily conclusive on a retrial in respect of its statements as to concessions made on the first trial. Mullin v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co., 56 Vt. 39, holding that a party may show the exact terms and limitations of the concession.

V. PRESUMPTIONS.*

A. Presumptions of Fact — 1. In General. Generically considered, a presumption of fact is that mental process by which the existence of one fact is inferred from proof of some other fact with which experience shows it is usually associated by succession or coexistence. It is inseparable from inductive reasoning as an inference of the unknown from proof of the known.[1] As commonly used in the law of evidence the term "presumption of fact" is applied to certain

See also Lawhorn v. Carter, 71 Bush (Ky.) 7, 9, where it is said: "Presumptions of facts are, at best, but mere arguments, and are to be judged by the common and received tests of the truth of propositions and the validity of arguments. They depend upon their own natural force and efficacy in generating conviction in the mind, and should not be aided by suggestions or intimations from the court as to what they do or do not prove." In Graham v. Badger, 164 Mass. 42, 47, 41 N. E. 61, Mr. Justice Holmes, discussing the rule of res ipsa loquitur, said that "presumptions of fact, or those general propositions of experience which form the major premises of particular conclusions of this sort, usually are for the jury."

Further expositions of presumptions of fact are: "When a fact is established in a cause by evidence, the jury may properly be allowed to draw therefrom such inferences as are logically deducible from it. . . A presumption should always be based upon a fact, and should be a reasonable and natural deduction from such fact." Philadelphia City Pass. R. Co. v. Henrice, 92 Pa. St. 431, 433, 37 Am. Rep. 699, per Paxson, J.

A presumption of fact is a "natural probability" of a given fact upon proof of another particular fact. Tanner v. Hughes, 53 Pa. St. 289, 290.

"The policy of the law attaches a presumption of law to all men generally. A presumption of fact is such that our knowledge of human nature and affairs leads us to draw from a particular range of facts presented in a specific case." Com. v. Frew, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 492, 496, per Yerkes, P. J.

"As proof of a fact, the law permits inferences from other facts." Douglass v. Mitchell, 35 Pa. St. 440, 443, per Thompson, J.

"The fair inferences from evidence founded upon the natural course of business and of human experience, are as much evidence as of the more frequent and strongly probative of the great mass of these logical inferences. In connection with this specific use, not only must the fact from which the inference is drawn be established in evidence and not rest on the accuracy of a reasoning process,[2] but the inference to which it gives rise should, in the majority of cases, be strong and almost inevitable.[3] A failure to comply with these requirements when announcing such a presumption has been severely criticized[4] and the caution deserves attention, as it is on the legally recognized presumptions of fact that the true "presumptions" or assumptions of law are based. It follows from the nature of the presumption of fact that it is rebuttable.[5]

2. BASED ON FACTS, NOT ON PRESUMPTIONS. No inference of fact should be drawn from premises which are uncertain.[6] Facts upon which an inference may legitimately rest must, it is said, be established by direct evidence as if they were the very facts in issue;[7] one presumption cannot be based upon another presumption.[8]

the principal facts from which the deductions flow." Austin v. Bingham, 31 Vt. 577, 581, per Redfield, C. J.

"We do not question that a jury may be allowed to presume the existence of a fact in some cases from the existence of other facts which have been proved. But the presumed fact must have an immediate connection with or relation to the established fact from which it is inferred." Manning v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co., 100 U. S. 693, 697, 25 L. ed. 761, per Strong, J.

"Presumptions of fact result from the proof of a fact, or a number of facts and circumstances, which human experience has shown are usually associated with the matter under investigation." U. S. v. Searcey, 26 Fed. 435, 437, per Dick, J.

Presumptions of fact "are, in truth, but mere arguments, of which the major premise is not a rule of law; they belong equally to any and every subject-matter; and are to be judged by the common and received tests of the truth of propositions and the validity of arguments. They depend upon their own natural force and efficacy in generating belief or conviction in the mind, as derived from those connections, which are shown by experience, irrespective of any legal relations." 1 Greenleaf Ev. § 44.

4. O'Gara v. Eisenlohr, 38 N. Y. 296, 299, per Mason, J., where the opinion of the court continues as follows: "There are many cases in the books which cannot be considered as law, and which are condemned by the best commentators. (Best on Presumptions of Law and Fact, 46; Law Library [N. S.], vol. 31, p. 47.) It has been well and truly said by Mr. Gresley, in his valuable treatise on equity evidence, while considering this subject, that the power of directing the jury to what length they might venture, has often been stretched beyond due limits by the judges, for, in cases of hardship, they have urged juries to presume facts which were manifestly incredible. (Gresley's Eq. Ev. 272, 273). And such are the cases of Rex v. Twyning, 2 B. & Ald. 386, 20 Rev. Rep. 480, and Wilkinson v. Payne, 4 T. R. 468, both of which have been severely criticized, and Eyre, Ch. B., characterized the latter case as one of 'presumption run mad.' It must be confessed that decisions of this kind, requiring courts and jurors to presume facts to be true which are probably, if not obviously, false, are pernicious and ought not to be followed. The presuming of absurdities in order to meet the exigencies of a particular case, must ever be fraught with mischief. Best on Presumptions of Law and Fact, 47."

Strength of inference.— The limits of time within which the inference of continuance possesses sufficient probative force to be relevant vary with each case. Always strongest in the beginning (Nash v. Classon, 55 Ill. App. 356; Bexar Bldg., etc., Assoc. v. Seebe. (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 40 S. W. 875), the inference steadily diminishes in force with lapse of time, at a rate proportionate to the quality of permanence belonging to the fact in question, until it ceases or perhaps is supplanted by a directly opposite inference (Oliver v. Ellzy, 11 Ala. 632; Goodwin v. Dean, 50 Conn. 517; Donahue v. Coleman, 49 Conn. 464; Allen v. Brown, 83 Ga. 161, 9 S. The strength of the inference is augmented when both the surnames and given names are identical (Sperry v. Tebbs, 10 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 318, 20 Cinc. L. Bul. 181), where the name is not of common occurrence (Sewell v. Evans, 4 Q. B. 626, 3 G. & D. 604, 7 Jur. 213, 12 L. J. Q. B. 276, 45 E. C. L. 626), where an appropriate initial is written out evidence to the contrary,[42] especially where the presumption of identity is invoked as an aid in tracing titles to land.[43] But identity cannot be inferred where evi-in full (Paxton v. Ross, 89 Iowa 661, 57 N. W. 428), or where there is other identification (Bennett v. Libhart, 27 Mich. 489; Stebbins v. Duncan, 108 U. S. 32, 2 S. Ct. 313, 27 L. ed. 641; Bulkeley v. Butler, 2 B. & C. 434, 3 D. & R. 625, 9 E. C. L. 194), such as that furnished by a document produced from proper custody (Simpson v. Dismore, 1 Dowl. P. C. N. S. 357, 5 Jur. 1012, 11 L. J. Exch. 137, 9 M. & W. 47), or similarity in handwriting (Sewell v. Evans, supra; Greenshields v. Crawford, 1 Dowl. P. C. N. S. 439, 6 Jur. 303, 11 L. J. Exch. 372, 9 M. & W. 314; Sayer v. Glossop, 2 Exch. 409, 12 Jur. 465, 17 L. J. Exch. 300; Nicholson v. Burkholder, 21 U. C. Q. B. 108, 111; Hesketh v. Ward, 17 U. C. Q. B. 190. See also Stebbing r. Spicer, 8 C. B. 827, 65 E. C. L. 827). reasons it is to be inferred that the death of a sane person[50] is not attributable to suicide.[51]

6. Spoliation, Fabrication, or Non-Production of Evidence[52] — a. Spoliation in General. The presumption hinted at rather than stated in the phrase omnia præsumuntur contra spoliatorem,[53] so far as it rests upon logic, is reinforced by the proposition of experience that men do not as a rule withhold from a tribunal facts beneficial to themselves. In practical administration, however, courts have, under a natural feeling of resentment at double dealing or bad faith, at times imposed penalties which, however justified by this feeling or considerations of public policy, go beyond the natural and logical effect of the situation.[54] The presumption contra spoliatorem does not justify the substitution of mere allegation or conjecture for proof,[55] nor arbitrarily overthrow a contention clearly established by evidence;[56] and its legitimate effect is confined to rendering evidence admissible which could not be received under ordinary circumstances, or giving to the evidence of the party claiming the benefit of the presumption the strongest construction in his favor that it will reasonably bear.[57] A spoliator of evidence cannot be deprived of his legal rights by excluding other and totally independent evidence offered by him.[58] In the application of principles the term "spoliation" may be regarded as generic for the various acts or omissions discussed in the following subsections.[59]

Presumption as corroboration.— When written evidence existed which would be decisive of a fact depending upon the testimony of a witness for plaintiff, directly contradicted by the oath of defendant, the court, contrary to the usual practice in such cases, decided the fact against defendant because it appeared that pending the litigation he had destroyed the written evidence. such as books of account,[61] official papers on file,[62] records,[63] or ship papers,[64] or other articles important as evidence,[65] or mutilation or alteration of material documents,[66] gives rise to an inference that the matter destroyed or mutilated is unfavorable to the spoliator. This inference, while it furnishes no affirmative evidence of facts inimical to him, enhances the probative value of his opponent's evidence,[67] and diminishes the force of his own.[68] But it cannot operate when there is positive evidence of the contents of the instrument destroyed,[69] and is, like other inferences, rebuttable by satisfactory explanation.[70]

c. Eloignment of Evidence. Where a party[71] eloigns witnesses[72] by removing them beyond the reach of process[73] or dissuading them from attendance,[74] or removes or conceals relevant documents[75] or portions thereof,[76] an inference arises that the evidence thus kept out of the case would be highly prejudicial to him.

ments are relevant, but do not constitute independent evidence of a fact.[86] Attempts to bribe a witness not to testify create an unfavorable inference.[87] It is not, however, a suppression of evidence, giving rise to adverse inferences, where a defendant in a criminal case declines to testify,[88] or a party in a civil case exercises a privilege of declining to allow his attorney[89] or physician[90] to testify, or a husband or wife thus excludes the testimony of the other.[91]

f. Failure to Call Witnesses. Failure to call an available[97] witness possessing peculiar knowledge[98] concerning facts essential to a party's case, direct[99] or rebutting,[1] or to examine such witness as to the facts covered by his special knowledge,[2] especially if the witness be naturally favorable to the party's contention,[3] relying instead upon the evidence of witnesses less familiar with the matter,[4] gives rise to an inference sometimes denominated a "strong presumption of law"[5] that the testimony of such uninterrogated witness would not sustain the contention of the party.[6] By no means the same inference arises from failure to produce corrobora-coparty,[17] confederate,[18] employee,[19] or relative,[20] his mere production in court does not free the party producing him from the inference which may arise from his not being called. He is not really a witness equally available to both parties, and it becomes the duty of the jury to say what inference, if any, arises in a given case from the failure to call him.[21]

g. Failure of Party to Testify. The non-appearance of a litigant[22] or his failure to testify[23] as to facts material to his case[24] and as to which he has especially full knowledge[25] creates an inference that he refrains from appearing or testifying because the truth if made to appear would not aid his contention; and, in connection with an unequivocal statement on the other side, which if untrue could be disproved by his testimony, often furnishes strong evidence of the fact asserted.[26] This inference does not in itself supply the place of evidence of

In the leading case of Huntley v. Whittier, 105 Mass. 391, 392, 7 Am. Rep. 536, Gray, J., said: "The depositing of a letter in the post-office, addressed to a merchant at his place of business, is prima facie evidence that he received it in the ordinary course of the mails; and where there is no other evidence, the jury should be so instructed."

44. A presumption, having the force stated in the text, that the receipt of the letter was not later than the ordinary course of the mails would deliver it, appears to have been fully recognized as existing in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, in Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 483, 56 Am. d. Mailing and Time of Mailing — (1) In General. In order to support a presumption of receipt of a letter by mail, there must be satisfactory proof that it was duly mailed,[49] although such proof need not consist of direct and positive testimony to the ultimate fact of mailing.[50] A letter deposited in a government street letter-box,[51] or delivered to an official letter carrier while on his official route,[52] or delivered to a United States mail agent while on duty on a mail

Defective address.— In U. S. Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Frommbold, 75 Ill. Non-receipt by addressee.— In Kingsland Land Co. v. Newman, 1 N. Y. App. Div. 1, 3, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 960, where the only question was whether a notice had been mailed, Brown, P. J., said: "The fact that the notice had not been received by the . . . [addressee] though it would have been of very little weight against the positive testimony of a disinterested person that it had been deposited in the post-office, was yet a circumstance which, in this case, the . . . [addressee] was entitled to have the jury consider."

50. Proof of custom in the sender's office whereby letters deposited in a particular place are taken by an employee and mailed by him, in connection with proof that the letter was so deposited and probably taken and mailed as usual, may support a presumption of due receipt. Lawrence Bank v. Raney, etc., Iron Co., 77 Md. 321, 26 Atl. 119; Matter of Wiltse, 5 Misc. (N. Y.) 105, 25 N. Y. Suppl. 733. See also Dana v. Kemble, 19 Pick. Custom of notary.— In Miller v. Hackley, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 375, 4 Am. Dec. 372, a notary testified that it was usual for him, when the drawer or indorser lived at a distance, to send a written notice of the dishonor of the bill to them by post on the evening of the same day, and that he believed he had sent such notice in that way. This was held sufficient. See also Backdahl v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 46 Minn. 61, 48 N. W. 454.

train,[53] is duly mailed. A postmark on the envelope affords a presumption that the letter was mailed,[54] but not that it was mailed on the day indicated.[55] The date of a letter authorizes no inference that it was mailed on that day.[56]

(II) Prepayment of Postage. A letter is not duly mailed so as to give rise to a presumption of receipt by the addressee, unless it is proved that the postage was prepaid.[57]

e. Time of Receipt. In the absence of evidence to the contrary it is presumed that a letter duly mailed was received in the ordinary course of the mails.[58] But receipt at a particular time cannot be presumed unless there is proof of the course of the mails,[59] as well as of the date of mailing,[60] for courts do not take judicial notice of the time of the arrival or departure of mails or trains,[61] nor of the number of mails between different places,[62] or the car-time from one place to another.[63]

f. Circumstances Strengthening Presumption. Presumption of receipt of a letter by mail is strengthened — "becomes well-nigh conclusive"[64] — where the letter bears a return request and is not returned to the sender,[65] or where it is found in possession of the addressee.[66] Conduct of the addressee inconsistent with the fact of non-receipt of the letter,[67] such as his refusal, on proper inquiry, to admit or deny receipt,[68] aids the presumption.

mail matter. See also Skilbeck v. Garbett, 7 Q. B. 846, 9 Jur. 939, 14 L. J. Q. B. 338, 53 E. C. L. 846.

g. Rebuttal of Presumption. The presumption of due receipt of a letter may be rebutted by evidence that it was not in fact received,[69] or not received in the ordinary course of the mails.[70] And the inference of delivery to the addressee in person may be destroyed by a contrary inference arising from a course of business routine in the addressee's office whereby letters are diverted from him to the hands of an employee.[71] It has been held that evidence of non-receipt, even though it consist of the addressee's positive denial of receipt, does not nullify the presumption, but leaves the question for the determination of the jury under all the circumstances,[72] with such weight given to the presumption as they think it

Suppression of evidence.— If employees in the office of the addressee testify that they did not receive the letter, but the one most likely to have knowledge of a positive kind is not produced and sworn, although still in the employ of the addressee, the omission to call him is fatal to the claim that the letter was not received. entitled to;[73] and the burden of proving receipt remains throughout upon the party who asserts it.[74] Testimony of the addressee that the letter was not received should be regarded with caution[75]—"with the greatest amount of caution"—where non-receipt, if proved, would relieve him of a burden;[76] and his failure to recollect whether the letter was received or not,[77] or his impression that it was not received,[78] or the fact that the letter was not on file in his office,[79] or was not found among the papers of a deceased addressee,[80] is usually deemed insufficient to overcome the presumption of receipt.

In the same case, and in connection with the circumstance of the addressee's denial of receipt of the letter the court said the contention that the letter was received was weakened by the failure to put in any evidence of the postal authorities that the mail upon the alleged day of receipt was regularly delivered and the omission to call the carrier who delivered mail to the addressee, etc.

9. Course of Business or Conduct of Affairs. Facts which usually and regularly coexist in business affairs are assumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary,[86] to coexist in any particular case.[87] Thus it is assumed that letters in reply came from the person signing them,[88] especially if written upon his business stationery;[89] that an overdue note in possession of the maker is paid;[90] that the date on a written instrument is the day of its execution;[91] that instruments executed on different dates are separate and distinct, and not parts of the same transaction;[92] that book entries are properly authorized;[93] that a party knew what he had the opportunity of knowing and should have known;[94] that an electric light company which has begun work has obtained permission from the city officials as required by an ordinance;[95] that a decedent was in contemplation of law insolvent at the time of his death, and had no property subject to administration, where no administration was had in any county of the state.[96] It is also a rebuttable presumption that when a month is referred to it is a month of the current year.[97]

B. Presumptions of Law — 1. In General. A presumption of law is a rule of law announcing a definite probative weight attached by jurisprudence to a proposition of logic. It is an assumption made by the law that a strong[98] inference of fact is prima facie correct, and will therefore sustain the burden of evidence, until conflicting facts on the point are shown.[99] When such evidence is introduced, the assumption of law is functus officio and drops out of sight. The inference of fact which has been assumed to be correct continues to have its logical weight in the case.

2. Capacity of Women For Child-Bearing. In England courts frequently act upon the inference that women under various circumstances of age and other conditions have become incapable of bearing children.[1] On the other hand in

97. Tipton v. State, 119 Ga. 304, 46 S. E. 436. See, generally, Time.

98. It is said that "a presumption of law establishes a certainty; it is a uniform, constant rule, with conditions fixed and unvarying." Com. v. Frew, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 492, 496, per Yerkes, P. J.

99. Tanner v. Hughes, 53 Pa. St. 289, 291, per Agnew, J.

Treatment of presumptions.— "Presumptions of Law consist of those rules which, in certain cases, either forbid or dispense with any ulterior inquiry. They are founded, either upon the first principles of justice; or the laws of nature; or the experienced course of human conduct and affairs, and the connection usually found to exist between certain things." 1 Greenleaf Ev. § 15. See also McCagg v. Heacock, 34 Ill. 476, 481, 85 Am. Dec. 327; Bow v. Allenstown, 34 N. H. 351, 365, 69 Am. Dec. 489 (where it is said: "Legal presumptions are artificial rules, established by the law, upon considerations of public policy or public convenience, against which no evidence is received"); U. S. v. Searcey, 26 Fed. 435, 437 (where Dick, J., said: "Presumptions of law are usually founded upon reasons of public policy, and social convenience and safety, which are warranted by the legal experience of courts in administering justice. Some of these presumptions have become established and conclusive rules of law, while others are only prima facie evidence, and may be rebutted").

Statements as to distinctions between presumptions of law and of fact.— In State v. Kelly, 57 Iowa 644, 646, 11 N. W. 635, the court, discussing the presumption of guilt from the recent unexplained possession of stolen property, said: "The term presumption of fact implies that from certain facts the law will raise a presumption. Either of these terms, presumption of law or presumption of fact, may be used to express the same thought, for they are identical in meaning." But compare Com. v. Frew, 3 Pa. Co. Ct. 492, 496, where Yerkes, P. J., said: "When we say a prisoner is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty, or that every man is bound to know the law, these are presumptions of law and binding upon us, however untrue and absurd they may be; but a presumption of fact depends on the proof from which it is to be inferred. Thus possession of stolen goods, when proved, is a fact from which a jury may infer that they were stolen by the possessor, but they are not bound so to do." In State v. Hodge, 50 N. H. 510, 521, a partial explanation is made in an interesting way as to how the confusion between the two species of presumptions originated. See also Sullivan v. Kuykendall, 82 Ky. 483, 56 Am. Rep. 901; U. S. v. Searcey, 26 Fed. 435.

the United States a woman is assumed capable of child-bearing at any age of adult life.[2]

3. Virility of Men. It is presumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary that a male person of mature years is capable of sexual intercourse[3] and of procreation.[4]

4. Ownership of Property From Possession. A rebuttable[5] presumption of ownership, which, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law will assume to be correct, arises from the possession of real[6] or personal[7] property. Where

The court declined to presume against incapacity in Croxton v. May, 9 Ch. D. 388, 39 L. T. Rep. N. S. 461, 27 Wkly. Rep. 327, woman fifty-four and married three years without issue. But see Re Taylor, 43 L. T. Rep. N. S. 795, 29 Wkly. Rep. 350 (where Malins, V. Consequence of presumption considered.— It has been held that the court will not make an inference against capacity to bear children when the effect of so doing would be to deprive a living person of a possible interest (In re Hocking, [1898] 2 Ch. 567, 67 L. J. Ch. 662, 79 L. T. Rep. N. S. 164, 47 Wkly. Weakness of presumption.— In Rawley v. Brown, 71 N. Y. 85, 89, Allen, J., said: "Possession of property alone and without explanation, is evidence of ownership; but is the lowest species of evidence. It is merely presumptive, and liable to be overcome by any evidence showing the character of the possession, and that it is not necessarily as owner. If the custody and possession is shown to be equally consistent with an outstanding ownership in a third person, as with a title in the one having the possession, no presumption of ownership arises solely from such possession. The law raises no presumption as to the character of the occupation of one cultivating the farm of another with the instruments of husbandry, beasts of the plough, teams and domestic animals of the owner of the farm, or as to the right of either to the growing crops and products of the farm, but leaves it a question of fact, to be determined by a jury upon the evidence and all the circumstances of the case." C. Pseudo-Presumptions of Law — 1. In General. Certain so-called presumptions of law deal with no inference of fact; they are usually paraphrases for a rule of substantive law or administration.[65] This is universally true of those termed "conclusive" presumptions — a term which is a misnomer, since ex vi termini a presumption is rebuttable.[66]

2. Rules of Substantive Law. Belonging to the category of pseudo-presumptions, but constituting rules of substantive law, is the prima facie presumption that persons above the age of seven years are capable of committing crime,[67] the presumption that subscribing witnesses to documents thirty years old are dead, so that execution of the documents need not be proved,[68] the presumption of a lost grant of corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments after twenty years' adverse possession or user,[69] the presumption that written contracts cover all prior parol negotiations,[70] the presumption of malice in certain libel and slander cases upon proof of publication of defamatory matter,[71] the rule of res ipsa loquitur in certain actions by passengers against carriers to recover damages for personal

3. Rules of Administration — a. Consequences of Conduct. It is presumed that every person intends the natural and probable,[74] although not all or even all the necessary,[75] consequences of his acts; and that he understands the nature of instruments signed by him,[76] although executed by mark,[77] or executed for him under his direction.[78] Since there is no inference of fact in such cases,[79] the meaning is that as a maxim of jurisprudence one who has done an act cannot allege in defense that he did not also intend that its usual consequences should follow.

b. Presumption of Innocence. The phrase "presumption of innocence," much used in civil[80] but especially important in criminal[81] cases, is based on no inference of fact. In civil cases it restates the alleged presumption against illegality, etc., as a regulation of the burden of evidence with regard to it.[82] In criminal cases it restates the government's burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. This pseudo-presumption has no connection with the legitimate inference of the fact of innocence which may arise upon the evidence.

administration that he who claims the existence of illegality must prove it.[94] Although the exact order in which acts took place may be shown if required by the interests of justice,[95] it will be assumed in the absence of evidence to the contrary that the order in which acts are done is that which is essential to their legal operation as intended.[96] In accordance with this principle material alterations in written instruments inter vivos are assumed to have been made before execution;[97] while, in case of a will, alteration after execution, being natural and not illegal, is assumed to have taken place.[98]

f. Knowledge of Law. All persons are presumed to know the general public laws[99] of the country where they reside or do business,[1] as well as the legal meaning of terms employed in establishing legal relations.[2] But it is said that they are not presumed to know how the courts will construe the law.[3] Since there is no inference of fact that law is known,[4] the presumption means that ignorance of law is not an excuse for its violation.[5]

g. As to Law of Sister State or Foreign Country. The principles of administration which a court employs when called upon to decide a point according to the law of a foreign state or country, of which no evidence is furnished, are commonly stated in the phraseology of presumptions of law. In the entire absence of direct or circumstantial evidence[6] or of judicial cognizance[7] the common law, including equity,[8] in a sister state[9] or a territory,[10] is presumed to be the same as the common law of the forum, especially where such state has been part of the sovereignty of the forum,[11] and has adopted a similar system of jurisprudence,[12] unless such an assumption of similarity would impose a penalty,[13] or work a forfeiture.[14] Except in relation to countries like Turkey, which have essentially different institutions,[15] the same presumption of similarity is extended to foreign countries.[16] Certain authorities hold that the same presumption of uniformity may be indulged with respect to the statute law of the forum and that of a sister state or territory,[17] or as between colonial provinces of the same bition against such acts, although there should be such a prohibition in the constitution of the forum.[39]

D. Probative Force and Conflict of Presumptions. Since only relevant facts have evidentiary value, and neither an inference from a fact — often erroneously spoken of as an argument from a fact[40] — nor the assumption that it is prima facie correct can in itself possess probative weight,[41] it follows: (1) That one inference cannot be predicated upon another;[42] and (2) that when the function of a presumption of law sustaining the burden of evidence is ended by the introduction of rebutting testimony the presumption of law disappears,[43] leaving in evidence the basic fact, which still retains its probative force and is capable of being weighed against other facts.[44] To balance a fact or the legitimate inferences from it with an assumption, maxim, or other rule of law is logically impossible.[45] Where presumptions are said to conflict it will usually be found that one of them at least is without basis of fact, and is spoken of as a presumption only upon the assumption that because a presumption of law sustains the burden of evidence a ruling as to the burden of evidence states a true presumption of law. Thus in civil cases presumptions against fraud[46] or illegality,[47] or in favor of innocence,[48] require proof from him who alleges improper conduct. When in discharging this burden he produces less than a prima facie inference of fact; for example, when it is sought to prove fraud by the presumption of payment arising from the possession of a negotiable instrument by a person liable on it,[49] or to establish bigamy by the inference of marriage from reputation and cohabitation or the continuance of a former marriage relation,[50] it is commonly declared that the presumption of proper conduct is not overcome by the presumptions mentioned.[51] In reality the ruling is upon the logical value of an inference from certain facts in satisfying a legal requirement as to the quantum of evidence.

So when the prosecution in a criminal case produces insufficient evidence to establish an essential fact beyond reasonable doubt, as where it is sought to prove that a bank officer knew of an embezzlement by evidence that books of account disclosing the fact were in his custody,[52] or claims that bigamy has been committed because the spouse of a former marriage, not being shown to have died, is inferred to be alive,[53] or asks the jury to infer that an impersonated elector was duly qualified to vote by showing that he was duly registered,[54] it is said that the presumption of innocence is not overcome; per contra where the prosecution makes out its case on a particular point, as by the exhibition of a public regularity,[55] as in the post-office department,[56] or relies on a statutory presumption of death arising from absence for a stated period,[57] it is likewise said that the presumption of innocence is displaced by a conflicting presumption; whereas the real ruling in both cases is, not that there is a conflict of presumptions, but that the prosecution has or has not presented inferences of fact which sustain the burden of evidence.

VI. FORMER EVIDENCE.*

A. In General — 1. Rule Stated. Facts may be established by evidence thereof given on a former trial, provided the court is satisfied: (1) That the party against whom the evidence is offered, or his privy, was a party on the former trial;[58] (2) that the issue is substantially the same in the two cases;[59] (3) that the witness who proposes to testify to the former evidence is able to state it with satisfactory correctness;[60] and (4) that a sufficient reason is shown why the original witness is not produced.[61] The first three of these conditions render the reported evidence relevant; the fourth is necessary to justify the court in receiving it. Under these conditions the evidence is admissible from necessity,[62] even if there is other evidence to the same effect;[63] and the admission of the evidence in criminal cases does not contravene a code provision that on a new trial in such cases "all the testimony must be produced anew."[64] When the conditions of relevancy and necessity exist it is no objection that the evidence could have been offered at a former retrial and was not;[65] that the original suit was in a sense a mistrial;[66] for example that it was abandoned,[67] dismissed,[68] terminated by nonsuit,[69] or resulted in a disagreement of the jury;[70] that the court before which the former testimony was taken had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter;[71]

in case of a deposition, that the witness might have been alive at the former trial and so the deposition would have been inadmissible;[72] or that the testimony was in the witness' favor.[73] The rule of admissibility applies only to evidence actually given,[74] and not to agreements concerning it.[75] The former evidence of a witness is open to any objection which would have excluded the original evidence.[76] The reported evidence originally given in favor of plaintiff may be used by defendant,[77] and vice versa.[78] Where, however, a witness is examined originally by one party at a time when he would have been disqualified by interest from testifying for the other the latter cannot at a subsequent trial use the evidence so given.[79]

2. PRELIMINARY INVESTIGATIONS. Very broad latitude is given to the phrase "former trial" in favor of the subsequent admissibility of evidence adduced thereon, and the main considerations are whether the issues in the earlier and later proceedings are the same and whether the party against whom the evidence is offered had the right of cross-examination.[80] Although the former action is commonly a prior trial of the same cause,[81] the evidence of a witness otherwise competent is admissible if given at a preliminary hearing in a civil[82] or

tion of the parties and power to administer oaths. Contra, where the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and defendant objected to the jurisdiction, although he afterward cross-examined the witness. Deering v. Schreyer, 88 N. Y. App. Div. 457, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 275.

In criminal cases it is sufficient if the accused, although not represented by counsel, was present and accorded an adequate opportunity for cross-examination (Reg. v. Lee, 4 F. & F. 63; Rex v. Smith, R. & R. 309), even if he failed to avail himself of it (State v. Fitzgerald, 63 Iowa 268, 19 N. W. 202).

Depositions are subject to the rule stated in the text. The party against whom they are offered in a subsequent case must have attended to cross-examine, or have had notice which would have enabled him to do so (Atty.-Gen. v. Davison, McClel. & Y. 160, 29 Rev. Rep. 774; Steinkeller v. Newton, 1 Scott N. R. 148; Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, 3 Swab. & Tr. 397), although notice by publication in the original suit has been held to give a sufficient opportunity (O'Neill v. Brown, 61 Tex. 34). A certain reasonableness has, however, been used in applying this requirement of the right of cross-examination. It has been held in England that upon a deposition before a committing magistrate it is sufficient if a deposition taken in his absence is read over to the prisoner and he is then permitted to cross-examine. Rex v. Smith, R. & R. 309. But see Baron Alderson's comments on the case last cited in Reg. v. Beeston, 3 C. L. R. 82, 6 Cox C. C. 425, Dears. C. C. 405, 18 Jur. 1058, 24 L. J. M. C. 5, 3 Wkly. If the cross-examination is suspended and never concluded the evidence actually taken is incompetent upon a subsequent trial. Noble v. McClintock, 6 Watts & S. (Pa.) 58.

97. Lane v. Brainerd, 30 Conn. 565, 579, per Hinman, C. J. See also Young v. Valentine, 177 N. Y. 347, 69 N. E. 643 [affirming 78 N. Y. App. Div. 633, 79 N. Y. Suppl. 536], and the cases cited supra, note 95.

It is not sufficient to show that the party against whom the evidence is offered was present either personally or by counsel at the former hearing. It must also affirmatively appear that he was allowed to cross-examine the witness whose evidence is offered. Jackson v. Crilly, 16 Colo. 103, 26 Pac. 331; O'Brian v. Com., 6 Bush (Ky.) 563; Rex v. Paine, 5 Mod. 163. Where evidence was given for example at an inquest before a coroner's jury, and the record merely set out that "the respective counsel in this case were present," the court, finding itself unable to say that defendant could have cross-examined the witness if so disposed, affirmed the rejection of the evidence. Jackson v. Crilly, 16 Colo. 103, 26 Pac. 331.

If one of the parties against whom the evidence is offered at the second trial had no opportunity, personally or by a predecessor in legal interest, to cross-examine, the evidence is incompetent even if it would have been admissible against another of the parties had he been present. Turnley v. Hanna, 82 Ala. 139, 2 So. 483.

New parties.— Where a second suit, while partly between the same parties, adds others, not in privity with those common to both suits, and who therefore have had no opportunity either personally or by representatives to cross-examine the reported evidence, it is incompetent (Orr v. Hadley, 36 N. H. 575; Varnum v. Hart, 47 Hun (N. Y.) 18), even at the instance of the new party. Turnley v. Hanna, 82 Ala. 139, 2 So. 483; In re Rushworth, Hardres 472. But where at a trial of two defendants a witness for one of the defendants, who had formerly been tried alone, was dead, the former evidence was held competent in behalf of such defendant, although it could not be allowed to affect the other. State v. Milam, 65 S. C. 321, 43 S. E. 677.

Nominal parties.— Where the substantial parties are the same in both cases, the fact that a nominal party required by the technical form of the former action was joined in the earlier suit and is not joined in the second does not it seems suffice to exclude the evidence. Wright v. Cumpsty, 41 Pa. St. 102. And it has even been held in case of a deposition that it is immaterial that other parties were joined in the former suit. Allen v. Chouteau, 102 Mo. 309, 14 S. W. 869. See also Emery v. Fowler, 39 Me. 326, 63 Am. Dec. 627; Doe v. Powell, 3 C. & K. 323.

Exceptional instances in England, receiving some color of support from an act of parliament, are settlement cases. In Rex v. Eriswell, 3 T. R. 707, the court of king's bench was equally divided on the question as to whether the declarations of a pauper before magistrates authorized to remove him, in the absence of the parish to which removal was afterward ordered, were competent as against such parish on a hearing to remove the pauper's family after he had become insane, and therefore could no longer testify.

98. McNamara v. State, 60 Ark. 400, 30 S. W. 762; Llanover v. Homfray, 19 Ch. D. 224; Cazenove v. Vaughan, 1 M. & S. 4, 14 Rev. Rep. 377.

What amounts to waiver of the right to between parties, the requirement of identity of parties is logically and necessarily relaxed.[99]

2. Representation by Privity. Substantive law extends the term "parties" in the rule under consideration to include persons who under the law of privity are identified with them in legal interest. Accordingly the testimony of witnesses on a former trial is competent, if the other conditions are satisfied, for or against one whose privy was a party to the suit in which the evidence was given.[1] Evidence admitted against a party is therefore competent against his administrator,[2] agent,[3] executor,[4] or grantee;[5] and the principle has been so far extended in England as to cover those in privity with predecessors in title who might at their option have been parties to the previous litigation.[6] Conversely the benefit of the former evidence inures to the person in privity, and it is admissible for his administrator[7] or executor.[8] Community of interest between parties[9]

cross-examine is a question of fact for the court. Mere inaction when the opportunity is open may constitute it (Bradley v. Mirick, 91 N. Y. 293; Cazenove v. Vaughan, 1 M. & S. 4, 14 Rev. Rep. 377), although the party was embarrassed by the absence of his attorney (Bradley v. Mirick, 91 N. Y. 293), or full time was not afforded in which to exercise the option (Cazenove v. Vaughan, 1 M. & S. 4, 14 Rev. Rep. 377). Where an adverse party voluntarily announces that he will take no further part in the examination no question can arise. Bostick v. State, 3 Humphr. (Tenn.) 344; McCombie v. Anton, 6 M. & G. 27, 6 Scott N. R. 923, 46 E. C. L. 26.

99. So where the issue in two proceedings by certain alleged next of kin of A was as to their relationship to A, the fact that while the petitioners were the same the adverse interest, namely, the crown, appeared in different capacities and was represented by different persons is not sufficient to exclude the former evidence. 9. Jackson v. Crissey, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 251, ejectment suit between different claimants, the evidence being excluded, although the point in issue was the same in both cases. See also Norris v. Nonen, 3 Watts (Pa.) 465. For the same reason statements of a deceased witness on the trial of an action against A as administrator are not evidence against or mere relationship by consanguinity between a party to the former suit and a party to the suit in which the evidence is sought to be used [10] is not privity.

C. Identity of Issue — 1. In General. Another condition of admissibility of evidence given in a former suit is that the issue in the two cases should be the same or substantially the same,[11] and the burden is on the proponent [12] to show, either by parol evidence or by producing the record of the former trial,[13] to the satisfaction of the court,[14] that the necessary identity of issues exists. If the issue upon which the evidence was originally given and that on which it is subsequently offered are substantially common to both suits, it is immaterial that there were other issues in each case,[15] that the issue concerns a different subject-matter,[16] or that the first action was criminal in form and the second civil.[17] On the other hand if the issues are different it is not material that the two suits concern the same subject-matter, and the former evidence is still inadmissible.[18]

10. The statement of a deceased witness in an action of ejectment between A and B, claiming as son of C, erroneously supposed to be dead, was held incompetent in ejectment relating to the same title between C and B. Morgan v. Nicholl, L. R. 2 C. P. 117, 12 Jur. N. S. 963, 36 L. J. C. P. 86, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 184, 15 Wkly. Rep. 110. It has been held, however, that A's examination de bene in his suit for defendant's negligence may be used in a suit by A's next of kin after his decease against the same defendant under a statutory provision to recover for the same act of negligence. Walkerton v. Erdman, 23 Can. Supreme Ct. 352, where the majority of the court said that while the cause of action was different the issues were practically the same and that the next of kin in effect claimed through A.

17. Gavan v. Ellsworth, 45 Ga. 283; Charlesworth v. Tinker, 18 Wis. 633.

18. Evidence of a witness since deceased

Under such circumstances it is also immaterial that the evidence offered covers a fact material in both suits.[19]

2. Test of Identity. It is difficult to discover any test as to the identity of issues more definite than the inquiry whether the party against whom the evidence is offered had a fair opportunity for cross-examination. If he had that the element of surprise is eliminated. In a criminal case it is of no consequence that the two hearings are on different indictments,[20] or even that the form of the charge is different in the two cases, provided both accusations so plainly arise from the same facts as to apprise the accused of the general nature and source of his alleged liability.[21] The same test, the scope of a reasonable cross-examination, is applied in civil cases.[22]

D. Excuses For Non-Production of Witness — 1. In General. While evidence of former testimony is not open to objection as "hearsay,"[23] it clearly is substitutionary as regards the direct statement of the witness. The court will therefore insist upon being satisfied not only that the situation of the case promises some advantage from its use, but also that a sufficient reason be shown why the original witness is not produced;[24] and that it is impossible fairly speaking for the person offering the evidence to produce the living witness or received on a former trial between A and B relating to a free fishery in a river was held incompetent on an action between A and B relating to a several fishery in the same river. 26. Thus in an early English case where counsel for plaintiff moved for a rule ordering "that if any of the witnesses, many of whom were very aged, should die, or become unable to attend in the meantime," their former evidence could be read at the next trial, Lord Mansfield replied: "You do not want a rule of court for that purpose: what a witness, since dead, has sworn upon a trial between the same parties, may, without any order of the court, be given in evidence, either from the judge's notes, or from notes that have been taken by any other person, who will swear to their accuracy; or the former evidence may be proved by any person who will swear from his memory to its having been given." Testimony given by deposition is subject to the same rule. Forney v. Hallagher, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 203.

Temporary return from an otherwise permanent absence does not affect the rule. Fonsick v. Agar, 6 Esp. 92. A deponent or an attesting witness who has left the country is considered beyond the jurisdiction, although for a temporary purpose, such as awaiting despatches (Fonsick v. Agar, 6 Esp. 92), or because driven back or detained by bad weather (Ward v. Wells, 1 Taunt. 461, 10 Rev. Rep. 581), the witness is at the time of trial actually within the country.

evidence is not universally conceded.[31] The more modern tendency is not only to require that the absence offered as a basis for admitting the former evidence should be permanent, but to require further that the party offering the evidence should show to the satisfaction of the court that he could not by the use of reasonable diligence have procured the deposition of the absent witness. Mere absence from the jurisdiction at the time of trial is a disability by no means equivalent to death, without affirmative evidence that a fruitless search has been conducted in good faith and with due diligence,[32] and that, from ignorance of the witness' whereabouts or other reason, his deposition could not have been taken.[33] In the absence of such evidence the testimony has been rejected,[34] especially in criminal

To ascertain by writing to the postmaster of a certain town in a distant state that a former witness is not in the postmaster's town, but in another town of the postmaster's state (Sullivan v. State, 6 Tex. App. 319, 32 Am. Rep. 580), or to show that the witness is reputed to be out of the state (Baldwin v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa 37, 25 N. W. 918), or for an officer charged with the service of a subpœna to report that he has made diligent search for a witness at the supposed residence and been informed by persons unknown to him that they had heard that the witness was dead (Augusta, etc., R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297, 11 S. E. 706), have been held under the facts of these particular cases not to be sufficient. Alleged absence from the jurisdiction must be established by the testimony of someone who knows the fact, or can testify to circumstances within his knowledge which will justify the inference of such fact. Baldwin v. St. Louis, etc., R. Co., 68 Iowa 37, 25 N. W. 918; Reynolds v. Fitzpatrick, 28 Mont. 170, 72 Pac. 510. Statements by persons with peculiar means of knowledge may, together with lack of further opportunity for inquiry, suffice to admit the evidence. Thus in case of an attesting witness the reply of his parents that he was in America was considered by Mr. Justice Erle as "reasonable evidence that the witness is out of the jurisdiction of the court." Austin v. Rumsey, 2 C. & K. 736, 61 E. C. L. 736. The mere fact that a party who could have summoned a witness has preferred to rely on his promise to attend voluntarily is no reason for admitting the witness' former evidence. Provo City v. Shurtliff, 4 Utah 15, 5 Pac. 302. The action of the court in deciding what search is sufficient will not be revised, in the absence of evidence of gross abuse of discretion. Vaughan v. State, 58 Ark. 353, 371, 24 S. W. 885; Clinton v. Estes, 20 Ark. 216.

Independent relevancy of answers.— While answers to questions as to the whereabouts of a witness are hearsay in themselves and have no tendency to prove the facts stated (Robinson v. Markis, 2 M. & Rob. 375), they may be competent facts in themselves bearing on whether due diligence in search has been shown (Burt v. Walker, 4 B. & Ald. 697, 6 E. C. L. 659; Austin v. Rumsey, 2 C. & K. 736, 61 E. C. L. 736; Wyatt v. Bateman, 7 C. & P. 586, 32 E. C. L. 772).

cases.[35] The rules relating to evidence do not apply where a sufficient independent excuse for not producing the witness appears in favor of admitting the evidence. Inability to attend as a witness, owing to an official duty, admits his evidence as given on a former trial.[36]

b. By Procurement of Adverse Party. Where it appears probable that the party against whom the original evidence would operate is endeavoring to prevent the witness from testifying, the reported evidence is admitted almost as a matter of course,[37] unless the court shall see fit in its discretion to adjourn the trial or have the evidence of the witness taken on commission.[38]

35. See cases cited in the preceding note. "Whatever may be the rule as to the testimony given by an absent witness on a former trial in a civil action, it cannot be proved on a criminal trial. The courts allow proof of such testimony when the witness is dead, but we are not advised that the rule has ever been extended so far as to permit either the commonwealth or the accused to prove the statements of a witness upon the sole ground that he was absent from the state and beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court." Collins v. Com., 12 Bush. (Ky.) 271, 273, per Lindsay, C. J. 41. Johnson v. Com., 70 S. W. 44, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 842. It is not sufficient that the reporting witness "understood" that the former witness was dead (State v. Wright, 70 Iowa 152, 30 N. W. 388; Tibbetts v. Flanders, 18 N. H. 284), or that such was the general report in the community (State v. Wright, 70 Iowa 152, 30 N. W. 388). While death must be affirmatively shown, the inference of fact arising from absence is competent evidence on this point. How far mere lapse of time is evidence of death cannot well be stated more definitely than that in each case the court is to exercise a sound discretion in requiring or dispensing with further proof. The English court of exchequer refused to admit in 1732 upon the assump-

to the earlier rule death was the sole condition of admissibility,[42] and in some jurisdictions this is still the rule in criminal cases.[43]

4. Disqualification of Witness. Inability to produce the witness because of some present legal prohibition against receiving his testimony, as that the witness is a party and the other party having died and the suit being against his representative the surviving party is not permitted to testify,[44] or that the witness has become disqualified by interest,[45] may render his former evidence competent. But it will not be made competent because the witness has become civiliter mortuus by reason of felony,[46] or has disqualified himself from testifying by claiming that his evidence might incriminate him.[47]

5. Incapacity of Witness. Where in a civil[48] or criminal[49] case a witness since the former trial has become insane or bereft of memory by senility,[50] his former evidence as a rule is admissible,[51] although the witness himself is in court.[52] Failure of memory not amounting to imbecility is insufficient.[53] It has also been held in many cases that sickness which prevents attendance as a witness,[54]

tion that the witness was dead a deposition of a witness examined in 1672. Benson v. Olive, 2 Str. 920. But in Llanover v. Homfray, 19 Ch. D. 224, Jessel, M. R., assumed that "of course aged witnesses, the youngest of whom in 1815 was sixty-seven years of age," were dead in 1871.

extreme age,[55] or great bodily infirmity[56] suffice to admit the evidence, except in some jurisdictions where in criminal cases nothing but death relieves the prosecution from the necessity of producing the original witness.[57]

E. Scope of Proof Required — 1. Early Requirements. Originally it was required that the reporting witness should be able to state ipsissimis verbis the language of the former witness.[58] But at an early day the rigor of this requirement was relaxed and repetition of the essential words was deemed sufficient.[59]

2. Substance or Effect of Language. It is generally recognized that the early strictness of requirement practically amounted to nullifying the rule as to evidence given at a former trial.[60] To admit evidence of the former testimony it is

Under this rule the former evidence of a witness delirious with typhoid fever a few days before (Chase v. Springvale Mills Co., 75 Me. 156), or of one "laboring with disease" (Miller v. Russell, 7 Mart. N. S. (La.) 266) has been admitted.

Under a code provision, Tex. Code Cr. Proc. art. 772, admitting prior evidence "when by reason of bodily infirmity, such witness cannot attend" the fact that a witness was confined to his room for several months by a severe attack of measles which had destroyed the sight of one eye and left him a chronic invalid with pains in the head and palpitation of the heart was deemed a sufficient excuse for failure to produce the witness in person. Collins v. State, 24 Tex. App. 141, 5 S. W. 848.

The practice of counsel in entering on the trial of a case knowing that an important witness is ill and may not be able to be present, and in the midst of the trial for the first time to present the fact of the absence of such witness, and then testify as to what such witness said on a former trial, reading from his own abstract of such testimony, was condemned in Chicago, etc., R. 57. In such courts production of the witness is not excused by sickness at the time of trial (Com. v. McKenna, 158 Mass. 207, 33 N. E. 389; State v. Staples, 47 N. H. 113, 119, 90 Am. In a criminal case the ruling has been made that the evidence of a deceased witness at a former trial could be only admitted, "provided the witness can repeat the testimony which [deceased] . . . gave, and not merely what he conceives to be the substance and effect of it, of which the jury ought alone to judge." U. S. v. Wood, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,756, 3 Wash. 440.

now sufficient as a general rule if its substance,[61] or even its effect, either in civil[62] or in criminal[63] cases can be given. Some courts have gone further and held that the evidence will be received, although the reporting witness can give neither the language of the original testimony nor its substance, if he can state the substance of the facts covered.[64] Whatever the degree of strictness required by the law established in a particular jurisdiction, it must affirmatively appear to the satisfaction of the court that the reporting witness can comply with this degree of

In analogous cases, as the courts in the above cited cases argued, no such strictness is enforced. Thus on an indictment for perjury it is not necessary to prove with verbal exactness the testimony of defendant. Rex v. Munton, 3 C. & P. 498, 14 E. C. L. 682. strictness.[65] If it appears that the witness cannot give the entire examination with the required certainty his evidence should be rejected.[66]

3. Special Rules. Rules of strictness intermediate between the earlier rule requiring a report of the exact language and the general modern rule that only its substance or effect need be given have been adopted by several courts. In Maryland it is sufficient for the reporting witness to prove that the former witness "in giving in his testimony deposed to certain facts."[67] In Massachusetts and several other states[68] it has been held with great inflexibility that the witness called to prove what a deceased witness testified on a former trial must be able to state the language in which the former testimony was given substantially and in all material particulars.[69] In New Jersey "it is sufficient if the witness is able to state the substance of what was sworn to on the former trial or what he believes to be substantially the words of the witness, not the conclusion to which the words of the deceased witness conducted the mind of the present witness";[70] and this seems to be the effect of the rule laid down in New York.[71] The limit of indulgence is reached in the Pennsylvania rule that "where the witness on the stand cannot recollect the very words of the deceased witness he may state in his own language the facts as related by the witness, as they were impressed upon his mind at the time; and this applies as well to the cross-examination as to the examination in chief."[72] A somewhat stricter rule is laid down in Wisconsin.[73]

Where a witness stated that "he could give the substance of it, but not the precise language," although the court, as Shaw, C. J., said, "lay no stress upon the epithet 'precise,'" he was held properly rejected. Warren v. Nichols, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 261, the authority of which cases is much weakened by the strong dissenting opinion of Hubbard, J. The form of statement used in drawing the exceptions in Corey v. Janes, 15 Gray (Mass.) 543, would lead to an inference that it might be sufficient if quoad the matter affected the reporting witness could give the "language substantially as spoken at the former trial upon any particular point or subject-matter." Such an inference, however, must be regarded as doubtful in view of the subsequent decision in Woods v. Keyes, 14 Allen (Mass.) 236, 92 Am. Dec. 766, where the court said: "The rule is settled that where proof is offered of what a deceased witness has testified at a former hearing it must be not merely a part of it, or the substance of it, but the whole of the testimony touching the matter in controversy."

For purpose of impeachment.— Even in Massachusetts, however, a different rule is applied when the former evidence of a present witness is to be reproduced to affect his credibility; testimony to the substance suffices. Gould v. Norfolk Lead Co., 9 Cush. (Mass.) 338, 57 Am. Dec. 50.

The only foundation laid for such admission was the testimony of the justice to the effect that perhaps he did not take down the entire testimony of Schultz; that he intended to get the main facts, that possibly he did not use the exact words of the witness; that he intended to get the facts, but may not have used

In Vermont it has been held sufficient to state "the substance of the testimony in the very words of the witness." [74]

4. ENTIRE EXAMINATION. While the exact language itself is no longer essential, the reporting witness must be able to recollect the substance of both direct and cross-examination; [75] but the other party may supplement the evidence as given.[76] It follows that where the substance of the evidence is required the testimony as reported must be the substance of the whole of the original evidence.[77] "Not only should the facts deposed to by the deceased witness be stated, but all the facts deposed to by him, as well upon the direct as the cross-examination"; [78] and where the substance of the language used is called for the requirement

the same words, that he probably missed some words, possibly a good many; that whether he got it all down depended upon circumstances, that when the witness went too rapidly to take it all down he always checked him; that he did not think he had left out any of the facts in the case; that, judging from the minutes, he should think that the testimony of Schultz was as contained in the minutes; that he should judge so, although he could not then remember, after having his mind refreshed by reading the minutes,—nothing else to go by. We are forced to the conclusion that the foundation thus laid was insufficient to justify the admission of such minutes, within the rule laid down by this court in Zitske v. Goldberg, 38 Wis. 216. It was there held that 'the minutes of a justice of the peace of testimony taken at a trial before him are not admissible at the trial of the same cause on appeal in the circuit court, either as evidence of the facts at issue or to impeach or sustain the credibility of a witness by showing what he testified before the justice.' extends to the whole examination.[79] To reject the evidence where a witness is unable to recollect the cross-examination, it must affirmatively appear that there was a cross-examination,[80] and that it modified the direct examination.[81] If the reporting witness can state the entire examination of the original witness on the points to which the evidence is directed, no reason is perceived why his inability to state the testimony on other points in no way relevant should do more than affect his credibility.[82]

F. Media of Proof — 1. Memoranda — a. In General. A person who has taken contemporaneous notes of the testimony given at a former trial which he is attempting to report may use them to refresh his recollection.[83] It has been held that if the witness has no present recollection he cannot make the notes evidence by testifying to a secondary recollection that the notes were accurate when made,[84] but the weight of authority is to the contrary.[85] In respect to such minutes the "best evidence" rule applies, and, upon proof that the originals have been lost, a

Judges, like other lawyers, vary greatly as to their habit and capacity for taking notes. It is a matter of common observation that many judges take no notes whatever; others scantily and occasionally; still others, in a painstaking, full, and accurate manner. There is great difference between notes taken in such different ways; for example, between such notes as were said in Yale v. Comstock, 112 Mass. 267, to be the next best evidence to a deposition, and disconnected jottings merely intended to refresh memory for trial purposes.

do not constitute an official record and are of no higher grade of evidence than any other competent testimony.[92] The relative importance of a judge's notes is lessened by the fact that modern stenography has brought into use in court a method of reproducing testimony of recognized fulness and general accuracy.[93]

d. By Stenographer. Transcripts from stenographic notes are, subject to statutory restrictions, admissible as evidence of the former testimony of a witness and have in some cases been accorded a prima facie effect;[94] but unless a statute so provides they are not evidence per se,[95] although accompanied by the stenog-

Verification of notes.— As it is no part of the official duties of a judge to take minutes of evidence, his certificate of the correctness of his notes is not sufficient. The notes must be verified by the oath of the judge himself, however inconvenient it may be to require his attendance, and however convenient a contrary practice may be. Miles v. O'Hara, 4 Binn. Containing entire testimony.— But a bill of exceptions taken and settled on a former trial and purporting to contain all the testimony given upon it, copied and extended from the minutes of a shorthand reporter was held to be "the very best evidence" of witness who testifies to the former evidence.[2] It has been held that the former evidence of a witness may be proved by a certificate of evidence in a chancery case, signed by the judge and constituting part of the record,[3] a brief of testimony on a motion for a new trial,[4] a "case" settled and certified by the judge, pursuant to statute, and containing all the evidence,[5] or a statement agreed upon by counsel and approved by the court.[6]

3. Witnesses. The former evidence of a witness may be established by the testimony of any person who can swear to it from memory,[7] including a committing magistrate,[8] the stenographer,[9] the county clerk,[10] or a juryman.[11]

VII. Relevancy.*

A. General Rule — 1. Logical Relevancy. In legal evolution reason has supplanted all other methods of ascertaining the existence of disputed facts. Logic is therefore the controlling force in the modern law of evidence.[12] An offer by a party to prove a statement or other fact in evidence involves an assertion by him the testimony given on the trial. Wilson v. Noonan, 35 Wis. 321. But see contra, Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ashline, 171 Ill. 313, 49 N. E. 521.

12. This logic is inductive, in the sense in which that term is employed by John S. Mill (System Logic, bk. iii) as being an inference from the known to the unknown. It presents, however, some peculiar features. So far as reducible to syllogistic form the major premise presents a general proposition based on experience as gained from observation or experiment; the minor premise consists of the fact offered in evidence; the conclusion is the existence of a fact to be established. While the process is more apparent in case of circumstantial than in that of direct evidence, the difference is only in degree. Inference from experience remains constant in either case both on the part of a witness and of the tribunal he that such a relation exists, in reason, as a matter of logic, between the fact offered and a fact in issue that the existence of the former renders probable or improbable the existence of the latter. The relation thus asserted has been termed relevancy.[13] The basic rule of the law of evidence, subject to the requirement of a clear connection stated hereafter,[14] is that whatever facts are logically relevant are legally admissible,[15] and that facts logically irrelevant to the issue are not admissible;[16] the onus of showing the relevancy, intrinsic or in connection with other addresses. The probative force to a witness of any observation by him or to the tribunal of its narration by the observer lies in the fact that in accordance with the teachings of experience it suggests an inference, raises a presumption, directly or indirectly, as to the existence of a fact in issue. The induction is usually imperfect. It employs a major premise broader as a rule than the conclusion. The conclusion itself does not, except in the comparatively rare instances where the tribunal learns a fact by inspection (as to which see infra, XI) permit of demonstration, but is simply probable to a greater or less extent.

13. Relevancy is thus defined by Stephen in the earlier editions of the Digest: "A fact is relevant to another fact when the existence of the one can be shown to be the cause or one of the causes, or the effect or one of the effects, of the existence of the other, or when the existence of the one, either alone or together with other facts, renders the existence of the other highly probable, or improbable, according to the common course of events." Stephen Dig. L. Ev. Introduction. In the third edition the definition was so changed as to read: "The word 'relevant' means that any two facts to which it is applied are so related to each other, that according to the common course of events one either taken by itself or in connection with other facts proves or renders probable the past, present, or future existence or non-existence of the other." The definition gains in brevity; but the abandonment of the word "highly" as qualifying "probable" is of doubtful advantage. See infra, VII, A, 2.

"The law furnishes no test of relevancy. For this, it tacitly refers to logic, assuming that the principles of reasoning are known to its judges and ministers; just as a vast multitude of things are assumed as already sufficiently known." facts, of a fact offered in evidence, being upon the party offering the evidence.[17] It follows from the existence of this broad and fundamental rule that the laws of evidence are largely those of exclusion; rejecting, for reasons partly practical and partly historical and arbitrary, the use of inferences logically to be drawn from certain facts or sets of facts.[18] The facts or set of facts rejected as bases for inferences are in the main four: (1) The existence of an unsworn statement as evidence of the fact which it asserts;[19] (2) the fact that a person is of a particular character on the question whether he did a certain act;[20] (3) the fact that a person has formed a particular opinion as evidence that the truth is in accordance with it;[21] and (4) the fact that a person has done a similar act at one time as evidence that he did a particular act at another.[22] To each of these four main exclusions — hearsay, character, opinion, and res inter alios — are excepted cases where the fundamental rule that all evidence logically relevant is legally admissible continues to apply.

2. Legal Relevancy. Not all facts, which are in some degree logically relevant, have sufficient probative force to justify the expenditure of the time necessarily consumed in proving, testing, and weighing them. The practical conditions under which causes are tried require a somewhat higher grade of probative force which may be called "legal relevancy," and do not permit the court to hear all facts which have a logical bearing on the issue.[23] Whenever the court feels that a fact is not of probative value commensurate with the time required for tion[28] be rejected. Even where the evidence is legally relevant it may be excluded, in the court's discretion, if for any reason, as where it is merely cumulative;[29] or tends only to prove facts which are admitted,[30] sufficiently proven,[31] or not controverted,[32] the necessary time would not be judiciously expended in hearing it.

3. Prejudice From Irrelevant Testimony. It may fairly be doubted how far a party can be truly said to be prejudiced by the receipt of evidence which is objectionable only because irrelevant; and a growing tendency has been manifested by courts of last resort not to regard as prejudicial error the receipt of such evidence and even to sustain the action of the lower court in admitting it,[33] pro-

Where a witness swears positively to facts, it constitutes no exception to admissibility of his testimony that from the nature of the subject such facts could not be within his knowledge. Thompson v. Stewart, 3 Conn. 171, 8 Am. Dec. 168.

"Guess," "impression," etc.— Testimony is not necessarily objectionable as conjectural because the witness has used a colloquial phrase, as "guess" (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35), "presume" (People v. Soap, 127 Cal. 408, 59 Pac. 771), or "suppose" (Chatfield v. Bunnell, 69 Conn. 511, 37 Atl. 1074; Atlanta Consol. St. R. Co. v. Beauchamp, 93 Ga. 6, 19 S. E. 24), which under the circumstances may fairly be taken to indicate, as used by him, the exercise of judgment; or has testified to his "impression," provided the word implies a recollection, however faint (State v. Flanders, 38 N. H. 324; State v. Wilson, 9 Wash. 16, 36 Pac. 967).

28. An important consideration affecting the propriety of the court's action in excluding a fact is whether more direct or conclusive proof is already in the case or could have been obtained by a reasonable amount of diligence. Long v. Travellers' Ins. Co., 113 Iowa 259, 85 N. W. 24. It is, however, no ground for rejecting competent evidence that apparently the same fact can be shown in a more direct and simple way. Miller v. Shay, 142 Mass. 598, 8 N. E. 419; Walker v. Curtis, 116 Mass. 98. On the border line of relevancy it is natural to expect conflicting decisions. vided the jury were not misled[34] or confused.[35] When, however, the incidental effect of receiving immaterial evidence has been to injure a party by exciting sympathy for his adversary[36] or hostility to himself,[37] or in any other way, the admission constitutes reversible error.[38] Absence of prejudice from irrelevant evidence is clearer where the party objecting has previously introduced without objection immaterial evidence on the same point. In such cases it has been held that evidence of like immaterial nature may be received, in the discretion of the court, to rebut the evidence already offered;[39] and it has even been intimated

if it may be expected to become relevant in connection with other facts.[44] A fact otherwise incompetent may be admitted to render the testimony of a witness more definite, as by fixing a date,[45] or by stating facts referred to in an agreement established in evidence.[46] It is no objection to the admissibility of a party's testimony that it is competent only upon his own theory. He has a right to have the case submitted to the jury upon his theory if there is any testimony to support it.[47]

dence itself, are competent. Of the same general nature are facts otherwise irrelevant which by explaining or unfolding a situation establish the relevancy of evidence.[51] Explanatory evidence is equally competent to diminish the force of unfavorable facts produced by an opponent.[52] It is not material that explanatory facts should precede or be contemporaneous with the facts they explain. In matters of contract for example acts done or settlements made by the parties under the contract are admissible in evidence to show the contemporaneous construction of the parties.[53]

6. Supplementary and Consistent Facts. To aid the tribunal in discharging the function of judgment, a party may enhance the weight of his evidence or minimize the weight of his opponent's evidence. In this connection a fact is relevant which tends to render probable the contention of the party producing it,[54] as by showing good faith,[55] or explains facts reflecting unfavorably on it, as by suggesting reasons why witnesses have not been called[56] or books produced.[57] A fact is equally relevant if its probative effect is to show that an opponent's contention is probably unsound because maintained in bad faith.[58] Either party may prove facts tending to show what weight should be accorded the testimony on either side,[59] or the degree of credibility of their respective witnesses,[60] as affected by bias,[61] impeached by contradiction,[62] or otherwise;[63] and in general, especially where the testimony is conflicting, the court may receive evidence of all circumstances attending a transaction and the relations of the parties to aid the jury in judging as to the reasonableness[64] or unreasonableness[65] of their respective claims. While as a matter of evidence a fact does not become relevant merely because its existence is consistent with a party's claim,[66] the court may receive aid from evidence which in itself is not relevant to any issue in the case, but is corroborative of other testimony upon a disputed point.[67]

Mode of proof and rebuttal.— It is sometimes said that the fact of no entry is not admissible when what is meant is that the fact cannot be proved in that particular way. Thus it has been held that the certificate of a clerk of the circuit court that one in whose name land stood of record in his office had not transferred or mortgaged the same was not admissible. Parker v. Cleveland, 37 Fla. 39, 19 So. 344. And it has been held that a witness other than an officer having charge of the public records is not competent to prove the negative fact that there was no record of a certain instrument. Edwards v. Barwise, 69 Tex. 84, 6 S. W. 677. The fact of no entry must itself be established by competent evidence. Bullock v. Wallingford, 55 N. H. 619; Myers v. Jones, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 330, 23 S. W. 562; Hill v. Bellows, 15 Vt. 727. It may be shown in rebuttal that there are other inaccessible records on which an entry might or memorandum[74] of a fact where it would naturally be found if it existed may be relevant. Such relevancy, however, except in cases where the law requires that an instrument to be effective shall be recorded, is entirely dependent upon the inference arising from regularity and disinterestedness, that if the fact existed an entry of it would have been made in that particular place.[75]

B. Special Relaxation of Requirements of Legal Relevancy — 1. Ancient Facts. While the "best evidence rule," viewed as a principle of administration, and considered on its permissive side,[76] is by no means uniformly applied, it is still true that otherwise inadmissible evidence is frequently received if it is the best attainable. Where, on account of lapse of time, impossibility of employing direct observation, trivial general importance, or other peculiarity of the subject-matter, more probative evidence is practically beyond the power of the party, he will in general be permitted to present such evidence as is available; the rules of relevancy and exclusion being relaxed in aid of his contention. No adverse inference of suppression[77] arises, but on the contrary the court may properly invoke its administrative function of prescribing what constitutes a prima facie case, to assist an uncontroverted contention which cannot well be made stronger. Prominent among such connections is proof of facts in pais[78] which occurred at a time fairly beyond the period of personal memory.[79] Accordingly such facts of which no written evidence can be presumed to exist may be established by hearsay evidence, and this evidence may be either direct,[80] or in the composite form of properly have been made. Bow v. Allenstown, 34 N. H. 351, 69 Am. Dec. 489.

Non-entry on books.— It has been held that non-entry of the receipt of goods on the books of a vendee of chattels is not relevant as to the delivery of the goods. Keim v. Rush, 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 377. So in an action for the price of goods where defendant testified that he had paid to plaintiff's clerk, plaintiff's books were held not admissible to show that they contained no credit of the amount so claimed to have been paid. Scott v. Bailey, 73 Vt. 49, 50 Atl. 557. In an action on an oral contract of insurance defendant's book of entries of risks taken, in which the alleged contract was not entered, was inadmissible to prove that there was no contract. Sanborn v. Fireman's Ins. Co., 16 Gray (Mass.) 448, 77 Am. Dec. 419. And it has been broadly held that books of account can only be admitted as affirmative evidence and are never admissible to establish a negative proposition. Schwarze v. Roessler, 40 Ill. 79. "Direct and positive proof cannot always be obtained, and in matters especially which relate to remote periods it is necessary to resort to circumstantial evidence and presumption to supply the place of that testimony which is lost by the lapse of time and the imperfection of human memory. Such evidence in the strict legal sense is not collateral. It raises, it is true, a new and distinct inquiry; but if it affords a reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in issue, it is relevant and material and does not tend to distract or mislead the jury from the real point in controversy." reputation.[81] Thus documents over thirty years old,[82] produced from a proper custody,[83] and purporting to indicate the exercise of acts of ownership[84] or dominion[85] will be received as evidence that such transactions actually took place,[86] or of facts incidentally recited,[87] even in the absence of proof of actual possession under the particular document;[88] although corroboration by proof of actual possession under similar documents or by other facts[89] adds to the weight of the evidence,[90] and indeed has in some instances been deemed essential to admissibility. In like manner ancient proprietors' records bearing intrinsic evidence of genuineness, where verification by the proper custodian can no longer be obtained, are admissible evidence of facts contained in them.[91]

2. FACTS OF FAMILY HISTORY — a. General Rule. A necessary limitation on the number of witnesses who could have personal knowledge as to facts at once so precise and so personal as those of family history has required that these facts, especially when remote in point of time,[92] shall be provable under relaxed conditions.[93] Declarations concerning pedigree which are elsewhere discussed in this article[94] form a distinct class among possible evidentiary facts on matters of family history. The original and generally accepted admissibility of such declarations is where the issue in the case is distinctly one of pedigree, not extending to family history in other connections. When a fact of genealogy therefore is relevant to an inquiry other than one of pedigree, the rule has no application, and declarations,[95] oral or written,[96] by deceased members of the family,[97] or family

"A case is not necessarily [a case of pedigree] . . . because it may involve questions of birth, parentage, age or relationship. Where these questions are merely incidental and the judgment will simply establish a debt, or a person's liability on a contract, or his proper settlement as a pauper and things reputation,[98] are equally incompetent. By some courts in the United States, however, the scope of the rules admitting declarations as to matters of genealogy or facts incidentally connected therewith has been extended by analogy, working through the best evidence principle of administration, from issues of pedigree to cover proof of such facts in any connection in which they are relevant.[99] These courts hold that declarations of a deceased[1] member of the family[2] made ante litem motam[3] are competent to establish the fact of age[4] and other facts of family history whenever these facts are relevant. The witness need not as a preliminary matter state the sources of his knowledge.[5]

Dangerous character of evidence.— To admit evidence of declarations of deceased members of a family as to the facts which collectively make up pedigree, birth, death, and marriage wherever they are in dispute has been spoken of by eminent authority as "extremely dangerous" in many cases, especially instancing a case where the declarations are very commonly used in the American courts — statutory offenses against female children. wherever the fact is relevant, to the relationship, if any, existing between him and a designated person.[50] Parentage may be proved also by general reputation.[51]

h. Settlement Cases. Whether unsworn declarations of a deceased pauper or of a deceased member of his family regarding births, deaths, residence, and the like, are admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule was, at an early day, treated in England as a doubtful question.[52] The law has since been settled that no such exception exists.[53] Declarations of this nature, whether by a deceased pauper,[54] or by deceased members of his family,[55] are rejected as evidence of time[56] or place[57] of birth, or of the marriage[58] or residence[59] of a pauper or of any member of his family through whom a settlement is claimed; and this whether the statement be oral[60] or in writing.[61] No question of pedigree is involved in such an inquiry.[62] These facts may be proved by relevant circumstantial evidence; for example, birthplace by evidence of presence there very early in life,[63] or time of birth by the date of the subsequent death of an individual in no way related to the pauper.[64]

i. Circumstantial Evidence — (I) In General. Among inferences which general experience recognizes as relevant, is this: That a fact exists because a person possessing adequate knowledge and without motive to misrepresent would not have acted as he has done had he not believed it to exist. This conduct may take the form of: (1) Acts by such a person; (2) declarations by such a person; (3) acquiescence by such a person in the acts of others; and (4) acquiescence by such a person in the declarations of others. The English law of evidence presents peculiarity only in differentiating, in practical treatment, the second of the foregoing subdivisions from the other three.

(II) Family Conduct — (A) In General. Facts of family history may be circumstantially established by the conduct of its members.[65] For example whether a certain person is a legitimate member of the family is evidenced by recognition[66] or failure to recognize[67] him as such by members of the family.[68]

(B) Acquiescence. For reasons analogous to those on which so called "admissions by conduct" by a party[69] are based, statements in any form,[70] made by any one,[71] are admissible as evidence of any facts of family history asserted; provided it affirmatively appears by direct or circumstantial[72] evidence that the statement was brought to the attention of a member of the family[73] who would be interested to correct a mistake, and that his conduct, in connection with such assertion, indicates acquiescence in the existence of the facts asserted.[74] It must also affirmatively appear that the declaration concerns the subject of the inquiry, and a mere identity of name is not sufficient.[75] Where a statement is not shown to have been either made by a competent declarant or assented to by the family or some member thereof it is inadmissible.[76]

Weight of evidence.— When the book is once shown to be the family bible or testament, the entries therein derive their weight as evidence not more from the fact that they were made by any particular person than that being in that place as a family registry they are to be taken as assented to by those in whose custody the book has been kept. The statement itself, whether directly[88] or circumstantially[89] relevant, should be given in evidence, rather than the witness' deduction from it.[90] Examined copies of inscriptions are admissible for the sake of convenience;[91] and where monuments are decayed by time, or surreptitiously destroyed or removed, evidence of the recollections of witnesses respecting them and the inscriptions they bore has been admitted.[92]

(III) Records or Their Absence. Where a contention is necessarily based on a transaction which if it actually occurred would probably be recorded in some family or other repository of records, existence of the appropriate entry in a proper place is a fact circumstantially relevant.[93] Absence of such a record is equally relevant for the opposite purpose.[94]

3. Identity. In the absence of direct evidence by the conclusions of witnesses,[95] or by inspection of the court and jury,[96] identity may be established circumstantially not only by proving extrinsic facts which render its existence probable,[97] but by proof of indicative manifestations, such as declarations showing peculiar knowledge,[98] or by conduct, such as residence in a particular country, state,[99] or other place,[1] or service in the army at a certain time.[2] A family tradition may assist in identification;[3] and hearsay statements in the nature of declarations regarding pedigree are competent for the same purpose.[4]

4. Mental Condition.[5] Among facts usually provable only by observing their manifestations is that of the existence of a definite mental condition, sound or unsound. Not only may such a fact be proved by the inference of those who had satisfactory opportunities for observation,[6] the opinion of an expert,[7] the relevant declarations of the person in question,[8] or by his acts, so far as indicative of the condition of his mind;[9] but in seeking to prove mental condition, the individual relevancy of separate facts is of necessity less insisted upon by the court than would be the case in matters as to which more definite evidence might fairly be expected. Where insanity is offered as a defense, it cannot, however, be shown by hearsay, even of members of the family.[10] Nor can the fact of insanity be

Good faith.— Whether the existence of good faith is a relevant mental state or on the contrary an inference to be deduced from the facts in evidence under certain rules of law which leave the mental state immaterial is a question on which some difference of opinion exists. So far as the mental state is competent, that is, so far as the legal quality of acts done is affected by intent, it may be proved in any way, for example, the party himself may testify to its existence.

acts fairly indicative of the existence of the mental state in question.[22] As in other cases of circumstantial evidence, such manifestations may often have but slight individual weight and must derive cogency from the difficulty of explaining the existence of many uniform indications upon any other theory than the one on which they are offered. The testimony, however, by which it is sought to prove a mental state must be itself competent under the rules of evidence,[23] and not too remote in point of time to be revelant.[24]

6. Moral Qualities. Proof of moral qualities presents the same practical difficulties as proof of mental states, with which they are much involved and frequently blend.[25] Except where proof of character is permitted in case of a party[26] or a witness,[27] general reputation cannot establish the existence of moral qualities,[28] such as chastity[29] or loyalty.[30]

7. Pedigree of Animals. It has been held that the pedigree of an animal may be proved by reputation,[31] but not by hearsay.[32]

8. Race and Status. General reputation is competent to show that a person is a member of a particular race.[33] It has also been held admissible to establish a status; as whether a given individual is bond or free,[34] or whether an association of persons is incorporated.[35]

9. Value — a. In General. Value, whether intrinsic or as regulated by the "market," is a quality so subtle and intangible; is a function of so many variables and these, frequently, of such a trivial nature; where intrinsic, it is so largely a matter of individual estimate or opinion, and when judged by the market its standards so largely consist of the opinion not under oath of a large and usually indefinite number of persons as indicated by trade lists, prices current, and other publications more or less official, that relaxation of strict rules of evidence is necessary, and use must be made of such probative methods as are available.[36]

one piece of land is not the equivalent of another; each as a rule presents peculiar features affecting a value which is to a large extent intrinsic. In seeking to establish such intrinsic value, its existence may be proved at any time sufficiently near the time in question to be relevant, whether before or after the time involved in the issue.[37] The physical condition of the real estate may be placed before the jury,[38] and evidence is admissible to show any probable use to which the land could reasonably be put, as for manufacturing,[39] railroad,[40] residential,[41] or other purposes.[42] The use or lack of it which any individual witness would have for a tract of land is no test of value, and is consequently irrelevant on such an inquiry;[43] but evidence that such tracts as those in suit are or are not in demand is competent.[44] In general any elements of value[45] not merely speculative[46] may be shown. Conversely any facts tending to depreciate intrinsic value may be placed before the jury, such as flaws in the title,[47] or restrictions on the use of the premises.[48]

(B) Improvements. When there are improvements on the land, these may be placed in detail before the jury, for example, the cost of constructing buildings.[49] Cost of constructing similar buildings is irrelevant.[50]

(C) Opinions of Observers or Experts. As is more fully stated hereinafter,[51] especial importance is attached to the inference of observers or the opinion of experts on questions of value.[52]

(II) Tests of Value — (A) Appraisals. Estimate of value made by appraisers acting under appointment of one party cannot affect the other, unless the latter coöperates in or subsequently ratifies the appointment.[53]

(B) Assessments. Valuations made by public officials for purposes of taxation are not relevant to aid a jury in assessing the value of land[54] or buildings,[55] especially where the valuation is remote in point of time.[56] The rule is the same in the case of betterment assessments.[57]

(C) Auction Sales. The price obtained at an auction sale of land,[58] or of an undivided interest therein,[59] is admissible as some evidence of the value of the land, in the absence of proof of imposition or mistake.[60]

sell neighboring land,[62] except as a fact involving an estimate by the owner.[63] But it is said that bona fide offers to purchase land which the owner has declined are competent.[64] Willingness to pay a certain sum, not ripening into an offer, is irrelevant.[65] And the amount for which an owner would have sold his property is influenced by too many fortuitous circumstances to be relevant on an inquiry as to value.[66] The valuation of the owner is, however, always competent evidence for the adverse party as an admission,[67] except where the fact is offered as it existed at a period too long before[68] or too long after[69] the time when the owner's estimate is of importance to have any probative value.

(E) Price Paid. It has been held that taken alone the price paid for land furnishes no evidence of value,[70] even when the bona fides of the transaction is shown,[71] and in no case is such a test conclusive.[72] In connection with other evidence, however, it may have a logical bearing.[73] As between persons at liberty to contract on equal terms, agreement on a price not only operates to affect the parties contractually, but itself constitutes some evidence of value.[74] But forced sales lack the element of relevancy and are inadmissible as a test of market value. Accordingly prices paid in settlement of claims for damage caused to property by a common injury or taking are the resultant of too many variable considerations to be competent on the question as to what damage has been suffered by similar property from the same cause;[75] although the amount to be paid was reached by agreement,[76] arbitration,[77] or the verdict of a jury.[78] This is still more clearly the rule where the two pieces of property are in different conditions.[79]

(F) Rental Value. Changes in rental value may indicate the measure of damages occasioned by an injury to or taking of property. General decrease in rental value of premises along the line of an elevated railroad and near the premises in question is therefore competent in determining damage caused by its construction and operation,[80] provided it appears that the land has in fact been injured, either absolutely[81] or relatively, as by failure to share in a general enhancement of values.[82] But a decrease in the rental value of adjacent property not shown to be general is irrelevant.[83]

Compulsory settlement.— The fact that a sale was made to a water or other municipal board does not of itself show that it was a compulsory settlement rather than a fair transaction in the market, so as to make it inadmissible on the question of value of neighboring land, where the board had statutory power to purchase as well as to condemn. Co. v. Splitlog, 45 Kan. 68, 25 Pac. 202) evidence may constitute error. A circumstance considered in determining the propriety of the court's exercise of discretion in this particular, as in other cases of relevancy as affected by remoteness, is whether it is reasonably within the power of the party presenting the evidence to produce evidence more probative. Pierce v. Boston, 164 Mass. 92, 41 N. E. 227.

Length of time suggests dissimilarity of conditions. Washburn v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 59 Wis. 364, 18 N. W. 328. A considerable intervening period has sufficed to exclude the evidence under circumstances, where the probability of change in conditions was not negatived. Everett v. Union Pac. R. On the other hand, it has not sufficed to exclude the evidence where it was necessary or still relevant by reason of the presumable non-existence of a change in condition. Montgomery v. Sayre, 100 Cal. 182, 34 Pac. 646, 38 Am. St. Rep. 271 (a few months); Bowditch v. Boston, 164 Mass. 107, 41 N. On cross-examination to test the accuracy of a witness as to value, the court may permit a wide range of inquiry as to sales of similar property. The period may extend condition[89] in all essential particulars,[90] including location,[91] as to raise a logical inference that practically the same elements of value are present in both cases,[92] or that any difference in value can be determined with approximate accuracy.[93] In other jurisdictions the evidence is not admissible.[94]

c. Personal Property — (i) Intrinsic Value — (a) In General. Where an article has no market value the jury may consider what would have contributed to make the market price if there had been one. The condition of the property as it existed sufficiently near the time embraced in the issue to afford a reasonable ground for belief that it remains the same,[95] or has changed only to an extent

Proof of the value of lands presenting peculiar conditions of situation or in other particulars requires relaxation of the strict requirements as to similarity of conditions attending probative instances of sale, in respect both to closeness of time and proximity in locality. Benham v. Dunbar, 103 Mass. 365, island in Boston harbor. Sales of high land are not as a rule relevant as to the value of low (Daigneault v. Woonsocket, 18 R. I. 378, 28 Atl. 346), or of improved land on the value of wild (Fox v. Robbins, (Tex. Civ. App. 1902) 70 S. W. 597. But see O'Malley v. Com., 182 Mass. 196, 65 N. E. 30). Sales of wild or timber land in other localities are incompetent as evidence of the value of similar lands in the absence of evidence of the existence of a market value. Bradshaw v. Rome, etc., R. Co., 1 N. Y. Suppl. 691. Similarity in a subordinate particular does not make the testimony relevant. It is not enough, for example, that a lot is similar to the land in question only in being low and traversed by a brook. Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp., 122 Mass. 305.

91. Huntington v. Attrill, 118 N. Y. 365, 23 N. E. 544; Washburn v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 59 Wis. 364, 18 N. W. 328. And see Dallas v. Boise, 44 Oreg. 302, 75 Pac. 208 (excluding evidence of the value of waterpowers two miles distant from those in controversy, where it was not shown that the conditions surrounding them were similar, so as to make their value equal); Newbold v. International, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 1079 (excluding evidence of the price of a lot at a greater distance from a railroad than the lot in question).

Considerable distance from the locus does not disqualify evidence of sales, provided it does not otherwise connote such dissimilarity of conditions as to affect relevancy. Concordia Cemetery Assoc. v. Minnesota, etc., R. Co., 121 Ill. 199, 12 N. E. 536; Gardner v. Brookline, 127 Mass. 358. This is especially true in case of wild lands. Mains v. Haight, 14 Barb. 93. A party is entitled to show points of difference in favor of his own land over the land sold. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Emery, 51 Kan. 16, 32 Pac. 631. And circumstances enhancing the prices realized at the collateral sale may be shown. Wyman v. Lexington, etc., R. Co., 13 Metc. (Mass.) 316. Difference in size (Sawyer v. Boston, 144 Mass. 470, 11 N. E. 711), class of buildings (Pierce v. Boston, 164 Mass. 92, 41 N. E. 227), or nature of restrictions (Lyman v. Boston, 164 Mass. 99, 41 N. E. 127) is not fatal to the evidence if substantial similarity is shown. But it is essential to relevancy that the effect of similarity should not be nullified by the presence of peculiar circumstances attending the sale and tending to prevent the fair operation on the price of the elements possessed in common by the two estates. which can be definitely estimated,[96] and actual elements of its value,[97] including proof of its cost,[98] and of the uses to which it is naturally adapted[99] may be laid before the jury, although the purpose for which goods are to be used is not ordinarily the best test of their value.[1] Value of specific property may be shown by proving the value of similar property,[2] provided the nature and amount of the differentiation, if any, can be shown with reasonable certainty.[3] The jury may under like conditions gain information from inspection of similar articles.[4]

(B) Second-Hand Property. The value of second-hand property is established in the same way as that of other property without market value.[5] Evidence of its cost, market price when new, and its usefulness and present condition, is admissible.[6]

affect the party against whom the evidence is offered is incompetent,[7] even if the appraisal is officially made.[8] On the other hand, where an appraisal can be deemed the act of a party, its results are admissible against him.[9]

(2) Auction Sales. As tests of value of personal property special importance is attached to prices obtained at auction sales, where the sales are fairly conducted with suitable effort to attract bidders[10] and are made sufficiently near the time involved in the issue, whether before or after,[11] to be relevant. The prices are not conclusive on the parties,[12] even when realized at an official sale, as by a sheriff on execution.[13]

(3) Offers. Offers of a price for personal property made in good faith and rejected by the owner are competent as evidence of value.[14]

(4) Prices Paid. That a party has placed a certain value on chattels[15] or services[16] is competent against him as an admission,[17] but cannot be used by him on his own behalf.[18] What a party paid for property furnishes by itself no test of value,[19] although it constitutes a circumstance to be weighed in connection with other evidence;[20] provided that the time of sale is sufficiently near to sustain a satisfactory inference on the question of value at the time involved in the inquiry.[21] The evidence is more readily received when other evidence of value is apparently unavailable.[22] is admissible,[24] provided that the time of sale is not too remote[25] to raise a logical inference.

(11) Market Value—(A) In General. Market value, when shown to exist,[26] may be proved as it existed at any time at which it is relevant.[27] Value of ordinary commodities having a market value may be proved by showing the value of articles of the same kind in the market, without showing that those in controversy are of the same quality.[28]

(B) How Proved—(1) In General. Where the statement as to market value is identified as that of a particular individual,[29] as where the opinion of persons not witnesses, including editors of newspapers,[30] is offered, it is to be rejected. Hearsay, to be admissible, must be of a concurrent or composite type.[31] What an owner would take for a chattel,[32] or what a particular person would be willing to give for it, embraces too many variable contingencies to constitute evidence of market value. In case of articles having a market value, cost of production is irrelevant.[33]

(2) Opinion Evidence—(a) In General. A common method of proving market value is by the inference of competent observers[34] or the opinion of experts[35] personally acquainted with the market in question.[36] The testimony is valuable in proportion as personal familiarity with the market is demonstrated.[37]

(b) Hearsay as a Basis. A witness may testify as to market value, although his sole knowledge be derived from commercial circulars,[38] correspondence,[39] market quotations,[40] newspaper market reports,[41] price lists,[42] prices current,[43] or telegrams.[44]

(3) Proof of Sales — (a) In General. A fundamental test of market value is the price realized on actual sales[45] or stated in bona fide offers by dealers having the articles for sale,[46] or in bidding for their purchase at a time near enough to be relevant.[47] Evidence of even a single occasion is admissible, provided that any variation in conditions is not such as to confuse rather than assist the tribunal.[48] Prices obtained at an auction sale held under fair conditions are competent evidence of market value.[49]

(b) Records of Trade Sales. The usual records of sales[50] or of offers to purchase or sell, such as newspaper market reports[51] or prices current,[52] are deemed competent evidence of market value, especially when accredited by the party against whom they are offered.[53] But prices current of dealers or in newspapers must be shown to represent actual or proposed transactions[54] and it ought to appear that the prices were promulgated from authoritative sources in good faith in the usual course of business.[55]

(c) Place at Which Market Value Is Relevant. If property has a market value at the place involved in the inquiry, evidence is properly directed to establishing it at that place,[56] although in case any ambiguity arises evidence of market value at other places may be received to aid the jury. Only where the evidence is clear and explicit as to the value of the article at the place of delivery is evidence at other places rejected as inadmissible.[57] Where it is affirmatively shown[58] that no market value for a commodity exists at the place involved in the inquiry, market value at other places may be shown, if these are sufficiently near to show, in connection with cost of transportation, etc., the value at the place in question,[59] and if this market is one legally open to the parties.[60] The question as to what places are sufficiently near is addressed to the sound discretion of the court,[61] the determining consideration being what evidence is practically available to the litigants.[62] The nearest market, if it be fairly illustrative, is usually demanded by the court.[63] But nearness is not conclusive where circumstances of variation render the market value at such place misleading.[64] Market value in the controlling market may always be shown, whatever its distance.[65] It is always open to a party for the purpose of impairing the weight of evidence introduced by the opposite party to Relevancy on question of intention.— In certain instances the fact of what others or plaintiff have charged at another time for the services may be admissible as throwing light on the probable intention of the contracting parties, especially where it can be shown or inferred that the scale of charges was known to the defendant before engaging the services. Paige v. Morgan, 28 Vt. 565. For example, where the parties in an action for services rendered under a special contract differ as to the compensation agreed upon, evidence of the value of like services, as bearing on the reasonableness of conflicting evidence, is admissible, where the jury are properly instructed as to the manner in which such evidence should be considered. for similar services on other occasions, or what others would have charged for the same work,[78] is obnoxious to the rule of res inter alios[79] and inadmissible.

VIII. UNSWORN STATEMENTS; INDEPENDENT RELEVANCY.*

A. In General — 1. RULE STATED. Only when offered as evidence of the existence of the fact asserted by it does the law of evidence exclude statements not made under oath. In other words the first of the four principal exclusionary rules of evidence — that against hearsay[80] — applies only to the inference that a fact exists because a person not a witness has stated it to be so. Accordingly, whenever the object is not to prove the truth of the statement, but to show that it existed — where the fact that a statement has been made is relevant, regardless of its truth or falsity — the rule against hearsay has no application.[81] An unsworn statement intrinsically relevant, written or oral,[82] is primary[83] evidence, and may constitute a fact in issue,[84] or be circumstantially[85] relevant as to the existence of such a fact. Whether facts are in issue or relevant to the issue, the statements are not evidence of the facts directly asserted,[86] although in many instances, as for

2. THE "RES GESTÆ" — a. In General. In any particular case submitted to judicial investigation, the nature of the right or liability asserted involves consideration by the tribunal of a certain number of principal facts, the happening of which extends over a definite period of time and directly determines the existence of the right or liability. This collection of primary facts constituting the necessary and immediate field of a judicial inquiry has been designated as the res gestæ.[96] Within this field of immediate inquiry the court will receive evidence of all the facts.[97] The phrase "res gestæ," however, has frequently — especially in the United States — been given a greatly extended application. It has been made to embrace all facts which are relevant to the principal fact in any

See also Wright v. Tatham, 7 A. & E. 313, 353, 34 E. C. L. 178, where the doctrine of "res gestæ" was much discussed. In the course of the argument, Bosanquet, J., observed: "How do you translate 'res gestæ?' —'Gestæ,' by whom?" Parke, B., afterward observed: "The acts, by whomsoever done, are res gestæ, if relevant to the matter in issue. But the question remains, what are relevant?" In delivering his opinion to the house of lords (Wright v. Tatham, 4 Bing. N. Cas. 489, 548, 33 E. C. L. 821), Vaughan, J., laid down the rule thus: "Where any facts are proper evidence upon an issue, all oral or written declarations which can explain such facts may be received in evidence."

Statements made by persons who examined the body immediately after the killing, and at the place where the killing occurred, is admissible as res gestæ. State v. Robinson, 12 Wash. 491, 41 Pac. 884.

Relevancy is essential to the admissibility of statements of a third person as part of the res gestæ where the scope of the primary facts is transcended. Lack of relevancy in this connection is frequently indicated by the court by saying that the statement is not part of the res gestæ. State v. Riley, 42 La. "It frequently happens, however, that as the evidence of circumstances must be resorted to for the purpose of proving the commission of the particular offence charged, the proof of those circumstances involves the proof of other acts, either criminal or apparently innocent. In such cases, it is proper, that the chain of evidence should be unbroken. If one or more links of that chain consist of circumstances, which tend to prove that the prisoner has been guilty of other crimes than that charged, this is no reason why the court should exclude those circumstances. They are so intimately connected and blended with the main facts adduced in evidence, that they cannot be departed from with propriety; and there is no reason why the criminality of such intimate and connected circumstances, should exclude them, more than other facts apparently innocent." R. 92, 94, where Lord Ellenborough, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If crimes do so intermix the court must go through the detail. I remember a case where a man committed three burglaries in one night; he took a shirt at one place and left it at another; and they were all so connected that the court went through the history of the three different burglaries."

Reason for exclusion.— Other offenses not specifically connected with the one under consideration are rejected, it is said, as res inter alios. See infra, XII. The real objection seems lack of relevancy, coupled with liability to prejudice. See supra, VII, A, 3. Whenever the bodily or mental feelings of an individual at a particular time are material to be proved, the usual expressions of such feelings made at the time in question are admissible as evidence of the existence of such feelings. They are classed with natural evidence, and whether they were real or feigned is for the jury to determine. Phillips v. Kelly, 29 Ala. 628. To the same effect see People v. Murphy, 3 N. Y. A narrative of the events attending the mishap would not be competent, but the patient may tell what the injury is, if he knows; he is suffering and is seeking relief; to get it he must tell the truth; any other course would mislead his physician and might result disastrously; he knows whether he has bruised the inflamed parts or whether he has been bitten by an insect. The rule expounded.— "It is well settled, that what a patient has said of his own feelings, pains, &c., while afflicted with a disease which is the subject of judicial decision, may be told by the witness, and is competent evidence. Such expressions are the indications or symptoms of the disease itself; and cannot be separated from it. A dumb patient would write and point to the seat of his pain; while one, who spoke, would indicate the same thing in words. In such cases, the words or gestures, are equally the signs of the disease felt by the patient." Hunter v. McClintock, Dudley (S. C.) 327, 328. cause of an injury[10] or the instrument with which it was inflicted[11] are to be rejected.[12] Entirely different considerations are suggested when the statements to a physician are not for purposes of treatment, but to enable the physician to testify as a witness. The interest of the declarant may seem to him to consist in intensifying actual symptoms or evolving new ones, and the statements have accordingly been rejected.[13] There is, however, authority to the effect that these considerations go merely to the weight of the evidence, and do not suffice to exclude it; and that statements indicative of present suffering,[14] or as to its locality,[15] are competent, although the declarant expects that the physician will testify for him in part on the basis of the truth of these statements.[16]

"Principle of the res gestæ."— Certain courts show an inclination to treat declarations indicating the existence of a particular claim as relevant only when the declarations would be evidence of the facts asserted; that is, when part of some fact in itself relevant. It has been held, following the analogy of declarations as evidence of facts, that in cases of statements regarding boundaries that the declaration must be made while the declarant is in the act of establishing or pointing out the bounds (Noyes v. Ward, 19 Conn. 250) and while on the land itself (Mann v. Cavanaugh, 110 Ky. 776, 62 S. while the declarant is in actual[28] or constructive[29] possession of the premises;[30] although it is not necessary that this possession should be exclusive, or that the declarant should be on the land while making his statement.[31] The fact of possession must be shown by evidence apart from the declarations themselves,[32] or the admissions of the real owner.[33] Since declarations of claim therefore accompany the fact of possession, they are, for reasons hereinbefore referred to,[34] frequently spoken of as "part of the res gestæ";[35] and it has been said to be under the same rule that narrative declarations as to the existence of past events,[36] or

Statements as to independent facts.— Declarations of a party in possession are admissible as part of the res gestæ to prove the character of his possession, as that he claims the property as his own, or holds it in subordination to the claim of another, but not to show that he had not given it to a third person, or that what he said about such gift was in jest, or that he only loaned it. statements of intention as to the future,[37] are incompetent and inadmissible in evidence.[38]

(III) Statements by Tenants or Holders. While possession is necessary for relevancy of a declaration as to claim, it is not in all instances sufficient. Whenever the rules of the substantive law of real property require, in addition to possession by the declarant, that facts should exist which amount to an ouster, evidence of declarations as to claim are incompetent, in the absence of proof of these additional facts. Thus, where the declarant in possession is a tenant holding under a lease,[39] or by possession,[40] or is a tenant by the curtesy,[41] or in dower,[42] or is a cotenant,[43] or where his claim is that of a mortgagee,[44] or other holder of an equitable title in possession, since his possession may well be under his actual rights and does not in itself put the owner upon an inquiry as to the animus with which it is being held, the declaration of adverse claim is not relevant, unless shown to have been brought to the attention of the owner,[45] or unless facts are proved from which the jury might reasonably infer the existence of an ouster by the tenant. But the statements of a tenant to the effect that he is a tenant of real[46] or personal[47] property, and as to who is the particular person under whom he claims to hold such real estate,[48] or personal property,[49] and even as to what lands are embraced in the holding,[50] are competent circumstantial evidence, in favor of the person named as owner, of the existence of a relevant fact.[51]

37. Comins v. Comins, 21 Conn. 413.

38. As stated substantially supra, VIII, A, 2, this is overworking a phrase which is needed in its proper connection of indicating a definite exception to the hearsay rule, where an equivalent for the sanction of an oath has been found in the circumstance that the declaration is a necessary part of some fact relevant in itself. As the hearsay rule operates merely upon statements which are offered as evidence of the facts asserted, no exception is presented where a declaration is independently relevant. There is no distinction between verbal and other acts in such a connection. The fact of possession in these cases is complete in itself. To establish prescription, however, another element — the existence of a particular animus, for a definite time — is necessary. This animus may be shown circumstantially by any relevant acts, including declarations. See the cases above cited.

example, to negative an intent to abandon the ownership.[59] It is not ground for rejecting the declarations that they are self-serving,[60] if they are made in apparent good faith; and the benefit of them in such case inures not only to the declarant, but to those in privity with him,[61] including creditors,[62] or his representatives.[63]

(11) Declarations as to Private Boundaries. While a declaration of one in actual [64] possession of premises as to the line of his boundary is not evidence that such is in fact the true line, it is primary evidence of the extent of his claim in that particular, including the position of landmarks.[65] An anomalous rule as to declarations concerning private boundaries, said to be based upon the "principle of the res gestæ," but presenting certain features of both the rule under consideration and that regulating the admissibility of declarations of deceased third persons as to matters of private boundary,[66] is prevalent in some of the United States, to the effect that declarations of a deceased owner or tenant, in possession of lands and on the premises, made while in the act of pointing out his own boundaries [67] and their marks,[68] are competent evidence, even to contradict the effect of a deed,[69] not only of the declarant's claim as to the extent of his possession, but of the fact that the boundaries and landmarks are as stated;[70] pro-

Declarations of deceased persons as to facts of public or private boundary should be distinguished from the statements under consideration. The former declarations furnish an inference that the facts are as they are stated to be. In other words they tend to establish the boundary. See infra, IX, E. The present declarations are mere circumstantial evidence of the animus and extent of a claim under which possession is being held. The circumstance that a rule of substantive law, regulating the effect of adverse possession, under certain conditions turns a claim of ownership into the fact of ownership does not obliterate the distinction. Possession as agent.— The general rule that the declarations of a vendor in possession of land are competent for the purpose of explaining, qualifying, or characterizing his possession cannot be extended to the declarations of an agent in possession in disparagement of the title and boundaries of his principal. Perkins v. Brinkley, 133 N. C. 348, 45 S. E. 652, holding that where a husband is in possession of land as agent of his wife, his declarations to strangers in regard to the boundaries of her land are not admissible against her.

In Vermont a more general application of this so-called principle of res gestæ requires that a declaration of claim to be admissible should be made while the declarant is exercising some right or easement, and should tend to show that the declarant claimed to exercise the same in his own right. although they were not made under the declarant's oath; and the rule applies to choses in action.[83] The declarant must have been in possession.[84]

(II) Explanation of Possession. Explanations of the possession of stolen goods are admissible, if made while the goods continue in the declarant's possession,[85] especially when made immediately on the declarant being found in possession and made aware that his right to possession is questioned.[86]

4. Constraint. Whether a person is acting under constraint may be shown by his relevant declarations.[87]

5. Indicating Nature of Phenomena. A logical and in some cases a necessary method of conveying to the tribunal an adequate impression of certain phenomena is by showing their effect on the mind of an observer. Exclamations and other relevant unsworn statements, therefore, are competent circumstantial evidence, where they fairly indicate the effect on the declarant of observed appearance,[88]

conduct,[89] or sensations.[90] The effect of influence upon the mind of the declarant may be shown in the same way.[91]

6. Fraud and Good Faith. A relevant[92] statement may furnish circumstantial evidence of fraud[93] or good faith.[94] The fact which it is sought to prove by the statement must itself be relevant. When the clear legal effect of conceded facts is that a transaction is fraudulent, the actual intention of a party is immaterial, and evidence of it is accordingly rejected.[95]

By "knowledge" in this connection, it is not necessarily implied that the knowledge is accurate. The fact to be proved is rather the mental state of a given person as to knowledge on a particular point; and the statement is equally admissible, if relevant, although shown to be false. Jones v. State, 103 Ala. 1, 15 So. 891, on a question whether defendant intended to shoot deceased, his declarations shortly before that the gun was not loaded is competent.

importance, although made long before the time involved in the inquiry.[8] Statements indicating the possession of knowledge may be admissible, although made subsequent to the time at which the knowledge was important; provided the time at which the declaration was made is not too remote to be relevant.[9]

b. Statements to Person. Where knowledge of a particular fact is relevant,[10] it may be shown that an unsworn statement as to its existence was brought to the person's attention,[11] in the same way that any other relevant statement may be shown to have been made to him.[12] The statements may be direct and specific, as Knowledge in the family.— Facts known to certain members of a family are not necessarily known to all; even to those standing in the relation of husband or wife to the person possessing knowledge. Oden v. Stubblefield, 4 Ala. 40. But proof of the wife's knowledge of a work of excavation on property owned by her jointly with her husband was held competent, as conducing with other circumstances to show knowledge on the part of her husband. Covington v. Geyler, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 466; Hart v. Newland, 10 N. C. 122.

General knowledge of a particular fact in a community (Crane v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 87 Mo. 588; Benoist v. Darby, 12 Mo. 196), or newspaper (Roberts v. Spencer, 123 Mass. 397; Com. v. Robinson, 1 Gray (Mass.) 555) or other (Putnam v. Gunning, 162 Mass. 552, 39 N. E. 347) publication of the fact raises an inference that a person likely to have learned of the statement (Clark v. Ricker, 14 N. H. 44; Milbank v. Dennistoun, 10 Bosw. (N. Y.) 382; Gaskell v. Morris, 7 Watts & S. (Pa.) 32) did so learn. But it has been held that where it becomes necessary to prove that a party had knowledge of a particular fact, proof that such fact was "generally known" is not competent for the purpose. Tucker v. Constable, 16 Oreg. 407, 19 Pac. 13. Mere conversation among neighbors not in presence of the party to be affected with knowledge of it is not competent. Clark v. Ricker, 14 N. H. 44. And evidence of general knowledge in the community has in case of advice,[13] information,[14] or instructions.[15] In like manner knowledge of a particular fact, when relevant, may be proved by evidence of notice[16] been rejected in a criminal case. Tucker v. Constable, 16 Oreg. 407, 19 Pac. 13.

Relevancy required.— The evidence offered must in all cases have a logical tendency to establish the fact of knowledge. Briggs v. Briggs, 135 Mass. 306; Carpenter v. Leonard, 3 Allen (Mass.) 32; Dunbar v. Mulry, 8 Gray (Mass.) 163; Fenno v. Chapin, 27 Minn. 519, 8 N. W. 762; Finch v. Green, 16 Minn. 355; Woods v. Buffalo R. Co., 35 N. Y. App. Div. 203, 54 N. Y. Suppl. 735. In an action by a bank against the sureties of its cashier to recover for peculations, the bank's books are inadmissible to show its knowledge of them; for the mere fact that the books showed the cashier to be a defaulter does not show knowledge on the part of the bank itself. Bowne v. Mt. Holly Nat. Bank, 45 N. J. L. 360. Accordingly, where reputation is relied on as evidence of knowledge it must be shown to have been established in such places and to such an extent as to raise a reasonable inference that the party to be affected knew of it. Distinction supporting admissibility.— Existence of a fact cannot be proved by general reputation or notoriety; but when the exist-offered for the purpose of showing knowledge may precede the happening of the principal event.[21]

9. Mental Conditions — a. In General. Statements by a person may constitute relevant evidence as to the condition of the declarant's mind.[22] As direct evidence of the fact asserted such declarations are incompetent.[23] The same is true of statements as to mental condition made by persons not called as witnesses;[24] and even where an intimate acquaintance with the person in question as in case of a father,[25] legal adviser,[26] or wife,[27] is shown to exist, their declarations are hearsay. On issues involving mental condition competent declarations may precede[28] or accompany[29] a principal event; and subsequent declarations are also admitted,[30] unless in the opinion of the court in the particular case the time is ence of the fact has been shown such evidence is admissible to charge a person in the neighborhood with knowledge of it. Woods v. Montevallo Coal, etc., Co., 84 Ala. 560, 3 So. 475, 5 Am. St. Rep. 393.

On an issue of self-defense in a prosecution for homicide reputation of the deceased as being a quarrelsome man is competent. Smith v. U. S., 161 U. S. 85, 16 S. Ct. 483, 40 L. ed. 626.

Insolvency or insanity.— In an action to recover money paid out by an insolvent, evidence of a common knowledge of his insolvency in the neighborhood is admissible to show that defendant must have had knowledge of that fact, since it is to be presumed that members of a community must know what is of common knowledge in such community. Larkin v. Hapgood, 56 Vt. 597. Absence of reputation prejudicial to solvency is relevant on the proposition that the person whose conduct is in question acted in ignorance of any financial embarrassment. Heywood v. Reed, 4 Gray (Mass.) 574; Bartlett v. Decreet, 4 Gray (Mass.) 111. But it has been held that evidence of general reputation of the insanity of a person in the neighborhood in which he resided is inadmissible to prove that a person was cognizant of that fact. Greenslade v. Dare, 20 Beav. 284.

Adverse user.— Reputation, in connection with proof of acts of ownership, is admissible on the issue of notice, to establish a private right by prescription. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Hall, 87 Ala. 708, 6 So. 277, 13 Am. St. Rep. 84, 4 L. R. A. 710; Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103; Russell v. Stocking, 8 Conn. 236; Kuglar v. Garner, 7 Ga. 765; Missouri Pac. R. "A man's words show his mental condition. It is common to prove insanity by the party's sayings as well as by his acts. One's likes and dislikes, fears and friendships, hopes and intentions, are shown by his utterances; so that it is generally true that, whenever a party's state of mind is a subject of inquiry, his declarations are admissible as evidence thereof. In other words, a declaration which is sought as mere evidence of an external fact, and whose force depends upon its credit for truth, is always mere hearsay if not made upon oath; but a declaration which is sought as evidence of what the declarant thought or felt, or of his mental capacity, is of the best kind of evidence." Res gestæ distinguished.— The fact that the statements under consideration are not used to establish the existence of the matters directly asserted removes them from the class of declarations which can with propriety be too remote to be relevant, even under the liberal rule applying to proof of this class of facts.[31]

b. Capacity For Resistance to Suggestions. The mental strength of a person may be a fact of great importance in estimating the effect of pressure upon him in the form of fraud[32] or undue influence;[33] in which cases much assistance is gained by considering the declarations,[34] written[35] or oral,[36] of the person in question, including declarations of a testator evincing fixed intention to make a disposition of property different from the provisions in his will.[37]

c. Mental Weakness and Insanity. Declarations of a person are admissible as evidence not only of weakness of his mental faculties,[38] but of insanity.[39]

d. Power of Memory. Declarations involving the use of memory are competent evidence of ability to recollect,[40] and conversely are admissible to show absence or impairment of memory.[41]

10. MENTAL STATE — a. In General. Where the existence of a particular mental state is a relevant[42] fact, declarations which indicate its existence are competent circumstantial evidence,[43] and are consequently primary evidence, compesaid to be part of the res gestæ. Linch v. Linch, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 526. Declaration by testator.— "A declaration after he [the testator] has made his will, of what the contents of the will are, is not a statement of anything which is passing in his mind at the time; it is simply a statement of a fact within his knowledge, and therefore you cannot admit it unless you can bring it within some of the exceptions to the general rule, that hearsay evidence is not admissible to prove a fact which is stated in the declaration. It does not come within any of the rules which have been hitherto established, and I doubt whether it is an advisable thing to establish new exceptions in a case which has never happened before, and may never happen again, for you then establish an exception which more or less throws a doubt on the law." "Intent" and "intention."— While it will frequently be found that "intention" is employed as equivalent to "intent," there is little advantage in confusing a mental state and a mental operation. The inquiry, for example, whether an act was done accidentally or intentionally evidently involves a different mental function from that involved in the inquiry whether the same act was done innocently or with felonious intent.

Suicidal intention.— Declarations of an insured person tending to show that he contemplated suicide, not accompanying nor explanatory of any act, were held incompetent evidence in favor of defendant insurance company against the beneficiary and the assignee. Jenkin v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 131 Cal. 121, 63 Pac. 180. See LIFE INSURANCE. But previous declarations of deceased threatening to take his own life were admitted on an issue as to whether deceased was murdered or committed suicide. People v. Gebmele, Sheld. (N. Y.) 251.

Letters.— Intention may be shown by contemporaneous declarations in letters written under circumstances excluding suspicion. Rogers v. Manhattan L. Ins. Co., 138 Cal. 285, 71 Pac. 348; Thorndike v. Boston, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 242; Hunter v. State, 40 N. J. L. 495; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 285, 12 S. Ct. 909, 36 L. ed. 706.

Passengers.— A person's declarations that he intended to take a train are competent to prove that fact. Matthews v. Great Northern R. Co., 81 Minn. 363, 84 N. W. 101, 83 Am. St. Rep. 383; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Herrick, 49 Ohio St. 25, 29 N. E. 1052. But compare Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Chancellor, 165 Ill. 438, 46 N. E. 269.

Res gestæ distinguished.— It is frequently said that such declarations of intention are admitted as part of the res gestæ (Kyle v. Craig, 125 Cal. 107, 57 Pac. 791; Church v. Rowell, 49 Me. 367; Gorham v. Canton, 5 Me. 266, 17 Am. Dec. 231; Wright v. Boston, 126 Mass. 161; Salem v. Lynn, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 544; Kilburn v. Bennett, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 199; Hunter v. State, 40 N. J. L. 495; Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Herrick, 49 Ohio St. 25, 29 N. E. 1052; Doyle v. Clark, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 4,053, 1 Flipp. 536. Contra, People v. Williams, 3 Park. Cr. (N. Y.) 84), and, in accordance with that rule, it has been held that a narrative of a past intention is the existence of the particular mental state is a relevant fact[61] at the time to which the declarations relate.[62] They are not direct evidence of the facts asserted,[63] but merely probative in and of themselves as to the existence of a material fact;[64] and the admissibility of such declarations therefore is not determined by the rules regulating declarations, part of the res gestæ, as an exception to the hearsay rule.[65] A declaration of intent or intention is not necessarily admissible because made contemporaneously with relevant acts; existence of the particular mental state at that time must itself be a relevant fact.[66] On the other hand, no requirement exists that the making of a declaration indicating intent or intention should be contemporaneous with the time when its existence is relevant. The test is logic, rather than time. Within limits prescribed by the rules as to remoteness,[67] prior,[68] or subsequent,[69] as well as accompanying,[70] statements, are competent. If a declaration of intent or intention is relevant, the declarant is entitled to the benefit of it, even though it be in his favor.[71] An otherwise relevant declaration is not rendered incompetent by reason of the fact that the declarant is dead.[72] incompetent (Baker v. Kelly, 41 Miss. 696, 93 Am. Dec. 274). This is misleading for reasons stated supra, VIII, A, 2. See also In re Olmsted, 122 Cal. 224, 54 Pac. 745; McDonald v. McDonald, 86 Mo. App. 122; Smith v. McElyea, 68 Tex. 70, 3 S. W. 258.

64. While declarations by a person are competent circumstantial evidence as to the existence of intent, facts involved incidentally in the inquiry cannot necessarily be proved in the same way. Thus, while a parent's declarations are admissible to show whether property given to a child was intended as an advancement, they are not admissible to prove the fact that money was given. 98. The distinction, however, between statements used in these several ways, that is, statements which on the one hand are competent because found as it were within the zone of facts which immediately constitute a transaction or occurrence (usually spoken of as the res gestæ) and on the other hand statements which per se establish a legal result, or fur-constitute a legal result, proof of what was said is relevant per se.[99] The statements may be those of one acting in a representative capacity as an agent,[1] or as a public official,[2] and are also spoken of as being part of the res gestæ.

2. AGENCY, BAILMENT, SALE, OR CONTRACT. Statements to a person may be admissible because they create the relation of agency,[3] or constitute the incidents of a bailment,[4] or assist to constitute a sale of real[5] or personal[6] property, or affect nish evidence from which the existence of such a legal result or some other relevant fact may be inferred, is one which, although clear in extreme cases, becomes shadowy as the border line between them is approached. It is fortunate therefore that however valuable for purposes of classification the distinction may be, it is, like the analogous distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence, of no especial importance; and indeed is frequently one merely of degree in directness of the relation of the evidence offered to the fact sought to be proved by it. that where the making of a contract extends over several interviews a relevant statement on any such occasion is competent.[15]

3. DEMAND OR REFUSAL. Unsworn statements may be admissible as constituting a demand[16] or refusal.[17]

4. DENIAL OR DISCLAIMER. The fact of denial may consist of unsworn statements admissible for that reason.[18] Disclaimer of ownership, total or partial, may be a relevant fact, properly constituted by statements of persons not witnesses.[19]

5. CONSPIRACY. Declarations may be admissible because they constitute a criminal agreement or conspiracy.[20]

IX. UNSWORN STATEMENTS — HEARSAY.*

A. Rule Excluding Hearsay — 1. IN GENERAL — a. Rule Stated. Prominent among logical inferences which the law of evidence rejects is that a fact exists because a person not called as a witness has stated its existence.[21] Such an

21. It is essential to the application of the "hearsay" or other exclusionary rule of evidence that the fact offered should be relevant. It is not until that test is successfully passed that a question of rules applicable to evidence arises. An irrelevant fact is not evidence. For some consideration of the conditions of relevancy under the hearsay rule see infra, IX, A, 2.

is admitted without objection, the evidence is competent, although any inherent weakness still attaches.[27] In criminal cases hearsay evidence is inadmissible against a defendant unless he assents.[28]

b. Impossibility of Obtaining Other Evidence. However valuable in practice or logical in principle[29] would be the establishment of a well guarded rule that a relevant unsworn statement should be treated as secondary evidence of the fact asserted, and however inconsistent to consider it such, in case of declarations against interest, as to pedigree, and in other instances, and not treat it so wherever relevant, it is stated by the great weight of authority that, except in certain well established connections, the impossibility, practical or absolute, of procuring other evidence of the fact asserted by an absent declarant, does not modify the application of the rule respecting the inference.[30] Relevant declarations of third persons, objectionable as hearsay, are not rendered competent by the fact that such third persons have since died.[31] Nor are such declarations competent because

On the contrary official conduct may be competent, although its only probative force consists in the fact that it implies a declaration to a particular effect which would not be competent evidence of the fact asserted. c. Second-Hand Hearsay — (I) General Rule. As a corollary to rejection of the inference itself, a witness is not at liberty to testify to facts from knowledge derived from unsworn statements of others, in whole[38] or in part,[39] or from reputation in that community;[40] and testimony so founded should be excluded, although based on a written or even an official statement.[41] The rule applies to proof of the contents of a lost document.[42] Hearsay, although repeated by a party to the suit as such, continues to be merely hearsay.[43] Knowledge acquired in the line of official duty or employment[44] is not objectionable as based on hearsay.[45]

(II) Preliminary Proof. What proof that his evidence is not hearsay the proponent is called upon to make, as a preliminary to hearing it, is a matter in dispute. On the one hand, it has been held that, unless it affirmatively appears that evidence is hearsay, it is not to be excluded if of such a nature that it may be based on the personal knowledge of the witness;[46] the evidence is accordingly received, and is stricken out later, if discovered to have been based upon hearsay.[47] On the contrary it has been decided that no evidence should be received unless it shall first appear that the witness is prepared to testify from his own knowledge.[48]

(III) Memoranda to Refresh Memory of Witness. A witness cannot refresh his memory by reference to a memorandum containing statements which he does not know, or has not at some time known to be true.[49] The rule applies to statements based upon books of account,[50] even where the witness knows the general correctness with which the accounts are kept.[51] department of agriculture, may state what districts of Texas are infected with the cattle fever, although they have never visited those districts, the knowledge gained by them in the correspondence of the department and in the investigation of such diseases as to the places of their origin or prevalence not being properly hearsay. Hearsay quality of the witness' "knowledge" may sufficiently appear from the statement itself. Lamar v. Pearre, 90 Ga. 377, 17 S. E. 92. A person who can neither read nor write cannot testify to the contents of a lost instrument, as his evidence is necessarily hearsay. Russell v. Brosseau, 65 Cal. 605, 4 Pac. 643. A witness cannot state what he "found out" (Rosenthal v. Middlebrook, 63 Tex. 333) or "understood from some source" (Scales v. Desha, 16 Ala. 308). But the form of the answer must unequivocally show that the statement does rest on hearsay. It is not sufficient ground for exclusion that it may so rest (admission of the answer of a witness in a murder case, when asked to give his opinion as to the cause of a reddish stain on defendant's knife is not ground for reversal, because showing by its form — "We thought" — that another examined the knife with him).

(iv) Results of Examination. While a witness cannot testify to the existence of a fact of which he has no personal knowledge, he is not necessarily precluded from stating what certain unsworn statements show, and, assuming them to be correct, what they prove.[52]

(v) Verified Statements. Where a witness testifies that he has truly stated to a third person of his own knowledge a fact which he has since forgotten, he thereby renders competent the testimony of that party as to what the forgotten statement actually was.[53]

2. Evidence Must Be Relevant — a. Rule Stated. A feeling runs through many decisions on the subject of unsworn statements when used as evidence of the facts asserted that, since such statements, when so used, are frequently rejected under the "rule against hearsay" all unsworn statements are inadmissible because of the hearsay rule. In many, perhaps the greater number, of instances the unsworn statement is excluded because it has no logical connection with the case; in other words, because it is irrelevant. Nothing but confusion can arise from assigning hearsay, character, opinion, or res inter alios as specific ground for the rejection of irrelevant testimony. The rules so designated have a distinct value only as applied to evidence otherwise relevant. It perhaps suffices for the purposes of a particular case to say of an unsworn irrelevant statement that it is rejected "as hearsay." But no specific rule can be said to apply to an unsworn statement while the same thing can be said of a statement under oath; and the latter would be rejected if irrelevant. Any statement, sworn or unsworn, is relevant only when it fulfils two conditions: (1) Bears on the issue; and (2) is made by a trustworthy person. The first condition — that the statement should bear on the issue — may, as in case of admissions, involve application of the rules of procedure, or, as in most cases, require the use of the rules of reasoning. The second condition — of trustworthiness in the declarant — implies at least two general requirements: (1) That it shall have been made by a person possessing adequate knowledge of the subject-matter;[54] and (2) that the declarant should be so far free from bias, or other motive to misrepresent, as to lead to a reasonable inference that he is not, consciously or unconsciously, misstating the fact.[55] While the possibility of applying the test of cross-examination introduces, especially as to the second of these requirements, a certain relaxation in favor of the sworn statement, the essential conditions of sworn and unsworn statements are so far identical that it is only to unsworn statements which fulfil these conditions that the hearsay rule of exclusion applies, and by consequence it is only unsworn

Practical convenience.— Where evidence states the result of voluminous facts, or of an inspection of books and papers which cannot conveniently take place in court, the objection of hearsay does not apply. Masonic Mut. Ben. Soc. v. Lackland, 97 Mo. 137, 10 S. W. 895, 10 Am. St. Rep. 298.

53. Where, on the trial of an action in which the number of loads of hay delivered at a particular time was in issue, a witness had stated that he could not remember the number of loads, but that he knew at the time and had told plaintiff, evidence of plaintiff of the number that witness had at the time told him was admissible. Shear v. Van Dyke, 10 Hun (N. Y.) 528. For the application of this rule as related to proof of book entries and other documents see infra, XIV, B, 1.

Statements by an interpreter.— The course is the same in other cases where the testimony of two witnesses is necessary to a complete statement. For example where an interpreter swears that he truly translated certain evidence to a court stenographer; the stenographer may then swear that he has truly reproduced the statements made to him by the interpreter and such minutes may be read to refresh the stenographer's recollection. Com. v. Storti, 177 Mass. 339, 58 N. E. 1021. The interpreter is a necessary witness. Evidence of what was said in its translated form, standing alone, is based upon hearsay. b. Conditions of Relevancy — (I) Statement Must Bear on the Issue — (A) In General. Where it appears that the statement can have no bearing upon the existence of any disputed fact,[61] in the absence of additional facts, which are not furnished,[62] the declaration is rejected as irrelevant. The rule is the same in criminal cases; in the absence of evidence of conspiracy or other agency, statements or conversations by third persons, out of defendant's presence, and not otherwise connected with him, are irrelevant as evidence of the facts stated.[63]

(B) Confession or Admission of Third Person. Confessions or criminal admissions by a third person are irrelevant on the issue as to whether the party on trial committed the crime to which such confessions or admissions refer,[64] in the absence of conspiracy,[65] or other established relation of agency; and the same rule applies to statements[66] or other acts of the third person which tend to establish circumstantially the guilt of the latter.

(c) Connection With Party — (1) ADMISSIONS. Statements are frequently rejected as hearsay when the real ground is that the declaration has not been sufficiently connected with the party to affect him and is consequently irrelevant;[67] as where statements constituting so-called admissions by conduct[68] — bribing witnesses,[69] compounding crime,[70] or suppressing evidence[71] — are not sufficiently connected with the party to be affected by them to be relevant, or where a statement alleged to have been made in his presence is not shown to have been heard by him,[72] or to have been made in his presence at all.[73]

Irrelevant statement.—In an action against a railroad company for causing the death of a man, a switchman testified that it was the engineer's duty to inform him of any obstructions on the track, that he might hold the following train till the obstruction was removed. It was held that this witness might testify that the engineer told him there was a man killed, but that no statements of the engineer as to how he was killed established. The same is true where it is not satisfactorily established that the declarant occupied the relation of agent as interpreter,[84] or servant.[85]

(3) PRIVITY. The statements of one not satisfactorily shown to have been in privity with a party are irrelevant when offered against him as declarations of a privy.[86]

(II) DECLARANT MUST BE TRUSTWORTHY — (A) Adequate Knowledge. If the statement, when offered in evidence, is found to possess no probative quality, because the declarant was unable to state the truth of the matter from lack of sufficient opportunities for acquiring knowledge, it should be rejected.[87]

(B) Lack of Motive to Misrepresent — (1) IN GENERAL. An unsworn statement to be relevant should not have been made under the influence of bias[88] or self-interest,[89] or under the influence of a controversive spirit as having been made post litem motam.[90]

(2) SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS — (a) DECLARATIONS OF AN INDIVIDUAL. A party's own statements, oral or written,[91] a fortiori, those distinctly self-servor how he looked were admissible. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. State, 62 Md. 479, 50 Am. Rep. 233.

agent.[5] Accordingly the favorable, unsworn statements of one co-defendant[6] or copartner[7] for the other, of a guardian for his ward,[8] a principal for the surety,[9] or a husband for his wife or vice versa,[10] are rejected.

(c) Declarations of Employee. The favorable, unsworn statement of an employee is not evidence for his employer.[11]

(d) Declarations of Officer of Corporation. A corporation cannot as a party introduce as evidence the unsworn declaration in its favor of one of its officers.[12]

(e) Declarations of Privies. An owner of property cannot use as evidence in his favor the self-serving declarations of his predecessors in title,[13] although the declarations have been brought to the attention of the opposite party.[14]

3. Reasons For the Rule. The hearsay rule is founded upon two principal considerations: (1) Distrust of the jury; and (2) the inherent weakness of the evidence itself. Distrust of the ability of the jury to give proper weight to an unsworn, untested statement furnishes a controlling reason for the existence of this very characteristic rule of the English law of evidence.[15] Where this consideration is removed and the judge decides matters of fact[16] or matters of discre-

16. "It is not the province of this Court to consider whether such evidence is properly receivable in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Those Courts are constituted upon principles very different from those which regulate the Courts of common law. Where the judges are authorized to deal both with the facts and the law, a much larger discretion with respect to the reception of evidence may not unreasonably be allowed than in Courts of common law, where the evidence, if received by the judge, must necessarily be submitted entire to the jury. By the rules of evidence established in the Courts of law, circumstances of great moral weight are often excluded, from which much assistance might, in particular cases, be afforded, in coming to a just conclusion, but which are nevertheless withheld from the consideration of the jury upon general principles, lest they should produce an undue influence upon the minds of persons unaccustomed to consider the limitations and restrictions which legal views upon the subject would impose. This is matter of daily experience, and requires no illustration by examples." Wright v. Doe, 7 A. & E. 313, 2 N. & P. 305, 34 E. C. L. 178, per Bosanquet, J. "In Scotland, and most of the Continental

tion,[17] the stringency of the rule is much relaxed, although the evidence is no more admissible at preliminary than on final hearings,[18] and where there is a jury the admission of hearsay is none the less objectionable because the questions eliciting it were asked by the judge.[19] The natural danger that a jury will overestimate the effect of a reported statement is intensified by the inherent weakness of the evidence itself; weakness inhering in the facts that the statement has not been subjected to the tests of an oath and of cross-examination.[20] It has been assumed that only a well-trained mind can give it any, without giving it undue, weight.[21]

4. "BEST EVIDENCE RULE." Where the conditions of relevancy[22] exist, and the evidence of the declarant is rendered unattainable by death or equivalent disability, and no other evidence is attainable, a case of hardship is presented by the strict operation of the hearsay rule, which has resulted not only in the establishment of certain recognized exceptions, as declarations as to pedigree, in course of business, etc.,[23] but in an effort to extend the "best evidence rule," in its broad application, to unsworn statements. In the modern law of evidence this "best evidence rule"[24] is not only a rule regulating the receipt of secondary evidence of the contents of certain written instruments, but also a general principle of administration recognized or employed by the courts in handling all the rules of evidence, especially within the realm of judicial discretion. In this latter aspect the principle as usually stated — the best evidence of which the case admits should be given — may operate either, as (1) a rule of requirement, or (2) a rule of indulgence. In other words, the principle, generally applied, not only requires that the best evidence should be offered, but that, when offered, it should be deemed sufficient. As a rule of requirement, the "best evidence" principle, where the declarant is alive and accessible,[25] or the fact to be shown is one which is in its nature susceptible of being proved by witnesses who can speak

States, the Judges determine upon the facts in dispute as well as upon the law; and they think there is no danger in their listening to evidence of hearsay, because when they come to consider their judgment on the merits of the case, they can trust themselves entirely to disregard the hearsay evidence, or to give it any little weight which it may seem to deserve. But in England, where the Jury are the sole judges of the fact, hearsay evidence is properly excluded, because no man can tell what effect it might have upon their minds." Berkeley's Case, 4 Campb. 401, 415, per Mansfield, C. J.

from their own knowledge,[26] evidently accords with the hearsay rules. On the other hand, considered as a rule of indulgence, where the declarant is dead or otherwise unavailable, and no further evidence of the fact can be had, the report of his statement would be the best evidence of the fact and be receivable as such. The state of the authorities indicates that in certain jurisdictions this principle of receiving secondary evidence where the primary cannot be obtained has been applied to the use of unsworn statements in other cases than the generally recognized exceptions above referred to. The testimony of the declarant in court as a witness is in these jurisdictions regarded as the primary evidence of the fact,[27] and it is held that, while primary evidence of the fact can be procured, the secondary evidence of unsworn statements should be rejected;[28] but that when the court is satisfied that the primary evidence is unattainable[29] because the declarant is dead[30] or out of the jurisdiction,[31] or is physically[32] or mentally incapacitated to testify, or could not have testified before,[33] secondary evidence of unsworn statements, more particularly in case of ancient facts,[34] or those of genealogy,[35] has been received as the best attainable.[36] It is difficult to detect any logical or administrative principle on which the exceptions to the hearsay rule could have been established that would not go so far as the guarded general rule announced in the foregoing cases.[37]

5. Forms of Hearsay — a. Composite Hearsay — (I) Reputation — (A) When Admissible. Like hearsay in other forms,[38] reputation furnishes a logical inference of the existence of a fact asserted only when the reputation is sufficiently probative to be relevant; and this logical inference is considered only when its use is not substitutionary, that is, when original and primary evidence to the same effect is not attainable.[39] Reputation is relevant when it arises in a community acquainted with the facts upon subjects in which the general community is interested, and concerning which it has no motive to misrepresent. Where these two conditions are fulfilled, reputation may be more probative than a mere unsworn statement. The fact that the statements on a matter of general interest have been so uniform, reiterated, and dominant against all counter statements as to create a general reputation throughout the community may well give rise to an

36. This is what is meant by saying that while hearsay as a general rule is not evidence, yet, when no better evidence can be supposed to exist, it is admitted. Gould v. Smith, 35 Me. 513.

37. "Now, it might well have been that our law, like the law of some other countries, should have admitted as evidence the declarations of persons who are dead in all cases where they were made under circumstances in which such evidence ought properly to have been admitted, that is, where the person who made them had no interest to the contrary, and where they were made before the commencement of the litigation. That is not, however, our law. As a rule the declarations, whether in writing or oral, made by deceased persons, are not admissible in evidence at all. But so inconvenient was the law upon this subject, so frequently has it shut out the only obtainable evidence, so frequently would it have caused a most crying and intolerable injustice, that a large number of exceptions have been made to the general rule. I will consider, first, what the exceptions are, and what is the principle which guides the Court in making exceptions. The exceptions are generally considered to be three principal and three subordinate exceptions. It does not matter in what order I take them. First, there is an exception of a declaration accompanying an act; secondly, of a declaration against interest; and, thirdly, of a declaration made by a person in the course of business, one which it was his duty to make. Those are three large exceptions. There are then some smaller exceptions; the first is the proof of matters of public and general interest, one might say of quasi-historical interest, not actually historical, where we admit the declarations of persons who may from their positions be fairly presumed to have had knowledge on the subject. In the next place, we admit evidence which is in its nature very weak indeed, that is in matters of pedigree, where we admit declarations of deceased members of a family, on its being shown that the persons were members of the family. Now I take it the principle which underlies all these exceptions is the same. In the first place, the case must be one in which it is difficult to obtain other evidence, for no doubt the ground for admitting the exceptions was that very difficulty. In the next place the declarant must be disinterested; that is, disinterested in the sense that the declaration was not made in favor of his interest. And, thirdly, the declaration must be made before dispute or litigation, so that it was made without bias on account of the existence of a dispute or litigation which the declarant might be supposed to favour. Lastly, and this appears to me one of the strongest reasons for admitting it, the declarant must have had peculiar means of knowledge not possessed in ordinary cases." Sugden v. St. Leonards, 1 P. D. 154, 240, 45 L. J. P. & Adm. 49, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 372, 24 Wkly. Rep. 860, per Jessel, M. R. See, however, supra, IX, A, 1, b.

38. It has been suggested, with some force, that reputation is not a form of hearsay but a fact in itself circumstantially relevant. Boone v. Purnell, 28 Md. 607, 626, 92 Am. Dec. 713. Fundamentally considered, the probative force of any statement, sworn or unsworn, probably consists in an inference that it would not have been made if it were not true. Classing reputation as a form of hearsay, when used as proof of facts asserted, seems in accordance with the entirely illogical importance which the English law of evidence attached to the administration of an oath.

and, in many jurisdictions of the United States, of private[56] boundaries, especially where the latter are of ancient origin,[57] or where the reputation has arisen among persons possessed of particularly accurate knowledge on the subject.[58] The general community is not only interested in its legal rights, but also in its moral standards, and matters affecting them, as the sobriety of its citizens,[59] or their moral qualities,[60] including truthfulness and veracity,[61] may be proved by reputation. The relation of certain public or quasi-public services is a matter of importance to the community. That a designated person discharges the duties of such an office or occupation of general concern[62] or of popular interest[63] may be shown by reputation. Facts of genealogy stand in a peculiar position as a matter of quasi-public concern.[64] While no better evidence is as a rule procurable, the extent to which such facts may fairly be regarded as of public interest is doubtful. In connection with those genealogical facts which are directly concerned with pedigree, the prevailing rule limits the persons who may be assumed to be interested in the matter to certain families, and provides that, while reputation in the general community is incompetent, reputation in the family itself is relevant.[65] Marriage has been treated as a matter of public interest, provable in part by general reputation.[66] In order to be admissible reputation must be current before a controversy has arisen on the point, that is, while the community is fairly disinterested.[67]

(B) When Not Admissible. Since the elements of relevancy and necessity are prerequisites to the admissibility of reputation as evidence of fact,[68] it follows that specific facts of limited general interest cannot be established in this way.[69] Among the facts which are within this rule are the habits or idiosyncrasies of

It is said that "this species of evidence being somewhat anomalous in its character, and standing on the ultima thule of competent testimony, is not highly favored by the courts, and the tendency is rather to restrict than to enlarge the right to receive it, or at least to require the evidence to be brought clearly within all the conditions requisite for its reception."[13]

b. Incidental Facts. Declarations against interest are not only received as evidence of the fact directly asserted, but of incidental facts fairly embraced within the scope of the declaration.[14]

2. Requisites For Relevancy — a. Adequate Knowledge. It is essential to relevancy in the declaration that the declarant should have adequate knowledge on the subject covered by his statement.[15] Hence, in case of a written statement,

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 1135 et seq.

Admissions distinguished.— A declaration against interest has been spoken of as an admission. There are, however, points of essential difference. The admission is a matter of procedure, is primary evidence of the fact stated, is competent only when the declarant or someone identified in legal interest is a party and need not have been, when made, considered by the declarant as being opposed to his interest. The declaration against interest is entirely a matter of evidence, is admissible only when the primary evidence is inaccessible, is competent in suits between third persons (Rand v. Dodge, 17 N. H. 343), or in favor of the party offering it (Currier v. Gale, 14 Gray (Mass.) 504, 77 Am. Dec. 343), or of one standing in privity to the declarant (Rand v. Dodge, supra; Turner v. Dewan, 41 U. C. Q. B. 361), and must have been, when made, to the knowledge of the declarant, against his obvious and real interest. Admissions by contract have been treated as within this rule where the declarant has deceased. Rand v. Dodge, 17 N. H. 343.

In a criminal case the declarations against interest of an owner of property do not affect the prosecution. Com. v. Sanders, 14 Gray (Mass.) 394, 77 Am. Dec. 335, embezzlement.

Res gestæ distinguished.— A declaration against interest need not accompany or explain a relevant act, although its probative weight will be increased where such happens to be the case. White v. Choteau, 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 493; Ivat v. Finch, 1 Taunt. 141, 9 Rev. Rep. 716.

Such declarations are not conclusive against the party making them, but may be explained (Phipps v. Martin, 33 Ark. 207; Raymond v. Cummings, 17 N. Brunsw. 544), and are even said to have but slight weight as against documentary evidence (Pargoud v. Amberson, 10 La. 352).

its mere production from the custody of an alleged declarant is not sufficient; it must be shown that the declarant actually made the statement.[16]

b. Absence of Motive to Misrepresent — (I) In General. In the average declaration against proprietary or pecuniary interest there is not only no motive to misrepresent,[17] but a strong guaranty of truth is furnished.[18] It has been held that the declaration need not be made ante litem motam.[19]

(II) Nature of Adverse Interest — (A) Pecuniary Interest. Where the declarant had adequate knowledge of the facts stated, and primary evidence cannot be procured, the declaration is admissible if made against his pecuniary interest;[20] as by acknowledgment of his indebtedness to others,[21] or that nothing is due him on a particular account;[22] by concession of the receipt[23] or misappropriation[24] of money, or of the fact that he is liable for an increased share of a common obligation,[25] or is individually liable for the whole claim.[26] and direct as presumably to have been present in his mind at the time of the declaration.[46] A declaration which would be against interest only in certain remote and improbable contingencies[47] is not competent.

(E) Real Interest Regarded. A declaration prima facie against the interest of the declarant when made does not become incompetent, although it should appear that the declaration was in reality beneficial to him.[48] It may appear, however, that a declaration, although in part against an obvious interest of the declarant, was, when made, beneficial to him to a still greater extent. Thus declarations of a husband against his proprietary interest may be in favor of his wife and designed to secure an advantage to her at the expense of his creditors,[49] or the receipt of a sum of money may be the basis of a claim to a much larger amount, either directly,[50] or by reviving a liability barred by a statute of limitations.[51] In such a case if the portion ostensibly against interest can be separated from the self-serving portion, the latter is rejected.[52] If it cannot be so separated, the entire declaration must be rejected.[53]

(F) Interest Other Than Pecuniary or Proprietary. An unsworn statement of a third person is not admissible merely because it appears to have been against the interest of the declarant by subjecting him to a successful civil suit[54] or criminal prosecution.[55]

3. Primary Evidence Unattainable. Evidence of the unsworn statement must

When oral declarations inadmissible.— There is no general distinction in admissibility between oral and written declarations against interest. Reg. v. Birmingham Parish, 1 B. & S. 763, 8 Jur. N. S. 37, 31 L. J. M. C. 63, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 309, 10 Wkly. Rep. 41, 101 E. C. L. 763; Bewley v. Atkinson, 13 Ch. D. 283, 49 L. J. Ch. 153, 41 L. T. Rep. N. S. 603, 28 Wkly. Rep. 638; Ganton v. Size, 22 U. C. Q. B. 473, 2 Grant Err. & App. (U. C.) 368. But where a rule of substantive law requires a written instrument to effect a particular legal result, an oral declaration against interest is said to be inadmissible for the purpose. For example, declarations by a decedent that he had sold certain lands, no deed being produced or accounted for, are insufficient to prove a conveyance by him of such lands. Marsh v. Ne-ha-sa-ne Park Assoc., 18 Misc. (N. Y.) 314, 42 N. Y. Suppl. 996. In Massachusetts declarations against pecuniary interest must be in writing. Jones v. Howard, 3 may be in writing.[63] Thus admissible declarations against interest may appear in accounts,[64] deeds,[65] memoranda,[66] receipts,[67] and the like.

C. Declarations as to Pedigree — 1. In General — a. Rule Stated. An unsworn statement[68] concerning matters of genealogy[69] may, if relevant,[70] furnish, upon an issue of pedigree,[71] a probative inference of the truth of the facts directly[72]

An erroneous tendency.— Owing largely to a careless statement in the first edition of Greenleaf Ev. § 104 (corrected in the second edition of 1844), the courts of this country have acquired a tendency to admit hearsay evidence of any facts of family history without regard to the nature of the inquiry in which this evidence is offered. or incidentally and inferentially[73] asserted; and in the necessary absence of evidence of a higher grade,[74] the statement is admissible[75] and may be testified to by any one who heard it.[76] The evidence is admitted on account of the necessity of the case,[77] and will not be received, it is said, when other evidence of the fact is attainable.[78] The statement moreover must purport to be one of fact; the existence of an opinion, however general among members of a family, is not competent.[79]

b. Incidental or Inferential Facts. On an inquiry as to pedigree the admissible unsworn statement is evidence not only of facts directly asserted by it,[80] but of such relevant facts as may be incidentally[81] or inferentially[82] stated; as the dates[83]

"This exception [pedigree] has been recognized on the ground of necessity; for, as in inquiries respecting relationship or descent, facts must often be proved which occurred many years before the trial, and were known to but few persons, it is obvious that the strict enforcement in such cases of the rules against hearsay evidence would frequently occasion a failure of justice." Dec. 323, where it was held that the declarations of deceased members of the family are primary evidence on questions of pedigree turning on a question of marriage, and that they are not admitted as evidence in its nature secondary, but taken because it is the best attainable. The necessity arises from the essentially perishable nature of the probative facts and the very limited number of persons who can be assumed to have either interest in or knowledge of facts of such slight general importance and of a nature at once so exact and so trivial; and the evidence has been rejected where the facts are not ancient. Source of information required.— Accordingly a third person who testifies from information furnished by a member of the family must disclose the source of his knowledge. Nunn v. Mayes, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 366, 30 S. W. 479.

28. McCarty v. Hodges, 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 433. The reliance placed upon this kind of evidence depends upon the circumstances attending the declarations as well as knowledge as to facts of pedigree, and so to receive the declarations of family physicians,[29] intimate friends,[30] persons living in the family,[31] or servants[32] and other persons having adequate knowledge of facts of family genealogy or opportunities for acquiring it,[33] the rule is now settled that, both in cases of reputation[34] and of direct statements, the only competent declarants are those related to the family;[35] and that consequently the declarations as to pedigree made by intimate friends,[36] neighbors,[37] or even by persons living in the family,[38] or by servants,[39] however trustworthy[40] or long employed in the family,[41] are incompetent.

b. Absence of Motive to Misrepresent. A second condition of relevancy is that the declarant should be disinterested[42] to the extent of having no motive which can fairly be assumed to be such as would induce him to state the fact otherwise than as he understood it.[43] The statement therefore must be shown to have been made ante litem motam;[44] a fortiori, before commencement of a suit involving the issue to which the declaration relates.[45] It is not material, however, that a controversy has arisen regarding a cognate matter,[46] unless indeed it clearly foreshadows one on the precise subject-matter of the declaration;[47] that a controversy, since entirely abated, once existed;[48] or that a state of affairs is known to exist out of which a controversy may at any time arise.[49] On the other hand the declaration is inadmissible if a controversy in fact exists, although the declarant be ignorant of it,[50] or it has not reached the stage of litigation.[51] A declaration made expressly with a view to a probable future contest is admissible quantum valeat;[52] but declarations made in the process of collecting evidence to substantiate the claim involved in a subsequent lis are incompetent.[53]

of composite as in that of direct statements hereinbefore considered.[60] First, the declarant must have possessed adequate knowledge. Not only is the reputation confined to those whose declarations would be competent in the event of their decease,[61] but the reporting witness must be a member of the family by birth or marriage.[62] Neighbors,[63] and a fortiori the community at large,[64] are not competent witnesses as to the existence of a reputation. Secondly, the reputation must have arisen among disinterested persons. Consequently reputation is competent only as it existed ante litem motam.[65] But the rule in case of direct statements that the declarant must be dead[66] does not apply to composite statements.[67] Relationship to the family may be established by testimony of the witness himself.[68]

69. "It will be observed that some of the authorities speak of repute, reputation and tradition, as convertible terms when applied to cases of pedigree. Now tradition is knowledge, belief or practices, transmitted orally from father to son, or from ancestors to posterity. When these authorities speak of repute, reputation or tradition in matters of pedigree, we think they mean such declarations and statements respecting the pedigree as have come down from generation to generation from deceased relatives in such a way that even though it cannot be said or determined which of the deceased relatives originally made them, or was personally cognizant of the facts therein stated, yet it appears that such declarations and statements were made as family history, ante litem motam, by a deceased person connected by blood or marriage with the person whose pedigree is to be established." In re Hurlburt, 68 Vt. 366, 377, 35 Atl. 77, 35 L. reputation,[71] and is admissible to prove the same facts of genealogy [72] — as death,[73] marriage,[74] or relationship [75] — or any inquiry of pedigree. It has been held that evidence of tradition in the family is inadmissible unless the members of the family among whom it arose are dead,[76] but that it will not be entirely rejected because shown to be in part erroneous,[77] or should the declarant appear to have had but little personal knowledge.[78] Tradition may be proved by evidence of persons not members of the family;[79] but the essential element of relevancy can be established only by evidence that the tradition arose among persons presumably of adequate knowledge and without interest to misrepresent.[80]

b. Oral Statements. A declaration regarding pedigree may be oral,[81] and in that form is equally competent with written evidence on the same point,[82] even if the latter is a family bible.[83]

2. Subjects Covered by the Rule. Among subjects of sufficient public interest to admit evidence of declarations concerning them[9] are boundaries of public corporations,[10] including those of territories,[11] counties,[12] or towns;[13] common and manorial rights;[14] the incorporation of municipalities as counties or towns;[15] and the location of highways,[16] town ways or streets,[17] or of large navigable watercourses.[18]

4. Private Boundaries. The admissibility of unsworn statements regarding the location of private boundaries and their incidental landmarks involves several lines of decisions easily confused,[23] and is further complicated with a direct con-

"If the fact to be proved is a particular date, though connected incidentally with a public matter, it is easy to see that it could not stand out as a salient fact for contemporaneous criticism and discussion so as to furnish any guaranty for its correctness; so that the general rule excluding hearsay evidence applies in full force. The human memory is proverbially treacherous even in regard to very recent dates, and little reliance can be placed on the sworn testimony of living witnesses in such matters, unless they are able to associate the date given with some more striking fact." Private boundaries.— The exclusion of incidental facts has been held not to apply to declarations concerning a private boundary. In jurisdictions where such declarations are received the fact (Hamilton v. Menor, 2 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 70) and date (Murray v. Spencer, 88 N. C. 357) of making a survey may be proved in this way. On the other hand it has been held that what streams a boundary line crosses (Smith v. Chapman, 10 Gratt. (Va.) 445), the location of a stream, claimed as a boundary (Taylor v. Glenn, 29 S. C. 292, 7 S. E. 483, 12 Am. St. Rep. 724), or that no conflict exists between the lines of two surveys (Moore v. Davis, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 540), cannot be shown by an unsworn statement.

A numerous class of unsworn declarations as to private boundaries — those made by a declarant in possession of property and defining the nature of the claim under which such possession is being held[24] are not under the rule, but are relevant circumstantial evidence, admissible under general rules. Even where the declarations are not made by persons in possession of the premises and indicative of their claim, it is agreed that in certain contingencies of limited frequency of occurrence, as where the private boundaries are ancient,[25] or coincide with public boundaries,[26] the declarations are competent. In other cases, as proof of the facts asserted, unsworn declarations of third persons are not admitted in England,[27] Canada,[28] or in some jurisdictions in the United States,[29] to show the location of a private boundary or the landmarks which determine it. 5. Requirements For Relevancy — a. Adequate Knowledge. It has been held that in regard to matters of public and general interest, any member of the community affected will be assumed to have adequate knowledge so as to qualify him as a declarant;[33] and on the other hand that even as to such matters actual knowledge must be shown.[34] As to matters of quasi-public interest, such as the location of private boundaries,[35] their landmarks,[36] or particular facts connected there-

In California "the declaration itself presupposes such knowledge or information, for how could he say where a boundary was, unless he did have personal knowledge or the means of arriving at the fact declared? "The most dangerous exception ingrafted upon the rule [excluding hearsay] is that which admits the declarations of a party or an agent uttered at the time of the principal transaction, and therefore taken to be a part of it, because it is supposed to be illustrative and evidence of the principal fact which is the subject of the inquiry. It probably had its origin in the trouble sometimes experienced in criminal cases to identify the perpetrator of a crime. The desire of the courts to prevent what would be an evident miscarriage of justice gradually led to the extension of the rule to civil controversies; and it is possibly as well settled as any of the rules of evidence that the declaration of a party, made at the time of an act which may be given in evidence, if it be calculated to explain, qualify, or characterize the act itself, and is so connected with it that it may be taken as a part of one and the same transaction, and is in no sense a narrative of something which has passed, may be proven as a part of the res gestæ." Equitable Mut. Acc. Assoc. v. McCluskey, 1 Colo. App. 473, 29 Pac. 383, 384, per Bissell, J.

that of a primary fact admissible in and of itself, part of the res gestæ; and accompanying it, a declaration which so explains, characterizes, illustrates, and, as it were, completes the admissible fact as to be necessary to its full understanding.[64] Admissibility of the statement, if itself relevant, is therefore dependent[65] upon the admissibility of the fact of which it forms part.[66] In dealing with declarations of this kind the guaranty for truth is found in such a correlation between the statement and the fact of which it forms part as strongly tends to negative the suggestion of fabrication or invention;[67] and the rule admitting the evidence under such circumstances meets the needs of justice when other evidence of the same fact cannot be procured.[68]

64. "This is the principle, it is believed, that is involved in the somewhat obscure doctrine of res gestæ, which is often resorted to, apparently, more on account of its convenient indefiniteness than for its scientific precision." Murray v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 72 N. H. 32, 34, 54 Atl. 289, 61 L. R. A. 495, per Walker, J. See also Shannon v. Castner, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 294.

65. Independent relevancy distinguished.— The use of a single phrase, "declarations part of the res gestæ," has made it easy to confuse declarations independently relevant (see supra, VIII, A, 2) with those whose admissibility is dependent upon constituting part of an admissible fact. The confusion is made easier by the fact that the two sets of declarations present certain common features. (1) Declarations independently relevant may, like those dependently admissible, accompany, explain and characterize the doing of a relevant act. (2) Both may, under practically the same conditions, be competent, although self-serving to the declarant. (3) In many jurisdictions, either set of declarations continues to be competent, although made subsequent to the fact or event to which they relate, if such prior fact or event may fairly be supposed to dominate the mind of the declarant to an extent which makes the declaration relevant. (4) A merely narrative statement of a past transaction is excluded in either connection. These aspects of similarity do not, however, conceal certain essential differences. (1) Independently relevant statements are evidentiary, per se; those dependently admissible are not. (2) Statements independently relevant may, within the limits prescribed by judicial discretion in the matter of remoteness, precede, accompany, or follow the happening of a principal event or the existence of a connotated fact or mental state at a particular time. Declarations part of a fact in the res gestæ, properly so called, must accompany the fact of which they are part, the controlling mental effect of a fact being regarded, by certain courts, as an extension of time in this particular. (3) Statements dependently admissible are evidence of the facts asserted. Independently relevant statements dentiary, per se; those dependently admissible can properly be part only of a primary fact, i. e., of a fact from which, either singly or in connection with others, the right or liability directly arises. A statement independently relevant may have been made at any time at which its existence is relevant, in any degree, to the existence of such right or liability. See supra, VIII, A, 2.

"This view of the common experience of mankind shows that, if the declaration has that character, it possesses an important element of reliability and significance which is foreign to narrative remarks made so long after the event as to derive directly no probative force from it, and that it should be admitted like any other material fact or evidentiary detail." Murray v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 72 N. H. 32, 38, 54 Atl. 289, 61 L. R. A. 495, per Walker, J. "The plural phrase [res gestæ] has certainly contributed to a mistaken impression that hearsay is always admissible if only it be evidential without requiring trust in the credit of the declarant." Thayer Cas Ev. 630. See also Murray v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 72 N. H. 32, 54 Atl. 289, 61 L. R. A. 495. The modern tendency is, it has been said, toward extending the application of this rule. Murray v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 72 N. H. 32, 34, 54 Atl. 289, 61 L. R. A. 495, where Walker, J., said: "Its development has been promoted, in modern times, by an effort to afford the triers of fact all reasonable means of ascertaining the truth, instead of withholding from them all information possible by the rigid application of certain rules of

2. Requisites of Admissibility — a. Fact Must Be Admissible — (I) In General. The fact embodying the declaration must be admissible in order to make the latter admissible as part of the res gestæ.[69]

(II) Fact Must Be Primary. As hereinbefore stated,[70] the original and proper scope of the res gestæ is the primary occurrence or other fact from the existence of which the right or liability involved in the judicial inquiry directly arises.[71] Under such a limitation, preliminary, subsequent, or subordinate facts, which tend to render the existence of primary facts probable or improbable, are rejected; the declarations being confined to the period during which acts are done or occurrences take place upon which the right or liability in question rests.[72]

(III) Relaxation of Rule. The broad extension of the scope of the res gestæ in case of declarations independently relevant[73] to the border lines of relevancy[74] has led to a similar extension as to declarations dependently relevant. In the practice and even in the decisions[75] of many courts a declaration is admissible, other conditions being fulfilled, if the fact itself is relevant to an issue in the

A definition affirming facts, so far as relates to criminal cases, given by Chief Justice Cockburn in a pamphlet which appeared in course of a controversy as to the propriety of his rule in Reg. v. Bedingfield, 14 Cox C. C. 341, is as follows: "Whatever act, or series of acts, constitute, or in point of time immediately accompany and terminate in, the principal act charged as an offence against the accused, from its inception to its consummation or final completion, or its prevention or abandonment,— whether on the part of the agent or wrong-doer, in order to its performance, or on that of the patient or party wronged, in order to its prevention,— and whatever may be said by either of the parties during the continuance of the transaction, with reference to it, including herein what may be said by the suffering party, though in the absence of the accused, during the continuance of the action of the latter, actual or constructive,— as, e. g., in the case of flight or applications for assistance,— form part of the principal transaction, and may be given in evidence as part of the res gestæ, or particulars of it; while, on the other hand, statements made by the complaining party, after all action on the part of the wrong-doer, actual or constructive, has ceased, through the completion of the principal act or other determination of it by its prevention or its abandonment by the wrong-doer,— such as, e. g., statements made with a view to the apprehension of the offender,— do not form part of the res gestæ, and should be excluded." case, whether it precedes[76] or follows the doing of the principal acts or the happening of the important events, even though, as in case of the appearance of an injured person,[77] his condition,[78] or the presence "of all the surrounding physical facts connected with" the transaction,[79] no idea of action or of the progress of events is necessarily implied. Thus, statements by one accused of crime, made at the time of his detection or arrest,[80] or while endeavoring to escape with the fruits of a crime,[81] and statements of what an assaulted person says while seeking to escape injury,[82] procure assistance,[83] or punish the offender[84] are part of the res gestæ. The period over which such facts may legitimately extend is a question of remoteness, that is, of logical relevancy, and varies with the facts of the particular case.[85] In other instances a further extended range of facts seems to have been deemed necessary. Thus, where the criminal use of poison is in question, any statements of the sufferer, after taking the drug, relating to its administration or operation have been admitted as part of the res gestæ.[86]

"Of the nature of res gestæ," which the condition of an injured person is said to be (Com. v. McPike, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 181, 50 Am. S.) 397, 19 L. ed. 437), a strongly formative marked effect in producing the present chaotic state of the law upon this subject.

Admissible declarations.— Where prosecuting witness in a trial for larceny testified that when defendant pulled his hand out of witness' pocket he grabbed him, and, on seeing him pass something to a co-defendant, grabbed him also, and shouted to a friend, "They are robbing me," such statement was a part of the res gestæ, and hence admissible. The theory of the prosecution being that defendant decoyed deceased into the woods to kill and rob him, and certain merchandise such as deceased was peddling being found in defendant's trunk after his arrest, evidence that defendant stated several days before the homicide that he bought similar articles of a peddler is not part of the res gestæ, and is inadmissible. Kahlenbeck v. State, 119 Ind. 118, 21 N. E. 460. Where letters offered in evidence are the declarations of third per-tent as one made after[91] the fact which it explains. In few cases, however, can the doing of an act and the making of the statement be precisely synchronous. Part of the essential difficulty of the subject lies in the fact that almost invariably an interval, however slight, must elapse between the act and the declaration.[92] The question of admissibility is thus placed largely within the judicial discretion, even in courts which do not treat spontaneity as the sole test.

d. Spontaneity as a Substitute For Other Requisites — (i) The Extended Doctrine. Consistently and concurrently with the extension of the scope of the res gestæ beyond the primary facts, to be coextensive with the relevant facts in a particular case,[93] a broad and almost unrecognizable doctrine of dependent relevancy has arisen, substituting spontaneity for other requisites of admissibility. The rule, as announced in many American jurisdictions, is to the effect that an unsworn statement is evidence of what it asserts, although it constitutes part of no particular fact in the res gestæ, however defined, provided it is so connected with the transaction as a whole that the utterance, in the opinion of the court, may be regarded as an expression of feeling forced instinctively from the declarant by pressure of the circumstances under which it is made, rather than be deemed the narrative result of thought.[94] Contemporaneousness is no longer required. Thus, fear of an impending peril may compel an utterance which, in this sense, precedes the relevant fact;[95] the declaration may accompany or be contemporaneous with the act, condition, or other fact which forces it from the speaker;[96] or, on the sons, written long prior to the controversy upon which the action is founded, they are not part of the res gestæ, and are properly excluded. Frank v. Brewer, 4 Silv. Supreme (N. Y.) 155, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 182.

ative with courts in establishing the rule under consideration, is that such an unsworn statement is not really within the hearsay rule, because its credibility does not rest in any considerable degree upon the credit of the declarant. It logically follows, on the same line of relevancy, that it is not necessary that the declarant should have been competent as a witness.[99] It is proceeding in a circle to use the declarations as proof of facts necessary to constitute the declarations part of the res gestæ.[1]

(II) Discretion of Court—(A) In General. The question of spontaneity, being one preliminary to reception of the declaration, is necessarily confided to the discretion of the presiding judge, the burden being upon the proponent of the evidence to show that a statement made after an occurrence and concerning it was in fact spontaneous.[2] If under the circumstances a sufficient opportunity for the invention or fabrication of a story was afforded, it will be assumed that the opportunity was utilized, and the statement will be rejected.[3] Should the proponent fail to discharge the burden of proving spontaneity, the statement is designated as narrative, and deemed mere hearsay.[4] A further and indeed logically inevitable step has been taken by courts which declare that no precise rule can be formulated on the subject; that each case stands upon its own footing, and that an unsworn statement is to be admitted or rejected, "in the sound

Confessions and dying declarations.— The spontaneous nature of declarations admitted as part of the res gestæ denies them the weight attaching to a deliberate confession of guilt (Allen v. State, 60 Ala. 19; Head v. State, 44 Miss. 731), and rules applicable to confessions do not apply to them; for example, the declarant need not have been warned that what he says will be taken against him (Miller v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. 609, 21 S. W. 925, 37 Am. St. Rep. 836). Although declarations regarded as part of the res gestæ because spontaneous may be made when the declarant is dying, a sense of impending death is not essential to admissibility, as in the case of "dying declarations" properly so called (Brownell v. Pacific R. Co., 47 Mo. 239); and, on the other hand, if the declaration is not spontaneous, it is not admissible in a civil suit because made under the solemn sanction of consciously approaching death (Waldele v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 19 Hun (N. Y.) 69). As to confessions see, generally, Criminal Law, 12 Cyc. 459. As to dying declarations see, generally, Homicide.

No privilege attaches to such statements by reason of the relation of husband and wife. State v. Middleham, 62 Iowa 150, 17 N. W. 446.

In a recent New Hampshire case the pregnant suggestion is made that as evidence of an injured man's position when found shortly after an accident may be shown, notwithstanding the fact that it might have been voluntarily assumed by him to his supposed advantage, no reason exists why a statement made at the same time should be rejected because a sufficient period of time has elapsed to allow the invention of a self-serving statement. Murray v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 72 N. H. 32, 54 Atl. 289, 61 L. R. A. 495. Logically, the position is impregnable and undoubtedly indicates the growth of legal ideas in this direction. The salient characteristic of the present law of evidence in distinguishing between unsworn statements as proof of facts and all other proof of facts is not a logical one and has been broken into in a hopelessly inconsistent way.

discretion of the court."[5] This discretion is further invoked in many cases when the scope of the res gestæ is extended beyond the primary facts.[6] Relevancy under such circumstances is largely a question of remoteness, in the determination of which discretion plays an important part.[7] It has not escaped notice that such a rule places the rights of the parties, as to the use of hearsay, in one of its most dangerous forms, largely on the decision of a preliminary question of fact which it is difficult, if not practically impossible, to review. The propriety, as a matter of principle, of treating the admissibility of testimony upon which in many instances the decision of the case may and indeed frequently does turn, as a matter of discretion, has been earnestly controverted.[8]

(B) Elements For Consideration — (1) TIME ELAPSED. Spontaneity, as presented in actual cases, is a function of so many variables, that no single element necessarily exerts a controlling influence. While it is obvious that a declaration is usually spontaneous in proportion as it is near, in point of time, to the fact which compels its automatic expression, the inference of the circumstance of nearness in time may in any given case be offset and indeed nullified by the presence of other and in that particular case more controlling considerations. No more general rule can be laid down than that, other things being equal, the shorter the interval of elapsed time, the greater the probability that the declaration is spontaneous.[9] The element of time has therefore no controlling effect.[10] Thus, where the declaration is shown to have been made "immediately after" the fact which calls it forth, the evidence has been rejected[11] in almost as large a proportion of cases as those in which it has been received.[12] On the other hand,

It has on the contrary been held, under statutory provisions (Mont. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3126, 3146) that the question as to whether a declaration is part of the res gestæ is for the jury. 32. "The seriousness of the injury, the character of the accident, and the surrounding physical circumstances and results of the statement is such as to raise an inference that the effect of an occurrence continues, for example, if he is suffering severe pain,[33] or is under intense excitement,[34] the statement will, other conditions existing, be deemed spontaneous.

(3) NATURE OF STATEMENT. Light may be thrown on the issue of spontaneity by the form of the statement itself. Intrinsic marks of premeditation may appear in a long, coherent, closely connected story,[35] which would be entirely lacking in brief, explosive, incoherent exclamations characteristic of spontaneity. Circumstances in any particular case may indicate the same premeditation; as where a declarant, before speaking, inquires how the bystanders will testify.[36] For like reasons a statement has been rejected when elicited by a question,[37] or when occurrence, attending the declaration as well as the principal fact, are necessary matters for consideration in the determination of the question of the admissibility of the declaration." Cool demeanor is naturally a circumstance of suspicion (Brown v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1898) 44 S. made in a whisper,[38] or contained in a letter.[39] So a statement against the apparent interest of the declarant would readily be received,[40] while a self-serving declaration,[41] or one on behalf of a fellow conspirator,[42] would be carefully scrutinized.

(4) Influence of Intervening Occurrences. A consideration of prime importance, even in case of occurrences calculated to exert a controlling and, within the period under consideration, permanent effect on the mind of the declarant, is the presence or absence of intervening sensations presented to his mind which may divert it from the influence of the past occurrence and so assist in restoring the mental balance and the use of the temporarily dormant faculty of self-interested thought.[43] A condition of severe bodily injury, unmitigated by medical or other attendance,[44] makes it probable that a statement, made while this

Running away from an assailant is not deemed a distracting circumstance, under this rule. Berry v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 395, 72 S. W. 170; Bejarano v. State, 6 Tex. App. 265. Under the definition of res gestæ given by Cockburn, C. J. (Am. L. Rev. 822; quoted supra, IX, E, 2, a, (II)) it would probably be immaterial whether the assailant were actually pursuing or not, if the fleeing person understood that he was doing so.

The test of admissibility is not removal, but the inference of the recovery of mental balance through the distracting influence of new sensations. Carrying an unconscious or intensely suffering person to another locality would not give rise to the natural inference of lack of spontaneity. State v. Martin, 124 Mo. 514, 28 S. W. 12. case of declarations part of a fact in the res gestæ.[53] Consequently, whether spontaneity be adopted as the sole test of admissibility or not, it is clearly within the mischief against which the hearsay rule was intended to provide. A "suspicion of after thought" prevents the use of a narrative as part of the res gestæ.[54]

b. Admissions — (1) In General. The relevant statement of a party, being competent by the rules of procedure,[55] is not within the hearsay rule and by consequence is competent as an admission in either a civil[56] or a criminal[57] case; although the statement, not being spontaneous and relating to a past transaction, would, if offered in the declarant's favor or for a third person, be rejected as narrative. The rule is the same as to so-called "admissions by conduct"; that is, in case of statements made in the presence and hearing of a party, coupled with evidence of silence or other relevant conduct on his part.[58] Such statements when admitted are spoken of as "part of the res gestæ," [59] although this is evidently a misapplication of the phrase. Conversely a narrative statement is said not to be part of the res gestæ, when the real ground of decision is that it is not competent as an admission; [60] as where a plaintiff, suing in his own right, is not affected by the statements of the person for whose death or injury [61] the action is brought.

(II) AGENTS. Spontaneous declarations of an agent,[62] or such declarations as are properly part of a fact in the res gestæ, present no peculiarity in the law of evidence. The representative nature of the declarant's position does not affect the admissibility of his statements. These have the same probative value, for or against his principal, as those of any other observer with equal knowledge and the same interest would have. In dealing, however, with narrative statements by agents, a double ambiguity in the use of the phrase "res gestæ" demands notice. (1) As the relevant statements of an agent, within the scope of his employment and while bona fide engaged in carrying it out, affect the principal,[63] his narrative [64] statements are competent as admissions of the principal and when admitted these are said, for the reasons hereinbefore stated,[65] to be part of the res gestæ. (2) The business of the principal, in doing which alone can the agent's statements, narrative or otherwise, affect the former, is also spoken of as "res gestæ." It follows that since as a rule the duties of an agent call upon him to do something rather than talk about it after it is done, it frequently happens that an agent's narrative declaration is rejected as "not part of the res gestæ,"[66] when the actual ground of rejection is that the declaration was not made in the line of the agent's duty to the principal; and so is not to be received as his admission. This line of ambiguous thought occurs with special frequency in cases of actions against railroad companies,[67] for example, to recover damages for personal or other injuries to evade an approaching train, the engineer's statements shortly after the accident that he would have killed such person had he not applied the air is admissible as part of the res gestæ. International, etc., R. Co. v. Bryant, (Tex. Civ. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 364.

X. CHARACTER AND REPUTATION.*

A. Definitions. "Character" and "reputation" are terms used at times interchangeably.[70] As used here, "character" denotes a particular collection of actual moral qualities or traits pertaining to and distinguishing from others an individual man or animal.[71] "Reputation" indicates that portion of reputation as a whole which consists of a current, popular impression as to the existence of such qualities in some relevant particular.[72] In other words reputation as to character is alone specifically treated in this connection.[73]

B. Evidence of Character — 1. Civil Cases — a. Rule Stated. That a person did or did not do a certain act because his character would predispose him to do or not to do it is an inference which, although sometimes logically probative,[74] the English law of evidence, with some exceptions,[75] absolutely rejects, in civil cases.[76]

70. Character and reputation are frequently confused, in a perplexing way. It is, for example, said by a tribunal of such high standing as the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts in Peterson v. Morgan, 116 Mass. 350, 352, that: "Proof of false rumors alone must of necessity be by hearsay evidence in its most objectionable form." Yet it seems clear that the evidence of rumor is hearsay so far as relates to proof of some trait of actual character. It may be competent in mitigation of damages as circumstantial evidence of impairment of reputation. See infra, X, B, 1, d. The reasons for this confusing of character and reputation are apparently two: (1) In defending under a plea of the truth of an alleged libel or slander the defendant may prove the actual existence of the trait of character charged. Matthews v. Huntley, 9 N. H. 146. See, generally, Libel and Slander. (2) The existence of a trait of character is properly proved by establishing the existence of a reputation regarding it. See infra, X, C, 1.

71. "The combination of properties, qualities, or peculiarities which distinguishes one person or thing, or one group of persons or things, from others; specifically, the sum of inherited and acquired ethical traits which give to a person his moral individuality." Century Dict. See also Character, 6 Cyc. 892.

Being relevant, the evidence, when introduced without objection, is competent. Martin v. Good, 14 Md. 398, 74 Am. Dec. 545. But the mere fact that a party gives without objection evidence of good character does not authorize his opponent to give improper evidence on the same subject. Landa v. Obert, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 620, 25 S. W. 342.

b. Character in Issue. Only as constituting a basis for the inference of conduct is proof of character rejected.[77] Where the existence of a particular trait of character is relevant for any other purpose, no rule excludes evidence of it. Thus, it is competent where it is a fact in issue,[78] as chastity in an action for breach of promise of marriage,[79] indecent assault,[80] rape,[81] seduction,[82] and, in certain states of the evidence, in an action for criminal conversation,[83] or competency for certain work in an action against a master for keeping an incompetent servant.[84]

c. Character Relevant. Character may be relevant, as well as a fact in issue,[85] and apart from any inference as to conduct.[86] The character of a third person may be relevant[87] as bearing on the probability that a certain course of conduct was adopted[88] either by the party[89] or by a third person,[90] or to show the purposes for which a certain building is used as a place of resort.[91] Where the damages claimed in any action embrace injury to feelings, as in actions involving chastity[92] or false imprisonment,[93] it may be shown that the plaintiff's actual character is such that less than a normal injury in this particular could be inflicted by the acts of defendant.

d. In Mitigation of Damages. As an injurious act is less serious in its consequences than it otherwise would be if it affects something which is already damaged, defendant, in actions where plaintiff seeks damages for injury to reputation, may show that plaintiff did not at the time in question possess an unimpaired reputation in the particular involved in the inquiry.[94] Whether defendant may prove that plaintiff's reputation was already impaired by the existence of rumors is a mooted question, it having been held that such evidence is admissible [95] and, with apparently sounder reasoning, that it is not; as, for example, in an action for libel or slander,[96] or for malicious prosecution.[97]

"As to the second head of evidence or evidence of rumours and suspicions to the same effect as the defamatory matter complained of, it would seem that on principle such evidence is not admissible, as only indirectly tending to affect the plaintiff's reputation. If these rumours and suspicions have, in fact, affected the plaintiff's reputation, that may be proved by general evidence of reputation. If they have not affected it they are not relevant to the issue. To admit evidence of rumours and suspicions is to give any one who knows nothing whatever of the plaintiff, or who may even have a grudge against him, an opportunity of spreading through the means of the publicity attending judicial proceedings what he may have picked from the most disreputable sources, and what no man of sense, who knows the plaintiff's character, would for a moment believe in. Unlike evidence of general reputation, it is particularly difficult for the plaintiff to meet and rebut such evidence; for all that those who know him best can say is that they have not heard anything of these rumours. Moreover, it may be that it is the defendant himself who has started them." Scott v. Sampson, 8 Q. B. D. 491, 503, 46 J. P. 408, 51 L. J. Q. B. 380, 46 L. T. Rep. N. S. 412, 30 Wkly. Rep. 541.

the inquiry,[99] if objection is made.[1] The option as to whether the question as to what inferences shall be drawn from certain traits of defendant's character rests in the first instance entirely with himself. He may invoke the aid of such inferences by introducing evidence showing the existence in himself of some relevant trait,[2] although he does not himself take the witness' stand,[3] and even where his character is not directly assailed.[4] This election must be directly declared and cannot be legitimately inferred from his doing something else; as introducing evidence of impaired intelligence[5] or taking the stand as a witness. In the latter case, while character for truth and veracity is in issue,[6] the general issue of character is not raised.[7] When the accused has opened up the issue, the prosecu-

Whether the attention of the jury can be called to the fact that defendant alone can raise the issue and that he has not seen fit to do so is in dispute. While the course has been deemed legitimate (State v. McAllister, 24 Me. 139), it has more often been repudiated as subversive of the privilege itself (People v. Gleason, 122 Cal. 370, 55 Pac. 123; People v. Evans, 72 Mich. 367, 40 N. W. 473; State v. O'Neal, 29 N. C. 251). When the argument is made, the error is not cured by an instruction to disregard it. "As well might one attempt to brush off with the hand a stain of ink from a piece of white linen. One, in the very nature of things, is just as impossible as the other." tion may not only rebut the favorable evidence, but may lay a foundation in the evidence on which to base an affirmative inference adverse to defendant.[8]

b. Character in Issue. It may be an integral part of the state's original case to establish a relevant trait of character in a third person,[9] as chastity on an indictment for carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen "theretofore chaste,"[10] or for seduction.[11]

c. Character Relevant. Either the government or the accused may in criminal cases make use as to third persons of the inference of conduct from character which is provisionally excluded in case of defendant. On prosecutions for certain sexual offenses, as rape, indecent assault, and the like, defendant may show that the prosecuting witness consented,[12] and the state may show that she did not consent,[13] to the doing of the alleged wrongful act by evidence of her actual character in respect to chastity.[14] In like manner on an indictment for homicide defendant, in aid of a plea of self-defense, may show the violent character of the deceased.[15]

3. Quasi-Criminal Cases. Certain actions present features of both civil and criminal proceedings. Although civil in form, they raise much the same issue as might properly be tried in an appropriate criminal prosecution. The modern law of evidence treats such actions, in connection with inferences from character, as civil cases. It refuses to permit a party to such an action, including actions which involve assault,[16] bastardy,[17] embezzlement,[18] fraud,[19] incendiarism,[20] malicious injury,[21] slander imputing crime, when the truth is pleaded,[22] and including also suits for a penalty,[23] to introduce evidence of good character, although certain facts alleged to exist would constitute an adequate basis for criminal proceedings.[24] The rule is the same where moral, rather than legal, wrong-doing is charged in the pleadings or proof.[25] There is authority to the effect that where the nature of the action directly assails the moral character,[26] or where, as in slander, truth being pleaded,[27] it is directly attacked,[28] or where the evidence of fraud[29] or other wrong-doing[30] is entirely circumstantial; or the charge impugns the party's credibility as a witness,[31] evidence of character will be received. It is agreed that a party's character is not put in issue by the mere fact that the evidence, if believed, tends to assail it.[32] Thus in an action to recover damages for personal injuries testimony for offering to corrupt an officer, the Defendant's counsel called a witness to character," but Eyre, C. B., said: "I can not admit this evidence in a civil suit. tending to show that plaintiff's alleged injuries were simulated does not put his character in issue.[33]

4. Relevant Traits — a. In General. That the existence of a particular trait should furnish an inference as to specific conduct, it is necessary that, in accordance with common experience, similar conduct usually results from such a stimulus. In other words it must be relevant.[34] General moral character is not sufficiently specific to be relevant in cases of homicide,[35] illegal sale of liquor,[36] or larceny.[37] But where, as in case of indecent assault[38] or rape,[39] the relevant traits are not well identified, evidence covering a broader range of character has been received.

b. Instances. That a person is careful is irrelevant in a question of assault.[40] Evidence that a person is chaste may be relevant in proceedings involving adultery,[41] indecent assault[42] or rape,[43] but not in case of homicide.[44] Evidence that defendant is conscientious or conservative is not relevant on any issue involved in

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 177 et seq.

In a civil action for assault with a knife, defendant offered evidence of his good character as a peaceable and orderly person. In affirming the rejection of the evidence the court say, in substance, after a full examination of the authorities, that these authorities assert two principles: (1) That in civil suits evidence of the character of the parties, except where the character is directly in issue, is not admissible; (2) that putting character in issue is a technical expression, which does not mean simply that the character may be affected by the result, but that it is of particular importance in the suit itself, as the character of plaintiff in an action of slander, or that of a woman in an action on the case for seduction. The remark of Professor Greenleaf, in his Treatise on Evidence, vol. 1, § 54, that "generally in actions of tort, wherever the defendant is charged with fraud from mere circumstances, evidence of his general good character is admissible to repel it," is not sustained by any authority which I can find, save Ruan v. Perry, 3 Cai. (N. Y.) 120, and this is expressly overruled in Gough v. St. John, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 646, above referred to. Porter v. Seiler, 23 Pa. St. 424, 62 Am. Dec. 341.

rape,[69] or train-wrecking.[70] In rebuttal the same class of evidence is competent.[71] It is not material on an issue of libel.[72] Habitual profanity is not relevant on an issue of embezzlement[73] or larceny.[74] That a person is quiet is admissible on an indictment for homicide.[75] Sobriety is immaterial on an issue of larceny.[76] Sturdiness of character is not relevant in larceny.[77] However important a reputation for truth and veracity may be in case of a witness,[78] it is irrelevant on indictment for assault with intent to kill,[79] for homicide,[80] or larceny.[81] The evidence has been deemed competent, however, in case of malicious mischief[82] and perjury.[83] To aid a plea of self-defense on an indictment for homicide it may be shown that the deceased was a violent man.[84] That an individual is merely "worthless" is irrelevant on an indictment for homicide.[85]

5. Ground of Irrelevancy. It very frequently happens that offered evidence is rejected on the ground that it is "character evidence" when the real ground for the court's action in rejecting it is that the fact is irrelevant.[86] Thus, where the offer is to prove a trait of character not logically connected with the issue,[87] to show that a character not involved possesses certain qualities,[88]

88. State v. Staton, 114 N. C. 813, 19 S. E. 96. On a trial for burning a barn, where a witness testified that defendant told him that or to establish a fact already admitted,[89] or clearly proved,[90] the evidence never comes within the scope of the rule excluding character evidence; for that rule excludes only evidence otherwise admissible, while that excluded in such cases is merely irrelevant.

6. NEGATIVE FACTS. Negative facts relating to character, as that a witness well acquainted with the accused in the locality where he lived never heard anything evil said of him,[91] or his character even discussed or spoken of,[92] are admissible as tending to establish circumstantially an excellent character.

C. Proof of Character — 1. IN GENERAL. The rules regulating proof of character are illogical, unscientific, anomalous; explainable only as archaic survivals of compurgation[93] or of states of legal development when the jury personally knew the facts on which their verdict was based. Evidence of common reputation in the community is entirely proper when the reputation is itself the ultimate fact.[94] But as proof of actual character, the evidence, whether viewed as a relevant fact, or as composite hearsay,[95] is probatively weak[96] and practically on many occasions inaccurate and misleading. It possesses the sole advantage that it makes a simple issue and one which the person affected may fairly be supposed to be able to meet without surprise.[97] But it is obvious that the community's estimate of character must usually be above or below the actual situation.[98] In point of principle the inference of a disinterested person of competent he sold to a certain person the property taken from the barn which he had burned, defendant is not entitled to show that such person is a man of good character. State v. Staton, 114 N. C. 813, 19 S. E. 96.

98. "Evidence of character is, however, admissible on the part of the prisoner, not only in the sense of what people in general think of him, which is mere rumour, but also in the sense of what is known of him generally in the judgment of the particular witness, which judgment is superior in quality and value to mere rumour. Numerous cases may be put in which a man may have no general character in the sense of any reputation or rumour about him at all, and yet may have a good disposition. For instance, he may be of a shy, retiring disposition, and known only to a few; or again, he may be a person of the vilest character and disposition, and yet only his intimates may be able to testify that this is the case. One knowledge would be equally probative, and often more so than the estimate of the community at large;[99] and little objection apparently exists to receiving the inference as is now done in case of the influence of the emotions upon appearance,[1] or upon conduct,[2] or as to the existence of definite mental conditions[3] or states,[4] in connection with an enumeration of the relevant facts observed by him;[5] and that such facts of conduct, including habits, should be received not man may deserve that character without having acquired it which another man may have acquired without deserving it. In such cases the value of the judgment of a man's intimates upon his character becomes manifest. In ordinary life, when we want to know the character of a servant, we apply to his master. A servant may be known to none but the members of his master's family: so the character of a child is only known to its parents and teachers, and the character of a man of business to those with whom he deals. I apprehend that there is nothing to prevent a man of business from calling every person with whom he has dealt for years, and asking each in succession whether he was a person, according to the witness's observation, of an honest and just character; and such evidence would be of the highest value. But, if a witness to character were to say that the man had got a good character in the parish, it might be that he had gained it because he had gone through the parish offices with decency, and the witness may have had no opportunity of judging of the man's real character and disposition. According to the experience of mankind one would ordinarily rely rather on the information and judgment of a man's intimates than on general report; and why not in a Court of law?" Reg. v. Rowton, 10 Cox C. C. 25, 11 Jur. N. S. 325, L. & C. 520, 542, 34 L. J. M. C. 57, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745, 13 Wkly. Rep. 436, per Willes, J. A further difficulty, not readily foreseen at the time this limitation upon means of proof was adopted in England, frequently presents itself in that communities may be either too scattered or too dense to have made any estimate on the matter whatever.

99. The arguments in favor of permitting other proof of character than reputation are well given by Erle, C. J., in dissenting from the opinion of the court for crown cases reserved in Reg. v. Rowton, 10 Cox C. C. 25, 11 Jur. N. S. 325, L. & C. 520, 533, 34 L. J. M. C. 57, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745, 13 Wkly. Rep. 436: "What is the principle on which evidence of character is admitted? It seems to me that such evidence is admissible for the purpose of shewing the disposition of the party accused, and basing thereon a presumption that he did not commit the crime imputed to him. Disposition cannot be ascertained directly; it is only to be ascertained by the opinion formed concerning the man, which must be founded either on personal experience, or on the expression of opinion by others, whose opinion again ought to be founded on their personal experience. The question between us is, whether the Court is at liberty to receive a statement of the disposition of a prisoner, founded on the personal experience of the witness, who attends to give evidence and state that estimate which long personal knowledge of and acquaintance with the prisoner has enabled him to form. I think that each source of evidence is admissible. You may give in evidence the general rumour prevalent in the prisoner's neighbourhood, and, according to my experience, you may have also the personal judgment of those who are capable of forming a more real, substantial, guiding opinion than that which is to be gathered from general rumour. I never saw a witness examined as to character without an inquiry being made into his personal means of knowledge of that character. The evidence goes to the jury depending entirely upon the personal experience of the witness who has offered his testimony. Suppose a witness to character were to say, 'This man has been in my employ for twenty years. I have had experience of his conduct; but I have never heard a human being express an opinion of him in my life. For my own part, I have always regarded him with the highest esteem and respect, and have had abundant experience that he is one of the worthiest men in the world.' The principle the Lord Chief Justice has laid down would exclude this evidence; and that is the point where I differ from him. To my mind personal experience gives cogency to the evidence; whereas such a statement as, 'I have heard some persons speak well of him,' or 'I have heard general report in favour of the prisoner,' has a very slight effect in comparison. Again, to the proposition that general character is alone admissible the answer is that it is impossible to get at it. There is no such thing as general character; it is the general inference supposed to arise from hearing a number of separate and disinterested statements in favour of the prisoner. But I think that the notion that general character is alone admissible is not accurate. It would be wholly inadmissible to ask a witness what individual he has ever heard give his opinion of a particular fact connected with the man. I attach considerable weight to this distinction, because, in my opinion, the best character is that which is the least talked of." See infra, X, C, 3, b.

5. The opinion of the majority of the court for crown cases reserved, given in a well-considered case, not only states the English rule but illustrates in an interesting way the practical difficulties of excluding facts and opinion. "It is quite clear," said Cockburn, C. J., "that, as the law now stands, the pris-only as constituting the basis of the inference, but as furnishing circumstantial evidence of its correctness, and generally as to the existence of the trait in question.

2. REPUTATION IN COMMUNITY — a. In General. The appropriate proof of actual character is by establishing general reputation,[6] as to the particular trait involved,[7] as it existed at the time of the occurrence rendered important by the evidence,[8] in the community in which the person in question is known,[9] whether the oner cannot give evidence of particular facts, although one fact would weigh more than the opinion of all his friends and neighbours. So too, evidence of antecedent bad conduct would form equally good ground for inferring the prisoner's guilt, yet it is quite clear evidence of that kind is inadmissible. The allowing evidence of good character has arisen from the fairness of our laws, and is an anomalous exception to the general rule. It is quite true that evidence of character is most cogent, when it is preceded by a statement shewing that the witness has had opportunities of acquiring information upon the subject beyond what the man's neighbours in general would have; and in practice the admission of such statements is often carried beyond the letter of the law in favour of the prisoner. It is, moreover, most essential that a witness who comes forward to give a man a good character should himself have a good opinion of him; for otherwise he would only be deceiving the jury; and so the strict rule is often exceeded. But, when we consider what, in the strict interpretation of the law, is the limit of such evidence, in my judgment it must be restricted to the man's general reputation, and must not extend to the individual opinion of the witness." character to be proved is that of a party[10] or of a third person, as the deceased in a homicide,[11] and whether the proof is offered in a civil[12] or criminal[13] case. Directly rebutting evidence of character should in like manner be by proof of general reputation.[14] It is not necessary that the witness should know that the reputation he states is the opinion of the majority of the community.[15] He should know that it is the prevailing impression.

b. Function of Judge. One who offers a witness as to character must prove[16] on direct examination[17] to the reasonable satisfaction of the court that the witness is duly qualified by the possession of adequate knowledge.[18] Whether the time at which it is offered to show a person's reputation is too remote to be relevant,[19] or whether a community is too distant for the purpose,[20] are preliminary questions to be decided by the judge. Ordinarily remoteness of time and place will affect the weight rather than the competency of the evidence.[21] The court may exclude further evidence if a satisfactory test of its value has been made[22] and it is shown that it would be slight.[23] The court may make a reasonable limitation upon the number of witnesses permitted to testify on the issue of character.[24] It has been intimated that the court may in its discretion permit a defendant to use other means of establishing his character than by proof of reputation.[25]

c. Requirements For Admissibility — (I) In General. That reputation as to character may be relevant it should fulfil two conditions: (1) The reputation must arise among the members of a community who may fairly be assumed to know that of which they speak. (2) It must be an expression of persons who have no motive to misrepresent; in other words, the statement must be made ante litem motam, or before the existence of a criminal charge.

(II) Relevancy — (A) Adequate Knowledge. The community whose estimate of a person's character is important is, other things being equal, that through which he is best known.[26] If he has lived long enough in his present residence to have acquired a reputation there special weight attaches to the estimate formed there,[27] although reputation in places of former residence is not excluded.[28] Where the person has not acquired a reputation in his present neighborhood, that acquired at a prior residence will be received,[29] provided the residence is not so long ago as to be excluded as remote.[30] The inquiry in cross-examination may extend to cover reputation existing in any community deemed relevant by the presiding justice.[31] The same practice obtains on rebuttal. When defendant introduces witnesses as to his character in certain communities of his residence,

A. 814) years has been held too remote.

On cross-examination a wider range is permitted (Halloway v. People, 181 Ill. 544, 54 N. E. 1030), even fifteen years not proving a barrier (State v. Espinozei, 20 Nev. 209, 19 Pac. 677).

the state may rebut as to those and other communities where he has lived,[32] under relevant circumstances.[33] But character as a citizen cannot be rebutted by evidence of character as a soldier.[34] The circumstances must have been such as to make the reputation relevant. It is not competent to rebut evidence of good character by proof of a bad local reputation, limited to a neighborhood remote from defendant's residence,[35] where he has never lived and where he is not shown to be generally known,[36] nor by proof of reports relating to particular facts.[37]

(B) Ante Litem Motam. Evidence must be directed to proof of the person's reputation as it existed ante litem motam in a civil case, and on a criminal proceeding before the accused was charged[38] or generally suspected of the offense; actual arrest not being the crucial fact.[39] Evidence of a reputation arising under other circumstances is equally incompetent in the party's favor.[40]

3. Other Proof of Character — a. Circumstantial Evidence — (I) In General. Although admitted in certain cases, apparently without objection,[41] and continually received to prove mental states,[42] it is settled by the great weight of authority that character cannot be proved by evidence of its operation in specific instances,[43] even when the conduct has become habitual, whether the character is bad character, as disreputable associates,[54] frequent quarrels,[55] imprisonment,[56] keeping a disreputable house,[57] or pursuit by police officers,[58] are equally inadmissible.

Statement and reason of rule.— "A different rule will expose the defendant to the great danger of having his character ruined or badly damaged, by the arts of a popular or artful prosecutor, stimulated to activity by the hope of thus making his prosecution successful. Evidence of character is of the nature of hearsay, and the general rule in relation to that kind of testimony is, that it shall not be received if the hearsay be post litem motam. . . . The reason for this is, 'that no man is presumed to be indifferent in regard to matters in actual controversy; for when the contest has begun, people, generally, take part on the one side or the other — their minds are in a ferment, and if they are disposed to speak the truth, facts are seen by them through a false medium. To avoid, therefore, the mischiefs, which would otherwise result, all ex parte declarations, even though made upon oath, referring to a date subsequent to the beginning of the controversy, are rejected.'" State v. Johnson, 60 N. C. 151, 152.

(II) ANIMALS.[59] In the case of lower animals character may be shown by evidence of specific instances in which a relevant trait was manifested.[60] It may thus be shown that a horse is gentle,[61] kind,[62] safe[63] or vicious;[64] even where the acts are subsequent to the occurrence involved in the inquiry.[65] Similarly, the character of animals may be established by the inference of competent observers,[66] as well as by general reputation.[67]

(III) CROSS-EXAMINATION.[68] A party whose reputation is attacked may test the evidence by calling, on cross-examination, for the particular charges which have been made against him and for the persons who made them,[69] but facts so elicited are not evidence of the truth of the statement.[70] In criminal cases a witness who testifies to a good reputation of accused may be tested by asking, on cross-examination, as to reports which he has heard,[71] or facts otherwise known to

It has been thought useful and favorable to the elucidation of truth in such cases to allow on cross-examination an inquiry as to particulars in the charges, and also in reference to the persons who made them, or gave their opinion as to the character of the individual impeached. basis of the witness' opinion of the party's reputation,[79] or where a government witness testifies on cross-examination to the good character of accused.[80] On a civil proceeding evidence of reputation cannot be rebutted by evidence of specific acts, although this has been permitted where character has been itself shown by specific instances.[81]

rebuttal;[90] even where it is an inference from observed conduct.[91] The evidence has been received, in the absence of objection,[92] or when placed in issue by the pleadings.[93]

D. Weight of Evidence of Character. The inference that a person will act in accordance with what a community assumes will be the prompting of his moral nature is affected by at least two serious infirmative considerations: (1) It is by no means certain that the reputation represents the actual character or disposition. (2) The inference presents no uniformity of a natural law. Impulse, trivial or undiscoverable motive, or even apparently purposeless volition, constantly intercede within the field of observation. The inference accordingly becomes increasingly unreliable as a guide in proportion as the conduct involved is of an unusual nature and the case is one presenting the objection of extraordinary motives.[94] It also, although usually to a lesser degree, suffers under the same logical difficulties as evidence derived from the doing of similar acts.[95] The probative value of the inference varies also with its relevancy, in the existing state of the evidence.[96] Its probative value is greater in criminal than in civil cases,[97] or in connection with other proceedings, as for the violation of a municipal

Since the purpose of evidence of the character of accused is to show his disposition, and to base thereon a presumption that he would not be likely to commit the crime charged, such presumption rests, not on the ground that in general repute accused possesses a disposition which would render it unlikely that he would commit the crime, but on the fact that he possesses such disposition, and hence a witness knowing such disposition may testify to it as a fact, and is not confined to general reputation. As proof of good character suggests caution in weighing the incriminating evidence rather than constitutes a defense, the inference of conduct from character becomes strong in proportion as the case which it is to meet is weak;[1] and it has been held that the inference may be disregarded when opposed to a case strongly proved[2] by direct evidence.[3] Such, however, is not the prevailing view, nor indeed the reasonable one. That one is of good reputation as an honest, peaceable citizen has little tendency to show that he has not violated a statute or ordinance forbidding him to catch trout out of season, or to drive certain vehicles faster than a walk, or requiring him to keep the sidewalks abutting on his premises free from snow and ice. The sale of intoxicating liquor to minors is strictly forbidden by the statute, but it does not necessarily involve any moral turpitude." Com. v. Nagle, 157 Mass. 554, 32 N. E. 861.

ter is conclusive in his favor.[8] What weight shall be accorded to the evidence is entirely for the jury.[9] The court therefore cannot properly rule that proof of good character raises a reasonable doubt,[10] or that good character is conclusive in doubtful cases.[11]

E. Evidence of Reputation — 1. In General. While actual character is unaffected thereby,[12] and the reputation affected need not be limited to the existence of any particular moral quality,[13] the conventional reputation of a person may suffer from the doing of certain acts for which damages may be claimed. Reputation, as an ultimate fact, may be proved by the same methods and under the same conditions as are employed in establishing it as circumstantial evidence of character.[14] The objections to the limitation of the proof to general reputation in a community possessed of adequate knowledge and without motive to misrepresent which have been stated regarding proof of character[15] do not apply when the reputation itself is the factum probandum.

2. Reputation in Issue. In actions involving injury to reputation, such as actions for libel or slander, etc., three main issues of fact are presented: (1) Did plaintiff have a good reputation in the particulars involved? (2) Has it been injured by the acts of defendant? (3) If so, how much, stated in money, has it been damaged? In the first and third of these issues evidence of reputation is competent. On a trial for murder, if, from all the other evidence, the jury would be satisfied of the guilt of defendant, they must still determine whether or not his previous good character, when weighed with all the other facts and circumstances in the case, raises a reasonable doubt as to his guilt; and if such reasonable doubt remains the jury must acquit. 12. Evidently the plaintiff's actual character in any particular involved is entirely unaffected by defendant's act in any suit involving reputation. It seems equally plain that the reputation referred to in many instances has no especial reference to a particular trait of character at all; but indicates his general standing in a community in which he is known. Leonard v. Allen, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 241. It is nevertheless said, that in cases involving reputation plaintiff's "character" is in issue; and it is deduced as a corollary that proof of such character in the particular involved may be given.

13. In an action for slander in charging plaintiff with burning a school-house evidence was admitted to impeach "the general character for integrity and moral worth as to his reputation in regard to conduct similar in character to the offence" with which he was charged. imprisonment,[17] libel and slander,[18] or malicious prosecution,[19] plaintiff is entitled to rely, in the absence of evidence, upon the legal assumption that his reputation is good, as to the particular in question; or he may produce, before[20] or after[21] his reputation has been attacked,[22] evidence that it is good,[23] to enhance the damages,[24] or maintain his action.

3. Reputation Relevant to the Issue. Reputation as to character may be a relevant fact in other connections. The existence of a good reputation in some relevant particular tends on an action for malicious prosecution to negative the existence of "probable cause" for instituting criminal proceedings;[25] while a bad reputation in the same particulars tends to establish it.[26] That a house is

20. Adams v. Lawson, 17 Gratt. (Va.) 250, 260, 94 Am. Dec. 455, where it is said: "It being thus important to the decision of the case that the jury should hear evidence as to the character of the plaintiff, either generally or in reference to the particular subject matter of the slander or libel, can any good reason be assigned why it should depend on the option of the defendant whether they shall hear such evidence or not? Such a one-sided rule would not be fair and equal as between the parties, would often defeat the justice of the case, and might operate great hardship upon a plaintiff who is unknown to the jury. The defendant would not open the door by an attack on his character, and he would not be allowed to sustain it by evidence in chief. It does not appear to me to be a satisfactory answer to say, that the plaintiff ought to stand upon the presumption which the law makes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that his character is good. Why should the plaintiff be compelled to rely upon such a general presumption, when he offers to prove that the presumption, in his particular case, is in accordance with the fact? And what right has the defendant to complain, since the evidence is only offered to establish with more certainty what the law would presume to be true in the absence of all evidence?"
