XI. OPINION.*

A. In General — 1. Rule of Exclusion Stated. Reasoning is the proper function of judge, jury, and counsel. It is not part of the normal function of a witness. He is to state facts rather than his opinions.[37] The inference that a fact

37. "Opinion," in this connection, designates: (1) Inferences formed either by direct reaction from sensation or, more remotely, by the exercise of judgment upon original data; (2) results reached by the mind from consideration of propositions submitted to it; and (3) conclusions reached by blending these mental processes.

"Matters of opinion," in the sense of debatable propositions of fact, as to which certainty is unattainable, are also excluded. The conclusion, inference, or judgment of a witness may well relate to the existence of a fact whose ascertainment is as definitely possible as any other. "The essential idea of opinion seems to be that it is a matter about which doubt may reasonably exist, as to which two persons can without absurdity think differently. The existence of an object before the eyes of two persons would not be a matter of opinion, nor would it be a matter of opinion that twice two are four. But when testimony is divided or uncertain the existence of a fact may become doubtful and, therefore, a matter of opinion." Lewis Authority in Matters of Opinion, c. 1, § 1, note.

Uncertainty not covered.—The term "opinion," as used in the law of evidence, does not as a rule connote the lack of certainty or fixity in mental conviction which it frequently does in more colloquial use. Such a use of the word is, however, frequent in the cases, where a statement is at times rejected as "opinion" when the real objection is that the evidence is not relevant because a witness is not really stating anything from knowledge but merely hazarding a guess.

Alabama.— Cummins v. State, 58 Ala. 387.

Maine.— Lime Rock Bank v. Hewett, 50 Me. 267; Palmer v. Pinkham, 33 Me. 32.

Michigan.— Reid v. Ladue, 66 Mich. 22, 32 N. W. 916, 11 Am. St. Rep. 462; Bissell v. Starr, 32 Mich. 297.

New York.— Cook v. Brockway, 21 Barb. 331; Fry v. Bennett, 3 Bosw. 200; People v. Holfelder, 5 N. Y. St. 488.

Ohio.—Arcade Hotel Co. v. Wiatt, 44 Ohio St. 32, 4 N. E. 398, 58 Am. Rep. 785.

Texas.— Kansas Gulf Short Line R. Co. v. Scott, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 20 S. W. 725.

Virginia.— Tyler v. Sites, 90 Va. 539, 19 S. E. 174.

Wisconsin.— Wood v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 40 Wis. 582.

Among phrases introducing this measure of uncertainty are those denoting:

Approximation.— Hopper v. Beck, 83 Md. 647, 34 Atl. 474.

Belief.— Mobile Furniture Commission Co. v. Little, 108 Ala. 399, 19 So. 443; Brewer v. Watson, 71 Ala. 299, 46 Am. Rep. 318; Collins v. Com., 25 S. W. 743, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 691; Salmon v. Feinour, 6 Gill & J. (Md.) 60; Hodges v. Hodges, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 455; Berg v. Parsons, 90 Hun (N. Y.) 267, 35 N. Y. Suppl. 780; Schrader v. Schrader, (Pa. 1888) 14 Atl. 434; Conde v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. 10, 24 S. W. 415; Bagley v. Mason, 69 Vt. 175, 37 Atl. 287; House v. House, 102 Va. 235, 46 S. E. 299.

Consideration.— Yanke v. State, 51 Wis. 464, 8 N. W. 276.

Expectation.— Hager v. National German-American Bank, 105 Ga. 116, 31 S. E. 141.

Guessing.— Spurlock v. Com., 20 S. W. 1095, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 605 (reckoned); Johnson v. Hovey, 98 Mich. 343, 57 N. W. 172.

Impression.— Thus a witness is not permitted to state his "impression," unless it is shown to have been derived from recollection (Rounds v. McCormick, 11 Ill. App. 220; Ingram v. Croft, 7 La. 82; Humphries v. Parker, 52 Me. 502; Lewis v. Brown, 41 Me. 448; People v. Dowd, 127 Mich. 140, 86 N. W. 546; Lovejoy v. Howe, 55 Minn. 353, 57 N. W. 57; Selden v. Bank of Commerce, 3 Minn. 166; Bank of Commerce v. Selden, 1 Minn. 340; Kingsbury v. Moses, 45 N. H. 222; State v. Thorp, 72 N. S., 113 Fed. 248, 51 C. C. A. 205); but a claim to any element of recollection whatever admits the evidence of an impression (Franklin v. Macon, 12 Ga. 257).

Judgment.— Huntsville Belt Line, etc., R. Co. v. Corpening, 97 Ala. 681, 12 So. 295.

Supposition.— What a witness "supposed" is not competent. Hall v. State, 40 Ala. 698; Ward v. Reynolds, 32 Ala. 384 (value); Menifee v. Higgins, 57 Ill. 50; State v. King, 22 Iowa 1, 96 N. W. 712; Orr v. Cedar Rapids, etc., R. Co., 94 Iowa 423, 62 N. W. 851; Cumberland Telephone, etc., Co. v. Odeneal, (Miss. 1899) 26 So. 966 ("naturally suppose"); Hoitt v. Moulton, 21 N. H. 586; Weber v. Kingsland, 8 Bosw. (N. Y.) 415); except where the fact is relevant per se (Irish-American Bank v. Ludlum, 49 Minn. 255, 51 N. W. 1047).

Thought.— Territory v. McKern, 3 Ida. 15, 26 Pac. 123; Sterling Bridge Co. v. Pearl, 80 Ill. 251; Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Stein, 140 Ind. 61, 39 N. E. 246; Roziene v. Ball, 51 Iowa 328, 1 N. exists because a witness has formed in his mind by a process of reasoning an affirmative impression as to its existence is in most connections excluded.[38] "A witness is to state facts, not inferences, and the court can draw no inferences which the facts as proved do not justify."[39] The mere use, however, of phrase-

That is not matter of opinion, a knowledge of which may be derived from the declarations of others. Olds v. Powell, 10 Ala. 393.

The existence of an opinion may be independently relevant, for example, to impeach a witness. Ledford v. Ledford, 95 Ind. 283.

Strict enforcement required.— It has been held that the general rule that witnesses must state facts rather than conclusions should be strictly followed; and that whenever it is doubtful whether a case falls under the rule or one of its exceptions the wise course is to place it under the rule. Kiesel v. Sun Ins. Office, 88 Fed. 243, 31 C. C. A. 515.

39. Berckmans v. Berckmans, 16 N. J. Eq. 122. "A fact known to the witness, though only from his own consciousness, and which may be pertinent to the issue, is admissible, ology appropriate to the expression of an inference is not conclusive that the witness is stating one, or exercising his judgment. The language may merely be the witness' way of saying that he is not speaking with entire certainty.[40] While the general proposition above stated as to the exclusion of opinion is undoubted,[41] its operation, in particular cases, is complicated by several modifying and at times controlling considerations. These will be found, upon their examination in detail, to be, in general terms, as follows: (1) The inference, conclusion, or judgment is competent in proportion as it is shown to be simple, reflex, or instructive, and is, on the contrary, rejected according as it is found to involve the element of mental operation, whether the reasoning is induction or deduction, or a combination of the two. (2) A particular conclusion, inference, or judgment is excluded where the jury are capable of reasoning on the matter to a tenable conclusion; and is received where they cannot do so, either (a) because they have no adequate major premise of experience, or (b) because they cannot, from inability to gather or adequately weigh, at their true probative value, the facts into a reasonable satisfactory minor premise. (3) The conclusion, inference, or judgment is accepted where it relates to a fact which is collateral or relatively unimportant; and but not when to such fact is added the exercise of the judgment upon its relation to other facts and an opinion upon such combination is expressed." Schmick v. Noel, 72 Tex. 1, 4, 8 S. W. 83. "The general rule is well settled that the province of a witness is to state facts, and that of the jury is to draw conclusions from them." Musick v. Latrobe, 184 Pa. St. 375, 39 Atl. 226. To the same effect see Perry v. Graham, 18 Ala. 822; Largan v. Central R. Co., 40 Cal. 272.

40. Hallahan v. New York, etc., R. Co., 102 N. Y. 194, 6 N. E. 287; Harpending v. Shoemaker, 37 Barb. (N. Y.) 270. Should the latter, in the opinion of the judge, appear to be the case the evidence may be received (Hunter v. Helsley, 98 Mo. App. 616, 73 S. W. 719); the form of statement being unimportant (Stone v. Com., 181 Mass. 438, 63 N. E. 1074, prophecy); and although the witness expresses unwillingness to swear to the accuracy of his statement (Lewis v. Freeman, 17 Me. 260).

Instances of this use of language are frequently found where a witness employs, directly, or in some modified form, the following phrases:

is rejected where the fact sought to be established is either in issue or so material thereto as to involve the substantial rights of the parties to a jury trial.[42]

2. Discretion of Court. For reasons connected with the historical development of the rule, the court exercises a wide administrative discretion in receiving the mental conclusions of witnesses, particularly the judgments of skilled witnesses testifying as experts.[43] Thus the judge may properly limit the number of such witnesses,[44] the range of the examination, either on direct[45] or cross-examination,[46] liability to comment for failure to call,[47] and the like.[48] The judge may prevent repetition of a question already fully answered.[49]

3. Judge Acting as a Jury. When an issue of fact is before the judge, either on voir dire[50] or when sitting as a jury, the rule is the same as in jury trials, viz., that evidence of inferences, conclusions, or judgments is not admissible when the facts can be stated and the judge is fully able to deal with them.[51] Indeed the judge may be especially fitted to deal with the precise point on which evidence is offered.[52] On the other hand it has been considered that the court may call in experts to aid its own deliberations;[53] and is unlikely to be misled by the inference of a witness whose qualifications he understands.[54]

4. Requirements For Admissibility — a. Relevancy — (i) General Rule. The conditions under which opinion evidence is admissible, however varied in other respects, present the common feature that they require (1) that the evidence offered should aid the jury in its work of decision, and (2) that the evidence should

42. See the sections following and the cases there cited.

43. Best evidence required.— It is within the function of the court to reject evidence, which, although from a source capable of aiding the jury, is not the best source of this assistance within the power of the party relying on it to produce. Russell v. State, 53 Miss. 367. See, generally, infra, XV.

Judicial cognizance.— The court may decline, in its discretion, to receive expert evidence to an effect which it judicially knows to be false, e. g. that cigars are drugs or medicines (Com. v. Marzynski, 149 Mass. 68, 21 N. E. 228), or that riding on a "cow catcher" or pilot of an engine is as safe as riding on top of a freight car (Warden v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 94 Ala. 277, 11 So. 276, 14 L. R. A. 552). The judge is not required to hear evidence as to matters of law (Merchants', etc., Sav. Bank v. Cross, 65 Minn. 154, 67 N. W. 1147, custom of bankers), as the general law merchant (Hogan v. Reynolds, 8 Ala. 59), as to the meaning of well known words (Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550, monomania), or as to other matters of which it must or does take judicial cognizance. See, generally, supra, II.

W. 559, where it is said: "Manifestly, a trial Judge must have some control over the dispatch of business in his court, and some discretion respecting the number of witnesses he will hear upon a specific line of inquiry incident to a case. This conceded, it follows, from the essential nature of the juridical connection of inferior and appellate courts, that the latter will not reverse the ruling of the former, originating in the exercise of this discretion, unless it has been abused and it can be seen that this abuse has resulted in injury. The value and convincingness of expert testimony in arriving at the truth in this case are not so clear and evident that the Court can see that the Chancellor abused his authority in limiting the number of experts to five on each side." be necessary for that purpose. Relevancy is, properly speaking, a condition of the application of the exclusionary rule itself — an irrelevant opinion not being rejected primarily because it is an opinion but because it is irrelevant[55] — rather than a condition of the admissibility of evidence received as an exception to the rule excluding opinion. The practice of treating relevancy as a condition of receiving opinion evidence is, however, a convenient one and has become inveterate.[56]

(II) Adequate Knowledge and Capacity. The element of relevancy which is of special importance in connection with statements of inferences, conclusions, or judgments, is that the declarant should be possessed of adequate knowledge regarding the subject-matter to which his declaration relates;[57] and this must be affirmatively shown, by the proponent of the evidence.[58] If the witness is offered as to a fact, the court must be able at least to assume that he knows it.[59] If the point covered by the testimony is an inference from observation or from the existence of any other state of consciousness, the court must be able to assume that the witness has adequate data on which to base the inference and the necessary mental equipment to enable him to draw it. If a conclusion is offered it can logically be only the conclusion of one who is competent to draw it.[60] Whether the subject of the evidence be fact, inference, or conclusion, knowledge must be shown or assumed proportionate to the requirements of the particular fact, inference, or conclusion.[61] Mere opportunity for acquiring the requisite knowledge is not suffi-

A claim to knowledge may, however, in the discretion of the court (Minnesota Belt-Line R., etc., Co. v. Gluck, 45 Minn. 463, 48 N. W. 194) be deemed a prima facie qualification, the basis of the alleged knowledge being first ascertained on cross-examination (Goodwine v. Evans, 134 Ind. 262, 33 N. E. 1031) by relevant questions (Pennsylvania, etc., Canal, etc., Co. v. Roberts, 2 Walk. (Pa.) 482).

61. Difference in qualification.— In all cases that a witness should be trustworthy (assuming that he is telling the truth and correctly understood) it must appear (1)

cient,[62] in the absence of facts which raise a satisfactory inference that the observer had sufficient capacity to coördinate his observations into relevant knowledge.[63] But extended opportunities for observation may well produce a special skill, denied to ordinary persons, even in the absence of special study.[64] A test of the qualifications of the witness so far as relates to facts, inferences, or conclusions is furnished by the requirement, noted hereafter, that the witness should on his direct examination state the facts observed by him or any other basis of his inference or conclusion.[65] Such a requirement serves three useful purposes: (1) It determines the extent and accuracy of the witness' powers of observation; (2) exhibits the

that the witness had sufficient opportunities of becoming acquainted with the facts, and (2) the capacity of drawing a suitable inference, conclusion, or judgment. It is evident, however, that where the matter is one of common observation or patent facts, the element of opportunity for observation is of superior importance and capacity, being practically a universal predicate, is of subsidiary moment; while in proportion as the element of reasoning increases, in conclusion or judgment the qualification of capacity becomes of superior importance, especially in matters of a technical or scientific nature, while the element of observation is reduced to a minimum in the same measure. See the cases in the notes following.

The test is not whether the court would believe the evidence offered but whether the witness has sufficient experience on a suitable subject to qualify him to give an opinion which shall be of value to the jury. It is not apparent credibility but capability that is the turning point. Probably this is meant by the supreme court of Nebraska in saying that "courts cannot establish a standard by which to measure expert witnesses. If they show that they have practical skill or scientific knowledge and experience as to matters under investigation, they are competent to testify." Sioux City, etc., R. Co. v. Finlayson, 16 Nebr. 578, 20 N. W. 860, 49 Am. Rep. 724. It is not required that an expert witness stand at the head of his class to make his evidence admissible. His preliminary examination must show such knowledge of the subject as will enable him to speak with intelligence. A worker in soapstone may not be qualified to testify as an expert as to the qualities of the stone or how the lower workings in a quarry will probably compare with the upper. "For aught that is shown in the case, he might have been a mere day laborer, mechanically performing the task assigned him; scarcely more intelligent than the material on which he wrought, and hardly better qualified to give an opinion of the qualities of that material than the tools he employed in working it. He was not, therefore, shown to possess that scientific or actual knowledge of the subject in relation to which he was inquired of, which made his opinions competent evidence; and they were improperly admitted." reasoning qualities of the witness; and (3) separates the element of inference from that of observation and indicates how large a proportion of each enters into the total result. review.[68] Examination as to qualification of a witness to state an inference, conclusion, or judgment should not be limited by narrow and stringent rules.[69] The necessary qualification may be affirmatively shown on the direct examination of the witness,[70] aided where necessary by any facts brought out on cross-examination,[71] and

In civil cases it has been held in some jurisdictions that counsel have no right to cross-examine the proposed witness on voir dire, but may do so by the direction of the judge, who may, on the other hand, with or without good ground, refuse to permit cross-examination at that stage. Suppl. 80), and it is said in other states that the better practice is to permit cross-examination on voir dire (In re Gorkow, 20 Wash. 563, 56 Pac. 385). The right to reasonable cross-examination as to the qualifications of an expert witness exists in full force at a subsequent stage, i. e., the regular cross-examination of the witness. relevant[72] evidence is admissible for that purpose.[73] In deciding upon qualifications the court may, in addition to the examination conducted by the proponent, himself examine the witness,[74] or ascertain his qualifications from the evidence of others;[75] not, however, including, in case of a skilled witness, the judgment of another skilled witness,[76] or the reputation of the witness proposed as an expert.[77] A witness is not necessarily qualified because he claims to be;[78] nor, on the other hand, is he excluded, if in fact qualified, because he himself thinks that he is not,[79] even where he is a party to the suit.[80]

and the capacity necessary to make and state it.[82] Where the statement therefore is largely one of fact, or the ground of necessity compelling the admission is that the jury cannot draw the inference themselves because the facts cannot be fully stated, the qualification of the witness consists, not in skill or special experience, but in the fact that he has had satisfactory data.[83] Naturally such an observer cannot testify, as an expert — that is, on an assumption of the truth of certain facts.[84] In a certain class of cases special experience has been acquired by residence in a given locality or other fortuitous circumstances which has conferred a degree of skill in drawing a probable inference from particular phenomena which

"For testimony, nothing further is in general required than opportunity of observation, ordinary attention and intelligence, and veracity. Almost every person of sound mind, who has reached a certain age, is a credible witness as to matters which he has observed, and as to which he has no immediate interest in deception or concealment." Lewis Authority in Matters of Opinion, c. 3, § 5.

The value of the inference depends upon the facts on which it rests. Its competency, however, is not measured by this standard; an inference of little value may nevertheless be competent. If any material facts at all are stated by the witness warranting the inference that he has sufficient knowledge to form an opinion, it is the duty of the court to permit it to go to the jury for whatever it may be worth. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

The interest of the witness, especially difficult of detection, even by the witness himself, in connection with this class of evidence, is a factor in the exercise of this discretion. The greater the interest of the witness the less reason exists to apprehend that the inference will be of value. Patrick v. Howard, 47 Mich. 40, 10 N. W. 71. "If a person was present at any event, so as to see or hear it; if he availed himself of his opportunity, so as to take note of what passed; if he had sufficient mental capacity to give an accurate report of the occurrence; and if he is not influenced by personal favour, or dislike, or fear, or hope of gain, to misreport the fact; or if, notwithstanding such influence, his own conscience and moral or religious principles, or the fear of public opinion, deters him from mendacity, such a person is a credible witness." Lewis Authority in Matters of Opinion, c. 3, § 1.

Court passing upon qualification of witness.— Upon principle, where the evidence is as to the existence of a fact and not of professional, scientific, or trade knowledge, no reason is perceived why the court should pass upon the qualifications of the witness. Prentis v. Bates, 93 Mich. 234, 53 N. W. 153, 17 L. R. A. 494. The practice is, however, to do so, as in case of an expert. People v. Youngs, 151 N. Y. 210, 45 N. E. 460; Dauphin v. U. is denied to the casual observer.[85] It has seemed best to regard such a person as a witness qualified by observation rather than as skilled by experience — a designation reserved for capacity for judgment acquired in some trade or calling not commonly shared or readily acquired by men in general.

(c) Skilled Witness — (1) In General. Where the ground for receiving an inference, conclusion, or judgment is that it relates to such a subject-matter that the jury require the aid of an experience outside their own, the evidence must be furnished by a "skilled witness."[86] Such a witness may be qualified either

"Skilled observer" in this connection is used to designate the witness who testifies as to his inference, conclusion, or judgment, not because the jury, if they had his experience, could not draw the same inference, but because they suffer under the specific difficulty that if every fact observed could be correctly placed before them they could not draw a reasonable inference from them. The term does not extend to a witness who states an inference from facts observed by him because these facts cannot for some reason be given in evidence in their entirety and proper relations; although the observer does in point of fact possess special skill in the matter. In other words the term designates the possession of a required experience. See the cases cited supra, this note.

87. See the cases hereinafter more specifically cited. "A witness' opinion is admissible as evidence, not only where scientific knowledge is required to comprehend the matter testified about, but also where experience and observation in the special calling of the witness give him knowledge of the subject in question beyond that of persons of common intelligence." obtained where the two unite in the same person. Thus the man of scientific or professional attainments is a more valuable witness if he has practised his calling;[88] and it is equally true that he who practises an art or calling gains by having studied the principles of the science on which its practice is based.[89] No more precise rule can be laid down on the minutiæ of qualification further than that the capacity must be shown to be commensurate with the reasonable requirements called for by the nature of the subject-matter. As the element of reasoning becomes greater, stringency in the requirements of qualification is proportionately increased. It is not necessary that a witness should qualify as to the possession of the ordinary knowledge which his occupation connotes. It will be assumed in practical administration that members of a profession, trade, or calling, after a reasonable length of time,[90] have the knowledge common to persons so engaged;[91] and that one appointed to office has the technical skill required to discharge its duties.[92] On the other hand it is not required that the witness, if otherwise qualified, should be a member of the calling to which his evidence relates.[93] Nor is there any assumption that a witness is skilled in a subject

E. 87); but he cannot state facts of a particular case claimed to be analogous to the one at bar (People v. Holmes, 111 Mich. 364, 69 N. W. 501), as that others have simulated certain symptoms (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Brown, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 93, 40 S. W. 608). The witness may state that he could do certain acts in a practical way of which he possesses knowledge in a theoretical. Childs v. O'Leary, 174 Mass. 111, 54 N. E. 490.

Some slight experience in a matter does not necessarily entitle a witness to be heard. If he has but little general intelligence (Broquet v. Tripp, 36 Kan. 700, 14 Pac. 227), or lacks knowledge of some essential fact (Stevens v. Minneapolis, 42 Minn. 136, 43 N. (2) Testimony as to Facts. Only a witness skilled by experience in the subject-matter of an inquiry can testify as to facts known only to such experienced persons.[95]

(3) Testimony as to Inferences From Sensation. A witness may properly testify to an inference from observed facts fully intelligible only to one skilled in a profession, trade, or calling, when, in the opinion of the presiding justice, he has the skill and experience accurately to observe the phenomena presented to him, and the technical capacity to coördinate them into a reasonable inference.[96] The requirements are more severe than those required in him who is merely asked to state a fact which is a mere matter of knowledge. Adequate faculties of both observation and inference must be shown.[97]

(4) Testimony as an "Expert." The necessary professional or technical qualifications of one who is asked to testify as to a judgment formed upon hypothetically stated facts are directed to the element of reasoning and capacity to deduce a correct inference, the ability to observe accurately and to report truly being of minor importance. One who testifies as an expert must be shown to be equipped with the special skill or knowledge necessary to make his formation of a judgment a fact of probative value.[98] It is not ground for excluding the evidence that the witness bases his statements in whole or in part upon his reading,[99] provided that the reading can be assumed to have been assimilated in the mind and constitutes part of a general knowledge,[1] adequate to enable the witness to form a reasonable opinion of his own.[2] There is therefore no assumption that a witness is skilled in a subject because he has studied it.[3] The skill required of a witness to qualify him as an expert is by no means necessarily of a scientific nature. It may be of the most severely practical kind, provided it be on a matter not within the knowledge of men in general or capable of being readily placed there with a sufficient approximation to accuracy.[4]

b. Necessity — (i) In General. It is not sufficient for admissibility that the inference, conclusion, or judgment offered should be relevant. It must be for some reason necessary to receive it. Parties appeal in legal disputes as to matters of fact to the experience and judgment of the jury.[5] It is the administrative duty of the court to see to it that the parties have the benefit of that appeal. The danger involved in receiving evidence of a witness' inference, conclusion, or judgment is lest the jury may substitute it for their own.[6] Where this danger is not presented or must be encountered, an inference, conclusion, or judgment, if a relevant fact, may properly be received.[7] The danger does not exist, where the statement is substantially one of fact, whether recognized by or known to a skilled or unskilled witness,[8] provided that the fact is not distinctly within the ultimate province of the jury.[9] The danger must be encountered under two conditions, for reasons inherent in the limitations of the tribunal and the witnesses through whom the evidence must be presented. (1) The first situation admitting the evidence is where the average witness cannot state and the average juror cannot coördinate into a reasonable mental result the sensations produced on the witness' mind by a number of minute and interblending phenomena.[10] (2) The second situation is presented where the tribunal by whose experience the case is to be determined has no sufficient experience on the subject, and the necessary qualifications for dealing with the subject cannot within the time available be conferred on the jury by the parties or their witnesses.[11] The jury must therefore, on certain subjects, be guided by the judgment on the facts in evidence of persons possessing relevant experience superior to their own.[12] Where no necessity for encountering the danger referred to is shown to the satisfaction of the court the evidence will be rejected.[13] Thus it has been held to be unnecessary to rely upon the inferences of witnesses as to a fact when all doubt has been[14] or may be[15] set at rest by the use of the senses, either directly[16] or through the use of plans[17] or photographs.[18]

(II) Competency of Jury Excludes. When all relevant facts can be or have been introduced before the jury, and the latter are able to deduce a reasonable inference from them, no reason exists for receiving opinion evidence, and it is inadmissible.[19] "The governing rule deduced from the cases permitting the

11. See infra, XI, A, 4, b. "It is not because a man has a reputation for superior sagacity, and judgment, and power of reasoning, that his opinion is admissible; if so, such men might be called in all cases, to advise the jury, and it would change the mode of trial. But it is because a man's professional pursuits, his peculiar skill and knowledge in some department of science, not common to men in general, enable him to draw an inference, where men of common experience, after all the facts proved, would be left in doubt." "The true test of the admissibility of such testimony is not whether the subject matter is common or uncommon, or whether many persons or few have knowledge of the matter; but it is whether the witnesses offered as experts have any peculiar knowledge or experience, not common to the world, which renders their opinions founded on such knowledge or experience any aid to the court or the jury in determining the questions at issue." Taylor v. Monroe, 43 Conn. 36, 44. Whenever the matter of inquiry is such that inexperienced persons are unlikely to prove capable of forming a correct judgment upon it; or in other words when it so far partakes of the nature of a science or trade as to require a previous habit or experience or study, in order to the attainment of a knowledge of it, the opinion of experts is admissible. On the other hand if the matter is not such as to require any peculiar habits or study in order to qualify a person to understand it then such evidence is not material. Davis v. State, 38 Md. 15. "The witness was asked, 'What would be the effect of sixteen feet of pipe held at one end on a stick, if one man let go; what would be the result to the man on the ladder, if he had the pipe on his shoulder as described?' He was further asked, what in his opinion caused the pipe to fall. We do not think these matters involve any of the mysteries of any particular science, trade or craft. The plumber was doubtless an expert touching matters involved in his particular trade, but these matters, concerning which an expression of opinion from him was then invoked, though bearing some slight relation to the plumber's trade, are simply the ordinary happenings and events of life, concerning which any man of reasonable intelligence from his own observation would be able to speak with as much precision as the most expert plumber."

"In applying circumstantial evidence, which does not go directly to the fact in issue, but to facts from which the fact in issue is to be inferred, the jury have two duties to perform; first, . . . to ascertain the truth of the fact to which the evidence goes, and thence to infer the truth of the fact in issue. This inference depends on experience. . . . Now when this experience is of such a nature that it may be presumed to be within the common experience of all men of common education, moving in the ordinary walks of life, there is no room for the evidence of opinion: it is for the jury to draw the inference." customs,[31] inferences drawn from ordinary resemblances,[32] and in general whatever any one may observe for himself and reach a reasonable conclusion with regard to it [33] may be decided by a jury without the assistance of any experience other than their own. It does not follow, because a witness is duly qualified and the general subject is a proper one, that his judgment can be asked on any branch of the inquiry. The precise point of each individual inquiry must be beyond the intelligence of an average jury, and "so far partake of the nature of a science as to require a course of previous habit or study in order to an attainment of a knowledge of them." [34] The specific decisions under this general rule turn too frequently upon the facts of the particular case to warrant an attempt at exact classification.[35] If the jury, although presumably devoid at the beginning of a trial of experience concerning a subject-matter, can be so informed during its progress as to reach an accurate conclusion, the subject is not one for an inference, conclusion, or judgment,[36] and the evidence may be excluded in the discretion of the court.[37]

c. Province of Jury — (I) In General. Although an inference or conclusion be in the main a mere statement of a fact, and therefore under ordinary circumstances not amenable to the rule excluding "opinion evidence," the parties may, by involving the fact within the distinctive field of the jury's operation, place it within the mischief of intruding upon the jury's province, against which the opinion evidence rule was intended to provide.[38] To protect this right the court will exclude so far as possible [39] the inference, conclusion, or judgment of witnesses where they cover the final inference as to the existence of a fact in issue,[40]

Benefits in mitigation of damages (Hagaman v. Moore, 84 Ind. 496; Shaw v. Charlestown, 2 Gray (Mass.) 107; Purdy v. Manhattan R. Co., 3 Misc. (N. Y.) 50, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 943) and the absence of damage (Mobile Furniture Commission Co. v. Little, 108 Ala. 399, 19 So. 443; McGregor v. Brown, 10 N. Y. 114) stand in the same position.

Elements of damage may be stated by the witnesses. Stewart v. Lanier House Co., 75 Ga. 582; Dougherty v. Stewart, 43 Iowa 648; Republican Valley R. Co. v. Linn, 15 Nebr. 234, 18 N. W. 35; Seamans v. Smith, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 320; Bloomfield, etc., Natural Gas-light Co. v. Calkins, 1 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 549, sinking and maintaining drain. But witnesses called to testify as to the amount of damage caused by taking land for a railroad cannot express opinions as to the separate items of damage to the land not himself,[66] and even where the estimate is made at the request of a judge sitting as a jury.[67] The sufficient reasons for the rejection are that this is precisely the point upon which the jury are to pass,[68] and that the statement is often rather a conclusion than an estimate and involves establishing or using a legal standard of liability,[69]

taken. In re New York, etc., R. Co., 29 Hun (N. Y.) 609. It has been held that the elements of value cannot be so stated, although the distinction seems a fine one. Packard v. Bergen Neck R. Co., 54 N. J. L. 553, 25 Atl. 506, uses to which land is adapted.

The relative damage caused by two acts cannot be stated. Bath v. Houston, etc., R. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1904) 78 S. W. 993, handling cotton for two or three days by a railroad company as compared to exposure for three months in the open air.

Additional reasons for rejection.— Where the statement is not so much an inference or estimate as a conclusion based in part upon unsworn statements, additional reason is furnished for rejecting it. Johnson v. Beaney, 9 Ill. App. 64. Additional objection also exists to receiving a question which cannot be covered by a single answer (Michigan Southern, etc., R. Co. v. McDonough, 21 Mich. 165, 4 Am. Rep. 466), or where the matter is largely one of conjecture (Friedenwald v. Baltimore, 74 Md. 116, 21 Atl. 555, ladies using street; Chesapeake, etc., Telephone Co. v. Mackenzie, 74 Md. 36, 21 Atl. 690, 28 Am. The possibility of procuring or the actual introduction into the case of better evidence also conduces to the rejection of the conclusion. Lewis v. Burlington Ins. Co., 71 Iowa 97, 32 N. W. 190.

whether the provisions of a will have been followed;[76] or whether any other fact exists upon which the decision of the issue must turn.[77] Putting a fact in issue or involving it with the issue may prevent the jury from receiving a simple inference. So doing cannot give the jury power to coördinate minute and numerous facts or confer on them additional experience. Therefore when, as in case of appraising damages or other connections within the specific function of the jury, the facts cannot be placed before the jury, the inference, conclusion, or judgment is competent.[78] For the same reasons a general statement that a skilled witness is never permitted to state an inference, conclusion, or judgment on a fact within the province of the jury to form[79] would be much too sweeping.[80] In many cases the inferences, conclusions, and judgments of witnesses are received on the precise point covered by the jury's investigation, as abundantly appears later in treating of this subject.[81]

"The witnesses whose testimony was objected to, were not strangers who were called upon to express an abstract opinion as to the amount of damages which a lady would sustain by the breach of promise of marriage, but they were intimate acquaintances, who knew well the social position of the plaintiff, her temperament and disposition, and all her surroundings, and from the knowledge thus acquired they formed their estimate of the damages which she had sustained. It is difficult to conceive how it would have been possible for these witnesses to state all the various facts, or reproduce in language the condition of things, upon which they based their estimates, so as to make the same palpable to the minds of the jury. How could they express in language the degree of sensibility of the lady, or the numerous other impalpable things which went to make up their estimate of the amount of damages which she had sustained?" or other person was competent for the work in which he was engaged; or was or was not habitually negligent.[40] For like reasons a witness, even the actor himself,[41] cannot state his inference as to the existence of contributory negligence[42] or whether a person was or was not in the exercise of due care;[43] or what would constitute reasonable care under given circumstances.[44]

(iv) Harmless Error. If a statement of inference, conclusion, or judgment is accompanied by an enumeration of the facts on which it is based, the error, if any, is usually harmless; as the jury can estimate the true probative value of the statement. Thus, where a witness states, merely by way of summary or introduction, his mental induction or deduction from facts which he gives in detail, the error does not furnish cause for reversing a judgment.[45] By a parity of reasoning the same result follows in a reversed case, as where a proper question as to inference is excluded, while all the facts are stated.[46] The result is the same where the jury, upon the undisputed evidence, must have reached the same conclusion as the witness,[47] or where opinion evidence is admitted on a point which the jury are entirely competent to decide, in accordance with general experience, and the jury follow it.[48] There is an equal absence of apparent prejudice where the inference of an unskilled witness is admitted on a subject which does not require scientific knowledge,[49] or the judgment of an expert witness is rejected as to a matter not of a technical or scientific nature;[50] or where the erroneously admitted statement is not misleading.[51] The same is true where the

That a witness, however, has stated an incompetent conclusion does not entitle him to state the facts on which it is based. same[52] or another[53] witness has testified to the same effect or on the same subject[54] without objection; or where the answer is, as it were, immaterial as covering a question of law,[55] or is favorable to the excepting party.[56]

5. Forms of Opinion. The distinction between fact, inference, conclusion, and judgment is one of degree; showing an increasing proportion of the element of reasoning involved in the statement. Simple statements of fact imply merely the degree of reasoning implied in perception and naming. Inference from observation or sensation presents, in its necessary or intuitive result on the mind, a minimum of the reasoning faculty. A conclusion, based in part on observation and in part upon more complex mental phenomena derived from other sources, as a rule more largely embodies the element of reasoning, while in case of judgment, as that of an "expert," upon facts assumed to be true, the entire mental process is one of reasoning. Inference and conclusion are equally based upon sensation or other states of consciousness. In the case of inference these are immediate and dominant. Conclusion is rather a composite blending of inferences, the original basis of which there is often great difficulty in stating. As the direct sensations, often individually trivial, have occurred, they have been mentally drawn to a hypothesis previously formed as the result of earlier experience in corroboration of the inferences to which such experience has given rise.[57]

B. Statements of Fact — 1. In General. Much effort is expended by judges and counsel during the trial of causes in inducing a witness to state precisely the individual impressions received through his senses rather than the inference or "opinion" which the mind has formed as a result of these sensations.[58] This in the last analysis is a distinction which in many cases it is absolutely impossible to draw.[59]

57. "There is one class of cases in particular, which may be referred to as illustrating our habit of entertaining opinions without any accurate memory of their grounds. That is, the estimates which we form of the characters of persons either in private or public life; our progress of a man's character is derived from observing a number of successive acts, forming in the aggregate his general course of conduct. Now in proportion as our opportunities for observation are multiplied, our judgment is likely to be correct, but the facts from which our ultimate opinion is collected are so numerous, and often so trivial in themselves, that however sound the opinion may be, a large part of them necessarily soon vanish from the memory." Lewis Authority in Matters of Opinion, c. 2, § 4.

Difference in mental process.— The inference of the observer is that which a jury draws when the evidence is received by them from inspection. See infra, XIII. The judgment of the expert, properly so called, is the same as that which the jury forms upon evidence furnished by the statements of documents or witnesses. It follows that the hypothetical question must be confined to the "expert." Wichita v. Coggshall, 3 Kan. App. 540, 43 Pac. 842; Titus v. Gage, 70 Vt. 13, 39 Atl. 246.

58. Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray (Mass.) 71, 79 (where on an issue of sanity, the court said: "All lawyers know how difficult it is to try issues of sanity with the restrictions as to matters of opinion already existing; how hard it is to make witnesses distinguish between matters of fact and opinion on this subject; between the conduct and traits of character they observe, and the impression which that conduct and those traits create, or the mental conclusion to which they lead the mind of the observer. If it were a new question, I should be disposed to allow every witness to give his opinion, subject to cross-examination upon the reasons upon which it is based, his degree of intelligence, and his means of observation. It is at least unwise to increase the existing restrictions."

59. Healy v. Visalia, etc., R. Co., 101 Cal. 585, 589, 36 Pac. 125. "The border line be-

The most simple statement of fact involves an element of coördination, induction, or inference — the merger of observation into perception under the influence of experience.[60] Success in drawing a definite line between fact and inference, in cases of observation, consists in deciding correctly, in any given case, how far down the scale of involution of the less into the more complicated fact a witness can fairly be required to go with advantage to the jury, for inference and fact will frequently be found so blended that it is necessary to admit or reject both.[61] Certain general rules, however, have been established, as to positive inferences from sensation. Where the inference is so usual, natural, or instinctive as to accord with general experience,[62] its statement is received as substantially one of a fact — part of the common stock of knowledge;[63] especially if the fact inferred is collateral and not one within the distinctive field of the jury's investigation.[64] An example is furnished where the witness identifies and names familiar phenomena observed by him;[65] such as alcohol,[66] blood,[67] chlorotween fact and opinion is often very indistinct, and the statement of a fact is frequently only an opinion of the witness. Impressions or sensations caused by external objects are not susceptible of exact reproduction or description in words, nor do they affect every individual alike, and the judgment or opinion of the witnesses by whom they have been experienced is the only mode by which they can be presented to a jury." Healy v. Visalia, etc., R. Co., supra. "In almost every act of our perceiving faculties observation and inference are intimately blended. What we are said to observe is usually a compound result, of which one tenth may be observation and the remaining nine tenths inference." Mills Logic, bk. 4, c. 1, § 2.

60. "When, however, the judgment is of so simple a kind as to become wholly unconscious and the interpretation of the appearances is a matter of general agreement, the object of sensation may be considered a fact." Lewis Authority in Matters of Opinion, c. 1, § 1.

63. "It is true that even the simplest sensations involve some judgment: when a witness reports that he saw an object of a certain shape and size, or at a certain distance, he describes something more than a mere impression on his sense of sight, and his statement implies a theory and explanation of the bare phenomenon. When, however, this judgment is of so simple a kind as to become wholly unconscious, and the interpretation of the appearances is a matter of general agreement, the object of sensation may, for our present purpose, be considered a fact." of human activity not universally known almost inevitably possess knowledge of certain facts not usually known,[81] which should be received on ordinary principles, unless clearly within the distinctive province of the jury, or unless the statement bulks largely in the element of reasoning or that of conjecture.[82] Instances of the admission of this class of facts are extremely numerous.[83] It is not necessary that the skill should be along desirable or even moral lines,[84] nor that the matter should not be one of ordinary use and frequency, provided a particular inference regarding it is outside the scope of the general knowledge of the community as represented by the jury.[85] No reason is perceived why such a witness should be spoken of as an expert;[86] although persons competent to testify as experts are as a rule possessed of such facts, so far as relates to their specialty,[87] and the witness is frequently so designated.[88] The fact offered must be relevant,[89] and to be entitled to weight greater than that accorded to the statement of the ordinary observer should be beyond the experience of an average member of the community.[90] One sufficiently acquainted with any trade or calling is competent to testify as to what was the "state of the art" at a given time;[91] for example, whether a certain device possesses novelty.[92] The more unusual properties of matter may be stated by any one familiar with them.[93]

b. Agriculture.[94] Persons engaged in agriculture may testify to facts generally known in the agricultural world, such as the proper time[95] or method[96] for conducting various farming operations, the average yield of given crops,[97] what constitutes a proper fence,[98] or definite probabilities in farming.[99] They may state what acts are prudent under given circumstances,[1] or the effect of certain forces or operations upon land.[2]

c. Building Trades.[3] The proper manner of conducting ordinary building operations,[4] the "life,"[5] strength,[6] and other characteristics of building materials,[7] including their adaptability for certain purposes,[8] and the effect produced upon them by decay,[9] heat,[10] or a particular act[11] may be stated by a witness skilled in the particular line involved in the inquiry,[12] unless the fact be one within the special function of the jury.[13] What forms of construction would be covered by a certain designation may be stated for like reasons by a competent builder.[14]

d. Cattle and Stock Raising and the Care or Use of Domestic Animals.[15] Witnesses experienced[16] in cattle-raising may state facts generally known in the business.[17] Thus they may state facts with regard to their diseases,[18] unsoundness,[19] or pedigree;[20] the effects of a designated treatment;[21] or the usual method of butchering.[22] Stock raisers may state facts familiar in their art.[23] Persons familiar with the use of horses and other domestic animals may state relevant facts not generally known as to their habits[24] or handling.[25]

e. Chemistry and Physiology.[26] A competent[27] witness may testify as to relevant chemical or physiological facts.[28] A chemist in stating that the corpuscles in the blood of man are larger than those in the blood of some animals,[29] whether writing can be removed by chemicals without discoloring the paper,[30] or the properties of gases[31] is testifying to a fact. That it is not generally known does not make him an "expert."[32]

f. Ecclesiastical Affairs. The testimony of a bishop of the protestant episcopal church showing the organization of a parish and its admission into a diocesan convention, although possibly objectionable as secondary evidence, states matters of fact, and cannot properly be excluded as opinion evidence.[33]

g. Engineering.[34] An engineer may state relevant facts connected with his profession; for example, what constitutes a bridge and its abutments,[35] what is customary bridge construction,[36] the proper method of doing certain work,[37] the natural laws affecting the flow of water in alluvial streams,[38] the proper grade of a railroad,[39] or the result of scientific computations.[40] An electrical engineer can state whether under given circumstances a person would receive an electric shock,[41] or the proper height at which to string electric wires across highways.[42]

h. Foreign and Interstate Law.[43] Any person who, in the opinion of the court of the forum acting under the general rules established in that jurisdiction, is qualified to do so,[44] may testify regarding the existence and nature of a provipetent to testify as to the effect of a stampede on the general appearance and market value of fat cattle); Proctor v. Irvin, 22 Mont. 547, 57 Pac. 183 (hard driving in calving season); Ft. Not properly an expert.— Little propriety as a rule exists for speaking of one who knows the existence of a foreign law or what it means as an "expert." The practice, however, is frequent (Jackson v. Jackson, 82 Md. 17, 33 Atl. 317, 34 L. R. A. 773) and receives color from the fact that the court examines into the qualifications of the witness in both cases, and for much the same reason; although in this case it is merely an application of the ordinary rule that one who offers to state a fact must be shown or assumed to know it. The witness testifies more nearly as an expert when he undertakes to apply the requirements of the foreign law to the facts of a particular case, giving thereby his inference. See infra, this section.

Qualifications of witnesses to foreign law. — In England it is not sufficient that the witness, however learned, has studied the foreign law at a university in a country other than that whose law is in question (Bristow v. Sequeville, 5 Exch. 275, 14 Jur. 674, 19 L. J. Exch. 289; In re Bonelli, 1 P. D. 69, 45 L. J. P. & Adm. 42, 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 32, 24 Wkly. Rep. 255), or has merely studied it outside the country (In re Bonelli, supra; Cartwright v. Cartwright, 26 Wkly. Rep. 684), has frequently studied it on appeal cases before the privy council, or even acted under it on several occasions (Reg. v. Savage, 13 Cox C. C. 178, Scotch marriage). Practical experience in the law of the foreign country is needed. Hence an attorney or an attorney-general, although not a lawyer (Picton's Case, 30 How. St. Tr. 226, 806), an ambassador (In re Dost Aly Khan, 6 P. D. 6, 49 L. J. P. & Adm. 78, 29 Wkly. Rep. 80), or a vice-consul (Lacon v. Higgins, D. & R. N. P. 38, 16 E. C. L. 425, 3 Stark. 178, 3 E. C. L. 643, 25 Rev. 779) of the country, are deemed sufficiently qualified. But professional witnesses are not the only ones so regarded. Vander Donckt v. Thellusson, 8 C. B. 812, 19 L. J. C. P. 12, 65 E. C. L. 812 (a merchant of Belgium who has been commissioner of stocks in Brussels may testify as to the law of Belgium as to the presentation of notes); Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & F. 85, 8 Jur. 793, 8 Eng. Reprint 1034 (a Roman catholic bishop, with the office of coadjutor to a vicar apostolic is a skilled witness as to the matrimonial law of Rome). In matters of ecclesiastical law the English courts of equity may require that a case be stated for the opinion of civilians. Hurst v. Beach, 5 Madd. 351, 21 Rev. Rep. 304 [followed in that respect in Sayre v. Cramp, 2 Wkly. Rep. 438].

A fortiori a claim to knowledge is not sufficient. McKenzie v. Gordon, 1 Nova Scotia Dec. 153.

In the United States one who has studied the foreign law as an intended profession (Dauphin v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 221, France), or has, as an attorney of the court of the former, examined the foreign law for the purposes of a particular case (Temple v. Pasquotank County, 111 N. C. 36, 15 S. E. 886, Maryland), or has acted under it (Pickard v. Bailey, 26 N. H. 152, magistrate; Dauphin v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 221, legal adviser to French legation), or who has made extensive examinations into the subject on which he proposes to speak (Barber v. Mexico International Co., 73 Conn. 587, 48 Atl. 758), or who has been graduated by an institution of learning which required a knowledge of such law (Dauphin v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 221, University of Paris), or who is (Baltimore Consol. Real Estate, etc., Co. v. Cashow, 41 Md. 59, New York; Sierra Madre Constr. Co. v. Brick, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 55 S. W. 521), or has been (Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Caldwell, 68 Ark. 505, 58 S. W. 355, Ohio) a practising attorney of the country or state in question is competent. Mere general study is not necessarily sufficient. Banco De Sonora v. Bankers' Mut. Casualty Co., (Iowa 1903) 95 N. W. 232, holding that a study of the Justinian code does not qualify a person to testify as to a provision in the law of Mexico. The witness need not be a lawyer by profession. Hall v. Costello, 48 N. H. 176, 2 Am. Rep. 207. Sufficient acquaintance with the law of the foreign jurisdiction to show relevancy is alone required. People v. McQuaid, 85 Mich. 123, 48 N. W. 161 (minister on marriage); State v. Behrman, 114 N. C. 797, 19 S. E. 220, 25 L. R. A. 449. See, however, People v. Lambert, 5 Mich. 349, 72 Am. Dec. 49, holding that mere acquaintance with the law of a state incidental to enforcing it as a policeman is not enough.

The witness may refresh his memory or correct or confirm his opinion by reference to books recognized as authority in the foreign jurisdiction. Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Cl. & F. 85, 8 Jur. 793, 8 Eng. Reprint 1034. But the law is to be taken from his evidence. Nelson v. Bridport, 8 Beav. 527, 10 Jur. 871. And while a skilled witness is of superior authority to written documents containing the law he may refresh his memory by examining them. Sussex Peerage Case, supra.

Books and printed matter.—The rule is not abrogated where a statute permits printed copies of written laws to be received as prima facie evidence. Brady v. Palmer, 19 Ohio Cir. Ct. 687, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 27. A contrary view has, however, been held to the effect that the medium of proof provided by the statute constitutes the "best evidence," and must be used unless good excuse is shown. Johnson v. Hesser, 61 Nebr. 631, 85 N. W. 894. Where the evidence is received the documents must affirmatively be shown to be authentic either by direct proof (Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Ware, (Tex. Qualification.— The judgment of the witness as to the construction of a statute enacted by a country cannot control the statute itself, and decisions of the courts of that country as to its meaning. China, etc., Bank v. Morse, 168 N. Y. 458, 61 N. E. 774, 85 Am. St. Rep. 676, 56 L. R. A. 139.

Translation.— The evidence of the skilled witness is competent and peculiarly appropriate when the copy of the law submitted to the court of the forum is in the form of a translation. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Slater, 115 Fed. 593, 53 C. C. A. 239.

Function of court.— The court may examine the laws and documents which have been referred to by the skilled witnesses as a correct statement of the law, "not as evidence per se, but as part of the testimony of the witness." Concha v. Murrieta, 40 Ch. D. 453, 60 L. T. Rep. N. S. 798, per Lopes, L. J. The duty of saying what an instrument means, e. g., the duty of construction, still rests on the presiding justice of the court of the forum, although the work of interpretation has been discharged by witnesses skilled in the foreign laws or languages. The actual state of the law upon a particular subject may be the resultant of many facts of which the written law is but one; and possibly therefore taken alone a misleading one. "Properly speaking," said Lord Denman, in De Bode's Case, 8 Q. B. 208, 55 E. C. L. 208, law of France, "the nature of such evidence is, not to set forth the contents of the written law, but its effect and the state of the law resulting from it. The mere contents, indeed, might often mislead persons not familiar with the particular system of law: the witness is called upon to state what law does result from the instrument." This position of the English courts, that the proper evidence of a foreign law is the testimony of a witness skilled in it was reached by overruling a series of earlier cases to the effect that the law might be proved by a properly authenticated copy of the written law. Lacon v. Higgins, D. & R. N. P. 38, 16 E. C. L. 425, 3 Stark. 178, 3 E. C. L. 643, 25 Rev. Rep. 779. And it is now held that the book containing the written law cannot be read to the jury but must be proved by a witness. Darby v. Ouseley, 1 H. & N. 1, 2 Jur. N. S. 497, 25 L. J. Exch. 227, 4 Wkly. Rep. 463, doctrines of the Roman church.

Where the meaning of the statute is plain or where no construction has been given it the evidence will be rejected. Molson's Bank v. Boardman, 47 Hun (N. Testimony of a lawyer of another state as to what, in the opinion of lawyers there, should be the construction of a statute of that state is not admissible where the language of the statute is plain and there has been no decision of the courts of that state upon the point in controversy. is due to the fact that a building is unoccupied[59] or is near a railroad;[60] or whether a fact in marine[61] or other insurance is material to the risk.[62]

j. Legal Profession.[63] Members of the legal profession, and others acquainted with the conduct of the affairs with which it deals[64] may state facts connected with it.[65] The necessity for receiving this evidence is especially great when the legal terms employed are those of a foreign system of jurisprudence and are in a language foreign to the forum.[66]

k. Manufacturing.[67] Those experienced in manufacturing pursuits may state facts within their knowledge concerning them;[68] the disease-producing effects of certain manufacturing occupations,[69] that certain lines of manufacturing usually classed as dangerous are safe, under stated conditions;[70] the proper method of doing certain manufacturing work;[71] and the effect of acts not so recognized.[72]

l. Mechanics.[73] Those persons who are skilled in mechanical matters[74] are competent to testify as to relevant[75] facts which are familiar in the mechanic arts.[76] Such facts may be simple and involve little of the element of reasoning; as for example the action of natural laws,[77] the limits of ordinary observation,[78]

It is always necessary that adequate knowledge quoad the subject-matter be shown to the satisfaction of the court. See supra, XI, A, 4, a, (II), (III). Where the injury is alleged to be due to an unusual cause, with which a physician is not necessarily brought in contact by experience or reading, special knowledge is required. Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 6 Allen (Mass.) 146, 83 Am. Dec. 621, holding that a physician is not necessarily competent to state the effect of illuminating gas upon the human system.

Students of medicine may, if they feel competent to do so, testify as to facts of medical science, although they have not practised professionally. Tullis v. Kidd, 12 Ala. 648; Murphy v. Murphy, 65 S. W. 165, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1460, effect of alcoholism on the will power.

Non-professional witnesses in the absence of special study or experience are incompetent (Osborne v. Troup, 60 Conn. 485, 23 Atl. 157, nurse; Com. v. Farrell, 187 Pa. St. 408, 41 Atl. 382, undertaker's assistants), but one of an allied profession may testify in relevant medical connections (Citizens' Gaslight, etc., Co. v. O'Brien, 19 Ill. App. 231, holding that a professor of chemistry may state the effect of coal gas upon the human system; State v. Cook, 17 Kan. 392, toxicologist).

Practical experience sufficient and required. — Persons not veterinaries, but having had long and extensive practical experience in the diseases of animals, may testify as to the symptoms of a given disease (Pearson v. Zehr, 138 Ill. 48, 29 N. E. 854, 32 Am. St. Rep. 113; Johnson v. Moffett, 19 Mo. App. 159; Nations v. Love, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 232) or injury (State v. Sheets, 89 N. C. 543, poison).

A physician, although he has never treated an animal for a given sickness, may state its effects. State v. Sheets, 89 N. C. 543.

Insufficient qualification.— Reading (Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Finley, 38 Kan. 550, 16 Pac. 951; Rouse v. Youard, 1 Kan. App. 270, 41 Pac. 426) or even editing a stock journal (Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452), listening to the evidence of skilled witnesses (Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Finley, supra), or observing their methods of treatment (Rouse v. Youard, supra) are not adequate qualifications.

Statutes.— Qualification may be controlled by statute. McCann v. Ullman, 109 Wis. 574, 85 N. W. 493, construing Rev. St. (1898) § 1492*f*, as amended by Laws (1899), c. 82.

98. On cross-examination it is proper to ask the witness as to any relevant cognate facts, and to reject such a question is error. Titus v. Gage, 70 Vt. 13, 39 Atl. 246, "turn of life."

Specialists may be required where the court feels the qualifications of the proposed witness to be insufficient to make his statement of fact helpful to the jury. Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co., 6 Allen (Mass.) 146, 83 Am. Dec. 621, illuminating gas.

New York.— Young v. Johnson, 123 N. Y. 226, 25 N. E. 363 (whether a first act of sexual intercourse would be apt to be fruitful in the absence of consent); Washburn v. National Acc. Soc., 10 N. Y. Suppl. 366 (instantaneous death).

North Carolina.— State v. Morgan, 95 N. C. 641, holding that such a witness may state the means by which death may be produced in a human being and leave no marks upon the body.

Wisconsin.— Crites v. New Richmond, 88 Wis. 55, 73 N. W. 322, sprain.

Canada.— Napier v. Ferguson, 18 N. Brunsw. 415.

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 2337.

An ordinary observer is not competent to state the effect of gunshot wounds (State v. Justus, 11 Oreg. 178, 8 Pac. 337, 50 Am. Rep. 470), or what injury, if any, a woman in a given stage of pregnancy would suffer from poison,[16] or a surgical operation upon the body[17] or mind,[18] but not on the moral nature;[19] conditions of gestation;[20] what certain symptoms indicate[21] or certain medical terms cover.[22] Definite possibilities[23] or probabilities, as that a given disease or injury will induce other troubles,[24] will be permanent,[25] followed by recovery,[26] or require a certain length of time[27] may be classified as facts, provided that no especial exercise of the reasoning faculty is involved. Subjects with which an average jury may fairly be assumed to be already familiar cannot be stated.[28]

n. Mercantile Affairs.[29] A witness acquainted with mercantile affairs,[30] wholesale or retail,[31] may testify as to the usual mode of doing business,[32] the effect of changes in temperature on perishable articles,[33] the percentage of loss caused the sudden jolting of a car (Murray v. Salt Lake City R. Co., 16 Utah 356, 52 Pac. 596).

16. Colorado.— Germania L. Ins. Co. v. Ross-Lewin, 24 Colo. 43, 51 Pac. 488, 65 Am. St. Rep. 215, cyanide of potassium.

Suitable storage.— A dealer in any commodity may well be presumed as a matter of experience to know what kind of place is thereby,[34] or in other ways;[35] the general duties of clerks or officers engaged in mercantile occupations;[36] the effect of certain acts upon mercantile credit;[37] what qualities render an article merchantable,[38] or within a certain trade designation;[39] what tests are applied in grading commodities;[40] or the symbols or ciphers used in a given business.[41]

o. Mining.[42] Facts of mining may be stated by those experienced in the business;[43] as the proper way of doing mining work,[44] the duties of particular employees,[45] or what workings are profitable.[46]

p. Natural History. An ethnologist may state the marks distinguishing different races of mankind.[47] One acquainted with them may state the habits of fish;[48] and in stating the habitat of certain animals a naturalist is merely stating a fact.[49]

q. Nautical Matters.[50] Nautical men of experience may state facts pertaining to their calling; for example the practical effect of natural conditions,[51] the effect of swells made by a large vessel upon a small one heavily laden,[52] the limits of vision,[53] the proper way of doing certain acts,[54] or the duties of the officers or crew under certain conditions.[55] Such a witness may properly state as facts the necessary for its proper preservation. Rust v. Eckler, 41 N. Y. 488.

34. Sexton v. Lamb, 27 Kan. 426, holding that persons in the ice business may testify what percentage is usually lost by melting while being handled.

35. McFadden v. Murdock, L. R. 1 C. L. 211, 15 Wkly. Rep. 1079, where it was said that a retail grocer may state what is a fair percentage to allow for loss in weighing out a large bulk in small quantities.

things should happen.[86] He may testify as to what are the probabilities with regard to certain occurrences.[87] Where a fact in railroad matters is known to a person not connected with the business, the latter may state it,[88] provided he be shown to possess adequate knowledge; mere opportunity for general observation is not sufficient.[89]

s. Street Railways.[90] Persons who are shown to the satisfaction of the court to be skilled in operating street railways may state facts generally known among persons,[91] although the experience of the witness was not acquired on the railway to which his testimony relates.[92] The general officers,[93] if qualified, as well as the operating force, conductors,[94] drivers,[95] or motor men,[96] may testify to the duties of these employees and other facts relating to the operation of the road;[97] the incidental dangers and the possibility of stopping cars[98] or doing other

C. Inference From Sensation; Ordinary Witness — 1. In General — a. Positive Inferences. Direct inference from observation or other states of consciousness may involve a larger element of reasoning faculty than is involved in the statement of a fact. This happens in a simple way, where a witness goes beyond the instinctive, automatic and, as it were, reflex mental impression which is implied in naming objects and testifies, as he may, to their form,[16] color,[17]

York, etc., R. Co., 21 How. (U. S.) 88, 100, 16 L. ed. 68. Cross-examination as to relevant mental state is permitted. Montgomery v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 788, knowledge. See, generally, WITNESSES.

Grounds of rejection.— Irrelevancy is frequently the real ground for rejecting evidence of the mental state of the witness (Laster v. Blackwell, 128 Ala. 143, 30 So. 663; Manchester F. Assur. Co. v. Feibelman, 118 Ala. 308, 23 So. 759, whom witness thought he was dealing with; Mobile Furniture Commission Co. v. Little, 108 Ala. 399, 19 So. 443; Tubins v. District of Columbia, 21 App. Cas. condition.[25] It follows that when a witness is injured he may testify as to his pain[26] or symptoms,[27] or as to the general effect of the injuries upon his mind or body, so far as his knowledge on the subject enables him to go, although he cannot draw technical inferences as the existence of internal trouble,[28] the effect on health,[29] whether the injuries are permanent,[30] and the like.

b. Negative Inferences. The inference that something did not exist because one who could have done so did not notice it may be designated a negative inference. In proportion as the mental process is of the necessary intuitive nature characteristic of a mere statement of fact, as for example where it is clearly shown, either directly[31] or by relevant facts,[32] that if a certain event had occurred or fact existed the witness must have observed it, the evidence is received,[33] and the observing witness is permitted to state in connection with such proof the probability[34] or certainty that he would have heard,[35] seen,[36] or in other ways observed an alleged occurrence had it actually taken place.[37] On the other hand, where the inference is largely the result of reason, it should be rejected, both in civil[38] and criminal[39] cases.

c. Reason For Admissibility. In most instances a witness is permitted to state other than intuitive inference from his sensations, because he can state the exact photographic effect on his mind only in that way. This is more nearly true of appearances than of acts.[40] In general if constituent impressions are so many,[41]

"The admissibility of the evidence rests upon three necessary conditions: 1. That the witness detail to the jury, so far as he is able, the facts and circumstances upon which his opinion is based, in order that the jury may have some basis by which to judge of the value of the opinion. 2. That the subject-matter to which the testimony relates cannot be reproduced and described to the jury precisely as it appeared to the witness at the time. And 3. That the facts upon which the witness is called upon to express his opinion are such as men in general are capable of comprehending and understanding. When these conditions have been complied with or fulfilled in a given case, the court must then pass upon the question whether the witness had the opportunity and means of inquiry, and was careful and intelligent in his observation and examination. It is not the mere qualification of the witness, but the extent and thoroughness of his examination, the specific facts to which the inquiry relates and the general character of those facts, as affording to one, having his opportunity to judge, the requisite means to form an opinion." People v. Hopt, 4 Utah 247, 253, 9 Pac. 407.

Cross-examination.— The facts may, however, be called for upon cross-examination (Steiner v. Tranum, 98 Ala. 315, 13 So. 365; Woodstock Iron Co. v. Roberts, 87 Ala. 436, 6 So. 349; Bennett v. Fail, 26 Ala. 605; Lund v. Tyngsborough, 9 Cush. St. 820; Fulcher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 465, 13 S. W. 750). Under the rule, "when the opinion is the mere shorthand rendering of facts, then the opinion can be given, subject to cross-examination as to the facts upon which it is based," evidence that, after the shooting, the deceased spoke to and "identified" defendant as the man who shot him is competent and not a mere expression of opinion. Fulcher v. State, 28 Tex. App. 465, 13 S. W. 750.

Facts not stated.— Where an essential fact is not stated (People v. Smith, 172 N. Y. 210, 64 N. E. 814), a fortiori, where no constituent facts are given (Pioneer Sav., etc., Co. v. Peck, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 49 S. W. 160), the inference will be rejected.

48. See, generally, as to knowledge of witness, supra, XI, A, 4, a, (II), (III). The witness is not permitted to add to the facts from his previous knowledge, although experience necessarily plays an important part in determining the inference itself. State v. Stickley, 41 Iowa 232.

sensation is not a quasi-necessary one, as in the ordinary case of a fact,[53] and the sensations from which the inference is drawn can be placed before the jury with satisfactory completeness,[54] and these facts in turn can be properly coördinated by the jury,[55] no necessity is shown for accepting such an inference and it is accordingly rejected.[56]

Facts not within experience of men in general.— It is not material that the facts stated are those observed by skilled or trained witnesses and are so far removed from the experience of men in general that a jury could not presumably draw the correct inference if these facts could have been placed before them exactly as observed by the witness. Pennsylvania Co. v. Conlan, 101 Ill. 93 (switch-men); Koccis v. State, 56 N. J. L. 44, 27 Atl. 800; Lund v. Masonic L. Assoc., 81 Hun (N. Y.) 287, 30 N. Y. Suppl. 775.

Where the jury cannot coördinate the facts it is not necessary to state them. Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Kirven, 57 S. C. 445, 35 S. E. 745.

Maryland.— Baltimore, etc., Co. v. Cassell, 66 Md. 419, 432, 7 Atl. 805, 59 Am. Rep. 175, where the court said: "If ordinary individuals could not judge of a person's health from his appearance and symptoms, it would be impossible to know when it was necessary to call in a physician. If a man received a blow from a heavy bludgeon on his lower limbs, certainly an unlearned person, who observed the occurrence, could testify that after the infliction of the blow his appearance whether the charge is from sickness to health,[68] or from health to sickness,[69] or from bad to worse,[70] or from worse to better.[71] He may also infer and state that a person's ability to help himself,[72] or his faculties,[73] or the use of his limbs[74] or other parts of his body,[75] or his earning capacity[76] has or has not been

was that of a crippled man, but not before. The testimony shows that the plaintiff was thrown down a declivity and after the accident could not walk, but was carried home, and certainly any one who then saw him was competent to say whether his appearance was that of a disabled man or one in a sound condition of health."

The evidence has been rejected where the estimate involves a large proportion of the personal mentality or morality of the observer (Brinkley v. State, 89 Ala. 34, 8 So. 22, 18 Am. St. Rep. 87, indecent dancing), as whether a person is a "careful driver," it object,[58] and the emotions,[59] influence,[60] or other causes from which he infers it took place, and what relations they indicate between two persons.[61] The inference as to conduct may be stated in the form of the existence of habits,[62] including sobriety [63] or intoxication,[64] or characteristic traits of the actor.[65] He may measure conduct observed by him by the standard of care,[66] correct performance,[67] honorable dealing,[68] mechanical skill,[69] necessity,[70] propriety,[71] or safety.[72] The facts upon which the inference is based should be stated by the witness.[73]

4. Estimates — a. In General. The court, in discharging its administrative function of securing for the jury the best evidence fairly available, may well, where accurate measurements, weights, or other applications of standards to phenomena are available, reject the estimate of a witness in such matters.[74] While, however, as is said by the supreme court of Illinois, that, of course, would be the very best kind of evidence, from the nature of things it is absolutely necessary that a lower grade of evidence should be admissible.[75]

While the general rule is that the opinion of a witness is inadmissible except when the inquiry involves a question of skill or science, and the witness possesses a peculiar knowledge of the subject, acquired by study or experience, there are well recognized exceptions to the rule, and among these exceptions are instances which involve a description or estimate of magnitude, size, dimension, velocity, value, etc., and when, from the nature of the subject under investigation, it is difficult or impossible to state with sufficient exactness, or in detail, the facts, with their surroundings, in such a manner as to produce upon the minds of the jury the impression that a personal observation has produced upon the mind of the witness. In such cases it is permissible for the witness who has had the benefit of personal examination to supplement the statement of facts detailed by him with his opinion or conclusion. Such testimony is not an opinion in its ordinary sense, which is an inference as to what will follow from a given state of facts, but rather the statement of a result that has happened and is observable as an existing condition"); Osten v. Jerome, 93 Mich. 196, 199, 53 N. that sufficient constituent facts are stated[33] and the witness is shown to be capable of drawing a reasonable inference.[34]

g. Dimensions. An observer may state his estimate of size, including height, depth, breadth, thickness, and width,[35] and any change in these or other dimensions.[36] The statement is merely one of fact as to which any person who has applied the measurements may testify,[37] with weight proportionate to his age and experience.[38] But where all dimensions and other material facts can be placed before a jury with exactness a witness will not be permitted to state his inference.[39]

h. Direction. A witness may state as a fact the direction in which motion takes place;[40] as for example the point from which a carriage seemed to come,[41] or the starting point of a fire,[42] or the direction in which force is applied,[43] or from which a sound proceeds.[44]

i. Distance. Rep. 401, where it was said: "It would seem to be within the knowledge of men in general, when looking at the effects of a blow upon a solid body, to determine from the external marks and indications, if any exist, the direction from which it came. In the great majority of cases, these indications are distinct and plain, and to observe them is within the constant experience of men. Take the case of a heavy body striking on the ground. A falling shot or fragment of rock leaves a very different mark, according as it strikes the ground vertically or at an angle; and if at an angle, the general direction from which it came would be apparent to the common eye. In like manner, a contusion on an upright surface might plainly indicate the direction of the blow. Suppose the panel of a carriage door is broken in by a collision; different appearances would follow from a horizontal blow delivered at right angles, than from a blow from the front or rear, from above or below. Such appearances the common observer can detect, some more accurately and clearly than others, but it is presumed to be within the power of all; and the opinion of an expert, who has experimented by blows on similar surfaces, and is learned in the law of forces, is not necessary or required. If the panel itself is introduced to the jury, they are competent and able to decide the question. If it cannot be, the witness who saw it may describe, as well as he can, what he saw, and state the conclusion he formed at the time."

j. Force. The estimate of causation[54] may take the form of stating the effect of a force; as of stating whether a person could continue in a sitting or standing position, after the force was applied;[55] the strength of a force,[56] whether force not be excluded without substantially excluding the fact also, a fact which may be an important element in the formation of the verdict. Among instances of this class, forming an exception to the general rule, is the proof of identity in a great variety of cases; such as the identity of person, handwriting, animals, and inanimate objects; and so where the identity is detected by the ear, or by the sound of the human voice, of a musical instrument, the discharge of a pistol, and the like. In the same class are opinions as to distances, size, weight and age. In these and an infinite variety of other cases, the conclusion is drawn from evidence addressed to the eye or ear or both, and which, from its very nature, cannot be described to another. If it could be, so as to enable a jury to decide, then the necessity of receiving the opinion, if it may be so called, would not exist, and the opinion should not be received."

p. Quantity. A witness may state his estimate of quantity, either absolute,[80] comparative,[81] or as deemed requisite for a future result,[82] provided that he appears to possess sufficient knowledge[83] and data[84] on which to ground an inference,[85] and that he shows this by stating the facts on which his inference is based.[86] The knowledge must be commensurate with the nature of the subject-matter;[87] but where knowledge is general a specialist is not required, although such an inference would have greater weight.[88]

q. Speed. An observer may state his estimate of the apparent speed of moving objects, as animals,[89] a dummy engine,[90] an electric,[91] or hand[92] car, a car-

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," §§ 2202, 2270.

The weight of the evidence is affected by the fact that the witness is not specially skilled in railroad matters (Stone v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 72 N. H. 206, 55 Atl. 359; Robinson v. Louisville R. Co., 112 Fed. 484, 50 C. C. A. 357), or was not in a position to know the fact (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Bell, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 579, 58 S. W. 614). But while technical training may add to the probative weight of the inference (Brown v. Rosedale St. R. Co., (Tex. App. 1890) 15 S. W. 120, engineers, firemen, etc.), it cannot be ruled, as matter of law, that the railroad man's opinion is entitled to the greater weight (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Gobin, 52 Ill. App. 565).

A witness is not excluded because he does not know the number of rods or feet which constitute a mile (Ward v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 85 Wis. 601, 55 N. W. 771), or even though the witness may characterize his estimate as a "guess" (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Orr, 121 Ala. 489, 26 So. 35. Compare supra, XI, A, 1, note 37) or may say that a train is going fast or slow, although he cannot tell how fast or slow it was going (Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Ashline, 171 Ill. 313, 49 N. E. 521; Overtoom v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 80 Ill. App. 515).

Estimate from force of collision.— A plaintiff, who has not seen a train coming cannot estimate its speed from the force of the blow which he receives. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Hayes, 87 Fed. 129, 30 C. C. A. 576.

an expert and need not have the training of one,[97] although he characterizes the rate of speed as dangerous,[98] "fast,"[99] "high,"[1] "very fast,"[2] "reckless,"[3] or "unusual,"[4] or judges of it by hearing rather than sight,[5] or applies other standards than distance traversed as related to time, as that of safety.[6] The witness should state the facts upon which he bases his inference,[7] and must be shown to have had adequate facilities for observation[8] and to have improved them,[9] although his claim to knowledge may be accepted as a prima facie qualification,[10] and knowledge of time and distance are alone required.[11]

r. Temperature. A witness, in estimating temperature, either in a general way,[12] or in connection with a given event, as the freezing of potatoes,[13] is merely stating a fact.

s. Time and Duration. The point of time[14] and its duration, either generally[15] or between two events,[16] is a matter of fact which a witness may state in the form

The opinion might not be so accurate and reliable as that of one who had been accustomed to observe, with time-piece in hand, the motion of an object of such size and momentum; but this would only go to the weight of the testimony, and not to its admissibility"); Chicago, etc., R. Qualifications of observer.— Observation and a knowledge of time and distance is all that are necessary to an inference (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Gunderson, 174 Ill. 495, 51 N. E. 708 (familiar); Detroit, etc., R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99), although the statements of others may assist in constituting the basis of the inference (Thomas v. Chicago, etc., R. of an estimate. One possessed of adequate knowledge may properly estimate the length of time required for certain usual acts [17] or occurrences.[18]

t. Value — (i) In General. An observer, after detailing such facts as fairly exhaust his power of statement may, if sufficiently familiar with property to make his inference relevant,[19] state his estimate of its value.[20] Where the property has no market value,[21] this is practically the only available method of proof.[22] The evidence may properly relate to a time prior [23] or subsequent to that involved in the controversy, provided the court regards the period as not too remote to be relevant, the length of the interval within these limits merely affecting the weight of the evidence.[24] Absence of value may be shown in the same way, although the negative statement is rather a fact than an estimate.[25]

Even where there is strictly speaking no market value the estimate of the witness is largely controlled by what would be the fair price of the property if a market could be found for it; and in considering what such price would be, the value of similar articles, the cost of these when new, the amount of depreciation in use, and the like may affect the estimate of the witness or of the jury; the ultimate standard still being what a fair-minded purchaser would be willing to give and a fair-minded seller be willing to take. Filson v. Territory, 11 Okla. 351, 67 Pac. 473. This standard is frequently spoken of as "market value." It has been intimated that the existence of better evidence may exclude an estimate.[26]

(II) Basis of Opinion—(A) In General. A witness as to value will be permitted and may be required to detail the facts upon which his estimate, inference, conclusion, or judgment is based,[27] whether as to the value of real[28] or personal[29] property or services,[30] even if the facts relied on are incompetent to affect value in the particular case,[31] including the elements of damage[32] or value.[33] In like manner a skilled witness testifying as an expert may give the reasons for his judgment.[34] The basis may include the result of inquiries made of others,[35] or the facts of relevant sales known to the witness.[36] An estimate not so fortified may be rejected, as the reliability of the estimate cannot be determined.[37] It is not material that the witness acquired his knowledge of the value of the property in question subsequent to its loss.[38] Where, in the opinion of the trial judge the basis of fact is insufficient, the estimate will be rejected.[39] Where it is received

Extent of knowledge.— "There is no rule of law, and there can be none, defining how much a witness shall know of property before he can be permitted to give an opinion of its value. He must have some acquaintance with it sufficient to enable him to form some estimate of its value, and then it is for the jury to determine how much weight to attach to such estimate." Deduced value.— A witness may testify to a value deduced from that of other property with which the witness as well as the general community is familiar. For example the value of flour, given the price of wheat. Hood v. Maxwell, 1 W. Va. 219. As to other similar property see supra, XI, C, 4, t, (II), (B).

Knowledge of actual sales is not needed. Greeley County v. Gebhart, (Nebr. 1902) 89 N. W. 753.

Not an expert.— To qualify a witness it is not necessary to show that he has had experience in buying and selling the class of property under investigation. Such a requirement involves a confusion of thought. To testify as an expert requires familiarity with the values of that kind of property, and the experience necessary to classification by quality, etc., and this must be affirmatively shown. But in most cases to testify from observation to value the only requirement is familiarity with the property itself. Ohio, etc., R. Co. v. Taylor, 27 Ill. 207; Continental Ins. Co. v. Horton, 28 Mich. 173; Willison v. Smith, 60 Mo. App. 469; and other cases cited infra, XI, C, 4, t, (III), (C).

A claim by a witness to knowledge, although not unqualified (Bell v. Keach, 3 Ky. L. Rep. 520, "guessing;" Johnston v. Farmers' F. Ins. Co., 106 Mich. 96, 64 N. W. 5; Bischoff v. Schulz, 5 N. Y. Suppl. 757, "something;" Harris v. Schuttler, (Tex. Civ. App. 1893) 24 S. W. 989, "tolerably"), as to the value of real (Union Elevator Co. v. Kansas City Suburban Belt R. Co., (Mo. Sup. 1896) 33 S. W. 926; and cases following) or personal (State v. Montgomery, (S. D. 1903) 97 N. W. 716, hogs; and cases following) prop-description is an element of qualification.[65] Whatever the qualification is alleged to be sufficiency of knowledge on the part of the witness is a preliminary question of fact for the decision of the trial judge.[66] In any specific instance the exercise of administrative discretion is apt to be a resultant of certain main considerations: (1) The nature of the property; (2) the opportunity for observation enjoyed by the witness; (3) his capacity for forming a reasonable inference; and (4) ability to procure probative evidence. In proportion as the property is common in its nature the number of qualified witnesses will increase.[67] Other conditions being equal a witness is valuable to the jury in proportion to his opportunities for observation, past experience, and ability to coördinate his knowledge into a reasonable conclusion.[68] The evidence is most freely received where the facts upon which an estimate is based cannot be placed before the jury or are of a nature beyond ordinary experience, and where more cogent evidence is not available.[69]

(B) Owner—(1) PERSONAL PROPERTY. The owner of chattels is qualified

erty, has been deemed to establish, in the absence of conflicting evidence, a prima facie qualification (Wichita R. Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 104, 16 Pac. 75; Central Branch Union Pac. R. Co. v. Andrews, 37 Kan. 162, 14 Pac. 509; Browne v. Moore, 32 Mich. 254; Union Elevator Co. v. Kansas City Suburban Belt R. Co., (Mo. 1896) 33 S. W. 926; St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. St. Louis Union Stock Yards Co., 120 Mo. 541, 25 S. W. 399; Bowne v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 46 Mo. App. 473; Southeastern Nebraska R. Co. v. Frazier, 25 Nebr. 53, 40 N. W. 609; Sioux City, etc., R. Co. v. Weimer, 16 Nebr. 272, 20 N. W. 349; Smith v. Hill, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 656; Moore v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 78 Wis. 120, 47 N. W. 273), leaving the fact of actual knowledge to be tested upon cross-examination (Bowne v. Hartford F. Ins. Co., 46 Mo. App. 473; Moore v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 28 Wis. 120, 47 N. W. 273), the evidence remaining unaffected as evidence if the opportunity for cross-examination is declined and by consequence the basis of the claim is not disclosed (Wilson v. Harnette, (Colo. Sup. 1904) 75 Pac. 395). Probably such an assumption would obtain only in case of matters within the general range of experience. A witness may be deemed qualified although he cautiously disclaims entire familiarity (Johnson v. Farmers' F. Ins. Co., 106 Mich. 96, 64 N. W. 5, "very nearly" knows; Harris v. Schuttler, (Tex. Civ. App. 1893) 24 S. W. 989, tolerably acquainted; Stolze v. Manitowoc Terminal Co., 100 Wis. 208, 75 N. W. 987, somewhat familiar); but if the witness expressly denies any knowledge on the subject he is incompetent (Clausen v. Tjenagel, 91 Iowa 285, 59 N. W. 277).

That the estimate is made by one who has been a public officer, as an assessor, charged with the duty of appraising property may be an adequate qualification. Muskeget Island Club v. Nantucket, 185 Mass. 303, 70 N. E. 61.

When action of court reviewed.— A ruling admitting witnesses as to value will not be reviewed except in case of a total lack of knowledge or palpable abuse of discretion. Fox v. Cox, 20 Ind. App. 61, 50 N. E. 92. Every reasonable assumption will be indulged in favor of the reasonableness of the finding (Kent Furniture Mfg. Co. v. Ransom, 46 Mich. 416, 9 N. W. 454; Stevens v. Benton, 39 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 13); and it is no ground in itself for reversal that the appellate court thinks that the finding might with greater propriety have been the other way (Conness v. Com., 184 Mass. 341, 69 N. E. 341). It has even been said that the action of the court is not reviewable (Taylor v. Roger Williams Ins. Co., 51 N. H. 50; Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452); but in most states the rule is otherwise, and the action of the lower court will be reviewed and the judgment reversed in case of clear abuse of discretion (Seurer v. Horst, 31 Minn. 479, 18 N. W. 283; Murphy v. Murphy, 22 Mo. App. 18).

67. Jones v. Erie, etc., R. Co., 151 Pa. St. 30, 48, 25 Atl. 134, 31 Am. St. Rep. 722, 17 L. R. A. 758, where it is said: "The value of a house or a piece of ground is a subject upon which all persons familiar with the property who have formed an opinion are competent to speak." It is otherwise of a trotting horse. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Calumet Stock Farm, 96 Ill. App. 337.

68. There is reason for thinking that the better and more consistent rule would be to admit the evidence as to value of any one acquainted with the property, which is mainly a question of fact, leaving in all cases to the jury the question of weight as tested by the entire examination. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Payne, 57 Kan. 291, 46 Pac. 315; Carpenter v. Robinson, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,431, Holmes 67.

Not an expert.— Such a witness cannot testify as an expert to an inference as to the probable effect of a sluiceway, based upon a interest[15] or element of value[16] therein; or its rental value[17] or the right to use it;[18] even though the real estate is in an unusual and speculative form, as a quarry,[19] an ore bank or vein,[20] or an undeveloped "prospect" in mineral lands,[21] may be estimated by one acquainted with the value of that class of property who has seen the land,[22] and who is possessed of adequate opportunities for observation[23] and the requisite ability to make a reasonable inference.[24] The knowledge as to the class of property which is required is such as is demanded by the nature of the supposed knowledge of geographical conditions, rainfall, etc., over a large area of country. Kansas, etc., R. Co. v. Cook, 57 Ark. 387, 21 S. W. 1066; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Donelson, 45 Kan. 18, 25 Pac. 584.

22. The knowledge requisite to qualify a witness to testify to his opinion of the value of lands may either be acquired by the performance of official duty, as by a county commissioner or selectman, whose duty it is to lay out public ways, or by an assessor, whose duty it is to ascertain the value of lands for the purpose of taxation; or it may be derived from knowing of sales and purchases of other lands in the vicinity, either by the witness himself or by other persons. Whitman v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 7 Allen (Mass.) 313; Fowler v. Middlesex County Com'rs, 6 Allen (Mass.) 92; Dickenson v. Fitchburg, 13 Gray (Mass.) 546; Russell v. Horn Pond Branch R. Evidence of the value per acre of the land may be received (Schuster v. Chicago Sanitary Dist., 177 Ill. 626, 52 N. E. 855; Pingery v. Cherokee, etc., R. Co., 78 Iowa 438, 43 N. W. 285), there being definite proof as to the number of acres involved (Ball v. Keokuk, etc., R. Co., 71 Iowa 306, 32 N. W. 354).

The value of special features, as a fishing-ground (Boston, etc., R. Co. v. Montgomery, 119 Mass. 114), or of unusual property (Clark v. Rockland Water Power Co., 52 Me. 68, mill), can be testified only by one acquainted with that class of property; but the value of usual features, as that of certain trees to a farmer as a shelter and windbreak (Andrews v. Youmans, 82 Wis. 81, 52 N. W. 23) or for fruit (Bradshaw v. Atkins, 110 Ill. 323; Latham v. Brown, 48 Kan. 190, 29 Pac. 400; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Mouriquand, 45 Kan. 170, 25 Pac. 567), may be stated by any one familiar with the property itself.

It is not necessary that a real-estate broker should live in the neighborhood of the land whose value he is stating (Lyman v. Boston, 164 Mass. 99, 41 N. E. 127) or ever have made a sale there (Amory v. Melrose, 162 Mass. 556, 39 N. E. 276).

One is not competent to testify to the value of land who has never seen the property or been in the neighborhood (Westlake v. St. Lawrence County Mut. Ins. Co., 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 206; Mewes v. Crescent Pipe Line Co., 170 Pa. St. 364, 369, 32 Atl. 1082, 1083; Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Vance, 115 Pa. St. 325, 8 Atl. 764); but lack of knowledge of actual sales (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Blake, 116 Ill. 163, 4 N. E. 488) affects only the weight of the evidence.

Mere opportunity for observation, as by residence in the neighborhood (Reed v. Drais, 67 Cal. 491, 8 Pac. 20; Whitney v. Boston, 98 Mass. 312; Hyman v. Boston Chair Mfg. Co., 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. 116, 13 N. Y. Suppl. 609; Galbraith v. Philadelphia Co., 2 Pa.

subject-matter, although it must be actual.[25] A farmer may state the value of farm lands[26] with which he is acquainted,[27] and, even as to farm land, it is not essential that the witness should be a farmer.[28] Change in value may be stated by the witness, whether in the way of increase or by diminution, as by the erection of a nuisance, etc.,[29] in which case, that of diminution, the estimate is frequently,[30] although improperly,[31] put in the form of an estimate of damages.[32] It naturally is necessary that the witness should have been acquainted with the land or other property prior to the change in condition.[33]

(D) Skilled Witness—(1) In General. Estimates of value may be given by specially skilled witnesses when such testimony will aid the jury.[50] The determination of the question whether the opinion or judgment of such a witness is calculated to aid the jury is one within the discretion of the court,[51] which will not be reversed except in case of manifest error.[52] The knowledge of the witness must be actual,[53] although he cannot testify to instances of sales,[54] and must be commensurate with the estimate or judgment which he proposes to state.[55] Where special skill or exceptional faculties are required, the witness must be shown to possess them.[56] A guess is not an estimate and should be rejected.[57] But it is not required that the training of the witness should be of a technical nature. It is sufficient that the knowledge is adequate quoad the property involved in the inquiry.[58] A farmer, although living at some distance,[59] may state the value of farm lands,[60] or their value as affected by a change in condition.[61] The scope which the examination of the witness may cover is within certain

"This is permitted as an exception to the general rule, and not strictly on the ground that such persons are experts; for such an application of the term would greatly extend its signification. The persons who testify are not supposed to have science or skill superior to that of the jurors; they have merely a knowledge of the particular facts in the case which jurors have not. And as value rests merely in opinion, this exception to the general rule that witnesses must be confined to facts, and cannot give opinions, is founded in necessity and obvious propriety." In New York it has on the contrary been held that the opinion of an expert as to what would have been the value of certain land if an elevated railroad had not been erected.[92] A skilled witness may state relevant facts of experience regarding the effect of certain changes, as the erection of an elevated railroad, upon the value of adjacent property.[93]

(4) Services. A person familiar, although only in a general way,[94] with the value of services rendered, whether agricultural,[95] building,[96] domestic,[97] as board and care,[98] or nursing,[99] mercantile,[1] or professional,[2] may state his judgment as to what it is,[3] provided that the matter is one removed from the knowledge of the general community.[4] It follows that a witness not possessed of special skill or training is not competent.[5] In case of professional services the members of that profession are as a rule competent. Thus an attorney at law is competent to testify as an expert as to the value of the services rendered by another attorney.[6] A

Minnesota.— Allis v. Day, 14 Minn. 516, where the court said: "Services performed by members of the legal profession in conducting litigation fall, we think, within this principle. There is no fixed standard by which their value can be determined; their value and reasonable price vary with the magnitude and importance of the particular case, the degree of responsibility attaching to its management, the difficulty of the questions involved, the ability and reputation of counsel engaged, the labor bestowed, and other matters which will readily occur to the profession. The experience and knowledge of ordinary jurymen do not qualify them to form an opinion as to the value of services of this kind; the case is not one where the opinions of witnesses should be excluded, because they are no better than the opinions physician is in a similar position with regard to the value of medical services;[7] and it has been held that others are not competent to testify on the subject.[8]

(5) Market Value. An estimate of value is admissible only in case a market value does not exist or is not relevant.[9] Where there is a market value, for a relevant use,[10] and it is affirmatively shown[11] or can be assumed[12] that the witness knows what it is,[13] with regard to personal property[14] or real estate,[15] although only as the result of inquiries,[16] or the use of market reports or quotations,[17] prices current,[18] and the like,[19] he should state it[20] as a mere matter of

of the jurymen themselves. On the other hand, practicing lawyers occupy the position of experts as to the questions of this nature; from the character of their business they are not only in the habit of estimating the value of professional services, but they enjoy peculiar advantages for so doing; their opinions of such value should therefore be received, not only because they are qualified to perform them, but because it appears to be impracticable to furnish any more satisfactory evidence."

It would be difficult in cases like this to determine the value of use by a mere statement of the facts. The opinion of a person having a knowledge of the facts would be some evidence, not an absolute guide — not binding upon the jury — but an assistance which would be available in the absence of more reliable proof." But see Dallas, etc., R. Co. v. Chenault, (Civ. App. 1890) 16 S. fact,[21] and as it exists in any relevant market.[22] A witness who does not know what the market value of property is cannot state how it would be affected by designated acts.[23] On the other hand one who knows such market value may testify as to the increase [24] or diminution [25] caused by certain occurrences, what the occurrences were which occasioned the change,[26] and how the market value will be affected by definite changes in the condition of the property.[27]

(E) Skilled Witnesses Testifying as Experts — (1) In General. To apply a monetary standard to property which the witness has not seen demands a widely varying range of qualification, according as the property is within or beyond the range of common experience.[28] In case of articles in common use a standard of value is created in most intelligent minds and no special skill is necessary to make a hypothetical estimate of sufficient probative force to be relevant.[29] But the property must be one which offers some basis for a reasonable judgment. The evidence must be something more than a mere guess or conjecture,[30] and it must not invade the field of the jury's distinctive function.[31] It is especially true, where the facts can be placed fully before the jury and damages are largely speculative, that an expert will not be allowed to speculate for and instead of the jury.[32] No other witnesses can testify as to value on the evidence of another witness.[33]

(2) Personal Property. In case of articles of personal property which are possessed of a special value,[34] as horses[35] or other domestic animals,[36] which are adapted for special purposes, or whose value for any reason is beyond the scope of common experience,[37] persons who have acquired the necessary skill and experience may state upon the evidence of others their conclusion as to value.[38] Such a witness may testify what would be the decrease in value resulting from certain injuries,[39] or the existence of certain faults[40] or defects.[41] As in case of real estate,[42] it is not necessary that the witness' experience should have been of a technical nature. Practical men, trained in the business to which the inquiry relates, are experts for the purpose in hand.[43] An experienced witness may state his judgment as to the value of farm animals[44] or produce,[45] and as to changes in the value due to specified causes.[46]

value[48] of real estate of certain changes in condition; what lands would be affected thereby;[49] the cause of a general depreciation in value of real estate in a particular locality;[50] or the proper capitalization of a company owning certain real property or franchises.[51] A mere conjecture is not competent;[52] and for much the same reason his judgment as to the uses to which the land would be put in the near future is inadmissible.[53]

(4) SERVICES. A skilled witness may state in response to hypothetical questions the value of services rendered in his special line,[54] whether professional, as of law[55] or medicine,[56] or the value of the use of a particular article.[57] The evidence elicited should be more than mere guess work.[58] On the other hand a question need not expressly state facts which are necessarily implied;[59] nor need the witness have heard all the evidence on the subject.[60]

(B) On Cross-Examination. The scope of cross-examination is largely a matter within the administrative discretion of the presiding justice,[64] and considerable latitude has been permitted.[65] A witness may be examined as to his knowl-

Roche v. Baldwin, 135 Cal. 522, 65 Pac. 459, 67 Pac. 903, excluding in a case relative to the value of an attorney's services a question as to what professional income such a valuation would edge of the value of adjacent land.[66] One who has testified as to value may be asked as to rental value,[67] or as to what price he paid,[68] received,[69] or would take[70] for the property. An ordinary,[71] or skilled witness,[72] or such a witness testifying as an expert,[73] may be asked as to the basis of his opinion,[74] or any question which tends to control the basis of fact upon which the witness is grounding his estimate or judgment is competent[75] to discredit his sincerity in testifying as he has done[76] or as to the existence of qualifying facts.[77]

(v) Weight of Evidence. The probative weight to be accorded to the estimates of witnesses as to value or their statements as to the fact of market value as to property or services with which they are or may become familiar[78] is entirely a matter for the jury,[79] whose action is not controlled by the fact that the evidence of the witnesses is uncontradicted.[80] Neither the judgments of experts[81] nor the inference of observers[82] is to be passively received and blindly followed; but of things,[96] is an inference which any one may state who shows himself possessed of adequate knowledge.[97] The witness should give also, in accordance with the rule stated in a previous section, the facts upon which the inference is based,[98] ence may be in the matter of identifying persons. His evidence is competent, the weight being a question for the jury."

See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law," § 1043; 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," §§ 2234, 2294.

Qualifications of witness.— It is indispensable that the estimates of the witnesses be founded on their own personal observation, and not on the testimony of others, or on any hypothetical statement of facts, as is permitted in the case of experts. In some of the cases it is held that the opinions can only be received in connection with facts stated by the witness. In other cases this is not required; as for instance in questions respecting the identity of persons. A witness well acquainted with another usually identifies him without conscious mental effort in the way of comparison or inference. In the absence of striking peculiarities of form or feature the identification may be, and often is, by the mere expression of countenance, which cannot be described. The witness may be correct in his opinion, and yet unable to give a single feature, or color of hair, or eyes, or any particulars as to dress. In such cases the distinction between opinion and fact is so fine that identification is best regarded as a fact, a direct perception of the senses. Ogden v. State, 134 Ill. 599, 25 N. E. 755; Aurora v. Hillman, 90 Ill. 61; Com. v. Dorsey, 103 Mass. 412. Where the inference of identity is merely an act of the reasoning faculty, divorced from direct observation, it is to be rejected. Roziene v. Ball, 51 Iowa 328, 1 N. Character and weight of testimony.— Positive testimony on the point is not indispensable (Thornton v. State, 113 Ala. 43, 21 So. 356, 59 Am. St. Rep. 97, in witness' "best opinion" deemed sufficient; Kent v. State, 94 Ga. 703, 19 S. E. 885; State v. Seymour, 94 Iowa 699, 63 N. W. 661; State v. Howard, 118 Mo. 127, 24 S. E. 794); but the evidence of those who testify from an inspection with the person before them is entitled to greater weight than the testimony of those who state identifying marks (Brack v. Wood, 11 La. Ann. 512). That the figure of the man in question resembled defendant more than any one else known to the witness is competent (State v. Costner, 127 N. C. 566, 37 S. E. 326, 80 Am. St. Rep. 809), but a "thought" or "impression" is not sufficient (People v. Williams, 1 N. Y. Cr. 336): and that a witness was "satisfied" as to the identity has been excluded (Templeton v. Luckett, 75 Fed. 254, 21 C. C. A. 325). Difficulty in identifying particular articles similar to many in common use, such as money (Gady v. State, 83 Ala. 51, 3 So. 429, "looked like" held sufficient; State v. Clark, 27 Utah 55, 74 Pac. 119), or pay checks (Gaines v. State, (Tex. New York.— Wilbur v. Hubbard, 35 Barb. 303, 304, where the court said: "I think it possible for persons to identify a dog [sheep-killing, very coarse voice] by merely hearing it bark, without seeing it. Some persons have such peculiar voices that they can be identified by acquaintances, who hear them talk, without seeing them; and it seems reasonable that some dogs may bark in such a manner, and have such singular voices, that they can be identified in the night time by presons who know them well, by merely hearing them bark, without seeing them. If I am right in this conclusion, the question whether the witnesses satisfactorily identified the defendant's dog as one of the two that were in the lot where the sheep were, the night they were wounded and killed and actually did the mischief complained of, was for the jury to determine."

5. Com. v. Kennedy, 170 Mass. 18, 48 N. E. 770; Smith v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 3 N. D. 555, 58 N. W. 345.

The ground of admissibility lies frequently in the difficulty of stating the facts constituent of the inference. Thornton v. State, 113 Ala. 43, 21 So. 356, 59 Am. St. Rep. 97; Hames v. Brownlee, 63 Ala. 277; Ogden v. People, 134 Ill. 599, 25 N. E. 755; Com. v. Kennedy, 170 Mass. 18, 48 N. E. 770; Smith v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 3 N. D. 555, 58 N. W. 345; State v. Harr, 38 W. Va. 58, 17 S. E. 794. Consequently, where the jury are equally capable of reaching a reasonable conclusion by having the same facts before them, and a question may exist as to the truth of the inference, the statement is rejected. Filer v. Smith, 96 Mich. 347, 55 N. W. 999, 35 Am. St. Rep. 603; People v. Wilson, 3 Park. Cr. (N. Y.) 199; Templeton v. Luckett, 75 Fed. 254, 21 C. C. A. 325.

Expert — Measurements.—An expert (State v. Reitz, 83 N. C. 634), or exact measurements (Baines v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. 490, 66 S. W. 847), are not necessary.

Delay in making a comparison does not exclude the evidence. State v. Sexton, 147 Mo. 89, 48 S. W. 452, delay of two or three days.

Province of jury.— Whether a shoe would have made a certain track (Busby v. State, 77 Ala. 66), or did make it (Livingston v. State, 105 Ala. 127, 16 So. 801; Hodge v. State, 97 Ala. 37, 12 So. 164, 38 Am. St. Rep. 145; Riley v. State, 88 Ala. 193, 7 So. 149), is a question of fact for the jury. In other words the final inference is for them.

7. Busby v. State, 77 Ala. 66; Com. v. Pope, 103 Mass. 440.

The inference, on the other hand, has been rejected, as coming within the distinctive province of the jury. Livingston v. State, 105 Ala. 127, 16 So. 801.

8. James v. State, 104 Ala. 20, 16 So. 94; State v. Millmeier, 102 Iowa 692, 72 N. W. 275; Thompson v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) to have been made by him,[9] or whether certain tracks corresponded with those made by a certain wagon,[10] sleigh,[11] or horse [12] is admissible for similar reasons. In like manner a witness may state whether two pieces of wood came from the same stick or block,[13] or whether the holes in a human body corresponded with those in certain garments.[14]

6. Intoxication. A witness may state whether a person was intoxicated [15] and the extent of his intoxication;[16] and whether he had been drinking [17] or just recovering from a state of drunkenness;[18] but a conclusion as to the capacity of the person in view of his condition is rejected.[19] Facts on which the opinion is that there has been no change in it.[46] The evidence must be given by witnesses in the usual way. Letters indicative of such opinion are not in themselves competent.[47] The witness, wherever possible, should state the grounds of his inference.[48]

77 S. W. 449. Measurements of tracks are competent evidence upon ordinary principles (Thompson v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 449); but the mere size and general configuration of the foot and that the shoe of accused answered the description is not definite enough to enable the witness to state that certain tracks were similar to those of accused (Smith v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 453). It seems an unnecessary refinement to permit a witness to state that the tracks and the object claimed to have made them are equal to the same thing, i. e., a certain length, and refuse to allow him to state that these measurements are equal to each other. Terry v. State, 118 Ala. 79, 23 So. 776. Where all the facts can be placed before the jury the evidence is unnecessary and is accordingly rejected. State v. Green, 40 S. C. 328, 18 S. E. 933, 42 Am. St. Rep. 872; Bluitt v. State, 12 Tex. App. 39, 41 Am. Rep. 666. W. 932), but he may testify that the horse made tracks similar to those in question (Campbell v. State, 23 Ala. 44, holding that the fact that the shoes on the prisoner's horse "seemed to fit in every particular" horse tracks found near the body of deceased is competent; Hester v. State, (Tex. A witness can scarcely convey any intelligible idea upon such a question, without infusing into his testimony more or less of opinion. Mental imbecility is exhibited in part by attitude, by gesture, by the tones of the voice, and the expression of the eye and face. Can these be described in language so as to convey, to one not an eye-witness, an adequate conception of their force?"

c. Insanity — (1) In General. The distinction between deductions by intellectual process of reasoning, from hypothetically stated facts, characteristic of the true "expert," and the inference from observed facts, which are only partially statable, by either an ordinary observer who could not, or by a skilled observer who could if necessary form a judgment as an expert upon hypothetically stated facts, is tested in numerous cases where persons of all degrees of technical training, who have observed the individual in question, are offered as witnesses to testify as to his sanity, and much diversity of opinion has been expressed by courts of equally eminent judicial authority as to whether the inference of an observer, skilled or unskilled, is competent, and if so under what conditions. To a large extent the action of the tribunals of a given state is determined by their opinion as to the probative value of "expert testimony," properly so called.[49] To courts which regard expert testimony or scientific subjects as of exceptional value it is a controlling consideration that the subject of insanity is one of a technical nature,[50] that the popular standard of insanity is not the same as the legal standard,[51] and that special training is needed to appreciate the significance of the facts presented in evidence, while the inference of an observer is frequently colored by his prejudices.[52] Courts whose opinion fails to recognize any special value in expert evidence generally naturally fail to recognize any in this connection.[53] They are impressed with the circumstance that the facts in their entirety frequently elude statement,[54] and that therefore the expert cannot have a complete and accurate basis for his judgment;[55] that many witnesses can make a correct inference easier

By the results it produces in a healthy state, all men have equal evidence that it is; but what it is, how to fathom, span or define its nature, is what we lack direct facts and analogies to enable us to do. Philosophers and physicians are here upon a level with the common masses of our race, and if wiser upon the subject, it is because they have been more astute and attentive observers").

55. Clark v. State, 12 Ohio 483, 490, 40 Am. Dec. 481, where the court said: "Doubtless an opinion formed by a person professionally conversant with the disease, upon the same observations, would be the most reliable; but if formed upon any relation of the facts which the observer would be able to give, it would be difficult to say, in many cases, that it would be the safest. A careful daily observer of a person feigning madness would witness innumerable acts, and expressions of countenance, which, with the attending incidents and circumstances, conclusively satisfying him of the fictitious character of the pretended malady, but which he could never communicate to a jury or scientific man, to give them a fair conception of their real importance. From poverty of language, these facts, should a witness attempt to detail them, would necessarily be mixed up with opinions, general or partial, in spite of his best efforts to avoid it. These are things than they can make a detailed description,[56] that as commonly presented to observation insanity is readily detected, if carried beyond a certain point,[57] and that to reject the inference of an observer with suitable opportunities and faculty for observation is to refuse to consider evidence which is frequently of the highest possible value.[58] Where the evidence of an observer is received he may be required to state the opportunities for observation which he has enjoyed and the facts so far as statable, which have been observed by him and which constitute the basis of his opinion ;[59] and if in the opinion of the presiding justice the facts so stated do not render the witness competent to express an opinion he may be excluded.[60]

(II) Inference From Ordinary Observation— (A) When Admissible— (1) Rule Stated. The inference of a properly qualified, unskilled observer as to the sanity or insanity of a person observed by him is competent in a majority of the American states.[61] The rule in this respect is the same in well known to all persons which our language only enables us to express by words of comparison — such are the peculiar features of the face, indicating an excitement of the passions, affections and emotions of the mind, as hope, fear, love, hatred, pleasure, pain, etc."

Can it be supposed that they would be more likely to form a correct opinion upon such a statement of facts, unaided by the inferences and impressions made upon the witnesses familiar with the ordinary conduct of the individual, than the opinion of those witnesses, formed upon the same facts, better understood, one step farther removed from uncertainty and misapprehension, and aided and illustrated by many minute acts and expressions, etc., which could never be related? Cal Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, has established the peculiar requirement that the observer in order to testify as to sanity must be an "intimate acquaintance." See People v. Barthleman, 120 Cal. 7, 52 Pac. 112. Who comes within the definition is largely within the administrative function of the trial court (People v. Hill, 116 Cal. 562, 48 Pac. 711; Wheelock v. Godfrey, 100 Cal. 578, 35 Pac. 317); but the requirement relates only to the direct inference of sanity or its absence, and any observer may testify whether a person's appearance at a particular time was rational or irrational (People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 592, 75 Pac. 177; People v. McCarthy, 115 Cal. 255, 46 Pac. 1073; Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 633, 36 Pac. 930, 37 Pac. 231. The personal equation of the witness may well be considered. "So different are the forms and habits of observation in different persons" that no general rule can be laid down as to what shall be deemed a sufficient opportunity of observation, other than that in fact it should have enabled the observer to form a belief or judgment thereon. Choice observer as a basis of his inference,[68] and the party offering such a witness is entitled to insist upon putting in these facts.[69] The rule stated applies whether the observer is a skilled observer or an unskilled one;[70] but it has been held that a lay witness may express his opinion that a person is sane, although not that he is insane, without giving the facts on which he founds his opinion.[71] The facts stated must relate to a time which is sufficiently near to be relevant.[72] Where the facts are not sufficient in the opinion of the court,[73] to give a reasonable basis for an inference,[74]

"Intimate acquaintance."— The provision of the California code requiring that the non-expert witness to sanity should be an intimate acquaintance illustrates the doubtful value of legislative definitions in connections where exactness is in the nature of things impossible. It is aptly epitomized by Temple, C., in Carpenter's Estate, 94 Cal. 406, 416, 29 Pac. 1101, where, in speaking of the statute, he says: "Since it requires the drawing of a definite line between things which are separated only by degrees of difference, the rule is and must remain more or less indefinite."

It not only serves, like the hypothetical basis of the expert's opinion, to gauge the value of his inference, but it also serves to show the presiding justice, in applying the preliminary test of competency, as to the opportunities and powers of observation enjoyed by the witness,[80] for it must also affirmatively appear to the satisfaction of the court[81]

In Alabama a witness has been permitted to testify, although unable to assign any basis that the witness has had adequate opportunities for observation.[82] The only additional requirements made of the witnesses is that they should be "people of good common sense."[83] It is not necessary that the facts detailed as the basis of the opinion suggest the same inference to the tribunal as they do to the witness. The very reason for admitting the inference of the witness is because the facts cannot all be placed before the court.[84]

(3) Function of Judge. It must appear in all instances that the inference is both necessary[85] and relevant,[86] not only because the witness possessed adequate opportunities and faculties for observation,[87] but because the observation took place at a time sufficiently recent in the opinion of the court to make the inference of value to the jury.[88] The exercise of discretion as applied to the various conditions of admissibility in relevancy or necessity will not in general be reversed.[89]

As an abstract proposition the question would seem to be one easily solved. In practice, however, a serious difficulty is met in the incapacity to detail specifically all the minor incidents from which the ultimate fact of an intimate acquaintance is deduced. Many persons cannot describe particulars in detail. A witness, as the result of observation, will determine with great accuracy that a given person is intoxicated, but confine him to a detail of the minute appearances that have led him unerringly up to the fact, and he will often fail most signally. The details of conduct, attitude, tones, gestures, words, expression of eye and face, and abnormal movements have either escaped him or he is unable to draw what may be termed a living picture of what he has seen and what is in reality photographed upon his mind. It is much the same in regard to the lesser details which go to make up the status of an intimate acquaintance, and the court having the witness before it is better able to determine the relation of the parties from the evidence given than can be done from a cold record of the words spoken"); Carpenter's Estate, 79 Cal. 382, 21 Pac. 835; People v. Fine, 77 Cal. 147, 19 Pac. 269; People v. Levy, 71 Cal. 18, 12 Pac. 791; People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50; Hite v. Com., 20 S. (4) Subscribing Witnesses. The English rule permitting the attesting witnesses to a will or deed to testify as to the sanity of a testator or grantor at the time of executing the instrument[90] obtains also in many states of the American Union,[91] even in jurisdictions where the inferences of other unskilled observers are rejected.[92]

It may be given, although the witness was suddenly called in, and heard only the request to sign and the declaration of its being his last will. It is undoubtedly true that all the facts seen or known by the witness at the time are proper subjects of inquiry by either party, and it is proper that they should be. But it is not legally necessary that all should be detailed by the witness, if not asked by either party, before he can give his opinion. The weight and value of his opinion may depend very much upon his means of observation and knowledge; and if he can give few grounds for his belief or opinion his testimony would, doubtless, have very little weight with the jury. But it is for the parties to bring out from the witness such facts as they deem important, touching the extent of knowledge on which the witness bases his opinion." The witness may also state to an extent usually denied that the decedent possessed testamentary capacity. Jones v. Collins, 94 Md. 403, 51 Atl. 398.

The reasons assigned for so striking an exemption have been various. In Massachusetts it has been said that they were "with the testator when he signed the will and required to notice the state of his mind;" a statement of obviously limited exactness. Needham v. Ide, 5 Pick. (Mass.) 510, 511. See also Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 346, 348, 23 N. E. 105, 15 Am. St. Rep. 206, 5 L. R. A. 790, where Knowlton, J., said: "The witnesses are chosen by the testator and are thereby, under the law, charged with an important duty in relation to the execution and proof of the will." In New York the admission is rested on the ground of necessity. Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681.

The only fact which the attesting witness is permitted to state is as to his inference

It is not necessary to the competency of the subscribing witness to a will that he should sustain the will.[93] Nor is his inference conclusive.[94] He may be contradicted[95] or impeached, as by proof of contradictory statements.[96]

(B) When Inadmissible. While the consensus of a majority of the American and English jurisdictions admits the inferences as to sanity or insanity which observers draw from the appearance and from the conduct of a particular individual, such is not the universal rule.[97] In certain states, as Maine,[98] Massachusetts,[99]

as to sanity at the time of executing the will. Walker v. Walker, 34 Ala. 469; Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 369, 16 Am. Rep. 473; Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 346, 23 N. E. 105, 15 Am. He cannot testify as to decedent's mental capacity to make a will, that being a question of law (Hall v. Perry, 87 Me. 569, 33 Atl. 160, 47 Am. St. Rep. 352), nor can he state an inference formed from observations made since the execution of the will (Williams v. Spencer, 150 Mass. 346, 23 N. E. 105, 15 Am. St. Rep. 206, 5 L. R. A. 790), or formed at the time of the execution of a codicil as to testamentary capacity at the time the original will was executed (Melanefy v. Morrison, 152 Mass. 473, 26 N. E. 36).

98. Wyman v. Gould, 47 Me. 159. An expert only can be permitted to state how a person "appeared" as to soundness of mind. Wyman v. Gould, 47 Me. 159. The ruling seems to have been adopted upon slight consideration. Wyman v. Gould, supra. The rule is restricted to the closest possible limits. In Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 369, 410, 16 Am. Rep. 473, Kent, J., said: "Certainly nothing less than a distinct expression of the opinion of the witness, given as such opinion directly, comes within our rule." Accordingly it was held in that case that witnesses may properly state in connection with the facts observed that they "did not observe any failure of mind," and that they "observed nothing peculiar." "Mere negations," said the court, "such as stated by these witnesses, do not give to the jury an affirmative opinion. They, at most, state negatively that nothing was observed by them. This is not an opinion of the witness, but had relation to a fact, as to the condition of the person." To the same effect see Fayette v. Chesterville, 77 Me. 28, 52 Am. Rep. 741. See also Ware v. Ware, 8 Me. 42.

99. McCoy v. Jordan, 184 Mass. 575, 69 N. E. 358 (holding that statements that testator's powers seemed to be complete and perfect, and that he was in possession of clear faculties and mental powers were conclusions and not responsive to questions calling for observation of testator's powers of comprehension, memory, etc., and that the direct inference of the witness as to testator's mental capacity was properly rejected); Ratigan v. Judge, 181 Mass. 572, 64 N. A discredited rule.— The later decisions in Massachusetts indorse the view of Justice Thomas in Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray 71, 79: "All lawyers know how difficult it is to try issues of sanity with the restrictions as to matters of opinion already existing; how hard it is to make witnesses distinguish between matters of fact and opinion on this subject; between the conduct and traits of character they observe, and the impression which that conduct and those traits create, or the mental conclusion to which they lead the mind. If it were a new question, I should be disposed to allow every witness to give his opinion, subject to cross-examination upon the reasons upon which it is based, his degree of intelligence, and his means of observation. It is at least unwise to increase the existing restrictions." See Com. v. Brayman, 136 Mass. 438. Later cases, while not covering the precise point under consideration, are practically, in their reasoning, inconsistent with the recognized rule. For example it has been held that witnesses may state whether there has been "an apparent change in a man's intelligence or understanding, or a want of coherence in his remarks." This is said to be not a matter of opinion, "but of fact, as to which any witness who has had opportunity to observe may testify, in order to put before the court or jury the acts and conduct from which the degree of his mental capacity may be inferred." Barker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477, 487. On an issue as to a testator's mental soundness, a witness who three weeks before the date of the will observed no incoherence of thought in the testator nor anything unusual or singular in respect to his mental condition, may state that fact. McCoy v. Jordan, 184 Mass. 575, 69 N. E. 358; Hogan v. Roche, 179 Mass. 510, 61 N. E. 57; McConnell v. Wildes, 153 Mass. 487, 26 N. E. 1114; Nash v. Hunt, 116 and New York,[1] although frequently with increasing reluctance, indicated by a

Mass. 237. A witness may testify that a boy "had no memory, that he was not a bright boy, and had to be told once or twice before he understood, and that sometimes, if you asked him a question, he would answer something else." The court said: "These are matters upon which ordinary people are capable of forming an intelligent opinion, and which do not require an expert to answer them." Laplante v. Warren Cotton Mills, 165 Mass. 487, 489, 43 N. E. 294. A statement of the degree of intelligence characteristic of a person may be stated (Hewitt v. Taunton St. R. Co., 167 Mass. 483, 46 N. E. 106, that a boy was of average intelligence) or any lack of memory (McCoy v. Jordan, 184 Mass. 575, 69 N. E. 358). Much of any remaining force in the rule is removed by a recent line of cases holding that an observer may be asked "whether he had observed any fact which led him to infer that there was any derangement of intellect." Hewitt v. Taunton St. R. Co., 167 Mass. 483, 46 N. E. 106; McConnell v. Wildes, 153 Mass. 487, 26 N. E. 1114; May v. Bradlee, 127 Mass. 414. This is truly said not to be "opinion." But the difference between permitting a witness to state his inference from observed facts as to insanity and allowing him to state whether his observation discloses anything which leads to an inference of insanity seems one of words rather than of ideas. A still further approximation to the general rule obtains to the effect that witnesses who have had suitable opportunities for observation may state as to whether there has been a change in mental powers. Clark v. Clark, 168 Mass. 523, 47 N. E. 510; Com. v. Brayman, 136 Mass. 438; Barker v. Comins, 110 Mass. 477. The fact of how the person in question impressed a witness in the matter of sanity may be elicited on cross-examination. Hogan v. Roche, 179 Mass. 510, 61 N. E. 57. A witness cannot state his opinion as to his own mental soundness at a particular time. O'Connell v. Beecher, 21 N. Y. App. Div. 298, 47 N. Y. Suppl. 334. A fortiori an ordinary observer cannot testify as to sanity from observations made by others. Bell v. McMaster, 29 Hun (N. Y.) 272.

The history of the rule in New York is peculiar. The evidence of ordinary observers as to sanity was at first rejected against a strong dissenting opinion by Judge Denio. Dewitt v. Barley, 9 N. Y. 371. The reasoning of the dissenting opinion was adopted by the majority in a subsequent hearing of the same case. De Witt v. Barly, 17 N. Y. 340. This ruling was again reversed in later cases and the earlier rule restored. See the cases cited supra in this note.

Distinctions taken by the New York courts make the rule as a whole difficult of administration, and give apparently undue importance to the form of words; as is indeed necessary where differences lie principally in degree. While a witness may not state as the result of personal observation the opinion formed by him or as to the impressions formed as to whether the subject of his observation was rational or irrational, he may be asked whether the conversations and acts were "those of a rational or an irrational man" (Johnson v. Cochrane, 159 N. Y. 555, 54 N. E. 1092; Wyse v. Wyse, 155 N. Y. 367, 49 N. E. 942; People v. Youngs, 151 N. Y. 210, 45 N. E. 460; People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 566, 42 N. E. 1045; People v. Taylor, 138 N. Y. 634; O'Brien v. People, 36 N. Y. 276, 2 Transcr. App. (N. Y.) 5, 3 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 368; Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681; White v. Davis, 62 Hun (N. Y.) 622, 17 N. Y. Suppl. 548; Howell v. Taylor, 11 Hun (N. Y.) 214; Yeandle v. Yeandle, 13 N. Y. St. 586), and in general as to the impressions which observed phenomena have made on his mind (People v. Youngs, supra), or whether he noticed anything which indicated insanity (People v. Krist, 168 N. Y. 19, 60 N. E. 1057, 15 N. Y. Cr. 532). It was said in Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 194, that "when a layman is examined as to facts, within his own knowledge and observation, tending to show the soundness or unsoundness of the testator's mind, he may characterize, as rational or irrational, the acts and declarations to which he testifies. It is legitimate to give them such additional weight as may be derived from the conviction they produced at the time. The party calling him may require it, to fortify the force of the facts, and the adverse party may demand it, as a mode of probing the truth and good faith of the narration. But to render his opinion admissible, even to this extent, it must be limited to his conclusions from the specific facts he discloses. His position is that of an observer, and not of a professional expert. He may testify to the impression produced by what he witnessed; but he is not legally competent refusal to extend the ruling beyond the precise terms in which it has been stated, it is held that the inference of a non-expert witness as to sanity is inadmissible.[2]

8. Mental State — a. When Inference Is Received. Where the main ingredient in an inference as to the existence of a relevant[3] mental[4] state is the intuitive induction from observed appearances, it amounts in substance to the statement of a fact and is accordingly received,[5] upon a statement by the witness of such to express an opinion on the general question, whether the mind of the testator was sound or unsound."

A matter of discretion.— The practical inconvenience in attempting to work so technical a set of rules is not permitted to work substantial hardship or injustice on account of the practice of the appellate court in not regarding a technical departure from the strictness of the rules as prejudicial error. Wyse v. Wyse, 155 N. Y. 367, 49 N. E. 942. The ultimate result is that the whole matter is largely a matter of discretion.

To say that a man acts rational or irrational is but to describe an outward manifestation drawn from observed facts. It is the last analysis, the ultimate fact, deduced from evidentiary facts, coming under observation, but so transitory and evanescent as to be like drunkenness, easy of detection, and difficult of explanation. And so, also, in the investigation of mental and psychological conditions, — because it is impossible to convey to the mind of another any adequate conception of the truth by a recital of visible and tangible appearances,— because you cannot, from the nature of the case, describe emotions, sentiments, and affections, which are really too plain to admit of concealment, but, at the same time, incapable of description,— the opinion of the observer is admissible from the necessity of the case; and witnesses are permitted to say of a person, 'he seemed to be frightened;' 'he was greatly excited;' 'he was much confused;' 'he was agitated;' 'he was pleased;' 'he was angry.' All these emotions are expressed to the observer by appearances of the countenance, the eye, and the general manner and bearing of the individual,— appearances which are plainly enough recognized by a person of good judgment, but which he cannot otherwise communicate than by an expression of results in the shape of an opinion."

England.— Dew v. Clark, 3 Add. Eccl. 79, 108; Wheeler v. Alderson, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 574.

In the English ecclesiastical courts witnesses have been permitted to testify of a testator that he was a man of an irritable and violent temper, exceedingly self-willed, and impatient of contradiction, and had his full share of pride and conceit; he was very precise and exact in his domestic arrangements, and had certainly very high notions of parental authority; if he said to his child that such a thing was to be done, there was no disobeying or contradicting him. Dew v. Clark, 3 Add. Eccl. 79, 108. It may be testified that a testatrix "appeared a sensible woman, one that I should call a sharp woman — not to be deceived, and who looked after her own interest." Wheeler v. Alderson, 3 Hagg. Eccl. 574.

If all the facts can be stated, the evidence of the inference is inadmissible. See supra, XI, A, 4, b.

Statement as to party's own mental state. — It has been held that the same rule applies to a party's statement as to his own motive or other mental state, and that such a statement is to be rejected as an inference. Sydleman v. Beckwith, 43 Conn. 9, 13 (where the court said: "In all cases it is important, with a view to confirm the opinion, that the witness should be able to state such facts as will show presumptively that his opinion is well founded. But it is not quite correct to say that the opinion of a witness is entitled to consideration only so far as the facts stated by him sustain the opinion, unless the proposition is understood to include among the facts referred to, the acquaintance of the witness with the subject matter and his opportunities for observation. The very basis upon which, as we have seen, this exception to the general rule rests, is that the nature of the subject matter is such that it cannot be reproduced or detailed to the jury precisely as it appeared to the witness at the time"); Cothran v. Forsyth, 68 Ga. 560; Marshall v. Hanby, 115 Iowa 318, 88 N. We do not see how the various facts upon which an opinion of the plaintiff's attachment must be grounded are capable of specification, so as to leave it, like ordinary facts, as a matter of inference, to the jury. It is true, as a general rule, that witnesses are not allowed to give their opinions to a jury; but there are exceptions, and we think this one of them. There are a thousand nameless things, indicating the existence and degree of the tender passion, which language cannot specify. The opinion of witnesses on this subject must be derived from a series of instances, passing under their observation, which yet they never could detail to a jury"); State v. James, 31 S. L. 372 (where in an action of criminal conversation alleged to have taken place with plaintiff's wife a witness was permitted to testify as to the affection the wife showed for plaintiff, Holroyd, J., being of opinion "that the judgment which the witness had formed, from the anxiety which the wife had expressed concerning her husband, and from her mode of speaking of him during her absence from him was evidence").

8. People v. Lilly, 38 Mich. 270; State v. Buehler, 103 Mo. 203, 207, 15 S. W. 331 (where the court said: "If the expressions of the countenance of one accused of crime could be seen by, or reproduced before the jury exactly as it was at the time, and immediately before and after the act, there can be no doubt it would have great weight in determining the intent and purpose of the accused, and the motives by which he was actuated; often it would be absolutely convincing. Such being its character, evidence of such expression would certainly be admissible. The general rule, it is true, is, that a witness must testify to facts, and the jury draw its conclusions from these facts. There are, however, manifestations, expressions, and conditions which language, at least of ordinary persons, cannot reproduce. Of such matters a witness is allowed to give the impression produced upon himself. This impression may be very near to an opinion"); State v. Edwards, 112 N. C. 901, 15 S. E. 521 ("mad").

E. 277, where the court said in substance it was competent therefore to prove that plaintiff seemed to be melancholy or to be suffering severe mental anguish when she was living in his house and constantly associated with him. The appearance of the countenance sometimes at least furnishes far more reliable evidence of mental agony than words, which are often used to give expression to what is feigned, and the impression produced can only be communicated to others as an opinion.

more complicated mental states, as belief or intention,[15] knowledge,[16] or the operation of undue or other influence.[17] The disposition of an animal,[18] as gentle, safe, and kind,[19] or sulky,[20] may be shown in the same way;[21] provided the witness is shown to have had suitable opportunities to form a reasonable conclusion and the capacity to do so.[22]

b. When Inference Is Rejected. Where the inference as to the existence of a mental state is one which is conceived rather than perceived; where it is reached by the aid, in some substantial degree, of the reasoning faculty;[23] or the fact inferred is irrelevant,[24] or in issue,[25] or the observer has no sufficient basis for the inference which he proposes to state,[26] he is not permitted to testify as to the existence of such a state.[27] This is true for example of fear,[28] fraud,[29] good faith,[30]

whether the resemblance is said to exist between persons or things,[47] or between persons and their bust[48] or photograph.[49] By a line of reasoning not very well defined it has been decided that the resemblance of a child to the alleged father cannot be made the subject of direct testimony.[50] In all cases the witness should

Am. St. Rep. 853 (that hair resembled that of defendant's horse). Probably if all points of resemblance could be fully stated a court might with propriety reject the evidence. Thus it has been held that a party had no ground of exception by reason of the exclusion of a question, on cross-examination of an expert in a land damage case, as to whether there was "any topographical resemblance" between certain estates. "It was much better," said the court, "to have the witness describe the two estates than to permit him to express his opinion on their topographical similarity." Handwriting as an instance.— The testimony of a non-expert witness as to handwriting may properly be regarded as a statement of resemblances, more or less completely remembered. McDonald v. McDonald, 142 Ind. 55, 41 N. E. 336. Even where the testimony is that of a skilled observer by comparison of hands, so called, it is still merely a question of observed resemblance. By the assumption that the standard of comparison is a genuine and fair sample of the disputed handwriting, the intellect is it is true appealed to in a sense. But the evidence is hardly that of an "expert," properly so called, for the essential value of the evidence lies in the detection of subtle differences and resemblances which especially trained or endowed senses of perception have enabled the skilled observer to detect to an extent denied ordinary observers. Crawford Peerage Case, 2 H. L. Cas. 534, 9 Eng. Reprint 1196. Such witnesses, however, are usually spoken of as "experts," and the court determines which witnesses possess the requisite skill to make their inferences of value to the jury. The argument against admitting the evidence seems to be that the fact is irrelevant and misleading in that while apparently probative it really furnishes a fact too fanciful to be a safe basis for the jury's action, unless they are enabled to act upon the resemblance as real evidence from their own inspection. The Maryland court of appeals announces the prevailing rule in saying: "We all know that nothing is more notional in the great majority of cases. What is taken as a resemblance by one is not perceived by another, with equal knowledge of the parties between whom the resemblance is supposed to exist. Where the parties are before the jury, and the latter can make the comparison for themselves, whatever resemblance is discovered may be a circumstance, in connection with others, to be considered. But to allow third persons to testify as to their notions of the resemblance supposed to exist between parties, would be allowing that to be given as evidence upon which no rational conclusion could be based, but which might readily serve to mislead the jury." Jones v. Jones, 45 Md. 144, 152. See BASTARDS, 5 Cyc. 663.

In England the evidence of resemblance has been admitted in certain cases. On a question of partus suppositio, the resemblances of the child to a person other than the parent claimed for it may be shown. Hubuck Succession 384. It is necessary to notice the questions of the admissibility and force of personal resemblance and native or congenital characteristics as evidence of descent or consanguinity. Lord Mansfield, in the Douglas case, said that he had always considered likeness, as an argument of a child being the son of a parent; in other cases, if there should be a likeness of features, there might be a discriminancy of voice, a difference in the gesture, the smile, and various other things; whereas, a family likeness ran generally through all these; for in everything there was a resemblance, as in features, size, attitude, and action. Accordingly he allowed in his judgment for the appellant considerable weight to the proved resemblance of him and his brother to Sir John Stewart and Lady Jane Douglas, and to their dissimilitude to the other persons whose children they were alleged to be. 2 Coll. Jur. 402. In ejectment, where the question was one of partus suppositio, Mr. Justice Heath, following this authority, admitted evidence that defendant bore a strong resemblance to his supposed father, and in summing up, after observing that this evidence had been made light of, said he admitted that resemblance was frequently fanciful, and therefore the jury should be well convinced that it did accompany his inference with a detailed statement of the facts observed by him so far as practicable;[51] and show suitable opportunities for observation and that they have been utilized;[52] and it is further necessary that the resemblance sought to be shown is a relevant fact,[53] and that it is necessary to prove it in this way.[54] The inference stated must be a summarizing of the facts observed by the witness; he is not permitted to state an inference as to the existence of a consequential fact which the phenomena observed tend to establish. Accordingly, while a witness may state that a certain track made by a boot or shoe "corresponded" with a given track,[55] it is not competent to ask whether defendant's shoe, "run down as it was," "would have made a track" such as was seen on the field.[56] The phenomenal quality of the inference in the two cases seems to differ and the distinction has received an extended, although not always conscious, recognition in the cases.[57] The witness is not allowed to state whether one track mark resembles another with sufficient closeness to deceive a person of ordinary intelligence,[58] although the evidence has been admitted, apparently without objection.[59]

b. Handwriting — (i) In General. Proof that handwriting, marks, figures,[60] or signs were or were not made by a particular person consists, (1) in direct evidence of witnesses who saw them made,[61] (2) peculiarities in spelling, style, etc.,[62] or (3) inferences of competent observers from resemblances of a disputed writing to a mental standard created by means which the law deems adequate.[63] These exist, but if they were so convinced it was impossible to have stronger evidence. Day v. Day, Huntington Assoc. (1797), Printed Report (3d ed.) 327; Hubback Succession 378.

On a question of identity specimens of handwriting by the person in question may be examined by the jury (Doe v. Roe, 16 Ga. 521; Udderzook v. Com., 76 Pa. St. 340), although not clearly shown to have been written by him (Bell v. Brewster, 44 Ohio St. 690, 10 N. E. 679), a consideration merely affecting the weight of the evidence.

The evidence here considered is intrinsic, and a witness is not at liberty to use past knowledge of and familiarity with the legal attainments, the style and composition of the alleged writer. Throckmorton v. Holt, 180 U. S. 552, 21 S. Ct. 474, 45 L. ed. 663.

Although the difference is one of degree proof of identity in the writer by peculiarities in spelling and the like is rather circumstantial evidence than proof of resemblance to a mental standard. "Every man's hand-writing has a definite and distinct character, so much so that those familiar with it are, at all times, able to distinguish it from all others. It is this knowledge of hand-writing which forms the basis of reliable testimony on this subject. The witness should have an exampler in his mind, so that upon the presentation of a signature he can say that it corresponds or not with that in his own mind, which, the theory of the law supposes, every witness to have." Kinney v. Flynn, 2 R. I. 319, 326. "The theory upon which these expert witnesses are permitted to testify is that handwriting is always in some degree the reflex qualifications, proof of which is requisite to admissibility,[64] may, in case of an unskilled observer, be established: (1) By seeing the individual in question write;[65] (2) by receiving specimens of his handwriting acknowledged by the writer to be genuine;[66] or (3) in certain jurisdictions by familiarity with his writing acquired in other ways.[67] In case of a skilled observer this standard may be created by a comparison of genuine specimens of the handwriting with that of the document in dispute.[68] As in other connections where resemblance[69] is to be shown, numerous and intangible facts, difficult of detailed statement by the witness or proper coördination by the tribunal, make it necessary that the witness, after proving his qualifications and detailing such of the constituent facts as he can, should be permitted to state, as a method of summarizing all such facts, the impression which they have made on his mind.[70] Much the same rule applies to proof of other facts concerning documents; as whether two specimens are shown circumstantially, as by the existence of various peculiarities in spelling, style and the like, to have been written by the same person.[71] Certainty of statement is not demanded.[72] If, for example, the witness testifies to a belief,[73] or to an "impression," of the nervous organization of the writer, which, independently of his will and unconsciously, causes him to stamp his individuality in his writing. I am convinced that this theory is sound." Gordon's Case, 50 N. J. Eq. 397, 422, 26 Atl. 268, per McGill, Ch.

Detection of forgery or imitation.— The resemblance to which the evidence of the witness is directed is of the disputed document to the mental standard of the person whose writing it purports to be. strong[74] or otherwise,[75] "opinion,"[76] or "thought;"[77] or states that he perceives a general[78] or strong[79] resemblance, it is sufficient to warrant submitting the evidence to the jury, although the witness declines to "swear" that the fact is as he believes it to be,[80] and although he be in doubt until he refreshes his memory by reference to genuine writings in his possession.[81] Not only the opinion but the reasons for it may be called for, even on direct examination.[82] A witness, however, who purports to testify as to who is the writer of a disputed document must state an inference one way or the other, else he gives nothing which can aid the jury,[83] and evidence which fails to state such an inference should be rejected.[84] Where it is claimed that a certain document is forged, a witness acquainted with the handwriting of the alleged forger may testify that it is in his writing,[85] although he is not also acquainted with the handwriting of the person whose instrument it purports to be.[86]

if he has formed one,[95] from the standard so raised in his mind, as to the genuineness of a particular document, although his opinion is the result of comparison,[96] or is strengthened by such comparison,[97] provided that he claims some knowledge or acquaintance with the handwriting of the person acquired by seeing him write.[98] A more stringent rule of qualification has been laid down and "an intelligent acquaintance" with the handwriting has even been insisted upon as a preliminary to receiving the evidence.[99]

(2) Receipt of Documents. It is not essential that the witness should have seen the person in question write.[1] The ordinary witness is permitted to testify on the subject of a person's handwriting from a mental standard created by the receipt of letters or other documents from him;[2] provided (1) that the standard is created ante litem motam,[3] and (2) that relevancy is secured and the danger of collateral issues as to the genuine nature of the standard forming documents be removed by an admission, acquiescence, or equivalent action, on the point by the person whose handwriting is in question.[4] These conditions must be shown to have been satisfied by evidence other than that furnished by the documents them-

come from A and has answered it and has since received no reply to the answer is not by these facts rendered competent to prove the handwriting of A.[12] It is not indispensable that the witness should be the individual to whom the letters received were addressed. The essential requisite is that the disputed writing should be tested by its resemblance to a document in the genuineness of which the alleged writer has acquiesced.[13] Any person through whose hands the documents indorsed by the alleged writer as authentic have passed, as clerks,[14] may testify; and the qualification has even been extended to any person, although neither the receiver of the documents nor associated in business with him, provided that he has seen such acknowledged documents, and thereby become familiar with the handwriting.[15]

(3) Other Experience. If the witness has in the course of official business,[16] or in any other way,[17] acquired by experience a knowledge of a person's handwriting[18] which in the opinion of the judge makes it probable that he can draw a reasonable inference as to the genuineness of the writing in question from the mental standard so created which is calculated to aid the jury,[19] he may state the Genuineness of documents.—That the documents from which the standard in the witness' mind is formed were genuine must be affirmatively shown. Gibson v. Trowbridge Furniture Co., 96 Ala. 357, 11 So. 365; Jar-inference which he has formed.[20] In case of certain commercial instruments, as bank-notes,[21] bills of exchange,[22] bonds,[23] and the like, genuineness is frequently a conclusion in which inference from resemblance of signatures[24] or other writings to a mental standard plays a part and not always a dominant one; blending with judgments formed by the skilled witness from the character of the paper,[25] the nature of the ink, engraving,[26] printing, and the general appearance of the instrument,[27] or other appearances,[28] into a complex impression as to whether the document is forged or genuine.[29] The court may receive from a competent witness the statement of his entire conclusion in the matter, even though the witness has no knowledge of the handwriting which in part authenticates the instrument which would be sufficient to enable him to testify on that proposition, if it stood alone; the element of resemblance in handwriting does not enter into the inference at all.[30] On the other hand it has been held in general terms that an unskilled observer who has never seen the individual write or corresponded with him is not competent to testify as to his handwriting.[31]

(B) Skilled Observer. So far as it is proposed that a witness should testify to an identity of the writer of a disputed document by its resemblance to a mental standard previously created in the methods stated above,[32] the skill of the observer merely affects the weight to be accorded to his inference.[33] Where, however, the genuineness of the standard is established by evidence dehors the observer and the latter is asked, as is permitted in some jurisdictions,[34] to compare two documents and infer whether they were written by the same person, the evidence of an ordinary observer would be in most cases irrelevant; for it must be affirmatively shown to the reasonable satisfaction of the judge that the witness is sufficiently qualified to make his inference an aid to the jury.[35]

(III) Comparison of Handwritings[36] — (A) In General. There has been great diversity of opinion as to whether a trained observer, or "expert," as he is called,[37] can be permitted to state, from a mere comparison of two or more specimens of handwriting submitted to him, an inference as to whether they were or were not made by the same person, and also as to whether such a comparison may be made by the jury or court.[38] In some jurisdictions the question has been settled by statute.[39]

(B) The Rule in the Absence of a Statute — (1) In England and Canada. In England, prior to the statute of 1854 making such evidence admissible, it had become the established rule in the common-law courts,[40] after some conflict of opinion, that where the writing or signing of a document was disputed, the jury could properly be allowed to compare the disputed document with other documents written or signed by the party and which were already properly in evidence as relevant to the issues raised in the cause, for the purpose of determining the identity of the writer or signer of the disputed document, but that other documents not relevant to the issues could not be proved or introduced in evidence for the purpose of such comparison, and that a witness could not be permitted to state his inference as to the identity of the writer of a disputed document or signature by a mere comparison of the writing with other writings admitted or proved to be genuine, whether such other writings were irrelevant to the issues in the cause and offered merely for the purpose of such comparison or were relevant to the issues and already in evidence,[41] unless he already had knowledge of the person's handwriting from seeing him write or otherwise, and made the com-

In this sense "comparison of handwriting" has been defined as "a comparison by the juxtaposition of two writings, in order, by such comparison, to ascertain whether both were written by the same person. A method of proof resorted to where the genuineness of a written document is disputed; it consists in comparing the handwriting of the disputed paper with that of another instrument which is proved or admitted to be in the writing of the party sought to be charged, in order to infer, from their identity or similarity in this respect, that they are the work of the same hand." parison merely in corroboration of his testimony from such knowledge.[42] In 1854, however, a statute was enacted by which it was provided that "comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine shall be permitted to be made by witnesses; and such writings, and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute."[43] In Canada the earlier cases followed the common-law rule,[44] but they have been overruled since the English statute and comparison is now allowed.[45]

(2) Reasons For the Rule. "The reasons usually assigned for adherence to this strict rule may be substantially stated as follows: 1. The admission of papers, otherwise irrelevant, would probably raise collateral issues respecting the genuineness of the signatures thereto which might be spun out indefinitely and to the utter confusion of the jury. 2. Opportunity might be given to the party offering the papers to obtain advantage by making an unfair selection of the test signatures."[46]

(3) Rules in the United States — (a) Comparison by Jury or Court. In the United States, in the absence of a statute,[47] most of the courts have adopted the common-law rule that, where a writing is disputed, it may be compared, for the purpose of determining the identity of the writer, by the jury,[48] or by the court

On the trial of an action on a promissory note, in which the question was whether defendant had indorsed it or not, it was held that plaintiff's counsel could not give in evidence a number of other notes bearing defendant's undoubted signature, with a view of having the jury compare the handwriting of those signatures with the indorsement on the note in question; and that the jury could not be allowed to compare anything with the indorsement, except documents otherwise evidence in the case. Bromage v. Rice, 7 C. & P. 548, 32 E. C. L. 752. On a question as to the genuineness of handwriting, a jury may compare the document with authentic writings of the party to whom it is ascribed, if such writings are in evidence for other purposes of the cause; but not else. If the papers or documents are not in evidence, or connected with the cause for some other purpose, and their genuineness is not admitted by the adverse party, then independent proof would be necessary upon the side of the party seeking to sue them as a standard of comparison, to establish their authenticity. This evidence, the opposite party would be entitled to rebut, and thereby the parties would become involved in a collateral issue. This the rule seeks to avoid); Dietz v. Grand Rapids Fourth Nat. Signature to pleadings.—Some of the courts have held that a party's signature to pleadings in the case should not be permitted to go to the jury for comparison with a disputed signature or writing, as this would permit the party to make evidence in his own favor. In an action on a promissory note purporting to be made and signed by defendant, but denied by her, her signature to her affidavit of defense filed in the action, being admitted to be genuine, was offered and admitted in evidence in order that the jury might compare the two signatures and determine whether that to the note was or was not genuine also. it,[54] or consents to the comparison,[55] and consent is shown if the papers are admitted without objection.[56] Other courts have held generally, contrary to the common-law rule, that irrelevant writings are admissible for the mere purpose of such comparison if their genuineness is either admitted or proved.[57] In Pennsylvania and South Carolina and perhaps in some of the other states comparison by the jury, whether the other writings are relevant and in evidence or irrelevant, is not allowed as independent proof, but is allowed in aid or corroboration of other evidence of the falsity or genuineness of the disputed writing.[58]

(b) Comparison by Witnesses — aa. In General. In the United States, in the absence of a statute,[59] some of the courts have followed the rule of the common law excluding proof of handwriting by the inference of a witness from a mere comparison of the disputed writing with other writings, even where the other writings are relevant to the issues in the cause and already in evidence.[60] Most of the courts, however, have received such evidence, not only where the writings with which the comparison is made are already in evidence as relevant to the issues,[61] but also where they are otherwise before the court as part of the record

See also Rose v. Winnsboro Nat. Bank, 41 S. C. 191, 19 S. E. 487; Graham v. Nesmith, 24 S. C. 285; Bennett v. Mathewes, 5 S. C. 478. Where there is conflicting testimony as to the genuineness of a signature, comparison of handwriting is admissible, as confirmatory evidence, to enable the jury to decide upon which of the witnesses they could most confide. Robertson v. Millar, 1 McMull. 120. Whether the proof is doubtful must be determined in the first instance by the trial judge, and his ruling will not be disturbed unless his error be very patent. Benedict v. Flanigan, 18 S. C. 506, 44 Am. Rep. 583.

In New Hampshire also this rule was formerly held. Myers v. Toscan, 3 N. H. 47, holding that it cannot be left to a jury to determine the genuineness of a signature to a paper, merely by comparing it with other signatures proved to be genuine; but when witnesses acquainted with the handwriting in question have testified, other signatures proved to be genuine may be submitted to the jury to corroborate or weaken their testimony. This rule, however, has since been abandoned. Carter v. Jackson, 58 N. H. 156; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452. See supra, note 57.

Pennsylvania.— In this state, prior to the statute of 1895 changing the rule (see infra, XI, C, 9, b, (III), (C)), although evidence touching the genuineness of a paper might be corroborated by a comparison to be made by a jury or auditor between that paper and other well authenticated writings of the party (see supra, XI, C, 9, b, (III), (B), (3), (A)), mere experts were not permitted to make the comparison, and then to testify to their conclusions from it. In Kentucky the evidence of an expert is excluded so long as the evidence of those personally acquainted with the handwriting is available. Fee v. Taylor, 83 Ky. 259, 7 Ky. L. Rep. 248. But a skilled witness, while not competent to state from comparison with documents, in or out of the case, whether a given handwriting is genuine, may still point out to the jury indications, other than resemblances of the handwriting, which tend circumstantially, as it were, to indicate the writer; such as differences in words or letters "or speak of other facts as they appear to him upon the face of a writing." Parts of same document.— As between disputed and genuine parts of a document already in evidence the same rule applies. A witness whose qualifications are shown may, as on the question of alteration, compare different parts of an instrument in evidence and state his inference as to whether they are in the same handwriting (Hawkins v. Grimes, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 257; Williams v. Drexel, 14 Md. 566; Graham v. Spang, (Pa. 1888) 16 Atl. 91), and he may compare two or more signatures and state his inference as to whether they were written by the same person (U. S. v. Darnaud, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,918, 3 Wall. Jr. 143).

Instruments admitted without objection.— Where the instruments, the signatures to which are thus compared, were for aught that appears in the case offered in evidence for other purposes than comparison, and were received without objection, it cannot be objected upon appeal that they were immaterial for any other purpose, and so could not be used for comparison. of comparison by the jury,[67] have held it admissible under exceptional circumstances, as where there is no danger of raising collateral issues because the genuineness of the writings offered for comparison is conceded,[68] or the other party is estopped to deny their genuineness,[69] or where the parties consent to the comparison,[70] or the comparison is merely in corroboration of other evidence of the falsity or genuineness of the writing in dispute.[71] In all cases the witness may and should state the basis of his inference.[72] He may illustrate his evidence to the jury by the aid of a blackboard.[73]

bb. Comparison to Refresh Memory or in Corroboration of Testimony. Even under the common-law rule, where a witness testifies as to the genuineness of handwriting, not from comparison merely, but from knowledge derived from having seen the party write or otherwise,[74] he may compare the disputed writing with other writings proved or admitted to be genuine to refresh his memory[75] or in corroboration of his testimony.[76]

cc. Qualifications of the Witness. In order that a witness may be allowed to compare two writings or signatures and state an inference as to whether or not they were written by the same person, it must be affirmatively shown[77] to the reason-

dd. Production of Disputed Writing. By the weight of authority, it is no ground of objection to the testimony of a witness from a comparison of handwritings that the writing in dispute has been lost or destroyed, or for any other reason cannot be produced at the trial, where the witness has seen the writing and his testimony is based on a comparison of his recollection of it with the specimen admitted or proved to be genuine.[83]

(c) The Rule Under Statutes. As has been seen in a previous section, a statute was enacted in England in 1854 providing that "comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine shall be permitted to be made by witnesses; and such writings, and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute."[84] Statutes on the subject, varying more or less in their terms, have also been enacted in many of the United States. Where the genuineness of a signature is in issue, it is competent for the person whose signature it purports to be, as well as the adverse party, to introduce in evidence other writings and signatures of his, shown to be genuine, for comparison with the one in dispute, and the fact that a signature so offered was made after the commencement of the action will not render it incompetent, although it may be considered by the jury as affecting its weight. 88. In Kentucky, in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal, upon a dispute as to the genuineness of the handwriting of a person, other handwritings of such person, although not in the case for any other purpose, may be introduced for the purpose of comparison by witnesses with the writing in dispute; and such writings, and the testimony of witnesses respecting them, may be submitted to the court or jury as evidence concerning the genuineness of the writing in dispute, provided that: (1) The genuineness of such writings shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the judge, by other than opinion evidence; (2) that it be proved, to the satisfaction of the judge, that they were written before any controversy arose as to the genuineness of the writing in dispute, and that no fraud was practised in their selection; (3) that the party proposing to introduce such writings give reasonable notice of his intention to the opposite party, or his attorney, with reasonable opportunity to examine them before the commencement of the trial; (4) that the judge may limit the number of such writings; and (5) that an error of the judge shall be subject to revision and correction in the same manner as if the error had been committed by the court. 93. In New Jersey, in all cases where the genuineness of any signature or writing is in dispute, comparison of the disputed signature or writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine, shall be permitted to be made by witnesses; and such writings and the testimony of witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the court or jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the signature or writing in dispute; but where the handwriting of any person is sought to be disproved by comparison with other writings, before they can be compared with the signature or writing in dispute, they must, if sought to be used before the court or jury by the party in whose handwriting they are, be proved to have been written before any dispute arose as to the genuineness of the signature or writing in controversy. 2 N. 94. In New York it was provided in 1880 that comparison of a disputed writing, with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine, shall be permitted to be made by witnesses in all trials and proceedings, and such writings and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same may be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute. Laws (1880), c. 36, § 1. This was amended in 1888 to read as follows: "Comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be the genuine handwriting of any person, claimed on the trial to have made or executed the disputed instrument, or writing shall be permitted and submitted to the court and jury in like manner. But nothing within contained shall affect or apply to any action or proceeding heretofore commenced or now pending." Laws (1888), c. 555, § 2; 1 Birdseye Rev. St. p. 1281. See People v. Corey, 148 N. Y. 476, 42 N. E. 1066; McKay v. Lasher, 121 N. Y. 477, 24 N. E. 711 [affirming 50 Hun 383, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 352]; Sudlow v. Warshing, 108 N. Y. 520, 15 N. The original section was not repealed by the act of 1888, but so much of its provisions as were contained in the amendment were continued in force; and an action pending at the time of the amendment was governed by the original statute. Mortimer v. Chambers, 63 Hun 335, 17 N. Y. Suppl. 874. Under the statute as amended the submission of writings to a jury must be in connection with the testimony of expert or skilled witnesses in regard to the validity or authorship of the various handwritings; and in the absence of such testimony such writings cannot be submitted to the jury for the purpose of arbitrary comparison by the jurors. People v. Pickney, 67 Hun 428, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 118; Glenn v. Roosevelt, 62 Fed. 550. The skilled observer, on comparison of the genuine with the disputed writing, can merely state his inference that both were or were not written by the same person. He cannot go further and testify positively as to who wrote the disputed one. People v. Severance, 67 Hun 182, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 91. See also Sudlow 4. Warshing, 108 N. Y. 520, 15 N. E. 532. The "disputed writing," with which comparison is permitted is any writing which one party upon the trial seeks to prove as the genuine handwriting of any person and which is not admitted to be such, provided that the writing is not otherwise incompetent. People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286, 62 L. R. A. 193. 95. In Oregon evidence respecting handwriting may be given "by a comparison, made by a witness skilled in such matters, or the jury, with writings admitted or treated as genuine by the party against whom the evidence is offered." Hill Annot Laws, § 765. See Munkers v. Farmers' Ins. Co., 30 Oreg. 211, 46 Pac. 850; Holmes v. Goldsmith, 147 U. S. 150, 13 S. Ct. 288, 37 L. ed. 118 [affirming 36 Fed. 484, 13 Sawy. 526, 1 L. 96. In Pennsylvania, since the statute of 1895, where there is a question as to any simulated or altered document or writing, the opinion of those, called "experts," who have had special experience with or who have pursued special studies relating to documents, handwritings, and alterations thereof is relevant, and it is competent for such experts in giving their testimony to make comparison of documents and comparison of disputed handwriting with any documents or writing admitted to be genuine, or proven to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine, and the evidence of such experts respecting the same shall be submitted to the jury as evidence of the genuineness or otherwise of the writing in dispute. Pub. Laws (1895), p. 69. This statute, in making

Rhode Island,[97] Tennessee,[98] Texas in criminal cases,[99] and in Wisconsin.[1] These statutes are constitutional.[2] Since they are in derogation of the common law it has been held that they are to be strictly construed.[3] Under these statutes the comparison, whether by the court or jury or by witnesses, may be made with irrelevant as well as relevant writings.[4] The state statutes do not apply in the federal courts in criminal cases,[5] but they are followed in civil cases.[6] Under the statutes, as well as in the absence of a statute,[7] the witness, to enable him to testify from comparison, must be shown to be qualified as a skilled observer or expert.[8]

it competent for experts to make comparison between writings, did not change the law allowing the introduction of well authenticated examples of a person's signature for the inspection of the jury. Shannon v. Castner, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 294. See supra, XI, C, 9, b, (III), (B), (3), (a).

97. In Rhode Island comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine shall be permitted to be made by witnesses; and such writings, and the evidence of witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the court and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing in dispute. Gen. Laws (1896), c. 244, § 44.

98. In Tennessee comparison of disputed writing or signatures with any writing or signatures proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine is permitted to be made by expert witnesses, and such writing or signatures, and the evidence of expert witnesses respecting the same, may be submitted to the courts and jury as evidence of the genuineness, or otherwise, of the writing or signature in dispute. Code (1896), § 5560. See Powers v. McKenzie, 90 Tenn. 167, 16 S. W. 559; Franklin v. Franklin, 90 Tenn. 44, 16 S. W. 557. The writings or signatures used as a standard of comparison must be those of the person purporting to have made the disputed writing; those of a person other than the makers and witnesses named in the disputed instrument are not admissible solely for comparison by experts under said statute. Powers v. McKenzie, supra; Franklin v. Franklin, supra.

99. In Texas there is no provision for comparison of handwritings in civil cases, but in criminal cases it is provided that "it is competent in every case to give evidence of handwriting by comparison made by experts or by the jury." Code Cr. Proc. art. 794. See Manning v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. 180, 39 S. W. 118; Mallory v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. 482, 36 S. W. 751, 66 Am. St. Rep. 808; Caldwell v. State, 28 Tex. App. 566, 14 S. An expert cannot make a fac-simile of a signature and then have the same and a genuine signature submitted to the jury for the purpose of showing how easily the genuine signature could be counterfeited. Thomas v. State, 18 Tex. App. 213.

1. In Wisconsin comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be the genuine handwriting of any person claimed on the trial to have made or executed the disputed instrument or writing shall be permitted to be made by witnesses, and such writings and evidence respecting them may be submitted to the court or jury. St. (1898) § 4189*a*.

2. The constitutional guaranty of the right to trial by jury is not infringed by the provisions of the statute authorizing comparison of a disputed writing with any writing "proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine," since a proper construction of such provision requires the jury to make the ultimate decision concerning the genuineness of the standard with which the disputed writing is compared and leaves to the court only the determination of the preliminary question whether sufficient proof of genuineness has been given to let the papers go to the jury. The action of the court in admitting a specimen of the handwriting as a standard for comparison will be final and conclusive unless based upon error in law (State v. Thompson, 80 Me. 194, 13 Atl. 892, 6 Am. St. Rep. 172; Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 2 N. St. Rep. 172; Costelo v. Crowell, 139 Mass. 588, 2 N. E. 698; Com. v. Coe, 115 Mass. 481; Nunes v. Perry, 113 Mass. 274). The determination by the court of the question of the genuineness of a written signature upon the evidence of experts, by comparison of handwriting, is entitled, on appeal, to the same consideration as the verdict of a jury. Lay v. Wissman, 36 Iowa 305. If positive proof is furnished and there is opposing testimony, the decision of the judge of the question of fact must ordinarily be accepted as conclusive, for the obvious reason that the credibility of the witnesses is an important factor, and of this he has better opportunity to judge than is afforded the appellate court. Shannon v. Castner, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 294, 297.

Leaving question to jury.— It has been held that the jury may be required as a preliminary matter to find in point of fact the genuineness of the document used by them as a standard of comparison. Williams v. Conger, 125 U. S. 397, 8 S. Ct. 983, 31 L. ed. 778. The general rule, however, is that the question is for the court. See the cases cited in this and the following note. Under a statute permitting the "comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine," the proof of genuineness is to be addressed to the court as distinguished from the jury. The phrase "direct and positive" evidence has been judicially interpreted in Sankey v. Cook, supra, where the court say: "In Hyde v. Woolfolk, 1 Iowa 159, it is said 'Two obvious methods of proving the standard are: First, by the testimony of a witness who saw the person write it; and, second, by the party's admission when offered by himself.' It is said that these may not be the only ways of making such proof, but they indicate what is understood by 'positive evidence.'"

The paper with which the comparison is to be made must be unquestionably a genuine paper, and that must be shown beyond a doubt. Martin v. Maguire, 7 Gray 177.

New York.— Mortimer v. Chambers, 63 Hun 335, 17 N. Y. Suppl. 874. The genuineness of writings, which may be used for purposes of comparison with a disputed writing when "proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine," must in civil cases be established by a fair preponderance of the evidence, and in criminal cases beyond a reasonable doubt. Where a receipt was offered as a standard of comparison, and a witness testified that defendant gave him a receipt that looked very similar to the one offered, but that he could not positively say it was the identical one offered in evidence, it was held that the evidence was too uncertain to warrant the admission of the paper as a standard. Pavey v. Pavey, supra.

Pennsylvania.— To authorize the admission of a writing offered as a test or standard, nothing short of proof by a person who saw the party write the paper, or of an admission by the party of its genuineness, or evidence of equal authority, is sufficient. positive testimony. While great care should be taken in determining whether the standard of comparison is genuine, the usual rule as to a fair balance of testimony applies. Rowell v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 688, 10 Atl. 853.

Single witness as against denial of genuineness.— Defendant having denied that he signed a certain letter, said letter is not admissible to prove defendant's signature to a note, on the testimony of one witness that defendant did sign said letter. Cook v. Granbury First Nat. Bank, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 33 S. W. 998.

A letter received in reply to one sent to the person by whom it purports to have been signed is not sufficiently established as genuine without further proof. McKeone v. Barnes, 108 Mass. 344; Desbrow v. Farrow, 3 Rich. (S. C.) 382, holding that such is the rule even where postmark and contents confirm the inference from the fact of reply.

The fact of finding it among the papers of a deceased person whose writing it purports to be does not establish a standard of comparison. Farrell v. Manhattan R. Co., 83 N. Y. App. Div. 393, 82 N. Y. Suppl. 334.

12. Before the comparison can be made by the expert or jury, the genuineness of the standard writing must be proved, established, and no longer a question of fact in the case. It should be so that the court can say to the jury that the standard as a matter of law is genuine, and leave to the jury the inquiry whether the disputed signature was written by the same hand. Sankey v. Cook, 82 Iowa 125, 47 N. W. 1077.

A signature offered as a standard of comparison cannot be proved to be an original and genuine signature merely by the opinion of a witness that it is so, such opinion being derived solely from the witness' general knowledge of the handwriting of the person whose signature it purports to be, but must be an admitted signature, or be established as genuine by undoubted evidence. Phillips v. State, 6 Tex. App. 364.

In New York the rule is otherwise. McKay v. Lasher, 121 N. Y. 477, 24 N. E. 711 [affirming 50 Hun 383, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 352], holding that under the provisions of the New York statute permitting the comparison of a disputed writing with any writing proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine, the manner of making such proof depends upon the general rules of evidence applicable to the proof of a party's handwriting; and that the comparison is not confined to writings proved by witnesses who saw the party write, but they may be proved by the testimony of witnesses that they were acquainted with the handwriting of the person whose writing is in question, and that those presented for comparison are genuine. In People v. Molineux, 168 N. Y. 264, 61 N. E. 286, 62 L. R. A. 193, it was held that the genuineness of writings which, when "proved to the satisfaction of the court to be genuine," may be used as standards of comparison with a disputed writing, may be established: (1) By the concession of the person sought to be charged with the disputed writing made at or for the purposes of the trial, or by his testimony; (2) by witnesses who saw the standards written or to whom or in whose hearing the person sought to be charged acknowledged the writing thereof; (3) by witnesses whose familiarity with the handwriting of the person who is claimed to have written the standard enables them to testify to a belief as to its genuineness; (4) or by evidence showing that the reputed writer of the standard has acquiesced in or recognized the same, or that it has been adopted and acted upon by him in his business transactions or other concerns.

in most states it may be proved.[21] Proof of genuineness is not dispensed with because the writer is dead.[22] Under some of the statutes the writing to be used as a standard must be the genuine handwriting of the person purporting to be the writer of the disputed document, and writings made by other persons, as by the person alleged to have forged the disputed paper, although proved to be genuine, are not admissible.[23] The person whose handwriting is in question cannot be permitted to write something at the trial and offer the specimen so prepared as a standard.[24] A writing specially prepared for the purpose of comparison is not admissible as a standard.[25] But where a signature has been written in

Proof of admission by party.— It is not enough to prove by a witness that the party whose handwriting is in question admitted the genuineness of the writing offered as a basis for comparison. Jones v. State, 60 Ind. 241; Van Sickle v. People, 29 Mich. 61. The fact that defendant in a deposition had admitted signatures to certain checks as genuine will not preclude him from denying such signatures on a trial in a plea of non est factum as to a promissory note; and on such denial such checks cannot be admitted in evidence. McCombs v. Foster, 62 Mo. App. 303, 305, where it is said: "Now, here it is true that the defendant admitted under oath, before the trial of this cause, that the signatures to the checks were his signatures, yet he did not admit or concede this at the trial. It is not a play upon the words 'admit' or 'concede,' but is here a question of whether what has taken place will avoid the collateral issue as to whether the signatures are genuine. Though defendant did admit in his deposition, taken before the trial, that the signatures were genuine, that fact did not conclude him on that question. He could still raise the question. He might afterward find he was deceived or was otherwise mistaken. When a party admits out of court a matter as being a fact, while it is evidence against him on an issue as to that fact, it does not prevent him from saying and showing the contrary. So, then, though defendant did admit in his deposition that the signatures were genuine, yet he was not precluded from denying it at the trial, and thus bring on the collateral issue, which the rule aforesaid was designed to avoid."

An admission by the party who seeks to use the writings, although he himself executed them, will not authorize their use, and the testimony of expert witnesses based upon such comparison is not admissible. Shorb v. Kinzie, 80 Ind. 500.

open court by the person in question at the request of the opposite party the party calling for the writing may introduce it in evidence.[26] The court will not as a rule order the person whose writing is in question to write in court at the suggestion of the counsel,[27] but it may under exceptional circumstances make the order.[28] A genuine handwriting is not inadmissible as a standard of comparison because it was given by defendant in a criminal case at the request of the public authorities or of an expert employed by them before defendant was arrested or charged with the crime.[29] As aids in making a comparison of writings the court, jury, or witnesses may use magnifying glasses and microscopes.[30] In some cases it has been held that photographic copies and photographic enlarged copies of the disputed and genuine handwritings or signatures may be used as aids in making the comparison by the court, jury, or witnesses,[31] but in other cases similar evidence has been rejected.[32] Traced copies,[33] magnified drawings,[34] or letter-press copies[35] cannot be used. disputed document or signature, the specimen used as a standard must be before the court and jury.[36]

(E) Ancient Documents. Comparison of hands is almost universally allowed in case of documents at least thirty years old. Such documents are admitted in evidence, without further proof of genuineness, as standards for comparison,[37] when accompanied by possession.[38] Conversely the authenticity of an ancient document may be established by the evidence of skilled observers testifying from resemblance to a mental standard created by juxtaposition or comparison.[39]

(IV) Weight of Evidence — (A) In General. A witness who speaks as to handwriting from one qualification is equally competent with one who speaks on the basis of any other, although greater opportunities for observation or continued study of the subject may give the observer superior skill and entitle his opinions to greater weight.[40] An illiterate man or one whose business seldom brings him into contact with writing cannot testify with the same weight as if he were an educated man, accustomed to correspondence and to seeing people write.[41] A party is at liberty to enhance the weight of his evidence by asking a witness for his reasons.[42] The probative force of the evidence is entirely a question for the jury.[43] The court, however, may properly reject evidence not

40. The weight and value of positive testimony of a party's handwriting depends upon the frequency with which the witnesses have had occasion to carefully observe the handwriting, and how recent their opportunities of noticing the handwriting have been, and whether or not the witnesses have any interest in establishing the genuineness of the signatures in dispute. Functions of the jury.— The action of the court in admitting the standard as genuine does not control the action of the jury. They may think otherwise. And it is the right and duty of the jury to judge for themselves. Pinkham v. Cockell, 77 Mich. 265, 43 N. W. 921; State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452; Rowell v. Fuller, 59 Vt. 688, 10 Atl. 853; State v. Ward, 39 Vt. 225. Both the genuineness of the standard and the weight of the evidence, whether furnished to the jury directly by the resemblance of the disputed writing to that standard (State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452) or furnished by the inference of the skilled witness (State v. Hastings, 53 N. H. 452)

of sufficient probative weight to enable a jury to give a reasonable inference.[44] It has been said that less weight should be given to inferences from familiarity with a person's signature,[45] or from comparison,[46] than to statements of witnesses who speak to matters within their personal observation, and such a feeling is active in the decisions of the courts.[47] It is not error to charge that inferences from comparison are far from satisfactory and should be received with great care and caution.[48] Still, as appears from the many jurisdictions which admit this species of evidence, it has its strong advocates.[49]

(B) As Affected by Cross-Examination. The weight to be attached to an expert's opinion may be impaired by showing on cross-examination that he has reached a contrary conclusion on another occasion.[50] He may be tested by showing him part of a writing, concealing the rest, and asking him in whose handwriting is the part shown,[51] in some states by showing other specimens of the handwriting and asking for his inference as to the writer,[52] or whether, assuming these specimens to be genuine, or it being admitted or proved that they are, he still is of the same mind as before;[53] but he cannot be called upon, when his knowledge is based upon a previous acquaintance with the person's handwriting, to pass upon the genuineness of other writings not proved or admitted to be genuine,[54] or to pick out from a number of signatures those which he regards as is for the jury. Where the defense to an action against the administrator of the maker of a note was non est factum, it was error to instruct that the evidence of experts who had testified as to the maker's signature was "intrinsically weak, and ought to be received and weighed by the jury with great caution," as on the weight of the testimony. Coleman v. Adair, 75 Miss. 660, 23 So. 369.

Weight is also affected by the fact that the specimen in question was made before the witness knew the handwriting. Ratliff v. Ratliff, 131 N. C. 425, 42 S. E. 887, 63 L. R. A. 963.

49. "Abstractly reasoning upon this kind of proof, it seems plain that a more correct judgment as to the identity of handwriting would be formed by a witness by a critical and minute comparison with a fair and genuine specimen of the party's handwriting, than by a comparison of seen signatures with the faint impressions produced by having seen the party write and even then perhaps under circumstances which did not awaken his attention, hence the greater necessity for such a standard, as without it no possible legal conclusion could be reached." genuine.[55] The same rule has been applied even where the writing submitted is conceded to be genuine.[56] The answer in any event cannot be shown to be incorrect.[57] The witness may be asked such questions as tend to disclose his opportunities for examining the disputed writing.[58]

10. Sound. A witness may characterize a sound as faint, loud, and the like, and state the direction from which it appeared to come,[59] or state the cause,[60] emotion,[61] or mental condition or state,[62] from which he infers it to have arisen, in such a manner that the statement represents so rudimentary an inference as practically to amount to a statement of fact. The witness may go further and characterize the sound by stating that it had a resemblance to other sounds,[63] or seemed to have been made in or outside a house.[64]

D. Inference From Sensation; Skilled Witness[65] — 1. Popular and technical use of term "expert."— Special skill and experience in connection with facts known to or observed by a witness do not constitute him an "expert" within the law of evidence. See the cases cited above. In common, popular use the test of an expert is special experience, regardless of whether his statement concerns facts personally known to him or observed by him, or to his judgment on facts assumed to have been proven by others. All such persons are equally experts in the popular sense. But distinctions in the law of evidence commonly vary according to the differing nature of the testimony offered rather than according to subjective experience of the witness. Following this usual line, the distinction between experts and other witnesses is that the latter testify to facts known to them; experts testify to inferences from facts proved by others. The line is between knowledge and inference; not between special skill or training and its absence. The skilled observer occupies the same position as any other, except that within certain lines he possesses a superior mental equipment which makes his knowledge relevant. See Betts v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 92 Iowa 343, 60 N. W. 623, 54 Am. St. Rep. 558, 26 L. R. A. 248; Faber v. New York upon his mind extends to him.[67] In matters connected with his specialty such a skilled observer may testify as to his inference from facts observed by him for an additional reason which does not apply in case of the ordinary observer, viz., that the bearing of the facts observed and frequently the facts themselves cannot be communicated fully to the jury by reason of being removed from common experience,[68] not primarily because they are numerous and intangible, but because, even if the facts themselves could be correctly placed before the jury, a special knowledge or training, beyond the possession or speedy acquirement of the tribunal, would be needed to coördinate and weigh these facts into an inference of value for the purposes of the case. In many instances, while testimony is confessedly as to a point of fact and based upon observation, it is essential to the weight of the inference that the witness should have had such special training. Among such inferences are those relating to logging[69] and values.[70] The facts relied on by the witness as the ground of his inference must still be stated by him,[71] and where the facts can be fully placed before the jury the evidence will be rejected.[72] A skilled observer may testify, both from observation and as an expert, as to his judgment on hypothetically stated facts.[73] But the two lines of examination are not to be confused. For example the observer when testifying as an expert cannot be asked to make his observation part of the hypothesis,[74] as the hypothetical question would then fail to enumerate a portion of the facts on which the judgment is based.[75] Nor can a witness who has testified on direct as an observer testify on redirect as an "expert."[76]

2. AGRICULTURE.[77] A witness properly qualified in agricultural matters, and who has had adequate opportunities for observation, may state his inferences from observed agricultural phenomena,[78] as what would be the effects of burning over,[79] draining,[80] or irrigating[81] a given piece of land; its availability for farman inference from his observation as to professional facts within the range of his knowledge or experience.[63] A land surveyor is in the same position. He may state the facts regarding a survey[64] as a preliminary to stating his inference from them; as for example that a certain line is shown by the marks to have been run by government surveyors,[65] that marks were fresh and easily identified and utilized;[66] that certain stakes are surveyor's stakes;[67] that a given map is correct;[68] that the field-notes of a survey closed;[69] what is the area of a given piece of land;[70] or what the shadings and marks on a plan indicate.[71]

9. Legal Matters.[75] A properly qualified member of the legal profession, or one who is connected therewith, may testify to his inference as to professional matters which have come under his observation and which present many details which could not be stated to a jury in detail, or, if so stated, could not be coördinated into a reasonable inference by the aid of any experience in the possession of the average juryman. Of this nature are the value of professional services. An attorney may testify to the value of the services rendered by another attorney to the latter's client, either from the observation furnished by being opposed to him in the case,[76] or in any other way.[77]

Closeness of connection felt by the witness to exist between the cause and its effect is an important element in dealing with the relevancy of his evidence. Conjectural sequence is rejected, possibility being an insufficient ground of admissibility. On the other hand a connection showing a slight increase of intimacy in the connection suffices to admit the evidence. Among these are the following: "Apt" (Gulf, etc., R. Not an expert.— As in other cases where a skilled witness testifies to facts observed by him and his inference from them, a family physician testifying as to his inference in regard to the insanity of a patient gleaned from his observation is not an "expert." See supra, XI, D, 1. This important but much overlooked distinction is admirably stated by the supreme court of Connecticut, in a case where one Nash, not even a physician, had testified as to the sanity of a testatrix, the court said: "It is very true that Mr. Nash had expressed an opinion as to the sanity of the testatrix, but as the opinion of a non-expert it was not, as a mere opinion, admissible or important. We never allow the mere opinion of a witness to go to the jury if objected to, unless the witness is an expert and testifies as such, where the jury from want of experience or observation are unable to draw proper inferences from facts proved. But where a witness speaks from his personal knowledge, and, after stating the facts, adds his opinion upon them, or, in a certain class of cases, gives his opinion without detailing the facts on which it is founded, his testimony is received as founded not on his judgment, but on his knowledge. As for instance, the case of personal identity; where the witness may say that he knows the man, and that the person whom he saw was that man, and he is not obliged, unless requested, to state his height, size, age, complexion, gait, voice and dress. So a witness may state that a certain road is or is not in repair, or that a certain bridge is sound and safe or otherwise, or that a farm or house is worth so much, without going into the particular facts on which he founds his opinion, these facts being known to him personally. He only states in such cases the merely add to the weight of his testimony in cases involving common types of insanity,[47] and constitute the weight necessary to relevancy in cases where remote or latent forms of mental unsoundness are in question. In certain states, however, the courts of which ordinarily exclude the inference of an unskilled observer, an attending physician is regarded as competent to state the inference drawn by him as to the sanity of his patient,[48] although not specially skilled in the subject,[49] provided that his observation has, in the opinion of the court, been so adequate[50] and recent[51] as to be relevant.[52] The witness is limited to stating the mental effect of observed facts. He cannot go further and apply legal tests of responsibility, for example, as to whether a testator was capable of making a will[53] or taking care of himself and his affairs.[54] Where an attending physician or other especially skilled observer testifies, his evidence, like that of any ordinary observer, should be accompanied with a statement of the facts observed by him, so far as the latter admit of statement, and the value of his conclusion varies with their truth and importance.[55]

(2) Other Skilled Witnesses. A witness competent to testify as an result of his own observation and knowledge. Wherever the particulars are quite numerous a witness is allowed to testify what he knows as the result of his observation of facts, and thus to testify to the general fact, rather than to recite every circumstance that conduces to that knowledge. This is a rule of convenience which must be applied on trials, unless they are to be indefinitely protracted by a useless minuteness of enquiry. This rule has been very generally, in this country, applied to the case of insanity." Dunham's Appeal, 27 Conn. 192, 197. A family physician cannot testify as an expert in Massachusetts. Opportunities for observation, although not gained in actual attendance, may qualify a medical witness. People v. Lake, 12 N. Y. 358.

47. In many perhaps most cases, at least of testamentary insanity, the facts concern the imbecility of old age rather than any distinct delusion, and so are presumably within the scope of the experience of an ordinary practising physician. Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray (Mass.) 71.

A family physician may be asked whether a testator had "sufficient mental power to comprehend matters of business, such as his relation to property and the proper mode of disposing of the same by will" (Hastings v. Rider, 99 Mass. 622), or whether an imbecile person was able to understand his duties toward his wife (St. George v. Biddeford, 76 Me. 593). "expert" upon hypothetically stated facts may observe or examine the party in question, either as a witness on the stand, or under other circumstances affording a suitable opportunity for forming an inference from the facts observed and may state this inference to the jury, together with the facts upon which it is based.[56] A nurse has been held competent to testify as to the mental condition of the patient, with a weight, as compared to the inference of the ordinary observer, enhanced by the semi-medical nature of her employment.[57]

(II) Exclusions. The witness may not testify what specific occurrences actually caused the condition.[58] In like manner, although a medical witness who has observed a practitioner can testify as to what constitutes skill in the profession in such a way as to create an adequate impression on the mind of the jury, he is not at liberty to state whether the practitioner who has come under his observation is as a matter of fact skilful;[59] but if he has observed it he may state the actual mode and effect of his treatment.[60] Where the facts can be placed before the jury with adequate fulness, especially if the inference is upon the precise point in issue,[61] the inference of the witness is rejected.[62] The same result follows where the physician states an inference as to the effect of the conditions observed by him in some connection as to which he is not qualified; for example, as to the insurability of the life affected in a particular way,[63] or an expectancy of life not based on the use of mortality tables.[64] A witness will not be allowed to characterize the injuries observed by him, as that they are "very serious."[65]

b. Basis of Inference. A medical observer should be guided entirely by his professional training and experience in dealing with the observed phenomena.[66] He cannot use as facts in giving his inference the statements of others,[67] although Irrelevancy is the real ground in many instances for the rejection of this evidence; it by no means necessarily follows that, because a witness is possessed of skill, he exercised it in a particular instance. Boydston v. Giltner, 3 Oreg. 118.

Where this reason fails, the rule fails also. Thus, in a civil action for negligence by reason of failure to provide a suitable fire-escape, "one of the surgeons was permitted to testify that, judging from the relative position and the condition of the broken bones, in his opinion the foot of plaintiff's broken leg struck upon a sloping object, that the heel of the foot struck the object before the ball of the foot struck, and that his body was in an upright position when he fell. Johnson v. Steam Gauge, etc., Co., 72 Hun (N. Y.) 535, 540, 25 N. Y. Suppl. 689, where Lewis, J., said: "The witness being a surgeon, presumably had a knowledge of the anatomy of the human body, the strength and position of the bones of the leg, not common to laymen, and having had the advantage of a personal examination of the plaintiff's leg after the injury, he was properly allowed to give his opinion as an expert."

c. Mechanical or Necessary Inferences. Inference is permitted in certain cases to exceed the limits of a mere summary of observed facts, the witness stating the result in his own mind of applying mechanical laws to the medical facts observed by him.[82] He may testify to his inference as to whether certain bruises on the head of deceased could have been made by one blow;[83] whether a wound was made by a blunt, cutting,[84] or deadly[85] instrument, or with what kind of an instrument;[86] and how much force it would take to make it;[87] the course[88] and size[89] of a bullet causing an observed injury; whether a wound could have been self-inflicted,[90] or how it was inflicted;[91] whether by a single blow,[92] or by a person cause litigation is pending and the physician is examining for the purpose of testifying (Cronin v. Fitchburg, etc., R. Co., 181 Mass. 202, 63 N. E. 335, 92 Am. St. Rep. 408; Missouri, etc., R. Probabilities and conjectures.— Probabilities are proper to be considered in reference to an existing physical condition (Quinn v. O'Keeffe, 9 N. Y. App. Div. 68, 41 N. Y. tain appearances point, as cracking,[50] or the effect of certain acts.[51] The facts on which the inference rests should first be stated,[52] and it is inadmissible if all the facts can be placed before the jury and properly coördinated by them.[53] For analogous reasons, inferences as to other operations involving soil caving may be stated by experienced witnesses.[54]

16. NAUTICAL AFFAIRS.[55] Persons skilled in maritime affairs[56] may testify, under the rule, as to their inferences regarding nautical matters.[57] Thus they may state their inference as to the condition of a vessel, as that she was seaworthy,[58] or that the machinery in a steamboat was properly placed;[59] or with regard to her management, as that she did not carry proper lights,[60] was safely moored,[61] or skilfully handled;[62] whether certain defects were obvious;[63] from what direction a blow came;[64] whether a collision could have been prevented;[65] whether a stream is navigable at a given point;[66] or what was the cause of certain occurrences.[67] It is a limitation upon the reception of this as other inferences that the facts cannot be adequately placed before the jury[68] and that the inference is one which his nautical experience gives him the capacity to draw.[69]

17. PHOTOGRAPHY. A professional photographer may testify as to whether a photograph is well executed.[70] But one who has never seen a sitter cannot testify from an examination of photographs of him that a certain bust is a good likeness.[71]

18. RAILROADING.[72] Adequate experience in the occupations connected with the operation of a railroad may qualify a witness to state an inference from numerous facts observed by him in such a connection.[73] Among such witnesses are those connected with the operating department, as baggage-masters,[74] brakemen,[75] conductors,[76] engineers,[77] firemen,[78] and trackmen.[79] Legitimate subjects for such inferences include the cause of certain appearances[80] or occurrences[81] and the possibility of preventing it;[82] whether the condition of the appliances,[83] premises,[84] road-bed,[85] or rolling-stock[86] was proper; whether a fellow servant is competent;[87] and the effect, necessity,[88] possibility,[89] or propriety[90] of doing certain railroad acts. Such a witness may testify as to the adequacy of the means employed for stopping trains[91] and protecting stock of the owners of land abutting on the line.[92] The inference may not require the experience of one engaged in the business. That of an experienced traveler may be based upon sufficient knowledge to be relevant;[93] or the inference of the ordinary unskilled observer may concern a matter within the range of common experience, and so be relevant,[94] in connection with facts observed.[95] Otherwise the statement of the ordinary observer is rejected.[96]

19. Street Railways.[97] Persons acquainted[98] with the management, operation, or appliances of a street railway may state inferences which their experience enables them to draw,[99] as whether certain appliances are safe.[1]

A female plaintiff suing for alienation of her husband's affections may be asked whether her husband could not have lived with her if she had been willing to live on did,[30] or whether a certain thing could have happened under certain circumstances, which the witness says did not exist,[31] will be rejected as involving too large an element of conjecture, even where the fact would be relevant and not within the province of the jury.

c. Understanding. As the meaning of the language used in a written contract,[32] deed,[33] letter,[34] or other writing[35] is a question for the court, a witness cannot state his understanding of it.[36] As the meaning of common words in the vernacular is within the judicial cognizance of the court and jury,[37] it necessarily follows that a witness will not be allowed to state the meaning of such words,[38]

2. When Received — a. In General. It is a well-settled rule of evidence that a reason for admitting a conclusion of fact is furnished where the statement is merely a way of stating an obvious fact. A statement of this nature, although in the form of a conclusion, and although some admixture of the exercise of the faculty is presented, is admissible in evidence.[56] A conclusion is usually deemed to contain less than the objectionable quantum of reasoning where the single negative fact is stated that nothing of a certain kind was done,[57] that a fact was not matter is one with respect to which the witness is competent to form a reasonable inference.[76]

d. Probability. A witness, after stating the facts which are relevant as a basis of his inference and showing adequate familiarity with the subject,[77] may state the effect of these and other facts observed by him upon the probability of the occurrence of a definite event[78] or result,[79] or what would probably happen upon the application of a specified natural force.[80]

e. Sufficiency. A witness with suitable opportunities for observation[81] may state his inference as to the sufficiency or adequacy of means to an end[82] or provision for an object;[83] as light,[84] opportunity,[85] space,[86] or time,[87] afforded for a certain occurrence.

76. Lake Erie, etc., R. Co. v. Juday, 19 Ind. App. 436, 49 N. E. 843; Aidt v. State, 2 Ohio Cir. Ct. 18, 1 Ohio Cir. Dec. 337; Bluman v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. 43, 21 S. W. 1027, 26 S. W. 75. f. Utility. A witness of adequate experience may testify as to the utility of certain articles.[88]

F. Conclusions of Law — 1. When Excluded. A witness will not be permitted to intrude upon both the function of the judge and that of the jury by stating a conclusion of law;[89] for example, as to the existence of an agency[90] or other authority,[91] excuse,[92] indebtedness,[93] ownership of real or personal property,[94]

2. When Received. The exercise of the judge's discretion in rejecting such conclusions is guided by two main considerations which may be stated as follows: (1) To what extent legal inference predominates over statement of fact; and (2) how far the conclusion relates to a matter in issue,[20] and so within the distinctive province of the jury.[21] It follows therefore, that where the conclusion offered, although to a certain extent resting upon the application of legal principles, is in main a mere statement of fact, and especially where the subject-matter is only collaterally involved, a witness will be permitted to state it.[22] The rule applies to the fact of agency,[23] gift,[24] indebtedness,[25] ownership,[26] partnership,[27]

Iowa.— Wimber v. Iowa Cent. R. Co., 114 Iowa 551, 87 N. W. 505, authority.

Maryland.— Morris v. Hazlehurst, 30 Md. 362, 365, the court saying that the law of evidence cannot be safely extended so far as to exclude every question to which the answer might possibly involve a matter of law, and holding that where a witness upon cross-examination was asked if he "had ever authorized any one to waive his discharge under the insolvent laws, or the bar of the Statute of Limitations," the question was admissible.

Michigan.— Bellows v. Crane Lumber Co., 119 Mich. 424, 78 N. W. 536, sort logs enumerated in a contract.

New York.— Davis v. Peck, 54 Barb. 425, loan was individual.

Texas.— Denison, etc., R. Co. v. O'Malley, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 200, 45 S. W. 225, holding that a witness may testify that the only available right of way is over "private property."

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 2170 et seq.

23. Agency may be a mere question of fact, a synopsis of conduct, or appearances. If so a witness may state it (Talladega Ins. Co. v. Peacock, 67 Ala. 253; Heusinkveld v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 106 Iowa 229, 76 N. W. 696; Gault v. Sickles, 85 Iowa 266, 52 N. W. 206; Knapp v. Smith, 27 N. Y. 277; Jennings v. Davies, 29 N. Y. App. Div. 227, 51 N. Y. Co., 20 Wash. 668, 56 Pac. 837); leaving the constituent facts to be ascertained on cross-examination (Service v. Deming Invest. Co., supra).

24. Gifts may be merely a question of fact. Davis v. Zimmermann, 40 Mich. 24.

25. Indebtedness may be merely a necessary and obvious fact which a witness may state. Shrimpton v. Brice, 109 Ala. 640, 20 So. 10; Plank v. Indiana Mut. Bldg., etc., Assoc., 28 Ind. App. 259, 62 N. E. 652; Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Endon, 50 La. Ann. 674, 23 So. 872; Greene v. Tally, 39 S. C. 338, 17 S. E. 779; Miller v. George, 30 S. C. 526, 9 S. E. 659.

26. Where the fact of ownership is stated, not as a question of legal title, but as a short method of stating a fact collaterally important and indicative of the coördinated class of acts, residence, exercise of control, etc., which usually attend ownership, a witness may state that he (German-American Ins. Co. v. Paul, 2 Indian Terr. 625, 53 S. W. 442; Murphy v. Olberding, 107 Iowa 547, 78 N. W. 205) or another (Hunnicutt v. Higginbotham, 138 Ala. 472, 35 So. 469, 100 Am. St. Rep. 45; Johnson v. State, 100 Ala. 55, 14 So. 627, wife of declarant; Nelson v. Iverson, 24 Ala. 9, 60 Am. Dec. 442; Catlin v. Frazier, (Conn. 1888) 12 Atl. 871; Muller v. Abramson, 25 Misc. (N. Y.) 520, 54 N. Y. Suppl. 1027; Olson v. O'Connor, 9 N. D. 504, 84 N. W. 359, 81 Am. St. Rep. 595) owns certain property, real (Pichler v. Reese, 171 N. Y. 577, 64 N. E. 441; Townsend v. Kennedy, 6 S. D. 47, 60 N. W. 164) or personal (Steiner v. Tranum, 98 Ala. 315, 13 So. 365; Daffron v. Crump, 69 Ala. 77; Cogley v. Cushman, 16 Minn. 397; Casper v. O'Brien, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 402). In an action for the conversion of property, witnesses who are personally familiar with the facts on which the ownership of such property is based can testify directly to the ownership of the same, as a fact, although the rule is otherwise where the facts constituting ownership are complex, or are not all within the knowledge of the witnesses, so that the answer as to ownership involves the opinion or conclusion of the witnesses. Olson v. O'Connor, 9 N. D. 504, 84 N. W. 359, 81 Am. St. Rep. 595. This is equally true, although the jury may have ultimately to pass on the question. Pichler v. Reese, 171 N. Y. 577, 64 N. E. 441.

27. Partnership may be a fact collaterally relevant and so permit of a simple statement.

possession,[28] and the like. A negative statement,[29] as that one gave no authority,[30] had no connection,[31] interest,[32] or title,[33] or offered no inducement,[34] is less apt to involve the use of inference than the corresponding positive assertions, and is consequently more frequently admitted.[35] The witness may accompany his conclusion with a detailed statement of the facts upon which the conclusion of law, so far as one is announced, is based.[36] If a statement is a reasoned conclusion it will be rejected, although it be couched in a negative form.[37]

G. Judgments of Experts — 1. In General — a. Rule Stated. Under the two conditions, relevancy and necessity, above considered,[38] the fact that a witness holds a particular opinion may possess such probative force as will justify a court in admitting it as evidence that the judgment is the proper one to draw from those facts. An expert, as the etymology of the word implies, is one taught by experience. In the law of evidence the secondary meaning attaches that his distinctive experience is one which the jury needs, that is, is not one which the community, as represented by the average jury, shares in common with the witness.[39] The fundamental characteristic of the testimony of an "expert" is not that he states an inference. Many observers do that as well as he.[40] Nor is it that he speaks as to the existence of an inference from facts known only to those experienced in an art, science, trade, or the like. Many skilled observers do the same.[41] The peculiar characteristic of the expert is inference from facts assumed to exist.[42] Probably the earliest use of expert witnesses was for the information

42. Nunes v. Perry, 113 Mass. 274; Com. v. Williams, 105 Mass. 62. It is unfortunately true that in the popular use of the term, any observer, and especially one skilled in a certain subject is, when testifying on that subject, and especially when testifying as to an inference from facts, termed an "expert." But too many difficulties in the law of evidence center about this very common practice of using a simple term to represent different ideas to render it advisable to continue it, unless strictly necessary. The term "expert" is at present properly applied to a witness specially skilled on a question before the court whose function is to pass judgment upon certain propositions submitted to his intellect. He testifies to the existence of no facts. He observes none. His function is to say what, assuming certain facts to be true, would be his inference from them. He is not understood as taking any position as to

of the court.[43] But since the middle of the seventeenth century the expert has testified, as other witnesses, to the jury.[44] The rules are the same in civil and criminal causes.[45]

b. Basis of Judgment. The party offering an expert is at liberty to reinforce his judgment, even before any attempt is made to discredit or impeach it, by showing the grounds on which it is based,[46] provided that such facts be relevant[47] and admissible for the purpose.[48] Facts so stated do not become evidence in the case.[49] Thus, although one testifying hypothetically to a diminution in value may state the items of his estimate, these items are not evidence of the truth of the facts asserted.[50] Where the evidence does not disclose the existence of sufficient data on which to base a reasonable judgment the witness, quoad that judgment, is incompetent.[51] The witness may base his judgment in part upon the result of experiments.[52]

the existence of the facts upon which his hypothetical position is based. Such a person is technically "an expert." Little necessity apparently exists for applying the same term to a witness whose similarity to the expert, properly so called, consists in the fact that he is specially skilled in the subject-matter; who unlike the true expert testifies to the existence of facts themselves and being unable, from the insufficiency of human memory or power of observation and statement, to give other facts existing in connection with and qualifying them, summarizes them by stating what effect they produced upon his mind; usually the only way in which coexisting physical phenomena can be suitably presented in words. The judgment of an expert must be more than a guess.[53] A tribunal which is called upon to decide a definite issue of fact by the use of the reasoning faculty cannot be aided where no mental certainty is shown by a witness. And where an inventor claimed to have expended one thousand seven hundred hours in perfecting an invention for defendants, evidence of machinists and pattern-makers as to whether a man could profitably spend so many hours on the business was held to have been improperly admitted. The court said: "It is insisted that the trial court erred in admitting this kind of testimony, for the reason that the elements which entered into the question are such that no machinist or pattern-maker could give any opinion which would be of any value to guide the judgment of the jury. It seems to us the objection is well taken, and is insuperable. It is obvious that no person, whether expert or non-expert, can possibly tell or form any reliable opinion as to how many hours of thought and study, of trial and experiment, it might be necessary to devote to the discovery and perfection of a useful invention. An inventive mind might by the study of a few weeks make an invention which would elude the industry and penetration of others for years, and perhaps for life, when engaged on the same subject. What man, however intelligent, could tell in advance or give an opinion as to the time it would be necessary to spend in perfecting the method of trans-evidence of speculative damages.[55] Evidence of this nature is widely distinguished from that of a definite judgment on ascertained facts where a different one is within the bounds of reason. To ask an expert, for example, what might have been a sufficient cause for an ascertained result is "a very common and very proper mode of scientific investigation," [56] and, where a definite course of conduct or dealing has become established, an expert may be asked what would probably happen, under a given set of circumstances, in a matter within its purview.[57]

2. APPLICATIONS OF RULE — a. In General. Instances in which the judgment of experts has been received as an aid to the jury are endless in variety.[58] Partly on account of the prominence of the element of discretion in adjudicating on the matter [59] it will be found impossible to reconcile the decisions on the subject with any precise rule or even to formulate such a rule as in principle ought to apply to the decision of each case as it arises.[60] As stated above, the subject must be one in which the experience of the jury does not enable them to form a reasonable judgment without assistance of another's special skill or knowledge.[61] While it is agreed broadly, on the one hand, that matters of art, science, or technical training are proper subjects for expert testimony,[62] and, on the other, that the mitting messages by means of the telegraph or telephone? A happy thought or inspiration of genius might enable one man to reach the desired result, when others, devoting the closest study and acuteness of intellect to the same investigation for years, would be baffled in their attempts to discover it. Therefore, it seems to us, the question whether or no a man can spend 1,700 hours in making the device shown the witness does not involve professional skill or peculiar knowledge, so as to render the opinions of experts admissible on the question as to the value of the services." common affairs of daily life are not,[63] there is a wide middle ground where the discretion of different courts has been exercised to an opposite effect, which appellate courts decline to disturb, although very possibly it would have exercised discretion to the opposite effect.[64] A question partly covering a proper subject of expert evidence and in part relating to a matter of common experience may be rejected.[65]

d. Cattle Raising.[95] Persons skilled by experience in cattle raising may testify as experts as to what would be the result of given treatment upon stock;[96] as their gain in weight by a season's pasturing under favorable conditions.[97]

e. Common Affairs.[98] Experience, skill, and training may be applied to the common affairs of life. The test of admissibility is not the technical nature of the subject-matter with which the evidence deals, but rather whether the skill or experience of the witness, to whatever subject applied, technical or common, will aid and is necessary to aid the jury.[99] This may happen in connections with which most men are familiar to a certain extent, but all men are not equally conversant to a point where they can necessarily draw, or be taught readily how to draw, a reasonable inference.[1] Of this nature may be the construction,[2] repair,[3] and use[4] of highways, and other ordinary occurrences.[5] Witnesses having large

f. Engineering.[9] Engineering is a science, and those acquainted with that department of it to which a given question relates, as engineers, may testify as to their judgment on facts of professional importance submitted to them,[10] so far as relevant.[11] Thus they may testify regarding the action of water, as whether a certain overflow was due to natural causes,[12] to the faulty construction of an embankment or dam,[13] or the improper handling of certain reservoirs;[14] whether wells dug near a stream divert water from it;[15] whether the removal of sand from a lake shore threatens a city with inundation or injures the harbor,[16] or what is the cause of the filling of a harbor.[17] They may state a judgment as to how much more land water would cover if raised to a definitely higher level[18] and whether certain designated work was properly done.[19]

g. Insurance.[20] In many instances the facts of insurance are merely those of common experience, as to which the judgment of a skilled witness is not necessary.[21] Facts connected with accident, fire, life, or marine insurance, which are commonly known in the community, cannot be made the subject of expert evidence;[22] as, in fire insurance, what obviously constitutes an increase of risk,[23] as

The same result as if expert testimony were received is accomplished by admitting evidence of the fact that insurance companies, under given circumstances of changed conditions, are in the habit of increasing their premium charges (Planters' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Rowland, 66 Md. 236, 7 Atl. 257; Luce v. Dorchester Mut. F. Ins. Co., 105 Mass. 297, 7 Am. Rep. 522; Merriam v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co., 21 Pick. (Mass.) 162, 32 Am. To hold that an expert cannot state whether certain alterations increase an insurance risk (Lyman v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co., 14 Allen (Mass) 329) and permit such a witness to state that insurance companies are in the habit of increasing the premium under the changed conditions seems extremely fine, but the courts of Massachusetts hold the former to be an "opinion," the latter a mere statement of fact (Webber v. Eastern R. Co., 2 Metc. (Mass.) 147). The rule is the same in the circuit court of the United States for leaving a building unoccupied,[24] inclosing a boiler previously detached from the building,[25] putting up adjacent buildings,[26] or a change in use,[27] or whether certain suppressed facts were material to the risk;[28] or, in life-insurance contracts, whether a concealment was on a material point.[29] Where the matter is more technical, as, in fire insurance, whether a certain quantity of wood could have been burned in a certain fire,[30] whether a certain change in use, not obviously dangerous, or the communication of a given fact[31] would increase the premium;[32] or at what premium a given risk could have been placed in other companies;[33] or, in life insurance, that slave-catching is more hazardous than farming,[34] or the value of renewal premiums;[35] or, in marine insurance, the materiality of a given fact to the risk,[36] how marine insurance brokers would have construed a particular letter of instructions under given circumstances,[37] that a vessel is a "total loss,"[38] or whether it was negligent to put a steamer close to a tall and inflammable building during the prevalence of a very strong wind blowing against the building,[39] any person shown to be specially experienced on the subject-matter[40] may give his judgment as an expert.[41] It is not necessary that the experience should be that of persons associated with the insurance business. Such persons constitute one class of experts, but any experience presumably supplementary to that of the jury will be received. Thus in matters of fire insurance, persons practically acquainted with the handling of fires, as members of associations for extinguishing fires, may be competent.[42]

h. Legal Matters.[43] A witness acquainted with legal affairs may state whether certain legal services were necessary[44] or what was the law of ejectment on a certain point at a given time.[45] An attorney is not permitted to state what constitutes negligence in a given case.[46]

i. Manufacturing.[47] Facts connected with manufacturing which are within the experience of the general community, as whether rough machinery is more dangerous than smooth when uncovered, are not proper subjects for expert testimony;[48] but on the other hand facts distinctly technical, as whether certain repairs are necessary,[49] what is a proper lacing of belts,[50] or whether there is a latent danger in the operation of certain machinery[51] may be stated by a witness suitably qualified.[52]

j. Mechanics.[53] The mechanic arts frequently present questions for determination by experts,[54] both those trained in the science,[55] and those practically acquainted with mechanical operations.[56] Such witnesses may testify as to whether certain conduct was proper;[57] what would be the dangers, if any, relative position of two persons when a bodily injury was inflicted, as determined by the direction of the wound, its locality, and other appearances, are not proper subjects for medical expert testimony.[10] It need hardly be stated that a person qualified to express an opinion on a particular medical subject is limited in stating his inference to that subject and not permitted a wide deviation.[11]

(II) Mental Condition.[12] The judgment of specially qualified[13] medical witnesses is used with frequency on issues involving mental condition,[14] as idiocy, insanity,[15] dementia,[16] or weak-mindedness,[17] and the probable effect of certain occurrences in creating or developing such conditions.[18] The range of a possible witness is largely determined by the nature of the mental malady involved, as related to the experience and capacity of the proposed witness.[19] Where the mental derangement is of a common type American courts as a rule have shown an inclination to accept a practising physician in good standing as competent to testify as an expert,[20] even where he is not a specialist on the subject,[21] although especial training may add weight to his judgment,[22] and no sufficient training will render him incompetent.[23] English judges have evinced the same feeling.[24] On the contrary other courts have shown a desire to escape a multitude of counselors by restricting the number of those regarded as qualified to testify as experts to persons who have made special studies in that line of medical research.[25] In these jurisdictions the evidence of a practising physician of good standing and long experience has been rejected.[26] The standard by which the mental condition is to be gauged in connection with the questions to an expert witness is not agreed upon. Whether a person is "capable of transacting ordinary business,"[27] or has had "the usual and ordinary capacity for the transaction of the business of life,"[28] has been used as a test. The witness cannot be asked to apply the standard of law involved in the case;[29] for example, whether the person in question had sufficient mental capacity to make a will,[30] or to be responsible for his criminal acts by knowing the difference between right and wrong,[31] or for his conduct in civil matters,[32] as such a question unnecessarily invades the province of the court or jury.[33] It is permissible to ask a qualified witness whether a person was insane at a certain time.[34] It has even been held that the question should be so framed as to require a witness to state the degree of the person's intelligence or incapacity in the best way he can.[35]

the same line of legal reasoning.[96] Thus a skilled witness may testify as to the distance within which a car could be stopped.[97] The usual method of constructing street railways is not a matter for expert testimony.[98] Nor is the question whether certain acts or apparatus were proper.[99] Where the inference is one which the jury may be assumed to be capable of drawing, the judgment of the expert is not received.[1]

H. Form of Question — 1. In General. It is tacitly assumed in all exercise of the reasoning faculty that the data on which it is based shall exist and be accurately observed, or otherwise cognized. In proportion, however, as the element of reasoning preponderates over the immediate reaction of sensation, it is important to ascertain as far as possible what the witness is assuming to be true. In a statement of fact, it is possible, in proportion to its familiarity, to know the connotations which the act of naming implies. No objection exists to calling directly for the fact itself. Where the inference is more complicated, especially as it becomes more in the nature of a conclusion, the witness is required to state such part of the facts as are relied on as true; the inference or conclusion being called for after and upon the basis of the detailed statement, the hypothetical form not being essential.[2] Where the statement is more nearly a pure act of judgment, the facts assumed are made part of the so-called "hypothetical" question.[3]

2. The Hypothetical Question — a. In General. Assumption of facts in putting a question might almost be regarded as a test of whether a witness is being examined as an expert. The expert, properly so called, is asked what would be his judgment, upon all[4] or any prescribed part[5] of the facts, as to which evidence has been lawfully admitted by the court,[6] assuming that they are

3. It is entirely unscientific to call a question which assumes the facts to be true a "hypothetical" question. Hypothesis, properly speaking, is an assumed explanation or harmonizing of facts proved to be true. What a hypothesis assumes to be true is a fact or act of reasoning which reconciles observed phenomena. It would be entirely proper to explain the facts in evidence upon a given hypothesis; as of guilt or innocence; that a man did or did not do a certain act, was at a certain place, etc. For this the highly ambiguous term "theory" is apparently selected. To assume the constituent facts to obtain certainty in the reasoning seems precisely to reverse the proper use of the term, although the original meaning was the same, the phrase "supposititious question" would more correctly express the idea intended to be conveyed. Misleading answers excluded.— In like manner the judge will order an answer to be stricken from the record where it is misleading because conjectural. Swenson v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co., 15 Misc. (N. Y.) 69, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 445. But an answer is not objectionable merely because it includes facts in evidence which might have been made part of the question. Hathaway v. National L. Ins. Co., 48 Vt. 335.

Inaccuracy.— A question which is inaccurate without being misleading is not error. Atlanta R., etc., Co. v. Monk, 118 Ga. 449, 45 S. E. 494; Turnbull v. Richardson, 69 Mich. 400, 37 N. W. 499; Thompson v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 6 N. Y. Suppl. 7; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Duvall, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 348, 35 S. W. 699. The same is still more true where the only objection to the question is that certain additional facts might have been proved which would assist witnesses in giving more satisfactory answers (Hendershott v. Western Union Tel. Co., 114 Iowa 415, 87 N. W. 288).

Harmless error.— Where the answer to a single improperly formed question could not have misled the jury (Hewitt v. Eisenhart, 36 Nebr. 794, 55 N. W. 252) or prejudiced the complaining party (Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233, 24 Atl. 253, answer beneficial), or where the question is admitted de bene before the evidence on which it is based and no request is made later that the answer be excluded or modified, or its effect controlled by instructions (Wilkinson v. Detroit Steel, etc., Works, 73 Mich. 405, 41 N. W. 490. See also Fuller v. Tolman, 92 Hun (N. Y.) 119, 36 N. Y. 22. Eastham v. Riedell, 125 Mass. 585.

Length not a controlling consideration.— It is no objection to a hypothetical question that it is lengthy, provided that it has been reduced to writing and embraces the whole situation in a connected manner. Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393, 27 Atl. 973, 22 L. R. A. 90; Jones v. Portland, 88 Mich. 598, 50 N. W. 731, 16 L. R. A. 437; Cole v. Fall Brook Coal Co., 87 Hun (N. Y.) 584, 34 N. Y. Suppl. 572; Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 73, 7 S. Ct. 408, 30 L. ed. 586. Three printed pages have been deemed not an excessive length. Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393, 27 Atl. 973, 22 L. R. A. 90. But the court has authority to require a question to be modified in these particulars. Forsyth v. Doolittle, 120 U. S. 73, 7 S. Ct. 408, 30 L. ed. 586.

Were the rule otherwise there would be no limit to the cross-examination of a witness called as an expert. It could be protracted as long as the fertility of the imagination might enable counsel to suppose cases, and the mental and physical powers of endurance of the witness would permit him to frame answers. People v. Augsbury, 97 N. Y. 501.

If the answers obtained upon an examination in chief are shown on cross-examination to have been given upon an erroneous basis, they may be stricken out. Keating v. Cornell, 104 Ill. App. 448.

On cross-examination the attention of the witness may be called to any facts omitted from the question (Horton v. U. S., 15 App. Cas. (D. C.) 310; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Wallace, 202 Ill. 129, 66 N. E. 1096 [affirmed in 104 Ill. App. 55]; State v. Wood, 112 Iowa 411, 84 N. W. 520; Williams v. State, 64 Md. 384, 1 Atl. 887; Lake Shore, etc., R. W. 778), and failure to do so will be deemed a waiver of the imperfection (Ragland v. State, 125 Ala. 12, 27 So. 983). If the question is prima facie competent, the fact that the question may be still further defined on cross-examination is not a ground for excluding it. Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Whidden, 23 Ohio Cir. Ct. 85.

The omission from the question of a fact which is not in strictness material may affect the weight to be given the answer (McKinstry v. Collins, 74 Vt. 147, 52 Atl. 438), but the question is not necessarily error on that account (Cass v. Third Ave. R. Illustrative questions may be permitted. Kraatz v. Brush Electric Light Co., 82 Mich. 457, 464, 46 N. W. 787. In an action for injuries caused by a live electric wire crossing a dead electric wire, it was held that there was no error in allowing the hypothetical question, "Supposing that a live wire should come in contact, for instance, with a telephone wire, by the telephone wire settling down upon the electric light wire, what effect would it have upon the telephone wire?" although there was no claim or evidence in regard to a telephone wire, as the effect on a telephone wire would be the same as on an electric light wire. Defect in form harmless.— Where the ques-proved,[29] or that the exact language of the witness should be followed,[30] or that immaterial facts should be covered by evidence.[31] It is not intended to imply that under no circumstances are other hypothetical questions than those based upon the evidence permissible in the discretion of the court. So to hold would be to lose a possible test, upon cross-examination, of the witness' ability or inclination to aid the jury. Such questions are merely designed to test the credibility of the witness.[32] It is proper to include in a hypothetical question facts of which the

The hypothetical question should contain such assumptions of facts and such only as counsel may fairly claim that the evidence in the case tends to justify. That counsel are mistaken in assuming that the evidence tends to prove certain facts is not a valid objection to a question which is within the possible range of the evidence. existence has been admitted in the pleadings or in any other legal form,[33] and in a criminal case it is proper to include facts which have been testified to by the accused himself.[34] The judge may properly exclude a question where it is so framed as to require a single answer to several distinct propositions[35] or does not present sufficient facts to afford ground for a reasonable conclusion,[36] or where it calls for a categorical answer and the witness says that he cannot so answer it,[37] or where it excludes any definiteness,[38] or is based on an assumption which is false.[39] A long question may be excluded in the discretion of the judge if deemed misleading, as not disclosing its hypothetical nature.[40] As the order of evidence is an administrative function the judge may permit an examining counsel at any stage to include in a hypothetical question facts of which he proposes to furnish evidence.[41] Unless such evidence is furnished, the answer to the question may be stricken out;[42] and it is equally within the judge's discretion to refuse to allow the question to be put until the foundation in the evidence is actually laid.[43] It is not necessary that the questioning party submit his question to the inspection of the other side.[44]

(II) Assuming All Material Facts. The liberty of an examining counsel to submit, in the form of a hypothetical question to the judgment of an expert, any set of facts which he claims the jury might reasonably find upon the evidence[45] has been restricted in certain jurisdictions where it is required that a question should cover all undisputed[46] material facts relating to the sub-

In cross-examining an expert witness the examiner should be allowed to assume almost any state of facts for the purpose of testing the witness' knowledge and credibility (Taylor v. Star Coal Co., 110 Iowa 40, 46, 81 N. 46. Levinson v. Sands, 81 Ill. App. 578. Neither party has a right to discard an important undisputed fact, merely because its insertion may vary the answer or opinion ject.[47] The courts of Kansas for example require that a hypothetical question "should contain substantially the facts as shown by the evidence."[48] Those of Missouri hold that that the question should "embody substantially all the facts relating to the subject. An opinion based upon a partial statement of the facts would be of no value and is not admissible."[49] A convenient rule is that announced in Indiana, that where there are no disputed facts the question should embrace all facts; but that when certain facts are disputed, either party may put to the expert hypothetically questions embodying the disputed facts as his construction of the evidence would show them to be.[50] The earlier rule in New York required that all material facts bearing on the issue of insanity should be stated to the expert by the prosecution in a criminal case,[51] but the rule has been established otherwise by later decisions.[52]

(III) Assuming Facts Essential to Any Reasonable Theory. It is not, however, in general essential that each question should embrace every fact which it might be contended should affect the expert's judgment.[53] Different hypotheses may be so put as to elicit his judgment as to the different groups of facts, covering any reasonable theory of the case,[54] although there must be evi-

cally points out the alleged imperfections.[59] Conflicting facts should not be embodied in a single question.[60] But it is not objectionable to permit the witness in answering a question assuming the existence of certain facts of which there is evidence to assume also the existence of other facts also in evidence, and which therefore "might properly have been embraced in the questions," [61] or to ask an expert whether the facts testified by opposing witnesses, assuming both sets of facts to have been correctly stated, are inconsistent with the existence of a particular fact.[62] It is not necessary that the questions should cover the entire case. Form of question.— The following has been held to be a proper form of question to be put to an expert: "You have heard all the evidence in this case — supposing the jury to be satisfied that the facts and circumstances testified to by the other witnesses, are true, what is your opinion as a medical man of the state of the prisoner's mind, at the time of the commission of the alleged crime? Was the prisoner, in your opinion, at the time of doing the act, under any and what kind of insanity or delusion; and what would you expect would be the conduct of a person under such circumstances?" Even conflicting facts cannot be included in a single question, although a witness may be asked to reconcile if possible any apparent conflict. Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398.

Loss of definiteness.— If the evidence is conflicting, to ask an expert for an inference from it deprives the answer of all definiteness. The witness must first decide in his own mind as to the truth as between the conflicting statements. Nothing discloses his decision upon this preliminary issue. It is therefore impossible to tell what facts have been used in forming his judgment (Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424; Smith v. Hickenbottom, 57 Iowa 733, 11 N. W. 664; Butler v. St. Louis L. Ins. The answer of the witness shows this: 'I think her insane, for it is impossible to reconcile her conduct as testified to by defendants' witnesses with the idea of her not being insane at the time of the will;' that is, that the evidence to show her insane is so strong that he considers it conclusive on the point — preponderates decidedly over the evidence to show her sane; and that the proofs for the plaintiffs must be accounted for as consistent with her insanity, as the other evidence cannot be reconciled with her sanity. It follows that an expert is not entitled to express his opinion upon the opinions of others (Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393, 27 Atl. 973, 22 L. R. A. 90; Walker v. Fields, 28 Ga. 237; Texas Brewing Co. v. Walters, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 43 S. W. 548) or whether certain statements are "reconcilable" (Diffin v. Dow, 22 N. Brunsw. 107, 109, where it was said: "I think this question and answer were improperly admitted. This is apparent from the consideration of the subjects on which an expert can give an opinion and those he cannot. He cannot, I think, give an opinion whether any fact exists or not. He cannot give an opinion as to what another witness intended by what he may have said: in other words, he cannot construe the language used by another witness. He cannot give an opinion as to the truth or falsity of what another witness has sworn. He cannot give an opinion as to the truth or falsity of the statements made to him on which to found an opinion. He cannot give an opinion as to whether any one witness is more reliable than another. He cannot testify as to a conflict of opinion between himself and another expert. He may give an opinion on an assumed state of facts on a professional or scientific subject as to what would result from those facts, and he can give no other opinion"). He cannot testify as to the merits of a case (Tingley v. Cowgill, 48 Mo. 291), or the value of an autopsy (Manufacturers' Acc. Indemnity Co. v. Dorgan, 58 Fed. 945, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620, holding that a physician, merely from hearing testimony as to an autopsy by those who performed it, cannot be asked whether the autopsy was such as to enable a physician to state the cause of death with any degree of certainty). An expert cannot state that a mechanical device is "considered" the best of its kind. Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. McKelvey, 12 Ohio Cir. Ct. 426, 5 Ohio Cir. Dec. 561.

In substance the question calls upon the expert to decide whether or how far the evidence establishes the facts which might have been hypothetically assumed. inference results where the witness has not heard all the material testimony and is asked to testify from what he has heard,[96] from what he has seen and heard,[97] or from what he has heard and from newspaper reports of the remainder of the evidence;[98] and evidence elicited by these forms of question has accordingly been rejected,[99] even where the evidence of a witness is incorporated with facts hypothetically stated.[1]

I. Tests of Opinion Evidence — 1. In General. The jury may properly apply in part to the statement of facts inference, conclusion, or judgment the same tests which the judge adopted in permitting the witness to testify.[2] So far as the element of fact enters into the statement the opportunities and ability of the witness to observe or otherwise cognize the fact are important. Mental capacity for forming a correct inference, conclusion, or judgment is the important factor in testing the element of reasoning.[3]

2. Inference — a. In General. An inference may be wrong: (1) Because the facts on which it is based either do not exist or are qualified in their operation by other facts which are not given proper weight; or (2) because the facts when ascertained do not support the inference.[4]

b. Accuracy of Observation. The enumeration of facts observed by the witness as part of the basis of his inference, which he may or may not be required error to permit an expert to testify from his "recollection" of the evidence of another (Bedford Belt R. Co. v. Palmer, 16 Ind. App. 17, 44 N. E. 686), or indeed from what he has heard a particular witness testify (Tibbits v. Phipps, 30 N. Y. App. Div. 274, 51 N. Y. Suppl. 954).

3. "Testimony may broadly be divided into (1) expressions of judgment or opinion, and (2) assertions of fact; and the latter into (a) matters of common observation or patent facts, and (b) latent facts, the subject of experiment or research. It is clear that capacity plays a chief part in the trustworthiness of judgment and research, while in the case of patent facts the reliability is chiefly grounded on the assertor's means or opportunities for knowing." Testimony and Authority, 8 Mind N. S. p. 77.

4. The essential difference between the expert and the trained observer consists therefore in the nature of the inference to be drawn by each, rather than in the means by to detail upon direct examination,[5] but which may always be inquired for on cross-examination,[6] furnish a practicable and valuable test of the accuracy of the witness' powers of observation.[7] The existence of the constituent facts relied on may therefore be disproved; and when these facts are disputed the jury will be instructed to give weight to the inference itself if, and in proportion as, they find the facts themselves to exist.[8] It may be claimed and evidence offered to show that the witness could not have observed correctly on account of his own condition, as because of intoxication[9] or because not properly qualified to observe carefully and with discrimination.[10] And as bearing on this it may be proved that the witness at first attached little or no importance to facts upon which he now strongly relies.[11]

c. Facts or Premises Supplied. The drawing of an inference by any individual involves two elements: (1) A fact or set of facts known to him; (2) the application of some general proposition involving uniformity of action in the physical or mental world, ascertained by experience. Danger of inaccuracy lurks in both these elements of the inference. To test its correctness involves therefore: (1) Ascertaining so far as possible the facts upon which the observer bases his inference; (2) the truth, scope, and applicability to the actual facts in their entirety of the general proposition of experience of which the witness consciously or unconsciously is making use. (1) Ascertaining the facts relied on by the observer must evidently be incompletely successful, since the precise reason for admitting the inference is that the facts cannot all be given.[12] In the case of a skilled observer an additional factor of confusion presents itself. Like the expert he frequently calls into operation in forming his inference what may be called subjective facts — facts furnished by his training and experience, which he is adding to those observed by him.[13] To test the value of his inference it is essential that these should be ascertained.[14] The difficulty of enumeration varies in degree according to the complexity of a particular case, but it is seldom eliminated entirely or even to such an extent as to make it certain precisely what facts the observer has in mind in giving his inference or what may be the relative value which he attaches to them respectively. (2) The proposition of experience which constitutes the major premise of the observer's inference is frequently one with which the general community is familiar.[15] Such inferences from experience so constantly constitute an implied term in the reasoning which the court and jury are called upon to make as to pass as a rule unnoticed, or adopted sub silentio as part of the judicial knowledge of the tribunal. A further step, a somewhat closer approximation to expert evidence, properly so called, is taken when a witness who has had sufficient opportunities for observation, with or without being asked to do so, generalizes the data furnished him by experience into a general proposition not known to the community at large, which he makes part of the basis of his inference.[16] Such generalizations usually cover what the witness has observed to happen under a given set of circumstances — tracing a relation of cause and effect from the persistent recurrence of the same result in cases more or less numerous where a simple factor has remained constant.[17] Under these circumstances the witness, after stating such facts as may permit of detailed statement, may give the generalization of his experience.[18] The rule that observers with special experience may state a relation of cause and effect based upon that experience is apparently exemplified in cases where a physician is asked to assign a cause for an effect which he has observed.[19] The experience may even be applied as a major premise to particular instances of application. For example one familiar with the condition of a gate may testify as to the effect of wind upon it.[20] In any case the validity of the inference is to be tested by ascertaining the propositions of experience which the witness is employing unless these are simple and obvious.[21]

d. Correctness of Reasoning. The enumeration of facts by the observer serves not only to test his accuracy of observation but also to characterize his powers of reasoning. It may occur that, even where the facts are correctly observed and accurately stated by the witness, they do not lead to the conclusion which he derives from them.[22] Accordingly a witness may be asked whether other persons have not drawn a different inference from the same facts[23] or whether another sufficient cause is not equally available.[24]

3. Judgment of Expert — a. In General. The judgment of an expert is of value precisely in accordance with what there is back of it. Every proper test should therefore be applied.[25] Being hypothetical it stands or falls with the existence of the facts upon which it is predicated.[26] Although the facts hypothetically stated are found by the jury to exist[27] they may still refuse to credit the judgment which the expert has formed from them,[28] because unwilling or

16. See supra, XI, A, 4, a, (III), (C); XI, D.

17. In generalizing from his own experience the witness is apparently stating facts in the only practically available way. For while it is not impossible that in certain cases the individual instances on which the generalization is based could be put in evidence with such fulness and distinctness as to place the jury in the position of the witness and enable them to draw the generalization for themselves, such a case is not customary. Usually both the completeness and the distinctness are absent. Memory is as a rule unable to call to the mind of the witness himself all the impressions, more or less intangible, which in numerous instances have united to form the generalization. Even were so remarkable a power of memory vouchsafed the witness, and sufficient time for the purpose accorded by the tribunal, the difficulty inherent in conveying these impressions to an ordinary jury in such a way as to create a uniform and correct result would usually prove insuperable. unable to do so.[29] They may find that the facts are true and the reasoning false, or that while the facts justify his inference they are equally consistent with another.[30] To test the value of an expert's opinion it is often first necessary to ascertain so far as possible what facts he has mentally added to those hypothetically stated,[31] especially as to the general scientific propositions upon which, as ultimate major premises, the induction will be found finally to rest.[32]

b. On Cross-Examination. The tests usually applied to expert evidence[33] are the usual weapons of a cross-examining counsel.[34] The qualifications of the witness,[35] his knowledge,[36] and the basis of his opinion,[37] including statements on which he has relied,[38] may be fully investigated,[39] and the expert may be asked what his opinion would be, assuming the facts to be as the cross-examining counsel claims that the evidence shows them to be;[40] and facts stated in the hypothetical question which the witness deems unimportant may be sifted out.[41] A favorite line of attack upon the expert is in testing the process of reasoning employed in deduc-

ing his conclusion;[42] and a wide range of examination is usually permitted,[43] in the discretion of the court,[44] and the hypothetical questions asked may properly go beyond the scope of the evidence.[45] The court may permit cross-examination on purely imaginary or abstract questions assuming facts or theories not in evidence,[46] if the office and purpose of the examination is to elicit the reason upon which the expert based the opinion expressed by him on his examination in chief, or to ascertain the extent of his learning and knowledge of the particular subject upon which he assumes to be an expert.[47] A cross-examining counsel is entitled to bring out any fact[48] permitted by the general scope of cross-examination, which is relevant on any issue, including that of damages.[49] The general credibility of the witness may be attacked,[50] provided the inquiry is relevant.[51]

There the modes of reaching conclusions from the facts when stated is not so different from the inference of common knowledge that expert testimony can be anything more than a mere guide. But when a case concerns the highly specialized art of treating an eye for cataract, or for the mysterious and dread disease of glaucoma, with respect to which a layman can have no knowledge at all, the court and jury must be dependent on expert evidence. There can be no other guide, and, where want of skill or attention is not thus shown by expert evidence applied to the facts, there is no evidence of it proper to be submitted to the jury"). United States.— U. S. v. McGlue, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,679, 1 Curt. 1, 10, where the court said to the jury: "If you consider judgment is dependent upon the correspondence of the facts stated to the expert and those established by the evidence,[64] or upon the ability of the witness, judging by the laws of mind, to deduce a correct conclusion;[65] that the skilled observer is entitled to greater consideration than the unskilled;[66] or that the expert evidence of the skilled witness is not entitled to confidence.[67] It is not error to charge concerning the testimony of experts that other things being equal the testimony of the greater number should be entitled to the greater weight.[68] Nor, on the other hand, is it proper for the court to reject the evidence merely because it seems to be of but slight weight.[69] But the judgment of an expert, when opposed to undisputed facts and the dictates of common sense, will not support a verdict;[70] nor would evidence of a supposition avail against the positive statement of one who knows the facts.[71]

2. Inference. While there can be little question that as between the evidence of a skilled and that of an unskilled witness of phenomena of a technical nature, the greater weight lies with the skilled observer;[72] a doubt may arise as to the relative weight to be attached to the inferences of a skilled observer and a witness of the same or greater scientific or practical qualification who has not seen the phenomena but who is testifying from a supposition of the existence of certain facts. The advantage in practical administration of expert testimony as contrasted with that of a skilled observer lies in the greater certainty of the basis involved in the expert's judgment.[73] In the hypothetically stated question the facts are enumerated; the limits of the field covered by the inference are definite.

that any of these states of fact put to the physicians are proved, then the opinions thereon are admissible evidence, to be weighed by you. Otherwise, their opinions are not applicable to this case.

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," § 2395 et seq.

It is not to be understood that the entire answer fails unless all facts which constitute its hypothesis are found by the jury. The latter may properly accord weight in proportion as they find the facts to have been proved (Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99; Turnbull v. Richardson, 69 Mich. 400, 37 N. W. 499; People v. Benham, 160 N. Y. 402, 55 N. E. 11, 14 N. Y. Cr. 188), or that the weight to be given to the evidence depends largely on the foundations of fact and of reason on which their opinions stand (Cram v. Chicago, 94 Ill. App. 199). It has, however, been held that it is error to allow a jury to find that an answer based upon an incorrect assumption of facts may have weight (Kirsher v. Kirsher, 120 Iowa 337, 94 N. W. 846; Hall v. Rankin, 87 Iowa 261, 54 N. W. 217; Stephens v. People, 4 Park. Cr. (N. Y.) 396); and it is proper to instruct the jury that if the assumed facts or any of them are not true, the judgment may be rejected by them (Dudley v. Gates, 124 Mich. 440, 83 N. W. 97, 86 N. W. 959), or that the value of the evidence varies with the conformity of the facts to the hypothesis (Woodward v. Iowa L. Ins. Co., 104 Tenn. 49, 56 S. W. 1020).

The evidentiary value of facts, as distinguished from the question of their existence, may well be a matter of science or experience with which a skilled witness is alone competent to deal. Bowen v. Huntington, 35 W. Va. 682, 14 S. E. 217.

Precisely the same hypothesis may be stated to another expert; or the hypothesis may itself be so varied in repeated questions as to cover all aspects in which the evidence is likely to impress the jury. The inferiority of expert testimony lies in two considerations: (1) The enumeration of facts is less complete than an equally skilled observer could perceive; and (2) the mental process is less immediate to the facts. The facts constituting part of the basis for the expert's judgment are frequently definite merely because they are incomplete. Where an observer presents to the tribunal his inference because he cannot state all the facts to the jury with the fulness necessary to enable them to draw an accurate inference, a fortiori such facts cannot be placed hypothetically before the expert so fully as to make his inference from them of any value to the jury.[74] In other words the expert stands in the same position regarding the original perception that the jury themselves occupy. In coördinating the separate mental impressions into a judgment the expert is compelled to use rather the functions of imagination and reasoning than the more vivid and inerrant faculties of sense, perception, and the semi-instructive coördination of common experience. On the other hand the skilled observer possesses the relative advantages: (1) That he has a broader, if less distinct, basis for his inference; (2) that he is dealing directly with the subject-matter; and (3) that he is able to seize upon some minute but possibly important phenomenon which would conceal its value from the ordinary observer and so never come within the purview of the expert's mental cognizance, because not embraced in his hypothesis. The "expert" deals, it may be said, with propositions formulated by the intellect; the trained observer considers facts known to or observed by him. Probably a higher grade of intellectuality or professional skill is needed to deal adequately with abstract propositions than to diagnose concrete appearances. But the points of resemblance are more marked than those of difference. The question of relative weight is for the jury.[75] But courts have expressed a decided leaning in favor of the evidence furnished by observation,[76] particularly in case of mental con-

They may be able to state the diagnosis of the disease more learnedly, but, upon the question whether it had, at a given time, reached such a stage, that the subject of it was incapable of making a contract, or irresponsible for his acts, the opinion of his neighbors, if men of good, common sense, would be worth more than that of all the experts in the country."

Ann. 532; Forsyth v. Despierris, 15 La. 215, holding that in a redhibitory action, of two physicians testifying to the nature of the disease of which the slave died, more weight is due the opinion of the attending physician who made a post-mortem examination.

Missouri.— Highfill v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 93 Mo. App. 219, holding that in an action against a railway company for injuries caused by a swinging door, which being pushed open by a porter struck plaintiff in the back, knocking him over the seats and dislocating his hip, evidence by experts that the hip could not have been dislocated under such circumstances was not sufficient to overcome positive testimony of a physician that the hip was dislocated.

New York.— Cadwell v. Arnheim, 152 N. Y. 182, 46 N. E. 310; Health Dept. v. Purdon, 99 N. Y. 237, 1 N. E. 687, 52 Am. Rep. 22; Pease Furnace Co. v. Kesler, 21 N. Y. App. Div. 631, 47 N. Y. Suppl. 473; Weber v. Third Ave. R. Co., 42 N. Y. Suppl. 789. In a case of a runaway accident it was held that the evidence of experts that the horses could have been stopped by proper management would not weigh sufficiently to warrant submitting a case to the jury as against the perdition;[77] and it has been ruled that it is error to speak of the testimony of a skilled observer as "matter of opinion."[78] It has been said that the inference of actual observers cannot be contradicted by the judgment of skilled witnesses testifying as experts, but a contrary opinion has been expressed in favor of expert evidence.[79]

3. Judgment of Expert — a. In General. The general uncertainty and persistent disagreement of authority on many lines of professional and scientific inquiry, the fact that this class of evidence deals so largely with the problematical and the conjectural, and that there are other elements of unreliability arising from human frailty, bias,[80] loyalty to one's employer,[81] pride of opinion, self-interest,[82] or the heat engendered by controversy, which more or less unconsciously warp the mind of the witness, even without the more vulgar elements of venality[83] and the absence of any efficient punishment for perjury, have caused courts of the highest eminence to feel that experts are frequently rather the hired advocates of the parties than men of science placing their special experience at the service of the cause of justice.[84] Such courts have naturally characterized this sonal testimony of a competent driver, who tried in vain to stop them on the occasion in question, that it could not be done.

As I have often explained since I have had the honour of a seat on this Bench, the opinion of an expert may be honestly obtained, and it may be quite different from the opinion of another expert also honestly obtained. But the mode in which expert evidence is obtained is such as not to give the fair result of scientific opinion to the Court. A man may go, and does sometimes, to half-a-dozen experts. I have known it in cases of valuation within my own experience at the Bar. He takes their honest opinions, he finds three in his favour and three against him; he says to the three in his favour, Will you be kind enough to give evidence? and he pays the three against him class of evidence unfavorably[85] and have ruled that such evidence should be received with "caution,"[86] "with narrow scrutiny and with much caution,"[87] and never received at all except when absolutely necessary;[88] and that the statement of an inference or judgment is inferior in probative effect to a statement of fact.[89] It has been suggested that the court should itself select the experts,[90] but there are obvious difficulties in such a course.[91] Still it cannot be their fees and leaves them alone; the other side does the same. It may not be three out of six, it may be three out of fifty. I was told in one case, where a person wanted a certain thing done, that they went to sixty-eight people before they found one. I was told that by the solicitor in the cause. That is an extreme case no doubt, but it may be done, and therefore I have always the greatest possible distrust of scientific evidence of this kind, not only because it is universally contradictory, and the mode of its selection makes it necessarily contradictory, but because I know of the way in which it is obtained. I am sorry to say the result is that the Court does not get that assistance from the experts which, if they were unbiased and fairly chosen, it would have a right to expect."

91. Thorn v. Worthing Skating Rink Co., 6 Ch. D. 415 note, 416 note, where it was said by Jessel, M. R.: "It is very difficult to do so in cases of this kind [infringement of patent]. First of all the Court has to find out an unbiased expert. That is very difficult. The Court does not know how many of these experts have been consulted by parties, either in the case of this particular patent or of a similar patent. It may turn out that a particular expert has been largely employed by the particular solicitor on the one side or the other in the case, and it is so extremely difficult to find out a really unbiased expert and a man who has no preconceived opinion or prejudice, that I have hitherto abstained from exercising the power which, no doubt, the Court has of selecting an expert to give evidence before the Court. That being so, it throws the Court on its own limited resources, and they are always limited with respect to subject-matter of the patent, a matter which depends on a very great variety of circumstances; and although the Court does derive, no doubt, a great deal of knowledge from the evidence of experts, yet of course, as we all know, in a subject-matter with which a person is not familiar from long training serious mistakes may be made which will not be made by persons who are so acquainted."

In cases involving mental condition the absolute and comparative value of expert tesdoubted that in very many cases expert evidence must be accorded that measure of respect which is due to a class of evidence, the use of which is absolutely indispensable.[92] It may be stated as a general rule that the value of opinions given by experts depends upon the experience and knowledge which they have and evince concerning the matters about which they testify,[93] and the reasons which they assign for it.[94]

b. How Impaired. The weight to be given the judgment of a skilled witness may be impaired by the various methods employed in the case of other testimony. He may be contradicted by others in his own class or any competent witness,[95] by his own statements at another time,[96] by the fact that he formed a different opinion at another time,[97] or by the fact that he is interested.[98] He may be impeached or discredited as by showing bias.[99] It may be shown that the inferences are erroneous, as where another sufficient cause will explain the phenomena[1] or an occurrence said to be impossible has occurred.[2] Lack of qualification may be proved,[3] but the evidence must be relevant[4] and admissible. For example, hearsay,[5] including reputation[6] and opinion,[7] are excluded. It may be proved that the faculties of the witness have been impaired by disease,[8] that the facts assumed as the basis of the question do not exist[9] or are not established by the evidence,[10] or that the witness is mistaken in a portion of his testimony.[11]

c. How Increased. A party is entitled to confirm the judgment of his expert witnesses by proof of facts which tend to show its accuracy.[12] Thus a party who introduces expert testimony is entitled to show that experiments confirm[13]

timony in insanity cases is a much controverted point. See supra, XI, D, 2. or demonstrate[14] its correctness. He may be asked whether he is satisfied with the accuracy of his conclusion,[15] but not as to whether a jury would be justified in finding a verdict on his evidence.[16] The weight of the expert's judgment may be enhanced by the evidence of another qualified witness as to his scientific or professional attainments.[17] Where the witness has formed an opinion he may be asked on examination in chief what he did in pursuance of it.[18] On redirect examination any impairment in weight or clearness resulting from the cross-examination may be remedied.[19]

4. STANDARD TREATISES — a. On Direct Examination. In connection with the value of expert testimony or the evidence of skilled witnesses the existence of standard treatises on scientific or technical subjects is a fact of importance; and what are standard treatises and what relevant propositions they severally lay down may be stated by the witness.[20] In accordance, however, with the rule that matters of fact cannot be proved by showing that certain authors so declare,[21] to which the necessity of employing expert testimony is largely due, a party cannot, as a general rule, read extracts from standard treatises to the jury.[22] Nor upon

The effect of such evidence is to make the statement of the author that of the witness. Where for example a medical or other expert testifies from his reading merely the circumstance which causes such testimony to differ from a mere attempt at introduction of the book itself (which would not be permitted) lies in the fact that a competent person practically indorses the statement as consistent with his other knowledge. Healy v. Visalia, etc., R. Co., 101 Cal. 585, 36 Pac. 125; Finnegan v. Fall River Gas Works Co., 159 Mass. 311, 34 N. This has been permitted by statute in some states. For example in Iowa it is provided that "historical works, works of science or art, and published maps and charts, when made by persons indifferent between the parties, are presumptive evidence of facts of general notoriety or interest." Iowa Civil Code, § 3995. Other states have permitted it in the absence of statute. Ripor v. Bittel, 30 Wis. 614. that, where a witness bases his inference upon the statements of authority, he may be asked to name the authors on which he relies.[32] It is competent to show affirmatively, by producing the treatise itself or suitable evidence of its contents, at the proper stage, that it says nothing of the kind, or that other authorities contradict the witness' interpretation of the treatise.[33]

b. On Cross-Examination. The right to read extracts from standard treatises is greatly increased upon cross-examination. But this cannot be shown, it seems, by asking the witness to point out the place in the particular treatise. Davis v. State, 38 Md. 15.

The contradicting statement does not become evidence. "Where a witness says a thing or a theory is so because a book says so, and the book, on being produced, is discovered to say directly to the contrary, there is a direct contradiction which anybody can understand. But where a witness simply gives his opinion as to the proper treatment of a given disease or injury, and a book is produced recommending a different treatment, at most the repugnance is not of fact, but of theory; and any number of additional books expressing different theories, would obviously be quite as competent as the first. But since the books are not admissible as original evidence in such cases, it must follow that they are not admissible on cross-examination, where their introduction is not for the direct contradiction of something asserted by the witness, but simply to prove a contrary theory." 'Are you prepared to say that no standard surgical authority prescribes splints reaching only to the hands for such fractures as plaintiff's was?' . . . XII. RES INTER ALIOS.*

A. In General — 1. Definitions. The maxim res inter alios acta alteri nocere non debet — usually abbreviated in use into res inter alios acta — indicates in itself merely the ground of irrelevancy in a particular instance; that is, where it is proposed to affect a person by the acts of others for whose doings he is in no way legally responsible. In the modern law of evidence, the phrase is employed in hinting rather than stating certain administrative principles usually adopted by courts in dealing with relevant facts whose probative value lies in the inference drawn by experience from the occurrence of similar events. Such events are by no means confined, as in the statement of the maxim itself, to acts done by others than the party whom it is sought to affect by them. They may be acts of the party himself at another time, and in connection with persons who are either strangers or parties to the pending inquiry. They may not even be acts at all. Mere natural occurrences are equally within the rules. In other words the administrative principles deal properly speaking with the inferences that a person has done a certain thing because he has at some other time done a similar one; or that a definite event occurred at one time because a similar event occurred at another. Being a part of the judge's administrative function the appeal is to the court's discretion. In exercising it the main considerations are three: (1) What dangers lie in the use of similar acts or occurrences; (2) what necessity exists for resorting to such evidence; (3) what would be the probative quality of the evidence itself, and consequently what advantage may reasonably be expected to accrue from its use. The phrase res inter alios is used moreover in a loose way to cover other classes of facts the proof of which presents no peculiarity in the law of evidence. For example it has been extended to cover proof of relevant facts, which, not being subject to direct cognition by the senses, can be proved only by showing manifestations which circumstantially indicate their existence. Of this nature are the mental states, knowledge, motive, intent, etc., which may be necessary to the existence of a claim or liability.[45] The use of the phrase has also been extended to cover facts tending to show circumstantially the existence of necessarily attendant circumstances, such as the possession of the skill, physical or mental capabilities, materials, tools, motives, etc., required for doing a particular act; the presence at a certain place, at a certain time, of a certain person, and the like.[46] The maxim has even been extended so as to apply to the steps by which a relation of cause and effect is traced, by the ordinary methods of inductive reasoning based upon observation or experiment, between two or more phenomena.[47]

2. Discretion of Court. Although complicated by the exercise of volition, it is still a proposition of experience, exemplified in the creation of habit and consequently of character, that a person is more apt to do than not to do under similar circumstances what he has done before. It is equally deducible from experience that in proportion as volition is eliminated identical conduct results from similar stimuli and that, as in other parts of the natural world, similar causes produce like results. The doing of similar acts or the occurrence of similar events is to that extent probative, on an issue as to whether a particular act was done by the same person or a like occurrence happened at another time. But experience also demonstrates that the inference is in itself a weak one; that men do not invariably or even in the great majority of instances do as they have done before, where the conditions are apparently similar, and that, still more often, the absence of a former element or the presence of a new factor in a psychological or physical combination of causes suffices to produce a very different result. Courts have felt that in such cases the jury could not well be permitted to consider the inference at all without giving it undue importance; that, so far as the consideration of similar acts or occurrences had weight, it would probably be overestimated. Judges have also realized the practical inconvenience of trying a number of collateral issues at the same time,[48] and the mischief of protracting

Value of property.— "The plaintiff sought to prove the evil effect of the road in diminishing values by the process of calling the owners of property in the vicinity and proving, in each case, what the particular premises owned by the witness rented for before the road was built and what thereafter. There were objections and exceptions. Such a process is not permissible. Each piece of evidence raised a collateral issue (Gouge v. Roberts, 53 N. Y. 619) and left the court to try a dozen issues over as many separate parcels of property." Jamieson v. Kings County El. R. Co., 147 N. Y. 322, 325, 41 N. E. 693, per Finch, J. Others similarly affected.— The practical impropriety of multiplying collateral issues, where direct evidence is available, is illustrated in Emerson v. Lowell Gas Light Co., 3 Allen (Mass.) 410, 417, where plaintiff, in an action of tort for injury to health by escaping gas, offered to show that a large number of houses in the neighborhood, the drains of which were similarly situated to his own, were filled with gas, and that where the gas trials,[49] surprising,[50] and otherwise prejudicing[51] litigants by permitting the use of evidence so well calculated to bewilder and mislead a jury.[52] Hence the rule is established that it is within the discretion of the court, except under special circumstances, to reject evidence of former acts or occurrences as proof that a particular act was done or a certain occurrence happened.[53] These reasons for this administrative rule, however, limit the scope of the operation of the rule itself. No such absolute prohibition against the evidence, where relevant, exists as in case of unsworn statements offered as proof of the facts asserted.[54] The admissibility of the evidence, so far as relevancy itself is concerned, varies with the ratio of danger and advantage; increasing as relevancy grows stronger, and as the probability that other and better evidence is procurable or that the jury will be misled by the evidence offered grows weaker; and diminishing, in turn, as relevancy grows weaker, and as the probability of procuring better evidence or that the jury may be misled increases. The difficulty, for example, relating to the raising of collateral issues is a purely practical one. There is no rule of law which prevents trying such issues,[55] and it is within the court's discretion to permit it to be done in a given instance, subject to review in case of abuse.[56]

entered sickness followed. The rejection of this evidence was held to be correct, the court saying: "Each separate and individual case must stand upon, and be decided by, the evidence particularly applicable to it. The attending circumstances may be so different, that the occurrence of sickness in one house would have no tendency to show the cause of illness in the occupants of another. If such evidence was admissible, the issues in a single cause might be indefinitely multiplied; and this would tend only to confusion, and to mislead the jury. It was competent for the plaintiffs to show all the facts and circumstances attending their sickness, and to add to that, proof of the opinions of persons of skill and experience as to the cause which produced such sickness, and particularly whether it might have been, or probably was, produced by the gas to which they were exposed in their house; but they were restricted by the rules of evidence to these limits, and could not establish or strengthen the evidence in their own case, by any proof concerning the condition of, or the injuries received by, another person."

It was held that the evidence was properly admitted. The court said: "So far as the introduction of collateral issues goes, that objection is a purely practical one, a concession to the shortness of life. When the fact sought to be proved is very unlikely to have any other explanation than the fact in issue, and may be proved or disproved without unreasonably protracting the trial, there is no objection to going into it." On an action to recover for work done under a special contract it is immaterial what others would have done the same work for at another and criminal,[58] the fact offered is said to be res inter alios, when the real meaning of the ruling is that it is irrelevant, that is, that no logical inference whatever can reasonably be drawn from it as to the existence of any fact in issue.[59] For example no inference that a certain act was reasonable can be drawn from the fact that others have[60] or have not[61] done it. Accordingly, on an issue of negligence, what others in the same business have been in the habit of doing is rejected.[62] Still less logical connection is there between the character of a house and that of one adjoining.[63] A genuine application of the principle occurs only where relevant evidence of similar acts or occurrences is rejected as evidence of the happening of an act or occurrence involved in the issue. The element of relevancy — the probative force of similar acts or events — is a resultant of three main factors: (1) The extent of the similarity; (2) the observed regularity of action; (3) the presence or absence of modifying forces. The maximum of relevancy would therefore be attained where the two facts present identical conditions, the operation of an invariable law, and the presence of no modifying circumstances. Considered in itself, apart from other elements affecting the exercise of discretion,[64] it may be said of this matter of relevancy, that as elements are added or eliminated, and in proportion as they are of importance, that is, as the similarity fails to cover all essential particulars as the relation of cause and effect is not found to be invariable, or — what is often much the same thing — as a modifying influence, such as volition, is introduced among the conditions attending an act or occurrence, relevancy is diminished. suggested that facts designated as res inter alios are admissible whenever relevant.[65] Without assenting to the truth of that general statement, it may be agreed that a chief difficulty in formulating this principle of administration lies in finding instances of its application as a rule, properly speaking, of exclusion; in other words, where it operates to prevent the reception of evidence which is clearly probative.

and more especially where direct evidence is or can be produced,[80] or the act is fully proved without it,[81] the evidence of habit is rejected. On the other hand it has been felt that the existence of a habit, causing a more or less settled or automatic reaction to physical or mental stimulus, presents a stronger relevancy as to what happened on a particular occasion than would the mere doing of an isolated act of a similar nature at another time.[82] Accordingly, when the existence of a habit is the only fact obtainable which is relevant on the point,[83] or, where the evidence is in conflict,[84] proof of habit has been received. Its influence, as here considered, relates to voluntary action of the person in question. Where a physical condition has been created which is beyond the control of the will, its existence, even if originally due to voluntary action, falls more nearly within the rules regulating natural occurrences[85] in which volition plays no part.[86] Much the same is true as to the habits of animals, since habit is relevant in proportion as volition ceases to disturb the ordinary relation between stimulus and conduct on which the relevancy is based.[87] In like manner, where it is claimed that an act is indicative of a particular criminal intent, evidence is competent that the actor habitually did the act without such an intent.[88] Evidence of the existence of a habit, probative for some reason other than that it renders probable the fact that the person acted in accordance with it on a particular occasion, is not within the rule.[89]

That a fact existed or event occurred at a particular time cannot be shown by evidence that another fact existed or event occurred[90] at another time, unless the two facts or occurrences are connected in some special way, indicating a relevancy beyond mere similarity in certain particulars.[91] Such relevancy is found where similarity in all essential

Applications of rule.— On an issue whether plaintiff was hired by the week or by the year, it was error to permit other employees to testify that they were hired by the year. Lichtenhein v. Fisher, 6 N. Y. App. Div. 385, 39 N. Y. Suppl. 553. The amount of hay raised on a farm in a given year cannot be proved by showing the average acreage of grass land and its yield in other years. Patrick v. Howard, 47 Mich. 40, 10 N. W. 71. Where the question was how much hay was eaten in a week by a particular horse, which was not in ordinary condition, evidence of how much hay an ordinary horse will eat in a week was held incompetent. Carlton v. Hescox, 107 Mass. 410. The question being whether a plaintiff in falling down an area was in the exercise of due care, the fact that many other people under other circumstances have passed the place in safety was properly excluded. Trenton Temperance Hall Assoc. v. Giles, 33 N. J. L. 260. Evidence of what expenses were necessary to be incurred by an engineer on one section of a railroad in its construction is incompetent to show what would be proper on another section, in the absence of proof that the conditions of both sections were the same. Pensacola, etc., R. Co. v. Atkinson, 20 Fla. 450. In a case of accident in a mine defendant cannot introduce evidence that there has not been an accident there before. Too many uncertain and undetermined elements which might affect the safety of its workmen make the testimony improper. Burgess v. Davis Sulphur Ore Co., 165 Mass. 71, 42 N. E. 501. Where, in an action for insurance on personal property, plaintiff claimed the value of a large number of books destroyed, and there was evidence that after the fire there were no remnants of the books, evidence that remnants of books remained after the burning of another building was properly excluded, where data as to the size of the building or extent of the fire were not given. Names v. Dwelling House Ins. Co., 95 Iowa 642, 64 N. W. 628.

A continuing fact, as a bodily condition, residence, etc., may, within limits of relevancy, be shown to have existed at a particular time by proof of its existence at an earlier date. See 16 Cyc. 1052. Its existence at the time in question cannot be shown by proof of its existence at a time which is later by a considerable interval. Bradford v. Haggerthy, 11 Ala. 698 (residence); Walton v. Cottingham, 30 Tex. 772 (disease of the womb; two months). An particulars is shown to exist. Evidence of other facts or occurrences is then admitted, provided the court deems this course a wise exercise of its administrative discretion. The probative fact or occurrence may be (1) found in actual life by observation, or (2) reproduced voluntarily in an experiment.[92]

2. SIMILARITY IN ESSENTIAL CONDITIONS. A sufficient ground of admissibility is furnished where physical conditions are shown to have been identical on the two occasions. The observed uniformity of nature raises under such circumstances an inference that like causes will produce like results.[93] It is legally as well as logically immaterial if dissimilarity in conditions is shown to exist in the presence of some particular which cannot reasonably be expected to have affected the result. Another fact or occurrence, the conditions of which are the same in all essential respects, will be deemed relevant,[94] the burden being upon the party offering the evidence to satisfy the court that such similarity exists.[95] In admitting evidence of such facts or occurrences the court makes no finding, except that sufficient has been shown to him as to the relevancy of the evidence to warrant its submis-interval which is short as compared with the natural permanent nature of the fact or condition in question does not destroy the relevancy of a subsequent occurrence. Finley v. Quirk, 9 Minn. 194, 86 Am. Dec. 93, balky horse; four days.

Evidence of other accidents similar to the one in question in certain particulars which do not establish relevancy are excluded. Florida Cent., etc., R. sion to the jury.[96] Other occurrences have been deemed relevant where the essential conditions are similar, although the law of uniformity in action underlying the relevancy is not natural but legal.[97]

3. EXPERIMENTS. The conditions of a relevant occurrence may be artificially created in an experiment. Where the material facts bearing on a particular issue are precisely duplicated in the experiment the result may be received in evidence,[98] the burden being on the proponent to show the correspondence in essentials.[99] Thus in a civil case whether an object in a certain position can be seen from a given height above a designated spot,[1] how far the human voice will carry words,[2] and in what degree intervening obstacles interfere with hearing under certain conditions,[3] are facts which a party may attempt to establish by showing what occurred when an experiment was tried. In a criminal case the

96. Com. v. Robinson, 146 Mass. 571, 581, 16 N. E. 452, where it was said: "It is only necessary that there should be so much evidence as to make it proper to submit the whole evidence to the jury. The fact of the admission of the evidence by the judge does not in a legal sense give it any greater weight with the jury; it does not affect the burden of proof, or change the duty of the jury in weighing the whole evidence. They must still be satisfied, in a criminal case, upon the whole evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt. Ordinarily, questions of fact are exclusively for the jury, and questions of law for the court. But when, in order to pass upon the admissibility of evidence, the determination of a preliminary question of fact is necessary, the court in the due and orderly course of the trial must necessarily determine it, as far as is necessary for that purpose, and usually without the assistance, at that stage, of the jury. If, under such circumstances, testimony is admitted against a party's objection, it may often happen that he may still ask the jury to disregard it."

distance at which a given revolver will produce certain results upon clothing,[4] or whether certain wounds could have been produced by a man standing on the ground[5] and other relevant facts,[6] may be shown by the result of experiments conducted under suitable conditions. A jury are not at liberty to try experiments for themselves out of court,[7] for this class of evidence comes within the administrative discretion of the court upon its relevancy being established.[8] Where the experiment is inconclusive,[9] or raises a number of collateral issues,[10] or the evidence seems to the court not to promise results justifying the use of the time required to hear it,[11] a party cannot insist upon producing it.

D. Attendant Circumstances — 1. Capability. Evidence of similar acts at other times is competent, where the doing of such acts tends to establish the capability for doing the act in question,[12] or the possibility that it may be done.[13] For example whether a machine is capable of doing certain work;[14] whether a horse can attain a certain speed;[15] whether a structure[16] or steam whistle[17] is calculated to frighten horses, or a locomotive is capable of setting fires along the road-bed of a railroad;[18] or in general whether any cause is capable of producing a given result may be shown by what has happened on other occasions.[19] Knowledge may be an element of capability.[20]

2. Presence at Given Locality. Acts done at another time are competent to show that a person was present at a particular place at a given time.[21]

3. Skill. Possession of the skill necessary to do a certain act may be an attendant circumstance of probative value in identifying the doer of the act. Existence of such skill may be shown by prior acts indicative of its possession.[22] Skill shown at a later period does not establish it at a time earlier by an appreci-

4. System of Coördinated Action. An attendant circumstance of highly probative value may in some cases be found in the existence of such a series or system of coördinated or correlated facts as lead to the inference that the particular act which is under investigation must have been done as a necessary part of a general plan to attain a definite object and that it was done by the person to whose real or supposed interest the particular act would redound. Evidence of fraud.— On a suit for money deposited as security for a note in a safety vault, which neither party could open, except in the other's presence or with his written consent, it appeared that defendant with plaintiff's written consent went to the vault and found only worthless paper. It was held that evidence of other acts of fraud by plaintiff in the course of his transactions with defendant during the same period of time were admissible to prove that he removed the money himself by fraud while at the vault with defendant. Conspiracy.— Proof of the system of operations may involve the existence of a conspiracy. See Criminal Law, 12 Cyc. 411 note 28. But mere proof of a conspiracy to do similar disconnected acts does not make the evidence of other transactions relevant (State v. Faulkner, (Mo. 1903) 75 S. may be shown notwithstanding the fact that the various acts cover an extended period of time.[28]

E. Causation Established by Induction — 1. Presence or Cause in Combination Uniformly Giving Result — a. Rule Stated. Where the question is which of several antecedent circumstances is the cause of a given effect, it is logically relevant to show that on other occasions the presence of a particular antecedent has produced similar results, the other antecedents being varied. This is in accordance with the canon of inductive reasoning that "if two or more instances of the phenomenon under investigation have only one circumstance in common, the circumstance in which alone all the instances agree, is the cause (or effect) of the phenomenon."[29] In other words, persistent recurrence of a given result when one antecedent alone remains constant is highly probative that this antecedent is the cause of the result.[30] In order to meet such evidence, or generally, it is entirely relevant to prove instances where the alleged cause was present and the result failed to follow;[31] or where the same result followed when the alleged

Other accidents under same circumstances. — In an action for personal injuries from a defective sidewalk, evidence of other accidents to other persons at the same place and from the same cause is competent, as tending to show the common cause of the accident to be the dangerous and unsafe condition of the walk. Rowlands v. Elgin, 66 Ill. App. 66. And in an action for an injury caused by plaintiff's horse becoming frightened by steam escaping from defendant's mill, next to a public highway, evidence was admissible to show that other horses, ordinarily safe, when driven by it on other occasions, shortly before and after the accident, when the construction and use of the mill were the same, were also frightened by it. Crocker v. McGregor, 76 Me. 282, 49 Am. Dec. 611.

Discretion of court.— "How far the plaintiff shall be permitted to go into particulars in offering such evidence should depend somewhat on the circumstances of the case, and must, within reasonable limits, be left to the discretion of the presiding judge." Complication of causes tending to vary result.— A railway company, in an action by a conductor for wages, claimed a set-off for moneys collected by him and not accounted for. It was held that the set-off could not be proved by mere comparison of his returns with those of another conductor running alternate days over the same route. Denver, etc., R. Co. v. Glasscott, 4 Colo. 270. And in an action on a note given for a machine, it was held error to admit evidence that another machine furnished by the same manufacturer failed through similar defects, where the issue was whether the machine in question failed through defects in its construction or by mismanagement. 31. Birmingham Union R. Co. v. Alexander, 93 Ala. 133, 9 So. 525; Shirley v. Keagy, 126 Pa. St. 282, 17 Atl. 607. In an action for negligence in leaving a piece of pipe suspended from a water-tank by which plaintiff's intestate, a brakeman, was injured, evidence was held relevant that the pipe had hung there for years and no one had been injured. East Tennessee, etc., R. Co. v. Thompson, 94 Ala. 636, 10 So. 280. And in an action for the price of a lot of frozen fish, defendant contended that they were worthless, and had been thawed and frozen several times while in plaintiff's possession, and put in evidence the state of the thermometer during this time. It was held that plaintiff might in rebuttal put in evidence that other fish of a similar description, stored in the same place for the same time, did not thaw, and were taken out afterward in good condition. Hodgkins v. Chappell, 128 Mass. 197. On the other hand, in an action against a ferryman for breach of his contract for transportation of animals which fell off the boat cause was not present;[32] provided the other conditions are shown to be sufficiently similar to render the evidence relevant.[33] It is also competent to prove occurrences on other occasions which show another cause for the result than that claimed to have been the cause.[34] It is further possible logically to contend that where a new element is added, other conditions remaining constant, a variation in result is due to the operation of the new element.[35]

b. Application of Rule. Among the cases in which the method of induction noticed in the preceding section[36] constitutes a necessary line of evidence are those where it is claimed that there is a defect in a hedge,[37] highway,[38] machinery,[39] road-bed,[40] or system of directing the affairs of a municipal corporation[41] or private business; or that a certain structure[42] or other thing[43] frightened a horse or other animal.

2. Removal of Cause Accompanied by Absence of Result. In order to prove that a result was due to a cause alleged, it is relevant to show other instances where the specified cause was not present in a combination of antecedents, and the result did not follow.[44] and were drowned through his alleged negligence in not furnishing the boat with barriers, evidence that just such a boat had been used to transport animals over the ferry for thirty years, and no accident had ever occurred before, was held inadmissible, as not being pertinent to the issue. XIII. INSPECTION.*

A. In General — 1. Nature of the Evidence. The tribunal of fact receives evidence through three channels: inspection, documents, and witnesses.[45] Evidence gained by inspection covers facts which the tribunal cognizes with its own senses; sees, hears,[46] smells, tastes,[47] or otherwise perceives[48] for itself.[49]

2. Power and Duty of Court. What the court will allow the jury to see for itself is largely within the administrative function of the judge, who will permit the use of the court-room for deviations from the usual routine of trials only when satisfied that the interests of substantial justice warrant him in so doing.[50] It is part of his function to decide necessary preliminary questions of fact, as the accuracy of a photograph,[51] or the identity of articles offered in evidence.[52] Having reached the conclusion that the information to be gained by inspection is relevant, the court decides for example that an experiment may[53] or may not[54] indispensable part of the cause of the phenomenen." Mills Logic, c. 8, § 2.

49. "By real evidence, I understand all evidence of which any object belonging to the class of things is the source; persons also included, in respect to such properties as belong to them in common with things." 3 Bentham Rationale Jud. Ev. 26. Bentham divides real evidence into immediate and reported; according as the matter is presented to the senses of the tribunal or brought to its attention by the report of a witness. As most evidence is of the latter description, the distinction seems valueless and instances of original perception by the court or jury are the only valid instances of the use of this class of evidence.

Judicial cognizance distinguished.— The circumstance that a judge or jury may ascertain by inspection a fact of which judicial notice may be taken has in some cases caused a confusion of facts of notoriety which a tribunal knows because everybody else does, and facts of casual importance or limited publicity which a tribunal learns for itself. For example, in the preface to the first edition of his Digest of the Law of Evidence, Stephen, speaking of judicial cognizance, says: "It is like proving that it is raining, by telling the judge to look out of the window," an obvious instance of real evidence.

Evidence not primary.— Except in case of a document (see infra, XIV) no rule of law requires production of a thing itself for the jury's inspection. be tried in court; that the jury shall be granted or refused a view of real or personal property;[55] or that an injured limb may be exhibited to the jury.[56] Inspection may be refused where in the opinion of the court the evidence is apt to mislead the jury,[57] unduly excite their antipathy[58] or sympathy,[59] or bewilder them with a number of preliminary[60] or collateral[61] issues; where the fact sought to be proved is remotely[62] or insufficiently[63] connected with the issue; where it is not deemed necessary to run the dangers incidental to the use of this class of evidence, because the party has a better grade of evidence which he can produce, or articles are so cumbrous that their exhibition would impede the orderly administration of justice;[64] or where the exhibition would be indecent[65] or offensive[66] to the sensibilities, without compensating advantages. The court may in its discretion refuse to compel a party to submit articles to the inspection of the jury.[67] But inspection evidence should be received where it is both relevant and highly probative and better evidence cannot reasonably be expected and the dangers of its use are small in comparison to the advantages.[68] It is said that the action of the court in the exercise of its discretion is not subject to review.[69] It may be doubted, however, whether in point of law any discretion exists in these connections which would not be equally applicable to the evidence furnished by witnesses;[70] and an unreasonable exercise of discretion has been held to constitute error.[71] The practical difficulty in securing a review is that the evidence gained by inspection cannot easily be reported for consideration of an appellate court.[72]

elsewhere in this article.[2] By inspection of a document, however, the jury may be aided in determining whether it is genuine or written in a counterfeited hand;[3] or whether it contains an alteration,[4] erasure,[5] or mutilation.[6] The jury may be asked to determine from inspection which of two words was written over the other.[7] In all these cases the jury may receive additional assistance from the inferences of specially skilled witnesses.[8] Submission of writings to the jury for comparison is treated in another place.[9]

E. Experiments Before Jury. In the discretion of the judge,[10] experiments may be tried in the presence of the jury either in[11] or out[12] of court, the results of which they may use as evidence.[13] Indeed the judge may in a civil case compel parties to assist in making a test of this nature.[14] Such an experiment may involve a person, as where clothes are tried on to see if they fit[15] or to show how an injury happened,[16] or where one who claims not to be able to read is asked to do so.[17]

38. Definition.— Documentary evidence has been defined as: "That which teaches authoritatively, sets forth or establishes; anything furnishing proof or evidence; especially, an original or official paper relied upon as the basis, proof, or support of anything else." Webster Dict. [quoted in Patterson v. Churchman, 122 Ind. 379, 387, 22 N. E. 662, 23 N. E. 1082].

"In the law of evidence, documents are either public or private. A public document is one recording facts which may have been inquired into or taken notice of for the benefit of the public by an agent authorized and accredited for the purpose. Such are acts of parliament, judgments and proceedings of courts, records generally, registers of births, deaths and marriages, and other registers. . . . Private documents include deeds, wills, agreements, and the like." Sweet L. Dict. [quoted in Patterson v. Churchman, 122 Ind. 379, 387, 22 N. E. 662, 23 N. E. 1082].

2. State Papers. Government gazettes, registers, and state papers generally are admissible as evidence of the proclamations issued by the executive and of all acts of government or matters of state therein contained,[41] but they are not admissible to prove facts of a private nature.[42] The American State Papers, published by order of congress, and the copies which they contain of legislative and executive documents, are, if they contain the authentication required by the act, admissible in evidence without further proof.[43] So a volume of public documents, printed by authority of the senate of the United States, containing letters to and from various officers of state, communicated by the president to the senate, are as competent evidence as the original documents themselves.[44]

3. Laws — a. In General. A full treatment of the admissibility of documentary evidence in proof of statutes domestic and foreign, will be found elsewhere in this work.[45]

b. Ordinances. Books or pamphlets purporting to contain the ordinances of a city and to be published by municipal authority are frequently made prima facie evidence of such ordinances by charter or the general law; and they have been held admissible even in the absence of express provision, and even where a different method of proof is allowed by statute or ordinance.[46] It has been held, however, that there must be some declaration in or on, and as part of, a book or pamphlet, that its publication is by reason of some competent authority, to bring it within this rule.[47] So, even when they are not expressly made evidence by statute, the official books or records of a municipal corporation are admissible in evidence to prove its ordinances and their adoption, where they are required or authorized to be kept by law and where they are produced from the proper repository.[48] Provision is frequently made by statute for proving a municipal

Record of suit transferred to another court. — In Geer v. Geer, 109 N. C. 679, 14 S. E. 297, it was held that where a suit instituted in the old court of equity was transferred to the superior court, the original records thereof were admissible in evidence in an action in the superior court, a transcript thereof being unnecessary.

Failure to record in book in compliance with statute.— The original records of a court have been held proper evidence in the court to which they belong, although it does not appear that the proceedings have been recorded in a well bound book kept for that purpose, as required by statute, since the court is presumed in law to know its own acts. Ward v. Saunders, 28 N. C. 382. So it has been held that the original report of a judicial sale is admissible in evidence without proof of its identity by an entry in the order book, as such report, found among the papers in the case, and purporting to be the will, if it can be produced, be admissible in any court, although a certified copy might also be admissible,[52] and although it was improper to remove the records from the office of the custodian.[53] But a judicial record is not admissible where it has no tendency to prove any issue made by the pleadings.[54]

Admissibility of minutes of justice in lieu of formal record.— In Strong v. Bradley, 13 Vt. 9, it was held that the files and minutes of proceedings in a justice's court, from which a record was to be made, were not proper evidence of the judgment where the justice was still alive, and there was no necessity for receiving any other than either the record of the judgment, or a certified copy thereof. To same effect see Nye v. Kellam, 18 Vt. 594. But where the justice had died without making a formal record the minutes were held admissible. Story v. Kimball, 6 Vt. 541. Under statute in Connecticut making the files and minutes of a deceased justice admissible in evidence in a suit on the judgment rendered by him, where he has neglected to make up the record, it has been held not to be necessary that the minutes shall be technically full and accurate, but that if they are full enough to show that a judgment was actually rendered, they are admissible. Redelsheimer v. Miller, 107 Ind. 485, 8 N. E. 447.

Effect of statute requiring filing of papers.—Under a statute requiring the justice to take minutes of the examination of a garnishee, and file the same with the other papers in the cause, it has been held that an entry on a justice's docket, instead of on a separate piece of paper to be filed in the cause, of the minutes of an examination of a garnishee defendant, would not be admissible to prove the examination, in the absence of any showing that it constitutes the original and only minutes of such examination, and especially not where it appears probable that other minutes were in fact taken and placed on the files. Watson v. Kane, 31 Mich. 61.

Judgment indorsed on summons.— Under Ga. Code, § 457, requiring a magistrate to keep a docket, and enter his judgment on it, and section 4143, requiring the officer serving a summons to return the original with an entry of service thereon to the justice, who shall file and preserve it with the other papers pertaining to his office, a summons from a justice's court, with the judgment in the case indorsed on it, is not admissible to prove the judgment. d. Docket Entries, Original Papers, Etc. The rule has been laid down in some of the cases that docket entries or entries in a judgment book, which are merely minutes or memoranda of a judgment and the proceedings, are not admissible.[61] But where a formal record is not required to be kept by law, docket entries which are permitted as a substitute for a formal record are admissible in evidence.[62] Moreover the rule supported by numerous authorities is that until the record is fully extended the docket is the record and the files, minutes, and entries therein are admissible;[63] and this although a certified copy of the same is

e. Matters Included in Record. Since the record as a whole imports verity every part of it is admissible to prove that which it legitimately sets forth.[70] Hence the rule admitting records in proof of judicial proceedings includes all pleadings[71] and all entries and papers legitimately forming a part of the record,[72]

a sheriff, in support of his title, produced a mere memorandum from the clerk's docket of the amount of the judgment, dated in 1783, and proved that nothing more could be found, it was held that the entry, having been made in a new and frontier county, during the Revolutionary war, might be received as a record. Necessity of recording.— In Barney v. Cuttler, 1 Root (Conn.) 489, it was held that an execution not recorded in the office from whence it issued, although recorded in the records of the town-clerk, could not be admitted as evidence of title. But in Perry v. Whipple, 38 Vt. 278, it was held that the original execution is evidence of its own contents, notwithstanding it has been incorrectly recorded. In Brewster v. Vail, 20 N. J. L. 56, 38 Am. Dec. 547, it was held that, although a writ and levy had not been actually returned and filed, but were still in the hands of the sheriff, a written document identified as the inventory made on the execution was admissible.

Execution returned after return-day.— The mere fact that an execution was not returned and filed until after the return-day does not destroy the effect of the writ and the return indorsed thereon as record evidence. Rowe v. Hardy, 97 Va. 674, 34 S. E. 625, 75 Am. St. Rep. 811. But it has been held that a receipt of payment of a judgment indorsed upon an execution and bearing date more than ten months after the return-day is no part of the record and is not admissible as such, where it does not appear that the writ was received by the sheriff and acted upon while it was in force. Chipman v. Fambro, 16 Ark. 291.

Indorsements by a sheriff on an execution are not competent evidence that land was sold thereunder, as the office of a return is to show the satisfaction or the failure to make satisfaction. Kimmel v. Meier, 106 Ill. App. 251.

Admissibility of docket entries or memoranda see supra, XIV, A, 4, d.

Testimony not a part of record.— Mestier v. New Orleans, etc., R. Co., 16 La. Ann. 354; Florance v. Bachemin, 3 La. Ann. 174.

Depositions in probate proceedings.— It has been held that depositions taken in a proceeding in the probate court against an executor for the payment of legacies are not necessarily a part of the record, except on appeal to the high court of errors and appeals, and hence they are not admissible in an action in the circuit court to charge a surety on the executor's bond. Lipscomb v. Postell, 38 Miss. 476, 77 Am. Dec. 651.

Unauthenticated opinion of court inadmissible.— Wixson v. Devine, 67 Cal. 341, 7 Pac. 776.

take judicial notice of its own records.[78] It is necessary, however, before any original record can be received in evidence in another court that the court be satisfied by legal and competent evidence that the alleged record is what it purports to be.[79] This may be shown either by producing in court the keeper of the records,[80] or his deputy,[81] and ascertaining from him on oath that it is a record of his office, or, it is said, by his certificate to the same effect under the seal of court.[82] And it has been held that an original record may be proved to be such by any person who can identify it.[83]

(II) Justices' Records. The docket of a justice is evidence per se where it is offered in a cause before the same justice;[84] and the original records of justices of the peace and other inferior tribunals are admissible in other courts if their authenticity is established;[85] but as a general rule there must be some proof of the identity and authenticity of the record other than the record itself.[86] The Executions.— It has been held that a paper purporting to be an execution is inadmissible in another action in the absence of a seal or filing mark of the proper officer, or other evidence showing that it had been in the hands of the sheriff or other officer and is a part of the record. Pryor v. Beck, 21 Ala. 393; Davis v. Ransom, 26 Ill. 100; Benjamin v. Shea, 83 Iowa 392, 49 N. W. 989. A paper purporting to be an affidavit made before a justice of the peace in another county is not admissible in evidence without proof of its authenticity. Hagaman v. Stafford, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 351.

Proof of handwriting of justice.—The judgment of a justice of the peace, it has been held, is not such a record that it may be given in evidence without proof of his handwriting. Official receipt given by justice to constable. — In an action against a justice of the peace to recover money received by him from a constable, and not paid over to the party entitled record may be authenticated by the oath of the justice himself,[87] or, it has been held, by the oath of any competent witness who can identify the record.[88] On the other hand it has been held that where the records of a justice are offered in proof of the facts which they purport to state, they must, if originals, be brought into court by the official custodian of them, who can testify as to their character; but that when offered in evidence merely to show that they exist, they may be admitted on any satisfactory evidence of their identity.[89]

5. Official Registers and Documents — a. In General. A record or document kept or prepared by a person whose public duty it is to record truly the facts stated therein is, when relevant, admissible as prima facie evidence of these facts, even in a controversy between third persons, and this whether or not there exists a statute authorizing such record to be used in evidence or expressly requiring a record to be kept,[90] and notwithstanding the document consists of statements thereto, the receipt given by the justice to the constable, and signed by the justice with his official title, has been held to be competent evidence to charge the justice, without further proof of its execution. Neal v. Keller, 19 Kan. 111.

In an action for malicious prosecution, where the record in the docket of a city justice was offered in evidence, and the acting city justice testified that he found the docket at the office of such city justice, that it was one of the records of the office, that a certain person, by whom the entries therein purported to have been made, was city justice, that he knew his handwriting, and that certain entries were in his handwriting, it was held that the entries were sufficiently identified and authenticated. Cole v. Curtis, 16 Minn. 182. So in Dennison v. Otis, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 9, it was held that the docket of a justice, obtained from his office during his absence from the county, and proved to be in his handwriting, is admissible, although no subpœna has been issued to procure his attendance. And in Pomeroy v. Golly, Ga. Dec. 26, it was held that an original affidavit and warrant is admissible in evidence, on proof of the magistrate's handwriting, although he is present in court and is not sworn.

made extrajudicially by a person not under oath and not subject to cross-examination.[91] It is sufficient if the record is kept in the discharge of a public duty and is a convenient and appropriate mode of discharging that duty.[92] Thus a record has been held admissible if it was kept by the direction of superior officers and in accordance with the rules and practices of the office.[93] Nor need a public record be kept by a public officer himself, if the entries are made under his direction by a person authorized by him.[94] But a record will not be admissible on this principle unless it is made by or under the direction of an officer[95] authorized either by express statute or the nature of his duties to make it.[96] So it seems that the rec-

Map made by ex-official.—In Gray v. Waterman, 40 Ill. 522, it was held that the county authorities and road commissioners were only authorized to employ the county surveyor to resurvey a public road, and hence neither the original nor a copy of a survey made by one who had ceased to be a county surveyor was admissible in evidence.

Indorsement of deputy surveyor after expiration of his office not admitted.— Vincent v. Huff, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 298.

Private letters and memoranda.—This principle has been applied to private letters (State v. Pagels, 92 Mo. 300, 4 S. W. 931; Mason v. U. S., 4 Ct. Cl. 495), and to mere private memoranda (State v. Vick, 25 N. C. 488; Doe v. Bray, 8 B. & C. 813, 7 L. J. K. B. O. S. 161, 3 M. & R. 428, 15 E. C. L. 399. See also Hand v. Grant, 5 Sm. & M. But an entry in a registry of baptisms and births, the object of which was to register the baptism and not the birth, the time of birth being introduced merely by way of description, has been held not to be evidence of the time of birth. Clark v. Trinity Church, 5 Watts & S. (Pa.) 266. So a burial register has been held inadmissible to show parentage and time and place of birth. Sitler v. Gehr, 105 Pa. St. 577, 51 Am. Rep. 207. In those jurisdictions, however, where no record of baptisms is required to be kept by law, a church book containing such record has been held not to be admissible in evidence as a public record. Contra.— In some jurisdictions, however, it has been held that statutes requiring records of births, marriages, and deaths, including the causes of death, to be kept by city boards of health are mere police regulations, and the records being required for special and local purposes, viz., to assist the board of health in the conduct of the affairs of that office, are not public records in such a sense as make them evidence between private parties of the facts recorded (Sovereign Camp W. of W. v. Grandon, 64 Nebr. 39, 89 N. Under Vt. Acts (1902), p. 49, providing that no public record of births or deaths, or any certified copy thereof, shall be competent evidence, except of the fact of birth and death, a certified copy of a death certificate is inadmissible to show that deceased died of pneumonia, as stated therein. c. Land-Office Records and Proceedings. Public land-office records are intended for the preservation of the evidence of the transactions of the land department and are admissible to prove the facts recited therein.[24] A full treatment of the admissibility and effect of these records, together with patents, surveys and maps, certificates and receipts, and other documentary evidence relating to public lands, will be found elsewhere in this work.[25]

d. Official Certificates. Certificates made by a public officer intrusted with authority for that purpose have been treated as public documents and as such they are competent evidence as against all persons of the facts which he is empowered to certify.[26] But to render the certificate admissible, the official character of the person claiming to act as such[27] and his authority to make the certificate by order of court or otherwise[28] must be established. So, although an officer is authorized to make a certificate, it is evidence only so far as the matter duly authenticated copy thereof must be produced.[48] But it is no objection that extracts only are read from a public record offered in evidence, where the entire record is produced and open to the use of the objecting party.[49] So where public records are contained in a record book, copies of so much of the records as relates to the subject-matter in litigation or as constitutes a distinct and independent record are admissible.[50] Where a record offered in evidence is interlined, erased, or mutilated, the interlineations or erasures should as a general rule be fully and satisfactorily explained,[51] especially where it is sought by the record in such condition to contradict a certified copy which appears to have been formally and regularly transcribed;[52] but where a public document, prepared by a sworn officer, is produced by him to whose custody the law intrusts it, the party offering it in evidence is not required to explain an alteration appearing to have been made at the same time and by the same hand as the obliterated letters and figures, there being no room for presumption that the document had been fraudulently altered.[53]

b. Judicial Records — (i) In General. As a general rule where judicial proceedings are offered in evidence the whole record or a duly authenticated copy thereof must be produced or accounted for, so that the court may determine the legal effect of the whole of it, which may be quite different from that of a part.[54] This general rule is not, however, universally applied, but it has been produced to show a valid judgment after service of process or the appearance of the parties.[62] Thus in an action on an injunction bond, the decree or other extracts from the record of the injunction cause are admissible to show either pendency or decision of the cause.[63] So it has been held that the entire record need not be produced where the object is to show a judgment to support an execution in favor of the purchaser at the execution sale,[64] or to show a decree which ex proprio vigore vests title to property,[65] or which directs a deed to be made, if sufficiently describing the land.[66] So where it is only necessary for a party to show that he has been made liable to pay a sum of money in the character of executor or administrator by a judgment or decree, the record of such judgment or decree or a duly authenticated copy thereof is sufficient.[67] The rule has been applied in an action brought on a judgment of another court.[68] To render the judgment or decree of a court of inferior or limited jurisdiction admissible, the record must be sufficiently complete to show that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties.[69]

Contra.— In some jurisdictions it is held that to prove a judgment on which an execution sale is based the entire record must be produced so that it may be seen whether the court had jurisdiction to determine the cause. verdict has been set aside or the judgment arrested,[70] yet the mere record of a verdict has been held admissible as evidence of the existence of a suit and the fact that a verdict was obtained, apart from any question of the facts adjudicated.[71]

(iv) Executions. As a general rule an execution is inadmissible in evidence unless it is accompanied by the judgment upon which it is founded.[72] But it has been held that where an officer sues a stranger for taking goods from his possession which he had seized by virtue of an execution, the production of the execution without the judgment is sufficient to support his right of action.[73] So it has been held that in an action against an officer by a person against whom an execution has been levied, the officer may justify his act done in obedience to the writ of execution by producing the writ without the judgment.[74] At common law, however, if a third person and not defendant in the execution brings trespass against the officer, the latter can defend only upon producing the judgment and the writ.[75]

(v) Effect of Recitals in Judgment or Decree. The absence of an entire record, it has been held, may be supplied by recitals in the judgment or decree of all the essential facts, jurisdictional or otherwise.[76] Thus where the judgment or decree on which the party adducing it in a collateral action relies as a muniment of title or as a link in a chain of title recites all essential facts, jurisdictional or otherwise, in regard to the proceedings in which it was rendered, the record of such judgment or decree, or a duly authenticated copy thereof, is admissible as prima facie evidence at least, without producing a complete record or transcript of the proceedings.[77] Recitals in the decree of a court of inferior or limited jurisdiction of the facts necessary to give jurisdiction are evidence of these facts, subject, however, to contradiction.[78]

(vi) Inclusion of Superfluous Matter in Record. The fact that a transcript contains matter irregularly there will not vitiate it so as to require its entire exclusion;[79] but where there are papers in a document sought to be introduced which are not legally authenticated as copies of any record of any court, and which are consequently incompetent, and these papers are offered with others in the document to which the objection might not apply in such a manner that they must all go to the jury together, without anything to indicate which are and which are not proper for consideration, the whole document is properly excluded.[80]

B. Authenticated Transcripts or Copies — 1. Public Records and Documents Generally — a. General Statement. It is a general principle that whenever documents or books of a public nature would of themselves be evidence if produced, their contents may be proved by copies duly verified on the ground that such records and documents cannot be removed from their place of custody without inconvenience to the public service.[81]

b. Sworn or Examined Copies. Thus it is a common-law rule that proof of public records or documents may be made by examined copies sworn to by the custodian of the record or any competent witness,[82] especially where the officer is not allowed to produce the original or to furnish copies.[83] Such evidence is not excluded by a statute making certified copies admissible.[84] An examined copy, however, can be proved only by proof of comparison with the original, and not by proof of comparison with some other copy.[85]

c. Certified Copies. The rule has been laid down in some of the decisions that a paper purporting to be a copy of a public document, certified by the officer in whose custody it is intrusted by law, is not receivable in evidence unless such certification is enjoined or permitted by statute;[86] but the rule sanctioned in most jurisdictions is that a certified copy given by a public officer whose duty it is to

2 JUDICIAL RECORDS — a. In General. The admission of copies of judicial records in evidence, as in the case of copies of other public records, is founded upon a principle of public convenience in order that documents of great moment may not be ambulatory and subject to the loss that might be incurred if they were removable.[93]

b. Exemplified Copies. Judicial records are provable by exemplified copies. An exemplified copy at common law was obtained by removing the record into the court of chancery by certiorari. The great seal was attached to a copy, which was transmitted by a mittimus to the court in which it was used as evidence.[94] In this country, it has been said, the great seal being usually if not always kept by the secretary of state, a different course prevails; and an exemplified copy under the seal of the court is usually admitted, even upon a plea of nul tiel record, as sufficient evidence,[95] and a writ of certiorari or mittimus is unnecessary to authorize or compel the production of the copy.[96]

c. Office Copies. In addition to copies exemplified by the great seal, or seal of a court, there were at common law certified copies made by the officer having custody of the judicial records, and known as office copies.[97] The rule has been stated that at common law an office copy is in the same court and in the same cause equivalent to the record, but in another court or in another cause in the same court the copy must be proved.[98] But the rule in most jurisdictions in this country, founded either on immemorial usage or on statutes expressly making certified or office copies of judicial records admissible in evidence, or requiring the custodian of such records to furnish copies, is that certified or office copies of judicial records duly certified by the clerk or custodian of the record, if they are otherwise competent, are admissible in evidence in any cause or court in the same jurisdiction where the records themselves would be admissible,[99] the seal of the court affixed to the copy being required in some jurisdictions but not in others.[1]

d. Examined or Sworn Copy. The third kind of authenticated copy is an examined or sworn copy, which is proved by producing a witness who has compared the copy with the original record, word for word, or who has examined the copy while another person read the original, and this, although the witness had not examined the original while another person read the copy.[2] Such copy is admissible without proof that the original cannot be produced.[3] But in order that copies may be admissible as examined copies some legal evidence of examination and comparison must be produced,[4] and an examined copy is inadmissible unless it appears that the original was in the proper place of deposit or in the hands of the officer in whose custody the records are kept.[5]

e. Courts of Probate. The rule making a duly authenticated copy of a judicial record admissible in evidence is very generally held to apply to records of probate, surrogates', and orphans' courts.[6] Under this rule exemplifications or certified copies of letters testamentary are admissible.[7] At common law the probate of a will before an ecclesiastical court or an exemplification thereof was not

7. Sometimes the practice is to make out and deliver letters of administration to the personal representative as original papers, and these, although required to be recorded by the registers of probate, are admissible as originals. See Greene v. Durfee, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 362. But letters of administration are generally regarded as being in the nature of exemplifications of the record and are admissible as such without showing the decree of the probate court making the appointment, or certified copies of the record may be admitted instead of the original letters. f. Justices' Records. In some jurisdictions sworn copies of the entries in a justice's docket have been held admissible as primary evidence,[12] and under various statutory provisions transcripts from justices' records certified by the justice himself or the proper custodian of the record have been held admissible.[13] The rule has been stated in some of the cases, however, that a justice's record can only

g. Executions and Returns. A writ of execution, when returned to the court from which it issued, becomes a record of the court, and a duly certified[15] or sworn[16] copy thereof may be used in evidence in the same way as copies of other parts of the record.

h. Stenographers' Notes and Records. In the absence of statutory provision for the certification of judicial proceedings by a court stenographer, his transcript of the testimony of a witness, although duly certified by him, is inadmissible as documentary evidence.[17] Stenographic notes are not public records within the meaning of a statute providing for the admission in evidence of copies of public records when properly certified.[18]

i. Copy of a Copy. As a general rule a certified copy of an official copy or other transcript of a record is not admissible in evidence.[19] But a copy of an officially certified copy of a judgment has been held admissible as secondary evidence, where the original records of the court had all been destroyed and where there was no evidence of the existence of the certified copy.[20]

Certified copy of transcript which has become a record.— A transcript filed in the court to which a cause has been removed by change of venue becomes a record of that court, and a duly certified transcript thereof is competent as evidence. State v. Rayburn, 31 Mo. App. 385. So a transcript of the record of the supreme court sent to the circuit court, containing an account of the proceedings of the supreme court in a cause sent from such circuit court to the supreme court, is, when filed in the supreme court, a record of that court; and a transcript of such transcript, made out and certified by the clerk, is evidence of the facts therein contained. 4. Records of Private Writings — a. Certified Copies — (1) In General. Where the recording of a private writing is authorized by statute, a certified copy of the record is admissible to show the fact that the instrument is of record,[22] and this, although the instrument has not been so executed or acknowledged as to make a certified copy evidence of its contents.[23] So, since it is the duty of a recorder by reason of the nature of his office and without special statutory direction to note when a record is made, a certified copy of such memorandum is competent evidence to prove the date of registration of a deed.[24] In some jurisdictions certified copies of deeds and other writings affecting lands are held admissible under statute,[25] or apart from statute,[26] as primary evidence of the execution and contents of the original. And the same rule has been applied under statute in many jurisdictions to records of other private writings,[27] such as chattel mortgages[28] and bills of sale.[29] But the rule in most jurisdictions, founded either on the common law or statutory provision, is that a certified copy of a recorded deed or other private writing[30] is in general inadmissible, unless the proper foundation is laid for its admission as secondary evidence by accounting for the non-production of the original.[31] Where, however, the record of a private writing is author-

In Texas a certified copy of deed, being evidence only by virtue of the statute, cannot be admitted before substantial compliance with provisions of the statute that it shall be filed among the papers of the suit in which it is to be used three days before the trial, and notice thereof given to the opposite party, and affidavit filed that the original has been lost or cannot be procured. Firebaugh v. Ward, 51 Tex. 409; Ury v. Houston, 36 Tex. 260; Gamage v. Trawick, 19 Tex. 58; Henry v. Bounds, (Civ. App. 1898) 46 S. W.

ized, the authorities are generally agreed that a certified copy is admissible as secondary evidence of the execution and contents of the writing upon proof that the original is lost or destroyed,[32] or is outside of the jurisdiction of the court,[33] or where the person in possession refuses to surrender the same.[34] So in a number of jurisdictions the broad rule is laid down either under statute or on common-law principles that a deed or other writing affecting realty may be proved by a certified copy of the record, upon showing generally that the original is not within the custody or control of the person wishing to use the same.[35] In some of the New England states the rule is laid down apart from statute that a party to an action

W. 688; Valentine v. Sweatt, (Civ. App. 1903) 78 S. W. 385, holding that the rule applies to all cases in which it is sought to use a certified copy of a recorded instrument in evidence. So under statute it is the duty of a party offering a certified copy of a deed and making affidavit that the deed is lost to show by some of the known rules of the common law the execution of the deed, where the opposite party files an affidavit claiming that the deed is a forgery. Thompson v. Johnson, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 246, 58 S. W. 1030; Younge v. Guilbeau, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 636, 18 L. ed. 262. Under statute, in trespass to try title, plaintiff may show common source of title by certified copies of deeds, without accounting for the absence of the originals. Ogden v. Bosse, 86 Tex. 336, 24 S. W. 798; Greenwood v. Fontaine, (Civ. App. 1896) 34 S. W. 826; Folts v. Ferguson, (Civ. App. 1894) 24 S. W. 657. So by statute copies of conveyances which were filed in the office of any alcalde or judge in Texas previous to the first Monday in February, 1837, are, if certified under the hand and official seal of the officer with whom the originals are deposited, admissible in evidence and have the same force and effect as the originals thereof. Van Sickle v. Catlett, 75 Tex. 404, 13 S. W. 31. See also Cowan v. Williams, 49 Tex. 380. So it has been held that copies of notarial acts, which under the civil law were regarded in contemplation of law as originals, and were the only evidence of title which the party interested was entitled to retain in his possession, are admissible, without production of the originals, for all purposes which could be effected by the originals themselves. Smith v. Townsend, Dall. 569. In Morrison v. Bean, 22 Tex. 554, it was held that the certified copy of a note or mortgage on file in another case in the same court is not admissible, as the court will permit the original to be taken from the files, or the clerk may be compelled to attend with it.

See 20 Cent. Dig. tit. "Evidence," §§ 1317, 1318.

Under a Nebraska statute, providing that the record of a deed duly recorded, or a transcript thereof duly certified, may be read in evidence with like force and effect as the original deed, whenever, by the party's oath or otherwise, the original is known to be lost or not to belong to the party seeking to use it, or to be within his control, a defendant in ejectment who seeks to prove title in a stranger as a defense, it sufficiently appear-after proof of the original deed to himself, or of his title by devise or descent, or by extent or otherwise, may use office copies of deeds to which he is not a party, but which constitute part of his chain of title as prima facie evidence without accounting for the non-production of the original, and that if the copy produced purports to be of a deed regularly executed, acknowledged, and recorded, the copy will be regarded as prima facie evidence of these facts as well as of the contents of the deeds.[36] In some of these jurisdictions moreover the courts have still further departed from the common law in regard to the admission of secondary evidence and have held generally that where a conveyance of real estate which is required to be recorded is made to a stranger to the suit, it is competent to prove the execution and contents of such original by a certified copy without laying a foundation for such proof by accounting for the non-production of the original.[37] But where the person offering the evidence is a party to the deed and may be presumed to have it in his possession, he cannot use an office copy until the loss of the original is shown.[38] Nor does the rule admitting office copies of recorded instruments in evidence apply to deeds which are pre-ing that the original deed does not belong to him, may introduce a copy of the record in the first instance, without proof of the loss of the original, or that it is not under his control. Buck v. Gage, 27 Nebr. 306, 43 N. W. 110.

In New Hampshire office copies have been held inadmissible when offered to show title in a third person under whom neither party to the action claims. Wells v. Jackson Iron Mfg. Co., 48 N. In Maine it is provided that in actions in which the title to real estate is material to the issue, and when original deeds would be admissible, attested copies of such deeds from the registry may be used as evidence without proof of their execution, when the party offering such copy is not a grantee in the deed nor claims as heir, nor justifies as servant of the grantee or his heirs. See also Elwell v. Cunningham, 74 Me. 127. Prior to the statutory provision this doctrine obtained under a rule of the supreme court. Hutchinson v. Chadbourne, 35 Me. 189; White v. Dwinel, 33 Me. 320; Baring v. Harmon, 13 Me. 361; Woodman v. Coolbroth, 7 Me. 181. Under this rule, in order to introduce an office copy instead of the original deed under which a party claims as heir, it is incumbent on him, besides showing that he has exhausted his apparent means of producing the original, to prove the execution and genuineness of the deed which he claims is lost. Egan v. Horrigan, 96 Me. 46, 51 Atl. 246; Elwell v. Cunningham, 74 Me. 127; White v. Dwinel, 33 Me. 320. See also Hewes v. Wiswell, 8 Me. 94. So office copies can be admitted only in actions touching realty and in all other actions the general principle prevailed that a party offering to prove act by a deed must produce it and prove its execution. sumed to be in the possession or control of the opposite party without notice to him to produce the original.[39]

(II) Unauthorized or Defective Records—(A) In General. To render a certified copy of the record of an instrument admissible in evidence, the registry of the original must have been authorized.[40] Thus where a deed has never been registered and the registration of a copy is unauthorized a certified copy of a registered copy is not admissible.[41]

(B) Writing Defectively Executed or Acknowledged. A certified copy of the record of a deed or other private writing is not admissible to show the execution and contents of the original, where the writing was not executed, proved, or acknowledged in the manner required by law to entitle it to be admitted to record,[42] unless such copies are by statute made admissible notwithstanding

Certified copy failing to show grantor's seal. — The rule has been laid down that, although a certified copy of a deed offered in evidence shows no seal or scrawl opposite the grantor's signature, yet if in the attestation clause the deed purports to be signed and sealed by the grantor, a presumption arises that the original deed was duly sealed as the law requires. Deed insufficiently acknowledged as to one of two parties.— In Addis v. Graham, 88 Mo. 197, it was held that the insufficiency of a wife's relinquishment of dower in her acknowledgment of a deed relied on in an ejectment suit in which the question of dower is not involved will not render a certified copy of the record inadmissible. And in Hall v. Redson, 10 Mich. 21, it was held that when a deed from several grantors is recorded as to only a part of whom it is properly executed and witnessed, a transcript of the record can only be evidence of the deed as to those parties by whom it has been properly executed and the execution of it has been duly witnessed so as to entitle it to the record had they been the only grantors named, and hence the transcript of a record of a deed from husband and wife which is executed by them separately and at different times, the deed containing one subscribing witness to the execution of the husband but duly witnessed and acknowledged as to the execution of the wife, is no evidence of the execution of the deed by the husband.

Where record is legal without probate.— Where under a statute a deed can be legally recorded without probate, a copy from the register's office of a deed recorded is admissible in evidence, although the probate does not appear from the registry, or upon the copy. Lamar v. Raysor, 1 Rich. (S. C.) 509.

sumption of legal proof and acknowledgment arises from the fact that the instrument had been of record for a prescribed period.[44]

(c) Recording at Improper Place. Where there is no law requiring or permitting the registry of a deed or other private writing in the place where the instrument in question was recorded, a certified copy of such record will be inadmissible to show the execution and contents of the instrument.[45] Thus it is very generally held that to make a certified copy of a deed or other instrument relating to land admissible in evidence, it must appear that the deed was duly recorded in the county or registry district in which the land conveyed was situated at the time of registration.[46] But it has been held that an office copy of a deed conveying lands in two counties and recorded in one only is evidence as to the lands in the county in which the deed is not recorded on the ground that, as the instrument is legally recorded in one county, its entire contents become legal evidence.[47]

(d) Records Not Made Within Prescribed Time. If a deed is not recorded within the time prescribed by law, a certified copy of the record will be inadmissible.[48]

(e) Rebutting Evidence. An office copy of a private writing is liable to be rebutted by any evidence which would have been admissible to disprove the execution of the original instrument if it had been produced.[49]

primary evidence. So it has been held that a copy of a written contract, although not properly certified, is admissible upon the testimony of the person who made it that it is correct, where the objection that the original should be produced is overcome or waived.[52] An examined copy can be proved only by proof of comparison with the original, and not by proof of comparison with some other copy, and hence a copy verified by examination with a certified copy of the record of a deed is not admissible.[53]

5. Requisites of Certification or Exemplification — a. Public Records Generally — (I) General Statement. A copy of a public record not exemplified by the certificate of the proper officer or otherwise authenticated is inadmissible in evidence.[54]

(II) Authority of Officer to Certify. Where certified copies of public records are offered, it should appear that the officer by whom they purport to be certified had the right to the custody of the records, and was the person who had authority to furnish authenticated copies.[55]

(III) Certificate of Fact or Conclusion From Record. To prove a fact of record without the production of the record itself, a duly authenticated copy of the record or so much thereof as relates to the fact in question is required. A certificate by a public officer having the lawful custody of public records as to any fact appearing on the records of his office or as to any conclusion he may draw from an inspection of the records is not competent evidence,[56] unless made sale for a slave, executed and recorded in Kentucky, upon the testimony of the subscribing witness to such bill of sale, who stated simply that he believed the copy to be substantially the same as the original, but that he had not seen the original for many years, and when it did not appear that he had ever compared the copy with the original, nor pretended to say that it was an exact or sworn copy.

so by statute.[57] A fortiori the authority to make certified copies will not authorize a certification as to facts not appearing of record[58] or improperly inserted therein,[59] or as to the purport of papers that are missing from the record.[60] So, in the absence of a statute, a negative certificate by an officer will not be evidence of the non-appearance of a fact on the records or of the absence of any entry, paper, or document from the records of his office,[61] it being said that such negative proof requires oral testimony under oath of a search made and of its results;[62] but the mere fact that a certificate contains matter of a negative character will not exclude it as evidence of its contents of a positive character.[63] The negative certificate of a recorder that a deed cannot be found has been received in evidence as part of the proof made to let in secondary evidence of the contents.[64]

(iv) Form and Mode of Authentication—(a) In General. Copies of public records or documents purporting to be exemplifications or certified copies will be inadmissible in evidence unless they are authenticated in the proper form and manner.[65] Thus it is generally required either under or apart from statute that it shall appear from the certificate that the paper is a true and complete copy of the original.[66] In the absence of statutory requirement, however, it is not necessary that a copy should be expressly certified as a "true copy," but the word "copy" attested by the proper officer is sufficient, since a copy authenticated by one authorized to do so will be taken as a true copy.[67] So certification of the fact of comparison of the copy with the original is sometimes required by statute.[68] In some cases it has been held that substantial compliance with the form of certification or authentication prescribed by statute is all that is required;[69] but in other decisions it is held that where copies are made evidence by statute the mode of authentication prescribed must be strictly pursued,[70] at least if the making of such copies evidence is in derogation of the common law.[71]

(b) Necessity of Seal. Where by statute a seal is expressly required for certified copies of public records,[72] or a seal of office is established by law for the authentication of documents from a particular public office,[73] an unsealed certificate is inadmissible.

"True copy of deed."— In Preston v. Robinson, 24 Vt. 583, it was held that a certificate that a copy is a "true copy of a deed" will be sufficient as intended to certify that it was a true copy from the record, where it was the officer's duty to certify a copy of the record and it clearly appeared from the copy that such record existed in his office. To the same effect see Vickery v. Benson, 26 Ga. 582.

(c) Necessity of Official Signature and Recital of Official Character. It has been held that the recital in a certificate to a copy of a document as to the official character of the officer as the legal custodian of it is prima facie proof of that fact.[74] But an alleged certified copy of a private instrument not signed by a public officer has been held to be inadmissible, although in the body of the certificate it purports to be made by an officer.[75]

b. Judicial Records — (i) In General. A copy of a judicial record that is not authenticated by the certificate of the proper officer or otherwise is inadmissible.[77]

(ii) Authority to Make Certificate. As a general rule the officer who is authorized to make and is bound to keep a judicial record is the only person authorized to give certified copies thereof.[78] Generally the clerk of the court is competent to certify copies;[79] and it is not necessary that the copy should be further authenticated by the signature of the judge before whom the judicial proceedings took place.[80] A copy attested and signed by a deputy clerk is admissible,[81] at least where it is indicated either in the certificate or by initials attached to the Bowersock v. Adams, 55 Kan. 681, 41 Pac. 971; Boardman v. Paige, 11 N. H. 431. Thus an exemplified copy of an award has been held inadmissible as primary evidence where there was no law directing the officer of the court to record the instrument. James v. Gordon, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,181, 1 Wash. 333. So in League v. Henecke, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 729, it was held that a certified copy of proceedings in the probate court, offered in evidence, as a decree in partition, and excluded as such, is not admissible to show an agreed partition, since such a matter is one coram non judice, which the clerk could not authenticate by his seal.

signature that the person signing is a deputy clerk.[82] Where one court becomes the successor of another and receives from the other all its records, copies of such records certified by the clerk of the former are entitled to be received in evidence the same as if they were copies of its own records.[83] But a copy certified merely by the judge[84] or by the clerk of another court[85] is generally inadmissible.

(III) Form of Attestation or Certification — (A) In General. It is the usual practice for clerks of court in certifying judicial records to append to the copy immediately before the official signature a clause or phrase attesting the correctness of the copy, and such attestation is required by statute in some jurisdictions.[86] Apart from statutory provision to the contrary, an attestation in these words, "A true copy. Attest," or similar language, is sufficient.[87] Indeed if there is no statute prescribing a particular form of attestation, a copy authenticated by a duly authorized officer need not be attested as a true copy; but an attestation in the words, "A copy, Attest," is sufficient, since a copy must be taken to be a true copy;[88] and a certificate that the copy is full and complete is not required if the record appears on the face of the copy to be complete.[89] Where by statute the clerk or other officer is required to make certification as to the completeness of the copy, the certificate need not as a general rule be formal or technical; it is sufficient if upon a reasonable construction it affirms that the transcript contains a full, true, and correct copy of all the proceedings.[90]

(B) Seal of Court. Where the copy is authenticated by the proper officer under the seal of the court, no further authentication is in general needed for its introduction in another court in the same state, since the seal of a court of record proves itself within the state.[91] At common law or under statute in some of the

Certificates failing to show copy to be transcript of original record.— In Drumm v. Cessnum, 58 Kan. 331, 49 Pac. 78, it was held that a certificate stating "the foregoing to be a full, true and correct copy of the transcript of the recognizance," etc., is defective in that it fails to show that the copy is a transcript of the original papers. On the other hand under a Texas statute requiring all judgments of the district court to be entered of record, it has been held that transcripts certified to be copies of "original orders" were defective in that they were not certified to be copies of orders as entered upon the minutes of the court. states copies of judicial records must be certified under the seal of the court if there be one;[92] but the rule in many jurisdictions, based either on statutory provisions or on common-law principles and immemorial usage, is that a copy of a record of a court certified to be used as evidence in another court in the state need not be exemplified under the seal of the court, but it is sufficient if the copy is attested by the clerk or other proper officer.[93]

(c) Recital of Official Character of Certifying Officer. It has been held not to be necessary that in addition to his signature the clerk should state his official character, it being sufficient if the date or other facts stated in the body of the certificate show that the copy was made during the official term of the officer or was otherwise made in an official capacity.[94] So it has been held sufficient if the clerk indicates his official capacity by initials merely.[95]

(d) Certification of Record Composed of Detached Papers. The mere fact that papers composing a record are certified separately has been held insufficient to require their rejection, if the papers taken together make a complete record.[96] Where, however, only one certificate is made and the record is composed of several distinct papers, they should be attached, that the court may be enabled to see that the clerk's certificate applies to all of them, and may import verity thereto.[97]

what court the record belongs[98] or otherwise fails to identify the papers or record intended to be authenticated[99] it will be inadmissible.

(F) Verification by Oath. Duly certified exemplifications or copies of the proceedings of one court within a state will be admissible in the other courts of the same state without being sworn to.[1] So a paper certified by a United States circuit court commissioner, with his seal and signature, as a true copy of the original record in a proceeding within his jurisdiction is admissible without oath in a court of the state in which the federal court sits.[2]

(IV) Certificate of Fact or Conclusion From Record. In the absence of a statute authorizing the admission of such evidence,[3] the certificate of a clerk, judge, or other officer of a court as to the existence, purport, and effect of a recorded judgment or other legal proceeding is inadmissible, the record itself or a duly authenticated copy being required.[4] has by a manifest clerical error been improperly transcribed, and the true date is obviously inferable from other parts of the record, the error may be disregarded and the copy received in evidence.[6]

(B) Omission to Copy Seal. The omission to copy the seal to an original execution has been held not to render the transcript thereof inadmissible in evidence,[7] especially if a seal to the original was not required by law.[8] So, where a clerk's attestation states that the seal of the court was affixed to an original judicial record and the transcript bears a scroll with the word "seal" inclosed, it is sufficient.[9]

(C) Omission of Judge's Signature to Record. The fact that a certified copy of a judicial proceeding omits the signature of the judge to the record will not render the copy inadmissible,[10] especially if the signature of the judge was not necessary to the validity of the original record.[11]

(VI) Justices' Records—(A) Who May Certify. It has been laid down as a rule founded on common-law principles that the person by whom a justice's record is certified must appear from the certificate or otherwise to have been the legal custodian of the record.[12] In many jurisdictions provision is made by statute for the certification of justices' records by the justice himself,[13] and provision is made in some jurisdictions for the certification of a copy of a judgment of a justice by another justice who as successor or otherwise may have the legal custody of the record,[14] provided it appears from the certificate[15] or other proof[16] that the person certifying had such legal custody. In some jurisdictions also provision is made by statute for the further authentication of the certified copy of the justice by the certification of the clerk of court of the county in which the justice resides or for the filing of the justice's transcript in the clerk's office and the issuance of certified copies by the clerk.[17] But apart from statute the certificate of a clerk as to the official character of the justice is not required.[18]

(B) Form of Certification. Under statute in some jurisdictions the justice is required to certify to the correctness or completeness of the copy,[19] but as a general rule no particular form of language is required,[20] and in the absence of express statutory provision, where the document purporting to be a copy comprises on its face all the essentials of a sufficient record, it is sufficient if it is certified by the justice to be "a true copy."[21]

(C) Necessity of Seal. In some jurisdictions under statute or on common-law principles it has been held that a transcript of the proceedings of a justice of the peace not authenticated under seal is not evidence.[22] On the other hand it has been held that, where a justice of the peace is his own clerk and has no seal, his official attestation placed upon a copy of a record made by himself is legally equivalent to the attestation placed upon a copy of a record of a judgment rendered by a superior court by the clerk thereof with its seal affixed and the certificate of the judge to the genuineness of the seal and of the clerk's signature.[23]

(II) Judicial Records. In some jurisdictions it is held that the judgments of the courts of the United States must be deemed to be embraced in the act of congress of 1790, providing for the mode of authentication of judicial proceedings of one state for admissibility in evidence in the courts of another state,[25] or to be classed as foreign judgments;[26] and that when offered as evidence in the state courts, authentication of the certificate of the clerk of court is necessary in each case. But the weight of authority is to the effect that the district and circuit courts of the United States are not foreign to the state courts and that the act of congress prescribing the mode of proving the judicial proceedings of one state in the courts of another has no application to the proceedings of the United States courts, and hence as a general rule a copy of the record of a federal district or circuit court will be admitted in evidence in the state courts if it is certified by the clerk under the seal of the court, and this, whether or not the state in whose courts the evidence is adduced belongs to the judicial district or circuit from which the exemplified copy is brought.[27] If, however, the copy is authenti-

Record of bankruptcy proceedings.— Under U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 4992, expressly providing that copies of records of bankruptcy proceedings duly certified under the seal of the court should in all cases be prima facie evidence of the fact therein stated, it was held that a transcript from the district court of the United States certified under the seal by the clerk was admissible in a state court. Under the Bankruptcy Act of July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 21, 30 U. S. St. at L. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3430], a certified copy of the bankruptcy record is admissible in evidence as original evidence. Fales, etc., Mach. Co. v. Browning, 68 S. C. 13, 46 S. E. 545. cated in the manner provided by the federal statutes, it will be admissible in evidence in the state and territorial courts.[28]

b. Proof Required in Federal Courts. It is not necessary that the record of a judgment or proceeding of a federal court should be authenticated in the mode prescribed by the act of congress for the records and judicial proceedings of the state courts to render the same admissible in other federal courts. Each circuit court and district court of the United States is presumed to know the seals of every other federal, circuit, and district court, and hence the record of a district or circuit court may be proved in any other circuit or district court by the certificate of the clerk under the seal of the court, without the certificate of the judge that the attestation is in due form.[29] But while the statute does not in terms include the record and judicial proceedings of the federal courts, it has been the practice from the date of its enactment to follow its requirements in authenticating the records of those courts, and such authentication is deemed sufficient.[30]

7. Public Documents and Records of Other States — a. Legislative Acts and Journals. A discussion of the mode of authenticating the legislative acts of another state under the federal statutes and the statutes of the various states will be found elsewhere in this work.[31]

b. Judicial Records — (i) In General. By the act of congress of 1790, the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state or territory or of any country subject to the jurisdiction of the United States shall be proved and admitted in any other court within the United States by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate that the said attestation is in due form. And the said records and judicial proceedings so authenticated shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which they are taken.[32] When the proceedings of a court of another state or territory are authenticated as provided by the act of congress, they must be received as evidence.[33] Where a court of a sister state has a presiding judge, a clerk, and a seal, it will be prima facie presumed to be a court of record,[34] and its records duly authenticated will be evidence not only of its acts but prima facie evidence of its jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties.[35]

(II) Requisites of Authentication—(A) Formalities Prescribed by Federal Statute—(1) In General. To be admissible under the federal statute, the form of authentication prescribed must be complied with,[36] substantially at least.[37]

(2) Attestation by Clerk—(a) Form of Attestation. The act of congress does not prescribe the form of certificate by which the clerk of a court in a sister state shall certify the record to make it evidence in another state or indeed that any certificate shall be made by that officer.[38] All that is required is that the attestation of the record shall be in conformity with the form used in the state whence it comes, and the exclusive and conclusive evidence of this fact is the certificate of the presiding judge of that court.[39] Thus the federal statute does not require that the clerk shall certify the transcript to be a full and complete copy of the whole proceedings. Any certificate by the clerk certified by the proper judicial officer will be sufficient, provided the transcript as certified does not disclose defects in the original record or incompleteness in the transcript as a copy.[40] Nor does the statute require that the clerk's certificate or attestation shall show that he has charge of the records of the court[41] or that the court is a court of record.[42]

(b) Authority to Make Attestation. The attestation is directed to be made by the clerk in person and cannot be made by a deputy or other person acting as a substitute for the clerk.[43] Nor will an attestation by a deputy be cured by a certificate of the judge stating that the attestation is made by the proper officer.[44] A statute of the state from which the record comes enabling deputies to perform the duties of the principal will not change the rule, since this would enable the several states to alter and control an act of congress.[45] An attestation by a judge will not as a general rule be sufficient.[46] The fact, however, that the judge is also ex-officio clerk does not render a judicial proceeding incapable of exemplification under the statute,[47] especially if his attestation and certificate are supported by a certificate of the governor as to his official capacity.[48] When these offices are combined in one person, however, he must certify in each capacity.[49] But it has been held to be a matter of form rather than of substance whether the certification shall be by two separate certificates or comprised in one.[50]

(c) Seal of Court. The seal of the court, if there be one, must be annexed to the clerk's attestation of the copy of the record;[51] it is not sufficient that it be annexed to the certificate of the judge authenticating the attestation of the Certification under "seal of office" sufficient.— In Clark v. Depew, 25 Pa. St. 509, 64 Am. Dec. 717, it was held that where the clerk of a court in another state certifies that he is the clerk, and that the seal attached is the seal of his office as such clerk, it sufficiently appears that the certificate is under the seal of the court. To the same effect see McLain v. Winchester, 17 Mo. 49.

clerk.[52] Whenever the court whose record is certified has no seal, this fact should appear either in the certificate of the clerk or in that of the judge.[53] Where, however, the want of a seal appears from the attestation clause and the judge certifies that the attestation is in due form of law, the absence of a seal or the use of a private seal is without objection.[54]

(3) Certificate as to Form of Attestation — (a) In General. The federal statute requires also that the copy of a judicial record of another state shall be accompanied by a certificate that the attestation of the clerk is in due form and the attestation of the clerk is not alone sufficient.[55] Such certification is sufficient, however, without setting out the form of the attestation.[56] The judge is not required or even authorized to state that the person who makes attestation of the record is the clerk of the court or that the seal attached by him is the seal of the court,[57] or that he was the clerk at the time of attestation.[58]

(b) Authority to Certify. The certificate cannot be made by any judge of any court, but it must as a general rule appear from the certificate that it was made by the judge, if there be one, or if there be more, by the chief justice or presiding magistrate of the court whence the record comes.[59] It is not necessary, however, that the certificate shall use the precise language of the act of congress, provided that when different language is adopted it is not equivocal or capable of bearing a different meaning from the language used in the act,[60] and he must

60. Geron v. Felder, 15 Ala. 304. A judgment of the circuit court of Garland county, Ark., is sufficiently certified by a judge who recites that he is "judge of the seventh judicial circuit in the state of Arkansas, of which circuit the county of Garland constitutes a part." Williams v. Williams, 53 Mo. App. 617. To same effect see Geron v. Felder, possess that character at the time he gives the certificate.[61] Where the fact that a judge is the presiding or sole judge of the court appears from the record, the failure of the certificate to recite the fact is immaterial.[62] Moreover when there is nothing on the face of the record to show that the court is composed of more than one judge, it is generally held immaterial that the judge's certificate does not recite that he is the sole judge.[63] If it appears from the certificate itself or the record that there are other judges of the same court, the judge's certificate must show that he is the chief justice or presiding magistrate,[64] although in several cases, where there appeared to be more than one judge and no provision was made by law for a chief justice (all of the judges being placed on an equality as to authority), the federal statute was liberally construed and it was held that a certificate by one of the judges[65] or by all of them[66] was a sufficient compliance with the statute. When the judges are commissioned for the state at large and not for any particular portion of the state and where they preside in turn, it has been held to be a strict compliance with the act of congress for the judge who in his turn is presiding to make the certificate.[67]

(4) Records Transferred From One Court to Another. The federal statutes contemplate that the certificates should be from the judge and clerk of the same court in which a judgment was rendered, if such court exists, but if the court has been abolished and its records and jurisdiction have been transferred to Judicial notice of laws creating sole judges. — Where the certificate of a judge to the form of attestation of a clerk to a copy of the record of a state court did not show whether he was the sole judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate thereof, but it appeared from the laws of the state relating to the organization of such court that it consisted of a single judge, it was held that the authentication was sufficient under the act of congress of May 26, 1789 (1 U. S. St. at L. 122 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 677]) as the federal court would take judicial notice of the laws of the state organizing a court to uphold such certificate. Bennett v. Bennett, 3 Fed. another, the judge and clerk of the substituted court are the proper certifying officers,[68] and it has been held that the abolition of the old court and the transfer of jurisdiction to the new may be shown by the certificate of the judge[69] or of the clerk.[70]

(5) Superfluous Attestation or Certificate. The fact that the authentication embraces more than is strictly necessary under the federal statute, by including superfluous matter either in the attestation or certification, does not impair its validity if it is otherwise in compliance with the act.[71]

(B) Other Modes of Authentication. The general mode of authentication of judicial records prescribed by the act of congress is not exclusive and does not abrogate any other mode of authentication known to the common law or which the courts of a particular state may deem expedient according to established principles.[72] Accordingly an original record produced and sworn to[73] or an examined or sworn copy[74] is admissible. In many of the states provision is made by statute for the admission of judicial records of sister states. Neither the federal constitution nor the statute forbids the states from authorizing the proof of records in other modes in their own state courts, provided of course that the state statute waives or dispenses with some of the requirements of the federal statute or if put into force does not have the effect of excluding a record authenticated according to the requirements of the federal statute.[75]

(III) Subject-Matter of Authentication— (A) In General. The statute is not restricted to the case of judgment records, but includes everything properly embraced in the term "judicial proceedings."[76] Deeds or other instruments that have become judicial records are, when properly authenticated, admissible under the act.[77] If, however, a deed or other matter not prima facie of record is the subject of exemplification under the act of congress making provision for the authentication of judicial records, the law authorizing the deed or other matter to be filed as a judicial record must be shown.[78]

(B) Records of Courts of Chancery. A decree of a court of chancery is within the constitution and the act of congress respecting the mode of authentication and the effect of the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of the respective states when offered in evidence in the courts of any other state.[79]

(C) Records of Probate Courts. The proceedings of courts of probate are judicial proceedings within the meaning of the act of congress, and transcripts thereof, when properly authenticated, are admissible in evidence.[80] But compliance with the mode of authentication prescribed by the act of congress is essential,[81] unless the transcript is introduced as a copy certified in accordance with the statutes of the state in which it is to be adduced as evidence,[82] or as a sworn or examined copy,[83] or is authenticated in some other manner known to the common law.[84] The probate of a will in another state is a judicial proceeding within the meaning of the act of congress, and when properly authenticated under the act is admissible in the courts of the several states,[85] and this without the

Probate of will must appear from transcript.— It has been said that a certified copy of the probate of a will of another state cannot become evidence under the act of congress unless it appears from the transcript or exemplification that the will was admitted to probate. See Jemison v. Smith, 37 Ala.

formal proof of the statute giving the foreign probate court jurisdiction.[86] This rule has been applied to the probate of wills disposing of lands in the state where the evidence is sought to be introduced, although the will has not been probated or recorded in the latter state.[87] But this doctrine has been denied in other states on the ground that the lands are subject to the laws of the state in which they are situated.[88]

(D) Records of Justices of the Peace. Whether judgments of justices of the peace are covered by the provisions of the act of congress of 1790 prescribing the mode of authentication and proof of judicial records and proceedings is disputed. According to the rule laid down in some states the adjudications of justices of the peace who do not record their proceedings through a clerk are not within the act, but the mode of their authentication is to be governed by the laws of the state where the exemplification is to be adduced in evidence. This is upon the supposition that the court whose proceedings are to be authenticated under the act of congress must be so constituted as to admit of the officers named in the act, and justices' courts have not ordinarily the machinery to enable them to comply with the act.[89] In other jurisdictions it is held that where courts of justices of the peace are courts of record, a justice may, after attestation of his record, certify that he is the presiding magistrate and that he has no seal or clerk, but acts as copy does not purport to contain a complete copy of the proceedings, or if it shows a defective record on its face, it will be inadmissible, although the statutory mode of authentication is complied with.[97] Thus a duly authenticated copy of a judgment only has been held inadmissible when the evidence is introduced to establish the facts adjudicated.[98] If the copy is authenticated according to the requirements of the act of congress, the authentication, however, is prima facie evidence of the correctness and completeness of the record.[99] Indeed it need not appear that the record was extended with the formality and accuracy required in the records of the courts in which the evidence is sought to be introduced; but it will be enough if the record is sufficient in substance and contains all the essential requisites of a judicial record.[1] Thus it has been held that the mere fact that it does not appear from the transcript that the original record was signed by the judge or other officer will not render the copy inadmissible.[2] Nor is it material that the reasons on which the court founded the judgment are not set forth.[3] On the other hand whatever the courts of another state have certified as a part of the record must as a general rule be received as such, and no part can be excluded because it would not have been certified as a part of the record in the state where the evidence is introduced.[4] At any rate the fact that the transcript con-

c. Documents and Records Not Legislative or Judicial — (I) In General. The constitution of the United States provides that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state, and congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts and proceedings shall be proved and the effect thereof.[6] And by act of congress it is provided: "All records and exemplifications of books, which may be kept in any public office of any State or Territory, or of any country subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, not appertaining to a court, shall be proved or admitted in any court or office in any other State or Territory, or in any such country, by the attestation of the keeper of the said records or books, and the seal of his office annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the presiding justice of the court of the county, parish, or district in which such office may be kept, or of the governor, or secretary of state, the chancellor or keeper of the great seal, of the State, or Territory, or country, that the said attestation is in due form, and by the proper officers. If the said certificate is given by the presiding justice of a court, it shall be further authenticated by the clerk or prothonotary of the said court, who shall certify, under his hand and the seal of his office, that the said presiding justice is duly commissioned and qualified; or, if given by such governor, secretary, chancellor, or keeper of the great seal, it shall be under the great seal of the State, Territory, or country aforesaid in which it is made. And the said records and exemplifications, so authenticated, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court and office within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts or offices of the State, Territory, or country, as aforesaid, from which they are taken."[7]

(II) The Records to Be Certified — (A) In General. It may be laid down as a general rule that every document of a public nature which there would be any inconvenience in removing from its proper place of custody and which the party has the right to inspect are "records" within the meaning of the above constitutional and statutory provisions and may be proved by a duly authenticated copy.[8]

(B) Conveyances and Other Private Writings — (1) In General. So copies from other states of records of conveyances and mortgages of lands[9] and other of the proceedings after trial, it was error to refuse to admit such opinion in evidence, since it would be presumed to have been made under the law of the state where the judgment was recovered, although it would not have been as part of the record in the state where offered.

private writings[10] if authenticated in accordance with the act of congress are admissible. If the instruments are properly recorded, copies of such records duly authenticated will have in another state the effect as evidence to which they are entitled by the laws of the state where the record is made.[11] Thus they will be admitted as primary[12] or secondary evidence[13] in accordance with this principle. So copies of records of other states have frequently been excluded from evidence either because they were clearly inadmissible under the laws of the state where the record was made or it did not appear from the evidence what was the law on the subject in such state.[14] Thus where by the laws of the state where the record is made the registry is merely required for the purpose of giving notice and not for the purpose of the preservation of evidence, a certified copy thereof is inadmissible in another state.[15]

(2) Unauthorized Records. It must appear that the laws of a state where an instrument is recorded require or authorize such registry, before an office copy thereof can be admitted in evidence in the courts of another state.[16]

(III) Authentication Required — (A) Under Federal Statute. To authorize the admission of office copies under the act of congress, the mode of authentication prescribed by the act must be pursued.[17] Thus a copy of a deed, from a clerk of the court, without the certificate of the presiding judge that the attes-

Exemplification of record in one state of lands situate in another.— Since the conveyance of lands is regulated by the law of the situs no foreign record is evidence of it, and hence an exemplification of a record in one state of a conveyance of lands situated in another has been held inadmissible as evidence in the latter. tation of the clerk is in due form, cannot be received as evidence.[18] So the attestation of the custodian of the record must be under his seal of office,[19] unless it appears that no seal of office is established by law.[20] Likewise the certificate of the governor or other officer that the person who assumes the character of custodian of the records is the proper officer must be under the seal of state or the proper seal of office.[21]

(B) Other Modes of Authentication. The act of congress does not exclude other modes of authentication or abrogate any principle of evidence previously established.[22] Provision is made by statute in some of the states for the receipt in evidence of copies of public records in sister states when certified and authenticated in a designated manner.[23] A record of another state not judicial may also be proved by a sworn copy, this common-law right not being abridged by the federal statutes authorizing the use of certified copies in evidence.[24] But copies of records of other states, although sworn to, are not evidence, until it be shown that the records themselves were kept under authority of law.[25]

8. State Records Offered in Federal Courts. The rule has been laid down in the federal courts that when the copy of an instrument on record in a public office of a state is certified to by the officer whose duty it is by law to keep the original on file in his office, it must be received as evidence of the original.[26] The record of a judgment of a state court is not admissible in evidence in a federal court sitting in another state unless it is authenticated in manner provided by section 905 of the Revised Statutes of the United States;[27] but when the record of a

Completeness of record exemplified.— In an action on a judgment of a state court, an exemplification which is a transcript of the "complete record" of the proceedings, made up according to the practice in the courts of the state, is held to be sufficient when it shows that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and that the judgment rendered in a state court is offered in evidence in a federal court sitting within the same state where the judgment was rendered, an authentication in accordance with the federal statute is not required; the certificate of the clerk and the seal of the court is sufficient.[28]

9. Foreign Documents or Records[29] — a. In General. The public records or documents of a foreign country may be proved by the original records themselves if they can be produced and are properly authenticated.[30] But as a general rule the original records cannot be produced and hence proof may be made by duly authenticated copies.[31] But it has been held that a transcript of the registry of marriage in a foreign country, however well authenticated, is not prima facie evidence of the marriage, without proof of the laws of the foreign country requiring the registry to be made and kept.[32] The statutes of some jurisdictions make provision for the mode of authenticating official copies of records and documents generally or of specified classes of records found in foreign registries or public offices.[33] In the absence of such statutory provision the rule has been laid down that the proper mode of authentication of foreign records or documents other than foreign laws or judicial records must be determined under the guidance furnished by the rules of the common law or the usages of nations, and that any evidence is in general sufficient that legitimately tends to prove that the document offered is in fact certified by the official custodian of the original of which it purports to be a copy, and that he has due authority to make such certification.[34]

Under statute in Louisiana documents properly authenticated by United States representatives abroad are admissible in evidence in the courts of that state. Justus's Succession, 48 La. Ann. 1096, 20 So. 680; Jerman v. Tenneas, 44 La. Ann. 620, 11 So. 80.

Thus a copy certified under the great seal of state is admissible.[35] So it has been held to be one of the proper and essential functions of consuls under the rules of international law to aid in the authentication of foreign documents for use in their country, and that for this purpose the courts will take notice of their seals of office.[36] Examined or sworn copies of foreign records have also been held admissible.[37]

b. Judicial Records — (i) In General. The best proof of the proceedings of a foreign court are the original records.[38] But these cannot ordinarily be produced.[39] Hence one of the usual modes of authenticating foreign judgments is by an exemplification under the great seal of state.[40] A copy authenticated by the great seal is sufficient, although unaccompanied by any certificate of its being a copy under the official signature of any officer of the court, or by other evidence of its genuineness.[41] But it has been held that a copy certified under the private seal of the secretary of state for foreign affairs of a foreign government,[42] or under the seal of a foreign minister,[43] is not admissible. Foreign judgments may be authenticated by a copy proved to be true by a witness who has personally compared it with the original record in the proper custody.[44] Thus a copy is

The seal of a notary public is one of which the courts take judicial notice whenever it is used to attest a foreign document which by the usages of nations may be so attested. See Barber v. Mexico International Co., 73 Conn. 587, 48 Atl. 758; Ashcraft v. Chapman, 38 Conn. 230; Orr v. Lacy, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,589, 4 McLean (U. S.) 243. As for instance in cases of protest of foreign bills of exchange. Waldron v. Turpin, 15 La. 552, 35 Am. Dec. 210; Phillips v. Flint, 3 La. 146; Rosine v. Bonnabel, 5 Rob. (La.) 163; Lloyd v. McGarr, 6 Pa. L. J. 74. So a notary public is an officer to whom in many countries resort is had for certificates authenticating copies of documents in public archives, and when the notary's certificate is properly authenticated the certified copy will be admissible. Barber v. Mexico International Co., 73 Conn. 587, 48 Atl. 758; Bowman v. Sanborn, 25 N. H. 87; Williams v. Conger, 125 U. S. 397, 8 S. Ct. 933, 31 L. ed. 778. In Talcott v. Delaware Ins. Co., 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,734, 2 Wash. 449, a copy to which a notarial certificate was affixed was not admitted where it did not appear that the notary had charge of the papers and that he had authority to authenticate them.

Form of attestation.— The attestation of the proper officer at the end of the entire document and over his signature that the same was "a true copy" has been held a sufficient verification to entitle it to be received in evidence as a certified copy. sufficiently authenticated by proof that the witness assisted the clerk in comparing the copy with the record and in affixing the seal of the court to the copy and saw the clerk attest the copy by putting his name to it.[45]

(II) Office Copy. A foreign judgment may also be proved by a copy thereof duly authenticated by the properly authenticated certificate of an officer authorized by law to give a copy.[46] Under this rule it has been held that the clerk or prothonotary of a court is presumed to possess authority to make and certify copies of the records of the court in his keeping, and such copies are duly authenticated by his certificate, over his official signature and the seal of the court, and that his official signature and the seal are duly authenticated by the great seal of the state or government in which the court is found affixed to the certificate of the keeper thereof.[47] Since a court of admiralty acts under the law of nations, its proceedings are sufficiently proved by the certificate of a deputy register under the seal of the court, the certificate of the judge, and the certificate of a notary.[48] Indeed it has been held that a copy of a decree of a court of admiralty certified by the deputy registrar under the seal of the court is sufficiently authenticated, the seal of a court of admiralty being deemed evidence of itself.[49] But in the case of foreign courts generally, the certificate of the clerk or other officer under seal of the court is not alone sufficient but must itself be properly authenticated.[50]

Completeness of transcript.— It has been held that the mere transcript of an order of a foreign court containing no previous proceedings upon which the order rested and no copy of the judgment-roll other than said order is inadmissible on the ground of the incompleteness of the record in the absence of proof of a procedure in the foreign country making such evidence sufficient. Wickersham v. Johnson, 104 Cal. 407, 38 Pac. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118; Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646; Coleman's Estate, 7 Pa. Dist. 731. See also Gunn v. Peakes, 36 Minn. 177, 30 N. Proof of seal and official character of person certifying by witnesses.— In Gardere v. Columbian Ins. Co., 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 514, it was held that a copy of the sentence of a foreign court of vice-admiralty under the seal of the court, signed by the actuary in the absence of the register, accompanied with a deposition of a witness proving the seal and signature, was sufficiently authenticated, although not signed by the judge. So in Packard v. Hill, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 434, it was held that a copy of a foreign sentence certified by the clerk who had the custody of the records of the court was admissible where a witness at the trial proved the signature of the clerk, and that the court had no seal, and that the copy was authenticated in the usual form of those sent to be used as evidence in a foreign country.

(iii) Provision Under State Statutes. Under statute in the various states provision is made for the authentication of foreign judgments so as to render them admissible in evidence.[51]

c. Foreign Laws. A discussion of the mode of proof of foreign laws will be found elsewhere in this work.[52]

C. Private or Unofficial Documents — 1. Wills, Conveyances, Contracts, and Other Instruments — a. In General. The general principles of evidence in respect to relevancy and competency in general are applicable to wills, conveyances, contracts, and other private writings of a kindred nature as in the case of other forms of evidence.[53]

b. Recitals. The admissibility of recitals in deeds of conveyance, mortgages, etc., depends on the binding effect of the recitals on the person against whom they are sought to be introduced, and hence the question is one properly treated elsewhere in this work.[54]

c. Void or Defective Instruments. As a general rule a deed, will, or other writing relied on as a muniment of title as embodying a contract, or as otherwise establishing by its terms a claim or right, will be excluded from the jury if it is so defective, either in substance or in form, that the court is able to say as a matter of law that it is an invalid instrument;[55] otherwise the evidence will be

Secondary evidence.— The rule has been laid down in some of the cases that the best evidence of accounts which it is in the power of the party to produce must be exhausted

as the "American rule," has been repudiated in England[69] and to some extent in this country.[70] The rule was sanctioned by the courts of this country as an exception to the general rule of law as it once existed that a party should not be a witness in his own case on grounds of supposed necessity in order to prevent a failure of justice, since the business of tradesmen was often carried on without clerks on whose testimony they might rely, and since many of their transactions on account of their variety and minuteness were necessarily not in the presence of witnesses.[71] Although the rule allowing a party's shop-books in evidence was established at a time when parties to an action were not allowed to be witnesses, subsequent legislation which removed that disqualification and authorized parties to testify in their own behalf does not deprive them of the right to introduce their books of account in evidence.[72] So, in suits by or against estates of deceased persons, the adverse party is not as a general rule prohibited by statutes excluding parties from testifying against the estates of deceased persons or restricting their right in this respect from introducing his account-books in evidence or from before the books of such accounts are admissible.

Account-book of individual inadmissible in favor of persons suing jointly.— In a joint suit by two co-plaintiffs, a book of accounts charging defendant with work done and money paid is inadmissible where it does not purport and is not shown to be the book of both plaintiffs but shows dealings between defendant and one plaintiff only. Hansen v. Kirtley, 11 Iowa 565.

Entries as part of res gestæ.— The entries in books of account are regarded as the statements of the person making them, and if an act done by the party is competent then entries in his books made by him at the time of the act tending to elucidate and give a character to it may be admitted as part of the res gestæ. Batchelder v. Sanborn, 22 N. H. 325. Thus a party's shop-books may be admitted as a part of the res gestæ for the purpose of explaining the character of the party's possession of goods. Welch v. Cooper, 8 Pa. St. 217. But the mere entry of a fact by a party will not, apart from any act which it is calculated to elucidate, be admissible on this principle. his handwriting will not be sufficient.[76] But the suppletory oath of the party making the entries may be dispensed with under certain circumstances, upon proof of his handwriting.[77] Thus the books of account of a deceased person are competent evidence in favor of his executor or administrator if supported by the oath of the personal representative,[78] or, as is held in some jurisdictions, if proved to be in his handwriting by a competent witness.[79] A similar rule is applied where the party since making the charges has become insane, the books being offered by his guardian.[80] But it has been held that the fact that a party whose entries are sought to be introduced is absent from the state will not render them admissible upon proof of his handwriting.[81] Where one of several copartners who made the entries is dead[82] or is out of the jurisdiction of the court[83] the other copartner may swear to his handwriting in the books. But if the partner making the entry is alive and can be produced his testimony only is receivable,[84] except where a contrary provision is made by statute.[85] modern statutes in some states the privilege of introducing account-books in evidence is extended to either party in all suits and actions, whether the parties are merchants or not.[88]

(5) Keeping Clerk. To render a book of account admissible under the shop-book rule it is frequently laid down as a general rule that it must appear that the party offering the book had no clerk.[89] But, where the entries are as a matter of fact made by the party, the mere fact that he had a clerk is immaterial.[90] So it is held that the clerk intended is an employee who has something to do with and has knowledge generally of the business of his employer as to goods sold or work done, so that he can testify on the subject.[91] Thus it is held that one whose

Dec. 125, it was held that the books of a tradesman or mechanic are admissible in evidence only to prove the performance and delivery of work done within the mechanic's shop, and that where the work is done outside of his shop, or on the premises of the party charged, such as building or repairing a house or any other fixture, there can be no necessity for books, for the work is apparent. So as to books of a schoolmaster. Oliver v. Phelps, 21 N. J. L. 597. But in Pelzer v. Cranston, 2 McCord (S. C.) 328, it was held that the books of a schoolmaster, although regularly kept, are not admissible to prove an account for instruction; there being no necessity, as such person should be able to furnish witnesses. The rule has been held not to extend to the books of a farmer or planter (Jeter v. Martin, 2 Brev. (S. C.) 156; Slade v. Teasdale, 2 Bay (S. C.) 172. Compare Tomlinson v. Borst, 30 Barb. (N. C.) 133, holding that where a shopkeeper himself sold and delivered goods to a party, and during the same day the entries were made by another person, who occasionally acted as clerk for him, the book was no evidence of the debt, and that the evidence was inadmissible.

90. Townsend v. Coleman, 18 Tex. 418, 20 Tex. 817.

Entries made partly by party.—It has been held that the mere fact that the entries are made partly by the party himself and partly by his clerk will not render the book inadmissible as to the entries made by the party. A foreman who tended to sales no further than merely delivering goods manufactured, neither keeping memoranda of the delivery for temporary purposes nor making entries on the employer's books, has been held not to be a clerk within the meaning of the rule. Sickles v. Mather, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) 72, 32 Am. Dec. 521.

Books kept by party's wife.— It is held that a party's wife who makes entries from memoranda furnished by him is not a clerk within the meaning of the rule requiring proof that the party had no clerk in order to render his shop-books admissible. Smith v. Smith, 163 N. Y. 168, 57 N. E. 300, 52 L. R. A. 543. So it has been held that a wife who keeps her husband's accounts is competent, where he introduces his book of original entries, to testify that she made the same by his direction and in his presence, and after she has so testified he may testify as to the times when they were made and that the charges contained therein are just and true. Littlefield v. Rice, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 287. Compare Carr v. Cornell, 4 Vt. 116. But to render such evidence admissible it has been held that the entries must be made under the eye of the husband, and that an entry made merely by the direction of a husband who could not write is inadmissible. Luce v. Doane, 38 Me. 478.

business is simply to keep the books is not a clerk within the meaning of the rule.[92] In some jurisdictions, under statute,[93] and even apart from statute,[94] a party is allowed to prove his own books whether kept by himself or by a clerk or agent.

(6) Proof of Delivery of Goods and Performance of Services. The rule is sometimes laid down that to render a party's books of account admissible he must make oath or in some way prove that the articles were delivered or the services actually performed.[95] In other jurisdictions the rule is stated that some of the articles charged must have been delivered or some of the services rendered.[96]

(7) Form and Regularity — (a) In General. The entries must appear to have been made in the regular course of business and under such circumstances as to import trustworthiness,[97] and the book must be in such shape that it may be presumed to be the register of the daily business transactions of the party offering it.[98] The law, however, prescribes no particular form in which a book must

Book containing charges against adverse party only.— In Fulton's Estate, 178 Pa. St. 78, 35 Atl. 880, 35 L. R. A. 133, it was held that a book which shows on its face that it was not one of entries in the regular course of business, but was a separate book contain-be kept and no particular material to be used,[99] and books may be admitted that are deficient in many respects, since it does not follow that before a plaintiff can fairly ask a verdict he may not be compelled to supply deficiencies in the evidence which his book affords.[1] Upon this principle marks on a shingle[2] or on a notched stick have been admitted.[3]

(b) Ledgers—aa. In General. Books of account are admissible, although kept in ledger form; that is, where all the charges against the adverse party are entered on the same leaf of the book with no intervening charges against others,[4]

ing no charges except against defendant, is not admissible as a book of original entries, although it contained several items against defendant. So in Swing v. Sparks, 7 N. J. L. 59, it was held that a book of accounts containing charges in several successive years, all written from oral directions, and all against one person, without any intervening charge, is not sufficient evidence to go to the jury. On the other hand it has been held that the fly leaf of a bible containing only one account is a sufficient book of account, within the meaning of the Missouri statute. Stephan v. Metzger, 95 Mo. App. 609, 69 S. W. 625.

Entries on first leaf of book.— An entry on the front leaf of a tradesman's books, before the first regular page of the book, and not in the regular course of charges, is not evidence to go to a jury to establish an account. Lynch v. McHugo, 1 Bay (S. C.) 33.

Entries on last leaf of book.— Charges of cash paid, advanced or lent, written on one of the last leaves of a book, detached from the daily entries and accounts by intervening blank leaves, and dated during the time of such entries and accounts, are not evidence. Wilson v. Wilson, 6 N. J. L. 95.

Under statute in some states the book must show a continuous dealing with persons generally or several items of charges at different times against the other party in the same book. Arney v. Meyer, 96 Iowa 395, 65 N. W. 337; Security Co. v. Graybeal, 85 Iowa 543, 52 N. W. 497, 39 Am. St. Rep. 311; Atkins v. Seeley, 54 Nebr. 688, 74 N. Illustration.— In an action to recover pay for labor, plaintiff's time-book, kept in a tabular form, in which the name of the laborer is inserted on the side, and all the days of the month are denoted by figures at the top, and under those figures are inserted other figures denoting the time of labor on those days, is admissible in evidence, with plaintiff's suppletory oath, not only as to his own labor, but also as to the labor of his apprentice. Mathes v. Robinson, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 269, 41 Am. Dec. 505.

Entries in pencil.— It is no objection to a party's book of accounts that the entries are made in pencil. Gibson v. Bailey, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 537; True v. Bryant, 32 N. H. 241; Hill v. Scott, 12 Pa. St. 168; Walton's Estate, 4 Kulp (Pa.) 487.

Books formerly used by another.—Account-books of original entry are not inadmissible because they were formerly used by a firm of which plaintiff was a member, and he continued to use them after the retirement of his copartner. Dunlap v. Hooper, 66 Ga. 211.

Private account of partner kept in firm-book.— Plaintiff was a member of a firm and kept his private account with defendant in the firm-book with the authority of his partner and at the request of defendant. It was held in a suit by plaintiff against defendant that this private account could be proved by the firm-book. White v. Tucker, 9 Iowa 100.

Records of a cash register are not admissible as books of account. Cullinan v. Moncrief, 90 N. Y. App. Div. 538, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 745.

A question for the court.— It is for the court to decide whether the book offered possesses the requisites of a book of accounts, and the question of competency must be determined by the appearance and character of the book and all the circumstances of the case, including the degree of education of the party, and the nature of his employment, indicating that it has been kept honestly and with reasonable care and accuracy or the reverse.

except when excluded on the ground that the original books of entry are the best evidence.[5] A ledger copied from a day-book or blotter is held to be inadmissible.[6] But a ledger has been held admissible, although a pass-book has been used for making memoranda to secure accuracy in the entries.[7]

bb. Necessity of Production of Ledger. When it appears from marks upon a day-book that entries therein have been transferred to a ledger the ledger should be produced in connection with the day-book.[8] But where it does not affirmatively appear from the day-book that any of the accounts have been posted or credits entered in the ledger, it is not necessary to produce the ledger without previous notice.[9]

(c) Entries on Separate Sheets of Paper. It has been held not to be material that the entries are made on a separate sheet or sheets of paper,[10] or even on scraps of paper.[11] On the other hand it has been held that entries made on loose or unconnected sheets of paper do not amount to books of account, since they cannot be presumed to be the daily minutes of business transactions.[12]

(d) Diaries and Memoranda of Accounts. Loose memoranda or entries in diaries or memorandum books used for recording any matter of which the owner may wish to make note, while admissible for the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness,[13] have generally been excluded as independent evidence.[14]

Iowa.— Under Code, § 3657, providing for the admission of evidence of books of account containing charges by one party against the other, made in the ordinary course of business, a book used as a mere memorandum book, from which to enter up charges against parties in a sale book, is not admissible in evi-

(e) Check-Book Stubs. A blank check-book from which checks when filled are cut out and in which a memorandum is entered in the margin, opposite to each check cut out, of the name of the drawee, the amount, date, etc., is not a book of accounts to which the party can swear.[15] They are inadmissible generally to show cash transactions, even granting that they are to be treated as books of account.[16]

(f) Suspicious Appearance or Circumstances. Suspicious circumstances appearing on the face of a book of accounts or otherwise proved against it must be explained before it can be admitted in evidence.[17] Thus a book of original entries bearing manifest and suspicious marks of erasure or alteration in a material point will be rejected unless the alteration is satisfactorily explained by the party.[18] It has even been held that the explanation must be made by a disinterested person, the explanation of the party being deemed insufficient.[19] So as a general rule mutilated books are not entitled to credit in favor of the owner.[20]

(g) Certainty and Particularity of Charges — aa. In General. There is no particular form in which a book charge must be made in order that it may be admissible in evidence.[21] But it must be made in such a manner as to show of itself a charge against the adverse party and the nature of the charge, so that in connection with a party's oath as to requisite preliminary matters it will show the nature of the claim without further evidence from the party to interpret the meaning of arbitrary characters, or terms intelligible only to himself.[22] Charges need not, however, be such as to be understood by the general public if they are intelligible to persons in the profession or business; although where they are not intelligible to the common understanding it would seem to be necessary to support them by other evidence as to their meaning and character.[23] The entries must be sufficient to show to a reasonable certainty what article or thing is made the basis of the charge.[24] It has also been held that the entries to be admissible must contain the price or value of the goods sold or services rendered;[25] but in other jurisdictions entries to which the price or value of the goods or services is not affixed are admitted when accompanied by other proof of the price or value.[26] The mere fact that the measure, weight, and quantity are not given in connection with the items will not render the accounts inadmissible.[27]

bb. Lumping Charges. Charges must as a general rule be specific and particular, and lumping accounts renders them inadmissible.[28] But in this respect, it lar entries in a prior portion of the book are followed by a number of blank pages. Robinson v. Hoyt, 39 Mich. 405.

Mutilated books inadmissible as secondary evidence.— The production of a book of accounts, with three leaves cut out, kept by a person deceased, together with evidence of his declarations that he had made charges in his book as advancements to his children, are not competent evidence that such advancements had been made on the missing leaves. Hartwell v. Rice, 1 Gray (Mass.) 587.

Mutilation after commencement of suit.— A memorandum book, out of which some of the entries bearing on the cause of action have been torn after the action was commenced, is not admissible in evidence. Johnson v. Fry, 88 Va. 695, 12 S. E. 973, 14 S. E. 183.

The fact that books of account have become shopworn from use, and the covers and some outside leaves lost, there being nothing to indicate any fraud or purpose to destroy entries, is not a justification for the exclusion of the entries proved; the condition of the books is a matter going to their weight and credibility with the jury. has been held, some latitude is allowed, depending upon the nature of the case, and the matter must rest to a great extent in the discretion of the court.[29] Accordingly single charges for services extending over several days,[30] or for goods delivered during a similar period, especially if delivered under a single order,[31] have been admitted.

cc. Dates. It has been held that a book of accounts is not to be rejected because the accounts are without date, as the date may be established by other evidence.[32] On the other hand it is held that there must be dates to the entries, although it is not necessary that the precise day of the month should be affixed to the charge in all cases, if the month is given and the books appear to be regular in other respects.[33]

(h) Completeness of Accounts. To entitle books of account to be received as evidence, it is held that it must appear that the entries therein are designed at least to embrace all the items of the account between the parties which are proper subjects of entry.[34]

(i) Original Entries Required — aa In General. To be admitted in evidence the book must appear to contain the party's original entries or the first permanent records of the transactions, and when the contrary is discoverable upon the face of the books, or comes out upon the examination of the party, or otherwise, they ought to be rejected as incompetent evidence.[35] But it is not a valid objection to the admission in evidence of original entries that they are in a book which contains other charges admitted not to be original.[36]

bb Copies of Destroyed Originals Made by Party. An account purporting to be drawn out by the party himself from his original and daily minutes is not as a general rule admissible in evidence, although the book from which such statement might have been copied has been burnt or destroyed by accident.[37] But it has been held that the transcript is admissible if there is proof that the items of the account drawn out actually existed in the party's book where his daily transactions were minuted, and that the transcript has been duly taken therefrom.[38]

cc Charges Transferred From Memoranda. It is not an objection to the competency of the party's book supported by a suppletory oath that the entries therein were transcribed from a slate, card, or memorandum book in which they were first entered for a temporary purpose, although the entries on the slate or memorandum were made by a person other than the party who copied them on the book. In such cases the entry of the charges in the first instance are regarded as memoranda preparatory to permanent evidence of the transactions, and the entry in the regular book of accounts of the party is deemed to be the first and original entry, and as such competent proof with the oath of the party of the charges therein made.[39] Especially is this true where the original entries or memoranda are incomplete and the final entries contain the first entries of the charges in their entirety.[40]

(8) Subject-Matter of Entry — (a) In General. The entries must relate to the business carried on by the person for whom the books are kept and not to matters in no way connected with the business.[41] Thus entries even in a regular book are not evidence of the casual sale of an article not in the line of the party's business.[42]

(b) Goods Delivered and Services Performed. In jurisdictions where a party's Ferriage.— In an action to recover a sum due for ferriage, the books of the ferry-owner are admissible to prove the account. Frazier v. Drayton, 2 Nott & M. (S. C.) 471.

Horse hire.— An account for the hire of a horse, it has been held, may be proved, as work and labor, under the book-debt law. Easly v. Eakin, Cooke (Tenn.) 388.

Charges for board.—In Tremain v. Edwards, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 414, it was held that meals furnished to one and his servants from day to day are a proper subject of book charge. But compare Gibbons' Estate, 1 Leg. Gaz. (Pa.) 10, where it was held that items charging board are not for goods sold in the ordinary course of business, and the book containing them is not such a book of original entry as to be admissible in evidence.

Price of goods.— A day-book is prima facie evidence of the prices of goods as well as of their sale and delivery. Ducoign v. Schreppel, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 347. See also F. H. Hill Co. v. Sommer, 55 Ill. App. 345.

Date of delivery of goods.— Where the date of delivery of goods was a material fact, the account-book containing the original entries thereof was held properly admitted in evidence. Costello v. Crowell, 133 Mass. 352.

Work done by party's servants.— In an action for work and materials plaintiff's books are admissible to prove work done by persons in his employment. Barker v. Haskell, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 218; Mitchell v. Clarke, 3 N. C. 13. Compare Wright v. Sharp, 1 Browne (Pa.) 344.

Book containing record of notes.— A book in which an intervener kept a record of certain notes has been held not admissible, as a book of accounts, to prove plaintiff's indebtedness on said notes. Kassing v. Walter, (Iowa 1896) 65 N. W. 832. So a note register or book of bills receivable kept by a bank or banker is not a "book of account." Martin v. Scott, 12 Nebr. 42, 10 N. W. 532.

Items relating to rent or breach of lease.— Books of account are not admissible to prove a debt of defendant to plaintiff for rent of land, or other items referable to the failure of a party to comply with the terms of a lease. Prince v. Smith, 4 Mass. 455.

Expenditures in search of slave.— In an action against stage-coach proprietors for aiding in the escape of plaintiff's slave, plaintiff's book entries are not, it is held, proper evidence of expenditures in search of his slave, as such expenditures are not matter of account. Redden v. Spruance, 4 Harr. (Del.) 217.

Charge for commission on ship-broker's book.— A ship-broker's book and his suppletory oath cannot, it is held, be received in evidence to support a charge for a commission on the sale of a vessel, since it relates to a transaction of which from the nature of the case other and better evidence could be given. Winsor v. Dillaway, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 221.

Charges for wharfage cannot, it is held, be proved by books of account. Lennig v. Quaker City Steamboat Co., 3 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 434; Wilmer v. Israel, 1 Browne (Pa.) 257.

Literary labor improper subject of book entries see Hirst v. Clarke, 3 Pa. L. J. 32, 1 Pa. L. J. Rep. 398.

Charges of damages.— Charges which are not in their nature liquidated sums, but damages which can be rendered certain only by convention or judicial decision, are not matters of book-account. Wait v. Krewson, 59 N. J. L. 71, 35 Atl. 742; Swing v. Sparks, 7 N. J. L. 59.

Books of agent or broker.— The rule relating to the admission of shop-books of services rendered, or the sale and delivery of merchandise on credit, has been held not to extend to the account-books of a broker or agent showing purchases from or sales to third persons by the agent, in an action between him and his principal. Rathborne v. Hatch, 80 N. Y. App. Div. 115, 80 N. Y. Suppl. 347. Compare Mertens v. Nottebohms, 4 Gratt. (Va.) 163. So where an agent conducted the business of a principal incapable of transacting his own business, the agent's books were held inadmissible to prove the supply of necessaries by the agent to his principal during the agency. for whom labor or services have been performed are not admissible in his favor.[46]

(c) Collateral Matters — aa. In General. The account-books of a party, whether verified by oath or not, are as a general rule inadmissible to prove any matter collateral to the issue of debt and credit between the parties.[47] If other facts aside from the sale and delivery of goods or the performance of work and labor are necessary to make out the party's case, these facts cannot be established by his books and suppletory oath, but must be made out by independent testimony.[48]

bb. To Whom Credit Is Given. Books of account are inadmissible to show to whom credit was given when that fact is in issue.[49] Thus they are not evidence to charge a defendant with goods delivered to a third person or for services performed for a third person, on the adverse party's order.[50] But after an order to deliver goods or to render services is proved by competent evidence aliunde, the delivery or performance itself may be proved by the books and suppletory oath of the party.[51]

Establishment of mechanic's lien.— In scire facias upon a mechanic's lien, where the materials were furnished on the credit of the building, charges in the book made against the owner or contractor individually have

cc. Special Agreements. Books of account to be received in evidence must be a registry of business actually done; they are inadmissible to prove the terms or contents of a special agreement.[52] In some of the decisions moreover it is held that the delivery of goods, the performance of services, or the payment of money under a special agreement is not provable by books of account, since by an agreement of this kind the transaction is taken out of the usual course of business dealings and the performance or non-performance of the contract is susceptible of other proof.[53] On the other hand it is held that, although a book of accounts been held competent to show the amount of materials furnished, the facts which rendered the building liable having been proven aliunde. Barbier v. Smith, 38 Pa. Illustrations.— Thus a special contract under which a party alleges he has paid a claim against him by crediting the same upon an account against another party is not provable by a book of accounts. Griesheimer v. Tanenbaum, 124 N. Y. 650, 26 N. E. 957. So the execution of a note in settlement of an account has been held not to be a transaction of a character which can be evidenced by a party's shop-books. Estes v. Jackson, 53 S. W. 271, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 859. And a plaintiff's books of account and suppletory oath are not competent evidence of the consideration of a promissory note. Rindge v. Breck, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 43. So in an action to recover contribution from one who is alleged to be a joint indorser with plaintiff of a promissory note, plaintiff cannot introduce in evidence an extract from his own books of account to corroborate his own testimony tending to show that the parties were joint indorsers. Alger v. Thompson, 1 Allen (Mass.) 453.

Charges becoming matters of account upon rescission of contract.— Charges for services done or property delivered under a supposed special contract, but which afterward become matter of account by operation of law in consequence of a rescission of the contract, cannot be proved by the party's book, since there must be a right to charge when the service is done or the goods delivered. Merrill v. Ithaca, etc., R. Co., 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 586, 30 Am. Dec. 130.

Delivery to sell on commission.— The fact that plaintiff had delivered wood to defendant to sell on commission must be proven by some other evidence than plaintiff's account-books, as the rule allowing such books in evidence cannot be extended to agreements other than the sale. Contract failing to stipulate amount and price of work.— Where the amount of work to be done, the materials to be furnished, and the prices to be paid are not stipulated, the may be incompetent to prove the performance of a special contract, yet where services are rendered or goods are delivered from time to time in the performance of the contract, it is proper to charge them upon the book, and such charges are competent evidence, not of the performance of the contract, but of the fact of the delivery of the goods and the rendition of the services and their amount.[54] So in a jurisdiction where a party's book of accounts with his suppletory oath is admissible to prove the payment generally of a sum of money not exceeding a prescribed amount, the book of accounts is held admissible to prove the fact of payment but not to prove that it was paid upon a particular debt.[55]

(d) Cash Items or Dealings. In some jurisdictions, under statute, items indicating loans or advances of money are to be admitted in evidence equally with other items, assuming the account to be otherwise admissible.[56] But as a general rule books of account of a party are not admissible in his own favor to prove charges for "money paid" or "money lent," or cash items or dealings between the parties generally, since these charges are not usually such as are made in the ordinary course of business, and since other and better evidence of the transaction usually exists or might reasonably be called for by the party making the advance.[57]

Making of entry in performance of contract. — In Ross v. Brusie, 70 Cal. 465, 11 Pac. 760, it was held that a party's book of account is admissible in evidence when offered, not to establish a claim against the adverse party, but to prove that the party has performed his contract and given a credit which he has promised. Goods charged as money loaned.— In Le Franc v. Hewitt, 7 Cal. 186, it was held that, although the account-book of a tradesman is generally inadmissible to show money loaned, yet where it is in fact shown that there was no money loaned, but that plaintiff had procured and paid for articles for defendant and charged them as so much money loaned, the books were admissible.

This rule has been modified by some of the decisions, however, and it is held that where money charges are made in the banking business, or otherwise as a matter of fact in the ordinary course of business, the accounts will be admissible under the shop-book rule.[58] Moreover the effect of the decisions in some jurisdictions is to extend the rule permitting proof of the delivery of goods sold and the performance of labor by shop-books so as to include charges of sums of money not exceeding a certain sum,[59] or small sums not definitely fixed by law.[60]

(9) The Person Charged — (a) In General. To be admissible under the shop-book rule the book must as a general rule contain charges by one party to the action against the other and the entry must be made with the intent to make a charge.[61] Thus books of entries of work done have been held inadmissible where

Entries charged in wrong name by mistake. — It has been held that where entries in a book of accounts are made by mistake to a wrong name, they may be read in evidence against the party intended to be charged, after the mistake has been satisfactorily explained by other competent evidence. Schettler v. Jones, 20 Wis. 412. See also Linn v. Naglee, 4 Whart. (Pa.) 92. So where plaintiff, in consequence of the declarations of one of defendants that the name of the firm was changed, the partners remaining as before, charged the goods sold and delivered afterward in the name of the new firm, it was held that his book of original entries was properly admitted in evidence in a suit brought against the partners, who were sued as trading under the original firm-name. Williamson v. Fox, 38 Pa. St. 214.

Charges against individual partners inadmissible against firm.— In an action against a firm, plaintiff's books, containing charges against the several members, are not evidence of the delivery to the firm of the goods so charged, and the declaration of one of the partners to plaintiff's servant that it was no matter to which of them the articles were charged, since they would all be paid for, does not make such books evidence. Kidder v. Norris, 18 N. H. 532.

the primary object of the entries was to enable the party to settle with his employees in the work and not to charge the work against the adverse party.[62] So a book of credits and not of charges kept by a purchaser or employer is inadmissible.[63] So a party's books are inadmissible to establish a negative in his favor by showing the absence of affirmative entries.[64]

(b) Charge Against Agent. A charge in a book of original entries against an agent may be given in evidence in a suit against the principal on proof aliunde of the agency and that the transaction was made in the course of the principal's business.[65]

(c) Charges Against Two or More Persons Jointly. So shop-books are admissible to prove accounts against two or more persons jointly,[66] if the joint liability is established by evidence aliunde.[67] The evidence of the joint liability need not precede the admission of the books, but may be subsequently introduced.[68]

(10) Amount of Charge. In some states, by statute, books are competent evidence to prove an account not exceeding a sum specified,[69] and indeed it has been intimated apart from statute that charges may be of such magnitude as to be improper subjects of book-accounts.[70]

(11) Contemporaneousness. To be admitted in evidence the entries must Charge against third person as showing admission.— In an action on an account, where the issue is as to whether the debt is owing by defendant or by a third person, plaintiff's account-books, showing that he charged the debt to a third person and not to defendant, are admissible against plaintiff. Heading account in alternative.— Where in an account-book the charge was entered to "A., B., or C. and D.," it was held in an action to which "C. and D." and the person making the entries were parties that after preliminary proof was made the account was admissible in evidence if the reason for making the charge in the alternative is satisfactorily explained. Burnell v. Dunlap, 11 Iowa 446.

Collection and loan registers made to keep track of collections and loans are not "books of account," within the meaning of Nebr. Civ. appear to have been made at or near the time of the transaction to be proved, and when the contrary is apparent upon the face of the books or is shown by extrinsic proof the entries are inadmissible, but no precise time is fixed by law when the entries should be made. The entry need not be made exactly at the time of the occurrence; but it is sufficient if it is made within a reasonable time. In this particular every case must be made to depend upon its own peculiar circumstances, having regard to the situation of the parties, the kind of business, the mode of conducting it, and the time and manner of making the entries.[71]

(12) Testimony of Third Persons as to Correctness of Accounts. (13) Entries Made From Memoranda Furnished by Another. Entries made by a party from data furnished or memoranda kept by an employee to assist his memory in making a report or return will be admissible if supplemented by the oath of the party and the testimony of the person furnishing the information.[76] In some of the cases moreover the testimony of the servant making the memoranda or furnishing the information is held to be necessary to render the books admissible unless at least he is dead or his absence is otherwise satisfactorily accounted for.[77] But in other jurisdictions a different rule prevails.[78]

(c) Impeachment of Credit of Books. The rule has been laid down that a plaintiff who swears to his original books of entries puts his general character for truth and veracity[79] and the general character of his book for honesty and accuracy in evidence, and invites attack upon either or both.[80] Accordingly it has been held competent for the adverse party to show the general character of the

(II) Entries by Clerks and Third Persons Generally—(A) General Statement. The general rule is well settled that an entry made contemporaneously with the transaction by a clerk of a party to the cause, or by any third person in the ordinary course of his business or vocation, with no interest to misrepresent, before any controversy or question has arisen, and in a book produced from the proper custody, is competent evidence after his death of the facts thus recorded.[82] A similar rule has been applied where the party making the entry

Effect of existence of better evidence.— In Montgomery Bank v. Plannett, 37 Ala. 222, it was held that a book of original entries made by the deceased teller of a bank is inadmissible in evidence to prove payment made to a depositor, where the custom of the bank is to pay money to depositors only on checks, on the ground that the reason of the rule admitting books of account kept by a deceased person in the regular course of business ceases, and the rule consequently fails, has since become insane[83] or is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, at least if his absence is permanent and not temporary,[84] or generally, it has been said, where it has become impossible to procure his testimony, the cause of such impossibility being immaterial.[85] But it has been held to be incumbent on the party offering entries of this kind, unauthenticated by the oath of the person who made them, to show as a prerequisite to their admission that such person cannot be produced as a witness, and when he is living some discretion must be allowed to the trial court in deciding whether proof offered as preliminary to the introduction of the entries is sufficient to admit them as in case of the witness' death.[86] The general rule established at common law and adopted by statute in many jurisdictions, with slight modifications in some instances, is that book entries should be proved or corroborated by the clerk, servant, or other person making them, if he is alive and can be produced.[87] Testimony of a party or the person for whom the books

the witness' memory and this although as a matter of fact the witness may have no present recollection of the facts entered,[90] and although, as it has been said, in cases of accounts composed of many items refreshing the memory means nothing more than reading the book in evidence.[91] In some instances contemporaneous entries by a person in the usual course of his duties have been received as constituting part of the res gestæ of the principal transaction, although the person who made the entry was alive at the time of the trial.[92] On the other hand this principle has been held inapplicable where an entry covers the entire transaction, that is, the principle fact in issue, and does not relate merely to contemporaneous facts leading up to the main issue.[93]

(B) Prerequisites to Admissibility — (1) In General. In order to lay a foundation for the admission of evidence under the regular course of business rule, the requisite facts prescribed by law must be established.[94]

(2) Contemporaneousness. The entries must be made contemporaneously with the facts which they record so as, in the language of some of the decisions, to form a part of the res gestæ. The law has, however, fixed no definite time within which the entries must be made.[95]

Identification of book of entries.— In Dow v. Sawyer, 29 Me. 117, it was held that where the book of a deceased agent is sought to be introduced there is no rule requiring proof to be made by extraneous testimony that the book is the account-book of the agent, when the book itself upon inspection sufficiently discloses the purpose for which it is kept and for which the entries are made.

No limitation as to amount of money charge in entry.— The rule in some jurisdictions limiting the amount of a money charge to be proved by the party's shop-books has been held inapplicable to book entries made by a deceased person in the regular course of business. (3) Form and Regularity — (a) In General. The entries must also appear to have been regularly and fairly made.[96]

(b) Original Entries Required — aa. In General. So the entries must be shown to be original entries.[97] Thus a day-book or a blotter has been held to be a permanent record of business transactions and cannot be superseded as evidence by a ledger or other book which is transcribed from it.[98] The fact, however, that a book of accounts introduced in evidence contains some entries which are not original entries forms no objection to receiving the book as evidence of other entries which are regularly made, it appearing that the entries generally have been properly made.[99]

bb. Entries Transcribed From Memoranda. The mere fact that a temporary entry is first made on a slate, tally-board, slips of paper, by chalk score, or in a memorandum book, for the purpose of convenience and aiding the memory until a permanent book entry can be made, will not operate to deprive the subsequent entry of its character as an original entry.[1]

(4) Duty or Right to Make Entry. It is very generally stated as a part of the rule under discussion that the entry must have been made by the person making it in the discharge of his duty or in the usual and regular course of his business or employment.[2] It has even been held that the rule relates only to entries made by an agent in the discharge of his duty toward his principal and does not apply to entries made by a principal.[3] Moreover it has been held that it must appear that the entry was not only made in the due discharge of the business about which the person is employed, but the duty must be to do the very thing to which the entry relates and then to make a report or record of it.[4]

(5) Knowledge of Person Making Entry. It must appear that the entries are made by a person having knowledge of the facts entered,[5] or that information was communicated to the person by whom the entries were made by some person engaged in the business whose duty it was to transact the particular business and make report thereof for entry on the books.[6]

(6) Absence of Motive to Misrepresent. It is sometimes said that it must also appear that the party making the entry had no motive or interest to mis-

(7) Effect of Coöperation in Making Entry. Where one person makes an entry from memoranda or information furnished by another, or two or more persons have otherwise coöperated in making an entry, the entry will be admissible in connection with the testimony of all the parties participating.[9] Indeed it is held that where the clerk who makes the entries has no knowledge of their correctness, but makes them as the items furnished by another, as for instance where entries are made by a bookkeeper from reports made by a foreman, it is essential that in addition to the oath of the party making the entry the party furnishing the items should testify to their correctness,[10] or that satisfactory

Information must be furnished in pursuance of duty.— It has been held to be a proper qualification of the rule admitting such evidence, that the entry must have been made in the ordinary course of business, and that it should not be extended so as to admit a mere private memorandum, not made in pursuance of any duty owing by the person making it, or when made upon information derived from another who made the communication casually and voluntarily, and not under the sanction of duty or other obligation. Form of books immaterial.— Where the book containing the entries against interest is shown to belong to the party, he will not be heard to object to the form of the book or the manner in which it is kept. Loewenthal v. McCormick, 101 Ill. 143; Barry v. Foyles, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 311, 7 L. ed. 157. See also Currier v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 31 N. H. 209. Thus a book kept by defendant in his business may be introduced against him, whatever the book may be called, and although it may in fact be a "mere blotter." Beyle v. Reid, 31 Kan. 113, 1 Pac. 264. So in McLellan v. Crofton, 6 Me. 307, it was held under whose direction[15] the entries were made. But unauthorized entries by a stranger or an agent will be inadmissible against the principal.[16] that a paper book in the handwriting of defendant's testator, containing accounts between himself and plaintiff's intestate, found among the intestate's papers, although mutilated and torn, is competent evidence, as admissions of defendant's testator against himself; and plaintiff is not bound to account for the mutilation, nor are the jury bound to infer that the part missing contained a settlement of the accounts. See also Bechtel's Case, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,204.

Book containing admissions and self-serving declarations.— If the adverse party calls for and introduces the party's book in evidence, all entries touching the subject are thus made evidence — the self-serving as well as the self-disserving entries. Dewey v. Hotchkiss, 30 N. Y. 497; Rowan v. Chenoweth, 49 W. Va. 287, 38 S. E. 544, 87 Am. St. Rep. 796. Y. 613, 32 N. E. 639. Thus where entries in a memorandum book have been admitted as being in the nature of admissions against the party, his entries in a journal or ledger which were not made contemporaneously with nor posted from the memorandum book are inadmissible in rebuttal of the entries on the memorandum book. (2) Partnership Books. Entries in partnership books, made in the regular course of business during the continuance of a firm, by either of the partners or their authorized clerks, are admissible evidence against and bind all the partners having access thereto in controversies to which a stranger is a party as well as in controversies between the partners themselves.[17]

(B) Against Adverse Party. The entries in a party's books of account are admissible as containing admissions by the adverse party, where the entries are made by the adverse party,[18] where they are made or read in his presence without objection on his part,[19] or where they have been used by the parties as the basis of their settlement of accounts[20] or their correctness has otherwise been assented right to make or direct entries therein. McKeen v. Providence County Sav. Bank, 23 R. I. 542, 54 Atl. 49.

The books of a bank, through the agency of which the parties have mutually conducted their business, are held admissible to show the state of their accounts between themselves, the bank acting in such case as the common agent of them both, and accordingly the books of the bank in which a plaintiff and defendant have kept their accounts are held competent to prove that a check given by plaintiff to defendant had been carried to the credit of the latter in the books of the bank, and that the money had thus come into the possession of the latter. Oliver v. Phelps, 21 N. J. L. 597 [affirming 20 N. J. L. 180]. But in Perrine v. Hotchkiss, 58 Barb. (N. Y.) 77, it was held that the books of a bank, kept by neither of the parties to an action, and relating solely to transactions between defendant and the bank, are not competent evidence between the parties to show the amount of paper which has been discounted by the bank for defendant and indorsed by plaintiff, and the number of notes so discounted and indorsed.

20. McDavid v. Ellis, 78 Ill. App. 381; Powers v. Hamilton, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 293; Hanson v. Jones, 20 Mo. App. 595. In an action by the promisee against the maker of a note, who sets up infancy as a defense, plaintiff, after proving that the note was given to balance an account standing on his books against defendant, may show, from his daybook and ledger, although they do not contain his original entries, the several articles of which the account was composed. Such evidence is competent for the purpose of showing an admission of defendant that he received the articles, but not for the purpose of showing that the articles were necessaries, or that they were charged at fair prices. to by the adverse party.[21] If the correctness of the entries is admitted they are admissible, although they are not original,[22] or although the items are not the subject of book charge under the shop-book rule,[23] or although the person making the entry is not produced as a witness.[24]

(iv) Entries by Third Persons Against Interest. If a person having peculiar means of knowing a fact makes a written entry of that fact, which is against his interest at the time, it is evidence of the fact as between third persons after his death if he could have been examined as to the fact in his lifetime.[25] It is not necessary that the entry should have been made at the time of the transaction.[26]

(v) Corroboration or Impeachment of Witness. Books of account or book entries generally are frequently admitted for the purpose of corroborating[27] or impeaching[28] a witness' testimony, although not supported by proof of a character to render them admissible as substantive evidence for the purpose of proving items of account or other contents.[29]

3. Memoranda — a. In General. Private memoranda may under certain conditions be used by a witness to refresh his recollection, and this according to the generally accepted rule, even in a case where the witness has no present recollection of the facts, if he recollects that when the memorandum was made he knew it to be true and hence can swear that it was correctly made; and under this rule the memorandum is according to many of the decisions allowed to go before the jury.[30] Memoranda introduced in cases where the witness had no present recollection of the fact, but is able to swear only to the correctness of the entries when made, have sometimes been referred to as independent evidence.[31] But in view of the language of other authorities this evidence seems properly to fall within the refreshing memory rule.[32] With this explanation it may be laid down as a general rule that mere private memoranda are inadmissible as independent evidence, that is, apart from oral testimony,[33] unless they form part of a transaction

Illustration.— Thus it has been held that a memorandum made by the parties to the transaction jointly, a portion having been written by one and a portion by the other, is admissible as part of the res gestæ. Bigelow v. Hall, 91 N. Y. 145. So where the maker and the holder of a promissory note had mutually compared memoranda, respectively made by them, of the part payments thereon, it was held that in an action thereon for the benefit of the estate of the deceased holder such memoranda of the maker circumstances showing an assent thereto by the parties, although not in itself a valid written contract, may be competent as substantive evidence tending to establish in connection with other evidence the terms of the contract.[37] If not made under the direction of both the parties or subsequently approved by them the memorandum will be inadmissible.[38]

Certificate of facts.— In Oakes v. Gill, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 442, it was held that a clerk of a religious corporation may make verified copies of the corporate records, but it is no part of his duty to certify facts, and his certificate cannot be received as evidence of facts. See also Tessmann v. Supreme Commandery of U. F., 103 Mich. 185, 61 N. W. 261.

Printed copies.— In a suit on a benefit certificate issued by an incorporated fraternal order, plaintiff's declaration averred generally, under section 126 of the Practice Act (2 Gen. St. 2554), the performance of all conditions precedent to recovery, and defendant's pleading specified, compliance with a law of the order, alleged to have been enacted after the issuing of the certificate as a condition precedent, the performance of which it intended to contest. It was held that such enactment could not be proved by the testimony of a member of the order that a printed book produced by him, in which such law was included, contained the laws of the order in force at a date stated. Herman v. Supreme Lodge K. of P., 66 N. J. L. 77, 48 Atl. 1000 [distinguishing Schubert Lodge No. 118 K. of P. v. Schubert Kranken Untersturzen Verein, 56 N. J. Eq. 78, 38 Atl. 347]. The Tennessee code, which provides that in actions between corporations and their stock-holders a copy of the proceedings of the board of directors and the subscription and other books of the company, certified by the secretary under the corporate seal, shall be evidence, applies to actions by the beneficiaries of a benefit insurance certificate against a benefit society; and hence a printed copy of the constitution and by-laws of such organization is improperly received in evidence in such an action, on the ground that it is not the best evidence. Page v. K. & L. of A., (Ch. App. 1900) 61 S. W. 1068. But it is held that the by-laws of an insurance company are sufficiently proved by printed copies attached to a policy of insurance and referred to by the policy and made a part of it to make them admissible where there is evidence to prove the policy. 5. Church Registers and Certificates. Under the rule admitting book entries made in the regular course of business, registers and certificates kept or issued by a clergyman or other proper officer, such as registers of marriages or deaths, have been held to be competent evidence.[49] So baptismal registers or certificates are admissible to show the fact and date of baptism,[50] but not to prove other facts, for example, the date of birth of the child except that he was born before the baptism,[51] or that he was baptized as the lawful child of the parents,[52] when these facts are in issue. But the date of baptism which is provable by the entry may with the aid of other evidence tending to fix the child's age at the time become material.[53]

6. Records of Secret Societies. As a general rule the records of a masonic lodge or other secret society which are not required by law to be kept are inadmissible, unless brought within some exception to the hearsay rule, to prove facts, such as the age of a member, which are susceptible of proof in the ordinary way.[54] But they have been held competent when offered to show not extraneous facts but the action of the body itself, and this although the society did not appear to have been incorporated.[55]

7. Reports of Commercial Agencies. The commercial "ratings" or other facts reported by a commercial agency are inadmissible against third persons who in no way participate in making or publishing the reports.[56]

8. Log-Books and Protests. A ship's log-book is by act of congress made

In Pennsylvania it has been held that examined copies of the books of an incorporated bank are inadmissible in evidence against any other than the bank without proof being first made as to who made the entries in the book, and that the proper witnesses to make such proof are the clerks by whom the entries were made, if to be found within the jurisdiction of the court, but if dead or out of the jurisdiction of the court, proof may be made of their handwriting. Sworn copy as secondary evidence.—Where it appeared that the secretary of a political convention had lost the original minutes and was unable to find them, and the copy of the minutes offered in evidence was according to the testimony of the secretary complete as to a question of adjournment, concerning which it was offered, it was held that the refusal to receive it in evidence was error. legal prima facie evidence in proof of desertion.[57] But apart from statute the rule has been laid down that the log-book is not proof per se of the facts therein stated,[58] at least where it is sought to be used in behalf of those by whom the entries are made.[59] It may be used, however, as evidence against those having a concern in writing or directing what should be contained therein.[60] In the same way the protests of the master of a vessel are not admissible as evidence of their contents for himself or his owners,[61] but may be evidence against them.[62]

Compliance with statute necessary.— The entry, however, must be a full compliance with the statute. Worth v. Mumford, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 1; Clutman v. Tunison, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,907, 1 Sumn. 373. Thus an entry that the seamen named "abandoned the ship" is not sufficient; that the seamen left the vessel without leave must be distinctly entered as a fact. Worth v. Mumford, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 1. So it must appear that the entry was made on the day of the desertion. Clutman v. Tunison, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,907, 1 Sumn. 373; The Phœbe v. Dignum, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,110, 1 Wash. 48. Entry in log-book referred to in deposition. — In Falconer v. Hanson, 1 Campb. 171, 10 Rev. Rep. 663, an entry in a log-book was received in evidence where it appeared that it had been referred to in a deposition affirming the truth of the entries.

Rule of admissibility governed by lex fori. — The admissibility or competency of evidence in a legal proceeding pertains to the remedy, and is governed by the lex fori, and therefore a clause in the British shipping act of 1854, making certain entries in the official log-book competent evidence in all courts, does not make them so in the courts of any other country. against the addressee where he fails to reply,[68] or replies only in part.[69] And so a letter or telegram may be evidence of a notice or demand,[70] or a refusal to rescind a contract, and the like.[71] And a letter, like other oral or written declarations, may be admissible to show the existence of a particular intention on the part of the writer at the time of writing whenever it is material to be proved.[72]

b. Admission of Correspondence in Entirety. Where letters or telegrams are offered in evidence by a party for the purpose of establishing a contract,[73] or to show admissions by the adverse party,[74] the latter, for the purpose of explaining the letters in evidence, may introduce or call for the production of the entire correspondence relevant or material to the transaction or question in issue. letter from himself to the adverse party which purports on its face to answer a letter from the adverse party, without producing the previous communication, or if the previous letter is lost or beyond his control, without showing this fact and then proving its contents.[76] But a party may give in evidence against the adverse party any letters of the latter containing admissions material to the questions in issue without putting in the whole correspondence between them,[77] at least where the letter offered in evidence as an admission is fairly self-explanatory.[78] So a reply is admissible as evidence of notice to the adverse party to whom it was addressed without producing the letter to which it referred.[79]

c. Authentication — (I) In General. To render a letter not in response to a letter previously sent to the alleged writer admissible in evidence, its authenticity must be established either by proof of the handwriting or by other proof establishing its genuineness; the mere fact that it purports to have been written by him is not sufficient.[80] To render letters admissible, it is not necessary that it be proved beyond a reasonable doubt that they were the letters of the alleged
