Recovery of vessel under claim of ownership.— A suit for the recovery of a vessel under a claim of ownership must be conducted as a suit in personam. Blanchard v. The Cavalier, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,508.

Repairs on domestic vessel.— A suit in personam lies for repairs furnished on a domestic vessel. Endner v. Greco, 3 Fed. 411.

Intervention by stipulation.— Where, before the institution of a suit in rem, the thing proceeded against by the libel had been deposited with or acquired by agents with full notice to them of the libellant's claim upon it, and on its arrest the agents intervened in the suit by stipulation and answered the libel at large, it was held that the suit might be treated as a suit in personam against them. Reed v. Hussey, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 525, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,646.

Suit transformed to one in rem.— On a libel in personam against a subcharterer to recover freight the respondent will be aland sometimes, where public policy forbids a proceeding in rem, a recovery may be had by a proceeding in personam.[40]

3. Suits In Rem — a. In General. A suit in rem is one brought against a vessel, cargo, or some thing or res as defendant, without process or prayer for relief against any person as defendant, and in which the owner of the property sued is not recognized until he comes in, claims, and defends.[41]

b. Necessity for Lien — (I) In General. A suit in rem is always founded upon a maritime lien, or a statutory lien in the nature of a maritime lien, to foreclose or enforce which is the object of the suit; and in the absence of such a lien the remedy in rem will not lie.[42]

(II) Causes Arising out of Contract. A proceeding in rem will not lie on a maritime contract unless a lien is annexed to such contract by law;[43] but where the law attaches a lien to the contract it may be enforced in rem.[44]

lowed, on petition, to pay the freight-moneys into court to abide the decision of a contest between the owner and charterer as to a claim for demurrage in which he is not interested, and a suit against him will be enjoined though the result will be to turn the proceeding into one in rem against the freight. A court of admiralty can only proceed in rem against the thing itself, or quasi in rem against the proceeds thereof. Carson v. Jennings, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 2, 2 L. ed. 531 [affirming 1 Wash. (U. S.) 129, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,464].

No personal judgment against owner.— Where a libel joins both the owner and the vessel as defendants, but contains no prayer for monition or personal judgment, and no monition is served, or attachment of property is made, to bring the owner in, the court cannot render a personal judgment against him when he appears by attorney merely to answer the libel in rem and defend the vessel. The Ethel, 66 Fed. 340, 30 U. S. App. 214, 13 C. C. A. 504. See also infra, V, Q, 4.

Effect of serving monition on owner.— Where the suit as begun is one in rem, the fact that the marshal serves the process issued against the vessel upon the owner, and fails to arrest the vessel, does not convert the suit into one in personam. The L. B. X., 88 Fed. 290.

Contract for carriage.— An action in rem will not lie for the breach of a contract of affreightment, no part of which has been performed (The Monte A., 12 Fed. 331), or for breach of an executory contract to carry a passenger on a particular vessel, where the vessel has never entered on the performance thereof, since the lien upon which the right to proceed in rem depends does not attach until the passenger has placed himself within the care and under the control of the master (The Eugene, 83 Fed. 222).

Refusal to make voyage.— A suit in rem will not lie against a vessel chartered to take a cargo or a certain voyage because her master and owners refused to take the cargo on board or to run the voyage. The Schooner General Sheridan, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 294, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,319.

Misrepresentation or concealment of facts. — In the case of a charter-party a suit in rem against the vessel is not maintainable for misrepresentation or concealment of facts by her master or owner in respect to her tonnage or capacity. The Eli Whitney, 1 Blatchf. (U. S.) 360, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,345.

General average loss.— There is no maritime lien created by a general average loss, and consequently admiralty has no jurisdiction in rem. Beane v. The Schooner Mayurka, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 72, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 1,175.

The wages of the master constitute no lien upon the vessel which can be enforced in rem. The Gate City, 5 Biss. (U. S.) 200, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,267; Bartlette v. The Viola, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 1,083, 3 Chic. Leg. N. 245; Willard v. Dorr, 3 Mason (U. S.) 91, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,679; The Ship Grand Turk, 1 Paine (U. S.) 73, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,683.

Mate suing as master.— A mate cannot sue in rem for services rendered as captain. The Schooner Leonidas, Olc. Adm. 12, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,262.

Money advanced on the personal credit of master or owner cannot be recovered by a libel in rem. Maitland v. The Brig Atlantic, Newb. Adm. 514, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 8,980.

(III) Causes Arising out of Tort. With but few exceptions there is a lien for a maritime tort which may be enforced in rem,[45] and damages for death by wrongful act may be recovered in such an action under a local law creating the right of action, where a lien is expressly created by such local law, but not otherwise.[46]

(IV) Recovery of Penalties. Sometimes provision is made by statute for a proceeding in rem to recover a statutory penalty.[47]

c. Necessity for Seizure of Property. It is held that an actual seizure of the property is necessary to give the court jurisdiction over it,[48] but it is not essential that the marshal shall continuously retain it in his custody,[49] and if a vessel is within the district at the time process is served, the court has jurisdiction though it departs before the libel is filed, and is seized on its subsequent return into the district.[50]

C. Joinder of Causes — 1. Proceeding In Rem and In Personam for Same Cause — a. In General. There is no abstract incompatibility between proceedings in rem and proceedings in personam which forbids them to be joined in one action when based on the same cause, if such joinder is calculated to advance the ends of substantial justice;[51] and so, where such joinder is not prohibited by the supreme court rules, the personal remedy and the remedy against the property may be sought in the same action.[52] Whether or not one proceeding shall be

Claim for wharfage.— A vessel using a wharf becomes liable for a reasonable compensation, and this charge, except when the vessel belongs in the same port with the wharf, may be enforced by a proceeding in rem in the district. Ex p. Easton, 95 U. S. 68, 24 L. ed. 373; The Canal-Boat Kate Tremaine, 5 Ben. (U. S.) 60, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,622.

Materialman's lien.— A materialman employed in building or repairing a domestic ship has a lien upon her as security for his payment, and may therefore proceed in rem against the vessel. The Selt, 3 Biss. (U. S.) 344, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,649.

Assault and battery.— Under Admiralty Rule 16, actions for damages for assaults must be brought in personam and not in rem (The Lyman D. Foster, 85 Fed. 987; The Miami, 78 Fed. 818; Smith v. The Ship Challenger, 2 Wash. Terr. 447, 7 Pac. 851), but where a seaman was bitten by a dog which was chained under a table in the cabin, it was held not to be a case of assault and battery within the meaning of the rule (The Lord Derby, 17 Fed. 265).

Injury by escape of steam.— The acts of congress confine the remedy in rem for injuries from injurious escape of steam to actions brought by passengers, and the remedy is in personam against the owners for such injuries done to others on board. Libellant not compelled to elect between remedies.— Where a libel is filed for a cause of action upon which both vessel and master may be together liable, the court will not make an order that the libellant elect between stayed until the remedy is exhausted in the other is a question for the discretion of the court, to be determined with reference to the convenient administration of justice;[53] but a failure of the respondent to object to a misjoinder until final hearing on appeal will operate to waive the objection.[54]

b. When Joinder Not Allowed by Admiralty Rules. In cases covered by the admiralty rules of the supreme court, proceedings in rem and in personam cannot be joined in the same libel, except where provision is made in the rules for such joinder.[55]

2. Joinder of Different Causes. A libellant may and should join in the same libel as many maritime causes of action as he may have against the defendant or res, whether founded on contract or tort, or both;[56] but separate and distinct causes cannot be joined against defendants not jointly liable.[57]

3. Consolidation of Actions. Where a vessel or other property is the defendant, and several persons are asserting distinct claims against or rights to it in separate proceedings before the same court, which cannot make a decree for one without affecting the claims or rights of the others, they all will be consolidated the remedy in rem and that in personam, nor that he submit to have either the arrest of the respondent or the attachment against the vessel vacated. The Zenobia, Abb. Adm. 48, 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,208.

Actions ex contractu and ex delicto.— Parties may join in one libel causes of action arising ex contractu and those arising ex delicto, where such causes are so united that the same evidence will apply to all. Borden v. Hiern, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 293, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,655.

Claims for wages and advances.— A seaman may recover both for wages and for money advanced to the ship's use in the same action, and, where the proceeding is in rem, may join with a co-libellant claiming wages only; but not where the proceeding is in personam. The Sloop Merchant, Abb. Adm. 1, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,434.

Claims for wages and damages for assault. It has been held that a seaman cannot join a claim for damages for an assault with one for wages in an action against the master (The Guiding Star, 2 Flipp. (U. S.) 596, 1 Fed. 347. Contra, Borden v. Hiern, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 293, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,655) or in an action in rem against the vessel (Pratt v. Thomas, 1 Ware (U. S.) 437, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,377). See also Davis v. Adams, 93 Fed. 977, wherein it was held that a libel for damages on the alleged ground that libellant was induced to visit a vessel by fraudulent pretenses, and there detained and compelled to go on a voyage, sounds in tort, and a recovery cannot be had thereunder for wages due the libellant for his services as seaman rendered under shipping-articles which he signed.

and tried together;[58] and the same will be done where the causes of action are of a like nature and involve substantially the same question, arising out of the same act or transaction, though against different vessels.[59]

4. SEVERANCE. Where claimants admit one of several causes of action, but deny others, the causes may be severed and judgment rendered upon the admitted cause, notwithstanding such severance destroys the right of appeal by reducing the amount in dispute.[60]

D. Venue. A libel in personam is not a "civil suit" within the meaning of the statute requiring actions to be brought in the district of defendant's residence.[61] A libel in rem may be prosecuted in any district in which the property may be apprehended,[62] and where a suit in rem has been instituted in a district court a petition by the owners to limit liability should be filed in the same district.[63]

E. Parties — 1. LIBELLANTS — a. Parties Entitled to Relief. The parties actually entitled to relief are the proper libellants in admiralty,[64] and a person lacking the capacity to proceed in his own name may sue by next friend.[65] If it appears Libel brought in wrong division.—Where a libel in rem is brought in the wrong division, the objections thereto being purely formal and it being probable that the case will be tried on issues of fact, a motion by respondent to transfer the cause to the right division should be granted (The Willamette, 53 Fed. 602); and the claimant, by appearing, securing the release of the vessel, and having the case transferred to another division, waives any objection on the ground that the suit was instituted in the wrong division (The Willamette, 70 Fed. 874, 44 U. District where liability arose.— A proceeding to limit the liability of a ship-owner is properly brought in the district where the stranding occurred out of which the liability arose, where the property which such owner seeks to abandon is within such district and no suit has been instituted in any other district. By surviving partner in firm-name.— The fact that proceedings are brought in the firm-name by the surviving partner is not a valid objection where it appears that the claimants, in dealing with the survivor, knew that after his copartner's death he continued to do business in the name of the firm. Byrnes v. The Rockaway, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,274.

65. Minors.— A minor may recover his wages as seaman upon a libel promoted by his father as next friend, where the father has agreed that the son may receive his own

from the libel that the libellant is not entitled to sue, the respondent may demur; but if the incapacity does not appear, but exists in fact, he must plead it in bar.[66]

b. Suit for Use of Another. In certain cases one person is permitted to sue for the use of another where he represents such other in some capacity connected with the transaction; as the owner for the insurers;[67] the master for the owner and others;[68] the carrier for the freight-owners;[69] the consignee for his principals;[70] or an assignee for the assignor.[71]

c. Persons Holding by Assignment or Subrogation. As a general rule persons holding claims by assignment are entitled to sue therefor in admiralty in their own names,[72] or to continue suits already begun by their assignors,[73] and the same is true of parties holding by subrogation.[74]

d. Joinder of Libellants. Parties whose interests or claims are based upon a cause of action common to all, though separate and distinct as between themselves, may unite as libellants, whether the claims arise out of contract or tort.[75] wages (Davis v. The Brig Seneca, Gilp. (U. S.) 34, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,651), and admiralty will protect the rights of the minor against the misconduct of such next friend (The Etna, 1 Ware (U. S.) 474, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,542).

When minor may sue in own name.— A minor may recover wages as a seaman in his own name when the contract was made personally with him and it does not appear that he has a parent, guardian, or tutor entitled to receive them (The Schooner David Faust, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 183, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,595) and in such action the respondent is not entitled to require the appointment of a guardian ad litem or next friend for the libellant (Wicks v. Ellis, Abb. Adm. 444, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,614).

Person unable to understand English language.— A person who, from incapacity of mind or other cause, cannot be made to understand the English language, cannot be a party to a sworn libel. e. Striking Out Libellant. The name of a libellant who has no interest in the suit may, on a proper application, be stricken from the record if it does not appear that the respondent will be deprived of any means of defense thereby.[77]

2. Defendants — a. In Proceedings In Personam. In a proceeding in personam all persons whose liability is joint only must be made defendants,[78] and where the liability is several only it must be enforced severally.[79] Where, however, as in case of a tort, the liability is both joint and several, the libellant may proceed against the wrong-doers either jointly or severally to recover his entire damages,[80] though, if he does not join all who may legally be joined in one action, but proceeds against them severally in different suits, he is not permitted to recover costs in more than one action.[81] If the libellant, by reason of certain facts alleged, is uncertain which of two defendants is liable to him for freight, he may sue them jointly and pray for alternative relief.[82]

b. In Proceedings In Rem. Where the proceeding is in rem and no personal judgment is sought, the non-joinder of some of the owners of the property attached is immaterial;[83] and where the attached property is released on a bond to abide the judgment, the omitted owners are not entitled to be made parties to

Same person libellant and respondent.— A joint action in personam cannot be maintained by several libellants constituting a firm of ship-builders, for repairs put on a vessel of which one of the firm is part-owner and is made a respondent with the other owners. 3. Death of Party Pending Action. An action in personam abates by the death of plaintiff or defendant, and must be revived in the name of his personal representative within a reasonable time;[85] but in an action in rem the death of claimant before trial, after filing his claim and answer defending against the libel, does not cause the suit to abate.[86]

F. Pleadings — 1. Requisites of Particular Pleading — a. The Libel — (I) In General — (A) Formal Requisites. The libel must be addressed to the court or the judge thereof,[87] and signed by the libellant or his agent.[88] It must show that the libellant is the party entitled to maintain the proceedings,[89] and that the defendant is the party liable;[90] but the property to be attached need not be specified in the libel,[91] and under a prayer for general relief damages may be recovered.[92]

(B) What Precision Requisite. The technical precision of common-law pleadings is not required of a libel in admiralty, and it is sufficient if it set forth substantially all the necessary facts;[93] but it must set forth the material Survival of actions.— It has been held that causes of action in admiralty for personal torts do not survive the death of the person injured (Crapo v. Allen, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 184, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,360), but the contrary has been held (The Sea Gull, Chase (U. S.) 145, 21 Fed. Cas. Libellant suing "for all other interests."— A libel for salvage, in the name of a British naval officer and the British consul, joining with him, "for all other interests," where the vessel rescued by the British naval vessel was sent home in charge of the officer, was held not fatally defective. J. Rep. 510.

90. Alleging defendant's ownership of vessel. — A libel in personam against the owners of a vessel for damages arising out of a collision is defective when it fails to aver that respondent was the owner of the vessel at the time of the collision. The Corsair, 145 U. S. 335, 12 S. Ct. 949, 36 L. ed. 727. See also Danace v. The Magnolia, 37 Fed. 367. Thorp v. Hammond, 12 Wall. (U. S.) 408, 20 L. ed. 419.

Party not named in prayer for relief.— Where a party proceeded against is named in the body of the libel, a decree secundum allegata et probata may be rendered against him, although he is not named in the prayer for relief. Nevitt v. Clarke, Olc. Adm. 316, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,138.

Charging defendants as common carriers.— Where the suit is in personam against the master or owners of the vessel to recover for injuries to goods, they must be charged in the libel as common carriers in order to render them liable as such carriers; but this is not necessary when the suit is in rem. Seller v. Steamship Pacific, 1 Oreg. 409.

(C) Necessity of Alleging Jurisdictional Facts. The libel must aver sufficient facts to show that the cause is one within the admiralty jurisdiction,[98] but it has been held unnecessary to aver that a vessel is engaged in navigation,[99] and the court will take judicial notice that the waters on which a contract was performed are navigable without an averment to that effect.[1]

(D) Exhibits. A libel founded on a charter-party or contract of affreightment should state that fact, and a copy of the charter-party or contract should be annexed to the libel.[2]

(E) Waiver of Objections. Objections to defects of form in a libel should be raised by special exceptions, else they are waived,[3] and if the exceptions in an

Omission of material facts.— An omission to state some facts which prove to be material, but which cannot have occasioned any surprise to the opposite party, will not be allowed to work any injury to libellant if the court can see there was no design on his part in omitting to state them. The Quickstep, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 665, 19 L. ed. 767.

3. Admiralty Rule 24.

Lack of precision and certainty.— Where a libel lacks precision and certainty in alleging facts, but is not excepted to in that respect, the court may dispose of a motion to vacate an attachment issued thereunder upon an as-answer are not insisted upon at the opening of the trial they will be considered as waived.[4]

(II) Information for Penalty or Forfeiture—(A) In General. In an information or libel[5] for a forfeiture or penalty for the violation of a statute the formality and technical precision of an indictment at common law are not required: it is sufficient if the offense be so set forth as to bring it clearly within the statute on which the information is founded,[6] and it is not essential that such pleading conclude "against the form of the statute."[7] The information must always show, however, with reasonable certainty, that there has been an act or omission violative of the statute.[8]

(B) Charging in Alternative. Stating a charge in the alternative is good if each alternative constitutes an offense under the statute,[9] and proof of the offense charged in either alternative will support the information.[10]

(III) Supplemental Libel. Matters occurring prior to the commencement of the suit may be set up by supplemental libel,[11] and when filed before the sumption of facts as broad as the libel will warrant, or as is claimed on behalf of libellant. Essler v. Worth, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,533*a*.

No averment of ownership in libellant.—On a libel for the non-delivery of goods, the want of averment of ownership in the libellant is waived where the point is not raised in any way in the answer. The Steamship Ville de Paris, 3 Ben. (U. S.) 276, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,942.

Misjoinder of causes.—The objection that a suit joins a libel in personam with a libel in rem should be made by exception to the libel before answer. The City of Carlisle, 39 Fed. 807, 5 L. R. A. 52.

Following language of statute.—An information pursuing the words of the statute is sufficient. U. S. v. The Brig Neurea, 19 How. (U. S.) 92, 15 L. ed. 531; The Merino, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 391, 6 L. ed. 118; The Emily, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 381, 6 L. ed. 116; The Idaho, 29 Fed. 187.

Need not anticipate defense.—In a libel for a seizure it is not necessary to state any fact that constitutes the claimant's defense, or a ground of exception to the operation of the law on which the libel is founded. The Brig Aurora v. U. S., 7 Cranch (U. S.) 382, 3 L. ed. 378.

Seizure of property.—An information for a forfeiture must allege the seizure of the property (U. S. v. One Raft of Timber, 5 Hughes (U. S.) 404, 13 Fed. 796; The Washington, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 101, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,221; The Schooner Silver Spring, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 551, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 12,858) and the place of such seizure (U. S. v. One Raft of Timber, 5 Hughes (U. S.) 404, 13 Fed. 796).

Intent to defraud the revenue.—In an information under the act of congress of 1796, c. 128, § 67, against goods on account of their differing in description from the contents of the entry, it is not necessary to allege an intention to defraud the revenue. Two Hundred Chests of Tea, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 430, 6 L. ed. 128.

Violation of embargo laws.—A libel against a vessel for violating the embargo laws need not state the particular character of the vessel. U. S. v. The Schooner Little Charles, 1 Brock. (U. S.) 347, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,612.

Unlading goods without permit.—In a libel under the act of congress of March 2, 1799, § 50, for unlading goods without a permit it is not necessary to state the time and place of importation nor the vessel in which it was made; an allegation that they were unknown being sufficient. Locke v. U. S., 7 Cranch (U. S.) 339, 3 L. ed. 364.

Vessel engaged in trade without license.—A libel under the act of congress of Feb. 28, 1793, § 32, providing for the forfeiture of a vessel employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, need not specify the particular trade in which the vessel was engaged at the time of the seizure. Supplemental libel in replication.—Where return-day of the process it becomes part of the pleadings which respondent is bound to answer without further notice.[12]

b. The Answer — (I) In General. Strict and technical formality is not required of the answer, but it must set forth fully, clearly, and explicitly the matters relied on,[13] otherwise an exception for insufficiency will lie to compel a further and better answer,[14] but if no exception is taken the reading of testimony cannot be objected to on the ground of the insufficiency of the answer.[15] Impertinent and irrelevant allegations will be stricken out on motion,[16] and where several averments are inconsistent and are not excepted to, the court will adopt that one which is least favorable to the pleader.[17] If matters of defense are anticipated in the libel a simple denial thereof in the answer is equivalent to an averment to the contrary.[18]

(II) Responsiveness to Allegations of Libel. The answer, even when made without oath,[19] must meet each material allegation of the libel with an admission, a denial, or a defense,[20] though a failure to notice an allegation does not admit it as truth, and it must nevertheless be proved.[21] It is not necessary, however, to answer specifically mere conclusions of law[22] or narrative statements in the libel alleging no damages and claiming no particular remedy,[23] and the defendant

the libellant relies on new matter in avoidance of the allegations of the answer he should put it on the record by a supplemental libel, to which the respondents should answer. Taber v. Jenny, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 315, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,720; Gladding v. Constant, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 73, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,468.

When allowed to stand as original libel.— A libel fatally defective is not helped by a supplemental libel setting up subsequent matters; but a supplemental libel may, for cause, be allowed to stand as an original libel as of that date. Henderson v. Three Hundred Tons of Iron Ore, 38 Fed. 36.

Insufficient averment of mutual agreement. — An averment that coal was furnished with "the intention, expectation, and anticipation" that the price therefor should be deducted from certain freights is not equivalent to an allegation that such was the mutual agreement of the parties. Particular defense by plea or answer.— When the respondent wishes to avail himself of any particular matter of defense he must present it with proper averments in his answer, or by plea. The William Harris, 1 Ware (U. S.) 373, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,695.

Answer after overruling of plea.— A plea to a libel which sets up no matter in defense is substantially a demurrer, and when such plea is overruled it is in the discretion of the court to allow an answer to be filed or to enter a decree at once for the damages claimed. The Sea Gull, Chase (U. S.) 145, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,578.

Insufficient answer.— An answer is insufficient which admits some of the averments of the libel, but concludes: "He denies the other allegations of the fourth article, as therein alleged, and refers to the allegations of the eighth article of the answer;" such eighth article being a narrative somewhat different from the libellant's. Virginia Home Ins. Co. v. Sundberg, 54 Fed. 389.

Respondent "ignorant" of matter alleged. — An allegation that the respondent is "ignorant" of a matter alleged in the libel is, it seems, sufficient. The City of Salem, 7 Sawy. (U. S.) 477, 10 Fed. 843.

Effect of omission where testimony conflicting.— The fact that the answer in a collision case, when put in, did not deny the averment of the libel that the tack was properly beat out, is to be considered on a conflict of testimony on that point, even though the answer was allowed to be amended on the hearing by inserting such a denial. is not required to answer an allegation where by so doing he would expose himself to a punishment, penalty, or forfeiture.[24]

(III) Setting Up New Matter. When the answer sets up matter in avoidance of the allegations of the libel it must admit such allegations,[25] at least to a reasonable intendment,[26] but new matter constituting a defensive allegation should be articled and pleaded separately and not blended with the response to an allegation of the libel.[27]

(IV) Setting Up Matter in Abatement. Matter in abatement may be set up along with an answer to the merits.[28]

(V) As Intervening or Cross Libel. A mere answer cannot be made to serve the purpose of an intervening or cross libel, where no process is prayed for or issued against the libellant or the vessel.[29]

c. The Reply. No reply is allowed to an answer in admiralty, even though it sets up new matter, such matter being considered as denied by the libellant;[30] but the libellant may amend his libel so as to confess and avoid, or explain, or add to the new matter set forth in the answer, and the defendant must then answer such amendments.[31]

2. Interrogatories. The libellant may require the defendant and any garnishee to answer on oath all interrogatories propounded by him at the close of the libel touching the allegations thereof,[32] and the defendant may also require the libellant to answer in like manner any interrogatories propounded to him regarding any matters charged in the libel or set up in the answer by way of defense.[33] But all interrogatories are subject to exceptions on the ground that the answering thereof will expose the party answering to a prosecution or punishment for crime, or to a penalty or forfeiture of property for a penal offense.[34]

Previous to Admiralty Rule 51, which was promulgated in 1854, it was the practice to allow a reply to the answer. See The Mary Jane, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 390, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,215; The Infanta, Abb. Production of papers.— Where a paper has been intrusted to libellant for the benefit of both parties, the court, on motion, will order its production before answer (The Voyageur de la Mer, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 372, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 17,025). But an inspection of documents or letters not in issue cannot be obtained by means of interrogatories (Havermeyers, etc., Sugar Refining Co. v. Compania Transatlantica Espanola, 43 Fed. 90).

When to be propounded.—Under Admiralty Rule 23, which requires the libellant's interrogatories to be propounded "at the close of the libel," the libellant may not, of course, propound interrogatories to the claimant after the filing of the answer. But he may apply for leave to amend his libel, and add at the close of the amended libel the desired interrogatories. The Edwin Baxter, 32 Fed. 296.

3. EXCEPTIONS. Wherever a pleading, report, or proceeding is insufficient, irregular, or objectionable it may be excepted to by the opposite party.[35] The exception should be interposed on the return-day of the process or the day appointed for answering,[36] and while strict technical formality is not required, yet it must state in clear and definite terms the particular ground on which it is based.[37] A hearing on an exception must be determined on the pleadings,[38] but facts judicially known to the court may be brought before it in an exceptive allegation attached to exceptions.[39]

4. VERIFICATION. In admiralty, verification is usually required, whatever may be the form of the pleading, whether it be a libel,[40]

In La Bourgogne, 104 Fed. 823, the court said: "But the mere loss of its [petitioner's] right to a limitation of liability under this statute, through proof of 'privity' with the cause of the damage, would not be of itself such a 'forfeiture' as to exempt the petitioner from answering interrogatories, or from compulsory testimony as a witness. The exemption can only be based upon the liability to such penalties or forfeitures as may be the subjects of a penal or criminal proceeding. See U. S. Const. Amendm. V; U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 860."

35. Effect of exception.— Exceptions to a pleading in admiralty have the effect of a demurrer, and also that of a motion to make the pleading more definite and certain. Quinn v. The Steamboat Transport, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 86, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,516.

In collision cases, exceptions to pleadings are permitted only when made in good faith for the sole purpose of obtaining the full statement of facts which the law requires. The Intrepid, 42 Fed. 185.

Impertinence and insufficiency.—Exceptions to an answer for insufficiency and impertinence are taken for entirely different causes, and therefore they cannot be taken at the same time. The Whistler, 8 Sawy. (U. S.) 232, 13 Fed. 295.

Exception with several specifications.— When exceptions to an answer are drawn with several specifications the failure to sustain any specification is fatal to the exception. The Intrepid, 42 Fed. 185.

Assumption that exception properly taken. — Where, after the argument of exceptions to a libel, a brief is filed in which for the first time the point is made that the facts set up in the exceptions cannot be thus raised, but are available only by answer, the court will consider the questions presented upon the assumption, made by both parties in the argument, that such facts were properly presented. Specifying line and page.—Exceptions should briefly but clearly specify by line and page the points excepted to. The Dictator, 30 Fed. 699.

An exception for irrelevancy, taken to a pleading which is not irrelevant, but is insufficient only, will be overruled. The Elizabeth Frith, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 195, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,361.

Where answer responsive to libel.— Where an answer is not full, explicit, and distinct as to each separate allegation of the libel, exceptions for insufficiency will lie to compel a further and better answer; but if the answer is responsive no exceptions will lie to it on the ground that it is not a defense to the suit, whether the matter be impertinent or not. 38. Prince Steam-Shipping Co. v. Lehman, 39 Fed. 704, 5 L. R. A. 464.

Waiver of exceptions.— Exceptions in an answer will be deemed to have been waived if not determined before proof is taken at the trial. Aumach v. The Queen of the South, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 657*a*.

39. The Seminole, 42 Fed. 924.

But unless the rules of the court in which the action is brought require the libel to be verified, it seems that verification is unnecessary. The J. R. Hoyle, 4 Biss. (U. S.) 234, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,557; Coffin v. Jenkins, 3 Story (U. S.) 108, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,948. See also Benedict Adm. (3d ed.) § 413.

Failure to raise objection in time.— After the rejection of a motion to dismiss proceedings in a libel, a second application on the ground that the libel was not verified will not be sustained. Such objection was presumptively known to counsel at the time of the first application, and, not having been embodied in that motion, could not be raised subsequently. Nelson v. Bell, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,101*a*.

The libellant's answer to interrogatories propounded by the defendant must be on oath. Admiralty Rule 32.

Omission of libellant to sign may be remedied by amendment and will not be considered after judgment. Hardy v. Moore, 4 Fed. 843.

Omission of subscription by clerk.— It may be shown, in opposition to a motion to set aside the proceeding for want of verification of the libel, that the oath was in fact regularly and duly administered, though the clerk's name was not subscribed. Nelson v. Bell, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,101*a*.

Omission of notary's seal.— In The Tug E. W. Gorgas, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 460, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,585, it was held that a notary's seal was not necessary to a due verification of a libel claim,[41] or answer.[42] Where a libel is verified by an attorney in fact for the libellant, his authority to act need not appear, but may be established when called in question.[43]

5. Amendments — a. In General. In admiralty the power to allow amendments is very broad, and where a party shows merits he will nearly always be permitted to amend his pleadings in matters of substance as well as of form,[44] though the court will sometimes impose conditions,[45] and the matter is one resting in the sound judicial discretion of the court, and leave will not be granted to amend where the application is without equity or its allowance would prejudice the opposite party.[46]

b. Time of Amendment. The court can, at discretion, allow the pleadings to be amended at any stage of the cause prior to a final decree,[47] and sometimes leave to amend will be granted on appeal.[48] sworn to before him, and that its absence was at most only an irregularity which could not be taken advantage of after decree in another proceeding before another court.

Amended libel.— Where the vessel is seized under a libel and released on stipulation, an amended libel thereafter filed, when the libellants are beyond the jurisdiction of the court, need not be verified. The Marion, 79 Fed. 104.

Filing amendment.— A writing should be filed containing the matters of amendment as a distinct proceeding in the case under Admiralty Rule 24, but such writing may extend to a new draft of the libel. Comings v. The Ida Stockdale, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,052, 22 Pittsb. Leg. J. (Pa.) 9.

Costs of amendment as to form.— Amendments of mere form, not going to the merits of the case and not of such a character as to prejudice the respondent, will not entitle him to costs. Olsen v. Schooner Edwin Post, 6 Fed. 314.

Waiver of objections.— While a court of admiralty has no power to permit a libel to be amended by striking out the name of a sole libellant and substituting another in its place, any objection to such an amendment is waived by proceeding in the trial without objecting. Remanding case for amendment.— Where the pleadings in admiralty are so deficient that the appellate court cannot properly apply the evidence in the record or justly determine the rights of the parties, there being no apparent design to suppress the facts, the court will set aside the decree below and remand the case for the filing of amended pleadings and taking additional evidence. c. Of Libel — (I) In General. It is always within the discretion of the court to allow the libel to be amended as to matters either of form or of substance,[49] even though the liability of sureties be affected thereby.[50]

(II) Change in Parties. The libel may be amended as to the parties by changing the character in which the libellant sues,[51] or by dismissing some of the libellants;[52] but a sole libellant cannot be stricken out and another substituted in his place.[53]

(III) Change in Form of Proceeding. In cases where actions in rem and in personam may be joined in one libel, a libel in rem may be amended so as to call for a personal judgment;[54] but where the joinder of such actions is improper an amendment changing the suit in rem to one in personam is not permissible.[55]

(IV) Introducing New Cause of Action. An entirely new cause of action not germane to that presented in the original libel cannot be added by amendment.[56]

Information — Inserting other offenses.— The United States, upon finding evidence of violations of the revenue laws committed by a vessel during the same period as those for which she has already been libeled, may take advantage of such discovery by amending the libel (The Haytian Republic, 57 Fed. 508). But an amendment by inserting a new substantive offense will not be allowed where the statute of limitations has run against it (The Schooner Harmony, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 123, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,081).

d. Of Answer. An amendment of the answer in a matter of substance will be allowed with great caution and only under extraordinary circumstances,[57] and an application will be denied where its allowance would work a hardship on the opposite party.[58]

6. Pleadings and Proof. While the technical rules of common-law pleading do not prevail in admiralty, yet there must be a substantial agreement between the pleadings and proof, and no evidence is admissible except such as applies to matters put in issue by the pleadings.[59] Thus a libellant cannot introduce evidence in support of a matter not put in issue by the pleadings;[60] nor can a defendant prove a defense not alleged in his answer,[61] as, for instance, a defense in the nature of a counter-claim.[62] But technical variances or departures in the pleadings, not operating to the surprise of the opposite party, will be disregarded.[63] Thus, in an action on a contract, a variation between the contract and the pleadings and proof will not defeat the action where substantial justice can be done.[64] Evidence of special damage may be given under a general allegation.[65]

G. Claim and Intervention — 1. Claimant and Intervener Distinguished. A claimant is a person who assumes the position of a defendant and demands the redelivery to himself of the property arrested, while an intervener is one who merely seeks the protection of his interest in such property, or the payment of his claim in the ultimate disposition of the case, without demanding a redelivery of the property.[66]

2. Claim — a. In General. In an action in rem a party desiring to appear and defend must file a claim to the property libeled,[67] averring the claimant's interest under oath[68] in a direct and issuable form, and not by way of recitals.[69] Where a claimant has been guilty of laches in failing to intervene until after judgment pro confesso and order of sale, he will be required to pay libellant's costs as a condition of opening the decree.[70]

Cross-claims for breach of oral agreement. — On a libel to recover a balance due for repairs made to a tug under a written contract, a cross-claim for damages founded upon the claimed breach of an extrinsic oral agreement cannot be considered when neither the answer nor the cross-libel sets up that the writing did not embody the entire contract. Any evidence which may have crept into the case in respect to such supposed oral agreement is irrelevant and inadmissible. The Bertha, 91 Fed. 272, 62 U. S. App. 437, 33 C. C. A. 509.

In The Kendal, 56 Fed. 237, a stevedore's libel for services in loading a vessel alleged that they were rendered at the master's request, and that therefore there became due the sum demanded. There was no allegation that the services were reasonably worth that sum. It was held that this language did not necessarily import an implied contract and a claim on quantum meruit, and there was no variance when the proof showed an express contract.

Where no question raised as to terms of contract.— Where a motion to dismiss a libel is made without objection, and the charter-party is presented to the court and commented on by counsel, no question being raised as to its terms, and is also referred to in the answer to the interrogatories, libellants are not entitled to have the question determined according to the allegations of the libel rather than the provisions of the charter-party. The Serapis, 36 Fed. 707.

Contract in name of agent—Action by principal.— A charter-party under seal, made out in the name of a person who acted merely as agent for another, without stating that fact, is admissible in evidence on a libel for breach of contract brought by the principal. b. Who May Claim. The claimant is an actor, and is entitled to go before the court in that character only where he has the legal or equitable title to the property arrested, or a proprietary interest therein;[71] but an objection that the claimant has no such interest must be raised before the hearing upon the claim and answer.[72]

3. Intervening Libels and Petitions — a. Under Rule 34. Where a vessel has been arrested and is in custody under a libel, or where her proceeds are in court, all other persons holding maritime liens enforceable in the admiralty against such vessel may file intervening libels in the pending case against the vessel, with a prayer that process issue thereon, only in case a stipulation is filed for the release of the vessel.[73] But intervention is allowed only where the vessel is still in cus-

He must have rights in the vessel itself, that is, an ownership either general or special in the property, or such a claim as operates directly upon it by way of a lien, statutory or maritime."

Prior attaching creditor.— A creditor who has attached the thing in a suit against the owner before the seizure may intervene. The Mary Anne, 1 Ware (U. S.) 99, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,195; The Louisetta, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 307, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,535.

When a vessel is arrested by a lien creditor and has not been delivered on stipulation, all other such creditors may intervene by summary petition without having the vessel arrested again, and have their claims allowed. The Young Mechanic, 3 Ware (U. S.) 58, 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,182.

In a petitory or possessory suit materialmen

tody or has been sold and the proceeds paid into court; and it is too late to intervene after the vessel has been released on bond.[74] An objection to the right of the party to intervene must be taken before the hearing, else it will be regarded as waived.[75]

b. Under Rule 43. Where the proceeds are in the registry of the court, intervening libels may be filed against them by lienors, and persons holding liens not independently enforceable in admiralty may file petitions in the pending case for the allowance and payment of their claims out of the surplus after first satisfying maritime claims in full.[76]

H. Set-Off, Recoupment, and Counter-Claim — 1. Setting Up by Answer. It is generally held that no jurisdiction exists in admiralty to allow the set-off of independent claims[77] or claims involving different parties,[78] but defendant may set up as a defense in his answer any matters of set-off, recoupment, or counter-claim arising out of the cause of action stated in the libel, and involving only the same parties.[79] When thus set up defensively by answer the counter-claim or set-cannot intervene to enforce a lien which they may have upon the vessel. The Taranto, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 170, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,751.

Insufficient interest.— A petition to intervene and contest a suit in rem should not be granted where the petitioner shows no interest in the res, but is concerned in the result only by virtue of his having agreed to indemnify the claimants. The Steamship Idaho, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 272, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,996.

Libel for forfeiture.— A person who has acquired a lien on a vessel by attachment may intervene on a subsequent libel of the vessel for a forfeiture, and contest such forfeiture. He is not obliged to wait until after decree to file his petition against the proceeds, as a decree against the vessel would annihilate his claim. The Mary Anne, 1 Ware (U. S.) 99, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,195.

Necessity of passing upon claim.— Before one can be admitted as an intervener under Admiralty Rule 34, his claim must be passed upon by the court (The Clara A. McIntyre, 94 Fed. 552), and the court may impose terms before admitting him (The America, 56 Fed. 1021).

Exorbitant demand for damages.— The court will, on a summary application, relieve against an exorbitant demand for damages in a libel, and a claimant who has given bonds for the full amount of such claim is therefore not entitled to set off against libellants' damages the amount paid to the stipulators as compensation for signing his stipulation for value. Enforcing claim for contribution.— Where the owner of the cargo recovers his whole damage from one of two vessels in fault, the vessel sued may set off in another suit between the owners of the two vessels, tried at the same time, the one half of the damage to the cargo which ought to be paid by the other vessel. The Canima, 17 Fed. 271. See also The Hercules, 20 Fed. 205.

Facts not constituting set-off.— In a suit by an assignee to recover freight earned under a charter-party, a claim, set up in the off can only go to diminish or extinguish libellant's demand, and no decree for an excess can be rendered for defendant.[80]

2. SETTING UP BY CROSS-LIBEL — a. In General. Whenever a respondent has a claim against the libellant arising out of the same cause of action, he may file a cross-libel thereon and recover a decree which is set off against the decree in favor of the libellant,[81] and he may also recover any excess over the libellant's claim;[82] but this is allowed only where defendant's claim arises out of the cause of action on which the libel is founded.[83]

b. Security Required of Original Libellant. When a cross-libel is filed, whether in rem or in personam,[84] the original libellant is required to give security in the usual form and amount to respond in damages as claimed in such cross-libel, unless the court shall otherwise direct; and proceedings on the original libel will be stayed until such security is filed.[85] Such security should be required as well answer, for coal, which it is alleged was furnished by defendant to libellant's assignor, after the making of the charter-party, "solely in reliance on the said contract of affreightment, and with the intention, expectation, and anticipation" that the price of such coal would be retained from the freight earned under such contract, but without alleging any agreement to that effect, does not constitute a set-off which can be entertained by a court of admiralty, the rule permitting a set-off for advances made upon the credit of the particular debt or demand sued on being limited to cases where there was an agreement that they should be so paid. Extrinsic understandings or agreements.— On a libel to recover a balance due for repairs on a tug under a written contract, a cross-claim for damages, founded upon the alleged breach of extrinsic oral understandings or agreements, cannot be considered when neither the answer nor the cross-libel sets up that the writing did not embody the entire contract. Any evidence in respect to such oral agreements is irrelevant and inadmissible. The Bertha, 91 Fed. 272, 62 U. S. App. 437, 33 C. C. A. 509.

Must be between same parties.— It is not the office of a cross-libel to enforce a new subject-matter introduced into the litigation by strangers to the original suit, and thus create a new libel. Admiralty Rule 53 clearly indicates that parties other than the original parties cannot be joined either as libellants or respondents in a cross-libel. The Ping-On, 7 Sawy. (U. S.) 483, 11 Fed. 607.

Original libel in personam — Attachment of vessel.— Admiralty Rule 53, requiring security from the respondent in a cross-libel for a counter-claim arising out of the same transaction as the original libel, applies to a case in which the original libel was in personam, but the vessel to which the suit relates was attached. The proceeding is then in effect in rem. Lochmore Steamship Co. v. Hagar, 78 Fed. 642.

Where libel by master instead of owners.— The fact that suit to recover damages for the sinking of a vessel by collision is instituted by the master instead of by the owners does not withdraw the case from the application of Admiralty Rule 53, requiring the giving of security by the libellant to respond in damages as claimed in a cross-libel; nor should the court be influenced, in requiring such security, where the libeled vessel is in custody as where she has been released on bond or stipulation;[86] but the cross-libellant must act promptly, and a motion for security comes too late after the witnesses have been summoned and the case is ready to proceed.[87]

I. Process and Appearance — 1. In General — a. Process. When a libellant has filed his libel and stipulation for costs, the clerk issues the process or writ prayed for to the marshal, for execution and return in accordance with the principles, rules, and usages of admiralty courts.[88] Defects in the process or service may be waived by failure to take advantage of them seasonably;[89] and errors of form may be amended or corrected by the court.[90] If execution or service cannot be made by the return-day an alias writ may issue to the marshal.[91]

b. Appearance. By appearing generally and answering to the merits a respondent waives objections to the process and is bound by the decision in the cause.[92] And so, where the corporate owners of a vessel seized in a proceeding in rem voluntarily appear as claimants, though under the wrong name, they are parties to the suit, and no objection can be taken to the decree for want of process against them.[93] But a general appearance in an action in rem is limited by the nature of the action and the property seized.[94]

by the fact that the libellant is individually unable to furnish it. Old Dominion Steamship Co. v. Kufahl, 100 Fed. 331.

Insufficient excuse for not giving security. — An objection by the respondent in a cross-suit to give security, on the ground that he cannot do so "without serious embarrassment to his business, and great expense and sacrifice," is insufficient. The Steam-Ship Zodiac, 5 Fed. 220.

Seizure under invalid warrant of arrest.— Where a release bond is given after seizure of a vessel under an invalid warrant of arrest, the claimant being then ignorant of such invalidity, the recital in such bond that the claimant and his surety personally appeared and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction

2. In Suits In Personam — a. Monition. The mesne process in a suit in personam may be by a simple monition in the nature of a summons to appear and answer to the suit,[95] and where this is the case the marshal makes service on defendant by delivering to him a copy of the monition.[96]

b. Arrest of the Person. Another form of process provided by the admiralty rules for such suits is a warrant of arrest of the person,[97] and a respondent properly arrested under such process must remain in custody until he gives bond or stipulation to satisfy the decree against him.[98] But imprisonment for debt on process from admiralty courts has now been abolished in all cases where, by the laws of the state in which the court is held, imprisonment for debt has been abolished on similar or analogous process issuing from a state court.[99]

c. Attachment. Where the respondent in a suit in personam cannot be found within the district by the officer, his appearance may be compelled by attaching property belonging to him within the jurisdiction of the court;[1] but such attach-of the court is not a waiver of the illegality and does not operate as an appearance in the suit. The Berkeley, 58 Fed. 920.

No personal judgment against owner.— Where a libel against both the vessel and its owner contains no prayer for monition and personal judgment, and no service of monition or attachment of property is made on the owner, his appearance to answer the libel in rem gives the court no jurisdiction to enter a personal judgment against him. Agent of foreign corporation.— In Christie v. Davis Coal, etc., Co., 92 Fed. 3, it was held that where a foreign railroad company maintained an office within the district where a portion of the regular business of the company was conducted by a local agent in making rates for through freight and procuring business contracts, service of process upon said local agent was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction for the purpose of making the corporation a third party defendant, upon a petition on the analogy of Admiralty Rule 59.

97. Admiralty Rules 2, 3.

Security required.— On a libel against the master and two mates of a vessel for an assault and battery upon libellant by the two mates, who are not in the jurisdiction, where there is no evidence that the master knew of the mates' intention to assault libellant or could have prevented it, an order of arrest will not be issued without the security usually required in such cases. Discharge of respondent.— Where a libellant procured the arrest of respondent in a suit brought in a district different from that in which they both resided, which was already in litigation between the parties in the courts of the state in which they resided, it was held that respondent should be discharged from the arrest (Martin v. Walker, Abb. Adm. 579, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,170). But a motion to discharge respondent from arrest on the ground that libellant has no legal cause of action will not be granted where the evidence read upon the motion in behalf of the respective parties is contradictory as to the merits (Wicks v. Ellis, Abb. Adm. 444, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,614).

Foreign corporation.— The district courts of the United States, as courts of admiralty, may award attachments against the property

ment is authorized only where the respondent cannot be found after a reasonable search,[2] and where the officer arrests the person he cannot at the same time attach the property.[3] It has been held also that an attachment is not justified where the respondent is within the district, but cannot be arrested because of a state law abolishing imprisonment for debt.[4] On the appearance of respondent the attachment will be discharged, but if there be no appearance the property will be held until the final disposition of the case.[5]

d. Garnishment. If respondent cannot be found, his effects and credits in the hands of third persons may be reached by garnishment.[6] In order to bring the garnishee into court he must be served with citation or notice calling upon him to appear and answer,[7] and after this has been done it becomes the right and duty of the garnishee to put in an answer.[8] If, after being properly served, the garnishee make default, execution may issue against the effects and credits of the principal in his hands, or he may be compelled to answer by compulsory process; and the court may in its discretion allow him to answer upon terms.[9]

3. In Suits In Rem — a. In General. The usual process in proceedings in rem is by warrant of arrest of the ship, goods, or other thing to be arrested,[10] which generally contains also a monition to all interested parties to appear and show cause.[11] On the issuance of such process the marshal is required to take

Must be named in writ.— The process will be set aside after service as to garnishees not named in the writ. Trask v. Pelletier, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,146.

Sufficient notice.— Personal service on the garnishees of a process containing a clause of foreign attachment, and a notice of what the process demands, and for what cause, and of the time and place when the garnishees must appear and answer, was held to be a sufficient attachment of any credits and effects of respondent in their hands. Sufficiency of warrant.— A warrant authorizing a marshal to take possession of a vessel must bear teste in the name of the judge of the court from which it issues and be under the seal of such court; but a warrant is not exceptionable on the ground that it comes from the judge in contradistinction to the court. the property into his possession for safe custody,[12] though it is not always necessary to take actual possession.[13] Notice of the seizure should be given by publication.[14] On the return-day the marshal must return the warrant stating what has been done under it.[15]

b. Damages for Wrongful Arrest. The arrest and detention of a vessel by legal process in a suit in rem which, although unfounded, is free from malice or bad faith on the part of libellant, will not entitle the claimant to damages.[16]

4. What Property Subject to Process. All appurtenances, boats, tackle, apparel, machinery, or other apparatus or appliances used on board a vessel when the lien of libellant attaches, constitute a part thereof, and should be seized by the marshal although they may be stored on shore or otherwise separated from the vessel when suit is brought.[17] But property of the government in the public

12. Admiralty Rule 9.

Property in custody of state officer.— A marshal's return stating a seizure of the vessel, but that at such time the vessel was in the custody of a state sheriff, does not imply such seizure as to give the court jurisdiction. The practice in such cases is to await the termination of the custody of the state sheriff. The Steamer Circassian, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 128, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,721; The Julia Ann, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 382, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,577. A sheriff's levy under an attachment is terminated by an order of the state court appointing a receiver of the debtor; and a seizure by the marshal, then in possession, with the sheriff's consent, under admiralty process, becomes legal. The Ferryboats Roslyn and Midland, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 119, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,068.

13. Snow v. One Hundred and Eighty and Three Fourths Tons of Scrap Iron, 11 Fed. 517.

Property already in marshal's custody.— Where a vessel is in the custody of the marshal, his receipt of a warrant of arrest in another suit, with intent to levy it, is a constructive levy, notwithstanding that he returns the warrant "withheld." The Haytian Republic, 60 Fed. 292.

Property in custody of collector.— Where a cargo, libeled for freight, is in the custody of the collector, the service of the monition on him by the marshal, by exhibiting the original process and leaving a copy thereof, is a sufficient caption of the res to give the court jurisdiction to order a sale thereof subject to the claims of the United States for duties and expenses. Two Hundred and Fifty Tons of Salt, 5 Fed. 216.

14. Admiralty Rule 9; Benedict Adm. (3d ed.) § 434.

Personal service equivalent to publication. — In proceedings in rem against a vessel, personal service on the owner dispenses with the usual publication. Henning v. Steamer St. Helena, 5 La. Ann. 349.

15. Benedict Adm. (3d ed.) § 434; The Steamer Circassian, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 128, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,721, wherein it was held that the marshal, being responsible for the execution of the process put into his hands, should be left free to state what he did with it subject to that responsibility.

Return not importing seizure.— To process issued in a suit in rem the marshal made return: "November 3, 1875, attached the steam tug Anna P. Dorr, her tackle, etc., by serving a copy of this writ, personally, on John Carse, part owner of same, and by serving November 5, 1875, a copy of this writ at residence of Captain E. F. Christian on wife." It was held that the return did not import a seizure of the tug. Brennan v. Steam-Tug Anna P. Dorr, 4 Fed. 459.

Conclusiveness as to place of seizure.— An unnecessary statement in the marshal's return as to the place of seizure of a vessel in a suit in rem is not conclusive of the court's jurisdiction over the res, and it may be shown by testimony, under a plea to the jurisdiction, that the seizure was in fact made outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court. The Lindrup, 70 Fed. 718.

16. The Wasco, 53 Fed. 546; Portland Shipping Co. v. The Alex. Gibson, 44 Fed. 371; Thompson v. Lyle, 3 Watts & S. (Pa.) 166.

Upon a tender of the accrued costs by a libellant on the voluntary dismissal of his libel the court will not, upon application of the claimant, inquire into damages caused him by an unfounded arrest of the ship. The Brig Oriole, Olc. Adm. 67, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,573.

Seizure without order of court.— But a libellant who procures the seizure and detention of vessels for the purpose of enforcing an alleged lien against them without an order of the court, when, on the facts stated in his libel, he has no lien, is liable in damages to the owners, even though he acted in good faith, as an attachment issues as of course in such cases on the filing of the libel, and a special order of the court is not required. Briggs Excursion Co. v. Fleming, 40 Fed. 593.

Undivided interest.— Proceedings in rem cannot be instituted against the undivided interest of an owner in the vessel. Manhattan F. Ins. Co. v. The Schooner C. L. Breed, 1 Flipp. (U. S.) 655, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,021.

Property seized by collector of customs.— Where goods have been seized by the collector of customs for duties, a constructive seizure may be made by the marshal by serving the collector with a copy of the process and giving notice to the warehouseman; and thereupon the court may proceed to decree a sale service, or in the possession of an officer of the government, is exempt from seizure;[18] and the same is true of property owned by a city and devoted to the service of the public.[19] The question of exemption must be raised by claim and answer, and not by motion,[20] and the burden of proof is upon the party claiming the exemption.[21]

J. Disposition of Property Pending Suit. Property arrested on process from an admiralty court is, in contemplation of law, in the custody of the court and cannot be withdrawn except by some person who shall establish a title to it;[22] and if such property be taken from the officer in whose custody it is, its return will be enforced by summary process.[23] Where no one appears to make claim, the court will retain possession of the property for a year and a day;[24] but if it be perishable in nature or be deteriorating in value it will be sold and the proceeds brought into court to abide the event.[25] On the dissolution of an attachment the marshal should restore the property to the person from whom it was taken.[26]

K. Tender and Payment into Court — 1. In General. An offer to pay, so conditioned as not to constitute a legal tender, can have no effect to extinguish libellant's maritime lien.[27] A payment into court by defendant operates as an admission that the amount paid in is due on the claim in suit,[28] though plaintiff of the property. Two Hundred and Fifty Tons of Salt, 5 Fed. 216. See also Jorgensen v. Three Thousand One Hundred and Seventy-Three Casks of Cement, 40 Fed. 606. Property taken without order of court.— Where petitioner, without order of the court, has obtained possession of property from the marshal who had seized the same on process in rem, the court will not order the marshal to deliver possession. Sale on claimant's motion pending suit.— A sale of a libeled vessel may be ordered before final decree, on claimant's motion, where libellant does not object after due notice, and especially where claimant is financially responsible and personally liable for all lawful demands against it growing out of the collision question. The Nevada, 85 Fed. 681.

Right to sell after appeal.— In Jennings v. Carson, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 2, 2 L. ed. 531, it was held that the res does not follow an appeal into the appellate court, but remains in the court below, which may order it sold as perishable notwithstanding the appeal. See also Jones v. Walker, Brunn. Col. Cas. (U. S.) 25, 3 N. C. 475, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,506.

Effect of sale.— Such a sale extinguishes all liens upon the property sold, whether arising under the maritime law or created by act of the owners or by state statutes. The Evangel, 94 Fed. 680; The Trenton, 4 Fed. 657.

26. The Schooner Two Marys, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 558, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,300.

In case of conflicting claims the marshal should not deliver the property without the order of the court. The Schooner Two Marys, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 558, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,300.

Delivery to wrong person.— Where, upon discontinuance of a suit in rem, the marshal delivers the res to the wrong person, the court cannot make a summary order for its return, because, the suit having been discontinued, the jurisdiction is gone. The remedy of the rightful owner is by action against the marshal. The Propeller Jack Jewett, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 353, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,121.

may prosecute his action for the remainder of his claim, taking the risk of liability for costs if he does not succeed.[29]

2. Compelling or Permitting Payment. When moneys have become the substitute for a vessel or cargo, libellant may require the moneys to be paid into court,[30] and on a libel in personam against a subcharterer to recover freight he may be allowed to pay the freight-money into court to abide the decision of a contest between the owner and the charterer as to a claim in which he is not interested.[31]

3. Withdrawal of Moneys Deposited. Where money is tendered and deposited in court, libellant may withdraw it at any time upon an order of the court, sufficient being reserved to cover costs,[32] but on appeal such deposit remains in the lower court, and the appellate court has no authority to order its payment.[33]

L. Stipulations and Bail — 1. In General. Provision is made in the admiralty rules for stipulations and bail-bonds to be given for the release of persons and property arrested under process from admiralty courts.[34] Such instruments are interpreted, as to the extent and limitation of the responsibility created by them, by the intention of the court which required them, and not by the intention of the parties who are bound by them.[35]

2. As Security for Costs. By long-standing practice in courts of admiralty, parties prosecuting, defending, or intervening are required to give stipulations for costs, and provision is made to that effect in the rules of the various district courts;[36] and such a stipulation may be enforced against the entire estates of the

30. The Queen of the Pacific, 9 Sawy. (U. S.) 421, 18 Fed. 700 (in which case a vessel and cargo which had been saved from a common peril proceeded to their destination, where the cargo was delivered and the consignee deposited a sum of money equal to twenty per cent. of its value, to cover general average, etc., and it was held that in a suit against the vessel and cargo for salvage libellant might elect to treat such deposit as a substitute for the cargo delivered and require the agent of the vessel to bring same into court to answer the judgment); The Schooner George Prescott, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 1, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,339 (holding that where a master of a vessel removed and sold her sails by virtue of a mortgage held by him, and the vessel was afterward libeled by other parties, the master could be compelled to pay the proceeds of the sails into court).

Assertion of claim to money paid in.— Where money has been paid into the registry as a substitute for freight attached, on an appeal to enforce a lien for wages on such freight-moneys, other parties who claim an interest therein should file their claim and set up their rights by answer to the libel. The Canal-Boat Monadnock, 5 Ben. (U. S.) 357, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,704.

31. Copp v. Decastro, etc., Sugar Refining Co., 8 Ben. (U. S.) 321, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,215, holding that the suit against respondent under the conditions mentioned in the text will be enjoined, though the result would be to turn the proceeding into one in rem against the freight.

Necessity of conforming to statute.— In The Brig Struggle, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 476, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,550, it was held that a bond voluntarily given upon the delivery of property, on appeal, on application of claimant, was good, although the condition did not exactly conform to the statute under which it was drawn.

Waiver of defects in execution.— A defective execution of a stipulation will be deemed waived unless excepted to before the close of the term next after the opposite party has notice of the defect. The Infanta, Abb. Adm. 327, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,031.

Reserving right to deny legality of custody. — The court may permit a stipulation to be given to satisfy the decree, reserving to the stipulator the right to deny the legality of the custody claimed by the marshal, and, if successful in such denial, to ask to be relieved therefrom. The Ferryboats Roslyn and Midland, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 119, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,068.

Stipulation in double the amount claimed. — A stipulation directed to be taken in double the amount of the demand will not be construed as a stipulation simply for costs. The Ferryboats Roslyn and Midland, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 119, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,068.

In an action by an informer, unless he be an officer whose duty it is to institute the prostipulators.[37] Security for costs is usually not required, however, in salvage cases [38] or in suits by seamen for wages,[39] and under an act of congress any poor person can bring a suit in an admiralty court without giving security, upon filing an affidavit of poverty.[40]

3. For Release of Person or Attached Property. Where defendant has been arrested in a suit in personam he may be released from custody on giving bail, with sufficient sureties, to appear in the suit and abide by all orders of the court and pay the decree rendered therein,[41] and property attached in such actions may be released on a like bond.[42]

Demanding additional security.— The affidavit on a motion for additional security for costs may be made by the proctor of the party. The Brig Harriet, Olc. Adm. 222, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,096.

Delay caused by libellant.— An increased stipulation for costs should not be required from the claimant on account of a delay in the progress of the action occasioned or obtained by libellant. The Bark Laurens, Abb. Adm. 302, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 8,121.

Consent to rehearing after final decree.— A consent to a rehearing by the parties to a suit will not affect the rights of a surety in a stipulation for costs who has been discharged by a previous final decree. The Martha, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 151, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,144.

Juratory caution.—Under a strict rule that a stipulation for costs must be filed with the libel, on proper showing one may be allowed to sue on a "juratory caution;" and, a libel having been filed with security which was shown to be bad, on motion to file additional security the court ordered additional security to be put in within five days, at the end of which time it might be shown that it could not be furnished and the case proceed on its merits. Stipulation to satisfy decree always necessary.— In suits in personam, in whatever way defendant is brought into court, he must give a stipulation to satisfy the decree before he can be admitted to defend, instead of giving stipulation for costs only. Millard v. Craig, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,547, 8 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 22.

Governed by equitable considerations.— In holding respondents to bail admiralty is governed largely by equitable considerations. Martin v. Walker, Abb. Adm. 579, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,170.

Surrender of principal by sureties.— Under a stipulation for appearance to answer and abide the court's decision the sureties are not irrevocably bound by a return of non est inventus; but they may surrender the principal at any time before decree against them, on citation to show cause. Must pay costs of attachment.— In giving a bond to relieve property taken by a clause of foreign attachment, defendant must pay the costs of the attachment as a condition of being permitted to defend the cause on its merits. Millard v. Craig, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,547, 8 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 22, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,548.

4. For Safe Return of Vessel, in Possessory Suit. The owners of a majority interest in a vessel, in case of disagreement with the minority owners, may be required by the latter, in a libel for possession, to give bail for the safe return of the vessel.[43] They may also, in such case, avail themselves of the right to give an ordinary release bond,[44] and cannot recover damages for the loss resulting from the seizure if they fail to do so.[45]

5. For Release of Property Seized In Rem — a. In General. Where a vessel or other property has been seized under a libel in rem on the instance side of a court of admiralty the claimant may have the same delivered to him upon filing a stipulation or bond with proper sureties;[46] and the claimant of a part of the property seized may thus procure its delivery to him while the remainder is left in custody.[47] A stipulation voluntarily given by a claimant before the seizure of the vessel gives the court jurisdiction to proceed with the cause just as if the stipulation had been given after the vessel had been taken into custody.[48] Such stipulation cannot be taken by the clerk, but must be taken in court, at chambers, or before a commissioner.[49] If no bond or stipulation be given, the court may, if it thinks best, order the property to be sold and the proceeds brought into court or otherwise disposed of.[50]

43. See supra, IV, E, 7, c; Burr v. The St. Thomas, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,195, 8 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 22. See also The Maggie J. Smith, 123 U. S. 349, 8 S. Ct. 159, 31 L. ed. 175; The Two Marys, 16 Fed. 697.

Seizure for forfeiture.— A vessel seized for a forfeiture will not be released to the claimant on a bond given under Admiralty Rules 10 or 11. The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897; The Mary N. Hogan, 17 Fed. 813. But see U. S. v. The Sloop Pitt, 2 Wheel. Crim. (N. Y.) 602, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,052.

Stipulator bound by default decree.— When a stranger to an original libel in rem, claiming to be the owner, gives a release bond to restore the vessel as the court shall direct, pay damages for its use and detention, and "perform any other judgment which the court may render," etc., he thereby becomes a party to the cause and is bound by a default decree thereafter entered in accordance with the stipulation of the bond. Briggs v. Taylor, 84 Fed. 681, 28 C. C. A. 518.

Where United States claimant.— Inasmuch as a suit brought in the district court to enforce a lien on a vessel given by state laws is not a "proceeding under the laws of any state," but is under the laws of the United States, the government, if claimant such suit, is not entitled to have the res discharged from arrest by giving a stipulation under U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 3753. The Revenue Cutter, 4 Sawy. (U. S.) 136, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,712.

Proceedings to limit liability.— The act of congress of March 3, 1851, to limit the liability of ship-owners, confers no power on the court to discharge the vessel from all liens upon her on the filing of a stipulation by the owners, in the full value of the vessel and freight, for the benefit of all parties having claims upon her. But this may be done under the general admiralty powers of the court. Place v. The Steamboat City of Norwich, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 89, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,202.

Appraisement without notice to opposite party.— An appraisement by an appraiser nominated by the clerk without notice to the opposite party will be set aside. Alliance Ins. Co. v. The Morning Light, 1 Fed. Cas. No. 246*a*.

Who may bond proceeds.— On a libel on bottomry bond, where the vessel is sold and the proceeds paid into court, one claiming as a mortgagee in possession under an overdue and unpaid mortgage will be allowed to bond the proceeds rather than the libellant whose claim is denied in the pleadings. b. Sufficiency of Instrument — (I) As to Form and Amount. Strict formality is not required of such an instrument, and it seems that a bond which is good as a common-law obligation is sufficient though not in exact conformity with the statute under which given.[51] The amount of the bail is a matter largely in the discretion of the court,[52] and after a proper bond has been given to the marshal the libellant cannot exact any additional stipulation.[53]

(II) As to Sureties. In the absence of satisfactory proof to the contrary the court will presume that the security is sufficient,[54] but the stipulator will be required to keep his stipulation good in the matter of sureties until the final determination of the case, and to furnish new sureties if necessary.[55]

c. Effect of Release — (I) As Discharge of Lien. Where a vessel has been fairly released from custody on a valid stipulation or bond, it returns to the claimant forever discharged from the lien which was the foundation of the proceedings in which it was arrested,[56] and the court has no power to order the vessel back into custody,[57] even by consent of the parties,[58] nor to compel the payment of the purchase-money into court, where it has been sold subsequently to the release;[59] nor can it be arrested again on another libel for the same cause of action.[60] But in case of any mistake or fraud in entering into the stipulation, and Full value of vessel, cargo, and freight.— A vessel, cargo, and freight attached on a libel on a bottomry bond will be bonded for their full amount, although the proceeds of the vessel alone are sufficient to meet the claims. The Bark Archer, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 455, 1 Fed. Cas. No. 507.

d. (II) Release of Liability. A stipulator will be discharged from his undertaking where the vessel is subsequently arrested on libels by others and sold, and the proceeds brought into court,[68] and where a libel in rem is dismissed by default the claimant may, without notice to the libellant, enter an order canceling the stipulation.[69] But an amendment of the libel neither increasing nor diminishing the liability of the sureties will not release them from their obligation.[70]

M. Special Defenses — 1. In General. Matter which is properly the subject of a cross-claim cannot be set up as a defense to a libel against the vessel.[71]

2. Another Action Pending or Past — a. In General. A court of admiralty has authority to stay proceedings in any case before it, in order to prevent injustice,[72] as where a cross-libel is necessary in order that defendant may set up his whole claim.[73] But in order that the proceedings in one libel may be a bar to a second, the second suit must be the same as the first in respect to subject-matter, parties, rights asserted, and relief demanded, and must be founded upon the same facts and for the same basis of relief.[74] The pendency of a libel for forfeiture in

73. Stay pending termination of cross-suit. — In a suit for towage, a defendant who has a counter-claim for damages for negligent performance of the contract in excess of libellant's claim cannot recover the full damages by answer, but only by cross-libel; and, as he cannot split his cross-demand, but must try it in the cross-suit, he is entitled to have the libel and cross-libel heard together, if brought in the same court: and if brought in different courts, judgment on the libel should be stayed until reasonable opportunity is had for the trial of the counter-claim in the cross-libel. one district against a vessel for a violation of law is no bar to a libel in another district for other violations of a similar character before the first suit was brought, although she was released by a bond for her entire value in the first case, and all the violations might have been joined therein.[75]

b. Action In Rem as Bar. A pending action in rem is not a bar to one by the same libellant in personam for the same cause,[76] unless defendants gave a stipulation in the former for the full amount of the claim.[77] The action in personam will not be stayed pending an appeal in the proceeding in rem,[78] though it is held that the court in which both of such proceedings are pending may stay the entry of a decree on the libel in rem until it is ascertained whether it will be necessary to recur to the security given in that suit.[79]

c. Another Action in State Court. The pendency of a replevin suit in a state court is not a legal bar which may be pleaded in abatement to a libel in rem in the United States courts to enforce the right or lien against the property,[80] though it is held that the pendency of a replevin suit in a state court to settle the right of property in a vessel is a bar to a libel in admiralty to settle the same right between the same persons.[81] The right of a seaman to sue in admiralty in personam for his wages is in no manner affected by an attachment of his wages by trustee process issuing out of a state court,[82] and the bringing of a suit in a state court which is afterward dismissed or discontinued before the hearing is not a bar to a suit in admiralty for the same cause.[83] On the other hand, a court of admiralty may order proceedings in execution of its judgment to pause until the termination of a suit in equity in a state court.[84] libel in personam by the owner of the cargo, where the latter was not a party to the first proceeding and no notice was given or publication made as required by the admiralty rule. Bailey v. Sundberg, 49 Fed. 583, 1 U. S. App. 101, 1 C. C. A. 387.

3. Premature Commencement of Suit — a. In General. The premature commencement of a suit in admiralty to enforce a freight lien is not jurisdictional,[85]

Objection.— After a decision for libellants in rem for freight and demurrage it cannot be objected that freight has been found due libellants in a pending suit in personam (Brookman v. Sixty Barrels of Molasses, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 1,941*a*), and a prior decree as a defense in an admiralty cause in favor of the party for whom it was rendered should be given in evidence, and not set up by summary motion to prevent further hearing or to try the fact upon affidavits (Reed v. The Fanny, 20 Fed. Nature of objection.— If the pendency of an action in a state court can be set up at all as an objection to a proceeding in rem in admiralty, the objection can be made only by a dilatory or declinatory exception. The Ship Prince Albert, 5 Ben. (U. S.) 386, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,426.

and such an objection will not require a dismissal of a libel, but will affect only the question of costs.[86]

b. Objection. Objection that a libel is prematurely brought must be raised promptly,[87] and will be waived if an answer is filed to the merits and the case is brought to a hearing,[88] or by other acts indicating such intention.[89]

4. Contributory Negligence — a. In General. Courts of admiralty are not bound by the common and civil law rules governing cases of contributory negligence, but award or withhold damages according to principles of equity and justice in the exercise of a sound discretion.[90] Therefore contributory negligence on the part of libellant is not, of necessity, a bar to his recovery,[91] but the court will apportion the damages.[92] When both vessels in a collision are in fault they must bear the damage in equal parts, the one suffering the least being decreed to pay to the other the amount necessary to make them equal, or one half the difference between the respective losses sustained.[93]

b. Injuries Resulting in Death. Under statutes giving the representatives of one whose death is caused by injuries an action for the damages resulting therefrom, it is held that such rights are to be administered according to the practice of the common law, and contributory negligence will bar the action;[94] and where such negligence is a defense in the particular state the action cannot be maintained in admiralty.[95]

Thus, where the contributory negligence of libellant in descending an unsafe ladder on board ship was not wilful, gross, or inexcusable, and libellee was guilty of negligence in not providing a safe ladder, the former is entitled to recover a portion of his damages and will be allowed nothing for his pain and suffering, but will be allowed the wages he would have earned but for the accident. 5. Limitation of Action — Laches — a. No Statutory Period. Except in criminal cases[96] and those of a quasi-criminal character, as for offenses against the revenue laws for which forfeitures are enforced by proceedings in rem in admiralty,[97] no period of limitation is fixed for the commencement of suits in admiralty.[98] The exercise of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the United States courts is governed entirely by the legislation of congress and the general principles of maritime law.[99] They are not controlled by the periods of limitation prescribed by state statutes.[1]

b. Stale Demands — (I) General Rule. Independently, however, of any limitations, courts of admiralty will not entertain suits for stale demands, and they adopt the principle that laches or delay will, under proper circumstances, constitute a valid defense.[2]

(II) Application of Rule — (A) Generally. While no arbitrary or fixed period of time is established as an inflexible rule, the delay which will defeat a proceeding in admiralty must in every case depend upon the peculiar equitable circumstances presented,[3] as upon the former opportunities for the enforcement of the claim and the change of circumstances affecting the rights and conditions of parties; and after a reasonable opportunity has been had for the enforcement of a claim, it will be held stale as against third persons who have in good faith

Enforcement as against purchaser.— Where a lien is to be enforced to the detriment of a purchaser for value without notice or demand, the defense of laches will be held valid under a shorter time and a more rigid scrutiny of the circumstances of the delay than where the claimant is the owner at the time the lien accrues. The Key City, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 653, 20 L. ed. 896. See also, in this connection, The Lyndhurst, 48 Fed. 839 (delay for nearly a year to take steps to enforce his lien by one furnishing supplies, though the vessel had been all the time within easy reach of process); The Bristol, 20 Fed. 800 (four years after damage done held laches as against owners who purchased two years after the collision and after taking every means to ascertain the existence of any liens); The Harriet Ann, 6 Biss. Adm. 474, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,609 (holding that an action in rem for wages by a seaman of a small sailing-craft plying on the Hudson river between Troy, Bristol, and the city of New York, cannot be maintained after a year from the sale of the vessel to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the outstanding wages, especially if the seaman was present and knew of the sale); The Utility, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 218, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,806 (holding that a lien for supplies furnished in New York to a vessel owned in North Carolina was lost through laches where more than two years had elapsed and no demand had been made of the master who contracted the debt, or of those who owned the vessel, when the debt was contracted, and the vessel had since made several voyages between New York and North Carolina and had been sold at public auction to a bona fide purchaser without notice of the debt).

Simply filing a libel is notice to no one and will not prevent a claim becoming stale, but taking out an attachment and placing it in the hands of the marshal of the district where the vessel is owned will have that effect. The Emma L. Coyne, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,466, 11 Chic. Leg. N. 98. See also The Robert Gaskin, 9 Fed. 62.

Lien based on running account.— Where a maritime lien for repairs was based on a running account extending over nearly four years, and during the whole of that time the account was reduced by payments made with considerable regularity, the last payment having been made within a week before the libel was filed to enforce the lien, it was held that the libel was not barred by laches, though the last repairs were made nearly a year before filing the libel, and that the claim should not be postponed to those of other lienors who furnished supplies to the vessel while the payments to libellant were being made. The John Dillon, 46 Fed. 527.

Where witnesses have perished.— In The Alaska, 33 Fed. 107, it was held that libellants were not guilty of laches by waiting eleven months after the vessel had been sunk by collision, though in the interval the offending steamer had passed into the possession of a third party without notice of the collision, where the libellants' most important witness had perished with the sunken vessel.

Pursuit of vessel into another district.— Where the lien-holder and owner are both residents of the same district there is no obligation on the part of the former to pursue the vessel into another district in order to prevent his claim from becoming stale. The C. N. Johnson, 19 Fed. 782; The Emma L. Coyne, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,466, 11 Chic. Leg. N. 98. See also MARITIME LIENS.

5. Where no bona fide rights intervene.— Where no claims of subsequent purchasers, lienors, or encumbrancers intervene, a maritime lien will not become stale or barred from lapse of time through a delay of two years in filing the libel, merely on the ground that some witnesses have been lost by the respondent. The Martino Cilento, 22 Fed. 859; The Galloway C. Morris, 2 Abb. (U. S.) 164, 7 Phila. (Pa.) 572, 27 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 204, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,204, holding that where there has been no change of ownership forbearance to enforce a seaman's lien for wages until after twenty-one months' continuous service will not render his claim stale. So, though service may be had upon foreign owners through an agent, failure to sue for sixteen months and until the first return of the ship to port, for personal injuries received while stowing cargo, will not prevent the maintenance of a suit in rem, where no other liens or rights have intervened, as by suing in personam the injured party would be compelled to waive his lien and rely on a personal judgment against the non-resident foreigners. The Conde Wifredo, 77 Fed. 324, 41 U. S. App. 438, 467, 609, 23 C. C. A. 187.

in order to apply the rule of strictness in scrutinizing the circumstance of the delay as against subsequent intervening rights, the subsequent transfer of the possession must be without notice to the purchaser of the existing claim.[6]

(B) Reference to Analogies of Statutory Limitations. While courts of admiralty are not bound by local statutes, in determining the question of laches they govern themselves by the analogies of the common-law or statutory limitations in the absence of special or exceptional circumstances.[7]

(III) Necessity of Pleading as Defense. The defense that a claim is barred as stale cannot be made unless it is properly raised by pleading it in the answer.[8]

N. Dismissal and Discontinuance — 1. In General. It is not improper to dismiss a libel on exceptions thereto,[9] and where the evidence is conflicting, and the claim is not established, and the court cannot render a satisfactory judgment, it may dismiss the libel without prejudice and without costs.[10]

2. Dismissal as to Party to Be Sworn. In a joint libel against two or more persons for a marine tort the court may dismiss the libel as to one, even if there is some evidence against him, for the purpose of permitting him to be used as a witness, if justice requires it.[11]

3. Effect of Dismissal as to Cross-Libel. If a cross-libel is dismissed, all the issues in the original suit remain as they were, and open for consideration;[12] but if the libel is dismissed, a cross-libel not so connected with the subject-matter of the libel as to be maintainable must also be dismissed.[13]

4. Dismissal for Want of Prosecution. According to the proper admiralty practice, each party is expected to attend court, and, when his causes are called, either bring them on for trial or by order of court or consent of the adversary

6. The Carrie, 46 Fed. 796.

Who is an innocent purchaser.— Where the purchaser was told by the seller that a seaman had claims on the boat, a claim for seaman's wages is not stale as against such purchaser where the libel was not filed for eighteen months after the services performed. The Steamboat Argo, 7 Ben. (U. S.) 304, 1 Fed. Cas. No. 515.

Accident notorious.— A libel for a collision filed after change of ownership is not barred where the accident was so notorious that the possibility of claims arising therefrom could not escape reasonable diligent inquiry on the part of the purchaser, and in such case the eleven months' delay in filing the libel was held not to be unreasonable. The Columbia, 27 Fed. 704.

Barge taken in payment of debt.— One who takes a barge in payment of a debt is not an innocent purchaser so as to be entitled to the benefit of the rule that when the business in which a vessel is engaged is divided into distinct seasons of activity old claims must be enforced before the debts growing out of the next season are incurred. The Alfred J. Murray, 60 Fed. 926.

Application of rule.— In The Frank Moffat, 2 Flipp. (U. S.) 291, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,060, it was held that where there had been no change of ownership libellant was not barred of his action if he commenced it within the time prescribed by the statute of limitations. But in Nesbit v. The Amboy, 36 Fed. 925, it was held that the period of limitation fixed by statute in common-law actions should not be extended by discretion in admiralty cases except for some cause of practical inability to sue or for some peculiarity of a maritime nature which has been recognized in a court of admiralty and makes it a matter of justice that the discretion should be so applied.

Bona fide purchaser.— In order to maintain the defense of stale claim it is necessary to allege and prove that respondents are purchasers in good faith for a valuable consideration and without notice of the existence of the claim. The Melissa, Brown Adm. 476, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,400.

have them continued; or, if his adversary be not present, have them dismissed or decided by default.[14] In analogy to the practice of a court of equity, if that court will not dismiss a suit because some of the joint complainants refuse to proceed, a court of admiralty will not dismiss a libel under like circumstances.[15]

5. Voluntary Discontinuance or Dismissal. After the introduction of pertinent evidence on the merits, plaintiff cannot suffer a nonsuit, so as not to be barred, unless by consent of the opposite party or on leave of court for sufficient reason,[16] though the rule recognized in some of the state courts is also followed, that a libellant has the right, at any stage of the cause, to dismiss his libel on payment of costs.[17]

O. Evidence and Method of Taking Proof — 1. In General — a. Dependent on Rules of Particular District. No rules for producing or taking evidence in admiralty have been prescribed by the supreme court under its statutory authority,[18] and therefore each district court follows its own rules as to the examination of witnesses. In some districts the testimony is reduced to writing before a commissioner,[19] while in others the witnesses are heard orally by the court.[20]

b. Competency of Witnesses. The laws of the state in which the admiralty court is held control the competency of witnesses,[21] and objections to evidence on Refusal to go to trial.— Douglass v. The Ship Washington, Crabbe (U. S.) 452, 7 Fed. Cas. Reception of evidence and taking testimony after judgment.— Notwithstanding an order of court closing all testimony in a cause after a limited time under a commission, the court will enlarge it upon proof of newly discovered evidence which the party could not procure to be taken under such commission, the same having come to his knowledge after the execution thereof. The Schooner Ruby, 5 Mason (U. S.) 451, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,103. See also The Glide, 68 Fed. 719, 25 U. S. App. 406, 15 C. C. A. 627. In this case, on the hearing of a cause, claimant, a non-resident, failed to appear, and libellant's evidence was taken, and the case adjourned. On the adjourned day claimant failed to appear, and his proctor failed to give a reason for his absence, and the case proceeded to judgment for libellant. It appeared that claimant was prevented by sickness from attending or advising with his proctor, and it was held proper to permit him to take evidence pending an appeal.

Examination of parties.— Since the act of July 2, 1864, parties to actions in the courts of the United States are no longer excluded as witnesses (U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 858), but prior to the passage of that act, while in the ground of competency must be made at the hearing. They come too late if made on the argument.[22]

c. Admissibility — (I) In General. A court of admiralty, being judge both of the law and fact, is not confined to the strict rules of the common law in respect to the admission of evidence,[23] and may take notice of matters not strictly proved.[24]

(II) Declarations and Admissions. The declarations of the master concerning the contract of the seamen are admissible in a suit against the owners, though not strictly part of the res gestæ,[25] and a statement by the advocate of the party, in open court, the day after the hearing, made by authority of the party, may be taken as an admission in contradiction of the evidence submitted by him.[26]

(III) Documentary Evidence — (A) In General. An entry made in a vessel's log with full knowledge or opportunity for ascertaining the truth must be accepted as the truth when it tells against the party making it;[27] and the vessel's many cases parties were allowed to testify in their own behalf where the strict rules of the common law excluded them (Benedict Adm. (3d ed.) § 534), it was held that state statutes admitting parties as witnesses did not apply in admiralty (The Ship William Jarvis, 1 Sprague (U. S.) 485, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,697; The Australia, 3 Ware (U. S.) 240, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 667; The Independence, 2 Curt. (U. S.) 350, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,014); but the testimony of the libellants themselves in an action in rem, the one for the other, although legally admissible, ought to be narrowly scrutinized and received with caution (The Steamboat Swallow, Olc. Adm. 334, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,665; Graham v. Hoskins, Olc. Adm. 224, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,669).

The master of a vessel who hypothecated her on bottomry is a competent witness in favor of the holder of the bottomry, particularly if released by him (Furniss v. The Brig Magoun, Olc. Adm. 55, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,163) or for the owner in a suit in rem for wages by one of the ship's company (The Steamboat Hudson, Olc. Adm. 396, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,831).

Estimates of damage — When admissible.— Good faith in the prosecution of claims forbids that vague or loose estimates of damage should be received where proper evidence has been voluntarily parted with by the suitor. Estimates may be received, however, where the proper evidence has been parted with through misapprehension as to the extent of the suitor's rights, though in such cases he should not recover beyond the lowest estimates of the most credible witnesses. Wolff v. The Vaderland, 18 Fed. 733.

Evidence at former trial — When inadmissible.— After a vessel libeled for collision had been released on stipulation, intervening libels were filed, on which a trial was had, and a judgment rendered for interveners, which was reversed on appeal, on the ground that the liability of the claimant on the stipulation could not be increased by the subsequent filing of new claims, and that, as the vessel had been discharged, the court could not adjudicate such claims. It was held that under such decision, which in effect determined that the vessel was not a party to the judgment, after new process had been issued on the intervening petitions, and the vessel again taken into custody, the parties were not the same, so as to render testimony taken on the former trial admissible on a second trial. Declarations by one not understanding English.—A foreign master, who understands and speaks English imperfectly, will not be charged upon his declarations or admissions in that language without clear proof that he well understood the meaning of what was addressed to him and that used by him in reply. The Bark Lotty, Olc. Adm. 329, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,524.

26. The Steam Tugs Harry and May Flower, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 524, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,147.

Sufficient admission of ownership.— A tender by respondents on libel for services as stewardess of a ship is an admission of ownership of the vessel. Jones v. Crowell, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,459.

Admission insufficient to establish demand against proceeds.— The admissions of the owner of a boat, made after the boat was placed in the custody of the law and had been ordered to be sold, are not competent to establish demands made against the proceeds of the sale of the boat. Renshaw v. Steamboat Pawnee, 19 Mo. 532.

27. The Newfoundland, 89 Fed. 510. But the charges made on the shipping-papers of advances to the seamen in the course of the voyage are not evidence until verified by the suppletory oath of the master. The David Pratt, 1 Ware (U. S.) 509, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,597.

Memorandum-book.— Written entries by the captain in a memorandum-book, made a month afterward from alleged contemporaneous entries in pencil, erased, are not entitled, as evidence, to the weight of a log-book properly kept, or of written contemporaneous entries. Brink v. Lyons, 18 Fed. 605.

manifest is also admissible under some circumstances.[28] So, too, when the evidence is found in commercial documents executed abroad, such documents may be considered without strict proof when the res gestæ afford the highest practical guaranties for their authenticity and correctness. But this practice should not be extended so as to justify any laches in obtaining full proof, the necessity of which could have been reasonably foreseen.[29]

(B) Secondary Evidence — (1) In General. In an action on shipping-articles parol evidence of their contents may be given on proving a reasonable excuse for not producing them.[30]

(2) Copies. Under certain circumstances copies may be introduced in evidence in lieu of the original papers.[31]

d. Production of Books and Papers. A proceeding in rem is not within the statute of 1789, which authorizes an order to produce books and writings on the trial of actions at law.[32]

28. Thus, on a libel charging a vessel with having violated the embargo acts in departing from a port in the United States and proceeding to Antigua, it appeared that she was at Camden, N. C., in December and January, and was in the port of Norfolk in April, and it was held that the report and manifest of her cargo, with the affidavit made by the captain before the collector at Norfolk, were admissible to show that she took in her cargo at Antigua. U. S. v. The Schooner Little Charles, 1 Brock. (U. S.) 347, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,612. So, too, on a prosecution for smuggling, a paper purporting on its face to be the manifest of the steamer was shown to have been produced from the usual place of deposit in the custom-house for ships' manifests, and it was shown that no other manifest for the voyage was on file, but no other proof of its genuineness was offered. The paper was held admissible in evidence. The Steamer Missouri, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 410, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,653.

29. The Boskenna Bay, 22 Fed. 662.

The official certificate of a notary proves the making of a marine protest and what it contains. It is competent evidence in a court of admiralty, and the examination of the notary by commission, in order to prove the protest, is not necessary. The Gallego, 30 Fed. 271.

30. The Brig Osceola, Olc. Adm. 450, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,602; Patten v. Park, Anth. N. P. (N. Y.) 46.

In a suit upon shipping-articles by a seaman to recover wages for a voyage, if the articles are not produced by the master or owner at the trial, after due requirement by the seaman, his statement of the contents thereof, when disputed, will be prima facie evidence of the same. But when a seaman ships under articles at Boston in December, 1842, and at New Orleans in March, 1843, and leaves the ship at Bordeaux in June, 1843, and in his libel filed against the vessel in this court for wages on those voyages he prays that "the shipping-articles may be produced by the master or owner," that is not such notice or requirement as will render his statement proof of their contents. The Brig Osceola, Olc. Adm. 450, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,602.

31. Documents relating to condemnation and sale.— Copies of documents relating to the condemnation and sale of a vessel, certified by the British consul to be copies of official documents on file in his office, and which had been proved by deposition a considerable time before the trial, so that the parties were not taken by surprise, were admissible in evidence. The Bark J. F. Spencer, 3 Ben. (U. S.) 337, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,315.

Protest.— A copy of protest offered in evidence without proof of its correctness as a copy,— where it was shown that a protest was made at the time and place where the copy purported to have been made, and that it was signed by the mate, and the mate, though called as a witness, was not asked in relation to the truth of the copy and did not dispute it,— was admissible. The Bark Vivid, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 319, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,978.

Records of foreign vice-admiralty court.— The proceedings of a vice-admiralty court of a foreign nation were held to be sufficiently verified by proof of the handwriting of the judge, and of the register of the court, to a certificate that the papers were a true copy from the records. Mumford v. Bowne, Anth. N. P. (N. Y.) 56.

Shipping-articles.— It seems that where original shipping-articles are proved before a commissioner and redelivered to the vessel, which thereupon pursues her voyage, a copy, certified by the commissioner, is competent evidence upon the hearing. Henry v. Curry, Abb. Adm. 433, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,381.

Continuance granted to procure originals.— In a suit to enforce a bottomry bond executed in a distant foreign country, though an attested copy thereof is not admissible in evidence, yet, being produced, the court will grant a continuance, that the original may be procured. The Jerusalem, 2 Gall. (U. S.) 191, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,293.

No witness to correctness of copy.— A copy of a survey of a vessel, not purporting to have been made by any one connected with her, is not admissible against her, no witness able to prove or disprove its correctness being called or shown to be within reach. The Bark Vivid, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 319, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,978.

e. Weight and Sufficiency. The admiralty court will determine facts upon the principles which govern trials by jury.[33]

2. Depositions. In admiralty, as well as in other courts, the testimony of absent witnesses or those about to depart from the jurisdiction may be taken de bene esse[34] or under a commission designated as a dedimus potestatem with annexed interrogatories,[35] or, in cases of foreign witnesses, by letters rogatory addressed to a foreign tribunal, requesting its aid in taking the evidence;[36] or, where no suit is pending, a court of equity may direct the taking of depositions in perpetuam rei memoriam, if they relate to any matters that may be cognizable in any court of the United States; and such depositions or similar ones taken

Balance in favor of greatest number of witnesses.— When there is an irreconcilable conflict in the testimony of witnesses, and circumstances of suspicion attach to the credit of them on both sides, the balance of evidence will be regarded as in favor of the party having the greatest number. The Brig Napoleon, Olc. Adm. 208, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,015.

Presumptions.— A neglect to state material facts within the knowledge of the party will be taken most unfavorably against him (Poole v. The Washington, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,271, 9 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 321), and where the evidence is such as to leave the circumstances and cause of a personal injury so uncertain that the court can give no logical reason for determining the issue in libellant's favor, the presumption that the person charged with the tort is not guilty must be maintained (The Meta, 88 Fed. 21).

34. U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), §§ 863–865; Benedict Adm. (3d ed.) §§ 520–530. But under Rule 8 of the Fifth Circuit, depositions cannot be taken de bene esse in the circuit court of appeals, but only by a commission, under Supreme Court Rule 12. The Beeche Dene, 55 Fed. 526, 2 U. S. App. 582, 5 C. C. A. 208.

Cannot be taken in foreign country.— Depositions de bene esse cannot be taken in a foreign country under U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 863. Cortes Co. v. Thannhauser, 21 Blatchf. (U. S.) 552, 18 Fed. 667.

The production of books and papers may be enforced on such examination, but not merely to refresh the memory of the witness. U. S. v. Tilden, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 566, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,522.

Suppression of deposition.— A deposition thus taken may be suppressed on motion, but it must be done promptly and before trial. Bibb v. Allen, 149 U. S. 481, 13 S. Ct. 950, 37 L. ed. 819; Doane v. Glenn, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 33, 22 L. ed. 476.

Waiver of objection.— When a witness is examined de bene esse out of court in an admiralty cause by the claimants, and is cross-examined by the libellant, who reads the cross-examination in support of his action, he cannot then except to the competency of the witness because interested in the cause, and exclude his testimony given in chief for the claimants. The Brig Osceola, Olc. Adm. 450, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,602.

35. U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), §§ 866–870; Benedict Adm. (3d ed.) §§ 531, 532.

By what practice governed.— U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 866, authorizing any of the courts of the United States to issue commissions to take depositions "according to common usage," does not require a court of admiralty to conform to the practice in the state courts, and it may by rule provide a different method for taking depositions. The Westminster, 96 Fed. 766.

Representation of adverse party.— Under Rule 40 in admiralty of the district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, which permits parties to attend the examination of witnesses whose testimony is taken on commission, either personally or by their proctors, if the adverse party desires to be represented at such an examination he should furnish the name and address of his representative to the party taking out the commission, or to the commissioner, or file the same with his cross-interrogatories, in which case it will be the duty of the commissioner to give such representative notice. The Westminster, 96 Fed. 766.

The oral cross-examination of witnesses on a commission abroad may be allowed as a condition of waiving objection of irregularity in the motion for the commission. The Steamship Louisiana, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 328, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,536.

Taking for use on appeal.— A commission to take testimony cannot be issued by the circuit court in an admiralty case, after an appeal has been taken to the supreme court, until after the supreme court, on motion, has decided the question as to the admissibility of the evidence. The Ocean Queen, 6 Blatchf. (U. S.) 24, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,411.

Commission issued to wife of witness.— Where an application was made for a commission to examine a witness who resided near Goa, in the East Indies, it appearing that no one was known who could be named as commissioner, except the wife of the witness, she was named as commissioner. The Ship Norway, 2 Ben. (U. S.) 121, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,358.

Commission refused when.— An application in the supreme court by appellant for a commission to take testimony of certain witnesses will be refused where no excuse was shown by applicant why the witnesses were not examined either by the district or the circuit courts. The Mabey, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 738, 20 L. ed. 473.

under state laws and admissible in the state courts will be admissible afterward, when suit is brought involving the matters.[37]

5. ANSWERS TO INTERROGATORIES. Answers to interrogatories annexed to the pleadings stand, as evidence, like the pleadings only. What is admitted needs no further proof; but, as respects matters that still remain at issue, answers to interrogatories are not affirmative evidence in favor of the party making them.[38]

4. PLEADINGS AS EVIDENCE—a. In General. Neither party can contradict by proof the averments in his pleading,[39] and the opposite party is entitled to rely thereon as an admission of facts.[40] Nor do such allegations require proof unless denied and put in issue.[41]

b. Allegations in Libel. The allegations of one of the parties in a libel are not evidence for him.[42]

c. Allegations in Answer. The answer to the libel, though on oath, is not evidence,[43] but it may be referred to, to explain ambiguities in the testimony and in aid of presumptions arising from the evidence to supply connecting links in the proof.[44]

d. Claim. A claim to a vessel and cargo filed in an admiralty cause, though sworn to, is not evidence.[45]

37. U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), §§ 866, 867.

Deposition taken in another suit.— In a suit for collision by the master of a vessel in behalf of the cargo-owners, libellant cannot read in evidence a deposition taken in behalf of the owners of the vessel in a suit by them for the same collision. The Steamboat John H. Starin, 9 Ben. (U. S.) 331, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,351.

Irregularities insufficient to exclude depositions.— The depositions of witnesses for claimant will not be suppressed because taken before answer, where prejudice to libellant does not appear. The Ship Pride of the Ocean, 10 Ben. (U. S.) 610, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,419. See also Nelson v. Woodruff, 1 Black (U. S.) 156, 17 L. ed. 97, where no preliminary proof was made of the witness's materiality, the deposition was not sealed up, and no notice of its being filed was given, but it appeared that the commissioner who took it was clerk of the court, and that the objecting proctor knew that it had been taken, and it was thereupon admitted.

No. 8,152, to the effect that sworn answers to special interrogatories in admiralty are not conclusive as to disputed facts. Their effect at most is to turn the scale when in equilibrio. They are no more evidence for one party than for the other, and will not be conclusive for either if the weight of proof is on the other side, or if, by self-contradiction, suspicion attaches to the answers themselves. But see The David Pratt, 1 Ware (U. S.) 509, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,597, to the effect that answers under oath to special interrogatories are evidence in the cause, as well in favor of as against the party answering.

No. 10,602, holding that the statement of the seaman in the libel is incompetent evidence to prove services rendered by him on board the vessel under shipping-articles. And see Jay v. Almy, 1 Woodb. & M. (U. S.) 262, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,236, to the effect that such allegations are not evidence for libellant unless called for by the other side, and are then to be weighed as they deserve, without requiring, in all cases, more than one witness to overcome them.

The Santa Claus, Olc. Adm. 428, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,327. And while an answer containing an admission of a contract as stated in the libel may, by leave of court, be afterward amended by withdrawing the admission, this will not relieve respondent from the effect of his admission as evidence. P. Hearing or Trial — 1. By Court — a. In General. The procedure on a trial in an admiralty court is extremely informal, being governed in large measure by the circumstances of the particular case.[46] The libels or petitions are heard in the order in which they are brought up,[47] and after the testimony has been taken the cause is argued and submitted to the court, usually with written briefs.[48] Sometimes the court will keep the case open in the interest of justice, in order to allow a party to produce further proof.[49]

b. Right to Jury Trial. Independently of statute there is no right to a trial by jury in civil cases in admiralty.[50] By statute the right to demand a jury trial is given in certain cases arising upon the lakes and navigable waters connecting the same,[51] but even in these cases the verdict is held to be advisory merely, and may be disregarded by the court if, in the opinion of the judge, it fails to do substantial justice.[52]

2. Before Commissioners — a. Reference to Commissioners — (I) When Ordered. Under Admiralty Rule 44, whenever the court deems it expedient or necessary for the purposes of justice, it may refer any matters arising in the progress of an admiralty suit to one or more commissioners appointed by it to hear the parties and make report thereon.[53] Submission of matters to commission-

Reserving question of damages and costs.— Where the evidence shows that libellants' scow was old, decayed, and improperly constructed, and that she sank from a blow which would not have injured a staunch and seaworthy craft, and libellants have not had full opportunity to meet this evidence, which would, unexplained, warrant a decree for a moiety, the court will reserve the question of damages and costs until the coming in of the commissioner's report. The Gilson, 35 Fed. 333.

Point reserved for further argument.— Where a point is reserved for further argument and consideration after a trial and decree in the case, it must be upon the pleadings and proofs as they stood on the original hearing. Effect of trial by jury.— In Lee v. Thompson, 3 Woods (U. S.) 167, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,202, wherein a question was left to the jury, it was held on appeal that, though a court of admiralty had no power to try causes by jury, yet, as the appellate court would have come to the same conclusion on the evidence, the decree of the lower court on the verdict would be affirmed.

51. U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 566; Gillet v. Pierce, Brown Adm. 553, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,437.

To what cases statute applies.— In admiralty causes of contract or tort arising upon the lakes, if either vessel concerned in such action be of twenty tons burden and upward, enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and employed in navigation between different states, either party to such action may demand a trial by jury; but if both vessels be foreign, or engaged in trade between places in the same state, or the action be other than one of contract or tort, it seems that neither party is entitled to a jury trial. Pleadings must show that act applies.—The party demanding a jury must bring himself, by his pleadings, within the provisions of the act. Gillet v. Pierce, Brown Adm. 553, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,437.

Special instances.— Where it appears that the main question relates to an account the court may properly refer the case to a commis-

ers may be made either at the instance of a party or by the court of its own motion.[54]

(II) Scope and Effect of Reference. The reference of questions of fact to commissioners is for the purpose of obtaining their opinion and advice in aid of the court,[55] and the court will not hear questions arising on a reference to compute damages at the instance of the parties unless they have submitted such questions to the commissioner.[56]

b. Proceedings before Commissioners — (I) In General. Under Admiralty Rule 44 commissioners have all the powers usually given to or exercised by masters in chancery.[57] An award of damages on a reference in admiralty is not invalidated by the fact that the commissioner sat outside the territorial jurisdiction of the court.[58]

(II) Scope of Reference and Issues. Under an order of reference the parties are confined to a contest of the matters referred,[59] but a statement in the opinion under which a final decree is entered, as to a fact affecting the amount of damages and not material to a determination on the question of liability settled by the decree, is not binding on a reference under such decree to ascertain the amount of damages, and either party may introduce evidence before the commissioner touching the extent of the damage.[60]

(III) Taking Testimony. Under the admiralty rule referred to, the commissioners have the power to administer oaths and examine the parties and witnesses touching the matters referred to them.[61]

(IV) Objections before Commissioner. In case of improper or irregular proceedings by the commissioner in conducting the hearing, either party may arrest the same until the question as to the proper method or action to be pursued can be certified by the commissioner to the court for confirmation.[62] It has been held that objections to the admission of evidence,[63] or to a ruling on the credibility of a witness, unless the objection rests wholly on the question of law,[64] or to the pro-sioner (Shaw v. Collyer, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 370, 18 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 238, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,718); and where the rights of the parties depend upon questions of nautical skill or seamanship the court may refer the matter to persons skilled in navigation and act upon their report (The Brig Emily, Olc. Evidence received out of time.— Where libellant rested, after examining three witnesses, without giving notice of an intention to offer further proof at a later stage, and claimant thereupon filed a motion to dismiss for want of sufficient evidence to sustain the libel, but, without waiting to submit the motion to the court, proceeded before the commissioner to take evidence on his side after notice that the motion was not waived, it was held that claimant was entitled to have the case decided on the evidence of the first three witnesses, unaided by that adduced by libellant on cross-examination of claimant's witnesses, or in rebuttal where no sufficient reason appeared for receiving such evidence out of time. Waiver on prior trial.— Where a party neglects at the trial to object to the competency of evidence he will be deemed to have waived his right to object on a subsequent reference to the clerk. The Trial, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 94, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,170.

64. See Burton v. The Commander in Chief, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,215 [affirmed without noticing this point in 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,216, and 1 Wall. (U. S.) 43, 17 L. ed. 609].

priety of the action of the commissioner in refusing to allow a witness to be sworn,[65] should be raised in this manner and not by exception to his report; but this has been denied, and the proper practice is said to be that where no facts are shown making it necessary to have the immediate opinion of the court, a reference should proceed to a report, leaving the parties to reserve their exceptions.[66]

c. Report of Commissioner — (I) In General — Sufficiency. A report of the matters referred should state facts and conclusions and should not detail the evidence at length.[67] The report should state the principles upon which damages are assessed, and not merely the gross sum assessed, without any explanation.[68]

(II) Effect and Conclusiveness. Where the witnesses have been heard before the commissioner, his decisions upon questions of fact as to which there was conflicting evidence will be adopted by the court unless clearly erroneous;[69] but such finding is not conclusive upon the court, and if clearly erroneous or there is a manifest preponderance of testimony against it, it will be reversed.[70]

(III) Exception to Report — (A) In General. After the filing of a commissioner's report either party may except thereto.[71] In fact, objection to the report must be made by formal exception filed thereto,[72] and on appeal a report to which no exception was taken below is not open to revision.[73]

66. The Brigantine Beaver, 8 Ben. (U. S.) 594, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,200, wherein it is said that cases may arise in which it would be proper to take the opinion of the court as to the correctness of the ruling of the commissioner at the time of the objection, as where the evidence to be offered is to be given by a witness about to go to sea, or where the testimony may be lost if not taken, but that where no such emergency is shown the cause should proceed to a report, which, with the evidence and ruling of the commissioners, can be brought before the court upon proper exceptions to the conclusions of the report and to such rulings of the commissioner as were objected to at the time. Such a practice seems to be approved in Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 43, 17 L. ed. 609 [affirming this case in 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,216, on the merits without referring to this particular point]; The Bulgaria, 83 Fed. 312; The Trial, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 94, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,170; Holmes v. Dodge, Abb. Adm. 60, 12 Fed. The proper practice is to report the amount ascertained as damages by reason of a collision as "the damages sustained by libellant by reason of a collision," and a report merely of a certain amount as due libellant is erroneous. The Steam Ferry-Boat Baltic, 3 Ben. (U. S.) 195, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 824.

Demand of specification of details.— A report as to the amount of libellant's claim is not objectionable in omitting a detail of the allowance, unless defendant has demanded a specification. Mitchell v. Kelsey, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,663.

Amount of costs.— An award which states the amount due and that libellants are entitled to costs is sufficiently certain without stating the amount of the costs. The Ship Liverpool Packet, 2 Sprague (U. S.) 37, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,407.

An appeal from a decree on a commissioner's report awarding damages will not be dismissed on motion, but must be heard in the usual way where the appellant appeared before the commissioner and contested the damages, though he took no exception to the report of the commissioner to whom the cause was referred on appellant's default on the merits. Farrell v. Campbell, 7 Blatchf. (U. S.) 158, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,682.

When report not conclusive.— Where a surplus after allowance of claims remains in court subject to distribution, there is no one before the court to except to the report, and the decree does not follow the report as a matter of course, though not excepted to, but the court will take it upon itself to see that the proper owners of the surplus receive it. (B) Sufficiency of Exception. The exception should be sufficiently clear and particular to bring to the notice of the court the errors alleged and to enable it to ascertain them without an unreasonable examination of the record.[74]

(C) Matter Reviewed on Exception. An exception to the report of a commissioner draws in question only the reasons upon which the report is founded,[75] and when his authority is limited by the order of reference an excess of authority should be objected to by motion to reject the report or for a rehearing on the merits.[76] The decree of the court cannot be attacked by exceptions to the commissioner's report thereunder.[77]

d. Recommittal. The court may recommit a report or allow a rehearing on the merits where there has been an irregular or improper procedure on the part of the commissioner.[78]

Q. Decree[79]— 1. Conformity to Issues. A decree in admiralty should correspond with the issues in the pleadings;[80] but under a prayer for general relief it is competent for the court to pass such decree as may be required by the proof, although not fully and precisely stated in the libel.[81] in admiralty cases being de novo, appellant could object to damages found by a commissioner in the district court, though no exceptions were filed.

74. Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 43, 17 L. ed. 609, holding that if the exception is that the commissioner received improper and immaterial evidence it should show what the evidence was; if that he had no evidence to justify his report it should set forth what evidence he did have; and if that he had admitted evidence of incompetent witnesses it should give the names of the witnesses and specify why they were incompetent, what they swore to, and why their evidence should have been rejected; The Cayuga, 59 Fed. 483, 16 U. S. App. 577, 8 C. C. A. 188.

Method of ascertaining damages.— An exception to the method adopted by the commissioner in ascertaining damages is not good unless the report or the exception shows what the method was. The Schooner Transit, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 138, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,138.

79. Medium of payment.— Where advances in a foreign port are made in gold, and drafts for the amount on the owners show that the payment to the parties making the advances is to be also in gold, the court may direct that its decree be entered for the amount in like currency. On recovery by several libellants.— Where several libellants, having distinct damage interests, recover in a cause, the decree may be in form for recovery by all of the aggregate sum, and directing a distribution to each of the sums respectively adjudicated to them. The City of Alexandria, 44 Fed. 361.

On recovery against several defendants.— In case of a joint admiralty suit against several, the court may, if equity require it, pass a decree apportioning the damages among the respondents, instead of passing a decree against them jointly. Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 54, 1 L. ed. 507.

2. ENROLLMENT. Decrees in admiralty are deemed to be enrolled as of the term in which they are made.[82]

3. DECREE BY DEFAULT — a. In General. If defendant, on the return-day of the process, does not appear and contest the suit, either by exceptions to the libel or by answering it, the court pronounces him to be in default and a decree pro confesso is entered.[83]

b. Nature of Decree. A decree pro confesso in admiralty is not final, and merely authorizes the court to hear the case ex parte, either directly or by reference to a commissioner to ascertain and report the amount due.[84]

c. Setting Aside Default. The court may, in its discretion, on good cause shown, set aside a decree by default and grant leave to answer.[85]

4. DECREE IN PERSONAM IN SUIT IN REM. As a rule, a decree in personam will not be entered in a suit in rem except upon amendment and the issue of a new process in personam, or the general appearance of the owner in personam.[86] of admiralty in a proceeding in rem is conclusive in respect of the matter on which it decides as against all the world.[88] It has been held, however, that if a former decree is relied on as a defense, the record must show that the matter in question was actually set up and passed upon.[89]

S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 4469. The Boston, 8 Fed. 628.

In a libel on a bottomry bond, the overruling of a plea alleging the disability of libellants to sue, on the ground that at the time the suit was brought and the plea was filed they were alien enemies, does not prevent respondents from pleading in bar that at the time the contract was entered into libellants were alien enemies, and for that reason the contract was void. No. 8,895; Murphy v. Roberts, 30 Ala. 232; Gardner v. Tyler, 16 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 17.

Defenses.— The right of libellant to have summary judgment against a stipulator for value is not affected by the death of a co-stipulator, or by the fact that libellant had not exhausted his remedy against the claimant of the vessel. The C. F. Ackerman, 14 Blatchf. (U. S.) 360, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,564.

Effect of summary judgment.— A summary personal judgment does not conclude defendants, in an action upon the judgment, from disputing the jurisdiction of the district court by showing that they never executed the bond, or that the attorney who assumed to execute it in their names had no authority to do so. Gardner v. Tyler, 16 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 17.

Notice of judgment.— Stipulators in a bond conditioned for the payment of the judgment which may be rendered at the next term of court, or for the forthcoming and delivery of the boat to answer sentence and decree of the court, are not entitled to notice before the rendition of judgment against them. Murphy v. Roberts, 30 Ala. 232. See also Johnson v. Chicago, etc., Elevator Co., 119 U. S. 388, 7 S. Ct. 254, 30 L. ed. 447.

Premature rendition.— In case of a libel against a steamboat, where the bond of the stipulators is conditioned for the payment of the judgment which may be rendered at the next term of court, or for the forthcoming and delivery of the boat to answer sentence and decree of the court, it is erroneous to render judgment against the stipulators on the bond at the same time the judgment of condemnation is rendered against the boat. Attachment.— The liability of sureties on a stipulation for value cannot be enforced by an attachment to compel them to comply with its conditions. The Blanche Page, 16 Blatchf. (U. S.) 1, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,524.

Contempt.— A court of admiralty has no power to punish sureties on a stipulation for value, for contempt in failing to comply with the provisions of the decree. The Blanche Page, 16 Blatchf. (U. S.) 1, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,524.

Sequestration.— A court of admiralty has no power to enforce a decree against sureties in a stipulation for value, by sequestration of their property. The Blanche Page, 16 Blatchf. (U. S.) 1, 3 Fed. Cas. No. 1,524.

Notice of execution.— The award which grants execution upon a final decree authorizes it against all parties embraced in the decree, and there is no necessity of special notice, to the surety of respondent, of an application for an execution against him. 10. Libel to Review Decree. A libel of review will lie in admiralty even after the term at which the original decree was passed.[97]

R. Sale of Property and Distribution of Proceeds or Remnants—

1. Sale of Property — a. Right to Sale. Where a libellant, in a suit in rem in admiralty, establishes a clear legal right to a condemnation and sale, there is no discretionary power in the court to refuse or postpone an order of sale.[98]

b. Notice of Sale. A sale of property after condemnation in suits in rem must be on the notice prescribed by the admiralty rules.[99]

c. Confirmation of Sale. Sales must be confirmed by the court before the purchaser is entitled to the property.[1]

d. Title of Purchaser. Where property is sold under a decree in rem in admiralty, all liens thereon are extinguished,[2] and a clear and indefeasible title is vested in the purchaser.[3]

e. Compelling Completion of Purchase. A court of admiralty may compel a purchaser at a judicial sale to complete his purchase.[4]

Foreign attachments are not proceedings in rem, and the sale of a vessel on adjudication therein will not give the purchaser a title superior to that of a prior mortgagee. Cole v. The Brandt, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 2,978.

Sale to defraud creditors.— If the owner fraudulently and collusively procure his vessel to be sold under the forms of law, and himself become the purchaser, for the purpose of cutting off just claims against her, such sale is void as against creditors. Thompson v. Steamboat Julius D. Morton, 8 Ohio St. 222.

Taking subject to power of court to vacate sale.— The purchasers of property under a decree in admiralty take subject to the power of the court to vacate the sale. The Steamer Sparkle, 7 Ben. (U. S.) 528, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,207.

Warranty.— On a sale by the marshal, under an order of court, no warranty is implied, neither the marshal nor his agent having any authority to warrant the article sold. The Monte Allegre, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 616, 6 L. ed. 174.

4. The Kate Williams, 2 Flipp. (U. S.) 50, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,623.

f. Setting Aside Sale. A court of admiralty has power, in a proper case, to set aside a sale of condemned property.[5]

g. Payment of Proceeds into Registry. Where property has been ordered sold by the admiralty on process in rem, the gross proceeds of the sale, deducting only expenses thereof, should be paid into the registry.[6]

2. Distribution of Proceeds or Remnants — a. Jurisdiction. Whenever proceeds or remnants are rightfully in the possession and custody of admiralty, it is an inherent incident to the jurisdiction of that court to entertain supplemental suits by the parties in interest,[7] to ascertain to whom these proceeds rightfully belong, and to deliver them over to the parties who establish the lawful ownership thereof.[8]

b. Mode of Proceeding. The party entitled to the remnant or surplus in court after a sale may obtain it by petition or motion.[9]

Excuse for refusal to complete purchase.— On a motion for an attachment for contempt in refusing to pay in the purchase-price of a tug purchased at a judicial sale thereof, it is no defense that the purchaser did not get all the property that formerly belonged to the vessel, where it was announced at the sale that the vessel was sold "as she is," although the published notices designated the vessel, "her boats, tackle, apparel, furniture, and appurtenances." The Kate Williams, 2 Flipp. (U. S.) 50, 53, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,623.

But the refusal of an auctioneer employed by the marshal, without authority, to allow the purchaser to take the vessel, unless he pay $25 auctioneer's fees and $5 for a bill of sale, will relieve the purchaser from his obligation to perfect the sale, so that he will not be liable for a deficiency resulting on the resale. The John E. Mulford, 18 Fed. 455.

Summary process.— Where the purchaser on a marshal's sale takes possession without paying the price, the court will enforce by summary process either a redelivery of the property in specie or payment of the purchase-money. The Phebe, 1 Ware (U. S.) 368, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,066.

5. The New York, 93 Fed. 495; The Ruby, 38 Fed. 622; The Garland, 16 Fed. 283; The Steamer Sparkle, 7 Ben. (U. S.) 528, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,207; The Schooner George Prescott, 1 Ben. (U. S.) 1, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,339; Freeman v. The Albany, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,083*a*.

Fraud.— A sale will be set aside for fraud of the purchaser, or of the officer who conducted it, or for fraudulent negligence or misconduct in any other person connected with it (The Steamer Sparkle, 7 Ben. (U. S.) 528, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,207); but a simple allegation of fraud in a petition to set aside a sale of a vessel without setting forth the facts which constitute the fraud is insufficient (The Kaloolah, Brown Adm. 55, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,602).

Inadequacy of price.— A sale in admiralty will be set aside where there was a combination between the persons in possession of the vessel and libellant, and the price was grossly inadequate. The Steamer Sparkle, 7 Ben. (U. S.) 528, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,207.

Laches.— Where the mortgagee of a vessel knew of the institution of a suit against her in time to intervene, and knew of the sale before its confirmation, but suffered six months to elapse before making application to set the sale aside, his laches will preclude him from any relief. Execution against proceeds.— A creditor, by judgment in a state court, of the owners of the vessel, even though he have a decree in personam also in the admiralty against them, cannot seize, or attach, on execution, proceeds of the vessel in the registry of the admiralty.

c. Necessity of Order of Court. A distribution of the proceeds of sale should not be made without an order of court.[10]

d. Claims Entitled to Share — (I) In General. The remnants of proceeds on the sale of a vessel under the process of the court are a representative of the vessel, and subject to claims which might be enforced against her in rem.[11]

(II) Claims Not Enforceable in Admiralty. As a rule an admiralty court will not order to be paid out of surplus proceeds in the registry a demand which could not be enforced in admiralty by a suit either in rem or in personam.[12] It has been held, however, that a claim for which a lien is given by a state law may be paid out of the registry, though such lien is not enforceable in admiralty.[13]

Filing libel to enforce mortgage.— Where a vessel has been libeled and sold in admiralty, and the proceeds are in the registry of the court, a mortgagee cannot file a libel against the proceeds. Schuchardt v. Babbidge, 19 How. (U. S.) 239, 15 L. ed. 625.

Necessity of presentation of claim.— The claims of officers of the court for fees and expenses upon proceeds in the registry must be presented to the court for allowance. The Phebe, 1 Ware (U. S.) 360, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,065.

Proof of claim.— In disposing of a fund in its registry it is competent for a court of admiralty to require proof of the right of the claimant to any part of the same. Dent v. Radmann, 1 Fed. 882. See also Rostron v. The Water Witch, 44 Fed. 95.

Effect of order for payment.— Where the proceeds of sale of a vessel are paid into court, claims against the fund will be barred after order for the payment of the money out of the registry. The J. W. Tucker, 20 Fed. 129.

Waiver of order.— If there be no mala fides the assent and ratification of all the parties will cure the irregularity of a distribution without an order of court. The Collector, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 194, 5 L. ed. 239.

Claims arising on the last voyage, and those for watching the vessel in port to the time of her seizure by the marshal, may be allowed out of the surplus proceeds in the registry, as against the assignee in bankruptcy. The Ship Trimountain, 5 Ben. (U. S.) 246, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,175.

Claim of assignee.— Admiralty Rule 43, providing that any person having an interest in any proceeds in the registry of the court shall have a right, by petition and summary proceeding, to intervene pro interesse suo for a delivery thereof to him, does not authorize a proceeding by petition against a sum in court awarded from the proceeds of the sale of a vessel to one who rendered salvage services, such petition having been filed by a third person, asserting no interest in the vessel but alleging a promise by the party to whom the salvage compensation was so awarded to pay half the amount thereof to the petitioner. Sheldrake v. The Chatfield, 52 Fed. 495.

See also The Skylark, 2 Biss. (U. S.) 251, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 12,928, wherein it was held that district courts in admiralty exercise equity powers in the distribution of a surplus arising under a sale, whether the parties have maritime liens or not.

See also Harper v. The New Brig, Gilp. (U. S.) 536, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,090, wherein it was held that one who purchased materials on his personal responsibility, and then delivered them to the owner of a ship, to be used in the construction thereof, and who afterward received from the owner a bill of sale of the ship to secure him for such materials and for money advances, though having no right to enforce his claim as a preferred lien in admiralty, is entitled to a surplus remaining in court after the sale of the vessel by a proceeding in rem in admiralty on libels by others.

(III) Claims on Which Lien Is Lost. One whose lien for a claim has been lost may be paid out of remnants remaining in the registry.[14]

(IV) Mortgages. A mortgage debt against a vessel will, in marshaling her proceeds for distribution, be entitled, after satisfaction of privileged and lien debts, to payment as against the owner.[15]

e. Order of Payment of Claims—(I) In General. In the disposition of the proceeds of a vessel it is the custom of some courts to pay different claims in the following order: costs of sale, and those incident to the custody of the vessel; seamen's wages, unless there be subsequent salvage; claims for towage and necessaries furnished in a foreign port; claims for supplies and materials furnished in the home port, for which a lien is given by the state law; mortgages.[16]

Month. 343, wherein it was held that an ordinary common-law chattel mortgage on a vessel, though given for the purchase-money, and filed and recorded as required by the law of the state to which the vessel belongs and the law of the United States, does not entitle the mortgagee to claim the surplus of the proceeds of a ship, sold under the process and decree of a court of admiralty, in preference to a privileged creditor who has a maritime lien.

Agreement for mortgage.— A person having an agreement for a mortgage upon a vessel has no such interest in the thing as will entitle him to claim the proceeds of her sale in the registry of the court. The Favorite, 3 Sawy. (U. S.) 405, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,699.

Mortgagee as purchaser.— The fact that the purchaser of a vessel in a proceeding in rem is also the owner of a mortgage thereon does not extinguish the mortgage, but the same becomes a charge upon the proceeds of the vessel, and the purchaser thereof may, upon petition, obtain payment of the amount due upon the mortgage out of such proceeds, all other claims against the vessel having been satisfied. No. 7,620, wherein the proceeds of a vessel sold on a libel for wages were distributed in the following order: wages and costs; recorded mortgages; clerk's, marshal's, and proctor's fees; supplies at the home port.

Priority between affreightment and claims of materialmen.— Maritime liens arising out of contracts of affreightment, and liens not resting upon the necessities of the ship or the hazards of navigation, are subordinate to the claims of materialmen, bottomry bond holders, salvors, and collision claimants. The America, 1 Fed. Cas. No. 288, 16 Law Rep. 264, 2 West. L. Month. 279; The Unadilla, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,333, 9 Chic. Leg. N. 427.

Priority between factors and possessors of cargo.— Factors entitled to a certain sum as commissions are not entitled to the proceeds of sale of a cargo as against bona fide possessors thereof, but the court will decide upon the equities of all concerned, and decree the amount of the lien to the factors, and the residue to the other claimants. The Ship Packet, 3 Mason (U. S.) 334, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,655.

Priority between hypothecations and mortgages.— On the sale of a vessel in a suit in rem, persons claiming by hypothecations made by the master to secure loans for necessary repairs and supplies are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds in court before a prior mortgage. Furniss v. The Brig Magoun, Olc. Adm. 55, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,163. See also Schuchardt v. The Angelique, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,483*c*.

Priority between mortgages and insurance premiums.— Claims for insurance premiums and moneys advanced to disburse ships in a foreign port, in so far as they are not maritime liens, cannot be paid out of surplus moneys in the registry arising from the sale of the vessels in priority to the claims of a mortgagee of the vessels. The Allianca, 65 Fed. 245.

Priority between salvage and seamen's wages.— In marshaling claims for payment from the proceeds of sale, salvage is entitled to be paid in preference to prior claims for seamen's wages. The Athenian, 3 Fed. 248.

Priority between sureties for claimants and mortgagees.— Sureties for claimants, who are compelled to pay a salvage decree, are not entitled to priority over valid mortgages which antedated the salvage services. Roberts v. The Huntsville, 3 Woods (U. S.) 386, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,904.

court, not followed by a decree, does not give the attaching creditor any priority over a creditor subsequently filing a libel in admiralty.[17]

(III) Libellant First Instituting Proceedings. Original libellants are not entitled to priority in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of a vessel over equal-rank claimants who have subsequently instituted proceedings for the enforcement of their demands.[18]

(IV) Liens of Same Class. Maritime liens of the same class, upon a vessel sold under order of a court of admiralty, should be paid out of the proceeds in the inverse order of the dates of the creation of such liens.[19]

f. Marshaling Assets. It has been held that admiralty will marshal the fund in its registry only between lien-holders and owners.[20]

S. Appeals — 1. Jurisdiction. As heretofore shown, the appellate jurisdiction in admiralty is, in certain classes of cases, vested in the circuit court of appeals, and in other classes in the supreme court.[21]

2. Orders and Decrees from Which Appeals Lie — a. General Rule. The appellate courts have jurisdiction of appeals only from final decrees.[22]

b. Application of the Rule — (I) Interlocutory Decrees. Thus an appeal

But see The Daniel Kaine, 35 Fed. 785 (wherein it appeared that after seizure of a vessel by the marshal on process in admiralty, but before sale, a writ of fieri facias out of a state court on a judgment against one of the part-owners of the vessel was put in the hands of a sheriff. It was held that, as against defendant in the execution, plaintiff therein acquired a lien as soon as his writ reached the sheriff's hands, and that, after satisfaction of all admiralty liens and liens of domestic creditors under the local statute, the execution creditor was entitled to defendant's remaining share of the surplus); The Lady Franklin, 2 Biss. (U. S.) 121, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,983 (wherein it was held that a federal court, in distributing the proceeds of a sale made to satisfy a maritime lien, will distribute them to the parties entitled under the law, state or federal; and parties who might have perfected their liens under the state law, had not the issue come into admiralty, are entitled to priority out of the proceeds); The Skylark, 2 Biss. (U. S.) 251, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 12,928 (wherein it was held that the purchaser of a vessel under execution from a state court has no superior rights as against the decree of an admiralty court enforcing a maritime lien).

Intervention by attaching sheriff.— A sheriff who, after attaching a vessel in a suit by a creditor against her owner, permits, without opposition, her seizure by the marshal under admiralty process, is a competent party to intervene in the admiralty suit and claim the proceeds in the registry. But see The Sea Lark, 34 Fed. 52, wherein it was held that where the time fixed by the rules of court for making defense has elapsed, and the libel has been taken for confessed, but the formal decree of condemnation and sale has not been entered, on account of the absence of the judge, any maritime claimant who comes in afterward by petition does so subject to the libel, and cannot be paid till libellant is paid in full, though his claim was originally prior to the libel.

Failure to intervene or institute suit.— A person injured by a collision instituted proceedings against the vessel in fault, and at his own expense prosecuted the suit to condemnation. It was held that another person injured, who took no part in the suit, could not share in the proceeds of the sale of the vessel until the claim of the first party had been satisfied. Woodworth v. Corn Exch. Ins. Co., 5 Wall. (U. S.) 87, 18 L. ed. 517.

So a creditor holding a maritime lien, who proceeds in rem and obtains a final decree before another creditor, having a coördinate claim, has instituted proceedings or intervened in the prior suit to enforce his lien, is entitled to be paid his debt in preference to such other creditor. ordinarily does not lie from an interlocutory decree, although it has been said that a party may appeal from an interlocutory decree having the effect of a final decree, or he may, at his election, wait until the final decree is positively entered and then take an appeal.[23]

(II) Amendment of Record Inserting Final Decree. The appellate court cannot allow an amendment of the record on appeal, by agreement of the parties, inserting a final decree so as to give jurisdiction.[24]

(III) Pro Forma Decrees. It has been held that an appeal will lie from a final decree even though it is entered pro forma without a trial upon the merits.[25]

c. Finality of Decrees — (I) In General. A final decree has been defined to be the determination by the court, upon the issue presented by the pleadings, which ascertains and finds absolutely and finally the rights of the parties in the particular suit in relation to the subject-matter in litigation and puts an end to the suit.[26] Where a decree decides finally, so far as the court can, the matter in dispute between the parties, it is final,[27] and since the allowance of costs is within the discretion of the court, a decree in admiralty may be final, and therefore

The Alert, 61 Fed. 113, 26 U. S. App. 63, 9 C. C. A. 390.

27. Thus the decree of the district court refusing an order for the sale of a vessel on an application by one of two owners, who have an equal interest, is final, and an appeal lies therefrom. Davis v. The Brig Seneca, Gilp. (U. S.) 34, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,651.

Decrees concerning funds in court.— There can be no final decree concerning funds which remain in the custody of the court except one which terminates the custody. Montgomery v. Anderson, 21 How. (U. S.) 386, 16 L. ed. 160; Cushing v. Laird, 15 Blatchf. (U. S.) 219, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,510; U. S. v. A Canoe, 5 Hughes (U. S.) 490, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,718; George v. Saunders, 19 Ala. 744.

Decrees in salvage cases.— A decree in a salvage case, rendered before the charges and expenses of keeping and selling the property are ascertained and the salvage apportioned, and which merely awards a certain rate of salvage out of the proceeds after deducting the charges and expenses, is not a final decree, but at most is only an interlocutory decree in the nature of a final decree. The Steamboat New England, 3 Sumn. (U. S.) 495, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,151.

Decrees of condemnation.— A decree in admiralty for the condemnation of a vessel is not final if the libel also claims the condemnation of the cargo, which has been delivered to the respondents at an appraised value and the money deposited with the register. Dayton v. U. S., 131 U. S. lxxx, appendix, 18 L. ed. 169.

Decree of dismissal.— On the ground that the decree is not final it has been held that no appeal lies from a decree dismissing a libel for want of prosecution (The Merchant, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 105, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,436) or for want of evidence (The Delaware, 33 Fed. 589); but it has been held that a decree in a prize cause, dismissing, with costs, a claim to property libeled as prize of war, and directing execution to issue for the costs, is a final judgment from which an appeal lies, although no disposition is made of the libel or the property (Withenbury v. U. S., 5 Wall. (U. S.) 819, 18 L. ed. 613).

Decree of reference to a commissioner.— A decree in a suit in rem on a bottomry bond, referring the case to a commissioner to ascertain the amount and report to the court, with liberty to either party to move to frame the decree thereon, is not final and appealable. The Yuba, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 314, 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,192.

Decree sustaining exceptions with permission to amend.— Where a decree sustains exceptions to the libel and gives permission to amend within a certain time, the prosecution of an appeal within the prescribed time is an election to waive the right to amend so that the decree takes effect immediately and becomes a final appealable decree. The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897.

Orders relating to executions.— An order denying a motion for a perpetual stay of execution, and to set aside a levy pursuant to the execution, is not a final decree, within the meaning of the statute, from which an appeal lies (The Elmira, 16 Fed. 133). And after a purchaser at execution has been put into possession by the sheriff, and has been dispossessed by the former owner, a subsequent order directing the sheriff again to put the purchaser into possession, being void, is not a final judgment and is therefore not appealable (Loring v. Illsley, 1 Cal. 24).

appealable, although there is an omission to decree costs.[28] A denial of a motion to open a default, being discretionary, is not appealable.[29]

(II) Action on Report of Commissioners Necessary to Make Decree Appealable. No appeal lies from a decree of restitution, etc., until the report of the commissioners to ascertain the damages has been acted on by the court.[30] And in the case of a libel in personam for damages, if a decree be rendered for the recovery of damages, and commissioners be appointed to ascertain the amount thereof, no appeal lies from such decree till the commissioners have made their report and it has been acted on by the court.[31]

3. Parties — a. In General. An appeal may, generally speaking, be taken by any person who is a party to the proceedings,[32] but not by a person who is neither a party nor privy to the judgment or decree.[33]

b. Joinder and Severance. Separate appeals by several parties asserting an interest in common, affected by a single decree, will not be permitted ;[34] but when the decree is several and independent as to different parties, each may appeal separately.[35] It has been held, also, that on a joint decree against respondents for a maritime tort there may be separate appeals where respondents have severed in their pleadings or jointly pleaded a general denial.[36]

c. Dismissal as to Improper Parties. An appeal may be dismissed as to improper parties thereto without affecting the proper ones.[37]

d. Amendment Bringing in New Parties. An amendment as to bringing in new parties was not allowed on appeal from the district to the circuit court.[38]

e. Appeal in Name of Vessel. An appeal or writ of error cannot be sustained in the name of a steamboat, or any other than a human being, or some corporate or associated aggregation of persons.[39]

4. Time for Taking Appeal — a. In General. All appeals in admiralty cases to the circuit court of appeals must, unless otherwise specially provided, be taken within six months, and appeals from that court to the supreme court must be taken within one year, after the entry of the order, judgment, or decree;[40] but appeals from the district or circuit court to the supreme court may be taken within two years,[41] except that appeals in prize cases are limited to thirty days after the rendering of the decree.[42]

b. Effect of Delay in Perfecting Appeal. Where an appeal in admiralty is not taken within the prescribed time it will be dismissed.[43]

5. Method of Taking Appeal — a. In General. In the absence of specially prescribed rules the practice of the court will govern as to notice and appeal bonds.[44]

b. Notice of Appeal. A notice to the effect that the appellant appeals from the decree, signed by the party or his proctor, may be filed with the clerk and served on the opposite party or his proctor.[45]

c. Bond to Stay Proceedings. If appellant desires to stay proceedings under the decree he must give bonds therefor within the time prescribed by the rules of the court.[46]

d. Security for Costs. But while the giving of a bond to stay the proceedings is a matter which lies within the discretion of appellant, as a general rule he must in any event give bond for the costs of the appeal.[47] It has been held, however, that where an appeal in admiralty has been taken by petition and citation, and appellee has been served with notice and has appeared, the appeal has a standing irrespective of the bond.[48]

e. Sufficiency of the Appeal Bond. An appeal bond should be executed by the appellant personally, if resident within the district,[49] with at least one surety,[50] and should run in favor of all the persons whom the appeal is intended to bring before the court.[51] It may be taken before a United States commissioner in the absence of a rule of court providing otherwise.[52]

tion for appeal setting forth the nature and date of filing of the successive pleadings in the case, with the action of the court thereon; and also an assignment of errors setting forth separately and particularly each error asserted and intended to be urged; and unless this is done the court will not hear or regard alleged errors except at its own option or request.[53] While a plain error may be noticed and considered,[54] the appellate court usually will not consider points not raised below nor assigned as error.[55]

(II) Sufficiency of the Assignment. The assignment of errors must be specific,[56] and an assignment that the court erred in allowing certain claims, which the evidence adduced by libellant did not substantiate, is too general to be considered,[57] as is an assignment "that the court erred in holding that libellant was entitled to any compensation for the injuries received."[58]

(III) Supplemental Assignments. For good cause shown, additional assignments of error may, on motion, be allowed to be filed.[59]

When the appeal has been allowed and the bond therefor approved by a judge of the circuit court of appeals or a district judge, a citation signed by the judge and returnable in thirty days is issued and served on appellee, notifying him thereof and designating the time for him to appear in the appellate court.[60]

b. The Apostles. It is the duty of the clerk, after an appeal is allowed and citation issued, to make up, certify, and transmit the record in the case to the appellate court. This must be done within thirty days after the filing of the notice of appeal.[61]

7. Effect of Appearance by Appellee. The appearance of appellee in an admiralty suit and his participation in the proceedings before the appellate court estop him from denying that there is a valid appeal pending.[62]

8. Effect of Appeal and Stay Bond. The taking of an appeal and giving of a supersedeas bond suspends and vacates the decree, and the case is heard de novo in the appellate court;[63] but it has been held that the taking of such appeal does

9. Form and Contents of Record on Appeal — a. In General. Elaborate provision is made for the form and contents of the record on appeal by the admiralty rules.[65]

b. Inclusion of Statement of Facts or Evidence. Unless there be an agreed statement of facts, or a statement is made by the court below of the evidence adduced or the facts proved,[66] the evidence presented in the court below must all appear in the transcript of appeal, otherwise the appellate court will decline to try the cause.[67] And it has been held that the records should be so prepared as to show which witnesses were examined in the presence of the district judge, and which were not so examined.[68]

10. Appeals from Territorial Courts. The practice on appeal from a territorial court in admiralty is regulated by the rules and usages of courts in admiralty[69] and not by the territorial statutes.[70]

It was held that an appeal from an order refusing an application, on a cross-libel, for security and stay, under Admiralty Rule 53, did not suspend the proceedings in the original suit. Control of property pending appeal.—Under the former system it was held that upon an appeal from the district to the circuit court in a proceeding in rem, the property or its proceeds followed the cause into the circuit court (The Wanata, 95 U. S. 600, 24 L. ed. 461; The Lottawanna, 20 Wall. (U. S.) 201, 22 L. ed. 259; The Grotius, 1 Gall. (U. S.) 503, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 5,844; Davis v. The Brig Seneca, Gilp. (U. S.) 34, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 5,844), except that it might, for the protection of the property, order its sale if it were perishable (Jones v. Walker, Brunn. Col. Cas. (U. S.) 25, 3 N. C. 475, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,506). But it was held that on a further appeal to the supreme court the property remained subject to the disposition of the circuit court and did not follow the cause into the supreme court (The Collector, 6 Wheat. (U. S.) 194, 5 L. ed. 239; Hayford v. Griffith, 3 Blatchf. (U. S.) 34, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6,263).

65. Admiralty Rule 52.

Setting out a rule violated.—The holding of the trial court that a vessel was in fault in violating a rule of the supervising inspector cannot be reviewed on appeal, where such rule is not set out in the record or the briefs, for the appellate court cannot take judicial notice of such rules. The Clara, 55 Fed. 1021, 14 U. S. App. 346, 5 C. C. A. 390.

66. Where there is nothing in the certificate of the judge to the statement of facts, or elsewhere in the transcript, to show that the adverse party was present when the statement was made up, or had any notice that it would be made, in the absence of a showing of one or both of these facts, the certificate to the statement will be of no avail, and the appeal should be dismissed. 70. Braithwaite v. Jordan, 5 N. D. 196, 65 N. W. 701, 31 L. R. A. 238. In Steamboat Zephyr v. Brown, 2 Wash. Terr. 44, 3 Pac. 186, it was held that the rule of the civil law regulated the mode of appeal in admiralty cases in Washington Territory, and that, in the absence of a rule or statute, an appeal was to be taken during the sitting of the court or at least at the time of sentence and to the term of the appellate court next after the term at which the decree was rendered.

(I) Appeal a Trial De Novo — (A) In General. An appeal in admiralty from the district court to the higher courts vacates the decree appealed from, and the cause is heard de novo.[71]

(B) Presumption from Record. An appellate court will indulge in presumptions in favor of the correctness of the decree below, except where the record is indefinite or silent as to controlling facts.[72]

(C) Conflicting Evidence Below. The decision of a trial court in admiralty upon questions of fact, based upon conflicting testimony or the credibility of witnesses examined before the judge, will not be reversed on appeal unless there is a decided preponderance of evidence against it, or a mistake is clearly shown;[73] but where the trial judge, who has heard the witnesses, decides disputed questions of fact without giving proper weight to the testimony of witnesses who were in the best position to observe the facts, his conclusions of fact will not be followed by the circuit court of appeals.[74]

Where the testimony has been taken in a cause before a commissioner or examiner, and not before the judge below, and it is all before the appellate court, that court will examine it for itself and reach its own conclusions. (II) Failure to File Cross-Appeal. Where a party has not appealed from a decree affecting him, but the other party has, the former cannot have the decree modified or reversed in his favor.[75]

b. Powers of Appellate Court — (I) Admission of Further Evidence — (A) In General. An appellate court will admit new evidence, and, if necessary, will award commissions to take such evidence where it appears that the requirements of justice call for such a course;[76] but further evidence will ordinarily be allowed by the appellate court only where some satisfactory excuse is given for the failure to examine the witnesses in the courts below.[77] However, new testimony will be admitted on appeal in admiralty when the court is of the opinion that under all the circumstances substantial justice requires it, though a satisfactory excuse is not given for failing to produce the testimony below.[78]

(B) Testimony Withheld Below. Where testimony has been deliberately withheld in the lower court, an appellate court will not admit it.[79]

(C) Weight of New Testimony. New testimony introduced on an appeal in admiralty is not entitled to the same consideration as testimony given in the court below.[80]

(D) Method of Taking Testimony. New evidence cannot, under the admiralty rules, be taken by deposition de bene esse, but only by a commission which should not issue of course, but only, as has been stated, when it appears that the testimony is material or a good excuse for not offering it in the trial court is given.[81]

(II) Amendment of Pleadings. Amendments may be made in the appellate court not only as to form, but as to matters of substance;[82] but the power of the court on appeal to allow amendments to the pleadings, so as to let in new evidence and new grounds of defense, should be exercised only in order to bring the merits of the controversy fairly before the court. They should be allowed only when justice requires and on a showing therefor.[83]

(III) Dismissal of Libel. The higher court, on appeal, has the right to dismiss the libel in the court below, but will not do so unless the findings of the district judge are against libellant and are warranted by the proof, and unless the new testimony introduced in the appellate court does not substantially change them.[84]

c. Decree — (I) In General. Since the effect of an appeal is to call for a new trial, the appellate court may direct such a decree to be entered and such proceedings to be taken as it may think proper.[85]

(II) Partial Affirmance. It is competent for the appellate court to partially confirm a decree in admiralty rendered by a lower court and reversed as to other points.[86]

(III) Partial Reversal. Where only part of a decree has been appealed from in case of a reversal, the remaining parts remain in full force and themselves become a part of the reversing decree.[87]

(IV) Allowance of Interest. When a decree in favor of libellant, which includes interest, is affirmed, he will be awarded interest on the whole decree unless special circumstances induce the court to disallow it,[88] but not for the time pending the appeal where libellant has appealed either by direct or cross appeal.[89]

Remand for amendment.— Where the libel is so defective that a decree cannot be entered upon it, but the evidence in the record shows merit, but does not conform to the allegations, the appellate court will not amend the libel, but will remand it to the lower court with directions to permit an amendment and for a new trial. decrees, but enters an order for a mandate to issue to the lower court directing what decree should be entered there; and thereupon the clerk, after taxing the costs[90] and attaching a statement thereof to the mandate, transmits the same to the court below, which accordingly enters the decree as directed, and execution may then be issued thereon against the defeated party and his sureties.[91]

T. Certifying Questions to the Supreme Court — 1. Statutory Provision For. The act of March 3, 1891, provides that the circuit court of appeals may at any time certify to the supreme court of the United States any question or proposition of law concerning which it desires the instruction of that court for its proper decision.[92]

2. Cases in Which Questions May Be Certified. Where the case presents no peculiarity rendering it appropriate for the circuit court of appeals to certify questions to the supreme court, an application therefor will be denied, and this will be done if the supreme court has passed on the question in a former case.[93]

3. Certificate and Record. Where a circuit court of appeals certifies a question or proposition of law to the supreme court for its decision, the certificate must contain a proper statement of the facts out of which the same arises, and if application is thereupon made to the supreme court that the whole record may be sent up to it for its consideration, decision, review, or determination, as if the whole matter or cause had been brought up on appeal or error, the applicant must furnish the supreme court with a certified copy of the entire record.[94]

U. Writ of Certiorari — 1. Power of Supreme Court to Review by Certiorari. As already shown, the supreme court may require by certiorari certain cases to be certified up for its review and determination with the same power and authority as if the case had been brought up by appeal or writ of error.[95]

2. Extent of Power — a. In General. The power of the supreme court in certiorari extends to every case pending in the circuit court of appeals, and may be exercised at any time during such pendency, provided the case is one which otherwise would be finally determined in that court; but the power will be sparingly exercised and is properly invoked only where questions of gravity and importance are involved.[96]

b. Necessity for a Final Decree. Ordinarily the writ of certiorari will not issue until after a final decree in the court of appeals.[97]

c. What Matters Reviewable. Where a case has been certified to the supreme court, the whole case is then open for examination, although it may have been in the circuit court of appeals on a second appeal and that court was limited to certain questions;[98] but only errors assigned by the petitioner can be considered, although the case was heard in the circuit court of appeals on appeals by both parties.[99]

d. Time of Applying for Writ. Application for the writ of certiorari may be made at any time within a year from the judgment or decree in the circuit court of appeals, if that is during the next term of the supreme court.[1]

e. Petition and Proceedings. Application for certiorari is made by a petition setting forth the questions involved, and having attached thereto a certified copy of the entire record in the circuit court of appeals. A copy of the petition should be served on the opposite party, with notice of the time it will be presented, and proof of such service should be filed with the petition. Briefs may be filed on both sides, but no oral argument is allowed.[2]

f. Court to Which Writ Issues. The fact that the mandate of the circuit court of appeals, affirming the decree of the district court, has gone down, does not prevent the supreme court from issuing the writ to the circuit court of appeals.[3]

V. Costs[4] — 1. Control of Court Over. Costs in admiralty are in the discretion of the court and will be allowed or refused according to the general equities of the case.[5]

2. Parties To and Against Whom Awarded — a. Prevailing Party. The prevailing party is generally entitled to costs.[6] They do not, however, necessarily follow the decree, and may be allowed, withheld, or divided without regard to the ultimate termination of the proceeding.[7]

b. Each Party in Part Successful. Where each party is in part successful, the costs may be distributed.[8]

c. On Dismissal of Libel—(I) In General. Though costs are usually imposed on libellant on the dismissal of a libel,[9] a dismissal may be without costs to libellant if he had strong probable cause of action.[10]

(II) For Want of Jurisdiction. Where a suit in rem in admiralty is dismissed because the court had no jurisdiction over the res, no decree as to costs can be made. In such case each party is responsible to the officers of the court for the costs incurred at his instance.[11]

Recovery in excess of tender.— Where each party makes an offer of settlement, libellant is entitled to costs where he recovers more than he is offered, though much less than he has demanded. The Walter W. Pharo, 1 Lowell (U. S.) 437, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,124.

Sufficiency of tender.— A tender or offer of payment relied on to bar costs should be a continuing offer. The Walter W. Pharo, 1 Lowell (U. S.) 437, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,124.

3. Items Taxable[13] — a. In General. The compensation to be taxed and allowed attorneys, solicitors, proctors,[14] clerks,[15] marshals,[16] commissioners,[17] witnesses,[18] jurors, and printers, is fixed by statute.[19] Items of costs not specified in the statute may, however, be allowed.[20]

And a payment of money into court, on plea of tender, at the filing of the answer, will not affect the question of costs, unless it is specified how much is tendered as payment of the claim and how much for costs. The Good Hope, 40 Fed. 608. So an offer to pay wages at the owner's counting-house, and a refusal to pay elsewhere, does not exonerate him from costs. The Sarah Jane, Blatchf. & H. Adm. 401, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,348.

A "final hearing," within U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 824, upon which libellant's proctor becomes entitled to a docket-fee, is a submission of the case for determination on the merits, or the submission of some question the disposition of which finally ends the case. Same proctor representing different libellants.— A proctor representing more than one libellant on final hearing, though under independent libels, is entitled to but one docket-fee. Docket-fees.— Where separate claims and demands are filed, which could, and properly should, be united, all the causes of action being proven by the same witnesses in the same depositions, all the parties appearing by the same attorneys, and the causes covered by one final decree, it is error for the court to allow more than one docket-fee. The State of Missouri, 76 Fed. 376, 46 U. S. App. 245, 22 C. C. A. 239.

Payment out of proceeds.— Where a vessel is sold by a trustee under the limited liability act, and the proceeds are paid into court, the clerk's commission is payable from such proceeds, though the owner appears and contests the liability of the vessel. The Vernon, 36 Fed. 113.

"Receiving, keeping, and paying out money."— Where a decree for salvage is rendered, but the claim is paid without sale of the vessel libeled, the clerk, under U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 828, giving him a commission for "receiving, keeping, and paying out money" in pursuance of any order of court, of a given per cent. of the amount "received, kept, and paid," is not entitled to any compensation. Party as witness.— Witness fees and mileage for the attendance of a party to an admiralty suit cannot be taxed in his favor against the other party. The Schooner Elizabeth and Helen, 4 Ben. (U. S.) 101, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,354.

Proof of payment.— The affidavit of a proctor that certain expenses have been actually incurred is not a sufficient voucher to authorize the clerk to tax such expenses as witness fees; and, if the opposing proctor object to such proof, the receipt of the witness, or the affidavit of the proctor that he has actually paid the fees, should be required. The Sallie P. Linderman, 22 Fed. 557.

Witness out of district.— Where a witness attends from out of the district, mileage can be taxed only to the extent of one hundred miles. The Vernon, 36 Fed. 113.

b. Compromise or Settlement of Litigation. The officers of court cannot be deprived of their fees by a compromise or settlement out of court.[21]

c. Error in Taxation. An irregularity in the taxation of costs may be corrected by the court, on motion, after final decree rendered.[22]

4. On Appeal — a. In General. The successful party to an appeal is usually awarded costs.[23] It has been held, however, that an appellant, in fault for delays before the circuit court, on appeal may be charged with the costs in the circuit court of appeals, though successful in obtaining a reversal.[24]

Costs of bond for release.— Where the claimant of a libeled vessel gives a bond for her release, and a decree is eventually rendered in his favor, the expense actually incurred by him in procuring the execution of the bond for her release by a surety company is a legitimate item of costs, to be taxed in his favor. Failure to decree costs.— The failure of the circuit court of appeals to decree costs to appellants on their appeal, even if intentional, affords no ground for complaining of a subsequent decree of the district court, as the error, if any, should have been corrected by motion in the appellate court before the mandate issued. The State of California, 54 Fed. 404, 7 U. S. App. 20, 4 C. C. A. 393.

Modification of decree.— Costs on appeal will not be awarded to either party where a decree of the district court is affirmed in so far as it dismissed the libel, but reversed as to the award of costs of claimant. The McDonald, 4 Blatchf. (U. S.) 477, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 8,756.

Recovery of less than three hundred dollars. — It has been held that the statute (U. S. Rev. Stat. (1878), § 968), providing that where "a libellant, upon his own appeal, recovers less than three hundred dollars, exclusive of costs, he shall not be allowed, but at the discretion of the court may be adjudged to pay, costs," relates to all the costs affected by the appeal. The Cassius, 41 Fed. 367.

b. Items Taxable. An appeal being a new trial, the question of costs is to be disposed of as an original question.[25]

5. Ownership of Costs. Fees in a cause in admiralty are the individual property of the persons by whom they were earned, and not of the suitors or parties.[26]

I. Definition.

Adoption has been defined to be the act by which relations of paternity and affiliation are recognized as legally existing between persons not so related by nature.[1]

II. History.

While the adoption of children is a practice of the greatest antiquity,[2] which was recognized by the civil law from its earliest date[3] and obtains in the continental nations of Europe whose jurisprudence follows the civil law,[4] it was unknown to the common law of England and exists in the states of the Union solely by virtue of statute.[5] While all the statutes which have been enacted authorizing the adoption of children are of comparatively recent date,[6] it now exists in nearly all the states.[7]

III. Constitutionality of Statutes.

Although numerous attacks have been made on the constitutionality of statutes relating to adoption they have been held uniformly to be constitutional[8] except where they interfere with vested rights[9] or where the act failed to state the object thereof in its title.[10]

IV. Who May Adopt.

A. In General. The statutes contemplate that persons desirous of adopting children shall be of suitable age to enter into parental relations,[11] and the mere fact that one is in the senile age of life does not render him incompetent.[12]

B. Husband and Wife — 1. Jointly. While it would be inconsistent with the general scope and purpose of the statute to permit two or more persons representing different families jointly or concurrently to adopt the same child, that objection does not apply to a joint proceeding by husband and wife;[13] and a husband and wife may jointly adopt a child.[14]

2. Separately — a. In General. In the absence of statutory provision to the

6. Krug v. Davis, 87 Ind. 590.

One of the first, if not the very first, of the states whose jurisprudence is based exclusively on the common law, to introduce the legal adoption of children, was Massachusetts, where it was done by Mass. Stat. (1851), c. 324. Gray, C. J., in Ross v. Ross, 129 Mass. 243, 37 Am. Rep. 321.

7. In Clarkson v. Hatton, 143 Mo. 47, 55, 44 S. W. 761, 65 Am. St. Rep. 635, the court said: "Adoption . . . exists in this country by the statutes of every state so far as we have had occasion to examine."

8. Power of adoption conferred on judge.— In Matter of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252, it was held that a provision of the code conferring power to perform the ceremony of adoption upon the judge, as distinguished from the court, was constitutional.

Power of child to hold real estate, when adopted in another state, is not in conflict with Ind. Const. art. 8, § 2, describing what shall constitute the common-school fund. State v. Meyer, 63 Ind. 33.

Without consent of father.— Statutes authorizing the adoption of a child on the application of its mother and without the consent of the father, where the latter has relinquished his claim to such child by abandonment, are not in conflict with any provisions of the constitution. Nugent v. Powell, 4 Wyo. 173, 33 Pac. 23, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17, 20 L. R. A. 199.

Without notice to child or relatives.— A state may authorize its courts, in the exercise of the power and duty of parens patriæ, to conduct proceedings for the adoption of minor children, without notice by publication or otherwise to the child, its parents, relatives, or next of kin. Van Matre v. Sankey, 148 Ill. 536, 36 N. E. 628, 39 Am. St. Rep. 196, 23 L. R. A. 665.

11. Krug v. Davis, 87 Ind. 590.

Thus Mass. Pub. Stat. (1882), c. 148, § 1, authorizes a person over twenty-one to adopt a person younger than himself. Collamore v. Learned, 171 Mass. 99, 50 N. E. 518. And Cal. Civ. Code (1897), § 222, provides that "the person adopting a child must be at least ten years older than the person adopted."

contrary either spouse may adopt a child without the other joining.[15] In such cases, however, the consent of the non-adopting spouse is sometimes necessary.[16]

b. One Spouse Insane. Where the statute provides that both husband and wife must join in a petition for adoption, it is doubtful if one spouse alone can adopt where the other is insane.[17]

C. Tutor or Guardian. A tutor or guardian may adopt his ward.[18]

D. Unmarried Person. In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary an unmarried person may adopt.[19]

V. Who May Be Adopted.

A. Minors or Adults. With respect to the age of the child some statutes provide expressly for the adoption of "minors,"[20] but in others only the word "child" is used. Under such statutes some courts have held that only minors can be adopted,[21] while others have held that adults may be.[22]

B. Waif. A child whose parents are unknown, who has no guardian, and has not been given up in writing, for the purpose of adoption, to a charitable institution incorporated by law, may be adopted by decree of the proper court.[23]

VI. Proceedings for Adoption.

A. In General. A statute providing a mode for adoption implies that it cannot be done legally in any other way,[24] and in order to effect an adoption there must be a substantial compliance with all the essential requirements of the law under which the right is claimed.[25] Statutes authorizing the adoption of children should not be construed so narrowly, however, as to defeat the manifest legislative intent.[26]

23. Edds, Appellant, 137 Mass. 346.

24. Johnson v. Terry, 34 Conn. 259.

Thus a mere agreement between a mother and uncle is insufficient to create the relation of parent and child between the uncle and child, when the statute requires the proceeding to be by petition to a certain court (Foley v. Foley, 61 Ill. App. 577), and a verbal agreement is insufficient to constitute an adoption where the statute provides for a written agreement to be duly acknowledged (Taylor v. Deseve, 81 Tex. 246, 16 S. W. 1008). So, too, in Fuselier v. Masse, 4 La. 423, it was held that since, by the laws of Spain, adoption could take place in but two ways,— by authority of the king, or by a judicial decree on proof of certain facts,— an instrument purporting to adopt a party, and passed in 1799 before the commandant of Opelousas as a notarial act, is invalid, and cannot be aided by the maxim, "Omnia rite acta." The court cannot presume both a decree and the previous formalities requisite.

B. Jurisdiction — 1. In General — a. May Be Conferred on Particular Court. Exclusive original jurisdiction in proceedings for adoption may be conferred on a particular court or courts.[27]

b. Residence of Parties — (I) All Parties. In some cases it has been held that the court must have jurisdiction over the parties seeking to adopt the child, over the child to be adopted, and over its natural parents.[28]

(II) Of Adoptive Parent. Under some statutes the proceedings must be had in the county where the adoptive parent resides,[29] but under such statutes a temporary residence in the county has been held sufficient.[30]

(III) Of Child. In some states an order for the adoption of a child can be made only in the county in which the child resides,[31] even though the will of the father, proved in another county, requests such adoption.[32]

2. Consent — a. In General. Consent lies at the foundation of statutes of adoption, and, if they require it to be given and submitted, the jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be acquired without it.[33]

b. Of Adoptive Parent — (I) When Necessary. Some statutes require the person adopting a child to sign a consent to such adoption,[34] and where the statute provides that neither husband nor wife can adopt a child without the other's consent, such consent is of course necessary.[35]

(II) Sufficiency of Consent. The consent need not be actually signed in

27. Thus the Illinois act of April 22, 1867, confers exclusive original jurisdiction upon the circuit and county courts of the state. And the city court of Alton, having concurrent jurisdiction "within the city of Alton," has no jurisdiction to enter an order of adoption of a child, where none of the parties to be affected by the proceeding reside within the city limits, even though they appear before the court in person and submit to its jurisdiction. Weinhard v. Tynan, 53 Ill. App. 17 [affirmed, on other grounds, in Tynan v. Weinhard, 153 Ill. 598, 38 N. E. 1014].

Judge may act anywhere in county.— Under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 4182, which provides for the filing of a declaration appointing one to stand as heir at law to the declarant in the event of his death, and for the making of an entry upon the journal by the judge, and a record of the proceedings, such declaration may be made before a judge of the probate court within his county at a place other than the office of said court. Bird v. Young, 56 Ohio St. 210, 46 N. E. 819.

Conflict of jurisdiction.— The fact that a child is under the jurisdiction of a court, under Cal. Civ. Code, § 138, in divorce proceedings between its parents, does not prevent another court from having jurisdiction of the same child in proceedings for its adoption on the consent of the parent to whose custody it has been given. Stat. (1867), c. 169, §§ 3–6, the provision that the decree be made in the county where the petitioner or the child resides implies that the statute was intended to be limited to cases in which all the parties have their domicile in that state, and does not apply to the case of an adoption therein of a child domiciled there by persons then and since domiciled in Massachusetts.

presence of the judge if signed and filed before the parties appear,[36] and even where the statute provides that the person adopting a child shall, in the presence of the county judge, sign the consent to such adoption, this does not require the county judge to witness the signature.[37]

c. Of Charitable Society. Where orphan asylums are authorized to consent to the adoption of children under their care in the same manner that parents are authorized to consent to the adoption of minor children, an order authorizing the adoption of a minor child in the care of an orphan asylum is not sufficient without the consent of the managers of the asylum.[38] In order to entitle a charitable society to consent to adoption it must maintain an actual home or asylum where children are supported and cared for,[39] and must have supported the child one year.[40]

d. Of Child.— (I) When Necessary. Some statutes provide that the consent of the child shall be necessary when he is above a certain age.[41]

(II) Presumption as to. When the child was above the age mentioned in the statute at the time of his adoption it will be presumed that he assented thereto, if for his benefit, unless his dissent expressly appears.[42]

e. Of Guardian Ad Litem. A guardian ad litem may consent to adoption where the parents of the child are unknown and no one consents to the adoption or appears, where the statute of the state authorizes him so to do.[43]

f. Of Natural Parents or Guardian — (I) In General — (A) When Necessary. Under some statutes, with certain exceptions enumerated therein,[44] the consent of the natural parents or guardian of a child is an indispensable requisite to its adoption,[45] and the statutes in this respect have received a strict construction.[46]

36. Matter of Johnson, 98 Cal. 531, 33 Pac. 460, 21 L. R. A. 380, since the material thing under the statute is merely that the parties shall consent in presence of the judge, and that such consent shall be manifest by writing then delivered.

Consent of bastard's mother.— Under the Pennsylvania act of May 4, 1855, providing

(B) When Unnecessary — (1) IN GENERAL. Where the statutes of adoption do not require the consent of natural parents such consent is of course unnecessary.[47]

(2) IN CASE OF ABANDONMENT — (a) RULE STATED. Where a parent has relinquished all claims on his minor child by abandonment, his consent to the adoption of such child is unnecessary.[48]

(b) WHAT CONSTITUTES ABANDONMENT. To constitute such an abandonment by a parent as will deprive him of the right to prevent the adoption of his child, there must be some conduct on his part which evinces a settled purpose to forego all parental duties.[49] But merely permitting the child to remain for a time undisturbed in the care of others is not such an abandonment.[50]

(3) IN CASE OF DIVORCE. Where the natural parent has been deprived of the custody of his child in divorce proceedings, his consent is not necessary,[51] and this rule is not changed by the fact that the divorce was granted prior to the enactment of the statute dispensing with consent in such cases.[52]

(II) WHEN GUARDIAN IS ALSO ADOPTER. Where the adoptive parent was also guardian, consent by him as guardian has been held to be sufficient.[53]

Effect of death of consenting parent.— The Pennsylvania act of May 19, 1887, requires consent of parents or surviving parent, or of next friend, guardian, etc., if there are no parents; and hence where it appears that the consenting surviving parent died before a petition of adoption was presented, and no one competent to consent intervened, the act has not been complied with, and the proceedings must be quashed. Effect of divorce following abandonment.— The fact that, before the adoption of a child whose mother had been abandoned by her husband, the father procured a decree of divorce in a foreign state, in which he was awarded the care and custody of such child, does not affect the validity of the adoption, where his abandonment continued after such decree and up to the time of adoption. Nugent v. Powell, 4 Wyo. 173, 33 Pac. 23, 62 Am. St. Rep. 17, 20 L. R. A. 199.

Time to adopt limited.—N. Y. Laws (1873), c. 830, as amended by N. Y. Laws (1887), c. 703, § 11, declares that whenever a child has been abandoned the person maintaining it may adopt it, without the consent of its parent, within six months from the time such person obtained custody of the child. It has been held that, since the limitation in such section applied only where the child was abandoned after its enactment, a person maintaining a child abandoned previous to the adoption of the statute was entitled to adopt it without the consent of the parent, though proceedings therefor were not begun within the time limited. Von Beck v. Thomsen, 44 N. Y. App. Div. 373, 60 N. Y. Suppl. 1094.

49. Winans v. Luppie, 47 N. J. Eq. 302, 20 Atl. 969 [reversing Luppie v. Winans, 37 N. J. Eq. 245]. In this case it was held that where a widowed mother allowed her female child of five years old to be taken by others to be maintained and educated, stating that she would never reclaim her, and allowed the child to remain five years, during which the child became accustomed to a station in life much above her mother's, and to a degree of comfort and luxury that the latter could not afford, there was such an abandonment.

Seven years' failure to provide.— A woman who for seven years has neglected to provide for her child cannot complain that the American Female Guardian Society has adopted it without her consent. Matter of Larson, 31 Hun (N. Y.) 539.

50. With grandmother three days.— That a mother, whose husband was a drunkard and had ordered dealers to supply her with nothing more to eat, left her child in the care of its grandmother for three days, does not constitute such an abandonment of the child as justifies the entry of a decree for its adoption without the mother's consent. In re Olson, 3 Ohio N. P. 304.

With mother six years.— A father does not abandon his child by permitting it to remain undisturbed in the custody of its mother for six years, during which time he exercises no legal control over it. Johnson v. Terry, 34 Conn. 259.

3. NOTICE — a. To Child. Notice to the child is not necessary in the absence of a specific statutory provision requiring it.[54]

b. To Natural Parents. In some states jurisdiction to order adoption can be acquired only after notice to the parent or surviving parent of the child.[55] But notice to the father of a bastard,[56] or to a parent who has abandoned his child,[57] is unnecessary.

C. By Agreement or Deed — 1. NATURE OF PROCEEDING. In a number of the states the proceeding for adoption is by a written instrument, declaration, or statement, more in the nature of a deed than anything else, which is required to be executed, attested, acknowledged, and filed for record in some designated place.[58] In such states the adoption of a child is not a judicial proceeding, although the sanction of a judicial officer is required for its consummation, but is essentially one of contract between the parties whose consent is required.[59]

2. EXECUTION. The instrument must be executed by the persons intending to adopt,[60] but the fact that it was not executed in the presence of the judge before whom the proceedings were had is immaterial where he certifies in his order that the persons adopting the child appeared before him with the child, and that they executed the necessary consents.[61]

3. REQUISITES OF AGREEMENT OR DEED — a. Following Language of Statute. Where the agreement or deed plainly shows an intent to follow the language of the statute it is sufficient.[62]

54. Van Matre v. Sankey, 148 Ill. 536, 36 N. E. 628, 39 Am. St. Rep. 196, 23 L. R. A. 665, holding that the fact that a child was outside the state when the decree of adoption was rendered, and was not notified of the proceeding, did not oust the court of jurisdiction, when the child's domicile was in the state, and notice was served on its guardian, who appeared and contested the proceeding.

Parent out of state.— Hill's Code Oreg. §§ 2938, 2939, provide that the parents of the child, or the survivor of them, shall consent in writing to the adoption, unless they be dead, or in prison for more than three years, or have deserted the child. Section 2940 provides that where a parent does not consent he shall be personally served with a copy of the petition or order, if found in the state; if not, publication is to be made for three weeks in a newspaper printed in the county. Under these provisions it has been held that unless the father of the child consents, or, being out of the state, is served as above, the court acquires no jurisdiction by reason of the mother's consent, and the proceedings are void. Analogy to deed.— Where the proceeding is by written instrument, declaration, or statement, "the maker or declarant is analogous to the grantor in an ordinary deed, the adopted child is the grantee, and the thing granted is the irrevocable right, capacity, or qualification to inherit, or succeed to the property of the adopter, in case he should die intestate." b. Joinder of Unnecessary Party. Where a wife joins with her husband in a declaration of adoption intended to be the act of her husband alone, the declaration is not thereby rendered void, but the wife's consent will be regarded as surplusage.[63]

c. Description of Child. So long as the agreement or deed contains a complete identification of the child it is not necessary that it state the child's real name[64] or disclose his age.[65]

d. Acknowledgment — (I) In General. Agreements or deeds of adoption are required generally to be acknowledged. Some statutes prescribe that such acknowledgment shall be in the form required for acknowledgments of deeds affecting real estate,[66] but in the absence of such provision an acknowledgment made in substantial conformity to the form prescribed for ordinary conveyances is sufficient.[67]

(II) By Husband and Wife. Where it is required that the wife separately acknowledge a deed of adoption by her husband, a deed not so acknowledged is absolutely void though it shows on its face that the wife signed it and was present when it was acknowledged by her husband.[68]

(III) Place of Acknowledgment. Where the statute requires the acknowledgment to be before the judge of probate of the county where the declarant resides, a declaration beginning with the name of the state and county, and describing declarant as "of said county and state," acknowledged before the probate judge of such county, shows a compliance therewith.[69]

4. Examination of Parties. The statutory provision requiring the judge to examine all parties to the proceeding, separately, is directory merely,[70] and the examination of a child under the age of consent is not necessary.[71]

5. Order of Approval — a. In General. The order or entry which the statute requires should be made is in no sense a judgment,[72] and the statute lays down no rules by which its form shall be measured and its sufficiency tested.[73]

c. Declaring Status of Child. The order may declare that the child is to be regarded as the child of both husband and wife, where both have joined in the agreement.[76]

d. Examination of Parties. The order need not show upon its face that all the parties to the proceeding were examined by the judge in the manner directed by the statute.[77]

e. Name of Adoptive Parent. The order should disclose the true name of the adoptive parent.[78]

f. Residence of Adoptive Parent. The order need not show upon its face that the adoptive parent resided in the county where the order was made at the time of the adoption.[79]

g. Conclusiveness of Order. An order of the probate court permitting the adoption of an infant is conclusive so far as that court is concerned. Such court has no further jurisdiction in the matter.[80]

6. Recording — a. Necessity for. Where the statutes require that the instrument of adoption be recorded, the act is not complete until such condition is complied with,[81] though the instrument was almost entirely destroyed by accident soon after it was executed, by reason of which it became impossible to make record of it.[82]

b. Manner of Recording. A declaration properly made is not invalid because recorded in the book of deeds and wills instead of on the minutes of the court,[83] nor will the omission of the recorder to index the parties as grantor and grantee agreement of adoption, reciting that the agreement is "hereby approved, and ordered to be filed with the clerk," is sufficient.

Conflicting claims to child.— A doubt has been thrown upon this question, however, by the case of Fouts v. Pierce, 64 Iowa 71, 19 N. W. 854, where a mother executed articles of adoption of a child to defendant, who neglected to have them recorded for several years, during which time the mother married plaintiff and executed articles of adoption to him, which he immediately recorded; and the court held, without deciding who was the legally adopted parent of the child, that the question of the right of the parties to the custody of the child would be decided on the ground of the child's best interest, and not solely on the ground of legal parentage.

c. Time of Recording. The instrument should be filed for record while the child is a minor[85] and in the lifetime of the adopting party.[86]

7. Effect of Collateral Agreement. A collateral agreement signed by the adopter a few days after the execution of the deed of adoption, providing that the mother could have the child "at any time she calls for him," does not revoke the adoption.[87]

D. By Judicial Proceeding — 1. Nature of Proceeding. In many states adoption is accomplished by petition to the proper court, stating certain requisite facts, upon which a decree is made by the court which judicially confers on the child the right and status authorized by the particular statute. This is a judicial proceeding, involving the rendition of the judgment by the court by which the new status of the child is determined.[88]

2. Requisites of Petition — a. In General. The petition is jurisdictional in its character, and the facts which are required by the statute to give the court jurisdiction must appear upon the face of the petition itself.[89] The petition is not, however, to be construed technically.[90]

b. Parties to Petition. Where the statute provides that neither husband nor wife can adopt a child without the consent of the other, both husband and wife should join in the petition,[91] but in the absence of such a statute a married man may adopt a child without his wife joining in the petition.[92]

c. Abandonment by Natural Parent. Where the petition alleges the abandonment of a child it must make a case strictly within the provisions of the statute relating to such abandonment.[93]

d. Child Not Sister or Aunt of Petitioners. Even where the statute forbids the adoption of a sister or aunt, the petition need not allege that the child is not a sister or aunt of the petitioners, or of either of them.[94]

e. Consent of Natural Parent. Where the petition alleges the death or abandonment of one parent it must show that the parent who has the actual custody and guardianship of the child consents to the adoption.[95]

f. Residence and Name of Natural Parents. The petition should state the residence and name of the child's natural parents, if living and known,[96] or should allege that such residence and name are known.[97]

g. Residence of Child. The petition should state the residence of the child sought to be adopted.[98]

h. Residence of Petitioner. It is not required that it shall be stated in the petition that the petitioner resides in the county.[99]

i. Signature. Even where the statute requires both a husband and wife to join in the petition, it is not necessary that it should be signed by both where it is in the name of both.[1]

3. Appointment of Guardian Ad Litem. Where the parents of the child are unknown, and no one consents to the adoption or appears, the court may appoint a guardian ad litem for the child, with power to give or withhold consent to the adoption,[2] but a failure to appoint such guardian is at the most an irregularity which will render the decree voidable by the infant.[3]

4. Order or Decree — a. Finding of Truth of Allegations in Petition. Some statutes provide that the order or decree must contain a finding that the allegations in the petition are true.[4]

b. Residence of Adoptive Parents. A decree confirming the adoption of a child need not affirmatively show that the adoptive parents were residents of the county.[5]

c. Terms of Adoption. Some statutes require the benefits to be conferred to be specifically set out in the decree,[6] but it has been held that all the terms of adoption need not be recited where the effect of the adoption is fixed by another section of the statute.[7]

5. Entry of Order Nunc pro Tunc. After a lapse of more than twenty years, a motion to enter an order in proceedings to adopt a child nunc pro tunc ought not to be entertained.[8]

E. Appeal. No appeal will lie from an order of adoption in the absence of a statute authorizing it.[9] Where the statute provides that "any petitioner or any Effect of contradictory recitals.— A recital that the mother of the child abandoned her for more than a year is not overcome by recitals that the mother was living, and objected to the adoption, and appeared in court with her objections, and that eight months previously the mother applied to the court for a similar order for adoption of the child by another, so as to preclude the court from making the order for want of appearance of jurisdictional facts. such child" may appeal from the decree, the next of kin of a petitioner, whose application for the adoption of an infant has been granted, have no right to appeal from the decree.[10] But under a statute providing that the child may appeal by next friend the father may act as such next friend, subject to the power of the court to substitute another in case he be found an improper person to act as such, even where it is alleged that the father had abandoned his child.[11]

VII. Evidence of Adoption.

There is no presumption that minor children living with a man who is not their father have been adopted by him.[12] The fact of adoption is established by an order of the court in the proceedings by which the child is adopted,[13] but where the adoption paper has been lost and the probate records of the county burned, circumstantial evidence, including the acts and declarations of the party, is admissible.[14]

VIII. Revoking or Setting Aside Adoption.

A. In General — 1. Jurisdiction. An application to revoke an order or decree of adoption should be presented to the court in which the order or decree was made.[15] This rule, however, must not be construed as abrogating the right of the higher court to control the custody of infants by the writ of habeas corpus.[16]

2. Who May Act. The administrator and collateral heirs of a deceased person have no standing in court to petition for the vacation of an adoption by their decedent,[17] except where the order was obtained by fraud while the next of kin were absent from the state and unaware of the conditions,[18] even though the proceedings might not be conclusive against the natural parent of the adopted child;[19] nor has a mere stranger to the proceedings;[20] and even on the petition of the person adopting, and the consent of the next friend who consented to the adoption, the decree cannot be rescinded in the absence of statutory provision therefor.[21] But a decree will be vacated on petition of the natural and adoptive parents of a minor child where it appears that such a course is for the best interests of the child, and that property rights have vested, or are likely to vest, in her.[22]

3. Grounds — a. In General. It requires more than mere irregularities to annul the relationship when entered into with honesty of purpose, especially when lived up to for many years and severed only by the hand of death.[23]

b. Fraud. A decree of adoption may be set aside where it was procured by fraud or misrepresentation.[24]

c. Motive of Adoption. An adoption will not be set aside because it was made for the purpose of making the adopted persons the adopter's heirs at law, in order to take away any inducement to others, who might have been his heirs, to oppose his will.[25]

d. Want of Consent. The order will be set aside where it is procured without the consent of the child's parent, on an allegation that she had abandoned it, if such charge were untrue,[26] or unless the child has been supported for a year by a charitable institution which consented to its adoption;[27] but the mere fact that the mother of an illegitimate child was under eighteen years old when she assented to the order is not sufficient to warrant such revocation.[28]

4. When Application Must Be Made. The application to revoke an adoption must be made promptly, and where parties have submitted to adoption proceedings as valid for a considerable length of time they are estopped by their conduct from changing their position to the prejudice of the child.[29]

5. Appeal. An appeal will lie from an order dismissing an application to revoke a decree of adoption.[30]

B. Collateral Attack. While ordinarily a decree of adoption cannot be attacked collaterally,[31] yet it has been held that, the proceeding being under a special statute and not according to the course of the common law, the court in which the proceeding is had quoad hoc must be considered as an inferior court,

But a delay of five months on the part of the next of kin of an adoptive parent, after his death, in seeking to revoke the decree of adoption on the grounds that it was procured by fraud, is not such laches as will defeat the application where the fraud was not known to the next of kin until the death of the adoptive parent. and unless all jurisdictional facts appear in the record itself the judgment in the proceeding will be void upon collateral attack.[32]

C. Effect of Revocation. Where an order of adoption has been set aside by the proper court, the status of the child is the same as if no proceedings of adoption had ever been had, and the child may be again given in adoption to the same parties.[33]

IX. Effect of Adoption.

A. On Adoptive Parent — 1. In General. The rights of the parent by adoption are treated substantially as those of a natural parent,[34] although the adoptive parent does not succeed to all the rights of a natural parent.[35]

2. Appointment of Testamentary Tutor. The adopter cannot appoint a testamentary tutor to the adopted to the exclusion of the natural father.[36]

3. Custody of Child. An adoptive parent is entitled to the custody of the adopted child as against all persons,[37] including the child's guardian[38] (unless it be the true parents when they have not consented),[39] and may enforce his rights by action and have an injunction against interference with the child by the father or any other person.[40]

4. Right to Dispose of Property by Will. By the weight of authority the laws permitting the adoption of children confer on them simply the ordinary rights of inheritance, and do not affect the power of the adoptive parent to dispose of his property by will,[41] even though the will was made prior to the adoption.[42]

St. Rep. 875, where, the consent of a mother to the adoption of her child having been obtained under an agreement that he should have a share of the property of the adoptive parent, it was held that the latter could not deprive such child of his rights by a fraudulent disposal of the property in his lifetime or by will.

5. Services and Earnings of Child. The adoptive parent is entitled to the services and earnings of the adopted child[43] and in his own name may sue for such earnings[44] or for an injury to such child.[45]

B. On Child — 1. In General. The law of the domicile of the parties is generally the rule which governs the creation of the status of an adopted child.[46] Adoption, when legally conducted, terminates the relations between the child and its natural parents,[47] making him a child of the adoptive parents.[48]

2. Where One Spouse Does Not Consent. Where one spouse does not join in the proceedings for adoption no such confidential relation exists between such spouse and the child as will justify equity in interfering in case of a breach thereof in a business transaction between the two.[49] Nor is the child an heir of such spouse.[50]

3. Claim for Services. An adopted child can have no claim for services rendered to the adoptive parent during the existence of the relationship.[51] And, in the absence of anything to show an express or implied contract, an adopted child who has been designated as heir at law of the husband cannot recover for services rendered to the widow after he became of age.[52]

4. Domicile. Where an adoptive parent removes, in good faith, to another state, taking the adopted child with him, and acquires a bona fide domicile in such state, the domicile of the child becomes the same.[53]

5. Right of Inheritance — a. By Child — (I) In General. The authorities unite in affirming that for all purposes of inheritance from the adoptive parent the adopted child becomes and is the lawful child of such adoptive parent save in so far as the statute authorizing the adoption may otherwise provide.[54] Such

45. Must allege ownership of services.— Under Ind. Rev. Stat. (1894), § 267, providing that the father (or, in case of his death, desertion, or imprisonment, the mother) may maintain an action for the injury or death of a child, a complaint in an action by a woman for injury to her adopted son is insufficient unless it alleges the ownership of his services, the particulars of his adoption, or his emancipation from the control of his natural parents. inheritable right does not conflict with the statute of descents, for the statute in regard to adoption points out who are to be considered "children" within the meaning of the statute of descents,[55] nor with the right of the adoptive parent to dispose of his property by will.[56] However, as against an adopted child, the statute should be strictly construed, because it is in derogation of the general law of inheritance, which is founded on natural relationship and is a rule of succession according to nature which has prevailed from time immemorial.[57] Hence a child by adoption cannot inherit from the adoptive parents unless the act of adoption has been done in strict accordance with the statute.[58]

b. From Child. With respect to inheritance from an adopted child there is some confusion of opinion, it having been held in some cases that on the death of such child his estate goes to his relations by blood and not to those by adoption,[73] while in others a contrary view obtains.[74] In some states statutes prescribe the disposition of property derived from an adoptive parent.[75]

(Pa.) 403, where it was held that under the Pennsylvania act of May 4, 1855, providing that, where adoptive parents shall have natural children, such natural children and the adopted children shall inherit from and through each other as if all were natural children, the natural children of an adoptive parent have not the right to inherit from an adopted child on his death intestate, where either of the adoptive parents are alive, since under Pa. Act (1833), § 3, children do not inherit from each other unless both of their parents are dead. The whole of such adopted child's estate in this case went to her natural brothers and sisters, her natural parents both being dead.

(Pa.) 301. In this case a child born in another state was adopted there. By the law of that state the adopted child became, to all legal intents, the child of the person adopting it, and the parents of the child were deprived of all legal right, as respects the child, during its minority. The child went to Pennsylvania, where she died a minor and unmarried, leaving certain personal estate which was claimed by both the adoptive and the natural father, who were citizens of the state of the adoption. It was held that the estate should go to the adoptive father, and not in accordance with the intestate laws of Pennsylvania.

75. Thus Ohio Rev. Stat. § 3140, relative to the descent of property inherited by an adopted child from an adoptive parent, provides that in case of the death of such adopted child, without issue, after the death of the adoptive parent, the property of such parent shall descend to his or her next of kin, and not to the next of kin of the adopted child. It has been held that such statute does not apply to property which the adopted child has

c. Through Child. The heirs of an adopted child will inherit through him a share of the estate of a deceased adoptive parent just as if such adopted child were a child by blood of such parent.[76]

6. Right to Homestead Exemption. An adopted child, like a natural one, is entitled, during minority, to a claim of homestead exemption.[77]

7. Right under Policy of Insurance. An adopted child may recover the amount due on a life-insurance policy made payable to his adoptive mother if she survives her husband, otherwise to their children for their use, he being the only child surviving at her death,[78] or may recover his proportionate share if there are other children.[79]

C. On Natural Parent. While it has been held that by consent to adoption the natural parent relinquishes all parental rights,[80] yet, if the order is invalid on its face, the child must be surrendered to the natural parent, even though proceedings are pending to amend the record and make the order valid.[81]

D. On Widow of Adoptive Parent. Where an adopted child is capable of inheriting, the existence of such child has the same effect, under statutes relating to a widow's share of her deceased husband's estate, as does the existence of natural children.[82] But where the child has been adopted by the husband alone, the wife can alien her estate received from him,[83] and on her death it will pass to her heirs and not to such adopted child.[84]

X. Contracts for Adoption.

A. Validity of Contract. A parent may make a valid contract for the delivery of his child to a charitable institution to be adopted into a good family,[85] but where such contract undertakes to destroy the identity of the child and to hide it from its mother, and to hide its mother and parentage from it, such contract is void as against public policy.[86]

B. Action for Breach. An action will lie for damages resulting from a breach of contract for adoption, the measure of damages being governed by the law of the state where the contract was to be performed.[87]

C. Effect of Contract — 1. On Child — a. May Sue in Name of Quasi-Adoptive Parent. One who has been taken to the house of another to be by him adopted, but has not taken his name, may maintain a suit in such name, though not as yet legally adopted.[88]

b. Right of Inheritance from Quasi-Adoptive Parent — (I) In General. The implied covenant arising from a contract to adopt, not legally executed, where the child has fulfilled its part of the contract, is that the infant should receive a child's share of the estate of the foster parent.[89] In case of intestacy that share is fixed by the intestate laws, but if there is a will it is fixed by the will.[90]

(II) Specific Performance — (A) Right to. Where the contract has been partially or fully performed by the child, equity, at the suit of the child or his heirs, will decree specific performance of an agreement by a testator or intestate to adopt such child and to make a settlement of property on him, when the contract did not amount to a legal adoption,[91] or when there has been an adoption under a statute subsequently held unconstitutional;[92] but to maintain such action it must appear that the alleged promisor induced the child to believe that he was his heir.[93]

(B) Consideration. As a rule the surrender by the parents of a child of all control over him and his services and companionship constitutes a valuable consideration for a promise of adoption;[94] but the surrender of an illegitimate child by its mother to its father will not constitute such consideration.[95] measure of damages under the law of Pennsylvania was not the value of the share of the promisor's estate which would have been inherited by the promisee at his death, but the value of the services rendered or outlay incurred by the promisee on the faith of the promise, with interest.

(c) Evidence—(1) Burden of Proof. The burden is on the person claiming the benefit of an alleged contract for adoption to establish it by clear, cogent, and convincing evidence.[96]

(2) Admissibility. An adoption paper, though not proven or recorded so as to constitute a legal adoption, may be competent evidence of a contractual relation between the quasi-adoptive parent and child,[97] but proof of casual remarks made from time to time by the alleged promisor, but not in the presence of plaintiff, are insufficient to establish an agreement for adoption.[98]

(3) Competency of Claimant. One seeking to enforce the specific performance of a contract for adoption is incompetent to testify in such action where the other party is dead.[99]

(4) Variance. An alleged contract that a testator would adopt plaintiff as his child and would grant and devise to her all his property at his death is not supported by evidence that the testator agreed to adopt plaintiff as his child and make her his heir. Such evidence places adopted child only in the position of a natural one.[100]

(5) In Rebuttal. Where it is sought to use a party claiming under a contract of adoption as a witness in rebuttal as to matters occurring since the appointment of the administrator of decedent, the offer of evidence should be confined to such subsequent matters.[101]

c. Insurable Interest in Life of Quasi-Adoptive Parent. A single woman who has lived with an old man and been treated by him as his daughter, although not in fact adopted, has an insurable interest in the life of such man.[102]

I. DEFINITION.

"Adulteration" has been defined as the act of corrupting or debasing. The term is generally applied to the act of mixing up with food or drink intended to be sold, other matters of an inferior quality, and usually of a more or less deleterious character.[1] But what shall and what shall not constitute an adulteration within the meaning of a particular statute must of course depend upon the terms of the statute, especially where such terms have been construed by the court.[2]

II. NATURE OF OFFENSE.

A. In General. The offenses of adulteration, or of selling adulterated substances, are in their nature infringements of the rights of citizens, and constitute a fraud and imposition upon their persons, health, and property.[3]

B. At Common Law. The selling of unwholesome provisions, or the mixture of poisonous ingredients in food or drink designed for any individual, is an indictable offense at common law, whether done through malice or from a mere desire of gain.[4]

C. By Statute — 1. In General. The law governing the offenses of adulteration, or of selling adulterated food, is for the most part laid down by statutes defining the offenses.[5] Such statutes have been considered constitutional as a

2. Thus it was held under the definition of adulterated foods in the Ohio act of March 20, 1884 [as amended April 22, 1890], that, where a considerable portion of the oil of the cocoa bean had been extracted and the remaining portion sold, there was no violation of a statute which provided that "an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated if any valuable or necessary constituent or ingredient had been abstracted from it," the court basing its opinion on the fact that such an article was not a compound or mixture. Rose v. State, 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. 87.

Adulterated milk.— Many of the states have defined by statute the standard or proportion of ingredients by which milk may be determined to be adulterated. The exact proportions differ in many instances, but the adulteration or non-adulteration is in each case laid down and defined by the statute of the particular state. See infra, III; also State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344, wherein it was held that under R. I. Pub. Stat. c. 127, § 5 [as amended Act March 23, 1882, § 3], defining what shall constitute adulterated milk, the offense lies in the intent to sell or exchange such milk, and not in the possession thereof.

Oath of liquor-dealers.— As a prevention of fraud in this respect it is by statute in some states made a condition precedent to the sale of spirituous liquors that the proposed seller appear before some officer designated in the statute and make oath or affidavit that he will not adulterate the same, and that he give bond to such effect. Under the Tennessee statute it has been held that an oath "not to mix or adulterate with any poisonous substance whatever" is not a compliance with the provision "not to mix or adulterate with any substance whatever." Hall v. State, 9 Lea (Tenn.) 574.

Polluting spring.— In State v. Buckman, 8 N. H. 203, 29 Am. Dec. 646, it was held that the pollution of the waters of a spring was an indictable offense at common law, since it was a mixture of poisonous ingredients with the drink of another to such an extent as to impair his health. legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, not impairing fundamental rights of life, liberty, or property.[6]

2. MUNICIPAL REGULATIONS. A city council in like manner, in the exercise of its police power, may adopt regulations prohibiting adulteration or the sale of adulterated food,[7] and a grant of power conferred upon a municipal corporation for this purpose is not repealed by a general statute to the same effect pertaining to the entire state.[8]

III. WHAT CONSTITUTES ADULTERATION.

A. In General. Where there is no statutory definition applicable to the particular article claimed to be adulterated, the fact of adulteration must necessarily depend upon the sufficiency of the evidence adduced, to bring the offense within the term as ordinarily understood.[9]

B. Adulteration of Milk — 1. IN GENERAL. Milk, being a common article of food, has received more statutory consideration on this account, and the question as to what percentage of original and foreign substances shall constitute an adulteration is usually laid down in express terms by statute.[10]

10. Percentage of adulteration.— By reference to the statutes cited or construed in the following list of cases it will be seen that the percentages of original and foreign substances allowed, while of slight variance, are not uniform in all of the states.

2. Analysis. The question whether the relative percentage of the several ingredients correspond to the requirements of the statute is usually determined by analysis,[11] and where there is no evidence to impeach or rebut the correctness of the chemical analysis it is only a matter of form to submit to the jury the question whether defendant's milk was adulterated within the meaning of the statute.[12]

C. Water as an Adulterant. Where the effect of using water as an adulterant is to lower or diminish the nutritive power of the substance with which it is mixed, the courts have almost invariably held that there is an adulteration within the meaning of the statute.[13]

D. Notice of Adulteration. It is in some cases provided by statute that where the adulterant consists of a matter or ingredient not injurious to health, and not intended fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the original substance, and the customer has notice of the adulteration, either by printed notice or label, there has been no offense committed.[14] Under this class of cases are to be found statutes regulating the sale of substances having the semblance of butter or cheese, but not wholly made from pure cream or milk, requiring each package to be marked or stamped with the name of each substance used in or entering into the composition of the article proposed to be sold.[15]

(1882), c. 57, § 5], punishing the sale of milk "to which water or any foreign substance has been added," a person may be convicted who sells skimmed milk colored by adding to it annatto. E. 280, a prosecution for having in possession with intent to sell milk containing a certain foreign substance, to wit, "annatto coloring matter," where it was held to be immaterial whether a coloring matter put into milk is injurious or not, the addition of any foreign substance being an offense.

Skimmed milk.— Under the Pennsylvania act of May 25, 1878, making it an offense to sell adulterated milk, and the Pennsylvania act of July 7, 1885, declaring skimmed milk with less than six per cent. of cream to be adulterated, selling skimmed milk does not constitute the offense of selling adulterated milk unless it contains less than six per cent. of cream. Com. v. Hough, 1 Pa. Dist. 51.

11. By whom made.— This analysis is sometimes to be made by an officer or officers designated in the statute (State v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469), while in other cases, no specific officer being designated, a mere proof by competent analysis is sufficient (Com. v. Evans, 132 Mass. 11; State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344, 27 Alb. L. J. 478).

(N. Y.) 311, wherein it was held that there should be evidence that the adulterant used was of such a character as to render the articles impure and unwholesome, and that the fact that water had been added to milk without any other ingredient was not in itself sufficient to show that there was an adulteration within the meaning of a statute forbidding the adulteration of milk and traffic in impure or unwholesome milk.

In Gage v. Elsey, 10 Q. B. D. 518, it was held that where a dealer had sold certain liquor to a customer, which had been adulterated by the addition of water, and at the same time called his attention to a notice stating that all spirits were sold as "diluted spirits, no alcoholic strength guaranteed," there was no sale to the prejudice of the customer and that no offense had been committed under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63, § 6. See also Sandys v. Small, 3 Q. B. D. 449.

Notice by label.— However, under N. Y. Laws (1881), c. 407, relating to the selling of adulterated food, it was held that the presence or absence of a label did not constitute an element of the offense. People v. Bischoff, 14 N. Y. St. Rep. 581.

IV. GUILTY KNOWLEDGE.

A. In General. As a general rule it is not necessary to prove that defendant had knowledge that the article in question was adulterated.[16]

B. As Essence of the Offense. The rule as above stated cannot, however, be accepted as universal. The necessity of guilty knowledge or intent as an ingredient of the offense is in some cases determined by the wording of the statute, or the particular section thereof, under which a conviction is sought;[17] but where the statute in express terms prohibits the sale of an adulterated article which is represented to be pure, it is enough to show a sale, and there need be no proof of criminal intent.[18]

Ct. 214; State v. Smith, 10 R. I. 258.

Absence of criminal intent on the part of the accused is immaterial under the New York statutes forbidding the sale of adulterated butter (People v. Mahaney, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 26) or adulterated milk (People v. Kibler, 106 N. Y. 321, 12 N. E. 795; People v. West, 106 N. Y. 293, 12 N. E. 610, 60 Am. Rep. 452; People v. Cipperly, 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107; People v. Schaeffer, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 23).

17. Com. v. Flannelly, 15 Gray (Mass.) 195; People v. West, 106 N. Y. 293, 12 N. E. 610, 60 Am. Rep. 452; People v. Schaeffer, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 23 [following People v. Mahaney, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 26]; Sanchez v. State, 27 Tex. App. 14, 10 S. W. 756; Cantee v. State, (Tex. App. 1889) 10 S. W. 757.

Applications of the rule, generally.— Thus, under a statute one section of which imposes a penalty upon any person who wilfully admixes with any article of food or drink any injurious or poisonous ingredient to adulterate it for sale, and another section of which imposes a penalty on any person who shall sell any article of food or drink with which, to his knowledge, any ingredient injurious to health has been mixed, and on every person who shall sell as unadulterated any article of food or drink which is adulterated, it has been held that under the first section a guilty knowledge is required, while under the second section the fact that defendant should sell articles as "unadulterated" which are adulterated, and in such a way as to mislead the buyer, is sufficient without further proof of guilty knowledge. Fitzpatrick v. Kelly, L. R. 8 Q. B. 337.

In passing upon the question of guilty intent the court, in People v. Schaeffer, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 23 [following People v. Mahaney, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 26], said: "The offense aimed at by the statutes under consideration is the sale of adulterated milk, which is shown to be adulterated when tested by the standard set by the act. That the seller had knowledge of the adulteration need not be shown. The first section, which defines the offense of which defendant is convicted, is silent as to the intent, while other sections defining other offenses make the intent a necessary ingredient." See also People v. Cipperly, 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107 [reversing 37 Hun (N. Y.) 319], the decision in the court of appeals being based on the dissenting opinion of Learned, J., in the court below.

In Dilley v. People, 4 Ill. App. 52, it was held that an instruction to the effect that if the jury found that A had sold milk to B, and had delivered the same to one of his own servants, by whom the same was delivered to B in the same condition in which it was when he received it from A, and that on its delivery to B it was examined and found to be adulterated, they should find A guilty, was erroneous, as the milk might, as a matter of fact, have been adulterated when A delivered it to his servant, and still A might not have done it or been privy to the transaction.

Adulteration before importation.— In Roberts v. Egerton, L. R. 9 Q. B. 494, a tea-dealer was convicted of selling an adulterated tea which he had guaranteed as pure. It appeared that the tea had been adulterated before importation and the seller had no knowledge of such adulteration. It was held, however, that, being in the tea-trade, the defendant must be taken to have a competent knowledge of his profession, and, where it was shown that such knowledge was general among other dealers, the conviction should be allowed to stand.

Professional milkmen.— In Com. v. Flannelly, 15 Gray (Mass.) 195, in speaking of the question of guilty knowledge, the court said: "The legislature, knowing the difficulty of proving the guilty knowledge or belief of adulteration, intended to hold those who were engaged in the sale of milk as a business or trade to a stricter rule, and impose upon them the duty of ascertaining the purity of the article which they offered for sale."

V. What Persons Liable.

A. Master. In this class of cases the act of the servant is the act of the master, and the latter is liable where the servant has acted within the scope of his duty.[19]

B. Servant. The servant also, it seems, under the provisions of the particular statute, may be guilty of the offense.[20]

VI. Jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of prosecutions for adulteration or sale of adulterated products, as a general rule, belongs to courts having a general criminal jurisdiction.[21] The fact, however, that the statute provides that a certain court shall have jurisdiction, does not necessarily render such court's jurisdiction exclusive, or oust from jurisdiction another court which had before taken cognizance of such cases.[22]

VII. Indictment or Complaint.

A. In General. Indictments or complaints for the selling or having in possession adulterated substances, being based upon statutes defining the offense, will be held sufficient when they substantially follow the words of the particular statute under which they are drawn[23] and allege all the facts and circum-

19. Com. v. Warren, 160 Mass. 533, 36 N. E. 308; Com. v. Vieth, 155 Mass. 442, 29 N. E. 577; Com. v. Haynes, 107 Mass. 194; Meyer v. State, 54 Ohio St. 242, 43 N. E. 164. See also Com. v. Smith, 143 Mass. 169, 9 N. E. 631.

In Com. v. Haynes, 107 Mass. 194, a sale by defendant was sufficiently proved by showing that defendant, whose father owned a milk route, carried the milk to the customers; that defendant and another employee knowingly adulterated the milk with water while on their way to distribute the same to the customers; and that defendant handed one of the cans of adulterated milk from the wagon to his co-employee, who delivered it to the purchaser.

Inadvertent sale by servant.— The master may be held liable for an inadvertent sale made by his servant in the course of his business. Com. v. Warren, 160 Mass. 533, 36 N. E. 308.

Sale without consent of master.— So where the sale was made in the absence of the master, without his knowledge or consent, he may be held liable. Com. v. Vieth, 155 Mass. 442, 29 N. E. 577.

Possession by servant.— Where the master was indicted for having in his possession for the purpose of selling and for selling adulterated milk, it was held that proof of the possession of such adulterated milk by his servant was not sufficient to convict without evidence that the servant was acting for and under instructions from his master. State v. Smith, 10 R. I. 258.

But in Com. v. Proctor, 165 Mass. 38, 42 N. E. 335, it was held that the possession of a servant is the possession of the master, the prosecution being under Mass. Stat. (1886), c. 318, § 2, and Mass. Stat. (1894), c. 425, for selling adulterated milk.

20. Meyer v. State, 54 Ohio St. 242, 43 N. E. 164; Myer v. State, 10 Ohio Cir. Ct. 226.

In the Meyer case cited supra it was held that one who sells impure and adulterated wine is subject to fine under the Ohio act of March 20, 1884, although at the time of the sale he is the agent of a principal who resides without the state.

In the Myer case cited supra the court held that an agent for a wine house in another state, who takes orders for adulterated wine in the state, and procures the transportation of the goods directly to the purchaser in the state, is guilty of a misdemeanor under the Ohio statute making any person guilty of a misdemeanor "who shall manufacture or cause the same to be done with intent to sell, or shall sell, or offer to sell," any adulterated wine within the state.

21. Com. v. Haynes, 107 Mass. 194 [citing Mass. Gen. Stat. c. 114, § 6]; People v. Harris, 123 N. Y. 70, 25 N. E. 317 [citing N. Y. Laws (1862), c. 467; N. Y. Laws (1884), c. 202; N. Y. Laws (1885), c. 183].

22. People v. Harris, 123 N. Y. 70, 25 N. E. 317; People v. Austin, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 396, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 578.

Thus it was held in Com. v. Haynes, 107 Mass. 194, that Mass. Stat. (1868), c. 263, § 2, which provided that the penalty prescribed for selling adulterated milk might be recovered on complaint before any court of competent jurisdiction, did not exclude the superior court from jurisdiction of an indictment for the offense.

23. Com. v. Keenan, 139 Mass. 193, 29 N. E. 477; People v. West, 106 N. Y. 293, 12 N. E. 610, 60 Am. Rep. 452; Haas v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 177. See also Meyer v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 233, wherein it was held that an affidavit charging that defendant sold for stances necessary to bring defendant within the terms of the statute creating and defining the offense.[24]

B. Description of Article Adulterated. There should be a description of the article claimed to be adulterated, sufficient to show that it is within the contemplation of the statute;[25] but there need be no particular description of the substance, as to either its ingredients or its use,[26] unless such a descrip-blackberry wine "a certain compound and mixture consisting of wine, sugar, water, alcohol, salicylic acid, and aniline red," charged a violation of the Ohio act of March 26, 1891, forbidding the sale of adulterated wine, and did not come within Ohio Rev. Stat. § 7456-26, excepting from the operation of the statute wine sold for medicinal purposes.

24. Com. v. Rowell, 146 Mass. 128, 15 N. E. 154; Com. v. O'Donnell, 1 Allen (Mass.) 593; Com. v. Flannelly, 15 Gray (Mass.) 195; People v. West, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 162.

Description of defendant.— Where the statute under which the indictment is drawn is applicable only to those who are engaged in the business of selling milk, the indictment must allege that the defendant belongs to that class of persons. Com. v. Flannelly, 15 Gray (Mass.) 195.

It is not necessary to allege that defendant was a member of a partnership, as such allegation is not descriptive of the offense. Com. v. Rowell, 146 Mass. 128, 15 N. E. 154.

Name of purchaser.— In People v. Burns, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 274, 7 N. Y. Crim. 92, 6 N. Y. Suppl. 611, it was held that an indictment which neither named the purchaser of the impure article nor stated that his name was unknown, was defective as not stating particularly the acts constituting the offense.

Negativing exceptions.— In Com. v. Kenneson, 143 Mass. 418, 9 N. E. 761, it was held that a complaint under Mass. Stat. (1886), c. 318, § 2, prohibiting the having in one's possession milk "not of good standard quality" with intent to sell the same, and establishing a different standard for the months of May and June, need not negative the exception of the months of May and June, where it alleges the unlawful possession on the first day of July.

That lard was stamped "pure," etc.— Under the Iowa statute which provides that no person shall sell any lard, or any article intended for use as lard, which contains any ingredient but the pure fat of healthy swine, under any label bearing the words "refined," "pure," "family," unless every package in which the article is sold is marked "compound lard" it was held that an information charging a violation of such act is sufficient if it alleges in substance that defendant sold a package, or bucket, filled with an article intended for use as lard which contained other ingredients than pure fat of healthy swine, and that such bucket or package did not bear on the top or outer side the name, and proportion in pounds and fractional parts thereof, of each ingredient contained therein, as provided by the statute, without alleging that it was stamped "pure," "refined," "family," or "compound" lard. State v. Snow, 81 Iowa 642, 47 N. W. 777, 11 L. R. A. 355.

25. Liquor.— Under an Ohio statute providing for the inspection of liquor it was held that the liquor sold must be alleged to have remained uninspected, and that it was not sufficient to allege that it was not inspected in the county where the sale was made and that the cask bore no inspector's brand. Woodworth v. State, 4 Ohio St. 487.

Milk.— An indictment charging that defendant had in his possession with intent to sell "milk" to which a certain foreign substance had been added was held sufficient where it was shown that boric acid had been added to "cream." Com. v. Gordon, 159 Mass. 8, 33 N. E. 709.

So it has been held unnecessary to allege that the milk was cow's milk. Com. v. Farren, 9 Allen (Mass.) 489.

Mustard.— In Haas v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 177, it was held that an affidavit charging defendant with selling to a certain person, on a day stated, in a specified county, "a certain quantity of food, to wit, ground mustard," which was adulterated with starch, is sufficient to put him on his trial.

Indefinite description.— Where the indictment charges defendant with fraudulently adulterating "a certain substance intended for food, to wit: one pound of confectionery," it was held insufficient and uncertain, the word "confectionery" being a generic term for many articles. Com. v. Chase, 125 Mass. 202.

Quantity of adulterated substance.— An indictment which alleges that defendant had in his "possession milk to which a certain foreign substance had been added, to wit, annatto coloring matter," with intent unlawfully to sell the same, is sufficient without naming the quantity. Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 512, 16 N. E. 280.

26. Allegation as to ingredients.— Where an indictment charges the defendant with having in his possession with intent to sell milk containing a less percentage of milk solids than is required by the statute, it is not necessary to allege further that the milk has been analyzed and found deficient, such fact being a matter of proof. Com. v. Tobias, 141 Mass. 129, 6 N. E. 217; Com. v. Bowers, 140 Mass. 483, 5 N. E. 469. Nor is it necessary to allege or prove the cause which reduced the quality of the milk below the legal standard. Com. v. Keenan, 139 Mass. 193, 29 N. E. 477, wherein it was held that under Mass. Pub. Stat. (1882), c. 57, § 5, providing that no person shall sell, or have in his possession with intent to sell, "adulterated milk, or milk to which water or any foreign substance has been added," and § 9, defining adulterated milk to be milk containing more than eighty-seven per cent. of watery fluid, or less than thirteen per cent. of milk

tion is necessary to properly charge the offense as defined by the particular statute.[27]

C. Description of Adulterant. While it is not necessary to describe particularly what were the noxious materials used in the adulteration,[28] yet where such description is attempted the proof must agree with the allegations.[29]

D. Guilty Knowledge or Intent. It is not necessary to allege that defendant had knowledge that the article sold was adulterated,[30] unless such knowledge is by the particular statute made one of the essential ingredients of the offense.[31] Nor is it necessary to allege that it was defendant's intent to injure any particular person or person's health.[32]

E. Joinder of Counts and Offenses. The rules as to joinder of counts and offenses applicable to criminal trials in general obtain in this class of indictments,[33] and defendant may be charged in different counts of the same indict-solids, a complaint is sufficient which alleges that defendant had in his possession, with intent to sell, a certain quantity of adulterated milk, to wit, milk "containing less than thirteen per cent. of milk solids."

Allegation of use.— In Haas v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 177 [criticising Vester v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 170], it was held that the presumption was that where a customer called for an article generally used for food, it was his intention so to use it, and there was no necessity of an allegation that the same was to be used as food. See also State v. Kelly, 54 Ohio St. 166, 43 N. E. 163.

27. State v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469, wherein it was held that under N. J. Laws (1882), c. 82, § 4, declaring that milk shown to contain more than eighty-eight per centum of watery fluids, or less than twelve per centum of milk solids, shall be deemed adulterated milk within the meaning of the act, a complaint for selling, and having in possession with intent to sell, milk under such standard, should be special, and not in the form of a complaint for selling milk which is in fact adulterated.

28. Rex v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11, holding that where the adulterant was described as unwholesome and unfit for the food of man, it was sufficient.

29. An allegation that defendant had in his possession one pint of adulterated milk, "to which milk water had been added," with intent to sell the same, is not supported, it seems, by proof that defendant had added water to pure milk. Com. v. Luscomb, 130 Mass. 42 [cited with approval in Com. v. Keenan, 139 Mass. 193, 29 N. E. 477].

30. Com. v. Farren, 9 Allen (Mass.) 489; Haas v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 177. See also supra, IV.

Hence, in People v. West, 106 N. Y. 293, 12 N. E. 610, 60 Am. Rep. 452, in a prosecution under N. Y. Laws (1885), c. 183, § 3, providing that no person or persons shall sell, supply, or bring to be manufactured to any butter or cheese manufactory any milk diluted with water, etc., it was held that an indictment charging that defendant did wrongfully, unlawfully, and knowingly supply and bring to be manufactured into cheese to a cheese manufactory then and there situate, etc., a certain quantity of milk, which said milk was then and there diluted with water, for the purpose of having the same manufactured into cheese, sufficiently states the offense.

31. Com. v. Flannelly, 15 Gray (Mass.) 195, holding that a complaint for selling adulterated milk under Mass. Stat. (1856), c. 222, providing for the punishment of any person who shall sell adulterated milk knowing or having reason to believe that the milk was adulterated, must allege that defendant knew, or had reason to know, that the milk was adulterated. And to the same effect see People v. Fauerback, 5 Park. Crim. (N. Y.) 311.

Sufficient allegation of knowledge.— In Sanchez v. State, 27 Tex. App. 14, 10 S. W. 756, it was held that an information under Willson's Crim. Stat. Tex. § 656, charging that defendant "did unlawfully and knowingly offer for sale" adulterated milk, was not open to the objection that it did not charge that defendant knew that the milk was adulterated.

32. Rex v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11. See also People v. West, 44 Hun (N. Y.) 162, wherein it was held that an indictment under N. Y. Laws (1884), c. 202, § 3, providing that no person shall sell, supply, or bring to be manufactured to any butter or cheese manufactory any milk diluted with water, etc., was not defective for the reason that it was not alleged therein that the manufactory to which the milk was brought was not a private factory used by the defendant alone, and the cheese manufactured for the market by reason of which third persons would be injured, the circumstances supposed being matters of defense.

Intent to be used as human food.— In State v. Kelly, 54 Ohio St. 166, 43 N. E. 163 [reversing 2 Ohio Dec. 239], it was held that an affidavit to charge a violation of the Ohio act of March 20, 1884, "to provide against the adulateration of food and drugs," need not charge that an adulterated article of food is sold to be used as human food.

33. Thus an indictment which alleges that defendant "did unlawfully keep, offer for sale, and sell" adulterated milk, charges but one offense. Com. v. Nichols, 10 Allen (Mass.) 199.

So an indictment is not bad for duplicity because it alleges that defendant sold "adulterated milk to which a large quantity, that ment with selling and having in possession for the purpose of sale adulterated articles.[34]

VIII. DEFENSES.

Defendant may always show such matters of defense as tend to remove him beyond the contemplation of the statute under which he is being prosecuted;[35] but where the statute in express terms declares the possession or sale of an article below a given standard to be an offense, a defendant who is shown to have had in his possession or to have made a sale of such an article will not be allowed to prove, by way of defense, any extenuating circumstances either on his own part[36] or with respect to the purchaser.[37]

IX. EVIDENCE.

A. Of Defendant's Intent. Defendant's intention to sell is to be gathered from his acts and from the time, place, and circumstances of their commission, all of which evidence is competent to be submitted to the jury either upon the question of intent[38] or upon the question of his possession with intent to sell.[39] is to say four quarts, of water, had been added," since the mixing of milk with water is an adulteration, and but one offense is charged. Com. v. Farren, 9 Allen (Mass.) 489. See also supra, III, C.

In Polinsky v. People, 73 N. Y. 65, it was held that an indictment purporting to proceed exclusively upon an ordinance of the city of New York prohibiting the bringing of adulterated milk into the city was not bad for duplicity in that it contained averments which might sustain a count for the offense of selling adulterated milk under N. Y. Laws (1862), c. 467 [as amended N. Y. Laws (1864), c. 544].

34. Com. v. Tobias, 141 Mass. 129, 6 N. E. 217. But where the complaint charges in one count both possession and sale of the prohibited article the question whether the prosecutor will be required to elect upon which charge he will rely depends upon the discretion of the court. People v. Briggs, 114 N. Y. 56, 20 N. E. 820. See also People v. Fulle, 12 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 196, where the complaint charged the selling of adulterated cream of tartar for a drug and food, in violation of a statute, and the prosecution was compelled to elect on which part of the charge it would proceed, and elected to try defendant for selling as a drug.

35. Good faith of defendant.— On a prosecution for selling adulterated molasses, defendant may show that he purchased it believing it to be pure, and in good faith sold it as such without intent to deceive. Kelly v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 239.

Sale of skim milk.— Where defendant was indicted for selling milk below the statutory standard, he may show as a defense that he sold the milk from a can marked "skim milk." Com. v. Tobias, 141 Mass. 129, 6 N. E. 217.

Failure to supply sample for analysis.— Upon a prosecution for failure to supply a sample for analysis as required under the Ohio statute, defendant should be allowed to prove that he did not offer for sale the articles in question. Margolius v. State, 1 Ohio N. P. 264.

36. Thus it is no defense that the milk has been reduced below the statutory standard by a removal of part of the cream, where the same has been sold as pure milk. Com. v. Bowers, 140 Mass. 483, 5 N. E. 469.

Special contract to deliver milk at a dairy will be no defense where it is below the legal standard. Com. v. Holt, 146 Mass. 38, 14 N. E. 930.

That the article was patented was not considered sufficient as a defense in a prosecution under Ohio Rev. Stat. § 7090, forbidding the sale of adulterated food unless stamped with a notice of its ingredients. Palmer v. State, 39 Ohio St. 236, 48 Am. Rep. 429.

37. Failure to post notice.— The fact that the purchaser, a manufacturer of cheese, did not post a notice of the statute in the receiving-room of his factory, as required by the act, was held no defense to a prosecution for its violation. Bainbridge v. State, 30 Ohio St. 264.

38. Thus the fact that the adulterated milk was in the wagon of defendant, with his name thereon, standing at an early hour upon the public streets; that defendant's servant was on the wagon, which contained several eight-quart cans, from which the sample was taken, was held evidence of an intent to sell, which was properly submitted to the jury. Com. v. Smith, 143 Mass. 169, 9 N. E. 631.

But in Meyer v. State, 2 Ohio Dec. 233, where defendant was prosecuted for selling adulterated wine, it was held not to be error to exclude defendant's evidence that he had no knowledge that the liquor was impure, where the other testimony plainly shows that he knew its quality.

39. The fact that defendant was on a wagon with a license-number containing milk cans, from one of which was taken the adulterated milk, is competent evidence to go to the jury as to whether defendant was in possession of the milk with intent to sell the same. Com. v. Rowell, 146 Mass. 128, 15 N. E. 154. See also Com. v. Smith, 143 Mass. 169, 9 N. E. 631, a complaint under Mass. Pub. Stat. c. 57, § 5, for having in possession adulterated milk with intent unlawfully to sell it.

B. Relating to Analysis. In prosecutions under statutes designating the method of seizure for analysis, the provisions of the statute must be strictly complied with in order that the analysis may be admissible in evidence;[40] but where the adulterated substance is seized for analysis under circumstances not contemplated in the statute, the competency of the evidence as to its quality is to be determined by the rules of common law,[41] and defendant may give evidence tending to impeach the correctness of the analysis.[42]

40. Com. v. Lockhardt, 144 Mass. 132, 10 N. E. 511. See also Com. v. Spear, 143 Mass. 172, 9 N. E. 632, wherein it is held that the question whether the addition, by the inspector, of a few drops of carbolic acid to that part of the milk reserved for defendant affected the sample so as to constitute a failure to comply with the provisions of Mass. Stat. (1884), c. 310, § 3, relating to the analysis of milk, is a question of fact for the jury.

Failure to seal securely.— The fact that the bottle in which the sample was kept was not securely sealed, so as to render the bottle air-tight, was held an insufficient compliance with a statute [Mass. Stat. (1884), c. 310] requiring the same to be "sealed." Com. v. Lockhardt, 144 Mass. 132, 10 N. E. 511. But in Com. v. Kenneson, 143 Mass. 418, 9 N. E. 761, it was held that Mass. Stat. (1884), c. 310, § 4, providing for the reservation and sealing before analysis, was repealed by Mass. Stat. (1886), c. 318, §§ 1, 3, and that under the latter statute evidence of an analysis was admissible in a charge for adulteration, though the sample was not given until two hours after the analysis.

Where two samples of milk were taken from defendant's wagon and analyzed, evidence is admissible as to both. Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 512, 16 N. E. 280, also holding that the prosecution need not be required to elect between the two samples.

41. Com. v. Holt, 146 Mass. 38, 14 N. E. 930, holding that in such cases the testimony of any person who had sufficient skill to make an analysis of milk, and who actually analyzed some of the milk in question, was admissible; Com. v. Spear, 143 Mass. 172, 9 N. E. 632.

In Com. v. Coleman, 157 Mass. 460, 32 N. E. 662, it was held that the fact that the collector of samples made a "purchase of milk" in a restaurant for analysis, and without giving the owner an opportunity to ask for a sealed sample, would not render evidence incompetent to show that the milk was below the legal standard.

Under the English statute it is not necessary for the officer to notify the seller or his agent of his intention to have the sample analyzed, or to deliver over a portion of the sample. Rouch v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. 17.

A rule of evidence is not established by statutes providing that milk shown by analysis to contain less than a certain per cent. of milk solids, etc., shall be deemed adulterated. State v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469; People v. Cipperly, 101 N. Y. 634, 4 N. E. 107 [reversing 37 Hun (N. Y.) 319]; State v. Smyth, 14 R. I. 100, 51 Am. Rep. 344.

Testimony of one not an official inspector may be received to show adulteration. Com. v. Spear, 143 Mass. 172, 9 N. E. 632, wherein it was held that Mass. Pub. Stat. (1882), c. 57, § 2, and Mass. Stat. (1884), c. 310, § 3, providing for an analysis of milk by public inspectors, did not operate as providing an exclusive mode of proving adulteration.

So, also, evidence having been introduced to show that a particular foreign substance has been added to milk, a chemist who has analyzed the latter may testify what the milk was, independently of that. Com. v. Schaffner, 146 Mass. 512, 16 N. E. 280.

The sworn certificate of a milk-inspector appointed to analyze milk may be admitted in evidence in a prosecution under Mass. Stat. (1864), c. 122, if it further appears that the inspector was a witness in the case and testified to all the facts set forth in the certificate. Com. v. Waite, 11 Allen (Mass.) 264, 87 Am. Dec. 711.

Evidence that defendant's cows were properly fed, not being offered for the purpose of discrediting the analysis of the milk put in on behalf of the prosecution, was held to have been properly excluded where defendant was indicted under N. H. Laws (1883), c. 42. State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 13 Atl. 585, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419.

42. State v. Groves, 15 R. I. 208, 2 Atl. 384. See also People v. Hodnett, 68 Hun (N. Y.) 341, 22 N. Y. Suppl. 809, which was an action brought under N. Y. Laws (1885), c. 183, to recover a penalty for selling adulterated milk.

So, where it appeared that defendant had on hand four cans of milk, and among the number one can of skimmed milk, and it did not appear from the evidence from which can the inspectors had taken the milk claimed to be adulterated, a judgment of conviction was reversed. The prosecution was under N. Y. Laws (1885), c. 183, an exception being made in the case of skimmed milk for use in the county in which it is produced. People v. Thompson, 14 N. Y. Suppl. 819.

Official analysis not conclusive.— In State v. Newton, 45 N. J. L. 469, it was held that N. J. Laws (1882), c. 82, § 2, prohibiting the sale of adulterated milk, and providing that milk shall be deemed adulterated which is shown, by analysis of a member of the board of public analysts, to contain less than twelve per cent. of milk solids, does not render the act of the analyst conclusive of the guilt of the defendant in selling adulterated milk, and thereby render the act unconstitutional, but merely prohibits the sale of milk containing less than twelve per cent. of milk solids.

C. Variance. In prosecutions for selling adulterated articles the rule against variance has been applied with respect to the admission of evidence.[43]

ADULTERINE. The issue of adulterous intercourse.[1]

ADULTERINE GUILDS. Traders acting as a corporation without a charter, and paying a fine annually for permission to exercise their usurped privileges.[2]

ADULTERINUS. Corrupt; spurious; counterfeit; forged.[3]

ADULTERIUM. A fine imposed for the commission of adultery.[4]

ADULTERIUM NON PROBET CONTRA ALIUM SOLA MULIERIS CONFESSIONE. A maxim meaning "adultery is not proved against another by the confession of the woman."[5]

ADULTEROUS BASTARDS. Those produced by an unlawful connection between two persons, who, at the time when the child was conceived, were, either of them or both, connected by marriage with some other person.[6]

43. What constitutes a variance.— In an indictment charging defendant with having in his custody and possession, with intent to sell the same, "one pint of adulterated milk, to which milk water had been added," the allegation is descriptive, and is not supported by proof that the milk in question was adulterated by adding water to pure milk. Com. v. Luscomb, 130 Mass. 42.

In State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, 13 Atl. 585, 10 Am. St. Rep. 419, evidence that pure milk does not always come up to the standard fixed by the statute was held not to be admissible upon a trial for selling adulterated milk.

In People v. Fulle, 12 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 196, defendant was indicted for selling an adulterated cream of tartar for a drug and food. Upon being forced to an election the prosecution went to trial upon the sale as a drug. Upon proof that the sale had been made as a food, it was held a variance notwithstanding the fact that under the statute sale as a food was an offense.

What does not constitute variance.— The variance between an averment in an indictment for selling adulterated milk in violation of Mass. Stat. (1864), c. 122, § 4, that the milk was sold to a woman, and proof that the woman, in buying the milk, was acting as her husband's agent, is not fatal, where defendant had no notice, express or implied, at the time of sale, that the woman was so acting. Com. v. Farren, 9 Allen (Mass.) 489.

In Com. v. Tobias, 141 Mass. 129, 6 N. E. 217, it was held that where a complaint contained two counts, the first charging defendant with selling adulterated milk and the second with having such milk in his possession for sale, the same milk being intended in both counts, and the having in possession being on the same day as the sale and preliminary to it, the court properly refused an instruction that if a consummated sale was proven there could be no conviction under the second count.

I. Definition.

Adultery is the voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with a person other than the offender's husband or wife.[1]

II. Nature and Elements of the Offense.

A. In General — 1. At Common Law. Adultery as a crime was unknown to the common law.[2]

2. By Canon Law. Under the canon law, however, adultery was considered a crime and was punishable by ecclesiastical censure,[3] and included all cases of incontinence by married persons, whether committed by a married man with a single or married woman, or by a married woman with a single or married man.[4]

3. By Statute — a. In General. Adultery, not being a common-law offense, is not punishable in this country unless made so by statute.[5] Most of the states, however, have passed statutes creating and defining the offense.[6]

According to the ecclesiastical law the offense of adultery is defined by Godolphin as "the inconstancy of married persons, or of persons whereof the one at least is under the conjugal vow." State v. Searle, 56 Vt. 516, 518. See also State v. Roth, 17 Iowa 336.

The civil law defines adultery to be the "carnal knowledge of another man's wife." Smitherman v. State, 27 Ala. 23; State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 69 Am. Dec. 59. By the civil law adultery could be committed only by the unlawful sexual intercourse of a man with a married woman. "The connection of a married man with a single woman does not make him guilty of the crime of adultery." Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 509, 511, 32 Am. Dec. 284 [quoting Wood's Inst. 272].

Failure to define "sexual intercourse."— A statute defining adultery to be the unlawful voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with one of the opposite sex is not invalid for uncertainty in that it fails to define what constitutes sexual intercourse. State v. Whealey, 5 S. D. 427, 59 N. W. 211.

Conspiracy to commit adultery is also made an offense in some states, but a mere agreement between a man and a woman to commit the offense is not indictable as a conspiracy to commit the crime. Miles v. State, 58 Ala. 390; Shannon v. Com., 14 Pa. St. 226. See also, generally, Conspiracy.

Solicitation to commit adultery is not an indictable offense unless made so by statute. Smith v. Com., 54 Pa. St. 209, 93 Am. Dec. 686. Compare State v. Avery, 7 Conn. 266, 267, 18 Am. Dec. 105.

Solicitation cannot be considered as an attempt to commit the offense. State v. Butler, 8 Wash. 194, 35 Pac. 1093, 40 Am. St. Rep. 900, 25 L. R. A. 434.

b. What Constitutes the Statutory Offense — (I) Difference of Opinion. The question as to what will constitute the statutory offense of adultery has not received uniform decision among the courts of the several states.[7]

(II) The Better Doctrine. Since the gist of the crime, independently of statutory enactments, is the danger of introducing spurious heirs into a family, whereby a man may be charged with the maintenance of children not his own,[8] it would seem to be the better doctrine that a man cannot be guilty of adultery by sexual intercourse with an unmarried woman;[9] and where he is criminally

7. Where both parties are married, each party, if guilty of any offense, is guilty of adultery. Kendrick v. State, 100 Ga. 360, 28 S. E. 120; State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591; Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 26 Am. Rep. 21; Hunter v. U. S., 1 Pinn. (Wis.) 91, 39 Am. Dec. 277. See also supra, I; and cases cited infra, in this note, as to the guilt of both parties "where either party is married."

Where either party is married, under some statutes the offense of adultery is complete, and both parties are guilty thereof.

Texas.— Edwards v. State, 10 Tex. App. 25; Parks v. State, 3 Tex. App. 337.

In Buchanan v. State, 55 Ala. 154, however, it is held that, according to the better opinion, where one party is married and the other is single, the former is guilty of adultery and the latter of fornication, while in Kendrick v. State, 100 Ga. 360, 28 S. E. 120, it was held that under Ga. Pen. Code, § 381, where one of the parties was married and the other single, each was guilty of the statutory offense denominated "adultery and fornication." See, generally, Fornication.

Where neither party is married it has been held that neither is guilty of adultery. If guilty of any offense at all under the statute it is fornication. Kendrick v. State, 100 Ga. 360, 28 S. E. 120; State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591; Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 26 Am. Rep. 21; State v. Lash, 16 N. J. L. 380, 32 Am. Dec. 397; State v. Connoway, Tappan (Ohio) 90. See also, generally, Fornication.

Where man is married and woman is single, under some statutes it has been held that the man is guilty of adultery (Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 509, 32 Am. Dec. 284; State v. Fellows, 50 Wis. 65, 6 N. W. 239; Hunter v. U. S., 1 Pinn. (Wis.) 91, 39 Am. Dec. 277); under others that the man is not guilty of adultery (State v. Connoway, Tappan (Ohio) 90); under others that the man is guilty of fornication (State v. Lash, 16 N. J. L. 380, 32 Am. Dec. 397); and under others that both the man and the woman are guilty of fornication (State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591; Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 26 Am. Rep. 21; State v. Armstrong, 4 Minn. 335).

Where woman is married and man is single, under some statutes it has been held that both the man and woman are guilty of adultery (State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591; Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 26 Am. Rep. 21; State v. Pearce, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 318; Names v. State, 20 Ind. App. 168, 50 N. E. 401; Com. v. Elwell, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 190, 35 Am. Dec. 277]); and under others that the man is merely a fornicator (Respublica v. Roberts, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 6; Com. v. Lafferty, 6 Gratt. (Va.) 672), while the woman is an adulteress (Com. v. Kilwell, 1 Pittsb. (Pa.) 255).

Reason for lack of uniformity of decisions. — This difference of opinion among the courts as to what constitutes the offense arises from the fact that the decisions are founded upon codes of law materially different from each other. Accordingly the doctrine announced in a particular case is dependent upon the individual statute under which the defendant is being prosecuted. Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 509, 32 Am. Dec. 284; State v. Lash, 16 N. J. L. 380, 32 Am. Dec. 397.

liable for the offense, the fact arises from some feature of the statute which brings the act within the definition given of the crime.[10]

(III) Where the Statute Does Not Define the Offense. Where no definition of the crime is contained in the statute making adultery a punishable offense, resort must be had to established definitions sanctioned by books of authority and adopted by long usage.[11]

B. Consent of Woman. The consent of the woman is not necessary, and as against the man he may be guilty, although the connection was effected by force and against the will of the woman.[12]

C. Mistake of Parties — 1. In General. The fact that a person is guilty of the offense of adultery through an erroneous belief that he or she is within the terms of the law is, as a general rule, no excuse for the commission of the crime.[13]

2. Mistake of Fact. In marriage the law does not presume death until after an unexplained absence of seven years, and a party to a marriage who remarries and cohabits before the expiration of that period may, under the statute, be guilty of the offense of adultery.[14] In such cases the marriage is presumed to continue until a dissolution by divorce or death is shown.[15]

3. Mistake of Law — a. In General. The fact that the parties thought that they had a right to marry and were so advised will afford no excuse where one of them has a living husband or wife at the time.[16] A woman, however, is not criminally guilty of adultery unless she had knowledge of a prior marriage or continued to cohabit after such knowledge.[17]

b. Invalid Divorce. So a defendant may be guilty of the offense, where, erroneously believing himself to be legally divorced, he remarries and cohabits under the second marriage.[18]

Distinction in civil and criminal actions.— In Smitherman v. State, 27 Ala. 23, 25, the court said: "The term 'adultery,' as used in our code, should be construed with reference to the subjects-matter with which it stands connected. When used with reference to divorce, it is to be taken in the canonical sense of that term, and embraces the infidelity of the husband to his wife . . . ; but when considered with reference to the criminal law it imports such sexual intercourse as violates another man's bed — as may entail a spurious issue upon the defrauded husband."

Woman drugged.—The fact that the woman was drugged at the time of the commission of the offense, and in consequence was not guilty, will not excuse the man, even where the two are jointly indicted. Com. v. Bakeman, 131 Mass. 577, 41 Am. Rep. 248.

Joint criminal intent.— In Alonzo v. State, 15 Tex. App. 378, 384, 49 Am. Rep. 207 [quoted in State v. Cutshall, 109 N. C. 764, 768, 14 S. E. 107, 26 Am. St. Rep. 599] the court said: "While it is true that, to constitute adultery, there must be a joint physical act, it is certainly not true that there must be a joint criminal intent."

Decree set aside for fraud.—Defendant may be convicted after a second marriage, where his decree has been set aside for fraud in its procurement. State v. Watson, 20 R. I. 354, 39 Atl. 193.

Marriage in another state.—The facts that a wife obtained divorce for the fault of her husband, and that he subsequently married again in another state, do not render him guilty of the crime of adultery. State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 69 Am. Dec. 59.

III. Who May Prosecute.

A. In General. The offense is usually prosecuted by the state.[19]

B. Special Statutory Provision. By statute in some states, however, it is provided that no prosecution for adultery can be commenced except by complaint of the husband or wife,[20] the object being to exempt the party from prosecution except at the instance of the husband or wife.[21]

IV. Joinder of Parties Defendant.

While it is not necessary to join both the man and the woman in the same indictment,[22] yet such course may be pursued at the election of the prosecution,[23] and in such cases the indictment must be construed as if it alleged that the acts constituting the offense, and charged to have been done by the defendants jointly, were also done by each of the defendants separately.[24]

V. Indictment or Information.[25]

which follows the language of the statute will generally be held sufficient.[26]

2. Under Statutes Authorizing Prosecution Only on Complaint of Spouse. Where the prosecution can be commenced only upon the complaint of the husband or wife, it is not necessary to allege such fact,[27] and evidence thereof may be introduced without averment.[28]

B. Certainty. Setting out the offense so plainly and distinctly that the jury can clearly understand its nature will be sufficient.[29]

C. Naming Offense. It is not necessary that the technical name of the crime be stated.[30]

D. Description of Parties. No particular description of the parties is required other than may be sufficient to bring them within the terms of the statute.[31]

Pennsylvania.—Helfrich v. Com., 33 Pa. St. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 579.

Texas.—Swancoat v. State, 4 Tex. App. 105.

Vermont.— State v. Miller, 60 Vt. 90, 12 Atl. 526.

Extent and limits of the rule.— Whether an indictment in the words of the statute is sufficient or not depends upon the manner of stating the offense in the statute; if every fact necessary to constitute the offense is charged or necessarily implied by following the language of the statute, an indictment in such language is sufficient; otherwise not. State v. Miller, 60 Vt. 90, 12 Atl. 526.

In some states it is made a special offense for a white person and a negro to live together in adultery, and where such statutes exist it is sufficient to charge the offense in the terms of the statute. Love v. State, (Ala. 1899) 27 So. 217 [citing Ala. Code (1876), § 4189].

See also, generally, Lewdness.

The exact words of the statute, however, need not be used, as a substantial following of their meaning is all that is required.

Indiana.— State v. Chandler, 96 Ind. 591.

Nebraska.— Lord v. State, 17 Nebr. 526, 23 N. W. 507.

Admission by attorney.— The complaint, warrant, and information need not allege that complainant was defendant's wife. It is enough that it appears that the marriage was admitted before the examining magistrate by defendant's attorney, the presumption being that the admission was made in defendant's presence, and such admission is binding on him. People v. Isham, 109 Mich. 72, 67 N. W. 819.

28. State v. Andrews, 95 Iowa 451, 64 N. W. 404; State v. Maas, 83 Iowa 469, 49 N. W. 1037.

Averment not conclusive.— An averment that the prosecution was commenced upon the complaint of the husband or wife of defendant is not conclusive upon the latter, and he or she may controvert the averment. State v. Roth, 17 Iowa 336.

29. Cook v. State, 11 Ga. 53, 56 Am. Dec. 410; State v. Stubbs, 108 N. C. 774, 13 S. E. 90.

Thus, where the indictment sets out the elements of the offense of adultery, it will be held good, although it attempts to set out another crime. Disharoon v. State, 95 Ga. 351, 22 S. E. 698. See also State v. Green, Kirby (Conn.) 87; Com. v. Squires, 97 Mass. 59.

Further specifications.— Where the indictment sets forth the offense with common-law strictness and particularity, defendant is not, as a matter of legal right, entitled to any further specifications of the crime with which he is charged. State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 24 Am. Rep. 124.

30. State v. Baldy, 17 Iowa 39, wherein it is held that an indictment which contains the facts constituting the offense is sufficient although it does not set out the technical name of the crime.

31. See infra, V, G, H.

Hence it is not necessary to allege the age,[32] race,[33] or sex[34] of the parties; and the indictment may allege the woman's name to be unknown.[35]

E. Averments as to Place and Time. While it is not necessary to allege the particular place within the county where the act was committed, yet it must appear from the evidence that it was within the jurisdiction of the court.[36] As a general rule the time of the act as laid is immaterial.[37] A day upon which the offense was committed should be alleged, but it will constitute no variance if the evidence does not show that the crime was committed on the very day charged.[38]

F. Averments as to Carnal Knowledge. Any term or expression which clearly conveys the idea of illicit connection is sufficient.[39]

G. Averments as to Marriage. It must be alleged that at least one of the parties was, at the time of the commission of the offense, married[40] to some person other than the one with whom the offense is charged to have been committed,[41]

32. Averment of age — Surplusage.— An averment of the woman's age is surplusage and need not be proved if the indictment states facts necessary to make out the crime. State v. Ean, 90 Iowa 534, 58 N. W. 898.

33. Miscegenation.—An indictment against a white man and a negro need not set out the race of each. Mulling v. State, 74 Ga. 10.

34. McLeod v. State, 35 Ala. 395 [following State v. Glaze, 9 Ala. 283]; Hildreth v. State, 19 Tex. App. 195.

"Maiden."— The word "maiden," used in an indictment for adultery, does not necessarily mean a virgin, but merely a young unmarried woman. State v. Shedrick, 69 Vt. 428, 38 Atl. 75.

"Spinster."— So in State v. Guest, 100 N. C. 410, 6 S. E. 253, it was held no ground for an arrest of judgment that the indictment against two defendants described the female as a "spinster."

36. Com. v. Horton, 2 Gray (Mass.) 354.

Name of the town.— So it was held unnecessary to allege the name of the town where the defendant resided, even where the officers of such town were entitled to a share in the fine. Duncan v. Com., 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 449.

37. Georgia.— Cook v. State, 11 Ga. 53, 56 Am. Dec. 410.

Iowa.— State v. Briggs, 68 Iowa 416, 27 N. W. 358.

Massachusetts.—Com. v. Merriam, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 518, 25 Am. Dec. 420; Com. v. Putnam, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 136.

Michigan.— People v. Davis, 52 Mich. 569, 18 N. W. 362.

Texas.— Wood v. State, (Tex. Crim. 1899) 51 S. W. 235.

But in Com. v. Seymour, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 567, where the indictment charged the offense to have been committed in 1800, it was held that it could not be amended by inserting the words "sixty-eight" in a blank left unfilled in the indictment.

"One thousand eight hundred and nine seven."— An allegation that the offense was committed in "one thousand eight hundred and nine seven" is sufficient to show its commission in 1897. Wood v. State, (Tex. Crim. 1899) 51 S. W. 235.

38. State v. Briggs, 68 Iowa 416, 27 N. W. 358; Com. v. Cobb, 14 Gray (Mass.) 57. See also infra, VIII, E.

Duplicity.— Where the indictment in one count charges defendant with several acts of adultery with the same person at different times, it charges more than one offense and is bad for duplicity. Com. v. Fuller, 163 Mass. 499, 40 N. E. 764.

39. Com. v. Squires, 97 Mass. 59; Gorman v. Com., 124 Pa. St. 536, 17 Atl. 26, 23 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 405; Davis v. Com., (Pa. 1886) 7 Atl. 194; State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 24 Am. Rep. 124.

In Helfrich v. Com., 33 Pa. St. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 579, an allegation that defendant did "commit adultery" was held sufficient without otherwise alleging carnal knowledge, since such term not only implied but expressed carnal knowledge.

Indefinite allegation.— Where the indictment alleged that the defendant was found in bed with another man's wife "under circumstances affording presumption of an illicit and felonious intention," it was held bad for not alleging what the illicit intention was. State v. Miller, 60 Vt. 90, 12 Atl. 526; State v. Chillis, Brayt. (Vt.) 131.

40. State v. Hutchinson, 36 Me. 261; State v. Thurstin, 35 Me. 205, 58 Am. Dec. 695; Com. v. Reardon, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 78; Tucker v. State, 35 Tex. 113; Clay v. State, 3 Tex. App. 499.

Implied allegation.— In Alabama, where adultery consists in the illicit commerce of two persons of different sexes one of whom at least is married, it has been held unnecessary to allege that either person is married, since the term "adultery" implies that fact without further allegation. State v. Hinton, 6 Ala. 864.

Marriage of both parties.— Where the indictment alleges that defendant is a married man it is sufficient without alleging that the other party was a married woman. But it may allege that both parties are married. State v. Hutchinson, 36 Me. 261 [quoting Com. v. Reardon, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 78].

41. State v. Hutchinson, 36 Me. 261; Moore v. Com., 6 Metc. (Mass.) 243, 39 Am. Dec. 724; State v. Clark, 54 N. H. 456; Tucker v. State, 35 Tex. 113; Hildreth v. State, 19 Tex. App. 195.

but any form of allegation which clearly and distinctly shows this fact will be held sufficient.[42]

H. Naming Husband or Wife of Defendant. It being made apparent from the allegations that the parties do not occupy the relation of husband and wife, it is not necessary further to allege the name or names of the legal spouse or spouses.[43]

I. Averments of Guilty Knowledge. Where guilty knowledge is part of the definition of the offense under the particular statute, it must be averred.[44] It seems, however, that under an indictment for adultery the defendant may be convicted of fornication if the evidence shows that he is guilty of that offense.[45]

VI. DEFENSES.

A. Defendant's Previous Good Character. Defendant's previous good character will not of itself constitute a defense.[46]

B. Former Acquittal of Bigamy. A former acquittal of bigamy will not constitute a defense to a charge of adultery.[47]

C. Innocence of Co-Defendant. The innocence of a co-defendant does not enure to the benefit of another defendant who is guilty.[48]

D. Mistake of Parties. While it is no defense that the parties were mistaken as to the law, and had no intention of committing the offense,[49] it seems, however, that the woman may set up her lack of knowledge of a prior marriage of her husband, where she ceased to cohabit with him upon becoming aware of such marriage.[50]

E. Subsequent Marriage. A subsequent marriage of one or both of the parties will not be deemed a valid defense where the specific offense antedates the ceremony.[51]

VII. COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES.

A. In General. The general rules governing the competency of witnesses in criminal cases are applicable to the offense of adultery.[52]

42. Thus an allegation that the woman is the lawful wife of another man is a sufficient allegation that she is not the wife of defendant (Names v. State, 20 Ind. App. 168, 50 N. E. 401; State v. Hutchinson, 36 Me. 261; Com. v. Reardon, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 78); and where the indictment alleged the name of the wife and further alleged that defendant committed adultery with another named woman, without otherwise alleging carnal knowledge, it was held sufficient without a further allegation that the latter was not his wife (Helfrich v. Com., 33 Pa. St. 68, 75 Am. Dec. 579).

43. Davis v. Com., (Pa. 1886) 7 Atl. 194; Hildreth v. State, 19 Tex. App. 195; Collum v. State, 10 Tex. App. 708. Contra, in Com. v. Corson, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 475, where it was held that upon an indictment against a married woman the name of her husband must be stated.

Under Texas statute.— Under the Texas statute it is not necessary to allege or prove the name of the person to whom one of the adulterers is married, and when so alleged it may be rejected as surplusage. Collum v. State, 10 Tex. App. 708 [citing Tex. Rev. Pen. Code, § 333].

44. Com. v. Elwell, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 190, 35 Am. Dec. 398; Fox v. State, 3 Tex. App. 329, 30 Am. Rep. 144.

Incestuous adultery.— Upon an indictment for incestuous adultery it is not necessary to charge a common knowledge of the relationship, if the charge of knowing the relationship is made against the party indicted. Morgan v. State, 11 Ala. 289.

45. State v. Cowell, 26 N. C. 231; Respublica v. Roberts, 1 Yeates (Pa.) 6.

46. State v. Donovan, 61 Iowa 278, 16 N. W. 130.

47. Swancoat v. State, 4 Tex. App. 105, the reason being that bigamy and adultery are not the same offenses.

51. Marrying paramour.— A party cannot set up as a defense that she has subsequently obtained a divorce from her husband and married her paramour. Fox v. State, 3 Tex. App. 329, 30 Am. Rep. 144.

Remarrying his former wife after a divorce, with knowledge of adultery committed with her by a third person during the former marriage, does not condone the offense of the third person so as to bar a criminal prosecution against such person. State v. Smith, 108 Iowa 440, 79 N. W. 115.

52. Bishop Stat. Crimes, § 688.

B. Accomplices — 1. In General. The rule that at common law a particeps criminis, notwithstanding the turpitude of his conduct, is not, on that account, an incompetent witness so long as he remains unconvicted and sentenced for an infamous crime,[53] has been applied to prosecutions for adultery.[54]

2. Necessity of Corroboration. The testimony of the accomplice must be corroborated by evidence tending to connect defendant with the commission of the offense,[55] and the degree of credit which ought to be given to the evidence is a matter exclusively within the province of the jury.[56] While such persons cannot be introduced as witnesses for one another, they may claim a severance, and if one or more be acquitted they may testify in behalf of the others.[57]

C. Husband and Wife — 1. At Common Law. At common law neither a husband nor a wife can be a witness for or against the other in a prosecution for adultery.[58]

2. By Statute. In some states, however, statutes exist which make the testimony of the husband or wife competent in such cases.[59]

So it was held in State v. Mims, 39 S. C. 557, 17 S. E. 850, that the confession of defendant's paramour, if not connected with some act of confession of his own in the nature of a joint acknowledgment, was not admissible.

Modification of rule.—The common-law rule as to the testimony of accomplices in this respect has been modified by statute in some states. Morrill v. State, 5 Tex. App. 447; Rutter v. State, 4 Tex. App. 57; U. S. v. Kershaw, 5 Utah 618, 19 Pac. 194.

The reason for the exclusion of the testimony is founded partly on the identity of interests, and partly on a principle of public policy which deems it necessary to guard the security and confidence of private life even at the risk of an occasional failure of justice. State v. Welch, 26 Me. 30, 45 Am. Dec. 94.

Extent and limits of rule—Evidence against a co-defendant of spouse.— The wife is not a competent witness against any co-defendant tried with her husband, if the evidence concern the husband, though it is not directly given against him. Cotton v. State, 62 Ala. 12.

Husband of paramour.— The husband of the woman with whom the adultery is alleged to have been committed is not a competent witness for the prosecution. State v. Gardner, 1 Root (Conn.) 485; State v. Welch, 26 Me. 30, 45 Am. Dec. 94; Com. v. Gordon, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 569. Contra, Morrill v. State, 5 Tex. App. 447.

Subsequent divorce.—A husband who since the commission of the offense has obtained a divorce is a competent witness to prove a marriage with his former wife. State v. Dudley, 7 Wis. 664.

By statute in Pennsylvania the wife is expressly authorized to testify to the marriage, upon a charge of adultery against the husband. Com. v. Mosier, 135 Pa. St. 221, 19 Atl. 943 [citing Pa. act of May 23, 1887, P. L. 158], holding also that in such case the fact that she testified as a witness before the grand jury will be no cause for quashing the indictment, as it will be presumed, in the absence of proof, that she testified only to the marriage.

VIII. EVIDENCE.

A. Burden of Proof — 1. As to Criminal Intent. The prosecution is not required to prove a criminal intent; the intent is inferred from the fact of intercourse, and any extenuating circumstances must be shown by defendant.[60]

2. As to Death of Absent Spouse. The onus of proving the death of the absent spouse, where seven years have not elapsed, is on defendant.[61]

3. As to Knowledge of Existence of Living Wife. Where there is evidence tending to show that defendant cohabited with a man following a prima facie valid marriage between them, the burden of proof is upon the state to prove that she knew that the man already had a living wife.[62]

4. To Rebut Presumption of Marriage. Testimony of spouse, together with proof of continued cohabitation, raises such a presumption of marriage as to make it incumbent upon defendant to rebut the presumption.[63]

5. To Show Prosecution Commenced by Spouse. Where the prosecution can be commenced only upon complaint of the spouse, proof of the fact of such commencement must be adduced at the trial.[64]

B. Admissibility — 1. Admissions and Confessions — a. Of Defendant. Admissions or confessions of guilt, when shown to be voluntary,[65] may be received in evidence as proof of the offense of adultery,[66] especially where they are corroborated.[67]

b. Of Co-Defendant. The admissions or confessions of one co-defendant are not admissible in evidence against the other.[68]

c. Of Third Persons. Admissions and communications between the injured wife and parties interested in the prosecution, to which defendant was not privy, should not be admitted against him.[69]

2. As to Defendant's Chastity. Evidence is admissible as to the chastity of defendant,[70] but it is not permissible to impeach the veracity of a male witness by such evidence.[71]

3. As to Intercourse — a. In General. Circumstantial evidence, such as the acts and conduct of the parties toward each other, is always admissible as evidence of their guilt.[72]

b. Suspicious Circumstances. Suspicious actions and incriminating circumstances are admissible as showing an adulterous inclination.[73]

4. As to Paternity. Resemblance of a seven-months-old child to its reputed father is inadmissible to establish paternity.[74]

5. As to Time of Commission. The state may show that the act was committed at any time within the statute of limitations.[75]

6. Similar Acts — a. In General. Facts tending to prove a similar but distinct offense are admissible for the purpose of raising an inference or presumption that defendant committed the particular act with which he was charged.[76]

b. Prior Acts of Familiarity. Evidence may be introduced of prior acts of Acts prior to filing of complaint.— Where it appeared that the complaint upon which the information was based was filed one month before the information, and there was more evidence to show adultery after the complaint was filed than before, a charge of the court that authorized a conviction for an offense at any time within two years before the filing of the information was held erroneous, since the time should have been limited prior to the filing of the complaint. Dec. 110. Compare Brevaldo v. State, 21 Fla. 789, a prosecution for living in an open state of adultery, where such evidence was admitted to explain similar acts committed within the period named familiarity between the same parties, as tending to establish an adulterous disposition.[77]

c. Subsequent Acts of Familiarity. Subsequent acts which tend to show an illicit continuation of the relation may be proved as characterizing the conduct of the parties,[78] even where such acts had taken place outside of the county in which the offense is prosecuted.[79]

C. Opinion Evidence. Mere opinion as to the guilt of the parties is inadmissible.[80]

D. Weight and Sufficiency — 1. In General. The oath of one credible witness is sufficient for conviction.[81] But a single act of adultery is not of itself sufficient to prove a prior act.[82] The weight to be given to the evidence is a question for the jury to decide, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case.[83]

2. To Show Carnal Knowledge — a. Circumstantial Evidence — (I) In General. In almost every case of adultery the fact of carnal intercourse is inferred by circumstances;[84] but the circumstances upon which a conviction is sought must be such as would lead the guarded discretion of a reasonable and just man to the conclusion that the offense had been committed,[85] and where the circumstances are merely incriminating, the weight of the evidence should be left to the jury.[86]

(II) Opportunity to Commit. While defendant is not to be presumed guilty of the crime from the mere fact of his opportunity to commit the act,[87] yet, where adulterous disposition is shown to exist between the parties at the time of the alleged offense, then mere opportunity, with comparatively slight circumstances showing guilt, will be sufficient to justify the inference that criminal intercourse has actually taken place.[88]

b. Emission. It is not necessary to show that the act of sexual intercourse was completed by emission.[89]

guishable from one inferable from circumstances, should be shown,[91] and mere evidence of general reputation is not sufficient.[92]

b. Direct Proof — (I) Marriage Certificate — (A) In General. The most usual and direct proof of marriage is furnished by the production of the marriage certificate or a certified copy of the record.[93]

(B) Presumptive Evidence. In some states statutes exist which, while not excluding other modes of proof,[94] make the record presumptive evidence of marriage in criminal cases.[95]

(C) Identification of Parties. It seems, however, in such cases, that outside of the mere production of the marriage certificate or a certified copy thereof there must be some evidence tending to establish the identity of the parties.[96]

(II) Witnesses to Ceremony. The marriage may also be proved by any person who was present when the marriage took place,[97] and it is sufficient that he is able to state that the marriage was celebrated according to the usual forms, without being able to state the words used.[98]

c. Cohabitation and Other Circumstances. Cohabitation and other facts from which marriage may be inferred constitute presumptive evidence of the fact, and are commonly understood in opposition to proof by direct evidence,[99] and where a marriage is followed by cohabitation its validity will be presumed.[1]

d. Admissions and Confessions — (I) Conflict of Opinion. While a deliberate and voluntary admission or confession of guilt is among the most weighty and effectual proofs known to the law,[2] the question whether a defendant can be convicted upon his own admissions or confessions of marriage has not met with a uniform decision, some of the courts holding that such evidence is insufficient to convict,[3] while others have held defendant guilty upon such direct evidence alone,[4] and especially where the admissions or confessions are corroborated by other testimony.[5]

(II) The Better Doctrine. A distinction should be drawn in this class of cases between the mere admissibility of evidence and actual proof. That the mere uncorroborated admission or confession of defendant will establish a marriage in fact is doubted, but such evidence should be admitted to prove the fact;[6] and where the admission or confession is once made under circumstances which render it admissible, it is for the jury to determine the just degree of confidence which they may place in it.[7]

E. Variance. The evidence adduced at the trial must correspond with all of the essential allegations of the indictment, and any variance therefrom will be held a fatal defect.[8]

I. DEFINITION AND ELEMENTS.

Adverse possession, generally speaking, is a possession of another's land which, when accompanied by certain acts and circumstances, will vest title in the possessor.[1] No matter in what jurisdiction the determination of what constitutes adverse possession may arise, the decisions and text-books are unanimous in declaring that the possession must be actual,[2] visible,[3] exclusive,[4] hostile,[5] and continued during the time necessary to create a bar under a statute of limitations.[6] It is, however, a matter of some difficulty to determine from the facts of any particular case when these elements exist. These matters are hereinafter considered at length.[7] In addition to these elements, which, as already stated, must always concur to give title by adverse possession, the statutes of some jurisdictions make it necessary for the claimant to hold under color of title,[8] and in others payment of taxes for the entire statutory period is necessary.[9] Good faith is also an element of adverse possession in some jurisdictions, and that, too, in the absence of any special statutory requirements; but the decisions on this question are very conflicting.[10]

II. Actual Possession.

A. Necessity. That an adverse claim to land may ripen into a perfect title by virtue of the statutes of limitations it is primarily essential that the possession relied upon be actual.[11] The constructive possession of land is always in the holder of the best title, unless he has renounced it; and this constructive possession can never be ousted by anything less than an actual possession maintained for the necessary period.[12] Hence a mere claim to land, unaccompanied by actual possession, will not ripen into a title, however long and persistently such claim is asserted.[13] Nor will the fact that such claim is asserted under a deed, though recorded, have any greater effect.[14]

Actual possession either substantial or virtual.— Actual possession may consist either in an occupancy in fact of the whole tract claimed, or an occupancy of part thereof in the name of the whole, where there is sufficient evidence of the bounds of the whole that is claimed as one entirety, and the circumstances are such that the law extends the possession of the part that is occupied to these bounds. This latter may be termed a "virtual possession," in order to distinguish it from the other kind of actual possession, which is called "substantial," or pedis possessio. But whatever terms may be used to give precision to the subject, the attributes which pertain to an actual possession belong to it, whether it be substantial or virtual. A residence in the vicinity of the land merely, and a claim to it, though such claim is generally recognized and spoken of in the neighborhood and affirmed by the vicinage, unaccompanied by any of the acts and indicia of ownership, is insufficient to constitute possession. Wood v. McGuire, 15 Ga. 202.

Invasion of rights necessary.— An adverse claim must be accompanied by such invasion of the rights of the opposite party as to give a cause of action for the trespass. A mere claim of title, unaccompanied by adverse possession, gives no right of action to the person against whom it is asserted, and consequently his rights are unaffected. sist in and be shown by a great number and almost endless combination of acts, and where the statutes of limitations have not designated certain things as requisites, the law has prescribed no particular manner in which possession shall be maintained and made manifest.[16] Nor, on the other hand, has the law attempted to lay down any precise rules by which the sufficiency of a given set of facts to constitute possession may be determined.[17] It is ordinarily sufficient if the acts of ownership are of such a nature as a party would exercise over his own property and would not exercise over another's.[18] Actuality of possession is a question compounded of law and fact,[19] and its solution must necessarily depend upon the situation of the parties, the nature of the claimant's title,[20] the character of the land, and the purpose to which it is adapted and for which it has been used.[21] All these circumstances must be taken into consideration by the jury, whose peculiar province it is to pass upon the question.[22] The only rule

Possession in the law does not mean that a man has to have his feet on every square foot of ground before it can be said that he is in possession. If he asserts the right of ownership over the property, such as improving it or using it for any purpose, that is possession, although the man may not live on it. The control, management, and direction that he may take with reference to the property, although he has never been on it, where it is under his control, management, and direction, may be sufficient to establish the possession. It may be established by inclosure, by cultivation, by the erection of buildings or other improvements, or, in fact, by any use that clearly indicates the appropriation and actual use of a person claiming to hold it. Exclusive possession.— When the possession of the claimant does effectually exclude that of others, it is immaterial by what acts possession may be accomplished or manifested. One method of occupation may be more satisfactory than another as evidence of exclusive possession, but there is no rule of law that a title by adverse possession can be gained only by certain particular methods of occupation. Distinction in application of rule.— The rule requiring actual and visible occupancy will be more strictly construed in an old and populous country, where land is usually improved and inclosed, than in a new country recently settled, in which the land is only partially inclosed. In order to acquire title to woodland there must be actual use and occupation of it, of such unequivocal character as will reasonably indicate to the owner visiting the prem-

of general applicability is that the acts relied upon to establish possession must always be as distinct as the character of the land reasonably admits of,[23] and must be exercised with sufficient continuity to acquaint the owner, should he visit the land, with the fact that a claim of ownership adverse to his title is being asserted.[24] Trivial and disconnected acts, doubtful and equivocal in their character, and which do not clearly indicate the intention with which they are performed, cannot be regarded as amounting to possession;[25] otherwise a man might be disseized without his knowledge, and the statutes of limitations might run against him while he had no ground to believe that his seizin had been interrupted.[26]

2. Application to Particular Acts — a. Actual Residence. Although the actual residence of the claimant upon the land in dispute is the most effectual mode of manifesting possession,[27] still personal occupation, except where required Mere acts of trespass upon vacant and unenclosed lands, not amounting to an exclusive appropriation thereof, and not made under a bona fide ownership or under circumstances indicating such a claim, do not constitute an adverse possession. Mere erection of a cabin or a shanty upon land, without use or occupation thereof, does not constitute an adverse possession. Wickliffe v. Ensor, 9 B. Mon. (Ky.) 253. And the fact that one occupied a shanty on certain wild lands while removing timber therefrom does not show a bona fide and actual possession thereof as against the legal owner. Fitful acts of ownership of land situated in a city, such as permitting persons on two occasions to erect a lemonade stand on the land, to be used for a day at a time, and causing some paving-stone for a sidewalk to be deposited on the land, are not sufficient, in connection with the payment of taxes and the open claim of title, to constitute adverse possession. Brown v. Bocquin, 57 Ark. 97, 20 S. W. 813.

The making of one crop on land is insufficient to constitute adverse possession. Conn v. Franklin, (Tex. 1892) 19 S. W. 126. The fact that a person planted tobacco-beds on different portions of land for more than the statutory period, but not on one spot for more than two years in succession (the land not being inclosed except during the period of cultivation), is not evidence of adverse possession. Hamilton v. Icard, 114 N. C. 532, 19 S. E. 607, 117 N. C. 476, 23 S. E. 354.

Occasional entries upon uninclosed and unimproved lands, not a part of and unconnected with improved and occupied lands, does not constitute actual possession. Miller v. Long Island R. Co., 71 N. Y. 380. A mere annual entry upon another man's land, to cut timber, to feed cattle, to hunt, or fish, can never give title. Wheeler v. Winn, 53 Pa. St. 122, 91 Am. Dec. 186. Occupation of a spot for five or six weeks annually, as a fishing place, is not a possession sufficient for the statute of limitations. McCullough v. Wall, 4 Rich. (S. C.) 68, 53 Am. Dec. 715. The agent of one claiming to own wild land as purchaser at a sheriff's sale was personally on it very often, visiting it, to protect the possession and warn off intruders, and the purchase and agency were generally known in the neighborhood, but there was no trespassing on the lot, and no other person exercised any ownership over it. The agent returned the land, and paid taxes on it for the alleged owner, but did not live on it or build any house, fence, or other structure on it. It was held that there was not such possession as would support a title by prescription. Scott v. Cain, 90 Ga. 34, 15 S. E. 816.

One claiming under a certificate of entry cleared portions of each forty acres covered thereby, and got wood and timber from all parts of the land, living meanwhile in a house built by him on forty acres adjoining the land covered by his certificate. He sold forty acres, but this did not sever the forty on which his house stood from the rest of the tract. It was held that his possession was adverse. Alabama State Land Co. v. Kyle, 99 Ala. 474, 13 So. 43. Possession by one's cattle and residence for a sufficient number of years by statute,[28] is not an indispensable condition where the other circumstances sufficiently prove an established and continuous dominion.[29]

b. Improvement — (I) Necessity. Nor is it essential that the land should have been improved[30] or cultivated,[31] or, as a general rule, that its condition should have been changed.[32] Possession is gauged by the actual state of the land, and not with reference to its capability of being changed into another state which would have admitted of a different character of possession.[33]

(II) Efficacy. But the improvement of land,[34] as by building upon it.[35]

are sufficient to make the possession actual. Den v. Mulford, 2 N. C. 358. Actual possession may be either by residence or cultivation, but need not be by both. Susquehanna, etc., R., etc., Co. v. Quick, 68 Pa. St. 189.

Adverse possession of unproductive lands is shown by the recording of the deed under which the occupant claims; payment of taxes; cutting of all the valuable timber; going upon the land at intervals, claiming absolute ownership; the employment of agents in the neighborhood to look after it; and the building of a brush fence around a portion cleared, without proof of actual occupancy. If a railroad locates its right of way over a strip of land, and enters thereon, throws up its embankments, and prepares its road-bed, these acts must be considered as constituting actual possession. 35. Congdon v. Morgan, 14 S. C. 587. In Williams v. Dongan, 20 Mo. 186, it appeared that defendant bought a claim to a tract of land and soon afterward took possession of it, built a dwelling upon it and lived therein, clearing it of its incumbent growth,[36] reducing it to a state of cultivation,[37] opening up mines[38] or quarries,[39] cutting roads through it,[40] digging ditches to drain it,[41] or building a dike about it,[42] is always to be regarded as the most significant act of adverse possession, because such an occupancy is of a character well calculated to inform the owner both of the fact of possession and that the intrusion is not intended as a mere temporary trespass.[43]

c. Inclosure — (i) Necessity. Except in one state[44] it is not necessary, to constitute actual possession, that there should be an inclosure of the premises, unless this is expressly required by statute.[45] The erection of a fence is nothing more cultivated the tract for eight or ten years, and then moved to another state. Afterward he paid all the taxes upon the land, had tenants on it part of the time, and, when not tenanted, had an agent in the neighborhood to rent it out for him and protect it from trespasses. It was held that this was an actual adverse possession.

Where a party erects upon a city lot of which he claims title a permanent brick building which he claims to own throughout its entire length, the circumstances attending his act amount to such a claim of title to the land upon which his building is erected as may by lapse of time ripen into title by adverse possession. In Tennessee, in order to constitute adverse possession, there must be an actual inclosure, "where such inclosure is practicable;" but, while this is so, an actual inclosure or residence on land is not always absolutely necessary to constitute possession if there is such use and occupation of the land as from its nature and character it is capable of. than an act presumptive of an intention to assert an ownership and possession over the property, and of this intention there are many other acts equally evincive.[46] Under the statutes of some states, where the claimant is without color of title, the land must either be protected by a substantial inclosure or "usually cultivated or improved."[47]

(II) Sufficiency—(A) Inclosure Must Be Substantial. Where adverse possession is sought to be shown by an inclosure of the land for the length of time prescribed in the statute,[48] such an inclosure must be a real and substantial one.[49] Its sufficiency depends somewhat upon the character of the land

Murphy v. Doyle, 37 Minn. 113, 33 N. W. 220.

46. In many decisions an inclosure is spoken of as essential, because the limits of the lands in question could be marked conveniently only in that way. But the essential fact is the indication, given by the inclosure, of the limits to which the possession claimed extends. None of the authorities deny the equal efficacy with an artificial inclosure, of other defined boundaries, or means of indicating the limits of a tract to which the possession of an occupant extends. Zeilin v. Rogers, 21 Fed. 103.

A public right to the use of a piece of ground, in a town or city, which has been dedicated as a common, cannot be ousted by mere claim of title or possession, or by anything else than by an actual private occupancy or exclusive use, evidenced by inclosure, for the statutory period before the assertion of the public right by action. Tennessee.— In order to obtain the benefit of the Tenn. Act (1819), c. 28, § 2, a person in actual possession of land for seven years without title must actually occupy the land by a definite and notorious inclosure. Dyche v. Gass, 3 Yerg. (Tenn.) 396.

48. Efficacy of inclosure to prove actual possession.— In New York, under the code of civil procedure, an inclosure for the statutory period constitutes actual possession. Palmer v. Safft, 56 N. Y. Super. Ct. 594, 3 N. Y. Suppl. 250. In Pennsylvania, where there is some evidence to show that a fence has been maintained for twenty-one years around the land sued for, it is held proper to submit the question of adverse possession to the jury, though no one lived on the land during that time and it was not cultivated continuously. Thompson v. Philadelphia, etc., Coal, etc., Co., 133 Pa. St. 46, 19 Atl. 346. Purpose with which erected.— Where one claimed title and paid taxes on vacant land for several years, and then, desiring to perfect his title by a fine and common recovery, inclosed the land with a fence and performed the other necessary acts to constitute a disseizin sufficient to support the fine, the fact that the fence was erected purely and only in order that the fine might be levied will not render the disseizin insufficient. McGregor v. Comstock, 17 N. Y. 162. Where the land in dispute is within the boundaries of defendant's deed, a fence erected by him within his lines and for his own purposes is not an inclosed.[50] In California it has been held that the fence must be sufficient to protect the land against the intrusion of cattle.[51] It has been very generally held that an inclosure of the land by felling trees and lapping them one upon another,[52] or by the erection of a brush fence,[53] is not sufficient.

(B) Inclosure Must Be Complete. The land must be completely inclosed.[54] It is not required, however, that the lot should be inclosed on every side by an artificial inclosure.[55]

inclosure of plaintiff, an adjoining owner, and hence affords no evidence of adverse possession in the latter. Storr v. James, 84 Md. 282, 35 Atl. 965. Where land was claimed by actual possession and inclosure in fences, and was bounded on one side by a pond and on the other sides by other lands to which claimant had good title, though his fences did in fact surround the land in question on all sides except that next the pond, yet it was held to have been properly left to the jury to determine whether they were erected by claimant for the purpose of inclosing the land in controversy, or merely for the protection of his own. Polack v. McGrath, 32 Cal. 15, holding, however, that the fence need not be so high, strong, and close as to preclude the possibility of being broken, but only such a fence as a prudent farmer erects to protect his growing crops.

Inclosing uncultivated land with a fence consisting of posts seven feet apart and one board six inches wide nailed onto the posts, totally insufficient for any purpose except to mark a line, is not sufficient to sustain an action of ejectment as against a party in possession of a part of the tract under a deed of the whole. But a brush and pole fence is a substantial inclosure the erection of which is sufficient to create an adverse possession. Hill v. Edie, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 605, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 480, 17 N. Y. St. 255.

Suffering fence to go to decay.— Placing a fence, consisting of small posts with two rails nailed on, around a piece of land, without actually occupying the land or any part of it, and suffering the fence to go to decay in a year or two, so that it will not keep out cattle, is not sufficient to constitute prima facie evidence of title to the land by actual possession, as against one who enters into the actual occupation and possession of a portion of the land after the fence is broken down. Borel v. Rollins, 30 Cal. 408. But in Texas, where it appeared that plaintiffs had more than ten years before sued to recover the land, built a wire fence around all the land in controversy, and maintained it intact for a number of years, when gaps were cut in it and left down for two or three years, but the posts remained standing, with the wires thereon, and it could be seen that a fence was around the land, though there were gaps in it, it was held that such fence was sufficient to give notice of adverse possession and that plaintiffs were entitled to the land. Moore v. McCown, (Tex. Civ. App. 1892) 20 S. W. 1112. A fence which the owner attempts to keep in repair constitutes an actual inclosure for the purpose of adverse possession, though a plank is sometimes off or a panel down. Land fenced only on two sides, one of the other sides abutting upon an unfenced highway, and the other indicated only by marked trees, is not protected by a substantial inclosure. Pope v. Hanmer, 74 N. Y. 240. But the fact that a portion of one end of a narrow strip lies open to the highway will not defeat adverse possession where the entire length of the strip was within the fences inclosing claimant's premises, and was cultivated as part of them. Hill v. Edie, 49 Hun (N. Y.) 605, 1 N. Y. Suppl. 480.

The fencing of three sides of an oblong or square piece of land is not a sufficient inclosure to make an adverse possession so as to vest title in a wrong-doer as against the real owner, though such fences exclude the latter from the use and enjoyment of the land. Armstrong v. Risteau, 5 Md. 256, 59 Am. Dec. 115.

Leaving opening for convenience' sake.— If, in an action of ejectment, defendant claims title by possession, and it appears that the fence of his adjoining land was so constructed, and so far extended toward the disputed land, as to give notice to the public and to all concerned that defendant and his grantors claimed to exercise exclusive dominion over the disputed land, by extending their fence so as to include this land whenever it should be convenient to complete the inclosure, and that it was left open for the time, for convenience of use, or because it was not then of sufficient importance to be inclosed, and this has been continued for fifteen years, it will be regarded as a sufficient possession to give title. Buck v. Squiers, 23 Vt. 498.

(c) When Inclosure Includes Other Lands. In New York it has been held that, although the claimant may avail himself of a fence upon the line to complete his inclosure, the statute does not contemplate that a fence located far away from the premises and including other lands should be used as a means of protection to a claim by adverse possession.[56] In other states the fact that land other than that claimed by adverse possession was embraced within the inclosure does not seem to affect its sufficiency if the whole tract inclosed was occupied and claimed for the statutory period.[57] But it has been held that a general inclosure of a large tract of land is not sufficient to constitute an actual and exclusive possession of a specific parcel within it, when it appears that much of the land within the inclosure is not claimed, and much of it is in the actual occupancy of those claiming and holding adverse possession.[58]

d. Taking Natural Products of Land — (1) Cutting Timber. Although there are some decisions apparently to the contrary,[59] the weight of authority sustains the rule that the mere occasional cutting of timber on land is not alone such evidence of ownership as to amount to a possession adverse to the true owner,[60] south and west sides of the premises, and on the east and southeast was a ledge of rocks from two hundred to four hundred feet high, along which there was no artificial fence, it was held that the ledge completed the inclosure as much as a fence would have done. Other acts in addition to cutting timber — Insufficient to constitute adverse possession.— See Thistle v. Frostburg Coal Co., 10 Md. 129 (cutting timber and giving permission to others to cut the same, as well as offering to sell the land, going upon it, walking over it, locking up the house upon it, and carrying away the key); Parker v. Parker, 1 Allen (Mass.) 245 (cutting timber and trimming trees, as well as in one instance, within twenty years, cutting off entire growth of wood upon the land); Slater v. Jepherson, 6 Cush. W. 692 (wherein it was held that where a separate tract of land, half prairie and half timber, might be easily inclosed, being fit for cultivation, the erection of a temporary structure, pasturing hogs, cutting timber, and payment of taxes under claim of ownership by one residing a mile and a half from it, did not constitute adverse possession).

Sufficient to constitute adverse possession. — Adverse possession of rough lands mostly unfit for cultivation is sufficiently shown by proof that the occupant paid all the taxes thereon which were taxed in his name, cut timber therefrom, blazed the outlines of it, claimed ownership, and offered it for sale. Moore v. Hinkle, 151 Ind. 343, 50 N. E. 822. One who took possession of timber lands and built a shanty thereon, cut timber at various times preparatory to cultivation, and remained in possession off and on for the statutory period, acquired title, since he actually occupied the land in the only manner in which, and for the only purposes for which, it was reasonably capable of being used and occupied. Backus v. Burke, 63 Minn. 272, 65 N. W. 459. An entry upon land under a deed, and possession by leasing parts of it and occasionally cutting wood upon it during the period required by the statute, although for a period of a few years no acts of ownership were exercised, is a sufficient possession to constitute a title. Menkens v. Ovenhouse, 22 Mo. 70. The occupation of pine land, by annually making turpentine on it, is such an actual possession as will oust a constructive sion. But if a person enters upon land and uses it thereafter as a wood-lot appurtenant to his farm, in the usual and ordinary way, and exercises such acts of ownership over it as are necessary to enjoy it, such acts have been held to amount to actual possession.[71]

(II) Cutting Wild Grass. The occasional or periodical entry upon land to cut wild grass is not an act manifesting a purpose to take possession as owner, and does not constitute actual possession.[72]

(III) Grazing Live Stock. The mere occupancy of land by grazing live stock upon it, without substantial inclosures or other permanent improvements, is not sufficient to support a plea of limitations.[73] But entering into possession of lands under color of title, followed by the construction and maintenance of a substantial fence, under continued use and occupation of the land for pasturage,— the only purpose for which it was adapted,— under claim of title, has been held to constitute an adverse possession of the land inclosed.[74]

(IV) Making Sugar. The occupancy of woodland for three or four weeks each year, for the purpose of making maple sugar, is not such a possession as will create a title by adverse possession, though continued annually for the statutory period.[75]

e. Payment of Taxes. The payment of taxes upon land does not constitute actual possession of it.[76] In some jurisdictions the fact is not even regarded as possession by one claiming merely under a superior paper title. Bynum v. Carter, 26 N. C. 310. See also Flannery v. Hightower, 97 Ga. 592, 25 S. E. 371.

Other acts in addition to cutting grass.— The fact that a person cuts hay on uninclosed land, lets his cattle roam over and pasture upon it just as they pasture on adjacent uninclosed lands, and prevents people from cutting and stealing wood on the land, is not sufficient to constitute adverse possession. Lambert v. Stees, 47 Minn. 141, 49 N. W. 662. But the fact that defendant and his predecessors in title had gathered seaweed on inclosed land, while not alone evidence of adverse possession, may be evidence of such possession when taken in connection with the fact that they prevented other freeholders of the town from gathering seaweed there, and did so under claim of exclusive right as owners, which claim was known to plaintiffs. evidence of possession,[77] and so not admissible in proof on behalf of the claimant.[78] But in other jurisdictions the courts, though regarding it as entitled to little weight, yet admit it in proof as a circumstance to show possession.[79] The accompanying circumstances that the claimant had the lands surveyed and mapped,[80] and executed a mortgage covering them,[81] and occasionally entered upon the lands to look after them [82] or employed an agent to do so,[83] or occasionally cut and carried off firewood and rails therefrom,[84] do not constitute actual possession.

f. Depositing Material. Merely depositing old machinery from a factory,[85] or refuse from a mine,[86] or piling wood [87] upon the land of another, does not constitute an actual possession of it.

g. Surveying Land and Fixing Boundaries. Entering upon land for the purpose of surveying it and fixing the boundaries of the tract claimed is not actual possession,[88] and the fact that the claimant pays the taxes [89] and enters from time to time to cut timber for use on other lands [90] is no more effective.

h. Posting Notices. The fact that the claimant of land posts notices upon it merely indicates an intention to hold the land, and is not sufficient proof of adverse possession.[91]

i. Flooding Land. In New York it has been held that the overflowing of another's land to such an extent as to make it useless constitutes an actual adverse possession,[92] but a contrary decision has been rendered in North Carolina.[93]

j. Sale of Land. The fact that one claiming a large tract of land under a deed sold and conveyed many small tracts within the boundary is insufficient to show actual possession;[94] so is the fact that the claimant offered the whole tract for sale and listed it for taxation.[95]

3. Application to Particular Kinds of Land — a. Burial-Plots. If one enters upon, sets apart, and asserts an exclusive right to a plot of land as a family burial-ground for a series of years, the use of the land for such a purpose constitutes an actual possession.[96] But where the possession is not under color of title the holding will be confined to such part of the land as is covered by the graves.[97]

b. Highways. Under the Massachusetts statute it has been held that maintaining a fence within the limits of a highway for the statutory period under a claim of right gives to the owner an absolute right to continue it there as against the public,[98] but the contrary has been held in Indiana and in Ohio.[99] Merely sowing grain and pasturing cattle on the sides of the road,[1] or occasionally piling lumber there and annually mowing and taking the grass therefrom,[2] does not amount to possession.

c. Mines. It is a general presumption that one who has the possession of the surface of land has possession of the subsoil also.[3] But when, by conveyance or reservation, a separation has been made of the ownership of the surface of land from that of the underground minerals, the owner of the former can acquire no

Sufficiency of evidence.— Proof, in ejectment, of the use of land, conveyed by a defective deed, as a burial-plot for over twenty-five years, and of an interment in a grave on the undisturbed portion thereof, the placing of a headstone thereon, and the planting of trees and shrubbery from twelve to fifteen years prior to the action, is sufficient proof of adverse possession to constitute the finding of the jury that title was thereby acquired by defendant. Conger v. Kinney, 16 N. Y. Suppl. 752. But evidence that plaintiff's ancestors and husband and children were buried in a certain lot; that as long as she lived in the locality she visited the lot and kept it in good repair, and when she went away left a person in charge of it, who visited it frequently and cared for it; that the person purchasing the land more than ten years before suit promised that the lot should never be troubled,— is insufficient to show title to the lot by adverse possession. Ritzmann v. Aspelmeier, 89 Iowa 179, 56 N. W. 421.

3. Possession of the surface of a mining-claim location is possession of all veins, lodes, and ledges the tops or apexes of which are inside the surface lines, although such veins, lodes, and ledges, as they go downward, may extend outside such surface lines; and possession of the surface ground protects such veins, lodes, and ledges from the operation of the statute of limitations. Pardee v. Murray, 4 Mont. 234, 2 Pac. 16. See also Armstrong v. Caldwell, 53 Pa. St. 284.

title to the latter by his exclusive and continued enjoyment of the surface;[4] nor does the owner of the minerals lose his right or his possession by any length of non-usage.[5] He must be disseized to lose his right, and there can be no disseizin by an act which does not actually take the minerals out of his possession.[6]

d. Submerged Lands — (I) Tide-Water and Navigable Flats — (A) Exclusive Use and Occupation. The title of every one in flats over which the tide ebbs and flows, so long as they remain unoccupied and uninclosed, is subject to the public right of navigation; and therefore it has been held that the use by any one of flats by passing in vessels or boats over them and anchoring thereon is not a disseizin, and, though frequent or long-continued, will not give a title by adverse possession.[7] Like the travel upon a highway, such use is presumed to be in the exercise of a public right, and is not adverse to the owner of the fee.[8] But if flats are inclosed or otherwise actually occupied by a person claiming a right to the soil, to the exclusion of all others, such use constitutes a disseizin.[9] Thus building a wharf and using the flats covered by the water at the end and sides of it to float vessels for the purpose of loading and unloading them is a disseizin of the land covered by the wharf,[10] and at the end and sides thereof so far as it has been exclusively used by such vessels.[11] So erecting two buildings, over ground which was covered by a mill-pond, upon piles under which the water flowed, but boats could not pass, has been held to be a disseizin of the land under the buildings and under the water in the open space between the buildings, used as a passageway between them.[12]

(B) Planting Oysters. No title to land under water can be acquired, as against the state or its grantee, by planting oysters thereon for any length of time without other title than that so sought to be acquired.[13]

(II) Land between High-Water and Low-Water Marks. The fact that the owner of land, bounded on one side by high-water mark, continues the fences on his lines running to the water down to low-water mark, to prevent cattle passing around them, is not such an occupancy or inclosure of the land between high-water mark and low-water mark as will constitute adverse possession.[14] Nor does the construction of a marine railway for the conveyance of boats between the land above high-water mark and the water give any title to the land between high-water mark and low-water mark, over which the railway runs, especially when the structure is allowed to decay and is washed away before the completion of the statutory period.[15]

Allen v. McKay, 120 Cal. 332, 52 Pac. 828. In ejectment to determine title to part of a wharf projecting into a navigable lake it appeared that defendant had driven a line of piles between twenty and thirty years before the commencement of suit, which would exclude from plaintiff's occupancy all the disputed territory, and which was done to fix boundaries. Where land above high-water mark was granted to one person, and the beach in front, between high-water and low-water marks, to another, merely passing over the shore with boats at high water, or landing boats on the shore at low water, by the proprietors of the land above high-water mark, and passing to and fro over the beach for a period of twenty years, does not amount to possession, there being nothing to define a possession in any particular portion of the land, and the acts being consistent with the exercise of a public right of passage when the beach was covered with water, and with an easement in the proprietor of the adjoining land, when the

(III) Ponds. Cutting ice on a pond and occupying part of the surface with men and horses for that purpose during a few weeks of each winter is not an actual possession of the pond.[16]

(IV) Unnavigable Stream. In a stream not navigable, keeping up fish-traps therein, erecting and repairing dams across it, and using it every year, during the entire fishing-season, for the purpose of catching fish, have been held to constitute an unequivocal possession thereof.[17]

e. Island Subject to Overflow. If an island which is subject to overflow is used by a claimant in the way most appropriate, considering its nature and liability to be inundated, by pasturing his stock thereon during such portion of the year as the state of the stream permits, such use has been held to constitute an adverse possession, although the island may not have been inclosed or improved.[18] But it has been held in the same state that the mere fact that one hauls sand from a barren island at intervals for over twenty years does not constitute possession adverse to a riparian owner whose deed includes the island, although such possession was as complete as the character of the island would allow.[19]

4. Sufficiency of Possession by Tenant or Agent. It is not necessary that the party claiming title by adverse possession should have been in personal occupation of the land. Possession by a tenant under him enures to his benefit and satisfies the requirements of the statute of limitations.[20] This is true whether the lease be by parol or in writing,[21] whether the tenancy is created by an arrangement with the claimant personally or through an agent,[22] and though the person claiming title is a non-resident.[23] Furthermore the rule applies although the tenant repudiates the tenancy and attorns to a third person, provided the claimant institutes suit against the lessee and recovers possession.[24] On the other hand the rule has no application when it appears that the lessee never went into possession at all, but suffered the land to remain unoccupied during the term of the lease, as the fact that the lessee was faithless to his contract must in such connection be visited upon the lessor rather than upon the true owner of the land.[25] The possession of one's agent is, for the purpose of acquiring title by adverse possession, the possession of the principal.[26] elements thereof "open and notorious" possession. It is in general true that title by adverse possession cannot be acquired unless the possession is open and notorious, but the rule must be understood with some qualification. The following is a more correct statement thereof: In order to make good a claim of title by adverse holding the true owner must have actual knowledge of the hostile claim,[27] or the possession must be so open, visible, and notorious as to raise the presumption of notice to the world that the right of the true owner is invaded intentionally and with a purpose to assert a claim of title adversely to his,[28] so patent that the owner could not be deceived, and such that if he remains in ignorance it is his own fault.[29] A clandestine entry or possession will not set the statute in motion.[30] The owner will not be condemned to lose his land because he has failed to sue for its recovery, when he had no notice that it was held or claimed adversely.[31]

2. Reason for Rule. "To hold otherwise," it has been said, "would be to establish a principle by which every proprietor of vacant land might be disseized without his knowledge or even the possibility of protecting himself."[32]

B. Its Effect as Constructive Notice to Disseizee. To perfect a title by adverse possession it is not necessary that the true owner should have had actual knowledge or notice of the claim. If the claimant's possession is open and notorious under claim of title it is sufficient in its character, whether the true owner knew the facts or not.[33] On open, visible, and notorious possession by the adverse claimant the law presumes notice to the true owner[34] in the absence of evidence

As between persons claiming title from a common grantor.— In ejectment, defendant testified that he supposed his deed from a common grantor covered the lot in issue, and that he fenced and planted it, but did not testify that he ever claimed title to the knowledge of the grantor or of plaintiff, or had done any act which would charge them with knowledge of such claim or would be inconsistent with permissive occupancy. It was held that he failed to show that his occupancy amounted to a disseizin of the grantor which would bar plaintiff's action. Draper v. Monroe, 18 R. I. 398, 28 Atl. 340.

As between holders of conflicting patents.— Where uncleared lands have been granted by the state by conflicting patents, testimony of the junior patentee that he had possession of the lands in controversy, without any showing of visible acts of ownership, is insufficient to show adverse possession. Harman v. Ratliff, 93 Va. 249, 24 S. E. 1023. See also Thruston v. Masterson, 9 Dana (Ky.) 228, where it was held that the party claiming under a junior grant is not presumed to have had notice of an adverse claim until adverse possession is taken under an elder grant, or some distinct and notorious assertion of right made under it.

Effect of occupation under color of title.— The fact that the disseizor holds under color of title will not dispense with the necessity of possession which is actual, exclusive, and notorious as the foundation of title by adverse possession. Foulke v. Bond, 41 N. J. L. 527.

The statute proceeds upon the ground that there has been an acquiescence, on the part of the owner of the land, in the claim which, on the part of the disseizor, was intended to be hostile and in fact is hostile to his title, and obviously it must appear that the possession or use which is claimed to be adverse was such that the owner knew or might have known that the disseizor intended to make title under it. that inquiries of the true owner, prosecuted with due diligence, did not disclose such possession.[35] Such possession is the equivalent of actual notice of the claim under which it is held,[36] and if the owner fails to look after his interests until the title of the adverse claimant grows into maturity he has no one but himself to blame for the loss of his estate.[37] Where the possession is notorious no declaration of abandonment of possession on the part of the owner is necessary in order that his title may be barred.[38]

C. The Effect of Actual Knowledge by Disseizee. If the owner have actual knowledge that the possession is adverse to his title the occupancy need not be open, visible, and notorious.[39] Notoriety is important only where the adverse character of the possession is to be brought home to the owner by presumption.[40]

D. What Constitutes Such Possession. The rule is that in determining whether possession is open, visible, and notorious, so as to charge the owner with notice of an adverse claim, the nature, situation, and uses of the property are to be considered,[41] and also the quantity or proportion of the land actually occupied.[42] It is therefore difficult or impossible to specify the acts which would, under every condition, constitute open and visible possession.[43] But it has been stated that the general rule is that it is sufficient if the land is appropriated in such manner as to apprise the community that the land is in the possession and enjoyment of the person claiming it.[44] And that openness and exclusiveness are shown by such acts as will ordinarily be performed by the true owner in appropriating the land and its avails to his own use and preventing, so far as practicable, all others from using it.[45] And this seems to be the rule deducible from the majority of cases.[46]

The fact that the possession of land is disputed does not make it any the less adverse, but rather the contrary, since this would necessarily seem to make more open and notorious the adverse character of such possession.[47]

IV. Duration and Continuity of Possession.

A. Necessity of Continuous Possession. In order to perfect title by adverse possession, such possession must be continuous for the whole period prescribed by the statute of limitations. Any break or interruption of the continuity of the possession will be fatal to the claim of the party setting up title by adverse possession.[48] Occasional trespasses or acts of ownership do not constitute ing cases: Where defendant's grantor held possession of a piece of land several years without color of title, pasturing and partly fencing it, and then verbally transferring it to defendant, who occupied it by pasturing cattle, cutting hay, and building additional fences, and such possession continued for more than ten years. Murray v. Romine, (Nebr. 1900) 82 N. W. 318. Where a purchaser of a city lot built a fence around three sides of it (the land being inaccessible from the fourth side, due to the roughness of the ground), cleared it of brush and timber, a considerable quantity of which was on it and the surrounding lots, and planted shrubbery thereon. Flint v. Long, 12 Wash. 342, 41 Pac. 49. Where a stranger who had taken from a cotenant of certain sea-beach lands a deed for the whole estate, and enlarged a boarding-house thereon, built docks, cut hay on the meadows, and paid taxes on the whole, claiming to be exclusive owner. Foulke v. Bond, 41 N. J. L. 527.

Illustrations of possession not sufficiently open and notorious.— Extending an inclosure on adjoining land over the line of another lot some ten or fifteen feet wide, and taking within such inclosure a strip of land of that width and running half across the lot, under a claim of title. Carrol v. Gillion, 33 Ga. 539. The building of a small cow-pen on the boundary line separating two lots of land and immediately contiguous to defendant's lands, occasional felling of trees, and permitting cattle to range over the uncultivated land. Royall v. Lisle, 15 Ga. 545, 60 Am. Dec. 712. The cutting for five years, from an uninclosed pine lot, by the owner of a sawmill located near such lot, of sticks to be worked up in said mill, the making of roads for hauling such logs to the mill, and the cutting, for several years more, of firewood from said lot. Watts v. Griswold, 20 Ga. 732, 65 Am. Dec. 647. The making of a fence on wild land, by cutting and lopping trees. Coburn v. Hollis, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 125.

The owner of land is chargeable with notice of its locality and boundaries, and the meaning and locality of every settlement made upon it by another without his authority. such continuous possession as will ripen into a title by adverse possession,[49] although extending over the statutory period.[50] So a mere claim of ownership does not of itself amount to a continuation of possession so as to support a title by adverse possession.[51]

B. Tacking Possessions — 1. Continuous Possession in One Person Unnecessary. It does not follow, however, from what has just been said, that continuous possession in any one person is necessary for the acquisition of title by adverse possession. On the contrary, if there is privity between successive occupants holding adversely to the true title continuously, the successive periods of occupation may be united or tacked to each other to make up the time of adverse holding prescribed by the statute as against such title.[52]

2. Necessity for Privity between Successive Occupants — a. Statement of Rule. Nevertheless, in order that such possessions may be tacked, it is essential that privity, either of contract, estate, or blood, should exist between the successive occupants.[53] Different entries at different times by different persons between whom there is no privity or connected claim of rightful holding are but a succession of trespasses, and neither can furnish any support to the other.[54] Each possession is a distinct and independent wrong for which an action may be maintained.[55]

b. Reason for Rule. The reason why privity is necessary is that in its absence a new and distinct disseizin is made by each disseizor.[56] As soon as the former adverse holder quits possession, the true owner, in virtue of his legal title, is again instantly seized or possessed of the premises by operation of law, and thereby the continuity of the possession between the adverse claimants is broken.[57]

a succession of relationships created by deed or other act or by operation of law.[58]

b. Vendor and Vendee — (I) Voluntary Conveyances. Except in one state[59] the law is well settled that such privity exists between vendor and vendee as will authorize the tacking of their successive possessions to perfect title by adverse possession in the vendee.[60] A vendor cannot, however, avail himself of the possession of his vendee to make up the statutory period, where the vendee repudiates the title of his vendor, to perfect title by adverse possession.[61]

(II) Involuntary Conveyances. A purchaser of land at a judicial sale may tack his possession to that of the person whose land is so sold, to make up the statutory period,[62] but the sale must rest on a valid decree, judgment, or order.[63] A possession under a sheriff's deed without judgment and execution against the former occupant cannot be tacked to that of such former occupant,[64] and the Successive possessions of unincorporated society and corporation.— Presumption of conveyance.— Where an unincorporated society holding property adversely becomes duly organized as a corporation, its possession prior to incorporation may be tacked to that subsequent thereto for the purpose of establishing title under the statute of limitations. The reason for this is that "the corporation . . . succeeded, without any formal conveyance, to all the property of the society and to all property held for its use. The case must be treated as if the society organized the corporation and transferred to it all the right and possession which it had." Gallupville Reformed Church v. Schoolcraft, 65 N. Y. 134, 144. W. 952); to sales under decrees for partition (Clark v. Bundy, 29 Oreg. 190, 44 Pac. 282); and to sales by administrators for payment of debts (Peele v. Chever, 8 Allen (Mass.) 89).

mere possession of such deed is not of itself sufficient evidence to establish privity, because it is not of itself evidence of the officer's authority to sell.[65] So it has been held that where title has been adjudicated in the plaintiff in an action of ejectment, but the defendant in possession has been decreed to have a lien upon the land, and the land has been ordered sold to satisfy it, the purchaser at a sale under such decree cannot, in a subsequent action of ejectment against him, tack the prior possession of the lienors to his own possession, subsequent to the sale, for the purpose of establishing a title by adverse possession against another who claims under the same source of title as the plaintiff in the action where the sale was had.[66]

c. Vendor and One Holding under Contract of Purchase. The occupancy of the vendee in a contract for the purchase of land is that of a tenant and enures to the benefit of the vendor for the purpose of perfecting title of the latter by adverse possession.[67] As a consequence of this rule the possession of such vendee cannot be tacked to that of his grantee to make up the statutory period.[68] Where the vendee, after occupying the land under his contract of purchase, subsequently acquires a deed thereto, his possessions before and after the acquisition of the deed may be tacked to perfect title in himself by adverse possession.[69]

d. Landlord and Tenant. The possession of landlord and tenant may be tacked to complete the bar of the statute of limitations.[70] And it is not necessary that the possession should be that of a single tenant. The landlord may tack the possession of several tenants to complete the statutory period.[71] So a temporary vacancy, such as is incident to a change of tenants, does not prevent the tacking of the various possessions.[72]

e. Ancestor and Heir. Privity such as will authorize the tacking of possessions exists between two successive holders where the latter takes under the earlier by descent.[73] This rule proceeds upon the theory that there is no new entry or trespass, but that the possession of the ancestors is cast by operation of law upon the heir, and that there is therefore no break in the continuity of the possession,[74] and where one heir enters into possession, his possession will enure to the benefit of the estate.[75] So the possession of a tenant holding under the ancestor enures to the benefit of the heirs.[76]

f. Testator and Devisee. Such privity exists between testator and devisee as will authorize the tacking of the two possessions to make up the period necessary to acquire title by prescription,[77] and the fact that the will is not executed in compliance with the statutory requirements does not alter the rule.[78] So it has been held that there is sufficient privity between the testator, the person to whom he has devised land for life, and the remainder-man under his will, to establish a title by adverse possession if the possession by the testator and the devisees is continuous for the statutory period of limitations. Privity here is based upon the fact that both devisees claim one title under the same will.[79] So, where the life-tenant under a will never enters into possession, and the remainder-man takes possession thereunder, his possession and that of the testator may be tacked to make up the statutory period.[80]

g. Decedent and Administrator. In the absence of any statutory provisions to the contrary, the occupation of an intestate and his administrator cannot be tacked to make up the statutory period,[81] and a fortiori the possession of the intestate and of a grantee of the administrator cannot be tacked.[82] Where, however, the administrator has the legal right by statute to take possession and control of his real estate, his possession is in privity with that of the intestate.[83]

h. Husband and Wife. At common law a wife has no such privity of estate with her husband, in land of which he died in adverse possession, that her continued adverse possession after his decease, without deed or devise from him, can be tacked to his to give her a complete title by disseizin.[84] And the reason for Decedent and son-in-law.— If a person die in adverse possession of a tract of land, and his son-in-law succeeds him in the possession, the relation the latter sustained to the deceased will constitute such privity as will entitle him to connect his possession with that of his father-in-law so as to give him the benefit of the latter's adverse possession. The possession of the deceased descends to his children, and if a person marries one of them the marriage will constitute such privity as will entitle him to tack his possession to that of his wife's father. The possession of the widow enures to the benefit of the heirs, and, for the purpose of perfecting title in them, may be tacked to that of the husband, and this because she cannot, without the assent of the heirs, change the character of the possession from an adverse to a friendly one. Mills v. Bodley, 4 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 248.

this is that a wife has no title, seizin, or right of entry as dowress until the assignment of dower.[85] This rule is in no way affected by the fact that she resided on the land with him during his possession.[86] Where, however, by virtue of statute, the widow is entitled to occupy in common with the heir any lands in which she is entitled to dower, before assignment and until the heir shall object thereto, such an occupancy by her until objection is made by the heir will be a continuance of the possession of the husband, and such privity will exist between them as to authorize the tacking of her possession to her husband's to enable her to defeat an action by the real owner for possession.[87] And it has been held that where, by statute, the widow is entitled to quarantine in the whole property until dower is assigned to her, her possession is in privity with that of her husband.[88] If a woman in adverse possession of land marries and continues in such possession after her husband's death, her possession and his may be tacked together to make one continued adverse possession, because the husband's possession is in legal effect the possession of the wife,[89] and the duration of the possession, by a husband, of land claimed by him to belong to his wife, and to which he made no claim in any other right, may be added to the widow's possession to sustain a title by adverse possession in her.[90] An estate by the curtesy is in the nature of an estate by descent rather than purchase, and possession under such an estate may be tacked to the preceding possession of the wife so as to raise the bar of the statute of limitations.[91]

i. Squatters and Purchasers of Tax-Title. Where a purchaser of land at a void tax-sale, relying on his tax-deed, recovers possession of land from squatters thereon, the prior possession of the squatters is not by this recovery rendered available to the tax-purchaser to perfect title by adverse possession against the true owner.[92]

j. Former Occupant and Person Acquiring Title by Compromise. Where one person enters into possession, and another claims adversely to him and takes possession under such claim by consent of the first possessor, pursuant to a compromise between them, this is not a continuity of the first possession, there being no privity between the parties.[93]

4. What Conveyances or Transfers Create Privity — a. Necessity of Writing. While in one jurisdiction devolution and possession are regarded as transfers of title to land which can pass only by deed, by law, or by descent,[94] the great weight of authority is to the effect that the privity requisite to constitute continuous adverse possession by tacking the possession of the original entryman to that of another may be effected by any conveyance, agreement, or understanding that has for its object a transfer of the possession and is accompanied by a transfer in fact.[95] It does not follow that because a deed is required to transfer the title to real estate that the same solemnity must be observed in the transfer of the possession where the title and possession are not united in the same person.[96]

b. Void Deeds. A deed from one possessor to another, void on its face, does not create privity so as to authorize the tacking of their respective possessions to create a title by prescription.[97]

c. Fraudulent Deeds. Where several are in adverse possession, and the period of such several possessions is more than the period of limitations, but the possessors claim from the first by successive deeds in fee simple, the possession may be connected, though the deeds were fraudulent.[98]

d. Defectively Executed Deeds. A deed executed by a married woman who is not privily examined creates privity between herself and her grantee.[99]

e. Deeds Omitting Description of or Misdescribing Land. The general rule is that possessions cannot be tacked to make out title by prescription where the deed under which the last occupant claims title does not include the land in dispute.[1] It must clearly appear in the deed that the particular premises were embraced in the deed or transfer, in whatever form it may have been made.[2] It has been held, however, that a mistake in a deed[3] whereby a portion of the premises intended to be conveyed has been omitted in the description does not prevent the

Thus it has been held that where a disseizor conveys part of the land, and the grantee, under color of the deed, enters upon the whole, the possession of the first disseizor will not avail his grantee in regard to the part not embraced in the deed. Ward v. Bartholomew, 6 Pick. (Mass.) 409; Blackstock v. Cole, 51 N. C. 560. This rule has also been applied where the former possessor by mistake occupies land not included within the boundaries defined in the deed under which he holds, and conveys by the description of his own deed. According to the weight of authority his possession of the land not included in such deed cannot be tacked to his successor's possession of such land to give the latter a prescriptive title (Ely v. Brown, 183 Ill. 575, 56 N. grantee from acquiring title by prescription,[4] and that, although the deed does not accurately describe the premises intended to be conveyed, it will nevertheless create sufficient privity to authorize the tacking of the successive possessions if the acts of the parties make clear what was intended to be conveyed.[5]

f. Deeds in Which Mistake Is Made in Name of Grantee. A variance between the name of the grantee in a deed executed in pursuance of a decree, and the name of the purchaser as given in the decree, does not destroy the effect of the deed as color of title, and such deed will enable the grantee therein to tack his possession to that of the parties whose interests are sold, to make out title by adverse possession.[6]

5. Character of Possession of Predecessor Requisite to Authorize Tacking — a. In General. The possession of a prior occupant, of a character insufficient to give title by adverse possession, cannot be united with a subsequent possession of another to protect title by adverse possession in the latter.[7]

b. Effect of Possession Originating in Fraud. To entitle an occupant of land to tack the possession of his predecessor to his own to make up the statutory period, the possession of the former must not have originated in fraud of the rights of the true owner.[8]

c. Effect of Possession without Color of Title. It is not necessary, however, that the possession of the prior occupant should have been under color of title,[9] unless it is otherwise provided by statute.[10]

d. Effect of Possession without Claim of Right. Nevertheless such possession must at least be under claim of right or title.[11]

6. Effect of Intervals between Possessions of Prior and Subsequent Occupants. The possession of a prior occupant cannot be tacked to that of a subsequent occupant claiming under him, where any interval of time, whether of long or short duration, intervenes between the two possessions.[12] When premises are Hughs v. Pickering, 14 Pa. St. 297.

10. Statute making color of title in prior occupant necessary.— In North Carolina it is held that color of title in a prior occupant is necessary under a statute [Code, § 141] which provides that when the person in possession of any real property, or those under whom he claims, shall have been in possession of the same under known and visible lines and boundaries under colorable title for seven years, no entry shall be made or action sustained against such possessor, etc. Morrison v. Craven, 120 N. Application of rule.— Where A has adverse possession for two years only, and conveys his left vacant the adverse possession follows the title of the true owner,[13] and the statute will run only from the commencement of the last adverse possession.[14]

7. Tacking Possessions of Same Person Temporarily Interrupted. Since the constructive possession of the true owner revives when actual possession by the adverse claimant ceases, a renewed adverse possession by him after temporary abandonment cannot be tacked to his prior possession to make out the statutory period.[15] Nor can one adverse holder tack together his own several holdings when he has allowed another person to acquire the intermediate tortious possession before his own has ripened into title.[16]

8. Tacking Possessions of Different Tracts. The possession of one part of a tract of land cannot be joined to the possession of another part so as to make up the statutory period.[17]

9. Tacking Possessions under Different Statutes. Part performance of the requirements of one statute cannot be tacked to part performance of the provisions of another statute, but, to constitute the bar, all the provisions of one or the other of the sections must be complied with.[18]

C. Interruption or Breach of Continuity— 1. What Constitutes Interruption or Breach — a. Denial of Claimant's Rights by Former Owner. The mere denial by the owner of the right of the adverse occupant,[19] or loose verbal claims of title in himself,[20] or ineffectual protests short of a disturbance of the rights of the adverse claimant in a legal sense, and short of the assertion of a right in himself,[21] will not interrupt the running of the statute or prevent its becoming a bar.

b. Entry by Original Owner — (I) General Rule as to Effect of Entry. The general rule is that entry on the land by the original owner before the expiration of the statutory period necessary to acquire title by adverse possession arrests the running of the statute.[22]

(II) Statutory Exceptions to Rule. In Pennsylvania, by virtue of special statutory enactments, an entry on lands held adversely does not interrupt the running of the statute of limitations unless an action of ejectment be commenced within a year thereafter.[23]

(III) Requisites and Sufficiency of Entry—(A) Necessity of Entry on Land Claimed. The entry must be on the land claimed.[24] The bar of the statute is not tolled by an entry into an adjoining tract held by the same party unless the property be held together as one acquisition or estate,[25] and where there are several possessors the entry must be on each parcel possessed.[26] If the land is situate in two or more counties there must be an entry on the parcel lying in each county.[27]

(B) Necessity of Intent to Take Possession. When a party is once dispossessed it is not every entry upon the premises without permission that would disturb the adverse possession. He may tread upon his own soil and still be as much out of possession of it there as elsewhere.[28] An entry, to defeat a subsisting actual possession, must be with the actual intention of taking possession.[29]

(C) Necessity of Indicating Intent to Take Possession. This intention must be sufficiently indicated by words or acts,[30] by express declaration, or by exercise of acts of ownership inconsistent with a subordinate character.[31] Occasional or temporary intrusions upon the land will not be sufficient to interrupt the running of the statute.[32] The acts should be open and notorious, and continue unbroken

gards the preservation of the rights of the person holding the legal title by entry. See the particular statutes.

During the three years immediately following the record of a tax deed which was void for irregularities, the original owner entered upon the land to remove the pine timber, and cut roads, built sled-ways, and cut and hauled the pine from the land during two successive lumber seasons of three or four months each, but did not place any building thereon. This occupancy was open and continuous for two seasons. It terminated when the pine timber was all removed, and the land, though fitted for agricultural purposes, continued unimproved during the whole period. This was held sufficient to interrupt the running of the statute of limitations. Haseltine v. Mosher, 51 Wis. 443, 8 N. for a sufficient time to give notice to the person interested that a claim of right is intended by them.[33] The entry must not be accidental or by invitation of the party in possession; if it is, it will not be effectual to toll the statute of limitations.[34]

(D) Necessity of Peaceable Entry. It has been said that, to interrupt the running of the statute in favor of a claimant by adverse possession, the entry by the owner must be peaceable, and "not with force and strong hand."[35] A rule which would allow the owner of land to arrest the operation of the statute of limitations by forcible intrusion upon the peaceable possession of an adverse occupant, and the expulsion of the latter from the premises, would be followed by the most pernicious consequences.[36] It has been held, however, that a peaceable entry upon the actual adverse possession of another, followed by an unlawful detainer, does not interrupt the adverse possession if an action for the forcible entry and detainer is commenced within a reasonable time and prosecuted to a successful termination.[37]

(E) Sufficiency of Entry by Agent. The general rule that entry by the owner interrupts the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the adverse claimant applies whether the entry is made by the owner in person[38] or by agent,[39] and a subsequent ratification of an entry on land by an unauthorized agent is equivalent to an entry by previous command for the purpose of suspending the running of the statute.[40]

c. Entry or Intrusion by Stranger. The mere temporary entry or intrusion[41] or occasional trespass[42] by a stranger does not interrupt the running of the statute in behalf of the adverse occupant. The intrusion of a trespasser will in no case interrupt the continuity of adverse possession unless continued for such a length of time that knowledge of the intrusion is presumed, or so as to become the assertion of an adverse right.[43] If they are known, they become assertions of right, and operate to break the continuity unless legal remedies are resorted to within a reasonable time to regain possession and are prosecuted to a successful determination.[44] But where legal proceedings against the intruder are promptly and successfully prosecuted there is no interruption of the continuity,[45] and the period during which the possession was interrupted cannot be deducted in computing the length of adverse possession by the claimant.[46]

d. Abandonment of Possession by Claimant — (I) Effect of Abandonment. Where an adverse occupant abandons possession before the statutory period has run he loses all rights acquired by his adverse holding, and the rightful owner by such abandonment is placed in the same position in all respects as he was before the intrusion took place.[47] If the claimant abandons possession after judgment in ejectment against him, this stops the running of the statute, although plaintiff in ejectment did not take possession.[48]

(II) What Constitutes Abandonment. In determining what acts constitute an abandonment the character of the property and the uses for which it can be adapted is of considerable importance. As every case presents a different state of facts no general rule can be stated as to what constitutes abandonment.[49]

e. Surrender of Possession by Claimant. When an adverse claimant surrenders possession to the disseizor before the expiration of the time necessary to acquire title by prescription, this puts an end to the running of the statute in his favor, and the possession thus interrupted is not effectual for any purpose.[50] This is true although the surrender is induced by threats of the true owner that he would resort to legal proceedings.[51] An agreement to surrender before expiration of the statutory period, based on a valuable consideration, also stops the running of the statute,[52] and continued possession thereunder will not be regarded as adverse;[53] son enters on land under color of title, and cultivates the land except for one year, during which he pastures it and keeps up the fences, it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that he has abandoned the possession because no one actually resides on the land. Perry v. Lawson, 112 Ala. 480, 20 So. 611. It has also been held that where a person took possession of forty acres of swampy land under claim of title, fenced it, and built a house on it, but, after living on it several years, left it vacant for two years because he was unable to find a tenant, but his improvements remained on the land and no one else took possession, he did not thereby lose possession. Downing v. Mayes, 153 Ill. 330, 38 N. E. 620, 46 Am. St. Rep. 896.

Failure to exercise acts of ownership over timber land for eleven years does not conclusively show an abandonment of possession, the question being one for the jury. To constitute a continuous possession it is not necessary that the occupant should be actually upon the premises continually. The mere fact that time intervenes between successive acts of occupancy does not necessarily destroy the continuity of possession. Aldrich v. Griffith, 66 Vt. 390, 29 Atl. 376.

Temporary user during period of unfitness for occupancy.—Where a non-possessor cleared, cultivated, and used the land adversely to and with the full knowledge of the alleged owner, and without any intent on his part to assert title, and the fence was accidentally burned, thereby rendering the active occupation of the premises unfit for use during several years, it was held that the statute did not cease to run during that non-user where there was no evidence tending to show abandonment except non-user. Ford v. Wilson, 35 Miss. 490, 72 Am. Dec. 137.

Temporary non-user, when not needed.—The adverse user of an irrigating ditch, through the lands of another, only during the cropping season, the ditch not being needed at other times, constitutes a continuous adverse user, as the omission to use when not needed does not break the continuity of the user. Hesperia Land, etc., Co. v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 10, 23 Pac. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209.

Where land is submerged.—When land held adversely is submerged for years, so that the holder is forced to abandon the possession, the time during which it is thus submerged cannot be counted in favor of either the holder of the legal title or the person holding adversely. Western v. Flanagan, 120 Mo. 61, 25 S. W. 531.

Leaving family in possession of premises.—A temporary absence by the adverse claimant from his home, he leaving his family in possession, is not such an interruption of possession as to stop the running of the statute (Smith v. De La Garza, 15 Tex. 150; Cunningham v. Brumback, 23 Ark. 336), especially where the adverse claimant claims in right of his wife (Smith v. De La Garza, 15 Tex. 150).

Where the cestui que trust, under a deed to secure the payment of a debt, holds for two years the property adversely to the debtor, and afterward surrendered it to the trustee to be sold under the deed of trust, and becomes himself the purchaser, it seems that he does not relinquish any right which he may have acquired by adverse possession. Quitclaim to original owner.—Within three years after the recording of a tax-deed the grantee quitclaimed to the original owner, but the deed was not recorded. Subsequently he conveyed to a third person, who had no knowledge of the quitclaim and who duly recorded his conveyance. The land remained unoccupied for more than three years after the tax-deed was recorded. It was held that such quitclaim deed operated as an abandonment and surrender to the original owner for the constructive adverse possession which arose in the grantor's favor by virtue of his taking such tax-deed and recording it, and that after such constructive adverse possession ceased, the statute of limitations of three years ceased to run in favor of his title, and ran in favor of the original owner, and barred any right of action in favor of those claiming under the tax-deed after the expiration of the three years from the recording thereof. Surrender to one of several cotenants.—The relinquishment and yielding up to one of several tenants in common by the disseizor, after a disseizin of five years, of all the right, seizin, possession, and betterments which the disseizor had in and to the proportion of that tenant in common in the premises, has the effect to put all the tenants in common in the seizin and possession of their shares, respectively, and to prevent the operation of the statute of limitations against any of them prior to that time. but an agreement by the adverse occupant to surrender after title has been acquired by adverse possession for the statutory period is void for want of consideration and does not divest him of the title.[54]

f. Recognition of Title in Another — (I) Effect of Recognition. Interruption of the continuity necessary to acquire title by prescription occurs when the adverse claimant recognizes the title of the disseizee. On recognition of such title his adverse possession ceases to be adverse, no matter how hostile it may previously have been,[55] and limitation does not again begin to run against the person whose title is acknowledged until the claimant repudiates his title.[56]

(II) What Constitutes Recognition. Title in another may be recognized in many different ways, as by agreeing to hold under another;[57] by confessing title when sued in ejectment, instead of pleading and going to trial;[58] by consenting to a conveyance by the true owner to a third person from whom the claimant takes a bond for deed;[59] by declaring title to be in another;[60] or by written admission of title in another.[61] Proceedings to foreclose a mortgage by advertisement is such an acknowledgment of the right of the mortgagor to redeem as to repel the presumption otherwise arising from occupation for more than the statutory period by the mortgagee.[62] So it has been held a recognition of the owner's title where a company, both prior and subsequent to entering the land, attempted to condemn it,[63] and proceedings by a company for the vaca-

g. Taking or Offering to Take Lease from Another. The acceptance of a lease by the claimant before the statutory period has run is a waiver of adverse possession previously originated, as against the person from whom the lease is accepted,[65] and an offer to lease the land from another also breaks the continuity of the adverse possession as against such other.[66] The rule applies whether the lease is taken from the holder of the legal title[67] or from a stranger.[68] The mental capacity of the person in possession after executing a lease, thereby acknowledging another's ownership, cannot be inquired into as against an innocent purchaser.[69]

Lease of tract including part of land held adversely.— A lease by defendant, for grazing purposes, of a tract of wild land adjoining his inclosed cultivated tract, will not prevent the running of the statute of limitations as to a strip of the former tract which had been inclosed and cultivated by defendant in accordance with a survey which he caused to be made. Application of rule.— A letter written by one in possession of land to the attorney of other claimants, in which he offers to lease the land from them, is a recognition of that title so as to prevent him from claiming adverse possession, though he afterward held longer than the statutory period, when he does nothing to indicate that such possession is adverse. An attornment by a tenant to a stranger claiming the land, although it may be ineffectual to create the relation of landlord and tenant in consequence of an estoppel in favor of the landlord under whom he entered, would nevertheless take from the possession its adverse character. 70. View that continuity is broken.— Some of the decisions hold or seem to hold without qualification that an attempt to buy the title or right of the true owner will operate to break the continuity of the possession. View that continuity is not broken.— On the other hand it is apparently held in some decisions that a mere offer by the adverse occupant to purchase an outstanding title or interest, whether of the true owner or of a third person, does not interrupt the continuity of the possession. McAllister v. Hartzell, 60 Ohio St. 69, 53 N. E. 715; Bannon v. Brandon, 34 Pa. St. 263, 75 Am. Dec. 655; Headrick v. Fritts, 93 Tenn. 270, 24 S. W. 11; Tobey v. Secor, 60 Wis. 310, 19 N. W. 99. See also Jackson v. Decker, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 418.

View that continuity is not necessarily broken.— There is yet a third line of decisions, the doctrine of which is that the mere offer or attempt to purchase an outstanding title does not necessarily amount to such a recognition of title in another as to break the continuity of possession.

i. Purchase of Outstanding Claim or Interest — (I) In General. With the exception of at least one decision in which it has been broadly ruled that the purchase of an outstanding title or interest by the adverse claimant interrupts the continuity of his possession,[71] it seems to be very generally conceded that an adverse occupant may purchase an outstanding title without thereby interrupting the continuity of his possession.[72] A party, it is said, may very well deny the validity of an adverse claim of title, and yet choose to buy his peace at a smaller price than be at great expense and annoyance in litigating it.[73] On the other hand it is also conceded that continuity of possession may be interrupted by the purchase of an outstanding claim or title.[74]

(II) Interruption of Continuity as against Former Owner — (A) Purchase of Tax-Title. The difficulty arises in determining under what circumstances the purchase of an outstanding claim or title is or is not a breach in the continuity of possession. In a considerable number of decisions it has been held that a purchase by an adverse occupant of the tax-title to the land is not an interruption of the continuity of the possession as against the former owner[75] unless the purchase is made for the owner under an agreement to lease the land or a portion thereof.[76]

(B) Purchase of Title from Third Person. So in a number of other deci-

According to some of these decisions, where one in possession of land offers to purchase it from the true owner before title by adverse possession has matured, and this offer is made not merely to buy an outstanding or adverse claim in order to quiet his possession or protect himself from litigation, the offer is a recognition of the owner's title and will stop the running of the statute. It has also been held that an attempt by the adverse occupant to purchase an interest consistent with and not opposed to his own rights will not arrest the running of the statute. Bean v. Bachelder, 74 Me. 202. See also James v. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co., 91 Ill. 554, in which it was held that the promise of officers of a corporation to pay for land occupied and used by it within the period of limitation is not an admission of title so as to prevent the running of the statute. The court said that a promise to pay for land, although evidence of the debt, is not inconsistent with a title in the possessor to the land, as, for instance, where title has been conveyed before payment is made of the purchase-money.

sions it has been held that continuity of possession as against the rightful owner is not broken by purchase of some interest or title from a third person.[77]

(c) Purchase of Former Owner's Interest. There are some decisions which seem to hold without qualification that a purchase of the rightful owner's interest does not affect the continuity of possession.[78] In other decisions it is held that if such purchase is made with the intent of quieting title or preventing litigation the continuity of the possession will not be interrupted.[79] According to still other decisions a purchase from the rightful owner of his interest or title prima facie divests the possession of its hostile character.[80]

(III) Purchase from One as Affecting Continuity against Another Claimant. A purchase, by the adverse occupant, of the title of one or more claimants, does not interrupt the continuity of his possession as against the others.[81]

j. Sale of Premises — (I) By Person Other Than Claimant's Grantor. Where an adverse occupant is in possession under color of title, the fact that the land was embraced in a deed to another person executed by a person other than the claimant's grantor is not sufficient to deprive him of his title.[82]

(II) By Adverse Occupant. Where land held adversely is sold by the adverse occupant before title in him has matured, this does not necessarily interrupt the running of the statute.[83] As shown in another connection, the possessions of grantor and grantee may be united to make up the statutory period.[84] Nevertheless the conveyance must be followed by delivery of possession,[85] but it seems Conveyance to person incompetent to take title.— Where the statute of limitations has commenced to run against the owners of lands in the possession of another, a conveyance and delivery of possession by such adverse occupier to one incompetent to take title will not arrest the running of the statute against the owners. Application of rule.— Where the original owner did not hold possession long enough to claim title it is incumbent on defendants claiming under him to supplement his possession by that of his vendee's. It did not appear that he took actual possession, or that the grantor's agent who was in possession continued to hold it for them as their tenant. The agent, not being in the actual possession of the land, sold to defendants' grantors. Defendants' grantors owned the land only a few days when they sold it to defendants, but they have nothing to show that they ever expected to take actual possession so as to raise the question as to whether they should be al-that a reasonable time will be allowed for the purchaser to take possession before a break in the running of the statute will be declared.[86] Thus adverse possession is not interrupted by a conveyance of the premises where possession is retained and a mortgage is taken for the purchase-money and subsequently foreclosed. Nor is it material that the foreclosure proceedings are defective.[87]

(III) Sales under Execution or Foreclosure against True Owner. The continuity of an adverse claimant's possession is not broken merely by a sale under execution against the original owner.[88] It is interrupted, however, by the levy of an execution and delivery of seizin to the creditor.[89] A purchaser of land at a foreclosure sale succeeds to the mortgagor's title, and cannot bring suit and recover the land against a party in adverse possession after the lapse of five years from the time the cause of action accrued to the mortgagor or those under whom he claims.[90]

(IV) Sales for Taxes. While there is one decision maintaining the contrary doctrine,[91] the weight of authority is to the effect that the running of the statute of limitations in favor of one holding by adverse possession is interrupted by a sale for taxes.[92] Of course, if the statutory period is complete before forfeiture to the state for taxes, such title will not be thereby affected, and the state will take nothing by the forfeiture.[93]

k. Execution of Lease of Premises to Another by Claimant. Continuity of adverse possession of land necessary to keep the statute of limitations running is not interrupted by the possession of one who occupies as a tenant of the alleged adverse possessor.[94]

l. Interruption by Legal Proceedings — (I) Unsuccessful Actions — (A) Against Adverse Claimant. An unsuccessful action leading to no change of possession does not arrest the running of the statute of limitations,[95] and this is true whether the action is prosecuted to judgment[96] or whether the suit is volun-

lowed a reasonable time to do this. Nor did it appear that they were acting as agents of defendants so as to connect defendants' possession with that of the original grantor. It was held that there was a complete break in the adverse possession of the land while it was owned by defendants' grantors. Tarlton v. Kirkpatrick, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 107, 21 S. W. 405.

tarily abandoned or dismissed for want of prosecution.[97] While the adverse possession of a defendant in ejectment during the pendency of the suit cannot ripen into an absolute title, yet the effect of the statute of limitations is neutralized only in respect of the particular suit and the plaintiff therein, and after the determination of that suit, the statutory limitations having meanwhile expired, no subsequent action can be brought to question that title or possession.[98]

(B) By Adverse Claimant. Where a person in adverse possession of land brings suit to remove a cloud from title and is defeated, his rights as against strangers to the suit are not affected, and as to such strangers limitations continue to run.[99]

(II) Recovery of Judgment without Change of Possession—(A) Statement of General Rule. Furthermore the mere recovery of a judgment will not of itself stop the running of the statute of limitations. There must be an actual change of possession by virtue of such judgment,[1] and where the plaintiff in ejectment neglects to enforce his judgment within the period laid in his demise, his right of entry under that judgment is altogether gone.[2]

(B) Limitations of Rule—(1) Where Decree Directs Conveyance by Claimant. The rule as stated is subject to some slight limitations. Thus the continuity of adverse possession is broken by a decree requiring the occupant to convey the land, even if the actual possession is not disturbed. The decree has the effect of a voluntary conveyance.[3]

(2) Where Parties Agree to Abide Judgment. So it has been held that an agreement that defendant shall deliver possession to plaintiff, or consent to abide the judgment for dispossession, is equivalent to dispossession.[4]

(III) Recovery of Judgment and Change of Possession. Where a judgment has been obtained against the adverse claimant, and a change of possession made in accordance therewith, the continuity of the running of the statute is broken.[5] A suit that eventually ripens into possession stops the running of the statute of limitations regardless of whether the entry thereunder is before or after the expiration of the statutory period.[6] In contemplation of law, possession acquired by plaintiff under a judgment puts an end to the adverse possession of defendant as of the date of the institution of the suit.[7]

(IV) Recovery of Judgment to Which Claimant Is Not a Party. The continuity of possession of one in the actual occupancy of land under claim of title is not broken so as to affect the running of the statute in his favor by a judgment of ouster rendered in an action of ejectment for the land, brought against one not at the time in privity with him in title or possession where he was not made a party and did not appear or employ counsel in such action.[8] It has also been held that a suit against a lessee for the possession of the demised premises is not an interruption of the possession of the lessor.[9]

Applications of rule.— Thus, where ejectment was brought within the statutory period, the fact that defendant remained in possession during the pendency of the proceedings, and that five years elapsed from the time he took possession until his eviction under the judgment, gave him no right to set up a title by prescription acquired by those remaining in possession. Breon v. Robrecht, 118 Cal. 469, 50 Pac. 689, 51 Pac. 33, 62 Am. St. Rep. 247. An executed judgment for plaintiff in ejectment, where suit has been commenced within the period of limitations, is conclusive, against defendant, of any asserted right founded merely upon his possession either at the time of the commencement of the action or at the time of the judgment. During the pendency of the action he can acquire no new right as against plaintiff by the mere fact that he remains in possession. During that period his right of possession is sub judice,— before the judge awaiting judicial determination,— and a judgment against him judicially determines that down to the date of its rendition his possession, as against plaintiff, has been wrongful. Breon v. Robrecht, 118 Cal. 469, 50 Pac. 689, 51 Pac. 33, 62 Am. St. Rep. 247. To same effect see Hackworth v. Harlan, (Ky. 1892) 19 S. W. 172.

8. Rigney v. De Graw, 100 Fed. 213, 214, in which it was said: "Judgments bind only the parties to the record and their privies in blood, or estate, or in law. No one is privy to a judgment whose succession to the rights of property thereby affected occurred previous to the institution of the suit."

An action of ejectment is not lis pendens as to one, not a party, who has no notice of the action, actual or constructive, and who is in possession under a bond for deed from defendant in ejectment. And such possession will ripen into an adverse title so as to defeat a writ of possession issued on a judgment rendered therein after the party in possession had occupied the premises for a sufficient length of time to acquire title by prescription. shall continue in possession.[10] And where title is claimed by adverse possession up to a certain boundary, an agreement to submit the disputed boundary to arbitration will defeat the operation of the statute.[11]

n. Death of Former Owner. The running of the statute of limitations in favor of persons in adverse possession of land is not suspended by the death of the former owner.[12] By the descent cast the heirs are placed exactly in the shoes of their ancestor; and, the statute having commenced running against him in his lifetime, it continues to run without intermission against his heirs,[13] and this, too, irrespective of any disabilities under which they may have been on the death of the ancestor.[14]

o. Issuance to Another of Patent of Land Occupied. If one be in possession, under color of title, of lands with known and visible boundaries, but, before possession is continued long enough to raise the presumption of a grant, a patent is issued to another, including a part of such land, the presumption of a grant is suspended as to the lappage if the party claiming by prescription be not in actual possession of the land included therein.[15] The presumption is not suspended, however, where the party claiming by prescription is in the actual possession of the land included in the lappage.[16]

p. Absence of Occupant in Compliance with Military Orders. The involuntary absence of one in possession of land, caused by the issuance of a military order, does not break the continuity of his possession[17] unless the order is operative against both the owner and the adverse claimant. In this case the continuity of possession will be deemed to have been interrupted, because it operated to prevent the owner from taking possession as well as to cause the adverse claimant to relinquish it.[18]

q. Temporary Vacancy Incident to Change of Owners or Tenants. Periods of vacancy incident to or occasioned by change of possession, or by the substitution in the possession of one tenant for another, and which are not of longer duration than is reasonable in view of the character of the land and the uses to which it is adapted and devoted, do not constitute interruptions of possession destroying its continuity in legal contemplation, when there is no intention to abandon the possession. They are but incidents of that continuous possession which the land inherently, and in relation to the manner of its use, admits of.[19]

Adverse possession by wife as against heirs of husband.— Possession of land by a divorced wife of the owner claiming under a void order rendered in adverse proceedings allotting the land to her is not changed into possession under her dower right by the death of the husband pending the running of the statute of limitations. Jones v. Thomas, 124 Mo. 586, 590, 28 S. W. 76, wherein the court said: "As her possession was, in its inception, adverse to her divorced husband and to the plaintiff, it continued to be adverse . . . and the fact that she became entitled to dower after the adverse possession began cannot change the result."

Change of possession by substitution of tenants.— If one and those claiming under him hold possession of land and make a crop on it every year for seven years, an interval of two or three months between one tenant's going out and another's coming in does not amount to such an interruption of the possession as to defeat the statute of limitations. Hudgins v. Crow, 32 Ga. 367. In an action where adverse possession was pleaded it appeared that one who had been put in possession of the land in controversy in 1880, by the grantor of defendant, after beginning to make a crop, abandoned the land, without the landlord's knowledge, in May of that year, and that in the summer or fall of the same

This rule proceeds upon the theory that notwithstanding such interruptions of actual occupancy there is in fact no actual interruption of such acts of possession as the land is reasonably susceptible of.[20] It is not to be understood, however, from anything here said, that an interval of several years elapsing between the possessions of the incoming and outgoing tenants is a temporary vacancy within the meaning of the rule just stated.[21]

r. Temporary Breaks in Fences or Inclosures. Temporary breaks in fences or inclosures, relied upon to constitute adverse possession, will not stop the running of the statute of limitations if enough of the fence or inclosure remains to give notice of the extent of the adverse claim,[22] or if there is still an actual and visible appropriation of the land, commenced and continued under a claim of right inconsistent with and hostile to the claims of all others.[23] So the fact that fences are permitted to become dilapidated during a period when not necessary for the protection of crops does not destroy the continuity of possession,[24] and it has been held that the destruction of a division fence under claim of ownership does not break the continuity of the adverse possession of the adjacent owner.[25] On the other hand, where, after inclosure of land, the fence goes to decay, and the land remains open for several years before the person making the inclosure again takes possession, it does not constitute continuous adverse possession.[26]

s. Attornment of Claimant's Tenant to Another. The continuity of possession by an adverse claimant is not broken by the attornment of his tenant to another without his knowledge or consent,[27] unless made in pursuance of a judg-year the landlord put another tenant in possession. It was held that these facts did not necessarily constitute a break in the continuity of the landlord's possession. Beasley v. Howell, 117 Ala. 439, 22 So. 989.

Change of possession by conveyance.— An interval of some days between the execution of a deed and the record thereof will not break the continuity of possession under the recorded deed, where the adverse possession of both grantor and grantee is necessary to make up the statutory period of adverse possession. A reasonable time must ordinarily intervene between the date of the deed and its record, and the change of possession in conformity with the title of record. De La Vega v. Butler, 47 Tex. 529; Jacks v. Dillon, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 192, 25 S. W. 645. Compare Tegarden v. Carpenter, 36 Miss. 404, in which it was held that where the vendor vacated the premises for a short time before he sold to his grantee, and before the latter took possession, and it did not appear that during this time either of them exercised any ownership over the land, the adverse possession was not continuous and the two possessions could be tacked together.

23. Gunter v. Mead, 78 Tex. 634, 14 S. W. 562.

A temporary interruption of actual residence, caused by the unlawful and violent acts of strangers in tearing down the house and rendering the premises untenantable for the time being, will not prevent the statute from continuing to run where there is no adverse entry or offer to redeem, and where the claimant continues to exercise all acts of ownership and dominion over the premises of which the nature of the land and its condition will admit. ment, decree, or order of court.[28] The holding of the tenant so attorning will be treated as the possession of the person under whom he entered.[29]

t. Absence of Claimant from State. Since the disseizor or his successor in the adverse holding may continue the adverse possession by tenants or agents against whom the owner may have his action to recover possession, the absence from the state of such disseizor or his successor does not interrupt the running of the time within which an action must be brought.[30]

2. Effect of Suspension of Statute During Period of Interruption. An interruption, though occurring during a period when the statute of limitations was suspended, is nevertheless sufficient to break the continuity of possession.[31]

3. Effect of Interruption. Whenever the running of the statute is interrupted, the possession of the true owner constructively intervenes, and the previous possession is unavailing. If the adverse holder thereafter assumes possession, the statute of limitations runs in support of his claim only from the time of the resumption.[32]

D. Time Requisite for Acquisition of Title by Adverse Possession — 1. Statutory Provisions. The time requisite for the acquisition of title by the adverse possessor is a matter which is dependent entirely on statutory regulation. These statutes are frequently changed. It is not considered worth while to cite the decisions in which the statutory period is declared, because it can be determined with much more certainty by a consultation of the statutes themselves. The only other statement which it is deemed necessary to make in this connection is, that under statutes making color of title an element of adverse possession the period of limitation is usually much shorter than in cases where color of title is not necessary.[33]

2. Effect of Suspension of Statute during Possession. Where, during the period of adverse possession, the statute of limitations is suspended by statute for a time, in computing the time necessary to perfect title by adverse possession the adverse occupant cannot avail himself of possession during the time the statute was suspended.[34]

Attornment under judgment.— A recovery in ejectment by one having the better title, and the attornment of the defendant's tenant to the plaintiff under pressure of a writ of habere facias possessionem, break the continuity of the possession. Actual eviction of the tenant before accepting a lease from plaintiff in ejectment is not necessary. The surrender is equally involuntary where the attornment is the alternative of actual ouster. 3. Effect of Disabilities Arising Before or After Possession Commences — a. Disability Affecting Former Owner — (I) Disability Arising Before Possession Commences. If the true owner is under any disability at the time the adverse possession commences, the statute does not run against him so long as the disability continues.[35] So, if several disabilities exist together, the statute does not run until all are removed.[36]

(II) Disability Arising After Possession Commences. If the disability accrues after the adverse possession commences, this disability has no effect on the running of the statute; only those disabilities which exist at the time the right of action accrues can be availed of.[37]

b. Disability Affecting Heir of Former Owner. If an adverse possession commences in the lifetime of the ancestor it will continue to run against the heir notwithstanding any existing disability on the part of the latter, where the right accrues to him or her.[38] Though they be infants, married women, or persons of unsound mind, they are nevertheless bound to sue before the expiration of the statutory period just as much as their ancestor would have been had he lived.[39]

V. Exclusive Possession.

The rule is broadly stated in a very considerable number of decisions that exclusiveness of possession is a necessary element of title by adverse possession;[40] within the Confederate lines, no matter for what purpose, after defendant's adverse possession had commenced, did not suspend the running of the statute. The court said: "If he went there to join the public enemy, that would be an extraordinary reason for claiming that the operation of our laws should be suspended in order that he may lose no rights. If he went there on legitimate business or as a loyal citizen, our courts would never have been closed against his suit. But, whatever his motive or his business, his act was purely voluntary, and that consideration disposes of his claim that the statute of limitations ceased to run."

Execution of trust not dependent on intervention of courts.— The doctrine that the statute of limitations was suspended during the war does not apply to the case of a mere personal trust which could have been executed by the trustee without the intervention of a court. Where the trustee neglected for more than seven years, embracing the time of the war, to execute such a trust, it was held that the statute was not suspended as against one in the adverse possession of land which was the subject of the trust. Rule under Kentucky statute.— The act of 1809 does not bar the right of persons upon whom the title is cast at the time they are laboring under any disability, unless the statute has fully run against the ancestor; and this is true although they may inherit it jointly with others laboring under no disability. But under the act of 1796, if the ancestor dies after the statute commences, but before the right is barred, it descends upon his heirs. While laboring under such disability the right of the heirs to sue is saved. McIntire v. Funk, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 33. Possession concurrent with that of true owner.— The possession of the one claiming title by adverse possession must not have been concurrent with that of the true owner. The possession follows the title, and if the owner and others were in possession, the law construes the owner as in possession.

One using property in dispute, during the period of prescription, as a way to his premises, must be said to have been in exclusive possession where the owner of the record title has used it during the same period to furnish light and air to his building. Where one has been using his property for the purpose of furnishing light and air, and another has been using it for a different purpose, neither can be said to have had the exclusive use of the property. In the great majority of decisions this statement is found merely in the enunciation of the general rule that, in order to acquire and no qualification of this doctrine is recognized by them.[42] Nevertheless this rule has been qualified in some jurisdictions, at least to this extent, that a person may, while admitting title in the federal or state government, hold exclusive of all others.[43]

VI. HOSTILE POSSESSION.

A. Necessity — 1. Statement of General Rule. The principle is well settled that to make a disseizin that will be the commencement of a new title, producing a change by which the estate is taken from the rightful owner and placed in the wrong-doer, the possession taken by the disseizor must be hostile or adverse in its character, importing a denial of the owner's title in the property claimed; otherwise, however open, notorious, constant, and long-continued it may be, the owner's action will not be barred.[44] The mere fact that the claimant has had possession title by adverse possession, the possession must be actual, continuous, open and notorious, exclusive and hostile. In the absence of other decisions stating the doctrine more specifically the legitimate inference would be that the exclusive possession meant is a possession exclusive of all persons whatsoever. This latter phase of the question has been directly considered in many cases, and in regard to it there appears to be some conflict of authority.

of the land for the statutory period will not suffice to satisfy the rule requiring the disseizor's possession to be hostile.[45]

2. Insufficiency of Exclusive Possession. So title cannot be acquired by holding the land "exclusively."[46] The reason for this is that possession may be exclusive and yet not hostile.[47] Hostility of possession cannot be assumed, as a matter of law, from mere exclusive possession, no matter how long continued.[48]

3. Necessity of Possession Hostile in Its Inception. While there are a number of decisions in which it is either held or said that possession, in order to ripen into title, must be hostile in its inception,[49] the great weight of authority is to the effect that although the original entry upon lands is made in subordination to the title of the real owner, the possession may become adverse.[50]

4. Necessity of Claim Hostile to Whole World — a. Statement of Rule. Some decisions hold that the statute of limitations runs only in favor of parties in possession claiming title adverse to the whole world.[51]

b. Limitations of Rule. Other decisions limit the rule at least to this extent, that a person may admit title in the United States and yet hold adversely to all others.[52] So in one state the qualification is made that a corporation chartered by act of congress, incompetent to acquire title in such state, may nevertheless maintain a possession adverse to all persons except the state.[53] Other decisions go even further, and hold that, to claim land under limitations, defendant's possession need not be adverse to the whole world, but only as to plaintiff who is asserting title in himself.[54]

These decisions proceed upon the theory that plaintiff in ejectment must ultimately recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title,[55] and if it is not meant to hold more than that the claimant in possession has sufficient right in the land to defeat an action by any person whatsoever, except the true owner, they are undoubtedly correct, because naked possession — that is, possession without even a claim of title — vests a right of property in the person who has such possession, sufficient to permit him to hold the land against all the world except the true owner.[56] If, however, the person in possession were bringing the action for the recovery of land to which he claims title by adverse possession, a different question would be presented, and he would not be permitted to recover.[57]

5. Necessity of Claim of Right or Title — a. Statement of Rule. While color of title is, as a general rule, not necessary to the acquisition of title by adverse possession,[58] claim of title or right by the occupant is in all cases necessary.[59] No matter how exclusive and hostile to the true owner the possession may

Thus possession of land which is merely incidental and subsidiary to the commission of a trespass on the land, as by cutting and removing the timber and abandonment when that object is accomplished, although it may have continued for some weeks or months, is not such an adverse possession as will prevent the true owner of the land from maintaining trover or replevin for the timber thus taken. Austin v. Holt, 32 Wis. 478. So digging away some of the soil and piling railroad ties on land, when not done under claim of ownership or by the possessor of a paper title, do not constitute adverse possession within the meaning of the statute of limitations. Possession of squatter.— The possession must be open, adverse, and continuous for the statutory period under a claim of title, to ripen into a title. occupant under such circumstances is considered as the possession of him upon whose pleasure it continues.[67]

b. Extent of Rule. The rule applies whether the license or permission is from a private individual,[68] a municipal corporation,[69] or the state or federal government.[70] Nor is the rule affected by the fact that the agreement conferring the permission or license is for any reason void.[71] So the rule has been held to apply, in case of mere permissive trespasses,[72] to an occupation of land under an agreement with the owner whereby the occupant was to have the use of the land in consideration of his paying the taxes thereon;[73] to an occupation under a simple license to occupy till some terms should be arranged between the parties;[74] and to an occupant entering upon land owned by tenants in common by license of one of them.[75] The rule likewise applies to the case of a transferee of a license, although the transfer or possession terminates the license and gives the licensor the right, if he so elects, to treat the transferee as a trespasser.[76]

Where use of an alley was permissive only, and not made under a claim of right or with the intent to enjoy it without regard to the wishes of the owner of the land, the possession is not adverse. Dexter v. Tree, 117 Ill. 532, 6 N. E. 506.

2. What Is Requisite to Give Possession a Hostile Character — a. Knowledge or Notice to Disseizee of Hostile Claim. Where possession is originally taken and held under the true owner, a clear, positive, and continued disclaimer and disavowal of title, and an assertion of an adverse right brought home to the true owner, are indispensable before any foundation can be laid for the operation of the statute of limitations.[77] If this were not so, the greatest injustice might be done. Without such knowledge the adverse claimant has the right to rely upon the fiduciary relation under which the possession was originally taken and held.[78]

b. What Knowledge or Notice Sufficient — (1) In General. The statute of limitations does not begin to run until the true owner has actual notice of a hostile holding against him, or until there are acts or declarations on the part of the claimant showing the possession to have become hostile, done or made in such manner and under such circumstances as to leave no doubt that they came to the knowledge of the owner or some one representing him.[79] It must be shown that

It would be a harsh doctrine, converting the statute of limitations into a statute for the encouragement of fraud, if tenants of particular estates, or tenants having had a limited or qualified interest or holding by mere sufferance or permission, could without the knowledge of the true owners,— without notice to them of any facts putting them on inquiry,— convert their possessions into adversary possession by mere claim of title, which the statute of limitations will protect. the true owner had knowledge of the adverse holding, or it must be so open and notorious as to raise a presumption of notice to him equivalent to actual notice.[80]

(II) NECESSITY OF ACTUAL KNOWLEDGE. Actual knowledge on the part of the owner is not an absolutely indispensable element of adverse holding by one who has entered under and in recognition of title of the true owner. The acts of the party in possession may be such as will warrant the presumption and finding that the true owner had knowledge of the adverse claim.[81]

C. Effect of Recognition or Admission of Title in Another. The possession of one who recognizes or admits title in another, either by declaration or conduct, is not adverse to the title of such other[82] until such occupant has

Acts held insufficient to charge with notice. — Proceedings for the partition of land, brought by persons holding possession under license from the true owner, and to which he is not a party, followed by a sale to one of the parties and continued exclusive possession by him, are insufficient to charge the true owner with notice of a hostile claim. Budd v. Collins, 69 Mo. 129. Mere declarations of intent to hold adversely by the occupant are insufficient to set in motion the statute of limitations in his favor, where he entered in subserviency to the title of another. Cadwalader v. App, 81 Pa. St. 194. And a fortiori a mere undisclosed intent on the part of such occupant to hold adversely is insufficient. Some notice or act indicative of an intent to sell is necessary. Comstock v. Eastwood, 108 Mo. 41, 18 S. W. 39; Bannon v. Brandon, 34 Pa. St. 263, 75 Am. Dec. 655. Paying taxes, making repairs, taking rents and profits, and cutting timber are not sufficient acts to constitute adverse possession on the part of one who enters into possession of land in privity with another against whom such possession is asserted. Hulvey v. Hulvey, 92 Va. 182, 23 S. E. 233. The receipt of rents and profits from real estate is not of itself such a possession as to prove an ouster of the party holding the legal title, and to render void a conveyance by him, but is consistent with the supposition that the possession is in some way subordinate to the title of the owner. Nevertheless it has been said in a recent decision that "no kind or degree of actual hostility will of itself convert such a permissive into an adverse possession. No sort of claim of ownership on the part of the party in possession will of itself have this effect. And while it may be open to the jury in some instances to find from the circumstances of the possession that the owner has notice of its hostile and exclusive character, no exclusiveness of possession, no hostility, no claim of right antagonistic to the title, will necessarily in any case take the place of direct proof of knowledge on the part of the owner that the possession is no longer held in subserviency to him. At most, in any case, the circumstances of hostility, exclusiveness, and claim of right are only for the jury to consider as tending to show knowledge on the part of the owner, the argument being that the circumstances of the possession were such as that he must have known them, and from them that the possession was no longer held under him and in recognition of his title." D. Effect of Agreement of Adjoining Proprietors in Relation to Boundaries — 1. Fixing Permanent Boundaries — a. Statement of Rule. Where proprietors of adjoining lands agree upon, fix, and establish a boundary line between their respective tracts, and each occupies up to the boundary line, their possession is mutually adverse to each other, and, if continued for the length of time prescribed by the statute of limitations, will ripen into a perfect title.[84] Where an Admission by deeds.— The possession by defendant, who has by deeds and partitions acknowledged the title of plaintiff, is not adverse to such title. Tomlinson v. Lynch, 32 Mo. 160. Possession of land by defendant and other grantors, accompanied by the erection of wharves and other buildings thereon, is not adverse when the conveyance under which they claim showed that they had no title to the accepted land, and their own subsequent conveyance recognized and repeated the exception. New York v. Law, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 637, 6 N. Y. Suppl. 628 [affirmed in 125 N. Y. 380, 26 N. E. 471]. Intention to leave when the real owner came.— Where one enters on unseated land with the intention to leave when the real owner came, but not until then, the owner being unknown, and holds continuous possession for twenty-one years, he acquires a perfect title against the real owner which is not affected by his endeavoring to find the real owner or purchase his title, or by his declarations to strangers of his want of title and his desire and intention to buy it or be paid for his improvements when the real owner appeared. agreement of this character exists, it is of course immaterial that the line thus agreed upon is not the correct one.[85]

Agreements of this character are not within the statute of frauds,[86] because they are not considered as extending to the title. They do not operate as a conveyance so as to pass title from one to the other, but proceed upon the theory that the true line of separation is in dispute and to some extent unknown, and in such case the agreement serves to fix the line to which the title of each extends.[87]

The line becomes binding, not upon the principle that the title to real estate can be passed by parol, but for the reason that the proprietors have by such consent agreed permanently upon the limits of the extent of

b. Extent and Limits of Rule. These agreements are binding on the heirs of the parties[88] and on their grantees,[89] and, after possession has been held for the statutory period conformably to the line agreed upon, a deed by one purporting to convey the land thus in possession of the other passes nothing to the grantee.[90]

While a disputed boundary line between adjoining proprietors may be settled by agreement between them as to where the line shall be, followed by occupancy for the time necessary to bar an entry, and such occupancy will confer title regardless of where the true line is, the same is not true of the projection of such agreed line beyond the point of occupancy, and in the latter case the agreement is within the statute of frauds, and the possession of each will follow his title to the true line, to be determined by the government corners and field-notes.[91]

c. Doctrine of Estoppel as Applicable to Agreements. In a number of jurisdictions it seems to be well settled that where a boundary line is established by agreement of two adjoining owners, title up to the line thus fixed may be acquired by estoppel as well as by adverse possession. Where adjoining landowners agree upon a boundary line and enter into possession and improve the lands according to the line thus agreed upon, the parties will be concluded from afterward disputing that the line thus agreed upon is the true one, even if the statute of limitations has not run.[92]

2. Occupation up to Provisional Line Until True Line Established. Where owners of adjacent tracts, being ignorant of the location of the true line, occupy up to a line which they agree is merely provisional and to continue only until the true line is thereafter determined, neither can acquire title to any land not within the true line.[93]

3. Fixing Provisional Line for Convenience. If a line is established merely for convenience, the parties thereto recognizing the true line, the possession, by either, of the other's land, no matter how long continued, cannot ripen into title.[94]

E. Effect of Occupation under Mistake as to Boundaries — 1. View that Possession Is Necessarily Adverse. A few decisions hold without qualification that one who, through a misapprehension as to the boundaries of his land, occupies and possesses land of another for the statutory period, thereby acquires title by adverse possession to such lands.[95]

Application of rule.— If two grants of land lap, and if, while neither grantee is settled on the lapped part, the junior grantee enters on the lappage, and clears and cultivates a field upon it with the permission of the senior grantee, on his agreeing to set back his fence whenever it would appear by survey that it was over the line of the elder grant, his possession of the field will not prevent the elder grantee, or one claiming under him, from having his lines run according to the calls of his grant. 2. View That Possession without Intent to Claim Is Not Adverse. Nevertheless, according to the great weight of authority, where the occupation of the land is by a mere mistake, and with no intention on the part of the occupant to claim as his own land which does not belong to him, but he intends to claim only to the true line wherever it may be, the holding is not adverse.[96] In cases of mis-

The principle on which these decisions proceed is, that although the intention of the possessor to claim adversely is an essential ingredient, the very nature of the act of entering on land believing and claiming it to be one's own amounts to an assertion of his own title and a denial of the title of all others,— that it is immaterial that the possessor was mistaken, and that he would not have entered on the land if he had been better informed. Applications of rule.— Where defendant's claim was limited to a lot of a certain number, but his possession extended to and covered a part of the adjoining lot embraced in his inclosure, this did not constitute adverse possession. Grube v. Wells, 34 Iowa 148. Where a person claims title to only a certain quarter of a section, and occupies certain land because he believes it to be a part of such quarter, and it is not a part thereof, his possession is not adverse. Fisher v. Muecke, 82 Iowa 547, 48 N. W. 936. In ejectment between owners of conterminous subdivisions of a lot take as to the true line between adjoining lands the real test as to whether or not a title will be acquired by a holding for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations is the intention of the party holding beyond the true line.[97] It is not merely the existence of a mistake, but the presence or absence of the requisite intention to claim title, that fixes the character of the entry and determines the question of disseizin.[98] There must be an intention to claim title to all land within a certain boundary, whether it eventually be the correct one or not.[99]

3. VIEW THAT POSSESSION WITH INTENT TO CLAIM IS ADVERSE. Where a person, acting under a mistake as to the true boundary line between his land and that of another, takes possession of land of another, believing it to be his own, up to a mistaken line, claiming title to it and so holding, the holding is adverse, and, if continued for the requisite period, will give title by adverse possession.[1] of land in a city, plaintiff claimed under a conveyance describing his subdivision as being "about twenty-nine feet" in width. Conveyances of the other subdivisions of the lot by metes and bounds demonstrated the fact that plaintiff's lot was only twenty-seven feet in width. Plaintiff had always supposed and claimed that his lot was twenty-nine feet wide, but had never been in the occupancy of or claimed any of the two feet beyond the true boundary. It was held that he had not acquired title to the strip of two feet by adverse possession. Kunze v. Evans, 107 Mo. 487, 18 S. W. 36, 28 Am. St. Rep. 435.

Agreement to conform to true line when established.— If a person builds a fence, being in doubt as to whether it is within the true boundary, and takes possession, stating that he will conform to the true line when established, his possession is not adverse. Grim v. Murphy, 110 Ill. 271.

Possession of tenant for landlord.—The possession of a tenant beyond the boundaries of the land contained in his lease cannot be regarded as the possession of his landlord where the latter had never had possession of the land or claimed title to it, even though the tenant believes that he is occupying only the land demised. Holmes v. Turner's Falls Lumber Co., 150 Mass. 535, 23 N. E. 305, 6 L. R. A. 283.

Possession of tenant for himself.—A tenant of two adjoining lots owned by different lessors divided them, for convenience in cultivation, by a fence not on the true division line, and afterward purchased the lot thus enlarged. It was held that his occupancy of the ground taken from the other lot could not be set up as an adverse possession under the statute of limitations. Betts v. Brown, 3 Mo. App. 20.

F. Character of Possession as Affected by Relationship or Situation of Parties toward Each Other — 1. By Grantor against Grantee in Absolute Deed — a. Possession Usually Not Adverse — (I) Statement of Rule. By the execution and delivery of a deed of land the entire legal interest in the premises vests in the grantee, and if the grantor continues in possession afterward his possession will be that either of tenant or trustee of the grantee. He will be regarded as holding the premises in subserviency to the grantee, and nothing short of an explicit disclaimer of such relation and a notorious assertion of right in himself will be sufficient to change the character of his possession and render it adverse to the grantee.[2]

Evidence to show claim.— The fact that one, after receiving a deed of a farm, occupies it all the time up to an existing fence which is beyond the true boundary line, is not enough to show that his possession of the intervening strip is adverse, since it will be presumed that he entered under his deed claiming only the title and possession which it gave him. Fuller v. Worth, 91 Wis. 406, 64 N. W. 995. (II) Reason for Rule. Where a grantor executes and delivers a deed of conveyance to go upon record he says to the world, "Though I am yet in the possession of the premises conveyed, it is for a temporary purpose without claim of right and merely as a tenant at sufferance of my grantee."[3]

b. Capacity of Grantor to Hold Adversely. While, as stated in a preceding section,[4] the continued possession of land by the grantor thereof after execution of a deed is presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, to be in subordination to the title of the grantee, it is none the less true that the conveyance does not of itself prevent the grantor from acquiring title by adverse possession against his grantee.[5] There is nothing in the relation of vendor and vendee by deed executed and not executory which will prevent the vendor who may remain in possession, or who may afterward take possession, from claiming adversely to the vendee and relying on the statute of limitations.[6] The covenant of warranty contained in the deed will not defeat title by limitations acquired after the deed. Such title is no breach of the covenant, which cannot be extended to cover future laches of the grantee whereby he loses the title conveyed to him.[7]

c. Under What Circumstances Possession Becomes Adverse. From the time when the grantor explicitly disclaims holding for the grantee and openly asserts his title to the premises in hostility to the title claimed under his own previous deed his possession becomes adverse;[8] and this is true although he knows his

Putting third person in possession.— Where one who has given a warranty deed of land afterward puts a third person into possession of the land, he may be presumed to have acted in so doing as the agent of the grantee, and such possession will enure to the benefit of the grantee. Rule applicable to heirs of grantor.— Where G, the owner of land, sold it to B, and after the sale remained in possession until his death, it was held that no title passed to G's heirs, but that they were mere possessors without title and could not plead the statute of limitations. Acts held to amount to an adverse holding. — Subsequent reëntry by the grantor, making leases, paying taxes, and improving the property, constitute an adverse holding by the grantor. Waltemeyer v. Baughman, 63 Md. 200; Watson v. Gregg, 10 Watts (Pa.) 289, 36 Am. Dec. 176. Leasing the property to a third person, disavowing the sale, and entry and occupation by the lessee, amount to an

title to be bad.[9] Nor is it essential to the acquisition of title by the grantor against his grantee that there should be an intervening paper title.[10] Any claim of title actually made known to the grantee will satisfy the requirement as to disclaimer.[11]

2. By Grantor against Grantee in Deed Reserving Right to Manage Property. Where, under a deed of land reserving to the grantor the right to manage the land and make such changes or improvements on the buildings as he chose, so that he did not deprive the grantee of a home, the grantor remained on the land putting up buildings and collecting rents, a portion of which he paid to the grantee, who also resided on the premises, his possession was held to be not adverse to the grantee.[12]

3. By Grantee in Absolute Deed against Grantor. Where the purchaser is in possession under a deed purporting to convey an absolute title to the land, he will be considered as holding adversely to the grantor and all other persons whatsoever;[13] and a reservation in a grant in fee of a small quit-rent does not prevent adverse holding. Pipher v. Lodge, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 310. Where the grantee's heirs leave the land, and the grantor places a tenant on it and proves possession continuous for the statutory period, it is erroneous to charge that the putting out of the tenant was not an ouster unless the grantor intended to commit an ouster. Pipher v. Lodge, 4 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 310. If grantees accept a deed of correction from their grantor, conveying land different from that conveyed to them by a prior deed misdescribing the land intended to be conveyed, and sell the land conveyed to them by the deed of correction, the fact that the original grantor does not remit to them all of the purchase-money received by him from their grantee does not affect their election to take the land conveyed to them by the deed of correction, nor does it affect the original grantor's adverse possession of the land described in the prior deed containing the misdescription. Fox v. Windes, 127 Mo. 502, 30 S. W. 323, 48 Am. St. Rep. 648. Remaining in possession for the statutory period, openly claiming the land as his own, will also vest title by adverse possession in the grantor. Meeks v. Garner, 93 Ala. 17, 8 So. 378, 11 L. R. A. 196.

Acts held not to amount to an adverse holding.— The mere fact that the grantor continues in possession, holding and enjoying the property in the same manner as before the conveyance, does not bind his grantee with notice of adverse claim. The fact that the grantor remains in possession, and purchases and records outstanding tax-titles, does not of itself amount to the assertion of a hostile title. Paldi v. Paldi, 84 Mich. 346, 47 N. The owner of two adjoining messuages fronting on a street on the east conveyed the southerly of the two, in 1703, by a deed in which he reserved free liberty of ingress and egress through a gate and passageway about five feet wide, leading from the street into the yard of the said messuage, for the purpose of carrying wood or other material in case such carrying did not annoy or injure the grantee or his heirs or assigns. It was held that though the owner of the northerly messuage had enjoyed the passageway for a period sufficient to gain a prescriptive title, such use having been consonant with the deed, the easement would be deemed to have been under, and not adverse to, the reservation. the grantee from claiming title against the world.[14] If, however, the grantee sues and recovers back his purchase-money because of a want of title in the grantor, he cannot set up adverse possession based on his purchase against the holder of the true title.[15]

4. By Grantee against Grantor in Deed Excepting Part of Tract. The grantee, by accepting a deed containing an exception of certain lands previously sold and conveyed to another, and then entering into the possession of the land thus excepted, will be deemed in law to have entered in subserviency to the title of the grantee of the excepted land, and to continue to hold in subserviency thereto unless he can establish the contrary by some unequivocal act or claim of title in himself;[16] but a possession of the land reserved, with an open and notorious claim of title, will be adverse.[17]

5. By Subsequent against Prior Grantee under Absolute Deed. Where a grantor, while in possession, executes a second conveyance of the premises, the possession of the second grantee will not be presumed to be adverse to the first grantee without proof of ouster or some unequivocal act amounting to an open denial of his title.[18] If, however, the second grantee enters and holds the land for the statutory period, claiming title in himself, the rights of the prior grantee are barred.[19]

Delay in giving deed.— If one agrees to buy and another to sell land, and no consideration is paid or deed given, and the buyer enters into possession, the fair inference is that the entry and possession are not adverse and a disseizin, but by consent of the owner and in subordination to his title until payment is made and a deed given. But if, on such agreement, the consideration is paid and the owner consents that the buyer may own and hold the land as his own, and the delay in giving a deed is by accident or mistake, or because a deed cannot be immediately procured, and the owner agrees to give a deed without further consideration or condition, and the buyer thereupon enters into possession, such entry and possession are not to be deemed subordinate to the title of the owner, but as adverse and a disseizin. Brown v. King, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 173.

Mistake as to location.— Where the purchaser of a tract of land, through mistake or fraud, enters upon another tract of the same grantor, the entry is under a claim of title assumed to have been derived from the grantor and is in subordination to the grantor's title. Farish v. Coon, 40 Cal. 33.

Undisclosed outstanding leases.— A person who takes a warranty deed and relies on the record title, not knowing of an outstanding life-lease in the grantor, may hold adversely as against such grantor. Case v. Green, 53 Mich. 615, 19 N. W. 554.

W. 579. Compare Smith v. Osage, 80 Iowa 84, 45 N. W. 404, 8 L. R. A. 632, in which it was held that where a conveyance of land was not acknowledged, and the grantor, having remained in possession for several years, executed a new deed in proper form to another and gave him possession, he held adversely to the title of the first grantee.

Acquiescence of prior grantee in second conveyance.— While, strictly speaking, a grantor who has conveyed all his interest in lands cannot make a second grant, yet for many practical purposes he may do so, as where a grantee encourages and acquiesces in a second grant by his grantor, under which the second purchaser takes possession and holds adversely to the former grant, in which case his grant will ripen into title. Burkhalter v. Edwards, 16 Ga. 593, 60 Am. Dec. 744.

19. Reynolds v. Cathens, 50 N. C. 437.

6. By Grantees in Conditional Deeds against Each Other. Where different parties claim the same premises under conflicting grants from the same source, each grant being on condition that the grantee is the true owner of the adjacent lands, possession under such grant by one who is not the true owner of the adjacent land cannot be deemed adverse so as to ripen into title against the owner.[20]

7. By Grantees against Creditors of Grantor. The possession of the grantee, it has been held, cannot in any event be considered adverse to the grantor's creditors before they have acquired a right of entry by levy of execution on the land under a judgment procured against the grantor;[21] nor can a possession not brought home to the notice of the creditors be adverse to them.[22] Although there is authority seemingly to the effect that (as to fraudulent conveyances at least) the act of limitations commences to run from the time the grantee obtains possession of the property, and not from the time judgment was obtained by the creditor,[23] it has been held that though a conveyance be in fraud of creditors the grantee therein may nevertheless acquire title by adverse possession;[24] but where the contract of purchase of land is fraudulent and voidable by the judgment creditors of the vendor, the possession of the land by the purchaser is not adverse to the vendor, but in trust for him.[25]

8. By Dedicator against Dedicatee. The rule applicable to grantors, generally, who remain in possession after execution of a conveyance, apply to persons who have dedicated property.[26]

9. By Donee against Donor. A donee who holds possession of land claiming title under a deed of gift for the statutory period acquires title by adverse possession.[27] But if one enters upon land by the owner's mere permission, expecting merely that the owner will give it to him, such permission and entry under it will not constitute a hostile holding.[28] So possession under a parol gift without claim of right by the donee cannot be considered adverse.[29]

On the other hand, possession of land by a donee under a mere parol gift, accompanied with a claim of right, is adverse as against the donor, and if continued without interruption for the statutory period is protected by the statute of limitations and matures into a good title.[30] That such a parol gift conveys no

And see Doe v. Murray, 15 N. Brunsw. 375, in which it was held that where one person gives bond to another by parol and puts him in possession, the donee is in under the donor, and, as the title does not pass by such a gift, the donee is in possession simply by permission of the donor, and consequently, in contemplation of law, a tenant at will.— the possession of the donee being that of the donor.

title, and only operates as a mere tenancy at will capable of revocation or disaffirmance by the donor at any time before the bar is complete, is immaterial; it is evidence of the beginning of an adverse possession by the donee which can be repelled only by showing a subsequent recognition of the donor's superior title.[31]

Application of rule.— Where a parol gift of land was made by a father-in-law to his son-in-law, who entered, made valuable improvements, continued in possession for more than seven years during the life of his father-in-law, claiming the land as his own, and then conveyed it to a purchaser for value, the legal representative of the father-in-law cannot, in an action brought more than thirty years after the gift, recover the land from one possessing under title derived from the son-in-law through successive vendees. Statutory provisions as affecting rule.— A statute which provides that "no estate of inheritance or freehold, for a term of more than one year, in lands or tenements, shall be conveyed from one to another, unless the conveyance be declared by writing, signed and delivered," does not prevent one from entering and claiming under a parol gift and acquiring title by adverse possession. Clarke v. McClure, 10 Gratt. (Va.) 305.

Materiality of understanding of donee.— In determining the character of the possession of one claiming by gift, the question is not so much what was intended by the donor as what was the donee's understanding, what he claimed and did; and if it be found that he believed the gift to be absolute, and went into possession under that belief and held adversely for the statutory period, the verdict must be for him. The intestate and A verbally made an exchange of lands, whereby A was to have the demanded premises if he paid the difference in value between them and the land for which they were exchanged. A went into possession of the premises under the contract, and occupied them for more than fifteen years, claiming no title thereto except by virtue of the contract, and had them set to him in the list, and paid the taxes thereon. A never paid the difference, and no deeds of the lands were ever executed, and finally A surrendered the premises to the intestate and retook possession of the land he let him have. It was held that A acquired no title to the premises by possession, and that after such surrender he had no interest therein which could be taken on a debt existing before the surrender. Rule in Iowa.— A statute of Iowa provides that in cases where the vendor of real estate has given a bond or other writing to convey the same on payment of the purchase-money, and such money or any part of it remains un-until payment or performance of all the conditions by the vendee,[34] or until the vendor has distinctly and unequivocally repudiated the title of his vendor,[35] which repudiation is brought expressly or by legal implication to the vendor's knowledge.[36] There are also a number of decisions in which it is held that a party entering into possession under an agreement to purchase cannot dispute the title of him under whom he enters until after a surrender of the possession.[37]

(II) Reason for Rule. The reason of the rule forbidding a person who has gone into possession under a contract to purchase, to dispute the title of his vendor, is believed to be the same as in cases of landlord and tenant; namely, the injustice of allowing a person who has obtained possession by admitting title of paid after the day fixed for payment, whether time is or is not of the essence of the contract, the vendor may file his petition asking the court to require the purchaser to perform his contract or to foreclose and sell his interest in the property. The vendee shall in such cases, for the purpose of the foreclosure, be treated as a mortgagor of the property purchased, and his rights may be foreclosed in a similar manner. Under this statute it has been held that possession of a vendee under bond of title is, contrary to the rule which obtains in most states, adverse to that of the vendor. another to enjoy that title and, in case of failure in proof of it, hold the premises himself.[38]

b. Parol Contracts. The possession of a vendee holding under a parol executory contract of purchase is not adverse to that of his vendor until he has performed the conditions thereof or repudiated the latter's title.[39]

c. Capacity of Vendee to Acquire Title by Adverse Possession. The possession of one who enters under a contract of purchase may become so far adverse that he will acquire title by limitation.[40]

d. Under What Circumstances Possession of Vendee Adverse — (I) Repudiation of Vendor's Title Brought to His Notice. The possession of one entering under an executory contract of purchase becomes adverse where he repudiates the title of his vendor, and he may acquire title by adverse possession by occupying the land for the statutory period after such repudiation.[41] The repudiation, however, must be manifested by explicit and unequivocal acts brought home to the vendor's knowledge.[42]

(II) Effect of Payment or Performance. While the law seems to be otherwise in some states,[43] the decided weight of authority is to the effect that a Gamble v. Hamilton, 31 Fla. 401, 12 So. 229.

What amounts to adverse possession by vendor.— A mere recovery of judgment by the vendor against the vendee, in ejectment, to enforce a contract of the sale of land, does not render the vendee's possession thereafter adverse so as to set in motion the statute of limitations, no proceedings having been taken to enforce the judgment. The vendor of land sold under articles of agreement must not only in some way repudiate the agreement, but must take actual possession of the premises, either in person or by an agent, a tenant, or another vendee, in order to break the relation his vendee sustains to him under the agreement, before the statute will commence to run. Acts sufficient as a repudiation.—Defendant contracted to purchase land, of which he was in possession, from M, who failed to execute a deed and furnish notes for defendant's execution for the price, as agreed; whereupon defendant requested M's agent to surrender field-notes of a survey which defendant had procured in pursuance of the contract, and notified such agent that he did not believe M had any title to the land. It was held that such acts constituted a repudiation of the contract to convey, and, ten years having expired after such repudiation, defendant was entitled to the land by adverse possession. McManus v. Matthews, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 55 S. W. 589.

Acts held insufficient as a repudiation.—The usual acts of ownership consistent with the possession of a vendee in possession under a contract of purchase are not evidence of an adverse claim of ownership. vendee of land in possession under a contract of sale by parol or in writing holds adversely to his vendor from the moment of payment or performance of the conditions of the contract;[44] and if this possession is continued for the statutory period the purchaser acquires title by the statute of limitations.[45]

Fiduciary character of possession.— It has been said that where the vendee has performed all his obligations the vendor's subsequent possession or interest in the land is held in trust and in subordination to the superior equitable right of the vendee, and that this possession continues to maintain its fiduciary character until the vendor manifests an intention to refuse performance or to claim and enjoy the land as his own. Illustrations of rule.— A died intestate, seized of certain lands, leaving four minor heirs and his widow. During the minority of the heirs defendant entered upon the land, and at the time took a bond from the widow, who was administratrix of A's estate, conditioned that the heirs of A should, in a reasonable time after they had arrived at majority, convey their interest in the land to B. The price agreed to be paid for the land was paid by B, and subsequently two of the heirs conveyed their interest to B. B continued in possession for more than fifteen years, and more than five years after all the heirs had arrived at full age, holding out against all persons and taking the rents and profits to himself, and, at the end of fifteen years, had demanded of the obligor a fulfilment of the condition of her bond. In an action of disseizin brought by the two heirs of A who had not conveyed their interest to B, it was held that the possession of B was an adverse one, and that it had vested in him the legal title to the land. Bryan v. Atwater, 5 Day (Conn.) 181, 5 Am. Dec. 136.

Payment at inception of contract.— If, on an agreement to sell lands, the consideration is paid and the owner consents that the buyer may have and hold the land as his own, such entry and possession cannot be deemed subordinate to the title of the seller, but is adverse and a disseizin, and, if continued for the statutory period, will ripen into title. Adams v. Fullam, 43 Vt. 592.

tory contract, with assertion of title in himself, is adverse;[48] and this, it seems, is true although the purchase-price has not been paid.[49]

11. By Purchaser from Vendee in Executory Contract of Purchase against Vendor. According to the weight of authority, the possession of a purchaser from a vendee on an executory contract is on the same footing as that of the original vendee. Such possession cannot, as a basis of prescription, be upon any higher or better footing than the possession of the original vendee himself.[50] There are, however, decisions to the effect that possession under a conveyance from an executory purchaser, though no title thereby is acquired, is adverse to that of the original vendor, and, if continued for the statutory period, will ripen into a title which will defeat or sustain an action of ejectment.[51]

12. By Widow of Vendee in Executory Contract of Purchase against Vendor. The widow of a vendee in an executory contract, who continues possession after his death, stands upon the same footing with regard to the vendor as her husband did.[52]

13. By Vendee in Executory Contract of Purchase against Persons Other than Vendor. One entering under an executory contract of purchase may, and generally does, hold adversely as against all persons except his vendor.[53]

14. By Vendee in Deed Reserving Lien for Purchase-Money against Vendor. 15. By Vendor in Executory Contract of Purchase against Vendee. Where a vendor of land has given a bond for title, or has agreed in writing to make a conveyance, he is in effect the trustee of the legal title for the vendee,[58] and the statute does not begin to run against the vendee until the vendor has done some acts showing an intention of holding the land adversely to the vendee.[59]

16. By Parent against Child. Where a parent is in possession of real estate which he admits belongs to his child, he cannot acquire title thereto by adverse possession,[60] so, if he is a tenant in common with his children, for some of whom he is guardian, he cannot make out a case of adverse holding without showing either that he held solely for himself and adversely to the others or that they knew of such claim and holding.[61] If the father takes possession of land deeded to his child and conceals the fact, though it has been so deeded, possession, however long held, cannot give title, since his possession commences in fraud.[62]

17. By Child against Parent. Where a child enters by consent of the parent, looking to the parent for title, the possession is not adverse[63] in the absence of some act or declaration indicating an intention to claim adversely.[64] So, where a child enters into the possession of land under a parol gift from his father, his possession, however long continued, does not become adverse until asserted so notoriously as to raise the presumption of notice to his father.[65] There is, however, no doubt that a child may hold adversely to the parent.[66]

Specific facts held not to show adverse possession by child.— Where the person claiming title to land, yet not residing on it, frequently visited her son, who did live there, and there was constant communication between them, it was held that the son's possession was not adverse. Dunham v. Townshend, 118 N. Y. 281, 23 N. E. 367. So it has been held that the declarations of a boy nine years old, living in the family of his father, to the effect that the land occupied by the family belonged to him, are not admissible to show his adverse possession to the land as against his father. Douglas v. Irvine, 126 Pa. St. 643, 17 Atl. 802. Where a father was insane, and one of his sons who had lived at his house returned and took charge of his farm, with the acquiescence of the mother and the rest of the family, for several years and until the father's death, it was held that the father continued seized while he lived, and that the taking of the profits of the farm by the son must be considered for the use and benefit of the

18. By Guardian against Ward. The possession, by a guardian, of property of the ward, either real or personal, is not adverse[67] in the absence of a distinct and unequivocal repudiation of the latter's title.[68] Where one who has entered into possession of property as agent for the owner, and after such owner's death has been appointed guardian of his children and continues to hold the property, his possession is that of his wards and is adverse to any others claiming to be children and heirs of the decedent, and the owner's death and appointment as guardian are sufficient notice to such claimants that the agency is terminated and that his holding is adverse to them.[69]

19. By Widow against Heirs — a. Possession of both guardian and ward.— If the infant and guardian are both in possession of the land, the guardian's possession is not adverse to that of the infant, because, in case of the common possession by two persons, the ownership draws to it the possession and it is presumed to be in him who has the title. Gaylord v. Respass, 92 N. C. 553.

Application of rule.— The mere entry by a widow into lands of her deceased husband, claiming it and taking the rents and profits for twenty-one years, is no disseizin of the heirs at law. To make it such there must be some plain, decisive, unequivocal act or conduct on the widow's part amounting to disseizin of the heirs. Hall v. Mathias, 4 Watts & S. (Pa.) 331.

Changing character of possession by partition.— Where a surviving wife has a life-estate in her husband's homestead, the character of her possession may be changed by a parol partition to which she and the heirs of the husband agree, so as to make her possession adverse. Whittemore v. Cope, 11 Utah 344, 40 Pac. 256.

Special statutory provisions as affecting rule.— Under a statute which makes seven session of the widow cannot in any case be adverse to that of the heirs.[71] The weight of authority, however, seems to recognize the doctrine that if the widow's possession is under an open and notorious claim of right in herself it amounts to a disseizin of the heirs, and title may be acquired by her by adverse possession.[72] Nevertheless, within this rule, to make her holding adverse, it is essential that there should be some plain, decisive, unequivocal act or conduct on the part of the widow amounting to an open denial of the rights of the heirs and putting them out of possession.[73] It has been held, however, that actual direct notice of a hostile claim to land by a widow is not necessary to set in motion the statute of limitations.[74]

(II) EXTENT OF RULE. Where the widow continues to live upon the land with her infant children, the heirs at law, or enters and takes possession, after her husband's decease, with the infant heirs, she is presumed to hold for her own benefit in reference to her dower only, and for the infant heirs as their natural guardian,[75] and the possession of a decedent's land by his widow and child is not adverse to his children by a former marriage.[76] The character of her possession is not changed by her subsequent removal from and lease of the premises,[77] and if

years' payment of taxes, with color of title and possession, constitute good title, the possession, under her right of quarantine, of the widow of one who had color of title, and her payment of taxes during her possession, enure in favor of the heirs of the deceased, since her relation to them is substantially that of tenant. Riggs v. Girard, 133 Ill. 619, 24 N. E. 1031.

Widow's possession against children of first wife.— Testator, having been twice married, and leaving surviving him children by both wives, left a will devising his farm to his second wife during her life, with remainder to her children begotten by him, there being no other mention of his children in the will. It was held that the possession of the widow, whether she be regarded as tenant of the homestead or in possession under her right of quarantine or under the will, was not adverse to the children of the first wife, and the statute of limitations would not begin to run as to them prior to her death. Other facts which do not affect the general rule.— The general rule that the widow's possession is not adverse to the heirs is not affected by the fact that she compromises an outstanding adverse claim to the land and takes a deed therefor in her own name, paying for it with money obtained from her father's estate, although she had money left her by her husband (Scott v. Proctor, (Ky. 1890) 13 S. W. 790), or by the fact that she procures a tax-deed from the state to the property, the land having been sold for taxes prior to the sale to her husband (Richards v. Richards, 75 Mich. 408, 42 N. W. 954), or by the fact that she purchases lands of the estate at a judicial sale, with funds in her hands as administratrix, for which she never accounts. In such case she holds in trust for the heirs, in the absence of evidence that the estate was indebted to her, especially where she retains possession during her life and does not account for the price of part of the land sold by her (Clayton v. Clayton, (Ky. 1889) 12 S. W. 312).

Lands conveyed to widow, but inventoried as property of the estate.— Where, after the death of one who conveyed lands as security for a loan, his widow paid the debt and had the lands conveyed to herself, but inventoried them as those of deceased, she having a dower and homestead right therein and occupying them as a homestead together with the sole heir, her possession is not adverse as against him. she marries again the possession of herself and husband will be for the heirs as well as for themselves,[78] unless the circumstances attending the possession amount to an actual ouster of the heirs and in fact exclude them from the land.[79] If the widow continues in possession of land adversely held by her husband under an understanding with her children that she should hold for life, she cannot claim title by adverse possession as against the children,[80] and although she remains in possession for a length of time sufficient to acquire title by adverse possession, declarations that the husband had devised the lands to the widow during her widowhood negative any decisive claim or intention to claim by the statute of limitations.[81] It has, however, been held that where the wife holds the land of which the husband is seized for more than the statutory period after his death, under claim of absolute title to the whole, the claims of the heirs are barred.[82]

b. After Assignment of Dower. It has been held that where dower is assigned, and the widow goes into possession, she cannot acquire any right against the heir by the statute of limitations, at least without some open, positive change of possession, accompanied with some manifestations of an unequivocal purpose to hold adversely to the heir, such as would have subjected the party coming in under such change of possession to an action at the instance of the heir.[83]

20. By Grantee of Widow against Heirs. The possession of the grantee of a widow before assignment of dower is not, as a general rule, adverse to the heirs.[84] It has been held that where the widow marries again and joins with her husband in conveying the entire premises to a stranger, who places the deed on record and takes possession, the possession becomes adverse to the heirs, and, if continued for twenty-one years, would bar their right to entry.[85]

21. By Heirs against Widow. Where, during the time she remained single the widow resided in a house on the land, but at first a half and subsequently a larger portion of the premises were cultivated for the heirs, all parties being ignorant of the widow's homestead rights, the heirs did not hold such adverse possession as would start the statute of limitations running against the widow's homestead title.[86] So it has been held that three years' adverse possession of a homestead by one holding for the children of a deceased intestate owner will not bar the right of the widow to her life-interest of one third.[87]

22. By Widow against Mortgagees or Creditors of Husband. If the decedent's land is admittedly subject to a lien, the continued possession of the widow is in subordination thereto in the absence of an express disclaimer and an express

Possession of second husband after widow's abandonment of premises.— A widow was authorized by the will of her deceased husband to continue the possession of the land eleven years after his death. She married again within nine months, resided upon the property about one year, and then left the possession; but her second husband and those claiming under him occupied it for thirty-five years, some twenty-five years after the right of entry by the owner accrued. It was held that the possession of the second husband was in privity with the estate of the owner, and that nothing short of an open and explicit disavowal of a holding under that title, and an assertion of title in himself, brought home to the owner's notice, would make his possession adverse. hostile occupancy with the claimant's knowledge,[88] and it has been held that the widow's possession of land assigned to her as dower is not adverse to the mortgagee of her husband or to the assignee of the latter;[89] and this is true although she made substantial improvements on the land while in possession.[90]

23. By Widow against Purchaser at Administrator's Sale. The possession of a widow before assignment of dower, and subsequent to an administrator's sale, is not adverse to one who does not get a deed and allows her to remain on the premises, and does not extinguish the title acquired by the purchaser.[91]

24. By Surviving Husband or Grantee against Heirs. Continued possession of the husband after the wife's death as tenant by the curtesy of lands of which she died seized is not adverse to her heirs,[92] and inasmuch as the husband has a legal right to the possession of the wife's land during coverture, which possession is not adverse to the heirs,[93] the possession of a grantee of a tenant by the curtesy under a deed of bargain and sale does not become adverse to the heirs of the wife until the death of such tenant, since the heirs have no right to enter upon the land and no right of action until his death.[94]

25. By Survivor of Community against Heirs. The possession of community property by the survivor of a community qualified as such is not adverse to the heirs of deceased in the absence of notice to them that the survivor is claiming adversely,[95] and occupancy by the widow and her children without repudiating the title of his children by a former wife will not sustain a plea of the statute of limitations where such homestead was community property of the first marriage.[96]

Effect of execution of deed by wife to husband.— Where a husband and wife reside on land after the execution of a void deed thereof by the wife to the husband, the possession of the husband, and persons claiming under him, after the death of the wife, is adverse to the wife's heirs. Extent of the rule.—The continuance of the possession commenced under such circumstances after the wife's death, though the right then ceased because of want of issue, will not be deemed adverse. The presumption is that he remains in possession under the heirs. There must be evidence to show that he continued the possession adversely, aside from the occupation itself. mony manifesting the actual character of his holding, the possession of the judgment debtor is regarded as consistent with the title of the purchaser,[99] and where the purchaser has paid the price in full, the rule applies although he has not been given a deed.[1] Nevertheless the possession of the judgment debtor may be adverse to that of the purchaser at a sale under the judgment or decree, where he claims title in himself openly and notoriously, and possession thus continued for the statutory period will ripen into a title by adverse possession.[2]

28. By Judgment Defendant against Plaintiff after Decree Quieting Title. Where a defendant in a suit to quiet title remains in possession or assumes possession after a decree adverse to him and vesting title in another, his possession is presumed to be in subordination to the true owner and does not become adverse without express notice of his adverse claim brought home to said owner.[3]

Attornment to third person.— Where the owner of land sold for taxes remained in possession after the issuance of the tax-deed, and, after the sale on execution subsequently issued against his interest in the land, continued in possession, the character of his occupancy was not rendered adverse to the tax-sale purchaser by attornment to some other person without notice to such purchaser. Swift v. Agnes, 33 Wis. 228.

Deed subsequently ratified.—Commissioners appointed by an interlocutory decree to sell lands, but not authorized to make a deed, sold the lands and also made a deed to the purchaser, the original owner and his heirs remaining in possession. Several years later the commissioners made a report of the proceedings, which the court confirmed by final decree, thus rendering it valid. It was held that the possession of the original owner was not adverse to the purchaser, because the decree of the court was essential to the validity of the deed, and in the meantime the owner held subject to the order of the court under such title, and not adversely thereto. Evan v. Spurgin, 6 Gratt. (Va.) 107, 52 Am. Dec. 105.

33. By Heirs against Trust Created by Ancestor. Persons who go into possession of lands as heirs of their ancestor are bound by a secret trust attached to their ancestor's deed, and cannot claim title by adverse possession.[8]

34. By Agent against Principal. Where one enters into possession of land as agent, his possession is that of his principal and does not become adverse[9] until a disclaimer of the principal's title and the assertion of a hostile claim.[10] Where the entry is originally in a fiduciary character there must be some decisive act or declaration to render the possession adverse.[11]

What amounts to adverse title by agent.— It has been held that a public claim by an agent to hold in his own right, selling parts of the land by conveyances and delivery during twenty years, amount to presumptive notice of an adverse holding. Farrow v. Edmundson, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 605, 41 Am. Dec. 250.

What does not amount to adverse possession by agent.— Where an agent employed by the owners of land to pay the taxes thereon procures, from the purchaser at a treasurer's sale, a conveyance in his own name, but professedly for the owners, the latter are not barred by the statute of limitations. Huzzard v. Trego, 35 Pa. St. 9. Applications of rule.— Where a person devises a life-estate in his homestead to his wife, and remainder to other devisees, the statute does not begin to run against the latter until the widow's death. Haby v. Fuos, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 25 S. W. 1121. So, if the land is covered by assigned dower, possession cannot be adverse to him, and the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the remainder-man until the termination of the dower estate; but seven years' adverse possession after the latter date bars the remainder-man. Burns v. Headerick, 85 Tenn. 102, 2 S. W. 259. Where an administrator, under a license from the probate court, conveyed land to defendant's grantor, and the widow, to whom the land had been assigned as dower, joined in the deed to convey and release her dower, defendant will not, during the life of the widow, be regarded as holding adversely to the reversioners. Poor v. Larrabee, 58 Me. 543.

By life-tenant against contingent remainder-man.— Until the death of the life-tenant the statute does not begin to run, in favor of the life-tenant or his grantee, against the remainder-man, whether the estate in remainder be vested or contingent, legal or equitable. Lamar v. Pearre, 82 Ga. 354, 9 S. E. 1043; Augusta v. Radcliffe, 66 Ga. 469. But compare Gindrat v. Alabama Western R. Co., 96 Ala. 162, 11 So. 372, 19 L. R. A. 839.

"All statutes of limitation are based on the theory of laches, and no laches can be imputed to one who has no remedy or right of action: and to hold the bar of the statute could run against the title of a person so circumstanced would be subversive of justice and would be to deprive such person of his estate without his day in court." Mettler v. Miller, 129 Ill. 630, 642, 22 N. E. 529.

The possession of the tenant for life, or his vendee, during the continuance of the life-tenancy, is, in contemplation of law, the possession of the remainder-man or reversioner. Mettler v. Miller, 129 Ill. 630, 22 N. E. 529; Clark v. Parsons, 69 N. H. 147, 39 Atl. 896.

Surrender or release.— Thus a tenant for life cannot debar the rights of a remainder-man by a surrender or a release, or by any other voluntary acts for merging the lesser estate into the greater. Moore v. Luce, 29 Pa. St. 260, 72 Am. Dec. 629.

Purchase of outstanding claim.— A tenant

36. By Grantee of Life-Tenant against Remainder-Man or Reversioner. The possession of the grantee of a tenant for life does not become adverse to the remainder-man or reversioner until after the death of the life-tenant; and this is true whether the deed purports to convey only the interest which the life-tenant possesses or the title in fee simple to the premises.[15]

37. By Tenant and Persons Holding under Him against Landlord — a. During the Existence of the Lease — (1) When Tenant's Possession That of Landlord — (A) Statement of Rule. The general rule is well settled that a tenant cannot dispute the title of his landlord by setting up title either in himself or in a third person during the existence of the lease or tenancy.[16] While the decisions for life in possession, who purchases an encumbrance on or an adverse title to the estate, will be regarded as having made the purchase for the joint benefit of himself and the reversioner or remainder-man. The law will not permit him to hold it for his own exclusive benefit if the reversioner or remainder-man will contribute the share that is unpaid. Varney v. Stevens, 22 Me. 321. So, if he buys in the lands under a trust deed made by a former owner, his purchase will enure to the benefit of the remainder-men. are far from harmonious as to what acts will initiate an adverse possession by the tenant, it is at least well settled that there can be no adverse possession by the tenant until one of the following acts has occurred: surrender of the premises to the landlord,[17] actual, open, and notorious disclaimer of the landlord's title brought to his knowledge,[18] or actual disseizin or ouster of the landlord.[19] The disclaimer and notice thereof must be actual, or so open and notorious as to raise the presumption of notice,[20] and the statute will run only from the time of such knowledge or notice.[21]

(B) Reason for Rule. The principle of estoppel applies to the relation between landlord and tenant and operates with full force to prevent the tenant from violating that contract by which he claimed and held possession. He cannot change the tenure by his own act merely, so as to enable himself to hold against the landlord, who reposes under the security of the tenancy believing the possession of the tenant to be his own, held under his title, and ready to be surrendered by its termination by lapse of time or time of possession.[22]

(c) Extent of Rule. The rule which prevents the tenant, or those taking his place, from denying the title of the landlord, is alike applicable whether the right of the landlord be legal or equitable, perfect or imperfect,[23] and if, during the possession, the tenant takes a contract for the purchase of land which is equally an acknowledgment of the landlord's title, and, being unable to perform, surrenders it and agrees to assume his footing as a tenant, no adverse possession can commence while that possession continues.[24] The rule, however, has been held to apply only where the conventional relation of landlord and tenant exists.[25]

(II) Capacity of Tenant to Hold Adversely. While a tenant is estopped to deny the title of the landlord, as when the relation exists and is recognized between them, he may repudiate the relation and set up an adverse claim and possession in himself which may ripen into a title under the statute.[26] After termination of the tenancy and surrender of the possession to the landlord the tenant may assert a title paramount against him, and the previous tenancy cannot bar the right of recovery.[27]

(III) When Tenant's Possession Becomes Adverse — (A) Statement of General Rule. In a preceding section it has been shown that, as a general rule, the possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord, and that in the absence of certain acts or declarations on the part of the tenant there can be no adverse holding by him. In this section an attempt will be made to show under what circumstances the possession becomes adverse. There are a number of decisions which hold, or seem to hold, without any qualification, that where a person enters into possession by virtue of a lease he cannot initiate an adverse possession without first surrendering the premises to the landlord.[28] It is believed, however, that the weight of authority is against this position. According to a considerable number of decisions, when the tenant disclaims to hold under the lease, and the landlord has notice of it, the tenant's possession is adverse, and the statute will run from the time when the landlord has notice;[29] and this notice, it seems,

It has been said with obvious truth that if the rule were otherwise no person would be safe in parting with the possession, as he might be driven to the necessity of making a complete chain of title before he could evict his tenant (Anderson v. Darby, 1 Nott & M. (S. C.) 369); and that a title, though perfectly good and indefeasible, could frequently be rendered practically worthless if tenants or third persons prevailing upon them to let them into possession were permitted to call his title in question and make him show that it was better than any other to the land before they could be compelled to surrender the possession of it to him (Cooper v. Smith, 8 Watts (Pa.) 536).

Presumption as to tenant's possession.— Where, after a contract of tenancy, the landlord sues the tenant in possession claiming the land, and after an absence of nine years returns and finds him still in possession, it will be presumed that the possession of the tenant under the landlord was continuous during all that time. need not be actual or express. It will probably be sufficient if the disclaimer of the tenant is so open and notorious as to raise the presumption of notice.[30] Surrender of the premises is not necessary when the landlord has notice of disclaimer.[31]

(B) Demand of Possession and Refusal to Surrender. The demand of possession by the landlord, and a refusal by the tenant to surrender on the ground that he claims title in himself, is evidence of actual ouster.[32]

(C) Non-Payment of Rent. The mere non-payment of rent by the tenant, and failure of the landlord to demand it, even though for a considerable period of time, raises no presumption of adverse holding by the tenant.[33]

b. By Tenant Holding Over. The possession of a tenant holding over after the expiration of the term is considered the possession of the landlord, and not adverse to him,[34] for, being once in by a lawful title, the law, which presumes no wrong in any man, will suppose him to continue upon a title equally good;[35] nor can the possession become adverse unless the possession is first surrendered[36] or the tenant has given notice of his adverse claim.[37] The status of a tenant holding over after the expiration of his term has been likened to that of a tenant at sufferance[38] or a tenant from year to year.[39]

c. By Persons Holding under Tenant — (I) Statement of Rule. Not only is the tenant precluded from relying on his possession to bar his landlord, but also all persons who come in under or derive possession from him in any manner, however remotely. In such cases possession is presumed to be in accordance with the title,[40] and this presumption will hold until some notorious and unequivocal act of exclusion shall have occurred.[41]

(II) Applications of Rule. This doctrine has been held to apply in the case of grantees of the tenant in fee,[42] and that, too, though the grantee takes the deed in ignorance of the fact that his grantor stood in the relation of tenant, the latter denying any such relation.[43] So it applies to sublessees of the tenant,[44] to assignees of the lease,[45] to heirs of the tenant,[46] or to the wife of the tenant living with him on the premises,[47] or to the widow of the tenant.[48]

d. By Holder under Tax-Lease against Owner. Possession under a tax-lease is not, during the lease, adverse to the owner in fee.[49] During the continuance of the lease the lessee cannot sustain a claim to any higher title than that of lessee for a term of years,[50] and it is immaterial that the lease was void for irregularity in the tax proceeding.[51]

38. By Trustee or Those Holding under Him against Cestui Que Trust — a. The relation of privity between the parties is such that the possession of one is the possession of the other, and there can be no adverse claim or possession

Possession of husband as trustee for wife.— Possession of land by a grantee as trustee for the use and benefit of his wife so long as it continues to be held under the deed is not adverse to her even after he has obtained a divorce. Possession for sole corporation.— A sole corporation consisting of a Roman Catholic archbishop cannot acquire title by adverse possession of land of which the legal title is vested in him as a private individual, though held in trust for the sole corporation. Possession by him must be referred to the legal title. Roman Catholic Archbishop v. Shipman, 79 Cal. 288, 21 Pac. 830.

Administrator and next of kin.—Mere lapse of time is not a bar to a direct trust as between trustee and beneficiary. Hence, an administrator, being a trustee, cannot set up the statute and bar the next of kin or person entitled to distribution of assets. Decouche v. Savetier, 3 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 190, 8 Am. Purchase of outstanding title by trustee.— One in possession of lands as trustee cannot buy in an outstanding title or purchase the land for taxes and set up the title thus acquired to defeat the title of the cestui que trust in equity. beneficiary has actual notice of it,[56] or the acts or declarations of the trustee asserting title in himself are so notorious and unequivocal as to raise a presumption of notice to the beneficiary.[57] Notice, or some act of such notoriety that it would be presumed to be known to the cestui que trust, should be proved before the relationship would be disavowed and the statute of limitations commence to run.[58] There are also some decisions in which it is either held or said that the trustee cannot claim adversely to the title under which he enters, without first surrendering the possession,[59] but, as will be shown subsequently the weight of authority is clearly to the contrary.[60]

(II) Under What Circumstances Possession Becomes Adverse— (A) Repudiation of Trust Brought to Beneficiary's Knowledge. While, as already shown, no length of possession by a trustee as such will give him a title as against the beneficiary, the trustee may nevertheless repudiate existing relations and thenceforth hold adversely to the beneficiary.[61] When the trust is repudiated by clear and unequivocal words and acts of the trustee who claims to hold the trust property as his own, and such repudiation and claim are brought to the notice of the beneficiary in such manner that he is called upon to assert his equitable rights,[62] the statute of limitations will begin to run from the time such repudiation and claim came to the knowledge of the beneficiary.[63]

(B) Failure to Perform Duties of Trust. In case of an accepted trust, passiveness or a failure to execute the duties thereby imposed will not set the statute of limitations in operation.[64]

(C) Termination of Trust. Even in the case of a direct trust the statute will begin to run when the trust ends.[65]

b. Where the Trust Is Implied — (I) Introductory Statement. In some decisions the rule is laid down without qualification that express trusts are the only class of trusts which are protected from the operation of the statute of limitations,[66] but there are decisions which place certain classes of implied trusts on the same footing as express trusts so far as the statute of limitations is concerned.[67] At all events the statute of limitations will run in favor of the trustee of a resulting or constructive trust from the time he disavows the obligation of trust and sets up a claim in his own right to the trust property.[68]

(II) Constructive Trusts. As between the trustee and beneficiary of a constructive trust, the statute of limitations begins to run against the enforcement thereof from the date of its inception,[69] unless there has been a fraudulent con-

What does or does not amount to a repudiation.— Acts which done by a stranger might be deemed adverse, when done by a trustee admit of a very different interpretation. Robinson v. Hook, 4 Mason (U. S.) 139, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,956. Payment of taxes and redemption from tax-sale by the trustee, if consistent with his duty, do not tend to show a repudiation of the trust. Warren v. Adams, 19 Colo. 515, 36 Pac. 604. Payment of taxes and a claim of the entire estate do not amount to a repudiation of the trust when not brought home to the beneficiary. Golson v. Fielder, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 400, 21 S. W. 173. Although the actual possession of the trustee, or non-possession of the beneficiary, is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether there has been a repudiation of the trust, or notice thereof to the vendee, yet such possession is not conclusive, and the mere fact that the vendee is out of possession will not set the statute of limitations running. Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 27 Pac. 1082. A trustee under a deed purchased by parol the interest of his daughter, one of the beneficiaries, giving her therefor personal property of which she at once took possession, and he began to claim her interest in the land. Thereafter he sold the land by parol to one who occupied it for two years, using it as his own, and then surrendered it to the father with the daughter's knowledge. He held it thereafter claiming it as his until he sold it. This was held to amount to an open disavowal of the trust and an open and notorious adverse claim which set in motion the statute of limitations. Hall v. Ditto, (Ky. 1890) 12 S. W. 941. In Lemoine v. Dunklin County, 51 Fed. 487, 10 U. S. App. 227, 2 C. C. A. 343, the following facts appeared: A suit was brought in 1888 to compel a county to convey swamp lands to the holder of certificates of purchase issued by the county officers in 1857. The defense was laches. The county court was the proper authority for making the conveyance, but there was no statute requiring demands for deeds to be made a matter of record, and the records of the county had been destroyed in 1872. It was held, for the purpose of showing a repudiation of its relation as trustee holding the legal title for the certificate-owner, that the county was entitled to show by parol evidence that demands for deeds were often made to the county and were continually refused on the ground of fraud.

cealment of the cause of action.[70] No disclaimer or disavowal of the trust by the trustee is necessary.[71]

(III) Resulting Trusts. Some decisions seem to lay down the doctrine without qualification that the statute of limitations runs against resulting trusts as well as any other trust arising by implication of law;[72] but judged by the undoubted weight of authority this view is certainly incorrect.[73] So, where the trust, though a resulting one, is "cognizable solely in equity," the time within which suit must be brought for the enforcement thereof will not begin to run until the trust has been repudiated as in the case of express trusts.[74] The same, it has been held, is the rule in that class of resulting trusts which are created "with the consent of the trustee and cestui que trust."[75] It has also been held that where a trustee purchases property with trust funds, though in his own name, his possession will be deemed the possession of the beneficiaries until he does some unequivocal act denying their right.[76] It has also been said that when

Constructive notice arising out of fraud.— In case of a constructive trust which is born of fraud, and which presupposes from its beginning an adverse claim of right on the part of the trustee by implication, the statute will commence to run from the period at which the cestui que trust could have indicated his right by action or otherwise. Reason assigned for rule.— It has been said that if the rule were otherwise there is scarcely a single case of bailment, or money received to use, or of factorage concerns, or of general account, into whose services the doctrine might not be pressed. Robinson v. Hook, 4 Mason (U. S.) 139, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,956. Such trusts are scarcely admitted or recognized by the parties, and, furthermore, the facts out of which they spring necessarily from their own nature presuppose an adverse claim of right on the part of the trustee. Where a wife furnished money to her husband with which to purchase land for her, and possession of trust property is taken by the trustee under the trust it is the possession of the cestui que trust whether the trust be express or implied, and cannot be adverse until the trust is fully disavowed or denied.[77]

c. By Trustee against Cestui Que Trust in Possession. The statute of limitations never runs in favor of a trustee against the cestui que trust when the latter is in possession of the trust estate; and this is true whether the trust be express or implied.[78]

d. By Grantee of Trustee against Cestui Que Trust. Some decisions lay down the general rule that where the trustee sells or otherwise disposes of the trust property to another person, who holds and uses the property as his own for the period of limitation, his possession is adverse within the meaning of the statute of limitations, and he is entitled to its protection.[79] There are, however, decisions which do not go to the full extent of the rule already stated.[80]

39. By Cestui Que Trust against Trustee. The possession of a cestui que trust, for however long a period, will not, in general, displace the legal title of the trustee, as his holding is not adverse.[81] If, however, there be a formal denial of the claim of the tenancy by the cestui que trust, or dealings with the estate in a manner inconsistent with its subsistence, he may oust the trustee and acquire an adverse possession on which the statute of limitations will operate.[82]

40. By Cestui Que Trust against Co-Beneficiary. The possession of a person who is trustee for two others enures to the benefit of both, and though they claim adversely to each other neither can take advantage of such possession to bar the other's rights;[83] and the possession of one cestui que trust will be deemed the possession of the other one in the absence of manifest hostility on the part of

Extent of this doctrine.— It has been held that this is the rule notwithstanding he may be chargeable in equity as an implied trustee because he took the property with knowledge of the trust. Curtis v. Daniel, 23 Ark. 362; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 50 Pac. 386.

80. These decisions limit the rule to this extent at least, that if the purchaser has knowledge of the trust he becomes so far a trustee for the beneficiary that he cannot set up title to the property by an adverse holding under the statute of limitations, in the absence of notice or knowledge thereof brought home to the beneficiary. 41. By Stranger against Trustee — a. Statement of Rule. A stranger may, by adverse possession against the trustee for the requisite period of time, bar both the legal estate of the trustee and the equitable estate of the cestui que trust. The general rule is well settled that where the estate of the trustee is barred the estate of the cestui que trust is also barred.[85]

b. How Rule Affected by Disability of Beneficiary. With the exception of a few decisions,[86] the rule is held to apply, though the cestui que trust is laboring under some disability. And such disability may be that consequent upon infancy,[87]

Rule in case of constructive trust.— The rule that where the legal title to land held by a trustee is barred by limitations, the equitable interests will also be defeated, though the beneficiary is an infant, applies though the person who holds the land is a constructive trustee by reason of having purchased from the actual trustee with knowledge of his violation of the trust. Accordingly it was held that where S, who held land in trust for P's wife and children, the trust being for the benefit of the wife during her life, remainder to her children, sold and conveyed the land to R, who held it adversely for more than thirty years, the children, though infants, were barred, without regard to the time when the life-estate terminated. c. How Rule Affected by Fact That Beneficiary Is Remainder-Man. So it has been held that the rule applies although the cestui que trust is a remainder-man, and that, too, whether the remainder be a vested[90] or a contingent one.[91]

d. How Rule Affected by Fact That Trustee Is Estopped to Sue. It has been held, however, that the principle that when the trustee is barred all the beneficiaries are barred, whether under disability or not, applies only when the trustee can sue but fails to do so. Thus, if the trustee estops himself from suing by a sale of the property,— thus uniting with the purchaser in a breach of trust,— the wrong is to the beneficiaries and not to him. He cannot sue, and the beneficiaries, if under a disability, are not affected by the statute.[92] is not adverse to the mortgagee and cannot become so as long as that relation continues.[95]

b. Extent of Rule. The general rule that the mortgagor's possession, or that of his grantee, is not adverse to the mortgagee, applies in the case of one who retains possession after giving an absolute deed intended to operate as a mortgage,[96] or after title acquired by another under foreclosure proceedings, whether such other be the mortgagee himself[97] or a third person.[98]

c. Under What Circumstances Possession Becomes Adverse. It is not to be understood, from anything stated in the preceding sections, that the mortgagor is prevented by the relation from holding adversely to the mortgagee; for, like the lessee, tenant in common, or trustee, he may give to his possession such character by some unequivocal act hostile to the title of the mortgagee, and distinctly brought to his knowledge or notice; in such way he may terminate his holding as mortgagor and actually disseize the mortgagee;[99] but in order that the character of the possession may be changed there must be a disclaimer of the mortgagee's rights, brought to his actual knowledge, or the disclaimer and denial must be so open, notorious, and unequivocal that a reasonably prudent man would have derived knowledge therefrom that the mortgagor's possession was adverse to him.[1]

Before the mortgagor can be said to hold adversely to the mortgagee so as to start the running of the statute, an actual as distinguished from a constructive possession is essential. In the absence of actual, visible possession by the mortgagor the rights of the mortgagee will be unaffected by the statute of limitations.[2]

43. By Mortgagee against Mortgagor — a. Under Ordinary Form of Mortgage — (I) Possession Generally Not Adverse. So long as the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee exists, the possession of the mortgagee is not adverse to the mortgagor, and the statute of limitations does not run in his favor.[3] Possession in the mortgagee must, from its commencement, have been taken under the engagement, which equity always implies, to account as a bailiff of the rents and profits to the mortgagor and to apply them to the discharge of the mortgage debt.[4]

(II) Under What Circumstances Possession Becomes Adverse. There is nothing, however, in the relation which will prevent the mortgagee from holding adversely to the mortgagor. He may disclaim the mortgage, and in that event the time of limitation provided by statute for recovery of property at law will begin to run in his favor from the disavowal. If he then holds possession for the statutory time the mortgagor's right to redeem is barred.[5] In no event, however, does the statute of limitations run against the right of the mortgagor to redeem until the mortgagee has actually taken possession.[6]

b. Under Mortgage Giving Mortgagee Possession Till Debt Paid. Where, by the terms of a mortgage, the mortgagee is to take and keep possession of the mortgaged property and apply the rents and profits to his debt until it is fully satisfied from that source, his possession will not become adverse, nor will the statute of limitations commence to run against the mortgagor until the debt secured by the mortgage is satisfied.[7]

44. By One Cotenant against Another — a. Ordinary Status of Possession by One Cotenant. The entry and possession of land under the common title by one cotenant will not be presumed to be adverse to the others, but will ordinarily be held to be for the benefit of all.[8]

While the general rule is as stated, it is well settled that one tenant may hold adversely to his cotenant, and if his possession is continued uninterruptedly for the statutory period he will acquire an indefeasible title;[9] and this is true whether the original entry

c. When Possession Becomes Adverse — (I) In General. It must be borne in mind, however, that stronger evidence is required to show an adverse holding by a tenant in common than by a stranger.[12]

(II) Necessity of Expulsion by Force. To constitute a disseizin of a cotenant it is not necessary that there should be an actual expulsion by manual force.[13]

(III) Necessity of Repudiating Cotenant's Title. But a tenant will not be permitted to claim the protection of the statute of limitations unless it clearly appears that he has repudiated the title of his cotenant and is holding adversely to him.[14]

(IV) Necessity of Knowledge or Notice. In order to constitute a disseizin of a cotenant the fact of adverse holding must be brought home to him either by information to that effect, given by the tenant in common asserting the adverse right,[15] or there must be outward acts of exclusive ownership of such a

Acts of exclusive possession which in case of strangers would be deemed adverse and of themselves a disseizin are in cases of tenancies in common susceptible of explanation consistently with the real title. They are not necessarily inconsistent with the unity of possession existing in such case. Warfield v. Lindell, 38 Mo. 561, 90 Am. Dec. 443; Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason (U. S.) 326, 19 Fed. Cas. It depends upon the intent with which the acts of ownership are done, and upon their notoriety, whether they will be such as to break and dissolve the unity of possession, constitute an adverse possession as against the cotenants, and amount to a disseizin. Evidence sufficient to show notice.— The fact that a cotenant distinctly states that he has nothing to do with the land and that the title is in the tenant in possession shows that nature as to give notice to the cotenant that an adverse possession and disseizin are intended to be asserted.[16] Actual verbal or written notice is not, however, necessary; adverse possession may be inferred from outward acts, open and notorious claim of ownership, and exercise of exclusive right.[17] It has also been held that it is not absolutely essential that the co-owner should have actual knowledge; a tenant in common will be deemed to have notice of the adverse holding by his cotenant where the hostile character of the possession is so open and manifest that a man of reasonable diligence would discover it.[18]

"A silent possession accompanied with no act which can amount to an ouster or give notice to his cotenant that his possession is adverse ought not . . . to be construed into an adverse possession." Per Marshall, C. J., in McClung v. Ross, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 116, 124, 5 L. ed. 46.

sion of that part under claim of title for the statutory period, perfect his title thereto against his cotenants.[23]

(c) Under Parol Purchase from Cotenant. Where one tenant in common sells by parol to another and abandons the possession, and the latter and those claiming under him continue in possession for twenty-one years afterward, claiming the interest of such tenant in common, an ouster may be presumed therefrom.[24]

(d) Under Deed from Third Person. If one tenant in common takes actual and exclusive possession of the entire estate under a deed of the whole, duly acknowledged and recorded from one who has no title, and receives the rents and profits, denying the right of any other person in the land, such possession amounts to a disseizin of his cotenants.[25] If, however, the other tenants in common have no notice of the conveyance or the claim thereunder, there is no ouster.[26]

(e) In Connection with Denial of Cotenant's Title. While an ouster or disseizin by a tenant in common is not presumed from the mere fact of sole possession, such possession of one cotenant who claims the whole and denies the title of his cotenant constitutes an ouster.[27] But if a tenant in common denies the several title of a cotenant, yet lets him into possession, it is not an ouster.[28]

(f) In Connection with Payment of Taxes and Appropriation of Rents. Possession, payment of taxes, and appropriation of rents and profits do not necessarily amount to adverse possession.[29]

(g) In Connection with Improvements and Payment of Taxes. So it has been held that sole possession, together with improvements and payment of taxes, do not necessarily show an adverse possession.[30]

(iv) Appropriation of Rents and Profits—(a) In General. The mere receipt and retention by one cotenant in possession of all the rents and profits does not of itself constitute an adverse possession,[31] and will not

Denial of title by answer.— In an action by a tenant in common to be admitted into possession, a denial, in the answer, of plaintiff's title and right of entry, is equivalent to an ouster. The action is the most effective demand that plaintiff could make to be let into possession, and if his title and right of entry be denied he need make no further proof of an ouster. Greer v. Tripp, 56 Cal. 209; Miller v. Myles, 46 Cal. 535; Withrow v. Biggerstaff, 82 N. C. 82. See also Clark v. Crego, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 599.

Possession under claim known to cotenant. — Possession of one cotenant under a claim of exclusive title in himself, known to his cotenant, is adverse to the latter. Knowles v. Brown, 69 Iowa 11, 28 N. W. 409.

What is not a denial of title.— If the tenant, on being informed by the demandant of his claim to be the owner of one fourth part thereof, merely admits that he is in possession of the demanded premises, and adds, "it is hard to pay twice;" this is not evidence of an ouster or disseizin. ripen into title as against the others, though continued for the statutory period.[32]

(B) Refusal to Pay Over on Demand. So a refusal to pay to a cotenant part of the rents and profits without denying his title does not of itself amount to an ouster.[33] But if, upon demand by one cotenant of his moiety, the other declines to pay and denies his title, saying he claims the whole and will not pay, and continues in possession, such possession is adverse and ouster enough.[34]

(C) In Connection with Assertion of Exclusive Title. So perception of rents and profits by one tenant in common, openly asserting sole title in himself and denying title of any other person, is an ouster of the cotenants and is adverse.[35]

(V) Refusal to Let Cotenant into Possession. The refusal by one joint tenant or tenant in common to let his cotenant come in or participate in the enjoyment of the common property amounts to an ouster, and possession thereafter is adverse.[36] If, however, one of two tenants in common of land is in possession thereof, and his cotenant demands the whole tract, refusal to comply with that demand is not to be considered as evidence of an ouster of the latter.[37]

(VI) Assertion of Title and Agreement to Sell the Whole. An assertion of an exclusive title to the whole of the land by a joint owner, and a contracting to sell the whole, are evidence of an adverse possession and such an ouster as to enable the cotenant to maintain ejectment.[38]

Exclusive possession of portion less than whole.— If one tenant in common is in the exclusive possession of a portion less than the whole of the common lands, and his cotenant demands that he be let into possession of the same on the ground of his joint ownership, and the other, while admitting the several title of the cotenant, refuses to let him into possession, his refusal is an ouster. (VII) ASSERTION OF TITLE BY JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS. Adverse possession of one tenant in common may commence by the assertion, in any proceeding at law, of a several and a distinct claim of title.[39]

(VIII) MORTGAGE OF PREMISES. It has been held that a mortgage of the whole premises by a cotenant does not necessarily establish an ouster.[40]

e. Effect of Giving Actual Notice of Claim. When a tenant denies the title of his cotenant and gives notice thereof, his possession is adverse and may ripen into a good title.[41]

f. Loss of Hostile Character of Possession. Where possession is apparently exclusive and adverse, the presumption of disseizin may be rebutted by evidence showing that the rights of the cotenant have been admitted or acknowledged.[42] Hostile character of possession is not lost by the tenant in possession tendering a quitclaim deed to his cotenant and requesting him to sign it, there being no offer to purchase nor any acknowledgment of the cotenant's rights.[43]

40. Wilson v. Collishaw, 13 Pa. St. 276.

That the giving of a mortgage should have efficacy toward constituting an ouster of a cotenant and the commencement of adverse possession on the part of the grantee, it must have been accompanied and followed by claims of which plaintiff had knowledge, and by acts of possession not only inconsistent with, but in exclusion of, the continuing right of plaintiff as tenant in common. Devising whole tract.— Where a tenant in common in possession devises the whole tract by will read in the presence of his cotenant, this amounts to an unequivocal claim of adverse holding and an ouster of the cotenant. Miller v. Miller, 60 Pa. St. 16, 100 Am. Dec. 538.

A mere verbal declaration made to some third person, of intent to hold exclusive of the rights of cotenants, is not such an ouster and injurious act as will work a disseizin and initiate an adverse possession. Warfield v. Lindell, 38 Mo. 561, 90 Am. Dec. 443.

ing his conveyance,[46] this will constitute a disseizin of the cotenants, and after the expiration of the statutory period of limitations their right to the land will be barred. Conveyance of whole tract in parcels.— Where a tenant in common takes possession of the entire property and divides it into town lots, which were sold by him from time to time to various persons, the statute of limitations runs in favor of the vendees as against the cotenant of the vendor, and at the expiration of seven years' uninterrupted possession they would have a prescriptive title. cotenant, and the grantee takes possession of the same on an agreement with the grantor to pay the taxes for and on behalf of the cotenants, his possession without a subsequent ouster or disseizin cannot be regarded as adverse to them, and the purchasers cannot invoke the limitation law to defeat the assertion of their rights.[50]

e. Where Possession Is Not Taken under Conveyance of Entire Tract. A conveyance by one tenant in common, purporting to convey the whole premises, unless possession is taken under it, is not an ouster of the cotenants.[51]

46. By Heirs against Coheirs — a. Possession Usually Not Adverse. Where one of several heirs enters into or remains in possession of land on the death of the ancestor, his possession will, in general, be considered the possession of his coheirs and for their benefit.[52]

b. Under What Circumstances Possession Is Adverse. There is, however, nothing in the relation between heirs which will prevent the possession of one from becoming adverse to the others.[53] But in order to render his possession adverse, there must be plain, decisive, unequivocal acts or conduct on his part amounting to an ouster or disseizin of the others.[54] No mere act of ownership

By heirs against pretermitted heirs.—Where, in ejectment, defendant claims under a will whereby the land was to become his absolute property upon the death of his mother, no possession held by him under the testator, or afterward during the life of his mother, can be considered as adverse to pretermitted heirs of the testator. McCracken v. McCracken, 67 Mo. 590.

Entry as tenant of father.—Where a father puts one of his children in possession of land, and he holds it as the tenant of his father and by his permission, his subsequent possession, after the death of his father, must be regarded as having been for the benefit of himself and his coheirs, as joint owners, unless it is proven that he held adversely. Blakeney v. Ferguson, 20 Ark. 547.

Joint possession of coheir with widow.— The possession, of one of the heirs, of land of which his father died seized, is not adverse to that of the other heirs by reason of his having resided with his mother after the death of her husband. Stevenson v. Huddleson, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 299.

Joint possession of two against others.— Where a brother and his sister and her successors lived for forty years upon land left by their father, and, in an action for partition by a granddaughter of the sister and the other children of the original owner against the brother's grantee, the evidence is conflicting whether the brother retained all the rents and profits, or shared them with his sister and her successors, an instruction that the possession of the granddaughter can be taken only as a circumstance tending to show that the brother's possession was not adverse to that of the other plaintiffs is error, since the joint possession of the brother and sister and her successors may have been adverse to the other children. will render the possession adverse.[55] It has been held, however, that the possession of land by grantees in a deed, wherein the grantors describe themselves as the "sole heirs" of the original owner, is adverse to the other heirs of the original owner from the time that the deed is placed on record.[56]

47. By Legatee against Co-Legatee. Any entry or acts of possession of one of several legatees, or of any one claiming under such legatee, down to the distribution of the real estate in pursuance of the will, whether with or without color or claim of title, cannot be operative toward gaining a title by adverse possession.[57]

48. By Holder of Legal Title against Holder of Equitable Title. Laches of the rightful owner of an equitable estate for the period required by a court of law to give title by adverse possession will bar the equitable title if during all that period the possession has been held under a claim unequivocally adverse and without anything having been done or said directly or indirectly to recognize such rightful owner's title by adverse possession.[58]

49. By Claimant of Easement against Owner of Fee. A claim merely of an easement, or of any other right less than the entire fee, does not give any adverse right to the fee,[59] and where the grantee of an easement maintains only such possession as is necessary to the enjoyment thereof his possession is not adverse to the owner.[60] So it has been held that a title in fee will not be implied from user where an easement only will secure the privilege and enjoyment.[61]

50. By Preëmptioner against Government or Its Grantee. The possession of government lands under preëmption laws is not adverse as against either the government or its grantee.[62]

The United States does not enter into a contract with a settler, or incur any obligation that the land occupied by him shall ever be put up for sale. 51. By One Using Land for Public Purpose against Government. The use of land necessary to the performance of a contract with the government is in subordination to the title of the government and not adverse thereto.[63]

VII. Color of Title.

A. Defined and Explained — 1. A Mere Semblance of Title. Color of title for the purpose of adverse possession under the statutes of limitations as to land is that which has the semblance or appearance of title, legal or equitable, but which is in fact no title.[64]

2. Valid Title Unnecessary. To constitute color of title it is not essential that the title under which the party claims should be a valid one.[65] A claim asserted to property, under the provisions of a conveyance, however inadequate to carry the true title to such property, and however incompetent might have been the power of the grantor in such conveyance to pass a title to the subject thereof, is strictly a claim under color of title, and one which will draw to the possession of the grantee the protection of the statute of limitations, other requisites of those statutes being complied with.[66] Whenever this defense is set up

In Louisiana it has been held that under the laws regulating the public use of battures and river banks, their possession and public use can in no case form a basis of prescription. It is said that the municipal possession is purely administrative, destined in its nature to terminate on a certain contingency, and, not being incompatible with ownership in the riparian proprietor, cannot avail against him as the possession of an adverse title in the corporation. the idea of right is excluded;[67] otherwise the statute of limitations would be of little use for protecting those who could otherwise show only an indefeasible title to the land.[68]

3. Necessity of Writing. It is familiar law that color of title is given by descent cast,[69] by judgments or decrees,[70] and by statutes.[71] This much is well settled, but there is much conflict of authority as to whether color of title not acquired by one of the methods enumerated must be acquired by some instrument in writing. In a number of decisions it is either held or said that a written instrument is not necessary to give color of title, but that it may be created by acts in pais.[72] Nevertheless, if there be no writing purporting to convey, there must be some visible acts or signs or indications which are apparent to all, showing the extent of the boundaries of the land claimed, to amount to color of title.[73] Be this as it may, it is believed that the decided weight of authority is to the effect that some writing is necessary in order to give color of title. This has been held or said in a considerable number of decisions, some of which embody this idea in defining color of title.[74] And it has been held that the evidence of title cannot be partly in writing and partly in parol.[75]

4. Effect of Color of Title. The effect of color of title is merely to fix the character of the occupant's possession and define its extent and limits.[76]

Color of title is not necessary to perfect title by adverse possession, in the absence of any statutory provision which expressly or by clear implication requires it.[77] In such case the only effect of claiming under a deed or paper title upon the question of adverse possession is to enlarge and extend the possession, beyond the portion actually occupied, to the whole lot described in the deed.[78] To con-

C. What Gives Color of Title — 1. Sufficiency of Instruments, Generally. An instrument, in order to operate as color of title, must purport to convey title to the claimant thereunder or to those with whom he is in privity,[81] and must describe and purport to convey the land in controversy.[82]

Necessity of chain of title.— Under Tenn. Acts (1797), c. 43, § 4, providing that one having possession for seven years under a deed "founded upon a grant" shall be entitled to preference in possession, it is not necessary that the occupant should have an uninterrupted chain of title connected with such grant, and therefore a sale of land on execution against one who was not shown to have derived any title from the original grantee is nevertheless effectual as a basis for a claim under the statute. e. Unregistered or Improperly Registered Deeds — (I) Statement of General Rule. A deed, although unregistered, will give color of title, in the absence of any statute expressly or impliedly providing otherwise.[89] Such a deed, it has been said, shows the nature of the possession taken under it to be adverse just as much as if it were recorded.[90] It has been held, however, that a deed which has not been recorded cannot be given in evidence as color of title without proof of its execution.[91] So a deed is good to show color of title although improperly admitted to registration.[92]

(II) Effect on Rule of Special Statutory Provisions. It has been held that a statute providing that contracts of sale of land shall be inadmissible in evidence without registration does not make registration essential to the use of a deed to show color of title where there is a claimant in possession under it.[93] On the other hand, under a statute providing that every suit to be instituted to recover real estate against any person having visible and adverse possession thereof, cultivating, using, or enjoying the same and paying taxes thereon, if any, and claiming under a deed or deeds duly registered, shall be instituted within five years next after the cause of action shall have accrued, etc., the deed under which possession is held, to constitute color of title, must be duly registered.[94] Under this statute it is not sufficient that some former deed in the claimant's chain of title has been so registered,[95] and the deed must have been of record for the full statutory period of five years before the institution of the suit.[96] So, under a statute providing that possession of land must be held under a written memorandum of title, duly registered, fixing the boundaries, in order to render available the bar of the statute as to more than a designated grant of land, possession of a greater tract would not enable a claimant to plead the statute to an action to recover the excess, in the absence of such a memorandum made and recorded.[97]

Under a statute which provides that "whoever has resided on a tract of land for . . . seven successive years prior to the commencement of an action of ejectment, having a connected title in law or equity deducible of record from the state or the United States, can plead the possession in bar of the suit," it is not necessary that the entire title of defendant be evidenced by acts of record; if the source or foundation of the title is of record it is available to every person claiming a legal title who can connect himself with it by such evidence as applies to the nature of the rights set up. Dolton v. Cain, 14 Wall. (U. S.) 472, 20 L. ed. 830. See also Mattison v. Walker, 1 Biss. (U. S.) 62, 16 Fed. Cas. No. 9,297.

(III) What Registration Sufficient When Registration Necessary. Where registration is necessary, the deed should be recorded in the county or parish where the land lies.[98]

f. Unsealed Deeds. A deed purporting to convey title will constitute color of title though it be without seal.[99]

g. Unsigned Deeds. It has been held that an unsigned deed gives the grantee color of title.[1]

Deed of land lying in two counties.— Under a statute providing that, where real estate is situate in two or more counties, probate of a deed conveying the same, made before the clerk of the superior court of either county, is sufficient, a deed to land situate in two counties, but registered in one only, is admissible to show color of title. Additional land without color of title.— When a party asserts a deed as a foundation of his title, his adverse possession is not necessarily confined to the premises embraced in his deed. description, though indefinite, is sufficient if the court can, with the aid of extrinsic evidence which does not add to, enlarge, or in any way change description, fit it to the property conveyed by the deed.[5] It is necessary, however, that the description be such that it can be rendered certain by such evidence.[6]

Aldrich v. Griffith, 66 Vt. 390, 29 Atl. 376.

veyed,[8] unless there is some statute from which this requirement may be inferred.[9]

k. Forged Deeds. It has been held that a forged deed in the hands of a bona fide holder constitutes color of title.[10] But under the statutes of most jurisdictions a forged deed cannot constitute the basis of a prescriptive title to land where the grantee participates in or has knowledge of the forgery.[11]

l. Fraudulent Deeds. There is some conflict of opinion as to whether a fraudulent deed constitutes color of title. It has been held that deeds, though

A sheriff's deed defective because the deed conveyed a tract of land part of which was in another county, and which the sheriff in consequence had no right to convey, is good to show color of title to the whole tract. Beverly v. Burke, 9 Ga. 440, 54 Am. Dec. 351, 14 Ga. 70.

Where grantee subsequently acquires title. — Where a person conveys by warranty deed land to which he has no title, and afterward a deed of the property is made to him, and he conveys it to a second grantee, the said deed to him cannot be relied on by his second grantee as color of title in good faith within the meaning of the statute of limitations, since the title acquired by such deed enured to the benefit of the first grantee. o. Deeds Executed Pursuant to Power under Will. If a deed is made pursuant to a power conferred by will it will give color of title.[18]

p. Deeds Adjudged Invalid. It has been held that there cannot be a holding under color of title where the paper relied on as giving color of title has been adjudged void in another suit to which the holder was a party. Such a paper does not give "appearance of title,"[19] and possession subsequent thereto is tortious as against the true owners.[20] described therein or is so insufficiently described as to render identification impossible.[29] Whatever may be the source of the invalidity of the deed, if it purports to convey land and in form passes what purports to be the title, it gives color of title.[30]

w. Deeds Executed by Agent or Attorney. A deed executed by an agent duly authorized to sell will of course give color of title.[31] It has been held that a deed executed by an agent or attorney who has no authority,[32] except perhaps where the grantee knew of the agent's want of authority,[33] or a deed executed by one under a defective power of attorney, will have the same effect.[34] And where a deed purports to be executed by virtue of a power of attorney it will be good as color of title, although the power of attorney be not shown.[35]

x. Deed of Tenant in Common. Where real estate is held in common, and one tenant assumes to convey the entire estate, and does convey it by metes and bounds, the deed will give color of title as to the whole tract, and an entry by the purchaser thereunder claiming title to the whole will operate as an actual ouster and disseizin of the cotenant.[36]

y. Deed of Married Woman Not Executed by Husband. A deed by a married woman, void because her husband did not join in the execution thereof, will nevertheless give color of title.[37]

3. Other Instruments in Writing — a. Patents or Grants. A patent or grant may constitute color of title[38] provided the land claimed is described in the instrument.[39]

b. Surveys. A survey never returned to the land office is not evidence of an adverse title without a warrant or other evidence of one,[40] and the record of a survey of land does not of itself constitute color of title thereto, although it may be evidence tending to show a claim of title.[41]

c. Preëmption Claims. An unperfected preëmption claim does not give color of title.[42]

d. Entries. A special entry of land, it has been held, may give color of title to the extent of the calls.[43]

e. Sheriff's Return. A fieri facias with the sheriff's return thereon setting forth a levy on land therein described, a sale thereof, and payment of the purchase-price, will give color of title.[44]

Grants from foreign government.— A possession of land in New York, under a grant from the French Canadian government prior to the conquest of Canada by the British, is not such an adverse possession as will prevent or defeat the operation of the subsequent grant of the same land under the provincial government of New York, but will be considered as held in subordination to the latter title. Jackson v. Waters, 12 Johns. (N. Y.) 365.

Land excepted from patent.— Where a patent for land excepts land lying within its limits "previously granted," possession under the patent, but outside of the land previously granted, is not constructive possession of the excepted land, and the patent is not color of title to the land so excepted. Basnight v. Smith, 112 N. C. 229, 16 S. E. 902.

A patent for lands previously patented to another, although void and passing no title, constitutes color of title. Patent subject to rights of claimants under act of congress of 1823.— Patents for lands situate in Peoria, Ill., subject to claims of citizens of that town under the act of 1823, designed for their relief, is a fee-simple title on its face and gives color of title. Void patents.— In Texas a void patent and mesne conveyances thereunder do not constitute color of title from and under the sovereignty of the soil. Bryan v. Crump, 55 Tex. 1. So a patent void for want of authority of the officer issuing it does not give color of title under the Texas three years' statute of limitations. Bates v. Bacon, 66 Tex. 348, 1 S. E. 232, in which it was held that a private survey and map never recorded or referred to, when made a part of the deed under which a party relying on it claims, cannot be considered color of title. Possession under color of title, as distinct from color of title, extends only to that portion of land where all claim is in actual possession.

f. Receipts. It has been held that a receipt, containing a description of land, issued by the receiver of the land office upon payment of its purchase-price to the government, is such a conveyance as is contemplated by a statute requiring an adverse claim to be founded "upon some written instrument as being a conveyance of the premises in question."[45]

g. Executory Contracts to Convey or Bond for Title. According to the weight of authority, an executory contract to convey or bond for title will give color of title as against all persons whatsoever after payment of the purchase-money.[46] Or the other hand, according to the fair weight of authority, an executory contract to convey or bond for title does not give color of title before payment of the purchase-money, at least as against the vendor.[47]

St. Rep. 590, wherein the court said: "The trend of judicial opinion is toward the reasonable view that a purchaser who has paid the price for which he bought, whether from a public officer at auction sale or from an individual contractor, if he is in the occupation of the land bought, holds it adversely to all the world under any writing that describes the land and defines the nature of his claim"; Doe v. Southard, 10 N. Code Civ. Proc., § 411), and is sufficient color of title under which a party may hold adverse possession (Carroll v. Patrick, 23 Nebr. 834, 37 N. W. 671).

Conditional bond for title.— An instrument in form of a bond for title, with the condition expressed that on the happening of a certain event no title should pass, but that the agreement should be rescinded, is not such a deed as is required by a statute of limitations providing that every suit to be instituted to recover real estate as against any person in the peaceable and adverse possession thereof, cultivating, using, or enjoying the same and paying taxes thereon, if any, claiming under a deed or deeds duly registered, shall be instituted within five years next after the cause of action shall have accrued. Winters v. Laird, 27 Tex. 616.

Title-bond taken for benefit of another but not assigned.— A title-bond from A to B, taken by B for the benefit of C, but never assigned to him, is not sufficient color of title in C to enable him, by claiming thereunder, to protect the title by the statute of limitations as against the paramount paper title. An imperfect equity resting in parol cannot serve a defendant in ejectment as color of title. Roe v. Kersey, 32 Ga. 152.

A void contract of sale is not such color of title as will prevent a recovery under the Texas three years' statute of limitations. Green v. Hugo, 81 Tex. 452, 17 S. W. 79, 26 Am. St. Rep. 824.

A written agreement to divide lands owned or claimed in common, though made by an administrator of one of the tenants in common without order of court for partition thereof, is admissible as color of title. McMullin v. Erwin, 58 Ga. 427; Shiels v. Lamar, 58 Ga. 590. But see Richards v. Williams, 3 Baxt. (Tenn.) 186, in which it was held that seven years' adverse possession of land under a mere written agreement for a division thereof, containing the boundaries, but not purporting to vest a fee-simple title, is not sufficient to perfect a title.

h. Assignment of Right to Deed. An assignment of a grantee's right, title, and interest in and to a deed of land does not give color of title.[48]

i. Certificate of Purchase.[49] A certificate of purchase issued at a tax-sale does not constitute color of title.[50] But it has been held that a certificate, regular on its face, of purchase of swamp land, gives color of title under a statute declaring it "evidence that the holder . . . is the owner of the tract described therein." [51] It has also been held that certificates of purchase from the land office, made in accordance with law, operate as an equitable severance of the land from the public domain, and constitute sufficient evidence of title, when accompanied with possession, to form the basis of prescription against the holder of a patent issued subsequently to the acquisition of such prescription.[52]

j. Mortgages. Possession taken under a mortgage before foreclosure, because of the failure to pay interest due or because of other breaches, is not possession under color of title.[53]

k. Wills. A devise of land may give color of title, possession under which for the statutory period will ripen into a good title by adverse possession.[54] But a will, to constitute color of title, must purport to convey the land to the claimant thereunder, or to those with whom he is in privity.[55]

Wisconsin.— Furlong v. Garrett, 44 Wis. 111.

The reason for the rule is that under such instrument the quasi-relation of landlord and tenant exists until the purchase-money is paid. Beverly v. Burke, 14 Ga. 70, 54 Am. Dec. 351; Stamper v. Griffin, 12 Ga. 450.

1. Letter Surrendering Rights. Where, in ejectment, defendant relies on adverse possession under color of title, a letter addressed to one under whom defendant claims, and signed by one under whom plaintiff claims, surrendering all the rights of the writer to the addressee, shows good color of title.[56]

4. Judgments or Decrees — a. In General. Judgments or decrees under which possession of land is taken constitute color of title,[57] and this is in general true although the decree or judgment is for any reason irregular or even void.[58] It seems to be well settled that possession under a decree in partition is good color of title, even though the decree is irregular or even void.[59] On the other hand such a decree, though erroneous, will divest the person against whom it is rendered of any color of title he may have had prior to the decree.[60] So it has been held that a decree of foreclosure will give color of title even though it may be void.[61]

Exceptions and limitations of rule.— A judgment in proceedings to settle the estate of a person who, though represented to be dead, turns out to be alive, cannot support a claim by adverse possession, under a statute authorizing such claim when founded on "the judgment of some competent court," as the proceedings are void for all purposes. b. In Condemnation Proceedings. Condemnation proceedings may constitute color of title when possession has been taken and held under them, notwithstanding irregularities of procedure which may render them invalid.[62] But occupation under irregular condemnation proceedings which did not in any manner indicate the bounds of the proposed right of way or the quantity of land to be appropriated is confined to the pedis possessio, and such proceedings do not give color of title.[63]

5. Statutes. An act or the legislature may give color of title although unconstitutional,[64] and a writing which purports to be made in accordance with a statute enacted for the relief of persons whose title-deeds have been destroyed will have the same effect.[65]

6. Vote or Ordinance. The vote of a town to convey land according to an ordinance in a warrant for a town-meeting, accompanied by entry in pursuance of the vote, has been held to constitute color of title.[66]

7. Descent Cast. A title by descent cast is color of title. So, where a person dies in possession of land and the possession is continued by his heirs, their possession is under color of title;[67] and this is true although the ancestor held under a mere claim of right and without color of title himself.[68] And where the ancestor had title the heir has color of title, although the ancestor was not in possession.[69]

8. Sale without Deed. A mere sale with or without order of court, and without a deed executed in pursuance thereof, does not constitute color of title.[70]

B. As an Element of Adverse Possession — 1. Conflict of Authority Whether or not title by adverse possession can be acquired without good faith on the part of the claimant is a subject on which there is great conflict of authority "of such long standing and in respect to so many phases of the question that it is useless to try to reconcile the various adjudications." [72] In a number of decisions the courts, without mentioning any statute, apparently lay down the doctrine without qualification that to perfect title by adverse possession such possession must have been held in good faith on the part of the claimant.[73]

2. Land Actually Occupied. The weight of authority, however, is that, to acquire title to land actually occupied, good faith is not necessary.[74]

3. Where Possession Is Constructive. There is also much conflict of authority as to whether good faith is necessary where the person is holding under color of title and claims constructive possession to the boundaries named in the deed. In some jurisdictions it is held necessary, under statutes requiring good faith either in totidem verbis or in language which cannot be otherwise construed ; [75] and in other curately said that a deed purporting to convey title is claim and color of title made in good faith. Such a deed is undoubtedly color of title, and, having been received by the grantee and acted under as though it conveyed title, such action implies claim of title. 72. Lampman v. Van Alstyne, 94 Wis. 417, 426, 69 N. W. 171, from which case it seems that this conflict is due in a measure, but not altogether, to the difference in the wording of the various statutes of limitation, the court saying: "The rule that good faith in respect to the validity of the claim of title must characterize the entry and possession is still held in some jurisdictions; in others it is held that good faith only applies to constructive possession; and in still others, while the element is held to be indispensable, it is so limited as to be practically done away with."

jurisdictions it seems to be necessary, though no statutes are mentioned as requiring it.[76] On the other hand there are decisions which hold that in the absence of a statute expressly requiring good faith it is not necessary, even where the party is claiming under color of title and seeking to acquire constructive possession to the extent of the boundaries in his conveyance.[77]

4. Possession Commenced in Good Faith and Continued in Bad Faith. By the express provisions of the Louisiana statute, good faith when the possession began suffices. Subsequent bad faith does not prevent prescription,[78] or in any way impair the efficacy of such possession as a ground of prescription.[79]

5. Predecessor's Bad Faith. As a general rule the rights of an adverse claimant who has held for the statutory period are not in any way affected by the bad faith of his grantor in acquiring title where he had no knowledge or notice of any of the facts from which the bad faith might be implied.[80] He cannot, how-

The rule laid down by these decisions has been well expressed as follows: "A party who sets up an adverse possession under color of title must act bona fide, or, in other words, he must be honest. He must believe his deed to be valid in law, and that it conveys to him a good title to the land, although it may turn out that another person has a better title." Dem v. Hunt, 20 N. J. L. 487, 493.

These decisions proceed upon the theory that, as good faith is not expressly required by the statutes, the courts cannot impair their purpose by injecting into them, by judicial construction, elements which are not there; that if the legislature has made no exception the courts can make none. See cases cited supra, this note.

Notice of outstanding claim subsequently acquired.— The grantee being at the grantor's death in possession and holding adversely to the remainder-man under color of title asserted in good faith, the fact that he afterward received notice of the remainder-man's claim of superior title does not interrupt his adverse possession so as to defeat his claim, the evidence not showing that he ever recognized such superior title. Rule under the Louisiana statute.— Merrick's Civ. Code La. art. 3482, provides, in regard to the five and ten years' statutes of limitations which require good faith, that it is sufficient if the possession has commenced in good faith. If the possession should afterward be held in bad faith, that shall not prevent prescription. Under this statute the ten years' statute cannot prevail where it appears that defendants claim as heirs and widow in the community of one who did not hold in ever, tack to his own possession the possession of a predecessor holding under color of title acquired in bad faith, in order to make up the period of prescription.[81]

C. What Constitutes Good Faith — 1. In General. The faith of the holder of color of title, whether good or bad, depends upon the purpose for which he acquired it and the reliance placed upon it.[82] Good faith is the opposite of bad faith or fraud[83] and means nothing more or less than that the party honestly believes he has acquired a good title,[84] although upon investigation it proves otherwise.[85] In determining whether a party did so believe or not, weight is to be given to the particular circumstances of each case.[86]

2. Knowledge That Title Was Defective. Mere knowledge on the part of claimant that his grantor's title was defective or was not a perfect title will not good faith. Kernan v. Baham, 45 La. Ann. 799, 13 So. 155. But where the original possessor was in good faith, although an intermediate one held in bad faith, the subsequent possessor in good faith may avail himself of the prescription applicable to such possession. "Possession originating in fraud." — The word "fraud," as used in the Georgia statute providing that possession, to be the foundation of prescription, cannot originate in fraud, the fraud meant is actual fraud, — a moral fraud, a wrongful act, and not a legal act which the law denominates a fraud regardless of the bona fides of the parties. Lee v. Ogden, 83 Ga. 325, 10 S. E. 349 [disapproving Hunt v. Dunn, 74 Ga. 120]; Ware v. Barlow, 81 Ga. 1, 6 S. E. 465; Wingfield v. Virgin, 51 Ga. 139.

86. Stark v. Starr, 1 Sawy. (U. S.) 15, 22 Fed. Cas. No. 13,307.

Good faith, as contemplated by the law of prescription, has relation to the actual existing state of the mind, whether so from ignorance, skepticism, sophistry, delusion, or imbecility, and without regard to what it should be from good legal standards of law or reason. It is not necessary, therefore, that the person claiming prescription should have taken the instrument relied on as evidence of his title under such honest belief only as would be entertained by an ordinarily intelligent man that the paper would give him a good title. If such paper was in law color of title, and was taken honestly and in good faith, the degree of intelligence with which this was done would be immaterial. It is the bona fides which is important, and not the amount of knowledge or mental capacity constituting the basis thereof. Lee v. O'Quin, 103 Ga. 355, 30 S. E. 356.

In Lee v. O'Quin, 103 Ga. 355, 365, 30 S. E. 356, it is said: "Ordinary intelligence might, upon bare inspection, know that an apparent title was worthless; and if the bona fides of the holding were to be tested by that standard, many cases would doubtless occur where a person of a lower order of intelligence, in his ignorance of law, would learn with surprise that he had occupied the land and held his color of title in bad faith, while he believed in fact that it was genuine and sufficient."

Bad faith cannot be imputed to a claimant by reason of failure, for several years after execution, to record the deed which is claimed to give color of title, there being no statute requiring it (Rawson v. Fox, 65 Ill. 200); or because the deed described the land conveyed as situated in a disputed territory (Cornelius v. Giberson, 25 N. J. L. 1); or because the claimant, a mortgagee who purchased at foreclosure sale, filed an insufficient affidavit as a basis for service by publication (Reedy v. Camfield, 159 Ill. 254, 42 N. E. 833); or because the claimant, a purchaser at a tax-sale, failed to comply with the statutory requirements as to notice governing the execution of tax-deeds (Duck Island Club v. Bexstead, 174 Ill. 435 [overruling 51 N. E. 831]; Dalton v. Lucas, 63 Ill. 337, and see also Whitney v. Stevens, 89 Ill. 53); or because the deed under which the claimant holds was the result of a sale by a trustee not made in strict conformity to law (Brady v. Walters, 55 Ga. 25); or because it appeared from the recitals in the deed that the property was sold at a day later than that fixed by statute (Hardin v. Crate, 60 Ill. 215). So it has been held that where one assumes to sell without title, or without disclosing the defects of his title, a vendee in good faith, though holding a non domino, may plead prescription; but that where the vendor sells only his right, and shows what it is and declines to plead generally, thus bringing home to the vendee a knowledge of his title, the vendee cannot plead prescription. Avery v. Allain, 11 Rob. (La.) 436; Reeves v. Towles, 10 La. 276. See also Thomas v. Kean, 10 Rob. (La.) 80; Templet v. Baker, 12 La. Ann. 658. In Eastman v. Beiller, 3 Rob. (La.) 220, it is said that the fact that the vendor refuses to guarantee the title he sells is a circumstance calculated to excite suspicion as to its validity and to put the vendee on his guard and induce him to make inquiries with regard to it.

impeach the good faith of his purchase.[87] But the possession cannot be said to be acquired in good faith where the claimant knew that the title of his grantor was "absolutely worthless." [88]

3. Knowledge of Adverse Claim. Adverse possession under color of title is not possession with bad faith merely because the color of title was acquired, and possession taken thereunder with notice of an outstanding adverse claim.[89] This is true whether the notice be actual [90] or merely constructive.[91]

4. Taking Deed Regular on Its Face. A deed purporting to convey title of itself imports good faith unless facts and circumstances attending its execution show that the party accepting it had no faith or confidence in it.[92]

Imperfections and irregularities in any part of the chain in which color of title is derived will not alone be regarded as an evidence of want of good faith. Reedy v. Camfield, 159 Ill. 254, 42 N. E. 833; Dawley v. Van Court, 21 Ill. 460.

Knowledge of defects in tax-title.— The fact that, while defendant was in adverse possession of land under a tax-title, plaintiff called his attention to defects in such title, does not destroy its effect as color of title or prevent possession thereunder from being adverse. IX. PAYMENT OF TAXES.

A. Necessity of — 1. In the Absence of Statute. Payment of taxes is not an element of adverse possession unless made so by express statutory requirement.[93]

2. Under Statutory Provisions — a. In General. In some states statutes have been enacted[94] which are uniformly construed to require payment of taxes for a certain period before title by adverse possession can be acquired.[95] Under these statutes payment for the entire period, concurrently with the other elements therein designated, is necessary.[96] The taxes must be paid by the claimant regardless of whom they are assessed to, in order to render the statute available.[97] And by parity of reasoning, if he has paid the taxes, it is immaterial to whom they are assessed; he will nevertheless be entitled to the benefit of the statute.[98]

b. Where No Taxes Have Been Assessed. In California the requirement of payment of taxes as an element of adverse possession has been held not to apply where no taxes have been assessed.[99] But in Colorado, Illinois, and Texas, failure to pay taxes, though resulting from failure to assess the land, will be fatal to the claimant's right to acquire title by adverse possession.[1]

c. Where Land Is Exempt from Taxation. Under the Texas statute making "payment of taxes, if any," an element of adverse possession, payment of taxes is not necessary to complete the bar of the statute where the land is by law

Evidence to show assessment.— A finding that the property in controversy was not assessed for taxes for a specified year is against the evidence where it appears that the land assessed by boundaries necessarily included the land in controversy, although there is no evidence that the tract claimed by defendant was assessed by any separate or specified description in that year. exempt from taxation.[2] But in Illinois seven years' possession, under color of title, of property exempt from taxation, is no bar under the limitation acts of 1839.[3]

d. Where Tax Is Invalid. Where a levy is in part for an unlawful purpose, payments of so much as is not for such unlawful purpose is a sufficient payment of "taxes legally assessed."[4]

e. Where Taxes for Last Year Were Not Due at Expiration of Statutory Period. Where the taxes for a year do not become due and payable until after the period necessary to perfect title under the Texas statute, then title becomes perfect under the statute without payment of the taxes for that year.[5]

f. Taxes Assessed Before but Levied After Occupancy. Under the California statute it has been held unnecessary to pay taxes assessed before the occupancy and levied afterward, and that only such taxes as were both levied and assessed during the occupancy need be paid.[6]

g. Where Statute Is Enacted After Adverse Occupation for a Time. Inasmuch as it is expressly provided that the California statute relating to payment of taxes shall not be retroactive, one who occupies land adversely for three years without paying the taxes before the enactment thereof, and for two years afterward in compliance therewith, perfects his adverse title.[7]

h. Where Statute Is Enacted Subsequent to Completion of Period. A statute making payment of taxes a necessary element of adverse possession has no application to a title by adverse possession completed prior thereto.[8]

i. Necessity of Continuing Payment After Bar of Statute Has Become Complete. When title has once been acquired by compliance with all the terms of the statute, the failure of the adverse possessor to pay taxes subsequently assessed on the land does not divest nor in any way affect his title.[9]

B. On What Land Paid. The payment of taxes must be on the same tract as that described in the instrument relied on as giving color of title.[10] So payment must be made upon the whole tract claimed and described in the instrument giving color of title.[11]

C. Time of Making — 1. After Acquiring Color of Title. Any payment of taxes made before acquisition of color of title cannot be availed of by one claiming under either section of the Illinois statute.[12]

2. NECESSITY OF PAYING TAXES EACH YEAR. Under the sixth section of the Illinois statute it has been held that a payment need not be made each year, but that two yearly assessments of taxes may be paid in one year if the party continues in possession;[13] but under the seventh section payment must be made each year,[14] and this seems to be the rule under the California statute.[15] In Texas, however, it is been held that it is not necessary to show that the taxes for each year were paid during the respective years for which they accrued.[16] It has been held that the Colorado statute is fully complied with by the payment of all the taxes assessed against the land for the statutory period.[17]

D. By Whom Payment Made — 1. HOLDER OF COLOR OF TITLE AND PERSONS IN PRIVITY WITH HIM. Within the statutes under consideration, payment of taxes must be made by the person holding the color of title.[18] But it is not to be understood from anything here said that payment by an agent or by a third person, in behalf of the person holding color of title, will be insufficient, for such is not the case,[19] and payment by one in privity with the claimant will be equivalent to payment by him.[20] If the land claimed adversely is held by tenants in com-

Title not acquired by agent for himself.— An agent who, by his principal's direction, took the title to land in his own name in settlement of a claim due such principal, has not such color of title that payment of taxes for five successive years will make him the owner by virtue of Gen. Stat. § 2187. Warren v. Adams, 19 Colo. 515, 36 Pac. 604.

Person contracting to pay for another.— A party to a contract for the purchase of land, by which he has agreed to pay all taxes thereon, is not permitted to apply such payment of taxes on the tax-title and thereby defeat the title of his vendor. Baily v. Doolittle, 24 Ill. 577.

20. Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Whitaker, 109 Cal. 268, 41 Pac. 1083; Cofield v. Furry, 19 Ill. 183. Thus, if taxes are paid by a tenant, the payment enures to the benefit of the landlord (Cofield v. Furry, 19 Ill. 183), and, if paid by the trustee or cestui que trust, to the benefit of the combined legal and equitable title claimed (Cofield v. Furry, 19 Ill. 183).

Payment of taxes by the mortgagee of the adverse claimant is a payment for and by the adverse claimant, and will satisfy the conditions of the statute as to the payment of the taxes for the purpose of adverse possession. Brown v. Clark, 89 Cal. 196, 26 Pac. 801; Chickering v. Failes, 26 Ill. 507.

Payment of taxes by a vendee of the claimant holding possession under bond for deed may constitute a sufficient payment for the latter. Peadro v. Carriker, 168 Ill. 570, 48 N. E. 102. It can make no difference whether the taxes are paid by the vendor or the vendee mon, payment of taxes on the joint property by either will operate as payment by all.[21]

2. HOLDER OF COLOR OF TITLE AND THIRD PERSON. Where tax-receipts produced in evidence by one claiming land under color of title show a payment of the taxes for a part of the seven years by the holder of the color of title and another person, this will not constitute a bar as to the whole tract, but only as to the undivided half.[22]

3. EFFECT OF PAYMENT BY BOTH OWNER AND CLAIMANT. The payment of taxes by any person extinguishes them, and if a voluntary attempt is made to pay them a second time the last payment will be considered a gratuity to the taxing power.[23] As a consequence thereof, payment of taxes by the owner cannot affect the rights of the adverse claimant where the latter has already paid such taxes.[24] On the other hand, where any one or more of the payments of taxes are made by the claimant "after payment" by the owner, there can be no acquisition of title by him by adverse possession.[25]

E. Effect of Buying in Land at Tax-Sale. Permitting the land to be sold for taxes and buying it in is not a payment of taxes within the meaning of any of these statutes.[26]

F. Effect of Misdescription in Tax-Receipts Where Taxes Actually Paid. One who, under color of title acquired in good faith, has paid the taxes actually assessed against land, is entitled to the benefit of the statute, notwithstanding the land may have been misdescribed in the tax-receipts,[27] provided he is able to remove the uncertainty by extrinsic evidence.[28] On the other hand, the fact that part of the tax-receipts held by defendant in ejectment included in their description the tract in controversy does not establish defendant's title thereto, under the statute of limitations, where the evidence shows that the tract was not

22. Coleman v. Billings, 89 Ill. 183, wherein it was held to be competent, however, to show that the taxes were in fact paid by the holder of the color of title, and that the name of the other person was by some inadvertence included in the receipts.

Reason of rule.— "To permit the owner to defeat the occupant's payment by paying an amount of money to the collector equal to the tax which had been previously paid by the occupant in discharge of all taxes assessed on the land would render the provisions of this statute inoperative and would amount virtually to its repeal, as the holder of the better title would surely make such a payment once in seven years." Morrison v. Kelly, 22 Ill. 609, 627, 74 Am. Dec. 169.

This rule applies although the taxes are paid by the owner within the time allowed by law for the payment thereof. Osburn v. Searles, 156 Ill. 88, 40 N. E. 452.

But see Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 99 Cal. 672, 34 Pac. 509, in which, it not appearing whether the payment was made by the owner before that by the adverse claimant, the court held that, the claimant having paid the taxes himself, his rights were in no way affected by the fact of payment by the owner, and it was said that it made no difference whether the payment by the owner was before or after payment by the adverse claimant.

Under the Colorado statute, the provisions of which are somewhat different from those of other states whose decisions are considered in the text, defendant cannot invoke the benefit of the statute where plaintiff has the better paper title and has paid the taxes on the land for the same period claimed by defendant. in fact assessed to defendant, or the taxes thereon paid, or intended to be paid, by her.[29]

G. Other Elements Necessary in Addition to Payment. Under none of these statutes is payment of taxes alone sufficient.[30] Under the sixth section of the Illinois statute, in order to create a bar, there must be a concurrence of three things for the period therein prescribed,—color of title, possession of land, and payment of taxes thereon.[31] Possession must be actually taken before the bar created by the seventh section of the Illinois statute will attach in favor of one who has, under color of title,[32] in accordance with its provisions, paid taxes for seven successive years on vacant and unoccupied lands.[33] Where, however, all the taxes legally assessed upon vacant land are paid, under color of title, for seven successive years while the land is vacant and unoccupied, and possession is then taken under such claim and color of title, this will establish a complete title by adverse possession,[34] which may be asserted either as a defense or to regain possession when invaded.[35]

Under the Colorado statute, payment of taxes on vacant lands, under color of title, for the period therein mentioned, will be sufficient to give title by adverse possession without any possession whatever.[36] Under the Texas statute, payment of taxes and possession under a recorded deed for the period therein mentioned

In the absence of color of title, payment of taxes for the statutory period is unavailable. Duck Island Club v. Bexstead, 174 Ill. 435, 51 N. E. 831; Durfee v. Peoria, etc., R. Thus possession and payment of taxes for seven years, by a grantee who has parted with color of title under his deed by subsequently executing a conveyance of the land to another, creates no bar. Heacock v. Lubuke, 107 Ill. 396.

Possession short of statutory period.—Payment of taxes for seven years and possession for two years immediately preceding the filing of the bill are insufficient to give title by adverse possession. Loewenthal v. Elkins, 175 Ill. 553, 51 N. E. 592.

Where these three elements have concurred for the statutory period claimant acquires a title by adverse possession. Durfee v. Peoria, etc., R. Co., 140 Ill. 435, 30 N. E. 686; Lake Shore, etc., R. 33. What is "vacant and unoccupied land." — The phrase "vacant and unoccupied land," as used in the statute, means land not in the actual possession of any one. Temporary entries without claim of right and without the intention to exclude others — camping thereon, leaving a wagon thereon, or building a haystack thereon — do not constitute possession so as to change the character of vacant land to that of land actually possessed or occupied. Walker v. Converse, 148 Ill. 622, 36 N. E. 202.

"Until the owner of the color of title has united actual possession to the color and to the payment of taxes, he is in no position to invoke the aid of the second [seventh] section, because that section cannot become constitutionally operative until the person invoking its aid has acquired actual possession. Then for the first time it properly becomes a limitation law."

Where the benefit of the bar of this statute has once been acquired the right of possession remains with the occupant, even if he temporarily leaves the possession, and enables him to recover the possession as against all persons as to whom his bar in defense, if set up, would have been available. must concur,[37] but when they do, the claimant acquires title by adverse possession.[38] Under the Idaho statute, adverse possession of land cannot be considered established unless it be shown that the land had been occupied and claimed continuously for the period mentioned in the statute, and that the party or persons, their predecessors and grantors, had paid all the taxes levied and assessed on the land.[39]

H. When Statute Commences to Run. Under both sections of the Illinois statute, limitation commences to run, not from the time of taking possession, but from the time of the first payment of taxes.[40] To complete the bar of these provisions there must be a period of full seven years between the day when the first payment of taxes was made and the date of the commencement of suit.[41] It is not necessary, however, that between the first and last payment seven years should intervene in order to complete the statutory bar.[42] In California the Illinois rule has been disapproved. The commencement of adverse possession is not required to coincide with the beginning or end of a fiscal year, and the payment by the owner of taxes which were levied and assessed and paid during the calendar year preceding the adverse occupation will not postpone the running of the statute until the end of the fiscal year.[43]

X. AGAINST WHOM THE STATUTE RUNS, AND PROPERTY SUBJECT THERETO.

A. Rule Exempting the Sovereign from the Operation of the Statute[44] — 1. IN ENGLAND. Formerly the invariable rule of the English law, resulting from the application of the maxim nullum tempus occurrit regi, was that no length of possession would give title to land as against the crown.[45] But the rule has undergone various changes by statute.[46]

2. IN THE UNITED STATES — a. General Rule. The English doctrine is applicable in the United States, so that here, as in England, no title by adverse possession can be acquired against the sovereign.[47]

b. Lands of the United States — (I) GENERAL RULE. By the application of this principle the only manner in which title to lands owned by the United States can be acquired is under some act of congress directly making the grant or authorizing it to be made by some person or officer.[48] No title can be acquired by adverse possession.[49] Therefore a mere trespasser in possession of government land cannot maintain an action against another person to quiet his possession.[50] It has, however, been held that a location and occupancy of government lands under the laws of the United States, though subordinate to the title of the government, may nevertheless be adverse to another claimant.[51]

Lands held by a derivative title.— The principle that the statute does not run against the commonwealth applies not only as to her sovereign right of original dominion, but also to every secondary or derivative right of property. So, where lands have been forfeited to the state under the delinquent tax laws or otherwise, they cannot be the subject of adverse possession while the title thus acquired remains in the state. Bagley v. Wallace, 16 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 245. And if the lands were held adversely to the owner at the time of the forfeiture the adverse character of the occupancy ceases when the state acquires title, and cannot be asserted against either the state or its grantee. (II) Where the Conveyance of State Lands is Expressly Prohibited. On the ground that title by possession presumes a grant, and such presumption cannot be entertained against one incapable of granting it, it has been held that title to land covered by navigable waters cannot be acquired by adverse possession, as against the state, in the face of a statute which expressly provides that no patent shall issue for such land.[54]

(III) Statutory Exception of the State from the Rule. Where the statute is expressly made to apply to the state, title by adverse possession may of course be acquired as against the state.[55]

B. Grantees of the Federal or State Government — 1. General Rule. The operation of the statute is not limited to land held under private grant; title to land held under a federal or state grant may be acquired by adverse possession continued for the statutory period after the grantee acquires the title from the federal[56] or state government,[57] and it is immaterial that the possession was commenced before the title passed.[58]

2. Time When the Statute Begins to Run — a. General Rule. The statute begins to run against a grantee of the sovereignty only from the time when he acquires title; in view of the rule excluding the government from the operation of the statute an occupancy prior to that time will not be deemed adverse and can have no effect to give title by adverse possession against grantees of the federal[59]

Under the New York statute of April 8, 1801, providing that actions by the state in respect to land by reason of long right or title which should not have accrued within the space of forty years before the suit is commenced unless the people, or those under whom they claim, shall have received the rents and profits thereof within the space of forty years, a title by adverse possession may be acquired by such a holding for forty years as would constitute a good adverse possession if the land had been owned by an individual instead of the state. By statute in North Carolina [1 N. C. b. Application of the Rule — (I) In General. Since there is a difference of opinion as to just when the title of the federal or state government passes to a grantee,[61] the cases do not agree in the application of the above-stated general rule.

(II) Grantees of the Federal Government — (A) Rule That Patent Must Issue. On the ground that the title of the United States does not pass until the issuance of a patent it is held by one line of cases that the statute runs against a purchaser from the federal government only from the date of his patent.[62]

(B) Rule That Issuance of Patent Is Not Necessary. But on the ground that one who enters upon public lands of the United States is the real owner of

Act curing void patent.— Where a patent was issued in the name of a deceased person, and this defect was cured by a subsequent act which provided that the title to the land should "enure to and become vested in the heirs, devisees, or assignees of such deceased patentee as if the patent had been issued to the deceased person during his life," it was held that the patent, being void, passed no title, and that a title acquired through the curative act did not relate back and take effect from the time the patent was issued in such a manner as to subject the land designated in it to the operations of the statute of limitations from the date of the patent and before the passage of the curative act, but that until the passage of the curative act there could be no adverse possession of the land as against a person claiming title under the patent and act of congress. Cancellation of original patent.— Plaintiff entered public lands under a military land-warrant in 1857. By mistake a patent was issued to him to another tract, which was canceled. In 1884 he obtained a patent under the original entry. It was held that since he could not have maintained an action to recover the land without this patent the statute of limitations did not begin to run in favor of one in adverse possession of the land until the patent issued in 1884. Churchill v. Sowards, 78 Iowa 472, 43 N. W. 271.

Mining lands.— It has been held that the statute commences to run in favor of an adverse occupant of mining lands only from the issuance of the patent. the property from the time that he has complied with all the conditions entitling him to a patent, some of the courts hold that an adverse possession will begin to run against the entry-man from the time he becomes entitled to a patent, and not from the date of the patent.[63] Thus, it has been held that the statute begins to run against a purchaser from the government from the date of his final payment and the issuance of a certificate of purchase.[64] But the statute does not commence to run against one who seeks to obtain title to land of the United States until his right to the patent is complete.[65]

(c) Lands Granted by Special Act of Congress. Where an act of congress relating to public lands amounts to a direct grant of the fee, the statute will begin to run from the time when the title passes, even though a patent has not been issued.[66]

(d) Where a Patent Is Expressly Required. Under a statute which expressly declares that the statute shall commence to run from the date of the patent, this question cannot, of course, arise, and there can be no adverse possession against the patentee of public lands except from the date of his patent.[67]

(iii) Grantees of State Governments — (a) Rule That Patent Must Issue. According to one line of cases it has been held that an occupancy of state lands prior to the issuance of the patent cannot be taken into account to make out the period of possession which is necessary to give the occupant title by adverse possession against the patentee.[68] And it has been held that this is true even where the patent is given a retroactive effect.[69]

Possession prior to entry.— Since the statute of limitations does not run against the federal government a defendant cannot, as against plaintiffs who claim title by entry and purchase of the land from the United States, set up title in himself by showing that he was in adverse possession prior to such entry by plaintiffs. (B) Rule That Issuance of Patent Is Not Necessary. On the other hand the courts have sometimes taken the view that the title passes before the issuance of a patent, and have held that the statute begins to run before a patent issues.[70]

(C) New Madrid Locations. Under the law of Missouri, the statute begins to run against a New Madrid location, in favor of an adverse possession, when the plat and survey have been returned to the recorder.[71]

(D) Virginia Military District School Lands. While it has been contended that the statute does not run against the right of one who holds a lease for ninety-nine years, renewable forever, to Virginia military district school lands, and who surrenders his lease and takes a conveyance in fee, except from the date of such conveyance, this contention has been denied, and it has been held that the statute runs against such grantee in favor of the possession of a person holding a similar lease, not merely from the time of the conveyance, but while the land was held under the lease.[72]

(E) Swamp Lands. It seems that the statute does not run against the title of a purchaser of swamp and overflowed lands, founded upon his certificate of purchase from the state, until the land has been certified to the state by the federal government.[73] And it has been held that under a state law granting to the counties certain swamp lands which had previously been granted to the state by act of congress providing that scrip should be issued, and, when located, a patent issued for the land, the statute did not begin to run in favor of an adverse occupant of such land until the issuance of the patent.[74]

(F) Rule Where the Statute Runs against the State. If the statute, by its terms, runs against the state, it will run against a grantee of the state, not merely from the date of the grant, but from the commencement of the adverse occupancy.[75]

C. Indians and Their Grantees. There can be no adverse possession of land prior to the extinguishment of the Indian title,[76] and where land which has been allotted to Indians by the United States is held by an Indian title, that is, where the title is vested in the United States and an Indian, so that there can be no alienation by the latter without the consent of the United States, no title by adverse possession can be acquired in the land.[77] But where the title of the Indian 125, the patent for a lot of land was granted in 1820 to a revolutionary officer in pursuance of an act of the legislature of that year. Although the act declared that the patent should have like effect, as to the title to the lot, as if it had been issued in 1790, it was held that the possession of the defendant prior to 1820, when the state divested itself of the title, could not be taken into the estimate under the plea of the statute of limitations, for it was only from that time the statute began to run.

70. In Pennsylvania it has been held that, as to land purchased from the state, whatever may be the origin of the title, whether it commenced by settlement, application, or warrant, the statute begins to run in favor of an adverse occupant against such settler, applicant, or warrantee from the day his equitable right by settlement first commenced. Munshower v. Patton, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 334, 13 Am. Dec. 678.

Illustrations.— The statute runs against lands held by a warrant and survey (Patten v. Scott, 118 Pa. St. 115, 12 Atl. 292, 4 Am. St. Rep. 576; McCoy v. Dickinson College, 4 Serg. & R. Civ. App. 386, 45 S. W. 221); and the statute will not run against a purchaser from the state until the land is located (Montgomery v. Gunther, 87 Tex. 320, 16 S. W. 1073).

Where, by a treaty with an Indian nation ceding certain lands to the United States, it was provided that particular sections of land should be selected and sold for the benefit of the orphans of the Indians, it was held that since the title to the land so reserved did not vest in the orphans, but was held by the United States for their benefit, no title to such lands could be acquired by adverse possession. Bates v. Aven, 60 Miss. 955.

is coupled with the power of unrestricted alienation the land is subject to the operation of the statute.[78] So when a purchaser of land from an Indian reservee obtains such title as will enable him to maintain ejectment the statute runs against him.[79]

D. Property of Municipal and Quasi-Municipal Corporations — 1. In General. While there is a conflict of opinion as to just how far the rule exempting the sovereign from the operation of the statute should be applied to municipal and quasi-municipal corporations, the cases are generally agreed that the rule is not to be applied to such corporations to the full extent that it is applied in favor of the state.

2. Property Held in the Capacity of a Private Owner. Thus almost if not quite all the cases agree in holding that where property is held by a municipal corporation as a private owner it is subject to the operation of the statute, and title thereto may be acquired by adverse possession.[80] It has even been held that the statute runs against land owned by a county.[81]

3. Property Dedicated to a Public Use — a. In General. But there is a pronounced conflict of opinion as to whether title by adverse possession may be acquired in property which is held by a municipal corporation for a public use.[82]

b. View That the Statute Runs — (1) In General. According to one line of cases the rule which exempts the state from the operation of the statute has no application whatever to municipal corporations, and, in the absence of some provision expressly exempting such corporations from the operation of the statute, title by adverse possession may be acquired to lands held by them for a public use.[83]

In West Virginia this rule was adopted and applied in the earlier cases: Teass v. St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 17 S. E. 400, 19 L. R. A. 802; Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36. But these cases were expressly overruled in Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326.

(II) Streets and Alleys. In line with this view it has been held that title by adverse possession may be acquired to lands dedicated to the public for the purposes of streets, alleys,[84] and public squares.[85]

(III) School Lands. While it has been held in one of the states where this view obtains that, since a county is a subdivision of the state, a county, like the state, is exempt from the operation of the statute,[86] it has, on the other hand, been held that lands held by counties and towns for school purposes are subject to the law of adverse possession.[87]

c. View That the Statute Does Not Run — (I) In General. While the view which has just been discussed is supported by respectable authority and by some very good reasons,[88] it is contrary to the clear weight of authority. The preponderance of authority, and perhaps of reason,[89] support the view that the maxim nullum tempus occurrit regi applies not only to the sovereign power of the state, but also to municipal and quasi-municipal corporations as trustees of the rights of the public, and that title to lands held by a public corporation for a public use cannot be acquired by adverse possession.[90]

88. In opposition to the view that where land is held by a city for the use of the public no title thereto can be acquired by adverse possession, it has been contended that in such cases the position and rights of the city are very analogous to those of a cestui que trust, while the public occupies the position and assumes the obligation of a trustee, and that, since a trustee is vested with a legal cause of action to recover possession of the trustee estate from an intruder, he cannot protect himself from the operation of the statute by showing that he holds the title in trust for another; in other words, that the effect of the statute cannot be avoided by vesting property in one person for the benefit of another. 89. In Almy v. Church, 18 R. I. 182, 187, 26 Atl. 58, the court says: "The grounds upon which the latter class of cases rests are variously stated: as, that an obstruction is a nuisance, and no nuisance can ripen into a right; that individuals may reasonably be held to a limited period to enforce their rights against adverse occupants, because they have interest sufficient to make them vigilant, while in public rights of property each individual feels but a slight interest and will tolerate a manifest encroachment rather than seek a dispute to set it right; that public policy requires the preservation of public rights, and that a municipality cannot, by permissive neglect, invest an intruder with title to a public highway. These reasons are very cogent and in our opinion outweigh the authorities which are opposed to them."

d. Rule Where the Statute Runs against the State. Where the statute, by express provision, runs against the state, the title to lands vested in municipalities is, of course, subject to the bar of the statute[2]

E. Highways. On the ground that there is a distinction between streets and highways which lie outside of and are not subject to the control of municipal corporations[3] it has been held, even in those jurisdictions where streets are considered to be subject to the statute, that title by adverse possession cannot be acquired to land which has been dedicated to the public use for the purposes of a highway.[4] And of course this rule obtains in those jurisdictions where it is held that streets are not subject to the law of adverse possession.[5] There are, however, some few cases in which it is held that highways are subject to the statute.[6] Some of the courts, even in the jurisdictions in which it is held that title by adverse possession cannot be acquired to a highway, have, in certain cases, resorted to the doctrine of estoppel to protect an adverse occupant.[7]

F. Corporations. Unquestionably the statute, in the absence of some provision to the contrary, runs against corporations.[8]

G. Railroad Companies. Since a railroad is not a public highway within the rule which exempts highways from the operation of the statute of limitations, land acquired by a railway company for right of way or station purposes may be taken from it by adverse possession.[9] But it has sometimes been expressly

2. O'Neil v. St. Louis, 8 Mo. App. 416. Highways acquired by prescription.—Under a statute providing that "nothing contained in any statute of limitations shall extend to any lands given, granted, sequestered, or appropriated to any public, pious, or charitable use, or to any lands belonging to this state," it has been held that no title by adverse possession can be acquired to land which forms part of a public highway, although the appropriation of the land for the purpose of a highway had been wrongful in the first instance, the easement having been acquired by ten years' occupancy and use of the road by the public. H. Trust Estates. While it was at one time thought that trust estates were not within the operation of the statute,[11] ever since a decision by Lord Hardwicke to the contrary,[12] it has uniformly been held that an adverse possession which is sufficient to bar the legal estate of the trustee also bars the equitable estate of the cestui que trust.[13] And this is so even though the cestui que trust is under some disability, such as infancy[14] or coverture.[15]

I. Property Acquired by Adverse Possession. Although the title to land has been acquired by adverse possession, it may, of course, like any other title, be defeated by a subsequent adverse possession for the statutory period.[16]

XI. Who May Acquire Title by Adverse Possession.

A. In General. As a general rule, the statute limiting the time for the commencement of real actions operates in favor of every class and description of persons, natural or artificial.[17]

B. States. Although the statute does not run against the state, an adverse possession by the state for the statutory period will give title by adverse possession.[18]

C. Municipal Corporations. A municipal corporation may acquire title to land by adverse possession for corporate purposes[19] and even for other than municipal purposes.[20]

D. Private Corporations — 1. In General. A private corporation is within the operation of the statute of limitations and may acquire title by adverse possession.[21] It has also been held that although a corporation is incapable of holding real estate it may acquire a title by adverse possession which will be valid as against all but the state.[22]

2. Foreign Corporations. Under a statute of limitations providing in effect that the statute shall not run against a person who is absent from the state, it has been held that title by adverse possession cannot be acquired by a foreign corporation.[23] But what seems to be the better view is that, since a foreign corporation is within the state for all the purposes of acquiring jurisdiction, its theoretical domicile within the state under the laws of which it was created does not make it out of the state within the meaning of this provision, and that therefore a foreign corporation is entitled to avail itself of the benefits of the statute.[24]

E. Aliens. Although not capable of holding real property, an alien may successfully set up the defense of adverse possession against the true owner.[25]

F. Infants. Adverse possession by an infant, either by himself or guardian, will vest a title in the infant.[26]

G. Married Women. Where a married woman, in her own right, takes and holds possession of land adversely to the owner for the statutory period, she acquires title by adverse possession[27] which cannot be affected by the acts of her husband.[28] And, though land is held by both the husband and the wife, if the possession is held openly under a deed conveying the legal title to the wife, a title by adverse possession enures to the benefit of the wife.[29]

2. Reason for Rule. The reason for this is that when an entry is not under color of title there is no invasion or disseizin which notifies the true owner of a claim asserted by another person, or which gives him a right of action except as to the land actually occupied.[32]

3. Limitations and Exceptions to Rule — a. In Vermont. In Vermont the rule stated in the preceding sections has not been accepted without some qualification. In a comparatively recent decision it is said: "Where a person without title or color of title enters upon a vacant lot and actually occupies a portion of it, and the lot has a definite boundary marked upon the land, such person, by claiming to be the owner to the boundary lines of the lot, has a constructive possession of the whole and will acquire a title to the whole by such partial occupation for fifteen years." [33]

b. In Pennsylvania. In Pennsylvania a number of decisions appear to hold, without qualification, that one who has no color of title can acquire title only to so much land as he actually occupies.[34] On the other hand there are decisions which seem to place a qualification on the rule very similar to that established in Vermont.[35]

c. In Texas. In this state there are three periods of limitation for acquiring title by adverse possession, of three, five,[36] and ten years, respectively. The ten years' statute contains very peculiar provisions,[37] and there has been some difference of opinion as to its proper construction. In a number of decisions in which the statute was not adverted to the court laid down the general rule, in accordance with that which obtains in most states, that, without color of title, title by adverse possession can be acquired only to such land as was actually occupied by the claimant.[38] But according to the weight of authority one may, by actual occupation of part of a larger tract, title to which is in another, acquire title to one hundred and sixty or six hundred and forty acres thereof, according as his occupation may have been under the former or present ten years' statute, although he may have had actual possession of a much less number of acres than is designated in the statute.[39]

See also Barnhart v. Pettit, 22 Pa. St. 135, wherein it was held that if the adverse occupant claims up to the line of the true owner's survey, using it as his own, exercising the usual acts of ownership over and paying taxes upon the whole tract, twenty-one years before the suit is brought, the statute will protect him for the whole.

B. Where Claimant Has Color of Title — 1. Statement of General Rule as to Effect of Part Possession. The general rule is well settled that where a party enters, under color of title, into the actual occupancy of a part of the premises described in the instrument giving color, his possession is not considered as confined to that part of the premises in his actual occupancy, but he acquires possession of all the lands embraced in the instrument under which he claims.[40] This

If the statutory number of acres has not been defined by specific metes and bounds for the statutory period, judgment will be given for one hundred and sixty acres to be defined under the instructions of the court so as to include the claimant's improvements. Bering v. Ashley, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 30 S. W. 838. If, however, the claimant, on entering, causes the statutory number of acres to be surveyed and marked off, he may acquire a right to the specific lands thus designated. McCarty v. Johnson, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 184, 49 S. W. 1098. It seems, though, that if the occupant makes no claim beyond defined boundaries, he cannot acquire title to more land than was included in such boundaries, although less than the amount designated in the statute. McCarty v. Johnson, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 184, 49 S. W. 1098. On the other hand, under both laws, the possessor may hold what he had actually inclosed, though it exceeds the area to which his possession would have been construed to extend from an occupation of only a part of the area named in the statute. is true although the land is not actually inclosed,[41] and though the tract may be divided into two parts by a river running through it.[42]

2. Reason for Rule. The ground upon which the doctrine of constructive possession is based is that one in possession claiming by metes and bounds under a paper title, and openly and notoriously exercising control and dominion over the land is presumed to be doing so to the extent of his claim.[43]

3. Character of Possession Acquired. A number of decisions characterize the possession acquired by occupancy of part under color of title as "actual possession" to the extent of the boundaries contained in the writing,[44] but in the great majority of cases this possession is characterized as constructive possession.[45]

4. Extent and Qualifications of Rule — a. Size, Situation, and Number of Tracts as Affecting Rule. As is shown in a preceding section,[46] possession under color of title is in general deemed to be coextensive with the boundaries designated in the instrument giving color of title. This rule, however, is, in a number of jurisdictions, subject to a material qualification dependent upon the size of the tract in controversy. The rule deducible from these decisions seems to be that the doctrine of constructive possession has no application where the land claimed is not of a proper size to be managed and used in a body according to the custom and business of the country; that it has no application to a large tract of land which can never be so used.[47] On the other hand there are decisions to the effect that possession of a part of a tract, no matter how small the part occupied is and how large the whole tract may be, gives title to the boundaries included in the deed, no matter what may be the size and character of the tract.[48]

Illustrations.— The rule relating to constructive possession under color of title has no application to a case where a person takes and maintains possession of a few acres of land in an uncultivated township for the mere purpose of thereby gaining a title to the entire township by possession, to the exclusion of the rightful owners (Chandler v. Spear, 22 Vt. 388. See also Paine v. Hutchinson, 49 Vt. 314, in which the same doctrine was applied in respect to a gore of land which was a municipal subdivision). It has also been held that the rule has no application where the tract consists of seven hundred and eighty-three acres, of which only two are in the actual possession of the claimant (Jackson v. Woodruff, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 276, 13 Am. Dec. 525); or where the claimant had actual possession of four hundred acres of the tract consisting of four thousand acres (Thompson v. Burhans, 61 N. Y. 52); or where the tract included upward of fifteen hundred acres (Sharp v. Brandow, 15 Wend. (N. Y.) 597). In case of a grant to a railroad company of a series of strips extending a distance of one hundred and forty miles, adverse possession will be confined to the portion actually occupied by the grantee (Archibald v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 1 N. Y. App. Div. 251, 37 N. Y. Suppl. 336).

Known farm or single lot.—A statute which provides that where a known farm or single lot has been partly improved, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left uncleared, according to the usual custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved, does not introduce a new rule applicable only to future cases, but is simply declaratory of the law as it already existed. Munro v. Merchant, 28 N. Y. 9. But, to establish adverse possession of a known farm outside of the actual possession taken, the known extent of the farm at the time of entry must be established, and adverse possession founded on such entry is limited to that extent. Pepper v. O'Dowd, 39 Wis. 538. The improvement and adverse possession of part of a forty-acre tract of land on a claim of title to the entire forty founded upon a written instrument purporting to convey the forty will, if continued long enough, convey title to the entire forty, such forty constituting a "known lot" within such statute. Kendrick v. Latham, 25 Fla. 819, 6 So. 871. The owner of a farm conveyed the piece in dispute, off the south side thereof, to defendant's predecessor in title, and then conveyed the whole farm to plaintiff's predecessor, who recorded his deed first. The parcel in dispute, together with a lot adjoining it on the south, known as "No. 10," was afterward conveyed in a single tract by mesne conveyance to defendant, and it was always kept and managed as a single tract. On the south side of the disputed piece and for some distance on the east and west sides was a fence dividing it from the farm. It was held that the whole tract conveyed to defendant constituted "a single lot" within the meaning of such statute. Northport Real Estate, etc., Co. v. Hendrickson, 139 N. Y. 440, 34 N. E. 1057 [affirming 65 Hun (N. Y.) 621, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 942].

b. Several Tracts Contiguous or Not Contiguous — (I) Possession of Part of Each Lot by Claimant. Where entry is made on several contiguous lots under color of title, and actual possession is taken of a part of each, such possession is deemed coextensive with the boundaries of the deed.[49]

(II) Adjoining Lots under One Inclosure. Although a tract may be subdivided into a number of smaller lots separated by partitions, possession of one may, nevertheless, be constructive possession of all, if inclosed by a common fence.[50] This, it has been held, is true although the title to the different lots may be derived from different sources.[51]

(III) Contiguous Tracts Embraced under One General Description. Where several distinct parcels of land lying contiguous to each other are conveyed by one deed under one general description embracing them all, actual possession of one of them by the grantee will give him constructive possession of the balance.[52]

(IV) Contiguous Lots Not Embraced under One General Description — Statement of Rule. Although there are a few decisions which seem to lay down the doctrine, without qualification, that where several contiguous tracts are conveyed in one deed, and the grantee takes possession thereunder, such possession draws to it constructive possession of all the lands described in the deed,[53] the weight of authority is to the effect that where several lots are conveyed by one instrument, under separate descriptions of each,— not under one general description including them all or purporting to convey them as one tract,— even though such lots are contiguous to each other, the actual possession of one lot or a part of one lot will not give constructive possession of the balance of the lots.[54]

Illustrations.— Where a deed describes by lot and block several or even the greater number of lots in a platted township or addition, his actual possession of known land for the purpose of adverse possession does not extend to those uninclosed lots of which he is not in actual possession. Morris v. McClary, 43 Minn. 346, 46 N. W. 238. When a block is divided into lots, inclosure and use of some of the lots does not operate as a possession of the whole block. Galveston Land, etc., Co. v. Perkins, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 26 S. W. 256. Actual occupancy of and the making of improvements upon one of two adjoining subdivisions of a grant, both of which are openly claimed under a recorded deed of both, does not give constructive possession to the whole tract. Faison v. Primm, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 34 S. W. 834. See also Turner v. Stephenson, 72 Mich. 409, 40 N. W. 735, 2 L. R. A. 277. And this is true although the claimant looked after the whole tract for the purpose of keeping off trespassers, paid taxes thereon, and

(v) Tract of Grantee and Adjoining Tract Embraced in Conveyance to Him. It has been held that where a party owns and is in possession of a distinct parcel of land, and attempts to extend his dominion over an adjoining piece by taking a deed including in its description his own land and the adjoining tract, he must maintain an actual possession of such tract for the statutory period in order to constitute such an adverse possession as will bar the owner's rights. He does not acquire any constructive possession thereof by such deed.[55]

(vi) Tracts Not Adjoining. Actual possession of one tract of land not contiguous to others is not constructive possession of such other tracts, though conveyed by the same deed;[56] and this is true although they may be described in the deed as one tract.[57]

(vii) Subdivision of Tract by Person Remaining in Possession of Part. Where one who has color of title subdivides the land into lots or blocks, possession of one or more of the lots or blocks by himself or tenant will give him constructive possession of the whole,[58] unless by sale of a portion a part becomes isolated from the rest.[59]

(viii) Sale of Part Actually Occupied by Claimant. Where one in possession of a tract of land sells the portion actually occupied by him, his constructive possession, which then existed as to the remainder, immediately determines.[60]

(ix) Claim to Whole Tract Previously Subdivided and Sold. Where a tract of land has been subdivided, and the subdivisions or any of them conveyed by the true owner, the statute of limitations cannot be invoked by a subsequent granted a right of way to a third party. Faison v. Primm, (Tex. Civ. App. 1896) 34 S. W. 834.

Survey of contiguous tracts.—Where plaintiff made a survey of many contiguous tracts, with the intermediate and dividing boundaries distinctly represented on the plat, it was held doubtful whether such possession on only one of the several tracts would raise a presumption of a grant to all. Alston v. McDowall, McMull. (S. C.) 444.

In Georgia this doctrine is qualified to the extent that if a conveyance of the character under consideration be recorded, actual possession of one of the lots will operate to give constructive possession of all. Sale of intervening tracts.— Where a part of a tract of land of which one is in possession claiming to the extent of the boundaries thereof, so as to give him constructive possession of the whole, is separated from another part of the boundary by the sale of intervening portions of the land, his possession ceases to give him constructive possession of that part of the tract from which he is thus claimant of the whole tract to subdivisions of which he is not and never has been in possession.[61]

(x) Lands Situate in Two Counties. Where one enters in one county on a tract of land lying in two counties, and keeps possession of the same claiming to hold the entire tract, his possession extends only to the lands of the county in which the entry is made.[62]

c. Effect of Invalidity of Title to Part of Land Conveyed. While it is generally true that possession under color of title, though only part of the premises are actually occupied, is coextensive with the boundaries in the deed, the rule, it has been held, is subject to the limitation that if the title was void as to part of the land conveyed, the occupation of that part to which the grantor had title will not give the grantee constructive possession of the other part to which he had no title, so as to disseize the real owner and to divest him of the whole tract described in the deed.[63]

d. Effect of Want of Description or Insufficiency of Description. Where an entry is under a paper title which is void for want of description of any land, the rule as to constructive possession does not attach and the adverse possession will extend only to that part of the land actually occupied and improved.[64]

e. Effect of Mixed Possession — (i) Where Both Defendants Have Color of Title and Actual Possession of Part. Where the title to land is in conflict, and each claimant is in possession of a part of the tract in controversy, the one having the better title has, by his occupation, constructive possession of the whole tract except that which is actually in the possession of his adversary.[65]

Difference in description between deed and record of sale.— Where the deed to a purchaser of lands sold for taxes, and the official record of sales kept by the judge of probate, differ from each other as to the quantity sold, the deed must control when offered, not as a muniment of title, but as color of title fixing the boundaries of an adverse possession. Subsequent entry by owner.— If one who claims title under a deed to a large tract of land enters upon it, builds a house, and acquires actual possession of a small part around his house and constructive possession of the whole, and the owner of the true title afterward enters on the same tract in another place, claiming the whole, the constructive possession thus acquired by the one who first entered is overcome by the constructive possession of the true owner, so that the statute does not run in favor of the owner who has not the true title. possession by the junior claimant of a part of the tract included in his conveyance outside of the interlock or lap gives him no constructive possession of lands lying therein.[70]

(2) Where Senior Claimant Is Not in Possession of Any Part of His Tract. According to a few decisions, if the senior claimant is not in actual possession of any part of the land included within his conveyance, and the junior claimant is in possession of a part of the land included within his conveyance, but outside of the interlock, the junior claimant acquires title by constructive possession of all the lands lying within the boundaries of his conveyance, including the interlock.[71] This view, however, it is believed, is opposed to the weight of authority. Some decisions have directly held that it was immaterial whether the senior claimant had ever been in actual possession of any part of his tract or not; that the junior claimant could not acquire constructive possession of the interlock by occupation of land included in his conveyance, but outside of the interlock.[72] So in a considerable number of decisions the rule is laid down, without qualification, that the possession by the junior claimant of any part of his tract outside of the interlock will not be extended by construction to the land lying within the interlock.[73]

(b) Where Senior Claimant Is in Possession of Interlock. Where the senior claimant has possession of part of the interlock he has constructive possession of the whole, if the junior claimant is not in the actual possession of any part thereof.[74]

(c) Where Junior Claimant Is in Possession of Interlock. According to what is believed to be the great weight of authority, if the junior claimant is in actual possession of a part of the interlock he will acquire constructive possession of the whole of it, although the senior claimant is in possession of some land lying within the conveyance to him, but not within the interlock.[75]

Conflicting deeds.— A deed, in the absence of fraud or mistake, gives the vendee constructive possession of all the territory within its limits, and a subsequent deed by the vendor, although it may cover all the territory first sold, will not interfere with such possession so as to give the grantees in the latter deed title by adverse possession, where they have not been in actual possession of the territory included in both deeds. Contiguous lots.— Where uncleared land has been granted by the state by conflicting patents, the fact that the land granted to the junior patentee was contiguous to his home tract, upon which he was living at the time of the grant, does not extend his possession of the home tract to the land patented so as to give him, as against the senior patentee, adverse possession of the overlapping lands. 5. Effect of Possession by Tenant. Within the rule that actual possession of part of a tract of land under color of title gives constructive possession to the extent of the boundaries designated in the conveyance, a possession by a tenant of part of a tract of land under a conveyance of the whole to his lessor will give the lessor constructive possession of the part not actually occupied by the tenant, as the possession of the tenant enures to the benefit of his lessor.[78]

In Kentucky and Virginia the rule is that where there are conflicting patents for land, and the junior patentee enters and holds by actual possession a part of the interference, claiming the interference to the extent of his patent boundary, and the owner of the senior patent is not in the actual possession of his land at the time of such entry and occupancy by the junior patentee, then the junior patentee acquires the actual possession of the whole interference, and the subsequent entry of the senior patentee upon and occupancy of his land outside of the interference does not give him actual or constructive possession of any part of the interference. Possession by stranger without license.— The mere entry of a stranger upon patented lands without license from the patentee will not necessarily give such patentee possession to the extent of the boundary of his patent.

6. Necessity of Actual Possession as Basis of Constructive Possession. Mere color of title does not draw possession to one who has not or does not take actual possession of some part of the land conveyed.[79]

7. Necessity of Claim of Title Coextensive with Boundaries. Actual possession of a part of the land under color of title will not draw to it constructive possession of the balance unless such color of title is also accompanied by claim of title coextensive with the boundaries of the conveyance.[80]

8. Limitation of Constructive Possession by Boundaries of Deed. Adverse possession under and by virtue of a deed is limited to the premises actually covered thereby.[81] The rule, of course, does not affect the right of the claimant to acquire title to lands outside of the boundaries of the deed under which he occupies, by actual occupation and claim of title or right. preclude such occupancy from being adverse.[82] The occupancy does not refer to the deed, but to the fact itself and its hostile character.[83] Nevertheless it requires a very distinct occupancy to extend the possession beyond the limits described in the deed.[84]

XIII. TITLE OR RIGHT ACQUIRED.

A. In England — 1. UNDER STATUTE 21 JAC. I, C. 16. § 1. According to some of the decisions under this statute possession for the statutory period confers a perfect title upon the claimant,[85] but later decisions either hold or say that title cannot be so acquired; that its effect is not to divest the estate, but merely to bar the remedy.[86]

2. UNDER 3 & 4 WM. IV, C. 27, § 34. The construction placed upon the statute of James not being satisfactory, the statute of William was enacted, and it not only barred the remedy in case of adverse possession, but in terms extinguished the estate.[87] Since the enactment of that statute it has been uniformly held that adverse possession for a period sufficient to bar the action divests the estate of the true owner and transfers it to the party holding adversely.[88]

B. In America — 1. STATEMENT AND EXTENT OF RULE. While it is true that in one state at least there are special statutes under which possession for the statutory period bars the remedy merely,[89] in America the doctrine is almost universal that possession for the statutory period not only bars the remedy of the holder of the paper title, but extinguishes his title and vests title in fee in the adverse occupant.[90] The title acquired by adverse possession is a title in fee simple, and is as

Thus, where one incloses land by a fence and claims title to all within the inclosure, his possession is adverse as to the entire tract, though he believes he is claiming only to the extent of his deed, which in fact does not embrace all the land so fenced. Bisso v. Casper, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 19, 36 S. W. 345.

83. Illinois Steel Co. v. Budzisz, (Wis. 1900) 81 N. W. 1027; Bishop v. Bleyer, 105 Wis. 330, 81 N. W. 413.

84. Shedd v. Powers, 28 Vt. 652, the reason being that the deed, while it is notice of claimant's title to the extent of the boundaries therein set forth, is also a distinct disclaimer of any further defense.

87. The text of this statute is as follows: "Be it further enacted that, at the determination of the period limited by this act, to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing any writ of quare impedit, or other action or suit, the right and title of such person to the land, rent, or advowson for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action, or rent, respectively, might have been made or brought within such period, shall be extinguished."

89. Tennessee.— Tenn. Laws (1819), c. 28, § 2 [Tenn. Code (1896), § 4458] provides that no person or persons or their heirs shall have, sue, or maintain any action or suit, either in law or equity, for any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, but within said seven years next after his, her, or their right to commence, have, or maintain such suit, shall have come fallen or accrued. This section has been uniformly construed to take away the remedy merely and not to vest title in the possessor. Crutsinger v. Catron, 10 Humphr. (Tenn.) 23 Norris v. Ellis, 7 Humphr. (Tenn.) 462; Wallace v. Hannum, 1 Humphr. (Tenn.) 443, 34 Am. Dec. 659; Hopkins v. Calloway, 7 Coldw. (Tenn.) 37; Marr v. Gilliam, 1 Coldw. (Tenn.) 488; East Tennessee Iron, etc., Co. v. Wiggin, 68 Fed. 446, 37 U. S. App. 129, 15 C. C. A. 510. It is to be noted that no such construction is put on statutes of the same or similar language in other jurisdictions. Without going into the argument which the court gives in support of this holding, it is sufficient to say that it was considered that this was the only construction which could give any effect whatever to this section, because of its marked similarity to another section of the same statute. Under other sections of the Tennessee statute, as is shown by the cases cited in the subsequent note (infra, note 90), possession for the period named vests absolute title in the possessor.

c. As Bar to Proceedings for Partition. Adverse possession for the statutory period will bar a petition for partition,[95] whatever may be the legal title of the petitioners.[96]

d. Right of Adverse Claimant to Maintain Ejectment. Where the bar of the statute has become absolute, it is just as available for attacking as for defensive purposes, and its availability in this respect will not depend upon the occupant continuing in the actual possession of the property.[97] He may maintain ejectment against any person acquiring the possession from him by force or fraud, or who has made entry thereon during a temporary absence of the occupant,[98] even though he be the true owner.[99]

e. Right to Bring Suit to Quiet Title. It is likewise an incident of the completion of the statutory bar that the title thus acquired will be quieted in the adverse holder on a bill in equity for that purpose, even against the holder of the legal title barred,[1] and the defendants will be enjoined from asserting title to the premises from former ownership that has been lost.[2] This is true although the adverse title has not been used to disturb him,[3] and though the title be equitable and not at law.[4] When adverse possession is relied on by a complainant as a ground for the removal of a cloud on his title, the right must of necessity be effectuated by extraneous evidence, and equity may always be invoked, in the absence of legal remedies, to quiet a title thus resting in parol.[5]

f. Right to Require Acceptance of Title Acquired by Adverse Possession. The courts will decree specific performance of a contract to purchase a title acquired by adverse possession.[6]

g. Rights of Action Growing out of Trespasses. So one who has acquired title by adverse possession may protect his possession by injunction against the commission of trespasses thereon,[7] and may recover damages for injury to land by reason of trespasses.[8]

XIV. Loss of Title Acquired by Adverse Possession.

A. Abandonment or Surrender. The disseizor may abandon the land or surrender his possession by parol to the disseizee at any time before his disseizin has ripened into a title, and thus put an end to his claim,[9] although a title which has ripened by adverse possession cannot be conveyed by a parol abandonment or relinquishment, but must be transferred by deed.[10]

B. Admission or Agreement. Where title has become perfect by adverse possession for the statutory period it is not lost by an admission by the holder that the possession was not adverse,[11] although the admission be in writing;[12] or by confession that the disseizin was committed with a fraudulent intent, and fraudulently concealed until the expiration of the time limited by the statute;[13] or by an admission of defects or infirmities in the title under which he held adversely;[14] or by a subsequent recognition of a previous title which, originally rightful, has lost that character by a delay to enforce it;[15] or by an agreement to join in a survey.[16]

Right to reclaim after declaration of abandonment.— It follows, therefore, that although one who has acquired title by adverse possession goes out of possession declaring that he abandons it to the former owner and does not intend to make any claim again to the land, he is not precluded from reclaiming what he has thus abandoned. School Dist. No. Four v. Benson, 31 Me. 381, 52 Am. Dec. 618.

C. Assertion of Right under Subsequently Acquired Title. Title by adverse possession for the statutory period is not lost by the owner's assertion of right under some other title subsequently acquired.[17]

D. Temporary Break in or Interruption of Possession. If title has become perfect by adverse possession it is not lost by a temporary break in[18] or interruption of[19] the occupation thereof.

E. Loss of Color of Title. Where the statute of limitations operated in favor of a devisee, and the will under which the devisee held possession was subsequently set aside, it did not divest the devisee of the rights acquired by the statute.[20]

XV. PLEADING.

A. Necessity of Pleading Specially — 1. In Actions by Claimant — a. For Possession. To entitle the plaintiff to recover in an action of ejectment on the ground of having acquired the title to the demanded property by five years' adverse possession, it is not necessary to allege adverse possession for the statutory period. Under an averment of ownership in fee and of right to the possession at the commencement of the action plaintiff may prove any facts which would entitle him to recover at that time.[21]

b. For Trespass. In actions for trespass, where the complaint alleges title to the premises in plaintiff, he may show adverse possession without specially pleading it.[22]

Submission to survey by holder of paper title.— In Riggs v. Riley, 113 Ind. 208, 15 N. E. 253, it was held that where, by adverse possession, one has gained title in fee, payment of rent by him thereafter for two years to the person having the paper title, and a subsequent survey procured by the latter without objection on the part of the former, will not defeat the title already gained. In this case the court quoted with approval from Cleveland v. Obenchain, 107 Ind. 591, 593, 8 N. E. 624, as follows: "In submitting to a survey he does not surrender any valid title that he may have, no matter how it may have been acquired. In not objecting to a survey he does not put himself in the position of surrendering his land or any part of it."

An offer to purchase any right which the holder of the paper title may have, for the purpose of avoiding litigation, does not affect the title acquired by adverse possession. Trespass to try title.— As the Texas statute [Sayles Civ. Stat. art. 5250] fully prescribes the requisites of a petition in trespass to try title without providing that the facts establishing title must be pleaded, plaintiff may establish title by limitation, though not set up in the petition, where the petition is in the form prescribed by statute. Article 3377, providing that laws of limitation shall not be available to any person in any suit unless specifically set forth as a defense in his answer, has no application. Benavides v. Molino, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 60 S. W. 260.

22. Donahue v. Thompson, 60 Wis. 500, 19 N. W. 520. To the same effect see Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Wickham, (Tex. Civ. App. 1898) 44 S. W. 1023.

2. In Actions against Claimant — a. In General — (I) For Possession. In most jurisdictions where adverse possession is relied on as a defense to an action at law to recover the possession of land it need not be specially pleaded, but may be shown under the general issue or general denial.[23] In other jurisdictions, however, adverse possession cannot be relied upon to defeat recovery unless it is specially pleaded.[24]

(II) For Trespass. The defendant in an action for trespass, under the general plea of title, without allegations that title is claimed by adverse possession, may introduce evidence to characterize his possession as adverse to any title of plaintiff.[25]

(III) To Foreclose Tax-Lien. In actions to foreclose tax liens it has been held that adverse possession must be specially pleaded to be available as a defense.[26]

b. Admissibility under General Issue as Affecting Right to Plead Specially. While it has been held that the fact that evidence of adverse possession is admissible under the general issue or general denial does not take away the right to plead it specially,[27] yet there are decisions which hold that it is improper to plead both the general issue and adverse possession specially.[28]

B. Necessary and Sufficient Allegations[29] — 1. As to Possession. Where adverse possession is specially pleaded, the party relying on it must allege that his

Reason for rule.— It has been said in a recent decision that "when the statute is relied on as a bar to the remedy merely, it must be specially pleaded. . . . But where the title to real estate is in question the operation of the statute is found to have a higher range. It is capable of conferring an absolute title. Hence it has long been held that a general denial of the plaintiff's title will suffice for the admission of evidence of adverse possession for the statutory period; because this will not merely bar the remedy, but may establish a title in the defendant which will exclusively negative any ownership in the plaintiff. In other words, it sustains and verifies the denial of the plaintiff's title." Hill v. Bailey, 8 Mo. App. 85, 87.

Striking out special plea.— It has been held not improper to strike out such special pleading (Wilson v. William, 52 Miss. 487), and that it should be struck out on motion or by the court of its own motion as tending to embarrass the trial (Weiskoph v. Dibble, 18 Fla. 24 [citing Wade v. Doyle, 17 Fla. 522]). But see Hill v. Atterbury, 88 Mo. 114, wherein it was held that a refusal to strike out an answer pleading adverse possession specially was not a ground for reversal inasmuch as by such statements plaintiffs were informed of the specific grounds on which defendants relied, of which they might otherwise have been ignorant until proved on the trial.

29. Forms of pleading setting up adverse possession.— For forms of pleadings in which adverse possession was held to be sufficiently pleaded see Young v. Cox, (Ky. 1890) 14 possession was actual;[30] open, notorious, and visible;[31] exclusive;[32] continuous and uninterrupted,[33] and for the statutory period;[34] and that it was hostile or adverse or under claim of right or title by him.[35]

2. As to Payment of Taxes. Payment of taxes, though made an element of adverse possession by statute, need not be alleged, it being a mere matter of proof and not of pleading.[36]

3. As to Color of Title. If color of title is an element of adverse possession it should be pleaded.[37]

4. Denying Disability of Complainant. A plea setting up adverse possession which fails to negative an allegation in the bill that certain of the complainants were under disability when their rights or possessions accrued and have so continued is insufficient.[38]

Allegation in direct terms unnecessary.— An allegation of ownership and possession during a period sufficient to make the statute of limitations available is sufficient without alleging in direct terms that the party had been in possession for more than three years (the statutory period) prior to the commencement of the action. Sullivan v. Dunphy, 4 Mont. 499, 2 Pac. 284.

Alleging possession for longer than statutory period.— It is no objection to a pleading that an allegation of possession for a longer period than necessary to sustain the allegation of adverse possession is not sustained by the evidence where it does appear that there was possession for a sufficient length of time to give title. Bogardus v. Trinity Church, 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 633; Harpending v. Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, 16 Pet. (U. S.) 455, 10 L. ed. 1029.

Setting out facts showing character of possession.— According to some cases it will be sufficient to allege generally that the possession is adverse, without stating the facts and circumstances which constitute the evidence of such possession. Portis v. Hill, 3 Tex. 273; Montague County v. Meadows, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 42 S. W. 326; Bartlett v. Secor, 56 Wis. 520, 14 N. W. 714. In others, however, it is held that a party relying upon adverse possession must allege in his pleadings the facts from which it will affirmatively appear that his possession was of an adverse and hostile character. Lick v. Diaz, 30 Cal. 65; Clarke v. Hughes, 13 Barb. (N. Y.) 147; McCloskey v. Barr, 38 Fed. 165; Hardman v. Ellames, 2 Myl. & K. 732.

Sufficiency of instrument relied on.—Where a tax-deed is relied on as color of title it is not necessary to allege that the requirements of the statute in regard to the levying of taxes, advertising of the property, recovery of the judgment, and the conducting of the sale and the execution of the tax-deed relied on was complied with. The deed need not be valid to give color of title. Walker v. Converse, 148 148 Ill, 622, 36 N. E. 202.

5. DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY. Where defendant claims a part of the land sued for by limitation, and the plea describes such part so that it it can be readily identified, the description is sufficient.[39]

6. REFERENCE TO STATUTE CREATING BAR. In pleading the statute to a bill in chancery it has been held unnecessary to refer expressly to the statute of the state in which the proceeding is instituted. The court is judicially bound to take notice of the statute of limitations.[40]

C. When Available by Demurrer. Where the declaration, complaint, or bill does not show affirmatively that title is barred by adverse possession on the part of defendant, the defense of adverse possession is not available by demurrer either at law[41] or in equity.[42] If, on the other hand, it appears on the face of the bill that defendant has had adverse possession for a period long enough to vest title in him, unless some sufficient excuse is shown in the bill, defendant may and should demur on that ground.[43] A bill which shows on its face that defendants have held the land adversely for the statutory period is fatally defective.[44]

D. Reply. Where, in an action of trespass to try title to land, defendant pleads adverse possession as a defense, plaintiff, if he desires to avail himself of the fact that the statute was suspended by defendant's temporary absence from the state, must set up such fact in his reply.[45]

E. Amendments. It has been held that where the defense of adverse possession is defectively stated the court may, in furtherance of justice, permit an amendment thereof after verdict, so as to make it conform to the ultimate facts proven.[46] An amendment of a bill in which adverse possession is set up must fail when repugnant to the bill.[47]

He must show every element necessary to constitute a title under the statute of limitations,[49] and if he fail to do so it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury that there is not sufficient evidence to entitle him to recover.[50] It must be shown that the possession was actual,[51] open and notorious,[52] continuous,[53] and for the full time required by the statute,[54] exclusive,[55] and hostile.[56] So, if payment of taxes is made an element of title by adverse possession by statute, the burden of proof is upon the party setting up adverse possession to show such payment.[57] The claimant by adverse possession also has the burden of showing the extent of his possession.[58]

same land, one by title and the other by wrong, the law considers the one who has the title as in possession to the extent of his right so as to preclude the other from taking advantage of the statute of limitations.[61]

2. Arising from Possession — a. Naked Possession. Although the law seems to be settled in one state that mere possession unexplained will be presumed to be adverse,[62] the great weight of authority is to the effect that mere possession without claim or color of title will be presumed to be in subordination to the title of the true owner,[63] and no length of time unaccompanied by any change in the character of the possession will render it adverse.[64] It is well settled that every presumption should be made in favor of a possession in subordination to the title of the true owner.[65]

b. And Permissive Entry. Where a party enters into possession of land under permission or license from the owner, the presumption is that his possession is in subordination to the true owner, in the absence of any acts amounting to a disseizin.[66]

Applications of rule.— A tenant entitled by curtesy sold his improvements on the land to H, who took possession under an arrangement with his vendor. H continued in possession a number of years till he made a quit-claim deed to defendant's vendor. The tenant by curtesy gave a release and deed to the land to plaintiffs, his children, who were entitled to the property after his death, and they immediately brought suit for the land. It was held that H, having entered into possession as a subordinate of the life-tenant, would be presumed to have continued in pos-

c. Accompanied by Other Elements of Adverse Possession. While the law stated in a preceding section [67] is elementary, there may, nevertheless, be circumstances under which a presumption of adverse holding will arise. Thus it has been held that one who enters upon land under claim and color of title is presumed to enter and occupy according to his title,[68] and where one who enters without claim or color of title subsequently acquires a colorable title, from that period an adverse possession will commence.[69] So actual occupancy and substantial inclosure of land, accompanied by acts of ownership inconsistent with ownership in another, has been held to be presumedly adverse,[70] and an actual, continuous, and exclusive possession for the statutory period, unexplained, raises a presumption that the possession is hostile.[71] Although the facts are sufficient to raise the presumption of adverse possession, this presumption may nevertheless be rebutted by proof to the contrary.[72]

d. By One Cotenant. It is well settled that where one joint owner is in possession of the whole, the presumption is that he is keeping possession not only for himself but for his cotenant according to their respective rights.[73] But an ouster or disseizin, while not to be presumed from the mere fact of sole possession, may be shown by such possession accompanied with a notorious claim of an exclusive right.[74]

e. Continued Possession by Grantor. Where the grantor and grantee remain in joint possession, the latter being a member of the grantor's family, the possession of the grantor will not be presumed adverse to the possession of the grantee, in whom the legal title is vested.[75] So it cannot be inferred that the possession of the former owner after sale for taxes was forcible and adverse.[76]

3. As to Actual Residence. Where actual residence of land is a prerequisite of title by adverse possession such actual residence cannot be presumed, but must be proved.[77]

4. As to Continuity of Possession. According to some decisions, adverse possession, when once shown, is presumed to continue until the contrary session as such till he repudiated the release by making a deed to the land. Mullins v. Conger, (Ky. 1893) 22 S. W. 546, 880.

So, too, one entitled to possession in the right of his wife will be presumed to hold subservient to the title of the wife, although he holds a void deed purporting to give him title in fee. Corwin v. Corwin, 6 N. Y. 342, 57 Am. Dec. 453.

When presumption of permissive entry arises.— D purchased a tract of land in 1853, upon which his son J immediately entered, remaining in possession or exercising control over it for eighteen years, until D's death, and afterward for eight years, until ejectment brought by D's devisees. In 1869 D conveyed to J another place, to which he moved. Until 1867 D paid the taxes on the tract in controversy; afterward J paid them. The tract was at times spoken of by D as his own, and at times as J's. J, after moving from it, received the rents, and always made repairs at his own expense. He claimed, in the action of ejectment, under a parol gift. It was held that the facts failed to show an adverse holding as against D during his lifetime, and that the presumption was that J entered under a mere license. Dean v. Tucker, 58 Miss. 487.

appears;[78] but according to others there is no such presumption, and although adverse possession may be shown to have existed at one time, it must be shown to have existed continuously for the whole period of limitation.[79]

5. As to Good Faith. Good faith in acquiring color of title will be presumed until the contrary is shown, and in order to overcome this presumption a design to defraud the person having a better title must be shown.[80] The party who alleges bad faith must prove it.[81]

6. As to Payment of Taxes. Where payment of taxes is made an element of adverse possession there is no presumption that the claimant has paid them, but he must show this fact;[82] nor does any presumption of payment arise from the fact that the taxes were assessed to the claimant and no default in payment was shown.[83] On the other hand, in the absence of evidence by the claimant, either that taxes assessed on the land were paid by him or that none were assessed, it will be presumed that taxes have been assessed and that he has not paid them.[84] If taxes are paid by one not claiming title to the land, and the owner subsequently compensates him therefor, it will be presumed that the payment was made in the owner's behalf.[85] So, where the claimant shows that he has paid all the taxes assessed during the statutory period, he is not bound to show that there were no special assessments on the land, the presumption being that there were none.[86]

7. As to Extent of Possession. Possession of one claiming under color of title is presumed to be coextensive with the boundaries of the instrument under which he claims,[87] and that claim of title is limited to the premises described in the deed.[88] The presumption may be rebutted, but only by positive evidence that the person claimed to be the owner of more than his deed expressed.[89]

C. Admissibility — 1. In General. Title by adverse possession may be shown by proof of claimant's acts, in the exercise of which he assumed to be the owner,[90] and such acts may be shown by parol evidence.[91]

2. As to Character of Possession — a. Actual Possession. A deed is not evidence of actual possession according to the boundaries described therein,[92] nor can it be shown by evidence that it was generally known in the vicinity of the land that the claimant's grantor claimed title thereto.[93] So possession cannot be established by declarations of a grantee in a deed of the property that the property was his, such declarations not being admissible except to characterize a possession otherwise proved.[94] The testimony of witnesses who have lived on the premises is competent to show actual possession.[95]

b. Open and Notorious Possession. Notoriety of possession by one setting up title by adverse possession may be shown by testimony that in the vicinity of the land he was reputed to be the owner[96] or in possession thereof.[97]

c. Continuous Possession. Where land is held adversely by different occupants, the continuity of their possession, in order to show a limitation, need not be proved by written evidence, but may be shown by parol.[98]

d. Exclusive Possession. Where, in ejectment, evidence is introduced to show exclusive possession of defendant for the statutory period, plaintiff should be permitted to introduce evidence to the contrary.[99]

e. Hostile Possession — (I) To Show Hostility — (A) Declarations of Claimant. Declarations of one in actual possession of land, showing that he claims to be sole owner, are admissible as tending to show hostility of possession.[1] Nevertheless, declarations made out of the presence of the grantor by the grantee in a deed of land who has never been in possession are not admissible;[2] and it has been held that declarations by one who enters under another, and who sets up title by disseizin, made to a stranger to the title, that he held adversely to the owner, are not admissible.[3] So declarations of one having title to land, that it was occupied by his mother and that he lived on it as her property, are irrelevant to show a disseizin by her, as they show that she occupied with his consent.[4]

(B) Acts of Ownership. Where an issue is raised as to whether a person seized during his lifetime asserted title to the land, evidence may be introduced by those claiming under such person that during his lifetime he performed work upon it.[5] Evidence of a conveyance by one claiming by adverse possession is also admissible on the question whether the possession was adverse.[6] And where a wife, during her husband's life, has claimed property in his possession as her own, and on his death becomes administrator, her omission to inventory the property as part of his estate is evidence that her possession after his death was adverse to the estate.[7]

(C) Payment of Taxes. To show character of the possession, the assessment rolls are admissible to prove that the land was assessed to the claimant's grantor for the statutory period,[8] but tax assessments paid by one who has never been in possession are inadmissible to show his adverse possession.[9]

(D) Record of Former Suit. The record of a suit by plaintiffs against the adverse holder, in which they recovered possession, is admissible to show adverse occupancy[10] provided it contains such a description of the land as will identify and locate it,[11] but the record of a suit tending to show adverse possession is properly excluded where the evidence shows that possession was not held for the statutory period.[12]

(E) Deed under Which Claimant Holds. Although a deed be void upon its face, it may nevertheless be used to show the hostile character of the possession claimed under it.[13]

(II) To Disprove Hostility—(A) In General. In order to show that possession is not of a hostile character it is competent to introduce evidence that the claimant accepted a lease from the owner.[14] So, where plaintiff claims title by adverse possession, a deed from him to defendant, given more than ten years before the bringing of the action, with oral testimony that about the time of its execution plaintiff became the agent for defendant, is competent to show that plaintiff's possession was not adverse.[15] And correspondence between the grantor and the officers of the grantee, a railroad company, occurring before the execution of the conveyance and covenant, may be admitted to prove the grantee's permissive occupation and to rebut the idea of adverse possession.[16]

(B) Declarations of Claimant or Predecessor in Title. Declarations made by claimant showing or tending to show that his possession was not hostile are admissible to prove such fact.[17] Thus it may be shown that he declared that he took possession of the land as the agent of another,[18] that he disclaimed any title in himself[19] or that he admitted title in another, whether such admission was made before or after the expiration of the statutory period.[20]

3. As to Extent of Possession. Declarations of the occupant at the time of the settlement, as to under whom and how he took possession, are admissible to show extent of possession,[21] which may be shown also by a deed under which the claimant entered, though void or in some respects defective.[22]

4. As to Title — a. To Show Claim of Title. According to the weight of authority, declarations of ownership made by one in actual possession of land are part of the res gestæ of possession and are admissible to show claim of title or the absence of it.[23] So declarations of a former occupant under whom the adverse possessor claims, showing that such occupant entered without claim of title, are admissible in evidence against the claimant.[24] And so, on the issue of claim of title, it may be shown that the claimant brought an action of trespass against others who attempted to use the property,[25] that he listed the land for taxation,[26] and that he paid taxes thereon.[27] The manner of using and conducting the property in dispute may also be shown as bearing on the question of claim of title.[28]

b. To Show Notoriety of Claim of Title. Evidence that it was generally known in the vicinity of the land that the claimant or his grantor claimed title thereto is admissible to show notoriety of claim of title,[29] but not to show title itself.[30]

5. As to Payment of Taxes. Where payment of taxes is material, tax-receipts in which there is a slight mistake in the spelling of the name, but otherwise identifying the land in controversy, are admissible as bearing on the question of payment of taxes;[31] and it has been held competent to prove by parol on what land taxes have been in fact paid, and thus supplement or contradict the evidence of the written receipts for taxes.[32] The claimant may also show, by the tax-lists, property on which he was assessed, and that the property was not assessed to any one else,[33] and evidence that a person had been in possession of land a number of years and had stipulated to pay the taxes will be allowed to go to the jury, with liberty to infer that he had paid them.[34] To rebut proof of payment of taxes the record of a judgment for taxes against certain land assessed as the property of another person is not admissible where the land is not shown to be identical with that in suit.[35] necessitates resort to mere conjecture.[37] It is not to be understood, however, that the evidence should show adverse possession beyond a reasonable doubt, for such is not the law, and a finding of adverse possession may be based upon a mere preponderance of the evidence.[38] So direct and positive evidence is not necessary to the establishment of adverse possession or any of its elements. It may be shown by circumstantial evidence.[39]

E. Province of Court and Jury — 1. Statement of General Rule. Adverse possession is usually a mixed question of law and fact. Whether the facts exist which constitute adverse possession is for the jury to determine,[40] and whether the facts as found by the jury constitute adverse possession is a question of law for the court.[41] On the other hand, on admitted or disputed facts, the court may decide the question of title as matter of law,[42] and if there is no evidence to show adverse possession the court need not and should not submit the question to the jury.[43]

2. In Determining Character of Possession — a. Whether Actual. It is for the jury to decide whether the party relying on adverse possession had actual possession of the premises claimed.[44]

Evidence as to hostility of possession.—The evidence was held sufficient to show hostility of possession in Miller v. Bensinger, (Cal. 1892) 31 Pac. 578; Houchin v. Houchin, (Ky. 1892) 20 S. W. 506; Strutton v. Strutton, (Ky. 1888) 9 S. Another statement of the rule is that adverse possession is a question of fact for the jury under proper instructions from the court. Kennedy v. Townsley, 16 Ala. 239; Clapp v. Bromagham, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 530; Jackson v. Joy, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 102; Broxson v. McDougal, 70 Tex. 64, 7 S. W. 591. What is meant by this is that the court instructs that if certain facts are found by the jury they are to render a verdict for or against the party relying on adverse possession. It follows from what has been said that if there is any evidence, no matter how slight, tending to show adverse possession, the question should be submitted to the jury. Bennett v. Morrison, 120 Pa. St. 390, 14 Atl. 264, 6 Am. St. Rep. 711.

If evidence as to one or more elements that go to make up title by adverse possession is wanting, the court should charge that the party claiming by virtue of the statute has no title thereunder. De Haven v. Landell, 31 Pa. St. 120. See also Herbert v. Hanrick, 16 Ala. 581.

b. Whether Open and Notorious. It is also for the jury to decide whether there has been open and notorious possession.[45]

c. Whether Exclusive. Whether claimant's possession has been exclusive is a question for the jury.[46]

d. Whether Continuous and of Sufficient Duration. So it is for the jury to decide when the possession commenced,[47] and whether it has been continuous[48] and for the requisite period.[49]

e. Whether Hostile. It is likewise for the jury to determine whether the possession has in fact been hostile or in subordination to the title of another,[50] and under claim of title in the person setting it up.[51]

3. In Determining Good Faith. The good faith of the party claiming title by adverse possession is in all cases a question of fact for the jury.[52]

Application of rule.— In an action to quiet title, where the adverse possession of defendants and their grantor is not within the statutory period unless tacked to that of a prior vendor, and there is evidence that he went into possession in 1852 and cultivated the land until he sold it, paid taxes, and scheduled it as assets of his insolvent estate, but in 1868 wrote letters to plaintiff's ancestors tending to show that he held permissively under them, it is for the jury to say whether his title was in fact adverse. Trufant v. White, 99 Ala. 526, 13 So. 83.

Defendant's decedent purchased land, taking the title in plaintiff's name without the latter's knowledge. After receiving the deed he took possession of the land, improved and occupied the same as a homestead, paying taxes and exercising acts of ownership over the property for more than twenty years, and until his death, without informing plaintiff that the deed ran to him. It was held that whether decedent claimed the land as his own, or intended that his possession should enure to the benefit of plaintiff, was a question for the jury. McPherson v. Featherstone, 37 Wis. 632.

Rule applicable where court sits as jury.— The question whether a possession is hostile is for the jury or for the court sitting as such, and in an action to establish a right of way by prescription the finding of the court on that question, in the absence of the testimony from the record, will be presumed to be correct. Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 Pac. 491.

4. In Determining Color of Title. On the other hand, what is color of title is a question of law,[53] and when the facts exhibiting the title are shown the court will determine whether they amount to color of title.[54]

5. In Determining Whether Adverse Possession Has Been Abandoned. Where one enters upon part of a tract of land under a deed from one having no title, and afterward receives a deed from the disseizee of a large part of the same tract, it is a question for the jury whether the disseizor did not intend thereby to yield and to abandon his possessory title to the whole tract on thus obtaining a perfect title to a large part of it.[55]

Classification of advowsons.— Advowsons are of two kinds: (1) Appendant, and (2) in gross. An advowson appendant means an advowson which is, and which from the first has been and ever since continued to be appended or annexed to a manor so that, if the manor were granted to any one, the advowson would go with it as incident to the estate. An advowson in gross signifies an advowson that belongs to a person, but is not annexed to a manor; so that an advowson appendant may be made an advowson in gross by severing it by deed of grant from the manor to which it was appendant. Advowsons are also either (1) presentative, (2) collative, or (3) donative. An advowson is termed presentative when the patron has the right of presentation to the bishop or ordinary, and also to require of him to institute his clerk, if he finds him qualified. An advowson is termed collative when the bishop and patron happen to be one and the same person, so that the bishop, not being able to present to himself, performs by one act (which is termed collation) all that is usually done by the separate acts of presentation and institution. An advowson is termed donative when the king or a subject founds a church or chapel, and does by a single donation in writing, place the clerk in possession, without presentation, institution or induction (Cowel; Coke Litt. 17*b*, 119*b*). Again, advowsons are either advowsons of rectories or advowsons of vicarages; the former having been created in very early times, almost contemporaneously with the creation of the manor itself: the latter having grown up more gradually, and as a consequence of the monasteries appropriating to themselves the tithes of the churches, and
