Rep. 773, where, in an action for partition of lands to which a lunatic and his committee were defendants, the averments of the petition as to the ownership of the lands were admitted by defendants, and no proof thereof was offered, as required by Ky. Civ. Code, § 126, which provides that material averments, although not denied, cannot be taken as true against a person under disability, and it was held that the defect, if any, was, as to the purchaser of the lands, cured by evidence showing such ownership, afterward produced in court on exceptions taken by him to the sale.

23. Campbell v. Bowen, 1 Rob. (Va.) 241.

Necessity of determining question of sanity.— In a suit against a trustee and his cestui que trust, a bare suggestion in the bill that the trustee has become a lunatic does not render it incumbent on the chancellor to ingraft upon the suit an inquiry into the lunacy. Campbell v. Brannin, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 478.

24. Yourie v. Nelson, 1 Tenn. Ch. 275, holding that pending a bill by a guardian to set aside conveyances on the ground that the ward at the time they were made was of unsound mind, the court, upon application of the parties properly verified, and security given for costs, will, even after argument, order a writ of inquisition to issue to asceraction on a note, an assignment of which was procured from an insane person by undue influence and fraud, the question of sanity or insanity may be tried, irrespective of whether a commission of lunacy has been issued.[25] A plea that plaintiff has become insane, filed on the day set for trial, will not be allowed to delay the trial while the question of insanity is being investigated.[26] A court of equity may submit the case to the jury on a feigned issue.[27] In a suit by a lunatic by his next friend, where defendant relies on a power of attorney given by plaintiff to dismiss the suit, the court may, at the same time the issues raised in the suit are submitted, submit the issue whether plaintiff was compos mentis when the power of attorney was executed.[28] In a suit by a guardian to set aside his ward's deed on the ground of insanity, although the impression made upon the jury by the appearance of the ward may be slight, still, in connection with other evidence in relation thereto, it should be allowed to have its effect.[29]

Necessity of feigned issue.—It is not necessary, in a suit in equity to avoid a lunatic's conveyance, that the question of the party's sanity be first submitted to a jury on a feigned issue, such an issue being merely to inform the conscience of the court. Judgment against guardian and ward.— In Illinois, where defendant in ejectment becomes insane, and his conservator is not substituted as an administrator or executor would be, but his name is added with the defendant in the title of the case, the court cannot render judgment against defendant and his conservator, and award a writ of possession against both, with costs against the conservator alone. Jurisdiction.— That a county court has appointed a committee for and acquired jurisdiction of the person and property of a lunatic does not preclude the supreme court, in an action properly brought before it against the lunatic and his committee, from making an order opening a default judgment against the lunatic, and permitting his committee to appear for him in the action without an order first obtained from the county court. Civ. App. 666, 32 S. W. 93. And see Eckstein's Estate, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 59, 2 Pa. L. J. 137, 1 Pa. L. J. Rep. 224 (where, on petition of the committee of a lunatic, supported by special affidavit, an injunction was granted by the common pleas to restrain an execution creditor of the lunatic from levying on and selling the personal estate in the hands of his committee); Tabb v. Gist, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,719, 1 Brock 33, 6 Call (Va.) 279 (holding that, although one may not be so insane as to avoid his contracts, yet if he labors under melancholy, this may authorize relief against a judgment obtained against him while in such a state of mind).

However, where process was served on an insane defendant and his personal guardians, none of whom appeared or answered, a judgment thereupon rendered by default is neither void nor voidable, but merely erroneous, to correct which proceedings in error should be had, instead of an action to declare the judgment void. McAllister v. Lancaster County Bank, 15 Nebr. 295, 18 N. W. 57. And after the appointment of a committee of a lunatic, the lunatic cannot object to a judgment recovered against him that he was not sufficiently recovered to attend to business, without showing that his committee were out of commission. Henderson v. Mitchell, 1 Bailey Eq. (S. C.) 113, 21 Am. Dec. 526.

Lunacy is no sufficient ground in equity for declaring a judgment at law against a lunatic a nullity. Stigers v. Brent, 50 Md. 214, 33 Am. Rep. 317. In any event, where a judgment is obtained against a lunatic, and an execution issued and levied upon his property, before the institution of proceedings in lunacy in the court of chancery, the court will not set aside the judgment and execution upon a summary application of the committee, although such judgment and execution are overreached by the finding of the jury upon the commission of lunacy. Matter of Hopper, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 489.

43. Dickerson v. Davis, 111 Ind. 433, 12 N. E. 145 (holding that where a judgment by default is taken against a person of unsound mind, presumably after due service of process, by a bona fide holder of a note obtained by fraud and without consideration by the original payee, defendant never having been judicially declared of unsound mind and plaintiff having no knowledge thereof, it will be set aside, and the guardian or administrator let in to defend, by simply showing that defendant was of unsound mind when the note was executed and the judgment taken, and that it was without consideration); Hawley v. Griffin, 121 Iowa 667, 92 N. W. 113, 97 N. W. 86 (where a decree in a suit to quiet title by grantees in tax deeds against the owner, who was insane and did not appear and for whom no guardian was appointed, entered in favor of plaintiff without any cognizance of the insanity of defendant, was vacated, although it had not been judicially found that defendant was insane and he was not confined in a state hospital). See, however, Woods v. Brown, 93 Ind. 164, 47 Am. St. Rep. 369 (holding that it is no ground for setting aside a judgment that it was rendered on default, without service of process, at a time when defendant therein was insane); Carroll Imp. Co. v. Engleman, (Iowa 1904) 99 N. W. 514 (holding that where, on foreclosure, personal service has been had on an insane person and her guardian, failure to appoint a guardian ad litem for the insane person was a mere irregularity, not affecting the judgment); White v. Hinton, 3 Wyo. 753, 30 Pac. 953, 17 L. R. A. 66.

Bill of review distinguished.— Proceedings to vacate a decree in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to quiet title by grantees in tax deeds against the owner, who was insane and did not appear and for whom no guardian was appointed, instituted by the heirs of the deceased owner under Iowa Code (1873), § 3154 et seq., authorizing the court to vacate a decree for erroneous proceedings against an insane person, differ from proceedings in equity in the nature of a bill of review, the former being governed by the conditions and limitations contained in the statute, and the latter by the ordinary rules of procedure. Hawley v. Griffin, 121 Iowa 667, 92 N. W. 113, 97 N. W. 86.

e. Execution.[45] In some states execution may issue on a judgment against an insane person, and his property be seized and sold;[46] but execution cannot be levied on the lunatic's property after a decree ordering it to be sold,[47] or on personal property in the possession of the committee,[48] the remedy of the creditor in such cases being by application to the court having jurisdiction, which will order the committee to raise and pay over the funds necessary to satisfy the judgment.[49] However, a sale of the lunatic's property on execution cannot be collaterally attacked because of his lunacy,[50] and the rights of the purchaser will be protected.[51]

2. Review.[52] An order denying a motion for judgment by default against plaintiff as guardian of an insane person as prayed by the cross complaint is not appealable.[53] An insane person may appeal in a lucid interval, although a guardian ad litem has been appointed.[54] A guardian may appeal or bring error in behalf of the ward.[55] The guardian ad litem is guardian for the case, and will be presumed to act as such in the appellate court.[56] An insane person's appeal need not await the removal of his disability,[57] and the statutes limiting the time for appealing do not as a rule apply to insane persons.[58] Service of notice of appeal on an insane person's guardian ad litem, who also appeared as his attorney in the court below, is sufficient.[59] Objections cannot be taken for the first time on appeal.[60] The propriety of rendering judgment against an insane person is reviewable on writ of error.[61] The appointment of a guardian ad litem rests in the discretion of the lower court.[62] Questions of fact will not ordinarily be reviewed on appeal.[63] A judgment will not be reversed for harmless error.[64]

Illustrations.— Where the committee of a lunatic, under the direction of the vice-chancellor, had improperly presented a petition to the chancellor in reference to the estate, he was held not to be charged with costs on the petition being dismissed (Matter of Hopper, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 489), and an incompetent person who is made a party to a suit to determine the construction of a will will not be left to pay his own costs out of property not derived under the will or from testator (King v. Strong, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 94). Where costs are directed to be paid out of the estate of a lunatic, if the litigation is unnecessarily protracted for the purpose of vexation the court will tax the party so acting with the costs. Alexander v. Alexander, 8 Ala. 796.

Attorney's fees.— Where an attorney, in ignorance of his client's insanity, drew a complaint for him, which was not served, and received his fee in advance, it was held that the lunatic's committee might recover the amount of the fee, as money received. I. TERMINOLOGY.

A. Insolvency.[1] "Insolvency" has been differently defined by different courts,[2] and it may be said to have two distinct and well defined significations;[3] as popularly understood, the term denotes the state of one whose assets are insufficient to pay his debts;[4] or his general inability to pay his

Where it is shown that a corporation has suffered the foreclosure of a mortgage against it, and that there are unpaid judgments, under which levies have been made, and unpaid taxes and outstanding notes, the existence of such unpaid obligation shows insolvency. Ft. Wayne Electric Corp. v. Franklin Electric Light Co., (N. J. Ch. 1898) 40 Atl. 441, 442.

Mere refusal to pay is not insolvency, but evidence of it. Heroy v. Kerr, 21 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 409, 421.

The refusal of a corporation to pay its debts, notes, or obligations at maturity is generally a suggestion of "insolvency"; but whether such refusal results from disability of the corporation to meet its obligations, or is based on other reasons, will be ordinarily best known to the officers and stock-holders. New Britain Nat. Bank v. A. B. Cleveland Co., 91 Hun (N. Y.) 447, 454, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 387.

This is sufficient to raise a presumption of insolvency. Ansley v. Carlos, 9 Ala. 973. When a person is unable to meet his obligations, and allows his property to be taken under an attachment on the charge of fraud, which he does not deny, he is legally if not actually insolvent. Harris v. Hanover Nat. Bank, 15 Fed. 786, 21 Blatchf. 255.

Presumption of prior insolvency.— The fact that one is insolvent to-day may be considered in connection with the disparity existing between his assets and his liabilities, as showing that he was insolvent a week prior thereto. McCormick v. Joseph, 77 Ala. 236. In order to show that the debtor was not insolvent at a certain previous period when he asked and obtained an extension of credit, he cannot introduce evidence that persons engaged in the same business had at the same time invariably obtained a similar extension and that there was a general understanding that the asking for such an extension at that period was no sign of an inability to pay debts in full. Vennard v. McConnell, 11 Allen (Mass.) 555. The existence of an outstanding note is admissible, with evidence of other indebtedness, to show the insolvency of the maker at a given date, although such note is afterward disallowed by the court of insolvency. In determining the insolvency of a partnership, the debtor consists of the partnership as well as the partners individually. If collectively there was property subject to partnership debts, the partnership was not insolvent, although the partnership itself may not have had sufficient means to pay its debts. Vaccaro v. Memphis Security Bank, 103 Fed. 436, 443, 43 C. C. A. 279.

By the statement that a firm is "insolvent" is meant that, if they had been forced into liquidation and the business wound up, they would not have been able to meet and pay all their obligations, and their assets were insufficient, and would have been at any trader" is one who cannot pay his debts in the ordinary course of trade and business.[25] Whenever the adjective "insolvent" is used to define the condition of a decedent's estate it has the same signification as when used with respect to the financial status of a living person.[26]

C. Insolvent Circumstances. By being "in insolvent circumstances" is meant that the whole property and credits are not equal in amount, at a fair appraisement, to the debts due by the party.[27]

D. In Contemplation of Insolvency. The words "in contemplation of insolvency" as used in insolvent laws has been held to intend not only contemplation solely of being an insolvent, but also contemplation of actually stopping business because of insolvency and incapacity to carry it on; the contemplation of something more than a state of insolvency — an act of insolvency, or an application to be declared an insolvent.[28]

E. Insolvent Law. An "insolvent law" is a positive regulation made by the legislature to exonerate the person or property of a debtor and to relieve him from the pressure of creditors.[29]

D. Interpretation. Statutes for the relief of insolvent debtors are to be construed liberally.[39]

E. Effect of Federal Bankruptcy Law.[40] There is nothing to prevent the enactment by a state of an insolvent law during the life of a bankruptcy act, although its provisions would be inoperative during the existence of the bankruptcy law, such enactment simply being tantamount to a provision that the former should take effect upon the repeal of the latter.[41] Upon the repeal of a federal bankruptcy law, the state insolvency statutes again become operative without the necessity for reënactment,[42] and apply to debts contracted during the period of suspension of the insolvency law,[43] the effect of the repeal being merely to remove the existence of the obstacle to the operation of the insolvency law.[44]

III. PROCEEDINGS FOR DECLARATION OF INSOLVENCY.

A. Courts Having Jurisdiction.[45] Proceedings in insolvency not being stricti juris either proceedings in law or equity, but a new remedy or proceeding, created by the statutes of the several states,[46] their administration has been vested in certain state courts, independent of their common-law or chancery powers as courts of general jurisdiction.[47]

B. Record of Proceedings.[48] The contents of the records required to be kept are governed entirely by statute.[49] The records of an insolvency proceeding have the same evidentiary effect as those of other proceeding in court.[50]

C. Voluntary Proceedings — 1. Nature of Proceedings. When the debtor institutes the proceedings and is desirous of availing himself of the insolvency laws and files a petition for that purpose, the proceedings are voluntary.[51]

2. Persons Entitled.[52] Insolvency laws are frequently restricted to merchants or traders,[53] although this restriction is not uniform and there is nothing to prevent such a law from being general and applicable to all classes of persons.[54] The benefit of such laws are also otherwise frequently restricted.[55]

3. Procedure[56] — a. In General. In the institution of proceedings for relief under the insolvency laws, the petitioner should comply directly and not by attorney or proxy with the essential forms of the law.[57] Unless it is by statute otherwise provided,[58] subsequent proceedings may be conducted through a duly authorized attorney.[59]

b. Notice to Creditors.[60] Creditors of an insolvent are as a rule entitled to notice of the institution of proceedings,[61] and under some statutes also to notice of certain subsequent proceedings, such as meetings of creditors and the like.[62] Whether the notice should be by personal service[63] or by publication[64] is gov-

Attaching creditors cannot impeach an adjudication in insolvency and claim a distributive share of the insolvent estate at the same time. Gottschalk v. Smith, 74 Md. 560, 22 Atl. 401.

The proper method is to proceed by direct action in the same court which entered the order contradictorily with the ceding debtor, and also with the creditors, by notice to the syndic elected by them. Jeffries v. Belleville Iron Works Co., 15 La. Ann. 19, where a creditor seeks to have annulled as alleged an order of court accepting a surrender of property by an insolvent.

Citation to the insolvent is unnecessary in an opposition to an insolvent's cession and discharge on the ground of fraud. Mayewski v. His Creditors, 40 La. Ann. 94, 4 So. 9.

Fraud is a frequent ground of such a contest,[76] but insolvency proceedings are not necessarily invalidated by the fraudulent intent of the debtor in instituting the same.[77] Creditors who neglect to appear and raise objections are concluded, if the requisite jurisdiction exist in the officer, except as to matters which the law declares shall avoid the proceeding.[78]

e. Creditors' Meeting.[79] In some jurisdictions the statutes require the calling of a creditors' meeting for the acceptance of the insolvent's surrender and for other purposes, although this rule is not general.[80]

f. Trial.[81] The usual rules of law with reference to the trial of cases prevails,[82] except that the time within which prosecutions may be had is as a rule limited

The bare assertion of fraud is not sufficient to warrant the sending of the case to the jury; affidavits of the facts should be filed. Fabre v. Zylstra, 2 Bay (S. C.) 147.

Where insolvent's statements are not sufficiently definite as to the losses and assets, the proper mode to reach such defects is by a charge of fraud and an examination of the insolvent under oath, and not by demurrer to the petition and a motion requiring him to amend. Wilson v. His Creditors, 32 Cal. 406.

Burden of proof.— The opposition to a cession must allege and prove on a charge of fraud against an insolvent an intent to defraud and injury resulting therefrom. Marx v. Creditors, 48 La. Ann. 1340, 20 So. 685.

Amendment.— The court may, on the trial of an issue upon the suggestion of fraud, refuse leave to amend the suggestion by charging that effects had come into the possession of an applicant since the making of the issue, knowledge of which came to the creditors during the trial. Morein v. Solomons, 7 Rich. (S. C.) 97.

Hearing before judge at chambers may not be objectionable. Clarke v. Ray, 6 Cal. 600.

Stay of proceedings.— Judge cannot stay proceedings against the debtor's person or by the insolvency statute.[83] A debtor charged with fraud in connection with his insolvency proceedings is entitled to a trial by jury.[84]

g. Adjudication of Insolvency.[85] An order adjudicating one an insolvent, or accepting the surrender of his property and convoking his creditors, cannot be collaterally attacked unless the proceedings are nullities on their face.[86]

D. Involuntary Proceedings — 1. In General. Where the proceedings are instituted by the creditors in invitum and the debtor is thus forced into insolvency, the proceedings are denominated as involuntary.[87]

2. Acts of Insolvency. The grounds upon which involuntary proceedings may be instituted against an insolvent are determined by the statutes of the several states.[88] Absconding or concealment to avoid payment of debts,[89] fraudulent concealing of property from creditors,[90] making a general assignment for the benefit of creditors,[91] permitting property to be taken under attachment without dissolving property and accept the cession so as to bind the creditors without the debtor's compliance directly and not by proxy with the essential forms prescribed by law. Foucher v. His Creditors, 7 La. 425. Method of attacking.— It has been held that the only way in which the legality of such proceedings can be questioned must be by a direct action to that effect (Hanney v. Healy, 14 La. Ann. 424), and not by a proceeding in equity (Pehrson v. Hewitt, 79 Cal. 594, 21 Pac. 950).

In Canada while there is nothing to prevent an insolvent debtor from transferring or assigning his property to one or more persons, in trust for the benefit of them all (Lanouette v. Tougas, 6 Montreal Leg. N. 123), still, such transfer will be inoperative as to dissenting creditors (Tourangeau v. Dubeau, 10 Quebec 92), and may be docketed, not only in the hands of the assignees them-the same within the time allowed for such purpose,[92] preferring creditors[93] and the like[94] usually constitute acts of insolvency.

3. GROUNDS OF OPPOSITION AND WHO MAY OPPOSE.[95] The alleged insolvent[96] or his creditors, other than those who filed the petition,[97] may oppose the relief sought, either upon the ground of irregularity in the proceedings, or because they are not warranted by law.

4. WHO MAY BE ADJUDGED INSOLVENT[98] — a. In General. As the benefits of voluntary proceedings are sometimes restricted to certain persons, so too involuntary insolvency proceedings are by statute often restricted to merchants or traders.[99] selves, but also in the hands of the vendee of the holder of a portion of the estate (Macfarlane v. McKenzie, 5 L. C. Jur. 106; Withal v. Young, 10 L. C. Rep. 149). A creditor assenting to such assignment cannot avail himself of it as a ground to obtain the compulsory liquidation of a debtor. Whyte v. Cohen, 14 L. C. Jur. 83. An abandonment of property under the common law, made by a debtor in favor of his creditors, without a discharge from them, has been held not to deprive the debtor of his rights of ownership (Rivard v. Belle, 1 Rev. Lég. 571); but it is in fact an irrevocable mandate, the effect of which is to deprive the debtor of the right of disposing otherwise of the property so assigned (Jacob v. Jacob, 2 Montreal Super. Ct. 258).

93. In some states the transfer or conveyance of property by a debtor while insolvent to one or more of his creditors, whereby such creditors obtain a preference over other creditors of a like class, constitutes sufficient ground for the institution of insolvency proceedings against such debtor. In re Strock, 128 Cal. 658, 61 Pac. 282; Brown v. Smart, 145 U. Immaturity of creditor's claim.— The right to petition to have a debtor adjudged insolvent arises at the time the act of insolvency is committed, and as a rule this right is held to exist, although the claim upon which the petition is based is not due (Fisk v. Chandler, 7 Mart. (La.) 24; Schiff v. Solomon, 57 Md. 572. But see Rice v. Dodd, 94 Ga. 414, 20 S. There may also be other restrictions, such as residence of the alleged insolvent and the like.[1]

b. Partnerships. The statutes generally provide for the involuntary insolvency of a partnership upon the same grounds and conditions as in the case of an individual.[2] The period within which such proceedings may be instituted varies in the different states. In some it is restricted to the life of the firm;[3] but in others proceedings may be instituted even after the dissolution, if there are partnership assets to be administered and partnership debts remaining unpaid.[4]

5. Petition[5] — a. In General. The petition of creditors seeking to have their debtor adjudged insolvent cannot be in general terms, but must specify in detail the names of the petitioning creditors and the debtor, the act claimed to have been committed which rendered the debtor amenable to the law,[6] together with its date,[7] the residence of the debtor[8] and the petitioners, the nature and amount of their several claims or demands,[9] and such other facts as may be required by the statute of the state in which the proceedings are instituted.[10] There is no reason why several creditors may not unite in one petition.[11] And there seems to be no reason why a petition may not be amended, provided one is not guilty of laches.[12]

The insolvent must either be an actual inhabitant of the state, or his acts of insolvency must have accrued just before, or just as he was about, leaving the state, and then his creditors are given ninety days thereafter to proceed against him; and there is nothing to permit one who has ceased to be an inhabitant, but continues to carry on business in the state, and while so residing out of the state commits acts of bankruptcy, to be adjudged an insolvent on petition of his creditors. b. Who May Petition[13]—(i) In General. The persons qualified to file a petition are determined by the statutes.[14]

(ii) Non-Resident. In some jurisdictions it is held that it is no defense to such proceedings that they are instituted by a non-resident creditor,[15] but in such case the non-resident instituting the proceedings will be bound thereby and his demand canceled by the debtor's discharge.[16]

(iii) Number and Amount of Claims. There is no fixed rule with reference to the number and amount of claims necessary to give the court jurisdiction, but this also varies in the different states.[17]

(iv) Signature and Verification. The petition should be signed and verified by the petitioners or by their authorized attorney.[18]

6. Intervention and Joinder of New Petitioners.[19] After a petition seeking the adjudication of a person insolvent has been filed, other creditors may as a rule intervene or join in it and aid in its prosecution.[20]

7. Statute of Limitations.[21] The statutes as a rule place a limitation upon the time within which proceedings must be instituted when founded upon some act of the insolvent.[22]

8. Process or Notice.[23] In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, process may be served either personally, by leaving it at the insolvent's residence or place of business, or by publication.[24] Creditors other than the petitioners should have an opportunity to be heard, and for that purpose should have notice of the institution of proceedings.[25]

9. Hearing and Determination.[26] The same rules with reference to hearings or the trial of issues generally prevail in the case of proceedings in insolvency.[27] The facts stated in the petition must be proved by legal and competent evidence,[28] and whether the issues shall be tried by court or jury is determined by the statutes of the particular state in which the proceedings are pending.[29]

10. Adjudication of Insolvency.[30] An adjudication of insolvency in a proceeding conducted conformable to law and in a court having jurisdiction is final, unless an appeal is allowed by statute, and cannot be collaterally attacked.[31]

E. Seizure and Custody of Insolvent's Property — 1. Restraining Transfer and Disposition.[32] Unless an insolvent is guilty of some fraud or has violated some statute with reference to the transfer or disposition of his property,[33] he cannot be restrained by his creditors under the general law from disposing of his property as he may desire, unless the demands of such creditors have been reduced to judgment, or they have some lien thereon.[34]

2. Restraining Interference by Third Persons.[35] The courts have the power to restrain third persons from interfering with the property of the insolvent after the filing of the petition.[36]

3. Receivership[37] Pending Proceedings. The court may appoint a receiver at the instance of the insolvent[38] or his creditors[39] to take charge of the assets of the former after the filing of the petition in insolvency and pending the appointment of a trustee or assignee. Such a receiver may be appointed ex parte in chambers[40] or in open court. The powers, duties, and liabilities of receivers appointed in an insolvency proceeding are determined by statute;[41] and the same may be said

Sufficiency.— An adjudication of insolvency in involuntary proceedings, stating that all the allegations of the creditors' petition are true, and that the debtor was on a certain day, ever since has been, and still is, insolvent, is sufficient, without formal findings. In re Clarke, 125 Cal. 388, 58 Pac. 22. 4. Warrant and Seizure Pending Proceedings. Upon the appointment of a messenger, trustee, or assignee to take possession of an insolvent's estate, and the issuance of a warrant or writ to take possession thereof, it is the duty of such person to take immediate possession of the property;[43] and if under the laws of the state it is essential that the insolvent should make a conveyance of his property, this should likewise be done.[44] After the issuance of such warrant, the insolvent's power over the estate ceases.[45]

IV. Assignment, Administration, and Distribution of Insolvent's Estate.

A. Appointment, Qualification, and Tenure of Assignee or Trustee[46]

1. In General. The statutes provide for the appointment of an officer generally designated as an "assignee" or a "trustee," to take charge of a debtor's estate upon the institution of insolvency proceedings.[47]

2. Election by Creditors.[48] The trustee or assignee is as a rule elected at a meeting of creditors duly called.[49] If the claim is partially secured, the creditor

Sale or disposition of property.— While it is the general rule that a receiver, or provisional trustee, or assignee should hold the property intact, pending the appointment of a permanent trustee or assignee (Pitcher v. Creditors, 40 La. Ann. 782, 6 So. 98; Brown v. Brice, 2 Harr. & G. (Md.) 24), yet in cases where there is a likelihood of deterioration or danger of serious loss, or emergency warrants it, the court would be justified in authorizing the disposition of such property (Calder v. His Creditors, 44 La. Ann. 454, 10 So. 930).

5. Qualification — a. In General. Whether the assignee or trustee must be a resident of the jurisdiction in which the proceedings are pending,[58] or a creditor,[59] or be possessed of any particular qualification,[60] is dependent upon the statute.

b. Bond. The trustee or assignee must qualify for the office by giving bond with good and sufficient surety for the faithful performance of his duties.[61] He can neither sue nor be sued,[62] nor in any manner intermeddle with the property of an insolvent until he does give such bond.[63]

6. Removal and Appointment of Successor.[64] An assignee or trustee may be removed from office for good cause, such as fraud or neglect of the estate resulting in injury thereto,[65] but his acts prior to his removal are not thereby

Appointment will not be rescinded and the assignee or trustee removed because the person appointed did not represent any of the creditors, but was counsel for the applicant (Teackle v. Crosby, 14 Md. 14), because a creditor was not personally notified and furnished a schedule (Shepard v. Abbott, 137 Mass. 224), because he was temporarily absent from the jurisdiction (Hughes v. His Creditors, 15 La. 446), or because the application did not allege that it is prosecuted for the benefit of all the creditors (Menke v. Lyndon, 124 Cal. 160, 56 Pac. 883).

A court of chancery has no jurisdiction in the removal of trustees of insolvents, as that matter by statute is vested in the courts of law. Powles v. Dilley, 9 Gill (Md.) 222.

In Canada it has been held that an assignment made by a copartnership vests in the assignee the separate estate of the partners, as well as the partnership estate, and the removal of the assignee has the effect of removing him with respect to both estates. In re Macfarlane, 12 L. C. Jur. 239. The power given to a court or a judge by the insolvent act of Canada of 1875 to remove an assignee is confined to the case of an assignee disobeying the order made under that act, and does not extend to other misconduct avoided.[66] Upon the refusal[67] or failure of an assignee or trustee to qualify after his appointment,[68] or upon his death,[69] a new trustee or assignee should be appointed, or elected as required by statute.

B. Assignment and Title, Rights and Remedies of Assignee or Trustee in General — 1. Assignment or Transfer to Trustee by Insolvent. The procedure necessary on the part of an insolvent in order to invest his assignee or trustee with a title to his property is not uniform. Under some statutes the title vests in the assignee or trustee by operation of law without the necessity of a deed or conveyance,[70] while under others an assignment or conveyance by the clerk of the court,[71] or a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors made by the insolvent is necessary.[72]

2. Property and Rights Vesting in Assignee or Trustee — a. In General. All of the property and rights of property of an insolvent, whether included in the schedule or not, pass to his assignee or trustee for the benefit of his creditors, unless exempt under the laws of the state in which the proceedings are pending;[73]

c. Claims Against United States. A claim or demand against the United States based upon a contract, express or implied, passes to the trustee or assignee with the right to maintain suit therefor.[83]

d. Equitable Estates — (I) In General. An insolvent's equitable interest in property which might be subjected to sale under execution would pass to his assignees or trustee for the benefit of his creditors with the right to maintain proceedings to reduce the same to money.[84] So too, on the other hand, property in which others have some rights, either legal or equitable, the legal title to which is in the insolvent, will pass to the trustee in insolvency.[85]

(II) Trust Estates. Property held by an insolvent merely in trust for others would not pass to an assignee or trustee upon his insolvency.[86] Where, however, such property is held in trust by another for the benefit of the insolvent, if by the laws of the state, it is subject to execution, it would pass to his assignee or trustee.[87]

e. Partnership and Individual Property. Upon the insolvency of a partnership, the assignee or trustee of the firm takes all of its assets and the surplus of the separate estate of the members of the firm, above the amount necessary to pay their individual debts.[88] The adjudication of the surviving partner as insolvent debtor operates to vest in his trustee the firm assets.[89] Upon the insolvency of a member of the firm, his assignee or trustee takes all of his individual assets and

C. Transfers and Preferences by Insolvents, Attachments, and Other Liens — 1. Transfers and Preferences[5] — a. In General — (i) Rule Stated. The general rule is that preferences created by the transfer or conveyance of property by the insolvent within a limited period prior to the insolvency are invalid[6] and may be avoided by his trustee or assignee.[7] Whether the transfer constituting the preference may be avoided or not is determined by the state statute.[8] The question of intent of the insolvent,[9] knowledge on the part of the creditor receiving the preference,[10] and the time within which the transfer was made[11] are elements which usually determine the validity of the transfer, and as to whether or not it can be avoided.

(ii) What Law Governs. The validity of a transfer of property resulting in a preference to a creditor, and the rights of the trustee or assignee thereto, is determined by the laws of the state in which the property is located.[12]

b. Fraudulent Transfer. Conveyances and transfers of property made to a person by one who is insolvent at the time, in the absence of a bona fide consideration therefor or with the intent to defraud creditors, being as a rule fraud-

The distinction between voluntary and involuntary transfers by a debtor are recognized by the English insolvent system, as well as in the statutes of some of the states, and to avoid such transfer for fraud pursuant to those systems, they must be shown to be voluntary, as well as made with a view and under an expectation of taking the benefit of the insolvent laws. Crawfords v. Taylor, 6 Gill & J. (Md.) 323, 26 Am. Dec. 579; Falconer v. Clark, 3 Md. Ch. 151; Powles v. Dilley, 2 Md. Ch. 119; Malsom v. Hall, 1 Md. Ch. 172; Artisans' Bank v. Treadwell, 34 Barb. (N. Y.) 553. A payment made as a preference is invalid, although it was made to relieve the debtor's property from attachment levied by the creditor receiving the payment (Merrill v. McLaughlin, 75 Me. 64); or the giving of a mortgage in order to obtain release of an attachment, where the attaching creditor had reasonable cause to believe the mortgagor was insolvent (Denny v. Dana, 2 Cush. (Mass.) 160, 48 Am. Dec. 655). ulent and void [13] as to his creditors, are also void as against the trustee or assignee of the insolvent and may be avoided by him,[14] where the grantee had reasonable cause to believe that his vendor was insolvent.[15] Such conveyances create no equity in the fraudulent grantee but may be valid and binding between the grantor and the grantee.[16]

c. Assignment For Benefit of Creditors.[17] The right of an insolvent debtor to make a general assignment of his property for the benefit of his creditors, the rights and title acquired by his assignee, and the general operation of and effect of such an assignment are elsewhere treated.[18] where he does not do so with intent to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors,[21] or in contemplation of insolvency.[22] In many states this is now expressly forbidden by statute.[23]

e. What Constitutes a Preference — (I) In General. Under statutes prohibiting preferences, a preference usually occurs where one or more creditors receives from the insolvent a greater proportion of his indebtedness than other creditors of a like class, and this may occur either through payment of money or the conveyance of property. While a preference thus created is as a rule made invalid when given with the intent of violating the insolvent acts, it is fraudulent in law without regard to the existence of actual fraud on the part of the transferee.[24]

Illustrations of preferences.—An assignment of accounts to a creditor to pay himself in full and other creditors, so far as there is any surplus, is deemed a preference (Lamb v. Radcliff, 28 Ga. 520); and so is an assignment by an insolvent debtor of goods to a creditor for sale, with authority to the creditor to apply the proceeds on his account (Burpee v. Sparhawk, 97 Mass. 342), or to prevent the property from coming into the hands of the assignee (Doe v. Roe, 89 Me. 523, 36 Atl. 1001).

A mortgage given to deter the mortgage creditors from attaching the mortgaged property has been held to be void as to those creditors, although the principal purpose of the parties is to secure a bona fide debt. Crowninshield v. Kittridge, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 520. The fact that the person to whom a preferential mortgage was given assumed a new liability by taking the mortgage is immaterial if the mortgage was also given as a security for a preëxisting liability. Whipple v. Bond, 164 Mass. 182, 41 N. E. 203.

In California the assignee of an insolvent who makes a mortgage to evade the provisions of the act may recover the property, if given within one month of his insolvency. Perkins v. Maier, etc., Brewery, 133 Cal. 496, 65 Pac. 1030. But the assignee cannot attack a mortgage on the ground that the acknowledgment was defective, since he is not a subsequent purchaser for value. Farmers' Exch. Bank v. Purdy, 130 Cal. 455, 62 Pac. 738.

In part cancellation of secured indebtedness.—While it may be that a deed executed by an insolvent debtor, to the extent that it was in consideration of the cancellation of his indebtedness to the grantee, which was amply secured, could not be a preference, within the meaning of the statute, yet, to the extent that it was in cancellation of other indebtedness which was unsecured, the chancellor, under the evidence, was authorized to conclude that it was a preference. Scherer v. Christian-Moerlein Brewing Co., 65 S. W. 448, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1613.

Renewal of an existing security is not a preference. St. Clair v. Cleveland, 83 Me. 559, 22 Atl. 474; Porter v. Welton, (Conn. 1892) 23 Atl. 868. See Simpson v. Carleton, 1 Allen (Mass.) 109, 79 Am. Dec. 707; Brackett v. Harvey, 91 N. Y. 214.

Substitution of securities.—It has been held in Massachusetts that where a bank holds property as a collateral security for a debt of an insolvent, and at his request releases it and takes in substitution property of the insolvent, having reasonable cause to believe the substitution is for the purpose of giving a fraudulent preference, the assignee can recover the substituted security, although nothing was gained by the substitution. Jaquith v. Winnisimmet Nat. Bank, 182 Mass. 53, 64 N. E. 723.

Exchanging of one security for another of equal value is not a preference. Hutchinson v. Murchie, 74 Me. 187; Stevens v. Blanchard, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 169.

The exchanging of a note against an insolvent firm for the note of the individual members of the firm within four months of the commencement of insolvency proceedings by a debtor, the result of which would give the creditor a larger dividend on his debt than he would otherwise obtain, operates as a preference. Chadbourne v. Harding, 80 Me. 580, 16 Atl. 248.

The reservation of a reasonable fee for the draftsman of a deed for its preparation has been held to be such a preference in a deed for the benefit of creditors as is forbidden. Wolfsheimer v. Rivinus, 64 Mo. 230, 1 Atl. 128, 54 Am. Rep. 769.

Fraud purged.—The fraud of purchasing property of an insolvent in contravention of the insolvency law is purged by a subsequent agreement with the seller under which the price is paid to one of the seller's creditors, without notice of the fraud, before insolvency proceedings are commenced. Enright v. Amsden, 70 Vt. 183, 40 Atl. 37.

Perjury committed by an insolvent to aid a mortgagee to increase the value of his mortgage at the expense of a prior mortgagee, and not affecting the distribution of his estate among his creditors, is not a preference, or attempted preference of a creditor, within the meaning of Vt. St. c. 102, relating to insolvents. In re Chapman, 71 Vt. 368, 45 Atl. 232.

by a person while insolvent, with the intent on his part to create a preference, is invalid and may be avoided by the assignee or trustee on the institution of insolvency proceedings against the debtor.[26] This intent may be inferred either from the fact of the preference or from other circumstances.[27]

(2) In Contemplation of Insolvency. In order to avoid a transfer or preference made by a debtor "in contemplation of insolvency"[28] within the usual inhibition of the statutes,[29] the debtor must have been in fact insolvent under the terms of the law at the time of the transfer, and there must have been in his mind an expectation or design that he would make an assignment or commence proceedings in insolvency and by this means circumvent the statute against preferences;[30]

An honest belief that he would be able to go on in business is no defense to a petition by his other creditors to have him declared insolvent when a person knows himself to be insolvent at the time of showing a preference to his creditors. Castleberg v. Wheeler, 68 Md. 266, 12 Atl. 3.

Concurring intent of both parties.— In California it has been held that the conveyance or payment must be both made and received with the intent to give a preference, and it is not void because received by a creditor intending to obtain a preference. Hass v. Whittier, 87 Cal. 613, 25 Pac. 917; Moore v. American L. & T. Co., 80 Fed. 49. See Salisbury v. Burr, (1896) 44 Pac. 461.

In Massachusetts, under the act of 1844, authorizing the issuance of a warrant to seize the estate of a debtor on the ground of his having made a fraudulent conveyance by way of preference, it must be shown: (1) That the debtor was insolvent, or contemplated proceedings in insolvency, at the time of making the conveyance and that he made it with a view of giving a preference to a preëxisting creditor; (2) that he then had no reasonable cause to believe himself solvent; and (3) that the creditor, at the time of receiving the conveyance, had reasonable cause to believe the debtor was insolvent. And the burden of proving the first and third of these propositions was on the creditor who petitioned for the issuing of the warrant. In re Jordan, 9 Metc. 292.

Retention of possession by vendor.— The question of the sufficiency of a transfer constituting a preference most frequently arises in the case of property, the title to which has been transferred to a creditor, but the possession of which has been retained by the vendor, the rule generally prevailing that such property passes to the assignee or trustee. The criterion as to what constitutes such reasonable cause is not actual knowledge or even actual belief of the debtor's insolvency, but whether as a reasonable man acting with ordinary prudence and discretion and in view of all the facts and circumstances known to him at the time of the conveyance, the creditor had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent. Buffum v. Jones, 144 Mass. 29, 10 N. E. 471; Kells v. Webster, 71 Minn. 276, 73 N. W. 962; Daniels v. Palmer, 35 Minn. 347, 29 N. W. 162; Larkin v. Batchelder, 56 Vt. 416. S. 80, 24 L. ed. 971], the court stated that, while on the one hand it is not necessary, in order to avoid a conveyance as a forbidden preference, that the purchaser shall actually know that the vendor is insolvent, yet, on the other hand, it is not sufficient that he entertains a mere suspicion that the vendor may be insolvent. While he cannot shut his eyes to suspicious circumstances which have put him on inquiry, yet he must have reasonable cause to believe that his vendor is insolvent. The court added that this was the construction given to this provision in the federal bankruptcy act, from which it borrowed. See also Cutler v. Dunn, 68 N. H. 394, 44 Atl. 536.

In California it has been held that where the insolvent, with intent to prefer one creditor over another, sells his property a few days before filing a petition in insolvency to one who knows such intent, the sale is void, although the purchaser paid his full value and the proceeds are applied to the payment of an honest debt. Tapscott v. Lyon, 103 Cal. 297, 37 Pac. 225.

In New York it has been held that payments and transfers of property made by a moneyed corporation when insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, with intent to give a preference to the creditors, are void, although the party receiving the payments or transfers had no knowledge of the insolvency of the company. Brouwer v. Harbeck, 5 Seld. 589 [reversing 1 Duer 114].

circumstances clearly sufficient to put a person of ordinary prudence and discretion upon inquiry is chargeable with the knowledge which such investigation or inquiry would have furnished.[33] The knowledge of the agent will be deemed the knowledge of the principal.[34] Under the laws of some states a transfer not in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor is prima facie evidence that the purchaser, assignee, or transferee had reasonable cause to believe the debtor insolvent.[35]

(III) Security For Current Loan or Credit. In the statutes prohibiting preferences, it is generally provided that a lien or deed given to secure an insolvent person on a contemporaneous bona fide advance, payment, or loan, and not a preëxisting debt, will be deemed valid and cannot be avoided by the subsequent institution of insolvency proceedings against the party to whom the advance is made;[36] and where a security is given for a present advance and a preëxisting debt, it will be held valid so far as the present advance is concerned and invalid as to the prior advance.[37]

f. Time of Transfer. The general rule is that as a condition precedent to the right of an assignee or trustee to avoid a preference created through a transfer of property by one adjudged an insolvent, the preference must have been given or created within a limited period prior to the institution of the insolvency proceedings, this period as a rule varying in the different states from one to six months;[38] and that if the preference was created prior to the period fixed by statute, assignment in insolvency upon liens acquired by legal proceedings when such liens were created prior to the assignment. The general rule seems to be that liens created within certain periods fixed by statute which result in giving the creditors a preference will be avoided by the assignment;[57] and that this rule will hold good, although the proceedings are at the instance of a citizen of another state, since a non-resident creditor can claim no greater rights than the resident, when he invokes the resident jurisdiction.[58] And it seems that the general rules above stated relating to fraudulent transfers and illegal preferences,[59] particularly as regards the intent of the parties,[60] may be invoked when applicable under the facts and circumstances.

Where a creditor attaches property in the hands of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, and the assignment is set aside, and the assets turned over to the trustee in insolvency, the attaching creditor's inchoate lien will be protected by the insolvent courts

(c) Judgment or Execution Lien. Similarly the rule with reference to the effect of an adjudication of insolvency upon a judgment and execution levied upon the insolvent's property prior thereto is not uniform. It is generally true, however, that a judgment and execution entered with the connivance of a debtor resulting in a fraudulent preference may be avoided by the assignee or trustee of the insolvent's estate,[67] but that in the absence of fraud and statutory provisions to the contrary,[68] an execution upon a judgment will not be affected

A judgment recovered adversely is not within the class of preferences mentioned in the act of June 4, 1901. McCurdy v. Gantz, 11 Pa. Dist. 534, 26 Pa. Co. Ct. 417, 8 Del. Co. 439.

The words "all executions" in the Insolvent Act of June 4, 1901, embrace only such executions as give preferences forbidden by the act. Lobach v. Riegel, 11 Pa. Dist. 533, 26 Pa. Co. Ct. 145.

68. In the absence of any statutory provision, a levy upon property by virtue of an attachment or execution creates an interest in the property superior to the rights of the assignee in insolvency, and only an express provision to that effect will make the proceedings in insolvency paramount to such lien. Elliott v. Warfield, 122 Cal. 632, 55 Pac. 409; Hefner v. Herron, 117 Cal. 473, 49 Pac. 586; Vermont Marble Co. v. San Francisco Super. Ct., 99 Cal. 579, 34 Pac. 326.

Stay of proceedings.— Where execution is issued and a levy made, prior to an assignment under the act of June 4, 1901, further proceedings will be stayed, without prejudice to whatever preference the execution creditor may be entitled to on distribution. Zacharias v. Imperial Stain, etc., Co., 11 Pa. Dist. 171. Where an action for a tort was brought

(II) After Assignment. The general rule is that a judgment or other lien obtained or created subsequent to the institution of insolvency proceedings and assignment by the insolvent will be inoperative as against the trustee or assignee of the insolvent.[72]

(III) Proceedings in Other States. An insolvent law having no extra-territorial force or effect,[73] the title acquired by the trustee or assignee pursuant to a conveyance under the insolvent laws of one state will not prevail against the rights of local attaching creditors under the laws of a different state where the

and prosecuted to judgment pending a proceeding in insolvency against defendant, under Gen. Laws, c. 274, the issuing of an execution on such judgment, prior to the determination of his right to a discharge, was illegal, as section 25 provides for a stay of execution in case the debtor is adjudged insolvent. In re Bowler, 20 R. I. 251, 38 Atl. 497.

Waiver of execution on personalty.— A creditor who has accepted a judgment note with a waiver of execution on personalty is not thereby barred from proceeding against his debtor under the act of June 4, 1901, where the debtor has committed an act of insolvency in assigning personalty with intent to defraud creditors. property is actually situated.[74] On the other hand, a creditor who is a citizen and resident of the same state as his debtor against whom insolvency proceedings have been instituted in said state is bound by the assignment of the debtor's property in such proceedings, and if he attempts to seize or attach the personal property of the debtor, situated in another state and embraced in the assignment, he may be restrained by injunction by the courts of the state in which he and his debtor reside.[75] The fact that the provisions of the statutes of one state operate to retroactively vacate attachments does not control attachments levied in other states at a time when under the statute of the former state the insolvent had not been deprived, by operation of law, of the dominion and control over his property and assets.[76]

"While the authorities are not altogether harmonious, the prevailing American doctrine is that a conveyance under a state insolvent law operates only upon property within the territory of that State, and that with respect to property in other States it is given only such effect as the laws of such State permit; and that, in general, it must give way to claims of creditors pursuing their remedies there. Insolvency proceedings in state court dissolve attachment from federal court.— Insolvency proceedings in a state court will dissolve an attachment made in a suit in a federal court under the same circumstances where by state statute an attachment in a suit in a state court would be dissolved. tions the rule is for the trustee or assignee to dispose of the property and bring the proceeds into court for distribution among the lien creditors and others according to their legal priorities.[79]

(11) Rights of Mortgagee. In some states the fact that the mortgagor is adjudged insolvent after executing the mortgage does not affect the right of the mortgagee to foreclose,[80] while in others the trustee or assignee in insolvency is the only person empowered to sell the mortgaged premises, although the mortgage contains a power of sale.[81]

D. Administration of Estate[82] — 1. Jurisdiction of Courts. The jurisdiction to hear and determine insolvency proceedings is by statute delegated to one or more courts, which as a general rule are given full, ample, and exclusive power[83] over the insolvent and his estate to the end that it may be fully administered and distributed to the persons entitled thereto. This supervision continues from term to term until the final disposition of the matter.[84]

2. Officers in General. The officers to be appointed in an insolvency proceeding, including commissioners[85] and referees,[86] their number and designation, and their qualifications, duties, and liabilities, are determined by provisions of the an erroneous judgment requiring much expense to correct the error, rendering it likely that changes may have occurred in the meantime, and there being no real benefits recoverable, it is proper to regard their rights as foreclosed. Harrigan v. Gilchrist, 121 Wis. 127, 99 N. W. 909.

Effect of judgment for deficiency.— In an action by a vendor against the assignee in insolvency of the vendee, a lien in favor of the vendor was declared on the property sold the vendee. It was held that a judgment for a deficiency after a foreclosure sale would not estop the assignee or creditors from disputing the validity of such claim. Clark v. B. B. 5. Authority and Functions of Assignee or Trustee — a. In General. As has been seen,[94] the trustee or assignee of an insolvent represents the creditors of an insolvent[95] as well as the insolvent,[96] and must show due diligence in the discharge of his duties and render full and complete account thereof.[97] And the right to institute proceedings in behalf of an insolvent's estate is primarily and in the first instance in the assignee or trustee, but where he refuses the creditor may proceed.[98] But in that event it should appear that a request has first been made upon him to act and been refused.[99] As a rule the assignee or trustee is authorized to compromise and settle controversies with the permission of the court, and when so authorized the court's action cannot be questioned by the insolvent.[1]

b. Discovery and Collection of Assets. It is the duty of the trustee or assignee of an insolvent to collect all of the assets either by a suit or otherwise, and hold them for the parties in interest.[2]

c. Custody and Management of Estate — (i) In General. It is the duty of the trustee or assignee to take into his possession all of the estate and effects to which the insolvent had the right of possession at the time of his application or adjudication as an insolvent, according to the laws of the state. To him is intrusted the entire management of the estate, subject to the control of the court by whom he is appointed.[3]

(II) Sale of Assets[4] — (A) In General. The assignee or trustee should sell or make such other disposition of the insolvent's property as will result to the best interests of the creditors, subject to the direction of the court.[5] If the trustee declines or refuses to sell, a creditor should apply to the court for an order directing the sale.[6]

(B) Proceedings For Sale. Before any proceedings can be taken looking to the sale, the trustee or assignee must first have qualified and then secured an order of court for the sale.[7] Some statutes require, as a condition precedent to the sale, that the creditors should have had notice of the proposed sale,[8] and that there must also have been a meeting of the creditors to pass upon the terms and conditions of sale.[9]

(C) Mode of Sale — (1) Public or Private Sale. Unless a private sale is by statute authorized, the property of an insolvent should be disposed of at public auction.[10]

(2) Claims of Doubtful Creditors. Claims of a doubtful creditor may be sold for less than their face value.[11]

(3) Property Subject to Lien.[12] Property which is encumbered or subject to a lien may either be sold free of all liens or encumbrances, reserving the settlement or adjustment of priorities until the final distribution of the fund,[13] or else

4. Jurisdiction.[53] Actions by an assignee or trustee against some third person[54] or against the assignee or trustee by some third person[55] may be brought in the same court as if by an ordinary plaintiff or against an ordinary defendant, unless by statute the court having jurisdiction of the insolvency proceedings is given exclusive jurisdiction with reference to all matters concerning the insolvent's estate.

5. Parties.[56] In proceedings either at law or in equity, the real parties in interest must be made parties plaintiff or defendant.[57] After the institution of insolvency proceedings, in an action commenced prior thereto by the insolvent, his trustee or assignee should be substituted as party plaintiff,[58] and where the insolvent is defendant, his trustee or assignee should be substituted as defendant.[59] The insolvent is not a necessary party in proceedings against his estate.[60] An action brought in behalf of the insolvent's estate, after the institution of insolvency proceedings, should be in the name of the assignee or trustee.[61]

6. Pleading.[62] With the exception of an averment of the capacity in which the assignee or trustee sues or is sued,[63] the same general rules of pleading apply in proceedings in insolvency as in other litigations.[64]

Usual course of business.— Where a mortgage covered practically all an insolvent's property, whether it was in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor is a question of fact for the jury, and the opinion of witnesses upon the question is inadmissible. Buffum v. Jones, 144 Mass. 29, 10 N. E. 471. Where a retail dealer with an unencumbered stock mortgages it, it was held proper to submit all the facts to the jury. Alden v. Marsh, 97 Mass. 160. Where the evidence shows that the mortgagor was a millwright, with no other occupation, and made a mortgage upon his homestead to secure a preëxisting debt, the jury has been instructed that the mortgage was not in the usual and ordinary course of business. Nary v. Merrill, 8 Allen (Mass.) 451. Where an insolvent sold his stock, taking notes in payment, and late at night, following close upon the sale, he indorses the notes to defendant's agents in payment of his indebtedness to them, it has been held that the court would have been warranted in finding as a fact that the payment was not made in the ordinary course of business. But when, by answering the evidence, the debtor denies the intent attributed, very strong evidence is necessary to countervail such answer or evidence. Brooks v. Thomas, 4 Md. Ch. 15. The fact that a party preferring his creditors, when he executed the deed could not apply for the benefit of the insolvent laws for want of the residence required to bring him within their provisions is a strong circumstance to show that it was not in his view and expectation at that time to take the benefit of such laws. Glenn v. Baker, 1 Md. Ch. 73. Evidence is insufficient to show that a conveyance was voluntary and with a view to taking advantage of the Insolvency Act, where it was made in consideration of payments made by the grantee for the grantor, which, with advances made, amounted to the full value of the real estate conveyed. b. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. A conveyance made by an insolvent to his assignee in the insolvency proceedings is prima facie evidence of title.[69] The intent of an insolvent to give a preference may be inferred from the fact that a preference has been given.[70] In some states it is specifically provided by statute that a transfer of property by an insolvent not made in the ordinary course of business shall be made prima facie evidence of fraud.[71] The onus probandi is upon the party who seeks to disturb such preference to show that it is prohibited by the insolvent system of the state.[72]

8. Trial. The general rules applicable in ordinary litigation with reference to the trial[73] and submission of issues to a jury[74] apply with equal force in proceedings in insolvency.[75]

9. Damages. In respect to the recovery of damages in actions by or against an assignee or trustee in insolvency the usual rules relating to damages are applicable.[76]

73. A finding that transferees knew that a transfer was being made with intent to prefer creditors, and to prevent the property from coming to the assignee in insolvency, is not inconsistent with a finding that they were free from actual fraud, and believed their conduct lawful; actual fraud not being essential to avoid a transfer in violation of the Insolvency Act. 2. Creditors Entitled to Prove and Claims Provable — a. Creditors Entitled to Prove. Among the creditors who are entitled to prove their claims against the estate of an insolvent[79] are non-resident creditors; and as a rule they are entitled to participate in the assets according to the rank and classification of their claims the same as resident creditors.[80] Unless the statute provides to the contrary, a creditor who has received a preference may surrender the preference and prove for the full amount, or if he is preferred as to a part only, he may prove as to the balance.[81]

A note executed and delivered by a firm as collateral security for a guaranty, on which the guarantor is still responsible, may be proved against the insolvent estate of the makers. Moseley v. Ames, 5 Allen (Mass.) 163.

86. See cases cited infra, this note.

A claim of a ward against her guardian for funds held by him as such is not provable against the insolvent's estate where the amount due has not been determined by the probate court and judgment has not been recovered on the guardian's bond. Murray v. Wood, 144 Mass. 195, 10 N. E. 822.

A contract by one partner to another to assume all the debts of the firm and save him harmless therefrom is not such a claim as may be proved against the estate of the obligor in insolvency until there has been a breach. It is not a contingent debt nor a contingent liability, for until the breach there is no liability. Fernald v. Johnson, 71 Me. 437.

(IV) CLAIMS AGAINST PARTNERS. The general rule is that where there are both partnership and individual assets for distribution, the firm assets will be first applied to the payment of partnership debts and the individual assets to the payment of the individual debts of the partners. If there is any surplus in either fund, it will be carried to the other and distributed as a part thereof.[87] Where both the firm and individual members are insolvent, the holder of a joint and several note given by the partners in the partnership name is entitled to prove his notes against the joint estate of the firm as well as against the several estates of the individual members and to receive a dividend from both estates, but under no condition can he receive more than the face of the claim.[88]

Bonds.— A bond of indemnity given for the protection of an attaching officer who has not been compelled to pay or sue for his acts does not constitute a debt which is provable in insolvency against the obligor. Kingman v. Fowle, 5 Allen (Mass.) 133. The liability of a surety on a bond does not constitute a debt until after there has been a breach of the bond. McIntire v. Cottrell, 185 Mass. 178, 69 N. E. 1091; Conklin v. U. S. Shipbuilding Co., 136 Fed. 1006.

The lessor's claim for the balance of the term, where the lessee became insolvent and the lessor reëntered, and where the lease authorized the renting of the premises, in which case credit should be given for the amount received, was contingent and could not be proved. Interest-bearing claims.— Where there is a surplus of the private estate of one member of an insolvent firm after payment of claims as filed, but there is a deficiency of the firm estate, the firm creditors cannot claim the surplus of the private creditors who hold interest-bearing claims, until they have been paid their interest. In re Mulholland, 6 Montreal Leg. N. 171.

Resort to mortgage on partner's property. — A creditor of an insolvent partnership is not obliged to resort to a mortgage held by him on the property of an individual partner, but can claim a distributive share in the partnership assets. In re Levin, 139 Cal. 350, 63 Pac. 335, 73 Pac. 159; Morrison v. Kurtz, 15 Ill. 193.

Assumption of liability.—A partner who sells his interest in the partnership property to his copartner, who agrees, as part of the consideration, to pay partnership debts and hold his partner harmless therefrom, and the selling partner afterward in good faith pays a debt of the firm, he may prove the claim as an individual claim of his own against the private estate of the copartnership, who after such payment has gone into insolvency. In re Burgess, 83 Me. 339, 22 Atl. 222; Wild v. Dean, 3 Allen (Mass.) 579. But see Morton v. Richards, 13 Gray (Mass.) 15. (v) Costs and Legal Expenses. The general rule seems to be that expenses incurred as costs or counsel fees in proceedings which are for the benefit of a particular creditor or class of creditors should not be borne by an estate but are chargeable to those in whose favor instituted.[89] If, however, it is for the benefit of the entire estate, it would be chargeable to the estate.[90]

(vi) Secured Claims[91] — (a) Necessity For Proof. The rule with reference to the proof of a claim by one holding a security or lien on the property of the debtor is not uniform. The better rule seems to be that such creditor may rest on his security and not prove his claim,[92] although on the other hand it has been held that the fact that he holds a security affords no excuse for a failure to make proof of his claim.[93]

(b) Right to Prove and Effect of Proving Claim. Under some statutes a creditor holding a security for his claim is required to exhaust his security or surrender it to the assignee before he will be permitted to participate in the distribution of the assets,[94] while under other statutes he may prove his whole claim

Where a secured creditor inadvertently, by mistake either of law or fact, proves his whole debt without disclosing his security, he would doubtless be authorized to withdraw his proof as an unsecured creditor, before the general creditors have suffered any detriment from his acts, and pursue his rights as against the security. Nichols v. Smith, 143 Mass. 455, 9 N. E. 810.

In Minnesota the proof of the whole claim without a release would not of itself operate to discharge or release the security; hence a mortgagee who has proved his debt against the estate of a mortgagor without discharging his mortgage is not thereby estopped to claim under it against a subsequent attaching creditor who has not proved his debt. Smith v. Brainard, 37 Minn. 479, 35 N. W. 271.

3. Amount of Claims — a. In General. Claims against the insolvent's estate can be proved only for the amount actually due,[98] and are allowable as of the date of the institution of insolvency proceedings.[99]

b. Interest. In the distribution of the estate of an insolvent interest should be computed to the time of the institution of insolvency proceedings upon all debts drawing interest either by agreement of the parties or as legal damages for non-payment.[1] If there be a surplus after paying the principal and interest thus computed, interest should also be allowed on all the debts from the date of the institution of the proceedings.[2]

c. Set-Off and Counter-Claim.[3] A right of set-off between an insolvent debtor and his creditor accrues at the time of the institution of insolvency proceedings, unless by statute a different time is provided.[4] In the case of two insolvent estates, each indebted to the other, a dividend to one should be set off as against the dividend to the other.[5]

4. Presentation and Proof of Claims — a. Presentation of Claims — (i) In General. The form in which a claim against an insolvent's estate should be presented is governed by statute.[6]

Reception of dividend greater than claim as proved.— Where the holder of a note received a dividend from the maker and indorser amounting to more than the claim as proved, but less than the principal and interest, it was held that he cannot receive a further dividend until the other creditors had received the full amount as proved. Blake v. Ames, 8 Allen (Mass.) 318.

Where both the firm and its members were insolvent under one commission, and the separate estate of one partner is more than enough to pay his separate debts, the surplus of that estate is to be added to that of the partnership estate and applied to the payment of joint debts before paying interest on the separate debts. Thomas v. Minot, 10 Gray (Mass.) 263.

Where money due is not wrongfully withheld, but the failure to pay is due to the insolvency only, interest will not necessarily be allowed on claims against the insolvent. American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case, 82 Md. 535, 34 Atl. 778, 38 L. R. A. 97.

While courts of equity usually seek to put all the creditors of an insolvent estate on the same footing as to payment of their claims, and in general allow no preferences between them, justice often requires preferences; the equality to be sought being generally equality between members of a class rather than between different classes of individuals. as legal debts.[20] It should receive a fair and reasonable interpretation,[21] and should not be so construed as to destroy prior legal liens.[22] Where a surety for a debt due to the United States pays the same, the right of priority of payment belonging to the government, it has been held, attaches to the claim of the surety as against the principal debtor.[23]

d. Claims in Favor of State. While under the common law the state has the sovereign right to priority of payment,[24] still there are states which do not recognize this common-law prerogative.[25] Those states which do recognize this prior right nevertheless make it subject to an antecedent lien of a creditor.[26]

i. Claims Against Partnership.[39] Partnership creditors must in the first instance be satisfied from the partnership estate and the separate or private creditors of the individual partners from the separate and private estates of the partners by whom the separate or private debts were respectively contracted; and the private and individual property of the partners should not be applied in the extinguishment of partnership debts until the separate and individual creditors of the respective partners shall be paid.[40] In some jurisdictions the fact that there is no joint estate and no solvent partner places the firm creditors on a footing with the individual creditors and they are permitted to share the separate estate concurrently with the separate creditors.[41]

j. Proceedings to Establish. The better practice would seem to be that where a creditor claims a preference in the distribution of the insolvent's estate he should assert his claim in the insolvency proceedings, unless by statute a different mode is provided.[42] In some jurisdictions, however, a proceeding in equity may be instituted for the purpose of determining the priority of various creditors or to establish a lien on the fund.[43]

6. Distribution and Release of Claims — a. In General. The procedure to be pursued in the distribution of an insolvent's estate, the meeting for such purpose, and the character of notice if required, is governed by the practice in the particular jurisdiction in which the proceedings are pending.[44]

b. Payment of Dividends — (I) In General. The dividend is based upon the claim as proved and allowed and the stage of the proceedings and the frequency with which it is declared is dependent upon the local practice.[45]

(II) Interest. If the estate is more than sufficient to pay all claims, interest will be allowed on all debts from the date of the institution of proceedings.[46] The neglect of an assignee or trustee to declare a dividend as soon as the greater part of the assets have been realized and the amount of the claims ascertained would doubtless render him personally liable for interest from the time when he might have declared a dividend.[47]

c. Release by Creditor. In the settlement of an insolvent's estate it is usually provided that his creditors shall receive no benefit therefrom unless they file a release from further liability upon claims held against the estate.[48] Should the

d. Effect on Creditor's Rights — (i) In General. No uniform rule can be laid down with reference to the effect of the proof of a claim and the receipt of a dividend thereon as respects the rights of creditors.[51] It may be stated, however, that a creditor who receives a dividend after proving his claim will be estopped from asserting that the insolvent law in question is unconstitutional.[52]

In Canada an insolvent has no action against an assignee of his insolvent estate to compel him to render an account. His recourse is by petition or motion and that he claims under a deed of composition or discharge, these must first have been deposited with the assignee, in order that he may give notice of the same. Fraser v. Patterson, 1 Rev. Crit. 248.

Imprisonment for refusal.— An assignee who refuses or neglects to conform to a judgment ordering him to pay over money in his hands may be compelled to do so by imprisonment. Bates v. Beaudry, 1 Rev. de Lég. 360.

the insolvent's assets and the proceeds therefrom coming into his hands[60] and be given credit for necessary expenditures.[61]

4. Compensation. The trustee or assignee of an insolvent is usually compensated for his services in the shape of a commission on the estate coming into his hands.[62] He is entitled to no commissions, however, where he has been guilty of fraud and mismanagement of the estate,[63] or on moneys coming into his hands which did not belong to the trust fund.[64]

5. Approval or Disapproval of Account. The approval or disapproval of the account of a trustee or assignee by the court, if final and no effort is made to obtain a review of the same,[65] operates, as a rule, to discharge the trustee or assignee from further liability to the estate and the creditors.[66] An objection to

V. COMPOSITION, RESPITE, OR DISCONTINUANCE.

A. Composition[73] — 1. In General. After a composition has been duly signed and approved,[74] and the percentage paid, it operates as a discharge of all claims of which the court had jurisdiction.[75] As soon as the composition deed has been

73. Composition defined see 5 Cyc. 356; 8 Cyc. 412. See also 4 Cyc. 282; 1 Cyc. 325.

74. As a rule the composition must be approved by a majority in number and amount of claims. See the statutes of the several states. See also Cobbossee Nat. Bank v. Rich, 81 Me. 164, 16 Atl. 506; Fenton v. Graham, 161 Mass. 554, 37 N. E. 745.

All creditors.— Where a deed of composition stipulates that it should be signed by all creditors, it is not valid or binding upon any unless they all do sign. Cuvillier v. Buteau, 1 Rev. de Légis. 109.

Assent of a creditor cannot be given by a clerk unless the authority of such clerk to bind his employer is of an express and unequivocal character. Vineberg v. Beaulieu, 4 Montreal Super. Ct. 328.

Amount of deposit by the insolvent to pay the claims should be large enough to cover all unproved claims computed on the amount set forth in the schedule as well as those already allowed. Claflin v. Lowe, 157 Mass. 252, 32 N. E. 158, where the decree was permitted to be amended to cure a defect in this particular.

A creditor who fails to prove his claim as required cannot object if the balance of the deposit is refunded to the insolvent or the person depositing the same after the payment of the proved claims. Holder v. Hillson, 170 Mass. 466, 49 N. E. 643.

Hearings on proposal of composition.— A judge of insolvency should not be compelled against his judgment to order a hearing on a proposal of composition where the amount is insignificant, especially where the statute provides that the court shall order confirmation only after the composition appears to be duly assented to and to be consistent with justice and for the interests of creditors. Hill v. McKim, 168 Mass. 100, 46 N. E. 427, holding that mandamus will not lie to compel the judge of a court of insolvency to order a hearing on a proposal for composition made by an insolvent, but the proper remedy is by bill or petition under the statute. The error of a judge in such matters cannot be corrected by a writ of prohibition. Fairweather v. McKim, 168 Mass. 103, 46 N. E. 427. In Maine a creditor who is not a party to the agreement of composition is limited in his rights of examination of the debtor to the question whether the agreement was signed by the required proportion of the creditors and whether the debtor has paid or secured his creditors the percentage agreed upon. Messer v. Storer, 79 Me. 512, 11 Atl. 275.

Assignee need not be appointed solely to represent creditors in proof of claims, where the composition is offered, so that unless there are other reasons for appointment the judge of insolvency should himself proceed and determine whether doubtful claims presented should be allowed. Van Ingen v. Bead, 165 Mass. 582, 43 N. E. 516.

Payment in part of his claim by sale of notes of the insolvent to parties outside of the state, for the amount of which he was not accountable to the assignee, does not prevent a creditor from proving other notes of the insolvent in court without having to account for what he has received already on his claim, although he thereby receives a greater percentage than was provided by the terms of the composition. Batcheller v. National Bank of Republic, 157 Mass. 33, 31 N. E. 481.

Surrender of security.—A creditor who consents without reserve to a composition with his debtor cannot retain collateral securities given by the latter, or a pledge, unless it be for the purpose of a guarantee of the unsecured amount of the composition. Heney v. Primeau, 18 Rev. Lég. 271; Roy v. Faucher, 17 Rev. Lég. 287.

75. Perkins v. Quint, 69 N. H. 428, 45 Atl. 143.

Although the insolvent fails to pay the instalments a discharge has been held to be absolute in effect. In re Piton, 6 Quebec 33.

Payment into court, by an insolvent who has obtained his discharge in composition proceedings, of the percentage due creditors, with interest from the time of demand by the creditors, and costs, operates as a tender precluding the creditor from recovering on his original claim. W. L. Blake Co. v. Lowell, 88 Me. 424, 34 Atl. 264, holding, however, that the insolvent cannot plead the discharge where he holds the percentage due on the creditor's claim, so long as the creditor is not chargeable with laches.

The record showing the proper facts and findings, viz., that the agreement presented to the judge was on its face sufficient, and the judge having adjudged it to be so the discharge cannot be invalidated by proof that creditors holding the requisite amount of claims did not consent to the composition under which the discharge was obtained. Cobbossee Nat. Bank v. Rich, 81 Me. 164, 16 Atl. 506. So, where the original payee of a note proves it in insolvency under composition proceedings and receives a receipt for the percentage paid by the insolvent and makes no objection to his discharge, the grounds for which appear by the records of proceedings in the court of insolvency, he waives his right to object to the discharge being invalid as to signed or executed, the assignee should reconvey the estate remaining in his hands to the insolvent.[76] The terms of the composition must be strictly complied with by the insolvent.[77] A discharge in composition proceedings becomes invalid for fraud or materially false statements in the affidavit or schedule filed by the insolvent,[78] and is therefore ineffective as a bar to the recovery of any balance due on the claims of creditors from the insolvent.[79]

2. REVOCATION OF COMPOSITION DEED. Where a composition debtor fails to comply with the terms thereof within a reasonable time the composition may be revoked;[80] and if he fails to make payment according to its terms a creditor is entitled to sue for the whole amount of his debt.[81]

B. Respite — 1. IN GENERAL. Under the law in some jurisdictions a respite,[82] voluntary[83] or forced,[84] may be secured by the debtor from proceedings against him by his creditors.

2. PROCEEDINGS TO OBTAIN. To secure a forced respite it is necessary that the

him, and the same is true of a subsequent indorsee who takes the note after the discharge with full knowledge of the facts. Wright v. Worthley, 84 Me. 182, 24 Atl. 811. See Eustis v. Bolles, 146 Mass. 413, 16 N. E. 286, 4 Am. St. Rep. 327.

Showing preference.— An insolvent who compounds with his creditors, and in order to obtain the signature of one of them to the deed of composition offers him better terms than the rest, cannot plead the fraudulent preference to escape such creditor's claim. Payment by notes as a release.— Where a party sends his creditor by letter the notes of third parties as a composition of the debts he owes, and the creditor retains them, he is bound by the composition, although the notes may not be paid at maturity. Roy v. Turcotte, 7 L. C. Jur. 53.

The indorser of a composition note given by a debtor to his creditor in carrying out a settlement for a certain percentage on the dollar has been held not to be released by reason of the fact that the debtor simply gives the creditor his own notes for and pays the balance of creditor's claim. Arpin v. Poulin, 22 L. C. Jur. 331, 1 Montreal Leg. N. 290. A surrender to the debtor of the note which constituted the principal evidence of the original debt does not affect the creditor's right to recover the full amount of his claim after the debtor has failed to comply with the terms of the composition. Brown v. Hartigan, 5 L. C. Jur. 41.

82. A respite is a privilege granted to a debtor, and always derogatory to the rights of the creditors who are in the minority, by changing their contracts without consent on their part. Dauphin v. Soulie, 3 Mart. N. S. (La.) 446. Another definition see La. Rev. Civ. Code (1900), art. 3084.

The respite and insolvency laws are perfectly distinct. The former rests on the apparent solvency, the latter on the conceded insolvency of the debtor. In the first case the property remains in the possession and absolute ownership of the applicant, in the latter it passes with qualifications to the creditors. Anderson v. His Creditors, 33 La. Ann. 1155.

83. A respite is voluntary when all the creditors consent to the proposal which the debtor makes to pay in a limited time the whole or a part of his debt. La. Rev. Civ. Code (1900), art. 3085.

The agreement granting a voluntary respite must be signed by all the creditors, and such a respite does not bind even those creditors who have signed it when the others who it was contemplated should become parties, do not sign. Faures v. Coincon, 15 La. 436.

84. A respite is forced when a part of the creditors refuse to accept the debtor's proposal and when the latter is obliged to compel them by judicial authority to consent to what the others have determined in debtor should make an application therefor,[85] and should file in the office of the clerk of the court to whom he presents his petition a schedule of his assets and liabilities,[86] after which there must be a properly called and advertised meeting of the creditors,[87] at which the creditors in order to vote thereat must appear and make a sworn statement of their debts,[88] and a majority in number and amount of the bona fide creditors who appear on the schedule or at the meeting must by vote give their consent to the respite.[89] After the creditors' vote has been taken it must be homologated by the judge who ordered the meeting and a judgment of homologation of the respite signed by him.[90]

3. Stay Pending Application. On an application for a respite a stay of pro-

the cases directed by law. La. Rev. Civ. Code (1900), art. 2085.

85. La. Rev. Code (1900), art. 3087; Anderson v. His Creditors, 32 La. Ann. 892; Haydel v. Girod, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 283, 9 L. ed. 426.

The theory of the application is that the applicant is plaintiff and the creditors defendants; there is issue joined between them by the filing of oppositions to the application; and the oppositions should be tried whenever legally fixed for trial without citation to either the applicant debtor or the assenting creditors to answer the oppositions. Anderson v. His Creditors, 32 La. Ann. 892.

86. Drew v. His Creditors, 49 La. Ann. 690, 22 So. 780; Lay v. His Creditors, 48 La. Ann. 1053, 20 So. 162; Phillips v. Her Creditors, 36 La. Ann. 904, holding that a failure to file such schedule is a ground for refusing the respite.

A failure to make a substantial compliance with the requirements to furnish a sworn schedule of the assets, and also the debtor's failure to respond when called upon in respect to such assets, is ground for setting aside his respite. Lay v. His Creditors, 48 La. Ann. 1053, 20 So. 162.

Placing parties who are not his creditors on the schedule is no good ground of opposition; because by so doing the debtor cannot prejudice the real creditors, any of whom, although not on the schedule, can by making oath vote at the creditors' meeting. Anderson v. His Creditors, 33 La. Ann. 1155.

87. Janin v. His Creditors, 8 La. 467, holding, however, that a debtor who applies for a respite cannot avail himself of an irregularity resulting from his own error in asking his creditors to be convened at too early a day.

Notice of proceedings must be given to every creditor and one not receiving proper notice will not be bound by the respite. Block v. Jefferies, 46 La. Ann. 1104, 15 So. 366; McHenry v. Burnett, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 297 (notice of application); Haydel v. Girod, 10 Pet. (U. S.) 283, 9 L. ed. 426. Notice will be presumed where the record shows a decree granting a respite. McHenry v. Burnett, supra.

Whether or not the preliminary orders in proceedings for respite were providently issued may be tested by rule to show cause and if found not to be so it is proper for the judge to seasonably revoke the same.

ceedings against the debtor or his property is usually ordered.[91] This order is equivalent to an injunction,[92] but ceases upon the granting of the respite.[93]

4. Operation and Effect. A respite if granted under a strict observance of the law[94] is a judicial contract between the debtor and the creditors and among the creditors by which the debtor is allowed a delay for the payment of the sums which he owes,[95] and which protects him against all anterior debts,[96] and holds in abeyance suits standing at issue when it is granted.[97] Thereafter a creditor cannot make any agreement or contract with the debtor or do any act by which he may secure an undue advantage over the others,[98] and the debtor must so conduct his affairs as to preserve equality among the creditors.[99] If the respite has expired each creditor may sue for his claim;[1] but if it has not, the debtor by pleading and proving it may have the action dismissed.[2] A respite, however, is not binding on privileged creditors whose privileges result from the nature of the debts and not from seizure.[3] Creditors who have not consented to the respite obtained without hypothecation of property have a right to demand security from the debtor; and the exercise of this right is not limited to any precise period after the respite.[4]

5. Breach of Conditions. Any act of the debtor in violation of the contract resulting from the respite is a fraud and ipso facto turns the respite into insolvent proceedings and the cession of goods for the benefit of the creditors as though it had been offered in the first instance,[5] and upon proof of his failure to comply with the terms of the respite,[6] his creditors may cause the respite to be set aside by direct action,[7] provided the opposition to arrest the respite is made within the prescribed time.[8]

6. Effect of Refusal of Respite. Where the creditors refuse a respite prayed for a cession of the debtor's property ipso facto ensues and creditors may proceed at once to vote for syndics and prescribe the terms for selling the property.[9] But where the respite is refused by the court on the ground of defect in the proceedings, although not refused by the creditors, the cession of property does not follow.[10]

Raising assignment.— Under the insolvency laws of Ohio, the probate court in which an assignment is filed has jurisdiction, upon the consent of all creditors, to make an trust created by the assignment brought to an end,[14] all parties being remitted to the same rights and duties as existed at the date of the assignment, except in so far as the estate has been administered and disposed.[15]

VI. RIGHTS, REMEDIES, AND DISCHARGE OF INSOLVENT.

A. Status of Insolvent in General — 1. Actions By or Against — a. Pending Actions — (I) Against Insolvent. The statutes usually provide that all pending actions against the insolvent for debts provable in insolvency shall be stayed until the question of his discharge is determined;[16] but where the insolvent neglects to ask for a continuance on the ground of the pendency of the insolvency proceedings, and permits judgment to be entered against himself by default, such default will not subsequently be set aside in order to allow him to plead his discharge to the action.[17]

(II) By Insolvent. A suit instituted by an insolvent will not abate upon his subsequent insolvency, it will either proceed in his name for the benefit of his estate, or his assignee or trustee will be substituted as party plaintiff, as the local practice may require.[18]

Where, pending an appeal, the debtor is adjudged insolvent by the court of another county, a motion to stay proceedings without a proper showing of adjudication of insolvency, or of the order staying proceedings issued therein, does not divest the court in which the appeal is taken of its authority to proceed so as to make its subsequent action void. State v. Nye County Fifth Dist. Ct., 18 Nev. 286, 3 Pac. 417.

The general rule is that the assignee or trustee may be substituted as party plaintiff for the insolvent and prosecute for the benefit of the estate a suit commenced by the insolvent. b. Actions Begun After Proceedings in Insolvency — (I) AGAINST INSOLVENT. A creditor cannot maintain an action on a debt which would be barred by a discharge,[19] and if commenced against the insolvent during the pendency of the insolvency proceedings it will be stayed.[20]

(II) BY INSOLVENT. After assignment the trustee or assignee is the proper party to bring suits on causes of action in favor of the insolvent,[21] except as to such as by statute are retained by the insolvent, as for example a right of action for a tort.[22]

2. EXEMPTIONS.[23] Insolvency statutes uniformly preserve for the insolvent as exempt certain personal property, and in some jurisdictions they preserve for him a homestead, the amount and character of which vary in the different states.[24] The property thus set apart is retained by the insolvent and can neither be taken upon execution in satisfaction of a debt of the insolvent,[25] nor be applied by the assignee or trustee as a part of the assets in the settlement and winding up of the estate.[26]

3. Refusal of Discharge. If a discharge is refused, the amount received by the creditors will be deemed a payment pro tanto on the amount of the claim and the insolvent will be liable in an action for the balance.[27]

4. Death of Insolvent. The statutes do not appear uniform with reference to the effect of the death of the insolvent upon the proceedings. In some states they abate,[28] while in others the assignee's control of the assigned estate is preserved and the representative of the deceased can only claim the surplus, if any.[29]

B. Effect of Release From Arrest or Imprisonment[30] — 1. Divesting Estate. The estate of an insolvent is fully divested by his discharge under the Insolvent Debtors Act.[31]

2. Effect on Action Against or By Insolvent. Whether an insolvent debtor, discharged under an Insolvent Debtors Act, may maintain suit upon a cause of action which accrued before his discharge, is governed by particular statutory provisions[32] and the same may be said to be true with respect to actions against such an insolvent.[33]

3. Discharge of Debts. The statutes relating to the release from arrest or imprisonment of poor debtors as a rule provide that the discharge of a poor debtor from arrest or imprisonment upon his past obligations does not impair any right of the creditor to obtain satisfaction of his claims out of the debtor's estate,[34]

4. Exemption From Subsequent Arrest — a. In General. As a rule a discharge in insolvency exempts the insolvent from subsequent arrest or imprisonment on account of a debt or demand which was provable against his estate,[36] but debts which are not provable are not released by the discharge and the insolvent may be arrested thereon in those jurisdictions where the right of arrest exists.[37] The debtor, however, will not be exempt from arrest even in the state where the discharge was had upon a suit instituted by a non-resident creditor who was not a party to the original proceedings.[38]

C. Discharge[40] — 1. Right to Discharge. The conditions upon which a discharge will be granted vary in the different states. In general any debtor who has been adjudged insolvent and complied with the requirements of the statute in the surrender of his property and the rendition of an account of his assets and liabilities and who has not been guilty of any fraud will be entitled to a discharge.[41]

2. Grounds For Refusal of Discharge[42] — a. In General. The insolvency laws as a rule provide for the refusal of a discharge upon a finding of the existence of certain facts, more specifically hereinafter noticed.[43]

b. Second Insolvency.[44] In some jurisdictions a discharge will not be granted to a debtor who is a second time adjudged insolvent, unless he has paid a certain percentage of the outstanding claims, and has obtained the consent of a specified proportion of his creditors.[45]

c. Fraud[46] — (I) In General. The statutes as a rule provide that a discharge will be refused where the debtor is guilty of fraud,[47] or has sworn falsely in relation to any material fact concerning his assets or liabilities, in connection with his insolvency proceedings.[48]

40. Definition.— It is not the filing of a release in an insolvency proceeding under the law of 1881 that discharges the insolvent debtor, but the judgment of the court entered thereon so discharging him. Megins v. Pary, 72 Minn. 113, 75 N. W. 120. A discharge is a decree, order, or certificate issued to an insolvent upon his compliance with the requirements of the statutes with reference to the surrender of his property and the like, which may be pleaded by him in bar to an action upon certain claims due and owing at the time of the insolvency proceedings. 45. If the insolvent has paid all the debts owing by him at the time of his previous insolvency or been voluntarily released therefrom by his creditors, there would of course be no objection to his second discharge. See the statutes of the several states.

Effect of discharge or refusal of discharge in bankruptcy.— It has been held under such a statute that a debtor who is insolvent for the second time and since his first insolvency has obtained a discharge in bankruptcy is within neither the letter nor the policy of the exceptions stated. Whitney v. Weed, 156 Mass. 224, 30 N. E. 1023. In California one who has refused a discharge in bankruptcy, it has been held, cannot in insolvency proceedings be discharged from the same debts. In re Smith, 68 Cal. 203, 8 Pac. 881.

Under the insolvent act of 1880 one whose petition for a discharge has been denied, on the ground that his debts did not exceed the sum of three hundred dollars, as required by the act (section 2) before a debtor could claim its benefits, is not within section 49, providing that no discharge shall be granted if the debtor has received "the benefits of any act of insolvency" within three years next preceding his application for discharge in insolvency. In re Marsh, 115 Cal. 230, 46 Pac. 1072.

(II) Fraudulent Transfers or Preferences.[49] It is usually provided that a debtor who has made a preference or transfer of his property with intent to defraud his creditors will be denied a discharge, if made within a certain period prior to the insolvency proceedings.[50]

d. Mistake. An unintentional or innocent mistake will not prevent the debtor's discharge.[51]

e. Failure of Trader to Keep Books.[52] The failure of a merchant or trader to keep proper books of account and records from which his true financial condition may be ascertained is often made a ground for refusing him a discharge in the insolvency proceedings.[53]

f. Failure to File or Defects in Schedule.[54] The statutes usually provide that an insolvent who has sworn falsely in his schedule with reference to his assets or liabilities,[55] or who has failed to file a schedule thereof as required by law, will be refused a discharge.[56] And in some jurisdictions, where the claim is not properly scheduled to enable its identification, it will not be released by the discharge.[57]

3. Proceedings For Discharge and Revocation[58] — a. Jurisdiction and Venue. The application for a discharge of the insolvent or the petition for its revocation should be addressed to the court in which the insolvency proceedings are pending, that court alone having jurisdiction of the matter.[59]

b. Application.[60] The statutes not being uniform with reference to the application and proceedings thereon necessary to obtain a discharge,[61] no general rule can be laid down. Where the schedule or affidavit is required, it should contain all the particulars specified by the statute, and conform to its requirements.[62]

c. Process and Notice. As preliminary to the granting of a discharge in insolvency, it is frequently required by the provisions of the statutes that the insolvent as well as his creditors should be served with notice of such application.[63]

Boston Nat. Bank v. Hammond, 21 Wash. 158, 57 Pac. 365.

Relinquishment of security.— Under the laws of New York a creditor who petitions for the discharge of the debtor must relinquish any security held by him. Morewood v. Hollister, 6 N. The petition, schedule, and affidavit are the pleadings on the part of the petitioner, who is plaintiff, and if they are sufficient to entitle him to a discharge, any irregularity or defect in form must be taken advantage of before judgment by his creditors, who are defendants in the proceedings. Transferee of debt.— Insolvent is not obliged to give notice of his application for a discharge to a person who has become transferee of the scheduled debt subsequent to the date of the assignment. Girouard v. Dufort, 2 Montreal Super. Ct. 179.

Order to show cause.— Under Wis. Rev. St. (1898) § 4285, providing that on the filing of an insolvent petition and schedules the court shall make an order requiring creditors to show cause why a discharge should not be granted, which order shall also fix a day for the hearing thereof, the fixing of the day is a necessary jurisdictional step. German American Bank v. Powell, 121 Wis. 575, 99 N. W. 222. The written order is merely evidence, the actual order being the announcement from the bench, and the statute is satisfied if an announcement fixing the day is made, although the date as it appears in the written order is left blank. German American Bank v. Powell, supra.

Besides personal service of such notice, a service may as a rule also be made by mail [64] or by publication.[65]

d. Meetings of Creditors and Consent to Discharge.[66] The statutes usually provide that there must be a meeting of creditors to pass upon the application for discharge, at which a certain proportion of the creditors, generally three fourths, must consent thereto.[67] It is also frequently provided that the creditors thus consenting must hold a certain proportion in amount of the claims.[68]

e. Opposition of Creditors [69] — (i) Who May Oppose. Any creditor holding a claim provable in the insolvency proceedings may oppose the discharge of the insolvent.[70] It has even been held that this right exists, although the creditor has failed to file his claim in the proceedings.[71]

(ii) Grounds of Opposition. The grounds of opposition are given by the statutes of the several states and are not uniform.[72]

f. Evidence and Trial of Issues. The general rules governing the evidence and the trial of issues in other litigation apply with reference to the discharge of an insolvent, unless made inapplicable by some statutory provision.[73]

g. Order or Decree. While the statutes are not uniform with reference to the form or contents of this order or decree of discharge, it should be made conformable to statutory requirements,[74] and be sufficiently full to show jurisdiction not only of the subject-matter but also of the person.[75]

h. Revocation of Discharge. As a rule a petition will lie to revoke a discharge where the insolvent has been guilty of fraud in the insolvency proceedings;[76]

Under Cal. St. (1895) p. 148, § 54, providing that any creditor opposing the discharge of a debtor shall file specifications in writing of the grounds of the opposition, and after the debtor has filed and served his answers thereto the court shall try the issues raised, it is error to grant a debtor his discharge on motion, where, after two specifications of an opposition have been stricken out on motion as irrelevant, and a demurrer sustained to others because of uncertainty, there remain six specifications unanswered, any one of which, if undisputed, or if established on issue joined, states facts sufficient to deprive the insolvent of his discharge. In re Rich, 129 Cal. 494, 62 Pac. 56. An order sustaining a demurrer to an opposition to the petition of an insolvent for a discharge only upon the grounds mentioned in certain paragraphs indicated, which attacked only three out of ten specifications contained in the opposition, cannot be regarded as sustaining the demurrer to the entire opposition, although the order is silent as to the grounds of demurrer to the entire opposition. In re Rich, supra.

4. VALIDITY OF DISCHARGE. A discharge granted by a court having jurisdiction of the proceedings after compliance with the requirements of the statute as to the method and form of procedure will be deemed valid,[78] unless fraud has been practised by the insolvent.[79] A discharge obtained by an insolvent through the payment of a consideration or promise of consideration will be deemed void.[80] The fraudulent omission of material facts from an insolvent's schedule will under some statutes prevent the debtor from subsequently availing himself of the discharge.[81] So too under some statutes the failure of a merchant or tradesman to keep proper books of account will operate to invalidate the discharge.[82] Again the conveyance of property by one who is insolvent to another, with intent to give a preference or to defraud creditors, will in some jurisdictions, render the discharge obtained in such proceedings ineffectual, if such conveyance or transfer was made within the time limited by statutes prior to the insolvency proceedings.[83]

5. Operation and Effect of Discharge[84] — a. In General. After the discharge of a debtor in insolvency proceedings, he can neither sue nor be sued in respect to the property transferred in pursuance thereof to his trustee or assignee for the benefit of his creditors, in the jurisdiction where such insolvency proceedings were conducted.[85] Whether the effect of a discharge in insolvency is to be determined by the law in force when the discharge was obtained or when the insolvency proceedings were instituted depends upon the statute of the jurisdiction in which the proceedings are pending.[86]

b. After-Acquired Property.[87] The discharge of a debtor in insolvency proceedings operates to protect the debtor's person as well as his property thereafter acquired from liability for debts previously contracted in the jurisdiction where the discharge was granted, and elsewhere as to creditors who were resident of the same jurisdiction of the debtor with notice of the insolvency proceedings, or who were parties thereto.[88]

c. Debts and Liabilities Discharged[89] — (I) In General. All debts and liabilities absolutely due and existing at the time of the adjudication of insolvency, or publication of the first notice in accordance with the statutes of the particular jurisdiction, which were provable, are released by a discharge.[90]

(II) Debts Due United States[91] or State.[92] A debt due from the insolvent to the United States,[93] to the state, or to the people unless it is expressly so specified in the statute[94] will not be discharged or released.

(III) Partnership and Individual Debts. The discharge of a member of a firm under the state insolvency laws operates as a release of liability on his personal debts as well as on his individual liability for the debts of the firm, unless there is some statutory enactment to the contrary.[95]

(IV) Debts Not Scheduled or Defectively Scheduled.[96] The effect of a discharge upon a debt which is imperfectly scheduled or not scheduled at all is not uniform in the different states.[97] In some jurisdictions a discharge is available as a plea in bar to an action upon a claim, although not scheduled in the absence of fraud on the part of the insolvent,[98] while in others such debt is not released.[99]

(V) Debts Proved in Prior Proceedings Which Failed.[1] Unless there is some statutory provision to the contrary, a debt proved in a proceeding in insolvency which has failed may be proved in subsequent proceedings in insolvency and will be released by a discharge in the subsequent proceedings.[2]

Extent and limitations of rule.— It has been held, however, that if the character of the indebtedness is changed by taking a note in lieu thereof (Rindge v. Breck, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 43), or the claim reduced to judgment (Bangs v. Watson, 9 Gray (Mass.) 211), it loses its privilege and the discharge would operate as a bar to the claim in its changed form.

What are necessaries.— The rent of a boarding-house kept by a single woman without a family was held not to be a claim for necessaries against her within the meaning of a statute which provided that such claims shall not be barred by a discharge in insolvency. Prentice v. Richards, 8 Gray (Mass.) 226. Where several persons held a lease as joint lessees, a claim for rent in the case of those who received a discharge in insolvency was held not to be for necessaries. Plympton v. Roberts, 12 Allen (Mass.) 366. A claim for articles delivered to a firm cannot be excepted from the operation of a certificate of discharge on the ground that the articles were necessaries actually used in the families of the debtors. debtor from the personal liability arising from a judgment rendered against him,[9] unless it be a debt expressly excepted from a discharge, such as for alimony,[10] a tort,[11] or a fine;[12] but does not affect any lien that may have been thereby created and made valid by statutes of the state.[13] Similarly the personal liability of the maker of a note secured by a mortgage, deed of trust, or other lien is released by a discharge, but the security for the obligation is not impaired.[14]

e. Persons Concluded — (i) In General. It may be said as a general rule that all parties to the proceedings in insolvency,[15] whether aliens,[16] residents,[17] or

While a creditor cannot have a personal judgment against a debtor discharged in insolvency proceedings, he is entitled, in case he has a valid property attachment, to a judgment in rem against the property for the amount of his debt. Ives v. Sturgis, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 462; Whittredge v. Maxam, 68 N. H. 323, 44 Atl. 491; Batcheler v. Putnam, 54 N. H. 84, 20 Am. Rep. 115.

Waiver of lien.— Where proof of a debt is made in insolvency without disclosing that it is secured, a dividend is accepted, and a release filed in accordance with the statute, and a judgment discharging the insolvent, it is conclusively established that the creditor has elected to waive his lien, and release a mortgage, if that be his security. Mankato First Nat. Bank v. Pope, 85 Minn. 433, 89 N. W. 318.

Costs.— An insolvent would be liable for costs in an action instituted by him before his insolvency, in which the judgment was rendered against him subsequent to a discharge (Mann v. Houghton, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 592); but costs in an action against the insolvent in which judgment was rendered prior to the discharge would fall with the judgment (Warne v. Vonstant, 5 Johns. (N. Y.) 135).

What does not constitute participation.— Where a creditor brought suit against an insolvent estate in a state court having jurisdiction to enforce the vendor's lien on goods sold and then went into the insolvency court, where a rule was taken to have certain goods delivered up to him, which it was alleged belonged to him, it will not be held that there is an implied assent to defendant's discharge. Sylvester v. Danziger, 32 Fed. 1. The contesting of a discharge under the insolvent laws was held not to bar a non-resident creditor from contesting the discharge, nor would the appearance of the creditor for such purpose bar him of his action. Collins v. Rudolph, 3 Greene (Iowa) 299; McCarty v. Gibson, 5 Gratt. (Va.) 307. Nor the laying of an attachment in the hands of a trustee before the trustee actually receives the insolvent's property. Glenn v. Boston, etc., Glass Co., 7 Md. 287. Notice to residents.— Under some statutes, although not parties to the proceedings, if residents of the state in which the proceedings were pending, they will be concluded, if shown to have had notice (White v. Lobre, 7 Mart. N. S. (La.) 564; Wetherbee v. Martin, 16 Gray (Mass.) 518; Barker v. Mann, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 302; W. W. Kimball Co. v. Coon, 45 Minn. 45, 47 N. W. 315; People v. Stryker, 24 Barb. (N. Y.) 649. (II) Co-Debtors, Guarantors, and Sureties.[19] The discharge of a debtor in insolvency will not release or discharge any other person liable for the same debt as co-debtor, guarantor, or surety.[20] A guarantor, surety, or co-debtor of an insolvent who is obliged to pay or contribute to the payment of an obligation of his principal subsequent to the discharge of a principal in insolvency proceedings may obtain contribution from his co-debtor or recover such payment from the principal notwithstanding his previous discharge.[21]

Suit by foreign creditor.— The fact that the foreign creditor brings suit upon his contract in the courts of a state in which the insolvent lives does not subject his contract, or the judgment obtained upon it, to the operation of the insolvent laws of the debtor's state. See 28 Cent. Dig. tit. "Insolvency," § 271; and FOREIGN CORPORATIONS, 19 Cyc. 1220.

The reason why a discharge in insolvency is ineffective as against the debt of a non-though the debt is payable in the state in which such proceedings took place,[24] or the contract upon which the claim is based was made in such state,[25] and to be resident creditor is that the insolvency court has no jurisdiction over him. Swift v. Winchester, 96 Me. 480, 52 Atl. 1017, 90 Am. St. Rep. 414.

The theory upon which it is held that such law cannot operate upon a citizen not within its jurisdiction is that the judgment of the court discharging a debtor from his obligation is, as to the creditors residing in another state, an ex parte judgment; if, however, he comes within the state and submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court, it has never been held that the contract should be discharged. Sloane v. Chiniquy, 22 Fed. 213.

Place of payment not mentioned.— See Rhodes v. Borden, 67 Cal. 7, 6 Pac. 850; Fessenden v. Willey, 2 Allen (Mass.) 67, 79 Am. Dec. 762; Houghton v. Maynard, 5 Gray (Mass.) 552. See also McKim v. Willis, 1 Allen (Mass.) 512).

Preference of non-resident.— The discharge of a defendant under the insolvent laws does not impair the right of non-resident judgment creditors to obtain by attachment or execution on their judgment a preference over domestic creditors. Glenn v. Boston, etc., Glass Co., 7 Md. 287; Owens v. Bowie, 2 Md. 457; Potter v. Kerr, 1 Md. Ch. 275.

Transfer of claim after discharge.— A discharge in insolvency is a good defense to an action on a note made in the state where the insolvency proceedings were instituted, to a citizen of such state, which was indorsed to a citizen of another state after the discharge was granted. Thomas v. Crow, 65 Cal. 470, 4 Pac. 448; Baker v. Wheaton, 5 Mass. 509, 4 Am. Dec. 71. A discharge would bar an action on a judgment on notes held by a non-resident firm, but were assigned to an attorney in the state where the insolvency proceedings were conducted for collection, the attorney recovering judgment in his own name. French v. Robinson, 86 Me. 142, 29 Atl. 960, 41 Am. St. Rep. 533.

Transfer of claim before proceedings.— A note which is indorsed to a non-resident before maturity and before proceedings in insolvency are begun will not be affected by the discharge in insolvency. Anderson v. Wheeler, 25 Conn. 603; Chase v. Flagg, 48 Me. 182; Felch v. Bugbee, 48 Me. 9, 77 Am. Dec. 203; Fessenden v. Willey, 2 Allen (Mass.) 67, 79 Am. Dec. 762; Savoye v. Marsh, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 594, 43 Am. Dec. 451; Smith v. Gardner, 4 Bosw. (N. Y.) 54.

Where the debt was contracted with a corporation, the name and seal of which did not disclose its identity or residence, and by which defendant was led to believe that he was dealing with a resident concern, his discharge in insolvency was no bar, when as a matter of fact plaintiff was a non-resident. Swift v. Winchester, 96 Me. 480, 52 Atl. 1017. 90 Am. St. Rep. 414. Although a foreign corporation established offices, procured a license, and appointed the commissioner of corporations its attorney, upon whom all lawful process might be served in the state in which the insolvency proceedings were instituted, a discharge of a debtor in said proceedings would not bar an action against an insolvent by such corporation. Bergner, etc., Brewing Co. v. Dreyfus, 172 Mass. 154, 51 N. E. 531, 70 Am. St. Rep. 251.

Such a discharge cannot be pleaded in bar of an action brought against the insolvent by a citizen of another state in any other state than the one in which the discharge was granted. Although the debt is a judgment recovered in the state where the proceedings are pending, the insolvent laws would not affect a creditor residing out of the state at the time of the application of the debtor for his discharge, where such creditor does not participate in the proceedings under such laws. performed in such state.[26] A discharge under a state insolvency law has no effect upon a contract with a non-resident made or to be performed out of the state and cannot be pleaded in bar to an action thereon.[27] The same is true of a contract made and to be executed in a foreign country.[28] Nor would a state have authority by statute to give a court jurisdiction to discharge an insolvent from a debt due a resident of another state, even though at the time the debt was contracted the creditor was a resident of the state in which the proceedings were instituted and the debt was payable there.[29] Such a non-resident creditor may proceed either against the person or property of the insolvent in accordance with the laws of such foreign state.[30]

f. Effect in Other Jurisdiction. A debt or claim released by a discharge in insolvency proceedings under the laws of the state where the contract was made,

Extent and limits of rule.— The discharge was held not to be a bar to an obligation of a contract made in another state between persons not residing in the state when the contract was made, although they became residents before the petition for the discharge was presented. Witt v. Follett, 2 Wend. (N. Y.) 457. 6. New Promise — a. In General. The liability on a debt which has been released by a discharge in insolvency will be revived by a valid new promise to pay.[33] The action should be upon the new and not upon the original promise.[34] A new promise given to the payee of a note inures to the benefit of subsequent indorsees.[35]

Failure to record in other state.— Where a debtor obtains a discharge in one state, after an assignment purporting to convey all his property, but such assignment is not recorded in another state, a creditor there can enforce his claim against an interest of the debtor in real estate in the other state. But see Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 476, where it was held that the cause of action should be upon the original demand, as the new promise is evidence merely of a waiver of the defense furnished by the discharge.

If the new debt created by the promise is conditional, the condition must be observed. Glenn v. Dunbar, 10 La. Ann. 253; Beck v. Howard, 3 La. Ann. 501; Scouton v. Eislord, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 36. See Wait v. Morris, 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 394.

the discharge, is regarded as a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay the debt released by the discharge.[37] A partial payment of a debt in some jurisdictions is held not to be the equivalent of a new promise and will not revive the balance of the debt.[38] The promise may be in writing or oral, in accordance with the statutes of the particular jurisdiction,[39] but cannot be established by implication or inference.[40]

7. PLEADING, EVIDENCE, AND DETERMINATION[41] — a. Pleading[42] — (I) RIGHT TO PLEAD. An insolvent discharged in a proceeding in insolvency if subsequently sued for any obligation which was released thereby[43] may plead the discharge in bar of such action, unless by giving a new promise or the doing of some other act he has estopped himself from making such plea,[44] as by a showing that the discharge had been obtained by fraud.[45]

(II) NECESSITY OF PLEADING. A debtor who has obtained a discharge in an insolvency proceeding, in order to avail himself of the discharge as a defense to an action on a debt existing at the time of the discharge, must plead it.[46]

Supplementary proceedings founded on a judgment obtained prior to an insolvent's discharge will be vacated on an application to the court. Smith v. Paul, 20 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 97.

Where a creditor has levied execution and a motion is made to set it aside because of the defense in insolvency proceedings, the court will not try the validity of the discharge on affidavits. Cramer v. ——, 3 Sandf. (N. Y.) 700; Noble v. Johnson, 9 Johns. (N. Y.) 259. In California an insolvent who has obtained a discharge cannot have execution against him enjoined, as tice pursued in other litigations as to questions of fact and of law as a rule prevails.[51]

c. Evidence of Discharge — (I) Presumption and Burden of Proof. Unless the statute provides to the contrary, a certificate of discharge is at least prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceeding, and the jurisdiction of the court;[52] and while it is generally conclusive of the proceedings and the facts therein contained,[53] the burden of showing that a debt is released by the discharge rests upon the party pleading it as a release.[54]

(II) Admissibility, and Weight and Sufficiency. In receiving or rejecting evidence which is offered to show a valid discharge of an insolvent,[55] the his release should be by motion to have the execution dismissed. Green v. Thomas, 17 Cal. 86. See also Imlay v. Carpentier, 14 Cal. 173.

Questions of fact properly submitted to the jury see Dean v. Grimes, 72 Cal. 442, 14 Pac. 178 (whether the insolvent had concealed any part of his property or estate, or made a false schedule, or committed any fraud under the statute to defeat the discharge); Downs v. Lewis, 11 Cush. (Mass.) 76 (where the validity of discharge was denied because of some question of fact); Soule v. Chase, 1 Rob. (N. Y.) 222, 1 Abb. Pr. N. P. 173 (prima facie evidence of a due discharge and of all the proceedings under the insolvent act); Ladbroke v. Gyles, Willes 199 (sufficient evidence of the discharge).

It will be presumed that the discharge was properly secured, and the question of its validity will not be tried on affidavits. Stuart v. Salhinger, 14 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 291.

Proof aliunde.— The discharge itself held sufficient evidence of the facts stated therein to give the commissioner jurisdiction without proof aliunde of those facts. Jenks v. Stebbins, 11 Johns. (N. Y.) 224. It seems, however, that notwithstanding the facts recited in the discharge, it is competent for the opposing party to show that the officer did not have jurisdiction. Barber v. Winslow, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 102. Although the discharge is made evidence of the facts therein contained, it is not the only evidence that can be received to show the regularity of the proceedings, and the omission to state in the discharge an act required by the statute to be done cannot even raise a presumption that such act was not performed. Salters v. Tobias, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 338.

In Massachusetts the certificate of an insolvent debtor's discharge is not conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated; but when offered in evidence, the court may look into the record of the proceedings in insolvency, in order to determine whether the certificate was properly granted. Gardner v. Nute, 2 Cush. 333. See also Cox v. Austin, 11 Cush. 32, holding that a recital that the debtor has "in all things conformed himself to the directions" of the insolvent law is not prima facie evidence that he made and subscribed the oath required of him by that law.

In an action on an insolvent's bond the breach assigned being that the insolvent did not give the notice of hearing to his creditors required by law, the record of the insolvent's discharge is not conclusive evidence that the insolvent did give such notice. Berens v. Rasch, 9 Phila. (Pa.) 45.

Y.) 291 note, holding that the court will not try the validity of an insolvent's discharge on affidavits, and on motion the recitals of the discharge are conclusive.

Except as to jurisdictional matters a discharge is conclusive evidence of the statutory proceedings and facts therein stated. The facts upon which the jurisdiction of the officer depends may be inquired into by the party seeking to impeach it in a collateral proceeding. Stanton v. Ellis, 12 N. Y. 575, 64 Am. Dec. 512.

The certificate of a discharge in insolvency is of itself evidence of the facts it contains, general rules governing and controlling the admissibility of evidence in other civil actions apply.[56]

3. Collateral Attack of Discharge. The discharge obtained by an insolvent under the insolvency statutes is not subject to collateral attack, except for matters going to the jurisdiction.[57]

D. Reversion of Property or Surplus to Debtor. In case of the discontinuance of insolvency proceedings, the parties thereto are remitted to their respective rights as they existed at the time of the institution of proceedings, except in so far as the estate shall have been administered. The undistributed assets should be returned to the insolvent while dividends received by the creditors are to be treated as so much payment on account.[58] After the debts of the insolvent are extinguished, either through a composition proceeding,[59] or by being satisfied by the assignee,[60] the latter becomes trustee for the benefit of the insolvent, and the estate remaining in the assignee's hands reverts to the insolvent or should be administered for his benefit, as required by the law of the particular jurisdiction in which the proceedings are pending.

VII. APPEAL AND REVISION OF PROCEEDINGS.

A. In General. The review and revision of insolvency proceedings is usually provided for by statute.[61] Depending upon the local practice, this review may be by certiorari,[62] by appeal,[63] or by general superintendence of certain courts given this jurisdiction by special statutory provision.[64]

C. Appeal — 1. In General.[66] As a rule the statutes provide an adequate remedy by way of appeal for the review of decisions of courts of insolvency.[67] The proper court to which the appeal should be taken as well as the scope and extent of its appellate jurisdiction in such matters is regulated by statute or governed by the local practice.[68]

2. Decisions Reviewable.[69] Notwithstanding the impossibility of laying down any general or uniform rule by reason of the lack of uniformity in the various statutory provisions,[70] among the decisions rendered by insolvency courts or by insolvency judges which have been held to be reviewable[71] may be enumerated orders or decrees: Allowing or disallowing a claim;[72] appointing a

A creditor who has proved his claim from an order directing the sale of an insolvent's property and also from the order confirming such sale. Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg., etc., Co., 41 Minn. 256, 43 N. W. 180. One of two co-assignees, from a decree granting a debtor a discharge from his debts, although the other co-assignee refuses to join therein and objects thereto. Paul v. Costello, 177 Mass. 580, 59 N. E. 451.

Persons not entitled have been held to include the following: An attaching creditor, from a decree adjudging a debtor insolvent (In re Hubbard, 85 Me. 542, 27 Atl. 464), although the adjudication would result in defeating the attachment (Commercial Nat. Bank's Appeal, 59 Conn. 25, 21 Atl. 1021). The syndic, from an order reducing the amount of claims carried on the tableau of distribution, to which the creditors took no exception (Chapoton v. His Creditors, 46 La. Ann. 412, 14 So. 882), nor where there is a conflict between creditors in which the syndic is without interest (Beer v. Their Creditors, 12 La. Ann. 774). One creditor, from the allowance of the claim of another creditor against the estate of a debtor who makes settlement by composition proceedings. Huston v. Worthly, 83 Me. 352, 22 Atl. 243. The debtor, in composition proceedings from the allowance of a claim against his estate. Thomson v. Poor, 163 Mass. 26, 39 N. E. 407. An assignee who has been removed. Campbell v. Miner, 4 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 96, 3 Ohio N. P. 138. A creditor, although a party to the proceedings, who does not prove his claim nor oppose the debtor's discharge in the lower court. Jacobs v. Bogart, 7 Rob. (La.) 162. A creditor from a discharge unless at the proper time he has filed objections thereto. In re Butterfield, 80 Me. 594, 16 Atl. 247. An attorney who rendered services to the assignee of an insolvent, and whose claim therefor has been denied. In re Trafton, 94 Me. 579, 48 Atl. 113.

4. Presentation and Reservation of Grounds.[4] The general rule that unless an objection is made or an exception reserved at the proper stage of the proceedings, advantage of such objection cannot be taken for the first time on appeal[5] applies.[6]

5. Taking and Perfecting.[7] The practice as to taking and perfecting an appeal or the time within which it may be taken varies according to the several provisions of the different states.[8] It is generally provided, however, that an undertaking or bond must be given as a condition to the granting of the appeal.[9]

6. Matters Reviewable and Extent of Review.[10] What will be considered by the court on review is governed by the rules and statutes of the several states.[11] Generally speaking, where it is a question of fact or the exercise of a discretion,

VIII. COSTS AND FEES.

A. Costs.[14] The allowance and taxation of costs in insolvency proceedings depend upon the local practice, being regulated either by special provision in the insolvency statutes themselves, or by general provision relating to costs.[15] This applies to costs in the court below [16] as well as to costs upon appeal;[17] also to security for costs whether in the court below [18] or upon appeal.[19]

C. Fees of Attorneys and Counsel — 1. Of Insolvent. As a rule the attorney for an insolvent is entitled to a reasonable fee out of the estate for conducting the proceedings in his behalf,[21] but not for services performed in resisting proceedings by his creditors to have him adjudged insolvent.[22]

2. Of Creditors. While the attorney representing a creditor as a rule is expected to look to him for his compensation, especially where the litigation is in the interest of the creditor only,[23] still if he renders services resulting in a benefit to the estate, a reasonable fee may be allowed him out of such estate.[24]

3. Of Assignee or Trustee. Where the counsel is employed by the assignee or trustee to aid in the administration of the estate a reasonable fee should be paid such attorney out of such estate.[25]

I. DEFINITION.

Inspection is the examination of certain articles made by law subject to such examination, so that they may be declared fit for commerce.[1]

II. PURPOSE OF INSPECTION LAWS AND POWER TO ENACT.

The object of inspection laws is to protect the community so far as they apply to domestic sales, from frauds and impositions; and in relation to articles designed for exportation, to preserve the character and reputation of the state in foreign markets.[2] They are also incidentally designed to protect manufacturers and vendors themselves against unfounded and unjust claims of vendees and consumers.[3] The right to pass inspection laws is not granted to congress, and consequently remains subject to state legislation,[4] as an incident of the police power;[5] but it is subject to the paramount right of congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states.[6]

The power to regulate commerce is not the source from which the right to pass inspection laws is derived (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. (U. S.) 1, 203, 6 L. ed. 23); but congress may interpose, if at any time any statute, under the guise of an inspection law, goes beyond the limit prescribed by the constitution, in imposing duties or imposts on

III. CONSTITUTIONALITY OF INSPECTION LAWS.

A statute providing for the appointment of inspectors and authorizing the charging of inspection fees is held not to violate either the constitutional provision that taxes shall be uniform,[7] or the provision of the federal constitution prohibiting any state, without the consent of congress, to lay duties on exports, where no burden is placed on commerce with foreign countries.[8] Nor is an inspection law rendered unconstitutional by the fact that it interferes with the right of a patentee to sell a certain brand of merchandise which has been patented under the laws of the United States,[9] or that its purpose is not to improve the quality of the article, but to aid in the detection and punishment of crime or fraud,[10] or that the cost of inspection is much less than the amount authorized to be charged.[11]

IV. SUBJECTS OF INSPECTION.

Inspection laws include nothing but personal property as a subject of their operation.[12] Their scope, however, is very large, and is not confined to articles of domestic produce or manufacture, or to articles intended for exportation, but applies to articles imported, and to those intended for domestic use as well.[13] Quantity is as legitimate a subject of inspection as quality.[14]

Recognized elements of inspection laws have always been: A quality of the article, form, capacity, dimensions and weight of package, mode of putting up, and marking and branding of various kinds, all these matters being supervised by a public officer having authority to pass or not pass the article as lawful merchandise, according as it did or did not answer the prescribed requirements. It has never been regarded as necessary, and it is manifestly not necessary, that all of these elements should coexist in order to make a valid inspection law. Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. Hoops.— Me. Rev. St. c. 41, § 20, applies to hogshead hoops and does not require barrel hoops to be culled and branded (Fitch v. Wood, 85 Me. 284, 27 Atl. 148), but where hoops are required to be culled and branded a sale thereof without such culling and branding is void (Durgin v. Dyer, 68 Me. 143).

Hoop-poles are not required by statute to be surveyed before sale. Lewis v. Soper, 44 Me. 72.

Staves.— Me. Rev. St. c. 66, requiring staves to be surveyed or culled previous to sale, does not apply to pine staves, but only to certain descriptions of oak staves. Gilman v. Perkins, 32 Me. 320.

V. CHANGE OF PACKAGE AND REINSPECTION.

Statutes providing that a certain article manufactured in or brought into the state shall be inspected and the package containing the same branded before sale does not require a second inspection after the bulk has been broken for purposes of sale.[15]

VI. INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN SHIPMENTS OR SALES.

A. In General. The application of inspection laws to foreign shipments or sales depends entirely upon their language and intent. The statutes of some states apply only to merchandise offered for sale or distribution, or to be consumed, within the state;[16] others require inspection only when the merchandise is intended for export,[17] while a third class make it a misdemeanor to sell certain articles without inspection whether the sale be for consumption within the state or elsewhere.[18] Merchandise in transit through a state or municipality is not subject to the inspection laws of such state or municipality.[19]

B. Inspection in State of Export. Foreign produce, inspected and branded in the state from which it is shipped, is exempt from reinspection.[20]

C. Extraterritorial Force of Inspection Laws. State inspection laws have no extraterritorial operation.[21]

VII. MODE OF INSPECTION.

The manner in which the inspection shall be made depends entirely upon the requirements of the statute and the nature of the merchandise.[22] The statutes

22. Beer.— Under the Missouri act of May 4, 1899, sections 7, 8, providing for the inspection of beer and other malt liquors, the inspector is not restricted to an examination or analysis of the finished product after it is bottled or barreled, but is authorized to go to the brewery and take samples of the malt and of the beer in the vats in the process of fermentation. Flour.— An inspector of flour is bound to inspect by boring through the head of the barrel with an auger not exceeding one-half inch in diameter. Delaplane v. Crenshaw, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 457.

Milk.— Under the Massachusetts statute of 1884, chapter 310, section 4, providing that a sample of the milk seized by an inspector shall be "sealed up," to be delivered to defendant or his attorney, in case a complaint is made, it is not enough to place generally require the inspector or subinspector to make inspection personally, and have the brand or stamp affixed under his immediate supervision.[23]

VIII. MARKS AND BRANDS.[24]

"Brand" is equivalent to "stamp" or "mark."[25] Hay pressed and put up for sale must be branded with the name of the person pressing.[26] The inspector's mark is not conclusive evidence of the quality of the article,[27] unless the purchaser expressly stipulates in his contract that it shall have that effect.[28]

IX. CERTIFICATES.

A certificate must be required from inspectors in order to hold them liable as warrantors.[29] Such certificate is presumptive evidence of the fact of inspection, and such other facts as inspectors are required to state.[30]

X. INSPECTION OFFICERS.

The power of appointing inspection officers is vested in the legislature,[31] which body may delegate it to the governor of the state,[32] to counties or municipalities,[33] to mayors of cities,[34] to courts of common pleas,[35] or to boards of trade.[36] Where

The action of inspectors appointed by a board of trade, however, is binding only upon the members of such corporation, and others

a vacancy occurs before the expiration of a term fixed by law, the new inspector is appointed only for the balance of the unexpired term.[37] An inspector has authority to appoint deputies,[38] and is bound to take out a license.[39]

XI. FEES.

A. In General. The right to pass inspection laws involves the power to enforce such laws by adequate provision for the remuneration, in the form of fees or salary,[40] of the officers charged with the duty of inspection.[41] The fixing of the amount of such fees is a legislative power,[42] which may be delegated when it seems advantageous to do so.[43] No charge beyond the amount so fixed can be made;[44] nor can the inspector recover at all, where his authority is denied, and his services are not required or requested.[45] A substantial performance of the service is a condition precedent to the right of compensation therefor.[46] The expenses of inspection are required to be borne by those presumably benefited thereby.[47] An inspection charge is not a tax.[48]

B. Actions For Fees. Where two inspectors have power jointly, and not severally, to appoint deputies, an action for services performed by a deputy is properly brought in the name of both inspectors.[49] In an action by a sheep inspector for his fees, an order appointing him inspector and approving his bond is admissible.[50]

XII. EFFECT OF FAILURE TO INSPECT.[51]

The sale of merchandise, without compliance with inspection laws, is void,

But see Com. v. Genther, 17 Serg. & R. and no recovery can be had for the price,[52] except where no inspector has been appointed.[53]

XIII. PENALTIES.

The penalty given for the violation of an inspection law may be recovered in an action qui tam.[54] The public at large, the dealers in the merchandise, are the ones intended to be protected, and an inspector cannot sustain an action for the penalty.[55] In an action for the penalty for altering inspectors' marks, it is necessary to set out the marks, and how altered.[56] Penalties do not attach to a sale of liquors, which are pure but not inspected, made before an inspector has been appointed.[57]

XIV. CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR VIOLATION OF INSPECTION LAW.

A. In General. Refilling branded oil barrels without erasing the brand is a criminal offense, although no inspection was made before the brand was placed thereon.[58] An indictment or information for violation of the inspection laws must bring the accused strictly within the terms of the offense as described in the statute and should leave nothing to conjecture or inference.[59] On the trial of an information for selling liquors not inspected, the state is bound to give some evidence in support of the negative averment of the want of inspection.[60]

B. Of Officers. Indictment for misdemeanor lies against an inspector for refusing to perform his duty.[61]

58. State v. Parsons, 12 Mo. App. 205.

59. State v. Broeder, 90 Mo. App. 156, holding that under the beer inspection act, making it an offense to sell any beer within the state which has not been inspected, or contained in packages which have not on them a certificate of the state inspector, an information alleging that the package did not, then and there, at the time and place of sale, have on it a certificate of the state inspector certifying that the beer had then and there been inspected, is insufficient, as such allegations do not negative in direct terms the fact that the package did not have on it an official certificate of the inspector.

Surplusage.— Under the beer inspection act making it an offense to sell any beer in the state which has not been inspected, where an information alleges that the package did not then and there, at the time and place of sale, have on it the certificate of the state inspector certifying that the beer had then and there been inspected, the words "then and there" at the conclusion cannot be rejected as surplusage, as they go to the substance of the offense. State v. Broeder, 90 Mo. App. 156.

Matter of defense.— Under the beer inspection act making it an offense to sell any beer in the state which has not been inspected, an information need not negative the fact that the beer was sold for exportation, as the exception in respect to beer for exportation is not contained in the section creating the offense, and is matter of defense. State v. Broeder, 90 Mo. App. 156.

W. 905 (holding that an inspector, made liable for falsely branding oil, is liable, irrespective of whether he actually knew that the branding was false); Tardos v. Bozant, 1 La. Ann. 199 (holding that where an inspector certifies that merchandise is of a certain quality, he is responsible, not only for its being of such quality at the date of his certificate, but for its remaining of such quality for the length of time during which the article is usually expected to continue in that likewise liable for lack of care and skill on the part of his deputies;[63] but not for mere errors of judgment,[64] and an action lies against him in the first instance.[65] In a suit against an inspector for the unskilful and unfaithful performance of his duties, it is not competent for him to prove the customary mode pursued by other inspectors.[66] Evidence that the merchandise passed inspection at the foreign market to which it was shipped is not conclusive against the inspector's liability.[67]

XVI. LIABILITY ON OFFICER'S BONDS.

Sureties on an inspector's official bond are liable for any breach of duty by him[68] or his deputy,[69] while acting officially.[70] An action may be maintained on an inspector's bond in the name of the governor for the benefit of the person injured;[71] and judgment against the inspector is not a condition precedent to an action on the bond.[72] condition if properly taken care of); Nickerson v. Thompson, 33 Me. 433; Hayes v. Porter, 22 Me. 371 (holding that a person injured by an inspector's negligence may recover damages, although the owner employs the men by whom the work is done, and furnishes the barrels, and there is no collusion between the parties, where the defects could have been discovered by a careful examination); McKennan v. Bodine, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 582. But see Gordon v. Livingston, 12 Mo. App. 267 (holding that an inspector is not liable for a false certificate given to one with whom he has not contracted); Fath v. Koeppel, 72 Wis. 289, 39 N. W. 539, 7 Am. St. Rep. 867 (holding that a fish inspector has judicial duties and powers, and while acting within his jurisdiction, is not liable for the careless, improper, or erroneous performance of his duties, although he knew his unfitness for the office).

Penalty does not exclude civil action.— Although an inspection law imposes a penalty upon the inspector for neglect of duty, one moiety thereof to the use of the town wherein the offense shall have been committed, and another moiety to the use of the person suing for the same, yet a person injured by the inspector's neglect of official duty may recover damages sustained thereby in an action on the case. Hayes v. Porter, 22 Me. 371.

Measure of damages.— In an action for damages for default in branding fish prepared for exportation, the measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the fish in the foreign market and the value which the fish would have had at the same time and place if they had been of the quality and in the condition indicated by the inspection, provided that they are exported within the usual and reasonable time after the inspection, that they are exposed to no extraordinary heat or other damage, and that they are exported to no remote or unusual place. Pearson v. Purkett, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 264.

Loss not occasioned by inspector's negligence.— In an action for damages caused by the explosion of oil falsely branded as up to the required test, the inspector is not liable if the explosion was caused by the defective condition of the lamp in which the oil was burned, although the oil was below the required test, and an instruction that the sole cause of the explosion was because the oil was not up to the required test, and that the burden was upon plaintiff to establish his claim, does not sufficiently submit the issue whether the cause of the explosion was the defective condition of the lamp in which the oil was burned. Hatcher v. Dunn, (Iowa 1896) 66 N. W. 905.

Reckless disregard of duty.— An inspector is liable for a reckless disregard of his duty that results in danger to another, but not for an honest mistake. McKennan v. Bodine, 6 Phila. (Pa.) 582.

63. Pearson v. Purkett, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 264.

Liability not limited by amount of deputy's bond.— The liability of an inspector for the default of a deputy is not limited to the amount of the penalty prescribed by law as the extent of the deputy's bond. Pearson v. Purkett, 15 Pick. (Mass.) 264.

68. People v. Harper, 91 Ill. 357 (holding that where one of the duties of an inspector is to pay over to his successor the residue of the inspector's fees that he has collected, the sureties on his official bond are liable for any default on his part so to pay over. It does not lie with them to say that such surplusage is larger than it ought to be); St. Louis County Ct. v. Fassett, 65 Mo. 418.

69. Verratt v. McAuley, 5 Ont. 313.

70. Witte v. Weinstein, 115 Iowa 247, 88 N. W. 349, holding that the act relating to an inspection of linseed oil contains no provision authorizing the secretary of state to require inspectors to collect samples to be sent to him for analysis, and hence a libel published by an inspector while procuring such samples was a trespass done in his private capacity, and not as a public officer, for which the sureties on his official bond are not liable.

INSPECTOR. In manufacturing, a name given to a person whose duty it is to make tests of machinery.[1] (See, generally, INSPECTION.)

INSPECTOR TICKETS. Tickets in the nature of receipts issued for wheat or grain received for storage in an elevator.[2] (See ELEVATOR; and, generally, WAREHOUSEMEN.)

INSPEXIMUS. Literally, "We have inspected." The first word of an ancient charter, or a royal grant.[3] (See, generally, CORPORATIONS; RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.)

INSTALLATION. The ceremony of inducting or investing with any charge, office, or rank.[4] (See, generally, OFFICERS.)

INSTALMENT. Different portions of the same debt payable at different successive periods as agreed.[5] (Instalment: Accrual of Action on, see ACTIONS; Actions — For Separate Instalments of Same Claim, see ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL; ACTIONS; On Claims Payable in Instalments, Aggregation to Make up Jurisdictional Amount, see APPEAL AND ERROR; Of Debt For Money Payable in Instalments, see DEBT, ACTION OF. They have a value, and pass from hand to hand, but only as representing and calling for the quantities of wheat therein specified. The transfer of such tickets is a usual way of transferring the property in the wheat called for by the same."

"Installation implies an act to be performed by the outgoing Governor and one to be performed by the Legislature. That to be performed by the outgoing Governor consists in placing in the hands of the incoming Governor the public property and insignia attached to the office of Governor; that to be performed by the Legislature consists in the recognition of the new Governor by acting with him in the conduct of public business." Ex p. Norris, 8 S. INSTANTANEOUS.[11] Done or occurring in an instant or without any perceptible portion of time.[12] (See INSTANT, and Cross-References Thereunder.)

INSTANTER. FORTHWITH,[13] q. v.; INSTANTLY,[14] q. v.; IMMEDIATELY,[15] q. v.; without delay;[16] without any delay or the allowance of any time;[17] without any intervention of time; it allows not a particle of delay; it marks an interval too small to be appreciated.[18] In practice it is sometimes said to mean "within twenty-four hours."[19] (See INSTANT, and Cross-References Thereunder.)

INSTANTLY.[20] Immediately after; without any intervening time.[21] (See INSTANT, and Cross-References Thereunder.)

IN STATU QUO. In the condition in which a person or thing was formerly.[22]

INSTEAD OF.[23] IN LIEU OF, q. v.; in the place or room of.[24]

But as often used the term does not import an absolutely instantaneous succession, but only that which is comparatively so (Burrill L. Dict. [quoted in Kleinschmidt v. McAndrews, 4 Mont. 8, 12, 223, 5 Pac. 281, 2 Pac. 286]); as for example as meaning "some time after, that is, instantly, upon, and immediately following, but not at the same moment" (Reg. v. Brownlow, 11 A. & E. 119, 126, 8 Dowl. The signification of the word "instanter," which seems to be more in accordance with the practice which has uniformly prevailed in Illinois, is the one suggested in the note to Rex v. Johnson, 6 East 583, 2 Smith K. B. 591, 8 Rev. Rep. 550, viz., "before the rising of the court," when the act is to be done in court, or "before the shutting of the office on the same night," when the act is to be done there. The same definition is adopted by Mr. Wharton in his law dictionary. He there lays down the rule that when a party is ordered to plead instanter he must plead the same day. 30. For example, the Institutes of Justinian, of Gaius, of Lord Coke. Black L. Dict.

Institutes of Justinian comprise "one of the four component parts or principal divisions of the Corpus Juris Civilis, being an elementary treatise on the Roman law, in four books. This work was compiled from earlier sources, (resting principally on the Institutes of Gaius,) by a commission composed of Tribonian and two others, by command and under direction of the emperor Justinian, and was first published November 21, A. D. 533." Black L. Dict. See also 10 Cyc. 1365.

Institutes of Lord Coke comprise "the . . . four volumes by Lord Coke, published A. D. 1628. The first is an extensive comment upon a treatise on tenures, compiled by Littleton, a judge of the common pleas, temp. Edward IV. This comment is a rich mine of valuable common-law learning, collected and heaped together from the ancient reports and Year Books, but greatly defective in method. It is usually cited by the name of Co. Litt., or as 1 Inst. The second volume is a comment upon old acts of parliament, without systematic order; the third a more methodical treatise on the pleas of the crown; and the fourth an account of the several species of courts. These are cited as 2, 3, or 4 Inst., without any author's name." Black L. Dict.

31. In jurisprudence the plural form of this word "institutions" is sometimes used as the equivalent of "institutes," to denote an elementary text book of the law. Black L. Dict. See INSTITUTES.

In legal parlance, the term implies foundation by law, by enactment, or by prescription (Dodge v. Williams, 46 Wis. 70, 101, 1 N. W. 92, 50 N. W. 1103); an undertaking formed to promote some defined purpose having in view generally the instruction or education of the public; it is the body (so to speak) called into existence to translate the purpose as conceived in the mind of the founders into a living and active principle (Manchester v. McAdams, [1896], A. C. 500, 511, 61 J. P. 100, 65 L. J. Q. B. 672, 75 L. T. Rep. N. S. 229.

Sometimes the word is used to denote merely the local habitation or the headquarters of the institution; sometimes it comprehends everything that goes to make up the institution — everything belonging to the undertaking in connection with the purpose which informs and animates the whole. Manchester v. McAdam, [1896] A. C. 500, 511, 512, 61 J. P. 100, 65 L. J. Q. B. 672, 75 L. T. Rep. N. S. 229.

INSTITUTION OF LEARNING. A term which includes every description of enterprise undertaken for educational purposes which is of a higher grade than the public schools.[44]

INSTRUCT.[45] To convey information to; to inform as to the law.[46] (See Enjoin; Instructions; and, generally, Criminal Law; Trial.)

INSTRUCTION.[47] Some degree of education as taught in the schools.[48] In practice, any direction given to the jury by the court,[49] in reference to the law of the case.[50] (Instruction: In Civil Action, see Trial. In Criminal Prosecution, see Criminal Law.)

INSTRUMENT.[51] A word most frequently used to denote something reduced to writing, as a means of evidence,[52] and by elision also often used for written

A contract of insurance contains five necessary ingredients: (1) The subject-matter; (2) the risks insured against; (3) the amount; (4) duration of the risk; and (5) the premium of insurance. A contract of insurance which wants any of these ingredients is incomplete. Tyler v. New Amsterdam F. Ins. Co., 4 Rob. (N. Y.) 151, 155.

Distinguished from contracts to pay money on marriage.—An agreement between an association and its members that the association will pay a stipulated amount to the wife of the member on the event of his marriage, in consideration of the agreement by him to pay stipulated dues so long as he remains single, and not to marry within two years, is not a contract of insurance, and does not fall within the supervision of the insurance commissioner. State v. Towle, 80 Me. 287, 14 Atl. 195.

Distinguished from sanitation contracts.—The business of inspecting and certifying as to the sanitary condition of buildings and premises is not an insurance business. People v. Rosedale, 142 N. Y. 126, 36 N. E. 806 [reversing 5 Misc. 378, 25 N. Y. Suppl. 769].

Distinguished from statutory protective societies.—An association contracting with its members for a stipulated annual payment to repair bicycles in case of accident and to replace those destroyed or stolen, but not agreeing to pay any money in the event of injury, loss, or destruction, is not an insurance company but is within the statutory provisions as to societies for protective purposes. Com. v. Provident Bicycle Assoc., 178 Pa. St. 636, 36 Atl. 197, 36 L. R. A. 589.

Distinguished from guaranty.—A contract by a lightning-rod dealer to pay damages resulting to a building on which a rod is erected within the given time, resulting from lightning, is a contract of guaranty and not a contract of insurance. Cole v. Haven, (Iowa 1880) 7 N. W. 383. So a stipulation by contractors to indemnify the owner of property for damages to others resulting from the performance of work on such property is not a contract of insurance. perils specified to certain things which may be exposed to them;[3] a contract whereby one party undertakes to indemnify or guarantee[4] the other against loss by certain specified risks;[5] an act or system of insuring or assuring against loss; specifically, the system by or under which indemnity or pecuniary payment is guaranteed by one party or several parties to another party, in certain contingencies, upon specified terms.[6]

B. Insurance Companies. An insurance company is a corporation or association whose business is to make contracts of insurance.[7]

C. Insured. An insured is the person indemnified by a contract of insurance.[8]

D. Insurer. This term means the underwriter or insurance company with whom a contract of insurance is made.[9]

A "contract of insurance" is defined as an agreement by which one party, for a consideration, which is usually paid in money, either in one sum or at different times during the continuance of the risk, promises to make a certain payment of money upon the destruction or injury of something in which the other party has an interest. Insurance "is a purely business adventure, in which one, for a stipulated consideration or premium per cent, engages to make up, wholly or in part, or in a certain agreed amount, any specific loss which another may sustain, and it may apply to loss of property, to personal injury, or to the loss of life. To grant indemnity or security against loss, for a consideration . . . is . . . the dominant and characteristic feature of the contract of insurance." Com. v. Equitable Beneficial Assoc., 137 Pa. II. KINDS OF INSURANCE.

The circumstances or contingencies under which loss, damage, or liability may arise being practically unlimited, the kinds of insurance in vogue are numerous.[10] The following nomenclature includes many of the common forms of insurance: Accident insurance,[11] benefit insurance,[12] benevolent insurance,[13] boiler insurance,[14] casualty insurance,[15] credit insurance,[16] cyclone insurance,[17] employers' liability insurance,[18] endowment insurance,[19] fidelity insurance,[20] fire insurance,[21] guaranty insurance,[22] hail insurance,[23] life insurance,[24] lightning insurance,[25] live-stock insurance,[26] Lloyds' insurance,[27] marine insurance,[28] passenger insurance,[29] plate-glass insurance,[30] rent insurance,[31] theft or burglary insurance,[32] and title insurance.[33]

III. REGULATION AND CONTROL OF THE BUSINESS.[34]

A. In General— 1. Restrictions to Corporations.[35] The legislature may, if it sees fit, restrict the right to carry on the insurance business to corporations, and deny it to individuals or unincorporated associations;[36] but in the absence of a statute requiring incorporation, citizens of the state acting as individuals or associations may conduct insurance business in the state without being incorporated, and a like privilege inures under the constitution of the United States to citizens of other states.[37] A statute regulating the business of insurance applies to individuals and associations as well as to corporations.[38]

2. As Interstate Commerce. The claim has sometimes been made that so far as the business of insurance involves contracts between a corporation authorized to do business in one state and the insured in another state it is interstate commerce, and therefore subject to federal regulation and free from regulation by the states; but the decisions of the supreme court of the United States have been against this claim.[39]

3. Power to Compel Adoption of Level Rate. The legislature has no power to compel the adoption of a level rate or compel a company to abandon the terms on which it is willing to underwrite risks in certain sections. A discrimination in insurance rates for different geological sections of the state, established by the underwriters' association, is not contrary to law.[40]

B. Statutory Regulation of Corporations — 1. To What Applicable. General statutory provisions regulating the insurance business are applicable to all companies, associations, partnerships, or individuals engaging in the business;[41] but the statutes are frequently so drawn as not to apply to unincorporated associations or assessment companies which are governed by provisions applicable to them alone.[42]

2. Regulation of Contracts, Policies, or Business — a. Power.[43] It is within the power of the state to regulate the terms of the contract of insurance. The subject-matter being a franchise the state may prescribe the condition on which it shall be granted.[44] So the extent of the risk assumed in any one contract may

b. Effect Upon Contract. Executory contracts of insurance made in violation of statutory regulations, or by companies not authorized to transact business, are invalid.[46]

3. STATE SUPERVISION — a. License by Superintendent or Commissioner. The superintendent or commissioner of insurance provided for by statute may be given extensive authority in investigating the affairs and management of companies or associations,[47] and he may be authorized to refuse a certificate to a company or association which has not complied with the requirements of law, or revoke such certificate if the business is conducted in violation of the law.[48] By statute the proceedings against an insurance company for failure or refusal to comply with the statutory regulations may be limited to an action by the attorney-general and such action cannot be brought by any other person.[49]

b. Deposit of Bonds or Securities — (i) IN GENERAL. Companies may be required to give bond for payment of losses,[50] or to have a paid-up capital of not less than a specified sum invested in such securities as the statute may require,[51]

tions imposed by statute are complied with, the foreign company is entitled to a license to do business and may enforce the issuance of such license by the state officers as a right,[94] unless as is the case in some jurisdictions the state officer is given a discretion in the issuance of a certificate, in which case his action cannot be controlled.[95] The license when issued authorizes the company to do only such business in the state as it is authorized to do under the statute.[96] The state only may contest the right of a company to have a license.[97] And no one can question the right of a company to do business without a license, unless he shows special damage.[98]

b. Revocation. By statutes in the several states authority has been conferred upon some state officer to revoke the license of a foreign insurance company authorizing it to transact business in the state, and the right to revoke includes the right to refuse to issue or renew the license.[99] An officer may refuse to issue or revoke such licenses for any cause prescribed by statute, such as a refusal to pay taxes,[1] or fees,[2] and even for the non-payment of fees for past years, the collection of which are barred by limitations,[3] or for the violation of an agreement not to remove a case from a state to a federal court, made as a condition precedent to doing business in the state,[4] or for violation of a statute prohibiting combinations between insurance companies.[5] While the officer in refusing to issue or in revoking a license acts ministerially, and not judicially,[6] and ordinarily the exercise of the discretion vested in him will not be reviewed,[7] he cannot exercise such authority except for causes specifically prescribed by the statute. Hence in the absence of statutory authority he cannot revoke a license for refusal to pay a loss which is contested in good faith,[8] for failure to pay a judgment from which an appeal has been taken,[9] for failing to use the prescribed form of policy,[10] for the issuance of a class of insurance authorized by the laws of the home state and not expressly prohibited by the local law,[11] or for becoming a member of an illegal combination.[12] But if the company is doing business in a manner prohibited by statute, a revocation of its license on that account will not be relieved against, although the revocation is made without statutory authority.[13]

acted as agent for an insurance company,[37] and the name of the person from whom an application was solicited or obtained.[38] Where the statute forbids an insurer to discriminate between insurants of the same class, and requires the terms of insurance to be set out in the policy, an indictment charging the granting of a rebate must aver that it was not stipulated for in the policy.[39]

b. Who Are Deemed Agents Within Prohibition. The provision as to acting as agent without compliance with the statutory requirements is usually applicable to the soliciting as well as the issuance of policies of insurance,[40] and a stipulation by the company that the person thus soliciting insurance shall be deemed the agent of the insured cannot affect his liability to the statutory penalty.[41] Indeed under some statutes it is immaterial whether or not the person prosecuted for soliciting insurance or engaged in the transaction of the business is an agent.[42] To adjust a loss within the state does not constitute the offense of acting as agent without complying with statutory requirements.[43] But an agent designated as an inspector, who after inspection of the property forwards applications to a foreign company, is acting as an agent.[44] So an agent in another state addressing communications to residents of the state, with reference to effecting insurance, is doing business within the state in violation of the statute.[45] And it has been held that to notify a foreign company of facts which constitute insurance within the state is the effecting of insurance within the state under a statutory prohibition.[46]

The executing and filing of the articles do not complete the incorporation, but it is essential that the required stock has been subscribed and paid in, and the directors chosen. But the fact that a subscriber has not paid for his stock in cash, but by transfer of securities, does not

pany has complied with the conditions of the statute relative to its organization, an examination under state authority may be provided for.[49]

2. ARTICLES AND BY-LAWS. The charter of a company may be modified under legislative authority, and its business subsequent to such modification, if authorized, is to be conducted according to the modified charter.[50] So the directors may be authorized to establish by-laws, and such authority may be exercised under statutory provisions, although not given in the articles of incorporation.[51]

3. STOCK SUBSCRIPTIONS AND NOTES. The capital stock of an insurance company is not the primary fund for the payment of losses accruing upon property insured, and is only to be resorted to when the premiums received and the other income of the company are found to be insufficient.[52] But the capital stock and the notes representing subscriptions to such stock constitute a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, and the subscribers to the stock cannot be relieved from their liability by the action of the company's officers in fraud of the interest of such creditors.[53] Where the secretary, acting as trustee for the company, although in his own name, subscribed for stock after the requisite amount of stock required by the statute had been subscribed, and his act was subsequently recognized and ratified by the company as done for it, it was held that his estate could not be held individually liable on his subscription.[54]

4. LIABILITY OF STOCK-HOLDERS. Where by statute stock-holders in insurance companies are made individually liable beyond the amount of their stock subscriptions, the claims of policy-holders as well as other creditors are debts toward the payment of which the stock-holders may be required to contribute under such statutory liability.[55] Such liability does not arise on contract but by way of statutory penalty.[56] But the action to enforce such liability may be brought in the name of the creditor.[57] There may also be an individual liability of stockholders for debts of the company contracted before it is authorized to transact business.[58]

5. DEPOSIT AND INVESTMENT OF FUNDS — a. General Funds. For the purpose of protecting policy-holders it is usual for the state to specifically provide how the funds of insurance companies shall be invested.[59] And after completion of organization and the making of the required investment or deposit of funds, a company may lawfully transact business.[60] Such investment is not engaging in the banking business.[61] Without regard to statutory provisions as to the method in which funds may be invested, the corporation has the implied power to collect debts due it by purchasing bills of exchange or other obligations,[62] and it may thus for the purpose of securing payment of a doubtful debt subscribe for stock in a bank, although such subscription is not under the conditions authorized by statute as to investment of funds.[63] It cannot, however, buy up the notes of one who has insured, for the purpose of using them as a set-off against liability on the policy.[64]

b. Special Funds. An insurance company, although not required by statute to make a deposit as security for payment of policies, may make such deposit with a state officer and it becomes a trust fund not subject to the claims of general creditors until the policy-holders have been satisfied.[65] So by contract with a class of policy-holders, a portion of the premiums paid on their policies may be set aside in trust for the payment of losses under such policies.[66] Where the obligation of the company is to create a reserve fund, surplus assets which are to be considered as part of such reserve fund are capital and not income.[67]

Investment in stock of other corporations. — The directors of a company having power to invest its funds in the stock of other corporations may exercise such power to the extent of acquiring a controlling interest in such a corporation, if the act is in good faith as an investment of funds and not as a scheme to pervert the funds of the company to an unauthorized purpose; but the statutory provisions as to investments in corporate stocks and securities usually limit such investments to stocks in companies which are already incorporated and established, and do not authorize the subscription to stock in a company which is being formed. the security of policy-holders, which shall not be liable to seizure for the benefit of general creditors,[68] and such guaranty will remain valid, although the company changes its manner of doing business and decreases the cash assets.[69] A bond given by the company to indemnify policy-holders, although made payable to the state, may be sued on by the beneficiary of a policy covered by such bond.[70]

6. Powers — a. Contracts of Insurance. The capacity of the company to make contracts of insurance depends upon the scope of power which it has under its charter and legislation regulating its business, and it cannot transact any other kind of insurance business or take any other kind of risks than that authorized.[71] Under a charter for transacting the insurance business in one locality, a company cannot be established for the transaction of business in another locality.[72] But the company is not to be presumed to be limited in its powers of contracting to the state within which it is organized.[73]

b. Other Contracts. As to other contracts than those strictly of insurance the company has only such powers as are expressly or impliedly given to it. Thus in the absence of express power it cannot loan or borrow money or discount notes;[74] but in the general conduct of its authorized business and as incident thereto, it may take, hold, and transfer negotiable paper.[75] It cannot engage in the banking business,[76] nor conduct the business of a building and loan association,[77] nor purchase shares in another corporation,[78] nor engage in

Limitations of rule.— It may acquire shares in another corporation, although the investment is not such as is authorized with reference to investment of funds, if the acquisition of such shares is incident to the general transaction of its business for the pur-

the business of conveyancing. Such an act is an usurpation on the commonwealth.[79]

7. Officers and Directors — a. Powers. Notwithstanding specific provisions in the articles or by-laws of the company as to how contracts of insurance can be made, it has been held that an officer, such as a secretary or manager, may bind the company by an oral agreement with reference to insurance.[80] He does not, however, bind the company nor himself by an attempt to contract insurance which is clearly outside of his authority as manager.[81] Nor does he render the company liable by acting as agent of an applicant to secure insurance in another company.[82] So a secretary procuring policies from other companies covering a part of a risk has no power to guarantee the solvency of such other companies.[83] The directors have the general authority to determine the liability of the company and obligate it to pay the amount thus determined, but such power is in the nature of a personal trust which cannot be delegated.[84]

b. Liability of Officers to Company. Directors or other officers may render themselves liable to the company in violating their duty to it in the management of its business.[85]

c. Liability to Third Persons. The officers or directors of a company may become personally liable to persons who are injured by reason of their fraudulent acts in representing the company to be solvent or entitled to do business, such representations being made with knowledge of their falsity.[86] Officers may also be subjected to a statutory penalty for their unlawful acts.[87] And by the terms of the contract the directors may be rendered personally liable to the insured.[88]

8. Dividends; Distribution of Profits, or Surplus[89] — a. In General. Under the general rule applicable to all corporations that dividends to stock-holders cannot be declared out of the capital stock but only out of the profits or surplus, an insurance corporation cannot treat premiums received on unexpired risks or unearned premiums as profits or surplus subject to distribution, there being no independent fund aside from the capital stock out of which the liability of such policies may be met.[90] If by the charter or articles of the company, or by the terms of the policies issued, the company is to distribute profits by way of dividends to policy-holders, the discretion as to declaring such a dividend or the method in which it shall be applied rests with the company, and the policy-holder's right to a dividend cannot be asserted by an action in the courts.[91] The right to participate in a dividend cannot be limited to holders of policies which shall be continued in force by the payment of a future premium.[92] And where a dividend is declared on certain classes of policies, the officers or directors cannot afterward deprive the policy-holder of his right thereto.[93] An unpaid assessment on stock may be offset as against the right to a dividend.[94]

b. Endowment and Tontine Policies. It may be provided that dividends shall be declared after maturity of policies in which a period is fixed, at the end of which distribution of profits by way of dividends shall be made. Under such contracts the policy-holder is entitled to participate in profits realized by way of dividends apportioned to them by the officers or directors; but they have no right of action at law for their respective shares, being dependent upon the declaration of dividends made in pursuance of the plan fixed by the contract.[95]

Operation of tontine plan.— The tontine plan contemplates a participation by the holders of policies remaining in force after a stated period, of the profits accruing from the lapse of policies of the same class, and in case of maturity of a policy by the death of the insured within the tontine period the beneficiary is entitled only to the insurance provided for by the policy and not to the participation in the profits. 9. Reorganization, Consolidation, and Transfer of Business. In the absence of express authority an insurance company cannot transfer its business, policy-holders, and assets to another company;[96] nor may a company without express authority take over or amalgamate with another.[97] When a transfer is illegally attempted a policy-holder may enjoin the act.[98] But after transfer a policy-holder cannot sue the retiring company on his policy for breach of the contract of insurance.[99] Where authority exists to take over another company it must be exercised in strict conformity with the law conferring it; otherwise the transfer is void and no right or liability accrues thereunder.[1] A lawful transfer of its business and assets by one company to another operates to bind policy-holders to the transferee company in the same manner as they were bound to the transferrer.[2] If the policy-holders, after notice of the transfer, acquiesce therein they cannot afterward look to the original company for payment of their policies but must rely upon the new company.[3] However, assent or acquiescence will not be presumed from the payment of premiums to,[4] or the taking of receipts therefor from, the new company,[5] even after receipt of an ambiguous circular giving notice of the transfer.[6] Nor will acceptance of annuities from the transferee operate to make a novation of the contract.[7] Where the policy-holder expressly refuses his assent he may still hold the company insuring him for the value of his policy.[8]

Where the statute provides for the sanction of a court to be given to the transfer after notice to the policy-holders, such sanction will not be given until the notices are actually issued, although the policy-holders may consent thereto.[9] But such notices may be issued after filing the petition and before the hearing thereof,[10] and the court's sanction may be given, notwithstanding less than one tenth of the policy-holders could not have received the notices in time to give their consent or express their dissent on the hearing.[11] If the transferee company guarantees the performance of the contracts of the transferrer company the latter is entitled to look to the aggregate assets of both companies in the hands of the former for the satisfaction of demands against it, although the transfer may have been ultra vires;[12] and if its contract was guaranteed by a third party, the guaranty may be enforced against him.[13] In the absence of fraud a transfer by one company to another of a part of its policy-holders, and a corresponding portion of its assets, will not be avoided at the instance of the receiver of the transferrer company.[14]

10. Insolvency and Dissolution — a. Determination of Question of Solvency. Solvency of an insurance company means that its assets shall at least equal its liabilities, whether matured or not;[15] and the rule for determining its solvency is generally fixed by statute.[16] In determining the solvency of a company, it is improper to consider its unavailable or uncollected assets or dues,[17] or its good-will,[18] or securities or property purchased but not paid for.[19]

b. Effect of Insolvency in General. The insolvency of an insurance company constitutes a breach of contract on its part,[20] and on dissolution of the company claims of policy-holders are debts due in præsenti.[21] On a decree dissolving the company and appointing a receiver to wind up its affairs, the policies of the company are canceled and losses thereafter accruing are not recoverable;[22] but it has been held that the cancellation of policies does not result from an

do business,[34] or is fraudulently conducting its business.[35] Statutes which provide for the dissolution of insurance companies under the circumstances named are not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of contracts,[36] or as depriving the company of its property without due process of law;[37] and where it applies to all insurance companies, it is not invalid as class legislation.[38]

(II) Proceedings to Compel Dissolution. The statutory mode for the dissolution of an insurance company is exclusive, and must be pursued;[39] and when it confers upon a state officer the right to institute the proceedings a stockholder cannot take such action.[40] The legislature has the right to alter the remedy for the dissolution of insolvent insurance companies;[41] and where several modes are provided by different statutes, the officer may pursue any one of them.[42] Where a state officer is authorized to file a bill to enjoin the transaction of any future business, and to dissolve the company, he may file a cross bill for such purposes to a suit by the company seeking to enjoin him from declaring it not legally engaged in business.[43] The offer of an insurance company to reinsure its policy-holders is no defense to a suit to declare it insolvent and have it dissolved.[44] And an attempt by the directors of an insolvent insurance company to transfer its business and assets is void and will not prevent proceedings for dissolution.[45] Suits pending against a company are not affected by proceedings for its dissolution;[46] and a judgment obtained within the time allowed for the winding up of its business after dissolution is valid.[47]

d. Appointment of Receiver.[48] When the company becomes insolvent the stock-holders are usually entitled to have a receiver appointed to wind up its affairs,[49] and policy-holders may enforce the termination of their contracts and the payment of the present value of their policies.[50] Statutory provisions for dissolution of the company and discontinuing business when its capital or funds are impaired do not authorize the appointment of a receiver unless there is a condition of insolvency.[51]

e. Powers of Receiver.[52] The receiver when appointed represents primarily the corporation, although he is the trustee for the policy-holders, and he may maintain an action against the directors to make good losses caused by their misconduct, although the policy-holder could have proceeded under such circumstances only in equity.[53] He is clothed with power to prosecute and defend suits for the company.[54] And may be authorized to compromise doubtful claims either in favor of or against the company.[55] He may claim possession of funds deposited with a public officer for the protection of policy-holders only so far as such funds are not necessary for that purpose.[56] But the court appointing a receiver acquires the right to distribute the securities of the company in payment of its debts, and that power does not remain with the state officer with whom the securities have been deposited.[57]

f. Proceedings by Receiver; Levy of Assessments. The proceedings of the receiver should be governed in general by the rules applicable to other receiverships in the case of insolvency.[58] Policy-holders may be allowed to appear and be made parties.[59] Creditors will be bound by the orders of the court in relation to the receiver's duties in winding up the company's affairs.[60] The receiver has authority to sue for assessments or premium notes.[61] It is not necessary to first determine the claims against the company and pass upon their validity before ordering an assessment.[62] The validity and amount of the assessment as fixed by the court in the proceeding in which the receiver is appointed cannot be questioned in the action on the assessment.[63]

g. Presentation and Payment of Claims and Distribution of Funds. When an insurance company has been dissolved and its assets have been placed in the hands of a receiver, creditors cannot maintain suits against it or its receiver; they must submit their claim to the tribunal charged with the distribution of its assets;[64] and where the evidence is conflicting, its decision, in the absence of error of law, is conclusive.[65] The value of the policy-holder's claim is to be determined by the mortality tables in general use,[66] and the state of his health is not to be considered.[67] He may demand the sum necessary to purchase a new similar policy in a solvent company at the same premium,[68] or the court may order the receiver to reinsure the policy-holder in another company;[69] and in so doing will prefer a domestic to a foreign company, even against the petition of the policy-holders.[70] Claims are payable only from the particular fund credited with the premiums paid by the policy-holders.[71] If no special funds are kept, all policies, whether mutual or stock, are payable ratably from the general assets.[72] When a company is dissolved, stipulations in its policies as to the time in which proofs of loss must be filed or suits brought are no longer of binding force.[73] But claims not presented within the time prescribed in a notice published by the receiver in accordance with statutory requirements are precluded from sharing in the assets,[74] and the receiver cannot enlarge the time fixed by the court for the filing of claims.[75] However, a claim for taxes due the state may be filed and enforced after the expiration of the time specified in the notice.[76]

h. Priority. In the absence of statute providing otherwise[77] claims of beneficiaries under policies which have matured prior to insolvency and dissolution have no preference over the claims of holders of unmatured policies.[78] When the corporation is dissolved all the policy-holders are creditors of the company, and are therefore entitled to share ratably in the assets of the company with those whose claims have matured.[79] Where a special fund is provided for the payment of losses, policy-holders have a priority over general creditors.[80] So far as the claims of policy-holders are not satisfied out of such fund, they become general creditors in regard to the assets of the company.[81] Under a statute providing that clerks, etc., are preferred creditors in the distribution of the property and estate of an insolvent corporation, the wages of clerks of an insolvent insurance company are a prior lien only on the general assets, and not on a special trust fund created for the benefit of the policy-holders.[82]

i. Rights of Set-Off. An accrued claim for a loss may be set off by the beneficiaries against a debt due from the assured to the company.[83] And a policy-holder who is entitled to reimbursement on the insolvency of the company may set off the equitable value of his policy as against the liability on a mortgage given to the company.[84] The receiver may offset amounts due upon notes given by policy-holders against the value of the policies and pay a dividend on the balance only.[85] Where a foreign insurance company makes an assignment in another state, such assignment having no extraterritorial effect, its agents in the state may take assignments of the claims of the policy-holders for unearned premiums, and set them off against their own liabilities to the company.[86] actions by policy-holders may be allowed and paid out of the receivership funds,[87] but the receivership is not chargeable with attorney's fees in a separate proceeding by a state officer to wind up the company.[88] A receiver appointed in a proceeding by a state officer to wind up the company is entitled to compensation out of the funds deposited with the state.[89]

B. Mutual Companies — 1. Nature. Mutual insurance companies are usually organized to insure their members on the assessment plan and without capital. The security of those having insurance in a mutual company is provided for by requiring that before engaging in business it have a certain number of members who have paid cash premiums or given premium notes, constituting a common fund out of which the member is entitled to indemnity in case of loss.[90] Such a company does not have stock-holders, but the term "stock-holder" may, under statutory provisions, be applicable as referring to a member of such company.[91] The form of the certificate does not determine whether or not the company is of the character described by the statute as a mutual company.[92] An association may be a mutual company within statutory provisions, although it is benevolent and not speculative in its purposes.[93] While a stock company is not usually permitted to do business on the assessment plan, yet a company organized under the laws of one state permitted to transact business both as a stock company and on the assessment plan, may be permitted in another state which prohibits the same company transacting business in both methods, to carry on the business on the assessment plan.[94] General statutory provisions as to insurance, such as a valued policy law, may be applicable to mutual companies.[95]

2. Authority to Do Business. Until the company has complied with the statutory requirements so as to be authorized to do business it cannot make valid and binding contracts.[96] But before full compliance with the requirement as to the Kaw Life Assoc. v. Lemke, 40 Kan. 661, 20 Pac. 512.

Filing copy of statement.— Under a statute requiring a coöperative company organized to do business in one county to extend its business into other counties by filing with the clerk of such county a duly certified copy of the statement filed by it in the office of the amount of insurance to be subscribed, the company may issue certificates and receive cash premiums or premium notes, its engagements being regarded as in nature preliminary to its complete organization, and these engagements will be binding when its organization is completed.[97] A member cannot question the regularity of the organization of the company.[98] The fact that the company has used a premium note of an applicant for membership as a part of the fund to secure the certificate of the state auditor will not estop the company from resisting liability for the loss on the part of such member, which has occurred before it has received its certificate.[99]

3. Articles, By-Laws, and Regulations — a. With Respect to Powers. By the statutes or by provisions in the articles the board of directors or members of mutual companies are usually given authority to make by-laws which constitute rules and regulations as to the method of transacting the business of the company, and such by-laws are binding upon the members within the scope of the authority given by such statutes and articles to make by-laws.[1] So far as the company is concerned, however, the provisions of its by-laws may be waived.[2]

b. As Constituting Part of the Contract of Insurance. The members of the company being bound by the provisions of its by-laws, such by-laws enter into and form a part of the contract of insurance as between the member and the company, whether formally incorporated into the contract of insurance or not, and knowledge on the part of the members of the provisions of such by-laws is presumed.[3] The fact that some of the by-laws are incorporated into the policy will not justify secretary of state, the company does not become authorized to do business in such other county by filing a copy of such statement which does not contain the by-laws of the company which are required to be embodied in the statement filed in the state office. ber until he has received his policy.[10] If the company is authorized to do business both on a cash and an assessment basis one who insures on a cash basis is not a member but simply an insured.[11] So contributors to a guaranty fund for the payment of losses are not members.[12] Membership may continue during the entire term of the policy of insurance, although the property insured has been destroyed before the term expires.[13] It terminates on the termination of the insurance and the payment of liabilities incurred under the contract of insurance.[14] Until the conditions on which withdrawals are permitted have been complied with the member continues to be liable as such.[15]

b. Eligibility to Membership. Non-residents may be excluded from membership,[16] and conditions of membership may be imposed excluding those not belonging to a particular class or description of persons.[17] One mutual company cannot become a member in another company, such assumption of authority being ultra vires.[18] But a corporation may be insured in a mutual company, although its charter indicates that natural persons only may become members.[19]

c. Rights and Liabilities Incident to Membership.[20] A member of a mutual company is at the same time insurer and insured. His rights as insured are determined by his contract, but his rights and liabilities as member are defined by the contract, the statutes relating to such corporations, and the by-laws of the company.[21] He impliedly consents that the company shall be represented by such officers and agents as shall be duly elected, and that they shall possess the powers and perform the duties ordinarily possessed and performed by such officers and agents, and he cannot question their acts done within the scope of their authority,[22] and he cannot set up, as against the company, illegal acts of the com-

The annual meeting of the members of a mutual insurance company has no authority to pass upon claims for losses, where the charter provides that the business and affairs of the company shall be under the control of

pany itself, as he is a party to such illegal acts by reason of his membership.[23] A mutual company is not a partnership so as to render the members liable for the debts of the company as partners,[24] and the liability of the member exists under his contract for membership only, so that only those obligations which attach during his membership can be enforced against him.[25]

5. Officers — a. Eligibility For Office and Election. Officers may be required to be members of the association.[26] Under a statutory provision that trustees or directors cannot at the same time be officers of the association receiving a salary, trustees are not disqualified because they acted as agents in effecting insurance.[27] In reviewing the validity of an election of directors, at which cash-paying policy-holders were not allowed to vote, a court may properly order a new election so that the votes may be counted on the proper basis.[28]

b. Powers of Officers and Directors. In general the powers of officers are as fixed by the articles and by-laws,[29] and they can exercise no powers except those so conferred.[30] The powers conferred upon the directors cannot be delegated, in the absence of authority for such delegation,[31] and in general their powers are limited by the statutes regulating the business of such companies.[32] But the presumption will be, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that a by-law or resolution giving authority to the directors was lawfully adopted.[33]

c. Liability of Officers and Directors. Officers or directors who divert the funds of the association are usually liable to the holders of claims which should have been paid out of such funds.[34] So officers or directors may become person-

6. Powers of the Company — a. In General. A company may exercise the powers given to it by statute, and those which may have been added under provisions for reincorporation or extension of charter.[38] It may divide its business into distinct classes and make the risks of each class primarily liable for losses occurring therein.[39] But if necessary the premium notes of one class may be assessed to meet losses occurring in another.[40] It may transfer notes received by it for premiums,[41] unless this will impair the trust fund of which they form a part,[42] and may borrow money to pay losses and give notes therefor.[43] A mutual company may, if authorized by statute, change to the stock plan.[44]

b. To Make Contracts of Insurance — (i) In General. A mutual company can enter into a valid contract of insurance as against such casualties as it is authorized to insure against by its charter, or articles, or the statutes under which it is created, but against no others.[45] By statute the authority of the company to

(II) To Issue Policies For Cash Premiums. In the absence of statutory prohibition a mutual insurance company may issue policies for cash premiums, which under its by-laws form a part of its general fund from which all losses are to be paid.[58] But the company cannot provide that on the payment of such cash premium the policy-holders shall be exempted from assessment to pay losses occurring during the period for which it was paid;[59] and the continued liability to assessment, under the statute, will operate to make valid a stock policy issued for such cash premium.[60] The cash premiums, like the assessments, must be applied to losses occurring during the period for which they are paid.[61] A mutual company may be expressly authorized by statute to issue policies for cash premiums to persons other than members,[62] and authority to issue such policies for cash premiums does not preclude the right to take notes for such premiums.[63]

c. To Provide a Guaranty Fund. A mutual fire-insurance company cannot as incident to the exercise of its general powers and functions create or provide a capital or guaranty fund, unless authority is specially given by its charter or a statute.[64] A mutual company may, however, be authorized by statute to receive guaranty notes constituting a fund to secure payment to its creditors,[65] or the company may be authorized to receive notes to constitute a fund which shall be the release the maker of such note from his liability.[74] Makers of guaranty notes are liable for the full amount thereof, standing as general creditors of the company after such payments.[75]

7. Profits, Dividends, and Special Funds. The accumulated profits of a mutual company may be distributed among those who are members when such distribution is ordered,[76] and an accumulated surplus may thus be distributed by way of dividends.[77] A provision made by statute or contract for distribution of surplus among policy-holders by way of dividends does not necessitate such distribution of the entire surplus.[78] Until the time for distribution under the terms of the contract has arrived, the policy-holder has no right to require an accounting in regard to the surplus fund.[79] In the distribution of a reserve fund those who are policy-holders at the time of distribution will participate,[80] and representatives of deceased members whose certificates have not been paid in full out of the mortuary fund will also participate to the extent of their unpaid claims, but will have no priority.[81] Funds held for beneficiaries cannot be used to pay expenses;[82] but in the absence of some special provision to that effect the funds of one department are not reserved for the benefit of a particular department, but go for the benefit of any claim against the association.[83] And an action in equity may be maintained by policy-holders to restrain the officers from appropriating funds to the benefit of one claim which belongs to all.[84]

in the new company,[85] and a member of the old company becomes a member of the new only on his assent to membership in the new company.[86] In the absence of statutory authority, a mutual company cannot, however, sell and transfer its business to another company.[87] But it may change the nature of its business within the scope of its charter.[88] A mutual company may, under statutory authority, be changed into a joint stock company.[89]

9. Insolvency and Dissolution[90] — a. What Constitutes Insolvency. A mutual company is insolvent when its resources, including capital stock notes subject to assessment, are not sufficient to meet its obligations.[91] It cannot, however, be said to be insolvent, or to act in contemplation of insolvency, merely because the sums insured greatly exceed its capital; nor when its assets are more than sufficient to meet all losses of which the company has any notice, information, or suspicion.[92]

b. Voluntary Liquidation. Provisions may be made by which a company may close up its business on payment of its debts, and reinsuring its risks;[93] and it may, under general statutory provisions, make an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, and the assignee may sue to recover any debts to the company,[94] but the assignee is not vested with the judicial power to make assessments.[95]

c. Grounds and Proceedings For Dissolution. Insolvency is a ground for dissolution.[96] So the misapplication of the funds of the company[97] or mismanagement of the business[98] are sufficient grounds for winding up a company. In the absence of some other method provided by statute, the members may institute proceedings to have an insolvent company wound up.[99] But provisions are usually made by which some public officer, such as the attorney-general or the insurance commissioner, is required to institute proceedings for the winding up of a mutual company which has become insolvent, or otherwise has forfeited its right to exercise its corporate franchise.[1] The suit need not be in the nature of a criminal proceeding nor quo warranto, but may be a special civil proceeding.[2] Personal notice to the members is not necessary, nor need they be made parties.[3] The statute may make the proceeding by the public officer exclusive of any proceeding by members.[4]

rule is not changed even though by the terms of the policy the company is required to give notice to the insured in case it desires to cancel the policy.[7] Holders of policies on which premiums have been paid for a term extending beyond the insolvency have valid claims against the company for unearned premiums.[8] A statute making the officers personally liable on policies issued by them when they knew the company to be insolvent does not render a policy issued under such condition void; the policy is binding on the company with the individual liability of the directors superadded.[9] The right of holders of unmatured policies is to share in the assets after payment of debts, while the holders of matured policies are regarded as creditors.[10]

e. Liability of Members on Insolvency and Dissolution. On the other hand the insolvency of the company does not terminate the obligation of policy-holders to contribute to the payment of losses which have occurred prior to insolvency,[11] and those giving premium notes are also liable to assessment for the payment of unearned premiums on business done under the cash plan.[12] Assessments cannot be collected from holders of policies which are issued in violation of law.[13] And they can only be made on existing members, that is, members whose policies are still in force at the time of insolvency. Assessments cannot be made on persons who having had policies in the company have surrendered and canceled them;[14]

basis of the assessment is at least prima facie sufficient to support the order for an assessment including such claim.[23] All the members are not necessary parties to a proceeding to make an assessment upon them.[24] Notice of the proceeding to levy an assessment should be given, if required by statute.[25] It has been held, however, that statutory notice of such proceeding is not a condition precedent to the recovery of an assessment from a member.[26] The order authorizing an assessment must be strictly followed by the receiver.[27]

(III) Amount of Assessment and Conclusiveness of Order. While the members are liable on their own premium notes only for their respective share of the losses or damages sustained by members,[28] yet, to the extent of the liability of the company for such losses and damages, they may be assessed to satisfy the company's entire indebtedness.[29] The receiver may include in the amount for which assessments should be made all just and equitable claims against the company,[30] and the assessment may be large enough to cover probable deficiencies due to uncollectable assessments.[31] The assessment may be made large enough to cover the expenses of collection, and winding up of the affairs of the company.[32] The action of the court in ordering the receiver to make an assessment is not in itself a determination of the amounts for which assessments shall be made, or the ratio of the assessments.[33] But the determination by the court of the amount of indebtedness and the rate of assessment is conclusive on the members, and not subject to collateral attack.[34] While the decree is conclusive as to the validity

by the directors which has proved inadequate, the court will not make a second assessment unless such action would be equitable under the circumstances. Merrill v. Colony Mut. Ins. Co., 169 Mass. 408, 48 N. E. 279.

and amount of the assessment, it does not preclude a policy-holder from defending on any ground peculiar to himself;[35] and a grossly excessive assessment may be corrected on appeal, if it appears that the discretion of the court has been improvidently exercised.[36] When money is paid under an assessment, it will be deemed voluntary and cannot be recovered back, although the assessment is void.[37]

(IV) Action to Recover Assessments. In a proceeding by the receiver to enforce payment of assessments made, the essential facts, such as the indebtedness of the company, the appointment of a receiver, the levy of the assessment, and notice to the member of the amount thereof should be alleged.[38] It must also be shown that the losses included in the assessment occurred during the time that the member's policy was in force,[39] and that either the court or the receiver under its authority has examined and determined the validity of the claims for which assessments have been made.[40] If the receiver has acted under authority of the court, determining the facts necessary to authorize the assessment, these facts may be put in issue in an action on the assessment.[41] Defendant cannot, as a defense to an action by the receiver for an assessment on his note, set up the fact that before the commencement of the action, but after the dissolution of the company, the claim against him has been attached in another state by a creditor of the company.[42]

V. AGENTS AND BROKERS.[59]

A. Definition of Terms. An insurance agent is one employed by an insurance company to solicit risks and effect insurance.[60] An insurance broker is one who acts as a middleman between the insured and the insurer; one who solicits contracts from the public under no employment from any special company; but having secured an order places the insurance with the company selected by the insured, or in the absence of any selection by him, then with the company selected by such broker.[61] An insurance broker is ordinarily the agent of the person seeking insurance.[62]

B. Agency For Company[63] — 1. APPOINTMENT OR EMPLOYMENT. A person may become authorized to bind the company as its agent not only by formal appointment as such agent, but also by being authorized by implication to act on behalf of the company in relation to its business; and in general persons who with the knowledge and assent of the company act for it in soliciting or procuring or contracting for insurance are held to be agents without formal appointment.[64] The authority of the agent is often sufficiently indicated by the general course of business in which he acts for the company, such course of business being known to the company and not objected to.[65] So one who acts with authority for the company in one particular instance is an agent of the company as to that transaction by whose acts it is bound.[66]

2. EVIDENCE AS TO AGENCY.[67] Agency may be established by evidence that the person alleged to be agent was intrusted with blank policies ready for execution and delivery, or other blanks suitable for the use of an agent,[68] or that the company has acted upon applications forwarded or information given by such person;[69] by evidence of a course of dealing known to and approved by the company;[70] or by evidence that the company has recognized such person as its agent in other transactions.[71] So the fact that one who claims to represent the company answers a letter addressed by the insured to the company is some evidence of his agency;[72] and mere representations of one claiming to act as agent that he is authorized to so act do not constitute any evidence of his agency.[73] Acts and declarations of the agent in the particular transaction are not admissible to prove his agency.[74] But testimony of the agent himself as to his authority is admissible.[75]

3. CONTINUANCE AND TERMINATION OF AUTHORITY. The authority of the agent to bind the company by his acts and contracts may in general be terminated as any other agency.[76] But termination of authority to make further contracts of insurance does not necessarily terminate the authority of the agent to represent the company with reference to existing insurance. Such agent may bind the company by his acts until notice of the revocation of his authority is brought home to the insured.[77] But a local custom permitting agents after the termination of their agency to cancel policies and transfer their insurance to other companies is in contravention of the principles governing the relation of principal and agent and is of no effect as conferring authority upon such agent.[78]

4. Scope of Authority[79] — a. General Agents — (I) Who Are. Agents authorized to accept risks and issue policies by filling out blank instruments which are placed in their hands for that purpose and to renew policies already issued are general agents of the company.[80]

(II) Power to Bind Company — (A) In General. The company is bound by the acts, representations, and knowledge of its general agent within the scope of his agency.[81]

Restrictions inserted in a policy of insurance upon the power of the agent to waive any conditions, except in a particular manner, as by indorsing the waiver on the policy, do contract.[86] So the limitations in the policy on the authority of the agent may be shown to have been waived by the company.[87]

b. Agents For Specified Territory. As to the authority of an agent acting within the general limits of his agency it is immaterial that he is described as a local agent and his authority is limited to particular territory.[88] While the authority of an agent may be limited to specified territory it is a question of fact whether his action in accepting risks was within the scope of his territory as reasonably understood by the insured.[89] Acts of agents outside of the scope of their territory may be ratified by acquiescence in general or by issuing a policy with knowledge of the fact.[90]

c. Soliciting Agents. There may be agents who have authority only to solicit insurance and submit applications to the company and who have not the authority to bind the company by any attempted acts or contracts in its behalf, not relating to the taking of the application.[91] The company is not bound by fraudulent representations of a soliciting agent as to the value of a policy, such agent having no authority with reference to procuring surrender of policies;[92] nor will the company be bound by the acts of such agent in taking and negotiating a note payable to himself individually for a policy.[93]

d. Subagents and Clerks.[94] A general agent, the exercise of whose power involves discretion, cannot delegate his authority to a subagent, unless so authorized by the company, and in the absence of such authorization the acts of such subagent or notice to him are not binding on the company.[95] But a general man-tion purporting to be taken by a person acting as its agent the company estops itself from denying such agency.[16] Where the company retains the premium it is chargeable with any fraud or mistake of its agent in the making of the contract regardless of the knowledge of such fraud, as it is bound by his wrongful acts within the scope of his authority.[17] The company may estop itself by ratifying an unauthorized course of conduct on the part of its agent from afterward objecting in a particular case that an act of the agent in accordance with such course of conduct is not binding upon it.[18] But proof of custom alone, without knowledge on the part of the company, is not sufficient.[19]

21. See cases cited infra, this note.

Insurance of agent's property or property in which he has interest.— According to well recognized principles of agency an agent cannot act for himself as insured and for the company as insurer at the same time, and a policy issued by an agent for the company on his own property is invalid. Spare v. Home Mut. Ins. Co., 19 Fed. 14, 9 Sawy. 148; White v. Lancashire Ins. Co., 27 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 61. Authority to an agent to issue policies on his own property does not amount to a ratification of policies thus issued which are antedated so as to cover a loss which had already occurred before the authority was given. Glens Falls Ins. Co. v. Hopkins, 16 Ill. App. 220. And likewise a policy is invalid which is secured by an agent on property in which he has an interest under an application forwarded by him without the company being advised as to his relations to the property. Ritt v. Washington M. & F. Ins. Co., 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 353; Bentley v. Columbia Ins. Co., 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 595. In such case the insurance is not avoided on account of materiality of the agent's relations to the risk but because such a contract is against public policy. Ritt v. Washington M. & F. Ins. Co., 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 353. But by failing to disaffirm with knowledge of the facts the company ratifies such contract and is bound by it.

Cancellation of policies.— Where an agent learning that his authority was about to be revoked canceled policies which he had already issued on behalf of the company which he then represented, such act not being on the request of either the company or the assured nor for the interests of the company, it was held that he was bound to account to the company for the premiums. German-American Ins. Co. v. Tribble, 86 Mo. App. 546; Northern Assur. Co. v. Hamilton, 50 Nebr. 248, 69 N. W. 781. But after the relations of the agent with the company have terminated he may acquire by assignment claims for unearned premiums arising from the cancellation at his instigation of policies which he as agent has issued. Scottish Union, etc., Ins. Co. v. Dangaix, 103 Ala. 388,

(II) Acting Also For Insured.[22] The rule that one cannot be the agent at the same time of both parties to a transaction renders invalid any agreement on behalf of the company by an agent who is at the same time acting as agent for the insured,[23] unless the relation of the agent to the insured is known to the company.[24] It is held, however, that the mere fact that the agent through whom the insurance is procured has previously been the agent of the insured for some other purpose with relation to the property does not make void the insurance.[25]

b. Rights of Agent Under Contract of Agency.[26] If the contract of employment is for an indefinite period, it is terminable at will;[27] and the right to terminate it is not affected by the agent's right to commissions on renewal premium;[28] nor by the fact that he has given notes payable out of the proceeds of the agency;[29] nor by stipulation in the contract that the agency may be terminated for specified causes, none of which occur.[30] It is not absolutely necessary for the contract to expressly name a definite period for its continuation, but a fixed time may be implied.[31] But for the wrongful termination of an agency, before the expiration thereof under the contract, the company is liable in damages.[32] So the company is liable for the breach of a contract by which it obligates itself not to raise the rates during the agent's employment. And he is entitled to recover what he would have earned at the old rates.[33] But where it issues several classes of insurance, it does not violate an agency contract by insisting on giving preference to a particular class.[34] The company is liable for a 15 So. 956. It has been held, however, that where during the agency the agent had collected premiums deducting therefrom thirty per cent as compensation, and after termination of the agency induced the policy-holders to surrender such policies to the company and take policies in other companies represented by him it was held that the company could recover from the agent thirty per cent of the return premiums which it was compelled to pay on such cancellation. refusal to comply with its contract to surrender its local business and agencies to the agent on the dissolution of the company and termination of the agency.[35] A contract to appoint a person as agent for certain territory whenever the company is authorized to do business therein is not necessarily broken by mere delay in procuring such authority.[36] The established business of an insurance agent has a well recognized value, and is the subject of sale,[37] the benefits to the purchaser may be defeated by the company's refusal to appoint him as its agent;[38] and if, after purchase made, on the faith of representations of the general agent, he is denied the agency and the right to resell, the general agent, but not the company, is liable to him for the losses sustained.[39]

c. Liability of Agent to Company — (I) In General. Where the agent agrees to devote his entire time and energy to the company's business, he is bound to devote his time and energy with that degree of diligence and attention usual among industrious business men engaged in like business and pursuing no other avocation.[40]

(II) Duty to Account For Funds. The agent is bound to account to the company for funds such as premiums collected by him.[41] No demand for money collected by the agent and due to the company is necessary where the contract of agency requires an immediate payment of money coming into the agent's hands.[42] A settlement will not be conclusive as to items of money received by the agent and not reported by him prior to such settlement.[43]

(III) To Respond in Damages For Breach of Duty. The agent must respond in damages for any breach of duty arising out of his relations as agent which has resulted in injury to the company.[44] Thus if the agent violates

Co. v. Tribble, 86 Mo. App. 546. However, after his authority as agent has been terminated he cannot cancel policies and pay rebates on the premiums so as to be entitled to set off the amounts so paid. Liable for acts of subagents.— The agent will be liable for breach of duty on the part of subagents acting for him, although their instructions as to the class of risks which he is to insure and thereby renders the company liable for a loss on a risk which would not have been accepted had the instructions been observed, the agent will be liable to the company for the amount of loss which it has been compelled to pay on account of such risk.[45] And if the agent fails to charge the amount of premium which he is required by his instructions to collect on such risks he will be liable not only for the amount of loss but for the amount of premium which he should have collected in excess of the premium collected and accounted for.[46] So if the agent is directed by the company to cancel a policy and neglects to do so, and there has been a loss, he is liable to the company for the amount which the company has had to pay on such loss,[47] notwithstanding contributory negligence of the company in failing to cancel the policy itself.[48] Nevertheless unless the agent is chargeable with some duty as to cancellation of policies he is not liable to the company for failure to cancel.[49] And where he was directed to cancel a policy, but as the result of correspondence was led to believe that the company had become satisfied with the risk, and loss afterward occurred he is not liable for failure to cancel.[50] The agent may be liable for failure to comply with the direction of his company to reduce the amount of insurance under a policy, and such liability will be for the difference between what the company has been compelled to pay and what it would have had to pay had the policy been reduced as directed.[51] Where he is under no contractual restraint, and no violation of business secrets reposed in him by reason of his agency is involved, he has the right, after the termination of such agency, to influence policy-holders of his former company to forfeit or transfer their poli-

d. Liability on Agent's Bond. Under a bond given to the company for the faithful discharge of his duties by the agent the sureties on the bond are not only liable for moneys received by the agent for which it is his duty to account,[53] but also for damages resulting from his negligent failure to cancel a policy as directed.[54] The liability of the surety will be determined in general by the contract of suretyship, taking into account also the contract of agency as brought home to the surety.[55] An action on a bond given to the directors of the company may be brought in the name of the company.[56]

e. Compensation — (I) Of Agents — (A) In General. An agent whose application is rejected is not entitled to commissions on a policy afterward issued on an application procured from the same person by another agent;[57] nor can he claim commissions on an increase, procured by another agent, in the application filed by him,[58]

52. American Ins. Co. v. France, 111 Ill. App. 382. But in such a case he may be liable to the company for his commissions retained out of premiums collected which the company is compelled to return to the insured on account of such cancellation. The bond covers money for which the agent becomes liable to account during the period of the bond, although the business may have been previously transacted (British American Assur. Co. v. Neil, 76 Iowa 645, 41 N. W. 382); but not a liability of the agent already existing prior to the execution of the bond (Byington v. Sherman, 64 Ark. 189, 41 S. W. 423; Ball v. Watertown F. Ins. Co., 44 Mich. 137, 6 N. W. 232).

If the agent is liable under his contract for moneys received by subagents the sureties on his bond are likewise liable therefor (Phœnix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Holloway, 51 Conn. 310, 50 Am. Rep. 21; Foster v. Franklin L. Ins. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 91); and the fact that the general agent appointing a subagent is liable for the default of the subagent does not relieve the liability of the sureties on the subagent's bond (Foster v. Franklin L. Ins. Co., (Tex. Civ. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 91); but notice to a state agent by a subagent of the termination of the contract of the latter is sufficient notice to the company to terminate the liability of the sureties on the subagent's bond (Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 105 Mich. 353, 63 N. W. 438); if the company appoints a cashier who is not accountable to the agent, the sureties on the agent's bond are not responsible for the default of such cashier (Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Coats, 44 Mich. 260, 6 N. W. 648).

Acts in violation of law.— The surety on the bond will not be liable with reference to the acts of the agent which are a violation of law or outside of the scope of the agent's authority, but the territorial limitations within which the agent is authorized to act will not be controlling as to the liability for moneys actually received. Fidelity, etc., Co. v. Brown, 69 Kan. 550, 77 Pac. 111; Norwich Union F. Ins. Assoc. v. Buchalter, 102 Mo. App. 332, 76 S. W. 484.

Advancements.—Under a contract of agency providing for advancements to the agent of money to be used in promoting the interests of the company it was held that the agent not being personally liable for the money so advanced, the sureties on his bond were not liable for his failure to repay such advancements. North Western Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Mooney, 108 N. Y. 118, 15 N. E. 303. And in an action for commissions received and not accounted for to the satisfaction of the company it was held that since the commissions claimed could not be regarded as advancements or payments to the agent the sureties were not chargeable. Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Lowenberg, 4 N. Y. St. 699.

Want of authority to issue policy.— It is no defense to an action on the bond that the company had no authority to issue the policy for which moneys sued for were collected. Rockford Ins. Co. v. Rogers, 9 Colo. App. 121, 47 Pac. 848.

especially where the custom is to pay the commissions to the agent procuring the accepted application.[59] So where his commissions are payable on the net balance in a certain department, carried over on a specified day after payment of all losses and expenses, he is not entitled to commissions on accounts unsettled on the date named.[60] But an agent cannot be deprived of commissions by an arbitrary rejection of applications submitted through him,[61] nor by the company's wrongfully refusing to deliver policies for which notes were given;[62] nor by its failure to deliver policies because of the refusal of the persons insured to pay a rate largely in excess of that at which the agent was expressly authorized to take the application;[63] nor by its wrongfully recalling a policy sent the insured by mail which was not promptly delivered;[64] nor by its recovering a policy from the insured on the faith of a promise to issue another of a different class, which was not done;[65] nor by its negligent failure to collect notes given for premiums, which it requires to be sent to it;[66] nor by claiming that the risk was undesirable, or that the applicant has failed to procure insurance in another company.[67] If the company surrenders a premium note and repurchases the policy, the agent is entitled to commission, although the insured was insolvent, and the note uncollectable.[68] But where the agent's right to commission depends upon the validity of the policy, a compromise of a claim based on the policy will not constitute such recognition of its validity as will entitle him to commissions.[69] If the agent has the right of election between two means or sources of compensation, and no time is fixed for the exercise thereof, he may make his election after the dissolution of the company and the appointment of a receiver.[70]

(B) Commissions on Canceled Policies. The rights of an agent to compensation as to canceled policies must be determined according to the contract, express or implied, under which he is employed,[71] and it may be competent to show the course of dealing between him and the company in order to fix his compensation.[72] He is generally entitled to commissions on the whole premium paid, and cannot be limited to the portion earned up to the time of cancellation.[73] But where, after termination of the contract, he induces the insured to surrender the policy and take the unearned premium, he should refund the commissions received by him on such part of the premium.[74] He cannot retain from the company's funds the sum paid out by him under verbal guaranty made to the insured in refunding unearned premium, such guaranty being void under the statute of frauds.[75] Nor can he recover unearned premiums paid by him to policy-holders whom he induces to return their policies in violation of the company's instruction; and for premiums repaid on policies voluntarily returned, he is entitled to recover only the portion of the original premium remaining after the deduction of the short-rate premium.[76]

(c) Commissions on Renewal Premiums. In the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, an agent is not entitled to commissions on renewal premiums paid after the termination of the agency,[77] and the forfeiture of his right thereto is not affected by stipulating in the contract specific grounds of forfeiture, none of which occurred.[78] But where the contract provides that an agent shall receive commissions on renewal premiums, he is entitled thereto, although the renewal was procured at the instance of another agent;[79] and the company cannot deprive him thereof by inducing policy-holders to change their policies,[80] or to transfer them to another company,[81] or by causing policies to lapse.[82] His right to such commissions is not lost by termination of the contract on notice in pursuance to the stipulations thereof,[83] nor by his withdrawal from the service of the company with its consent;[84] but it is lost by his unconditional resignation.[85] In an action for breach of contract to pay commission on renewal, the agent may recover, as on an indivisible contract, the full value of his commissions, to be estimated by the actuary tables in general use, and by which the value of policies is determined.[86]

(d) Commissions on Business Done by Subagents. If he is entitled to commissions on the business done by his subagents, and subagents in the territory at the time of his appointment are made his agents by the company, he is entitled to commissions on the business done by them.[87]

(e) Right as Affected by Modification of Contract. Where a contract is modified by a reduction of commissions, the conditions of the original contract attaches to the commissions payable under the modification.[88] And if the time for the payment of commissions on renewal be modified by a circular from the company, and the agent acts thereunder, he cannot claim commissions beyond the period limited therein.[89]

aggravated; ordinary or slight misconduct will not work a forfeiture.[90] If the company, with knowledge of the facts, acquiesces in the breach of duty, it is liable for commissions on renewals.[91] But gross misconduct or infidelity will justify a termination of the agency and a forfeiture of the right of the agent to claim commissions or compensation,[92] and on the termination of the agency the agent or his assignee may recover only commissions on premiums collected up to the happening of the breach for which the contract was terminated, less any sums owing by the agent to the company.[93]

(G) Right as Affected by Agreement For Division of Commissions. In order to bind a general agent to observe an agreement between local agents for a division of commissions, the rule requiring the agreement to be in writing and filed with the application must be strictly observed.[94] Such agreement, to which the company is not a party, will not prevent an agent from recovering against it his full commissions.[95] And where a company has notice that its agent reserves certain commissions on taking another into partnership with him, it is liable to him for such commissions subsequently accruing.[96]

(H) Actions to Recover Compensation. In an action to recover compensation, the complaint is not subject to demurrer for failing to allege that defendant, a foreign insurance company, has complied with the provisions of the local insurance law.[97] Nor is such complaint, based on an express contract, subject to general demurrer for praying for an assessment of damages on a quantum meruit.[98] If the company approves of a sale by its general agent of an interest in his business, and afterward directs a dissolution of the partnership, it is a proper party to a suit for an accounting brought by the retiring partner.[99] Where the written contract does not specify the compensation, the agreement therefor may be shown by parol.[1] But if the contract is express as to the compensation, it cannot be varied by proof of custom,[2] or of a contemporaneous verbal agreement.[3] In an action for commissions on renewal premiums the burden is on the company to show that the premiums had not been paid as presumption is against lapses and cancellation,[4] and the agent may show that the company negligently failed to collect notes given therefor or to allow him to do so. This evidence should not be excluded as varying the terms of a written contract.[5]

(II) Of Subagents. The general agent having power to appoint subagents, in the absence of express prohibition, has authority to fix their compensation and bind the company;[6] and where the general agent, by the charter of the company, has the management of state agencies, the appointment of agents, and the direction of their work, he may bind the company by contract with a subagent, although he may exceed powers given him by private contract with the company, not brought to the notice of the subagent.[7] But an inspector or superintendent of agencies will not be presumed to have the authority to appoint and make a contract with subagents on behalf of the company.[8] Where the subagent is chargeable with notice of the terms of the contract between the company and the general agent, he is bound thereby;[9] and if the contract between a general and a special agent expressly denies the latter all right to make any claim thereunder against the company, it is not liable for any breach thereof.[10]

f. Lien of Agent or Broker. As a general rule an insurance broker has a lien on all policies in his hands, procured by him for his principals, for the payment of the sums due to him for commissions, disbursements, advances, and services, in and about the same,[11] even when he knows that the person employing him is only the agent of the owner,[12] and his subagent is invested with the same right.[13] If the broker is not informed that the person employing him is not the owner, he has a lien on the policies for any balance of an insurance account between him and such person.[14] But where he knows his employer is merely agent of another, he has no such lien.[15] Neither of them have any lien for the payment of the balance of a general account, embracing items wholly disconnected from the agency.[16] However, the lien is not destroyed by merely intermixing charges in respect to the insurance, with other items of a distinct nature in a general account.[17] But whenever the credits on such account, not appropriated by either party to the payment of any specific items, balance or exceed all items in the account down to and including those growing out of the agency, charges on account thereof will be considered paid, and the lien lost.[18] And in such event, the insured may recover from the subagent any money received by him on account of the policy.[19] The broker's lien is lost by parting with the possession of the policy;[20] and if he has paid the premium, he cannot be subro-gated to the right of the underwriter to deduct it from the sum due for a loss occurring under the policy.[21] The lien is revived by the policy coming again into the broker's hands, from the person against whom the lien originally attached,[22] unless the manner of his parting with it manifested an intention to abandon the lien,[23] or it is received from one not his employer, or not known to him as the assured at the time of effecting the insurance.[24] In case of the revival of the lien, an intermediate assignee will be held to have taken the policy subject thereto.[25] If there is no lien when the insurance is effected, no subsequent transaction between the broker and the agent who employed him can create it as against the owner.[26] The insurance broker who receives premiums and pays losses, taking the policies as vouchers for such payments, has a lien on the policies and abandonments in his hands, for a general balance against the underwriter.[27]

C. Agency For Insured — 1. When Deemed Agent For Insured — a. In General. A person appointed or employed by an insurance company to solicit applications to it for insurance is its agent;[28] and so is an insurance broker employed to act in its behalf.[29] The rule applies to mutual as well as stock companies.[30] Such person does not become the agent of the insured where, as the representative of several companies, he is authorized to place the insurance in one or more of them, as he may elect.[31] Nor by being the rental agent of the insured, in charge of the property on which the policy is issued.[32] On the other hand if the insured employs another to procure insurance for him, such person is his agent, and not that of the insurer.[33] The business of insurance broker or agent involving the procuring of insurance for persons who desire to have it procured for them from insurance companies or their agents and in which the broker or agent represents the applicant for insurance and not the company is well recognized and acts or knowledge of such broker or agent will be binding on or imputed to the insured and not to the company.[34] And payment of the broker's commission by the agent of the company out of his commission on the premium does not make the broker the agent of the company.[35]

b. Dual Agency. A contract of insurance procured by an agent acting in his own interest without the knowledge of the company,[36] or acting in the interest of one whom he in fact represents, without the knowledge of the company which regards him as its own agent acting in its interest, may be avoided; for the policy of the law is against a person acting as agent for both the parties to a contract.[37] But the fact that the agent of the company is an employee of the insured as to matters having no relation to the insurance of the property does not give rise to a dual agency such as to invalidate the transaction.[38] But the same person may act for different purposes as agent of the different parties to the contract so that for one purpose he may be the agent for the insured, although as to the procuring of the insurance he also represents the company.[39] So it has been held that where an agent represents several companies and is authorized by the insured to place with other companies insurance which he does not procure in his own company, there is not such dual agency as to invalidate insurance which he does place in his own companies.[40]

c. Provisions in Policy. The company cannot, by stipulation in its policies that the persons who procure them shall be deemed to be the agents of the insured for whose acts and knowledge the company shall not be responsible, convert those whom they recognize as their agents acting for them into agents of the insured.[41] But such a stipulation is operative where the person who procures the insurance in fact acts for the insured,[42] and will be construed as referring to one who could be the agent of the applicant and not to one who is in fact the agent of the company. Such stipulation in the policy will not be binding on an applicant for insurance who has no knowledge thereof.[43]

d. Statutory Provisions. For the purpose of preventing companies from stipulating that acts of persons who solicit or contract for insurance shall be regarded as acting for the insured and not for the company and thus avoiding any contention that the acts and knowledge of such persons are not to be imputed to the company, it is usually provided by statute that such persons are to be deemed the agents of the company. Under such a provision any person who acts with reference to the procuring of insurance is an agent of the company in which the insurance is procured, although he is not otherwise recognized as its agent.[44] Under such a statute one who acts in aid of the company's adjuster in an examination as to the loss is the agent of the company.[45] But such a statute does not preclude a solicitor for the company from acting as agent of the insured in some particulars.[46]

2. Scope of Authority — a. To Make and Modify Contracts. The insured is bound by the acts of his agent authorized to contract for insurance in accepting delivery of a policy,[47] and by representations made by the agent in procuring such policy.[48] So the insured is bound by knowledge coming to his agent in the course of his employment or by notice given to him.[49] But a broker authorized only to procure a specific policy does not bind the insured by accepting a policy differing from that which he is specially authorized to procure;[50] and the authority of the broker with reference to the insurance which he is specifically authorized to procure terminates with the completion of the contract.[51] If the insured leaves his policy with the broker for the purpose of having a change made therein the broker has authority to consent to the change in the contract by the company.[52]

b. To Cancel and Renew Policies. A special agent authorized only to procure specific policies of insurance has no authority to cancel such policies and notice to him of cancellation thereof provided for in the contract will not be binding on the insured.[53] So it seems that an agent with general authority to insure cannot cancel a policy procured by him with the effect of leaving his client without insurance,[54] but a general agent with authority to insure property and to keep it insured may accept notice of cancellation and procure substituted insurance or renewal of insurance in another company.[55] It has also been held that a course of dealing between the insured and the broker may be shown for the purpose of establishing authority on the part of the broker to cancel or renew policies.[56]

Applications of rule.— Where the policy was delivered to a broker upon condition that it should not take effect until approved at the home office of the company it was held that the broker continued to be the agent of the insured until the policy had been acted upon and that notice to the broker of its rejection was notice to the insured. There is no presumption that an agent employed to procure a policy has authority after delivery to receive notice of cancellation or to surrender or discharge the policy.[57]

c. Ratification. The action of a broker or agent for the insured in contracting with reference to insurance may be ratified by the insured so that he shall be bound thereby.[58] But knowledge is essential to constitute a valid ratification.[59]

3. Relation Between Insured and Agent — a. Liability of Agent — (i) Of Company. As between the insured and the agent of the company there is in general no relation which imposes any obligation upon the agent to the insured, the remedy of the insured being against the company for which the agent acts.[60] But there may be such false and fraudulent representations on the part of the company's agent relied upon as made on his own responsibility as to render him liable to the insured for damages resulting.[61] In such an action the company may be made a party defendant.[62]

(ii) Of Insured. As between the insured and his own agent or broker authorized by him to procure insurance there is the usual obligation on the part of the latter to carry out the instructions given him and faithfully discharge the trust imposed in him, and he may become liable in damages for breach of duty. If he is instructed to procure specific insurance and fails to do so he is liable to his principal for the damage suffered by reason of the want of such insurance;[63]

and a general undertaking to keep the property of the principal insured will render the agent liable for negligence in not securing or renewing insurance on the property.[64] In either case the liability of the agent with respect to a loss is that which would have fallen upon the company had the insurance been effected as contemplated;[65] any negligence or wrongful act of the agent defeating in whole or in part the insurance which he is directed to secure or maintain will render him liable to his principal for the resulting loss,[66] and such agent is also liable if he places the insurance in companies not authorized by law to do business in the state, the policies being void on that account.[67]

b. Compensation; Lien. The insured dealing with the agent of the company is not liable to the agent for his services in making out the policy.[68] But an insurance broker may recover from the insured commissions and expenses for procuring the insurance.[69] The insured is also liable to the broker for premiums advanced in procuring the insurance,[70] or the broker has a lien on all policies in his hands for commissions and other charges in connection with such insurance;[71] but not

A distinction is often taken between "insurgent" and "rebel," in this: that the former term is not necessarily to be taken in a bad sense, inasmuch as an insurrection, though extralegal, may be just and timely in itself; as where it is undertaken for the overthrow of tyranny or the reform of gross abuses. According to Webster, an insurrection is an incipient or early stage of a rebellion. Black L. Dict.

I. WHAT CONSTITUTES.

In its broadest sense the term "insurrection" applies to a rising against governmental restraint; specifically it applies to an organized and armed resistance by numbers to the enforcement of the laws.[1] Hence any open and active opposition of a number of persons to the execution of the laws of the United States of so formidable a character as to defy for the time being the authority of the government constitutes an insurrection, even though not accompanied by bloodshed and not of sufficient magnitude to render success probable.[2]

II. CIVIL LIABILITY.

A. Status of Insurgents. In localities where the insurrectionary movement has become so formidable as to make it necessary to resort to armed force with a view to its suppression, all residents of the territory in insurrection become liable to be treated as enemies.[3]

B. Remedy For Injury. When the law charges municipalities or the state itself with the duty of protecting citizens against acts of unlawful violence, the remedy which the statute provides may be resorted to.[4]

Rebellion distinguished.—Insurrection closely resembles rebellion, of which in fact it is an incipient form, in that it is a movement directed against the existence of the government. It is distinguished from rebellion in that the movement is less extensive and its political or military organization is less highly developed. Prize Cases, 2 Black (U. S.) 635, 17 L. ed. 459; The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. 408; Lieber Instructions for Government of Armies of the United States in the Field (1863), par. 157. The recognition of the insurgents by foreign powers, or by the government against which the insurrectionary movement is directed, gives to the undertaking the legal and political character of a rebellion. Riot and rout distinguished.— Insurrection is distinguished from rout, riot, and offenses connected with mob violence by the fact that in insurrection there is an organized and armed uprising against authority or operations of government, while crimes growing out of mob violence, however serious they may be and however numerous the participants, are simply unlawful acts in disturbance of the peace which do not threaten the stability of the government or the existence of political society. L. 87. Riot defined see RIOT. Rout defined see ROUT.

Sedition distinguished.—Insurrection is distinguished from sedition, which is a form of discontent against government caused by inflammatory speeches or writings or by acts or language tending to a breach of public order, by the fact that such acts are offenses against the peace and fall short of treason on account of the absence of an overt act. Hardie Case, 1 St. Tr. N. S. 751; Abbott L. Dict.; Anderson L. Dict.; Century Dict. See also 1 Hale P. C. 77; 1 Hume 553; 33 St. Tr. O. S. 342, 394; Cockburn Exam. Trials For Sedition, 1, 3, 36. Sedition defined see SEDITION.

Insurgent defined.— One who in combination with others takes part in active and forcible opposition to the constitutional authorities, where there has been no recognition of belligerency, is an insurgent. Bouvier L. Dict.; Standard Dict.

III. SUPPRESSION BY CIVIL AUTHORITY.[5]

Insurrection being an offense highly prejudicial to the public peace, it may be suppressed by civil authority.[6]

INT. An abbreviation of the word "interest."[1] (See INTEREST.)

INTAKE. That which is taken in.[2]

INTANGIBLE. Incapable of being touched; not perceptible to the touch.[3]

INTEGRAL. Constituting a completed whole; containing all the parts.[4]

INTEGRITY. Freedom from every biasing or corrupt influence or motive.[5]

INTELLIGENCE. The quality of being intelligent; understanding; intellect; power of cognition.[6] (Intelligence: In General, see INSANE PERSONS. Of Juror, see JURIES. Of Witness, see WITNESSES. See also INTELLIGIBLE; INTELLIGIBLY.)

INTELLIGENCE OFFICE. An office for the obtaining of employment for female domestic servants or other laborers.[7] (Intelligence Office: Regulation and License of, see LICENSES; MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.)

INTELLIGIBLE. That can be understood; capable of being apprehended by the intellect or understanding; comprehensible.[8]

INTEMPERANCE. A term which does not necessarily imply drunkenness, but the use of anything beyond moderation.[9] (Intemperance: See INTOXICATION, and Cross-References Thereunder. See also, generally, DRUNKARDS.)

34. Bouvier L. Dict. [quoted in State v. Ah Mook, 12 Nev. 369, 381].

"Immediate intention" see Lynch v. State, 24 Tex. App. 350, 365, 6 S. W. 190, 5 Am. St. Rep. 888.

"'Intention of the Legislature' is a common but very slippery phrase, which, popularly understood, may signify anything from intention embodied in positive enactment to speculative opinion as to what the Legislature probably would have meant, although there has been an omission to enact it. In a Court of Law or Equity, what the Legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from that which it has chosen to enact, either in express words or by reasonable and necessary implication." Salomon v. Salomon, [1897] A. C. 22, 38, 66 L. J. Ch. 35, 75 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426, 4 Manson 89, 45 Wkly. Rep. 193.

As synonymous with "meant" see Studdard v. Linville, 10 N. C. 474, 477, where it is said that the difference between the two words "is scarcely perceptible."

37. Distinguished from "gross," "reckless," and "wanton" in Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Tartt, 64 Fed. 823, 826, 12 C. C. A. 618.

Distinguished from "with premeditated design" in State v. Hoyt, 13 Minn. 132.

38. Webster Int. Dict.

It implies the exercise of the reasoning faculties, consciousness, and violation. Berger v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co., 88 Fed. 241, 242.

When used in connection with the doing of a wrongful act, it means not only that the party intended to do the particular act, but to do it knowing at the time that it was wrongful. Ickenroth v. St. Louis Transit Co., 102 Mo. App. 597, 614, 77 S. W. 162. See also Trauerman v. Lippincott, 39 Mo. App. 478, 488 [citing Goetz v. Ambs, 27 Mo. 28].

"Every intentional act is necessarily a wilful one. The one implies the other." Com. v. Green, 1 Ashm. (Pa.) 289, 299.

"Intentional and premeditated design are very far apart." Cupps v. State, 120 Wis. 504, 542, 97 N. W. 210, 98 N. W. 546, 102 Am. St. Rep. 996.

B. Simple Interest. Simple interest is interest computed solely upon the principal.[2]

C. Compound Interest. Compound interest is interest upon interest;[3] where accrued interest is added to the principal sum and the whole treated as a new principal for the calculation of the interest for the next period.[4] It is to be observed, however, that there are two distinct methods of computing what is loosely termed compound interest. By the first method periodical rests are made and at each rest the principal and the accrued interest thereon is combined into a new principal which bears interest until the next rest and so on; this method results in giving interest not only upon the principal and upon the interest on the principal, but also in giving interest upon the interest on the interest and so on ad infinitum until payment, and this is what is meant by "compound interest" when the term is used in its strict sense. By the other method, the accrued interest is not combined with the principal but each instalment of interest on the principal becomes itself a new principal which bears simple interest, but no interest is allowed upon the interest on the interest;[5] and although this method is also sometimes called compound interest, it has been more correctly described as a middle course between simple and compound interest.[6]

D. Legal Interest.[7] Legal interest is that rate of interest prescribed by the law of the state or country which will prevail in the absence of any special agreement between the parties.[8]

See Vaughan v. Kennan, 38 Ark. 114, 117, where a note was given "with interest from date at the rate of 10% per annum" in which it was stipulated that "if interest be not paid annually to become principal and to bear same rate of interest"; and the court said "we think, therefore, that the note itself continued to bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. after maturity as before, and that the unpaid interest due at maturity became interest-bearing at the same rate, together with the successive annual installments of interest as the failure to pay them occurred on each anniversary of the maturity of the note; not, however, so as to compound the interest on the amounts in default, which should each bear interest alone at the contractual rate. It is only the interest on the principal which is to become principal. This is the course adopted by the court in North Carolina. Bledsoe v. Nixon, 69 N. C. 89, 12 Am. Rep. 642. Each unpaid sum of annual interest stands alone, as if a new note had been given for it, bearing like interest." See also Morgan v. Michigan Air-Line R. Co., 57 Mich. 430, 25 N. W. 161, 26 N. Difference in the two systems.— A simple mathematical calculation will show the difference in the result of the two systems. If the principal be one thousand dollars and the interest ten per cent, at the end of five years the amount due under the first system will be one thousand six hundred and ten dollars and fifty-one cents, while under the second system it will be only sixteen hundred dollars. And this difference becomes larger when a longer time elapses.

8. See Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 568; Black L. Dict. By the words "legal interest," found in a statute, is to be understood the rate per cent prescribed by law, in the absence of special agreement, at the date of the passage of the act. Beals v. Amador County, 35 Cal. 624.

Under the Spanish law such interest was known as judicial interest. Caisergues v. Dujarreau, 1 Mart. (La.) 7.

E. Lawful Interest. The term "lawful interest" as distinguished from "legal interest" means any rate of interest up to that fixed by statute as the maximum rate at which interest can be contracted for. Where, however, there is no express stipulation as to a named rate the term "lawful interest" is synonymous with legal interest.[9]

F. Conventional Interest. Conventional interest is that rate of interest agreed upon by the parties.[10] It may be greater or less than the legal rate, provided it does not exceed the highest rate which the laws of the state or country allow parties to contract for.[11]

II. ORIGIN AND HISTORY.

A. Origin. The custom of taking interest for the use of money is lost in antiquity. It was known from the earliest historical times, and under the name of "usury" is frequently mentioned in the Bible.[12]

B. History — 1. In Early Times. The taking of interest, or as it was then called, "usury,"[13] was looked upon in early times with great disfavor; and actually prohibited, not only by the Mosaic law among the Jews, but also under severe penalties by the old English laws.[14] The church uttered its anathema and the state leveled its forfeitures, against the taking of any interest, great or small.[15] But notwithstanding the denunciations and punishments to which it was subjected, it could not be suppressed,[16] and it was finally, in 1545, sanctioned in England by 37 Henry VIII, chapter 9.[17]

2. Growth and Development of the Law. From the enactment of this earliest English statute permitting the taking of interest, the prejudice against the custom gradually gave way before the assaults made upon it by additional statutes and the decisions of the courts; and the allowance of interest has now

The provision of the banking law of Michigan that banks shall not take or receive "more than the legal rate of interest in advance" refers to the rate permitted under agreement and not to the rate fixed where the contract is silent as to the rate. Cameron v. Merchants', etc., Bank, 37 Mich. 239.

9. Daniel v. Gibson, 72 Ga. 367, 369, 53 Am. Rep. 845, where it is said: "The words 'lawful interest,' in the Code mean interest at seven per cent, if the contract stipulates no other rate; but they mean the contract rate, if stipulated and within the lawful limit. In the case where no rate is agreed upon, seven per cent is the lawful interest meant by the Code; in cases where another rate is agreed upon by the contract sued on, the contract rate is the lawful interest in those cases, if not beyond the limit fixed by the statute of force when the contract was made."

Customary rate.— In Fowler v. Smith, 2 Cal. 568, 570, in defining the kinds of interest allowed by the Spanish law, the court defined conventional interest as the "rate general, and usual by custom, at a given time, in a given place; and which may be greater or less than legal interest."

Object of statute.— It may be questioned whether this statute was the result of more enlightened views as to the justice, honesty, or advantages of letting money at interest, or whether it was not rather the dictate of policy, that as the vice could not be suppressed it should be tolerated, but with many and severe restrictions. Adriance v. Brooks, 13 Tex. 279.

become quite general in all matters of contract and in many cases of tort.[18] This growth and development of the law concerning interest has been attended by many conflicts in the decisions of the courts; and it is difficult, and sometimes impossible, to reconcile them.[19] Among the earlier cases are found many that hold that interest should be allowed only where there is a contract to pay it, or where there is a contract to pay a certain sum of money on a day certain, as in cases of bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other mercantile securities.[20] This rule as to the allowance of interest was not limited to express contracts for payment, but extended to such contracts as might be implied from the usage of trade, the custom of dealing between the parties, or otherwise.[21] In many cases where such a contract for the payment of interest, or for the specific payment of money to which the implied contract might attach, could not be established, interest was refused,[22] but in other cases a more liberal doctrine was announced; and interest, as damages, was allowed from the time of default in paying over money due,[23] and in still other cases interest was permitted to be given in the discretion

Discrepancies explained.— "Perhaps the discrepancies of opinion on this subject [of what was the common law doctrine of interest] may be accounted for in this way. At an early period in England the chancellors were generally churchmen, and not lawyers. As the catholic church has always set its face against usury, and been disposed to condemn the practice of exacting interest as immoral . . . it is probable that the chancellors held all interest usurious and illegal; whilst the common law courts, presided over by lawyers, better acquainted with the commercial necessities of the country . . . may have held that reasonable interest was not unlawful." 3. Modern English Rule. St. 3 and 4 Wm. 4. Doctrine in the United States. b. In Equity. The courts of equity, in decreeing or refusing interest, generally follow the law;[31] but interest is sometimes allowed by courts of equity, in the exercise of a sound discretion, when it would not be recoverable at law.[32] On the other hand courts of law are sometimes affected by equitable considerations in the allowance of interest.[33] The English rule concerning the allowance of interest in equity seems to be not so broad as the rule in America at law.[34]

c. Interest as the Creature of Statute. It has frequently been said that interest is of purely statutory origin and not the creature of the common law; and interest has been refused except in such cases as come within the terms of the statute.[35] But contractual interest may be allowed of course, even though the

(II) Damages For Torts. Where damages are recovered for a tort, and interest is sought as an element of such damages, its recovery is governed by the law of the place where the tort was committed.[48]

(III) Sales and Consignments. Where a sale of property is made and there is no contract as to interest on the sum due from such sale, the general rule will prevail, and its allowance will be governed by the law of the place of performance.[49] Where property is consigned for the purpose of sale to a commission merchant or factor in another state, and advances are made by such commission merchant or factor upon such consignments, the allowance of interest, in an accounting between the parties, is governed by the law of the place to which the property is consigned.[50]

(IV) Merger of Foreign Contract Into Judgment. Whatever law may be applied in determining the rate of interest to be allowed on a debt prior to the recovery of judgment thereon, it is quite generally held that after the recovery of such judgment interest is to be allowed thereon according to the law of the place where the judgment was rendered.[51] But on the other hand there is authority for the view that where there is a stipulation for a certain rate of interest, which is lawful where the debt is contracted or payable, until the debt is paid, a judgment for the debt in another state should continue to bear interest at the contract rate.[52]

(V) Foreign Judgments. The allowance of interest upon judgments recovered in one jurisdiction and sued on in another jurisdiction has frequently been held to depend upon the law of the place where the original judgment was rendered;[53]

Presumption that common law prevails.— As a rule of law interest will not be allowed

but in many other cases it has been held that interest upon a foreign judgment is recoverable only as damages, not eo nomine, and the recovery will be controlled by the law of the place where suit on such judgment is brought,[54] even though such judgment in terms provides for a rate different from that authorized by the lex fori.[55]

3. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions — a. In General. A constitutional provision requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation applies to a statute respecting interest.[56] In England and in some of the United States the statutes prescribe the character of demands upon which interest is recoverable, but the statutes more generally merely fix a legal rate of interest and prohibit the taking of interest beyond a specified rate, without affirmatively declaring what character of demands shall draw interest.[57] The legislature has the power to impose on debtors the obligation of paying interest after the passage of the act on obligations already due, and such a statute is not objectionable as being retrospective.[58]

b. Construction and Operation. The ordinary rules governing the interpretation of statutes apply to legislative enactments concerning interest.[59] Interest statutes, being in derogation of the common law, must be strictly construed;[60] and the doctrine of expressio unius applies to restrict the operation of statutes regulating interest to the recited instances.[61] Statutory provisions respecting the on foreign judgments, the common-law doctrine that judgments do not bear interest being presumed to apply thereto. Harrison v. Harrison, 20 Ala. 629, 56 Am. Dec. 227; Thompson v. Monrow, 2 Cal. 99, 56 Am. Dec. 318. See Atkinson v. Braybrooke, 4 Campb. 380, 1 Stark. 219, 2 E. C. L. 89.

4. When Interest Accrues — a. In General. The general rule is that interest becomes due and payable at the same time that the principal becomes due and not before;[63] but this rule is subject to be varied by the contract of the parties, and interest may become due and payable at any time, irrespective of the maturity of the principal, according to the true intendment of the contract therefor.[64]

Where the contract provides for the payment of a certain rate of interest "per annum," it only fixes the rate to be paid and has no reference to the time when such interest shall be paid, and consequently interest so reserved becomes due and payable only with the principal;[65] but where the contract provides for the payment of "annual interest," interest must be paid annually, without reference to the date fixed for the payment of the principal.[66] Where the contract provides for the payment of interest periodically, but is silent as to such payments after the maturity of the principal debt, the interest will not thereafter accrue periodically;[67] but if the contract provides that interest shall be paid periodically after maturity of the principal debt, as well as before, such stipulation will control and the interest will be recoverable in accordance with its terms.[68]

b. Interest in Advance.[69] The payment of interest in advance may be provided for by contract between private parties, without rendering such contract subject to the usury laws.[70] It has been held that the mere fact that interest is paid in advance does not of itself establish an agreement to forbear the collection of the principal until the expiration of the time for which such interest is paid.[71]

But where interest has been paid in advance and the principal sum is subsequently paid prior to the expiration of the period for which interest has been paid, the unearned interest must be deducted from the principal.[72]

5. Apportionment of Interest. The general rule that sums of money payable periodically at fixed times are not apportionable during the intervening periods[73] has been held to apply in the absence of statute or express agreement to interest payable at stated times, on government, state, county, or municipal bonds, or bonds of a railroad or other public or quasi-public corporation, not issued separately for the payment of a specific debt but usually bought and held by way of investment, and in such cases the interest is not apportionable between the days of payment thereof.[74] But interest upon bonds and notes of individuals and private corporations, such as are usually given for money lent, whether or not secured by mortgage or pledge, is apportionable between the days upon which it is stipulated to be paid, being held to accrue de die in diem.[75]

6. Waiver or Estoppel[76] — a. In General. Where a person is barred from recovering the principal of a debt, he is equally barred from recovering interest thereon;[77] but the fact that a plaintiff recovers less than the amount for which he sued does not deprive him of the right to interest upon the amount recovered.[78] Interest may not only be waived or barred absolutely, but it may also be suspended during a particular period of time, and this waiver or suspension of interest may be affected either by act of the parties, which will estop them from claiming it,[79]

Subsequent demand.— Where a note was payable at a future date at a particular place, with interest from that date, if not punctually paid, and no demand for its payment was made on the date it was due, a demand subsequently made at the place of payment, after the note had matured, will not entitle the holder to interest. Glover v. Doty, 1 Rob. (La.) 130.

Interest on rent in arrear.— Interest will not be recoverable on rent in arrear where it appears that there were always effects on the premises liable to distress, sufficient to have satisfied the rent, although such rent was demanded by the landlord. Dow v. Adam, 5 Munf. (Va.) 21.

Delay in bringing to hearing suit seasonably begun.— A railroad company will not be relieved from liability to pay interest on the damages due to the owner of land appropriated by it for a right of way, because such owner delays the bringing to a hearing of a petition for damages seasonably filed. Drury v. Midland R. Co., 127 Mass. 571.

Interest on a verdict is to be regarded as compensation for delay in payment of the fact that the creditor awaits the decision of a test case, involving the same question of liability, will not effect a waiver of interest upon his claim,[83] although if the hearing and decision of the test case be itself unreasonably delayed, the creditor will not be protected in his own delay awaiting its conclusion.[84]

c. Compound Interest. Compound interest, or interest upon interest, is not favored by the courts, and it will not be allowed where the conduct of the party claiming it makes it inequitable that such claim should be enforced.[85] The acceptance of simple interest upon a debt will constitute a waiver of a claim for compound interest thereon.[86]

7. Payment Without Legal Liability. Where a debtor voluntarily pays interest on his debt, if such payment of interest be not unlawful he cannot recover such interest, even though the creditor could not have enforced such payment by action at law.[87]

B. Contracts For Interest — 1. Power to Contract — a. In General. Subject to statutory regulations, usually relating simply to the rate,[88] persons occupying or intending to assume the relation of debtor and creditor have at the present time full power to contract for the payment of interest upon the indebtedness,[89] and such contracts are governed by the same principles as other contracts with reference to the powers and capacities of the parties thereto.[90]

b. Compound Interest. Compound interest or interest upon interest is not favored either at law or in equity;[91] and while it is competent for parties to contract for the payment of such interest[92] this right is rather strictly limited. It is undisputed that after interest has accrued it is perfectly competent for the parties to the obligation to agree to add the accrued interest to the principal, thus making a new principal upon which interest is to be allowed.[93] So also if after interest has sum found due, and it will not be allowed on a merely formal verdict taken by consent, subject to the opinion of the court, where the delay in the submission of the case for final decision is due to the laches of the party claiming the interest. 85. See Wofford v. Wyly, 72 Ga. 863; Gray v. Bate, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 573, holding that where persons interested in an estate agreed to set apart a fund out of the residuum thereof, the interest of which was to be paid to one person until the death of his mother, and the undevised residuum was sufficient, after the payment of debts, to raise such fund, but it was not done, partly through the fault of the person entitled to the interest thereon, he might recover the unpaid interest but not interest on such interest.

pounded by virtue of any provision in the obligation on which the interest accrues.[98] The reason of this distinction is not, however, very obvious,[99] and there is considerable authority for the view that it is perfectly competent for the parties to agree at the time a loan is made or a debt contracted, that if interest be not paid at the time stipulated it shall be treated as principal and bear interest, and such agreement is valid.[1] In addition to this there are to be found in

Reason of the rule.— The principle of not giving effect to a stipulation for the compounding of future interest upon a debt does not arise from the usury laws. It is merely adopted as a rule of public policy to prevent an accumulation of compound interest in favor of negligent creditors who do not collect their interest when it becomes due; which negligence is found, in the end, to be an injury rather than a benefit to the debtor. Quackenbush v. Leonard, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 334. See also Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 162, 23 Am. Rep. 99.

The rule is not applicable to a case where one person advances money to purchase property for the benefit of himself and another, such advances to be refunded to him with compound interest out of the proceeds of the sale of the property, but he having no right to demand payment of either interest or principal until the same can be realized out of the proceeds of the land when sold. the reports a number of cases where contracts made in advance for compound interest or interest on interest have been construed and enforced without any question being raised as to their validity.[2] A distinction has also been drawn between law and equity, it being set forth that a promise to pay interest on interest is valid at law even though made at the time of the original contract, but that in equity an agreement made at the time of the original contract to pay interest on interest is discountenanced and will not be enforced.[3]

2. Express Contracts — a. General. Interest is created expressly when the parties to a contract agree in terms that interest shall be paid, which is usually done in written contracts by inserting therein the words, "bearing interest," "with interest," or some expression of like import; and such express contracts for interest have been universally upheld and enforced ever since interest has been recoverable under legal sanction.[4]

b. Consideration. A contract for the payment of interest, like other contracts, requires a valuable consideration to support it.[5] But the past use of money lent[6] or the forbearance to enforce the collection of the principal will support an agreement to pay interest.[7] An extension of the time of payment of a debt admitted to be due will support a promise to pay back interest on such debt,[8] even though the debt was originally non-interest bearing.[9]

c. Contracts in Writing. In the absence of statutory requirement,[10] it is not necessary that a contract for the payment of interest should be in writing, but it may be verbal.[11] But where a contract for the payment of interest is in writing, the general rule excluding parol evidence from being used for the purpose of varying the terms of a written contract[12] is applicable thereto,[13] although an oral agreement, made after the maturity of the debt, relating to a new engagement to pay interest[14] or to a change of rate or method of payment,[15] is valid and binding.

d. Construction and Operation — (I) In General. Contracts in writing for the payment of interest are governed by the same rules that apply to other written contracts, as to their construction and operation.[16] Thus the contract should be so construed as to give it some operation rather than none at all,[17] and the true intent of the parties, when it has been properly ascertained, will control.[18] If the terms of the contract render its meaning doubtful, it is to be construed most strongly against the party contracting to pay the interest.[19]

(II) Abbreviations and Omissions. Abbreviations used in a contract for the payment of interest are to be construed according to their usual and generally accepted meaning.[20] The omission of the word "interest" from a contract purporting to stipulate for the payment of interest is supplied by the law, where the intent is so disclosed by the contract,[21] and where the contract contains no stipulation as to the period to which the rate agreed upon shall apply, it is construed so as to make the interest computable per annum.[22]

3. Implied Contracts — a. In General. It has been held that an implied contract to pay interest arises when the parties make no express agreement therefor, but from the circumstances the law infers that they contracted with reference thereto, and interest may be recovered upon a contract thus implied as well as upon an express contract to pay it.[23] An agreement that a debt or obligation shall not bear interest may be implied as well as an agreement to pay interest.[24]

b. Breach of Contract to Pay Money. It has been held in a number of cases that where a definite contract exists for the payment of money at a fixed date, and there is a breach of such contract, the law raises an implied promise to pay interest on the sum due;[25] but the great majority of cases hold that upon a breach of a contract to pay money interest is allowed as damages and not by reason of any implied contract to pay it.[26]

C. Interest as Damages — 1. Breach of Contract to Pay Money — a. In General. Although in some cases of breach of contract to pay money interest has been allowed thereon on the ground of an implied contract to pay interest that arises from the failure to pay the principal,[41] the general rule established by the great weight of authority is that where there is a contract, express or implied, to pay money, even though such contract be silent as to interest, interest will be allowed upon its breach, as damages, and not because of any promise to pay it.[42]

Interest in such cases is merely the measure of the damages to be allowed,[43] and this measure is a fixed and invariable standard, not subject to be varied because of peculiar or unusual damages sustained in any particular case, as the law contemplates no damages for the detention of money beyond the interest on such money.[44] In some cases it has been held that, even where interest is provided for by contract, in case of breach of the contract to pay the principal sum when due, such interest is recoverable only as damages which have been liquidated by such agreement.[45]

b. Default. Before interest, as damages, will be allowed for the breach of a contract to pay money, there must in general be a default in the payment of the principal debt, but interest is usually allowed from the time of such default.[46]

Reason stated.— "This rule of allowing interest as damages originated in the desire of the courts to adhere to certain technical rules, and at the same time do justice to the parties. Interest could only be allowed on the ground of an express or an implied contract to pay it. In case therefore of an express written contract covering the subject-matter, but which was silent as to interest, the express contract could not be enlarged by adding a promise to pay interest, and there was no ground or right to imply such a promise. But as it was extremely unjust to allow the defendant to have the use of the money loaned without compensation, interest was allowed, in the nature of damages, for the detention of the money." Interest and damages distinguished.— Interest, being the creature of contract, is recoverable strictly as interest only during the continuation of the contract, and as provided by its terms, before breach, and not after. When the agreement is once violated, the promisee has sustained a wrong for which the law gives him redress by way of damages. And although in many cases the term "interest" has been used indiscriminately to designate the accession to the principal by the terms of the contract, and also the amount allowed in consequence of the breach of the contract, yet the distinction is perfect in law, and the synonymous use of the expression "interest" with the term "damages" has arisen from the fact that whenever the law regulates the amount of interest, that rate becomes the standard of damages on the breach of all money contracts; the result being the same, it is quite natural that the same name should frequently be employed in both cases. Obviously a party cannot be in default in the payment of a debt until the debt is ascertained in amount, or capable of ascertainment, and hence default, so as to render a party liable for interest, cannot occur unless the sum due is certain.[47] There must also be certainty as to the time of payment, before there can be a default in payment for which interest as damages will be allowed;[48] but the time of payment is sufficiently certain if it is capable of being fixed by implication or by the nature of the transaction.[49]

(II) Periodical Instalments of Interest. Where interest is by agreement payable at stated periodical times, and is not paid at such times, it is generally held that interest on such instalments of interest will be allowed from the time they became due and payable,[87] but in some jurisdictions the courts refuse to allow interest upon such unpaid interest.[88]

b. After Maturity of Principal Debt. After the maturity of the principal debt upon which interest is payable in periodical instalments, no instalments of interest will be considered as coming due, in the absence of a specific contract to that effect, for both the principal and the interest are due on every day thereafter until paid,[89] and interest will not be allowed on interest that accrues merely by lapse of time after the maturity of the principal debt.[90] But where there is an agreement for the payment of interest periodically after the maturity of the principal debt as well as before, interest will be allowed on instalments of interest falling due after maturity of the principal and unpaid.[91]

j. Judgments For Attorney's Fees. Where attorney's fees are included in a judgment they bear interest at the same rate as the principal sum.[35]

IV. RATE.[36]

A. Statutory Regulations — 1. Power to Regulate. The legislature has entire control over the subject of interest, restricted only by constitutional limitations, and it may enact such laws as it deems wise, regulating the rate to be allowed in any given case.[37]

2. Changes in Statutory Rate — a. In General. The general rule that statutes operate prospectively only and not retrospectively applies to statutes changing the rate of interest on debts, obligations, etc.[38]

b. Effect on Contracts Fixing Rate. Where parties to a contract have stipulated for the payment of a specified rate of interest, lawful at the date of the con-

Contract fixing rate after maturity.— A contract for a certain lawful rate of interest to be paid after maturity of the principal debt will bear that rate after maturity, although a statute enacted prior to such maturity, but after the contract was made, reduced the rate permitted below the agreed rate. New promise.— Inasmuch as a new promise revives or extends the original liability, creating no new liability (Ga. Code, § 2936), the rate of conventional interest borne by a note is part of the liability revived or extended by a new promise, and such rate continues in force as fully after the making of the new promise as it was at the date of the creation of the debt. Nor does it make any difference that, by a change in the law of usury made in the interval between the execution of the note and the date of the new promise, such conventional rate was largely in excess of any conventional rate allowed by the new law, it having been legal at the time the note was executed. d. Effect on Contracts Not Stipulating For Interest. It has been held that where there is a simple undertaking to pay money with no stipulation as to interest the law implies a contract for the payment of interest at the legal rate then existing, and interest will continue to run at such rate until the debt is paid, notwithstanding a subsequent statute changing the rate.[42]

e. Effect on Interest Awarded as Damages. In cases where interest is allowed as damages, and not by reason of a contract, express or implied, for its payment, the interest for each period must be computed at the rate which was legal during that period, and statutes changing the rate will operate prospectively only.[43]

f. Effect on Interest Allowed on Judgments. The rate of interest recoverable on a judgment is generally determined by the law in force at the date of its rendition.[44] It has been held in some cases that such rate will not be varied by an

Change of rate between verdict and judgment.— The law in force at the time of the rendering of a verdict governs as to the interest to be allowed upon the sum found by the verdict, and not the law in force at the time of the rendition of the judgment, it not clearly appearing that the later law is intended to operate retrospectively. Change of rate pending writ of error.— Where at the time when a judgment was recovered the rate allowed by the statute was eight per cent, but pending a writ of error the rate was changed to six per cent on judgments thereafter obtained, interest at the rate of eight per cent should be recovered, on affirmance of the judgment. alteration of the legal rate by subsequent statute,[45] but in other cases it has been held that interest on judgments must be computed according to the varying rates prescribed by the changing laws, the legal rate during each period governing.[46] A like conflict in the decisions is to be found in cases when the judgment in terms provides for interest; in some cases the rate is held to be fixed by the terms of the judgment, and not to be affected by subsequent legislation,[47] while in others it is held to vary with the statutes changing the rate, notwithstanding the terms of the judgment.[48] Where a statute provides that the rate of interest fixed by a contract shall be recoverable upon a judgment rendered on such contract, it is generally held that such rate will not be affected by subsequent statutes changing the legal rate.[49]

g. Effect of General Statute Changing Rate on Special Statute. The rule that where a general law and a special statute come in conflict the general law yields to the special without regard to priority in date and a special law will not be repealed by a general statute unless by express words or necessary implication applies in the case of interest statutes.[50]

even though at the time money might easily have been lent out at a higher rate,[52] or although on account of the improper retention of the money due him the creditor was compelled to borrow money at a rate exceeding the legal rate.[53] But it has been held that if money be lent or advanced to take up an obligation bearing a particular rate of interest, the person making such loan or advancement, in the absence of contract, will be subrogated to the rights of the original creditor, and may recover the particular rate provided for in such obligation,[54] and also that where an overpayment is made by a debtor on a contract bearing a conventional rate of interest, the debtor is entitled to recover such rate on the amount of the overpayment and not merely the legal rate.[55] And under equitable principles a higher rate of interest than the legal rate is sometimes allowed in cases of breach of trust or fraud.[56]

2. Coupons and Periodical Instalments of Interest. When interest at a specific rate is payable periodically, or is evidenced by coupons, the instalments of interest, where interest is permitted to be recovered thereon, will bear interest at the legal rate from the date of their maturity, in the absence of special contract to the contrary,[57] even though the original obligation bears a higher rate of interest.[58]

3. In Absence of Legal Rate. The fact that there is no fixed legal rate of interest in the jurisdiction where, under general principles, interest is due, will not prevent its recovery; but in such case interest at a reasonable rate, conform-

C. Contracts as to Rate — 1. Power to Contract — a. In General. There is no restriction as to the rate of interest the parties to a contract may agree to be paid, except such as may be imposed by the various statutes,[60] or such as grow out of the doctrine that the rate agreed upon must not be so great as to be unconscionable,[61] and must be intended as compensation for the use of money, and not as a penalty for non-payment when due.[62]

b. For Increased Rate After Maturity. As a general rule a contract which provides that interest shall be paid at a given rate until maturity, and in case of default, at a higher lawful rate thereafter, will be enforced according to its terms, such increased rate being regarded as a liquidation of the damages and not as a penalty.[63]

c. For Increased Rate From Date in Case of Default. In a number of cases it has been held that a provision for the payment of a greater rate of interest than that originally provided for, from the date of the contract, in case of failure to meet periodical interest payments when due or to pay the principal at maturity, is valid and enforceable;[64] but other cases hold that such a provision is in the nature of a penalty and cannot be enforced.[65] Even where the latter doctrine prevails it is, however, held that a provision for interest at a stipulated rate with an agreement to take a smaller rate if interest payments are met promptly or the debt paid promptly at maturity, is perfectly valid, and if the debtor fails to pay either principal or interest promptly he cannot be relieved against the higher rate.[66]

d. Power of Corporations. A corporation is restricted in its power to make contracts relating to the payment of interest, as in case of other contracts, by the terms of its corporate charter; but in the absence of any charter provision restricting its power, a corporation may contract for the payment of any rate of interest allowed by law.[67]

2. Requisites and Validity of Contracts — a. In General. In the absence of any statutory provision requiring contracts for the payment of other than the legal rate of interest to be express or to be in writing, any rate of interest permitted to be contracted for by law may be provided for by implied contract, arising from acquiescence in a statement or act, consent to the charge of a particular rate, or from other acts of the parties evidencing such an agreement.[68] And even where the rule is that a higher rate of interest than the legal will not be allowed unless there is an express contract therefor,[69] the existence of such a contract may be inferred from the circumstances.[70]

b. Consideration.[71] There must be a sufficient consideration to support a contract for a higher rate of interest than that originally contracted for;[72] but it has been held that an extension of the time of payment is a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay an increased rate in the future,[73] or even for a promise to pay an increased rate from a date anterior to the agreement.[74] An agreement made after maturity that, on the payment of a part of the principal, the rate of interest on the balance shall be less than that stated in the note has been held to be without consideration and not binding.[75]

c. Necessity For Written Contract. In the absence of statutory requirement an agreement for any rate of interest allowed by law may be by parol;[76] but it is provided by statute in many of the states that any contract for the payment of a higher rate of interest than the legal rate, in order to be valid, must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged, and must specify the rate agreed upon.[77]

Where such statutes obtain, a verbal contract is valid to the extent of the legal rate, but only such rate is chargeable thereon.[78] It has been held that a contract reducing the rate of interest provided for in a written contract must likewise be in writing.[79] Under some statutes the rate need not be expressed in the written contract;[80] but if the interest has been calculated and included in the principal sum named in the written contract this is sufficient.[81]

3. Effect of Order For Sale of Property on Contract Rate. Where notes specify a particular rate of interest higher than the legal rate an order for a sale of the debtor's property to satisfy claims against him does not have the effect of stopping interest at the contract rate and making interest run thereafter at the legal rate only, but the creditor is entitled to the contract rate certainly to the day of sale.[82]

D. Contracts Silent as to Rate. Where no specific rate of interest is named in a contract for the payment of money interest will be computed at the legal rate.[83]

2. By Implied Contract. The rate after the maturity of the debt may also be fixed by an implied contract, and such contract will generally be enforced.[87] Thus, where a loan is made for a short period of time with a provision that interest shall be paid annually,[88] or a debt payable on demand on its face bears interest at a particular rate,[89] interest will generally be held recoverable at the rate specified until the debt is paid or becomes merged in judgment.

3. In the Absence of Contract. The decisions of the various courts are not in accord as to what rate shall be computed upon a debt after its maturity and in default of payment, when there is a contract for the payment of a particular rate of interest on the debt, but no agreement as to the rate after its maturity.[90] It has been held in many cases that the legal rate governs after maturity and default in payment of a debt, whether the rate fixed by the contract before maturity be greater or less than the legal rate;[91] but what has been termed the

V. TIME DURING WHICH INTEREST RUNS.

A. Time From Which Interest Runs — 1. In General. The general rule is that interest on money runs from the time when the money became due and payable.[1] A creditor seeking to recover interest must show when the debtor's liability became fixed so as to establish the time from which the interest is to be computed,[2] and in the absence of such a showing interest should be allowed only from the commencement of the action.[3] In addition to this a number of cases have arisen in which, usually owing to some peculiar circumstances connected with a claim for money, interest has been allowed only from the commencement of an action to recover the money, although it should have been paid at an earlier time.[4] When a claim is liquidated and should have been paid before action brought and the auditor while allowing interest has computed it only to the date of the writ, it is proper that for the judgment interest should be made up from the date of the writ and not merely from the filing of the auditor's report.[5]

b. Implied Contracts. A contract fixing the particular time from which interest is to run may be implied from the terms of the agreement of the parties or otherwise; and when so established the contract will be as effective as if it were in express terms.[7]

c. Contracts Silent as to Time. Where a contract for the payment of money contains a stipulation for the payment of interest, but does not, either expressly or impliedly, fix the time from which such interest is to run, it is generally held that interest is to be allowed from the date of the contract.[8] But where the payment of interest is conditioned upon default in payment of the principal at maturity, without any stipulation as to the date from which the interest is to run, it is sometimes held that interest is to be computed only from maturity and default.[9]

Delay in paying money to borrower.— Where money is lent, but is not paid to the borrower for some days after the date of the mortgage securing the loan, which calls for interest from date, it will be assumed, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, that the borrower, knowing that there would be some short delay in perfecting title, intended and agreed that such delay should work no change as to the time at which interest was to commence to run. But a delay of several months by the lender in paying the money to the borrower will prevent the accruing of interest except from the date when the money was paid. Dodge v. Tulleys, 144 U. decedent's estate,[16] the completion of certain work,[17] or the delivery of certain articles.[18]

(E) Contracts Silent as to Time. It has been frequently held that where a contract for the payment of money fixes no time when it shall be paid, the amount is payable immediately and interest runs from the date of the contract.[19]

(F) Goods Sold and Delivered. As a general rule, when goods are sold and delivered without special agreement as to the time of payment therefor, the purchase-price is due upon delivery of the goods, and interest thereon is recoverable from that date,[20] although it has been held that in such case interest runs from the time of a demand for payment.[21] Of course if there is a special contract that the goods shall be paid for at a particular time, interest is payable only from such time.[22] It has been held that where goods are sold for cash interest is recoverable from the date of the sale,[23] but other cases hold that even on sale for cash interest should be allowed only from the time of the actual delivery of the goods.[24]

(G) Loans and Advances. Where one person lends money to or pays money at the request and to the use of another, interest is to be allowed on the sum lent or advanced from the date of the transaction in the absence of any agreement to the contrary.[25]

custom of dealing, or by statute, interest will be computed from the expiration of such credit;[30] and it has even been held that interest is to be computed from the expiration of a reasonable term of credit.[31] In some cases it has been held that interest should be allowed from the date of the last item of the account on the debit side.[32]

(I) Work Done and Materials Furnished. It has been held that, in the absence of a contract fixing the time of payment for work done and materials furnished, payment should be made upon the completion of the work, and interest is to be allowed from such time.[33] But it has also been held that in suits for wages or for work done and materials furnished interest is to be allowed from the time of a demand proved,[34] and in the absence of a previous demand interest is to be allowed only from institution of the suit.[35] Where the right of a party to compensation for work and materials furnished under a contract is doubtful and contested on reasonable grounds, and the amount due him requires to be adjusted by proceedings in the suit, interest is recoverable only after the right of the party to recover and the amount of his recovery have been determined.[36]

g. Form and Sufficiency of Demand — (I) In General. In the absence of statute or agreement, no specific form of demand is essential in order to start the running of interest on a debt, but it is only necessary that the debtor be notified that immediate payment of the debt is requested.[63] Where, however, the statute requires a demand to be made in writing, as in England,[64] there must be a substantial compliance with its requirements in order to start the running of interest.[65] A written acknowledgment by the debtor that a demand has been made upon him is sufficient to start the running of interest from the date of such acknowledgment,[66] and part payment of a debt has been said to be sufficient evidence of a demand for payment to justify the allowance of interest on the balance due, as upon a demand made therefor.[67]

(II) Institution of Suit. The institution of legal proceedings to collect a debt is a sufficient demand for its payment to start the running of interest thereon from the time suit is begun,[68] and this has been held to be true even though the suit is dismissed, if in a subsequent suit a recovery be had.[69] So also the presentation of a set-off or counter-claim in an answer or cross bill is held to be such a demand as to start the running of interest on the claim from the date of service of such pleading on the opposite party.[70]

(III) Excessive Demand. A demand for an excessive sum, where the debtor offers to pay all that is due, will not support a claim for interest on the balance found due later, from the time of the demand to the time of the trial.[71]

B. Time to Which Interest Runs — 1. In General. Interest is generally computed to the time when the debt is paid or merged in a judgment,[76] unless, by some act of the parties or by operation of law, a suspension of the interest is caused.[77] Interest upon a judgment continues to run until the judgment debt is paid,[78] and when a judgment is satisfied by an execution, it is generally held that interest should be computed on the judgment to the day the levy is completed.[79]

Time at which debt would have been paid but for creditor's fault.— Where plaintiffs recover damages for breach of a contract under which they were to pay for certain machinery sold to them by defendants by sawing logs, which defendants were bound but failed to supply, an agreement of plaintiffs to pay interest on the purchase-price is to be reckoned as an agreement to pay interest till the purchase-price is paid out of the profits of the contract, and not to pay interest during the entire period of the contract; and, in case of defendants' failure to furnish plaintiffs with logs to saw, the interest to be deducted from plaintiffs' damages will run only for the probable period it would have taken plaintiffs to pay the purchase-price out of the contract, had they been allowed to enter upon it. Jones v. Foster, 67 Wis. 296, 30 N. W. 697.

Debt to be deducted from debtor's share of creditor's estate.— Where a note payable with interest provides that instead of the maker's paying the same in the payee's lifetime the amount of the note may be deducted from the share of the payee's estate to be left to the maker at his death, the interest on the note ceases to run on the death of the payee, where the rights of creditors are not involved. In re Newcomb, 98 Iowa 175, 67 N. W. 587.

Sale on credit of security given.— Where a note stipulated that a stock of goods mortgaged to the payee as security might be sold at his option before the maturity of the note, and the payee exercised this option but at the demand of the maker sold the property on twelve months' credit and took sale notes bearing interest after six months, it was held that as against the maker of the original note the payee was entitled to interest to the date of the maturity of the sale of the notes, he allowing credit for the amount of interest received on the sale notes. Pennsylvania the rule is that where the debtor or his estate is solvent, interest continues to run until the proceeds of the sale are actually applied to the payment of the debt;[81] but if the debtor or his estate be insolvent interest ceases when the sale is confirmed,[82] although even in such case if the fund arising from the sale, instead of being paid out to the creditors whose liens have been divested by the sale and who are entitled to be paid, is so kept or invested afterward as to draw interest, the creditors are entitled to this interest because it is produced by the money to which they are entitled.[83] In Maryland if the sale is made for cash interest is allowed up to the day of sale whether the estate be solvent[84] or insolvent;[85] and if the sale is on credit and consequently the purchase-money bears interest the creditor is entitled to interest until the amount is collected.[86] In other states it has been held that where there has been a sale of the whole of mortgaged premises under a decree of foreclosure, in a case where only a part of the debt had become due, interest should not be allowed on the part not due beyond the time when the proceeds of the sale become applicable to the payment of such part,[87] and that interest ceased to run on a mortgage debt from the time of the sale of the mortgaged property by the executor of the mortgagor, although the executor failed to pay the mortgage debt and retained the funds uninvested in his hands.[88]

b. Sheriff's Sales. Where property is sold at sheriff's sale, interest on liens is allowed to the date of the sale only.[89]

c. Sales Under Deed of Trust. Where land was sold under a deed of trust, one half of the purchase-price to be paid in cash and the remainder in twelve months, and was purchased by the beneficiaries in the deed, who paid nothing, the purchase simply extinguishing their claims, it was held proper to charge interest on the whole amount of the secured debts up to the time of the sale and on one half of the amount for twelve months thereafter.[90]

C. Suspension — 1. By Contract. If a contract makes provision for the suspension of interest for any particular period of time, or upon a certain contingency, such provision will be permitted to control, and the running of interest will be governed by its terms;[91] but a mere agreement not to sue for a certain period will not have the effect of suspending the running of interest on the debt or obligation during such period.[92]

2. By Act of Parties — a. Act of Creditor — (i) In General. If the failure to make payment of the principal debt is due to any improper act of the creditor, or to such conduct on his part as prevents the debtor from complying with his contract to pay, interest on such debt is generally suspended during the time the debtor is so prevented from making payment.[93] Mere delay to make valid title on the part of a vendor of property will not suspend the running of interest on the amount of the purchase-price due, where the vendee is in possession of the property;[94] but if the vendee has kept the money idle awaiting demand for it upon perfection of title, or if the vendor's delay is due to wilful neglect, interest will be suspended during such period.[95]

(ii) Absence or Concealment of Creditor. If the creditor absents himself from the country and leaves no person to represent him, to whom payment of the debt may be made, or conceals his whereabouts, so as to prevent payment by the debtor, no interest will be allowed on the debt during such absence or concealment.[96]

But the debtor must not himself be in default for not making reasonable effort to seek his creditor and pay the debt when due.[97]

(III) Neglect to Present Commercial Paper For Payment.[98] Neglect to present commercial paper for payment at such time and place as is designated in the instrument has been held sufficient to defeat the recovery of interest thereon after its maturity.[99] But in order to relieve himself from payment of interest on account of the creditor's failure to make presentment for payment, the debtor must show that he had the money ready to make payment on the date and at the place designated in the instrument.[1] If the instrument does not designate a particular place of payment, interest thereon will not be affected by failure to present for payment.[2] It has been held that the failure to present interest coupons for payment does not prevent the allowance of interest thereon.[3]

(IV) Loss or Destruction of Instrument. The mere fact that an instrument evidencing a debt has been lost or destroyed will not generally cause a suspension of interest, where the amount of the debt and interest thereon and its non-payment, can be shown, and no tender of payment has been made.[4] But where a note payable on demand is lost, the debtor must offer a bond of indemnity, upon making demand, in order to start the running of interest.[5]

b. Act of Debtor[6] — (I) Tender of Principal[7] — (A) In General. A tender of the amount due under a contract to pay money will prevent the running of interest subsequent to such tender.[8] But in order to have this effect the ten-when a debt became due, and thereafter lived abroad, interest will run on the debt, although he left no agent. Ogden v. King, 1 N. C. 446.

Tender of payment before maturity at the bank where the note was payable did not constitute a valid tender, nor stop the running of interest thereon. Kelly v. Collins, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 56 S. W. 997.

A mere offer to pay off a judgment, made by a person who is ready to purchase the property, is not a sufficient tender to the judgment creditor to vary the running of interest. Jones v. Moore, 1 Edw. (N. Y.) 632.

has not made a technical legal tender, but has made such offer of payment as amounts in effect to a tender, interest will not be recoverable after such offer.[10]

(B) Tender of Less Than Principal. A tender of a less sum than is actually due will not prevent the running of interest thereafter on the whole principal, as though tender had been made.[11]

(C) Conditional Tender. While it has been flatly laid down that a conditional tender is not good to stop the running of interest,[12] the better rule appears to be that the tender of the principal sum due upon a condition reasonable in itself and which the debtor has a right to impose will suspend the running of interest from the date of such tender;[13] but it is otherwise if the condition be unreasonable, or one which the debtor has no right to impose.[14]

(II) Holding Funds in Readiness to Pay Principal. Where a debt is payable at a particular time and place, and the debtor provides sufficient funds at such time and place to pay the debt, it is generally held that such readiness to make payment, if maintained, amounts to a legal tender, and interest is accordingly denied during the time the funds are so held for the purpose of making such payment.[15] But if the debtor withdraws the funds and appropriates them to a different purpose, interest will be recoverable from maturity of the debt.[16]

e. Appeal and Proceedings For Review.[32] The question of the suspension of interest pending an appeal is one largely determined by the character of the case, and by the result of the appeal.[33] If the judgment appealed from be affirmed by the appellate court, interest is generally allowed on the judgment below from its date, notwithstanding the appeal,[34] and a mere modification of the judgment below does not suspend the running of interest pending the appeal, if such judgment be substantially affirmed.[35] If the judgment appealed from be reversed and the case remanded, interest is not generally computed during the pendency of the appeal, but is suspended until the entry of final judgment.[36] Where the entry

B. Under Special Statutes. The method of computing interest is sometimes prescribed by statute, by the adoption of interest tables, or otherwise;[49] but such statutes do not apply to contracts made prior to their adoption.[50]

C. Rests in Computation. The computation of interest with periodical rests to ascertain the balance due, carrying the accrued interest over as part of the new principal, is not generally permitted, as this results in compounding interest;[51] but it has been frequently held that such rests should be made, whenever the custom of dealing between the parties, the known usages of trade, or the peculiar circumstances of the case require it.[52]

D. Partial Payments — 1. Application. Where partial payments are made the rule is to apply the payments in the first place to the discharge of the interest then due. If a payment exceeds the interest then due, the surplus goes toward discharging the principal, and interest is to be computed thereafter on the balance of the principal. If the payment is less than the interest, the surplus of interest must not be taken to augment the principal, but interest continues on the former principal until the payments, taken together, exceed the interest due, and then the surplus is to be applied toward discharging the principal, and interest is partial payments are to be first applied to the discharge of the interest accrued upon interest, then to the discharge of the interest upon the principal, and lastly to the discharge of the principal itself.[54] Where interest on a bond payable in instalments, although running from its date, is not payable until the principal is payable, a partial payment made before the principal falls due is to be applied to the extinguishment of principal and such proportion of interest as has accrued on the principal so extinguished.[55]

2. INTEREST ON PARTIAL PAYMENTS. In the absence of some agreement providing for such method of computation, interest is not generally allowed upon partial payments made upon the principal debt, and it is error to compute interest on the principal to some day subsequent to the partial payment, and on that day to apply the payment, with interest thereon, to the principal and accrued interest.[56]

3. MERCANTILE RULE. Some cases have adopted a method known as the mercantile rule, in conformity with the custom of the parties, or the usage of the trade in which they are engaged. By this method the account is stated, calculating interest upon each item of the debt on the one side, and allowing interest upon each payment on the other.[57]

E. Application of Set-Off. It has been held that if a debtor whose obligation bears interest becomes entitled to set off a non-interest-bearing claim against the creditor, the original debt is deemed to be acquitted to the extent of the set-off and thereafter interest runs only on the balance.[58]

F. Compound Interest — 1. IN GENERAL.[59] The general rule is that in the absence of contract therefor, express or implied, or of some statute requiring it, compound interest is not allowed to be computed upon a debt;[60] but this rule is

G. Errors in Computation. Where interest has been paid in accordance with a computation found to be erroneous, the intention being to pay the correct sum, the party injured by the error may recover the excess or deficit.[66] Error in the allowance of interest in a judgment, when ascertainable by mere computation, will generally be corrected by permitting the prevailing party to remit the excess of interest, without a reversal of the judgment.[67] Such an error has been corrected by the appellate court itself and judgment for the proper amount entered, without remanding the case to the court below;[68] but in other instances the appel-

Exceptional cases sometimes arise where it is inequitable that interest, by way of damages, should be given. Thus in an action on a judgment, the amount of which was doubled by eight per cent interest, a portion of which was compounded, the court may refuse to allow interest on the judgment. Judgment as security.— Where plaintiff obtained a verdict and the parties agreed that judgment should be entered as security for whatever might be ultimately recovered in a new trial granted by the court, interest ought not to be calculated on the amount of the judgment, which included principal and interest, but only on the sum originally due. late court has remanded the case with a direction to the trial court to correct the error and enter judgment for the proper amount.[69] Where the amount of interest erroneously allowed is insignificant, it has been held, under the doctrine of de minimis, not to require correction.[70]

VII. RECOVERY.[71]

A. Nature and Form of Remedy. It is optional with a party whether he will claim the whole, part, or none of the interest allowed by law; but when he sues for it the claim for interest must stand or fall with the principal debt.[72] The general count for money had and received, in an action brought upon an interest-bearing demand, is generally held to carry interest,[73] although the declaration contains no specific count for interest;[74] but it has been held that interest will not be recoverable on the general count for goods sold and delivered.[75] Where rent is collected by distress, no interest can be recovered in the distress proceeding.[76]

B. Interest as Incident to Principal. While in a number of cases interest is stated generally to be an incident of the debt, apparently without regard to the distinction between interest as damages and contractual interest,[77] the proper distinction is that where interest is payable by virtue of a contract, it is an integral part of the debt, as much so as the principal debt itself;[78] but where it is acceptance of the principal debt as such. Where a payment of less than principal and interest is made without being specifically applied to the principal it will be applied according to the rule of partial payments, first extinguishing the interest, even though such payment exceeds the principal.[88] And of course the parties may agree that the acceptance of the principal sum only will not affect the creditor's right to recover interest subsequently.[89]

b. Acceptance of Principal Only Under Protest. Even where the creditor accepts the payment of the principal sum only under protest, or otherwise claims interest thereon, such acceptance will prevent his recovery of interest on such debt thereafter.[90]

c. Payment of Principal Pending Suit For Principal and Interest. It has been held that the payment of the principal debt will defeat the recovery of interest thereon, when such interest is recoverable only as damages, even though such payment be made pending a suit for such principal and interest;[91] but other cases hold that when an action is once begun, plaintiff's right to interest on the debt sued for cannot be defeated by subsequent payment of the debt.[92]

5. Effect of Compromise. An agreement by the creditor to accept a certain sum by way of compromise and settlement of his debt, and as an extinguishment of his entire claim, will extinguish any claim he may have for interest.[93]

D. Limitation of Actions.[94] Where no time for the payment of interest is fixed, it is deemed payable with the principal, and the statute does not run against the interest until the debt is barred;[95] but if the principal debt is barred by the statute of limitations interest thereon is equally barred.[96] Where interest is payable annually, so much of the interest as accrued more than the statutory period before action brought is barred, notwithstanding the principal debt may not be barred.[97] The revival of a barred debt by an acknowledgment or new promise also revives the claim for interest on such debt for the whole period;[98] but where the debtor revives the debt by paying the amount into court and at the same time refuses to pay interest, the claim for interest is not revived.[99] It is sometimes provided by statute that a specific limitation shall apply to claims for interest, regardless of that applying to the principal debt.[1]

E. Pleadings — 1. Construction of Terms. The term "legal interest," used in pleadings, may mean the rate fixed by law in the absence of contract, or the highest rate of interest which the law allows the parties to contract for; and the true meaning depends upon the context and the facts. It will be understood as it appears that the pleader intended it should be.[2] A claim of interest at a certain "per cent" will be construed to mean such per cent per annum.[3]

2. Complaint or Petition — a. Demanding Interest. Where interest is recoverable as damages, and as a legal incident of the debt sued on,[4] or where the allowance is required under equitable principles,[5] interest should be allowed, although no demand therefor is made in the bill or declaration; but otherwise, as in the case of interest due by virtue of a contract therefor, interest must be demanded in the declaration, or it cannot be recovered.[6]

b. Setting Forth Rate and Time. A substantial averment of the facts, when interest is claimed in the pleading, from which the actual interest claimed may be clearly understood, is all that is necessary.[7] Thus it has been held that in order to recover interest at the rate specified in the written instrument sued on it is not necessary to make demand for that specific rate in the declaration.[8] But in order to entitle a party to recover interest at the rate allowed in another state such rate must be alleged in the pleadings; it is not sufficient to prove it at the trial under the prayer for damages for the detention of the principal sum due.[9] Interest will not generally be allowed from a time prior to the date from which plaintiff claims it in his pleadings.[10]

c. Setting Forth Specific Contract For Interest. Where interest is sought under a special contract for its payment, such contract must be set forth in the declaration, in order to support the allowance of such interest.[11]

d. Negativing Payment of Interest. The non-payment of interest must be specially alleged, where the right to its recovery is based upon a contract for its payment.[12]

e. Averment as to Law of Foreign State. In order to support the recovery of interest according to the law of another state, such law must be specifically averred and proved.[13]

3. Answer or Plea. Where, in an action upon a debt, interest is demanded in the declaration, a plea which avers that the contract for interest was at a greater rate than allowed by law except upon an instrument in writing, and that the contract was not in writing, presents no defense to the action;[14] and where the complaint alleges an express agreement to pay interest on the debt, a denial in the answer that defendant agreed in writing to pay interest is not responsive to the allegation in the complaint, and presents no issue.[15] When failure to demand interest due on daily bank balances is relied upon as a defense to a claim for interest on such balances prior to commencement of suit, such want of demand must be set up in the plea.[16]

4. Amendment. A complaint may be amended at any time, so as to cover interest accruing after the commencement of the suit in which it is sought to be recovered;[17] and it will be presumed to have been so amended as to cover a judgment at a subsequent term, which includes such after accrued interest.[18]

5. Issues, Proof, and Variance. An averment of the substantial facts upon which the claim for interest is based will generally be sufficient to admit proof of such facts so as to support a recovery of the interest claimed;[19] but the variance between a note bearing interest and a declaration thereon, which made no mention of interest, has been held to be fatal;[20] and where the declaration described the note as being for a certain sum, "with interest," and the note offered in evidence was silent as to interest, this was held to be a fatal variance.[21]

F. Evidence. Where interest is sought upon a contract to pay it, the evidence must satisfactorily establish such contract.[22] The burden of proving a demand, so as to start the running of interest thereon, is upon the party who sues upon it,[23] while if an agreement or the existence of any facts absolving the debtor from further payments of interest is relied upon, the burden is on the debtor to prove the same.[24] The legal rate of interest of one state is not presumed to be within the knowledge of the courts of another, but must be proved by the party claiming the benefit of such rate.[25] In some states it is held that in the absence of such proof interest on a debt governed by the laws of another state is recoverable at the legal rate of the state in which suit is brought,[26] the presumption being that the legal rates are the same;[27] but in other states it is held that in the absence of proof of the interest law of another state no interest will be allowed upon a demand governed by the law of such state.[28] Where money was received upon evidences of debt, it will be presumed to have been received in accordance with their terms, and interest will be calculated accordingly.[29] In an action against a defaulter for failure to turn over money received by him, he will be presumed, in the absence of testimony, to have converted it immediately upon his receipt thereof, so as to fix such date as the time from which interest should be calculated.[30] The note upon which interest is claimed is pertinent and competent evidence to support such claim, even after the principal of the note has been paid;[31] and in England it has been held that a bill of exchange must be produced in evidence, when suit is brought thereon after its maturity, otherwise interest thereon will not be allowed.[32] Evidence is admissible of the mercantile usage of another state to charge interest on an open account from the time it became due.[33]

G. Province of Court and Jury — 1. In General. When interest on judgments is given by statute its allowance is not a matter of discretion with the court or jury.[34] A court may render judgment for the interest on a single bill without the intervention of a jury.[35] Where interest is sought to be recovered on money due and withheld by unreasonable and vexatious delay of payment, the question whether there has been such delay is for the jury.[36] The rate of interest permitted by law in another state is for the jury to determine,[37] but the rate to be charged on a given principal brought into question by exceptions to an auditor's report is for the court.[38] It is for the jury to determine whether the parties contracted with reference to a custom allowing interest,[39] and generally to determine whether the circumstances of any particular case raise an implied contract for the payment of interest.[40] Where interest is allowable in the discretion of the jury, and a general verdict therefor is rendered, it is presumed that sufficient circumstances exist to justify such verdict. But if the jury state the circumstances in a special verdict, the court will determine the sufficiency of such circumstances and allow or disallow interest as it shall deem proper.[41]

2. Interest by Contract. Interest provided for by a valid contract, express or implied, is recoverable as matter of right, and is not subject to the discretion of the court or jury;[42] but a court of equity may, in a suit for the specific performance of a contract, grant relief only upon the abatement of the interest, where the circumstances render this equitable.[43]

3. Interest as Damages — a. In General. It has been frequently laid down in the decisions, as a general rule of law, that, where interest is recoverable only as damages, it is within the discretion of the jury to allow or disallow it;[44] but even if this be recognized as the general rule it is subject to limitations and exceptions.[45]

b. Breach of Contract to Pay Money. If the amount due under a contract to pay money is unliquidated or if the time of payment is not definitely fixed, the allowance of interest as damages for the breach of the contract is within the discretion of the jury.[46] But in the United States it has been frequently held that

INTEREST REIPUBLICÆ UT SIT FINIS LITIUM. A maxim meaning "It concerns the commonwealth that there be a limit to litigation."[27]

"Interest coupons are instruments of a peculiar character. The title to them passes from hand to hand by mere delivery. A transfer of possession is presumptively a transfer of title. And especially is this true when the transfer is made to one who is not a debtor, to one who is under no obligation to receive them or to pay them." Ketchum v. Duncan, 96 U. Modes of interference.—"Every man's business is liable to be 'interfered with' by the action of another, and yet no action lies for such interference. Competition represents 'interference,' and yet it is in the interest of the community that it should exist. A new invention utterly ousting an old trade would certainly 'interfere with' it. Every organiser of a strike, in order to obtain higher wages, 'interferes with' the employer carrying on his business; also every member of an employers' federation who persuades his co-employer to lock out his workmen must 'interfere with' those workmen. Yet I do not think it will be argued that an action can be maintained in either case on account of such interference." Allen v. Flood, [1898] A. C. 1, 179, 67 L. J. Q. B. 119, 77 L. T. Rep. N. The "interlocking signal system" is a tower built near the point of crossing of two roads, and in that tower are placed wires connected by levers with signals each way at a distance sufficient to insure the stoppage of a train before it reaches the point of crossing. The interlocking feature consists in a wire connection, by which a signal movement necessarily shows a signal on each road on each side of the crossing. Jersey City, etc., R. Co. v. New York, etc., R. Co., 62 N. J. Eq. 390, 393, 53 Atl. 709.

"There are two systems."— There is an interlocking signal system and the interlocking signal and derailing system. In the one reliance is placed entirely upon signals given at a long distance on the steam railroad and at a short distance on the street railway. The signal and derailing system provides, not only a signal, but also a derailment on both tracks, so that if a signal is overlooked by the engineer or motorman the train will be derailed before it reaches the point of crossing." Such matters of local government as are confided to the municipalities at once become, and until recalled remain, their 'internal affairs.' I. TERMINOLOGY.[1]

A. Revenue Law. The term "revenue law," when used in connection with the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, means a law imposing duties on imports or tonnage, or a law providing in terms for revenue; that is to say, a law which is directly traceable to the power granted to congress by the constitution "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises."[2] The words "revenue laws," used broadly and generally, include internal revenue as well as customs laws.[3]

B. Excise. "Excise" is defined to be an inland imposition, sometimes upon consumption of the commodity and sometimes upon retail sale, sometimes upon the manufacturer, and sometimes upon the vendor.[4]

C. Excise Law. An "excise law" is a law imposing excise duties on specified commodities and providing for the collection of revenue therefrom.[5]

D. Corporation — Person. The word "corporation" as used in a revenue law does not include a state.[6] The word "person" includes corporations,[7] but does not include a state.[8] Such terms as "person" and "corporation" are broad enough in statutory construction to include the corporate side of a government and municipalities.[9]

E. Objects Charged With Tax. The words "objects charged with internal revenue tax" do not necessarily mean objects which are tangible and material in form. The words are comprehensive enough to include gross receipts of express companies.[10]

F. Manufactured Goods. "Manufactured goods" means goods the manufacture of which is completed so that they are in a condition to be sold.[11]

II. HISTORY AND SUMMARY OF INTERNAL REVENUE LEGISLATION.

The first internal revenue measure after the constitution went into operation was the act of March 3, 1791, levying a tax on distilled spirits. Other internal revenue laws were passed during Washington's administration.[12] These taxes were repealed by the act of April 6, 1802, entitled "An Act to Repeal the Internal Taxes." The War of 1812 required additional revenue and internal revenue taxation was again resorted to. Various acts were passed in 1813, 1814, and 1815, imposing taxes on distilled spirits, sugar, and other articles.[13] These acts were repealed when the exigencies requiring them ceased to exist, by the act of Dec. 23, 1817, taking effect from and after December 31. The country depended upon customs duties as a source of revenue from that time until 1861.[14]

Feb. 27, 1815, c. 61, on plate. April 19, 1816, c. 58, § 4, on licenses for distilling liquors.

14. Internal taxation, in the form of excises, was introduced into England by a par-

The act of July 1, 1862, created the office of internal revenue and is largely the basis of the present system of internal revenue taxation.[15] The act of June 30, 1864, reënacted to a great extent the act of 1862, with additions and modifications. The act of July 13, 1866, was the first act to reduce taxation after the close of the Civil war. It required the tax on fermented liquors to be paid by stamps, which was the beginning of the stamp system on liquors. The acts of March 2, 1867, and March 31, 1868, reduced taxation. The act of Feb. 3, 1868, repealed the tax on cotton. The act of July 20, 1868, revised the law in regard to spirits and tobacco and made the taxes thereon payable by stamps, and also reduced taxes. The act of July 14, 1870, repealed taxes on gross receipts, legacies, and successions, and extended the income tax till Dec. 31, 1871, when it expired. The act of June 6, 1872, repealed stamp duties on instruments except bank checks. The act of Dec. 24, 1872, abolished the offices of assessor and assistant assessor. The act of March 3, 1875, increased the tax on spirits from seventy cents to ninety cents per gallon. The act of March 1, 1879, reduced the tax on tobacco to sixteen cents per pound. The act of March 3, 1883, repealed taxes on capital and deposits of banks; also, after July 1, 1883, the stamp tax on bank checks and articles under schedule A (medicinal preparations, etc.), and reduced the tax on tobacco to eight cents per pound. The act of Aug. 2, 1886, imposed a tax on oleomargarine. The act of Oct. 1, 1890 (McKinley bill) imposed a tax on opium (not productive of revenue) and swept away petty special taxes on dealers, peddlers, and manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, and cigars, and reduced the tax on tobacco to six cents per pound. The act of Aug. 28, 1894 (Wilson bill) imposed a tax on incomes, since declared unconstitutional, and reimposed the tax on playing cards. It increased the tax on distilled spirits to one dollar and ten cents per gallon. The act of June 6, 1896, imposed a tax of one cent per pound on filled cheese, not intended as a revenue measure. The act of June 13, 1898 (30 U. S. St. at L. 448), known as the "War Revenue Act," taking effect July 1, 1898, imposed additional taxes on fermented liquors, tobacco, and cigars; special taxes on bankers and other occupations; stamp duties upon various documents, and on medicinal articles, cosmetics, chewing gum, and wines; a tax of one-fourth of one per cent on annual gross receipts in excess of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of persons engaged in refining petroleum or sugar, or owning or controlling pipe-lines for transporting oil or products; a tax on legacies and distributive shares of personal property; and a tax on mixed flour. The act of March 2, 1901 (31 U. S. St. at L. 938), partially repealed the war taxes on and after July 1, 1901. The act of April 12, 1902 (32 U. S. St. at L. 96), repealed the remaining war taxes, taking effect July 1, 1902, except the tax on mixed flour not intended as a revenue measure. The act of May 9, 1902, taking effect July 1, 1902, changed the tax on oleomargarine, and imposed taxes on adulterated butter and renovated butter. The act of June 7, 1906, provided for alcohol free of tax for use in the arts and industries.

III. THE TAXING POWER AND ITS CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS.

A. Introductory Statement. The power vested in congress by the constitution to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, with the authority to make all laws necessary and proper to carry that power into effect, is absolute, except the restriction that no rights secured by other provisions of the constitution shall be violated.[16] Power is given to lay and collect taxes of every kind or nature,[17] liamentary resolution passed on March 28, 1643, and carried into effect by an ordinance of the same date. 2 Dowell Hist. Tax. 9.

and extends to all usual objects of taxation.[18] The only limitations imposed are that the taxes must be uniform and that direct taxes including the capitation tax shall be apportioned, and that no duties shall be imposed upon articles exported.[19] No power of supervision or control is lodged in either of the other departments of the government.[20] The courts cannot inquire into the reasonableness of a tax,[21] nor set it aside on the ground that it is excessive or that congress has abused its authority by levying a tax which is unwise or oppressive.[22] No contract between persons, or states and persons, can be set up to defeat a tax which is within the limits of the constitution.[23] Taxation cannot, however, extend beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power, and the objects of taxation must be within the territorial limits of the taxing power.[24]

B. Rule as to Uniformity. Taxes must be uniform throughout the United States.[25] This clause of the constitution relates only to geographical uniformity, requiring the same plan and the same method to be operative throughout the United States.[26] It does not require uniformity in the manner of collection.[27] A law which lays a uniform tax is not open to the objection that it is not uniform throughout the United States because its execution is forcibly delayed in certain sections.[28]

C. Prohibition Against Tax on Exports. The true construction of the provision prohibiting a tax on articles exported is that no burden by way of tax or duty can be cast upon the exportation of articles. It does not mean that articles which are exported are relieved from the prior ordinary burdens of taxation which rest upon all property similarly situated.[29]

(U. S.) 111, 21 L. ed. 49); the tax on interest on bonds of corporations (Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Slack, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,527*a*, 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 337 [affirmed in 100 U. What are not taxes on exports illustrated. — A tax on filled cheese manufactured for export, and in fact exported, is not unconstitutional, the tax being the same as that upon other filled cheese (Cornell v. Coyne, 192 U. S. 418, 29 S. Ct. 383, 48 L. ed. 504); and a tax laid on tobacco before its removal from the factory is constitutional, although the tobacco is intended for exportation (Turpin v. Burgess, 117 U. S. 504, 6 S. Ct.

D. Tax on Instrumentalities of a State. The federal government cannot tax the property, or the agencies of a state, or the means necessary to the exercise of its functions any more than the states can tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, or the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution.[30] Each is sovereign in its sphere of action, and exempt from the interference or control of the other.[31] But if a state engages in commercial business for a profit, it is liable to the same taxes which are imposed upon individuals engaged in the same business. The exemptions of sovereignty extend no further than the attributes of sovereignty.[32]

E. Double Taxation. Duplicate taxation is not open to legal objection when it is plainly intended or when it naturally and unavoidably results from the law.[33] The presumption, however, is against duplicate taxation.[34]

IV. CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS.

A. Legislative Intent. Revenue laws are not, like penal acts, to be construed strictly in favor of the defendants. They are rather to be regarded as remedial in their character, passed to promote the public good, and should be so construed as to carry out the intention of the legislature in passing them.[35]

835, 29 L. ed. 988); so a charge which is not excessive for stamps to be placed on packages of tobacco intended for exportation to identify the tobacco is not a duty on exports (Pace v. Burgess, 92 U. S. 372, 23 L. ed. 657).

What are taxes on exports illustrated.— A stamp tax imposed on foreign bills of lading is equivalent to a tax on the articles included in the bill of lading, and therefore a tax on exports, and unconstitutional (Fairbank v. U. S., 181 U. S. 283, 21 S. Ct. 648, 45 L. ed. 862); and stamp taxes on manifests for the clearance of cargoes for foreign ports are also unconstitutional, upon the same principle (New York, etc., Mail Steamship Co. v. U. S., 125 Fed. 320).

The doctrine applied.— A railroad owned by a state and operated by it is not taxable under the United States revenue laws (Georgia v. Atkins, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5,350, 1 Abb. 22, 35 Ga. 315); so the United States cannot tax the salary of state officers (Buffington v. Day, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 113, 20 L. ed. 122 [affirming 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,675, 3 Cliff. 376]; Freedman v. Sigel, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,080, 10 Blatchf. 327); nor impose a tax on their official bonds (State v. Garton, 32 Ind. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 315; Bettman v. Warwick, 108 Fed. 46, 47 C. C. A. 185 [affirming 102 Fed. 127]. Contra, Muscatine v. Sterneman, 30 Iowa 526, 6 Am. Rep. 685); nor on bonds given by saloon-keepers under state laws (Ambrosini v. U. S., 187 U. S. 1, 23 S. Ct. 1, 47 L. ed. 49 [reversing 105 Fed. 239]; U. S. v. Owens, 100 Fed. 70, the bond is a part of the license); it cannot impose a stamp tax on the writs and processes of state courts (Craig v. Dimock, 47 Ill. 308; Jones v. Keep, 19 Wis. 369. See also on this subject, infra, VIII, A, 5. A municipal corporation it has been held is not subject to taxation by congress upon its municipal revenues. U. S. v. Baltimore, etc., R. Co., 17 Wall. (U. S.) 322, 21 L. ed. 597 [affirming 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,511, 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 117]. A tax upon income derived from the interest of bonds issued by a municipal corporation is a tax upon the power of the state and its instrumentalities to borrow money and therefore repugnant to the constitution. Pollock v. Farmers' L. & T. Co., 157 U. S. 429, 15 S. Ct. 673, 39 L. ed. 759).

Municipal corporations engaged in distilling spirits are liable to the tax, whether its acts in that respect are or are not ultra vires. Salt Lake City v. Hollister, 118 U. S. 256, 6 S. Ct. 1055, 30 L. ed. 176.

An additional tax on imported spirits in bond at the time the act takes effect was held legal. Westfall v. Shook, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,448, 5 Blatchf. 383, 5 Int. Rev. Rec. 54. A tax can be imposed upon beer in barrels and an additional stamp tax can be imposed when it is put up in bottles and labeled a tonic. U. S. v. J. D. Iler Brewing Co., 121 Fed. 41, 57 C. C. A. 681.

Taxation by state and United States.— The power to tax may be exercised at the same time upon the same objects of private property by the state and by the United States without inconsistency or repugnancy, except the power of a state to tax does not extend to those means which are employed by congress to carry into execution the powers conferred in the federal constitution. Savings Soc. v. Coite, 6 Wall. (U. S.) 594, 18 L. ed. 897; Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. (U. S.) 514, 563, 7 L. ed. 939.

Legislative intention is the guide to true judicial interpretation,[36] and should be followed, although contrary to the letter.[37] The intent of the legislature is gathered from the language used.[38] Where the words are not explicit the intention may be gathered from the context, and from the general purpose of the law.[39] Congress is bound to express its intention to tax in clear and unambiguous language,[40] and if the language is clear there is no room for presumptions,[41] and it is immaterial what was intended so long as what the law-makers actually did is free from doubt.[42] In relation to the United States Revised Statutes the original statute may be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of doubtful language used in the revision.[43] Words spoken in debate or the motives of members are not to be considered in construing a statute, but the court may, with propriety, recur to the history of the times when it was passed.[44] Punctuation is no part of the statute.[45] Where the intention is in some particular ambiguously expressed, it is the duty of the court to construe the act so it will harmonize in such particular with the general purpose, plainly expressed.[46]

B. Necessity of Giving Effect to Each Word and Clause. Effect should be given if possible to every clause and word of a statute. If different portions seem to conflict, the courts must harmonize them if practicable, and must lean in favor of a construction which will render every word operative,[47] so that one section will explain and support and not defeat or destroy another section.[48] The whole and every part of a statute should be considered in determining the meaning of any of its parts.[49]

C. Necessity For Reasonable Construction. Revenue laws are to have a fair and reasonable construction to carry out the intention of congress,[50] and such as will not endanger public interests.[51] They should be construed with reasonable fairness to the citizen.[52] Words of common use are to be taken in their natural, plain, and ordinary meaning, in the sense in which they are understood by the public in which they take effect.[53] When, taking the words just as they are written, doubt remains respecting their meaning, that meaning must be adopted which the words most obviously express and which best comports with the nature of the subject and right reason.[54]

D. Construction of Statutes In Pari Materia. Various laws on the same subject-matter must be construed in connection with each other.[55] And the construction should be such as to harmonize and give effect to all their provisions.[56] All statutes in pari materia, whether repealed or not, should be taken into view in resolving a doubt as to the meaning of any one of them.[57]

E. Doctrine of Liberal Construction. Laws for the raising of revenue ought to be construed liberally in favor of the government [58] against all who attempt to commit fraud.[59] They should receive a liberal construction to carry out the purposes of their enactment,[60] but not so loosely as to permit evasions on merely fanciful and unsubstantial distinctions.[61] There is a difference between those provisions of the revenue laws which point out the subjects to be taxed, and indicate the time and manner of assessment and collection and those which impose penalties for obstructions and evasions. There is no reason for peculiar strictness in construing the former, neither is there reason for liberality.[62] They are to be construed fairly for the government and justly for the citizen.[63] There is no reason requiring a statute imposing special internal revenue taxes to be construed liberally in favor of the government, but it should be construed fairly and judicially with reference to both parties.[64] A remedial statute must be construed liberally.[65] And it is very generally held that laws providing for redemption of property from sales for taxes should be construed favorably to the owner of the land.[66]

F. Construction of Laws Imposing Penalties. Revenue laws inflicting penalties for their violation are not to be construed with great strictness or with excess of liberality, but in such a manner, looking at their policy, purpose, spirit, and language as will best effectuate the legislative intent.[67] Thus revenue laws which impose forfeitures for fraud are not technically penal so as to call for a strict construction, but are to be so construed as effectually to accomplish the intention of their makers.[68] But highly penal statutes providing for the punishment of offenders should be strictly construed in accordance with the general rule and ought not to be extended by implication so as to include acts not clearly within their terms.[69]

G. Construction Favorable to Taxpayer in Doubtful Cases. The internal revenue laws should not be construed so as to extend their meaning beyond the clear import of the words used. The courts are not at liberty, by construction or legal fiction, to enlarge their scope to include subjects of taxation not within the terms of the law.[70] When a statute providing for taxation is of doubtful construction, the doubt is to be resolved in favor of the taxpayer.[71] This is the tenor of both American and English decisions.[72] A liberal construction should be given to words of exception confining the operation of the duty.[73] Before the property of the citizen can be taken under the exercise of the taxing power, it is necessary that the statute be clear and unambiguous.[74]

H. Weight Given to Departmental Construction. While it is the duty of the judiciary to determine for itself the construction of all laws involved in a case, it may, with propriety, consult the action of other departments.[75] The courts give great weight to departmental construction of the statute,[76] and where there is doubt, it will be followed unless there are cogent reasons to the contrary.[77] This doctrine has been recognized and declared in many cases.[78] Nevertheless the rule which gives determining weight to contemporaneous construction, put upon a statute by those charged with its execution, applies only in cases of ambiguity and doubt,[79] and in order to be binding upon the courts, it must be long continued and unbroken.[80]

I. Obsolete and Repealed Laws. Before a court will hold an act of congress obsolete it must appear conclusively that it was totally inoperative for any lawful or useful purpose.[81] Repeals by implication are not favored, particularly in revenue laws, and will only be held to exist when the repugnance is positive, and then only to the extent of such repugnance.[82] But when the only reasonable interpretation of a later statute shows a necessarily implied intent which is clearly repugnant to an earlier statute, a repeal by implication is the inevitable result.[83] When a later statute is a complete revision of the subject to which the earlier statute related and the new legislation was manifestly intended as a substitute for the former legislation, the prior act must be held to have been repealed.[84] Under U. S. Rev. St. § 13 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 6] the repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture, or liability incurred under such statute, unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide.[85]

J. Retrospective Legislation. The power of congress to pass laws on subjects within the scope of its constitutional power is not restricted to laws prospective in their operation. Congress may pass retrospective statutes provided they are not ex post facto.[86] But they should be construed to apply only to future cases, unless they are made by clear and explicit language to embrace past transactions.[87]

K. Time When Statutes Take Effect. A law of congress which contains no provision as to the time when it shall take effect commences and takes effect as a law from the moment it receives the approbation of the president. As a general rule it is not competent to go into the division of a day.[88] There is a presumption that the act was signed on the first minute of the day when it took effect, but it is competent to show by proof the exact time when the law is approved by the president.[89] When necessary to determine conflicting rights courts of justice will take cognizance of the fractions of a day.[90]

L. Revenue Laws of Foreign Countries. Revenue laws of foreign countries are usually disregarded. No country ever takes notice of the revenue laws of another.[91]

M. Territorial Extent of Operation of Revenue Laws. The internal revenue laws imposing taxes on distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, snuff, and cigars, extend to such articles produced anywhere within the exterior boundaries of the United States, whether the same be within a collection district or not.[92] The Indian Territory is included in the general terms of the above provision notwithstanding any prior treaty.[93] The establishment of a distillery in the Indian Territory on land to which the Indian title was extinct would be in contravention of law.[94] The internal revenue laws extend over Alaska as well as other portions of the country.[95] The laws of the United States not locally inap-

V. DIRECT TAXES.[1]

A. Rule of Apportionment. Direct taxes must be apportioned among the several states according to population.[2]

B. What Are Direct Taxes. Capitation or poll taxes are direct taxes by the express words of the constitution. Taxes on land and on rents or income from investment in real estate are within the same category.[3] Taxes on personal property or on the income of personal property are likewise direct taxes.[4] As a mere abstract, scientific, or economical problem, a particular tax might possibly be regarded as a direct tax, when as a practical matter pertaining to the actual operation of the tax it might quite plainly appear to be indirect.[5] The following taxes are not direct taxes and may be laid without apportionment: viz, a tax on carriages;[6] legacy taxes;[7] succession taxes;[8] a tax on bank circulacrimes in the district of Alaska, act of March 3, 1899 (30 U. S. St. at L. 1340) provides: "That nothing in this Act shall in any way repeal, conflict, or interfere with the public general laws of the United States imposing taxes on the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for the purpose of revenue and known as the 'Internal-Revenue laws.'"

C. Act of 1861 and Amendments — 1. In General. The act of Aug. 5, 1861, levied a direct tax of twenty million dollars "upon the United States," and apportioned it to the several states of the Union, the tax to be assessed and paid on the value of all lands and lots of ground, with their improvements and dwelling-houses.[13] The object of the law was the raising of revenue by a tax on land.[14] Another act was passed in 1862 for the collection of the direct tax in the insurrectionary districts, the tax to be collected by a board of tax commissioners to be appointed for each insurrectionary state.[15] These two acts should be construed together, that is, construed as if passed at the same time, and effect must be given to all the provisions of the first act not in conflict with the later one.[16] There was no liability on the part of the states to pay the tax. The liability was upon the individual landowners,[17] but the states could voluntarily assume payment.[18]

2. Constitutionality of Statutes. The law was not unconstitutional on account of the penalty of fifty per cent charged for default of voluntary payment.[19]

3. Forfeiture of Land For Non-Payment of Tax. The land was forfeited for non-payment of taxes, and all interests connected with it passed with the sale to the purchaser, subject to the right of redemption.[20] Nevertheless the non-payment of taxes did not work divestiture of title, but the title became subject to be vested in the United States or other purchaser upon public sale.[21]

4. Sale of Land. When lands were sold for unpaid taxes the tax-sale certificate was prima facie evidence not only of a regular sale, but of all the antecedent facts which were essential to its validity and to that of the purchaser's title.[22] The certificate of sale was not void because signed by only two commissioners.[23] The act did not contemplate a sale until the military power had been so firmly established that citizens could go to headquarters and pay the tax.[24] The sale was void when the penalty of fifty per cent in case of delinquency was imposed simultaneously with the apportionment of the taxes, and no property-owner was permitted to pay his taxes without also paying the penalty.[25]

5. Validity of Titles. An agent has the right to pay taxes for his principal, and if the officers adopted a rule that they would not receive taxes from an agent, this excused the agent from making tender and rendered sales invalid.[26] It was a sufficient tender if a relative of the owner went to the office of the commissioners to see about the payment of the taxes, although he made no formal tender and rendered a sale void.[27] Irregularities did not affect the validity of the title, provided the proceedings were colorable and free from fraud, accident, or mistake.[28] The government did not guarantee the title it gave upon tax-sale.[29] Purchasers who bought land at tax-sales and who lost the land by failure of title were repaid their purchase-money by a special relief act, but the purchaser must defend in good faith. It was necessary to show an eviction without collusion on his part.[30] This was a revenue law, and therefore cases arising under it involving the validity of titles were removable from state courts to United States circuit courts.[31]

6. Owner Entitled to Surplus. In case of the sale of land for taxes, the owner was entitled to the surplus proceeds of the sale, after satisfying the tax, costs, charges, and commissions, to be paid to him or his legal representatives, or if he or they could not be found, or refused to receive the money, then it was required to be deposited in the treasury of the United States and there held for the use of the owner or his legal representatives, until such time as he or they should make application therefor to the treasurer of the United States.[32] Prior to his application to the treasurer of the United States for such surplus, the owner had no claim thereto which could be enforced by suit against the United States.[33]

"Owner."— The term "owner" under the Direct Tax Act of 1861, was intended to include every kind of estate or equity which should rightly entitle a person to the whole or a portion of the surplus (Wilson v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 135; Rodgers v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 130); or a purchaser in possession under a title bond (Rodgers v. U. S., supra; Wilson v. U. S., supra). Thus it was held to include a tenant for life in possession. Cuthbert v. U. S., 20 Ct. Cl. 172.

Evidence of ownership.— In a suit for a surplus under the direct tax acts, it is sufficient evidence of ownership that the claimant was in actual, undisturbed possession under color of title at the time of sale. Where actual possession cannot be shown he must show either a complete title or that the property was assessed to him or to those under whom he held, and that he or they paid the taxes thereon for a period covered by the statute of limitations. Wilson v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 135.

Legal representatives.— It has been held in a decision of the court of claims if the owner of real property, sold for a direct national tax, was sole owner in fee, the surplus money derived from the sale was personalty which passed to the executors, and that they are the "legal representatives" within the meaning of Act Aug. 5, 1861 (12 U. S. St. at L. 304, § 36), and the proper parties to maintain an action therefor. Chaplin v. U. S., 19 Ct. Cl. 424.

But if his application were refused he might then bring an action in the court of claims to recover the money.[34] This was a trust fund and the owner might allow it to remain in the treasury for an indefinite period without losing his right to demand it.[35] But the statute of limitations ran from the date of his application to the secretary of the treasury.[36] In case the tax title failed the owner could not hold the land and at the same time claim the surplus money of the sale.[37] So also if the land was redeemed he had no claim to the surplus.[38]

7. Redemption of Land Sold. The statute relative to redemption of land from taxes was construed favorably to the owners.[39] A lien creditor of the owner of the fee is an "owner of the land," and could redeem the land from the tax-sale.[40] In the absence of a provision in the act as to the right of a minor on redemption to recover rents and profits the state law applies.[41]

8. Refund of Tax. Taxes illegally collected could be recovered back;[42] also interest exacted for a period anterior to a legal assessment, and the person entitled to a refund could allow it to remain in the treasury for an indefinite period without losing his right to it.[43] The entire tax collected under these acts was ultimately refunded to the states and territories.[44] The law contemplated that the tax should be refunded to the person on whose property the tax was collected, and not necessarily to the person who paid the tax.[45]

VI. The Income Tax and Miscellaneous Repealed Taxes.

A. The Income Tax of 1862 and Amendments — 1. In General. The system of taxing incomes, earnings, and profits was adopted during the Civil war, and abandoned as soon after that war ended as it could be done safely.[46] The tax was to be collected annually upon the gains, profits, and income for the preceding year.[47] Its constitutionality was sustained.[48] It was not a direct tax requiring to be apportioned.[49] Income received in gold coin was taxable on the amount reduced to its equivalent market value in legal tender currency.[50] A bona fide exchange of stocks for other property was not a sale, and profits derived therefrom were not taxable as income.[51] Advance in value of government bonds did not constitute gains, profits, or income, but constituted increase of capital.[52] Salaries of judicial officers of a state or a city were not taxable as income.[53] The death of a person before the appointed time for making his return did not discharge his estate. The tax was to be paid by his executor or administrator.[54]

2. Tax on Dividends, Earnings, and Interest on Bonds — a. In General. The tax on interest, dividends, and profits of railroads and other corporations was entirely distinct and separate from the income tax proper.[55] It was of the same character as the tax on income of individuals but the mode of assessing and collecting was different.[56] The tax on interest and dividends was an excise tax on

Under Act July 1, 1862 (12 U. S. St. at L. 432), the tax was three per cent on incomes over six hundred dollars and not over ten thousand dollars; over ten thousand dollars five per cent. No income tax was collected under the act of June 30, 1864, as it was amended by the act of March 3, 1865, before it was collectable. By the act of March 3, 1865, the tax on incomes over six hundred dollars and not over five thousand dollars was five per cent; over five thousand dollars, ten per cent on excess over five thousand dollars; by the act of March 2, 1867, the tax on incomes over one thousand dollars was five per cent; by the act of July 14, 1870, the tax on incomes over two thousand dollars was two and one-half per cent. The tax imposed by the act of Aug. 5, 1861 (12 U. S. St. at L. 309), was not collected, being superseded by Act July 1, 1862. Bennett v. Hunter, 9 Wall. (U. S.) 326, 19 L. ed. 672; U. 56. Sioux City, etc., R. Co. v. U. S., 110 U. S. 205, 3 S. Ct. 565, 28 L. ed. 120 (interest on subsidy bonds loaned by the government); Memphis, etc., R. Co. v. U. S., 108 U. S. 228, 2 S. Ct. 482, 27 L. ed. 711 (tax due on dividends paid during the war in Confederate notes within the Confederate lines); Lake Shore, etc., R. Co. v. Rose, 95 U. S. 78, 24 L. ed. 376 (the duty on dividends and interest on bonds of railroad companies, and profits carried to the account of any fund, or used in construction was in force from 1862 to 1870); Metropolitan R Co. v. Slack, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,506, Holmes 375 (tax on the dividends and earnings of a railway corporation for the first six months of 1870 is not an income tax but an excise); Philadelphia, etc., R. Co. v. Barnes, 19 Fed.

the business of corporations to be paid by the corporations out of their earnings, income, and profits, and not a tax on the incomes of the bond or stock-holders.[57] Congress intended to hold the railroad company absolutely and solely liable for the tax, although railroads were empowered to withhold the amount of the tax from the dividends due stock-holders or interest payable to bondholders.[58] The provision that the amount of the tax might be withheld from any stock-holder or bondholder who is a subject of any foreign government did not impair the validity of the tax.[59] Earnings were taxable whether divided or undivided.[60] Earnings carried to a fund were not taxable unless the operations of the company showed a profit. Earnings used to pay interest or dividends were taxable whether they were actual profits or not.[61] No tax accrues upon a fund except for the year in which the fund itself accrues.[62] That cannot be regarded as net income or profits which is required to keep the property up in its usual condition proper for operation.[63] Estimated depreciation of assets may be included in losses.[64] Interest paid and dividends declared during the last five months of the year 1870 were taxable, as well as those declared during the year 1871, there being no apparent reason why income derived through corporations should not be taxed like income generally.[65] The income tax or duties imposed upon the amounts insured, renewed, or continued by insurance companies upon the gross amounts of premiums received, and also upon dividends, undistributed sums and income, was not a direct tax but a duty or excise.[66]

59. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Slack, 100 U. S. 595, 25 L. ed. 647 [followed in U. S. v. Erie R. Co., 106 U. S. 327, 1 S. Ct. 223, 27 L. ed. 151]. No income tax was imposed on citizens of foreign countries whether from interest on bonds or any other source. Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 262, 19 L. ed. 88 [affirming 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,142, Chase 268, 2 Int. Rev. Rec. 174], the decision of the court in this case rested upon the phraseology of the act of June 30, 1864. A tax was imposed on alien non-resident bondholders by the acts of March 10, 1866, and July 13, 1866.

60. Stockdale v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 20 Wall. (U. S.) 323, 22 L. ed. 348 [reversing 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,662, 16 Int. Rev. Rec. 30]. Discussing opinions of the court as to whether the tax was on the corporation or the stockholder.

66. Pacific Ins. Co. v. Soule, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 433, 19 L. ed. 95; Merchants' Ins. Co. v. McCartney, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,443, 1 Lowell

b. Tax on Dividends of Banks. The tax was on dividends and on undistributed sums or excess over dividends carried to a surplus fund.[67] "Profits" meant net profits, after deducting expenses and losses. Losses of whatever nature incurred by a bank in the legitimate prosecution of its business might be deducted.[68] The act of a bank in declaring a dividend was conclusive as to its liability, and it could not avoid paying the tax by showing that the dividends were in fact ignorantly paid out of the capital and accumulated surplus of former years.[69] The bank was not entitled to an exemption from the tax on dividends on account of a state tax, since the state tax was not a tax on the bank but a tax on the stock-holder.[70]

B. Income Tax of 1894. An income tax was again imposed in 1894.[71] The tax was two per cent on incomes above four thousand dollars. The United States supreme court declared the law unconstitutional on the ground that the tax was a direct tax requiring it to be apportioned among the states according to population.[72]

C. Miscellaneous Repealed Taxes — 1. On Gross Receipts. The tax on gross receipts of railroads, advertisements, bridges, canals, express companies, ferries, lotteries, ships, barges, stages, steamboats, telegraphs and insurance companies, and museums, operas, circuses, etc., was repealed in 1870.[73]

2. On Sales. The tax on sales at auction and sales of apothecaries, butchers, brokers, dealers, manufacturers, etc., was in operation nine years.[74]

447, 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 122, profits earned previous to the passage of the act could not be taxed as annual income.

Decisions relative to railroad companies.— U. S. v. Philadelphia, etc., R. Co., 123 U. S. 113, 8 S. Ct. 77, 31 L. ed. 138 (acquiescence by the government in former adjustment raises presumption against claim); U. S. v. Indianapolis, etc., R. Co., 113 U. S. 711, 5 S. Ct. 716, 28 L. ed. 1140 (interest on bonds earned in 1871 but payable Jan. 1, 1872, not taxable); Western Union R. Co. v. U. S., 101 U. S. 543, 25 L. ed. 1068 (the tax on the coupons paid on bonds is a tax on the interest, not as it accrues, but when it is paid); Eastern Kentucky R. Co. v. Slack, 100 U. 3. On Manufactured Articles and Products. In 1862 a general ad valorem rate of three per cent was imposed upon manufactured articles. In 1864 the rate was increased to five per cent, and additional articles made taxable. In 1865 these rates were advanced.[75] Any person engaged in the manufacture or preparation for sale of any article or compound was regarded as a manufacturer.[76]

4. Tax on Sugar Refiners. The tax imposed by the act of June 13, 1898, upon persons, companies, and corporations carrying on the business of refining sugar, whose gross annual receipts exceeded two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, was constitutional, not being a direct tax but an excise.[77] The tax was payable annually and on annual receipts, and a regulation of the commissioner requiring the assessment and collection of the tax monthly was unauthorized.[78] Money earned previous to the passage of the act but received thereafter was not properly included in the taxable receipts.[79] The tax was imposed only upon receipts in the business of refining sugar, not receipts from independent sources; consequently interest on funds deposited in banks and dividends received on stock of other corporations were not subject to the tax.[80] Receipts of a sugar refining company from wharves owned by it and used almost exclusively for the unloading of sugar consigned to it were properly included in the gross annual receipts upon which the amount of the tax was computed.[81] The law was repealed to take effect on and after July 1, 1902.[82]

VII. LEGACY AND SUCCESSION TAXES.

A. Nature of Tax. A legacy tax is not a tax upon property in the ordinary sense of the term, but upon the right to dispose of it.[83] A succession tax is a tax on the privilege of acquiring property by inheritance.[84] The imposition of these taxes is the exercise of the power, which every state and sovereignty possesses, of regulating the manner and terms under which property, real and personal, within its dominion may be transferred by last will or testament, or by inheritance, and of prescribing who shall and who shall not be capable of taking it.[85]

B. Legacy and Succession Taxes During the Civil War Period. A legacy tax was imposed by the act of July 1, 1862. The duties imposed greatly resembled those then existing in England;[86] the act of 1864 added a succession tax or a duty on the passing of real estate, in substantial harmony with the principle of the English Succession Duty Act.[87] A retroactive operation was not given so as to subject persons to a tax upon interests acquired before the act was passed.[88] The succession tax was imposed on every devolution of title to any real estate. It was not a direct tax, and the law was constitutional.[89] The act made legacy and succession taxes a lien on the decedent's property and directed the executor or administrator to pay the same to the collector.[90] In case the administrator or executor did not pay the tax the statute provided that the lien should be enforced by suit against any one having possession of the property. There was no provision for a suit against the executor or administrator.[91] A legatee was not liable in personam for the legacy tax.[92] The person liable to pay the succession tax was the person beneficially interested in the property.[93] The legacy tax was not applicable to legacies paid out of proceeds of real estate,[94] nor to legacies payable in pursuance of a compromise.[95] Where real estate was devised before the act was passed to one for life, remainder to another, the tax accrued on the death of the life-tenant.[96] The tax was payable when the beneficiaries became entitled to possession or enjoyment of the property. It became a lien on the succession after assessment.[97] There was no liability on the person having charge of the property until there had been a neglect or refusal to pay after demand.[98] The tax became a lien from the time it accrued and it did not accrue until it was made payable.[99] These taxes were repealed on and after October 1, 1870.[1] No tax was due on successions to which the successors became entitled in possession after October 1, 1870,[2] nor on legacies payable after October 1, 1870.[3]

C. Legacy Tax Under the War Revenue Act — 1. Provisions and Constitutionality of Act. A legacy tax was again imposed by the War Revenue Act of 1898, practically a reënactment of the act of June 30, 1864, without the amendments, and was in force until July 1, 1902.[4] The act imposed the tax on the death of the testator or of the intestate and made it a lien for twenty years. Legacies not exceeding ten thousand dollars were not taxable, and the rate of tax was progressively increased, according to the net amount of the separate legacies or distributive shares to be distributed. The passing of personal property was subjected to the tax. The personal property left after paying debts made up legacy which passed.[5] The tax was constitutional, not being a direct tax, but a duty or excise, and its operation being uniform throughout the United States.[6]

2. Legacies Subject to Tax. In the case of property passing to a legatee by virtue of a power of appointment granted under the will of one dying prior to the act and exercised by the donor subsequent thereto no tax was due.[7] Legacies of bonds of the United States and the income therefrom were taxable.[8] Legacies to municipal corporations were taxable. Congress has power to tax the transmission of property by legacy to states or municipalities.[9] A legacy to a son-in-law was taxed as to a stranger in blood.[10] The legacy tax does not apply to estates of aliens or persons domiciled abroad.[11] The former legacy tax was chargeable only on estates of those who were domiciled in the United States at the time of death.[12] Where a testator removed his residence to Europe and died there, the legacies were not subject to the tax.[13]

3. When the Tax Accrued and Was Payable. No tax accrued where the testator died prior to the passage of the act.[14] A trustee who at the time of the passage of the act held personal property in trust to be distributed at a future date was not "a person possessed" of such property, within the meaning of the statute, so as to render it subject to the tax when it passed from him to the distributees.[15] The lien attached upon the property bequeathed when the tax became due and payable.[16] By the terms of the amendment of March 2, 1901, the tax was due and payable in one year after the death of the testator. The tax was to be deducted from a beneficial interest before payment or distribution. The tax on reversionary interests was payable when the beneficiaries entered into the possession and enjoyment of the legacies.[17]

4. The Repealing Act and Its Effect. The tax was repealed to take effect July 1, 1902.[18] The effect of the repeal was to exempt from taxation after July 1, 1902, all legacies except such as should have become previously taxable. A tax not demandable at the time the repeal took effect could not thereafter be exacted by the government.[19] Legacy taxes, which were due and payable one year after the death of the testator were not collectable on the estates of persons who died within one year prior to July 1, 1902.[20]

5. Act of 1902. The law provided for refunding legacy taxes collected on contingent beneficial interests not vested prior to July 1, 1902, and no tax was assessable on any such interests not vested prior to that date.[21] Where property was bequeathed in trust the income therefrom to be paid to the testator's widow for life, with remainder to the testator's children living at the time of her death and the lawful issue of deceased children, the remainder so created was contin-

VIII. STAMP TAXES.[25]

A. Stamp Taxes on Instruments Under Former Laws — 1. Purpose, Construction, and Operation. Former acts of congress required stamps to be affixed to certain instruments, such as conveyances, leases, manifests, probates, powers of attorney, checks, drafts, bills of exchange, bills of lading, bonds, certificates of stocks, insurance policies, etc.[26] The object of the law was to raise revenue and not to invalidate contracts or inflict penalties, and courts should give it a liberal construction.[27] Stamp laws are in restraint of common right and not to be extended by construction to cases that do not come clearly within their terms.[28] The liability of an instrument to stamp duty, as well as the amount of such duty, is determined by the form and face of the instrument, and cannot be affected by proof of facts outside of the instrument itself.[29] Congress intended to exempt from the stamp tax instruments or documents executed for or in behalf of a state, county, town, or other municipal corporation, to enable it to perform its ordinary governmental or municipal functions.[30]

2. Validity and Admissibility in Evidence of Unstamped Instruments — a. In General. Many questions arose as to the validity of instruments, or their admissibility as evidence, when not stamped as provided, and conflicting decisions were rendered. There were authorities holding that instruments were inadmissible as evidence in state courts unless stamped as prescribed by law.[31] In other cases, however, it was held that it belongs to the states exclusively to declare what shall be received as evidence in their own courts, and the preponderance of decisions was to the effect that the provision of the law that certain papers not stamped should not be received as evidence must be limited in their operations to the federal courts;[32] and according to the great weight of authority, omission to attach the required stamp to an instrument did not render it invalid or inadmissible in evidence, either in a federal or a state court, unless such omission was fraudulent or designed to evade the duty.[33] It has also been held that an instrument executed in England where the revenue laws require it to be stamped, and

b. Admissibility as Evidence For Collateral Purposes. The statute cannot be regarded as prohibiting the use as evidence of unstamped instruments for collateral purposes.[35] The prohibition was upon their offer as evidence when relied upon as valid instruments for the purpose for which they were drawn.[36] When an unstamped instrument is the subject of a crime, it is immaterial whether it is stamped or not.[37]

3. Presumption and Burden of Proof as to Invalidity of Unstamped Instrument. Fraudulent intent will not be presumed, but must be affirmatively shown.[38] When an instrument has the required stamp and is offered in evidence, the presumption will prevail that it was stamped at the proper time, by the proper person, and in the proper sum.[39] The burden is on the party disputing the validity of an instrument, because unstamped, to show that the stamp was omitted with intent to evade the law.[40]

4. Admissibility to Record of Unstamped Documents. It was not lawful to record an instrument not properly stamped.[41] But the provision that no unstamped instrument required to be stamped shall be recorded applied only to Penal statutes are strictly construed, and presumptions of guilt not indulged upon facts consistent with the opposite hypothesis or that of innocence. 5. Stamps on Instruments Used in Legal Proceedings.[44] The internal revenue acts requiring stamps on writs and other processes of state courts were generally held an unconstitutional interference with their proceedings, it being beyond the power of the federal government to impose any burden on the procedure of state courts.[45] The provisions of the act of 1898 requiring stamps to be attached to certain instruments did not apply to instruments used in legal proceedings in state courts.[46]

trial,[49] or after verdict in court.[50] Deeds or other instruments executed during the civil war were valid and admissible as evidence, although not stamped at the time of their execution, provided that, after the close of the war, they were stamped by the proper revenue officer.[51] The court will take judicial notice of the existence of the conditions referred to during the Civil war.[52] Under the act of 1898 a stamp could be affixed at any time before the instrument was offered in evidence.[53]

7. CANCELLATION OF STAMPS. Stamps were required to be canceled to prevent their use a second time, either by the maker or by the party for whose use and benefit the instrument was made.[54] A stamp on a note may be canceled by the initials of the payee or by those of the maker.[55] A stamp is effectually canceled when it is so defaced that it cannot be used a second time.[56] The sufficiency of the cancellation is not affected by the failure to affix the initials of the party's name.[57] An instrument duly stamped could be read in evidence, although the stamp was not canceled.[58] Irregularity in canceling did not affect its validity as evidence.[59] The question of cancellation is one for the jury.[60]

B. Stamp Tax on Commodities or Specific Articles Under Former Laws. b. Memoranda of Speculative Stock Transactions. In the case of speculative transactions conducted on margins where no actual delivery was contemplated, it was the duty of persons conducting such business to give to parties with whom transactions were had stamped memoranda.[86] Where deals were made through an agent, only one transaction was taxable.[87] Corporations engaged in conducting transactions respecting the purchase and sale of stocks to be settled with reference to the public market quotation of prices, through correspondents, whose orders represented orders from their own customers, were required to give memoranda and pay the stamp tax thereon, as such transactions were transactions between principals.[88] Where after an agreement to sell stock for future delivery there was no actual delivery but a settlement was made by payment of differences such settlement did not require new memoranda to be made and stamped.[89]

c. Deeds Under Judicial Sales. Deeds of masters in chancery under decree of a federal court, and sale thereunder, were required to be stamped; the stamps may be paid for, as expenses, out of the funds in the hands of the receiver.[90] Congress has no power to impose a stamp tax on a certificate of sale of land for taxes issued by state authority,[91] nor to require a revenue stamp on a tax deed executed under the laws of a state.[92]

2. Admissibility in Evidence of Unstamped Instruments. Unstamped instruments were not ordinarily competent evidence in United States courts under the Revenue Act of 1898.[93] This act was substantially identical with that of 1864 in respect to the inadmissibility of unstamped instruments as evidence, and it appeared to be the prevailing opinion that congress had no power to prescribe rules of evidence for state courts and that the provisions of the Stamp Act in this respect were not intended to govern such tribunals, but were applicable to federal courts only.[94] In any event the act applied only to instruments where the stamp had been fraudulently omitted. It was essential that the omission to stamp the instrument was with the intent to evade payment of revenue.[95]

3. Medicinal Preparations. Patent medicines and other proprietary articles were taxable under the War Revenue Act.[96] Uncompounded medicinal drugs or chemicals were exempt.[97] Plasters put up in style or manner similar to that of patent, trade-mark, or proprietary medicines in general, and advertised as remedies, or as having a special claim to merit, were taxable.[98] These taxes were repealed on and after July 1, 1902.[99]

D. Who Required to Affix Stamps. The person executing a document is the one to affix the stamp,[1] or the party for whose use or benefit the instrument was issued.[2] In the case of telegraphic despatches the sender of the message was required to affix the stamp.[3] Carriers were required to affix stamps to receipts given to shippers, but they were not forbidden to shift the burden of the tax by an increase of rates which were not unreasonable.[4]

E. Number of Stamps Required. Only one stamp was required upon two separate papers which constituted one transaction.[5]

F. Validating Unstamped Instruments. The war revenue law provides for the validating of instruments subject to stamp tax which were unstamped at the time they were issued. The party can appear before the collector and pay a penalty and the collector makes a notation which validates the document so that it can be used in court as if originally stamped.[6] Prior stamp acts contained a similar provision.[7] The subsequent stamping by the collector and remission of penalties does not cure the defect in such a sense as to interfere with intervening rights.[8] It has been held that deputy collectors have the same power as collectors to validate unstamped instruments,[9] although there are decisions to the contrary.[10] The object of the penal provisions of the Stamp Act was to secure observance of its requirements, and since the law is no longer in force there is not the same necessity for literal compliance with the form prescribed for supplying omissions. If the full price of the stamp is paid and the penalty it is not necessary that the collector should affix and cancel the stamp.[11]

State agents.— Persons who sell spirits are not relieved from liability by the fact that they have no interest in the property and are simply agents of a state. The exemption of state agencies from national taxation is liminterstate business can no more escape it than those doing business wholly within one state.[13]

2. Constitutionality of Laws. Congress has power to pass a law imposing special tax on occupations which are subject to police regulations by states.[14] Such law is constitutional and entirely consistent with the right of the states to tax, or regulate any business carried on within its limits.[15]

3. Payment of Tax No Defense For Violating Other Liquor Laws. The stamp issued in payment of the special tax is merely a receipt for the tax. It is not a license and cannot afford any protection to the holder from prosecution for doing business in violation of state or local laws.[16] The payment of special tax is no defense to a prosecution for illegally selling liquors in Alaska,[17] nor for the introduction of liquors into the Indian country in violation of law.[18]

4. Payment Not Retroactive to Condone Offense. After the offense of carrying on business without payment of special tax has been committed its payment does not condone the offense and is not a bar to prosecution.[19]

B. Special Taxes Now in Force — 1. In General. The law now in force imposes special taxes upon brewers, rectifiers, wholesale and retail liquor dealers, wholesale and retail dealers in malt liquors, manufacturers of oleomargarine, wholesale and retail dealers in oleomargarine artificially colored, wholesale and retail dealers in oleomargarine free from artificial coloration, wholesale and retail dealers in filled cheese, manufacturers of filled cheese, manufacturers of adulterated butter, wholesale and retail dealers in adulterated butter, manufacturers of renovated butter, manufacturers of mixed flour, and manufacturers of stills.[20] Special taxpayers are required to place and keep conspicuously in their places of business stamps denoting the payment of special tax.[21] And every collector is required to keep a record in his office of all persons who have paid special taxes in his district, which is open to public inspection.[22]

2. CHANGE OF FIRM. Additional special tax is not required in case of a change of firm, one or more of its members succeeding to and carrying on the business at the same place,[23] or at the place to which the business may be transferred.[24]

C. Wholesale Liquor Dealers — 1. WHO ARE WHOLESALE LIQUOR DEALERS. Persons who sell or offer for sale spirits or wines in quantities of five gallons or over are required to pay a special tax as wholesale liquor dealears.[25] The words "sells or offers for sale" are used in their legal sense.[26] Legally qualified distillers or brewers who sell only distilled spirits or malt liquors of their own production at the place of manufacture, in the original casks or packages, are not required to pay special tax as wholesale dealers.[27] Commission merchants who, at the request of foreign correspondents, purchase liquors in quantity, and take charge of shipping the same, and charge costs and their commissions, are liable as "wholesale liquor dealers."[28] If spirits are sold in wholesale quantities the seller is a wholesale dealer, although the spirits are delivered in retail quantities.[29] A retail liquor dealer may sell different packages of different liquors at the same time, aggregating over five gallons, without being liable as a wholesale dealer, provided no single package equals that amount.[30] It is the actual quantity sold and not the pretended or nominal quantity that determines the liability.[31]

2. PLACE OF SALE AND PAYMENT OF TAX. The place where the delivery, either actual or constructive, which transfers ownership from the vendor to the vendee is made, is the place of sale, at which the person selling should pay the tax. Goods are offered for sale at the place where they are kept for sale. They are not offered for sale elsewhere by sending abroad an agent with samples, or by establishing an office for the purpose of taking orders.[32]

3. SEIZURE AND PROSECUTION FOR FAILURE TO PAY SPECIAL TAX. The wine and distilled spirits owned by a wholesale liquor dealer are not forfeited by reason of

32. U. S. v. Chevalier, 107 Fed. 434, 46 C. C. A. 402 [affirming 102 Fed. 125], defendant, a wholesale liquor dealer in San Francisco, maintained a branch house in Portland, where samples of his trade were kept. The sales were made at San Francisco, notwithstanding the agent may have been authorized to make binding contracts and collected the purchase-money at the office in Portland.

A dealer can fill orders at his place of business for which he has paid special tax and send the liquor to persons at a distance, but cannot legally make sales along the road. U. S. v. Durham, 33 Fed. 834.

Constructive delivery.— Where orders for spirits are received at a place of business where the requisite special-tax stamps are held, and they are duly accepted there, the subsequent delivery of the spirits from a place of storage elsewhere does not necessitate the payment of special tax at such storage house. A sale by a wholesale liquor dealer in New York of liquors stored in New Orleans and there delivered to the purchaser does not subject the seller to a second tax as wholesale liquor dealer at New Orleans. De Bary v. Souer, 101 Fed. 425, 41 C. C. A. 417.

failure to pay special tax.[33] In prosecutions for selling at wholesale, without payment of special tax, it is not incumbent upon the government to prove that the gallon measure used conformed to the legal standard; nor to prove that each gallon contained a gallon of proof spirits.[34]

D. Retail Liquor Dealers[35] — 1. In General. Retail liquor dealers are those who sell or offer to sell spirits or wines in quantities less than five gallons. One is liable if he has liquor on hand to be sold to any one who applies for it.[36] He need not keep a shop or store or carry on the business for a livelihood.[37] It makes no difference if the proceeds of the sale are to be used for a charitable purpose.[38]

2. Clubs Selling to Members. Any class of selling, although to a restricted class of persons, and without a view to profit, is within the meaning of the law. Clubs owning liquors and selling to members are liable to the tax,[39] but not canteens or post exchanges under the complete control of the secretary of war as governmental agencies.[40]

3. Physicians and Druggists. The law does not treat distilled spirits as a drug or medicine, and neither physicians nor druggists can sell it even on prescription without payment of the special tax as liquor dealer.[41] The tax is not imposed upon apothecaries as to wines or liquors used exclusively in the preparation or making up of medicines which cannot be used as beverages.[42]

4. Sale of Medicinal Preparations. Medicinal preparations like "tonic bitters" may be sold by a druggist or other person without incurring liability.[43] The fact that a compound may be used as a medicine, and may be so intended by the person making it, does not relieve the seller from the liability to the tax, if the compound is intoxicating, and is not sold as medicine. The true intent in all such cases is: Was the compound sold in good faith for medicinal purposes only, or was it sold as a beverage, or sold knowingly to persons who bought for use as a beverage?[44] The law is not to be avoided by mere deceptive names, and if beverages in which the essential ingredient is distilled spirits, disguised by aromatic or other drugs, are commonly bought and sold as and for intoxicating beverages the seller is liable to the tax as a retail liquor dealer.[45] A party selling brandy peaches or like preparations is liable as a liquor dealer, if the fruit is added as a mere disguise, and the spirits and not the ingredients contained in the package is the inducement to the sale.[46]

5. Persons Negotiating Sales For Others. A party who sells spirits cannot escape liability on the ground that he is acting as agent of a distilling company if he purchases the goods and they are charged to him by the company, and the company looks to him for payment.[47] The seller is liable irrespective of the manner or mode in which the liquors are procured from the manufacturers. It is not necessary that he should be the owner.[48] If a person buys spirits in his own name, and has the same billed to him in his own name, and deals it out from time to time as called for, he is a retail liquor dealer, although the liquor was disposed of without profit to himself, and he purchased it with money advanced by others.[49]

6. Occasional or Single Sales. Proof of a single act of selling or offering for sale has been held sufficient;[50] but in case of a single sale it may be a good defense to show that it was exceptional, accidental, or made under circumstances which indicate that it was not the business of the vendor.[51] It is for the jury to decide how many sales and what appointments are necessary to constitute the business.[52]

7. Spirits Shipped to Be Paid For on Delivery. According to the weight of authority where a seller accepts an order for goods at his place of business, by delivering the goods to a carrier to be transported and delivered to the purchaser, at another place, on payment of the price in accordance with the terms of the order, the sale is made and the title passes at the time and place of such delivery to the carrier, subject to the seller's right of stoppage in transitu, and the seller is not liable to pay a special tax at the place of delivery.[53] The carrier is simply the agent of the seller for the purpose of collecting the purchase-price, and is not subject to indictment for making a sale at the place of delivery.[54] The order to the carrier to collect on delivery is a mere provision for the retention of the seller's lien.[55] A delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the buyer and the title then and there passes.[56] But there are cases holding that a sale of goods to be paid for on delivery is not complete until the goods are actually delivered to the buyer and paid for, and the seller and the express agent, if he acts knowingly in

E. Rectifiers. A rectifier is not merely a person who runs spirits through charcoal but any one who rectifies or purifies spirits in any manner whatever, or who makes any mixture of spirits with anything else, and sells it under any name is a rectifier.[58] A retail liquor dealer who mixes whisky with water and sugar or other substances and keeps the same in stock for sale is subject to tax as a rectifier.[59] The addition to spirits of water only does not change the spirits into a spurious imitation or compound liquor, and the special tax of a rectifier is not required to be paid on this account.[60]

F. Dealers in Malt Liquors. A wholesale dealer in malt liquors is one who sells or offers for sale malt liquors in quantities of five gallons or over at one time, but who does not deal in spirituous liquors at wholesale.[61] A brewer can sell his original stamped packages of malt liquor anywhere in the United States without incurring liability to special tax as a wholesale dealer.[62] A retail dealer in malt liquors is one who sells or offers for sale malt liquors in less quantity than five gallons at one time, but who does not deal in spirituous liquors.[63]

G. Dealers in Oleomargarine. Parties selling oleomargarine are liable to a special tax, although they are ignorant that the substance is oleomargarine.[64] One sale is sufficient to constitute the party making it a dealer. A merchant does not become a dealer by permitting packages to be shipped in his name simply as an accommodation and a guarantee that the price would be paid when he derived no profit therefrom.[65]

X. DISTILLED SPIRITS.

A. Distilled Spirits and Distillers Defined. The term "distilled spirits" is confined to the product of distillation.[66] A "distiller" is one who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash, fit for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who, by any process of evaporation, separates alcoholic spirit from any fermented substance, or who, making or keeping mash, wort, or wash, has also in his possession or use a still.[67] A manufacturer of apple brandy is included in the meaning of the word "distiller."[68] It is not necessary that the spirits produced should be of any particular degree of strength.[69] To make one in possession of a still a distiller because he keeps mash, wort, or wash, the mash, wort, or wash must be such as will produce spirits on distillation.[70] All persons having an interest in the business are considered distillers and subject to the provisions of the law.[71] It is not necessary that the party should carry on the business personally,[72] but a direct interest in the business must be shown.[73] Corporations may carry on the business of distilling. The stock-holders are individually liable for taxes due, notwithstanding any state statute regulating the liability of stock-holders in a corporation organized under state laws.[74]

B. General Superintendence of Business of Distillers Authorized. The complete superintending control of the business of distillers is exercised by the government, and when they enter the business they contract to submit to this governmental surveillance.[75] Revenue officers are vested with a power of visitation for the purpose of inspecting the operations of distillers, wholesale liquor dealers, and rectifiers.[76] The stringent provisions of the law requiring the apparatus at distilleries to be constructed so as to prevent abstraction of spirits were intended to prevent fraud and to secure the tax.[77]

Under Act July 20, 1868 (15 U. S. St. at L. 125), the tax was fifty cents per gallon, but there was an additional tax of four dollars per barrel of forty proof gallons, also a capacity tax, and a requirement of reimbursement by the distiller of the sums paid by the government for gagers' fees and storekeepers' salaries. By the act of June 6, 1872, taking effect Aug. 1, 1872, the barrel tax and capacity tax and the reimbursement provision were repealed, and a tax of by the manufacturer, even in the case of their destruction, unless the circumstances on which he relies for exemption come within the particular description in some one of the remedial statutes.[80] The tax is payable by stamps issued by collectors which are nothing more than receipts, and are worthless as receipts to other parties than those to whom they are issued.[81]

3. Lien For Tax and Its Operation.[82] There is a special provision for a lien for the tax upon distilled spirits, by virtue of which the spirits, stills, distillery, and the lot or tract of land on which it is situated are made liable from the moment the spirits come into existence.[83] The lien is absolute and unconditional and good against innocent purchasers for value.[84] The lien follows the spirits everywhere, and any person into whose possession they come, without the tax thereon having been paid, is bound to pay it.[85] The tax is a first lien on spirits deposited in a warehouse.[86] The purchaser takes the property subject to the lien not only of the tax levied pursuant to the report of the distiller, but to any additional tax that may be assessed by the commissioner under the law.[87] The lien on the land means a lien on the interest of the distiller in the land and the interest of the party signing the consent.[88] If distillery property is sold it remains liable to the lien. The purchaser is bound to take notice of the use which had been made of the premises before he acquired title.[89] The lien is valid against subsequent judgments on the distiller's real and personal estate. Personal property of a distiller, not located on the distillery premises nor used in the process of distilling, is not subject to this lien.[90] When spirits are forfeited and sold, the proceeds should be first applied to the payment of the tax.[91] When the property is sold under decree of forfeiture without reservation, the marshal's deed to the purchaser conveys whatever interest the United States had therein, and the government is estopped from setting up the lien.[92]

4. Exceptions to Operation of Tax. The act of Aug. 28, 1894, made a provision for exemption from tax of alcohol to be used in the arts or medicinal compounds under regulations to be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury.[93]

This act was never carried into execution, being repealed before any regulations were issued.[94] The making of regulations was a condition precedent, and the secretary having found it impracticable to make proper regulations without further legislation, no right of rebate arose under the statute.[95] A vinegar manufacturer may make mash, wort, or wash, and employ vaporizing process under certain restrictions.[96]

D. Regulations and Requirements in Regard to Distillers — 1. Bonds — a. In General. The distiller must before commencing business and annually thereafter execute a bond in the form prescribed.[97] The condition of the bond is that the principal shall in all respects comply with the law in relation to his business.[98] It is an obligation to pay all penalties incurred or fines imposed[99] as well as the tax on spirits distilled.[1] The execution of a warehousing bond covering spirits placed in a warehouse does not release liability on the annual bond.[2] Stock-holders of a corporation engaged in distilling cannot be accepted as sureties.[3] The laws in regard to bonds are not to be regarded as penal but remedial, to be liberally construed to give full effect to the purposes of their enactment.[4] A bond is not invalid because it contains conditions in excess of the statutory requirements. If voluntarily given it is binding.[5] Where a bond contains conditions, some of which are legal and others illegal, and they are severable and separable, the latter may be disregarded and the former enforced.[6] Any private agreement made by an officer which in any way changes the terms of the bond is as to the government inoperative and void. He cannot in any way change the terms of the bond required by law.[7] A married woman authorized by the state law to carry on the business of a distiller for her sole and separate benefit has legal capacity to bind herself by such bond.[8]

b. Irregularities in the Execution. Sureties signing a bond, having an understanding with the principal that other sureties were to be obtained before its delivery, cannot, if the bond is regular upon its face, be relieved from liability on account of such private understanding, the government having no notice of the condition.[9] A bond delivered by the surety to the principal on condition was held an escrow till the condition be performed.[10] A bond, executed in blank as to the quantity of spirits and amount secured, is not binding unless ratified after the blanks are filled. A ratification for a firm may be made by one member. It is not invalid when signed by a clerk in the name of the principal with his authority.[11] Any objection to form should be made when the bond is presented for execution.[12]

c. Scope of Obligation. The liability is not to be extended beyond the terms of the contract, and sureties are not liable when the business is carried on at a place other than that mentioned in the bond.[13] Sureties are liable for what was fairly contemplated by the parties at the time of the execution of the bond.[14] They are presumed to know the law and to contract with reference to all of its provisions.[15] The liability on the bond is only to the extent of the damage sustained.[16] The bond covers not merely duties imposed by existing law, but duties belonging to and naturally connected with the business imposed by subsequent law.[17] They are within the reasonable contemplation and evident intention of the parties to such a contract.[18]

d. Defenses on Suits on Bonds. Although the law declares that no suit shall be maintained for the recovery of any tax illegally assessed, until an appeal has first been made to the commissioner of internal revenue, this does not prevent defendant in a suit brought by the government for taxes from setting up as a defense the erroneous assessment or illegality of the tax.[19] If property is bid in by the government for the tax it extinguishes the debt, and suit cannot afterward be maintained on the bond for its collection.[20] The laches of officers or agents of the government does not relieve sureties.[21] The negligence of officers in failing to collect the tax at the proper time does not preclude the United States from recovering the tax in a suit upon the bond.[22] Alteration of the bond by substituting a surety for one given in the bond discharges the other sureties, where the substitution was without their knowledge or consent.[23]

3. DISTILLERY WAREHOUSES. The distiller must provide a warehouse for the storage of spirits, and must give a bond conditioned that he will pay the tax upon the spirits deposited therein before removal, and within eight years from date of entry.[25] Distillery warehouses are deemed bonded warehouses of the United States,[26] and are in the joint custody of the internal revenue storekeeper and the proprietor.[27] The court will take judicial notice that the statute requires every distiller to provide such a warehouse; and a jury may legally act on the presumption that the distiller has a warehouse, as required by the statute.[28] Depositing spirits in the warehouse does not make them the property of the government.[29] They remain the property of the distiller,[30] but are virtually in the possession of the United States held for the tax.[31] The government assumes no responsibility for their security except what is necessary for its own purposes. The deposit is solely for the benefit of the distiller, and to enable him to give a bond for the tax instead of paying it at once.[32] The spirits are in the custody and control of the owner so as to make them liable to forfeiture for fraudulent acts.[33] The party placing spirits in the warehouse has an insurable interest to the amount of the value of the spirits and the tax.[34] An insurance policy without reference to the tax entitles the assured to include the tax in his recovery in case of loss, if the assured is liable.[35] The destruction of spirits by fire in a warehouse constitutes a removal so as to make the tax payable before expiration of the bonded period.[36] No spirits can be legally removed from the warehouse at any other time than after sunrise and before sunset, but in case of a fire at night it would be the duty of the warehouseman to disregard the statute, when its observance would inevitably result in the destruction of the property.[37] Spirits cannot remain on storage in warehouse after payment of the tax.[38] These warehouses being agencies of the United States are subject to their exclusive regulation. The provisions of state laws are inoperative as against spirits held therein.[39] Spirits in warehouse are not liable to seizure by a sheriff under state process.[40] A sheriff under an execution may sell the spirits without entering the warehouse and making a seizure, and the purchaser will acquire the title of the owner.[41]

4. WAREHOUSING BONDS. The warehousing bond taken for the express purpose of securing the payment of the tax on the spirits deposited in warehouses is not a substitute for the distiller's annual bond, but is cumulative.[42] An annual bond may be given or a monthly warehousing bond, as the distiller elects. Stock-holders of a corporation engaged in distilling cannot be accepted as sureties on these bonds.[43] If spirits are stolen from the warehouse through neglect of the internal revenue officers to provide sufficient locks, it is no defense to a suit on the bond to recover the tax.[44] An abatement of the tax on spirits destroyed in the warehouse operates as a cancellation of the bond and it is not revived by a revocation of the order of abatement.[45] The bond is not liable for the tax on spirits which are forfeited and sold subject to tax. If the tax is paid, the object of the bond is accomplished, and it becomes functus officio.[46]

5. SURVEY OF DISTILLERIES. A survey of the distillery is required for the purpose of determining its true spirit-producing capacity, a copy of which should be delivered to the distiller to fix his liability.[47] The survey and estimate of producing capacity are conclusive, while they remain, although subject to revision, under the direction of the commissioner of internal revenue.[48] The commissioner may at any time direct a new survey, if he is satisfied that the one already made is in any way incorrect or needs revision.[49] But if an assessor changes the capacity of a distillery, without a new survey, the assessment based thereon is illegal.[50]

6. METERS. Congress has the power to compel distillers to affix certain meters to their stills as a condition precedent to carrying on their business.[51]

7. SIGNS. Every distiller is required to keep conspicuously on his distillery a sign, showing the name or firm of the distiller, with the words, "registered distillery,"[52] and it is an offense to work in a distillery on which no sign is placed.[53]

8. Distillers Books. Distillers are required to keep books according to the form prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue.[54] They can be seized and used as evidence on the trial of a libel for forfeiture filed against the distillery.[55] In proceedings in rem against the distillery, the private books of the distiller are proper subjects of examination under the orders of the court.[56] The distiller cannot be allowed to say that he has kept a private record of his transactions. The government has a right to see any record kept by him of his business.[57]

9. Exemptions in Favor of Fruit Distillers. A distiller of brandy from fruit is exempted from certain requirements but not from payment of tax on the spirits produced.[58] The regulations providing exemption from the requirement to provide a bonded warehouse were authorized.[59]

E. Withdrawal of Spirits From Warehouse — 1. In General. In case of excessive loss of spirits in warehouse the commissioner has authority to order their withdrawal before the bonded period has expired, and to require payment of the tax on the quantity originally entered.[60] Distilled spirits may be exported to a foreign country free of tax, under a through bond, or for shipment to a port of export under a transportation bond.[61] The execution of the bond frees the spirits for the time being from obligation to pay the tax, and from the operation of the distiller's warehousing bond.[62] Spirits can be shipped to the Philippine Islands under the same regulations that apply to exportation to a foreign country.[63] The withdrawal of spirits from a bonded warehouse for consumption on a foreign war vessel is not an exportation.[64] It is a criminal offense to intentionally reland within the jurisdiction of the United States spirits shipped for export, and the spirits relanded are liable to forfeiture.[65] Spirits purchased by the United States while in a bonded warehouse, and withdrawn "free of tax," are thereby withdrawn from the operation of the internal revenue laws, and there is no occasion for the regaging and adjustment of the tax thereon.[66]

2. Transportation Bonds. If the government prevents the performance of the condition of a transportation bond by the seizure of the spirits, it is estopped from recovering upon such a breach.[67] Bonds given to secure removals are valid to secure the performance of their conditions after repeal of the law allowing removals under bond. The repeal of the law cannot destroy the contract and put an end to the right of the government to the tax.[68]

Spirits withdrawn for transportation under a repealed act.— U. S. v. Bennett, 15 Wall. (U. S.) 660, 21 L. ed. 104.

F. Assessments Against Distillers — 1. For Deficiency in Production. The producing capacity of a distillery, and not the amount of spirits produced, is made the measure of taxation.[69] The distiller must pay a tax on eighty per cent of the estimated producing capacity of the distillery, whether the spirits are actually produced or not, and assessments are made for deficiencies.[70] A regular suspension of work by a distiller relieves him from assessment for taxation during the interval between the time he so regularly suspends work and the time he actually resumes.[71] The commissioner has power to prescribe the mode and time when a legal suspension can take place in a distillery.[72]

2. For Excess of Materials Used. In cases where material for distillation is used in excess of the quantity allowed by the survey the distiller is liable to an assessment for tax on spirits that should have been produced from the material used in excess, whether the quantity reported made equals or exceeds eighty per cent of the producing capacity of the distillery.[73] The statute does not make the average daily capacity the standard, but merely the capacity of the distillery. The distiller cannot be assessed for an excess of material used over his surveyed capacity in one month when such excess will be balanced by a corresponding deficiency in the next month.[74] The object was to secure payment of the tax and not to impose a penalty for over-production. Double taxation was not intended.[75] To sustain the theory that a given amount of material will produce a certain quantity of spirits, it must be shown that this is a necessary and unavoidable inference from the facts proved.[76]

3. Relief From Assessments. In case there has been a failure to produce the quantity of spirits required by the survey where such failure was not occasioned by want of diligence or by any fraudulent purpose, but was the result of a misunderstanding of the law and regulations, or was occasioned by unavoidable accident, the commissioner is authorized to allow claims for abatement or refund. The courts themselves do not possess the power.[77] This power, it has been said, is essentially identical with that relating to the abatement and refund of taxes in general.[78]

G. Allowance For Tax on Spirits Destroyed. The distiller is released from payment of tax upon spirits destroyed by accident while in process of manufacture, and before being placed in the distillery warehouse, and when destroyed in the distillery warehouse.[79] The secretary of the treasury has jurisdiction of claims for refund founded on the destruction by casualty of spirits in the custody of an officer of internal revenue, and his decision is final.[80] Allowance for losses by leakage or evaporation rests upon the express provisions of the statutes, and when none is provided for in the law the courts can make none no matter how strong the equity may be.[81] It is the general policy of the law to allow loss by leakage in transportation.[82] Where distillers ship spirits to points within the United States under bond for foreign exportation and then change their minds and put the spirits on the home market, they will not be entitled to the allowance for leakage in transportation.[83] An allowance may be made for leakage or loss by unavoidable accident occurring during transportation from a distillery warehouse to the port of export, but not for loss in the warehouse after filing the export bond and before withdrawal.[84] Allowance is made for loss in warehouse under certain conditions and limitations.[85] In any assessment growing out of the regage or claim for loss an appeal lies to the commissioner of internal revenue whose decisions are final.[86]

H. Wholesale Liquor Dealers and Rectifiers — 1. Books to Be Kept. Wholesale liquor dealers and rectifiers are required to keep a book, and to make a monthly return under oath to the collector.[87] The record must show from whom the spirits were purchased or received,[88] and to whom the spirits are to be sent. It is required to be kept by dealers in foreign as well as domestic spirits.[89] Where parties are both wholesale and retail liquor dealers at the same place, spirits received should be entered in the book and entry made of transfer to themselves as retail liquor dealers.[90] A wholesale dealer in malt liquors is not required to keep the book.[91] Penalties are provided for the refusal or neglect to keep the book,[92] without regard to the question of intent.[93] Ambiguous entries in the book are to be taken most strongly against the rectifier where discrepancies are not explained.[94]

2. RECOVERING SPIRITS FROM EMPTY PACKAGES. The recovery of distilled spirits from empty distiller's packages by the use of steam or hot water is tantamount to the production of spirits, and the person who recovers such spirits is held liable as a distiller.[95] A rectifier may recover from charcoal used in the purification or rectification of spirits, the spirits remaining in it.[96]

3. MARKS AND BRANDS ON RECTIFIERS' AND WHOLESALE LIQUOR DEALERS' PACKAGES. Packages of spirits put up by rectifiers and wholesale liquor dealers, containing five gallons or more, are required to be stamped and branded.[97]

4. REGULATIONS AUTHORIZED. The marks and stamps required by the regulations to be placed on wholesale liquor dealers' packages are marks and stamps required by law.[98] The regulations in regard to rectifiers and prescribing the form of notice of intention to rectify are authorized.[99]

I. Penalties and Forfeitures[1] — 1. SETTING UP A STILL WITHOUT PERMIT OR GIVING BOND. The law provided penalty and forfeiture for setting up a still to be used for the purpose of distilling without first obtaining a permit from the collector.[2] If parties commence distilling without giving a bond or before complying with the preliminary requirements of the law, they commit the offense of carrying on an illicit distillery.[3] The act makes it an offense to carry on the business without first giving the bond. An intention to defraud need not be proved.[4]

2. DISTILLING ON CERTAIN PROHIBITED PREMISES. Distilling on premises where vinegar is manufactured is prohibited.[5] The prohibition of a distillery within six hundred feet of a rectifying establishment is not an unwarrantable interference with the use and disposition of property.[6]

3. DEFRAUDING OR ATTEMPTING TO DEFRAUD — a. In General. Carrying on the business of a distiller without having given bond, or with intent to defraud the United States of the tax, is punishable by fine and imprisonment, and forfeiture of the distillery and of all distilled spirits owned by such person, wherever found, and of the right, title, and interest of such person, in the land on which such distillery is situated.[7] The punishment is not simply for intent to defraud, but for the act of engaging in and carrying on the business with that intent.[8] All things which are part of the unlawful business and are found within the same inclosure, whether inside or outside the building, are forfeited, and all articles appropriated to such business so found are prima facie presumed to be connected with the fraud.[9] The connivance of a government storekeeper with the frauds committed does not exempt the property from forfeiture.[10] Whoever aids in the act of illegal distilling is amenable to the penal provisions of the law without regard to ownership of the still or its product.[11] All who knowingly aid are alike guilty.[12] One employed as laborer in a distillery is not carrying on the business of a distiller.[13] A part owner is liable if he knows that the law is being transgressed by his coöwner or any other person with the still; and it is immaterial that he does not share in the spirits produced, or in the profits.[14]

b. Forfeiture of Real Estate. The law forfeiting the distillery and real estate for frauds committed is constitutional.[15] The land which is connected with the distillery, and used to facilitate the carrying on of the business is forfeited, but not pastures, orchards, and vineyards which are not connected with the distillery, otherwise than that they are contiguous and under the same ownership.[16] The forfeiture of real estate does not reach beyond the interest of the distiller, or of such persons as have consented to the carrying on of the business upon the premises.[17] The interest of an innocent mortgagee or other person having a lien on the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated is not included in a forfeiture for acts of the owner only.[18] A mortgage given by the distiller before the unlawful acts were committed is good as against the United States, if the business was not carried on by the mortgagee's permission or connivance.[19]

c. Forfeiture of Personal Property — (I) IN GENERAL. All personal property employed in the business of illicit distilling is subject to forfeiture irrespective of ownership.[20] Spirits found on the premises are forfeited and spirits owned by the distiller wherever found.[21] The removal of distilled spirits from a distillery to a bonded warehouse with intent to defraud forfeits the spirits even though the fraudulent intent was never carried out.[22]

(II) Personal Property Mortgaged. Personal property mortgaged, which remains in the possession of the owner, becomes forfeited by illegal acts of the owner, although the mortgagee is not shown to have been concerned in such acts.[23] Forfeiture of spirits at a distillery, fraudulently operated extends to the interest of a mortgagee, although ignorant of the frauds.[24] The forfeiture is of the thing itself, and not the interest of the mortgagor; and the mortgagee has no right to intervene to prevent forfeiture.[25] In the case of materials furnished a distillery in the erection of buildings and where mechanics' liens are filed in compliance with the state law, the court will allow their amount out of the proceeds of forfeiture in the registry of the court.[26]

d. Forfeiture of Leased Property. Where the owner leases a distillery for the purpose of distilling, the acts of the lessees in carrying on the business with intent to defraud subject the property to forfeture, although the owner be innocent. The owner who knowingly permits his land to be used for a distillery is responsible for its unlawful use.[27]

e. Liens on Spirits Not Subject of Illicit Operations. Forfeiture does not attach to spirits which have not been the subject of illicit operations, and have been disposed of to innocent parties for value. A bona fide mortgagee will be protected to the extent of his lien. The word "owner" is used in the popular sense.[28] Bona fide liens are protected, provided the liens are subsisting at the date of the seizure, and also at the time when the claims thereunder are passed upon by the court.[29] The fact that a person has, in good faith, made advances upon distilled spirits is no defense to an action for their forfeiture for not being properly marked and branded, or found elsewhere than in a distillery or a distillery warehouse, not having been removed therefrom according to law.[30] attempts to evade the payment of the tax on distilled spirits, he shall forfeit and pay double the amount of the tax so evaded or attempted to be evaded.[31]

4. Failing to Keep Books. Penalties are incurred, and the distillery, the land upon which it is located, and the personal property on the premises used in the business, are liable to forfeiture for failure to keep the required books, or for making false entries therein. Forfeiture does not include the interests of innocent third persons.[32] In a proceeding to enforce a forfeiture of property because of failure to keep the books, the burden is on the government to show that such failure or omission was with intent to defraud.[33]

5. Fraudulently Removing or Concealing Spirits.[34] The law provides a penalty for removing spirits on which the tax has not been paid to a place other than a distillery warehouse, or concealing spirits so removed, or aiding or abetting in the removal.[35] The statute was intended to punish the distiller and any one else who violated its provisions.[36] There must be a wilful purpose to defraud the government.[37] Conviction may be had if removal is proved, although concealment is not shown.[38] Any person having an interest in a distillery, who orders or sets on foot the removal of spirits illicitly, is liable, although not personally present at the time.[39] A person personally concerned in the removal may be guilty, whether he is interested in the spirits or not.[40] The aiding and abetting in the removal is a distinct offense, but does not prevent a person aiding and abetting from being convicted as a principal in the unlawful removal.[41] A removal procured by a false and fraudulent bond, although accepted by the collector, is not a removal according to law.[42] Rectifiers are liable to a penalty for receiving or rectifying distilled spirits produced at and removed from an illicit distillery or fraudulently removed from a registered distillery.[43]

6. Mixture of Fraudulent Spirits With Others. When distilled spirits forfeited to the United States are mixed with other spirits belonging to the same person (ignorant of the forfeiture), they are not lost to the government by such mixture. The government will be entitled to its proportion of the result.[44] If spirits liable to forfeiture are mixed with others and the identity of the goods destroyed the entire quantity is forfeited.[45] The forfeiture of goods not unlawfully stamped because found with other guilty goods is a proceeding highly penal in its character.[46]

7. Unlawful Purchase of Spirits. It is unlawful for any rectifier or wholesale or retail liquor dealer to purchase or receive spirits in quantities greater than twenty gallons from any person other than an authorized rectifier, distiller, or wholesale liquor dealer.[47] The word "receive" means receive for sale. Where a retail dealer receives spirits from any person other than one authorized to sell for storage only and not for sale, he does not incur the penalty.[48]

8. Non-Compliance With Requirements as to Marks and Brands — a. Absence of Stamps and Brands. The absence of any stamp or brand required by law from a package of distilled spirits containing five gallons or more works a forfeiture, the presumption being that the spirits are illicit.[49] This provision applies to portable casks and not to stand casks in a retail liquor dealer's saloon forming part of the fixtures.[50] The law does not forfeit spirits properly stamped, marked, and branded packed inside of a barrel which contained no brand,[51] nor where the stamps and brands are temporarily obscured by tacking a piece of newspaper over them.[52]

b. Discrepancy Between the Marks and Contents of Packages. If after packages have been stamped, branded, and marked so as to indicate the proof and quality of the contents other spirits are put into the packages the spirits are subject to forfeiture, irrespective of the question of frauds upon private individuals.[53] Spirits are forfeited if the stamps indicate a larger quantity of spirits than the capacity of the casks would permit to be placed therein;[54] also if the stamps are without date. If the dates have been removed through accidental causes, their absence is no ground of forfeiture.[55] A mere discrepancy in proof between the contents of a package and the proof marked thereon is not in itself sufficient evidence of fraud to justify forfeiture;[56] but if there is a wide difference between the marks and stamps and the contents of the package, irregularity or fraud is presumed.[57] Where packages containing spirits have once been properly stamped and marked, and the proper duties paid thereon, and after a sale of a portion of the contents and the residue is diluted with water only, the spirits are not liable to forfeiture.[58] Where the wine and proof gallons had been reduced by age below the original gage, the mere addition of water is not a change of package requiring a wholesale liquor dealer's stamp to be placed thereon.[59] It is doubtful whether a regulation which permits the reduction of the proof of liquors by the addition of water after the stamps have been affixed is valid, but the government is estopped from claiming forfeiture for an act done in conformity therewith.[60]

c. Shipping Liquors Under False Brands. If spirits, fermented liquors, or wines are shipped under other than their proper names or brands, as known to the trade, they are forfeited to the government and the shipper is liable to a fine, whether they are shipped in small packages like bottles or jugs, or in boxes or barrels.[61] The penalty is incurred whether the offense is committed knowingly or unintentionally.[62] The purpose of the statute is to aid in preventing frauds on the revenue, and the fact that its enforcement may incidentally protect trade-marks and prevent private frauds does not affect its validity.[63] The statute being highly penal must be strictly construed.[64] The law does not forbid a shipment without any designation whatever.[65] The statute applies only to distillers, rectifiers, brewers, manufacturers of wine, and wholesale dealers in liquors or wines.[66]

d. Failure to Obliterate Stamps and Brands From Empty Packages. Failing to efface and obliterate marks, stamps, and brands on spirit casks when the spirits are drawn off is punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is not discretionary with the court to either fine or imprison. The offender must be both fined and imprisoned,[67] although the offense was committed without fraudulent intent or any purpose to violate the law.[68] The words "at the time of emptying such cask" do not require the effacing and obliterating of the stamp to be done eo instanti that the cask is emptied.[69] If the stamps, marks, and brands were being effaced and obliterated, at the time of seizure, the same were in contemplation of law effaced and obliterated.[70] A transportation company is liable for receiving empty stamped barrels which had contained spirits, and ignorance will not relieve the party from the penalty imposed.[71] It is unlawful to sell an empty barrel or package which has contained any article upon which internal revenue tax has been paid, without first destroying the stamp.[72]

e. Removing Stamps From Packages and Having in Possession Used Stamps. To have in possession stamps that have been removed from packages without, at the time of removal, having been defaced and destroyed is an offense, whether the packages contained domestic or imported spirits. In the offense of removal of stamps, without destroying them, fraudulent intent is not made an ingredient,[73] nor is it in the offense of having possession of stamps once used.[74]

XI. TAX ON FERMENTED LIQUORS, TOBACCO, SNUFF AND CIGARS, OLEOMARGARINE, AND OTHER ARTICLES.

A. Fermented Liquors — 1. Rate of Tax. The tax on beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors is one dollar per barrel, containing not more than thirty-one gallons.[75] The word "gallon" means a wine gallon, the liquid measure containing two hundred and thirty-one cubic inches.[76] The tax must be paid by the brewer before removal from the brewery, and criminal liability incurred for not doing so does not depend upon actual intent to defraud.[77]

2. Brewer's Books. Books are required to be kept by the brewer which show or ought to show the actual production.[78] All malt liquor manufactured must be entered whether the brewer sells it to other brewers or to the public. The phrases "malt liquor" and "fermented liquor" are synonymous.[79] Materials purchased for the production of fermented liquor must also be entered. A book of general accounts kept by a brewer in conducting his business cannot be deemed such a book as the statute requires.[80]

3. Beer Stamps. Beer stamps are not articles of merchandise. They are merely evidence of payment of tax. The tax is paid when the brewer attaches the stamp to the barrels for the purpose of putting the produce upon the market.[81] A collector's duty is to keep on hand stamps equal to two months' sale thereof.

From June 14, 1898, to July 1, 1901 (Act June 13, 1898), two dollars. From July 1, 1901, to July 1, 1902 (Act March 2, 1901), one dollar and sixty cents. From July 1, 1902 (Act April 12, 1902, 32 U. Discount on stamps purchased.— Under the act of July 24, 1897, a brewer was required to pay the full face value of the stamps purchased, without deduction of the seven and one half per cent discount previously allowed. The act of June 13, 1898, increasing the tax to two dollars per barrel, restored the right

The law does not permit transactions for future delivery.[82] The stamps are the equivalent of money in the hands of the collector.[83] Stamps must be affixed upon a spigot-hole in the head of the package.[84]

4. PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES.[85] A brewer who neglects to keep the book required is liable to a penalty,[86] whether or not he intended to defraud.[87] False entries and fraudulent omissions are punishable by forfeiture, fine, and imprisonment.[88] Evading or attempting to evade the tax forfeits all the liquors made, and all the vessels, utensils, and apparatus used in making the same,[89] and renders the party liable to fine and imprisonment.[90]

B. Imitation Wines. A tax is imposed on imitation wine, but there is an exemption in case the article is made from grapes grown in the United States. If wine made from grapes grown in the United States is converted into an imitation or sparkling wine by the injection of carbonic acid gas it is not taxable.[91]

C. Tobacco, Snuff and Cigars — 1. TOBACCO — a. Tax. A tax of six cents per pound is imposed on all manufactured tobacco and snuff.[92] The law seeks to accomplish two objects: (1) The taxation of all forms of manufactured tobacco, including also the waste or scrap arising therefrom; and (2) the complete accounting by the manufacturer for all the product of his factory, including the waste.[93] This is an excise tax, and congress has the power to increase it, at least while the property is held for sale, and before it has passed into the hands of the consumer.[94] The rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner relative to rebates on tobacco and snuff under the act of April 12, 1902, were authorized and were not unreasonable.[95] The tax is not payable until the tobacco is sold or removed for consumption or sale.[96]

b. Bonds and Books of Tobacco Manufacturers. Tobacco manufacturers are required to give a bond before engaging in business. The sureties assume that the principal shall fulfil all the requirements of the statute.[97] Every manufacturer is required to keep a book in the form prescribed and to make entry therein of tobacco manufactured and removed. A manufacturer who transfers tobacco to a retail department where it is sold without making record thereof subjects himself to the penalty provided.[98]

c. Packages of Tobacco and Snuff. Tobacco and snuff must be put up by the manufacturer in prescribed packages.[99] Retail dealers in the course of their business can sell tobacco taken by them from wooden packages duly stamped, whether taken at or before the sale,[1] and can sell at retail to other retailers. The vendor is under no obligations to inform himself as to the purposes of a purchaser.[2]

d. Stamps. Stamps are a means of paying the tax when the manufacturer wishes to put his product on the market.[3] When stamps are destroyed in the hands of the manufacturer he is entitled to reimbursement by delivering other stamps, or by payment of the face value thereof in money.[4] The commissioner of internal revenue with the approval of the secretary of the treasury can change the form or style of any stamp or label under any provision of law relating to distilled spirits, tobacco, or cigars.[5] Where property required to have stamps placed thereon is sold by revenue officers upon distraint or forfeiture, the same not having been stamped as required, it is the duty of the officer selling to affix the stamps or cause them to be affixed.[6] Stamps when they are once attached to the tobacco and canceled can never be lawfully used again. They cease to have any separate and independent value, and that which they had previously becomes merged into that of the tobacco.[7]

e. Tobacco and Cigars For Export. Tobacco, snuff, and cigars may be removed for export to a foreign country without payment of tax, under regulations pre-act of June 13, 1898, could not be required to pay an additional tax of six cents per pound thereon, instead of three cents, merely because the same had not been physically "removed" from his factory.

scribed.[8] The payment for the export stamp required to be affixed to packages was not the payment of a tax and the fee charged was not unconstitutional.[9]

f. Penalties and Forfeitures Relating to Tobacco. Penalties and forfeitures are imposed for removing manufactured tobacco from the factory without being put up in proper packages, and without having the proper stamps affixed thereon to indicate payment of the tax.[10] The absence of the proper stamp is prima facie evidence of non-payment of tax, and unstamped tobacco or snuff is subject to forfeiture.[11] If false brands are put on tobacco by a revenue officer without knowledge of the manufacturer, the criminality attaches to the officer and it is not a ground of forfeiture. The tobacco is forfeited for fraud of the manufacturer in the possession of an innocent purchaser.[12] One is liable to a penalty for having manufactured tobacco in his possession without being stamped, whether refuse or damaged or not, and irrespective of value.[13]

2. Cigars and Cigarettes — a. Regulations Authorized. Congress may prescribe any rule or regulation which is not in itself unreasonable, relative to the manufacture and handling of tobacco or cigars.[14] The commissioner has authority to prescribe regulations for the inspection of cigars and the collection of the tax thereon.[15] Cigars shall be put up in boxes properly stamped and branded with the number of the factory and number of the district and the state.[16] The place of manufacture of cigars should be kept separate and apart from the place of sale.[17] A manufacturer cannot retail cigars in his cigar factory.[18] There is no authority to permit the repacking of cigars in the same boxes without adding new stamps.[19] Cigars imported are required to pay the internal revenue tax in addition to the custom duty, and internal revenue stamps are required to be affixed to the boxes.[20] It is assumed that each manufacturer should produce at least one thousand cigars from each twenty-five pounds of unstemmed leaf tobacco used, and the commissioner is authorized to make assessments for deficiencies on this basis, the presumption being that the cigars have been manufactured and removed, and not reported.[21]

b. Penalties and Forfeitures For Offenses Relating to Cigars.[22] Dealers, as well as manufacturers, are liable for selling or offering for sale cigars not properly boxed and stamped.[23] Affixing to a box containing domestic cigars a stamp in the similitude of a customs stamp is an indictable offense, and it is not necessary in the indictment to aver an intent to defraud the United States.[24] Every person who buys, receives, or has in possession cigars on which the tax to which they are liable has not been paid is liable to a penalty.[25] Cigars not properly marked and branded are forfeited wherever found,[26] even in the hands of innocent purchasers.[27] A cigar manufacturer who carries on the business unlawfully, in addition to other penalties, forfeits all materials, machinery, tools, etc., found in his possession, or used in his business, together with his estate or interest in the building and the tract of ground on which the factory was located.[28]

D. Oleomargarine — 1. Rate of Tax. 3. Regulations. The law authorizes the commissioner of internal revenue with the approval of the secretary to make regulations describing the marks, stamps, and brands to be used. This involves no unconstitutional delegation of power.[36] The authority given to the commissioner to make all needful regulations for carrying into effect the act does not authorize the imposition of a penalty by a regulation where congress imposed none in the act.[37]

4. Retail Dealers' Packages. Retail dealers must sell oleomargarine only from the original stamped packages, and pack it in suitable packages.[38]

5. Penalties and Forfeitures.[39] Selling oleomargarine in packages not marked in accordance with the regulations is an indictable offense.[40] Defrauding or attempting to defraud the United States of the tax forfeits the factory. The more drastic measures applicable to distilled spirits, passed prior to the oleomargarine law, do not apply.[41]

E. Renovated Butter. The law imposes a tax on renovated or process butter of one fourth of one cent per pound.[42] A regulation which prohibits a dealer receiving or handling such butter after it has been duly inspected, marked, and branded, and shipped from the factory, from obliterating the marks or brands thereon finds no warrant in the statute, and there is nothing in the law which will support an indictment or information for the violation of such a regulation.[43] to national banks, as the ten per cent tax on notes used for circulation is prohibitory and prevents circulation of other notes.[44]

B. Tax of Ten Per Cent on Notes Used For Circulation. Every person and corporation other than a national banking association is required to pay a tax of ten per cent on their own notes used for circulation and paid out by them, and every such person or corporation, and every national banking association is required to pay a tax of ten per cent on the notes of any town, city, or municipal corporation and of any person, firm, or corporation other than a national banking association, used for circulation and paid out by them.[45] This tax is not a direct tax and is not repugnant to the constitution. The tax is laid, not on the notes, but on their use as a circulating medium.[46] It is part of the system adopted by congress to provide a currency for the country, and to restrain the circulation of any notes not issued under its own authority.[47] The tax is limited to such negotiable promissory notes as carry title in their circulation from hand to hand. They must be payable in money.[48] The tax on state bank circulation applies only to promissory notes and not to other negotiable or quasi-negotiable paper. Cases of doubt should be resolved in favor of exemption.[49] If the maker of the note did not intend it to be used as a substitute for money he is not liable to the tax if others so use it without his approval.[50] Where notes circulate as money, and when redeemed are reissued, every issue of the notes is taxable.[51] Banks in the United States are liable for the tax on Canadian bank-notes paid out.[52]

Evidence of intent to use for circulation.— Although notes are not taxable as circulation unless the person issuing them intends them for circulation, his knowledge at the time he paid them out that they would be used for circulation is evidence from which an intent to pay them out for that purpose may be inferred. of banks under former acts[53] was repealed by the act of March 3, 1883.[54] The tax was a tax on the corporation.[55] Deposits belonging to a state and subject to drafts of the state were not exempted. The tax did not fall upon the state.[56] Savings banks were exempt from the tax on deposits in certain cases.[57]

2. TAX ON CAPITAL. Congress did not intend that the question of taxation upon capital employed in the business of banking should depend upon the mere name given to such business, either by those engaged in it or by others.[58] Capital invested in foreign countries was subject to tax.[59] Foreign banks doing business in the United States were required to pay taxes on capital employed.[60] The term "capital" had its ordinary signification. It was money or property appropriated to the purpose of the business analogous to the capital in a corporation denominated "capital stock."[61] The whole capital beyond the amount invested in United States bonds was assessable whether employed to its full extent in business or not.[62]

3. SPECIAL TAX ON BANKERS (WAR REVENUE ACT). A special tax was imposed on bankers by the act of June 13, 1898 (War Revenue Act).[63] The amount of tax was based on the capital employed and surplus was treated as capital. The word "surplus" was not restricted to the meaning given it in previous national bank legislation, as covering only so much of the surplus profits as the board of directors had set apart for a reserve capital, but was used in its ordinary sense and included undivided profits.[64]

65. See, generally, OFFICERS.

unless so appointed they are not strictly speaking officers of the United States.[66] Detectives employed by the commissioner of internal revenue are not officers.[67] A clerk of a supervisor of internal revenue is not an officer, within the meaning of the law requiring every person elected or appointed to any office, whether of honor or profit, to take a certain prescribed oath.[68]

B. Presumptions as to Appointment and Performance of Duty. The law presumes that persons acting in a public office have been duly appointed, and are acting with authority,[69] and that all public officers perform their proper official duties until the contrary appears.[70]

C. Holding Two Offices. One person may hold two offices or two separate employments, provided their duties are not incompatible, and he is entitled to receive compensation for both;[71] but a person holding one office whose pay is fixed by law or regulation cannot be allowed to receive additional pay or compensation for performing additional duties, or duties properly belonging to another office, unless authorized by law.[72] In construing statutes prohibiting dual or extra compensation courts have aimed to carry out the legislative intent by giving them sufficient flexibility not to injure the public service and sufficient rigidity to prevent executive abuse.[73]

D. Official Bonds in General. The giving of the bond is a mere ministerial act for the security of the government, and not a condition precedent to the authority of an officer whose appointment is complete to act in performance of the duties of the office.[74] The form of bonds is impliedly left to be fixed by the officers who are to approve them.[75] The validity of a bond, so far as it depends upon the capacity of the parties to make it, is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made.[76] Defective statutory bonds are sometimes sustained as common-law obligations. A bond is good at common law if entered into for a valuable consideration and not repugnant to any statute or the general policy of the law.[77] A bond executed by sureties with the date left blank authorizes the principal to fill in the date, and is valid in the hands of the government.[78] Executive officers cannot make regulations which enlarge or restrict the liability of an officer on his bond.[79] Official bonds are to be renewed every four years, or oftener if deemed necessary.[80] The liability of the obligors in the bond of a federal officer is joint and several.[81]

E. Commissioner of Internal Revenue and His Duties— 1. In General. The commissioner of internal revenue has general superintendence of the collection of internal revenue taxes, and of the enforcement of internal revenue laws.[82] His acts in matters relating to the revenue are presumed to be the acts of the secretary of the treasury.[83] His duties as assessor are in their nature judicial,[84] also his functions, in respect to appeals and claims for refunding taxes.[85]

2. Authority to Make Regulations. It is fundamental that the law-making power is exclusively in congress and cannot be delegated to any other department;[86] but regulations made by an executive department in pursuance of authority delegated by congress have the force of law,[87] and are of as binding force as if incorporated in the body of the act.[88] Regulations made by the commissioner pursuant to law have the force of law, and the courts will take judicial notice of their existence and provisions.[89] The rules promulgated by the commissioner may be proved in like manner as the laws of foreign states are proved.[90] The commissioner is authorized to make regulations to carry out the law, or to make regulations which become necessary by reason of changes in the law.[91] Regulations in respect to the assessment and collection of internal revenue,[92] prohibiting collectors from producing official records in court in behalf of litigants or furnishing copies for the use of third parties,[93] and regulations in regard to attaching, protecting, and canceling stamps and changing their form, style, and character have the force of law.[94] Nevertheless the commissioner cannot alone, or in connection with the secretary of the treasury, alter or amend the law. His regulations in aid of the execution of the law must be reasonable.[95] The commissioner cannot require an additional mark on a package of spirits so as to make its absence a forfeitable offense,[96] nor make an act or omission a criminal offense when the statute does not make it so.[97]

F. Collection Districts. The president is authorized to establish convenient collection districts, and to alter these districts as the interests of the service demand.[98] The courts take judicial notice that by law the territory of the United States is, for internal revenue purposes, divided into collection districts, with defined geographical boundaries.[99] The acts and decisions of the secretary of the treasury upon the question of boundaries of collection districts are not conclusive upon the courts unless made so by statute.[1]

G. Collectors, Their Duties and Compensation — 1. In General. Collectors of internal revenue are appointed by the president. There is no limitation by law to the term of office of collectors. It is their duty to collect taxes and to see that the laws are complied with; to seize property liable to seizure and to prosecute for recovery of sums forfeited by law.[2] They are the custodians of the revenue collected until it is paid into the proper depository.[3] They are authorized to investigate all accounts, lists, or returns made or required to be made to them by persons liable to pay taxes upon any property or business.[4] They are authorized in certain cases to sell property seized for violation of law,[5] and the purchaser at such sales acquires good title.[6] The power of sale by a collector of property seized is ministerial, not judicial.[7] The collector is a ministerial officer who must obey the mandate in his hands for the collection of the tax. The legality of his proceedings may be determined by the principles which apply to the case of an officer acting under a judgment and execution.[8]

2. Compensation of Collectors. The salary of collectors is adjusted on the basis of their annual collections, but cannot be less than two thousand dollars. The right of collectors to commissions on taxes collected by the sale of tax-paid-spirits stamps was not taken from them by the act of March 1, 1879, but the total

net compensation of collectors cannot in any case exceed four thousand five hundred dollars per annum.[9] The salary begins from the date of taking the oath and entering on duty.[10] Questions of salary are questions of contract, and the government can be sued in the court of claims when it fails to pay a collector his salary.[11] Where the words of a statute fixing the compensation of a public officer are loose and obscure and admit of two meanings, they should be construed in favor of the officer.[12] An allowance made by the secretary of the treasury to a collector for extra compensation is conclusive.[13] He may fix the amount of an extra allowance of a collector in advance of the services rendered.[14]

H. Collectors' Bonds — 1. In General. Collectors of internal revenue are required to execute bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties and for the faithful accounting of all public moneys coming into their hands and to execute bonds also as disbursing agents.[15] The bond required from the collector as disbursing agent is separate from and additional to his bond as collector.[16] The bond of a collector is a contract for the indemnity of the United States alone, and not for the indemnity of private persons.[17] It is valid, although it does not state the district for which defendant was appointed.[18] The bond is liable for taxes collected,[19] even if past due and accruing beyond the period during which assessment can be made,[20] for money deposited as offers of compromise,[21] for gagers' fees collected,[22] and for public money or property in the collector's hands which he has failed to account for from whatever cause, unless it be the act of God or the public enemy.[23] If the money is embezzled or stolen without fault or negligence of the collector, the bondsmen are not released from their liability.[24] The bond is liable only for moneys received during the term for which the collector was appointed covered by the bond.[25] Accounts must be stated to show liability under each bond. Where an officer becomes his own successor he is as such successor to be governed by the same rules as if another person had been appointed.[26]

2. Scope of Obligation. The obligations of sureties cannot be extended beyond what they have in terms assumed.[27] When the condition of the bond declares that the obligor "shall truly and faithfully discharge the duties of his office, according to law," the law referred to is any law then on the statute book or that may be passed during his term of office, regulating the powers and duties thereof.[28] If, after a bond has been executed, the nature of the office is changed by law, it ceases to be obligatory.[29] Sureties are liable for moneys collected under an act passed after the execution of the bond.[30] A bond conditional for the faithful performance of their duties by all deputies appointed by the collector is valid, although such a condition is not required by the statute. A change in the regulations subsequent to the execution of the bond, putting deputy collectors in the classified civil service, does not relieve the sureties.[31] And the death of a surety on the bond does not relieve his estate from liability for a breach of the conditions occurring subsequent to his death, but during the term of office for which the bond was given, where it binds the obligors and their several heirs, executors, and administrators.[32]

3. Cumulative or Strengthening Bonds. Substitute bonds discharge sureties on the old bonds from the time the new bond is accepted. Strengthening bonds do not have that effect.[33] The question whether an additional bond, executed by the collector at the request of the commissioner, is a substitute or strengthening bond should properly be left to the jury.[34] The direction of the commissioner to execute a new bond must be considered as the direction of the secretary of the treasury.[35]

4. Suits on Collector's Bond. The collector in a suit on his bond is entitled to credit for all uncollected taxes transferred to his successor, if due diligence was used to collect them;[36] and he is at liberty to show that by due diligence he could not collect the same before the expiration of his term of office.[37] Where no allowance was made for extra service by the accounting officer in the settlement of the collector's accounts, a set-off will not be allowed in a suit on the bond.[38] It is not a ground of defense by the sureties to an action for the recovery of the amount of defalcations of the collector that officers of the treasury department failed to notify the sureties of such defalcations until after the collector had become insolvent.[39] Errors of computation are not vested rights in favor of sureties. It is competent for the accounting officers to correct mistakes and restate the balance in adjusting their accounts.[40] The bond is liable for loss occasioned by the collector's breach of duty in allowing spirits to be removed from a warehouse, upon insufficient bonds, and it is no defense that he did not act corruptly, but only negligently. The measure of damages is the loss sustained by reason of the taking of the worthless bonds.[41] A judgment against a defaulting collector does not bind a surety unless the surety was a party to the action; and no federal statute creates a lien on the property of a collector or of his sureties from the execution of his official bond, or from the date of any default thereon.[42] Real estate acquired by virtue of proceedings against a collector of internal revenue cannot be considered as acquired in payment of debts arising under the laws relating "to internal revenue."[43]

I. Deputy Collectors — 1. In General. Deputy collectors are appointed by collectors, and have like authority to collect taxes within their divisions and to make seizures.[44] A deputy collector is authorized to act as such when his commission has been signed and placed in the mail and he is notified thereof by telegraph.[45] The collector is responsible for the acts of his deputies.[46] Deputy collectors may be removed by the collector subject to such requirements as to notice as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe.[47] If a deputy collector converts public money to his own use, the government may hold him directly responsible in an action for money had and received, although it has another remedy against his principal.[48]

2. Compensation. Deputy collectors are compensated by allowances made by the secretary of the treasury upon the recommendation of the commissioner of internal revenue. An allowance for the salary of a deputy, unimpeached for fraud or mistake, is binding upon the courts.[49]

3. Bonds. The collector may require deputies to execute to him bonds for the faithful performance of their duties.[50] The undertaking of sureties on the bonds of a deputy collector must receive a strict interpretation, both as to time and terms.[51] This obligation may be enforced, although the instrument is not under seal.[52] The omission of a collector to remove a deputy collector after knowledge of default of the latter does not discharge the sureties of the deputy collector.[53] The consent of the collector to the use of the public money by his deputy in his private business, not being communicated and assented to by the sureties of the latter, will discharge them from their liability for a defalcation resulting therefrom.[54] An action by a collector against a deputy collector on his bond is a suit arising under the laws of the United States and may be removed from the state court to the federal court.[55]

J. Gagers and Storekeepers. Gagers are appointed by the secretary of the treasury and are assigned to duty at distilleries, rectifying houses, and wherever inspection and gaging of spirits is necessary. They are paid by fees determined by the quantity of spirits gaged, but their compensation cannot exceed five dollars per day. It is an offense for a gager to receive any compensation except as by law prescribed for the performance of his duty.[56] The commissioner of internal revenue has a right to make regulations concerning gaging and in relation to gagers, and these regulations are binding and obligatory. Neither the statutes nor the regulations authorize a gager to delegate his authority, or to have his duties performed for him.[57] A gager is an officer and cannot receive pay for other service rendered the government at the same time.[58] Every gager is required to give a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties under the law. The right of action on the bond is reserved to the government, notwithstanding an indictment, conviction, and sentence unless there is an averment of satisfaction for the latter.[59] Storekeepers are appointed by the secretary of the treasury and have charge of distilleries and distillery warehouses and are required to keep account of the spirits manufactured and entered in warehouse and withdrawn therefrom, and are required to give bonds. They receive compensation only when rendering actual service.[60]

K. Authority of Officers to Enter Premises. Authority is given to any collector, deputy collector, or internal revenue agent, to enter, in the daytime, any building or place within his district, where any articles or objects subject to taxation are made, produced, or kept, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose of examining such objects or articles. A national bank is not exempt from this provision.[61] Officers must have free and peaceable egress as well as ingress, and the proprietors have no right to eject them.[62] The authority of officers to make examinations cannot be delegated to their clerks.[63]

bidden by the constitution,[64] the statutes provide a way for searching premises through the instrumentality of a search warrant, and such acts are constitutional.[65] It is the duty of United States commissioners to issue search warrants in internal revenue cases when properly applied for.[66]

M. Civil and Criminal Liability For Acts of Officers — 1. Civil Liability — a. In General. The law afford officers protection while properly performing their official duties,[67] and it is the duty of the government to defend them when sued for doing what the law requires.[68] They are not liable criminally, nor for damages in trespass unless their acts are tortious or unauthorized.[69] An officer is answerable in damages for an illegal trespass.[70] In addition to his liability for actual damages he is subject to exemplary or punitive damages, if he proceeds in malicious or wanton disregard of the citizen's rights.[71] The assessor is liable to the injured party for making an illegal assessment.[72] A suit can be brought against the collector for damages for making an illegal seizure and sale of property, notwithstanding the owner could have given a bond and taken the case into court for adjudication and failed to do so.[73] An appeal to the commissioner is not a condition precedent to an action against the collector for trespass.[74] Any mistake or irregularity on the part of an assessor will not make the collector a trespasser.[75] The collector in collecting taxes assessed is protected by the assessment, regular on its face, although it may be invalid. His duty in this respect is purely ministerial, and the assessment is his authority to proceed.[76] A gager in charge of a warehouse is bound to use ordinary care, and if whisky is lost through his gross negligence he is liable.[77]

b. Certificate of Probable Cause. If the court certifies that there was probable cause for the act, the officer is protected from personal liability and the government assumes the responsibility.[78] Such a certificate operates as a stay of execution and converts the claim practically into a claim against the government,

Where the government has had no notice of the proceedings prior to the judgment it is not concluded by the certificate. Dunnegan v. U. S., 17 Ct. Cl. 247.

Although the court fails to make the certificate of probable cause, in rendering judgment for the claimant in a proceeding for the seizure of property, proof of probable cause of seizure is a complete defense and may be which is binding upon the accounting officers.[79] The officer making a seizure is entitled to a certificate if he acted in good faith and had reasonable grounds to suppose that the law had been violated,[80] or in case of doubt respecting the true interpretation of the law.[81] If officers act with probable cause they are not liable no matter what their motives may have been,[82] and notwithstanding that the seizure was malicious. The certificate need not recite the reason which justifies its issuance. The words "probable cause" and "reasonable cause" of seizure have the same meaning.[83] Where the court orders restitution of the property and denies a certificate of probable cause, it establishes the fact that the seizure was tortious and that the owner is entitled to damages.[84] The refusal of the district court to grant a certificate of reasonable cause is not a matter which can be reviewed in the circuit or supreme court.[85]

c. Laches or Torts of Officers. The government is not responsible for the laches or wrongful acts of its officers. It may be the loser by their negligence, but it never becomes bound to others for the consequences of such neglect, unless it be by express agreement to that effect.[86] It is an established principle that a government is not responsible for the tortious acts of its officers generally; in order to create any such liability there must have been either authorization or ratification.[87] The government is not bound by the act of its officers, making an unauthorized payment under misconstruction of the law.[88] Statements made by departmental officers to the effect that a claim would be allowed, or had been certified favorably to the auditing office, constitute no estoppel against the government.[89] The government does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of any of the officers or agents whom it employs.[90] If officers act illegally, they are per-made in an action against the revenue officer for wrongful seizure. Agnew v. Haynes, 141 Fed. 631 [reversing 132 Fed. 525].

What is probable cause.— Where the proof shows that defendant made the seizure by direction of the commissioner of internal revenue, based on information received from his special agent, which justified his suspicion that plaintiff was violating the law, the court may charge the jury, as matter of law, that there was probable cause. sonally liable in damages, not the government.[91] The laches of officers is no bar to the assertion of its rights.[92] Their carelessness does not relieve sureties on bonds.[93]

2. Criminal Liability.[94] The failure of an officer to report in writing to his next superior officer or to the commissioner of internal revenue violations of law of which he has knowledge is punishable.[95] So collectors are liable to prosecution for accepting fraudulent bonds, as well as liable on their official bonds for loss sustained by the government.[96] And any subordinate revenue officer who demands or accepts, or attempts to collect, directly or indirectly, as payment of gift, or otherwise, any sum of money, or other thing of value, for a compromise of the violation of the revenue laws, is guilty of a misdemeanor.[97]

N. Removal From Office. The courts have no jurisdiction to control an executive officer in the matter of making removals.[98] The power to regulate the subject of removals from office belongs to congress.[99]

XIV. Assessment, Collection, Refunding, and Recovery of Taxes Paid.[1]

A. Assessments — 1. In General. Assessments of taxes not payable by stamps are made by the commissioner of internal revenue on lists, monthly or special.[2] Any legal ascertainment of the tax is in fact its assessment.[3] The law fixes the tax and the revenue officer is simply the instrument or machinery provided for carrying it into effect.[4] The decisions of an assessor are of a quasi-judicial character, and cannot be questioned collaterally when made within the scope of his jurisdiction.[5]

2. Operation and Effect — a. In General. The assessment is prima facie evidence of the amount due. It is presumed to be valid and stands until shown by satisfactory proof to be illegal.[6] It is not conclusive, however, and in a suit to recover taxes assessed defendant can show that the tax was excessive or illegal, although he has not appealed therefrom to the commissioner.[7] When the presumption of law as to the validity of the assessment has been rebutted the burden of proof is shifted upon the government to establish its validity.[8] The collector has no authority to question the validity of assessments. The assessment lists constitute his warrant to collect.[9]

b. Illegal Assessments. If any indistinguishable or inseparable part or proportion of an entire assessment is illegal, the whole assessment is illegal.[10] If the assessment is illegal, all proceedings under it are void and the assessment may be attacked collaterally.[11]

3. Reassessment. In case of omission the commissioner of internal revenue may enter the names of the persons omitted and amount of tax on any monthly or special list within fifteen months from the time of the delivery of the list to the collector.[12] If the incompleteness results from any omission, understatement, or undervaluation, from whatever source it arose, or from whatever cause it happened, the power is given to correct.[13]

4. Returns. The statutes contemplate two methods of taxation — one requires a return containing a list of objects liable to tax, upon which an assessment is to be made, and the other requires payment of the tax by stamps affixed to the taxable articles.[14] The law authorizes the addition of fifty per cent to the tax in case of refusal or neglect to make return, not occasioned by sickness or absence; and one hundred per cent in case of a false or fraudulent return. This provision is constitutional.[15] The fifty per cent addition to the tax is a penalty and not a tax.[16] It does not accrue where the taxpayer discloses his liability to the collector or deputy collector within the calendar month.[17] The one hundred per cent penalty is incurred where the return is untrue, although not wilfully false.[18] The act of adjudging whether the one hundred per cent penalty is incurred is a quasi-judicial act, and the assessor should himself determine that the omission was false. The penalty must be added as the result of his own finding.[19] These penalties

5. Right of Collectors to Issue Summons. A collector of internal revenue is authorized for the purpose of ascertaining liability to tax to summon persons charged with the duty of making returns to produce their private or business books for examination and to testify under oath. This power was formerly conferred upon assessors.[21] It is conditional upon the failure or refusal to deliver a return of "objects subject to tax," or upon the delivery of a false or fraudulent return or one containing understatements or undervaluations.[22] The proceedings are civil in their nature and not an infringement of the constitutional provision against unreasonable searches.[23] The mere issuing of a summons is in itself only a ministerial act, but requiring persons to appear and testify under oath, produce books, etc., may be a judicial act taken in an extended sense.[24] Being an extraordinary inquisitorial power it ought to be strictly construed.[25] It should be strictly limited within the express terms of the law and cannot be extended by analogy.[26] There is no authority to require the production of books and papers for the purpose of ascertaining a person's liability to tax after the right of assessment has been lost.[27] The summons should state the cause of its being issued, and should be sufficiently explicit to enable the person summoned to decide whether he is bound to appear or not.[28] It should be limited to books and papers concerning the subject of investigation which should be mentioned with reasonable certainty.[29] The person summoned having appeared, he cannot refuse to exhibit the books, or refuse to testify concerning them.[30] Authority was formerly conferred upon supervisors of internal revenue to summon persons to appear and testify and to produce books and papers to aid in the investigation of frauds, This was a proceeding of a different character from the power to summon parties for the purpose of obtaining data for an assessment and was not unconstitutional either as an unreasonable search and seizure or as compelling a party to testify against himself.[31] When the office of supervisor was abolished these powers were vested in collectors of internal revenue.[32] If the parties summoned were satisfied

6. Failure to Obey Summons. Where a summons has been issued and duly served, and not complied with, a United States district judge may issue a writ of attachment as for contempt.[35] This power should not be exercised except in a case admitting of no doubt.[36] The application for a writ is a proceeding in a civil case and may be amended.[37] It is no defense that the answers of the person summoned would tend to criminate him, as no disclosures or admissions so made can be used against him in criminal proceedings.[38] One who in good faith questions the legality of the summons is entitled to consideration; and an order for an attachment will be with the provision that, should the witness in the meantime obey the process, such order will be discharged.[39]

7. Appeals From Assessments. The government has provided a complete system of corrective justice in regard to all taxes imposed, founded upon the idea of appeals within the executive departments.[40] An appeal is a condition precedent to an action for the recovery of taxes paid. An appeal may be taken by the purchaser of property upon which there is a lien for taxes.[41] It is too late after a party has exercised his rights under an appeal to object to an irregularity in the notice of the assessment.[42]

B. Collection — 1. In General. Payment must be made whether the tax is justly or unjustly levied, and redress for illegal action must be sought subsequently.[43] A collector has no authority to receive in payment of taxes anything but money. In accepting a draft he acts at his own risk and does not bind the United States.[44] In the absence of any express provision therefor a collector is not authorized to collect the stamp tax on instruments in any other manner than by the sale of stamps.[45]

2. Penalty and Interest on Non-Payment. If the person assessed does not pay the tax within ten days after notice, a penalty of five per centum additional is incurred, and interest at the rate of one per centum a month.[46] Notice is necessary before the taxpayer can be charged with the penalty.[47] It is not necessary that resort should be had to a suit or prosecution in order to its recovery.[48] Penalties are never extended by implication and these do not apply when the law specially provides another penalty for the default.[49]

3. Lien For Taxes.[50] The law provides a lien upon property, real and personal, of the delinquent for taxes assessed, and a remedy by distraint to enforce it.[51] The lien which is created establishes itself not only upon property in possession but upon all rights to property,[52] belonging to the delinquent at the time of demand but not upon property which has been transferred to innocent purchasers prior to demand.[53] In order to support the lien all the prerequisites of the law must be strictly complied with.[54] An assessment, a notice that the tax is due, and a specific demand upon the individual taxpayer are necessary to create the lien. The demand should state the amount of tax as well as the time when it is due.[55] The matter of liens under the internal revenue laws is independent of state legislation, and a state law requiring liens to be recorded does not apply.[56]

4. Distraint and Sale.[57] Where a party refuses to pay taxes assessed a collector or his deputy, after notice and demand, may collect by distraint and sale of the delinquent's property.[58] The sale passes nothing more than the interest of the delinquent.[59] It conveys a good title to the purchaser, where the proceedings are regular.[60] Proceedings in pais, to divest title to real estate, must pursue the statute exactly; no presumption will be indulged in favor of their correctness.[61] Proceedings are void if the substantial requirements of the law have not been complied with.[62] Real estate may be seized under distraint without going upon the premises by indorsing a description of the same upon the writ.[63] The officer's certificate of sale given to the purchaser does not pass title, but is evidence only that the holder has a right to acquire title by deed, or to receive the money necessary to effect redemption.[64] Taxes can be collected by distraint and by suit on the bond at the same time.[65]

5. COLLECTOR'S DEED TO LAND SOLD. The collector's deed is prima facie evidence of the facts which by law are authorized or required to be stated in it, and operates as a conveyance of all the right, title, and interest which the party delinquent had in the land at the time the lien attached if the proceedings have been in accordance with law.[66] It is prima facie evidence of the name of the person for whose taxes the land was sold, of the name of the purchaser, of the real estate purchased, and of the price paid, but not as to other recitals.[67]

6. BILL IN EQUITY TO ENFORCE LIEN. The government can also resort to a bill in equity to enforce the lien, or to subject any real estate owned by the delinquent or in which he has any right, title, or interest, to the payment of the tax.[68] This is a cumulative remedy and does not preclude the government from enforcing its liens by other statutory methods.[69] It is only in cases where it is lawful and has become necessary to seize and sell real estate to satisfy the tax that a suit of this character can be sustained.[70]

7. COLLECTION OF TAXES BY SUIT. The government is not prohibited from adopting the action of debt or any other common-law remedy for collecting taxes due.[71] The government loses none of its remedies to collect its revenue unless there is an express repeal or abrogation of some existing remedy.[72] Suit for taxes can be brought at any time, whether or not they have been assessed, and whether or not they are assessable.[73] The fact that an assessment has been made and paid is no bar to a suit for the recovery of an additional amount found due.[74] The controlling question is not what has been assessed, but what is by law due.[75] When the United States appears as a suitor in court, it voluntarily submits to the law and places itself upon the same footing with other litigants; but this does not apply to such defenses as laches and the statute of limitations.[76] In an action brought by the United States for the recovery of taxes, defendant cannot plead a set-off, legal or equitable, growing out of independent claims;[77] although such claims are just and have been presented to the proper accounting officers and rejected.[78]

C. Refunding Taxes Erroneously Collected[79] — 1. Grounds For Refunding Taxes. The commissioner is authorized to refund and pay back taxes unjustly assessed or excessive in amount or in any manner wrongfully collected,[80] but he cannot refund a tax which has been legally imposed.[81] The commissioner should refund in all cases of illegal collection except where the fault of the taxpayer, his waiver of his rights, his long acquiescence, or other sufficient circumstances discredit the claim.[82] Where a distiller loses his tax-paid stamps before they are affixed to the casks, and pays the tax again to procure other stamps, the duplicate payment may be refunded,[83] and if a stamp is destroyed the money paid for a second stamp may be refunded.[84] Refund may be made to a surety on a distiller's bond who has paid an assessment against his principal.[85]

2. No Protest Necessary To Authorize Refund. While an action cannot be maintained for the recovery back of money paid unless the payment was made under protest, that principle is held as too technical for application for the refund of taxes, and no proof of protest is required.[86]

3. Claims For Refund.[87] The regulations made by the secretary of the treasury prescribing the manner in which appeals for the refund of taxes shall be made are authorized by law,[88] and have the force of law.[89] The commissioner is not obliged to follow the secretary's advice.[90] Claims for refund of taxes must be filed within two years from the date of the payment of the tax.[91] If they are filed with the collector within that time it is a compliance with the terms of the statute.[92] An informal or defective application may be regarded as a claim, so far at least as to be a foundation for an amendment.[93] A valid claim cannot be defeated by irregularity in the matter of form.[94] The indorsement of a protest on the checks by which the taxes were paid, and a protest upon the return are not a claim such as is required by the law and regulations.[95]

4. Operation and Effect of Commissioner's Decision. An allowance by the commissioner for the refund of a tax is not the simple passing of an ordinary claim by an ordinary accounting officer, but an award which is conclusive, unless impeached for fraud or mistake.[96] His decisions are final within the scope of his authority and not subject to revision by the accounting officers;[97] nor can a court inquire as to the sufficiency of the evidence before him.[98] A mistake of judgment or discretion cannot be set up to impeach his action, but it may be impeached for want of jurisdiction.[99]

5. Evidence of Action of Commissioner. An official copy of the official entry in the record is the best evidence that a claim for refund has been rejected. A letter of the commissioner stating that the claim had been rejected was not received as evidence.[1]

6. Reopening Claims For Refund. Claims for refund come within the rule that a final decision, upon a knowledge of all the facts made by an officer authorized to act, is not to be reopened and reviewed by his successors in office unless the decision was founded on mistakes in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation or the absence of material testimony afterward discovered or produced.[2] The commissioner may reconsider and revoke an allowance made for refund at any time before payment, where suit has not been brought and there has been no change in the head of the bureau.[3] The award does not become final until it has passed out of his control. While it remains in his office it is subject to correction or revocation.[4]

7. Claims For Refund Under Special Acts. In auditing and paying a claim for a specific sum, for which appropriation has been made by congress, the functions of the government officers are only clerical.[5] If an act of congress directs certain sums of money to be refunded to certain persons named the United States cannot withhold portions of these sums.[6]

8. Refusal of Payment After Allowance of Claim. If the claim is allowed by the commissioner and payment refused by the accounting officer, a suit may be brought directly against the government in the court of claims.[7] If the commis-

D. Suits to Recover Taxes Paid[10] — 1. In General. The remedy of a suit against collectors of internal revenue to recover back the tax after it has been paid is provided by statute.[11] An action for the recovery of taxes illegally exacted may also be brought against the United States.[12] These proceedings are exclusive of any other remedy.[13] Suits for taxes illegally collected are prohibited, unless the taxpayer shall have duly made an appeal to the commissioner of internal revenue in accordance with the provisions of the law, and until the appeal has been decided, unless the decision is postponed longer than six months.[14] Suits must be brought within two years after the cause of action accrued.[15] The right of action accrues at the expiration of six months after an appeal without action thereon and becomes barred in two years thereafter.[16] The running of the statute of limitations is not suspended during the pendency of the appeal before the commissioner.[17] If no appeal has been made, defendant may protect himself, by plea to that effect, in abatement of the action, or he may waive this defense, and then it becomes immaterial whether an appeal was made to the commissioner or not.[18] It is not necessary before bringing suit to make a claim for refund of 12. Act March 3, 1887 (24 U. S. St. at L. 505). A claim to recover back taxes illegally exacted under the War Revenue Act is a claim founded upon a law of congress within the meaning of the act of March 3, 1887, and it may be enforced by an action directly against the United States after it has been presented to the commissioner, whether it has received his approval or not, and whether it is an action on a contract or an action sounding in tort. Demurrer.— Where the complaint shows that more than two years have elapsed, and it is therefore barred, the defense of the statute of limitations may be raised by dean illegal tax if a claim for abatement of the assessment has been made and rejected.[19] When the government is the moving party, as upon an application for an order upon a receiver to pay an assessment, the defense may show that the assessment was erroneous, without regard to the lapse of time or to an appeal having been made to the commissioner of internal revenue.[20]

2. NECESSITY AND SUFFICIENCY OF PROTEST. In the absence of such duress as will render the payment involuntary, protest becomes necessary in order to show that the legality of the demand was not admitted when the payment was made. The recovery rests upon the fact that the payment was made to release property from detention or to prevent a seizure and sale of property and the protest saves the rights which grow out of that fact.[21] But under the internal revenue laws it is not necessary that the protest be reduced to writing. A verbal protest is sufficient to give notice that the legality of the demand is disputed.[22]

3. VOLUNTARY PAYMENT. The authorities are in general accord that taxes voluntarily paid cannot be recovered back. Every man is supposed to know the law, and if he voluntarily makes a payment which the law would not compel him to make he cannot invoke the aid of the courts to get his money back.[23] This is a rule of repose of general application founded on sound public policy, and thus far the law is clear, but it is not always easy to say what is a voluntary payment. Thus if the tax be paid under duress or compulsion of law,[24] or under protest,[25] or with notice that the taxpayer intends to bring suit to test the validity of the claim, he may recover it back, if the assessment was erroneous or illegal, in an action of assumpsit for money had and received.[26] Where the only alternative of the citizen is to submit to an illegal exaction or discontinue his business, money paid under such pressure can never be regarded as a voluntary act, within the meaning of the maxim, volenti non fit injuria.[27] So also the unwilling payment of an illegal tax to avoid the seizure and sale of property is not a voluntary payment. To render a payment involuntary it is not necessary that it should be exacted by actual violence or physical duress.[28] In other words, when taxes are paid on the demand of an officer having authority to collect them by distraint, there is sufficient duress of the property to make the payment involuntary.[29]

4. Payment of Judgments Against Officers. Judgments against officers for taxes illegally collected and damages and costs recovered against them by reason of acts done in the performance of their duties are payable by the government. Claims for taxes recovered by judgments should be presented within two years after date of judgment.[30] The rejection of an application to refund a tax does not exhaust the authority of the commissioner, so that he cannot allow payment of a judgment against the collector in a suit brought to recover back the same tax.[31] Judgments may be paid to the judgment creditor or to the collector, although the court refused a certificate of probable cause. It should be paid to the judgment creditor if it has not been paid by the officer against whom it was recovered.[32] Costs will be allowed if under the practice in the state courts costs are allowed the prevailing party.[33]

E. Restraining Assessment or Collection by Injunction. The assessment or collection of an internal revenue tax cannot be restrained, although it be erroneous, irregular, or void, or the lien is to be enforced upon property in the hands of an innocent purchaser.[34] Neither a federal nor state court has any power to stay collection.[35] An injunction to restrain the collection of a tax is not the proper mode of inquiring into its unconstitutionality or invalidity.[36] Executive officers of the government cannot be interfered with in the exercise of their ordinary official duties, either by injunction or mandamus.[37] The national courts cannot rightfully interfere with executive action in any case where an executive officer is authorized to exercise judgment or discretion in the performance of an official act.[38] The proper course for the aggrieved party to take in case of a tax unjustly enacted is to pay the tax demanded and appeal to the commissioner of internal revenue for a refund, and, if denied, to institute a suit to recover the amount paid.[39]

XV. VIOLATIONS OF THE REVENUE LAW AND JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN RELATION THERETO.

A. Persons Liable[40] — 1. In General. The failure of officers to perform their duties does not relieve the citizen from the consequences of a violation of law.[41]

2. Violation of Law by Partner. Any violation of the revenue law incurring a penalty committed by a partner in the course of partnership business is in legal contemplation the act of all the partners, and each one of them is liable to the penalty.[42] Where two persons composing a partnership make and sign, in their partnership name, a false return, they may be jointly indicted therefor.[43]

3. Violation of Law by Corporation. A corporation is responsible for acts done by its agent, whether in contractu or in delicto, in the course of its business, as an individual is responsible under similar circumstances,[44] and may be indicted for the acts of its officers or employees.[45] If the penalty be both fine and imprisonment, the statute is inoperative as to the imprisonment, as that part of the punishment cannot, from the nature of the offender, be carried out.[46]

4. Violations of Law by Agents or Employees. The illegal acts of agents or employees work forfeiture of property, although without the knowledge or procurement of the owner.[47] The principal is criminally responsible for the acts of an agent where they are done within the scope of his employment, and within the scope of his authority, but is not criminally liable for unauthorized acts.[48] A master, owing a certain duty to the public, who intrusts its performance to a servant, is responsible criminally for the failure of his servant to discharge that duty.[49] A principal is liable for failure of clerks or employees to make proper entries in books which they are required to keep,[50] or for selling in the usual and ordinary course of business oleomargarine not properly marked and branded.[51] Where a person with unlawful intent designs the commission of a criminal act, and to carry out that purpose another is employed to do the act, that act becomes the act of the principal, and he as well as the agent is criminally responsible.[52]

B. Intent as Element of Offense.[53] Where an offense against the law is shown to have been committed, the law raises the presumption of guilty intent.[54] Every man is presumed to intend the necessary legal or legitimate consequences of his acts.[55] In statutory offenses a guilty intent is not necessarily an ingredient.[55] But where the law contains the words "with intent to evade" the intent is material and of the essence of the offense.[57] In omission to pay taxes imposed by the revenue laws intention forms no part of the offense.[58] Intent to defraud need not be proven to convict a person of selling liquors without payment of special tax.[59] The word "wilfully," in the ordinary sense in which it is used in statutes, means not merely voluntarily, but with a bad purpose.[60] An act may be done knowingly and intentionally, whether it is the immediate act of the person charged or his authorized act through an employee.[61]

C. Effect of Violation of Law on Contracts. One who permits distilled spirits to be removed from his distillery and sold in fraud of the revenue cannot recover for the spirits thus sold.[62] A contract in which the consideration is illicit brandy is void as against public policy.[63] The neglect of a dealer to pay the special tax does not invalidate sales. The illegality consisted in not paying the tax but the sale is not unlawful on that account.[64] A sale of cigars at the factory before they are boxed or stamped is not invalid where the contract provides that they shall be stamped as the law requires before removal.[65]

D. Jurisdiction[66] — 1. In General. Suits for fines, penalties, and forfeitures must be brought in the United States circuit or district court for the district within which the fine, penalty, or forfeiture may have been incurred. Taxes may be sued for in any circuit or district court for the district within which the liability was incurred, or where the party from whom the tax is due resides at the time of the commencement of the action.[67] United States circuit courts have original jurisdiction when the right of either party depends on the validity of an act of congress.[68] They have jurisdiction of suits arising under the internal revenue laws.[69] An internal revenue case may be taken from the circuit court to the circuit court of appeals, and from there to the supreme court when its constitutionality is involved.[70] A suit to recover taxes alleged to have been illegally collected is cognizable in the United States circuit court without regard to the citizenship of the parties.[71]

2. Suits In Rem. The district courts have jurisdiction of suits in rem for forfeiture for violation of the internal revenue laws.[72] The circuit courts also have jurisdiction.[73] The court of the district where the res is seized has jurisdiction, although the violation of law occurred in another state.[74] Jurisdiction depends upon the possession of the property, actual or constructive.[75]

be attached by state officers.[76] A mechanic's lien on distillery premises cannot be enforced in a state court, after proceedings in rem have been commenced in a United States court.[77] Where property is seized under a state process and is in the custody of the sheriff awaiting the judgment of the court, the possession of the sheriff cannot be legally interfered with by internal revenue officers.[78] Property in the custody of the marshal is not liable to be proceeded against for the internal revenue tax while in his custody.[79]

4. Removal of Cases to United States Courts. Cases civil or criminal arising under the internal revenue laws, if commenced in a state court against an officer, appointed or acting under those laws, or against persons acting under such an officer may be removed on petition of defendant into the United States circuit court, irrespective of the citizenship of the parties.[80] A prosecution cannot be removed before an indictment has been found.[81] The statute is highly remedial and should receive a liberal construction,[82] but it should not be extended to give jurisdiction where jurisdiction does not appear to have been intended. Where the question of jurisdiction is doubtful the rule is to resolve that doubt against the jurisdiction of the federal courts.[83] A rule issued by a state court upon a collector to show why an attachment should not issue against him for contempt in refusing to permit the sheriff to enter a warehouse is removable to a federal court,[84] as is also a proceeding by a landlord to recover from a lessee possession of premises used as a bonded warehouse, to which proceeding the collector and storekeeper are made parties defendant.[85]

E. Arrests. No warrant of arrest for violation of the internal revenue law shall be issued upon the sworn complaint of a private citizen unless first approved in writing by a United States district attorney.[86]

F. Penalties[87] — 1. In General. A penalty given by statute is technically a debt. It does not, however, arise upon contract, but is imposed for a violation of law or the neglect or refusal to perform some duty enjoined by law.[88] Penalties must be plainly imposed or they cannot be exacted.[89] The penal sum of a bond is not a penalty.[90] If a statute provides that a fine shall not be less than a certain sum, nor exceeding a certain larger sum, a court has no more right to impose a less fine than the smaller amount than it has to impose any greater fine than the larger amount.[91]

2. Methods of Recovery.[92] Where the proceeding for enforcing a penalty is prescribed that mode is exclusive; but where no mode of proceeding is mentioned, the proceeding must be in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceeding.[93] Thus it is held that penalties may be recovered by indictment,[94] or by information.[95] Where the punishment prescribed is a fine or pecuniary penalty, and the act fixes the exact amount, it may be recovered by a civil action in the form of an action of debt.[96] In an action against several jointly judgment may be entered against some and in favor of others whose complicity is not proved, precisely as though the action were in form as well as in substance ex delicto.[97] If the penalty is a fine on conviction, or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court, its provisions cannot be enforced by civil action.[98]

G. Forfeitures[99] — 1. Forfeiture For Fraud Generally. All taxable articles are forfeited when found in possession of any person for the purpose of being sold in fraud of the revenue; all raw materials in possession for the purpose of being manufactured into articles subject to tax and sold in fraud of the revenue; and all tools, implements, and personal property in the place or building, or within any yard or inclosure where such articles are found.[1] This provision applies to distilled spirits notwithstanding the forfeiture of spirits is provided for in other sections of the law.[2] The ground for the seizure of taxable articles and raw materials is the fraudulent intent of the person who has them in possession or control.[3] The object is to enable the government to anticipate and prevent the sale or removal and to proceed to a forfeiture before the overt act of fraud is perpetrated.[4] This provision does not apply to oleomargarine frauds.[5] Forfeiture of the personal property is incurred irrespective of the question whether or not it is to be used in the illicit manufacture of taxable articles,[6] and without regard to the fraudulent intent or purpose of the person having possession or control thereof.[7] The onus is upon the claimant to make out to the satisfaction of the court and jury that the situation of the property is consistent with innocence.[8] Raw material intended for fraudulent manufacture may be seized for forfeiture wherever found.[9] Forfeiture does not depend on the material being seized in the possession of a person in whose possession forfeitable taxable articles are found.[10] It is necessary, as a ground of forfeiture, that the tools and implements should be found on the premises of the manufactory.[11] Fixtures are not included in the words "tools, implements and instruments."[12]

2. Forfeiture of Conveyances Used For Removal of Illicit Goods. In addition to the penalties imposed upon persons who remove or conceal goods upon which the tax has not been paid with intent to defraud, all conveyances and animals used in the accomplishment of this unlawful purpose are forfeitable.[13] Knowledge or intent on the part of the owner of a conveyance so used is not required to be shown.[14] The conveyances and animals are considered the offenders and liable without regard to the misconduct or responsibility of the owner. officers of the government who have been invested with authority to remit forfeitures.[16]

3. PROVISIONS FOR PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES WHEN NOT OTHERWISE PROVIDED. The law imposes a penalty and forfeiture in the case of distillers, rectifiers, wholesale liquor dealers, and manufacturers of tobacco or cigars, for omitting things required, and for doing things forbidden, where there is no specific penalty elsewhere imposed.[17] It was not intended by this provision to cumulate or increase punishment.[18] The spirits which are forfeited are those owned by the distiller, rectifier, or wholesale liquor dealer, or in which he has any interest as owner at the time of the discovery of his offense.[19] The phrase "all distilled spirits or liquors owned by him" shall be forfeited is to be construed to mean all distilled spirits and liquors. It was not intended to discriminate between distilled spirits and liquors.[20] To incur the penalties under this provision, the violator of the law must have a knowledge that he is doing or omitting to do the act forbidden or required, and intends so to do;[21] but fraudulent or criminal intent is not a necessary ingredient.[22]

4. WHEN FORFEITURE TAKES EFFECT. When an act has been done which works a forfeiture of property the forfeiture takes effect immediately upon the commission of the act. It relates back to the time the offense was committed, and operates at that time as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government,[23] and avoids intermediate sales and alienations even to innocent purchasers.[24] The government's title to forfeited property is not perfected until judicial condemnation.[25] Property acquired by the person who committed the offense subsequent to the date of the offense and found in his possession is not forfeited.[26]

5. Operation of Forfeiture Against Innocent Persons. Forfeiture of property is not incurred on account of the misconduct of strangers over whom the owners could have no control, unless the law clearly so declares. It is necessary to ascertain the intention of the law-making power.[27] Statutes will not be understood to forfeit property except for the fault of the owner or his agents unless such a construction is unavoidable.[28] Cases often arise where property is forfeited on account of the fraud, neglect, or misconduct of those having possession without regard to ownership. This is frequently the case with distillery property.[29] The title of the government to property infected with fraud vests from the time of its commission and the taint of fraud inheres in it even in the possession of an innocent purchaser.[30] The conveyance of forfeited property passes no title as against the United States.[31] Owners who have in no way participated in the frauds which caused the forfeiture must seek redress from the wrong-doers, or they can apply to the officers of the government invested with the authority to remit forfeitures.[32]

6. Nature of Forfeiture Proceedings. A proceeding for forfeiture is not a criminal proceeding,[33] although of a quasi-criminal nature. It is civil in form, but in its nature criminal.[34] A forfeiture does not convict the claimants, but the property proceeded against is treated as the offender.[35] The thing is considered guilty without regard to the owner or his guilt.[36]

7. Information. Proceedings for forfeiture are begun by filing a libel of information in the judicial district in which the property is seized.[37] The property

Congress has the power to decide in what event a divestiture of title shall take place, and where the act declares without any election of remedies that forfeiture shall take place upon commission of the wrongful act, the court must carry the provision into effect, even against innocent purchasers, when the title is consummated by seizure, suit, judgment, and condemnation. proposed to be forfeited should be described with reasonable certainty.[38] The technical precision of an indictment is not necessary, yet the allegations must be sufficiently specific to enable the claimant to traverse them. A general averment that the statute has been violated is insufficient.[39] It is sufficient to follow the language of the statute.[40] Where fraudulent intent is alleged it is not necessary to set out facts from which such intent is inferred.[41] Where an information is vague the claimant is entitled to a bill of particulars.[42] If an article in an information is uncertain it should be construed most favorably for defendant and most strongly against the pleader.[43] When exceptions are filed to an information, the district attorney will be given leave to amend.[44]

H. Seizure in Proceedings to Condemn Property Forfeited — 1. In General. A seizure is necessary in proceedings to condemn property forfeited.[45] Any person may make the seizure, and its adoption by the government cures any defect in this respect.[46] If goods are seized irregularly or for an insufficient cause, it is immaterial if sufficient cause is alleged in the information and is established by the evidence.[47] It is the duty of a collector on seizing property forthwith to turn the case over to the proper law officer of the government.[48] The collector is authorized to sell property seized, instead of reporting it to the United States attorney for proceeding in court, when the value does not exceed five hundred dollars.[49] An abandonment of the property by the seizing officer nullifies the seizure,[50] and the title remains in the original owner.[51] Perishable property may be sold and the proceeds paid into the registry of the court, in which event the proceeds represent the property seized.[52] The destruction of property seized is authorized in certain cases.[53] Property seized or distrained upon under the internal revenue laws is irrepleviable and action of replevin is taken away from persons claiming property so seized or distrained upon.[54]

2. Release on Bond. In ordinary cases where property can be released upon good security and without detriment to the public interests it is usual to grant an application to release on bond.[55] The court has this power independent of any statute.[56] The bond is treated as a substitute for the property itself.[57] Where the property is bonded and returned to the claimants, it is for all purposes their own as much as any property theretofore or thereafter acquired.[58] The property may be sold by the owner bona fide, and the purchaser acquires a good title.[59] Its release on bond does not divest the court of jurisdiction to go on with the condemnation proceedings. The court may reseize the property and order it to be sold, except where it will interfere with the rights of third persons, acquired after the release, and upon the faith of it.[60] It may be again seized for taxes due.[61] As the application to bond is one for a favor, terms may be imposed.[62]

with precision and certainty.[64] The general rule is that it is sufficient to charge the offense in the words of the statute.[65] It is not necessary that the exact words be followed if their equivalent is expressed,[66] but there are cases where more particularity is required.[67] Charging the offense in the language of the statute is not sufficient when the statute does not define the acts constituting the offense so as to give the offender information of the nature and cause of the accusation.[68] An indictment for a statutory misdemeanor need not charge the offense with the particularity of time, place, and circumstances required for a felony, or a common-law offense. Defendant has a remedy by application for a bill of particulars,[69] but a bill of particulars cannot cure the omission of a material averment.[70] It is not necessary to prove that the offense was committed on the day alleged unless a particular day be made material by the statute.[71] But the time charged should be consistent with the offense charged. To lay an impossible time or one beyond the statute of limitations would be bad.[72] It is not necessary to state the particular means employed to effect the commission of a statutory offense.[73] In an indictment for executing a fraudulent bond it is not necessary to set out the particulars in which the bond is fraudulent.[74] It is not necessary in an indictment for removing stamps from packages of spirits to set out the stamps removed verbatim.[75] Where knowledge or intent are not ingredients of the offense the indictment need not aver a criminal intent.[76]

2. Indictment For Failure to Pay Special Tax. Where the charge is that a certain business has been carried on without payment of special tax it is not essential to set out the particular acts which constitute the business.[77]

3. Indictment For Removing and Concealing Distilled Spirits. An indictment for removing and concealing distilled spirits on which the tax has not been paid, which charges the performance of that act at a particular time and place, and in the language of the statutes, is sufficiently certain.[78]

4. Charges Which May Be Joined in One Indictment. Distinct offenses of the same class, although committed at different times, may be joined in one indictment in separate counts,[79] although some are designated as felonies and others not.[80] Each count, charging a separate and distinct offense, is in legal effect a separate indictment. The statute in permitting the joinder of different offenses in a single indictment by necessary implication authorizes a separate punishment for each offense proved.[81]

J. Evidence[82] — 1. Privileged Communications, Documents, or Records. The records of executive departments are quasi-confidential and must be classed as privileged communications whose production cannot be compelled by a court without express authority of law.[83] The papers upon which an assessment is made are privileged, and courts have no authority to require their production.[84] Official communications between officers of the government are privileged from disclosure on the ground of public policy.[85] In certain cases communications other than those of officials may be treated as confidential, and the department may, upon public consideration, decline to furnish copies of such communications on the order of a court.[86] A state court has no right to compel by subpœna a collector to produce the records of his office for use in trial of persons indicted for violating state laws. Regulations prohibiting collectors from producing the records of their offices or furnishing copies thereof for use as evidence in behalf of litigants in any court is a valid regulation.[87]

2. Testimony of Collectors and Deputy Collectors. Collectors and deputy collectors are not only prohibited from giving out copies from their records, but also from testifying orally, in cases not arising under the laws of the United States, as to facts that have come to their knowledge as the result of information contained in the records.[88]

3. Treasury Transcripts and Copies of Papers. Duly certified treasury transcripts of accounts are admissible as evidence when suit is brought in case of delinquency of a revenue officer or other person accountable for public money.[89] The proper mode of proving papers on file in the departments is by procuring certified copies.[90] A collector of internal revenue is not required to certify copies of reports on file in his office.[91]

4. Evidence in Forfeiture Proceedings. In proceedings to enforce forfeiture the proof must conform to the allegations.[92] The government must show affirmatively every fact which is an element of the act made penal.[93] A preponderance of evidence is sufficient. It is not like a criminal case, where defendant is entitled to a reasonable doubt of guilt.[94]

5. Evidence of Fraud or Fraudulent Intent. Fraud is not to be presumed. It must be established, but it may be established, indirectly, by circumstances, as well as by direct evidence.[95] The fact that spirits are purchased for less than the tax is sufficient evidence, in the absence of any explanatory circumstances, to show that the purchaser could not have believed that the tax was paid.[96] Proof of acts other than those in question can be admitted in forfeiture proceedings to show the animus of the parties in respect to intent to defraud. The range of inquiry is within the discretion of the court.[97] Previous fraudulent intent and previous fraudulent acts are admissible to show a fraudulent intent in a subsequent transaction.[98] The execution of worthless bonds as tobacco manufacturer is material evidence on the question of fraudulent intent in proceedings to forfeit the factory.[99] A record proving the forfeiture of spirits from the same distillery for alleged frauds by a decree of another court is admissible as a circumstance strengthening the presumption of fraud charged.[1] The question whether the facts proved warrant the inference of fraud charged is exclusively for the jury.[2]

6. Production of Books and Papers. The law authorizing the production of books and papers for the government in suits other than criminal applies to cases arising under the internal revenue law, and is constitutional.[3] Private books and papers are protected from unreasonable searches. The power to compel their production covers such documents only as would be, if produced, competent material evidence for the party applying therefor.[4] Where the order of court provides that the prosecution may have judgment where the books are not produced, the failure of the claimants to produce them, where unexplained, will entitle the United States to a forfeiture.[5] The claimants and their counsel have the right to be present at the examination of such books and papers. The same need not be more specifically described than as those used and kept in his business as distiller or rectifier between certain dates named.[6]

7. Burden of Proof — a. In Suits In Rem. In civil cases the burden of proof lies on the party who asserts the affirmative, and may shift during the progress of the trial. When a presumption of fact exists against a party in a case of seizure in rem, the burden is on the party to remove the presumption, and if he does not, the case must go against him.[7] In certain cases of seizure of spirits, the law places the burden of proof on the claimant to show that no fraud has been committed, and that the tax has been paid.[8] Where evidence is introduced tending to show that true entries and returns relative to the spirits have not been made, the burden is thrown upon the claimant to prove regularity.[9] When spirits are found outside of a bonded warehouse not removed therefrom according to law, the burden is on the claimants to show that the requirements of the law have been complied with.[10] Where spirits seized are claimed by one who asserts that he purchased them in the open market, the fact that the barrels were branded to show regularity is not evidence that the taxes have been paid.[11]

b. Burden of Proof in Criminal Cases. The burden of proof in criminal cases is upon the state, and if there is a reasonable doubt as to any element necessary to constitute the offense charged, defendant should have the benefit of the doubt.[12] The burden of proof is on the prosecution throughout to establish defendant's guilt by the evidence.[13]

c. In Actions For Penalties. In an action for penalties for alleged frauds upon the revenue, the burden rests upon the government to make out its case beyond a reasonable doubt.[14]

K. Trial and Verdict[15] — 1. In General. The claimants of property seized must have notice to appear and be heard upon the charges for which the forfeiture is claimed,[16] and have a constitutional right to a trial by jury.[17] Where the evidence on a question is all one way, the court is justified in not submitting the question as one of fact to the jury.[18] The verdict of a jury is conclusive upon a question of fact, unless plainly against the evidence. The same weight must be given to the finding of a court.[19] No question of fact involved in a general finding by the court in a case at law where a jury has been waived can be the subject of review.[20] Where the information in different counts avers several frauds, under different sections, a verdict of forfeiture will be sustained, if there is one count setting forth a fraud, within the words of any one of the sections.[21]

2. Cumulative Punishment. No man can be twice lawfully punished for the same offense. There has never been any doubt of the complete protection of the party where a second punishment is proposed in the same court, on the same facts, for the same statutory offense.[22] But cumulative punishment may be imposed for distinct offenses.[23] Where offenses are punishable by a penalty in a civil action, and by fine and imprisonment in a criminal prosecution, the recovery of the penalty is not a bar to criminal proceedings.[24] Proceedings for forfeiture of property and for recovery of fine imposed upon the offender may both exist.[25] A suit on a distiller's bond does not bar or abate proceedings for forfeitures.[26]

3. Effect of Acquittal. An acquittal of the offending person is a bar to a proceeding in rem for the condemnation of property based upon the same state of facts. The facts once ascertained in the criminal proceedings cannot be again litigated as the basis of any statutory punishment denounced as a consequence of their existence.[27] But an acquittal does not estop the United States from proceeding against the party for tax, and a judgment in the one case cannot be pleaded in bar of the other.[28] The fact that an indictment has been quashed because of insufficient averments is no ground for quashing an information subsequently filed against the same person for the same offense.[29]

4. Effect of Conviction. A conviction for conspiring to defraud the United States by the unlawful removal of distilled spirits, without paying taxes, bars a subsequent civil suit to recover the penalty of double the amount of such taxes founded on the same acts.[30] If the government elects in case of a breach of duty of an officer to prosecute him by indictment instead of proceeding on his bond for damages, and obtains a conviction and satisfaction of the judgment, it would be barred from proceeding on the bond for the same delinquencies.[31] A conviction on the charge of illicit distilling is not a bar to proceedings in rem for forfeiture of the distillery. The question of being twice in jeopardy does not arise.[32]

Construction of verdict.—In an action brought to forfeit, for violation of the internal revenue acts, a quantity of manufactured tobacco, and a quantity of raw materials, and certain tools and other property, the jury rendered a verdict "in favor of the United States, condemning the goods." On a motion to arrest judgment on the verdict it was held that the verdict was a verdict for the United States on each of the three issues presented to the jury. U. "Many cases exist, where there is both a forfeiture

After an officer and stock-holder of a corporation engaged in distilling has been convicted of violation of law, an action cannot be maintained to enforce forfeiture of the corporation's property for the same offense.[33] Where there was a separate verdict of guilty on several counts in an indictment, and the various offenses charged were connected with each other so as to substantially constitute but one offense, the court rendered but one judgment on the verdict.[34]

5. Opening Judgment and New Trial. There is no power to open a judgment of forfeiture after the term at which it was entered, but where a judgment is entered by mistake of the court the mistake may be corrected after almost any lapse of time if the rights of third parties have not intervened.[35] Errors in the proceedings not merely formal must be corrected by proceedings in the appellate tribunal.[36] A court has no power to open a judgment against the surety on a bond and grant a new trial, upon the ground that certain facts, existing when the case was tried, were not then put in evidence.[37] The weight of authority is that the court will not grant a new trial in an action for a forfeiture where the verdict is for defendant.[38]

6. Costs.[39] When judgment is rendered against defendant in a prosecution for a fine or forfeiture, he shall be subject to the payment of costs. The word "defendant" includes a claimant in an action in rem for forfeiture.[40] These costs consist of expenditures made by the government during the progress of the case,[41] expenses of clerks and officers sent away as witnesses;[42] expenses of watching property seized;[43] and premiums for insurance of property seized paid by the marshal.[44]

general.[46] The final authority rests with the commissioner. The functions of the secretary of the treasury and the attorney-general are advisory.[47] The right to compromise embraces the criminal as well as the civil liability of defendant, but ceases after final judgment.[48] The discontinuance of a case in court on payment of costs is a compromise requiring the concurrence of the three officers named.[49] The commissioner may direct an unconditional dismissal of a suit without the recommendation of the attorney-general.[50] The commissioner is not authorized to compromise offenses committed by internal revenue officers, nor suits brought by a taxpayer for recovery of taxes alleged to have been erroneously collected.[51]

2. COMPROMISE OF TAXES. Taxes legally due from a solvent taxpayer cannot be compromised.[52] Disputed claims for taxes can be compromised in the mode prescribed.[53]

3. MONEY DEPOSITED IN COMPROMISE. Money deposited with the collector to apply to a proposed compromise cannot be held or set off against taxes due; but where the collector applied it improperly to payment of a disputed tax the government may set up the tax by way of counter-claim in a suit brought to recover it.[54]

4. COMPROMISE OF CASES AFTER JUDGMENT. The secretary of the treasury has power to compromise claims and judgments in favor of the United States, in cases where collection is doubtful.[55] The power is strictly a fiscal one and to be exercised upon fiscal consideration alone.[56] The government's claim to real property cannot be compromised.[57]

5. EFFECT OF COMPROMISE. A compromise operates for the protection of the offender against subsequent proceedings as fully as a former conviction or acquittal, and is a bar to a suit on a bond to recover penalties based upon the same offense.[58]

M. Remission of Fines, Penalties, and Forfeitures — 1. IN GENERAL. The power of the secretary of the treasury to remit fines, penalties, and forfeitures applies to penalties under the internal revenue laws as well as under the customs laws.[59] The distinction between the power of the secretary to compromise and the power to remit fines, penalties, and forfeitures is that the former is strictly a

A compromise implies some mutuality of concession, some real doubt about the legality of the claim, or the ability to meet it. 16 Op. Atty.-Gen. 249. fiscal one and the latter in the nature of a pardoning power.[60] The power to remit penalties is intrusted to the secretary of the treasury alone, and there is no appeal from his decision.[61]

2. PARDON. A pardon relieves the offender from the consequences of his offense; and when the forfeiture of his property is one of those consequences, it returns the property to him, unless the rights of other parties have vested.[62] It is a bar to a civil suit for penalties growing out of the same transaction,[63] but does not relieve a party from the payment of taxes which are due.[64] The pardon of an officer is a bar to an action on his official bond, assigning the same act as a breach.[65]

N. Rewards For Information — 1. IN GENERAL. The commissioner of internal revenue with the approval of the secretary of the treasury is authorized to offer rewards for information leading to the detection and punishment of persons violating the internal revenue laws.[66] The circular offering a reward expresses the contract between the informer and the government.[67] The offer may be withdrawn at any time, and unless prior to the withdrawal something has been done to establish a right under it, a claimant takes nothing by reason thereof.[68]

2. WHO IS AN INFORMER. The informer is he who first gives to some officer authorized to act upon it information which leads in fact to the seizure and forfeiture.[69] A special agent appointed to investigate a fraud is not an informer in respect to facts found in the ordinary and regular discharge of his duty.[70] Although as a general rule the payment of a reward to an officer for services within the scope of his official duties is contrary to public policy,[71] it has been held that a deputy marshal is entitled to receive a reward expressly authorized by competent legislative authority and sanctioned by the executive officer to whom the legislative power has delegated ample discretion to offer a reward.[72]

3. REPEAL OF STATUTES GIVING SHARES TO INFORMERS. The right of informers to moieties under former acts[73] was repealed in 1872.[74] The fact that a person

Atty.-Gen. 228. An officer who obtained information through the examination of witnesses compelled to testify before the grand jury, or who acted on information furnished him as an officer, and intended by his informant to be given the government, and did not recover new facts by his own diligence, was not the informer. U. S. v. One Hundred Barrels of Distilled Spirits, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,946, 1 Lowell 244, 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 20.

Who is an informer.— Under the act of 1864, section 179, as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 [14 U. S. St. at L. 145], the informer is he who first gives to a person authorized to receive it the important information which in fact leads to the desired result. The offer is not necessarily confined to persons who shall expose the details of the fraud. Thus, if the government officers were already aware of the offense, but were unable to trace the goods, and the informer supplied the necessary facts; or if the informer without knowing precisely what fraud had been perpetrated knew of suspicious circumstances sufficient to justify a seizure; in these and similar cases, the person who gave the information by which the forfeiture was in fact decreed or imposed would be within the fair intent of the act. U. S. v. One Hundred Barrels of Distilled Spirits, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,946, 1 Lowell 244, 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 20.

It is not essential that an informer should act as prosecutor or be called as a witness; it is enough that the result is in fact reached primarily through his means. U. S. v. One Hundred Barrels of Distilled Spirits, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,946, 1 Lowell 244, 8 Int. Rev. Rec. 20. See also as sustaining this proposition Sawyer v. Steele, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,406, 3 Wash. 464; Besse v. Dyer, 9 Allen (Mass.) 151, 85 Am. Dec. 747; Crowshow v. Roxbury, 9 Gray (Mass.) 374; Smith v. Moore, 1 C. B. 438, 9 Jur. 352, 50 E. C. L. 438.

Necessity of statutory authority for allowance.— An informer of a violation of revenue laws, by virtue of which a seizure is made and condemnation of the property is obtained, can entitle himself to a reward or proportion of the property, only in cases provided for by some statute. Such services do not create a legal or equitable title to compensation. Robinson v. Hook, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11,956, 4 Mason 139.

Necessity for recovery of judgment.— It is only when the amount of the penalty has been recovered by a judgment of the court that an informer is entitled to a moiety thereof. Thus if it was paid by a compromise or agreement before final judgment he is not entitled to any share therein, either under U. S. St. (1862) c. 119, § 31, or U. S. St. (1864) c. 173, § 41. The right of the informer became fixed, on the receipt by the marshal of the money, to receive the amount to which, by the then existing regulation, he was entitled. In re Eight Barrels of Distilled Spirits, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,316, 1 Ben. 472, 10 Int. Rev. Rec. 157; U. S. v. Twenty-Five Thousand Segars, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,565, 5 Blatchf. 500.

Jurisdiction of suits by an informer against collector.— Where judgment is given for the amount of a penalty which was paid over to the collector as the representative of the United States, and the judgment does not pass upon the question of who was the informer, he might sue the collector for the moiety in any national or state court having jurisdiction of the parties. Rice v. Thayer, 105 Mass. 258, 7 Am. Rep. 516; Lapham v. Almy, 13 Allen (Mass.) 301. See also the following decisions of the federal courts as tending to sustain this view. Buel v. Van Ness, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 312, 5 L. ed. 624; Van Ness v. Buel, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 74, 4 L. ed. 516; Jones v. Shore, 1 Wheat. (U. S.) 462, 4 L. ed. 136; Sawyer v. Steele, 21 Fed. Cas. No. 12,406, 3 Wash. 464.

Deduction for costs.— The proviso in section 91 of the act of congress of March 2, 1799 (1 U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 3089 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 2016]), that where the value of the property forfeited is less than two hundred and fifty dollars, the share of the United States is to be applied toward the costs of the prosecution is general in its application, and is applicable to forfeitures under the internal revenue laws. The share allotted to the informer is not subject to a proportionate deduction for costs and charges. In re One Large Water Tub, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,532, 3 Ben. 436, 10 Int. Rev. Rec. 139.

By what law governed.— A decree condemning liquor was entered by the consent of the claimant, but before a sale thereunder the decree and all proceedings thereon were vacated on claimant's motion, and he was allowed to come in and defend. After he filed his claim and answer, the cause was postponed for one term, and a final decree of condemnation was then rendered and carried into execution. It was held that the share of the informer in the proceeds was to be determined by the law in force at the time of such final decree. U. I. NATURE AND SOURCES.

A. Definition. International law has not, as yet, perhaps, been fully and accurately defined, or rather the specific matters to which it may extend and its scope have not been fully settled. It includes, however, the entire body of obligations which one nation owes to another with respect to its own conduct or the conduct of its citizens toward other nations or their citizens.[1] As defined by Wheaton, it consists "of those rules of conduct which reason deduces, as consonant to justice, from the nature of the society existing among independent nations; with such definitions and modifications as may be established by general consent."[2] International law is "divided into public and private: public, that which regulates the political intercourse of nations with each other; private, that which regulates the comity of States in giving effect in one State to the municipal laws of another relating to private persons, their contracts, etc."[3]

B. History, Legal Nature, and Scope. As a science international law is of comparatively recent origin. It did not exist in the modern comprehensive sense either in the ancient world or in the middle ages.[4] It is not proposed in this article to treat international law from the historical point of view,[5] but rather from the legal standpoint; that is to say, to endeavor to arrive at the principles which have been established, and which are now applied, in the relations of states between themselves or their citizens. Two views have been taken as to the legal nature of international law. There are those who regard it as absolute law which can be ascertained, applied, and enforced; and others who regard it as merely a body of ethical rules properly applicable as occasion arises, but which cannot be insisted upon or enforced. There are various theories in this respect, known as the Hobbes, Austin, and Bentham theories.[6] But international law will be treated in this article from the American standpoint, which is that the law of nations does exist, can be ascertained, and can be applied, and that there is a body of law which civilized nations have consented should form the rules of their conduct in their relations with each other.[7] It will therefore be assumed that there is actually a body of international law which is ascertainable and by which, when ascertained, international relations can be controlled and adjudicated as between nations when no sovereign authority above a sovereign state, the law is between and not above the states, and this was the argument which induced Jeremy Bentham to define it as "international law." Roche v. Washington, 19 Ind. 53, 81 Am. Dec. 376. See also Snow Manual Int. L. § 2.

Difference between international and municipal law.— "The Law of Nations and the Municipal Law of the single States are essentially different from each other. They differ, first, as regards their sources. Sources of Municipal Law are custom grown up within the boundaries of the respective State and statutes enacted by the law-giving authority. Sources of International Law are custom grown up within the Family of Nations and law-making treaties concluded by the members of that family." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 20 [citing Holland Studies Int. "There is no precise time at which it may be said that the body of rules which regulate, under the title of international law, the intercourse of nations, came into being. As a science it assumed a definite form in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries." 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 1.

5. Numerous text writers, such as Wheaton, Kent, Walker, and others, have published elaborate treatises on the history of the development of international law, most of them dividing it into two periods, one prior to Grotius, who published his work "De Jure Belli ac Pacis" in 1625, or prior to the Peace of Westphalia, in 1648, and the other or modern period, subsequent thereto. The pre-Grotian writers include Legnano, Belli, Brunus, Victoria, Ayala, Suarez, and Gentilis. The list of the great writers on international law of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries includes Grotius, Gentilis, Bentham, Bynkershoek, Zouche, Pufendorf, Moser, von Martens, Wolff, and Vattel. Oppenheim gives the following list of authorities on international law as being the leading modern authorities in their respective countries:

Great Britain.— Manning, Polson, Wildman, Phillimore, Twiss, Amos, Creasy, Hall, Maine, Lorimer, Levi, Lawrence, Walker, Baker, Smith, and Westlake.

United States.— Kent, Wheaton, Woolsey, Halleck, Wharton, Davis, and Taylor.

France.— Funck-Brentano and Sorel, Pradier-Fodéré, Bonfils, Despagnet, Piedelièvre.

Germany.—Schmalz, Klüber, Saalfeld, Heffter, Oppenheim, Bluntschli, Hartmann, Holtzendorff, Bulmerincq, Gareis, Ullmann, von Liszt.

Italy.— Casanova, Fiore, Carnazza-Amari, del Bon, Sandona, Pertille, Pierantoni.

Spain and Spanish America.— Bello, de Pando, Riquelme, Calvo, Alcorta, de Olivart, Acosta, Cruchaga.

Miscellaneous.— Bornemann, von Martens, Ferguson, Rivier, Matzen, Nys.

See also 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. pp. ix–xxx appendix, which contains a complete list of authorities on the subject.

According to Wheaton, and his view has been generally followed, the Peace of Westphalia in 1648 may be chosen as the epoch from which dates the history of the modern science of international law. Wheaton Hist. L. of N. p. 69.

they agree to submit controversies to properly organized tribunals, and by which also courts of law may determine the relations between parties over whom they have jurisdiction.[8] In fact the rule is in the United States that the fundamental principles of the law of nations form a part of the municipal jurisprudence of every country, and that it may be ascertained and administered by the courts of appropriate jurisdiction as often as rights depending upon it are duly presented for their determination.[9] Before the adoption of the constitution the proposition had been advanced that the law of nations was part of the common law of Great Britain.[10] Under the theory that the nation was only bound by those rules of international law to which it had consented it was held in 1876 that, although a rule might be one generally recognized by international law, it would not be binding upon Great Britian until that country had consented to it, and it was held in the Franconia case that such consent must be evidenced by an act of parliament.[11] In the United States the rule is different, as the existence of the law of "The Government of the United States has on various occasions announced the principle that International law, as a system, is binding upon nations, not merely as something to which they may be tacitly assumed to have agreed, but also as a fundamental condition of their admission to full and equal participation in the intercourse of civilized states." 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 1 [p. 2].

8. The law of nations is not, however, always the same as the law of nature, nor is a rule of public morals, according to civilized notions, a rule of international law. For instance, the African slave trade was held to be contrary to the law of nature, but not prohibited by the positive law of nations. The Antelope, 10 Wheat. (U. "The early English authorities accepted the law of nations as law in the concrete, and administered it in courts of justice and common law, whenever a case arose in a court necessarily involving a question of international law. The statement of Sir William Blackstone may be taken as summing up the view of the bench and bar in his day. In a passage of his Commentaries, not so well known as it should be, the learned expounder of the Laws of England says: 'The Law of Nations (whenever any question arises which is properly the object of its jurisdiction) is here [in England] adopted by its full extent by the common law, and is held to be a part of the law of the land (4 Blackstone Comm. 67).'" 5 Columbia L. Rev. 126 (article by Professor James Brown Scott on the "Legal Nature of International Law"), where it is also said: "The view thus expressed was not original with Blackstone. It was simply a digest of the various cases decided before and during his time in courts of justice." See Barbuit's Case, Cas. t. Talb. 281, 283, in which Lord Talbot held that the law of nations in its full extent was part of the law of England. 11. Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63, 13 Cox C. C. 403, 46 L. J. M. C. 17. The question involved in that case was whether the jurisdiction of the state extended over the maritime belt of three marine miles from low-water mark, and the court held that, although the rule was generally recognized in international law, it had never been consented to by Great Britain, and refused to take jurisdiction to try a man indicted for manslaughter on a foreign vessel within three miles of the English coast on the ground that that territory was not within "the body of the county" within which the trial court had jurisdiction. This case was decided in the exchequer division by a divided court and has been frequently commented on and criticized. See 11 Am. L. "It is quite true that whatever has received the common consent of civilized nations must have received the assent of our country, and that to which we have assented along with other nations in general may properly be called international law, and as such will be acknowledged and applied by our municipal tribunals when legitimate occasion arises for those tribunals to decide questions to which doctrines of international law may be relevant." nations was recognized by the framers of the constitution, and congress was authorized to "define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations." [12] In fact it had been recognized prior to the adoption of the constitution by the continental congress in the ordinances adopted Dec. 4, 1781.[13] Since the adoption of the constitution congress has frequently recognized the existence of the law of nations in enacting statutes relating to the adjustment of claims against foreign governments, defining the crime of piracy and in punishing the counterfeiting of securities of foreign governments, etc.[14] The courts of the United States have recognized the existence of international law in construing these statutes and also in determining the rights, under international law, of parties litigant, and in so doing have held that the law of nations "is no less binding upon congress than if the limitation were written in the Constitution." [15] In reaching this conclusion the courts have held that international law is part of the common law [16] and that it is "the law of all tribunals in the society of nations, and is supposed to be equally understood by all." two classes: (1) Those in which one state asserts a claim against another state and which can only be settled by an international tribunal, as the courts of neither state would have jurisdiction over the other state;[18] and (2) cases in which an individual seeks some redress in the courts against a person over whom the courts have jurisdiction in a case where the principles of international law are involved.[19] The American studying international law will therefore find several distinct bodies of decisions that must be consulted: (1) The decisions of international tribunals, all of which, up to the present time, have been separate and independent of each other; (2) the decisions of American courts, which are binding as precedents, according to the authority of the court, on American courts, and in which those courts have determined what, in their respective opinions, the rules of international law involved were and how they should be applied in the particular case under consideration; and (3) similar decisions of municipal courts in other countries. When the courts of the United States determine what the rules of international law are and how they should be applied, their decisions (and this is true of the courts of other countries) are not necessarily binding upon the tribunals of other countries or upon international tribunals of arbitration.[20] No court of arbitration is necessarily bound by the doctrine of stare decisis; it will listen with respect and take into consideration and carefully weigh the decisions rendered by other tribunals, but it is in no wise bound thereby. That element of uniformity does not at present exist in the systems of having arbitrations ad hoc to settle each separate dispute. The tendency, however, on the part

L. § 1, where it is said: "International law differs from the municipal or national law of individual States in that it does not proceed from any authorized law making power and that it has no superior international tribunal whose functions it is to enforce the law in the case of its infraction. Nevertheless it is obeyed for the most part without question, and it is only upon exceptional occasions that resort is now had to war as a settlement of international disputes." See also U. S. v. The Active, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,420, 3 Wheel. Cr. (N. Y.) 263, where it is said: "[International law] is a law for the government of national communities as to their mutual relations, and not for the government of individuals of those communities in their relation towards one another — nor can it control the conduct of nations towards their own citizens, except in cases involving the rights of other nations."

These cases might either involve international claims where the state itself had sustained an injury and was seeking redress for the nation and not for any particular individual, or claims which the nation asserted on behalf of a particular citizen or particular class of citizens injured by a foreign state, and which would also have to be settled by an international tribunal.

19. For instance, in the case of "The Schooner Exchange," where an American sought to regain possession of a vessel formerly his property which had been seized by order, and passed into the possession, of a foreign sovereign who had transformed her into a vessel of war, it was decided, Chief Justice Marshall writing the opinion, that a sovereign cannot be sued in the courts of another country, the decision being based entirely upon the principles of international law, and not on any particular rules of the common law or the statutory law of this country. The Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 116, 3 L. ed. 287. "The cases of Wolff v. Oxholm, 6 M. & S. 92, 18 Rev. Rep. 313, and Reg. v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63, 13 Cox C. C. 403, 46 L. J. M. C. 17, are only illustrations of the same rule — namely, that questions of international law may arise, and may have to be considered in connection with the administration of municipal law." West Rand Cent. Gold Min. Co. v. Rex, [1905] 2 K. B. 391, 408.

Application to prize cases.— International law is limited to questions affecting the mutual relations of nations. Therefore, in its application to prize cases, it only determines under what circumstances prizes may be taken, and does not attempt to declare to whom the property shall go after it is taken — whether to the captors themselves, or to their government. These latter questions must be regulated exclusively by the municipal law of the captor's own country. U. S. v. The Active, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,420.

20. The United States condemned British vessels for pelagiac sealing in Bering sea, but subsequently the Paris tribunal held that the United States had no right to do so and the United States was obliged to indemnify the owners of the vessels which had been condemned. In like manner, the United States court condemned the Peterhoff as a prize during the Civil war after the capture of New of all nations to submit matters to arbitration will probably result in greater uniformity of decision and greater weight being given to prior decisions in similar cases.[21] International law as administered by the laws of a country thereupon becomes part of the municipal law and theoretically ceases to be international law, as under the Bentham theory above referred to international law is a law between states and individuals cannot be parties to it nor can the courts of either nation determine what the law is.[22] Therefore the decisions of the courts of this country and of Great Britain which are cited in this article and the notes thereto are not, strictly speaking, international law cases, but cases involving the principles of international law, and the decisions of the respective courts are, so far as other states are concerned, only the utterances of those courts as to what, in their respective opinions, are the principles of international law involved in those cases. As to cases subsequently arising in the courts of the United States, however, the decisions of the courts of this country are authoritative and will be followed.

C. Codification and Sources. International law has never been codified,[23] either as it exists between states or as administered as a part of the municipal law by courts of the different countries. It corresponds more to the unwritten and customary law and the exact rule applicable to the case under consideration has to be determined by previous decisions, and what has been consented to and adopted by different nations; to ascertain this the court may refer not only to the statutes, treaties, and legislative acts and judicial decisions, but also to the customs and usages of civilized nations, to the works of jurists, and the opinions

Orleans and the claims commission under the treaty of 1871 with Great Britain held that the captnre was illegal and the United States was obliged to indemnify the owners of the vessel. See The Peterhoff v. U. S., 5 Wall. (U. S.) 28, 18 L. ed. 564. See also 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3838.

21. The institution of the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague for the peaceful settlement of international disputes provides a court, the decisions of which as they are rendered from time to time ought eventually to form a body of precedents similar to that of the unwritten common law of England and the United States; the decisions of this court should, and probably will, have the same force and effect as precedents for subsequent cases involving similar questions as the decisions of the courts in countries where the doctrine of stare decisis prevails. At present the court at The Hague has a large number of judicial members, appointed by the different governments signatory to the treaty, and the personnel of the actual court in the various cases submitted to the tribunal necessarily varies, as it is seldom that the same members of the court are chosen. It would be a great step forward if the number of judges were reduced so that the personnel of the court would be permanent. Under such circumstances the decisions would bave greater weight and would be more binding as precedents, as the court would of course follow its own decisions more closely, if rendered by the same judges in the same manner as in the great appellate courts of the United States and England. The same deference and respect is not paid to the judgments of a court where the judges are constantly changing, as no one of the judges feels that he is personally bound by the decisions of a court so constituted, nor does the same obligation to do so exist.

22. See supra, note 6.

23. Attempts have been made, from time to time, to codify certain parts of international law, and while they have never been adopted universally, they have a certain weight and authority, depending more or less upon the ability with which the codification has been made and the acceptance of the definitions and rules therein contained. Amongst these codifications are those of Prof. Francis Lieber, of Columbia University, in 1863, prepared under the directions of President Lincoln, and issued as General Order No. 100, entitled "Instructions for the Government of the Armies of the United States in the Field;" Bluntschli's Draft in 1868; Mancini's in 1872; David Dudley Field's in 1872; the code of the Institute of International Law of 1880; of Fiore, 1890; the codes of the Convention of the Peace Conference of The Hague of 1899. In 1900 the United States issued a body of rules entitled "The Laws and Usages of War at Sea" which was promulgated by the navy department, but was revoked by an order issued Feb. 4, 1904. See also 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 30, where he refers to various attempts at codification.

"Codification has a tendency to arrest progress. It has been so found, even where branches or heads of municipal law have been codified, and it will at once be seen how much less favorable a field for such an enterprise international law presents, where so many questions are still indeterminate. . . . While agreeing, therefore, that indeterminate points should be determined and that we should aim at raising the ethical standard, I do not think we have yet reached the point at which codification is practicable, or if practicable, would of commentators.[24] Every text writer has attempted to classify the sources of international law, that is, the places where its rules and principles may be obtained. They differ in various degrees, and attempts have been made to give a relative value to the different sources; but it is impossible to differentiate them in this manner, and the statement from Snow's Manual in the notes includes all the principal sources of modern international law.[25] And in the ascertainment of any fact of which they are bound to take judicial notice, as in the decision of matters of law which it is their office to know, judges may refresh their memories and inform their consciences from such sources as they deem most trustworthy.[26]

In determining what the rules of international law are that apply to a given case the court will always endeavor to ascertain what the long established usages are of the nations of the world, as well as the written compacts affecting the particular cases. "These rules are the outgrowth of the customs arising from the intercourse of nations, of various international agreements, and of the acts of states which have in the lapse of time been accepted as of binding force by the various civilized States of the world. They may be considered as being based upon the moral and intelligent conviction of enlightened mankind." Snow Manual Int. L. § 1. The law of nations is the law of nature, rendered applicable to political societies, and modified, in progress of time, by the tacit or express consent, or by the long-established usages and written compact of nations. Johnson v. Twenty-One Bales, etc., 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,417, 2 Paine 601, Van Ness Prize Cas. 5. The law of nations, having its origin in the necessities growing out of the commercial, diplomatic and social intercourse of civilized nations, and being founded on their express or implied assent, cannot be extended to those nations who have not so assented, and who are by nature and constitution incapable of civilized intercourse. Heirn v. Bridault, 37 Miss. 209.

25. "By the sources of international law is meant the places where its rulings and principles are obtained. The following may be given as the sources of modern international law: 1. The works of great publicists — the text writers of authority. These give both principles and usages. 2. The decisions and conclusions of prize courts, of official international conferences and of arbitral tribunals. 3. Treaties. 4. State papers of jurists, opinions of attorneys-general, confidentially and otherwise given to their respective governments. 5. Instructions, regulations and ordinances issued by the States for the guidance of their own citizens or subjects, officers, and tribunals. 6. History of wars, negotiations, and current events. 7. The proposed codes and formulated views of voluntary international associations of jurists. Though an attempt is made by the order of classification to give the relative value of these sources, still in practice with the different writers and different schools in existence, it is almost impossible to make a rigid distinction. International usage, however, may be considered as the touchstone which gives life and strength to the principles of international law. When rules, apparently sound, conflict, then usage, prevailing usage, should determine the rule to follow. Snow Manual Int. L. § 3.

"The law of nations is the great source from which we derive those rules, respecting belligerent and neutral rights, which are recognized by all civilized and commercial states throughout Europe and America. This law is in part unwritten, and in part conventional. To ascertain that which is unwritten, we resort to the great principles of reason and justice: but as these principles will be differently understood by different nations, under different circumstances, we consider them as being, in some degree, fixed and rendered stable by a series of judicial decisions. The decisions of the courts of every country, so far as they are founded upon a law common to every country, will be received, not as authority, but with respect. The decisions of the courts of every country show how the law of nations, in the given case, is understood in that country, and will be considered in adopting the rule which is to prevail in this." Bentzon v. Boyle, 9 Cranch 191, 198, 3 L. ed. 701.

II. EXISTENCE AND IDENTITY OF STATES.

A. "States" Defined. States as Vattel[27] defines them "are bodies politic, societies of men united together for the promotion of their mutual safety and advantage by the joint efforts of their combined strength. Such a society has her affairs and her interests. She deliberates and takes resolutions in common, thus becoming a moral person who possesses an understanding and a will peculiar to herself and is susceptible of obligations and rights."

B. Kinds of States — 1. In General. International law recognizes a number of different kinds of states, and these states can deal with each other as soon as they are independent. Where states are independent they can deal with other states on an equal basis, for "no principle of general law is more universally acknowledged, than the perfect equality of nations. . . . It results from this equality, that no one can rightfully impose a rule on another."[28]

2. Sovereign States — a. In General. States, or international persons, as they are called in international law, are generally single sovereign states in which there is one central political authority representing the state within its borders as well as in its intercourse with other international persons.[29]

b. Composite International Person — (I) Personal Union. A composite international person exists where two or more independent states are in some way so united that they deal and are dealt with by other international persons as a unit. These unions may be real or personal. A personal union is where two international persons happen to have for the time being the same sovereign; the nations themselves are not necessarily amalgamated, but owing to the accidental fact that they have the same sovereign their international relations are conducted through him.[30]

(II) Real Union. A real union exists when two sovereign states are so united under the same monarch or government that they make thereafter one single international person as to the outside world.[31]

c. Confederated States. Confederated states are a number of fully sovereign states united for the maintenance of their independence by a compact or a treaty in a union for which a central government is organized with certain

Wheaton says that "Cicero and subsequent public jurists define a State to be a body political or society of men united together for the purpose of promoting their mutual safety and advantage by their combined strength." Wheaton Int. L. § 17 [quoted with approval in Keith v. Clark, 97 U. S. 454, 460, 24 L. ed. 1071].

"A sovereign state may be defined as a body politic, supreme over its members, subject to no external authority, which has attained a certain size, sufficiency of importance, and degree of civilization. Fixed in its own territory, with well defined boundaries, it must have provided for the continuity of its existence." Snow Manual Int. L. § 4. See also Texas v. White, 7 Wall. (U. S.) 700, 19 L. ed. 227; Yrisarri v. Clement, 3 Bing. 432, 11 E. C. L. 213, 2 C. & P. 223, 12 E. C. L. 538, 4 L. J. C. P. O. S. 128, 11 Moore C. P. 308.

States, their characteristics, and their classifications, form the subject-matter of 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. C. 2. The chapter treats at length of definitions, sovereignty, independence, classification, government, and rights and duties of states.

28. The Antelope, 10 Wheat. (U. S.) 66, 122, 6 L. ed. 268.

29. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 85.

The accepted definitions of state exclude corporations created by a state and existing under its authority whatever its purpose may be; that is, The East India Company; voluntary associations of robbers, pirates, or outlaws, although banded together for their own safety; unsettled hordes of wandering savages not yet formed into civil societies. The legal idea of state necessarily implies habitual obedience of the members to the persons in whom authority is vested, a fixed abode of, and definite territory belonging to the people thereof. 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 1 [p. 15].

30. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 85. Examples of this are Great Britain and Hanover from 1714 to 1837; Netherlands and Luxemburg from 1815 to 1890; and at present Belgium and the Congo Free State.

31. For instance, Austria and Hungary; and until a very recent period Norway and Sweden. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 85.

powers over the principal states which still retain their independence as to local government. Such a confederation does not create a new state or nation, except so far as other states or nations are concerned, and their international relations have to be conducted through the central government.[32]

d. Federal State. A federal state is a union of several sovereign states, the central government of which is invested with power not only over the federal states but which also, to the extent of the power delegated to it, exercises power over the citizens of the several states.[33]

3. States Not Full Sovereign. Besides full sovereign states,[34] which are international persons in the fullest sense of the word, there are other international persons which are not full sovereign but which are subject, in their international relations, to limitations imposed on them by reason of their relations with other states,[35] or their sovereignty may be complete in all respects except where it is expressly limited by some peculiar treaty.[36]

4. As Affecting Responsibility. Where a state is a single sovereign state, such for instance as France, there is no question about the liability of that state for any act occurring in its jurisdiction for which an international person is responsible to another international person. But questions of responsibility frequently arise in the case of federations and other unions as to how far the central government of the union is responsible for the acts of the member states. This is a question in which the United States is particularly interested. Questions have frequently arisen as to how far the federal government is responsible for acts for which the states themselves would be responsible if they were separate international persons and not members of the Union.[37]

C. "Family of Nations." It is a theory of international law that every part of the world has some government responsible for it to the other nations of the world, and the different states which are so responsible make up the family of 32. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 87. Examples are: The Netherlands from 1580 to 1795; the United States from 1778 to 1787; Germany from 1815 to 1866; and the present Republic of Central America. The Confederate States of America were organized on the basis of a confederation, with complete sovereignty to the states, as distinguished from the federal states with international existence in the central government.

33. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 88. Such a nation may be based either on treaty or a constitution. Examples are: The United States; Switzerland; Germany; Mexico; Argentina; Brazil; Venezuela.

For the dual relation of citizens of a confederation to the state and to the central government see U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 550, 23 L. ed. 588.

34. See supra, II, B, 2.

35. These might be colonies, such as different states of the United States were prior to the Declaration of Independence, or they might be vassal states over which more powerful states exercise a suzerainty, or they may be protected states. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 89.

Sovereign — Half-sovereign.— In The Charkieh, L. R. 4 A. & E. 59, 1 Aspin. 581, 42 L. J. Adm. 17, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513, Scott Cases Int. L. 48, the status of the khedive of Egypt was considered. The Charkieh was claimed to be a public vessel of the khedive and to be exempt from process as appertaining to the sovereignty of that ruler. It was held that the khedive was a subject of the Ottoman empire and not entitled to the privilege of a sovereign prince and that his property was not exempt from seizure.

36. Such for instance as Cuba, which is fully sovereign as to all the world in all respects except so far as it is affected by the provisions of the "Platt Amendment" and the treaty thereafter including the same. In this amendment and treaty Cuba's sovereign powers are limited, amongst other things, against incurring any debt the interest of which would exceed the revenues of the island. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 91. The Platt amendment so called because it was offered by Sen. O. H. Platt of Connecticut, then chairman of the senate committee on relations with Cuba, as an amendment to the pending bill for appropriations for the army and adopted as a "rider" to that bill is a part of c. 803, 31 U. S. St. at L. 895, 897 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 2799], approved March 2, 1901. The Platt amendment appears at length in 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power 175. And see pp. 173–190, for other congressional resolutions and decisions regarding Cuba and relations to United States prior to the withdrawal of troops of United States therefrom.

nations. There are constant changes in this family as the result of annexation, conquest, union, or dissolution of unions.[38] The most recent classification by any expert authority on international law is by Oppenheim,[39] which can be accepted with the modification as to Sweden and Norway.[40]

D. Terminology. So far we have spoken of international persons as "states."[41] In describing and referring to them other terms are frequently used, such as "people," "nation," "sovereign," "union," etc.[42] As a general proposition of international law, states deal only with states, and the question of whether an

L. p. 40].

39. Oppenheim (1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 108) has classified all the nations and countries of the world according to their status as follows:

European.— Great Powers.— Austria-Hungary; France; Germany; Great Britain; Italy; Russia.

Smaller states. — Denmark; Greece; Holland; Montenegro; Portugal; Roumania; Servia; Spain; Sweden-Norway; Turkey.

Very small, but nevertheless full-sovereign states.— Lichenstein and Monaco.

Neutralized states.—Belgium; Luxemburg; Switzerland.

Part-sovereign states.—(a) Member-States of Germany: Kingdoms — Bavaria; Prussia; Saxony; Würtemburg. Grand-Duchies — Baden; Hesse; Mecklenburg-Schwerin; Mecklenburg-Strelitz; Oldenburg. Dukedoms — Anhalt; Brunswick; Saxe-Altenburg; Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; Saxe-Meingen; Saxe-Weimar. Principalities — Lippe; Reuss Elder Line; Reuss Younger Line; Schaumburg-Sonderhausen; Waldeck. Free Towns — Bremen; Hamburg; Lubeck. (b) Member-States of Switzerland: Aargau; Appenzell; Basle; Berne; Fribourg; Geneva; Glarus; Grisons; Lucerne; Neuchatel; Schaffhausen; Soleure; St. Gall; Tessin; Thurgau; Unterwalden; Uri; Valais; Vaud; Zug.

North America.—United States of America; United States of Mexico.

Central America.— Major Republic of Central America (Honduras, Nicaragua, and San Salvador); Costa Rica; Cuba; Guatemala; Hayti; Panama; San Domingo.

South America.— Bolivia; Chili; Colombia; Ecuador; Paraguay; Peru; United States of Argentina; United States of Brazil; United States of Venezuela; Uruguay.

Africa.—Full-sovereign.—Congo Free State; Negro Republic of Liberia.

Half-sovereign.— Egypt; Tunis. Abyssinia and Morocco are full sovereign states, but for some parts only are included in the family of nations.

Asia.— Japan is the only full and real member of the family of nations. China, Korea, Persia, Siam, and Tibet are for some parts only within the family of nations.

For other instances of neutralized states; suzerain and subject; protected states and protectorates; and as to the status of the American Indians — domestic dependent nations; the Holy See and the status of states under military occupation see 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. c. 2.

40. Until recently in classifying the family of nations Sweden and Norway were classified as one international person, but since the severance of 1905 each state now stands as a separate international person.

41. See supra, passim.

42. For definitions of "states," "nation," "people," "sovereign," "dependency," "vassalage," "protectorate," "union," "unions both incorporate and federal"; the effect of internal changes resulting from civil war, revolutions, and other changes, see Halleck Int. L. c. 3; and the collection of authorities and citations under the different subdivisions. "In the 18th article of the treaty, the terms 'subjects,' 'people,' and 'inhabitants,' are indiscriminately used as synonymous, to designate the same persons in both countries." The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. (U. S.) 227, 245, 4 L. ed. 226.

"Colony" is defined in The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 512, 5 C. C. A. 608. See also The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897.

"Dependency" was defined by the court in U. S. v. The Nancy, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 15,854, 3 Wash. 281, 286, to imply "some civil and political relation, which one country bears to another, as its superior, different from that of a mere possession." See Alpheus Henry Snow's recent work, "The Government of Dependencies."

"District" is defined in The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 512, 5 C. C. A. 608. See also The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897.

"Nation." — "The word 'nation' as ordinarily used presupposes or implies an independence of any other sovereign power more or less absolute, an organized government, recognized officials, a system of laws, definite boundaries and the power to enter into negotiations with other nations." Montoya v. U. S., 180 U. S. 261, 265, 21 S. Ct. 358, 45

organization purporting or claiming to be a government is actually a state or body politic with which other states can deal, and against which the claims of citizens of the claimant's country can be pressed, is a political matter to be determined by the government of the country of which the claimant is a citizen, and that subject is elsewhere considered.[43]

III. RECOGNITION OF STATES AND RECOGNITION OF BELLIGERENCY.

A. Complete Recognition — 1. In General. After a state as a body politic has actually become one of the family of nations other states can deal with it. Questions frequently arise, however, where there is doubt as to the actual existence of a state and whether it is entitled to be dealt with as such by other states. This question most frequently arises now as the result of internal revolution by which either a part of a state is formed into a new state or the existing government is overturned and a new government installed in its place. The establishment of new states either by revolution or the institution of a new government is more a matter of history than of law,[44] although all of such changes necessarily give

L. ed. 521. The terms "nation" and "state" are frequently used interchangeably. "A nation by the laws of nations, is considered a moral being, and the principle which imposes moral restraints on the conduct of an individual, applies with greater force to the actions of a nation." Charge to Grand Jury, 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,267, 5 McLean 306, 308, per McLean, J.

"People." — "This word is a comprehensive one, and is, of course, subject to many different meanings, depending always upon the connection in which it is used, and the subject-matter to which it relates. The definition given in Anderson L. Dict. is: 'Ordinarily, the entire body of the inhabitants of a state. In a political sense, that portion of the inhabitants who are intrusted with political power.'" The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 511, 5 C. C. A. 608. In construing the act of March 3, 1817 [3 U. S. St. at L. 370], to prevent violations of the neutrality of the United States the supreme court said: "The word 'people,' when not used as the equivalent of state or nation, must apply to a body of persons less than a state or nation, and this meaning would be satisfied by considering it as applicable to any consolidated political body." The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 58, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897. "People" is also defined in U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 445, 467, 8 L. ed. 458.

"State." — As to what is a state see discussions in opinions in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, 5 Pet. (U. S.) 1, 8 L. ed. 25. See also Mexico v. De Arangoiz, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 634 [quoting Vattel's definition]. "A complete body of free persons united together for their common benefit, to enjoy peaceably what is their own, and to do justice to others. It is an artificial person. It has its affairs and its interests: it has its rules: it has its rights: and it has its obligations." Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. (U. S.) 419, 455, 1 L. ed. 440. "State" is also defined in U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 445, 467, 8 L. ed. 458; The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 512, 5 C. C. A. 608. See also The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 17 S. 44. The fact of national independence may be deduced from history by courts exercising jurisdiction of international law. No explicit official recognition is necessary. Griffin's list of references. — In 1904, while the questions involved in the recognition of Panama were being considered in congress, Mr. A. P. C. Griffin, chief bibliographer of the library of congress, prepared for the use of congress a list of references, and diplomatic history comprising references, to treatises on international law, in which the theory and practice of recognition are discussed, and of essays on specific cases. It was preceded by a condensed statement as follows: "The method of procedure followed by the United States in recognizing new states is briefly set forth in Senate document No. 40 of the Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, in a report drawn up by the Chief of the Bureau of Rolls, Department of State. The diplomatic correspondence containing the recognition of States by this country from 1861 to the present time is contained in the series now published by the Department of State under the title 'Foreign relations,' previously under the title 'Diplomatic correspondence.' . . . For correspondence prior to 1861 there are the 'American State papers. Foreign relations.'"

Recognition an executive function; see a report presented by Senator Hale, Jan. 11, 1897, forming Senate document No. 56, 54th Congress, 2d session, reciting the proceedings in connection with the recognition of the Spanish-American republics and Texas, to support the doctrine of the power of the executive to recognize new states.

The constitutional right of congress to recognize a foreign nation is asserted in Henry Winter Davis, report and resolution addressed to the house of representatives, June, 1874, printed in his "Speeches and Addresses," pp. 456–471. It contains a review of precedents in recognition of foreign governments by the United States.

The constitutional right of recognition is considered in the following: Curtis' "Constitutional History of the United States," vol. 1, p. 580; Pomeroy's "An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States;" Rawle's "A View of the Constitution of the United States of America" (2d ed.) pp. 195–196; and Story's "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States" (5th ed.) pp. 384–385.

an existing state they can only be admitted to the family of nations by the recognition of those states which are already in the family, and it is for each of these states to determine for itself what action it will promulgate in regard to such recognition.[45]

2. De Facto Government. During the interim between the first effort for the establishment of a new state and the recognition thereof by a sufficient number of already established states to admit it to the family of nations there may be a "de facto government" which may or may not continue.[46] A de facto government is one in possession of the supreme or sovereign power and has been called "a government of paramount force." As a general rule it is maintained by military force and directed by military authorities.[47]

3. The Act and Method of Recognition. Whenever an existing state sees fit to

The doctrine and practice of recognition in international law are considered in Block's "Reconnaissance internationale," in his "Dictionnaire général de la politique," nouvelle éd. vol. 2, pp. 772–773; Bluntschli's "Le droit international codifié," 5 éd. pp. 71–77; Bonfils' "Manuel de droit international public," 3 éd. pp. 107–115; Calvo's "Le droit international théoretique et pratique," 5e éd.; George B. B. Scott's "Cases on International Law Selected from Decisions of English and American Courts," pp. 37–45; Snow's "Cases and Opinions on International Law," p. 13; Vattel's "The Law of Nations," pp. 457–458; Wharton's "A Digest of the International Law of the United States," vol. 1, pp. 521–553; and Wherton's "Elements of International Law," pp. 34–38.

In connection with the discussion in congress as to recognizing Cuban independence, Senator Cullom presented a report on Dec. 21, 1896, forming Senate report No. 1160, of the 54th Congress, 2d session, in which he cites "the modern precedents of European insurrection and intervention, where independence was the issue involved."

Since Mr. Griffin's report was published Moore's Digest has been published, and §§ 27–79 of c. 3, vol. 1, which are devoted to the subject of states; their recognition and continuity contain numerous historical and legal references to the recognition of states.

45. "A State is not, by reason of its birth, a member of the Family of Nations. The formation of a new State is . . . a matter of fact, and not of law. It is through recognition, which is a matter of law, that such new State becomes a member of the Family of Nations and a subject of International Law. As soon as recognition is given, the new State's territory is recognised as the territory of a subject of International Law, and it matters not how this territory was acquired before the recognition." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 209.

Recognition is generally given by a written or oral declaration of the recognizing state; it matters little whether the recognized state coöperates in it or not. It is not necessarily express; it may be implied, as by sending or receiving diplomatic agents, but in order to be effective it must emanate from a government which is itself recognized. 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 27.

46. For instance, there was a de facto government established by the United States during the Revolution, which afterward was recognized in the states so established, and became a member of the family of nations. There was also a de facto government established by the Confederate States of America, which, after the failure of the rebellion, ceased to exist.

47. A classification is sometimes made of a de facto government, called a "government of paramount force." The distinguishing characteristics of this classification are that the government is maintained by active military force and are usually administered directly by military authorities. Such was the government of Castine, Maine, during the war of 1812, referred to in U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 253, 4 L. ed. 562. See also the case of Tampico, in the war with Mexico, referred to in Fleming v. Page, 9 How. (U. S.) 603, 614, 13 L. ed. 276. A de facto government is grant to persons establishing or attempting to establish a new government the right of admission to the family of nations it "recognizes" its existence, and this act of recognition is a matter wholly within the power of the recognizing state, and no state is bound to recognize a new state because another existing state has already done so.[48] Each existing state determines for itself the method of recognition of a new state, and how far its judicial and political bodies are limited in the method of recognition depends upon its own internal constitutional and municipal law. So far as the United States is concerned it has been decided that recog-one in possession of the supreme or sovereign power, but without right — a government by usurpation, founded perhaps in crime, and in violation of every principle of international or municipal law, and of right and justice; yet, while it is thus organized, and in the exercise and control of the sovereign authority, there can be no question of the lawfulness of the government under whose commission a capture has been made, between the insurer and the insured. Mauran v. Alliance Ins. Co., 6 Wall. (U. S.) 1, 18 L. ed. 836 [citing Nesbitt v. Lushington, 4 T. R. 783, 2 Rev. Rep. 519, where the clause of an insurance policy respecting the restraints of kings, people or princes and "the governing power of the country" and "the power of the country, whatever it may be" and the court described the character of the government contemplated, as not necessarily a lawful power or government, or one that had been adopted into the family of nations].

There are several degrees of what is called de facto government.—"Such a government, in its highest degree, assumes a character very closely resembling that of a lawful government. This is when the usurping government expels the regular authorities from their customary seats and functions, and establishes itself in their place, and so becomes the actual government of a country. The distinguishing characteristic of such a government is, that adherents to it in war against the government de jure do not incur the penalties of treason; and under certain limitations, obligations assumed by it in behalf of the country, or otherwise, will, in general, be respected by the government de jure when restored." Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. (U. S.) 1, 8, 19 L. ed. 361. But see Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U. S. 176, 185, 24 L. ed. 716. And as to the effect of unsuccessful rebellion see Williams v. Bruffy, supra, at page 186, and cases there cited.

De facto governments, their classification and the effects of their acts and the acts of other governments toward them, are treated at length in 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 20.

"Who is the sovereign, de jure or de facto, of a territory is not a judicial, but a political question, the determination of which by the legislative and executive departments of any government conclusively binds the judges, as well as all other officers, citizens and subjects of that government. This principle has always been upheld by this court, and has been affirmed under a great variety of circumstances. . . . It is equally well settled in England." Jones v. U. S., 137 U. S. 202, 212, 11 S. Ct. 80, 34 L. ed. 691 [citing U. S. v. Lynde, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 632, 20 L. ed. 230; U. S. v. Yorba, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 412, 17 L. ed. 635; Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 13 Pet. 48. It will be seen by reference to a previous note (see supra, note 44), that the recognition granted to the South American provinces by the United States long preceded the recognition of those provinces by European powers.

The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction to examine into the sovereign acts or political transactions of a foreign government, or the acts of military officers in command of the armed forces of such government, whether de jure or de facto. Underhill v. Hernandez, 65 Fed. 577, 13 C. C. A. 51, 38 L. R. A. 405. Courts are bound, in deciding cases involving the status of contending forces for the control of the government of a foreign country, to take notice of the important facts of history, and the right to determine finally every question involved in the struggle for the control of the government belongs to the people of that country, and their decision must be accepted everywhere as conclusive. The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 520, 5 C. C. A. 608.

"This is not a new question.— It came before the court in the case of Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 241, 272, 2 L. ed. 608, and again in Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 246, 324, 4 L. ed. 381. And in both of these cases, the court said, that it belongs exclusively to governments to recognize new states in the revolutions which may occur in the world; and until such recognition, either by our own government or the government to which the new state belonged, courts of justice are bound to consider the ancient state nition is a political act,[49] but there is still a question as to whether it is exclusively executive or whether the recognition requires the action of both the executive of things as remaining unaltered." Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. (U. S.) 38, 51, 14 L. ed. 316.

When state becomes sovereign. — As respects its own government a nation becomes independent from the declaration thereof, but as regards other nations only when recognized by them. U. S. v. Hutchings, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,429, Brunn. Col. Cas. 489, 2 Wheel. Cr. (N. Y.) 543. "This opinion is predicated upon a principle which is believed to be undeniable, that the several states which composed this Union, so far at least as regarded their municipal regulations, became entitled, from the time when they declared themselves independent, to all the rights and powers of sovereign states, and that they did not derive them from concessions made by the British king. The treaty of peace contains a recognition of their independence, not a grant of it. From hence, it results that the laws of the several state governments were the laws of sovereign states, and as such were obligatory upon the people of such state, from the time they were enacted." McIlvaine v. Coxe, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 209, 212, 2 L. ed. 598. "The colony of St. Domingo, originally belonging to France, had broken the bond which connected her with the parent state, had declared herself independent, and was endeavoring to support that independence by arms. France still asserted her claim of sovereignty, and had employed a military force in support of that claim. A war de facto, then, unquestionably, existed between France and St. Domingo. It has been argued, that the colony, having declared itself a sovereign state, and having thus far maintained its sovereignty by arms, must be considered and treated by other nations, as sovereign in fact, and as being entitled to maintain the same intercourse with the world that is maintained by other belligerent nations. In support of this argument, the doctrines of Vattel have been particularly referred to. But the language of that writer is obviously addressed to sovereigns, not to courts. It is for governments to decide, whether they will consider St. Domingo as an independent nation, and until such decision shall be made, or France shall relinquish her claim, courts of justice must consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered, and the sovereign power of France over that colony as still subsisting." Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 241, 272, 2 L. ed. 608. In February, 1856, the Rivas-Walker government of Nicaragua, not then recognized by the United States, made a decree, revoking the charter of the Accessory Transit Company, which decree remained in force and was enforced in May, 1856, when the said government was recognized by the United States. It was held that, at any rate from the time of the recognition, this decree must be regarded as a valid act of the Nicaraguan government. Murray v. Vanderbilt, 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 140. "When citizens or subjects of one nation, in its name, and by its authority, or with its assent, take and hold actual, continuous and useful possession . . . of territory unoccupied by any other government or its citizens, the nation to which they belong may exercise such jurisdiction and for such period as it sees fit over territory so acquired." Recognition is a political act, and not one for courts. The Divina Pastora, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 52, 63, 4 L. ed. 512 and note at page 65. See also cases cited infra, this and note 50. "Whether Texas had or had not at that time become an independent state, was a question for that department of our government exclusively which is charged with our foreign relations." Kennett v. Chambers, supra.

It belongs exclusively to the political department of the government to recognize or refuse to recognize a new government in a foreign country claiming to have displaced the old one, and until the political department so recognizes the independence of the new government, the courts are bound to consider the old order of things as existing. Kennett v. Chambers, 14 How. (U. S.) 38, 14 L. ed. 316 (the republic of Texas); Clark v. U. S., 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,838, 3 Wash. 101 (San Domingo); The Hornet, 12 Fed. Cas. Conclusiveness of decision. — The decision of the political department of a government that no de facto government exists is conclusive upon its own citizens. The Jarvis Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 145. See also Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co., 13 Pet. (U. S.) 415, 10 L. ed. 226.

Judicial notice. — "All courts of justice are bound to take judicial notice of the territorial extent of the jurisdiction exercised by the government whose laws they administer, or of its recognition or denial of the sovereignty of a foreign power, as appearing from the public acts of the legislature and executive, although those acts are not formally put in evidence, nor in accord with the pleadings." and legislative branches of the government.[50] After revolutionists have actually succeeded in separating themselves from their former mother country or in completely overturning the existing government and substituting the new one, the recognition of it by other states cannot be regarded as an unfriendly act either by the state from which the territory has been separated or by the government which has been overturned; but the parent state or the one attempting to reëstablish its control against the revolutionists does frequently regard the recognition by other states of the revolutionist as an unfriendly act.[51] Each existing state, however, must be its own judge as to whether it will recognize a new government and as to how long a period it will permit to elapse after the establishment of the new government before recognition is granted it.[52]

4. Its Effect. The foregoing[53] relates to the complete recognition of a state as actually a member of the family of nations, and that recognition is complete and grants an equality to the new state with the already existing states, and after such recognition has been made diplomatic relations are established with the new state on the same basis as those already established with existing states.

B. Partial Recognition — Recognition of Belligerency — 1. In General. There may, however, be a partial recognition pending the attempt of an organized body to either establish a new government on territory belonging to another state, or to overthrow the existing government by force of arms which is called recognition of "belligerency."[54]

2. Its Effect. The effect of this partial recognition is not to recognize the revolutionists or belligerents as an actually existing state, but as an organized body which is entitled to carry on war under the rules of civilized warfare and entitled to the same rights of war as a regularly organized state.[55] This subject is more properly treated under "War," but some cases are here given as to the rights granted to revolutionists and belligerents whose belligerency has been recognized directly or indirectly by this government.[56] The rights of foreigners

Method of recognition of belligerency see cases cited supra, note 48 et seq. "Belligerency is recognized when a political struggle has attained a certain magnitude and affects the interests of the recognizing power; and in the instance of maritime operations recognition may be compelled, or the vessels of the insurgents, if molesting third parties, may be pursued as pirates. The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. 408; 3 Wharton Dig. Int. L. par. 381, and authorities cited. But it belongs to the political department to determine when belligerency shall be recognized, and its action must be accepted according to the terms and intention expressed. The distinction between recognition of belligerency and recognition of a condition of political revolt, between recognition of the existence of war in a material sense and of war in a legal sense, is sharply illustrated by the case before us. For here the political department has not recognized the existence of a de facto belligerent power engaged in hostility with Spain, but has recognized the existence of insurrectionary warfare prevailing before, at the time and since this forfeiture is alleged to have been incurred." The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 63, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897. "It is express when made by a proclamation of neutrality, as by the Queen of England's proclamation of May 13, 1861. It is implied in a declaration of blockade, as in that of President Lincoln of April 19, 1861. And when there is long acquiescence in belligerent acts affecting another nation's interests, without protest or objection, such as the blockade of ports, or the use of a nation's ports as a harbor for prizes, a tacit recognition of belligerent rights is to be reasonably inferred." The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. 408, 443, citing numerous historical instances of recognition of belligerents by the United States and other powers.

Effect of recognition upon neutrality.— "The government of the United States has recognised the existence of a civil war between Spain and her colonies, and has avowed a determination to remain neutral between the parties, and to allow to each the same rights of asylum, and hospitality and intercourse. Each party is, therefore, deemed by us a belligerent nation, having, so far as concern us, the sovereign rights of war, and entitled to be respected in the exercise of those rights. We cannot interfere, to the prejudice of either belligerent, without making ourselves a party to the contest, and departing from the posture of neutrality. All captures made by each must be considered as having the same validity, and all the immunities which may be claimed by public ships in our ports, under the law of nations, must be considered as equally the right of each; and as such, must be recognised by our courts of justice, until Congress shall prescribe a different rule." The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. (U. S.) 283, 337, 5 L. ed. 454. To the same effect see Syllabus in The Neustra Senora de la Caridad, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 479, 4 L. ed. 624. The admission by the United States of the existence of a civil war between two foreign powers entitles both belligerents to the sovereign rights of war, and to claim from it the obligations of neutrality, although it has not acknowledged the independence of one of them. Walley v. The Liberty, 12 La. 98, 32 Am. Dec. 114.

Effect of recognition on piracy.— In the case of a revolution, whether the acts of persons on the high seas, claiming to be commissioned by the revolutionists, are authorized acts of war or acts of piracy, depends, so far as the judiciary of the country is concerned, on whether or not the government has recognized its belligerency or independence. U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. (U. S.) 610, 4 L. ed. 471. "The liability of the vessel to seizure, as piratical, turns wholly upon the question whether the insurgents had or had not obtained any previous recognition of belligerent rights, either from their own government or from the political or executive department of any other nation; and that, in the absence of recognition by any government whatever, the tribunals of other nations must hold such expeditions as this to be technically piratical." The Itata, 56 Fed. 505, 5 C. C. A. 608; The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. 408, 412. But while the insurgent expedition at its outset may be liable to be charged as being piratical, owing to the fact that the insurgents have not then been recognized, the subsequent recognition by the government of the United States of the insurgent forces as a government de facto and entitled to belligerent rights, may alter the status of the expedition and relieve those engaged therein from the technical charge of piracy. So held in The Ambrose Light, supra, at page 443. Even though the recognition of the belligerency of insurgents may be indirect and result from implication, the vessels of the insurgents are to be regarded as being engaged in belligerent and not in piratical expeditions. The Ambrose Light, supra, at page 447.

Recognition imposes rights and obligations of a state.— "Of course a political community whose independence has been recognized is a 'state' under the act; and, if a body embarked in a revolutionary political movement, whose independence has not been, but whose belligerency has been, recognized, is also embraced by that term, then the words 'colony, district or people,' instead of being limited to a political community which has been recognized as a belligerent, must necessarily be held applicable to a body of insurgents associated together in a common political enterprise and carrying on hostilities against the parent country, in the effort to achieve independence, although recognition of belligerency has not been accorded. And as agreeably to the principles of international law and the reason of the thing, the recognition of belligerency, while not conferring all the rights of an independent state, concedes to the Government recognized the rights, and imposes upon it the obligations, of an independent state in matters relating to the war being waged, no adequate ground is perceived for holding that acts in aid of such a Government are not in aid of a state in the sense of the statute." The Three Friends, 166 U. S. 1, 56, 17 S. Ct. 495, 41 L. ed. 897.

IV. SOVEREIGNTY.[58]

The greatest attribute which a state possesses is its sovereignty. It is the supreme power, is absolute, and is subject to no judge, Judge Story defined it in its largest sense, as the "supreme, absolute, uncontrollable power, the jus summi imperii; the absolute right to govern."[59] The rights of sovereignty extend to all persons and things that are within the territory; they extend to all persons therein whether citizens or strangers and to those whose residence is only transitory. All strangers who are in the territory of a sovereign owe him a temporary allegiance and are entitled to his protection.[60] By reason of its sovereignty a state can, through its government, perform many acts which cannot be questioned either in its own courts or in the courts of other states.[61]

Waiver of exclusive territorial jurisdiction. — The perfect equality and absolute independence of sovereigns, and this common intercourse impelling them to mutual intercourse and an interchange of good offices with each other, have given rise to a class of cases in which every sovereign is understood to waive the exercise of a part of that complete, exclusive territorial jurisdiction which has been stated to be the attribute of every nation. (1) One of these is admitted to be the exemption of the person of the sovereign from arrest or detention within a foreign territory. (2) A second case, standing on the same principles with the first, is the immunity which all civilized nations allow to foreign ministers. (3) A third case in which a sovereign is understood to cede a portion of his territorial jurisdiction is, where he allows the troops of a foreign prince to pass through his dominions. Exemption from jurisdiction.— A public armed vessel of a foreign state, at peace with the United States, is exempt from the jurisdiction of its local tribunals while enjoying in a friendly manner the hospitality of its waters. Walley v. The Liberty, 12 La. 98, 32 Am. Dec. 114; The Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 116, 3 L. ed. 287. She had a cargo of machinery on board her, alleged to belong to private individuals, of which her government had for public purposes charged itself with the care and protection. Important and efficient salvage services were rendered to the ship and her cargo. A suit was instituted on behalf of certain of the salvors against the ship and her cargo. The court refused to order a warrant to issue for the arrest of the ship or cargo, and held it had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. The Constitution, 4 P. D. 39, 4 Aspin. 79, 48 L. J. As a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority, and of the international comity which induces every sovereign state to respect the independence of every other sovereign state, each state declines to exercise by means of any of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador, or over the public property of any other state which is destined to its public use, or over the property of any ambassador, although such sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory, and therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction. Sovereign as party defendant.— Although a sovereign or a sovereign state, in its political capacity, cannot be sued in the courts of another state or nation to enforce a demand, yet a state or sovereign may be made a defendant in order to give an opportunity to appear, and thus enable the court to act more intelligently on demands sought to be enforced against other defendants. 61a. Contracts of foreign sovereign.— The bond of a foreign government creates nothing but a debt of honor, and the promise contained in it cannot be enforced in the courts of this country against English agents of the government who have funds belonging to it in their hands, even though the government, after notice of an action by the bondholder against the agents, makes no claim to the

V. TERRITORIAL EXTENT AND JURISDICTION.[62]

A. In General. Each fully sovereign state has exclusive jurisdiction over its own territory and within that territory the state is absolute. It is subject to no limitation not imposed by itself, for, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall, "any restriction upon it, deriving validity from an external source, would imply a diminution of its sovereignty, to the extent of the restriction, and an investment of that sovereignty, to the same extent, in that power which could impose such restriction."[63] So far as territorial jurisdiction is concerned no question ever arises except as to the extent of the territory and what is the outside limit of the boundaries of the state.[64] It is conceded that the legislation of every country is terri-funds. If such an action against the agent could be maintained, it would amount to an assumption of a jurisdiction over the foreign government. As the foreign government cannot be sued in the courts of this country, neither can its agents be sued in the absence of the principals. Twycross v. Drefus, 5 Ch. D. 605, 46 L. J. Ch. 510, 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 752. By a convention between the government of Peru and a Peruvian company, all guano to be exported from Peru to Great Britain and Ireland was consigned to the company, and it was agreed that the company should sell the guano, and hold a portion of the proceeds at the disposal of the government. The Peruvian government afterward contracted a loan in England upon the terms that all the Peruvian guano to be imported into Great Britain and Ireland and Belgium should be hypothecated for the repayment of the loan, and that out of the proceeds of the guano a certain sum should be applied half-yearly in redemption of the loan. It was held, in a suit by the bondholders of the loan (to which the Peruvian government was made a defendant, but did not appear), that the court had no jurisdiction to compel the company or its agents to apply the proceeds of the guano in the hands of the agents in England to the redemption of the loan. It was held that the government complied with this contract by canceling half-yearly bonds, which had been given up to it in exchange for bonds of a subsequent loan, to the stipulated amount at the price at which the subsequent loan was contracted, being a higher price than the price of the bonds of the first loan as quoted on the London Stock Exchange. One sovereign being in no respect amenable to another; and being bound by obligations of the highest character not to degrade the dignity of his nation, by placing himself or its sovereign rights within the jurisdiction of another, can be supposed to enter a foreign territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign station, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication, and will be extended to him."

Exclusive jurisdiction in its own territory to establish courts.— Jay, C. J., in Glass v. The Betsey, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 6, 16, 1 L. ed. 485, said: "And the said supreme court being further of opinion, that no foreign power can, of right, institute or erect any court of judicature of any kind, within the jurisdiction of the United States, but such only as may be warranted by, and be in pursuance of treaties, it is, therefore, decreed and adjudged, that the admiralty jurisdiction which has been exercised in the United States by the consuls of France, not being so warranted, is not of right."

B. Boundary Waters— 1. "High Seas" and Maritime Belt. Questions most frequently arise as to the point on the high seas to which the territorial jurisdiction of the state extends; for, while it has always been maintained that every nation has exclusive jurisdiction over the waters adjacent to its shores to the extent of a cannon shot, or one marine league,[66] many questions arise as to what constitutes the maritime belt. This subject is more properly treated under "High Seas,"[67] but a few of the cases bearing upon it are noticed below.[68] It is now an

Law of the sea.— "Undoubtedly, no single nation can change the law of the sea. That law is of universal obligation, and no statute of one or two nations can create obligations for the world. Like all the laws of nations, it rests upon the common consent of civilized communities. It is of force, not because it was prescribed by any superior power, but because it has been generally accepted as a rule of conduct." Sears v. The Scotia, 14 Wall. (U. Violations of law on high seas left to executive.— Although the capture of an English vessel by a French vessel within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States is an offense against the United States as a neutral power, yet it is not one for which the courts can give redress to the British owners; the offense against this country being one which must be left to the executive department. "Three marine miles from the low-water mark may be considered as in practice the conventional extent of maritime jurisdiction. There are, however, many exceptions claimed and granted. One of the most common claims, though not generally admitted, is that the rule enunciated by Bynkershoek should be followed, viz: that the jurisdiction should be bounded by the range of arms and should accordingly be increased as the range of arms increases. For certain purposes, such as attack and defense of the coast, it is maintained that this is in fact the real limit of effective jurisdiction at the present time. For revenue purposes, for the protection of special industries, such as fishing, and for other reasons, various limits beyond the three mile line have been claimed and acknowledged from time to time." High seas defined in commissions.— "The first instructions given by the President to the private armed vessels of the United States, define the high seas, . . . to extend to low-water mark, with the exception of the space of one league, or three miles, from the shore of countries at peace with Great Britain or the United States." "The boundary line of the maritime belt is . . . uncertain, since no unanimity prevails with regard to the width of the belt. It is, however, certain that the boundary line runs not nearer to the shore than three miles, or one marine league, from the low-water mark." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 199. "The greatest distance to which any respectable assent among nations has been at any time given, has been the extent of the human sight, estimated at upwards of twenty miles, and the smallest distance, I believe, claimed by any nation whatever, is the utmost range of a cannon ball. . . . The character of our coast, remarkable in considerable parts of it for admitting no vessels of size to pass near the shores, would entitle us in reason to as broad a margin of protected navigation as any nation whatever." Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Genet, Nov. 8, 1793; MSS. Notes, For. Leg.: 1 Am. St. Pap. (For. Rel.) 183; 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 100.

Extent of jurisdiction on high seas.— "The jurisdiction of the French courts as to seizures is not confined to seizures made within two leagues of the coast. A seizure beyond the limits of the territorial jurisdiction, for breach of a municipal regulation is warranted by the law of nations." Hudson v. Guestier, 6 Cranch (U. S.) 281, 3 L. ed. 224, syllabus. "As this article authorizes a seizure of those vessels only which are 'sailing within the territorial extent of the island, found within less than two leagues of the coast,' it is deemed by the court to be sufficiently evident that the seizure and confiscation are made in consequence of a violation of municipal regulation, and not in right of war. It is true, that the revolt of the colony is the motive for this exercise of sovereign power. Still, it is an exercise of sovereign power, restricting itself within those limits which are the province of municipal law, not the exercise of a belligerent right." Rose v. Himely, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 241, 276, 2 L. ed. 608.

The "Headland Doctrine"— Bays.— For a discussion of the "Headland Doctrine" see Int. L. Situations (1904), pp. 138–140 [citing Inst. Int. L. (1894)], which adopted twelve miles as the width of the mouth of inclosed bays; Rivier, who considered the ten-mile line as a reasonable one for mouths of rivers and bays; the Convention of The Hague in 1882 which adopted ten miles; concluding with this summary: "The general drift of opinion has been toward the admission of a claim to jurisdiction over bays when the mouth is not over ten miles in width and also to three miles beyond the line drawn from headland to headland." "It cannot be asserted as a general rule that nations have an exclusive right of fishery over all adjacent waters to a distance of three marine miles beyond an imaginary line drawn from headland to headland. This doctrine of headlands is new, and has received a proper limit in the convention between France and Great Britain of the 2d of August, 1839, in which 'it is equally agreed that the distance of three miles fixed as the general limit for the exclusive right of fishery upon the coasts of the two countries shall, with respect to bays, the mouths of which do not exceed ten miles in width, be measured from a straight line drawn from headland to headland.'" 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 76 [citing Umpire London C, 1853, 212; 1 Halifax Award 152]. "The whole of the waters within the capes of the Delaware Bay is neutral territory when the United States is neutral. This neutrality depends not 'on any of the various distances claimed' on the sea 'by different nations possessing the neighboring shore,' but upon the fact that the United States are the proprietors of the lands on both sides of the Delaware, from its head to its entrance into the sea. But the law of nations and the Treaty of Paris of 1783 may justify the United States in attaching to their coasts 'an extent into the sea beyond the reach of cannon shot.'" 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 75 [citing 1 Op. Atty.-Gen. 32 (Randolph) 1793; 1 Am. St. Pap. (For. Rel.) 80; Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Morris, 1 Am. St. Pap. (For. Rel.) 167. In Direct U. S. Cable Co. v. Anglo-American Tel. Chesapeake bay, with headlands twelve miles apart, was held to be territorial waters. The Alleganean, 4 Moore Int. Arb. 4332.

Lakes connected with the sea.— "If the maritime water which bathes the coast is considered to belong to the riparian States, there is still greater reason that the waters which touch the sea should be the same, that is to say, if the lakes form in the immediate neighborhood of the sea. These lakes ought to be considered as belonging to the State or States in whose territory they lie, under the same conditions that the enclosed seas are all reputed as such, and as they are generally in communication with or connected with the sea they ought to be considered as under the same rules as international rivers." Fodéré Int. L. p. 202.

Nature of jurisdiction or sway.—"The open sea within this limit [not less than a marine league] is, of course, subject to the common right of navigation; and all governments, for the purpose of self-protection in time of war or for the prevention of frauds on its revenue, exercise an authority beyond this limit." "But no unanimity exists with regard to the nature of the sway of the riparian States. Many writers maintain that such sway is sovereignty, that the maritime belt is a part of the territory of the riparian State, and that the territorial supremacy of the latter extends over its coast waters. . . . On the other hand, many writers of great authority emphatically deny the territorial character of the maritime belt and concede to the riparian States, in the interest of the safety of the coast, only certain powers of control, jurisdiction, police, and the like, but not sovereignty." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. p. 239.

Territorial sea waters open to commerce.—"In all cases in which territorial waters are so placed that passage over them is either necessary or convenient for the navigation of open seas, as in that of marginal waters, or of an appropriated strait connecting unappropriated waters, they are subject to a right of innocent use by all mankind for the purposes of commercial navigation. The general consent of nations, which was seen to be wanting to the alleged right of navigation of rivers may fairly be said to have been given to that of the sea. . . . The right therefore must be considered to be established in the most complete manner." Hall Int. L. (4th ed.) § 42. But a government has the right to grant an exclusive right of towage in its territorial waters. The Mark Gray Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 33.

Territorial sea waters not open to war vessels.—"This right of innocent passage does not extend to vessels of war. Its possession by them could not be explained upon the grounds by which commercial passage is justified. The interests of the whole world are concerned in the possession of the utmost liberty of navigation for the purposes of trade by the vessels of all States. But no general interests are necessarily or commonly involved in the possession by a State of a right to navigate the waters of other States with its ships of war. . . . A State has therefore always the right to refuse access to its territorial waters to the armed vessels of other States, if it wishes to do so." Hall Int. L. § 42.

"The limits of the right of a nation to control the fisheries on its sea coasts, and in the bays and arms of the sea within its territory, have never been placed at less than a marine league from the coast on the open sea; and bays wholly within the territory of a nation, the headlands of which are not more than two marine leagues, or six geographical miles apart, have always been regarded as a part of the territory of the nation in which they lie. Proceedings of the Halifax Commission of 1877, under the Treaty of Washington of May 8, 1871, Executive Document No. 89, 45th Congress, 2d Session, Ho. Reps. pp. 120, 121, 166." L. § 60, where it is said: "What Grotius contended for in his 'Mare Liberum' against the exclusive claim of Portugal to the possession of original commerce, 'that everyone has, by the law of nations, free intercourse by sea with every one else,' is now for the most part admitted, and the pathways of commerce can no longer be obstructed." Straits of Magellan.—"The government of the United States will not tolerate exclusive claims by any nation whatsoever to the Straits of Magellan, and will hold responsible any government that undertakes, no matter on what pretext, to lay any impost or check on United States commerce through those Straits." 1 Wharton Dig. "St. Mary's River formed, at this period, the boundary between the United States and the Spanish territory, the boundary line, by the treaty of 1795, running through the middle thereof, in its whole course to the Atlantic Ocean. The only access from the ocean to the Spanish waters running into the St. Mary's, as well as to the adjacent Spanish ter-

country and Great Britain as to the status of the Bay of Fundy and bays in Alaska.[70]

2. Rivers, Lakes, Etc. As to boundary waters, the territory of the state includes as a part of its domain the lakes and rivers which lie within its limits, and these waters may be appropriated in part by one adjoining nation and in part by another, and when so divided the part belonging to each is as completely a part of its territory as though the whole lake or river were within its limits.[71] As to ritories, was through this river. So, that, upon the general principles of the law of nations, the waters of the whole river must be considered as common to both nations, for all purposes of navigation, as a common highway, necessary for the advantageous use of its own territorial rights and possessions." "Boundary lakes and land-locked seas are such as separate the lands of two or more different States from each other. The boundary line runs through the middle of these lakes and seas, but as a rule special treaties portion off such lakes and seas between riparian States." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 199. "Theory and practice agree upon the rule that such lakes and land-locked seas as are entirely enclosed by the land of one and the same State are part of the territory of this State. . . . As regards, however, such lakes and land-locked seas as are surrounded by the territories of several States, no unanimity exists. The majority of writers consider these lakes and land-locked seas parts of the surrounding territories, but several dissent asserting that these lakes and seas do not belong to the riparian States, but are free like the Open Sea. The practice of the States seems to favor the opinion of the majority of writers." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 179. "Such lakes and land-locked seas as are surrounded by the territories of several States and are at the same time navigable from the Open Sea, are called 'international lakes and land-locked seas.' However, although some writers dissent, it must be emphasised that hitherto the Law of Nations has not yet recognized the principle of free navigation on such lakes and seas. The only case in which such free navigation is stipulated is that of the lakes within the Congo district." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 180 [dissenting writers referred to being Rivier, Calvo, Caratheodory and Holtzendorff].

The "Great Lakes."— "The right and title to the shores of the Great Lakes is in the several States, and not in the United States." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 99 [citing 6 Op. Atty.-Gen. (Cushing) 172]. See 2 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 136 et seq., "The Great Lakes."

"Boundary rivers are such rivers as separate two different States from each other. If such river is not navigable, the imaginary boundary line runs down the middle of the river, following all turnings of the border line of both banks of the river. On the other hand, in a navigable river the boundary line runs through the middle of the so-called Thalweg, that is, the mid-channel of the river. . . . And it must be remembered that, since a river sometimes changes more or less its course, the boundary line running through the middle of the Thalweg or along the border-line is thereby also altered." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 199. See doctrine of the Thalweg discussed and applied in Mississippi v. Louisiana, 202 U. S. 1, 58; Illinois v. Iowa, 202 U. S. 59.

"When a great river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the original property is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream. But when . . . one state is the original proprietor and grants the territory on one side only, it retains the river within its own domains, and the newly-created state extends to the river only." In such case the lower water mark is its boundary, whether the fluctuations in the stream result from tides or from an annual rise and fall. Handly v. Anthony, 5 Wheat. (U. S.) 374, 379, 5 L. ed. 113 syllabus [quoted in Alabama v. Georgia, 23 How. (U. S.) 505, 514, 16 L. ed. 556]. "Where two nations are possessed of territory on opposite sides of a bay or navigable river, the sovereignty of each presumptively extends to the middle of the water from any part of their respective shores;" and "where one nation first takes possession of the whole of the bay or navigable river, and exercises sovereignty thereon, the neighboring people shall nevertheless be 'lords of their particular ports, and so much of the sea or navigable river as the convenient access to the shore requires.'" 1 Wharton Dig. what is wholly within its own territory a state has exclusive jurisdiction. There has been much discussion in this connection in regard to rivers, straits, canals, and lakes. Many of these matters have been settled by special treaties, in which case the treaty must of course control.[72] Others are held in common and where any question arises the rules of international law must be applied.[73] Questions

Effect of accretion, decretion, and avulsion. — "Where a river is the boundary between two nations, it continues so notwithstanding accretion and decretion of its banks; but if it violently leave its bed, the latter remains the boundary." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 96 [citing 8 Op. Atty.-Gen. 175 (Cushing) 1856]. And see infra, note 4.

The rule for the control and navigation of rivers is thus stated in Field's International Code, § 55: "A nation, and its members, through the territories of which runs a navigable river, have the right to navigate the river to and from the high seas, even though passing through the territory of another nation, subject, however, to the right of the latter nation to make necessary or reasonable police regulations for its own peace and safety. Message of President Grant to the Congress of the United States, December, 1870, and treaties there cited." See the criticism of Sir R. Phillimore of the position taken by Great Britain regarding the navigation of the St. Lawrence, that, because "she possessed both banks of the St. Lawrence where it disembogued itself, she denied to the United States the right to navigation, though about one-half of the waters of Lakes Ontario, Erie, Huron and Superior, and the whole of Lake Michigan, through which the river flows, were the property of the United States." Phillimore Int. L. (3d ed.) 245.

"When the free navigation of a river is conceded, this carries with it the right to use the shores so far as necessary to the use of the river." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 97 [citing Phillimore Int. L. (3d ed.) 225; Wheaton Hist. L. N. 510; Wharton Comm. Am. L. § 191].

Use of waters of boundary rivers.— "The unquestioned rule of the common law was that every riparian owner was entitled to the continued natural flow of the stream; but every State has the power, within its dominion, to change this rule, and permit the appropriation of the flowing waters for such purposes as it deems wise." U. S. v. Rio Grande Dam, etc., Co., 174 U. S. 690, 19 S. Ct. 770, 43 L. ed. 1136, syllabus.

72. Rivers.— The St. Lawrence river, by the treaty of 1871, is "forever" to remain free and open to the citizens of the United States, and the like privilege is extended to the subjects of Great Britain respecting the Yukon, Porcupine, and Stikine in Alaska. The pertinent parts of the treaty are found in 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 83, 84; see also 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 80–83, for interesting discussions and references to state papers which preceded the execution of the treaty. "By the Treaty of Versailles, of 1783, by which the independence of the United States was recognized, it was provided in article 8, that 'the navigation of the River Mississippi shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the subjects of the United States.' But the United States having purchased Louisiana on April 30, 1803, from France, and Florida from Spain, on February 22, 1819, acquired possession of the banks on both sides of the Mississippi, and the Treaty of Ghent, on December 24, 1814, no doubt for this reason, omitted all reference to the rights of British subjects to the navigation of the River. Since then the exclusive control of the River by the United States, so far as concerns foreign States, has been conceded internationally; though subject to police supervision and the right to impose pilotage and quarantine regulations, the free navigation of this and of other navigable rivers within the United States is, by the law of nations accepted by the United States, open to all ships of foreign sovereigns." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 96. The question of the conflicting rights of Spain and the United States, in 1804, to the Mississippi river and the discussions thereon will be found in 2 Am. St. Pap. (For. Rel.) 596 et seq.

The Suez canal was neutralized by the convention of Constantinople, Oct. 29, 1888, between the great powers of Europe.

The Panama or other canal to be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans was neutralized by the so-called Hay-Pauncefote Treaty, Nov. 18, 1901, and made applicable to all nations observing the rules embraced in the treaty. See 3 Moore Dig. Int. L. c. 9, "Interoceanic Communication."

73. Rivers.— As affecting the ownership and control of rivers and their waters, cases are now pending before the supreme court of the United States, amongst them that of Kansas v. Colorado, in which case the question to be determined is the ownership and control of the waters of the Arkansas river, it being claimed by Kansas that Colorado is monopolizing these waters in irrigation to the detriment of Kansas. In the case of Missouri v. Illinois, the former state complained of the pollution of the waters of the Mississippi river by the Chicago drainage canal. The court held that it had jurisdiction to prevent such pollution if proved, but that in this case it was not proved. Missouri v. Illinois, 200 U. S. 496. "The right to peacefully of territorial extent and jurisdiction have arisen also with relation to waters in which the tides ebb and flow.[74]

C. Political Question. Questions as to boundary between nations are not for their courts. They are to be settled by the political departments of the government.[75]

VI. ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

A. Modes of Acquisition — 1. In General. A sovereign may increase its territory and extend its sovereignty in various ways.[76] Those recognized by international law, besides accretion[77] by the action of the elements, are as follows: Discovery and occupation,[78] conquest,[79] cession,[80] annexation,[81] and prescription.[82] The title of the present domain of the United States rests upon every different method of acquisition known to international law, but as to every portion thereof the title is clear and recognizable by that law as well as by our own laws, as they have been defined and construed by the supreme court.[83] navigate the Amazon River belongs, in international law, to all maritime States." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 85, Mr. Marcy to Mr. Trousdale, Aug. 8, 1853, MSS. Inst. Brazil.

"That canals are parts of the territories of the respective territorial States is obvious from the fact that they are artificially constructed waterways. And there ought to be no doubt that all the rules regarding rivers must analogously be applied to canals." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 182. "While a natural thoroughfare, although wholly within the dominion of a government, may be passed by commercial ships, of right, yet the nation which constructs an artificial channel may annex such conditions to its use as it pleases." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 80 [citing The Avon, 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 165].

The right to close portions of the national territory to navigation is inherent in all governments. Orinoco Steamship Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 72. States through the territory of which navigable streams flow, although those streams rise in the territory of other states, have the right to close the rivers to navigation at their discretion and no appeal will lie therefrom. The Faber Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 600.

74. See, generally, NAVIGABLE WATERS.

Floating property resting on land at low tide is on land.—"The pine timber having been floated into shallow water, where it was secured and in the custody of the owner of the ship, an American citizen, the court cannot perceive any solid distinction, so far as respects confiscation, between this property and other British property found on land at the commencement of hostilities." But as between the states forming the United States, it is a judicial question. U. S. v. Texas, 143 U. S. 621, 2 S. Ct. 488, 36 L. ed. 285; Louisiana v. Mississippi, 202 U. S. 1.

Questions of boundary between nations not for their courts.—"In a controversy between two nations, concerning national boundary, it is scarcely possible, that the courts of either should refuse to abide by the measures adopted by its own government. There being no common tribunal to decide between them, each determines for itself on its own rights, and if they cannot adjust their differences peaceably, the right remains with the strongest. The judiciary is not that department of the government, to which the assertion of its interests against foreign powers is confided; and its duty commonly is, to decide upon individual rights, according to those principles, which the political departments of the nation have established." Delassus v. U. S., 9 Pet. (U. S.) 117, 9 L. ed. 71; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. (U. S.) 691, 711, 8 L. ed. 547; Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. (U. S.) 253, 307, 7 L. ed. 415.

Not a legislative function.—The act of Texas of Dec. 19, 1836, fixing the western boundary of the state at the Rio Grande, did not have the effect of making the province of New Mexico a part of Texas, since the republic could not acquire territory by merely fixing its boundary by statute, if the territory was in the actual possession of Mexico. De Baca v. U. S., 36 Ct. Cl. 407.

2. Discovery and Occupation. The original title to all of North and South America is based upon this method of acquisition.[84] Occupation is the act of appropriation by a state through which it intentionally acquires sovereignty over such territory as is at the time not under the sovereignty of another state.[85] Occupation differs from subjugation as a mode of acquisition chiefly in so far as the conquered and afterward annexed territory has hitherto belonged to another state.[86] When a government acquires territory by discovery it must, in order to make its title and control thereof effective, establish a responsible government within a reasonable time.[87]

3. Conquest. The right of the victorious nation to retain the ownership of invaded and conquered territory is still recognized by international law.[88] The effect of conquest is to hold the territory by occupation, and the conquering state is subject to have it wrested from it by the state from which it was taken or may voluntarily surrender it at the end of the war.[89] And it only becomes an actual acquisition after the conqueror has established the conquest and formally annexed the territory.[90] After such conquest or annexation the enemy state either ceases to exist, if its entire territory has been conquered, or it ceases to exercise jurisdiction over that portion of the territory which has been conquered.[91] The effect of conquest on private property in the conquered territory is practically the same as when the territory is ceded and will be treated under that title.[92] Few recent titles rest exclusively on conquest, however, as it has practically

The United States added the Oregon territory to its domain by the discovery of the mouth of the Columbia river by Captain Gray, the expedition of Lewis and Clarke, and the Astoria settlement. The title of the United States to the Guano and Midway Islands also rests upon discovery and occupation. 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power, § 44. "Only such territory can be the object of occupation as is no State's land, whether entirely uninhabited, as e. g. an island, or inhabited by natives whose community is not to be considered as a State. Even civilised individuals may live and have private property on a territory without any union by them into a State proper which exercises sovereignty over such territory." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 221. See also report of Charles E. Magoon, Law Officer, Bureau of Insular Affairs, senate Document 234, 56th Congress, 1st Session, on the legal aspects of the territorial possessions of the United States. This report and others prepared by Mr. Magoon were afterward republished by the war department under the title of "The Law of Civil Government under Military Occupation," Government Printing Office, 1902.

88. "As long as a Law of Nations has been in existence, the States as well as the vast majority of writers have recognised subjugation as a mode of acquiring territory. Its justification lies in the fact that war is a contention between States for the purpose of overpowering one another. States which go to war know beforehand that they risk more or less their very existence, and that it may be a necessity for the victor to annex the conquered enemy territory, be it in the interest of national unity or of safety against further attacks, or for other reasons." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 238; 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power, § 44.

Territorial status while conquered by enemy.—Under the revenue laws, the port of Castine, Maine, held by the British during the War of 1812, was held to be foreign territory, and goods imported to that port not liable to duty. The subsequent evacuation by the British and resumption of authority by the United States did not change the character of the past transaction. U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 246, 4 L. ed. 562.

91. Such was the case when Spain relinquished Cuba. Spain still continued to exist as a state but it ceased to exercise jurisdiction over that island. Subsequently, by treaty, it relinquished jurisdiction over Cuba as well as the Philippines and Porto Rico.

92. See infra, VI, B, 1, 2. The general rule is that the subjugator does not acquire the private property of the inhabitants of the annexed territory, although it may impose such become a universal custom to settle ownership of territory and boundary lines after every war by a treaty; the conquering power generally, and properly, insists upon an unequivocal cession of the territory which it accepts as indemnity, or retains as conquered, so as to avoid all subsequent questions of ownership and sovereignty.[93]

4. Cession. Cession by one sovereign power to another is the method of acquisition of territory that has been most commonly employed during the past century. It is evidenced by a treaty,[94] or by legislation of the contracting countries.[95] A cession may be made either: (1) For a monetary consideration, without the element of conquest or coercion;[96] (2) by a friendly exchange of laws upon it as it sees fit. 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 240. See 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 92, "Effects of Change of Sovereignty."

93. For this reason it is sometimes difficult to determine whether territory so acquired is conquered or ceded; this applies to our Mexican territory acquired in 1848, as well as to our acquisitions from Spain in 1898. In both instances we held, and could have retained, them as conquered, but we obtained cessions thereof in the treaties of peace concluded on terminating the wars. 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power § 44.

94. "The only form in which a cession can be effected is an agreement embodied in a treaty between the ceding and the acquiring State. Such treaty may be the outcome of peaceable negotiations or of war, and the cession may be one with or without compensation." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 216. See 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 83 et seq., "Cession."

95. "Cession of State territory is the transfer of sovereignty over State territory by the owner State to another State. There is no doubt whatever that such cession is possible according to the Law of Nations, and history presents innumerable examples of such transfer of sovereignty. The Constitutional Law of the different States may or may not lay down special rules for the transfer or acquisition of territory. Such rules can have no direct influence upon the rules of the Law of Nations concerning cession, since Municipal Law can neither abolish existing nor create new rules of International Law. But if such municipal rules contain constitutional restrictions of the Government with regard to cession of territory, these restrictions are so far important that such treaties of cession concluded by heads of States or Governments as violate these restrictions are not binding." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 213.

"The usage of the world is, if a nation be not entirely subdued, to consider the holding of conquered territory as a mere military occupation, until its fate shall be determined by the treaty of peace. If it be ceded by the treaty, the acquisition is confirmed, and the ceded territory becomes a part of the nation to which it is annexed; either on the terms stipulated in the treaty of cession, or on such as its new master shall impose. On such transfer of territory, it has never been held, that the relations of the inhabitants with each other undergo any change. Their relations with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same act which transfers their country transfers the allegiance of those who remain in it; and the law, which may be denominated political, is necessarily changed, although that which regulates the intercourse, and general conduct of individuals, remains in force, until altered by the newly created power of the state." American Ins. Co. v. Canter, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 511, 542, 7 L. ed. 242.

"The object of cession is sovereignty over such territory as has hitherto already belonged to another State. As far as the Law of Nations is concerned, every State as a rule can cede a part of its territory to another State, or by ceding the whole of its territory can even totally merge in another State. However, since certain parts of State territory, as for instance rivers and the maritime belt, are inalienable appurtenances of the land, they cannot be ceded without a piece of land." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 215.

"As a rule, no third Power has the right of veto with regard to a cession of territory. Exceptionally, however, such right may exist; it may be that a third Power has by a previous treaty acquired a right of pre-emption concerning the ceded territory, or that some early treaty has created another obstacle to the cession, as, for instance, in the case of permanently neutralised parts of a not-permanently neutralised State. And the Powers have certainly the right of veto in case a permanently neutralised State desires to increase its territory by acquiring land through cession from another State. But even where no right of veto exists, a third Power might intervene for political reasons. For there is no duty on the part of third States to acquiesce in such cessions of territory as endanger the balance of power or are otherwise of vital importance. And a strong State will practically always interfere in case a cession of such kind is agreed upon as menaces its vital interests." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 218, citing the case of Luxemburg which Holland proposed to sell to France in 1867 and which was neutralized upon the interposition of the North German Confederation.

territory;[97] (3) at the end of a war, partly for indemnity and partly for monetary or other considerations;[98] or (4) without any consideration except good-will.[99] There have been numerous transfers in other countries. The right of sovereign powers to cede territory to, and to acquire other territory from, other sovereign powers, with the accompanying transfer of sovereignty thereover, is one of the elementary principles of international law. It is essential, however, that the contracting powers should be fully sovereign in order to act either as transferrer or transferee. A government that is not fully sovereign has no right to extend its territorial possessions, and conversely one that cannot extend them does not possess the full measure of sovereignty. It is subject, by some limitation, to some other power, which must be superior to it in that aspect; when any government is in that condition, owing to any cause whatever, it must acknowledge that it lacks complete sovereignty, and that it cannot rank among the great and independent powers of the world.[1] The consent of inhabitants of territory, ceded by one sovereign power to another, is not required to validate the transfer, either of the territory or the sovereignty thereof; this is as well established as is the principle of municipal law, as it is generally administered, that the consent of a tenant is not necessary to enable the owner of the fee to dispose of it. Where such consent has been asked it has been the result of a policy adopted and not of any legal necessity.[2]

1. Such is the condition of every state of this Union. No one of them is completely sovereign, because the people have either delegated certain elements of sovereignty to the central government, viewing it from a federal standpoint, or viewing it from a national standpoint, they have vested the central government with certain elements of sovereignty to the exclusion of the states. One of the elements of sovereignty which the states do not possess is this right of acquisition of additional territory. No one of them can extend its borders without the consent of the central government. 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power, § 43. "Semi sovereign states do not possess all the essential rights of sovereignty, and therefore, can be regarded as subjects of international law only indirectly, or at least in a subordinate degree." 1 Halleck Int. L. (Baker 3d Eng. ed.) p. 74. See Hall Int. L. p. 31; Woolsey Int. L. p. 35; Glenn Int. L. p. 17 and citations collected in foot-note. "The general proposition of international law, therefore, is that by its proper, constituted authorities, whatever they may be,—king, president, legislature, people,—a nation may alienate to or acquire from another nation, territory or other things which are the objects of property. 'It is, moreover, of the last importance to remember that a nation which allows its ruler, either in his own person or through his minister, to enter into negotiation respecting the alienation of property with other nations, must be held to have consented to the act of the ruler; unless, indeed, it can be clearly proved that the other contracting party was aware at the time that the rule in so doing was transgressing the fundamental laws of this state.'" 2. The United States has never asked the inhabitants of any of its purchased territory to ratify the transfer. It has always acted on the basis that it had the right to acquire the territory if the other sovereign had the right to cede it. "This rule has been adopted not only by the United States, but the world over. There was no plebiscite in Alsace or Lorraine when the borderland Frenchmen became the subjects of Germany. The French colonists of Quebec could not speak English when by the treaty of 1763 they were transformed into British subjects. The Spanish and native population of Cuba and the Philippines were not consulted in 1762 or 1764." 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power, § 46; Hall Int. L. pp. 47–50; Halleck Int. L. (ed. 1861) p. 125; Woolsey Int. L. pp. 63–65. "As the object of cession is sovereignty over the ceded territory, all such individuals domiciled thereon as are subjects of the ceding State become ipso facto by the cession subjects of the acquiring State. The hardship involved in the fact that in all cases of cession the inhabitants of the territory lose their old citizenship and are handed over to a new Sovereign whether they like it or not, has created a movement in favor of the claim that no cession shall be valid before the inhabitants have by a plebiscite given their consent to the cession. And several treaties

5. Annexation. Acquisition of territory may be accomplished by annexation, as where two governments, by treaty stipulation, or reciprocal legislation, unite under the government of one or the other.[3]

6. Accretion. Accretion is the gradual accumulation by alluvial formation, and where a boundary river changes its course gradually the parties on either side hold by the same boundary — the center of the channel. Avulsion is the sudden and rapid change in the course and channel of a boundary river. It does not work any change in the boundary, which remains as it was in the center of the old channel, although no water may be flowing therein. These principles apply alike whether the rivers be boundaries between private property or between states and nations.[4]

of cession concluded during the nineteenth century stipulate that the cession shall only be valid provided the inhabitants consent to it through a plebiscite. But it is doubtful whether the Law of Nations will ever make it a condition of every cession that it must be ratified by a plebiscite. The necessities of international policy may now and then allow or even demand such a plebiscite, but in most cases they will not allow it." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 219. See 1 Rivier, p. 210, for collection of treaties providing for plebiscite before cession effective. See 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 80 et seq., "Cession."

3. This method has been very frequently employed in South America, as well as on at least two occasions in the United States. This was the case when Texas was admitted to the Union as a state and surrendered her independent government for the conditions of statehood in 1845; and also when Hawaii became a part of the United States under congressional resolution in 1898. 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power, § 44. "Accretion is the name for the increase of land through new formations. . . . And it is a customary rule of the Law of Nations that enlargement of territory, if any, created through new formations, takes place ipso facto by the accretion, without the State concerned taking any special step for the purpose of extending its sovereignty. . . . New formations through accretions may be artificial or natural. . . Artificial formations are embankments, breakwaters, dykes, and the like, built along the river or the coast line of the sea. As such artificial new formations along the bank of a boundary river may more or less push the volume of water so far as to encroach upon the other bank of the river, and as no State is allowed to alter the natural condition of its own territory to the disadvantage of the natural conditions of a neighbouring State territory, a State cannot build embankments, and the like, of such kind without a previous agreement with the neighboring State. But every riparian State of the sea may construct such artificial formations as far into the sea beyond the low-water mark as it likes and thereby gain considerably in land and also in territory, since the extent of the at least three miles wide maritime belt is now to be measured from the extended shore." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. § 229.

"Alluvion is the name for an accession of land washed up on the sea-shore or on a river-bank by the waters. Such accession is as a rule produced by a slow and gradual process, but sometimes also through a sudden act of violence, the stream detaching a portion of the soil from one bank of a river, carrying it over to the other bank, and embedding it there so as to be immovable (avulsio). Through alluvions the land and also the territory of a State may be considerably enlarged." 1 Oppenheim Int. L. p. 284.

B. Effect of Change of Sovereignty — 1. Governmental Control and Title to Public Property. When a government acquires territory from another country by treaty of cession or by conquest and subjugation it acquires the right of governmental control over the territory and also the title to the public property, the public domain, and ungranted lands.[7]

2. Rights of Inhabitants — a. In General. The rights of the inhabitants are frequently determined by the treaty itself. Each case must be determined by the facts relating to it. It depends upon the treaty whether or not the acquiring government assumes the obligations of the ceding government.[8] There have been numerous cases in the courts of this country arising from the constant acquisitions which have been made and the effect of change of sovereignty upon the inhabitants. The general rule is that the laws of the acquired territory continue in force until changed by legislation of the state acquiring it;[9] the relations of the inhabitants of the ceded or conquered territory to each other do not change; their allegiance and the laws which may be classed as political are changed, but those which regulate the intercourse and conduct of individuals remain unaltered by the change of sovereignty;[10] but in each case the special features of the law and its application under the new conditions must be considered.[11]

b. Property Rights. On the transfer of the sovereignty of a country, the inhabitants are protected in the possession of their private property. Such is the

The ancient laws of conquered or ceded countries remain unchanged until actually abrogated by the new government, and therefore the laws of Spain continued in force here [Mississippi] until after the territorial government was actually organized under the act of congress of April 7, 1798, which was not until the year 1799. Exception in case of public domain.— The doctrine that the laws of a conquered or ceded country, except so far as affected by the political institutions of the new government, remain in force after conquest or cession, until changed by it, does not apply to laws authorizing the alienation of any portions of the public domain, or to officers charged under the former government with that power. No proceedings affecting the rights of the new government over public property could be taken, except in pursuance of its authority on the subject. More v. Steinbach, 127 U. S. 70, 8 S. That a treaty of cession was a deed or grant by one sovereign to another, which transferred nothing to which he had no right of property, and only such right as he owned and could convey to the grantee." "This is the principle of the law of nations, as expounded by the highest authorities. In the case of The Fama, 5 C. Rob. 106, Sir William Scott declares it to be 'the settled principle of the law of nations, that the inhabitants of a conquered territory change their allegiance, and their relation to their former sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other, and their rights of property not taken from them by the orders of the conqueror, remain undisturbed.' So, too, it is laid down by Vattel, Book 3d, cap. 13, sec. 200, that 'the conqueror lays his hands on the possessions of the State, whilst private persons are permitted to retain theirs; they suffer but indirectly by the war, and to them the result is, that they only change masters.' In the case of U. S. v. Percheman, 7 Pet. (U. S.) 51, 86, 87, 8 L. ed. 604, this court has said: 'It may be not unworthy of remark, that it is very unusual, even in cases of conquest, for the conqueror to do more than to displace the sovereign, and assume dominion over the country. The modern usage of nations, which has become law, would be violated, and that sense of justice and right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated and private rights annulled. The people change their allegiance; their relation to their sovereign is dissolved; but their relations to each other, and their rights of property, remain undisturbed." Revolt and restoration.— Upon the suppression of a rebellion, the restored legitimate government is entitled, as of right, to all moneys, goods and treasure which were public property of the government at the time of the outbreak; such right being in no way affected by the wrongful seizure of the property by the usurping government. But with respect to property which has been voluntarily contributed to, or acquired by, the insurrectionary government in the exercise of its usurped authority, and has been impressed in its hands with the character of public property, the legitimate government is not, on its restoration, entitled by title paramount, but as successor only (and to that extent recognizing the authority) of the displaced usurping government; and in seeking to recover such property from an agent of the displaced government can only do so to the same extent and subject to the same rights and obligations as if that government had not been displaced, and was itself proceeding against the agent. cession, these rights can only be determined and administered after the cession by the courts of, and in accordance with the law of the country to, which the cession was made.[15]

c. Personal Rights and Citizenship. Personal rights and citizenship where no property rights are involved have a somewhat different standing and, except so far as they are protected by constitutional guarantees, they remain wholly under governmental control.[16] As a general rule the treaty of peace provides for the effect on the citizenship and allegiance of the inhabitants of the ceded territory.[17] In many instances the treaties ceding territory to the United States have provided for the effect of the cession on the citizenship of the inhabitants, and in others it has been left to the general rules of law.[18] When a country becomes a province of, or in any way merged into, another country, it loses its identity and diplomatic relations with it cease or are carried on through the country into which it has been merged.[19]

15. It would be entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of the ceding country to attempt to determine these rights, and it is doubtful even if the political department of the ceding country could take any action in regard thereto, as the ceded territory would have passed wholly beyond the jurisdiction of the original owner. "It is no answer to say that by the ordinary principles of international law private property is respected by the sovereign which accepts the cession and assumes the duties and legal obligations of the former sovereign with respect to such private property within the ceded territory. All that can be properly meant by such a proposition is, that according to the well understood rules of international law, a change of sovereignty by cession ought not to affect private property, but no municipal tribunal has authority to enforce such an obligation. And if there is either an express or a well understood bargain between the ceding potentate and the Government to which the cession is made, that private property shall be respected, that is only a bargain which can be enforced by sovereign against sovereign, in the ordinary course of diplomatic pressure." Cook v. Sprigg, 68 L. J. P. C. 144, 147, per the Earl of Halsbury, Lord Chancellor. Stipulations for the protection of private rights may be found in many treaties by which the United States has acquired territory. They are held by the courts to be merely declaratory of the law of nations. 1 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 99.

People v. Folsom, 5 Cal. 373.

Redress of wrongs committed by ceding state.—It is the duty of a nation receiving a cession of territory to respect all rights of property recognized by the nation making the cession, but not to right wrongs which the grantor nation may have theretofore committed against individuals, except perhaps in cases where the wrong was so recently committed that the individual may not have had time to appeal to the courts or other authorities of the grantor nation for redress. The court held that by the principles of international law, on a transfer of territory by one nation to another, the political relations between the inhabitants of the ceded country and the former government are changed, and new ones arise between them and the new government. The

VII. EXTRATERRITORIALITY.

A. Rule Stated — "Comity of Nations." As a general proposition, both of international and municipal law, the laws of one country have in themselves no extraterritorial force, and whatever force they are permitted to have in foreign countries depends upon the comity of nations, regulated by a sense of their own interests and public convenience.[20] And whatever may be the municipal law under which a tribunal acts, if it exercises a jurisdiction which its sovereign is not allowed by the laws of nations to confer, its decrees must be disregarded out of the dominions of the sovereign.[21] Whether or not the principle of extraterritoriality is an absolute and well defined rule of law or only founded on courtesy, comity or deference between nations has been questioned.[22]

B. Limitations of Rule — 1. In General. There are instances, however, in which the municipal institutions of a state may operate beyond its territorial jurisdiction.[23]

manner in which this is to be effected is ordinarily the subject of treaty. The contracting parties have the right to contract, to transfer, and to receive, respectively, the allegiance of all native-born citizens; but the naturalized citizens, who owe allegiance purely statutory, when released therefrom, are remitted to their original status.

Mr. Justice Story considers that the phrase, "Comity of nations," is most appropriate as indicating the foundations and extent of the obligation of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. The extraterritorial influence of laws is derived from the voluntary consent of the nation within which its application is proposed; and they are tacitly adopted jure gentium, in the absence of any positive rule, affirming, denying, or restraining their operation; unless they are repugnant to local policy or prejudicial to local interests. It is not the comity of courts, but the comity of nations, which authorizes the administration of foreign laws within the limits of another sovereignty — and subject to the limitations we have mentioned, the courts can exercise no discretion on the subject. Hanrick v. Andrews, 9 Port. (Ala.) 9.

"A power to seize for a violation of the laws of the country is an attribute of sovereignty, and is to be exercised within the limits which circumscribe the sovereign power from which it is derived. And while the rights of war may be exercised on the high seas, a seizure beyond the limits of territorial jurisdiction for a breach of a municipal regulation is not warranted by international law." 1 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 33 [citing Rose v. Himely, supra].

Comity cannot prevail in cases where it violates the law of our own country, or the law of nature, or the law of God. Kerwin v. Doran, 29 Mo. App. 397.

22. The Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva held that "the privilege of exterritoriality, accorded to vessels of war, had been admitted into the law of nations, not as an absolute right, but solely as a proceeding founded on the principle of courtesy and mutual deference between nations." 4 Pap. Rel. Tr. Washington 50.

23. Some of these which relate to the person of the sovereign or the person of an ambassador of the sovereign or the right of a foreign army or fleet to march or sail through the territory of another country have been discussed supra, pp. 20–22. See also under AMBASSADORS AND CONSULS; NEUTRALITY LAWS; TREATIES; WAR. And see 2 Moore Dig. Int. L. c. 6, "Exemptions from Territorial Jurisdiction."

Wheaton, in enumerating the instances in which the municipal institutions of a state may operate beyond the limits of its territorial jurisdiction, specifies: "(1) person of the sovereign; (2) the person of the ambassador and his residence; (3) the foreign army or fleet marching through, sailing over or stationed in the territory of another State, and in the absence of any express prohibition the ports of a friendly State are considered as open to the public, armed and commissioned ships belonging to another nation with whom that State is at peace. Such ships are exempt from the jurisdiction of the local tribunals and authorities, whether they enter the ports under the license implied from the absence of any prohibition or under an express permission stipulated by treaty." Wheaton Int. L. (Dana 8th ed. 1866) pt. 2, § 95, p. 153. In elaborating upon this, he says: "If there shall be no prohibition, the ports of a friendly nation are considered as open to the public ships of all pose of trade, is, so long as she remains, subject to the laws which govern those ports.[24]

b. On High Seas. Ordinarily the authority of a nation cannot extend beyond her boundaries; but, where the boundary is the high seas, the right of a nation to prevent evasion of its laws is not so restricted. It may watch its coast and seize ships approaching with intent to violate its laws, provided such right is exercised at a reasonable distance only.[25] Crimes committed on the high seas, whether on board ships of war or merchantmen, are considered as committed in the territory of the state to which the ship belongs, because only the laws of the latter are infringed, and consequently only the jurisdiction of the same is called upon to adjudicate, whether the accused be of the nationality of the ship or a foreigner, and whether the crime was committed against a fellow countryman or between foreign passengers.[26]

c. Distinctions in Regard to Kind of Vessel. There are certain distinctions in regard to the extent of extraterritoriality of a nation's laws in regard to its merchant ships and its ships of war.[27] As to immunity from seizure of a foreign ship of war see the opinion of Attorney-General Cushing [28] and the opinion of Chief powers with whom it is at peace, and they are supposed to enter such ports and remain in them, while allowed to remain, under the protection of the Government of the place." Wheaton Int. L. § 100, p. 159.

A vessel on the high seas in a time of peace and on a lawful voyage is under the exclusive jurisdiction of her home state, and, if forced by unavoidable accident into a friendly port, she loses none of the rights which she had on the high seas; but she and her cargo, and the persons on board, with their property rights and personal relations, as settled by the laws of the state to which they belong, are placed temporarily under the protection extended by the law of nations to those so circumstanced, and although the vessel and her master, crew, and owners may be subject to the law of the place for any infractions thereof committed while so situated, yet the local law does not supersede the law of the country to which the vessel belongs, so far as relates to the rights, duties, and obligations of those on board. In the first case the principle of exterritoriality covers the ship from all foreign intervention or investigation. . . . In the second case, when the crime has been committed on board a merchantman in a foreign port, the resolution is different because the condition of a merchantman in a foreign port is different from that of a man of war. The rule in these cases, in default of treaties or inducements of reciprocity determining it, is, that if the offence affect only the interior discipline of the ship, without disturbing nor compromitting the tranquillity of the port, the local authority ought to declare itself incompetent unless its assistance is requested, because the true regulator of these questions, in which the local authority has no interest, is the consul." 28. A foreign ship of war or any prize of hers in command of a public officer possesses, in the ports of the United States, the rights of extraterritoriality and is not subject to local jurisdiction. And a prisoner on board such vessels cannot be released on habeas corpus issuing from either the courts of the Justice Marshall in "The Schooner Exchange" in which a vessel of war belonging to the French government was released from seizure.[29]

3. CONSULAR COURTS. There is another respect in which the laws of one country are sometimes administered in the territory of another, and that is by the consular courts which have been established in ports of Eastern countries.[30] This jurisdiction rests wholly on treaty stipulations and no government has the right to establish its courts within the territory of another government without the latter's consent.[31] The right of the United States to try Americans in consular courts has been established by the supreme court of the United States.[32]

VIII. RELATIONS BETWEEN STATES.

A. In General. A state is bound to treat every other state with equity and fairness according to the rules of international law, and the proper rules applicable to the situation are to be determined according to the circumstances.[33]

B. Under Treaties. The relations of one state to another state may, however, be affected and determined by treaties existing either between the individual nations or general treaties to which many nations are parties.[34]

IX. CLAIMS OF CITIZENS AGAINST FOREIGN STATES IN GENERAL.

A. "Interposition." This assertion of a claim for its citizen against a foreign government is known as "interposition."[35]

B. Claims Founded on a Tort. Claims of a private citizen against a foreign government are in their nature either contractual or tortious. L. § 259 et seq.

33. "The law of nations requires every national government to use 'due diligence' to prevent a wrong being done within its own dominion to another nation with which it is at peace, or to the people thereof; and because of this obligation of one nation to punish those who within its own jurisdiction counterfeit the money of another nation has long been recognized." 35. "Interposition is the diplomatic presentation by a nation of the claim of a subject against a foreign government with a view to induce by means of negotiation or arbitration a settlement of the claim. It differs from intervention in that it is confined to entirely peaceful remedies. When nations resort to reprisal, retorsion, 'pacific' blockade or war in order to force a settlement of the pecuniary claims of their subjects, they may be said to have intervened — they have committed a hostile act. On principle, neither interposition nor intervention should be allowed by international law in the case of a foreigner, who has been denied the standard of protection and justice to which he is entitled, until he has exhausted in vain the remedies provided by the national law." Annals Am. Acad. Pol. & Soc. Sci. (1903) p. 74, Geo. Winfield Scott.

"Whether the remedy of interposition will avail the foreigner anything in a particular is morally bound to assert the rights of its citizen and demand indemnity from the other government. The highest duty which a government owes to its citizens is to protect them against injuries inflicted on account of their nationality.[36]

C. Claims Founded on Contract. It is different, however, with claims founded on contract, for, while the government of the injured citizen may endeavor to obtain redress for its citizen in such case, the same moral obligation does not exist as in case of tort, because the elements of national honor are not involved to such a great extent, and the citizen is merely sustaining the same loss in a business risk that he might have sustained had he embarked his capital in a private enterprise and suffered loss as the result of individual delinquency or ordinary mercantile misfortune. While this cannot be laid down as a hard-and-fast rule in regard to the assertion and enforcement of claims against foreign governments by the government of the aggrieved citizen founded on contract such has been the policy of the United States and Great Britain.[37] Some of the modern writers on international law, especially Calvo and Drago, have advanced the theory that no government should use force to collect claims of its citizens case depends upon the standard of protection and justice which he is entitled to enjoy by the rules of international law, regardless of and apart from the national or municipal law of the nation which denies the civil responsibility. This standard can only be determined by the principles governing the actual occasion in which interposition has been successful." Annals Am. Acad. Pol. & Soc. Sci. (1903) p. 74, Geo. Winfield Scott.

36. One of the strongest declarations of the policy of Great Britain in protecting its subjects against injuries in foreign countries was made by Lord Palmerston in his speech in the house of commons in 1850 in defense of his policy regarding the celebrated "Don Pacifico" claim. The claimant was a British subject of Jewish extraction and claimed to have lost household property, jewels, papers, etc., of the value of some thirty-two thousand pounds sterling at the hands of a mob in Athens, where he was domiciled; the claim was subsequently settled for about one-thirtieth of the amount demanded. An interesting account of this celebrated incident is to be found in 2 McCarthy Hist. of Our Own Times, c. 19.

This report consists of eight volumes, the first three of which contain reports of the Committee on, and the history of, a large number of claims of citizens of the United States against foreign countries.

37. The policy of Great Britain in regard to money claims was laid down by Lord Palmerston in 1848, in a circular addressed to the representatives of that country in foreign states, as follows: "Her Majesty's Government have frequently had occasion to instruct her Majesty's representatives in various foreign States to make earnest and friendly, but not authoritative representations in support of the unsatisfied claims of British subjects who are holders of public bonds and money securities of those states. As some misconception appears to exist in some of those states with regard to the just right of her Majesty's government to interfere authoritatively, if it should think fit to do so, in support of those claims, I have to inform you as the representative of her Majesty in one of the states against which British subjects have such claims, that it is for the British government entirely a question of discretion, and by no means a question of international right, whether they should or should not make this matter the subject of diplomatic negotiation. If the question is to be considered simply in its bearing on international right, there can be no doubt whatever of the perfect right which the government of every country possesses to take up, as a matter of diplomatic negotiation, any well-founded complaint which any of its subjects may prefer against the government of another country, or any wrong which from such foreign government those subjects may have sustained. . . . It has hitherto against foreign governments, especially if founded on contract.[37a] It has been a matter of discussion whether or not the term "claim against foreign government," when used generally, does not refer exclusively to a claim founded upon tort.[38]

D. Claims May Be Either National or Individual. As between themselves, the claims of one government against another are always national, but as between the government asserting the claim and its own injured citizen, the claim might been thought by the successive governments of Great Britain undesirable that British subjects should invest their capital in loans to foreign governments instead of employing it in profitable undertakings at home; and with a view to discourage hazardous loans to foreign governments, who may be either unable or unwilling to pay the stipulated interest thereupon, the British government has hitherto thought it the best policy to abstain from taking up as international questions the complaints made by British subjects against foreign governments which have failed to make good their engagements in regard to such pecuniary transactions. For the British government has considered that the losses of imprudent men, who have placed mistaken confidence in the good faith of foreign governments, would prove a salutary warning to others, and would prevent any other foreign loans from being raised in Great Britain, except by governments of known good faith and ascertained solvency. But nevertheless it might happen that the loss occasioned to British subjects by the nonpayment of interest upon loans made by them to foreign governments might become so great that it would be too high a price for the nation to pay for such a warning as to the future, and in such a state of things it might become the duty of the British government to make these matters the subject of diplomatic negotiation." See Hall Int. L. (4th ed.) pp. 294, 295, where in commenting on this circular, the author says: "A short time previously Lord Palmerston, in answer to a question in the House of Commons, indicated that under certain circumstances he might be prepared to go the length of using force. The doctrine and the principles of policy laid down in Lord Palmerston's circular were more lately reaffirmed by Lord Salisbury. See the "London Times" of Jan. 7, 1880.

37a. See Dr. Drago's original note of Dec. 29, 1902, to the minister of the Argentine Republic to the United States (U. S. For. Rel. (1903) p. 1); Secretary Hay's note to the United States minister to Argentine, inclosing a memorandum upon the subject of Dr. Drago's note (U. S. For. Rel. (1903) p. 5); "Calvo and the Calvo Doctrine," 18 Green Bag (July, 1906, No. 7), p. 377 et seq). Proceedings of the Pan-American Conference at Rio de Janeiro of 1906 will refer to this doctrine. On April 17, 1903, Calvo, who was at that time envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to France and to the pope, from the Argentine Republic, wrote a circular letter soliciting the opinions of a number of specialists on international law upon Dr. Drago's note. The replies of a number of these correspondents are printed in the "Revue de droit international, et de legislation comparée," for 1903, and with other material bearing on the question may be found in a pamphlet entitled "La Doctrine de Monroe," Paris, 1903, 28 pages, 8°, by Eymeoud. The chargé d'affaires of the Argentine Republic in Russia has published a pamphlet containing an article by F. De Martens entitled "Par la justice vers la paix," and Dr. Drago's original note and certain other matters as an appendix.

The Calvo doctrine is predicated upon the fact that contracts made with a foreign nation should be construed in the courts of that nation.

The Drago doctrine presupposes the Calvo clause and carries the matter a step further, namely, that judgment had in those courts should be executed according to the same law.

If carried to their fullest extent the Calvo and Drago doctrines preclude diplomatic construction of contract debts as well as diplomatic enforcement or execution of adjudged indebtedness on contract claims.

38. There are conflicting views as to whether "claims" includes bonds — confers jurisdiction by the use of that term to entertain a claim based upon government bonds. In the Columbian Bond case (Convention with Columbia (1864), it was held by Sir Frederick Bruce, as umpire, that there was no jurisdiction in the tribunal to entertain the claim. He refers to the fact that the United States, like Great Britain, has never seen fit to give a citizen who holds an interest in the debt of a foreign country the same support that it would where he had suffered from a direct act of violence or injustice and says: "It is easy to see that many reasons of policy exist which would deter a government from insisting on a preferential payment of a part only of the public creditors of a foreign state." And he therefore concluded that "the term 'claims' in the convention must be construed so as to confine it to demands which have been made the subject of international controversy, or which are of such a nature as, according to received international principles, would entitle them on presentation to the official support of the government of the complainant." 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3612, 3615. See also Du Pont v. Mexico, No. 440, Convention of 1868, 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3616. But in the Venezuelan Bond Cases, No. 18, United States and Venezuelan Claims Commission, Convention of 1885, it was held in elaborate opinions that bonds were the subject of claims. 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3616. Claims based on contracts with a government are frequently the subject of international arbitration. The questions of international law be either national or individual.[39] There are many different views, however, on this division of claims into national and individual.[40] After the treaty of Washington of 1871, the question arose as to whether the tribunal that was to sit at Geneva and determine the amount, if any, due from Great Britain to the United States, should take cognizance of the national claims which might have amounted to many hundreds of millions of dollars. The tribunal itself decided that its jurisdiction extended only to the specified claims for individual loss.

E. Duty of Government to Present and Press Claims — 1. A Matter of Discretion. It is always a matter of discretion whether or not a government will present the claim of its injured citizen against a foreign government committing, or responsible for, an injury. Its relations with the foreign government may not, at the time, be in a condition which would justify any further strain upon them arising are usually those of citizenship and right to the protection of the government intervening. See also Aliens; Neutrality Laws. See 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3425–3590, for cases based on contract. Under the protocol with Venezuela of 1893, the term "all claims" includes an equitable demand. Boulton's Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 26.

39. For instance, the claims of the United States against Great Britain for the damages occasioned by the Alabama and other Confederate cruisers were, as against Great Britain, wholly national, but they could be separated into two divisions: "National," representing the general loss to the shipping industry of the United States, driving its merchant flag off the sea; and "Individual," as to those claims in which the individual ship-owners lost their vessels and the owners of the cargoes lost their cargoes. The following extract throws a great deal of light on the terms "national" and "individual" when applied to claims against foreign governments "The word 'national' has been largely used in argument in allusion to the different kinds of claims at different periods brought into the discussion, and is a convenient word if clearly understood in the connection in which it is used. All claims are 'national' in the sense of the jus gentium, for no nation deals as to questions of tort with an alien individual; the rights of that individual are against his Government, and not until that Government has undertaken to urge his claim — not until that Government has approved it as at least prima facie valid — does it become a matter of international contention; then, by adoption, it is the claim of the nation, and as such only is it regarded by the other country. The name of the individual claimant may be used as a convenient designation of the particular discussion, but as between the nations it is never his individual claim, but the claim of his Government founded upon injury to its citizen. Nations negotiate and settle with nations; individuals have relations only with their own Governments. Other claims, sometimes the subject of argument, rest upon injury to the state as a whole; of these an apt illustration is found in the so-called 'indirect' claims against Great Britain, disposed of in the arbitration of 1872, and in the claims advanced by France for injury caused by non-compliance with the treaties of 1778. Thus, while all claims urged by one nation upon another are, technically speaking, 'national,' it is convenient to use, colloquially the words 'national' and 'individual' as distinguishing claims founded upon injury to the whole people from those founded upon injury to particular citizens. Using the words in this sense, it appears that in the negotiations prior to the treaty of 1800, and in effect in the instrument itself, national claims were advanced by France against individual claims advanced by the United States. France urged that she had been wronged as a nation; we urged that our citizens' rights had been invaded. If 'national' claims had been used against 'national' claims, and the one class had been set off against the other in the compromise, of course the agreement would have been final in every way, as the surrender and the consideration therefor would have been national, and no rights between the individual and his own Government could have complicated the situation. But in the negotiation of 1800 we used 'individual' claims against 'national' claims, and the set-off was of French national claims against American individual claims. That any Government has the right to do this, as it has the right to refuse war in protection of a wronged citizen, or to take other action, which, at the expense of the individual, is most beneficial to the whole people, is too clear for discussion. Nevertheless, the citizen whose property is thus sacrificed for the safety and welfare of his country has his claim against that country; he has a right to compensation, which exists even if no remedy in the courts or elsewhere be given him. A right often exists where there is no remedy, and a most frequent illustration of this is found in the relation of the subject to his sovereign, the citizen to his government." Gray v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 340, 391, per Davis, J., in one of the leading French Spoliation cases.

40. One test which is frequently although not always applied to ascertain whether claims are individual or national is the disposition of the indemnity received. Any money received by the United States for indemnity for a national claim must of course eventually find its way into the treasury of and it might be inexpedient to press an individual matter.[41] How far governments should and will assert the claims of their citizens for bonds of defaulting governments has been discussed both academically and practically. There is no law, either municipal or international, by which a citizen can compel his own government to assert his claim against a foreign government. Whether or not a government which thus refuses to press a claim of its citizen against a foreign government becomes liable to its citizen for its failure to press the claim is a matter which must be determined by the municipal or national law of that government, and a claim of a citizen against his own government for refusing to present his claim against a foreign government can be determined only in such forum as that government clothes with jurisdiction of the case.

2. Failure to Press, or Relinquishment of Claim — a. Right of Government to Relinquish. It is a principle of international law that claims of individuals against a foreign government are the property of the government of the aggrieved citizen and that that government has the absolute right to relinquish the claim, to settle it, or to accept an indemnity therefor and after such adjustment the claim cannot ever be pressed again by the citizen against the foreign government.[42]

b. Indemnity to Citizen. In the United States it has generally been acknowledged, as an abstract principle of law, that where the government either refuses to press the just claim of a citizen against a foreign government or settles with the foreign government in such manner that the claim cannot be pressed, the government is bound to indemnify the citizen.[43] This results from a principle somewhat similar to that of eminent domain. The claim itself is private prop-

the United States, whence it can only be withdrawn under some congressional authority. On the other hand indemnities for individual claims are always paid to the United States, but they are as a general rule received by the executive department of the government, and paid over by it directly to the parties entitled thereto.

41. Where a citizen applies to his government to press his claim against a foreign power, he does so subject to the wise and judicious discretion which a nation has a right to exercise in determining his duty to itself, the citizen, and the foreign power. U. S. v. La Abra Silver Min. Co., 29 Ct. Cl. 432. "A citizen of one nation wronged by the conduct of another nation, must seek redress through his own government. His sovereign must assume the responsibility of presenting his claim, or it need not be considered. If this responsibility is assumed, the claim may be prosecuted as one nation proceeds against another, not by suit in the courts, as of right, but by diplomacy, or, if need be, by war. It rests with the sovereign against whom the demand is made to determine for himself what he will do in respect to it. He may pay or reject it; he may submit to arbitration, open his own courts to suit, or consent to be tried in the courts of another nation. All depends upon himself." U. S. v. Diekelman, 92 U. S. 520, 524, 23 L. ed. 742. A claim of an individual against a government does not become international in character until demand has been made on the government debtor. The Del Rio Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 879.

The secretary of state must decide, according to his own discretion, whether he will press the claim of a citizen of the United States upon the attention of a foreign government. 9 Op. Atty.-Gen. 338 (Black). See infra, IX, F.

42. It is a part of the sovereign right of a government, if, at any time before the consummation of a transaction relating to the claim of a citizen against a foreign government, it becomes satisfied of the falsity or injustice of the claim, to abandon all further action on behalf of the claimant. U. S. v. La Abra Silver Min. Co., 29 Ct. Cl. 432. "The government may take private property for public use by the terms of a treaty, and may release the choses in action of American citizens to a foreign government." Meade's Case, 2 Ct. Cl. 224, 225. See also infra, IX, E, 2, b, text and note 45.

43. "That Congress had the power to sacrifice the rights and interests of private citizens to secure the safety or prosperity of the public, I have no doubt; but the immutable principles of justice; the public faith of the states, that confiscated and received British debts, pledged to the debtors; and the rights of the debtors violated by the treaty; all combine to prove, that ample compensation ought to be made to all the debtors who have been injured by the treaty for the benefit of the public. This principle is recognized by the Constitution, which declares, 'that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.' See Vattel. lib. 1, c. 20, f. 244. . . . "It is not to be supposed, that those whose duty it may be to make the compensation, will make the rights of our citizens to be sacrificed to a public object, without the fullest indemnity." Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 199, 245, 1 L. ed. 568. In Gray v. U. S., 21 Ct. Cl. 340, 390, Davis, J., says: "The judiciary

erty, but it may be necessary to sacrifice it for the public good, and the owner of the claim should be compensated for his property so taken.[44] It has been decided by the supreme court of the United States that claims of citizens of the United States are private property as between the government of the United States and its citizen, and the citizen whose claim is asserted by the government, and which, so far as the foreign government is concerned, are national property of the United States.[45] No court, however, exists which has jurisdiction over the United has seldom occasion to deal with the abstract right of the citizen against his Government; for in a case raising such a question the individual is without remedy other than that granted him by the legislature. The question of right, therefore, is usually passed upon by the political branch of the Government, leaving to the courts the power only to construe the amount and nature of the remedy given. Still judicial authority is not wanting in support of the position that by the agreement with France the United States became liable over to their individual citizens. Lord Truro laid down in the House of Lords as admitted law — 'That if the subject of a country is spoliated by a foreign Government he is entitled to redress through the means of his own Government. But if from weakness, timidity, or any other cause on the part of his own Government no redress is obtained from the foreign one, then he has a claim against his own country' (De Bode v. Reg., 3 H. L. Cas. 449, 464). The same position is sustained by that eminent writer upon the public law, Vattel, who held that while the sovereign may dispose of either the person or the property of a subject by treaty with a foreign power, still, 'as it is for the public advantage that he thus disposes of them, the state is bound to indemnify the citizens who are sufferers by the transaction.'" See also extract from Grotius, cited in 2 Wharton Dig. Int. L. p. 709, § 248: "But we must also observe this, that a king may, two ways, deprive his subjects of their rights, either by way of punishment or by virtue of his eminent domain. But if he do it the last way it must be for some public advantage, and then the subject ought to receive, if possible, a just compensation for the loss he suffers out of the common stock (Grotius War and Peace 333, f. 2, ch. 14, § 7)."

"A settlement by the governments of the ground of international controversy between them, ipso facto settles any claims of individuals arising under such controversies against the government of the other country, unless they especially excepted; as each government by so doing assumes, as principal, the adjustment of the claims of its own citizens, and becomes, itself, solely responsible to them." 44. Wheaton (Wheaton Int. L. (Boyd 3d ed.) p. 623, says: "The power of making treaties of peace, like that of making other treaties with foreign states, is, or may be, limited in extent by the national Constitution. We have already seen that a general authority to make treaties of peace necessarily implies a power to stipulate the conditions of peace. . . . The duty of making compensation to individuals whose private property is thus sacrificed to the general welfare is inculcated by jurists as correlative of the sovereign right of alienating the things which are included in the eminent domain." Halleck, quoting both Wheaton and Kent, says that the treaty-making power is bound by the fundamental law of the constitution of the state, and the only exception made by Halleck, Wheaton, or Kent as to compensation to individuals is when a state is obliged for purposes of peace to cede territory they are not necessarily obliged to indemnify the persons whose territory is so ceded. It can easily be seen that this is not the same as a sacrifice of property, as it is simply a transfer of sovereignty, the ownership of the property not being affected, whereas in the case of claims the property right itself is not simply relegated for adjudication to courts of another country, but is absolutely destroyed. The United States, however, indemnified the owners of property which passed from under its sovereignty to that of Great Britain by the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842.

"A release by the United States to a foreign government (in part consideration of a cession of territory) of an indebtedness to an American citizen, acknowledged to be valid, is a taking of private property for public use." Meade v. U. S., 2 Ct. Cl. 224, 225.

"A debt due to an American citizen from a foreign Government is as much property as houses and lands, and when taken for public use is to be paid for in the same manner." Meade v. U. S., 2 Ct. Cl. 224, 225.

45. This right of indemnity against the acts of a foreign government was held, in Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 193, 215, 7 L. ed. 108, to be real and tangible enough to pass by general assignment by an insolvent, and it was held by the court, per Story, J., that "the right to indemnity for an unjust capture, whether against the captors or the sovereign; whether remediable in his own courts, or by his own extraordinary interposition and grants, upon private petition, or upon public negotiation, is a right attached to the ownership of the property itself, and passes by cession to the use of the ultimate sufferer." This decision has been followed in numerous cases. See Leonard v. Nye, 125 Mass. 455; Delafield v. Colden, 1 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 139; Williams v. Heard, 149 U. S.

States to compel it to indemnify its citizen for refusing to press or for relinquishing a claim against a foreign government. The United States has relinquished claims against foreign governments and established courts having jurisdiction to determine the amounts due to and the rights of the citizens whose claims have been so relinquished.[46]

3. Where Remedy Exists in Courts of Offending Country. As a general rule claims will not be asserted by a government in behalf of its citizen where a remedy exists in the courts of the offending country until every judicial remedy is exhausted which is open to the claimant.[47] And if the claim is not allowed by the courts, the government of the aggrieved citizen will not interfere unless there has been a substantial denial of justice, or such that makes it apparent that the judgment was influenced by the nationality of or prejudice against the citizen aggrieved.[48] Many contracts and concessions with governments, particularly with

"The decisions and awards of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims, under the statutes of the United States, were conclusive as to the amount to be paid upon each claim adjudged to be valid, but not as to the party entitled to receive it. A claim decided by that court to be a valid claim against the United States is property which passes to the assignee of a bankrupt under an assignment made prior to the decision." 46. Such was the case with Spain in 1898 and the subsequent establishment of the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission. For decisions recognizing the right of the state to sacrifice the vested rights of its citizens for national purposes see U. S. v. The Peggy, 1 Cranch (U. S.) 103, 110, 2 L. ed. 49; Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. (U. S.) 199, 245, 1 L. ed. 568.

47. "If claimant meditated any demand against the government of the country where he resided he should have sought redress through the tribunals of justice. . . . There is nothing to show that a denial of justice was meditated or likely to ensue to the claimant, and only in such event could he have claimed from the government of Mexico indemnity for the loss he sustained." Baldwin's Case, Treaty with Mexico, 1848, Act of March 3, 1849, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3126.

Local remedies must be exhausted, as a rule, but need not be where justice is wanting; where they have been superseded or are insufficient, and unjust judgments are not internationally binding. 7 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 987 et seq.

Law of domicile governs as to the class of claims for damages to a decedent which survive to his estate. Under the law of Venezuela his heirs may recover for bodily injuries but not for damages to feelings or reputation. The Metzger Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 578.

48. Justice may be as much denied when it would be absurd to seek it by judicial process as if denied after being sought. Triunfo Co.'s Case, For. Rel. U. S. (1902) 871. Where it is apparent that appeal to the municipal courts would be useless, resort need not be had to them before appealing to the government of the citizen for redress. Triunfo Co.'s Case, For. Rel. U. S. (1902) 871. In the Moses' Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3127, the claim was retained against the objection that the claimant had not pursued his remedy in the courts. The umpire, Dr. Lieber, adverted to the fact that there was no dispute about the justice of the claim but an apparent anxiety to get it out of that tribunal. There was an allegation in the petition that the courts were so corrupt that he would be denied justice. For other cases of denial of justice see 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3073 et seq. For other cases where claims were dismissed or allowed, according to the circumstances of each case on the ground that the ordinary judicial remedies were not or need not have been pursued see 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3126–3160. See also pp. 3160–3234, for cases where the final decrees of national tribunals have been opened and awards made, resting on fraud, insufficient evidence, gross irregularities, etc., amounting to denial of justice.

A claimant illegally imprisoned and subjected to inhuman treatment is not required to seek redress for his wrongs by a civil action in the local courts. He may have recourse to his own government and that government has the right to intervene in his behalf. The Davy Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 410.

Convention with Chile, 1892.— Under the terms of the contract the North and South American Construction Company (a Kentucky corporation) renounced any right it might have to the protection of the United States government. The contract also provided for the submission of disputes to an arbitration tribunal. This tribunal was afterward suppressed by the Chilean government. Upon filing the claim with the commission, the Chilean government demurred on the ground that the claimant had by contract deprived itself of the right and also on the ground that it had not attempted to secure its rights by the aid of the constituted authorities of Chile. The majority of the commission held that by suppressing the tribunal of arbitra-

the South American republics, contain stipulations to the effect that all disputes concerning the contract shall be determined by the courts of the country granting the concession or making the contract, and that the subject-matter of the contract shall never become the subject of an international claim. There has been some conflict regarding the effect of these stipulations, but the opinion now is that they do not bind the government of the citizen aggrieved.[49]

F. Submission of Claim to State Department. When a citizen of the United States has a claim against a foreign government which must be asserted through the medium of the government of the United States it must be first submitted to and passed upon by the state department in accordance with the rules of practice which that department has established.[50]

tion the Chilean government had revived the right which the claimant had to invoke the intervention of the United States, and, under the terms of the convention, the claimant was not bound to exhaust the remedies afforded by the Chilean authorities. Case of North and South American Construction Co., No. 7, United States and Chilean Claims Commission, Convention of 1892; Shield Rep. 54; 3 Moore Int. Arb. p. 2318.

Convention with Costa Rica, 1860.— The contentions of claimants were the subject of litigation before claim was made. "Only a formal denial of justice, the dishonesty or prevaricatio of a judge legally proved, 'the case of torture, the denial of the means of defense at the trial, or gross injustice, in re minime dubia' (see opinion of Phillimore in the controversy between Great Britain and Paraguay) may justify a government in extending further its protection." Bertinatti, Commissioner, Case of Medina, Convention with Costa Rica, 1860, MSS. Opinions; 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2317.

Treaty 1853 Great Britain.— Claim was made as next of kin, etc., to property in hands of the crown. "No instance can be found of the interference of government with the question of ordinary heirship and succession of estates in other jurisdictions. They are ever left to local action and jurisdiction of the courts of the countries where situated." Cook's Case, Upham, Commissioner, Senatorial Executive Document 103, 34th Congressional Session, 166–169; 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2315. See also Anderson's Case, No. 333, Convention with Mexico, 1868, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2317.

49. The agreement of one of its citizens with another nation that all disputes and controversies shall be submitted to private arbitration or be subject to the jurisdiction of the local courts exclusively and not be the subject of an international claim does not bind the United States, and it may intervene in behalf of its citizen. The Rudloff Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 182. A provision in a contract with a nation that all doubts and controversies arising concerning it shall be referred to the local courts of that country and shall never be the subject of an international claim is binding upon the parties to the contract. It does not bind the government of the citizen who is the party to the contract, however, and it may intervene, particularly if there is a denial of justice. The Woodruff Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 151. The right of the sovereign power to submit all claims of its citizens to a mixed commission is superior to any attempt on the part of a subject or citizen to contract away such right in advance. The commission is, as between Venezuela and Italy, substituted for all national forums which, with or without contract, might have had jurisdiction over the subject-matter. The Martini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 819. A clause contained in a contract that "doubts and controversies that may arise in consequence of this contract shall be settled by the Courts of the Republic in conformity with its laws, does not preclude the claimant from demanding damages from the government for breach of a collateral promise. The American Electric Co. Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 246. In order that a party to a contract containing a clause that "any questions or controversies that may arise out of this contract shall be decided in conformity with the laws of the Republic (Venezuela) and by the competent tribunals of the Republic" may make a claim before an international tribunal for damages for its breach, he must first go before the local courts and obtain a judgment that this breach of the contract took place. No damages can be recovered for breach of a second contract made on the assumption that the first one is illegal without having been so adjudged by a competent court. Turnbull, etc., Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 200. A stipulation in a concession from a government that all doubts and controversies arising as to the interpretation and execution of the agreement shall be submitted to the local tribunals, and shall never be made the subject of international intervention, bars the concessionary from the right to seek redress from any other tribunals. Orinoco Steamship Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 72.

50. Circular of department of state in regard to claims against foreign governments, issued March 6, 1901, and in force at present time — July, 1906 (The latest edition of this circular can be obtained on application to the department of state, Washington, D. C.) is as follows: "Citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments, not founded on contract, in the prosecution of which they may desire the assistance of the Department of State, should forward to the

G. Methods of Enforcement and Collection — 1. In General. When a government has taken up the claim of its citizen it may assert it in such manner Department statements of the same, under oath, accompanied by the proper proof. The following rules, which are substantially those which have been adopted by commissions organized under conventions between the United States and foreign governments, for the adjustment of claims are published for the information of citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments of the character indicated in the above notification; and they are advised to conform as nearly as possible to these rules in preparing and forwarding their papers to the Department of State. Each claimant should file a memorial, properly dated, setting forth minutely and particularly the facts and circumstances from which the right to prefer such claim is derived by the claimant. This memorial should be verified by his or her oath or affirmation. The memorial and all the accompanying papers should have a margin of at least one inch on each side of the page, so as to admit of their being bound in volumes for preservation and convenient reference; and the pages should succeed each other, like those of a book, and be readable without inverting them. When any of the papers mentioned in rule 11 are known to have been already furnished to the Department by other claimants, it will be unnecessary to repeat them in a subsequent memorial. A particular description, with a reference to the date under which they were previously transmitted, is sufficient. Nor is it necessary, when it is alleged that several vessels have been captured by the same cruiser, to repeat in each memorial the circumstances in respect to the equipment, arming, manning, flag, etc., of such cruiser, which are relied upon as the evidence of the responsibility of a foreign government for its alleged tortious acts. A simple reference to and adoption of one memorial in which such facts have been fully stated will suffice. It is proper that the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented should be requested in express terms, to avoid a possible objection to the jurisdiction of a future commission on the ground of the generality of the claim. Claims of citizens against the Government of the United States are not generally under the cognizance of this Department. They are usually subjects for the consideration of some other Department, or of the Court of Claims, or for an appeal to Congress."

"In every memorial should be set forth —

"1. The amount of the claim; the time when and place where it arose; the kind or kinds and amount of property lost or injured; the facts and circumstances attending the loss or injury out of which the claim arises; the principles and causes which lie at the foundation of the claim.

"2. For and in behalf of whom the claim is preferred, giving Christian and surname of each in full.

"3. Whether the claimant is now a citizen of the United States, and, if so, whether he is a native or naturalized citizen and where is now his domicile; and, if he claims in his own right, then whether he was a citizen when the claim had its origin and where was then his domicile; and, if he claims in the right of another, then whether such other was a citizen when the claim had its origin and where was then and where is now his domicile; and if, in either case, the domicile of the claimant at the time the claim had its origin was in any foreign country, then whether such claimant was then a subject of the government of such country or had taken any oath of allegiance thereto.

"4. Whether the entire amount of the claim does now, and did at the time when it had its origin, belong solely and absolutely to the claimant; and, if any other person is or has been interested therein, or in any part thereof, then who is such other person and what is or was the nature and extent of his interest; and how, when, and by what means and for what considerations the transfer of rights or interests, if any such was made, took place between the parties.

"5. Whether the claimant, or any other who may at any time have been entitled to the amount claimed, or any part thereof, has ever received any, and, if any, what, sum of money or other equivalent or indemnification for the whole or any part of the loss or injury upon which the claim is founded; and, if so, when and from whom the same was received.

"6. All testimony should be in writing, and upon oath or affirmation, duly administered according to the laws of the place where the same is taken, by a magistrate or other person competent by such laws to take depositions, having no interest in the claim to which the testimony relates and not being the agent or attorney of any person having such interest, and it must be certified by him that such is the case. The credibility of the affiant or deponent, if known to such magistrate or other person authorized to take such testimony, should be certified by him; and, if not known, should be certified on the same paper upon oath by some other person known to such magistrate, having no interest in such claim and not being the agent or attorney of any person having such interest, whose credibility must be certified by such magistrate. The deposition should be reduced to writing by the person taking the same, or by some person in his presence having no interest, and not being the agent or attorney of any person having an interest in the claim, and should be carefully read to the deponent by the magistrate before being signed by him, and this should be certified.

"7. Depositions taken in any city, port, or place without the limits of the United States may be taken before any consul or other public civil officer of the United States resident as it sees fit; it may withdraw it, or it may assert it by threatening or employing force to collect it.[51]

2. By Suit. The great difficulty in the law of claims against governments is that every government protects itself by the right of the sovereign not to be sued.[52] As a general proposition of law a sovereign power is exempt from claims, demands, process, and jurisdiction,[53] and cannot be reached for the assertion of any claim except through its legislative or executive departments; indemnity for claims against it of all kinds is thus a matter of grace and not the result of judicial decree.[54] Many governments, however, have waived this exemption of sovereignty in such city, port, or place, having no interest, and not being agent or attorney of any person having an interest, in the claim to which the testimony so taken relates. In all other cases, whether in the United States or in any foreign place, the right of the person taking the deposition to administer oaths by the laws of the place must be verified.

"8. Every affiant or deponent should state in his deposition his age, place of birth, residence, and occupation, and where was his residence and what was his occupation at the time the events took place in regard to which he deposes; and must also state if he have any, and, if any, what, interest in the claim to support which his testimony is taken; and, if he have any contingent interest in the same, to what extent, and upon the happening of what event, he will be entitled to receive any part of the sum which may be awarded. He should also state whether he be the agent or attorney of the claimant or of any person having an interest in the claim.

"9. Original papers exhibited in proof should be verified as originals by the oath of a witness, whose credibility must be certified as required in the sixth of these rules; but, when the fact is within the exclusive knowledge of the claimant, it may be verified by his own oath or affirmation. Papers in the handwriting of anyone who is deceased or whose residence is unknown to the claimant may be verified by proof of such handwriting and of the death of the party or his removal to places unknown.

"10. All testimony taken in any foreign language and all papers and documents in any foreign language which may be exhibited in proof should be accompanied by a translation of the same into the English language.

"11. When the claim arises from the seizure or loss of any ship or vessel, or the cargo of any ship or vessel, a certified copy of the enrollment or registry of such ship or vessel should be produced, together with the original clearance, manifests, and all other papers and documents required by the laws of the United States which she possessed on her last voyage from the United States, when the same are in the possession of the claimant or can be obtained by him; and, when not, certified copies of the same should be produced, together with his oath or affirmation that the originals are not in his possession and can not be obtained by him.

"12. In all cases where property of any description for the seizure or loss of which a claim has been presented was insured at the time of such seizure or loss, the original policy of insurance, or a certified copy thereof, should be produced.

"13. If the claimant be a naturalized citizen of the United States, a copy of the record of his naturalization, duly certified, should be produced.

"14. Documentary proof should be authenticated by proper certificates or by the oath of a witness.

"15. If the claimant shall have employed counsel, the name of such counsel should, with his address, be signed to the memorial and entered upon the record, so that all necessary notices may be addressed to such counsel or agent respecting the case."

In Lawrence's Report on Alien Claims will be found a compilation of the rules of a member of foreign countries for the presentation of claims against them, as such rules existed in 1875.

52. "The action of a former Congress, however, in requiring (Act of July 27, 1868, U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 1068 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 740]) that aliens should not maintain certain suits here unless their own governments accord a corresponding right to citizens of the United States, has revealed the fact that the legal redress given to a citizen of the United States against the United States is less than he can have against almost any government in Christendom. The laws of other nations have been produced and proved in this court, and the mortifying fact is judicially established that the government of the United States holds itself, of nearly all governments, the least amenable to the law." Brown v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 171, 192, decided prior to passage of Tucker Act.

53. Although a foreign government is not liable to suit in our courts, yet, when it submits to the jurisdiction by asking the aid of the courts of this country to enforce its claims, claims against it may be set off against its demands. Rowan v. Sharps' Rifle Mfg. Co., 29 Conn. 282, 31 Conn. 1.

54. "It is within the constitutional power of Congress to determine whether claims upon the public treasury are founded upon moral and honorable obligations, and upon to the extent of clothing certain of their courts with jurisdiction as to certain specified classes of cases, and if a case falls within one of these specified classes it can be asserted in the court having jurisdiction thereof.[55] Wherever this right to sue has been granted, as it is a waiver of sovereignty, it is always presumed that the waiver is as limited as possible and is not to be extended.[56] This right to sue in a specified case inures, as a general rule, to the benefit of citizens of that country only, and an alien has no right to avail himself of the privilege unless it is expressly granted.[57] So far as we have been able to find, no country has waived its exemption and established a tribunal in which a citizen of another country can assert a claim founded on a tort. In this country a citizen may assert a claim founded on contract in the court of claims, but no citizen of a foreign country can assert his claim in this court, unless the government of which he is a subject gives the same right to a citizen of the United States.[58] Some governments allow aliens to sue them in their own courts when the claims are founded on contract, and when a citizen of one of these countries has a claim against the United States principles of right and justice; and having decided such questions in the affirmative, and having appropriated public money for the payment of such claims, its decision can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the Government." U. S. v. Realty Co., 163 U. S. 427, 16 S. Ct. 1120, 41 L. ed. 215.

55. Such is the case in the United States where the court of claims has jurisdiction of certain classes of claims against the government. See infra, note 58.

56. An act of congress referring a claim against the government to an officer of one of the executive departments to examine and adjust does not, even though the claimant and the government act under the statute, and the account is examined and adjusted, make the case one of arbitrament and award, in the technical sense of these words, so as to bind either party as by submission to award. Hence a subsequent act, repealing the one making the reference, the claim not yet being paid, impairs no right and is valid. Blackfeather v. U. S., 190 U. S. 368, 23 S. Ct. 772, 47 L. ed. 1099; Gordon v. U. S., 7 Wall. (U. S.) 188, 19 L. ed. 35.

57. In U. S. v. O'Keefe, 11 Wall. (U. S.) 178, 20 L. ed. 131, the claimant, O'Keefe, was a subject of Great Britain and the question for decision was whether any reciprocal right was accorded to citizens of the United States in Great Britain. It was found that an alien had the right to file a "petition of right" in great Britain in common with the subjects of that country; that this right had become a part of the common law and that the practice was regulated by statute. This procedure, it was decided, was within the terms of the statute and that O'Keefe had the right to bring his action in the court of claims. "The only question presented by this case is whether, under the Italian law, an American citizen may maintain an action against the government of Italy. As we have before found, the perfected justice of the civil law made the government, in matters of ordinary obligation, subject to the suit of the citizen, in the ordinary tribunals of the country. We have found this right to be preserved under modern codes in Prussia, Hanover, and Bavaria, Brown v. U. S., 5 Ct. Cl. 571; in the Republic of Switzerland, Lobsiger v. U. S., 5 Ct. Cl. 687; in Holland, The Netherlands, The Hanseatic Provinces and the free city of Hamburg, Brown v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 193; in France, Dauphin v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 221; in Spain, Molina v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 269, and in Belgium, De Give v. U. S., 7 Ct. Cl. 517. It was also shown in Brown v. U. S., supra, by a distinguished historical writer who was examined as a witness, Mr. Frederick Kapp, that this liability of a government under the civil law is not a device of modern civilization, but has been deemed inherent in the system, and has been so long established that, to use the phrase of the common law, the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Therefore, it is to be expected that in Italy, the seat and fountain of the civil law, this same liability of government is to be found existing. The 'Civil Code of the Kingdom of Italy' of 1866 recognizes, rather than establishes, the fundamental principle of liability; but it expressly provides (article 10) that, 'in suits pending before the judicial authority, between private persons and the public administration, the proceedings shall always take place formally at the regular session.' It is also established, by the third article of the same code, that 'the alien is admitted to enjoy all the civil rights granted to citizens.' These provisions establish the right of an Italian citizen to maintain his action in this court within the meaning of the Act of July 27, 1868 (U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 1068 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 740]), which prohibits the subject of a foreign government from maintaining a suit for captured property, unless 'the right to prosecute claims against such government in its courts' is reciprocal, and extends to citizens of the United States." Where a special mode is provided for ob-founded on contract he can have it adjudicated in the court of claims. If a citizen of the United States has a claim against a foreign government, whether founded on tort or on contract, where no court exists having jurisdiction of claims of aliens, he has no redress except through the assertion of his claim by this government against the foreign country, and when once his government takes up the claim and asserts it, it assumes all control thereover.[59]

3. By Diplomacy and Arbitration. Claims have been collected from foreign governments by the United States and by other nations by diplomatic correspondence where there has been no breach of pleasant relations, and sometimes by diplomatic negotiations followed by arbitration, sometimes with and sometimes without friction.[60] All claims on behalf of its citizens against a foreign government should be, and, generally speaking, can be, settled by the government either diplomatically or by an arbitration tribunal specially created or by reference to the permanent court now existing at The Hague. The tendency is to endow The Hague court with ampler jurisdiction and to provide by general arbitration treaties for the submission of all disputes involving only questions of law and pecuniary claims as they arise. In 1902 the Pan-American Conference at the City of Mexico adopted such an arbitration agreement which was ratified January

taining compensation, such as by statute or by treaty, or where the power of assessing or deciding on the questions is given to a special tribunal, the remedies thus specially provided can alone be pursued, and consequently no action in the premises can be maintained in the court of claims. 60. The best collection of authorities on this subject will be found in Moore's History of International Arbitrations which contains, in volumes one and two, a summary of all the arbitrations to which the United States had been a party up to the time of the publication of that work; also at the end of volume five, appendix 3, will be found a summary of arbitrations between countries other than the United States and in which the United States was not concerned in any manner. At the end of volume two there is a summary of arbitrations in which the president or other officer of the United States was umpire. In nearly all of them claims against foreign governments or the United States or both were involved, but a few of them related to boundaries. Some of these arbitrations are as follows, the references being to Moore's Arbitrations:

Great Britain.— Commission 1794 London (I, 299–349); Commission 1794 Philadelphia (I, 271–298); Arbitrator 1818 St. Petersburg (I, 350–363); 1822 Commission Washington (I, 363–382); 1853 London Commission (I, 391–425); 1863 Washington Commission (I, 237–270); 1871 Geneva Commission (I, 495–682); 1871 Washington Commission (I, 683–702); 1892 Paris Commission (I, 755–961); 1896 Victoria Commission (II, 2123–2131).

Salvador.— 1864 Guatemala Commission (II, 1855–1857).

China.— 1884 Swatow Commission (II, 1857–1859).

11, 1905, by the senate of the United States. At the present time arbitration treaties exist between many countries, some of which are limited to special cases and others are almost general in their terms.[61]

4. By Threats and Force. Claims may also be collected from foreign governments by threats of war and by the actual employment of force.[62] In fact one of the causes stated in the ultimatum of the United States to Spain was the immense amount of unpaid claims of citizens of the United States against the

61. The Hague Tribunal was established under what is known as The Hague Arbitration Convention of 1899 for the peaceful settlement of international differences. The powers signatory to the original treaty, other than the United States, are Germany, Austria, Belgium, China, Denmark, Spain, France, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Japan, Luxemburg, Montenegro, The Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Siam, Sweden, Norway, Turkey, and Bulgaria. The treaty was executed at The Hague July 29, 1899, as the result of the first peace conference held in that year at the invitation of the Czar of Russia and to which delegates from all of the above mentioned powers were present and it contains provisions, in articles 59 and 60 for other powers becoming parties to it. The treaty is divided into four titles: the first relates to the maintenance of general peace; the second, articles 2–8, to good offices and mediation under which the powers agree to allow such good offices from friendly powers; third, to international commissions of inquiry, articles 9–14, which are to be constituted by special agreements between the parties, and the reports of such commissions are to be limited to a statement of the facts and shall in no way have the character of an arbitral award. (In the case of the North sea incident between Russia and Great Britain, a commission of inquiry was organized on the lines of The Hague treaty, but the commission was given fuller powers than those provided for in The Hague treaty.) Fourth, international arbitration, articles 15–57, which in its turn is divided into: chapter 1, articles 15–19, on arbitral justice, and chapter 2, articles 20–29, on the Permanent Court of Arbitration, providing for its organization and jurisdiction, and, chapter 2, articles 30–57, on arbitral procedure which provides the rules of practice applicable to cases referred to the court unless the parties agree upon different regulations. The treaty concludes with general provisions, articles 58–61, as to the ratification of the treaty and the adhesion of other powers thereto. This treaty was ratified by the senate Feb. 7, 1900 (32 U. S. St. at L. 1779) and thereafter President McKinley appointed as members of the court, representing the United States, the Hon. Melville W. Fuller, chief justice of the United States, Hon. Benjamin Harrison, former president of the United States, Hon. John W. Griggs of New Jersey, then attorney-general of the United States, Hon. George Gray, of Delaware, former senator of the United States, member of the peace conference between the United States and Spain and judge of the circuit court of the United States for the third circuit. After the death of ex-President Harrison, Hon. Oscar S. Straus, of New York, former minister from the United States to Turkey, was appointed to succeed him. The first matter referred to the tribunal was the controversy between Mexico and the United States in regard to the liability of the Mexican government to certain charitable institutions in California, known as the "Pious Fund Case." The next case was that arising out of the blockade of Venezuelan ports by Great Britain, Germany, and Italy. Mexico, Spain, France, Belgium, Sweden, and Norway and the United States held claims against Venezuela, but no forceful measures were employed by them. All of the claims were subsequently sent to various arbitration commissions for adjustment and Venezuela agreed to set apart thirty per cent of its customs revenues to be divided between the claimants according to the awards to be made under these arbitrations. The blockading powers having claimed a preference, the question as to whether they were entitled to preferential treatment was submitted to The Hague Tribunal which decided that they had a preference. For a full report of this case see Penfield's Report of the Venezuelan Arbitration of 1903, Washington, Government Printing Office (1905). For a full account of the proceedings of the various claims commissions see Ralston's Report of the Venezuela Arbitrations of 1903, protocols, opinions and summary of awards; Washington, Government Printing Office (1904). Non-amicable methods are classified in 7 Moore Dig. Int. L. § 1089 et seq. as follows: Withdrawal of diplomatic relations; retorsion or retaliation; display of force; use of force, with special authority and without special authority; gain of preference in payment; reprisals; pacific blockade; embargo; non-intercourse.

Spanish government.[63] No rule can be laid down as to how far one government should resort to force for the purpose of indemnifying its citizens who have suffered loss from the tortious acts of another government. That is a matter that each government must decide as occasion arises, and a government which would not protect its citizens from bodily harm and loss of property from violence due to the tortious acts of a foreign government or for which it was responsible for failure to prevent would be failing in its chief duty — the protection of the rights of its citizens at home and abroad.[64] How far a government should go in attempting to collect the claims of its citizens against a foreign government for violations of contracts is a different matter, and it is the general opinion that a different rule prevails as to the extent to which force should be used or threatened.[65]

H. Payment or Distribution to Citizen Claimants — 1. Claims Collected Under Decree of Arbitration Tribunal. When the government collects a claim for one of its citizens from a foreign government by settlement or a decree of an arbitration tribunal, there is seldom any difficulty about the claimant receiving the award. In such cases, in the United States, the award is generally paid over by the state department without the intervention of any act of congress, the money being paid to the secretary of state as trustee for the citizen. There have been instances where the award has been paid when there has been more than one claimant, and the apportionment between the parties thereto has been made by the state department.[66]

2. After Relinquishment of Claims of Many Citizens and Settlement Between the Two States — a. In General. Where, however, the United States has given up and relinquished the claims of a large number of its citizens against a foreign government and the money has been paid to the United States by the foreign government, either in a lump sum[67] or by the adjustment of accounts,[68] or by the cession of territory,[69] the money or its equivalent in land and credit is paid or transferred to the United States as a creditor nation and while it is also a trustee for its citizens whose claims it has thus relinquished, the manner of distribution

64. The policy of the United States has always been to protect its citizens from the tortious acts of foreign governments to the utmost. If a citizen be spoliated by a foreign government, he is entitled to obtain redress from the foreign government through the means of his own government. The Brig Armstrong v. U. S., Dev. Ct. Cl. 38. In fact the statute requires the president to take immediate action in behalf of citizens wrongfully imprisoned. "Whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress." U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 2001 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 1270].

66. Such was the case in regard to both the indemnity paid by Spain for the Virginius outrage (U. S. For. Rel. Rep. (1875) pt. 2, p. 1250); and that paid by Great Britain for the loss sustained by American fishermen by excluding them from the Newfoundland fisheries in 1878 (U. S. For. Rel. Rep. (1881) p. 590).

is wholly a matter within the legislative control, and the citizen whose claim has been surrendered has no way of ascertaining or collecting from the government his share of the indemnity, except such as congress shall provide.[70]

b. Manner of Distribution. This may be done either by directing payment to be made to the parties entitled thereto, by granting jurisdiction to the court of claims,[71] or by appointing special tribunals to determine the claims and what parties are entitled to share in the award.[72] In case the awards are made by the court of claims or special tribunals their judgments can still only be satisfied and discharged after an appropriation under an act of congress.[73]

c. Amount Payable. Where the United States has secured indemnity either in cash or territory from a foreign government for claims due to citizens of the United States and a tribunal has been appointed to determine what citizens are entitled and to what extent to participate in the indemnity, the claim of the citizen is adjudicated on principles of international law, and the United States is only bound to pay to its citizens prosecuting their claims in that court whatever those citizens could have recovered against the foreign government under the principles of international law, had the claims been presented and adjudicated by an international tribunal of arbitration.[74]

I. Who May Assert Claim — 1. In General. The United States government never asserts a claim against a foreign government except in behalf of its own citizens or of persons who are under its protection, and in this respect the government determines for itself whom it will protect, and it has the right, as between itself and the foreign government, to take under its protection and assert the rights of such persons within its jurisdiction as it shall see fit.[75]

70. See 2 Butler Treaty-Making Power, §§ 443 et seq., notes on the status of international claims against foreign governments. "The sum awarded by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva, when paid, constituted a national fund, in which no individual claimant had any rights legal or equitable, and which Congress could distribute as it pleased." 71. As was done in the case of the Chinese indemnity in 1878 and in many of the French spoliation cases. 20 U. S. St. at L. 171, the Chinese Indemnity Act. For cases bearing on disputed rights of claimants for awards of arbitration tribunals or indemnity paid for claims of citizens see 2 Butler Treaty-Making Power, § 443, note 4, and cases there collected.

72. As was done in the case of the claims against Spain in 1819 and the present existing Spanish treaty claims commission for the settlement of 1898.

A list of tribunals to adjudicate claims against certain nations has been given in Moore's Arbitration as follows (the references being to the volume and page of that work): Against Great Britain — 1826 (I, 382–390); 1871 (V, 4639–4685). Against France — 1800 (V, 4396–4432); 1803 (V, 4432–4446); 1831 (V, 4447–4485). Against Spain — 1821 (V, 4487–4518); 1821 (V, 4519–4531); 1901 (Act of March 2, 31 U. S. St. at L. 877). Against Denmark — 1830 (V, 4549–4573). Against Naples — 1832 (V, 4575–4589). Against Peru — 1841 (V, 4591–4607). Against Brazil — 1849 (V, 4609–4626). Against China — 1858 (V, 4627–4637). Against Mexico — 1849 (II, 1244–1286).

73. As a general rule these appropriations are made within a year after the judgments are rendered, but there have been instances, especially in the French spoliation claims, where congress has not appropriated for the judgments of the court of claims. And in case congress fails to appropriate there is no way to compel it to do so or to otherwise enforce the judgment.

74. That is to say, the United States stands in the place of the foreign government and is not liable to pay any more than what the foreign government would have been obliged to pay. The act creating the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission is a recent example. 31 U. S. St. at L. 877. See The Paquette Habana, 175 U. S. 677, 700, 20 S. Ct. 290, 44 L. ed. 320.

75. For instance the United States may and has asserted claims against foreign governments for the wrongful killing of sailors on United States vessels, although such sailors were not citizens of the United States, except so far as the United States will grant rights of citizenship and protection to its sailors and also for the wrongful killing of foreign persons in the consular service of the United States. In January, 1861, Mr. Huesken, the interpreter to the Japanese legation, was assaulted and killed; the United States at once demanded punishment of the offenders, an apology for the offense and an indemnity for the widowed mother of Mr. Huesken, all of which was accorded, and the sum of ten thousand dollars was paid by the Japanese government and transmitted to Mrs. Huesken, a citizen of The Netherlands. See Messages and Diplomatic Correspondence for 1862, pp. 804–807. Indemnity was paid to

2. Native-Born or Naturalized Citizens. For the purpose of asserting their claims, citizens may be native-born or naturalized, and under the doctrine of expatriation as adopted by the United States government the naturalized citizen has the same rights as the native-born citizen so far as the assertion of claims against foreign governments is concerned.[76] The United States may, if it sees fit, assert the claim of one who intends to become naturalized, although the naturalization has not been entirely perfected.[77] Native-born and naturalized citizens may retain their citizenship even though absent for a long period, and the presumption animus revertendi can be maintained and the United States will protect them; but this rule is not as strong in regard to a naturalized citizen who returns to his native country, and in that case the presumption of the continuance of the animus revertendi is not so strong.[78] There is a growing tendency to regard with disfavor the assertion of the claims of a naturalized citizen against his former country after he has returned to that country and has remained there for any period of time and has engaged in business there.[79] The decision of the state department to present a claim on behalf of one alleging citizenship is not always conclusive, as the treaty appointing the commission for the adjustment of the claims of citizens might give the commission power to determine whether or not the claimant was a citizen and entitled to have his claim adjudicated.[80]

77. This was the rule laid down in the famous Martin Koszta case in 1853, in which Mr. Marey, secretary of state, denied the right of Austria to question the citizenship of Koszta, who had merely declared his intention to become a citizen and had not yet received his final papers. Renunciation of allegiance.—"When citizens of the United States voluntarily leave their own country and enter into the service of another, they thereby voluntarily renounce their allegiance, and with it relinquish their right to the protection of the government under which they were born." Dimond's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2386; Treaty of 1848 with Mexico; Act of March 3, 1849.

79. Mr. Olney, secretary of state, in a despatch to Consul-General Lee, Feb. 23, 1897, concerning the Ruiz case, said: "You are wholly mistaken in thinking a person is necessarily entitled to United States protection because of having taken out naturalization papers. Even native-born citizens may forfeit such protection by long-continued residence abroad and evasion of citizenship duties. Much more does a naturalized citizen incur such forfeiture when naturalization papers are the beginning and end of the citizenship, and he abides permanently in his native country."

Mr. Blaine, secretary of state, March 31, 1881, wrote to Mr. Kasson: "A naturalized citizen of the United States who returns to his country of origin and there marries, settles, and remains twenty years is not entitled to a passport as a citizen of the United States."

Mr. Fish, secretary of state, Oct. 14, 1869, wrote to Mr. Motley: "Cautious scrutiny is enjoined in such cases, because evidence has been accumulating in this Department for some years that many aliens seek naturalization in the United States without any design of subjecting themselves, by permanent residence, to the duties and burdens of citizenship, and solely for the purpose of returning to their native country and fixing their domicile and pursuing business therein, relying on such naturalization to evade the obligations of citizenship to the country of their native allegiance and actual habitation. To allow such pretensions would be to tolerate a fraud upon both Governments, enabling a man to enjoy the choice of two nationalities and to escape the duties and burdens of each." Mr. Fish also wrote to Mr. Wing, Dec. 15, 1870: "An eminent predecessor of mine in this Department, in an instruction to a minister of the United States in a foreign country, expressed the opinion that 'it can be admitted of no doubt that the naturalization laws of the United States contemplate residence in the country and of the naturalized citizens, unless they shall go abroad in the public service or for temporary purposes.'"

3 Moore Dig. Int. L. cc. 10, 11, 12, 13, exhaustively cover the subjects of nationality; citizenship; naturalization; expatriation; national protection; domicile; passports; aliens; expulsion and exclusion.

80. This question should more properly be treated under Citizens and Aliens, but a few cases bearing on the subject are here given. In The Texan Star (Pike v. U. S.), No. 736, Davis Rep. 89, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2360, after an elaborate review of the authorities it was held, per Rayner, J., that the simulated transfer of the "Texan Star" to a British subject did not estop the real owners from making claim.

International tribunals are usually limited to jurisdiction over claims of their respective citizens and which had their inception in favor of such citizens. But this rule may be modified by treaty. Orinoco Steamship Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 72. An international tribunal is not bound, in determining its jurisdiction, by the recitals in a certificate of naturalization, and may determine for itself the citizenship of the claimant. Flutie Cases, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 38; Ruiz v. U. S., No. 112, Spanish Treaty Claims Commission.

Partnership claimant.—Rodocanochi v. U. S., No. 1883, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2359. The property destroyed was Italian property, the domicile of the firm being in Italy (The Cheshire v. U. S., 3 Wall. (U. S.) 231, 18 L. ed. 175); the members of the firm were all foreigners, one of them being a naturalized British subject. The certificate of naturalization excepted "any rights or capacities of a natural born British subject out of and beyond the dominions of the British Crown and the limits thereof." It was held that "the requirement that a person must be entitled to the protection of the United States is satisfied by a firm's being so entitled, even though a partner might not be." It was also held that under the terms of the certificate of naturalization the claimant might fairly be considered a foreigner of Great Britain. See also Schreiner v. U. S., 6 Ct. Cl. 359. In Lord v. U. S., No. 233, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2359, the claim was allowed for one half of the total amount on the ground that Munn, being a native of Ireland and a subject of Great Britain, could not recover. In Levois v. U. S., No. 158, Davis Rep. 15, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2357, it appeared that the claimant was the surviving partner of a firm, composed of himself, a citizen and resident of France, and a citizen of the United States, residing at New Orleans, who was disloyal to the government of the United States. The claim was allowed.

Person entitled to protection of flag.— The cases of Worth v. U. S., No. 91, Davis Rep. 35, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2350, and Schreiber v. U. S., No. 740, Davis Rep. 35, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2350, settled the important principles that this clause entitled every person whether native born, naturalized, or foreigner, to share in the award, provided he was entitled to the protection of the flag, either as a citizen, as seaman, or as the owner or shipper of goods in a ship of United States registry — except only subjects of Great Britain. The second Alabama claims court departed from the rule laid down by the first court in the cases of Worth and Schreiber, supra, and allowed a subject of Great Britain who was entitled to the protection of the flag of the United States to recover. Cassidy v. U. S., No. 144, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2380.

Proof that claimant was born in the United States is not sufficient where it appears that his parents were aliens. U. S. v. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. 649, 18 S. Ct. 456, 42 L. ed. 890; Suarez v. U. S., No. 716, Treaty with Mexico (1868); Del Barco v. U. S., No. 748, Treaty with Mexico (1868), 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2449.

Under the law of Mexico, the children of a foreigner, although born in Mexico, follow the nationality of their father, until they arrive at majority. Schreck v. Mexico, No. 768, Convention of 1868, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2450.

In case of conflict of law as to nationality, the law of the domicile is the law which governs as to citizenship. The Mathison Case, Venez. Arb. (1903), Ralston Rep. 429. See also The Brignone Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 710; The Stevenson Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 438.

The United States statute prohibiting assignments of claims does not apply to the claims of foreigners coming before an international tribunal to which the United States is a party. Camy's Case, No. 656, Convention with France of 1880, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2398.

Claims dismissed.— Convention of 1858 with China.— Declaration of intention to become citizen not sufficient to support claim of citizenship when not followed by residence in United States. "The imperfect citizenship which the claimant had acquired by his simple declaration of intention had wholly lapsed by his removal out of the territory of the United States and establishing himself in business in a foreign jurisdiction." Ryder's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2332. See Wheaton, pt. 4, c. 1, § 17.

Convention with Costa Rica, 1860.— Naturalized citizens returning to native country and engaging in business are subject to the lex loci. Medina's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2316.

Under the treaty with France of 1880, the claims of all persons, who were citizens of France at the time they accrued, but who subsequently became citizens of the United States, were rejected. Perche's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2401, 2418.

Treaty with Mexico of 1848 — Act of March 3, 1849.—The treaty provided for the assumption by the United States of all claims of its citizens. The claim in question arose from a loan by a citizen of the United States to the Mexican government, but the bills of exchange which evidenced the loan were afterward transferred to a Mexican citizen and the claim was presented by him. The Commissioners held: "It matters not that the claim was American in origin. It had in a case involving a claim by a corporation.[81] But there have been instances where governments have intervened in behalf of stock-holders and bondholders, although the corporations themselves were of other countries.[82]

J. Forfeiture of Right to Assert Claim. Where a citizen alleging a grievance has taken part in local politics[83] or given aid or comfort to the enemies or ceased to be American at the date of the treaty, and the holder of it could not invoke the interposition of our government for his protection." Jarrero's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2324. Claimants were passengers on an American schooner and were captured by a Mexican vessel of war in 1837; claimants were at that time citizens of Texas but filed claims on the ground that by the annexation of Texas they had become citizens of the United States. The claims were rejected on the ground that the claimants were not citizens of the United States at the time of the injury complained of. The Champion, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2322. See also Sandoval's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2323. Claim was allowed as to interest of American partner, but was disallowed as to interest of German partner. See Hargous' Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2327. Partner with aliens can claim only for individual interest — not for entire property of firm. Claimant must be citizen at the time of the injury complained of. Not affected by fact that claimant became surviving partner by death of alien partner. "The principle of the common law has no application to this case. The right of the claimant must be tested by the law of nations and not by the municipal law." Morrison's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2325.

Convention with Spain, 1871.— Claim was made by a native of Cuba claiming to be a resident and citizen of the United States for damages for an embargo laid in 1869. Claimant declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in 1870. The umpire, Baron Lederer, held that the claimant "not being a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the Constitution and laws thereof," could not be "regarded as such citizen according to said agreement" (the convention of 1871). De Rojas' Case, No. 70, Spanish Com. (1871), 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2337, No. 126, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2341. Similar claims dismissed see Prieto's Case, No. 54, Span. Com. 1871, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2339; Yzquierdo's Case, No. 7, Span. Com. 1871, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2340. Spain laid an embargo upon the interest of the Spanish member of a firm partly Spanish and partly American and such interest was sold. The American members of the firm claimed that their interests were damaged by such act. It was held that Spain had a right to lay such embargo and the loss to the American members of the firm was damnum absque injuria. Casanova's Case, No. 28, Span. Com. 1871. 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2337. Claimant was a native of Cuba and claimed damages for an embargo laid in 1869 and also for refusal of Spanish officials to raise the embargo after the decree revoking it and after claimant became a naturalized citizen of the United States (1873). The umpire held that "as the claimant was not a citizen of the United States of America when the authorities of the Island of Cuba placed an embargo upon his property" the case should be dismissed. Carrillo y O'Farrell's Case, No. 113, Span. Com. 1871, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2337.

Treaty with Venezuela of 1885.— Claim was made for damages based on transaction in 1863 and 1864 at which time claimant was a subject of Italy; he became an American citizen in 1868, the claim was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, Little, commissioner, holding: "This is the key — subject of course to treaty terms — for the determination of such jurisdictional questions: Was the plaintiff State injured? It was not, where the person wronged was at the time a citizen of another State, although afterwards becoming its own citizen. The injury there was to the other State. Naturalization transfers allegiance but not existing state obligations." Abbiatti's Case, No. 34, U. S. and Venez. Cl. Com. (1885), 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2347 [followed in Loehr's Case, No. 44, Bettiker's Case, No. 6, and Finn's Case, No. 24, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2348].

81. The jurisdiction of an international claims commission over the claims of a corporation is controlled by the nationality of the corporation and not by the nationality of the stock-holders. The Baash & Römer Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 906. While the right of stock-holders to make claims for their equitable proportions of the losses sustained by a defunct corporation exists, this right is subject to the claims of creditors of the corporation, and in the absence of proof of the amount of the liabilities of the corporation, the extent of the interests of the stock-holders is not ascertainable and the claims were dismissed. Kunhardt's Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 63.

82. The United States and Great Britain intervened in behalf of its citizens who were stock-holders and bondholders in a Portuguese corporation whose concession was wrongfully annulled by that government. The Delagoa Bay R. Co.'s Case, 2 Moore Int. Arb. 1865. See the final award, For. Rel. U. S. (1900) 903. The United States has intervened in behalf of its citizen stock-holders owning shares in a San Salvador corporation, for wrongs committed by that country against the corporation. Triunfo Co.'s Case, For. Rel. U. S. (1902) 871. Under the terms of the protocol between Venezuela and Belgium, jurisdiction was entertained of a claim of a Belgian corporation, although some of the stock-holders were not Belgians. The Compagnie Générale des Eaux Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 271.

83. Loss of protection by taking part in politics.— The claim was resisted on the ground that the claimant had actively parinsurrectionists[84] he loses the right to the protection of his government so far as his claims are concerned against the government whose enemies he has assisted.

K. Classification of Claims Which Have Been Asserted. It is impossible to collate all the decisions in which claims have been allowed or disallowed against governments in the numerous arbitrations which have taken place. They can be classified in general terms somewhat as follows: For taking private property without compensation;[85] for the acts of agents and public officials;[86] for the improper ticipated in the political movements of the Imperialists during the time of the French intervention. It was found that "the claimant did not preserve that neutral character which was to be expected of him as a foreigner, and failing which his government was not bound to support him." Tripler's Case, No. 144, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2823.

84. Having given aid and comfort to the enemy.— Objection was made to the claims of W. R. Grace & Co. on the ground that they had furnished coal and other supplies directly to the Peruvian navy and army during the war with Chile and therefore were excepted by the treaty as being with the class who had given aid and comfort to the enemy. Objections sustained and claims dismissed. Grace v. Chile, No. 28, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2781; Treaty with Chile (1892).

Trading with the enemy.— A claim was made under the act of March 3, 1849, Treaty with Mexico (1848). Objection was made to the claim on the ground that the claimant or his representative had engaged in trade with the enemy. The objection was sustained and the claim dismissed. The vessel was American and the acts complained of were trade with Spanish subjects, Mexico being then at war with Spain. It was held that there was a violation of neutrality and a forfeiture of protection. The Felix, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2800. Granting permission to others, while refusing it to claimant, to run steamers during the closure of the Orinoco river does not give rise to the right to make any claim, when the government had good grounds to believe that claimant was in sympathy with the revolutionary movement, although this was not the fact. Orinoco Steamship Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 72.

Allegiance and right of protection as affecting awards under the Geneva Arbitration.— The act of June 23, 1874, contained the following provision: "Section 12. . . . And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court arising in favor of any person not entitled, at the time of his loss, to the protection of the United States in the premises, nor arising in favor of any person who did not at all times during the late rebellion bear true allegiance to the United States."

Convention with Mexico, 1868.— Claim was made for the loss of goods owned by Americans which were destroyed by the Mexican troops after having been captured while under French escort in the war with France. It was held that such trade was "illicit and hostile, and all engaged in it were enemies of the opposing belligerents." The claim was dismissed. Torre's Case, No. 749, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2816.

85. Taking private property must be compensated for. The Upton Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 172.

86. Governments are responsible for the acts of their agents, whether such acts be directed or only ratified by silence or acquiescence. Asphalt Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 331. A claim founded upon a supposed wrongful act attributed to minor public officials should be clear and definite in its statements and proof and show unavailing appeal to superior authority to justify recovery against a state. The De Zeo Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 693. To hold a government responsible for the seizure of goods or property, the seizure must have been made by the government itself, through its proper authorities or by those who had a right to act in its name or behalf. The Henriquez Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 896. If citizens of one nation commit depredations against another, and are not punished by their own government, or given up to the injured government for punishment, the nation to whom they owe allegiance becomes a party to their wrong under the principles of international law. In re Charge to Grand Jury, 30 Fed. Cas. No. 18,267, 5 McLean 306.

Wanton acts.— Governments are liable for the wanton acts of their officials. The Cesarino Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 770.

Unofficered troops.— A government will not be held responsible for the reckless acts of unofficered troops. The Henriquez Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 896, at page 910.

In case of the commission of a crime in the territory of a state, the state is bound, without being requested to prosecute the criminals before the proper local authorities, and in case of its failure so to do it will be held liable in damages to those who have suffered. The Bovallins Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 952.

Revolutionists are not the agents of the government and a natural responsibility does not exist, and where they are beyond the control of the government it cannot be held responsible for the acts of those who have escaped its restraint. The Sambiaggio Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 666. Under the terms of the French-Venezuelan protocols, a claim was allowed for damages resulting from acts of the revolutionists. The Acquatella Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 487 [following Kummerow's Case, Ralston Rep. 526]. A state is responsible for damages committed by revolutionists where it subsequently appoints the participants and leaders of the revolution to office, thereby annulment of concessions;[87] for duties improperly exacted;[88] for taxes collected by de facto revolutionary governments;[89] for forced loans;[90] for payment of bonds;[91] for damages done to person or property by revolutionists, insurrectionists, belligerents, or government officials, during periods of riot and insurrection.[92] tacitly approving their conduct. The Bovallins Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 952.

Private trespassers.— The United States government is not responsible for the acts of private trespassers. 4 Op. Atty.-Gen. (Nelson) 332.

The national government of Venezuela cannot disclaim responsibility for the acts of officials of the states and municipalities created by its authority. Circumstances of formation of these state governments are distinguished from those in the United States. The Davy Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 410.

87. Where money is spent on the faith of a permit granted, the claimant is entitled to indemnity when the permit is withdrawn. The Paquet Case (Concession), Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 267. Damages for the taking away of a concession indirectly by expulsion of the concessionary may be recovered. The Oliva Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 771. Where an enterprise is undertaken on the strength of assurances by the department of state of protection of the United States, a claim arises, when the claims of this country are abandoned and the protection withdrawn. See 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2390–2396, where the Peruvian guano claims are referred to.

Provision against assignment.— A stipulation in a concession by a government that it shall not be assigned to third parties without giving notice to the government is obligatory on the concessionary, otherwise any assignment of the rights and privileges under the concession is absolutely void as against such government. Orinoco Steamship Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 72.

Ultra vires concession.— A claim based upon the payment of a sum of money to the government for rights which the government could not concede, and which rights the claimant was prevented from enjoying by the government, will be allowed for the sum so paid, with interest from the date of payment. Turnbull, etc., Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 200.

88. Claims for refund of duties paid and for confiscations and arrests under the revenue laws have been frequently made and allowed. 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3361–3407. Damages were allowed because of unjustified refusal of customs officials to clear ship from Venezuelan port. The Lalanne Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 501; The Ballistini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 503.

A consul who assumes to collect duties in the territory of another country on goods to be entered in the country of the consul, commits an act of sovereignty which is an offense against the country where the duties are collected. Asphalt Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 331. A consul resident abroad has no right to demand of the captain of a vessel that he procure passports as a condition precedent to the clearing of his ship and no national law on this subject can affect the case. It is governed by international law. Asphalt Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 331.

Outrages in the form of arrest, imprisonment, and detention under the forms of law are the frequent subject of international claims. For numerous illustrations of this class of claims see 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3225 et seq. And see Moore Dig. Int. L. c. 21.

89. Taxes collected by a de facto revolutionary government cannot be again enforced by the titular government. The Guastini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 730.

The titular government has no right to collect taxes on property which have already been paid to a revolutionary government which had gained control over the portion of the national territory where the property is situated. Taxes so collected must be returned. The Santa Clara Estates Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 397.

90. "A forced loan is a loan levied in accordance with law. It is equally distributed amongst all the inhabitants of the country, whether native or foreign. . . . As long as the foreigner is placed upon the same footing as the native he cannot complain. But if there be unfairness in the distributing of the loan or in its repayment, and if any preference be shown to the native, the foreigner has good cause for complaint." Rose's Case, Treaty with Mexico (1848), act of 1849; 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3421. See also Cole's Case, p. 3422, and many others cited in 4 Moore Int. Arb. 3409–3421.

The central government was held liable for a forced loan by one of the constituent states, the proceeds of which were used for the defense of the nation. The Beckman Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 598.

91. Claim for failure of government to pay bonds was allowed. Payment at par was enforced and evidence was not allowed to show that bonds were delivered at forty per cent of nominal value where the contract of transfer stated that they were issued at par. The Compagnie Générale des Eaux Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 271. But it was held to be a principle of public international law that the internal debt of a state, classified as a public debt, which is subject to speculations current amongst that sort of values which are acquired freely and spontaneously at very different rates of quotations which mark great fluctuations of their rise and fall, can never be the subject of international claims in order to obtain their immediate payment in cash. . . . To establish such a principle would put a premium on stock jobbing. The Ballastini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 503.

92. Revolutionists.— One class of claims

frequently arising and involving many questions of law are those for damages for loss of property occasioned by acts of war by revolutionists. There are now pending over one hundred cases before the Spanish Treaty Claims Commission to adjust the claims of American citizens who suffered loss during the insurrection in Cuba. These cases involve all of the questions as to the liability of a government for the acts of its own officers and for the acts of belligerents. Numerous briefs have been submitted on both sides of the questions and from time to time decisions bearing on these points are being made by the commission and they should be consulted. See 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2978–2981, for other cases where the claims were not allowed, under the treaty with Mexico of 1868, on the ground that the depredations were committed by revolutionists. A similar case arose under the Spanish commission of 1871, for depredations by the Cuban insurrectionists. 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2981. Damages may be recovered for the seizure of property by a government which appropriates it to its own use during a revolution for military purposes, and which is damaged while in its possession. American Electric, etc., Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 35. A government will not be held liable for acts of revolutionists unless negligence is clearly proven. The Revesno Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 753. The central government ultimately receiving property taken by revolutionists equitably should pay therefor. The Mazzei Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 693. Under the admissions in the protocols, the umpire in the German cases held that Venezuela was liable for all injuries to property by revolutionists during the recent civil war. These admissions were held not to extend to persons and not to injuries to property at any other times. Claims for these injuries were to be determined by the general principles of international law. The Kummerow Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 526. The Spanish commission held that Venezuela could not invoke the defense that under the rules of international law the titular government is not liable for the acts of revolutionists. The Padron Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 923; The Mena Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 931. Damages will not be allowed for injuries to persons or property committed by troops of unsuccessful revolutionists where there is no proof of any fault or lack of diligence on the part of the central government. The Aroa Mines Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 344.

Successful revolutionists.— The government established by a successful revolution is responsible for the acts of that revolution from the time that it began. Bolivar R. Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 388. The acts of a revolution becoming successful are to be regarded as the acts of a de facto government. Dix Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 7. The taking of neutral property by successful revolutionists gives rise to a claim against such government. Dix Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 7. Claim for indemnity for killing of her husband, an American citizen, by an armed force of revolutionists, was allowed. Hughes v. Mexico, Treaty of 1848, Act of March 3, 1849, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2972.

Belligerents.— Neutral property destroyed by soldiers of belligerent with authorization, or in the presence of their officers, gives a right to compensation whenever the fact can be proven that said superiors had the means of preventing the outrage and did not make use of them. Kunhardt's Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 63. The rule of international law is well established that a foreigner who resides in the country of a belligerent can claim no indemnity for losses of property occasioned by acts of war of the other belligerent. Perrin's Case, 4 Ct. Cl. 543, 12 Op. Atty.-Gen. (Stanberry) 21. The United States was held not liable for the acts of the Confederates during the Civil war. This question was not affected by the fact that the claimant was a Mexican citizen and that Mexico had not recognized the Confederacy as a belligerent. Prats v. U. S., No. 748, Convention with Mexico, 1868, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2886.

Ordinary course of war.— A government is not liable for damages suffered by property which is situated in the track of war. Puerto Cabello R. Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 455. A person assumes all risks as well as advantages of his residence abroad and neither he nor his property can be exempted from the evils incident to a state of war. The Upton Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 172. No claim can be allowed for property of neutrals accidentally destroyed in the course of war. The Volkmar Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 258. Damages cannot be recovered as the result of a bombardment as a necessary act of war. American Electric, etc., Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 35. Damages will not be allowed for interruption to business in the territory where war exists, since it is an inevitable result of a state of war. Heny's Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 14. Claim was made for burning of goods in the attack on Zacualtipan by the Miramon forces. It was held that the claim was an ordinary loss of war and also that it resulted from an attack of the Miramon forces which were not the de facto government. Schultz v. Mexico, Convention of 1868, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2973. An agreement between the government and a railroad to the effect that if the railroad will carry the troops and munitions of war the government will see that the railroad is indemnified for all damages resulting therefrom is absolutely void as against public policy and because the railroad is bound as a public corporation to questioned.[93] So far as the United States is concerned the decisions of the supreme carry persons and freight as presented. No damages can be allowed to a railroad for suspension of traffic during period of active war operations. The Great Venezuelan Railroad Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 632. For further discussion of claims against governments arising out of or during war, both as to claims of its own citizens and citizens of other countries, see NEUTRALITY LAWS; WAR.

De facto government.— The Claim of Cuculla (3 Moore Int. Arb. 2873) for loans to the Zuloaga government in Mexico was not allowed, it being held that the movement never amounted to a de facto government. See a collection of a large number of these claims in 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2881–2886.

De facto officers.— The goods of the claimant were seized and he was imprisoned by a revolutionary body at the time in the control of the department. The rebellion was afterward suppressed; objection was made to the claim on the ground that the parties committing the depredations were private individuals. The claim was allowed. Dr. Baldwin's Tehuantepec Claim, Convention with Mexico, 1839, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2859.

The military commander at Matamoras, Mexico, promulgated certain tariff regulations during the period of three years and collected the duties to aid in the suppression of a rebellion in that quarter. Claimant imported his goods and paid duties during this period. When these duties were abrogated by a decree of the federal government the goods were seized by it with a view to confiscation as having been illegally imported. The claim was allowed. Speyers' Claim, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2868.

Bonds of Confederate state.— Claim was made by a British subject based on a "cotton-bond loan," alleging that the United States had seized the cotton hypothecated for the loan. The claim was dismissed. Barrett v. U. S., 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2900.

Breach of a promise to do an illegal act cannot be made the basis of a claim, and the promise of a government to annul an existing contract containing the clause that "doubts and controversies that may arise in consequence of this contract shall be settled by the courts of the Republic and in conformity with its laws" is a promise to do an illegal act. American Electric Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 246.

Claim for mob violence was not allowed. Lagueruene's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3027. See also Derbec's Case, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3029.

Claims against Mexico based upon acts of the Maximilian authorities were rejected by the commission under the convention of 1868 with Mexico. Jansen v. Mexico, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2902.

Claims are not usually allowed for arrests under military authority or for detentions occasioned thereby, except where it is apparent that the action was wanton or unnecessary, or, particularly, if directed against the nationality of the claimant. 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3265–3332.

Claims arising out of breaches of the neutrality laws see NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Claim for loss of cotton destroyed by Confederates in Louisiana and Mississippi was dismissed upon demurrer. Hanna v. U. S., Treaty with Great Britain (1871), 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2982.

Damages for unlawful killing was allowed. The Di Caro Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 769.

For frauds and denial of justice by judicial officers claimants were allowed to recover. The Rebecca and other cases, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3008 et seq.

Pillage and violence by soldiers under command of officers is an act of the government for which it is liable. The Roberts Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 142.

Plundering soldiery not under command of officer.— The claim was disallowed on the ground that it was not shown to which party of the two contending forces the pillagers belonged — whether to the government or the revolutionists; it also appeared that the soldiers were mere marauders, not under the command of any officer and that they could not be restrained owing to a fight going on in another part of the town. Vesseron's Case, Convention with Mexico (1868), 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2975.

Where doubt existed as to identity of pillagers the claim was allowed. The case was distinguished from that of a loss resulting from a territorial or Civil war carried on by two parties acknowledging each other as belligerents. The depredation appears to have been committed by a military chief afterward affiliated with the existing government. Miller v. Mexico, Convention of 1868, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2974.

For cases based on acts of governors, customs officials, pilots, etc., see 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3018–3027.

Prize cases.— For illegal seizures of vessels see WAR.

93. Right of expulsion recognized.— The Maal Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 914; The Paquet Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 265.

"By the law of nations, whenever a war breaks out between two countries, the persons and property of one of them found within the dominions of the other are liable to detention and capture. . . . This absolute right, however, has not been very rigorously insisted upon in modern times. . . . But however absolute this right may be, all writers on public law agree that it may be modified and regulated by treaty." While as a general rule the breaking out of war abrogates treaties, this is not true where it is apparent that the treaty contemplated an intervening war. In such case the obligation of the treaty is the stronger, the occasion having arisen for its enforcement. Therefore, claims for expulsion, in time of war, must be considered with reference to the rules of international law and with reference to treaty obligations. 3 Moore Int. Arb. 3333–3359.

court are conclusive on that point.[94] But the expulsion must be in accordance with law[95] and not in violation of any treaty;[96] and the government of the person expelled is entitled to know the reasons for such action, and if such explanations are refused the action is to be considered arbitrary and indemnity must be paid to those expelled or prevented from entering.[97]

X. CLAIM AGAINST CENTRAL GOVERNMENT OF A FEDERAL UNION.

How far the central government of a federal union is responsible for the acts of the constituent states depends very largely upon the nature of the union. The union might be so close that there would be but one government, and on the other hand the constituent members might be so loosely bound together that each would retain its rights and responsibilities so that foreign governments could deal with them and collect claims from them.[98] Claims have been allowed against the central government where the offense was committed or the debt was due by one of the constituent members, and on the other hand responsibility has been repudiated by central governments.[99]

XI. INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS.

A. Exist Only by Treaty. No international tribunal exists or ever has existed except by virtue of a treaty creating it.[1]

B. Procedure — 1. In General. The procedure of the court is determined by the treaty creating it, or, in the absence of definite rules of procedure prescribed in the treaty itself, it must formulate its own.[2] But as a general rule international tribunals are not bound as strictly as municipal courts are by the rules of evidence,[3] and they are their own judges as to the methods of presentation of claims.[4]

A claim against a municipality is not a claim against the central government. Thomson-Houston Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 168.

Claim for breach of contract by municipal corporation was not allowed in La Guaira Electric Light, etc., Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 178.

99. The Montijo Case, 2 Moore Int. Arb. 1421. This question is discussed at length in 1 Butler Treaty-Making Power 141 et seq., in which the position of the United States on this question is fully set forth. In the Montijo Case, supra, the United States asserted a claim against the Republic of Colombia for an obligation of the state of Panama. The matter was submitted to arbitration and the umpire, Mr. Bunch, British Minister at Bogota, awarded in favor of the United States.

1. No court can be created except by a sovereignty having jurisdiction to establish one and there is no sovereignty which has jurisdiction over the other party to the controversy which itself is a sovereignty not having jurisdiction over the other party.

2. In the case of The Hague court the procedure is to some extent directed by the treaty itself.

The treaty of 1871 with Great Britain for the adjustment of the Alabama claims and other differences prescribed certain rules of evidence and certain rules of procedure. 17 U. S. St. at L. 863.

3. Frelinghuysen v. Key, 110 U. S. 63, 3 S. Ct. 462, 28 L. ed. 71. In the absence of an express provision to the contrary, an international tribunal has the right to adopt whatever means it determines upon to obtain evidence. The Franqui Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 934.

International mixed tribunals are not bound by the strict rules of evidence. The Caldera Case, 15 Ct. Cl. 546; The Meade Case, 2 Ct. Cl. 224; The Faber Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 600.

4. A "claim" must at least be sufficient to inform the respondent of the right claimed or the wrong inflicted. Reception of Evidence and Claims, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 651.

On questions of pleading see Williams v. U. S., No. 45, Davis' Report 30, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2349; Rhind v. U. S., No. 242, Davis Report 33, 3 Moore Int. Arb. 2350.

And likewise international tribunals are the sole judges of the extent of their jurisdiction.[5]

2. DAMAGES. The rules for ascertaining damages in international tribunals in cases of contract are generally the same as those prevailing in municipal courts.[6] The facts of each case must of course largely govern. The conventions for the settlement of these international claims sometimes contain restrictions as to the damages or rules to be applied in their consideration, and these control.

3. INTEREST. How far interest shall be allowed is generally a question for the tribunal to determine although it is frequently governed by the treaty.[7] As a

The "most-favored-nation" clause contained in a treaty between the governments parties to the protocols does not oblige the commission to follow, in favor of the subjects of the claimant nation, the interpretations made by other commissions of their protocols. The Sambiaggio Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 666.

The following rules of interpretation were adopted by the umpire in the Italian-Venezuelan Commission of 1903: "If two meanings are admissible, that is to be preferred which is least for the advantage of the party for whose benefit the clause is inserted; the sense which the acceptor of conditions attaches to them ought rather to be followed than that of the offerer; two meanings being admissible, preference is given to that which the party proposing the clause knew at the time was held by the party accepting it; doubtful stipulations should be interpreted in the least onerous sense for the party obligated; conditions not express cannot be invoked by the party who should have clearly expressed them." "Treaties are to be interpreted generally mutatis mutandis as statutes and, in the absence of express language, are not given a retroactive effect." The Sambiaggio Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 666. See this case for a full discussion of the rules of interpretation and a compilation of the authorities.

6. Damages generally see DAMAGES.

Proximate and remote damages.— Governments, like individuals, are responsible only for the proximate consequences of their acts. Dix Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 7. Remote and consequential damages not recoverable. 6 Op. Atty.-Gen. 530 (Cushing). By the Geneva tribunal the distinction between immediate and remote (or consequential) damages was maintained: the latter being held not to be properly chargeable. 2 Wharton Dig. Int. L. 707.

Profits may be recovered where they are not uncertain or remote. The Martini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 819. Probable future profits cannot be allowed. Triunfo Co.'s Case, For. Rel. U. S. (1902) 872. Speculative and conjectural profits cannot be recovered. The Oliva Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 771.

In cases arising in tort, as in the municipal law, the rule for the allowance of damages is more liberal. Punitive damages are awarded where the facts warrant it. Van Bokkelan v. Hayti, Protocol of 1888, 2 Moore Int. Arb. 1807. In this case the claimant was imprisoned without legal authority for about fifteen months. An award of sixty thousand dollars was made. Where the wrongful acts are wholly without justification or excuse, damages may be awarded in excess of those directly the result of such acts. Roberts' Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 142, where five thousand dollars was allowed in addition to about three thousand dollars actual damages. Actual but not punitive damages may be allowed for an arrest by mistake where apology is promptly made. The Torrey Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 162.

7. See cases and authorities cited infra, this note.

Interest not allowed on a claim if not demanded in the claim itself. The Postal Claim, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 270.

Interest will only be allowed against a government from the time of the demand for compensation, unless the delay in presenting the claim is satisfactorily explained. De Garmendia's Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 10; Cervetti Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 658.

In the Italian cases in the Venezuelan Arbitrations the umpire held regarding interest: Interest on claims can only be allowed from date of presentation to the government or to the commission in the absence of direct contractual relations with the government. Unless otherwise agreed by contract, interest will be allowed at three per cent from such presentation to Dec. 31, 1903. Under the protocols no interest can be allowed on awards. The Cervetti Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 658.

The umpire in the German-Venezuelan Arbitration made the following rulings regarding interest: No interest eo nomine will be allowed on claims based solely upon injuries to the person. Claims based upon contracts in which a certain rate of interest is stipulated shall carry interest at that rate from the date of breach. In all other contractual claims interest will be computed at the rate of three per cent from the date of the demand for payment of damages for the breach. Claims for wrongful seizures of or injuries to property shall bear interest only from the date of demand for payment of general rule the United States does not pay interest on any debts of the government, except in case of stipulation to that effect or where it is given by act of congress; acts of congress authorizing the settlement of claims according to "equity" or "equity and justice" do not give interest.[8]

4. Attorney's Fees and Costs. The commission of arbitration may allow attorney's fees and costs and damages occasioned by bringing of an unfounded action by the government.[9]

5. Prescription and Laches. Claims may be barred by prescription for failure to present them,[10] but not necessarily when there have been no laches.[11]

C. Fraudulent Claims. There have been instances where fraudulent claims have been asserted and carried to a successful termination before an international tribunal, and in such a case it is proper for the government which receives the award to either reopen the case or return that portion of the award which has not been distributed.[12] damages, and at the rate of three per cent per annum. Whenever interest is allowed it shall be computed to and including Dec. 31, 1903, the date of the probable final awards. Under the protocols the commission had no power to allow interest on awards. The Christina Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 520.

The umpire in the Swedish arbitration allowed interest at five per cent "from the date that the claimants were proved to have been in their right." The Christina Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 99.

Under the terms of the protocol between Great Britain and Venezuela, interest was not allowed on the awards from the date thereof until paid. The Motion for Interest, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 413.

8. 7 Op. Atty.-Gen. 523 (Cushing). In general, the government, which is always to be presumed to be ready and willing to discharge its obligations, pays no interest; yet, from considerations of state policy, it has sometimes, as in the case of claims under the act of 1814 (6 U. S. St. at L. 139) allowed it. 5 Op. Atty.-Gen. 105 (Johnson); 5 Op. Atty.-Gen. 138 (Johnson).

Claims for consul fees in the prosecution of a claim are not allowed. Orinoco S. S. Co.'s Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 72.

Expenses of translation in preparation of claim allowed. Asphalt Co's Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 331.

Fee agreements.— A commission constituted in pursuance of a treaty to adjust disputed claims is a quasi-court, and a fee agreement to prosecute a claim for a fixed compensation, or for a reasonable percentage of the amount recovered is not illegal, immoral, or against public policy. Wright v. Tebbitts, 91 U. S. 252, 23 L. ed. 320. An agreement to pay twenty-five per cent of a claim, made before the treaty of Washington of 1871, was not affected by section 18 of the act of June 23, 1874, creating the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, creating restrictions on fee agreements. Bachman v. Lawson, 109 U. S. 659, 3 S. Ct. 479, 27 L. ed. 1067.

10. Claims may be barred by failure to present within a reasonable time. The peculiar circumstances of each case govern. See the very elaborate opinion in Williams v. Venezuela, No. 36, United States and Venezuelan Commission, Convention of 1885, 4 Moore Int. Arb. 4181, 4199. Claim was disallowed when presented forty-three years after its inception. The Spader Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 161.

Local laws of prescription cannot be invoked to defeat an international claim. Nevertheless the principle of preseription will be recognized internationally. The Gentini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 720. See The Tagliaferro Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 764, where a claim thirty-one years old was held not barred, the government having had knowledge of it. To same effect is The Giocopini Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 765.

Prescription must be pleaded. The Daniel Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 507.

11. An international claim is not barred by preseription when it appears that there have been no laches on the part of claimant or his government in its presentation. The Stevenson Case, Venez. Arb. (1903) Ralston Rep. 327. In this case the claim arose in 1869.

12. See the Gardner Case (under the Mexican Claims Commission in 1849), 2 Moore Int. Arb. 1255; the Venezuela Commission of 1868–1869, 2 Moore Int. Arb. 1659. And see the cases of the La Abra Mining Co. and Weil awards. La Abra Silver Min. Co. v. U. S., 175 U. S. 423, 20 S. Ct. 168, 44 L. ed. 223 [affirming 29 Ct. Cl. 432]; U. S. v. Blaine, 139 U. S. 306, 11 S. Ct. 607, 39 L. ed. 183; Frelinghuysen v. Key, 110 U. S. 63, 3 S. Ct. 462, 28 L. ed. 71. These four cases grew out of the La Abra and Weil awards under the Mexican claims treaty of 1868. The various points decided in each of the cases appear in the syllabus. The general point maintained was that the United States would have the right to set aside awards, made by a commission and decided by an umpire in favor of the claimants and against the foreign nations, and return the money to the government against which the award was made, where there was clear proof that the testimony on which the claims were supported was false and had been fraudulently manufactured and obtained.
