The legality of an arrest may be inquired into in the federal courts. U. S. v. Shepard, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,273, 1 Abb. 431, holding also that it may be urged that there was no showing on oath or affirmation to support the warrant.

In case the proceeding is by information, although a statute may require a legal commitment as a basis therefor, the information cannot be set aside for informalities or irregularities which do not deprive defendant of any substantial right. People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 Pac. 1028 (so holding, although the complaint failed to charge an offense); People v. Rodrigo, 69 Cal. 601, 11 Pac. 481 (so holding with regard to an omission by the district attorney or magistrate to ask the profession or business of the witness); State v. McGann, 8 Ida. 40, 66 Pac. 823 (where the deposition of a witness at a preliminary examination did not state his occupation and place of residence); Alderman

As a general rule it is not necessary that an information show on its face the reason why the proceeding has not been by indictment,[69] or aver that a preliminary examination as required by a particular statute was had.[70]

g. Irregularities in Composition and Organization of Grand Jury — (i) In General. In general a mere irregularity or informality in the procedure with regard to drawing, summoning, and impaneling of the grand jury, by which an indictment is found, is not ground for quashing it unless prejudice is shown to have been occasioned to the substantial rights of the accused.[71] Where, however, the irregularity is such that the grand jury acquires no legal existence, the indictment may be quashed,[72] as where the grand jury is organized under an unconstitutional statute.[73] Objections to the grand jury not enumerated among the specific grounds for a motion to quash prescribed by statute cannot be urged,[74]

v. State, 24 Nebr. 97, 38 N. W. 36 (holding that on an information charging a felony, the form and validity of the complaint on which a preliminary examination was had would not be inquired into, the crime alleged being the same). And see State v. Collins, 8 Kan. App. 398, 57 Pac. 38.

An information filed without a preliminary examination as required by statute cannot, in some states, be attacked by a motion to quash. Where the information is based on the complaint it will be quashed in case the complaint is defective. State v. Whitaker, 75 Mo. App. 184.

Under the Canadian criminal code an indictment may be quashed where the evidence is not taken in the presence of the accused at the preliminary inquiry. Reg. v. Lepine, 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 145. Failure of the clerk to send to the grand jury the depositions taken on the preliminary inquiry as required by the code is not ground for motion to quash. Rex v. Turpin, 8 Can. Cr. Cas. 59. and likewise where the grounds for challenge to an individual juror or to the array of the grand jury are fixed by statute, a challenge cannot be sustained, although placed in the form of a motion to quash.[75] By statute it is frequently provided that a defendant who has been held to answer prior to the finding of an indictment cannot by motion to quash urge objections which would have furnished ground for a challenge to individual grand jurors or to the array,[76] although defendant was imprisoned at the time of the finding of the indictment.[77] It has been held that the irregularities must appear on the face of the record,[78] statutes sometimes so providing.[79]

(II) DISCRIMINATION IN SELECTION. Discrimination as to color in the selection of grand jurors is, in a case where defendant has had no prior opportunity to raise the objection, ground for quashing an indictment, although not so provided by a statute specifying the particular grounds for quashing.[80]

(III) DISQUALIFICATION. There is no harmony between the decisions as to whether the disqualification of an individual grand juror is ground for a motion to quash.[81] It is so regarded in some jurisdictions,[82] especially where defendants have had no opportunity to challenge,[83] decisions to this effect being sometimes based on express statutes.[84] In other jurisdictions a contrary rule prevails,[85] frequently by reason of express statutory provision.[86]

(IV) PRESUMPTION OF REGULARITY. Regularity of the proceedings is presumed,[87] and the indorsement of an indictment, "a true bill," is evidence that it was duly found by a legal grand jury;[88] but such indorsement may be overcome by the records of the court.[89]

h. Proceedings and Deliberations of Grand Jury — (I) IN GENERAL. Matters which go to the proceedings of the grand jury and which contradict the record, and if true are provable only by the testimony of the grand jurors, while in many states they cannot be set up by a plea in abatement,[90] may in some cases, where manifest and undeniable wrong has been done, be set up by a suggestion to the court in the nature of a motion to quash,[91] as where a requisite number of the grand jurors have not concurred in the finding of the indictment.[92] In case the grand jury have been guilty of misconduct, the court may in its discretion quash an indictment.[93] An indictment will not be quashed for the failure of the grand jury to observe directory provisions of the statutes,[94] or for error in the general charge of the court.[95]

(II) PRESENCE OR ADVICE OF UNAUTHORIZED PERSON. Where the proceedings before the grand jury are conducted by[96] or the indictment is found on the advice of[97] an unauthorized person it may be set aside. At common law, the presence of any person other than the witness undergoing examination, and the attorney for the state during the proceedings of the grand jury, is ground for quashing.[98] In

i. Illegality or Insufficiency of Evidence Before Grand Jury — (i) In General. The court will not as a general rule on a motion to quash review the character of the evidence upon which the indictment was found,[2] or consider its sufficiency.[3] So an indictment will not be quashed for the reason that the grand jury received improper evidence,[4] or examined incompetent witnesses,[5] such as the wife of defendant,[6] where other evidence was received, or witnesses examined. The sole witness, it has been held, may have been incompetent where incompetency of witnesses is not a statutory ground of quashing.[7] In extreme cases, however, where the furtherance of justice demands it, the court may review even the character and sufficiency of the evidence,[8] and where an indictment is found without lawful evidence it will be quashed.[9]

Ct. 175, 4 Kulp (Pa.) 289, as where a witness whose name had not been placed on the bill by the district attorney was called, sworn (there being no authority to administer the oath) and allowed to testify before the grand jury.

Under the New York code of criminal procedure it is now settled that an indictment may be quashed where the grand jury has acted without evidence or upon illegal and incompetent testimony (People v. Glen, 173 N. Y. 395, 66 N. E. 112 [affirming 64 N. Y. App. Div. 167, 71 N. Y. Suppl. 893]; People v. Bills, 44 Misc. 348, 89 N. Y. Suppl. 1091; People v. Harmon, 34 Misc. 211, 69 N. Y. Suppl. 511, 15 N. Y. Cr. 360). Prior to these decisions there had been a conflict of authority, some decisions denying the power of the court to dismiss on other than the express statutory grounds (People v. Rutherford, 47 N. Y. App. Div. 209, 62 N. Y. Suppl. 224; People v. Scannell, 37 Misc. 345, 75 N. Y. Suppl. 500; People v. Montgomery, 36 Misc. 326, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 535; People v. O'Connor, 31 Misc. 668, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 126; People v. Winant, 24 Misc. 361, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 695; People v. Willis, 23 Misc. 568, 52 N. Y. Suppl. 808), while others held the contrary (People v. Stern, 33 Misc. 455, 68 N. Y. Suppl. 732, 15 N. Y. Cr. 295; People v. Thomas, 32 Misc. 170, 66 N. Y. Suppl. 191; Matter of Gardiner, 31 Misc. 364, 64 N. Y. Suppl. 760, 14 N. Y. Cr. 519; People v. Molineux, 27 Misc. 79, 58 N. Y. Suppl. 155; People v. Vaughan, 19 Misc. 289, 58 N. Y. Suppl. 959; People v. Edwards, 25 N. Y. Suppl. 480; People v. Brickner, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 528, 8 N. Y. Cr. 217; People v. Clark, 14 N. If the legal evidence will warrant conviction the indictment will not be dismissed, although illegal evidence was received. People v. Winant, 24 Misc. (N. Y.) 361, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 695.

Denial of habeas corpus sought on ground of want of evidence before a committing magistrate establishes sufficiency of evidence to justify indictment. People v. Martin, 87 N. Y. App. Div. 487, 84 N. Y. Suppl. 823.

Proof of insufficiency of evidence may be made by the prosecuting attorney but not by grand juror. State v. Cole, 145 Mo. 672, 47 S. W. 895.

Although defendant's name is not indorsed upon the indictment it may be quashed. State v. Gardner, 88 Minn. 130, 92 N. W. 529.

That defendant was subpœnaed before the grand jury, where he refused to testify as to matters which he thought would incriminate him and voluntarily answered such questions as would not, in his judgment, show or tend to show that he had committed a criminal offense, is not sufficient to warrant the quashing of the indictment. People v. Hummell, 96 N. Y. Suppl. 878.

Where the prosecuting attorney directed the grand jury not to regard the evidence of accused, it will, in the absence of proof, be assumed that the instruction was obeyed and that there was sufficient evidence aside from defendant's to authorize the finding of the indictment. An indictment against a corporation for a nuisance cannot be quashed upon the ground that it does not disclose an offense for which the corporation may be liable, but the only remedy is by demurrer. Reg. v. Toronto R. Co., 4 Can. Cr. Cas. 4, holding that the common-law rule had not been altered by the Canadian criminal code.

Failure to substantially follow the language of the statute may be ground for quashing, although the statute provides that no indictment shall be quashed, if an indictable offense is clearly charged therein. State v. Morse, 1 Greene (Iowa) 503.

15. State v. Robinson, 19 Tex. 478.

It is disputed whether an indictment may be quashed because from its face it appears to be barred by the statute of limitations; some courts holding that it will not be,[16] while others hold the contrary.[17] In many states, as already noted, statutes provide that an indictment shall not be vitiated for defects of form merely.[18] Under such statutes an indictment will not be quashed for formal errors in the caption,[19] or commencement,[20] or conclusion;[21] but where a statute expressly requires the observance of a form a failure to do so is ground for quashing.[22] Clerical errors which do not obscure the meaning of the indictment do not in general vitiate it,[23] hence they are not ground for a motion to quash.[24] An indictment may be quashed for the omission of the christian name of the accused,[25] for a failure to lay the venue[26] or to indorse the names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury,[27] for want of a prosecutor required by statute,[28] for an insufficient charge of an intent,[29] for omission of the word "felonious" in the description of a felony[30] or lack of a verification as required by statute in case of an information,[31] or for an amendment made without authority.[32] An indictment for robbery will not be quashed for the reason that

E. 317; White v. State, 93 Ga. 47, 19 S. Informality in signature of information.— Under a statute providing that the indictment shall not be invalid for defects which do not mislead defendant or prejudice his substantial rights, the fact that the prosecuting attorney does not place his full name in the body of an information or sign it to the information is not ground for quashing. the description of the money claimed to have been taken was included with the description of many pieces of money of other kinds so that it is impossible for defendant to tell what money he is charged with taking.[33] Variance between an indictment or information and the preliminary complaint cannot be reached by a motion to quash.[34] Under the statutes in some states certain defects must be urged by demurrer only.[35]

(II) Duplicity and Misjoinder. An objection to the indictment for duplicity,[36] or misjoinder of offenses,[37] is properly taken by a motion to quash, the ruling on such motion being subject to principles already examined.[38]

(III) Insufficiency of Part of Indictment. A motion to quash going to the entire indictment will be overruled where it contains a valid and sufficient charge after the defective matter is rejected.[39] On a motion directed to the entire indictment it will not be quashed if it contains one good count,[40] or when it contains a good charge.[41]

8. Hearing and Evidence on Motion to Quash. must be taken as true,[43] and the grounds assigned for quashing, if not established by the record, must be sustained by distinct evidence introduced or offered by the accused,[44] the accused being entitled to introduce such evidence if his motion is sufficient in law,[45] and having the burden of proof.[46] The state need not file a written admission or denial of the motion.[47] The motion may be heard upon affidavits,[48] or, where there is no conflict, upon an agreed statement of facts.[49] Material allegations of the indictment cannot, however, be contradicted by affidavits.[50] The sufficiency of the affidavits is a question of law.[51] Unless controverted they are to be taken as true.[52] A provision of the statutes postponing hearing on the motion for a certain time after it is filed may be waived by the state and the accused cannot object to an immediate hearing.[53] A decision upon the motion is waived by going to trial on other issues.[54]

Sufficiency of affidavit.—An affidavit which states that affiant was "present in and about" the deliberations of the grand jury is not sufficient to establish that the grand jury acted on insufficient or incompetent evidence (Radford v. U. 9. Order or Judgment. Upon quashing or setting aside of an indictment or information, if it is apparent that an offense has been committed, the action of the court should be without prejudice to a subsequent accusation, and the prisoner may be remanded to custody,[55] or held to bail,[56] to answer to a new indictment or information.[57] By statute in some jurisdictions, however, the discharge of the prisoner is necessary, although he may be immediately rearrested upon the same charge.[58]

10. Quashing of Part. According to the prevailing rule, an improper or defective charge[59] or count[60] in an indictment may be quashed without vitiating the remainder;[61] and a joint indictment may be quashed as to part of the defendants.[62]

C. Demurrer — 1. Nature and Scope in General. The office of the demurrer is to present objections to the indictment as insufficient in law because of defects in substance or of form,[63] or, under particular statutes, defects in substance only.[64] It cannot be used to present questions of fact.[65]

2. Time For Demurrer. A demurrer in the regular order precedes arraignment,[66] and should be made before plea;[67] but in the discretion of the court a plea may be allowed to be withdrawn for the purpose of entering a demurrer,[68] although not for the purpose of making a merely formal objection.[69]

3. Form and Requisites. Oral demurrers were permitted at common law;[70] but under statutes requiring written pleadings, demurrers must be in writing.[71] A single demurrer must not be interposed to several indictments.[72] In criminal procedure the distinction between general and special demurrers and their application to matters of substance and form as existing in civil pleading is not recognized,[73] but the specific objections to the indictment must in all cases be pointed out.[74]

4. Grounds For Demurrer — a. In General. Only such matters as are apparent upon the face of the indictment or record,[75] or of which judicial notice is taken,[76] may be urged by demurrer. A demurrer may be sustained for lack of jurisdiction apparent from the record,[77] or for the unconstitutionality of a statute upon which the indictment is based.[78] It would seem, however, that a question merely of statutory construction cannot be determined upon demurrer but must be otherwise urged.[79]

b. Statutory Provisions. The specific grounds for demurrer are frequently enumerated by the statutes of criminal procedure and in such case others cannot as a general rule be urged.[80]

c. Irregularities in Composition or Proceedings of Grand Jury. As a general rule questions affecting the legality or regularity of the organization of the grand jury finding the indictment cannot be raised by demurrer.[81] Demurrer will not lie for disqualification of a grand juror.[82] A demurrer may, however, lie in some cases where the illegality appears from the face of the indictment.[83]

d. Bar of Prosecution by Statute of Limitations. The statute of limitations must be urged under the general issue or special pleas as the practice may be in the particular jurisdiction,[84] and cannot as a general rule be taken advantage of by demurrer, although the indictment discloses on its face that it is barred.[85] In some jurisdictions, however, the objection is available on demurrer.[86]

e. Sufficiency of Accusation — (i) In General. An insufficient description of the offense may be ground for demurrer,[87] even though, in the case of a statutory offense, the language of the statute has been followed.[88] Where the facts stated constitute a crime, although not that attempted to be charged, a demurrer will not be sustained.[89] Where sufficient facts are stated to constitute the crime, defendant, if he believes that he will be prejudiced through lack of knowledge of the particular facts upon which the prosecution will rely, should demand a bill of particulars;[90] and he cannot demur.[91] Under some statutes objection to the indictment for indefiniteness must be taken by motion to quash.[92] An indictment is not demurrable for a misnomer,[93] for use of a particular form of expression,[94] or for repugnancy between counts;[95] but may be for the statement of an impossible time,[96] or for an insufficient description of a person described as of name unknown.[97]

(II) DUPLICITY AND MISJOINDER. As already noted, a misjoinder of counts does not, save in a few exceptional cases, render an indictment bad as a matter of law, and it is in the absence of statute not a ground for demurrer.[98] Duplicity, on the contrary, must in general be taken advantage of by demurrer.[99] By statute, however, in some jurisdictions, it is provided that the objection that two offenses are charged in an indictment must be raised by demurrer,[1] and such provision applies also to duplicity.[2]

(III) INSUFFICIENCY OF PART OF INDICTMENT. When an indictment is good without the part objected to, a demurrer will not be sustained.[3] A demurrer to the whole of an indictment containing more than one count cannot be sustained in case it contains one good count.[4]

pleaded,[6] but not allegations of their legal effect;[7] nor does it admit facts insufficiently pleaded.[8] Evidence will not be heard for the purpose of allowing the prosecution to amend.[9] Stipulations made between counsel that the indictment shall be regarded as containing certain omitted allegations will not be considered.[10] Where the indictment is bad on its face, the prosecution should, instead of joining in demurrer, apply for an order to quash or for leave to enter a nolle prosequi.[11] It is within the discretion of the court to permit defendant to withdraw his demurrer and plead at any time before judgment upon the demurrer;[12] but it has been held that, as a condition for leave to withdraw the demurrer, defendant may be required to waive his right to move in arrest for any matter apparent on the indictment.[13]

6. Order or Judgment — a. In General. Upon determination of the demurrer the court should give judgment either allowing or disallowing it.[14]

b. Where Demurrer Is Overruled. In the case of misdemeanors, a judgment overruling a demurrer operates as a conviction,[15] and defendant cannot as a matter of right plead over,[16] unless, as is sometimes the case, a statute so provides,[17] although in some jurisdictions a similar ruling has been made in the absence of statute.[18] It is within the discretion of the court, however, to allow defendant to plead over.[19] It seems likewise that the right to plead over as a matter of right does not exist even in the case of felony;[20] but it is discretionary with the court to allow defendant to plead over,[21] and such plea is ordinarily allowed.[22] Where at the time of demurring the prosecution consents that the accused may afterward plead over, he may do so as a matter of right either in felonies or misdemeanors.[23]

It has been held that after an order has been entered overruling a demurrer, the court may permit the order to be set aside, and allow the state to confess the demurrer and file a new information.[24]

c. Where Demurrer Is Sustained. At common law, when a demurrer was sustained on the ground that the facts charged did not constitute a crime, defendant was discharged;[25] but when the demurrer was sustained merely for insufficiency in form, the prisoner was held until a new indictment could be prepared.[26] By statute it is sometimes provided that, upon allowing a demurrer, the court may hold defendant to answer a new indictment.[27] In such case the allowance of an amendment or the direction for resubmission must be by matter of record made at the time when the demurrer is allowed.[28] The striking of a portion of an indictment on sustaining a demurrer is not regarded as an amendment.[29]

7. Effect of Failure to Demur. Matters which are made grounds for demurrer, it is frequently provided by statute, are to be regarded as waived if not so presented.[30]

no such amendment where the constitution requires an indictment by a grand jury.[39]

(II) IN MATTERS OF FORM. It was the practice at common law for the grand jury to consent at the time they were sworn that the court might amend matters of form, altering no matter of substance, and mere informalities could be amended by the court at any time before trial, or perhaps during the trial.[40] In the United States therefore some of the courts have held, even in the absence of a statute, that it is competent for the court to amend an indictment in matters of form.[41] Other courts have held the contrary.[42]

(III) CONSENT OF DEFENDANT OR COUNSEL. It has been held in some jurisdictions that an indictment cannot be amended in matter of substance even with defendant's consent or by stipulation of counsel, particularly where the constitution requires an indictment, and that in such case defendant cannot be estopped by such consent or stipulation;[43] but other cases are to the contrary.[44]

b. Under Statutory Provisions — (I) IN GENERAL. In most jurisdictions statutes have been enacted allowing indictments to be amended by the court in matters of form, where the amendment is such that it cannot prejudice defendant, or specifically allowing amendments to cure mistakes in the statement of time or place, names and description of persons, description of property, statements of ownership, and the like, if the defendant cannot be prejudiced thereby in his defense on the merits.[45]

(II) CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTES. Where such a form of accusation is required by the constitution, the legislature cannot authorize the court to amend an indictment in matter of substance, for as amended it would not be the finding of the grand jury.[46] And the legislature cannot authorize the amendment of an indictment during the trial in matter of substance where, as is the case in most states, if not in all, the constitution guarantees to persons accused the right, before they can be called upon to answer, to be fully and substantially informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, either by an express provision to this effect or impliedly by the provision requiring due process of law.[47] The legislature, however, may authorize amendments at any time in mere matters of form where defendant will not be prejudiced thereby.[48] On this ground the courts have sustained statutes authorizing amendments to correct a mistake in the name of the accused;[49] and some courts, but not all, have sustained statutes allowing amendments with respect to the names of third persons or the ownership of property,[50] averments of time,[51] and the like.[52]

(III) CONSENT OF DEFENDANT. In Alabama, and it may be in other states, the statute allows amendment of indictments with defendant's consent as to his name and in certain other particulars, and no amendment can be allowed without his consent, even in an immaterial matter.[53] Generally, however, the statutes permitting amendments do not require defendant's consent.[54]

(IV) TIME OF AMENDMENT. As has been seen, the legislature cannot constitutionally authorize an amendment in matter of substance after arraignment and plea, but may authorize amendment in matter of form at any time before judgment.[55] Under some statutes particular amendments cannot be made after verdict,[56]

after the case has gone to the jury,[57] or after announcement of ready for trial by both parties.[58] And under some statutes particular amendments cannot be made until after the jury has been sworn.[59]

(v) Discretion of Court. The allowance of amendments is under some statutes within the discretion of the court.[60]

(vi) Necessity For Amendment. Under a statute authorizing the amendment of indictments to conform to the proofs, where unprejudicial to the accused, the order of the court does not work the amendment; but there must be a manual change of the indictment, and where this is not done the conviction will be set aside.[61]

3. Effect of Amendment. When an authorized amendment of an indictment is made the indictment afterward exists only as amended.[62] If an unauthorized amendment is made by the court by alteration of the indictment, it vitiates the whole indictment,[63] unless it is immaterial and does not change the legal effect of the indictment;[64] but an indictment is not vitiated or affected by an unauthorized addition or change by the clerk of the court.[65]

B. Of Information[66] — 1. In the Absence of Statute. Even in the absence of a statute, informations, not being found upon the oath of a grand jury, but filed by the public prosecutor, may be amended either in matter of form or substance by leave of court at any time before trial, even after motion to quash, demurrer, or plea;[67] and the rule applies to informations for felonies under stat-

496), or after the case has gone to the jury (Reg. v. Frost, 3 C. L. R. 665, 6 Cox C. C. 526, Dears. C. C. 474, 1 Jur. N. S. 406, 24 L. J. M. C. 116, 3 Wkly. Rep. 401).

Lord Mansfield said: "There is a great difference between amending indictments and amending informations. Indictments are found upon the oaths of a jury, and ought only to be amended by themselves; but informations are as declarations in the King's suit. An officer of the crown has the right of framing them originally, and may, with leave, amend, in like manner as any plaintiff may do. If the amendment can give occasion to a new defence, the defendant has leave to change his plea." Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 2527, 2569.

information and the affidavit on which it is based may be amended in substance or form at any time before plea, the affidavit, when amended, being sworn to; and the information may be amended at any time before or on the trial to conform to the affidavit.[74] In Texas an information may be amended by leave of court in any matter of form at any time before an announcement by both parties of ready for trial on the merits, but not afterward, and no matter of substance can be amended.[75]

b. Constitutionality of Statutes. In view of the constitutional provisions guaranteeing to persons accused of crime the right, before they can be called upon to answer, to be informed fully and substantially of the nature and cause of the accusation,[76] the legislature cannot authorize an information to be amended during the trial in matter of substance,[77] any more than it could authorize such amendment of indictments.[78] But it may authorize amendments at any time in mere matter of form,[79] and may authorize amendments before trial either in substance or form.[80]

3. Discretion of Court. It is generally within the discretion of the trial court whether it will permit an information to be amended, and its exercise of such discretion will not be interfered with in the absence of abuse.[81] Leave to amend should be denied if the prosecution has become barred by the statute of limitations,[82] or, it has been held, where the amendment is for the purpose of adding charges,[83] or where the complaint before the magistrate or the presentment on which the information is based does not charge a crime,[84] or where the amendment charges a graver crime with a heavier penalty.[85]

4. Who May Amend. As a rule amendments of informations are made and must be made by the prosecuting attorney;[86] but authorized amendments may be made, with the permission of the court, by an assistant prosecuting attorney in the absence of his superior,[87] or by the successor in office of the prosecuting attorney who filed the information.[88] An amendment may be directed by the court of its own motion.[89]

5. Notice and Hearing of Motion to Amend. On motion to amend an information defendant is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard, and an amendment without this is erroneous.[90]

74. 6. After Change of Venue. An information cannot be amended in the county in which a criminal case is pending after a change of venue has been granted, but the amended information must be filed in the original county.[91]

7. Necessity For Amendment. It has been held that when an information is defective and amendable, the amendment must be actually made.[92]

8. Effect of Amendment. When an amended information is filed the original information is thereby quashed and abandoned.[93] When an information is amended in matters of substance after arraignment and plea, there must be a new arraignment and plea.[94] An amendment cannot be relied upon as error where it is immaterial and the legal effect of the information is not in any way changed.[95]

C. Of Complaint or Affidavit.[96] Complaints and affidavits treated as complaints, like informations, may be amended by leave of court before trial in matters of form or substance,[97] or during trial, or even in the appellate court, in matter of form,[98] but not in matter of substance.[99] A complaint under oath cannot be amended in matter of substance in an appellate court,[1] except, in some jurisdictions, where there is a trial de novo.[2]

D. Matters Amendable; Form and Substance Distinguished — 1. In General. In applying the principles set forth and statutes referred to in the preceding subdivisions with reference to matters of substance and form, there has been some conflict of opinion as to what are to be regarded as amendments in matter of substance as distinguished from mere matter of form. It is perhaps safe to say, however, on the one hand, that the power of amendment extends to formal matters which are not essential to the charge and mere clerical errors, etc., where defendant cannot be misled or prejudiced;[3] but on the other hand any that an amendment of an information by the insertion of a verification as to the date of filing, without notice to defendant and opportunity to be heard, is erroneous.

But compare State v. Patterson, 66 Kan. 447, 71 Pac. 860 (holding that where the court has ordered certain irrelevant matter in an information disregarded, it is not absolutely necessary that it should be obliterated from the information, or that the information should be redrafted, where the precise effect of the order is shown by the record); State v. Pipes, 65 Kan. 543, 70 Pac. 363 (holding that where defendant alleges that his name is other than that used in the information against him, and declares his real name, and the court orders it to be substituted in all further proceedings, it is not essential that the information should be amended with respect to the name.

95. State v. McKee, 17 Utah 370, 53 Pac. 733. omission or misstatement which prevents an indictment or information from showing on its face that an offense has been committed, or from showing what offense it is intended to charge, is a defect in matter of substance which cannot be cured by amendment at the trial, or, in the case of an indictment, by the court at any time, where an indictment is necessary.[4] And an indictment or information cannot be amended at the trial so as to change the identity of the offense,[5] or so as to include or add another offense.[6] An indictment will not be amended by striking out the word "feloniously" and thereby converting a charge of felony into a misdemeanor,[7] or by inserting the word "feloniously," where it is essential to the charge.[8] The test as to whether a defendant is prejudiced by the amendment of an indictment has been said to be whether a defense under the indictment as it originally stood would be equally available after the amendment is made, and whether any evidence defendant might have would be equally applicable to the indictment in the one form as in the other.[9]

Proc. art. 549, authorizing the correction of an indictment by inserting defendant's name therein as suggested by himself, and by changing the style of the cause so as to give the true name, authorizes a correction of the name wherever it occurs, and not merely in the formal parts of the indictment. Colter v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. 78, 51 S. W. 945. It is not proper for the court, on suggestion of the county attorney, to amend a complaint and information in regard to defendant's name. The statutory provisions which authorize such amendments have reference to cases in which defendant suggests that his name is misstated. If he makes no such suggestion, the cause proceeds as though his name were truly alleged, and the misnomer is no defense. Patillo v. State, 3 Tex. App. 442.

done only to correct a mistake in charging the offense, and not to change the offense.[27]

4. Time and Place. In some states amendments have been sustained under statutory provisions, as being in matter of form, adding or changing the time of the alleged offense, where the time is not of the essence of the offense;[28] but elsewhere decisions are to the contrary.[29] Although the contrary has been held, according to the weight of authority a statement of the county in which the crime was committed is matter of substance which cannot be changed or supplied by amendment of an indictment,[30] or, during the trial, of an information or other like accusation;[31] and the same has been held in other cases in which the statement or description of place is material,[32] although amendments have been

Amendments have also been allowed under statutes, although subject to conflict of opinion in some of the cases mentioned, to correct a mere mistake in the allegation of a former conviction in an indictment or information for a second offense,[35] although not to supply an entire omission of such an allegation;[36] to charge the offense more specifically;[37] to correct or make more specific allegations in indictments for perjury,[38] false pretenses,[39] forgery or uttering,[40] libel,[41] shooting with a dangerous weapon,[42] exhibiting a deadly weapon,[43] and other offenses;[44] to change or make more specific the description of property in an indictment or information for larceny, embezzlement, false pretenses, and like offenses, where the accused cannot be prejudiced thereby,[45] or the description

need not be proved or considered.[2] The prosecution is not bound to prove negative averments,[3] and where an indictment contains allegations suited merely to negative a defense which is expected, such allegations need not be proved.[4] Where the specific acts constituting an offense are set forth in the statute punishing it, it is sufficient to prove such acts without proving additional facts.[5]

2. Place of Offense. An averment of venue is material and must be proved,[6] but where it is unnecessarily particular, it need not be proved precisely as laid.[7]

3. Time of Offense. In all cases the state is bound to establish some time at which the offense was committed;[8] with reference to which all the essentials of the offense must be established.[9] Such date must be shown to have been within the period of limitations,[10] and before the finding of the indictment,[11] but it need not be proved as laid.[12] Where the basis of an indictment is neglect, the continuance of such neglect need not be proved as laid in the indictment where the continuance is not essential to the charge.[13]

4. Description of Accused. Matter descriptive of the identity of the accused, although unnecessarily alleged, must be proved.[14]

5. Description of Third Persons. The name of the person injured must be proved,[15] but matters merely descriptive of persons other than the accused which can be rejected without affecting the indictment need not be.[16] By statute it is sometimes provided that the prosecution is not bound to prove a fact of incorporation mentioned in an indictment unless placed in issue by plea.[17]

6. Description of Property. As a general rule matter alleged in identification of property must be proved as alleged, although the description is unnecessarily specific.[18] So if the indictment state the name of the owner of property although unnecessarily it must be proved as laid.[19] Allegations of weight, magnitude, number, and value are generally, but not always, exceptions to this rule.[20] So sums of money need not be proved as laid unless they form part of the description of a written instrument, or the exact sum is of the essence of the offense.[21]

7. Matters Alleged to Be Unknown to Grand Jury. Where there is an averment that a person or matter is unknown to the grand jury, if nothing appears to the contrary, the truth of such allegation is presumed and need not be proved.[22] So it is held that an allegation that a more particular description of property stolen is unknown is not traversable.[23] In some states, however, such an allegation is regarded as traversed by a plea of not guilty and must be sustained.[24] Where matters unknown are attempted to be described for the purpose of identification, the descriptive matter should be proved.[25]

8. Surplusage and Unnecessary Averments. The general rule is that all descriptive averments in the indictment, although unnecessarily particular, must be proved as laid,[26] although it is stated that in the case of such averments the same strictness of proof is not required as in the proof of the material facts,[27] except where they concern a record, a written agreement, or perhaps an express contract.[28] This general rule is limited by another rule which provides that if matter may be omitted entirely without affecting the charge against the prisoner, it may be considered as surplusage and disregarded,[29] especially where the particular allegation is pleaded under a videlicet.[30] Under a statute providing that an indictment shall not be held insufficient by reason of any surplusage, it has been held that surplusage in the description of property need not be proved.[31]

A. 246. Compare Wilkinson v. State, 10 Ind. 372, holding that if intent to defraud a particular person is averred in an indictment for passing a counterfeit, such intent must be proved.

9. Sufficiency of Proof of Part of Charge. It is in general sufficient to prove so much of the indictment as shows that defendant has committed a substantive crime therein specified.[32] So, where the offense charged involves the wrongful taking of property, it is not necessary to prove the taking of all the property alleged in the indictment,[33] and where a crime is charged to have been committed by various means proof of any one of such means is sufficient.[34] If the indictment is drawn under a statute which makes several acts mentioned in the alternative, or a single act done with either of several motives or intents punishable, it is sufficient if the proof establishes one of such acts or intents, although several are charged conjunctively in the indictment.[35] Where the indictment contains more than one count, it is sufficient if the evidence establishes either count.[36] When two distinct offenses are properly joined in the same indictment,[37] it is sufficient to support a conviction that either be established.[38]

B. Evidence Admissible Under Pleadings[39]— 1. In General. Everything which is necessary to be proved must as a general rule be averred;[40] and evidence as to matters which are not sufficiently pleaded cannot be submitted to the jury.[41] So where it is necessary to prove agency, there must be an averment of the relation.[42] It has been held that a joint charge of felony necessarily involves a conspiracy rendering proof thereof admissible without a formal allega-

Although a count would be insufficient upon arrest of judgment evidence may nevertheless be given to support it. U. S. v. Crandell, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,885, 4 Cranch C. C. 683.

42. Beasley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. 688, 47 S. W. 991, holding that an allegation that a forged instrument purported to be "the act of one J. C. Pray. Agt." was insufficient to admit proof that P was agent. But see Com. v. Bagley, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 279, holding tion.[48] The flight of accused may be shown in order to establish that he is not entitled to the benefit of the statute of limitations, although such flight is not alleged.[44] Evidence is admissible to establish any part of the charge.[45] Where the state has furnished a bill of particulars, it is limited to the facts stated therein.[46]

2. PROOF OF OTHER OFFENSES. Subject to certain general exceptions, evidence of other offenses than that charged in the indictment is inadmissible.[47] Under this rule where place is a general element in an offense, the proof must be confined to the place alleged.[48] Evidence as to the time of the offense may be admissible, although not in conformity with the date alleged;[49] but the state will not be permitted to prove two offenses, one on the date charged in the indictment and one on another date;[50] nor can the offense be shown to have been committed after the finding of the indictment.[51]

3. INDICTMENTS IN SEVERAL COUNTS. Where several offenses are properly joined in the same indictment in separate counts, evidence of all of the offenses so charged may be introduced.[52] Evidence properly admissible under one count of an indictment may be introduced, although inadmissible under the other counts.[53] But where the state has elected to proceed on a portion of the counts only, evidence which is admissible only under counts which have been abandoned cannot be received.[54]

C. Variance Between Allegations and Proof — 1. IN GENERAL. Variance is defined to be a disagreement between the averments of the indictment and the proof in some matter which is legally essential to the charge.[55] As a general rule a variance in a material matter is fatal and entitles defendant to an acquittal,[56] unless the objection may be and is cured by statute.[57] The fact, however, that more is proved by the state than is necessary will not constitute a variance where

Sales to agent.— Where a sale is made to persons with notice that they are buying for others, the sale should be alleged to have been made to the employers; but where a sale is made to an agent without notice of the agency, it may be alleged to have been made to the agent. the proof relates merely to matters of description.[58] And where the evidence corresponds with one of several counts there is no variance, although it does not correspond with other counts.[59]

2. STATUTORY PROVISIONS. By statute it is now frequently provided that variance with regard to matters of description shall not be ground for an acquittal unless material to the merits of the case or prejudicial to defendant.[60]

3. PLACE OF OFFENSE. Where place is laid in an indictment not as descriptive of the offense but for the purpose of establishing jurisdiction, variance is not material if the place established is within the jurisdiction.[61] When place is alleged as matter of local description, however, it must be proved as laid;[62] as where the offense may be committed only within a particular territorial division less than a county,[63] or where the judgment must operate upon a particular thing,[64] as in the case of indictments for the abatement of a nuisance,[65] or for forcible entry and detainer.[66] Where the place is known both by the name alleged and by another name there is no variance.[67]

4. TIME OF OFFENSE. Save in those cases in which time is of the essence of the offense,[68] the prosecution is not confined in its evidence to the precise date laid in the indictment, but may prove the offense to have been committed upon any day prior to the finding of the indictment and within the period of limitations.[69]

In those cases, however, in which time is essential, it must be proved as laid;[70] as where, defendant having been tried for another and similar offense within the period of limitations, proof of the exact date is necessary to show that he is not being again tried for the same offense;[71] or where the date is necessary to enable the court to impose the proper sentence,[72] as in the case of recent alterations of the statutes punishing the offense.[73] Where the time alleged is to be proved by record, any variance is fatal.[74] At common law it was held that, where an offense consisted of a series of acts, a day certain must be alleged, and time being material, no evidence of the commission of the acts on other days was admissible.[75] When such an offense was laid under a continuando, the evidence was confined to the period alleged,[76] although the indictment might be supported by proof of the offense during any part thereof.[77] According to later cases, however, the state is not confined in its proof by the continuando but may prove any time within the period of limitations and before finding of the indictment.[78]

5. The Person Accused — a. In General. A misnomer of defendant in an indictment must be taken advantage of by plea in abatement and cannot be made a ground of objection after plea.[79] Where a variance develops from the evidence, it may be shown that defendant was commonly called and as well known by the name in the indictment or information as by the true name;[80] but a verdict cannot be entered against a defendant other than the one described in the indictment or information unless the record discloses that by amendment after plea of misnomer or otherwise, the name has been changed to conform to that in the verdict.[81] Although matters descriptive of the person of the accused have been alleged unnecessarily, they must be proved as laid.[82] Documentary evidence referring to defendant by his initials is admissible to support an averment charging him by his name in full.[83] Where a person is indicted under an alias it is not necessary to prove that he was known and called by both of the names;[84] and such an indictment is supported by proof that defendant acted in the matter charged under a name different from his own.[85]

b. Joint Defendants. Where an indictment charges two or more defendants with an offense jointly, they cannot be convicted upon proof of the commission of separate offenses by each, although the offenses are of the same nature;[86] but in case two are indicted for a crime which might have been committed by either alone, the jury may find one guilty and acquit the other.[87] So upon a joint indictment for receiving stolen goods, proof may be offered of the receipt of goods by the different defendants at different times and one defendant may be convicted alone.[88] In case of a joint charge of an offense aggravated by former convictions, it is not necessary to prove that the former convictions were joint, but separate convictions may be shown at different times and of distinct offenses.[89]

c. Principals and Accessaries — (I) Principals in First and Second Degree. As a general rule, where no distinction in punishment is made, a person indicted as a principal may be convicted on proof that he was only present aiding and abetting.[90] Under a joint indictment against the perpetrator and those who were present to aid and abet in a felony, each is responsible for the act and may be convicted as principal.[91] Hence where the participation of joint defendants in an offense is so set out as to charge them respectively as principals in the first and second degrees, a variance in the proof as to which were in fact the principals in the first degree is not material and a conviction may be had according to the evidence.[92] Conversely a person indicted as an aider and abetter may be convicted as a principal in the first degree,[93] except where a more severe punishment follows.[94]

(III) Principal and Accessary Before or After Fact. At common law[95] and in those states in which the common-law distinctions between the principal felon and accessaries before the fact are retained,[96] there can be no conviction of a person as an accessary before the fact upon an indictment charging him as principal, and conversely, there can be no conviction as principal of one charged as accessary before the fact;[97] but in those states in which the distinction between principals and accessaries before the fact has been abolished, it is held in many states that one indicted as principal may be convicted on evidence showing that he is an accessary,[98] and conversely,[99] especially where the statutes provide that they shall be indicted, tried, and punished alike.[1] In other states, however, it is held that, although the distinction is abolished, in the absence of express statutory permission to the contrary, the indictment must state whether defendant is charged as a principal or as an accessary and a variance in the proof is fatal.[2] One indicted as a principal cannot be convicted as such on evidence showing that he is merely an accessary after the fact,[3] nor can he be convicted as an accessary.[4]

proof merely of an attempt to cheat.[6] On a charge of an attempt, however, proof of a completed offense is not a variance.[7] Where an offense may be committed in various ways, the evidence must establish it to have been committed in the mode charged in the indictment.[8] A conviction cannot be had on evidence of another offense of the same kind committed on the same day but not identical with that charged.[9] Where matters in aggravation are alleged, it is not a variance to fail to establish them.[10]

The part of the charge describing the manner of the offense must conform substantially with the evidence introduced to support it.[11] A material variance in descriptive matter is fatal.[12] A variance will not result where the allegations and the proof, although variant, are of the same legal signification.[13] The fact that a charge is general and the proof particular does not necessarily show a variance.[14]

offense, the name must be correctly stated and a material variance is fatal.[17] The rule applies for example to the name of a person upon whom a felony was committed,[18] or whose property was affected thereby.[19] If the name of a third person is not essential to the description of the offense a misnomer is not fatal.[20] A variance is not necessarily established by the fact that names are spelled differently,[21] and where the names may be sounded alike or are idem sonans, the spelling is immaterial.[22] So also where the variance is so slight that the person would have been readily known by the name established.[23] And where no question as to the identity of a person arose, it has been held that the spelling of his name in two ways in an indictment and proof of it in one of such ways was not fatal.[24] The question of idem sonans is for the jury.[25] Mere terms of description which are used for the purpose of designation and distinction need not be proved as laid,[26] but where residence is unnecessarily stated it must be proved.[27] Where a person is given a fictitious name, it is not material that the proof shows that such person is a woman, while the fictitious name is masculine.[28] The fact that no

witness testifies to the complete christian and surname of a person as stated in the indictment, but the witnesses testify either to the christian or surname, will not constitute a variance where there is no controversy as to identity.[29]

b. Statutory Provisions. By statute in some states, it is provided that a variance as to the name of a person in an indictment shall not be ground of acquittal unless the court upon the trial finds it material or prejudicial,[30] or that an erroneous allegation is not to be regarded as material where the offense is in other respects described with sufficient certainty to identify the act.[31]

c. Christian Names. The christian name of a third person who is necessarily described in an indictment must be proved,[32] and a material variance is fatal,[33] in the absence of a showing that the person was as well known by the name alleged in the indictment as by that proved;[34] in which case the question whether there is a variance is for the jury.[35] It is held, however, that where two names are ordinarily taken to be the same in common use, although different in sound, as where the one is a contraction or corruption of the other, no variance will arise from the allegation of one and proof of the other.[36] An allegation of initials and the proof of a name in full or conversely does not constitute a variance where the

is unknown, and it was proved that the ownership was in a woman.

full name and the initials are consistent,[37] although the identity must be apparent.[38] Where a person is described by name and also by other matters of description, it has been held that proof of such matters rendering the identity certain may cure any variance as to the name.[39]

d. Middle Names and Initials. The proof of a middle name or initial where none is alleged is not a material variance,[40] and in many cases it is held that a middle initial or name if alleged need not be proved as alleged.[41] Under a statute making it sufficient to state one or more initials of the name and the surname, an allegation of the middle initial may be supported by proof of the first name and such initial.[42]

e. Name by Which Person Is Commonly Known. Where it is shown that the person is well and usually known by the name stated in the indictment, there is no variance, although such name may not be the true name,[43] or although the person is also commonly known by some other name or names.[44] Where the true name is stated, evidence that the person is generally known by some other name is not fatal.[45] Where a variance appears in the name of a third person, evidence is admissible to show that he is commonly known by the name charged in the indictment,[46] although there is no allegation to that effect in the indictment,[47] and the burden of proof is on the prosecution,[48] the sufficiency of the proof being a question for the jury.[49]

f. Names of Corporations and Partnerships. In some cases it has been held that a corporate name must be proved strictly as laid;[50] but the better rule appears to be that a variance in a portion of the corporate name which is not an integral part thereof is not fatal,[51] such as in a part of the name which would commonly be understood as referring to the place of business of the corporation,[52] it having been said that the name of a corporation differs from that of an individual in that the transposition or the omission of words from its name may not make an essential difference in the sense.[53] The name by which the corporation is commonly known has in some cases been held sufficient.[54] A misspelling of a corporate name where it does not cause a change in pronunciation is immaterial.[55] An averment of the state or the laws under which the corporation was created need not, unless essential to the identity of the corporation, be proved.[56] The name of a partner-she is as well known by that name as by the name of the person adopting her. Walker v. State, 134 Ala. 86, 32 So. 703.

The person need not be as exclusively or familiarly known by the name used in the indictment as by any other, but it is sufficient that such name identifies him as certainly as any other (Bell v. State, 25 Tex. 574); but it is not sufficient that the proof establish that the person was "known" simply by the name under which he was described (State v. Lincoln, 17 Wis. 579).

It need not be established beyond a reasonable doubt that the person is as well known by either name. Walker v. State, 134 Ala. 86, 32 So. 703.

Proof of de facto existence is sufficient where a corporation is alleged to be the owner ship alleged to have been affected by the criminal transaction must be proved as laid.[57] Where copartners are described as such and also by their individual names, a variance in the given name of one of the partners will not be regarded as material if it cannot be misleading.[58] A name adopted as a business style simply need not be proved precisely as laid.[59]

8. Description of Property — a. In General. The allegations and the proof as to real[60] or personal[61] property essential to the description of the offense charged must correspond.[62] The proof of an allegation descriptive of real property may be more specific than the allegation where not in conflict therewith.[63] In some states it is held that where specifications are filed, the presiding judge may in his discretion admit evidence which is entirely outside of them, if it is pertinent to the indictment, and if defendant is given a sufficient opportunity to answer it.[64]

b. Money and Currency. In general an averment of the taking of "money" may be supported by proof of the taking of any particular kind of money.[65] But where a particular kind of money is specifically described it must be proved as laid.[66] An averment of the taking of promissory notes may be supported by proof of the taking of bank-bills[67] or treasury notes.[68] An averment of money, however, is not supported by proof of a certificate of deposit[69] or of a check.[70]

which it is necessary to aver the ownership of property,[71] a material variance between the allegations and proof is fatal.[72] An immaterial allegation of ownership may, however, be rejected as surplusage, and need not be proved,[73] unless the averment is descriptive, in which case it cannot be rejected as surplusage.[74] As a general rule an allegation of ownership, where the injury is to the possession, is supported by proof that either the general property or the possession was in the person named.[75] Proof of possession is sufficient,[76] as is proof of right to possession,[77] or proof of custody and control rendering the possessor accountable to the true owner.[78] Where the injury is to a dwelling-house, it should be described as the dwelling of the person in possession.[79] An averment of possession must be proved as laid,[80] but may be supported by proof of possession by a servant or agent.[81] It is not necessary to prove ownership of all the property described if the ownership of sufficient to make out the offense is established.[82]

b. Statutory Provisions. Statutes in some jurisdictions provide that there shall be no variance in case it is proved at the trial that either the actual or constructive possession or the general or special property was in the person alleged to be the owner.[83]

d. Infants. Articles which a parent, in the discharge of his obligation as such, furnishes to a minor child who lives with him may be charged to be the property either of the parent or the child;[87] but property which the minor holds for purposes of pleasure and which the parent is not bound to furnish should be described as property of the minor.[88]

e. Joint Tenants and Tenants in Common. Where the injury is against the possession, ownership may be alleged to be in all or either of the persons owning property in common or jointly;[89] but in some cases where there is no actual occupation of the premises, the legal title must be stated accurately.[90] Where a joint ownership is averred, it is not supported by proof of sole ownership,[91] but since the property of joint owners may be properly described as that of any one of them proof of joint ownership of property described as that of an individual is not a variance.[92]

f. Partnerships. The property of a partnership may be laid in the name of the individual partners and proof of ownership by the partnership is not a variance,[93] provision being sometimes made by statute that it may be laid in an individual partner.[94] An averment that money embezzled was received for the account of an individual is not, however, supported by proof that it was received for a partnership, although the individual's name appears in the firm-name.[95]

10. Description of Written or Printed Matter. A variance between the pleading and proof of a writing necessarily to be described in the indictment is fatal.[1] Where the indictment attempts to set forth an instrument or writing according to its tenor, the evidence must conform to the instrument set out, although the description is unnecessarily particular.[2] A mere literal variance, however, is not fatal.[3] It is generally sufficient to describe a paper according to its legal effect;[4] but where an instrument is described according to its legal effect the description must be proved.[5] Where only the substance and effect is set out in the indictment proof to such extent is sufficient,[6] but the substance and effect must be established.[7] Under the statutes relaxing the common-law strictness of pleading, however, an immaterial variance is usually regarded as harmless.[8] There is no variance where an instrument offered in evidence corresponds to the description pleaded, although other details are shown which are not pleaded.[9] A variance

Knowledge as to a portion of the articles charged as unknown will not defeat a conviction where the articles, as to which there to be properly placed upon the ground of lack of diligence or carelessness in making the accusation and not upon variance between the allegation and proof.[17] The fact that it appears that knowledge exists at the time of trial will not of itself establish a variance;[18] but in such case it has been said that affirmative proof must be offered that the fact was unknown to the grand jury.[19] Where the matter alleged to have been unknown was not essential to the sufficiency of the indictment, proof of knowledge will be immaterial.[20]

12. Disposition of Case on Establishment of Variance. Upon acquittal because of variance, the prisoner may be remanded to await a new indictment.[21] Under the statutes in some states where the variance appears from the evidence, it is within the power of the trial court to take the case from the jury and hold defendant to answer a new indictment.[22]

XII. CONVICTION OF OFFENSES INCLUDED IN CHARGE.

A. General Rules. The general rule at common law was that when an indictment charged an offense which included within it another less offense or one of a lower degree, defendant, although acquitted of the higher offense, might be convicted of the less.[23] This common-law rule is not abrogated, although the minor included offenses are by statute triable without a jury,[24] or although the minor offense is not triable on indictment.[25] On an indictment for a major offense, the state may abandon aggravating circumstances and proceed for a minor degree or included offense.[26]

B. Conviction of Misdemeanor on Charge of Felony. At common law, however, there could be no conviction of a misdemeanor upon an indictment for felony, although the elements of the misdemeanor were included in the felony charged,[27] the reason for the rule being that upon a trial for misdemeanor defendant had certain advantages such as the right to appear by counsel, to have a copy of the indictment and to a special jury, which were denied him upon a trial for felony.[28] But in the United States, since the accused has the same rights upon the trial of offenses of either character, the common-law rule has not been generally recognized, there being no reason for its application,[29] it having been abolished by statute in many of the states,[30] and indeed also in England.[31] By some of the earlier statutes, however, the doctrine of merger was recognized even in the United States.[32]

C. Statutory Provisions. By statutes, variously worded in the various states, it is commonly provided that upon an indictment charging defendant with an offense consisting of several degrees, there may be a conviction of the minor degree upon a charge of a greater,[33] or that there may be a conviction for an offense necessarily included in the graver charge.[34] In case the statement of the graver offense in the indictment is sufficient to inform accused also of the essentials of the less charge, such statutes do not infringe the constitutional right of the accused to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation;[35] or to the presentment and indictment of a grand jury.[36] Such statutes extend to offenses made punishable after their enactment.[37] Statutes authorizing a conviction of a less degree do not authorize a conviction as accessary under an indictment as principal.[38]

included in the charge for which the indictment is drawn,[39] a conviction cannot be had of a crime as included in the offense specifically charged unless the indictment in describing the major offense contains all the essential averments of the less, or the greater offense necessarily includes all the essential ingredients of the less.[40] Otherwise there must be an added count.[41] So upon an indictment charging burglary and larceny, the larceny must be well laid in order to support a conviction for larceny.[42] Where it is essential that the minor offense be charged to have been done "unlawfully" or in any other particular manner, such manner may be gathered from the entire indictment.[43]

2. Effect of Insufficiency of Charge of Higher Offense. It would seem upon principle that where an indictment contains a sufficient charge of a minor offense, a conviction therefor may be sustained, although the indictment is insufficient to charge the greater offense.[44] There are holdings, however, that the less charge must fall with the greater.[45]

3. Conviction of Highest Degree When Degree Is Not Specified. An indictment which does not specify the degree will sustain a verdict for the highest degree of an offense divided by statute into degrees, when it contains the essentials of a charge of such degree.[46]

E. Conviction of Lower Degree — 1. In General. In the case of an offense divided into degrees, defendant may, on an indictment framed for the higher degree, be convicted of the lower degree and acquitted of the higher,[47] a provision to such effect being frequently made by statute.[48] Where the act for which defendant is indicted is the same as that for which he is convicted, a conviction may be had for the lower degree, although the particular intent or circumstances characterizing the lower degree are not stated.[49] But where criminal acts of widely different characteristics are arranged together under a statute as degrees of an offense of the same name, a conviction cannot be had upon an indictment for a higher degree unless the indictment of the higher degree charges all the circumstances of the lower degree and additional allegations charging the higher degree, in which case the additional allegations may be rejected as surplusage.[50]

2. ARSON. Where an indictment for arson in the first degree includes the circumstances of minor degrees, there may be a conviction for such degrees.[51]

3. BURGLARY. On a charge of burglary in the first degree, a conviction may be had for burglary in the second degree.[52]

4. COUNTERFEITING. When a different punishment is attached to the possession with intent to utter of counterfeit money according to the amount in defendant's possession, there may be a conviction for the possession of a less amount on a charge of a greater.[53]

5. HOMICIDE. Since an indictment for murder includes all the lower grades of felonious homicide,[54] under a common-law form of indictment, a conviction may be had for either of the degrees of murder as defined by statute or of the lower grades of homicide.[55] So upon an indictment charging murder generally a defendant may be found guilty of manslaughter,[56] and, where manslaughter has been divided by statute into degrees, of any of the statutory degrees.[57] It is also held that there may be a conviction for involuntary manslaughter,[58] or negligent homicide.[59] In case an indictment is drawn under a statute for murder in the first degree, a conviction may be had of a less degree or for manslaughter,[60] since murder in the first degree, properly charged, includes every grade of homicide.[61] So where the indictment is for the second degree, a conviction of manslaughter may be had.[62] Although there is evidence tending to show a conspiracy to kill, if defendant is also shown to have been present aiding and abetting, he may be convicted of murder in the second degree under an indictment for murder in the first degree.[63]

a conviction is regarded as justified by a statute permitting defendant to be found guilty of any offense necessarily included in the charge.[68] The effect of such statutes is not altered by the fact that a specific punishment is provided for an attempt to commit any offense prohibited by law.[69] Under these statutes there may be a conviction of an attempt to commit an included offense,[70] but there can be no conviction where the attempt does not constitute a punishable offense.[71] If an indictment is insufficient to charge a crime, there can be no conviction of an attempt to commit such crime.[72] And where the evidence shows a completed offense of a lower degree than that charged, there can be no conviction of an attempt to commit the higher degree.[73]

2. Abortion. A charge of abortion will support a conviction for attempt[74] if such an attempt is an offense, but not otherwise.[75]

3. Arson. On an indictment for arson, there may be a conviction of an attempt.[76]

4. Homicide.[77] Upon an indictment for murder, it has been held that there may be a conviction of assault with intent to kill, although no assault is specifically charged in the indictment;[78] but the better rule is apparently that to support such a conviction the circumstances must be so charged in the indictment as to indicate the fact of an assault and to allow proof to be introduced in support of it.[79] It has, however, been held that an assault with intent or an attempt to commit cannot be included in a charge either of murder or of manslaughter,[80] the doctrine of merger being applicable.[81] Any difficulty on this point is solved by statute in some states which provide that there may be a conviction of assault in any degree, constituted by the act complained of and warranted by the evidence, in case the act is not proven to be the cause of death.[82]

5. Larceny. Upon an indictment for larceny, there may be a conviction of an attempt to commit larceny.[83]

6. Rape. A charge of rape will support a conviction of assault with intent to commit rape.[84]

G. Conviction of Different Offense Included in Charge — 1. GENERAL RULE. Where the charge of a greater offense contains the essential elements of a minor offense, the jury may acquit defendant of the graver charge and find him guilty of the less offense included therein;[87] and such provision is usually made by statute.[88] This rule applies in all cases in which the minor offense is necessarily an elemental part of the greater when proof of the greater necessarily establishes the less;[89] or, as is sometimes stated, where the offenses are of the same generic class.[90] And the rule applies, although both crimes are statutory,[91] and although they could not be charged together in the same count.[92] But the proof of the greater crime must be sufficient to prove the less.[93]

2. APPLICATIONS OF RULE — a. Affray. Upon an indictment for an affray, there may be a conviction of assault and battery,[94] if the indictment contains the allegations necessary to allow proof thereof, but not otherwise.[95]

b. Assault and Battery and Aggravated Assaults — (i) IN GENERAL. In general upon a charge of an aggravated[96] or felonious[97] assault defendant may be convicted of a simple assault, or of an assault of less degree than that charged.[98] Upon an indictment for assault and battery, there may be a conviction of simple assault.[99] On an indictment for assault upon a peace officer, there may be a conviction of simple assault.[1]

(VIII) STATUTORY SHOOTINGS, STABBINGS, AND LIKE OFFENSES. Under an indictment based on statutes which punish the shooting, cutting, stabbing, striking, or wounding of one person by another with various intents, there may as a general rule be a conviction of other included statutory assaults of minor degree or of a simple assault, or in case a battery is charged, of an assault and battery.[32]

c. Burglary. Upon a charge of burglary there may be a conviction of offenses necessarily included therein,[33] provided of course the evidence establish

32. See cases cited infra, this note. And see State v. Price, 45 La. Ann. 1430, 14 So. 250, holding that under a statute punishing shooting, stabbing, cutting, striking, or thrusting any person with a dangerous weapon with intent to commit murder while lying in wait or in the perpetration, or intent to perpetrate, any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, there may be a conviction of such shooting, etc., without the aggravation of lying in wait or of such act without the aggravation of lying in wait and of murderous intent. State v. Wilson, 39 La. Ann. 203, 1 So. 418.

Shooting.— On an indictment for shooting with intent to kill, there may be a conviction of assault and battery (Heller v. State, 23 Ohio St. 582), or of a battery (People v. Chalmers, 5 Utah 274, 15 Pac. 2), or assault (White v. State, 13 Ohio St. 569), or of shooting with intent to kill or wound (Robinson v. Com., 16 B. Mon. (Ky.) 609), or of wounding under circumstances that would have constituted manslaughter had death ensued (State v. Ryno, 68 Kan. 348, 74 Pac. 1114, 64 L. R. A. 303; State v. Hammerli, (Kan. 1899) 58 Pac. 559), or of pointing a pistol at another (Jenkins v. State, 92 Ga. 470, 17 S. E. 693). On a charge of maliciously shooting at and wounding another, there may be a conviction of shooting at another without inflicting a wound with intent to kill (Harris v. Com., 15 Ky. L. Rep. 269), and on a charge of shooting with intent to kill and murder, there may be a verdict of guilty of shooting with intent to kill (State v. Keasley, 50 La. Ann. 761, 23 So. 900; State v. Vance, 49 La. Ann. 1011, 22 So. 310). In Louisiana, however, under a charge of shooting with intent to kill, there can be no conviction of assault or of assault and battery (State v. Washington, 107 La. 298, 31 So. 638; State v. Robertson, 48 La. Ann. 1067, 20 So. 296), or of assault with a dangerous weapon (State v. Benjamin, (La. 1893) 14 So. 71; State v. Allen, 40 La. Ann. 199, 3 So. 537), or of an assault with a dangerous weapon inflicting a wound less than mayhem (State v. Parker, 42 La. Ann. 972, 8 So. 473; State v. Murdoch, 35 La. Ann. 729; State v. Pratt, 10 La. Ann. 191); but under an indictment for shooting with intent to murder while lying in wait, there may be a conviction of shooting with intent to murder (State v. Price, 45 La. Ann. 1430, 14 So. 250; State v. Evans, 40 La. Ann. 216, 3 So. 838; State v. Wilson, 39 La. Ann. 203, 1 So. 418).

Cutting and stabbing.— Upon an indictment for stabbing, the prisoner may be found guilty of an assault and battery (Ward v. State, 56 Ga. 408; Whilden v. State, 25 Ga. 396, 71 Am. Dec. 181. Contra, State v. Valentine, 6 Yerg. (Tenn.) 533), or of an assault (Sessions v. State, 115 Ga. 18, 41 S. E. 259; Montgomery v. Com., 98 Va. 840, 36 S. E. 371); and on an indictment for stabbing with intent to kill, there may be a verdict of any lower degree of the offense (Tyra v. Com., 2 Metc. (Ky.) 1). Under the Louisiana statute, however, a charge of cutting and stabbing with intent to kill and murder does not include the offense of inflicting a wound less than mayhem with a dangerous weapon (State v. Jacques, 45 La. Ann. 1451, 14 So. 213; State v. Day, 37 La. Ann. 785. See contra, State v. Gilkie, 35 La. Ann. 53), although it will sustain a conviction of an assault with a dangerous weapon (State v. De Laney, 28 La. Ann. 434), or of cutting and stabbing with intent to kill (State v. Jacques, supra). Under the Ohio statute, on an indictment for maliciously cutting with intent to kill, there can be no conviction of maliciously cutting with intent to wound. Barber v. State, 39 Ohio St. 660; Bailey v. State, 9 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 164, 11 Cinc. L. Bul. 123.

Striking.— On an indictment for striking with a deadly weapon, there may be a conviction of assault and battery in case it appears that the weapon was not deadly (Com. v. Yarnell, 68 S. W. 136, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 144); but under the Louisiana statute, a person charged with striking with intent to kill and murder cannot be convicted of assault (State v. Bellard, 50 La. Ann. 594, 23 So. 504, 69 Am. St. Rep. 461), although when charged with having lain in wait, he may be convicted of the offense without that circumstance of aggravation (State v. Price 45 La. Ann. 1430, 14 So. 250). On a charge of an assault with a slung shot with intent to kill, there can be no conviction for wounding, maiming, and disfiguring in the absence of any allegation of the infliction of an injury. State v. Melton, 102 Mo. 683, 15 S. W. 139.

Wounding.— On a charge of wounding with intent to commit murder, there may be a conviction of inflicting a wound less than mayhem with intent to kill (State v. Jessie, 30 La. Ann. 1170); and on an indictment for malicious wounding, the jury may convict of assault and battery (Parrott v. Com., 47 S. W. 452, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 761).

33. Com. v. Hurd, 109 Ky. 8, 58 S. W. 369, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 509 (holding that there might be a conviction of house-breaking); State v. Miller, 45 La. Ann. 1170, 14 So. 136; State v. Morris, 27 La. Ann. 480 (both holding that where the charge was of burglary

d. Embezzlement. Upon a charge of embezzlement there can be no conviction of a distinct offense.[40] So upon an indictment for embezzlement the accused cannot be convicted of a breach of trust.[41] It is provided in some states by statute, however, that if the evidence discloses larceny, a conviction may be had of such offense.[42]

the question of whether there may be a conviction under an indictment for homicide of an offense which does not involve a homicide, there is some conflict of authority. That there may be such a conviction is supported by the weight of authority in those jurisdictions in which the common-law rule preventing a conviction for a misdemeanor upon a charge of felony is not recognized.[44] Upon an indictment for murder in the commission of rape, there can be no conviction of rape,[45] or of abortion on an indictment charging murder in the commission of abortion.[46]

f. Larceny. Where a simple larceny committed under certain circumstances of aggravation is made a graver offense by statute, a conviction may be had of a simple larceny on a charge of the greater.[47] Of this nature are charges under statutes punishing larceny from the person,[48] or from the house or other build-

Under statutes which provide in substance that the accused may be convicted of any offense which is necessarily included in the crime charged in the indictment, it has been held that upon an indictment charging homicide there may be a conviction of assault and battery, in case the assault and battery is alleged (State v. O'Kane, 23 Kan. 244; Com. v. Drum, 19 Pick. In Pennsylvania a conviction of assault and battery is impliedly forbidden by a statute which provides that a conviction of an included cutting, stabbing, or shooting may be had upon the trial of an indictment for felony, except murder or manslaughter, and it is held to be also unjust to defendant as forbidding him an opportunity to settle the misdemeanor as provided by statute and as not giving him notice of the charge against which he is to defend. same is true of pocket-picking.[80] A charge of robbery will sustain a conviction of assault and battery,[81] or simple assault;[82] but an indictment for robbery in the usual form does not state the elements of an aggravated assault,[83] or of an assault with intent to murder.[84]

k. Offenses Including Fornication. A conviction for fornication may be had upon a charge of a graver offense in which sexual intercourse is an element, if the essential allegations of fornication are present.[85]

H. Conviction of First Offense on Charge of Second or Third. Upon an indictment charging a second or third offense, there may be a conviction of a first offense.[93]

I. Indictments of Accessaries and Principals in Second Degree. One indicted as a principal in the second degree may be convicted of a lower degree of the offense ascribed to the principal in the first degree.[94] So on a charge of aiding and abetting a murder, there may be a conviction of manslaughter.[95] An accessary before the fact to grand larceny may be convicted of petit larceny, although the latter is a misdemeanor only.[96]

J. Upon Joint Indictments. In the case of a joint indictment, a portion of defendants may be convicted of the greater offense and others of the less.[97]

K. Effect of Proof Sufficient to Establish Charge or Higher Offense. It is no defense to an indictment that the evidence shows that defendant committed a higher offense than that charged;[98] and in the absence of a statute, a conviction of a less offense may be sustained, although the evidence establishes a greater,[99] the error, if any, not being regarded as prejudicial to defendant.[1] But by statute in some states the jury is not entitled to find defendant guilty of a less degree than established by the evidence.[2]

L. Conviction of Higher Offense. As a matter of course an indictment will not support a conviction for a more serious offense than that charged.[3]

XIII. WAIVER OF DEFECTS AND OBJECTIONS.

A. In General. As a general rule, matter of abatement must be considered as waived unless urged before plea of the general issue.[4] A prisoner, however, by pleading to an indictment charging him as a principal, does not waive rights which he would have had were he charged with being an accessary.[5]

B. Particular Defects and Objections — 1. Constitution of Grand Jury. After a plea to the indictment and conviction, it is too late to object to the constitution of the grand jury.[6]

2. Finding, Filing, and Presentment. A plea to the indictment is regarded as an admission of its genuineness as a record,[7] and it is held therefore that after plea of not guilty irregularities in the filing or presentation thereof cannot be urged.[8] Nor can objections to the witnesses who appeared before the grand jury be urged.[9] But where defendant in answer to a rule to show cause why an information should not be filed objects that the presentment upon which it is founded does not state an offense, he does not waive such objection by plea.[10]

3. Indorsements, Signatures, and Verifications. The fact that an indictment is not indorsed a "true bill" is waived by pleading to the merits,[11] as are objections based upon the absence of the foreman's signature.[12] Objections to the verification of an information must be urged before going to trial or at least before verdict,[13] and in some cases have been held to be waived by giving a recognizance for appearance.[14]

5. Statement of Substance of Offense. A plea of guilty has been held to have the same effect as a verdict of guilty with regard to defective averments;[16] but if no crime is charged in the indictment or information, a plea of guilty does not prevent defendant from raising an objection on that ground.[17] Defects of substance are not cured by plea,[18] and in some jurisdictions the right to demur has been held not waived by plea of not guilty.[19]

6. Duplicity and Joinder of Offenses. An objection on the ground of duplicity is waived by going to trial without objection,[20] or by a plea of guilty;[21] and an appearance and plea of not guilty waives an objection as to misjoinder of offenses in separate counts.[22] A demurrer to an indictment admits the propriety of charging defendants jointly.[23]

7. Variance Between Warrant and Information. An objection upon the ground of variance between the offenses charged in the warrant and that set forth in the information is waived by pleading to the information.[24]

8. Amendments. By consent to an alteration in the indorsement of an indictment upon the record, defendant waives a written motion for an amendment.[25] In case defendant agrees that an accusation for simple larceny may be amended to charge larceny from a house, the agreement will be construed to permit any amendment necessary to make the accusation valid.[26] Under a statute providing that in case defendant does not consent to an amendment correcting the statement of the name of defendant, or of the description of any person, property, or matter stated in the indictment, the indictment may be dismissed and another indictment ordered to be preferred, defendant waives a defense of former jeopardy by consenting to the amendment.[27]

9. Rulings on Demurrers and Motions. A demurrer is not waived by pleading over after it is overruled.[28] A motion to quash is waived by a plea to the merits pending a decision.[29] The state, by asking leave to amend, will not be held to have waived an exception to a ruling sustaining a motion to quash in case the leave to amend was refused, although a waiver would have resulted had the amendment been granted.[30] The right of the state to final judgment where a demurrer to an indictment is overruled is waived by placing defendant upon trial.[31]

XIV. AIDER BY VERDICT.

A. General Rules. The rule as to defects which are cured by verdict is the same in criminal as in civil cases,[32] it being that where an averment necessary to support a particular part of the indictment has been imperfectly stated, a verdict cures the defect, which might have been bad on demurrer, in case it appears to the court that unless the averment were true the verdict could not be sustained.[33] Hence after verdict advantage cannot be taken of mere formal, technical, or grammatical errors in the indictment, which do not obscure the meaning to a common intent.[34] Defects in substance are not cured by verdict.[35] And some authorities in opposition to the rule above stated hold that upon a motion in arrest, every objection, either in substance or form, which might have been taken on demurrer, may be raised,[36] and that a general verdict of guilty is a finding only of the facts sufficiently pleaded.[37]

B. Defects Which Are Cured — 1. Constitution of Grand Jury. The general rule is that it is too late after a verdict to object to the competency of the grand jurors by whom the indictment was found or to the mode of summoning or impaneling them.[38] So also an objection that the grand jury was composed of a greater number than provided by law must as a rule be taken by plea in abatement and cannot be urged after verdict.[39]

2. Finding, Filing, and Presentment. Irregularities in the finding, filing, or presentation of the indictment, or filing of the information, cannot be urged for the first time after verdict.[40] In case, however, a defendant does not learn that the indictment was not presented by the grand jury until after a verdict has been entered against him, he is entitled to move to amend the record by striking from it the indictment and so much of the entry as shows that it has been duly presented by the grand jury.[41]

3. Indorsement, Signature, and Verification. A defect in the verification of an information cannot be first urged after verdict;[42] nor can a failure to properly indorse an indictment a "true bill,"[43] or to indorse upon it the names of the witnesses,[44] or the name of the prosecutor.[45]

4. Statement of Place. An imperfect statement of place may be cured by verdict,[46] as when simply the county is stated without more particular description.[47]

5. Statement of Time. A failure to state a day certain is not necessarily a fatal defect after verdict,[48] nor is the statement of an impossible day;[49] but it seems that the omission of an allegation of time which is essential to the description of the offense is not aided by verdict.[50]

6. Description of Accused. A failure to state the christian name,[51] or the degree, mystery, or residence[52] of defendant cannot be urged after verdict. The same is true of failure to rename defendant.[53]

7. Statement of Substance of Offense. A defective statement of the offense is cured by verdict;[54] but not an insufficient description of the true character of the Illustrations.— Defendant after verdict cannot urge defects in the minutes of the court as to the formal presentment of the indictment (Douglass v. State, 8 Tex. App. 520) or object that the record does not show that the grand jury was present when the indictment was returned (State v. Mann, 83 Mo. 589), or that an affidavit was not filed with the information (Schott v. State, 7 Tex. App. 616), or that the bailiff was present during the deliberations of the grand jury (State v. Kimball, 29 Iowa 267), or that a defective copy of the indictment was served upon him (Smith v. State, 40 Tex. Amended indictment.— After verdict defendant cannot object that the date when the indictment was found by the grand jury is not indicated upon the amended indictment or that no witnesses were sworn before the grand jury. De Berry v. State, 99 Tenn. 207, 42 S. W. 31.

ant guilty of one offense, and to have acquitted him of the other.[63] So where there is a misjoinder of counts, an objection cannot be raised after verdict.[64] In case, however, distinct offenses are joined, which are of different nature, it would seem that the verdict must be special and find defendant guilty of but one of the offenses charged,[65] although this distinction is not expressly made in many of the cases. In case there is a misjoinder of counts and a conviction upon one count only, there is no error.[66]

11. VARIANCE. Variance cannot as a general rule be taken advantage of after verdict,[67] although it has been held that in a proper case a judgment may be reversed where it is apparent from the record that there is a fatal variance between the charge and the proof.[68]

C. Verdict on Indictment Containing Good and Bad Counts — 1. GENERAL RULE. Where there is a general verdict on an indictment which contains good and bad counts, the finding of the jury will be referred to the good count or counts if sustained by the evidence, and the judgment of the court thereupon sustained.[69] So where an indictment for the taking and carrying away of a slave

charged in various counts the taking by different means, it was not error for the court to instruct the jury that they need not find in what way the taking was accomplished, although some of the counts were defective, where the instructions also required the finding of facts which were averred only in the good counts.[70] The presumption of law that the general verdict of guilty was responsive to the valid count may be overcome if the evidence clearly shows that the verdict is not responsive, and upon such a conviction judgment should be arrested.[71] A general verdict of guilty will not authorize separate penalties to be inflicted upon the separate counts in the indictment.[72]

counts must relate to the same transaction,[73] and that there must be no matters of aggravation alleged in the defective counts that may be supposed to have influenced the judgment and sentence.[74] So also it is said that a general verdict is uncertain where distinct offenses are charged in separate counts of both of which the party cannot be guilty and there is evidence pertaining to both counts,[75] and this rule has been extended to cases where the same offense is charged in different counts of the indictment and evidence applicable to a bad count is submitted to the jury with the other evidence,[76] although where a general verdict could not have been rendered upon proof of the bad counts only, a general verdict may be sustained.[77] A distinction must be made between verdicts which find all of the various counts and a verdict which includes one of such counts, it being uncertain which one is included.[78] In case the court's attention has been called to the bad counts by special demurrer or motion to quash and it has refused to strike them from the indictment, some cases hold that the general verdict cannot be sustained.[79] Where the jury is required to fix the punishment, a general verdict upon good and bad counts cannot be sustained, for the reason that it is impossible to tell in what manner the jury apportioned the punishment,[80] and also because the evidence on the bad counts may have aggravated the punishment imposed by the verdict.[81]

3. In Case of Special Verdict. Where a special verdict is rendered upon the good count, it is not invalidated by the fact that the indictment contains bad counts.[82] But where there is a verdict of guilty referring especially to two counts, one of which is bad, it has been held that the verdict cannot be sustained as upon the good count.[83]

XV. STATUTORY PROVISIONS FOR CURE OF DEFECTS AND OBJECTIONS.

A. In General. The early statutes of amendments and jeofails were not applicable to criminal proceedings;[85] but statutes in the various states and in England now provide the time and manner of urging certain objections to the indictment, and that if they are not so urged, they cannot afterward be raised.[86] These statutes materially alter the common-law rules of waiver,[87] and aider by verdict,[88] and where they exist the effect of any defect is controlled by their wording and the construction which the courts, often intermingling statute and common-law rules, have placed upon them. Under these statutes, objections are frequently required to be taken by demurrer[89] or motion to quash,[90] and unless so taken are held to be waived.

B. Particular Defects and Objections — 1. FORMAL OBJECTIONS. Defects in form apparent upon the face of the indictment or information cannot usually be taken advantage of after verdict,[91] especially where the amendment of such defects is provided for by statute.[92]

2. OBJECTIONS RELATING TO CONSTITUTION OF GRAND JURY. A defect in the drawing or summoning of the grand jury, when not previously urged in the manner provided by statute, cannot be taken advantage of for the first time on appeal.[93] By statute such defects are sometimes required to be urged before plea,[94] being sometimes held to be formal defects apparent upon the face of the indictment.[95]

3. FINDING, FILING, AND PRESENTMENT. As a general rule the failure of the indictment to show that it was found and presented by a grand jury having proper authority must be taken by a motion to quash or set it aside.[96] So also the want of a legal commitment as the basis of the information cannot be raised after arraignment.[97] Nor can the fact that an information was not filed within the statutory period after the preliminary examination be raised after demurrer or plea.[98] Defects of this nature which, by statute, are permitted to be amended, are usually held to be cured by verdict.[99] Under statutes providing that the venue of the proceeding shall not be changed until after all motions, special pleas, and exceptions have been filed and acted on by the court, defendant after obtaining a change of venue cannot urge that it does not appear from the record that the indictment was returned by the grand jury.[1]

4. Indorsements, Signatures, and Verifications. Under the statutes relating to the cure of formal defects, the fact that the indictment lacks the indorsement "a true bill" must usually be taken advantage of before plea,[2] as must the fact that the signature of the foreman of the grand jury is not added to such indorsement.[3] So the failure to indorse the names of the witnesses upon the indictment must be taken by motion to set it aside.[4] An objection to the verification of an information is waived by plea under statutes making a plea to the indictment a waiver of all matters which may be urged by motion to quash;[5] and the same is true with regard to an objection that the indictment or information is not properly signed by the prosecuting attorney.[6]

5. Statement of Place. As a general rule a defective statement of the place or venue cannot be taken advantage of after verdict, where it does not prejudice the substantial rights of defendant;[7] and some statutes provide that omis-

6. Statement of Time. Under an early English statute, an informality of date was cured by verdict;[9] and such statutes are commonly prevalent in the United States.[10]

7. Statement of Substance of Offense — a. In General. Statutes in many states provide that a judgment will not be interfered with for any surplusage or other defect or imperfection in the charge which does not tend to prejudice the substantial rights of defendant upon the merits.[11] Other statutes provide that it is sufficient after verdict that the crime be so set forth that a person of common understanding may know what is intended and with a degree of certainty enabling the court to pronounce the right judgment upon conviction.[12] Under other statutes all defects save that the indictment does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense or to confer jurisdiction upon the court are waived unless presented by a motion to quash or demurrer,[13] but the failure of the indictment to sufficiently describe the offense is not a formal defect within the meaning of such statutes.[14] A demurrer or plea in bar or of the general issue is by statute sometimes made a waiver of all defects which may be raised by motion to quash or plea in abatement.[15] Where an indictment, being otherwise unobjectionable, is regarded by accused as not sufficiently specific, he must seek a bill of particulars,[16] and without such demand he cannot move in arrest of judgment,[17] or urge the defect by application for a writ of habeas corpus.[18]

b. Statutory Offenses. An early English statute provided that in case the offense was one which had been defined by statute or subjected to a greater degree of punishment by statute, the indictment should be regarded as sufficient after verdict, in case it described the offense in the words of the statute;[19] and similar statutes are in effect in some of the states;[20] but they are not construed as excusing a neglect to aver descriptive facts.[21] Although an objection to an indictment might be sufficient before verdict on the ground of its insufficiency to charge a particular statutory offense, under the statutes of some states a judgment will not be reversed if any offense is charged in the indictment to which the judgment is applicable.[22]

8. Description of Accused. Under the statutes of some states, the accused on arraignment must make any objection upon the ground of misnomer which is available to him, and if he does not, he will be deemed to have waived it.[23]

9. Description of Third Persons. Under statutes which provide that the indictment or the judgment thereon shall not be affected by defects which do not prejudice the substantial rights of defendants upon the merits, an uncertainty in the description of a third person cannot as a general rule be taken advantage of after verdict.[24] The failure to state the name of a person upon whom an assault was committed has been held, however, a substantial defect within the meaning of a provision that a motion in arrest of judgment may be made upon any substantial defect in the indictment.[25]

10. Duplicity and Joinder of Offenses. Duplicity being a ground of demurrer is under the statutes of some states regarded as waived if not so taken.[26] Under a statute obviating formal objections, the objection of duplicity is cured by verdict.[27] Under a statute providing that proceedings shall not be affected by defects or imperfections in matters of form which do not tend to the prejudice of defendant, repugnant averments cannot be taken advantage of after a general verdict.[28] Under a statute requiring objections on account of formal defects

Illustration.—"Whether we consider the words 'infamous punishment' in their popular meaning, or as they are understood by the Constitution and laws, a sentence to the state prison, for any term of time, must be considered as falling within them. The convict is placed in a public place of punishment, common to the whole state, subject to solitary imprisonment, to have his hair cropped, to be clothed in conspicuous prison dress, subjected to hard labor without pay, to hard fare, coarse and meagre food, and to severe discipline. Some of these a convict in the house of correction is subject to; but the house of correction, under that and the various names of workhouse and bridewell, has not the same character of infamy attached to it. I. WHO ARE INFANTS.

A. Definition. An infant is a person who has not arrived at the age fixed by the common law or by statute as the time when a person is presumed to have reached full maturity and becomes able to exercise all the rights and powers of the citizen.[1]

B. Age of Majority — 1. IN GENERAL. At common law the age at which an infant, whether male or female, reaches full majority is fixed at twenty-one years.[2] This rule is still almost universal under statutes in the case of males;[3] but in a number of states the age of majority as to females, at least for some purposes, has been fixed at eighteen years.[4]

Mexican law.— On an issue as to how old one must be to be an adult under the laws of Mexico, a showing that the Justinian code was the basis of jurisprudence in Mexico, and that under the civil law a male person is an adult at the age of fourteen years, was not proof that such person was an adult under the laws of Mexico, since the entire body of civil law or Justinian code might not have been adopted. Colorado.— Jackson v. Allen, 4 Colo. 263.

2. When Age Deemed Attained. The rule is that the age of majority is attained on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of the person's birth, or on the corresponding day, if another age than twenty-one has been fixed by statute as that of majority.[5]

3. What Law Governs. It has been laid down that the law of the domicile of origin governs the state and condition of a person as to minority or majority, into whatever state or country he may remove;[6] but the better rule, and that supported by the great weight of authority, is that the law of the place where the contract is made or the act done governs in determining whether a party is or is not an infant.[7]

II. PRIVILEGES AND DISABILITIES.

A. Privileges — 1. Immunity From Prejudice by Lapse of Time or Laches.[8] In the absence of any positive provision of law to the contrary, an infant will not be prejudiced by lapse of time,[9] nor is laches ordinarily imputable to infants to their prejudice.[10]

2. Immunity From Estoppel.[11] It has been laid down that as a general rule the doctrine of estoppel has no application to infants;[12] but there are many cases

recognizing an exception to this rule or denying its application in case the conduct of the infant on which the estoppel is sought to be based has been intentional and fraudulent, and the infant was at the time of years of discretion.[13] It has been laid down that as an infant is not bound by an estoppel in pais he cannot claim one against an adult.[14]

B. Disabilities — 1. In General. Even the disabilities of infants are really privileges, for the object is to secure the infants from damaging themselves or their property by their own improvident acts.[15] Hence an infant cannot, on reaching majority, disaffirm acts done for others and not affecting his own property.[16] So also an infant may exercise a power as fully and effectually as an adult,[17]

Decree of emancipation.— A person who has been emancipated on his own petition by the decree of a competent court having jurisdiction over his person, correct in form, will be estopped from invoking the nullity of such judgment against third persons who have dealt with him as an emancipated minor. Allison v. Watson, 36 La. Ann. 616.

Representation as to decree of emancipation.— The fact that an infant represented to non-resident plaintiffs that his disability to contract had been removed by a decree of the judge of probate of the county where he resided, as authorized by Ala. Code (1886), § 2363, before executing the notes sued on, in another state, was not sufficient to estop him from pleading infancy as a defense to the notes. Wilkinson v. Buster, 124 Ala. 574, 26 So. 940.

Election by court of equity.— An infant cannot make an election and thus create an estoppel against himself; but a court of equity has undoubted power to elect for him and will not allow him to receive and hold the proceeds of an unauthorized sale of his property and at the same time repudiate the sale. Equitable estoppels of this character apply to infants as well as adults. Marx v. Clisby, 130 Ala. 502, 30 So. 517; Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13.

unless such power be coupled with an interest,[18] or requires the exercise of discretion.[19] The privilege of an infant to avoid his acts or contracts is personal,[20] but after his death this privilege extends to his legal personal representatives.[21]

2. APPOINTMENT OF AGENT OR ATTORNEY. An infant cannot legally appoint an agent,[22] or give a power, warrant, or letter of attorney.[23] It has been frequently asserted that such acts on the part of an infant, as well as the acts of the person attempted to be appointed agent or attorney, are absolutely void;[24] nevertheless

3. ACTING AS AGENT. It has been held, however, that an infant may be the agent of another person.[26]

4. ACTING AS TRUSTEE. An infant may be created or charged as a trustee,[27] and in such case he is as much bound to carry out the trust as if he were an adult.[28] He will not be permitted to receive the property to his own exclusive benefit and then repudiate the trust or equitable charge created by the person from whom he derived it.[29]

He has the right to receive the balance of his estate in money or notes in the hands of his tutor without the intervention of a family meeting. Withers v. His Executors, 3 La. 363. On the marriage of a female minor, her fer upon married women the power to contract generally, or even to convey their separate real estate, with or without the consent of their husbands, do not remove the disability of infancy from an infant married woman, but simply remove the disability of coverture, leaving the disability of infancy the same as if such statutes were not in force.[48] Where an infant emancipated by marriage becomes a widow before reaching the age of majority, she does not relapse into pupilage.[49]

c. Judicial Emancipation. In some states provision is made by statute for proceedings in court leading up to an order or decree removing the disabilities of a minor.[50] The power to remove such disability is usually vested in courts of chancery[51] or of probate.[52] Residence of the infant within the county where the court is held is a jurisdictional requisite.[53] Such proceedings are usually commenced by a petition[54] presented by the infant,[55] in which the guardian is sometimes required to join.[56] The petition should state the cause for the removal asked,[57]

and that the minor is capable of managing his own affairs;[58] but it has been held that a petition may be sufficient without alleging that the relief sought will be to the interest of the minor.[59] It is sometimes required that the petition shall be sworn to by some person cognizant of the facts set out therein.[60] Notice of the filing of the petition is sometimes required.[61] There should be a hearing on the petition,[62] at which it may be contested.[63] The minor's ability to manage his own affairs must be shown,[64] and if the court deems it advisable or for the best interest of the minor that his disabilities should be removed, it should so order.[65] The effect of an order or decree emancipating an infant or removing his disabilities is to invest him with all the powers and capacities and subject him to all the liabilities and obligations which he would have or be subject to if he had actually reached his majority.[66] Irregularities in the proceedings do not render the order or decree removing the infant's disabilities a nullity,[67] nor is such order or decree subject to collateral attack.[68]

Territorial effect.— Under Ala. Code (1886), § 2363, which authorizes a decree removing an infant's disability to contract, and provides that on a certified copy thereof being filed in each county in the state where such infant does business, contracts made in such counties shall be enforceable, the effect of an order removing an infant's disability is coextensive only with the limits of the counties in which a copy thereof is filed, and hence the filing of such decree in the county where the infant resides does not prevent him from pleading infancy as a defense to notes executed by him in another state during minority. St. (1899) c. 75, § 51, is in violation of the constitution in so far as it authorizes the commitment to the state industrial school of children over the age of sixteen years, who have not been convicted of crime; but it is valid and enforceable to the extent that it authorizes the commitment to such school of children under the age of sixteen who, for want of proper parental care, are growing in mendicancy or crime. When commitment proper.— Whenever it is made to appear affirmatively and clearly that a male or female child, who exhibits knowledge and capacity to commit crime, and who, authorizes the same disposition of children destitute by misfortune and of children convicted of crime,[83] and fails to provide for their separation;[84] nor is it unconstitutional as involving an improper interference with the relation of parent and child, or an arbitrary invasion of any natural and inalienable rights of parent or child.[85] Neither does the commitment of a child to such an institution, except for crime, operate as an imprisonment without due process of law in violation of the constitution.[86] The commitment must be upon one of the grounds mentioned in the statute,[87] must be based upon a showing of facts sufficient to bring the case within the statute,[88] and cannot be for a term longer than that designated.[89] The detention of the child, in case of vagrancy, is not by way of punishment, but is designed for its good and welfare.[90]

D. Societies For Care and Protection of Children. At the present time there are many corporations or societies organized for the purpose of caring for poor or neglected children,[91] to which such children may be committed.[92] The

if a male, is within the age of twenty-one, and, if a female, within the age of eighteen, has been guilty of vagrancy, he or she may be lawfully committed by an alderman or a justice of the peace to the house of refuge, and to the care and custody of its managers. rights and powers of these organizations vary considerably according to their charters or the general statutes governing them.[93]

E. Proceedings Affecting Custody — 1. Nature. A proceeding for the commitment of a destitute or vagrant child to an institution is not a criminal proceeding.[94]

2. Petition or Complaint. The petition or complaint must show the case to be within the statute,[95] and should be verified.[96]

3. Notice. Proceedings for the commitment of juvenile delinquents or vagrants are often required to be upon notice to the parent or parents,[97] guardian,[98] or custodian[99] of the child, or some public officer or board.[1]

4. Trial or Hearing. The statutes usually provide, or at least contemplate, that the parents, guardians, or custodians of the child shall have an opportunity to be heard on the question of the commitment.[2] When the proceeding is before

Constitutionality of statute.— N. D. a magistrate, the evidence taken must be reduced to writing.[3] It has been held that a minor cannot be committed to an institution as a criminal without a trial by jury.[4]

5. Evidence. The evidence must show that the child sought to be committed is in such a condition or such circumstances as to be within the purview of the statute.[5]

6. Commitment.[6] The commitment must set out the jurisdictional facts,[7] and show that the case is within the statute.[8] It is sometimes required that the commitment shall show that those to whom notice is required had such notice,[9] and were present at the examination, hearing, or trial.[10] Where the term of detention is fixed by law it need not be specified in the commitment.[11] It has been held that even if an order of commitment might be subject to criticism, as fixing the period of detention for a designated time, the commitment would not be void, but would hold good, the period of detention being left open to be met by further contingencies.[12] In New York the commitment has been held to have all the force and effect of a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction,[13] but in other states it has been held otherwise.[14]

F. Restoration of Child to Parents. An adjudication committing a child to an institution because of the neglect or failure of the parent to provide for it does not deprive the parent of his right to the custody of the child if he subsequently becomes competent and willing to properly care for it,[15] and in such case

A "business or vocation" to be within the purview of N. Y. Laws (1876), c. 122, "to prevent and punish wrongs to children," must be an employment either vicious in itself or one which partakes of the character of an amusement. The statute has no application to productive industries, or useful and necessary businesses or occupations, and hence does not apply to employment in a laundry.

fied,[30] or in occupations which are, or are liable to prove, injurious to morals.[31] Such statutes are applicable to corporations as well as to natural persons.[32] The offense is complete if the employer knew or by the exercise of reasonable diligence should have known that the child was under the specified age,[33] and it is no defense that he acted in good faith on the statement of the child and an affidavit of its father that it was above such age.[34]

I. Cruelty to Children.[35] In many jurisdictions statutes have been enacted for the prevention and punishment of cruelty to children.[36] Thus the statutes provide for the punishment of any one who wilfully causes the endangering of the life or injuring of the health of a child in his care or custody,[37] or exposes it

Indictment.— Where the neglect of the accused has continued and extended over a long period of time, it is proper to charge in the indictment that the offense was committed on a particular day subsequent to the time when the consequences of the neglect were developed, since it is the result of the several acts that the statute is designed to

to the inclemency of the weather.[38] So also the statutes sometimes provide for the punishment of any person who wilfully omits,[39] without lawful excuse,[40] to perform a duty by law imposed upon him[41] to furnish food,[42] clothing,[43] shelter,[44] or medical attendance[45] to a minor. These statutes being penal in their nature are, according to the well established rule of construction, to be strictly construed.[46]

Necessity for attendance.— The question whether a person, by refusing to furnish medical attendance for a minor, has been guilty of a misdemeanor under N. Y. Pen. Code, § 288, is to be determined by the fact whether an ordinarily prudent person, solicitous for the welfare of the child, would deem it necessary to call in the services of a physician. Constitutionality of statute.— The constitutional guaranty of the full and free enjoyment of religious profession and worship is not violated by a statute making it a penal offense to refuse to provide "medical attendance" to a minor, such medical attendance being construed not to include that of a layman who, because of his religious beliefs that prayer for divine aid is the proper remedy for sickness, neglects to furnish proper medical attendance to a minor child. Authorizing person to receive property.— In cases of intestacy, or where there is no

vided by law.[48] One who is tenant in common with infants is liable to them for their proportion of the rents derived from the common property as if they were of age,[49] while on the other hand, the right of cotenants to compel contribution in equity for protecting the common title may be enforced as well against infants as against adults.[50] Infants holding an equity in land, when the legal title thereto is acquired by an innocent purchaser, are in no better condition than they would have been if they were adults.[51] Infants are not regarded as capable of managing their property,[52] or of determining whether a change from one kind of property to another is for their interest;[53] and hence the general rule, both in England and in the United States, has been, in dealing with the property of infants, to impress it during the infants' minority with its original character, whatever change may have actually occurred.[54]

2. Payment of Legacy to Infant.[55] An infant legatee or distributee may receipt for his legacy or distributive share,[56] but a receipt in full executed by him will not preclude him from showing that more was due than he received;[57] although he must account for what he did receive.[58] A different rule would, however, prevail, if it were shown that the executor or administrator knew of the minority.[59]

3. Adverse Possession Against Infant. In Georgia prescription does not run against the rights of a minor during infancy;[60] but he is entitled to assert his title within the prescribed period after he has attained majority.[61] In North Carolina, however, the rule is different.[62]

4. Enforcement of Vendor's Lien. A proceeding against land to enforce a lien reserved upon the face of a deed thereto for the purchase-money has been held to be a proceeding in rem not affected by the infancy of one of the grantees at the time the deed and a bond for the purchase-money were executed.[63]

5. Intermeddling With Estates of Infants. A person who intermeddles with the property of an infant will be treated in equity as a trustee for the infant,[64]

B. Acquisition of Property[66] — 1. By Purchase. An infant may be a grantee in a conveyance of land,[67] and the estate conveyed vests in him, subject only to be divested in case he disagrees to the conveyance when of full age,[68] which he has power to do.[69] When a deed clearly beneficial to an infant is given to him, his acceptance of the same will be presumed.[70] A purchase of personalty by an infant is also voidable at his option,[71] but the adult seller cannot avoid the transaction.[72]

Conversion — credits. — Where defendant was concerned in the conversion by an attorney of his infant client's personalty, he is entitled to credit for such part only of payments made by the attorney to the infant and spent by her during her infancy as the attorney would have a right to be credited with had he been the general guardian of the infant — that is, such sums as were reasonably necessary for the infant under all the circumstances. Delivery of the deed is necessary (Foster v. Mitchell, 15 Ala. 571), but an infant may assent to a deed delivered to a third person for the benefit of the infant, so as to vest the estate (Tate v. Tate, 21 N. C. 22), or delivery of a deed executed in behalf of an infant to a witness of the deed, for the benefit of the infant, may operate as a delivery to the infant (Watson v. Myers, 73 Ga. 138).

Destruction of deed. — A deed of land was made to plaintiff, an infant, and delivered to his father to keep for him. Under an arrangement afterward made between the grantor and the father for the benefit of the latter, the deed was destroyed without having been registered, and the grantor made another deed to defendant. The consideration for the deed to plaintiff was a promise made by his relatives to pay the purchase-money. It was held that plaintiff, being incapable of assenting to the destruction of the deed, was entitled to be restored to the position occupied by him before the destruction of the deed, unless defendant should show himself to be a purchaser for value without notice. 3. By Lease. A lease to an infant, while voidable at his election,[75] is not void,[76] and it is not for third persons to set up the defense of infancy.[77]

4. By Gift. An infant is capable of being a donee of property.[78] In the case of a gift to an infant no formal acceptance is necessary,[79] but if the gift is for his advantage the law accepts it for him, and will hold the donor bound,[80] while if the gift is not for the infant's advantage, the law will repudiate it at his instance, even though he may in terms have accepted it.[81]

and the fact that the infant has received the consideration on an invalid sale does not preclude him from recovering back the land.[85]

b. Property Held in Trust. One who takes and holds the legal title to land in trust can convey or mortgage the same in execution of that trust, and cannot disaffirm or avoid his deed or mortgage on the ground of his minority, since the execution of the trust was a duty which a court of equity would have compelled him to perform notwithstanding his infancy.[86] So also an infant trustee may be directed by order or decree of court to make a conveyance,[87] and a conveyance made by the infant trustee pursuant to such a decree is good until the decree is reversed and the conveyance avoided.[88]

2. Conveyances — a. In General. A deed of an infant purporting to convey real property operates to transmit the title,[89] although it is voidable at the election of the infant.[90] It is well established, however, that such a deed is voidable

An infant feme covert cannot bind herself by any deed or contract, either at law or in equity, except under the sanction of the court of chancery, or in cases provided for by statute. Sanford v. McLean, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 117, 23 Am. Dec. 773.

Under the Spanish law the written assent of the curator and the authority of the judge were necessary to a valid alienation of the real estate of the minor; but if there was no curator and the minor was more than fourteen years of age, the sale was valid without such assent, provided there was no lesion, and the judge's authority was obtained. Means v. Robinson, 7 Tex. 502.

Consent to sale by supposed husband.— A sale of property by one who was supposed to be a woman's husband, but who was not, by reason of a prior existing marriage, is not binding on the woman, although made with her consent, if at the time the sale was made and at the time she consented thereto, she was not twenty-one years old. although an infant is bound by his equal partition if he might have been compelled by law to make it.[19]

9. Marriage Settlements. An infant female may settle her personalty at marriage, for such settlement cannot be to her prejudice but must be to her advantage if it secures anything to her or her issue, since without the settlement the whole would go to the husband absolutely on her marriage;[20] but the weight of authority seems to support the view that she cannot bind herself by a settlement of her real estate on marriage,[21] although such a settlement is usually considered to be voidable only and not void.[22] It has been held that an infant husband may disaffirm an antenuptial settlement with his intended wife so far as he is personally concerned, notwithstanding the subsequent marriage.[23]

10. Gifts. An infant cannot bind himself by a gift of his property,[24] even though accompanied by a manual delivery;[25] but such a gift may be revoked or avoided by the infant,[26] or his personal representative,[27] although it is not void.[28]

11. Creation of Trusts. An infant may make over property upon trust by any act of assurance, and it is not void, but voidable only, and the estate of the trustee will remain good until the assurance be avoided.[29]

by or to an infant being voidable only, needs no positive confirmation but stands good until impeached by a proper party. In the first instance confirmation has no proper application to it, but when there is an effort to avoid the act it becomes important to inquire whether there has been a confirmation, for if so, the matter has passed beyond the control of the party and is no longer voidable.[46]

4. What Constitutes Ratification — a. In General.[47] There are three modes of affirming the voidable conveyances, mortgages, etc., of infants: (1) By express ratification;[48] (2) by the performance of acts from which an affirmance may reasonably be implied;[49] and, according to some authorities (3) by the omission to disaffirm within a reasonable time.[50] Excluding for the present a discussion of the third method, which will be treated later,[51] it may be laid down that if an express ratification is relied on, it must appear that the act of confirmation was direct and deliberate and done with the full knowledge that it was to have that effect,[52] while if an implied confirmation is relied on, this must appear from facts and circumstances tending to prove a recognition of the deed, mortgage, etc., and inconsistent with the idea of any intention to avoid it.[53] In order to constitute a ratification of a conveyance, mortgage, etc., executed by an infant during his minority, there must be some positive and clear act performed for the purpose of ratification,[54] with a full knowledge of its consequences,[55] and an intent to ratify[56] what is known to be voidable.[57] It is not necessary, however, that there should be a deed or other instrument of ratification,[58] or that there should be a reacknowledgment of the instrument executed during infancy;[59] but any act by which the infant after becoming of age assents to or recognizes as valid his act performed

b. Acquiescence or Failure to Disaffirm.[77] It has been frequently laid down that the mere acquiescence of the late infant in his deed, mortgage, etc., or his failure to disaffirm the same[78] within a reasonable time after attaining his majority,[79] with full knowledge of his privilege of avoidance,[80] may fairly be regarded as equivalent to an act of affirmance amounting in law and in fact to a ratificadeed proclaiming his mother as the true and only owner of the land; (2) by his continued use of it as her property, held for his benefit; (3) by never offering an avoidance or rescission and striving repeatedly to sell to some other person; (4) by selling to the son of the original vendor for an amount considerably less than he had declared to be the minimum for which the vendor could have it back; and (5) by suing for damages for an alleged fraud and therefore waiving an avoidance on the plea of infancy.

d. Written Instruments Showing Ratification. The ratification may be by a written instrument,[92] which expressly or by necessary implication recognizes as valid the act done during infancy.[93] Where one who has conveyed land while an infant executes, after his arrival at majority, a second deed for the same land to the same grantee, this operates as a ratification of the first deed.[94] So also a deed, mortgage, or other similar instrument executed by an infant is ratified where, after attaining his majority, he reacknowledges[95] or redelivers the same.[96] The execution by an adult of a will directing that all his just debts be paid has been held a ratification of a mortgage executed by him during infancy.[97]

5. Effect of Ratification.[98] A ratification by the late infant gives to the transaction the same validity as though he had been of full age at the time.[99]

Taking new lease.— In the case of a lease by an infant, the taking of a new lease for another year of the same land after the expiration of the old one would not come within the influence of this principle. Flexner v. Dickerson, 72 Ala. 318.

Retaining proceeds of land purchased and resold during infancy.— The retention by a person, after he has reached the age of twenty-one, of the proceeds of land which had been purchased and sold by him while an infant, is not an act in affirmance of the contract so as to render him liable upon his covenant to pay a mortgage to which the lands were subject at the time of his purchase, and which by the deed he had agreed to pay as part of the consideration. Walsh v. Powers, 43 N. Y. 23, 3 Am. Rep. 654.

Retention not sufficient to constitute ratification.— Where plaintiff, on attaining her majority, promptly notified the vendor of her election to rescind an unauthorized purchase made for her by her guardian, and offered to reconvey on repayment of her money advanced, and within three months brought an action for that purpose, her retention of the property in the meantime was not a ratification of the purchase. Scott v. Scott, 29 S. C. 414, 7 S. E. 811.

Affirmance by married woman.— Where a married woman during her minority executes a mortgage on land, she cannot affirm the mortgage, after she attains her majority and during her coverture, by an instrument not executed in the manner provided by statute for the conveyance of land by married women. Walton v. Gaines, 94 Tenn. 420, 29 S. W. 458.

93. See Watkins v. Wassell, 15 Ark. 73 (holding that where a minor executes a deed of conveyance of realty, and on arriving at age, jointly with his grantee executes a deed of mortgage to secure a debt of the grantee, such act is an affirmance of the conveyance); Story v. Johnson, 5 L. J. Exch. 9, 2 Y. & C. Exch. 586.

Illustrations.— An infant who has mortgaged his property ratifies the mortgage where, after reaching his majority, he conveys the property subject to the mortgage (Losey v. Bond, 94 Ind. 67; Boston Bank v. Chamberlin, 15 Mass. 220; Allen v. Poole, 54 Miss. 323), or executes another mortgage on the land reciting that the mortgage given during minority is a prior lien (Ward v. Anderson, 111 N. C. 115, 15 S. E. 933).

Where a deed executed after reaching majority refers to a deed made while an infant and recites a design to confirm the agreement witnessed by the first deed, it is a ratification. Phillips v. Green, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 344.

A deed of assignment of the property, executed by the infant, with the others interested, several months after becoming of age, is sufficient. Keller v. Cooper, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 188.

A deed by a married woman, not properly executed, and with no probate, or privy examination taken, is no ratification of a prior deed executed by her while a minor. Gaskins v. Allen, 137 N. C. 426, 49 S. E. 919.

Evidence as to time of signing deed.— In an action to set aside a sale of land made by plaintiff, while a minor, to her guardian, the testimony of defendant that plaintiff ratified the deed after coming of age, by then for the first time signing it, is insufficient, in the face of the certificate of the clerk of the court that the deed was signed, acknowledged, and recorded while plaintiff was still an infant, to prove a ratification. Outland v. Vance, 34 S. W. 22, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1226.

The ratification relates back to the time of the original conveyance or other transaction;[1] but it is the ratification which is the effective act and which rescues the deed from its liability at any moment to be made a nullity,[2] and a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration of land conveyed by an infant during his minority will hold the land as against a ratification by the grantor of which the subsequent purchaser had neither actual nor constructive notice.[3]

Fraud.— A court of equity will not refuse to allow an infant to avail himself of his infancy to set aside his grant or covenant, on the ground that his doing so is a fraud, unless the grantee or covenantee has been misled by some actual misrepresentation or concealment. Seabrook v. Gregg, 2 S. C. 68.

Avoidance after assignment for benefit of creditors.— An infant whose estate was assigned under the Massachusetts insolvent law of 1838 could not revoke a transfer of property previously made by him in payment of his wife's debts contracted before marriage, so as to vest that property in his assignee. Butler v. Breck, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 164, 39 Am. Dec. 768.

A post-nuptial judicial settlement of the proceeds of the sale of property of an infant married woman, which property was in the custody of the court, or an order in such proceedings directing a conveyance to her guardian of property purchased with such proceeds, cannot be disaffirmed by the married woman by her mere act upon attaining her majority. Brown v. Wadsworth, 168 N. Y. 225, 61 N. E. 250.

A special act of the legislature empowering an infant to sell her real estate provided she invested the proceeds in a note secured by mortgage did not deprive her or her administrator, she having died during infancy, of the right to avoid her act in parting with the note so obtained to the maker before it fell due in consideration of a payment of it by him. of the other party,[6] unless in making the same the infant merely did, without suit, what the law would have compelled him to do if suit had been brought for that purpose,[7] or unless he has after his majority ratified the same.[8] It is not necessary to entitle one who has conveyed land while an infant to disaffirm that he should be in a position to recover possession of the land.[9]

b. Conveyance, Etc., Jointly With Person Not Under Disability.[10] Where an infant and an adult who have estates or interests in the same land join in a conveyance thereof, the infant still has the right to disaffirm as to his interest;[11] but a transaction involving the title to property is not rendered voidable as to the adult parties thereto by the fact that an infant is also a party.[12]

c. Who May Avoid.[13] The right to avoid a deed, mortgage, etc., made by an infant rests primarily in the infant himself,[14] and is a privilege personal to him,[15] and not assignable for the purpose of avoiding the transaction,[16] nor capable of being exercised by third persons for the purpose of setting aside a title claimed under the infant.[17] But while it has been held that the privilege cannot be

Acts, etc., not amounting to estoppel.— Where a minor, supposing himself to be of age, made a conveyance which he subsequently, after coming of age, sued to be set aside for fraud, the fact that he alleged in his petition that he was of age when he executed the deed does not estop him from afterward disaffirming the deed because he was a minor when he executed it. Ridgeway v. Herbert, 150 Mo. 606, 51 S. W. 1040, 73 Am. St. Rep. 464. Mere lapse of time may estop the heirs of a grantor from setting up the infancy of their ancestor at the time of the conveyance in omission on his part since his majority which was prejudicial to the person in possession of the granted premises must be shown in order to work an estoppel.[26]

(II) False Representation as to Age.[27] It has been frequently laid down that the fact that an infant, at the time of executing a deed, mortgage, or other instrument affecting his realty, falsely represented himself to be of age and thereby deceived the person with whom he dealt, does not estop him from disaffirming his act upon his arrival at majority.[28] But on the other hand there are a number of cases holding that such misrepresentation will create an estoppel,[29] especially if the situation and appearance of the alleged infant at the time of the execution of the deed were such as tended to corroborate the statement as to his being of full age.[30] Mere failure to give notice of the fact of infancy, without any representations upon the subject or any intent to defraud, has been held insufficient to create an estoppel, although the infant appeared to be of age and was believed by the other party to be so.[31]

2. Time For Avoidance — a. Before or After Majority — (i) Transactions as to Realty. The time for avoidance, by an infant, of sales, mortgages, or other transactions affecting realty is after his arrival at majority.[33] Prior to that time he cannot avoid his act,[34] although according to some authorities he may, even during infancy, enter and take the profits of the land,[35] or avoid his conveyance so far as to be enabled to recover the income of the estate conveyed.[36]

(ii) Transactions as to Personalty.[37] As to transactions by an infant in relation to personal property, the disaffirmance may be effected as well before as after majority.[38]

married women may be barred by estoppels in pais, the time for disaffirmance runs from majority notwithstanding coverture.[51] Where an infant feme sole has conveyed her property, her marriage shortly after attaining majority does not extend the time for avoidance of the deed.[52]

3. NECESSITY FOR ACTS OF AVOIDANCE.[53] The deed, mortgage, etc., of an infant being voidable only and not void, holds good until some act has been done by the infant to avoid it.[54]

4. WHAT CONSTITUTES AVOIDANCE[55] — a. In General. It is for an infant desiring to avoid his deed, mortgage, etc., to signify his desire, not only by refraining from any act of affirmance, but by performing some positive act of disaffirmance,[56] which is of such a character as to clearly show his intention not to be bound by his act.[57] It is not necessary that the disaffirmance of a conveyance, etc., made by an infant should be by an act or instrument of equal solemnity with the one sought to be avoided,[58] or even that the disaffirmance should be in writing;[59] but any act on the part of the late infant done with the intent to disaffirm,[60] which shows to the world that he does not intend to be bound, and is inconsistent with the continued validity of the conveyance, etc., is sufficient.[61]

b. Disaffirmance by Written Instrument. A conveyance, etc., made by an infant is disaffirmed by his execution, after majority, of an instrument under seal revoking and annulling the same,[62] or by his writing a letter to the purchaser stating his intention of repudiating the sale.[63]

c. Bringing or Defending Suit. The institution of a suit to set aside a deed is an avoidance of it.[64] The weight of authority supports the rule that where one, after reaching majority, brings suit to recover possession of land which he has conveyed during infancy, this is a sufficient disaffirmance;[65] but there is also authority for the view that some previous act of disaffirmance is necessary to authorize the bringing of a suit for possession of the land.[66] A suit by the late infant to recover the money paid by him on a contract for the purchase of land is an act of avoidance.[67] Setting up the defense of infancy in a suit by the other party to enforce his rights under the deed, etc., is also a sufficient avoidance.[68]

d. Reentry or Reclaiming Property. An entry by the late infant upon real estate conveyed by him or his reclaiming the property sold shows his disaffirmance.[69]

Conveyance by heirs of infant grantor a disaffirmance.— Searcy v. Hunter, 81 Tex. 644, 17 S. W. 372, 26 Am. St. Rep. 837.

A contract of sale entered into with a third person after reaching majority and the execution of a bond for title is an avoidance of a sale of the same land made during infancy; and if the first vendee, with knowledge of such contract, obtains the legal title from the original vendor, he takes it subject to a trust for the second vendee. Mustard v. Wohlford, 15 Gratt. (Va.) 329, 76 Am. Dec. 209. Conversely a contract of sale made during infancy is disaffirmed by a conveyance after majority to another person. Cook v. Bronaugh, 13 Ark. 183.

The purchaser from the late infant acquires a good title (Ison v. Cornett, 75 S. W. 204, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 366; White v. Flora, 2 Overt. (Tenn.) 426; Nettleton v. Morrison, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,127, 5 Dill. 503), although he had knowledge of the prior conveyance (Ison v. Cornett, supra; Nettleton v. Morrison, supra), and is entitled to a decree quieting his title, without restoring the consideration for the voidable conveyance (Nettleton v. Morrison, supra).

Where it was not intended to include the land formerly conveyed in the conveyance executed after majority, and the former conveyance has been reacknowledged after majority, there is no disaffirmance. Blair v. Whitaker, 31 Ind. App. 664, 69 N. E. 182.

of an absolute conveyance or warranty deed containing no reference to a mortgage executed during infancy is a disaffirmance of the mortgage,[74] although a mere quitclaim deed will not have this effect;[75] and it seems that a mortgage up to the full value of the property executed after majority may avoid a prior mortgage executed while an infant.[76] In order, however, that the subsequent conveyance or mortgage shall operate as a disaffirmance of the former act, it must be inconsistent therewith; if both can properly stand together there is no disaffirmance.[77]

(II) Necessity For Entry by Late Infant. It has been held that an infant's conveyance of land may be disaffirmed on his attaining majority without entry by conveying the land to another person.[78] But on the other hand it has been laid down that while a deed executed by an infant may be avoided by another deed made to a third person, without entry by the infant when he arrives at age, in case the land continues in the possession of the infant[79] or is vacant and uncultivated,[80] a second deed executed by the infant after arriving at full age, while the land is held adversely to him under the first, and without an entry by him for the purpose of avoiding the first conveyance will not amount to a revocation thereof.[81]

5. Return of Property or Consideration.[82] If an infant, upon his arrival at majority, still has the property or consideration received by him, or any part thereof, he must, upon the avoidance of his act, restore such property or consideration;[83] but if, during infancy, he has disposed of the property received or General offer to repay sufficient.— Graves v. Hickman, 59 Tex. 381.

The late infant need not tender anything which he may have acquired or received in the transaction which he seeks to disaffirm in order to exercise the right of avoidance; but by exercising the right he subjects himself to liability to account for what he has received and has in his possession when he reaches majority. An offer in writing to return the property is, in the absence of acceptance, equivalent to an actual tender. Beickler v. Guenther, 121 Iowa 419, 96 N. W. 895.

An attempt to repudiate an executor's sale of real estate in which an infant is interested is within the rule. Brandon v. Brown, 106 Ill. 519.

Conveyance pursuant to judgment.—Where lands have been conveyed to a minor by order of a void or erroneous judgment, he may, upon arriving at the age of majority, cause such judgment to be reversed without first offering to reconvey the lands; but he must tender reconveyance before recovering the property in lieu of which the lands were conveyed to him. Roberts v. Roberts, 61 Ohio St. 96, 55 N. E. 411.

Tender to purchaser from vendee.— Where an infant, after selling a horse, elects to reavoidance.[84] The same rule applies where the transaction is sought to be scind the sale, and tenders to the purchaser the price received, he may recover the horse, or its value, from a third person to whom it had been sold without tendering the price received to such person, and although the latter was a bona fide purchaser. Downing v. Stone, 47 Mo. App. 144.

That the consideration has changed its form is immaterial if it is still in the possession of the infant. Utermehle v. McGreal, 1 App. Cas. (D. C.) 359.

Indiana statutes. — Under Ind. Rev. St. (1894) § 3364, an infant feme covert who has sold her lands by a conveyance in which her husband joined, he being of full age, cannot disaffirm without restoring the consideration. Blair v. Whittaker, 31 Ind. App. 664, 69 N. E. 182. This statute applies to mortgages as well as conveyances, but does not prevent the wife's disaffirming the note secured by the mortgage and thus escaping personal liability. U. S. Sav. Fund, etc., Co. v. Harris, 142 Ind. 226, 40 N. E. 1072, 41 N. E. 451. The statute is not applicable where the infant feme covert has received no consideration (Shroyer v. Pittenger, 31 Ind. App. 158, 67 N. E. 475), nor where the husband was an infant at the time of the conveyance (see Gillenwaters v. Campbell, 142 Ind. 529, 41 N. E. 1041). Under Ind. Rev. St. (1894) § 3365, an infant cannot disaffirm his conveyance without restoring the consideration if, at the time, he falsely represented himself to be of age and the purchaser relied upon such representation and had good cause to believe it to be true. In order to bring a case within this statute there must have been a false representation by the infant as to his age (Gillenwaters v. Campbell, supra), and one who has dealt with minors in relation to real property, with full knowledge of their incapacity, cannot insist upon a restoration of the consideration as a condition precedent to their right to disaffirm (Shaul v. Rinker, 139 Ind. 163, 38 N. E. 593).

avoided, not by the late infant himself, but by some other person claiming in his right.[85]

6. Effect of Avoidance[86] — a. In General. The effect of the disaffirmance of a deed, mortgage, etc., executed by an infant is to render the same void ab initio by relation,[87] and in case of a conveyance, possession of the property may be recovered by the late infant.[88] After disaffirmance by the late infant, all persons may take advantage thereof and treat the deed or mortgage as null.[89]

b. Rents and Profits. The late infant is entitled to charge the purchaser under the deed which has been avoided with rents and profits for the whole time during which he was in possession of the property claiming under such deed.[90]

So also a married woman who joined with her husband in a conveyance of his lands in order to release her dower may disaffirm without refunding any portion of the purchase-money which her husband received. Where property purchased with proceeds in infant's possession.— Where an infant sold his land in consideration of cash paid to his father, and the latter purchased a piano for the infant, he, on coming of age, need not return the piano in order to disaffirm the contract. Englehart v. Troxell, 40 Nebr. 195, 58 N. W. 852, 43 Am. St. Rep. 665, 26 L. R. A. 177.

The rents are not a lien on the purchaser's remaining interest in the land where all of the grantors were not infants, and he is therefore a cotenant with the infants who have disaffirmed. French v. McAndrew, 61 Miss. 187.

Credit for lien paid off.— On the disaffirmance of a conveyance of land on the ground of the grantor's minority, the purchaser who has paid off a judgment lien on the land as a part of the purchase-price is entitled to credit therefor in his accounting for the rents

c. Improvements and Expenditures by Purchaser. The purchaser from an infant whose deed has been avoided is entitled to be allowed for improvements placed by him upon the property [91] by setting off the same against the rents and profits,[92] but it has been held that the late infant cannot be required to compensate him for improvements exceeding the rental value.[93] Where the deed of several grantors is avoided only as to those who were infants, they are not entitled to the benefit of improvements made by the grantee.[94]

d. Waste. The purchaser may be charged with the value of timber cut by him while in possession.[95]

e. Disaffirmance of Contract of Purchase. When an infant disaffirms his contract of purchase on becoming of age, it ceases to exist for the benefit of either party and is rendered void ab initio,[96] and the other party is reinvested with a right to whatever he has parted with under the contract and may sue to recover it.[97] But the disaffirmance does not ipso facto retransfer the legal title to the land to the vendor so as to enable him to recover the land in ejectment.[98] If the infant has been in possession he is liable for rents.[99] On the avoidance of a contract for the purchase of personalty the infant may recover back what he has paid on account,[1] and is not liable for the use of the property,[2] and is liable only in tort, if at all, for damages to the property while in his possession.[3]

7. Withdrawal of Avoidance. Where the late infant has unequivocally disaffirmed and elected to avoid the transaction, he cannot subsequently withdraw or rescind the avoidance and insist upon having the transaction stand.[4]

F. Jurisdiction and Powers of Courts — 1. In General. Courts of equity exercise a broad, comprehensive, and plenary jurisdiction over the property of infants,[5] and as soon as any proceeding affecting an infant's property is instituted, of the land. French v. McAndrew, 61 Miss. 187.

course be exercised only in the cases, under the circumstances, and in the manner provided for.[19] It has been held that such statutes are to be strictly construed,[20] but on the other hand it has also been asserted that such statutes are eminently remedial in their nature and should receive a liberal construction so as to advance the remedy and promote the policy of the legislature.[21]

b. Purposes For Which Sale, Etc., Authorized. Where a sale or mortgage is sought under statutory authority, the court can order the same only for the purpose for which it is authorized by the statute.[22] It is usually provided, or at least contemplated in the statutes and considered necessary in the exercise of the inherent jurisdiction of equity, that there shall be some special and substantial benefit accruing to the infant by a sale in order that it may be authorized,[23] and support and education,[30] and his personal estate is insufficient for this purpose.[31] Property of infants may be mortgaged to pay for necessary repairs,[32] or unproductive lands may be sold to raise amounts to discharge encumbrances on productive property.[33] It has been held that a court of chancery may sell the realty of an infant for the purpose of removing the proceeds to another state where the infant permanently resides.[34] Land descended to infants is subject to be sold for the payment of the debts of the ancestor,[35] and lands of which infants are part owners may be sold for partition.[36]

c. What Property May Be Sold. The inherent power of a court of equity to order a sale or mortgage of the property of an infant, where such power is held to exist, extends to both the legal and equitable estates of the infant.[37] Where the statutes provide for a sale by the court of property of a particular character or of particular estates in land only, it must appear that the property or estate is of the character designated;[38] but under a statute authorizing generally the sale of real estate of infants, the court may order the sale of any interests of an infant in such estate, whatever may be the character of that interest, whether legal or equitable, vested or contingent, in common with others or separate, or in whatever manner it may be held, whether by descent, devise, or by contract.[39] Under some statutes real property or an interest therein cannot be sold, mortgaged, or leased contrary to the provisions of a will by which it was devised, or a conveyance or other instrument by which it was transferred to the infant.[40]

d. Consent of Infant or Guardian. Under some statutes the consent of the infant or his guardian is necessary to authorize the court to order a sale of the infant's realty.[41]

Under Md. St. (1868) c. 273, a bill for the sale of an infant's property should be filed in the name of the infant by his next friend, and not by the guardian in his own name as guardian of the infant; but the fact that the petition was filed by the guardian in his own name is not such an irregularity as would necessarily defeat the jurisdiction of the court. infant should join in the petition.[47] It is sometimes required that the infant shall be made a party to a proceeding to sell or mortgage his real estate,[48] and that there should be an appearance for him by guardian ad litem appointed by the court.[49] There is no authority for uniting in a suit to sell an infant's interest in land, persons who claim a legal title adverse to the infant's, and compelling them to litigate that claim and pronouncing upon it in such suit.[50]

(III) Process. Where a proceeding in equity to sell lands was for the benefit of infant owners, it will not be invalid because the infants were not cited and brought into court.[51]

(IV) Petition or Other Application. The application to sell an infant's property should ordinarily be by petition,[52] which should fully state all the facts or circumstances rendering the sale or other disposition of the infant's property necessary,[53] and all the matters which the statute requires to be set forth.[54] A petition embracing substantially all that is required by the statute is sufficient,[55] and where the facts necessary to give jurisdiction of an infant's land under the statute are proved, the infelicitous presentation of them in the petition is not sufficient to affect the validity of the proceedings.[56] The petition may, in the dis-

Statement that sale asked to avoid partition.— A petition to sell the undivided interest of an infant in land, which states that the executors of the infant's ancestor are about to sell the interest of the other tenants under a power in the will, and that the purchasers will no doubt be strangers to the infant, and apt to disregard in great measure her undivided interest, and might bring partition against her, sufficiently alleges that the application is made to avoid a partition by the cotenants, within N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2350, providing that where such allegation is made, the particulars concerning the real and personal estate of the infant, her income, and the debts against her estate need not be stated. (v) TRIAL OR HEARING. Under some statutes the court may proceed in a summary manner to inquire into the merits of the application.[59] Before the court will authorize a sale or other disposition of an infant's estate, it must be satisfied from the facts before it of the necessity and propriety of the measure,[60] and it must be proved to the satisfaction of the court that the sale will be for the benefit of the infant.[61] A sale should not be authorized until all liens against the land for taxes or otherwise are ascertained and determined so that a fair sale may be had and a clear title secured to the purchaser.[62] There is no prerequisite in the Virginia statute requiring that the will under which infants hold land shall be construed before a sale is ordered.[63] In Georgia a decree for the sale of real estate devised to minors may be made during term-time as well as in vacation, all parties, including the guardian ad litem of the minors, consenting.[64]

Code, § 2616, appeared. Lancaster v. Barton, 92 Va. 615, 24 S. sale,[66] and whether the interest of the infant requires it.[67] An order for the sale of an infant's realty will not be granted unless the report of the master complies with the rules of the court in all the particulars required to be reported,[68] and where a reference is required by statute, such a report as the statute requires is necessary to give the court jurisdiction to order the sale.[69] Upon a reference to examine and report whether the interest of infants requires and will be promoted by a sale of their lands, the master must report his own opinion formed from facts, not that of others, nor an opinion founded upon that of others without facts.[70] The testimony upon which the opinion of the master or commissioner as to the necessity and expediency of the sale is founded should be reported to the court so that it may form an opinion as to such necessity for itself.[71] The referee's report in a proceeding to mortgage an infant's realty for the payment of certain specified debts should specify the objects to which the avails are to be applied and not merely refer to the evidence for a statement of these objects.[72]

(VII) FAMILY MEETING.[73] Under the laws of Louisiana the real property of a minor cannot be sold or mortgaged unless a family meeting, duly assembled, declares that the sale or mortgage is of absolute necessity or of evident advantage to the minor.[74] A decree homologating the proceedings of a family meeting will protect a purchaser in good faith.[75]

(VIII) APPRAISEMENT. In Louisiana it is required that the property shall be appraised before a sale,[76] and it cannot be sold for less than the amount of the appraisement,[77] except where it is sold to pay the debts of the ancestor.[78]

(IX) ORDER OR DECREE. An order of the court to that effect is necessary to authorize a sale of an infant's property.[79] The fact that the description of the lands in the decree of sale is very general does not render it ineffectual if the land can be clearly identified by the subsequent proceedings.[80] An order requiring the special guardian of an infant to mortgage its realty and apply the proceeds to the payment of certain specified debts should specify the objects to which the avails are to be applied and not merely refer to another paper therefor.[81] Where nothing to the contrary appears in the record, it will be presumed that an order for the sale of an infant's property was made upon a sufficient showing, and was for the infant's benefit,[82] and where the court acquired jurisdiction, its decree, even though erroneous, is conclusive until reversed or set aside.[83] An order for the mortgaging of property obtained by fraud against infants interested therein has been held void.[84]

Breach of bond.— Where a special guardian appointed to sell the real estate of an infant gave a bond conditioned upon the trust reposed in him, and to pay over, invest, and account for all moneys that should be received by him according to the order of any court having authority to give directions in the premises, and to observe the orders and directions of the supreme court in relation to said trust, his omission and neglect to account for the purchase-money and to invest the same according to the terms of the sale and the order of the court affirming the same was a clear breach of his duty as special guardian, and a breach of the condition of the bond. Hunt v. Hunt, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 577, holding further that it was no excuse for not complying with the condition of his bond for the special guardian to show that he was administrator of the estate of the infant's father, or that such estate was insolvent, and he had wrongfully taken the funds which came to his hands as special guardian and had, without the order or allowance of the court, misappropriated them as administrator.

Prerequisites to suit on bond.— A bond given on the appointment of a guardian ad litem to sell the realty of an infant cannot be prosecuted until proceedings for an ac-failure to require or to give such a bond has been held to render the whole proceeding void.[86]

g. Manner and Conduct of Sale — (i) In General. When a sale in a certain way is authorized by the court, it can be made only in that way;[87] and statutory requirements as to the manner of making the sale must be complied with.[88]

(ii) By Whom Sale Made. It has been held that the general guardian of the infants, if they have one, is the proper person to be appointed to sell their real estate, unless some sufficient reason is shown for substituting another for that purpose.[89]

(iii) Time of Sale. Where the order of sale does not require the master to consult with the guardian ad litem as to the time of the sale, his failure to do so cannot be regarded even as an irregularity.[90]

(iv) Place of Sale. In Louisiana it has been held that the sale of a minor's property must be at the place where the family meeting has determined, and this may be outside of the parish where the land lies.[91]

(v) Terms and Conditions of Sale. The terms of sale are usually prescribed by the court,[92] and the sale must be made upon such terms.[93]

(vi) Public or Private Sale. The sale of an infant's estate under order of court should ordinarily be by public outcry,[94] but private sales may in some count have been had against the guardian in chancery. Salisbury v. Van Hoesen, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 77.

A recital in the decree of sale that the bond was given authorizes the inference that it was given before or simultaneously with the decree, although it is dated the day after. Thornton v. McGrath, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 349.

states be authorized under certain circumstances.[95] An order for a private sale of an infant's property does not authorize a public sale.[96]

h. Who May Purchase.[97] Under the Tennessee statute, where land is sold because it is for the benefit of an infant owner that it shall be sold, neither a guardian,[98] next friend,[99] nor a witness in the cause[1] can purchase at such sale, or at any time afterward until five years from the removal of the existing disability, and if any such person makes such a purchase, original sales shall become void and the infant may bring ejectment for the land.[2] A sale by a special guardian appointed by the court to his wife is ordinarily improper,[3] but the court has power in its discretion to permit and approve such a sale.[4] The judge who ordered the sale cannot either directly or indirectly become the purchaser.[5] In South Carolina a purchase at public sale by the guardian of the infants for full value has been held valid.[6] Upon the recovery of land the sale of which was void because purchased by one standing in a confidential relation to the infant owners, the latter are entitled to an account for rents and profits;[7] but the purchaser will be entitled to an account of permanent improvements to the extent that they have enhanced the value of the land, not to exceed the rents and profits, and also for taxes paid.[8]

i. Confirmation. Confirmation by the court is necessary to complete the sale.[9] It is no objection to confirmation that the petition for confirmation is filed by the purchaser.[10] There may be cases where, in justice to a purchaser in good faith, a sale of an infant's property under order of court should be confirmed, if in good conscience this ought to be done and the interest of the infant will not be prejudiced thereby, although it was not made in strict compliance with the statute;[11] but there is no rule of law or right empowering a court of equity to confirm a private sale of an infant's real estate made by an unauthorized person without an order of court.[12] When the court can see that injustice will be

Report on conversion of crops.— By an order in an infancy application under 12 Vict. c. 72 (C. S. U. C. c. 12), it was referred to the master to take an account of the value of the crops grown on the premises during a given year, and of what had become thereof, and how much had been converted by one A to his own use beyond one third thereof; and it was ordered that said A, on service of the order and report, should pay into court the amount found due by the master. It was held that the order being final so far as A was concerned, the report made in pursuance thereof did not require confirmation. Re Yaggie, 1 Ch. Chamb. (U. C.) 168.

inflicted upon a party not in default by the ratification of a sale, the sale should not be ratified.[13] The confirmation of a sale cures irregularities,[14] and perfects the title of the purchaser,[15] and the purchaser cannot, after confirmation of the sale, and after the expiration of the term at which such confirmation was made, resist the payment of the purchase-money on the ground of irregularity in the sale or the proceedings under which it was had.[16] But the purchaser may except to the confirmation of the commissioner's report of sale and may appeal from the judgment on such exceptions.[17] A decree of the court of chancery confirming a lease of an infant's realty is so far binding on the infant that he cannot, by a bill of review, an original bill, or other proceeding impeach it to the prejudice of a bona fide purchaser for value of the leasehold interest before suit brought.[18]

j. Purchase-Money. It has been held to be the duty of a court of equity, on decreeing a sale of land belonging to infants, to retain the title as security for the purchase-money, no matter what other security may have been taken for the payment thereof.[19] The fact that Confederate money was received in payment does not render the sale void.[20] A commissioner appointed to sell lands of minors for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds cannot transfer notes taken for the purchase-money.[21]

k. Validity and Effect of Sale. Irregularities in the proceedings do not render the sale void;[22] nor is the sale void because of the fact that the order of sale was erroneous;[23] nor is it rendered void by the reversal of the order of sale for error.[24] A sale under the order of court passes the infant's title, and the conveyance of the officers of the court operates as an estoppel to the same extent and in the same manner that a proper deed of an adult conveying his title would bar him from asserting it against his grantee.[25] It has been held that the sale of an infant's land under statute, if regular and within the provisions of the statute, is a conversion of the real property into personalty;[26] but it has also been held that Ratification.— Where infants' lands have been sold under a decree in chancery, they may, after their arrival at majority, waive any irregularity as to themselves, and confirm the sale (Nelson v. Lee, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 495; Lampton v. Usher, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 57), and insist on a specific performance by the purchaser (Nelson v. Lee, supra). Where infants, after reaching their majority, with knowledge of the facts rendering a sale of their land voidable for fraud, receive the residue of the purchase-price, they ratify the sale. Smith v. Gray, 116 N. C. 311, 21 S. E. 200.

Failure to answer.— Where the infant defendants have all been summoned, a failure to answer by guardian or otherwise is only an error which entitles them to a reversal, but it does not render the decree for the sale either void or voidable, this error being not included in the statutory grounds of avoidance. Thornton v. McGrath, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 349.

Sale on cross bill.— If real estate is sold upon informal proceedings, and the minor files a cross bill by prochein ami and has the sale set aside and a resale ordered, his position as defendant is changed and any defense that existed in the proceedings on the original bill cannot affect the validity of the second sale. Upon the death of the infant intestate after such sale and before any order of the court

the proceeds of an infant's lands which have been sold under order of court retain the character of realty,[27] until the infant comes of age and elects to take them as money.[28] Infants are as much bound by the sale as adults, with the qualification that after coming of age an infant may impeach the sale for error apparent on the face of the decree,[29] or, it seems, for fraud.[30]

l. Title and Rights of Purchaser. Where the court had jurisdiction both of the parties and of the subject-matter,[31] the purchaser acquires a good title[32] to the entire estate sold,[33] even though the proceedings may have been irregular in some respects, for which irregularities the judgment might have been reversed,[34] for if jurisdiction was properly acquired, the purchaser is not bound to look beyond the decree.[35] The court of chancery sells only the interest and estate of the parties to the cause, and the doctrine of caveat emptor applies to all such cases;[36] but a purchaser discovering a defect of title at a proper time may be relieved from his purchase by asking a rescission of the sale.[37] If the sale is void by reason of a lack of jurisdiction, the payment of the purchase-money will not be compelled,[38] and it has been held that where the purchaser objects that the proceedings were irregular, he cannot be compelled to pay the purchase-price until the proceedings have been so far perfected as to secure him a good title.[39]

m. Deed. A statute requiring that the conveyance shall be executed under the direction of the court applies to a mortgage as well as to an absolute deed.[40] Where a court directs the execution of a deed conveying land of infants, the deed stamping the fund with the character of realty, such fund will be transmissible under the laws of distribution as for personalty. Rogers v. Clark, 5 Sneed (Tenn.) 665.

Cornwall v. Cornwall, 6 Bush (Ky.) 369.

Where purchaser in possession.— The rule that where a purchaser remains in peaceable possession of the premises he cannot have relief against payment of the purchase-money or any part of it on the ground of defect of title has been applied to a sale of land under order of court as the property of an infant. must be executed in conformity with the order, or the purchaser is not bound to accept it.[41]

n. Setting Aside Sale. Where the sale is beneficial to the infant it will not be set aside for mere irregularities,[42] nor on the election of the purchaser without complaint on the part of the infant;[43] but a court of chancery will not undertake to validate void sales of infants' property because beneficial to them.[44] If the price paid at the time of sale was a fair one, the fact that the land has subsequently increased in value gives the infant no equity to have it set aside;[45] but it has been held in Louisiana that if the purchaser fails to pay the price the infant may sue for a dissolution of the sale.[46] A failure of the commissioner appointed to sell to give the bond required by law is not necessarily a ground for setting aside the sale.[47] In setting aside the sale the rents and profits since the sale may be allowed as an offset against the amount paid by the purchaser.[48]

o. Collateral Attack. Neither the sale nor the order under which it was made can be collaterally impeached for errors or irregularities if the court had jurisdiction.[49] Neither can the sale be collaterally attacked for fraud.[50] But an order for the sale or mortgaging of the property of an infant may be collaterally attacked for want of jurisdiction,[51] and the rule as to the conclusiveness of the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, when collaterally attacked, cannot be invoked in aid of a decree of sale made by the orphans' court subject to conditions, where neither compliance with the conditions nor confirmation of the sale has been had.[52]

Order for payment of debts.— Where the special guardian is ordered to mortgage the infant's realty and apply the proceeds to the payment of specified debts, he cannot refuse to pay one of them on the ground that the court ought not to have authorized its payment. In re Lampman, 22 Hun (N. Y.) 239, holding that where the special guardian procured an order confirming his report without notice to the creditor who was unpaid, the latter might have the order vacated and the guardian might be directed to pay his proportionate share of the proceeds with interest from the date of the order confirming the report.

Conclusiveness of order.— The orders of the investment for the benefit of the infant in such manner as the court may deem best and most advantageous,[55] but the failure of the court to make such order as the statute requires as to the proceeds will not vitiate the sale.[56] The solicitor who conducted the proceedings for a sale of the land of infants is entitled to a fee out of the proceeds of sale.[57] Where the land has been sold free of encumbrances, the proceeds may be applied so far as necessary to the payment of such encumbrances.[58] A special guardian appointed to sell an infant's real estate is bound to account to the infant for the purchase-money, less what was paid to the widow of the ancestor for her right of dower in the land.[59] The purchaser is not as a rule under any duty to see to the application of the proceeds of sale.[60]

q. Curative Statutes. as an adult, is bound by all contracts connected with the occupation in which he is engaged.[85] To engage in business within the meaning of these statutes is to have a regular employment or occupation in which the infant is engaged as a means of livelihood or profit;[86] but such statutes apply only where the infant is carrying on a business of his own, and not where he is engaged in business as a mere employee.[87]

b. Partnership. An infant may become a partner with an adult;[88] but the partnership agreement is voidable at the election of the infant,[89] although it is not void,[90] and is binding upon the adult partner.[91] Where an infant has paid money in consideration of being admitted as a partner in a business, and he has become a partner and remained so for a certain time, he cannot recover back the money thus paid[92] unless he was induced to enter into the partnership by fraudulent representations.[93] The infant cannot recover upon an implied assumpsit from his adult partner for services performed for the partnership under the partnership agreement.[94] The infancy of one of the partners does not affect the validity of the transactions of the adult partners with respect to firm property,[95] and the acts of the infant partner before his disaffirmance of the partnership agreement bind the firm.[96] The interest of the infant partner in the firm assets is liable for firm debts.[97] It has been held that an infant who engages in business in partnership with an adult is not bound by the contracts or liable for the debts of the firm,[98] but a more accurate statement is that he may disaffirm the partnership contract and avoid all liabilities under it,[99] including the partnership debts,[1] for an infant partner is responsible for all partnership engagements unless and until he elects to set up his personal plea of infancy.[2] The court may decree the dissolution of a partnership and wind up its affairs through the medium of a receiver, notwithstanding one of the partners is an infant,[3] and upon a dissolution, whether by the court or by consent, the partnership debts must be first paid out of the partnership assets,[4] and if what remains is insufficient to repay in full the contributions of all the partners to the capital, the loss must fall upon all the partners pro rata, and the infant cannot throw upon his copartners the obligation of making up the deficiency to him.[5] If during infancy a person has held himself out to be a partner, he will be liable for partnership debts incurred after he attained majority, unless when he comes of age he expressly disaffirms the partnership.[6]

B. Particular Acts and Contracts Considered — 1. Accounts Stated. The statement of an account by an infant is not binding on him,[8] and an action on an account stated does not lie against an infant,[9] even though the items are for necessaries.[10] But an account stated by an infant is voidable only and not void.[11]

2. Bills and Notes. A promissory note or bill single executed by an infant is not binding on him, but may be avoided.[12] In a number of cases it has been laid down that such instruments are void;[13] but the better opinion, and that supported partnership, but the infant wife never executed the deed or took any part in the business, and there is no evidence whatever that she even knew of the partnership deed, or that she was named in it as a member of the firm, the fact that she on several occasions drew money from the concern is not sufficient to show her knowledge and acquiescence, as she might have attained such money merely as the wife of a partner, and her drawing it is quite consistent with her not being a partner or knowing that she was said to be one. by the weight of authority, is that they are, like other acts of an infant, merely voidable at his election.[14] The joint note of an infant and an adult is binding upon the latter,[15] but not upon the infant.[16] As an infant is liable for his torts[17] he is liable upon his note given in settlement of a tort so long as the consideration of the note is open to inquiry to the same extent as he would have been liable on the original cause of action.[18] An infant's indorsement of a promissory note being voidable only by himself or his representatives[19] passes the title as between the indorsee and the maker and entitles the former to sue the latter on the note.[20]

The reason of this is that by a rule of law in reference to negotiable instruments when in the hands of an indorsee, the consideration cannot be gone into, and consequently unless they are held to be absolutely void when executed by an infant, he would constantly be liable to be imposed upon by unprincipled and designing men who would procure his notes and immediately negotiate them. b. Credit Must Be Given to Infant. But an infant cannot be held liable for things furnished to him, although they may be necessaries, if they are furnished, not upon his contract or request, but on the contract or request of the infant's parent, guardian, or some other person to whom the credit is given.[37]

c. Express Contracts. Some authorities hold that an infant is not liable on his express contract to pay for necessaries,[38] but only upon the contract to pay the reasonable value implied from his receipt of the articles;[39] but the better rule appears to be that an infant may bind himself by an express contract to pay for necessaries[40] if the form of the contract be such that the consideration may be inquired into.[41] Whichever view is adopted, however, the practical result is the same, for where the infant is held unable to bind himself by an express contract, the fact that he has attempted to do so does not prevent a recovery of the value of the necessaries on his implied contract,[42] while where he is held capable of binding himself by an express contract he can, by showing that the amount agreed to Necessaries procured by agent are within the rule. Fruchey v. Eagleson, 15 Ind. App. 88, 43 N. E. 146.

The fact that a person has furnished articles not necessaries to an infant does not preclude him from recovering for the necessaries furnished. Bent v. Manning, 10 Vt. 225.

The obligation does not arise out of a contract in the legal sense of that term, but out of a transaction of a quasi-contractual nature, for it may be imposed on an infant too young to understand the nature of a contract at all. be paid is unreasonable, reduce the recovery to a just compensation for the necessaries which he has received.[43]

d. Executory Contracts. No binding obligation to pay for necessaries can arise until they have been supplied to the infant, and he cannot make a binding executory agreement to purchase necessaries or to pay for necessaries to be supplied him.[44]

e. What Are Necessaries. The term "necessaries" is not confined to merely such things as are required for a bare subsistence,[45] but includes those things without which the individual cannot reasonably exist,[46] and which are useful and suitable,[47] and necessary for his support, use, and comfort,[48] taking into consideration the infant's state and condition in life.[49] The articles furnished must be actually necessary to the particular case, for use and substantial good, not mere ornament or pleasure;[50] but beyond this there is no positive rule by means of which it may be determined what are or what are not necessaries,[51] for what may be considered necessary for one infant may not be necessaries for another infant whose state is different as to rank, social position, fortune, health, or other cir-

A lawsuit may or may not be a necessary for an infant according to circumstances. Thrall v. Wright, 38 Vt. 494.

Services rendered by an attorney as guardian ad litem in defending a suit to foreclose a mortgage made by the infant's ancestor are not necessaries which would render a deed of land by the infant in consideration thereof valid, as the statute provides compensation for such guardians. Englebert v. Troxell, 40 Nebr. 195, 58 N. W. 852, 42 Am. St. Rep. 665, 26 L. R. A. 177.

Examination of public records.— Where at the request of an infant an attorney examined the public records and advised the infant as to his rights to certain property inherited from his deceased father, it was held that the services rendered by the attorney were not necessaries. Cobbey v. Buchanan, 48 Nebr. 391, 67 N. W. 176.

Suit instituted by next friend.— Although a suit was instituted and counsel employed by the infant through her next friend, yet, since this was of necessity, and since she knew of and profited by the proceedings, and must have conferred with counsel, and appeared as a witness, there was an implied promise by her to pay for the necessary counsel fees. Crafts v. Carr, 24 R. I. 397, 53 Atl. 275, 96 Am. St. Rep. 721, 60 L. R. A. 128.

Where a testator's adult heirs employed an attorney and agreed to give him half of the land to be recovered in case the will should be broken, and through the attorney's efforts the will was broken, an infant heir, although participating equally in the benefit of the result, could not be compelled to contribute to the attorney's compensation. Dillon v. Bowles, 77 Mo. 603 [affirming 8 Mo. App. 419].

Where request for services presumed.— A request for the defense of a suit against an infant as necessary to protect his interests may be presumed from the necessities of the

in a criminal action or prosecution.[61] So also the payment of taxes on the property of infants is a necessary.[62] Horses,[63] vehicles,[64] saddles, harness, and the like[65] are not ordinarily considered necessaries for an infant. Neither are repairs[66] and improvements[67] on an infant's realty, or articles purchased by or furnished to him for use in carrying on the business or occupation in which he is engaged, ordinarily considered necessaries.[68] It has also been held that a contract for fire insurance is not for a necessary.[69]

f. Where Infant Already Sufficiently Supplied. It is incumbent upon a tradesman before he trusts an infant for what may appear to be necessaries to inquire whether he is already provided, as otherwise he trusts the infant at his peril;[70] and

Such inquiry is not a condition precedent to a recovery, but if the articles furnished are actually necessaries they may be recovered for, although no inquiry was made. Brayshaw v. Eaton, 1 Arn. 466, 5 Bing. N. Cas. 231, 3 Jur. 222, 8 L. J. C. P. 153, 7 Scott 183, 35 E. C. L. 132; Dalton v. Gibb, although articles are of such a character that they might be necessaries if the infant was not supplied with them a recovery cannot be had for such articles furnished when the infant was already sufficiently supplied with such article or articles of a like character,[71] no matter by whom or how he was supplied[72] and regardless of whether or not the person supplying the articles knew of the existing supply.[73]

g. Where Infant Has an Allowance. It has been laid down that as a rule an infant who has an allowance from the court, his guardian, or any other source, of a sum sufficient to supply himself with necessaries suitable to his fortune and condition is not liable for necessaries supplied on credit;[74] and certainly when the infant has been supplied with money sufficient to supply him with necessaries the presumption is that he has been fully supplied from that fund and the burden is upon the person claiming for necessaries furnished on credit to rebut that presumption.[75]

h. Where Infant Has Parents or Guardian. As a rule the parent is liable for the support of his child,[76] and the guardian for the support of his ward.[77] Consequently, an infant living with his parents who provide him with everything that appears to be necessary and proper cannot bind himself to a stranger even for necessaries,[78] and where the parent has the ability and is willing to support his minor child, board, lodging, etc., furnished to such infant by another without the parent's consent is not a necessary for which the infant is liable.[79] But the mere fact that an infant has a father, mother, or guardian does not prevent his being bound to pay for what was actually necessary for him when furnished, if neither his parents nor guardian did anything toward his care or support.[80]

i. Loans and Advances For Necessaries.[81] It is a general rule that a loan of money is not a necessary, although the infant afterward purchases necessaries with it,[82] although it has been held that money furnished to an infant for the express purpose of purchasing necessaries may be recovered as for necessaries furnished.[83] But the courts recognize a difference between lending and paying, and hence an infant is held liable to a person who at his request pays a bill already contracted by the infant for necessaries, or advances him the money with which to pay it.[84] Such liability is, however, subject to the condition that the debt so paid must have been for a necessary,[85] and is not measured by the actual amount paid, but limited, irrespective of the contract price, to such sum as would be a reasonable compensation for the necessaries furnished.[86]

j. Necessaries of Wife and Family. The capacity of an infant husband to contract for necessaries is enlarged by his marriage, so that he will be bound for the reasonable value of necessaries for his wife and family as well as for himself.[87]

k. Question of Law and Fact. The question as to what are necessaries is a mixed one of law and fact;[88] it is a question for the court to decide whether certain subjects of expenditures are necessaries and what classes or general description of articles are necessaries;[89] and it is for the jury to determine whether the particular articles, etc., fall within any of these classes, and whether they were actually necessary and suitable to the estate and condition of the infant, and were furnished under such circumstances as to authorize a recovery.[90] The quantity, quality, and value of what was furnished is of course a question for the jury.[91]

l. Burden of Proof. The person seeking to recover for articles furnished to an infant on the ground that they were necessaries has the burden of proving that the articles were in their nature necessaries suitable to the infant to whom they were supplied and were actually needed by the infant,[92] and it has been held that they or the money therefor were not supplied by the parent, guardian, or others.[93]

m. Amount of Recovery. The recovery for necessaries furnished to an infant is limited to their fair and reasonable value, and the price or amount agreed to be paid for them does not, if it exceeds such value, fix the measure of recovery.[94] It has been said that an infant has no power to incur a debt exceeding his income even for necessaries.[95]

10. Releases. A release by an infant is not binding upon him but is voidable,[96] and if such release is repudiated by the infant it cannot be interposed or contracts also precludes him from binding himself by any subsequent ratification thereof.[24]

b. Ratification After Commencement of Action. It has been held that as the executory contract of an infant gives no cause of action against him until it is ratified,[25] a new promise or ratification made after the commencement of an action against him will not support that action.[26]

3. Necessity of Ratification.[27] Whether, when an infant arrives at full age, it is necessary that he should do any act to avoid or affirm a contract made under age in order to render it nugatory or binding is a question upon which there are contradictory authorities.[28] But the better supported rule appears to be that the executory contracts of an infant are voidable, as distinguished from void, only in the sense that they are, while prima facie void, susceptible of ratification, and hence they must be ratified after his arrival at age in order to become obligatory upon him;[29] while the executed contracts of an infant are voidable only in the sense that, while prima facie valid and binding, they may be avoided, and hence no ratification is necessary in order that he may be bound by contracts of such a character.[30]

4. Requisites to Valid Ratification — a. Ratification Must Be Voluntary. The acts, declarations, or promises relied upon to show ratification must have been voluntary, and not under terror of arrest or any other kind of duress.[31]

A threat of suit if payment be not made is

b. New Consideration. No new consideration is necessary for the late infant's ratification of his contract made during infancy.[32]

c. Whether Writing Necessary. Under some statutes the ratification of an infant's contract must be in writing,[33] but in the absence of such a statutory requirement the ratification may be oral as well as written.[34]

d. Knowledge of Non-Liability. The better considered rule appears to be that as the late infant must be presumed to know his legal rights,[35] it is not necessary to a ratification of his contract made during infancy that the act or promise relied on should have been done or made with actual knowledge that he was not bound;[36] but there are many cases asserting the contrary, although these assertions are mostly in the form of dicta.[37]

5. Conditional Ratification. A ratification may be absolute or conditional,[38] and if it be the latter the terms of the condition must be shown to have happened or been complied with before an action can be sustained.[39]

6. PARTIAL RATIFICATION. It has been said that the ratification may be partial,[40] but this dictum must be considered in connection with the rule that the late infant cannot ratify so much as is to his benefit and avoid the rest.[41]

7. WHAT CONSTITUTES RATIFICATION — a. In General.[42] The ratification of an infant's contract must be by some act or declaration recognizing its legal existence and binding efficacy,[43] and inconsistent with any intention not to be bound.[44] The act, promise, or declaration relied upon must have been deliberately and understandingly done or made,[45] and there must have been an intention to ratify[46] unless the act relied on is of such a nature that it would be a fraud on the other party if the contract were not affirmed,[47] but no particular form of language is necessary to show a ratification.[48] It has been held that in order to constitute a ratification of an infant's executory contract for the payment of money, there must be a direct promise,[49] which is obviously a sufficient ratification,[50] or such a direct confirmation as expressly ratifies the contract, although not in the language of a formal promise;[51] but in this connection the acts of the late infant in favor of the contract may constitute as full a ratification as an express and unequivocal promise,[52] and where the declarations or acts of the individual, after coming of age, fairly and justly lead to the inference that he intended to and did recognize and adopt as binding an agreement executory on his part made during infancy, and intended to pay the debt then incurred, this is sufficient to constitute ratification.[53] There seems, however, to be a difference between contracts simply for the payment of money or the performance of any personal duty, and those which are connected with land or grow out of an interest therein, and an affirmation of the latter class may be implied.[54] A mere acknowledgment of the debt, contract, or

Under the Missouri statute a partial payment after majority constitutes a ratification of a contract made during infancy (Koerner v. Wilkinson, (Mo. App. 1902) 70 S. W. 509), but where the maker of a note after attaining his majority directed his debtor to pay the amount of the debt to the holder of the note, believing that the holder had agreed to look to the debtor for payment, such direction and a subsequent payment by the debtor did not amount to a ratification by the maker within the statute (Snyder v. Gericke, 101 Mo. a member of a firm during his infancy concurs in carrying on the partnership, or receives profits from it after he comes of age, this amounts to a confirmation and renders him liable on a partnership note or debt, given or contracted during his minority.[61] Where a minor submitted a claim to arbitration and an award was made in his favor and paid to his guardian, his receiving the money from his guardian after attaining full age was an affirmance of the submission and a bar to the claim submitted.[62]

b. Acquiescence or Failure to Disaffirm.[63] According to some authorities the contract of an infant may become binding upon him through his failure to disaffirm the same within a reasonable time after reaching his majority, this being construed to work a ratification;[64] but on the other hand there are cases denying that mere acquiescence and failure to disaffirm will be construed as a ratification,[65] especially where the infant has not, since his majority, received any new consideration or retained any old consideration arising out of the original transaction.[66]

c. Retention or Disposal of Property or Consideration.[67] Where an infant purchases property and gives his note or promise to pay therefor, and after his becoming of age he retains the property for an unreasonable time,[68] or disposes of the same,[69] this will amount to a ratification of the promise to pay. So also in the case of an executed contract the infant's retention of the property or consideration which he received for an unreasonable time after reaching majority works a ratification.[70] But a contract made by one who had no power to bind the infant's interest is not made good because he was benefited by it and accepted its fruits.[71]

Where the infant tenders back the property received by him, and upon refusal of his tender, brings suit, the mere retention of the

8. EVIDENCE. The burden of proving a ratification rests upon the person claiming under a voidable contract of an infant,[72] but it is sufficient for plaintiff to show a new promise or ratification since the making of the contract without showing that defendant was of age at the time, and it then devolves upon defendant to prove that he was an infant when he made the alleged ratification if he claims that such was the fact.[73] Subject to the general rules of evidence,[74] any evidence is admissible which legitimately tends to show that the late infant did ratify the contract,[75] or is explanatory of what occurred after the infant reached majority.[76]

9. EFFECT OF RATIFICATION.[77] The effect of the ratification by an infant, after his arrival at majority, of his contract made during infancy is to render the same binding upon him and enforceable against him,[78] and he cannot subsequently

(11) False Representations as to Age.[94] According to some authorities the fact that an infant at the time of entering into a contract falsely represented to the person with whom he dealt that he had attained the age of majority does not give any validity to the contract or estop the infant from disaffirming the same or setting up the defense of infancy against the enforcement of any rights thereunder;[95] but there is also authority for the view that such false representations will create an estoppel against the infant,[96] and under the statutes of some states no contract can be disaffirmed where, on account of the minor's representations as to his majority, the other party had good reason to believe the minor capable of contracting.[97] Where the infant has made no representations whatever as to his age, the mere fact that the person with whom he dealt believed him to be of age, even though his belief was warranted by the infant's appearance and the surrounding circumstances, and the infant knew of such belief, will not render the contract valid or estop the infant to disaffirm.[98]

different means according to the nature of the act and the circumstances of the case,[10] but it may be laid down as a general rule that any act showing unequivocally a renunciation of or a disposition not to abide by the contract made during minority is sufficient to avoid it.[11] Bringing a suit to assert rights contrary to those existing under the contract is an election to rescind,[12] although the bringing of a suit is not essential to an avoidance.[13] So also a plea of infancy in an action based on the contract is an election to avoid.[14]

5. Return of Property or Consideration.[15] It has been laid down broadly that it is not necessary in order to give effect to a disaffirmance of an infant's voidable contract that the other party shall be placed in statu quo or the consideration received by the infant returned to him;[16] but on the other hand it has been asserted that the infant on avoiding his contract must restore the consideration which he received,[17] and must allow or is liable for the benefit derived from whatever his immaturity; and if he were required to restore an equivalent where he has wasted or squandered the property or consideration received, the privilege of repudiating would be of no avail when most needed.[22] There have been distinctions attempted to be made between executory and executed contracts and between seeking relief at law and in equity, but with only a few exceptions the rule stated has governed the decision regardless of the facts relied on as distinguishing.[23]

6. Effect of Avoidance — a. In General.[24] The disaffirmance of a contract made by an infant nullifies it and renders it void ab initio, and the parties are returned to the same condition as if the contract had never been made.[25] After the infant has disaffirmed the contract any one may take advantage of such disaffirmance.[26] Where an infant avoids his contract it cannot thereafter be resuscitated or ratified.[27]

b. Recovery of What Was Paid or Parted With. Upon the disaffirmance of a contract by an infant, he is entitled to recover what he paid or parted with pursuant to such contract, if he returns what he received,[28] or offers to return it,[29] or if he has received no consideration or no benefit whatever from the contract.[30] It has even been asserted that he may recover what he paid or parted with with-limit the liability of an infant for torts to acts of trespass or pure torts properly so called, and deny any redress in a court of law against the fraudulent conduct of infants in any manner connected with a contract;[58] but there is also another line of authorities which, while fully recognizing the non-liability of an infant upon his contracts, draws a distinction between holding him upon the contract and estopping him, or making him responsible for his frauds, deceits, and falsehoods in matters connected with but not forming a constituent part of the contract. These cases consider that the action brought or the defense set up against the infants must sound in tort and not in contract, but if it does sound in tort it will not be defeated, although the tort complained of was connected with the contract.[59] The true principle appears to be this: that if the injury complained of arises from a breach of contract, although there may have been false representations or concealment respecting the subject-matter of it, the infant cannot be charged for his breach of promise or contract by a change in the form of action; in short, a cause of action in contract cannot be changed to a tort in order to deprive the infant of the benefit of the plea of infancy;[60] but if the injury is not a mere breach of contract, but a distinct, wilful, and positive wrong of itself, then, although it may be connected with a contract, the infant is liable.[61] This distinction is well illustrated by the cases which have arisen with reference to injuries to property held by the infant under a contract of hire. As to such injuries the established rule is that when the infant has kept within the terms of the bailment and the injury is due merely to his lack of skill and experience, and not to any wrongful intent, he is not liable, for the damages are in the nature of a breach of contract;[62] but he is liable where the injury has resulted from his departure from the object of the bailment or he has been guilty of a positive and wilful tort,[63] as when, having hired a horse or vehicle to go to a designated place he injures the same by driving or going beyond such place or to another place in a different direction,[64] where he wilfully and intentionally beats, overdrives, or otherwise misuses a hired horse,[65] or where he fails or refuses to return the property after the term of bailment has expired.[66]

Presumption.— An infant under fourteen years of age is presumed to be incapable of malice, and is therefore not liable in an action for slander, unless the evidence is such as will rebut the presumption that he was not sufficiently developed mentally to comprehend the nature of the charge as tending to discredit plaintiff in public estimation, and to understand that liability would result from speaking such slanderous words. infant's civil disabilities be not criminal when done by him,[70] the general rule is that the fact that a person is under the age of twenty-one, or eighteen, where that is the age of majority, does not render him incapable of committing crime or exempt from responsibility therefor.[71] The responsibility of infants for crime depends more on their discretion, and the power to discriminate right from wrong, what is just or otherwise, than on their age;[72] and there is no exact age at which it can be laid down that an infant becomes accountable criminally for his acts,[73] but the time of infancy is usually divided into three distinct periods, during each of which a different presumption prevails.[74]

2. PRESUMPTION OF INCAPACITY — a. Conclusive Presumption. The first period is that up to the age of seven years,[75] during which the infant is conclusively presumed to be incapable of understanding the nature of crime and can in no event be held responsible therefor.[76]

b. Prima Facie Presumption. The second is that between the ages of seven and fourteen years.[77] An infant between these ages is presumed to be incapable

Rule as to assault and battery.— Although, according to the common law, a boy under the age of fourteen is not indictable for an ordinary assault and battery, yet, if the battery be of an aggravated kind, as if it be a mayhem, or be done with a deadly weapon, or be prompted by a brutal passion, such as unbridled lust, the public justice will interfere and punish, if it appear that the accused was doli capax. of committing a crime;[78] but this presumption may be rebutted by proof that the infant possessed sufficient discretion to be aware of the nature of the act,[79] and in such cases the infant may be held liable and punished.[80] In the case of a person between such ages the burden of proving capacity is upon the prosecution,[81]

and a conviction cannot be had or sustained unless it is affirmatively made to appear that defendant was at the time of the act of sufficient maturity of mind to understand and appreciate what he did.[82] The question as to defendant's capacity is for the jury,[83] and it has been said that in order to convict the jury must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of defendant's capacity.[84]

3. Presumption of Capacity. The third period is after the age of fourteen years when the infant is presumed to be capable of committing crime, and of being responsible therefor in the same manner as with the case of an adult,[85] although the presumption is subject to proof as to the real fact.[86] The burden

Nature of evidence required.— Direct and positive testimony is not necesssary to prove capacity, but circumstances of education, habits of life, general character, moral and religious instructions, and often circumstances immediately connected with the offense charged, may in most instances be proven to convince the jury whether or not defendant had the discretion required. Wusnig v. State, 33 Tex. 651.

Actual knowledge of the unlawfulness of the act need not be shown, but if capacity is established, knowledge may be presumed. Com. v. Mead, 10 Allen (Mass.) 398.

A sense of moral guilt only on the part of the infant, in the absence of a knowledge of his legal responsibility for his act, will not authorize a conviction. The strongest and clearest proof of capacity to entertain a criminal intent is necessary. Angelo v. People, 96 Ill. 209, 36 Am. Rep. 132.

Where no evidence was taken as to the capacity of infant defendants to commit crime, for the reason that the court, from their appearance, and conversation with them and their parents, was convinced that they had capacity to understand the act charged and its wrongfulness, a conviction could not be sustained. People v. Domenico, 45 Misc. (N. Y.) 309, 92 N. Y. Suppl. 390.

A plea of guilty by a child between seven and twelve years of age will not overcome the presumption that such a child is incapable of committing crime. People v. Domenico, 45 Misc. (N. Y.) 309, 92 N. Y. Suppl. 390.

Expert testimony is admissible to prove the capacity of an infant to commit crime. State v. Nickleson, 45 La. Ann. 1172, 14 So. 134.

Sufficiency of evidence.— Circumstances under which a theft is committed by an infant between seven and fourteen years of age, indicating that he was conscious, while stealing, that he was doing wrong, are sufficient evidence of his capacity. Stage's Case, 5 City Hall Rec. (N. Y.) 177. Under the Texas statute it must be shown that the infant understood the nature and illegality of the act; mere proof that he knew the difference between good and evil and had the ordinary intelligence of boys of his age is not sufficient. Evidence to remove presumption.— Where one charged with crime is above the age at which capacity to commit crime is presumed his own testimony that he did not know it was wrong to do the act constituting the crime will not in the absence of any evidence as to his general mental capacity tend to re-

of proving mental incapacity during this period is, however, upon the infant defendant.[87]

B. Acts Under Direction of Parent. An infant otherwise liable for a crime cannot escape liability by showing that he acted under the command of his parent.[88]

C. Burden of Proof as to Age. A defendant who seeks to shield himself from responsibility for crime on the ground of infancy must show that he is within the ages under which the law either conclusively or prima facie presumes him to be incapable of committing a crime.[89]

D. Rights and Privileges as to Prosecution. If above the age when criminal responsibility attaches the infant appears and defends in person or by attorney.[90] As an incident to the right to defend in person the infant has a right to elect the mode of trial,[91] and as a further incident he must plead, and consequently may plead guilty.[92] It is the duty of the court to see that the infant's rights are carefully guarded and protected and to protect him from all irregular proceedings during the trial.[93]

E. Punishment. An infant who has reached the age of criminal responsibility, and has been convicted of crime, is subject to the penalty or punishment therefor, the same as an adult;[94] but in many states statutes have been enacted providing that persons under a designated age are, on conviction of charge, to be imprisoned in the county jail instead of the penitentiary,[95] or giving the courts power to commit infants convicted of crime to reformatory rather than to penal institutions.[96]

VIII. ACTIONS.[97]

A. Rights of Action — 1. Capacity to Sue or Be Sued in General. The fact that a person is an infant does not prevent his suing[98] either at law or in

Under the New York penal code, a child under sixteen convicted of a felony may, in the discretion of the court, instead of being sentenced to a fine or imprisonment, be placed in charge of a suitable person or institution until majority, or for a shorter term. But in case of conviction for a misdemeanor he must be committed to some reformatory, charitable, or other institution, authorized by law to receive and take charge of minors. Place of confinement.— It is discretionary with the court whether the minor under sixteen years of age shall be confined in the workhouse or house of refuge. Ex p. Walker, 8 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 480, 8 Cinc. L. Bul. 198.

The administrator of an infant who died before majority may maintain an action to forcclose a mortgage given to the infant, if brought within the time that the infant if living could have maintained such action. Nolte v. Libbert, 34 Ind. 163.

In a hypothecary action by a minor, it is essential that his rights be previously liqui-equity,[99] nor does it prevent his being sued,[1] and his responsibilities as recognized by the law of the land being enforced against him.[2] But an infant must sue or be sued by next friend or guardian ad litem.[3]

2. Actions on Contracts. An infant may sue to recover what is due him under a contract,[4] or damages for a breach.[5] As a rule an infant is not liable to an action sounding in contract,[6] unless the contract was for necessaries;[7] but it has been held that he is liable in assumpsit for money tortiously taken by him.[8]

3. Actions in Respect to Property Rights.[9] An infant may institute and maintain such actions as may be necessary and appropriate to maintain his property rights.[10] Thus the infant owner of realty may bring ejectment,[11] or a writ of entry,[12]

Form not sufficient.— The simple naming of "the children of Alexander James and the children of Calvin James" as plaintiffs does not make them parties, under the rules of the North Carolina superior court requiring minors to sue by guardians ad litem or next friend. James v. Withers, 114 N. C. 474, 19 S. E. 367.

decree cannot affect an infant unless he was made a party either plaintiff or defendant to the suit in which it was rendered.[25]

b. Plaintiffs or Defendants. An infant should ordinarily be made a defendant rather than a complainant in a bill in chancery,[26] but a proceeding which divests a minor of an estate in lands is not necessarily against his interest so that he must in every possible contingency be made a defendant.[27] Upon a suggestion at any stage of the cause that an infant party is on the wrong side of the record, the court may order an inquiry, and if the fact is found as suggested the proceedings will be amended by placing the infant on the opposite side of the suit.[28]

7. Infant the Real Party. Although a suit is prosecuted or defended on behalf of an infant by a next friend or guardian ad litem he cannot be considered a party to the cause,[29] but the infant is the real party.[30]

The fact that an answer is filed for the infant by a guardian ad litem does not make him a party if he is not named in the bill. Dixon v. Donaldson, 6 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 575.

Presumption.— Where a minor was brought into court by a plea of intervention filed by his adult brothers in a matter in which they had a joint interest, it will be presumed, in the absence of a showing in the record to the contrary, that they were acting in the capacity of next friend, and that he was before the court in such manner as to confer jurisdiction of his person. 8. Parol Demurrer. The common law gave an infant who was sued in respect of land derived from his ancestor the right to resort to his parol demurrer, the effect of which was to stay the action until he arrived at full age, when the cause might be proceeded with, upon his being resummoned into court;[31] but at the present time the parol demurrer is practically obsolete and causes against infants proceed to judgment like other causes.[32]

The trial judge may act in accordance with his conscience in protecting the interest of a minor in the fund in court and order a rea-

of the next friend or guardian ad litem.[35] Thus, while it is not necessary that the infant should have any knowledge of the bringing of a suit by his next friend, and such suit may even be maintained against his wish,[36] the court may and in a proper case should dismiss or at least arrest the progress of a suit commenced in behalf of an infant by his next friend if it appears not to be for the benefit or interest of the infant that it should be prosecuted.[37] Before the estate of an infant is divested the court should be satisfied that he has had a full opportunity to have his day in court by a proper and suitable guardian, and should see, notwithstanding any admission of facts, even by such guardian, that his rights are not sacrificed.[38] The court should see that the guardian ad litem of an infant defendant makes a proper defense,[39] and that the rights of the infant are not prejudiced or abandoned by his answer,[40] and should never render judgment against an infant but on plea filed for him or on being satisfied by the guardian ad litem that after faithful efforts he has ascertained that no defense can be usefully made.[41] In the exercise of its general protection over the interests of infants the court may grant to an infant relief not asked for in the pleadings.[42] A court of chancery has the right to compromise the rights of minors in proper cases where they are parties.[43] The failure of the guardian ad litem to answer for the infant does not deprive the court of jurisdiction.[44]

C. Designation or Description of Parties. The infant being the real party to an action to enforce his rights,[45] the bill, petition, or complaint should be filed in his name by his guardian or next friend,[46] and not in the name of the guardian or next friend for the infant.[47] This is the rule both at law and in equity.[48] So also a suit must be brought against an infant defendant in his own name,[49] and not against the guardian in the first instance.[50]

D. Guardian Ad Litem or Next Friend[51] — 1. Definitions — a. Guardian Ad Litem. A guardian ad litem is a special guardian appointed by the court to prosecute or defend in behalf of an infant a suit to which he is a party.[52]

b. Next Friend. A next friend or prochein ami is a person who undertakes to prosecute a suit in behalf of an infant.[53]

2. Necessity For Representation[54] — a. In General. Although an infant is capable of suing or being sued,[55] he is not considered to have sufficient discretion to adequately enforce or protect his rights,[56] and hence he is not allowed to prosecute or defend a suit alone;[57] but it is necessary, in order that full justice be done him, that in a suit by or against him he should have a guardian ad litem or next friend to safeguard his interests.[58] Where proceedings are instituted affect-

In insolvency proceedings against a partnership, when the petitioning creditors neither seek nor obtain an adjudication by the insolvent court against the infant partner or against his individual estate, the appointment of a guardian ad litem for him is not required. Conary v. Sawyer, 92 Me. 463, 43 Atl. 27, 69 Am. St. Rep. 525.

In bastardy proceedings neither the complainant (Low v. Mitchell, 18 Me. 372. But compare Coomes v. Knapp, 11 Vt. 543) nor defendant (Miller v. State, 110 Ala. 69, 20 So. 392) need appear or act by guardian ad litem or next friend.

Probate proceedings.— The practice in the probate court being instituted and regulated by statute, it was not necessary in the absence of a statute so providing to appoint a guardian ad litem to represent infant parties in any case in that court because the statute practice of the chancery court required the appointment of such guardian in similar cases in the latter court. Johnson v. Cooper, 56 Miss. 608. The provision of Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 372, that a guardian ad litem shall be appointed to represent infants in civil actions, does not apply to probate proceedings but these are governed by section 1718 of the code providing for the appointment of an attorney to represent infants in such proceedings. Carpenter v. San Joaquin County Super. Ct., 75 Cal. 596, 19 Pac. 14. Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2530, the surrogate must appoint a special guardian to represent an infant, where the infant does not appear by general guardian; and, where he does so appear, the surrogate must appoint a special guardian if for any reason the interests of the infant require it. has even been said that a guardian ad litem is only appointed for infant defendants or respondents, and can never prosecute for infant plaintiffs;[73] but in some states an infant may sue by guardian ad litem, as well as by next friend, or must sue by guardian ad litem;[74] and in fact with respect to the representation of an infant plaintiff there seems to be little if any difference between the functions of a guardian ad litem and of a next friend.

Where an infant becomes a party to a trustee process as claimant, it must appear in order to render the proceeding conclusive against him that he appeared by guardian as

f. Representation Without Appointment. No one has authority to appear and answer for an infant defendant without having been first appointed by the court for that purpose,[76] and a decree rendered upon the answer or defense of a person who has assumed to act as guardian ad litem for the infant without any such appointment is erroneous,[77] and does not conclude the infant.[78] It has also been laid down that a next friend suing for an infant must be regularly appointed by the court,[79] and in the absence of such appointment the suit may be dismissed on motion of defendant;[80] but if defendant appears and pleads, it is then too late to question the authority of the next friend, and the recital in the suit that the infant is suing by his next friend is taken as conclusive that an order has been made;[81]

and according to a number of authorities an infant may sue by his next friend without an appointment at all, it being necessary only that the court should recognize the representative capacity of such person.[82] Where a person as next of kin of minors has filed a bill to protect their interests they are, in the absence of fraud, bound by a decree rendered after litigation of the entire subject-matter, and persons acquiring rights thereunder will be protected, although no formal order appears appointing the complainant as guardian ad litem of the minors;[83] but where a suit in equity is brought in the names of infants by one as their next friend, without any authority other than being administrator of their father's estate, and the proceeding is adverse to them, instead of being in their interest, a decree rendered may be avoided by such parties on a bill filed to impeach same.[84] A judgment rendered for defendant in an action for the recovery of land brought on behalf of an infant without his consent by one who is neither de jure nor de facto his guardian nor his natural guardian cannot be sustained on the theory that the person suing was his next friend.[85]

Louisiana rule is explained in Pinniger's Succession, 25 La. Ann. 53.

A decree cannot be made on a bill of revivor against infant defendants unless a guardian ad litem be appointed, who accepts the appointment, and appears or is served with process. St. Clair v. Smith, 3 Ohio 355.

An appointment of an administrator de bonis non made without notice to the minor children of decedent, and without a guardian ad litem being appointed to represent them, is invalid, although the application for the appointment was made by the general guardian of such children. Hubbard v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 104 Wis. 160, 80 N. W. 454, 76 Am. St. Rep. 855.

In proceedings for the settlement of a decedent's estate where infants are cited and do not appear, it is not error to render a decree without the appointment of a guardian ad litem. Parks v. Stonum, 8 Ala. 752.

Probate of will as an exception to the rule see Coalson v. Tooke, 18 Ga. 742.

An infant may maintain a writ of error to avoid a judgment against him in an action wherein no guardian was appointed to defend in his behalf. Johnson v. Waterhouse, 152 Mass. 585, 26 N. E. 234, 23 Am. St. Rep. 858, 11 L. R. A. 440.

After the lapse of a great number of years the judgment or decree will not be set aside. Feitner v. Hoeger, 14 Daly (N. Y.) 470, 15 N. Y. St. 377, fifty years.

Infant's remedy is by motion to set aside judgment. McMurray v. McMurray, 9 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 315, 41 How. Pr. 41. And a judgment for the sale of real estate of infants rendered without the appointment of a guardian ad litem cannot be reversed on that account until there has first been a motion in the lower court to set aside the judgment. Norfleet v. Logan, 54 S. W. 713, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 1200. Entry of judgment against an infant without appointing a guardian ad litem is not a mere irregularity, which rule 37 of the supreme court requires to have specified in the notice of motion to set aside, but is an error in fact which need not be specified. Peck v. Coler, 20 Hun (N. Y.) 534.

Where the pleadings do not show that defendant is a minor, a motion in arrest of judgment, alleging failure to cause him to appear by guardian ad litem, will be overruled. Rawles v. State, 56 Ind. 433. See also Palmer v. Palmer, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. 660.

The absence of a formal entry that a guardian ad litem was appointed is not ground for reversal when the mother of the infant was admitted by the court to defend as guardian. Treiber v. Shafer, 18 Iowa 29.

Arrest of judgment.— Cavender v. Smith, 5 Iowa 157, motion improperly overruled.

Interest acquired pending litigation.— Failure to appoint a guardian ad litem for infants who, pending a contest of a will, have acquired by conveyance from the contestant rights in the property involved, will not of itself invalidate the judgment, nor entitle the infants to have it set aside. Shelby v. St. James Orphan Asylum, 66 Nebr. 40, 92 N. W. 155.

Transfer of interest pending litigation.— The fact that one of the parties against whom a judgment in partition was rendered was a minor who was not represented by a guardian ad litem did not invalidate the judgment where the minor, during the pendency of the suit, transferred his interest in the land to the party in whose favor the judgment was rendered. Shelburn v. McCrocklin, (Tex. Civ. App. 1897) 42 S. W. 329.

Proceedings against joint debtors.— The New York statute authorizing a plaintiff to proceed to judgment against joint debtors, where all the defendants have not been brought in, applies as well to infants as adults, and consequently a judgment thus entered against an infant defendant will not be revoked upon a writ of error, although it was entered without the appointment of a guardian to the infant. Mason v. Denison, 11 Wend. (N. Y.) 612.

Where a jury has found that a defendant was of full age, notwithstanding his plea of infancy, he cannot subsequently have the judgment set aside on the ground that he was an infant and no guardian appeared for him at the trial, but the finding of the jury can only be reviewed on appeal. Where the appointment of the guardian ad litem was void because of irregularities this does not render the judgment void but only voidable at the option of the infants, service of process having been duly made on them. Crouter v. Crouter, 133 N. Y. 55, 30 N. E. 726 [affirming 17 N. Y. Suppl. 758].

Proceedings in insolvency, in invitum, against an infant who is not represented by a guardian ad litem are void and may be set aside on a bill in equity brought by a creditor who has an attachment upon his estate, although such creditor's claim is one reversed on appeal or error or set aside by direct proceedings,[88] and is not subject to collateral attack.[89] Where it appears from the record of a cause that there are infant defendants for whom no guardian was appointed an appellate court cannot presume for the purpose of sustaining the judgment that such defendants attained their majority before the time of the trial.[90] Adult parties cannot invoke the infancy of another party not represented by guardian ad litem to set aside the decree as to themselves.[91] It is not an absolute prerequisite to jurisdiction of an action by an infant that he should sue by guardian ad litem or next friend;[92] but a failure to appoint a guardian ad litem or next friend for an infant plaintiff merely affects the regularity of the proceedings,[93] and the defect is one which before verdict is amendable, and after verdict and judgment is cured.[94]

(II) Dismissal or Nonsuit. It has been held, although there is also authority to the contrary, that the fact that an infant plaintiff[95] or defendant[96] is not represented by a next friend or guardian ad litem is not a ground for a dismissal of the suit, but an amendment should be permitted to introduce a representative. It has also been held that the fact that an infant plaintiff is not represented by guardian or next friend is not ground for a nonsuit, but the objection should be by plea in abatement.[97]

(III) New Trial. Where the proofs show that some of defendants were infants and no guardian ad litem was appointed for them this might be cause for a new trial.[98]

(IV) Waiver or Loss of Right to Object. A defendant waives the objection that plaintiff is an infant suing without a guardian or next friend when he pleads to the merits,[99] and fails to raise the objection by demurrer or answer,[1] and he cannot after plea or answer move on this ground to set aside the proceedings[2] or to arrest judgment.[3] It has been held that an infant defendant cannot, while an infant, waive the defect that he did not appear by guardian;[4] but if an infant defendant appears and pleads without guardian ad litem, and pending the suit he attains to full age, and afterward pleads again, the judgment will be binding upon him.[5] A defendant loses his right to attack a judgment against him on the ground that he was an infant when it was rendered and was not represented by guardian ad litem where he acquiesces in the judgment for a number of years after he becomes of age.[6]

Where an infant has arrived at such an age that he is presumed to possess sufficient discretion to select a suitable person to represent him, which age is usually fixed at fourteen years, a guardian ad litem may be appointed upon his application,[22] and in some states he is allowed a certain time to make such application and until the expiration of such time no other person can apply.[23] Where the infant is under the age referred to above, or where he fails to apply, the application may be made on his behalf by any other party to the action or by a relative or friend of the infant.[24] In case an infant is made a party defendant to an action, the plaintiff has a right to apply to the court for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for such infant,[25] and

Practice.— When the complainant applies for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant, he will be entitled to an order appointing such person as shall then be designated by the court, unless the infant, within ten days after service of a copy of the order, shall procure a guardian to be appointed for himself, and give notice thereof to the complainant. is not necessary that the next friend should be selected by the infant.[34] It has been considered that a married woman should not be appointed next friend or guardian ad litem.[35] In the absence of any statutory prohibition a non-resident may be appointed guardian ad litem.[36] A next friend or guardian ad litem for an infant plaintiff being liable for costs,[37] should be a person of substance.[38] One who could have acted as next friend for an infant can employ and indemnify another to allow the use of his name as such.[39] Neither the adverse party nor his counsel can be allowed to select the guardian to defend for the infants,[40] nor can a defendant appeal from the court's selection of a next friend for the infant plaintiff.[41]

(II) Relationship to Infant. The usual practice is to appoint as guardian ad litem or next friend the nearest relation of the infant who is not concerned in point of interest in the matter in question and is otherwise qualified to act;[42] but it is not necessary to the validity of the appointment that this practice should be

(III) Effect of Interest Adverse to Infant. There should be no conflicting interests between the infant and the person representing him,[46] and hence a person whose interest in a suit is adverse to an infant should not be appointed guardian ad litem,[47] or permitted to act as the next friend of the infant.[48] In order to disqualify, however, the adverse interest must be clear and substantial.[49] Neither should the attorney of an adverse party be appointed guardian ad litem of infants,[50] although the suit be an amicable one and the infants request that he

In New York there is no unbending rule of practice in relation to the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant upon application of the complainant where the infant and his friends neglect to procure the appointment of a guardian ad litem for him within twenty days after the return-day of the subpœna (Concklin v. Hall, 2 Barb. Ch. 136), but the usual practice is to grant an order nisi appointing some suitable person as guardian ad litem for the infant defendant unless he, within ten days after the service of a copy of the order, procures the appointment of another person (Concklin v. Hall, supra; Knickerbacker v. De Freest, 2 Paige 304). The court has also sanctioned the practice of giving notice to the infant at the time of serving the subpœna where he is of the age of fourteen or upward, or to his relative or protector in whose presence the subpœna is served where he is under that age, that if he does not procure the appointment of a guardian ad litem within twenty days after the return-day of the subpœna the complainant will apply to the court to appoint a guardian ad litem for him without further notice. Concklin v. Hall, supra.

In the case of infants who are absentees it is a matter of course to make an absolute order for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for them without further notice, where they or their friends do not procure a guardian to be appointed within twenty days after the expiration of the time limited in the order of the court for their appearance. (III) Service of Process on Infants.[61] Before the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant, either resident or non-resident, there should be such service of process upon the infant as is necessary to bring him within the jurisdiction of the court, and an appointment made without such service is irregular and unauthorized and will work a reversal on error of any decree rendered against the infant.[62] It has been held that an appointment without such

Appointment of guardian ad litem before service complete irregular.— Darrow v. Calkins, 154 N. Y. 503, 49 N. E. 61, 61 Am. St. Rep. 637, 48 L. R. A. 299 [affirming 6 N. Y. App. Div. 28, 39 N. Y. Suppl. 527]; Crouter v. Crouter, 17 N. Y. Suppl. 758 [affirmed in 133 N. Y. 55, 30 N. E. 726].

Service of writ without petition.— In a suit for partition and sale of land, the court has no jurisdiction to appoint a guardian ad litem for infants living out of the county who are entitled to be served with a copy both of the writ and petition but who are only served with a copy of the writ. Kremer v. Haynie, 67 Tex. 450, 3 S. W. 676.

Acceptance of service.— Where an administrator filed a petition to sell land to make assets, and the heir at law accepted service of the summons and a guardian ad litem was appointed, but no actual service was ever made, the irregularity was cured by N. C. Code Civ. Proc. § 387. Cates v. Pickett, 97 N. C. 21, 1 S. E. 763.

Action in rem.— In an action in a federal court in the nature of a suit in rem, seeking to subject certain property in which an infant is interested to the payment of partnership debts the appointment of a guardian ad litem for such infant on application of the mother was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction without actual service upon the infant. Sloane v. Martin, 145 N. Y. 524, 40 N. E. 217, 45 Am. St. Rep. 630, 28 L. R. A. 347 [affirming 77 Hun 249, 28 N. Y. Suppl. 332].

Service of process on infant defendants in another state does not give jurisdiction to appoint a guardian ad litem, where it is not made to appear that there is no parent or guardian of the infants within the state in which the action is brought upon whom process might be served. Frank v. Webb, 67 Miss. 462, 6 So. 620 [following Erwin v. Carson, 54 Miss. 282].

Equity suits in federal courts.— Congress and the federal courts having failed, up to 1868, to prescribe the manner in which infant defendants in equity suits in a federal court should be subjected to the jurisdiction of the court, and equity rule 90, then in force, having provided that, where the rules of the federal courts did not apply, the practice of the circuit court should be regulated by the practice in the English chancery court, a guardian ad litem for infant defendants could be appointed by the court without personal service on the infants, on an appearance being entered by a solicitor for such defendants, followed by a petition by their mother for such appointment; this being proper practice in the English chancery court. Sloane v. Martin, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 661 [affirmed in 77 Hun 249, 28 N. Y. Suppl. 332].

Bondurant v. Sibley, 37 Ala. 565 (holding therefore that an appointment of a second guardian was void when made before the irregular first appointment was set aside); Preston v. Dunn, 25 Ala. 507 (holding that where a guardian ad litem was appointed by the chancery court for an infant defendant, a decree rendered against the infant cannot be collaterally attacked by the infant for want of jurisdiction, although the appointment was made without service of process); Wood v. Martin, 66 Barb. (N. Y.) 241 (holding that as to infants under fourteen years of age, the appointment of a guardian ad litem before service of summons is, at most, an irregularity to which objection must be taken within a reasonable period). appears, failure to serve process on him before the appointment of a guardian ad litem will not render the appointment invalid.[65]

(iv) Application or Petition. An application, petition, or motion for the appointment of a guardian ad litem or next friend should be in writing,[66] and should state the name of the person proposed,[67] show his pecuniary responsibility,[68] and his consent to be appointed,[69] and set forth the facts giving the court authority to make the appointment.[70] It has been held not absolutely necessary that a petition for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant over fourteen years of age should be verified.[71] Irregularities or erroneous statements in the petition may be cured by amendment even after judgment has been rendered in the action.[72]

(v) Affidavits. In some jurisdictions it is necessary that there should be presented to the court an affidavit of the fact of infancy,[73] that there is no general

Appearance by general guardian.— Where in proceedings for partition the guardian appointed in another state of a non-resident idiot under age appeared and obtained the appointment of a guardian ad litem this gave the court jurisdiction over the ward's interest in the estate, although there had been no service of summons either personally or by publication on the guardian or his ward. Genuineness of signature.— It is no objection to the validity of a judgment against an infant defendant that it does not appear of record that the signature to his petition for the appointment of a guardian ad litem was proved to be genuine. It will be presumed that such proof was given on the trial. Varian v. Stevens, 2 Duer (N. Y.) 635.

73. In Alabama.— Under Ch. Pr. rule 23 (Rev. Code, p. 826), the appointment of a guardian ad litem for infant defendant must be made on affidavit of the fact of infancy and of the infant's age, or on sworn bill showing the fact of infancy and age of the minor, and not otherwise. Rhett v. Mastin, 43 Ala. 86; Carter v. Ingraham, 43 Ala. 78.

guardian,[74] that all the persons on whom by statute a summons for an infant defendant might be served are plaintiffs,[75] or as to the fitness or qualifications of the person to be appointed.[76]

(VI) Consent of Infant. It has been held that the consent of an infant is not necessary to the appointment of a guardian ad litem for him.[77]

In England on an application for the appointment, without a commission, of a guardian ad litem to an infant abroad, an affidavit should be produced of the infancy of the party. Lingren v. Lingren, 7 Beav. 66, 29 Eng. Ch. 66, 49 Eng. Reprint 987.

Time of filing.— On a motion for the appointment of a guardian ad litem, under the 21st order of May, 1850, the court permitted an affidavit, showing that defendants were infants, to be filed after the day named for the motion to be heard. Freeland v. Jones, 2 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 581.

74. McMakin v. Shelton, 6 Ky. L. Rep. 154, holding, however, that an affidavit that there is no statutory guardian is not a prerequisite to the right to appoint, but is merely a reliable manner specified by the code for informing the court.

Effect of general guardianship on right to sue or defend by next friend or guardian ad litem see GUARDIAN AND WARD.

Who may make affidavit.— An affidavit for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant defendant may be made either by plaintiff or his attorney. James v. Cox, 88 Ky. 270, 10 S. W. 814, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 858.

Sufficiency of affidavit.— An affidavit for the appointment of a guardian ad litem stating that infant defendants had no statutory guardian, curator, or committee "except their father," was a substantial compliance with Ky Code, § 38, requiring that the affidavit should show that defendant had no guardian, curator, or committee residing in the state known to the affiant. Donaldson v. Stone, 11 S. W. 462, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 27. An affidavit stating that affiant is the father of plaintiff, "who is an infant under 21 years of age, that he is a resident of Hardin county, Ky., and free from disability, and that he has no guardian, curator, or committee residing in this state known to affiant," is sufficient to authorize the prosecution of the action by affiant as next friend. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Nall, 51 S. W. 147, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 282.

When affidavit unnecessary.— Where the statutory guardians of infants interested, in an action to sell a decedent's realty to pay debts, are themselves defendants, and fail to secure a guardian ad litem for the infants, such appointment may be made by the court without the filing of any affidavit therefor in behalf of the infants. Gardner v. Letcher, 29 S. W. 868, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 778.

75. Walch v. Davis, 32 S. W. 281, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 634, holding, however, that under Ky. Civ. Code, § 52, providing certain persons on whom service may be made in case an infant be a defendant, and providing that if all such persons be plaintiffs, on affidavit of one of them, showing such fact, the clerk of court shall appoint a guardian ad litem for the infant, on whom the summons shall be served, a judgment against infant defendants is not void because the affidavit on which the guardian ad litem for them was appointed, made by their father, plaintiff, and who was the only one on whom process could be served, failed to state that there was no other on whom it could be served.

Sufficiency of affidavit.— An affidavit alleging the death of the father of infant defendants that plaintiff is their mother and guardian, and that they "reside" with her, is sufficient to authorize appointment of a guardian ad litem, without alleging that she is "the person having charge" of them. Robinson v. Clark, 34 S. W. 1083, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1401.

76. Foster v. Cautley, 10 Hare appendix xxiv, 17 Jur. 370, 22 L. J. Ch. 639, 1 Wkly. Rep. 275, 44 Eng. Ch. 737.

Form.— Such affidavit, under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, § 5, should be entitled "In the matter of the Act 'and in the matter of A. B. the infant," and not "In the special case." Star v. Newbery, 20 Beav. 14, 52 Eng. Reprint 507; Maddison v. Skein, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 20.

Amendment.— Where in a suit against an infant to foreclose a mortgage, the venue of the affidavit of the guardian ad litem showing his qualification was incorrectly stated, the court had power to amend the proceedings nunc pro tunc and to correct the error after the entry of final judgment, although the better practice might have been to have allowed the filing of a new affidavit nunc pro tunc. Baumeister v. Demuth, 84 N. Y. App. Div. 394, 82 N. Y. Suppl. 831 [reversing 40 Misc. 22, 81 N. Y. Suppl. 148, and affirmed in 178 N. Y. 630, 71 N. E. 1128].

77. Beddinger v. Smith, (Ark. 1890) 13 S. W. 734; Brick's Estate, 15 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 12, holding that 2 Rev. St. 150, which requires the ward's consent to the appointment of a guardian, relates only to the appointment of general guardians, and does not deprive the surrogate of the power to appoint a special guardian, or a guardian ad litem, without the consent of a minor, although he be over fourteen. See also Banta v. Calhoon, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 166 (holding that it is not necessary to bring an infant before the court before appointing a guardian ad litem); Walker v. Hull, 35 Mich. 488. Contra, E. B. v. E. C. B., 8 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 44, holding that a guardian ad litem cannot be appointed for an infant over fourteen years of age without the infant's consent. And see Walker v. Hallett, 1 Ala. 379, holding that infants above the age of fourteen years should be consulted in the appointment of a guardian

(VII) CONSENT OF GUARDIAN AD LITEM OR NEXT FRIEND. It is necessary to a complete and valid appointment of a guardian ad litem or next friend that the person so appointed should accept the appointment and consent to act in such capacity,[78] and it is sometimes required that the consent shall be in writing,[79] and Record should show acceptance. Jenkins v. Jenkins, 16 Ala. 693.

How acceptance indicated.— A guardian ad litem appointed for an infant defendant must indicate his acceptance by filing or adopting a proper answer. Alexander v. Davis, 42 W. Va. 465, 26 S. E. 291.

There must be an express assent or some action denoting assent and, in the absence of proof of such assent, the decree will be declared void for want of jurisdiction. Frierson v. Travis, 39 Ala. 150.

What is a sufficient consent.— Where a guardian appointed for infants in partition proceedings has made and filed a bond as required and has given notice thereof to the party intending to institute the action, he thereby consents to act as guardian and accepts his appointment as such. Althause v. Radde, 3 Bosw. (N. Y.) 410.

Acceptance after order of sale.— The fact that a guardian ad litem, appointed for the minor children in an application by the widow to have the homestead sold and reinvested, did not accept his appointment till after the order of sale was granted, was merely an irregularity, which was cured by the court's subsequent order confirming the sale. Deyton v. Bell, 81 Ga. 370, 8 S. E. 620.

A judgment against an infant will be reversed in the absence of evidence to show that the guardian ad litem accepted the appointment or acted as such guardian. Creech v. Creech, 10 Mo. App. 586.

In a collateral attack on a decree in the accounting of a guardian the record must in order to sustain the decree affirmatively show that the guardian ad litem accepted the appointment, and this cannot be inferred from a mere recital that the guardian ad litem was present and did not object to the allowance of the accounts and vouchers in the settlement of the guardian's account. Guardian ad litem nisi.— The provision of N. Y. Code Civ. Schell v. Cohen, 55 Hun (N. Y.) 207, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 858.

79. McVickar v. Constable, Hopk. (N. Y.) 102.

Sufficiency.— Where plaintiff's father files with the justice before whom suit was begun a written consent to become the next friend of plaintiff and responsible for the costs, this is a sufficient compliance with the Missouri statute. Bush v. Fisher, 85 Mo. App. 1.

A complaint signed by the next friend of the infant is a sufficient consent in writing. Peacock v Albin, 39 Ind. 25.

Time of filing consent.— Ind. Rev. St. (1881) § 256, providing that, "before any process shall be issued in the name of an infant, who is a sole plaintiff, a competent and responsible person shall consent in writing to appear, as the next friend," is merely directory, in respect to the time when such consent shall be filed, and process may issue and the cause proceed without such consent, until it is required by defendant. Greenman v. Cohee, 61 Ind. 201; Budd v. Rutherford, 4 Ind. App. 386, 30 N. E. 1111.

When objection to lack of consent too late. — Where a person who was sued by an infant before a justice appeared to the suit before the justice, went to trial on the merits, and suffered judgment to be rendered against him, without making the objection that the next friend of the infant had not consented in writing to his appointment, and the suit was appealed to the circuit court where defendant moved to dismiss for the want of such written consent; but the circuit court was not informed, by affidavit or otherwise, that defendant did not know of the omission complained of while the suit was pending before the justice, the circuit court properly refused to dismiss the suit. that there shall be an acknowledgment of the written consent by the guardian ad litem or next friend.[80]

(VIII) ORDER OF APPOINTMENT. An order of the court appointing a guardian ad litem is usually required.[81] The order should certainly designate the person who is appointed,[82] and, if the statute requires, a bond from the guardian must direct that it be given.[83] An order appointing a guardian ad litem for minor defendants is inoperative if the minors are not named in the order,[84] or in the guardian's answer, or any portion of the record;[85] but it is otherwise if the record shows that some of defendants are minors.[86] An order appointing a guardian ad litem has been considered not to be appealable,[87] but such an order may be rescinded by the court where another person has been previously appointed and has filed an answer.[88]

(IX) NOTICE OF APPOINTMENT. In some states notice of the appointment of a guardian ad litem must be given.[89]

In New York where a guardian ad litem is appointed for non-resident infant defendants on the application of plaintiff the order appoints a certain person unless within a certain time after service of the order upon them or their parents they procure a guardian to be appointed. Gotendorf v. Goldschmidt, 83 N. Y. 110, holding that where service was made as directed, and at the expiration of the time limited, no steps having been taken by or on behalf of the infants, the guardian was appointed and duly qualified, and the summons was served on him and the infants appeared by him and answered, this was sufficient. A justice cannot act out of court in directing how an order appointing a guardian ad litem under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 473, shall be served but such directions must be given by the court. Uhl v. Loughran, 4 N. Y. Suppl. 827, 16 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 386 [affirming 2 N. Y. Suppl. 190, 14 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 344]. Where service was had by publication on non-resident infant defendants, and after their time to appear had expired a guardian ad litem was appointed on petition of plaintiffs, the appointment was not invalid because it did not contain a provision that a person might be appointed unless the infant, or someone on his behalf, procured the appointment of a guardian. Piatt v. Finck, 60 N. Y. App. Div. 312, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 74.

Presumption.— Where an answer is filed for infant defendants by one purporting to be their guardian ad litem, and the decree recites that he was so appointed, but the record shows no separate order of appointment, it will be presumed that the appointment was regularly made. Tibbs v. Allen, 27 Ill. 119.

What sufficient to show order.— Where a petition by infant defendants for the appointment of a guardian ad litem appears in the records of a cause, and the calendar entries show that an order was made appointing the guardian, and the answer of the infants is signed by their guardian ad litem, this is sufficient to show that an order was made appointing the guardian, although it does not appear in the files of the case. Stevenson v. Kurtz, 98 Mich. 493, 57 N. W. 580.

Orders signed as of course.— Orders for appointments of guardians ad litem for infants are signed as of course, and should not be presented at chambers, but merely mailed to the clerk on application therefor. Anonymous, 10 N. J. L. J. 22.

82. Hess v. Voss, 52 Ill. 472, holding, however, that it is not essential to the validity of an order appointing "the clerk of the court" guardian ad litem that he be designated by a name.

83. Walter v. De Graaf, 19 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 406, holding that an order appointing a guardian ad litem, which fails to direct him to give bond, is void, and the defect cannot be cured by amendment nunc pro tunc.

The answer of a guardian ad litem is proof

a guardian ad litem was regularly and properly made and that the necessary proofs were before the court to justify its action in making the order.[90] Irregularity in the appointment of a guardian ad litem does not affect the jurisdiction,[91] and renders the appointment merely voidable;[92] but the appointment of a guardian ad litem for an infant not a party to the suit or properly brought into court is a nullity.[93] A recognition by the court of a person appearing for infants as their representative has in some cases been held equivalent to an appointment of such person as guardian ad litem.[94]

Suit on bond. — A person, who as next friend of a minor, has recovered a sum of money, and given bond faithfully to account but it has been held that the omission of the guardian ad litem to file his bond is a mere irregularity[97] which is curable,[98] and does not affect the jurisdiction of the court[99] or the validity of a sale under its judgment.[1] Where an infant sues by next friend it is not usually considered necessary that he should give a bond for the security of the infant.[2] therefor, may, upon the majority of such minor, be sued by him as for a breach of such bond in any court having jurisdiction of his person and of the subject-matter, without first obtaining an order from the court appointing the next friend and requiring the bond. Rule in chancery cases.— McClellan Dig. Fla. p. 812, § 7, requiring the next friend of an infant to give bond upon the institution of a suit, relates exclusively to proceedings at common law, and does not apply to suits in equity, wherein, however, chancellors have power to adopt such measures as are necessary fully to protect the interest of infant litigants. In Illinois "the filing of the bond for costs is not a jurisdictional prerequisite to beginning a suit for a minor by one who has not been appointed "next friend" by the court, but such bond may be filed at any time during the suit. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Latimer, 128 Ill. 163, 21 N. E. 7 [affirming 28 Ill. App. 552]. A court has power, on a proper showing made, to allow a minor to prosecute a suit by his next friend, without such next friend giving security for costs (St. Louis, etc., R. Co. v. Reagan, 52 Ill. App. 488; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Lane, 30 Ill. App. 437 [affirmed in 130 Ill. 116, 22 N. Where the next friend is insolvent he may be compelled to give security for costs. Fulton v. Rosevelt, 1 Paige (N. Y.) 178.

(II) For Costs. The guardian ad litem or next friend of an infant plaintiff is in some jurisdictions required to give a bond for costs.[3]

A non-resident guardian ad litem for an infant plaintiff, whether a responsible person or not, may be required to give security for costs, although some of the plaintiffs in the action are residents. Ten Broeck v. Reynolds, 13 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 462.

Substitution of new next friend.— Where the name of a next friend was stricken from the bill and another person appointed in order that the original next friend might become a witness the court required the new next friend to give security for costs already incurred. Colden v. Haskins, 3 Edw. (N. Y.) 311. It is to be noted that under the present New York statutes security for costs is not required.

Written consent to be responsible for costs. —Failure of a guardian ad litem to file a written consent to be responsible for costs, as required by N. Y. Laws (1882), c. 410, § 1295, is ground for a dismissal of the action in the municipal court. Weintraub v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co., 27 Misc. (N. Y.) 540, 58 N. Y. Suppl. 295.

Leave to sue as poor person.— Where an order granted before the commencement of an action has permitted an infant to sue as a poor person, a motion of defendant that a guardian ad litem be required to file security for costs should be denied. Hayes v Second Ave. R. Co., 5 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 155.

g. Oath. In some jurisdictions a guardian ad litem is required to take an oath prescribed by statute.[4]

h. Effect of Appointment. The fact that a court has appointed a guardian ad litem for a party to a suit is conclusive evidence of his infancy only for that purpose, and does not otherwise affect the question of infancy, which may be subsequently raised by the proper plea.[5]

4. Powers, Rights, and Duties[6] — a. Powers in General. A guardian ad litem or next friend is recognized only for certain specific purposes and has not the general powers of a trustee or guardian.[7] His powers are strictly limited to matters connected with the suit in which he is appointed, and his acts with respect to the infant's rights concerning any other matters are unauthorized;[8] but he is a full representative of the rights and interests of the infant for the particular case in which he is appointed, and is clothed with as full and perfect authority for that suit as the general guardian is for all the duties incident to his office.[9] Neither a guardian ad litem nor next friend can injure or prejudice the infant by any act.[10]

W. 1006, next friend. Contra, Rhoads v. Rhoads, 43 Ill. 239, holding that the guardian ad litem cannot bind the infant by anything he may do.

Conveyance.— In a suit against infant devisees for specific performance of a contract of sale made by the testator the guardian ad litem may be directed to execute a conveyance in the names of the infants. See Knight v. Weatherwax, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 182. As to sufficiency of conveyance executed under order of court see U. S. Bank v. Van Ness, 2 Fed. Cas. No. 938, 5 Cranch C. Dismissal of suit.— A next friend can dismiss a suit because he is himself liable for the costs, but it may well be questioned whether he can do even this when injury to the minor would be the result. Isaacs v. Boyd, 5 Port. (Ala.) 388. The rights of a

b. Power to Bring Suit. A next friend may bring a suit without first obtaining leave of the court;[11] but it has been held that as the power of a next friend commences with the suit he can maintain a suit for such causes of action only as may be prosecuted without a previous special demand, unless defendant has waived the necessity of a demand.[12]

c. Protection of Infant's Interest. The duty of a guardian ad litem or next friend is to look after the infant's interests and to act for him in all matters relating to the suit as he might act for himself if he were of capacity to do so.[13] The guardian ad litem should make a defense of the interests of the infant as vigorous as the nature of the case will admit.[14] His duty requires him to acquaint himself with the rights, both legal and equitable, of his ward and take all necessary steps to defend and protect them,[15] and to submit to the court for its consideration and decision every question involving the rights of the infant affected by the suit.[16] If in consequence of the culpable omission or neglect of the guardian ad litem the interests of the infant are sacrificed the guardian may be punished for his neglect[17] as well as made to respond to the infant for the damage sustained.[18]

d. Election For Infant. The guardian ad litem may sometimes with the concurrence of the court make an election for the infant,[19] but a next friend cannot elect between two rights by filing a bill in one aspect alone.[20]

e. Appearance. The mere appointment of a guardian ad litem and his appearance for infants does not of itself make them parties to the suit,[21] but where a party is duly served with process and a guardian ad litem is appointed and appears and files an answer for him this brings him into court for all the purposes of the suit.[22]

Admissions not prejudicial.— Where, in a proceeding to reach the equitable interest of a judgment debtor in real estate, against the debtor and his infant daughter, in whose name the title had been taken, the substantial matters admitted in the answer of the guardian were matters of record, it was held that the court could not presume that the decree was rendered on the admissions of the guardian, and that those admissions did not prejudice the rights of the infant. Illustrations.— A guardian ad litem may enter into a stipulation as to the state of a party's bank-account at a certain time (Rarick v. Vandevier, 11 Colo. App. 116, 52 Pac. 743), or consent to the trial of the case at the first term (McMillan v. Hunnicutt, 109 Ga. 699, 35 S. E. 102). i. Employment of Attorney. Although a next friend or guardian ad litem may employ an attorney to conduct the suit,[33] he cannot make a contract for the payment of a specified compensation which will bind the infant or his estate;[34] but the compensation of the attorney will be fixed by the court without regard to any such contract.[35]

j. Purchase of Infant's Property.[36] A guardian ad litem or next friend cannot acquire the infant's property for himself pending litigation in respect to it,[37] nor, it has been held, purchase the infant's property or property in which the infant is interested at a sale ordered in the action in which he represents the infant.[38] agree that the case may be submitted without argument, the testimony to have the same effect as if taken by the examiner after infant's answer had been filed. Biddinger v. Wiland, 67 Md. 359, 10 Atl. 202. Where a legatee who is a minor has been personally served with citation to appear in the probate court in a proceeding to make final settlement of the accounts of the administrator and a guardian ad litem is appointed by the court pending the proceeding such guardian may waive notice of citation and consent to an immediate hearing. Pollock v. Buie, 43 Miss. 140. The guardian ad litem of an infant defendant in a suit for a partition sale is not required to put in an answer, although it is advisable that such answer should be filed to protect the guardian if he is ignorant of the infant's interest in the property. Where he knows the rights of his client and is willing to assume the responsibility, there is no reason why he may not consent to the partition. At any rate it does not affect the regularity of the proceedings. Bogert v. Bogert, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 121. A guardian ad litem may consent to the removal of the suit from one circuit court to another (Lemmon v. Herbert, 92 Va. 653, 24 S. Formerly such a purchase was considered merely voidable. See Dugan v. Sharkey, 89 N. Y. App. Div. 161, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 778; Dugan v. Denyse, 13 N. Y. App. Div. 214, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 308.

5. Compensation and Allowances — a. In General. The guardian ad litem is allowed a reasonable compensation for his services,[39] and where serious questions were involved and he was justified in litigating the matter to the extent he did the fact that he was unsuccessful in upholding his contentions does not deprive him of the right to compensation.[40] Reasonable attorney's fees which the guardian has paid should also be allowed him.[41] A next friend is entitled to be reimbursed all his expenditures,[42] but he has been held not entitled to any compensation for personal services.[43]

b. How Allowance Made. The allowance of compensation or reimbursement is to be made by the court in which the action is brought,[44] before the case is

Departure from contract as to compensation.— Before his appointment as guardian ad litem, an attorney agreed to accept such appointment in a proposed suit and conduct the litigation therein for his wards for a specified sum in the trial court and for a like sum in the supreme court on appeal. He received and receipted for the agreed sum after the trial. Thereafter the opposing attorney was changed and the guardian ad litem's right to appeal was opposed and the general guardian attempted to secure his discharge and opposed all his efforts in behalf of the wards. It was held that the compensation of the guardian ad litem for services in the trial court was fixed by the agreement, but the circumstances of the appeal were so changed from those contemplated when the agreement was made that compensation should be awarded to the guardian ad litem independent of the agreement. Services in appellate court.—Under Ky. Civ. finally disposed of.[45] The guardian's compensation and allowance is sometimes taxed in the bill of costs,[46] but an allowance of solicitor's fees cannot be included as part of such costs to be paid by the opposing party.[47] Where in an unsuccessful contest of the validity of a will, the same guardian ad litem was appointed for all the minor devisees, and their interests under the will, although different, constituted the only property owned by them, an allowance to the guardian in solido for all services in the cause was proper.[48] Where a reference is made to ascertain the amount of fees due a guardian ad litem for services to a minor the guardian and minor occupy antagonistic positions and hence another guardian ad litem should be appointed for that particular matter.[49]

The authority of a guardian ad litem or next friend terminates at the conclusion of the suit in which he was appointed to act for the infant;[65] but such authority is not ended or suspended by an appeal to a higher court,[66] nor is it necessary that there should be a new guardian ad litem every time a pleading is amended.[67]

E. Attainment of Majority Pending Action. Where an action is begun by guardian ad litem or next friend, and during the pendency thereof the infant becomes of age the action does not abate,[87] but may proceed in the name of the infant if he so elects.[88] In such case the record should show that the suit is prosecuted by plaintiff himself,[89] and it is proper to strike out the name of the guardian or next friend,[90] but an amendment of the proceedings is not necessary,[91] a mere suggestion of the fact entered on the record being sufficient.[92] Where an infant has commenced an action without a guardian ad litem or next friend and during the pendency thereof he reaches majority it is competent for him to continue the action thus erroneously commenced, and to ratify what has been done therein, and thereafter there is no good reason why the action should not proceed with the same effect as if it had been properly commenced.[93] So also the coming of age of an infant defendant does not abate the suit,[94] or dismiss him therefrom or relieve him of any of the duties and responsibilities of a party.[95] Neither does it render a supplemental bill necessary unless his interest in the suit is changed by that event.[96] But the late infant upon coming of age is entitled to personally manage his own defense.[97] The fact that some of defendants were infants when the suit was instituted and no guardian ad litem was appointed does not affect the validity of the judgment where before such judgment was rendered they became of age and were notified and aware of the pendency of the suit and its object.[98] It has been held, however, that service upon an infant will not compel his appearance after arriving at age;[99] and under a statute providing that a judgment in ejectment was conclusive upon the party against whom it was recovered, not under disability at the time of its recovery, it has been held that where a judgment in ejectment rendered in favor of an infant was reversed on appeal after he came of age, but there was nothing in the record showing his appearance as an adult, the judgment was not conclusive against him.[1] If a suit by next friend was not properly brought, the infant may, on coming of age, abandon it.[2]

F. Process[3] — 1. Requisites in General. It has been held that where an infant is plaintiff the form of the writ may be the same as in other cases,[4] and that summons or citation to infant defendants should show the age of each infant,[5] and direct them to appear by guardian.[6] But where the summons was

Service on mother.— Where an infant defendant of tender years has no general guardian, service of subpœna may be made upon his mother, who is also the trustee of his estate. Peck v. Adsit, 98 Mich. 639, 57 N. W. 804. But the service of process, when issued against infants under fourteen years of age, is not valid when made on them and their mother, unless it appears in and from the affidavit of the bailiff that no father or guardian of the infants could be found. Service on the mother and stepfather of an infant under fourteen years of age, residing with them, authorizes and requires the appointment of a guardian ad litem. Irwin v. Irwin, 57 Ala. 614.

Summons running to parent as such.— Where a summons substantially conforming to the statute was served on defendant, who was a minor under fourteen; and a similar summons, but running to D as the minor's mother, was served on her, this was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the minor. Kalb v. German Sav., etc., Soc., 25 Wash. 349, 65 Pac. 559.

Unchristened infant.— Under Ky. Civ. Code, § 52, requiring the summons to be served on the father of an infant under fourteen years of age, service on the father of several defendants under that age is good as to an unchristened infant described in the summons, where a guardian ad litem is appointed and defense is made for all, although the father is a party plaintiff, and the sheriff's return mentions the other children, but does not mention such infant. Donaldson v. Stone, 11 S. W. 462, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 27. By the act of Jan. 6, 1882, special provision is made for the case where one of the persons on whom summons for an infant defendant must be served is a plaintiff.

Where the father is plaintiff in an action against his infant son, service of process on the father as the son's representative is insufficient to give jurisdiction over his person. Isert v. Davis, 32 S. W. 294, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 686; Uhl v. Loughran, 4 N. Y. Suppl. 827.

the writ against the minor could be made.[55] The return may be amended so as to show that proper service was actually made.[56]

8. Recitals in Record as to Service. The record should affirmatively show that process was duly served on the infant,[57] and a recital of service in the record is presumed to be true;[58] but an infant defendant is at liberty to show that the service was not in fact made.[59] If the record shows service on the infant, but does not show with whom he was residing, it will be presumed for the purpose of sustaining the jurisdiction that he was residing with his father.[60]

9. Presumption of Service. Where a court has undertaken to pass upon the rights of infants who were represented by guardian ad litem it will be presumed in a collateral proceeding that they were brought properly before the court.[61]

10. Waiver of Irregularities. It has been held that an irregularity in the service of summons is waived when defendant appears and answers, even though he be an infant appearing and answering by guardian ad litem.[62]

11. Waiver of Process.[63] Where personal service upon an infant is required he cannot waive such service,[64] nor can his parents[65] or guardian[66] waive service for him; but when service upon the general guardian is all that is required, the guardian may waive such service,[67] or a guardian ad litem may waive service upon himself.[68] Where a writ is sued out against and served on an infant, who, after he arrives at majority, appears and pleads to the action, he cannot afterward object that the writ was not properly served by reason of his minority.[69]

12. Arrest in Civil Actions. In North Carolina it has been held that an infant who has been arrested in a civil suit should be discharged from custody on motion, upon the fact of infancy being shown to the court.[70] But in Pennsylvania it has been held that where there is no charge of fraud, the court will not discharge a defendant summarily on the ground of infancy; but will leave him to indebtedness of defendant to the infant and not to the next friend as such.[82] In a suit by an infant to recover money obtained from him it is not necessary to make any other than the general allegations of damage to plaintiff.[83] Failure of the petition, in an action by a father, as next friend of his child, to recover for her damages for personal injuries, to allege that she has no lawful guardian is cured by verdict.[84]

(II) Allegation of Infancy and Representation by Guardian or Next Friend. The petition or complaint in an action by an infant should allege his infancy,[85] his representation by guardian ad litem or next friend,[86] and, where an appointment is necessary, the due appointment of the person acting in that capacity.[87]

(III) Allegation of Ratification or Disaffirmance of Contract, Etc. In an action to enforce rights under a contract, etc., made while an infant, it is not necessary that plaintiff should expressly allege ratification.[88] Neither when a minor conveys land, and, after attaining majority, brings an action of ejectment to recover it, is it necessary to set out in the petition a disaffirmance of the conveyance.[89]

See 27 Cent. Dig. tit. "Infants," § 278. Compare Bent v. Maxwell Land Grant, etc., Co., 3 N. M. 158, 3 Pac. 721, holding that a bill in equity reciting that infants appear by their next friend, without showing that an order of appointment was made, is sufficient.

Allegation of giving bond. — See Temple v. Price 24 Mo. 288, failure to allege no ground for demurrer.

Effect of erroneous allegation. — Where a guardian ad litem is in fact appointed by the county judge, an allegation in a complaint filed by such guardian that he was appointed by an order of the county court does not preclude him, on a motion to dismiss the proceedings, from claiming that the order was made by the judge. Statement in answer. — The ratification by an infant, after attaining majority, of a contract for services during infancy, is sufficiently alleged by the answer of defendant stating that such services had been rendered pursuant to the contract, that defendant had fully paid for them in accordance with the terms thereof, and that plaintiff, after attaining majority and with full knowledge of the facts, had ratified such contract. (iv) Verification of Petition or Complaint. A petition or complaint in an action by an infant may be verified by his next friend or guardian ad litem.[90]

b. Pleadings of Defendant — (i) Objection of Infant's Incapacity to Sue. Plaintiff, if of lawful age, is not required to allege it;[91] but if defendant relies upon plaintiff's incapacity to sue because of infancy he must plead it.[92] The objection of the incapacity of an infant plaintiff should be taken by a plea in abatement;[93] but it has also been held that it may be taken by answer,[94] or, if the infancy appears on the face of the writ, by demurrer.[95] Infancy of plaintiff is not a sufficient plea in bar,[96] nor is it ground for a nonsuit.[97] If defendant does not in a proper manner raise the objection to plaintiff's capacity to sue it is considered as waived,[98] and he cannot raise it after pleading to the merits.[99]

Amendment.— Defendant may ordinarily get the benefit of the objection that plaintiff is an infant by motion to amend after the testimony bearing upon the merits has been heard, if the court in its discretion allows the amendment. But where the disability still continues when such motion is heard the usual practice of the court is to protect the infant by allowing him also to amend his summons and complaint by inserting the

(II) Objection of Lack of Due Appointment of Guardian or Next Friend. A defect in a petition by an infant, suing by next friend, because of failure to allege that the person acting as next friend has been duly appointed, may be raised by answer;[1] but the better and more convenient practice is to take a preliminary objection by motion before interposing an answer to the merits.[2] If no objection is made to the declaration on the ground that it does not show the due appointment of the next friend, the objection must, after verdict, be considered as waived.[3] An issue as to such appointment is not raised by a general denial.[4]

2. Actions Against Infants — a. Pleadings of Plaintiff — (I) In General. On the foreclosure of a mortgage against infant defendants the complaint must allege the requisite facts to show what the interests of the infants in the premises are.[5] In Alabama it has been held that a bill against infants should recite whether they are over the age of fourteen years.[6]

(II) Allegations as to Necessaries. Where a declaration on a note shows that the maker was an infant but does not allege that the note was given for necessaries the suit may be dismissed on demurrer.[7] A complaint in an action against an infant for necessaries furnished is sufficient if it contains allegations which if made in a declaration at common law would have stated a cause of action of debt for board and lodging or goods furnished.[8] Where defendant in a suit on a promissory note pleads infancy a replication stating that the consideration of the note was necessaries furnished defendant at his request, without specifying of what such necessaries consisted, or when furnished, or how or by whom, is bad.[9]

(III) Allegations of Ratification or New Promise. Ratification of the contract of an infant validates it between the parties,[10] and it may be declared on without noticing the ratification;[11] but where infancy is pleaded by defendant the facts constituting ratification are in avoidance of the plea and must be introduced into the pleadings, in actions at law, by a replication.[12] Where a defendant pleads infancy plaintiff may by his replication set up a new promise by defendant after reaching majority.[13] This plea admits a truth of defendant's plea of infancy, and hence that need not be proved,[14] but the new promise must be proved.[15]

b. Pleadings of Defendant — (I) TIME TO PLEAD. A rule of court limiting the time within which dilatory pleas may be filed, when applied to action against an infant defending by guardian ad litem, should be so construed or extended as at least to allow the guardian to file such a plea within the time limited after his appointment.[16]

(II) OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION. Infants must raise objections to the jurisdiction of the court in the mode and time prescribed by statute the same as adults.[17]

(III) ANSWER FOR INFANTS IN GENERAL. A guardian ad litem should answer for the infant[18] denying every material allegation of the complaint prejudicial to him,[19] and setting up every defense to which the infant is entitled,[20] or at least calling for strict proof[21] and praying that the rights of the infant be protected;[22] and it is irregular and erroneous to proceed to a hearing[23] or render a decree against an infant[24] without an answer having been previously filed on his behalf by the guardian. The answer of a guardian ad litem must not be his personal answer, but the answer of the infant by the guardian.[25] It has been held that where infant defendants have no special or separate defense, no separate answer is necessary, but joinder in the general answer of defendants is sufficient.[26]

The answer of an infant by his guardian cannot be excepted to for insufficiency.[27] A merely formal answer of a guardian ad litem submitting the rights of the infant to the protection of the court need not be under oath,[28] but such an answer has the effect of a general denial and any defense that could be availed of is to be considered as interposed.[29] An infant's answer on oath, by his guardian, is not evidence either in his favor[30] or against him.[31] Where a decree recites that the cause came on to be heard on the answer of the guardian ad litem for an infant defendant it will be presumed that the answer was sworn to, although there is no evidence of the fact in the record.[32] The general answer of an infant by his guardian ad litem, when sufficient for the purpose of putting plaintiff to his proofs, and enabling the guardian to controvert every allegation of the complaint, suffices to raise an issue of fact for the purpose of taxation of costs.[33] Where a guardian ad litem did not sign his answer, but it was verified and filed and treated as properly drawn, this was a mere irregularity not affecting the title of a purchaser in the proceedings.[34] Where a decree was reversed because no order appeared in the record to have been made appointing the person who answered for infants their guardian ad litem and the court below then appointed a new guardian but revoked such appointment on discovering that an order had actually been made appointing the first guardian ad litem, which did not appear in the record by reason of a clerical error, it was held that the court proceeded correctly in hearing the cause upon the answer of the guardian first appointed.[35]

(IV) SETTING UP INFANCY. In order for the defense of infancy to be available in an action on a contract, etc., it must be pleaded;[36] but an allegation that at the time of the transaction defendant was an infant is sufficient without alleging that the transaction was voidable.[37] A joint plea of the infancy of one defendant in an action on a joint and several bond is bad on demurrer.[38] Where an infant

(v) Denial of Concealment of Infancy. Where plaintiff alleges that defendant concealed his infancy at the time of the transaction on which the action is based a denial by defendant that he concealed his infancy is not a good plea, but if he notified plaintiff of his infancy he should plead such notice affirmatively.[40]

J. Issues and Evidence — 1. In General. In actions against infants all the facts entitling plaintiff to judgment must be sustained by proof,[41] and the necessity of establishing the case as against an infant party cannot be obviated by making him a plaintiff.[42] Where a defendant sets up infancy and rescission of the contract sued on and defendant sets up matters in avoidance of the infancy and rescission he must prove the facts alleged.[43] Where a plaintiff sues on a note whose execution defendant admits, but against which he pleads minority, plaintiff must, in order to recover, bring his case within the statute providing that an emancipated minor engaged in trade is of age for all purposes of such trade.[44] Where it is alleged that a defendant at the time of the transaction in question was in business holding himself out as of full age, and concealed from plaintiff the fact of his infancy and defendant alleges that plaintiff knew of his infancy, which plaintiff denies, the burden of proof is on defendant to show such knowledge on the part of plaintiff.[45] The acts and admissions of an infant relative to the subject-matter of the suit are admissible in evidence,[46] but his infancy may be shown to obviate their effect, and the weight to be attached to them must depend upon the circumstances.[47] The answer of complainant to the cross bill of adult defendants, stating the consideration of a note sued upon, cannot be taken as proof against infant defendants.[48] In an action by an infant it is not necessary to make proof of the appointment of the guardian ad litem unless defendant makes the objection that no such appointment has been made.[49] A written notice of disaffirmance of a deed executed by a minor may be given in evidence under a pleading which alleges disaffirmance either in general terms or by setting out such notice specially.[50] It has been held that as infants are entitled to special protection in a court of chancery infant defendants in a suit to enforce a vendor's lien may show a waiver of the lien without specially pleading it.[51]

2. Proof of Infancy. Where suit is brought by next friend it is proper to prove the infancy of the real plaintiff and hence his right to sue in this manner.[52] Where a suit is brought by guardian or next friend a plea of the general issue[53] or of accord and satisfaction[54] admits plaintiff's infancy, and hence it need not be proved. Infancy as a ground of relief is never presumed but must be proved;[55] but it has been held that, although in an action prosecuted by next friend the answer denies the infancy of plaintiff, he need not prove that he is an infant where his right of action does not depend upon that fact.[56] When nothing appears to the contrary, persons entering into an agreement are presumed to be adults, and competent to contract,[57] and hence one who relies upon his infancy to defeat his act, contract, etc., has the burden of proving such infancy.[58] When the defense of infancy rests upon the uncorroborated testimony of defendant, his physical appearance, in connection with all the other circumstances of the case, may be considered by the jury in determining whether or not his testimony is deserving of credit.[59] In an action upon a contract, etc., proof of the infancy of defendant may be made under a plea of the general issue.[60] Where there are several issues, one of which is upon the plea of infancy, and that is found for defendant, it disposes of the whole case, and entitles defendant to a judgment; and the jury need not pass upon the other issues.[61]

3. Depositions. A deposition cannot be read against an infant where it does not appear that the guardian ad litem was served with notice.[62] Under the statutes of some states a deposition cannot be read in a suit for the sale of the land of an infant unless taken in the presence of the guardian ad litem or upon interrogatories agreed upon by him;[63] but such provision does not apply to suits against infants generally.[64] If a deposition is taken in a case to which an infant is a party, before the same is at issue, and it does not appear to have been taken de bene esse and there is reason to believe that there was collusion between the guardian ad litem or next friend of the infant and the adverse party the deposition will be rejected.[65] It is no valid objection to proceedings against an infant that depositions were taken before the same person as commissioner who was the guardian ad litem of the infant.[66] In Kentucky where the only defendant against whom a deposition is to be read is under the disability of infancy alone, the deposition must be taken upon interrogatories except in actions and proceedings for divorce and alimony and the custody of children.[67]

4. Preservation of Evidence in Record. In Illinois it is held that all the evidence necessary to establish a decree against an infant should be preserved in the record.[68] But in Indiana it has been held that a decree against an infant will not be reversed simply because the evidence is not in the record.[69]

K. Variance. The rule that the proof adduced at the trial must correspond with the allegations in the pleadings applies to actions against infants,[70] but a variance in the name of an infant defendant as stated in the complaint and in the

L. Trial — 1. Time For Trial. In case an infant appears by guardian and makes an issue it may be noticed for trial at once like other issues.[72]

2. Questions For Court and Jury. Where a question of infancy vel non arises directly it must be determined by a jury,[73] but whether an infant grantor was, at the time of executing the deed, under the government of a parent or guardian, is, upon a given state of facts, strictly a question of strict law, involving only the legal operation and effect of such facts.[74] It is a question for the jury whether the deed, contract, etc., of an infant has been ratified,[75] or avoided,[76] and in case an avoidance is claimed, whether it was within a reasonable time is also a question of fact for the jury.[77] In a case where the consideration of an infant's contract consisted partly of money paid for him, and partly of an undertaking by defendant involving uncertain risks, if the infant seeks to recover back money paid in execution of the contract the jury must determine what, under all the circumstances, it was reasonable the infant should engage to pay, and that sum should be allowed to defendant against the money paid in execution of the contract, and the balance, if any, recovered by plaintiff.[78] In an action against a minor for goods sold and delivered to him pursuant to a bargain made by his father, who, with his knowledge and consent, was using his name, and doing business under it, under such circumstances that persons dealing with him might suppose that his father was the one who owned the business, it is reversible error to refuse to submit to the jury the question whether the minor obtained the goods by fraud, since, if such were the case, he would be liable for the price.[79] In New York when an issue of fact is raised by the answer of an infant defendant in partition such issue must be tried by a jury and the infant is not entitled to a reference.[80] An infant party cannot waive trial by jury.[81] The fact that plaintiff is an infant does not necessarily make the question of negligence one for the jury, but where the facts are undisputed and the inferences certain it may be a question of law for the court.[82] Whether or not plaintiff's next friend was duly and regularly appointed is a question of law for the court.[83]

3. VERDICT AND FINDINGS. In an action against several defendants, one of whom is an infant, the jury may find for the infant and against the other defendants.[84] Under an issue formed to try the question of property between a claimant and a plaintiff in execution, the jury cannot render a verdict against the claimant on the ground of infancy. The proper course in such case is to move for an issue to try the question of infancy, or for the appointment of a guardian.[85] A statutory provision that findings of fact may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact applies to infants as well as to adults.[86]

4. REFERENCE. Where some of defendants are infants the court will not grant a summary reference until a guardian ad litem has been appointed.[87] An infant is not capable of consenting to a reference in an action to which he is a party,[88] and the guardian ad litem of an infant defendant should not consent to a general reference to a master to take an account against the infant until he has ascertained that the rights of the infant can be protected on such reference.[89] Where testimony is taken before a master in chancery without notice to the guardian ad litem of infant defendants it is not admissible as against the infants notwithstanding the guardian may make no objection on the hearing.[90] It is the practice of English and Canadian courts when a bill of foreclosure is filed by the mortgagee after the death of the mortgagor, and the heir is an infant, to refer it to the master with the consent of the mortgagee to inquire where a sale or foreclosure will be most for the benefit of the infant.[91]

M. New Trial. In Kentucky an infant defendant is entitled to a new trial for erroneous proceedings against him where the condition of defendant does not appear in the record nor the error in the proceedings,[92] and when it appears in evidence that defendant, sued as an adult, is an infant, plaintiff should be required to proceed against him as an infant; if the court renders judgment against the infant without requiring this to be done, it should grant relief on a motion for a new trial.[93] It was not an abuse of discretion to refuse a rehearing to a minor decreed to be holding lands as a trustee and required to convey them on payment of a debt due him, where, although not appearing in the case, his interests were defended by his father, who was his foreign guardian, or where, on attaining his majority, in two months more, he would be entitled, under the statute relating to decrees for conveyance, to a readjudication for any fraud, collusion, error, or mistake therein.[94]

N. Judgment[95] — 1. FORM OF JUDGMENT. It is error to give a joint decree in favor of several complainants for the aggregate of all their debts against defendant where one of the complainants is an infant.[96] In Louisiana it has been held that judgment cannot be given in the general terms against an emancipated minor but should direct that execution should not be levied upon immovables but only on the movables.[97]

2. Judgment to Be For or Against Infant. Where an infant party is successful the judgment should be in favor of the infant and not in favor of the next friend,[98] and where he is unsuccessful the judgment should be against the infant and not against the guardian ad litem.[99]

3. Time of Entry. The fact that a decree was entered as of a week earlier than it was rendered, without objection from the guardian ad litem, does not show fraud on his part, where this enabled the parties to get the case before the appellate court earlier, and it does not appear that the infant would have profited by delay.[1] In New York it is not necessary that twenty days shall elapse between the appointment of a guardian ad litem and the entry of judgment against the infant except in case of judgment by default.[2]

4. Judgment Must Be on Issues Presented. In an action for partition against infants the court is limited to a decree on the claim as made in the complaint and a decree concerning the claim of the infants to property other than that sought by the complaint to be divided is void.[3]

5. Decree For Conveyance of Land. It has been held that in an action to obtain a conveyance, where one of defendants is an infant, a decree for the conveyance of his title may be rendered if it appears that it will not be prejudicial to him.[4]

6. Effect of Recitals in Judgment. A recital in a final judgment that a guardian ad litem of infants appeared pursuant to a due and proper appointment by the court is sufficient to establish the guardian's authority.[5] Where the record of a cause shows that a guardian ad litem was appointed for minor defendants, and that he accepted the appointment and filed their answer, a recital in the decree that the cause was heard upon their answer is conclusive as to the service of legal notice on the minors.[6]

7. Judgment by Default. A judgment rendered against an infant by default and without proof of the facts relied on for relief is erroneous and voidable,[7] but decree is made by consent of the infant or his next friend.

In Kentucky under Code Civ. Proc. § 36, subs. 3, providing that no judgment shall be rendered against an infant until his guardian or guardian ad litem shall have made defense, or filed a report stating that, after a careful examination of the case, he is unable to make defense, it was error to render judgment against an infant defendant upon the report of the guardian ad litem that he had no defense to make, without any statement that he had examined the record. Womble v. Trice, 66 S. W. 370, 67 S. W. 9, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1939.

Under the New York code of civil procedure a judgment by default cannot be taken against an infant defendant until twenty days have expired since the appointment of a guardian ad litem for him. N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 1218. See Newins v. Baird, 19 Hun (N. Y.) 306. This provision applies only to actions where the infancy is admitted, and in which judgment may be rendered against an infant defendant; and a defendant sued as an adult, and against whom a judgment has been rendered by default, is not entitled to have such judgment set aside as a matter of right, and without terms, on an ex parte showing of his minority. Jackson v. Brunor, 16 Misc. (N. Y.) 294, 38 N. Y. Suppl. 110. It is discretionary with the court to relieve defendant on motion and such discretion is not subject to review. A judgment by default will not be vacated on the ground that defendant was an infant at the time the judgment was rendered, but the defense of infancy can be interposed in such case only after procuring an order opening the default, and allowing defendant to plead. Appel v. Brooks, 4 Misc. (N. Y.) 626, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 100. A court will not aid a defendant, on the plea of infancy, in setting aside a judgment obtained by default, where such default was caused by his own laches. Graham v. Pinckney, 30 N. Y. Super. infant is entitled, as a matter of course, at any time before the decree is made absolute to put in a new answer and have the cause heard again.[19] In many jurisdictions, however, this practice does not now obtain, the necessity for such a reservation being obviated by statutes giving the infant time to show cause after majority.[20]

11. Operation and Effect of Judgment. A judgment or decree rendered in an action or proceeding to which an infant was a party is binding upon him the same as if he had been an adult, unless reversed or set aside in some appropriate proceeding.[21] The fact that the person in whose favor a judgment has against infants saves the right to them to have the decree opened within a certain time, they will not be prevented from having the decree set aside within that time by the fact that the subject-matter of the contract has been sold by the complainant while the decree was in force against the infants to bona fide purchasers. Right to Relief.[23] Even independent of statute it has been held that a judgment irregularly obtained against an infant may be set aside after he has become of age,[24] but in many jurisdictions the statutes give to an infant against whom a judgment or decree has been rendered a certain time after attaining majority within which he may show cause against or proceed to vacate it.[25] Such a statute has also been held not applicable

A purchaser of land from one whose title depends on a decree taken against infants is bound with notice of their right to show cause against such decree. Blanton v. Rose, 70 Ark. 415, 68 S. W. 674.

Ejectment.— Va. Code (1849), c. 135, § 36, providing that a judgment recovered in ejectment against an infant shall be no bar to an action commenced by such infant within five to a judgment in an action in which the complaining infant was the actor,[26] and in the absence of fraud or collusion, a decree rendered in an infant's favor on a bill by next friend whether involving real or personal estate cannot be reopened by the infant.[27] The right to maintain an action to review a judgment against infant defendants after their arrival at majority exists only in those who were infants at the time of the rendition of the judgment, and interested in it, and does not belong to such as thereafter became interested in the subject-matter of the suit by reason of the death of one of the parties to it.[28] Where an attempt by an infant, after his arrival at majority, to set aside a decree, is founded in fraud, the relief asked will not be granted.[29] Where some of the persons interested in a partition proceeding were represented by guardians, but it was not shown that the money received by them or by their guardians was received with knowledge of the fact that any portion of it was the proceeds of the property of partition, the proceedings and decree for partition did not prevent the infants from electing, on attaining their majority, to follow the property itself.[30] In Kentucky where the error appears in the record the remedy is by appeal and not by an attempt to secure a vacation of the judgment.[31] Where a minor mortgaged lands, and a scire facias was sued out on the mortgage, and the premises sold for less than the sum due and a judgment was rendered for the balance, on a bill by the minor to enjoin this judgment, alleging his minority and want of notice of the proceedings at law, it was held that his only remedy was at law through a writ of error.[32]

b. Grounds.[33] An infant has no absolute right to have a judgment against him set aside on reaching majority,[34] nor does a statute giving him the right to show cause against a decree after majority extend the right beyond those cases in years after the removal of his disability, did not apply to actions of ejectment brought by a lessee to recover possession of leased premises which had been recovered by the landlord under Code, c. 138. Leonard v. Henderson, 23 Gratt. (Va.) 331.

Void judgment.— A judgment against a minor in an action wherein he did not have his day in court may be reversed on petition in error filed by him within the statutory time after reaching majority, although it be void in legal effect. Roberts v. Roberts, 61 Ohio St. 96, 55 N. E. 411.

A decree entered in conformity with the mandate of an appellate court to which the case had been appealed cannot be attacked by original bill by a party who was an infant when the decree was entered, where he by his next friend appealed from the original decree and appeared in the appellate court by guardian ad litem to answer to a cross appeal. Kingsbury v. Buckner, 134 U. S. 650, 10 S. Ct. 638, 33 L. ed. 1047.

Effect of affirmance of judgment on appeal. — Where an infant after arriving at majority prosecuted an appeal from a judgment rendered against him during infancy a judgment of affirmance on such appeal is a good plea in bar to a petition filed in the lower court to vacate or set aside the judgment appealed from, whether such petition was filed before or after the appeal was taken. Speak v. Mattingly, 4 Bush (Ky.) 310. But infants are entitled to a rehearing under Miss. which, under the old practice, such right was reserved in the decree;[35] but the fact that the applicant was an infant when the judgment was rendered and that the judgment itself is shown to be unjust is sufficient to entitle the applicant to relief.[36] The judgment or decree may be set aside for fraud,[37] surprise,[38] mistake,[39] irregularity,[40] or error.[41] A judgment entered on agreement of the parties may be set aside because improvident as to an infant party,[42] and a judgment adverse to an infant may be set aside because his interests were not properly cared for.[43] The right of an infant to show cause against a decree which affects his interests after he arrives at age is limited to cause existing at the time of the rendition of the decree, and not such as arose afterward.[44] Where a guardian ad litem was appointed for an infant defendant but had neither knowledge nor notice of the appointment until after final judgment had been recovered and entered in the case, and on learning of his appointment he promptly applies for leave to answer, such leave should be granted unless plaintiff consents to strike out the infant's name as a party to the action.[45]

c. Time For Application. Notwithstanding an infant may be entitled to show cause against a judgment after he comes of age he is not bound to wait until that time before seeking to set aside a judgment against him, but may apply for that purpose as soon as he sees fit;[46] but he is not bound to move at the earliest possible opportunity to set aside a judgment because of the omission to appoint a guardian ad litem for him.[47] Where the statute allows an infant a fixed time after arrival at majority to show cause against or seek to vacate a judgment rendered against him during infancy he must proceed within such time or his right to attack the judgment will be lost.[48]

d. Proceedings. Proceedings to set aside a judgment against an infant should be commenced in the court in which the judgment was rendered.[49] The proceedings must be upon notice to the other parties to the decree,[50] and persons claiming under the decree must be made parties;[51] but it is not necessary to join a party to the original proceeding who has no further interest on the litigation and against whom no relief is sought.[52] While the infant may impeach a decree against him by motion in the cause,[53] or by bill of review,[54] he is not bound to proceed in this manner or by way of rehearing,[55] but may maintain an original bill or action to impeach a decree against him for fraud or error.[56] It has also been held that a judgment against an infant may be reversed by writ of error coram nobis.[57] It is not necessary to allege any of the special grounds for which new trials are granted to adults.[58] The burden is upon the infant to show that the injustice has been done him,[59] and a motion to set aside a judgment on account of defendant's minority must be sustained by proof that he had not arrived at full age at the date of the rendition of the judgment.[60] A defendant in a proceeding by an infant to vacate the judgment against him is not limited to a demurrer or plea of release of error, but may by answer controvert the allegations of the petition where it brings in question matters of fact considered by the court at the time the judgment was rendered;[61] but where an infant after reaching majority seeks to open a judgment for an error not appearing on the face of the record, the judgment sought to be opened cannot be made the basis of a plea of res adjudicata.[62]

e. Relief Awarded. Where the infant succeeds in showing that the judgment against him should not have been rendered the court should place him and the other parties in statu quo as nearly as this can be done.[63] Where upon an infant's showing cause against a decree against him an additional fact appears, which if it had been originally shown would have authorized the decree, it will not be disturbed, although without that fact being proved the decree ought not to have been entered.[64]

f. Loss of Right to Attack Judgment. An infant may become estopped to attack a judgment against him or affecting his interests,[65] or may lose his right to do so by laches,[66] as where he fails to assert his right for several years after reaching majority.[67] Where an infant has during minority unsuccessfully exercised his right to attack a judgment against him by suit by guardian he is precluded from again exercising it after reaching majority;[68] and where an infant against whom judgment had been rendered after coming of age joined with the other defendants in a motion for a new trial and appealed from an order denying the same, which was affirmed, it was held that by joining in the motion and appeal he submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court and could not thereafter move to set aside the judgment on the ground of his infancy.[69]

13. COLLATERAL ATTACK ON JUDGMENT.[70] The fact that a judgment is against an infant does not render it subject to collateral attack where it would not be subject to such attack if against an adult;[71] but it can be avoided for error or irregularity only by appeal, writ of error, or some other direct proceeding for the purpose of setting it aside.[72] Where in a proceeding for the sale of a decedent's land to pay debts, a defendant, although not a minor, is brought before the court by a guardian ad litem, such defendant cannot, after appearing before the commissioners and failing to object to the appointment of the guardian ad litem, collaterally attack the proceedings by proof that he was not a minor when his answer was taken.[73]

was affirmed by the supreme court, but the opinion and judgment of affirmance ignored the next friend, treating the judgment as for plaintiff in person, execution properly issued in the name of the infant.[85] The issuance of execution in favor of an infant is sometimes suspended until there is some person authorized to receive the money.[86]

Q. Review in Appellate Court[87] — 1. Right to Appeal or Writ of Error — a. Infant. An infant has the right to appeal from a judgment against him, where the judgment if against an adult would be appealable,[88] but such appeal should be by next friend or guardian ad litem.[89] If an infant sues out a writ of error in his own name and there is a joinder in error his disability is waived.[90] It is not necessary that the next friend by whom a writ of error is prosecuted should be the same person who acted as next friend in the trial court.[91] An appeal by an infant whose guardian ad litem has become insolvent and has failed to pay the costs adjudged will not be stayed because of non-payment of such costs.[92]

b. Guardian Ad Litem or Next Friend. A guardian ad litem or next friend does not necessarily become functus officio by the rendition of a judgment or decree,[93] but may take and prosecute an appeal therefrom;[94] and in case such an appeal is taken his duties and powers continue until the final termination of the infant ought to appear upon its face to have issued after a stay of twelve months and upon motion, or the sheriff is not bound to levy it. Newbern Bank v. Stanly, 13 N. C. 476. See also Ricks v. Blount, 15 N. C. 128.

No leave of court is necessary to authorize cause,[95] unless he is removed by the court[96] or the guardianship is terminated by the infant's arrival at majority.[97]

c. Waiver of Error. Where a writ of error is brought to reverse a judgment recovered on a note against an infant who appeared by attorney a promise made by him after he comes of age to pay the note is neither a release or waiver of the error nor a bar to a writ of error.[98]

2. Time For Appeal. Under the statutes of some jurisdictions an infant against whom or affecting whose interests a judgment has been rendered is allowed a certain time after reaching majority within which he may appeal or sue out a writ of error;[99] but such a statute does not prevent the infant from taking an appeal, or suing out a writ of error by next friend or guardian during his minority.[1]

3. Appointment of a Guardian Ad Litem or Next Friend on Appeal. Proceedings in review of a judgment are a continuation of the original case,[2] and hence the guardian ad litem or next friend who appeared for the infant in the original case is entitled to appear for him in the appellate court,[3] and it is not necessary or proper to appoint a new guardian ad litem or next friend on the appeal where the one who originally represented the infant appears.[4] But where infant parties were not represented by guardian or next friend in the trial court, a person may be appointed by the appellate court to represent them.[5]

4. Matters Considered on Appeal. The rule that it is the duty of the courts to protect the interests of an infant litigant[6] applies to an appellate court into which the case is brought as well as to the trial court,[7] and hence it has been laid down that on appeal an infant will be given the benefit of every defense of which he could have availed himself or which might have been interposed for him in the trial court.[8] But as against adult parties the court will enforce the rule that only grounds of exception presented and reserved in the lower court will be considered.[9] The omission of the next friend of an infant plaintiff to give bond to secure the proceeds of a judgment to be recovered cannot be assigned as error by defendant on appeal, since he is not injured or prejudiced and it does not concern him.[10] Where a defendant pleaded infancy, and the justice before whom the action was tried, from examination, was of opinion that he was not an infant, and the jury so found, the infancy of defendant cannot be assigned for error, it being against the record and the fact as found by the jury.[11]

5. Disposition of Cause. Where an infant brings a writ of error to reverse a judgment rendered against him, the court only vacates the judgment, but does not set aside the proceedings altogether.[12] A judgment against minors and adults as joint trespassers may be reversed as to the minors only, since no contribution could be compelled if one were obliged to pay the judgment.[13] A decree rendered on the application of infants cannot be reversed merely on account of infancy.[14] Where a complainant's bill and a cross bill by an infant defendant were both dismissed, and on appeal by the complainant the decree is reversed, the appellate court has no power to reinstate the cross bill or grant any relief upon it; but in order that the infant may have an opportunity to assert his rights the cause will be remanded in order that another cross bill may be filed on behalf of the infant if it be deemed advisable.[15] The homologation of the proceedings of a family meeting ratifying a compromise involving the interests of a minor will be set aside on appeal when it appears that the lower court at the date of the homologation had no evidence before it going to show whether the compromise would injure or benefit the minor.[16] Where an infant was the only one to be benefited by the refusal to probate a will, and certain of her relatives improperly filed a caveat in their own names against such probate, but the suit was conducted as if the infant was the caveator, and they her next friends, on

Appointment of next friend.— Where a cause in which an infant appeared by his next friend is appealed by defendant from the judgment of a justice of the peace to the circuit court, and no question is made in the appeal papers as to the regularity of such appearance by next friend, it must be assumed for all further purposes in the appellate court that the appointment of and appearance by the next friend were regular. appeal by the caveators from a decree of the prerogative court, it was held that the record should be remitted to that court that it might there be amended by a substitution of the name of the infant as caveator and by the admission of a next friend to prosecute the suit and for further proceedings in the cause as amended.[17] Where in an action on notes against several defendants, one of them by a separate answer alleged infancy and the issue thus raised was submitted to the jury as a separate issue and the jury found for such defendant on such issue and also found for all the defendants on the general issue it was held that the judgment in favor of the infant defendant must stand, although as to the other defendants the judgment was reversed.[18] In Maryland the court has refused to reverse a decree on account of a departure from the usual practice when the infants were not thereby subjected to any inconvenience or deprived of any right or advantage.[19]

6. Certiorari.[20] In Georgia it has been held that a minor who has sufficient discretion to understand an oath, and to form a rational opinion as to his interests, is competent to make an affidavit verifying a petition for certiorari brought for him by a guardian ad litem, and may allege therein his own inability, by reason of poverty, to pay costs.[21] In Massachusetts where a street was laid out over the land of minors without previous notice and without making an estimate of the amount of damage thereby sustained by the owners, and more than a year elapsed before either of the owners came of age, a writ of certiorari was ordered, on a petition filed by one of the owners at the first term after he came of age;[22] but the court has refused to issue a writ of certiorari on the application of a minor, whose guardian ad litem duly appointed for the occasion, assented to the proceedings sought to be quashed.[23]

R. Costs[24] — 1. In General. Where on the trial of an action to recover for goods sold a verdict is directed in behalf of one of defendants on the ground of infancy, he is not entitled to costs as a matter of course but their allowance depends on a special application to the court by which they may be withheld or allowed according to its sound discretion.[25] Where an infant defendant, joined with others, secures a nolle prosequi as to himself on account of infancy, he is not entitled to costs.[26] Where a defendant in an action on a joint liability who was not served voluntarily answers, pleading infancy, plaintiff may obtain leave to discontinue as to him without costs and such defendant cannot be allowed any costs in the action other than the costs of making his motion to compel plaintiff to receive his answer.[27] Where a judgment recovered against an infant on a note is reversed on writ of error because of the infancy of defendant below, the court will not give plaintiff in error costs unless it appears that plaintiff in the court below knew that he was an infant.[28] Where certain infant appellees were not represented by a guardian or next friend, the costs of the appeal were taxed against the appellants, although the cause was reversed.[29] Where an infant was appointed administrator and continued to act after becoming of age until the commencement of a suit, when he objected to the validity of his appointment on the ground of infancy, it was held that he was not entitled to costs of a cross

2. LIABILITY OF INFANT.[31] According to some authorities an infant plaintiff suing by guardian ad litem or next friend is liable for costs in case he is unsuccessful,[32] but this is denied by other authorities.[33] An infant defendant is not liable for costs in an action to which he is a necessary party because of his being the heir of the person against whom if alive the action should be brought,[34] but in other cases an infant defendant may be liable for costs.[35] for the interest of the infant.[37] The guardian ad litem of an infant defendant is not ordinarily chargeable with costs,[38] unless in case of gross misconduct on his part;[39] but it has been held that guardian ad litem who appeals on behalf of an infant defendant is liable for the costs of the appeal where the judgment is affirmed.[40]

I. AT LAW.

An information in civil cases is a suit filed by the attorney-general, or other proper officer, on behalf of the government to recover money or other charges, or to obtain satisfaction in damages for any personal wrong committed on the lands or other possessions of the government.[1] The usual informations are those of intrusion, for any trespass committed on the land of the government,[2] and debt upon any contract for moneys due to the government or for any forfeit due to the government from the breach of a penal statute.[3]

An information of intrusion is in fact an action of trespass at the suit of the government not brought to gain possession or to establish title except incidentally. Atty.-Gen. v. Stanley, 9 U. C. Q. B. 84. It is of the nature of an action of trespass quare clausum fregit and accordingly cannot be maintained by the government until it has acquired the possession. Com. v. Hite, 6 Leigh (Va.) 588, 29 Am. Dec. 226.

An information to recover damages for an intrusion and to enjoin further trespass is substantially an action for the recovery of real property and is not "a case of chancery" of which the supreme court has appellate jurisdiction. State v. Pacific Guano Co., 22 S. C. 50.

Information of intrusion in escheat proceedings see Com. v. Andre, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 224. And see Escheat, 16 Cyc. 555.

A judgment upon an information of intrusion is not in the nature of a seizin or possession but only that defendant be convicted and committed for the fine, and includes judgment for any damages that may have been given for the trespass; and includes also an amoveas manus — that is, from the judgment for the intrusion an injunction issues for the possession against defendants and all claiming under them. II. IN EQUITY.

A. Definition and Nature — 1. IN GENERAL. Where a suit in equity is instituted on behalf of the government, state or national, or of those who partake of its prerogative, such as idiots and lunatics,[4] or whose rights are under its protection, such as the objects of public charities,[5] the matter of complaint is offered to the court not by way of petition but by way of information by the attorney-general or other proper law officer of such government.[6] By such information the attorney-general as official representative of the government undertakes to put the court in possession of facts which when communicated in proper form, through the right official channel, imposes upon the court determinate duties.[7] He does not take the attitude nor hold the language of an ordinary suitor. He is not a complainant, nor does he petition.[8] An information in its substantive characteristics is the same as a bill in equity, and in every respect follows the nature of a bill except as to name and form.[9]

2. INFORMATION AND BILL. If a private individual has an interest in the matter in dispute in connection with the government, of an injury to which he has a right to complain, apart from the government, he may have his personal complaint or bill joined to and incorporated with the information of the attorney-general, and they form together an information and bill.[10] But an information and bill cannot be supported unless the relator has some individual interest in the subject-matter of the suit;[11] and if it should afterward appear that he has no interest to be subserved, the bill will be dismissed with costs and the information retained.[12]

B. When Information Will Lie. An information in equity by the attorney-general or other proper officer can be maintained only where it is brought in the interests of the public,[13] and not where it is brought in the name of the attorney-general at the relation of an individual for the protection of the latter's private interests.[14] Among other grounds, an information in equity will lie to assert the government's right to certain property,[15] to establish a charity,[16] to abate a public nuisance,[17] to restrain unauthorized corporate action or transgressions of powers,[18] or to annul a patent for lands.[19]

C. Mode of Procedure — 1. In General. The most common form of instituting information in equity is in the name of the attorney-general or other proper law officer on behalf of the government;[20] although it is sometimes brought in the name of the government upon the relation of the attorney-general,[21] or of a private citizen.[22] But in either case the information should show on its face in no uncertain manner that the attorney-general is the officer instituting and prosecuting the suit and the sole person responsible for its inception and maintenance.[23]

2. With or Without Relator. Where the suit immediately concerns the rights of the government alone the attorney-general usually proceeds by way of information without a relator;[24] and if there be a private relator, it need not appear that he has any special interest in the subject-matter or in the relief sought.[25] But where the suit is one that does not immediately concern the rights of the government, it is the more common practice for the attorney-general to depend upon

I. DEFINITION.

An injunction is a writ framed according to the circumstances of the case commanding an act which the court regards as essential to justice, or restraining an act which it esteems contrary to equity and good conscience.[1]

II. CLASSIFICATION AND NATURE OF INJUNCTIONS.

A. Preliminary or Perpetual Injunctions[2] — 1. PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS. According to one well recognized classification injunctions are preliminary or interlocutory or perpetual. Preliminary or interlocutory injunctions are those granted prior to the final hearing and determination of the trial, and continue until answer, or until the final hearing, or until the further order of the court. They do not conclude the rights of the parties. Their object is to maintain the status quo, to maintain property in its existing condition, to prevent further or impending injury — not to determine the right itself.[3] Therefore, where the

Other definitions.—"A prohibitory writ restraining a person from committing or doing a thing which appears to be against equity and conscience." Ex p. Grimball, T. U. P. Charlt. (Ga.) 153, 155.

"A remedial writ which courts issue for the purpose of enforcing their equity jurisdiction." McDonogh v. Calloway, 7 Rob. (La.) 442, 444.

"A judicial process, whereby a party is required to do a particular thing, or to refrain from doing a particular thing, according to the exigency of the writ." Rogers Locomotive, etc., Works v. Erie R. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 379, 388 [quoting Story Eq. Jur.].

As defined by statute see Ark. St. §§ 3775–3776; Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 525; Ida. Code Civ. Proc. § 3283; Indian Terr. St. § 2487; Garland La. Code, §§ 210, 296; Nebr. Comp. St. § 1279; Nev. Comp. Laws, § 3206; Hill Annot. Laws (Oreg.), § 408.

As distinguished from stay of proceedings see ACTIONS, 1 Cyc. 751 note 47.

In Quebec by statute the injunction or restraining order is assimilated to the writ of mandamus. See Savard v. Moisan, 1 Rev. de Lég. 378; Carter v. Breakey, 3 Quebec 113; Crawford v. Protestant Hospital for Insane, 4 Montreal Super. Ct. 215.

issuance of a preliminary injunction would have the effect of granting all the relief that could be obtained by a final decree and would practically dispose of the whole case, it will not be granted.[4] So it will not be granted where the injurious acts have been completed,[5] or where they have been discontinued and there is no showing that they are likely to be renewed,[6] and of course it will not be granted where it is not apparent that any injury at all will occur.[7]

2. PERPETUAL INJUNCTIONS. A perpetual injunction is one granted by the judgment which finally disposes of the injunction suit.[8]

B. Preventive or Mandatory Injunctions — 1. PREVENTIVE INJUNCTIONS. Another classification of injunctions is preventive and mandatory. A preventive injunction commands a party to refrain from doing an act.[9] Injunctions of this character necessarily operate upon an unperformed and unexecuted act and prevent a threatened but non-existent injury.[10]

2. Mandatory Injunctions[11] — a. In General. Mandatory injunctions command the performance of some positive act.[12] In the very great majority of cases injunction is a merely preventive remedy, and in some cases courts have on this ground refused to issue an injunction mandatory in its nature, or have declared that it is not the object of an injunction to redress a consummated wrong or to undo what has been done;[13] yet there is no doubt as to the power of courts of equity to issue mandatory injunctions.[14] And a mandatory injunction may be granted, although the act causing the injury has been completed before the suit is brought. The complainant may by this means be put in statu quo.[15]

the issuance of any order or decree, the court has power to compel by mandatory injunction the restoration of the former condition of things.[16]

c. Preliminary or Temporary Mandatory Injunctions. Since an injunction mandatory in its nature generally does more than to maintain the status quo, it is generally improper to issue such an injunction prior to final hearing; and it is frequently said that such a preliminary injunction will never issue.[17] For instance it is improper to issue a preliminary injunction, the effect of which will be to compel the transfer of property from one litigant to another.[18] On the other hand there is no doubt that the court has jurisdiction to issue preliminary mandatory injunctions, and it is proper to do so in cases of extreme urgency, where the right is very clear indeed, and where considerations of the relative inconvenience bear strongly in complainant's favor.[19] If the issuance on preliminary application of an injunction mandatory in nature will have the effect of granting to the complainant all the relief that he could obtain upon a final hearing, the application should be refused except in very rare cases, and then only where the complainant's right to the relief is clear and certain.[20]

C. Common and Special Injunctions. Under the earlier practice preliminary injunctions were classified as common and special; common injunctions being those which issue secondarily and in aid of another equity, while special injunctions issued primarily and for the prevention of irreparable injury.[21] The special injunction issued only upon good cause shown by affidavit,[22] upon special grounds arising out of the circumstances of the case,[23] and operated according to the terms of the order granting it.[24] The common injunction issued to restrain further proceedings in an action at law to enable defendant to assert an equity which he could not assert in a law court.[25] Where the common injunction issued before the declaration in the action at law, it stayed all further proceedings; but if it issued afterward, it merely stayed the execution.[26] Under the practice in those states in which both legal and equitable causes are tried in the same courts and in the same forms of action, it would seem that the necessity for a common injunction can never arise,[27] and in fact common executions no longer issue in most jurisdictions,[28] such result following as of course from statutes requiring notice to the opposing party before the issuance of an injunction,[29] and the terms "preliminary" and "special" injunctions are in some cases employed interchangeably.[30]

D. Restraining Orders. A restraining order is an order granted to maintain the subject of controversy in statu quo until the hearing of an application for a temporary injunction.[31] It may be issued before notice to defendant in order to prevent irreparable injury pending the hearing.[32] Its purpose is merely to suspend proceedings until there may be an opportunity to inquire whether any injunction should be granted,[33] and it is not intended as an injunction pendente lite;[34] hence its duration should be limited to such a reasonable time as may be necessary to notify the adverse party,[35] especially where defendant is likely to be

34. A temporary restraining order contemplates a further hearing on the application for a temporary injunction upon notice to the adverse party, while a temporary injunction contemplates no further hearing until the final action is taken upon the application. State v. Baker, 62 Nebr. 840, 88 N. W. 124; Miles v. Sheep Rock Min., etc., Co., 15 Utah 436, 49 Pac. 536, holding that such an order was not an injunction within the meaning of a statute providing that no assessment may be levied on the capital stock of a corporation while a previous assessment remains unpaid, unless the collection of such assessment has been prohibited by injunction.

Whether an order is a restraining order or a temporary injunction must be determined from its form and substance. State v. Baker, 62 Nebr. 840, 88 N. W. 124.

35. Wallace v. McVey, 6 Ind. 300. A mere temporary restraining order should by its own terms be timed to extend in any event no longer than until the preliminary hearing of the application. Vornholt v. Gordon, 4 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 498.

Postponement of hearing to a subsequent term is unreasonable, where the order is granted in term-time. Andrews v. Powell, 27 Ind. 303, holding, however, that the objection damaged by delay.[36] A restraining order ceases to be operative at the expiration of the time fixed by its terms;[37] or if at the time fixed by it to show cause there is no appearance by either party, and the motion for injunction is not continued or kept alive in any mode,[38] although there is no order of dissolution,[39] and although the restraining order provides that it shall be effective until further order.[40] So the force of restraining orders ceases upon the granting[41] or refusal[42] of a temporary injunction. Where the order refusing the injunction is appealed from the restraining order is not prolonged,[43] nor where an injunction has been granted and dissolved does an appeal from the order of dissolution revive the restraining order.[44] In case a restraining order is dissolved, a party is not entitled to have the order dissolving it superseded pending review.[45] Where a restraining order has been granted ex parte, it may be dissolved on motion before answer.[46] The unauthorized issuance of a restraining order will not prevent the issuance of a temporary injunction upon a full hearing.[47] A bond given to secure a restraining order will not give effect to a temporary injunction subsequently allowed in the same case, but a new bond must be executed.[48]

III. GENERAL PRINCIPLES GOVERNING ISSUANCE.

A. Discretion of the Court. An injunction, whether temporary or permanent, cannot as a general rule be sought as a matter of right, but its granting or refusal rests in the sound discretion of the court under the circumstances of the particular case.[49] Especially is this the rule in the case of a temporary injunction was not available on appeal from a final trial on the merits.

Where defendant has made no defense, but has stipulated that a permanent injunction shall issue, it is within the discretion of the court to refuse the injunction when the real object for which it is sought is the influence it will exert on third parties. National Phonograph Co. v. Schlegel, 117 Fed. 624.

Failure to fully disclose facts.— An application for an injunction goes to the sound conscience of the court, acting upon all the circumstances of each particular case; and the court, having the right to require a full and candid disclosure of all the facts, may refuse to exercise its extraordinary power by writ of injunction if the proceedings are such as to show that a full disclosure has not been made. Canton Co. v. Northern Cent. R. Co., 21 Md. 383; Reddall v. Bryan, 14 Md. 444, 74 Am. Dec. 550.

Adequacy of remedy at law.— Where it is not made clear at a trial whether plaintiff can obtain full damages at law for the violation of a covenant not to build upon or encumber a certain right of way, an injunction against such violation is discretionary with the trial court, and will not be disturbed. Dexter v. Beard, 2 Silv. Sup. (N. Y.) 106, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 11.

Where proof not conclusive.— Where a bill was filed to restrain the maintenance of a dam, and the question involved was whether or not the water had been raised above a certain mark fixed by the arbitrator, but the proofs did not conclusively show that such height had been exceeded, a dismissal of the bill will not be interfered with. Cobb v. Slimmer, 45 Mich. 176, 7 N. W. 806.

Disclaimer by defendant of intention to do acts complained of.— Where the seller of a business covenanted not to engage in the same business within a certain territory within a certain period, on an application by the purchaser to restrain him from engaging in such business in violation of his covenant the court may consider all the circumstances, and is not bound to take his disclaimer that he does not intend to violate it, or his statement that he does not propose to engage in such business under the name of his wife. Fleckenstein Bros. Co. v. Fleckenstein, (N. J. Ch. 1903) 53 Atl. 1043.

The English Judicature Act of 1873 gives to the high court of justice the power to issue an injunction whenever it appears to the court that such issuance would be just "or" convenient, and thus apparently very much enlarges the court's discretion. But this has been construed to authorize an injunction only when it is just "and" convenient, and the principles upon which this is to be determined are practically unchanged. of fact and the evidence is conflicting.[50] This discretionary power, however, is not arbitrary and unlimited, but must be exercised reasonably and in harmony with well established principles.[51] And where the case made out by the complainant is perfectly clear, and he has complied with all the requirements of the law for the issuance of an injunction, he is entitled to the injunction as a matter of right.[52] The action of the court may be reviewed on appeal or error in case of a clear abuse of discretion,[53] but not otherwise;[54] and mandamus will not lie

Discretion limited to terms.— Where the complaint states a cause of action, and the motion papers disclose a reasonable probability of plaintiff's ultimate success, it is well nigh an imperative duty of the court to preserve the status quo by temporary injunction, if its disturbance pendente lite will render futile in considerable degree the judgment sought, or cause serious and irreparable injury to one party; especially if injury to the other is slight, or of character easily compensable in money; and the discretion vested in the court is largely over the question of the terms of the restraint and the protection of the rights by bonds from one party to the other. While the action of the chancellor is of grace, such action sometimes becomes a matter of right to the suitor, and when it is clear that the law cannot give protection and relief to which the complainant is admittedly entitled, the chancellor can no more withhold his grace than the law can deny protection and relief if able to grant them. Effect of understanding as to right to appeal.— Although the issuance of a preliminary injunction is largely discretionary and will usually not be reviewed by an appellate court, this rule does not apply where the lower court issued the injunction with the understanding that the order would be appealable, while an order denying such injunc-

to control such discretion.[55] A temporary injunction may be refused under circumstances where a permanent injunction might be granted,[56] particularly where sought upon an ex parte application.[57] An injunction will not be granted when good conscience does not require it,[58] nor where it will tend to promote, rather than to prevent, fraud and injustice.[59]

B. Caution Required. Great caution is to be used in issuing mandatory injunctions;[60] and it has been said that this has no special application in the case of mandatory injunctions, but applies alike to all injunctions.[61] The complainant must make out a clear case free from doubt and dispute.[62]

C. Existence and Nature of the Right — 1. In General. The existence of a right violated is a prerequisite to the granting of an injunction. Where it is clear that the complainant does not have the right that he claims, he is not entitled to an injunction, either temporary or perpetual, to prevent a violation of such supposed right.[63] So where the complainant claims his right under a law tion would not be, and where the facts upon which the injunction was based are clearly before the court of appeals. Northern Securities Co. v. Harriman, 134 Fed. 331, 67 C. C. A. 245 [affirmed in 197 U. S. 244, 25 S. Ct. 493, 49 L. ed. 739].

What is not abuse of discretion.— Where the hearing of an application for an injunction is upon bill, answer, and affidavits in support of the bill, and the answer fails to explain as fully as it should a material point in the case, and the action of the chancellor in granting the injunction is, as to this point, supported by the bill and the affidavits, although controverted by the answer to the extent that the latter goes, it cannot be said that the chancellor has abused his discretion, or committed any error justifying the interposition of the appellate court. that is unconstitutional,[64] or under a contract that is illegal,[65] he is not entitled to an injunction. If the right claimed is purely legal in character, a bill in equity is not the proper proceeding to establish it; all that equity will do in such case is to protect the property involved from ruinous or irreparable injury until the existence of the right can be established at law.[66] temporary injunction maintaining the status quo until the right or title in question is established.[69]

b. Temporary Injunction — (i) In General. It is not sufficient ground for refusing a preliminary injunction that it is not absolutely certain that complainant has the right that he claims or that the injury feared will occur; and even though complainant's right to permanent relief is doubtful it may be proper to maintain the status quo pending the determination of his right, the issuance of a temporary injunction in such cases depending chiefly upon the relative inconvenience to be caused the parties.[70] Thus where there is a prospect of irremediable injury, even Limitation of rule.— Where one who had long been in possession of land under color of title sued for an injunction to prevent injury thereto, it was held that the fact that there was a doubt as to the validity of his title was not ground for refusing the injunction, inasmuch as the complainant had an apparent title and defendant was without even color of title and a stranger to the property. Restatement of rule.— Where the sole object for which an injunction is sought is the preservation of a fund in controversy, or the maintenance of the status quo, until the question of right between the parties can be decided on final hearing, the injunction properly may be allowed, although there may be serious doubt of the ultimate success of the complainant. Harriman v. Northern Securities Co., 132 Fed. 464.

Comparative injury.— A preliminary injunction maintaining the status quo may properly issue whenever the questions of law or of fact to be ultimately determined in a suit are grave and difficult, and injury to the moving party will be immediate, certain, and great, if it is denied, while the loss or inconvenience to the opposing party will be comparatively small or insignificant if it is granted. Newton v. Levis, 79 Fed. 715, 25 C. C. A. 161.

Right to final relief.— It is not necessary that the court should determine that the complainant is entitled to a final award in though the title is disputed, a temporary injunction may issue at once, without waiting until a trial at law is had.[71] The injunction may be granted, although an action at law has not been commenced,[72] and the complainant or defendant may be ordered to institute a suit at law immediately.[73] its favor. It is enough that the case presented seems sufficiently meritorious to warrant the court in preserving the status quo until the real merits of the controversy have been finally determined. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 120 Fed. 981.

The fact that an appeal does not lie from an order denying a preliminary injunction is of controlling importance where there is reasonable doubt as to whether the complainant will be entitled to permanent relief ultimately. Harriman v. Northern Securities Co., 132 Fed. 464.

Reason for rule.— When there is reasonable ground to apprehend the commission of irreparable mischief, pending the litigation, and the title is matter of doubt, the court should restrain both the parties or appoint a receiver under proper circumstances. The party restrained in a case of reasonable doubt has at least these advantages: (1) The property is left untouched for the time, and upon the termination of the suit in his favor returns to him unimpaired; (2) he has not only his remedy against the opposite party, but also against his sureties. But in case the party is not restrained and the suit should terminate adversely to him, the other party must rely solely upon his personal responsibility. It is true that notwithstanding all these advantages he may suffer seriously; but as it is a matter of doubt who has the right, and someone must incur the risk pending litigation, the risk would be less on his than on the other side. Merced Min. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 317, 68 Am. Dec. 262. The evident injustice of permitting the actual destruction of the subject-matter in dispute during the delay necessarily incident to the establishment by judicial determination of the rights of the parties led the equity courts to interfere, not to decide the dispute as to the legal title, but to save the property from destruction until the law courts should, by a proper proceeding, adjudge the rights of the parties. Johnson v. Hughes, 58 N. J. Eq. 406, 43 Atl. 901.

Shutting off supply of gas or water.— Injunction will lie to prevent a gas company from shutting off the supply of gas from a consumer's house, where the right depends on failure to pay which is disputed. The reason underlying this jurisdiction does not require the pending of a suit to try the title. Every good purpose is subserved if plaintiff shows his claim of title, the imminency of irreparable injury, and his intention to immediately put the question of title into a course of legal investigation and determination. Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, 59 L. R. A. 556.

(II) Limitations of Rule. The right asserted by complainant, however, must be perfectly clear and free from doubt where the effect of a preliminary injunction will be more than merely the maintenance of the status quo, or where the injunction will cause defendant greater loss and inconvenience than that which will be suffered by the complainant in the absence of an injunction.[74] In any event an injunction must be refused if the complainant's case is so doubtful that it does not appear reasonably probable that he has the right claimed and that it is being violated,[75] or if he does not make it appear reasonably probable

Defendant required to bring action.— It is usual where the title itself comes into controversy to grant a temporary injunction to await the event of an action at law to be prosecuted by plaintiff. But where plaintiff is in actual possession, and has been for many years, he is not in a position nor has he any occasion to sue. Defendant is the proper party to bring an action and test the rights of the respective parties at law, and if he neglects to do so this injunction will be made permanent. The enforcement of an ordinance fixing the price of gas will not be enjoined when the amount invested and the cost of production are doubtful, and the rates fixed will produce some profit in any event. The lower rates might increase consumption also, and thus increase profits; so that the unreasonableness of the ordinance is not clear. Capital City Gaslight Co. v. Des Moines, 72 Fed. 829.

plainant must make out at least a prima facie showing of a right to the final relief.[78] It is necessary also that the complainant make a full presentation of his case and of the facts.[79] If it appears from the complainant's own statement of his case that he will not be entitled to the permanent relief sought, or that his right to such relief will depend upon a contingency not yet determined, no preliminary injunction should issue.[80]

(iv) Disputed Questions of Fact or of Law. Applications for preliminary injunctions are frequently refused on the ground that the facts upon which the application is based are disputed, the evidence in regard to them being conflicting;[81] but the fact that there is such a dispute or conflict is not in itself sufficient ground for refusing the application. If the complainant shows that an irreparable injury will probably be suffered by him before the final hearing, that there is a reasonable probability that he will establish the facts as he alleges, and that the injunction will not cause a great injury to defendant, a preliminary injunction should issue to maintain the status quo, despite the conflict as to facts.[82] In cases, however, where the equities of the complainant's bill are satisfactorily denied in the answer, where the facts upon which complainant's right is based are disputed, or where defendant denies that he is doing the injurious acts charged, no injunction will issue except to prevent an irreparable injury that will occur before final hearing can be reached.[83] Again injunctions have been refused because the right of the complainant to permanent relief depends upon a question of law that is in dispute and undetermined;[84] but this is not necessarily a fatal objection, and a preliminary injunction is proper under the same circumstances as in the case of disputed and undetermined facts.[85] When the question of law is one of the chief issues to be determined on the final hearing, and complete relief can be then afforded, the complainant is not entitled to the preliminary injunction.[86] An injunction will not be granted where there is grave doubt as to its propriety or necessity.[87]

3. Violation of Right. The complainant must show not only the existence of his right but he must affirmatively show that the acts sought to be restrained will be a violation thereof. There must be what the law regards as a legal injury, not a mere inconvenience.[88]

4. Only Civil Rights Protected. The subject-matter of equitable jurisdiction is civil property and the maintenance of civil rights. Injunctions do not issue to prevent acts merely because they are immoral or illegal or criminal,[89] but only in case the complainant's civil rights are being invaded. So also rights that are purely political in their nature are not within the protection of the court of chancery.[90] This has been made one ground for refusing injunctions in cases involving public office and elections.[91]

D. Existence and Nature of the Injury — 1. Threatened Injury — a. In General. An injunction may be obtained to prevent an irreparable injury, even though no such injury has as yet occurred. If such injury is threatened or impending to property or property rights an injunction will be granted.[92] The threatened injury must, however, be clearly impending, and it is generally not sufficient to show mere threats to do the thing sought to be enjoined; some overt act toward carrying out the threat must usually be shown.[93] However, the mere fact that defendant denies his intention to do the threatened act is not sufficient ground for denying the injunction.[94]

b. Injury Improbable. It is not sufficient ground for an injunction that the injurious acts may possibly be committed or that injury may possibly result from the acts sought to be prevented. There must be at least a reasonable probability that the injury will be done if no injunction is granted, and not a mere fear or apprehension.[95] On this ground it is premature to sue for an injunction to pre-

Illustrations of rule.— The granting of free passes by a railroad to state officers will not be restrained at the suit of a shareholder merely on a showing that passes have been granted to similar officers in the past. Goodwin v. New York, etc., R. Co., 43 Conn. 494. The dredging of sand from the bed of a lake will not be prevented by equity merely because there is a possibility that it may cause erosion of the shore line or prevent accretions to the shore line. Blatchford v. Chicago Dredging, etc., Co., 22 Ill. App. 376. A railroad company will not be prevented from making a junction with another, merely because such junction will render possible the breaking of a contract with the complainant company for the transportation of passengers and freight. Delaware, etc., Canal Co. v. Camden, etc., R. Co., 15 N. J. Eq. 13. The payment of money will not be enjoined merely because a city engineer has improperly recommended such payment, when the city council has not adopted such recommendation or ordered a warrant drawn, and there is no indication that it will do so. Union Cemetery Assoc. v. McConnell, 124 N. Y. 88, 26 N. E. 330. Electric light wires may be strung within a few feet of telegraph wires, even though there is some danger that they may become broken and crossed during a storm and thereby injure the telegraph company. Denial of intention.—Where defendant posi-

vent the holding of an election to levy a tax,[96] or to prevent the enforcement of a law or ordinance before the election required for ratifying it has been held.[97] Defendant will not be enjoined from doing an act merely because others are likely to follow his example and thereby cause injury.[98] A society will not be enjoined merely because it has cited the complainant to show cause why he should not be fined for breach of the society's rules.[99] The collection of a fine will not be enjoined before a judgment assessing it is rendered.[1]

2. INJURY SUSTAINED PRIOR TO SUIT — a. Injury Wholly Past. Since equity will not attempt to do a vain thing, it will not by injunction attempt to prevent an injury that has already been sustained or to prevent the doing of an act that has already been performed,[2] especially where there is no showing that such action is being continued or repeated, or that defendant is threatening or intending to repeat the injury.[3] The party injured is of necessity remitted to his remedy at tively asserts that it is not his intention to do the injurious act, and there is no evidence to the contrary, no injunction will issue. Whalen v. Dalashmutt, 59 Md. 250.

The injury threatened may be too remote to warrant the issuance of an injunction. Shaw v. National Transit Co., 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 363; Tacoma v. Bridges, 25 Wash. 221, 65 Pac. 186. The injury is too remote when town trustees are about to consent to the construction of a street railway over complainant's land but no attempt to construct the railway is threatened. Dailey v. Nassau County R. Co., 52 N. Y. App. Div. 272, 65 N. Y. Suppl. 396.

law to recover damages,[4] not because it is adequate, but because no other remedy is possible.

b. Injury Continuing. If, on the other hand, the act sought to be enjoined and the injury resulting therefrom are continuing in their nature,[5] or if the injurious act has not yet been completed,[6] an injunction is proper. So where structures have been put up and are being wrongfully maintained, their maintenance may be prevented by injunction.[7]

3. Character of Injury — a. Necessity of Special Injury Different From That Suffered by Public. Where the injury complained of is really a public injury, and the right violated is a public right, the general rule is that an individual cannot maintain a suit for an injunction unless he suffers a special injury different from that suffered by the public at large.[8] In case the government is obstructed in exercising its powers and discharging its duties, it has a right to apply to its own courts for any proper assistance by way of injunction. It is a proper party complainant because of its interest in promoting the general welfare.[9]

b. Necessity For Substantial Injury. Although it may not be necessary in some cases for the complainant to make an affirmative showing of injury to himself from the acts sought to be enjoined,[10] yet such injury to the complainant must exist, and it must be substantial in character in order to warrant a court of equity in granting an injunction whether prohibitory or manda-

The reason for this rule seems to be that if any individual may maintain suit for an injunction defendant might be subjected to the expense and annoyance of innumerable suits; for a decree in favor of or against one individual would not conclude another individual not a party thereto.

An individual may be the relator in such a case, bringing the suit in the name of the state, if the attorney-general refuses to bring it. State v. Cunningham, 83 Wis. 90, 53 N. W. 35, 35 Am. St. Rep. 27, 17 L. R. A. 145. See also Fenelon Falls v. Victoria R. W. Co., 29 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 4.

tory.[11] A complainant who can show no injury to himself from the action sought to be prevented is not entitled to an injunction.[12] Equity will not interpose where the complainant's injury is merely nominal or theoretical.[13] On such grounds an injunction to prevent the building of a bridge,[14] the maintenance of a ditch or drain,[15] or the making of excavations on an adjoining lot,[16] has been refused; and so acts that may possibly create a cloud on title to land will not be restrained without a further showing.[17] The granting of an injunction is not governed, however, by the mere value of the property,[18] nor is it limited to cases where damages could be recovered in an action at law;[19] and an adverse use may be restrained, even though the damage suffered is small, where its continuance might ripen it into a right.[20] with a water-supply,[33] ordinarily causes irreparable injury and authorizes the granting of an injunction.

E. Multiplicity of Suits[34] — 1. In General. The prevention of a multiplicity of actions at law is one of the special grounds of equity jurisdiction, and for that purpose the remedy by injunction is freely used.[35] However, the saving of expense is not alone a sufficient ground for bringing a bill in equity.[36]

2. Parties Numerous — a. Injury to One Requiring Suits Against Many. Where the consummation of a wrongful act will injure the complainant, and in order to obtain redress at law he would be required to bring many actions against many persons, he is entitled to an injunction to prevent the performance of the act.[37]

b. Wrongful Act Causing Many Suits Against One. Where the consummation of a wrongful or illegal act will probably result in many disputed claims and many actions at law against the complainant, his remedy at law is inadequate and he is entitled to the protection of equity by injunction.[38]

Applications of rule.— The enforcement of an ordinance reducing rates of fare on a street railway in violation of a contract between the municipality and the company may be enjoined on the ground that otherwise a multiplicity of actions and harassing and expensive litigation would result. Conflicts over the right to be carried at the reduced rate would result, with breaches of the peace and suits for damages. Cleveland v. Cleveland City R. Co., 194 U. S. 517, 24 S. Multiplicity of suits not threatened.— A county treasurer is not entitled to an injunction to restrain twenty-three grand jurors from attempting to collect similar invalid

c. Wrongful Act Doing Common Injury to Many. Where the wrongful act will injure many persons in a similar way, interfering with the common right of each, they are allowed in a great many cases to unite in a bill to restrain the commission of the act.[39] In some cases, however, an injunction has been refused because no common right or title was involved and there was no community of interest in the subject-matter.[40] In other cases jurisdiction has been extended to cases where there would seem to be no actual common right invaded, but where the separate and individual rights of many are invaded by the same wrongful act, injuring all in a similar manner, and where as to all alike the wrongfulness of the act is to be established by the same principles of law and by proof of the very same facts.[41] As illustrating the variance in the decisions many courts have held that the prevention of a multiplicity of actions is not sufficient ground for enjoining the collection of illegal taxes. The interests of the taxpayers are said not to be common in a manner that will authorize a suit in equity by one or more in behalf of all.[42] Many cases, however, hold that injunction is a proper remedy to claims, even though all depend upon the same principles and facts, where one of those jurors has sued at law and the proof is direct and positive that no other suits are threatened but that the other jurors intend to abide by the event of the one suit. Andel v. Starkel, 192 Ill. 206, 61 N. E. 356.

Independent causes of action.— The mere fact that numerous independent parties hold separate instruments upon which they might bring separate suits is not sufficient to justify a court of equity in entertaining an action by the debtor to compel them to litigate their claims in an action in the forum he selects. And this even though the validity of all those instruments is attacked upon a common ground. Venice v. Woodruff, 62 N. Y. 462, 20 Am. Rep. 495 [distinguishing New York, etc., R. Résumé of decisions.—All of the cases assert that where the ground of the jurisdiction is merely the numerousness of the parties injured by the wrongful act, such parties cannot maintain a bill for an injunction unless the act sought to be enjoined affects some right or interest that all have in common; but there are no uniform rules for determining the existence and nature of this community of right or interest. It is easy to see the reason for the jurisdiction in case the common right invaded is a right of common such as was possessed by the tenants of a feudal lord in the common pasture or forest or waste land of the manor. prevent the levy and collection of an illegal tax and that the taxpayers similarly affected may unite in bringing the suit, even though the remedy of each is perfect at law, and they have no common property that is affected.[43]

3. MULTIPLICITY OF ACTIONS BETWEEN TWO PARTIES. It is now well settled that where an injury committed by one against another is continuous or is being constantly repeated, so that the complainant's remedy at law requires the bringing of successive actions, that remedy is inadequate and the injury will be prevented by injunction. If repeated trespasses are threatened for which a remedy at law could be obtained only through a multiplicity of suits, making the expense excessive and disproportionate to the damages, an injunction will commonly be issued. Especially is this true when the acts complained of constitute a wilful invasion of the complainant's right.[44] On the other hand it has been held that

46. Lloyd v. Catlin Coal Co., 210 Ill. 460, 71 N. See also Pratt v. Kendig, 128 Ill. 293, 21 N. E. 495; Imperial F. Ins. Co. v. Gunning, 81 Ill. 236.

Reason for rule.— If the right claimed affects numerous parties, equity will sometimes enjoin a continuance of the litigation because the judgment against one of the parties would not be binding on the others. But where there are continued suits between two single individuals, arising from the separate repetition of trespasses, equity will not interfere by injunction where the right has not been established at law, because a judgment in any one of the suits would be evidence in all of the others. being whether the remedy at law is adequate.[51] To defeat the equitable jurisdiction, however, it is not sufficient that the law should merely afford some remedy; that remedy must be as practical and efficient as is the equitable remedy in rendering justice and as prompt in its administration.[52] An injunction is in many cases more prompt and efficient than any legal remedy, and because of this promptness and efficiency there is a strong tendency to grant injunctions in cases where formerly the remedy at law would have been deemed fully adequate.[53] So the existence of a remedy at law which would ordinarily be available is no objection to the granting of an injunction when, for reasons beyond his control, the complainant cannot avail himself of it;[54] and the same is true where the remedy must be sought in a foreign court.[55]

b. Damages as a Remedy. The principal remedy afforded by courts of law for an injury is money damages. If such damages will constitute an adequate compensation for the injury threatened or inflicted, equity will not interfere by injunction.[56] But the mere fact that damages are recoverable at law is no objec-

d. Insolvency of Defendant.[61] The solvency or insolvency of defendant is not important where the injunction is sought on the ground of the impossibility of measuring the injury in terms of money; there the remedy at law is inadequate, however responsible defendant may be.[62] Insolvency of defendant is frequently an added ground for an injunction where the complainant is really entitled on other grounds to the relief asked.[63] But in many cases an injunction has been granted on the ground that defendant is insolvent, where, were it not for such insolvency, an action for damages would be an adequate remedy. Thus an insolvent defendant has been enjoined from making a wrongful transfer of property,[64] from wrongfully paying out money that belongs to the complainant,[65] or from doing other wrongful acts to the injury of the complainant.[66] Suits for the purchase-money of property have often been restrained where defendant therein has a set-off that he could make use of only in a separate action, and that action would afford him an inadequate remedy because the other party is insolvent.[67] And the payment of money by third persons to one who is insolvent may be restrained at the suit of those entitled to the money.[68] It is self-evident that where damages would fully compensate for the injury and defendant is solvent and able to respond, no injunction should issue.[69] Some courts have held that in cases where damages at law are capable of fully compensating for the injury, the remedy at law is not to be deemed inadequate merely because defendant appears to be insolvent.[70] There can be no doubt that in cases where there are positive reasons why equity should not take jurisdiction and in cases over which the equitable jurisdiction has never been extended, such jurisdiction cannot be conferred by merely showing that defendant is insolvent.[71]

e. Injunction Incidental to Other Relief. An injunction may be granted as incidental to relief asked in a case where equity has jurisdiction for some other purpose, even though the law might afford a sufficient remedy for the specific injury sought to be prevented by the injunction. Equity having jurisdiction for one purpose may dispose of the entire matter in its own way.[72]

f. Negligence of Party Asking Injunction as Affecting Adequacy of Remedy. The remedy at law is not regarded as inadequate, where the injustice is likely to occur because of the party's own negligence, and in such case an injunction will not be granted.[73] Where one has allowed his case to go to trial with insufficient evidence, and has negligently omitted to file a bill of discovery, he is not entitled to an injunction.[74]

the remedy provided by statute is an adequate one;[75] but if the statutory remedy is not adequate a bill for injunction lies.[76]

b. By Criminal Proceedings. Although the wrongful act sought to be enjoined has also been made the subject of criminal prosecution by statute, the complainant is entitled to an injunction in case such prosecution is not an adequate remedy to prevent or make good the injury to him.[77] It is otherwise in case the criminal prosecution will effectually redress the complainant's wrong.[78]

3. Remedy by Appeal, Certiorari, Writ of Prohibition, Quo Warranto, or Mandamus. An injunction will not be granted when relief may be obtained by an appeal,[79] by certiorari,[80] by a writ of prohibition,[81] or by habeas corpus.[82] So also quo warranto is the proper and adequate remedy in many cases, particularly where the question involved is really the title to an office.[83] A mandatory injunction will not be granted where mandamus furnishes an adequate remedy.[84] Such is the case where the object of the bill is to compel the performance of some official ministerial act as required by law.[85]

4. Remedy Outside the Courts. Where the complainant has an adequate means of redress in his own hands,[86] or before some private quasi-judicial tribunal,[87] he is not entitled to an injunction. It is no objection to an injunction, however, that the complainant may have the right to abate a nuisance or remove an obstruction or otherwise redress his own grievance by force. Although he may be allowed to take the law into his own hands in some cases, the law will in no case compel him to do so.[88]

G. Conduct of Complainant as Affecting Right — 1. Fraudulent or Dishonest Conduct. The applicant for an injunction is governed by the usual equitable rules, and the relief will be denied him, even though he shows that he has a right and would otherwise be entitled to the remedy, in case he himself has acted dishonestly, fraudulently, or illegally.[89] It is not enough to show that defendant is without right; the complainant who seeks equity must do equity and must affirmatively show himself to be equitably entitled to the relief asked.[90]

3. Laches — a. In General. The mere lapse of time, independent of the statute of limitations, may be a sufficient ground for denying an injunction unless a legal excuse for such delay is shown.[92] It has been held, however, that laches will not bar relief where complainant's right is clear and of such character as entitles him to ask the interference of the court without resorting to law for the establishment of his right.[93] Furthermore it has been held that delay will not constitute a bar, although complainant has suffered a considerable time to elapse where he has frequently protested to defendant against the doing of the act sought to be enjoined.[94] No arbitrary rule exists for determining what constitutes laches, but the question

c. Delay Prejudicial to Defendant. Where plaintiff, with knowledge of all the facts, has delayed so long in seeking equitable relief, without sufficient excuse, that the injury to defendant if the injunction is granted will be much greater by reason of expenditures, etc., than that suffered by plaintiff, an injunction will be refused.[1]

d. Delay Prejudicial to Third Persons. When plaintiff has improperly delayed action until the right of third persons have intervened and an injunction cannot be granted without substantial injury to such rights, an injunction will be denied.[3]

e. Excuse For Delay. Laches will not bar plaintiff's right to an injunction if a legal excuse for the delay is proved.[4] For instance, where plaintiff has used due diligence and investigated every fact suggested by the surrounding circumstances, ignorance of an essential fact will excuse delay.[5]

H. Former Applications For Injunction as Affecting Right — 1. Former Injunction Dissolved or Application Refused. Where the complainant has obtained an injunction which has later been dissolved, he may be entitled to a second injunction if he amends his bill or files a supplemental one;[6] but he is not entitled to a second injunction on grounds that were set up in his first bill or should have been set up.[7]

2. Former Injunction Existing. If the complainant has obtained an injunction in one court and that injunction is still in force, there is no need for a second injunction in that or in another court, and it will be refused.[8]

See 27 Cent. Dig. tit. "Injunction," §§ 199, 200.

I. Injunction Ineffectual or Unnecessary — 1. In General. A court of equity will refuse to grant an injunction where circumstances are such that the injunction cannot be enforced by the court, or where such enforcement will require a continuous supervision on the part of the court.[9] In like manner a court will refuse an injunction where for any reason it can be of no benefit to the complainant.[10] Such is the case where the complainant has already in some other manner obtained the relief sought.[11]

2. Injuria Sine Damno. A defendant will not be enjoined from doing an illegal or wrongful act where, because of the illegality or for other reasons, the attempted action will be void and of no effect, and hence of no injury to the complainant.[12]

3. Change in Circumstances After Suit Brought. Where, after the filing of the bill, events occur which render an injunction unnecessary or ineffectual, it will generally be refused;[13] but defendant cannot, by hastening his wrongful acts to completion after the filing of the bill, thereby deprive the court of jurisdiction. Although it cannot prevent the act, it can give damages.[14] It has also been held that the abandonment by defendant of his illegal course of action is not sufficient reason for denying the injunction asked;[15] and the same is true of a mere proposition on the part of a defendant, made after the bill is filed, to change his course of action so as to avoid the injury.[16]

J. Relative Convenience and Injury[17] — 1. In General. If it is clear that there is a violation of a right of the complainant and his injury is regarded as irreparable and his other remedies inadequate, he is ordinarily entitled to an injunction even though the injunction will cause defendant a greater loss than his own.[18] But in any event, when the injunction will cause great injury to defendant and will confer no benefit or very little benefit in comparison upon the complainant, it is within the discretion of the court to refuse the application.[19]

Sullivan v. Jones, etc., Steel Co., 208 Pa. St. 540, 57 Atl. 1065, 66 L. R. A. 712, so holding where an injunction was sought to protect the possession and enjoyment of property as against its destruction by the artificial use of the land of another.

A public necessity will not prevent equitable relief when private property is being taken without compensation. Cilly v. Cincinnati, 7 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 344, 2 Cinc. L. Bul. 135.

Injury to real estate.— A continuing trespass or permanent injury may be enjoined, although the injunction will cost defendant more than failure to grant it would cost complainant. A. 712; Walters v. McElroy, 151 Pa. St. 549. The question whether complainant shall have a prohibitory injunction or, if the work affecting the property has been done, a mandatory injunction requiring the restoration of the estate to its former condition depends upon a consideration of the equities between the parties. Lynch v. Union Sav. Inst., supra. In general where defendant has gone on without right and without excuse, in an attempt to appropriate complainant's property, or to interfere with his rights, and has changed the condition of his real estate, he is compelled to undo so far as possible what he has wrongfully done affecting complainant and pay the damages. Lynch v. Union Sav. Inst., supra; Lynch v. Union Sav. Inst., 158 Mass. 394, 33 N. E. 603. On the other hand, where, by an innocent mistake, erections have been placed a little upon complainant's land, and the damage caused to defendant by their removal would be greatly disproportionate to the injury of which complainant complains, the court will not order their removal, but will leave complainant to his remedy at law. Diversion of water.— A mandatory injunction may be obtained to compel the restoration of water to its natural channel, even though great loss to defendant would result without apparent benefit to plaintiff. Corning v. Troy Iron, etc., Factory, 40 N. Y. 191.

Loss of profits.— An injunction will not be refused where the complainant's property is about to be taken wrongfully, on the ground that defendant can make more money out of the property than the complainant can. Likewise, where the complainant can at comparatively slight cost protect himself, he is not entitled to equitable relief.[20] In all cases the court takes into consideration the relative inconvenience to be caused to the parties, and will refuse an injunction if it appears inequitable to issue it.[21] The court may, however, refuse to consider the comparative loss or inconvenience to defendant where his action has been wanton and unprovoked.[22]

2. Temporary or Preliminary Injunctions. The discretionary power of the court in granting or refusing a temporary injunction should be exercised with a particular view to the relative amount of inconvenience or injury to be suffered by the parties. If the injunction will cause defendant little inconvenience it should be granted even though the complainant's rights are not clearly established.[23] But if the injunction will cause defendant more injury than its refusal

Mandatory injunctions.— The general proposition applies particularly to injunctions mandatory in their nature (Springfield v. Springfield St. R. Co., 182 Mass. 41, 64 N. E. 577); and a defendant will not ordinarily be compelled to pull down an expensive structure because it does a comparatively slight injury to the complainant (Cobb v. Massachusetts Chemical Co., 179 Mass. 423, 60 N. E. 790; Brande v. Grace, 154 Mass. 210, 31 N. E. 633; Engle v. Thorn, 3 Duer (N. Y.) 15).

Tortious act.— The principle that the court will refuse to enjoin where greater injury will result from granting than from refusing an injunction has no application where the act complained of is in itself as well as in its incidents tortious. would impose on the complainant, it should generally not be issued.[24] The same principle applies in case the issuance or refusal of the injunction will cause injury to the public and third persons, the rule being that even though as against defendant alone the complainant may be entitled to the order asked, the court may in its discretion refuse it because of public or outside interests.[25]

K. Injury or Inconvenience to the Public. The interests of the public are to be taken into consideration by the court, and when the issuance of an injunction will cause serious public inconvenience or loss, without a correspondingly great advantage to the complainant, no injunction will be granted.[26] If the injunction

cuting suits rests on the clear authority vested in them over persons within their jurisdiction.[41] An injunction to stay proceedings in courts of law is not directed against the court itself but against the parties to the proceeding.[42] An injunction, granted at the instance of a private citizen, restraining a judge, duly commissioned by the governor of the state, from discharging his judicial functions, is wholly unwarranted.[43] The court in which the action sought to be enjoined is pending may proceed despite the injunction, in case the enjoined party chooses to commit a contempt by disobeying the order, and the judgment of the court of law will be valid just as if no injunction had ever been issued.[44] However, if the attention of the court is properly called to the fact that a party has been enjoined from proceeding, it will usually not permit the party to disobey the injunction, and will stay the proceeding out of respect for the court issuing the injunction.[45]

2. Persons in Whose Favor Injunctions May Be Issued. An action will not ordinarily be enjoined at the instance of one not a party thereto,[46] particularly where complainant is not interested in the decision of that action,[47] where the judgment in that action will not conclude the rights of complainant and he will suffer no injury,[48] or where he may become a party to that action and protect his rights therein.[49] But the general rule is subject to many exceptions, and where complainant is likely to suffer irreparable injury,[50] or where the continuation of the action will result in causing a multiplicity of suits or other unnecessary difficulty,[51] the action will be enjoined on his application. Here, as always,[52] complainant must come into equity with clean hands.[53] The fact that a defendant has appeared in an action at law and pleaded thereto does not deprive him of his right to an injunction against the prosecution of that action.[54]

3. Grounds of Jurisdiction — a. More Adequate Remedy. The object of equity in restraining proceedings at law is to afford a more plain, adequate, and complete remedy for the wrong complained of than the party can have at law.[55] The jurisdiction to enjoin actions or other proceedings at law is to be sparingly exercised, and only when other remedies are inadequate and the equities invoking it are apparent and strong.[56] Where plaintiff in the action at law is not abusing the legal process, and defendant is not being oppressed or defrauded, then of course such defendant has no standing in a court of equity and no right to an injunction.[57] The remedy at law is not inadequate merely because complainant has no defense whatever either in law or equity,[58] nor will equity interfere merely because one fears that the court of law will decide incorrectly.[59] An injunction will not be granted on the ground that the well settled rules of law will work a hardship in the individual case.[60] So where by statute the right to pursue a remedy at law is positively given, it may be pursued and equity will not interfere, since where positive law in point of fact injures, it is the legislature which must furnish the corrective, not the courts.[61] When the bringing in of new parties is necessary in order to do complete justice, and this cannot be done at law, equity will assume jurisdiction of the case and enjoin the proceedings at law.[62]

b. Unfair Advantage and Abuse of Process. When a party is attempting, through the instrumentality of an action at law, to obtain an unconscionable advantage of another,[63] as where an unfair, oppressive, or fraudulent use is being made of legal process,[64] equity will restrain such action.

c. Prevention of Irreparable Injury. A judicial proceeding will be enjoined to restrain the assertion of doubtful rights in a manner productive of irreparable damage, and to prevent injury to a person from the doubtful title of others.[65]

d. Protection of Officers of Court in Execution of Its Orders. If an officer of a court of equity is sued at law for carrying out his orders, the action will be enjoined.[66] For instance, if a receiver, guardian, or committee of a lunatic, appointed in one court, be prosecuted in any other court for his official acts, the court from which he derived his authority will enjoin such a suit.[67]

e. Confining Litigation to One Forum. The court first having possession of the case — its power being adequate to the administration of complete justice in the premises — should retain its jurisdiction, and efforts by either party to divert the litigation to another court may be restrained by injunction, especially after an adverse decision in the court to which resort is first had.[68]

f. Aid of Equitable Remedy.[69] Where complainant shows himself to be entitled to some purely equitable remedy, thus giving equity jurisdiction of the case, an injunction will be granted to restrain pending or threatened actions at law concerning the same subject-matter.[70] Equity having obtained jurisdiction for one purpose will generally dispose of the entire case and enjoin actions at law in order to prevent circuity of action and a multiplicity of suits and to render justice more completely and conveniently.[71]

g. Multiplicity and Vexatious Suits[72] — (i) In General. An undisputed ground of equity jurisdiction to enjoin pending or threatened actions at law is the avoidance of a multiplicity or circuity of actions and the prevention of vexatious ones. Courts are not altogether agreed as to what constitutes such a multiplicity as to justify the interference of equity, but where this multiplicity exists equity will take jurisdiction, determine the rights of all the parties in one proceeding, and enjoin all actions at law relating to the same subject-matter.[73] In such cases the existence of a perfect defense at law makes no difference; the jurisdiction is exercised to prevent the necessity of making that defense in a multitude of suits with the attendant trouble and expense.[74] Where a multiplicity of suits between the same parties is threatened, it is proper to restrain the prosecution of all but one and allow that one to proceed.[75]

(II) Multitude Alone Not Multiplicity. The fact that there is a multitude of actions does not in itself constitute multiplicity.[76] In order to maintain an injunction against numerous separate parties, to restrain them from prosecuting separate actions against complainant, they must have a common title, or a community of right or interest in the subject-matter of the controversy, and a community of interest in the questions of law and fact involved in the litigation.[77] The mere fact that the actions grew out of the same occurrence and depend for

Multiplicity must affect plaintiff. The objection of a multiplicity of suits must be one to which plaintiff will be subject, and of which he may complain. A person liable in respect to a proceeding which may create a lien or cloud on the title of his separate property cannot obtain an injunction because there are others whose property may be similarly affected. Crevier v. New York, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 340.

"The object to be attained by resort to a court of equity, in such cases, is, to obtain a final determination of the particular right in controversy, as between all the parties concerned, by a single issue, instead of leaving the right open to litigation by separate suits brought by each of the parties in interest." Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. McFarlan, 31 N. J. Eq. 730, 754.

Single question involved — Illustration. — The Earl of Powis fenced up a certain common forest. Complainant and others, claiming rights of common, broke down the fence. The earl then brought eight suits in trespass. An injunction against those suits was obtained because there was a common question involved — the right of the earl to fence the common. Powell v. Powis, 1 Y. & J. 159.

their solution upon the same questions of fact and of law is not sufficient, where there is no community of interest.[78] Equity will not enjoin the prosecution of separate suits by several parties against the same person, and compel them to be determined in one proceeding, if each claim is a distinct cause of action, arising out of different transactions and relating to different property.[79] If a defendant has an independent cause of action against plaintiff, he may sue at law thereon, and his suit will not be enjoined, even though he might have made use of his cause of action as a counter-claim or set-off in the action brought by plaintiff.[80]

(III) Adequate Remedy at Law by Consolidation. Where it is possible by a consolidation of the actions at law to avoid a multiplicity of actions, there is no ground for the interference of equity.[81]

(IV) Disputed Right Must Affect Many Persons. Where actions brought or threatened are not in themselves vexatious, and the right has not been established at law, to entitle a party to maintain a bill of peace the right claimed must be one affecting many persons, a suitable number of whom must be before the court; if the right is disputed between two persons only, the bill should in most cases be dismissed, for as between them the first judgment might be used as a bar in all the other actions.[82]

(V) Necessity of First Ascertaining Right at Law. If a bill of peace cannot be justified on the ground of the great number of parties interested in common, it will be allowed in general only where complainant has satisfactorily established his right at law.[83]

(VI) Repeated Ejectment Actions. At common law the judgment in an ejectment suit did not operate as a bar to subsequent actions for the same purpose, and there was no limit to the number that might be brought, however much the vexation and cost to the possessor of the land and however just his claim. Under these circumstances equity early interfered by injunction to prevent repeated vexatious ejectment suits.[84] An injunction will not be granted, however, until the title to the land in dispute has been fully and satisfactorily established at law. It is not necessary that there should have been any specific number of trials at law, but they must have uniformly established the title in favor of complainant. Even one judgment in his favor may be sufficient.[85] But where many ejectment suits have been brought, and are still pending, it has been held proper, even though the title has not been determined, to enjoin all but one and to let that one proceed.[86]

(VII) VEXATIOUS SUITS. Equity has jurisdiction to enjoin vexatious suits, not brought in good faith and instituted for annoyance and to cause unnecessary litigation.[87] But actions are not necessarily vexatious because they are numerous,[88] nor where they are successive.[89]

(VIII) INJUNCTION INCIDENTAL TO JURISDICTION ON OTHER GROUNDS. Where equity has obtained jurisdiction of a case on some special equitable ground, it will retain jurisdiction for all purposes and do complete justice; and in such case, in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits, the complainant is entitled to an injunction, as incidental to his principal case, to prevent other actions upon the same subject-matter.[90]

Source of equity jurisdiction.— It is the previous determination of the title at law by an inconclusive judgment that gives equity its whole jurisdiction. The determination of the title pertains exclusively to the court of law, and equity can only determine, not whether the title has been rightly found at law, but whether sufficient effort has been made in order to its being rightly found. The rule is that the complainant must be in possession, and must have established his right at law. No precise number of trials is necessary. Marsh v. Reed, 10 Ohio 34.

h. Fraud[91] — (i) In General. Courts of law and courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction to relieve in cases of fraud. Courts of equity assumed such jurisdiction in earliest times, and have still retained it even though courts of law are competent to give relief.[92] This jurisdiction is not concurrent, however, in the sense that each party is at liberty to take his choice of courts, nor that the injured party has the option of going into equity after the other has already sued at law.[93] Whether a suit can be brought in equity at all depends, not only upon which party is bringing it, but also upon the remedy that is asked.[94] Where the injured party seeks some equitable remedy before any action at law is begun, it is generally held that equity will assume jurisdiction and proceed to dispose of the whole case, and enjoin the bringing of actions at law even though a court of law might also have been able to give adequate relief.[95] But when an action at law has been brought by either party and adequate relief can be obtained in that action, equity will rarely entertain a bill for relief, much less restrain the prosecution of the action at law.[96] Nevertheless where by fraud a party has an unfair advantage in proceedings in a court of law, which must necessarily make that court an instrument of injustice, and it is therefore against conscience that he should use that advantage, a court of equity will interfere and restrain him from proceeding with the action and from reaping the benefit of his improper advantage.[97] Without considering whether defendant can set up his defense of fraud in the action at law and secure complete justice, courts of equity, when convinced that plaintiff is suing on a fraudulent claim or is attempting

They also confine it, when the point is seasonably and properly made and insisted on, to transactions where, in consequence of the indicated state of facts, there appears to be ground for employing some mode of action, or some kind of aid or relief not practicable in a court of law, but allowable in equity."

to make a fraudulent use of his action, have assumed jurisdiction and enjoined that action.[98]

(II) Necessity For Existence of Fraud. Where the facts alleged do not amount to fraud, of course there will be no injunction against the action.[99] So where the fraudulent representations were made by a third person, not acting for plaintiff at law, an injunction will not issue.[1]

i. Accident and Mistake. The same rules may be laid down as governing cases of accident and mistake as in cases of fraud. The right to relief depends upon the adequacy of the remedy at law, except that many courts favor equitable jurisdiction here as in cases of fraud.[2] The usual rules apply in the matter of requiring the mistake to be mutual,[3] and in cases where the mistake is purely a mistake of law.[4] Accident and mistake are often ground for asking some specific equitable remedy, such as reformation or cancellation, and in such case the court may take complete jurisdiction and enjoin an action at law.[5]

One who has obtained a fraudulent divorce decree may be enjoined from setting it up as

But the putting in of a defense that would not be sustained in a court of law will not be enjoined.[7] A defense is not to be enjoined merely because plaintiff is no longer in a position to rebut it because his witnesses are dead or incompetent.[8]

(11) STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS. A defendant will not be enjoined from pleading the statute of limitations when the delay in bringing the action was not caused by artifice or fraud on the part of defendant or by an injunction since dissolved.[9] But where such delay was caused by an injunction obtained at defendant's instance, he is not equitably entitled to use the statute as a defense and will be enjoined.[10]

4. EXISTENCE OF ANOTHER SUFFICIENT REMEDY — a. Remedy at Law in General. Since it is a general rule that an injunction will not be granted for any purpose where the law furnishes an adequate remedy,[11] it follows as a matter of course that an action at law will not be enjoined where adequate relief can be obtained in the court where that action is pending.[12] The remedy at law is not inadequate merely because the court refuses to grant a continuance or to postpone a trial, this being a discretionary matter for that court;[13] nor because the remedy at law is not quite so prompt as the remedy in equity;[14] nor because complainant is unable to furnish the bond required by law as a prerequisite to the remedy.[15]

b. Court of Law More Suitable Forum For Questions Involved. An action at law will not ordinarily be enjoined where a court of law is a more suitable forum for a trial of the questions involved. Where the question in the action sought to be enjoined is one properly triable at law, a court of equity will not usurp the function of the court of law by granting an injunction.[16] Where the title to land is being tested in an action at law, an injunction will rarely be granted even in cases where equity would have concurrent jurisdiction.[17] So the proper construction,[18] or the constitutionality[19] of a statute, or the validity of an ordinance,[20] is a purely legal question, the litigation of which in a court of law will not ordinarily be enjoined.

c. Defense Available in Actions at Law[21] — (i) In General. Matters that will constitute a defense of which the complainant may avail himself in a suit pending or threatened against him cannot be made the ground of an injunction to restrain proceedings in such suit.[22] Furthermore, an action will not be enjoined

v. Dickson, 13 Ir. Eq. 216. See Lapeer County Com'rs v. Hart, Harr. (Mich.) 157, holding that the inability to take an appeal because of lack of funds does not make the remedy by appeal inadequate. while it is uncertain whether the court of law will entertain a defense.[23] And a fortiori an action will not be enjoined on grounds that constitute no defense either at law or in equity.[24] Nevertheless the existence of a defense at law does not make an injunction against the action at law improper when for any reason the court of equity is a more suitable tribunal for the determination of the matter or where equitable remedies, unavailable in the court of law, are necessary;[25] and the defense at law is regarded as inadequate unless it is available in the courts of the state where the injunction is asked.[26]

(D) Laches and Statute of Limitations. Generally speaking mere delay in bringing an action is no ground for an injunction against its prosecution; although delay, along with other circumstances constituting an equitable estoppel, may be.[36] The right to plead the statute of limitations does not constitute an equitable defense, and therefore the fact that the period fixed by the statute has run is no ground for enjoining the action at law, even though the plea of the statute cannot be made available at law.[37]

(III) Both Legal and Equitable Defenses. Where complainant has a purely equitable defense as well as a perfect legal one, equity will usually take jurisdiction of the case, and incidentally enjoin the action at law.[38]

(IV) Want of Consideration. The fact that an instrument sued upon at law was without consideration is no ground for enjoining the action.[39]

(V) Failure of Consideration—(A) In General. Where one of the parties to a contract has failed to perform his part, especially in cases where land has been sold with general covenant of warranty, and later it appears that the title is defective, the courts are not in harmony as to the circumstances under which the vendee can obtain an injunction against an action for the collection of the purchase-money or the enforcement of the contract. In cases where the defect of title or the non-performance can be used as a defense in the action at law, it would seem that there is no reason for the interposition of a court of equity.[40] But where the defense could not be availed of in the action at law, or where some special equitable remedy is necessary to do complete justice, or the remedy at law is otherwise inadequate, there is no objection to an injunction restraining the action at law.[41] Cases seeming to make mere failure of consideration the ground for enjoining an action can generally be justified on the foregoing grounds. Where a defendant is sued on a negotiable note, the consideration for which has failed, the suit will be enjoined and the note ordered delivered up for cancellation to prevent its coming into the hands of a bona fide purchaser.[42] In the case of a sale of land the vendee still has a right of action against his vendor on the covenant of warranty, and many courts hold that this in itself affords an adequate remedy at law, and therefore refuse an injunction against an action for the purchase-price.[43]

(B) Insolvency of Grantor. Ordinarily the collection of the purchase price will not be enjoined unless the grantor or covenantor is insolvent, since otherwise an action at law on the covenant would be an adequate remedy.[44] And an injunction may be refused, even though insolvency is shown.[45]

(C) Eviction Under Paramount Title. Where the vendee has been actually evicted by one holding title paramount, he is entitled to an injunction against the collection of the purchase-money.[46]

(D) Defect in Title. An injunction has been held improper where the purchaser had notice of the defect of title or adverse claim at the time of his purchase.[47] But if the defect in the title was fraudulently concealed an injunction will be granted.[48] According to some decisions where a purchaser has been let into possession and has continued without interruption or eviction by one holding a paramount title, he is not, in the absence of fraud, entitled to equitable relief from payment of the purchase-money on the ground of defect of title.[49] Unless there is fraud on the part of the vendor an actual eviction is a prerequisite to the obtaining of an injunction, and a mere threat to evict or the mere existence of a defect in the title is not alone sufficient.[50] There is a line of cases, however, which hold that equity will enjoin the collection of purchase-money of land, on the ground of a defect of title after the purchaser has taken possession under a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, if the title is questioned by a suit, either prosecuted or threatened, or if the purchaser can show clearly that the title is defective, even though no fraud is shown and there has been no eviction.[51] Some of the courts hold that where no suit to enforce the adverse claim has been actually brought, an injunction will not be granted.[52] Again it has been held that the fact that such a suit is actually pending is in itself sufficient ground for an injunction,[53] although the contrary has been held in a well considered case.[54]

(E) Deficiency in Amount. It has been said that a deficiency in quantity of land sold is ground for enjoining the collection of the purchase-price.[55]

(F) Where Contract of Sale Is Executory. A distinction is to be made between cases where the purchaser has actually received possession and a deed of warranty has been given, and cases where the sale is still executory and the purchaser has only an agreement to convey or bond for title; in the case of an unexecuted contract for the sale of land, the vendee is entitled to have that for which he contracts, before he can be compelled to pay, and if the vendor has no title at the time he agreed to convey, equity will enjoin him from proceeding at law for the purchase-money.[56]

(G) No Actual Failure of Consideration. In many cases where an injunction was sought on the ground of failure of consideration, it has been refused because there was no actual failure.[57]

(VI) FRAUD. Ordinarily if an action is brought upon any contract or evidence of indebtedness which has been obtained by fraud, defendant can make a good defense at law, and a bill in equity to restrain the prosecution of that action will be dismissed.[58] But if the cause of action is likely to be transferred to some bona fide purchaser against whom the defense would not avail,[59] or if for any reason the party who is liable to be sued, or who has been sued, cannot, in an action at law, present his defense as fully and effectually as he could in a court of equity, and such disability has been brought about by any fraud, equity will give relief and enjoin the action at law.[60]

(VII) PAYMENT OR DISCHARGE. The fact that a debt or obligation has been paid, discharged, or released is in ordinary cases an adequate defense at law to an action for collection or for the enforcement of the obligation, and such action will not be enjoined.[61] But where the defense at law is not clearly adequate an injunction may issue, and of course an injunction may be proper on other equitable grounds.[62]

(VIII) SET-OFF. Where a complainant has a set-off to the cause of action upon which he is sued at law, and it is possible to avail himself of it in the action at law itself, he is not entitled to an injunction because of the set-off.[63] But where there are mutual demands between the parties which cannot be set off at law, but which a court of equity may apply in satisfaction of each other without interfering with the equitable rights of any person, the fact that plaintiff at law is insolvent is sufficient ground for enjoining his action and allowing the set-off in equity.[64] Such is the case where an equitable accounting or the winding-up of a partnership is necessary to determine the complainant's counter-claim.[65] Even though the set-off is a purely equitable one, the action at law is usually not enjoined unless plaintiff therein is insolvent; if solvent, an action against him on the counter-claim is an adequate remedy.[66]

(IX) Former Adjudication. After a question has once been decided in a court of competent jurisdiction, a second action on the same subject-matter will usually not be enjoined, because the former adjudication is an adequate defense at law.[67] However, subsequent actions may be enjoined on the ground that they are vexations.[68]

(X) Incompetency of Witnesses to Establish a Defense. Where a defendant has a perfect legal defense to an action at law, but cannot prove it for the reason that the only possible witnesses are incompetent to testify because of interest or otherwise, equity will in some cases enjoin the action at law and allow the defense to be proved in equity.[69]

there is danger that the evidence of the defense may be lost by lapse of time, inasmuch as the action at law may be terminated by a dismissal or a nonsuit,[73] or where the defense at law is inadequate because some equitable remedy is necessary.[74] This is particularly true where the cause of action is on an instrument bearing on its face the evidence of its invalidity.[75]

(XIII) INVALIDITY OF LAWS OR ORDINANCES UNDER WHICH SUIT BROUGHT. An action will not be enjoined merely because brought under an invalid ordinance or law, since such invalidity is a legal defense and the remedy at law is adequate.[76]

5. Injunctions Against Suits in Equity. It is a general rule that a party will not be restrained by injunction from proceeding with a suit in equity, because complainant's equitable rights can be fully protected in that suit.[93] An order to stay such suit should be obtained by an application in that court itself.[94] It follows that equity will not enjoin a suit to obtain an injunction,[95] or an accounting,[96] or a receiver.[97] Nor will a foreclosure suit be enjoined for the relief of one who might obtain full relief in that suit itself.[98] However, a court of equity has "power" to enjoin a party from proceeding with other equitable suits, and such an injunction, when issued, is not void and must be obeyed.[99] But the power should be exercised only in extreme cases.[1] The court first acquiring jurisdiction of a case will protect that jurisdiction by enjoining an action by the same parties on the same subject-matter in another court, even though that other court may also have equity jurisdiction.[2] Wherever complainant's rights cannot be fully protected in the other suit it will be enjoined.[3] An injunction will be granted in actions of interpleader against the further prosecution of suits against complainant, even though one of these suits may be in equity, because of the necessity of disposing of the whole matter in one action.[4] And where equity has undertaken to administer the assets of an insolvent corporation, so far as they are within its jurisdiction, other equitable suits for the same purpose will be enjoined.[5]

See 27 Cent. Dig. tit. "Injunction," § 29.

Rule restated.— "A Court of Equity has no power to restrain by an injunction, or to set aside, the proceedings of a subordinate tribunal of special jurisdiction, upon the ground that it has threatened to exceed, or has exceeded its authority and powers as defined by law, but that the proper remedy of an aggrieved party, in all such cases, must be sought in a court of law. There may formerly have been, and may still be, some exceptions to this general rule, as where the effect of the proceedings sought to be restrained or annulled, would be to cast a cloud upon a title to real estate, or where the interposition of the court is plainly necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits." So a bill of peace lies to prevent a multiplicity of suits, even though the suits may themselves be in courts of equity.[6]

6. Injunctions Against Particular Proceedings or Remedies in Civil Actions — a. Introduction of Evidence. The introduction in an action at law of evidence obtained by fraud or duress will be enjoined, where in justice and good faith it should not be used against complainant.[7]

b. Appeals. A party will not be enjoined from prosecuting an appeal from a judgment against him on any ground that might be made use of in the appellate court.[8]

c. Settlement or Discontinuance of Action. Under some circumstances a plaintiff will be enjoined from dismissing his action, as where an assignor attempts to dismiss an action at law brought in his name for the benefit of the assignee,[9] or where one has given a power of attorney to another authorizing the use of his name in a suit for the other's benefit;[10] and especially where such a dismissal would work irreparable injury because complainant would be barred by the statute of limitations from commencing a subsequent action.[11] But the settlement of a suit will not be enjoined merely because creditors of plaintiff would be benefited in case its prosecution was continued.[12]

7. Injunctions Against Mandamus, Writ of Prohibition, and Supersedeas. Equity has no jurisdiction to grant an injunction to stay proceedings on a mandamus or a writ of prohibition,[13] and the effect of a supersedeas cannot be controlled or destroyed by injunction.[14]

8. Concurrent Jurisdiction, as Affecting Right to Relief. In all cases of concurrent jurisdiction, the tribunal which first obtains jurisdiction of the subject-matter ordinarily will proceed and finally dispose of it.[15] Where a court of law first acquires jurisdiction, equity will not interfere by injunction, unless there is some equitable circumstance in the case of which the party cannot avail himself at law.[16] And even though the suit in equity is begun first, it does not follow necessarily that the action at law will be enjoined. An injunction will be refused where the question can be tried better before a jury.[17]

9. Confession of Judgment as Prerequisite to Allowance of Injunction. Where an injunction is asked because of the existence of equitable defenses not cognizable at law, courts have frequently refused to enjoin the action prior to judgment therein, on the ground that complainant's equitable rights may be fully protected by enjoining execution of the judgment,[18] except in cases where a discovery is asked in order to assist the defense at law.[19] The general rule is that it is in the discretion of the chancellor whether he will stay proceedings in an action at law prior to the rendition of judgment therein, or whether he will require complainant to confess judgment as a condition of obtaining an injunction against its execution.[20] A confession of judgment has often been required,[21] but in such case the order should require execution of the judgment to be stayed and the judgment itself to be dealt with as equity may finally direct.[22] In other cases it has been said that where complainant has ground for equitable relief and also a good legal defense, he need not abandon the latter by confessing judgment in order to obtain an injunction.[23]

10. Designation of Tribunal by Statute as Affecting Right to Relief. Where the legislature has specified a particular tribunal for determining a question, that tribunal ought not in general to be prevented from proceeding with the action or proceeding before it.[24] This rule has been applied to courts of probate,[25] of admiralty,[26] and of insolvency.[27] Yet here also the necessity of some equitable remedy or the danger of a multiplicity of suits or the probability of irreparable injury may be sufficient ground for an injunction.[28]

England.— Ochsenbein v. Papelier, L. R. 8 Ch. 695, 42 L. J. Ch. 861, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 459, 21 Wkly. Rep. 516; Hoare v. Bremridge, L. R. 8 Ch. 22, 42 L. J. Ch. 1, 27 L. T. Rep. N. Where complainant has a perfect defense at law, to a suit commenced against him there, if the allegations in his bill are true, the court of chancery, although it has concurrent jurisdiction with the court of law in relation to the subject of the suit, will not grant a preliminary injunction for the mere purpose of obtaining exclusive jurisdiction of the case and thus deprive the adverse party of his right to jury trial. Mitchell v. Oakley, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 68.

11. COURT IN WHICH ACTION IS PENDING AS AFFECTING RIGHT TO RELIEF[29] — a. Actions in the Same Court. Ordinarily it is improper to restrain by injunction in one suit proceedings in the same court in another action, because the court can grant as adequate relief in that action as in the one asking the injunction.[30] Nevertheless injunctions have been granted in such cases, even though the action to be enjoined is an equitable one.[31]

b. Actions in Courts of Coördinate Jurisdiction. Although it has been said that a court has no power to enjoin an action pending in another court of coördinate jurisdiction,[32] there is no doubt that such power exists and should be exercised whenever the circumstances justify an injunction.[33]

c. Actions in Courts of Other States or Countries — (i) In General. A court of equity has clear and undoubted jurisdiction, on a proper case being made out, to restrain persons within its jurisdiction from prosecuting suits in foreign courts. The injunction should be granted whenever the equities of complainant require it, and the location of the court where the action is pending is immaterial.[34] This jurisdiction is not founded upon any pretension to judicial or administrative rights abroad, but solely upon the fact that the person of the party to be enjoined

(IV) Evasion of Laws of Domicile. A citizen of one state may be enjoined from prosecuting an action against another citizen of the same state, in a foreign jurisdiction, for the purpose of evading the laws of his own state.[39] An injunction has frequently been granted at the instance of a debtor to restrain a resident creditor from attempting to enforce a claim in a foreign jurisdiction, where the attempt, if successful, would deprive the debtor of his exemption under the local law;[40] especially where the creditor is attempting to reach exempt wages, earned

d. Injunctions by Federal Courts Against Actions in State Courts. Because of the greater danger of a conflict between the two jurisdictions, of which there has been at least one illustration,[44] federal courts will rarely enjoin the prosecution of an action in a state court; and they are prohibited by statute from enjoining actions in the state courts except in bankruptcy proceedings.[45] The

Enjoining execution.— Where a case went into judgment in a state court and was afterward carried to the United States supreme court by writ of error, it was held that a federal court could not issue an injunction to restrain the service of execution federal courts have construed the Judiciary Act to not apply to injunctions in cases where the federal court has acquired jurisdiction before any state action has been started, and hence parties may be enjoined from commencing any such action.[46] And where the federal court acquires jurisdiction of a case it may enjoin the prosecution of actions in state courts to protect its own jurisdiction or as ancillary thereto;[47] as in cases that have been properly removed from a state court to the federal courts.[48]

e. Injunctions by State Courts Against Actions in Federal Courts. In nearly all cases state courts have refused to enjoin the prosecution of a suit in the federal courts.[49] However, a state court may protect its jurisdiction, when it has first attached, by enjoining proceedings in a federal court, and it may enjoin such a proceeding in order to enforce its own process already issued.[50] interest is sufficient to entitle complainant to an injunction against injury to the inheritance.[55]

(III) EQUITABLE INTEREST.[56] An equitable interest in property is in general sufficient title on which to base a suit for an injunction.[57] This doctrine has been applied in proceedings to enjoin waste,[58] trespass,[59] or a wrongful sale,[60] and in proceedings to quiet title.[61]

(IV) LEASEHOLD INTEREST. A lessee has such an interest as entitles him to an injunction to prevent irreparable injury to his leasehold estate.[62]

(V) LIEN OF ATTACHING CREDITOR. A plaintiff in a suit by attachment may have an injunction to prevent acts of waste being committed by an insolvent defendant.[63]

b. Establishment of Right or Title at Law — (I) THE GENERAL RULE AND ITS APPLICATIONS. As a general rule a court of equity will not interfere to protect legal rights in property until the complainant has established his title or right by an action at law,[64] especially where the answer denies the title of the complainant to the property sought to be protected.[65] If the legal right or title the case to a court of law, although it may be necessary to decide between adverse titles.[78]

(F) Protection of Public Domain. Public domain will be protected at the instance of the government without the title being first established at law.[79]

(G) Statutory Exceptions. Under the statutes of one state an injunction may be issued without the title of the party being first established in a suit at law.[80] The title, if in dispute, and the equitable remedy may be determined in the same action.[81] So under the statutes of another state parties in possession need not establish their title at law before bringing suit to restrain waste and trespass.[82]

(III) Trial of Title. A court of chancery is not the appropriate tribunal for the trial of title to land, and where the main object of a suit asking for relief by injunction is to determine the legal title to property,[83] or to fix the boundaries of land,[84] equity will not interfere by injunction, but will remit the parties to a court of law. Likewise equity will not try title to personal property in an injunction suit.[85]

c. Protection Pending Litigation as to Right or Title[86] — (I) In General — (A) Rule Stated. Pending a suit in equity,[87] or at law,[88] an injunction may be granted to preserve in statu quo the property involved until a final settlement of the right or title. The injunction should not, however, give either party an advantage.[89]

Scope of order.— The purpose of a restraining order pendente lite in all cases of this

(B) Substantial Question in Pending Action. An injunction pendente lite may be granted where there appears to be a substantial question between the parties and a reasonable ground to believe that complainant may ultimately be successful in his claim;[90] but it is not necessary that it should clearly appear that complainant will ultimately succeed, it being sufficient if he makes out a prima facie right.[91]

(C) Balance of Convenience. The court, in exercising its discretion in cases where the right or title is in litigation, will be largely guided by the relative inconvenience which would result from granting or refusing the relief.[92]

(D) Terms Imposed. In granting the injunction the court may limit the time for the complainant or defendant to prosecute the pending suit to a speedy determination,[93] or require security to protect defendant in case the complainant ultimately fails.[94]

nature is to preserve property which is the subject of controversy, in its existing condition, until a final hearing and determination of the cause, and the order should be so limited as to simply preserve the status quo and should not give either party an advantage by proceeding in the acquisition or alteration of property the right to which is disputed, while the hands of the other party are tied. See 27 Cent. Dig. tit. "Injunction," § 86.

Substantial nature of question.— Equity will not interfere if it thinks there is no real question between the parties, but if it sees there is a substantial question to be decided it will preserve the property until such question can be regularly disposed of; and in order to support an injunction for such purpose it is not necessary for the court to decide upon the merits in favor of the complainant. If the bill states a substantial question between the parties, the right to the injunction may be good, although the title to the relief may immediately fail. New Jersey Zinc, etc., Co. v. Trotter, 38 N. J. Eq. 3.

Second action.— Where a question has been settled once in law or equity against the complainant, an injunction will not be granted pending a second suit or action. Scope of order.— When plaintiff claims to be the legal owner, he must show that he is prosecuting his suit at law and the injury which he will sustain by the acts of defendant before he can obtain judgment will be irreparable, and in the latter case the court, in continuing the injunction, must make such order as will insure the speedy determination of the suit at law. (II) Use of Property Pending Litigation. A defendant in possession will not be enjoined from the use of the property in controversy unless it is made to appear that complainant will thus lose the fruits of his action at law if he establishes title.[95]

(III) Protection Against Ouster. One in possession of land under a claim of title which is not merely colorable may maintain a suit for an injunction to protect his possession pending litigation as to the title to the property, when dispossession would result in irreparable injury, or where the remedy at law is inadequate;[96] and, as ancillary to a suit in equity, an injunction may be granted to protect possession, in cases in which the complainant would be entitled to the relief if ultimately successful.[97]

(IV) Protection of Funds. Where the matter in litigation is a trust fund, an injunction may be granted to preserve the fund and secure it for the party to whom it may belong upon the final decree,[98] and funds in the court's possession will be protected until the controversy in regard to them has been determined.[99] Where there is danger that the fund in controversy will be lost or dissipated and complainant will lose the fruit of his action, equity will preserve the fund by a restraining order.[1]

See 27 Cent. Dig. tit. "Injunction," § 89.

Pending an action to recover specific personalty, an injunction will lie to restrain defendant from disposing of it, although he may have ample property to satisfy plaintiff in any pecuniary demand. Atkins v. Veach, 7 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 176, 1 Cinc. L. Bul. 234.

Forfeiture.— At the instance of the vendor an injunction will not be granted to restrain a vendee from removing a house which the vendee had erected, and which the vendor claimed on the ground that under the contract of purchase the vendee had forfeited all his rights by failure to pay part of purchase-price. Crane v. Dwyer, 9 Mich. 350, 80 Am. Dec. 87.

Transfer as preventing judgment from being conclusive.— A conveyance or transfer of land will be enjoined pendente lite where such action would prevent judgment at law being conclusive. Cole v. Jerman, 77 Conn. 374, 59 Atl. 425.

Slaves.— The sale or removal of slaves pendente lite was generally restrained. Barnes v. Edward, 17 B. Mon. (Ky.) 632; Leah v. Young, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 18; Miller v. Washburn, 38 N. C. 161; Loftin v. Espy, 4 Yerg. (Tenn.) 84; Smith v. Koontz, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 189.

Fraudulent disposition of property pending action.— Where the aid of equity is sought as ancillary to prevent defendants from fraudulently depriving plaintiff of the anticipated fruits of an action of trespass. by disposing of their property, when there is sufficient probability of a judgment being obtained, the chancellor may and should interpose to prevent the legal remedy from being defeated by fraud. Cottrell v. Moody, 12 B. Mon. (Ky.) 500. But see Burdett v. Fader, 40 Can. L. J. 32.

Assignment of judgment.— In a suit by the United States to set off cross judgments, there is no necessity for an injunction to prevent the transfer by defendant of his judgment against the United States, because, under 18 U. S. St. at L. 481 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 746] any transferee will take subject to the government's right of set-off. Teller v. U. S., 113 Fed. 463, 51 C. C. A. 297.

(VI) PENDING APPEAL. The unsuccessful party in an action at law may be granted an injunction where it appears that otherwise there will be such a change in the status of the subject-matter of the controversy as may render nugatory the judgment of the court of review when announced.[4] But if the injury will be insignificant,[5] or the remedy at law adequate,[6] or if complainant has seemingly acquiesced in defendant's right and allowed him to make great expenditures,[7] or if appellant fails to show a prima facie right,[8] or if the statutes provide a remedy,[9] an injunction will be denied. Pending an appeal from a decision dismissing a bill for an injunction or dissolving one, an injunction will not be granted or revived.[10]

3. TRESPASS OR OTHER INJURY TO PROPERTY[11] — a. Jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of equity, in a proper case, to restrain trespasses is now well settled.[12]

In New York one of the code grounds for an injunction is that defendant, during the pendency of the action, threatens or is about to remove or dispose of his property with intent to defraud plaintiff. This code provision does not apply where a money judgment only is sought. Campbell v. Ernest, 64 Hun 188, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 123, 22 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 218. See also Jerome Co. v. Loeb, 59 How. Pr. 508. But see Malcom v. Miller, 6 How. Pr. 456. It does not warrant an injunction before the trial restraining defendant from disposing of a note which is the cause of action. Sebring v. Lant, 9 How. Pr. 346. Nor does it apply to a case where plaintiff has obtained an attachment against defendant's property. Brooks v. Stone, 11 Abb. Pr. 220, 19 How. Pr. 395.

Discretion of court.— Where the whole matter in controversy is continuance of injunction, or where it appears that such order is necessary to prevent great and irreparable mischief to rights of appellant, the order is usually granted, but it lies in the sound discretion of the chancellor. Van Walkenburgh v. Rahway Bank, 8 N. J. Eq. 725.

Fraud or want of jurisdiction.— If proceedings were fraudulent or collusive or gave the magistrate no jurisdiction, an injunction might issue. The only ground on which the court would have power to do this would be fraud or want of jurisdiction. Coster v. Van Schaick, 64 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 100.

Historical.— The interference of courts of equity by injunction to protect property in cases of trespass is of comparatively modern origin. The remedy was originally confined to cases of waste, that is, cases between parties who were privies in title, such as landlord and tenant, or remainder-man and tenant of a particular estate. The court refused to interfere where the injury was caused by a stranger or one claiming adversely to the owner. The distinction between technical waste and trespass has gradually been disregarded until it no longer exists. The earliest case known in which an injunction was

b. Parties Entitled to Injunction — (I) Complainant in Possession. When the complainant is in possession and seeks to restrain a trespass by one who claims under color of right, the injunction will usually be granted where the threatened acts may tend to the destruction of the inheritance,[13] or would result in a multiplicity of suits,[14] or would produce a confusion of boundaries.[15]

(II) Complainant out of Possession. As a general rule where plaintiff is out of possession and claims possession, the court will refuse to interfere against a defendant in possession under claim of right.[16] But where the threatened granted against trespass is Flamang's Case [cited in Livingston v. Livingston, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 497, 499, 10 Am. Dec. 353], in which Lord Thurlow enjoined a trespasser from working a mine on the ground that irreparable and destructive injury might result otherwise. The parent case in the United States is Livingston v. Livingston, supra, in which Chancellor Kent laid down the rule that where the title is not controverted equity will always interpose to prevent irreparable mischief. Statutes.— Actual possession of land is not essential to maintain the equitable jurisdiction given by the act of June 4, 1889. Reddick v. Meffert, 32 Fla. 409, 13 So. 894.

There are two distinct classes of cases, the one where the party against whom the application for injunction is made is in possession, and the other where plaintiff is in possession and asking the court to protect the estate. A priori it is obvious that the court will draw a clear distinction between the two injury would be irreparable, an injunction will lie at the instance of a complainant out of possession,[17] although in some cases the injunction has been refused even against irreparable injury if the title has not been established at law, and no action to establish it has been brought.[18]

c. Adequate Remedy at Law — (I) In General. The inadequacy of the remedy at law is the basis of the jurisdiction in cases of trespass, and it is now well settled that equity will interfere to prevent the commission or continuance of a trespass where full and ample relief cannot be granted at law, where the value of the inheritance is put in jeopardy, where the trespass goes to the destruction of the property in the character in which it has been enjoyed, or where the relief is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits.[19]

(II) Ordinary or Naked Trespass. Equity will not restrain by injunction classes of cases. If a man claims to be owner of an estate of which he is in possession, or in a position tantamount to that, the court will be very slow to interfere to restrain such an apparent owner from doing those acts which an owner so situated may properly do. There is a wide difference between such case and that of a person claiming to be the owner (whatever the ground of his claim), not taking proceedings at law to recover but coming on the owner's estate and doing acts injurious to it. Lowndes v. Bettle, 33 L. J. Ch. 451, 4 New Rep. 609, 12 Wkly. Rep. 399.

Possession acquired by a tortious trespass on the day the suit for injunction was begun is no defense. Carter v. Warner, 2 Nebr. (Unoff.) 688, 89 N. W. 747.

Where a stranger to the title is in possession, the injunction may be granted, although the complainant is not the sole owner. Gilpin v. Sierra Nevada Consol. Min. Co., 2 Ida. 696, 23 Pac. 547, 1014.

tortious attempt to use and possess the real property of another, or is permanently injuring the estate, an injunction may issue, although a recovery of damages would be adequate, in case the remedy of the complainant is otherwise inadequate at law.[25]

d. Inadequate Remedy at Law — (1) IRREPARABLE INJURY IN GENERAL. It is well settled that if the bill shows that irreparable injury will result from a trespass, a sufficient ground for the interference of equity by injunction to restrain its commission or continuance is made out.[26]

"Irreparable" defined.— Irreparable injury authorizing the interference of a court of chancery need not always be such injury as is beyond the possibility of repair or beyond compensation in damages, nor necessarily great damage; but it is that species of injury, great or small, that ought to be submitted to on the one hand or inflicted on the other, and is of constant and frequent occurrence, so that no fair or reasonable redress can be had therefor in a court of law. Wahle v. Reinbach, 76 Ill. 322. "Irreparable" means that which cannot be repaired, retrieved, put back again, or atoned for. The most absolute and positive instance of it is the cutting down of ornamental trees. Gause v. Perkins, 56 N. C. 177, 69 Am. Dec. 728. The word "irreparable" means that which cannot be repaired, restored, or adequately compensated for in money, or where the compensation cannot be safely measured.

(II) Damages as Inadequate. Where the injury is of such a nature that it cannot be fully compensated in damages,[27] or cannot be measured by any certain pecuniary standard,[28] it is irreparable and the trespass may be enjoined.

(III) Destruction of the Inheritance— (A) In General. The rule is well settled that when the injury goes to the destruction of the inheritance, it is irreparable, and the trespass will be enjoined. The injury may consist in the destruction of that on which the value of the estate depends, or in the destruction of the estate in the character in which it has been enjoyed.[29] So threatened occupation

Rule restated.— In enjoining interference with church property the court said: "The general rule undoubtedly is, that in cases of private trespass an injunction would not be granted, for the reason that the aggrieved party had an adequate common-law remedy by action, where proper damages could be assessed by a jury. In ordinary cases this was found to be sufficient for the protection of property. 'But in cases of a peculiar nature . . . which damages could not compensate, or where the injury reached to the very substance and value of the estate, and went to the destruction of it in the character in which it was enjoyed,' then courts of equity would grant an injunction to prevent the injury complained of. . . . Now it must be admitted that the circumstances of this case are so special, the nature and use of the property itself so peculiar, that an ordinary action of trespass would furnish no adequate compensation for an injury to the possession. . . . The entire value of such property consists in its free and undisturbed use and enjoyment for religious worship." New Elm German Evangelical Cong. v. Hoessli, 13 Wis. 348, 354.

(B) Cutting Timber.[31] The general rule is that the cutting of timber is such a destruction to the inheritance as will cause a court of equity to interfere to restrain the trespass.[32] So where it appears that the trees are necessary to the enjoyment of the property in the particular character in which it has been used,[33] or that the cutting defeats the purpose for which the trees are being grown,[34] an injunction will be granted, but not if the injury results from using trees for the purposes for which they are grown.[35] The injunction has, however, been refused in some cases on the ground that it did not appear that the trees had any particular value,[36] and in others because irreparable injury was not shown.[37] As an exception to the rule that equity will not interfere to prevent a trespass when the impending injury is remediable by the recovery of damages at law,[38] it is held that the destruction of ornamental, shade, and fruit trees, and ornamental shrubbery, is an injury going to the destruction of the inheritance which may be enjoined.[39] In some states the right to injunctive relief against the cutting of timber is regulated by statutes the construction of which is shown in the notes.[40]

In Florida, Rev. St. (1892) § 1469, giving the right to an injunction to any person claiming to own any timbered lands in the state, does not apply to one claiming to own only the turpentine in the trees with the privilege of cutting, boxing, and scraping the trees. McDonald v. Padgett, 46 Fla. 501, 35 So. 336. The owner of timber on lands is not an owner of "timbered" lands within section 1469. Doke v. Peek, 45 Fla. 244, 34 So. 896. The statute, to the extent that it confers jurisdiction on the court of chancery to enjoin trespass on timber lands, by a mere trespasser, without color of right or authority, is constitutional. McMillan v. Wiley, 45 Fla. 487, 33 So. 993. Under Rev. St. § 1469, a bill in equity can be maintained by a party claiming to own timbered lands to enjoin commission of trespasses thereon by the cutting of trees. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Gibson, 43 Fla. 315, 31 So. 230.

In Georgia, where plaintiff has not a "perfect title" required under Civ. Code (1895), § 4927, insolvency or irreparable injury must be alleged. Swindell v. Saddler, 122 Ga. 15, 49 S. E. 753; Wiggins v. Middleton, 117 Ga. 162, 43 S. E. 432. "Perfect title," under Civ. Code, § 4927, giving a right to injunction against cutting timber, means a complete and perfect paper title, capable of being recorded. A parol title is not sufficient to meet requirement of "perfect title," under Civ. Code, § 4927. Powell v. Brinson, 120 Ga. 36, 47 S. E. 499; Wilcox Lumber Co. v. Bullock, 109 Ga. 532, 35 S. E. 52. Where part of plaintiff's chain of title to certain land was a deed executed by an attorney in fact of the grantor containing certain time reservations in favor of the grantor, plaintiff's title was not a "perfect title" within Civ. Grounds for enjoining.— Erecting a building in part on land of another is not a mere trespass for which a pecuniary compensation may be obtained in the ordinary course of law, but plaintiff's estate would be destroyed to a certain extent by rendering it unfit for building. And it is no answer to say that if plaintiffs recover the land in dispute in an action of ejectment they would get the wall which defendant put upon it, because that wall, if suffered to remain, would have to be removed and the foundation filled up before they could have the just use and enjoyment of their property. Herr v. Bierbower, 3 Md. Ch. 456.

(D) Construction and Maintenance of Railroads. A threatened injury of a permanent and irreparable character by a railroad to the vested rights of an individual or another corporation may be enjoined, especially when sought to be done under the color of a charter.[44] So where it clearly appears that a railroad company threatens or is about to enter upon and take permanent possession of land without first having in some way acquired the right to do so, and without making compensation, the landowner is entitled to an injunction[45] on the ground of necessity to prevent irreparable injury,[46] or to prevent a continuing trespass,[47] although there is a remedy at law.[48] A strong case must, however, be presented, and the impending danger must be imminent and impressive to justify the issuing of an injunction as a precautionary and preventive remedy.[49] In case of a conflict in the evidence as to the title to the premises affected, the injunction may be granted in part and refused in part.[50]

(E) Opening Highways. When municipal authorities threaten to enter upon and take permanent possession of land for a public use, without having acquired the right by complying with the statutory requirements, an injunction will be granted to restrain them.[51]

A railroad company has such a title in its right of way as to permit it to obtain an injunction against the construction of a street railroad crossing over its track at a point other than a highway crossing. Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Harrisburg, etc., Electric R. Co., 177 Pa. St. 142, 35 Atl. 624, 34 L. R. A. 572, holding that there was a sufficient increase of danger to the operation of the railroad as to authorize an injunction against the construction by a street railroad company of an overhead crossing, one hundred or more feet in length, at a point where there had never previously been either an overhead or grade crossing.

Good faith as a defense.— Where a railroad has entered upon premises against the express refusal of permission of complainants, it is not entitled to protection on the ground that it has begun its work in good faith and under a misapprehension as to the control of municipal authorities over the premises, or upon the ground that it is making an effort to afford compensation. Morris, etc., R. Co. v. Hudson Tunnel R. Co., 25 N. J. Eq. 384.

Relative convenience and injury.— Where the person injured will obtain but small benefit and the injunction will operate oppressively and to the great annoyance and injury of the other party, an injunction will not be granted unless the wrong is wanton and unprovoked. Morris, etc., R. Co. v. Prudden, 20 N. J. Eq. 530 (holding that an injunction would not be granted against the placing of an additional track in a street in front of plaintiff's premises, none of plaintiff's property being occupied, and there being a remedy by action at law for damages, or, in case the use of the railroad became a nuisance or proved to be a permanent injury without adequate remedy at law, by an injunction to prevent its continuance or for its removal); Higbee v. Camden, etc., R., etc., Co., 20 N. Distinction between public and private trespasses.— An obvious distinction exists between the cases where officers of a corporation are proceeding to appropriate land to the use of the public and an ordinary trespass. In the latter case there is not an attempt to permanently occupy and take from the owner the enjoyment of his property, although his possessory rights may be invaded. Irreparable injury.— A private person who applied for an injunction to restrain a public company or body from entering illegally upon his land is not required to make out a case of destructive trespass or irreparable damage. Continuous injury as distinguished from continuous trespass.— The remedy at law is inadequate where the party injured by the trespass cannot obtain complete redress by one action for damages, but would be forced to bring numerous actions. Equity will in such cases interfere to prevent a multiplicity of suits. The cases in which relief has been granted against trespass on this ground are of two kinds, those where a continuous injury results from one act of trespass by defendant, and those where the injury results from constantly repeated acts of trespass. The authorities are not entirely in harmony on the question whether the constant repetition of a mere trespass by one person who is not insolvent constitutes a sufficient ground for interference by injunction. The tendency and great weight of the modern authorities, however, is to grant the remedy wherever the trespass is vexatiously persisted in, even if the trespasser is not insolvent, as otherwise a multiplicity of suits would result and the action at law would be inadequate. See cases cited supra, this note.

In Florida equity will not interfere to prevent multiplicity of suits where injury to land caused by its occupation for railroad purposes is permanent, since a judgment in an action at law for damages may include damages for future injury. Pensacola, etc., R. Co. v. Jackson, 21 Fla. 146.

Community of interest.— The perpetration of several similar trespasses on each of several distinct persons, thus laying the ground for each to bring a separate action against the same trespasser, does not give rise to such a multiplicity of suits as will justify the granting of an injunction; but there must be some joint or common interest of all in the same wrongful act which is about to be committed. cases of repeated or continuing trespasses.[60] For instance an insolvent trespasser may be enjoined from removing a growing crop[61] or from cutting timber.[62] But insolvency of the trespasser will not of itself give chancery jurisdiction to enjoin a trespass. It is one element to be weighed but it is not of itself decisive.[63] If there are other sufficient means of preventing the commission of the threatened trespass,[64] or no such pressing injury or danger in delay as calls for an injunction,[65] none will issue. Where the main object of suit is to settle title, an injunction to restrain a trespass will not be granted merely because of the insolvency of defendant.[66]

e. Franchises and Privileges.[67] An injunction will be granted to secure a party in the enjoyment of an exclusive privilege which has been conferred by legislative or government grant, such as an exclusive franchise for a bridge,[68] ferry,[69] or toll-road or turnpike.[70] However, to entitle the complainant to an injunction, his right must be clear,[71] his privilege exclusive,[72] and he must be in

If the right is not doubtful, an injunction will always be granted to secure the enjoyment of a statute privilege of which the party is in the actual possession. To restrain multiplicity of suits and prevent immediate damage to a statute privilege is the exercise of a sound discretion. But to prevent future damage that by possibility may arise when plaintiff is not in the possession or enjoyment of a franchise, and perhaps never may be, a court of equity is not called upon to exercise its extraordinary powers. actual possession.[73] If statutes provide a legal remedy the injunction will be denied,[74] but the mere fact that the statute gives treble damages does not prevent the granting of an injunction.[75]

4. Conveyance and Disposition of Property[76] — a. Removal or Destruction of Property. Except where there is a complete remedy at law, as by execution and attachment, an injunction will lie at the instance of creditors and encumbrancers, such as mortgagees,[77] chattel mortgagees,[78] or mechanic's lienors,[79] to aid them in the enforcement of their claims by restraining the removal, disposition, or destruction of property subject to their claims or encumbrances, to their prejudice.[80]
